CROOKED PLACES:

A Story of Struggles and Hopes.

By EDWARD GARRETT, AUTHOR OF "OCCUPATIONS OF A RETIRED LIFE," ETC.

INTRODUCTION.

gates of the heart are set open, that its "Miserere" or its "Te Deum" may pour forth, have you never noticed that though the scoring may vary widely, the tune is always

II. N.S.

EVERY life keeps one or two secrets of experience which it might be well for its fellows to know. In those mysterious times of solemn visitation or thanksgiving, when the

the same? We poor human beings are so strangely prone to forget our common resemblance, that we only recognise it in a sort of joyful wonder. Yet just dare to whisper to another how you felt in your day of weakness or of loss,—not your mere conventional feeling, nor yet the great capital letter of your anguish, but the little secret pain that nestled nameless in your bosom,—and that other will, in ninety cases out of a hundred, stretch forth the warm right hand of brotherhood; whilst nine at least, out of the remaining ten, will store your confidence in secret, and go on their way rejoicing.

But we are such perverse creatures that, slightly altering our words of confession, "we speak what we should leave unsaid, and are silent where we should speak." So many of us are doomed to go through life without being able to utter the pangs and the fears that lie in our very heart of hearts, our only hope being, like that of the woman with the issue, to follow in the crowd behind Jesus, and haply be healed unawares. Thus, how many a preached or written word, which seemed as nothing to him who uttered it, has been as a drop of dew under which some poor scorched heart once more lifted its head to God's blue sky, or as a friendly hand-clasp to some weary soul, alone in the crowd of life?

There is a sadness about this strange silent secrecy of our lives; yet to name a pain is often to fix it; and in many of the straits of life, one walks the braver for not measuring exactly how narrow they are, nor how deep is the gulf below. The visible hand of human help would often lie heavy on us, where the unseen hand of God upholds. And no pointed counsel, nor personal consolation, could ever come to us with such force as the unsuperscribed message of warning or comfort which our own heart appropriates to itself.

And let nobody say that his own life has been too blank and humble to have any such uncoined gold to spare for others' stamping. Have we not seen what treasures some people can work from what others cast aside as rubbish? How many of the truest pictures of life have been limned by men or women who lived quietly among common people, and left no outward history that might not be told in two or three simple dates? Could we have found such wisdom in such homely places? Perhaps not; nevertheless it was there, for those to whom God gave eyes to see.

It is not our strength, but our weakness, that demands wide social circles, varied and stirring experiences. It takes a more complicated educational machinery to teach a blind child than a "sighted" one. We often cannot read the histories that are going on before our eyes in our own dull street. Our spiritual sight is too weak for such small caligraphy, though we can see the same stories afar off, brought out by the lurid flames of some long past martyrdom, or written large in gold and red, with crowns for initial letters, and margins illuminated with battle fields and victorious cavalcades.

It has often struck me that it would not be a bad idea to study the history of every individual member of a family. I think writers are rather unfair in this respect. They pick out the picturesque "bit," the beauty, the genius, or the prodigal, and treat the good grandmother in her arm-chair, the steady father in his counting-house, the patient mother, or the trusted servant, as if they were only useful back-grounding. Writers are not altogether to be blamed for this partiality. Most forms of art demand a central figure, and I am no admirer of that grotesque Pre-Raphaelitism which makes every leaf on a tree as prominent as the lovers who are whispering beneath it. But it seems to me that these people who are never seen but in their supernumerary parts, must each have a history of his own, which may be worth even more than the picturesque "bit;" not perhaps for its intrinsic value, but for its closer interest to that larger section of the world, who (thank God!) are neither beauties, wits, nor prodigals.

Now, I have lived a very bounded and ordinary life, and do not understand æsthetics, and I write, half to keep myself company in a world where few old friends remain to "talk over" the matters which interest me most, and half in hopes that sometimes I may drop a word that shall bind up some hidden wound, or cheer some heart to its battle. It seems to me that such as I may find only too wide a field of labour in faithfully etching one after another of a certain group of family faces. Some of them I have known with that true knowledge which is born of love, and of every one I have such ample sources of information, documentary or oral, or both, as might well fill professed biographers with despairing envy. I have slighted no scrap of information as too trivial to bear on my studies. My mass of collected material includes all sorts of things, from delicate miniatures on ivory to worn-out fragments of fine needlework, from dainty old love-letters to scrappy washing bills.

It touches me strangely as I turn over these simple, used, useless things. They seem so like withered leaves—swept off the hewed-down trees of life, as they were carried away to the building of the City not made with hands. Piteful, it seems at first thought, how little of its very own a full, strong, busy life leaves behind it. Most of what it leaves has other uses beyond it. The chosen furniture, the selected pictures, the favourite books, live on in other service. Even the loves it cherished, bear fruit for other hands. Only here and there, in perfumed, seldom-opened drawers, lie a few crumpled papers, a few faded ribbons; and here and there, in the shady corner of the household circle, is a face which people say "has never been the same since." And yet this is not grievous, but joyous. Life, and not Death, is the end and aim of creation. Life here and Life beyond. God's way of marking graves is not to lay barren granite boulders on them, but to make the grass and flowers to grow there more freshly and abundantly. God's way of keeping the dead in remembrance is not to stay looking into the open grave, but to go the way that they have gone before us, where we shall see them (Mark xvi. 7). And so I tenderly turn over my heap of relics, and, in the sure and certain hope of the coming spring of Immortality, am cheerfully content to know that all such poor withered leaves must first be swept away.

I mean to show you these dear lost friends of mine more especially in their "crooked places," because every life has such, and indeed, without them, life would be a long, straight, easily-forgotten road. It does run so sometimes. There are whole years which we don't remember much. If such a smooth highway opens to us after we have been sifted and shaken round a sharp corner, then let us thank God, as those should thank Him, whom He has made the blessed of the earth. Nevertheless, it is the crooked corner we have passed that gives the level all its beauty. It is well for us when we come upon it soon, for we find more flowers, and hear more singing of birds, and enjoy a wider prospect ever after. Christ is often nearest to us when we are in our "crooked place." As artists give to their dearest a copy of their masterpiece, as most men make sacred love-gifts of pictures or symbols of what lies nearest their secret life, so our Lord gives us our "crooked place" as the similitude of the cross under which He lived, and on which, at last, He died, that our sinful natures might there be crucified with Him. And presently, as the tender mosses of time and memory clothe its sharpness, our hearts will love to return to it, like birds to their accustomed tree, and we will build our Ebenezer there, and sing with the quaint old poet, that the breast—

"That is possessed
Of earth without a cross, has earth
Without a rest."

PART I.—A JUST WOMAN.

CHAPTER I.—MRS. HARVEY'S HOME.

OUR story begins about sixty years ago; and it commences in a quiet, dark room, with a young woman sitting at its window. Her fresh widow's cap showed out wide and hard in the twilight.

There was a glimmer of fire in the grate, and the heavy plated candlesticks stood ready on the table. Mrs. Harvey had long been accustomed to light her candles herself.

The place was profoundly quiet, though it was in the heart of London. Sixty years ago people found out such places and lived in them. The front door of this house opened into a street, not unfashionable, and decidedly genteel. The window where the widow sat looked out—over a tree-shaded promenade—upon the broad cool river. There was plenty of life in the Willow Walk on fine summer evenings. Mrs. Harvey had enjoyed many opportunities of watching it. For herself, she had not gone there for many years, except in the very early morning with her children.

It was too late for the gay company now, and the great willow-trees were left to sigh and whisper to each other. And all the boats were gone off the river, except here and there a lighterman's hoy, or a red-sailed, hay-laden barge.

The widow had sat there alone all the while the light faded. She had not been a widow a month yet, poor thing, and neighbours were still whispering as to how she was "left," and how she seemed to bear it.

She had wept, but not vehemently, rather those slow tears that come with a bitter, aching pain—the tears of those who have long learned to mourn inwardly, while going about with a smile on their faces, and a cheerful word on their lips.

She had been an only child in her own home, and a very dainty pet. There was an old portrait of her over the mantel of that twilight chamber,—the presentment of a pretty sprightly child with fair hair curling over an elaborately embroidered muslin dress, which it must have taken months to make, for there was no clipping machine work in those days.

They had left her no fortune, those dear kind parents, both dead now. Her father had been but a civil servant, with an income not sufficient to allow much saving. The shrewd mother had not quailed before her darling's possible future. "We've given her a good education," she used to say, "and if that don't keep a woman on her feet no fortune will. Only one woman of my own set ever died in a workhouse, and her father had left her ten thousand pounds only twenty years before. If a woman can't make money, she'll not be able to keep it, for it's a carrion that draws vultures."

But the father had not been quite so courageous, and he had been very profoundly satisfied when young Mr. Harvey, a merchant in a fair way to make a sound and substantial competence, had laid his fortune at pretty Bessie's feet.

Now, there had always been a form of godliness in the girl's early home. The family had gone to public worship, and honoured the vicar, and eschewed all who mingled in masquerades, or other of those looser junketings then so fashionable. In after years, Elizabeth, who had lived nearest to her father and mother, was not afraid to believe that there had been much better things in their hearts, albeit somewhat faded and checked, like misunderstood flowers, shut up in damp and darkness. But she remembered well enough that though she had thought more of the bridegroom's open face and frank manner than of his fortune, and that her parents had congratulated themselves upon his character rather than his prospects, still neither she nor her parents had ever once reflected whether these fair fruits were the genuine outcome of a soul deep-rooted in the love of God. They were victims of a heartless state of pseudo-religious thought, in whose creed respectability and goodness were synonyms.

So the girl Elizabeth was married to Peter Harvey, and went home to his snug, semi-luxurious house, and took a young matron's pride in cookery-books and housekeeping accounts, and gave her first dinner party with satisfaction to herself and all parties concerned.

In those dreary days of the false wit and wild license of the Regency, the ideal woman of more respectable life was she who filled most jam-pots, who could not have slept on unfilled pillows, and who kept her kitchen red with burnished copper. The spirit of household love, and mercy, and peace, was neither the beginning nor the end of this fashion of "notableness." The husband might miss his companion while she performed feats of pickling and preserving, and the boys might run to ruin while their mother was mending their socks, so that none could detect a darn. All her ambition ran in the groove of the Pharisee's thanksgiving, that she should not be as others were. A hideous image of vain-glory and self-righteousness was set up in the temple of domestic virtue. Alas, that when the iconoclasts came, as they always will come, they not only overthrew the idol, but demolished the shrine!

Young Mrs. Harvey, with her inbred exactitude and energy, her lofty standards of kitchen, pantry, and linen closets, her moderate yet ample means, seemed certainly doomed to develop into one of the most flourishing of these stolid, intolerant mothers, whose life in reality was as much a life of sense and selfishness as that of those poor women, the goddesses of a widely different clique, who were then fluttering like half-burnt butterflies in the glare of Carlton House.

Her father, in his sleepy satisfaction, would not have hoped anything better for his Bessie. Her mother, who was shrewder in her spiritual insights, would yet have said, with a half-sigh, that there was nothing better to be hoped for.

But the heavenly Father, who was so little remembered at that decorous bountiful, wedding feast, had other purposes towards the youthful life that lay, unconscious, in his hand.

She had not learned to see Him in the sunny little waves of her existence. Like the rustic who mistakes the porter for the prince, and thinks that the vestibule of the palace is the royal chamber, her heart was quite at rest among its outside treasures. The God who was watching over her, and loving her with a love beyond her husband's or her parents', was an unknown God.

Just once, her heart swelled towards Him, when they laid her first-born son on her breast, and left her alone to read the divine secrets of motherhood. But she could not understand her own thankful yearning. The earth, earthly, closed round her so soon. They said hers was the most beautiful child in the parish. The doctor pronounced it the finest boy he had helped into the world for twenty years. The most elaborate preparation had been made for its coming, yet every day her jealous pride was busy supplying some discovered gap. She did not love other babies more for its sake, though she observed them curiously to see that none surpassed it.

Then the Lord put forth his hand and took back his own gift. Not in judgment, but because He loved both the mother and the child. It had just grown old enough to twine little clinging hands round her fingers, and to make a sweet crowing whenever she took it in her arms. But she could not hold it back from God.

She took her loss very quietly. There was this good in the life wherein she had been trained,—that if it did not foster the purest and tenderest sentiment, at least it discouraged the shrieking semblance thereof.

"I never lost one," her mother said to her, following her about the house, with the half-reverent wistfulness of a parent who sees her child pass above her on the heights of experience. "I never lost one. I don't think I should have borne it so well as you do, Bessie."

But in her heart, Bessie knew she was not bearing it well. She was silent because there was no use in crying out. She was dumb with despair. She had never thought about death. She had known it, only as an ugly fact, to be turned from as quickly as possible. Be gentle to her, reader. Don't judge that her mind must have been utterly dry and dead, but remember that she lived in an era when they carved skull and cross-bones over churchyard gates.

But a woman's mind must follow her heart. While her darlings are under her own roof, the mother does not heed that all the vast continents are to her but names and mist. But let her boy go out to the stranger's land, and how she will hunger and thirst for information! Bessie's thoughts went after her baby into the shadowy region they had always shunned before.

Poor thing! poor thing! It was to her only the land of charnel houses. She would sit and shiver before her fire to think how the rain was falling on her baby's grave in St. Martin's churchyard. She went every day to look at it. And she shrank from meeting her next-door neighbour, who had a little living babe of the same age as her dead Peter.

Kindly gossips warned Mr. Harvey that he must begin to take care of his wife. The good man did his best. He took her to Bath and to Cheltenham. She did not refuse to walk with him on the Parade, and she accepted all his proffered amusements with a piteous gratitude.

She was fading, and fading, and even her mind was losing its old bright energy of grasp. What would be the end of it, nobody knew, —except God.

When her husband told her that he must leave her awhile at Bath, and return to his business, she cried a little, and begged him to take her back too. But he was fain to flatter himself that she was benefiting by the fresher air and varied scene, and perhaps thought it might not be an unkindly experiment to throw her a little on her own resources. So he was firm, and came away. And then she cried a little more to herself, and thought of the final separation of death, and only looked at the sunshine and the trees to remember that they would go on when all who were enjoying them were turned to dust.

She sat still day after day, with her active white hands folded on her black dress, and her kindly landlady said to herself that this sort of thing had gone on quite long enough.

Was it chance that had sent Elizabeth Harvey to the house of a woman who had known almost every sorrow under the sun, who had buried husband and children, who was a weakly woman and a poor woman, who had to slave for daily bread under the whims and fancies of her thoughtless fine-lady-lodgers; but who knew God her Father, and carried such a bright face, and such a merry heart, that many a puling madam was fain to pay her the compliment of unreflecting envy?

We cannot stop to tell how it happened—indeed, neither of the two women could have detailed it themselves. But Elizabeth found that the homely widow had sweet secrets to impart. She never spoke of her "lost," but of her "dear ones with God." She no more thought of them as in the humble graves on which she sometimes snatched time to plant a rose-bush or an evergreen, than as in the stiff jerky old drawers where she had folded away their poor garments. She did not look at life as a drama to be hastened on ere the curtain fell, but as a work to be diligently done ere the curtain should rise.

It was a mode of thought which had such attractions for poor wrung Elizabeth, that she would have gone anywhere to find the key to it. Her good landlady only invited her to accompany her to Mr. Jay's chapel.

Now, as we have said before, Elizabeth's whole training was not favourable to self-revelation. She said very little. But she went to the chapel again and again, attending week-day services for which her hard-working friend could find no opportunity. And she took to reading the Bible. It was wonderful how little she knew of it. It had been kept in her father's house, wrapped in green baize, as if its mere presence was a sufficient charm, though to be sure her mother had an old black-letter edition, over which she sometimes pondered on Sunday evenings.

She said very little, but presently bands of white were introduced among the dense mourning which she had hitherto cultivated in morbid vanity of woe. And she took her little baby's miniature (painted after death) from the black crape bag where she had kept it, and went out and bought a purple velvet frame for it. And she wrote to her husband, and told him that she was quite well enough to return home, and was only sorry she had been so selfish and troublesome already, but at any rate she would not bring him out on his way to fetch her, but would take courage and travel by herself.

Peter Harvey was glad to have his bonnie Bessie again, still more glad to find that she could once more venture to open the piano and softly play him some of the sweetest of his favourite songs, even though his favourites were nearly all pathetic. She had improved in her singing too. She welcomed back their old acquaintances. She embroidered a little frock for the birthday of the baby next door.

In the face of this soft sunshine Peter Harvey was fain to wink at some other changes of which he did not so heartily approve. Elizabeth seemed somewhat seceding from the ways which he thought best for a woman. She was as delicately neat as ever, but she did not seem to cultivate being as "fine" as other women. She began to ask her mantua-maker how soon she "could" execute her orders, instead of issuing them, to be obeyed, whether or no. Her dinners were as punctual and as dainty as ever, but she developed curious inclinations to include another class of guests—people who did not always give invitations in return. As for her gentle persuasions that they should attend a more faithful and devout ministry than that they found in their genteel chapel-of-ease, Peter Harvey was quite willing to accede to them, for it was a matter of indifference to him, and certainly their former clergyman was very much given to attend operas and balls, and to absent himself at his brother's, the country squire's, with whom he followed the hounds, and Peter Harvey was a man who thought there should be some limits to license, and that clergymen, at least, would be better within them.

But altogether Peter Harvey was well satisfied with the restoration of his handsome, gracious wife, and though at first he was inclined to say to himself that some of the minor changes to which he took slight exception would be sure to pass away when other children came to enliven the house, presently Peter became aware that these very changes had a subtle charm of their own. Not in the least that he learned to understand their origin or their spirit. But he found Elizabeth more at his service than when she had been engaged in laborious vanities to outshine her neighbours. And among their new and poorer guests Peter not only found people more kindly and entertaining than the pragmatic aldermen and their pompous wives, but presently some of these humble visitors did him better business service than the richer ones had done.

Elizabeth started in her upward course in all humility and trembling, too doubtful of her own Christianity to begin straightway to question that of others. Her sweet womanly nature was ready to infer that as she had looked up to her parents and husband in all worldly ways, so they were probably before her on this. But by-and-by, the truth forced itself even on her humility.

It is one of the saddest experiences of human life when, even socially or intellectually, we pass before those with whom our heart dwelleth. It is a pang which balances the pleasure of prosperity or fame. But it is nothing to the agony, when crossing the line which divides the renewed man from the old Adam, we suddenly discover that we have left our nearest and dearest at the other side. This is a nameless anguish. The heart that really feels it never dares to clothe it in words, even to itself. It would be its own death-blow.

Elizabeth instituted no bravado parallels between her own yearning affection and the mysteries of the Divine Love. She simply clung to her new-found faith that God was good, and pitiful, and full of tender mercy, far beyond human imagining. But she did not try to draw hard and fast lines as to how such goodness and tender mercy must exactly manifest themselves. She was wiser than many sages, inasmuch as she was wise enough to know that the working of the moral attributes of the Almighty, like his secret ways in earth and ocean, might be quite above her comprehension.

She had her hopes. How can any of us mistrust a God who has provided that these shall spring, like fresh grass, in every barren place? One hope was that she might be mistaken in her own judgment of what seemed to her as hard and selfish and worldly. Another, that the way was open, by which she herself had escaped from bondage. And a halo of trustful confidence rose like an incense out of these simple hopes, and mounted far beyond them.

Morning and evening she prayed fervently for her dear ones. Nay, every thought became prayer, and shaped itself into the beautiful life that was as a witness and a testimony before them. As we said before, Elizabeth had been trained to silence, and was a shy woman naturally. But science tells us that the dumb have sometimes articulated under the pressure of anxiety and alarm about their darlings. And so Elizabeth found her spiritual speech.

It was—as spiritual speech generally is—of a sort with her natural speech—discreet and gracious. Her father and mother first listened, then she thought they encouraged it. Sometimes her mother would stamp her thoughts and aspirations with a hearty endorsement. Sometimes her father would ask her to repeat a remark, and would observe that "there was something in it." Elizabeth noticed that her mother became less impatient with her run of stupid servants—she could not quite check the old habit, but she pulled it up very often with a word of commendation.

"I'm thinking we ought to bear with one another, for the Lord bears enough from all of us alike," she said to Elizabeth.

Her father left off smoking in the best room, and put his pipe away altogether on Sundays.

"Your mother never liked the smell among her curtains, Bessie," he observed, "and it's time I gave her her own way, at last. And if I put the cost of my Sunday pipe into the Bible Society's box, I gain more than it does, for I needn't drowse away any more Sundays, when I don't know how few may be left."

The mother died quite suddenly, the father also, after a long illness, which almost wore all his mind away. But their lives did not go out, to return no more, without first leaving a sweet olive branch of hope and promise with their daughter.

As for Peter Harvey, whenever his wife ventured to bring her new interests before him, he listened with respectful, dubious silence, and thought to himself that she was becoming a clever woman. Nor was he wrong. God's sunshine in the heart quickens the mind. A Christian, however slow and stupid, is brighter and acuter than he would be without his Christianity. And the highest unconsecrated genius has missed that finest point of intelligence and sympathy, which only intimate contact with the divine nature can impart. Peter and Elizabeth had once been very equally mated. Both were well educated, according to the education of those days, and both were fairly endowed by nature. But her soul had undergone a refining and elevating process, through which it had passed out far ahead of his. She did not in the least notice this herself. But even mere gossiping acquaintances whispered that "Mrs. Harvey was very superior to her husband."

Children came round the Harveys' hearth, and for a long time their quiet domestic happiness might have seemed to give the lie to scriptural declarations as to the enmity of the natural heart against God. But the longest time is not for ever; and the best wild fruit of human nature always falls rotten to the ground before the gathering season.

Just as family cares were thickening round Peter Harvey, he met with severe and unforeseen losses. He was a man of sanguine temperament, soon depressed, and rash and reckless in his schemes of recuperation. He fancied he saw a way to speedily retrieve his losses. It only involved him more and more.

He was certainly unworthy of his wife Elizabeth; for he had never attained the wisdom of the "virtuous woman's" husband, whose heart "safely trusted in her." Only from his look and manner, never once from his words, did she gather that things were going wrong. Now she had always been severely economical. Her establishment had cost at least a fourth less than most houses of its elegant and fitting appearance. But straightway Elizabeth hinted that she could manage perfectly with one servant, and that sundry simplicities, quite compatible with health and comfort, might be immediately introduced into their table arrangements.

That was the only occasion that Mr. Harvey ever spoke harshly to his wife. He rebuked her interference. He scoffed at such paltry retrenchments. He straightway hired a boy to assist the maids with the knives and boots, and that very evening he brought home a huge Chinese chest of tea at twelve shillings a pound.

Elizabeth was a wise woman. That night as she was storing the week's washing in the linen-closet, perhaps a few tears fell on the fresh garments. But she remembered a homely saying of her mother's, "that the cow was never brought home by the man pulling its head, and the woman its tail." She had to obey her husband and to serve his best interests too. So her quarterly allowance for dress went unnoticed into the house-keeping. She dropped her single glass of wine for dinner. That would save a whole bottle in a fortnight. She thought no more of a good teacher for her little girls, but quietly continued to instruct them herself.

But nobody can save a man's soul—or his fortune—against his will. Elizabeth soon became sorrowfully aware of new expenses that swallowed double the value of her meek savings. The wine went faster than ever, and Mr. Harvey repaired slowly and sulkily to his office in the morning, and often returned far too late for any plea of business.

Alas, alas! but when moral declension can turn success and prosperity into an apple of Sodom, what fearful bitterness must it add to the sour cup of loss and sorrow! How sad when the character falls beneath the fallen fortune!

We have said before that Elizabeth Harvey was a wise woman. She gave no word to her wifely anguish. Only she was glad with a bitter sweet gladness that her parents were gone from her before this trouble grew out of the very dependence and protection for which her father had been so thankful for her sake. And she was thankful, oh so thankful! that she knew One to whom she could tell her troubles without rending her heart anew by shaming the man that she loved so tenderly.

The end came. Peter Harvey lay down to die in the prime of his days. He had shortened his own life. Well, he shrunk from seeing his boon companions. He said to his wife, "I should have done better if I had taken your counsel." Over and over again, he asked her to read her favourite hymn, "Jesu, lover of my soul." He bade his boy to "mind his mother in everything;" and not long before he died he said to Elizabeth, "I've no right to leave my widow and fatherless children to God; but He'll take you nevertheless." That was all.

But it was enough for love, which can keep hope alive and strong on very scanty food. Nevertheless, when their children looked back, after long years, they remembered that it was on the day of their father's death, and not in any of the troubles which came after, that their mother lost the last bloom of her beautiful youth.

And thus she came to sit in her widow's cap in the twilight, thinking over all these things, as we first saw her.

CHAPTER II.—CICELY BROOK'S MODE OF HELPING A NEIGHBOUR.

MRS. HARVEY was waiting for the arrival of a distant relative and a lawyer who had spent the whole of that day, and of many days before, in her dead husband's office, and who had engaged to come that night, and bring her a final report of her pecuniary position. It was a dull waiting of fear, for she knew it was only a question of how bad matters would be.

She roused herself from her reverie at last, and lit the candle, for she only lit one, though there were three in readiness in the heavy old candelabra. The reaction of the mere act of rising made her feel unable to settle down again. She went out upon the stairs, looked into a bedroom, and then into the little breakfast parlour opening from the hall.

There had been a light there for a long time, for her eldest child had not yet gone to bed, and this was the room where he learned his lessons. He was sitting at the table, with his feet tucked up on the rung of the chair—a delicate boy of about twelve, who looked almost transparent in his deep mourning. He started when his mother opened the door, for the house had been awfully soundless since the little ones retired. He was one of those children who are constantly getting into higher classes, almost against their teacher's will, and at this instant he was busy translating Homer pages beyond his appointed task. He knew nothing about coming trouble, and had private dreams of going to college in two or three years' time.

"George, dear," said Mrs. Harvey, painfully struck by his pale thin face, "what has kept you so late with your books? They should have been all put away long ago."

"Oh, mother, I only wanted to know how Menelaus and Paris got on in their duel. But I've done now." He had been trying a few stanzas on his own account since he had ceased the translation. He did not mention these.

"It's right for you to like your books well, my child," said his mother, with her hand resting fondly on his shoulder; "still there are other things beside books. It would be sad and wrong for you to pore over them till you hurt your health. Such learning does not make a really wise man. I should like to see you heartier and more active. You've had your own ways too much for these last few weeks, and it mustn't be any longer. Go off to bed now, and wake up in the morning bright and early."

"Oh you needn't fuss about me, mother," said the boy, with a boyish horror of anything like "moddle-coddle," which is often at least as strong in the fragile and studious, who require some of it, as in the hale and stout, who sometimes even seem to like it for a change. And with a good-night kiss he obeyed, and had scarcely gone before a sounding knock warned her to retreat to the best room and receive her dreaded guests.

The lawyer looked the kinder of the two. The second cousin seemed hoarding his civilities like a man who is afraid lest such may be mistaken for promissory notes, payable at some future time.

"Well, madam," the solicitor began blandly, "we have got through our work at last. It seemed a very complicated matter when we began. But we have got through." There he paused, and somehow poor Elizabeth suddenly and inconsequently remembered a smooth-speaking old surgeon who in the days of her girlhood had once performed a painful operation on her hand.

"We hoped for better things, though," said the second cousin gloomily.

"Ay, to be sure we did," the solicitor responded. "I am sorry to say, madam, that things might have been a great deal better."

"They couldn't be worse," decided the second cousin bluntly.

"Well, well, that's hard to say," interposed the lawyer, pitying the strained, worn face that he had known so fresh and bright. "Of course, we will give you any details that you require. But the plain fact is there are no assets to speak of, and a good many debts."

Elizabeth sat silent for a moment, and then asked in a dry harsh whisper—

"Do you mean there is nothing even to pay the debts?"

"Well, I'm afraid it amounts to that," admitted the solicitor; "there is little money owing to the estate, and there are really no effects except the goodwill of the business, the stock—which is very limited—the lease of this house and the furniture; and if they are all most favourably disposed of they will not cover the two thousand pounds, which it appears must be paid out of the estate before the other creditors can claim anything."

This referred to the deceased merchant's settlement on his wife, but the words had no meaning to her. She knew there had been certain legal processes gone through at her marriage, but she had never thought of them as securing her comfort amid the general ruin. She had taken Peter Harvey "for better, for worse," and had long made up her mind for the "worse" without dreaming of evading it.

"It's very fortunate for you that Peter made so liberal a provision," said the second cousin reproachfully, for he was thinking, "She didn't bring a penny with her, and I dare say she's been extravagant, and all the poverty is her own fault."

The second cousin was of Mr. Harvey's side of the house.

Elizabeth looked at him, half-mystified for the moment, but just then memory gave one of its singular dives into the dark, and brought back the old marriage settlement.

"Do you mean that the money meant for me takes precedence of the just debts?" she asked.

"Yes, indeed," said the lawyer, "the property settled on you at your marriage is regarded as yours, distinct from your husband's."

"It certainly don't seem quite fair," observed the second cousin, who had lent Mr. Harvey £20 on an I.O.U.

"Is it mine to do what I like with?" Elizabeth inquired.

"It is yours," returned the lawyer. "The deed, whose draft I have, reserves to you power of absolute disposal. It is singularly brief, and, I should say, was made at the last moment, and was only intended to be temporary, and then got left as it was."

"Just Peter's way," groaned the second cousin, with the inward addition, "She'll get married again, and let the poor children go to ruin, or drift upon their father's relations."

"Then I can pay the debts with it, at least as far as it will go," said Elizabeth, with a bright flush spreading over her wan face.

"She's so unpractical that she thinks she and the children can live on air; she'll expect us to keep the whole lot," thought the second cousin again.

"Why, madam," said the lawyer, "deeds like this are actually made for the protection of wives and children in such contingencies as the present. In this instance most of the creditors are wealthy men, and considering the efforts your late husband has recently made to straighten his accounts, in spite of the great depression in his branch of business, I am sure they must all feel they have been honourably dealt with. You have no reason to indulge in the least feeling on their account."

"Certainly not," said the second cousin briskly; "men in a large way of business calculate on such losses. But I can understand your feelings, cousin, and after you have realised your poverty, which is really a very handsome provision, and some little time has elapsed, say three months or so, you might quietly pay any smaller sums that may be due in any private way. As you are not obliged to pay any, I don't suppose any one could interfere with you paying who you like. A small debt is a greater loss to some people than a larger one to others. If I had a little free cash just now, I ought to be taking my poor little pale children for a breath of fresh air."

"Mrs. Harvey must not be allowed to pledge herself to anything in such a sudden way as this," said the lawyer peremptorily. "The sum she can claim is by no means more than sufficient for a very simple maintenance of herself and her young family."

"But I cannot touch it, it is not mine," protested Elizabeth, repeating her words to every argument that they brought forward, till, at last, they rose and said it was time for them to depart; they would not go into any papers to-night, and there need be no hurry, —she would think better of it when she had a little time for quiet consideration.

Elizabeth lighted them to the door, and said good night mechanically, and then returned past the parlour, and went on to her own solitary bedroom. There were no sounds but the weird sounds of silence, the clock ticking on the stair, the flicker of the candle, the river lazily lapping the terrace below. She had a curious disembodied feeling. She lifted a chair, and set it down sharply to wake herself.

Her soul turned a forlorn gaze over the dead level of the long past years. What had there been in them to train her for this conflict? Marked decisions and active efforts had never come among her duties. It had been hers to submit, to persuade, to endure. How could that prepare her for this? Ah, Elizabeth, the tender Father, God, knew best, and the patient doing of one duty can never unfit for the brave doing of another.

"Why should you give it up?" asked the Tempter. "Who would do as much for you? These creditors would not have been paid up as well as they are but for your caring and sparing. If you had been but a hired housekeeper all these years, you would have had something of your own; why should you have nothing because you have been more than a housekeeper, have given more than faithful service, have strained your very soul in this behoof?"

"You are going to plunge yourself into a poverty you don't understand," the Tempter went on, "not such a poverty as your aunt Mary's, with even her little pension of thirty pounds. She used to say that she knew her cloth, and cut her coat accordingly; but what cloth at all will you have? You will be as badly off as your mother's old charwoman, who worked from six on Monday morning till twelve on Saturday night, and was very glad of an extra loaf or blanket from the parish. What can you do for a living? How much are people paid for needle-work, and what would your drawings fetch? What will you do with children? You'll sink to the lowest, and then fall sick and die, and they'll be turned into the street. It's only the common lot of such as they'll become. And when they're in workhouses and jails, a disgrace to themselves and a curse to society, shall you have done the world a service? Why should you fancy that you and your children will be above the ordinary temptations that come to destitution? You are on a level with the rest of humanity, and only need the same candle to reveal the same dark places in your hearts." (The devil's best lies are made of half-truths.)

"Two thousand pounds," pursued the beguiling voice, whispering at the poor wrung mother-heart, "why, you could go and settle in the country, and live the quiet life that has been your ideal in these latter days of anxiety, and moil, and terror. You can live near some endowed school for the benefit of your dear, frail, clever son" (and against the blank wall of the chamber the Tempter conjured a phantasm of the child, with his transparent hands, bending over his books in the yellow candle-light). "Then, between scholarships and exhibitions and such-like, you need have no fear for his future. Very likely your boy will be a great man, and will be able to pay off old scores quite easily, with something over to the people for waiting. And you can bring up your little girls at your own side, and, well-kept and well-bred, you need be under no stress of fear for their establishment in life. You will be poor enough, but you will be genteel, and not lack friends. You will have leisure, and you will be able to do so much good among the villagers. You may become a spiritual Lady Bountiful."

The Tempter seemed tugging at her heart—tempters are generally very eager and exigent—and the Something that should have answered him seemed to Elizabeth to stand far off, silent, with reproachful gaze.

Seemed, we say.

For who was it that upheld her, as with one strong shudder, like the shaking off of a physical weight, she crossed the room to the ebony bureau, whose every pigeon-hole she had learned by heart during the last few days. There was but one which she had not looked through lately. It was the farthest to the right, and it held a single yellow deed.

It was her marriage settlement. With other papers, it had returned to her husband's hands, on the death of her father, who had been sole trustee. It should have been in other custody, but these were simple people, who avoided legal interference as much as possible, and the new solicitor had only seen an old draft copy.

As she drew it forth, a little withered flower fell out and dropped to the ground. An orange flower. The document had never been opened since the time of bridal trappings.

She clutched it in her hands, as if to hold it away from some unseen Presence that might grasp it from her. She looked round the room. There was no fire in the grate, bright with its summer polish. There was no tinder-box on its usual stand, the negligent servant had forgotten to place one there. "May not this be a check sent from Providence to curb you?" the Tempter began again.

She threw the deed behind the bars of the fireplace, and thrust the candle through them. How hard it was to get rid of that thick parchment! What a many opportunities it gave the Tempter to whisper, "It is not too late yet!" But she only thrust the candle further in. It would not have cost her so much had it been her own hand. Before the deed was ashes the whole candle was used, and it was in utter darkness that she dropped upon her bed, with one convulsive sob—

"My God, thou hast saved me from myself!"

Let those who toss sleepless or dream-haunted in their troubles try one safe recipe before they resort to the baleful poppy. Let them walk straight into the darkness of their woe, and grapple with its worst phantom. Let them make their souls wholesomely weary with active exercise in the fresh air of God's precepts and promises. We nearly all sleep soundly in the midnight of our tribulation, when God's rod has struck us so sharply that we forget to beat ourselves with our little pricks. It is in the twilight afterwards, the hour of dim forms and nameless shadows, of doubt and weakness, that we lie moaning and staring.

That night Elizabeth Harvey slept like the dead.

She did not wake till she heard her servant's footstep on the stair, and pleasant familiar sounds of life on the terrace beneath. She woke slowly. Her soul seemed to have a long way to return.

She bathed her face and tidied her hair. She remembered what she had done, and was glad she had done it. But she was glad with a humble joy. For she feared she could not do it again.

Then she went to her boy's room. She passed her serving damsel in the passage, and spoke cheerfully to her.

George was already up and dressed, and at his books again. It smote her to see it.

"Put them away, dear," she said, "I want to talk to you. I have something to tell you. You are my right-hand man now, you know, George."

The boy pressed up to her, half fondling, half proud.

"You won't mind when I tell you that we are very poor now, George."

His face fell a little, for the college was uppermost in his mind. Scarcely daring to look at him, his mother hurried on. "We shall have to leave our dear old house, and go away somewhere else, and we shall all have to work very hard, and go without many things that we like, at least for the present. You'll be my brave boy, and help me all you can by being bright and cheerful, won't you, George? Then I shall not mind anything else."

It troubled her that he stood so quiet. It need not. Life hangs before children like the sheet of a magic lantern, and as each new view supplants the last, the last is forgotten, and the present one seems the prettiest. But there are some scenes that return often. The college will come back to little George's long-fancy, but never mind, at present it is blotted out for quite a new and fascinating design composed of notes of interrogation. Poverty meant that they must leave this house, said his mother. Where would they go? Would it be into the country? George only hoped it would be away from the river. He had never liked that. As a baby, he had cried when taken to the windows overlooking it, and though brave enough in every other respect, for as frail as he was, he was still frightened to be in a boat. George rather wished the new home might be farther east, somewhere deeper in that great, unmeasurable wilderness of bricks and mortar, on whose margin he had hovered once or twice, and in whose mysterious precincts his imagination played at a perpetual Arabian Nights.

She fancied she guessed his thoughts. "As God wills that we shall be poor, He will take care of us," she said gently. "He will give us all we need. He will teach you himself, my Georgie, as you are not able to go to school any more."

"School!" Why, George felt already far beyond that elementary formula. It is not from his first glimpse of practical life that any healthily made boy recoils to his books.

When the lawyer next saw Elizabeth he thought that she had become quite reconciled to her small sure provision, she looked so calm and happy. He was very angry when she told him what she had done. That came of clients keeping their papers in their own hands, he said. He told her that her rashness need not inevitably stand good. It might be a fair case for an equitable settlement if there was anybody to take it up. But he was a kindly-hearted man, and appreciated her motives, though his admiration found its only expression in blame and grumbling, and he indignantly repudiated the widow's only suggestion that the creditors need not know the sacrifice she had made.

He told them. And they each and all said, "Well, it was really fair that a man's own should suffer first in his misfortunes. Still, not many women would have done as Mrs. Harvey had, and they honoured her for it." Apart, Mr. B., whose debt was thirty pounds, said that if he was Mr. C., whose claim was four hundred, he should be ashamed to take it all, that he should, a rich man, keeping two carriages and three hunters, and giving away ever so much in subscriptions to charities. In Mr. B.'s opinion, Mr. C. should only take half, and think himself well off to have got that. But it never struck Mr. B. to set the example by commuting his own claim to fifteen pounds.

Mr. C., on the other hand, observed that for his part he thought the widow had behaved like a heroine, and that certainly something should be done for her. He had heard some whisper about commuting their claims. He did not think that would be pleasing to a lady of her highly independent mind. But she should not be allowed to want, and her children should be looked after in some way. He could not do it himself, he lived so far from London, but he could trust the two next largest creditors—Mr. A. and Mr. D.—to do everything that was right and considerate.

Mr. A. thought her rather a fool for her pains. Didn't believe she'd have done it unless she'd got some money put away safe somewhere.

Mr. D. was always very busy. Thought a man had a right to his own, without the burden of any moral obligations to the person who paid it to him. But was ready to do what he could. Would give his five pound if a subscription was organized.

The creditors all received their money, and they all made their professions, but everybody's business, as usual, proved to be nobody's, and they each passed on their way and forgot all about it.

All but one. There was a poor old maid, a Miss Brook, who had earned a scanty living as agent for some of Peter Harvey's goods, among his poorer outlying customers. A small sum, something like six pounds had been due to her for commission. She had trusted to it for her rent, and when its payment first seemed doubtful, she had gone to the Harveys' solicitor, and pleaded her peculiar case and her great poverty very forcibly. He had engaged that she should not suffer much in any event. Finally, of course, Miss Brook was paid in full. She gave one or two inarticulate grunts as she took the money. She had to pay it all over to her landlord that very evening.

Next day she "took the liberty," in her own phrase, of calling on Mrs. Harvey. She was a tall gaunt woman with bushy eyebrows and wispy bonnet strings, and she carried a great gingham umbrella, which she clasped about its waist.

"If there's anything to do that I can help you in, I'll do it," she said fiercely, with a frown. "I'm used to most things."

"It is really very good of you," said Mrs. Harvey, with grateful sincerity (whereupon the old maid frowned fiercer than at first). "The fact is, there are so many things to do, that I scarcely know where to begin."

"You'll have to get lodgings and to pack," observed Miss Brook, with a decisive definiteness that was more strengthening and comforting than any amount of wordy sympathy; "I can help in that. I know all about lodgings, and having 'em got into good order before you go in, and all that. I won't be put upon by landlords—I know 'em."

Grim Miss Brook had neither silver nor gold to give, but she had all her own hard-earned experience of life, and all the courage that she had learned in her loneliness. She helped Mrs. Harvey greatly, by being the first to name every necessary hard fact. It did not seem so cruel after she had spoken of it as a matter-of-course.

"Don't you go and be afraid of living in very lowly places," she said. "There's no need to be. There's good and bad of all sorts in them as well as everywhere, only there's more of both. While you've got to be a poor woman, my dear, be one, and don't break your back with straining to be anything else. Keep as close in everything as you can, that you may have the more to spare in bread and beef, for that's blood and bone to the children. There's all sorts of nice clean places cheap enough for the poorest. Little old cottages belonging to monthly nurses, and watchmen, and the like. I'll soon look out and find you one."

She did. It was in a mean, broken-up old street just at the beginning of the Mile-End Road. The lodgings were two tiny rooms with sloping roofs and projecting windows. The stairs were narrow and cracked. But the place was respectable, and the rough, cheerful landlady—forewoman at a neighbouring laundry—was quite prepared to re-whitewash, mend broken panes, &c., at Miss Brook's suggestion.

The very extremity of the change made it easier to be borne. It was like going out into a new country.

"You'll never repent it, my dear," frowned Miss Brook, "there's nobody about here that knew you before, to be breaking your heart with their pity. It'll go quite the other way. The woman of the house says she can see you're the thorough lady, and so will the other folks, and that will put you on your mettle to keep yourself up. Ah, my dear, Cicely Brook knows by experience, that one way of life is about as good as another, if you look at it right down to its bottom."

Mrs. Harvey took away but little of her furniture. In her determination to pay all the debts possible, she let it all go. And the debts were paid,—a glorious and comfortable conclusion, which enabled her to endure the sight of the second cousin's wife cheapening her own dear mother's treasured stock of lace. The second cousin and his wife were very punctual at the sale, and carried off a good many of the little Harveys' toys for nothing, because "it was such a pity to leave them where they might be kicked about and destroyed." However, as they did not plunder Hatty Harvey's armless doll, or her sister Milly's broken kaleidoscope, Mrs. Harvey forgave them, these oldest playthings being the more particular personal favourites.

CHAPTER III.—IN MILE-END.

So when they "moved" to Mile-End, it was with the servant's bed, an old couch, a damaged crib, a few cane chairs, a painted table, and a dozen pieces of willow-pattern crockery. Elizabeth saved the black silhouettes of her parents and husband, but her portrait in oil was sold, in a lot with the initialled silver, and the family crest in wools. Some furniture dealer bought them all. Well! it is pleasant and honourable to have family heirlooms and specialities, but sometimes it is even more honourable to have lost them!

And after all, the little slanting rooms did not look so bad. They had a few green plants for the window-sill, and a bit of red glazed cotton for a curtain. They put the willow-pattern china on the mantelpiece, the dish in the middle, and the plates at the side, with the cups and saucers in front, just as the Sèvres set had stood in the cabinet in the old home. They hung up the silhouettes, and George's common bedroom book-shelves, on which they ranged their Bibles and Prayer-books, and a few old favourite volumes, which they had been able to keep partly because they were so old and worn. And then the two little girls clapped their hands and said it was "as good as a game."

But George was quieter, and his mother's heart was yearning tenderly over her boy. What did all this mean for his future? Ah me, she knew that it meant that he must take to hard early toil—he, poor lad, young, half-trained, innocent, must mix with rude, rough, vulgar people, and either break in such a fierce crucible or pass through it, leaving behind something of his own. Then, again, how—oh how!—was she to tell her child that he must find out some way by which to earn a few shillings a week, and must not mind hard, dirty hands, and coarse, soiled clothes? Miss Brook never hinted at this. She feared to touch the torn tendrils of the mother-heart. This was a winepress which the good woman had not trodden herself. And to Elizabeth it seemed harder to bear than to put that document into the fire as she had done. The widow had not yet proved the blessed truth that when we take one determined step on the steep ladder of righteousness and self-sacrifice, then God himself comes and lifts us over many succeeding rungs.

She never needed to speak to George on the subject. He spoke first. The boy had not been learning nothing in these few weeks since he had left school. He had fathomed what poverty meant, that it meant one did not get food and clothing without knowing exactly what they cost, and where the money came from.

"Mother," said he, in the twilight of that very first evening, amid their pathetic novelties, "you always said I read writing well, didn't you?"

"Yes, dear," she answered, wondering.

"I could always make out the queer hand-writings that came to father, couldn't I?" he asked again.

"Yes, dear, often better than we could ourselves," she said.

"Do you know that they hire boys to read writing in printing offices?" he inquired.

"Yes, I know they do," she replied, with a jump of the heart.

"I used to know the reading-boy at the Apollo Press, which I passed on my way to school," George went on. "I never spoke to him, but I always saw him. He was a nice, decent-looking fellow. Somebody told me his father had been a dissenting minister." A pause. Then suddenly, "Mother, a reading-boy is wanted by a printer just round in the main street here. Will you let me go?"

"Do you think he would take you, darling?" she asked, in fond, unreasoning despair.

"I know he will," said George proudly; "I've been in already and spoken to him. He gave me a paper to try me, and I read it right off without a blunder, and he said I'd do finely. But I said I must speak to you first. He'd give me six shillings a week to begin."

"I suppose you must go, George," she said, with a smile that would not be sad.

He jumped up and kissed her. He was quite as happy as he could have been had he won the first prize for Latin verse.

Now in the earlier days of her poverty, before her eyesight weakened and her hands grew unsteady, Miss Brook had got her living by waistcoat making. It was not so very badly paid in those days, when domestic service absorbed so much female labour, and machines were unknown. Miss Brook advised Mrs. Harvey to try it. She could get her work from her own old employers, and she would teach her and help her till she was able to give full satisfaction. Elizabeth was only too glad to follow her advice.

It may be remembered that Elizabeth's worthy mother had spoken as if the good education her daughter had received would stand between her and want, and it may be superciliously thought that it must have utterly failed her before she was reduced to such a humble resource as this. Not so. Elizabeth could have kept a school, and a good one, had she possessed capital to start with. But she did not. She could have gone out teaching. But she wisely preferred anything that kept her at her own hearth, and gave her own little girls the benefit of her society and instruction. And do you suppose there was any one part of her education which did not help her now? Was it not her well-disciplined mind which made her such a quick learner that Miss Brook held up her hands in astonishment? Did not her skill in delicate needlework stand her in good stead when it enabled her to throw herself into the gap caused by some sick embroideresses at the very moment when a large fancy order was driving her employer to despair? Was her drawing quite thrown away, when at last new patterns were suddenly wanted, and she revealed that she could supply them, although she had not been prepared to starve till that genteel work came in her way, and although that genteel work not being very constant or trustworthy, she contentedly returned to her stitching in its intervals.

All her rare gifts of economy and "household good" found worthy service now. She could make wholesome and dainty dishes at less cost than her neighbours' unsavoury messes. These neighbours were not unwilling to learn of her either, for she was no despised "French madam," suspected of frogs and grass. She could also teach her own little girls. She knew, too, the most effective and simplest modes of cleanliness.

Do not think that her life was all sunshine.

It takes an inward struggle before eyes that have been used to rich carpets shine contentedly on bare boards. (And bare boards continued the fashion with the Harveys for many a day, for even when little odd prosperities came to them Elizabeth would not spend any perceptible sums on luxuries until they had made a little hoard against a possible time of sickness and adversity.) And it takes a great struggle for a delicately-bred lady to accept that it is her duty to God and man to go out bare-handed, and store her one pair of gloves for Sunday wear. And it takes a greater struggle still for a mother to pass in and out among words and scenes which she would die to keep from her children's ears, and yet to believe that God's angels close their wings over them and shut them in from harm.

Neither think that her life had no galas.

There was a genuine merriment in their Saturday evening marketing, with sometimes a penny over for a bunch of flowers or a brace of ruddy apples. [N.B.—No apples are so good as those which must be divided.] The tradespeople were always in a good humour when that little family came in. Hatty had a pet cat in every shop she frequented, and the grocer's wife always lent Milly the Youth's Magazine before it was two months old.

They had two or three "whole" holidays in a year, fixing them for the whole family when George got his. When the weather was wet they went to the British Museum, and when it was fine they sometimes got as far as Epping Forest, and brought home bundles of roots, and pine-cones to make fancy baskets to plant them in. Elizabeth never forgot the glad uplifting of her heart when their good landlady came to the door to wish them "good luck" on the very first of these excursions, and added that George "didn't look as if he needed change o' air nowadays, for he was a sight fatter and rosier than when he first came." Elizabeth knew that it was true.

And the Sabbath was always such a blessed day in the little home—when they went to church together, and read the Bible aloud, and sang hymns, and had nothing to think about except how God loved them all, and made them love one another. That was the time when Elizabeth's soul sat down at its Father's feet. On other days a care for the far future would sometimes crop up among her very thankfulness for present mercies. But on that holy day her heart had leisure to note how the sunshine of God's promises shimmers all down the vistas of life, and is overhead always, even when the boughs are so thick and dark as to obscure it for a while. On that day, too, her heart had time to get nearer the inner hearts of her children, and somehow, the more utterly she loved them, the stronger she felt to trust them to His care who had brought her through her own "crooked place," and turned its wilderness into water-springs.

"I'll tell you what it is, Mrs. Harvey," said Miss Brook, as they once walked home from evening service together, with George and his two sisters in front, "you paid a high price for your independence, but it has turned out a good bargain for every one of you, and, mark my words, it will be the best fortune you could leave your children;—you'll see if it isn't."

So shall we.

GOD'S HUSBANDRY

"I the Lord do keep it."—ISAIAH xxvii. 3.

BLESSED Lord of all that springs,
 Growing from this earth of Thine,
 Ruler of the time that brings Root and branch and grape and wine ;
 Who can tell what Thou wilt do
 With us in our low estate—
 Searching all our frailty through Ere Thy patience make us great ?
 Ere Thy spreading noble tree,
 Raised to its divine repose,
 In all human husbandry
 Lean on Him for whom it rose.
 Nourished with descending dew,
 Lo, we climb by things that die
 To a use beyond our view,
 Sacred in Thy guardian eye.
 Weakness to the weak will cling,
 Earth by earth will be sustained,
 Till Thou hast Thy holy thing,
 And the gracious end is gained ;
 Till upon a heavenly height
 Fearless shall our increase be,
 And the vine of Thy delight
 Stretch forth every stem to Thee.
 Hopes that at Thy bidding sink,
 Joys that of themselves decline,
 Truths that are not as we think,
 Train us to this end of Thine.
 Bound to that which sets them free,
 Torn from many a timely stay—Thou, Eternal One, art He Whom Thy growing things obey.
 And Thy hand we learn to know
 (By a sovereign wisdom blest)
 When the props that let us go
 Lift us to our rock of rest.
 There to boundless love resigned,
 Whatsoe'er its hold embrace—
 Tendrils from the earth entwined
 Take their own eternal place.
 And in Thee, the Lord at large,
 While our limits guard us well—
 All the gladness of Thy charge,
 All the glory, who can tell? A. L. W.

"CROOKED PLACES."

THIS IS THE WAY.*

"A word behind thee, saying, This is the way."—ISAIAH xxx. 21.

TWO gifts of God are distinguished in this prophecy. One is for the eye; the other is for the ear. One is in front; the other is behind. "Thine eyes shall see thy teachers." "Thine ears shall hear a word behind thee."

There is one thing common to the two promises. Both offer guidance. Both imply the blessedness, both presuppose the desire, of being guided. God Himself can open to the sincere person no greater happiness than that of right guidance.

To the sincere. And to them only can God speak. To the double-minded there is a special call, but it is of a preliminary kind. Cleanse your hearts, that God may speak to you. He cannot deal with you as you are, save in judgment. You will misread, mishear, misunderstand everything that God says, till you are in earnest. When you are—when the Advent call has found you out, "Sinner, prepare to meet thy God"—then you will ask in good earnest, "What wilt Thou, Lord? What shall I do? Where, and what, is eternal life?" and you will count yourself the happiest of men in that day, if the twofold promise should unfold itself to you:—

"Thine eyes shall see thy teachers ;"

and,

"Thine ears shall hear a word behind thee, saying!"

It is with the latter that we are concerned now. There is something mysterious in that "behind thee." It will bear pondering. I think it distinguishes the wanderer from the steadfast. The "teacher seen" is the director. He is in front of the wayfarer, guiding the steps. He is in time to prevent error; to say, "This is the way; keep it, and you find life." The "word behind" is the voice of the corrector—following the straying footsteps, and bringing back the right-hand or left-hand rover into the way of peace.

Guidance itself—Divine guidance—has two parts, two aspects, two functions and offices, towards His people: the one is the office of direction, the other is the office of correction.

Which want we, my brethren? which of the two guidances? the teacher in sight, or the word behind?

Yes, for us, here assembled on the Eve of Christmas, muffled up before men with our secrets of life and our mysteries of soul, but before God, each one, "naked and open"— direction and correction are practically one and the same; but, if we are asked and must answer, I know you will all say—

"For me, for me, the word behind! Direction for the saint, correction for the sinner!" A word behind thee, saying, This is the way.

The possible voices are many.

There is the voice of inclination, saying, This is the way.

What harm can it do, just once, and just once more, to indulge passion, to give the rein to self-interest, to ambition, to vanity, to folly, to lust? does not every one so?

And there is the voice of indolence, saying, This is the way.

It is irksome, it is intolerable, to be always on the stretch; to be looking narrowly, pedantically, at each thing as right or wrong, as safe or perilous, as a duty or a sin. Surely, surely, there are many things of neutral colour—neither this nor that—words, enjoyments, actions too, which God has mercifully left to us unsaddened, unsoured, by the religious question. At all events, life is short, and pleasure shorter; and there will be sickness, there will be sorrow, there will be old age, there will be death, to make these subjects less distasteful, more congenial—therefore for the time I will take my fill of that which is. I will say to the monitor of eternity, as Felix said to-day to St. Paul, "When I have a convenient season, I will call for thee."

And there is the voice of unbelief, saying, This is the way.

All is uncertain—Revelation, the Bible, Jesus Christ most of all. It is unsafe to take that way, the way of simple faith, of humble trust, of personal love to the Invisible One. I will show thee a way, which, if not all that thou desirest, is yet enough for thee—the way of duty and morality, the way of kindness and charity, the way which must be part of the right and may be the whole of it; walk in that; yes—quoting Scripture as usual—do justly, and love mercy, and walk humbly with thy God; visit the fatherless and widow, and keep thyself unspotted from wickedness, and thou canst not be lost; thou mayest (even if there be a Christ) be saved for thy well-doing.

This is one of the voices, and thousands listen to it, and walk for a lifetime in dim darkness, when Christ is offering them the very daylight of God.

And there is the voice of custom—the world's, the church's custom—saying, This is the way.

Be quite sure that, whatever fanatics and enthusiasts may tell you, however they may for a time vex and convulse consciences, or even galvanize mind and life into a temporary revolution of being, it is always the middle course, the creed and practice of moderation, which has the truth and will prevail. Be with the multitude, not of the godless or profane or licentious, but of the respectable and regular and religious—and you must be safe. Shun extremes, stand on the old paths, and there will be, for you, few regrets and no remorse.

And then, once again, there is quite another voice in your ears, different from all these, the voice of a new-old teacher, saying, This, this is the way.

You are weak, and ignorant, and a child ; you cannot study the Bible for yourself, so as to draw from it its hidden secret ; you cannot expect to see where wiser men have been blind ; you cannot expect to decide where great men, mighty men, saintly men, have differed : resign your intellect, your judgment, your conscience to me, and I will guide you. I am the voice of the Church, speaking the wisdom of the first and purest age, ere yet Christ was divided, or heresy had intruded itself into the bosom of infallible truth. I will undertake you—I, represented by some priest of the Church Catholic, will direct, correct, discipline, guarantee you. I will receive your confessions, I will minister your absolution, I will apply the requisite medicine of the wounds, and the blood, and the passion, and the Cross of Jesus. That which you cannot do for yourself without infinite risk—that which God Himself does not for you, save through the Church—you shall thus have from me, in its purity, in its comfort, in its certainty, in its strength. This is the way, walk ye in it !

Brethren, we speak that which we know. These are among the counterfeit voices, more specious or less, which are bidding for your souls. God forbid that we should confuse or confound them one with another—as though there were no difference, in these matters, between the voice of selfish passion, and the voice of idle worldliness, and the voice of religious earnestness : still, we cannot think that any of these are the very thing spoken of in the text. God help us to apprehend it : it is, might we but grasp it, the life and the light of men.

We have erred and strayed—this very verse says so—to the right hand and to the left. And God promises a word behind us, saying, "This is the way."

There are many lesser, lower senses in which He fulfils it ; and they are all true fulfilments, unless they be divorced from the one, the all-embracing.

1. Providence itself is oftentimes such a word behind us.

How often have we fallen into some snare of the devil—laid for us in evil companionship, laid for us in worldly connexion, laid for us in bosom sin—and we were entirely captivated and captured ! We lay, at uneasy rest, in the thing that was wrong ; we loved it, or we acquiesced in it, or we despaired under it : and it would have held us fast till this hour ; but God interposed—prepared one of His strong east winds, or one of His insignificant worms, of which the Bible tells, and smote our gourd, or let the sun beat upon our head : either satiety, or fickleness, or treachery stepped in—perhaps a fever, perhaps a death—the snare was broken, and we were delivered. Then we began to see and to loathe ourselves in our own sight. Why ? Because the word was then at last audible behind us, This, this is the way—the way of duty, and therefore the way of peace.

2. Conscience is one of these words behind us. More often, perhaps, than it is the "teacher seen." St. Paul himself—we heard it this morning—found it no easy matter to keep his conscience always in front of him. He says he had to "exercise" himself—the original word is that which gave its title to asceticism ; it expresses a perpetual practising and disciplining of the whole life, the whole man, unto obedience, unto godliness—"to have always an unstumbling conscience," a conscience which does not trip and fall over hillocks of guilty memory—such is the figure—as it reviews and sits in judgment upon the thing, the history that is past.

Conscience, even in the faithful, is too often a word behind, reproving rather than guiding : yet even thus it is one of God's words. Yes ; through it, chiefly, are any of God's words spoken. Conscience is the self-knowledge, the self-privy, which tells me what I am, and of what sort that thing is. Conscience, taught of Christ, is the very word of words as to duty. Even heathen moralists and satirists could tell of its retributive lash—could write startlingly, thrillingly, of its force as a word behind. Often has it been God's first voice in the man, preparing him for Christ ; saying, This is the way, and in this way without Christ thou canst not walk.

3. Pre-eminently, predominantly, is the Gospel the word behind us. How often in the night-watches has the face of the Man of Sorrows, stricken, smitten, crucified by us as for us, brought the conviction of sin into some hard heart! Oh, surely it was the wisdom as well as the love of God—His “manifold” wisdom angels call it—which devised that plan and scheme of the re-purchase! The Gospel of Jesus Christ ought to be, is in countless thousands, the teacher seen, the Cross itself the spectacle of persuasion and of direction. More often still is it the other—the conviction of sin unto correction of the sinner.

Surely, surely, there is a loving God who gives energy and power to His Gospel. Every day, were the eye of this soul but open to behold Him, we should see signs and proofs of His working.

A few weeks ago—I vouch not for the particulars—I repeat but at second-hand, ignorant of names and dates, the fact itself, which yet I thankfully accept in its substance—a few weeks ago, at this Sunday service, there entered this Church, as any common casual worshipper might do, a young creature in deepest distress and despair—so wretched, that she had resolved on self-destruction, and brought with her into this presence the poison which was to end life. The service began. There fell upon her heart, with a meaning unfelt before, those words of the General Confession—Oh, who has pondered them to-day?—“We have erred and strayed”—yes, there was the voice behind, “when we turn to the right hand and when we turn to the left:” presently there was the pleading cry—and then the tears could not be restrained—“Spare us, Good Lord, spare Thy people whom Thou hast redeemed with Thy most precious blood:” then the hymn: then the sermon—I know not what—she left the church, and threw the poison into the Thames. Now that disconsolate life, that desperate soul, has found entire rest and peace in the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ. God followed up His gracious work by other instrumentality, till He made the word behind a word also within.

Great solemnity is given to these Temple Church Sundays by one such history, one such experience. Oh what ought to be the earnestness of the minister, what ought to be the devoutness of the congregation, when he knows, and they know, that, in the very midst of them, there may be a fierce battle like this raging in secret between Christ and the devil! How frightful does such a reflection render the profaneness which is (I had almost said) rampant here side by side with the agony! I myself see from the Altar-Table a levity and a trifling which would be incredible without the eye-witness. Scarce a Sunday or two after the secret wrestling of that soul which was here saved as by fire, two other persons—as young, as seemly, as decorous (doubtless) in other things, as she of whom I have spoken—were discussing half-aloud, during the service or sermon, to the terrible discomfort of others, their plans of departure and of journeying! Would to God that the word might this day be heard behind these, if they be again by chance here present, Repent, and believe, and be saved!

4. But neither Providence, nor conscience, nor even the Gospel, is the very voice itself, which is here predicted and promised.

There was one special gift and grace of this final, this closing dispensation, so wonderful, so stupendous, in its character, that even saints under the Old Testament—even the Baptist, who had a dispensation all his own, between the Old and the New—were not in the Kingdom of Heaven for lack of it. That promise, that gift, that grace—the fulfilment of the promise here open before us—is the Holy Ghost the Comforter.

We stay not to enquire, to-day, in what respect the Pentecostal gift differed from the Pre-Messianic—or “He dwelleth with you,” from “He shall be in you.” Enough for us to record, to emphasize, and to lay to heart the Scripture. The word, the voice, saying, not once for all, but in each instance and each instant of duty, This is the way—when we, but for it, are turning aside to the right hand or to the left—is that of God’s Holy Spirit; purchased for us on Calvary; out-poured upon us—yea, upon the Church and the Christian of all time—at Pentecost; sought day by day, received day by day, in each emergency of being, but not less in the unmarked, colourless days of existence, by every believing man, as the anointing oil of the day’s consecration, as the informing, enabling, empowering influence of every duty and of every devotion; as the vital supply which makes the whole body of Christ one; as that present possession which guarantees in the future the resurrection of the just, and the everlasting life of heaven.

Whither, my brethren, has this hope of the Church fled, that we seldom hear of it now, save in some vague, generalized, impersonal figure, such as influence, assistance, or grace? Sure I am, that, if we would ever know what the true life of God is, we must stir up within us the revelation of the Holy Ghost. Sure I am, that, if we would ever find comfort in prayer, access to the Throne, or strength for holy living, we must find each, find all, in a far more intelligent, reliant, affiant, entreaty for the personal presence and indwelling of the Holy Ghost. What are we not missing by our indifference, by our unbelief? Saints of old "prayed in the Holy Ghost," "were in the Spirit on the Lord's Day," had "the love of the Spirit" for their chief plea one with another, had the "supply of the Spirit of Jesus Christ" for the very life-blood circulating in the soul's veins, giving vigour to their health and vitality to their life.

Oh, when the Son of Man cometh, shall He, even in this one primary, vital point, find faith in His very Church? What might not preaching be, if the sinful man who rises with "his word of exhortation for the people," had first clothed, endued, hidden, lost himself in the Holy Spirit? "O hide this self from me," we pray, half in vain—why? Because we do not half realize as we ought that only possible way of putting off the old man, which is the putting on the new! Only he can be indeed self-forgetting, who is pervaded, transfigured, re-created, by receiving into him the Spirit which maketh all things new. Only he can do one day's or one hour's work, not for self, but for God and Christ and eternity, who prays, not in word but in deed, for the entrance into him of the Holy Ghost to enable him both to will and to work of God's good pleasure.

Then, in each difficult duty—then, in each critical struggle—then, in each depressing circumstance, inward and outward, whether of loss, or of weakness, or of solitude, or of self-reproach, or of utter, wretched, desperate self-abhorrence—we shall still, listening for it, hear the word behind: Thou hast done all this wickedness—yet this is the way: God, who has been pleased to buy you back with the blood of Jesus, will not leave nor forsake you: He will guide you still with his counsel; He will receive you at last to His glory!

C. J. VAUGHAN.

FLETCHER OF MADELEY.

JEAN GUILLAUME DE LA FLECHERE, commonly called Fletcher of Madeley, was the youngest son of a Bernese gentleman, Colonel de la Fléchère, and descended from a noble house of Savoy. Colonel de la Fléchère had distinguished himself in the armies of France and Switzerland, and on his retirement from the service, had settled at Nyon, near Geneva, where his son Jean was born, Sept. 12, 1729. Jean was, with his brothers, educated at the college of Geneva, where he was remarkable for his extreme diligence, for, besides devoting the whole day to his studies, he would frequently spend a great portion of the night in making notes of what he had read. He carried away several prizes, among them two of those awarded for distinction in classics, and this, as more than one of his biographers remark with surprise, although some of the competitors were nearly related to the professors who conducted the examinations. From Geneva he went to Lenzburg, in the canton of Aargau, where he learnt German; and having acquired that language, he returned home and devoted himself to the study of Hebrew and mathematics. His parents, seeing that he was of a thoughtful disposition, were anxious that he should become a clergyman, and they were both surprised and displeased when he announced his intention of going into the army. His reasons we give in his own words:—

"From the time I first began to feel the love of God shed abroad in my heart (I think at seven years of age), I resolved to give myself up to God and the service of his Church if ever I should be fit for it; but the corruption which is in the world, and that which was within my heart, soon weakened, if not erased, those first characters which grace had written upon it. However, I went through my studies with the design of going into orders, but afterwards feeling I was unequal to so great a burden, disgusted by the necessity I should be under to subscribe to the high Calvinism of the Geneva Articles, and disapproving of entering upon so sacred an office from any secular motives, I yielded to the desire of those of my friends who advised me to enter the army."

Colonel and Madame de la Fléchère would not consent to their son's becoming a soldier, but he was not to be turned from his purpose; and, after carefully studying the works of Cohorn and Vauban, he went away to Lisbon and accepted a commission, seemingly at the head of a body of his young countrymen, in the service of the King of Portugal. He was to sail at once in a man-of-war for the Brazils, and wrote home for a large sum of money, which he hoped to lay out to great advantage there: this was refused by his father, and Jean resolved to go without it. He was on the very point of starting when a servant, in waiting on him at breakfast, let the kettle of boiling water fall on his legs, and scalded him so severely that he was confined to his bed for some weeks, during which time the vessel sailed, and was never more heard of. Jean then determined to join his uncle, who was a colonel in the Dutch service, and from whom he had the offer of a commission; but the peace which was declared just as he arrived in Flanders, and the death of his uncle, which took place shortly afterwards, put an end to his military prospects.

The strong opposition which Colonel de la Fléchère had shown to his son's wishes made him unwilling to return to his home, and whilst he was wavering in his choice of a profession, he arranged to spend a short time in England. He went, for the purpose of learning the language, into the school of a Mr. Burchell, at South Mimms, in Hertfordshire, and studied English literature with much diligence for nearly two years. By this time he had returned to his early desire of being a clergyman, but wishing for leisure for consideration and study, he procured (at the recommendation of M. Déchamps, a French minister in London) the situation of tutor to the two sons of Mr. Hill, M.P. for Shrewsbury, who lived at Tern Hall, near Atcham, on the Severn. Here Fletcher, as he began to be called, devoted much of his attention to religious subjects, and was very frequent in his attendance at church. But he was soon to take a more decided step. As Mr. Hill and his family were travelling up to London for the meeting of Parliament, they halted at St. Alban's, and Fletcher strolled out into the town, and remained away so long that he was left behind. When he overtook the rest of the party and was asked the reason of his delay, he said that he had heard an old woman talk so delightfully of Jesus Christ that he could not leave her. Mrs. Hill exclaimed in surprise, "I shall wonder if our tutor does not turn Methodist!" "Methodist, madam," said Fletcher, "pray what is that?" She replied, "Why, the Methodists are a people that do nothing but pray; they are praying all day and all night." "Are they indeed?" he answered; "then, by the help of God, I will find them out if they be above ground."

Accordingly, on his arrival in London, Fletcher joined the Methodist Society, by becoming a member of the class under the care of Mr. Richard Edwards. He considered at first that he was quite one of the best persons among the Methodists, and "endeavoured by doing much to make himself acceptable to God," but he was roused by a fearful dream from this condition, and, on hearing a sermon upon saving faith, he became convinced that he did not understand its nature. "Is it possible," he asked himself, "that I, who have always been accounted so religious, who have made divinity my study, and received the premium of piety (so called) from my university for my writings on divine subjects,—is it possible that I should yet be so ignorant as not to know what faith is?" He added that he felt sure that "nothing but a revelation of the Lord Jesus to his heart could make him a true believer." In a diary which he kept for a little while at this time, he wrote:—

"When I saw that all my endeavours towards conquering sin availed nothing, I almost gave up all hope, and resolved to sin on and go to hell. But I remember there was a sort of sweetness even in the midst of these abominable thoughts. 'If I go to hell,' said I, 'I will serve God there, and since I cannot be an instance of his mercy in heaven, I will be a monument of his justice in hell, and if I show forth his glory one way or the other, I am content.' But I soon recovered my ground. I thought Christ died for all, therefore He died for me; He died to pluck such sinners as I am as brands out of the burning. And as I sincerely desire to be his, He will surely take me to himself; He will surely let me know before I die that He hath died for me, and will break asunder these chains wherewith I am bound. . . . So I went on, sinning and repenting, and sinning again, but still calling on God's mercy through Christ."

After a long struggle with the coldness and deadness of feeling which so distressed him, Fletcher began to hope that he would be able to find strength and peace, and at last the time came. He had one night continued his prayers till very late, when he accidentally opened his Bible at the 55th Psalm, and saw the words, "Cast thy burden upon the Lord, and He shall sustain thee."

"Filled with joy," he says, "I fell again on my knees to beg of God that I might always cast my burden on Him. I took up my Bible again, and opened it on these words: 'The Lord, He it is that doth go before thee: He will be with thee, He will not fail thee, neither forsake thee; fear not, neither be dismayed' (Deut. xxxi. 8.) My hope was now greatly increased, I thought I saw myself conqueror over sin, hell, and all manner of affliction. With this comfortable promise I shut my Bible, being now perfectly satisfied; and as I shut it I cast my eyes on that passage, 'Whatsoever ye ask in my name, I will do it.' So, having asked grace of God to serve Him till death, I went cheerfully to take my rest."

Fletcher devoted all his spare time to reading, meditation, and prayer; he sat up during two nights in each week, and on other evenings he made it a rule to read in bed as long as he could keep awake, until one night his curtains and cap took fire, and he narrowly escaped being burnt to death. He refused to dine at Mr. Hill's table, and lived wholly on vegetables, bread, and milk; but in after life he said that, although he did not then feel the need of the sleep and substantial food of which he deprived himself, he would not so abstain if he had the same time to spend over again. He read scarcely any books but the Bible and the "Christian's Pattern," but we may suppose from the regret which he so often expressed afterwards that he had never had time to read Shakespeare, that in this respect also he wished he had acted differently. Almost his only recreation was a walk by the Severn between the services on Sunday, in which he was accompanied by an old servant of Mr. Hill's, who entertained views very similar to his own, and who had once severely rebuked him for copying music on Sunday. But Fletcher felt the need of friendly counsel; and at first selected Mr. Edwards as an adviser. He afterwards turned to Charles Wesley, and continued to consult him as long as he lived.

In 1756 Fletcher made the acquaintance of the Countess of Huntingdon, and at her request preached several times at her house. He had by this time almost determined to become a clergyman, and in the second year of his residence at Tern Hall his resolution was finally taken. After much thought, and consultation with Charles Wesley (in whom he had such confidence that he only asked as an answer—Persist, or Forbear), Fletcher was ordained deacon on Sunday, March 6, 1757, by the Bishop of Hereford, and priest on the following Sunday, by the Bishop of Bangor, in the Chapel Royal, St. James's. The same day he hastened to the West Street chapel, where he assisted Charles Wesley in his service, and he constantly preached there, in Spitalfields, and in other London chapels, both in English and in French. On his return to the country he was asked to preach at Atcham, but his plain speaking gave offence to the congregation; "they gazed at him as if he had been a monster," and he was not for some time invited to preach to them again. Indeed, during the next six months he did not preach more than six times, on each occasion in one of the Shrewsbury churches, or at Wroxeter.

In the next year, when Fletcher accompanied his pupils to London, he stopped on his way to see the Rev. John Berridge of Everton, of whom he had heard much, and introduced himself as one anxious for instruction and advice. Mr. Berridge, perceiving him to be a foreigner, asked where he came from, and on hearing that he was a Swiss, inquired if he was acquainted with a young man named Fletcher, who had preached for the Mr. Wesleys, and had gained much praise from them. Fletcher replied that he was, but added that if the Mr. Wesleys knew that young man as well as he did they would not praise him so much. When Mr. Berridge expressed surprise at his visitor's thus speaking of a countryman, and at his doubting the justice of the opinion formed by the Mr. Wesleys, Fletcher discovered himself, and Mr. Berridge requested him to preach for him next day that he might form his own opinion of him. They became great friends, and were scarcely even separated by a warm controversy which they had when Fletcher published his "Checks to Antinomianism," and Mr. Berridge answered and remarked upon it in his "Christian World Unmasked;" for in the end of 1776, when they met, not having seen each other since their first introduction twenty years before, Mr. Berridge embraced Fletcher, exclaiming, "How could we write against each other when we both aim at the same thing, the glory of God and the good of souls? But my book lies very quietly on the shelf, and there let it lie!"

Fletcher was invited to preach in French to the prisoners on parole at Tunbridge, but the Bishop of London, from some unexplained reason, rejected the petition made to him on the subject, and the sermon was never preached. He occasionally officiated in London, and on his return to Shropshire, he so frequently assisted Mr. Chambrey, the Vicar of Madeley, that he was called his curate. In this year, 1760, Fletcher's duties as tutor came to an end, for his pupils went to Cambridge; the eldest of them died soon afterwards, but the youngest lived to succeed his father in the representation of Shrewsbury and to become Baron Berwick of Attingham House—for so he called Tern Hall. Mr. Hill asked Fletcher if he would take the living of Dunham in Cheshire, telling him that the parish was small, the duty light, the income good (£400 a year), and the place situated in a fine healthy sporting country. Fletcher with many thanks refused the offer, saying that Dunham would not suit him, for there was too much money and too little labour. Mr. Hill said it was a pity to refuse such a living, but as his object was to make Fletcher comfortable in his own way, he asked if he would prefer Madeley, as Mr. Chambrey would gladly go to Dunham, that being worth more than twice as much. This exchange was accordingly effected, and in the end of 1760 Fletcher was established as Vicar of Madeley.

Madeley was even then a very busy and populous place, full, like Coalbrookdale, of collieries and iron-works, and possessing also an extensive china manufactory; the people were lawless, drunken, and devoted to bull-baiting, cock-fighting, and other cruel sports. Fletcher set himself to improve their condition by every means in his power; he held frequent services and prayer-meetings, he made the acquaintance of every one of his parishioners, he personally attended those who were suffering from infectious fevers and who could get no nurse to approach them, he denied himself in all ways in order to be able to relieve their necessities—going without fires, and even giving up many letters to save the then considerable expense of postage. His sermons, which, after he was able to speak English with ease, were always extempore, were very powerful and striking, and his delivery so good, that Wesley considered that he had never met his equal as a preacher; but the influence which he gained in Madeley was in a great measure due to the extreme kindness which marked all his actions, and to the ready wit with which he would point a remark or draw a lesson from some passing occurrence; and his active habits, energy of character, and great personal courage were not without their effect on his rough parishioners. A few instances will show the way in which he dealt with the people. To one collier who would not listen to any of his remonstrances or entreaties, he said, "Well, John, you must either turn or burn." To another, just as he was about to register his marriage, he observed, "William, you have had your name entered in our register once before this." "Yes, sir, at my christening." "And now," continued Fletcher, "your name will be entered a second time. You have no doubt thought much about your present step, and made proper preparations for it in a great many different ways?" "Yes, sir." "Recollect, however, that a third entry of your name, the register of your burial, will sooner or later be made. Think, then, about death, and make preparation for that also, lest it overtake you as a thief in the night." One man, in consequence of a reproof from Fletcher, vowed that he would never enter the church; and once, coming with a funeral, he remained in the porch during the service. Fletcher came out to him and begged him to leave off his evil ways, and at last, finding him obdurate, he said, "Oh, John, if you will not come to God's house on your own feet, prepare, at any rate, for the time when you must come there on your neighbours' shoulders."

Fletcher held stirring services in the open air, and thus attracted many hearers who would not come to church, and on Sunday he would go round his parish with a bell (starting at five A.M. in order to reach the most distant houses), to call those who had excused themselves from morning service because they could not wake in time to get their needful work done before they went. He continually preached against the cruel sports so common in Madeley, and against the evils of the wakes and fairs which were often held there. He was, in consequence, frequently threatened by the rough colliers, who would not give up their amusements, and once some of the most lawless planned a "parson-baiting," as they called it, in which he was to be pulled off his horse and worried by their fierce dogs. But Fletcher's courageous spirit in time commanded their respect, his kindness and tact began to tell, and his church gradually filled. The opposition of the neighbouring clergy and squires, who resented his interference with the established pursuits of the neighbourhood, was more slow to yield, and showed itself in constant petty persecution; but this also in time gave way before the untiring zeal with which Fletcher pursued his object. He wrote to Charles Wesley:—

"When I first came to Madeley I was greatly mortified and discouraged by the smallness of my congregation. . . . But now, thank God, things are altered in that respect, and last Sunday I had the pleasure of seeing some in the churchyard who could not get into the church."

But in less than a year he had to add:—

"My church begins not to be so well filled as it has been, and I account for it by the following reasons: The curiosity of some of my hearers is satisfied, and others are offended by the word; the roads are worse, and if it shall ever please the Lord to pour his Spirit upon us, the time is not yet come, for, instead of saying, 'Let us go up together to the house of the Lord,' they exclaim, 'Why should we go and hear a Methodist?' I should lose all patience with my flock if I had not more reason to be satisfied with them than with myself."

at his afternoon service, and "taking leave to make observations on such passages as confirmed what had been advanced" in his own sermon in the morning; by this plan those persons who only came to find fault were silenced or baffled, and by degrees his church filled with willing hearers. He devoted himself to his work so entirely that he never left Madeley for ten years after his appointment, and declared that a parish was a greater tie than a wife. However, in the spring of 1770 he was persuaded to take a holiday, and travelled for five months with his friend, Mr. Ireland, in the South of France, where he preached to the Protestants in the Cevennes: he ended by visiting his old home in Switzerland.

But Madeley was now an orderly parish, and Fletcher in consequence was not obliged to occupy himself so exclusively in his work there. Lady Huntingdon had never lost sight of him, and on his return to England she asked him to become the head of the college which she had established in 1769 at Trevecca, in South Wales. This college was intended for religious young men of all denominations, and the terms of admission were that "the students should be truly converted to God, and resolved to dedicate themselves to his service." They were boarded, clothed, and taught for three years at Lady Huntingdon's expense, and after that time were to become either clergymen of the Church of England or Dissenting ministers, as they chose. Fletcher declined the governorship of this college, as he would not leave Madeley; but he consented to act as a sort of superior in it, and made frequent visits to it to appoint masters, to admit or exclude students, to judge of their qualifications for the ministry, and to overlook their studies. But very soon the college began to be divided against itself. We cannot indeed wonder at its failure (even without a clear understanding of the points of difference), when we read the description given by Mr. Cox, one of the biographers of Fletcher. He says—

"Lady Huntingdon, the founder of the college, leaned to supralapsarianism; the Hon. Walter Shirley, the president, to sublapsarianism; Mr. Fletcher, the visitor, maintained the doctrine of general redemption; and Mr. Henderson, who had just resigned to Mr. Benson his office of classical tutor, was an Universalist."

Mr. Cox goes on:—

"The superior talents, eminent piety, and conciliatory manners of the visitor, might for some time longer have neutralised these jarring elements, had not Mr. Wesley, in his zeal to check the progress of Antinomianism, publicly borne his testimony in his Minutes of Conference against that error in language which was supposed to border on Pelagianism."

Upon this Lady Huntingdon forgot her liberal views, and declared that any student who did not fully disavow the doctrines of those Minutes must leave her college. The masters and students had to give their opinion in writing, and Fletcher sent in his resignation, saying that as he should always believe that Christ died for all men, he considered himself to be discharged from his post. Mr. Benson left the college at the same time, and Fletcher thus wrote to him:—

"So far as we can, let us keep this matter to ourselves. When you speak of it to others, rather endeavour to palliate than aggravate what has been wrong in your opponents. Remember that that great lady has been an instrument of great good, and that there are inconsistencies attending the greatest and best of men."

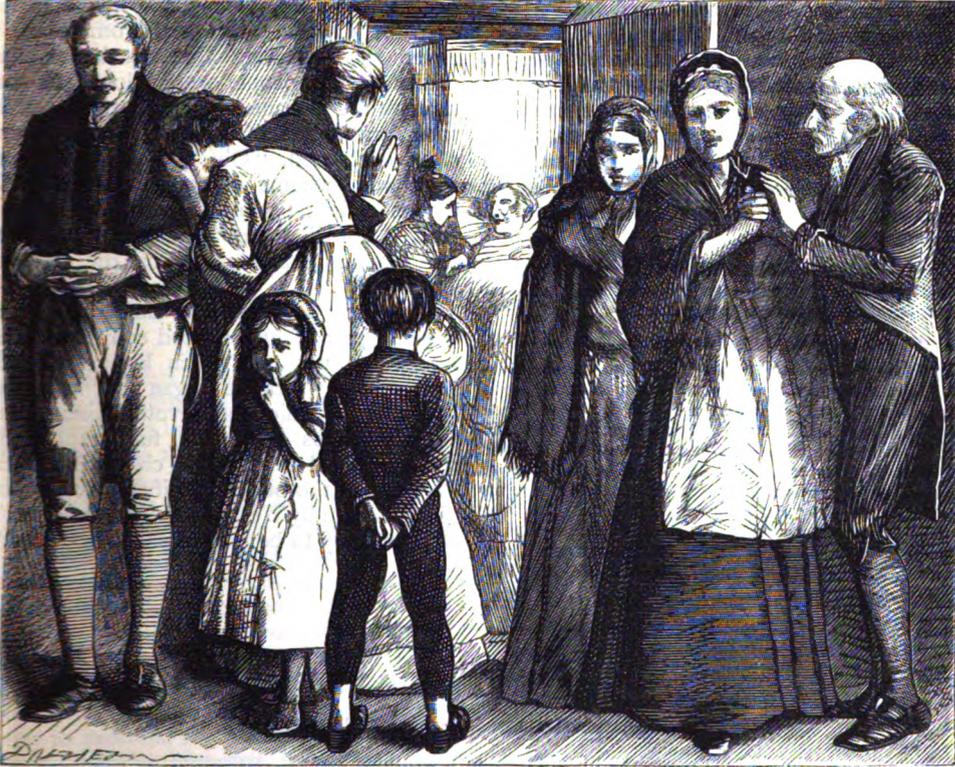

But, as was to be expected, the controversy became public, and was continued for some time; Wesley passed on his share in it to Fletcher, and he now wrote his "Checks to Antinomianism"—his principal opponents being the Rev. Augustus Toplady (so well known from his hymns), Sir Richard Hill, of Hawkstone, and his brother the celebrated Rowland Hill, and the Rev. Mr. Berridge. The dispute was carried on with extreme warmth, and the following anecdote will show the almost incredible bitterness of feeling which it called forth:—A person who took the opposite side to Fletcher in the contest came to hear him preach, and, after plainly showing his objection to the discourse during its progress, said at the end, "I do not like your doctrine, sir, because before the sermon you prayed that all men might be saved. That is false doctrine, and if Christ himself came from heaven to preach it I would not believe it."

Fletcher himself deeply regretted the vehemence shown during the controversy, and used to lament that those engaged in it, "though Christians, wished to gore each other." He seems to have confined himself to the purely argumentative side of the matter, and to have drawn back from the personal attacks into which it would have been easy to fall, and he did his best to make friends with all his opponents. To one angry controversialist who refused to shake hands with him, he said, "My dear brother, we serve the same blessed Lord; why then should we disagree because our liveries are not turned up exactly alike?" But the constant worry and distress which such a quarrel could not fail to bring to a man like Fletcher had a bad effect on his health, which was already weakened by his frequent journeys in all weathers to Trevecca, and by his unceasing labours at Madeley. He would often be out in his parish or holding services at five o'clock in the morning; he generally worked for sixteen hours a day and took no regular meals, and he wearied himself by going to preach at places several miles from Madeley. He was offered another living by the King, whose notice he had attracted by his tract in support of Wesley's view of the right England had to tax the American colonies, but he declined it, saying, "I want nothing but more grace."

However, in 1776 he was obliged to leave Madeley for a considerable time, for his health had completely broken down, and he was thought to be in a consumption. He never expected to recover, but he consented to try the Bristol waters, and to give himself complete rest. At Bristol he was visited by a man who, although far gone in decline, refused to believe that he was dying; after some conversation with him, Fletcher laid his hand on his own chest, and said, "God has fixed a loud knocker at my breast and yours. Because we did not regard as we ought the gentle calls of his Holy Spirit, his Word, and his providences, He has taken fast hold here, and we cannot get out of his hands. Oh, let the knocker waken you!" Fletcher wrote also in a similar strain to Miss Ireland (whose father had taken her abroad in the vain hope of checking the disease of the lungs from which she suffered):—

"To see the bridge of life cut off behind us, and have done with all thoughts of repairing it to go back into the world, has a natural tendency to make us venture forward to the foot of the Cross. Reflect that though your earthly father loves you much—witness the hundreds of miles he has gone for the bare prospect of your health—yet your Heavenly Father loves you a thousand times better, and He is all wisdom as well as all goodness. Allow then such a gracious, loving Father to choose for you, and if He chooses death, acquiesce, and say, as you can, Good is the will of the Lord; His choice must be best."

The Bristol waters had no effect on Fletcher's health, and he left England, going first to Aix-les-Bains, and then to his old home at Nyon, where he remained for more than three years. The complete rest and pure air did more towards his recovery than could have been expected. At the end of the three years he was able to preach, and on the few occasions that he did so the church at Nyon was far too small for the congregations which assembled, and ladders were placed against the windows, and covered with listeners. During this time Fletcher wrote his principal work, "The Portrait of St. Paul;" it was written in French, but has been well translated into English.

In April, 1781, he returned to England, and in the autumn of that year he married Miss Bosanquet, a lady with whom he had been acquainted for more than twenty years. With the exception of one short visit to some friends in Ireland, Fletcher and his wife stayed at Madeley during the four remaining years of his life—he working among his people with undiminished energy, and she helping him in every possible way. But he was well aware of his precarious condition. To a friend he wrote:—

"God has lately shaken Mr. Wesley over the grave, notwithstanding I think he will survive me. . . . I have been long walking around my grave."

And to Wesley himself he wrote, later:—

"I keep in my sentry-box till Providence remove me; my situation is quite suited to my little strength. I may do as much or as little as I please, according to my weakness; and I have an advantage here which I can have nowhere else in such a degree—my little field of action is just at my door, so that if I happen to overdo myself I have but a step from my pulpit to my bed, and from my bed to my grave. If I had a body full of vigour, and a purse full of money, I should like well enough to travel about as you do, but as Providence did not call me to it, I readily submit. The snail does best in its shell."

Fletcher's last illness was short. In the beginning of August, 1785, many of his parishioners were ill of fever, and one night, after having been among them for more than twelve hours, he complained of extreme fatigue and weakness. He would not, however, take sufficient rest, and on the following Sunday he insisted on doing the whole of the morning service. In the course of his sermon he nearly fainted, and Mrs. Fletcher, pressing through the crowd, entreated him to stop. But he revived a little when a window was opened and a bunch of flowers given him to smell, and went on to the end. Then his strength failed completely, and he was carried from the church to his bed, from which he never rose. During that week he sank gradually; his people were allowed to pass through the passage by the open door of his room, and he, full of distress at leaving them, often exclaimed, "Oh, my poor, my poor, what will become of my poor! But," he always added, turning to his wife, "God is love." He died on Sunday, August 14th, and was buried at Madeley on the following Wednesday.

Fletcher's labours were carried on in an obscure part of his adopted country, his few books are not now much known, but the energy with which he began and continued the work to which he devoted himself, and the saintliness of his life, fully explain the reverence still felt for his character and example, and thoroughly justify the description given of him by Wesley—"A pattern of holiness scarcely to be paralleled in a century."

LOVE AND ADORATION.

"Thomas said unto Him, My Lord and my God."—JOHN XX. 28.

OH I would love Thee as I would adore,
 My Lord, my God; my God in whom I live,
 Claiming my life's devotion evermore;
 My Lord, who for my joy Thy joy didst give
 To anguish: for my life Thy life to loss:
 Who more than Maker, more than Master art,
 Claiming my love's devotion, from Thy Cross
 Pleading, "I love thee well, give me thine heart."
 Creator and Redeemer, God and Lord,
 Pledging my life I kneel before Thy face,
 From Thee apostate, yet by Thee restored,
 I pledge my whole heart for Thy tender grace.
 Yea, I would love Thee as I would adore:
 Oh to be worthier! Oh to love Thee more!

FOOTSTEPS OF THE COLPORTEUR.

THE Colporteur movement in Scotland has been a great success. In the north of Ireland, too, it has done remarkably well; England alone, of the three kingdoms, has looked at it shyly. In Scotland, it is as yet but a stripling of seventeen, but as the saying is, it has made a good use of its time. It is a healthy fir-tree that, when sawn across, presents a distinct ring for every year of its life; what shall we infer from the subjoined section of the colportage Scotch fir?—

At the close of 1855 there were 3 colporteurs.

"	"	1858	"	54	"

"	"	1869	"	169	"
"	"	1870	"	179	"
"	"	1871	"	202	"

We like this quiet, steady growth, indicating so clearly that while the branches are spreading, the roots are deepening and the trunk is thickening. But who and what is the colporteur? The simplest answer to this question would be—See the SUNDAY MAGAZINE for 1865, page 822. But we do not flatter ourselves that in more than perhaps one case out of a hundred, this reference would be turned to account. Let us say then in one word, that the ideal colporteur—and in cases not a few the real colporteur as well—is not a mere book-hawker, but an earnest Christian man, who tries to promote the sale of cheap and wholesome Christian literature, with a view to the highest good of the people, and avails himself of the various openings for Christian usefulness that occur in the course of his peregrinations. Chosen without regard to sect or denomination by friends interested in the Christian welfare of the people in their neighbourhood, he is supplied with his ammunition by a society in Edinburgh, and once a month traverses his district, embracing a population of perhaps eight thousand, selling books and Bibles, supplying periodicals to his subscribers, offering tracts to whoever will take them, and using his personal influence in every suitable way for the discouragement of vice, and the promotion of godliness. Wherever he has average success, the profit on what he sells defrays at least one-half of his salary, and a sum of about thirty pounds a year is all that is needed from local contributions. It is the cheapest of all mission-agencies; it is one of the most catholic, and the results already realised show that it is also one of the most useful.

The origin of the scheme may be traced, we believe, to certain cheap London papers—penny journals and miscellanies that are sent over the country in hundred weights and tons. It was remarked that these were pouring into the homes of the working classes in towns, and even penetrating to the rural districts, absorbing the attention of the young, and giving to their minds a most frivolous if not pernicious direction. In very many cases they furnish the Sunday reading of the people, the magazines being read by the younger members of the families, and the newspapers by the older. Closer investigations brought out the fact that there is much matter surreptitiously circulated of a grossly obscene and disgusting kind. The art of photography, for example, has been employed to an extent which is incredible, in the production of pictures of unsurpassable grossness, and there are women vile enough to traverse the country and endeavour to find purchasers for such infamous filth. Since the colporteur scheme came into operation, the dangers arising from the circulation of unwholesome literature have not decreased, except perhaps in so far as they have been counteracted by the movements of this society and similar agencies. Sensational journals, dealing in police reports and the proceedings of the divorce courts, and accompanying their narratives with hideous pictures, are familiarising the lower class of minds with crime and disorder, and encouraging not a few to go and do likewise. What profess to be biographies of the most abandoned characters, male and female, present the details of the guiltiest careers to readers by the hundred thousand, professing perhaps to show the misery they breed, but really rendering vice interesting, and softening and finally removing the horror with which it is regarded by the healthy conscience. The worst of these things is that they tend, by the very law of their existence, to become worse and worse. The prurient appetite clamours for more and more exciting food, and the ingenuity of the debased and demoralised writer is stimulated to discover how, without incurring the penalties of Lord Campbell's Act, he may make his dishes spicier and spicier. It is beyond doubt that a large section of the people of these islands are trifling with the currents that have been so destructive of the moral fibre of France, and have made that country an easy prey to Bismarck and the Germans. And Acts of Parliament, we must remember, are a poor and feeble protection against corrupting tendencies. No law can be permanently enforced that is not backed by strong public opinion; and if British sentiment should become easy and tolerant of the ways of the demi-monde, our laws would be little more effectual than children's walls of sand on the sea-beach against the roll of the advancing ocean.

Perhaps the best way for the general reader to get an idea of the colporteur's labours is to take a tour with him, and see how he gets on. It is the beginning of the month, and he has just got his parcel of periodicals and books from the Edinburgh dépôt. And here comes his first enjoyment. Who does not know the pleasure of the first look of a new number of a favourite magazine, especially if it be well illustrated? What sort of cartoon has the British Workman got this month, and what are the texts of Spurgeon's sermons? What is there to attract the youngsters in the Children's Friend, and what has the Adviser got to rouse the better feelings of the drunkard? Has the SUNDAY MAGAZINE got any of the charming experiences of dear old Edward Garrett, or of his sister Ruth? Where has Dr. Guthrie been wandering, and is it one of the London Charities, or one of his pulpit sermons that he makes the subject of his paper? Ah, here is something in another magazine that just meets a difficult case that puzzled him last month, and that will tell him what so and so wished to know. And what are these tender lines somewhere else, on the death of the Shunammite's son? Full of balm and sweetness to a poor mother in his beat, who has gone through the Shunammite's experience of grief, and may thus be encouraged to lay hold, in some measure, of her resurrection experience too. We would not grudge to the skilful colporteur a little more time than perhaps he usually takes to acquaint himself with the contents of his parcel; for if he read with his customers and people in his view, and store his mind with things adapted to this case and the other, and use them skilfully and readily as he goes along, the time so spent will be as usefully employed as any.

And now he is ready to set out. But first let him kneel down and commend himself and his wares to his Master, and humbly implore that to all with whom he talks he may be guided to say the right word, and that every page that he parts with may bear a blessing to the reader. In the town or hamlet where he resides, he will have a good many periodicals to deliver. Perhaps as he goes along he will have some good news to hear. One day a woman comes up to him and asks, "Do you remember the little book I got from you three weeks ago?" and before he can remember what it was, she says, "It has been the means of saving my soul"—and hurries on, leaving him dumb with surprise and pleasure. Another time he hears that a little book which one of his customers lent to a drunken neighbour has had a marvellous effect, and that she is now quite a changed woman. Possibly the change is on one nearer home, and a house that has been the scene of utter misery gets a streak of Paradise thrown across it. When handing sixpence to the colporteur for a book which he had sold to her the previous month, a married woman remarks—"It has been the best sixpence worth ever was in our house, I can assure you: for I had been reading it, and left it on the settle, and when my husband came in, he took it up and read it in silence, and then aloud, and I rejoiced to see the tears running down his face, and at last he was like to choke; and there and then, for the first time, he saw he was lost, and cried to God for mercy, and has obtained peace through believing. Mrs. J—— and I met every day for prayer, and asked God to change the hearts of our husbands, and you see our prayers have not been in vain. And to think that God employed that little book as the means of bringing him to seek salvation. We had lived a most miserable life about twelve months. We had come to an agreement to part altogether, and I was determined to do so, if I was to experience another of his mad fits. But you see old things are passed away, and all things are become new; for since the change took place he is as peaceable as a lamb, and we are so happy. And now we have family worship, which he takes a delight in."

Another of his happy experiences is to meet with persons in humble life who, at no little cost of time and money, are trying to do good. Here, for example, is a young woman who spends threepence a month in purchasing periodicals which she lays down in the jobbers' room in the slaughter-houses, for the benefit of the butchers in their leisure hours. Threepence to her may be nearly as much as the two mites of the widow; but encouraged by what she has experienced, she resolves to double the sum; sends word to the colporteur to send sixpence worth hereafter, and for this the men receive monthly the British Workman, British Herald, Cottager, two Happy Homes, two Appeals, and one Adviser, besides a good supply of tracts supplied by the society; "and I believe," adds the colporteur, "that these are the only means of grace that are brought to bear on the most of these poor men. They are the most careless class of men ever I came in contact with, and yet many of them are soft-hearted men too, for when I have the opportunity of speaking to some of them, I have often observed the big tears rolling down the cheeks of the most hardened looking of them all. I asked one of them one day if the periodicals were read by many of the men. He said they were, and the little stories were the subject of conversation many a time when it would have been nothing but cursing and swearing. He said that many of them longed for the first of the month. I ask your prayers that these silent messengers may be blessed to some of these poor men and boys."

Another enjoyment which the colporteur sometimes has, in consequence of his customers belonging to various classes of society, is to suggest to the more comfortable, little ways of helping the distressed which might not otherwise occur to them. Most large houses have a lumber-closet, whose contents only occupy space and are of no use whatever; bring the colporteur, or the Bible-woman into contact with them, and see what treasures they will be found. At present our story is about an old piece of carpet. "When visiting in this locality two months before, I called on an invalid, whose sister stays with her. Both are old, lean, and spent creatures, but though very poor, they keep the attic in which they live very clean; but it being like themselves, pretty old, the floor is much open, and consequently is very cold. My visit then paid, I went to a mansion in the neighbourhood, and desired to see the lady's companion, to whom I unfolded the case of the two old, spent, thin-blooded sisters; of their bare, old open floor; and said that I thought they perhaps might have some tags of carpets laid uselessly by; and wished her to try and see if anything could be done to make cold, gloomy winter more cheerful to the aged pair. She promised to see. So, on calling last Wednesday on the old people, I ran up-stairs to engage in prayer with them, having quite forgot all about the carpets. On my entering, a smile of contentment and satisfaction played on their countenances, as, seizing my hands, they began pouring out blessings on my head, and on my family. 'Look,' they said, pointing to the floor. A glance brought the whole affair to my remembrance, and soon revealed the secret of the joy they exhibited, for there I stood on a comfortably carpeted floor; 'and,' says the invalid who was in bed at the time, 'the lady has also sent a warm rug for my feet at the fireside.' 'Ay,' says the other sister, opening the chest and displaying a nice, clean, folded piece of carpet, 'we have all this over for any other purpose; and the lady told us it was you we had to thank for the whole; blessings on you.' Having conversed a little, we knelt in prayer, and thanked God for our many comforts."

The journeys of the colporteur bring him into contact with a great variety of people, many of them very inaccessible to the more ordinary means of grace. A rainy day is not always the worst for him. In smithies and barns and bothies he may come upon considerable numbers of persons, and he finds it a good opportunity of showing them his wares, and getting into friendly conversation. The bothy, as many of our readers know, is the insoluble problem of Scottish civilisation. It is the dwelling-place of the unmarried labourers on the larger farms, very rough outwardly, and, for the most part, still more so inwardly. It is a special charge of the earnest colporteur. And now he finds himself more at home there than he used to do. The lads are not left to exercise their ingenuity and their wit in settling what kind of animal he is, and what kind of wares he carries. Often he enlists them among his subscribers, and sells to them a number of his books. "I am happy to say," says a colporteur, "that there is a great difference since I began to travel here. I have had several conversations with young men in bothies since I wrote you last. I am glad to see some young lads who have not much to buy with glad to get me to stop a while with them, that they may see my books, some of them will be busy reading all the time, and when returning the paper or book they were looking at, will tell me, 'If I had money I would buy that one.' I try to convince them that it will be far better for them to invest their money with me than with the landlord of the most spacious public-house. I find that some of the Temperance Tales I have sold have been carefully read in the bothy, and lent to others. The Rev. Mr. G—, in one of his visitations, recommended a British Workman to four young men in a bothy where there had never been anything but trash read before. He told me of having done so. I went, and now I take every month three Sunday Magazines, one Good Words, and a British Messenger, besides at times a few other things. Two of them are now leaving, and anxiously inquire if there will be a colporteur where they are going."

Another very necessitous field is the mining district, with its rude, roystering, well-paid but careless population. "I find that there is great need for religious literature in this district, especially amongst the mining classes; but the Lord is opening up a great field for me here, so that I am getting the good seed sown in one row of miners' houses. I have sold no less than fourteen of the Society's reduced Bibles at three shillings; and what is more remarkable still, there was no such thing as a Bible in their house before, and I verily believe never would have been but for this agency."

Even the Irish Roman Catholics are not wholly unreached:—

"I sell a good number of the small three-penny Testaments to Roman Catholics, and also the 'Pilgrim's Progress,' and 'Come to Jesus.' One day I was passing by a Papist's house, and the man's wife followed me to another house and told me to come back, for her husband wanted to buy Baxter's 'Saint's Rest.' So I went back, and he told me he saw one of them in a Catholic house, that I had sold a few days before; so he bought it, and the wife entered her name as a subscriber for the Children's Friend, for her children. And there are many things similar to this that I have not mentioned."

No place is too unpromising for the colporteur. He drops into a stable, finds a number of young men engaged as stable-boys generally are, gets into friendly conversation with them, and persuades some of them to buy a book or to become subscribers for his periodicals. He sees an encampment of tinkers, wild and repulsive-looking enough to scare away any ordinary visitor; but without hesitation he lays himself alongside of them; and if he cannot find readers among them, he can at least interest the children in the coloured cards and illuminated texts which form part of his ammunition—perhaps touch their hearts by telling them a Bible story, and create in them a desire to be able to read for themselves. And generally, if he have the knack of interesting children, they will come to be among the most enthusiastic of his friends. The hymns that he gives them at one visit are often committed to memory against another; if he be musical he will sing new hymns and tunes to them, introducing them to the "Beautiful River," or some other favourite melody, so that it is no wonder if his arrival be eagerly waited for, and warmly welcomed. Few things can be more encouraging than the welcome of children; and any colporteur may well forget the fatigue of a long tramp on the hard highway if, at some well-known corner, there are half-a-dozen smiling faces and cheery voices to welcome him, holding out their little hands for illuminated texts and hymns, and bounding off in delight to show them to their companions and carry them home.

Occasions sometimes occur when he needs a wider knowledge and a larger acquaintance with literature to be able to meet the questions with which he is plied. The free-thinker will occasionally assail him with his objections, and to deal with them effectually will make a considerable demand on his intelligence and skill. A sceptical shoemaker tells him that the Bible cannot be from God, because its account of the creation is untrue. The colporteur refers him to Hugh Miller's "Testimony of the Rocks," and indicates that if a man like Miller did not feel his faith in the Bible impaired by geology, his friend the shoemaker may rest satisfied on that head too. Like many a disputant, the sceptic finds it easier to assail the character of his witness than to dispose of his testimony. He does not think that one whose death came about as Hugh Miller's did can be a valid witness on the side of religion. The colporteur has the opportunity of turning on him and asking him whether such a style of arguing denotes a sincere desire for truth—whether it does not rather evince a strong prejudice against it. Sceptical objections to the Bible and to Christianity are always starting up somewhere; it is of the last importance for the colporteur to be armed with handy and conclusive arguments on the other side.

Such illustrations of the colporteur's work make it very plain that it is as a supplementary labourer, in connection with other agencies, that his Christian usefulness chiefly lies. To fancy that the colporteur single-handed can grapple with the tremendous problems which the state of farm servants or of the mining population presents to Christian zeal, would be absurd. He may do occasional good service here and there; but other agencies are eminently needed for the state of things presented by these classes. Still, it is a great thing to do a little ; as Romney Leigh discovered, hard experience compels us to abandon the youthful notion of putting the whole disorders of society to rights, and to be content with being like one of the seven men whom it takes to make a pin—content if our efforts to do good to the world enable us “to mend its rents a little.” The colporteur, even in his most ideal state of perfection, can do no more.

We have spoken of the colporteur chiefly as a missionary. And this is really his leading function, nor would the greater part of the friends who support him care to do so if the benefits which they expected from his labours were of an inferior kind. Still there are subordinate benefits which, at least in some instances, spring from his labours. A taste for reading is encouraged, a stimulus is given to the thirst for knowledge, and young men of the more ardent type are led on to higher efforts in the way of self-education and mental improvement. It may probably not be so in all cases, possibly not in many, but it certainly is so in some. An Aberdeenshire colporteur tells of a young man who after devouring the provender with which he has supplied him, goes off to college, and may some day perhaps emerge a minister of the gospel or a medical missionary. And in some instances it is the colporteur himself that is developed into the educated man. A few months ago a sad announcement appeared in the newspapers—a steamer was run down in the China seas, and among those who perished was a young and very promising medical missionary, Dr. Thomson. His history was eminently interesting. Originally a collier-lad in Linlithgowshire, he had commended himself by his Christian steadfastness to his pastor, and under his countenance had become the colporteur of the district. He had discharged the duties of that humble office so well, and had shown such a capacity for general culture and for Christian usefulness, that he was encouraged to go through a college curriculum, and qualify himself as a medical missionary. The struggles of that long preparation had come to an end, he had just entered on his work as a missionary in China, and had given the highest promise of usefulness, when his career was ended in the disastrous manner that has been adverted to. Other such cases may have occurred, and more will in all likelihood be heard of ; for in Scotland especially the thirst for knowledge grows by what it feeds on, and success in the humbler walks of usefulness has a wonderful effect in begetting a desire for the higher spheres.

In the books and periodicals of which the largest number of copies are sold, according to the list annually published by the society, it is obvious that the predominating qualities are earnestness and a direct capacity for usefulness, and that works in which there is more regard to the literary element occupy a somewhat secondary place. This is what was to be expected ; the missionary character of the scheme must ever be the prominent feature. But a scheme of this kind, wisely conducted, will embrace among its secondary benefits an elevation of the literary taste, and a widening of the literary sympathies of the more intelligent class of readers. And it is well to keep this in view from the beginning. In the first stage of not a few earnest religious movements taste has been utterly neglected, and the consequence has been that after a time a reaction has set in ; there has been a rush to the opposite extreme, and the æsthetic element has stifled or at least dwarfed the spiritual. In places of worship built by men intent on the conversion of souls, architecture has often been despised ; by-and-by a reaction has come, and in place of the big barns which were the original structures there has been reared chapels of white marble, with magnificent organs and all the luxuriant fittings of modern device, such as the Methodists and others are now building in America. The true way to prevent this extreme at the end of a religious movement is to avoid its opposite at the beginning. We are thankful to observe that in many of the forms of religious earnestness in our day the claims of good taste are obtaining more attention. In psalmody, in the selection of tunes, in hymnology, there is a steady progress from primitive rant to a purer style. The first era of tracts was sufficiently rude ; now it is felt that the appearance even of the smallest piece of printed matter goes for something. Human nature is many-sided ; and though it be well to obtain access at first by a vigorous appeal to some single faculty, if permanent and complete possession of it is to be held, regard must be had to all its wants and appetencies. Some time ago we were much interested in getting from a very earnest minister of the gospel in Glasgow an account of a class of mill-girls, in which one of his exercises was to read and comment on books fitted to purify and elevate their taste—one of them, as we remember, being the poems of Elizabeth Barrett Browning. The beginning of his labours had been in the Wynds, amongst the worst dregs and outcasts of Glasgow society; the preaching of the gospel had gathered them in, the Spirit of God had been poured out at revival meetings, and the reception of divine truth, while it had satisfied their earnest spiritual cravings, had served to stir other faculties, and among the rest that sense of the beautiful, in some of its subtler forms, which poems like Mrs. Browning's are fitted to gratify. Directors of spiritual movements do well to remember that in proportion as they succeed in their more immediate object, they are broadening out the human soul, they are slowly and silently rousing dormant faculties on this side and on that, and are creating new cravings, the supply of which is sometimes a more difficult matter than the provision for their more earnest and vital wants.

Among the secondary demands of a time of spiritual quickening are books such as Arnold used to long for; not directly religious, but on common subjects written in a religious spirit. Earnest men are sometimes apt to suppose that their own efforts and the efforts of others are thrown away unless they are directed to the production or the circulation of the highest essences of spiritual food—tracts and books bearing on the most fundamental interests of the soul. But Providence takes a wider view of what is needed for the world's welfare. Good men are moved by God's Spirit to undertake work of wonderful range and variety, and in the end it will be found that every portion of it is required for the building up of that perfect temple which is ultimately to issue from all the varied activity of Christians. Thus Milton joins with Bunyan and Baxter in building up the kingdom of God; and Butler's "Analogy" and Paley's "Natural Theology" are in their way as indispensable as Doddridge's "Rise and Progress" or James's "Anxious Inquirer."

It is in this direction that members of the bookselling trade will eventually find compensation for any small loss which may accrue to them at first from the work of the colporteur. It is quite possible that in some few instances the colporteur may interfere with the local bookseller. To whatever extent this may happen, it is to be regretted, as any and every operation is to be regretted, however good its design, which discourages honest and self-relying industry. But in the end, the colportage movement is fitted to benefit the bookseller. Whatever quickens the appetite for wholesome reading, whatever elevates the taste and enlarges the minds of the masses must in the end tell in his favour. Whatever turns expenditure from the public-house to the literary mart, and makes men in large numbers to feel that they must have something to satisfy their cravings, not for strong drink, but for intellectual refreshment, must be a good thing for the bookselling trade. The mere huckster who aims at making a living, no matter how, will of course be ill pleased at anything that cuts off from him the slightest atom of business. The man of larger soul, who sees in the book trade a great engine for elevating and purifying the character of the people, will rejoice in any scheme that bears in this direction. To such a man, the existence of low literary tastes on the part of the masses, is a source of the deepest distress; no brighter vision could flit before him than that of a people scorning the miserable garbage now so eagerly pounced on, and finding a high gratification in the best and purest of our literary treasures. Why may the vision not become a reality? A great impulse is in the course of being given to the cause of common education; a considerable enlargement of the intellectual faculties may surely be looked for, in harmony, as we trust and hope, with the claims of divine truth. If such an intellectual enlargement shall take place, it is a great question, how it is to be fed? To our mind the answer is plain. Such agencies as that of the colporteur will bring the people into acquaintance with wholesome literature of the more elementary sort; but the larger and profounder treasuries of knowledge will continue to be supplied, only on a larger scale, by the regular trade. And while the humbler agency has a sphere of great usefulness before it in dealing with those whose tastes and habits are at the lowest, the opportunity lies before the other of aiding in the indefinite elevation both of the literary taste and the literary provender of the nation at large.

and loch were the centre of a district of pasture lands, and of ancient forest cut down and awaiting fresh planting. The whole formed a green hollow, rising in slightly swelling uplands, and bounded on the west by the blue hills of Stirlingshire. In this hollow slept the steel-blue loch, and along the side of the loch stretched the town in a fashion not uncommon in Scotland. But the Lithgow of those days was different from the quiet, quaint little country town of present times. In spite of primitive rudeness and little comfort, Lithgow boasted then a palace—not a ruin, but in stately perfection—honourable among the palaces of its day, with park, avenue, and grand gateway—the favourite residence of Mary of Guise. In its western tower was born another Mary, whose beauty and misery still raise for her champions. In its Parliament Hall, sittings of parliament were not rare occurrences. The little brown town, the houses of which were mostly composed of wood and thatch, held two or three monasteries of black and white friars and carmelites, and the battlemented town houses of several of the nobility, including those of the Duke of Chatelraux and the Archbishop of St. Andrews. At no distant day a treacherous occupation of one of those houses was to cost Scotland her head, and darken the dawning of her liberty and order.

But it is not with the higher and mightier dwellings that we have to do. It is with a humble enough building in which, nevertheless, there was fostered a power greater than mere outward authority. The same power, like Hercules in his cradle, was strangling serpents, and rising to gigantic labours and achievements all over Scotland. On the Mount hill near Cupar-Fife; at St. Andrews amidst the mists of the German Ocean; at Glasgow by old St. Mungo's cell; at Haddington in the fat Louduns, the light was kindled—the one irresistible impulse of truth, justice, and faith, which may admit of persecution and violent death, but which cannot, as God is in heaven, admit of final defeat. It was meet that poor little Scotland—where men in the middle of their fierce passions and stern necessities were keen-witted, with a craving after knowledge—should play an early and considerable part in that wonderful drama which we call the Reformation. Granted that the learning, besides the massive Latin and (a little later) the polished Greek, was in its metaphysical heart dry and dogmatic, so that it tended to nurture hard-headed, saturnine men, who when bitter persecution was added to the rest of their education, became on occasion harsh in manner and arrogant in tone: still, learning did its work, and the old Scotch scholars, for the most part, had hearts as firm and incapable of being uprooted as their mountains—hearts, the warmth of which, like peat fires behind volumes of pungent smoke, glowed out of the gloom on the friends whom the scholars trusted and who believed in and followed them.

The grammar school of Lithgow, under the wing of St. Michael's Church, was then a long, low building, having turf walls thatched with heather, and its earthen floors strewn with rushes, as much to save the masters from rheums and agues as the scholars from chilblains. The nature of the accommodation was not of much count in a hardy age. The great thing was that there was a grammar school, where not only the laird of Briechsidge's son and the sons of other neighbouring lairds could acquire a little useful and polite learning without the burden and cost of resident tutors; but where humbler persons, sib to gentle blood and venturing to share in the aspirations of their betters, could get their sons, if they showed capacity, carried beyond the horn-book at a reasonable rate of payment in kind—in flour and flax, butter and wool, with special dues of home-made candles for candlemas, and cakes and ale for yule.

Such a person with a promising son was Mistress Dundas, of the Port-House. Her husband, deceased, had been a thriving wool-comber in the town, of such eminence in his trade that he had been one of the eight deacons helping to constitute the town council, which was incorporated in the late reign. Death had cut short his temporal fortunes; but he had left his widow sufficiently well-off for her to continue to occupy, at the west port of the town, a narrow, high wooden house, known as the Port-House, and to manage, by the help of her servants, to till a field or two which, with their hovels of offices, belonged to the Port-House.

On one of the benches in the dark grammar school, at the close of a tempestuous March afternoon, sat Thomas, or Tam Dundas, a big-boned boy of thirteen or fourteen, in his grey doublet and purple hose, with his little ink-horn fastened to his side, like a young clerk. No pretty boy was the lad. He had rather a wiry, terrier-dog aspect, with his dry, rebellious, sand-coloured hair standing on end above a tanned, high-cheek-boned face. He had, besides, a blunt nose, a strong jaw, a straight chin, and in the precocious sagacity and intrepidity which they expressed he looked almost queer. The forehead was powerful; and the redeeming feature, with reference to beauty, presented itself in the eyes, yet they were neither large nor dark, only a grey hazel and deep-set, but very keen and lustrous.

Tam was occupied along with the other lads in a course of grammar, and the rudiments of Latin, mathematics, and philosophy. But there was this distinction in Tam's case, that, while his fellow-pupils in great proportion worked either dully, or diversified their work by boyish diversions, he learned with a will and a relish, evident in the pleased, engrossed saving backwards and forwards of his lank body, and the contortions of his face, which accompanied the contented drone between the hum of a bee and the purr of a cat, with which, unconscious of the babble around him, he went over his tasks.

The masters were two that day—one was the regular master, a stout, easy-minded old man, who had waxed fat and slothful at his post, yawning with little disguise behind his book of rules and simple Latinity, and winking largely at the negligence and turbulence of his scholars, by whom he was half liked, half despised. The other master wore a priest's cassock, and was indeed a priest who had come to live with the vicar of St. Michael's, and had taken the grammar school under his particular superintendence. Master Nicol was so far gone in lethargic self-indulgence, that he hardly heeded or resented the interference; and the boys were slow to respond, save by fear and abhorrence, to the rousing discipline of a man with whom the ordinary boy-nature had not a particle of sympathy.

His reverence's was a cold, rigid, logical soul, looking out of a spare body and pale face. Having subscribed in spirit to a creed, he acknowledged a code of duty and a round of discipline, and refused to allow a single soul, however differently constituted, to swerve a hair's breadth from his rules. Master Ninian Wingate was such a man as is sure to become a great authority, because a crystal-clear, steel-cutting, unshaken guide; or else an equally great incubus over his bewildered fellow-creatures. Tam Dundas was the only lad in Lithgow grammar school who had any appreciation of the disinterested, indefatigable man, who was voluntarily attempting the reformation of the school—only demanding that it should be worked out from within and be conducted entirely according to his own principles.

"The cock is in earnest," pronounced Tam, in his seeming irreverence, "and kens something he can show us," he proceeded in his canny, practical Scotch fashion; but Tam and his teacher were not kindred spirits. They were utterly unlike in most respects, except in earnestness, and in that quenchless thirst for the water of classic fountains, struck from the rock by the mighty dead, and just then beginning to be unsealed after the barren drought of the dark ages; and for which all the nobler hearts of the generation seemed to pant. Tam and Master Wingate were not unfrequently in antagonism, as they were presently.

The master came and looked at Tam's lesson—a sum in arithmetic correctly worked out, but not done according to the rule.

"You have hit the mark, but no thanks to you for it," declared the teacher; "your success is little better than a chance guess; you ought to have gone according to the rules laid down for you."

"The answer is richt," Tam defended his product stoutly. "What does it matter though I have brocht it out in my ain way?"

"It matters this, sirrah, that there is a right way and a wrong way, and you have chosen to take the wrong, with the right plainly pointed out to you. Moreover, to abide by law is your duty."

Tam made no more audible protest, but he noted to himself emphatically—

"Then the law ought to be gey siccar, my man, and I ought to be satisfied of its siccar-ness, else what is to be said for the bursters of bonds and founders of kingdoms that we read o' in baith sacred and profane history? Hout, the like o' Wingate would hae William Wallace and King Dauvit himsell naething but twa law-breakers."

Soon afterwards the grammar school broke up for the day, but the pupils did not immediately disperse. There was an extensive playground round the rude "biggin" of the grammar school, more in accordance with the requirements of modern physical science, than anything of the kind which could be found in use in Scotland two centuries later. There were bow butts for archery, wrestling rings, a field for golf; and the lads, in place of being left to their own unorganized games, were systematically initiated into the exercises and sports, which were rightly judged necessary for the effectual training of the body in the offensive and defensive warfare of the battle of life. Master Nicol, who had been a skilful archer and famous golfer in his day, awoke up to something like animation in assuming the office of arbiter in the games, and in accepting the lagging tribute of respect to his experience and prowess.

What should a man of peace and learning have to do with mimic fighting? These were days when priests put on hauberks over their cassocks; and monks at times threw off their frocks, donned corslets, and went into battle with their vassals. Better this a thousand times than the effete uselessness, the base wallowing in the mire of the lower appetites, the horrible corruption, of which Davie Lyndesay had written with fearless plainness in plays and ballads. The plays and ballads had been condemned to be burnt by the common hangman the year after the king's favourite's death; but in his lifetime, they had been so acted and sung throughout Scotland, that even Tam Dundas with his ever-open eyes knew the substance of them. Honest priests like Master Wingate, still bent on thundering forth the infallibility of the Church and on crushing heresy, were forced to own, with sorrow and shame, that the very church during the last century had been a charnel-house, from which a resurrection of some sort was imperatively demanded.

Tam Dundas was a prominent figure on the exercise ground as on the school forms. He gave all his heart for the time to shooting, golfing, and wrestling; so that, with his growing strength and accurate observation, he was one of the fairest performers, and his feats acquired for him among his comrades a readier popularity than any diligence at his book—a distinction rather provocative of suspicion and spite. But Tam Dundas, even as a boy, was not of the soft or sensitive mould on whom disfavour among fellows acts as a blight and canker. He was hardy and self-assured, giving gibe for gibe when he provoked criticism.

At last he went off alone, whistling, and leaping over the obstacles in his way, not minding the bleak scouring March wind, nor seeking for company, though he would have taken it, if it had come to him. He was a lad to whom his own convictions and his own company could prove sufficient, though he was not of the stuff to despise sympathy and society when he might have them. The road he chose to the Port-House, however, was not the most direct road. He took a passing glance at the swaggering retainers in the court of the duke's mansion, had a passing word with the corders' and baxters' apprentices at the doors of their masters' shops, diverged down a narrow wynd to the loch, to visit a coot's nest which he had "fund," as it swung there among the reeds on the curling water, and which, though treasure-trove peculiarly his own by the whole constitution of boyish honour, he was careful not to disturb.

CHAPTER II.—THE PORT-HOUSE AND ITS PEOPLE.

At length Tam reached the steep outer stair and nail-studded door of his mother's house. Mounting briskly, he entered through the spence with its water-stoups, and passed into the ha', with its wide chimney, black corner-cupboards, oak settles, and single leather-covered arm-chair, occupied by his mother since his father's death, till it should in due time be occupied by Tam as head of the house. Tam found the early supper set out on the long table—stock fish for those who wanted it, scalded whey, porridge and ale, scones and bread and cheese. Mistress

Dundas and Giles were only waiting for Tam, to take their places at the upper end ; while below them sat the servants—a huge heavy ploughman, and a halfin' herd in hoddin grey, their broad bonnets doffed, with two buxom and vigorous lasses in red petticoats, smock sleeves and snoods, who worked more in the fields or among the kye and sheep, than in serving Mistress Dundas and Giles.

Mistress Dundas herself was a comely, busy, middle-aged woman, in her black gown and white curch. She was so kindly that her kindness gave a certain enlargement—above all where her children were concerned—to a nature more noted for caution than daring, and tempted to a little guile in its mingled shrewdness and simplicity.

And Mistress Dundas had seen a good deal in her day to make her wary. Living on the skirts of the court, having humble pretensions to sibness with gentle birth and breeding, all unlettered and homely as she was, she formed one of the links between class and class. She could remember when the two young and royal French kinswomen, queens in succession of James V., had come, the one after the other, with great feasting, diversions and masques, to Lithgow Palace, and when the sanguine and thoughtless of the nation had seen nothing but promise in the future of king and queen. Mistress Dundas had known all that was mortal of Magdalene of Lorraine, whose beauty and sweetness were the ecstatic flush of a dying girl, become dust and ashes within the year of her royal bridal. Mistress Dundas had heard faint rumours how Mary of Guise, with all her discretion, virtue, and good-will for Lithgow, was yet a weak woman in the hands of foreign kindred, so that neither discretion, virtue, nor good-will could avail her in preserving the confidence of the people over whom she was called to rule.

Mistress Dundas could recall when King James had brought the lawless moss-troopers to order, when he had begun to work the Scotch mines, when he was the glad and gallant promoter of national games. And she could recall still more vividly when his council was rebellious, his army mutinous, his lad-bairns dying—and when the battle of Solway Moss had been disgracefully lost, and the king, a broken staff in the prime of his manhood, had flung himself, in the perversity of a sick heart, from palace to palace, until hearing of his lass born at Lithgow, he said his sad say, turned his face to the wall, and died.

Mistress Dundas had attained to more significant and dangerous knowledge in the course of her fifty years' life than these purely public events. She had looked with half reverential, half horrified eyes, on some of those copies of Tyndale's New Testament in English, which merchant ships brought in secret bales among ships' cargoes to Scotland, and which, though the books were translations from Holy Scripture, Pope and council forbade to the unlearned, and inquisitors searched out and burned. As Mistress Dundas could not read, one might have thought that she was out of temptation ; but, if she could not read, she could listen, and had always had fascinated, inquisitive eyes for the very boards and clasps of that book, with regard to which men said that it was at once the well of life and of death, and a great example of the old tree of knowledge, of which to pluck and eat the fruit with unlicensed hands was to die.

Later, Mistress Dundas had become, perforce, acquainted with results which caused her to shudder at the bare recollection that she had gazed in secret among the disaffected gazers on Tyndale's New Testaments. Patrick Hamilton, evangelist, apostle, and martyr, had offered to Scotland the spectacle, unprecedented in his generation, of a man of birth and rank, not only entering the Church, but turning saint. He had stooped to teach the poor, comfort the stricken, and convert the sinner, bravely professing the doctrines stamped and banned as heresy, defying the consequences, and going gladly through his baptism of fire. And he was a Hamilton of Kinclaven, a Lithgow man by descent. It was at Lithgow that Patrick Hamilton preached his sermons to multitudes, taking hold of the people, and inspiring them by all manner of nobleness and gentleness, and by the old, winning words, so long unheard in Scotland, of free pardon through Christ's blood. Mistress Dundas had formed one in these multitudes, and had, like other "common people," heard the Master's faithful servant gladly. But when the powers whom she had been taught to reverence unquestioningly, suddenly seized the reformer, condemned his doctrine as damnable, and had him led out and burnt to death as a man tainted and accursed, and dangerous to the common welfare, then the sprouting grain of faith in Mistress Dundas was scorched and shrivelled almost out of existence. If brave, stern men, instructed, enlightened, and like-minded with Patrick Hamilton, though less matured than he was, recoiled from such a sentence, with its bitter execution, what wonder that a simple woman quailed utterly? Such questions, and their settlement, were not for her class or sex. Let powerful nobles, scholars, and priests raise them or lay them at will, Mistress Dundas would not meddle farther with matters which were out of her way and beyond her capacity. She would mind her own business, and impress upon her husband to mind his; rear her children, say her prayers;—there could be no harm in that, and surely some merciful ear of homely saint, or virgin mother, or blessed Saviour, would hear them. She would be regular in her attendance on the Church's ordinances, and in paying the Church her dues, as the vicar and priests enjoined, while she said as little as she could help saying, and thought as little as she could help thinking.

But though Mistress Dundas had suffered trials and losses, it was a unique proof of the enlargement which natural affection and kindness of temper produced in a timorous and crafty spirit, that in an age when knowledge was held to be pernicious by all, save a few gentlefolk and scholars, she had seen with secret delight that her son Tam was fond of his horn-book, and mastered its contents greedily, and was proud in the thought that she could pay for Tam's becoming a scholar in the grammar school of Lithgow. "What for no?" she would ask herself decidedly when an anxious doubt would intrude and wrinkle her matronly brow. "Gin I had kenned what would come of having him taught his letters, I micht have swithered; but since he has got them, and can sign his name like a gentleman and a writer in the big towns, he's sae brodent on lear, he would mak it out for himsell whether I helped him or no. He's sic a maisterfu' dour cheild for a widow's son is my Tam. Yet I'm an ungrateful quean not to be blythe, that as he's no a silly daw, neither is my fine laddie a diel. The laird o' Brieche side wished his son, who was keen on the sword exercise of the men-at-arms, were as keen of his book."

Mistress Dundas had even extended her complacency to allowing Giles, Tam's elder sister, to attain the rare acquirement then for a woman of a little reading and writing, which had been picked up from her brother. But as Mrs. Dundas made apology, "Puir Giles wasna, and was never like to be, as her married sisters" (for Mistress Dundas had elder daughters already established in houses of their own), "or as ither lasses."

And Giles, waiting there with her mother for Tam to come home, in order to sit down at the supper-table, in her riband snood and cloth kirtle, was indeed a painful contrast to the blooming young servant lasses in their worsted snoods and smock sleeves. Giles had a prematurely old and worn look, though in reality she was only a year Tam's senior. In place of being blooming and straight, she was sallow and shrunken and crooked—one of those invalids from their cradles who are not unfrequently destined to be either the torment or the comfort of their homes. Giles had been largely a torment, that had been borne with motherly patience and pity on Mistress Dundas's side, and on her brother's partly with disdain and a tendency to mockery, and partly with an instinct of manly long-suffering; for Tam's bark was from the first worst than his bite, and in his latent strength he had forbearance, half scornful though it might be, with weakness.

"I wonder at you, Giles," Tam had once, on a momentous day, condescended to remonstrate with his sister on one of her wantonly mischievous tricks—after the achievement of which she set everybody at defiance, and jeered at the discomfited household, all the time wearing so eldritch an expression on her sickly face, that the servants ventured to whisper that surely Giles Dundas was a changeling or bewitched. Then her mother hurried the girl away to strive to control and soothe her in private, while she checked peremptorily the baneful whispers that rose in her hearing.

"If to the unhappy bairn's natural misfortunes is to be added that hicht o' ill-luck o' being pinte'd at wi' the finger o' scorn, and set upon and exorcised, as they ca'd, by a pack o' prood, guzzlin', ill-living loons,—that I suld say the word,—wha nevertheless sall never lay a finger on my distressed bairn while I'm to the fore to keep them off,—heaven help the lass!"

"I wonder at you, Gilesy," lectured Tam, more to the purpose and with some unconscious relenting in his indignant voice, "that you can find nothing better to do than to ravel hasps, tell tales, and set the hoose by the lugs."

"And what suld I find to do, maister?" inquired Giles, with a desperate pain in her ironical demand; "busk my bonnie body to meet men's smiles, and bake and brew and spin, when the idlest cutty among the lasses can beat a feckless fule like me in sic troke, and lauch ower her shouter at me, though, gin mither-wit had a chance, I culd buy them at the ae end o' the town and sell them at the ither?"

"Weel, lad or lass needna beat you at a book," remarked Tam carelessly, not weighing his words.

Giles caught and pondered the deliverance. She crept cunningly to Tam's side when he came home of nights and on holiday afternoons, craving him to teach her from his own book—the original of all school collections. Tam, with that inclination to impart his treasure to others which distinguishes the scholar alone among treasure-holders, and only some even among scholars, complied with his sister's solicitation. The dissatisfied, restless girl, with an acute mind preying on itself, learned even more quickly than Tam had learned, and gave very little trouble to her teacher. Naturally, he grew proud of his pupil's progress, and found it no unpleasant task to play the patron and pedagogue.

Mistress Dundas had not the heart to interfere with the brother and sister's occupation. It served to divert Giles, and kept her from continuing to provoke the various members of the family; it gradually established an intimacy and friendship between brother and sister.

"Birds o' ae nest and maist eildens, they never took to ane another afore," reflected Mistress Dundas with tender forethought; "but now they're like trusty freres. An' gin I were taen awa' wha would Gilesy, that's as sharp as a needle, and is growing to stick as close to Tam as his shaddy, ha'e to look to but Tam? A seat at even a gude brother's ingle is a driech seat; but my Tam is as constant as he's fair, and will never see his silly sister want. Na, gin he get fond o' her, he will not suffer wife or bairn to gie her the cauld shouter."

This afternoon there was an unexplained secret of importance pursuing together Mistress Dundas's lips, and causing Giles's lips to fall asunder, though the house-mistress tried to behave as usual, and even to direct the conversation during supper into a common channel, by asking Tam—

"An' what hae you been thrang wi' the day, my man?"

"What suld I hae been thrang wi' but syntax and vocables, gin you ken them?" replied Tam, in general terms, succinctly, and with a little supercilious doubt of any woman's right to interfere with a man's—that is a boy's—studies.

"Were you ploughing the Langriggs the day, Jock?" Tam said, turning to examine the ploughman with more reason and interest, as Tam thought, in his question.

"Ay, Tam; and they were unco sappy," answered Jock, with a long-drawn breath between every word, and between the poisoning in the air and the disposing down the yawning cavern of his throat of his "saps" of porridge and milk, heaped and brimming over the edges of a horn spoon.

After the supper, when Tam was about to leave the table to go out with Jock and see to the ordering of the kye and of the yoke of horses for the night, or to sit with the herd boy "Hairy," constructing ingenious "springs" and "girns" for birds and vermin, Mistress Dundas told Tam she wished him to remain where he was, that she might speak a particular word to him. So the mother, son, and daughter still sat at the top of the board after the dishes had been cleared away, and the servants had retired to their out-of-door avocations, their essays in mechanics, and their wheels by the fire.

"Tam," announced Mistress Dundas, unable to contain her tidings longer, "the laird o' Brieichside has been here. His son is bund for France for perfyteness in sculin'. The laird wants a kened, douce lad, whose keep the laird will see to, to bear his lad company, and he has bidden you, Tam Dundas."

"Hooray! hooray!" shouted Tam, startling the maids and Hairy by the ingle nook, as he thundered with his fists on the table, his face all aglow. "Our leddy and the Laird be thanket," he added more soberly, a little affronted at his own outburst, "I see my way now to being as grand a scholar as is among them."

"Nae doubt it is a brow chance; but how am I to part wi' you, laddie?" asked his mother wistfully, and with a little accent of reproach, as she put her apron to her eyes, though she was reluctant to damp his joy.

"I'll come back again, mither," replied Tam, with a shade of compunction—in-capable as a boy like him was of fathoming the heart which was ready to be broken were it to promote his welfare. "I'll come back better worth you're carin' for; you'll a' be proud o' me when I'm a scholar," declared the lad with unconscious audacity and egotism.

"That will we, Tam," cried Giles, who had been unwontedly silent. I would that I had your fortune; but I'll forgie you for being a brisk lad, while I'm naething but a silly lass, gin you'll come back a great man, garring the lave stand about, and lifting up my mother and me from our howe when you stoop to us from your hicht. You may be a priest—wha kens? A lord abbot in purple, or a lord cardinal in scarlet."

"IN REFORMATION TIMES."

The girl clenched her thin nervous hands together, her sallow pinched face flushed and expanded in anticipation of the goals to be reached, and the honours to be won by the knowledge which was power.

"Na, na," negated her mother hastily, "let them be priests wha hae a vocation. I trow, Tam, a mettlesome lad like you has nae to a frock and cowl, to shrieving auld wives, and starting up at the sound o' the dead bell to claim the Kirk's cow and coat. Gin you dinna incline to the 'oo trade or the plough, and troth your fine education would be wasted at carding or grazing," she admitted with a sigh, "turn your attention to the law, that's a wise laddie. There's mony a canny, prosperous writer body in the big towns. It's no canny for a bauld, honest spirit to try priestcraft in thae times—Gude forgie me for lichtlying the ghaistly calling—aboon a' furrin priestcraft. I mind me o' Master Guillaume, who gaed a sair gate afore puir Master ——. Oh, laddie, laddie," she broke off, throwing up her hands in testimony against the mysterious horror she would wave off, "have nae troke wi' strange priests."

"Never fear," declared Tam confidently, "I dinna gang to France for wily priestcraft, but for plain knowledge. As you say, mither, I hae nae broo for wearing the monk's cowl on my head, let the monks and Davie Lyndesay answer to ane anither for what lies aneath. It is the wisdom o' the ancients and the truth o' the universe that I seek to reach. You're wrang, Gilesy, I'll no come back a pursy abbot or a dour cardinal. Let them that will try that road. I'll be a leal son o' the Kirk: gin she'll let me be, I'll let her be; but I'll no be a priest to pu' down or build up priestly biggins. This common world is enough for me to spell my short day in. But if I'm eydent, wha kens but I may win a gown and cap too, and bide, or come back a university regent like Mayor? An', Gilesy, I'll gie you my coot's nest on the loch, as arles till I come back."

"Laddie, the coots will be a' flown ere you win hame," foreboded his mother.

CHAPTER III.—AT MONTPELLIER, IN THE COLLEGE.

WITHIN ten years Tam Dundas was actually Dr. Thomas Dundas in the Moorish founded University of Montpellier. There was nothing very wonderful in the early dignity at a date when there were other scholars who were still sooner distinguished. Men grew apace then, and beardless boys looked manly and wise in the bachelor's red cloak, and the professor's chair.

Dundas, and the young laird of Briechside, had drifted to Montpellier, instead of to Paris or Louvain, from the circumstance that a distant kinswoman of the laird's, having married a soldier of fortune in France, and being, in a sort, naturalised there, and left a widow with one child, was glad to eke out a living by affording lodging in her house in Montpellier to those students of the university who, after the fashion of Scotch students, did not live in college, but beyond bounds in all quarters of the town. The young laird of Briechside had soon fulfilled his college course, and returned home to participate in the political troubles and brawls of Mary's reign. But Dundas still tarried in Montpellier, supporting himself as a poor scholar by filling the post of tutor to various young men of rank, and at last by entering the house of Dr. Ferrard, one of the professors, as assistant in his classes.

Few wider contrasts could be found than that between the natural features and climate of Montpellier in the soft South, and those of Lithgow in the bleak North. The chief town of Languedoc, rising on the ruins, and built largely of the materials, of magnificent old Roman amphitheatres, baths, and temples, lay in a garden almost unrivalled in Italy itself for rich blossoming over decay, for dreamy and inspiring associations, and a thousand picturesque touches and interludes alike in the landscape and in the life which had been lived within sight of Pyrenees and Alps, the Bouches de Rhone, the wild, haunted solitudes of the Cevennes. Possibly Dr. Thomas paid little heed to the details, hardly noticed consciously the rich pink bloom of the almond orchards in spring, the dense mantling of the fig-trees in the summer, the purpling clusters of the vines in autumn; and far less stooped to gather posies of the gem-like meadow flowers—bright blue lobellia, great white magnolia, golden and purple iris, according to the season. Very likely he heard, without once pausing to decipher the chords of melody, the early song of the nightingales. Though men were then eagerly resuming their researches into the secrets of nature, as into the wealth of classic literature, still it was only the students of nature pure and simple, the elected sons of science, who took up the study. Scholars like Dr. Thomas Dundas had neither time nor inclination to analyze nature, whether in its open beauties or its occult forces. As a whole, the young man admired warmly and affectionately — for France, in her university, had indeed been an alma mater to him—one of the loveliest landscapes which the world has to show; but he did not stop to examine it minutely, and pick it to pieces. He was accustomed to regard such practices as puerile and womanish—men had more to think of in his day. The sounding sea, at no great distance, the mountain peaks, so much higher than his own Grampians, the mass of a forest, the expanse of a plain, deserved to arrest a man's notice; but to stand noting every field, and examining every weed, was fit only for husbandmen, herbalists, and children. Dr. Thomas was better fitted to enter into the changing history of the place, from its Moorish to its Roman days, from its persecutions of the Albigenses to its tolerance of the awful mixture of Lucifer, Satyr, and human-hearted man in its Rabellais.

Dr. Thomas had kept his pledge to Giles in winning his doctor's degree, but it had been different with his word to his mother that he should abstain from theological disputes, which, so far from dying out in the ashes of the martyrs, were raging more fiercely than ever at Wittenberg, Worms, Geneva, Zürich, Amsterdam, in the Sorbonne among learned doctors—in the halls and castle, and on the bare sea braes of St. Andrews. Dr. Thomas was already a Lutheran, and on his way to being a Calvinist. There had been no choice to him save between a greater and a less apostasy. While the young man pursued his studies in philosophy and metaphysics, he could not shut out morals and theology. These formed the questions of his day; and, as his inexperienced boyhood had not guessed, they hemmed him in, priest or no priest, and summoned him to a decision. As he hated a lie, he could not continue his faith in the canons of the Church, its elaborate rites, and such living epistles of it as he could not choose but read in the words and deeds of many of its notable professors.

There was no refuge for Dundas, unless he had been so miserable as to find it in the dreary, gross, and mocking cynicism of the master of modern intellect; but the grace of God, and Dundas's wholesome Scotch balance of reverence, independence, and kindness, saved him from that pit.

It might very well be that Dundas would stop with being a protesting and believing scholar; nay, that in years to come, when he was more and more entangled in the subtleties and warfares of the schools, in splitting hairs, pointing epigrams, and flinging about taunting invectives and stinging satires, with a remnant of the savage joy, which the old Northmen used to feel when they wasted, burnt and slew their enemies, he might hold his faith more and more as a thorny, dead letter, and be content to serve learning, and not religion, continuing a scholar, and growing ever colder and harder, while he never rose to be a reformer.

But at present, in his young, ardent life, rough and vehement as he remained, his principles were rather active than passive. He was vexed to the heart by the supineness, the double-dealing, the altogether half-hearted Protestantism of his professor Ferrard—the more vexed that he was keenly conscious of his own want of grace and blandness, and had greatly admired the courtesy and affability of his professor.

In the college rooms which the professor and his assistant shared, and where they were waited upon by an old servant of the former, there were abundant marks of increasing civilisation and intellectual life. A great advance was made on the Port-House of Lithgow, for in the college of Montpellier there were tapestry hangings and cushioned seats, books and maps, even a porcelain vase among the silver tankards, while above the pinnacled chimney-piece hung a dark painting of a weighty-browed professor.

Dundas, in the freedom of intercourse permitted to him, did not hesitate to urge his senior to a more pronounced and declared expression of his opinions. Why attend mass, the popular explanation of which Dr. Ferrard held to be idolatrous,—that is, if he accepted a creed at all; for without a recognition of Godhead there need not be idolatry. Why maintain by his example the employment of sacramental tests in the university? Why decline to proclaim his convictions, leaving them to be only guessed, at the best—at the worst, misunderstood and maligned?

Dr. Ferrard, in his black velvet cap, with his doctor's bands fastened by a jewel, his physique displaying the sensitive olive skin, the glittering black eyes, the bird-like nose, of a true Languedocian, was amused and inclined to play with the hot-headed zeal of his subordinate.

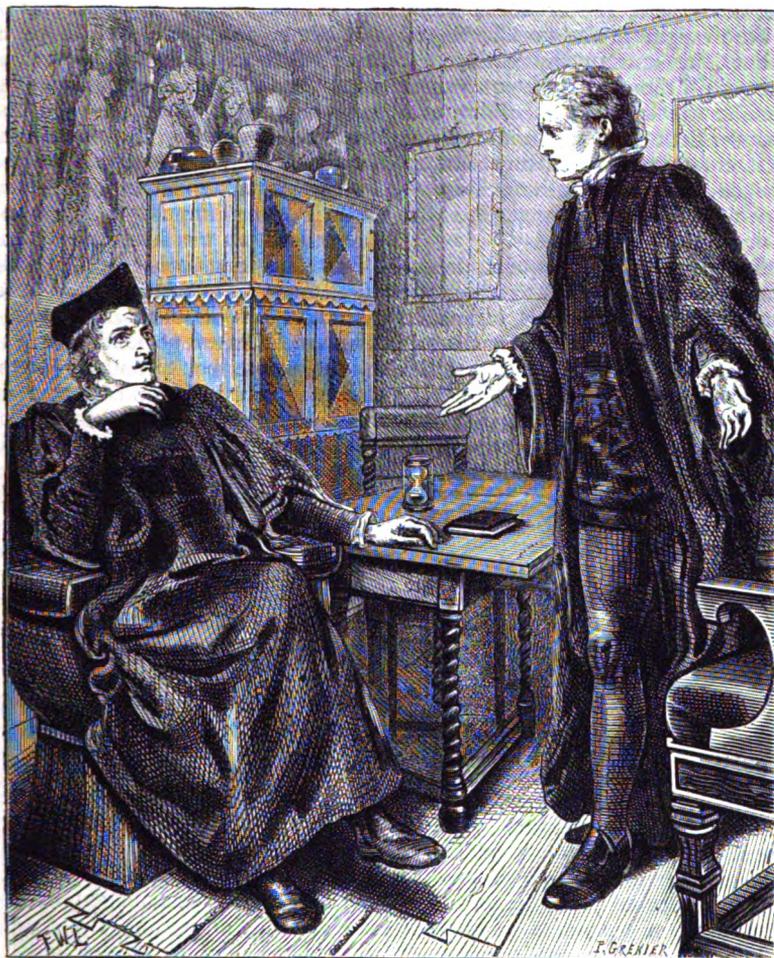

"Thou art young, thou art young, Dr. Thomas," he would say. "When thou art full grown thou wilt know how much may be argued on the side of expedient temporising. Is every principle so clear that I should risk my seat—nay, my neck—for it? To what purpose a loud profession which is bad tone in philosophy? It serves for recantations and burnings. Would I be a better man because I was driven to recant, or would the world gain by my burning?"

"Yes; for might it not be that truth would gain?" Dr. Thomas would put in.

"Truth would gain, sayest thou? Ah! but to some truth comes as a negative, not an affirmative; and from them she does not ask such a tremendous attestation. I am not a hero, I, any more than Michel de Montaigne, and he had the priests called in at the end to keep him right either way. Did not Socrates pour out a libation to the gods whom he had doubted, the last thing? I do not pretend to be wiser than Socrates, my son; it is not easy to tear up even the roots of a bastard tare-like superstition, and leave its lawful brother and sister of wheat-like faith free to grow in the human heart. When thou art as old as I, thou wilt take things quietly, and let them work by degrees of themselves, as it were, and as Heaven wills. Heaven does not want our miserable, blundering aid, according to the opinion of Erasmus."

"If my professor please, I should prefer to perish in my green nonage," protested

Dundas bitterly, "sooner than ripen to such trimming and time-serving policy. Was the Lord Christ not wiser than Socrates, and did He not set us the example of testifying to the death? Did He not leave a command with his followers to go and teach all nations—teach what?—corruptions, sophistries, juggling tricks, monstrous lies, or divine truth?"

"Thou art beyond me, Dr. Thomas." Dr. Ferrard dismissed the subject, still without passion or resentment, only a little wearily and querulously. "Notwithstanding, the experience of four-and-twenty does not compass all experience. If thou reservest thyself to die like Tyndale, or Wishart in thy own country, good go with thee! it is no business of mine to balk thy aim; yet bethink thee that thou art no more than a youth, and no better than my assistant, with all thy attainments, whose views and stubbornness in maintaining and suffering for these views will have little weight in the world. So an' it please thee, sir, restrain thy passion for being a martyr till thou canst be so to some purpose amidst the distractions of thy own country,—never Scot yet came under my rule who was not cross-grained and turbulent, so that the Languedocians were nothing to him,—and save me the trouble and danger of either defending or disowning thy heresy."

It was after one of these frequent discussions, stormy on Dundas's part, to which the easy manners, and untrammelled intimacies of the schools, together with the accessible character of Dr. Ferrard, had led, that Dr. Thomas thought to refresh himself by paying a visit to some old acquaintances in Montpellier. He did not particularly require refreshment. At no period of his life did strife come otherwise to him than as the wind blowing over the barren hills and moors of his country, rousing and bracing him for contest.

With his harsh, but sagacious and far from ignoble face aglow with the late encounter, as the town of Montpellier was aglow in sympathy with a gorgeous August sunset, Dundas took his way through steep streets and narrow lanes having the trottoir already deep in shadow, past tall lit-up gables, fantastic corbels and cavernous portals—presenting contrasts of positive blackness, and here and there a relic of massive Roman ruins still spared, and bound together over and above their cement by the long clinging arms of the wild gourd, while crowned by feathery grasses and dainty snapdragons. The old boyish exuberance of energy was not spent as Dr. Thomas Dundas strode along amidst a lively population. He caused his weather-beaten cloak to wave behind his long limbs and his walking rapier to clank in its scabbard, while he exchanged greetings with his fellow-passengers—students like himself, of every political and theological shade, whose books and swords were their sole stock in trade, and citizens in decorous cloth doublets, who in the time immemorial feud of town and gown, were disposed to look upon the unruly students, though kinsmen, lodgers, and customers, as also tyrants and persecutors.

THE FARMER OF BAAL-SHALISHA.

A Harvest Miracle.

2 KINGS iv. 42.

FAMINES were very frequent in Palestine in ancient times. The narrative, from which the subject of the present paper is taken, describes one that happened in the days of Elisha, and was long remembered by the people. For seven years it prevailed, and was the cause of deep and widespread misery. The changes of the seasons, as during the deluge, were obliterated, and a uniform monotonous drought burnt up the vegetation, and dried up the rivers and brooks. The sower no more went forth to sow; the reaper's song in the harvest-field was no longer heard; the pleasant noise of the grinding-mill in the village homes was stilled; all the glad sights and sounds of rural labour had ceased and were almost forgotten; and over all the country brooded a desolate gloom. The whole population was reduced to the greatest straits for want of food. The pious Shunammite, whose son was restored to life by Elisha, though in the most affluent circumstances, and possessing a lordly heritage near Jezreel, the most fertile part of the Holy Land, was obliged by the repeated failure of the crops, and the scarcity of provisions, to migrate to the territory of the Philistines, where the famine, owing to more favourable conditions, was less grievous. But the universal calamity pressed most heavily of all upon the schools of the prophets which had been established in different places throughout the land, and which were almost entirely dependent upon the contributions of the charitable for their support. It was felt with especial keenness by the college of Gilgal, situated in the midst of a fierce and lawless people, who had little or no sympathy with the mission of the prophets. To such a pitch of destitution were the pupils of Elisha at this place reduced, that their food consisted solely of any kind of edible wild herbs they chanced to find in the wilderness; and the whole party would have been poisoned on one occasion by one of the products of the waste had not the prophet interfered, and by supernatural means neutralised the deadly element, and converted the noxious pottage into a safe and palatable meal.

At the close of this terrible famine, when the covenant-bow was again appearing in the gathering clouds, and the promise of seed-time and harvest was again about to be realised, a farmer came one day from Baal-shalisha to Gilgal, with a present of the first-fruits of the harvest to Elisha. God had blessed his labours with a small degree of success. The earth, after long and utter barrenness, had yielded to him a scanty increase; and in the gratitude of his heart he hastened a long day's journey to the nearest school of the prophets to lay an offering of it before the Lord. This act showed that the man was a pious Israelite, a devout observer of the law; for under the law the first-fruits of the harvest were sacred to the Lord, and belonged to the ministers of the sanctuary. While almost all his countrymen had thrown off the Levitical yoke, and given their homage and their offerings to Baal or to the calves of Jeroboam, this man remained steadfast in his allegiance to the God of his fathers. The name of the place where he lived, Baal-shalisha, indicated that it was one of the seats of Baal-worship; and it can easily be imagined how painful would be the position of a worshipper of Jehovah in such a place. Day by day his whole nature would be shocked by the foul and foolish practices of idolatry. His friends and neighbours would resent the singularity of his faithfulness to the ancient worship, and would show in a hundred petty ways how much they disliked it. Probably it was not without considerable difficulty that he was able to carry out his purpose of dedicating the first-fruits of his harvest to the Lord. His intention would be known to the people of the place, and they would place every obstacle in the way of its execution. When we take all these circumstances into consideration, we must assign a high moral value to the act of the farmer of Baal-shalisha.

The fact that the sons of the prophets received a gift, which, according to the Levitical institution, belonged to the priests alone, indicated the changed relations of these two most important offices in Israel. The most lamentable thing about the national apostasy was, that those whose duty it was to have prevented it were themselves the ringleaders of it. The priests of Jehovah, almost to a man, had become the priests of the calf-worship of Jeroboam, or of the Baal-worship of Jezebel, and were more zealous in the foul practices of idolatry than they had been in the service of God. Owing to the separation of the kingdom of Israel from that of Judah, the inhabitants of the northern provinces were shut out from the city of Jerusalem, the local centre of their common faith. In this state of isolation, deprived of the ordinary means of grace, prevented from going up annually to the solemn temple festivals, the sacrifices and offerings of the Mosaic law speedily fell into desuetude. The Jewish ritual separated from its holy shrine, where alone it could be efficiently performed, and from its past glorious history, lost its hold upon the imaginations and the hearts of the people, and they were easily persuaded by their unscrupulous rulers to substitute the gross licentiousness of idolatry for the pure worship of Jehovah. In these sad circumstances God gave to those who remained faithful some compensation in the grand development of the prophetic schools, and the extraordinary energy of individual prophets. Elijah and Elisha, with their disciples, who had only the inward call, supplied the place of the priests who were regularly called according to the Aaronic succession. They kept the sense of the true religion alive in the hearts of the people, and were the centres of resistance against all the attempts of the royal family to establish the worship of Baal and Astarte. And as a reward for these noble and distinguished services, the God-fearing in the land, of whom the farmer of Baal-shalisha was the representative, tendered to the prophets the Levitical offerings, which they refused to those who had become the priests of the calves or of Baal.

The offering of the first-fruits of the harvest had a deep significance to the Israelites. Among all the nations of antiquity it was customary to dedicate a representative part of the produce of the fields to the tutelary god of agriculture. Offerings of wheat and corn were laid by the Greeks and Romans upon the altar of Ceres at the close of a prosperous harvest; while by the northern races the last sheaf cut in the field was dressed in the shape of a maiden with fantastic garments, and hung up in the guest-room of the house till the next harvest, as a symbol of homage to some unknown deity that presided over the growth of man's food. But all these offerings were mere nature gifts in acknowledgment of the god of nature. They were simply tokens of gratitude, and had no other religious significance. But besides being expressive of national and individual thankfulness for the bounty of Providence, the offering of the first-fruits of the harvest by the Israelites was linked with the holiness of God. It brought the whole harvest—all the objects and processes connected with it—within the sphere of religion, and invested them with a sacred character. It was all tabooed or made sacred; for if the first-fruits were holy the lump was also holy; if the first-fruits—which were the earliest and best part of the produce of the harvest—were presented to the Lord, the entire crop partook of the same consecrated character. Hence the offering of the first-fruits signified that all who reaped and enjoyed the harvest came under vow to employ its produce only in the service of God. The bread formed from it was to be man's support as the servant of Jehovah, living in obedience to God's law, and in devotion to His worship. None of the strength and health imparted by God's bread was to be employed in the service or worship of idols. It was because this grand principle was not recognised, and did not exercise a salutary influence upon the common life and labours of the Israelites, that the harvest so frequently failed in Palestine, and famines were so common and grievous. God would not give to His people the means of alienating them from Himself—would not strengthen, as it were, the hands of His enemies and rivals—would not allow His own good gifts to be perverted to the service of Baal and Astarte. By breaking their staff of bread He would punish His people for their idolatry, prove to them that their harvests were covenant blessings, bestowed only on condition of their obedience to His will; and thus lead them to repentance, bring them back to the service and worship of Him who giveth rain from heaven and fruitful seasons, filling men's mouths with food and their hearts with gladness.

To the priests the offering of the first-fruits of the harvest was especially significant. It was upon their faithfulness that the annual harvest itself depended. If they guided the people aright and kept them in the fear and love of God, then an abundant harvest rewarded the labours of the year, of which a liberal share would be given to themselves. But if they forsook God, and taught the people to neglect and despise the ordinances of grace, then drought or blight destroyed the labours of the field, and involved priests and people in one common ruin. Thus in a land where all nature was, so to speak, plastic to man's will, and gave or withheld its blessings according to man's moral condition, was obedient to the people who were obedient to God, and hostile to those who transgressed His laws, the principle of the first-fruits consecrated the whole nation, taught them that they would not enjoy the fruits of the earth—the common bounties of Providence—unless they put to their proper spiritual uses their powers of body and soul which were sustained by these natural means.

Our forefathers also gave, for the support of the ministers of religion in this country, the first-fruits of the harvest. Their payment is still made in corn, and depends upon the plentifulness or scarcity of the corn. The word stipend comes from a Latin word signifying a straw. It would be well if the religious principle upon which this wise arrangement rests were more generally recognised. Both ministers and people, owing to the artificial character of modern life, and its means of support, overlook the inseparable connection between the harvest and the covenant of grace. They forget that when the first-fruits are given to religion, as in the payment of its ministers, the whole produce is thereby sanctified, and should only be employed for good and gracious purposes, in carrying out God's great ends in the church and in the world. Our harvests, notwithstanding our vastly improved methods of agriculture, depend as much upon our religious character as a nation, as did the harvests of Israel in the primitive times of Elisha. There is no difference in the growth of the corn; its vital processes are always and everywhere the same. Science cannot guard us completely from the accidents and mishaps to which it is ever liable; or, indeed, greatly diminish the zone of uncertainties that must ever surround the growth of our daily bread. It is a most significant fact that both the production of our food and of our clothing should depend upon very small and insignificant-looking agencies. The staple manufacture of one of the greatest countries of the world, and the principal produce of another, depend upon the apparently accidental irregularity upon the surface of a hair—the twisting seen in the ultimate cotton fibre under the microscope, produced by its peculiar method of growth, by means of which it can unite with its fellows, and form with them a cord strong enough to be woven. So, too, with the food of the whole world. It is produced by the fertilising action of the slender hair-like filaments called stamens and pistils which hang out of the green ear at a certain season when the corn is in flower. Were these to fail in their work—were they to shrivel up or be blighted by unfavourable weather—and it would seem as if a fiercer ray of sunshine, a ruder breath of wind, or a heavier fall of rain than ordinary, might do this, the whole produce of the fields would fail; and all the swift ships and extensive warehouses, and complicated arrangements of trade, and institutions of society, which man's skill and power have thrown up as breakwaters against the tides of fortune, would be of no avail to stem the universal disaster. The life of man thus literally hangs upon a thread. Science, therefore, cannot make us independent. Science cannot be substituted for religion—for conscious dependence upon the great Being who twists the little cotton-fibre every summer that the looms of the nation may be kept busy, and that the shame and misery of our nakedness may not appear; and gives every year favourable weather, by which the ear of corn may hang out its tiny staminal thread, and complete its all-essential functions, so that the sower and the reaper may rejoice together with the joy of harvest.

God's bow is still suspended in the favouring heavens that bend over the growth of the corn. He connected His great world-covenant, that seed-time and harvest should never cease, with the righteousness of Noah; and year after year He still connects it with the righteousness of His people. As man approaches the season of harvest, he draws near to the limit of his free-will. He may devote his wondrous powers to evil and rebellion, but in his dependence upon his daily bread, and in the fact that the annual harvest suffices only for the annual food of the world, God retains His hold over him. He may harden his heart and shut his ear to every direct appeal from heaven; God may thunder His commandments in vain; but so long as man needs bread and can suffer from the want of it, God can reach him and make him understand the deadliness of sin. Every year in autumn we reach the limits of that accumulation of the necessities of life which the physical laws of the world permit. The world as a whole is poor. There can be no heaping up of true riches—of daily bread—by the richest nation. Poverty is the constant companion of the great majority of the human race; starvation is often within a day's march of countless thousands, and once a year is within a month of all, rich and poor alike. God has thus a bit in the mouth of man's rebelliousness by which he may be made submissive to the Divine will. Judgment is God's strange work, but He will assuredly have recourse to it if gentler methods should fail. He adopted this method frequently of old, when His people turned their backs upon Him. He broke the staff of bread, and proclaimed by the mouth of His prophet, "As the Lord God of Israel liveth, before whom I stand, there shall not be dew nor rain these years, but according to my word." Baal—the vaunted god of plenty, whom they worshipped, the apotheosis of nature, of its fertilising and productive power, to which the Phoenicians attributed their unrivalled accumulation of material riches—should for three years and a half be found unable to supply the wants of his votaries, powerless in the exercise of his most special attribute. And we have shown to us in the clearest and most outstanding light on the page of history that there is a most intimate relation between the beauty and fertility of a country and the goodness of its inhabitants. The first sin changed Eden into a wilderness; the first crime was avenged by the barrenness of the earth that drank a brother's blood. God said to Cain, "When thou tillest the ground, it shall not henceforth yield unto thee her strength." And sin, vice, and wrong, ever since, have made a waste in nature; and the thorns and thistles of the fields without have reflected the blighted desert within man's heart. The punishment of the first transgression is repeated upon every transgression. The relations between sin and that curse which makes the earth a wilderness are maintained as earnestly and inflexibly as at the first. Why is the brutal savage abjectly dependent upon the caprice of nature, and why does he find her such a cruel tyrant? Why are famines so frequent in heathen countries and so rare in Christian lands? Why is Palestine, once able to support millions, now unable to support thousands—the fruitful fields reduced to deserts, and populous cities to the lairs of wild beasts? Is it not because man has become alienated from the life of God by reason of wicked works, and has forfeited his right to the means and the blessings of life? While on the other hand, all things work together for good to them that love God. They are working in the line of His gracious purposes, and the fertility and fruitfulness of nature is the smile of God made visible to them.

The offering of first-fruits by the farmer of Baal-shalisha to the prophets of Gilgal, actuated as it was by such pious motives, and presented amid such difficult and trying circumstances, was well-fitted to be the basis of a signal display of divine power and goodness. What was a gift of piety and love would be made a blessing to many. What was a proof of faith would be made a miracle of power. It showed the power of God's grace in the man's heart; it would show the power of God's arm in the home of the prophets. The offering brought by the farmer consisted of twenty loaves of barley. The mention of barley is one of the illustrations that constantly occur of the surprising accuracy, down to the smallest details, of the Bible narrative. Barley is the cereal crop that ripens with the greatest rapidity; less than two months frequently intervening between the seed-time and the harvest. The consequence is, that in some countries they are able to procure two crops in one season. On this occasion, therefore, the barley crop would be the first to be ready after the long famine; from its hardier nature it would be able to overcome the unfavourable conditions which would prevent the other more tender crops from ripening. And though its coarser nature rendered the bread made from it less palatable on ordinary occasions, it would be highly prized at this time by all who could get it. The full ears of corn brought along with the barley would be considered a great luxury on account of their scarcity. The smallness of the offering of both kinds of grain shows how severe had been the famine, how difficult it was for even those who were best off to procure the commonest necessities of life. The supply was altogether inadequate for the large company who were in want of provisions. When we read of twenty loaves of barley, we immediately think of our own wheaten loaves; but the barley loaves were far smaller: indeed, it would require three of them to form a meal for a single person, so that altogether the twenty loaves would have been inadequate for seven persons. We do not wonder, therefore, that the servant of Elisha, who was, in all likelihood, Gehazi, scrupled about obeying the command of the prophet to set such an insignificant supply of food before so large a party of famishing men. It would seem like a cruel mockery. "What!" said he, in mingled tones of surprise and contempt, "should I set this before an hundred men!"

If Gehazi was indeed the servitor who said this, it is only what we should have expected from him. He acted in character. He was carnal, entirely under the dominion of sense, and could trust only what he could see and understand. Notwithstanding his familiarity with Elisha, he was a stranger to the prophet's true character, appreciated not his holiness, his spirituality, his power with God. And as he stood affected towards Elisha personally, so, doubtless, did he towards the high and holy work in which the prophet was engaged. He saw the miracles, but they neither solemnised nor awed him. To his mind they were but mere thaumaturgic displays, in which he delighted only as proofs to the multitude how great a master his was, and, by implication, how great a man his follower must be. Thus insensible to the glorious manifestations themselves as redemptive signs, and alive only to their effects upon others, we are not surprised at the incredulity which he displayed when asked to feed the multitude, and at his want of faith in the power of Elisha's God. And yet we must not altogether condemn him if we consider the unusual difficulties of the case. What he was required to do on this occasion would have proved a stumbling-block to most people. A similar test staggered the disciples of Jesus themselves. When Philip was asked to feed the five thousand in the wilderness of Capernaum with the five barley loaves and the two small fishes, he hesitated and looked altogether sceptical. "What are these among so many?" We should ourselves have laughed to scorn any prophet who commanded us to feed a hundred men with twenty barley loaves. We should have said, "What is the use of trying?" It is an absurdity—an impossibility on the very face of it! We should only expose ourselves to ridicule by our abortive attempt. Now it is in the overcoming of these difficulties and absurdities of sense that the power of faith is manifested. To the faith that obtains a victory over the unbelief and natural incredulity of the heart all things are possible. Faith, the miracle within that removes mountains of moral difficulty, rises to meet the miracle without that removes mountains of physical difficulty. And assuredly nothing can put implicit faith to a severer test than to promise effects as the result of causes in themselves wholly inadequate to produce them. Had God engaged to shower down bread from heaven to feed the prophets at Gilgal, as He sent manna to feed the Israelites in the wilderness, as the result of His own direct omnipotence, a simple reliance upon the truth and ability of Him that promised would have silenced every doubt.

The mind would repose at once, without question or dispute, upon the boundless resources of the Almighty. But when second causes and intermediate instruments were employed—when Gehazi was requested to feed the multitude with the barley loaves and ears of corn—then the weakness of sense came in. He would not believe that effects could be brought about by causes, which the dictates of his own understanding, and the established course of nature, pronounced utterly inadequate to produce them.

Elisha therefore reiterated his command; and in condescension to the weakness of his servant's faith, gave the reason and the assurance—"Give the people that they may eat. For thus saith the Lord, They shall eat and shall leave thereof." Yielding mechanically to the prophet's command, the servant set the limited provision before the company, and the hunger of all was satisfied. They left behind some basketsful of the fragments. The scanty produce of a seven years' famine became an abundant, yea, an overflowing feast. The provision grew with the use made of it. In giving the multitude to eat, the servant did actually give them to eat. And is it not so also with many a duty of the Christian and secular life to which we are called? It seems above our strength, our wisdom, our grace; we are afraid of it; and did we consult the timid suggestions of nature, we should never attempt it at all. And yet when we do actually proceed to discharge the formidable duty, we find that its seeming impossibilities have vanished. It becomes easy to us; we receive grace and strength to do it; and we ourselves are surprised at the result.

AMONG THE STRICKEN.

I.—CRIPPLE BOYS' HOME AND CRIPPLE NURSERY.

BY no means the darkest page, but one of the most painful, in King David's history is that which relates the injustice he did to a cripple; to one who, for many reasons, deserved very different treatment at his hands. Mephibosheth, to whom we refer, was the son of Jonathan. Misfortunes pursued him almost from his cradle to the grave. He was but five years of age when tidings of Gilboah's fatal battle reached the ears of his nurse. Faithful to her charge, and fearing that the Philistines would follow up their victory by exterminating every member of the royal house, she instantly caught up the boy, and fled; but unfortunately, with such hot hurry that—an example of the proverb, The more haste the less speed—she fell with him, or he fell from her arms, and in consequence was lamed for life.

This accident was the least part of his misfortunes. He suffered a greater fall: when Saul and Jonathan perished in battle, falling from the steps of a throne into a mean position; from being the heir of a crown, to be dependent on charity; to be maintained, sheltered, and concealed from public sight in a kind man's house on the other side of Jordan. There this royal cripple lived in such obscurity that David seems for twenty years to have been ignorant even of his existence. Some circumstance at length occurred to remind the King of what he should never have forgotten, the debt of gratitude he owed to Jonathan; and in consequence of this he was led to inquire whether any of his descendants still survived.

This issued in the discovery of Mephibosheth, and to an interview between him and David. At the sight of the child of Jonathan "the fountains of the great deep were opened:" tender recollections of other days rushed on David's memory: his heart glowed with kindness: and we can fancy, to use the beautiful language of Scripture, that he lifted up his voice and wept. It must have been a touching interview. How could it be otherwise? Scripture records few things more beautiful than the respect Jonathan's son showed and the gratitude he expressed to David; the confidence he reposed in the kindness of his father's friend; and his uncomplaining, gentle submission to the will of God. It touches one's heart to read how, on being introduced into the presence of the king—of one that, occupying the throne which should have been his own, had supplanted him, "he fell on his face, and did reverence;" such his humility and such his gratitude for the kindness David promised to show him for Jonathan, his father's sake, that he exclaimed, as he bowed himself to the ground, "What is thy servant that thou shouldest look upon such a dead dog as I am?"

These were no words of course, the mere exaggerations and hyperbolic language of Orientalism. His father's son in the depth and sincerity of his friendship, no man more tenderly sympathized with David, when Absalom sought his life. Though hindered by his infirmity and by the villainy of a servant from sharing, as he wished to do, in the king's flight and fortunes, during the whole time of that monstrous rebellion Mephibosheth neglected all care of his person, and showed every mark of excessive sorrow. Nor when David afterwards, lending a too credulous ear to the tongue of a mendacious and dishonest servant, had withdrawn the gifts he had bestowed on him, does this gentle and noble-minded man complain—far less resent the wrong. Where in the page of history shall we find a finer example of a generous and unselfish heart? His own wrongs and griefs are forgotten in gratitude for the king's happy return; an event he hails with such exuberant joy that he "takes joyfully the spoiling of his goods," and is content that his own rights and property should all be lost. "Yea," said he, speaking of the miscreant by whose misrepresentations he had been wickedly defrauded, "Yea, let him take all, forasmuch as my lord the king is come again in peace unto his own house!"

The injustice which David, we may say unwittingly, inflicted on the son of Jonathan is all the more to be regretted, when we recall the tender relationships that existed between David and his father. Had not Jonathan, to use his own tender and strong expression, loved David as his own soul? Had he not in defence of him encountered and braved a father's wrath? Had not their friendship been ratified by a solemn covenant—"Thou shalt not only while yet I live," said Jonathan, "show me the kindness of the Lord that I die not; but also, thou shalt not cut off thy kindness from my house for ever; no, not when the Lord hath cut off the enemies of David, every one from the face of the earth?" And had not the memory of this bond probably cheered the last hours of Jonathan, as he lay bleeding on the battle-field, and his last thoughts, like those of a soldier who falls on some distant shore, were turned to his home and the children that were to be cast orphans on the world? If there was a man on earth David was bound tenderly to foster, and at all hazards and sacrifices to protect, it was this cripple, the son of Jonathan—the only living representative and descendant of one, whose friendship for himself, unparalleled in story, is, next to the Saviour's love for us, the most touching thing in Scripture—altogether worthy of this impassioned outburst, this wail of a breaking heart, "I am distressed for thee, my brother Jonathan; very pleasant hast thou been unto me; thy love to me was wonderful, passing the love of women."

We are happy to think that it was to a large extent unwittingly, in ignorance of the true circumstances of the case, that David is chargeable with the injustice of withdrawing from Mephibosheth the family property he had restored to him. The excuse we offer for him may, perhaps, to some extent be pleaded for us—for the long years during which the cripples of our own country were neglected and uncared for. As Paul says in excuse of himself, we "did it ignorantly." Still we shall not have recalled in vain this story of Jonathan's son, if it awaken attention to the case of our own cripples; and teach us, in respect of the neglect with which these poor sufferers have been long, and are still, treated, to turn our reproaches from David on ourselves. Considering that the number of cripples in our country is not less than 100,000, it is certainly scandalous, that London is the only city with Homes for Cripples; nor more of these there than two, or at the most three. "But what are they among so many?"

To that which receives girls we have already introduced our readers; and we now proceed to introduce them—with a few observations, in the first place, on one opened for infants—to the Cripple Boys' Home.

The Infant Home, or Cripple Nursery, as it is called, is situated at 14, Old Quebec Street, Oxford Street, Hyde Park. This is its head-quarters. There, according to the report of 1871, 30 little cripple creatures were housed. Through Lady Gainsborough's kindness 6 more were kept at her Invalid Home, Copped Hall Green, Essex; and besides these, 12 more still, sent there for the benefit of the bracing air and sea-bathing, were in a branch of the institution they have at Margate. Altogether there were 56 infant cripples under the care of the committee. Both boys and girls are received into this establishment, which is properly a nursery subsidiary to the Homes for Boys and Girls. Sir Fowell Buxton and Mr. Hanbury form its gentleman's committee, and its secretary is Miss Shand, 53, Queen's Gardens, Hyde Park.

On going to hear the Bishop of Peterborough preach in Quebec Chapel on a Sunday, we arrived before the doors were opened and sought refuge from the inclemency of the weather in one of the houses of the neighbourhood. It happened to be the Cripples' Nursery. And what a collection of little sufferers was there, afflicted with all manner of deformities! One, more particular in his scrutiny than ourselves, found six of the children at dinner,—their table was only 2 feet in height,—and of these children three were possessed of only one leg each. Of the whole 33 little cripples then in the house 8 had but one leg, and 9 were bedridden.

These poor little creatures presented a very touching sight. As we have often observed in cases of spinal deformity, there were countenances there of much beauty and fine expression; and, though many had a delicate and pallid aspect, all looked happy. Good food, kind nursing, and religious influences had wrought as great a change on them as time had on their place; for where that blessed Home now stands stood some years ago the greatest curse of our towns and country—a publichouse, out of which drunkards reeled to stagger homeward, a terror to their children; and where pale, emaciated, ragged creatures were wont to resort with bottles for a supply of gin to cruel and brutal parents.

In this institution, which stands much in need of the liberality of kind-hearted men and women, the tiny cripples receive the best instruction. They are educated besides, so far as their abilities and years permit, in various departments of industry. But, as the committee say in their report, "it is their first wish to have these dear children taught that their heavenly Father, who has seen fit to afflict them so severely, that few can ever hope to be completely restored to health, has provided for them a better home above, where they may find rest and peace through the merits of their blessed Saviour."

We now request our readers to accompany us to the CRIPPLE BOYS' HOME.

This is the complement to the Cripple Girls' Home, to which indeed we may say this one owes its existence; it being felt that there was no less need for that being done for cripple boys which had been already done with such signal success for cripple girls. This institution, which has in the list of its committee the names of Lord Lawrence, Mr. Fuller Maitland, Dr. Stoughton, and many more well-known Christian philanthropists, and S. H. Bibby, Esq., 60, Green Street, Grosvenor Square, for its honorary and indefatigable secretary, stands in Wright's Lane, High Street, Kensington. The ground it stands on, like many a spot in London and its neighbourhood, is interesting for its associations with the great or good of by-gone days. Sir Isaac Newton lived close by this place, and the very ground it occupies was Sir Isaac's own property; and there is still standing there—the pride and ornament of its garden, and an object we regarded with feelings akin to veneration—a great old mulberry-tree, beneath whose umbrageous branches this devout Christian and greatest of philosophers had probably often reclined; working out in his mighty intellect those problems in science which have borne his name to the ends of the world, and earned for him and for his country the highest and most enduring fame.

This tree, interesting from its associations with a man as remarkable for his humility as for his piety, and for his piety as for his talents, one day offered an unexpected proof of the animal vigour and agility the poor cripples acquire through the good feeding and kindly treatment of this admirable institution. On a summer day, when the old mulberry was in full foliage, the superintendent was walking in the garden—as he supposed, all alone. He saw no one. There was no person, man or boy, within sight; yet, to his great surprise, he heard boys talking. Their merry voices seemed to be in the air; and for a while he was quite at fault. He could not imagine, or divine whence the sounds came. At length, however, he traced them to the mulberry-tree; and on drawing near it, what was his astonishment to see two of his boys perched up there like birds, and merry as they—one of these such a cripple that literally he had not a foot to stand on; both his feet and the lower part of his legs having been torn away by machinery.

Nor was this feat of athletics—not easy to explain, and still less easy to accomplish—without its parallel among boys who, to appearance, are as able to fly as to perform such exploits. Some short while before our visit they had been taken, as a reward for good behaviour, to see the wonders of the Crystal Palace. Some on crutches, some drawn in chairs, some stumping away on one wooden leg, and some on two, they all luxuriated in its beautiful gardens and galleries. But there were those these did not content. Fired by the ambition which carried Dr. Chalmers, on every occasion when he visited an English cathedral, to the top of its highest tower, strange to say, some of these cripples were bent on climbing to the loftiest summit of the Palace; and did it.

But perhaps the most remarkable proof of the effect produced by good food and mental cultivation on those who, in most instances, arrive at that Home dull, low-spirited, apathetic, feckless both in mind and in body, stood before us in a stone wall, to which our attention was directed. It was 10 feet in height, and armed atop with splinters of glass. Outside this wall lies a vacant piece of ground belonging to a railway, over which some of the cripples, as they surveyed it from their windows—for “stolen waters are sweet” to them as to others—felt a strong desire to disport. It offered them a wider field than their own garden for cricket, and the other games in which, cripples though they be, they delight to engage. So, watching their opportunity, at this wall, with its 10 feet of height and formidable chevaux de frise, they set, wooden legs and crutches carrying the day. Over they went, and were found, to the amazement of the officers of the institution, careering over this forbidden, and what to most boys would have proved inaccessible ground. People may naturally ask, How can cripples play cricket? Yet they have a cricket club; and it would amaze and delight any one to see how, dwarfed and maimed as they are, they stand by the wickets; and pursuing the ball—some by help of one crutch, some of two, this one hopping on a wooden leg, that other dragging a paralysed limb behind him—they dash here and there, as keen at play as the best-built boys of any English school.

As has been already hinted, the ample supply of nutritious food goes far to explain the animal energy and remarkable physical improvement of these cripples. It's the mou that maks the cou, is a Scotch proverb which applies as well to other animals, rational or irrational, as to cows. According to the quantity of oats he gets, so is the strength and spirit of the horse; and the key to what puzzles many, the vigour and energy with which, though lazy and nerveless at home, a Highlander brought to the low country, or an Irishman transported to England, handles the spade is this—instead of inferior oatmeal and waxy potatoes, and too little of both, with perhaps too much whiskey, he, acquiring in his new position the habits of his neighbours, fares daily now on a full supply of victuals, good for making red blood, bone, and muscle. At first we did wonder at the energy and spirit of these lads, at the marked improvement in their health, and the occasional restoration of power to their withered members, but our wonder ceased on entering the salle à manger and tasting the dinner they were about to sit down to. The soup would have satisfied an alderman. It was made of Australian preserved meat; and for the benefit of those not acquainted with its merits, we would recommend the use of this food, to a large extent, in hospitals, homes, ragged schools, and other such institutions. It is both highly nutritious and comparatively cheap. Need we add that we have no shares in any Australian Meat Company?

While on this subject we may venture to remark, that the children in some of the English benevolent institutions appear to be fed at a rate too costly; money being wasted in this way which might be employed in extending the benefits of the institution. Nor let us be deterred, by the fear of its being set down to Scotch prejudice, from recommending that once a day the children should have a diet of good oatmeal porridge with milk—not the meagre, tasteless, watery gruel that passes for porridge in England; but such as may be found in tables north the Border, and imparts to the Scotch peasant the physical power described by Burns in this graphic picture—

He'll make it whistle,
And legs, and arms, and heads he'll sneed
Like taps o' thristle.”

To say nothing of experience, Liebig, the great chemist, and greatest authority on such subjects, shows oatmeal to be almost as nutritious as the very best English beef; and that it contains a larger proportion than wheat bread of the elements that go to form bone and muscle. This was proved by a course of experiments carried on for a series of years by Forbes, an eminent philosopher and the discoverer of the Glacier Theory, at that time Professor of Natural Philosophy in the Edinburgh University, and afterwards Principal of the University of St. Andrews. For twenty years or so, he measured the breadth and height, and also tested the strength both of the arms and loins of his students; a very numerous class, consisting of different nationalities drawn to Edinburgh by his fame. These were the results—in respect of height, breadth of chest and shoulders, and strength both of the arms and loins, the bottom of the scale was occupied by Belgians; above them, and but a little higher, stood the French; very much above them, stood the English; while the top of the scale was occupied by the Scotch, and the Scoto-Irish, from Ulster, who, like the natives of Scotland, are fed in their early years with at least one meal a day of good milk and good porridge. Nations have their prejudices; but the rod which measured the height, and the tape that went round the chest of these students, and the machine whereby Forbes tested the power of arms and loins, had none. So one might be pardoned, when reading these results, for remembering the retort made to Dr. Johnson's sneer, when he defines oats in his dictionary as “food for horses in England and men in Scotland,” this, namely, And where will you find such horses as in England, or men as in Scotland? These remarks, for which we find high authority in Wellington's celebrated saying that battles are won by the Commissariat, no doubt, touch only material matters; but good food, comfortable clothing, and houses where the proprieties of life may be observed, are matters that affect too much the morale of a people to be overlooked by Christian philanthropists.

In the Cripple Boys' Home we found 40 inmates; most of them cripples indeed, and presenting a remarkable variety of deformities. One had legs, but had no use of them. Fixed to a low stool, when he is about to move out of his position, he takes his legs in his hands and crosses them so that they may be out of the way; then throwing his body forward, he keeps himself from falling—which he would otherwise do—by means of two short crutches, using these in fact as a horse does his fore-legs. It was curious to see with what speed he got over the ground, and still more so to be told that no boy there is more active, or enters with more spirit into many of their games. Perhaps the most remarkable malformation was presented by a boy, whose thighs were so misplaced that, instead of being in the same line with the trunk, they projected out at his sides; forming a right angle with them, and making his walking, such as it was, resemble that of a crab. Happily most of the boys are not very sensitive; but on the contrary occasionally make a joke or a nickname out of their peculiar deformities. This boy, however, was painfully sensible of his; though his mis-shapen form lodged, we may observe, a jewel which more than compensated for the uncouthness and unsightliness of the casket. Singularly thoughtful, and of deep though unostentatious piety, it pleased and interested us to be told that, when the others were engaged in play, he would often be found engaged in prayer, or reading the Word of God, in some retired corner of the building. A circumstance occurred in connection with this cripple which deserves to be mentioned, as reflecting great credit on the training of the boys and the moral tone of the institution. A lady who takes a deep interest in its affairs offered a prize to the best behaved and most beloved of the cripples. This was left to be settled by themselves; and that no undue influences might come into play, the election was to be by ballot. The box was opened; and the result of the scrutiny was as honourable to the electors as to the elected—almost every slip of paper being inscribed with this cripple's name.

As showing how successfully the kindest and best feelings of our nature are cultivated in these youths, another circumstance may be mentioned. They entered into a plot, a secret conspiracy, which—though, it is said, nothing is a secret that is known to three persons—they kept so close that their superintendent remained in profound ignorance of it till the train was ready to be fired. One day it exploded to his astonishment, but most of all to that of the parties most nearly concerned. A zealous City Missionary, in addition to his regular labours and without any reward from man, was in the habit of coming once a week to tell these boys of Jesus, and address them on the great concerns of their souls and of eternity. A lady and gentleman also went there every Sunday evening for the same purpose. Nor do they appear, to use the words of Scripture, to have “run their horses on a rock and ploughed there with oxen.” Unprompted by any one outside the institution and unknown to any official within it, these cripple boys met in secret conclave to consider whether, and how, they should express their gratitude to such kind and considerate friends. Poor as they seem, and dependent on others as they really are, they have a little money at their command. That happens thus. Purchasers of the articles manufactured there, interested in the institution and moved with pity for its inmates, occasionally give a little more than the price of the article they purchase. For the encouragement of the boys, the rule of the house is, that this surplus belongs to the cripple who made the article, whatever that may be. Suppose, for example, that a lady or gentleman charged with a payment of nine and sixpence is pleased to give half-a-sovereign, and seek no change, the sixpence does not go to the funds of the institution, but to the credit of the youth whose work has fallen into such kind and generous hands. These small gains are much valued by the cripples; yet all the more to their honour each offered this his little hoard to express his gratitude to these kind Christians. And thus the lady and gentleman were presented with a copy of “Keats's Poems,” the missionary with one of Bunyan's “Pilgrim's Progress.”

“Seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness,” our Lord's injunction, is of universal application; and with an eye to that, this institution seeks first of all to train up every boy in the fear of God and knowledge of the Saviour. Beyond that, its object is not to support these cripples, but to teach them to support themselves by the arts of honest and remunerative industry. Ten pounds a-year has to be paid for each boy by the person, or persons, through whose influence he is received into the institution; and three years is the usual time during which they are allowed to remain within its walls. There a great variety of work is carried on, suited to the different capacities of the inmates; as we saw, and as is set forth in a business-like style in their trade circular. Accustomed to associate trade circulars with large manufacturing and mercantile houses, it rather at first amused us, we must confess, to find such an ambitious document issued by an institution where the meagre and mis-shapen objects around us seemed physically incapable of any useful work whatever. But we changed our minds before we had gone half-way through the home, and seen evidence in the many beautiful, as well as useful fruits of their skill and labour, that whatever deformity there might be in the workers, there was none in the work. We may remark here, that in the issue of a trade circular, many other benevolent and industrial institutions would find it of advantage to “do likewise.” Such an advertisement is a good stroke of policy. It keeps the subject before a public, who are apt to forget old schemes in the multitude of new ones; and it contributes materially to that important end which the directors of the Home set forth in the words that form the heading of their circular—these, namely, “The committee of the Home beg to request the attention of their friends to the following list of charges for articles manufactured and work done there by the cripple boys. They would urge upon their friends and the public the importance of keeping the boys well employed by orders given to the respective departments, as by this means they are instructed and encouraged to aid in their own maintenance."

To give our readers some idea of what may be made of poor and, as many would say, useless cripples, to what a happy and good account their life may be turned by such institutions as this, here is a brief account, drawn from their trade circular, of the articles they make, and of their various prices. These are set forth under different departments as follows:—I. Stamping department—crests, monograms, addresses, &c., stamped and illuminated in gold, silver, and colours. II. Dye-sinking and engraving. III. Stationery. IV. Tailor's department—the articles of clothing ranging in prices from 6s. up to £4 4s. V. Carpentry department, presenting a large variety of objects, from knife-boxes at 2s. to French-polished wardrobes, valued at £7 10s. It is in short quite wonderful to see the work done by these cripples; and when, from the scene of activity which the different departments present, and where boys are seen learning trades by which, on their leaving this Home, they will become benefits, instead of burdens to society, we turn to the books of the institution, it is very satisfactory to find at how small a cost to the funds of the Home this valuable education is obtained. The value of the work done for the house itself, and the produce of the sales, are together nearly equal to the whole expenditure. This our readers can see for themselves in the following table:—

How cheap is charity, some one has said. So it is when well and wisely applied; as the Scotch version of the psalm has it:—

"Blessed is he that wisely doth
The poor man's case consider."

And this institution, among many competing claims, presents such an illustration of that adage as may well recommend it to the generous support of a humane and Christian public. Here, in the space of three years, and at an annual expense of £23 for each, forty boys, who would otherwise have passed a miserable and dependent life—a burden to others, and in many instances their life a burden to themselves—are housed, are clothed, are fed, are instructed in the ordinary branches of knowledge, and while taught the way to a better world, are trained to earn their honest bread in this. So far as, strictly speaking, their industrial education is concerned, the expense, as appears by the above table, is quite trifling. At the small cost of 10s. annually, for a term of three years, the poor cripple, though he has not perhaps a foot to stand on, is, so to speak, set on his feet, and raised into a happy and useful member of society.

With its 100,000 cripples—man, woman, and child—why are there not many such institutions throughout the country, where the parochial authorities might send every cripple, young enough, and not so deformed as to be incapable of learning a trade? This were both economy and mercy. Our religion, if nothing else, forbids us following the Red Indian's practice—knocking deformed infants on the head. These cripples, if not taught to support themselves, must be supported. Teach them to earn their own bread, and the public would be relieved of heavy charges that now only end with their life; and, better still, many an unhappy object would be relieved of that sense of dependence and all those other evils that crush his spirit, and sour his temper, and cast a dark shadow over his whole existence. "We then that are strong," says the Apostle, "ought to bear the infirmities of the weak, and not to please ourselves"—words that in their most literal sense may be regarded as giving a divine sanction to such institutions as form the subject of this and a preceding article. Give him fair play, pity, nor "persecute him whom God has smitten;" stand humbly before him, as beholding in his deformity a picture of those hearts of ours which sin has still more deformed; be just to him as to one who suffers for no fault of his own, and holds in that rude and uncouth casket a soul of infinite value, of immortal essence, purchased by the blood of Jesus, and destined to survive the stroke that turns the proudest beauty and fairest form into a heap of dust; and what may the despised cripple not become?

Cripples are found in the roll of the greatest or best men the world has seen. Æsop was deformed; so in a way was Socrates; so was Philip of Macedon, father of Alexander the Great, and himself the greater of the two; so was François-Henri de Montmorency, one of the greatest generals of his ages—historians telling us that his stature was diminutive, his features harsh, and his person deformed; so was Byron; so was Walter Scott; and so was probably a greater and better man than any of them, the great Apostle of the Gentiles.

It will gratify our Christian readers to know that the religious interests of these poor cripples are assiduously and devoutly cared for. In all these homes they are taught that salvation, through the blood of a crucified Redeemer and the work of the Holy Spirit, is the one thing needful. Nor have they been taught this in vain. Not a few who, but for these Homes, had been left to grovel through life in a condition of hardship, misery, and neglect, degrading alike to body and soul, have found their "walls salvation and their gates peace." They have entered them to find Jesus there; and some, praising God with dying lips, have already left them for that better home, of which one, when she had taken a parting look of her poor, distorted, emaciated body, said, as she raised her eyes to heaven, "THERE ARE NO CRIPPLES THERE!"

THOMAS GUTHRIE.

ECHO.

I WANDER'D through the forest's gloom,

When Autumn winds were drear,
The glories of its summer-bloom
Lay round me dank and sear:
And oh is this man's fate, I cried,
From all that's bright to sever?
And a far-distant voice replied,
And answer'd—Ever!—ever!

I stood upon the sounding shore,
Beneath me in the bay,
To ride the booming waves no more,
A hopeless shipwreck lay:
And oh are these the ends, I cried,
Of hope and high endeavour?
And a far-distant voice replied,
And answer'd—Ever!—ever!

I sought the woods again, when Spring

Called forth my love and me,
And I was glad, and everything
Was glad as glad could be:
And oh can Love e'er fail, I cried,
Life's load to lighten ever?
And a far-distant voice replied,
And answer'd—Never!—never!

We wander'd by the glassy tide,
Our happy hearts at ease,
A gallant ship in all its pride
Swept past us in the breeze:
And oh shall man despair, I cried,
Shall sorrow sadden ever?
And a far-distant voice replied,
While some one whisper'd by my side,
And answer'd—Never!—never!

JOHN MONSELL.

OUR DISTRICT.

By A RIVER-SIDE VISITOR.

INTRODUCTORY.

FRIENDS of ours of a theorizing turn of mind sometimes ask us why waterside districts—meaning the below-bridge waterside districts of the Thames—should be what they are—should be so rough and dirty, and of such evil repute. The questioners fancy that with a tithé of our practical experience we ought to be able to account for the characteristics of such districts upon some grand general principle. But to our thinking, the characteristics of such districts are to be accounted for on simple grounds. All sorts of noisy and noisome trades are carried on along the river-banks, and this and the knowledge that large numbers of the rough labourers engaged in such works must reside in the neighbourhood, make a waterside district a very undesirable place of residence. Being a waterside district, it "lies handy" for the "chance" labourers and lumpers who hang about docks and wharves on the chance of picking up a day's, or it may be an hour's, work; and who, living from hand to mouth, are constantly hovering between the pauper and criminal classes, and but too frequently being engulfed in one or other of them. Then, as sailors and other sea-going folks frequent it, the crimps, and hosts of other harpies, who prey upon "poor Jack," take up their abodes in it, and publichouses, it is scarcely necessary to add, abound in it.

These, speaking broadly, are the class of inhabitants who go to make up the population of a waterside district. They are "a rough lot," and no small percentage of them would come under the head of having no visible means of support. The quarter they inhabit is avoided by others, and ranks as "queer" and dangerous. Yet there are characters among waterside inhabitants, that are well worthy of being known. Our own especial district, representative in most other respects, is representative in this respect also.

I.—CAPTAIN RUST.

At the time we made his acquaintance, "Captain Rust" was a 'long-shore ranger, and as such was much better known than respected—not without good cause. We first heard of him in connection with the unlawful disappearance of some chickens. We happened one morning to be passing a row of cottages, the back-yards of which went down to the river-bank; and, seeing a crowd round the door of one of them, we asked a person who had come from the spot what was the cause of the commotion.

"Well, it ain't anything very dreadful," answered the man; "it's Jim Burgess a-swearing vengeance agen everybody, because some one has been and collar'd a couple of his chickens. He thinks it's some of the neighbours, and he's a letten' out strong in hopes as the party may get raw, and put their head in the cap."

We knew Burgess in a general way, and observed:—

"We should hardly have thought any one in the Row would have been so unneighbourly as to rob him."

"Well, for my part, I don't think any of 'em has," said the man; "but if they have, there's nothing he can say as is too hard for 'em—he's a quiet cove, and one as wouldn't touch so much as a pin-head that wasn't his own."

Coming up to Burgess's house, we heard him fiercely exclaiming—

"If I on'y know'd for certain who it was, I'd twist their necks for 'em, as I suppose they've atwisted the chickens; I would as sure as my name's what it is; which I've lived hereabout all my life, and in this 'ere very house 'goin' on of twelve years, and I'm well bekknown, and my character will bear looking into. If they'd been common barn-door birds, I wouldn't have cared; but they weren't, they were fancy 'un's as I bred myself: and now to think as they've been took for the pot, as of course they 'ave been—it makes my blood boil, it do, to think of it; if I could on'y lay hands on them as done it, wouldn't I be level with them, that's all!"

For a moment he paused to recover breath, and then, striking his fist on the door jamb, he concluded:—

"Look here! I'm a poor fellow, and the loss of two such chickens as them has made me a good five shillings poorer; but blest if I won't give another five to any one as 'll tell me who done it—not to law 'em, or anything of that sort; on'y to have the satisfaction of taking it out of their thieven' hides."

At this point a woman, who, to judge from the basket over her arm, and the house doorway carried loosely in her hand, had been out marketing, came along the Row, and on reaching the verge of the crowd asked—

"What's up?"

"Some one has stole two of Jim's best chickens," answered a dozen voices.

"Ah, I shouldn't wonder," she said coolly; "I was expecting to hear of something bein' a missing—I saw Captain Rust prowling about outside the back-doors when I was a getting up this morning, and I thought to myself at the time, 'Well, some one will suffer for it.'"

On hearing this there was a general exclamation of "O-o-o!" uttered in a tone that made it mean that there was no further occasion to ask to whom the disappearance of the fowls was attributable. This also seemed to be Burgess's opinion, for, looking greatly disconcerted, and muttering something about giving Mr. Rust a dustin' the first time he dropped on him, he hastily retreated indoors, and the crowd dispersed.

One of them was a shrewd, good-humoured tinker, with whom we had a nodding acquaintance, and following him up, we asked:—

"Who is Captain Rust?"

"What, don't you know Rust!" he exclaimed, in astonishment. "But, there, of course you don't," he went on, smiling, "or you wouldn't have asked, on'y I'd have thought as how no one could have been about here, if it was on'y for a week, without hearing about the gallant Rust."

"Well, but who is he?" we asked again.

"Well, as to who he is," answered the tinker sententiously, "I can't tell'ee; as likely as not he couldn't tell'ee himself. As to what he is, why he ain't anything in particular; he's on the loose. You see he's the sort of gentleman for fowls to roost high from, and he ain't partic'lar to trifles in other ways. All the same, he's not what you may call an altogether bad sort of warment. At least not yet, though I suppose he will be all in good time, or as I should say, all in bad time. The law is sure to have him sooner or later; and, when he's been jailed two or three times, or done a turn of penal, he'll come out a finished blade and a keen 'un. When Rust has once got the jail polish, it'll be 'ware hawk' between him and them as has got anything to lose."

"But why do they call him Captain Rust?" we persisted, as our discursive acquaintance came to a pause.

"Why, because he's a ruster. Leastwise, he sets up as rusting bein' his reg'lar game, and I suppose it is to a certain extent; but he ain't partic'lar in sticking to one line;—bits of sails, or rope, timber, or any such live stock as pigeons, fowls, or rabbits, anything in fact as aint too hot, or too heavy, or too well watched—it's all the sâme to him, all's fish that comes to his net."

"Still you haven't told us what rusting is," we said.

"Beg yer pardon, no more I ain't," answered the tinker good humouredly; "well, it is pickin' up old iron 'long shore—they call it rust, because it mostly is rusty, I suppose."

"But the river is not generally supposed to wash iron to bank," we said, smiling.

"Well, no," retorted our companion, smiling in turn, "but there are shipbuildin' yards and engine factories, and places of that kind on the banks, and there is generally a bit of rust to be picked up. The captain's reg'lar 'lurk' is among the yards down the river, and bein' pretty well known, and—though you mightn't have thought it—pretty well liked, by the men in the yards, he often gets extra bits of old iron chucked out to him."

"And he turns the rust into money," we said.

"Yes, in course he sells it, and his other pickin's, every evening."

We had now reached the point where our roads separated, and, my curiosity having been satisfied, the tinker and I parted.

For some months after this, it was not our hap either to come into contact with Captain Rust, or to hear anything further of him. We had almost forgotten that there was such a person, when his name again cropped up in connection with a matter in which we were personally interested.

We had been assisting to establish a Ragged School in a part of our district standing sorely in need of such an institution, and just as the school was about to be opened, we, in common with our fellow-workers, were portentously informed by some of the inhabitants who had taken a friendly interest in our labours, that we might look out for squalls; that the redoubtable Captain Rust had taken up his parable against the school, and avowed his intention of "making it hot" for all concerned in the affair.

Whether or not Captain Rust was at the bottom of it, certain it is that the night school on its opening had an evil time of it. Bands of young roughs besieged it. The younger scholars were pelted and hooted at as they went in and out. A constant whooping and howling was kept up, the doors were battered till at times they seemed about to give way, and occasionally windows were broken. At such times as we could get a policeman actually upon the spot, there was a lull in the storm; but as an officer could not be told off every night for that especial duty, the teachers had to depend chiefly upon their own efforts, which were of but little avail against the perseverance and adroitness of the assailants. One night when we were taking a class the annoyance had been particularly great; and, on the close of the school, we were leaving in anything but an amiable frame of mind, when one of the pupils who had left a few minutes previously, came running up to us breathlessly exclaiming—

"They've got him, sir, they've catch'd him, old Ben Tyler has,—and ain't he just a servin' on him out, sir, that's all!"

As he spoke he pointed to a group a little way down the street, and walking up to it we found in the midst a boy tied up to the wall by the thumbs in such a manner that the tips of his toes barely touched the ground; while, standing beside him, flourishing a stout rope's-end was Ben Tyler, an old navy pensioner, who added to his scanty pension by fish-hawking.

"Punishment parade, you see, yer honour," said Ben, touching his hat, as we came up and evidently expecting our approval.

"He's got to have ten minutes more of this, and I've give him a round and sound dozen with Timothy Tickle-Toby here"—he went on brandishing the rope's-end as he spoke—"and though—as is only fair to say—he's game to the backbone, and wouldn't give mouth, I'll pound it that every stroke went home, and won't want no rubbin' in. If he ever comes here agen after this, he must have a strong stomach, though it shan't be stronger than my arm; I'll double the dose every time I ketch him, and I'll warrant to tire him of being licked, before I tire of licking of him. I'll make him remember coming clouting of orderly children, and a disturbing schools as his betters has started."

The culprit was a boy of apparently nine or ten years of age. We had often seen him about the streets and about the river-bank, and, without knowing who he was, or ever having spoken to him, we had come to entertain a liking for him. He was a thorough "city arab," and the leader of a band of street boys who were generally engaged in mischief; and sometimes perhaps in something worse. Still, to our eyes there had seemed a something lovable about him. He was a well-grown, fine-limbed boy, with a jaunty, rollicking gait that spoke him full of spirits. He had a fair, chubby, smiling face, bright blue eyes, and crisply curling brown hair; and, well washed and dressed, would have been pronounced a handsome boy anywhere.

Though he now kept his teeth firmly clenched, and tried to appear carelessly defiant, it was evident that he suffered severely. Seeing this we said to old Tyler—

"Well, perhaps, it's only from thoughtlessness that he has annoyed us, and, at any rate, he has been sufficiently punished, and you had better let him down now."

"Beggin' pardon, yer honour, I don't think I had," answered Tyler; "it's not often you can catch a customer of his stamp, and when you do you should stick to 'em. I've been arter him for some time, but he has always managed to run the blockade up till now. To-night, howm-sum-ever, I captur'd him fair, and me and some of them round as have boys at the school court-martialed him, and the sentence was a dozen with the rope and a quarter of an hour's stringing up. The dozen he has had," he concluded, pulling out a large old-fashioned watch as he spoke, "but there's eight minutes of the time to run."

"Oh, but you must let us beg him off that," we said; "he will promise us not to disturb the school again, I know—won't you now?"

We paused for an answer, but he would make none, and Tyler exclaimed,—

"There, you see the sort he is! Let him go, eh? Give him another dozen more like."

"Well, it seems he is a stubborn boy," we said; "still we cannot stand by and see him tormented;" and without further parley we cut the string. We had laid hold of his collar intending to administer a few words of admonition ere letting him go; but before we could speak he had deftly twisted himself loose and dashed away.

"You'd a better let him had the dose out, sir," said Tyler, somewhat sulkily; "I wouldn't go to be cruel to any youngster, but with such as Captain Rust you must be hard if you mean to do any good with 'em."

"Captain Rust!" we exclaimed, "do you mean to say that was Captain Rust?"

"Why, yes," said the pensioner; "who did you think it was? There ain't another Captain Rust, I expects; or, if there is, that 'un's the original character; and a beauty he is, without paint."

We didn't know exactly why, we said, but we had been under the impression that the notorious captain was at least a young man.

"Well, anybody as only heer'd of his precious performances might easily think that," said Tyler; "there ain't many young men as would come up to him, for a more owdacious young willain was never born to be hanged."

"Oh! come, Ben, we mustn't be too hard on him," put in a costermonger, who, as we afterwards understood, had been one of the court martial, "he ain't had much chance of being anythink but what he is; he's had to scratch for himself since ever he could walk almost, and a pretty hard scratch he's had of it, for all as plucky and sharp as he is. When you come to think of what a job thousands of us men have to knock out a bare livin' for ourselves, you may guess how hard it is for a child, with, as you may say, not a soul to care for him, and all the world agen him."

There was a murmur of "Hear, hear," and then the "coster" resumed—

"I don't say but what he's a bad young rip, and a going on in a way as is sure to bring him into trouble in the long-run; but, at the same time, if he has his bad points he has his good 'uns too. Badly off as he is, there's others like him, but as hasn't his pluck in 'em, as is wuss off still; and I know as a fact that he always shares his crust with them even at times when all of it wouldn't be enough for hisself. And a chap of his years as'll do that," he concluded, laying his hand on the pensioner's shoulder, "isn't altogether a bad 'un; is he now, Ben?"

"Well, no," answered Ben, whose passing ill-humour had by this time vanished, "I quite believe the young rapsallion is a good-hearted 'un at bottom; all the same, you know, he did lead the attack agen the school, and deserved a bit of correction, and a rope's-end breaks no bones. What I give him will do him no harm."

Ben spoke at us, and we answered, that we hoped the correction would do the captain good—sufficient good to keep him away from the school. To this we added an apology for having interfered to prevent the full carrying out of the sentence of the court martial; and, then, bidding good night to the members of the court and the spectators generally, we went on our way. The feeling of astonishment we had experienced on discovering that Captain Rust was so young a boy was still uppermost in our mind.

The following morning we were going along a street from which side streets branched on either side, when we became conscious that we were being dogged. We could hear a pattering of bare feet behind us; but whenever there was any indication of stopping or turning on our part, we could tell by the sound that the person following us rushed down the nearest side street. At length, feeling more irritated than alarmed, we determined to ascertain by whom we were being followed; and, striding hastily back to the top of a narrow street, whom should we behold but Captain Rust, trying to so flatten himself into a doorway as to be screened from sight. He now darted out, but, having retreated well out of reach, he came to a standstill as if undecided what to do. Presently he began to come cautiously forward, and, on getting within earshot, opened parley:—

"May I speak to you, guv—sir?" he called out stammeringly.

"Of course he could," we answered.

"And you won't go a collarin' of me, or a giving me into charge for making a row at the school?"

"No, we would do nothing against him for what was past," we answered.

"Honour bright?" he questioned dubiously.

"Honour bright," we answered, and then he came confidently up to us.

"And now what do you want to say?" we asked.

"Well, you see," he began slowly and with a rather puzzled air, "it ain't esackly as I've got anythink to tell you like; on'y I see you goen along, and I thinks to myself, I ought to say 'Thank you,' to him, and I was a comin' right up, when I thinks as well, perhaps he'll lumber me, and that was what put me folloren you up in sich an in-and-out style—so thank you, sir."

"You mean for cutting you loose last night?" we said.

"Yes, sir," he answered. "I wouldn't knuckle down to old Ben and that lot; but it did hurt me orfle, and wasn't I glad to get away! and I'll never get on with any games at the school again,—I wouldn't be such a bad 'un as that 'ud come to, arter you cutting of me down; and if any of the rest on 'em gets a molestin' of you it'll be them and me for it."

"We should like you to come to school as a scholar," we said, "only in the evening; now, will you come?"

He paused in evident embarrassment, but at length he said:—

"I can't, sir; I scrats for myself, and I'm on lays as takes me pretty well all my time."

We felt drawn towards the sturdy little fellow, and, seeing some of his arab companions approaching, and desiring to have a little quiet talk with him, we asked:—

"Have you had any breakfast this morning?"

"No," he answered, in a tone of indifference.

"Well, will you come and have some with us?"

"Where?" he asked, with quick suspicion.

"Oh, only round at B—s," we said, naming a coffee-house, just outside a neighbouring shipyard's gates.

"But I didn't speak to you to get you to stand anything," said the captain sturdily.

"Of course not," we said; no such idea had ever entered our mind, we just wanted him to come and have a cup of coffee, because it would be easier to talk over that than standing there in the street.

His mind set at ease upon this point, the captain accompanied us with cheerful alacrity, and a few minutes later was seated at a breakfast, which, though plain, we took care was substantial and plentiful. Sipping at a cup of coffee, and appearing to be absorbingly interested in a week-old paper, we let the captain finish his meal without interrupting him by talk, or embarrassing him by any notice; and a very hearty meal he made.

He was the first to break silence. Twitching us by the sleeve, he whispered—

"Does yer have to pay for the lot?"

A glance at the table showed us the captain's drift, and we briefly answered—

"Yes."

"Well, that 'un," he whispered, indicating a slice of bread and butter still left upon the plate, "is one too many for me now—can I plant it?"

We nodded assent, and the next instant he had stowed it away in the pocket of his ragged jacket, and then with a sigh of pleasure he exclaimed—

"Wouldn't it be jolly to have a blow-out like this every day! But there," he added in a slightly disappointed tone, "you does have as much as you likes every day."

"And don't you?" we asked by way of drawing him out.

"Why, no!" he said, "plenty o' days I don't. I don't more days than I do, and nows and thens there's days when I don't get any at all. Not as I'm grumblin' or carneying, mind you. For one thing," he went on with the precocious manliness and self-reliance of air and tone characteristic of street children who "scratch for themselves," "you see it takes a goodish bit to be enough for me. Knockin' about 'long shore makes yer rare and peckish, and where there's plenty to perform on, and I'm free to eat till further orders, I can put a lot out o' sight for my share. Getting yer grub's an in-and-out bisness with the likes o' me; but, taking it through and through, I come off pretty well,—some days I has as much as ever I can tuck into me, and most days I gets a bit."

"Well, captain," we began, adding in a laughing, apologetical way, "we must call you Captain Rust, you know, as we don't know your proper name."

"Which everybody does call me Captain Rust, and I don't mind," he put in; "on'y if you want to know my proper name it's Bill White."

"Well, then, Bill," we said, "about your coming to the school, you may take our word as a friend that it would be the best thing you could do for yourself; a boy or man that can't read or write has very little chance of getting on in the world nowadays. Come, now," we urged, on seeing that he remained silent, "there is nothing to pay, and it's only at night, you know, you could manage that; you can't rust in the dark."

"But it ain't dark till late now," he said; "all the same I don't rust at night, but now as it's the summer I'm on another lay as I do go arter at night."

"What lay is it?" we asked.

"Chuck-out-yer-mouldy-coppers, you know," he answered.

Our looks intimated that we did not know, for he went on in an explanatory tone—

"Mud-larkin' and cart-wheelin'. I meets the wans coming back from the bean-feasts and the like, and turns cart wheels along the road beside 'em, and sings out to those on 'em, 'Chuck-out-yer-mouldy-coppers,' and there's mostly some good-natured uns among 'em. Then other times I works up 'long shore to the Trafalgar, where the swells as come down to the whitebait feeds are out in the what-do-calls—in front of the winders, you know, and I does a bit of tumblin' afore 'em, and then sings for them to chuck out their coppers."

"And do they?" we asked, as at this point he came to a full stop.

"Well, on'y sometimes," he answered. "You see," he went on, with a philosophizing air, "them as comes to the Trafalgar is mostly toppin' swells, and there's a difference 'tween them and bean-feasters. The feasters is mostly workin' people just out for their day's holiday, as they've perhaps been a saving up for ever so long, and they're that pleased at being out, that they ain't pertic'lar to a copper or two, and don't mind doin' a bit of chaff with you; and sometimes, if they've been taking their own grub with 'em, they'll chuck you a paper of sandwiches or summat o' that sort, as well as the coppers. But it ain't that way with the swells. They're used to doin' the grand, and bein' out for the day ain't such a pertic'lar treat for 'em as to put 'em in extra good humour, and then besides it's stand orf when it comes to swells. The police has orders to drive the mud-larkers off the bank before the Trafalgar; but, bless you, sir," he concluded with a laugh, "that's jest what gives us the pull."

"In what way?" we asked.

"Well, for all the police is put on to us for sake of the swells, there's nothink pleases most of 'em better than to see a policeman taken orf, and that's just how a mud-lark can do—if he's got any game in him. He ain't got no shoes or stockings on, and no clothes as he's afeard o' spilin', and the bobby has; so if it comes to a close shave you can allays dodge him by runnin' into the water a bit, and if, instead of lettin' him drive you away, you dodge him round about under the winders till he's tired, or goes off in the 'huff' at being laughed at, the swells is sure to chuck you coppers then, and sometimes a bit o' silver."

"That may be all very fine now, Bill," we said when he had finished; "but you should remember that, after a while, you'll be getting too big for those sort of games, and if you are not a little bit of a scholar, you won't have much chance of making a man of yourself. You had better give up the mouldy-copper lay, and attend the night-school."

"I must knock out a living how I can," he muttered.

"Have you no one to help you?" we asked; "no parents, no father or mother?"

"I aint got no mother," he answered, and his voice grew low and trembling, and a look of sadness came over his face. "It 'ud be different with me if I had. I dessay I should 'a been at school afore now if she'd 'a been left; she stuck to me through thick and thin. I only wish I did have her now. But I dunno neither," he added quickly, "she had an orful time of it, and a good deal through a takin' of my part. He used to wollup us dreadful, partic'larly poor mother; he killed her orf by inches."

"Your father you mean?" we said.

"I does, and no one else," he said, his eyes flashing angrily.

"And is he dead, too?" we asked.

"No; wuss luck," he answered promptly. "I'd 'a been a lot better off if he had been. He worn't content with kicking me out, if ever he thought I had a few ha'pence he'd come arter me and shake 'um out o' me, and gie me a hidin' if I said anything agen it. Howsumever," he went on, his face brightening again as he spoke, "he's pretty nigh as good as dead to me; he's doen time—ten years' penal, and he had a back scratchin' into the bargain. A woman as know'd my mother read it all out of a noosepaper to me, and didn't I larf when it said how he 'owled when they were givin' him the cat. I know'd he was chicken-arted. Though he used to knock us about so, I've heard men put him down like old boots, and he hadn't a word to say for hisself. Agen he's out next time, I'll be man enough for him myself, an' if he comes near me then I'll smash like that," and he brought his fist down fiercely on the coffee-room table.

"Oh, come, Bill," we said, laying a hand upon his shoulder, "you must not have such thoughts as that, they are wicked."

"You may think so," he answered somewhat doggedly; "but you don't know how I've been knocked about; and mother, poor mother!" he added, his voice dropping to a murmur.

"But there!" he resumed, suddenly, as if wishing to shake off some train of thought, "I must be goin'."

"You have given us no answer about the school, though," we said, as he rose to his feet.

"I told you the lay I was on," he answered.

"Well, but if we can find you something to do in the day-time to make up for that lay, will you come to school then?"

He paused for a few seconds, debating the matter in his mind, and our impression was, that the thought of the "chaff" to which he would be subjected by his associates if he accepted our offer, decided him against it.

"I wouldn't like to say anythink to you, sir, that I mightn't stick to," he answered at length, "and so I'd rather not promise; leastwise not now, perhaps I'll come in the winter."

This was the utmost we could get out of him, and we tried to make the most of it.

"Well, then, we shall expect to see you at school in the winter," we said, as he was leaving us.

"I on'y said perhaps, you know," he answered.

"Oh yes," we said; "we wouldn't try to trap him, still we would like him to come, and we would look him up again in the winter to speak to him about it. Was he agreeable?"

"Yes, sir," he answered; "and thank you for the breakfast, and you'll see there won't be no more goings on up at the school."

Though we had failed in our chief object of it, our interview with Captain Rust had increased our liking for him; our desire to snatch him if we could from the life of criminality and misery towards which he was but too probably gravitating; to which, if they live to become men, most of the children—and their number is legion—who are kicked out in the world to "scratch for themselves," ultimately do come. He was a sturdy, fearless, self-reliant little fellow, with the seeds of much that was good in him; a boy that, under favourable circumstances, would, in all probability, make a bright man, and a useful member of society. But he was not under favourable circumstances; he was under very unfavourable circumstances, was in a way to become an enemy to society—one of the "dangerous" classes.

Something like these were the thoughts that flitted through our mind as the captain walked away; his usual elastic jaunty gait, and free-and-easy bearing, coming back to him when he had gone a few paces.

His promise that there should be no more disturbances at the school was faithfully kept, and that, as we were told, at the cost of several fights with some of those who were desirous of continuing the sport, as they considered it. At the same time, however, the captain very characteristically began—as our informant upon this point put it—to make poor old Ben Tyler's life a burden to him. Occasionally, when moving about our district, we caught sight of the boy, but only at a distance; and we had an idea that he designedly kept out of our reach in order to avoid being pressed upon the subject of the school. As most of the younger boys who attended the night classes were in the habit of going into the country with their parents harvesting and hopping, it was, on that and other grounds, decided to discontinue the evening classes at the school from the beginning of August till the middle of October.

When they were resumed we were away from the district on leave of absence, and did not return till November, when, however, we immediately bethought us of Captain Rust. We began to look out for him when taking our walks abroad, but having at the end of a week seen nothing of him, we began to make inquiries as to where we would be likely to "drop on him."

Well, they couldn't exactly tell us, was the answer given by those to whom we put the question. Somewhere about his old "lurk," they should think; but he hadn't shown up much lately, and seemed to be dreadfully down on his luck. At length, we fell in with an old man, the keeper of a moored barge, which served as landing stage for a waterman's ferry, who was a little more definite.

"I see him a few days back," he said, "and precious ill he was too, poor little feller, with his head in a sling, and looking like a walking skeleton a'most."

"With his head in a sling!" we echoed.

"Well, bandaged up. He got his cheek badly gashed awhile ago, and with no one to see to him it went bad, and some good-natured soul of a woman had tied it up for him that morning. He asked me for some old sacking as was lying about on the barge here, and I give him that and the last twopence of my week's dinner-beer money; for I thinks to myself, well, it's only a matter of going without my half-pint for a couple of days, while it'll get the captain a bit o' summat to eat. But if you believe me, sir, I had a job to get him to take the coppers; he's a spirited 'un, is Rust, and no mistake."

"But can you tell us where we can find him?" we asked.

"I can't now," he answered; "but I'll try and find out. I would like to see summat done for him. He ain't come out much lately," he went on. "You see he's like the wild beastes, as you maysay, and like them he'd try to creep into some quiet hole to die."

"But he can't be dead," we said hastily, "or it would be known in the neighbourhood."

"Well, I don't say as he is dead, sir," answered the old man, "and I hope he ain't; but as to saying he can't be, that's another affair. I ain't saying it in a hard-hearted way, but a dozen such as him might be dead and no one know, and—God help 'em, poor little creeters—no one care about it either. Just you put it to yourself, sir—here's the captain, poor knocked about little wasteral, who's to miss him if he was gone?"

The old man spoke with a depth of feeling that was catching, and for the moment we had no words to answer him. After a brief pause he went on in a somewhat calmer tone.

"It's pretty certain, sir, that he's kenneling out, most likely in some out-of-the-way corner of a shut-up wharf or yard, and he might die there and not be a case of body found for long enough after."

What the landing-stage keeper had told us made us feel very anxious and uncomfortable, and throughout the remainder of the day we were actively engaged making inquiries among the policemen on the beat, common lodging-house keepers, and others; but all in vain, none of them could tell us the whereabouts of Captain Rust. The next morning, however, the desired information was brought to us, thanks to the instrumentality of the old ferry keeper. We had just got down-stairs, when we were told that a man wished to speak to us. He was a tall, burly fellow, and, with a hairy cap tied down over his ears, a large red woollen "comforter" wrapped thickly round his throat, and a much be-patched great coat coming down to his heels, he looked a formidable customer.

"Beg yer pardon for calling so early," he began, the instant he was shown into the room in which we were; "but you see, sir, I'm night watchman at Miller's yard, and I thought if I didn't call before I turned in, I mightn't catch you."

"That was all right," we said, signing to him to take a chair, "but what might he want with us?"

"Well, it's this way, sir," he began, in a half-confidential sort of tone; "as I was a coming home this morning, I meets old Dan Davies down at the Ferry there, and says he to me, 'Charley'—Charley Johnson bein' my name, you know—'do you happen to know anything as to where Captain Rust hangs out now?' So says I, 'Why?' 'Well, cos,' says he, 'Mr. — was a inquirin' of me about him, and I think he'd give him a lift if he could find him.' 'Well, if that's it,' says I, 'I do know something about him. I know where he sleeps, only I'm not supposed to. I'm supposed not to, more than anybody else.' 'Well,' says he, 'if you'd give Mr. — a call, I'm sure he'd be obliged to you,' and so I said I would, and here I am, sir, and I 'ope you won't think me for'ard in coming."

"We thought him a good-hearted fellow," we answered, and were very much obliged to him for taking the trouble to come.

"Oh, don't let us say anything about that, sir," he answered, colouring. "It would be a poor heart that wouldn't go a step out of its way to help another. This is how it is, sir; Dingley's yard, which is next to ours, has been standing idle this year past, and it's in a shed there that the captain sleeps, though I have to make believe not to know it. I'm supposed to keep a bit of an eye on that yard as well as our own; so, if I was to let on that I was aware of his coming there o' nights, I'd be expected to drive him away; but, bless you, sir, I couldn't do it. So as I tell you I take on as if I didn't know it. I try not to see him, and he tries not to let me; he's a sharp little chap, and we understand each other. When I'm having my supper, I leaves a bit at a spot where it's handy for him to fetch it, and then I goes for a walk in another part of the yard, and when I come back the grub's gone; but of course I ain't seen any one take it; it might ha' been a dog for anything I know; and if I throws a bit of sacking or a few pieces of coke over the wall, I ain't supposed to know as anybody walks them off and turns 'em to account. Drive him away! No! I couldn't have the heart to do it, if I was to lose fifty jobs over it! I'm a roughish sort o' chap, sir, but it almost brings the water into my eyes to think o' that poor little feller, he's so broke down and ill, and so brave-hearted with it all. I've six on 'em, three boys and three girls, and there's only two-and-twenty shillings a week to keep the lot of us, so you may know there ain't much chance for saving; and when I see little Rust—for between you and me and the post, sir, I do see him sometimes—I think to myself what would become of my own youngsters if they were left as poor Rust has been? If you can do anything for him, sir, it'll be a real charity; and if I can do anything to help you in it, there's my hand on it."

Heartily we grasped the brawny hand he proffered us, and then in a few brief words it was arranged that he should that night conduct us to the spot where Captain Rust "kenneled."

It was a rainy, raw November night, and the disused ship-yard seemed to us an especially dismal place as we stood in it at the point close to the water's edge, at which we had clambered into it in company with our kind-hearted guide. The bare poles and scaffolding stood up gaunt and skeleton-like against the leaden sky, and the slimy lap-lapping of the slowly rising tide had something dirge-like in its sound. There was a faint moonlight, and by this we began to make our way up the timber-strewn yard, our watchman friend not wishing to turn on the dark lantern he carried, unless it should become absolutely necessary to do so. In about five minutes we got up to the brick-built parts of the yard, the forges, stores, offices, and there things seemed more cheerful.

Coming to a stand for a moment, our guide whispered—

"We're close to him now; the shed's just behind that second forge there; should I speak to him first? he'll know my voice."

"Yes," we whispered; and then the pair of us advanced as directly as we could. As we came up to the shed, we heard its occupant creep to the door to listen; and so, hastening forward, our companion, putting his mouth to a chink, said, in an undertone—

"Don't you be afeard, Rust, it's only me, Charley Johnson, you know. I've brought Mr. — with me; he wants to see you; open the door, that's my hearty."

There was a sound as of a piece of wood being struck out of a staple; and then the door swung open and we entered.

Having pulled the door to after him, Johnson turned on his lamp, by the light of which we saw poor little Rust crouching in a corner beside the pile of old sacking which served him as bed. He looked a wofully different boy from what he had done when we first met him. Wasted, haggard, emaciated, with face deadly pale, lack-lustre eyes, the old buoyancy of bearing gone, and his clothes not only dreadfully ragged, but hanging about him "a world too wide." It was a piteous spectacle, so piteous, that we were for the moment unable to speak, and the boy himself was the first to break the painful silence.

Slowly rising to his feet, he dragged himself towards us, and in a weak, hollow voice, said:—

"I 'spose you've come about the school; but I couldn't come in such togs as these; and, besides, I've been very bad, sir, I have indeed, there ain't no sham about it; is there, Charley?"

"Goodness knows, there ain't," answered Charley emphatically.

"No, we can see that but too plainly," we said; and then, with an assumed heartiness of tone, we went on:—"Never mind about the school now; we must get you better first, and then we can talk about other things. I've only come to take you away from here at present."

"Where to?" he asked quickly, and shrinking back as he spoke.

"Well, we hardly know yet," we said; "however, it will be some place where you'll be well done by, and where we don't think you'll want to leave, but where you'll be free to leave if you do want."

"There now, what could be kinder or fairer than that!" exclaimed Johnson admiringly; "so come along, little matey;" and without more ado he took Rust up in his arms as lightly and as tenderly as though he had been an infant, and led the way out of the yard. He carried him thus till he came to the front gate of the premises of which he was watchman, then standing him gently down on the pavement, said—

"May it be the turn of the tide for you, old chap, as summat seems to tell me it will; but if it shouldn't be, and you ever do want the shed again—which, of course, I 'ope you won't—there it is for you, and no questions ast and no notice took. And now, good-bye, little Rust—good-bye, and God bless yer." As he finished speaking he stooped and kissed the desolate boy upon the forehead, and then, with a brief good night to us, he went off.

Calling a passing boy, we sent him to a neighbouring stand for a cab; and, while waiting for it, we resolved to convey Captain Rust, in the first instance at any rate, to a local home for destitute boys, with the manager of which we were acquainted.

It was nearly ten o'clock when we reached the home, and the boys being gone to bed, we found the matron in her own room, darning stockings. It was a cosy little room, and, with a clear fire burning, it looked and felt decidedly cheerful by contrast with the dark, wet streets, and we could see Rust's eyes brighten the instant he came into it.

A glance at our companion was sufficient to give the matron a general understanding of the position; and, before we could enter into any explanation, she had put the already singing kettle on the fire, and was bringing out a little jar of extract of beef wherewith to make beef-tea.

"Ah, poor little fellow, he looks sadly wasted," was her comment, in an undertone, when we had briefly told her Captain Rust's story; "but it's more a case for meat than medicine."

The beef-tea was soon ready, and while the boy was sipping it the active matron prepared a warm bath for him in an adjoining room, and looked out a suit of the Home uniform. Somewhat refreshed by the beef-tea, the warmth, and his brief rest, the captain went readily enough to the bath when requested to do so, and came back looking decidedly improved. In the meantime the matron had got ready a cup of coffee, with an egg and some thin bread-and-butter. To this the captain sat down with something of his old alacrity of movement, but he had scarcely tasted the food when, covering his face with his hands, he burst out sobbing, as though his heart would break.

"I can't help it! I can't stand it no longer! It chokes me a'most!" he gasped out between the great sobs that shook his poor little frame.

"What is it, Bill?" we said soothingly. "You can't stand what?"

"This," he sobbed out brokenly—"yer all bein' so kind to me. I know it's babyish, but I can't help it."

The matron probably divined that we were going to tell him that he must not cry, for with a quick shake of the head at us, she advanced, and patting him on the head, said—

"There, dear, you are weak now, but you will be better soon. I'll keep your coffee hot for you; it will do you good presently."

Her voice and touch seemed to calm him, for his sobbing immediately became less violent. Seeing this, the matron left his side and resumed the conversation with us, which had been interrupted by the captain's outbreak of grief. It was about him that we were talking; the matron sorrowfully explaining to us that she feared it would be impossible for the boy to be sheltered there for more than a day or two, as what beds they had were full, and the state of their funds did not admit of their keeping another bed.

We had spoken in whispers, but the event proved that the captain's sharp ears had caught at least the general purport of our talk. Suddenly rising, he staggered to where the matron was seated, and falling on his knees at her feet, and burying his face in her lap, broke out—

"O lady! don't send me away. I'll sleep anywheres, and do anything, only let me stay. I could be good where you wos, I know I could. Take pity on me, I'm quite broke down. I'm on'y a little chap, and I've no mother."

There was an earnestness in his brokenly uttered appeal, an air of forlorn helplessness about his attitude and wasted figure that would have touched even a hard-hearted person—and the matron was not hard-hearted.

Bowing her own head over his to conceal her rising tears, she murmured, "No, you shall not be sent away, poor motherless wanderer. I'll have room made for you somehow. With God's help, I'll be as a mother to you, so far as in me lies."

Timidly he kissed her hand, and, so well as his choking sobs would let him, fervently murmured some incoherent expression of thanks. Balm had been poured upon his wounded spirit; gradually the tempest of grief in his breast subsided; his sobs grew softer and softer, till at length they died away in sighs; and, finally, he fell into a light and gentle sleep.

And so, still resting his weary little head on the lap of her who had promised to be a mother to him, we left him—a brand snatched from the burning.

PRAY WITHOUT CEASING.

I THESS. v. 17.

"PRAY without ceasing," says the zealous Paul;
 But what means this? Must we not work, nor eat,
 Nor take our rest? Is prayer to swallow all?
 Are knees to serve in lieu of hands and feet?
 Nay—I will show thee what is ceaseless prayer.
 First, 'tis a heart to prayer for aye inclined;
 Next, that it be of all our choicest care;
 Next, that we ask the Counsellor to share
 Each sorrow of the body and the mind;
 Next, that we cease not till our good we find,
 Like him who said, "I will not let Thee part Until Thou bless;" next, that our spirits dart
 Their pious glances, when they can, on high;
 Last, that we bound each day with morn and evening cry.

I.—NOTES AND COMMENTS.

THE COMING WINTER.

WITH the shortening day and the approach of winter, we feel ourselves forced to contemplate some elements of discomfort of another kind. Food is dear, fuel is dearer, the potato crop is diseased; struggles of labour and capital become more intense; the English labourer, slowest and most immovable of men, has begun to agitate; the whole understratum of society appears to be heaving. What is to be the result? Or to look only to what is immediate, how is the winter to pass over? If the upper and middle classes will feel a difference, and if the working classes will find that nearly all that they have gained in higher wages is taken back in higher prices, what will become of that class whose incomes, fixed and unelastic, can undergo no improvement? What will become of the clergyman and the teacher, the clerk, and the annuitant, the widow and the invalid, who find it so hard to make ends meet even when the times are favourable, and who cannot but be check-mated when prices suddenly rise? It is a strange experience to come upon us in the heart of a spell of such unwonted prosperity. It will at least serve to give scope to the thoughtful benevolence of those who are not satisfied with appeasing the outcry of the noisy, but would fain contribute to the adjustment of more honourable claims. We do not hesitate to say, and to say decidedly, that it is the duty of all who have anything in their power to consider well the case of the classes which we have mentioned, and, if possible, not to suffer them, and them alone, to sustain the pinch of a change which has brought increase of comfort to most of their neighbours. In what manner this is to be done, it is not for us to say; the proverb will probably settle that point—where there's a will there's a way. And as to the generally troubled state of our social horizon, we believe that it is a call in Providence to all classes to exercise more of that submission to the will of God, and of that patience, forbearance, and love to one another that are so eminently Christian graces. It is singular that God should have given the nation a new lesson of dependence in the midst of its prosperity, and rising, as it were, out of its very prosperity. The lesson will not be lost if it tends to chasten our vaunting spirit, and to spread the conviction that nothing but the favour of God can ever make our mountain to stand strong.

THE LABOURERS AND THEIR PENNY.

Conspicuous among the classes whose present attitude is fitted to create anxiety, are the agricultural labourers. The condition of this class has long been a reproach to England, and the only wonder is that they have been so long of making any effort to improve their circumstances. Is there to be war between them and their employers? Are they to succeed in raising their wages, and if they succeed in this, is it to be balanced by the loss of perquisites that have generally come to them? And are all bonds of sympathy between them and their employers to be broken, and is a relation which used to have something of the paternal and the filial in it, to degenerate into a mere matter of work and wages?

It is not our province to answer these questions, or to mingle directly in this fray. We observe, however, that a very interesting question has been raised in relation to it. Supposing it to be true that the English agricultural labourer has been held down, and that he is now struggling in an honest cause, what is the duty of the Christian Church in relation to the struggle? The question has been keenly debated chiefly in some Church of England newspapers, in which many influential clergymen have freely expressed their opinions. On the one hand, it is maintained by some that the Bible always gives its support to the poor and needy when borne down by a superior social power, and that it would not only be in itself fair and manly, but eminently Christian, for clergymen to take openly the side of those who have hitherto had such a miserable lot. On the other hand, it is maintained by others that it is with the spiritual interests of men alone that the Church has to do; that the early Church was very careful not to intermeddle with political questions, or questions that had a political side; that even slavery was not openly denounced, but rather the endeavour was made to destroy the spirit out of which slavery arose, and thus to make provision for its ultimate extinction. Hence it is maintained that the duty of the Church is not to interfere directly in the present conflict, but to endeavour to instil principles of justice and generosity on the one side, and patience and contentment on the other, with a view to a satisfactory adjustment of the strife. To this it is answered that in point of fact it is true that the early Church abstained from open interference with matters that had a political side, even when they bore closely on moral and spiritual interests. But while this was true of a Church struggling hard to obtain bare toleration at the hands of a most alien world, it does not follow that the same course is incumbent on a Church which has obtained not only toleration, but a commanding position and influence. Christian men, in these circumstances, are called to declare for the right. Our blessed Lord would never have shrunk from doing so through fear of offending those in whose hands the power and influence of this world lay. Such are pretty nearly the views of the different sides. The matter has an importance not only on its own account, but also for its bearing on higher interests. It is an undoubted fact that the Christian Church generally has suffered in our country in the estimation of the working classes, from its having been held by them to show a spirit of indifference to their burdens, and to stand aloof when they have been trying to get them lightened. Hitherto this has prevailed only in towns, and the agricultural labourer has continued outwardly, at least, loyal to his Church; but whether his loyalty will endure in future generations will, humanly speaking, depend in some degree on the present attitude of the Church. We speak of secondary causes, and of the masses, not individuals; knowing well that no working man will turn his back on any Church which has been to him the channel of salvation.

SCIENCE AND PRAYER.

Most of our readers have, of course, observed the singular controversy which has been going on during the last two or three months on the efficacy of prayer. Objections to the efficacy of prayer have unfortunately of late years been too much the order of the day on the part of an enthusiastic class of "scientists" (as they are now beginning to be called); but the peculiar aspect of this last discussion arose from the nature of the test to which it was proposed to bring the matter. In a letter communicated through Professor Tyndall to a leading Review, and understood to have been written with a bonâ-fide intention, by an eminent London physician, it was proposed that in order to test the efficacy of prayer, there should be something like a prayer union throughout Christendom on behalf of a particular ward of some hospital, and that the question should be determined by the fact whether or not the rate of mortality was lessened in consequence. We believe that the proposal was an honest one, and that its ingenious author had no idea of the shock which it would give to the feelings of Christian men. At the very first blush, it looked like the old demand of a sign from heaven, or like the presumptuous condition of Thomas—"Except I see in his hands the print of the nails and thrust my finger into his side, I will not believe." Looked at more carefully, it revealed much ignorance of the conditions on which answers are promised to prayer—such as the faith of the party asking,—the fitness of the thing asked to promote the highest good of the sick person,—and the regard had in the whole circumstances of the case not merely to what is for the good of man, but also to what is for the honour and glory of God. But the most repulsive feature of the matter was its being, on the very face of it, a cool proposal to experiment on God's ways, merely for the satisfaction of man, to subject the divine procedure to human tests—to constrain the Holy One to manifest Himself precisely after the fashion that his creatures should choose. In this point of view, the very statement of the proposal caused a shudder of pain.

In a paper contributed by Mr. Galton to another Review it was affirmed that to put the matter to a new test of this kind was quite unnecessary, inasmuch as we had already sufficient proof from many quarters that prayer made no difference. Mr. Galton affirms in this article that he never knew a medical man ascribe any cure that took place within his practice to prayer; that the members of the Royal Family, much though they are prayed for, do not live longer than other people; that missionary ships, and churches and chapels, are not more secure than other ships or than other churches and chapels that are not prayed for; that the deaths advertised in the Record, which probably have been much prayed about, are not at a more advanced age than those advertised in the Times, which probably have not enjoyed that privilege. Here is another sample of the misapprehensions which such men show in dealing with these matters. No believer in prayer affirms that cures vouchsafed in answer to prayer take place (ordinarily) without the intervention of some natural cause, brought to operate on the diseased frame through the unseen power of God, either (according to one view) by a special interposition on the occasion, or (according to another) by a series of pre-established arrangements, adjusted to the foreseen fact of prayer. The cure may have all the appearance of a natural one, yet it may really be in answer to prayer. The physician may be induced to change his treatment, the state of the atmosphere may improve, or something else may occur to strengthen the patient's system, appearing quite accidental to most persons, but not so to him who has prayed in secret, and obtained the blessing that he sought. In regard to the Royal Family, it is unfortunately true that the prayers offered for them, though sincere enough at bottom, are often offered quite formally, not possessing that quality of importunity which we are led to connect with effectual prayer. As to missionary ships, &c., the statement of Mr. Galton is a random one; the data are few; nor would the fact be conclusive, because such calamities as he refers to are often, in the case of missionary and other public bodies, real benefits in the end. And as to the duration of lives that are prayed for in comparison of those that are not prayed for, we rather apprehend that the case will turn out favourable to the former; partly, it may be, owing to direct answers, but mainly and most commonly, because the divine blessing given in answer to prayer has led the persons prayed for to practise that self-control and careful living, and to enjoy that serenity of mind and radiance of heart with which long life is usually connected.

In the August number of the Contemporary Review there appeared a very able paper, by Dr. Littledale, on the efficacy of prayer. The question is discussed thoroughly from the scientific point of view, and the doctrine of prayer is shown to involve no violation of the order of nature. At the same time stress is laid on the universal prevalence of prayer wherever there has been a religion of any kind, and its far more abundant prevalence under Christianity than under any other. If it be admitted that Christianity is the purest religion, then how comes it that prayer has been so much more common under it?

There is something very melancholy in this endeavour, in the name of science, to deprive us of one of our highest privileges. If the views of Tyndall and Galton should be established, the awful dream of John Paul Richter would become nearly a reality:—"I wandered to the farthest verge of creation, and there I saw a Socket where an Eye should have been, and I heard the shriek of a Fatherless world."

II.—OUR LETTER-DRAWER.

A few months ago, while expressing in these columns disapproval of Mr. Ward Beecher's plan of opening picture-galleries and reading-rooms on the evening of the Lord's-day, in order to draw off young men from haunts of debauchery, we invited suggestions from correspondents as to what provisions of a more unexceptionable kind might in their judgment be made for the Sabbath evening. We now return to that subject.

YOUNG MEN'S SABBATH-EVENINGS.

Our correspondents have shown a tendency rather to dwell on the wide subject of Sabbath desecration and its evils than on the particular phase of the question to which we wished to draw attention. This is true of the elaborate communication of "C." He writes with much feeling on the growing tendency of a large section of the population of large towns to turn the first day of the week into a mere day of pleasure-seeking, and strongly urges the Churches to use all the means in their power—not excepting their discipline—to correct the growing evil. He longs for a powerful confederation whose object shall be to maintain the sanctity of the day, and rouse public opinion in regard to it. After specifying various forms of labour for such an association, he adds:—

"In order to make its work complete, it might do much in carrying out the suggestions made in the SUNDAY MAGAZINE for June last, by providing reading-rooms where nothing but religious reading should be supplied, and in connection with which short services might be held. These doubtless would be attended by many who now never attend the house of God, and thus be brought under the influences which they have never before experienced. So would the work be at once destructive and constructive (and such is the work of all reformation), inasmuch as it would tend to prevent Sabbath-breaking in the case of unlawful trading, and would provide 'some better thing' than pleasure-seeking for those who transgress in that direction."

Writing from the north of Ireland, M.K.S.B. "views with dismay the growing facilities put in the way of the working classes for the desecration of the Lord's-day: trains running to and fro at single fares, steamboat excursions at reduced rates—temptations hard to be resisted by artisans, and, above all, by mill-workers pent up all the week in a close, stifling atmosphere, and to whom a day in the country, breathing air uncontaminated by smoke, must be like a glimpse of heaven." Looking at the visible result of the Sunday train experiment, our correspondent thinks that it must be deemed a failure. "Children tired and cross, women distracted between watching them and looking after their half-drunk husbands, suspicions, quarrelling, and recriminations, are no fit preparation for entering on the toils of the Monday. Contrast this with a day spent in the public and private exercises of God's worship, the Sabbath quiet, and the Sabbath rest, the strength derived from communion with the Eternal, and what a difference!"

A telling passage is quoted from Hugh Miller, which we are glad to reproduce:—

"There is a variety of the genus philanthropist who would fain send out our working classes to the country on the Sabbath to become happy and innocent in smelling primroses, and stringing daisies. An excellent scheme theirs for sinking a people into ignorance and brutality, for filling a country with gloomy workhouses, and the workhouses with unhappy paupers. The mere animal that has to pass six days of the week in hard labour, benefits greatly by a seventh day of mere animal rest and enjoyment. The repose according to its nature proves of signal use to it, because it is according to its nature. But man is not a mere animal; what is best for the ox and the ass is not best for him; and in order to degrade him into a poor unintellectual slave, over whom tyranny, in its caprice, may trample roughshod, it is but necessary to tie him down, animal-like, during six working days to hard engrossing labour, and to convert the seventh into a day of frivolous, unthinking relaxation. The merry, unthinking serfs who, early in the reign of Charles I., danced on Sabbaths round the maypole, were afterwards the ready tools of despotism, and fought that England might be enslaved. The Ironsides who, in the cause of civil and religious freedom, bore them down, were staunch Sabbatarians."

Our correspondent thus concludes:—

"Your suggestion that halls should be opened in large towns on Sabbath evenings with books and periodicals suitable for Sunday reading, would, I feel assured, if carried into execution, be productive of much good, and be the saving of many young men, especially lads from the country, who drop away gradually from the church, and fall into the ways of sin from having nowhere to go to, and nothing to interest them on that evening. Ah! if the children of the light were only as wise in their generation as the children of darkness. Meanwhile, we who love Zion and Zion's King, must cry mightily to Him 'who maketh the wrath of man to praise Him,' who 'with good still overcometh evil,' to guide our leaders in this matter, to endow them with a spirit of wisdom and of understanding; and to teach us how to make the Lord's-day 'a delight, the holy of the Lord, and honourable,' the pearl of days, the dew and blessing of the weak, the foretaste of that 'rest that remaineth for the people of God.'"

THE BIBLE AND SCIENCE.

The following is an extract from a letter of inquiry which we have received on this subject:—

"Will you oblige me by informing me what book is best calculated to reconcile science with religion, more especially geology with the history of creation in Genesis?"

We are afraid that we must give a somewhat indirect answer to this question. Many books and a still larger number of brochures have been written for the purpose of effecting the desired reconciliation, but that any of them have proved satisfactory we cannot undertake to say, for this simple reason, that we do not think that the time has come when any book can be written thoroughly adapted to the purpose. Most of the books that have been written—by Dr. Chalmers, Dr. Buckland, Hugh Miller, Dr. Pye Smith, and many others—are rather calculated to show that a reconciliation is possible than to indicate the one true reconciliation.

Suppose a man has suddenly disappeared, and that a surmise arises that he has been murdered. Many hypotheses will be started to show that his disappearance may be accounted for without the supposition of murder; and different minds will cling to different hypotheses, until the mystery is at last cleared up. It is useful to have these hypotheses, but it would be foolish to pronounce prematurely that one was right and all the rest wrong.

Now the various suppositions as to the way of reconciling Genesis and geology on the time and order of creation are as yet little more than suggestions of possible solutions. And what makes it all but impossible to go much further is, that geology as yet has not succeeded in reaching definite and comprehensive results. Dr. Carpenter, in his introductory lecture at Brighton, at the meeting of the British Association, spoke of geology as the most speculative of all the natural sciences, and used it to illustrate the manner in which the facts of nature are liable to receive a colour from the mind of the person observing them. That address of Dr. Carpenter's was certainly a very important testimony as to the net value of scientific discoveries. The "arrogance of science" was smartly rebuked for maintaining that absolute certainty characterizes its so-called conclusions,—these conclusions consisting really of a certain amount of fact, modified and coloured by the views of the person making use of it. Dr. Carpenter maintained that the conclusions of science have to pass through an alembic of "common sense," there to be tested and verified by the common sentiment of mankind, before they can be accepted as certain.

Undoubtedly, if this be true, many of the so-called conclusions of modern science are as yet on the wrong side of this test—only in the outer court of the Gentiles. The doctrine of evolution, the origin of the human family, the antiquity of man, the doctrine of natural selection, spontaneous generation, and sundry other theories for which the certainty of science has been confidently claimed, must, according to Dr. Carpenter, forego their claim.

It is impossible to reconcile Genesis and geology satisfactorily until we know better what geology really teaches. But the other day geologists had to give up their old doctrine that the different stratified rocks must have been formed at separate times—it is now known that they may be in the course of formation simultaneously. It is quite reasonable, therefore, that we should point to possible ways of reconciling the Bible and science, until the conclusions of the latter become more certain. Till geology has passed through the common-sense test of Dr. Carpenter, it is not reasonable to expect the permanent reconciliation.

Meanwhile it may be well to note some books on the subject, in addition to those already adverted to. Probably the most thorough is one noticed some time ago in these columns, the late Archdeacon Pratt's "Scripture and Science not at Variance." Mr. Pratt takes every case of alleged contradiction between them, case by case, and brings forward his reasons for believing that these contradictions do not really take place. In some instances he is remarkably successful. "Moses and Modern Science," by Professor Elliot of Liverpool, is an extension of Hugh Miller's "Geological Theory," by the introduction of the nebular theory of Laplace. "The Beginning," by Mungo Ponton, very carefully investigates the primitive condition of matter, and finds a strong argument in favour of the Mosaic record in the fact that light is said to have been created before the sun. The author thinks that it never would have entered into any ancient brain to represent light as existing before the sun, had the fact not been supernaturally revealed. But modern investigations have shown that light is caused by vibrations of the luminiferous substance, which vibrations may have been given to it by the Spirit of God brooding over the waters.

This note is already too long—it would be easy to add to it. It seems impossible for any thoughtful and candid mind not to see the presence of something supernatural in the Mosaic account of creation. Scripture and Science are like the two glasses of a stereoscope—we have not yet got their focus, and the combined image is somewhat blurred; but we see enough of coincidence to assure us that, when the proper focus is got, the convergence will be complete and the image clear.

III.—GLANCES AT WHAT IS DOING.

CHRISTIAN CONFERENCES.

Among the new institutions of the age, greatly encouraged and promoted by facilities of travelling, are conferences of friends interested in Christian objects. Some of them are partly ecclesiastical, others wholly devotional and practical. Of Church "CONGRESSES" we have given some account on previous occasions; our present glance is at the "CONFERENCES." The Mildmay Conference in England, and the Perth Conference in Scotland, may be taken as samples of the gatherings we refer to. There is something both interesting and refreshing in the spectacle of many earnest men of different Churches assembled together under the common bond of love to the Saviour and interest in his work. At Perth one short meeting a day was devoted to the hearing of addresses, on subjects that come home to all earnest Christians, by brethren selected for the purpose; another to free conversation on similar points; and another to evangelistic addresses to the public. At one afternoon meeting accounts were given of interesting work going on in different countries. A gentleman from Portugal told of the progress of the Gospel there; another, settled at Pau, spoke of the state of France, and the progress and difficulties of the truth; a third, Dr. Moon, described his work among the blind; a fourth gave a chapter of the evangelistic work in the East-end of London, and showed what men of business might do after business hours in teaching and influencing the young Arabs of that desert. At another meeting the brethren present joined together in commemorating the death of the Lord at his table. The combination of a puritan intensity with a catholic spirit is perhaps the most remarkable characteristic of these meetings. Full of fervour, and burdened with a sense of the overwhelming importance of divine things, and the critical state of souls, the leaders of these meetings pour out their hearts to God and to their fellow-men with an urgency seldom equalled. As the result of such meetings, many a lamp, we trust, will burn brighter, many a heart warmer, and many a life be more thoroughly consecrated to the varied enterprises of Christian love.

THE ATHANASIAN CREED.

The excitement connected with this subject continues unabated. It is a sign of the singular state of tension in which men's minds are at the present time—the marvellous contrast between the prevalent tone now and the easy-going indifference of a previous generation, that the desire of some to be relieved from what they feel to be a galling fetter is met by others with the most solemn declaration that if any such relief be granted, it will be regarded by them as a fundamental change on the constitution of the Church, and a justification of separation from her pale. Such is the position of Dr. Pusey. In a letter to the Times, published in August, he challenged the Archbishop of Canterbury's statement that it was but a handful that shared his convictions. He repudiated with warmth the notion that that handful might retire into lay communion. To tamper with the Church's testimony in the Athanasian Creed would be a fundamental change. If the Church of England agreed to it, it would no longer be the old Church of England, and the proper course for him and his friends would be to remain in the old. Archdeacon Denison writes to say that if Parliament shall in any way interfere with the sacraments or the creeds, he will apply for admission into the Liberation Society.

It is a singular case of extremes meeting that the ground of Dr. Pusey is identical, mutatis mutandis, with that occupied in Scotland by the more vehement opponents of the proposed union between the Free Church and the United Presbyterians. It is alleged by them that any change which would impair the testimony of the Free Church as to the duty of political rulers to support and extend the Church of Christ would be a vital change, and would so alter the constitution of the Church as to make it different from that to which they had vowed their allegiance. They would remain where they were and constitute the true Free Church.

One difference there is between the position of the Scotch and the English protesters. The Scotch claim that if the crisis should occur the whole property of the Free Church would be legally theirs. Dr. Pusey does not seem to have considered whether he and his friends might not claim all the cathedrals, churches, schools, parsonages, and other buildings, along with some twelve or fourteen millions annually, as the reward of their faithful adherence to principle.

THE HUGUENOT COMMEMORATION.

Three centuries have run on since the infamous massacre of St. Bartholomew's-day, when so many thousands of the best men and women of France perished in one hideous massacre. Considerable attention has been drawn to the subject, though from its horrible details and the difficulty of drawing any lesson from it that by its brightness would form a contrast to it, many persons have been repelled rather than attracted. Dean Stanley made it the text of a sermon against intolerance, indicating a leaning to the view that at that time all Churches were pretty much alike in this respect, and that in our time all Churches have advanced pretty equally in their tolerance. Some excellent, but not very original, truth was spoken by Dean Stanley on the bitterness of spirit so characteristic of religious controversy, and the terrible loss which Christendom and the world at large had incurred, in consequence of so much energy that might have been devoted to the labour of love finding so different a channel. Even the Church of Rome, he said, was now thoroughly ashamed of the massacre of St. Bartholomew, and instead of regarding it with the pride of former times, could not but feel remorse and horror at the contemplation of it. These remarks on the feeling of the Church of Rome, however, have not passed unchallenged. Dr. Wylie of Edinburgh, in a letter to the Times, has affirmed that no authoritative or formal expression of any such change of feeling has ever been given to the world, that the Church of Rome therefore is not entitled to the credit of the repentance ascribed to her, and Dean Stanley has in effect admitted that his apology does not rest on any public documents, but only on what has been said or done by individuals.

Meanwhile attention is again turned to the truth, so conspicuous in history—the inevitable tendency of such outrageous events to avenge themselves. The martyrs of the St. Bartholomew massacre, and of the other persecuting deeds of France against the Huguenots, can hardly have been represented by the souls seen in the Apocalypse under the altar that cried, "How long, O Lord, holy and true, dost thou not avenge our blood on them that dwell on the earth?" If ever blood has been avenged, it is surely Huguenot blood. What a difference it would make to the Paris of the present day to have twenty thousand such God-fearing men and women as those whose blood crimsoned the waters of the Seine on St. Bartholomew's-day! For our own part, when we think of the great increase of industrious and God-fearing men whom these persecutions gave to our country—of the Fletchers, the Lefroys, and multitudes more who brought among us so much piety, industry, and refinement—we may well praise the name of Him who brings good out of evil. But it is sad to think of France, tossed from one political disaster and trouble to another, finding her only consolation in that lurid idea of military glory which covers with its deceitful glare so much of what is unjust and horrible, seeking in vain for that moral solidity which would give something like fixity to her institutions—haunted by a ghost which she cannot lay. Yet one day we doubt not the dove with the olive-branch will come to her, mercy will once more rejoice over judgment, and the dead past will bury its dead.

THE ROMAN THEATRE ON THE DEEDS OF THE CHURCH.

Dean Stanley would have been nearer the mark if, instead of the Roman Church, he had named the Roman people as regarding the massacre of St. Bartholomew with shame and horror. A curious evidence of the feeling of the people with reference to the misdeeds of the Church has been furnished recently by the Roman theatres. It appears from a letter by an occasional correspondent of the Times, that the theatres have on a sudden become intensely popular in consequence of their having such plays as "The Mysteries of the Spanish Inquisition, or Torquemada Sixtus the Fifth," "Barbara Ubryk, or the Nun of Cracow Buried Alive," "The Hebrew Family, or the Mysteries of the Old Police." The writer gives a sketch of a play which he witnessed—the "Maladetto." It represents a Jesuit plot. The Jesuits are in need of money to finish some edifice, and at a council of war they form a scheme for getting certain old ladies to leave their money to them. The working out of this scheme in the case of an old lady is detailed. Letters are intercepted; a young lady is assured that her lover is dead, and is persuaded to enter a convent; the old lady is induced to sign the will prepared. The indignation of the natural heirs is intense, and one of them confiding his views of the future to a friend thus declares himself:—

"Tired humanity feels the necessity of being freed from the nets of superstition, and from that mysticism through which men conceal their worldly appetites under the white veil of the faith. This beautiful and holy religion, born in the lap of poverty on the shores of the Sea of Tiberias and among the olives of Gethsemane, will then return to its limpid source. Then the minister of Christ will appear great in his poverty, magnanimous in his mission. The good Jesus drove out the Pharisees from the Temple, we will drive out the modern professors from our churches."

"Enemies of all progress and of every noble aspiration, you have reigned for long, but your reign is nearly over! Buttresses of despotism, you will fall with it! Spreaders of darkness, the light of liberty will dispel your night, and that divine faith which you have profaned will raise the immortal standard of the Cross upon your ruins. For that Cross I fight, through it I defy you, and as long as God gives me life and strength will I make by my words and with my pen implacable and eternal war against you!"

These performances are of little use save as indications how the wind of public opinion blows. The applause of the audience at such sentiments is said to be unbounded. If, however, public confidence in the old religious institutions of Italy is undergoing these fierce assaults, and if the people are responding in so great numbers and with such intense enthusiasm to the denunciation of them, it becomes all the more urgent a duty to endeavour, with all diligence and with all prayer to God, to bring to their ears the true Gospel of heaven.

THE BIBLE IN INDIA.

Under the auspices of the British and Foreign Bible Society a new method of evangelistic effort has been begun, or rather, we ought to say, an old method has been raised to a more conspicuous place. Copies of the Scriptures and of portions of them in English and vernacular tongues are furnished to missionaries willing to undertake the work, the missionaries endeavouring as they itinerate to interest the people in the Scriptures, and induce them to become readers for themselves. In the Bible Society Monthly Reporter for August we find a most interesting record of this work, a brief portion of which, from a letter by the Rev. E. Lewis of Madras, is all that our space enables us to give:—

"After visiting the English school, we went in order to the market-place, the principal streets of the town, the purely vernacular schools, and many shops and private dwellings, in all of which we read select passages from the Bible, striving in every instance to choose such passages to read as were best adapted to the circumstances of the people, and oftentimes succeeded by previous conversation to create such circumstances before reading. For example, we found that marriage feasts were being celebrated in several places; in such cases we endeavour to get amongst a large number of guests and read to them passages such as the following:—'The Marriage of the King's Son,' and 'The Parable of the Ten Virgins.' To groups of Ryots we read the parable of the Sower, the Vineyard, and the Barren Fig-tree. To rich men resting at ease by their own houses, the story of the rich man and Lazarus; the account of the young man who was rich whom Jesus loved, but who loved his riches more than he loved his Lord; and of the rich fool whose soul was required of him whilst he contemplated pulling down his barns and building greater. To numbers of shepherds whom we met with we read of the Good Shepherd who gave his life for his sheep, and the parable of the Lost Sheep. To many men learned in native lore, and proud of their learning, we read of the Pharisees and Scribes, and several passages from the Epistles of Paul. Other topics such as the creator of the world; the histories of Abraham, Moses, David; portions from the Psalms and the Book of Proverbs; the Sermon on the Mount, and the parable of the Prodigal Son—we read in almost every place and invariably found an attentive and appreciative audience.

"One of the most interesting and important of the plans adopted by us for commending the Bible was that of seeking admission into the house of several wealthy men in various towns, when we had a good opportunity of reading carefully and fully many passages from the Bible to the members of the family and friends assembled. As far as we could see, the effect of this course upon the family was most telling, and in every instance we either sold a copy of the entire Bible or of the New Testament, and explained how the Bible may be read with profit every day."

ANOTHER MARTYR OF ERROMANGA.

The question was asked last winter in Edinburgh by an eminent scholar and divine, Who would now die for his religion? Within a few weeks of th question being asked, a practical answer was furnished at the antipodes, the Rev. James D. Gordon, a Presbyterian missionary, having been murdered at Erromanga. Our readers must be aware that it was there that the great modern apostle of the South Seas, the late John Williams, was put to death in 1839. Twenty-two years after, other two missionaries, the Rev. G. D. Gordon and his wife, were murdered almost at the same spot. And now, eleven years after the murder of Mr. G. D. Gordon, his brother James, who stepped forward to take the colours as they dropped from his hand, shares the same fate, and joins the martyr band. He had come all the way from his home in New Brunswick to speak of the Saviour's love to the murderers of his brother and sister, and his reward is the martyr's crown. There can be little doubt that the abominable kidnapping traffic in which Englishmen have been involved, has embittered the spirit of the natives, and it is possible that the murder of Mr. Gordon, like that of Bishop Patteson, is to be traced to this cause. A Sydney newspaper has given the following particulars of Mr. Gordon:—

"Mr. James Gordon was a man of singular piety, somewhat eccentric in his way, self-denying to an extreme, and always ready, even with some foreboding, to be offered as a martyr in the cause he had so nobly espoused. He has laboured in Erromanga for eight years, and translated the Gospel of St. Matthew, the Book of Genesis, and other portions into the language of the people, besides preparing primers and hymns for their use. He also acquired a knowledge of the language of the island of Esparito Santo, and spent a winter there teaching the people. He prepared a phonetic primer in that language. Mr. Gordon has been alone on the island since the death of the Rev. James M'Nair in 1870. He was unmarried, and trusted himself unreservedly among the natives. He had a very enterprising missionary spirit, and had always a longing to proceed 'to regions beyond.' He even thought he might lay his bones in New Guinea."

IV.—OUR LIBRARY TABLE.

We will not say that the writings of Canon Liddon always yield us undiluted pleasure; but in his new work, "Some Elements of Religion," we find so much to be thankful for that even if we differed in some points we could not make them a ground of disparagement. The title is certainly unfortunate; one could not gather from it that the six discourses it contains are a most valuable and powerful vindication of divine truth in reference to the difficulties and objections of the educated and thinking classes of the present day. Canon Liddon is one of the few powerful expositors of the old truth who have the power of setting it forth, not in mere abstract forms equally suited or unsuited to any of the fifty generations that have come and gone during the Christian era, but in a way specially adapted to this thinking, doubting, wondering, searching age in which our lot is cast. What religion really is—what God is—what the soul is—what sin is—what prayer is—what Christ is—are the subjects of the several chapters, and they are handled with much intellectual clearness, scholarlike precision, and moral earnestness. We should desiderate more explicit teaching on the death of Christ, as the source of pardon and life eternal, and a more constant allusion throughout to that very vital theme.

The literature of the Beatitudes would itself suffice to verify Solomon's remark about "many books;" nevertheless, we welcome the Rev. J. O. Dykes's "Beatitudes of the Kingdom" as cordially as if they were the first of the series. We seem to be getting in these times to understand better the personal character of Christ—"the man Christ Jesus"—and the light reflected from the person on the teaching makes the latter wonderfully fresh and interesting. This seems to us a great feature of Mr. Dykes's exposition. What we have here is the Blessings in the light of the Blessor, instinct with his own spirit, fragrant with his own aroma. There is not only instruction, therefore, in these expositions, but refreshment, feasting, benediction.

Father Taylor of Boston, whose life is recorded in a most attractive volume by the Rev. Gilbert Haven and the Hon. Thomas Russell, was in every way a remarkable man and did a great work. He was born in Richmond in 1793, spent a rough boyhood, became a sailor, and was taken prisoner of war by the English and carried to Dartmoor. The light had visited him shortly before, and he began to speak to his fellow-prisoners of their souls and to preach to them, and was chosen their chaplain. When he returned to America he became a pedlar, but never ceased to be a preacher of the truth; and at length he was admitted a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church. He at once devoted himself chiefly to the sailors, and drew crowds of them, as well as many distinguished and intellectual people; for he has been described and praised by Dickens, Emerson, Miss Martineau, Miss Bremer, and many others. His preaching was wonderful. It was full of simile, and direct conversational appeal, and was made vivid by dramatic paraphrase and movement. He was distinctly an original and earnest man; much to be admired as fitted for his own work, but not to be copied. He visited the rough women in parts where no one else could have gone; and his work among them was much blessed. The calls on him of this kind were such that he had never time for study; but perhaps this was in his favour, as study might have given the "set" character to his preaching that would have spoiled it. His discourses seem to have been a mixture of all styles—now pathetic, drawing tears from rough, sun-browned sailor faces; now sarcastic, and now richly humorous—apothegms trooping on each other's heels; and sometimes he was truly poetic. On one occasion he was preaching a funeral sermon for a pastor who had died young, of consumption, and whose people were sincerely mourning their loss, when he wound up with—"God did not wish the dear little man to preach, He wanted him in heaven; but he was anxious to do some service for his Lord, and his request was granted. When his first year closed, he would have been taken at once to heaven, but you were so im-portunate to have him back, that God indulged you for a little while. You had no right to expect he would remain with you; he preached every sermon, as you saw, with his winding sheet on his arms." But Father Taylor was not always tender; his sarcasm was often searching in its honest directness. Once at a meeting a rich gentleman from the city was telling the sailors self-complacently what he had done for them. When he sat down Taylor rose and said, "Is there any other old sinner from up in town who would like to say a word before we go on." When he was building his new chapel, and was preaching in a wealthy church in Boston for a collection, he said, "I do not want your arches, and columns, and draperies for my house, only give the shavings that fall from your Corinthian pillars." He sometimes reached almost scriptural simplicity and grandeur. When referring to the folly of expecting great results all at once, he said, "Carry not the seed basket and the sickle into the field together." Though his sympathies with fellow Christians was broad, he was decidedly evangelical; and, while he was inclined to be brotherly with all, he would not cease speaking his home truths—many telling instances of which are given. Thus Father Taylor went on from year to year, sometimes preaching four times a day, and walking and visiting a great part of his time. He was thrown aside ten years before his death in helpless passivity; but he was always cheerful, and he died in 1871 much mourned.

In the Rev. William Williams' "History of Welsh Calvinistic Methodism" (Nisbet & Co.), we have another stirring record of the wonderful way in which the grace of God sometimes works upon multitudes. While Wesley was producing his great impressions in England, a similar movement, though quite distinct, began in Wales, through the earnest preaching of a clergyman. The fire caught the hearts of Howell Harris and a young curate, Rowlands, at the same time; and their preaching founded Welsh Methodism, which flourished in face of much opposition. So enthusiastic were the people that companies would walk forty miles to worship on the Saturday, and back again on the Monday, refreshing themselves on the way by reciting the preacher's words. It is good to read such a record of self-denying faithfulness.

"Eight Months on Duty" (Strahan), which is worthily introduced to us by our respected contributor, Dr. Vaughan, is the diary of a young officer, who went through the campaign with Chanzy's army in the late war. It gives us a very good idea of certain of the operations; but is more valuable still as showing that amid the dissolute and godless crowd there were earnest souls, who must have proved a healthful savour. There is hope for a nation that produces men such as this young officer. For its high tone and true religious feeling, we can cordially recommend the little volume.

We rejoice to see from the appearance of "The Annals of English Presbytery," which Messrs. Nisbet & Co. have just published, that Dr. M'Crie, who some time since resigned his office of Professor at the Theological College of the Presbyterian Church of England, has still strength to pursue his old and well-loved studies in Church History. This volume consists of careful gatherings; and is the result of much patient investigation and thought. That we may the more readily draw our readers to the book, let us say, however, that it is not so much the "Annals of Presbytery," in any strict sense, as a graphic sketch of Church History in Great Britain from the early centuries of the Christian Era. It is historical rather than polemical, and abounds in eloquent pictures of the leading characters—Columba and St. Aidan, Wycliffe and Sir John Oldcastle, Knox and Melville, the Westminster divines, and many later personages. Everything which Dr. M'Crie touches he makes attractive. His sympathies are lively, his style, though full, is vivid; and here and there he shows a breadth of sentiment and a generous catholicity which are very admirable, kept in association as they are with views in no way loose or latitudinarian. Two passages there are of especial interest in the work. One is where he shows how Calvin's followers have often found it difficult to justify his practical liberality, and the other where he heartily praises the old Scotch Confession of Faith, and ventures a word in favour of a somewhat more adorned worship than that common among the Scotch Presbyterian Churches. We have read Dr. M'Crie's volume with peculiar pleasure.

Lord Shaftesbury said some time ago that he believed the most effectual means of dealing with the growing carelessness and scepticism of the working classes was to get members of their own class to go among them and preach the truth to them. From Mr. Thomas Cooper's "Plain Pulpit Talk" (Hodder and Stoughton) we find that he has been for years carrying out this idea. And, judging from these sermons, he must be a powerful influence. They are colloquial, yet full of matter, soundly evangelical, yet most strikingly illustrated; and he is not afraid to venture on familiar phrases. The first sermon, on "The Horrible Pit," with its divisions of "Jolly Corner," "Gambler's Corner," "Drunkard's Corner," and "Socinian Corner," is certainly fitted to arouse—the better fitted perhaps for its special audience that there is nothing of the conventionality of the pulpit in it. That the sermon has been much preached among colliers and miners gives it a special significance. The whole volume is singularly direct and rousing.

We are glad of the opportunity of calling attention to a most useful series of tracts—"Kind Words for all Classes," by the Rev. Robert Holmes. They are specially adapted to the working classes, particularly to those who do not aspire to profounder reading. As full of friendly and very telling warning against the temptations that assail them, encouraging counsels towards the higher paths of life, and cordial recognitions of that power of godliness which alone can really achieve the desired end, these papers are most excellent. They are issued in monthly numbers, and have now been going on for two or three years.

CROOKED PLACES:

A Story of Struggles and Hopes.

BY EDWARD GARRETT, AUTHOR OF "OCCUPATIONS OF A RETIRED LIFE," ETC.

CHAPTER IV.—A CONTRAST.

DESPITE the manifold trials of her hard-working, poverty-stricken widowhood, Mrs. Harvey might have been almost as happy as she had ever been in her life, but for her children. They were good children, and she had faith that God could preserve them in the path where He had placed them. But, just as we often feel that we may trust His providence that our bread and water shall be sure, yet trouble sorely whether He will always grant us milk and butter, so Mrs. Harvey grieved lest they should lose the dainty, delicate ways of her own youth, and of their former position. They were different now from those around them, although they were no richer. But would they be as different ten or twenty years hence? She could bear it for George. He was older than the girls, and more formed already, and, with his present fund of information, and his thirst for more, she had little reason to fear his falling into the coarse pleasures that degraded too many about him. The mother had a curiously boundless faith in her boy. It had been the habit of her life, as well as the instinct of her nature, to look up to the stronger sex. There might not have been very much in either her father or husband to justify it, but the ease and happiness with which some of the strongest and noblest women reverence and obey very ordinary men, is one of the sweetest and most touching hints of woman's true place. Elizabeth was one of those women who see in men not only all they are, but all they ought to be. It may be fairly discussed whether such reverence is not more honourable and wholesome to her who gives, and him who takes, than the modern feminine consciousness of "purifying and elevating influence."

It was about her daughters that Mrs. Harvey pondered. She taught them and lived with them, but not all her maternal anxieties had worried her into any unnatural shutting up. Among the visions of her own youth, she remembered several "come-down" genteel people, friendless and antedated, with bloodless faces and ghostly tones. To her sensible judgment this horror was greater than any other. Better that Hatty and Milly should grow up red-handed, bouncing, and cockneyfied! And yet it seemed such a pity!

To tell the truth it was Hatty that troubled her most—Hatty, who was always spoken of up and down the lowly street as "the young lady." Unless Hatty belied her promise, she would be a beauty. The rough, outspoken neighbours said so to her face. It was a comfort to poor Mrs. Harvey that Hatty did not seem to care much either way.

Little brown Milly was in no danger of flattery here. Her angular figure and white face were mere foils to her sister's lithe form, sweet-pea complexion, and blue eyes. Hatty's charms were those which appealed readily to uninstructed eyes, while it required deeper physiognomists than those poor neighbours to appreciate Milly's noble head, and grave dark eyes. It was the same with their characters. There were times when Mrs. Harvey, in her vexation, was almost ready to say within herself that her eldest daughter's very beauty and graces, physical and moral, must have something innately vulgar in them, they were of such a sort to command popular notice and applause. She was an universal baby lover. Had crèches been the fashion in that day, she might have been said to be as good as a crèche in the locality. She was always leading home some lost child, or volunteering the charge of some infant. Whenever Hatty was missing, she was to be found in the local dairy, where there were twins. She could keep a dozen children amused, for she had an endless fund of "stories," such being mere recapitulations of the ways of life in her old home, which Hatty grew to regard as the fairy-land which it seemed to her auditors. Milly Harvey was of quite another disposition. She made few friends among the neighbours, shrank from children, and rarely entered a stranger's room, however invited, and spoke so seldom to anybody but her mother and George, that she was in little danger of catching the colloquialisms which infected Hatty's speech, and shocked her mother.

Hatty was also what is called "clever at her needle." Yet it was not she, but Milly, who went down the patient stitches of the family darning and sewing, and was oftener and oftener trusted with a straight seam in what they called "mamma's pay-work." But Hatty could put a ribbon across a bonnet, and a flower upon the ribbon, in the right way. She became an authority and a benefactress at Whitsuntide and Boxing-day. Hatty's idea of beauty was gaiety of colour and fulness of form. And for either of these she was ready to despise soundness of material or neatness of workmanship. Mrs. Harvey's own quiet taste had descended to Milly, after whom the boys in the street would sometimes call "Quaker." But Mrs. Harvey's prim purchases always grew smart the moment Hatty put them on. And horror of horrors, the dairy wife, out of gratitude for her kindness to the twins, presented Hatty with a pinchbeck brooch, which Hatty herself had admired in a shop window!

"Never you mind," said sage Miss Brook, on some occasion which had brought out an expression of the mother's anxiety; "God made gay cockatoos, as well as sweet nightingales and useful hens. You've not got to fuss yourself about what isn't in Hatty, but to find out what is, and make the best of that. God has got a use for the very ways that puzzle you, so long as the devil doesn't get 'em first. And mark me, Mrs. Harvey, your wise-like Milly, who is safe from most of Hatty's dangers, will have other hard passes of her own, of the sort that's too narrow for any hand to help her in, except an angel's."

The truth was Hatty was lonely in her own home. There is a great deal of that loneliness even in the most united and loving families. And, while we have always much sympathy for the genius who goes ahead of his fellows, too many of us simply slight and condemn the simple lowly nature that is left farthest behind. Could Mrs. Harvey but have known it, she had conferred a priceless boon on Hatty by the act of unconscious heroism, which had changed the level of her children's lives. Hatty was not a girl to be improved by what is called "education." She was far too sweet-natured to have become pedantic, which is the revenge that some shallow minds take for being sown with too heavy a crop. But she would have been disheartened. Only her beauty and grace would have saved her from constantly filling the demoralising place of universal inferior, and these would naturally have assumed undue proportions in her eyes. In cultivated society her companions would, too frequently not have been of the highest type. In a word, unless her mother had possessed the uncommon judiciousness to see and counteract these temptations, Hatty would probably have become an idle, gossiping, sentimental fine lady. And Mrs. Harvey had no claim to uncommon judiciousness; except, perchance, that greatest claim of all, the will and the power to do the plain right thing, which is, after all, the imperial sword that can cut through all Gordian knots of social difficulty. In the present instance it had placed Hatty where her powers of lowly kindness and helpfulness came to the front, and given her friends whose roughness and ignorance were not necessarily connected with any moral taint, and who honestly respected and admired her.

Naturally enough, as time passed on, the household means increased. The day of sickness and adversity, carefully provided for, did not come. George rose rapidly in his printing-office, and expressed no wish to leave it. Often his mother almost hinted that he might procure some kind of counting-house work with shorter hours and a healthier atmosphere. For, though he was certainly far stronger than he had ever seemed likely to be in his earlier boyhood, he was still a slender, delicate lad, who grew very fast, had a slight appetite, and a strange inclination for abnormally long and rapid walks. As for Milly, she had proved such a apt pupil, under her mother's sole tuition, that she was presently in constant work as a designer to a small manufactory near, and only needed to fill up her short leisure with the less remunerative stitching. "It was no trouble to teach her, except that she soon got beyond me," Mrs. Harvey would say fondly, "and that's always the way with the good scholars."

So they were able to leave their old rickety lodgings, and take a quaint, ancient fo roomed cottage down a quiet "Providence Place" hard by. This removal was not so easy as the last one had been, for of late they had had odd shillings to invest from time to time, and the product of these, joined to the invention and ingenuity that they had all learned when there was no money to spend, made the new home look a very bright, snug place. Hatty filled the two tiny parlour windows with flowers, mostly raised from seeds or sickly shoots bestowed upon her by some of her friends.

"If you wouldn't buy the red carpet that I chose, and look grave when I put on my red ribbons, you can't object to the red in my flowers!" she said. "Twasn't me that made the geraniums!"

There was real housekeeping for Hatty now, and Hatty did it. She scrubbed down the whole house once a week. She went down on her knees at six o'clock in the morning and whitened the tiny courtyard in front of the door. She kept the windows so clean that you couldn't see there was glass in them. And yet, in her own homely phrase, "she was not above" keeping friends with people who were content to live in a constant "muddle."

"You may be as particular as you like with your own ways," she said, "but you needn't be so over-particular with other people's. And there's no use in disliking dirt so much that you can't even clean it up."

One thing Mrs. Harvey fervently desired, for all her children, that they might be God's children as well as hers. They had been brought up in a very different atmosphere to that of her own youth. They had lived under the warm shelter of a life to whom God, and Saviour, and eternity, and duty, were much more real than any material realities. And yet Mrs. Harvey's keen maternal sympathies could feel that they were all just what she had once been. She could bring them up in the courts of the Lord, but her hand could not raise for them the veil of the holy of holies. Only God himself could do that. And the mother prayed and hoped. Her noble-minded, right-feeling George, her patient thoughtful Milly, often seemed so near, so near. Theirs was the nature that can of itself appreciate so much of religion, from its side of moral and spiritual beauty. Milly was one of those who delight to clothe themselves in bands of strictest discipline. She had her morning and evening portions, her regular times, when her mother noticed that she sought solitude. Her favourite religious reading lay among books which were not then so popular as they have since become—writings of old Anglican divines, whose solemn precepts, clothed in stately English, had an echo as of a Gregorian chant pealing down the tinted sunlight of an old cathedral. Mrs. Harvey sometimes found scraps of her daughter's writing, such as sets of "Resolutions for the New Year," or "Rules for daily Devotion." It was actually these which damped her hopes. They were of "the letter which killeth," rather than "the spirit which maketh alive." They were full of self-education and self-mortification, but they never once reached the true Christian idea of self-sacrifice. Their very asceticism and discipline were the mere self-indulgence of such a nature as Milly's. Mrs. Harvey sorrowfully owned that her darling was still on the wrong side of that mysterious line which divides the natural from the spiritual man—that she had not yet passed through Leviticus to the glorious Gospel of Christ.

And still Hatty seemed so much farther off. She read her Bible—the historical books and the Revelation. She seldom read anything else on Sundays. Hatty was no great reader at any time. On Sundays, she would go about singing "Oh, that will be joyful," or "There is a land of pure delight," instead of the "Poor Mary Anne," and the "No, we never mention her," which she was given to lilt on week-days. It was a peculiarity of Hatty that she always sang sad songs and joyful hymns. Hymns had always been easy lessons to Hatty, while catechism had only represented tears and failure. She had been first tried with Watts's "Mother's Catechism," and had got on well through the simple facts at the beginning, and there stuck. She had been tried with the "Shorter Catechism," and the Church Catechism afterwards, for Mrs. Harvey's creed was truly catholic in its breadth. In the first Hatty knew the first answer. "Man's chief end is to glorify God and to enjoy Him for ever;" and in the second she could reply to two questions, "What is your name?" and "What is your duty towards your neighbour?" That last subject she learned like magic in one Sunday afternoon, and never forgot it, and became greatly addicted to quote it in conversation. Mrs. Harvey was sorely afraid that her Hatty would be one of those good-natured, utterly careless people, whose status for time and for eternity is one of the sorest problems with many thoughtful people.

But He who brings the last to be first, and perfects His wisdom in the mouths of babes and sucklings, had ruled otherwise. Among these Harvey children, the first plain active decision for God was destined to come from this perplexing Hatty.

CHAPTER V.—HATTY DECIDES.

It was a bright, dancing June morning; George was at his office—Millicent was out, taking home some of her patterns. Mrs. Harvey was at her needlework, and Hatty was sitting at a side table, shelling peas from a wooden bowl into a willow-pattern vegetable dish. She wore a piece of washed red ribbon in her hair, and a house-apron of bright green print, with a frill at the bottom.

"Mother," she said, rather suddenly, "you wouldn't mind me being a member at Zion chapel, would you?—I want to."

It must be explained that Mrs. Harvey and Milly attended church and then kept house together. As George chose to go all across London to hear a celebrated preacher, Hatty was obliged to go alone, and had got into the habit of attending Zion chapel, where most of the neighbours went, who attended divine worship at all.

Mrs. Harvey stuck her needle in her work. "You know I regard all Christian sects as aisles in the same house of God, my dear," she said. "And I shall thank our Father very much if He has given you the right to call yourself a follower of Him. I feared you didn't think very seriously of these solemn matters, Hatty."

"I don't see there's much to think about, mother," said the girl simply. "It's just does one mean to be good, or wicked; and if one means to be good, how is one to be it? I couldn't make a goodness worth anything if I tried ever so. Of course, nobody can, but then one like me is in no danger of fancying I can. So I should have to go without being good at all, unless somebody else would give me his goodness, and that's just what Christ does. But I haven't taken it, unless I make up my mind to keep in His way and do what He says."

"Yes, my dear," said her mother, "that is the root of the matter."

"And I should like to belong to Zion chapel, not because I see any difference between it and the church,—I'm too stupid to notice the sort of things that George talks about, schism and apostolic succession, and such like,—but because I got to care for these things through people that go there. They are not clever people, mother. They are mostly like me. I'm not far forward enough to understand the things that puzzle and interest George and Milly. The parts of the Bible that I can understand at all, are plain and straightforward enough, and have more in them than will last my lifetime. But old uncle George at the dairy, and Mary Smith, the sempstress, knew the sort of feelings that I had. They knew how one is likely to shuffle on, from day to day, just doing one's work, as if it were nothing for God to notice, and meaning to think some day, but never thinking, and dropping off at last, like the beasts that perish. Old George at the dairy used to tell me that he believed I thought religion was a plaster to be stuck on when one was sick. And he was right. At least I thought religion was separate bits to be pricked into one's life, and that some people, like ministers, should have a great many, but that such as me couldn't have more than one or two, a prayer at night and morning, and a sermon on Sunday. I remember when Mary Smith was converted. It's near two years ago. She always had sat at her work all day long before, and been a steady girl that went to church, and didn't gallivant. And there she was, just the same. And said I to her, 'Mary, what does being converted mean? What difference does it make to you? Ain't you doing just the same as you did before?' And she said, 'No, indeed, Miss Hatty, there's many a time when I've been pressed, that I've sent home seams scarcely fastened, so that they'd be sure to rip; but please God, my seams will never rip again.' And that made me see how religion could come into such a common life as mine, cleaning and cooking, and just making things as pleasant as I can. And from that day, all these two years, I've seen a difference. I've noticed myself in ways of work,—getting off it, or getting over it, that have showed me what I wasn't, and what I ought to be. And so," said Hatty simply, "I want to join Zion chapel because it began there."

Now the minister of Zion chapel was an old devout man, who did not spare himself in his Master's service. He was doing a work of which no one took any heed, and which to his humility, seemed to himself, but poor and insignificant. In those days, the East-end of London had not become a focus for the zeal, philanthropy, and sentiment of the West. Foreign visitors were not taken to Ratcliff Highway as to a disgusting peep-show. This old minister would have shrunk from the very mention of scenes which are now drawn with Fuseli-exaggeration to make effective background for the supposed sweetness and light of the other end of the town. His gentle, tremulous hands were far too weak to let down the cup of salvation into that black dungeon of spirits in darkness. But he could stand and plead, and hold others back from going near its perilous archways. He had been a widower for nearly forty years, —a childless widower. No dream of promotion would have taken him from the humble, common people, whose welfare, temporal and eternal, had happily and usefully re-filled his emptied heart. But he took no thought of self-sacrifice therefore, for no promotion was ever likely to come to him. He could only say very plain things in a very plain way, and superficial sharp people would have pronounced him an "unpractical man." But his poor flock could have told such, that somehow, obedience to their pastor's unworldly advice always led them farther and farther from the workhouse, the mad-house, and the prison.

Such was the man, under whose direct personal ministrations Hatty Harvey sat, week after week, with about half-a-dozen other young people, for nearly two months before their admission to church-membership. Was it any marvel that, at the end of that time, Hatty had grown much more subdued and womanly? The hoyden was reined. The fine animal spirits, the indomitable lightness of heart were not destroyed, they were rather fenced about from the destroyer, and taught to preserve their powers, sweet and fresh, to lighten the labours of a humanity which left half its laughter in an empty Eden.

Hatty became a Sabbath-school teacher, and soon had the largest class. Mr. Webber, the superintendent and chief man of Zion chapel, said she was "an invaluable young person." She found no difficulty in keeping up the "home visitation" of her pupils. It was the most natural thing in the world to her. The parents used to ask her to take tea with them. One enthusiastic dustman engaged her for a whole hour hearing about the secrets of his profession. The folks at home couldn't help laughing when she told them.

"Never mind," said Hatty, "one thing is pretty near as good as another, only we could get along easiest without those that think themselves finest."

But next Sunday, the dustman was sitting with oiled hair, on a back seat in Zion chapel.

And so Mrs. Harvey was greatly set at rest about Hatty. For Mrs. Harvey had the wisdom which is thankful for every good thing, even though it may not be the good thing that exactly fits our own taste.

"Mother likes pears best, but she don't think apples have no right to grow," said Hatty.

It was no wonder that Hatty was a very attractive woman. She grew up even lovelier than her childhood had promised. She was sometimes taken for a little above her age, on account of her tall full figure, and even the stately outline of her features might have contributed to the mistake. More than that, she had a quaint, homely wit, essentially womanly—the precise sort of wit that used to be the pleasant fashion among great ladies, before female education was carried on in the dangerous style of "high farming," the kind of wit that a queen can enjoy, and a servant maid understand. Hatty dressed very neatly now, rejecting flimsiness and flauntiness as "not becoming or consistent." (She had once seen the old minister glance, while speaking of the adornment of "a meek and quiet spirit," at a flounced barege that she was wearing.) At the same time she vindicated her natural tastes by a single bright ribbon, and delightfully fresh white ruffles. But how surprised Hatty would have been to be told she was witty! As for her good looks she heard enough of "that nonsense," as she called it. The only compliment that ever moved her was to be told she was "like her mother about the face." Then she blushed, asked "Do you really think so?" and shook her head.

CHAPTER VI.—HARRY WESTBROOK.

As a matter of course, Hatty had lovers. It took Mrs. Harvey another inward struggle to accept the plain facts of this epoch of her children's lives. Seeing what they were and where they were, whom would they be likely to marry? Ordinary working men and an ordinary working woman? No, not Milly at least, Mrs. Harvey felt almost sure. As for the other two, she was not a fool to think that in their present circumstances, they had any claim to aught higher. If George was fit, in mind and even manner, for any lady, the mother could impartially own that his surroundings were not. His wife must be prepared to wash, and scrub, and cook, without any thought of wrong done to her. His soul and his life had different claims, and one or the other must miss something in the future.

Hatty took everything quite equably, and did not feel in the least shamed or angered that her first offer of marriage came from a working shoemaker.

"Only I'm sorry when a decent man makes a fool of himself," she said; "I'm sure I'd put him off plain enough for him to understand, if he hadn't made up his mind not to."

Mrs. Harvey, accustomed to the cautious advances and careful distinction of grades of a more reticent part of society, was somewhat scandalized by the frankness and courage around her. She herself, married at three-and-twenty, had refused but one previous offer, and could only plead guilty to one or two silent lovers, one at least of whom, she felt sure, had kept from declaration from his just sense of certain rejection. But Hatty's admirers seemed to take for their motto, "Nothing venture, nothing have." Hatty's own characteristic report of the matter was true enough.

"You can't be civil to a man but he thinks you're willing to marry him, and if you're not civil he thinks it all the more."

Mrs. Harvey could only silently wonder what it would end in. Hatty herself seemed perfectly heart-whole. Nor could all her mother's watchful affection detect anything amiss in her conduct which could explain her troubles. She was only impartially cordial and open, which was so ingrained in her nature that when she sincerely endeavoured to be austere and repellent, it only resulted in a spasmodic, over-done shyness, which might easily be mistaken for arch coquetry.

Presently there came a lover of a very different kind to the honest shoemaker, the sharp saddler, and the earnest, blundering corn-chandler's "young man" who had already presented themselves.

When this one began to "drop in" of an evening, he did not make all the family uncomfortable by sitting on the edge of his chair and blushing and stammering. He had a bit of news for Mrs. Harvey, a fitting pleasant word for Millicent, and an argument for George.

His name was Harry Westbrook, and though he lived in the same lowly street with the Harveys, he had "gentle blood" in his veins. Once, in the course of some appropriate conversation, he took from his pocket an old signet ring with the family crest engraved thereon, and showed it to Mrs. Harvey. The well-bred, dignified woman liked him all the better for having it, and for not wearing it.

He was tall and fine-looking, with a something in mien and manner that set him apart from the handsomest of the working men around him. And he had also that greatest charm of all, a sad history.

His spendthrift gentleman-father, born to "hunters" and "meets," had fallen to die from the effects of a ducking he had received as a "welsher" on a fifth-rate race-course. This ne'er-do-weel's wife had been a simple decent woman of lower birth, who had been dazzled into marrying him while he was still handsome and fascinating. Poor thing! Even from her own son's account, one could hear she had paid very dear for her folly. His childhood had been spent in furnished lodgings, each more squalid and disorderly than the last. The scapegrace father, passing with circumstances from cruel penuriousness to mocking prodigality, had often clothed his half-fed child in rich velvets, and hidden his wife's bruised arms in Lyons silk. But the poor woman had done her best for her boy. She had taught him all she knew, and then starved herself that he might be taught more. She had striven to screen his father from blame, even while training him to loathe his father's courses. She died first, mercifully spared the last cruel pang of such a death as her husband's.

All this was indicated rather than related by Harry Westbrook, and it touched Mrs. Harvey's motherly heart. She felt that she could not be surprised if Hatty listened to his wooing.

Hatty was a riddle not easy to read. As the young man's attentions advanced her cordiality retreated, but not in the old laughing, skittish way. During his visits she would stay more than half the time in her own room, and then come down grave and silent.

As the family acquaintance with Harry increased, Mrs. Harvey, though she grew to like him more and more, began to have her doubts and fears. It was hard to say that he was not a religious man. He had attended church regularly since they had known him. (He now went to Zion chapel.) He stayed quietly in his dismal lodging during the intervals of service, in spite of all temptations to seek fresh air and change. He kept a sort of humble, pathetic silence whenever sacred topics crept into conversation, or if he spoke it was just with one or two half-yearning words. And yet—

Still, even if he were not yet "altogether a Christian," how few holy influences he had enjoyed hitherto, poor fellow! There was a good deal of poetry left in Mrs. Harvey, elderly widow as she was, and not all her sharper experiences of life had destroyed the old humble simplicity that had always preferred others to herself. Like an unsuspected skeleton at the bottom of a calm, sunny river, the pain of her own half-sympathetic marriage lay unspoken in her heart. She would pray, and she would exhort, that her daughters might never know what that was. But if Hatty only saw the difference which she could see between this lover and all her other lovers, if her warm young heart caught the love-version of her own calm, motherly liking for the youth, then it seemed to Mrs. Harvey that her daughter was caught in the mesh of a terrible temptation from whose intricacy she could see no way of escape. Hatty seemed just the sort of woman to refuse to see the entanglement, and to walk straight into it, blindfold, and singing.

It seemed to Mrs. Harvey a much harder pass than that agonized decision of hers which had made them all into poor working people. And yet Hatty had always said, "She could never have done that."

There was one thing which Mrs. Harvey forgot. Something which we are all prone to forget. Not that God shows a way of escape along with every temptation. Mrs. Harvey remembered that full well, and reiterated it in her prayers, and tried to take comfort from it; but failed because she could not see the way herself. But she forgot that this was not her temptation, and that there was no need, and, therefore, no promise, that she should see the outlet.

Hatty grew much graver and gentler. She would take her work off to her own room, and sit there alone for hours even when no Harry was haunting the family apartment. A responsibility had fallen on the girl. She had a question to answer to God and to her own soul.

She was such a young thing—scarcely nineteen yet—and still it was two months since Harry had said to her—

"Miss Harvey, you must know what you are to me. Do you think you can like me?"

They were walking in the twilight, for he had waylaid her on some household errand. And Hatty had found that the easiest answer was the truth.

"Of course I like you, Mr. Westbrook."

"Don't say it so," he had answered hotly.

"I mean can you love me better than anybody else, and for ever and for ever? Don't say a word now, it would be too hasty either way. Think it over, and tell me when I ask you again. You must be everything to me or nothing."

None of her other simple lovers had ever spoken so. And it was those last words of his that haunted her—"everything or nothing." Could he be everything? Would it be a very praiseworthy or happy life that had him for its highest point? And yet would not his utter withdrawal make a very unbearable blank?

Hatty did not put it so. She had never talked metaphysics with George and Milly; but she said to herself—

"I wonder if all my ways are his ways; and if not, I wonder if I could give up mine for his. I don't quite know what his ways are, I'm not even sure that he has any yet, and if so, then who knows what they will be? He's lived a sad, unsettled life, poor boy—always 'in tents,' as our minister would say. One never hears him talk about things near at hand and likely. It would be better to think about a rise in his salary than of what he'd do if he had five hundred a-year. That only seems a worry to me, and enough to hinder one getting on at all. But religion is nothing unless it makes us charitable to the ways of those who have had disadvantages. And I'm sure if I'd been in Harry's place, I'd not been near as good as he is. I don't think that I am really as good now, if only he could see a few things a little differently. I wish he had not told me that he never cared to go to church till he saw me. Mother does not know that, and have I any right to tell her what poor Harry said in strict confidence, only to show me what a good influence I had over him?"

And so there was rather a bewildering complication that night when Harry Westbrook announced to Mrs. Harvey that "he had received hopes that he himself might some day call her mother."

"What, are you and Hatty really engaged?" Mrs. Harvey asked.

"It's no use saying engaged," Hatty had spoken up, rather decisively for a young lady in her interesting position, and with a swift flush passing over her face; "it's no use saying engaged till one knows when one expects to be married. And we don't want to be married for a long while yet."

"I shall have to be rude enough to bid you speak for yourself," said the lover gallantly.

"I can't understand you one bit," Milly said to Hatty that evening when they were both shut up in their bedroom. "You were never angry with the ridiculous people who made you offers, and now, although you are going to accept Harry's, you seem half as if you resented it."

"I don't understand myself, and I don't try much, because I ain't worth the trouble," Hatty answered.

"I do hope you will take care what you do," Milly went on; "don't play false in your thoughtlessness. Harry is just the man who could be terribly injured by want of heart in the woman he loves."

Hatty gave a low whistle. It was a shocking habit of hers, generally indulged in, when, in her own phraseology, she had something to say, which she could not "bring out."

"Yes, indeed, Hatty," Milly urged, in her young enthusiasm, "you may have his welfare for this world and the next in your own hands."

"Mayn't he have mine, in his turn?" Hatty inquired humbly.

"Men are different to women," Milly answered loftily.

Page 85.

"I think I'm a very old woman to you," Hatty observed, as it seemed inconsequently. "I ain't got any romance in me; at least, not your sort."

"You shouldn't give Harry hopes unless you love him," said Milly.

Hatty said not a word, and did not whistle. Milly's advice, like most advice in love affairs, was given in the dark. There was much in Harry's history and character, over which the motherliness of Hatty's nature yearned with an infinite dumb tenderness, and which gave an agony of strength to his appeals for her love. And she must be "everything or nothing," and she really loved him far too well for that dread alternative. Indeed, Hatty had such a clinging kindness for every human being with whom she had ever come in contact, that she had rejected the shoemaker and the saddler with all the less pain, because she would still see them, day after day, in their old places, and she had never felt quite comforted concerning them until they had resumed their former habits of neighbourly greeting and chat, and had, in fact, quite settled it in their own minds, that they had never had more than "a foolish fancy" for her.

But, in her own heart, Hatty had long laid down laws concerning the marriage state, to which she clung with that narrow persistency which is the weakness of an uncultivated mind, and yet so often its best stronghold. Very few need to open a grammar, if it were no use to learn a rule, unless one could remember all its exceptions. And it is better to forget a real exception, than to make a false one.

One of her rules was of the headship of the husband over the wife; in her own words, "that no woman should marry a man she could not look up to." She made no philosophic distinctions about mental and moral powers, laws of compensation, &c., all of which are not without their wisdom and justice, but which often sacrifice clearness to effect, like "Old English" letters on a sign-post.

She had often said, half playfully, half seriously, "If my husband wanted coffee, and I wanted tea, I'd like him to be the sort of man to whom I give his own way directly, without even letting him know it wasn't mine."

Now, ninety-nine people out of a hundred, Hatty herself and her sister Milly included, would have decided that Harry Westbrook was altogether the superior of the couple. He was better read, and, in every conventional sense, he was better bred; for he made no mispronunciations, nor indulged in the rough and ready phrases with which Hatty liked "to cut her way straight into a truth." And yet Hatty felt herself noways inclined to give up her own ways to his, and was actually beginning to doubt whether her old admiration of such dutiful surrender was not a mere girlish folly.

Mrs. Harvey did not grow better satisfied with her future son-in-law. He was as well-behaved as ever, but in the quicker current of their more familiar acquaintance, little straws began to show which way the wind blew.

"My hair has fallen out a great deal lately," Hatty chanced to say.

"Oh, we must stop that," Harry replied with solicitude. "You have such lovely hair, and I admire beautiful hair so much. Indeed, I think everybody does. A woman is nothing without her pretty hair."

"Then what is she to do if it all falls off?" Hatty asked, only half archly.

"Wear a wig," said he.

"Well, yes, if she was a disagreeable sight without one," Hatty answered; "but I wouldn't wear one without telling everybody that it was a wig. I hate deceptions."

"But you need say nothing about it," said Harry.

"There's sure to be something to make one mention one's 'hair,'" Hatty retorted, "and whenever that happened I should say 'my wig' instead."

"Is not that straining truth too far?" Harry asked.

"You can't strain truth," said Hatty; "truth is truth, and everything else is lies."

"Well, if you were wearing a wig, I myself would rather not know it," Harry observed.

"I fear you set too much value on perishable externals, Harry," said Mrs. Harvey very gravely; and her heart grew sore to feel how soon the hard work and many cares of young, needy married life, would wear away the physical bloom and beauty which even the mother was half afraid were Hatty's chief charms in the eyes of her lover.

"I hope you pray to God to guide you, dear," she would often say to her daughter. "I think only God can guide us in these matters, for our dearest friends do not know what will really be best for us. Ask Him to lead you to what will keep you nearest Himself, dear, and pray Him to keep out of your heart anything that can come between you and your love for Him. Better give up anything than Him."

And then the mother would sigh within herself, feeling that this daughter of hers was cast in no heroic mould. Not that she feared Hatty would wilfully hold everything cheap in purchase of a brief day of false, passionate love. A woman must have gone far downward, before Satan tempts her to try that turning. But had Hatty the determination which can tear up what has taken root deep in the soul? Besides, what was to urge her to such decision? The young man could not be said to have deteriorated. At least, Mrs. Harvey could not feel sure that he had, though she sometimes thought he seemed a little changed—less serious, more trifling. The fact was, their early acquaintance with him had been like one of those fair shimmering spring mornings which promise such a glorious day, and yet sometimes die away into a grey, dull noon—so imperceptibly that you could not say when the last sunbeam finally faded out.

There was only one person in the little social circle who had never given Harry more praise than a dubious "Humph," and who now spoke out plainly. This was Miss Brook.

"I never liked him," she declared stoutly. "Hatty had better have married the saddler, for he is a honest, well-doing young fellow. I'm glad he's got somebody to take him. I looked in upon him and his new wife yesterday, and their pretty parlour does him credit. It's quite a picture."

"But one does not marry for a pretty parlour," Mrs. Harvey remarked laughing, half sadly.

"No, but one marries for what gets one," said Miss Brook fiercely. "It's eighteen months since this young spark first saw our Hatty, and a whole year since he first had the impudence to speak about her to you, and what the nearer is he to being married? Wasn't it only our Hatty's own good sense that saved her from parading a trumpery ring on her finger, and looking like a fool to the whole parish?"

"What can he do?" asked Mrs. Harvey forlornly.

"Do! Work all night, and live on bread and water by day! Do! Anything!"

"He would only break down his constitution."

"Fiddlesticks! Constitutions are made to be broken down one way or another, and you must take your choice between. Don't a long, lingering, diddle-daddling engagement break down a woman's constitution?"

"I'm afraid it often does," Mrs. Harvey said, with a sigh.

"More than often. And wastes her life as well, for it's an awful strain working with one's hands in one place and one's heart in another. And yet I'd bid a true woman wait for her lover twenty years if there was any God's reason why he should not marry her out of hand. But if he's only sparing and saving his own precious constitution, I'd leave him free to do the same to the end. A man can no more take his constitution with him to heaven than he can take his silver and gold. He's only got to make the best use of it in this life, and it's generally as true with it as with money, that there is which scattereth and yet increaseth."

"It was my plea, remember, not Harry's," said Mrs. Harvey.

"If I was a young man, with a girl waiting to marry me when I could afford to take her, would I go and buy fine new satin stocks at four and sixpence?" asked Miss Brook, with withering sarcasm, "would I have a single pair of gloves in my possession, let alone three pairs, one lemon coloured? These wouldn't be my ways, Mrs. Harvey; and I'm double sure they would not be your own."

"For Hatty's sake and his own, we must hope he will grow wiser," said Mrs. Harvey. "But the poor lad has had but little enjoyment in his life, and is likely to feel it hard to be called to so much self-sacrifice."

"So much self-sacrifice!" echoed Miss Brook, with a snort which meant more than a dozen dictionaries could convey. "But it's the way with human nature. Whenever there's one, like yourself, that's lifted an hundredweight, you are always so fearful that another may be crushed beneath an ounce!"

"What can I do?" sighed Mrs. Harvey. "Certainly I am not satisfied about Harry. With all his moral conduct and correct outward observances, I fear he is not a thoroughly Christian man. But how can I expect an affectionate girl, seeing everything through the first light of love, to believe this? There seems too much in his favour. It would be different did he go into gaieties and dissipation."

"Go! There is no go in him!" said Miss Brook. "He won't even go to the dogs—he'll wait till they come to him. He wants a good moral electric shock—something that will go right across the torpid grain of him."

In truth, though Hatty did not own it to herself, she was not happy in her love-affair. The sunshine seemed gone off the world; faith and energy lay tranced in her heart. How was she to know that this was actually the consequence of the evening visits, and chats, which, indeed, were assuming an undue position, as the only charms of her life? She still taught in the Sunday-school, but her class was not as attractive as it used to be, and she had lost two or three of her best scholars, and really sometimes gave a serious consideration to Harry Westbrook's frequent hints that she should resign her post. Not that she showed any falling off in zeal or diligence that was perceptible to the old minister or to Mr. Webber, the superintendent. Hatty's conscience was still in her work, though her enthusiasm had faded. There was no comfort in sermons nowadays, and no relief in prayer. Hatty's sole safety lay in the misery that she felt because this was so. It was the one imperishable seal of her redemption. She was inside the Father's house, though she had left her sheltered seat by the hearth, to stand shivering on the threshold.

And then Harry Westbrook lost his situation. He had applied for an increase of salary, and his application not being immediately granted, it had seemed to him a right and prudent course to menace his employer by unpunctuality and negligence.

"I thought I would show him what I was worth," said Harry.

And perhaps he did—only the employer showed him the door.

"But I have not quarrelled with him—Oh, dear, no," Harry explained. "I have been in to see him, and had quite a pleasant chat only this morning. And I've quite talked him over to understand that he did not really dismiss me, but that I grew dissatisfied, and left to better myself."

And open truthful Hatty said not a word. She had learned that it was no use. Remonstrance only led to a war of words, in which his subtler wit always bore off the victory, and left the pain with her.

"Harry Westbrook is a fool and worse," was the comment of her brother George. "Give him up, Hatty, and don't waste another thought upon him."

"Give him up, in his hour of trial and adversity!" said Milly. "Hatty is no true woman if she can do that. Only let her be faithful, and she will be sure to win her reward."

True words indeed! But with a truth beyond Milly's romance.

Harry did not find it easy to obtain a new appointment better than that he had lost. One or two worse ones offered themselves, but he rebelled against "going backwards." Yet presently he would have been very glad of another chance of these. He had saved but little, and was soon deep in debt at his lodgings. Hatty heard all the details of the misery: how he was bullied and insulted—how once he walked the streets the whole night rather than confront his landlord, who became so alarmed, that he came out to look for his lodger, and, glad to find him safe and sound, led him home without one angry word for that time.

Any one who knows a woman's nature can guess how blindly and devotedly Hatty clung to him now. When nobody knows what of bitter change and agony any day may bring forth, every trifling endearment or petty act of good nature, assumes such a cruel, wringing pathos!

Everybody openly blamed him now. "They had all turned against him in his trouble," she cried in desperation, only wishing in her inmost heart that she could really feel it was so.

"It often seems so," her mother said, with sad gravity. "His troubles have shown what he is. But if, after what has passed, he became heir to a million, you would find that my censures would only become doubly as strong."

And yet, while Mrs. Harvey did not spare her daughter from hearing the severest judgments on her lover, and repeatedly expressed her decided opinion as to Hatty's proper course, she never personally urged her to give him up. She felt it too sacred a matter for the pressure of even a mother's authority. Such giving up must be voluntary to be effectual. A bitter life is better than a blighted one, and it is useless to break off an engagement, if a heart breaks with it.

CHAPTER VII.—MATED FOR LIFE.

It was an unusually damp and trying November. The house was dull and dreary as it had never been before; for Hatty was benumbed and depressed, and everybody else was silent and sad for her sake. Not that she neglected her domestic work. There were days when she "tidied," with doubled, desperate energy; but the little touches of gaiety were gone—the pink jug was no longer artfully put in front of the green plate. "It did not matter" now with Hatty; while to her mother, for the first time fully comprehending of what lightness and ease of heart these little things had been symbolic, it did matter very much indeed.

There came a single heavy knock upon the door. Hatty started. She started at every knock now. Then she went to open it. Though she had seen Harry the evening before, she had all sorts of vague fears about people with news of a dead body discovered, with a letter from her upon it. Instead of this tragedy, she found only a rough errand lad who she knew to be in the service of Mr. Webber, the Sunday-school superintendent.

"Our housekeeper is taken sudden bad with the erysipelas, miss," he said, "and I daresay you knows, miss, the three children has the hooping-cough. Says our housekeeper, says she, 'I'd be easy in my mind, if Miss Harvey would come round for the day, for she's a fine hand with sick children;' and I wish you would, miss, for the master has been up and down with them all night, and now he's up and down out of the shop, and he looks like a ghost, miss. Ain't you well yourself, miss?"

"Oh yes, I'm quite well," Hatty answered, a little inclined to feel it "a bother" that her own afflictions were not of that ostensible kind which entitles the sufferer to the luxury of strict retirement. She actually hesitated a whole minute before she said—

"Tell the housekeeper I'll come."

She went back into the house to finish something she was about. As she was putting on her bonnet, she said—

"One can't refuse when one's asked; but I wish people would let one alone."

"No, you don't, Hatty," said her mother gently. "You only fancy so. I know better." She was glad of an outer world interest for the girl.

Hatty turned and kissed her. She was usually very undemonstrative among her nearest and dearest.

"It's nice to hear you say so," she sighed, "but I'm getting sick of myself."

And so she went away. Turning into the Mile-end Road, she met Harry Westbrook.

He walked on a few yards with her. He had no hopeful word to say. There was no luck for him in the world, and he wished he was out of it. He was only a burden to her, he knew that. And she did not need any burdens, it seemed to him her life was hard enough already. He only wished he was a rich man, that he might take care of her. For himself, perhaps the grave was the best inheritance. Then he said good-bye; it was an unpleasant, foggy morning, to be out in. He should have liked to see her again in the evening, but he begged her not to hasten home a moment earlier on his account—only he should like to see her, for there was no knowing how little longer he might see her at all. Good-bye again.

The clouds, through which her mother's words had let a little sunshine, closed again over Hatty. But she went patiently on her way.

Mr. Webber kept a large shop, and described himself as "a bookseller and stationer, wholesale and retail," but his literary stock seldom got beyond spelling-books, ready-reckoners, and elegant letter-writers, and his best profits were on grocers' stationery, packing paper, and cardboard for fancy boxes. He was a widower, and his three motherless children had, till lately, been "boarded out" in the country, whence they had now returned, sadly unruly—a sore trial to their patient, pious father, and the prim old woman who managed his household.

Hatty went up to the great first-floor sitting-room, over the shop. The three children were there by themselves. Little Ellen, the youngest, perched uncomfortably on a sofa, coughing and fretful. Dick, the eldest boy, hunting the younger, James, about the room. There was a chorus of delight at Hatty's arrival.

But she went away for a moment to see the invalided housekeeper. She was an ancient spinster, as kind and good as she could possibly be, but one of those women who are positively terrified with the management of children. It had been bad enough while they were well. Their sickness had driven her almost frantic, and Hatty felt quite sure that her conscientious terrors had been the active cause of her utter disablement.

"It's all very fine to say it's only a common child's disease," said the good woman, gasping in her darkened room, "but what's the doctor been examining Dick's chest for, and saying we must take great care of him for as strong as he seems? I should just like to let the doctor himself try to take care of Dick Webber, that I should! And then he says, they must do this, and they mustn't do that; but yet I must be considerate, and not cross 'em—the cough makes children so nervous. I'd like to see the doctor make little Ellen drink mutton-broth without crossing of her! But it will be all right to-day, now you've come, Miss Harvey, for you've a genius for it."

Not at all nonplussed, Hatty went to her task, and found it sufficiently engrossing to make her own anxieties grow very far off. She knew all sorts of lively games, which yet did not knock the children's sorely needed breath out of their bodies. When Mr. Webber came up to dinner, he blessed her in his heart. He looked pale and worried, poor man, for it was a busy time in the shop, and he had all a father's feelings and a man's helplessness. Bad as was the day, he had not hesitated to run out that he might himself choose a toy for his little white-faced Ellen, who looked so dreadfully like her mother in her last illness. His kindness was its own reward, for Hatty, with her quick woman's wit, made it a stringent condition "that now papa had been so good as to buy such a pretty doll, Ellen must take her broth without saying a word to fidget him, or else surely she would be ashamed to look at his nice present."

It was the most peaceful meal that Mr. Webber had enjoyed for a long time, and he felt quite loth to leave the snug, bright room, for the cold, damp shop. He actually indulged himself in ten minutes' chat before the fire.

"But I must be off at last," he said cheerily. "Dear me, but the shop I half shrink from to-day, would have seemed a paradise to me, compared with the cold, damp outhouse I worked in, in my young days. But nobody need complain when their hard lines comes early. And as for fun and excitement, it comes natural in those rough ways. And there's worse mental exercise than pulling hard at the two ends to make them meet."

Mr. Webber was a little plain man, who did not talk immaculate grammar, and whose education was solely made of the strange odds and ends of religious magazines, mutual improvement societies, and the like. Yet the world was the better for Mr. Webber by one godly home, and one honest Christian example. "I only wish Harry was a little like him," sighed Hatty. "Every hardship would grow easy then."

Mr. Webber saw a pretty picture when he came up after tea, to release Hatty from her labours. The two younger children, weak and easily wearied, had fallen asleep on the sofa, and for their sake Hatty had put the candle behind the screen. She was seated in the firelight, with Dick beside her in the great arm-chair, which was quite roomy enough for them both. Her arm was round the boy, whose head rested on her shoulder. Mr. Webber could hear their low voices as he came softly up-stairs. Dick used to sit just so in the twilight, giving childish confidences to the mother who had been dead nearly five years already. Dick had never sat so since. His father was often sorely troubled about him. He had to be strict and severe to his boisterous lawlessness. He had to be law and justice; but it was with a forlorn sorrow that there was nobody to be restraining mercy. As the good father saw his rebel subdued for once, happy and earnest, his heart grew so full that he could trust himself to eavesdrop no longer, but dashed into the room and broke up the pretty picture.

"I wish Miss Harvey would come and live here always, instead of old Mrs. Gamm!" said the boy that night.

Hatty found Harry Westbrook awaiting her in her own home. George was out. Mrs. Harvey and Milly were both seated at needle-work with their heads bent very low. They both rose up as she entered, and left the room. As Mrs. Harvey passed out, she took Hatty's face between her hands and kissed it fervently.

Astonished, Hatty turned to Harry. His face was bright and eager, and he stretched out his hand and drew her fondly towards him.

"All the terror is over, darling," he said. "I have the offer of a good appointment. I got it through my old employer. I shall be able to marry you directly, and we shall live in such ease and luxury, for the climate is healthy and native service is cheap in the hill-country of India."

Hatty put her hand to her forehead, and her heart felt cold and dead.

"It may seem hard to you to go at first," Harry went on blithely; "but you will have me, darling. Surely you will be quite satisfied with having me, all to yourself. For my part, I am glad to go; I shall like the change, and a change for so much the better. We shall be waited on like princes, over there, Hatty. No common people always treating my beauty as an equal, and worrying her to help them out of their troubles."

Hatty drew herself away from him. Her mother or her neighbours would scarcely have known the handsome girl as she gazed at her lover then. The outlines of her face looked strong and hard. Her voice was deep and harsh.

"I cannot go with you, Harry. I cannot leave everything else. Oh, Harry, I dare say you will call me false and fickle. But I cannot—cannot—cannot leave everything else to go away with you."

He might have thought that her words could be presently combated, but there was in them a cry of agony—a tortured rending in two—which he could not mistake.

"Have not I heard you preach that man or woman should leave father and mother and cleave only to wife or husband?" he asked with a passionate bitterness.

"Yes, yes," she cried, "the Book says so, and it is so. Unless it is so there is no true marriage. Unless a woman would cheerfully follow a man to the ends of the earth, she ought not to marry him. She has not the true wife's love for him. I have loved you—yes, Harry, I have, I have—among other things. But all by yourself, I don't love you enough. I can't tell how it is, Harry, you know I'm not clever. But I'm thankful you asked me to go to India, because as I can't say 'Yes,' it shows me I'm not meant to be your wife anywhere. I hope I haven't done you any harm already, Harry, but it wouldn't undo that to do you the greatest harm of all, and go on to be your wife now I know I oughtn't to be."

"It is quite natural that you should feel leaving your mother and sister, Hatty," he pleaded, "but if you would only be patient and think of me you would be able to bear it."

"No, no," she wailed. "Perhaps I might for some people—I don't know, maybe I haven't got enough heart for such deep love. But I can't do it for you. I'd be a happier and a better woman, living here, an old maid, just going wherever she was wanted, and doing whatever nobody else cared to do. I'd have more satisfaction in that, Harry. Oh, forgive me, forgive me!"

"Shall I stay at home?" he asked mournfully. "Or shall I go away there till I have earned some money, and then come home again and try to settle down?"

"Not for me!" she said. "This has come like a flash of lightning, and shown us what a dangerous way we are in. Because the lightning goes out the way doesn't get safer, Harry. If this had not come to test us, Harry, I might have married you, and lived to grow what you wouldn't like, nor God either."

"And you don't think you'll miss me when I'm gone?" he pleaded.

"I shall! I know I shall," she owned with a burst of tears. "But I don't know that I shall miss you more than I should what I should leave if I went with you."

"I think you are putting too much stress upon very natural feelings," Harry observed, more hopefully. "I dare say most women who have gone with their husbands to foreign lands heartily wish themselves at home again, and wonder how they could have come away. Yet it is but simple home-sickness, and wears away in time."

"Yes, yes, Harry," she interrupted; "I know it is so. I have heard mother say that one may often wonder how one had strength for this or that, and feel that one couldn't have it again. But then one had it at the time it was wanted, and one thanks God for that. I haven't it, Harry. I've felt for a long time that this was coming somehow."

"What! that you meant to give me up?" he said, stepping back, stung.

"No," she said; "but I've felt something was wrong. Life didn't fit me, and I don't think it really fitted you either."

They sat silent. Both their heads were buried in their hands, and great tears kept falling on the table between Hatty's fingers.

She looked up at last.

"When do you go?" she asked.

"In five weeks' time," he answered heavily. "I am required to leave for Southampton the day after to-morrow. I meant to return here to be married last thing before I sailed."

Another silence.

"You'll want a great outfit," she said.

"Yes," he replied; "it will be easily bought. My new master makes an allowance for that. He would have made an allowance for you too."

"Harry," said Hatty eagerly, "don't buy everything. Let me do some sewing for you—it will show me that you forgive me."

He looked at her earnestly.

"You shall have some, Hatty," he said. "That shows me you mean all you're saying. I believe that—you do love me—but not in the wife's way. Make me up anything you like, and send it to my lodgings. I'll say good-bye now. Don't speak another word. And don't come out to the door. I can't stand it."

She sat still where she was, till she heard the street door close, and his heavy footsteps pass the little courtyard. She still sat motionless, till her mother and Milly came creeping back with eyes full of tearful interrogations.

"Harry is gone," she said quietly. "It is all over. I could not go away with him. Don't talk to me about it."

And she rose and went away to her own dark chamber, and did not come in again to supper.

But next morning she prepared breakfast as usual, and then went out and bought some fine linen, and set herself diligently to make it up into the most elaborate shirts. It was the dainty shroud of a still-born love.

She did not see Harry Westbrook again before he sailed. A little note from him acknowledged the receipt of her farewell gift. Mrs. Harvey, Milly, and even George, all read it. Anybody might have done so.

"MY DEAR HARRIET,—Thank you for your token of remembrance. You have always been very good to me, as you are to everybody, and I shall owe you much of my pleasantest recollection of England. As for what is bitter, you would not have given it me but in kindness, and I hope it will do me good, that you need never feel that you did anything but what was right. My best love to all, and "I remain, always yours gratefully,

"HARRY WESTBROOK."

"There must be a great deal of good in him, after all," said Mrs. Harvey wistfully.

"Yes, very likely, if you stirred him well up," commented vigorous Miss Brook. "The worst of the people with a great deal of good in them is, that few are ready to tell 'em there's more evil! Our Hatty has been a true friend to Henry Westbrook."

Good Miss Brook's active interest in the Harvey household was rewarded by a sweet sense of property therein. Between Mrs. Harvey and her the children were always "ours."

The mother had no more reason to fear any flights or vagaries in Hatty. Her life had had that priceless touch of responsibility and sorrow, which gave her ripening beauty a sweet, womanly sedateness, and shamed away the light, shallow love which had before haunted her footsteps. As months and months went by, and she still remained so serenely sober, so solitary among her old associations, Mrs. Harvey actually began to think that after all Hatty might become an old maid.

To be sure, George and Milly had got into such a habit of laughing over Hatty's lovers, that they could not leave it off, but must sometimes twit her about Mr. Webber, and the regularity with which he kept her supplied with a loan of Sunday books. Hatty bore it with her old patience for a long while, but at last she flushed tearfully, and sobbed—

"That she had let them laugh about a good many, and they might, as long as they liked; but they had no right to make game of a good, serious man, like Mr. Webber."

"Certainly not," chimed in Mrs. Harvey, quite innocently. "It is natural that Hatty should not like to hear any foolery, about an old friend, for whom she has such a deserved respect."

She was still as profoundly innocent, when one evening, Mr. Webber called and inquired pointedly for Mrs. Harvey.

"Something about that delicate little daughter of his," said the good lady, as she adjusted her cap and bustled to receive him, only to be confounded by such incoherent speech as this.

"Your daughter Harriet—have long seen her inestimable value—am not young—nor at all worthy. But she says she can look over that. My dear children's best interests safe in her kind hands. Home like home again. My boy Dick worships her. So good, she would not make a fuss about anything, but shall have new carpets and papers, and everything right. May suit her better than a younger man. She says she can honour me—I don't know what for. Hope you will pardon what must seem like impudence in a widower and middle-aged, but we both want your blessing, and I'll do my duty to your child, as I know she'll do the same by mine."

"And can you really love him better than poor Harry?" Milly asked in another chamber conference.

"I know I'd go to Van Dieman's Land with James Webber if he asked me," said Hatty bravely, with a strong light in her beautiful eyes, and a tender quiver round her mouth. "James Webber carries God in his heart, and that would make it home wherever he went."

There was a quiet wedding, with Milly and little Nelly Webber for bridesmaids, and then the wedded pair took the three step-children with them on their week's honeymoon at Richmond. There was no such long difference between the ages of the husband and wife as to make a romance or a scandal. She was twenty-two and he was thirty-eight.

Miss Brook officiated at the marriage, terrible in an old brocade that had done service in the days of her youth. She went through the ceremony so diligently that she even echoed the portions set apart for the bride and bridegroom.

She drove home in the same fly with Mrs. Harvey, and could not resist making a few personal observations.

"Ain't you sorry now that Hatty put such a many stakes down in her own place, that she couldn't strike tents and off at any word like a marching soldier? Can't you see now, that them God doesn't give much romanticalness to are just those that haven't got what is necessary to keep romanticalness from being sheer rubbish? Can't you see now that from every temptation God makes the way of escape suitable to the nature He offers it to? Is He a mocker that He should bid a rabbit save its life by running up a tree, and a cat by burrowing in the ground?"

And so Hatty settled down to the homely, loving life that was fittest to bring out the best of her, and to make her of most service to God in this world.

HENRY LAWRENCE.

FIRST PAPER.

IN the year 1855 Sir Henry Lawrence paid the last of his rare visits to Calcutta. Emphatically a man of action, whether as a soldier, a "political" in the Anglo-Indian sense, or an administrator, he had spent the thirty years of his brilliant career in the swamps of Arakan, the villages of the north-western provinces, the passes and forts of Afghanistan, the solitude of the valleys of Nepal, the court and camps of the Punjab, and the arid wastes of Rajpootana, relieved only by a few weeks rest in the cool heights of Mount Aboo. He was known personally to few of those in the great cities who, whether Englishmen or natives, form the public opinion of India. But his name had for some time been in every mouth. Keen interest was felt in the man who, having helped Lord Hardinge to win the first Punjab War, and having prevented the second from being attended by disaster at Chillianwala, had converted the turbulent brotherhood of Sikh prætorians into sturdy peasants or contented landlords, and yet had given way to his younger brother, John, as ruler of our new frontier province. The Marquis of Dalhousie was at the height of his well-deserved fame as Governor-General. But all the circumstances which a year before had led him to transfer Sir Henry Lawrence from Lahore to the inferior appointment of Agent for the states of Rajpootana, were not known, and especially throughout the Indian Army keen sympathy was felt with the officer who had been thus superseded. Not only they who thus sympathized, but all officials who had long admired Sir Henry for his own sake, united to do him honour in a banquet, public enough to be thoroughly representative, but not so public as to chill the flow of private friendship, or check the expression of frank admiration.

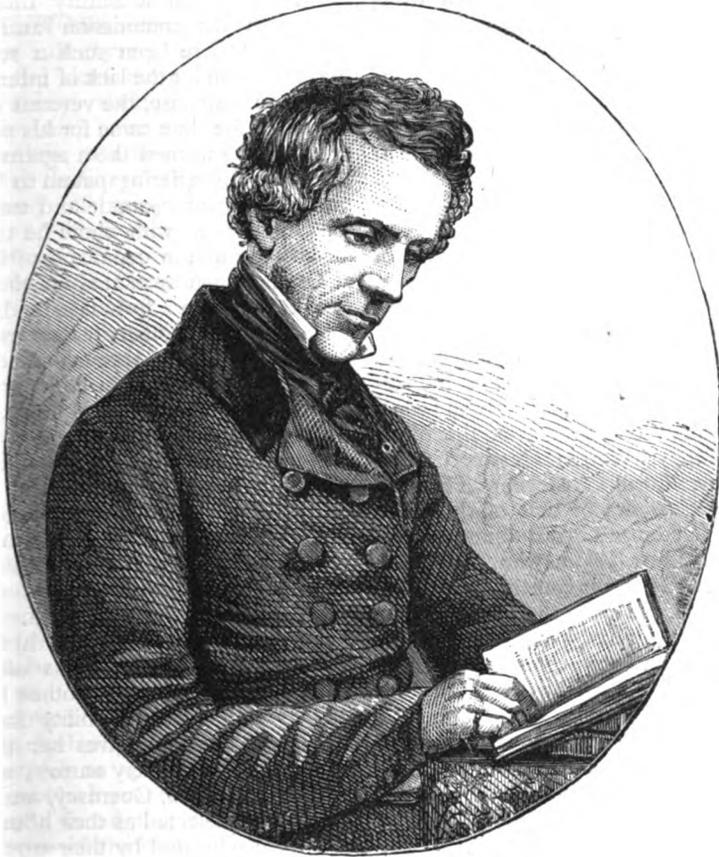

But Sir Henry Lawrence was something more and higher than a great soldier and administrator. He was remarkable in both capacities, because the root of his nature lay deep in Christ. While his brother officers and civilians crowded to recognise in him their professional ideal, there were some who knew his inner life and the true secret of that influence which radiated from him; there were many who saw in him chiefly the beneficent philanthropist, the friend of the poor, the helper of the needy, the pattern of self-denial. The day of the banquet given in his honour by the "Services" he spent with me in visiting the various charities and schools of Calcutta, happily abundant in both, to which he had been long a subscriber. He knew well that there is a wise as well as a foolish way of spending money in seeking to do good, and in all the cases on which he spent the bulk of his income he sought by personal knowledge, or by means of those friends whom he employed as his almoners, to secure the wise way. On this occasion he was chiefly interested in the children of poor European parents, and in that class of East Indians, the descendants of English fathers and native mothers, who are often neglected. The same spirit which led him to establish for soldiers' children the noble Asylums that bear his name, prompted him all through his career to care for the class of adventurers, the runaway sons who used to enlist in the East India Company's armies before the colonies offered a healthier outlet to adventurous spirits. Of this class, and of individuals whom he had secretly assisted ever since he had been a Revenue Surveyor, we talked much, and he expressed to me his intention to follow up his earliest production, "The Adventurer in the Punjab," by a work on European blackguards in India. He used the term humorously and kindly, including in it the soldiers of fortune, French as well as English, who had fought in the service of native chiefs, as well as those poor "loafers," vagabond sailors, soldiers, and Australian grooms, whose increasing numbers have since caused so much political difficulty and moral scandal as to necessitate the interference of the legislature.

I had corresponded with Sir Henry Lawrence for some time, and had formed my own idea of the personnel of the man whose impetuous but shrewd benevolence, whose literary enthusiasm tempered by the grace of his noble wife, and whose eagerness as an Indian political reformer, I had good reason to know. But I was not prepared for the tall form, the gaunt features, the almost wasted face, and grizzly hair, which gave him the ascetic stamp of the old Puritan till the soul within spiritualised his expression. What the fever of Arakan began in the young lieutenant, marring his features and to some extent his form, was intensified by hard work and occasional disappointment in a tropical climate. A few months before this his wife had been taken from him. The time had even now come for that sick leave to England which the doctors had often pressed upon him, and which his appointment as Chief Commissioner of Oudh the year after prevented him from taking. The photograph taken of him when he first went to Oudh, and engraved in Rees' "Narrative of the Siege of Lucknow," unfortunately remains the only published portrait of one who has justly been termed the greatest man England has ever sent to India. His recently published "Life," by his friend and disciple, Sir Herbert Edwardes, completed by Mr. Herman Merivale, for which the public has so long waited, does not contain a portrait such as we trust the publishers will yet supply. If a biography is valuable in proportion as it represents what its subject was, as well as what he did, then it is deeply to be regretted that Sir Herbert Edwardes did not live to complete his labour of love. Rarely has so valuable an addition been made to religious or to Anglo-Indian biography as the first volume of this work. It is unfortunate that the tale of Sir Henry

Lawrence's administration of the Punjab and removal to Rajpootana, and the story of the Mutiny in Oudh crowned by that death-bed in the Baillie Guard of the Lucknow Residency, has not been told by the man who was, next to the brothers Lawrence, facile princeps among the statesmen of the Punjab, who kept the gate of India at Peshawur against all odds in '57, and who belonged to the same school of catholic-evangelicals as his great master. As it is, when the unaccountable errors which disfigure the second volume have been removed, the book will be worthy to rank with Sir John Kaye's "Lives of Indian Officers." It should be studied, especially by young men, along with such biographies as Mr. Marshman's "Life of Havelock," and the memoir of the good and the wise Bishop Cotton, by his widow.

Henry Lawrence was an Irishman, but of the Scotch-Protestant type. Those who are curious in such matters will observe that the three countries divide very fairly among them the distinguished men who have won and built up our Indian empire. Clive and Warren Hastings were purely English, while Lord William Bentinck—like the present Governor-General, Lord Northbrook—was of Anglo-Dutch descent. Lord Minto, who has never received justice; the Marquis of Hastings, whose long administration was so brilliant; and the Marquis of Dalhousie, who excelled even that nobleman in his services to the empire and to humanity, are claimed by Scotland. But it is to Ireland that we must give the honour of having sent to India the Marquis Wellesley, who, though overshadowed in the eyes of Europe by his younger brother, the Duke of Wellington, was the "glorious little man" of Indian contemporaries like Metcalfe and Malcolm. To Ireland also we owe the Lawrences—George, Henry, and John. The first, less known in this country than his younger brothers, has won a solid reputation alike as a soldier, a "political," and a captive in the Afghan War, and as Henry's successor in the control of the eighteen principalities of Rajpootana. He is still spared to enjoy retirement in England, where he proves himself worthy of his name by assisting in movements for the spiritual and moral good of the soldier. The story of Henry and of John seems even more romantic than that of the Westminster schoolboys, Warren Hastings, Chief Justice Impey, Lord Chancellor Thurlow, and the poet Cowper; or that of the three Christ Church students, Lord Dalhousie, Lord Canning, and Lord Elgin, who succeeded each other as Governor-General of India. Henry Lawrence, the artillery officer, fevered by the swamps of Arakan, came home to find his younger brother, John, eager to go out to India as a soldier. Dissuaded from this by his brother, John landed in Calcutta in the civil service, and, other things being equal, by that one fact gained the start and distanced his elder brother in the honours of life. So important was it, so valuable is it still, to be a "covenanted" civilian rather than a soldier in the East. Henry found himself ousted from the Punjab by the brother whom he had as his colleague in the Board of Administration, and honourably enough so far as that brother was concerned. When the supreme crisis of the Mutiny came John was Chief Commissioner of the Punjab, and Henry had at last been appointed by Lord Canning Chief Commissioner of Oudh. Henry was the one man in India to whom England looked as the successor of Lord Canning, and Lord Palmerston nominated him Provisional Governor-General. But death carried off the elder brother before he could fill the highest position, for good or evil, that a subject of the British Crown can hold; and on Lord Elgin's death the same Premier appointed John, who after a few years' term as Viceroy was raised to the peerage, and still enjoys his well-won rewards.

Alexander, the father of the Lawrences, was the youngest son of a mill-owner in Coleraine. He was worthy of such sons. When just seventeen he went off to India as a military volunteer. There he so served for a quarter of a century that he would have won his commission and a Victoria Cross, had there been such a reward, many times over but for the lack of interest. Forced at last to purchase, the veteran was soured, and when the time came for his sons to enter the army he warned them against the Royal Service. From Seringapatam to Waterloo he proved a worthy comrade and subordinate of the Great Duke, with whom he remonstrated for keeping him in command of his regiment at Ostend when he panted for the front. Nor were the boys less fortunate in their mother, a Knox, and a collateral descendant of the Scottish Reformer, through Andrew Knox, Bishop of the Isles. In their long roamings over India and Ceylon, and during occasional visits to England, this couple were blessed with twelve children, of whom the three boys and their eldest sister, Letitia, concern us most. Henry Montgomery Lawrence was his mother's jewel, being described by her as her Matura diamond, in allusion to his birthplace, which is known for its precious stones. He was born on 28th June, 1806. What with their father's grievance and his sometimes thoughtless generosity to his old comrades and their families, their mother had need of all that administrative ability for which her son Henry so fondly gives her credit. The family income was very narrow, and, on their return to England, Guernsey, and afterwards Clifton, was selected as their home. But the boys were educated by their uncle, the Rev. James Knox, who was head-master of the Foyle College, at Derry, a town ever since associated with the Lawrences, and justly proud of their reputation. There Henry was remarkable for his love of truth-telling even to his own hurt, and for the thoughtfulness of his character. Mrs. Lawrence was fortunate not only as a manager, but in her relation as cousin to Mr. Huddleston, who was both an East India director and a member of Parliament. This good man, who had been the intimate friend of the missionary Schwartz, in Tanjore, liberally provided cadetships and a writership for the Lawrence boys, the last falling to John. Henry chivalrously refused any appointment which did not involve an examination, and hence he passed for the Artillery, lest it should be said that no Lawrence could face an examination. He left behind him at Addiscombe the reputation of being "backward and slow." Both he and John were wont to confess that they were dull at scholarly studies, and that their education had been neglected. But Henry came out the first of his year. His so-called slowness seems to have been due to that habit which was the secret of his success. He was what the Germans call "grundlich," refusing to advance till he had thoroughly mastered every step, always seeking the causes of things. It is true, however, that competitive examinations, as now conducted, would have deprived India of Henry and John Lawrence, and of many of their great predecessors. There was at least one man who foresaw Henry's future. When Letitia, the beloved elder sister and companion, was so bemoaning her brother's approaching departure that he proposed to take her with him, and set up a school or a shop in the Himalayas, Mr. Huddleston said, "You foolish thing, Henry will distinguish himself. All your brothers will do well, I think; but Henry has such steadiness and resolution that you'll see him come back a general. He will be Sir Henry Lawrence before he dies." So away from Clifton one September morning, leaving the young ones in bed, and parting with his sister on Brandon Hill! His mother's counsel is characteristic of both, and tells of a life of struggling, not unmingled with happiness. "I know you don't like advice, so I will not give you much. But, pray, recollect two things. Don't marry a woman who had not a good mother; and don't be too ready to speak your mind. It was the rock on which your father shipwrecked his prospects." In all this we have as yet hardly a glimpse of the higher life. But Sir Herbert Edwardes tells us that the mother had inherited no small share of John Knox's "strong, God-fearing character," and we know that Letitia, the sister, prayed much for her favourite brother, that he might be led into all truth. We learn afterwards, too, that the scarred old Colonel, the victim of many wrongs, and oft grumbling over his grievances, found before his death their true remedy in the love of Him who bears every burden, a fact which Henry joyfully records.

It was in 1823, towards the close of the cold season in February, that Henry Lawrence joined the head-quarters of the Bengal Artillery at Dum Dum, now almost a suburb of Calcutta. Two or three months later there landed with his regiment at the same place a young officer of the Royal Service, who, on the soldier side of his character, so resembled Lawrence—Henry Havelock. Both saw their first campaign in the Burmese War, which was already brewing. Both came under spiritual influences at once, Havelock in the saintly circle of Baptists at Serampore, Lawrence among the Church of England evangelicals at Dum Dum and Calcutta. Both took part in the Afghan conflicts. And both, by very different paths, found a soldier's grave in '57, Lawrence in the hallowed ground of the beleaguered Residency of Lucknow, Havelock in the then fortified garden of Dilkooshah, from which he had advanced to the relief of that Residency. When Henry Lawrence had time to look from professional details to the society around him, he found that some of his most intimate companions at Addiscombe, who had landed a few weeks before him, had undergone a change. One especially, named Lewin, was a new man altogether. We find Henry writing again and again of this change to his sister. In a letter dated eight months after his arrival he recurs to it as something at once marvellous and worthy of his own imitation, but yet hardly attainable by himself. "Lewin has turned an excellent religious young fellow," writes the lieutenant of seventeen. And again: "There is a play here to-night, but as I did not feel inclined to go, I took tea with Lewin, and am just returned home. It is really wonderful to me the conversion of Lewin, having known him as a worldly-minded lad. His whole thoughts seem now to be of what good he can do. I only wish I was like him." The occasion of the change was this. The Rev. George Craufurd, who still lives, and now holds the family baronetcy as Sir George Craufurd, had gone out in the same ship with Lewin and the other cadets, as assistant chaplain to the Rev. Thomas Thomason. With the cadets was Lawrence's friend, James Thomason, afterwards the great Lieutenant-Governor of the North-Western Provinces, whose admiring disciple in all things, Sir William Muir, still rules in his spirit over the thirty millions of Hindostan proper. Sir George Craufurd's name is one henceforth to be remembered with those of the Simeonites, Brown, Corrie, Henry Martyn, Bishop Wilson, and Bishop Dealtry, who, with the Serampore and the Scotch missionaries, have made India spiritually what it is, and what it promises to be.

Not only as the father in Christ of Henry Lawrence and others, but as the man who first asserted religious liberty for the Sepoys, ought the name of Sir George Craufurd to be recorded. The story has a sad interest since the Mutiny, and we may tell it in passing.

When chaplain at Allahabad in 1830, Sir George Craufurd was visited in his own house by Sepoys curious about the Christian religion. Assisted by a Mirza, his catechist, Sir George finally accepted their written invitation to teach the Church Catechism in the lines. The Major commanding, excited by the dread of insubordination, interfered. The General, much better disposed, laughingly permitted the chaplain to teach only such Sepoys as chose to visit him privately. The result was the application of several for baptism. Lord William Bentinck, the Governor-General, overborne by his advisers, it was thought, had ordered Archdeacon Corrie to forbid the visiting of the native soldiers in their lines. But when the question of baptism arose the matter seemed more serious. It is deeply to be lamented that two such men as Lord William Bentinck and Archdeacon Corrie went so far as to prevent the baptism of Sepoys; and the former issued that order prohibiting all chaplains from speaking to native soldiers on the subject of religion, which did so much to foster the ignorance that ended in the Mutiny. Even after the abolition of the East India Company, Lord Canning rebuked a civilian for attending the baptism of a Sepoy, and forbade Colonel Wheeler to preach. Since that time, however, missionaries like Mr. Clark and his wife have been allowed to evangelize the Muzzbee regiment of Sikhs, low caste men. But the disgraceful and inexpedient order of Lord William Bentinck's government still remains in force, so far as I know.

The prayers of Lewin, his companion, and the labours of Craufurd were blessed in time to the conversion of Henry Lawrence. Very slowly does Lawrence seem to have opened his reserved and questioning heart to the influences of that circle. At last we find him reaching this point in his intercourse with the chaplain: "What I want to be assured of is that this Book is God's. Because when I know that, I have nothing left but to obey it." On the Christmas-day of 1823 we find this joyous entry in Lewin's journal: "Lawrence took the sacrament; God bless him now and for evermore." On the subsequent 17th of April the words occur, "I have been greatly pleased to-day to see dear Lawrence reading his Bible considerably." The good seed was then sown.

The cold season of 1823-24 was passed amid preparations for a war with Burma. The first half of the eighteenth century, or from the death of Aurungzebe, about the time of the union of Scotland and England, to Clive's victory of Plassey, was the period of anarchy in India. All, Mussulman and Hindoo, Mahratta and Rajpoot, English and French, sought to keep what they had got, and more or less consciously, on our part at least, to obtain supremacy. The Mussulman was effete. The Hindoo had no power of recuperation, and sought only, as in Rajpootana, to be protected from his enemies. The Mahrattas, themselves Hindoos, were the most formidable—a veritable scourge of God. Of the European powers then trading in India the Portuguese were as hopeless as the Mussulman, while the Dutch had only sought gain in the paradise of the Eastern Archipelago, which their culture system still oppresses. The peninsula lay open to the English and French. But the latter, in spite of great names like La Bourdonnais and Dupleix, were not supported, save by Colbert for a time, at home; and their designs were of the purely selfish military class. Whether deserving it or not, England was used to save society, and all who, like the princes of Rajpootana and the Nizam of Hyderabad, clung to the English were preserved, and have been fossilised to this hour. While India proper was thus seething, what the ancients called India beyond the Ganges was undergoing a similar revolution. The robber-chief Alompra founded in the valley of the Irrawaddy that house whose ambassadors have lately come from the Viceroy's to the foot of the Queen's throne. For years the dynasty of Alompra had, from Ava, their capital, insulted the English Governor-General, who had sent envoys to the Golden Foot, but had otherwise been too busy to think of Burma. In an evil moment the Burmese not only claimed, but invaded Assam and Cachar. The empire had enjoyed five years peace, the treasury was full, and Lord Amherst, the weakest of Governors next to Lord Auckland, was in power. So a two years' war was waged and brought to a successful issue; thanks to Sir Thomas Munro, the great Governor of Madras. Henry Lawrence and his guns formed part of the Chittagong column which, under General Morrison, crossed the jungles and hills of Arakan and took its capital. What Henry Lawrence did with a volume of Scott's

Bible, given him by the chaplain as his companion, we have not space to tell. Havelock, with the main army, seeing that there was no chaplain at all with the force, converted a cloister of the great Shoay Dagon pagoda of Rangoon into a church, and there, by the light of a lamp placed in the lap of the images of Gautama that lined the walls, he ministered to the soldiers of H.M.'s 13th. The hot weather of 1825 came, and even by May of that year the early rainy season of Burma was upon our troops. As Havelock, the historian of the war, records, "In a month General Morrison had no longer an army." Of all the artillery officers, only Henry Lawrence and his colonel were fit for duty, and the former received his first promotion as adjutant. But there he too was struck down, and after being nursed in Calcutta by Mr. Craufurd, he was ordered to England. In May, 1827, we find this noble testimony from a mother in her journal:—"Returned from Arracan after the Burmese war, my dearest beloved, Henry Montgomery, not twenty-one years old, but reduced by sickness and suffering to more than double that age. Self-denial and affection to his whole family were ever the prominent features of his character."

Who shall describe the joys of the first visit home of the Indian exile? Yet that is an easier task than the attempt to picture the other side of the poetry of Anglo-Indian life—the separation of husband and wife, of parents and children, of the friends of youth and of manhood, often for long years. That, and nothing else, is the price we pay for India, for death is less bitter. That Henry Lawrence was changed in other respects than in form was soon apparent. His first act was to consult his sister Letitia about family prayers. After some surprise on the part of the household, he brought out his Scott's Bible, and from that day there was an altar in the house. This holiday of two years and a half was memorable for some things. Notably, with his sister's companionship and the spiritual privileges, which he enjoyed alike at Clifton and when he visited the north of Ireland, he grew in grace. Hard by his father's house, Robert Hall's preaching was sounding forth, and drawing good men of all sects to listen. His younger brother John was grumbling that Mr. Huddleston had presented him with an appointment to the Bengal Civil Service, instead of giving him the chance of becoming a soldier, like his seniors. He admired the young hero of the Burmese War, and could not understand why that somewhat stern person should side with his father in the advice—"If you want to be independent, be a civilian." So to Haileybury the future viceroy went, but not before he had often helped Henry to carry the delicate Letitia up the hills from Clifton, to be in time for the preaching of Robert Hall. A picture worthy of a place in the Anglo-Indian historical gallery—the embryo soldier-statesman, one to have the viceroy's throne in his gift, the other to fill it for five years, and both to save an empire, while acknowledging in all humility Him who had called them.

When, in one of those fits of home-sickness which so often recur in India, Henry had pined for the society of those he loved, he thought only of mother and sister. But now he had his wish fulfilled in an even higher form. He met his cousin, his sister's friend, Honoria Marshall, a fair Irish girl, once, twice, and again; and he made many inquiries as to her training, her tastes, the books she liked to read. The result was such an exalted opinion of her, and so humble an idea of himself in relation to her, that he returned to India without opening his heart to her. Aunt Angel, who figures much and lovingly in the early part of Sir Herbert Edwards's volume, pronounced marriage at that time most imprudent—"they were little better than children." There was another reason for his silence: his dream was to create a pious fund for his father and mother. The old colonel had steadily refused all assistance, even from his sons; but that could not always be. To marry now would be selfishly to neglect a sacred duty, and so, hating scenes, he parts with Honoria deliberately, "on the steps of a shilling show" in Regent Street, as his friend and biographer expresses it. With the Arakan fever not quite extirpated, as it never was, he and John sail for India, and after a five months' voyage reach Calcutta in February, 1830. Months passed on in the study of Persian and Hindostanee at Kurónal, varied by riding lessons, which fitted him for many a long journey in after days. Soon John was appointed to Delhi, within a few hours' distance of both his elder brothers, and Henry was transferred to the Horse Artillery. A year or two passed; good appointments so came to him and his brothers, as the result of hard work, that the pious fund grew apace, and he begins to wonder if now he dare ask Honoria Marshall to be his wife. He dares, humbly, almost despairingly; and in 1837 she lands at Calcutta, only to find that there is no bridegroom. Illness had driven him to the hills, and her letters to him had miscarried. But when the news reached him at Simla, in August, the worst season, he soon made her his own.

Only those who have been privileged to witness their family life can tell all that Lady Lawrence proved to be to her husband. She was a woman of high culture and refined taste. Her literary productions were excellent, some of her letters, now published for the first time, cannot be surpassed. The poetry of her prose articles in the Calcutta Review, especially on such subjects as the Englishwoman in India, married life in India, and the sick-room in India, is exquisite. Her influence on his intense earnest temper was purifying. A true soldier's wife, she ever strung up his nature to meet the call of duty, the claims of affection, and the appeals of neediness, while she gently turned away his spirit from dwelling too long on slights and wrongs. In the one instance recorded by Sir Herbert Edwardes, in which the old temper burned so fiercely as to threaten a duel with an officer who had attacked his honour in its keenest part, she wrote him a letter, touching in its pathos and almost sublime in its appeals, and that only a fortnight after the birth of their first child. The sin was averted by the decision of his brother officers, that a challenge was quite unnecessary, the opinion of the army being with him in the dispute. At a later period we find their positions changed to that which is more becoming, the husband determined on a deed of heroic self-sacrifice, and the distant wife, doubtful at first, but soon encouraging him to the venture.

When in 1842 Henry Lawrence was with Pollock's avenging force at Oosman Khan's Fort, fourteen miles in advance of Jellalabad, Akbar Khan sent a second message, offering to give up the English captives if Pollock would retire at once and release the Afghan prisoners. George Lawrence, a captive, was employed as one of the envoys, in the hope that he would influence his brother and the general to consent. The message was returned, that our force would advance, and the ladies must be sent in at once. With this George had to return to what seemed death at the hands of the murderer of Sir W. Macnaghten. Henry nevertheless volunteered to return in George's place, assured that his wife would approve. He had not mistaken her. Four letters, dispatched to her husband on the 17th, 18th, 19th, and 20th of August, record an incident unmatched in the annals of heroism. The first and most doubting thus begins:—"And you offered to go in the stead of George, darling? I am glad you did it, and I am glad there was no time to ask me, lest my heart should have failed." The next is more assured:—"Yes, you see I did say you were right in offering to go, and furthermore I shall say you are right if you do go to Cabul." In the two next she rises to the full height of the self-sacrifice.

"August 19.—Last night I was a long time awake, and felt great delight thinking of your offer for your brother, and how pleasing it must be in the sight of our great Redeemer, who gave himself in the stead of his enemies, that they might be made his friends, even his brothers. . . . The vivid feeling brought to my heart by your love and disinterestedness helped me more feelingly than I ever did before to thank Jesus Christ for what He did for our race, and for each individual of it."

"August 20.—And now, my husband, listen to what I say, for it is the steadfast purpose of my heart. You have more than my acquiescence in your changing places with George. Besides which, I cannot but feel that there is not an officer now in Afghanistan who may not be made a prisoner. Therefore, my Henry, if so it be your lot, your wife will be with you."

But George was worthy of such a brother, to whose wife he writes, "We return to-morrow Cabul-wards; Henry, as usual, volunteering to go for me, but this I could not allow." The life of Lady Lawrence is an example to every woman in India.

ONE WITH THEE.

NEARER, nearer, heavenly Saviour,
Draw my cold, unwilling soul—
Closer, ever closer, hold me,
Till Thy touch have made me whole:
Oh, to think that I may be,
Blessed Jesus, one with Thee!

When the world my love allureth,
When I say to Thee, "Depart,"
Heed me not, but let Thy sunshine
Melt my hard ungrateful heart:
Till, like birds beneath the wing,
Unto Thee I turn and cling.

If the flesh, O Lord, should tempt me,
Show Thy wounds in foot and hand;
With the look that softened Peter,
Lord, before my spirit stand,
Till all dark deeds I forsake,
Loathing each for Thy dear sake.

When the devil strives to win me,
Hide me, hide me, Saviour blest—
Draw me, in a closer union,
Closer to Thy heavenly breast:
For no evil thing shall e'er
Reach the soul that's anchored there.

OUR DISTRICT.

By A RIVER-SIDE VISITOR.

II.—FAIRY ARMSTRONG.

T was on one of the occasions when it fell to us, to give out the "treat" tickets to the Sunday-school scholars that we first noticed Fairy Armstrong. We say noticed, for as at that time she had been five weeks at the school, we had of course seen the blue-eyed, golden-haired little creature before, but it was only now that she attracted our special interest. On many a young face beside hers there were signs of a struggle between hope and doubt, but on no other face was it so plainly or painfully visible as upon hers; no other face struck us as so expressive. While yet some half-dozen children from her, as we passed along the row in which she stood, we caught her bright blue eyes fixed intently upon us, and saw that she was flushed and panting with excitement. As we came nearer to her, her excitement increased until, by the time we reached her side, her cheeks were all aflame. Her name was not on the list, and the instant we had passed her, her face grew suddenly pale, her head drooped, and though she bit her lips and struggled to "be hard," two great tears welled into her eyes. But, as we were pleased to notice, she did not mutter or grumble, or assume an injured or defiant air, as was the wont of the disappointed. Favouritism in dealing with children is, we know, a bad thing; but we are afraid that some little degree of it is natural. We knew that we were "favouring" Fairy Armstrong, and that it was wrong to do so, but we felt that we must do it.

When we had finished we went back to the governess, and, indicating Fairy Armstrong by a motion of the head, asked—

"Who is that little girl?"

"Her name is Annie Armstrong," answered the governess, "though I generally hear the other children calling her 'Fairy.'"

"Well, she is a fairy-like little creature," we said, glancing towards her as we spoke.

"Yes, she certainly is a pretty child," agreed the governess, with a smile; "still, I should hardly think the name had been bestowed upon her on that ground alone. Here, Smith," she went on, beckoning to one of the scholars. "Why do you other children call Armstrong 'Fairy?'"

"Which I don't call her it more'n others," answered the girl, who evidently had an idea that she had been called up to be reprimanded.

"I don't suppose you do," said the governess; "but why do you call her so at all?"

"Well, 'cos she's one on 'em, I spose," was the to us unintelligible reply.

"I don't know what you mean. One what?" urged the governess.

"One fairy, or whatever you calls 'em, in the pantermine, you know, all in white, and as if they wos in the air like. My brother Bill took me last year, and I seed her myself."

"Oh, and that is why you call her Fairy?"

"Yes, and some calls her 'Paper Wings,' and some 'Spangles.' She gets called all sorts of names, but not spiteful uns, like some is called; none on us means no harm to her; we like her, and she don't mind."

"Poor little thing!" we said, referring to Fairy, when the other girl had gone back to her class, "she seems sadly cut up at not getting a ticket; we can't help feeling sorry for her, and if it was a matter of payment we would willingly pay for her."

We were feeling our way, but the governess making no response, we were constrained to speak plainly.

"Come," we said, "let us intercede for her; if it is not altogether against law and precedent, you might give her a ticket."

"I have to be very careful in such matters," she answered; "still, the point is discretionary, and as she has been a very good little girl while she has been here, I'll see what I can do. Armstrong, come here," and when Fairy was nearer she asked, "How long have you come to Sunday-school?"

"This makes the sixth Sunday, please," she answered.

"And you came on purpose to get a ticket for the treat? At any rate, that was what you thought most about, wasn't it, now?" she went on, softening her question a little on seeing that the child remained silent.

This time she paused firmly for a reply, and at length Fairy stammered out—

"Yes, governess."

"And now that you haven't got a ticket you won't come to school any more, eh?"

"Yes, I will, governess," she answered; "I like school." And now she spoke steadily enough, and, raising her head, looked the governess in the face. "I will, indeed," she added earnestly, after a moment's pause, seeing that the other remained silent.

"I believe you will," said the governess, laying her hand kindly upon the child's head; "you are a good girl, Annie. Always tell the truth as you have done to-day. I would have known that it was the thought of getting a ticket that had brought you here, even if you had said it was not. If you had denied it I would have thought you a story-telling girl, now I know you are a truthful one—and you shall have a ticket."

The revulsion of feeling which this announcement produced was almost too much for Fairy; it put her beyond speaking her thanks, but the fervent expression of delight and gratitude that overspread her countenance was a thing to remember—and treasure.

On the day of the treat we kept an especial look out for Fairy. She was one of the first to arrive at the school, and came radiant in smiles—and red ribbons. Her dress was clean and comfortable, but it could certainly not have been described as neat. Most people, even without knowing that she had been upon the stage, would have been disposed to pronounce it stagey. Her well-worn frock of dead white muslin was low-necked and short-skirted, her stockings too were white, and she wore a pair of shiny "sandal" shoes; all the rest of her seemed red. There were red bows at her shoes, a red bow at her breast, her waist was encircled, and her hat heavily trimmed, with red ribbon; she had a little red worsted shawl over her left arm, and the paper flag that she carried—it was a custom with the children to provide themselves with small paper flags on these occasions—was also red.

"Here you are then, Annie," we said, as she took her place in the class; "why you are a regular little Red Riding Hood."

She looked puzzled for a moment, and then, her face brightening, she answered with a volubility arising out of her state of excitement—

"Oh, I know, sir! the little girl in the story; dad's told me about it; he knows lots of stories. We had the ribbon by us," she went on, glancing down at her shoe bows, "and dad said I should wear it; he likes me to look nice."

Her faith in "dad's" taste and in "dad" generally was evidently unbounded, and as it was not for us to say anything reflecting upon the correctness of his taste, we passed on to other children, leaving Fairy proud and happy in her too-liberal adornment of red.

The treat ground this year was a lovely common some sixteen miles south-west of London; and here Fairy enjoyed herself with a thoroughness and abandon that was specially noticeable even in a scene in which hearty enjoyment was the prevailing feature. She raced on the grass, flitted about flower gathering among the underwood, led mimic battles in which the combatants lightly pelted each other with fir cones, and, conspicuous by her red ribbons, skipped and danced about in all directions in wild exuberance of spirits—

"Turning to mirth all things of earth
As only childhood can."

She was nine years old, the governess informed us, in reply to a question, and she was little for her age; but when tea time came she was quite motherly in helping to look after the younger children, and was most unselfish in giving way to others.

In preparing for the return journey she showed the same spirit, "making room" for others time after time, until in the end she found herself squeezed into a corner of the van in most uncomfortable fashion. Seeing this, we lifted her out of that vehicle and took her beside ourselves on the driver's seat of another van. She was quite tired out, and we were scarcely under weigh on the homeward ride when, nestling close to our side, she fell fast asleep. The season was far enough advanced for the evenings to be slightly chilly; and, seeing that she had fallen asleep, the driver good naturedly brought a rug out of his box and put it over her. We knew this driver as a "hand" of the gentleman who had lent the van, knew that he was a decent labouring man, living in the neighbourhood, and, noticing the fatherly tenderness with which he "tucked" the wrapper round Fairy, we asked him—

"Do you know her?"

"Well, like most others living in our neighbourhood, I know her in a general way."

"What are her people?" was our next question.

"Well, there's only two on 'em as I know of," he answered, "her father as she lives with, and her grandmother—Mother Dreadful as they call her—as I expect would like Fairy to live with her, though it would be a bad job for her if she did."

"Is the old woman a bad un, then?"

"And no mistake!" answered the driver, giving his whip a flick by way of emphasis; "she ain't called Mother Dreadful for nothink.

I should say she was a bad un! If there's ever a worse I should just like to see 'em, or rather I shouldn't like to see 'em. She must have missed her turn when hearts was a-given out. I never raised a finger agen a woman in my life, and I wouldn't, and in a general way I would be for knocking down any one as I saw doing it; but for all that I think a good dose of this"—shaking his whip—"is what would suit Mother Dreadful's complaint, and when I think of her I almost feel as if I could give it her."

Page 96.

"What is she?" we asked.

"She calls herself a minder," was the answer.

"A minder!" we echoed. "What's that?"

"Well, a real minder," he replied, "is a woman as takes charge of children for the day while their mothers are out at work; but the minding is only a blind with Dreadful, her place is a regular young beggars' opera."

Again we were rather at a loss as to our companion's exact meaning.

"A beggars' opera?" we said.

"Yes; trains young beggars," exclaimed the driver; "mostly singing ones, though she has all sorts. Bless you, sir, people would hardly believe there could be such things if they didn't see 'em with their own eyes as I've done. Why, I've seen her with a dozen children round her, teaching 'em to sing their beggin' songs, just as you might be teaching a class in school their ymns. That wouldn't matter so much; it's the way as she knocks the poor little creatures about, and starves 'em, that's the black thing agen her."

"But as we understood you just now, this little girl does not live with her," we said.

"No; but she'd like her to," he responded.

"She thinks the father don't make enough out of her, and she has tried it on to get her away from him, but though he's a bit soft on most things, he held fast there. There's no mistake about him loving his daughter."

"What is the father?" we asked.

"Well, that's just as you like to name him," replied our companion. "You could call him a musician, or a teacher of music, or a busker, which is what he really is. He's got a card with 'Music Lessons Given' stuck in his window, though I never heard of any one going to him for lessons—not but what I dare say he could give 'em, for he can play on a'most anything. He plays about the piers and in steamboat bands in summer, and in winter at the sing-songs and hops about our neighbourhood—the public-house concerts and balls, you know."

"And does he take this little girl with him to such places?" we asked.

"Not to the hops or sing-songs, he don't," answered our companion; "and he won't neither, though he's had offers to do it as would have tempted many a man. Fairy can sing and dance, and then she could be put as from 'The Theatre Royal;' and I know the landlord of the 'Help-me-through-the-World' offered him fifteen shillings a week to let her appear at his Saturday and Monday concerts, but the ole man wouldn't. And that's what crabs Mother Dreadful so much. I've seen her almost a crying with vexation, saying as how the child was a ready-made fortune to anybody as had sense."

When the vans reached the school there was a crowd of the parents waiting about, and Fairy, after one rapid glance at them, joyously exclaimed—

"There's dad! There's dad!"

Dad kissed his hand to her, and began to work his way forward; a tall, thin, round-shouldered man, with remarkably long arms, and a shambling gait; middle-aged, with iron grey hair, worn long and in limp ringlets. He had a shrinking, nervous expression in his eye, and a naturally cadaverous face made strikingly so by a bluish-black tinge on the cheeks arising from constant shaving. The children in the van had to get out at the back, so that he alone among the parents stood at the driver's end, and we had a good look at him, though a brief one, for Fairy, bidding us a hasty good night, called out, "Catch, dad!" and then sprang fearlessly into his arms.

He kissed her as he caught her, and putting her gently on her feet, wrapped round her a shawl that he had brought. Taking her hand, they started homewards, Fairy skipping at a pace that put him to the trot to keep up with her.

On the Sunday following the treat there was, as usual, a large falling off in the attendance at the school; but Fairy, as we were glad to see, was not among the absentees. On that and the two following Sundays she was duly in attendance; on the fourth Sunday, however, we missed her, and again on the fifth, and we were reluctantly coming to class her with the backsliders, when we received a letter of explanation from her father, dated from Margate, and stating that it was his practice to take Annie to the sea-side for a few weeks every year; that this year he had gone away in a hurry, and his child had been so put out at not having been able to tell her Sunday-school teachers that she was going, that at last yielding to her importunities he had written to explain, though he "dare sayed" we cared very little about it.

Happening to meet our van-driving friend a day or two later, we mentioned the receipt of this letter to him, and speaking of Armstrong, observed "he appears to be a person of some education, and speaks of taking the child to the sea-side every year. Has he any means?" we asked.

"Oh, no!" exclaimed the man. "It's the other way about, as you may say. Instead of him having means to take her to the sea-side, it's taking her to the sea-side as gets him the means. His holidays pays its own expenses and something to the good. They go busking about to hotels and on the sands, him playing and her singing and going round collecting; and that's a bit of a draw, mind you, as there's plenty 'll give to a pretty little girl as wouldn't give to a rusty-looking old feller like 'im. Their sea-side trip and the pantermime season are their best times."

"But we thought you said he didn't take her about with him," we observed.

"Not to public-houses, he don't," was the answer; "but he does out of doors sometimes, and I think she likes it; at any rate she don't dislike, or she wouldn't be at it; I know he'd rather starve than force her to a thing like that."

Now, we had not so hard an opinion of the wandering-musician class as we knew many good people had—principally, we think, because we had a considerable knowledge of the class. Still, we knew very well that, making all due allowances, it was not a profession in which any one taking a friendly interest would like to see a child brought up—especially a girl. And as we had come to take a very friendly interest in Fairy Armstrong, we decided, even at the risk of being considered meddling, to attempt to bring about her withdrawal from such a profession. With this purpose in view, we waited upon her father a few days after his return, some three weeks later than the date of his letter. He occupied a couple of rooms in a quiet by-street mostly inhabited by respectable labourers and their families, and we easily picked out his apartment by means of the card announcing "Music Lessons," of which the van-driver had made mention. We had selected a wet morning as being a likely time to find him in, and we were doubly fortunate on this point, as we found not only that he was at home, but that Fairy, whose presence would have been a check upon a conversation respecting herself, was out, having gone to a neighbour's house.

Armstrong himself opened the door, and greeted us with a coldly uttered, "What may be your pleasure, sir?" But on our mentioning our name, and that we had come to speak to him about his daughter, his face instantly brightened, and, asking us to come in, he led the way to his living-room. It was a clean, cozy little room, but—rare fault in our district—looked crowdedly furnished; an appearance, however, that was due not to any unusual quantity of ordinary household furniture, but to the presence in the room of a large, old-fashioned piano. Over the piano hung a couple of violins, a cornet-a-piston, and three flutes; coloured frontispieces from popular pieces of music were pasted about the walls by way of pictures, and a pile of sheet music had to be placed on the floor to free a chair for our use. Apart from the musical signs and tokens, the outfitting of the room was commonplace enough, with the exception perhaps of a large-sized, finely-executed, and nicely-coloured photographic portrait of Fairy in stage costume, which, in a heavy, gilt frame, occupied the place of honour over the mantelpiece.

"I hope you have not come to complain of Annie," said Armstrong, rather nervously, when he had taken a seat.

"Oh, no, anything but that," we answered. "We are all very fond of her at school, and feel an interest in her welfare, and—in fact, that is what we have come to speak about."

The subject we had come to broach was a delicate one, and now that we were face to face with the father we were at a loss as to how we should come to it, our consciousness of good-will in the matter notwithstanding.

"The fact is, Mr. Armstrong," we said,

"we take so warm an interest in your little daughter that, coupled with what we have heard of your affection for her, it has emboldened us to come here, and in all kindness put it to you as a matter for consideration whether the career to which she is now growing up is well calculated to promote her welfare."

His face flushed as we finished speaking, and for some seconds he sat in silence, nervously twitching his fingers, then, in a voice made husky by the endeavour to keep it steady under strong emotion he answered—

"You need not put that to me, sir, as a matter for consideration; I have considered it times out of number—considered it till both heart and brain have ached—considered it tearfully and prayerfully, and I hope, though it would tear my heart-strings to part with her, unselfishly."

"And what conclusion have you arrived at?" we asked, looking at him in surprise.

"Well, you see, she is still as she is and what she is," was his enigmatical answer.

"From the tone in which you speak, we can scarcely believe that you think that the best career for her," we said.

"Well, I hardly know," he answered slowly; "the best is a rather wide term; there's many things must go to the making up of any best, and it may have many meanings. I do think that as she is constituted, and as things have come to be between her and me, it is the happiest career she could have for the present, at any rate. In any other she would have to be separated from me, and that, though I say it, would break her heart—would make her miserable anywhere. There is a wandering strain in both of us. I have known better days, as the phrase runs, but always more or less wandering ones. My father was the manager of a provincial theatrical company, with which he 'worked' an extensive circuit. Sometimes he kept his brougham; at others, had to keep us without Sunday's dinner to pay the Saturday-night salaries of his company. On an average, however, he was pretty well to do, and he always managed to keep up an appearance, and through all to give me a good education. When I grew up I was furbisher of plays to the company. In my day I have written what by courtesy were called original dramas, I have acted, I have arranged music for, and been 'musical director of a large theatre;' and if I had only had what some call 'push' and others 'cheek' in my composition, I might have got on in the world. As it was I came down in the world. From being musical director of a large theatre, I came down to being second fiddle in a small one, and so on down to what I am now—a busker. It was when I was about midway in my downward career that I met with my wife, who was in the ballet at a minor suburban theatre, where I was in the orchestra. As you may have heard, she was the daughter of the woman they call Mother Dreadful hereabout; but she had none of her mother's evil disposition in her. She was a simple, kind-hearted creature, and things might have gone differently with Annie if she had lived. But she died when our child was only a year old, and I was as both father and mother to Annie till she was old enough to understand, and then we grew to be companions. Believe me, sir, to separate would be to injure us—her as well as me. I once read some lines that I always remember as being—to my thinking—specially applicable to the relations between my daughter and me, or the notion of making us other than we are. They run—

'For the slender beech and the sapling oak
That grow by the shadowy rill,
You may cut down both at a single stroke,
You may cut down which you will;

But this you must know that, as long as they grow,
Whatever change may be,
You never can teach either oak or beech
To be aught but a greenwood tree.'

To find in the inhabitant of some very humble homes the follower of some very poorly paid employment, a thoughtful, well-educated person who had "known better days," was a common enough experience with us; still we felt surprised at finding what manner of man Fairy Armstrong's father was, and had been, and we listened to him with a sensation of wonder as well as of interest. For the moment we scarcely knew how to reply, and so we merely observed—

"But your daughter is very young."

"She is, sir," he assented; "but, whether for good or ill, I believe you'll find that she is a twig that has received its bent. There is one thing, I think, I am entitled to say," he went on, opening the door of the inner room and beckoning us forward as he spoke, "and that is, that she is neither uncomfortable nor neglected. This is her nest."

Following the sweep of his hand, we glanced around the little inner room which was, upon the whole, bright, cheery, and cozy—such a room as but few children indeed of the poorer working classes could have had to themselves. The little bed had a snow-white coverlet and hangings, and scattered about were pieces of cheap childish finery, picture books, and even toys; while from the open window came a welcome perfume from a number of carefully tended pot-flowers standing on the window-sill, and enclosed by a neatly painted lath railing.

"That is her own room," Armstrong went on when we had finished our survey; "as yet she has never known what it is to want a meal, and very rarely known what it is to hear a cross word from me; and so far as I can I look to her moral and religious training, and shield her from all evil influences."

"Well, we were pleased to see that the child was so well cared for," we said, "and we did not doubt his affection for her, but—but—" and here we broke down.

"Don't think I would stand in the way of my child, sir," he said earnestly. "I am only anxious for her happiness—and I'll leave it to her. I give you my word that she shall have no hint from me of the object of your call here, and I will trust to your honour as a gentleman not to use any undue persuasion with her, and with that understood, you can try her on the subject the first time you see her. If you find her willing to leave her present mode of life, if you find her even not unwilling, I will do anything I can to help you."

This arrangement was the only one to which we could come in the end. Such as it was we proceeded to carry it out at the earliest opportunity: but the alarmed manner and scared look exhibited by Fairy on our merely hinting at the possibility of her being separated from her father, were sufficient to cause us to desist in our attempt.

"I knew it would be so," said the father, speaking to us a day or two later on meeting us in the street. "You see it would make her as well as me unhappy to part us. Not, mark you, sir, that I say she wouldn't give up her present way of life, if that was all; it's our companionship that is the pull. When I am gone the case will be different; and I will go all the happier now, for knowing that there is at least one person in the world who takes an interest in her. She'll still be young enough to train for something else; and I'm not long for this world."

He spoke with a coolness that was astonishing, considering the nature of his remarks; but making no comment upon that point, we merely observed—

"How long we may be for this world is a thing that none of us can know."

"I mean nothing irreverent, sir," he answered; "that of course is only my impression, but I have grounds for it. I have felt for years past that whatever of stamina I may have had has been diminishing. My chest has failed me so that for a year past I have had to give up wind instruments altogether, and now I habitually feel sick and shaky as I go about in the daytime, and exhausted when I get home at night. I am pretty near worn out, and as I am not in a position to lie by or nurse myself, I must die in harness."

We scarcely knew what to answer to this, and while we were hesitating he resumed—

"If my fear, or feelings, or whatever it is, should prove true, would you still be willing to befriend my child?"

"More willing then than even we are now," we replied.

"God bless you!" he exclaimed fervently, by way of answer; and as he spoke he grasped our hand, and then hastily walked away, though not before we had caught a glimpse of the tears that he sought to hide.

Looking at his bowed and wasted figure as he passed down the street, we could not help acknowledging to ourself that there was in all likelihood a good deal of truth in what he had said about his being a worn-out man. But as this thought passed through our mind little did we think that for him the end was so near as in the event it proved to be. Three months later he was dead. The "outing" season was drawing to a close, and he had been working very hard as a member of bands accompanying or hanging-on to excursion parties. On one of these excursions he had got wet, and going about in his damp clothes for many hours afterward had caught a severe cold. He had been strongly advised to nurse it, but saying that he must make a little money for "wintering" on, he persevered in going out day after day, and the result was fatal in the end. One night in the midst of a paroxysm of coughing, he fell from his chair, and the people in the lower part of the house rushing up, on hearing Fairy's screams, found him insensible and blood gushing from the mouth. He had ruptured important blood vessels; and the next day Fairy was an orphan.

We heard of the death within a few hours of its taking place, and immediately hastened to the house, where the first discovery we made was that Mother Dreadful had already "come down like a wolf on the fold." We need scarcely say that we were deeply chagrined; but, feeling that we must accept the situation, we did so with the best grace we could muster.

"Where is the child?" we asked civilly.

"In her own room, pore little dear, a sobbin' her 'art out a'most," she drawled out in a whining tone that was palpably "put on."

"It's so sudden, yer see, but I dessay she'll be better presently; I've been a cheerin' of her up all I can."

"Don't you think it would be well for us to take her away for a while," we said; "we know a lady that would take charge of her till something could be arranged for her."

"Well, thanking you kindly, sir, I think I'd rayther take care of her myself," she answered, a covert sneer underlying her lachrymose tone. "I think her own grandmother is the fittest person to have charge of her."

We saw that any attempt at persuasion would be useless, and so assuming a sterner tone, we said—

"Now, look here, Mrs. —, this is neither a time nor place for wrangling, but we must be plain. We don't think you are the fittest person to have charge of this child; but, remember this, if you do persist in keeping her with you, you shall be well watched."

"I can stand being watched," she replied, now sneering undisguisedly; "I know what my rights are, and what yours arn't, and I don't care that for you or any of yer sort," snapping her fingers contemptuously.

We did see that she was watched in respect to her conduct towards Fairy, but we could hear of no attempt on her part to deal harshly with her. Finding, however, that at the end of three weeks she did not return to Sunday-school, we determined upon bearding the lion in her den, and accordingly proceeded to Mother Dreadful's residence.

"And what might you want?" was the greeting with which she met us on the doorstep.

"We wanted to know why Annie Armstrong did not attend Sunday-school now."

"Just because I ain't goin' to let her attend a school where her mind 'll be poisoned agen me—that's why," she retorted defiantly.

"That's nonsense," we said impatiently.

"It's what I'm going to stick to, any way," she answered, in the same tone. "As I told you before, I knows my rights, and I intend to stand by 'em. I wouldn't spoil her, like her fool of a father, but I'm doing what's right by her; you can speak to her, if you like."

"By herself?" we questioned.

"Oh yes," she answered; "I'll take a turn up the street while you see her; I know you can't stand to take her away."

Accepting this offer, we entered the house, where we found Fairy looking very thin and grief-stricken, and still mourning, with heart-breaking intensity, for her lost "dad." But while the sorrowful expression of her young face was pitiful to see, she was comfortably clad in mourning, and had no complaint to make of hard living or ill-usage, but spoke of "grandmother" being very good to her.

We could point to nothing substantial to justify suspicion, and our work at this time taking us into another part of our district, and giving us many other people and things to think about, Fairy Armstrong was comparatively forgotten.

But, as events proved, she was destined to be but too soon brought under our notice again. Some three months after our last-mentioned interview with her, on a sloppy, foggy, miserable Saturday night in December, we were surprised by a visit from our van-driver friend. He looked strongly excited and mysterious withal, and his greeting was in keeping with the expression of his face.

"Look here, sir," he broke out, "come with me, and ask no questions; the things as I'll take you to see will explain itself."

"Can't you tell us what it is?" we asked.

"Well, of course I could," he answered, "but I'd rather not. An hour's telling wouldn't bring it home to you half as strong as a minute's seeing. You may take my word for it, sir, that when you have seen it, you'll say that seeing it first without hearing about it was out-and-out the best way."

We could see that he had set his heart on having his own way in the matter; and so, waiving the point, we set out with him. He kept a little ahead of us, with a view, as we took it, of avoiding questions on our part; and, after about ten minutes' walk, stopped in front of a large corner public-house known as the "Help-me-through-the-World."

"Are we going in here?" we asked.

"Yes, up into the sing-song room," he answered, and entering the house as he spoke, left nothing for us but to follow.

A description of a London sing-song would not be without a certain grim interest, but there is neither space nor necessity to give the description here. Suffice it to say that the large room was crowded with a rough, noisy, more or less drunken audience, and reeked with the fumes of rankly-strong tobacco and cheap cigars. We entered at a favourable moment; for the audience being engaged in roaring a chorus, we were able to take a seat unobserved.

It was a last verse they were chorusing, and the retiring singer was succeeded by a father bringing on two tiny children, whom he put through a number of violent contortions. Then ensued a pause and buzz of expectation, until the chairman rose and announced that Fairy Armstrong, of the Theatre

Royal, would now make her first appearance as a juvenile character singer and dancer.

This announcement was received with enthusiastic approbation, which found vent in the hammering of pewter pots upon tables. Under cover of this our companion whispered—

"There, now, the murder's out! That's Mother Dreadful's doings. It was to bring her to this that she pretended to be so kind to her. Look here, sir, I'd sooner see a little girl of mine laid in her grave than brought on to that stage. I say nothing agen the poor things as get their liven' in such places, God help 'em, they've most likely been drove to it, or never known anything better; but you see for yourself what sort come here."

"But what do you want us to do?" we whispered.

"Do!" he exclaimed, in the same low but energetic tone. "Why, if you really care for her, as I think you do, save her from this. Though her poor old father let her go with other children on the theatre stage, he'd have rather seen her dead at his feet than brought here to perform—he knew what it meant."

At this point the hammering and shouting suddenly ceased, and Fairy, clad in ballet costume, skipped lightly on to the stage, and gracefully acknowledged the round of applause with which she was received. Then she raised her head, gave a quick glance round the room and at the upturned faces, and instantly—as, watching her intently, we could see—turned pale and faltered.

Our companion also noticed this, for, clutching our arm, he whispered—

"There, do you see that? the light has broke in on her; you may depend she didn't know the sort of place she was being brought to."

Before we could make any reply all was uproar and confusion, for Fairy, after standing stock still for a minute, gave a hysterical scream, and, covering her face with her hands, rushed from the stage. Amid all the noise in front of the stage, we could hear angry voices behind it; and without a moment's further hesitation we pushed our way up, and boldly opening a side door, found ourselves in the little apartment which served the performers as waiting-room. Fairy was in the centre of an excited group, consisting of performers, waiters, the landlord, and Mother Dreadful. The last-named personage was grasping Fairy tightly by the shoulder, and trying to induce her to sip at some brandy which she held in a glass. Fairy's face being towards the door, she was the first to recognise us, and shaking herself free from her grandmother's grasp, she sprang to our side, and seizing our hand, exclaimed—

"Oh, teacher, take me away; take me away from here, please." For, though we were not her teacher, she had always addressed us by that title since the day on which we had got her the "treat" ticket.

Before we could make any answer beyond what was conveyed by a pressure of the hand, the grandmother, her face all aflame with passion, broke out,—

"So it's you as has put her up to this, is it? It's a plant, eh!"

"Look here, Mrs. —," we broke in, "if we had known of this sooner, we would have interfered to prevent the child's being here at all, as now we shall interfere to prevent her being brought here again."

"And how will you prevent it?" she asked, with a sneer.

"Not by any appeal to you, certainly," was our answer, "but we warn the landlord that if he persists in being a party to the dragging this child here against her will, we will do all that we can to get his license taken from him."

The landlord protested that he would have nothing further to do with the affair; that he had been misled by Mother Dreadful, and "done out" of three pounds, which he had let her have in advance.

Hearing the landlord speak in this way, Mother Dreadful, shrugging her shoulders, and glancing significantly at us, observed,—

"Ah, well, if she won't work at this sort of thing, she must at something else. I can't keep her in idleness."

"You needn't keep her at all," we said; "we are willing to take her off your hands."

"But I'm not quite willing to let you."

"Then you had better take care how you treat her," we said.

"That is just what I will do," she answered.

"I know my book."

As there was nothing more to be done under the circumstances, we left the house, but with a mind full of forebodings for poor Fairy.

On the life of the child for a space of three months following, we will not dwell. It would profit nothing to speak of her termagant grandmother's cunning cruelty to her, or our feelings at finding ourselves impotent to prevent it. She "knew her book," as she phrased it. She did not thrash Fairy, or starve her, nor did she make her do anything that was not done by scores of other children in the neighbourhood; and yet it is not too much to say that she was killing her by inches. In the cold, wet winter weather, poor little Fairy, her spirit utterly broken, was sent out step-cleaning, the result being that she caught severe colds, that her hands were chapped, her feet chilblained, and herself altogether miserable—and we could do very little to alleviate her sufferings, for the law, as she managed to keep within the letter of it, was upon the side of Mother Dreadful.

Such was the position of affairs when one dark and bitterly cold night in March, returning from the opposite side of the river in a small boat, we landed at the waterman's stairs of our district.

"A black night," we observed, in passing, to the man in charge of the stairs.

"It is," he replied; "I wish it wasn't, for I'm trying to keep a bright look-out."

"Expecting anything particular up the river, then?" we questioned.

"No; it's on shore here I want to keep my eye," he answered. "There's some poor girl dogging about here in sad trouble; and, young as she is, I do believe she means to make a plunge of it. I've heard her sobbing and moaning; but when I try to go near her she scuds away and hides, and I don't like to go far in case she should give me the slip and get down the steps. Whist!" he went on, suddenly dropping his voice, and laying his hand upon our shoulder, "there she comes, you'll see her in half a minute; she'll come into the light of that lamp."

We turned our gaze towards the spot he indicated, and presently made out coming slowly forward, and peering anxiously about her—our Fairy Armstrong.

In our surprise we blurted out her name, whereupon the man at our side, slapping his thigh, exclaimed,— "Bless me, so it is! To think as I shouldn't a known her. Here I deessay I've been putting myself in a sweat for nothink; it's most likely as she's just been a-looking out for you. Were you expecting of her?"

"No," we replied; "but if she had been inquiring for us she would be told we were over the water. Without waiting to say more we hastened up the stairs, and the instant we came into the light Fairy rushed up to us, and, throwing herself sobbing into our arms, exclaimed,—

"O teacher, teacher! take me with you; I daren't go back to grandmother again!"

Then, as well as her grief would let her, she told her story. Her hands were so sore that she could not clean steps, and she had gone home on the previous day without having earned anything. But the grandmother had sent her out again this morning, telling her that, if she returned again without money, she would "lick her within an inch of her life." Fairy had attempted to clean one set of steps, but the pain of her hands was so great that she had been compelled to desist, and, being again without money, feared to venture home, believing that her grandmother would do as she said.

As in heart-broken accents she poured out her tale, we resolved that we would defy Mother Dreadful, and chance her carrying out her oft-repeated threat of "lawing" us. Having found her a comfortable shelter for the night, on the following day we arranged with a benevolent lady that Fairy should be taken into her house; should be nursed there till she was strong again, and then brought in to be an assistant-nursemaid — always supposing that we succeeded in keeping Mother Dreadful at bay, as, happily, we were able to do, for though she came storming to the house and renewed her threats of "lawing," she took no action in the matter, probably seeing that she had as much to fear as we had from any appeal to law.

But alas for poor Fairy! Though she was lovingly nursed, she was destined never to be "strong again." The hardship she had gone through had been too much for her delicate constitution. The doctor called in to attend her could not say that she was suffering from any specific complaint. She simply faded away. She, as well as those around her, knew for weeks before she died that she was dying. And in a simple child-like, but still confident and happy way, she was prepared to go. She spoke calmly, and with all the unquestioning faith of a child, of meeting her "dear Saviour," of being with the angels, and seeing "dad" again. She had a natural love of music, and her greatest delight towards the last was when the lady of the house would play over the air, while she (Fairy) murmured a verse or two of a favourite hymn of our Sunday-school scholars:—

"I know I'm weak and sinful,
But Jesus' will forgive;
For many little children
Have gone to heaven to live.
Dear Saviour, when I languish,
And lay me down to die,
Oh! send a shining angel
To bear me to the sky.

Oh, there I'll be an angel,
And with the angels stand,
A crown upon my forehead,
A harp within my hand;
And there before my Saviour,
So glorious and so bright,
I'll wake the heavenly music,
And praise Him day and night."

When the end came it was peace. Painlessly, and with a smile on her lips she passed away. By the kindness of friends who had become interested in her, she was laid in the same grave as her father; so that of the poor broken-down busker and his child it might, with very little stretch of poetical license, be said that they "were lovely and pleasant in their lives, and in their death they were not divided."

VOICES.

I. THE VOICE OF THE DISCIPLE.

ONE fate with Thee, my Master, I will share;
Shame were it to rejoice where Thou didst weep;
Where Thou didst wake, my Lord, I would not sleep,
Or faint where Thou didst bear.

Far off I follow Thee in spite of strife,
Returning to Thee, though awhile I stray,
In spite of thorns and briars in the way,
Still on the path to Life.

And not alone, because Thy presence fills
My midnight darkness and my midday light;
And so, though friend-bereft, I am not quite Guideless upon the hills.

II. THE VOICE OF THE BELOVED.

My child, thou doest well to trust my love—
Can any save thee if I let thee die?
Has the world proved to thee more kind than I,
That thou shouldst doubt and rove?

The world gives tinsel, and I give thee gold;
I cast not off my friend for being poor;
Come, sad and desolate, unto my door,
Or totter even when old.

Who suffer here, hereafter reign with me,
If only they trail not their spirit-wings,
Or tire them, by pursuing earthly things,
For my eternity.

Some Glimpses of Life at a Great Era.

PART I.—A SCOTCH SCHOLAR.

CHAPTER IV.—AT MONTPELLIER, IN AN OLD FRIEND'S LODGINGS.

HE house for which Dr. Thomas was bound was that of the friend, Mistress Dalrymple, with whom Dundas and the young laird of Brieche-side had first lodged when they came to Montpellier. She was a Lithgow woman by extraction, and so was like a breath of home—long forsaken but well remembered to Dr. Thomas. On her part, her heart still turned back fondly from the land of a quarter of a century's adoption to what she called her "ain countrie"—her "cawf countrie," and she warmed towards Dr. Thomas in the same connection. Besides, had he not stood her friend in all her former difficulties with the young laird, than whom Dr. Thomas was far more staid and discreet?

Mistress Dalrymple's hospitality was her strong point, and she liked a gossip about old places and friends, and was always glad to see Dr. Thomas. And so was young Jenny Dalrymple, who was her mother over again—only not yet crushed by an overwhelming burden, while it remained to be seen whether Jenny, drawing strength from fresh resources, would escape the load which had broken her mother's back and taken the content and hope out of her nature. Jenny was soft and supple, accustomed to endure and to rise against a great deal of dolefulness and murmuring. And hers was a fair spring face and figure, conspicuously fair and sunshiny, yet subdued and delicate among the warm-tinted Languedoc girls, whether brought up in conventual stillness or in their jealously-guarded homes. Jenny's Scotch primrose charms, displayed not altogether to disadvantage beside the vivid maiden blossoms of southern France, had their admirers, and, to poor Mistress Dalrymple's consternation, were even trolled in students' songs.

Dr. Thomas Dundas did not know that he admired Jenny. Such gallant admiration was hardly in the rugged, devoted scholar's way, any more than an analytical contemplation of nature. But he liked Jenny with a brotherly partiality, part patronising, part condescending; and Jenny, with a true instinct, turned to him from her light-headed admirers as to a tower of strength. She was eager to hear him talk of his Scotch home, his mother, his wise sister Giles, and was sensitively curious as to his thoughts of her and her influence over these thoughts.

Even the Dalrymples' house—that of a widow with a straitened income,—showed that it was in the country which led the renaissance in letters, in art, and in science; causing the thought of France to be cherished with almost passionate tenderness by curt and otherwise dispassionate men, to whom letters, science, and art were not lords and kings, but well-beloved mistresses. Mistress Dalrymple's family-room had woollen hangings in place of bare walls, and a cover on the boards of the small table. There was also a mirror, set in a steel frame, which hung opposite the window, and which Mistress Dalrymple, though she failed to remove it, continually dreaded as an encouragement to vanity. A silken coverlet was spread on the cumbrous bed; and, as Jenny happened to have a musical voice, the service of which she had contributed to the choir of a neighbouring convent, there was a claverin or small harp, which a noble patroness of the convent had presented to Jenny, causing her to be instructed in the use of the instrument as a fitting reward for the devout exercise of a natural gift.

Mistress Dalrymple and Jenny wore kirtles of no costlier material than black serge and white muslin, laced with blue; but the older woman's pinched face, with the mouth drooping and the eyes running over with lamentation, was shaded with a fine cambric coif, while falling back from Jenny's round throat and resting on her slim and sloping shoulders, was a cambric collar equally fine. Even Dr. Thomas—no butterfly gallant, wore a fair, clear collar over the neck of the vest, which was seen under his frayed and stained mantle; so that it was no wonder Jenny's collar was fastened by a string of Scotch pearls, which her mother had saved out of the wreck of her fortunes, and carried with her from Scotland.

Jenny could read and write almost as well as Giles Dundas, for she had received a little convent favour and instruction; but she did not, like Giles Dundas away in the homely Port-House of Lithgow, read every morsel of print—"Complaint of Scotland," poem of Dunbar, or Douglas, or chapman's ballad—which came in her way. Jenny practised her reading in her "Book of Hours," "Legends of the Saints," and scraps of old provincial hymns and romances. It somehow soothed and gratified Dr. Thomas's not very musical ear to listen to her playing and singing, his fingers beating time on the chair's back, and his face turned towards her as she sat at the claverin, though he looked far beyond her out of the casement, at the crimson sunset fast purpling into dusk, or the lustrous moon rising above the houses and gardens, the colleges and ruins of Montpellier.

"Come in, and welcome, Dr. Tammas," Mistress Dalrymple hailed her visitor on the present occasion, glad to get a new recipient for the outpouring of her woes. "Let me tell you how I have been fleeced by a Montpellier merchant, and put upon by my last lodger. Eh! Dr. Tammas, your mither has an easy down-sitting ower yonder in the kindly Louduns, whence she has never been moved, maid or wife."

"Hooly, madam," Dr. Thomas interrupted her good-naturedly, and falling back into his native tongue; "my mother is a widow woman, like yourself; and is it not some deprivation that she has not set een on her only son's face, even granting it a gruesome ane, these ten long years?"

"She kens your face is biding her, and she dwells between times among her ain folk," maintained Mistress Dalrymple. "Can you tell me," she continued less peevishly, "gin the merle still sings as sweetly in the palace park at the gloamin', and gin the Lithgow wells are as caller as they were wont to be on the simmer mornings lang syne?"

"My mither aye threeps," put in Jenny in better Scotch than the Languedoc dialect, which she spoke to the mass of her neighbours, was good French, "that the nightingale is nocht to the merle or the laverock, and that our fountains are but drumly to the Lithgow wells."

"I kenna." The arbiter thus declined to settle a question which his patriotism might hinder him from settling correctly. "But there are other fountains in which pur auld Scotland is deficient, and in search of which her sons have left her. She's but a benighted country in this sixteenth century, where knowledge, both sacred and profane, is concerned, though I dinna say that Wardlaw, Kennedy, and Elphinstone did not ettle their best to help her."

"No, Dr. Tammas," forbade Mistress Dalrymple indignantly, "dinna gie foreigners room to brag ower us. That werna the speech o' a leal Scot."

"Gin foreigners hae room they'll no be denied the richt by me, mistress. That were not the speech of a leal man," proclaimed Dundas; "besides, if we are not to own our defects, how are we ever to mend them?"

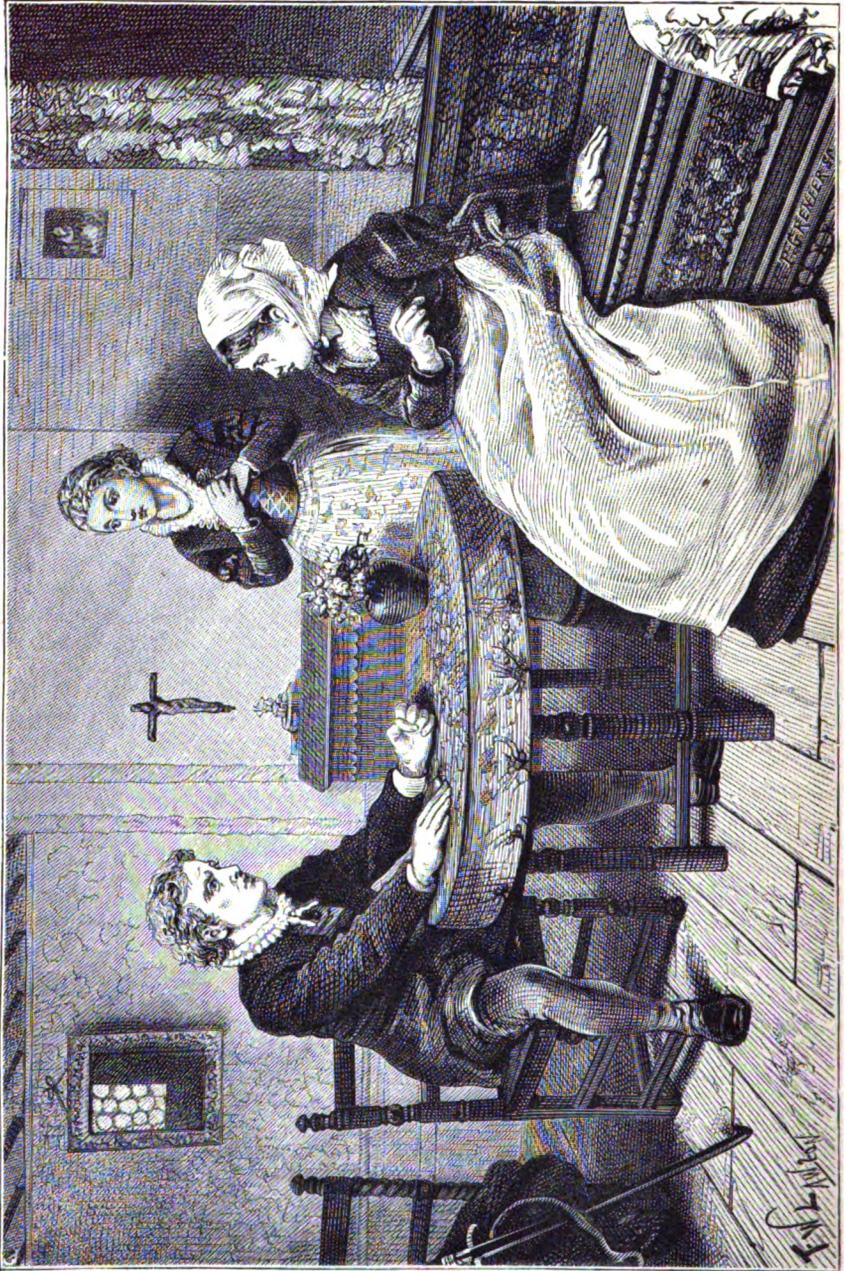

"But Scotland was chokefu' o' priests and teachers when I kennaed her," answered Mistress Dalrymple, changing her cue. "What'na o' grand abbeys and kirks there were! It was a privilege to be a kirk vassal, for the abbots and priors had a hantle in their power. As for ither lear wasna there Blind Harry and Tammas the Rhymer—wise Tammas—whase bonnet you'll never rieve for a' your French doctor's degree; and there was Davie Lyndesay—why, Davie Lyndesay made fun o' the very palmers and pardoners to their faces! The maist feck just leuch, though some scowled. I saw and heard it mysel' when I was a heimpie like Jenny, and stood in the crowd as the "Complaint o' the King's Popinjay," and "the Three Estates" were sung and played afore the king's majesty, his court, and commons at Lithgow. Ah, times were nae sae hard then, Dr. Tammas."

"You're richt there," answered Dundas, thoughtfully; "the kirk either had not ta'en alarm, or rather the better men who had not left her, in their fairness, bore down the unfairness of the worse."

"Whisht, sir"—Mistress Dalrymple tried to silence him imperatively—"the kirk can do nae wrang. Is na his holiness the Pape in the hie seat o' Saunt Peter, wha got the keys, and was to open and shut, wi' neither man nor angel to forbid?"

"Say you sae, mistress," queried Dr. Thomas; and the born disputant pricked his ears and raised his eyebrows, not disdaining so shallow and flimsy an antagonist. "But, come, tell me again what you thoct o' Davie Lyndesay's sangs in those fine days lang syne," he misled her mischievously.

"I thoct they were very merry, and pleasant, and instructive, sic as nae man—even a Montpellier doctor, by your leave—could mak the day," protested Mistress Dalrymple with dignity and triumph, utterly unconscious of the snare into which she was being decoyed.

"Yet the Pope o' Rome condemned them to be burnt by the common hangman a year after Lyndesay was dead; that is, after the tongue was silent and the hand stiff, which could hae garred Scotland and Europe ring wi' the monstrous offence against justice."

"Pity me! pity me! no possible," protested Mistress Dalrymple, in horror and dismay at her own admissions amongst other things; "an' me to see wi' my ain een abbots in copes and mitres, and begging friars wi' rope girdles, hearkening and cheering on the ditty. You're fleying me, Tam Dundas, wi' your story o' banned and brunt heresies. Mercy on me! I believe there is a copy o' the "Complaint o' the Popinjay" in this very house, which shall be flung on the back o' the fire, afore I'm a day alder."

"Rest easy, Mistress Dalrymple," Dr. Thomas assured her scornfully, "your straying amice in the walks o' heresy is kenned to naebody here, save to me and Jenny. Even gin they were kenned, the authorities o' Montpellier, Nismes, and Narbonne have offences nearer home, and stinking more foully in their nostrils, that they should travel out o' the gate to call up ancient Scotch heresy. Eat your fish on Friday, mem, dinna fail to go to confession on saunts' days; aboon a', dinna stint your awmouses and offerings, and the kirk here like the kirk yonder, will hold you a dutifu' dochter, never fear."

"I do abide, as I'm a sinner, by a fish diet whenever the kirk ordains it," replied Mistress Dalrymple, her very fractiousness driven out of her by the extent of the danger which she had unwittingly provoked; "Jenny will tell you that, and I'm regular at confessional when my ailments will let me, though Father Antony is twice as hard on me as he is on that wheedling, sorry La Clere next door, or even on Jenny, though I aye say that Jenny suld be let take some o' my ayes and pater-nosters, were it but to keep her hand—that is to say, her tongue—in. Besides, I spend on masses for my gudeman's soul and pilgrimages to our leddy's shrine at Nismes—because she's thoct to be by ordinar' gracious there to sic steeks in the side as that which I have added to my ither troubles—on candles and bonnie deys to the altars, mair than I can spare, Dr. Tammas, for I'm a puir woman, like to be rugged and reived frae, till I'm roupit out o' house and hold."

"I believe you, madam," answered Dr. Thomas, dryly. "Muckle gude may your fastings and pilgrimages do you, since you'll no try simple prayers to one God, and Father, and Saviour."

"Dinna mint it, Tammas Dundas," protested Mistress Dalrymple, and she put her hands over her ears, and rose to leave the room. "I would like ill to forbid you my house, far less to carry tidings against a countryman, an auld lodger, and an auld gossip's son, who will get mair wit and grace yet, it is to be hoped. But I daur you to say another word to me, and I put it to your honour no to speak to a bairn like Jenny sic language against our holy mither kirk, while I go about my proper housewifeskep."

He might have dared, but the appeal to his honour placed a barrier against the hot words which rose to his lips.

It was Jenny who broke down the barrier and addressed him, remonstrating in mingled girlish dogmatism and timidity against his conduct. "What gars you, sir, cast laith on what my mither reverences, and try to rob her of what she believes, without being able to give her another gospel?" protested Jenny, with the ruffled plumes of a dove, and the severity which is the under side of a certain kind of softness.

"I spoke but as my heart prompted me, Jenny," he half apologized. "I had no thoct o' wounding your mother; but I also believe that the refuges of lies maun be cast down before the true refuge can be found."

"It may be sae," admitted Jenny. "I ken there is muckle mair in this heresy than my mother jalouses. I ken that it is spread far and wide, in secret, through this France as through other countries. There are sisters in the convent of St. Catherine's, where I gang, of whom other sisters whisper that they are touched with heresy, and so are their confessors, yet they are among the best behind the grilles. Noble ladies and princesses, they say, are among the converts. I dinna pretend to judge of the right and wrang of it a'. But oh, Dr. Tammas, is there to be no peace for them who do not pretend to judge, and who are not prepared to be sifted as wheat for what they but half compass? Gin they follow the licht they have and do their best, is there no hope for them?"

"I dinna say that, Jenny," Dr. Thomas denied, earnestly, "though I would implore silly women and bairns, and erring men, too, for that matter, to pray and strive for mair licht. But it is the Pope and his councils who profess that there is no hope for them that differ; it is not true Protestants. Only, Jenny, I put it to you, can you believe that even a gude reasonable man or woman would tak it as a glorious hansel and head mark o' heavenly virtue in me that I should abstain from an ox's sirloin, or a venison pasty, and whet my hunger on a dish o' trout or o' coterred eggs on Fridays?"

"It is the motive, no the act itself," whispered Jenny.

"Canna you let me grasp the motive in simplicity, unencumbered by the senseless act?"

"Fasting is mentioned in the New Testament, that you cry so loud you cleave to."

"But is it put in the forefront o' a man's duty? Is it not classed with forms and ceremonies which may be expedient but never essential? Is there not a likening of it to the auld bottles which held the auld wine, that seems to mark it as a relic o' a past dispensation, fu' of outward observances which, in the husk, profited not, and were at the same time too idly irksome to be borne? How mony o' your Catholics, even your priests, stick to the rule o' fasting on Friday, hey, Jenny? Forby, there is no warrant in the New Testament for fasting ilka Friday. Na, na, the New Testament is ower fu' of calls to repentance and godliness, to keep sounding a summons to fast on Friday."

"You are unco familiar wi' the New Testament, lad, and you are learned enuch to read it in its ain tongue, though you have no warrant for the study ony mair than the ignorant vulgar hae," protested Jenny, with a mixture of vexation, admiration, and pique. "But I think I have heard in the kirk's lessons out o' the Auld Scriptures, that there were fastings enjoined by the prophets—fastings frae strife and debate. What do you say to them, Dr. Tammas?"

"I say that you hae me there, Mistress Jenny," he acknowledged; "but mealy mou's were never for reformers. Did the auld prophets bogle at terms when they stood forward to ding down apostacy and idolatry?"

"They had a commission."

"Sae, in a sense, has every honest man, Jenny Dalrymple."

CHAPTER V.—IN THE TOWER AT BRIECHSIDE.

DUNDAS was back in Scotland, at length, but he only paid a passing visit to his mother and Giles, and was wondered over and made much of by them at Lithgow, from which more than the coots had flown since he was there last. Dundas had to go where he could earn his livelihood through his scholarship. In the stormy transition state of Scotland in the early years of Mary's reign, such a call was both difficult and dangerous. There were only two ways—to join one of the universities which sorely wanted scholars, both ripe and young, but which, though in a less degree than the English universities, were still trammelled by state and aristocratic influences; or to enter the household of some man of rank—a representative of the lords of the congregation; and, living in his shadow and sheltered by his power, to send forth from that stronghold vigorous attacks on clerical abuses, and what had been popular superstition. The scholar and reformer who was thus privileged to pursue his work from a comparative fastness, was expected to give some return for the service rendered him by being a stanch party man, on his host's side in politics, by lending it all the aid of scholarly reputation and power, and by hitting hard in diatribes the hereditary and personal enemies of the head of the honourable household in which the writer dwelt. The antidote to this description of clientela was the strikingly independent habits of thought and speech which the early reformers, in their rebound from despotism and falseness of every description, cultivated towards king and council, friend and foe. Such fearlessly plain words positively staggered into silence and compulsory magnanimity the patron who had a grain of generosity left in him.

Thus, when one reformer was addressed by the chancellor in the name of the Council Chamber, with the fiery challenge, "Who dare sign this deed?" referring to a national protest of the day, he answered coolly, "I dare;" and advancing into the galaxy of frowning faces, appended his signature; and when another Presbyterian divine met the rough oath of James VI. with the honest rebuke, "Do not ban, sir," there was nothing to be done either by council or king at the time but submit with a bad grace.

Dundas, who accepted the opening, and entered the household of his old pupil the laird of Briechside, did not escape the perils of a satellite because of his former connection with the laird. Neither was the laird one of those exceptionally noble spirits which are rarely to be met with in any generation. All that the experience of travel and the polish of a foreign university had effected for the laird who ruled at Briecheide in the room of his father, was to render a little more reasonable and a little less illiterate, one of the haughty and headstrong gentlemen, who fought stoutly in the national struggle for their own way and their own share of the spoil, as well as for the good of kirk and nation. But the laird at least maintained the assumption of a liberal and hospitable establishment; and possibly there was never any want of rude hospitality in these old Scotch towers and holds, where accommodation and entertainment were as easily come by as they were homely; which, therefore, bristled with kinsmen and retainers, presenting an ostentatious retinue in time of peace and a formidable brigade in time of war, as, indeed, when was it not the time of civil war and private feud?

The laird welcomed his old tutor to Briecheide—rather vain of the connection because of the standing which Dundas had won among scholars; while the laird counted not the less willy on the benefit of commanding Dundas's weapons against Briecheide's foes. Thomas Dundas could count on no immunity from the encroachments on his natural liberty and rights claimed over him, save what he could get by God's blessing on his integrity.

Dundas had undertaken, and was prepared to give, other equivalent for his board, and the countenance extended to him by the laird of Briecheide. He was to act as the laird's secretary and as tutor to the laird's half-brothers. The last office, though it were in behalf of little lads no farther than their primer, was fulfilled cheerfully by the first scholars in Scotland at that time. So simple, well-nigh sublime, was the enthusiasm for learning, that the very hewing of wood and drawing of water in its service—the showing to a child or to an ignorant adult his letters,—was recognised and accepted as a profitable and honourable task. There was no condescension in the matter. To instruct the ignorant was to help to cut away the gross buttresses of error, vice, and crime, and to build up the fair pillars of wisdom and virtue.

When Thomas Dundas came to Briecheide from Montpellier, after many detours and delays, he was agreeably surprised to find an old acquaintance and friend there before him. Mistress Dalrymple had died, and Jenny left an orphan, with a very slender provision in savings of silver pennies and bonnet pieces, had been transported to Scotland in the safe keeping of a Scotch skipper and his wife, who, when no English or Spanish privateer was in the way, sailed between Leith and Bordeaux. And so Jenny was committed to the care of the Briecheide family. Her presence at Briecheide will be seen shortly to have been at once a source of comfort and of complication in Dundas's affairs.

The Place of Briecheide was situated within what would now be held an easy half-day's journey of Lithgow; but, in the state of the roads and of the country then, and after a sharp enmity which had chanced to arise between the laird and the provost of the burgh at that date, the household of Briecheide were largely shut out from intercourse with the county town, or indeed from outside intercourse of any kind, since the house or fortalice was in the wilder and less populous district of the shire. The laird and his stepmother only, paid periodical visits to court, attended by as large a train of men-at-arms as they could muster, unless when they were in disfavour; for Briecheide was a partisan of Murray and the Reformed kirk, and not of Mary and the Catholic barons.

Not Luther in the Wartzburg was left more to his own company, or more confidently understood to want no other society, than was the comparatively obscure young scholar whose little dark closet, crammed even with his scant allowance of books and papers, was also the Briecheide boys' schoolroom.

The house of Briecheide was a solid square building, with some pretension to battlements, set in a courtyard, and having on the opposite side from the courtyard a small terraced garden, the ground beyond which descended as abruptly as heathery braes can descend, a hundred feet or so, into a natural hollow watered by a little burn. This "howe" was the only irregularity within sight in an otherwise level moorland, only a small portion of which was in cultivation as corn-fields. In like manner the "howe," (it was no more, and did not pretend to be glen or dell, though it had been adroitly made of avail to render it less liable to attack on one side,) offered the single example of wood within miles. There was a sprinkling of hazel, thorn and birch on the sides of the hollow, just enough to relieve the eye, looking down from the terraces of the garden or out of the narrow windows of the house, on the bare, rough sward, which yet afforded pasture for cattle and sheep, and included the few ill-fenced corn-fields.

Doubtless, and the exemption was a fortunate one, very few of the men and women who then called Briecheide their home, missed any brilliance or luxuriance or even fatness from the landscape. Were there not black-faced sheep on the moorland and long-horned cattle closer in field? Did not these stunted oat and bean crops suffice for home consumption? As for the garden, beyond the kail plants, the herb or two, the half dozen hardy fruit-trees, what more was wanted? Rare vegetables and flowers were for the idle cultivation of the monks, who were banished from the land. Still, was there not a great pear-tree in the Briechside garden, and enough gilliflower, lavender, and roses to busk posies in their short season; and who cared for flowers out of their June and July fitness?

From the cavernous guard-room and hall in one, up the steep winding stair to the laird's chamber and the lady's bower, as exemplified at Briechside, Scotland, distracted and engrossed with more serious concerns, had made slight progress in domestic refinement, even under a French-bred queen. Briechside, the house of a laird, was not so well furnished with provision for the needs of thoughtful men and delicate women, as had been the college or even the lodging-house of Mistress Dalrymple in Montpellier. There was hardly a book beyond those which had been gradually accumulated by Dr. Thomas, not a musical instrument save a shepherd's pipe, or the harp which a travelling harper might carry in with him the one day and carry off again the next; and not a flower which was not included in that briefest June and July bloom of the garden and the pasture. Of social intercourse there was none to speak of beyond the walls of the Place, barely even ghostly ministrations, for Dundas was not in orders, though he acted as reader and exhorter; and the laird having quarrelled with the town of Lithgow in the person of its provost, did not choose that any of his family should wait on the preaching there.

The act had been passed by which the celebration of mass became treason to all save the queen and her household in their private chapel, and even that celebration was not persisted in without angry interruption from the populace. It was a changed world since Patrick Hamilton and George Wishart had passed away with glorious steadfastness in flame and smoke, becoming thenceforth beacons of renown, as they themselves had taught,—never dying torches to light the way of the Reformation. And Mistress Dundas had charged her gifted son not to meddle with priestcraft, and Mistress Dalrymple had put her fingers in her ears, lest they should catch the most distant blast of that trumpet-tongued proclamation, which bade the people go free from their ages-long, intolerable yoke of credos and saints, confessions and penances, with the iron of arbitrary violence and unutterable baseness driven deep into many a soul!

Still the Reformation was young and shaking to its foundation, granting that it was an everlasting foundation. The rookeries had been pulled down in the swell of the tide, wisely or unwisely; but many a rook yet lingered in high and low places, threatening to overthrow the Reformers' work and re-establish Popery in Scotland, as it had been temporarily restored in England under Mary Tudor. It is wonderful to reckon up the limited number of great names, making up in quality for what they wanted in quantity, borne by those who established the Reformation in Scotland—Knox, Buchanan, the two Melvilles. Certainly there were other and less pure forces at work besides those which prevailed in the scholars and protesting priests; notably that of the restless, rapacious nobles, craving change, catching up watchwords, which would serve them in waging war to the knife with each other, coveting the forfeited wealth of the proscribed Church. But in the partisanship of the nobles loomed a great danger, to meet which there was but a single city church—that of St. Giles in Edinburgh. The first General Assembly of the Reformed Church consisted of only forty members. There was but one man fit to confer with Murray and resist the queen, than whom no woman ever lived whose blandishments proved more irresistible.

The dwellers at Briechside lived to some extent as the illiterate dwellers at a remote Australian or New Zealand station live today. The men engaged in the circumscribed agricultural operations, in such sport of fishing, fowling, otter-hunting, &c., as they could command; in games of foot-ball, in the practice of archery and sword exercise—the latter in anticipation of what might be needed in conflict with the English next year, or with their neighbours any day; in keeping a considerable amount of watch and ward; in telling men-at-arms' and country people's stories round the winter fire, or lolling on the sunny courtyard wall. The women baked and brewed, spun, stitched, gossiped, and told grandmother and maiden stories.

Jenny Dalrymple was in the sorriest case. As it happened she had been an alien in France, and now she was an alien in Scotland. It was not so much a matter of religion as of climate and custom. Absolved from the terrors which had obscured her mother's vision, while always disposed to be guided by her natural leaders for the time, she had given in her adherence to Protestantism. But Jenny missed innocently the light, warmth, and vivacity of the southern town. Jenny, too, could have said, with a far more miserably alienated Scotchwoman, that she had been brought up to joyousness and not to gravity; so that the atmosphere of Brieche-side and Scotland, though nobody was actually unkind to her, and she had found an old friend, was at first raw and surly.

Jenny's patroness, Lady Brieche-side, a faded, handsome woman, in her silver girdle with its chain and keys, and velvet curch, was of an order of fine lady not uncommon in any age. She meant well, and tried to rule beneficently, thinking to maintain her rank and state honourably, and hand them down unimpaired by her to her sons' wives. But she was unable to avoid sinking the woman in the lady, not being a great enough woman to rise above her ladyhood, or to understand that truest ladyhood is truest womanhood. Thus she had grown always more pre-occupied and self-engrossed. She was formal and distant, however gracious in her manners. She was much engaged with the receipt of her due in rights and privileges accorded by her late husband's son; with the etiquette of her bower, her seat in the chimney corner, her place on the dais at table; with her daily walk on the garden terraces, and her countenancing of what was called the Exercise, the reading of Scripture and prayer, which Dr. Thomas Dundas was appointed to conduct. She was concerned about the degree of her authority over her boys and their tutor; in arbitrations between the tirewoman and house-keeper, steward, cooks, and scullions, when they chanced to fall out; and, in addition to the rest of her duties, she had the ordering and accomplishment of rare visits and the entertainment of company at home. In the same manner many a modern fine lady lives in a whirl of religious, charitable, social, and æsthetic obligations, and is thoroughly distracted between setting an august example in the management of a village club, presiding over a stall at a bazaar, making imperative sojourns at country houses, and cultivating art-exhibitions and oratorios.

Lady Brieche-side granted her protection to Jenny Dalrymple, and was well pleased that the girl should enjoy the safety and light of a reformed and honourable household. But naturally the great lady saw but little of the orphan girl who did not rank above a poor dependent. A civil word bestowed on her, now and then, was all that Jenny received or had reason to expect from such a source. Yet this was but a poor substitute for a mother's fond concern, weak and full of murmuring as Jenny's mother had been. Lady Brieche-side's head-women, staid, confidential, and none of them young, copied their mistress's bearing strictly. Besides, they, too, were full of their own aims and objects, and almost inevitably regarded Jenny as an interloper. Doubtless, also, though Jenny was tractable enough, and a sweet though quick-tempered child always, she had not at this time acquired the grace and breadth which should have prevented her from being petulant to equals and inferiors.

Thomas Dundas, a quickly observant and far from a dreamy and abstracted man, was apprised of Jenny's pining isolation, and was more patient and sympathetic with it than he was with most small pains, whether they beset himself or his neighbours. He would contrive to have chats with Jenny, when they encountered in the court or in the guard-room, as it was arranged for a chapel, recalling old Montpellier days to brighten the sombreness of her present experience, and bidding her be of good heart. In order to help her, he spoke good gentle words to her, reminding her how Paul charged young women to be sober and keepers at home. He enjoined on her to be diligent in all her tasks, whether baking of wassail bread, gathering and drying of herbs, or passementing of garments; to strive to live in tender charity with all men, so that the older men and women might look upon her as a daughter, and the younger men and women as a sister. Above all, he laid before her eloquently the beauties of holiness and of a godly conversation, urging on her to cultivate them, promising her that they would yield her in the end such noble satisfaction and sweet content as her soul, being in the divine image, could never draw from any merely earthly and mortal "joyousness," until she should come to look upon this life at Brieche-side, which at present she viewed in the light of a sore cross, as the perfecting crown of her being.

No wonder that Jenny learnt among other lessons to trust and cling to her old friend, and to think no face or figure manlier, more gallant. Thomas Dundas stood by and defended Jenny in every difficulty. Almost as a matter of course, a young man like the laird admired a creature with Jenny's April charm and a certain flavour of foreign novelty and piquancy, mellowed as it was by the familiarity of old acquaintance and remote kinship. She was not so far removed from him either in birth or education. But the laird—an ambitious one, like so many lairds of his day—would no more have contracted an alliance with Jenny than with his meanest scullion. He was not, however, above seeking to amuse himself, and to tease his stepmother by taking notice of Jenny at the risk of depriving the helpless girl of what were her most precious possessions—a good conscience and peace of mind.

But Jenny was not without sufficient safeguards. She had the purity of nature and prudence of a really good and God-fearing girl. She knew that there was something more and better worth having in the world than a man's love; and this she felt was a light, mocking love at which her upright nature revolted justly. These are sufficient safeguards to render a good girl proof against vanity and light love of whatever degree. But Jenny had other defences. Dundas did not hesitate as a man might hesitate nowadays, out of a sense of private rights and from motives of delicacy, to speak to the laird of Briecheide—his host—on the laird's meaningless attentions to Jenny, and to remonstrate with him on the annoyance which they caused her, and the scandal to which they might give rise. And the laird of Briecheide, however irritated and offended, could not choose but listen sulkily and attend so far to the remonstrance. What were reformers and exhorters for if they were not to arrest a man when he was lapsing into error, and to counsel and rebuke him? The laird of Briecheide's censor was very little older than he himself was; and if Thomas Dundas had once been the laird's tutor, Thomas was now the laird's protégé; but the word protégé was never less synonymous with the word minion than in that generation and country.

"The lass is fatherless and motherless, without a home, except what the leddy here affords her," protested Dundas boldly; "and I put it to you, sir, whether it is worthy of you or of any Christian gentleman to make her feel the hardship of her lot, and to drive her to seek another, perhaps a worse refuge."

"I meant no ill," grumbled the laird; "it was only an idle hap in bestowing an idle moment. The lass is as saucy as gin she were a duke's dochter."

"She is not saucy," her defender urged; "at least I have never found her saucy. She has only the spirit which every honest lass ought to show in declining to sing off the same book with you when the leddy is not by, and in refusing to have your gifts of rokelay and mittens, seeing that the time was neither Hansel Monday nor her birthday."

"Since you hear her stories, do you pretend to plight troth with her?" inquired the laird, turning the tables on his assailant.

Dundas drew back, reddening violently.

"You must ken, sir, that poor scholars have no troke with troth plights. I hope I would take the part of any orphan lass in the country," he defended himself indignantly.

"Ilka body is ower kind to this orphan lass," retorted the laird; but he attempted no more condescending daffing with Jenny.

Jenny, on her part, was of some use to the scholar. She lent a friendly hand to keep in order the raiment which could not be always transferred to his mother's and Giles's care; and he was wont to offer for her perusal the treatises against evil in Kirk and State and against individuals in power, which it was the chief glory of Dundas's life to cause to issue from Briechside. These treatises were caustic, daring, not guiltless of employing scholarly quibbles; being framed rather for the display of the sardonic humour and intrepidity of the writer, than for the expression of that gentleness of heavenly wisdom in which the pride and wrath of man do not form elements.

Jenny was little qualified to understand these treatises, even when they were not in the Latin tongue. She could only admire and marvel over them at a humble distance. But there was one thing that she could do. She could see quickly when there was any passage savouring of scurrility and abuse, and in her instinctive love of peace and her regard for the writer she could put her finger firmly on the spot and venture to suggest—

"I wouldna put that in, Dr. Tammas. Na, I would be a hunder times readier to abstain from a hard allusion to the man's wicked gutcher, or from calling the man himsel 'Lucifer' and 'Judas,' just because he had cast at Briechside and you the names of Korah and Dathan, of Absalom and Jehu."

Dundas always contested the point stoutly with her, and fought hard for the reasonableness of his speaking his mind freely, but he ended by withdrawing the offensive paragraphs; and when he had once consented to the excision, somehow her call for it and his compliance with it resulted in mutual satisfaction, until it were difficult to say whether Jenny or he regarded the improved text with the more complacence.

THE LAW OF GROWTH IN NATURE AND IN GRACE.

BY THE DEAN OF CHESTER.

"First the blade, then the ear, after that the full corn in the ear."—MARK iv. 28.

DURING the recent autumn months our minds have been occupied somewhat anxiously with thoughts of the harvest: and perhaps there are reasons for anticipating hard times in the coming winter.

Many persons, on the Sundays of these months, have carried with them into church such thoughts of the harvest: and in carrying such thoughts into church on Sunday there is no harm, if we seek to make this subject the ground-work of spiritual learning—if we use the laws of Nature for a help to a better appreciation of the laws of Grace—if the supplies which we have seen around us on the fields—supplies, it may be, in some respects, attended with disappointment, but supplies beneficent and undeserved—remind us of what is done for our souls in the moral world of which we form a part.

This is the manner in which our Lord made use of the growth and the ripening of the harvest. Speaking to His disciples, while the view of the corn-fields was before them, He said, "So is the kingdom of God, as if a man should cast seed into the ground; and should sleep, and rise night and day, and the seed should spring and grow up, he knoweth not how. For the earth bringeth forth fruit of herself; first the blade, then the ear, then the full corn in the ear. But when the fruit is brought forth, immediately he putteth in the sickle, because the harvest is come."*

These words possess a remarkable interest in more ways than one. In the first place, they constitute the only parable which is peculiar to St. Mark. Even so, this parable stands out very definitely apart from all the rest. But, further, it is a very unique parable as to the truth which it expresses. Most of the parables admonish us, in some form, of what we ought to do. This rather tells us what God does, and admonishes us that, in some very important senses, we must be content to be passive,—though certainly very important duties follow also again from this very fact.

There are certain things in God's constituted system of the world, which proceed in an orderly regulated way—certain laws, as we call them, which cannot be altered: and our part is to acquiesce in these laws—cheerfully, thankfully,—to adapt ourselves to their requirements, to shape our conduct according to the course which they inevitably mark out.

This is eminently the case in regard to that beneficent law of vegetation which causes the earth to "bring forth grass and herb yielding seed after their kind,"† and the full and final operation of which is briefly described in the words quoted above, from St. Mark's one characteristic parable: "First the blade, then the ear, after that the full corn in the ear."

We have here before us the law of growth; and in attempting to draw out the religious meanings of this law, and to illustrate its connection with the responsibility of human action, we should first turn our attention to the mere natural growth of the corn-plant, which our Lord takes as the basis of His spiritual instruction. This is necessary indeed in order that we may appreciate the force of the parable: and even this natural growth has its important connection, both with the principle of trust in God and with diligent performance of human duty.

The point of the parable is this, that from the moment when the corn is put into the ground, the husbandman dismisses all anxiety in regard to its growth. He is perfectly convinced that it will grow in the usual orderly manner, and that it will grow according to its kind. He proceeds to go about other business. "He sleeps and rises night and day." From the sowing-time to the harvest-time he knows that he can do nothing to promote or modify the growth. He leaves all this to the inevitable operations of nature. "The seed springs and grows up, he knows not how. For the earth bringeth forth fruit of herself—first the blade, then the ear, then the full corn in the ear."

The farmer is one of the most perfect examples of faith which the world can show. He has the most calm and absolute confidence that all these results will take place, and in this order, after the seed has been put into the ground. He is also quite sure, not only that this order will be observed in the growth of the corn-plant, but that the growth will be according to its kind. If he sows wheat, he knows that the harvest will not be barley. In this confidence he waits patiently till the harvest, and then—when the fruit is ripe—"immediately," without waiting a day, unless the weather should discourage him, or difficulty arise in obtaining labour, "he puts in the sickle, because the harvest is come."

Moreover, the husbandman is an example not only of faith, but of faith showing itself by works. He is so perfectly certain of all these things, he has such absolute confidence in God's beneficent laws, that he makes his arrangements long beforehand,—he engages his servants, he buys his ploughs, he stocks his farm, he attends markets,—all the whole varied business of his active life grows out of this one principle of calm trust in what God has ordained and fixed.

So we see human activity in its connection with a law of nature and with a law of growth. Why is there not the same faith in regard to the spiritual world? and why not faith manifesting itself in the same way by works? Our Saviour clearly uses the natural world as an emblem of the spiritual: and we now turn to the operation of the law of growth in Grace, as illustrated by this parable.

Nature will have its own way, and so will Grace. And as we trust Nature, so we ought to trust Grace. And as this very confidence leads to activity and diligence in one instance, so it ought in the other instance. This is clearly part of what He says to us: and this is the part of His instruction to which attention is here invited. Let us now contemplate this sacred comparison in three points of view.

First, let us give a few moments to the consideration of it in its bearing on education.

Anxiety on the part of Christian parents is natural and inevitable, knowing as they do the inherent evil that is in their children, and the temptations to which they will be exposed. The mother's heart is often dis-ressed, even at a very early period, when she sees the plain symptoms of bad temper, selfishness, and untruthfulness. As years pass on, the father trembles inwardly, when he marks the rising spirit of independence, perhaps of rebellion; for he well knows what the consequences are of passion and folly. Under these circumstances, to the parent who prays and has confidence in God, it is a great comfort to reflect on this law of gradual, secret, invisible growth, which is a principle of the world of Grace as well as the world of Nature. We must not expect too much at an early period, and we must not expect all at once. It would be unreasonable to look for the harvest when the seed-time is hardly past. We are of course bound to do our own part; but we must leave the growth to God.

Nor must we expect this growth to go on without discouragements. Even if we have much ground for hope, we must prepare for disappointments. Even after that fresh early green—the first sweet promise of the coming harvest—has gladdened our eyes, there may be many a sharp wind and bitter frost.

And besides this, natural virtues and spiritual virtues are, in early stages, not easily distinguished. Grace will take its own course and follow its own secret ways; and we cannot ourselves keep Grace alive, or regulate the exercise of its power. We must learn therefore to be patient as well as diligent. Later influences may succeed, where earlier efforts have failed. "Behold, the husbandman waiteth for the precious fruit of the earth, and hath long patience for it, until he receive the early and latter rain. Be ye also patient and stablish your hearts."*

Thus we ought to have far more confidence in prayer and in the hidden goodness and wisdom of God, than in any efforts of our own. Though certainly this kind of confidence ought not to make us relax our exertion. On the contrary, it imposes on us the responsibility of exertion, and stimulates and strengthens exertion, because it causes us to feel that there is something to which we can trust. Whether in the family, or the school, or the parish, the training of the young gives one of the greatest opportunities for the exercise of faith, and for active, hopeful effort. Only we must remember that it is the sowing which belongs to us—that the growth must be left to God—that we sow in order to obtain a harvest—and that our confidence rests on those Divine methods, unknown to us, which are the established laws of the spiritual world.

* James v. 7, 8.

But besides this process of education, viewed as the operation of a Divine law bringing those fruits to maturity of which we have sown the seed, there is for the Christian another very serious subject, connected in the same way with the world of Grace. There is that grave question of the growth of his own religious character.

I am sure I shall have a response from many godly hearts among the readers of these pages, when I say that thoughts and inquiries about this growth are often attended with feelings of much discouragement. It seems sometimes as if we were never to be any better. Bad tempers surprise us when we thought they were overcome: hasty words escape from our lips when we had resolved not to utter them; and on close examination of our daily life we find that the old unworthy motives in our hearts have been at work again. These things are disheartening; and we ask ourselves, with something like despair, "Are we never to improve?"

Now here again some comfort is to be derived from the parallel between the world of Nature and the world of Grace. We must expect variations of season in the one as well as the other. And sometimes the very checks which we suffer may be overruled for bringing the fruits of holiness to maturity. "Tribulation worketh patience; and patience, experience; and experience, hope; and hope maketh not ashamed."* The secret law of God's grace may be operating all this time in ways which we do not understand.

And one law of His spiritual kingdom affecting the growth of character is not altogether secret. I mean the law of the formation of habits. I mean this, that separate acts, continually repeated, and persevered in for a considerable time, result inevitably in a new condition of mind and heart. Things that were difficult gradually become easy; things that were disagreeable gradually become congenial. This is an established law of God's government as certainly as the law of the growth of the grain from seed-time to harvest.

And evidently it is our duty and our happiness to act in harmony with that law. It imposes upon us, in fact, the double responsibility of eradicating bad habits, and of forming good habits. Weeds grow as well as corn, and in the selfsame way. When there is neglect in regard to the former, progress in regard to the latter will be hindered, just as is the case in the literal cornfield under the influences of rain and sunshine.

Thus in the laws of our mental and moral constitution we have a very strong ground for confidence, a very urgent motive for diligent exertion. And this exertion ought to take a healthy and orderly form. There may be a disquietude of mind which is very unfavourable to growth—a morbid form of self-inquiry which is almost like pulling up the plant to see how it is growing; while if there be a diligent, watchful attention to the details of common duties, we may have a cheerful confidence that, according to God's established law, the growth of Christian character is really going on—"first the blade, then the ear, then the full corn in the ear." One of the early Christian writers puts the matter in this way: "When we conceive good desires, we put seed into the ground; when we begin to act, we are the blade; when we finish a good work, we are the ear; when we are matured into the habit of good, we are the full corn in the ear."

* Rom. v. 3-5.

And there is one subject more which to the religious mind is the occasion of serious thought in connection with the progress of spiritual growth; and this perhaps is the subject on which the parable is most especially intended to bear. I mean the advance of Christ's spiritual kingdom in this world.

Christ our Saviour is gone away from the earth. It is as though the husbandman had sown his seed and left it to itself, and turned his thoughts to other things; and the progress seems very slow, and the prospect of the great harvest very discouraging. And indeed the seed is left to itself; but it has life in itself, and it "springs up and grows"—we "know not how." And though Christ is departed for the present, the Holy Spirit is ever working; and we do see some of the results, though we cannot understand the process. "The wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof, but canst not tell whence it cometh and whither it goeth; so is every one that is born of the Spirit."*

There is, beyond any doubt, in Christ's kingdom a secret law of progress, inexplicable to us. When we look back on earlier ages, we ourselves can distinctly see what wonderful effects the Gospel has already wrought. And so it will be in time to come. Not indeed without interruption. I do not expect any outward visible growth of good, gradually and uniformly overspreading the earth, before Christ's second advent. On the contrary, when I read His prophecies, and the prophecies of His apostles, I look for far greater outbreaks of evil than the world has yet seen. But still I believe He does allow us to perceive some symptoms of His secret working, and of His preparation for the great harvest. Every marked change in society—every new step in the progress of human thought—every great scientific discovery—these are like the sound of the chariot-wheels of His coming. And meanwhile, these things are also (it is our part to remember this) opportunities which ought to be promptly made use of by God's true servants for promoting good in the world.*

One main point that is urged in these remarks is this, that everything which is ascertained to be one of God's laws in the government of the world involves, on our side, a corresponding duty. And this is as true of a providential law in the moral world as of a physical law in the world of nature. Our part is thoughtfully and seriously to watch what is going on around us—to be very sensible of the evil which prevails—to be on the alert for using remedies. God does suggest remedies in the course of His providential ordering of the world; and with us rests the responsibility of observing them and using them. Take any great discovery or invention. Once established, it constitutes one of the laws under which the human race was appointed to live. Let it be the invention of printing. The changes which followed in the condition of society were irresistible: and thenceforward a new obligation was imposed on every man of Christian feeling to do his utmost to apply the use of the printing-press to good and religious ends. Or let it be the railway system. How much capability for good or for evil there may be in that system we hardly yet know. But it is one of the powers under which henceforward we must live. It is now a providential law, impressed upon society: and we are bound to learn and to employ what methods it can supply for promoting the charities of life, for diminishing vice, and for the spread of the kingdom of God.

A principle runs through God's moral world of responsible beings, strictly analogous to the principle running through that physical world which supplies our earthly wants. There is a law of growth in Grace as in Nature. The law is briefly laid down in the words quoted at the head of this paper, and more fully expounded in the parable from which they are taken. We have seen how

* In one of those remarkable sermons which were preached by Dr. Newman between 1830 and 1840, he says:—"These theories of science are ever most useful, in enabling us to obey the course of God's providence, and the ordinances of His will to the benefit of man. Thus we are enabled to enjoy His gifts; and let us thank Him for the knowledge which enables us to do so, and honour those who are His instruments in communicating it."—Vol. ii. p. 405.

the principle is exemplified in three instances of familiar experience—in improvement through the religious education which relies on the gracious promises of God—in the improvement of our own characters, through the operation of the law of habit—in improvement of general morality and happiness, by the aid of whatever providential agencies are within our reach. Other illustrations will easily suggest themselves to the religious mind. May God enable us in this spirit to read the harvest lesson of the present year, and of any future years that He may grant us to see!

JOHN S. HOWSON.

EVANGELICAL WORK IN SPAIN.

THE writer of these notes, who has recently visited Spain, proposes to give a simple statement of what came under his own observation in connection with the Protestant movement in that country. Cradled as she was only a few years ago in the midst of bitter and unrelenting persecution, the Spanish Protestant Church—the new Sister of the Reformation—lays claim all the more strongly to our sympathy.

Entering Spain from the north, the first place we visited where Evangelical worship has been established was Valladolid—the birthplace of that ruffian Philip II., and likewise notable as the place where Christopher Columbus, after a life unspeakably noble, went to his rest. The house where he lived for some years and in which he died still stands, and is pointed out to the passing traveller. We were sorry to learn how greatly the Protestant congregation had been persecuted here. At the instigation of an intolerant priesthood they have been twice or thrice turned out of their place of worship, and been compelled on each occasion to rent premises inferior to those they had been driven from. The numbers who now attend public worship are in consequence smaller than they once were, and much smaller than they would be had they a larger church in a better situation. But on the other hand Señor Cruzada, the teacher, assured us that the number of devoted adherents and members of the church at Valladolid has not fallen off. There are about eighty members—all very poor, but they contribute a little towards the cost of ordinances. We looked over the list of names, with the small contributions affixed to each, with much interest. Besides Señor Castro and Señor Cruzada there is a colporteur stationed at Valladolid, Señor Flores.

We reached Madrid on 3rd April. We were fortunate at being there while the Synod of the Reformed Church was assembled, as we thus made the acquaintance of several pastors of churches at places we were unable to visit. The chief business of the Synod was to revise and adopt a Confession of Faith which had been prepared by a committee previously appointed. We attended the meetings on several occasions, and, being familiar with the Spanish tongue, were greatly interested in the proceedings. We were much pleased with the manner in which discussions on a number of the articles in the Confession were conducted, and it was satisfactory to know that, though several continental deputies counselled the adoption of less distinct utterances, they all ended in the adoption of sound Evangelical views. We were greatly impressed by the tact and ability of Señor Cabrera of Seville, whose views almost invariably commended themselves to the acceptance of the Assembly. Several lay delegates or elders were present and took a prominent part in the proceedings. The adoption of this Confession of Faith is a most important step, and it will serve as a bond of union (or "alianza" as they themselves call it) amongst churches hitherto isolated and separated from each other.

Another important step taken by the Synod was the adoption of some wise regulations, restricting the use of the pulpits in the different churches to authorised and properly qualified men. This was a needful step, as hitherto (no doubt owing to the scarcity of qualified preachers) their pulpits have been occasionally occupied by men not "apt to teach." Before the close of the proceedings, the Synod ordained several pastors, and licensed Señor Flores, of Valladolid, as a preacher of the gospel, as well as Señor Escudero, an ex-canon of the Roman Catholic Church in Mexico. Escudero, although comparatively a young man, has had a somewhat remarkable history. He was chaplain to the unfortunate Empress Charlotte of Mexico, and came with her to Europe. After returning to Mexico, he came a second time to Europe as secretary to his bishop, who attended the celebrated Œcumenical Council. When at Rome, Escudero expressed himself as adverse to the pretensions of the papacy. He was put in prison, but afterwards found his way to Spain, where he is now effectively assisting the Rev. Mr. Jameson, of the Limon Spanish Protestant congregation at Madrid.

During our stay at Madrid there was a social gathering of nearly all the pastors and delegates who were attending the Synod; and they formed a band of Christian labourers in the long uncultivated Spanish field, whose labours in many parts of Spain have already been honoured by the Master of the vineyard.

We had also while at Madrid several opportunities of worshipping with our Spanish Protestant brethren. On Wednesday evening, 3rd April, we heard Señor Carrasco preach in his own church, Madera Bajo Street, from the text, "They hated me without a cause." There were present about four hundred and fifty persons. On Thursday evening, in Señor Ruet's church, Señor Sanchez, of Huelva, preached to a congregation of six or seven hundred from the words, "This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation, that Jesus Christ came into the world to save sinners." A large proportion of the congregations on each occasion were labouring men, who, after a hard day's toil, came in their work-day clothes, and appeared to be earnest and devout worshippers. On Sunday morning, 7th April, we were again at Señor Carrasco's church, where we found a large congregation of about eight hundred people. Señor Cabrera, of Seville, occupied the pulpit. In the evening, at Señor Ruet's church, we found a large congregation of eight or nine hundred people, Señor Ruet himself conducting the services. On the evening of Monday, 8th April, we went to the church of the Limon, an outlying district of Madrid, where Mr. Jameson ministers to a Spanish congregation. Señor Cabrera preached. There were about two hundred and fifty persons present, which we understood was a larger congregation than usual. The present congregation has been recently formed. There are about thirty or forty communicants. Mr. Jameson has a mission-hall in another district, where Señor Escudero preaches with much acceptance to large congregations. A Bible-woman also labours in Mr. Jameson's district, and under his direction. Mr. Moore's recently-formed congregation at Peñuelos numbers from two to three hundred. There are most useful and well-conducted day-schools for boys and girls, attended by nearly three hundred children, attached to his church; and we were glad to find that day-schools are also connected with Señor Carrasco's and Mr. Jameson's churches. Besides these four congregations in Madrid, there is another under the pastorate of Mr. Knapp, an American Baptist, who has also day-schools under his superintendence. To Mr. Knapp's grief, a number of his agents lately went back to the Church of Rome.

Altogether, the work in Madrid appeared to be in a most promising state. We were much struck by the hearty way in which the people joined in singing the hymns. Many who were unable to read had evidently learned the words, and were able heartily to join in the service. Señor Carrasco's and Señor Ruet's congregations occupy very humble places of worship, low in the roof and badly ventilated. It would be most desirable to see better churches provided, but as the people are very poor, this is a step they themselves are quite unable to take.

From Madrid we proceeded to Granada, where we spent a few days under the shadow of the celebrated Alhambra. The congregation at Granada is fluctuating, and not very large. We gathered that the attendance now is considerably smaller than at one time. But, as at Valladolid, that does not imply any diminution in the number of really interested and devoted adherents and members of the church. Señor Alhama frequently goes on evangelistic visits to the villages in the neighbouring valley, the fertile Vega of Granada. He is invariably well received, and has often large and attentive congregations. There are good day-schools for both boys and girls connected with Señor Alhama's church.

After leaving Granada we visited Cordova, where there is likewise evangelical work and a Protestant church organized. At first, when religious liberty was conceded in Spain (about four years ago), everything looked hopeful and encouraging at Cordova—crowds gathered to hear the Word—but there have since been many discouragements. A thousand people congregated on the very first occasion, when Señor Soler preached. But he, unhappily, turned out an unsatisfactory agent, and ultimately went back to the Church of Rome. The labourer who succeeded Soler was also unsatisfactory. Lately, Señor Sanchez has gone, and we heard good testimony to his zeal and devotion. The communion was recently dispensed, when sixty-two persons joined in the ordinance. The congregation which now assembles for worship usually numbers fifty or sixty. Señor Sanchez, besides preaching twice on Sabbath, has two week-evening services. On the other evenings of the week he has Bible and adult classes. Such zeal and energy we were glad to find existing, and Mr. Duncan Shaw, a well-known friend of the cause in Cordova, gave us good accounts of Señor Sanchez's devotedness to his work.

From Cordova we passed on to the large and important city of Seville. This is the field of Señor Cabrera's labours, and where he has been the means of doing much good. Before Señor Cabrera embraced the reformed doctrines, he was a priest of the Romish Church, and belonged to the order of the Esculapians, the one which, being a teaching order, has not been suppressed in Spain. He is perhaps the most accomplished scholar and the ablest theologian of the Reformed Church of Spain. Through the liberality of Christian friends in Great Britain and the United States, one of the Roman Catholic city churches was purchased for him and his congregation some time ago. It is a beautiful church, with a high dome, and very comfortably fitted up; but we were sorry to find it a very unsuitable place for speaking in. This church was one of the many which the state sold when it appropriated the funds and property of the monastic orders to national purposes, a few years ago. The congregation usually numbers about a hundred and fifty. Señor Cabrera as yet has no day-school attached to his congregation. The people are very poor, as at the other places we visited. Señor Cabrera's stipend is raised abroad, chiefly in Scotland.

The English chaplain at Seville, the Rev. Mr. Tugwell, has devoted much of his energy and strength to the gospel work at Seville in face of opposition, and deserves the highest praise. At the schools which he established, and which he finds the means for sustaining, there are two hundred and fifty children, obtaining instruction gratuitously. His efforts have stirred up the Romish priests to establish free schools also; and, though the spirit of opposition is not to be admired, the results, we hope, may be good and useful. A mission church, in which a liturgical service is used, has been begun, under Mr. Tugwell's auspices, by Señor Palomares, an ex-priest. Mr. Tugwell's educational efforts have prospered better than those of an evangelistic character.

Cadiz was the last town we visited in Spain, where the new reformation has got a foothold, and with what we saw and heard there we were much interested. There are two Protestant congregations in Cadiz; one under the pastorate of Señor Hernandez, the other under the pastoral care of the Rev. Mr. Benoliel. The former is sustained by the Edinburgh committee, the latter by the United Presbyterian Church. Señor Hernandez has a congregation numbering about four hundred in all. The attendance at public worship is usually one hundred and fifty to two hundred, and the membership of the church has increased largely during the past year. In 1869 there were thirty-five communicants. In March, 1871, there were seventy, in November ninety, and in March of this year one hundred and twenty-seven sat down at the Lord's table. Mr. Benoliel's congregation is a much larger one. His church is very commodious and well-situated. Sometimes the congregation numbers five or six hundred persons. This congregation has been more recently planted than the other, and there are as yet only about thirty members. Admission to the membership of Mr. Benoliel's church is only granted after long probation, and on public profession of faith in Christ before the congregation. We were greatly interested in visiting the admirable day-schools in connection with Mr. Benoliel's church. They are under excellent management, and seem to be very popular. The number in daily attendance we found to be about two hundred and fifty boys and girls, with three hundred and twenty-six on the roll at the time of our visit. Nor is Mr. Benoliel's activity confined to Cadiz. He has recently arranged for mission-work at the adjoining town of San Fernando, where a large hall was being fitted up and an evangelist ready to undertake the work with every prospect of success. Mr. Benoliel had not seen it to be his duty to attend the synod at Madrid, although labouring as the representative of a Presbyterian Church, but we trust he may ere long cast in his lot with his brethren of the Spanish Reformed Church.

So far we have borne witness only to what came under our own observation. There are many other evangelical churches in other places which we were unable to visit; but the narrative of what we did see should serve to assure Christian people in England and elsewhere, regarding the character and extent of the religious movement in Spain. The Spanish Reformers of the sixteenth century were all of the higher classes of society—educated men. They were too prominent and notable to elude the diabolical vigilance of the inquisitors. Now it is different. The common people hear the word gladly. Amongst them the good seed of the kingdom has been widely scattered, and it would be impossible now to eradicate the reformed doctrines, or to take the Scriptures out of the hands of the people.

LITTLE ALICE.

BLESSINGS on my little Alice !
 Be her heart a brimming chalice,
 Full of love, and free of malice.

Through life's journey, glad or weeping ;
 Toiling, resting ; waking, sleeping ;
 God still have her in His keeping.

Jesu ! bless my little daughter,
 Wash her in the blood which bought her,
 Give her drink of living water.

With the bread eternal feed her,
 In the way of duty speed her ;
 For Thy name's sake, guide her, lead her.

Her may sin or Satan never
 From Thy side, O Saviour, sever,
 Till she dwells with Thee for ever !

THE CHRISTIAN'S WALK.

WE walk by faith, not by sight—these were the words that rose to our recollection on visiting the ruins of that famous old castle at St. Andrews, from which those earliest and noblest of Scottish martyrs, Hamilton and Wishart, came to die at the stake. Groping our way along a tortuous passage, we descended by some steps into an inner prison; where a faint light, streaming through a loophole in the massive walls, revealed an opening in the centre of the floor. It looked like the mouth of a draw-well. Candles lighted and swung down, we saw the shaft descending into the very bowels of the rock, and, like the neck of a bottle, widening out below into a dark, damp, dreary vault. A dreadful dungeon, it was called—and justly called—an Oubliette, or place of forgetfulness; those that black mouth once swallowed up being henceforth lost to light and liberty, to their friends and the world, almost as much as the dead that “in the grave forgotten lie.”

It made one shudder to look down into that horrible pit; nothing seen but “the blackness of darkness,” nor heard but the muffled sound of the waves as, breaking on its rocky walls, they seemed to moan for the crimes that had been perpetrated there. There, speaking of this very dungeon, John Knox says, “many of God’s dear children suffered death;” slowly pining away—their life ebbing out like the tide upon the shore, or suffering sudden death at the hand of the assassin. Such were the dark and bloody days of Popery—gone, we trust, never to return! And standing there, as our fancy called up the great and good men entering that low-browed door to be swung down into this living sepulchre, like a coffin into its grave, and never to leave it unless to die on the scaffold or at the stake, we could not help exclaiming, “They walked by faith, not by sight.”

St. Paul himself makes a similar use of these words. In his hands they were what the heathen, who had neither desires nor hopes beyond the present world, must have regarded as a complete enigma—a key not only to the patience, but even the cheerfulness, with which the first Christians bore their sufferings; though obscure and humble, the magnanimity they displayed; how they gloried in tribulation, and took joyfully the spoiling of their goods; how they sought death, rather than shunned it, smiling in the face of the King of Terrors, and gathering crowds to see them go to the stake, singing, rejoicing, radiant as a bride to the arms of her bridegroom. He speaks of stoning, scourging, famine, exile, prisons, and cruel tortures, even of death itself with a sort of divine contempt. Calling what makes other men shudder and has sometimes turned the bravest into cowards, “light afflictions,” he says, “Our light afflictions, which are but for a moment, work out for us a far more exceeding, even an eternal weight of glory.” The reason why?—“we walk by faith, not by sight”—“We look not at the things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen; for the things which are seen are temporal; but the things which are not seen are eternal.”

No doubt, our days are different from those of the Apostle. Not that, like many other great and ancient empires, Satan’s has been overthrown; or that the revolutions which have changed the face of the world, have changed human nature. By no means. “The carnal mind is enmity against God” still, is not subject to his law, nor indeed can be; and never will be till God pours out his Spirit, and taking away the stony heart, fill its place with one of flesh. Yet that old enmity, restrained by providential circumstances, does not chafe, and rage, and foam, against the Church as once it did. In the beautiful language of Holy Scripture, “no sound of archers is heard at the place of the drawing of water;” the sword of persecution hangs in its sheath, nor is red now with aught but rust; and the fires are sleeping in their ashes that Pagans and Papists kindled in the days of old. Still they are there; ready to burst out—the world, like that volcanic mountain where, though vineyard and fig-trees, orange and olive and citron groves mantle its sides with the richest verdure, an occasional groan, a tremor, a puff of smoke, a burst of lava, shows that there is fire within, and that the volcano, which in other days buried Pompeii and Herculaneum beneath its fiery discharges, is dormant only, and not dead.

So is it with the carnal mind, and its enmity to God. Any way, and in all ages, His people have, as much as they ever had, to walk by faith. Not only so, but we may have more reason to dread a life full of pleasures than one full of perils. No doubt, it is much more pleasant to walk on a flowery meadow than on a rough and flinty road. But the roughest road may be the safest, and the hardest life the holiest. How much better, for instance, for David when the host went out to battle had he gone with it, resigning the ease and pleasures of his palace for the hardships of a campaign; instead of his beautiful and alluring wife to have had Uriah himself at his side, grim with the dust and blood of battle? His body might have been wounded there, but not so likely his conscience; fighting the Philistines by day and sleeping on the hard cold ground by night, he had been away from the soft temptations that ended in so sad and shameful a fall.

Whatever be the character of the times, or the age we live in, or our condition in life, as there is but one name given under heaven whereby man can be saved, there is but one way to it. Not two, far less many, roads to heaven. With all the saints now in glory, whether they wear or wear not the martyr's crown, we must walk by faith, not by sight. We cannot be saved or sanctified otherwise. Never otherwise, be the road long or short, the voyage calm or stormy, shall we reach that happy home, where, amid the beatitudes of the skies, and in the presence of Him who loved and redeemed us to God by his blood, faith shall be changed to sight, and our brightest hopes be lost, like stars at sunrise, in the blaze of unimagined and unimaginable enjoyment. God bring us, through his grace, and by the blood of the covenant, to that blessed home! Meanwhile, let us turn our attention to one or two of the many ways in which we must walk by faith rather than by sight.

Believers walk by faith in the work and cross of Jesus Christ.—By faith Noah, by faith Abraham, by faith David, and many other saints in Old Testament days, won themselves a place in the "cloud of witnesses;" and yet I cannot but think that the old man who waited in our Lord's days for the consolation of Israel, though his name has no place in that distinguished roll, was second to none of them. In old age, when, to borrow figures from Solomon, the almond-tree blossoms, and the grinders cease, and the windows are darkened, and the keepers of the house tremble, and the grasshopper is a burden, man "is afraid of that which is high;" yet, where shall we find faith taking a higher flight, rising on stronger wings than Simeon's? Never was finer fruit plucked by the hand of God or man than from that old gnarled, moss-grown tree.

Venerable for years as for grace, what is this he holds in arms that tremble more from joy than age, as he bends over the object of his earnest gaze a head white with the snows of many winters?—an infant, a feeble infant, the child of a humble woman, clad in mean attire; that, like a common vagrant's, had been born in a stable and cradled in a manger, and now, awoke from sleep, wails, and cries, and, like any other child, refuses to be comforted but at the fountains of a mother's breast? Its life a spark, a foot could tread out; a flame, a breath could blow out, how easy it were to quench it—the young of no creature that walks the earth, or swims the waters, or cleaves the air, more helpless than that little child!

There is a stage in life and in the ordinary providence of God when the feelings get blunted, and enthusiasm dies, and we sink to some extent into a state of apathy; at least grow calm and placid as rivers that approach the sea. Yet, though Simeon had reached that stage, the sight of this child throws him into a holy ecstasy—his eye flushes with exultation; his pale and withered face beams with gratitude, and hope, and triumph! The long-looked-for, the Hope of Israel, whom prophets and righteous men of old desired to see, has come at last; and now, as if there were nothing more on earth worth looking at, nor waiting for, the old man, borne away on a transport of joy, raises his hands and eyes to heaven to exclaim, "Lord, now lettest Thou Thy servant depart in peace, for mine eyes have seen Thy salvation!" Thy salvation? Spoken of a weeping, wailing infant, folded in a mother's arms, hanging on a mother's breast, faith never uttered a bolder speech, nor without faith man a more foolish one; but—no drowning man who as he rises from the cold plunge catches at a passing straw—Simeon saw in that child, like the giant oak in the tiny acorn, the Saviour of mankind, and, in the arm that hung on a mother's neck, the power which sustains the universe.

He certainly on that occasion walked by faith, not by sight. Yet we have not as much, but more than he, to do the same. Mine eyes, he said, have seen thy salvation—a privilege this our eyes have never enjoyed; nor shall, till they are closed in death; shut on this and opened on a better world. Still less has our faith those aids which their senses lent to the faith of our Lord's disciples. They saw the feet that walked Galilee's stormy waters—they touched the hands that wrenched her fetters from the tomb—they heard the voice which rebuked disease, and calmed the tempest, and called back the dead, and, better and greater than all, said to the woman who lay weeping at his feet, "Thy sins be forgiven thee." These twelve men had the evidence of their senses for the existence, the presence, and the divine power of Jesus, as much as Thomas, for the fact of his resurrection, when, turning to the doubter, half in kindness and half in rebuke, our Lord said, "Reach hither thy fingers and behold my hands, and reach hither thy hand and thrust it into my side, and be not faithless, but believing."

Do we wish that we had lived in their days; esteeming them happier than ourselves? We have no cause to envy either Simeon or the twelve. They saw and believed; but blessed, says our Lord, are they who have not seen and yet have believed. If we have been enabled by grace to believe, our faith is a higher attainment than theirs, and indeed I know no flight of human genius for boldness and sublimity to be compared with the faith of the humblest Christian. It is the gift of God, as the Bible says, and a marvellous gift it is. Regard it. The emigrant who stands on yon deck watching the mountains of his native land sink beneath the wave, has seen and handled the gold that others have washed from the sands or dug from the mines of the distant land to which his ship is bound; he has held converse with those who have been there; he has seen them go out poor and return rich, and unlike Naomi go forth empty and come back full. With such evidences of its existence it is easy for him to believe in a country beyond the seas where the rivers run over golden sands. But we believe in the existence and have set our hearts on the treasures, and are sustained amid the trials of life by the hopes, of a country, not beyond the seas, but beyond the grave; where there is no night, nor sorrow, nor sin; and whence, though we have seen thousands depart for it, we never saw one return to reveal its secrets. We believe in a Saviour we never saw, nor have seen any that ever did; and to Him have committed not all our money, but something more precious than money, than all the gold in the Bank of England, our immortal souls. We stake our everlasting welfare on a work done long centuries ago, of which—whatever Papists say to the contrary—neither in the manger where He was cradled, nor in the cross where He hung in bleeding agony, nor in the sepulchre that received his sacred remains, nor in any of all the sick He healed or the lepers He cleansed, or the dead He raised, is there so much as a vestige on the earth for faith to cling to, like ivy to a mouldering ruin. Such confidence in any ordinary matter, we ourselves would regard as the highest folly. Yet the foolishness of God is wiser than men; and in making such a venture we are not mad, as Paul said to Festus. The only ground on which we plead for pardon lies in the mercy of the Father and the merits of the Son; and in rejecting as the ground of our acceptance with God all that might be accounted our good works—our penitence, our prayers, our virtues, and charities—to lay the whole stress and strain on the righteousness of Jesus Christ, on his imputed righteousness, in thus walking by faith, not by sight, we are not casting away the substance to grasp at an empty shadow.

Unseen! What though Jesus, lover and Saviour of our souls, is so? The most real and enduring objects are unseen, and the things we see are but the shadows of the unseen. Our spirits, for instance, are unseen, but they shall survive the stroke of death, and live when this body is a heap of unanimated dust. These heavens we see shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat, the earth also and the works that are therein shall be burned up—they shall perish but not their Maker, and He is unseen. "No man hath seen God at any time or can see Him;" and to tell me that He is unseen in whose service I would choose to live, and in whose blessed arms I would like to die, no more shakes my faith in Jesus Christ than in the existence of God, of my soul, of angels, of the heavens above me, or of those redeemed and exalted spirits who beckon us there and wait our coming.

Unseen! Yonder lighthouse tower, away among the tumbling waves, seems to have nothing else than them to rest on; yet there it lifts its stately form, beautiful in the calm, and calm amid the rage and billows of the wintry tempest, to warn the sailor off the sunken reef, or guide him to his desired haven, through the gloom of night and over the pathless sea; and this because beneath these weltering waves it has a rock to rest on. Blessed tower, that with its light flashing through the darkness rises on many an anxious eye as the star of hope, what it, resting secure on an immovable foundation, is to a house built on the sand bank, the shifting sand which the last storm threw up and the next may sweep back into the sea, Christ's righteousness and works are to ours—to the best of ours. Hence the language of a dying Christian, of one like Dorcas, "full of good works," whose feet now cold in death, had long trod in Jesus' footprints—this his answer to one who, little knowing what can support a man in such an hour, was recalling the good he had done, "I take my good works and my bad works to cast them into one heap and flee from both to Jesus—Jesus! He is all my salvation and all my desire." Followed as loyally through life and trusted as lovingly in death, may He be ours!—ours with such full assurance that we can say, "Whom having not seen we love, and in whom, though now we see Him not, yet believing, we rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory."

Believers walk by faith in the Providence of God.—In language intelligible to men of every tongue, "the heavens declare the glory of God," says the Psalmist, "and the firmament sheweth his handiwork; day unto day uttereth speech, and night unto night sheweth knowledge. There is no speech nor language where their voice is not heard—their line is gone out through all the earth, and their words to the end of the world." None so deaf as may not hear that voice. All nature worships God; sea and shore, valley and snow-clad mountain, earth and azure sky, are vocal with hymns of praise—praise heard as well in the sweet songs of woodlands as in the roar of the tempest and the peal of the rolling thunder. No nobler study than the providence of God; nor nobler task than to illustrate its might and explore its mysteries. But to write a book to prove it, to demonstrate the being, power, and presence of a Supreme Intelligence would seem to be a waste both of time and labour. Carved on every rock, painted on every flower, written on every leaf, who are so blind as not to discover these by the light of a noonday sun, are not likely to see them better by help of our feeble taper. "The invisible things of him," says St. Paul, "from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even his eternal power and Godhead;" and for ourselves—though the fool may say in his heart there is no God—we stand astonished to find any man outside the walls of a lunatic asylum denying either the being or the providence of God.

But while a general providence is manifest, the special care God takes of his own people, as distinguished from a world that lieth in wickedness, is often a thing less of sight than of faith. The tares and wheat grow side by side; the sun shines alike on the evil and the good; the rain falls alike on the just and unjust; the corn grows as tall, and the sheaves stand as thick, on the fields of Nabal as of Boaz—of a godless as of a godly husbandman; and of many things else, besides death, it is true, that "there is one event to all." Faith in the special providence of God finds greater stumbling-blocks than even these in its way. Lazarus, over whom angels hover to carry his soul when he expires to Abraham's bosom, sits a beggar at the rich man's gate; and in bitter poverty, in wasting sickness, in household sorrows, in successive bereavements, God's children have sometimes the bitterest cup to drink, and the heaviest burden to bear. They want where others waste. Others sleep in peace when their eyes are kept waking, and their pillow is soaked with tears; and with half their children and more than half their hearts buried in the churchyard, they may be said, amid crowding memories of the dead, "to dwell among the tombs." "Peace, Mary," said a godly woman, who had been bereaved of all her family, to a querulous and godless neighbour that refused to be comforted because God had taken one out of many; "Peace, Mary, you have had but one, I have six pairs of empty shoes to look on!" On climbing the steep sides of a lofty mountain that, heaving its head high above all around it, the sun at rising was the first to touch, and at setting was the last to leave, we found the rock that crowned it riven with thunder, and its summit all naked and bare; and so it has happened, and that not unfrequently, that they who live nearest to God, with their heads I may say constantly in heaven, enjoy least earthly prosperity, and have the fewest earthly comforts. Hence the complaint of Job, "The tabernacles of robbers prosper;" and hence, also, the question of an afflicted and bewildered prophet, "Wherefore doth the way of the wicked prosper, and are all they happy that deal treacherously?"

"Behind a frowning providence God hides a smiling face."

So, like the bird that keeps her song for the gloom of night, and sings, they say, the sweetest when her throbbing breast is wounded by a piercing thorn, sings the poet; and certainly, in dark and dubious circumstances, our comfort lies in believing that—in walking by faith and not by sight.

I have known a timid traveller whose route lay across the higher Alps, on a path that, no broader than a mule's foothold, skirted a dizzy precipice, where we saw the foaming river far below minished to a silver thread, find it safest to shut her eyes; nor attempt to guide the course, or touch the bridle where a touch were fatal, throwing steed and rider over to bound from shelf to shelf and be dashed to pieces in the valley below. And there are times and circumstances when to be saved from falling into sinful doubts, and even into blank despair, the believer must, if we may say so, shut his eyes; and committing his way to God, let the bridle lie on the neck of providence, and walk not by sight but faith. God—however things may look—has not forgotten to be gracious, nor is his mercy clean gone for ever; and when we are walking in darkness and have no light, there is nothing for it but to trust in the Lord, to “stay ourselves on God.”

Had Jacob done so, he had not been so utterly distracted and crushed by the loss of Joseph; nor, as he clung to Benjamin, had he turned on his other sons, like a bear on the hunters come to bereave her of her whelps, with this doleful, angry cry, “Me have ye bereaved of my children; Joseph is not, and Simeon is not; and will ye also take Benjamin away?—all these things are against me.” Had he done so, he had borne himself more erect before the king of Egypt, a venerable and noble witness for God in a heathen palace, instead of wailing out this pitiful complaint, Few and evil have been the days of my pilgrimage on earth! He lived to unsay that, and regret that he had walked so much by sight and not by faith; living to see, as all God’s people shall in another world, if not in this, that all things—the bitter and the sweet together, losses as well as gains, coffins as much as cradles—were not against, but for him. One of whom it might be said that “nothing in his life became him so much as his leaving it,” see him dying!—his faith breaking out in full and bright effulgence, like the sun at the close of a cloudy day. Propped up on pillows, with one hand on Ephraim’s, and the other on Manasseh’s head, he raises his sightless orbs to heaven to breathe out this grand confession and prayer—The God which fed me all my life long unto this day, the angel which redeemed me from all evil, bless the lads! With that history, and many such before them, never let God’s dear children yield—no, not in life’s darkest hour—to the thought that all things are against them. Even when deep answereth unto deep at the noise of his water-spouts, and all God’s billows and waves go over them, and their barque, with sails torn to ribbons and bulwarks gone by the board, is staggering through a sea of troubles, never let them fancy that they are the sport of winds and waves. Your Father is at the helm! The Lord reigneth, let his enemies tremble; the Lord reigneth, let his people rejoice: He will make all things work together for good to them who love Him, and are the called according to his purpose.

Believers walk by faith in another world.—

The discovery of the New World, as the vast continent of America with its islands is called, was not, as many great discoveries have been, an accident, but the reward of faith; of Christopher Columbus’s faith. Fruits were found on the western shores of Europe, cast up there by Atlantic waves, diverse from any which the temperate, the frozen, or the fiery zones of the Old World produced. Strolling along the sea-beach, Columbus one day picks up, I shall say, a nut; he takes it into his hand, takes it into his fertile and capacious mind, and out of that seed grows his faith in another world, lying far beyond that watery horizon, where, as he boldly conjectured and events subsequently proved, the bed of the sea was sown with pearls, and the veins of the mountains were filled with silver, and the rivers that flowed through forests of spices ran over sands of gold. The world thought him mad—mad to leave his two sweet boys, and loving friends, and pleasant home to embark on a sea keel had never ploughed, in quest of a land no man had seen.

God’s people know in whom they have believed, and can give a reason for the faith that is in them. Columbus could do the same; and so he launched his barque on the deep, and with strange stars above and strange seas around him, ominous signs without and fierce mutinies within, hoping where all others despaired, no danger daunting his courage or trials exhausting his patience, he stands by the helm, keeps the prow of his caravel ever onward and westward, till lights gleam on Salvador’s shores, and at break of day “Land,” the joyful cry of “Land” is sung out from the masthead, and with the crew kneeling at his feet and ready almost to worship him, success crowns his faith and patience has her perfect work.

Here, I have always thought, is a type of the believer—only the faith of that bold seaman puts ours to shame. We blush to read it; and as we read the wondrous story we seem to hear an echo of our Lord’s own words, “I have not found such faith, no, not in Israel.” For how stands the case? Where Columbus had conjecture only, we have certainty; where he had not even the word of man, we have the sure testimony of God—that there is another and a better world, where Jesus, having opened a way to it through his blood, waits to receive us, to receive and welcome the very chief of sinner. Thwarted by priests, deceived by kings, regarded by almost all as a dreamer, Columbus had no help from man, but our help is in the Lord our God. And we need that help, and should seek it in earnest prayer; for, though the believer may say with Paul, I can do all things through Christ who strengtheneth me, it is far from an easy thing to walk by faith. Among things seen, to love the unseen, and love the unseen best; with so many attractions drawing, and often dragging us down to earth, to rise, soaring like a lark into the skies; to be in the world and yet not of it; for them that have wives to be as though they have none; for them that weep as though they wept not; for them that rejoice as though they rejoiced not; for them that buy as though they possessed not; for a king on his knees to remember that he is a beggar, and for a beggar in his hovel to remember that he is a king; to believe the hand kind that wounds us; to be content, though it be to place it in his bosom, that Jesus come down into our garden and spoil it of its fairest flower; when we lay a loved one in the coffin and the churchyard mould is rattling on its lid, to say, Father, Thy will be done! This is no easy matter. Who is sufficient for these things? In the corruption of our nature, the snares of Satan, the seductions of a world alienated from God, we have all but insuperable difficulties to encounter; and, abandoning the enterprise, would return to the world, saying, Here will I stay. If I perish, I perish!—but for the promised aids of the Holy Spirit, and our covenant right to all the blessings couched under the grand, the farewell words of Moses, ere he ascended to his unknown grave on Nebo's Mount, "Thy shoes shall be iron and brass, and as thy days so shall thy strength be. There is none like unto the God of Jeshurun, who rideth upon the heaven in thy help, and in his excellency on the sky. The eternal God is thy refuge, and underneath are the everlasting arms. He shall thrust out the enemy from before thee, and shall say, Destroy them. Israel then shall dwell in safety alone; the fountain of Jacob shall be upon a land of corn and wine; his heavens also shall drop down dew. Happy art thou, O Israel; who is like unto thee, O people saved by the Lord, the shield of thy help and the sword of thy excellency!"

THOMAS GUTHRIE.

THE FARMER OF BAAL-SHALISHA.

A Harbrest Miracle.

2 KINGS iv. 42.

PART SECOND.

BAAL-WORSHIP was a species of pantheism. It was a deification of nature—a perfect identification of God with the works of His hands. According to this belief there could be no special movement in nature—no interruption of its totality—no supernatural manifestation of any kind. Whatever action took place in it or upon it was the action of the whole. Like Wordsworth's cloud, nature moved altogether if it moved at all. To counteract the influence of this degrading worship was the great mission of Elisha. He laboured to recall the idea of a personal God—to bring the great I Am home to the hearts, the prayers, and the lives of His covenant people in all the reality and nearness with which He communed with their fathers during their wanderings in the wilderness. The doctrine of a special Providence was the distinctive feature of his teaching. All his works were wrought for the purpose of restoring this missing link between heaven and earth. He passed from miracle to miracle, heaping proof upon proof that He whom they had forgotten in their idolatry—whom they imagined to be too distant to be invoked for the common needs of life—was indeed the God of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob, the Source of all their blessings and the Foundation of all their hopes. In these miracles the Being, who seemed too abstract to be realised in their thoughts, walked visibly before them, and nature, as it were, changed step for a moment, in accommodation to His lofty footsteps.

The harvest-miracle, which we considered in the last number of this magazine, was wrought, however, not so much to produce conviction in the minds of the worshippers of Baal as to strengthen the faith and encourage the hearts of the pupils of the prophetic school at Gilgal. Distinguished as was the position of these prophets, and most important as were the functions which they performed, they were not endowed with the highest gift of direct inspiration; they had not the witness in their own hearts of the Divine presence and power. It would seem, therefore, as if the multiplicity and variety of the miracles wrought by Elisha in connection with the college at Gilgal were intended to compensate them for the want of the internal evidence of prophetic inspiration. They needed to be encouraged in the arduous work in which they were engaged by an assurance appealing to their senses, that greater was He that was with them than all that could be against them. They were very much in the position of the children of Israel in the wilderness. They had resigned their secular callings, by which they might have earned their own bread. They had renounced the life of sense for the life of faith—the independence which man secures by his own efforts for the broad support of the Everlasting Arms. In ordinary circumstances the benevolent offerings of the pious were the roundabout means by which God fed them. He put it into the hearts of the true Israelites to minister to the temporal necessities of those who ministered to them in spiritual things. But during the terrible famine which had devastated all the land, this source of supply was exhausted, and the prophets were therefore thrown directly upon the providence of God.

It is a very significant feature of Elisha's miracle that it was wrought at Gilgal. It was there that the Israelites first tasted of the corn of Canaan; and as the consequence of this, we are told that the manna which had been their food for so many years previously ceased at once. The supernatural food that was necessary in the wilderness, when they sowed not and reaped not, merged into and was superseded by the natural food in a region of agriculture, where man's ordinary labour sufficed to supply his ordinary wants. It was like Christ commanding Jairus and his wife to give their daughter meat after He had raised her from the dead. The miracle must give place to the common processes of life; for the supernatural is temporary and for one purpose, the natural is constant and for all purposes. In connection with this, therefore, it is most interesting to notice that in this same Gilgal the old manna returned when the old corn of the land ceased. The former event was reversed. The natural gave place to the supernatural. The Hand that for several generations had remained concealed behind the veil of the ordinary processes of nature was again put forth to give to man his daily bread when man himself could not supply it. The almighty Arm that had been clothed with the raiment of second causes—with the tilling of the ground, and the sowing, and the reaping of the harvest—until the clothing was almost regarded as the Arm itself, was again made bare in the miracle, to help by direct interposition the representatives of the holy people in their distress. When the fruitful land became a wilderness, the manna of the wilderness came back to feed the faithful; and the covenant-promise was fulfilled that there should be no want to them that fear God.

In all the details of this miracle at Gilgal, we find it to be a striking prefiguration of our Lord's feeding of the multitude in the wilderness of Capernaum. It was the shadow cast before of the coming event—only foreshortened as became its place in the inferior preparatory dispensation, and as wrought by one who had grace only in measure; just as the duller crimson colour and coarser texture of the young spring leaves prepare for and prophecy of the coming blossom with its richer tints and its more delicate substance. In one respect, which has been generally overlooked, our Lord's miracle differs from that of Elisha. The Old Testament miracle was wrought during a time of universal famine, and in a scene where the drought had burnt up the verdure, and the footsteps of desolation had stamped out all the beauty and fertility of nature. Our Lord's miracle, on the contrary, took place during a season of ordinary fruitfulness and plenty. It was not, so to speak, an oasis in the desert, like its prototype, but a greater development of the existing abundance—a fairer garden in a smiling Eden—a focus of nature's luxuriance. It happened in the springtime of the year, after the continuous rains of the short winter had filled the veins of the earth with a copious circulation of life-giving fluid. The thirsty, dried-up soil put forth its fresh green verdure at every pore, and all nature looked refreshed and invigorated as with a new life. It is significantly said that there was much grass in the place,—that Jesus commanded the multitude to sit down on the green grass. That pictorial feature introduced with especial picturesqueness into St. Mark's narrative, of itself irresistibly suggests to us the universal abundance. It speaks to us of the profuse bounty of nature—of that Gracious Hand which maketh grass to grow upon the mountains, which maketh even the wilderness and the solitary place to be glad with beauty, and the desert to rejoice and blossom as the rose. In that uncultivated region nature displayed her wealth of resources as freely and fully as in the corn-fields and vineyards that enlivened the haunts of man, and cheered the heart with their rich promise. Looked at from this point of view, the multiplication of the loaves was only a manifestation of the same Power which on the bare, desolate table of the wilderness spread a plentiful feast of grass, wild fruits and herbs for the sustenance of man and beast,—which converted by the slow processes of nature the stones of the waste into bread, and covered the barren sand, which no man owned or tilled, with verdure. The miracle was on the same line of progression with the natural process—parallel, but not counter to it. The bread which the multitude held in their hands was but a few degrees removed from the grass upon which they sat. They both belonged to the same order of vegetation. A carpet of green grass afforded a welcome resting-place to their wearied bodies; and the seed of barley, a species of grass, furnished grateful nourishment for their exhausted strength. It was the same Power which at first enlarged abnormally the seed of a grass, which multiplied the nutritious elements in its ear, and made barley, so to speak, a Divinely artificial plant, and gave it as a miraculous provision for man's wants—that multiplied the five loaves until they became a sufficiency for thousands. The perennial grass under their feet, at the very moment the miracle was going on, was in the act of multiplying itself by a process of lateral extension, each root sending out a new shoot, and thus, in the absence of blossom and seed, spreading itself over the soil, and affording an abundant Heaven-provided feast for the dumb, helpless creatures that could neither sow nor reap, nor gather into barns. Thus, by a somewhat analogous process in the miracle, our Lord made the same kind of provision for the wants of the multitude who had followed Him into the wilderness far beyond the reach of the ordinary sources of food-supply, as He uniformly makes in the scheme of nature for the supply of the wants of the inferior creatures.

Taken together, the two parallel miracles of Gilgal and Capernaum were meant to counteract, for those who witnessed them and for us who read of them in faith, the effects of Nature, or Baal-worship, the deadening and materialising influence of regularity and uniformity in the ordinances of nature and of human society. They turn away the thoughts, by their wise and gracious interruptions, from the established course of the world, back to its origin and up to its source; and disclose the great Living Will by whose word it was created, and by whose continuous work it is upheld. They connect themselves with the common methods by which bread is grown, just as the miracle of the manna in the wilderness connected itself with the growth of the corn of Canaan and merged into it. They are God's object-lessons, as it were, teaching us the meaning and design of the wider phenomena of nature; God's experiments illustrating the wonderful working of the one Divine Power which everywhere produces out of the various ingredients of the soil and the air the food of common life. He who rained manna directly from heaven; He who multiplied the barley loaves by Elisha's instrumentality at Gilgal; He who fed the multitude at Capernaum, is the same who season after season raises the seed-corn into the waving harvest. We see in the common event no less than in the rare miracle—not a dead course of things, but the work of our Father's hands, the light of His glory, and the tokens of His love. While the more uncommon and astonishing events of His providence are signs to us of a new creation—the first-fruits of a new order, the pledges of a new power which will gradually purge the whole creation, which groaneth and travaileth together in pain until now, from the evil of sin and the curse of barrenness, and cause it to share in the glorious liberty of the sons of God. What are the miracles of Gilgal and Capernaum but the winding up intensively, as it were, by the Divine hand of a providential mechanism which has been working itself down extensively ever since in the prevention of famine and in the multiplication of food over wider and wider areas of the earth's surface? The teaching of the prophets of Gilgal and of the Saviour at Capernaum, signed and sealed by such wonderful practical proofs of its effects, has contributed to the order and freedom and comfort in which we rejoice,—has enabled us to disarm nature and harness her to our help,—has been the means of giving a richer success and a larger return to the culture of the soil throughout all Christian lands.

The fact that both Christ and Elisha employed intervening agencies, instead of giving the bread out of their own hands direct to the multitude, is not the least significant, and certainly not the least Divine, circumstance in the miracles. It is in entire and beautiful accordance with God's procedure throughout the whole economy of human life. He does not give the produce of the yearly harvests directly to those who consume it. There are numerous intermediate ministries and services. Very few of my readers raise their own food. Not a particle of corn is grown in the streets and squares of the great city where these words are written. The inhabitants are occupied in other pursuits which are necessary for the well-being and advancement of mankind. And yet this great multitude is fed. Christ says virtually to the farmer, and the miller, and the merchant, "Give ye them to eat." They are fed day by day and year by year not by their own direct efforts—not immediately from the hand of the Lord of the harvest—but by the agency of those who rear and prepare and sell the food—by the ordinances of nature and of human society, which are of God's appointment, and which He causes to work together for good ends. Relatively to the number of those engaged in other pursuits in this country, the number of those who produce our food is almost as small as the number of the disciples compared with the multitude whom they fed. In this connection it is a significant circumstance that our Lord should have caused the multitude to be arranged in regular order before He proceeded to divide the small supply of food. St. Mark, with his usual graphic power of description and eye to pictorial effect, calls the separate parties of fifty or a hundred by a word in the original which means spaces separately and carefully marked off, like flowers planted in garden parterres. Are we to suppose that this arrangement was made merely for the sake of conveniently distributing the food to the crowd, and that it had no other purpose? This, as it seems to me, would be taking too low a view of this feature of the miracle. Just as the hem of Christ's garment was replete with healing power, so the smallest details of His miracles are full of spiritual suggestiveness, and point to a larger and wider purpose while fulfilling the more immediate object in view. If the miracles are typical or illustrative of the grander natural processes of the world, then we must regard the arrangement in the miracle of the crowd into convenient groups of fifties and hundreds as symbolic of the order of society, and the division and organization of labour by which the wants of the great human family are supplied. In the first instance we see exhibited to us in the miracle on a small scale and in a more precise form the same wonderful Divine order which pervades all the arrangements of nature—the succession of the seasons, of seed-time and harvest, cold and heat, summer and winter, day and night—the correlation of physical agencies and influences by which the bread of man is grown and ripened. He who so carefully prepared the multitude for receiving the miraculous food, had with equal care prepared the way for the production of that food from the earth by the slow gradual processes of nature. But further, we see reflected in the orderly arrangement of the miracle the division of the great human multitude by the Divine appointment into groups of trades and industries, by which the food that is grown and earned by man is distributed with least noise, confusion, and loss of time, and by which the young, the aged, and infirm are prevented from being deprived of their share by the selfishness and inconsiderateness of the strong. Our Heavenly Father has so arranged the various pursuits and interests of society that they act and react upon each other, and the good of each depends directly upon the good of the whole. The operations of each human being carried on for his own advantage, pass over into some wider usefulness. All monopolies are broken up into companies of hundreds and fifties to be fed from the common store. If riches are increased, they are increased that use them; however selfishly accumulated or retained, they inevitably run over into circulation for the general good.

Our common English word order has a twofold meaning; it may be used in the sense of command or of arrangement; and this identification of the two meanings points to the great Will or Divine Law by which every arrangement or system exists. No one can reflect upon the order of society by which human food is produced and distributed without recognising the operation of the Divine Will. When old occupations have ceased to become profitable, new industries are opened up by which men may earn wages and their bread. When the increase of population presses too heavily upon the limits of the food-supply grown in old and long-cultivated regions, then, in God's order, new countries are discovered; a population is drawn to them by the discovery of the precious metals; and when this source of attraction is exhausted, the inhabitants settle down to the cultivation of the ground, and thus a surplus of food is produced to supply the deficiency of the mother-country. Is it not a remarkable providential arrangement, for instance, that when the harvest has failed so lamentably in Britain this year, California—which, a few years ago, was an unknown and uncultivated wilderness, or merely a gold-field—has gathered into its barns one of the richest harvests which the earth has ever yielded to the labours of man, and is now prepared to pour into our empty lap its overflowing treasures, to feed a multitude which, but for this timely succour, might have had to face famine and starvation? By these, and such-like methods of arrangement, the Great Father feeds the multitudes and the generations as truly and effectually, as wisely and advantageously as the five thousand were fed in ranks by the hands of Jesus in the wilderness. We are thus taught in the most impressive manner our mutual dependence upon each other and upon God for the supply of our daily bread.

In the animal kingdom it has been observed that various creatures are frequently found associated with others altogether different. They are not parasites, but simply take advantage of the larger animals to which they attach themselves in order to obtain food, which they would otherwise be unable to acquire, and which, in most cases, is identical with that of their hosts. They dine at the same table as it were; the two animals furnish together an example of what is called commensalism. A higher kind of this commensalism may be seen in human society. Human beings dine together at the same great table which Heaven furnishes every season with the produce of the fields. The wise and the strong are made by God's arrangement to provide for the commensals, which share with them the same home, or neighbourhood, or country,—the wards and the pensioners of society, the young and the aged, the incapable and the unfortunate. What a rebuke is there in the Divine words, "Give ye them to eat," to those who refuse to do good and communicate, to administer to a brother's necessity what they have got from the Lord for that very purpose! What a rebuke is there to the many in our great cities who hasten to be rich, and riot in luxury and extravagance, even though it be at the expense of the poverty, degradation, and hunger of their fellow-creatures—who selfishly interrupt and appropriate to their own use the gifts intended to be passed on to others! What a rebuke to our workmen and to our capitalists, who, by their foolish strikes and greedy combinations, are raising so enormously the cost of living! We may rest assured that every monopoly which fixes the barriers of its own advantage against the general good, has the providence of God leagued against it, and cannot succeed. Commercial schemes that seek to fatten upon the necessities of the poor inevitably come to a disastrous bankruptcy. Measures of special co-operation, trades-unions, and other similar combinations of class against class, interfere with the regular action of the social family, hinder the law of mutual help, and are therefore certain, sooner or later, to produce much social distress: everything that disturbs by a class privilege the common balance and broad partnership of the industries, everything that sets man against his brother, eats up the common substance and raises prices for all. "Give ye them to eat," says Christ to all employers. Let those who help to create wealth share more in the fruit of their labours; let capital and labour adjust their claims more equitably. "Give ye them to eat," says Christ to the guardians of the poor whom we have always with us—which guardians are all those whom God has blessed with abundance. And what is thus passed on by all the employments to its right destination is multiplied as it passes on under the blessing of Heaven; so that those who distribute and those who receive share in common in the blessed increase.

But the great lesson which we learn from the miracle of Gilgal is the duty and blessedness of giving the first-fruits of all our harvests, whatever they be—whether of profit in business or profit in farming—to the Lord. What a powerful practical illustration of the text, "There is that scattereth, and yet increaseth," is the feeding of three hundred prophets by the twenty loaves! Had the farmer of Baal-shalisha kept his barley loaves to himself, they would only have furnished him with seven meals; they would have sufficed for only one meal to his small household, and the pleasure of the indulgence would have been speedily forgotten. But giving them to the Lord, they were made the means of an abundant feast to the whole college of prophets; the farmer got a spiritual blessing from the act; and this thing which he did to the disciples in the name of a disciple immortalised his memory. His gift of barley-loaves—like the pot of manna—is treasured up in the holy place for perpetual remembrance. Let us imitate his example. In spite of all unfavourable influences this year, God has proved His faithfulness to His covenant promise. He has given to us a harvest such as it is; He has kept us from famine; and perhaps when we come to count up our gains with our losses, our present gloomy fears may be disappointed. In any case, let us in gratitude and faith yield the first-fruits of our harvest to God; and as the first-fruits are thus made holy, let us remember that we are thereby pledged to employ no part of the produce of the harvest in the work of sin, but, on the contrary, to expend the leisure, the health, the strength, the blessings which the harvest imparts in the service of God, in doing good and communicating. And thus consecrated and employed, the harvest far below the average will be much above the average in its power of blessing and enriching. The little that a just man hath—and it is to be feared that there will be little indeed in many households during the coming winter—used in this manner will be more than the great riches of wicked men. The scanty barrel of meal will be multiplied by the blessing of God into an abundant feast, and will leave enduring and gracious results behind to benefit all generations.

HUGH MACMILLAN.

THE FUTURE OF THE WORKING CLASSES.

FIRST PAPER.

"MORE leisure and more pay," are the two great points of the charter for which the working man has been struggling during the last dozen years. And beyond all doubt he has struggled to some purpose. It says not a little for the energy he has displayed (we speak not of other qualities), that he has made substantial progress in both directions at one and the same time. Nor is there much sign of his deeming that he has yet reached the stage of "Rest and be thankful." Many are asking in astonishment, Where and when is he going to stop? That his goal is definitely fixed in his own mind we do not doubt, at least in one of the two directions; nor do we think that he is likely to carry matters to the point sarcastically indicated by the American lady, who advertised for a servant that would have to work but one hour a day, and for whom a music master would be engaged to give lessons on the piano.

We assume it, then, as quite a settled point that the working man of the future will have more leisure and more pay than he has ever had since settled industry had a home in this country. And this is just to assume that he is about to enter on a new era of his history. With a considerable amount of spare time and spare money, he will be a different sort of being from what he was, when every available hour was spent in labour, and every shilling he earned in the bare necessities of life. Spare time and spare money are fitted to become noble levers for raising him in the scale of being. Will the working man rise in the scale of being, now that he is coming to possess these two things? We think that he may, to a large extent; that is to say, we think that he may reach a new development of his higher faculties, hitherto all but dormant, and along with this, that he may attain to a considerable share of what is truly valuable and desirable in leisurely, cultivated life. But we deliberately say that he may, not that he will; he has conquered the one, it remains to be seen whether he will conquer the other; he has gained the opportunity, and it is for him to decide whether he will now turn the opportunity into the reality. There seems to us to open, in the not distant future, a magnificent vista for the working man; the whole style and character of his life may undergo a remarkable elevation; a considerable share of all that is bright and pleasant in the life of the middle and upper classes may come to his lot; and the change may affect not merely the few who rise to a higher class, but the whole platform of labour, the great mass of our working population. Such a consummation is worthy of the help and the prayers of every earnest Christian among us; for, as labour has hitherto been regulated, there has commonly been so much of strain and drudgery and exhaustion about it, that it is only in a few exceptional instances that the delicacy and beauty of the Christian life have been reached in its ranks. But now that there is to be more leisure and more means, if only men are willing and God's grace comes to bless their efforts, we may find among the working classes, in addition to the solid Christian worth which they have often exemplified, not a little of the cultivation, and the taste, and the easy pleasing manners that have hitherto been associated mainly with other classes of society. The working man may become, what Dr. Chalmers saw afar off, a companionable, cultivated being, whose fellowship all may be able to relish; and the amenities of life, which have hitherto been distributed in proportions so unequal, may come to be diffused much more abundantly through the lower strata of the community.

Why, for example, to put the case in a practical form, and to begin at a low level (we shall ascend higher by-and-by), ought not the working classes of the next generation to become at least as civilised in their style of life as the lower section of the middle class are at the present day? We have often asked ourselves the question, as year by year we have seen a social transformation going on in the matter of dwelling houses. During the last dozen of years a very conspicuous change has been going on in Edinburgh, and we believe in most other large towns. The middle classes have been steadily leaving the houses which were occupied by previous generations, and building much superior dwellings in the suburbs. The old houses thus left vacant have generally been taken possession of by the class below. Why should not the working class, as they take possession of the houses, enter also on some of the things characteristic of the mode of life of the previous occupants? Why should they not try to keep a similar collection of books, for example, and a musical instrument, and to have the tea-drinkings, and the social intercourse, and it may be the occasional change to the country, of those whose houses they have taken possession of? That the thing is feasible is proved by the fact that in a few instances it takes place. If the working man, as a general rule, would practise the self-control, the providence, the self-reliance, which have been characteristic of the more industrious members of the middle class, there is nothing now to prevent him from having as fair a share of what is really desirable in civilised life as his middle-class brother enjoyed a couple of generations ago.

The working man, we have said, has gained the opportunity; it remains to be seen whether he will attain to the reality. A crowded railway train is coming along the line, and nearing the place where the pointsman stands. It depends on the pointsman whether it is to be carried straight along the line to the proper terminus, or shunted off in a wrong direction to encounter some nameless catastrophe. So it depends greatly on the working man of the present day whether the coming generations of his fellows are to have a career of such worth and honour as must satisfy the longings of their most ardent friends; or whether, on the other hand, shunted off in the direction of grovelling indulgence, they are to go further and further astray, until they reach a depth from which there can be no resurrection.

That the working man may better his position without bettering himself—may increase his earnings and increase his leisure and at the same time debase himself more shockingly than ever, is only too apparent at the present day. Is it creditable to the working classes that there should be even a plausible ground for debating the question whether they are better off for their greater wages and shorter hours? Is it creditable that we should be debarred, for a time at least, from applying confidently to this movement the test, "The tree is known by its fruits?" "Fruits!" some will say to us, "see what they are! Drinking-bouts that last for days and nights together—neglect of families—no laying up for the future—the Sabbath of God turned into a high festival of the devil—insolence to employers—coarseness and brutality in every form!" Unfortunately, in every neighbourhood, there are outstanding instances of this state of things quite enough to give a colour to the assertion that, like Midas's gift of gold, all that the working man has recently got has been a curse to him. They may be quite exceptional instances, and often they are; but they are what attract attention, and very often, though very unfairly, they are represented as showing the usual state of things. We sympathize very deeply with the mass of excellent men who suffer in reputation for the sins of their neighbours, and in public estimation are treated as if all were alike. It is true, all the same, that every one acquainted with the domestic circumstances of working men, especially in certain industries, such as those of iron and coal, can tell of this family and the other whose united earnings amount to two or three hundred pounds a year; yet their bedding is not worth five shillings, and their whole household gear would be dear at five pounds. The inspector of the poor has his stories of their improvidence and their meanness—how they apply for parish aid for their father when he is unable to work, or how they actually suffer their mother to die in the poor-house. It is usually in such families that the children grow up uneducated, and it is the greed and the grovelling habits of such parents that send mere infants to labour, and compel them to support themselves before they can write their name. The only institution they support on a liberal scale is their stomach; without a figure, their god is their belly; their worship is an index of their character; and really if they tried nothing else they could hardly succeed better than they do in degrading themselves, and disgusting their well-wishers.

Unhappily, too, there are other facts that bear in the same direction. A quiet sea-side town is favoured with a visit of an excursion party from a mining county. The excursionists pour like an army of skirmishers along green bank and sandy beach, wooded glen and rocky promontory. In a very short time the pleasure arising from the novelty of the scene is exhausted, and it becomes a question how the day is to be got through. They have no band of music, and do not even fall on the device of most excursionists—a dance on the level green. The objects of the sea-shore have little interest for them, though some of them may never have looked on the sea before. A few of the men fall on the odd amusement of plunging into the water, clothes and all. For the time being it is great fun, but by-and-by there comes a chilly feeling, suggesting the public house and a bumper of whiskey. By degrees the whole party, or very nearly the whole, are patronising that grand institute of modern civilisation. As the hour for leaving draws on, the village streets swarm with staggering men and women. And after they are gone, the one prominent tradition of their visit is that half of them were drunk.

We do not blame them overmuch. We know something of the miner's life, going down to work in the blackness of darkness before he has learnt the games of schoolboys, before he has learnt to love the face of nature, an exile from the light of heaven, and all its cheering influences, coming up at night stiff and weary, with no one perhaps to take him by the hand in a brotherly way, or show him how life may become agreeable and at the same time blessed. But such a fact as that which we have now noticed is very sad and very ominous. It is not easy to refute the scornful comment on it which we are so likely to hear—"See what your holidays and high wages come to!"

We are justly proud of our railways. We like to think of the millions that have been spent in their construction, and of the engineering skill and indomitable perseverance of which they are the enduring monument. But what a black chapter in their history would be that of the contractor's pay-day! It happened to the writer of these lines to spend a Saturday afternoon lately in a secluded part of Lanarkshire, consecrated to the memory of the Covenanters, near the grave of John Brown of Priesthill, "the godly carrier," as he was called, who was shot by Claverhouse at his own door, in presence of his wife and family, on the spot where his tombstone stands. It was a balmy, bright afternoon; the moorlands and hills bathed in the sunshine, looked as if resolved to make up for all their sullen looks in duller days; and from the martyr-land that lay round and round, there seemed to come forth a holy influence that braced one's soul, as if for every high and heroic deed. It is not easy to tell with what revulsion of feeling, as we drove homewards, we saw the way strewn with navvies, dead drunk and helpless, certainly not natives of the district, who had just received their fortnight's pay. And the most melancholy thing of all is, that such scenes have become so common as to excite no surprise. They are expected as punctually as the high-tide at full moon. "Only a railway navvie who has got his pay!"

But we have not reached the full significance of these facts till we have considered that they are the fruit of a law of human nature, which is as sure and as wide in its operation as gravitation itself. That law, thank God, may be superseded by other laws, but unless it be so, the working man's ruin is sealed. The law to which we refer is, that which regulates enjoyment. There are certain pleasures which may be relished without any preparatory training; there are other pleasures, and these of a higher kind, which are in no sense pleasures to the uneducated and undisciplined soul. It is chiefly our animal gratifications, eating and drinking, and the like, or the gratifying of any of our bodily propensities, that need no preparatory process. Of the same class is the excitement of gambling, and that of witnessing a fight, or a race, or of hearing or reading accounts of them, or accounts of daring crimes or shocking accidents. These are the ready and handy resort of all undisciplined minds, whenever the opportunity occurs. And on every side there are caterers who know the fact, and spread the tempting bait whenever the workman has time and money on his hands. But the effect is to degrade, to brutalise, to destroy. It is precisely this class of pleasures that demand the exercise of self-control. If you plunge into them with a careless abandon, all is over with you. On the other hand, a man's mind must be educated to relish natural beauty, to enjoy improving reading, to be interested in rational conversation and quiet society, to feel the charm of the higher kind of music, to find pleasure in botany, zoology, or geology, or in museums and galleries of art—in a word, to relish the purer and better enjoyments of leisurely life. We are not speaking here of the highest of all enjoyments—those of the soul in fellowship with God; but if this were our subject, the argument for a preparatory change in order to their being enjoyed would be all the stronger. What we now affirm is, that unless the working man have an educated mind, and a large share of self-control, he is sure, when he has leisure and money, to fall upon the class of enjoyments that need no preparatory training—those that are nearest and handiest—and unless prevented by higher influences, to indulge in them to a degree that will prove absolutely ruinous. It may be assumed as an axiom, that after any considerable muscular strain, after any long spell of work, there comes a craving for relaxation and enjoyment, and that whensoever the leisure and the money to command enjoyment exist, it will be eagerly sought. And this craving is naturally very strong in the case of the young. The elasticity of their nature is such, that after the restraint and pressure of a long pull at work, the spring bounds back with peculiar force—the craving for enjoyment comes with an irresistible impulse. The question is, what species of enjoyment will they resort to? Now, what we dread most of all in looking forward to the future of the working classes is, the possession of ample means and leisure for enjoyment, without that intellectual, moral, and spiritual training which will incline them to enjoyments of a pure and elevating kind. In former times, the limited means and limited leisure of working men, though they did not neutralise this tendency, kept it within moderate limits. Let the means and the leisure be multiplied, and no purer tastes and cravings formed, then assuredly we may look at last for the fulfilment of Prince Metternich's celebrated prophecy, "After me, the deluge!"

We do not think that it is possible for any friend of the working classes to warn them too loudly of the fearful danger to which they are exposed, as the result of a low use of their greater leisure and better pay. Let us take, by way of sample, the case of girls earning considerable wages in mills. We happen to know a provincial town, where a pastrycook's shop is a great attraction to such girls, insomuch, we are told, that one large share of their earnings goes for tarts and buns. Of course they must have smart head-dresses and body-dresses for Sundays and holidays, and another considerable share of their earnings is absorbed in gum-flowers, ribbons, and flounces. Literature does not cost them much; what they do patronise is the London Journal and the Police Chronicle. As for accomplishments, all they care for is to learn to dance. Observe now the daily life of such girls. They are up early in the morning, summer and winter, seldom, we fear, bending the knee in prayer before they go out; their beds are made by their mothers; they come in to breakfast—that, too, is prepared by their mothers; in to dinner, ditto; to tea, ditto; and in the evening, perhaps, out at a dance. Is this the way to elevate their order? Are these the future wives and mothers of our working classes? If it be so, what on earth is to become of our country?

But happily there is another side of the picture. There is evidence of the existence of a large amount of sound feeling and lofty aspiration among the working classes. Take, for example, the Good Templar movement that has spread so widely. We do not inquire into the rules or methods by which the Good Templars seek to attain their object; it is enough for our purpose to mark the object which they seek to attain. Good Templarism, then, as we take it, is an effort on the part of the working classes to steer clear, and help one another to steer clear, of that gulf to which we have adverted—the cesspool of mere animal gratification, sensual indulgence, degrading pleasures. The imminent danger of the class has been forced on the notice of its more observant members, and they have felt it to be of the last necessity to do something to avert it. The Good Templar movement may or may not be adapted permanently to effect its purpose; but it is at least an interesting proof of the earnest desire of a large number of the working classes to get the ship steered into a safer channel than that to which she has been drifting. And it is interesting to see the heartiness with which the friends of the movement throw themselves into it. It shows that there is a large measure of brotherly feeling among the working classes, when so many of them are consecrating their leisure to such earnest and disinterested labour on behalf of their fellows.

The large number of teetotallers who belong to the working classes, and the still greater number of supporters of the Permissive Bill, are additional facts bearing in the same direction. Further, as showing that all do not bow down to the idol of gross animal indulgence, we may advert to the large amount of deposits in the savings-banks, and to the remarkable success of building and investment societies, resulting in the erection of workmen's houses by the hundred thousand.

In Scotland we can advert to a still more significant fact. The working classes supply many thousands of our godly church-goers, and there are elders and deacons from their ranks not a few. And though in our mining, and in some of our urban districts, where the population is largely Irish, there is much indifference among working people to education, it is otherwise with the great mass of what may be called the people of Scotland. If in some quarters London Journals and Police Chronicles are eagerly devoured, there is many a student, on the other hand, of such works as Cassell's "Popular Educator," and many a reader of some of our best periodicals. We cannot speak of England as of Scotland from personal observation, but for the more northern kingdom we think that there is ground to say that among working classes there is a sufficient leaven of intelligence, self-control, and godliness to warrant the expectation that, in process of time, through God's blessing, the happy future of which we have spoken will be realised to a considerable degree.

We are very far from thinking that the working classes are the only portion of the community that lie open to the temptations of misused means and misused leisure. Would only that we could speak of the upper and middle classes as models in these particulars! Would that there were no occasion to reproach any of the privileged classes with those very vices to which the workman is prone—sensuality, gambling, betting, and other unrestrained gratifications of the lower part of our nature! Alas! that in spite of their opportunities of self-improvement, so many even of the upper class should devote their youth to the lowest and most destructive forms of gratification, without even the excuse of a long spell of exhausting labour, and in spite of the responsibility entailed on them by their high position. As for the middle class, there is much in their position too, especially in connection with the wonderfully rapid increase of wealth among them, to create the deepest anxiety. It is a serious thing for the country that so many young men, the sons of those who have acquired great wealth during the last thirty years, will begin life without the necessity of working for their bread, with little or no stimulus to exertion, with every luxury and pleasure at their elbow, and exposed to the whole host of caterers and flatterers skilled in the cultivation of wild oats, who waylay them in the hope of making something out of their weaknesses. In selecting the future of the working classes as our subject, we have not been influenced by the notion that they alone are exposed to danger, or that they alone need to be urged to strive to fulfil their destiny. What impresses us is, that there is something so remarkable in the present opportunity of the working classes, and at the same time that there is so great need for their being urged to avail themselves of that opportunity. Some may resent our attempt as an uncalled-for interference—a ridiculous endeavour to lecture an independent order of men into ways of life which they are perfectly able to follow of themselves if they chose. We can afford to bear this cuff, because we know so well that we shall have the countenance and benediction of many a working man to whom nothing is more refreshing than to hear a hearty voice from another quarter beseeching the millions of his labouring brethren to strive to realise for themselves a glorious future. Many a working man sees all that we have now said, and feels it deeply; and nothing grieves him more than the difficulty of getting his fellows to see it, and to band themselves together in an effort to make the future of their order as bright as it might be. We do not dream of a premature Paradise, and we will not waste our labour in sketching an ideal Utopia. We take our stand upon a foundation of realised fact. We see a practicable way by which the labouring masses, if they choose, may, with God's blessing, attain to a mode of life brightened by many advantages and enjoyments hitherto seen only from afar. We see a way by which they may do more than they have ever done for blessing mankind, and turning to account glorious capabilities of heart and soul hitherto left dormant or allowed to run to waste. Of some of the details of that life, and of the forces by which it is to be realised, we shall try to speak in succeeding papers. We do not hesitate to announce broadly, that we go on the old principle that the fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom. We have nothing to say to the wanderer till he return to his Father's house; if he do return in a filial spirit, he will find it true that godliness is profitable unto all things, having the promise of the life that now is, as well as of that which is to come.

IN THE WILDERNESS.

LORD JESUS, I am sad and lone,
Scarce have strength to make my moan ;
Like a sick babe, here I lie,
Only love can hear my cry,
Only love have might to bear,
The wayward purpose of my prayer
For strength, for life, for rest above :
But then I know that Thou art Love ;
I know not what I want or would,
But this I know—that Thou art good.

Lord, my life has struck its tent,
Its days 'mid Elim's palms are spent ;
The desert stretches parched and bare,
Dead bones of pilgrims whiten there ;
The very sun seems not the same,
Its golden glow has waxed to flame :
But yet upon the burning sand,
I read the writing of Thy hand.
"Fear not to come. This path I trod,—
The soul is safe which follows God."

O Lord, I fear, but still I come !
The way is hard,—the end is home.
I do not pray Thee make it fair,
I only pray Thee, bring me there ;
Thy staves must break, then let them be Thy rods to chide me nearer Thee !

My limbs must fail, my sandals slack,
I care not, so I go not back !
Heed not what'er I cry in pain,
But help me on to walk again ;
Only when all the road is o'er
Come out, and meet me at Thy door !

I.—NOTES AND COMMENTS.

TO OUR READERS.

THE readers of the SUNDAY MAGAZINE have probably observed, from statements in the public journals, that Dr. Guthrie has recently had a severe attack of illness. Though his recovery has been advancing as favourably as could have been expected, he has been interdicted by medical authority from undertaking work that would involve any strain, whether of mind or body. This will not interfere with the arrangements for carrying on the Magazine in all its departments, as announced in the programme for the year; nor will it prevent Dr. Guthrie from writing papers of which the materials are already in his hands; but it will render it necessary for him to suspend for a time the papers which he was to have contributed under the title, "Among the Stricken"—a class to which it may be said that for the present he himself belongs. Dr. Guthrie has had so much experience of the kindness of the readers of the Magazine, that he does not doubt that he will have their sympathy and forbearance on the present occasion. Should strength be given him to renew the series, he need not say that he will esteem it more than ever a privilege to help to make known some of those noble institutions, the blessed offspring of Christian love, by which it is sought to alleviate the sufferings of the stricken, and minister to the wants both of body and soul. One would have little claim to be a follower of the great Master, if the personal experience of suffering did not make one more able to sympathize with the stricken, and more willing to succour them.

THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND.

Even strangers cannot think of the present troubles of the Church of England without deep concern. Those who are most remote from it, as regards personal connection, and who are therefore least influenced by the personal feelings which a great controversy raises, cannot but be deeply moved when they think of the momentous results, for time and for evermore, that hang upon present proceedings. The crisis is too solemn to admit of any feelings inconsistent with those of deep and prayerful solicitude. We are overwhelmed by the number and magnitude of the interests that crowd on us when we try to estimate the bearings of present movements and struggles. Not only the welfare of the millions of England, high and low, rich and poor, but the interests of colonies and dependencies unprecedented in number and in magnitude, and crowned by the great peninsula in the East, are linked by very vital cords and currents to the Church of England. So mighty a stirring of a people's heart as is now going on in connection with ecclesiastical matters, embracing Nonconformists as well as Churchmen, is rare in the history of any great people. It is such a movement as takes place only once perhaps in centuries. The full effect of it cannot be apprehended till after it has settled down. Whatever be one's personal feelings or leanings, the one prevailing desire in every true heart must be, that God would give strength and power to his servants, show them their duty, and enable them to do it. Every succeeding event—every succeeding complication tends to deepen our fervour as we pray—

Thou framer of the light and dark,
Steer through the tempest Thine own ark
Amid the howling wintry sea;
We are in port if we have Thee.

SECESSION OF MR. MOLYNEUX.

All unite in bearing testimony to the high character and great usefulness of the Rev. Capel Molyneux, of the Lock Chapel, who in a pamphlet just published, has signified his determination to leave the Church of England, after an incumbency, we believe, of forty years. Those who deplore the step most, are not less ready than those who welcome it, to speak of Mr. Molyneux as an honour to any Church. It is the Bennett judgment that has induced him to take this step. We purposely avoid giving any opinion one way or other, but we may briefly state the leading grounds both of Mr. Molyneux and of those who differ from him. He holds that "there is no longer any security for attendants at our Church for knowing beforehand whether the teaching to which they shall submit themselves shall be of a directly infidel, Romanising, or evangelical character." Moreover, he holds that being an Established Church, "she is what the law makes and declares her to be. The law can unmake her, alter her, or destroy her at any time." He proceeds to pass under review the three possibilities that might enable one to escape from the position of countenancing the error which the Bennett judgment allows—namely, reformation, disestablishment, and secession. The first, including a revision of the Prayer-Book, he deems impossible. The second "looms in the distance, the cloud gathers, the day of disruption hastens upon us," but it affords no present relief. The third remains, and bitter though the necessity be, it is the only way of relief to him. "I presume not to decide the question for any other man living; nor to judge any other man living for the answer, be it what it may, that he may feel right to give; but I do presume to answer the question for myself, and that with perfect confidence, and the answer is, Secession is MY duty. And that duty I am, God helping me, fully prepared to discharge; yes, real, radical reformation, carrying with it the revision of the Prayer-Book, being impracticable, I will secede!"

The Record deems the step taken by Mr. Molyneux a great mistake, and one that might be fatal "were the example to be followed to any great extent, of which," it rejoices to add, "there is no probability whatever." The Record especially controverts his assumption that being an Established Church, the Church of England is what the law makes her, maintaining that she exists by the will of God, and has independent rights and rules of acting given to her by the Lord, of which no State can deprive her. The State does not make her laws, but only interprets them. She is not the slave but the ally of the State, and maintains her independence and her power of action, subject to the risk of losing her temporalities. The Record further stamps Mr. Molyneux's course as pusillanimous. As a member of the Council of the Church Association, he should have been prepared for a long battle, and it is "anything but a brave or magnanimous course to desert the post of duty at the first repulse, and to fling down the weapons at the very time when there is need to grasp them more firmly, and wield them more resolutely than ever."

To this Mr. Molyneux replies, that it was not as a Church of Christ in the general that he maintained the Church of England to be under the power of the State, but as an Established or National Church, and that it was needless to assert that she had powers superior to the control of the State, if she could not use them. Could she proceed against Mr. Bennett? Could she refuse to be bound by the decision of the State? As to the charge of pusillanimity, founded on the fact that he had been one of those who were engaged in the prosecution of Mr. Bennett, he had engaged in that prosecution because he believed it to involve the interests of the truth and the honour of the Church; but now Mr. Bennett was acquitted, the object of the prosecution was lost, the evils that he wished to avert had come, and it was because he was unable in conscience to acquiesce in the decision that he felt it right to secede. He was not bound to adhere to the Established Church at all hazards and in all circumstances, and whether the step he has taken be or be not cowardly in the eyes of his brethren, it is enough for him that he deems it duty to his Master.

In reply it is alleged that Mr. Molyneux has taken this step either too late or too soon. There is nothing different in principle between this judgment and that by which the authors of "Essays and Reviews" were acquitted. Neither is there anything different from the state of things under which Dr. Colenso escaped being prosecuted, he having taken care not to contradict formally the Articles of the Church. If, therefore, Mr. Molyneux was justified in retaining his office for the last ten years, he ought not to secede now.

DEAN LAW'S VIEW OF THE CRISIS.

The Venerable Dean of Gloucester has addressed a letter to Captain Palmer on the present perils of the Church of England, and how to meet them. The state of things, in his view, is extremely painful. That when every nation in Europe is throwing off the yoke of Rome, England should be yielding herself up more and more to Romish views and practices, is utterly distressing and humiliating. The recent judgment he looks on as shaking the hope which hitherto had not been moved. In previous decisions rules had been laid down fitted to check the Romanising clergy. But in the most rebellious spirit they had set these rules at defiance. And now comes a decision in their favour! And yet a very strange decision. The true doctrine of the Church is made very clear, but the culprit escapes! And he escapes just because his offence is so great! Just because if he is guilty the punishment is so heavy, every effort must be made to find a door for him to escape by. Minor culprits may tremble, but the most daring may rejoice in the safety of their position!

Dean Law had hoped for deliverance through the Bishops, and especially through the Primate, whose power was so great that he had been styled, not extravagantly, "Papa alterius orbis." That hope had been disappointed. Ought they, then, to resort to secession? Anything but that. "Secession savours of peevish petulance, of mortified self-will, of wounded self-importance, of imbecility and cowardice. It is not the brave front of Christian faith and Christian valour." And there was no call for it, the Church had changed none of its articles or doctrines. "Far from us be the timidity which forsakes a cause betrayed by some false friends." The remedy is in the pulpit.

"The grand doctrine of justification by faith only should be uplifted as a beacon on a thousand hills. Hearers should be distinctly taught our grand verities—the Father's eternal love—the terms of the unfulfilling Covenant—the Son's perfect and finished work—the Spirit's indwelling—the beauty and simplicity and purport of our sacraments—the evidence of faith—the might of prayer—the delight of praise—the labour of love—the patience of hope—the loveliness of purity—the high walk of uprightness—the solemnity of worship—the happiness of godly life."

We abstain from indicating any opinion on Dean Law's view of what is adequate to meet the crisis; but we can hardly abstain from signifying regret that he and others should so vehemently judge the spirit and motives of those who take a different view. In this judgment, we feel that they will not have the support of the church catholic.

THE ARCHBISHOP'S VIEW.

In his primary charge to the clergy of Canterbury, the Archbishop naturally dwells on the present confusions in the Church. His view is that the founders of the Church did well in making the formularies comprehensive enough to include a variety of ministers.

"We," said he, "who live in this generation, and look back upon the time of comparative darkness in which our fathers lived, rejoice to think that the Church of which we are members was wide enough for Charles Simeon and William Wilberforce, and those who in their day, in spite of much opposition, held forth the great Evangelical truths which had for a time been overlooked, never thought of leaving the Church of England, but found within its formularies full scope for the preaching of that Gospel in its purity which their hearts loved. We, also, looking still further back, I think, have no reason to regret that the Church of England was able to lead the van, in its struggle against Deism and various forms of infidelity under such as Paley; and if we look back to the time of Archbishop Tillotson, we don't, I think, regret that the Church of England found in its formu-laries sufficient room for men of that turn of mind ; and when we look back further, I suppose there is not one of us who would wish that George Herbert should have been cast out of the Church of England."

Summing up his views as to the comprehension proper to the Church, he said :—

"As far as possible, it seems to me that the ideal of our Church is this—that men who agree in the grand essence of Christianity, who reverence the Lord Jesus Christ, who look to the purifying blood as the atonement of their sins, who confess themselves without hope of salvation without his death or passion, who point to the written Word of God as the test by which all the doctrines are to be observed—such men should, as far as possible, be united in one community, and I trust that as men become earnest in the great duties of their calling, they will more and more realise such truths."

In regard to the dependence of the Church on the State, he wished his clergy to consider that even Nonconformist churches were in certain respects dependent on the State. Nonconformist churches had property, and when the question arose whether they were carrying out the doctrines for which they had acquired the property, the decision of the question lay with the civil courts. Dr. Tait, who seems to regard "what is called" the Free Church of Scotland as a beacon to Christendom, and who, in the debate on the Irish Church, found even in her Sustentation Fund material for a solemn warning to the House of Lords, directed the attention of his clergy to a question now pending in that body. What was apparently the majority, who were now negotiating for union with other churches, were accused by the minority of departing from the original principles of the Church, and the minority were resolved to appeal to the civil courts to determine to which side the property belonged. Thus even the body which had made the greatest sacrifice to secure independence was unable to avoid the control of the State.

[In reference to a paragraph in our last number, under the head of "the Athanasian Creed," in which a parallel was pointed out between the Anti-union party in Scotland and Dr. Pusey, in their relation to their respective Churches, we wish to say for the sake of a correspondent who has misapprehended our meaning, that the parallel was limited to the points specified in the paragraph, and not meant to embrace the grounds on which the parties have taken up respectively the attitude they maintain.]

MR. ORBY SHIPLEY'S VIEW.

Mr. Orby Shipley is well known as an able and learned defender of High Church views, and as the editor of the volumes of Essays entitled, "The Church and the World." In the Contemporary Review for September he has published an elaborate paper, entitled "Church and State in Discord." He reviews historically the relations that have prevailed between Church and State in England, and comes to the conclusion that the recent treatment of the Church is at direct variance with the theory of their alliance, and that the Church has been subjected to such opposite kinds of treatment that her position has been most grievously weakened. After discussing the possibility of remedy, he gives frankly his own conclusion :—"That only one complete remedy exists for this anomaly of Church and State in discord ; and that remedy is to be found in harmony restored by the severance of their union." Unless a speedy remedy be found for actual wrongs, "Disestablishment, combined with that which is even more strongly dreaded—Disendowment—will ensue more speedily than many expect, and under less favourable terms than it may be possible now to secure." In the matter of self-government three things were essential—legislative, executive and judicial. "Suffer her to decide her own spiritual causes ; enable her to elect her own chief officers ; force her to initiate her own reformation, and she will be placed in a position to re-assert her lost, but inherent and divine power." If these three things were conceded to the Church, he would concede not a little to the State. Convocation need not be permitted to enforce its laws without the sanction of the State ; the Crown might name bishops out of two or three priests elected by the diocese ; and the spiritual courts might be constituted in the name of the supreme head of the Empire. "All this might remain ; and yet spiritual things would be decided by spiritual persons ; the episcopate would be recruited after an ecclesiastic manner ; convocation reformed would become a living, active, energizing, and respected influence in both Church and State ; whilst some effort would have been made to diminish the existing want of harmony between the temporal and the spiritual powers."

THE NEW LICENSING LAW.

We observe, with much pleasure, that the general testimony, based on the results, appears to be generally in favour of the new regulations. A diminution of drunkenness and disorder appears to have resulted wherever these regulations have been carefully applied. If we may judge from the opinions of leading men in Bristol, the effect there has been markedly beneficial. At a public meeting, one gentleman declared that he had taken pains to ascertain how the new Act had worked in Bristol, and the testimony of the police and other persons was, that since the houses had closed at eleven o'clock the streets were much quieter. The medical officer of the Local Board of Health had expressed his belief that the indirect effect of the Act would be to lessen debauchery and licentiousness, and to prolong the lives of the public. In Liverpool we read that several of the large manufactories have been visited, and the vote of the persons employed has been obtained as to whether the public-houses should be allowed to remain open beyond the prescribed time. The opinion has been generally against such permission being granted. The same canvass has taken place in Birmingham, and in one manufactory, Messrs. Hind & Son, lamp-makers, out of one hundred workpeople, ninety-six were against any extension of hours to the publican.

We have little doubt that as experience is gathered it will be more and more in the same direction; and we particularly rejoice to think that the testimony of industrious working men has been raised in favour of restriction. There is a general impression in the minds of many that working men have no desire but to drink away the ampler means and ampler leisure they now enjoy. We have observed that at public meetings, when any allusion is made to this impression, it is warmly and most indignantly repudiated by working men. We take the following from an account of a Birmingham meeting held the other day:—

“It had been widely stated, and extensively believed by those who did not know or understand the working classes, that any shortening of the hours of labour, or any increase of wages, meant only increased facility for extravagant habits and drinking customs.—(“Shame.”) This was simply shameful; it was monstrous.—(Cheers.) There was drunkenness in every class of the community, probably not disproportionately so amongst the working classes; but he asked them, as reasonable men, was the drunkard to be the standard measure of labour, or the sober, steady, and industrious man?—(Hear, hear.) Was the standard to be on the lower or the higher scale, and because an inveterate drunkard would, in all probability, spend foolishly any extra money which might accrue to him in consequence of an advance of wages, was the honest and industrious man to be deprived of the advance he could justly claim, and which would enable him to make his home more happy, and to give the education to his children which it was necessary they should have?—(Cheers.) They must get rid of all the nonsense which was talked about making the drunkard the standard of wages; and they must remember that whilst some men spent their money foolishly, there were hundreds and thousands of others who spent it wisely.—(Hear.)”

There can be little doubt that this is true of certain industries and bodies of workmen, but there are others to which it is unhappily not applicable. A more general testimony in favour of the shortening of the hours of public houses would serve to remove from the sober members of the class the imputation which they feel so keenly.

II.—OUR LETTER DRAWER:

CRIPPLES' HOMES.

In Dr. Guthrie's article on Cripples' Homes it is stated that those in London are the only institutions of the kind. We have received a letter from an excellent and most devoted lady in Edinburgh, stating that a small home for cripple children has existed in Edinburgh since May, 1870, and that the Home is now situated in No. 9, Salisbury Place, and visitors are welcome on Wednesdays and Fridays after two o'clock.

Through personal inquiries we are able to bear testimony to the admirable character of this Home. It has been carried on so quietly and unobtrusively as not to attract the notice which it deserves, but it has been, and continues to be, a source of great blessing to the children who have enjoyed its benefits.

But surely in a city like Edinburgh, with all its “Hospitals” and their munificent endowments, more attention ought to be given to this most important class of “the stricken”?

RURAL CHURCHES FOR CITY POOR.

A correspondent from an English rectory draws our attention to the difficulty of establishing church-going habits among the inhabitants of dark and dingy rooms, when they are asked to attend churches scarcely less gloomy and oppressive. He proposes a remedy. Let a rural church be built for such in some green bright spot, the very sight of which will be a joy for ever, and let a train be run to and fro, to convey the inhabitants thither and bring them home. Our friend seems to think that church-going would become so attractive that the habits of neglect which prevail at present would be overcome. Many persons of choice attend church at a little distance from their dwellings, and enjoy above all things a church in a sweet rural situation. Would not the poor like it as well as the rich?

This is one of several proposals for benefiting the religious condition of the people brought under our notice by the same friend. Several of his ideas seem to us of value, and well worth pondering; but this particular proposal of rural churches, attractive though it be when it first comes into the mind, is one that could not be carried into effect.

There is first the question of the train—not only the principle of the thing, but the expense. The question of principle is supremely important. However cheap, it must cost a few pence, and that would be a serious obstacle. Then there is the effort to rouse one's self for the journey. For to people oppressed with much labour, this effort would be considerable. Further, there is the loss of the benefit arising from God's house being in the midst of them. God's dwelling among them is, or is capable of becoming, a great moral power. And still further, there is the mental dissipation of a journey, especially to such a class—the mind is shaken, and is not in a frame to join in worship demanding the consecration of all its faculties. The whole arrangement is too complicated and artificial, even if it were in principle sound.

But why should not a church in such localities be made bright and cheerful? And why might not a reading-room be connected with it, supplied with suitable reading for the Lord's-day? And children's services, bright and attractive, might be held too. There is no people that have done more to make mission services attractive, especially to the young, than the people of the United States. Let a stranger go to Philadelphia, and enter the spacious building used as a Sunday-school in the Bethany mission, with its fountain, its coloured windows, its pictures, its banners, and its organ, and the last thing that he will think of is dinginess and repulsiveness. Probably we should not go so far as our brethren on the other side; but we might at least take a leaf from their book.

OPENING OF MUSEUMS ON SUNDAY.

The agitation on this subject (adverted to under this head in our last number) has received a considerable impulse from a letter published in the London newspapers, by the Rev. S. C. H. Hansard, Rector of St. Matthew's, Bethnal Green. He is in favour of the Sunday opening of the museum lately established in that quarter by the liberality of Sir Richard Wallace. His argument is :—

"It is always a matter of wonder to me that my poor neighbours (many of whom are my friends, though they never come to church) are as good, and orderly, and kind, and well-behaved as they are. But that is just the very reason why, if the way which I have adopted for elevating and improving their moral and social life does not commend itself to them, I should adopt another, not indeed by any means the highest and best, not indeed one which leads them to "eternal life," but one which, at any rate, will elevate this present life of theirs, which will lift them out of themselves, and make them, for an hour or two at least in the week, to learn to wonder at and admire what is truly beautiful and above them, or at least will keep them from temptation, and perhaps from sin. Truly it is a dog-in-manger spirit which makes good Christians say—'Because you won't come to our churches and chapels on Sunday, you shall have nothing more improving to do on that Christian holiday than to lounge about the dirty streets smoking bad tobacco, and "chaffing" the young women, and gambling with pence, and making the back streets of London a nuisance to every decent man or woman who passes by.'"

For this reason he would open the Museum, and give them the benefit of anything of the kind that is fitted to raise them in any sense, or to any degree.

Our attention has been drawn to a sensible article in a provincial paper which gives the other and, as we think, better side of the question. The Yorkshire Post points out that while the people of the district would probably care nothing for the museum, a great number of the working classes would be deprived of their Sunday's rest—attendants, cab-drivers, stablemen, and the like. Then other exhibitions would have to be opened, and the Crystal Palace, and the Polytechnic, and on you would go down to the theatres and music saloons. As to the working classes, between the Saturday half-holiday, the nine hours a day, and the festival of St. Monday, their opportunities for inspecting the public museums are not so very few. Moreover, if the Sunday once lose its sacred character, it ceases to be the day of rest—

"The drift, the inevitable tendency, of all such proposals as that which we are combating is to convert the Sunday into a holiday, and all experience shows us that when this transformation is effected the Sunday holiday ceases to be a day of rest. We see this result plainly exhibited in the large towns of the Continent. There the Sunday is a high holiday for the majority of the poor and the working classes, but to a very considerable minority it is the hardest working day in the whole week. This proposal is utterly inimical to the truest interests of the working classes themselves. They, more than any other section of the community, are vitally concerned in the retention of the first day of the week as a day of rest. We all of us need it, but they most of all. To denude it of its religious character, and make it a secular holiday, is to ensure its being converted into a regular working day."

We should like, if any of our correspondents could tell us, whether there is any known case of museums or picture-galleries being useful in the first instance to raise a sunken population? Our own conviction is, that Christianity must first gender some taste for these things, and that they do not in themselves affect a debased people. Our Lord, we apprehend, indicated a principle applicable to both rich and poor. "If they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded though"—they have a museum and a picture-gallery open every Sunday afternoon at their door.

III.—GLANCES AT WHAT IS DOING ABROAD.

THE OLD CATHOLIC CONFERENCE.

The annual gathering of representatives of the Old Catholic movement has been held at Cologne. Upwards of five hundred representatives attended. There were two public meetings, where the number present was some four thousand, and where the popular enthusiasm was very great. Representatives from the English and American episcopal churches were there in the persons of the Bishops of Norwich, Ely, and Baltimore. Dean Stanley had expressed his sympathy in a letter. The whole proceedings were conducted with great heartiness and spirit.

It appears that the new body is in a certain difficulty, out of which, however, the lapse of a little time will in all probability bring it. On the one hand, there is a disposition to adhere to all that is characteristic of the Roman Catholic Church, excepting only the Papal infallibility. It is desired to maintain the attitude of a Church which retains all that is old, and repudiates only this monstrous innovation. But though there may be a disposition technically to this view, the actual spirit of the movement is wider by far. There is a strong desire to get many reforms accomplished, for which the Church has been sighing for five hundred years. This is evidently the dominating spirit of the movement. At the same time, the leaders feel that the time has not come for dealing with the reforms proposed.

We have said once and again that if the movement rests merely on the basis of the opposition to the claim of infallibility, its support is far too slender, and its power of attracting the sympathies of the people far too feeble for popular success. But if it takes a wider basis, and sets itself not only to overthrow detailed corruptions, but to bring the people into personal contact with the living Saviour and the Written Word, then by God's help, a very different career may lie before it.

We have been interested in the speeches of Professor Friedrich, who seems to be the most popular and the heartiest of the leaders of the movement. Here is what he says of the basis to which they have gone back :—

"We have turned back to the foundation, which alone is the true basis of the Church, which alone is our safety: we have turned back to our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, in whom alone is our safety, who only is our Teacher and Master. I, for my part—and I believe I may venture to say that I have devoted my life to serious theological studies—I, for my part, know not where the gracious Saviour has said that the saints must be dragged in, in order to win heaven."

One of the most interesting subjects with which the Alt-Catholics have to deal is the union of different communions. But what is to be the basis of union? One voice was heard, that of a Protestant professor from Heidelberg, proclaiming that a doctrinal basis was impossible:—that between Protestants and Catholics union on such a ground could not take place. They could only unite on grounds of morality and life, and this was the more possible among Germans, because a community of thought existed among all scholars of both confessions. The remark, however, was received with "sensation." Professor Reinkens noted four things which were the chief hindrances to reunion—unbelief, misbelief, indifference, and politics. "These four things we cannot use: unbelief, it has no hope, and so no Church is possible. Misbelief, it has no light, and, where no light, no Church. Indifference, it has no strength, only the enervating of man, and, without strength, no Church. Politics, for where religion is used as a political medium, there neither truth nor unity can be cherished."

Not much progress was made towards practical action, but a commission was appointed to inquire more into the matter; ascertain difficulties and endeavour to remove them; and by essays and popular writings spread a knowledge of each other's views, and awaken a wider interest in the subject generally.

BISMARCK AND CHURCH MATTERS.

Some difference of opinion has been expressed as to the expediency of the address of congratulation lately presented to Prince Bismarck by the Hon. Arthur Kinnaird. In particular, Ewald, the celebrated theologian, has complained that Bismarck is opposing the true interests of liberty, civil and religious, and does not deserve the praise of Englishmen. However this may be, the German Government not only show no sign of changing their course, but have gone on to take in some things more decided action. A step has been taken in the controversy with the Bishop of Ermeland which must bring matters to a crisis. Our readers will remember that Bishop Kremetz excommunicated two of the leading Alt-Catholics, Drs. Wollmann and Michelis, and refused even to remit so much of the sentence as had a reference to civil rights. To this he adhered after remonstrance from the Government. It was reported that the Emperor was opposed to more severe measures being taken; but if such was his feeling, it is no longer allowed to prevail, for it has been intimated to the bishop by Dr. Falk, on the part of the Government, that if he does not abandon the position which he has taken up, payment of the emoluments derived by him from the State, amounting to upwards of £1,100, will be stopped.

The future steps in this quarrel will be watched with the utmost interest, for the forces represented on either side are as powerful as any that are ever confronted in human strifes.

FRANCE—ITS APATHY AND ITS SUPERSTITION.

A correspondent of the Times has called attention, in a very marked way, to the absence of everything like religious fervour, and even intelligence, among the thinking people of France. Hardly any interest was taken there in the Alt-Catholic Conference at Cologne, and not a single representative, so far as he was aware, attended it. This is not because the people are too good Catholics, but because, for the most part, they are only nominally Catholics.

"Such men as Père Hyacinthe or the Abbé Michaud have no backing among independent and earnest religious thinkers, simply because there are none. Good Catholics are bound by their consciences to believe, and not to think; bad ones are not worth having; and the 'Free-thinkers' are old-fashioned scoffers at everything serious, and have no original or religious ideas at all. The consequence is that there is no encouragement for priests to risk everything on a point of conscience, and France seems destined to hang as a dead weight upon the intellectual, moral, and religious progress of the age.

"It was curious to read the comments of the French press, for instance, on Père Hyacinthe's marriage; he was scoffed at by the infidels because he believed in a God, denounced, in what may without exaggeration be termed 'Billingsgate,' by the pious because he believed in a wife, while the masses, who were neither one thing nor the other, seemed aghast at a phenomenon they could not comprehend. The anomaly that appeared to puzzle these indifferentists, who probably never attend mass themselves, was, how a priest could administer the sacrament with his wife in the church. As a general rule the comments of the masses were about a match for this objection in intelligence, and proved what the effect of a habit of mind may be which is the result of training and prejudice and not of thought."

If such, however, be the condition of France, there are sections of her people quite capable of being roused into spasmodic religious fervour. Fashionable pilgrimages are becoming the order of the day. Lourdes is the place to which the pilgrims flocked, in order to celebrate the Immaculate Conception. On one day the number of pilgrims amounted to about thirteen hundred. Of these about half seemed to be priests, who carried pockets of tracts, pamphlets, and hymns in praise of Notre Dame de Lourdes, which were intended for distribution on the way. The remainder were for the most part old women of the middle or poorer class, who carried their own provisions apparently, and were laden with bundles and handbaskets, after the manner of old women generally. The men were in a small minority, and nearly all of them old.

On the Sunday forty thousand pilgrims assembled and were present at a mass celebrated in the open air by the Bishop of Carcassonne. After the ceremony a politico-religious speech was made by the Bishop of Tarbes. The pilgrims received it with cries of "Vive la France!" "Vive le Pape!" At two o'clock there was a procession bearing two hundred banners, representing all countries, which were deposited at the church. Among them was that of Alsace-Lorraine. All the banners were covered with crape, as a sign of mourning. Their value is estimated at 200,000 francs. Nineteen deputies took part in the procession. The bishops present were those of Auch, Carcassonne, Mende, Lucon, Aire, Tarbes, and the Indies.

The explanation of this singular pilgrimage is as follows:—

"According to the legend, on the 11th of February, 1838, the Blessed Lady stood suddenly at the entrance of the grotto, on the bank of the Gave, opposite to Lourdes, before a peasant-girl named Bernadette Soubirous, and subsequently repeated her visit on eighteen distinct occasions. Bernadette told her neighbours of the signal favours vouchsafed to her, and the matter was referred to the Bishop of Tarbes, who, after appointing a commission to inquire into the portent, made himself answerable for the authenticity of the girl's statements by a solemn declaration, which also received the confirmation of the Holy See. Influential gentlemen and ladies of high rank throughout France, unwilling to rely on the spontaneous zeal of the faithful, have been for several weeks, and by every imaginable contrivance, ministering to the excitement, thus bringing to the spot a vast concourse of people, and raising a general expectation of some supernatural occurrence on the day set apart for the celebration of the most imposing ceremonies."

It is the old French spirit—vanity predominant. The uppermost thought in the mind of the promoters is the impression produced on the world. If they knew what the impression is, they would be somewhat taken aback. Contempt on the part of the world; compassion on the part of the Church.

THE WALDENSIAN SYNOD.

The Waldensian Synod has just met at La Tour, and has spent the usual time in reviewing and re-arranging its work in the Valleys and in Italy. By far the most generally interesting work is that of evangelisation in Italy. The Synod has not fewer than thirty-seven missionary stations in Italy and Sicily, where ordained ministers or schoolmaster-evangelists are placed, exclusive of evangelistic work carried on in small towns and villages around many of the stations. Since May, 1871, the number of regular hearers has not increased, but, on the contrary, it has fallen off to the extent of 350, a fact which is accounted for by a schism in the congregation at Leghorn. The adherents of the Church who worship regularly at the different stations amount to 3,220, and the communicants to 1,952. The contributions for the maintenance of religious ordinances raised in the mission stations throughout Italy by the people themselves, during the last fifteen months, amounts to nearly £850, as compared with £400 the previous year. The number of children attending Sunday-schools has also increased during the year.

The day of small things! one exclaims, reading these figures. But the kingdom of heaven is like a grain of mustard seed, and under the divine blessing may yet grow in Italy to a great tree, in which the fowls of heaven will make their nests. Considering the state of things but a few years ago, it is matter for the greatest thankfulness that, independent of what is done by other agencies, this Waldensian Church, preserved in Providence amid appalling trials and calamities till now, has been able to hold forth the Word of life at so many centres, and to invite the people of Italy to the pure river of the water of life.

JOTTINGS FROM THE MISSION FIELD.

The Bible Society Monthly Reporter gives a singular history of a Bible found accidentally twenty years ago in the bottom of the Arno at Signa by a man bathing in that river. In the days of the persecuting Grand Duke who imprisoned the Madias, it had been flung into the river, most probably at Florence, by some one afraid of having it found in his custody, and had floated down from Florence to Signa; and having been well bound, it was not much injured. A joiner at Signa read the book, not only alone, but aloud to others, and of those who thus heard it was a stonemason of the name of Georgi, who, in consequence of what he heard, continued for twenty years to feel a want which he could not get supplied. At length he was led to the Bible Society dépôt at Florence, where he got a New Testament, and also much valuable instruction and guidance from the superintendent. He is now a diligent reader, an attentive hearer of the Gospel, and is becoming anxious to do good to others.

Dr. Krapf gives a narrative, in so far resembling this, as illustrating the change which a single copy of the Bible may effect. The case occurred in Abyssinia: A learned Abyssinian of the name of Wolda Salassieh procured a Bible in 1867 (one of those circulated by Mr. Flad), which had the effect of showing him the errors of the Abyssinian Church, and bringing him to right views of the Gospel. Being desirous of learning more about the way of salvation, he went to Jerusalem, where he became acquainted with Bishop Gobat, and received public instruction. Dr. Krapf has him now under his eye with a view to his becoming an evangelist in Abyssinia, and especially doing service as a teacher. It seems likewise that a monk, one of his friends, having been supplied by him with a Bible, has thrown his monkish dress aside, and resolved to give himself to the duty of a missionary among his own countrymen.

A still more interesting occurrence, with a similar origin, has taken place in India. A missionary in Bellary, in the south of India, in the course of a recent tour for disseminating the Bible, came upon a young man named Seeta Ram, who ten or twelve years ago obtained from a colporteur some portions of the Word of God, and more recently the whole Bible in Telugu, and proceeded to read it most diligently and try to apply it. Getting a little company gathered to hear him, including his wife and mother, he told them all that he had learned, and read the Bible to them, and with marked effect. He himself was earnest in prayer to the One God and in trust in Jesus his Saviour, and much grieved at the idolatry and wickedness around him. Becoming ill about a year ago, he was more earnest than ever, and one night read the account of the New Jerusalem with very special warmth, asking his friends if they did not see the glorious city. The same night he died. He had desired that a tract called "The Book of Life" should be placed in his hand when he was buried, and that the portions of Scripture which he possessed should be distributed, and the Bible itself kept in the house and read amongst his friends. He had often expressed a hope that he might see a Christian teacher, and learn more than he could find out about baptism and the sacraments, and the way to keep the Sabbath. The congregation he left consisted of his wife and mother, two men and two women, and some lads. These were found by the missionary to be in the habit of meeting every Sunday for prayer, and the study of the Bible. His conversation with them was most interesting, the acquaintance of some of them with Bible truth being most wonderful. The unaffected way in which they spoke of God as their Father in heaven, and Jesus as their Saviour, and the Holy Ghost as their Comforter and Teacher, showed that flesh and blood had not revealed these things to them. "Seeta Ram's mother," says the missionary, "shed tears of joy mingled with sorrow as she told us of her son," her beloved pious son. "He used to tell me many sweet stories," she said, "and begged me always to pray to this one true God; he has gone before to the beautiful city."

How wonderful an instance of the Bible becoming its own witness, and the Holy Spirit using it even without a living teacher to bring poor souls to God!

A Wesleyan missionary in Mysore gives an account of an evening at a Young Men's Mutual Improvement Association, which is somewhat à propos to the discussion lately occasioned by the Archbishop of Canterbury's remarks at Carlisle:—

"The lecture was on 'Hindu Civilisation.' The bulk of the lecture was confessedly taken from Robertson, and, to us, nothing new or specially interesting. It was, however, most amusing to sit and listen to the various criticisms made upon the lecture: some ambitious, others humorous, and one or two sharp and cruel. Most, with the lecturer, displayed an overweening satisfaction with themselves, as contrasted with the rest of the world. Even their long submission to a foreign yoke was but one of the finest proofs of the civilisation of the 'mild Hindu!' One speaker, the acting head-tutor to H.H. the Maharajah, gravely propounded his belief that Christianity, as softened, refined, and philosophized upon by Thomas de Quincey, might not be unworthy the attention of inquiring minds; but even this new and improved edition of the old Christian faith could not hope to maintain a permanent hold upon the convictions of thinking men!

"Finally, the highest native official in the province stood up and gave a most sensible address, quietly brushing away the crudities of the preceding speakers, pointing out what was lacking in Hindu civilisation: he acknowledged the honesty and justice of the English rule, confessed the inability of the Hindus to take care of themselves, and mourned that he could not look hopefully upon their future as a people or as a nation. Then, with reference to certain aspersions that had been made indirectly on missionaries, he spoke in evidently sincere and sufficiently flattering terms of their lives, labours, characters, and influence; and expressed his conviction that it was unfortunate for the missionaries that they belonged to the ruling race, as the conquered people were thoroughly convinced of our secret connection with the Government."

The Church Missionary Society Reporter states that on 17th May last Lady Muir laid the foundation-stone of St. Peter's Church, in the new Christian village of Bela, and that his honour Sir William Muir, Lieutenant-Governor of the North-Western Provinces, opened the school recently erected by his liberality. The idea of a Christian village is an extremely pleasing one. In the course of his remarks Sir William observed that he had known the Christians at Secundra before the mutiny, where they had a flourishing village, a nice church and school, but he thought that the new village, with its comfortable houses and spacious streets, its magnificent schoolroom and church, was even better than that of Secundra. He hoped that, as a city set on a hill, their influence for good on the heathen around would be felt far and wide, and that as the church tower would point heavenward, so he trusted the conversation and morality of the village of Bela would be heavenward also. He hoped all Christian virtues would be exemplified in their lives, and they would not forget among other things that cleanliness was akin to godliness. He trusted that, with their present privileges they would strive to help themselves, for he saw no reason why native Christians should not educate themselves to fill posts of honour, and to take the foremost position in native society. He would have the children well trained, and urged upon the parents the necessity of bringing up their children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord. He hoped that every man in the village would have his little cottage-garden, and thus make the village a model one in every respect for the North-West Provinces, also that the fruits of Christian grace might be visible in their lives, so that the Christian's peace might be theirs in death.

From New Caledonia there is very sad intelligence. At Ouvea, in the Loyalty Islands, according to the Sydney Morning Herald, a horrible massacre has taken place. It is believed to have been at the instigation of Catholics in the island, and of the chief Ombaloo, who have a fanatical hatred to the Protestants. The immediate occasion of the massacre would seem to have been the determination of the Protestants to build a church. Four men were killed in the first onset and many wounded. Four more were killed afterwards, and among these an old man, chopped with an axe in a horrible manner, who lived a few hours. The rest were compelled to become Catholics through terror, and at the edge of the axe.

CROOKED PLACES:

A Story of Struggles and Hopes.

BY EDWARD GARRETT, AUTHOR OF "OCCUPATIONS OF A RETIRED LIFE," ETC.

PART II.—HOW GOD GUIDED A GENIUS.

CHAPTER I.—THE TALENT PUT TO INTEREST.

ALthough his diligent boy-hood and youth, George Harvey lived a kind of double life. He might talk over some of his duties and prospects to his mother and sisters, but the real secrets of his working existence remained in his own heart. If Mrs. Harvey had known all, she might have felt goaded to snatch him from it, at any cost, as a brand from the burning.

George's was a very hard place to begin with. It was easy to describe himself as "a reading boy," and to speak only of his wonderful trials and successes in his old skill in deciphering writing. To the brave, manly lad it was equally easy to be silent about the errand-going, window-cleaning, and office-cleansings, which earned more than half his humble wage. When George's hands looked unaccountably red and scarified, there was always some reasonable account of a seasonable and obliging assistance which had been required in the matter of presses and types. It was the truth certainly, but it was not the whole truth, nor yet one quarter of it.

O reader, in thy praiseworthy severity towards shams, include not under that name all things which are not precisely what they seem. Was He an impostor who supped at Emmaus in the guise of a stranger? Stop the counterfeit coin, and destroy its baseness for ever, but condemn not the foreign piece which thou hast taken unawares into thy purse. It may not be good to pay thy baker's bill, but it may be worthy to grace a royal cabinet. Askest thou, what is the use of the secrecies, and euphonisms behind which grow up only fair flowers of endurance and sacrifice? Askest thou, why should not the world see these beauties, these virtues? Why dost thou store thy dainty plants in winter? Why dost thou not leave them open to sweeten the north-east wind, and enliven the snowy landscape? Answer that question, and then be content to love even thy nearest and dearest, in the faith that they offer to God far sweeter blossoms than they can ever give thee in this world.

Poor little George Harvey, with his Greek verses, and his many crowding fancies!—no loving heart less tender and true than the heart of his Heavenly Father could have borne to see him, in his little greasy apron, rubbing away at smoky windows with sore chapped hands, or going from tap-room to coffee-house collecting the unctuous dinners of the ribald journeymen. He patronised the exact side-streets where he knew his mother would never see him. He met Milly once, and exhorted her "not to tell," and she was worthy of him, and did not, and never even mentioned it to himself, till years and years afterwards. And surely God wrote down his name in his book of heroes—a larger volume and of a totally different contents to any such work current in this world.

In their more prosperous days, George had enjoyed a small weekly allowance, which he had always hoarded for the purchase of books. But this was now set afar off, among unattainable luxuries. He had just to go over and over again, his old Homer, his old "Pilgrim's Progress," and his very ancient and battered Plutarch's Lives. He was often very tired of these at first; the mystery was that he grew less and less so. He did not remember that a sage had said, "Fear the man of one book."

George's scrambling duties led him among many varied people. He did not make friends as his sister Hatty did. Or rather he made friends to himself, but was not made a friend of. He filled his own heart and imagination rather than entered into others'. He really knew more about many people to whom he never spoke an unnecessary word, than did Hatty of those with whom she sat and chatted for hours.

There was the woman at the boiled-beef-shop. George knew quite well that she had been a great deal better brought up than the vulgarly handsome "master," who sat in her parlour smoking a long clay pipe. George quite understood that she was very unhappy, and though her eyes were red for weeks after her baby died, still George did not think she was altogether sorry. Heaven preserve the little printer boy, but he had his private doubts, which he would not have breathed to a living soul, whether she was really "Mrs. Smith." He always put her wasted tawdry figure into Hatty's song of—

"Oh no, we never mention her,
Her name is quite forgot."

And yet she was kind to the little quiet printer boy, and let him look over her shop-bundles of waste-paper, and pick out whatever he chose.

Then there was "Mr. Rollo," who wrote poetry, and got George's master to print it on credit. Mr. Rollo had been a wealthy tradesman's son, but he had been quite above the shop. He could not find Helicon in the cellar, nor Parnassus behind the counter. It staggered George at first, and he thought Mr. Rollo a shrinking, sensitive soul, too "sweet" and "light" for his hard work-a-day world. With Mr. Rollo in his eye, George even wrote a secret stanza about—

"That lofty soul, that noble mind,
Which no fit resting-place can find;
But bravely meets its lonely doom,
And only asks—a poet's tomb!"

But George presently discovered that if Mr. Rollo could not find Helicon and Parnassus in the shop, he seemed to find them in still stranger places. Did he think the gutter was Helicon, that George had to pick him out of it one fine winter evening? Did he think the police-cell was Parnassus, that he went there regularly every two or three months for blacking "Mrs. Rollo's" eyes? Why had he married poor Mrs. Rollo, if he did not like her?—and George could not wonder if he did not, for she was vulgar, fat, and loud. By-and-by George heard that Mrs. Rollo had a little money! It was altogether a shock to one's ideas to think—

"That heaven-born genius so should fall!"

But still poor Rollo was kind; he was the very first person to whom George ventured to show his own rhymes, and Rollo lent him Crabbe's "Poems," and Walter Scott's "Antiquary," and patted the boy's shoulder and said, with something very like a tear in his fishy eyes, "that he'd better stick to his work, and that would make a man of him."

Poor little George! Once he set his boyish heart on buying a bound and ruled book wherein to copy his poetical efforts. These things were not so cheap sixty years ago as they are now, and it was a very common-looking thing, priced eighteen-pence, on which George set his fancy. But his wish was a profound secret. Nobody knew that he wrote poetry, and yet the longing for utterance was so strong with him, that it seemed to him as if an invisible public would read and sympathize, if once his rhymes were legibly written out! He used to picture to himself how he might die, and his writings be found afterwards, and his name made immortal! Morbid fancy of green youth, fruit of folly and not of genius! But in his case the sacred salt of genius preserved it from corruption into mere egotism. For he hoped it might bring friends to help his mother and sisters when he was gone!

But the practical part of the question was about this eighteen-pence, and what were the legitimate means of secretly acquiring such a fortune!

Now in the office there was a young printer, with whom George was on rather more intimate terms than with most of the other men. Mrs. Harvey heard occasional mention of his name—James Murray; but if she had known all about him and his history up and down, she would almost have died of terror for her poor boy's morals and manners.

James Murray did not know how he came by his name. His earliest recollections were of living with his mother in varying sets of furnished apartments. He had known none of the restraints and instructions of even nominally decent homes. He had been born and brought up at the bottom of the blackest pit of human depravity. It was a miracle that he was not a thief, in the coarsest rendering of pick-pocket or burglar, but that was the utmost that could be said of him, for sense of morality he had none.

In birth, in breeding, in that grain of mind and frame which grows out of these, George Harvey and James Murray stood at antipodes. And it was from their very distance that they drew together.

The other men and lads in the place were ordinary work-people, with the common merits and faults of their class—left, at that date, very much in their native "rough." They disliked George, calling all his little ways which differed from theirs, "a setting up," and constantly jealous of the superiority his quickness of mind gained over their untutored strength. They despised James. There were always fights arising out of their coarse insults about his parentage; for though James confided to George that he did not much feel the sting of these, he always made them an excuse to display his physical prowess, as the best proof he could bring forward "that he was as good as they were."

The melancholy mystery of James Murray's whole life gave him a weird interest to George. George had put him into two poems—"The Foundling," and "The Homeless Waif," and we must say that James would not have known himself, and yet, perhaps, his failure would have lain with his own perception, rather than with George's art. Perhaps George, looking straight out of his innocent boyhood, saw the nearest to what God himself saw—a sight utterly sad and pitiful, to make angels weep and fiends rejoice. George was not yet philosopher enough to say coolly "that every human being must have had a chance in life," and so pass by, self-satisfied, on the other side.

James Murray, who kept no "Sunday best," had once, from a lounging post, seen the Harvey family going to church. He could not understand it at all—was as far from it as the best of us are from the angel's song and service. "She's a fine woman, that little chap's mother," he said afterwards. "I'd have liked to go up and speak to 'em, if I'd had on a decent coat."

It was this James Murray who happened one day to tell George that "his old landlady was in an awful pickle, for she'd a swell lodger who wanted his boots cleaned for him, and her own hands were bad with the gout, and she was "queer," and so suspicious of strangers that she would not have one in, and her own nephew said she might get them done how she liked, for he was above being "any man's flunkey."

George thought it over all day long. He was not without a boy's dislike for "menial" work, but he argued within himself, that when he already did so much like it, it was rather foolish not to do a little more, when he wanted eighteen-pence so very, very much! "It is easier doing it when one is not forced to do it, too," he argued within himself. "It is the forcing that breaks one's spirit. I should not like to be forced. I should not like mother to have had to say to me, 'George, you must take any sort of place you can get, and you must not be particular what you have to do, for you must earn money.' I came here of my own accord, and I don't see why I shouldn't clean these boots for my own pleasure. This common boy, the old lady's nephew, is afraid of seeming a flunkey, because he is one already. I've heard mother say that nothing honest is beneath a gentleman, because, whatever it is, he can do it from a gentleman's motive, and in a gentleman's way."

Was he a poor little moralist on stilts? Never mind; stilts are only folly at a country fair, but we fancy we remember hearing of a district in Germany where some peculiarity of the soil sets all the sensible people walking on stilts, and only fools trail through the bog!

So George made up his mind to clean the boots, and requested James Murray to introduce him to the "queer" landlady, in case she might be disposed to trust him as not altogether a stranger.

"Well, this is a rum go!" James not un-naturally ejaculated. "Why, I wouldn't do such a thing myself, unless I hadn't a bit of bread to eat without it! But I'll tell her she can trust you—yes, with untold gold on her kitchen table, if she likes, and that's more than she could do with some that pay her rent, I can tell you!"

And so George cleaned the boots, and was pronounced by the old woman "a regular nice, decent lad," and became hateful to her nephew on account of his aunt's praises. The bitterness of the deed was over after it had been done once or twice, and as the old lady's hands were not quite recovered when the eighteen-pence was earned, George resolved to go on as long as he was needed. The worse of it was, the walk to and fro took up his small leisure, and prevented him from getting as far as Cheapside to buy the particular book on which he had set his heart. "One can't be earning and spending too," George said to himself; and, besides, had a capitalist's comfortable inclination to wait and choose the best market.

In the meantime James Murray had been going on very badly indeed. In the lodging-house kitchen, George had learned more about him than he had ever heard before. Now, George regularly read the Youth's Magazine which the grocer's wife lent his sister Milly, and its simple, moral stories fired him with a desire to do good, like their Christian heroes and heroines. He wanted to make some drunkard sober, some infidel believe, some Sabbath-breaker attend church. George did not know that he was not a Christian himself, nor did he suspect that Christianity meant any more than these good outward things—except that there was what seemed to George a mere formula attached to his favourite stories, which, in his turn, he was quite ready to repeat, though with no more meaning than the muttering of a magic spell. He was like the poor little bird in the dark inn-kitchen, who mistook a lamp for the sun, and sang its matin at vesper-time! He could not have understood the question, “Do ye fulfil the law of Christ?” for he had not learned that there is no fulfilment of the law out of Christ. But the little dim artificial light he had he wanted to share—sure sign that a higher law was working in him than any he yet knew how to obey.

He wanted to do good to James Murray; he “talked” to him very sensibly as to his outward failures and delinquencies, and James was often seriously attentive. But George spoiled all by winding up with religious exhortations, which his unmeaning utterance spoiled as an ignorant translation can spoil the grandest original.

Oh, if the aspiring missionary had only heard his subject’s candid opinion of him.

“He’s a good enough little chap, but I can’t make out half what he means, and I don’t believe he can himself.”

And yet, never mind. Aspiration is the upward path. Desire precedes fulfilment. Let each, in whatever gibberish he can command, tell his fellow-sufferers and sinners that there is a Fountain of Living Water, and what he believes to be the best way to it. Their empty vessels, big and little, may have to wait awhile before the stream of pardoning love shall fill them. Nobody knows who shall first be filled—the last may be first, and the first last—perchance he who told of the Fountain may fill his own vessel from his who once did not even know that there was such a fountain!

George had been at his “menial” duty nearly six weeks when James Murray sauntered into the kitchen, and throwing himself into one of the chairs, announced—

“I ain’t going up to work with you to-day; and if the governors think o’ sending here to look for me, tell them to save themselves the trouble, for I’ll be off within half an hour after you go.”

“Off? Where to?” George asked in astonishment.

James laughed. “Don’t know, and don’t care,” he said recklessly. “I can’t be much worse than in prison, and if I stopped I’d be there to-night.”

“What do you mean, Jem?” George inquired kindly.

“Oh, I’ve been behaving like ‘a warning tract,’ or your clever talk, mate. I’ve gone from bad to worse. I’ve sworn and drank long enough; now I’ve been picking and stealing, and when you write my history I don’t know whether you’ll need stretch your fancy much to just finish off that I died on the gallows at last!”

“What have you stolen?” George asked, knowing the young man quite well enough to accept his plain statement as no exaggeration of fact.

“Was cleaned out last night, and one of the governors had left three shillings and sixpence on the shelf, and I took it up. Old tell-tale Cater saw me, but I said I was taking it home with me to keep it safe from the boys. I tried my luck with it and lost, and ain’t got a penny to refund with. I’m deep in debt here too, so it’s a good opportunity to clear all scores by cutting away. I’ll enlist, or go out before the mast. I’ve tried something like a decent life, and made a mull of it, and now I’ll try the other.”

All for three-and-sixpence! When a soul treads the slimy paths of sin, it takes a very little slip to slide him down that yawning precipice below, whose bottom no man knows!

All for three-and-sixpence! And George Harvey had absolutely four shillings in his pocket carefully wrapped in a fragment of that scribble which he was so modestly anxious to see at least in fair and flowing manuscript.

Honest, enthusiastic little soul! He had not yet heard of the refinements of that delicate philosophy which hesitates to use its powers for good lest it should be guilty of bribery or compulsion! He looked upon this as a glorious opportunity, and it did not cost him half the struggle to give up his earnings as it had to earn them.

“I’ll lend you three-and-sixpence, Murray, and you can take it back with you this morning,” he said; “but I can’t do it unless you’ll promise me to sign the pledge, and go to church every Sunday for three months.”

“That’s stiff conditions, my boy,” returned the other, with half a jeer; “I don’t think my respectability is worth so much.”

“Oh, yes, it is,” George urged, adding, not without shrewdness, “and did not you tell me you were to get a rise in your salary in two or three months’ time? Do you want to lose all the advantages you’ve been waiting for so long?”

James whistled. George's earnestness touched him a little, and gave him a momentary glimpse of life in a new light. Like many another, he cheapened and half-suspected the benefit that was thrust upon him.

"Where have you got so much money from?" he asked.

"Out of these boots," said George laconically.

"I daresay I should never pay you again," James remarked coolly.

"Never mind," said George.

"How can you tell I'm not hoaxing you because I know you have got a little loose tin?" James presently inquired, with a hoarse laugh.

George gave him one quick glance. "I'll take the chance," he answered.

"Can't you let us off the pledge?" James asked mockingly. "As for church, I can do that. It's a warm sitting, and it's winter already."

George shook his head. "It is drink that is ruining you," he said, with his premature preciseness. "Church would do you no good, with a gill of brandy in your head."

James reflected. And it struck him that if George lent him this money, he would have no means of enforcing his conditions. He might please him by "turning" into church sometimes, but as for the pledge, he need not take it, or, for that matter, if he did he could break it.

"You're a brick, young one!" said he. "Give us over the coin."

And George counted out his little hoard.

James scarcely thanked him, but he turned back on the kitchen threshold to say—

"I'd better wait for you to come with me to the office, else I might still cut and run, and take your money with me, without giving you my precious soul in exchange."

The two did not speak much all day; but when the heavy rattle of the presses ceased, and the men began to turn down their sleeves, and wipe their faces, George went up to James.

"I know a place where you can take the pledge. I'm coming with you. There'll be a lecture first. I told mother I was going to hear it, so they don't expect me home till late."

"You're a determined young dog," said James. But he offered no opposition. The lecture might prove "a lark," and there would still be plenty of time to "get off" the pledge at last.

In those days the Temperance movement was not the wealthy or widespread organization which it now is. Gough was not yet born to adorn it with oratory, nor had Mathew yet consecrated it by his zeal. The noble army of self-denial had not arisen, and there were few total abstainers except reformed drunkards. Yet this simpler state of matters was not without its advantages. Temperance at the table was not then in much danger of breeding intemperance of the tongue. It had not become an element in political life, and it had few advocates except men of simple and vital piety, who were in no danger of mistaking a means for the end, and who fostered little excitement, and less self-laudation.

It was such a man who addressed the meeting that night. The plea with which he came before the people, was after this wise:—

There was One who came to live among men, and show what God had meant them to be, and, at last, to die among them, by their hands—to die for them, taking the punishment of their sins upon himself, that those who would clothe themselves in his righteousness might pass from the just wrath to the pardoning mercies of his Almighty Father. It was on the divine idea of sacrifice that he dwelt. And when he came at last to press his special plea, it was pointing to the story of the Cross, and urging "that He died in his love for thee; canst thou not do this small thing in love and gratitude to Him?"

There was a grandeur in his simple eloquence.

"For thee Christ gave up his Father's throne, and the worship of angels, and all the indescribable bliss of heaven. For thee, instead of these, He took up a frail mortal body, and became a poor despised man, who had not where to lay his holy head. For thee, He endured temptation, persecution, and treachery. For thee, He was scourged and spit upon, and mocked. For thee, He hung among the common malefactors. For thee, He fainted and bled, and died in agony.

"For his sake, can you not give up the cup that starves you and strips you and slays your wives and children? For his sake, can you not give up the glass that seduces you to workhouses and madhouses and jails? For his sake, can you not give up the fiery poison, which you will loathe as it should be loathed before you have abstained from it for a year? For his sake, O my brethren, can you not give up the deadly drug that will send you besotted to the doom He died to save you from?"

"Don't you believe in 'giving up,' my friends? Is there nobody who has ever given up anything for you?" (Ay, that there is like a little Briton, thought James Murray.) "And wouldn't you hate yourself for a mean, cowardly worm, if you took their kindness and flung it back in their face?" (It is awfully shabby—of course I never meant to do it, thought James Murray.) "Then why do you do to your divine Saviour what you wouldn't do to your human friend? If there's one here who feels he hasn't a bit of goodness of his own, and that he don't even know what goodness is, you're the man that Jesus wants, my brother." (Then that's me, thought James Murray.) "Come to Him—just as you are. Put your dirty, stained life in his hand, and He will make it pure. And I, as his servant and because I love you for his sake, stand here and entreat you to come and be one of us. If it will help you to tell me your difficulties, I am quite sure Christ has an answer for them all. We want to aid you, as brothers should aid each other, and may the blessing of God be about us all."

"I'm going to stay," whispered James Murray to George. "Don't you wait. I'd rather go up by myself."

He signed the pledge that night.

He repaid George's loan in less than a month. And the next time he was called ugly names in the office, his face turned very red, but he did not offer to fight. George went with him to many an evening service and Bible reading among his new friends, but he grew often weary where James sat interested and delighted. George thought the difference lay in James's utter ignorance which made every holy thing a pleasing novelty. George became terribly afraid that such a complete change could not last, and that he should have the humiliation of seeing James fall back to his old ways. He could not understand the entire difference in his tone of thought, which was presently manifold. Strangest of all it was, to find how James was heartily ashamed of ways and characteristics which had formerly been his pride—that he no longer called arrogance and brutality "high spirit," nor mistook ribaldry for wit, nor shamelessness for candour.

Poor George, he would have only cut off the tops of the weeds, and because a wiser way had uprooted them, and sown honest corn in their place, he doubted, and was almost glad when James, by-and-by, went away, with a creditable character, to a better situation in a midland town. As if anybody was ever quite lost sight of in this little world, where, if you flee from London to Caffraria, you shall find your old next-door neighbour's brother living in the nearest shanty! Let us take heed what we cast into the sea of life, for it will surely be thrown ashore again at our feet.

And so George's poems were fairly copied out at last.

CHAPTER II.—GEORGE HARVEY'S FIRST SUCCESS.

AND then George's life flowed on very evenly for years. He rose in his employment, and became a first-rate compositor. Many and many an one might have thanked him that in some occult way their lucubrations appeared in proof, with mended punctuation, grammar, and even sense. But they only thought "how much better it read in print."

"I would not trouble myself thus for nothing, Harvey," his fellow-workmen would say.

"In all labour there is profit," George smiled in reply. He grew more popular as he grew older.

But all through those quietly prosperous years, there ran a strong under-current of excited interest. George must have been about seventeen when he first sent a "poem" to a magazine. He did it in secret, and when he had done it, he trembled to think what an awkward revelation its return would make. For George gave his own name and his own address, too open to think of any double dealing, and too generous and unsophisticated to suspect that his lowly habitation might offer no attraction to the editorial eye.

But George need not have troubled himself about "returned MS." that time—no, nor for long afterwards. Not until his mother and sisters had guessed the mystery of his interminable copyings, and watched for the postman's knock as eagerly as he did himself.

"Do not speak to him about it, girls," exhorted Mrs. Harvey. "Wait till he speaks himself. Suspense and disappointment are often easiest borne in silence."

"But he might show his writings to us," Hatty had protested. "Because the stupid magazine people don't care for them, he needn't think we shouldn't." And it became a stereotyped form of unfavourable criticism with her.

"I'm sure George could have done better than that."

George actually greeted it as a step made in the right direction, when his papers began to come back "with thanks." But why need we go into all the details of a story which in some form is as old as genius itself? Why need we tell of the sour editor, who made the poor lad wander for two hours in the dark in Hackney Fields, by scrawling over the back of his very best production, "Let the writer learn a useful trade, and forget that he had ever the folly and presumption to think of verse-making?" Why need we tell of the kind editor—no, it was an editress!—who lifted him into the seventh heaven by writing him a pretty little note (which had a deep black border), saying, "You only need patience and cultivation. You have the gift, and it lies now in your own hands. I can appreciate your poems, in spite of their technical crudeness, and they have touched me—you may guess how much, for I could not find time to write thus fully to many of my would-be contributors. They remind me of my younger and brighter self, before I had lost faith in everything but blue skies and green grass. I should like to see you, but will not, for my acquaintance would be no real benefit to you."

It made George very happy when he read it. It was the first warm grasp of a comrade's hand. Years after, when he read it again, it made him very sad; for by that time he had learned enough to read a woeful tale between the lines.

Despairing of the magazines, George collected his poems, and resolved to face a publisher. He chose one who had recently issued a little book something in the style of his own production. How it would have daunted George had he known that its author had published strictly on his own account, and was already fifty pounds the poorer for the transaction!

George left the packet of poems and a very modest letter, saying he would call again in a few days. He did so, and a smirking shopman told him that if he waited a moment, he thought "Mr. Dunbar would see him." And George sat down to wait. He fancied that a superior-looking young man, seated behind a desk, looked pointedly at him; but ere he had time even to return the glance, the shopman came back and summoned him to Mr. Dunbar's presence, warning him familiarly that, 'he would have to speak up well, for the governor was dreadfully deaf;' and with great trepidation, George entered the awful sanctum.

"Come in, come in and sit down, my lad," said a cheerful, rubicund old gentleman. "And so you write poems, do you? Bless me, you look very young! And what else can you do beside write poems, young man?"

"I am a compositor," said George.

"That's right—that's right. A starving genius is never the best sort of genius, my boy. And I can tell you, my lad, you write a deal better for being a compositor. Says I to my nephew when I read your verses, says I, 'This young fellow has looked outside his own head;' and I can tell you, my friend, if the greatest genius doesna do that, his genius soon gets blind in the dark! And now, my dear laddie, you mustn't mind me saying that these things won't sell. If I were to publish them, instead of my paying you, I should want you to pay me; and there wouldn't be ten sold except what you bought yourself to give to your friends, who would laugh at you behind your back. And now, what did you say your name was, my boy?"

"George Harvey," faltered poor George.

"And are you with your own people? Have you still got your father and mother?"

"Only my mother," said George.

"Ah, she's a widow," observed the old man, with a kindly insight into the little tragedy before him. "And has she been a widow long?"

"Seven years," said George.

"And are you a Londoner-born?" asked Mr. Dunbar.

"Yes, I was born in Buckingham Street, by Charing Cross," said George. "We were better off before my father died."

"Harvey! Buckingham Street, Charing Cross," echoed the publisher. "I have a brother doing business in the wharves below there; surely I've heard him speak of the Harveys—something about your mother behaving in a vera honourable way about her husband's debts?"

"My mother did what was right," said George proudly.

"Yes, yes—a weel-respeckit woman—an' there were some that didna say much, that noticed a good deal. So, so. Well, my boy, if you'll take an old man's advice, what you've got to do is to work for the magazines, and the editors will tak care not to publish what folk winna read, an' they'll lick you into shape fine."

"But they won't have anything to do with me, sir," said George, laughing.

"Willna they?" answered the good Scotchman. "Ha' ye tried the Thoughtful Hour?"

"No, sir," said George, "I did not dare to do that, for inferior papers have rejected me."

"An' did it never strike your simple mind that your morals might be too guid for them as well as your rhymes too bad?" asked Mr. Dunbar. "A' well, the editor of the Thoughtful Hour is a good man, frae my ain toon in Dumfrieshire, an' I'll gie ye a line to him. Mind, I canna make him tak your verses, and I dinna think he will tak mony; but I'll tell him to look himsel' at what you may send, and gie ye a word o' advice, when you need it, an' 'accept' ye as soch as he can. An' when the Thoughtful Hour accepts, it pays. An' noo, good-day, my man; and ye needna thank me, for it's an unco' pleasure to come across a bodie whase sel', or verses either, are worth saying a guid word for."

As George, in his delight, almost stumbled along the dark passage which led from the private room to the shop, he jostled against the young man whom he noticed behind the desk.

"The shopman tells me you are Mr. Harvey," he said, interrupting George's apologies. "My uncle gave me your manuscripts to read. You are one of the right sort; we shall hear more of you. I am glad to have seen you."

And George went home, as if he had wings rather than feet. If such was the foretaste of fame, what must be the sweetness of its full fruition? Ah, George, George, you cannot eat a peach without brushing its bloom away, and many a beautiful picture looks fairest from the distance. Fame's trumpet sounds well down the aisles of the past, but it often seems only discord to the ears that are nearest.

"CROOKED PLACES."

Then George dispatched a little budget to the Thoughtful Hour, and for four months that oracle preserved a dead silence, and George began to fear that he need only thank kind Mr. Dunbar for good intentions.

It was Hatty Harvey's duty always to answer the door, but whenever there was a postman's call George always went out of the parlour and stood on the mat. If it was a family letter he came in again with Hatty, if it was anything for himself he took it from her, and retired to the back room, and stayed there as long as he liked, sure that when he chose to join the family circle no remark would be made nor question asked. Is not such silence the very heart of confidence?

They kept it so implicitly that the mother and daughter never even said a word to each other whenever Hatty came in alone.

"He would not like to be talked over," Mrs. Harvey had decided, "and there is a fine instinct by which people always know when it is done."

They only suspended their work for a single significant glance at each other, one might say when they heard him pacing about the next room, with a strange new vehemence. They were all stitching with their usual industry when he came in, and said, with suppressed excitement, that could not pause to go through any unnecessary explanation—

"One is taken at last! They have sent me the proof and a draft. Look!"

He spread the papers on the table. Milly caught up the poem. Hatty seized the draft. But the mother's eyes were on her boy's face. It was white and sharp in its agony of triumph, with a wild, strong light in the dark blue eyes. It was as the fierce ecstasy of a dumb man, who suddenly finds voice. She had often pondered if her child really had genius—or only its terrible, treacherous simulation. That never troubled her again.

"A whole guinea! And yet I'm sure it's worth more!" cried Hatty, not in the least ashamed of her keen interest in the practical part of the affair. And why should she be? For honesty is before honour; and though man must write his poems in sounding words, God's poems are printed best in the brave and silent duties of common life.

Her voice called George down from that point of acute rapture whereon mortals are never very safely poised, to those simple facts which great raptures and agonies are only made to sanctify. He did not sharply rebuke his sister's observation as degrading to the high vocation which was opening before him. It revealed the soundness of his nature that he was wise and sweet in his hour of joy. At the very moment of his own triumph he unconsciously felt, clearer than ever before, that life was holy and beautiful on all its sides, and that only God can rightly judge which side is highest.

"I hope I shall soon be able to make things very different for you all," he said proudly. "I've never said so before, because mere talking is no use."

"I know it is not much yet, Hatty," he went on deprecatingly, "but it is only the beginning." And then the pride of his order flushed up, and he added: "Money need not represent the value of the work. Some things cannot have money value. Fifteen thousand pounds could have been no nearer to the value of 'Paradise Lost' than the fifteen pounds that the Milton family got for it. You don't think your linnets' songs are only worth the seeds you give it, Hatty. But the seeds are all that you can give."

"But I'd be ashamed of myself if I gave it just as little as would keep it alive!" Hatty muttered, wagging her head.

"This is really worth very little," he said, taking his poem from Milly's hand. "I only wonder that they have taken it at all. I never thought less of anything of mine than I do of this poem as I read it now. Nothing more than any girl in my heroine's place must think, if she would only think it aloud."

"But you ain't a girl, and that makes it wonderful," persisted downright Hatty.

"A little appreciation makes one very humble, mother," said George to Mrs. Harvey, as he bade her good-night. "I thought there was something in me, and while I was snubbed I could assert that something! But now—I'm afraid!"

There was no sleep for him that night. Slumber never brought such dreams as he dreamed—wakeful. Those poor shillings, marked on that draft—what agonies of mental arithmetic were they not carried through! So many poems, so much money. So much money, so much improvement at home. Out of this, his very first literary earning, he must make some gift to his mother and each of his sisters. Something pretty as a keepsake, and pleasing as a present, and yet something that should spare the household purse, always so sternly absorbed. God had dropped the seed of a true poet into the lad's heart; and thus it was striking root downward and bearing fruit upward, spreading its sweet aroma through all the ramifications of his nature; not growing on the surface of his life, but drawing his life into itself.

Well, it is something in one's life when the first watchful night is one of hope and joy!

CHAPTER III.—HOW GEORGE GOT LOST IN THE SUBLIME DARKNESS.

GEORGE never "woke one fine morning and found himself famous." He worked his way on slowly and surely. Editors and publishers who were pleased with his poems, began to suggest that he might find new successes in prose. Their encouragement was not always as entirely flattering or beneficent as it might appear, since the idea generally seized them when some "regular hand" had failed them, perhaps on some subject that was already advertised, and the tyro was expected to write at a shortness of time which the "regular hand" would utterly have repudiated, except at very different prices! George knew all about it, but he had lived no glass-case existence, but an honest open-air one, and instead of being sensitive and indignant, was contented and thankful, and was, perhaps, all the more grateful to his employers, because their favours did not lie upon him as a heavy burden, but were borne between them, as cheerful mutual obligation. "George is a genius," Hatty used to say, "and yet he's as sensible as if he was stupid!"

George continued in his printing-office until more than a year after his sister Hatty's marriage. At that time he accepted the post of sub-editor and general literary factotum in the house of a rising publisher, who wanted to get as good an article as was to be had—cheap.

He had been the financial head of the little household for some time before that, and, indeed, his commencing salary was not much more than the wages he had earned among the presses—was, in fact, no more, considering the extra expenses of a changed social position.

"We can do things a little different without letting them cost much more," his mother reflected, and their changes were made by that prudent standard.

They left the homely house at Mile-end for an old-fashioned cottage at Hackney. They got this on very moderate terms, because the landlord lived next door, and was "particular," and would not take children, or a piano, or people who kept late hours. It was a pretty little cottage, scarcely larger than the Mile-end one, but with a trellis-porch, a Virginian creeper, and Gothic windows.

"Just such a quaint, genteel place as I always thought I should like to live in when I got old," said Mrs. Harvey.

Another change on which George insisted was, that his mother should give up all work for money. They had lost their old house-keeper, Hatty, and George commanded that his mother should take her place, with the assistance of a little maid hired from the workhouse.

Milly still continued her designing, and earned a very fair female income. Then, as the Hackney cottage boasted an extra bedroom, it was arranged that Miss Brook should come and live with them. It was a plan which conferred a benefit on all parties concerned. Miss Brook put her own furniture into the empty room, and paid the five shillings a week which had been her accustomed rent for years. That made a considerable item in the rent of the Hackney cottage. At the same time, Miss Brook had hitherto been penned in her own narrow precincts, frying comfortless chops in winter, and in summer eating cold dinners and drinking milk, sooner than light a fire. Now she had "the run of the house," and lived cheaper and better by sharing the Harveys' food. Miss Brook still frowned and spoke as sharply as ever, but the Harveys never noticed it, for they knew it meant smiles and approval. George had made two or three "characters" out of Miss Brook, and had put her in two or three poems. She had such a strongly-marked self, and yet spoke so little of herself, that she was really exciting to the imagination, like some of those gaunt old Border keeps, which have survived their very names and traditions.

But George presently found that he must be prepared to attend an occasional dinner party. Flattering letters came to him from wealthy, would-be litterateurs.

Now, in his own home, at his mother's side, George Harvey had always enjoyed the very best society—that of a thoughtful, cultivated Christian woman. She had really formed her son's taste upon this standard. But connoisseurs of all kinds are at times liable to be diverted out of their better sense. Men who can appreciate Velasquez and Vanduyck have been bewitched into buying Sir Peter Lelys.

George Harvey was but young. And if there were some trials and temptations of literary life, against which his Spartan training had forearmed him, there were others to which it left him peculiarly open. The lowly printing-office, the free gibe and comment of the work-people, but served as a foil to set forth the charms of the soft-speaking, complimentary society into which he was now introduced. At first he did not care for it at all, was only too glad to escape from it to a bread-and-cheese supper, and the simple talk at home. But after a time the poison began to work. Its sickly taste began to seem only sweetness. An appetite was forming which could be satisfied with no other food.

He began to think that perhaps public opinion in his home had grown rather too simple and direct—that perhaps life had a few interesting corners which must be measured by some rule less stern and straight than that of "Fear God, and keep his commandments; for this is the whole duty of man."

He fancied that there might be some truth in the delicate and wide views of his new friends, and that most ministers of the gospel were too "narrow." Not that all these superior people censured them for it,—the common multitude required bonds and bounds, but they were elevated above such things, as the man is elevated above scholastic discipline. It was a dainty compliment to George, when referring to his minister, they observed "how beautiful it was in him to be ready to learn of a man whom he could teach."

They never said that anything was "wicked." There were men in the "set" who had two wives, or at least a right wife and a wrong one. Their stories were whispered about as interesting secret tragedies. They might mean suffering and sacrifice and sorrow—they might mean anything but what they unmistakably did mean—sin. And yet it is wrong to say that they never said anything was wicked. Whatever injured themselves, either in fact or fancy, was unpardonable. Whatever would not be injured by them, was coarse selfishness or black ingratitude. In a word, they forgave everybody's enemies but their own. But this inconsistency was not apparent to George, while their acquaintance-ship was new.

They went into such charmingly courageous arguments. Nothing was too sacred to be doubted and discussed. "Perish whatever will not bear handling," they cried. Fancy if a burglar said so of your jewel-case!

They were so gentle, too, and tender. The women among them could not believe that the taint of sin was already in their "sweet and innocent little ones." It was quite natural and interesting that they should smash their toys, make targets of windows, and insist on tasting every dish at table. It was also "natural" that they should pull the cat's tail, but they evidently judged her a higher order of being, for it was not natural if she turned round and retaliated. Then she must be beaten and banished.

"Well, I do believe in innate depravity," George observed (it had been their last argument), "and yet I cannot remember the least inclination to worry an animal."

At first George fancied that the re-action of their doubts and uncertainties, was but a refreshment and stimulant to his own spiritual nature. The fact was, he did not yet understand that spirituality is quite different from mere mental grasp. There were beliefs which he held the tighter for any effort to draw them from him. He was a Christian in his understanding, and it had a side-light into his heart, which otherwise was yet in darkness.

There are many people, especially those of quick and thoughtful capacity, who, born in Christian homes, can never tell precisely when first the light about them shone also from within. It may have been such a little taper at first, that though it would have shone plainly in darkness, it was smothered by the brilliance around. Often it burns so for a long time, is almost extinguished, and then its revivifying is likely to be mistaken for its first appearance.

George presently became aware of an uncomfortable change in himself. His regular prayers and public devotions began to appear wearisome and useless formalities. The Bible seemed half a dull truism, and half an incomprehensible mystery. Life looked like a tangle. The dogmas on which he had rested seemed to bend beneath him, like bodies without a living soul. What had satisfied him hitherto sufficed him no longer. He thought he needed less—he really needed more. He was like a man throwing away a precious stone as useless, because it is not yet set and polished.

Yet he had misgivings that this was not a change for the better, and wanted to hide it as much as he could, even from himself. But it would come out. It is as hard to hide a dead faith as a dead body. These acquaintances of his found it out as vultures find carrion.

"We always thought you would soon rise above the circle of the creeds," they congratulated him. "We knew you would soon be strong enough to recognise the sublime darkness, without trying to dissipate it with a farthing candle. Submit yourself to the mysteries of the Infinite. Rest assured that the Supreme Intelligence which turns the dead leaf into manure for the next spring, will find some satisfactory use for our lives beyond the grave. Let positive science be your undeniable revelation."

George stoutly denied that he had reached any such point of enlightenment, but the others shook their heads and knew better. George still went to church; he still read family prayers,—Mrs. Harvey having long since relegated that duty to him. But he did not pray in private. Sometimes he kneeled down—dumb. Even his desk-work had ceased to be a joy to him. He did not know what to say; he had nothing worth saying to his fellows. What is there to say about a "supreme silent Intelligence?" Who is to be the perfect ideal of the Friend and the Benefactor? Who is to be the Husband of the widow, or the Father of the fatherless? In his secret heart, George Harvey felt that his questionings were going far beyond the avowals of his acquaintance. And so he was, for his doubts were sincere spiritual throes, theirs but social excuses.

But it all lay between God and his own soul. His nearest and dearest never suspected it. Only his plain-speaking sister Hatty observed to her husband—

"George always seems to me to be in a bad temper when he comes from service on Sundays."

CHAPTER IV.—THE TALENT BEARS INTEREST.

GEORGE lived on somehow, as people do live through great struggles or great sorrows. He knew now that he had lost something whose possession he had never realised before. He missed it, as the world would miss its unnoticed blessings of air, light, and water.

He could not help seeing an outer difference in himself. It was no longer easy to put aside his own books, and read aloud from some volume that interested his mother and Miss Brook. It was no longer a matter of course to postpone some purchase for himself, that he might the sooner buy some article for Mrs. Harvey, or some trifle to beautify the home. To remember birthdays seemed but a trivial impertinence, unworthy of the "stern reality" of life.

He gradually grew taciturn, and was often touchy and irascible. Mrs. Harvey feared he was working his brain too hard, and George himself tried to believe in the motherly apprehension.

He would go and sit in the Webbers' house of an evening. He did not speak much, and the good little stationer was often sorely awed by this strange genius of a brother-in-law.

But George liked to hear him talk. His simple views of life, his perpetual consciousness of a higher law, and his trustful confidence in its finalities, were to George's wrung and jaded sensibilities like a sweet fairy tale among bewildering geometrical problems. It soothed him as such, but it did him no more good, because it was a seed that fell on such stony ground as this:

"He is naturally a good man, and he is satisfied and happy because he is not very wise. He has faith, because he does not know doubt. His soul has known no struggle, no yearning. It may be well to be so—especially for him!"

George forgot that nobody knew of his own struggles and yearnings, though they might begin presently to perceive upon him the signs of defeat. We are all so apt to forget that other men's histories are not written as plainly upon their backs, as our own is, in our hearts.

Another woeful experience for George was, that as he had lost his old and merely half-mechanical faith in God, he had gained faith in godless men. He invested love and confidence in people with whom, in his old simplicity, he would have had no close personal relations. He was doomed to find that hearts, unfertilised by divine love, are too sterile for any wholesome human growth.

It is no use going into the unprofitable revelations of "the natural man" which poor George found himself suddenly forced to receive. There was one, with whom George had held many a metaphysical disquisition, and who had startled him by such views as that "surely what are called sins are merely natural developments in certain persons, since almost every particular evil trait of humanity is found, as it were, personified in some species of the animal world,"—who believed "that the world was a vast machine, bound to work remorselessly on from some uncertain beginning to some unknown end,"—who held that "prayer was a useless fiction, and free-will a mere chimera, whose nearest fact lay with those who knew they had none, and consciously surrendered themselves to the despotism of their fate."

In a little money-matter with George, this individual became involved in what looked awfully like a particularly mean and base embezzlement, for which he could find no available defence except two lies and a dash of defiance. George let him go unpunished, except by a little suspense as to whether "fate" destined him to a police-cell, and by the awful consciousness that there was at least one person in the world who knew the measure of his "natural goodness!"

Still, George comforted himself that he had never had the highest opinion of the stability of this individual. For one peculiarity of his enlightenment was that it had made him "hail-fellows-well-met," with some whom all the while he secretly distrusted and more than half despised.

But there was one, who had been the very ideal of George's new spiritual world. He had not so much disputed the letter of religion, as insisted on its needlessness for those who walked in the spirit. He had neglected Sabbath observances because he said all days should be sabbaths. He had slighted God's ministers, only because he said that all men should be priests unto God. He had never kneeled to pray, because "every thought should be a prayer." His only doubt of scriptural inspiration was his belief in the equal inspiration of many other books. He had smiled benignly on the grand doctrine of the atonement, because he regarded it as the "artistic embodiment of that spirit of sacrifice which was the highest secret of life."

To this man there came a trial. Only a commercial difficulty, which he had no reserve to meet, because his delicate and liberal taste had preferred sumptuous luxury to the "low gratification of hoarding." And now he began to clutch at anything that might save him. No matter what it might be, he would grasp it—tear it up—if it would only check his fall for a moment. He who had despised "penurious economy," was not below claiming its results from any trustful hands. A hundred broken hearts and bruised lives were to him as nothing compared with his own broken fortune. He would take the bread and cheese from those that had earned it, that he and "his own" might enjoy the Dives' paradise of "faring sumptuously" every day. Self-sacrifice was the good and beautiful thing for everybody but himself!

George said nothing. Never one bitter word passed between him and his former friend. The bitterness was too bitter to be borne in the mouth. The fallen idol was shivered in too many pieces to be touched. Bury the rubbish.

It was just after this sad and silent burial that George sat one day in his office, blank and dreary. It seemed an empty world beneath an empty heaven.

"If there was a God who cared personally for us, I think He would pity me," George pondered.

There was a rap on the door—a strange rap. Nobody who came there knocked with a walking-stick. George's heart gave a curious thump.

"Come in," he said.

There entered a man about thirty. A well-dressed, pleasant looking man, with very blue eyes and a humorous mouth.

"You don't know me, I see, Mr. Harvey," he said. "But perhaps you'll recollect the name—James Murray."

"I beg your pardon for coming here to bother you," he went on, as George greeted him warmly, and drew up their chairs together before the fire. "But I've never been in London since we last parted, and I've been reading you in the magazines, and I could not help wanting to say, 'God bless you,' and how glad I am that you are in a way of doing good to plenty others as you did good to me."

"I'm afraid I don't do much good to anybody else, if I did any to you," said poor George humbly.

"No mistake about me," responded James. "You know that I was as thorough-going a young blackguard as there can be in this city, and I'd never have gone of myself where I was likely to hear how to be anything else. There's a way in which it wasn't you who did me any good, sir, because it is only God who can take the evil spirit out of a man and put in a new one—just as it's only God who can make the right medicine do good to a sick man. But the doctor that prescribed the physic, and the nurse that takes the sick man to the doctor are all in it, and they all deserve gratitude and love."

"And you really are a different man to what you used to be?" George observed, rather dreamily.

"God be praised I am, sir," Murray answered devoutly; "and I may say it, for it's not to my own glory, and its best sign is that while I used not to think myself a sinner but just what was quite natural and like everybody else, now I know both what I was and what I am still, sir."

"And you are happy and doing well?" George asked.

"Yes, I married a good little woman, and we've got a pretty baby, and I'm head man in Dash and Blank's printing-office in Leeds, so we get along very fairly in our small way. Of course, it's very different to yours nowadays, sir. But if ever you're passing a night in Leeds, you must put up with us. The bedroom is nice and comfortable, and we can sleep on the parlour-sofa as easy as anything. It would be a real treat to do it to accommodate you, sir, and we'll be hurt if you don't prove it. I'd be glad to take you into my Sunday-school class, and say to them, 'Here's the gentleman you've often heard about, that's been my best earthly friend.'"

"Have you ever met any doubters—religious doubters?" George asked, with a strong effort to appear unconcerned.

"Dear, yes, sir, lots. Some of all kinds. Some that couldn't believe, and some that wouldn't; but the first sort mostly come round at last. I've met people that didn't think there was a God, and people that didn't think He troubled himself with anything except the earth and the stars—folks who couldn't get further into the Bible than the first chapter of Genesis. I've seen people that don't think we want a Saviour. I can't say I've ever been troubled with doubts myself. You see it was only likely that most of the Jews in Jerusalem should be exercised in their minds as to whether Jesus was the promised Messiah or not, but I don't suppose the widow of Nain, or Jairus, or the man born blind, had many doubts about it. They knew. So do I."

George Harvey looked earnestly at his companion. The man seated at Christ's feet, clothed and in his right mind, could not have been more unlike the raging lunatic among the tombs than was this decent, cheery, kindly artisan unlike the profligate, artful, reckless lad of fifteen years ago. One might as well assert that a barren field had become a fruitful garden, by some force of its own, as that such a change had been wrought without any exterior power. George knew by experience that "nature" in itself has elements of decay, but not of restoration.

He took James Murray home with him, and the simple-hearted man amused them all with the history of his old admiration for Mrs. Harvey, and his feeling that he should like to speak to her if he had a decent coat.

"I never thought to be sitting supping with you," he said. "That would have seemed too good. But God gives us a deal more than we ask Him for. Did it ever strike you, Mr. Harvey, that we should be awful poor creatures, in soul and body, if He gave us nothing more than our prayers?"

George sat in his room till late that night. His soul felt like one who has just come out of a fever, weak and faint, not fit for strong meat, and feebly grateful to resign itself to a narrow bound, and a shaded light, but yet thankful to know that its ghastly horrors are over with its delirium, and that it is still safe in a breezy world, where God's sun is shining. And into his silent heart it seemed to him that Jesus came and stood in the midst, and said, "Peace be unto you. Reach hither thy finger, and behold my hands: and reach hither thy hand and thrust it into my side: and be not faithless, but believing."

And, on his knees, George answered and said unto him—

"My Lord and my God!"

Next Sabbath he took a class in a water-side ragged-school.

PRAYER.

"WHY wilt thou pray?—why storm with cries
His car who rides the thundering skies
And passes scaithful by?
His laws stand firm: He may not hear;
Thy life, thy death in his career
Are but as steps: He will not hear,
Though loud thou lift thy cry."

Belike, belike: yet the soft tear,
Fresh dropt upon the senseless bier,
Hath virtue, nor that small:
The sod why dost thou strew with flowers?
The dead man walks not in thy bowers,
He will not rise to sorrow's showers,
Nor feel when wreaths do fall;

And yet thou weep'st—much more may thou
Pay to the living God thy vow,
Nor fruitless pour the prayer.
Deft Logic is but Reason's tool,
Reason a child in Nature's school,
We may nor joy, nor grieve by rule,
Nor syllogize a prayer.

JOHN STUART BLACKIE.

IS THERE A CENTRAL HEAVEN?

THERE are questions of deep interest connected with the thought of the relation which our planet, which is our present home, bears to that brighter and more perfect dwelling-place to which all Christians look as their final rest, termed popularly as well as scripturally—heaven. Assuming the fact that there is such a place or locality as heaven, adapted for material beings, and therefore necessarily material itself, the question recurs again and again to the thoughtful mind—what is it? and where is it? Our Lord, as the Scripture tells us, and as we repeat in our Christian creeds, has “ascended into heaven,” not as a spirit (which, as He himself declares, “hath not flesh and bones” as He had), but as a man with a body, though not in every particular the same as ours, yet in many points identical, and certainly material, as he distinctly proved to Thomas. Whither then has He gone? to what material world or distant part of his dominions has He departed? Is it to some vast orb so far removed from our little dusky globe in the dark blue depths of space, that as we think of its distance, and endeavour to realise it to our imagination, we feel almost hopelessly separated from it, like mariners in a solitary ship in mid-ocean, or a boat’s crew cast away on a desert island cut off from all companionship but its own? Or, on the other hand, have we reason to think that there is at the present hour, as there always has been, such a real connection both physically (i.e. astronomically) as well as morally and spiritually between the two worlds, between this island-world called the earth and the distant mainland or continent of heaven—the home of God and his holy angels, as well as the “perfected just,” that space alone divides us physically and literally, while but the slender plank of death separates us from it individually; and that, as over that dark bridge each moment souls are spanning the gulf, they are admitted at once to its golden light and unfading glory? These are questions which, though science may throw some partial light upon them, Revelation alone can fully answer, and which it is admitted by all who believe the Bible are answered by that wonderful book in the affirmative, fully, though not perhaps as fully as our curiosity may desire, and satisfactorily at least so far as it is necessary or possible for us with our present faculties to apprehend such a subject.

Among the sciences, astronomy, however, is the only one that can throw even a glimpse of light upon it other than the Scriptures afford; and though its testimony is indirect and necessarily imperfect, yet it is of considerable value and interest as far as it goes, serving to impart a reality to the statements of Scripture, and thus assist in confirming its truth.

That there is, then, a physical or material connection between our planet and other worlds, though so distant as to be out of our sight altogether, is the first inductive step in the testimony which astronomy affords and suggests as to the inferential existence of a material heaven.

Astronomically viewed, we perceive at once, the earth is no solitary island-world, no strange sail in the great sea of space, no mere isolated globe. Belonging herself to the sun, she is only one out of a number of a family resembling herself that are warmed by the same vast hearth-fire, and, circulating round him, are likewise carried forward with him in his more gigantic, and as yet unmeasured, orbit.

But, our solar system, as it is termed, with its family of worlds, occupying as it does a circle of at least six thousand millions of miles in diameter, dwindles to a mere point in the universe of starry space; and, amidst the millions of bright suns, and clusters of suns, with their attendant worlds, that encompass and surround us here, we find ourselves to be but a microscopic unit, small as a grain of sand in the archipelago of similar bodies, that belong to our own astral system, or nebula, as it is termed, bounded as it is by the Milky Way.

Vast, then, and inconceivable as are the distances from us, as from each other, of these innumerable suns and systems that burn and roll around us here, and without leaving the boundary of our own star system, we can at once perceive the physical relation which our planet bears to every other member of the same system, about the centre of which, or nearly so, our sun has been placed by astronomers as its normal position.

Thus viewed, it may be affirmed, everything connected with our globe bears an astronomical relation to others under analogous conditions—its size, its place, its path in the heavens, its relative distance from its own primary or sun, as well as from other suns or planets; its rate of travelling, as also other circumstances connected with the wondrous arrangements of our globe; its diurnal or daily, as well as its orbital or annual, motion—everything has been determined, designed, and adjusted, with a view to others, and accordingly with a precision so admirable, and so plainly perceptible, that we know were any one of the conditions under which the earth, or any other planet or sun, exists, now absent or altered, chaos and confusion would ensue instead of the order and beauty maintained in the system, and catastrophes the most tremendous to contemplate would involve the universe of stars to which we belong in utter ruin.

But not only does astronomy thus inform us of our relative physical connection with the more immediate members of our solar system as a unit belonging to it, or even to the more distant suns that we see sparkling around us, and which are within reach of human sight, either unassisted or through the medium of the telescope, but also permits us to infer the mysterious connection of our world with a far more distant part of the universe quite out of our sight in fact, and beyond even the reach of the telescope. This great fact has been thus brought to light. It has been ascertained beyond question that the sun, as we have already remarked, is moving onwards in a supposed arc or orbit of vast dimensions, carrying necessarily also his satellite worlds with him on his journey; and the problem has been started for astronomical investigation, Whereabouts does the centre of this great circle lie?—i.e. in what direction are we to look for it? Given the arc or segment of a circle, and provided we have likewise its plane, a simple calculation will tell us where to look for the centre? As, however, little more than the direction towards which our sun or solar system is travelling can be approximated to, and the angle of motion or the curvature of the line in which it is travelling can be as yet little more than suggested (the orbit being so vast as to appear to us almost a straight line), while the plane of the supposed orbit is even still more difficult to ascertain, but little that is positive can as yet be affirmed about it. And the proposition of finding the exact direction in which to look for the centre of the sun's vast orbit is no easy task, and can scarcely be considered as yet fully accomplished. Different positions in the heavens have, however, been assigned for it, and pointed out by different astronomers as the probable position of the central sun or mass of matter round which our great orb and his companion worlds are circulating. Among the eminent astronomers who have undertaken the difficult problem, Maedler perhaps stands the first. He entered upon this calculation some fifteen years ago, with indefatigable energy and industry, and at length boldly pointed to the star Alcyone (the principal of the group of the Pleiades in the constellation Taurus), as the probable actual central mass round which he moved. Maedler's theory, however, notwithstanding the credit which justly attaches to him for the magnificent conception implied in it, as well as the incalculable labour attending such a work, has not been altogether confirmed by other astronomers, some of whom assign a somewhat different direction of movement and plane, and consequently different direction wherein to look for the centre. But here it must be remembered that, after all, little more than the mere direction of the central mass could with the imperfect data possessed be pointed out. The vast length of radius or distance which lay between the sun and its centre could never be approximated without far more perfect data than we possess, or are likely ever to possess. The fixing, therefore, by Maedler, on one particular star as that distant central point or mass has not been confirmed, notwithstanding other testimony seemingly corroborative of this theory which he has adduced from the "proper motion" of the other stars in the group to which Alcyone belongs. There is no limit, indeed, to what might be the length of that invisible radius or chord of gravity which binds our primary and his family of worlds to the distant centre round which he is travelling. Supposing the direction of that centre to be as Maedler has described, and to lie towards Alcyone, yet Alcyone, distant as it is from our sun, might be but the first step or round in the celestial ladder—the first inch in the celestial mileage—the first huge mile in the celestial millions or billions of such measurements, by which infinite space is portioned, while inconceivably beyond all may still lie the outskirts or suburbs of the central mass of glory of the celestial city or world to which we are bound fast. What the power of gravity may be, or how far it may extend its influence in space, is only to be limited by its size and density; and measuring it according to the Newtonian law, and having infinity to deal with, there is no limit that we can assign to its distance any more than to its magnitude. If the magnitude and density of the body be sufficient, enough power of gravity may be put forth to hold not our solar system only in its grasp, but innumerable suns and systems. One thing is certain—the magnitude of the centre which, while out of the sight of the human eye, even when armed with the most powerful telescope, still continues to hold our own sun and his family of worlds fast by its invisible chain, must be something vast and inconceivable by us.

Thus then—though the precise direction and the distance of our sun from his invisible centre is still unknown, there is little doubt of the existence of such a centre. This granted, then the physical connection of the earth is established by the same argument that connects the planet with its primary:

whatever distant point the sun may be attached to, the earth is likewise attached to that point; just as our satellite, the moon, is doubly connected with the earth and sun, so are we with the sun and the central mass to which he belongs.

One thing, then, appears evident here, which astronomy unfolds to us. We are not as a severed link in the great world of creation, we are not a mere isolated globe of matter floating, as a ship and her crew, hopelessly and helplessly in a boundless sea of space unconnected with other lands. We belong to, and are actually attached, as by an iron chain, to some other world in a distant part of the universe, far beyond our own sun, and which unglorified mortal eye has not yet seen; but the chain is there nevertheless, as well as the country it belongs to, and the existence of both are as much a matter of fact as the existence of America and the Atlantic cable, though both are alike invisible to us here. That wondrous wire connects the Old and the New World so as to enable the inhabitants of earth, though invisible to each other, to converse in words of lightning. The Newtonian chain of gravity in like manner connects the heavenly with the earthly; how far, notwithstanding the vast distance, a conversation and intercourse is possible to be carried on between the two countries, past experience has shown: how far, and in what manner it may be, and is still maintained, and how long it shall continue, are questions for further consideration. In the meantime something has been done by astronomy, if it has only suggested the magnificent and cheering thought, that we are not only connected relatively with the millions of suns and systems that we behold around us, but positively and physically with some vast centre out of sight, and to which all worlds and systems alike belong and render homage. What, if this should be the heaven of heavens, the very throne and habitation of God, the highest and best of all worlds, the present abode of the Man Christ Jesus, and round which, turning as on a mighty pivot, the universe of creation and its gigantic frame-work rolls its starry face successively towards its Creator, is there anything irrational in such a supposition? On the contrary, are there not many reasons derived from other sources for thinking it in the highest degree probable? It must be allowed, however, whatever may be thought of it, that astronomy, without positively asserting it, suggests here a grand and sublime idea. But here science bids us farewell—having conducted us thus in imagination, as it were, to the very portals of the unknown regions—the celestial city above—she modestly retires, leaving us, however, not in the dark, but in the hands and under the guidance of another and “more sure and powerful” witness—and that is, the inspired volume of the Scriptures. That assures us not only of the reality and certainty of the existence of such a place as heaven, though it tells not its celestial longitude or latitude, but of the actual physical, moral, and in- telligent connection between the two worlds—heaven and earth—established, not by gravity, but by actual intercourse of the inhabitants—by the communication which has subsisted between the two worlds, through the medium of intelligent Beings (who have visited us) of a race far superior to man, and who have passed and repassed from one world to the other, crossing the vast gulf of space that lies between with far more ease than we can now, with all the aids of science we possess, pass from one country or city on our own globe to another,—their flight resembling, indeed, in its speed more the flashing of the electric spark along the wire, that now sounds and spans the solitary depths of our Atlantic, than any mortal flight, but thus establishing beyond all question the intimate relation of this terrestrial ball and kingdom of earth with another and a grander and a brighter world and kingdom. But here we pass from the testimony of science to the domain of ancient and inspired history.

OUR DISTRICT.

By A RIVER-SIDE VISITOR.

III.—BIBLE BRAIDY.

WE had not been very long in our district before we began to hear in various incidental ways of Bible Braidy, and to gather that he was an institution in the neighbourhood. In the language of the district—a very slangy language—he was a “proper old bloke;” as good an old sort as ever stepped, and as “mum as a mute” in respect to criminal secrets entrusted to him under confessional-like circumstances. Further we were told that he was “no end of a scolar,” and could “talk like a book about almost anything; while as to reading the Bible—” and a snap of the finger, or shrug of the shoulders, generally intimated that the rest upon that point was a thing to be imagined, not described.

“Why, bless you, sir!” exclaimed the only person who went into anything like details upon the subject—a gentleman who in his day had undergone sundry terms of imprisonment,—“why, bless you, sir!” exclaimed this worthy, with a real enthusiasm, “the regular patterers as is paid for it, and as comes messing about when they ain’t wanted, ain’t a patch on old Bible, who wouldn’t take a penny for it though he’s as poor as a church mouse, as the sayen is. And as to doing good, why, there ain’t one of the regular hands fit to be mentioned in the same week with him. Not as I go for to say that the regulars, as I call 'em, don't want to do good, or for to deny that they sometimes do do a good turn, or that they are plucky going where fevers are and the like. All the same, there ain't any one of 'em as you can name as comes within a long chalk of old Braidy, in doing good—in the Bible way I mean, you know. And cos why? Why, cos he's got our measure. He knows us. He don't come potterin' about when he ain't wanted; but when he is wanted he's always up to time. Early or late, fair weather or foul, send for him, and there he is, and no questions asked. No matter who the man may be; if he was the worst fellow as ever died in his shoes, he'd read to him, and pray for him, and stick to him. There's many a poor 'cross' cove about here, sir, I can tell you, as has died happy, but as would have died hard, awful hard, sir—I mean in the way of being troubled in their minds—if Bible Braidy hadn't been with them at the last. Strike me!" exclaimed our friend in conclusion, "if old Bible shouldn't be the head of all the parsons if I had the making of them! If things was managed as they ought to be, the old man would be a lot better off than he is—a bishop, or a school-master with a big screw, or something of that sort."

"Seeing that he can do so much good in it, Mr. Braidy would perhaps rather remain in his present position," we observed.

"Well, I was only saying what I would do for him, if I had my way," rejoined our friend. "As far as he's concerned, I dare say, he would rather be where he is than in a better sort of place, and, as you say, on account of the good he can do. I'll back him to be as square an old party as any breathing bar none; so that it's only from choice that he needs to live in a cross quarter, and, above all, in such a h—ll-hole as Barker's Buildings, for that's about what it is, though I live in it."

What we heard of Bible Braidy made us anxious to form acquaintance with him, and at length an opportunity occurred of doing so under circumstances so impressive and so characteristic of the spot in which Braidy lived and the good work done by him in it, that we will venture to relate them.

One day we had occasion to call upon an odd-job labourer. On reaching his place of abode, we were informed by his landlady that he was house-bound, by reason of an injury to his foot, and that if we wanted to see him we must go up to his apartment. We accordingly ascended to the third-floor back room, which served him and his wife and three children as living, eating, and sleeping room. There were only two chairs in the room. He was seated on one of them, while his bandaged foot rested upon the other; so we took our seat upon the end of the bed, which stood across the window of the room. When, in answer to our inquiry, we had heard the story of the accident to the foot, and had said that which we had come to say, we chanced to glance out at the window, and beheld a scene that would certainly have been strange and striking to eyes that, unlike our own, had not become familiar with such districts as that in which we were. We could see right down a narrow street, which a single glance was sufficient to show was a "hot" quarter—a quarter given up to the worst descriptions of the habitual criminal classes. The houses were lean-to and dilapidated to an alarming extent. Broken, rag-stuffed, curtainless windows were in the ascendant; numbers of the street-doors had pannels stove in, and in two or three instances the doors were gone altogether.

It was a warm summer's afternoon, and crowds of dirty, ill-cared-for children, most of them nearly and some of them wholly naked, were playing about in the refuse-littered gutters and roadway. On the shady side of the street numbers of fearsome-looking men, with foreheads villanous low, were seated upon window sills, or stretched at full length upon the pavement, while frowsy, slatternly-looking women stood in groups around doorways or kept up loud-voiced conversation from opposite windows. Beer cans were circulating freely, and this was especially the case with a band of choice spirits seated on a bench outside a public-house just under the window, out of which we were looking. The whole scene was such an one as Dante might have imagined, and as we could not hope by mere words to give our readers a full realisation of its horrors—even if it were desirable that we should do so—we have simply given its leading outlines. It was a picture of most pandemonium-like aspect. The air that rose from the street was fetid, and such scraps of language as distinctly reached the ear were tainted by foul ideas, and harsh with strange oaths. After a moment's mental comparison of localities, we knew that we were looking upon the blackest spot of our whole district—that Barker's Buildings which was but too characteristically described by the fiercely condemnatory epithet applied to it by the predatory gentleman who had spoken so enthusiastically of Bible Braidy.

"This must be Barker's Buildings, then," we said, turning from the window.

"Which it are, sir, and no mistake," answered the tenant of the room. "It isn't often you'd find two such spots as that, even in such neighbourhoods as this. One of 'em's one too many, for if you'll excuse me saying so, sir, if ever there was a devil's own quarter, Barker's Buildings is it. We're most of us a rough lot hereabout, and a good many ain't particular to a trifle how they knock out a living. We don't draw things very fine, but all of us out of it are quite agreed that Barker's Buildings are something awful. You ask any of the police whether any of them would venture into it single-handed. It would be about as much as their life was worth if they did. There ain't a worse lot out than the Buildings' gang. They say themselves that they are good for anything from pitch and toss to manslaughter, and from robbing a church to killing a man; and, there's no mistake about it, they are. There's some of them that actually are laid by the heels at this very present time for stripping a church roof of lead."

At this point there arose a great hubbub in the street, and looking out of the window, to which the labourer also limped, we saw that the carousal of the band of worthies outside the public-house had been rudely broken in upon. A stalwart woman was brandishing her clenched fist in the face of one of the men. In her excitement she had pulled the fastenings from her hair, which floated about her in grim disorder. Her face was heavily flushed, her eyes flashing, and her voice, trembling with passion, rose loud and harsh—

"Sugar-Bag is in for it now," said the labourer at our elbow.

"Sugar-Bag!" we echoed.

"Sugar-Bag is her nickname," he explained; "she works at the sugar-bag making, and is one of the very few of the Buildings lot as does do anything in a honest way. She's very quiet and inoffensive as a general thing, but her husband was sentenced to two years for a wharf-robbery, and she thinks, and as far as that goes, so do others, that it was through 'Fly' Palmer there he was taken; but she had better leave him alone."

The woman did not leave him alone. For a moment she seemed cowed by his manner, but only for a moment. Merely stepping back just so far as to be out of the reach of his arm, she began to rail again. Amid a volley of abuse she repeated her accusation of his having "rounded" on her Bill, and insinuated that she knew what would send him to the gallows.

This insinuation seemed to sting "Fly" Palmer, for the last words had scarcely left her lips before he was on his feet again. This time he followed her up as she retreated. She became terrified, and turned and ran. Still he followed, and she had got but a short distance down the street, when he overtook her, and hit her such a heavy blow on the head that she fell, stunned. For a few seconds the fallen woman lay; then she rose hastily to her feet. She stood looking round her in a dazed kind of way for a moment, with her right hand pressed to her side; then with a passionate rapidity she swept back the hair from her face, and dashing forward, struck Palmer on the breast. A loud shivering cry, half sob, half groan, burst from his lips, and the next instant he sank to his knees, and, after swaying twice to and fro, fell helplessly forward with his face to the ground. The whole street was instantly in an uproar. Some men came forward and gently raised him in their arms, and, as they turned his face upwards, we could see that it was drawn with pain and ghastly pale.

"This is horrible!" we exclaimed, impulsively rising, and putting on our hat; but the labourer, laying a restraining hand upon our shoulder, said in a tone of friendly remonstrance,

"Excuse me bein' so bold, but if I was you, sir, I wouldn't go near; their quarrels are like man and wife's—best settled among themselves. Any one as goes between them is only likely to offend both. Beside, that sort of thing ain't so partic'lar out of the way in the Buildings, as it would be in any decent sort of neighbourhood. The bag-making hands carry a knife for cutting their twine, and having it handy, she's let him have it. It's the way with the women among 'em when their roused. Whatever comes handy they'll use. They often smash a jug or bottle over one another's faces; and as to a clout over the head, why, they think nothing of that. I dare say Mr. Palmer ain't very much hurt, and any way, sir, what could you do if you went round; they're all in an uproar, and would only think you in the way."

This last consideration had already occurred to ourselves, and, yielding to its cogency, we sat down again. In the meantime the wounded man had been carried into the house in which he lived, and a few minutes later a doctor arrived. He soon left, and immediately after, a woman wringing her hands and moaning aloud came hastily out of it and up the street.

"Is he much hurt, Poll?" asked another woman in a tone of sympathy, as she approached the window at which we were placed.

"Done for! done for!" she exclaimed in a voice made shrill by agony. "He says he knows he's going, and the doctor won't contradict him, won't say a word, only shakes his head. But there; I can't stop, I'm going for Bible Braidy. Joe's that troubled in his mind, they can scarcely keep him down in bed, and all his cry is for old Bible."

She rushed off as she finished speaking, but presently came slowly back, and seeing the woman who had spoken to her still standing in the road-way, she thus broke out:

"Oh dear! oh dear! Whatever shall I do! Braidy's out, and face Joe again without him I daren't. Do you know, does any one know, where the old man is?"

And as she asked the question, she turned from side to side with a look of wild appeal in her eyes. Acting upon our impulse this time, before our labourer friend could do anything to prevent it, we leaned from the window, and having attracted the woman's attention, asked, "Is the man really dying?"

"O yes, sir, I'm afraid he is," she sobbed; "and he knows it, and he knows he ain't fit to go, and it's come on him so sudden. He's past the law doing anything to him; so it don't matter who knows it now. He's got a deal to answer for—as much as a man can have, and he's taking on dreadful. He wants some good man to come to him—some one as'll read to him, and say a prayer for him. Will you come, sir?" and she raised her eyes to ours with a beseeching look.

We answered that we would come round at once; and, putting on our hat, we set out with all speed possible.

On getting round to the nearest corner of Barker's Buildings we found the woman waiting for us. She greeted us with an exclamation of thankfulness, and led the way towards the house, which we had nearly reached when we were brought to a standstill by the announcement that old Bible had been found, and was hastening to the spot. Even among the "dangerous" classes there is a feeling of kindness to one another, and it had now been at work. Unbidden and unsolicited, a number of men, on hearing the woman's exclamations of disappointment, had hurried away in different directions in search of Bible Braidy; and one of them now returned in breathless haste to say that he had found him, and that he was "a coming along as fast as ever his game leg would let him."

A look of relief came over the woman's troubled countenance, immediately followed by a look of embarrassment. We understood the meaning of the latter, and hastened to observe, "You had better wait for Mr. Braidy; he will be of greater service than we can hope to be."

"Well, he's used to the ways of such as Joe," she said, and turned her gaze anxiously towards the end of the street by which the messenger had intimated that Braidy would enter it. In a moment or two he came in sight, and impulsively we started forward to meet him. He was a man of middle height, stoutly built, large headed, heavy featured, with cleanly shaven face, and his grizzled iron-grey hair closely cropped. He walked lame with one leg, and on that side leaned heavily upon a walking-stick; and he was attired in a long, loose, rusty-looking coat, dark trousers patched at the knees with some material a shade lighter, and a low-buttoning, double-breasted waistcoat, which freely displayed his blue check shirt, and high, old-fashioned stock. A poor-looking man enough, and, at a distance, a commonplace-looking man; but, face to face with him, a glance was sufficient to show that he was not commonplace. The broad, high forehead, the great brown eyes, soft and liquid as a woman's, but still bright, unwavering, and straight-glancing, eyes to "look the whole world in the face,"—these, and the generally thoughtful, and modestly self-assured expression, gave the beholder assurance of a man with "something in him."

This was the impression instantaneously made upon us as he looked up at us as we confronted him on the pavement of Barker's Buildings. Turning and walking with him, so as not to delay by a moment his mission of grace, we as briefly as possible explained to him how we came to be there, and that we were now going to withdraw.

"No, don't go," he said. "This is no time to bandy compliments; I believe that I will be the fitter instrument here, but you too may be able to say a word in season; and any way, you may take my word for it, that this poor dying sinner would sooner see a man like you at his bedside than any of his companions."

We felt that it was no time to bandy compliment, and simply answered—

"In that case we'll come, then."

The crowd round the door of the house in which "Fly" Palmer was lying silently parted to led Braidy through, and we entered together. The wounded man lay on a wretched bed, one end of which was supported by bricks, the legs having at some time been knocked off. He was lying back, panting after a struggle with the two men who stood one on either side, ready to restrain him should he again "take on wild," while his wife sat at the head of the bed, rocking herself to and fro, with her hands over her face. It was evident at a glance that Palmer was dying. The face was pinched and deadly pale; around the mouth it was already growing livid and clammy, and the rattle could be distinguished mingling with his laboured breathing. Gradually the breathing grew calmer, and he sank into a dozing state; but the troubled spirit would not be at rest. "Don't be a fool," he muttered; "pawning's a risky game—awkward questions asked, stuff stuck to, and all that. Sell to the regular melters," he muttered on, after a pause; "their price is small, but they're safe, and safety's a thing we must pay for."

He was silent for a brief space, and then with a shudder and start he awoke, and the woman eagerly seized the opportunity to say, "Here's old Bible and another good gentleman come now, Joe."

"Thank God for that!" he murmured earnestly, giving a quick glance round him. As his eye rested upon us he muttered some expression of thanks, then, turning to Braidy, he motioned him to his bedside; and, obeying the signal, the old man advanced, and kneeling by the bed allowed Palmer to take his hand in both his.

After lying still for a few seconds to gain breath, Palmer, slightly raising himself on his elbow, exclaimed, "O Bible, old man, I'm thankful you've come. I was beginning to think that I should be left to die without any one to say a good word for me, and I ain't fit to say one for myself; I've been trying to pray and I can't."

"Oh, Braidy!" he went on, looking into the other's face with a haggard anxiety painful to behold, "it's domino with me; I knew it was as soon as I was hit. I shall go out with the tide, and it'll ebb in an hour. Is there any hope for me, Braidy?—any at all?"

"You're in the hands of God, Palmer," he answered, softly and solemnly, "and He is a merciful, a loving God, a God whose greatest desire and happiness is to forgive even the worst sinners, if they will ask him; to save them if they will only let him."

"Then there is hope?" he said, questioningly, as he sank back on the bed.

"Yes, there is hope and salvation for all who repent and believe," answered Braidy, in the same solemn tone; "who repent of their sins, and believe that—" and briefly, but clearly, kindly, and in language suitable to the understanding of the dying man, he explained the essentials of Christian belief. "Believe in this all merciful God," he concluded, "and seek his mercy through the Son, who He gave to suffer for our, for your transgressions. Do this and there is hope for you. The promise of the Lord is that, though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow, and Christ himself has told us that there is joy in heaven over one sinner that repents."

From sheer weakness, Palmer had closed his eyes, while Braidy was speaking; but, watching the expression of his face from where we stood, we could see that it grew calmer, that hope was dawning upon his sorely troubled spirit. Still there were signs of doubt and terror, and presently, when there had been silence for about a minute's space, he suddenly raised himself in the bed again, and, gazing into Braidy's countenance with the painfully beseeching look already spoken of, broke out—

"But I've been such a bad lot, Bible—such an awful bad lot, I'm afraid there can't be any hope for me. Don't go for to deceive me now, Braidy; is there really any chance for me?"

"The mercy and goodness of the Lord is boundless, Joe," answered the old man gravely, "none can be bad enough to be beyond his forgiveness, if they only sincerely believe and repent; therefore there is hope for you. You heard" (Braidy had already partly told him, partly read to him the story of the crucifixion), "when the dying thief on the cross prayed our Saviour to remember him when he came into his kingdom, Jesus answered him, 'To-day shalt thou be with me in Paradise.' And that is the answer which, in his holy Word, the blessed Bible, God gives to all who sincerely pray to be taken into his kingdom. 'Knock,' he says, 'and it shall be opened;' and it is by prayer, Joe, that you must knock at the gates of the kingdom of heaven. Pray!"

"But I can't pray!" the other exclaimed in a voice of agonized despair. "I told you I tried and I couldn't. I had a notion I used to know 'Our Father' when I was a kid, but I couldn't think of a word of it; will you say it for me?"

Reverently bowing his head and clasping his hands, Braidy, in a low fervent tone, repeated the Lord's Prayer; Palmer lying back with closed eyes, occasionally repeating the words after him.

After the prayer there was again a brief silence, which was broken by Palmer's speaking as if in continuation of thought, and in a voice that had grown palpably weaker, he said—

"Oh yes, I see! Forgive them that trespass against us. Braidy, I do forgive poor Sugar-Bags from the bottom of my heart, and I 'ope as they wont do anything to her for this business."

"I'll tell her what you say," Braidy answered, and then Palmer, who was evidently sinking, fell back once more too exhausted for further speech. Braidy, who all this time had been kneeling by the bedside, now rose to his feet, and holding in his right hand the well-worn Bible that he had taken out of his pocket, stood beside us. Silently we both of us watched the countenance of the dying man, over which there again began to creep the expression of terror and doubt that had rested upon it when we first entered. Gradually it intensified until the agony of mind that it indicated giving what was, under the circumstances, an almost supernatural strength, Palmer once more raised himself on his elbow, and convulsively grasping Braidy by the arm, on his stepping to the bedside again, he hoarsely exclaimed—

"It's no use, Bible; I can't believe that there can be hope for such an out-and-out bad lot as I've been. The Bible only spoke of a thief; but I've been worse." As he spoke a shudder ran through his weakened frame, and for a space his utterance was choked by sobs.

"I can guess what you mean, Joe," said Braidy soothingly; "but even that would not place you beyond hope. As I told you just now, the mercy and goodness and forgiveness of the Lord is boundless. He will forgive even blood-guiltiness where the repentance for it is sincere. To despair is to doubt his mercy. However bad you may have been, there is hope for you in that mercy."

"O Bible, old man, you have taken a load off me," exclaimed Palmer, sobbing again, but now rather joyously than despairingly, "and Braidy," he went on, in a tone of fervent assurance, "though I was never took for it, I have suffered—no tongue could tell how much."

He paused for a moment to gain breath, and then, getting his mouth close to Braidy's ear, he resumed in a hoarse whisper—

"I knifed him, and he turned his eyes on me as he fell, and the look in them has haunted me ever since. Hundreds and hundreds of nights I've seen him glarin' at me out of the dark, till it druv me mad a'most, and I'd have put an end to myself only I hadn't the pluck. But I thank God now that I hadn't. I wouldn't have had this chance then, and I do begin to feel happier, Bible, now that I am getting this off my mind and you still say there is hope."

"There is hope," said Braidy, "but, Joe, my poor fellow, remember the end is near."

"I know, Bible," he answered, his voice now barely audible, "but I must make a clean breast of this now I have began it. He was a sailor, a darkie. We had cleaned him out, and he cut up rough, and talked about bringing the police. That was what did it; we had a lot of stuff in the house at the time as would have transported us if it had been found, and when he tried to break his way out, swearing that he would bring the blues, I let him have it, and he scarcely lived two minutes after he was hit."

As the other sank back exhausted, a shudder shook old Braidy's frame, and for a few moments he stood incapable of speech, but controlling his feelings, he took the dying sinner's hand, and in a gentle voice said—

"It was a foul crime, Joe, but remember, 'though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be white as snow.' There is a place in heaven for all sinners, who seek it by true penitence and prayer—pray, Joe, pray, for the end is very near with you."

"Pray for me, I can't pray," he moaned.

"I will pray for you," answered Braidy; "but you too can pray, the blessed book here has provided a prayer for you—'God be merciful to me a sinner.' That is your prayer, Joe; a prayer that sincerely uttered or thought is never turned a deaf ear to."

With a last effort of strength the dying man clasped his hands together, and fervently uttered the grandly simple prayer thus taught him. He tried to repeat it, but his arms fell helplessly by his side and the words died in his throat. Seeing this, Braidy knelt by the bedside again, and in homely language earnestly prayed that the soul then passing might be saved alive.

When he had finished his prayer, no sound was heard in the room save the half-stifled sobs of Palmer's wife, who with a true affection had up to this point kept mute her grief, in order that it might not distract the attention of the dying man. He seemed to hear her now, for he put out his hand towards her, and she took it in both hers. Braidy held the other, and thus he lay, the faint flicker of life still remaining in him visibly waning. Once or twice he seemed to be bracing himself for some last effort, and at length there came from his lips in a barely audible whisper:—"Braidy, you've helped to save my soul.—Good-bye.—God be mer—" the last word died away uncompleted, and in a few minutes the great change took place.

Thus in the solemn presence of death, by such a death-bed as that of "Fly" Palmer's, we first made the acquaintance of "Bible Braidy." We had seen him engaged in the mission to which for years he had devoted himself, and in which we could now unhesitatingly believe he had done great good. What we had seen made us anxious to cultivate the friendship thus commenced, but it will easily be believed that on passing out of the house of death neither of us felt much disposed to "chat." Scarcely a sentence had passed between us when we reached his own threshold, and there with a warm grasp of the hand we left him, having simply arranged that we were to give him a call in some more cheerful time—and we did give him a call, and as time passed on many calls.

MINISTERIAL SUCCESSION.*

*And Moses stripped Aaron of his garments, and put them upon Eleazar his son: and Aaron died there in the top of the mount: and Moses and Eleazar came down from the mount.—NUM. xx. 28.

IN these calm, almost cold, words is told all that man is to know of an event full of interest, full of mystery, full of awe.

In that year 1452 (as chronologers say) before the Christian era, a life is brought to its close, which, but for one other life beside it, would have been unique in wonder.

That old man who has gone up into Mount Hor, under Divine direction, to die, is God's High Priest; the first of a long line, the only one that God ever consecrated, to stand between Himself and His chosen people, in the things of religion and of the soul, until He should at last come, who is the End of all Revelation and the Antitype of all Priesthood.

His life has been long and eventful. For eighty years, and we know not how many more—for he was the elder of the two illustrious brothers—he had been one of Egypt's bondmen. The tradition of hope, which had cheered the death-bed of Joseph, had become dim and misty, as the weary years rolled over an oppressed and suffering people. At last a call, strong but secret, bids him go forth towards the desert to meet a messenger and a message from God. The bearer of it is a stranger. For forty years an exile; for other forty before them the inmate of a king's court, unknown to and ignorant of his own. Yet he is his brother: and upon those two men is laid a burden such as has no real parallel in history; first the deliverance of a nation from the midst of another nation by terrible signs and judgments, and then the education of the ransomed race into the stewardship of God's oracles of law and promise for the Church and the world of all lands and times.

Brethren! the Bible is all truth, and its very heroes are seen compassed with infirmity. This old man, so illustrious in work and office, has no exemption from the failings and faults and sins of the fallen. The personal records of him are in large part records of this character. There is a mark of inspiration here. I pray you to give heed to it. Aaron is shut out from Canaan for a fault, for a sin. He is to die in this mountain because, in impatience, in irritation, in unbelief, he had been concerned in smiting a rock to which he ought but to have spoken. It was a disobedience. That there was faith even in the disobedience is no excuse for it in the sight of God. Judged as man judges, it was a little sin. It was not the greatest of the sins even of this one life. But with God "great" and "little" have no place in the estimate of transgression. Here, in the sight of Israel, a precise direction had been disregarded: the wonder-working rod had been appealed to, as though the calm commanding word were insufficient: and the sentence, solemn and stern, is pronounced upon both the brothers, the lawgiver and the priest of Israel, "Because ye believed me not, to sanctify me in the eyes of the children of Israel, therefore ye shall not bring this congregation into the land which I have given them."

The lesson of "severity" lies on the surface of the record. Surely we make much too free with the letter of God's commandment. We think nothing of smiting where God has said, Speak. If there be a general good intention—alas, even if there be not—we say to ourselves, perverting the Scripture, God will not be extreme to mark. Breaking the letter, we may yet make up for it from the spirit. Surely these things were our example, and are written here, read this day for the first time as a chosen Lesson in our Churches, for our admonition, upon whom the ends of the world are come.

Yet I think that there are two other lessons here taught us, not equally obvious, yet not less true.

One of these is the lesson of love. See how God chastens without disowning. Did God resign, renounce, the charge of this life, because He must punish? Nay, the Father's voice speaks still concerning it, and the Father's hand still directs. I cannot understand that reading of the Old Testament which sees not in it the God of the Gospel. Easy had it been for God to give up that rebel child, that oft-chastised yet unchastened son. Yet He does not. It is God who corrects yet forsakes not. It is God who says, "Take Aaron, and bring him up into Mount Hor; and he shall die there." It is God who says, later on, concerning the other leader of Israel, "Moses my servant is dead:" my servant still, though he is dead, and though God, dealing in one point more sternly with him, had sent him up into Mount Nebo alone to die there.

The other lesson is the lesson of death.

It is the fashion to say that the language of the Old Testament is cheerless about death. I cannot see it. These deaths—if we might for a moment use the speech of men—these deaths for small sins seem to be eloquent as to the insignificance of death. They seem to say, The life that is seen is but a fragment of the whole life. It may be thou hast forfeited thy place here. God must call thee up into some mountain, or fling thee into some valley of humiliation, that thou mayest die there. Yes, but thou art His still—and when He has humbled thee and crushed thee here, it is but that He may make thee shine before Him as the stars for ever.

So then, under God's direction—forget not that—the aged High-Priest must go up into that mountain-top—go, as a condemned man; go, to pay the debt not of original but of personal sin; go, and die there. His brother shall go with him: he has another year of life: he has been the direct voice of God to the other all these years—he shall be so unto the end. And his son shall go with him: he is to be his successor: he is to take from this scene the impress of life's charge and of life's end: already he has seen two brothers slain as in a moment for offering strange fire—now he must see a father die, die for a sin, and yet die cared for, die forgiven, loved, immortal. These are God's lessons for him—surely they are engraven upon his heart for ever! And all Israel is looking on: sees the High-Priest, in his garments of full state, those garments for glory and beauty for which every minutest direction had been issued from Sinai, as proving the typical use and meaning; sees him rise step by step up the mountain side, and knows wherefore he is gone. How must some hearts have smitten themselves in that great concourse; hearts which knew themselves the cause of this chastisement, of this bitter yet most patiently-borne privation! God keep us all from the sight of that death-bed which our hands, our sins, have made—or to which we have added that sting, which is sin!

Nothing is more pathetic in Holy Scripture than that selflessness which God requires in His servants; that absorption of natural feeling in the one higher, which is the perfection of the self-control and the self-forgetfulness. Aaron himself had been enabled to rise to it, when he saw his two sons cut off before him, forbidden to mourn, forbidden to bury them. I know nothing more keenly wounding to hearts that can feel, than that apology of Aaron, in the day of his bereavement, for some omission of which he and his surviving sons had been guilty in the precise rules of the sanctuary. He had held his peace in the morning; he had let more distant relatives perform the father's office of burying: the deep anguish only betrays itself in that one brief clause in which he appeals to his brother's pity about the neglected sin-offering, "And such things have befallen me!"

And now it is the turn of that brother to take his part in bearing the burden which God's ministry lays upon them that are privileged to exercise it. Now he must strip his dying brother of the beautiful and costly vestments of his priesthood. He must array in them a new Priest, who is to carry on God's work before a younger generation. And when the sad and solemn office is ended, he must turn back, with that other, to the thoughts and acts of the living, till he also shall have finished his course, and be ready to rejoin his brother in the Paradise of the just made perfect.

Yes, made perfect. Made perfect, through much discipline and much correction; by many a fall and many a rising; it may be, by an embittered life; it may be, by a premature death: perfect, not in the spotlessness of a sinless innocence, but in the robes made white, and the heart eschewing its own wickedness.

Such, brethren, is life—as the Word of God interprets it.

The garments of ministry, secular, sacred, personal, are stripped from one and put upon another. We wear them but for a lifetime. They were another's before us: they shall be another's afterward. There is a succession in these things: we do well to recognize and to give heed to it.

There are some forms of ministration which suggest succession. Those garments which are emblematical of office—the judge's ermine, worn only on the judgment-seat; the bishop's lawn, put on with prayer and benediction, in midst of the ceremony of his consecration—speak for themselves as to the disrobing. The wearer had a predecessor, shall have a successor, in that ministry. He is but the life-holder: less than the life-holder; for decay of strength, decline of vigour, may further abridge the tenure of that charge, towards God and man, which the vestment of office typifies. There must be that stripping of which the text speaks; that putting off that another may put on. Let him live in the foreview of that day! God makes not our differences between the sacredness of two ministries. Moses the judge ranks in Scripture above, not below, Aaron the priest. Would to God that there were that heart in us, to feel the sanctity of all office, the Divine source and right of all power! never to say, This office is secular, and a worldly spirit will suffice for it—and that office is sacred, and to the holder of it I will transfer every demand of disinterestedness and high principle and a good conscience! Would that we might follow the example, lately before us, of a distinguished judge, living to a late old age with eye undimmed and natural force unabated, of whom it is told that the Bible was the companion of his circuits, and Sunday his day of days, holy indeed to the Lord and honourable—because he felt himself to be the steward of a high trust, and determined to render his account of it with joy and not with grief!

Brethren, we are all God's ministers, and to feel it is to consecrate life. No profession, assuredly, exercises a more God-like office than that which undertakes to execute justice between man and man, and even to bear the sword, not in vain, against the soul that doeth evil. That profession binds itself to be religious. It declares itself to be on God's side in this warring, battling world: woe to it if it makes its familiarity with evil an excuse for forgetting the soul and the judgment!

We hold but for a few short years these ministries, these priesthoods, of duty and service. Soon we pass, and others succeed us. Soon will another voice be in the ears of another generation, and he who now speaks to you from this place the words of life will be silent, will be forgotten, for ever. None the less is the responsibility great for him and for you. These garments of office, sacred or secular, descend, not mechanically, but with an inheritance of influence, to the successor. Each one of us, charged with any trust, may make it, must make it, easier, or more difficult, for the next holder, to serve God in it, or to forget Him. We all know how the expectation, the demand, the requirement, of goodness, tends to foster and to create it; how impossible at last it becomes for any but a good man to undertake a particular office, which once perhaps involved no such necessity—but it pleased God to breathe into one man a new spirit, and the very place which he filled on earth became sanctified beyond desecration. So might it be with every office in the State and in the Church. It is the greatest crime that can be committed, to debase, to demoralize one. It is the highest Christian ambition to carry religion, which is the love of God, into one new department of earth's living activity.

Might it be so, that, in this one Church, of peculiar, of exceptional, of unique responsibility, there might be, Sunday by Sunday, the stirring of one new life, one new devotion! With what strength might God's work be done in England, if but a few of us His worshippers were impregnated with the sense of our responsibility! if we indeed felt ourselves to be His ministers, whatever the name or the nature of our calling! if we deeply pondered with ourselves day by day the hour of the unclipping and clipping upon—the work for which we must give account, and the eternity which shall be according to the things done in the body!

Behold in one view the littleness and the greatness of man.

The littleness in space and time. One generation goeth, and another cometh. Earth is a speck, and time a moment. If we would write our celebrity on earth, we write it in sand, we write it in water. Old age, failure, contempt, obliterate as we indite.

But, view life as a trust—view office, view work, view character, view being, as a priesthood—and all is ennobled, all consecrated.

Say to yourself, I am God's priest—I wear His ephod and His crown, and the inscription on that crown is, "Holiness unto the Lord"—then you are great; great above kings, who know not a hereafter; great above hierarchies which would shine in God's stead: your light is God's light, and the world shall be the brighter for it.

But, perhaps, brethren, you say to me, Mine is no priesthood. Mine is a very common lot on a very common earth. I see no sacrifice that I can offer. I am dust and ashes. You stir in me a sort of hope, but it has no reality and no substance. Tell me what you mean. I am a very common man, and I understand not what is that higher thing to which you call me.

God grant that this be the question, this morning, of many hearts! For, indeed, it is the question which is rare, not the answer which is difficult.

Yes, you are a priest. Take to you the holy garments—for you are God's priest. St. Peter says so, the Apostle to the Hebrews says so, in words. It matters not how poor you are, or how ignorant, or how lowly: if you are a Christian, you are a priest. You may go forth to-morrow to keep an office, or to sweep a street—and you have a priesthood, if you are a Christian. A priesthood that is yours but for a while: it must pass into other hands, and you must die. Still the world may be the better for you. The next occupant of your house or of your place may be a better man because you existed. You may raise expectations which he must satisfy. You may kindle an altar, which he, for decency's sake, must keep burning.

Succession is a beautiful thought. Moses stripped Aaron of his priestly garments—it was to put them upon Eleazar. Wash your robes, and make them white in the blood of the Lamb—and another must wear them. This is a succession, not of man, but of God. The very stones cry out, if your successor shall hold his peace.

Brethren, I would not deceive you with vain hopes. There is a condition. You are a priest if you are a Christian. Without this you cannot be. Come to Christ; wrap yourself in His robe, wash yourself in the water, touch yourself with the blood of His purifying, His propitiation—and you are a priest. But dispense with Him—try to offer your own sacrifice, try to wear your own robe of office—and you are none. The fire of your altar will sputter with a false flame: look round, and it is gone out.

Come to Christ, yourself, first of all. See yourself vile; see yourself helpless. Say to Him, Be my Righteousness—be my Strength. None that trusted in Him were ever confounded. None that lived inside Christ were ever left alone on their death-bed, or condemned in the judgment. Be His witness. Be His priest. Faults, backslidings, sins, sever not, necessarily, from Him. He is very pitiful, and of great mercy. Aaron sinned—Aaron made the idol calf—yet the Intercessor prayed for him, and he was forgiven. Aaron murmured against Moses—Aaron smote the rock to which he should have spoken—Aaron was debarred from the land of promise—Aaron was stripped of the holy garments—yet Aaron was God's priest and God's saint. God presided over the death—God has him in His holy keeping—God will raise him at the last day.

So be it, holy brethren, with you and with me! When we die, may God watch over us, and may the one intransferable priesthood—the priesthood which knows no change, because it holds the very keys of hell and death—spread its robe and its tabernacle over us! In the day of days, may we hear that voice saying, Well done! and may we awake from the dust of death into the joys which are at His right hand for ever!

C. J. VAUGHAN.

FEMALE PREACHING.

THE subject of public preaching by women is one which has frequently created much perplexity, discussion, and division in the Church, both in earlier times and in our own day. It may not be unfitting to devote a short paper to the subject, and in doing so, to look at it as calmly and impartially as possible.

That some, perhaps many, of the Christian women at Corinth were in the habit of addressing public assemblies of the Church at the time when the Apostle wrote to it, is undeniable. The words of 1 Cor. xi. 4, 5, are conclusive upon the point: "Every man praying or prophesying having his head covered, dishonoureth his head. But every woman that prayeth or prophesieth with her head uncovered dishonoureth her head; for that is even all one as if she were shaven." The contrast of the two verses renders it impossible to suppose that the Apostle is here putting a merely supposititious case. Women must have prayed or prophesied as well as men. Of the fact, also, it is clear that these words contain no condemnation; nay, they seem to allow the practice in the case of the one sex not less decidedly than in that of the other. If the Apostle says that a woman, when she prays or prophesies in public, is to avoid doing it in a particular manner, the inference is not an unnatural one that the act itself of doing it is not condemned.

Further, it is at once to be admitted that special instances of public prophesying on the part of women are to be found both in the Old Testament and in the New. In the former, we have those of Miriam, Deborah, and Huldah, three in number only, it is true, in a space of time extending over several thousand years: but still enough to establish the fact, that for by far the most remarkable function of his ancient religious economy the Almighty found women suitable as well as men. In the New Testament, again, we have the four daughters of Philip, "which did prophesy" (Acts xxi. 9).

Once more, ability to address to a public assembly lessons of divine truth, may be possessed by woman as well as man. Sir Thomas Fowell Buxton tells us of "the great and astonishing display of mental powers" exhibited in the ministry of Priscilla Gurney.* It will surprise no one that it should have been so. That most powerful element of all eloquence, the heart, is certainly possessed by the weaker in even a greater degree than by the stronger sex; and the same thing may be said of many of the other qualities that constitute no mean part of the power of a persuasive speaker, vivacity and rapidity of thought, fertility of illustration, expressiveness and play of countenance, sweetness and flexibility of voice. It would be a strange thing to deny, that alike in natural suitability, at least in many particulars, for the task, and in that higher suitability which comes from the full reception of the gifts of grace, woman may not, in very many instances, be as much qualified for the work of public preaching as man.

Are not these considerations, then, enough to settle the question without further argument? They would be, did we not possess express teaching of St. Paul upon the point. We have to turn to it and to try to estimate its force. There are two passages with which we have especially to deal.

The first of these is 1 Cor. xiv. 34, 35. "Let your women keep silence in the churches; for it is not permitted unto them to speak; but they are commanded to be under obedience, as also saith the law. And if they will learn anything, let them ask their husbands at home; for it is a shame for women to speak in the church." Nothing apparently can be clearer than this passage. It is not by incidental allusion, or by inference from words employed by the Apostle when speaking of another subject, that we learn his mind; "Let your women keep silence in the church," "It is a shame," or, rather, "it is uncomely, indecent," "for women to speak in the church." In reply to this, however, attention is called to the word "speak." There is no allusion, it is said, in this word to public preaching. It refers only to ordinary conversation, to the use of words with which the women of Corinth were in the habit of interrupting the service of the assembled Christians, to asking questions,† to what would be more properly expressed by "babbling," or even "wragling." The object of the Apostle, therefore, is not to forbid preaching or prophesying on the part of women, but to condemn foolish, inappropriate, ill-timed talking. There is no foundation whatever for this criticism. The Greek verb translated "speak" in the passage quoted by us, is used again and again in the New Testament of speech in its most sacred forms and most formal utterances. No doubt it refers, when distinguished from another verb translated in the same way, to the act of speaking itself, rather than to the distinct and connected substance of what is spoken. Yet even then, the substance of what is spoken is not lost sight of. It is rather that that substance is viewed mainly as it falls upon the outward ear, whereas in the other case, it is viewed mainly in its power to penetrate the mind.

"And He spake many things unto them in parables." "Therefore speak I to them in parables." "Then spake Jesus to the multitude and to his disciples." "Verily, verily, I say unto thee, we speak that we do know." "For He whom God hath sent speaketh the words of God." "Then spake Jesus again unto them, saying, I am the light of the world." "Howbeit we speak wisdom among them that are perfect, yet not the wisdom of this world, nor of the princes of this world that come to naught. But we speak the wisdom of God in a mystery, even the hidden wisdom which God ordained before the world unto our glory." "If any man speak, let him speak as the oracles of God." "And I turned to see the voice that spake with me." (Matt. xiii. 3, 13; xxiii. 1; John iii. 11, 34; viii. 12; 1 Cor. ii. 6, 7; 1 Peter iv. 11; Rev. i. 12.) In all these instances, to say nothing of very many others, taken almost at random from different books of the New Testament, the verb translated "speak" in the passage we are considering has the same high and solemn meaning. It never in itself suggests the slightest idea of frivolous or empty talk. It is as sacred a word as any that could be used. The attempt, therefore, to fasten upon it a lower meaning entirely fails. Nor can it be said, with any better show of reason, that the connection of 1 Cor. xiv. 35 with the verse immediately preceding, proves that the word is to be understood here at least in the sense of "asking questions" with a view to being instructed and edified. The

* The whole description is so interesting that our readers will do well to doubt welcome its being quoted in a note. "I have listened," he says in one of his letters, "to many eminent preachers, and many speakers also, but I deem her as perfect a speaker as I ever heard. The tone of her voice, her beauty, the singular clearness of her conception, and above all her own strong conviction that she was urging the truth, and the force of the utmost importance—the whole constituted a species of ministry which no one could hear, and which I am persuaded no one ever did hear, without a deep impression."—Life, c. vii.

† The argument thus often used is as old as Barclay in his Apology for the Quakers. "Neither think we," he says, "that of Paul, 1 Cor. xiv. 34, to reprove the inconsiderate and talkative women among the Corinthians, who troubled the Church of Christ with their unprofitable questions, any ways repugnant to this doctrine," viz., that women may preach. The italics are the eminent writer's own.—Apology, Proposition 10.

true connection proves rather the very contrary. The progress of the Apostle's reasoning is from the greater to the less. To his statement that women were not to speak, in the sense of teaching in church, it might perhaps have been replied, "May they not ask questions in order to be themselves instructed by the answer, if they may not speak to instruct others?" The reply is, "No; they may not do even that; 'if they will learn anything, let them ask their own husbands at home.'" The same conclusion may be drawn from the place occupied in the chapter, as a whole, by the injunction to silence with which we are dealing. It can hardly be regarded as the introduction of an entirely new topic. It follows closely on the general subject of prophesying or preaching in open Christian assemblies, and the order of the argument leaves it hardly possible to suppose that we have here anything else but a fresh limitation of that gift of prophesying, which had already been limited in other ways in the verses going immediately before.

The conclusive consideration upon the point, however, is contained in the ground given by St. Paul himself for his injunction. It is that women were not permitted to speak in the churches because they were to be "under obedience," as also the law said; because, even in cases where a genuine desire for instruction would have led them to break silence, "their own husbands at home" were the proper persons for them to appeal to. Nothing can show more clearly what the speaking referred to means. To suppose that it can be "asking questions" is to destroy the whole force and meaning of the passage. That would have been the very best proof that women could give that they felt themselves to be "under obedience," instead of being the contradiction of it. It would have been an illustration of humility and teachableness, not of presumption, or of a desire to step out of their proper sphere. The Apostle evidently felt that the subordination of order in which God had placed the woman to the man, a subordination to which he often alludes, was inconsistent with the former's taking upon her the position of a public teacher. That was a position of authority, of command. It could not be rightly filled unless the duty were discharged with "all authority" (Titus ii. 15); and to appear in public clothing herself with this, and exercising it in reference alike towards her husband and other men, was not woman's part.

The second passage claiming our attention is 1 Tim. ii. 11—15: "Let the woman learn in silence with all subjection. But I suffer not a woman to teach, nor to usurp authority over the man, but to be in silence. For Adam was first formed, then Eve. And Adam was not deceived, but the woman being deceived was in the transgression. Notwithstanding she shall be saved in child-bearing, if they continue in faith, and charity, and holiness with sobriety." The meaning of the precept here is as clear as in the former case; and the contrast between the "teach" of ver. 12 and the "learn" of ver. 11 more especially shows that not one species of teaching alone, which might be designated by the word "teach" used technically, but every species of public instruction, everything opposed to "learning in silence" is prohibited. Again, too, as in the passage in Corinthians, the injunction given is backed by reasons, and there is no want of plainness in the statement of them. The order of creation is first referred to as indicating that a certain order in the relation of the sexes to the work of life should be observed, and that the burden of that work belonged to man. The order of the fall is next noticed, where the great deception of the tempter was practised upon Eve, a proof, the Apostle would seem to say, that the impulsive nature of woman, perhaps even the greater unsuspectingness and more ready receptivity of opinions urged by others that distinguishes her when compared with man, might make her a too easy prey and a too ready exponent of views inconsistent with the truth. Lastly, the true and proper sphere for woman is pointed out. It is the family, the home. We should be disposed to render the words "she shall be saved in child-bearing," "she shall be saved through her child-bearing," that is, with no direct, although there may be a distant and indirect, reference to the birth of Jesus, she shall be saved through the filling aright in faith, and charity, and holiness with sobriety, that sphere of wifehood and motherhood for which she is specially designed. It is there that she is to excel, there that she is to shine, there that she has a task to perform not less important than the task of the public speaker, and rewards to win not less valuable than the rewards that wait upon him when he is successful. At all events that is her sphere. To address promiscuous assemblies in a public manner is to leave it. It is to claim, by the very act of doing so, a right to exercise authority over the man, whereas "the head of the woman is the man," and therefore the Apostle can only say that no form of public teaching is within her province.

Such, then, are the two classical passages in the writings of St. Paul on the point before us, and it seems impossible to entertain any doubt as to their meaning. Even were the injunctions contained in them less clear and decided than they are, the reasons upon which these injunctions are grounded hardly leave room for controversy. No one was more alive than the Apostle to the elevating influence of the gospel upon the female sex, or to the importance of the change it had introduced in the position of women. With all the strength of the deep convictions of his nature, he felt that woman was made by it the true companion and helpmeet of man; that her spiritual relation to God was not less near and intimate than his; that her standing in Christ as a redeemed immortal spirit was as high; that, where Christ has been put on, "there is neither Jew nor Greek, there is neither bond nor free, there is neither male nor female," for all were one in Christ Jesus (Gal. iii. 28). But it is one of the most characteristic parts of the Apostle's teaching, a part nowhere more strikingly illustrated than in the First Epistle to the Corinthians, that he always recognises an order of things the foundations of which are laid in nature and providence, and which Christianity confirms instead of abrogating, elevates and sanctifies instead of destroying. He applied this principle in the case before us. It was his conviction that the spheres of male and female life were different; that man was by nature fitted for public, woman for private, life; and that Christianity could not and did not reverse an order appointed by God Himself, and stamped by Him upon the whole constitution of human things. Believing this to be "nature" in the highest sense of the word, he could not suppose that the Spirit of God would act otherwise than in harmony with it; and had any woman, therefore, pleaded that she had received the gift of public prophesying, he would, by his own gift of "discerning of spirits," have pronounced her mistaken, and would have enjoined her to seek another and a private field within which to serve her Lord. So thoroughly persuaded was he of this, so deeply does the persuasion colour the whole tone of his writings, that it is absolutely necessary to interpret the words of 1 Cor. xi. 5, "every woman that prayeth or prophesieth with her head uncovered dishonoureth her head," in harmony with it. We must suppose that he has here the single point of the wearing of the veil in view; and that, inasmuch as women were actually praying and prophesying with uncovered heads, he hastens to the condemnation of a practice so offensive to his notions of propriety, without taking time, at the moment, to condemn another practice equally objectionable, and reserving his opinion of it till he should have to deal directly with the whole subject of spiritual gifts.

We have said that the language of St. Paul leaves no doubt as to its meaning. It may be well to add that no doubt has ever been entertained with regard to it in the Church. Women were indeed permitted by one of the early heretical sects to preach, to become presbyters, and even bishops, but the Church Catholic always condemned the practice. "As to women," says Bingham,* "whatever gifts they could pretend to, they were never allowed to preach publicly in the church either by the Apostles' rules, or those of succeeding ages." It does not, indeed, seem as if there had been often occasion for the Church to pronounce upon the point, but her voice in later ages has been the same as in the earlier. To take one recent example. The General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church of the United States issued the following deliverance in the year 1832:—"Meetings of pious women by themselves for conversation and prayer, we entirely approve. But let not the inspired prohibitions of the great Apostle, as found in his Epistle to the Corinthians and to Timothy, be violated. To teach and to exhort, or to lead in prayer in public and promiscuous assembly, is clearly forbidden to women in the holy oracles." Nor have the views of that Church changed since then. In the spring of the present year considerable excitement was caused in Brooklyn, New York, by the fact that one of the Presbyterian ministers there had permitted a female preacher, well known both in America and in this country, to appear in his pulpit and to preach. The matter was brought before the presbytery, which, with only one dissenting voice, condemned what had been done; and overtured the General Assembly "to adopt and transmit to the presbyteries such rules as shall forbid the licensing and ordaining of women to the gospel ministry, and the teaching and preaching of women in our pulpits, or in the public and promiscuous meetings of the Christian Church." The overture went up, and the General Assembly at once referred the petitioners to the judgment of the

* "Antiq.," Book xiv. § 5.

General Assembly of 1832, already quoted by us, "which expresses the judgment of this Assembly."

It need hardly be said, in conclusion, that nothing either in the language of St. Paul, or in that of the Church in later times, is to be understood as implying that all the more private labours of Christian faith and love are not as appropriate to woman as to man. To preach or exhort in meetings of her own sex gathered together for mutual edification, to teach in the Sunday-school, the zenana, or the family; these, and such-like labours, are in no respect inconsistent with apostolic precept or Church order. They are in perfect harmony with the former, and they are distinctly encouraged by the latter. In them women may easily find a sufficiently important and, at the same time, a peculiarly appropriate sphere of usefulness. It is not necessary that they should preach. There are innumerable other ways in which they can equally serve their generation and promote their Saviour's glory. Their earnestness and zeal can readily enough discover other channels in which to flow. Ability to discharge a particular function does not necessarily imply that it ought to be discharged, so long as general considerations show that that function is assigned in Scripture to a class to which the possessor of the ability does not belong. All the conditions of the case, and not one or two only, must be looked at, when we would determine the course that we are to pursue, and the place in God's general order of things that we are to fill. Isolated and exceptional instances too, such as the four daughters of Philip, must not be argued from. We need a general principle and a general rule to guide us, if all the members of the body are to work harmoniously, and God is to appear not as "the author of confusion but of peace." There are even many circumstances in which the restraining of gifts is not less illustrative of Christian excellence, and not less promotive of Christian good, than their exercise. Women have only to consider what the world, what the Church, would be if every woman who is capable of being trained to preach with effect were to regard that as a call of Providence to do so, and they will hardly fail to acknowledge the divine wisdom which forbids their making the attempt, and points them to other fields of Christian labour.

WILLIAM MILLIGAN.

THE HIGH CALLING OF GOD IN CHRIST JESUS.

"I am the Almighty God; walk before me, and be thou perfect."

LORD, dost Thou care to have my soul
Before Thee in the light—
As Thou art, true and pure and whole,
As Thou art, wise and right?

Hast Thou indeed so high an aim
For one who looked so low—
A way above the reach of shame
Wherein my heart may go?

Then fill the fulness of my gaze
From that sure sight of Thine,
Which girds the sinner with Thy praise,
And makes his life divine.

Thee only shall Thy servant claim,
And where Thou art to be,
His power Thy own Almighty name,
And all his springs in Thee.

Watch me for this amid the fear
That time must yet fulfil;
Watch me through hopes that disappear
At Thy redeeming will.

Thy purpose in me shall not fail
With my declining breath;
Thy thought is that which shall prevail
Against the bars of death.

The thing that dieth, let it die;
Let that which goes depart;
But keep me seeing with Thine eye,
And thinking with Thy heart.

AGAINST THE STREAM:

The Story of an Heroic Age in England.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE SCHONBERG-COTTA FAMILY."

CHAPTER I.—INTRODUCTORY.

One who has not tried can imagine what a pleasant thing it is to be, undeniably and consciously, an old woman.

I mean, of course, literally, not symbolically.

To have the whole landscape of life behind you, and below you. To see, now and then, indications through the mists and shadows, why the path wound here through barren, empty wastes, and there through thorny thickets; in one place scaled recklessly the perilous rocky steep, in another crept in weary windings along monotonous slopes it had seemed easier to clear at a bound; or why, just there, it broke off in a sudden chasm, which at the time threatened to end its meaning and waste its work altogether. To catch some explanatory hints of a training of eye and nerve for higher work hereafter; some illuminated glimpses of fellow-travellers, to be succoured just at that perplexing turn, and nowhere else. To have the long uphill all but over, and to find "the upland slopes of duty" all but merging in the "table-land of glory," as they do, not for the exceptional hero only, but for all who follow the footprints of the Master's feet, if the Master's words are true; if heroism means, as He showed, not exceptional achievement, but self-rendering obedience; and glory, as He is showing now, not some vague repetition of earthly pomps with a larger than earthly audience, but the expansion and illumination of every faculty, in a life fuller than the in-tensest life below, for a service higher because nearer Him.

To watch such explanatory broken lights stealing over the past that reaches back so far;—to catch the dawn of unbroken, satisfying light on the future, now so near. Rest here, in the acquiescence in powers enfeebled, unequal to fresh enterprise, that have done their work and can undertake no more, save such stray quiet kindnesses as may come to us demanding to be done; rest there, in the hope of powers renewed, so that their exercise shall become once more a joy, such as it was to move or breathe in childhood.

A little faint insight through the learning and unlearning of the years,—through their tenderer tolerance, and larger judgments, into the patience of Him who has been teaching and long-suffering through the ages. A strong and ever-growing trust, through some discords resolved, and some despairs clashed into hopes; through some misunderstood things explained, and some wrongs righted or turped into sacred instruments of martyrdom, through much forgiven and something overcome—in the purpose of Him "who willeth not that any should perish," not because sin is a mere passing disease of the childhood of humanity, or a mere passing discord of the harmonies of the universe, but because "He willeth that all men should repent." A bright and ever brightening hope in a heaven which shall be the seed-plot of many heavens, through that Death which is the seed of infinite life.

To find the "great multitude no man can number," the "majority" to which we go, no longer an overwhelming dazzle of supernatural light, a crowd of unknown unindividualised angelic faces, but the blessed company where the dearest eyes wonder and smile, and the most familiar voices are heard, in that speech at once so tender and so high we know not what better to call it than song.

These things are worth waiting for, worth growing old for, worth having this world emptied for.

Can I say that?

Not always; not most healthily, I think, in moments of ecstatic foreseeing, but in those moments, more frequent, when it is given me, in some simple ways, to fill up the measure of their service who have gone before, and so to feel that, after all, this world is indeed not empty to me, though my best have gone on out of sight.

So vividly they stand before me, those old times, now that the morning mists and the noon-day haze are over, and the mists of night have scarcely come; so clearly do the old voices sound back to me in the quiet, especially from the earliest days, and so different is the world whence they come from this around me now, that I feel attracted to sit down and picture them, with just as little effort as if I were not making pictures at all, but simply tracing outlines on a series of mirrors, and transforming them thus, by some magic, into a series of stained-glass windows.

So it seems to me.

But then, of course, I always see the clear living mirror behind my outlines; and how far the stained glass represents it to others I cannot know.

It is worth while to do it, for myself at least, for I have lived through one of our country's heroic ages, and, as it seems to me, have seen some of the heroes not very far off.

And, in looking back over my life, if there are any principles which have been its joy and strength, and which I could wish to see more the joy and strength of others, they are these.

Christianity is to me, and ever has been since I learned to live by it, not so much a fresh mystery, as a revelation of mysteries—a "mystery shown;" not a clouding, but an unveiling; not a new riddle, whose glory is that being the divinest it is the deepest, but a solution of many riddles, although indeed not yet of all.

The world and its great history are full of darkness; society and our own little histories are full of darkness, and much of this Christianity has left unconquered and unexplained.

But at the heart and centre of all is not darkness, but light; not only a mind infinite and incomprehensible, but a heart that loves and speaks; not a subtle setter-forth of riddles which humanity has to solve at its peril, or perish, but a patient Teacher of babes, to whom His human creatures are dear; not an inexorable medical examiner testing candidates for appointments, but the Physician healing the sick; not the Sphinx, but the Word.

Truth obvious indeed, and at the root of all Christian theology (is not the absence of it practically Atheism?), yet from which it seems to me most Christian theologies are for ever departing into labyrinths of our own making, and ever needing to be recalled.

And flowing from this is another principle, which has strengthened me to live and hope. The light, and not the darkness, are meant to conquer, in individuals, as in the whole. Human character is not immutable, like the instincts of animals, but corrigible and perfectible;—perfectible in the best to the end, corrigible in the worst to the end;—capable of radical change, capable of infinite growth.

Again, truth most obvious, if Christianity is true; yet one which in the apparent fixedness of character in all men after early youth, and the apparent invincibility of small faults in good men, in wrongs from others, in struggles with myself, I, at least, have not found it easy to hold; which, indeed, I should have found it impossible to hold, but for constant recurrence to that first great truth which is its source.

Faith in God, unbounded; and, for that reason, hope for men unbounded also.

Are these things so easy to hold in a world where the chaos of a French revolution can whirl on for a century without evolving a creation?—where the Church of land after land, and age after age, has succeeded too often in silencing its noblest men?—where a Las Casas originated the slave-trade, and the abolition of slavery has not at all events resulted in a planter's Paradise of grateful, industrious labourers?—where a century of philanthropic efforts leaves our English legislation powerless to lift off the accumulating weight of pauperism, and a millennium of Christianity leaves English Christians powerless to stem the increasing flood of intemperance?—where in our own little worlds all of us have seen the race not always won by the swift, nor the battle by the brave?

Do we not need in such a world a faith in God which, whatever is doubtful and whatever is dark, leaves it not doubtful that "in Him is no darkness at all?"

Do we not need a hope for man that has its root deeper than in any man, or in any history, even in Him who loving most has suffered most; Who "underwent and overcame;" Whose life was serving, Whose victory was in being vanquished, Whose reigning is serving, Whose reward for the service of His own is to serve better, Whose work in the midst of the throne is the old familiar shepherd's work of "leading" and feeding, Whose triumph in the day of His joy will be to "gird himself, and come forth, and serve?"

And this leads me to the third living principle of my life;—belief in a heaven which is not a contradiction, but a completion of true Christian life below; in a Master Whose promise is, not a rewarding of seventy years of toil by an eternity of luxurious repose; nor an avenging of seventy years of abasement by an eternity of exaltation; nor a compensation for seventy years of service and suffering by an eternity of triumphal pomp and regal state; but a training by the numbered years of imperfect work here for an eternity of blessed work, unhindered and unwearied; by seventy years of gradual deliverance from the bondage of self, not for an eternity of the gratification of self, intellectual or spiritual, but for an eternity of the only liberty worth having, the Liberty, not of the Rights of independent atoms, but of the Duties of a mutually dependent brotherhood, in the presence of the Father whom all obey, and on whom all depend; the glorious Liberty of Love, the necessity of whose nature, like His who is its source and end, is to give, and in giving, before and in all its gifts to give itself, giving and receiving in that endless interchange which ensures growth, and which only is worthy to be called life.

A belief I have found not without practical importance: since earnest and foretastes of our promised inheritance are sure to be coveted by the way, and it makes not a little difference to our practical life whether we consider the truest symbol and foretaste of heaven to be the contemplation of toiling cities from suburban paradises, or the succouring and serving the poorest creature toiling in those city streets.

If I have had any power in my life to "lift up hands that hang down," to revive now and then hope for humanity in some veterans (to whom I have been as a child), worn-out with the disappointments of many victories which have failed to accomplish all they seemed to promise; or, in some fallen creatures, worn-out with the despair of many defeats, it is to such simple and obvious principles as these that I owe it.

And yet, how vain to think we know the springs of the influences which have moulded us, or through which we have acted on others; so subtle are they, so simple, so subtly combined, so finely distinct!

Deeper even than its deepest principles is our religion, rooted not in a principle, but in the Person we adore; and, since the divine history is ever deeper and wider than all the theologies and philosophies drawn from it, to me, doubtless, as to all, from the wisest to the simplest, all true power to live, or to help to live, has come from Him Who, while in Himself revealing the Father, understood and saved the "sinner" who washed His feet, hoped in and saved the disciple who denied Him, loved and saved the Pharisee who "persecuted Him," Whose presence makes heaven, and must make a heaven like Himself.

We may review or analyze our life into principles, as we analyze our food into alkalies, salts, and acids; but no chemical combination of alkalies, salts, and acids yet invented will keep us alive.

Principles must, after all, be rooted in affections: life can only be nourished by life.

CHAPTER II.

"Fretted by sallies of his mother's kisses,
With light upon him from his father's eyes."

SUCH Recollections of early childhood with me are all too soon broken in upon.

Yet to me also the world began with Paradise. I can dimly recall such a zone of tenderest sunlight, such a sense of being watched and delighted in, and brooded and purred over, and played with; such a golden time of kisses and coaxings, and tender foldings up at night, and laughing wakings up in the morning.

And then, succeeding it, a time of silence and darkness and cold; of being hushed and kept quiet because Something which had made the sunshine of the home was gone, and Something else which needed that lost sunshine more than any had come, and must be cherished and watched and kept alive with such artificial warmth as the world can make for motherless babes,—leaving at the moment little warmth and light to spare anywhere for me.

A dark confused chaotic time, "without form, and void;" in looking back, I can scarcely tell whether it lasted days, or months, or years; a time when God had made for me no lights, greater or lesser, to divide the light from the darkness.

So my first associations with my brother, my own brother Piers, who was afterwards the life of my life, were rather of something subtracted than something added, rather of a great loss, than the great gift he was.

I think we shall find it thus with many of our best gifts, often.

After this comes first into my recollection a pervading and overshadowing memory of Clothes.

Before, it was like being a bird or a flower. But connected with that dark chaotic time comes a sense of being in a state of existence where one had always to carry about Things to be taken care of, which one was in some vague and uneasy way identified with and responsible for, and which the people in the nursery who loved one most, felt to be in some sense of more importance than oneself, and yet the very nature of which appeared to be that the influences which were pleasant to their wearer were pernicious to them.

It was, I suppose, the form in which my spirit had to struggle into the consciousness of matter,

"Obstinate questionings,
Blank misgivings of a creature
Moving about in worlds not realised."

How many of the lessons incident to the "shades of the prison-house" came to me through my Clothes!—through that portion of the material world which was to me so essentially part of the "Not Me," and was evidently regarded by those around me as an integral portion of the "Me!"

I can remember now the delighted sense of freedom with which, one fine Sunday afternoon, I had crept, unnoticed, out of the garden door, with my faithful companion, our great black Newfoundland dog, Pluto, up the green hill outside the garden wall to the edge of the brook beyond, and was enjoying at once the joys of liberty and of tyranny in making him plunge into the water and fetch me a stick as I had seen my father do. I remember now the half-remonstrant, half-condescending way in which the grand creature yielded to my little imperiousnesses, and then, landing his freight, shook himself in a storm of sparkling drops over me and my new frock.

And I also remember a certain calm philosophical interest (which ought in any consistent biography to have presaged a genius for scientific investigation) wherewith I was observing that the drops did not penetrate my crape, but lay on it, round and sparkling,—when nurse burst upon us with baby in her arms and a wail on her lips.

"Bless the maid! what will she be after next? Miss Bride, Miss Bride, you contrary child, how can you be so unfeeling as to forget your new crape, and your blessed mother, and Sunday, and everything, and romp about like a beggar's brat with that great brute of a dog?"

A speech which left me in such a bewilderment of images and injustices that I was too perplexed to cry or to defend myself, until the dog, his affections getting the better of his tact, shook himself in a rapture of welcome over baby and nurse, and thereby drew on himself a blow which sent him away whining in his inarticulate way; whilst I, tearfully protesting that Pluto was not a brute nor I a brat, and that I had not forgotten Sunday, for father had only just given me my Sunday gingerbread, was dragged down the steps of the dear old garden, from terrace to terrace, whining in my half-articulate way.

And I also remember to this day my father standing at the door of the summer parlour, which opened on the garden, welcoming me with open arms, caressing and comforting me, and saying that "Clothes did not matter at all if I would only be his own dear little Bride, and not cry."

But Clothes did matter, as I knew too well in my feminine experience, and as nurse protested, "How should master know about Clothes, poor dear soul, who had neither to make nor to mend, nor to starch nor to iron? Men, the wisest of them, always talked as if clothes grew upon children like fur upon kittens."

They mattered, indeed, so much to me, that I had never any difficulty at all in receiving the narrative of Genesis connecting Clothes with the fall rather than the creation of man, as a most rational explanation of the nature of things, being already quite convinced from my own history that they could never have been originally intended as essentials in any beneficent scheme of the universe.

Only, Piers and I used in after years frequently to lament that the primitive institution of skins had not been adhered to.

Also, I suspect, Clothes had much to do with that next step which made so great a change in our lives.

I have little doubt it was a sense of his incapacity for contending with the difficulties springing, not from the characters of his children, but from their Clothes, feminine and infantine, with all the feminine care and attendance incident thereunto, that induced him to place at the head of his house the discreet and sober-minded gentlewoman who became our stepmother; clothes, I mean, in the larger sense,—conventionalities, customs, proprieties.

The reign of Clothes certainly did not cease with my stepmother. Only the signification of the word extended. Conventionalities, customs, proprieties, all the ritual of life, these were her standard measures, her household gods, her sacred Scriptures, or at least her tradition of the elders, which brought them down to practice; her Talmud if not her Pentateuch. With most of us, I suppose, our practical commentaries are unwritten.

On the Upper Olympus, doubtless, with her as with others, sate enthroned the serene far-off orthodox divinities, but by the hearth were acknowledged two presiding powers, one deprecated as the root of mischief, and the other honoured with daily incense and libation. Her evil genius was Enthusiasm ; her protecting divinity, Moderation.

To understand the Bible or anything properly, she would have considered that every text should be underlined with "Let everything be done decently and in order," and, "Let your moderation be known unto all men."

With her, sin was doing anything too vehemently ; heresy, believing anything too intensely ; justice between contending parties was thinking every one equally wrong ; charity, thinking every one equally right ; the Christian warfare an armed neutrality ; truth, the residuum after the extraction of all extreme opinions ; paradise, the place where all exaggerated ideas and characters are either absent or kept quiet.

At least such was the impression she made on me in the exaggerations of my childish imagination ; for hers was a moderation which always tempted me into extremes, and it is only later that I learned to be just to her. She was as kind as any one can be without sympathy, as just as any one can be without imagination. She adhered as faithfully to the golden rule, "As ye would that men should do to you, do ye also to them," as any one can do who has no conception of the differences between men, between the "they" and the "you," no idea of the patient study of circumstance and character which the true fulfilling of the precept involves.

In later years, moreover, we grew to understand each other better ; as she and I both learned, I trust, something from each other, and more from life.

And in earlier years, I can see now, if not the good she did me, at least something of the evils from which she kept me.

It is good for us all to have some ice in our lives. It makes the air fresher, and restrains the enthusiasm which is meant to enrich the summers and middle levels with living waters and life-giving soil, from overflowing too early in the spring-time on the higher levels, and so evaporating in mists of sentiment, or being lost in marshes of vague good intention.

Much fond and foolish talk there was, no doubt, in the nursery, when it was announced that Mr. Danescombe, my father, was about to marry Miss Euphrasia Weston.

Faltering exhortations were addressed to me by nurse as to the duties of our new relationship to the good lady who was coming to be our "new mother," congratulations whose compassionate tones made me interpret them into condolences. For children, like dogs, read speech as if it were music, by tones rather than by words.

The only words of her exhortations which made any impression on me were those terrible promises of a "new mother." To me they were what to a devout Jew might have been the promise of a "new God."

In those days the French words, vulgarised by bad nursery pronunciation into papa and mamma, which would be so intolerable if they were not hallowed to two or three generations by the lisping of baby lips, had not yet been introduced into England, or at least had not penetrated to our social level in our little country town. There was, therefore, no convenient intermediate conventional term, expressive rather of position than relationship.

And the sacred name, mother, was not, in my Protestant childhood, distributed in the liberal manner since the fashion among any benevolent ladies who undertake the charge of young girls, good or naughty. In those days women only became mothers through a mother's anguish and joy.

To me "mother" meant one only incomparable love, one only irreparable loss ; love which had loved me, me as I was, not my clothes, nor my beauty in me, not my clothes, nor my behaviour, but me, her little, helpless, longing, clinging Bride ; loss which had left my childhood, consciously or unconsciously, one long empty craving, "feeling after if haply I might find" wings to brood over me, arms to fold me like hers.

And now nurse seemed to expect me to transfer that dear lost name in this easy way to an unknown quantity, as if it meant nothing, like a nonsense nursery rhyme ; as if life meant nothing but a "make-believe" play with dolls.

I could not have done so even to an old doll. Yet to remonstrate with any one who could have had the want of perception to propose such a thing was, I instinctively felt, as useless as trying to explain the mysteries of property to Pluto.

I cried myself to sleep silently that night, in one of those unutterable agonies of childhood. Happily childish agonies do not drive sleep away !

And the next morning I awoke and began my vain tears again, but made no moan or complaint, until nurse finding I did not get on with my bread and milk, began one of her half-caressing, half-querulous remonstrances.

"What ails the child? Miss Bride, you are getting quite beyond poor old nurse. And so no doubt others have thought. Maybe the new lady will manage better."

Then I broke out into one gasping sob, and said, "Must I call the new lady Mother?"

"Sure enough, child, sure enough! what would poor dear master say?"

"Did father say that?"

"Who would make so bold as to ask him? Never mind, poor lamb, never mind; what's the name? The name's nothing."

To me the name was unutterably much. But I was consoled by perceiving that it was plain nurse had no sentence on the matter from my father; and I secretly resolved to ask him myself.

To me the name was everything. To use it falsely was, I felt in some dim way, to bring a lie into my life, or rather to sap all significance out of the words falsehood and truth, to make all language, all sacred words and names lose their distinctive meaning and become mere interchangeable hollowneses. That is to say, this is what I now know my instinctive revulsion meant.

The very next time that I sate on my father's knee, and could get my face well hidden on his breast, with desperate courage I began—

"Must I call her Mother?"

His hands trembled as they stroked my hair, and his lips as he kissed me, and I could hear that his voice was half choked as he said—

"Who, little Bride? What does my darling mean?"

"The new lady," I said, without lifting my head.

He put me down, and paced hastily up and down the room; and then he said, in what seemed to me a very cold and absent voice, "I will ask her."

But then again suddenly he seized me in his arms and pressed me to his heart, and I felt his tears as he said—

"Little Bride, my darling little Bride, you are not afraid of me? I am only bringing some one home to take care of you and baby."

And so he fully believed, my poor father. Bewildered by the advice of some and the gossip of others, and the well-meant querulousness of nurse, and the various feminine and infantine incomprehensibilities of baby and of me, he was bringing home this sage and sober-minded new lady who talked good English, which nurse did not, and was a good economist, which he was not, to preside over his household, his children, and himself, to provide us with costumes and catechisms, with clothes, intellectual, moral, and material.

I am not describing typical relationships or characters. Relationships and characters are not to be so easily classified into types. Second marriages are as different as first marriages, and stepmothers as different as mothers or mothers-in-law. But our country town was not a normal community, nor was mine a normal life. And this was my experience.

The next day my father kissed me very tenderly when I went to bed, and said gravely—

"Miss Weston does not wish my little Bride to call her anything that is not strictly correct. You may call her Mrs. Danescombe. She would like it."

I felt so relieved, and so grateful to the new lady for the relief, I could almost have welcomed her. I suppose a dim hope came to me that she would after all understand me.

A week after that my father went away for a day or two. In those days wedding journeys had not been introduced. He was married in the neighbouring town where Miss Euphrasia was staying, and the next day he brought her home, and we were summoned to greet her.

She stooped down graciously and gave me her cheek to kiss; and she spoke in a high-pitched caressing tone, supposed to suit the infantine taste, to Piers, and made a movement as if she would have taken him in her arms and kissed him. But she seemed to find her dress a little in the way. She wore a drooping large-brimmed hat with a feather, and ruffles and lappets and laces in various places, and I believe she felt shy with the child, which he with a child's instinct of course perceived; and concluding she had no right or possession in him, he turned from her with a little pout, and a little quiver of the lips to me.

I saw her colour rise a little, and I felt rather than saw a slight uneasy frown on my father's face. I knew that things were going wrong; and then all at once something motherly seemed to wake up in my own heart (I do not know what else to call it), a dim feeling that I was not there to be taken care of, but to take care of other people, of Piers and father, and even in some sense of Mrs. Danescombe. And I folded my arms around my little brother, and stretched out his little hands and mine together towards her, and then I seemed to feel father's frown relax to a smile, and in a moment we were both caught up and half smothered in his arms, and enveloped in a comprehensive embrace in which Mrs. Danescombe was in some way involved.

Then afterwards father hastily left the room, as if he had finished the reconciliation scene in a play, his sanguine nature quite satisfied that all was going right; and Mrs. Danescombe, after bestowing a toy on Piers, and a new London doll on me, was quite content to leave Piers to my guardianship, whilst she smoothed herself down before the small cut Venetian glass in the oaken frame over the old high-carved chimney-piece.

And I remember sitting in the window-seat with my arms around Piers, altogether grave and happy with that new feeling of motherliness. We did not touch our toys, but sate gravely conversing; so that when father returned, cheerily rubbing his hands, he looked a little disappointed to see the new gifts neglected, and said to me half reproachfully—

"Does not my little Bride care for her beautiful new doll?"

How could I? I, who was feeling wise and matronly as if I were the mother of the human race, and had the world on my shoulders, himself included!

Besides, what strange ideas he must have about dolls! Was a new doll to be made acquaintance with and taken to one's heart in a moment?

However, I took up the doll, and began to behave to it with great politeness.

And Mrs. Danescombe drew near us, and made sundry efforts to "amuse" Piers by jerking the angular wooden puppet with which she had presented him, by means of internal strings, into various mountebank attitudes, which were intended to be funny.

I remember now the sense of grave wonder and pity with which I contemplated these futile attempts at entertainment, whilst Piers continued to gaze steadily into her face, with serious, undeluded eyes, evidently concluding that she was quite too old to play, and that the whole thing was a piece of very ineffective dramatic performance. I think the courteous complaisance with which little children receive our imbecile attempts to amuse them very remarkable; they who are never taken in, who are themselves actors of the first-class, by instinct, living in a perpetually varied drama as gloriously independent of vulgar necessities of scene-painting as an Athenian audience; they to whom any few square feet of earth where they can be let alone are an imperial amphitheatre, and two chairs a hippodrome, and a heap of chips a fortune of theatrical properties.

Piers, I am sure, took in the whole futility and absurdity of the situation; but he also understood that the new lady meant well, and, like the little king he was, from time to time he vouchsafed her the patronage of a smile, and even condescended to imitate her movements with the puppet.

Little king that he was! My little king, whom I would serve with all I was and had, and guard and cherish, and pet and honour, and keep the world warm for; and be his interpreter, his queen, his slave!

That night I asked nurse if I might say my prayers beside baby's crib, instead of at her knee. The wonderful birds and flowers on her chintz petticoat had always been a hindrance to me, and also her snuff-box, and I so often had to begin all over again.

At first she seemed rather hurt at the request; but then I began to cry, and pleaded that baby looked so dear; and she consented, and called us "Poor innocents!" and began to cry too.

Piers was asleep, one little arm under his round cheek, flushed as it was with sleep, and the other little fat hand clenched like a wrestler's, and thrust out over the edge of his cot. My prayers must have been a mysterious ritual to me, scarcely "in a tongue understood of the people." No one had ever explained them to me. I do not remember ever expecting anything to come of them, except some vague harm to some one if they were left out. What the words were at that time I cannot even tell. There were no Sunday-schools in our town; nurse was very ignorant, and I am sure she could not read. Not improbably they were the Lord's Prayer and the invocation to the Four Evangelists, long afterwards not disused in the district. And my theology was, doubtless, neither definite nor broad. It certainly, however, included a belief in Something that could hurt Piers and me, especially if we were naughty, and in the dark.

But mysterious, indeed, are all little children's prayers!

Who knows the "tongues of angels!" Who knows the mystic, unutterable communion there may be between the Father of spirits and those little ones whose angels always see his face!

"Exiled children of Eve," little royal strangers, whose wondering eyes have not yet narrowed their range to our mortal vision, —whose free, fearless, questioning thought is not yet fettered to our mortal speech,—who knows the delicate, aerial touches that come and go along those strings the world's rude hands have not yet swept? Who knows the moment when the Father who fell on the prodigal's neck and kissed him, clasps to his heart those little ones who have not yet wilfully left the Father's house? what kisses, what consecrating touches are theirs?

Who knows, since God is love,—not primarily the Infinite Mind that speaks to us by works or thoughts, but the Father's heart that speaks to us by loving,—what divine touches, real as a mother's kisses, tender as the soft pressure of her arms, rest on the little ones?

Page 183.

Not only on a few score of exceptional little Galilean children were the sacred Hands laid, in those three years' which made visible the eternity of unseen Divine love.

Nor is it only a few Jewish fishermen who have misunderstood the love of the Master for little children,—the babes,—the creatures we call speechless and unconscious.

Is it not rather we who have become blind, and speechless, and unconscious? blinded by the countless small glitterings, and the countless vain prying of this world; robbed of heavenly utterance by its empty chattering and bitter contentions; made unconscious by its drowsy charms, of the realities of life and death, and love, of the capacities for sorrow and joy, deeper even than sorrow around and within us still, whether we know it or not,— as they are around the little children we think unaware of them?

Who knows how little the wisest of us know, or how much the simplest?

I know not, indeed, what passed in my heart that night, or what words passed my lips. But I remember my cheek resting on my little brother's cheek, and the dear little hand unclenching itself and resting on me, and the sleepy eyes opening for a moment on mine, and the parted lips sleepily lisping my name.

And I remember lying down in my own little bed afterwards, so still and happy, and warm at heart, feeling not so much that I was brooded over, or needed it, as that some kind of wings had unfolded in me, and were brooding over Piers, and keeping him safe and warm.

That was, as far as I can remember, the way God began to teach me; by filling my heart with that great love which was just a little feeble image of His.

THE FUTURE OF THE WORKING CLASSES.

II.—GOD OR MAMMON?

FEW things have troubled some men more during the last half-dozen of years than the thought of the International Society. On the principle, we suppose, that objects looming through the mist look larger than when seen through a clear atmosphere, it has frightened many persons out of their propriety, as the great bombshell destined to explode in ruin to Europe. For our own part, utterly though we dislike it, we do not see much cause for such fears. According to Mazzini, when the French section was believed to number members by the million, and to have money enough to stock a bank, it actually contained but six hundred and sixty-six members (an ominous number, we admit!), and it was in debt to the amount of four hundred and forty-six francs. We can hardly help comparing it with the organization which Augustus Comte set in motion for supporting in the first instance himself, and thereafter the Comtian religion in the great countries of the civilised world, under a magnificent hierarchy of priests, high-priests, and presidents, whose revenue for the first year, when it came to be summed up, amounted to the splendid total of four thousand francs!

But small comparatively though the dimensions of the International have been, and smaller still the sections into which its members are now divided, its very existence is a striking fact. We believe that in certain respects, the first conception of its formers was good and even great. The English Exhibition of 1862 brought together many intelligent working men from England and from France. It seemed to them that by mutual conference and co-operation, the working men of the different countries of Europe might help one another to elevate their condition. They wished to see their order raised to a condition in which they would have more freedom, more leisure, more political influence, more education, more opportunity to exercise their minds, to cultivate their affections, and to turn to account capabilities that had hitherto been wasted, stifled, lost. A great International Workmen's Society, pursuing these objects on a Christian basis and in a Christian spirit, would have been a noble institution. Unhappily, however, the movement took a different direction. Almost the first action of the society, when it became organized in 1864, was to declare that the source of all political, moral, and material servitude was the subjection of labour to capital, and that the one great aim of the society must be to secure the economic emancipation of the working-classes. Thus, in the most specific terms the society declared as its very basis that a material evil—a misadjustment of labour and capital—was the cause of all that unduly depressed the working classes, and that a material remedy—the extrication of labour from being under capital and its being placed alongside of it—was the grand cure of all their disorder and suffering. As the view thus taken of the cause of the depression was extremely narrow, so the means proposed for rectifying it seemed little calculated to draw out those higher capacities that had hitherto lain dormant among working men. Practically, the International was founded on materialism, pure and simple. It recognised no living God, ruling the universe, whose aid must be sought in the endeavour to obtain justice for the labourer, and freedom to fulfil the higher purposes of life. It proposed to guide the enslaved host from Egypt to Canaan, not only without the presence of the Lord or of his angel, but as if such an idea were a mere childish superstition. And what has been the result? It is not easy to get at the exact truth in reference to a society whose proceedings are secret, but it is well known that some sections of the International have declared war against religion, against property, against patriotism, against marriage, against God. The banner of naked atheism has been held aloft. It has been affirmed that when Robespierre declared, after his experience of the revolution, that some religion was necessary for man, and when, accordingly, he instituted the worship of the goddess of reason, he was guilty of a weakness, and that he made a mistake. Everything of the kind is a pernicious sham; material interests are the only reality, the only thing therefore for which it is worth while to contend.

These sentiments have horrified many respectable members of the International, who did not advert at first to the connection between them and the purely material basis on which the society was founded. To their honour be it said, the English members have not been submissive servants to Carl Marx, the ruling spirit of the society, who, probably in consequence of this, has found it necessary to remove its head-quarters from London to New York.

To the honour, likewise, of Joseph Mazzini be it said, that he spoke out most emphatically against the materialistic basis of the society. What may have been his own personal relation to the Christian faith, is a point on which we have no satisfactory knowledge, but on which his language gives us an unfavourable impression. His own plans gave a prominence to political changes which we have no intention to indorse. But he saw as clear as daylight that it was absolute madness to attempt to rectify the disorders of society, elevate the life of the labouring man, and benefit the world at large, without any regard to a Moral Governor, to a moral law, to human responsibility, to the unseen world, to the kingdom of God. He saw that any movement which rested on no better basis than materialism would infallibly degenerate into a wrangle over mere interests, would develop in the working classes nothing better than selfishness, would excite in them a fierce pugnacity, unmitigated by the amenities with which other classes are wont to soften the aspect of their quarrels, and would issue in an anarchy, like that of the Commune, in which everything would be ruined and nothing built up. The last months of his life were spent in preparing a warning to the working classes against following an ignis fatuus which could only land them in the morass, and delay indefinitely the elevation of their order.* He complained especially of the impetuosity of some of his own countrymen, who had no power to remove the visible evils of their country, and who conceived themselves bound to avenge their impotence by decreeing the abolition of God! Thereon they went to work to inspire their people with the spirit of sacrifice and martyrdom, by teaching them that human life was nothing more than a series of mechanical acts, dependent upon material forces and foreign impulses; that immortality was an illusion, and that man was naught but dust, and to dust he was destined to return!

"Thus," he summed up, "with no Authority to guide it; no conception of a State; with neither God nor common faith; neither country nor property; the republican banner we have hailed as the insignia of a new world and crown of a new epoch . . . would be transformed into the paltry flag of certain individuals or nuclei of individuals, owning no restraint save their interests, no law save the caprice of the hour, and no hope beyond the triumph of an hour. Mankind, broken up into a multitude of communes . . . would gradually sink to the mere vegetative existence of serfs attached to the soil, or chained within the narrow workshop whence they derive the necessaries of physical life; and ignorant or indifferent about all things else."

It is true that in England we have got certain atheistic lecturers who are full of the very spirit that Mazzini so strongly deplored. We cannot but think, however, that this wild atheistic spirit is foreign to British workmen, and that very few of them would expect, under such leadership, to be guided to a land flowing with milk and honey. But there are many things to incline the working masses in the direction of materialism, and to induce them practically, though not, perhaps, theoretically, to disregard religion in any shape as a leading factor in the great work of elevation. There is the natural carnality of the human heart—the blinding influence of the god of this world; there is the erroneous but prevalent notion that religion calls on us to disregard all that pertains to this life as of no consequence whatever; there is often the distraction caused by contending sects and parties in the Christian church; there is the want of home-coming power in the public services of the sanctuary, as if they were framed and adapted for a different class of minds; and there is a certain reserve towards the clergy, even the best and kindest of them, as if they would willingly improve the condition of the working classes in any and in every way, except only the way of independence which they so eagerly crave.

But all these considerations only render it more imperative on the working classes deliberately to face the question of religion, and to determine, as wise, calm, and sober-minded men, what relation to it is best fitted to promote the elevation of their order? As individuals, they have a question to settle that comes much nearer to the heart and conscience: but what we speak of here is the bearing of religion not on the soul of the individual, but on the condition of the mass. We know that "religion" is a very vague word, and we do not choose it as the best; but we shall come to something more definite before we close.

Let us suppose, in the first place, that the struggle of the working classes is solely for material benefit. They think themselves entitled to more wages and to shorter hours of labour, to more consideration in the community, to more influence in the Legislature, to a more potential voice in the management of the great national interests. Let us suppose that the attainment of these things is their goal, beyond which they do not care to look or to go. What will be the effect of this aim on their own spirit? As a whole, it cannot be ennobling. It may, indeed, be ennobling in the case of those, if such there should be, who, disregarding their own interests, devote themselves with a pure heart to advance those of their less able brethren. But, as a whole, a continuous struggle for mere material interests has a bad effect on character. It leads to a great development of selfishness. It genders a spirit of overweening regard to personal benefit that begins with indifference to the interests of employers, but by-and-by tells against neighbours, relatives, and friends. It wears out forbearance and generosity. It paralyses the martyr-spirit. And as it shows little or no generosity, it comes by-and-by, when its interests are at stake, to have not much regard for justice. And then, up rise sectional jealousies and animosities, and bitter, bitter is their breath. Have we had no illustrations of this? Are children as ready as they used to be to contribute to the support of aged and infirm parents? Is the process of "rattening" one that would have ever been heard of if the working man's heart had not been subjected to perverse influences? And what are we to think of the moral education of the man who blows up his neighbour's house with gunpowder, or throws a bombshell through his window?

It is only religion that can give such elevation and dignity to the movement of the working classes as to check this deteriorating influence, and substitute a better and nobler. Our Lord has taught us that a man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the good things which he possesseth. Under the influence of his teaching, the struggle of the working classes would be a struggle, not for mere material benefits, but for the means of fulfilling more efficiently and more generally the higher purposes of life. It would be a movement for enabling the masses to reach the condition in which they should be most useful and serviceable, and be able to do most to make the spot which they influence better and brighter than they found it. It is noble to struggle for a position where one may work with more free heart and more unfettered limb—work with mind and soul as well as with thaw and sinew—work pleasantly and prosperously with employers, overseers, and all—contribute more to the comfort of aged parents or of a beloved partner—give to one's children a better education, throwing their minds more open to the influence of what is best and noblest in the records of all time—lighten the burdens of the afflicted, encourage upward efforts in the young, promote self-control and industry in all, and diffuse that blessed Gospel which is so gloriously adapted to secure these and a thousand other equally noble ends. A movement of this kind, instead of developing selfishness and its odious brood, develops the qualities that secure affection and respect. Its reaction is as beneficial as its direct results. It is twice blessed—it blesseth those for whom the struggle is carried on, and it blesseth him who carries on the struggle. But it can derive its inspiration from no other source than Christianity. It is our Lord who teaches, "He that saveth his life shall lose it." To be always struggling for our present interests is the way to lose all that is desirable in life. An object beyond ourselves, or at least beyond our material interests, is necessary to high success. We are to seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and other things will be added to us. The present aims of the working classes are too much of the earth, earthy. Let them aim higher for themselves, and for their order, and for the world; in that case, the material benefits for which they are so exclusively concerned will come to them as the secondary and indirect results of far higher things.

Let us now ask the thoughtful working man—member of the International, mayhap (but not an atheist)—to look at the matter in another light. You are engaged in what you regard a great struggle, affecting the welfare of by far the largest class of society. You consider that that class has hitherto been in a state of serfdom, and you wish to raise them to the position of free labourers, and civilised, educated men. You wish to place labour and capital more on a level with each other, to secure more respect for the voice of labour, and to protect the labourer from being regarded as an inferior being by those who form opinion and govern the community. Right or wrong, it is a great aim. It amounts practically to a revolution. Now, the question is, Is it to be expected that so great a change will be carried out altogether irrespective of the great Ruler of the world? If the world has a Supreme Ruler, is it not reasonable to believe that He has some mind and purpose in connection with this proposed change; must not the control of the whole movement, indeed, lie with Him, and would it not be well to consider what his will is in the matter? He may, indeed, leave men to carry out their plans in their own way, as He left the Israelites to attack the Canaanites after the order had been issued to turn again towards the sea. But in that case, what can be expected but defeat, chastisement, and mortification? They may gain their material ends, but at a sad cost; at the cost of much bitter alienation between class and class, and at the cost of much deterioration of their own character. But let us make another supposition. In a godly, filial spirit, the mass of working men, and pre-eminently their leaders, look on the advantages which they desire to secure as things that are now in God's hands, and would not desire to have them, except as God's gifts, and with God's blessing. Consequently, they go about the obtaining of them with a deep and earnest regard to his will. They will take no measures which He may not be expected to sanction. They will ask his guidance and his blessing on every step of their progress. They will commit their way to Him, they will do right, and trust to Him the issue. If this were the prevailing spirit of the working class movement, how much more sweet and musical would be its progress, and how much more sure of the highest blessing the final consummation!

If now we desire to know something more of the methods of the Lord of Providence, whether for elevating a class unduly depressed, or for curing the evils of society generally, let us listen to the voice which comes from the Apocalyptic throne, "Behold, I make all things new!" It has pleased God to connect with One Name, and to commit to One Hand, the entire reconstruction of the world. This, undoubtedly, is the Christian doctrine, and it must either be wholly true or wholly false. If true at all, it is wholly true. If it be true that the Son of God lived on earth in human form, that all the light and life of the Godhead dwelt bodily in Him; all the healing virtue, all the restorative efficacy of heaven; if his death was the penalty of man's sin; and if, when He rose, the whole honour and power of the universe were given to Him—if all this be true, it cannot but be true that He is the centre of all renewal, that, apart from Him, no part of the process of restoration can ever go on. Not only is there no other name under heaven given among men whereby, in the highest sense, they must be saved; but there is no other whereby any part of the disorder which sin has brought into our world can be healed. Either this is true, or the whole story of Christ is a delusion and malignant fiction. Either He is the rock on which your house will withstand the wind and the rain, or He is a mere pretender, who makes your case more pitiable, lulling you into a false security by professions as empty as the air, and dooming you to a disaster all the more terrible because you looked so confidently for peace and blessing at his hands.

Unhappily, we live in an age when the darker supposition regarding Christ does not lack its advocates. Men may tell us that they are weary of hearing of Christ, and the emancipation of humanity through Him. "Have we not had eighteen centuries of Christ, and even in Christian countries what is the result? Don't we hear Mr. Carlyle denouncing the society even of Christian England as a cesspool of all abominations, a bottomless pit of lies and shams and shoddy? Don't we hear Hindus from the headquarters of heathendom, challenging our archbishops for talking of their darkness, and pointing to things among ourselves, that whatever may be the lowest depths of heathendom, show in Christendom a lower still? And is this broken reed—this name of Christ—the charm to which we are to trust for curing us of our wounds and bruises and putrefying sores? Nay, but we know better; we abjure a spell that has lost its virtue; and however bitter the battle, we will fly to arms and fight to the death for our rights and privileges!"

Dear friend, your voice sounds of impatience, and impatience is not the tone of wisdom. If there be one thing more than another incumbent on you in your present position, it is to be calm and deliberate, to study well the lessons of history and experience, and never let the irritation of impatience cloud your vision. Have you, then, made yourself acquainted with the state of the masses under Greek and Roman civilisation, or under that of Egypt, Assyria, or Babylon? What think you of the labouring poor in Mahometan countries? Have you compared the India of two hundred years ago with the India of to-day, and seen how much it has been improved even by the faint reflection of Christianity that has come upon it through British rule? Have you noted the fact that it is under a corrupt form of Christianity that the evils you deplore are at their worst, and that in proportion as Christianity is like the Christianity of the early ages, the condition of the people is greatly better? You complain of the slow influence of Christianity. It is good enough, you say, but it is too slow; we need something that works faster. We say, if you depend on anything that works more rapidly than Christ will keep pace with and sanctify, you will one day know which is the broken reed. But remember, Christ does not require you to sit still with folded hands when you have wrongs to be remedied, or unjust burdens to be removed. He bids you take up your bed and walk. But He requires you to be a fellow-worker with himself—to invoke his Spirit and seek his blessing. And the very reason why Christ works so slowly in such matters may be, that you and others are so little in the spirit of conferring with Him, and trusting to Him; it may be requisite that you should be taught wherein your strength lies, before you are called to raise the shout of victory.

And if there be so much in the great Person who is the Alpha and Omega of Christianity to win your confidence and awaken your gratitude, it is only as second to Him that you have cause to trust and value the great Christian Book. Besides its surpassing benefits to the individual, what boundless obligations do the labouring masses lie under to the New Testament! What is the great bulwark that has kept them from being utterly swept away by the tide of pride, selfishness, and ambition, that has been rolling against them age after age? Is it not the doctrine that all men are the children of one family; that the souls of all are equally precious; that the redeeming love and grace of the Saviour are alike for high and low; that the meanest and most despised of human beings are not insignificant in God's eyes, for do not the angels watch for the soul of the poor beggar whose sores are licked by the dogs at the Rich Man's gate? Even the broken spray, as it has dashed on the poor over the bulwark, has been bad enough, but what if they had been exposed to the full roll of the sea? They have been given in thousands as food for cannon; they have been sent to sea in crazy vessels, they have been entombed in mines more perilous than the crater of Vesuvius; they have been lodged in dens where fever and pestilence for ever lurk; they have been treated as machines that could not be supposed to have feelings; even under a somewhat paternal régime they have been spoken of as animals, who, it was satisfactory to think, had food enough in their bellies, and wool enough on their backs! How little could the children of labour have stood up against this spirit had it met with no check or opposition! But against this spirit and on behalf of the obscurest child of humanity, there has rung out the voice of the Bible proclaiming that all men are brothers, and that each man is immortal! In that coarse frame there is lodged a soul that can never die, fitted, if God's grace comes to it, to shine as a star of heaven, doomed, if it be neglected and lost, to feel the pangs of an undying misery. The Christian doctrine of the soul, what a bulwark it is for the poor! The Christian doctrine of redemption, too, and of the kingdom of heaven, that has no respect of persons, where there is neither Jew nor Greek, circumcision nor uncircumcision, barbarian, Scythian, bond, nor free, but all are one in Christ Jesus. And then, as showing the respect due to labour, there is the example of Jesus Christ, the carpenter's son, and of the fishermen of Galilee, and of the chiefest of all the apostles—a man of learning and of culture, but who was not ashamed to work with his hands. These are facts, and they are facts of marvellous power, and in the ages when the masses were isolated and helpless, it was such facts as these that were their only protection. And though now they have learned to unite, and to find a new strength in union, and therefore perhaps may think that they are not so dependent as their fathers were on these moral bulwarks, is it not true: that it is from such sources that the spirit must come which will sweeten the breath of society, and bind all classes in loving brotherhood? Are we to be ever fighting for our rights, and in a hard, proud spirit, defying those from whom we have wrested them? We may scowl upon the class above us, and having no pleasant dealings with them, persuade ourselves that the grapes are sour, and that they are not worth our minding; but deep in our hearts there may be found a suppressed yearning for a more loving relation; and if, at some unlooked-for moment, there come to us a pleasant experience of a sweeter feeling than we gave them credit for, it may be a little aperture through which we perceive a whole world of enjoyment which might be had but for the bitter jealousies that estrange those that were meant to be friends. Christianity is the only power that can really fuse society into a homogeneous mass. Under any other system the various classes will be in a state little better than that of armed neutrality; entrenched in their respective strongholds, and shaking their fists, or even gnashing their teeth, at any who shall dare to trespass on their domain.

We own that it is in no very satisfactory mood that we contemplate the present attitude of the working-classes toward religion, especially those of them who are most forward in economic movements. They do not seem to have much faith in Christ, and they do not seem to set much value on the personal interest and guidance of God. If we are right, it is a serious error, and it must result in disappointment and defeat. There can be no doubt, however, that the working classes contain a very great number of pure and earnest Christians. Very probably such men take little part in the plans and movements now in operation. Their deeper feelings are engaged in other work. But the economic revolution rolls on with such a mighty volume, and constitutes such a crisis for their whole order, that it is high time for them to consider what they can do to purify a movement which carries such issues, whether for weal or woe. There has been a fiery heat and hardness about it that does not indicate much of a heavenly presence. There would be a softer sky and a balmier air if only the cry were going up from them, "If Thy presence go not with us, carry us not up hence."

THOUGHTS BY THE WAY.

I.

THE higher a man rises above the beast, the greater his sympathy will be with it. The nearer the brute, the less pity for it. That is—Give the nature range on one side, and you extend it on the other; elevate it, and you soften it. This balance completes itself in a true man on both sides, and exists infinitely in God. How false and shallow, then, the view that God's greatness excludes us from his sympathy!

There is an originality of natural genius, but there is also an originality of a very plain understanding which has gained insight into God's Word through the teaching of his Spirit. And frequently, the plainer the understanding the more original is the product, as the teaching of God's Spirit is uncoloured and undiluted—achromatic, as opticians term it. We meet it in the humblest natures. It is the originality of the heart as distinguished from the mind. "A new heart also will I give you."

It is worth remarking how much the poco piu—the little more—will add to a whole character. Two men may seem to have equal elements of intellectual power, but there is an indescribable somewhat in the one which gives a flavour to all he is, or a direction to all he does, and which makes him diverse from the other, or opposite. Mood is the passive form of this difference, and purpose is the active form. It is like the perfume of a plant, or the amalgam in a conglomerate stone, and confers on the man his individuality. By the first of these, the perfume of character, we are guided in our likings; by the second, the purpose of character, we determine our moral judgments. To have a true friend we require both.

When God's grace pervades a man, it gives a new and higher individuality, having its resemblance to the above. There is a fresh fragrance and a higher aim which take possession of the natural, and consecrate them. This individuality is exceedingly beautiful when it descends on what is already fair; and it is with peculiar regret we have sometimes to say, "One thing thou lackest."

IN REFORMATION TIMES:

Some Glimpses of Life at a Great Era.

PART I.—A SCOTCH SCHOLAR.

CHAPTER VI.—A DIFFERENCE AND A RECONCILIATION.

DUNDAS was in many respects a born schoolmaster; his notion of teaching involving the exact performance of appointed tasks with prompt obedience; failure or negligence being expiated by speedy punishment. In the infliction of this punishment Dundas was scrupulously just, but at this period of his life, in the comparative absence of softening influences he was in danger of falling into occasional violence, alternating with the hearty kindness which could lead him, like another great scholar, to take a little lad "between his knees" to warm him in the circle round the hall fire, and not to hesitate to carry the same little lad on his back when the boy grew foot-sore on a walking excursion.

One morning, young Walter of Brieche-side had exhausted his tutor's not very extensive stock of patience by impudently producing a thesis, which bore such plain marks of sloth and carelessness, that its simple production was little short of an act of insubordination. Dr. Thomas did not go about the bush, but beat the lad severely as the students in the colleges were beaten without fail in similar transgressions; and, when Walter showed no symptom of contrition, but behaved like a young rebel, his determined master was proceeding to beat him again.

In the meantime, however, Walter's brother William had carried the tale to Jenny Dalrymple, and Jenny, who was an ally of the boys as well as of their tutor's, on some excuse or other, fluttered into the gallery to which Dr. Thomas's room led, and where for the advantage of space, the execution of justice had taken place, and was about to be repeated.

Jenny craved a word with the tutor, who came and spoke to her, ruffled and irate even where she was concerned, because she had interrupted him in the discharge of a disagreeable duty—and the more disagreeable it was, the more certain Thomas Dundas was of doing it. He came forward to her, bearing the rod still in his right hand; while the dour culprit, a broad-shouldered boy of ten or eleven years, stood raising his shoulders, putting out his lip, and contemplating with a mocking expression, the instrument of torture.

"Gie him nae mair. Let the bairn gang; he is but a bairn," pled Jenny.

"Bring up a child in the way he should go," quoted the dominie with emphasis, but giving way a little at the beseeching woman's face, and the soft grasp on his arm.

"Forby," Jenny was foolish enough to add, not knowing when to stop or how to leave well alone, "he's saftly nurtured, and neither Brieche-side nor the leddy his mither will care for him being dealt wi' just like a common wean."

"Say you sae, Jenny?" exclaimed Dundas hotly; "I admit no exemption in pupil of mine. Gentler blude demands gentler deed. What's gude for Peter is gude for Paul. Come on, sirrah, take your chastisement like a man, at least;" and making a lounge at young Walter in order to inflict a blow, he miscalculated the distance, and came across the lad's cheek, causing it to tingle with pain, and driving the sufferer to an outcry in which the younger brother joined lustily for sympathy, while a fiery weal rose where the stroke had descended.

"Oh, you cruel man, I'll never speak to you again. You'll not pay thrice or you'll pay me," protested Jenny in a tumult of passionate pity and resentment, throwing herself between Dundas and Walter, and clasping the boy in her arms, and crying over him.

"I did not intend to strike there, nor to strike sae hard," apologized Dundas, relenting on the instant, and becoming pale with mental pain and shame.

"What signified what you intended," cried Jenny, "when you see what you did?"

"Let me alone. What business is it o' yours, Jenny Dalrymple?" questioned the young victim in an extremity of petulance and ingratitude, more aggrieved than soothed by Jenny's caresses, and struggling to free himself. "I'm no sair hurt, nor will I roar like a bull segg as Wully is doing, for a paik from him or ony man."

"You see what you've done," insisted Jenny, withdrawing from the scene with feelings outraged on all sides; "you've fallen out wi' me as well as wi' Watty, and you've caused him to fa' out baith wi' me and wi' his brither, and made the laddie twice the Turk he was afore—I hope you're pleased wi' your work."

Jenny was more speedily and surely brought to a penitent frame of mind than was young

Walter. She waylaid Dundas on his way to supper that night, and down-cast and contrite, begged his pardon, and offered to beg it again in the presence of his pupils. "For I did despite to your lawful authority, sir, nor did you deserve sic contumaciousness at my hands, you wha hae been like an elder brither to me, sin my mither deed and we two forgathered here. I hae spoken to the lads already and tried to show them how wrong we a' have acted to our best friend, and they're thinking better o't,' I trust; but I'll do penance if you will, Dr. Tammas, and ask your grace before the bairns to serve as an example."

"Tut, tut, Jenny, I was na free frae blame; the auld Adam had got hold o' me by the lug and the horn, and in my fury I micht hae done the lad some hurt, God help baith him and me! I too have gotten a lesson, and I pray that I may lay it to heart. But what is a hasty word between friend's? The bairns ken that you're but a woman and I'm but a man, an' mark you, Jenny, I'll never strike again when you bid me hold my hand."

CHAPTER VII.—THE HIGHER CALLING.

IN a year Dr. Thomas Dundas, having the good fortune to be named to the mastership of the grammar school of Lithgow, took in wedlock Jenny Dalrymple. He was not unabashed at the adoption of such a step by a scholar—a departure as it was from old rule and precedent which, however vigorously he might condemn them in theory, still unconsciously coloured his practice in life. He was inclined to make excuses for his marriage, as other reformers made excuses for their natural grief at the death of their children. He tried to persuade himself that it was done in the humanity of affording Jenny a shelter, and of withdrawing her from her dependent position at Briecheide, or in the possibility that in his taking orders, he might repeat Martin Luther's active protest against the celibacy of priests. But it was an older, sweeter obligation which impelled Thomas Dundas—that God had given the first woman to the first man; and in pursuance of the natural order, Jenny Dalrymple pleasing Thomas Dundas, he could not choose but seek her for his portion.

Jenny went and dwelt with old Mistress Dundas and Giles, who had professed the Protestant faith in due time with all Scotland, their home being still the old Port-House of Lithgow. Jenny was sweet and provoking too, at times—fond, and faithful, fitfully capacious and exacting withal, while she was growing always wiser and better by God's grace, as she travelled in God's fear, on the great common journey.

It might have seemed that old Mistress Dundas had not improved, since the testiness of age had taken the place of the caution of mature worldly wisdom, but that would only have been because of her infirmity while the grain of mustard seed in the kindness becoming ever more tender, was sending out the shoots still hidden, which would yet be spreading branches in the pure air of heaven.

Giles, likewise, who had in the end managed the house and in-fields for her mother in her brother's absence, proving a boon and a mainstay to the family in which she had originally been a torment, had loved the power which she had learnt to wield honourably, and wondered superciliously that her wise brother should have brought home a weak enough girlish wife whose fair face had appeared to Giles her chief recommendation.

But Thomas Dundas was the centre of these conflicting influences, and the unquestioned head of his household. He could evoke order from disorder, and bring conflicting forces into harmony, because he was a king and priest there, and his women were his fellow-subjects under the great King, his fellow-worshippers under the High Priest, and did not doubt that Thomas Dundas was ordained to be their ruler and teacher in his house and theirs. Thus above, beneath, and around the family in the Port-House was a firmament of truth, love, peace, which spread more widely, and at the same time brooded more closely over them as life advanced. Small grudges and petty offences gradually dissolved and disappeared, as if they had been but idle shadows, while the truth, the love, and peace were the substance and reality.

Seed-times and harvests had dawned and waned on a land marred by strife, since Thomas Dundas had settled as the head of his father's house. The troubles of the country had not touched him and his closely, though the Dundases had been thrilled like others by such terrible public news as those of the ghastly murder at Kirk o' Field in February, and the ghastlier wedding at Holyrood in May. The tidings were followed by those of the battle of Carberry Hill with its royal criminal and prisoner, the escape from the castle in Loch Leven, and the piteous thought of that queenly lass, to whom Lithgow had given birth, a wretched, defamed woman, still in her flower, riding sixty miles without rest, for dear life, and driven to complain that she had been forced to drink sour milk, feed on oatmeal, and be "three nights like the owls;" and when all was done, fain to fling herself desperately on the pride and pity of her rival kinswoman and queen.

Later still, and Lithgow, the Dundas's native town, had been the theatre of a grievous tragedy when Regent Murray—the one righteous man, as men go, among his peers—had been shot down like a dog in the long street by the assassin, Hamilton.

At last John Knox had laid down his burden of worn flesh, dreading fresh days of darkness for the reformed Kirk from the acts of aggression and spoliation persisted in by the state and the nobility. The man who, chained in the French galley, had called the image of the Virgin "a pented brod," and desired to try whether it could swim; who had stood alone in Mary's ante-chamber amidst the dazzling influences of a court, bearing flouts and jeers, in order to assert the cause which was the cause of right to him, was gone, with his many virtues and his faults, to the Saviour in whom he trusted. He left Scotland under a succession of feeble and fierce regents for a helpless infant, in the unsettled anarchy of a new régime, with no rights, whether of Kirk or State, clearly defined; but with the Kirk inclined to dictate to the State, and the State willing to dissemble and defer to the Kirk; while the State kept the Kirk so low in its exchequer, from which the forfeited revenues of the great old abbeys and monasteries had been abstracted by powerful hands, that the ministers who did not follow other professions were exposed to the risk of actual starvation, no tithes being paid sometimes for long periods of years.

It was at this date that Thomas Dundas proposed to add to his labours and obligations by taking priests' orders. He would not be profited by it in a secular light, and, on the contrary side of the argument, he would render himself more amenable to the powers that were established, he would be more conspicuous and obnoxious to those who differed from him, and he would be more tempted to provoke their enmity by executing his commission and vindicating his rights. He had been for years content to walk backwards and forwards, in his gown, and carrying his hour-glass between the Port-House and the grammar-school, to rear scholars. He had issued no "blasts" against prevailing abuses and prominent offenders since he became a schoolmaster and a family man; but now, as a regular minister of the town, he would be called upon to speak and write on all occasions; he would be subject to the rules of his superintendent (in some respects a substitute for a bishop); he would be required to attend presbyteries, synods, and assemblies, and become mixed up with their deliverances, and answerable for them—the serious business and strong measures of the day. As a consequence, he would distinguish himself in debate; incur praise or blame—the blame often enough preponderating; he would be summoned to answer for his opinions before the Regent, the Council, the Parliament, and be imprisoned or banished, while his household fell to wreck and ruin, and his family—parted from their head—struggled wearily, and perhaps sunk and perished in the mêlée, with the hapless family of many another patriot. What marvel that there was a loud remonstrance and an approach to a revolt on the part of his women, when wantonly, as it seemed to them, he devoted himself to the threatened danger.

The family were gathered in one group round Thomas Dundas one autumn evening, when the cruse was lit betimes on the supper-table. Mistress Dundas forgot that her daughter-in-law had taken her own way, and departed from her elder's example in the dress and diet of the children. She plucked at Jenny's sleeve, and pulled her down beside her on the settle, that she might be the surer of commanding the support of her son's wife in the family council. Jenny, for her part, cast into oblivion the fact that Giles had been prone to undervalue her few accomplishments acquired in the Montpellier convent. Jenny, as she now sat with one child in her arms, and another holding fast by her apron-string, craned her neck to whisper into Giles's ear—

"Oh, Giles, you wha hae the gift o' the gab, speak up, for I can just hold out the bairns to him and greet."

"Why go ye to weep and to bræk my heart?" cried the beset man, quoting Scripture in the constant fashion of the time.

"Ye dinna ken when you are weel aff, my son, Tammas," protested the quavering voice of his old mother. "Ye winna leave weel alane. But you were aye masterfu' and camstary, since you but to be a responsible scholar instead of a canny wool-kaimer, like your honest faither. Wae worth the day!

I needna mind, I'll no be lang wi' you to be mixed wi' the rout; but gin you took thocht for your mither, and honoured her as you're bidden', my chap, you would ken that she might like to see your face wi' her failed een—the last thing, and to be avised that your hands would lay her grey head i' the grave."

"He that loves father or mother more than me is not worthy of me," urged Dundas with a groan.

"Gin it were for power to do what you've gotten to do better and more boldly, Tam," insinuated Giles, "I would say naething, though you put that in a balance, and your hame and your folk in anither, and forsook the last. You mind when you departed a brisk laddie for France, I bade you come back a cardinal, or an abbot. Siccan ane might hae had a voice that he daured lift, and an arm that he could wield to purpose. But what can a puir minister say or do that will better the condition o' Kirk or nation? And how is he certain that when kingdoms and Kirks are reeling, his faith will not fail him, and the auld infidel cry o' the auld heathen schools will not come to his tongue, 'What is truth?' and close his lips; while his wavering voice dees out in the roar o' the conflict? Then the man is branded for ever as a coward and traitor. Sic recantations hae come to pass, Tam."

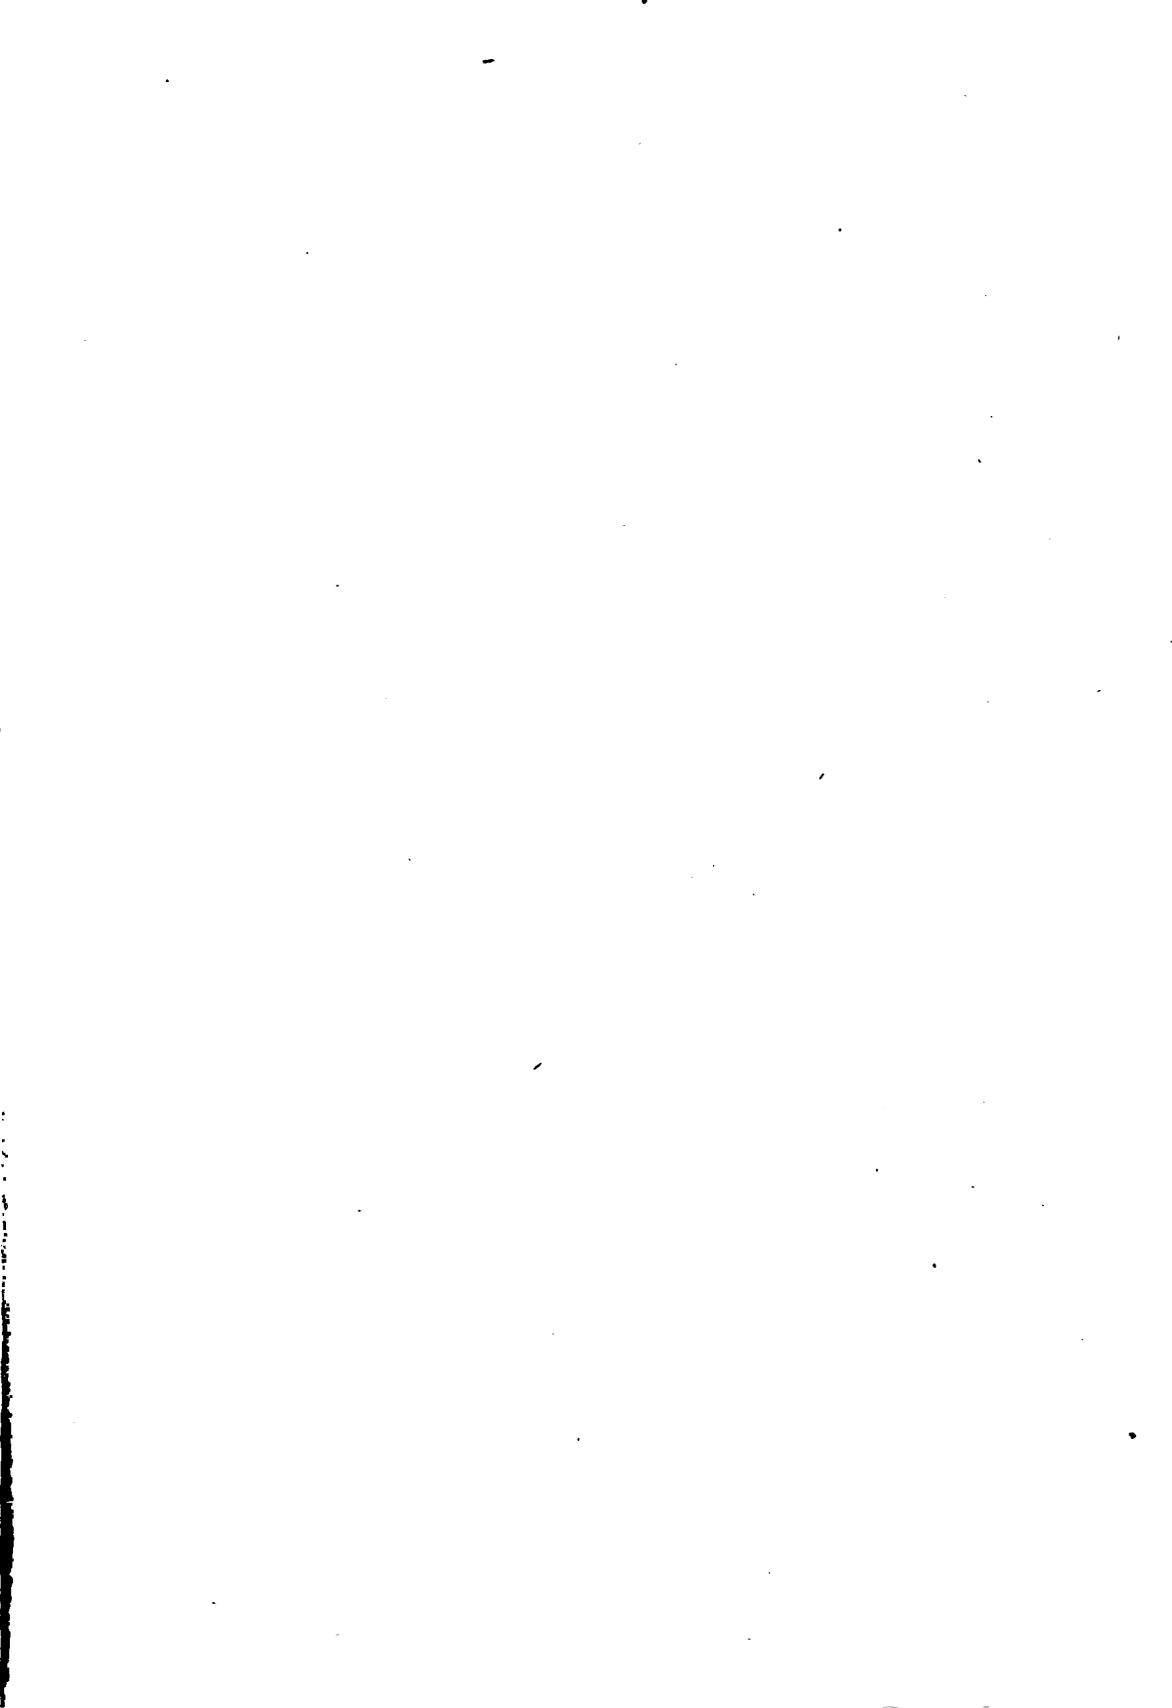

"Alake! alake they have, Giles, and that you should remind me o' them! But the weak things o' the world are chosen to confound the mighty. 'I hae prayed for thee, that thy faith fail not,' was said to a man who gaed out into a wilder storm than this I have to face, and he won the day at last."

"Ither men think first o' their wives and bairns," Jenny reproached her man passionately; "but you are taking this step as gin you had nane belonging to you. What have I or they done that we should be sae lightly held? I hae never murmured, though you were up to your een in books, hardly sparing time to notice when we donned new mantles or kirtles, or to gie us your cracks, or attend us abroad to the Exercise, or the Weaponshaw."

Dundas took lighter ground in answering his wife; he spoke to her with humour shining through the moisture in his eyes. He maintained that she had been frightened by hearing that the Assembly had passed a law by which the reverend body condemned in the apparel of ministers' wives, as well as of ministers, any "vagaries of velvet on gowns," any "superfluous stocking," "all kinds of light and variant hues in clothing, as red, blue, yellow, and sich like, whilk declares the lightness of the mind;" all "wearing of rings, bracelets, buttons of silver, gold, or other metal;" and enjoined that "their hail habit be of grave colour, as black, russet, sad grey, sad brown, or serges, worsted camlet, grogram, lytes, worsted; and sich like." He vowed that ere Jenny had been taken for his marrow, she should have come bound like Lord Ochiltree's daughter, John Knox's spouse, to carry his wallet for him when he grew weary, if the two were destined to play the part of gaberlunzies in that bonnie France, which they both kenned weel, or in the Low Countries. He had never till now fully gone in with Master John in his quarrel with "the Regiment of Women," but at last he saw the force of it.

Then, suddenly breaking down in his pleasantry, Dundas looked round wistfully on the old room in the Port-House, where he had pursued his gambols and conned his tasks with all his might when he was a boy; where he had sat at the head of the board in the master's chair and taken his ease after the day's darg was done, entertained his friends, exchanged confidences with wife, mother, and sister; watched the gambols of his children in their turn, read his book, prayed his prayers, wrestling in spirit with the Almighty. The house-place—the abode of three generations—was very home-like to its master. He had long ceased to miss the glorious blaze of sunshine, the grand and varied features of Languedoc landscape, as well as the precedence which France had over Scotland in civilisation and refinement. Besides, Scotland was fast becoming another Scotland, outwardly as well as inwardly. Floorcloths, Venetian glass and china in the buffets, Scotch edited and printed classics on the book-shelves, were only a few among many improvements. A "Sang Schule," instituted in Lithgow as in every larger town in the kingdom, was frequently heard in melodious practice in the Port-House; purer French than that of Languedoc was spoken freely within the rude walls; the bookman had visitors of his own kind, and he was instructing his little son so that the boy might, in time, read the chapter at family prayers on such ceremonious occasions in the original Greek or Hebrew. Thomas Dundas gazed on the whole scene, with the white gleam of a bountiful harvest moon shining broadly on the window-panes and the opposite wall, while the red glow of the fire and of the cruise on the supper-table warmed the immediate space around him. He looked in turn on his old mother, and on his sister, who was twisted in body, but sharp in mind, and on his comely wife and children, and he hid his face in his sinewy hands, and appealed to the women in accents so reproachful that they were almost bitter.

"Do you, Jenny, and the lave really think that I canna' count the cost, or that I dinna heed that I would cast on the waters a' which makes life worth gin there were any remeid, gin Scotland and the Kirk didna want ilka true man since the truest has gane hame?"

The women sat dumb with consternation, scarcely venturing to glance—awed and shocked as they were—at the agitation which they had helped to provoke in so brave a man.

At length his old mother rose from her seat, tottered to his elbow, pressed her shrivelled lips to the swollen veins on his forehead,—a solemn caress, such as she had not given him since he was a bairn.

"Gang your ways, Tam," she bade him; "you have my love and blessing. Thank God, your ways were aye honourable ways. He will cover your head. Gin I fail to see my son's face on earth, I'll hail it ere long in heaven—my bonnie man."

Giles bent forward to her brother in eager atonement. "I rue my words, Tam. Nae furrow that the plough turns can be spared. What though it works laigh down and in the dark? The stane that the builders rejected is made the head o' the corner. I was ever pridefu' an' cankered, and you were noble frae the beginning."

Jenny hurried her child into its cradle, and hung upon her husband's shoulder. "Never mind, my ain gude man, forget a' I said. I was beside mysel, I forgot mysel, as you ken I was aye fain to do. You ken best—do your wull. I'll be ower prood and blythe to cross the seas, and bear your wallet, gin I'm granted the propyne, or I'll stay ahint and fend for the bairns, and lippen you to your Maister, in the gude cause, for halesome faring and a glad meeting again. Dinna fear ony mair for the bairns and me."

Thus the old scholar's women gained faith—in him, in themselves, in their Lord and King—to send out one of the giants in these days, to play his part and do his duty among his fellow-heroes, whether his duty carried him into turmoil, frays, assassination, lodgings in the Tower of London, or strange banishment—and it was pretty certain to produce one or other of these results. But it was the good cause of the Reformation, and it must conquer, let who would see the conquest. The real bourne, however obscured, was "the high lands" of heaven, as the sublime object, however blurred, was freedom, spiritual and political;—the glory of God, and the good of men.

THE WIDOW'S POT OF OIL.

2 Kings iv. 1—8.

VERY abrupt and striking were the transitions in the life of Elisha. At one time we find him far away from the haunts of civilisation in the desolate mountain regions beyond the south-east shores of the Dead Sea; at another domiciled in the prophet's chamber of the rich Shunammite's house, amid the smiling corn-fields of Samaria. Now he accompanies the armies of Judah and Israel, and is the honoured counsellor of the allied kings; and anon he is engaged in the humble task of a teacher in the school of the prophets at Gilgal. Yesterday he wrought a stupendous miracle which supplied the wants of a whole army, and was the means, more than the sword of Jehoram and Jehosaphat, of subduing the rebellious kingdom of Moab; to-day he works a miracle for the relief of a poor and friendless widow, to save her sons from slavery and herself from starvation. In this respect Elisha is a type of the faithful Christian minister, who has to pass through scenes as chequered, and transitions in their own way as sudden and remarkable,—who, abstracted from common interests and habits, and lifted by his unworldly character and mission above all human precedences, is debtor alike to the rich and the poor, and becomes all things to all men, if by any means he may save some.

To the widow, whose case we have to consider, Elisha stood as the representative of the compassionate Saviour, before whom all the world's glory pales, and whose presence alone can, without disturbance to the order of society, equalise all human ranks and level all their conventional distinctions in the dust. She was in circumstances that made her feel with peculiar painfulness the gradations of rank and the vicissitudes of life. If we are to believe the voice of tradition as expressed by Josephus, she was one who had seen far better days, being the widow of Obadiah, the lord high-chamberlain of Ahab. While her husband lived she breathed the atmosphere of a court, and was nourished in the lap of luxury. But when he died she seems to have been reduced to the utmost poverty. That world which had smiled upon her in the days of her prosperity, now, with characteristic fickleness, turned its back upon her. Her friends forsook her, and refused to help her. She was plunged into debt, contracted in order to obtain the barest necessities of life. Having nothing of any value in the house, the hard-hearted creditor, in lieu of payment, threatened to take and sell her two only sons as slaves, which, by virtue of one Jewish law and the extension of another, he had the power to do. It is true that the period during which slaves could be held in Israel was mercifully limited by the year of jubilee, and that year, which would break every fetter, might be near at hand; but nevertheless, in her position, the enforcement of the law even for the shortest period could not but be felt as a grievous calamity. On account of these trying circumstances, her case was one that peculiarly warranted the interposition of Heaven. But she had another claim still, beside that of her wretchedness, upon the sympathy and help of Elisha. Her husband feared the Lord while he lived. He was the son of a prophet, and cherished the deepest regard for the person and the work of those who filled that sacred office. If he was, indeed, Obadiah, the steward of Ahab—and there seems no reason to doubt the Jewish tradition which thus identifies the husband of the widow—then the sacred story informs us that during the fierce persecution of the prophets of Israel by Jezebel, he took an hundred of these prophets, and, at the peril of his life, hid them by fifty in a cave, and fed them with bread and water during the whole continuance of the famine.

Let us look for a moment at the beauty and significance of Obadiah's devotion on this occasion. Most interesting is it to find that while beyond the confines of Israel, the widow of Zarephath was sustaining the prophet of the Lord by the barrel of meal that wasted not, and by the cruse of oil that did not fail, Obadiah, in the court of Israel—in the very centre of that wickedness which had brought the curse of desolation upon the land—was sustaining the hidden prophets of the Lord by a zeal that never tired, and a patient tenderness that never wore out. We see the hand of God in both these parallel incidents; in the one as clearly as in the other. The replenishing of the widow's barrel of meal and cruse of oil that supported Elijah was the doing of the Lord; the maintaining of the love and devotion in Obadiah's heart, whereby in the midst of almost insurmountable difficulties and innumerable dangers he failed not, for three years and a half, to support the hundred true prophets under his care, was also the doing of the Lord. The one was a specimen of God's working in the field of nature and providence; the other was a specimen of God's working in the field of the human heart; and both are wonderful in our eyes. How striking a proof of God's care for His servants do these two co-related examples afford! There was a curse of drought and famine upon all the land; thousands came to want, and probably perished; but Jehovah's servants were preserved, and had enough to eat and drink. An unclean bird and a heathen widow—a Baal-worshipper from Jezebel's native country—ministered to the wants of Elijah; a courtier, a servant of Ahab and Jezebel, ministered to the others.

Obadiah's devotion on this occasion may have greatly encroached upon the provision which he may have been making for his family after his death. He may have spent upon the prophets of the Lord what he meant for his own wife and children. That the expense of feeding such a multitude for such a long period must have been very great is at once apparent when we consider that food was all the time at famine prices; and also that in order to convey this food to the hiding-places of the prophets he must have employed many servants, paid them well for their work, and perhaps even bribed them to conceal it lest it should come to the ears of his mistress, and prove fatal to the prophets and to himself. Like Joseph in Pharaoh's court, like Daniel in Babylon—the upright and pious chamberlain in the palace of Ahab did not take advantage of his opportunities of enriching himself; the officers of eastern monarchs have often done. On the contrary, he spent his fortune in benefiting the needy, and died poor. On this ground his widow might well appeal to Elisha for assistance. If he who had given at the risk of his life and with the loss of his substance bread and water to the starving prophets of the Lord, might now in the persons of his representatives, in great straits, expect a prophet's reward.

Elisha willingly acknowledges the claim. He is filled with pity for the poor broken-hearted widow. He recognises in her case features of resemblance to those of the widow of Zarephath, whom his great master befriended in her time of sore need. But her circumstances are more pitiable still. The widow of Zarephath was in all likelihood a common peasant woman, who had never known any reverses of fortune, and her extremity, when Elijah met her, was the common fate of all, for the famine was sore upon all the land of Syria and Palestine, the chief centres of Baal-worship. But the widow of Obadiah was reduced from affluence and high rank to penury and social degradation. She was one whose lot is a thousand times harder than that of those who have always been poor; and her extremity of destitution was exceptional,—it happened in the midst of plenty—she was the one poor among the many rich. Further still, the widow of Zarephath had her son with her to share her last meal; but the widow of Obadiah was about to suffer the loss of the only compensation which God had left to her—she was about to be separated from the objects of her love and left alone. Her two sons were about to be sold into slavery to pay her debt. It was this last hardship that caused her cup of misery to overflow—that drove her a suppliant to the feet of Elisha. Who knows what terrible privations she underwent without complaining while she had the company of her sons to cheer her! But when they were about to be taken from her, she could no more hide her suffering. She must get help, else she will die.

Elisha's first question to her evinced a wonderful knowledge of the human heart, and of the best mode of dealing with poverty and suffering. Instead of volunteering to give her aid at once, as most persons would have done, carried away by an overpowering impulse of compassion at the recital of the tale of sorrow; like a wise and judicious friend, he inquires how far she herself has the power to avert the threatened calamity—"What hast thou in the house?" His assistance must be based upon her own assistance. He will help her to help herself. And this is the only true way to benefit the poor. By reckless and indiscriminate almsgiving, by wholesale gifts of money, we run the risk of pauperising the objects of our charity. Our assistance should therefore be of such a nature as to call forth the resources which they themselves possess, and to make the most of them. However small these resources may be, they should be used as a fulcrum, by means of which our help may raise them to a better condition. The first question which we too should ask the widow or the destitute is—"What hast thou in the house?" No help from without can benefit, unless there be a willingness of self-help within. Of course such a mode as this of administering charity is more troublesome, and requires a greater expenditure of time and self-denial, than the plan, which is far too common, of throwing a dole to a beggar to get rid of his importunity, and to save ourselves the annoyance of his wretchedness. But putting him in the way of helping himself will be truer charity than any gift of money.

The widow of Obadiah had nothing in the house save a pot of oil. Was this oil grown by Obadiah during his lifetime—the last of the produce of his olive-yard? In all likelihood it was all that remained of the once extensive property of Ahab's steward. Out of this last pot of oil—the sign of her uttermost poverty—Elisha furnished the source of her comfort and happiness. Like Elijah, who made the handful of meal and the cruse of oil already existing an un-wasting provision for each new day's want; like a greater than Elijah, whose miracle of the multiplication of the loaves and fishes took its point of departure into the supernatural from the common barley loaves and fishes before him, so Elisha in the case of Obadiah's widow made the produce of nature and of man's labour the basis of his wonderful act. In the fables of all nations we are told that a magician, by a mere wave of his wand, or by pronouncing a certain charm, produces at once wealth and luxuries that had no existence before. Aladdin rubs a ring, and immediately a genius appears, and at his command provides a rich feast for him out of nothing. He rubs an old lamp, and at once a gorgeous palace rises up before him in substantial reality, created out of the formless ether around. By putting on Fortunatus's wishing-cap the lucky possessors of it can get anything they want, and create things unknown before. But there is nothing like this in the miracles of the Bible. The prophets and godly men of old were no such magicians as these. Their most wonderful works are in beautiful accordance with the wise laws of labour and economy which pervade the ordinary arrangements of life. Even the miracles of Christ, which approached nearest to creations out of nothing, rested upon a fulcrum of existing materials, by means of which their supernatural leverage was exerted. We nowhere read that He created anything which had no existence before. Such a miracle would have been contrary to the analogy of His whole work of redemption. Jesus on earth was a Redeemer, not a Creator. He came for the purpose of removing the curse of sin that lay upon the old world, which He had created once for all, and which He had pronounced very good; and not for the purpose of making a new world. He came to make all things new—not by a new creation, but by the purification of the old; and the miracles of Elijah and Elisha, as well as of St. Peter and St. Paul, were all wrought for the same purpose, and in conformity with and anticipation of this glorious restitution of all things.

The Gospel miracle which most nearly resembles the multiplication of the widow's oil by Elisha, is the miracle of the loaves and fishes. In both cases the properties of the articles remained the same, and their substance only was extended. In both cases the point of departure and the completed result of the miracle were articles in familiar use among the people. Elisha simply multiplied the common olive oil of the widow into the common olive oil of the country, neither better nor worse. Jesus simply multiplied the common barley loaves and fishes of the fisher-lad into the common barley loaves and fishes which formed the ordinary fare of the disciples. In both cases the miracle was based upon the ultimate result of man's labour. The oil in the widow's pot was the juice expressed, out of berries gathered, from trees planted, grafted, and tended by man's toil and skill. The bread in the fisherman's possession was baked by man's hands, out of barley sown, reaped, gathered, threshed, and ground in the mill by man's skill and labour; the fishes were equally the produce of human industry and special knowledge. These examples show to us that even in miracles man must be a fellow-worker with God in subduing the earth, and in removing the limitations and disabilities of the curse. And this idea is further illustrated by the command laid by Elisha upon the widow to furnish vessels for the miraculous oil. "Go borrow thee vessels abroad of all thy neighbours, even empty vessels; borrow not a few; and when thou art come in, thou shalt shut the door upon thee and upon thy sons, and shalt pour out into all these vessels, and thou shalt set aside that which is full." This procedure is exactly similar to that of the disciples in distributing the loaves and fishes to the multitude—to that of the servants at Cana in drawing the water and bearing it to the governor of the feast. To common sense these actions might seem absurd; and, therefore, men were enjoined to do them in order to prove their faith in God—to show that they could have implicit confidence in His word, even in regard to things which might appear contrary to reason and experience. In these actions men prepared themselves by the miracle wrought within them—the triumph over natural unbelief and the objections of reason—to believe in and to benefit by the miracle about to be wrought without. They heated the iron as it were which the hammer of Omnipotence was about to strike and to mould for His purposes.

The widow of Obadiah might well be astonished at the command of Elisha. If she had stopped to reason about the procedure required of her, she might well hesitate to undertake it. Taking a common-sense view of the matter, of what use would it be to borrow as many vessels as possible from her neighbours? What answer could she give them if they asked her what she meant to do with these vessels? Would they not laugh at her if she told the prophet's message, and ridicule the utter folly of the whole story? Would she not seem to herself playing at a child's game in pouring her pot of oil into the empty vessels? Did any one ever know of any good coming of pouring oil from vessel to vessel? The quantity could not possibly be increased by the process. The pot of oil would still be only a pot of oil, though spread over a thousand vessels; and yet, in spite of all these apparent absurdities and impossibilities—in spite of all the objections of reason and common sense, the widow hastened to obey the prophet's command. She stumbled not because of unbelief. Her faith triumphed over all difficulties. She had implicit confidence in Elisha's word, although she knew not what he was about to do; and in this way she proved herself to be a fit subject for having the miracle performed for her. She fulfilled the condition upon which alone a miracle can be wrought—"Believest thou that I can do this?"

It is a significant circumstance that the prophet should have commanded the widow to shut the door upon herself and her sons, when she poured out the oil into the vessels. There is a reason for, and a meaning in, every detail of the Bible miracles; and doubtless the design of this apparently trivial injunction was to secure to the widow the privacy and calmness of mind necessary for the performance of the miracle, and for its producing the full and proper impression upon her own soul. If she had left the door open, the neighbours doubtless, moved by curiosity to see what she would do with the vessels she had borrowed, would flock around her, and sadly discompose her mind by their laughter, their sneers, and their unsuitable remarks. Reverence, stillness, and solitude are needed for the miracle, and therefore the door must be shut, and the unsympathetic world must be excluded. It is not in the crowd that God works his wonders in nature and grace—it is in the lonely place, to the solitary individual. Who is it that sees the grander revelations of nature, but he who turns his back upon the human multitude, and seeks communion with her alone in the sanctuary of her hills and desert-places? It is to Moses, the solitary shepherd who led his flock to the back of Horeb, and turned aside to behold the great sight, that the burning bush appeared. It was before Elijah in a cave, in the same wild, lonely region, that the terror and the mercy of Jehovah passed by in the whirlwind, the fire, and the still small voice. We must enter into our closet and shut the door, if our prayer is to be indeed such a communion with our Father who seeth in secret, as will transfigure us into His likeness, and make us, when we come out into the world, strong to do and bear all His will. In two of the mightiest miracles of Jesus we see strikingly manifested the different treatment given to humble reverence and to rude unbelief. The boisterous crowd of hired mourners were put out of the house of Jairus, and they saw not the mighty miracle which Jesus did. If they had not laughed Him who is the resurrection and the life to scorn, they might have obtained such an outlook into the life beyond the grave in that house, as would have enabled them to laugh death to scorn. While, on the other hand, we read that when Jesus touched the bier of the widow of Nain's son, the bearers stood still. They were struck by a sudden consciousness that they were in the presence of One who had a right to stop them, even in their progress to the tomb; and they waited silently and reverently for what He might say or do; and they had the unspeakable privilege of witnessing the mighty act which would in future change for them the shadow of death into the morning.

But, besides being necessary in order to prepare the widow of Obadiah for receiving the benefits of the miracle, the solitude and secrecy which Elisha enjoined were significant of the mysterious character of the miracle itself. It was withdrawn from sight. It was silent and unimaginable. It was veiled in the same obscurity as all creative acts—as all beginnings. It was out of darkness and in darkness that the world was created; and it is in darkness that all the natural processes that approximate most closely to creations take place. The seed germinates, or, in other words, multiplies itself in darkness; animal life begins in the mysterious secrecy of the womb; formless matter crystallizes in the sunless caves of the earth into more than the glory of living flowers. Who catches the exact moment when the evening star first twinkles in the transparent blue? Who has noticed the unfolding of the full-blown rose from the bud? God's arm wrought unseen for Israel in the bosom of the dark cloud which rested over the Red Sea all the night; and in the morning the dry path was revealed between the crystal walls of water. The veil of darkness concealed the falling of the manna from heaven; and the dawn only disclosed it as it whitened the tawny sand of the desert around the tents of Israel. We cannot trace beginnings, or behold creative acts; they are hid in the secret place of God's thundering; they are kept beyond all our researches in the hiding-places of God's power. Verily God hideth himself—shuts, as it were, the door upon all his origins and commencements, and leaves us baffled outside. Science, and religion, and all life bring us back to an unfathomable mystery—a closed door, whose magic "Sesame" no human being can utter.

How great must have been the astonishment of the widow when, pouring into the first vessel a quantity of oil from her pot, the vessel filled immediately after the first few drops; and the same thing happened as she passed from vessel to vessel, each filling to the brim as soon as she poured a little from her own store into it; until at the end, pouring the last remaining drops into the last vessel, her own stock of oil and the supply from heaven failed together. She could not understand the extraordinary occurrence, though it took place under her own hand. The process by which the oil was multiplied we, too, labour in vain to conceive. We cannot explain the phenomenon by the observation of any known laws; and yet in truth the miracle is not more strange, save in the rapidity with which it is effected, than that which is every day going forward in nature in those regions where the olive-tree grows. You sow the seed of an olive-tree; that seed contains a very small quantity of oil. It grows and becomes a tree, and produces an immense quantity of fruit; so that from the little drop of oil in the small vessel of the seed, you have thousands of vessels in the shape of the berries, each filled with oil. He who makes the olive-seed in the course of a few years, or the olive-tree every season, to prepare and extract oil from the scanty soil on the arid rocks, and the dry burning air in which the tree delights to grow, concentrated, in the miracle in the widow's chamber, the slower processes of nature spread over months and years, into the act of a single moment. Of course the natural process does not explain the miracle, but it is a help to our faith. The one sheds light upon the other. The miracle teaches us that the natural process is not the result of an impersonal law or of a dead course of things, but the working of our Father in heaven; while the natural process in its turn shows to us that God in the miracle is working in the line of the ordinary events and dispensations of His providence.

Awestruck and filled with amazement, the widow went and told the man of God what had happened. She asked for counsel in the strange and unexpected emergency. She needed assurance of the reality and permanence of this marvellous good fortune. The oil might vanish as mysteriously as it came. She did not know what to do with it. How calmly the prophet receives her! He is not astonished at what she tells him. He knew what would happen. And does not this show a wonderful amount of faith and confidence in God on the part of Elisha? Does it not impart a striking confirmation to the truth of the words, "the secret of the Lord is with them that fear Him." Elisha told the widow to sell the miraculous oil and pay her debt with the price of it, and use what she could not sell as food for herself and her children. This feature of the miracle brings it into close relation with the gathering of the basketfuls of fragments by the disciples after the feeding of the multitude, and the preserving of the fragments for future use in daily life, when no miracle would be wrought for them. Just as the manna blended with the corn of Canaan, and the fragments of the miraculous loaves took their place among the common daily bread of the world, so the miraculous oil took its place among the common stores of the merchant, and served its purpose in the homely uses of every-day life. A price was set upon it, and the oil-merchant could not distinguish it from his ordinary stock. The miracle goes no farther than is absolutely necessary. It does not permanently enrich the poor; it provides only for the temporary necessity. The help of Jesus stops at the point when the diseased or disabled man, by being cured, is able to come up with his fellows and keep pace with them in providing for himself. The miracle blends with common life. How strikingly does this wonderful incident show to us that we must be fellow-workers with God throughout, from first to last, in our own deliverance and blessing. How wonderfully it illustrates the whole Divine economy of grace, under which we are enjoined to work out our own salvation with fear and trembling, seeing that it is God that worketh in us both to will and to do of His good pleasure.

Thus, in a most interesting manner, was the bread cast upon the waters found after many days. The widow proved in her experience the truth of the Saviour's words—"Blessed are the merciful, for they shall obtain mercy;" or, as the phrase should be translated literally, "Blessed are the olive-givers, for olives shall be given to them." Obadiah had poured the oil of his bounty into the afflicted heart of God's servants; and God's servant, in return, gave his widow the oil of joy for mourning and the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness.

I might make many practical uses of the widow's pot of oil, for it is full of significance, but I prefer turning the incident into a parable, and using it as an encouragement to prayer. We are all in the condition of the poor widow; we are destitute of everything and are ready to perish. But God is far more tender and considerate to us than Elisha was to the widow. If we have but the feeling of want, but the desire for God's help, that very want or desire will be to us what the pot of oil was to the widow—the source of an abundant supply of all that we need. If we come to God with the longing of our hearts for His salvation, He will come with the fulness of His Godhead, and supply all our need according to the riches of His glory in Christ Jesus. If we provide vessels, God will furnish the oil with which to fill them. For our own little oil, He will give us overflowing measure; for our feeble desire, He will do exceeding abundantly above all that we can ask or think. Let us borrow, then, many vessels; let them be empty, nothing of self in them; and let us lay them before Christ, and He will fill them to the brim with the oil of His grace. Gethsemane, the place where He suffered the last agony, means a press for olive oil. From that oil-press of sorrow He will provide a sufficient supply of the oil of gladness for us.

THE DEFORMED CHILD.

[“Since our two last articles on London Charities appeared, we have found in a volume of ‘Religious and other Poems,’—by Amanda M. Edmond, a highly gifted lady,—published in Boston, U.S., one called ‘The Deformed Child:’ and this we here present to the readers of the SUNDAY MAGAZINE as a suitable, admirable, and touching appendix to our pleas on behalf of Cripples and Cripples’ Homes.”—THOMAS GUTHRIE.]

CHILD.

MAMMA! the children look at me
 Whene'er I try to play,
 And smile and whisper when they see That I am not as they.

We rambled not an hour ago
 Upon the green hillside;
 I cannot run, mamma, you know,
 But oh! how hard I tried!

Yet I was forced alone to sit
 And see them hurry by;
 I could not help but minding it,—
 You know the reason why.

We tried to catch the butterflies,
 On pinions fleet and free;
 I fell, mamma, and scarce could rise;
 They would not wait for me.

I saw them turn and see me fall,
 I heard them laughing too;
 And so I left them, one and all,
 To come and sit with you.
 I know that strange my form must be,
 Unlovely too; but, oh,
 'Tis hard to have them laugh at me,
 When God has made me so!
 But in the world above, so fair,
 Where no diseases sway,
 Will angel children love me there,
 Or turn, like these, away?

MOTHER.

Oh no, my child! weep not, for thou Shalt be like those in heaven;
 A crown of light to deck thy brow
 To thee shall there be given!

A form most beautiful and bright,
 Beyond the fairest here,
 Too dazzling for a mortal's sight—
 Too pure for sin's dark sphere.

The sorrowing child her eyes upraised ;
Grief's keenest pangs were o'er ;
Upon her mother's face she gazed,
And smiled, and wept no more.

The days of summer, bright and brief
On rapid wings flew by,
And with the autumn's fading leaf
The child lay down to die.

And soon around her early grave
They came to weep in vain
Who, 'mid their childish pastimes, gave Her gentle spirit pain.

O ye who sport in life's glad morn,
The Hand that moulded you
The little ones ye dare to scorn
Hath wisely fashioned too !

Let not one harsh, unkindly voice
Or look to them be given ;
So may ye o'er their graves rejoice
With hope to meet in heaven.

'Tis but the mortal part ye see
That moulders 'neath the sod ;
The soul most beautiful shall be
Before the throne of God.

HENRY LAWRENCE.

SECOND PAPER.

HENRY LAWRENCE'S visit to England had been remarkable for more than the development of his higher nature, and winning the trust of such a wife. He had, as was his wont, gone to school again ; this time, with the Royal Engineers. His Addiscombe training and artillery experience had given him scientific tastes, and he thought he could not spend his sick holiday better than in mastering the Trigonometrical Survey. In this he showed no little foresight. If our Indian administrative system lacked one thing above all in the fruitful period of Lord William Bentinck's government, it was a survey and righteous assessment of the land. In a country of which the Government is sole landlord, deriving half its gross revenue from the soil, the very root of economic prosperity and political contentment lies in a detailed settlement with the peasantry and the large landholders. About 1830, the experiments of half a century had resulted in the conviction that thirty years' leases, based on a careful survey, would alone prove fair at once to the public treasury and the agricultural classes. A Bengal civilian, still revered as Robert Mertens Bird, devised and applied this system to the North-Western Provinces, training a school of young civilians and soldiers, of whom Thomason and Henry and John Lawrence were the most distinguished. Henry Lawrence had just mastered the native languages, and got into the Horse Artillery, when, in 1832, his brother George, then on sick leave at Simla, obtained an interview with Lord William Bentinck, which is thus described : "Well, what have you come for ?" asked the Governor-General. "Nothing for myself." "What then ? I can tell you, you are the first man I have met in India who wanted nothing." The request was that Henry should be appointed to the Revenue Survey. It was done, and the artillery lieutenant became the ablest subordinate of Bird, showing him how to triple the out-turn of work every year, and training many who still fondly look back on him as the man who not only taught them their profession, but gave them for ever a high ideal of both work and belief. For five years Lawrence and his wife lived in camp, surveying almost every field in the districts—each larger than Yorkshire—of Moradabad, Futtchgurh, Goruckpoor, and Allahabad. Arakan had taught him war, and to understand the British soldier. At home he had learned to sound the depths of his own nature and to educate himself. On his return he had mastered the native languages and the technicalities of his profession. And now he knows the people and how to govern them, as he lives in their midst. He is at last equipped to be a ruler of men, though he is only thirty-two. And he is wanted, for the Army of the Indus is assembling.

In August, 1838, when completing the season's survey of the fields and villages of Allahabad, he was officially informed that the 2nd Brigade of Horse Artillery, to which he belonged, was under orders for active service. After he had joined his battery, it was determined that his brigade should remain behind with the army of observation at Ferozepoor. This made him only the more eager for political employment. The famous Bengal civilian, George Clerk (since known in this country as Sir George Clerk, Governor of Bombay, and still member of the Council of India), was political agent at Loodiana, and required an assistant to administer the little barony of Ferozepoor, which had lapsed to us four years previously. Lawrence was delighted to receive the appointment on a smaller salary than he had previously enjoyed. His wife's first act was to propose to the American Presbyterian Mission at Loodiana the establishment of a branch in the new station. In reply to her offer of aid, the Rev. John Newton, the same venerable missionary whose invitation to united prayer, twenty-one years afterwards, was so generally welcomed, concluded his letter to Captain Lawrence with these words: "I should say that Mrs. Lawrence's sentiments about differences of denomination have my cordial sympathy." On this, the equally catholic and evangelical Edwardes remarks: "Yes; there is nothing like a heathen land for drawing Christians together. Differences about bishops look very small under the shadow of an idol with twelve heads." In Ferozepoor, thus consecrated, Henry Lawrence worked for three years, doing with all his might on a small scale what he was so soon to be called on to effect for the whole of the Punjab. For, six months after his appointment, Runjeet Singh died at Lahore, and he virtually became Runjeet Singh's successor. When the old Lion of the Punjab passed away we lost a faithful ally, and the kingdom was given up to anarchy. But before we could respond to the call for our interference, ending ultimately in conquest which we had not sought, and in annexation which we had honestly deprecated, we had to atone for our iniquitous policy and military incapacity in Afghanistan. It was due to Lawrence's ceaseless toils in Ferozepoor, through which the Bengal troops passed, and to his after labours at Peshawur and in Afghanistan itself, that the atonement was not more difficult.

Our vacillating policy for the third of a century, our sacrifice of Persia contrary to treaty and to our own interests, the weakness of the weakest Governor-General ever sent to India, the headstrong selfishness of his councillors both in England and in India, and the senility of inexperienced generals, all culminated in the disasters of the Kabul War. When the great Napoleon—first by himself, and again in alliance with Russia—sought to wound England through its Indian empire, by encouraging Zemân Shah, the Suddozye ruler of Afghanistan, to invade India, we formed a counter-alliance with Persia in the year 1800. Our policy then was precisely that which in recent times public opinion forced on Lord Lawrence, and which was so heartily adopted by Lord Mayo. It was the "buffer" policy; that of so supporting the strong de facto powers all along our border as to enable them to keep back invaders from the north without our direct interference. Afghanistan was against us at the end of last century; but Persia, far more powerful than she is now, was only too eager to work with us. The danger from Napoleon passed away, and the Afghan Suddozye, Zemân Shah, became a pensioner in our own territories. The mayors of the palace in Afghanistan, the Barukzye family, had turned out the royal Suddozyes, and were represented by the ablest ruler Asia had seen since Timour, Dost Mahomed. With France and the Suddozyes thus removed, it was clearly our policy to maintain our alliance with Persia, so as to prevent Russian aggression, and to be friendly with Dost Mahomed, who had overturned our Afghan enemy. We followed the opposite course. We allowed Persia to be swallowed up bit by bit by Russia, contrary to our treaty, and for failure of duty we submitted to the humiliation of paying Persia heavy compensation. This was the act of George Canning, who, like all English statesmen except Pitt and Palmerston, was indifferent to our interests in the East, though at one time about to go out as Governor-General. In Afghanistan, we rejected all the advances of Dost Mahomed, and adopted the cause of the Suddozye rois faibles, to whom we had given an asylum at Loodiana. This was the act of the late Lord Broughton, when president of the Board of Control, and of Lord Auckland. Thus Persia and Afghanistan alike were thrown at the feet of Russia. It is too late to save what is left of poor miserable Persia. The "buffer" policy, adopted in 1868, may yet preserve Afghanistan, while strengthening the new potentate, the Ataligh Ghazee, or Attila, who has ruled over Kashgaria since 1864.

By the tripartite treaty which the English, Runjeet Singh, and the Suddozye king, Shah Soojah, signed at Lahore on 20th June, 1838, and by the mad proclamation of war which Lord Auckland issued from Simla on the 1st of October thereafter, the die was cast. The Bengal and Bombay forces slowly made their way through the passes, Ghuznee fell to young Durand's powder-bag, and the puppet king was enthroned in the Bala Hissar of Kabul. Dost Mahomed was captured and sent to Calcutta, where he drove with the Governor-General's family on the course, and astonished the public by daily at sunset getting out of his carriage to pray towards Mecca. But now incompetent generals were used to avenge an evil policy, and an inevitable attempt to retrench the enormous expenditure in a foreign country, which we were forced to occupy indefinitely, resulted in the assassination of our leaders and the massacre of our forces. Yet, apart from these leaders, never had a country been served by a nobler set of officers, who became the victims of a war which in their hearts they condemned. Major-General Colin Mackenzie, C.B., still lives, and serves in India, as if to show at once how long the greatest services may go inadequately rewarded, and that the race of Puritan heroes is not yet extinct. Of the same type is Colonel Haughton, C.B., who, narrowly saved at Chareekar, now administers the steaming swamps and fertile knolls of North-Eastern Bengal. To his hardships in Afghanistan, of the captivity in which he is the historian, Sir Vincent Eyre added his triumphs in the Mutiny campaigns, and he now rests on his laurels. These and others, like Generals Macgregor and Troup, are still spared in a green, albeit scarred old age, that the youth of our country may see of what stuff the men were made who have built up our Indian empire. But how many of the Afghan heroes are with the mighty dead!

Henry Lawrence struggled hard to be in the thick of the disaster; but Providence, as we now see, kept him back to train him for the founding of a later school of officials—that of the Punjab, and for the toils of the Oudh rebellion. Poor Lord Auckland was superseded by the impetuous and sometimes fickle Lord Ellenborough, whom Durand, the young soldier that had blown in the gate of Ghuznee, tried to keep straight when his secretary. It was then that Durand first learned to admire the kindred spirit of Lawrence, and, with all the vast influence of a Governor-General's private secretary, helped to push him on. The troubles in Afghanistan made it necessary to send Lawrence to Peshawur. Supports had to be pushed up to relieve Sale and the illustrious garrison of Jellalabad. The resolute Nott, with Sir Henry Rawlinson, had refused to evacuate Kandahar. But the first relieving brigade was placed under another incompetent leader, who was told to ask the demoralised Sikh government of Maharajah Shere Singh for guns and auxiliaries. The result may be imagined. Only George Clerk's influence at Lahore obtained the orders for this Sikh force, and it was many months before even Lawrence's tact and energy at Peshawur could atone for the general's inefficiency, or induce the Sikhs to assist. The tide of disaster turned when, neglecting the claims of senility, the Government selected General Pollock to lead the avenging army to Kabul from the Bengal side, while Nott advanced from Kandahar. That General—who so lately died full of years and honour a Field Marshal—was fain to take Lawrence on with him from Peshawur. The Khyber Pass was forced on 5th April, 1842, Lawrence playing his guns from the heights to the admiration of beholders. Slowly did Pollock advance up the dreadful eight-and-twenty miles, only to find, when, on the 16th, he reached Jellalabad, Sale's garrison coming out to meet them with the band playing, "Oh, but ye've been lang o' comin'." Sale's 1,800 men of all arms had driven off the 6,000 Afghans who besieged them. Now Pollock from Jellalabad and Nott from Kandahar, in spite of contradictory orders from Lord Ellenborough, made a race for Kabul, rescued the captive officers, ladies, and children, and returned in triumph.

The mutinous conduct of the Sikhs at Jellalabad had rendered it necessary for Lawrence to be sent for. There he met Havelock, who showed him round the fields of battle and took him to his chapel in the town, where some forty soldiers and twelve officers joined in the extempore prayers and listened to the read sermon of the Captain, who had so recently led to victory one of the columns that had routed Akbar Khan and his Afghans. Lawrence led his Sikhs into action at Tezeen, and, ever true to "the Blues," his own loved artillery, helped his brother officers to lay the guns, which his Sikh cavalry had dragged along. Lord Ellenborough, more just to him than to the noble captives whom he had helped to rescue, rewarded him with the appointment of Superintendent of Dehra Doon, that paradise which the low range of the Sewalik hills shuts in between Mussoorie and the plains of Hindostan. But it was found that only a covenanted civilian could hold that office, in which already the soldier-administrator had begun to plan all sorts of improvements. So Lawrence was transferred to Umballa, with the title of Assistant to the Envoy at Lahore. Thereafter he gained new experience in the settlement of the lapsed territory of Khytul. Finally, promotion came to him in his appointment as Resident at the protected Court of Nepal. In almost as many months he had, to his own disappointment, been moved about four times on the official chess-board. These changes, so evil in ordinary cases, inasmuch as they prevent the individual influence of the English officer flowing forth to a people whom he knows, and who become loyal for his sake, were beneficial in this instance. And now it was rest that he really wanted, though his active spirit chafed at such promotion. The years 1844 and 1845 were fruitful, however, in other forms of action. His essays in the Calcutta Review revealed him as a thoughtful reformer, skilful alike in the highest quality of statesmanship—foresight, and in that which is its basis—the ability to gather the fruits of experience in the study of men and of events. And to these years India owes the Lawrence Asylums.

Only twelve per cent. of the fifty-five thousand men who form the English garrison of India are allowed to be married. This, though a higher proportion than is the rule in Great Britain, is a frightful fact, as all know who are acquainted with barrack life in the tropics. The two military arguments against a married army, that is, an army in which only half the men would probably avail themselves of the permission to marry, are these—the mortality of the women and children in time of peace, and the difficulty created by such impediments in war. The expense need not be noticed, for that is really greater under the present system, if all the effects of that system be considered. Now, in the Indian Army, even under improved sanitary conditions, at least one woman dies annually out of every twenty, and one child out of every ten, to say nothing of ever-prevalent sickness. Such mortality, however, is less to be lamented than the effect of barrack life, on the girls especially. The deduction is not that our Indian army should live in the vilest concubinage by being unmarried, but that the children should be reared on the hills from an early age, away alike from moral contamination and the effects of a hostile climate. No English parents, who can afford to send their children home, keep them in the tropics after they are five or six years of age. If a policy of military colonies on the hills, so modified as to fit into a sound strategical system in the plains, cannot be carried out on a fair scale, at least the children of soldiers may be educated in the sanatoria of the Himalayas and the Neilgherries. Henry Lawrence saw this at an early period. During the single month that he had charge of Dehra Doon, and Mussoori its hill station, he resolved that his first task would be the establishment of what he then called a European charity-school. Again, at Umballa, having Simla in his jurisdiction, he proposed the endowment of such a school at Kus-sowlee, and Sir George Clerk approved. No sooner was he at rest in Nepal than he elaborated his plan, and on 22nd July, 1845, formally submitted it to the Government of India. He said, "My proposal is no sudden freak of wild enthusiasm, but the sober result of long acquaintance with the condition of barrack children, and of the especial degradation of girls." He offered £500 at once and £100 a year, sums which he afterwards far exceeded. He had already failed in inducing the managers of the military orphan schools in Calcutta to remove them to the hills, although he offered £500 for the purpose. After some unwillingness on the part of even Mr. Thomason, Lieutenant-Governor, and of Lord Hardinge, the Governor-General who superseded Lord Ellenborough, his brother-in-law, the scheme was sanctioned amid the smoke of the first Sikh war.

The traveller, who, panting from the hot winds of the plains, climbs slowly the great wall of the Himalayas where it towers up four thousand feet into the table-land of Kussowlee, rests a little on his way to Simla to gaze at the Hill of Sunâwur, which he passes on the road to the next stage of Subathoo, or Dug-shai. There stands the first Henry Lawrence Asylum, a happy colony of soldiers' children, girls and boys, saved from moral and physical death on the plains to feed the educated labour-market of India. Begun in March, 1847, by Mrs. George Lawrence, the Sunâwur Asylum now reckons as its offspring similar institutions at Murree, in the Punjab; at Mount Aboo, in Rajpootana; and on the Neilgherries, in Madras. The Bible without sectarian comment is the corner-stone of the whole system of education, which is industrial as well as ordinary, a principle practically objected to only by Roman Catholic priests, but not by Roman Catholic parents. The children of each sect may receive religious instruction from their own pastors. How near the soldiers' children were to the heart of this great philanthropist, not only the large sums which he spent on them every year, but his last words testify. When dying amid the shot and shell of the siege of Lucknow, he faintly murmured, "Remember the Asylum; do not let them forget the Asylum." And in addition to his expenditure on the Asylum, this Indian officer, without a private fortune and with a family to provide for, spent £400 a year on other charities through one of his almoners, and more through others.

From the solitude of Nepal Lawrence sent his wife to England, while he himself was summoned to that very position on the Punjab frontier in which he had before been assistant. Lord Hardinge had early discovered his ability, alike as a soldier and an administrator, and leaned upon the soldier-statesman all through his term of office. The murder of Runjeet Singh's successor, Shere Singh, was followed by a succession of similar crimes, and finally by the march of the Sikh army across the Sutlej. The battles of Moodkee, Ferozshuhur, Aliwal, and Sohraon were the result. In all it was seen that our Sepoy army and our military system were only just a match for the levies trained by the European officers of Runjeet Singh. Henry Lawrence was by the side of the Governor-General, who had so chivalrously placed himself under the far inferior commander-in-chief at the final victory of Sohraon, and he confirmed Lord Hardinge in his desire not to annex the Punjab. The hopeless task of reconstructing the Sikh Government was tried, and if it could have succeeded, Henry Lawrence was the one man in India to secure success. As it was, the almost fascination which radiated from him kept the kingdom quiet, so as to allow some civilising progress to be made for a time. But it was at the expense of such expedients as the sale of Kashmir and its people to a man like Goolab Singh, a transaction so fruitful in bitter consequences. And even he came to be rather less unfavourable to annexation. But sickness forced him home with Lord Hardinge to receive at last his K.C.B. The inevitable catastrophe came, in the second Sikh War. That converted Lord Hardinge, but not Sir Henry Lawrence, to the necessity of annexation. Lawrence hurried out with his wife at the end of 1848. He saw Mooltan fall, he was in time to convert the drawn battle of Chillianwala into a seeming victory, by prevailing with Lord Gough to remain on the field. He learned from Sir Colin Campbell our success in the last battle at Goojerat when he was again taking charge of his office as Resident at Lahore. Lord Dalhousie was Governor-General.

We now come to what Lawrence himself considered the turning-point in his career. The former Governor-General had consulted him on all great occasions, and had followed his advice. That advice had seemed to be justified by success so long as he ruled the Punjab. The second war he looked on as partly due to his absence. He had carried his point, too, in the sale of Kashmir to Goolab Singh, a chief whom even Edwardes had described as base beyond conception. What he did not see was that it was only his personal influence which had prevented failure at an earlier period, and that the time was past even for that influence. John agreed in the inevitable; and on the 29th of March, 1849, the Punjab was proclaimed British territory. Yet such was Lord Dalhousie's regard for Henry Lawrence, that he had delayed this proclamation, and he refused to accept Lawrence's resignation of the Residentsip. The government of the Punjab was entrusted to a Board, of which Henry, with special charge of political matters, was President. The other members were John, with revenue and finance as his department, and Mr. Mansel in charge of the judicial administration. For a time this worked well. Accepting annexation, Henry could not but feel a little bitterness, even though he had been kept in office to make the change as easy as possible for the demoralised Khalsa or Sikh brotherhood. The moment that our comparatively rigid, because equal and just, system of administration came to be applied to a chaos in which might had been right, and riot had wasted a noble peasantry, John could not help seeing that the period of a sentimental regard for the spawn of Runjeet Singh's court must not be indefinitely extended. On this point the brothers divided, and Lord Dalhousie sided with John, as he could not help doing. There was, in truth, no alternative between a return to Henry's favourite plan of a protected Sikh government on the purely Asiatic system, and a financially sound administration in that elastic form of the Anglo-Indian system known as "non-regulation." The result has justified Lord Dalhousie alike in the loyal support given by the Punjabees to the Empire in '57, and in the annually growing prosperity of the people and their chiefs. Much as I admire the sentiment of Henry Lawrence's policy, which only he could have worked, I marvel still more at the delicacy with which Lord Dalhousie conducted his part of the relations which ended in the breaking up of the Board and the honourable transfer of Sir Henry to Rajpootana. Lord Dalhousie's reputation can afford to wait for justice; Henry Lawrence's can suffer no abatement even in the eyes of those who differ from him on this point.

When, in such circumstances, Henry Lawrence closed his four years' administration of the Punjab, he wrote a letter to John showing undiminished affection. The secret of his chivalrous self-abnegation, combined with impetuous zeal for what he believed to be right, will be found in the following passage from a journal, written amid the bustle of administrative work as he sailed down the Ravee, and at a time, the 2nd of October, 1852, when his official differences with his brother and the Governor-General had reached their height.

"O Lord, give me grace and strength to do thy will, to begin the day and end it with prayer and searching of my own heart, with reading of thy word. Make me to understand it, to understand thee: to bring home to my heart the reality of thy perfect Godhead and perfect humanity, and above all of my entire need of a Saviour, of my utter inability to do aught that is right in my own strength: make me humble, reasonable, contented, thankful, just, and considerate. Restrain my tongue and my thoughts; may I act as ever in thy sight, as if I may die this day. May I not fear man or man's opinions, but remember that thou knowest my motives and my thoughts, and that thou wilt be my judge. It is not in me to be regular: let me be so as much as I can. Let me do to-day's work to-day, not postponing, clear up and finish daily; so living in humility, thankfulness, contentment."

The removal to Rajpootana, like the promotion to Nepal years before, had at least the attraction for Lady Lawrence of possible rest. But Mount Aboo, the hill sanitarium, was rarely visited by Sir Henry. He spent even the hottest months in camp, for the Anglo-Indian disease, the crave for work as a refuge from the climate, and disappointment, was on him. Soon the necessity for sending their second boy to England wrung the strong woman's heart. Her last letter was to her boys at home. To her loving exhortations the father added this postscript:—"Remember how much your mother's happiness—indeed her very life—is in your hands." In a few weeks she departed, looking out for those letters from her boys which arrived two hours after she breathed her last, and repeating her daily prayer for them, that they might live to be good men, honest and straightforward in word and deed, kind and affectionate, and considerate to all around, thoughtful and pitiful for the poor and the weak, and those who have no friends.* Such is the tragedy of many an Anglo-Indian household. May each be irradiated as Henry Lawrence's was with the presence of the spirit of Christ. The memory of Honoria Lawrence is fitly enshrined in the little chapel of the Asylum, at Sunāwur, by a stained-glass window, and an inscription on a monumental slab.

The stricken husband plunged still more deeply into work. In one of his letters he states that Lord Dalhousie offered him the newly-created Chief Commissionership of Oudh, which was annexed by orders from England in 1855. Sorrow and sickness probably led him to decline a position which he eagerly accepted from Lord Canning eighteen months after, although the doctors had ordered him home. It was unfortunate for the new province, and for himself, that he was not its ruler from the first. Had he organized the administration as sole governor, there would have been no rebellion in Oudh, probably, and its great barons might have been used, like the Punjab chiefs, to help us actively in crushing a purely military rising. But the north-west civilians, entrusted with the administration, grossly mismanaged the land settlement, and quarrelled among themselves. Even General Outram's military and political arrangements were condemned by Sir Henry Lawrence as worse, for that noble soldier would enlist no Sepoys or policemen who had not been in the ex-king's service, while the troops, the unprotected magazine, and treasury were scattered over a wide area. When, at the end of March, 1857, Sir Henry reached Lucknow, he found discontent in the city and throughout the country. His European force was hardly 700 strong, and the military arrangements were thus defective. This was the result of the neglect of Lord Dalhousie's orders, due to the interval between the departure of a strong Governor-General and the time when his successor could govern for himself. But such was the magic of Henry Lawrence's name, such the effect of his firm but loving rule, that "in ten days" the mass of the difficulties disappeared.

But side by side with the local discontent there was, throughout all Northern and Central India, the mutinous spirit of the native soldiery. At Berhampoor and Barrackpoor, in Lower Bengal, and then at Meerut and Delhi in Upper India, the storm had burst. From the beginning of the cartridge excitement, Lawrence saw the extent of the danger, and the best way of meeting it. "He told me," says the ablest of his staff, "that nearly the whole army would go, that he did not think the Sikhs would go." His policy was to segregate the Sikhs and selected men from the mutinous mass. He placed the artillery with the European infantry, he distributed the discontented irregulars, he garrisoned the fort called Muchee Bhawn, he prepared the Residency. In directions and personal intercourse with the native officials and troops he attached to himself many who afterwards helped us, and neutralised the hostility of others. By the 17th of May, one week after the fatal 10th at Meerut, his military re-organization was complete, and he awaited the storm in calm confidence. Ever thoughtful of others, he encouraged General Wheeler at Cawnpoor, and so comforted Lord Canning, that he looked on him as "a tower of strength." The English Government quietly nominated him provisional Governor-General. When, on the night of 30th May, the outbreak came, it was fitful; it had been discounted. But in the out-stations of the province, the Sepoys were triumphant; the great landholders, while occasionally giving refuge to the English fugitives, were acquiescent. At Cawnpoor the Nana Sahib had shut in Wheeler, and had already butchered several. On 31st May the mutineers had been driven northwards from the city of Lucknow. On 29th June, worn out by constant toil and vigilance, and overruled, it is believed, by rash advisers, Sir Henry Lawrence marched out of Lucknow to reconnoitre the insurgents at Chinhut, some little distance from the city. He had only 336 white troops and 11 guns; his 220 natives went over to their brethren. The reconnaissance became an attack, the attack a rout, and Sir Henry Lawrence and the garrison were shut up in the enclosure of the Residency which he had prepared for the worst contingency.

On 1st July an eight-inch shell burst in Sir Henry's small room without injury. When urged to leave it for a safer he laughingly replied that the enemy had not an artilleryman good enough to send another after it. Round shot followed later in the day. The 2nd of July he spent in withdrawing the garrison of Muehee Bhawn to the Residency amid the dreadful heat of that season, and at eight P.M. he lay down in his clothes exhausted. He was again urged to go to a lower room. His nephew lay on a bed parallel with his. As he was directing alterations to be made in a memorandum which was being read to him by Colonel Wilson of his staff, the fatal shot came: "a sheet of flame, a terrific report, and shock, and dense darkness." Colonel Wilson fell stunned, and on recovering consciousness could see neither Sir Henry nor his nephew amidst the smoke and dust. In great alarm, he twice cried out, "Sir Henry, are you hurt?" The third time there came the low response, "I am killed." Some soldiers of the 32nd rushed in and bore him to a safe room. Then, Dr. Fayer, telling him he had only forty-eight hours to live, had him removed to his own house beside the Baillie Guard Gate. These hours the dying hero spent first in duty—in giving instructions to those who were to take his place. That done, he did not even then think of himself, but called to his bedside those officers whom he knew in private life, that he might tell them the one lesson of his life. "Earnestly he entreated them to consider the vanity of earthly things, and the importance of living unto Christ while life and time were granted to them. He exhorted them not to set their hearts on the transitory pleasures, or honours, or riches of the world. . . . He spoke most humbly of himself as having failed to do what he ought, though he had tried; spoke of himself as unworthy, and died, I hope and trust, a humble, good Christian, none the worse for being a soldier of the centurion's stamp, who did not deem himself worthy that our Lord should come under his roof." These words were written by Sir Henry Durand as he took them down from the lips of Dr. Fayer, the Christian physician, soon after the relief of the garrison. They have new interest now, since Sir Henry Durand was himself, when Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab, struck down by a still more terrible death when passing under the low gateway of the frontier tower of Tank. Of all the great men it has been my privilege to meet, these two Christian soldier-statesmen are the greatest. Of both we may ask, with Durand himself, when commenting on that death-bed, "Will God prosper the soldier's sermon?"

The Residency of Lucknow, like the area around the massacre-house and well of Cawnpoor, is now a sweet garden-cemetery, amid the foliage of which the long beleaguered ruins look like some old cathedral. There lies all that is mortal of Henry Lawrence under a simply massive tomb, which speaks of him only as one "who tried to do his duty." When last I visited the hallowed spot his brother John, standing as Viceroy of India on the terrace of the Residency, which overlooks the plain of the Goomtee, was receiving homage from all the chivalry of Oudh! The national memorial of Henry Lawrence, a marble statue, has its fitting place in St. Paul's. With Durand we may best apply to him his own favourite lines from George Herbert:

"If soldier,
Chase base employments with a naked sword
Throughout the world. Fool not; for all may have,
If they dare try, a glorious life or grave."

I.—NOTES AND COMMENTS.

THE NEW CRUSADE.

THE greatest difficulty in saying anything special in favour of the new crusade for the suppression of the slave trade in the East of Africa, is the impossibility of conceiving anything that can be said against it. Peter the Hermit, if he were here, or rather the noble crusaders of Clapham who originated the truly heroic enterprise against the slave trade of their time, would find that not even a dog would now bark against them. Obviously, this is due in a considerable degree to the fact that not a single subject of Queen Victoria, so far as is known, far less any influential section of her people, has the shadow of a secular interest in maintaining the accursed trade. Don't let us flatter ourselves too much. Don't let us dream that Christian philanthropy has made such rapid progress that what was denounced in influential quarters in the days of William Wilberforce is cheered to the echo in the days of his son Samuel. Suppose that there were in these islands a hundred thousand persons deriving profits from the slave trade of East Africa to the tune of hundreds or thousands a year, should we not have a tolerably keen opposition? If it were proved that the traffic in drink is doing as much harm as the slave trade, would there be the same unanimity for its restraint or suppression?

But passing from this, it is most gratifying that the English people have shown a determination to bring to an end the system which Livingstone has never ceased to expose and denounce. A few weeks ago, we gave our opinion in these columns, that the best way in which the nation could show its appreciation of Livingstone, was to take steps for the suppression of that abomination. And now these steps have been taken. Sir Bartle Frere, whose emphatic testimony in favour of missions in India we have before this submitted to our readers, has been appointed the head of a mission to Africa, and by universal admission, he is the right man in the right place. His first errand is to endeavour to revise our existing treaty with the Imaums of Muscat and Zanzibar, under which all the efforts of our cruisers in opposition to the atrocities now practised are laughed to scorn by the Arabs. Not allowing us to interfere with slavery in their dominions, the treaty permits us only to stop ships that are exporting slaves abroad, say to Persia or Arabia; but as such ships always manage to have papers pretending that they are only trading from one port of their own country to another, the right of search, and the fear of prevention are reduced to mere nullities. The report was, some time ago, that the Imaum of Zanzibar, who would be a great loser by the suppression of the trade, was to receive a money solatium to compensate for his loss. This, however, is no necessary part of the programme, although, from the circumstance that Sir Bartle Frere has advocated the proposal, it may be presumed that is among the contingencies which are not unlikely to occur. It must be well seen to, however, that the nation gets value for its money; it would be tantalizing in the last degree if we were saddled with a payment of eight thousand a year only to find that though put a stop to in one way, the traffic was as active as ever in another.

Nothing, certainly, can be more appalling than the atrocities we read of. Few readers of Livingstone's books have forgot the print representing the string of negroes fastened to one another by logs and chains and what not, driven on by their captors with far more barbarity than a herd of cattle. The memory refuses to let go the thought of wretches overtaken by sickness or fatigue loosened from the gang and left to die; of infants torn from the arms of their mothers, and of obstreperous members of the company knocked on the head or murdered in cold blood. Not less harrowing are the accounts of the voyage performed in ships constructed so as to conceal, as far as possible, the nefarious traffic to which they are put. What nameless atrocities are involved in the fact that of the captives taken in Africa not more than one in seven or one in ten reaches the scene of his future bondage alive! Unhappily, too, the East of Africa is not the only part of the globe cursed with this infamy. The murder of Bishop Patteson has drawn attention vividly to the horrible development of a like system in the South Sea Islands. Is there really no limit to the covetousness of man, or to the atrocities which he coolly commits on his fellow-creatures through lust of gain? What a lurid light these proceedings throw on the corruption of human nature! We should like to ask how the theory that sin is a mere weakness, an imperfection, a result of the limitation of man's nature, will hold water side by side with the facts said to have been confessed recently in a fit of remorse by the captain of a slaver, whom a dangerous illness brought near to death. His ship, cruising about, contrived to fill its hold by first sinking canoes, and then picking up the men. Proving refractory in the hold, these men were fired on promiscuously from the deck, fifty were killed and twenty wounded; all thrown in cold blood into the sea next morning. In another case—occurring on the East of Africa—a captured vessel had in its hold a horde of negroes, many of them children, lying in filth and bilge-water of the most horrible description, and many in misery with small-pox! At first, when the disease broke out, the persons infected were flung into the sea each morning; but when it was found that the disease was not to be stamped out, they were left to their fate, to die or live as might be. Well did David say, "Let me not fall into the hands of man." O wolves, tigers, hyænas, rush from your dens on these poor negroes before they are captured, and rather let your fangs make an end of them at once than that they should fall into the merciless clutch of their own brethren! O Britain, Christian Britain, arise to the rescue, and vow before God to give no sleep to thine eyes, or slumber to thine eyelids, till these nameless horrors are reckoned among the things that were!

THE TROUBLES OF THE LONDON SCHOOL BOARD.

We cannot say that it surprises us to find the London School Board in trouble. Our astonishment would be quite the other way; if it had no troubles we should say that it could be doing little good. A coach travelling through a jungle, and sending forward its own men to hew down the trees and make the road, may expect from time to time to become motionless. School boards cannot expect to be able to dispense with the lessons of experience,—a teacher who has in her classes as many wise men as fools, and the wiser they are the more need do they feel for her lessons. We are truly sorry, however, that the hitch should seem in connection with ragged schools and gutter children. There is no doubt much to be said on both sides of the question. Which is the better method of dealing with these? Ought gutter children to be absorbed into the common schools of the Board, and made to sit alongside of other children? or ought special schools to be got up for them? or ought the care and custody of them to be left to voluntary effort? All the sides have their advocates, and for each there is considerable strength of argument. That ultimately the ragged schools will be absorbed into the general system, we do not doubt. As Lord Shaftesbury has remarked, the mere payment of the fee is a small matter; the great consideration is, that many children, now earning their own bread, will be withdrawn from the occupations which enabled them to do so. We must say, however, that we have very much sympathy with Lord Shaftesbury in his regret that the ragged school system should have been virtually abolished before any right substitute has been found for it. The Board ought surely to have paused before virtually bringing to an end a class of schools that have constituted a memorable chapter in English history. Around the ragged schools there has been gathered a remarkable amount and quality of Christian beneficence. These schools represent an incalculable amount of that yearning philanthropy which no act of parliament can call into existence, but which is liable to be scattered when compulsory rates begin to be established. Even if some better substitute can be found for the schools, that substitute will not be able to keep alive the spirit of Christian love which for more than a quarter of a century has kept these schools in operation. Lord Shaftesbury's eulogy on the movement is worthy of all consideration:—

"Whether those who received the blessing or those who imparted it were the happier, I cannot say; but of this I am sure, that the rise and fall of the Ragged-School effort will be an epoch in the history of England, and almost, indeed, of the human race.

"It will be remembered—at least, I hope so—that the Governments were careless, and politicians ignorant, and the busy world absorbed in the pursuit of every form of enjoyment, some thousands of the less wealthy sort, from the easy tradesman to the wretched needlewoman, came forward, in a long succession of some thirty years, to give their hearts and their efforts, their nights and their days, to rescue these forgotten children for time and for eternity. And all this, too, without fee or reward beyond that which rose out of their holy and Christian career.

"It will be remembered, perhaps, that they gave, during the period, to more than half a million children an education imperfect, it is true, but one vastly better than nothing at all; that they took off the streets and sent into various departments of service at the very least 200,000 of these cast-off creatures, who would otherwise have been the curse and dishonour of society. And most certainly it will be remembered,—if ever such a time arrive in this realm of England,

When nations slowly wise, and meanly just,
To buried Merit raise the tardy bust,"— that when the dissolution of the system drew nigh, these self-denying labours and Christian achievements, which have staved off so many evils, reared such good citizens, and, indeed, made the present movement possible, were dismissed, coldly and contemptuously, by those in authority, without a sentiment of gratitude or a word of honour."

ECHOES OF CONGRESSES AND CONFERENCES.

Monthly magazines can so ill keep up with the rapid rush of events, that when they wish to take note of what is a few weeks old, it is almost necessary to catch up the echoes of the proceedings, the original sounds having died away. There is, however, one advantage in this; it is the most enduring notes that awaken echoes—those that have made the deepest impression on the public mind. Surveying the proceedings of public deliberative bodies a little while after they are past has this advantage—it enables one to gather up the leading currents of thought; to see what are the subjects about which the deliberative bodies have been most deeply interested, and to preserve any valuable suggestions that have been contributed towards important problems of the day. Congresses and conferences are now as thick in the autumn months as leaves in Vallambrosa. We have had the Leeds Congress, the Congregational Union, the Baptist Union, and diocesan conferences almost without number. It is natural for all these deliberative bodies to occupy a considerable share of time and attention with interests peculiar to themselves. It is at the same time their custom, more or less, to look around, and discuss questions of universal interest, applicable to the whole Christian community and interesting to every part of it. Let us note two or three of the leading topics of this kind, and see what contributions have been made towards them.

CHRISTIANITY AND SCIENCE.

The relations of Christianity to science and civilisation were fully considered at the Leeds Congress. Without specifying names, we note some points of value that have been brought out in relation to this, premising, however, that the papers and speeches were all on the Christian side. 1. Recent discussions on science have had the effect of dissipating credulity, or readiness to believe the marvellous: 2. men now do believe any thing marvellous, the presumption is that they have found more solid evidence for it than might have been considered necessary in a previous age.

2. Some scientific men have been showing a tendency to abandon the patient method of inductive science, and to take to speculative hypotheses instead of well-ascertained theories. They have been giving up Bacon for Des Cartes. This has been the cause of much of the disturbance to religion; the more they can be kept to the inductive method, the less danger both to science and religion. One speaker referred to the fact that Mr. Darwin had been refused admission to the French Academy, because he was considered to be of too speculative a turn.

3. The remarkable zeal in the investigation of God's works of which this age affords the spectacle is in itself a good and interesting thing.

4. So also is the separation of what is certain from what is uncertain in our knowledge which the rigid inquiries of the age promote.

5. The Christian doctrine of the resurrection of the body is interesting in relation to the physiological doctrine of the connection of mind and brain. It is not said anywhere in Scripture that the separate state is more than provisional and temporary. It is the resurrection state that is the permanently glorious state. The vile body is to be changed into a glorious body when the Lord comes again. There is no trace of the Manichean doctrine that the highest state is to get quit of the body altogether. The doctrine of the resurrection is eminently a doctrine of Christian revelation. "When he spake of the resurrection some mocked." Yet this very doctrine may, perhaps, stand in intimate relation to the doctrine of the brain and nervous system which is perverted by some to the denial of the very existence of God.

6. In reference to the proposal of prayer for the ward of some hospital, one speaker threw out the interesting thought that some of these very hospitals may have owed their existence to prayer—may themselves have been originated in answer to prayer. Another remarked that even if prayer for a certain ward were to be followed by an unusual number of recoveries, the unbeliever might still refuse to believe that this was done in answer to prayer, because it would come about through natural second causes, and there would be no visible evidence of anything supernatural.

VITAL RELIGION AND SOCIAL MORALITY.

There is a deep feeling very widely spread that the springs of the spiritual life need to be replenished, and that the results of real vitality would appear speedily in a higher tone of social morality. In other words, attention needs to be turned both to the roots and the fruits of the spiritual life. One important matter that concerns both roots and fruits is the observance of the Sabbath. At a meeting of working men in connection with the Congregational Union, the remarks of Mr. George Potter, who has long been before the public as a zealous working men's advocate, were full of interest. Outsiders are apt to suspect the religious character of all who are prominent in such movements, but we have cause to know that in many instances the state of the case is otherwise. That most unfortunate joke of the Bishop of Gloucester, when he advised the peasantry to commit to their horse-pond any one who should come to speak to them of their social condition, betrays the common notion as to the principles and character of such. It is only an act of justice to mark the very different tenor of Mr. Potter's view of the Christian Sabbath. No institution, he said, had been more blessed to the labouring man's welfare than the Sabbath. To it England owed her happiness, her prosperity, and her liberty. Where there was no recognition of the Sabbath, crime, immorality, and ignorance abounded. But where it was rightly observed order prevailed, morals were promoted, people were elevated, and the nation exalted. The Sabbath gave working men the opportunity of meeting their fellow-men, whether they were rich or poor, in the presence of their common Father, where they might confess their sins and infirmities, and their faith in a common Saviour. But for the Sabbath, where would there be any recognition of our common brotherhood, and of our equality before God? It would not be for the good of the country to devote the Sabbath to labour or amusements. About the lawfulness of using it for recreation, he had not a clear opinion, but he observed that it was not from working men who attend places of worship that the desire came that museums and picture galleries should be open on the Sabbath. It was not necessary to go to these places on that day, and he would have Christian people to encourage the short-time movement, in order that workers might have time on other days. Let every preacher and teacher meet that movement by telling the working men that they wanted them to have their time in the week to get recreation, and leave the seventh day for worship, as it would conduce to their rest and their welfare here, and to their prosperity in the life to come.

We can think of few things more desirable or important than that the working classes should lay to heart such counsels as these, at this very important crisis of their history.

[We had intended to notice some other points in connection with recent meetings, but our space for the present forbids.]

II.—OUR LETTER DRAWER.

EMPLOYMENT FOR SUNDAY EVENINGS.

"To the Editors of the SUNDAY MAGAZINE."

"Bromley, Kent, Nov. 8th, 1872.

"I think 'An Evening of Sacred Song' has not been among the suggestions you have received for a Sabbath evening's occupation. I was present last evening at Bromley at a kind of service, to which this name was given, entirely conducted by Mr. Phillips, the American Pilgrim. The good work that he is engaged in has probably already come under your notice. The service was opened by a short prayer. Then Mr. Phillips read the passages of Scripture as given in the programme, after which all were invited to join in the following hymn. Then six solos were sung by Mr. Phillips. Between these he spoke a few affectionate words, and told one or two stories, all bearing on the words he had been singing. At the conclusion all were invited to join, and told how to do so, in the first set of choruses on the programme. The way in which these invitations 'to join in' were responded to by the audience was very striking. Might not some such service as this be not only very attractive, but a means of great blessing on a Sabbath evening in our large towns? It probably would be difficult to meet with many who were able physically, as well as willing, to do what Mr. P. does. Of course, he has a remarkable voice, and remarkable strength; but surely some there are possessing the former who would be willing to devote their talent thus to the Lord's work; and arrangements might be made for dividing the labour, or even introducing reading between the songs.

"Good readers are very rare amongst well-educated people. I have noticed how willingly plain, intelligent reading is listened to by the lower classes. I believe, in village reading-rooms, such a reader is most eagerly listened to by those who are supposed to come to read for themselves. The class of listeners in large towns would be of a different stamp, no doubt, to these; but would not good reading of the 'Pilgrim's Progress,' for instance, or 'The Holy War' prove attractive; or even of simple stories—'Wee Davie,' or 'Drops of Oil,' and 'The Prince in Disguise,' in the Golden Ladder series? I once tried the effect of 'Drops of Oil' (which is only intended for a child's book) on some labouring men. They were entranced, and would have stayed any length of time to hear the end. They were fair readers themselves, and very intelligent. This is, again, only country experience, still it may not be altogether worthless.

"M. C."

[We are familiar with Mr. Phillips's labours, having heard him at work both in this country and in America. We regard his "Evenings of Sacred Song" as eminently delightful and useful, with only one qualification—that we think that the plain statement of divine truth ought to be more prominent, and not to be introduced merely to fill up a little space between the hymns. We should be delighted if others to whom the like gift of song has been given, would follow the example of Mr. Phillips.

We may remark, at the same time, that "Evenings of Sacred Song" do not need to depend on a single voice. A Christian choir might be formed for the purpose of conducting such evenings. We think it is our esteemed friend and contributor, Dr. Ker, of Glasgow, who has set agoing some meetings of this kind. He calls them "Praise Meetings." They are spent mainly in singing; but expositions are given by the presiding minister of what is sung; and thus the whole is conducive to the advancement of the interests of divine truth.

There can be no doubt that the singing of hymns is often a means of awakening and conversion. In one of the early numbers of this magazine, reference was made to the conversion of a young lady in a ball-room, through the singing of that song in Tennyson, "Too late, too late, ye cannot enter in." Singing, we believe, has been far too little used as a handmaid to home missions. The danger is, lest it supersede preaching. This, as we have said, must not be allowed; but singing as a handmaid to the proclamation of God's message, may be greatly blessed.—ED. S. M.]

III.—GLANCES AT WHAT IS DOING ABROAD.

FRANCE.—M. WALLON'S BOOK ON THE COUNCIL.

France seems as if she were unable at present to take an interest in anything but matters of political excitement. Even the Lourdes pilgrimages attracted popular attention chiefly, it is said, because of the alleged monarchical complexion of the feeling promoted by them. Meanwhile, as testified at Nottingham by M. Pressensé and from Rome by the Abbé Michaud, the Catholicism of France is becoming more and more identified with Ultramontanism and Jesuitism. In the home of the Gallican liberties, of Dupanloup and others, the old Catholic Congress at Cologne has hardly been heard of or discussed. But that the old spirit of the National Church is not entirely extinct, has been proved recently by a vigorous work by M. Henri Jean Wallon, known as a liberal Catholic politician. His work is entitled "La Vérité sur le Concile," and contains criticisms on the arguments by which the doctrine of Infallibility has been supported in France, and compilations of the remonstrances and protests signed by French, German, Italian, and American bishops against the doctrine of Infallibility. The result is little in favour of France. The brave words led to no brave deeds, and only the feeblest bulwark has been reared against Infallibility in France.

OPINIONS ON THE ALT-CATHOLIC CONFERENCE.

There are some things about which it is not less important to know what the actors did than to know what other persons think of their doings. Those especially who have spent their lives in examining religious movements, and who have acquired no little insight into them, and no little skill in forecasting their issues, will always be listened to most attentively in reference to such things. We have got four witnesses of this kind (more or less) at the door; we propose to call them in and hear their testimony. The first is:—

who holds the chair of Church History in the Theological College of the Free Church in Edinburgh. He has contributed an article to the Presbyterian, in which he expresses his belief, that, although the movement professes to be based solely on objection to the Infallibility, "a leaven is working in the body which will inevitably determine very considerable changes, and these will probably be all the more resolutely gone through with, because they are cautiously undertaken." On the other hand, he sees "no evidence that the Old Catholics have been led to make any material approach as yet to the main elements of the Evangelical Reformation Faith. They appear still to bear the mint stamp of the Church from which they have separated. They still, apparently, ascribe to the Church the position of authoritative interpreter of Scripture, although they refuse to recognise her voice in any recent councils. They do not appear to have altered their view of the Sacramental system, and of the dependence of salvation upon it. They show no approach to a Protestant doctrine of Justification. But one may see among them the evidences of a strong desire after healthy operation of religious influence on common life, and a strong impatience of mere ignorant superstition. This, if it lives and grows, may modify their views; the demands of a healthy practice leading to a sounder theory. One may see among them also a disposition to stand on the utterances, and to propagate the influence, of Scripture; and this, if it lasts, will tell still more powerfully. Finally, they constantly appeal to the imperative necessity of following Christ, whatever men may think or say, and whether, in the view of this world, they succeed or fail. This is the most hopeful symptom of all. May the gracious Lord whom they desire to follow, lead them into his own Truth, and so employ them for his service and glory."

Our next witness is the late

DR. MERLE D'AUBIGNE.

One of his latest acts was to express at Geneva his deep interest in the Alt-Catholic movement, and to prepare the address of faithful Christian counsel to which he made reference in his remarks:—

"The religious movement we have been considering," he said, "claims our sympathy; the Old Catholics are doing well. It is not a small matter for them to separate themselves from the Papacy, so dear to all Roman Catholics. The work appears to be of God; consequently, I think it our duty to approach them with the expression of our sympathy and affection. But we cannot do this better than by respectfully pointing out that in which, according to our judgment, the work is wanting." He then proceeded to show that, to accomplish the object desired by the Old Catholics, the glory of Christ Jesus should be made prominent; that which glorified Him magnified Him. And it seemed to the speaker that the Old Catholics needed to be told two things: first, that they should establish themselves on the divine and supreme authority alone of the Holy Scriptures; and secondly, that there cannot be any real religious life in the Church, or true reform, but by the work of God's Holy Spirit. After enlarging upon these points in a lucid and powerful manner, he expressed the wish that, as one of the practical results of this Conference, a letter, embodying the views just explained, might be drafted and adopted, and then sent to the President of the Old Catholics, and that special prayer should be offered for the divine blessing to accompany the reception of the document.

who naturally looks at the movement with High Church eyes, and rejoices very much that it is not of a Protestant kind. A Protestant movement would, in his view, have been equivalent to the entire abandonment of the Western Church to the lies and abuses under which it groans. Dr. Littledale rejoices that the Alt-Catholics propose no such course. They wish to exert an influence within the Church, and therein he thinks they are right. The whole cast of their movement, in his view, is of this kind, and he rejoices in it. Having been at Cologne, he speaks (in the Contemporary) of the singular enthusiasm of the Cologne people for the movement. Cologne is a very Catholic city, but there could be no mistaking the feeling of the congregation of four thousand, mostly men, who appeared at the public meetings. "Men got up one after another, and with all the power of eloquence, learning, sarcasm, wit, and indignation, denounced abuses in the Catholic Church, and found every telling point received with rounds of ringing applause."

One other witness remains—

author of "Religious Thought in England"—a member of the Broad Church school. Mr. Hunt was likewise at Cologne, and greatly interested in what he saw and heard. To him the movement wears the aspect of a revolt of reason against authority. He thinks that in another form it manifests the germ of the movement in the Broad Church and elsewhere for giving to human thought its due place in connection with religious questions. But he seems to feel that it is only the faintest tinge of this spirit that can be discerned in the movement, and that its promoters are a long way, indeed, from seeing the real issues that must ultimately arise from the position which they have assumed. It is to be noted that, as far as the intention of the promoters is concerned, they are as far as possible from wishing to give the movement this direction.

THE FULDA CONGRESS.

The interest of Protestant Christendom has been so much concentrated on late on the Old Catholic organization, that it requires some effort to give our attention to the Catholic Church on the majority. For, while the other German governments have done little directly to countenance the claims of the Old Catholics to be the historic Catholic Church, the Prussian Government has recently very emphatically and practically protested against the attempts of the Infallibilist authorities to regard the Old Catholics as aliens.

The measures of the Prussian Government have been the occasion of a Congress of Infallibilist bishops at Fulda. The memorial published by them, written professedly in the interests of peace, has been generally looked on as a declaration of universal war, and has created a storm of indignation and opposition. The public is especially incredulous as to their allegation that the present difficulties have come on the Church "suddenly and unexpectedly."

But for us, probably the most remarkable result of this memorial lies in the disclosures that have been made—in the tergiversation of these bishops, who, after long opposition to the dogma of Infallibility, have at last succumbed. Of these there are several amongst the subscribers to the memorial: and of that number Hefele, Bishop of Rottenburg, is one of the most notable. It has always been known that long after the promulgation of the dogma, he maintained his strenuous opposition to it; but he issued no such statement of his position after the promulgation till the publication, a week or two ago, of a letter written by him on the 11th November, 1870. In this letter he declares, in the strongest terms, his repudiation of the dogma, and his regret at the want of resoluteness on the part of some of those who were at heart opposed to the doctrine of Infallibility. Nothing can be more amazing and saddening than the attempted explanation he has since given of the progress of the mental conflict which ended in his "sincerely subordinating his subjectivity to the highest Church authority."

IV.—JOTTINGS FROM THE MISSION FIELD.

Everything about Madagascar is interesting, and we are glad to find from the report of the agent of the Bible Society that a large number of copies of the Bible, or parts of it, has been disposed of. "We have many indications," he says, "of good being done—crowded congregations—hundreds learning to read—and new congregations forming in all directions. Our danger is lest our churches should be flooded with men who join us only because Christianity has become the popular religion. We have now 300,000 adherents: most of them have only attended Christian services since 1869, and know very little of the real character of the religion they have adopted. And what are all our instructions among such a mass?"

It is gratifying to learn, from a recent speech by the Rev. George Sargeant, Wesleyan missionary, that of late years Jamaica has made remarkable progress in social well-being. The disestablishment of the Church had been the means of good; it had drawn out the laity and produced a state of healthy activity. He passed a high eulogy on a native minister, once a slave, called Edward Fraser, a man whose rare intellectual ability, truly noble Christian character, and hard and successful labours, must have placed him in the front rank of the men whom Wesleyan Missions had raised up in any part of the world. He never saw a man who exemplified more the excellencies of the Christian character than Edward Fraser, the converted slave. He resolved to build a chapel and mission-house; and, after obtaining the stone and wood with great difficulty, sold his library, which he had been accumulating for forty years, in order to finish the building. He had received the mournful intelligence of his death since he (the speaker) came to England. He died just as he had lived, in the full triumph of faith as it is in Jesus.

Among the indirect results of missions in China may be named a great desire for books. Such works as "Herschel's Astronomy" are greatly prized. The Report of the Peking Hospital for 1871 states that—

"The books most in demand have been Hobson's 'Complete Medical Works,' in five vols.; the 'Pou-wuh-sin-pien,' a treatise on Natural Philosophy, one of the set having a large separate circulation; Dr. Martin's 'Natural Philosophy,' Mr. Edkins's 'Mechanics,' Prof. Li's various Mathematical Works, 'Herschel's Astronomy,' and Mr. Wylie's 'Mathematical and Algebraical Works; Muirhead's, Way's, Condit's, and Lu's Geographies (the latter is a well-known work by a Chinese official); Kerr's 'Chemistry and Materia Medica,' Pin's 'Travels in Europe,' Edkins's Map of the World, &c. The latter has had a very large circulation, and is well adapted to give the Chinese correct ideas of the relative size and position of the various countries of the globe, and to dispel their long-cherished but false notion that China is the 'Middle Kingdom.' Its circular character must be a standing denial of their belief that the earth is square. History, ancient and modern, will be an invaluable aid to this proud people in helping them to understand clearly what they are. Officials and people—the former may not care to acknowledge it—are yearly becoming more anxious to know still more about foreign countries and relations."

A translation of the Bible into Sanscrit has been completed. It was first projected and executed by Dr. Carey. A new translation was afterwards projected, and it has now been completed by an old German missionary, Rev. J. Wenyer. Mr. Wenyer says:—"I have felt as if the Sanscrit Bible was a luxury, and the Bengalee one the bread of life. But I trust that He who has led me to undertake the task will not allow it to remain unblest, and that the labour will not be in vain in the Lord."

V.—OUR LIBRARY TABLE.

The Ordnance Survey of the Peninsula of Sinai is one of those complete and handsome works which show that there are still men among us who can both work and pay for an idea. Among the endless financial schemes that have been poured upon the public of late years, no one has ever suggested Sinai as the scene of so much as one; nor is it readily conceivable how anything there could be made to pay. It is all the more interesting to find men who combine the love of the Bible with the love of science, and add to these the enterprise of travellers, setting out to explore the famous Peninsula, and coming home to make us acquainted with all that they have found. The Report is in five handsome folio volumes—the first containing an account of the survey; the second, maps, plans, and sections; the third, fourth, and fifth, photographic views. The public are greatly indebted to the late Rev. Pierce Butler, the originator of the expedition; the Rev. George Williams, Captains Palmer and Wilson, and Mr. E. H. Palmer, by whom the investigations have chiefly been carried on.

So far as biblical matters are concerned, this survey has done little more than confirmed the conclusions arrived at more than twenty years ago by Dr. Edward Robinson and other biblical writers. The interesting question, Which is the real Sinai?—the peak on which the Lord descended, and from which He uttered the law of the Ten Commandments—is decided in favour of the traditional Jebel Musa, but the peak selected is not the traditional one, but the north-west summit fixed on by Dr. Robinson, called Rás Sufsáfah. At the bottom lies the plain Er Rahah, with an area of 1,200 acres, commanding a view of the top, and large enough to have accommodated more than two millions, while in the immediate neighbourhood there is ample space for encampments. The claims of Jebel Serbál, the only other mountain that has competed with Jebel Musa, are set aside. Hardly any new light is thrown on the line of march of the Israelites, nor can it be said that any additional places have been identified of those enumerated in the list of their encampments. From the Red Sea to Mount Sinai, opinions have been divided between two routes—one inland and direct, the other more circuitous, proceeding southwards along the sea-coast, then striking eastwards through Wady Feiran. The surveyors, again following Dr. Robinson, pronounce in favour of the latter route. Though longer, it is easier, and they think that Moses, who knew the desert well, would have known that for leading such a host it was the more favourable road.

The photographs, however, are the great feature of this work, and so complete are they that tarry-at-home travellers are put by them on nearly the same level with those who have looked on the actual scenes.

It is not without some significance that just as Sir Bartle Frere was about to start on that mission, of which we have already spoken, to initiate measures for repressing the East African slave trade, Mr. Stanley's work—How I Found Livingstone—should have made its appearance. Most people will read it for its adventure, of which it is full, and, in spite of the little salt of egotism, will not fail to admire the author's indomitable pluck; and a goodly number, doubtless, will search in it for fresh facts as to sources and watersheds. But the main attraction for us, we confess, has lain in the fair prospects Mr. Stanley opens for extended missionary effort. Ever and anon, across the exciting course of his narrative, there comes a quiet breath of reflection and hopeful anticipation. Amid the records of fevers, losses, desertions, and manifold defalcations on the part of his helpers—of perils and difficulties in swamp, and jungle, and waterless desert—he is constantly emerging on tempting tracts and peaceful villages, which, he says, only wait the advent of the missionary. The Wami River, he tells us, is navigable to light draught steamers for two hundred miles, from Whinde to Mbumi, and could be traversed in four days, conveying the Christian teacher to one of the gentlest of African races:—

"Here is the greenest verdure, purest water; here are valleys teeming with grain stalks, forests of tamarind, mimosa, gum-copal tree; here is the gigantic mvule, the stately mparamusi, the beautiful palm—a scene such as only a tropic sky covers! Except civilised society, nothing that the soul of man can desire is lacking here! From the village of Kadetamare a score of admirable mission sites are available, with fine health-giving breezes blowing over them. Water in abundance at their feet, fertility unsurpassed around them, with docile, good-tempered people dwelling everywhere at peace with each other."

And these are the very races that are being decimated by the rapacity of the lower and more servile. What he tells about the poor Wadoe, who inhabit a tract of country between the sea and Unyamembe, is deeply touching. The slave-traders of Whinde have bribed and armed their more savage neighbours to carry off the wives and children of these Wadoe, and to despoil them. The process has been often repeated. These things should quicken the zeal of the Christian public of Britain; and gratitude is surely due to Mr. Stanley for putting them before us so plainly once again, no less than for his greater achievement of so timeously carrying aid to Dr. Livingstone, and sustaining him in his grand object.

The momentous conflicts that have been going on between capital and labour impart a peculiar interest to a biography which is remarkable in itself, interesting in its authorship, and reasonable in the light it throws on great social questions. We mean Sir Arthur Helps's Life and Labours of Mr. Brassey. Mr. Brassey was well known as one of the great railway contractors of our day, and one of the most extensive employers of labour. He was an eminently successful man, successful in his undertakings, and successful in dealing with men—in so handling those whom he employed as to get them to yield to him a willing and hearty service. Acting towards them with generosity, and making them feel that he trusted them, he touched that hidden spring whereby men are induced to do their best in the work committed to their hands. Whether Mr. Brassey would have been equally successful in dealing with the spirit that has been dominant of late years, we cannot say. Mr. Brassey appears to have acted in life under a sense of responsibility to Him from whom all his opportunities came; and this will probably be found to account for much of the calmness and fairness of spirit by which he was so honourably distinguished.

Mr. Ward Beecher's Lectures on Preaching are lectures in the Beecher style. We say this quite respectfully. A lectureship of pastoral theology has recently been founded in connection with the theological department of Yale College in the United States, and Mr. Beecher has been called to fill it for three years. It is his intention to give a three years' course, and the volume on our table is the first of the three, and bears chiefly on the personal elements which have to do with preaching. It rather talks than lectures about preaching. The lectures were unwritten, and with his marvellous conversational power.

Mr. Beecher had just to pour out the observations which crowded upon him in connection with an art of which he is so great a master. Full of egotism the book is, but Mr. Beecher could not speak of his own art without egotism. To make the pulpit lively and full of force is evidently his aim. Whatever he deems good in the old theology he would throw into modern moulds. Mr. Beecher is a man of splendid instincts, but not of patient thought and careful study. If his book be read with a due regard to his idiosyncrasies, it may contribute much towards making the pulpit efficient, lively, and impressive.

The Man with the Book, by John Matthias Weyland, is an interesting sample of the work done in the poorest districts of London by Christian agents who go into them full of the love of God. The picture of the localities and their inhabitants is evidently from the life. Though the writer has not all the graphic power, and certainly not the finished style which can present such scenes and such people in the most interesting form, he brings their condition before us with great truth, and gives most wonderful instances of the power of the Bible accompanied by God's Spirit to transform and elevate them. Those to whom our own "River-side Visitor" conveys such living pictures of London poverty and ignorance, who may desire to have their impressions corroborated, will meet in "The Man with the Book," with the same kind of people, and the same kind of work. Surely some great good will come ultimately out of all the earnest labours, of which, thank God, we are constantly reading, in connection with these fallen populations.

Thoughts on Recent Scientific Conclusions, and their Relation to Religion, is a series of plain Essays on the Antiquity of Man, Darwinism, the Deluge, and other topics recently stirred in the scientific world. The aim of the writer is to show that there is no real warrant for the conclusions that have been come to so hastily by some in reference to these matters. They can only be regarded as speculations, certainly not ascertained conclusions. The work is written sensibly and clearly, and cannot fail to interest those who read it—only a larger measure of force in the style and grip in the reasoning would have added greatly to its efficiency, and enabled the writer to do more justice to himself.

Lectures on the Re-union of the Churches, by J. J. I. von Döllinger, D.D., D.C.L., appears with a preface by Henry Nutcombe Oxenham, M.A., which we cannot praise. It is written in the highest tone of ritualism, and along with the use which in his dedication he makes of the name of his personal friend Canon Liddon, it will be pronounced, we believe, by all impartial judges to be in singularly bad taste. We have already, in these columns, given some account of the Lectures—their remarkable frankness in many points, their approach to Protestant ground; but their want of that doctrine of salvation which gave to the Lutheran Reformation its great power and glory. Relatively, the Lectures are most interesting; absolutely, they leave the question of reunion pretty much where they found it.

VI.—IN MEMORIAM.

J. H. MERLE D'AUBIGNÉ, D.D.

By the death of Dr. Merle d'Aubigné, French-speaking Protestants have lost their foremost representative, and the Evangelical Church catholic one whose name is familiar in all mouths as a household word. He had reached a green old age; and, passing away during the night between the Sabbath and Monday, his death was probably without a struggle, and like that of Chalmers, whom in massiveness and force of character he somewhat resembled, it was more like a translation than a death. The "History of the Reformation," in connection with which he obtained his first fame, like Gibbon's "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire," owed its origin to a circumstance that might be said to indicate a providential plan. Gibbon, it is said, conceived his work while looking on a procession of monks in Rome; Merle d'Aubigné conceived his when present at the tercentenary of the celebration of the Reformation, at the Wartburg, in 1817. The son of a Geneva merchant, he was on his way from his native city to Leipsic to attend the university there, when he was drawn into the stream of travellers to the Wartburg, to which place he turned aside to witness the commemoration of the memorable day, when Luther nailed his theses to the church door of Wittenberg. Dissatisfied at the spirit of the celebration, he resolved then and there to write the "Life of Luther." Previously to this time, he had come under the influence of Mr. Robert Haldane, at Geneva, and a pointed question put to him by that gentleman was the means of a new life springing up in his soul. His first charge was in 1823 as minister of the French Church at Hamburg. Thereafter he was appointed preacher to the King of Holland, and in 1830 he returned to his native city, where he became one of the founders of the Church of the Oratoire, and Professor in the New School of Theology. Of the services which he rendered to the cause of Evangelical Christianity, it is impossible to speak too highly. He was not only an interesting and successful writer, he was a great man. His very appearance carried weight. He may be said to have been equally honoured for the soundness of his judgment, the consistency and godliness of his character, his research and learning as an author, his fervour and eloquence as a speaker. The place left vacant at Geneva is one for which it is not likely that the French Protestant community will be able to find another such occupant.

LORD KINLOCH,

A devout judge on the bench of Scotland, with a catholic heart, and considerable facilities in sacred literature, has also passed from among us. As a writer, he was enabled to make some very useful contributions to our devotional reading. "Time's Treasure," the first of his works, is in verse, and is written in a vein of evangelical fervour and simplicity that meets the taste of the many. His other works were of similar quality, and have been much appreciated by the Christian Community.

AGAINST THE STREAM:

The Story of an Heroic Age in England.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE SCHONBERG-COTTA FAMILY."

CHAPTER III.

IN these days to be Insular is a reproach which most people repel with indignation. Or if any one admits it with a contemptuous pity as but too applicable, in many respects, to our country, it is always with the tacit understanding that he himself is contemplating that narrow and common-place little community from some wide continent of experience and thought whence the island and its interests assume their duly diminutive proportions.

In my early days people gloried in being Insular. The "right little, tight little island" was delighted in with something of the same kind of attachment an old sailor used to feel for his ship—knowing well her weak points, but knowing also what storms she had weathered, what broadsides she had gallantly stood, and fearless as to the tempests and battles to come; a patriotism not at all tending to anything international or cosmopolitan, but combative, exclusive, Insular to the core.

The Americans were still our "colonies" across the seas; we were fresh from a hot fight with them, in which our national temper had not been sweetened by our having been in the wrong and having been beaten. On most of us the idea had scarcely dawned that they were a Nation at all. They were "our plantations," a branch of the old trunk, vigorous certainly, but very knotty, and gnarled; the vigour of course belonging to the stock they came of, and, (perhaps it must be admitted,) the knots and gnarls also. The echoes of a hundred years before, moreover, had scarcely died away, and in some Englishmen resentment against "rebels" who had disowned the king was blended with a dim disapproval of Dissenters who had tried to upset the Church, and were believed for the most part to be Puritans (whatever that meant), and therefore, naturally, to speak through their noses.

II. N.S.

Again, the French were "a nation of dancing-masters," who, with all their misplaced agility, could not climb the shrouds of a ship. Had not their own Voltaire lately called them a compound of monkey and tiger?

The "German States"—(Germany did not exist, even in popular ballads)—were too remote, and too unknown and varying a quantity to have any definite portrait.

Spain loomed mistily on us, gigantic and yet shadowy, with the old glooms and glories of her past playing fitfully around her, her palaces and prisons still echoing as we believed with groans, under an Inquisition not yet dead; her fleets still recalling the Armada; yet through all, a ghastliness and ghostliness, as if the whole structure were held together by old spells grown feeble, and at a bold touch or word might crumble helplessly away.

Insular! we thanked God in our hymns for it; islanded safe, in our green security, with our glorious constitution in Church and State, our King, our Church, our "wooden walls;" a second "chosen people," better preserved than the first from the various idolatrous nations around. If Israel of old had been guarded by the Straits of Dover and the German Ocean, who could say that things might not have ended differently? But no doubt it was to be. Israel was a stiff-necked people, and we, on the contrary, were always improving ourselves and our constitution.

Of course even then there were a few croakers, who might have repeated Oliver Cromwell's old exhortation, "You glory in that ditch which guards your shores; I tell you your ditch will be no defence to you unless you reform yourselves;" and a few profane wits infected with the levity of France, who did not regard even the Thirty-nine Articles, or our most religious and gracious king as unassailable; and a few democrats who did not consider even our glorious constitution final. But for the most part, even if, when comparing class with class amongst us, we now and then recognised reluctantly that there was some unequal pressure, that there might be some corners which were not quite paradise; when, on the other hand, we compared ourselves with the rest of the world, our self-appreciation was restored, and we became once more sensible of our privileges.

Moreover, not only were we one island, we were in another sense an archipelago of islands.

Not only was England thus islanded from the world. Every country town was islanded from the rest—was a living community in itself, with its own local history and government, local glories and wrongs, its local circle of families established there for generations; not certainly without their mutual jealousies and rivalries, but belonging to each other, by a real and recognised relationship.

And still farther within this inner island was an innermost, like the ball within ball of the Indian puzzle.

In those days every Englishman's "house was his castle," in a more peculiar sense, or at least in a greater variety of senses, than now. A house belonged to a family, was part of its complex existence, more in the same sense that a man's body is part of his complex self. It grew with the family growth, flourished with the family prosperity, decayed with the family decay; and as we die out of our bodies and leave them, so, with a mortality in one sense more pathetic because apparently not inevitable, a family might, by misfortune, folly, failure of succession, die out of the old family house. A house, therefore, had quite a different significance; it had family histories stamped into it, growing out of it; it had features, characteristics, a life of its own.

There are stately mansions of our great families, to which something of this character attaches still. The greatness and glory of the great family is built into them, and they stand.

But, then, this family character attached to countless unpretending English houses, and this not only in country places, to fine old manorial halls, or homely farmsteads, but in the streets of every town. We all of us can recognise those old houses still. They look out on us with pathetic, or quaint and humorous human faces; the humanity that has grown with them and around them, and from them for generations, cannot die out of them. And when we see them left stranded forlorn in some featureless row of windows and doors such as human creatures now swarm and are fed in, until the next hive is ready, we welcome them or compassionate them, not as buildings but as friends.

In such houses were the families of my childhood islanded in the island of our little country town, in the island of our England.

I smile sometimes a little when I see people endeavouring now aesthetically to restore this lost sacredness of houses by means of Elizabethan windows and fireplaces and mediæval texts, and family arms on doors and walls. I think the rush of nineteenth-century life will be too strong for them. Will their children live where they lived, or love what they loved, or think as they thought?

If it is hard to make a lost religion or a lost architecture live again, I think it is harder still to revive a dead habit of social life. But our grandchildren will see.

It is this inmost island of home that I must first picture, before the scene widens to the town and the country in which it was enclosed. All true geography, all geography which would lead to the knowledge, not of names, but of things, must begin, not with the elliptic and the equator, but with the pond in the farm-yard.

The living germ of our town was a Benedictine abbey, one of the finest and earliest in the kingdom. This abbey had been built by the side of a clear rocky river, where the hills through which it cut its way from the moorland opened out so as to leave a little level of rich meadow-land.

Around the church and the conventual buildings, the two solid stone bridges, and the Weir with its deep pool and salmon-trap, whence the town Abbot's Weir had its name, the houses of the town clustered, gradually stretching back over the strip of level to the hills.

Our house had thus been driven to the foot of the steep slope, and had been constrained to make the best of it by all kinds of eccentric devices, climbing here and delving there, until it possessed scarcely two rooms on the same level; to children perhaps the most delightful plan on which a house could be constructed. Its very existence was a continual victory over adverse circumstances, and tended to communicate to its inhabitants, according to the material on which the stamp was impressed, a character either militant and adventurous, or easy and imperturbable, conquering circumstance by resolutely surmounting it, or by accepting its ups and downs as inevitable... and making them part of its own constitution.

The entrance was by a Tudor arch into a broad passage. On the right was a large wainscoted room with a stone floor and one long, low mullioned window with a long, deep window-seat. In this room, as a rule, the family breakfasted, dined, and had all its family meals—all that were not connected with ceremonial and extended to strangers. This also was the nearest approach Piers and I had to a day nursery or playroom, our great resource on any wet days which drove us from our natural territory in the garden; a room into which, even after the régime of my stepmother, Pluto was admitted, and my father's favourite pointer and setter, and that long succession of my kittens which came to such a variety of tragical ends. Mrs. Danescombe's cat, which never came to misfortune of any kind, sleek, impenetrable, demure, resided in the Oak Parlour, approached by a small flight of steps on the opposite side of the passage. Into this we only went by invitation; but that cat had the entrée. A most evil and hypocritical creature we considered her; an embodiment of all the dark side of cat-nature—malignantly breaking all the china and gluttonously imbibing all the dainties, on account of which my luckless kittens suffered, and then sitting upright on the parlour window-seat winking superciliously at all the world.

There were few middle tints in the portraits of our childhood, and among the most Rembrandt-like that comes back to me is the image of my stepmother's cat. All that Puritan meant to the most prejudiced of Cavaliers, or Tartuffe to the most anti-ecclesiastical of Frenchmen, that sleek, stealthy, whiskered black-and-white cat meant to me. It scarcely ever purred. We believed it could not purr; its conscience was too laden with crime. Nor do I remember its ever playing, except once or twice in a murderous way with a fly on the window-pane when it thought no one was looking. Its name was Mignonette, and to this day I can scarcely do justice to the sweetness of the little flower whose appellation it polluted.

The Oak Parlour had a very different social rank from the Stone Parlour. It was my stepmother's especial domain. It was seldom entered by any one until the afternoon, being the scene of leisurely employment and sober amusement, and of all social entertainments not of the stateliest kind. There Mrs. Danescombe embroidered muslin and made lace, or took snuff and played cards with chosen associates, always for small stakes; and there were solemnly handed around trays with small glasses of liqueurs or cordials, or in aftertimes with dainty small cups of tea. No uproarious merriment was ever heard within those precincts; nothing stronger than tea or cordials was ever sipped therein. Seldom did masculine foot invade them. If my father wished to entertain his friends with solid British viands and vigorous British beverages, recourse was had to the Stone Parlour, where also we gathered in the winter evenings on oaken settles or footstools around the great old chimney with its dogs and log-fires. Echoes of Christmas merriment and of children's laughter hung around those old walls; but the wainscoting of the Oak Parlour could never have reported anything more sonorous than the murmured gossip of the card-table, unless some of the players by any series of other people's mistakes or their own mischances lost their game and their tempers, and broke out of the decorum of the place into the hard realities of unfairly lost shillings and sixpences.

There were two sacred things to me, however, in the room.

In the recesses on each side of the high oaken chimneypiece with its carved looking-glass, hung portraits of my father and of my own mother in the dresses they wore just after they were married: he with a bag-wig, hand ruffles, and a sword, and elaborate shoe-buckles, which certainly did not recall his every-day appearance; she with powdered hair brushed over a high cushion, a little hat stuck coquettishly on the top of it, a blue satin bodice and train, and brocaded petticoat, with a large bouquet in the hand laid on her lap, and a shepherd's crook in the other. At her feet was a lamb wreathed with flowers, looking wistfully up in her face. The native Vandyke or Sir Joshua had evidently a confused Ideal compounded of the pastoral and the courtly, and was very familiar with neither. There must have been something very invincible in the character of my mother's face to penetrate as it did at once through the false idealism and the imperfect execution of the painter. For it was evidently a likeness. Underneath a fair, finely-arched brow were distinct though delicate eyebrows, visible far back at the side of the forehead, and overshadowing very large, soft dark-grey eyes. There was much depth in the eyes, but no dreaminess. They evidently saw—saw the lamb looking up into them, and much besides. The mouth was firm and grave; the pose of the whole figure was at once easy and commanding; the small hand, wooden as the painting was, held the crook with a real grasp. You felt instinctively that the visible lamb and the imaginary flock were well cared for under such guardianship. Oh! with what longing I used to look at that lamb lying so safe at her feet!

She sate before me a type not so much of fond, passionate motherliness, as of tender, wise, protective motherhood; not so much of the mother's bliss, as of the mother's care; not like one of Murillo's girl Madonnas dreaming over a new delight, but like one of the earlier Italian school, grave with the very weight of the mother's joy, and with the destinies of the life with which her own was bound up.

For had I not the memory of her touch and her kiss to interpret the portrait? Had not those hands pressed me to her heart, and did I not know how those grave lips could part and smile?

Underneath this portrait stood a little table with a well in it, containing, I knew, my mother's work, and especially one dainty little frill of a baby's cap, unfinished, with her needle in it. Upon it was placed her ebony spinning-wheel. Nurse used to dust it reverently every morning; and often I stole in with her, and then, when nurse was not looking, I used to reach up to the picture and softly kiss its hands.

Every afternoon, when there was no company, I spent an hour in that room with Mrs. Danescombe and the hypocritical cat, learning to sew. But at those times I did not dare to look much at my beloved picture; because, being frequently in trouble with my work, I was afraid if I caught sight of that lamb and of that dear face, a terrible rush of the feeling of motherlessness would come over me, and I should cry. For, once, when I had been very unsuccessful with my sewing, and had had to unpick it several times, this had happened, and Mrs. Danescombe had asked what I was crying for; and I, stretching out my arms to the picture, and sobbing out something about "mother," my stepmother had replied in an even, undisturbed voice—one of her maxims being that "a gentlewoman never degrades reproof into scolding by raising her voice"—

"Bridget, that is something I cannot permit. When little girls lose their tempers over their tasks, I cannot suffer them to deceive themselves by calling their naughty passions sensibility. You have many faults! but I did hope you were a truthful child. Never let me hear you speak in that way again."

And that was a reproach I never did incur again. How it burnt into my heart! Not only by the injustice, but the justice in it. For I was a very truthful child; and it was not only the dull pain of being misunderstood that hurt me; it was the terrible fear that my stepmother, after all, had understood me better than I understood myself. Was she not older, wiser, my father's chosen ruler for us—set over us by all the mysterious powers whence authority springs—authority against which I had not a thought of rebelling? And had I not been in something very like a naughty temper, writing down very hard things against my stepmother, and the bitter fate of little girls in general who had to learn sewing, indeed, even against the Nature of Things which involved clothes that had to be sewn? And was it possible that I had desecrated that love to my own mother, and the memory of her love, by making it an excuse even to myself for being cross and angry?

I certainly had sometimes underneath these perplexities and self-accusations a dim sense, now and then flashing into a passionate persuasion that it was not all my fault. But then, again, I reproached myself again for this.

If the things in Mrs. Danescombe's character which jarred against mine had been angles, the conflict would have been less harassing. But in her there were no angles; there was nothing to lay hold of; it was simply coldness, smoothness of surface, hard polish, and impenetrability; and what "case" could be made out of these? She never scolded, or threatened, or punished. She simply reprovved. Her severest discipline was a distant politeness and a peculiar way of calling me "Bridget." What was there cruel in that? Yet it froze into my bones. And there were times when her mere presence was to me a prison worse than the darkest of the dark holes nurse threatened us with. It was not until long afterwards I learned why.

Her government was based on suspicion. She was not theological in any sense; she had no extreme theories of the depravity of human nature. But she had a deep-seated conviction that every man and woman, and more especially every servant and little child, was more likely to do wrong than right, and more likely to do wrong from the worst motives than the best.

Combined with this, or perhaps flowing from it, was a remarkable keenness of perception as to any defect or mistake, in anything or person, from a speck of dust or rust on the furniture, to the smallest solecism in dress or manners, or the least excess or defect in demeanour.

Therefore she never praised; partly because she thought commendation nourished vanity, and partly because in the best work she always detected some petty blemish, not imaginary, but real; yet, however small, sufficient to distract her attention from all that was good on it.

It would have been a difficult atmosphere to grow in, but that we had a large space of life free from her inspection, and an element of positive freedom, warmth, and breadth in my father, which, I suppose, would scarcely have done alone.

Only I have often thought that my mother's character would have been the supplementary opposite as my stepmother's was the neutralising contrary of my father. My mother's character would have drawn out and filled up all that was highest and best in his. Mrs. Danescombe merely repressed and neutralised. With her he was, perhaps, restrained from doing or saying some things better not done or said; with my mother he would have become all he might have been. Both made some kind of harmony, but with my mother all the life would have been larger, richer, fuller.

CHAPTER IV.

At the end of the passage was a wide staircase with black oak banisters, which led to the Best Parlour, an apartment provided with furniture altogether

"too bright and good For common nature's daily food:"

where from week to week the amber damask curtains and tapestried chairs were pinned into thick coverings, and the carpet was rolled up on one side, and the gilded sconces on the frame of the small round looking-glass were veiled, and the Venetian-blinds were closely shut.

This was the inmost sanctuary of Mrs. Danescombe's domain. In my mother's time it had not been furnished, and I had faint memories of its having been abandoned to us as a play-room; of wild games there with my father in winter twilight, and of delicious terrors, half-real, half-feigned, as he sprang on us from dim corners with awful growls and roars, in the characters of lion or bear. Moreover, outside there was a balcony which was a delightfully romantic place, whence the world assumed quite a new aspect, a borderland which was neither indoors nor out-of-doors, where all the life of the street moved before us in a continual procession, better than any picture-book.

But now all this was changed, and we only entered the room at all on the very highest days in our very best, and therefore most harassing, clothes; and would as soon have thought of venturing into the pulpit of the church as into the balcony.

Behind this were the principal bedrooms, looking on an inner court, and then a flight of rather ladder-like stairs leading to the first platform of the garden, on which opened the Summer Parlour. This was my father's special retreat, the corner of the house which he succeeded in defending against all the assaults of Order, and keeping freely open to us.

In this room we had the rights of citizenship to the fullest extent; everything was open to us; and, in consequence, everything was sacred to us. We were trusted and believed in; and to have hurt anything my father cared about would have been to Piers or me, naturally, the direst of misfortunes.

My father's principles of government and views of life were the very contrary of Mrs. Danescombe's. His expectation was that every one belonging to him would do right, and everything would go right; and if, contrary to expectation, any one did wrong, or anything went wrong, he was wont to attribute it to the best possible motives, and resume his sanguine anticipations, unbroken. Not, perhaps, an altogether adequate principle for government on any large scale. Although I remember being smitten with a far keener repentance by being misunderstood by him on the too favourable side than all my stepmother's keen detection and exposure of the dark ever brought to me.

The real defect in his rule was not, I think, hoping or trusting too much, but suffering his sanguine temperament to dim his sight. To see everything wrong, and yet hope everything good, is higher, I suppose, because truer.

And it was there, I fancy, my mother would have helped him. The optimism which revolted to an extreme against Mrs. Danescombe's suspicions would have been braced and corrected by my mother's loving truthfulness.

That room was a world of interest to us. There were marvellous models of machines in it (those were the days of Watt and Arkwright), balls of twine, fishing tackle, carpenters' tools, a turning lathe, pieces of various woods—Spanish mahogany and cedar, curious knots and blocks of oak, box, walnut, and various native woods; for my father delighted in experimenting, and had a theory that half the use that might be was not made of our own English produce. The marred work, and the pieces with unconquerable flaws were our Jetsam and Flotsam; but the greatest pleasure of all was to be allowed to stand by and watch while he was at work.

To watch the real work of grown people was an endless interest to us children. It was their amusements, and still more their attempts to amuse us, which seemed to us so dull. And by mistaken benevolence of that kind we in our childhood were not much oppressed.

My father having much "of the child's heart in his breast," took us quite naturally into his confidence, and enjoyed our sympathy in his projects as much as we did his in ours. Mrs. Danescombe, probably never having known childhood herself, capable of having existed from infancy like the children in old-fashioned family pictures, erect from morning till night in a cushion and hoop, never thought of us as helpless creatures that had to be made happy, but as fallen and refractory creatures that had to be kept down, and brought up, and if possible kept tidy. Thus no one took any trouble to amuse us. And accordingly we were endlessly amused.

Never, moreover, were children happier in the scenery of their childhood, than we in that dear old up and down house and garden.

The garden consisted of a succession of platforms and terraces, connected by flights of steps, or by steep slopes. The first of these was opposite the Summer Parlour. Round it was a border of flowers—roses, pansies, marigolds, love-lies-bleeding, hen and chicken daisies, sunflowers, hollyhocks, all Lord Bacon's catalogue. In one corner, hollowed out of the rocky hillside, was a Dropping Well, where the slow falling of the drops, one by one, we saw not whence, into the dark cool water below, mysteriously echoing from the sides, made delicious music for us. The entrance was draped by tufts and fringes of ferns of the richest green and the most delicate forms; beneath it, under the rock, was a bed of the sweetest lilies of the valley. It was only entered in the early morning by a few stray sunbeams, and of these scarcely one reached the opposite rock, and none ever penetrated into the clefts and corners. My father told us it was natural, and carved out by the little drops themselves dropping through hundreds, perhaps thousands of years. They had begun their chimes, he said, long before any had sounded from the old church-tower.

Thus to us that little melodious well was like the threshold of a thousand delightful mysteries. Where did those melodious drops start from? From what dark hidden pools under the hills? From what bright floating clouds in the sky? Whose pitchers had they filled,—what little children had they sung to before? What were they saying to us, or wanting to say? Wistful Undines and Nixen longing to speak to us; wise busy gnomes at work for ages, knowing thousands of secrets they would not tell but we would give anything to hear; all the wild mythology of mountain and water sprites; all that "nurse" nature would say to us and cannot; all that we would learn from her and cannot; dim reflections of our personality on material things; dim shinings through and prismatic refractions of the Personality beyond and within; all this, and unutterably more, murmured to us through that Dropping Well. Children of the mystic and humorous North, did we need legends Scandinavian or Teutonic to tell us what a strange compound the world was?

Was there not, moreover, from time to time, in that very well, an apparition of a gigantic wide-mouthed frog, who, in the midst of all that melancholy and mystic music, and those delicate ferns, and those sweet lilies of the valley, would croak and hop, and be as self-satisfied, and as entirely an embodied joke as any of the quaintest dwarfs Grimm ever disinterred or Cruikshank ever drew? The whole mysterious animal-world lay open to us between our sympathetic dog Pluto and that supercilious impenetrable frog.

When, years afterwards, we saw those German stories, we felt we had known them all our lives.

For I confess I am tempted to count it among the blessings of our childhood that we had no children's books at all.

No doubt there were children's books in our days; but the allowance was scanty, and what there was did not reach us. If we had been provided with any they would, no doubt, have been heavily weighted with morals, and would have been duller to us than our lessons. But happily we were not. Our lesson-books were good, honest lesson-books—my first was a horn-book. Our alphabets had no pictures; there was no sugar on the margin of our draughts of learning. We took them, certainly not without tears. But if to us "books" meant the antithesis of "play," and we cried over them and their consequences very heartily and very frequently, at least we did not fall into the far more desperate fate of yawning over our play, and listlessly requesting to be instructed how to amuse ourselves.

In our days the age of wise children's literature had not commenced. For us Rosamond and Frank, Harry and Lucy did not exist. They may, indeed, have dawned on some of the higher social summits, but certainly did not penetrate to Abbot's Weir. Still less, of course, was there anything for us of the nature of the reactionary literature of nonsense, clever or inane, which succeeded that era of supernatural good sense.

What nursery nonsense we had was quite genuine, with no perplexing parodies of sense, or half glimmerings of sense treacherously lurking beneath the surface. For us Little Jack Horner sate in his corner, and took out his plum, and congratulated himself (not as one might have expected, on his good fortune, but on his virtue), in the most literal way, without any allegorical construction. No suspicions of satire, or of the signs of the zodiac, marred our enjoyment of the confusion which ensued when "the cat had the fiddle, the cow jumped over the moon, the little dog laughed to see the sport, and the dish ran away with the spoon."

For us Mother Hubbard's agreeable disappointment at the futility of her dog's coffin was always fresh; the funeral rites of Jenny Wren could be repeated to any extent; the Babes in the Wood and Little Red Riding Hood were alternately dreaded and desired as we felt equal or not to the luxuries of tragedy. But between those ancient histories and the literature of our elders there was no intervening world of little boys and girls, exemplarily good, supernaturally naughty, sentimental, religious, or scientific.

The world of grown people's work—of animals and flowers, the garden, and the Timber-yard, and the Iron Foundry were our books. And for us there was no idle reading.

But perhaps we were exceptionally happy in these respects. My father himself was our Miss Edgeworth, almost always ready to explain to us his own work, or to enter with such serious interest as we felt its due into ours.

And, of course, it is not every child who can be free of a Timber-yard and a Foundry as we were.

For I have not yet told half the delights of our garden.

By the side of the Dropping Well was a door, better to us than any underground steps of Aladdin, leading through a short tunnel, ending in a flight of stairs cut in the rock, to the second garden, which was a steep slope crowned at the top with a terrace and an arbour.

This was of peculiar interest to us, because it was one of the pages of our own original illustrated copy of the Pilgrim's Progress, being obviously the Hill Difficulty, the arbour where Christian lost his roll, and also in another aspect the Palace Beautiful, and the Delectable Mountains whence the pilgrims could survey the land.

Could not we survey the whole land from that summit?

Below us lay the slate roofs of the town, tier below tier, the two bridges and the river; and opposite was the fine old grey tower of the church, with its pinnacles standing out against the wooded hillsides, whilst above stretched the sweeping curves and sharp angles of the granite Tors, the moorland hills, whence the river flowed, purple and golden, with crisp lights and shadows, or blue and soft and far away, "the everlasting hills."

This, therefore, was one of our usual haunts on Sunday afternoons.

In the side wall of this garden was another door, and beyond it an orchard, and beyond that a great free range of fields called the Leas, and at the top of this a channel of water called the Leat, which was detached higher up from the river, and fell at one end of the Leas in a cascade which turned the large water-wheel of the Iron Foundry. At the other end of this field was the Timber-yard, and the Foundry and the Timber-yard were among the chief scenes of my father's work and of our play.

In those days it was the general custom for men of business to live near their work. Now, scarcely even the smaller shopkeepers live over their shops; and not only great cities but country towns are fringed with their suburbs of villas. Then, even large merchants lived near their warehouses, and if, as we did, they possessed a farm, it was a genuine farm, in the real country, where men and women did their real work; and if things were fair to see, it was because it was their nature, not because they were put there to be seen. I suppose there is gain in the change. People breathe better air, at least physically; of the moral atmosphere I am not so sure. It may be good to escape from the cares of business to vineries and conservatories and geranium beds; it is certainly better than to be buried, body and soul, in business; but to ennoble business is even better than to escape from it. All work must be degraded and must degrade, the chief object of which is to earn the means to do no work. The highest art may certainly in that way be degraded into a trade; and I think there are few manufactures or trades which may not, on the other hand, be raised into art.

At least it was so with my father. That Timber-yard and that Foundry were to him, and through him to us, outlets into the world of knowledge and of work.

Into the interior of the Foundry we were not permitted to enter except under his protection.

My chief associations with that were a sense of the wonder-working powers of Water and of Fire.

It was, indeed, a perpetual fairy tale to see those creatures which we knew as fantastic dwarfs, or melodious melancholy nymphs, or dancing sprites, when they worked at their own wild will in the Dropping Well, or around the great logs on the hearth of the Stone-Parlour, transformed into steadfast and irresistible giants by the pressure of the steady will of man.

For thousands of years the slow dropping water had been at work, and had carved out to the sound of its own singing that strange hollow in the rocky hills, with its grotesque angles and dim clefts; and now at last the great water-wheel was set to direct it, and patiently and willingly the mighty creature, rising to its full strength, turned the great machine round and round, making by its own unconquerable beauty the loveliest sparkling cascades and showers at every turn. And out of this combined power, of water and man, came harrows, and spades, and scythes; and pots, and pans, and kettles, and all kinds of fairy household gifts to make our work easier and our homes pleasanter. Were not the swift, flashing waters careering with their rush of rapid music over the wheel as pleasant to see and hear as when dropping into the well? And were not scythes and even kettles as poetical things to make as caves?—the fireside and the reaping field being surely as sacred as the rocky hillside and the heathery moors?

I have always, however, been rather glad, as far as the lessons and associations of childhood went, that our machinery was worked by the separate powers of Fire and Water, and not by these powers combined, in the more prosaic form of Steam.

There was a large foundry not fifty miles from us, worked by steam, before we were born. And at the great engine factory of Bolton and Watt, many years before, my father used to tell how, Mr. Bolton showed Dr. Johnson round, and said to him, "Sir, we sell here the thing all men are in search of—Power."

We lived in the days of the birth and infancy of many things which have since grown to gigantic powers and overspread the world.

Our childhood was passed in one of the great dawns of history. The world was awake and stirring around us in every direction—machinery, politics, religion; and my father was a man awake to every throb of the busy life around him.

The great Steam Power was already in the world, and through the busy brains of Watt, Cartwright, and Arkwright was feeling after its work in railroads, steamboats, and power-looms. But happily for us, our moorland river did the work for us, and instead of pistons and cranks and close oily rooms, we had our gigantic water-wheel and the cascade which rushed over it from the hill.

Then, the pictures and parables enacted for us on the great casting-days, when we were taken to see the molten metal flow out of the furnace into the moulds of sand, the Rembrandt-like groups of men with blackened, illumined faces shovelling out the liquid fire as if they had been agents in some fiery horrors of Dante's Inferno; the power of heat in that red cave of fire raging at its roof into fierce white flames, which always made me think of Nebuchadnezzar's fiery furnace, and clasp tight my father's hand and Piers' lest they should be burned up like the wicked accusers!

I used to wonder how the three children and that "Fourth" looked in the midst of the flames; not black, I was sure, like old Reuben Pengelly, the furnace-man, but beautiful and calm, and fresh and white, like a very bright soft moon in the midst of the angry glare.

Yet old Reuben himself was very dear to us children. He had lost a little boy about the age of Piers, and he had always a very tender feeling to Piers, partly because the child, looking, no doubt, from his blackened face, and muscular bare neck, to his kind eyes, had always had such trust in him, and would have gone in his arms to the mouth of the furnace. Reuben's delight on Sunday, when he had his clean washed face, and his best coat on, was to carry Piers in his arms about the silent foundry-yard, amongst the stationary wheels and hammers, and to sing us Methodist hymns. For he was a man of a strong, fervent piety, such as fitted his rough work and his muscular frame; and it was from him I first remember hearing the story of the three children in the furnace. To Reuben the Bible was the written part of a continuous living history, unwritten; and he told us how that Fourth, "who made the flames as soft as morning dews to them, was with him, old Reuben Pengelly, as really as with them, and with us little ones, too." And I used often to gaze into the depths of that burning haze, in a vague hope of finding something marvellous there.

All the men knew us, not as angelic benefactors descending on them now and then on festival occasions, but as little creatures they had some kind of tender right in; "master's" and also therefore "theirs." And we knew the inside of many of their homes, not merely by religious or benevolent visits, but naturally, as our neighbours, as people who had known and loved and served us and ours before we had known them.

There is incalculably much in that tie of neighbourhood between rich and poor, employer and employed. The mere daily natural crossing of our paths is something, the familiarity with each other's faces and dwellings, and the countless kindnesses that may spring out of it, are infinitely more. Our Lord knew us well when He said, not "Ye shall love mankind as yourselves," but "Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself." We often read it the other way. But the meaning is quite different.

And it often seems to me that half the social problems which beset us arise from the rich and poor having ceased in so many instances to be neighbours. What is half at least of our charitable machinery but an ineffective and clumsy effort to replace the countless little interchanges of mutual good-will and service, the countless healthful, mutually sustaining intertings of life and love, which are involved in the simple fact of living within sight of each other?

The timber-yard, however, was Piers' and my most constant resource and delight; our gymnasium, our race-course, the dockyard of our navies.

Thence also the histories my father told us made a broad channel on which our imaginations sailed away to the various northern and southern lands, where the great bare timbers over which we sprang had grown.

When we were tired we used to sit on these trunks, and Piers would listen to any extent whilst I reproduced to him narratives of bears and wolves which had crept stealthily like cats over the snows after their prey, or howled and growled among the stems of these Norway pines.

We must have been rather sensational and gloomy in our tastes, for these bear and wolf stories were always more popular with us than those of the garlanded trees, and the gay parrots, or even of the monkeys of the south. Through the Timber-yard, the atlas became a living world to us; and I have no doubt the sense of all these far-off things and creatures mingled like music with our plays, as we jumped from trunk to trunk, as free and happy as the squirrels and birds which had hopped from branch to branch in former days.

Here also were the chips out of which we constructed the fleets which sailed in the Leat at the top of the Leas, the fleets for which we made harbours and piers, and carried on our great contest with the elements that were always ruthlessly endeavouring to draw them over the cascade, to be crushed by the inexorable water-wheel.

CHAPTER V.

THE Sundays of our childhood, how much depends on them! To me the associations they bring are chiefly of sunshine and rest; undisturbed, unless by an uneasy sense of responsibility in relation to Sunday clothes.

I cannot recall much definite religious teaching. We used, certainly, to say the Church Catechism to Mrs. Danescombe; and I must confess it seemed to me a very obscure collocation of words, in which it was nearly impossible not to put the wrong sentence first. I do not remember any part of it being explained to us, except the Duty to our Neighbour, which was enforced on us with strong personal application, and left me so oppressed with the impossibility of either saying or doing it, and so perplexed about the quantity of wrong things one might have done without knowing, that I should have been quite ready, with a certain little French girl at her first confession, to have pronounced myself guilty of all the sins prohibited in the Decalogue, including Simony.

My father never gave us direct lessons of any kind, religious or secular. He was undoubtedly not didactic, and I suppose he was not dogmatic; probably not finding any great necessity of formulas for his own use, and certainly not disposed to impose them on others. Neither was he given to cavil or to question. His mind was as little of the stuff heretics as of that inquisitors are made of; a subtle material, perhaps sometimes more similar than either think. In Scotland I think it probable he would have accepted the Westminster Confession, in Saxony the Confession of Augsburg, in France the great Creeds of the Gallican Church, his faith in all cases remaining substantially the same, and in all cases omitting the anathemas.

He was not theological at all in the sense of being keenly alive to the defects in other people's theology. He was theological to the core in the sense that St. John was the Theologian; in that his faith began with God rather than with man; less with man, erring, falling, sinning, than with God, loving, giving, forgiving.

Analysis and criticism were not his element. So far from his theology being negative, if anything was wanting in it, it was negations. If in after life we wandered into doubts and perplexities, to come back to him was to come back neither to elaborate solutions nor to anxious denunciations, but to the child's heart and the Apostles' Creed. His influence on us was through what he was, and what he loved.

Cowper, then a new poet, was his delight; not for his satire on social frailties, or his bitter lamentations over human depravity; but for his sympathy with human wrong, his gentle pathos, his sunny humour, his large and loving hope in man and God.

Not that my father was destitute of the force of indignation; but, like Cowper's, his indignation was reserved for injustice rather than for error; for the Bastille, for the slave-trade, for the desecration of the sacrament into a political test, for the corruption and meanesses of "corporations," for "charging God with such outrageous wrong" as leaving the sages of old

"in endless woe
For ignorance of what they could not know."

It is strange to see how many abuses then hotly contended for, are now abandoned by the extremest reactionists; and on the other hand, how much of the larger hopes which still have to be contended for, had even then dawned on generous Christian hearts.

To my father we owe the blessing of liberation, space, and joyousness connected with Sunday; and to him also the inestimable benefit that to us Christianity was associated, not with limitation, prohibition, and retrogression, but with freedom, expansion, and progress, with all that is generous and glad and hopeful, and belonging to the light.

At eight o'clock the "warning" church bell announced that it was Sunday; and father used to knock at our nursery door, and carry us off to the weekly festival of breakfast in the Stone Parlour, Piers usually perched on his shoulders, and I holding his hand.

Then followed that long trial of patience, —the apparelling for church; and then the walk by father's side down the quiet yet festive street, between the closed shop windows, among the friendly greetings of the neighbours, across the churchyard, past that one corner of it which was the most sacred place on earth to him and to us, up the long aisle to our high, square pew, between the Squire's and the Vicar's.

When we sat down my view was necessarily quite domestic, limited by the wooden walls. But when the singing began, it was my privilege to stand on the seat and survey the congregation; and most marvellous and interesting to me were the Sunday transformations of everybody by means of clothes.

There was far more difference between best and every-day clothes in those days than now, and far more variety in costume, not only between different classes—between what might be termed generically rich and poor—but between the different orders and species of well-to-do people. Between the rich and poor the contrast was not only in form but in material. Silk was utterly unknown below a certain level; calico prints with imitations of French or Damascene patterns had not been made common by Manchester looms. Stout woolseys, woven in cottage looms, clean white kerchiefs, and sober blues and hodden greys characterized the free-seats.

Yet none of the transformations of Sunday seemed to me so complete and remarkable as that which set Reuben Pengelly in the choir gallery embracing a huge musical instrument—not the "wee sinfu' fiddle," but a gigantic bass-viol; in a bright blue coat and scarlet waistcoat, which sat on his muscular unaccustomed limbs like plate armour, and a conspicuously white shirt, his face shining at once with friction and devotion. There was a sober radiance, and yet a sense of responsibility about his countenance which continually attracted me to it, and I always found myself ending my survey of my neighbours with that dear reverent old face, as if unconsciously I recognised it to be a shrine and altar from which more than could be heard or seen was going up to heaven.

And it must be confessed there was much to distract my attention. If the wages-paying and wages-receiving classes were thus sharply defined by the material of their clothes, the minor distinctions among their richer neighbours were equally marked to a discriminating eye by their chronology. It was but at a slow pace that our town toilettes could approach the standard of the Squire's, and still further of the Countess' pew, in those brief intervals when the Countess shone on us.

Many decades of the fashion-book were thus represented around me, and it was impossible that my eye should not be arrested by varieties reaching from the aristocratic French classics of tight skirts and short waists, to the hoop and high whale-bone hood of Miss Felicity Benbow, the schoolmistress, to whom a Sunday dress was a possession for life, and who would as soon have thought of changing her grandfather the general's Tory principles for Jacobinism, as her mother's fashions for raiment which she severely, but blushing, characterized as "little better than none at all."

I was not conscious of doing anything profane or un-sabbatical in thus contemplating my neighbours.

At that time no gorgeous varieties of symbolical vesture had been thought of for the clergy; but I had no doubt that these varieties of costume among the laity formed as integral a part of the Sunday festivities as Tate and Brady, Reuben Pengelly's great bass-viol, and my uncle Parson Fyford's preaching a sermon in the pulpit robed in black.

I cannot remember anything special in those sermons; but I do remember well waking up from time to time, not as far as I know by external suggestions, to a sense of meaning and a sense of appropriation in various parts of the Liturgy.

First there was the Lord's Prayer. What- ever else in the service might be the peculiar possession of grown-up people, that plainly belonged to us children. We said it every morning and evening. Then there was the Apostles' Creed, which seemed to belong to the Lord's Prayer, beginning with the Almighty Father and going on with its simple history of the Saviour who came from heaven, who also like us had once a mother, and was nailed on the dreadful cross, and had died and had been "buried" like our mother; but, unlike her, had risen again. He had, I knew, made other people rise again, but not mother yet. But one day He would make us all rise again; for that, father had told me, was what the end of the Creed meant. And then I should see Mother.

But there were two versicles in the Prayer-Book which, being entirely incomprehensible to me, I always privately revised.

Whatever the rest of the congregation might be able to say, being grown up, and no doubt having better consciences than I had, I, ignorant of archaic English, and keenly conscious of my own misdoings, could certainly never pray that God would "not deal with me after my sins," and "would not reward me after my iniquities." I who had become entangled in such a bewildering labyrinth of sins and iniquities, could I ask God not to deal any more after them with me? Therefore I always left out the "not." "Not dealing with me," as I understood it, so exactly represented my stepmother's mode of punishment. My food was given me, lessons were taught me, all the mechanism of life went on, even to the morning and evening kiss; but I, as a little trembling, clinging, living, loving personality, was left out, ignored, the averted eye never meeting mine, my words indeed answered; my wants supplied, but I myself unresponded to altogether; close in body, in heart and soul banished into outer darkness. I myself was simply "not dealt with."

If God were at all like that, watching coldly and gravely in the expectation I should go wrong; what a destiny, if for ever and ever I were to live in his sight and within his hearing, under the icy weight of his cold displeasure, not clear why I had offended Him, and feeling it quite hopeless to ask, without the resource even of an occasional flash of indignant revolt, because of course He must be right!

Those versicles are, however, especially memorable to me as connected with one especial Sunday afternoon.

I had gone through a week of those small misdemeanours and misfortunes, connected, as usual, chiefly with behaviour and clothes, in which mischance and misdoing were so inextricably confused to me, yet in which I so often felt that if the original offence which had drawn down the displeasure of my stepmother had been trifling, the burning anger and revolt aroused in me were not trifles. Moreover, I had fallen into two undeniable passions about wrongs done, as I conceived, to Piers, and to the reigning kitten.

That Sunday therefore, with unusual fervour, and with bitter secret tears, I had prayed my little private revision of the Liturgy.

"Deal with me! oh do not give up dealing with me after my sins."

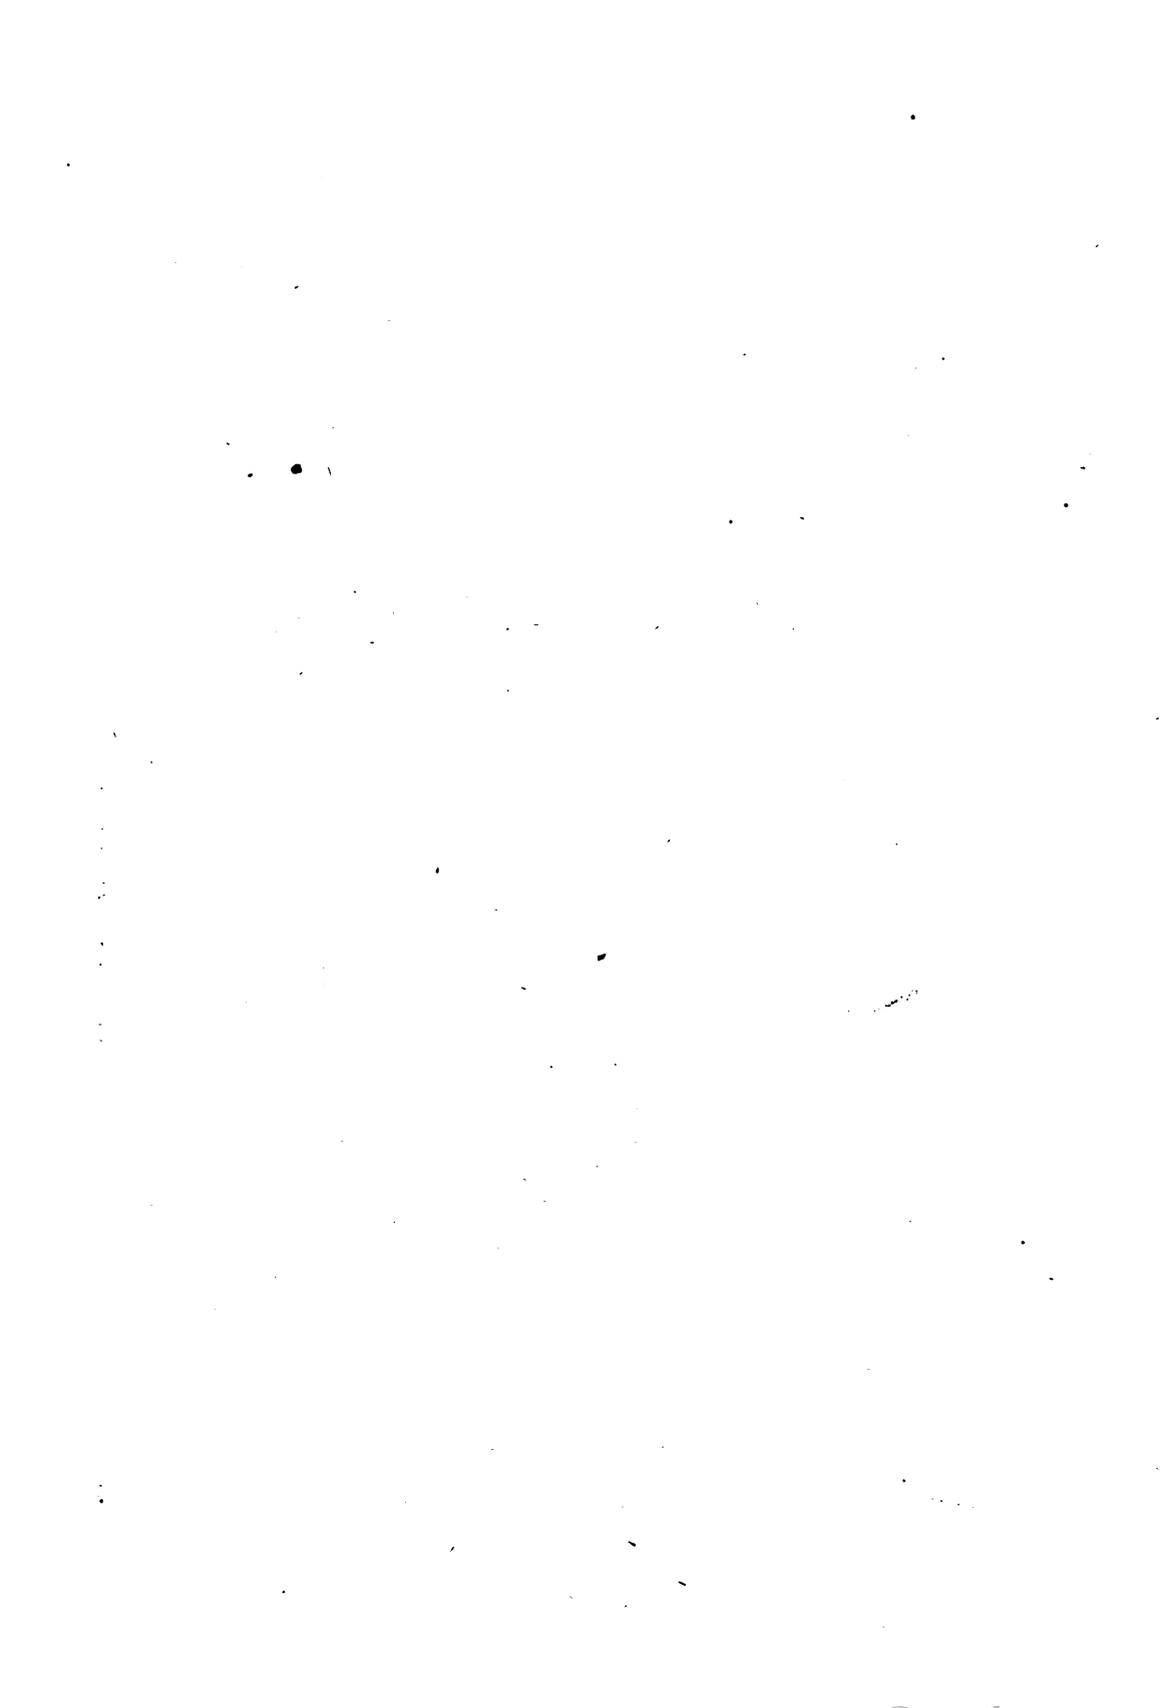

Poor blundering childish prayer, I believe it was heard.

I had certainly no irreverent intention of correcting the compilers of the Prayer-Book, I only thought I must be so much worse than other people who could calmly say the words as they were printed! Otherwise, of course the words would never have been there. My stepmother had so often told me I was quite exceptionally naughty, and this Sunday at least, after such a week, I felt it must be true; more especially because my father himself, having come in at the climax of one of my passions, and not knowing the cause, had looked gravely distressed at me.

That Sunday afternoon it happened that my father was occupied with visitors, and Piers and I crept away to our usual resource, through the field to the foundry-yard, to pay a visit to Reuben Pengelly and Priscy his wife. They lived at the gate-house, and we were welcomed as usual. But I was very unhappy, feeling like a little exile even there. While Piers was sitting complacently on old Priscy Pengelly's knee, enjoying her adoration and his bit of apple pasty, I, quite beyond the consolation of caresses and pasties, sate and nursed my sorrows on the little wooden stool in the porch at Reuben's feet.

The very quiet of the place seemed to irritate me. I had so many hammers beating, and complicated wheels revolving in my little heart and brain, that the usual din and rattle of the works would have been more congenial to me.

Everything but me was so good and quiet and fit for Sunday! The water playing over the idle wheel, the lazy occasional creaking of some of the machinery (like a yawn of Pluto awakened out of sleep), the quiet noiseless investigations being pursued by Priscy's cat among heaps of iron, and stationary machines she would not have dared to come near on work-days; the absence of all the clamorous busy life that filled the place at other times, and the peace and shining cleanness of Reuben's house and face, always made that porch seem to me the most Sunday-like place in the world. And I liked to hear old Reuben and Priscy talk, in a way I only half understood, but always, I felt, in good kind voices about good and happy things.

But that day the disquiet within was too deep to be soothed by the quiet without.

All Reuben's benevolent attempts to draw me into happy childish talk had failed, and at length, Piers having fallen asleep on Priscy's knee, and Priscy having fallen fast asleep too, Reuben looked tenderly down at me, and seeing, I suppose, the dull stony look so unnatural on a childish face, he said—

"My lamb, what makes thee so wisht?"

It happened that just then I was watching a little drama being enacted on the opposite side of the yard, between Priscy's cat and a large brown hen. Anxiously the poor mother, ignorant of the restraints imposed on pussy by our presence, had been calling her chickens to her, and at length had succeeded in attracting the last of them from the seductions of crumbs and grains under the shelter of her wings. And there she sate tenderly clucking over her little ones, nestled close to her; and heroically confronting the enemy.

I had watched the little parable with a strange choking bitterness; and, at first, when Reuben spoke I could say nothing.

But, when he stooped down and stood me beside his knee, and then took me on it and held my hands so tenderly in his great snowy hand, the first ice-crust of my reserve began to melt, and I said quietly—I felt too despairing for tears—

"Reuben, I cannot be good. I cannot. I have done so many sins and iniquities. I think God is going to give up dealing with me."

I suppose he thought my case not very hopeless, for he smiled most complacently, and said—

"Give thee up, poor lamb! At last! Why He did not give up dealing with me!"

I did not feel the force of the consolation. What could Reuben have done as naughty as I had? I only shook my head.

"Why, what be ye thinking about, Miss Bride, my dear?" came out in his hearty voice. "The Lord is good, good; with poor hardened old sinners, and to thee! an innocent babe like thee!"

I felt much more like a hardened sinner, whatever that meant, than like an innocent babe; and suddenly something that had lain hidden at the bottom of my heart rose up at his words—something I could never have said to father, and had scarcely said even to myself.

"Reuben," I said, looking straight up into his eyes; "is God good? To you, Reuben. But not to me; not to me. He took away Mother! Even those little chickens have somewhere warm and soft to hide; and I have nowhere. God took away Mother from me. He must have known I should never be good afterwards. He is not good to me."

Happily for me, the old man did not crush the helpless cry of anguish with a reproof, as if it had been a mere wilful cry of revolt. But a look of pain came over his face, such as I should have felt if Piers had struck father! And he said, looking reverently upwards—

"Poor lamb! Poor motherless babe! She knows not what she says. She wants to be good; and she doesn't know how Thou wants it!—Thou who hast died for it!"

"I do want to be good, Reuben," I said, afraid I had not been quite honest; "but I want—oh I want Mother!"

"My lamb, my lamb," he said, "you want God! Mother is happy, for she loves God. She did when she was here, dear soul, and now she is with Him and loves Him better; for she knows how God loves."

"Is Mother happy, Reuben?" I said, roused to an unwonted daring. "How can she be happy? If she is living and awake, how can she be happy, and I so unhappy, and not good, and never going to be good? Why, even I could not be happy on Father's knee, and Father pleased with me, if Piers were hurt or naughty. And how could Mother? She loved us more than that. I know, I know, if God would let her, Mother would come back from anywhere—from anywhere, to help us and make us good. It is God who took her away, and will not ever let her come back. And how can I pretend to love God, or say He is good to me?"

Reuben said nothing, but kept stroking my hands. I was afraid he was vexed. But when I glanced up at him I thought he had never looked so kind, although great tears were on his cheeks.

And then gently, as if I had been an infant, he carried me into his little house, and shut the door, and knelt down, with me beside him, and prayed till the drops stood on his forehead and the tears rained down his face.

He said something like this :—

“O, blessed Father! Pity this poor, wisht, forlorn babe. She has lost her mother, and she has lost sight of Thee. She doesn't understand. She thinks Thou art turning away Thy face from her, and not caring for her. And all the time it is Thou who art stooping down and likening Thyself to anything, to that poor helpless fool of a hen gathering her chickens, just to make us understand how Thou lovest us—calling, calling, spreading out Thy wings—for her, for her! Lord, make the little one understand; make the babe hear and see.

“Blessed Lord Jesus, Thou knowest how we want to hear, and touch, and see; above all, the little ones. Thou camest that we might touch and see. Thou tookest them in Thine arms, and laid Thine hands on them, that they might touch and see. Thou hast let them nail Thee to the Cross that we might feel and see. Ah, good Shepherd! And this little lamb has lost sight of Thee altogether! But Thou hearest her crying. Lord, it's only the lamb bleating for its mother—Thy little lamb bleating for Thee! Take her home on Thy shoulders, Lord. Take her home to Thy heart, and make her happy, and make her good.”

Then he rose and sat down, and took me on his knees again. I leant my head on his shoulder, and was quite quiet—quiet in my heart too.

“My lamb,” he said, “that's it; that's all. You want God. And God wants you to be good. He gave his own Son for us. He would have left mother with you if He could. It seems to me He wants you just to look up, as it were, and see mother smiling on you in heaven, as sure enough she is; and then turning round to Him, just that you may follow her eyes, and turn round to Him too, and see how He is smiling on her, and on you both. Child, child! mother is happy! And she would never be happy unless she knew God was good, and good to you. Follow her looks up to His face, my lamb, and you will see what she sees.”

All the time I had not cried. I had felt too naughty and wretched. But those words went to my heart.

“Mother knows God is good, and good to me.”

And I did try to follow her looks upwards to His face.

And He helped me; He did not give up dealing with me.

My new treasure was soon tested. For I remember the very evening after that Sunday afternoon talk with Reuben had begun to clear things a little to me, I ventured to say to my stepmother when I kissed her for the night, that I really hoped now I should be good, for I thought I had a little love to God, and He would help me.

My heart was glowing, yet it cost me much to stammer out those words. To me it was like a confession. It was in the Oak Parlour. She was looking out of the window. She turned round, a little surprised, and questioned me with her eyes till I coloured crimson; but she only said :—

“Very well, Bridget. I am sure I hope you will be good. You are liable to very violent ebullitions of feeling. I think it was two days since you called me cruel because your kitten was whipped for stealing cream, and three days since you tried to take up your brother and kiss him when he was naughty and was put in the corner, and threw yourself into a frantic rage with me because I would not let you, which your father saw; and four days since you sate sobbing half an hour, as if your heart would break, because you had torn your pinafore, and had to mend it, instead of playing in the garden. You are subject to very vehement changes of emotion. I suppose this is one of them. I hope it will last, and that you will in future wash your hands in time for dinner, and keep your hair smooth. I judge by fruits.”

I crept humbled away, with the feeling one has in seeing the dog in Landseer's picture, with wistful eyes and appealing paws, entreating the parrot for a crumb of cheese.

Yet I believe the hail-showers and glaciers of my childhood were good for me, as well as its sunshine and soft dews. I went away saddened, but no more chilled to the heart: for I had learned that the sunshine and the dews, and soft brooding warm wings of ever-present love were at least as real as the cold. The key was in my hand; it has never been quite lost since; and secret after secret is unlocked to me whenever I touch the doors of hidden chambers with it.

So, as it happened, my feeling after mother became at last a feeling after God, and finding Him, which, I suppose, was part at least of what He meant.

It was on the Sunday after this that I was thinking I wished mother had been among some “goodly fellowship” or “glorious company” or “noble army” mentioned in the Zi Deum, that I might have been sure she was among those we sang about as praising with us. And then it occurred to me that the Holy Church throughout the world could not mean the little bit of it where we are and which we see; where the prophets and apostles are not any longer.

I remembered Reuben's words, and all at once a heavy roof seemed lifted off from the world, and I followed Mother's eyes up to his face, and saw that the church of our old town was only a little corner of the great Church throughout the world which is always praising Him; and that I down in the dark room, and Mother up in the light where she was waiting for me, without anything between, were singing our Te Deum together.

Thus the service gradually grew to shine out on me, bit by bit, like far-off fields on our own moors lighted up one by one by the sun.

My attention to the sermon was less endangered by external objects; for I was always caused during its delivery to subside into the depths of a great pew, above whose walls nothing was visible to me but my uncle, Parson Fyford, the top of Miss Felicity's whalebone hood, the bows in Madam Glanvil's bonnet, which used periodically to sway about and disappear, and then to recover and erect themselves inexplicably in a defiant manner; the grave face of Reuben Pengelly above the choir gallery, and the trees waving in the churchyard outside the windows.

I remember wondering why my Uncle Fyford put on quite a different voice from that in which he spoke to us during the week, and whether I should ever be expected to understand what he said.

But my most vivid recollections of the sermon, especially after that Sunday afternoon with Reuben in the foundry-yard, were of a time of delicious rest, when the two people who were kindest to me in the world were looking serenely down on me, and Piers being, by father's express sanction, allowed to go to sleep, was leaning his sleepy little head against me, and I was feeling like a little mother to him, with one hand around him, and the other hand nestled in father's; whilst above us was the dear sacred name on a white marble tablet, and a consciousness of a sacred corner outside in the churchyard, and of something more sacred and tenderer still above us in the sky; a light deeper than the sunlight, a smile kinder than father's, embracing mother and us, all.

And eager and restless as I was, the sermon did not seem long to me; and a heaven "where congregations ne'er break up," would not have seemed to me a terrible threat at all.

THOUGHTS BY THE WAY.

II.

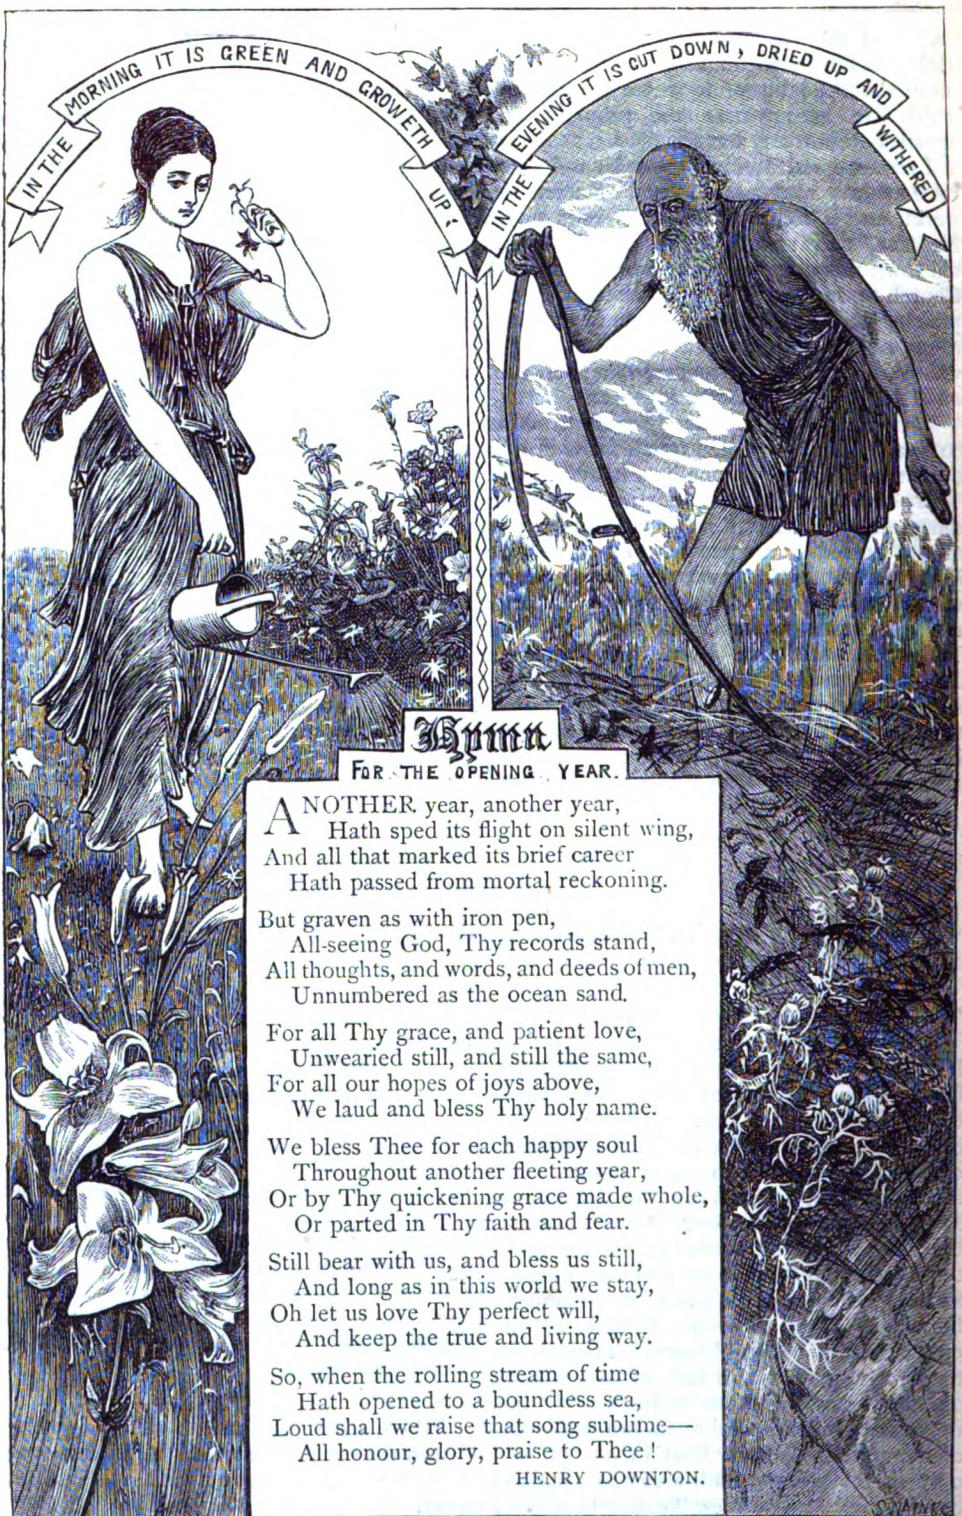

TAKE away the Old Testament, and even though the Christianity of the New were left, there would be an immense want in meeting the different moods of feeling and stages of thought in human nature. The deep sense of sin wrought by the ceremonial of purification has its value to many minds, apart from the light it casts on the doctrine of atonement; and the fiery denunciations of the prophets will be needed till we are nearer the millennium than we seem to be. There is an energetic patriotism and a strong national life which the gospel comes to broaden and enlighten, but not to destroy. There is the tender and pathetic, in view of man's frailty and of the nothingness of his earthly life, musings on the dim future in Job and some of the psalms, such as float in on the soul only in the twilight and with the sound of evening bells. The New Testament is more cheerful, and filled with bright sunshine, but the other has its time and truth to many hearts—to all hearts at certain hours. The evening and the morning are still needed, as at first, to make the full day.

In a fiction artistically constructed, the catastrophe must be logically connected with the characters and the whole plan. The villain must be punished, not by accident, but as the result of his conduct. This is a testimony from art to moral order—to what ought to be, and shall be. The universe is the highest work of art, and shall come forth as a complete whole.

When some men speak of nailing their flag to the mast, they would be more correct if they spoke of nailing their ship to the quay.

JOHN KER.

Hymn

FOR THE OPENING YEAR.

ANOTHER year, another year,
Hath sped its flight on silent wing,
And all that marked its brief career
Hath passed from mortal reckoning.

But graven as with iron pen,
All-seeing God, Thy records stand,
All thoughts, and words, and deeds of men,
Unnumbered as the ocean sand.

For all Thy grace, and patient love,
Unwearied still, and still the same,
For all our hopes of joys above,
We laud and bless Thy holy name.

We bless Thee for each happy soul
Throughout another fleeting year,
Or by Thy quickening grace made whole,
Or parted in Thy faith and fear.

Still bear with us, and bless us still,
And long as in this world we stay,
Oh let us love Thy perfect will,
And keep the true and living way.

So, when the rolling stream of time
Hath opened to a boundless sea,
Loud shall we raise that song sublime—
All honour, glory, praise to Thee!

HENRY DOWNTON.

ON MONEY.

BY THE REV. A. W. THOROLD, M.A.

I.—GETTING AND KEEPING.

IT has been truly said by Sir Henry Taylor, that there are few things in the world of greater importance than money. To despise it is an affectation of virtue, and to ignore it is a confession of folly. See what it can do ! To the bulk of mankind it is the focus of interest, the stimulus of effort, and the instrument of power. In a real and intelligible sense it buys food, heals disease, builds houses, prints books, imparts knowledge, spreads education, moves armies, augments happiness, humanises life, promotes religion. If it is not an end, it is certainly a means to an end. In every condition of life, and in all the circumstances of it, we are perpetually handling and using it for one purpose or another. The temptations to which it exposes us, the sacrifices to which it invites us, the good or the harm for which it enables us, on the one hand help us to see why God gave Solomon riches as a special mark of favour ; on the other, to understand how St. Paul could write of it, "The love of money is the root of all evil."

To use money we must possess it ; and whether we inherit it from others, or acquire it by our own exertion, it is equally a gift from God, and a trust for us.

Any one can see that in making money the conscience is incessantly confronted with the eternal inevitable laws of justice and truth. The exact line of demarcation between right and wrong is always invisible ; but those who have most felt the difficulty of finding it for their own guidance are also most likely to be indulgent to the difficulties of their neighbours. So, when we hear surprise expressed that Christian people can be found to justify either the manufacture or the sale of such articles of consumption as human infirmity converts to purposes of sin, will not a kindly common sense bid them go a little farther back in the problem, and ask how ever it could please a good and just God to create the hop and the vine. There can, however, be no doubt at all that use and habit do blunt the edge of conscience, and that self-interest, when stimulated by a love of gain, first shuts the eye to the moral of the case, and thus blinds it to the harm.

Several other points, however, less palpable, but quite as important, soon turn up in the intricate, but interesting casuistry of this part of the subject. Is it possible to make too much money? Is speculation lawful? To what extent, and on what grounds are we justified in praying for commercial success?

A certain degree of accumulation seems consistent with that instinct of forethought, which, like our other instincts, we may reasonably conceive to have been implanted in us for legitimate indulgence. When St. Paul appeals to the habit of mankind, of parents laying up for children rather than children for parents, as a ground for his own unwillingness to be burdensome to the Church, his recognition of the practice is tantamount to an approval of it. It is not only reasonable, but praiseworthy that the head of a family should by diligence and frugality be in a position to spare his widow, at the moment when she has care and grief enough in other ways, the additional anxiety of a sudden poverty ; to give his sons enough to start them with in their professions, and to send his daughters not quite empty-handed from their father's house to their husbands'. The hardest life, and much quiet self-denial are unspeakably sweetened to a manly and generous nature by the thought, that when the head and hands that have so steadily worked for others are becoming dust in the ground, the love that nerved to that work, and made it pleasanter than any selfish indulgence, will secure and perpetuate its reward.

But it is quite another thing for a Christian deliberately to make his life one long grind in a counting-house, and to turn not only his youth, but even his later years, into a perpetual slavery, only to swell his personal possessions, and perhaps to point in his own case the Saviour's mournful warning—"Woe unto you rich, for ye have received your consolation." Of course, political economy will treat any hint like this with undisguised contempt ; and sufficiency is a very relative word ; and few young men have sense enough to prefer to make their fortune for themselves ; and what in past and simpler days would have been called a competent, though modest, dowry for an English gentlewoman might now hardly suffice to pay for her clothes. Still wealth, with all its subtle joys, and sense of power, is a great snare and peril. To hundreds and thousands of us covetousness is idolatry, for we put our money in the place of God to us, when we treat it as our consolation and security—the source of our dignity, the weapon of our defence. Yet it is a poor god to worship; for it takes all the leisure from the life, all the comfort from the home, all the brightness from the face, all the nobleness from the character. If you succeed, it is at the loss both of the sweetness and repose, that are the true charms of human existence; if you fail, you lose both worlds. Thus it is that to the man who fears God, and values his own consistency, and understands something of human nature, and steadily looks on into the other world, the question, sooner or later, will and must occur, “Is not the time come, that I have enough; and shall not I better please God, and help my own salvation, by retiring from the anxieties of my career?” Or, if such may not be, and it will often happen, that the entire relinquishment of active employment has a serious, if not fatal, result, a good man may easily resolve with himself, that the occupation he will continue for its own sake, but henceforward the profit of it shall be for God. Yet there is one noble justification for that plodding, and almost insatiable pursuit of wealth, that so markedly characterizes modern Englishmen. I mean the secret resolute aim of accomplishing, single-handed, some blessed Christian enterprise that shall live after us, and work by us, long after the silver and gold we have acquired have passed to our heirs. There are many among us who have done this; many more who are capable of it if it were pressed home to their consciences as a duty for God. What was the real, the beautiful secret of that passionate love of poverty, which with all the self-love that spoiled it, and the small extravagancies that disfigured it, was still such a moral force, in the Middle Ages, when the Church had all but forgotten how to overcome the world? Was it not in this, that it was endured for Christ’s sake, as a means of resembling and honouring Him. Why cannot we be content, also, to be rich for Christ’s sake, and to try to say, in the deepest sense of the word, “I have learned both to be full and to be hungry, both to abound and to suffer need?” There are hundreds and thousands of wealthy men and women in England at this moment, not only making a Christian profession, but eminently worthy of it—who simply from want of direction are blind to their opportunities for glorifying God through the wealth lying idle in their hands. They have ample for their heirs, and for their own needs, and for the decorous conventional charities that society expects of them—ample, also, for some individual act of useful, practical, permanent munificence, which might be their vase of ointment for the head of their blessed Lord, fragrant and honourable till He comes back in his glory. Yes, each Christian, to whom the blessed opportunity is given, and many more possess it than care to know, should resolve to leave behind some mark of real self-denial to be his monument when he is gone. A church, a school, a bed in a hospital, a mission-house—the support of a missionary; let us choose what we please, only let us do something. The more sacrifice it involves, the more precious in Christ’s sight will the offering be. “She hath done what she could.” How few since Mary’s day have earned that praise!

In trying to think out the abstract lawfulness of speculation, the first thing to make clear is what speculation means. For there are two very different things expressed by the same word. If we simply mean by it the bold and prompt seizing of an opportunity, through the clear foresight that guesses the turn of the market, or the practised skill that calculates how the events of the day will affect exchange, then it is but the legitimate exercise of a special and valuable kind of talent. The welfare of society is often greatly promoted by the happy ventures of commercial enterprise; and to forbid such efforts would be but a feeble and silly attempt to hamstring the energy, and to impede the progress of mankind.

But where speculation is a mere gambling throw in the dark, the rash impulse of a lazy and ignorant hardihood to make in a week what honest work could hardly make in a year; imperilling precious interests on the chance of a die, and fostering in the character just those instincts and tendencies that make industry intolerable, and tempt men to exchange the serious business of life for the risks of a lottery, the individual speculator not only injures himself, but he defrauds the community; injures himself, for he can never enjoy that real sweetness of success, with which honest labour sooner or later rewards us; defrauds the community, since it does not receive from him that contribution of diligent and useful production, which is wanted to augment the general capital of the State.

To a Christian mind one key to the difficulty may be found in that practice of asking God’s blessing on any proposed enterprise, which is the habit of those who fear God. There are clearly two distinct lines of thought in which prayer about temporal blessings may be conceived to run. There is the prayer for divine guidance as to the lawfulness of any particular scheme under consideration. "Will God sanction my doing this?" There is also the prayer for divine blessing on the scheme, when the decision has been made. "May God prosper this now that it is to be done!" It is certain that if good men were more careful to ask for counsel on the propriety of any particular enterprise before making up their minds to it, instead of first deciding, and then asking for success, many mistakes would be avoided, and much distress saved. A man, with wife and children, has five thousand pounds at his disposal, which he has put out at moderate interest on reliable security. One day he sees a prospectus for a railway across Honduras, or perhaps a Japan loan, which would pay him fifteen per cent. His imagination is fired. He appreciates with a vivid and perilous facility the comforts that could be procured, and perhaps the money put by, with so much additional income. He cannot see anything wrong in doing the best he can for himself; really, there is hardly anything to ask about. He makes up his mind, acts, then prays to be prospered, and waits the result of his venture, fortified by the delusive consciousness of having implored the blessing of God. But had he first of all asked to be guided as to the expediency, as well as the lawfulness, of the step he was proposing, He who gives "wisdom to all men," might have made him see, that the augmented income, plus the risk, the anxiety, the feverishness of mind about money engendered by such transactions in ordinary natures, and the love of it for its own sake so easily fostered by any temporary success, do not counterbalance the smaller income, and the surer investment, and the unbroken tranquillity. The "still small voice" might have said, "Leave it alone: 'they that will be rich fall into temptation and a snare.' Trust me."

But, assuming that our enterprise is lawful, and that we are justifiably confident of the divine sanction on our undertakings, there still remains a question of interest for those who, just because they so fully believe in prayer, desire to pray reasonably and according to the will of God. Can it be right directly to ask God to prosper our efforts, —which in some cases may amount to a request for ten thousand pounds? or is it better to confine ourselves simply to laying the matter before Him, in the simple confidence of loyal children who wish to tell Him everything, knowing that He will bless us in this way or in that (without our direct asking), as He may see it to be for our good. The question is complicated by many considerations; and every man must have liberty of conscience about it. The writer's own conviction, however, is clear, that while in spiritual things we should both ask and trust, for there we can have no doubt about the good of what we ask for, in temporal things (beyond actual necessities), after having poured out our heart before God, we should trust and not ask.

For temporal things, up to a certain point, we are indeed both permitted and commanded to pray. "Give us this day our daily bread" is a petition of our Saviour's own dictating; and, though one man's daily bread may mean something very different to another man's: and it is not safe to trust every one with the definition of what the necessities of life may be, there is nevertheless a distinction both reasonable and intelligible, between the prayer that asks God according to his promise to supply our necessities, and the prayer that asks of Him to pour vast wealth into our lap. Our modern society is in such a state of mutual interdependence and entanglement, that often for me to gain, my neighbour must lose; and so the event that enriches me impoverishes him. Then, though it may be good for one man suddenly to step into a position of affluence; it may be ruinous for another man; and God loving the two men equally, will, just because of that love, in one case bestow, in the other deny. Material prosperity—so far from being the highest good—is in itself neither good nor evil; but it will turn to good or evil, according to the character with which it is brought in contact, and the spirit in which it is met and used. Surely a thoughtful parent would pause and muse, before out of a choice of blessings at his disposal for some beloved child, he decided on the gift of great riches. May we not reverently suppose that thoughts of this kind pass through the heart of our Heavenly Father as He looks round on us; and is not there wisdom in the self-control that refuses to press Him for a gift, which may be health, and may be poison?

For nothing tries a man more than the sudden loss or gain of money. The loss of it, while it goads some men to an amazing and almost noble effort to recover it, will so sour and paralyze others, that henceforth they cease to be capable of further struggle with the world. The gain of it is good for some, is perhaps worse for more. Men who, while enjoying a modest competency, have been simple, kind, and charitable, have found in a great accession of wealth an instant occasion for a sordid and miserable inflation. A sudden rush of selfishness will sometimes flood the heart, that think itself permanently raised over the necessities of friendship, or even the protection of Providence. Summer time parches the soil as well as ripens the harvest; and to need man's sympathy is a great help to giving it.

If the first thing about money is to get it, the second is to keep it. And it is not so easy to keep it. Most people have some sort of screw loose in their private money matters. Either they invest it foolishly, or they spend it wastefully; or, what is almost the worst possible thing to do with it, they hoard it covetously; and either way, it is their Lord's money hidden down in the earth, instead of being put out to use for Him.

The investment of money is just one of those questions which it is real wisdom to think over very carefully, till our mind is made up about it; and then, when once settled, it should be put away upon a shelf, to be left there. Money, like every other talent, is to be made the most of; and it is our duty to see that we do make the most of it, or it is worth just so much less, both for our own use, and our power of sharing it with others. But making the most of it does not necessarily mean getting the highest possible return for it; simply, the highest interest compatible with good security.

Now it is quite true that to be able to have all one's property invested in land or consols, there ought to be a great deal of it; and that the difference between three per cent. and six per cent. will often mean to the struggling father of a large family the salary of a governess, or a boy's schooling, or the summer holiday, or the annual premium on his life insurance. Still the old duke's maxim that "high interest means bad security" is a perfectly sound one. A little more income for ten years, at the cost for losing all for ever afterwards is a poor bargain; and an assured, if less income has a rest and comfort about it, that to a dabbler in foreign bonds, or speculative railways, is often an object of profound envy. It is an old proverb, "never to carry all your eggs in the same basket:" and if your fortune is invested in more securities than one, it must be a storm indeed that robs you of everything. To be living in one's own house is not only to live at less rent: but it permits you to drive a nail in the wall, or to throw two rooms into one without an uneasy dread of the landlord's displeasure. While for country people, it unquestionably gives an interest to life, to watch the trees grow up that your own hands have planted; and year by year to make fresh improvements in what you can bequeath to others, more beautiful, and more valuable than when it first became yours.

After all, as we have said already, the great aim should be to do the best we can in putting out our money, that we may be saved all anxiety about it afterwards. Very few persons out of business life can be safely trusted to make their own investments. It is money well spent to procure the best advice on the subject; and it is true economy when the advice is given, to take it. Fidgetiness often leads to covetousness; perpetually to be fancying that we are on the point of being ruined, or that we are making less interest than we might make, if we managed more cleverly, deteriorates the character, and robs the life of peace.

CUTHBERT OF LINDISFARNE.

PART I.

IN spite of the opinion of such writers as Michelet, the power which ruled the earlier Middle Ages was the power of personal holiness; a blurred and distorted image of holiness it was, but it was the only likeness of this divine attribute which our forefathers knew, "for the word of the Lord was precious in those days, and there was no open vision." We cannot afford to smile when we read of thanes and serfs alike turning out to catch a passing view of a man who was reported to have received an answer to his prayer, to have subdued a fierce temptation, to have vanquished a demon in a lonely vigil, or to have seen a vision of his God; for it was symptomatic of the intense religious belief which had overcome the hideous paganism of our ancestors. Faulty, groping, superstitious the lives were which received this universal homage; but they were lives whose single aim was sanctification, whose single desire was for communion with God, whose noblest zeal was evangelization, and whose most irrational austerities were for the purpose of "crucifying the flesh with its affections and lusts."

The story of Cuthbert is twelve centuries old. At the time of his birth there were men living, not yet middle-aged, whose fathers remembered the days of the last Emperor of Rome. The Pandects of Justinian were still new. Mahomet was promulgating the Koran, and his followers in the flush of victory had lately desecrated the Holy City. A Christian emperor reigned at Constantinople, still the metropolis of the Eastern empire. The Church, now the mosque, of St. Sophia, lately built by Justinian, still rang with Christian litanies and the hymns of Gregory Nazianzen. Scandinavia was given up to predatory forays and the rites of her wild mythology. France was just emerging from the mythical period of her history. Germany was a vast battle-field of barbaric tribes. Ireland, as the centre of learning and piety, was known as the "Isle of Saints." A portion of Scotland was connected with the rest of Europe by the missionary enterprises of Iona. England was only known as a barbarous nation, divided into seven kingdoms, supposed to be too weak to do aught but make war on each other. Of the other broken fragments of the Roman Empire as little is known. The greater part of Europe was Pagan, and where semi-Christianized, the monastery was the only refuge from the warlike violence of the times. At Rome Gregory the Great reigned, and already in Kent his missionary Augustine was baptizing the fair-haired Saxons by thousands, and building Christian churches with the stones of the lately ruined temples of Diana and Apollo.

The great kingdom of Northumbria was the most powerful of the Saxon Heptarchy, for though Eboracum, and the remains of its magnificence under the Romans, had been swept away by Ida, it had regained its former supremacy, and extended its borders from the Humber to the Forth. Oswald, a pagan prince of the royal house, during an exile among the Scots, had embraced Christianity. Soon after his accession to the Northumbrian throne the Pagan kings, Penda and Cædwalla, ravaged his kingdom, and forced upon him an unequal encounter at Deniseburn. There, with his own hands, he set up a rude wooden cross, and kneeling before it in the midst of his half-pagan army, he offered up an earnest prayer for the help of the Lord Almighty. At dawn of the next day he utterly routed his enemies, and, in gratitude for his great deliverance he resolved to establish Christianity in Berneira, the northern province of his kingdom. It might have been easy for a powerful and lately victorious sovereign, by force of arms and the pressure of his royal authority, to drive his subjects into the baptismal waters, and produce a temporary cessation from idolatry, after the fashion of certain ancient monarchs; but not so thought and acted this pious and enlightened prince. To bring about this great work he sought not to arms, nor to Deira, which was already Christianized, nor to Italy, from whence had come the all-conquering Augustine, nor to Ireland, still rich in missionary monks, but to the land of his own conversion, and through the mediation of the king of Scotland to the sacred Icolm Kill, that green island of the hoarse Atlantic, from which, for more than a century, the light of truth had sparkled here and there in Europe, making the Rule of Columba famous on the earth.

Nor was his quest in vain. Cormon, a monk, was at once dispatched; but, after a very brief attempt upon the heathenism of Oswald's subjects, he returned to Iona with the tidings that success was impossible among a people so brutalised and obstinate as the Lowlanders. A brother, who sat by, said in tones of solemn earnestness, "Was it their obstinacy or thy severity? Didst thou forget God's command to give the milk first and the strong meat afterwards?" All eyes were turned towards Aidan the speaker. His own words designated him as the fitting envoy, and shortly afterwards he voluntarily left the "blessed isle," with its blessed activities and blessed peace, and the fraternal intercourse of the monastery, to go forth in the footsteps of many brethren and preach the gospel among the heathen.

When Aidan arrived at Oswald's court he was allowed to choose the seat of his episcopate, but not one of the becks or rivers, not one of the fertile plains or sheltered valleys of the rich northern province, allured the Scottish monk. Memories of Iona's sea-girdled shores, of her almost treeless greenness, of her insular security, doubtless weighed with him in the selection of the island of Lindisfarne. This selection was one among many proofs of Aidan's sagacity. The island was accessible on foot twice a day, and twice a day was insulated by a strait two miles wide, and it was only ten miles from Bamborough, the residence of King Oswald. The fame of the new teacher soon brought the pagan Northumbrians in thousands to this semi-insulated mission station, and through the long summer days Aidan proclaimed the gospel with King Oswald sitting at his feet to interpret the good news to his subjects, whenever the missionary's imperfect acquaintance with the vernacular rendered his message unintelligible. It was a goodly spectacle. The preaching of Christ soon produced an effect. Churches were built by converted thanes, and Oswald's munificence endowed several monasteries, in which Aidan and others trained English youths for the ministry. In the eighth year of Aidan's episcopate Penda, the heathen king of Mercia, invaded Northumbria, and Oswald was slain with the prayer upon his lips, "Lord God, have mercy upon the souls of our people,"—the first cry of Christian patriotism from the lips of a Saxon. The character of this prince brightens this dreary period of the story of the Heptarchy. He is the ideal of the Christian patriot hero; bold in battle, generous in victory, true in friendship, incapable of suspicion, lowly and devout, and incessantly occupied in seeking the highest good of his subjects. He has been reckoned, perhaps not unjustly, among "the noble army of martyrs." Shortly afterwards, war broke out between Oswy and Oswin, the two princes between whom his kingdom was divided, and was only terminated by the assassination of Oswin, who had won Aidan's friendship by his sincere profession of Christianity. At the time of this unholy deed, the good bishop, who was sorely grieved in spirit for the bloody wars in the land, and their disastrous influence upon its infant Christianity, was dwelling in a "lean-to" of the village church of Bamborough. He was so afflicted by the evil tidings that he sickened, and in twelve days died, in prayer, leaning against a buttress of the church.

On the night on which Bishop Aidan departed, Cuthbert, a shepherd lad, was tending the flock on the bleak slopes of the Lammermuir hills. Of his birthplace and parentage we are uncertain; but it is said that he led a peasant boy's life in the house of "the widow Kenspid, at the west end of the hamlet of Wrangholm." Twelve centuries ago the boys wrestled on the village greens of the northern villages, as they wrestle any summer evening yet. Cuthbert was an athlete, the best leaper and wrestler among them, and, like most lads of fine physique and well-developed muscles, he was good-natured, and a general favourite. One evening the youths were diverting themselves on the green, some wrestling, others playing hockey, some standing on their heads, others lying on the grass, while Cuthbert, unwearied, was in every game, and always successful. A little child (he says) stood apart, constantly praying him to leave off, and at last, with bitter tears, cried out, "Leave off that naughty game," a request which he obeyed as a command, and took the infant home. The lonely boy regarded these words as a message from God, bidding him "seek those things which are above," and ever afterwards spoke of them as his "call." So, from this time, in memories of the day when Aidan signed him with Christ's cross as he came up from the baptismal waters, in dreamy musings on the unseen, in reading heavenly meanings in earthly things, in watching for visions from on high, the years of his boyhood glided by. We read of whole nights spent in prayer as he kept the sheep on the cold uplands of the Lammermuirs, till at last, on the night before referred to (according to Bede), a vision of angels bearing to heaven the soul of the Bishop of Lindisfarne, burst upon his sight, and determined him to devote his energies to a religious career. Thus, at a very early age, Cuthbert left his pastoral cares, the pleasant Lauder water, and the aged friend on whom he had bestowed the name of mother, to "seek the sheep of Christ who are scattered in this naughty world." Where the Lauder water joined the Tweed, and the heavy forest then stretched up to the triple-clefted Eildons, some pious monks from Iona had founded the abbey of Mailross (two miles from the Abbey of Melrose afterwards erected), a humble edifice consisting of a collection of low wooden buildings, at this time presided over by Eata, afterwards Bishop of Lindisfarne. He was absent, and outside the door Baisil the prior was standing with a monk, when an athletic youth rode up, who, after bestowing his horse and spear upon an attendant, went into the church to pray. "This is a servant of God," exclaimed Baisil, by a true intuition, for no man has lived who, in great or lowly work, was more emphatically a servant. He lived to do a servant's work with more than a servant's sense of unworthiness, but in the land to which he carried the good tidings, the name of Cuthbert of Lindisfarne is foremost on the list of those confessors whose faith and works illuminate the cold grey dawn of English Church history.

Good Baisil's intuition had prepared him to accede to the request made shortly afterwards by Cuthbert for admission into the brotherhood. The ardent devotion of the young man, and his rapid progress under instruction made him a great favourite with the prior, and a most tender and endearing friend, ship sprang up between them.

There was no wilder region in all Northumbria than that which these missionary monks were seeking to reclaim for Christ. Sedgy stretches, dotted here and there by rude kraals of huts, harbouring a barbarous peasantry; legions of hoarse-voiced water-fowl; vast bogs, over which the few travellers picked their way cautiously, looking out at once for holes and marauders; dense forests, wolf-haunted; and bleak uplands, smitten by the east winds, were the physical features of the missionary field. Mailross was the chief mission-station of northern Northumbria; and the slopes and plains where now the rich harvests of the Lowlands wave, were then the abode of wild beasts and half-civilised men. Not that the Northumbrian peasants were altogether savage, like the "unintelligible men" of Wales and Wessex, or the tribes north and west of the Grampians. The Northumbrian court was Christian, and sturdy and independent as the thralls might be, they were influenced by the thanes, who in their turn were influenced by the king. It is almost needless to add that in the seventh century the word "influence," as applied to the dealings of thanes with thralls, meant something more than the power which position always gives to persuasion. Absolute pagan worship had consequently become almost extinct in Berneira, though we should hesitate to acknowledge as Christianity that which succeeded it. When the monks of Mailross went forth to teach the peasants of the deep love of a personal God, they had to work on a mixture of enforced compliance with Christian rites and willing adherence to pagan superstitions. The All-Father and the Thunderer were far dearer to the rustics than the victim who perished in far-off Jerusalem, and they attributed the misfortunes which befell the enemies of the new faith to the displeasure of the ancestral deities. As the log rafts destined for the construction of Tynemouth Priory drifted helplessly out to sea, with their monkish labourers upon them, the churls who looked on cried, "Let no man pray for these men, nor God pity them, who have taken from us our old worship; and how their new-fangled customs are to be observed, nobody knows."

It was to teach these benighted ones of the Lord of heaven and earth, incarnate, and dying on Calvary, that Cuthbert went forth in his youth, vigour, and apostolic zeal. The people were not stolid, and everywhere he obtained large audiences, all the more ready to receive his message because he was no learned man from Italy or Ireland, and needed not an interpreter like these, or even like the Scottish monks from Lindisfarne; for the rude accents of Northumbria were on his tongue, and when he sought out the rough and poor, they knew that he was a peasant like themselves, fresh from keeping sheep. He was a man, too, of a vigorous frame, and at this time had nothing of the ascetic about him; and though abstemious in drink, he considered that a hearty dinner was an essential part of the day's duty. He was not a learned man, but he was a loving one. The fire of youth was tempered by a singular sweetness, which shone in his face and manner; and these natural advantages, added to strong convictions, a keen sense of humour, and vigorous common sense, gave him a peculiar command over his hearers, to whose emotions and reason he simultaneously appealed. So—sometimes on foot, sometimes on horseback, battling with every species of hardship—the young monk traversed northern Northumbria, and afterwards penetrated the wild regions of Galloway, then called in England "the land of the Picts." It was hopeful and remunerative toil. The people were sometimes indignant, sometimes impracticable, but never apathetic.

Cuthbert, along with Luther and many other moderns, had a vivid belief in the personality and active agency of the devil. He regarded his missionary work as a direct onslaught upon the kingdom of Satan, and all opposition to it as the direct work of the "strong man armed." This belief gave a peculiar colouring to his view of both his successes and disappointments, as well as to his teaching. He invariably prefaced his addresses with a caution against both the open and masked attacks of the "roaring lion." For many years Cuthbert devoted himself with marvellous zeal and intensity to the work of preaching the gospel, visiting the wildest districts, and even scaling the rocky fastnesses of robbers in search of the lost sheep of Christ. An extraordinary account is given by Bede of the difficulties which he encountered and the prejudices which he combated. One of the last, under a form adapted to altered circumstances, was not fully eradicated from the Border for a thousand years after his death, namely, the use of incantations and other demoniacal mysteries, on behalf of dying persons who had embraced the Christian faith. Among the thousands of converts brought out from Paganism, and that mixture of Paganism and Christianity to which reference has been made before, during these years of evangelization, Cuthbert was most severe in his requirements. He preached the baptism of John as well as the gospel of Jesus. In his estimation, baptism was worth nothing unless the baptismal robes were kept unspotted from the world. No missionary has ever more strongly insisted upon the complete abandonment of ancestral superstitions, or upon a life of godliness, meekness, and purity.

But, though his success in these respects has justly earned for him the title of the "Apostle of Northumbria," it was not even by an arm so vigorous as his that the old tree could be altogether felled. A current of the thought and practice of the ancient Paganism ran for several generations underneath the modern Christianity. The supposed miraculous interventions of Cuthbert are limited to North Anglia; the mythic horse and bull connected with the Teutonic rites re-appear in his legendary history; and throughout the marvellous wanderings of his cofined corpse, the feeling which erected oratories and churches where the body rested is only the same (sanctified by the Christian faith) which led the Saxon to bring to "Woden the Wanderer" gifts on all high hills and by every wayside.

In the midst of these apostolic labours, Cuthbert was removed to Ripon to serve as hospitaller in Ripon monastery, to which Eata, the pious abbot of Mailross, had been appointed. The duty of receiving and serving strangers was generally considered one fraught with peril to young monks, as it brought them into contact with many godless and vain persons, but Cuthbert passed through the ordeal with singular fidelity to his profession, and was rejoiced to return to Mailross that he might further profit by the precepts and example of Baisil. A short time afterwards an epidemic, which ravaged and decimated the north of England, lighted on Mailross, and Cuthbert was among the first stricken. The disease progressed with its usual rapidity, and his brethren despaired of his life, but knowing how deeply his loss would affect the community, they devoted one whole night to prayer for his recovery. At daybreak his delirium had ceased, and they told him of their intercessions. "Then why am I lying here?" he asked, "for it is not to be believed that God despises the prayers of so many good men. Give me my stick and shoes." So saying, he rose, aided by his staff, and though he never fully recovered the shock of this illness, yet, thanks to his strong will and vigorous constitution, he began to mend from that very hour.

But deep sorrow awaited him. He had hardly regained his strength, when Baisil, his beloved master and friend, was laid low with the epidemic. Most touching is the brief story of the death of this holy man. "Cuthbert," he said, "you have recovered, and you must live a while longer; as to myself, I must die, and that soon, therefore I would have you to learn so long as I am able to teach." Cuthbert answered, "What is there that it would be advisable for us to read together that would occupy me for a week?" "St. John the Evangelist," replied Baisil, "I have a copy of it stitched in seven divisions; one of which, by the help of God, we may read daily, I, wherever need is, explaining it to thee." So for the space of seven days the disciple whom Jesus loved spoke to the dying prior and his mourning pupil, till on the eighth day, when the task was just completed, the Master Himself broke in upon their sublime converse, and Baisil and He departed together. Long years afterwards, this Gospel of John was laid in the coffin which contained the remains of Cuthbert, Bishop of Lindisfarne.

After the good Baisil's death Cuthbert became Prior of Mailross, and not satisfied either with the penitential austerities or the practices of a purely contemplative piety, which even then were crowding into monasteries, he redoubled his evangelistic labours, and, again traversing all Northumbria, he brought thousands of its half-heathenish inhabitants into a state of Christian docility. Of this, perhaps the best part of Cuthbert's career, six signal miracles are related by his biographers, which may be passed over advantageously, in favour of two simple tales connected with his missionary journeys, which we are as safe in accepting as in rejecting. On one occasion Cuthbert left Mailross accompanied only by a boy, and when the day was far spent, and both, tired and hungry, found themselves still far from their journey's end, the elder asked the younger, "Tell me, boy, where you intend to rest to-day, or whether you know any one on this path to give us food and shelter for the night?" "That's just what I've been thinking myself," the neophyte replied, "for we brought out no supper with us, and I know nobody on this road likely to give us any. It's a long way to travel fasting." The elder was not too tired to be hopeful, and said cheerfully, "Trust and hope in God, boy; he never dies of hunger who serves God faithfully. Look at that eagle flying over head; God can feed us through him if He likes." The eagle wheeled out of sight, but when they came to one of those wood-fringed beckes which brighten the slopes of the Border hills, they beheld him resting on the bank with his prey. "Sec," cried Cuthbert, "there is our supper settled for us as I told you. Run, boy, and bring the meat God sends us." The eagle, suddenly startled, flew away, leaving on the bank a good-sized fish, which the boy seized upon in triumph. "What have you done?" asked the humane evangelist; "why don't you give the provider his share?"

Quick, cut the fish in half and give the eagle the piece he deserves." So the bird and the travellers were both fed. On another occasion he was coasting along the shores of Galloway on a missionary tour in a small boat, with two brethren as his companions, when a storm drove them upon an uninhabited coast, and hindered for a time their further progress. The wind raged persistently from the same quarter, and having after a few days exhausted their provisions, they were in imminent danger of starvation.

Cuthbert, however, never lost the cheerfulness and humour which contributed largely to his success, and addressed his companion somewhat jocularly, even under these dismal circumstances. "Why don't you look for some way out of your difficulties? The snow closes our way along the shore, the storm our way over the sea; the way to heaven, however, is still open to our prayers." So they wandered over the rocks, praying as they went, and presently found in a hole some pieces of seal's flesh, ready cooked, left there probably by some wandering seal hunters. They gave thanks and ate ravenously, and the next day the sea offered no obstacle to their further progress.

We call such circumstances coincidences, or, at the most, providences, but the seventh century was as ready to believe in direct divine interposition as the nineteenth is to ignore it; and the "unilluminated" contemporaries of Cuthbert place these most simple incidents in the same category of miracles as the marvels vouchsafed to Elijah. The stories in themselves are credible enough, and there is a healthy, hearty, manly tone about them, which contrasts forcibly with the maudlin sentimentality of many of the legends concerning "saints." It is very probable that a large number of the "miracles" reported in these early biographies rest upon a solid substratum of fact, magnified or distorted by the pious, imaginative, and superstitious faith of our ancestors.

After bringing multitudes of the Northumbrians to a saving knowledge of the true God, and imbuing his brethren with a spirit of fervent zeal and piety, Cuthbert left Mailross to become prior of the great monastery of Lindisfarne, of which his friend Eata was abbot, bearing with him the character indicated by Basil's first address to him, "Behold an Israelite indeed, in whom is no guile!" This was in 664. Shortly before, in consequence of the decision of the Witenagemot at Whitby, establishing the Roman ideas on the Eastern and tonsure disputes, Lindisfarne had sustained a great blow in the departure of the Scottish monks by whom it had been ruled, and who refused to accept the new order. Eata, the new abbot, was a disciple of Aidan, so also was Cuthbert, the new prior; but both accepted the decision of Whitby, and their first task on removing to Lindisfarne was to conciliate the remainder of its inmates to Roman rule. The monastery was not only weakened by the departure of the Scottish monks, but had just been decimated by a terrible pestilence which had swept over Northumbria. However, the fame of the piety of Eata and Cuthbert soon raised it to more than its former glory. It was crowded with monks at once remarkable for their personal sanctity and their evangelistic zeal, and though the Rule of Columba was exchanged for the Rule of Benedict, and the order of prayer was altered, and the monks were clothed in the Benedictine habit, the old missionary spirit imported from Iona had lost none of its aggressive tendencies, and Lindisfarne, under Cuthbert, made perpetual onslaughts upon the superstitions and low nominal Christianity of all Northumbria.

There were no drones among the monks of Lindisfarne, little learned leisure, no pomp, no luxuries. They built their own wooden churches, which were thatched with reeds and strewn with bent, and their humble wattled habitations, tilled their own soil, and wove the stuff for their coarse garments of undyed wool. The vow of poverty was sacredly kept, the rigid discipline sacredly observed. Owing to the frightful abuses which some years later crept into monastic institutions, rendering their suppression a necessity when the fierce light of the Reformation beat upon them, we are in some danger of forgetting that "from the beginning it was not so." In the days of Cuthbert, the monasteries were not only the great religious but the great civilising influence—the only seats of learning, biblical and classical—the only schools of music, painting, and architecture. They were, in fact, the mission stations of a semi-pagan land, the colleges in which the future preachers and teachers of England were trained, the schools to which kings, nobles, and thralls resorted for instruction in the Christian faith, the abodes in which copies of the Scripture were multiplied at the cost of infinite labour, the refuges to which all the perplexed and afflicted resorted in their time of need.

Lindisfarne was not only the great centre of missionary activity, but a dwelling from which the sound of prayer and praise ascended continually to heaven. The monks, at whose feet kings and thanes were sitting for instruction, were as poor as those of Mailross, spending the money bestowed upon them in gifts to the poor, and the ransom of slaves and prisoners of war. Repose alternated with movement and activity. Missionaries were daily returning to the Holy Island, with news of the spread of the gospel throughout the land, of kings entering the baptismal waters along with the humblest of their subjects, of ill-gotten wealth given up to the work of the Church, of thousands pressing to hear the glad tidings. So speaking, they fired the younger brethren with zeal, while they refreshed themselves with the study of the Scriptures, with solitary meditation, and in committing to memory those psalms and hymns which were already the war cries of an aggressive Christianity. Then, again, going forth, two and two, after drinking of the still waters of comfort, the Lindisfarne brethren preached Christ, bearing precious seed, sowing beside all waters, to return again with rejoicing, bringing their sheaves with them. It might have been supposed that the conviction which led Cuthbert, many years afterwards, to seek a hermit's cell, was the result of work untempered by worship; but it was not so, for the custom of Lindisfarne had absolutely wedded the twain. "The Hours" were rigidly observed, solitary meditation was a rule as well as a delight. As the east wind set towards the Northumbrian shore, there was never a midnight on which the solemn strains of the Ambrosian hymn, Mediæ noctis tempus est, were not wafted upon the ears of the peasants, and when the long lines of breakers rolled in over ugly reefs, to spread themselves over the broad brown sands, and the dawn flushed the pale, cold waves of the eastern sea with its first ruddy light, the returning fishers were awed into prayerfulness by the sweet cadence of the "hymn for the cock-crowing," Æterne rerum conditor, with which Ambrose had sustained the hearts of his flock beleaguered in the Milan Basilica two centuries before.

These were the surroundings amidst which Cuthbert found himself when he entered upon his duties as prior of Lindisfarne in 664. From henceforth his life emerges into the detailed narrative bequeathed to us by an anonymous monk of Lindisfarne.

ISABELLA L. BIRD.

BEGINNING WITH THE YEAR.

TO THE YOUNG.

We all know it is no easy matter, in some instances, to determine with certainty the real source, or sources, of a river. In the case of most of the great rivers, the sources are not easily reached—they are far off and high up; hundreds or thousands of miles must be trodden by the adventurous traveller before he comes even into the region where they may be found. And when he is there, standing by the very cradle of the waters, he finds, it may be, several streams from different hillsides, each having some claim to the honour of being the head: and when he, at length, assigns the honour to some one—if he does not give it equally to several—he does this on no inevitable principle of law for the case, but from taste, from personal opinion, or in a quite arbitrary manner. Or he finds that he can trace the river back to some one hillside or "mossy bed," out of which, however, a good many "new-born rills" come "trickling." So that while the whole earthly source of the river may be said, in one way, to lie quite open to the view, yet no human power can tell, exactly, where the flow begins. Or, again, he finds that the river issues at once, and in a considerable fountain, from the bosom of the earth. "Here at least can be no uncertainty." Yet even here an intelligent traveller has to think, that no water comes out of the earth that did not go into it. His imagination therefore starts on a subterranean journey, following the bendings of the strata, and comes out to the light once more perhaps in a moss, or mountain hollow, or amid the mists and showers of mountain tops. In fact, it does come to this, most literally and simply, that every river begins in the air.

Herein is a parable for behoof of those who are apt to be over-wise, or over-curious, or over-anxious, about the real beginning of the religious life in the individual. What if we are not able to find it? What if it lies deep down, or far back, within the circle of that mystery which will be found to envelop all vital beginnings? Are we the worse for not knowing what God never meant us to know?—for not seeing what only Omniscience can descry? Jeremiah was "sanctified before he came forth out of the womb,"—his religion, implicitly, began before his life. Timothy had "faith" which "dwelt first in his grandmother," and then "in his mother." Paul was converted on the way to Damascus, we may say almost in a moment. But who can tell how many preparatory things had led up to that wonderful change—his religious education and his incorruptible conscience among them? Separate streams of influence flow into each individual being from the first, and we never can be sure that we stand at the ultimate springs. Religion in the soul, like water in the river, comes originally out of the air. "Every good gift, and every perfect gift, cometh down from above."

But now, who cares for the real fountal springs of the rivers of the world, beyond a few scientific persons? Manifestly, the thing of real interest to men concerning a river is, that it really becomes and continues such—that it irrigates the country through which it flows, turns the mill-wheel, washes the city that sits clean on its banks, and, as it rolls to the sea, becomes the shelter of ships, and the highway of nations. The Nile will be just the Nile, neither more nor less, after its sources have been discovered and determined.

How a young man becomes religious—under what specific impressions and emotions—is in reality a quite secondary question. But that he should really become and continue religious and good, matters everything to him—self, and matters very much also to many other people who are and will be connected with him. Now I want in this paper to commend to the young, and especially to young men, the practical beginning of the religious life—its first great comprehensive act—viz., a present, conscious, full-hearted, consecration to God. This practical beginning is common to all the varieties of religious experience. In this they all converge.* There are those who may be said, in a manner, to enter the kingdom of God in their birth, and who as far as can be known grow up in its grace—not without difficulties and struggles, yet, on the whole truly, “in the nurture and admonition of the Lord.” Surely it is not unreasonable to invite such young people to make a pause at the gate of this year and at the gate of their own manhood and womanhood, in order to realise, express, and confirm in one glad solemn act their own religious life. There are those who, if born in the kingdom, went early out of it (I am speaking of the facts as they seem, and in no way either advancing or opposing any doctrinal theory) and far away. But they have been “converted”—turned round, and, with homeward yearnings in their hearts, set on the homeward way. Surely we may invite them to corroborate in their own consciousness and by their own acts what they hope God has done for them. What is conversion that does not become consecration, but an empty name, a metaphysical subtlety as shifting as the sands? There are those too who sometimes hope that they have had grace from the first, but are not quite sure. Then let them now make sure—not by giving to the past one anxious thought, the less they think of it the better, but by accepting the grace which is present, and which is full, free, and “sufficient” for all the needs of those who trust in it, and by offering fealty and life service to God. And there are those who know and feel that they are not “of the household of faith,” and that they are not living a trustful and obedient life; who yet at times seem almost to long for it, and feel as though they could begin it at once if they might, and were it not that the profound pre-requisite of the new birth in order to any real goodness in man, stands darkly in their imagination as a thing yet unfulfilled, and which they have, of themselves, no power to fulfil. To those in this condition I would call with peculiar earnestness to come forward at once and without misgiving, to the humble and resolute discharge of this great and blessed duty of personal consecration to God through Jesus Christ: and let them not doubt, but most steadfastly believe, that whatever needs to be done by divine power will not be left undone, and that God's regenerating grace will be the strength of every good purpose they form, and the vital air of every holy thought they cherish. No young man alive who “repents”—changes his mind, and “converts himself”—turns or changes his whole behaviour and outward life, according to the apostolic exhortation of Acts iii. 19, where both verbs are in the active form, will be left unconverted of God. What is this consecration which we are commending but conversion realised, and corroborated, and declared? I wish I knew how to proclaim with energy and emphasis enough, the simple, and when believed all-enabling truth, that we have nothing to do but begin. “Come! for all things are now ready.” “Who is willing to consecrate himself?”

1. Let it be laid deeply in the mind, and firmly held in belief, that this is possible. Possible to every living human creature. More easily possible, if we may say so, to the young, than to those who have lived a number of years uncommitted and at large. Possible—not merely according to some theological or philosophic theory which is constructed to cover human life, and to which the hardest facts are made to bend, but practically and really possible, just as other things are, which we seriously think of, resolve on, and do. So long as doubts on this point are entertained, or even permitted by sufferance, a fatal paralysis, more or less deep, will lie on the very nerve of moral decision, on the very spring of the living will. It were well, therefore, to compel these doubts to definiteness and express themselves, one by one, that they may, one by one, be answered. “Can I be pardoned?” This question is sure to be among the first to arise, and is sure to flit in a dim and darkening way about the heart; and in moments of silence the croaking answer of the poet's famous raven will seem to fill the air—Pardoned? “Never, never more!” That a great act of divine forgiveness must precede and accompany a real beginning of religious living in man is, of necessity, assumed. The very idea of consecration, dated from “this present,” supposes the opposite of that, or the lack of that hitherto. And the opposite of that is sin—daily forgetfulnesses and denials of God, heedlessness, passion, consecration to self. We never read in the Bible of small forgivenesses for few and little sins. Our “sins, which are many” and “great,”

are forgiven. The dark thunder-cloud is "blotted out;" the mountain is cast into the sea. "And is this really possible?" is the question; a question which agitates and darkens the young mind quite as much as it sometimes does those of riper years. And some wise men (men who are wise in other things) answer the question in the negative—say "No: we shall find no place for repentance, though we seek it carefully with tears. Nature" (nature is their God) "never relents; nor cancels; nor goes back; no forgiveness is possible: only amendment." A sad case, indeed! That declared to be impossible, without which, it is felt, amendment cannot even begin! If this were all we had to look to, and speak of to each other, the feeling would soon be universal that the less we speak of religious things to each other the better. But on the forefront of the gospel we see the word "forgiveness." Full acquittance and release are written out, as in larger letters, in the preface to the message, so that none need despair, and so that each may see that there is for him the glorious possibility of entering upon a new and consecrated life, disburdened and unimpeded. "There is no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus." "To the Lord our God belong forgivenesses." They are of his very nature. The forgiving disposition is his eternally; and, instead of being checked and frozen by the perpetual calls of our need, is only brought out the more by the sight of human miseries and anxieties. Does any one wish, in fresh youth, to begin to live unto God? The Saviour meets him with this word—"Thy sins are forgiven thee."

"But have I got anything really worthy in me to consecrate? For after all if one comes forward to a great altar with an offering, there ought to be some worth in the offering. Am I conscious of any in myself? Am I not conscious of the very reverse? Would it not be better to wait until there has been healing, and growth, and some gatherings of goodness, and then come—with some treasure in the vessel for the Master's use?" Oh, no! Seven times no. For there never will be treasure in the vessel until it is consecrated. There can be no healing of our moral nature, no growing of our spiritual affections and principles away from God. His touch is healing and strength. His breath is purity. His loving-kindness is better than life.

"But consecration is a promise for the future—for all the future. How dare we pledge ourselves to anything so vast? What security have we for the accomplishment of this immense promise to God that we shall be his for ever?" The answer is, that we have no security in ourselves at all, and that we take security of God. Rather we, by gracious allowance, give God security in himself for the fulfilment of our life-vow. We refer Him to his own promise, to his own fidelity, and feel that in so doing we are building on the rock.

In one word, the gospel, in its whole practical intent and influence on the life and character, is a donation of "power." We, strengthless in ourselves, are able to do all things through Christ strengthening. His grace is sufficient. It is a gift to us of divine ability, perpetually renewed. It enables us to do and be all we will and all we wish as renewed creatures; and it is peculiarly present and available to all who sincerely wish to be renewed and consecrated to God.

2. This consecration is a great act—the greatest which can be performed by a single individual. If we can reach greatness at all, it will be evidently in such an act as this—conscious and voluntary offering up of ourselves, in wholeness, and without any reserve, unto God. To realise this fully and intensely will be some help to the doing of it. As thus:—"I am now come to myself—to my better, real self. I am henceforth to put away from my being the usurping lower self which had grown around the better, and pressed it almost to extinction. I am to 'put off the old man' which had been creeping and growing around me, although I am yet so young. I am now to wear 'the beauty of the Lord my God upon me'—to 'live, and move, and have my' intellectual and moral 'being in Him.' I am to summon my best powers and dedicate them to the best uses. My strongest affections and passions are now to be set on the noblest, purest, fairest objects. My life is now to be ruled by conscience, drawn out in practical wisdom from day to day, made strong in justice, touched by sensibility, filled with self-sacrificing love, and so offered to God! And this, not for a little while, but for ever! A great act, assuredly, if I am capable of a great act at all. I am fearfully and wonderfully made!" Yes. You are ascending the steps of that great altar, before which, when you reverently stand, you will be as in the sight of men and angels! You are beginning the performance of a continuous act, which will inseparably associate you with all the loyalty and faithfulness in the universe! You may be said now, and thus, almost to clasp hands with the excellent of the earth, and the illustrious of the sky.

3. This act, however, can be great only in proportion as it is done in wholeness. We know what a crack is in a costly vase: what a deep stain or cut is in a fine painting: what a little oozing of water through the bank of a reservoir may come to: what a worm can do at the heart of an acorn, or at the root of a flower. These are emblems by no means too strong of an act of professed consecration not made in wholeness. In the old times God never would accept a sacrifice with a flaw. He rejected such an offering with emphatic indignation. It might be much or little in itself—bullock, lamb, turtle-dove, or young pigeon—all that was left to the disposition, and made dependent on the circumstances, of the offerer, but it must be without blemish. Wholeness does not mean perfection realised; but it does mean perfection purposed. It means that no allowance is given to sin by the self-devoting soul; that there is no reservation of anything possessed; and that the future, without stipulation, is put into the hands of God. Religion, as a business and an enterprise in this world, will be found, by the individual, to be easy or difficult exactly in the proportion in which there has been wholeness, or the opposite, in the individual consecration. When all the inward powers and emotions, and all the more outward activities are united in a holy happy league, and held, day by day, in singleness of service, life is comparatively easy. While, on the other hand, if there be internal dissension among the powers, or an allowed infirmity in the general purpose, storms and struggles will of necessity arise. No doubt there are some natures which make storm as they go. They have that in them which changes the moral atmosphere and challenges opposition. But then, as compensation, such natures experience a kind of joy in conflict, which in their case adds nothing, or very little, to the difficulty of religious obedience. No doubt also there are some natures which make peace as they go. By temperament they have it, as much as by religious faithfulness. But the general truth remains that we partly make the conditions of our own life as we pass along. The spirit and aim of the pilgrim make the rough or smooth path. "I entreated thy favour with my whole heart." "Then shall I not be ashamed, when I have respect unto all thy commandments."

4. Surely it were well to give this act of consecration such embodiment and expression as will present it, and keep it before the mind in the most solemn and affecting light.

Each one must find for himself the best means of doing this. It may be that you can do it all, and do it best, in the silence of the mind. Or, it may be wise for you to speak it, in some solemn sentences, for your own hearing. What should hinder a young man from opening the Bible some night, in the quiet of his own room, and reading out David's words to God, as his own—"O Lord, truly I am thy servant; I am thy servant. Thou hast loosed my bonds?" Or you might even write it out, as a covenant between yourself and God for ever. "Set your hand and seal to it," says the saintly Doddridge, "that on such a day of such a month and year, and at such a place, on full consideration, you came to this happy resolution—that whatever others might do, you would serve the Lord." He then gives a form of consecration at some length, of which these solemn and tender words make the close—"Receive, O heavenly Father, thy returning prodigal! Wash me in the blood of thy dear Son! Clothe me with thy perfect righteousness, and sanctify me throughout by the power of thy Spirit. And, O Lord, when thou seest the agonies of dissolving nature upon me, remember this covenant even though I should then be incapable of recollecting it, and look with pitying eye upon thy dying child. Put strength and confidence into my departing spirit, and receive it to the embraces of thine everlasting love."

5. Finally, whatever form the self-consecration may take, give good heed that it be transacted and accomplished in very humble and sincere dependence on divine grace. You know not what the future is to be—what suns may shine, what storms may blow, what fires may burn, what friends may be snatched from you, how hard it may be in some places and times of that unknown future to keep your vow; and it may, therefore, seem almost presumptuous to make it. Meet and cover all that unknown future with this one promise, which has all other promises in the heart of it—"My grace is sufficient for thee." Trusting to that one promise, you cannot fail. He who makes that promise will keep it to your heart's comfort, in all the changes of your life, and through the darkness of your dying hour. Rivers must freeze in their fountains, and flowers wither to their roots, and the light die out of every star, before it can fail in fulfilment. He who gives himself to God, has God as the strength of his heart and his portion for ever.

ALEXANDER RALEIGH.

A MISTAKE.

SCENE I.

THE summer sun was high and strong,
 And dust was on the traveller's feet;
 Oh weary was the stage and long,
 And burning was the early heat.
 There was a pause. For Ernest stood
 Upon the borders of a wood.
 Between him and his home it lay,
 Stretching in mystery away.
 What might be there he could not tell,
 Of briery steep or mossy dell,
 Of bog or brake, of glen or glade,
 All hidden by the dim green shade.
 He had not passed that way before;
 And wonderingly he waited now,
 While mystic voices, o'er and o'er,
 Soft whispered on from bough to bough.
 Oh was it only wind and trees,
 That made such gentle whisperings?
 Or was it some sweet spirit-breeze
 That bore a message on its wings,
 And bid the traveller, that day,
 Go forward on his woodland way?
 How should he know? He had no clue;
 And more than one fair opening lay
 Before him, where the broad boughs threw
 Cool, restful shade across the way.
 Which should he choose? He could not trace
 The onward track by vision keen;
 The drooping branches interlace,
 Not far the winding paths are seen.
 Oh for a sign! Were choice not right,
 Was no return, for well he knew
 The hours were short, and swift the night;
 Once entered, he must hasten through.
 For what hath been can never be
 As if it had not been at all;
 We gaze, but nevermore can we Retrace one footstep's wavering fall.
 Oh how we need from day to day,
 A guiding Hand for all the way!
 Oh how we need from hour to hour,
 That faithful, ever-present Power!
 Which should he choose? He pondered long,
 And with the sound of bird and bee,
 He blent an oft-repeated song,
 A soft and suppliant melody.
 "Oh for a light from heaven,
 Clear and divine,
 Now on the paths before me
 Brightly to shine!
 Oh for a hand to beckon!
 Oh for a voice to say,
 'Follow in firm assurance,
 This is the way!'"
 "List'ning to mingling voices,
 Seeking a guiding hand,
 Watching for light from heaven,
 Waiting I stand.
 Onward and homeward pressing,
 Nothing my feet should stay,
 Might I but plainly hear it,
 'This is the way.'"
 Was it indeed an answer given,
 That whisper in the tree-tops o'er him?
 Was it indeed a light from heaven,
 That fell upon the path before him?

Or was it only that he met
 The wayward playing of the breeze,
 Parting the heavy boughs to let
 The sunshine fall among the trees?
 Again he listened—did it say,
 "This is the onward, homeward way?"
 Perhaps it did. He would not wait,
 But, pressing towards a Mansion Gate
 That, yet unseen, all surely stood
 Beyond that untried, unknown wood,
 And trusting that his prayer was heard,
 Although he caught no answering word,
 And gazing on with calm, clear eye
 The straightest, surest path to spy,
 (Not seeking out the smooth and bright,
 If he might only choose the right),
 With hopeful heart, and manly tread,
 Into the forest depths he sped.

SCENE II.

Hours flit on, and the sunshine fails in the zenith of day;
 Hours flit on, and' the loud wind, crashes and moans o'er the ridge;
 Heavily beateth the strong rain, lashing the miry
 clay,
 Hoarsely roareth the torrent under the quivering bridge.
 Under the shivering pine-trees, over the slippery stone,
 Over the rugged boulder, over the cold wet weed, Ernest, the traveller, passeth, storm-beaten, weary, and lone,
 Only following faintly whither the path may lead.
 Leading down to the valleys, dank in the shadow of death,
 Leading on through the briers, poisonous, keen,
 and sore;
 Leading up to the grim rocks, mounted with panting breath,
 Only to gain a shuddering glimpse of sterner toil before.
 Faint, and wounded and bleeding, hungry, thirsty, and chill,
 Hardly a step before him seen through the tangled brake, Rougher and wilder the storm-blast, steeper the thorn-grown hill,
 Brave heart, and bright eye, and strong limb, well may they quiver and ache!
 Was it indeed the right way? was it a God-led choice, Followed in faith and patience, and chosen not for ease?
 Was it a false, false gleam, and a mocking, mocking voice
 That fell on the woodland pathway and murmured among the trees?
 Oh the dire mistake! fatal freedom to choose!
 Had he but taken a fair path, sheltered, level, and straight,
 Never a thorn to wound him, never a stone to bruise,
 Leading safely and softly on to the Mansion Gate!
 Was it the wail of a wind-harp, cadencing weird and long,
 Pulsing under the pine-trees, dying to wake again?
 Is it the voice of a brave heart striving to utter in song
 Agony, prayer, and reliance, courage, and wonder, and pain?

" Onward and homeward ever,
 Battling with dark distress ;
 Faltering, but yielding never,
 Still shall my faint feet press.
 Why was no beckoning hand
 Sent in my doubt and need ?
 Why did no true guide stand
 Guiding me right indeed ?
Why ? They will tell me all
 When I have reached the Gate
 Where, in the shining hall,
 Many my coming wait.

" Oh the terrible night
 Falling without a star !
 Darkness anear ; but light,
 Glorious light, afar.
 Oh the perilous way !
 Oh the pitiless blast !
 Long though I suffer and stray
 There will be rest at last.
 Perhaps I have far to go !
 Perhaps but a little way !
 Well that I do not know !
 Onward ! I must not stay.

" Splinter and thorn and brier
 Yet may be sore and keen :
 Rocks may be rougher and higher,
 Hollows more chill between.
 There may be torrents to cross,
 Bridgeless, and fierce with foam ;
 Rest in the wild wood were loss,
 There will be rest at home.
 Battling with dark distress,
 Faltering but yielding never,
 Still shall my faint feet press
 Onward and homeward ever !"

Pulsing under the pine-trees, dying, dying,—and gone,—

Gone that Æolian cadence, silent the firm refrain.
 Only the howl of the storm-wind rages cruelly on ;
 Has the traveller fallen, vanquished by toil and pain ?

SCENE III.

Morning, morning on the mountains, golden-vestured, snowy-browed !
 Morning light of clear resplendence, shining forth without a cloud ;
 Morning songs of jubilation, thrilling through the crystal air,
 Morning joy upon all faces, new and radiant, pure and fair !

At the portals of the mansion, Ernest stands and gazes back.
 There is light upon the river, light upon the forest track,
 Light upon the darkest valley, light upon the sternest height,
 Light upon the brake and bramble,—everywhere that glorious light !

Strong and joyous stands the traveller, in that morning glory now,
 Not a shade upon the brightness of the cool and peaceful brow,—
 Not a trace of weary faintness, not a touch of lingering pain,
 Not a scar to wake the memory of the suffering hours again.

Onward by the winding pathway many another journeyed fast,
 Hastening to the princely mansion by the way that he had passed ;
 Spared the doubting and the erring by those footsteps bravely placed In the clogging mire, or trampling on the wounding bramble-waste.

Some had followed close behind him, pressing to the self-same mark,
 Cheered and guided by the refrain of that singer in the dark ;
 Some were near him in the tempest while he thought himself alone,
 And regained a long-lost pathway following that beckoning tone.

Some who patiently, yet feebly, sought to reach that mansion too, Caught the unseen singer's courage, battled on with vigour new ;
 Some, exhausted in the struggle, sunk in slumber chill and deep,
 Started at that strange voice near them, rousing from their fatal sleep.

Now they meet and gather round him, and together enter in Where the rest is consummated and the joys of home begin,
 Where the tempest cannot reach them, where the wanderings are past,
 Where the sorrows of the journey not a single shadow cast.

Singing once in dismal forest, singing once in cruel storm,
 Singing now at home in gladness in the sunshine bright and warm,
 Once again the voice resoundeth, pouring forth a happy song,
 While a chorus of rejoicing swells the sweet notes full and long :

" Light after darkness,
 Gain after loss,
 Strength after suffering,
 Crown after cross.
 Sweet after bitter,
 Song after sigh,
 Home after wandering,
 Praise after cry.

" Sheaves after sowing,
 Sun after rain,
 Sight after mystery,
 Peace after pain.
 Joy after sorrow,
 Calm after blast,
 Rest after weariness,
 Sweet rest at last.

" Near after distant,
 Gleam after gloom,
 Love after loneliness,
 Life after tomb.
 After long agony
 Rapture of bliss !
Right was the pathway Leading to this !"

CROOKED PLACES:

A Story of Struggles and Hopes.

By EDWARD GARRETT, AUTHOR OF "OCCUPATIONS OF A RETIRED LIFE," ETC.

PART II.—HOW GOD GUIDED A GENIUS.

CHAPTER V.—MILLICENT'S PROMOTION.

HERE is no use in denying that Mrs. Harvey felt a keen thrill of pleasure and triumph the first time that her daughter Millicent was included with George to an evening party. Superficial people might suppose that the courage of her justice and the brightness of her self-sacrifice would have raised her above the minor pleasures and triumphs of life. Never. The great includes all beneath it. Nay, small pleasures are bigger and more important in large hearts than in small ones, only they are kept in due proportion. The quaint gargyles of a cathedral are larger than those of a domestic chapel, yet they neither darken the painted window, nor obscure the vaulted roof.

Milly's social promotion delighted the mother twice as much as the girl. It was so strange to Milly, that it rather troubled her. To Mrs. Harvey, it seemed a delightful, easy, and natural return to old ways.

"I'm sorry I have not lace to give you, my dear," were her first words on the occasion. "Your grandmother left me some beautiful pieces, but it was all sold with the other things. But fine white net is always lady-like, and it is not expensive."

"Am I to go then?" Milly asked, with a slight flush deepening on her pale cheek.

"Of course you are, child! Why should you not go to your vicar's house, when he honours you with such a kind invitation? The vicar's lady has written the note herself, for I know her handwriting."

"I wish they had asked you instead, mother."

"Nonsense, child. What can they know of me, or expect me to be, but a poor, working woman? They pay me the highest possible compliment by acknowledging that my children are fit for their society."

"I'd rather they'd set me down as the same as you, whatever they think that is, mother," said Milly sturdily, with a slight toss of the head, and a bewitching pout that gave a piquancy to the characteristic nose and lips.

"They'll see she's pretty at the vicarage," thought the mother fondly, "though they'll be too well-bred to tell her so, as Hatty's set did."

"We'll take a drive to the West-end," Mrs. Harvey observed presently, "and go shopping at the establishment in Pall Mall, where my mother and I always dealt. I never see anything like the things that came from there. I would sooner wear one of their calicoes than other people's poplins. Plain things may be as cheap and humble as one chooses, or one's purse compels, but anything like luxury must always be good. Cheap necessaries are respectable. Cheap finery is low."

Mrs. Harvey's heart was in a secret flutter when they started on their expedition. She had never been in that particular section of the West-end since she left it in the forlorn first days of her widowhood. Life makes little distances very long sometimes.

The going back to an old long-unvisited haunt gives one a strange, sudden realisation of the full weight and meaning of all that has happened between former times and the present. Among all the strange people thronging the familiar streets none seemed so strange to Mrs. Harvey as the vision of her old self. What a weak, perplexed, despairing self it seemed! The consciousness of gained height and strength came to her, as in another sense it comes to the wanderer who returns home to find that the inaccessible mountains of his childhood are but mole-hills to his travelled eye.

The memory of herself in her widow's mourning, with hot eyes burning beneath her black veil, and heart torn with its own desperate energy and determination, seemed so strange that Mrs. Harvey caught herself recalling it as "poor thing," and pitying it as if it were a stranger!

The pair looked very insignificant customers in the great, wealthy, magnificent West-end emporium. They were very careful not to buy an unnecessary yard of black silk, though to Milly her mother seemed recklessly extravagant over the fineness and quantity of the net, and the perfection of the Limerick lace gloves, of which a pair was bought at last, folded in a walnut-shell tied up with pink ribbons. But it was not silk, or net, or lace that Mrs. Harvey was buying, but the halo of old days, the long-abnegated graces and daintinesses of her early life, like jewels that had seemed lost, while only secretly taken away by some kind hand, that they may be given back re-set in the finest gold. Staid Mrs. Harvey, eagerly directing her daughter's purchases, felt oddly like the light-hearted girl who had once gone to that shop with that dear mother dead so long ago.

Then they came out of the shop and peeped about St. Martin's Church, and Mrs. Harvey confided to Milly some of the glories of her wedding day. Then they sauntered past a rich, staid-looking goldsmith's shop, the abode of one of Mrs. Harvey's old sweet-hearts, but she said nothing about that—only remarked that "Mr. Needham was still in his accustomed place." Then they went down Buckingham Street, and surveyed the Willow Walk. Their old house was sub-let in sets of chambers. Hundreds of old reminiscences came crowding back on the widow's mind. Things that had lain apparently quite forgotten, rose before her as freshly as if they had happened yesterday. And Milly saw a light come into her mother's eyes, that brought tears to hers.

"Dear child," whispered Mrs. Harvey, pressing her daughter's hand within her arm. "Do not cry for me. It has all been so well and so good, and I am so thankful to God that it is all safely over!"

And then they returned home, and set themselves to their pretty needle-work. Millicent herself was quite docile in the hands of her mother and Miss Brook. She was sure they wished to make her look nice, and that they would know better on such matters than she did. At least, if they and George were pleased, anyhow, that was all she cared about. She enjoyed their interest intensely, and thought that the party would at least give her something to tell them. She would have plenty of time to notice everything, for she did not expect to know any other guests at the vicarage, and quite realised that George's society was likely to be claimed by people who would not trouble themselves about her. Milly was in much the same mental and moral state as George had been in his early working-days—far more inclined to look on the world, than to mingle in it.

But Mrs. Harvey caught sight of her daughter's mood, and straightway exhorted her. Her etiquette was of that perennial sort which grows from Christianity.

"You have not only to be happy in your own fashion, Milly," she said, "you must help other people to be happy, and you must make your hostess' task easy, by letting her see that you are happy. That is the reason why we wish your dress to be pretty and pleasing; we owe it to our fellow-creatures to make ourselves cheerful and agreeable in their sight."

"Then, I'm sure it's a debt most people are willing to ruin themselves to pay, mother," said Milly.

"No, no, child," Mrs. Harvey answered, "the dress which ruins people is not planned out of kindness, but out of malice, not to please, but to provoke. I have known people who were always slovens among those they professed to love, take the greatest pains with their toilets when they went among rivals whom they disliked."

"Well, mamma, I can understand that," said Milly, "for when we were in the mercer's, the other day, I could not help wishing that papa's cousins might happen to come in and see us!"

"My dear, my dear," replied Mrs. Harvey, "don't let that feeling creep into your heart. Why cannot we drink up our own cups of innocent delight, without leaving a dreg to turn sour and physic others?"

Young Mrs. Webber was in and out constantly during those days. Last of all she brought a gift from her husband for Milly.

"The only thing I ever longed to have!" the delighted girl cried, as she held it up. It was a delicate little miniature of Mrs. Harvey set in seed pearls. "It must have been you who thought of it, Hatty."

"That it wasn't," Hatty answered eagerly. "James is just the man to know what to give everybody. I was thinking of buying you a big gold brooch; but says he, 'Hatty, won't it be better to give something worth twenty times more than the money it costs?'"

Miss Brook had her offering also. It was a coral necklace.

"I've worn it myself, in my time," she said, frowning. "I don't know whether you'll think it's any the worse for that. Mind, I don't say you will. It's forty year old, but it's the kind of thing that when it's fashionable, it's fashionable, and when it ain't, it's everything else."

Mr. and Mrs. Webber and the little Webbers came to tea the evening before the party, and Milly indulged them by dressing herself in her gala robes and giving them all ten minutes' sight of her. They might be only the "every-day wear" of thousands of women—the neat black silk, the net kerchief and ruff, and scarlet posy, the quaint necklet and the loving pendant. Little things, mere outward, transient things may be. But the royal crown and sceptre are only outward things too, the sovereignty is not in them. They are only symbols. Every palpable thing in this world is only a symbol. Let those who despise the symbols beware lest they lose the things symbolized.

The two old women and the little children, the middle-aged man, and the happy brother and sister crowded round the laughing girl and twitched her this way and that, and commented and praised.

"I like the look of it, because it's a dress fit to live in—not only got up for an occasion," said Mr. Webber. "I've seen ladies with artificial flowers and false pearls sewn over their skirts, that all went smash when they sat down."

"Don't the red coral and ribbons come out beautiful, among the black and white?" remarked Hatty.

"You're like your grandmother, child," said Mrs. Harvey. "You know she was smaller than me. I've always wished I could have kept her life-size portrait painted in just such dress as that: but God has given me a living picture instead."

"I've never seen anything prettier," said George, adding playfully, "and I'm an authority, because I've been to many parties already."

"Ah, but I won't believe your praises," Milly retorted archly; "because you are my guardian, and you'll want to make me contented with myself to keep me from being extravagant." And with a roguish tug of his hair, she ran off to disrobe, followed by Miss Brook.

"It's all very nice, Millicent," she said, "and it's quite natural and right; but you'll find there's nothing in life that holds, except one's prayers and one's work."

CHAPTER VI.—A CASE OF CHRONIC DISEASE OF THE TONGUE, WITH HEART-COMPLICATIONS.

GEORGE HARVEY was not destined to carry to his innocent evening party the light heart he had borne the night before.

He had recently published a small book of essays and dramatic conversations, and had thereby got into the hands of the reviewers. George was by no means a person to be killed by a word; indeed, the sooner such sensitive people are put out of their misery the better. He had stood his beatings like a man, laughing to read meanings assigned to him which he had never meant, amused to find himself condemned for ignorance because of the grammatical or other blunders he had depicted in characters where such were natural, humble and attentive under honest criticism, warmly thankful for judicious praise.

But on the morning of the party, chancing to go into a bookseller's shop, he took up a certain paper, and read a fresh review of his "Talks and Meditations."

"What a delightful title!" it began. "We suppose it is intended to be redolent of the learned leisure of the cathedral cloister, or the well-appointed vicarage. Some green 'prentice boy, who can get nobody to talk to him, has talked to himself, imagining that his own poor, thin individuality can evolve other characters from its own non-existent moral consciousness. Mr. G. Harvey, whoever he may be, thinks that if he had been permitted to take a hand in the creation of the world, he could have been of material assistance to the Creator. Having arrived on the scene too late for this, he feels his next best step is to declare himself in the secrets of the universe, and pass judgment on the mysteries of existence in much the same spirit as a pigmy ascertaining the stature of a giant by measuring his little toe! This raw youth must have been brought up among the muffins and toast of Little Bethel tea-fights, for he is actually narrow-minded and foolish enough to believe in the antedated scriptural dogma that 'godliness is profitable unto all things, both in the life which now is, and in that which is to come.' He thinks that 'he is the man,' and 'that wisdom will die with him,' a fault which one never finds except among religionists, and which really puts such below the notice of easy, tolerant, and cultured people. In fact, it is hard to say why we do notice such a nonentity as Mr. G. Harvey. Perhaps it is because we want to revenge ourselves upon him for burdening our library-table with such crude doctrinal trash as might be in its place in the reticule of an old maid on a mission to convert servant-girls and ploughboys. We can imagine that he may be very acceptable to some people, whose narrow minds think that going to church, hearing sermons, reading 'goody' books, and acting model husbands and fathers, or rather, we ought to say, wives and mothers, are all and the best which life has to give. Such people will take a pious pleasure in Mr. Harvey's coarse story of the drunken suicide, and, of course, prospective damnation of the poor, vain, heartless beauty, for whom one would have hoped some friends might have been raised up, although she had broken her father's heart, and refused her sister's counsels. To our mind it is sad to think of her golden hair dabbled in the gutter mud, and of her felon's funeral at the cross-roads by torch-light. Mr. Harvey is full of maudlin sentiment over the old father's death-bed, and the saintly sister's loneliness and struggles. Readers of the class we have referred to will also be deeply interested in the metaphysics of the 'conversion' of the infidel French governess, Madame Gérard. In passing, we may notice that in the letter supposed to be written by this lady, Mr. Harvey spells 'agreeable,' 'agreeable.' In fact, he is altogether too pious for spelling-books, the study of which he doubtless considers a sinful waste of precious time. In the last story of all, he spells 'perhaps' 'prehaps.' In fact, he knows nothing of any sphere of life but his own, which is one which nobody else wants to know anything about. The density of his social ignorance is such that he makes a fast young college man talk about his sister's 'blonde petticoat!' We should advise Mr. Harvey to turn his attention to penny-a-lining, by which his wonderful powers of spinning out will enable him to make a comfortable living. The whole contents of this volume might have been condensed into two pages, just as they may be described in two words, 'Arrogant impertinence.'

Perhaps it was altogether wrong and foolish in George to feel the least pang at this tirade. He should have accepted it in its proper light, as a proof that he was sufficiently important to provoke enmity.

But it was its utter injustice that galled him. If his critic wished to make sweeping statements of his arrogance, self-conceit, and harshness, was it not his bounden duty to have brought forward extracts in proof thereof?

From far different reviews George had already learned that a quoted sentence may be as fair a specimen of a work as a single brick of a wall. But still, that was a move towards fairness.

How aggravating, too, was the critic's fatuous belief that his own sympathy for a sinner was a genuine and beautiful thing, while the poor author's sympathy for those whose hearts she had broken could only be described as "maudlin!"

How hard, too, that the same reviewer who professed to despise as nothing the conversion of a wild, passionate, evil Frenchwoman to godliness, gentleness, and self-restraint, should often "be enthralled" by the "plot" of books whose only human interest lay in which of two equally worthless men some vacillating girl would choose for a husband! And how intensely cruel that a person, vaunting a sweetness of charity even above "that which is written," should, in eagerness and haste to find fault anyhow, carp at a word which was quite natural in the English-French letter where it appeared, and condemn the author's ignorance for a printer's typographical blunder!

"If I could set up my books as well as write them," said George, "the fellow would not have to say that I could not spell 'perhaps.' But that is the sort of review which no man would be small and low enough to write, if he had to disgrace his own name by signing it."

The pity was that, even in his very first indignation, George did not remember that most people would be as able as himself to detect the bad logic and petty malice of his assailant.

Then there entered a temptation. George said to himself, "I could not write a word that I do not think. I could not dishonour myself by black-leg heroes or adulterous heroines. But, perhaps, it is not my bounden duty to write everything that I do think. If they would prefer the play of Hamlet, with Hamlet left out, I know I could please them. I will write of good people and their patience and brightness, and their conflicts and their heroic sacrifices, but I need not so carefully hold up that this goodness is not of the natural, but the renewed, man. People who could understand it, if I said it, will know it without my telling. What good does my plain speaking do, if it only raises a scoff? Perhaps I should only be 'wise as a serpent' if I dealt my goods so subtly, that some might receive a healing medicine in the belief that it was an intoxicating cup."

George said nothing about his review to the excited, merry little circle that gathered round him at dinner. The habits of his youth had made it an instinct with him to keep secret all unpleasantness. A wise and good reserve in many cases, yet sometimes a barrier that shuts out the open air and sunshine of common sense, for while to name some pains is to fix them, there are others that fly and vanish before plain description, like ghosts before the dawn. But once the barrier of reserve is built, it is hard to break it through, and it can be seldom perfectly done except for some new love, round which such silence has never been necessary.

Another talk with plain James Murray would have done the genius good that day.

CHAPTER VII.—A SIGN SENT FOR COMFORT.

THE vicarage stood within its own garden-walls. It was a prim red house of Queen Anne's time, with long rows of high narrow windows. As George and Milly walked up the carriage-drive, the brilliant illumination within came glowing down upon them, through rich bits of stained glass with which the vicar's wife had enriched the stiff old casements.

There was an atmosphere of welcome in the very porch, where the door flew open before the knocker was touched, and a ready, pleasant maid stood prepared to receive the ladies' wraps, and the genial warmth went on rising till it culminated in the spacious rambling drawing-rooms, where the vicar's wife, Mrs. Devon, was waiting with a cheery word and smile for everyone. Her quick eyes understood George and Milly at once. The young author she had often seen before, but the keen lady could read his whole family history in the simple little figure beside him, with its touching mixture of timid reserve and dignified composure, and its old-world etiquettes and graces hanging round it, like a soft old perfume.

"My young ladies must know you, my dear," the lady said kindly. "For they have just been reading your brother's book, and are full of questions that he must take neither the time nor the trouble to answer, but I know you'll be glad to do it,—just as I am glad to talk over Mr. Devon's sermons. We women may well be thankful when we can be proud of our men-folk. The girls are in the back drawing-room. Let us go there, and find you a seat with them. Here they are. This is my daughter Grace, Miss Harvey,—and this a dear Scotch cousin of ours, Miss Christian Dunbar."

The two young ladies made room for Milly on the sofa between them. They seemed very different from each other. Grace Devon moved with a bird-like quickness, and shook up her frills like a bathing sparrow. Christian Dunbar was soft and quiet. Grace Devon poured a volley of chatter into Milly's ear before Christian said a word. And then Grace fluttered off to be hospitable to some "dear darling old lady," who presently arrived, and Christian and Millicent remained alone together.

Some visitor went to the pianoforte and began to sing. She had a sweet voice, and Milly asked Miss Dunbar what was her name.

"I do not know," she answered. "I am quite a stranger here. I have just come from Scotland for a visit."

"Have you ever been in London before?" Milly inquired.

"Oh yes," she said. "I lived in London till ten years ago, when my uncle died."

"I fancied I had heard your name before," said Milly. "Very likely you always attended St. John's."

"No," Miss Dunbar answered. "My uncle Robert was a Scotchman and a Presbyterian, and while he lived I went with him to his chapel. I hardly went out anywhere in those days. We lived very quietly together, he, my brother, and I, in the old house over the shop in Paternoster Row."

"Mr. Dunbar—Paternoster Row!" Milly exclaimed, springing up in her eagerness, "why, that was the gentleman who did so much for George when he was nobody!"

A flood of passionate tenderness rushed instantly to Christian Dunbar's quiet blue eyes. "Oh don't say so, till you are quite sure," she said, "or I should be so disappointed. I'd sooner get a new pleasant memory of uncle, than find he had left me another legacy!"

"I know it was a Mr. Dunbar of Paternoster Row, who was so kind to George," Milly said decisively. "George has always kept on mentioning him, only I don't know many particulars. George has a way of keeping in things. But I'll fetch him—I'm sure he'll tell you."

"What a difference to what I thought!" reflected eager Milly, as she threaded her way in and out among the increasing guests. "I shall like going out after this. It isn't all stupid and superficial." It was her first personal discovery of the old truth, that we need but enter any sphere, from a prince's to a beggar's, and human interests instantly enter with us.

She brought back George in triumph, breathlessly exclaiming, "It was a Mr. Dunbar of Paternoster Row who was so good to you, was it not? This lady is his niece."

George Harvey and Christian Dunbar were both a little confused at this quick direct introduction. George slipped into the place Milly had vacated.

"I am thankful indeed to meet you," he said. "It is a pleasure to tell my gratitude to one who loved Mr. Dunbar, as I can never tell it to himself in this world. A few months after he showed me kindness, I wrote to him, and my note being never acknowledged, I called at his office, and was told he was dead. I believe I was introduced to a nephew of his. I often wished I had known his name, that I might have told him of my sorrow that Mr. Dunbar could never know how serviceable he had been to me. But I feared that even if I found him out, I might only be troublesome."

"I wish you had," said Christian, for the first time raising her eyes full to his. "My poor brother had many private trials, and often got depressed and despairing about the world and human nature. A bright gleam might have done him so much good. I have lost him too—he has been for five years with God. I wish you had found him out, Mr. Harvey."

"I wish I had," said George earnestly. "I know his kindly enthusiasm, 'We shall hear of you some day,' seemed to do me almost as much good as your uncle's practical advice."

"That is it," said Christian. "It is not what is said, but when it is said, that gives a word half its weight; and so I think the best way to be sure of saying cheering words at the right time is to say them always!"

"Indeed, they are often wanted when the want is not apparent," George observed, rather pitifully, though there was something in the pure and peaceful atmosphere about this quiet woman that seemed to set the jar of that hateful review as far from him as the coarse broils and blasphemy that must have been at that moment going forward in many not far-distant places.

"And yet I know it is so easy to be silent, for fear of being intrusive or impertinent," Christian went on, smiling. "If we read a book and are specially touched or helped by it, we feel that there must be hundreds touched and helped likewise, and think that we need not trouble the author with a letter assuring him of what he must know well enough already. If it be possible to carry on two trains of thought at the same time, I must confess that while I have been lecturing you on your reserve, I have been wondering whether you would be at all interested in a little incident I could tell you about your own book."

"Miss Dunbar," said George, "I am human—very human. And humanity is vain and—inquisitive!"

"Well, then, you must know that I travelled up from Scotland by coach, because I am a bad sailor," she began. "I was the only passenger from Edinburgh to London. All the Scotch people stopped at York, and I thought I was to finish my journey by myself, for the guard told me nobody else was booked. But just before we started in the morning a lady came up, wanting to go to London. I saw that the guard looked suspiciously at her, and spoke gruffly. You know how quick those men are to detect anything wrong or queer. For luggage, she had only a little hand-bag. She was a tall, slight woman, and wore a long thick grey cloak, reaching down to the ground. But when she unfastened this, as she took her seat in the coach, I saw that her other garments were very unsuitable for a journey, for her dress was made of dark rose-coloured satin, with white lace trimmings about the bodice—in fact, an evening dress, as if she had started on her journey in hottest haste. I should think she was about my own age—six or seven and twenty—and a very handsome woman, but with a beauty like that of burning ships or volcanic eruptions. I felt a little eerie at being shut in with her, after the sensive good-wives with whom I had chatted and nibbled and napped during the early part of my journey."

"I should think so, indeed," said George; "it was too brave of you to travel alone."

Christian smiled. "I don't mean I was afraid," she explained. "But it was awkward to have her sitting opposite me, death-mute, and staring straight before her, as if she did not see I was there. After we had driven so for an hour or two, I began to fidget about, and repair to my biscuits and sherry-flask. I offered her this and I offered her that. She shook her head, and answered 'No, no,' without a word of thanks, but not rudely, only as if she could not be troubled. She made me think of that poor girl, Charlotte Corday, going up to Paris on her dreadful errand of assassination. At last I remembered your 'Talks and Meditations,' and I offered her that, asking if she would like to beguile the journey with it, for it was very interesting.

"She did not say a word but took it, thinking, I fancy, that it would be a convenient refuge from further interference. She sat with it in her hand upside down for about half an hour, then detected herself, and reversed it with a start. Then she turned the leaves over and over and over, as if she were searching for something between them. Then some sentence seemed to catch her eye, and she read for a minute or two, and then again stared blankly out of the coach window, but kept her finger in the place. Presently, she turned over the leaves to the beginning of that particular story. Then she leaned far back in the coach corner, and put up her hand so that I could not see her face. But I could see big tears falling fast. By-and-by, she let the book fall, and turned completely round, and hid her face in the carriage pillows, and sobbed and moaned passionately. I tried to say something to soothe her, but she never answered nor heeded. At last she sat up again, with her face worn and wrung with agony. As we neared Lincoln, she began to draw up her cloak, and make preparations for departure. 'We are scores of miles from London yet, madam,' I said, thinking she might be such an utter stranger as to mistake it. 'I know,' she answered, and picked up 'Talks and Meditations,' and handed it to me. 'Would you like to keep it for the rest of your journey?' I asked. 'I shall have another copy for myself where I am going.' 'May I?' she said. 'Then God bless you!' and as she said so, the coach stopped and she got out, and took out her bag, and fee'd the guard. 'I thought you was going to London, mum!' said the man roughly. 'So I was,' she replied, 'but I have changed my mind.' 'Well, you can do that, so long as you don't expect us to return money,' he said. She did not answer him, nor did she go into the coaching inn, but walked quietly away, with her port-manteau in one hand, and your book in the other."

"CROOKED PLACES."

"Do you know which story it was that she read?" George asked.

"Yes, I spelled out the title backwards, as she sat sobbing over it. It was 'The Repentance of Madame Gérard.' I cannot help thinking, Mr. Harvey, that you have saved a vessel of life from a reckless shooting of some terrible rapid."

"Then God be praised for it," said George earnestly; "and God be praised for bringing me here to hear the story;" and before he noticed that he was confiding to this lady, never seen before, what he had not confided to one of his familiar household, he had told her the whole history of the bitter review, and of the doubts and despairs it had raised within him.

"But they were only for a moment," answered Christian Dunbar; "one feels thus for a moment. But one so brave as you would never long suffer from any enmity but God's."

"How do you know that I am brave?" George asked sadly.

"Because you ought to be," she replied, "and as you are a Christian man, God himself will make you all you ought to be."

"I should like you to know my mother," said George. "She would love you."

"I will call upon her," Christian promised frankly; "is she anything like that dear frisky little kitten of a sister who was talking to me just now?"

"No; my mother is tall, and grave, and sedate," George answered. "She has looked spiritual giants in the face and conquered them, and as the old tradition runs, has gathered their defeated strength into her own."

"And now let us go and look for Miss Harvey," said Christian, rising. She had that sweet strange womanly instinct of something in the atmosphere that made her withdraw into herself. A fancy-free maiden will not look at once into the depths of a man's heart, lest it be open to her only unguardedly. She will turn away, that he may solemnly lead her back again. She will not usurp her queendom. The crown seems nothing to her, till consecrated in the coronation.

Milly had left Christian and George together and wandered away. She went and stood near the piano, and listened to the singing. Her delight at the pleasure she had found for George made her feel quite at home. A young gentleman brought a chair to her, and invited her to sit down. She did so, and then he asked her if she played or sang. She said no, neither. Then he said, he was sure she drew, and he smiled mischievously as he said it. Milly admitted it, and wondered how he guessed. And then they began to talk about pictures, and went round the rooms to study the engravings on the wall.

Reader, reader, do not laugh. There have been men—not poets or sentimentalists, but hard-headed famous men of science—who in their youth have loved for years without a word. Little prim Milly, whom nobody had ever yet flirted with, had won such a love as this! This youth, whom she had never wittingly seen before, whose very name she did not then know—for Milly naively forgot all about an introduction—had for months watched her going to and fro with her pattern portfolio. He knew her name, and who she was.

She had a very pleasant time of it. The good old vicar, watching her dark eyes flashing in her excitement, said to his wife, "And so that's young Harvey's sister. We must look after all that family. There's more than genius in them. Genius may grow wild anywhere, but they are surely the stuff that makes its natural soil. I never saw young Maxwell so gallant before. Well, well, he is a good lad, and if he were my own son, I should think he might do worse than try to find out what sort of heart goes with that bright girl-face."

"Oh, George," said Milly, clinging to his arm, as they turned from the vicarage homeward through the dark lanes. "If parties are often like this, they are worth going to!"

And George thought so too.

They found Mrs. Harvey and Miss Brook awaiting them by the parlour fire. They both sat down and opened their budget of news. And actually before he went to bed, George had told them all about his review, and laughed over it! A secret drawer that has once been opened is never so stiff again, but still one does not show everything that is in it, and George did not then tell the story Miss Dunbar had told him. One maintains a sweet, curious feeling of confidence with another, by keeping something that one talks over with nobody else.

"Well, my son," observed Mrs. Harvey, "it is well to remember, especially among so much praise as you do get, that 'the friendship of the world is enmity with God.'"

"Miss Dunbar used almost those same words, 'mother,' he said.

But Miss Brook punched the fire severely.

"Why can't people keep their tongues off what they can't understand, and won't try to," said she. "If a cat criticized a dog, what would her criticism be worth? If I was George, next time I wrote a book, I'd put on the title-page, that 'no one need trouble himself to review it, that didn't believe in God, read the Bible, live with one wife, and pay his debts.' Let wicked infidels get their living by reviewing wicked infidel books—and a precious poor living they'd get."

"O let them do as they like!" said George.

CHAPTER VIII.—GEORGE'S GIFT FROM THE LORD.

CHRISTIAN DUNBAR paid her promised visit to Mrs. Harvey. She did not come very soon, and she brought Grace Devon with her, and they arrived in the early afternoon, and found nobody at home but Mrs. Harvey and Miss Brook.

George was particularly anxious to hear every detail of that visit, and he heard all there was to hear, but Grace Devon had evidently talked a great deal more than Christian Dunbar.

And so friendly relations were established between the stately old vicarage and the Harveys' quaint green cottage. The worst of it was, Christian Dunbar was only staying with the Devons for three months.

"There does not seem to be half enough time in life," George observed one day, apropos of nothing in particular. "So much has to be forced on, and may be spoiled in the forcing. If one could only take a little more time!"

"When an Indian chief heard some one make that remark," said Miss Brook, "he answered, 'I suppose you have all there is.'"

Somehow, at that time, there crept into the Harveys' household conversation a great many discussions about marriage. About the necessary means for marriage—about the proper time for marriage—about the duties and rights of lovers in sundry and divers positions. Miss Brook was a great deal more certain on all these points than Mrs. Harvey, and maintained her right so to be.

"Married people arn't half such good advisers in love-affairs as single ones," she asserted. "They've muddled their minds with their own mistakes, and they go on giving you the particular good advice they wanted themselves, instead of what you want. Just as when you have the toothache, some good souls think it could do you no harm to take their pet gout-specific."

Therefore Miss Brook uttered her axioms like an authority.

"The necessary means for marriage are a sound head-piece and a strong right hand," she said.

"But it is generally fools who think themselves wise," put in Milly; "and the surest sign of one's sanity is to doubt it a little."

"Hold your tongue, child," Miss Brook retorted. "And the proper time for marriage is when one meets the proper person."

"Always provided he or she is equally agreeable, I presume," said Milly wickedly.

"But when a poor man feels that nothing is too good for the woman he loves, it seems selfish for him to ask her to share his poverty and struggles," observed George.

"If she loves him, she's longing to do it," answered Miss Brook; "and isn't it selfish of him to balk her wishes for the sake of his own stuck-up pride?"

The fact was, George had not taken long to discover that life could never be what it had been before he had seen Christian Dunbar. Her coming had been like a burst of sunshine over a landscape—river and rock and tree are the same, but, oh, how different!

Perhaps one of her greatest charms for him was that she drew him entirely out of himself—that he could talk to her with a freedom with which he had not hitherto communed even with his own soul.

With all George's fear of selfishness, it must be admitted that he felt it to be a happy day when he heard that Christian Dunbar had a bare five hundred pounds for her whole portion, and that like the sensible woman that she was, she intended to leave it untouched, and to earn her own living as a teacher. She was not an accomplished woman: she neither painted, played, nor sang, but she was a good writer and arithmetician, and had persuaded her brother to teach her Latin, as a diversion during one of the melancholy fits from which he had suffered. She did not aim to do what she could not, but diligently sought to find what she could, and so engaged herself at a moderate salary, in "a preparatory school for young gentlemen."

It was within three days of her departure, when she and George met in an old churchyard, not far from both their abodes. Never mind how they happened to meet. Perhaps Christian had said something about passing through that churchyard on her way somewhere. And perhaps, on the strength of those words, George had waited there two or three hours. How could Christian know he would be there? And yet if she did not, why did she walk so slowly, and why did her heart beat so fast?

She came along under the new-budded trees, and George sprang out from a cross avenue, and took her hand, and drew it through his arm. He never knew he did not shake hands formally, and Christian did not notice the omission at the moment, but remembered it distinctly afterwards.

What is the use of repeating what George said? It will sound stilted and unnatural to the reader who has not said it himself, and he who has said it knows all about it without hearing it over again! What did Christian say? Well, Christian was cooler than George; which is not uncommon, for while we poor men are in agonies of suspense, the dear ladies know their own answer, and either that it makes all right, or else that they do not care at all.

And then there came a girl-and-boy feeling into two glad hearts, and without heeding it, they went walking together hand-in-hand!

Let one fact reveal the love and unity of the Harvey household. George went straight home to his mother and sister, and told them of his engagement, and knew that the greatest pang of the telling lay with himself, and that they rejoiced wholly for his sake. He was the man of the house, and one who had been enabled to give the family a distinction that it would not have without him, but they were not women to make their gratitude a blight, and their love a fetter. It might be that their lives helped them to such right-mindedness. They were no parasite women, trailing forlornly unless propped. They had learned to respect and trust themselves, and to know that life had plenty of flowers and fruit within their own reach. Beyond such tokens of brotherly love as he would continue to give, Milly had neither taken nor expected anything from her brother. She had been trained to feel it no wrong, but one of her noblest rights, to be independent. And when more women shall have sacred interests of their own, the will and the power to create their own spheres, and to clothe their own lives with appropriate beauties and duties, then surely the antagonism of mothers and sisters-in-law will cease, and the man without female relations be no longer justly regarded as the most eligible lover! Oh, if some of those who fear that the bloom of womanhood is so evanescent that it will perish in the first brush with the realities of God's world of work, would but reflect how it already turns to driest and bitterest dust in the stagnant atmosphere of helpless spite and repining.

George and Christian were not married till the first anniversary of their engagement. Christian went to her school, and earned enough to cover the cost of her marriage outfit, without breaking the little fortune that was her uncle's legacy. She made her outfit nearly all herself—all except what Milly and Grace Devon and Mrs. Webber begged from her. There was not a hireling seam in it. Womanly love and hope, friendliness and good wishes, were in every stitch.

But Christian came back to the vicarage to spend the last two months of her maiden life. She wanted to have her rightful share in the building of the pretty home-nest that George had found midway between her Uncle Devon's house and his mother's cottage. Mrs. Harvey and Milly were to remain just as they were. Perhaps, by-and-by, they might receive another boarder as well as Mrs. Brook, but it was no matter of stringent necessity. For Milly's little income went on regularly increasing, so that she was even inclined to pout and be a little affronted that George should be so determined still to set aside a certain allowance for his mother!

George and Christian lived in a fairy tale for those two months. They were privileged now to take long sweet lonely walks. Sweet and lonely,—though they were often through noisy crowded streets. For Christian loved to be taken among the scenes of her lover's stern boyhood, and George loved to take her there. He took her over the old printing-office, and gave half-a-crown to a little red-haired lad who was sitting in his former place. He took her to the wretched little terrace where James Murray had lodged, and where he had gone to clean the boots. He showed her the boiled-beef shop. He made an effort to trace Mr. Rollo, but that failed.

"The mystery is," said George, "that as I revive the old associations, I cannot revive the old self that did not know you! I remember how I studied the sizes of penny rolls, but I cannot remember how my heart felt when it was empty. I think you must have been always there, shut up, till that night when you opened your shrine, and let in the sunshine."

Christian begged for the little manuscript book that had been bought with so much self-denial. In long years after, George had occasion to ask to look at it, when he discovered that his wife kept it in an antique oak dressing-case, among her jewellery and lace.

The wedding-day came at last. Of course, Christian was married from the vicarage, and Grace Devon had the arrangement of the wedding presents. Conspicuous among the dainty little bits of china and silver, stood an elaborately-carved bread-plate and butter-dish stand, which had arrived with a fancy card announcing them as "small tokens of the respect and love of James Murray, and Sarah his wife, with all good wishes."

The curate read the marriage service, because the vicar gave away his niece. Grace and Milly, and little Ellen Webber, were the bridesmaids. Christian insisted on Ellen Webber, because she wished to associate Hatty with the immediate marriage group. Christian found a great share of affection to spare for beautiful Hatty.

"It is such a pleasure to look at her," she said, "and I am sure it takes a great deal of goodness to keep beauty beautiful."

Richard Webber, our old friend "Dick," now growing a tall and very interesting lad, acted "best man." The whole made a group thoroughly typical of the best side of English life—of that free and yet conservative state of society, which binds such different men as the stately old vicar, and the homely tradesman. Mr. Webber, in bonds of mutual respect and amity, and yet leaves them far apart, where each can be happier, better, and more useful than either could be in any false and affected "equality."

Mrs. Harvey shed two or three tears of thankful joy to see how wonderfully God had supplied the particular want of her son's position by leading him to a bride, in breeding and character every inch a lady, and yet with the simple ways and tastes, that would make her happy and useful in the household exigencies of "a poor gentleman."

"God bless you, George," she said, when the ceremony was over; "and be you thankful to Him that He has given you a wife whom He himself loves better than you can."

"I say, Aunt Milly," said Dick Webber, as they drove back to the vicarage, "did you see that Mr. Maxwell peeping round the nearest pillar behind us, and he had on a rose-coloured neck-tie, like your ribbons!"

But when George and Christian were seated together in the coach that was to carry them away for a fortnight among the Surrey hills, Christian suddenly turned to George and sighed.

"I wonder what has become of that poor thing who travelled up from York with me scarcely more than a year ago."

"What makes you think of her now?" asked George.

"I don't know," Christian answered. "Unless it is because I am so happy and she was so sad!"

IS THERE A CENTRAL HEAVEN?

SECOND PAPER.

WE will now inquire, what is the testimony which the Scriptures afford to this deeply interesting question? The proofs contained in the Bible are (as I take it) neither few nor slight, to the great fact suggested by science; so much so, indeed, that, valuable as the testimony of astronomy is as a confirmation of or contribution to inspired truth, yet, had the knowledge we have obtained of the universe done nothing in that direction, the great doctrine of heaven as a place or locality in the heavens would remain the same. Stereotyped as it is in the Book that records it, it has been equally stereotyped on the mind of every person that has read that book and believed in it. It could not indeed be discredited without discrediting the entire volume that reveals it, in which it is the central picture, next to Christ himself; the great object towards which all our hopes and fears are directed; our final home, the reality of which is indelibly imprinted on our mind from our earliest years, as being also the home of God and the holy angels, and the "spirits of the just made perfect."

At a parent's knee we have been taught to look upward to the deep blue above as indicating the direction of the place where God lives; and unless the canker of infidelity has crept in to mar the lovely vision, it has remained on our mind to the last, as one of those bright cheering thoughts that lessen the cares, and banish (when we think of it) much of the gloom of approaching death, and the sorrows and anxieties of human life.

But where has the idea been derived but from the inspired volume alone (for science could never assure us of it)? To it, therefore, we may look as containing, though not all that we desire to know, yet something more definite and certain than astronomy can afford us, and which, with the aid that is afforded by that noble science, so far as it goes, all but demonstrates the great truth, that there is a central heaven, the special residence of the Most High, where his glory is manifested, which is the home of many a bright angel and archangel, and from which man, when made like unto the angels (ισαγγελος), if not equal to them, shall not be excluded. The evidence of Scripture on this subject is confined to a few points, but not the less clear on that account. First, there is the direct testimony to the existence of heaven, with a general and chiefly figurative description of its glory and its inhabitants. Second, the indirect testimony furnished by the actual intercourse that has subsisted between some of the inhabitants of heaven with the inhabitants of the earth, together with the deep sympathy which we are informed exists among those inhabitants of heaven for the human race on earth; crowned by the actual ascension from earth to heaven in the body by two of our race, and finally that of our Lord himself, not to speak of the subsequent experience of St. Paul of the same glorious place entitled by him "the third heaven" and "paradise" (2 Cor. xii 1-4). With respect to the first part of this scriptural evidence, it may be premised that the names which are assigned to it in Scripture are in themselves significant, so as to indicate, to a certain extent, what is to be expected. Thus, in the earliest record of it, which is to be found in 2 Chron. ii. 6, and vi. 18, it is termed "the heaven of heavens," i.e. the heaven above or among the heavens, meaning by the latter the starry heavens. The word heaven itself indicating "a lifting up," from the Saxon "heave." In the same inspired prayer of Solomon it is called also the dwelling-place of God: "Hear thou from heaven thy dwelling-place" (2 Chron. vi. 21). So, also, David terms it, in Psalm cxliii., "Oh thou that dwellest in the heavens."

Thus, in this and many other similar expressions, the idea that there is somewhere in the universe a place where God (as it were) resides, or where his presence and glory are specially manifested in the presence of the holy company that are admitted to dwell there, is plainly conveyed. To such a place, doubtless, Paul was caught up or conducted, either in the body or out of the body, to the "third heaven" or "paradise," by both which names he describes it, being synonymous with the "heaven of heavens." There he says he heard "unspeakable words," which it is not lawful for man to utter, i.e. the language of heaven spoken by its inhabitants; a language either that could not be spoken by man, or should not be revealed by him.

That there is such a place is plainly signified also in Luke i. 19, where the angel Gabriel, announcing his message to Zacharias, says, "I am Gabriel, that stand in the presence of God; and am sent to speak unto thee." So the evangelist relates in the same chapter, the same angel Gabriel was "sent from God" to the Virgin Mary. It is thus plainly implied and taught that there is a place in the heavens, where God is present in a different sense from that in which He is said to be omnipresent—in other words in heaven He is personally present; and to and fro from that place angels have passed and repassed to earth and back when sent by God as his messengers to do his pleasure. To that same place it is declared by Luke our Lord himself ascended (Luke xxiv. 51): "While he blessed, He was parted from them, and carried up to heaven;" an event described or prophesied previously by Himself to Mary, in words that declare it distinctly as the residence of his Father, as in John xx. 17, "Touch me not, for I am not yet ascended to my Father; but go and tell my brethren, I ascend unto my Father and your Father, to my God and your God."

Here his ascension is described in one place as to heaven, in the other to his Father; therefore to one and the same place, to his Father who He states in the Lord's Prayer is in heaven.

Its vast distance from the earth is also implied by Paul in Eph. iv. 10: "He that descended is the same also that ascended up far above all heavens," meaning probably above the first or aerial heavens, or possibly the starry heaven visible to us. Also in Heb. viii.: "We have such an High Priest, who is set on the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the heavens." And there He sits, as King of kings, and as our Advocate and Mediator; "for Christ is not entered into the holy places made with hands, which are the figures of the true" (then there is a true heaven of which the holiest of holies was to us but the figure); "but into heaven itself, now to appear in the presence of God for us."* Here it will be remarked, the presence of God is again associated with heaven—it is plainly his dwelling-place. Again, John xiv. 2, 3 : “In my Father’s house,” says Jesus, “are many mansions : if it were not so, I would have told you, and I go to prepare a place for you. And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again, and receive you unto myself; that where I am, there shall ye be also.”

There are many points of deep interest in this short but important passage that deserve notice :—1. His Father has a house (i.e. a dwelling-place); 2. There are many mansions in it (i.e. abiding-places;—rooms, apartments, as it were, to the palace where God dwells); 3. This is a certainty, as true as Christianity, “If it were not so,” says Jesus, “I would have told you;” 4. It is a distant locality to which Christ must go, and from which He will return (a far country as he describes in it the parable),* further, it is a place, not a mere state or condition; 6. It is a prepared place, i.e. prepared, and suited for, and made ready now for the people of God; 7. It is the place where Christ himself will be and is. “I will take you to myself, that where I am there shall ye be also.” The expression, “I am,” here, does not indicate, as some have said, the place where He then was—the earth—but where He should be, wherever that was.

Thus the direct evidence of a place in the heavens, whither Christ went, where He ascended, where God dwells, and is manifested specially in the person of Jesus Christ, the second person of the Trinity, where also the redeemed people of God (once on earth) are, and the holy angels dwell and pay their homage to the King of kings, is plainly declared by the direct evidence not only of the passages of Scripture now quoted, but by many others, which are but a repetition of the same thing.†

But the testimony which Scripture affords to the existence of such a place in the heavens is further proved by the intercourse which has subsisted from time immemorial between the inhabitants of heaven and those of the earth; the former having visited the earth—come, indeed, from the very courts of heaven itself, resplendent with its brightness, reeking, as it were, with celestial glory—come as ministering spirits to man, and in like manner departing again as to their native home on high.

There are few questions perhaps of deeper interest than this subject presents to the mind of the thoughtful inquirer.

If a native of some distant and unknown part of our globe appears in our civilised regions, it naturally excites much interest and curiosity : it assures us, first, that there is a portion of our little world that we have never seen, and yet that surely exists;—the very truth that men are most likely to question, as did the crew of Columbus, although assured of its certainty by his superior intelligence and foresight. The native of a strange country assures us of the existence of that country; his strange speech, his dress, his appearance, his voice, his manner and habits—all bring conviction to the mind beyond the possibility of doubt; and if, besides, he is enabled to describe the part of the globe he comes from, the nature of the country, and the people who are his fellow-countrymen,—who can doubt the fact? Now transfer this to the angels of God; once ascertain the fact of their having appeared on earth, having spoken and acted and declared distinctly where they came from; that they belonged, not to this small planet, but had, as it were, dropped from the sky, above us, flashed from the heavens upon us, left “the heaven of heavens,” and the throne and presence of God!—and who shall be bold enough to question or deny it? The certainty of the fact is established by the arrival or departure of the strange visitors. The intercourse between the two countries, heaven and earth, is then proved, and becomes as palpable a fact as the intercourse of nations here proves that there is another country besides our own; a bridge is at once thus thrown across the supposed impassable gulf of space; and the barrier that has seemed to separate the planet we inhabit for ever from all other residences in the universe is at once removed; and though to man in his present condition it seems as though his home has been specially contrived, so that he shall never leave his present abode or associate with other Beings, the arrival of a single intelligent Being from another country in the heavens at once dissipates the illusion, breaks the charm, and shows not only the possibility and certainty of transit between the two worlds, but also the certainty that there is a heaven where angels dwell as surely as there is an earth where man dwells. And when we come to examine the records we have of the appearance of such Creatures in our world, we find that their visits have been—not, as erroneously described by the Poet, “few and far between,” but quite the reverse, † 2 Chron. xviii. 18—22; Job i. 6, 7; Zech. iii. 1—4; Dan. vii. 9, 10, 13; Isa. vi. 1; Ezek. i. 1, 24—28.

and that the Scriptures assume throughout a constant intercourse maintained and deep sympathy felt for man by this noble class of beings—the true nobility of heaven—superior to ourselves in intellect and power and virtue, as doubtless they are in numbers.

That there are such beings, and that they form a most important portion of the creatures of God, the Scriptures so distinctly inform us, that if we reject belief in their existence, we must reject likewise our belief in the entire of the Old and New Testaments, as both bear their testimony generally to the fact, in language that cannot be disputed; while in the history of man's redemption they form so important a feature, and play so important a part, that if their existence is ignored or denied, the whole framework of Christianity will fall to pieces, and the most important testimony to its truth will be lost.

That the heaven of heavens is the abode or habitation of these glorious Creatures we are specially informed. That delightful world is the place towards which all our own hopes and expectations are directed, the home to which we are invited to look as our final rest from every trouble, and the seat of all the enjoyment we are capable of attaining. With the inhabitants of that blest world we are told we shall, if we are wise, be one day acquainted and intimately united, and shall live in the midst of them for ever. Of this world, therefore, and of those who dwell there, we need information, and accordingly it has not been withheld from us.*

But there is one more consideration of interest to us in this matter in the sympathy thus established and maintained between the inhabitants of the two countries. That sympathy does exist we are assured by the Lord Jesus himself, when he says (Luke xv.), "There is joy among the angels of God"—in the presence of God—"over one sinner that repenteth." What does this imply, if it does not assure us of the deep interest which the inhabitants of heaven feel in the affairs of mankind?

The Apostle Peter indeed tells us that "the angels desire to look into these things,"† meaning the matters relating to the redemption of man; while the Apostle Paul declares that it was God's intention and "eternal purpose" that they should be informed of it. "That to the principalities and powers in heavenly places might be known by the church the manifold wisdom of God according to the eternal purpose which He pur-posed in Christ Jesus our Lord" (Eph. iii. 10, 11).

Thus we are apprised of the interesting fact, that the matters of earth and relating to mankind are not only known above, but are the subject of the deepest interest to the inhabitants of heaven. Nay, more; that the inhabitants of both places are considered as constituting one family in Christ, of whom, says the same apostle (Eph. iii. 15), "the whole family in heaven and earth are named." Thus there is a moral chain, as well as a physical and literal one, that binds us to the bright land above us, out of sight though it be—at least out of our sight—but not out of the memory or removed from the sympathy of millions of the noblest of God's creatures, who make our joy their joy, and doubtless our sorrow or sin the occasion of their deep sympathy.

In the string of beautiful parables in Luke xv., the Lord Jesus is represented as calling his friends and neighbours around Him, to rejoice with Him in the recovery of the lost sheep and the lost money. And who are these friends and neighbours, if they are not the heavenly host? And what is a friend, and what is a neighbour? who are friends and neighbours to us, but those whose position enables them to know our circumstances and character, and whose friendship induces them to sympathize with us?

Thus England has great commercial and friendly relations with most of the civilised nations of the globe; and to all alike she is ready to extend the hand of friendship and sympathy; and though individually there are millions who have no opportunity of visiting those countries, yet there is no difference in the general feeling of the nation towards those who require or demand their sympathy or friendship, it is well understood and taken for granted, and forms a ground of union, and confidence, which regulates the most important of our commercial relations, and makes England the greatest and most prosperous of kingdoms.

So there is a like confidence and understanding between the hosts of heaven and the inhabitants of this distant little planet; and though we cannot see nor talk with them as some of our race have done, a communication is established between the two worlds and their inhabitants; not by prayer to them which they are too loyal to accept (Rev. xxii. 8, 9), but through their and our divine Lord and Head, to whom alone our prayers should be addressed, and who doubtless (as in the parables already referred to) calls his angelic family around Him to make them participators in his joy and the joy of our salvation.

Here, when we would converse or sympathize with a distant nation, such as our American brethren, we flash our wants, our wishes, our thanks alike along the mysterious wire that connects us in speech with each other, and address ourselves to him who is the representative of the country, or the governing power by whom they are ruled.

The telegraph has thus done more to unite the nations of the earth in brotherly union and amity than any other discovery that science has ever made, and by its means, though so distant from us, we can now truly call the Americans our neighbours as well as our friends. Distance is annihilated when men can converse. But there is a more distant country than America, and a far vaster population, to whose Divine Head and representative we too may, with as great ease, send our telegraph of prayer, and supplication, and praise, and thanksgiving. We have this promise distinct and clear, that while we are yet speaking He will hear, and before we call He will answer (Isa. lxx. 24). Any message of importance, therefore, that reaches heaven will be thus known and appreciated by the glorious company above—our heavenly friends and neighbours. The earth is possibly viewed by them as one would look at the dark hull of some convict ship belonging to the sovereign, and containing a band of criminals and traitors, or, as it has been truly described by Chalmers, a rebellious province in God's dominions; yet from that dark vessel, from that rebellious band arrives every day, and hour, and moment some soul rejoicing in its deliverance from bondage and misery; and each sinner, as he plants his foot on the pearly shore of that blessed place, will be welcomed in such a fashion as the heavenly host alone can welcome him. They will conduct him to their Mount Zion—to their Lord—to the city of the living God—the heavenly Jerusalem, to an innumerable company like themselves—the home of the elect, the throne of the Lamb.

THE WIFE'S ANSWER.

(A sequel to the "Pitman to his Wife," which appeared in a previous number of this Magazine.)

I'VE listened, Geordie, to all thou's said, and now that thou's had thy say,
 I can but tell thee it's far the best of my hearing this many a day;
 Though many a look thou's given to me, and many a word thou's said,
 I was pleased enough to get and to hear both before and since we were wed.
 Thou never wast much of a one for talk, and I reckon there's little need
 Of a vast of words between two folks that are always well agreed,
 Yet many a talk we've had to ourselves just sitting here by the fire,
 But never a one that's been so much to my heart's content and desire.
 For if thou couldst take a look in my heart, and read from it line by line,
 As one reads from out of a printed book, it would be like this talk of thine;
 For I've got a word, a word in my heart that's made it both glad and sore,
 And ye'll wonder to hear me talk like this that's never talked so before.
 For though I've gone both to chapel and church, and I've minded what I've heard said,
 Yet so many things all the sermon through would come in and out of my head;
 It might be the bairns, or it might be thee, or what we're to get to eat,
 Or what we're to get to wear, or how I'd to manage to make ends meet;
 That I've thought, when I've seen the minister stand and give out a beautiful text,
 And tell us we're not to take heed for this life, but to give all our minds to the next,
 It's easier said than it's done for me, what with waur-day work to do,
 And so many folks just with waur-day talk dropping in all the Sunday through.
 But now my mind's got another turn, and I see all as clear as glass,
 And I've given my heart to the chief concern, and how it has come to pass, I'll tell thee now that we've once begun, it was all through our little lass.
 "For mother," says she, as she and I were going one night up-stairs,
 "Am'nt I old enough," she says, "to give up saying my prayers,
 I've been seven and a half such a great while now, I think I'll be eight very soon,
 And it's long since I've had a knife and a fork and given over using a spoon."

"Why, what dost thou mean by such talk?" I said, and she turns on me her eyes,
And gives me a look quite innocent, and yet as wise as wise;

"Why, mother," she says, "there's a lot of things like saying I will and I won't,
That children are always bid to mind, and that bigger people don't.

"And brothers, when they were as young as me, wore their little frocks instead,
Of coats and trousers, and little ones are sent off soon to bed,
And set to learn our A B, abs, and I thought that saying one's prayers Was just like these,* for I never see any grown-up folks say theirs."

"Oh bairn!" I said, "have done with thy talk," for each word was like a knife,
"Of lessons, thou's given thy mother one that'll last her all her life;"
And I knelt down beside her little bed, and all that I could say,
Was just "Our Father who art in heaven," and, "Lord, teach me how to pray."

"And pardon," I said, "a sinner's heart, that comes to Thee on her knees,
And pardon, her ways that's been blind so long, that it's only now she sees;
And pardon," I said, "a sinner's life, and give her Thy grace to mend,
And be Thou to me, and be Thou to mine, a Saviour and a Friend."

It's been on my mind to tell thee this, but I thought thou'd think it strange,
Thou's always got thy own ideas, and thou's not one given to change;
And I thought I'd just hold my peace and wait, for it's little a woman can Do at her best, let her do her best, without the help of her man.

It isn't for me to be leadin' thee, but now that thou's taken a start, We'll go together, for didn't we say the words, "Until death us part?"
It'll never part us now, Geordie, for we're seeking the blessed land, Thou and me and the canny bairns, and we're seeking it hand in hand.

EARLY ADVENTURES ON THE DEAD SEA.

BY THE LATE JAMES FINN, M.R.A.S.

THE earliest modern attempt at exploration of the Dead Sea was that of Christopher Costigan, a young Irishman, in the autumn of 1835. Of the result, however, we know nothing, as it seems that the difficulties and dangers encountered by him precluded the possibility of describing such, beyond a rude pencil sketch of outline of the lake. We do not even know what instruments or appliances Mr. Costigan had for making any scientific researches.

The writer of this is, however, in possession of a plain English Bible found among his effects, containing pencil-notes upon the blank leaves, not wholly, if at all, relating to the Dead Sea, but exceedingly indistinct—too much so for imparting information of any discoveries. The mournful circumstances of the termination of this expedition will always command some amount of interest among those who are concerned for Palestine exploration.

The following details of the closing events were gathered from the Rev. John Nicolayson (the principal person acting in them) by his daughter. All three are now at rest in the silent earth, awaiting the first and blessed resurrection.

In a boat brought over from Acre to Tiberias Mr. Costigan descended the Jordan. That task was found both difficult and perilous, owing to the numerous rocks and falls that occur along the tortuous course of the river. It was in the month of August, when the volume of water is much diminished there; and the present writer is well able, from personal experience, to understand the inconveniences of the Jordan region arising from heat at that season of the year.

Costigan was as much in the water as in the boat or on the banks during three wearisome days, and then, finding his servant (a native of the country, and unused to matters of navigation) becoming impatient, and himself too much broken in strength for continuing the work, he resolved on leaving the river, and, with his camels and Bedaween escort, carrying the boat along the Ghor down to Jericho. The luggage was sent on by the servant through Nablus to Jerusalem.

One incident, and it seems the only one of any note, took place before reaching Jericho. Seeing some Arabs on a hill near the line of march a little in advance of him, he sent forward a few of his men to reconnoitre, but his own horse bolted, carrying him off with them. He tugged at his sword, but it had become so rusted with the proceedings in the river, that it refused to leave the scabbard, and the hilt broke off instead. Fortunately, the Arabs took to flight on finding themselves unexpectedly assailed in that lonely place by a shouting party in full gallop. They darted into the river, swam over, and made their escape eastwards.

It was well that he met no party of regular tribes in armed force. In those days they had never conceived the idea of Europeans carrying on such expeditions, and were not on the look-out for opportunities of levying ghuf'r, or toll for leave of passage.

The chief annoyance was that derived from the bushes of large and sharp thorns abounding in that desert. The perpetual struggles in passing through these reduced his clothing to rags before reaching Jericho.

Leaving the boat there, he went up to Jerusalem, probably for a supply of provisions, and returned accompanied by a European friend from the city. Again he went to Jerusalem, and came back among a party of French travellers. He had now engaged a Maltese servant to assist in navigating the Dead Sea, intending to begin by examining the eastern coast.

When at the conclusion of this ill-fated voyage the Rev. Mr. Nicolayson found Costigan at Jericho, he was too weak to be able to afford information about their adventure, and such account as we have is that obtained from the Maltese.

It appears that under sail they reached the southern extremity (near forty miles) in two or three days, but there they failed to get a favourable wind for the return. A complete calm lay on the water for several days. They had to take to the oars, and persevered till the servant, exhausted with toil, threw the cask of fresh water overboard while Costigan lay asleep, with a view of lightening the boat. A more insane act can scarcely be imagined.

Hitherto they had only suffered from heat and fatigue—the heat of a vast cauldron steaming under a tropical sun, and confined between lofty basaltic cliffs at thirteen hundred feet below the level of the Mediterranean (probably the very lowest surface on the habitable globe), and that steam impregnated with saline and other exhalations even more injurious to health, beneath the sun of August. Their true misery, therefore, only now begun. Appetite for eating failed, yet exertion at the oars was necessary in order to escape from perishing by thirst and hunger. In such an awful condition of loneliness, and the certainty that no human being could be expected to perceive them, no human habitations occurring within the reach of the keenest sight—the rocks calcined with heat or darkened with sulphurous exhalation, scarcely even a bird to be seen in the air, and the very water void of fish; we can but imagine that the young adventurer must have repented of undertaking his task, with so little knowledge of the country or its resources. How keenly must his thoughts have reverted to the home of his childhood, and the long experienced and tender care of relations far away!

Occasionally a green spot might be seen on shore, which seemed to point out the existence of water, but the Maltese refused to go in search of it. Indeed, as we now learn from later investigations, no water fit for assuaging thirst could have been reached but at great heights among steep and rugged cliffs.

Still an effort to get off the lake must be made. The sails were entirely useless. Costigan himself laboured at the oars for a whole day while the other slept, although utterly unpractised in the use of them. The servant's strength failed first, and no breeze came to sustain the flagging spirit.

On the fourth or fifth day from the southern end (for it was difficult to keep exact count of time) they reached the northern beach, with its white powdered crust; but even then, in a state of fever and starvation, they were without human aid; not a creature was to be seen, and they knew of no water short of Jericho, a walk of at least three hours over burning marl. For this they were utterly unable. Imprudently they poured water from the corrosive lake over themselves and their clothes with the idea of obtaining coolness, but this only blistered the skin and intensified their fever.

After a night and the greater part of a day spent in lying upon the beach among the trunks or branches of trees washed down by the Jordan, and bleached by saline incrustation, the servant made an effort to reach Jericho, to procure water and a horse for Costigan: more than seven times he fell fainting, and once turned out of the way towards an old ruin for shelter from the sun. This must have been the Daiv Hajlah, but he failed to discover the beautiful fountain in its vicinity. Arrived at the tower of Jericho, he fell down in utter exhaustion; but there he found a man in the service of the Governor of Jerusalem, who immediately dispatched two of the Bashi-bozuk riders with water for the sufferer there, his own horse for bringing him to the tower, and a camel for conveying the boat.

Notwithstanding the frequent return of the fever, Costigan had just strength enough to ride the horse, and at the village was received into one of its miserable hovels, where he was carefully tended by the owner's mother. There, in similar condition with poor Mungo Park in Central Africa, he had reason to be thankful for the tenderness of woman's nature even among a population of barbarians.

This was on Wednesday, 2nd of September, 1835; in the evening he sent his servant to Jerusalem with the sails and oars of the boat, and other things that had been left before embarking, intending himself to start about midnight, when he expected a cessation from fever. The man was to see the Governor of the city, and request a camel with mattresses and cushions for conveying Costigan thither, should he not be able to ride his horse; he, however, forgot the orders, and no camel or other aid was sent.

On Thursday afternoon a messenger from Jericho, mounted on Costigan's own horse, brought a note from Costigan to Mr. Nicolayson, begging for some medicine, as "I cannot rise from my bed, and if I pass two such nights as the last without aid or medicine, you'll have to do something else for me."

As there was then no physician in Jerusalem, Mr. Nicolayson thought it right to go down himself and endeavour to bring up the patient. In less than two hours he was on the road. Not aware that there was a necessity for mattresses, he did not think of it himself, and did not know that the Maltese had been directed to procure them. Along the road between Jerusalem and Jericho (noted of old for liability to fall among thieves) he went through the night, and arrived at two A.M. of Friday. There he found Costigan lying out in the open air, which he preferred to the stifling heat of the hovel into which by day he was glad to escape from the sun. A severe paroxysm of fever had just left him.

Soon after dawn they were fain to take shelter under roof, and the day was occupied in devising methods of conveying Costigan in some easy manner to Jerusalem. So long as he was free from fever he believed that the assistance of one riding behind him on the same horse, on whom he might lean, and a man on each side to hold him steady, he should be able to accomplish the journey; and three men from Siloam, who were going towards Jerusalem, were accordingly hired for the purpose.

But when, about four P.M., the fever returned this scheme appeared impracticable; so the Shaikh of the village was sent for, and required to furnish eight men, and some poles on which to form some kind of litter. The Shaikh came. Mr. Nicolayson at first reasoned with him, then made liberal promises, but could get no other answer than that it was impossible to find either men or poles. Threats were then resorted to, reminding the Shaikh that he was officially liable to the vengeance of the Governor of the city. This seemed to have some effect, and the old fellow began to look about and consult with some of the lazy people who were sauntering about or lying on the ground smoking; there was talk, but absolutely no work done. To the promise of paying for their trouble three times as much as the Governor of Jerusalem should allow as their due, the Shaikh promised to find some other men than his own, after they should return from the fields at sunset; but that was all.

Appeal was then made to the pitiless idlers present to procure the poles; but their only reply was, "Ma fee'sh" (there are none). Then Mr. Nicolayson set himself to look for some. Among a heap of sticks there were none found suitable for the purpose; but from the sun-shelters ('araish) attached to some of the huts he pulled out several pieces, in order to select the best—among these was the beam of an old plough—and promised to pay double price for everything that might be used.

The peasants now began to show some symptoms of being ashamed, and to bestir themselves. They soon produced a considerable heap of short poles. But they were in want of ropes; these were furnished by the owner of the house, and the people began to tie them together as well as they could.

Evening came on, but no other men appeared. The Shaikh was again threatened and promised alternately; but he answered only as before. It was evident the people would not obey him; they declared they were unable to carry the burden. It would seem there was then no Aga of the irregular cavalry stationed at the town, as now, to whom appeal might be made.

At this time Costigan was suffering extremely from fever; the heat was tremendous, for a strong sirocco was blowing, and whirling sand and dust over the plain; and this, although evening had come on, rendered it impracticable to bring him into the open air, however much he craved it; the sand might have suffocated him.

Then the three men of Siloam who had been engaged went away; and still no others appeared to take their place.

The mother of the host continued anxiously attending upon the sufferer. She sat, when not engaged in preparing something for him or in her household affairs, rubbing his hands or fanning him with the long sleeves of her blue dress. Indeed, all the women showed much of that compassionate feeling of which the men seemed so provokingly destitute.

Night advanced, but no men came, and those of the place would not listen to the proposal of carrying the Englishman. And no wonder, for they are in the habit of delegating all toil of such a nature to the women. There can be no doubt that had the journey been a short one, these women would have undertaken the task, and then the men would have followed on foot, smoking and chatting, as their protectors.

At last a wise old woman suggested a plan that would require only three men. This was to fill two sacks with chopped straw, and tie them one on each side of the broad pack saddle, so as to form a hollow along the back of the horse. On this was spread a large fur cloak, and then a couple of cushions were fixed on the neck of the horse for the head to rest upon.

About nine P.M., when the fever had subsided, the party started in that manner, the patient lying along the horse, two men supporting his legs and one guiding the animal. The atmosphere having cooled in some degree, poor Costigan felt strength sufficient for riding so up the first ascent, which is very steep, but on reaching the level he was so much exhausted that they were obliged to rest for half an hour: and indeed the whole journey to Jerusalem had been tedious and painful, as they had often required to halt and re-adjust the sacks of straw.

At length the city was reached at eight A.M. of Saturday, the 5th of September, and Mr. Nicolayson had the satisfaction of seeing his sick friend comfortably in bed at the Casa nuova or hotel belonging to the Franciscan Convent. There were at that period no hotels or lodging houses in Jerusalem: all travellers had to resort to convents for residence, Latin, Greek, or Armenian.

The physician of H.E. Shereef Pashà of Damascus, a European, chanced to be in Jerusalem and came to the sufferer. Mr. Whiting, the American missionary, with Mr. Nicolayson, sat up with him at night, remaining also as much as possible during the day.

Throughout Sunday, Costigan was comparatively free from fever, and appeared so much better that they all hoped the virulence of the disease was past. He himself, however, did not share in this expectation, and often said, "No, I know better."

Towards evening the fever returned with violence, and the doctor pronounced that there was no chance of his surviving the night. Before midnight the fever became doubly strong. Up to that time he had possessed the full use of his faculties. During his last two hours he ceased to speak, and breathed with much difficulty. All that could then be done was to moisten his lips occasionally with lemonade, and about eight A.M. of Monday, September 7th, 1835, Christopher Costigan peacefully breathed his last, without a struggle or a groan, and was buried the same day in the cemetery of the Latin community, attended by Mr. Nicolayson, Mr. Whiting, and the friars of the convent.

The writer of this narrative has often stood over his grave to read his Latin epitaph, with the supplement in the name of his widowed mother—"Farewell, my son! May that heavenly Sion receive thee, where there is neither death, nor grief, nor any suffering, but endless triumph reigns."

It appears that his age was twenty-five.

Since the period of this occurrence two other expeditions to the Dead Sea have had melancholy terminations: that of 1847, fatal to Lieut. Molyneux, of H.M.S. Spartan; and the American one of 1848, which was successful in every point but in the loss of Lieut. Dale. And these two are laid near each other in the American mission cemetery at Bayroot.

In each of these three instances it was the young and the brave carried off as martyrs to the interests of science in the Holy Land.

Two years after Costigan (1837), two Englishmen, named Moore and Beke, had also a boat conveyed to the Dead Sea, but no account is extant of their proceedings: we only know that they met with much difficulty, and at last abandoned their task, sinking their boat into the lake, expecting probably to return under more favourable circumstances, but no indication was left for others of the whereabouts of the boat; and they never returned.

HAPPY TEXTS.

A WELL-CHOSEN pulpit text, fitting in with happy exactness to the circumstances of a people, is of great advantage to a preacher. It often acts upon the hearers with the effect of a kind of sacred wit, surprising and pleasing them; while it predisposes them to attention, because they see that the arrow has been skillfully chosen and feathered, and is to be aimed at a mark. It must be owned, however, that even in texts of this kind there are differences, and that in some instances the adaptation is confined to a play upon words that is scarcely consistent with a belief in the gravity or earnestness of the preacher. The greater number of those which we intend to notice shall be of the better class; though a glance at a few of the inferior order may have its uses, as revealing the sentiments or reflecting the prejudices and animosities of the age in which they were spoken. The first is not a very favourable specimen, but it serves the purpose to which we have just referred.

When Galileo, at the age of seventy, was cast into prison for declaring his belief that the sun was immovable in the centre of our planetary system, and that our earth, instead of being an immovable centre, performed an annual revolution round the sun—a belief which the observations of his own telescope had confirmed, and of which it has been said that he could not cease to believe, without ceasing to think—every effort was made to inflame the popular prejudice against the old philosopher. Many of the monkish theologians of those times refused even to look through the telescope at the stars, and the priests were vehement in their denunciations of astronomy and its aged apostle. One of their favourite pulpit texts was taken from Acts i. 11, and from the Latin Vulgate, which made the play upon the words the more successful, "Viri Galilæi, quid statis in cœlum suspicientes?" as if they had read it in our own vernacular, "Ye men of Galileo, why stand ye gazing up into heaven?" There is more of an unscrupulous cleverness in this selection than of that grave wit which may sometimes even besem the pulpit. But it gives us one of those glimpses into the past which are not without their value in the present; and it is easy to imagine what ignorance, bigotry, and vindictive suggestion may have gathered around words so misapplied.

The age of the Puritans supplies us with more than one of those happily chosen texts of which we have undertaken to present some specimens; and we question whether there ever was a more perfect adaptation than in one of the funeral sermons preached by the majestic Howe. A Mrs. Henry Sampson, the wife of an eminent Christian physician of those times, and herself a woman of strong, enduring faith, having languished for the long period of eighteen years under a distressing ailment, died on a Sabbath morning. Howe read as his text those words in Luke xiii. 16, "Ought not this woman, being a daughter of Abraham, whom Satan hath bound, lo! these eighteen years, be loosed from her bonds on the Sabbath-day?" The sermon has been preserved with this title, "The Devil's malice in inflicting, and Christ's compassion in curing, diseases." In no part of it does the great Puritan rise into a loftier region of thought than when dilating on the congenial sentiment that death is, to every one of the spiritual seed of believing Abraham, a loosing of bonds and an entrance into glorious liberty. He mentions with a beautiful tenderness the motto on the wedding-ring that had been given to Mrs. Sampson, by agreement with her pious consort, on their first coming together, "Emmanuel, God with us."

Few men excelled more in appropriate texts, or in the quaint and felicitous handling of them, than Matthew Henry, the famous popular commentator. He delighted in alliteration and in compact proverbial sentences, and it almost seemed as if he kept a magician's wand for commanding from its hiding-place the very verse in all the Scriptures that was most suitable. Even after the Act of Uniformity had come to be a dead letter, the spirit that prompted it was long in dying out. Suspicions of disloyalty and rebellion were apt to be awakened even by the building of a new place of worship for one of the Non-conformists, and the work needed to be proceeded with in such a manner as would least awaken observation or arouse hostility. It was with this state of things before his mind that, on the opening of his new place of worship at Chester, which "remains unto this day," he took his quiet protest that separation was not rebellion, in those words from the Book of Joshua, xxii. 22, "The Lord God of gods, the Lord God of gods, He knoweth, and Israel he shall know; if it be in rebellion, or if in transgression against the Lord, that we have built us an altar."

We place alongside of this, as an instance of felicitous selection, the words in Genesis xxxv. 5, from which his patriarchal and saintly father, Philip Henry, preached on occasion of his baptizing several of his grandchildren in Matthew's chapel at Chester, "Esau asked, Who are those with thee? And he said, The children which God hath graciously given thy servant."

A wedding sermon by Manton is woven with much skill out of this well-chosen passage, "And the Lord God brought her unto the man" (Gen. ii. 22). Marriage is traced up to its divine institution in Paradise; and, after the old Puritan manner, the principal doctrine of the text is stated in these words, "that marriages are then holily entered into, when the parties take one another out of God's hands."

When we pass from the Puritans to certain of the court preachers, we find ourselves in a very different element. Yet we might plead in excuse for what now appear to us to have been great indiscretions, the difficulty which men, preaching in the presence of royalty, must often have felt in hinting a fault without losing the sunshine of kingly favour, especially at a time when the pulpit exercised more of the right of censorship over public acts. History and fiction have alike painted James I. of England and VI. of Scotland as a vacillating ruler, who varied in his purposes under every new influence; no pen, perhaps, having traced his character with such masterly vividness and truth as Sir Walter Scott's, in one memorable passage in his "Fortunes of Nigel." That preacher was therefore surely making a bold hazard when he announced as his text for the edification of a king who added to his other weaknesses a keen appetite for flattery—"James i. and 6—'Nothing wavering.'"

The spirit of political faction, more than anything higher or better, must surely have helped the preacher in the choice of his text, when a new party in the state having mounted into power, and the new minister having neither place nor pay sufficient for all the greedy claimants for office, he announced his intention of instructing his audience for the day from these words, John vi. 9: "There is a lad here that hath five barley loaves and two small fishes; but what are they among so many?" One is apt to think that Cowper must have had preachers of this stamp in his eye when he spoke of those who were more eager "to court a grin than to woo a soul." The man who for the sake of a clever hit could so grievously cast away a golden opportunity, deserved to be "unfrocked."

We can imagine that Fuller, who was witty in season and out of season, but beneath whose wit there was usually a thick substratum of wisdom, must often have startled his audience with the happy adaptation of his texts to his purpose. We are not aware that the record of any of these has been preserved. But he gives us, in one place, his recollection of a preacher whose ingenuity struck him not so much in the choice of his text, as in his success in making what seemed a desert to sing for joy. Of course, we present the narrative in his own words; though we are not without some suspicion that, after all, the preacher whom he reports was Fuller himself.

"I heard a preacher take for his text: 'Am not I thine ass, upon which thou hast ridden ever since I was thine unto this day? was I ever wont to do so unto thee?' I wondered what he would make thereof, fearing he would starve his auditors for want of matter. But hence he observed:

"1. The silliest and simplest, being wronged, may justly speak in their own defence.

"2. Worst men have a good title to their own goods. Balaam a sorcerer; yet the ass confesseth twice he was his.

"3. They who have done many good offices, and fail in one, are often not only unrewarded for former service, but punished for that one offence.

"4. When the creatures formerly officious to serve us, start from their wonted obedience (as the earth to become barren and air pestilential), man ought to reflect on his own sin as the sole cause thereof."

"How fruitful," adds Fuller, "are the seeming barren places of Scripture! Bad ploughmen which make balks of such ground. Wheresoever the surface of God's word doth not laugh and sing with corn, there the heart thereof within is 'merry' with mines, affording, where not plain matter, hidden mysteries."

There are two sermons by South, entitled, "Against Long Extemporary Prayers," in which all the characteristic excellences and faults of that powerful preacher come out in bold relief. There are his masculine energy of thought, his clear, incisive, muscular, Saxon style, and his knowledge and command of Scripture facts. But along with these, there are his scathing satire in which the truth is spoken without love, and his rancour and hate against ecclesiastical adversaries, in which the great preacher sinks into the political pamphleteer, and the pulpit is given over to the worst purposes of faction, justifying his designation by Wilmot's as "the theological Junius." Many of his representations would be utterly untrue and his charges unjust, if they were designed to be levelled against the leading men among the contemporary Puritans; but undoubtedly they were fairly enough aimed against many of Cromwell's more fanatical and extravagant followers. And his text itself was like a nail driven home firm and fast, "Be not rash with thy mouth, and let not thy heart be hasty to utter anything before God: for God is in heaven, and thou upon earth: therefore let thy words be few" (Eccles. v. 2).

The temptations associated with the theatre have afforded frequent occasion for the warnings of faithful preachers, and sometimes the text has been happily adapted. Orton, the biographer of Doddridge, in a sermon entitled, "A Serious Dissuasive from frequenting the Playhouse," preached from these words, in 2 Tim. ii. 16: "But shun profane and vain babblings: for they will increase unto more ungodliness." Though we think there was a more curious fitness in the text chosen by an eminent London minister justly celebrated as the friend of young men, when preaching with a similar design, he announced those words respecting Paul at Ephesus as the motto of his discourse, "And certain of his friends sent unto him, desiring him that he would not adventure himself into the theatre" (Acts xix. 31).

It was a more than pardonable adaptation on the part of the late Mr. Jay of Bath, when, on the re-opening of his place of worship after it had been enlarged, and his soliciting an extraordinary collection from his people, he read as his text those words in 2 Cor. vi. 13, "Now for a recompense in the same (I speak as unto my children), be ye also enlarged." And there was at once an implied eulogy on the departed friend of fifty years, and a suggested lesson to the living, when, on the death of the famous Rowland Hill of Surrey Chapel, who, with all his eccentricities, had for two generations exerted such a mighty influence for good in London, Mr. Jay preached the patriarch's funeral sermon from those verses in Zechariah, xi. 2, 3, "Howl, fir tree, for the cedar is fallen; because the mighty are spoiled: howl, O ye oaks of Bashan, for the forest of the vintage is come down. There is a voice of the howling of the shepherds, for their glory is spoiled: a voice of the roaring of young lions, for the pride of Jordan is spoiled."

We remember a beautiful little church which stood on the sides of the Ochils in Scotland, half hidden among woods and ivy-clad, and which had been the place of worship for more than one generation. One night, it was burnt to the ground from some mysterious cause that was never explained. The aged minister travelled over the neighbouring counties, preaching with a view to collections for the "repairing of his waste places;" and his well-chosen text perhaps did quite as much to open the hearts and the hands of his hearers as the sermon founded on it. It touched more than one chord,— "Our holy and our beautiful house where our fathers praised thee, is burned up with fire: and all our pleasant things are laid waste" (Isa. lxiv. 11).

We must not omit from this enumeration the singularly appropriate text of Carey's memorable sermon, the preaching of which at Nottingham, in June, 1792, may be affirmed, without extravagance, to have marked an epoch in the history of modern missions,— "Enlarge the place of thy tent, and let them stretch forth the curtains of thine habitations: spare not, lengthen thy cords, and strengthen thy stakes; for thou shalt break forth on the right hand and on the left; and thy seed shall inherit the Gentiles and make the desolate cities to be inhabited" (Isa. liv. 2, 3). After observing that the church was, in these words, compared to some poor, desolate widow who lived alone in a small tent, that she who thus lived in a manner forlorn and childless, was told to expect such an increase in her family as would require a much larger dwelling, and this because her Maker was her husband, whose name was not only the Lord of Hosts and the Holy One of Israel, but the God of the whole earth, he proceeded to bring out the spirit of the passage in two memorable exhortations—1. Expect great things from God. 2. Attempt great things for God. In private conference with his brethren immediately afterwards, Carey formally laid himself on the missionary altar, saying to Pearce and Fuller in those immortal words, "I will go down into the pit, if you will hold the ropes;" and so was formed the Baptist Missionary Society, and a mightier impulse given to missionary zeal all over the world.

It has long been the custom among the Presbyterians in Scotland, that when a young minister has been ordained as pastor of a church, he shall be introduced to his congregation on the following Sabbath, by some older minister of name and experience preaching a sermon and commending him to the confidence and affections of his people. In a little mountain village in Mid Lothian, about a century ago, a promising young pastor was to be thus introduced to his future charge. On the Saturday a snow-storm commenced, and on the following morning it continued to rage with little diminution in its violence; but the aged father had not arrived. Still he might only be delayed, and might appear at the eleventh hour. The anxious young pastor was in great straits, for two services had been promised, and he had only prepared to preach at the second meeting; besides, there was an awkwardness in having no one to take him by the hand on such an occasion, and with devout and loving solemnity to bid him God speed. There was much eager listening for the sound of an approaching vehicle, and much peering through the drifting snow, in search of the much-longed-for presbyter appearing on horseback; but the hour for assembling had come, and there was no sign. The necessity brought out unexpected power and fertility of resource in the young minister, for, casting himself on divine strength, he, with much modesty and propriety, introduced himself, preaching with great eloquence and acceptance from those words in 2 Cor. ii. 12, "Furthermore, when I came to Troas to preach Christ's gospel, and a door was opened unto me of the Lord, I had no rest in my spirit because I found not Titus my brother."

Perhaps no text has been more happily chosen in our days than that from which the Dean of Westminster preached in his own abbey in behalf of Paris when it was suffering all the mingled horrors of siege and famine, and that most splendid and luxurious of European cities was shut out from all intercourse with the world,— "How doth the city sit solitary that was full of people! how is she become as a widow! she that was great among the nations, and princess among the provinces, how is she become tributary!" (Lam. i. 1.) That was not the least honourable page in our nation's history which was written a few weeks afterwards, when the munificent charity of England rolled up to the opened gates of the desolated capital, and all the jealousies of centuries were forgotten in that hour of our neighbour's sorrow, humiliation, and misery. OUR DISTRICT.

By A RIVER-SIDE VISITOR.

IV.—THE SUGAR-BAGS DEFENCE FUND.

TURNING OVER some old papers that were calculated to serve as remembrancers of some of the more noteworthy incidents and experiences of our district work, I came across a subscription-list headed "The Sugar-Bags Defence Fund," and containing a number of such signatures—most of them in one handwriting, but attested by the crosses of the individuals—as Crockery Jack, a shilling; Big Kate, sixpence; Busker Bill, a shilling; One-armed Hopkins, ninepence; Darkey Rogers, ninepence; Donkey Smith, a shilling; Dry Land Lawson, sixpence; Mother Badger, a shilling. These signatures, strange as they looked, were not playful inventions of people desiring to do good by stealth; they were the regular sobriquets of the subscribers, and were in most cases characteristic. For instance, Crockery Jack was a hawker of crockery; and Donkey Smith was the proprietor, manager, and driver of three or four donkeys, that were hired out to holiday-makers in the summer months, and to costermongers and other itinerant tradesmen in the winter. Busker Bill was a "busking," that is, wandering, musician; and Dry Land Lawson was a worthy of the type known as dry land, or "turnpike" sailors—sturdy, able-bodied impostors, whose line is to beg, or, if opportunity serves, extort, under guise of selling tracts narrating the dreadful shipwrecks from which they have escaped with bare life.

The sight of this subscription-list reminded me that I had preserved it as a sort of curiosity of literature, reminded me too that it had a history.

On the morning following the death of Fly Palmer I was passing along one of the leading streets of our district, and was brought to a standstill by a gentleman who, standing on a door-step, saluted me with a jauntily uttered "Morning, sir," as I came up to him. As a whole he was a horsey-looking gentleman. The suit of light grey tweed in which he was attired was tight fitting and sportingly cut, his scarf was loud in colour, his horse-shoe breast pin large in size, his boots glittered with patent leather and fancy buttons, and he wore a shiny, curly-brimmed hat, stuck on the side of his head.

He was a cool gentleman too, and he evidently enjoyed the puzzled air with which I regarded him.

"Can't quite make me out, eh?" he said, smiling. "Well, think I can freshen your memory there, though: Buttonhole Row. Does anything knock now, eh?"

Something did knock, that is to say, the name he had mentioned "freshened my memory," for I instantly recalled the face as that of the man who had directed me to Buttonhole Row, when I had been looking for it under its map name of Foundry Lane.*

"Ah, that fetches you!" he exclaimed, smiling; but his manner abruptly changing to seriousness, he asked—

"Did you see any one leaving me as you came up?"

"No," I answered briefly.

"Well, that doesn't matter much," he replied. "You know her; it was Fly Palmer's Poll. She tells me that you were with old Braidy at Palmer's death-bed."

"Yes, I was at his death-bed," I answered, adding, "a terrible death-bed scene it was."

"So Poll has been telling me," he said; "and if it is true—as I have no doubt it is—that the memories of their whole past life flash back upon the dying, don't wonder at it. Can guess that his recollections must have been ugly chickens to come home to roost upon him in his dying hour, and can quite understand his not dying 'game.'"

* See "Button-hole Row," SUNDAY MAGAZINE for September, 1872, page 853.

"He died penitent, which is a grander thing," I said.

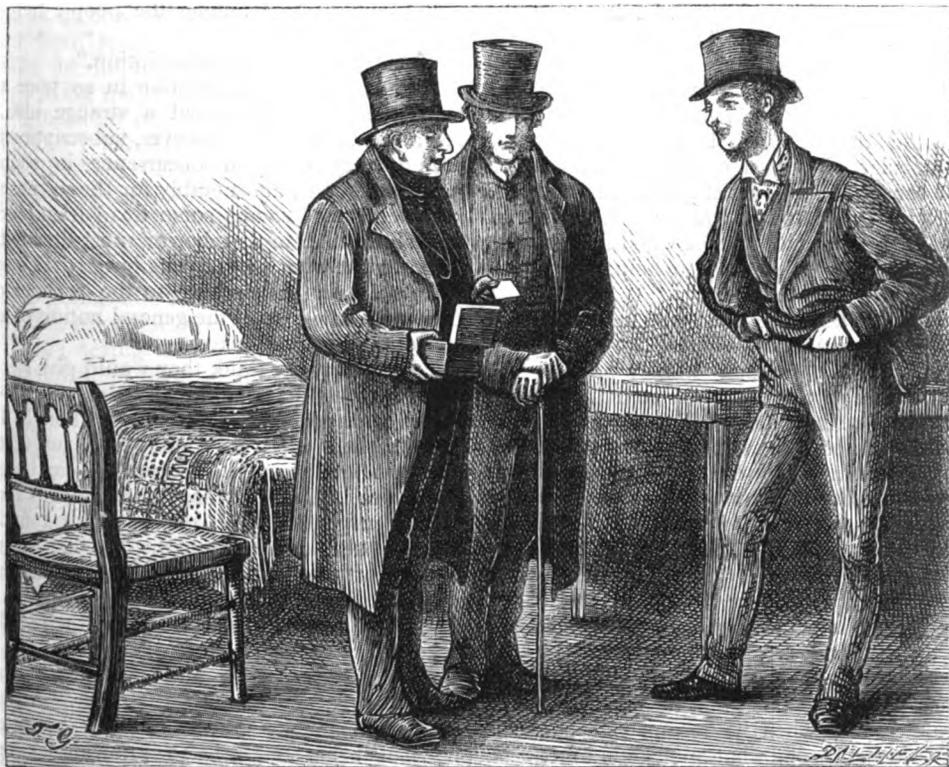

"Well, yes," answered our companion, "better so than that he should have passed

'Unhousel'd, disappointed, unanel'd,
No reckoning made, but sent to his account
With all his imperfections on his head.'"

So far he had spoken and quoted in all earnestness, and indeed with a certain degree of solemnity; but his usual mercurial manner asserted itself when, on concluding the quotation, he struck a theatrical attitude, and added, "Hamlet! verbally altered."

"Do you read Shakespeare then?" I asked.

"Well, I used to read him a goodish bit, when I was a younger and better fellow than I am now," he answered, "and, as you hear, I can still spout him a little; fact is, it's part of my business to be able to do a bit in the 'language of the poets' line. People would hardly think it to look at them; but the rank and file of such quarters as this are greatly taken with the 'flowery.' As long as it is given with a flourish, it don't much matter whether they understand it or not. If ever I'm at a loss I shove in a bit of doggerel of my own, and it generally goes down all right, especially as, barring old Braid, there is no one else hereabout as can tip them the flowery at all. Speaking of old Braid," he rattled on in his rapid jerky style, "I've sent round for him to come and do a confab with me, about a matter I have in hand; that's why I have stopped you—matter in question arises out of Palmer's death, and so I thought you would feel interested in it, might perhaps be able to lend a hand. Will you come into my crib here, and wait till Bible comes?"

While I stood hesitating what to answer he broke into a light laugh, in which, however, there could be detected a certain tone of bitterness.

"Ah, well, never mind," he said; "we'll wait for him here; though really, you know, I don't think I look quite the style of customer to go in for decoying and robbing passers-by."

I am afraid that if I had subjected myself to very strict self-examination, I should have found that it had been some vague general ideas anent passers-by being decoyed and robbed that had caused my hesitation; but, evading such self-examination, I smilingly answered—

"Oh! it was scarcely so bad as that. But, to be candid, you did not strike me as quite the sort of customer to be associated in any business with Mr. Braidy."

"Right you are—in a general way," he answered readily enough; "but, then, you see, there are strange associations, and strange many other things in a neighbourhood like this. I can remember a time when the idea of my becoming what I have become would have appeared much more strange to me, than such a thing as a true old Christian like Braidy associating with a fellow who is out of the pale of honest society."

He spoke with an affectation of cool cynicism, but it was easy to see that he was really moved. With a sincere desire to soothe him I said I felt sure that the particular object in connection with which he sought Braidy's assistance was a good one.

"I believe it to be a good one," he answered, "and I believe old Bible will think so too. It is to do what we can to help poor Sugar-Bags in her trouble."

"Sugar-Bags!" I exclaimed in amazement. "The woman who——"

"Yes, the woman who murdered Fly Palmer, if you like to put it that way," he broke in, seeing I hesitated for a word. "The woman whose hands are stained with the life-blood of a fellow-creature—who, knowing only that of her, the world will be inclined to regard as a 'female fiend,' 'a human tiger,' or any other penny-a-liner-christened monster; a thing to shudder at and shrink from—perhaps strangle."

He spoke with the utmost vehemence, and with a sternness of expression such as one would scarcely have thought him capable of, but, pausing at this point for breath, he grew calmer, and when he resumed he spoke in a lower and somewhat apologetic tone.

"I beg your pardon," he said, "I know it is both rude and wrong of me to fly out in that way. Still that is how Sugar-Bags would appear to outsiders if she went before them undefended; and my object is to see that she does not stand friendless in her hour of need. She is not the woman that that one unhappy act would seem to stamp her. The blow was struck in mere madness and terror, and, take her for all in all, she is more to be pitied than condemned. She is nothing to me, but she is unfortunate and friendless, and so overcome by horror at the result of her own mad act as to be helpless, and therefore I would help her."

I said that I had no doubt of his good intention in the matter; and that there was no necessity for his justifying himself to me over it.

"It isn't exactly that," he answered, "I wouldn't justify myself to any one; but I saw how you looked at the mention of Sugar-Bags' name, and I thought how ready the world is to judge hardly. I was rather railing at the world than justifying myself or blaming you."

"And how do you propose to help the woman?" I asked.

"By getting up a subscription to raise the means to defend her."

"A subscription among the people hereabouts?"

"Yes, a purely local subscription."

To a stranger, a subscription in so poor a quarter might have seemed a strange idea. As a matter of fact, however, subscriptions are of very common occurrence in such neighbourhoods, and notably for the purpose of funerals; of saving some dead friend or acquaintance from that horror most dreaded of all by the poor—a pauper's burial. It was therefore only in reference to the particular object in view, not to the general notion of a subscription, that I asked—

"Do you really think they would give?"

"I believe they would if the thing is properly managed," he answered; "though I want to hear what old Braidy says on that point before I take action. I can see your idea is that a feeling of friendship for Palmer might stand in the way, but I find a great deal more sympathy for her than sorrow for him; and, knowing the reputation he bore, I'm not surprised at it."

"What reputation did he bear, then?" I asked.

"That of a traitor and informer," was the prompt and emphatic answer. "He was nicknamed 'Fly' Palmer, because he had been so 'fly'—so knowing as to have avoided ever being convicted, though it was notorious that he lived by crime. He was what some would think wise in his generation. He worked upon the cats-paw principle, and not only used his tools, but sacrificed them. If he was not convicted, those who were associated with him generally were; and, though no case was ever fully brought home to him, there is no doubt that, in some instances, he betrayed his fellow-criminals; furnished the police 'information I received,' which condemned them. I'm not saying this as against his memory, or in her extenuation; simply state it as a fact, justifying belief, that there would be no special objection, even among the Barker's Buildings fraternity, to subscribe to a 'Sugar-Bags Defence Fund.'"

"And the upshot of all this is, that you want a subscription from me?" I said.

"No," he replied, shaking his head, "I wasn't leading up to that. Of course, if the thing is set a-going I would be glad if you did subscribe, but I had no idea of touting for subscriptions now. I merely spoke to you because your coming up just after Palmer's Poll had referred to you, had put it into my head. In fact, now I come back to it, I almost think my first intention in stopping you was to mention to you what Palmer's Poll had been speaking to me about, as I was under the impression that you had noticed her leaving me as you came up."

"And what might she have been speaking about?" I asked, for on his first mentioning that she had been with him, I had felt somewhat curious to know.

"Well, curiously enough, about a subscription," he answered, "though not, as you will easily guess, the Sugar-Bags one. She wanted me to get up one to bury Palmer."

"But, of course, you couldn't?"

"No; seeing that I was already turning over the other affair in my mind, I couldn't have acted for her under any circumstances," he answered; "but, apart from that, the idea was altogether a mistake. As gently as I could, I put it to her that, rightly or wrongly, he had been unpopular, and that to ask subscriptions promiscuously would be bad policy; at same time, gave her a note to a leading melter, pointedly suggesting that he and a few more of his kidney should make a 'whip round,' to the extent of raising sufficient to put Palmer decently under ground, as parish authorities pottering about his room might make discoveries that would be ugly for some people. I fancy they'll make the whip. Halloo, here comes the messenger I sent for Braidy!" and as he spoke, he indicated by a nod of the head a boy coming along on the opposite side of the street.

"Well, is he coming?" he asked, as the boy came up to where we were standing.

"No, he has gone to the court," was the answer.

"That will do," he said, in a tone of dismissal; then, turning to me, he went on, "He must be gone to hear Sugar-Bags' first examination. I'll go too. Suppose you won't care about going?"

"Well, I would not have thought of going of my own accord," I answered; but what he had been saying had interested me, and I rather thought now that I should like to hear the examination.

"All right, then," he said, "only you know you needn't stand on ceremony with me—needn't walk through the streets with me unless you like."

He spoke seriously, and without bitterness; but, putting the point aside as lightly as I could, I started for the court with him.

Outside the court there was a strong muster of people from our district, and especially of the Barker's Buildings set; and as we made our way through their midst I could gather that the burden of their song was, "Poor Sugar-Bags!" Inside, too, the court was crowded; but, following in the wake of my companion, who pushed forward with a most business-like air, we secured standing-room at a point from which I had a good view of the prisoner's face when she was brought in. It was a younger, more comely face than from the brief glimpse I had obtained of it on the previous day I had supposed it to be; but it was deadly pale, and wore a haggard, despairing expression, that left no doubt as to the intense agony of mind she was enduring. Though many eyes sought hers, she kept her gaze steadfastly fixed on the ground, save once or twice when she turned it timidly to where Braidy sat watching with a look of kindly sorrow in his soft brown eyes.

The examination was a short one, being merely a formal preliminary to a remand, the only evidence given being that of the constable who had arrested her, and who spoke to expressions having fallen from her which amounted to a confession that she was the person who had struck the blow.

With eyes still averted, and the agonized expression of her countenance unchanged, she was taken from the bar, and her removal was greeted by a general sigh of relief among the spectators, the majority of whom immediately left court.

On reaching the street a man accosted our companion, who, turning to us, exclaimed in his jerky, self-satisfied way, "Business! Must be attended to, you know; soon knock it off, though; won't detain you long; mind just stopping old Braidy if you see him going?"

In less than a minute after, Braidy did come out, and, touching him upon the shoulder, I bade him good day.

"Oh, good day, sir," he replied, looking up; "I saw you come into court with Shiny Smith."

"Shiny Smith!" I exclaimed; "is that his name?"

"Well, he calls himself Smith," answered Braidy, "and others call him Shiny, I suppose, because in slang phrase it is his nature to be constantly 'cutting a shine.'"

"What is he at all?" I asked, for I felt curious upon the point, having already been turning it over in my mind without arriving at any conclusion. My first impression had been that he was simply a swell-mobsmen, but that idea had not borne reflection. Swell-mobsmen are birds of prey that flock together, and I knew that there was no nest of them in our district.

"What is he!" echoed Braidy, who for the moment seemed puzzled by the question; "well, I think he would be best described as regular scribe, and irregular lawyer to the doubtful and dangerous classes hereabout."

"A lawyer!" I exclaimed significantly; "that accounts for his interesting himself so warmly about the defence of this woman."

"I did not know he was interesting himself in the matter," Braidy answered; "still, if he is, it does not follow that he is doing so selfishly. He is a bad man, and yet not wholly bad. Not that he is particularly exceptional in that; few people that haven't lived among such a set as I have done would credit the amount of good—I mean goodness of heart and kindness of feeling—there is latent among bad people. I often think that with better chances many of them would have been better men. Not that that applies to Shiny. I feel convinced that he in his day has had good chances. He is one of the might-have-beens, but I have not given up hope that he is yet among the may-bes. More than once when I have been with him it has struck me that his flourishing manner is put on to stifle the still small voice; and where conscience wants 'putting down' there is always chance of amendment."

Before any reply could be made Shiny Smith joined us, and in his most rattling manner saluted Braidy—

"Ah, here you are then!" he exclaimed, seizing his hand. "Glad to see you taking an interest in poor Sal's case; been on the hunt for you to speak to you about her; thinking of getting up a whip round; wanted to see what you thought of it; like the idea myself; think it sounds well, you know: The 'Sugar-Bags Defence Fund.'"

"I am going to her room to take possession of a few little things I have promised her to hold in charge," answered Braidy, with what seemed coldness by contrast with the other's tone; "if you want to talk anything over you had better come there with me."

"All right, old friend," answered Shiny, quite unabashed; "we're with you. I've enlisted Mr. — here in the cause."

I was about to say something in modification of this assertion, but guessing my intention he anticipated me—

"Well! well!" he hurried on, "provisionally, of course; supposing you are shown that it is a deserving case."

The three of us then walked on in silence until we reached Barker's Buildings.

The landlady of the house in which Sugar-Bags had occupied a room made no objections on Braidy explaining his errand.

"Well, the rent is a couple of weeks behindhand," she said, "but that is neither here nor there now. I wouldn't be the one to keep back so much as a cutting of twine belongin' to poor Sal. The furniture, what little there is of it, is mine; whatever small traps of hers there may be you'll find quite safe."

"This was her room," she went on, when she had led the way up to it, "and many's the hard day's, and, for the matter of that, hard night's work she done in it; and many's the sore heart, and good cry, and hungry belly she's had in it, poor thing; and to think that she should a' come to this, all in a minute, as you may say, she as never did a wrong act in her life before, and no one—the police, nor no one else—can say she did, for all the sort she lived among and the husband she had, and being often without a bit to put in her mouth. You must live with people to know 'em, as the sayen is, and I ain't had her livin' in my house without knowing something about her. She wasn't the one to make a song about her troubles, 'specially as it would have told agen him; but what she had to put up with and go through, and how she did put up with it and go through it, would soften a heart of stone to think of."

The recollection had undoubtedly softened her heart. She was a coarse, hard-featured woman; and I subsequently learned that she was generally reputed a hard-hearted one in the matter of "bundling out" lodgers who were in arrears of rent with her; but, however unused to the melting mood in a general way, her emotion now was unmistakable, and it was easy to see that her volubility was intended to hide an inclination to tears. "It's her as has done it," she resumed, when she had taken her breath, "but it's him as ought to suffer for it by rights, for it was all along o' him, with his lettin' hisself be led by the nose and givin' way to the drink, though I say it as has a husband of my own about as big a drunkard as there well can be, but you don't catch me going after mine like she did after hers. Many a time I've known her live on a crust a day; not that that was much punishment to her, for she was often too heart-sick to eat—and then spend her last copper in getting a bit o' something tasty for supper for him; and go to the public-house to beg him to come home to it. I've seen her myself coaxing him and my-dearing him, and clingin' to him and looking up in his face that loving that you would think that any man couldn't but go. But no! When he looked like going, Palmer or some of the rest of the gang would jeer him into throwin' her off; and then she'd creep home and fling herself on her knees by the bed, and cry her heart out pretty near. All the same, she would save him the supper and have it there for him when he did come home, and then she'd try to coax him again as loving as ever—I've heard her with my own ears. 'Oh Bill!' she would say, 'why will you act like this? it will break my heart altogether, if this goes on much longer. You know how wrong it is; then why won't you give up your evil companions, and strive to be a better man? But there you will, now, won't you, dear; promise me, now.'

"And then, though I was only listening outside, I could tell she was putting her arms round his neck. Then he would come out with his regular excuse: he couldn't get work, his character was gone, and he must drown care.

"No, it isn't drowning care, Bill,' she would answer him, 'it's bringing care, and making bad worse. Give up the cursed drink, and I'll work for us both till better times come for us, as I'm sure they would come, if you would only turn your back on your evil companions.' Then he'd tell her that he would—ay, and swear to it too; and I dare say he meant it right enough at the time. Sometimes he would be steady for a day or two, and sometimes even get a day's work at the docks; and then you should have seen how pleased and proud she was, and what a fuss she made about him. But it never lasted; the gang would get hold of him, and he'd go off on the drink again, and be worse than ever; and so it went on till it come to what it did."

"Why," she was beginning again, when Shiny Smith unceremoniously cut her short—

"Ah, yes! To be continued in our next," he said, motioning her to the door; "your feelings do you credit and all that sort of thing, but we want to have a little talk among ourselves, if you don't mind—see?" She apparently did see, for muttering that what she had said was right, she retired.

"What she says is true enough," observed Shiny, shutting the door of the room after her; "but she would have talked all day if she hadn't been checked. There's one thing," he went on, glancing round the apartment, "she might well say 'what little there is of it' when she spoke of the furniture: a rickety chair, a deal slabtable, and a shaky truckle bed, isn't an unnecessary amount of furniture, to say the least of it. As we are a council of three, it just runs to a seat each, so, Braidy, I vote you to the chair. Mr. — here had better take the table, which, though rough, looks pretty firm; and if the bed goes down with me, I shan't have far to fall."

Without making any direct reply, Braidy, pointing to a cupboard beside which Shiny was standing, asked—

"Is there an old tea-caddy in there?"

"Yes, here it is," answered the other, opening the cupboard, and handing out a small caddy of various-coloured woods. Is that her casket of treasures?"

"Treasures of memory, perhaps," answered Braidy. "You may easily guess that they have no pawnable or sellable value, or they wouldn't be here. Here they are," he went on, opening the caddy, and turning over the papers in it; her marriage certificate, some faded photographs, a few old letters, and a character as housemaid. "And now, Smith," he concluded, as he put back the papers, "I'm ready to listen to you."

"Well, the sum and substance of what I have to say is—What do you think of my idea of a general 'whip round' to defend Sugar-Bags?"

"Well, broadly, and supposing I were assured it meant nothing more than a desire to obtain legal assistance for her, I would have nothing to say against it."

Braidy spoke with a coldness that appeared to surprise as well as disappoint Shiny, who observed—

"Well, that's poor encouragement, and, excuse me saying it, it's scarcely like yourself; perhaps I don't quite 'take.'"

"Perhaps not," responded Braidy, rather drily; "but I'll tell you exactly what I mean. I find that in the Buildings here there is a strong disposition to regard her as something very like a heroine. There are some of them who seem to think—and, indeed, don't hesitate to say—that even had she acted deliberately, she would be justified in what she had done; and if your proposed subscription is in any way intended to sanction that opinion, then I am conscience-bound to disapprove of it strongly, however harsh it may seem of me to do so. I speak in all humbleness: but, however it may be with those around me, it would ill indeed beseme me to forget that it is written, 'Vengeance is mine, I will repay, saith the Lord.'

"I assure you, Braidy," answered Shiny, "that, so far as I am concerned, there is no thought of justification, though I am free to confess there is of extenuation. My grounds for moving in the matter, as I have already partially explained to our friend here, are, that I believe she was for the moment in a frenzied state, that she is friendless, and has been dragged down to her present condition by too faithful love for one who was unworthy of it."

"There, I can quite agree with you," answered Braidy in a much more hearty tone than he had hitherto spoken in. "Understand, I do not speak against befriending her, poor creature,—the Lord forbid,—I only speak against the opinion I mentioned, and I am happy to say that she has no part in it. She feels the greatness of her sin, is bowed down by it, and is as contrite as a poor sinner can be. So far as I honestly could, I spoke nothing but words of consolation to her."

"You have seen her, then," I observed, taking part in the conversation for the first time.

"Yes," he said, "she sent for me last night, and I was permitted to converse with her."

"But about the subscription, Braidy," said Shiny, who seemed to fear that the conversation might go off at a tangent; "do you think it would be a success?"

"I think that may be taken for granted," was the answer.

"Well, yes, I think it may," said the other; "but will you put your name to it? for that, after all, is my point with you."

"Will you take it round yourself?" questioned Braidy.

"Yes."

"Well, if you will promise me not to allow me to be misunderstood on the point I've spoken of, you can put me down for a shilling, which is about as much as I can afford."

"Don't mention the amount!" exclaimed Smith enthusiastically, "your name is a tower of strength; with that, and the estimation she was held in, to work upon, we shall do well."

"If, previous to this unhappy business, she was the sort of person you and her landlady would make her out to be," I said, addressing Shiny, "I can scarcely understand her having stood in good estimation in a neighbourhood like this. If she did, it could scarcely be upon the principle of fellow-feeling."

"Well, she undoubtedly was highly esteemed by her neighbours," said Braidy, taking up the answer. "It was a case of vice paying homage to virtue; and my experience is that vice will always do that where it sees that virtue is genuine in itself, and faithful to itself, and is not given to pharisaically thanking the Lord that it is not as others. When this Sugar-Bags, as they call her, first came here, her neighbours were very much inclined to resent her holding aloof from them, but when they come to find that her shrinking was rather from timidity than pride, that she was humble and long-suffering in her determination to live honestly, and had been brought into such a neighbourhood as theirs, by a too faithful love for a worthless husband—when they come to see how the land lay, as they would say, that though among them she was not of them, resentment was turned to respect and pity. Unhappily, as I have already told you, there is a disposition—arising out of the character the dead man bore—to approve of what she has done, but apart from that there is a general friendliness of feeling for her, so that the subscription is very likely to do well."

"Do well—of course it will!" exclaimed Shiny, "we'll make it do well. That'll be about the style of thing, eh, Bible?" and as he spoke he handed over a pocket-book in which he had been scribbling during the latter part of the conversation.

"Well, that part of the business may be safely left to you, Smith," answered Braidy with a smile, and passing the pocket-book as he spoke.

It was a large-sized oblong book, and boldly written across its length was the following rather startling announcement:—

"THE SUGAR-BAGS DEFENCE FUND.
NEIGHBOURS, ATTENTION!

To Be or Not to Be? That Is The Question.
Shall Poor Sugar-Bags go Undefended?
Remember! Many Can Help One.

The Smallest Donation Thankfully Received."

"Strikes you as a rum start, doesn't it now," said Shiny, observing my look of astonishment; "dare say you think it a caper of mine; but there you're wrong. When in Rome do as Romans do; that is the regular sort of thing here, isn't it, Braidy?"

Braidy nodded assent, and the other resumed—

"I told you they were fond of the flowery; and there is nothing they like it better in than the heading of a subscription-list—give them a bit of sentiment for their money, and they'll part with it as freely again. 'Help one another, Boys,' or, 'Be to a Friend in distress like a Brother,' is very easily written, and it draws. The Sugar-Bags heading will be mild and sensible compared with many I have done; all it wants now is two or three good names to top it—shall yours be one?"

The question came rather unexpectedly; but I answered that I had no objection, provided it was understood that it was given in the same spirit in which Mr. Braidy's had been given.

"I'll take care of that," he answered; "and things being settled so far, I'll exit and see about putting the business in train."

As there was nothing further to detain Braidy, he observed that we could all leave together, and we accordingly did so, separating at the door, Braidy and Smith going in one direction, and I in another.

I had scarcely, however, got half-a-dozen paces from the threshold, when I was followed by the landlady, who exclaimed—

"Just half a minute, sir," by way of apology, and led us back to the door-step. "Beg yer pardon, sir," she said, when we came to a standstill, "but might I ax yer what's on the cards about poor Sal?"

It was scarcely flattering perhaps to have been selected—as I could see I had been—as the person most likely to be got round; but, feeling assured that her interest in the matter was a friendly one, I answered that I believed there was an idea of getting up a subscription to defend her late lodger.

"And a werry good idea too!" she exclaimed emphatically, "and here's one that'll give to the whip, if she pawns her gown to do it. They calls me a tartar, and perhaps I am, and I'd need to be to get along with some of the customers I has to deal with. But, bless yer, sir, we's all a soft spot in our 'earts if it is only got at, and poor Sugar-Bags got at mine, and it would had to have been a heart of stone altogether if she hadn't, poor thing. I'd come to look on her like a daughter almost, which I would have had a daughter pretty near as old as her if she had lived till now, though it's perhaps as well as she didn't, for she was but weakish, and it's a rough world, and a crowded 'un, and it's the weak as goes to the wall in the crush."

"How old might Sugar-Bags be, then?" I asked.

"Well, she looks forty, but she's only eight-and-twenty," answered the voluble landlady. "It's trouble as has aged her; she's gone through oceans of it. You know, when the heart is full of sorrer, it will run over at times, and as she had no one else to speak to, she used to come to me, rough as I am, with her troubles, and that is how I come to know more about her than others, and to care more for her."

"What has she been?" we asked.

"Well, nothing very grand as far as that goes. Still she had been decently brought up, and was a respectable servant, and it was a come-down for her to be brought here. It was meeting her hopeful husband that was the ruin of her. He was a clerk, and went fast, and got himself into some scrape, and Palmer and one or two others of his stamp got him under their thumb; and they weren't the men to have a hold on him for nothing. They'd got some information about the crib in which she happened to be in service, and meant to crack it. But it was a big job, and before starting of it they wanted to know more about how things stood, and to get at it they put him up on the lady-killing lay—to court the servant, you know, and get out of her all about the house. Well, he made up to her, and to make a long story short, she thinking him a decent young fellow, falls in love with him, and I suppose he did with her as far as his shilly-shally nature would let him. What between his liking for her, and the others putting the screw on him, he played in and out—at least it was thought so—and when they did the crack they got hardly anything, and in a little while all that had been in the job, except Fly Palmer, got took and convicted. Sugar-Bags' husband, as is now, he got off for a few months, and when he comes out what does he do but go after her again. Well, he was down on his luck, and he talked fine about not having a friend in the world, and what a lesson this job would be to him, and how well he would do in the future, and all the rest of it, and I dessay he meant it at the time. The end of it was she married him, and they went to a part of London where they weren't known, and made a fresh start; but he wasn't long before he got into bad company again, and gave way to drink. Then Palmer came across him and got him here, and led him on from bad to worse, until it has come to what it has."

Such was the Barker's Buildings landlady's history of her lodger—a history which I subsequently ascertained from other sources to be substantially correct. Having heard so much of her, and having in this incidental manner come to be concerned in the organizing of the subscription in her behalf, I could not but come to feel an interest in the fate of the unhappy Sugar-Bags, and I must confess it was with a sincere feeling of relief that I heard that her crime, reduced to manslaughter, was punished by a short term of imprisonment.

It was immediately after the expiration of this term of imprisonment that it became my lot to meet her face to face and speak to her. I was entrusted to convey to her an offer, upon the part of some benevolent person, to enable her to emigrate; and, taking Braidy with me, I called upon her at her old landlady's on the first day of her return. She was greatly altered in appearance. She was very pale, and so thin that her clothes seemed to hang upon her. Her black hair was heavily streaked with grey, her manner was painfully nervous, and there was a timid and grief-stricken expression upon her face. We saw that our presence was calculated to put her into a state of nervous excitement, and so we delivered our message as briefly and kindly as we could. I had confidently expected to see her delighted at the news, and was therefore astonished to behold the look of dismay that came over her countenance. She could see that my surprise was not exactly of an agreeable nature, and that Braidy shared my feeling, and in a pleading tone she exclaimed—

“Oh! sir; oh! Bible, don't be angry with me, and don't think me ungrateful; I know how kind you mean to be, but I couldn't go away now, my—my husband.”

Neither of us made any reply in words, but we looked what was passing in our minds; namely, that we would have thought she had had enough of such a husband.

As we remained silent she went on.

“Don't think too hardly of him, believe me he is not altogether hardened; if it is the Lord's will, his heart may be touched yet. I know how weak I have been before; I trusted only to my own strength, but I have been taught better now.”

In her weakened condition her emotion was too much for her, and she sank into the only chair in the room, unable to speak further.

Seeing this, Braidy, who was evidently moved, stepped to her side, and, laying his hand kindly on her shoulder, said—

“There; I see it's too much for you; I think I understand you, though; it's brave of you, and I believe you are right. Do give up the trust in your own strength, lean upon the Almighty; pray to Him night and day, that your husband may be turned from his wickedness, and your prayer may be answered.”

“I will, Bible! I will!” she exclaimed fervently, and the tears starting to her eyes as she spoke. “He shall have a home to come to, and if it is God's good will to change him we will go away together; if he won't be better I will know then that I am called upon to leave him, and I will; but I must give him one more trial.”

To this resolution she adhered; nor seeing the spirit it was couched in could we well offer any strong objection to it. She took her old room, but she shrank from all “neighbouring,” not morosely, but with the nervous sensitiveness of one broken in spirit and wishing to be alone. Seeing this, those around, while pitying her, refrained from thrusting their sympathy upon her with a degree of delicacy and good feeling for which few would have been prepared to give them credit. On the rare occasions on which she appeared out of doors, she hurried on her way with eyes cast down, and even in the little chapel, of which she became a regular attendant, she sat apart. She resumed her former employment of sugar-bag making, and wrought at it with an eager assiduity, the meaning of which was explained when, on the eve of her husband's release from prison, she took a couple of rooms in another part of London, and in humble fashion furnished them as a home. I was among the few who were entrusted with a knowledge of the whereabouts of the new residence, and I watched with a painful curiosity to see how the husband would turn out; whether he would go on in his downward career, or “turn from his wickedness,” and it was with unfeigned feelings of joy that I saw that the wife's efforts to reclaim him were proving of avail. At first he was very restless, and had his former companions been at hand he would probably have lapsed into evil courses. Happily, however, he was for the time out of their reach, and by an earnest watchfulness his wife managed to keep him off “the drink.” At the end of a month employment was obtained for him, and he then became steadier, and a few weeks later he began to accompany his wife to her place of worship. From this time things went smoothly with them in their degree. They both worked hard, lived hard, and saved hard—saved so that in three years' time they were enabled to emigrate at their own cost. At intervals, Braidy still receives letters from poor Sugar-Bags. They are but ill-written and composed, and there is always a melancholy tinge about them; but, upon the whole, they show her to be about as happy as the cloud which fell upon her life will admit of her being on this side the grave.

GOD'S MESSAGE.

USURPING authority, and violating every law both of God and man, tyrants have shed the blood of innocence, and so abused their power, that not the property only, or the liberty only, but the very lives of others have been in danger. Where there is no tribunal at which such a tyrant can be placed, nor superior authority by which he can be restrained, are his subjects free to preserve their liberties and their lives by putting him to a violent death? Vengeance is mine, saith the Lord, I will repay. There is no question about that; but the question here is whether without form of law private individuals are in such circumstances entitled to assume the office of the magistrate, and protect themselves from certain destruction by putting the tyrant to death; dealing with him as all acknowledge they would be justified in doing with one who sought to murder them, with a midnight assassin, a maniac, or a mad dog.

It must be admitted that a good cause has seldom been promoted by private individuals taking the law into their own hands. Such violence, however it might be justified or palliated, has usually recoiled with terrible effect on the heads of those who have resorted to it. The matter presents a difficult question in moral casuistry. It is one on which it becomes men to be severe in judging themselves, but lenient in judging others. This, however, is certain, that the cases of that description recorded in the Bible, without censure but rather with approbation, supply no warrant for us assuming the prerogative of the public magistrate, or of Him who says, "Vengeance is mine, I will repay, saith the Lord." To take his case as an illustration, Ehud, who became a Judge in Israel, was invested with a divine commission. He was raised up by God to deliver his countrymen from the oppression of the King of Moab. King of a nation whom God had cursed and commanded his people to destroy, that man's life was already forfeited; he lay, so to speak, under sentence of death, and, though through the long-suffering of God he and his people were relieved from time to time, the sentence itself had never been repealed. In these circumstances we are told that when the children of Israel, groaning under the intolerable oppression of this tyrant, cried unto the Lord, "the Lord raised them up a deliverer, Ehud the son of Gera, a Benjamite, a man left-handed."

Selected by his nation to carry a present to the tyrant, he chose that occasion as an auspicious and favourable one for striking a brave blow for liberty. The lion crouches before he springs; and Ehud's visit to Eglon, the King of Moab, with this token of submission, and even of apparent loyalty on the part of Israel, was calculated to lull the latter into false security. The children of Israel would appear through him, their representative, rather to be hugging than on the point of breaking the chains that bound them. Besides, the very aspect of their deputy was calculated to lull the king's suspicions, if he had any, and to dispense with the precautions against danger which tyrants usually take. Indeed the man, as well as the time, was admirably chosen for the end in view. According to our translation, Ehud was "left-handed;" but in point of fact he was more than that, he was lame of his right hand; and this infirmity, which would become apparent when he laid the presents at the feet of the king, would go far to confirm him in his false security. It would not be a lame man conspirators would select for such a bold and desperate enterprise as Ehud had undertaken.

He executes his public commission; and has proceeded so far on his way home when, as one that had forgotten some circumstance of importance, Ehud hastens back to crave a private audience of the king. It is granted. The grateful office which he had that day discharged, the sentiments of loyalty on the part of Israel which he had been the medium of expressing, as well as the hand that hung withered by his side, would be considered sufficient guarantees against his harbouring any sinister purpose. So, as the audience he asks is a private one, the attendants retire and leave him alone with the king.

He breaks the silence with words that make Eglon start—I have a message from God unto thee! He had gone, on his return as far as Gilgal, where certain graven images had been set up, and at whose oracle Eglon, the King of Moab, probably fancied he had received the communication for which he sought his ear. With a reverence that did him honour, the king rose to receive it—not, however, in words whispered in his private ear, but in a double-edged dagger, suddenly drawn from his flowing robe, which Ehud plunged into the tyrant's heart. The blow was well struck. No cry, nor sound was heard by the guards without, leaving Ehud to improve the opportunity of escape. He was the man for such a bold and daring deed. With singular coolness and deliberation, as he left the apartment, he locked the door, that the attendants might suppose that the king, wishing for retirement, had locked himself in. As if nothing unusual had happened, he walked deliberately past them; and afterwards, hurrying along at the top of his speed, had the mountains of Ephraim echoing before nightfall to the blast of the trumpet that gathered the children of Israel around him, and the standard of a successful revolt. Death was the message he came with from God.

Very different the message with which the ambassadors of the cross are charged. They also are sent to men, but on a very different errand; yet no words could more appropriately express the purpose and object for which they ascend the pulpit, and crave, or rather demand, a hearing than these. It is not in his own name, or of his own authority, the preacher speaks. It is not himself he preaches, nor his own thoughts and opinion he comes to deliver. Rising from his knees, leaving the august presence of God, to stand face to face before a congregation of mortal and sinful men, with the Word of God in his hand and on his lips, he occupies a place of the highest dignity; and, more than any other orator, may begin every discourse with these solemn, startling, but in respect of the communication he brings, most blessed and gracious words, I have a message from God unto thee!

1. His message is from God. Some people have shed many tears over a novel, who never dropped one on the Bible; and many have sat melted and enchanted within the walls of a theatre, who sit within walls where Jesus Christ is set forth, and the most solemn truths are spoken, unmoved as the seats they sit on. This led to the question which it is said a bishop once put to a distinguished player. "Why is it," said he to Mr. Garrick, "that men hear our truths as if they were falsehoods, while they hear your falsehoods as if they were truths?" "Because," said the other, "you speak your truths, my lord, as if they were falsehoods, while we speak our falsehoods as if they were truths."

Notwithstanding the natural disinclination of the heart to the things of God, there was truth and justice in this reply; much in it to account for this, that people are never seen sleeping in a theatre as they are seen sleeping in a church. Did we see a blind man, who had missed the bridge, approaching the edge of the rock from which it sprung, nearing the brink over which another step carries him to be plunged into the deep dark pool that foams and boils below, what a cry should we raise to arrest his steps! And if preachers of the gospel were sufficiently alive to the hell on which sinners are hurrying, to the heaven which all may gain but many lose, to the solemn consideration that for every soul committed to their charge they will have an account to render at the great day of judgment, how much more earnestly would they plead with God, how much more powerfully and eloquently would they plead with men? "Dull as a sermon," would cease to be a proverb; the dullest speakers becoming lively, and the coldest tempers kindling into enthusiasm. People may talk of extravagance, and want of taste and refinement. But does the mother when she hears her infant scream, and sees it borne away before her eyes on the roaring flood, bear herself calmly and coolly as she takes measures to save its life? Was it as one goes to waken another to their daily labours that Lot entered the houses of his sons-in-law, drew aside the curtains, and told them to rise and flee for their life? I can fancy the bound with which he burst into the apartment; the terror expressed on his countenance; the loudness of his cry; how he shook his grey hairs and bewailed their folly when they refused to rise, treating him "as one that mocked." We should oftener see something like that in the pulpit—in the manner, and passions, and fervour, and fire of the preacher, were the messenger of God sufficiently alive to the danger of those he is addressing—addressing, alas, as coolly as if they were in no danger at all; and oftener also, did the audience realise the brink of ruin on which many of them are standing, would they, breaking through all the rules of conventional propriety, give audible expression to their anxiety and alarm in the old cry, Men and brethren, what shall we do?

Whatever defects, however, may be laid to the door of preachers, much of the little influence of the pulpit is due to this, that the people forget what the preacher is; and that, whatever be his appearance or manner, he comes to them on God's errand and in God's name as an ambassador of heaven, with this solemn, startling announcement on his lips, I have a message from God unto thee! God has sent various, and often strange messengers on his errands. By the dumb beast which he bestrode He spake to Balaam, rebuking the madness of the prophet; a shepherd from the mountains of Midian, slow of speech and of faltering tongue, was sent to Pharaoh to demand the liberty of the Hebrews and set the bondsmen free; his ambassador to Nineveh was a stranger clad in a shaggy robe, who trode its streets, filling and frightening them with this doleful cry, Yet forty days, and Nineveh shall be destroyed! while it was by the lips of a little artless child that he foretold to the aged Eli the wreck and ruin of his house. It was in peals of thunder He delivered his message on Sinai; it was in letters of fire on the walls of Belshazzar's palace that he wrote the doom of the king; it was in the songs of angels that He announced the advent of the Messiah; and it was by a voice sounding down from heaven that He revealed the presence, and proclaimed the authority of his Son, saying, This is my beloved Son, hear ye Him! And what we are to remember in the house of God, whoever be the messenger or whatever the manner of his message, is this—that the preacher is an ambassador of God; that it is not how he holds up Christ, but the Christ he holds up that we are to look to; that the messenger is to be sunk in the message, the earthen vessel to be forgot in the treasure it contains; and that if he is a faithful minister of the word, whatever be the plainness of his style, the defects or even dulness of his manner, he is entitled to a hearing, to the serious and solemn attention of his hearers, as one who may begin every address with this grand and startling announcement—in the words of Ehud to the King of Moab—I have a message from God unto thee!

2. The message itself.

That is the best window which, transmitting it in its purity, imparts no colour to the light of heaven; that the best pipe which imparts neither taint nor flavour to the water it conveys, but carries it along pure, as it springs in the fountain; and he the best preacher who delivers to men the message as God delivers it to him—like the disciples when they gave the bread to the people as they received it from the hands of Christ.

Through the fear of man that bringeth a snare, the messenger may sometimes be tempted, not to deliver the whole counsel of God. Forgetting that a faithful minister has no choice, people are apt to take offence when, with speech more plain to their sense than pleasant to their sins, he assumes the office of a censor. For example, Jeroboam set up two calves in Bethel, and because a prophet, commanded of God so to do, denounced this idolatry, and cried out against the altar, Jeroboam puts forth his authority to silence and his arm to seize him. Seduced by his heathenish and bloody wife, Ahab abandons the worship of God for that of Baal; and because Elijah, faithful amid a faithless generation, protests against the crime, the king accuses him of being “a troubler of Israel;” and because on the mountain where heaven, by its descending fires, attested the divinity of his mission, Elijah ordered her priests to be slain, Jezebel swears that the gods shall do to her and more also if she make not his life as the life of one of them by to-morrow. How unreasonable, to say the least of it, this displeasure with the messenger!

An ambassador for God, to use Paul's words, the indignity is not offered to him, but to the sovereign he represents; and if Christ regards a wrong done to the humblest member of his body as one done to himself, how shall He resent injustice to those his servants who speak in his name and bear his authority! Let such as are displeased with the truth because it jars on their conscience, and attacks their sins, and breaks in on their peace, remember that their contention is not with man, but with God; the truth being God's, and man here no more than the instrument by which He speaks, the servant who carries his master's message. But whatever offence men take against faithful ministers of the Word, the great message they proclaim in the name of God is one it should be as pleasant for others to hear, as for them to announce. He who hastens to the felon's cell with news of his pardon, goes to an unhappy man, but on a most happy errand. It is pleasant to be the bearer of good tidings—to tell men dying of thirst on the desert sands that a spring of water has been found; to bid the Israelite drag himself to his tent-door, and look on the serpent to be healed and live; to turn the eyes of the trembling host on the sea through which the wind is cleaving a passage of safety to the other shore. But better far the message the preacher of the gospel is commissioned of God to carry to dying sinners—that in Jesus Christ there is salvation for the chief of them; that whosoever believeth on Him shall not perish, but have everlasting life; that they have nothing to do but to believe in Him who has fulfilled all righteousness for them, and opened a way of escape from hell to heaven. True, the consequences of rejecting this salvation are not concealed—there remains for those who do so, nothing but a fearful looking-for of judgment. But the message itself is one of reconciliation, peace, and pardon. We come as ambassadors for Christ not so much to warn you of your danger, as to tell you of your safety; like Lot by the bedside of his son-in-law, we would waken you, not so much to hear that Sodom shall be burned, as that there is still time and opportunity of escape. The sinner, like Peter asleep between his guards, lies in his prison-house, condemned to die, dreaming perhaps of liberty though fettered in iron; in a jail of home; of peace in the midst of danger; and what though, like the angel who set him free, we smite to waken them, break in on their deep slumber and dissipate their pleasant but delusive dreams, when we can direct their astonished eyes to open doors, and, speaking for our Master, say, in his own words, "Behold, I have set before you an open door!"

3. The message addresses itself to unawakened sinners.

Is it peace, Jehu?—was the question with which the king sent forth his servants; on recognising, by the fury with which it was driven, the chariot of Jehu the son of Nimshi. One servant goes forth; a second also; and then a third; and to the same question Jehu had but this one brief and stern answer, "What hast thou to do with peace? And such is the answer the gospel gives to men who obstinately refuse salvation, and choosing self-indulgence rather than self-denial, live on in their sins. "There is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked." Do they, nevertheless, enjoy a sort of peace; feel no remorse; enjoy the present; look back on the past without regret, and forward into the future without dread of approaching evil? So much the worse. Most fatal of all signs! They have peace—such as it is. And so has the patient when mortification has set in; and the unhappy traveller who, sinking amid Alpine snows, has with feelings benumbed and fears allayed, laid himself down to "sleep the sleep that knows no waking." No state so alarming as when all tenderness of conscience has gone, and, glorying in their shame, men court temptation, and sin without remorse—when, to use the expressive language of Scripture, their conscience is seared with a hot iron.

Yet would God's Spirit give effect to them, there are truths in the Bible sharper than the dagger Ehud struck to Eglon's heart. Not that these are intended to kill the sinner, but the sin that's there. Jonah carried no such terrible message to Nineveh, nor Lot to his sons-in-law in Sodom, nor did Noah, as his hammer rung on the ark, foretell any such calamity impending on an impenitent world as is proclaimed to sinners in these words of Christ, "Except ye repent ye shall all likewise perish! This is God's truth—a solemn, very awful part of the message which the preacher is bound to deliver, and to press on his hearers, if he has any regard for their safety, or for his own, as one bound to declare the whole counsel of God.

When the cry rose on his sleeping ear, The Philistines are on thee, Samson, how did he spring to his feet, and, leaving the wanton arms of pleasure, stand like a lion at bay! Had there been any to raise a warning cry, how had the weary and war-worn soldier started and fled when the nail of the Kenite's wife was at his temple and the hammer raised that, descending, drove the tent pin through blood and bone, pinning him to the earth! In the message God sends by his servants He raises such a cry. It is a Father's voice which follows the sinner through all his wicked life, on to the very brink of ruin, saying, Turn ye, turn ye, why will ye die? He who died to save them, with all the tenderness of divine love, warns us, if we neglect this great salvation, of pains and horrors, imagination fails to conceive—a worm that never dieth, and a fire that is never quenched. Between that hell and those who reject the gospel there is no more time nor space than between any man and death. Another breath, and we may be there; another step, and it lands us in irretrievable perdition; another moment, and the door that had long stood open may be shut; and what avails it then that we cry, Open, open unto me—no other answer returned to our knocking and crying and earnest entreaties, but this, The door is shut!

4. The message addresses itself to awakened sinners.

To their eager, anxious question, What must I do to be saved? the preacher has an answer altogether satisfactory; glad tidings indeed of great joy. By the bedside of his patient the physician has not unfrequently to stand, beaten and baffled, confessing that he can do nothing more. Disease he may, death he cannot cure; and the case there is beyond all human remedy. Equally helpless, the crowd has stood on the stormy shore, and heard cries of distress mingled with the roar of breakers, and seen the poor seamen, one after another, swept off the wreck into the devouring waters, and, though willing to risk their lives in the noble enterprise, been unable to do aught to save them.

Were we as unable to save men, or rather to show them how they might and would certainly be saved, we would make no attempt to touch their consciences, to awaken or alarm them. In such a case I would no more disturb the slumber of a sinner asleep in his sins, than break in on the sleep and silence of a cell where he smiles in happy dreams who dies to-morrow on the gallows. But who would let him sleep on to die, were there time and opportunity for escape? And such is the message with which God sends the preacher of his word to sinners. The door is open; the way is clear; there is none too foul to be cleansed—too wicked to be forgiven.

Whosoever cometh unto me, says Jesus, I will in nowise cast out. Whatever you may have been, whatever you are, believe and be saved. Is your guilt great?—my blood has virtue to wash it all away. Are your righteousnesses as filthy rags?—cast them off, and put on in mine a robe fairer than ever angel wore. In your repentance, and good works, and efforts of many kinds, have you sought peace and found it not?—I am your peace; I have borne your griefs and carried your sorrows; I was wounded for your transgressions, and bruised for your iniquities; the chastisement of your peace was upon me, and with my stripes are ye healed. And now, believing in me, poor, penitent, terror-stricken, awakened, trembling soul, fear not, for thou shalt not be ashamed; neither be thou confounded, for thou shalt not be put to shame, for the mountains shall depart and the hills be removed; but my kindness shall not depart from thee, neither shall the covenant of my peace be removed, saith the Lord that hath mercy on thee.

5. The message is often rejected.

I have a message from God unto thee! These words made Eglon start, as well they might. A message from God?—that must be a matter of importance; and he was all attention, nor attention only, but reverence also—putting many to shame who sit in the house of God with wandering eyes or drowsy ear.

We find the messages which God has sent to men meeting with very different receptions. Received where one might have supposed they would have been rejected, rejected where one might have supposed they would have been received, a thief is saved and a disciple lost; and those gates that are shut against scribes and pharisees are thrown open to admit publicans and sinners. How different the way in which the messages conveyed by Jonah and Noah were received! Jonah appears in the streets of Nineveh an utter stranger to its inhabitants; yet as that foreign man goes up and down its streets, raising above its sounds of pleasure and din of business that doleful cry, "Yet forty days, and Nineveh shall be destroyed," the people are struck with terror, and from the palace to the meanest hovel the whole city goes into mourning. On the other hand, Noah was no stranger to those whom he addressed. They knew him to be a man of God, and one—as preachers have not always been—who practised what he preached. The flood that he predicted he diligently prepared for; his axe rang in the forest and his hammer on the ark as it rose deck by deck before the eyes of a scoffing world, a palpable testimony to his faith. Yet of all the men who heard him preach—saw the ark built—more wonderful still, saw the sea-bird from the shore, the eagle from her crag, the sheep from mountain pastures, and lions from the thicket take refuge within its walls, not one turned their steps to the open door; not one repented him of his sins. Noah's message was universally rejected. With his hand on the windows of heaven, ready to let the waters go, yet waiting to be gracious, God looked down on the world, and they were all eating and drinking, marrying and given in marriage—"he hearkened and heard, but they spake not aright; no man repented him of his wickedness."

Blessed be God, the message of the gospel is neither thus obstinately nor universally rejected. There were but eight saved in the ark; yet, though in one sense many are called and few chosen, heaven already holds of ransomed, redeemed, and glorified spirits more than any man can number. In them, and millions who shall follow them, or are now treading their steps, Jesus sees of the travail of his soul and is satisfied. Yet if many are in the ark who have found salvation through faith in a crucified Saviour, how many, alas, are out of it!—are living as if no flood were coming, to sweep them away, from the door where they stand, perhaps, with their foot on its threshold, fully intending some day to enter!

Broad is the way, said our Lord himself, and wide is the gate that leadeth to destruction, and many there be that go in thereat; but narrow is the way, and strait is the gate that leadeth to life, and few there be that find it! How sad to think it is so; and how much the more need we should see to it that, neither neglecting nor rejecting this great salvation, we are giving all diligence to make our own calling and election sure. Then, rising above all earthly cares, with the hour of death and day of judgment full and near in view, we may be "careful for nothing, but in everything by prayer and supplication with thanksgiving, let our requests be made known unto God; and the peace of God, which passeth all understanding, shall keep our hearts and minds through Jesus Christ."

6. Hindrances to the reception of God's message.

Among these may be reckoned our familiarity with it. If that does not, in the terms of the common proverb, breed contempt, it in too many cases, through the influence of our sinful nature, breeds indifference. Thus many, accustomed from their very childhood to sit under the sound, and receive the offers of the gospel, become, as it has been called, gospel-proof. Hence those who have been reared in godly homes are, when they become wicked, apt to run into excess of wickedness. History records no rebellion more abominable than Absalom's; and, child of David, under what holy influences was he reared! Judas Iscariot is the chief of traitors; yet he passed the last years of his life in constant intercourse with the Son of God. Hence of all unconverted men, the case of an unconverted minister may be regarded as the most hopeless—familiarity with the gospel if disassociated from saving, sanctifying grace, like familiarity with death, hardening, petrifying the heart. No man thinks less of the grave than the hoary sexton whose trembling hands toss about the mouldering wrecks of mortality.

This explains how it is—as we ourselves have seen—that discourses which have been preached without any apparent effect to an audience familiar with the name of Christ, and as much accustomed to the sound of the gospel as natives of the shore to the dash of the waves that seems but to lull them to sleep, when preached to congregations to which Jesus Christ and Him crucified was as a new revelation, have been listened to with astonishment; with open eyes and ears; with such gladness on the part of eager crowds, as was ready to express itself, in the words of the old exclamation, How beautiful upon the mountains are the feet of Him that bringeth good tidings, that publisheth peace; that bringeth good tidings of good, that publisheth salvation.

Another hindrance to the reception of the gospel message, is the self-denial that it requires. The message sent to Lot is not only to leave Sodom, but its possessions and pleasures—all his wealth and property to perish in its avenging fires. This may explain why he was so slow to depart. He found it no easy matter to tear himself away.

Though the day was breaking, and the angels were urging him to make haste, and every moment was increasing the danger of delay, those who came to him saying, We have a message from God unto thee, had to lay violent hands on him and his family, and drag rather than lead them out of the doomed, devoted city.

And here lies the difficulty of getting sinners to accept the gospel message. The salvation of our souls requires the sacrifice of our sins; it is by the cross, borne daily for Christ, that his people are prepared for the crown; and so strait is the gate that, though the greatest sinner may enter, he cannot enter with the least sin upon him. It is this which makes men unwilling to accept of Christ; which keeps them so halting between the two opinions, that though almost they are not prepared to deny themselves, and take up their cross daily, and become altogether Christians. You can part with many, but not with some favourite sin. Well, there is no alternative. You must part with that or part with God, and part with Christ, and part with happiness and heaven. Where will you find folly like that?—not in the hospital where a man parts with his hand or limb to save his life; not in the prison where the felon will submit to any pain or punishment to escape the gallows; not at the death-bed—unless he is a Christian longing to depart and be with Jesus—where a man would part with all his lands and pay down all his fortune for a medicine that would save him from the grave. "All that a man hath will he give for his life." Yet strange and sad to say, many give up heaven rather than give up their sins.

7. To receive God's message, it must be accompanied by his power and Spirit. He who says, Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest, says also, No man can come unto me, except the Father draw him. Some fancy that if the message were more impressively, earnestly, eloquently delivered, it would be more generally, if not universally, received. I have heard of a minister of the gospel desiring them to carry him from his dying bed to the pulpit, that, standing there on the very verge of another world, he might beseech sinners once more to accept a Saviour, and with panting breath raise his emaciated hand and sepulchral voice to address them in a last, loving, farewell warning. Such an affecting and affectionate scene, we may think, could not fail to tell; imparting a power to the broken speech of the dying never given to the brilliant and burning eloquence of the living pastor.

Fond, but vain imagination! There is a hardness and depravity in the human heart which could resist not only the voice of the dying, but the voice of the dead. Dives, the rich man of the parable, would have had the beggar sent from heaven to his brethren. There are no prayers either offered or answered in hell; but suppose the request had been granted, and that some night when his surviving brethren are carousing in the hall, the beggar stands before them, and after delivering his message — telling where their brother was, and what he was suffering, revealing the horrors and secrets of the prison-house — vanishes from their sight. What were the issue? No more wassail that night; pallid with terror the company disperses; and for a time the apparition of that old beggar haunts their solitude and rises before them in the darkness and dreams of the night.

But it had never changed their hearts. Our Lord lends his sanction to the answer of Abraham, "If they believe not Moses and the prophets, neither will they believe though one rise from the dead." Let God's Spirit grieved and resisted be withheld, and with the ark and its open door before them, the world is drowned; but let him give his Spirit, and when an unknown stranger walks the streets of Nineveh, proclaiming her approaching doom, the city clothes herself in sackcloth, repents, and is saved. What prayers should be offered for the Spirit! He only can send home the message of the gospel like Ehud's weapon; strike it into the sinner's heart. So let us cry to the Lord, when we read his word or hear his servants, that the Master's power would go forth with his message, and that the gospel which has come to us in word, may come to us also "in power, and in the Holy Ghost, and with much assurance."

THOMAS GUTHRIE.

FÆDER URE.

By HENRY ATTWELL.

MANY readers of this magazine will, we think, be glad to possess a copy of the Lord's Prayer in the form in which our Anglo-Saxon forefathers were wont, a thousand years ago, to utter it; and those who are already familiar with our mother-tongue, will not, we are quite sure, grudge the space here bestowed upon it.

Our interesting extract is taken from Dr. Bosworth's edition of the Anglo-Saxon Gospels, based upon the best manuscripts.

It cannot be ascertained with exactness when the Gospels were first translated into Anglo-Saxon; but we are told that the Venerable Bede dictated with his dying lips to his pupil Cuthbert the last words of St. John's Gospel. This was A.D. 735; and we may fairly infer that the other three Gospels had already been translated. The two Anglo-Saxon MSS. from which Dr. Bosworth's text is mainly derived, were probably copied about half a century before the Norman Conquest.

It is interesting to note that the Anglo-Saxon translations were made from the Latin version known as the Vetus Italica, and not from St. Jerome's Vulgate. We learn that two copies of the Vetus Italica Gospels were sent by Gregory the Great to St. Augustine.

These valuable manuscripts are preserved, one in the library of Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, the other in the Bodleian Library: it is probable that it was from one of these, or at least from a copy of one of these, that the Anglo-Saxon churchmen made their translations.

We shall append a few notes to the prayer: not as a philological study, but to show how readily the Anglo-Saxon may be converted into intelligible English: and this without the aid of a single word of Latin or French origin; and by barely making any alteration beyond simplifying the old inflections.

Fæder ūre dū de eart on heofonum, sī dīn nama gehālgod; to-becume dīn rice; gewurde dīn willa on eorpan swā swā on heofonum; urne dæg-wamlican hlāf syle us to-dæg; and forgyf us ūre gyltas, swā swā we forgyfap ūrum gyltendum; and ne gelæd dū us on costnunge, ac ālys us of yfele.

Sōþlice.

We would ask the reader, before looking at the following notes, to try to recognise the words by their sounds. We sometimes fail to recognise an old friend until we hear his voice. It will help us to the recognition of these old words if we read them aloud, giving attention to these two hints:—

(1) — makes the vowel long: thus, a is pronounced as o in cone; o, as oo in book; u, as ow in fowl; y as y in spy; æ, as EA in HEAT.

(2) d, represented in the old Anglo-Saxon ð, has the flat sound of TH in THOSE. has the thin sound of TH in THIN.

(a) The first note we make is that ðE (the) has, like the German DER, the force of the relative who.

(b) SI (be-thou). This is almost the only word we shall have need to change. Through intermixture of substantive verbs in our verb to be, this part of the A.S. verb wesan has been dropped. The student of German will see that SI is exactly identical in sound and sense to sei, the subjunctive of sein.

(c) GEHALGOD (hallowed). The prefix GE of the A.S. participle is obsolete in English. It is, however, preserved in the antiquated word yclept, A.S. geclepod, called.

"But hail thou, goddess, fair and free,
In heaven yclept Euphrosyne."

MILTON.

The change of g, A.S., to y, English, will be seen in very many words.

The ear will perceive that such a change is a very natural one by gradually softening the guttural g, in such a word as dæg, until it becomes day.

(d) TO-BECOME (come). The TO has the force of the Latin ad; and we see the same prefix in the German zukommen. It is interesting to find, in Wykliffe's translation of the passage, the old form preserved: "Thi kyngdom cumme-to."

(e) RICE (kingdom). Pronounce c as k. This word has lost its primary meaning of power, kingdom (seen in the German Reich); but we retain it, in the sense of wealth, in rich.

(f) GEWURDE (be, become, happen). We have the root of this word in the adjective worth, which means to be of some account; and again in some parts of the verb to be, was, were, wert. The GE, here, gives an intenseness to the verb, much as the prefix be does in such verbs as be-drop, be-dim, be-labour. This A.S. participle, GE is retained in clash (GElash), cram (GERam), crumple (GERumple), grub (GERub), &c.

(g) SWA, SWA (so, so; so, as).

(h) HLAFF (loaf, bread). It would seem that loaf was not quite so limited in its meaning in A.S. as in English: still, the loaf (HLAFF) was the lump of bread; while the bread was the aliment, the substance that *bred (BREDAN). We cannot resist the temptation to digress for a moment in order to look at this word HLAFF in a few kindred languages. German, laib; Old German, hlaiba; Russian, chleb; Bohemian, chleb; and on turning to Ulphilas's translation (ab. A.D. 360) of the Lord's Prayer into Gothic,—the oldest written language closely allied to Anglo-Saxon,—we read, "Hlaif unsarna pana sinteinan gif uns himma daga."

(i) SYLE (give). It will be seen that this word has lost its primary meaning of to give, to bestow, in its English form, SELL.

(k) GYLTA. Hardly guilts, in our English sense; but debts, as in the Greek original. So, also, GYLTDUM means debtors, as in our authorised translation of St. Luke's Gospel: "for we also forgive every one that is indebted to us."

(l) COSTNUNGE (temptation). Wykliffe uses the foreign word "temptacioun." The A.S. dictionary gives us COSTIAN, to try, to tempt, to prove; and COSTUNG or COSTNUNG, a trial, a temptation. But shall we find the old root still living? It will help us in our search if we refer to another A.S. verb, of nearly the same form and meaning, namely, CEOSAN, to try, to test, to CHOOSE. Now, to choose is to test (in order to select); and we may fairly reproduce this COSTNUNG as choosing.

(m) AC (also). We find this word preserved in our well-nigh obsolete eke.

(n) ALYS (unloose). It will be seen that we retain the exact word, in unloose, by simply changing the prefix A for UN.

(o) SORLICE. Soothlike, soothly, in sooth; sov, meaning truth.

We are now prepared to see through the secondary meaning of such words as rich, loaf, sell, guilts, choosing; and changing two words only, to read the prayer as English.

Father our, Thou that art on heavens, hallowed be Thy name; to become Thy ^e rich; be done Thy will on earth so so on heavens; our daily loaf¹ sell us to-day; forgive us our guilts, so so we forgive our guilters; and not lead Thou us on ¹choosing; but unloose us of evil.

Soothly.

* Unless, indeed, we may surmise bread to have been the flat, broad, cake.

THE EDITORS' ROOM.

I.—NOTES AND COMMENTS.

THE KNOX CELEBRATION.

THE celebration of the tercentenary of the death of Knox has not been a very great affair. Several causes may be assigned for this. In the first place, it was a celebration of a death, not of a birth. In the second place, religious celebrations of this kind do not very well suit the genius of the people. We have had two great centenary celebrations in Edinburgh within the last few years—that of Burns, and that of Scott. The chief part of each was a banquet, and the celebration took the form of the post-prandial speeches that are usually delivered on such occasions. The class of people who would have been more specially interested in a celebration of Knox are not those who would feel themselves in their element at a noisy banquet. In the third place, nothing is going on at the present time fitted to arouse any very special enthusiasm about Knox. No one is very loud in abusing him. On the contrary, he has been getting to be somewhat popular. People who are listened to, no longer call him a savage and a brute. The world knows that savages don't found schemes of national education, and that brutes don't refuse bishoprics when pressed upon them by English kings. Thanks to Dr. M'Crie, we have a true picture of the life of Knox. And thanks to Thomas Carlyle and to James Anthony Froude, even the literary world has come to see that the man who, in the words of the latter, created a nation as well as reformed a church, must be one of the greatest men of his own or of any time. The Scotch people look upon this change of feeling about Knox with calm satisfaction, but not with extravagant enthusiasm. They ponder these things and lay them up in their hearts, but they do not let them out in a burst, like bottles of ginger beer. The feeling that has been roused will probably embody itself in different ways in the case of different persons. Some will contribute more or less to build a monument in Edinburgh. Others will feel impelled, quietly but decidedly, to do all they can to promote the success of the new national scheme of education, which at length presents a fair probability of the accomplishment of Knox's ideal—the "devout imagination" which the nobles ridiculed. And others will feel that the best way of showing honour to his memory is to promote a closer fellowship, something like an ecclesiastical federation, among the millions of English-speaking men, in Britain, in the United States, in India, and in the colonies, who not only share his belief, but follow the form of church polity which he established.

If Knox were here he would be pleased with much, but he would be sad for some things. Pleased he would be at the vitality which has attended his system, and the marvellous expansion it has undergone in three centuries. Following its fortunes, his heart would rest, with special interest, on the great American Church which still calls him its father. Pleased he would be, likewise, at the efforts we are at last making for the extension of common and of college education. Pleased, too, he would be to see lay elders still held in honour, and the system esteemed more and more in other lands and in other communions. But he would be sadly vexed at the Poor Laws, for the "paup," in his view, were God's charge to the Church. He would be sadly vexed at our ecclesiastical divisions. He would be sadly vexed at the ecclesiastical divorce of England and Scotland. And he would be sadly vexed at the isolation of the nobility, not only from the Church, but from the people of the country. Most vexed of all, probably, at the too feeble pulse of spiritual life, and the faintness of the brave old spirit that was willing to give "all for the Church and a little less for the State."

ATTACKS ON MISSIONARIES.

The proposal, which will have been carried into effect before this number of our Magazine reaches our readers, to observe the 20th December for earnest prayer on behalf of foreign missions, has drawn forth an angry philippic from one of the high priests of high churchism, Dr. Littledale. Not that he objects to prayer for missions—far from it; but his soul is distressed on account of a proposal by Archdeacon Allen to have evening communion on that day. Now, evening communion is to Dr. Littledale an awful profanation. Have not the Church councils of the last twelve hundred years decreed that the communion should be received fasting? And dare any good man receive it otherwise? For our own part, we could not help thinking of a company of good men that met in an upper chamber one evening, and, after supper, their Master took bread and brake it, and gave it to them, saying, "Take, eat." Then we thought of another occasion where certain disciples were gathered together, and a certain Apostle came among them; and though he had been at Troas a whole week, and might well enough have observed the "breaking of bread" in the morning, he put it off till the evening, for the speech which he delivered on the occasion lasted till midnight. We confess we were simple enough to think that Mr. Allen might safely follow these precedents, older than even eighteen hundred years; but Dr. Littledale and his friends must be able to say, "Nous avons changé tout cela!"

But it is not to comment on that circumstance that we advert to Dr. Littledale. He is highly displeased with modern missions. He says they are not conducted after the manner of the successful apostles of former times. Well, if he can point out wherein "the doctrine on the church, the sacraments, the atonement, the ministry, and the operation of grace," as taught by our modern missionaries, differs from that taught by Peter and Paul and John, we shall be very thankful. But that is not the point at all. The doctrine may be the same as that of these apostles, but Dr. Littledale's apostles are quite another set of men: they are mediæval apostles; they are "the men that converted the invaders of the Empire in the fifth and sixth centuries, and won Russia and Scandinavia to the Gospel in the tenth century."

We remember hearing of a foreign missionary lamenting to a brother churchman that there was so little of conversion among the natives. "How could you expect them to be converted," was the reply, "when your church is not built east and west?" How can we expect missions to prosper, virtually asks Dr. Littledale, if missionaries do not receive the sacrament fasting?

More than that, how can we expect missionaries to be good men, if they are so profane? And good men they are not. "I find it," he says, "reiterated in the most explicit language from every quarter of the heathen world, by dispassionate lay-travellers, the laziness and self-indulgence of Protestant missionaries, whether nominal Anglicans or Dissenters. There is absolutely only one voice on this head."

Dr. Littledale has such a power over facts that it may be rash to contradict him even here. Still, "methinks he doth protest too much." He has vaulted so high as to land on the wrong side of the horse. To say that there is absolutely only one voice on the character of missionaries, and that that one voice charges the whole fraternity with laziness and self-indulgence, is so absurd and so untrue a statement that the value of the whole assertion comes to nothing. Did Dr. Littledale ever hear of Lord Napier of Merchistoun, or of Sir Bartle Frere? Did he ever hear of Sir Henry Lawrence, or Sir Herbert Edwards? Is the name of the gallant and excellent Sir Donald Macleod, who met his death the other day in a way so distressing, quite unknown to him? Who constitute the chain of dispassionate lay-travellers that unanimously accuse our missionaries of leading a life so disgraceful in men holding their office? Or let us see how the charge fits to some well-known names. Take churchmen first:—Henry Martyn, Allen Gardiner, Bishop Mackenzie, Bishop Patteson? Take Nonconformists or others:—John Williams, Robert Moffat, David Livingstone, Alexander Duff, William Burns? Need we go further? The reckless folly of such a charge recoils on the head that fabricated it. Its use is simply to indicate the intense dislike with which every enterprise conducted in the evangelical spirit is regarded by the more advanced high churchmen. The step would not be a long one from such a spirit of hatred to deeds of persecution if there were the power.

THE ASSYRIAN TABLET OF THE FLOOD.

The Moabite stone has yielded the palm. For though neither Dr. Tristram nor any of his fellow-travellers has discovered any other tablet in Moab to be placed beside what is still the Moabite stone, a discovery has been made in the heart of London that reaches back to a much more distant point of time than even that of the royal sheep-master of Moab. Mr. Smith, of the British Museum, has been searching among a mass of clay tablets taken some fifteen years ago from the Royal Library of Nineveh, and has discovered one which he believes to contain the story of the Flood. The tablets were much mutilated, and it was only after a careful search that he got together all the fragments that were necessary to supply the story entire. Of course, the outer world must rely in absolute trust on the few great Assyrian scholars who are capable of dealing with such documents, and the names of these might be told off on the fingers of a single hand. Conspicuous among them is Sir Henry Rawlinson, who, though in some doubt as to the proper names, has thrown no suspicion on the rendering of the narrative itself. It turns out to be a Chaldæan version of the story of the Flood, differing in some particulars from the scriptural account, but sufficiently near to throw a very interesting light on that narrative. The date of the document of which that now found is a copy can only be guessed at, but according to Mr. Smith it cannot be later than the seventeenth century before Christ. It is in the form of a narrative given to a king whose name he has not been able to read phonetically, but which by another process he gives as Izdubar. The flood destroys all life from the face of the earth. Not only were the men destroyed, but the very gods were frightened; and the document, lowering the gods in a way unknown in the sacred Scriptures, likens them to dogs cowering with their tails between their legs. The cause of the flood was sin. "The world to sin has turned; and then I in the presence of the gods prophesied evil; when I prophesied in the presence of the gods evil, to evil were devoted all my people, and I prophesied thus, 'I have begotten man, and let him not, like the sons of the fishes, fill the seas.'" The flood lasts for six days and nights. Then Ishtar opens the window, but the ship is borne along to the mountain of Nizir, where it sticks. On the seventh day after, a dove is sent forth and it returns. Then a swallow, which also returns. Then a raven, which wanders away and does not return. Then Ishtar offers a libation to the gods, and Bel comes and hands him and his wife out, and purifies the country and establishes a covenant.

Such is this new tradition. Traditions of the flood have always been so numerous, and in many of their features so much resembling the Bible account of it, that a new one is little more than a stone added to a cairn. The interesting thing is, that in these days, when scepticism pronounces a flood like that of Noah impossible, our attention should be turned to the overwhelming evidence in favour of it. We should not like to be the man who stakes his well-being, whether now or hereafter, on the chance of the flood proving to have been a myth. As little should we like to be the man who stakes his salvation on the chance of the prophecy proving to be a delusion, that as the world was once destroyed by water, it is destined hereafter to be consumed by fire.

THE WESLEYAN EDUCATION CONFERENCE.

A very important change of policy in regard to public education has taken place in the Wesleyan body. Since the Wesleyans resolved, some years ago, to have connectional schools, the weight of their influence has been in favour of denominational education. They were not at first disposed, when Mr. Forster's measure became law, to throw their connectional schools into the general system. But of late strong reasons for moderating this policy have been operating upon them. During December, an important conference of leading members of the Wesleyan Church has been held for the purpose of giving the subject a full consideration. While Dr. Rigg, Mr. Pope, and others, showed an inclination to retain the connectional character of the schools, Mr. Arthur, and the majority, were of opinion that it would on the whole be better to merge them in the general system. Provided the Bible should continue to be taught in the schools, they were willing that they should form part of the national system. But the resolution carried did not go quite so far. A kind of compromise was agreed to, reserving existing schools under the old system, but agreeing that new schools should be embraced in the national scheme. Whether the proposal to exempt existing schools will be maintained or not, we cannot say; the probability is, we should suppose, that once the new policy has been digested a little, this restriction will not be insisted on.

It is felt that this is a very important resolution, and that it will not be without effect in connection with the national scheme. Some change, it is generally believed, will have to be made upon it; and the step indicated by the Wesleyans may not be without influence on those to whom it lies to consider what the change is to be.

II.—OUR LETTER-DRAWER.

THE BIBLE AND SCIENCES.

To the Editors of the SUNDAY MAGAZINE.

"I was very glad to meet with your answer to an inquiry concerning 'The Bible and Science,' in October. I hoped the concluding remarks of that reply, referring to the causation of light would have produced a question on, and an explanation of that, to me, most perplexing subject; but seeming to be solitary in my ignorance of the nature of those discoveries achieved by modern science, which prove that light exists independently of the sun, I have presumed to address you, hoping you will devote a short space in your next issue to a definition of the 'luminiferous substance,' and the manner of its 'vibration.'

"M. E. C."

The theory of light, about which M. E. C. asks information, now, we believe, accepted by philosophers, is, in one word, that light is not matter but motion. Sir Isaac Newton thought that light consisted of small particles emitted by the luminous body with great velocity in all directions. Since his time, however, by means of certain decisive experiments, it has been found that light does not consist of particles of matter, but of undulations, occurring in a highly attenuated but elastic substance, called ether, which must fill all space, connecting our globe with the remotest stars, and pervading our atmosphere and all transparent bodies.

It is obvious that until this theory came into existence, it would be very unlikely that any one should suppose that there could be light, as recorded in the first chapter of Genesis, before the sun was formed. How then did it happen that the author of that chapter represented light as existing before the sun? The argument to which we referred was, that he must have written under the influence of a higher guidance, since the idea of light without the sun would not have occurred to him. Now that the undulatory theory of light has been established, we can understand how there should be light without the sun. The Spirit of God moving through the void might cause the vibrations in the ether which produce light. Subsequently, when the sun and other luminous bodies were formed, the vibrations were produced by them, it being the property of luminous bodies to cause the undulatory motion by which light is produced.

Mr. Ponton, the author to whose book we referred ("The Beginning"), is learned in explanations of the Hebrew words in the first chapter of Genesis. He affirms, for example, that the word mirahefeth, "The spirit of God moved on the face of the water" means, by consent of commentators, "the production of a tremulous or vibratory motion." Mr. Ponton argues that the terms employed are precisely such as a thoroughly scientific mind would employ to denote the process. We do not agree with him there. Commentators are not agreed that mirahefeth denotes a tremulous or vibratory motion. It does not seem to us to be wise to attempt to find in the Bible recondite allusions to scientific facts or laws but lately discovered, and to build upon these an argument for verbal inspiration. All that it seems to us fair and reasonable to infer either from the fact that light is said to have been created before the sun, or from the language used to describe the process, is, that the writer could not have invented the statement—he must have got it from some one who knew more about the matter than men had then the means of knowing of themselves.

PROSE SET TO POETRY.

We hardly know how to acknowledge the courtesy of "Emerald Isle," who, in a provincial newspaper kindly forwarded to us, sends back to us in rhyme echoes of our own lucubrations. Here, for example, is very good advice to the working man who has secured a better share than formerly of—

SPARE TIME AND SPARE MONEY.

(A Rhyme for the Working Man.)

Long we've fought to reach this height,
By unions, strikes, and combination,
Now, in this dawn of new-born light,
Shall we raise or sink our nation?

Day by day, and year by year,
Long we strove to reach this goal,
Counting nothing was too dear
To gain more rest from slavish toil.

Now we've won our sighed-for state,
 Rest from labour,—“softer lines,”
 Shall we “rest and thankful wait,”
 And test results by present signs ?

Are our homes made happier, say
 Does want get banished from our ranks,
 Where goes all our extra pay,
 To public-house, or “Saving Banks ?”

The future is at least our own,—
 Fight and conquer each abuse,
 Let us trust in right alone,
 To good fast cling, the bad refuse.

Leisure time brings leisure's cares,
 Extra pay, temptations strong ;
 Be it ours to shun all snares,
 If we would our rights prolong.

Rally round Mechanics' Halls,
 Lecture rooms, and evening schools,
 Step to the front when duty calls,
 Leave drink and sloth to sots and fools.

EMERALD ISLE.

III.—GLANCES AT WHAT IS DOING ABROAD.

FRANCE.

The cauldron has been stirred again; “bubble, bubble, toil and trouble,” as before. Only the cauldron has not boiled over; the process has been arrested for the time. For the time, but we fear only for the time; the dove with the olive leaf has not yet settled down, and no one can tell what may be on the point of taking place. Good people are thankful that in one of Thiers' official documents he should have sought for France the protection of the Almighty; it is such a great thing for the President to make any recognition of God. As for the Reformed Church, men seem to be making up their minds that a disruption between the rationalist and Evangelical portions of it is inevitable; elements so opposite cannot cohere.

In regard to the Church's work, earnest men are getting to be more alive. We learn from a contemporary that the National Conferences of the South have been held and conducted in a most prayerful spirit. The first question was that of society and Christianity. Rich against poor and poor against rich; producer against consumer, and consumer against producer; systems of socialism and systems of political economy, were passed in review. The only true remedy is the unselfish love implanted in man by the gospel. With this, co-operative association were counted one of the best practical remedies. Christian men were earnestly exhorted to see that their families bore bright testimony to the holiness and happiness produced by the Gospel. Then the Synod was discussed; and, after that, what could be done to make the public services more interesting and impressive and full of life. It was felt that a politico-religious journal was a great desideratum; and a committee was named to consider what could be done.

The Committee of the Cologne Congress has brought out an answer to the Fulda memorial. Comparing it with what the same parties issued in 1870, it declares that it is contradictory, and therefore a nullity. It affirms of the Alt-Catholics that they believe all that the Church believed up to July 18, 1870, and therefore they are the true Catholic Church. Therefore it is a calumny to allege that they are apostates, and that their masses are sacrilegious.

In a recent number, we adverted to the singular fact, that in protesting against the right of a Church to make the slightest alteration on its formularies, Dr. Pusey of England and Dr. Begg of Scotland,—the extreme High Church of the one kingdom, and the extreme Free Church of the other,—joined hands. It now appears that the Alt-Catholics take the same ground; but, we cannot help thinking, with infinitely more reason than either of the others.

IN THE PRUSSIAN PARLIAMENT.

Nothing can be more vigorous than the war between ultramontaniam and the representatives of the people. Several pitched battles have lately taken place. The House was asked by Reichensperger to declare that Catholic children should be exempted from attendance on Professor Wollmann, the excommunicated professor in the Bauenburg Gymnasium. By a majority of 264 to 83, the House declared that it would not interfere. Next day an attempt was made to reverse the decision of the Minister of Worship against the teaching in schools by nuns and sisters. The result was similar—a majority against the proposal of 242 to 83. Dr. Palk, the Minister of Worship, defended himself with great vigour. The State knew nothing, he said, of the Vatican decree, and as for the Bishops, the organ of communication with the Church and the Government, they had made their bargain with them before there was any Vatican decree. And as for the nuns and sisters, it was but twenty years since they had been admitted to schools, and there was no reason why the schools might not get on without them now as well as they did twenty years ago. In conclusion he said: The Church had declared war against the State, and the State was reluctantly compelled to accept it. In the Catholic itinerant meetings hot-blooded priests were preaching war with fanatical cries against the State. Alone the State could not conquer; the people must help the State to resist fanaticism and priestly intolerance.

It is said that the laws against the Jesuits are being executed with no little rigour.

The German correspondent of the Guardian notices a new book entitled “The Boundaries between the Church and State.” Among other points noticed in connection with Great Britain, is the Catholic Emancipation of 1829. That measure, says the writer, was founded avowedly on the principle that the papal claim of Infallibility, with all the consequences flowing from it, did not exist. Now that the Infallibility has been decreed, the ground has been cut away on which that measure rested. The English did not seem to be giving any heed to this; but the ever advancing front of the Catholic Church would bring on proceedings that would awaken them from their dream.

DR. STRAUSS'S NEW WORK.

The name of Dr. David Strauss, besides being familiar as a household word to all theologians, is known likewise to every well-informed person as that of the renowned author of the "Life of Jesus," published some thirty years ago, which did so much to discredit the historical character and accuracy of the four Gospels. By means of the mythical theory, which accounted for the Gospel miracles as myths added to the plain history by the fond fancy and credulous superstition of the admirers of Jesus, Strauss got rid of the supernatural, threw overboard our Lord's resurrection, and left no more of the old Gospel history than is left of the glory of some venerable ruin, when the ivy and eglantine are torn from off it, and nothing is left but a gaunt shapeless shoulder of stone and lime.

It was not likely that Dr. Strauss either would or could remain at the point indicated by his "Life of Jesus." He had gone on an inclined plane, and he must either abandon it, or yield to the downward attraction which is inevitable in such a position. His new book, entitled "Der Alte und der Neue Glaube"—The Old and the New Faith—shows too clearly which of these alternatives he has followed. Those who hold his views, he says with some pride, the "We" in whose name he writes, are no longer an insignificant handful, but are to be reckoned by tens of thousands. Such being the case, it is necessary that they should now take stock, ascertain their bearings, define their position. And this book is designed to show whereabouts they are. They have no intention to found a new church, for they don't believe in any church. The questions for them to answer are such as these—Are we still Christians? Have we still Religion? What is our View of the World? How ought we to order our lives? As to the first, he makes short work of that. There is no real reason why they should call themselves Christians. "My conviction is, apart from all subtleties, if we will adopt the Yea yea, and the Nay nay, in short, if we will speak as honest upright men—we must confess we are no longer Christians." And here they do speak as honest upright men, ghastly though their utterance is, and it were only to be wished that all who are of the same mind would be equally explicit in their avowal. In regard to the question, Have we still Religion? in other words, do we still believe in God, in immortality, in prayer, in duty? he is less decided. You may say Yes or No, as you please—he says to his followers. If religion mean a sense of absolute dependence, we have it; but whether our dependence is on God or on the Universe, is unimportant. In other words, our religion, such as it is, does not imply a personal God; an impersonal deity, the god of the pantheist, will do for us. Or possibly we may say that we have no god at all! As to the world, his belief is that it is the result of evolution, and though we have no evidence of such a thing as spontaneous generation, neither have we evidence that in some other condition of the world, spontaneous generation did not occur. And on this most unwarranted guess, he builds the world, and all its inhabitants, dispensing with the agency of a God! As to the ordering of their lives he lays down pretty good ethical rules, but instead of looking to the Church for the stimulus and the consolation in ordering their lives which men have been wont to seek for there, they are to look to—what do our readers suppose?—Poetry and Music. We have heard of a lady, who on the death of her only son, when suffering a bereavement of the most excruciating kind, wrote to a friend that she found great comfort in her piano. It would appear not only that hers will hereafter be no exceptional case, but that all men must draw from that and from kindred sources all the comfort going in their heaviest trials. It will be interesting to know what instrument will be found best adapted for religious consolation. Perhaps different nations will prefer different instruments—the Italian his harp, the Frenchman his fiddle, and the Highlander his bagpipes. And this is the end of Rationalism! It takes from me a Saviour, a God, a Bible, a Gospel, a Father, a Home, an Immortality; and it sends me to Lucretius and Goethe, to Shelley and to Swinburne, to the harmonium and the piano for my loftiest inspirations and most glowing thoughts. I lose my soul, but I do not gain the world; like the dog crossing the river, I drop my piece of flesh, and with it the shadow that looked so tempting disappears for ever!

IV.—JOTTINGS FROM THE MISSION FIELD.

Irish Colportage.—In a recent article, the subject of Colportage in Scotland was brought under the notice of the readers of the SUNDAY MAGAZINE; we are happy to find that in Ireland this method of diffusing wholesome and Christian literature is prosecuted with encouraging success. One reports that he has sold three hundred Douay Testaments and Bibles to Roman Catholics, and tells of groups of persons that read the Bible which he furnishes to them with much earnestness and considerable spiritual fruit. Nor are there wanting singular instances of the Word of God being recognised in a way quite unlike other books. A colporteur goes into a house; in which he finds five men sitting idle. After some talk about the weather and his wares in general, he opens a Bible, and assures them that its contents are true. At the page at which he has opened the Bible he reads the verse, "We brought nothing into this world, and certainly we can carry nothing out." He asks if that is not a true saying? One of his hearers says, No;—for he knew an old woman who had two sovereigns, and when dying she swallowed them, as she thought they might be of use to her where she was going. Another of the men said that after all she took them only to the grave, no further; and bought the book. In the spring of next year, as the colporteur was travelling in the same neighbourhood, a man came up to him, and asked if he had not sold a book to such and such a person (the man in the house). He added that the buyer of the book was his father; that he and his daughter had thereafter gone to America; that the daughter had read the book every Sunday to her father; and that the old man had never forgot the verse, "We brought nothing into this world, and certainly we can carry nothing out." She had written to her brother, urged him to get a book and read it for himself, and to buy two copies and send them out to her, if he could find the colporteur. Thus was "the bread cast on the waters found after many days."

At the Diamond Fields in Africa.—The interest of the Diamond Fields is often sadly tragic. A Wesleyan missionary thus tells a simple tale of much sorrow:—

"In going about among the people, day after day, as I do, I meet with some cases of touching interest. I lately buried a sweet little girl of eight years, who was the last of seven interred by her affectionate and almost broken-hearted parents! Also a young man of twenty-three, all alone on the Fields, came to increase his fortune by diamond digging; but who, after a few weeks spent here, falls sick, and dies, a stranger in a strange land, his widowed mother at home (in England) not knowing thereof for some time. This week I visited a family where the father has been suddenly taken away by death, and three grown-up children lay sick on different beds in the house. The poor widowed mother lies almost at her wits' end. One day recently I found out a man who had been nine days long suffering from dysentery, and very near death's door, but whom no one had visited, not knowing of the case! Last week I saw a man, in a fit of desperation, throw down what was in his hand, declaring there was no God, or at all events no God for him! He had been the subject, we found, of a series of disappointments, and unsuccessful all his life long; and, 'though he prayed, yet God never helped nor answered him!' To-day I have visited a man, who, living in his waggon, is under concern for his soul. He says he sees people dying around him, and feels that, if his turn comes, he is unprepared. He is now praying, weeping, and seeking the Lord in good earnest."

The Chief Justice of Fiji on its Missions.—We really can hardly tell how the Chief Justice of Fiji happens to hold that august office. His name is Sir Charles St. Julian, and he is not a member of the Wesleyan Church; but on a recent occasion, when a Wesleyan missionary, Mr. Nettleton, was about to leave the islands for a time, a testimonial was presented to him, and Chief Justice St. Julian bore a testimony to Fiji missions, which is specially seasonable after the attacks contained in the book called "South Sea Bubbles." He said, "that he did not come there to represent any denomination; but it was to him a pleasure to attend on that occasion, although belonging to a different sect to the Reverend gentleman. He appeared before them as an admirer of Mr. Nettleton. From his position he was a critic, and as a lawyer and a judge was accustomed to find faults, yet to give every man his due, and to act impartially. He had been a close observer of the Wesleyan mission, and when he came here was hardly prepared for what he saw. If the work done by that society had only been to cause the natives to cast off bad practices and customs, it would have been a very gratifying result; but the mission had built up the foundation of a kingdom. He had heard of Mr. Nettleton before coming to Fiji, and now knew him as an earnest and zealous labourer in the mission field, and had marked with pleasure the success which had attended that gentleman's labour. He wished to say something about Mrs. Nettleton. He thought missionaries' wives did more than the missionaries themselves. He could not say what he could wish on account of their friends being present, but he wished them a safe passage and God speed."

Light and Shade in a South Sea Island.—The island of Maupiti belongs to a group about a hundred miles north-west of Tahiti. It contains a population of but 400, who are under the charge of Hiomai, a native catechist. They had a pastoral visit in spring from Mr. Pearse, of the London Missionary Society. The reception of the missionary was all that could have been wished. A boat manned by young men from the Bible class comes forty miles to convey him. Nearly all Maupiti turn out to greet him. On the Saturday the mission party are presented with two large heaps of native vegetables, pigs, fowl, fish, and native puddings, one from the church, the other from the school. On the Sunday the church is filled. The preacher observes pencils busily at work taking down notes of the sermon. The singing is lively and hearty, especially in the Sunday School, which contains no fewer than 126 children. Then there is a missionary meeting of the grown-up people, and upwards of thirty-six dollars are subscribed for missions. Another day there is a missionary meeting of the young people, who outstrip the old in liberality, contributing upwards of thirty-seven dollars. All this is very bright; but turn round the picture, and you see things in another light.

You find that there have been ongoings which remind us of the story of Baal-peor. Some time previously a feast had been given in honour of a royal birthday. The young people were invited and went. After some harmless preliminaries, old heathen dances were introduced, followed by old heathen songs, full of ribaldry and all uncleanness; and after the excitement had become very great, the usual excesses followed that in the days of heathenism had made these festivals abominable. The native teacher in charge of the Christian Church, after trying other means of putting an end to these revellies, resorted at last to discipline. Out of 105 church members, he suspended 52, the largest number, probably, or the largest proportion, in whose case that step has ever been taken. Some submitted; but though the missionary packed the catechist, a number showed a great reluctance to humble themselves. At last, however, matters were brought to a more favourable pass; and the missionary left the island, in the hope that the heathen festivals would be abandoned, and a better spirit prevail.

We like to read in a missionary journal an honest statement like this. No intelligent friend of missions will be surprised at outbursts of the old spirit, or will deem the reports of missionary progress untrue, because such dark clouds are liable to come and overcast the bright blue sky.

A Romish Mission to the Negroes of America.—It is a considerable time since one of the present editors of the SUNDAY MAGAZINE, writing on the subject of the United States, and on the future of the negroes, drew attention to the fact that the Church of Rome had an eye to their conversion. It was remarked on that occasion that this was far from an unlikely enterprise. The negroes are ignorant, superstitious, excitable, and fond of gaudy display. There are many things in Popery that are attractive to them. The only safeguards against Rome would be, either such spiritual experience as the Romish religion cannot satisfy, or such intellectual training as the Romish superstition must shock and repel. It appears that the Romish project has now taken shape. The conversion of the negroes is to be entrusted to the Roman Catholics of Great Britain, and Archbishop Manning, it is said, is full of the enterprise. The society entrusted with the scheme is called the St. Joseph's Society, and already has a foreign missionary college in London, under charge of Dr. Vaughan. The Archbishop of Baltimore is the chief promoter in the United States; he proposes that the capital of what was once a Roman Catholic settlement should become the head-quarters of the movement. Already five priests have gone to begin the mission. The number is to be increased to fifty as soon as possible. The difficulty of finding priests, however, will be a somewhat serious one. The United States cannot provide priests for their own use, still less for missionary purposes. Still the enterprise is an important one, and to withstand it will require all the vigilance and prayerful efforts of the Christian friends of the negro. We hope that such institutions as the Howard College, of which an account was given in these pages, will be found eminently serviceable in the right development of the negro.

A Mistake corrected.—We regret to find that the account which we gave in a recent number, of the conversion of a Mahometan, said to be a grandson of the late king of Delhi, and taken by us from one of the most trustworthy missionary journals—The Church Missionary Intelligencer—turns out to have originated in a case of imposture which the writer has since discovered and exposed.

Medical Mission in London.—It is now several years since Dr. Burns Thomson began a medical mission in Edinburgh. It was planted in the Cowgate, in the very heart of one of the poorest and most miserable localities in Edinburgh. It has proved a signal benefit to the town. For a long time under the charge of Dr. Burns Thomson, that mission centre is now occupied by other labourers; while Dr. Thomson himself pursues his benevolent work on the outskirts of the Canongate, the twin-sister of the Cowgate in destitution, dirt, and misery. Besides prescribing to the wants both of body and soul to thousands of the poor, Dr. Thomson added to his establishment an institution for the training of medical students and nurses in connection with mission work. Then the Madagascar medical mission was an offshoot from his institution, and more recently a Convalescent Home. The work has been a spreading work, reminding one somewhat of the parable of the mustard seed, or of Hosea's emblem of the thriving Israel—"his branches shall spread."

These spreading branches reached, a year or two ago, as far as London's famous town. An Edinburgh institution taking root in London kindled a spark of the old feeling in the capital of Scotland, doomed so frequently to feel herself extinguished by the colossal metropolis of the Empire. We have seen in a London contemporary a notice of the London institution. Under the charge of Dr. Saunders, C.B., the various operations are carried on. Here is an account of them:—

"On the days set apart for prescribing for the patients and dispensing medicine to them, there are short devotional services, part of which consists of a simple religious exhortation by the superintendent, designed to set before the hearers the truths of the gospel in a truly catholic form, and so as to be understood by the most ignorant. Dr. Saunders is assisted in his labours by a Bible-woman, who acts as a nurse. When patients are unable to attend the dispensary, they are visited in their homes, and these are of the most wretched description, squalor and poverty being the staple character of the locality. Christian instruction is thus carried into quarters where the ordinary city missionary would be helpless, and great good is said to have resulted. Every Sunday afternoon a Bible-class is held for adults, and also one for children, and the gospel is preached in the evening. During the last six months over 1,400 new patients have applied for advice, and these have made upwards of 5,500 visits to the dispensary. Over 1,500 visits have been paid by the missionary physician to 250 patients whose ailments confined them to their own miserable abodes."

In Liverpool, we are glad to say, where, in imitation of the example of London, a similar work has been going on, the success has been so great that larger premises have had to be taken. The work is entirely unsectarian, and well deserves the support of the Christian public.

V.—OUR LIBRARY TABLE.

Rational Theology and Christian Philosophy in England in the Seventeenth Century: by John Tulloch, D.D., St. Andrews,—a handsome book in two octavo volumes, treats of a very important subject, and a very interesting class of men. We have sketches of the lives and views of such men as Lord Falkland, John Hales of Eton, Chillingworth, Jeremy Taylor, and Stillingfleet, of Benjamin Whichcote, John Smith, Ralph Cudworth, and Henry More. Of the latter group especially, several were brought up under Puritan influences; and it would be of very great service to us, who seem to be entering upon an experience similar to that which followed the Puritan age in England, to have a faithful picture of these men, and to understand the reasons that led them to move away in some degree from their Puritan moorings. We regret to say that the work before us does not (in our judgment) fulfil the highest purpose of such an undertaking. It is the work of a partisan—of one who, under very peculiar circumstances, has committed himself to “rational theology,” and who labours to find, in the subjects of these sketches, men sharing all his own views. When the author finds that a man goes with him in one point, he is prone to represent him as substantially at one with him in all. It does not follow that because some of these men shrunk from the extreme of Puritan dogmatism, had a great dislike of controversy, and were more interested in the practical outcome or fruit of divine truth than in doctrinal warfare, they were what is now meant by rationalists. They would have been as far as possible from relishing the fellowship in which Dr. Tulloch places them. We object, too, to the vague sense in which the term “reason” is used. It would at some times appear as if he thought that evangelical theology assigned no place whatever to reason in connection with God’s Revelation; and whenever Dr. Tulloch finds, in one of his old writers, a decided statement in favour of reason as having to do with theology, he writes as if the author of that statement could undoubtedly be claimed for the school of modern rationalists. This is quite out of the question. There is really no controversy at the present day as to reason having a place in connection with revelation; the real question is, whether its place is supreme? Dr. Tulloch avoids the great question, which, in writing such a book, he ought to have made as clear as noon-day. Does he consider it to be the function of reason to sit in judgment on the specific contents of revelation, and to reject those parts of the book which it is unable to verify and indorse? If he thinks so, it is impossible for him to claim the men whom we have named as concurring with him. If he does not think so, he ought to make it plain on what ground of “rational theology” he desires to stand.

The late Professor John Duncan, of Edinburgh, has become an object of singular curiosity, alike to intellectual men, who like to find a mind of remarkable type, and to spiritual men, who are even more interested in an unusual development of Christian experience and life. Three books have now been written on him; Mr. Knight’s “Colloquia Peripatetica,” which sets forth chiefly his intellectual character; Dr. David Brown’s “Memoir,” which combines both the intellectual and the spiritual; and now the third appears from the pen of Mr. Moody Stuart, dwelling mainly on the spiritual. Mr. Moody Stuart’s Recollections of the late John Duncan, LL.D., were at first intended to fill a niche in Dr. Brown’s “Memoir,” but, extending as they do over a period of forty years, it is little wonder they have swelled out into the dimensions of a volume. A single remark of the writer, embodying a single experience of the subject of his recollections, will give some idea of the man and of the book. “Language,” says Mr. Moody Stuart, “can hardly embody a stronger utterance of desire than in the words:—‘Every fibre of my soul winds itself round the enjoyment of God for ever, with unutterable, sickening, fainting desire;’ and every one who knew the writer can attest his transparent sincerity, and the clear evidence of the strength of his thoughts exceeding the force of his words.”

Among other publications of the day we may simply note, Essentials of New Testament Study: intended as a Companion to the New Testament. By William Edensor Littlewood, M.A.,—a useful and careful introduction to all the books of the New Testament, along with a Dictionary of Biography and Geography, a Harmony of the Gospels, and much other useful information; Disciple Life, by Rev. D. M’Coll, author of “Work in the Wynns,”—a series of thoughtful, substantial, earnest discourses on the lessons which the disciples derived from the ministry of Christ; The Ministry, addressed to Students of Divinity, by Charles F. Brown, D.D.,—a reprint of practical addresses, in which the writer strives to make students of divinity seize and project into the souls of their hearers the very pith and marrow of the Word of God; The Resurrection of the Dead, by William Hanna, D.D.,—a beautiful reprint of the exposition of 1 Cor. xv., which appeared in the successive numbers of the SUNDAY MAGAZINE of last year, characterized by all Dr. Hanna’s grace, tenderness of feeling, and fervour of utterance.

VI.—OUR MEMORIAL RECORD.

SIR DONALD MACLEOD, K.S.I.

While all the kingdom is deploring the tragic manner of Sir Donald Macleod’s death, through his falling before carriages in the Metropolitan Railway, it is but right that, with the smaller company who loved and honoured him for his Christian worth, we should express our sense of bereavement. Born in India, and educated at home, he was impressed at an early age with divine truth, and spent his life working for his Master as well as for his country. The man who was five years Governor of the Punjab, and whose services at the mutiny and in other very trying times were eminently useful, could not but be a valuable servant of the Crown; the friend of missionaries, the active helper in mission work, the bright, cheerful companion, the friendly visitor of the poor, the liberal supporter of every good cause, was an equally valuable member of the great catholic church. It is a great comfort to his many friends to know that, notwithstanding the horrible nature of his accident, his death was without torture of body, and with much peace of mind; and his last spoken words will not be readily forgotten—“Praised be His holy name for ever and ever.”

CROOKED PLACES:

A Story of Struggles and Hopes.

BY EDWARD GARRETT, AUTHOR OF "OCCUPATIONS OF A RETIRED LIFE," ETC.

PART III.—MILLICENT'S ROMANCE, AND WHAT IT WAS MADE OF.

CHAPTER I.—WHERE TWO STORIES MEET.

N all the outskirts of London, there could be scarcely a gloomier dwelling than Blenheim House, Hackney. It turned its side to the high road, a great, dirty, brick side, only broken by two lights, a barred window on the ground-floor, and another, high up, on a staircase. The front of the house looked into its own dank, green garden, amid dreary walls with their deep-set, olive-green door, bearing the inscription—"David Maxwell, Surgeon."

The interior was as dismal. The rooms could never have been cheerful, but they had once been handsome. Now, the marble mantels were discoloured by neglect and careless usage, the wood-carving had been chipped and never repaired, even the windows had been cheaply mended with coarse defective glass. Whatever colours the heavy sprawling-patterned carpets had once possessed, were worn away under the steps of many years. The only pictures were a few engravings after Benjamin West, and a set of Hogarth's "Rake's Progress." The mirrors were framed in ebony. But there was none of that stately precision which gives dignity to gloom. There was always a clay pipe on the mantel-shelves, and Mr. Maxwell liked to drink his ale, at all hours, out of a pewter-pot.

The inmates were like their home, as they generally are, since they either make it or it makes them. They were only four in number—master, mistress, son, and servant.

The surgeon had belonged to respectable connections of Scotch origin, but long settled as manufacturers in an eastern county. He did not belong to them now. He had found his own level, far below theirs. His closest ties were dead, and what slight communication passed between him and those who remained, were due entirely to their pitiful regrets for one who had sunk so low that he did not know his own degradation. Mr. Maxwell was a thoroughly coarse man, not without a kind of rank cleverness, which he would have been better without, for while too idle and unscrupulous to earn or deserve a honest professional confidence, this afforded him a slippery back staircase to a small, doubtful celebrity, which he valued more for its excitement than even for its uncertain profits. He was the easy-going doctor who asked no awkward questions in sundry matters connected with births and deaths, whose decorous certificate was always forthcoming,—and he liked to reckon how many reputations he held in his mercy. Yet his professional income was not nearly so large as the decent, humdrum parish doctor's, and had he not possessed some small private means, he could not even have maintained the dismalness of Blenheim House, even though he was not very particular how he took payment. The only handsome modern article in Blenheim House was a velvet pile table-cover, which had come from the scene of the suicide of an old wicked patient of his. It was as good as new, except that there was a little stain on one corner, which nobody could tell was not port wine. But Mr. Maxwell did a great many dirty deeds for nothing, and therefore fancied himself a liberal man, though he never entered a shop without beating down the shopkeeper, nor paid a bill till he had been dunned many times. Mr. Maxwell professed to despise society, and called all visiting "rubbish and nonsense," which simply meant that he found his most agreeable companions in pot-houses; and that he begrudged to give that hospitality which reserves the minimum of sensual gratification to the host.

And it was very easy for him to scoff at respectable tea-parties and neighbourly gatherings; but the fact was, he had really put himself out of society many years ago, and he knew it.

There had been two "Mrs. Maxwells" at Blenheim House. The first, who had been dead before Mr. Maxwell came to Hackney, had never had any right to that style—the second had only acquired it, after tardy years, at the urging of some well-meaning and wealthy connection of the surgeon's, who had vainly hoped to purify two corrupted and unrepentant lives, by a spiritual salt, which became a savourless formula the moment it touched them.

Of the mistress of the house, it is therefore needless to say much, for she was just what might be expected, except perhaps, that having become a wife when she least thought to be one, she measured the honour, not from its proper basis, but from the depths of her previous degradation, and by her rampant self-sufficiency and insolence, justified Solomon's description of "the odious woman when she is married." She had not her husband's contempt for society. She hankered after it, as the stage whereon to strut and display her bran-new morality. Her vanity assured her credulity that nobody knew anything of her past, and she understood none of those finer feelings which shrink from taking credit beyond capital. She went regularly to church, though Mr. Maxwell never accompanied her. She angled for, and hooked an occasional invitation. Some people thought the floating rumours of the district might be only scandal, founded on her husband's undeniably bad character, and that if she were the virtuous, though common and disagreeable wife, of such an abandoned man, she deserved a little countenance, while one or two social ghouls who believed the worst, accepted her acquaintance in the hope of getting a real peep into the Blenheim chamber of horrors. But Mr. Maxwell never encouraged his wife to return the invitations she received.

"You'll make a fool of yourself, Poll," he said, "but you shan't make one of me."

And so, when one of the ghouls came, he had his cup of tea sent out of the parlour into his surgery, but came into the room after, and behaved with such a mixture of coarse repulsion and coarser familiarity, that even the ghoul retreated in dismay, and reported "that it was quite impossible to visit poor Mrs. Maxwell, the surgeon was so very peculiar."

And so Mrs. Maxwell presently became content to pay a limited number of visits on the understanding that they were not returned, on account of her husband's "eccentricities." And she did not object to the arrangement, so long as it could be thus made without blighting wholly her social ambitions. Nevertheless, she had her Mor-decai, and that not merely at her gate, but within it.

Many a respectable matron in Hackney, troubled, even in those days, with raw servants, that came and went, burning the linen, smashing the crockery, and diversifying the monotony of this by occasional larcenies, wondered how it was that dreary Blenheim House had won a domestic treasure which they could not find for their own snug habitations. For Phœbe Winter had been in Mr. Maxwell's service for more than twenty years at least. She had arrived, perched behind his goods, when he came to Blenheim House. She had seen the home-coming of its present mistress. She knew all about everything. Phœbe Winter wore a wedding-ring, and was doubtless a widow. In years as in residence, Phœbe was older than her mistress. She could never have been a pretty girl: but she was grand now. She was like some great majestic rock, which has been stripped of all its clinging herbage. An artist once stopped her in the street and asked her to sit to him. Phœbe was savagely indignant. "Am I to be insulted at my time of life," she asked, "that nobody dared insult when I was a gal?" He wanted her for a model of Jael, the wife of Heber. Fancy what she must have been, for him to detect her fitness in her coarse, clinging dress and rough kitchen cap!

Mrs. Maxwell had to bear many congratulations about her "faithful old servant." When the ghoul called upon her, the ghoul considered it "only a fit mark of respect to such a commendable domestic," to try to open a little conversation with her, when she attended while the ghoul resumed her clogs. Just a little harmless patronising conversation, which, had it been received with grateful cordiality, might have led to a few more words if the lady and the servant chanced to meet in the market or at the church door. But Phœbe Winter was not cordial.

Mrs. Maxwell wanted to get rid of Phœbe. Phœbe was determined not to go. And Phœbe had her way. If Mrs. Maxwell blustered, Phœbe did not care. If Mrs. Maxwell assumed kindness, and urged her to better herself, she only grimly answered, "that folks had their own ways of taking care of themselves." If Mrs. Maxwell taunted her for her poor spirit in staying to earn a girl's wage of six pounds a year, and no perquisites, Phœbe coolly said "that she'd seen such a many draggle-tails marry-come-up in their satins and cambrics, that she didn't covet any better than a honest lirsej-woolsey for herself." This generally dispatched Mrs. Maxwell to her own business in the parlour. She never took courage to give Phœbe a direct notice to quit. She knew by heart all that Phœbe would say to her side-hints, but she was not at all sure what Phœbe might say to that—and she preferred not to know.

After all, many people might have as old servants as Phœbe, if they were prepared to endure such service as hers. She certainly worked hard, but she did not know how to work. She could not have entered service till her ideas were set beyond readjustment, and they had surely been formed in a country labourer's cottage. Every detail showed it. She could cook well in flour, milk, or potatoes, but her meats were either raw or cindery. She could scrub, but she could not dust; she could wash, but she could neither starch nor iron. Twice or thrice Mrs. Maxwell had supplemented her deficiencies by another servant. But no other servant would stay long at Blenheim House. Some were afraid of the master. Some declared they would not stop in a place where the mistress did not think they were of the same flesh and blood as herself. They each poured out their grievances to Phœbe before they went away. Phœbe pursed up her mouth, and said nothing.

Such was the woman who lived in Blenheim House kitchen, with its prospect of dust-bin and pump. But wherever the Blenheim House skeleton cupboard was, it surely had a door into that kitchen, whether the master knew it or not, and although Mrs. Maxwell had never found it—perhaps because she feared to search too close.

But there was one young life in the dismal, hopeless place. There was one who had played—faintly and quietly, perhaps—about the gloomy rooms, Little David Maxwell, as he was called by repute, had not arrived in Hackney with Phœbe in the goods cart. He had been brought up next day by a maid who had a box and baggage of her own with her, as if she expected to stay, but who presently went away again, box and all, counting money in her purse.

Phœbe had the sole charge of him, from then, till the new Mrs. Maxwell came, seven years after. Since then, she might be said to have had double charge of him—not only to preserve, but to defend.

Little David had sat at meals with the surgeon and his wife. But he had learned his lessons in the kitchen. He had had his playmate there too, in the shape of a great good-tempered cat; but when the new mistress came home, she ordered this to be sent away, saying—

"Some little boys should be thankful to be fed and clothed themselves, without expecting money to be wasted on meat for useless animals."

She wanted it to be destroyed. She would give a man sixpence to do it, she said—"Last money need never be grudged." But with apparent indifference Phœbe had suggested that she thought this expense might be spared, she knew where she could find a home for David's favourite.

So she did. That very evening she carried it off to an almshouse near. David went with her, to see his pet completely installed on a soft cushion in an old woman's snug domicile. In his passionate childish grief at leaving his playfellow, he did not much notice that old woman's garrulous assurances.

"'Deed, mem, an' it shall be taken care of. I'm fond of beasts—cats in particular, an' I'd have had one long ago if I could afford its keep, and it shall have its cat's meat and milk just as you say, mem, and you're welcome to look in, an' see that I'm a-layin' out your money as you mean it to be."

"There, there, Davie," said Phœbe, as they walked home, "don't cry, you'll be able to come with me and see Tommy now and then."

"But I shan't have him always any more!" sobbed the boy.

"Pussy is quite comfortable," Phœbe assured him; "he is better off than with us, for that nice little room will be warm all night, much nicer than our damp kitchen. If you care for poor pussy, David, you shouldn't mind giving him up for his own good."

Fivepence a week for cat's board was a heavy tax on six pounds a year. Phœbe could not have clearly explained why she paid it. But David growing satisfied in the dull kitchen, because he had a glimpse of his favourite, sleek and snug on the almshouse window-sill, had learned the childish version of a priceless lesson.

David went to school, and won the favour of his master. His schoolfellows did not know him. His solitude, and the dispiriting sense of an unintelligible inferiority, forced on him by his stepmother, had not taught him how to make friends. He would decline a share in sports which he was really longing to join. If there were any lad for whom he felt a particular admiration and warmth, from that boy he especially shrank.

At fifteen, he closed his career as a pupil. Instead of the dozens of friends which most youths fancy they have made for life, David Maxwell had but a trembling possession of one. This was a boy named Fergus Laurie, the son of a very needy widow, who had given him the advantage of a year's "good schooling" before putting him into a neighbouring manufactory.

David and Fergus were about the same age, and Fergus was set to earn his bread two years before David left school—a fact whereon Mrs. Maxwell made many edifying comments. There were many points of sympathy between the boys. For both, it was desirable that the friendship should be an out-door one. David had never called forth express injunction on the subject, but he quite understood that no acquaintance of his would be welcome at Blenheim House. On the other hand, Mrs. Laurie lived in a perpetual muddle, and was a woman who would never admit any stranger to a sight of the scanty fare which she could scarcely get for her own children. For though she would often put herself into protracted difficulties by a burst of extravagant indulgence in the table luxuries, after which she constantly hankered, yet to share such dear-bought luxuries with others formed no part of her enjoyment.

Fergus's life would be hard if David's was repressed. Fergus was like a plant left open to battle with the storm. David was like one shut up from light and air.

Fergus gave David his first great pleasure—the exquisite delight of having something to give worthy of another's taking. Fergus's education was broken off just at the climax of his longing for knowledge. As David advanced beyond his friend, he discovered that he might help him forward.

There was a pathetic humour in the lads' shifts. They had to carry on their studies wandering in the streets. Sometimes they would snatch a chapter of history by the friendly light of some shop window. Once, on a frosty night, David bought a pennyworth of roast chestnuts, that he might seek out the derivation of a word by the warm light of the chestnut vendor's fire. David lent his school-books to Fergus between the respective class days: David even lost a prize, because Fergus forgot to return one in time for him to get up an important task.

The two lads were "confirmed" at the same time. They went together to the vicar for preparation. Mr. Devon was considerably interested in them both. Mr. Devon was one of those who believed no more of the queer reports about the Maxwells than that the surgeon was a very bad man, the shadow of whose vices had fallen on two probably innocent wives. He was rather annoyed that Mrs. Devon persisted in being very freezing to Mrs. Maxwell whenever she called at the vicarage. Mrs. Devon never contradicted him when he asserted his view of the case, which discreet reservation only made it the harder for him to blame her for a very subtle line of behaviour, which, had the good gentleman only known it, Mrs. Maxwell was far too hardened and arrogant to feel, or to care for.

"That young Maxwell has really a remarkable scriptural knowledge, and a child-like clearness of belief," said the vicar to himself. "I cannot suppose he acquired it at school, for I fear there is not much lively evangelical truth taught in the Academy. He must owe it to his stepmother, after all, coarse, vulgar woman as I must own—not to Mrs. Devon—that she appears!"

That same night, speaking with her nurse-like freedom, which she had never resigned, Phœbe inquired—

"Well, David, could you answer the parson's questions?"

"I think so, Phœbe. Thanks to you, if I did. You must have taken a great deal of trouble with me."

David had not long left the Academy before he returned to it as a teacher. Apart from Mrs. Maxwell's taunting hints, he had a right-minded boy's desire for independence, and, in his father's utter apathy, only too eagerly seized on what first presented itself as a road thereto.

Fergus Laurie stoutly blamed him for entering a line of life with such narrow, dim prospects. Fergus was already advancing in his manufactory, and had made up his mind to die a merchant prince. Fergus Laurie was a slight, small creature, but strong and sound in his very delicacy, and possessing that nervous-bilious temperament which always carries so much before it. He had hazel eyes for David's grey eyes, stiff, drab-brown hair for David's chestnut locks, and though they were both equally taciturn, when Fergus Laurie spoke, it was not with David's timid proffer of idea, but with authority, and the air of one who would have spoken long before had he cared to take the trouble. Fergus Laurie had fronted the world, compounded family debts, negotiated family loans, and learned how to make sixpence represent a shilling; while David Maxwell had had nothing to do but sit still, and accept the hard fact that his parents were not like other parents, nor his home like other homes.

Fergus Laurie decorated his bedroom with such texts as—"The hand of the diligent shall bear rule;" "Be strong and of good courage: be not afraid, neither be thou dismayed." He transcribed them himself, on cartridge paper, in quaint characters, that made every letter a capital one.

In David Maxwell's pocket Bible the marker lay ever on the ninety-first Psalm, and had it been removed the book would still have opened there.

He did not develop into a strong man. Perhaps it was not likely that he should. But like many another, nobody noticed that he was only struggling on till he dropped. There came an evening when he met Fergus Laurie for their accustomed walk, and was obliged to ask him not to practise his French upon him that night, he felt so queer and misty. And Fergus, who was very anxious to get on with his French at that particular time, hinted to him that he "gave way" very easily. But next morning David was not in the teacher's seat at the Academy. And he never was there again.

He did not die. He went to the very gates of the grave and struggled back again. It was in the days of doubt, that Fergus Laurie first made his way into Blenheim House.

Phœbe let him pass very easily, and he boldly presented himself at Mrs. Maxwell's parlour door.

"I don't ask to see him to-night," he said, "but I cannot rest satisfied without getting the report from head-quarters, and then, of course, you will tell me, as soon as ever I may venture in."

Fergus meant to gain admittance, and he gained it. Was he, Fergus Laurie, who meant to conquer the world, to be exiled from his only friend by a woman whose measure he took as he did Mrs. Maxwell's? It was no use shutting moral doors in his face, he walked straight through them all. He could see no reason why Blenheim House should maintain such seclusion, since it certainly had not his own family reason of proud and selfish poverty. When David got better—and he would be sure to get better—how much more comfortable it would be for them to sit and read together in any of these vacant chambers than to wander in the streets!

David did get better, but his had been an illness which entails years of convalescence. His father opened his purse-strings a little, and gave him change of air in lonely sojourns at dull watering places, and whenever some old, old parsimony made itself unpleasantly manifest in the household, Mrs. Maxwell sighed and made appropriate remarks about "the expenses one must incur for poor afflicted invalids."

For a long time, David hoped that each succeeding week would find him fit to recommence battle with the world, and on some more independent scheme—if not, oh, beautiful mirage, on an altogether new battle-field. But it was no use. He presently became convinced that this dreary page of life was too large to be left blank. He must fill it in as best he could.

His father discussed each of his suggestions with as much interest and gravity as if they had related to the politics of Lilliput, instead of the welfare of his own flesh and blood. Mrs. Maxwell dashed them by reproachful hints that "he was not grateful for his good home, and that he'd be better employed thinking of his duty to the father to whom he owed so much, than worrying about his own affairs."

David at last did the only thing that it seemed he could do. He went into the surgery. He could make himself useful there in many small ways, in lieu of young men whom his father had hitherto hired, for miserable pittances indeed, but the sparing of which would certainly cover the expenses of his board. His father had often talked of taking a pupil instead of these assistants, saying that one would be quite as useful, and save the salary. David would be this pupil. Had he known more of the world, or had a less simple-minded forgetfulness of himself, he might have been daunted by the miserable prospect before a delicate man as a medical practitioner. Nor did he know what Mr. Maxwell was as well as everybody else did. From the inside and from the outside things show differently. And the very habit of household life, however miserable, begets a kind of confidence and fetters the critical powers. But David just did the best according to his judgment and knowledge, and it is sometimes well that one's judgment and knowledge have limits. To be over prudent, is to be less than wise.

Henceforth David almost lived in the surgery. In the evening Fergus Laurie came there, and was still helped forward in his general studies. In the morning David sat behind the barred window and read his medical books. It was sitting so, that he first noticed a neat, brisk little figure that constantly went by, always carrying a drawing portfolio. He grew to look for her. Perhaps it was the utter absence of any such figure from his own life that invested it with such a peculiar charm. He wondered what the house must be like, where she lived.

"Don't you know who that is?" Fergus Laurie asked, one morning when he had happened to call in at the surgery, and perhaps observed that David's eyes followed the little passer-by as she went down the road. "That is Miss Millicent Harvey. She lives with her mother in a little house in Grove Lane. She works for our firm."

"Does she, really?" David asked, adding with a tell-tale blush, "Isn't she very sweet-looking?"

"Is she? Well, yes, I suppose she is," admitted young Laurie.

"What does she do for your firm?" David asked.

"Designs patterns," said Fergus.

"I should think she's clever," commented David. "I should think she might be able to do something above designs. She has eyes which look as if they saw a great deal. And I've noticed her looking up at the sunsets, and how few people do that—I used not myself. I suppose you know her to speak to?" he added, with ill-affected indifference.

"I require to speak to her sometimes," Fergus answered. "Have you never seen her at church? No,—you can't, they sit in a corner that you don't see from your pew, and they come in and out by a different door. She has a mother and a brother. He writes for the papers."

This was all that David Maxwell ever knew of Millicent Harvey till the night when, after much demur and shrinking, he accepted the vicar's unexpected invitation.

He went home from that party with a springing step. It had come naturally to speak to her, and she had been so pleasant. He flashed upon the brutalised surgeon and his sullen wife in their forlorn parlour, like a lamp suddenly shining into a dark place. He had the same effect. The brightness stirred and irritated them.

"What's up now, Dave?" asked Mr. Maxwell. "Are you fancying some girl has fallen in love with you? Hope she's got money."

"I should think David has too much sense," said Mrs. Maxwell. "He has got something else to think of besides falling in love. He has to get back his health and make money before he dreams of that nonsense. And girls must hold themselves very cheap, if those that have a chance to visit at the vicarage would look at David."

The darkness seemed to conquer. The light went out. David went up to his bed-chamber, feeling as if it would never again be so easy to speak to Millicent.

But did the light go out? or was it only shaded and screened from the cold cruel blast? He had caught a glimpse of beauty and joy and courage possible even in the same world as Blenheim House. The world could never be the old, dull world again. There was a yearning within him for that brighter, freer life of which he had caught a glimpse. It could not have been satisfied by the mere shadow which had awakened it. Had he been able to seize that shadow, his grasp would have swept the glory from it, as the gold perishes on a caught butterfly. But it passed softly away from his life, only to find refuge in his very soul, and to be elevated into that pure ideal, which the Saviour surely meant when He said, "Blessed are they which do hunger and thirst after righteousness, for they shall be filled."

Next day, David took a leaf from Fergus's book. He, too, wrote out a text, but he did not put it up on his chamber wall, but laid it in the secret drawer of the old bureau which Mr. Maxwell had said he might use as his own.

This was the text:—

"Delight thyself in the Lord, and He shall give thee the desires of thy heart."

CHAPTER II.—A SHARP YOUNG MAN.

AFTER David Maxwell's comments, Fergus Laurie took more notice of Millicent than he had ever done before. He discovered that she really was pretty, when one came to look at her. Business prevented him from being one of the vicar's guests, on the occasion when David introduced himself to Millicent, and perhaps this accidental loss incited him to greater zeal next time he met her, in the ordinary way, in the counting-house.

Once, something obliged her to wait there awhile. Fergus set a chair for her in just the most agreeable position. Fergus had often been very remiss in such common civilities. He had a nature in which politeness was not an instinct; and the occasional attentions of such are often set at a different value to habitual courtesy, except by very wise people. We need not pity those who form this false estimate, for it is generally vanity that betrays them into it, as the civility which is not of natural grace has a delicious savour of special personal tribute.

Then Fergus began to talk about her designs, and told her of praise which the head-partner of the house had privately bestowed upon them. Next he asked, if she ever sketched.

Millicent hesitated. "I am seldom in the country," she said. "I have never seen such scenery as people care for. But I have tried a few things that took my own fancy; tumble-down cottages; and the church tower, trifles that nobody could see any beauty in."

"Perhaps, because they have not learned to use their eyes," Fergus answered, with an emphasis on the nominative. "But whoever does one thing well can generally do many things tolerably, and if you can sketch half as well as you design, I should think you might develop into a good artist. You must have had first-rate teaching?"

"Only my mother's," Millicent replied.

"Ah,—well,—doubtless she must have been a good teacher, and yet perhaps we only learn what we teach ourselves. You have only had a home training in art, and I only had one year's good schooling, and yet I think we have known greater dunces than we are, Miss Harvey," he concluded, with a slight laugh, as he turned away to his ledger.

Millicent was interested. The suggestion of the "one year's good schooling" touched the sympathies of George Harvey's sister. And then Fergus had hitherto been so blunt and curt, that this burst of friendly candour made one wonder what more lay hidden within him. Wonder is ever credulous. There was hardly yet a locked-up room which was not credited either with hidden treasure or a ghost, and yet rooms are sometimes locked up, simply because they are out of repair and are not wanted!

"He must have had his troubles too, poor fellow," Millicent thought, "and troubles are apt to harden and chill one on the outside."

In those days, though only about forty-five years ago, art was in a very different position from what it is in at present. Pictorial works were costly, and consequently rare; and of the pictures which then passed as beautiful, many would now be condemned as spiritless and conventional. Yet, at the same time, art was not then degraded into a "regulation property," and if comparatively few authors saw their thoughts reflected back in pictures, at least they were not so liable to see them distorted therein. Artists were not then assured enough to ride their pet model rough-shod over a poet's conception, till the reader is fairly puzzled between the womanly woman who lives on the page, and the brazen vixen who stares him out of countenance from the "cut." And there was also more scope for individual fancy, ill-trained as it might be. Wealthy people of taste had not then left off having favourite poems illustrated, and special places sketched, to their own particular order. A bride, who wished to remember the church of her wedding-day, and a widow, desiring to recall the grave of her hopes, could not then make a facile purchase of the same photograph, to serve equally as a memento of joy and sorrow. No; the bride had a sunshiny painting of the old church porch, the beech avenue, and the lych gate; while the widow procured a moonlight view of the yews among the graves behind the church, with the great east window illuminated by some evening service within.

Now one of the partners in Mr. Laurie's firm, a Mr. Smith, was greatly addicted to this kind of dabbling in art. He had made a good deal of money in business, and had a childlike enthusiasm for poetry, which he only half understood. Wordsworth was his especial adoration. The man whom necessity had chained half his life in city alleys, and whom fashion now kept in a West-end square, was yet captivated by the mountain bard's sweet pictures of "Old places, full of many a lovely brood,

Tall trees, green arbours, and ground flowers in flocks,
And wild rose tiptoe upon hawthorn stocks;"

and only wondered that such "a poet of nature" could ever have been so forsaken as to think there was something worth writing about in "the filthy waterside corners one sees from Westminster Bridge."

This gentleman (who went in stoutly for every kind of reform, except the Catholic Emancipation Bill) had paid considerable sums of money for a series of illustrations of the "White Doe of Rylstone." He kept them in tissue veils, and paper cases (for the preservation of their mounts!), in a portfolio in his drawing-room. He had put each of their prices on their backs, for their recapitulation was part of the show, and he did not want to make mistakes. And his good lady thought her husband entirely what she called him, "quite a Macenas."

His attention had latterly been drawn to the noble poem, "Resolution and Independence." He thought it "a fine moral piece," and liked to quote lines from it in the counting-house. This good-hearted man, whose faults were only foibles at which angels themselves might smile, always talked a great deal to Fergus Laurie. Fergus did not only assent in monosyllables, with the respectful stupidity of most of the young men. Fergus often dissented, or put questions which "drew on." The kindly master told his wife that this clerk was "a sharp young man," and did not dream that his well-meant conversations were recited for the amusement of Mrs. and Miss Laurie, and his truisms epitomized into household bywords.

"Yes, Laurie," he said, "that 'Resolution and Independence' is a very fine moral piece. I should like every young man to read it. I would not mind giving five pounds for two or three little sketches to set it off. They'd be an excuse for bringing the subject forward, and then I'd read the lines. Just simple little sketches, you know. They need not be fine, like my 'White Doe' set, because I don't want these so much as a matter of art as of doing good."

"And of course, it is desirable to do that as cheaply as possible," said Fergus gravely.

"Yes, of course," answered the merchant in his simplicity, "for then one can do the more of it."

"I think I know somebody who could do what you require, sir," said Fergus.

"Indeed!" and out came a little private note-book, where percentages and shipping rates mingled oddly with quotations in rhyme, and wise adages. "If you'll just give me the name and address, Mr. Laurie, I'll be vastly obliged."

Fergus hesitated. "Will you mind giving me the commission, sir?" he asked. "I will name your terms, but will not pledge you to pay anything till at least one sketch is finished and approved of. There are circumstances that make it better the artist should not be known unless the work is successful. And it may not be successful: the artist is untried in this way; but I think, worth trying."

"Eh, eh, young—rising, eh? I like to give a turn to such. Very much indebted to you, Mr. Laurie. Leave all to your discretion. Shan't mind raising the terms a little if I'm very pleased. But leave all to your discretion."

Fergus knew the way to the Harveys' house well enough. Indeed, he had called there once or twice about business, and had left messages with Mrs. Harvey for her daughter. But he required first to look in at Blenheim House, where David Maxwell was expecting him.

David was sitting, as usual, in the surgery, with a volume of Plutarch open before him.

"I can't stay," Fergus said, in his abrupt way, "so I won't sit down. I must go on to Miss Harvey's house. I have just got a good chance for her. Our Mr. Smith wants some sketches for Wordsworth's poem, 'Resolution and Independence,' and I put in a good word for her, and if she does one well, she'll get the order."

"She'll do it," said David. "It's well to be you to have such chances of serving people."

Fergus accepted the congratulation as a matter of course.

"I hope I shall do greater things in that line soon," he observed.

David had already turned to the poem, in the copy of Wordsworth which Fergus had put on the table. He wanted to read what Millicent would be presently reading.

"She will want models," he observed. "If she cannot think of anybody for the leech-gatherer's figure, you might remind her of the old sweeper by the churchyard. I have often been struck with that old man's resolute, patient face. She could go into the graveyard and get a sketch of him without his knowing. I think it would spoil his look if he knew, and he seems a man who might even object, like our Phœbe."

Fergus received the suggestion in silence, and David thought that very likely he condemned it as worthless, but was too kind to say so.

"I'll go with you as far as the Harveys," David proposed cheerfully. It seemed getting near Millicent to walk with somebody who was going to speak with her. And as he went along, he revolved in his mind what other hint he could give to secure Millicent's success. He desired it with such single-heartedness, that he would risk Fergus's belief in his good taste and wisdom, by giving nineteen foolish suggestions, if out of such a bundle of blunders might come one worth consideration.

"You say Miss Harvey is to do one picture on approval—don't you, Laurie?" he asked.

"Yes," said Fergus, "and the first lines are easy to illustrate—a few trees, and a bit of brightish sky reflected in some pools."

"But I don't see that she need make the first picture the specimen," David observed. "You might tell her to take the subject that most struck her own fancy; she would be sure to do that best."

"Oh, of course I shall talk it over with her," said Fergus; "there is no use in planning what I shall advise till I see what she says."

They paused before the Harveys' gate.

"You may as well come in, too," Fergus went on. "You have met both Miss Harvey and her brother at the vicarage. Come in."

"No, I think not," David replied, with a wistful look at the lighted parlour window. "They won't care about seeing me, and while business is being talked over, the fewer people there are about, the better."

"That's quite true," said Fergus. "So, good-night." And he went in, and David crossed the road, and stood in the dark, watching the shadows that presently wavered across the blind.

Page 304.

Mrs. Harvey, Miss Brook, and Milly, were all at home, and they now constituted the whole household, for George had been married two months before the night of this memorable visit.

Fergus stated his commission in his own cold, brief way, and in the pause while Milly read and re-read the poem he laid before her, he had time to survey the parlour in which the little family group was seated. It was a pretty little room; but what struck Fergus was that its prettiness seemed so cheap and easy. Its elegancies represented very little cash, for, with unselfish foresight, Mrs. Harvey had gently overruled George whenever he had wished to buy any article of luxury. What could have been the total cost of all the ornaments?—the home-made featherscreens on the mantel, the cardboard frames in which were set especial bits of Milly's drawing, the hand-worked fringing of the book-shelves, the patch-work cover of the side-table. A mere trifle, that anybody could afford. Therefore, Fergus asked himself, why should not his mother and sister make their sitting-room look as well? And they were neither of them bread-winning women, as all of these were, or, at any rate, had been, till quite lately. "If we had a room like this," said Fergus to himself, "we could invite anybody to visit us—and I should like to invite people. Our place ought to look quite as well, for I'm sure our furniture is really better, and mother and Robina must have more leisure than these."

With all his sharpness, Fergus had not yet learned that those who do much, always find time for more, and that whatever does not cost money, involves a mental and moral wealth, which is not nearly so easily acquired.

"I am to draw one picture on trial?" Milly asked, looking up at last, with a catch in her voice such as people have as they brace themselves to climb a hill. It never even occurred to Milly to say that "there was no use in trying." Effort was certainly in her power, whether success was, or no.

"Yes, and take any one you like," said Fergus. "Don't feel yourself bound to begin at the beginning."

"I should prefer to take a scene that would include the leech-gatherer's figure," Milly mused aloud. "I should like the test sketch to be one of the most important, because I should not like to succeed in that, and fail afterwards."

"Certainly not," said Fergus, "but the first picture will get all the criticism. Succeed brilliantly in that, and the others will be trusted. It is like when artists or authors make a name, people take the rest of their work on credit. Nobody is always inquiring into things. Get a reputation for early rising, and you may sleep till noon-day."

"Humph!" said Miss Brook, from her corner.

"Perhaps I may suggest that if you want a study for the leech-gatherer you may find one in the sweeper by the churchyard," Fergus went on. "Just go inside the palings, and take a look at him, and perhaps you may get from him two or three good lines to give individuality to your lay-figure's correctness. Have you any lay figures, Miss Harvey?"

"Oh yes," said Milly, "I bought one a long while ago."

"If not, I was going to offer to bring one for you, as I shall be in the West-end tomorrow. So, I suppose you have had thoughts of this kind of work before?"

"Scarcely," Milly laughed; "but I like it, and I thought my designing would be none the worse for it."

And then Fergus rose, and departed amid Mrs. Harvey's thanks and Milly's grateful assurances that he had already given her some most valuable hints, and that any more he might think of would be extremely welcome.

"And if your friend" (who he was, remained a secret from Milly) "is not quite satisfied with my first attempt, tell him I shall be most happy to throw it aside and try again, if he will let me," she pleaded.

"Oh, of course I shall see it first," Fergus answered. "and I who know his ideas, and exactly what he requires, will be able to judge whether it will do; and if you give me leave to tell you if I think not, you can try again, without his knowing anything about it."

"Give you leave!" echoed Milly. "it will be the greatest kindness you could show me. And I will set to work diligently, that I may have time for three or four failures."

And as Fergus came out of the bright little passage, with the eagerly grateful faces of the mother and daughter beaming behind him, David Maxwell turned and fled in the darkness; and then presently, fearful lest Fergus might see him in some sudden cross light, stepped into a deep, shady porch, and stood there breathless, till Fergus's springing step had passed far down the road.

CHAPTER III.—HOW FERGUS LAURIE GOT HIS OWN WAY.

MILLY set to work upon her sketches with all energy. Fergus Laurie presently sent her a note saying that he would take care that she was not called upon as early as usual for her regular supply of designs, and she wrote back, thanking him, and saying this would help her forward with the "sense of freedom." But he found that her designs arrived on the same day as usual.

Fergus presently made up his mind that he would take his sister Robina to call on the Harveys as a preliminary to inviting them to take tea with his mother. To name such schemes was to produce a revolution at home.

"I hope you've counted the cost before you think of beginning such things," said Mrs. Laurie.

"What cost can there be?" said her son serenely. "Will it ruin us to buy another half-pound of tea and some currants and candies for Robina to make into a cake?"

"I'm not going to make a cake for people to laugh at," observed Robina. "Don't do these things at all unless you mean to do them properly."

"Well, at any rate, come with me to see these people," Fergus pleaded, "and afterwards I'll settle everything exactly as you like. Only come," and he added an argument likely to be more effectual in these quarters. "We shall never get on, or be able to afford anything, if we shut ourselves up like hermits."

"I've seen these Harveys at church," said Robina Laurie. "They are always very particularly well dressed. I would like to pay visits as well as any body, yet unless I can get something better to wear than my last winter's bonnet, I'd rather not go."

"What would it cost to get a bonnet as good as Miss Harvey's?" Fergus asked, in helpless masculine ignorance.

"It could not be bought under a guinea!" said Robina, with triumph. "Yes, indeed," she added, spitefully, "it is very easy to be always hinting how neat and pretty she looks, but neatness and prettiness cost something, I can tell you, sir; and if one is to have them, somebody must pay for them!"

Fergus was astounded. This put all his calculations about economy at fault. But he knew enough traditionally of the Harveys to feel sure that they had no private income, and he jumped to the conclusion that if their means justified such expenses, so did his own: a very common conclusion, though scarcely worthy of Fergus's reasoning powers. But he wanted his will, and would not let even his own logic stand in its way. And how was he, poor male creature, to know or suspect that the Harveys' bonnets were all home-made, and came out year after year pleasing and apparently new, but at only three or four shillings of fresh cost? Still some vague notion of such possibility came across him.

"Can't you make a bonnet for yourself cheaper than that, Robina?" he asked.

Robina bounced out of the room. She could bounce, though she was a little mite of a thing, after her brother's mould. She came back with her marketing bonnet in her hand. It was a coarse straw bonnet, badly dyed, with a piece of washed ribbon strained awry across it.

"There," said she, "that's the sort of thing people who have never learned millinery can get up at home. Would you like to take me visiting in that?"

This settled the question. "Get whatever you must have," Fergus conceded; "I'll pay for it. But I can't believe that you need to make all this fuss about paying a call to people no better off than we are ourselves, if so well off. For everything put together, including whatever allowance they get from the son since his marriage, I should not think they have more to live on than my salary, and we have mother's pension beside."

"Ah, you'd better think of letting that accumulate for us, than go wasting your money to show off to strangers," sighed Mrs. Laurie. "And how do you know what people have? They have a good lodger, anyhow."

"I was just thinking so might we, mother," said Fergus. "We have two rooms standing empty."

"I'll not have any one but ourselves in my house," Mrs. Laurie returned. "I've not been used to that sort of thing. Still it's profitable for those that don't mind it."

"In my father's time, and until I paid the rent," said Fergus, "you were not 'used' to live in a house where there was a room to spare." Fergus had struggled stoutly for his family, and took a kind of pride in connecting all his ambitions with them; but he was not dutiful with his tongue. Indeed, the whole Laurie family affection was of the curious kind which thinks itself above courtesy or restraint, and delights in proving with what immunity it can give and take thrusts which would prove deathblows among outer-world friendships. But it was only a compound form of selfishness; and the good-nature with which they each took the other's home-truths was only as real as the frankness with which some men are wont to accuse themselves of pride, hastiness, or folly.

However, in two or three days, Robina announced to her brother that she was ready to accompany him to the Harveys whenever he chose, and so they went together that very evening.

Hatty Webber happened to be visiting her mother, and was sitting chatting with Mrs. Harvey and Miss Brook, while Milly was hard at work on her sketches at a side-table. Hatty Webber never took work with her to visit; she would no more have thought of carrying the children's stockings in her reticule, than Milly would have dreamed of taking her pencils and india-rubber when she went to tea with the Webbers. "Everybody must rest sometimes," was Hatty's dogma, "and whoever is always at work before people, must take it easy behind their backs."

Of course, Milly's drawings were the first topic. She was just putting the last touches upon the test picture. Fergus looked at it, but approved so coolly that Milly got frightened, and eagerly begged that she might do another.

"Oh, no, there is no need for that," Fergus said. "I have no doubt this will do well enough. Only the figure is almost too much like the old crossing-sweeper. A little more fancy—a little idealisation would have been better, perhaps. Still, tastes differ. And I daresay the gentleman who has to judge this picture will not know about the crossing-sweeper."

"But what can it matter if he does?" asked Hatty.

"Oh, he might think it was commonplace," Fergus explained. "It is easy to reverse this old leech-gatherer—a particular branch of poverty we are never likely to come across; but it spoils the romance to confound him with an old beggar, to whom any of us can give a halfpenny when we choose."

"A crossing-sweeper is not a beggar," said practical Hatty; "for whenever we use his crossing without paying him, we have more occasion to say 'thank you' to him, than he has to us, when we do pay him."

"You are like a friend of mine," Fergus answered. "When there has been a particularly poor abject-looking being standing at a crossing, I've known my friend go sloshing through the mud, rather than pass him without a fee."

"Is that Mr. Maxwell?" asked Milly simply. She had often seen him with Fergus.

"Ah, you know him. Yes, it is he."

"And now," said Miss Laurie, addressing Mrs. Harvey, "I must give you our special excuse for this intrusion. We have come to invite you and Miss Harvey to take tea with us this day fortnight."

Mrs. Harvey glanced at Milly. Milly looked bright and eager.

Therefore Mrs. Harvey answered—

"Thank you. We shall be very happy to come."

"We are very glad to have the opportunity of making such friends," Fergus observed, with that touch of reserved warmth in his tone, which suggested so much.

"Yes, indeed," said his sister Robina aside to Mrs. Webber, "for paying a visit or receiving one has grown quite a novelty with us. We have been so very poor, that it has been quite impossible for us to keep any equal terms with such people as we would wish, and we are rather too proud to accept friendship on any other footing."

"We have been very poor, too," said Hatty, but she spoke stiffly.

"We are going to invite Mr. and Mrs. George Harvey," Fergus went on. "Very likely they will not despise an opportunity for a long evening with you. And we shall be delighted to see you and Mr. Webber, too," he added, turning to Hatty. "My mother and sister will do their best to entertain you all."

"Oh, yes, we'll do our best," said Robina, "only my brother knows a great deal about it, you know, and fancies it is quite as easy to receive twelve people as six. But do come—if you'll only look over shortcomings, and take us as you find us."

"Thank you very much," Hatty answered, with the chill of her manner setting into hard frost; "but we do not go out very often, and cannot see our own old friends as often as we would wish. So you must excuse us."

And then Robina Laurie felt she had done something wrong, and that she would have a scolding from her brother, and would have been glad of a little more delay, before he requested that Milly's drawing might be wrapped up, and put in his charge, and then took leave.

"What do you think of them, Hatty?" Milly asked eagerly, when they were gone. Fergus Laurie had been such a prominent subject in all her recent conversations with her sister, that she was delighted to hope that this personal acquaintance might give them a mutual interest in him.

"Well, Milly, I can't say I fell in love with either of them," Hatty returned.

"I don't think you understood him," said Milly. "You thought he himself meant what he said, whereas he was only stating the general feeling of most people."

"Well, at any rate, I don't like the sister," persisted Hatty, "and as they are people who are so particular to have their friends on an equality with them, they have no right to invite our George."

"Oh," said Miss Brook grimly, "don't you know that equality generally means that one's as good as one's superiors, but better than one's equals, and above touching one's inferiors?"

"I don't know more of Miss Laurie than you do," Milly conceded; "but I cannot understand how she gave Hatty so much offence. She owns that she has lost the habit of talking to strangers, and I daresay it is a kind of nervousness which makes her over open. In a world where we all require to have so much patience with each other, it is surely easy to be patient with that. You are generally so good-humoured, Hatty—a great deal more good-humoured than I am. But Miss Laurie saw you were affronted.”

“I can't endure being patronised,” said Hatty. “And if she did not find it a pleasure to have us, why should she think it could be a pleasure for us to go?”

“Children, children,” put in Mrs. Harvey, “don't forget that the Bible exhorts us to that charity which thinketh no evil. Better to be disappointed in people, than grow so wise as never to trust, or to forgive in little matters where there may be mutual misunderstanding.”

“Do you think I have much of that wisdom, mother?” Hatty asked pitifully. This married daughter was always keenly touched by the least reproof from Mrs. Harvey. “I'm sure I don't want it,” she added; “and I'm quite ready to own that perhaps I didn't take to the Lauries, because I couldn't help wondering what they would have thought of me, in the happy old days when I scoured down the house at Mile-end.”

“They would have loved and admired you,” cried Milly: “at any rate, he would. In spite of his cold manner, I am sure he is very warm-hearted and far-seeing. They are but shallow people who fancy warm manners and warm hearts must go together.”

Shallow indeed! But scarcely more shallow than the sentimentalists who think that warm hearts are always hidden in cold exteriors.

Meanwhile, Fergus and Robina trudged some distance in silence. Robina was afraid to speak, lest she should bring out the lecture which she felt was due. It came soon enough.

“I don't know what you can think of yourself,” said her brother. “I extend my invitation to somebody who is accidentally present when the original one is given, and you back it up by saying what an immense deal of trouble it will give if it is accepted! You have no breeding, Robina. But you might have a little regard for me. I think I am the first person to be considered in these affairs. The entertainment is mine, and if you find I am putting too much work upon you, you could but tell me privately that you must have assistance.”

“I'm sure I'm very sorry,” said Robina, in a tone curiously balanced between conciliation and defiance; “but I did not think you could really want the Webbers' company. The man keeps a shop in the Mile-end Road, and speaks like a person who has never been to school. You spoke of going a little into society because it might help you to get on: I don't see that the Webbers' friendship could be any advantage to you.”

Robina had only quoted his own words, though certainly with that added shade of meaning which quoted words always have. He could not deny them, but they jarred him now. They had been uttered less as his own sentiment than as a motive which would appeal to his mother and sister. Fergus had genuine hospitable and social instincts. His greatest fault was his egotism, with its strong self-will. But then that is the lean kine which swallows many fat ones. He would have his own way, and whoever refuses to turn aside in that path must certainly often wade through dirty places.

“I dare say Mrs. George Harvey will not be sorry not to meet her brother-in-law,” Robina put in, emboldened by her brother's silence. “Now I do hope she and her husband will come. I wonder what the Devons will think of our inviting their niece? But we have quite a right to do so. You are able to serve Miss Harvey, and Miss Christian was not above marrying Miss Harvey's brother. Besides, I don't know what Mrs. George Harvey's own father was. Her uncle Robert, who adopted her, was only a book-seller.”

Fergus heard and did not hear. He was ready enough at times to listen to such talk and to join in it; but it was not what pleased him best. Still it was one of the influences of his life. If he had taken one of his own minor wills he would have silenced it, as small, mean, and unworthy, but then he had a larger and more material will, in gaining which it seemed to him that his sister Robina might be useful. And though their view of family affection gave him freedom to gibe at Robina, it was unprecedented among the Lauries to administer that kind of firm, loving rebuke which claims an altered course of speech or action. Robina would not have borne this; Fergus would never have thought of giving it.

Next day Milly received this note:—

“DEAR MISS HARVEY,

“Your sketch is accepted with great approbation, as I expected and as it deserved. Go on as you have begun. I hope to get better terms for you than those I first stated. But, with your leave, I think it best to keep you and my friend in your present mutual ignorance till this transaction is concluded. I do not think you will lose if you repose this much confidence in me.

"With my respectful greetings to your mother, I remain,

"Faithfully yours,
"FERGUS OGILVIE LAURIE."

"She's done it," he announced to his friend David Maxwell when he met him that evening. "It's my belief that she'd do whatever she took in hand. And she does it in such beautiful simplicity. Tries and succeeds, and doesn't seem to know it! But I think she wants somebody to tell her what to try. She doesn't feel her own strength enough. It is not sufficiently stirred within her to goad her to put it forth on something. She wants leading out."

"What line did she choose for the first picture?" David asked.

"Motionless as a cloud the old man stood," quoted Fergus. "And she made a downright portrait of that crossing-sweeper. I was afraid at first that it might be too literal to be pleasing, for it was wonderful as a likeness. But Mr. Smith never dreams of noticing a face out of a picture."

And then David Maxwell, left to himself, fell into a train of thought which had never troubled Fergus or occurred to Millicent. He thought to himself that if the outward man of this parish crossing-sweeper would serve so well as a type of the grand simple old hero of the poem, might not the fitness rise from some spiritual resemblance? Was it quite fair to take him as a type of patient endurance, and not try to lighten his burden — if by ever so little? This old man had unconsciously done Millicent a service which she must have missed had he not kept his face noble and steadfast amid all the cares and squalors of bitter poverty and decrepitude. David, loving Millicent in his silent romantic way, felt a yearning to show kindness to him for her sake, as well as sympathy for the possible sufferings and character which might have made him so fit a form for a fine ideal. David did not understand the too common enjoyment of rubbing up one's emotions without producing one electric spark of action. Never mind that all he could do in this case was to buy his winter gloves of Berlin thread instead of kid, so that on the next Sunday morning, when his stepmother happened not to be with him, he was able to slip half-a-crown into the sweeper's hand.

The old man looked up suddenly, but without a start.

"God bless you, sir," he said. "I knowed it would come, for things was just about down at their worst, and something allays does come then. God bless you, sir."

Next Sunday the old man was not in his accustomed place. He was dead. He had died suddenly of heart disease, and the parish people found a whole shilling in his little canvas bag. David's charity had gone with him to the end.

"I cannot think how that Mr. Maxwell can choose to wear Berlin gloves," thought Milly to herself, "he must be very stingy."

She little dreamed that if there were more of his genuine appreciation of the truths which all art is only created to illustrate, there might be fewer subjects for sad pictures and pathetic poems and—more Berlin gloves!

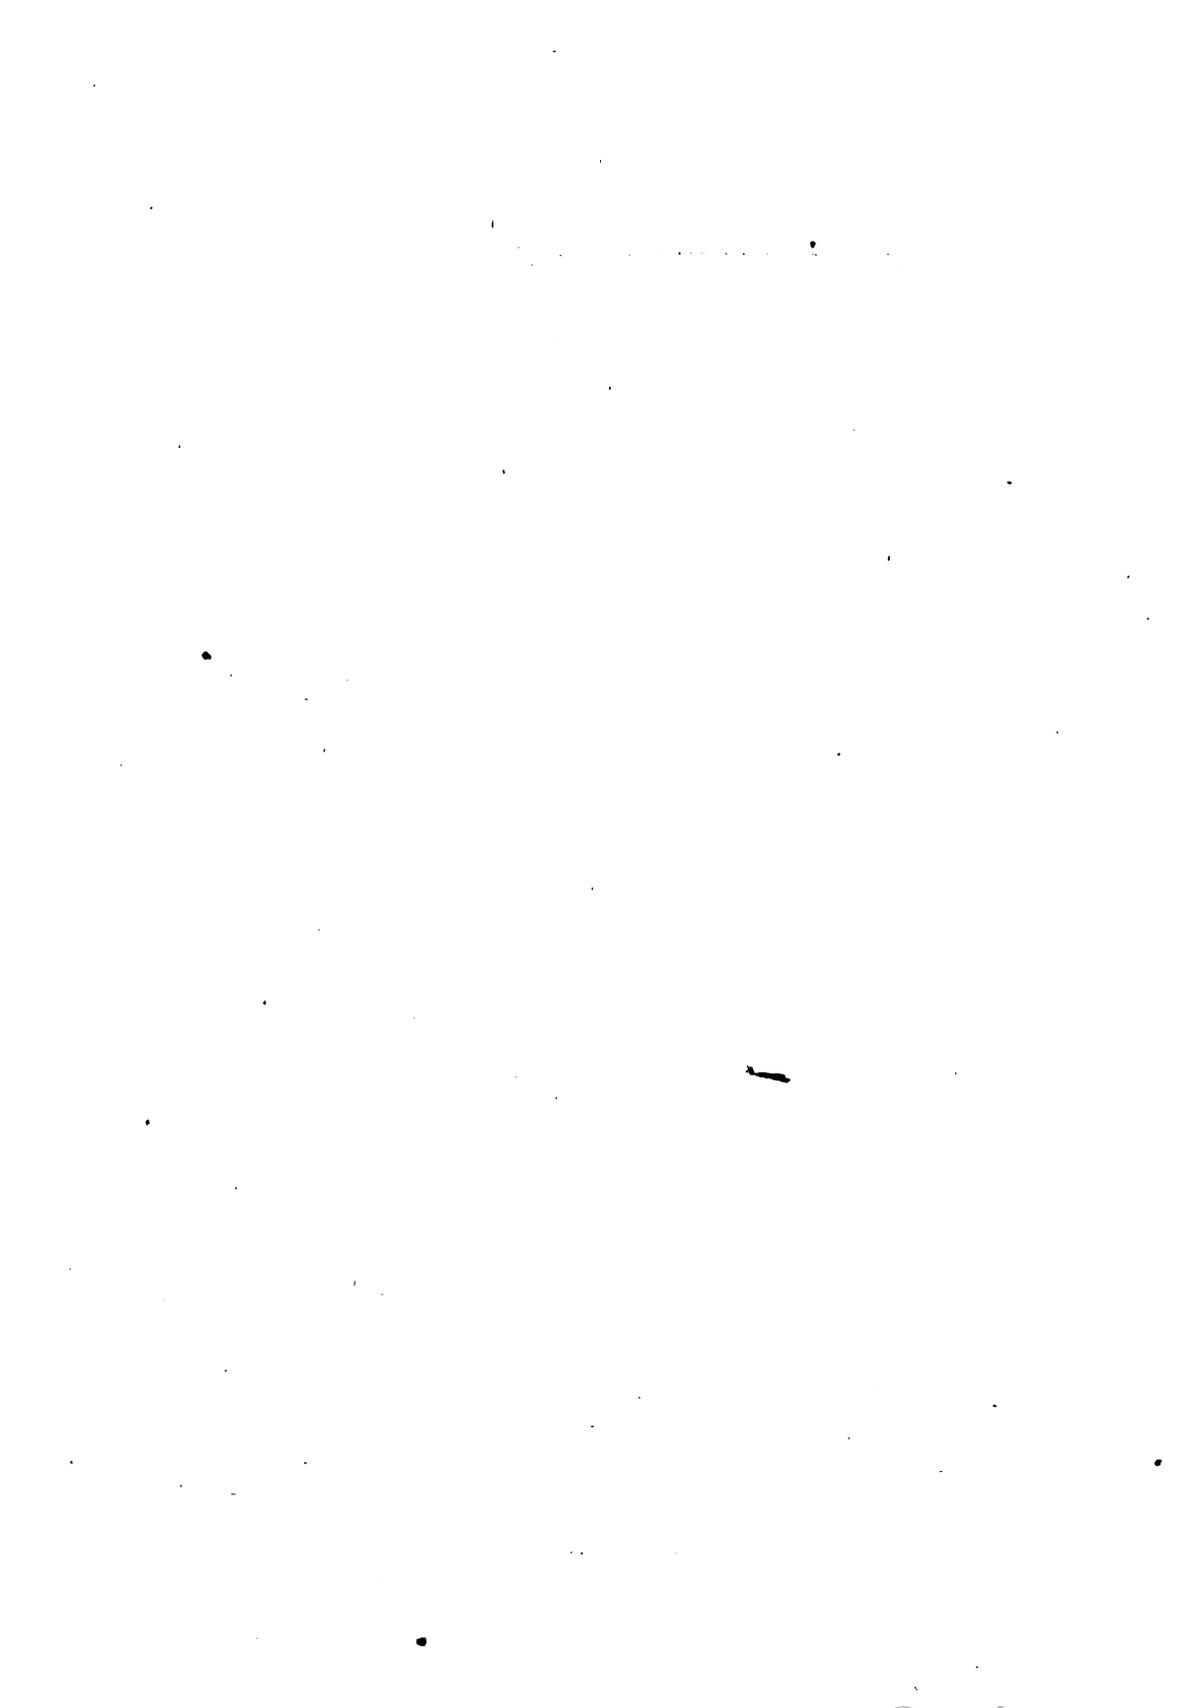

"THE LORD BLESS THEE AND KEEP THEE."

"THE Lord bless thee!"
How shall He bless thee?
Not with earth's vain empty blessing,
Joys that fade in the possessing,—
Not with earth's poor fleeting treasure,
Not with earth's mean scanty measure;—
But with the blessing of Him
Whose light cannot fade nor dim;
Whose boundless store
Yields ever more and more;
Whose mighty strength
Knows neither shortness nor length;
Whose wondrous love
Outspans the heavens above:—
With the gladness that knoweth no decay,
With the riches that cannot pass away,
With the sunshine that makes an endless day:—
Thus may He bless thee!

"And keep thee!"
How shall He keep thee?
Not with earth's poor feeble keeping,
Eyes that cannot stay from sleeping,—
Not with earth's fast tiring power.
Strength too weak for trouble's hour;—
But with the Keeping of Him
Whose Eye can never grow dim,— Whose potent Arm
Can ward off each alarm;
Whose untiring zeal
No weariness can feel;
Whose tender care
Sends just what we can bear:—
With the all-covering shadow of His wings,
With the strong love that guards from evil things,
With the sure power that sale to Glory brings:—
Thus may He keep thee!

it is only necessary to mention that the phrase is common alike to fashionable slang and the slang of low life, and has much the same meaning in both. There is, however, one very material point of difference. In upper and middle-class circles the grass-widow is usually found receiving a comfortable allowance from the absent husband; but among the lower classes the grass-widow is, generally, a deserted woman—a woman, therefore, who has to “scratch” for herself and for whatever children she may happen to have, and who,
as a rule, makes a very poor scratch of it.
Ours being a waterside district, grass-widows were, unhappily, numerous in it. Some of the deserted women were the wives of men who, though not sea-going, had become so for the nonce, to the extent of stowing away or working their passage out to America or Australia.
This class of deserters, it is perhaps worth while to note in passing, would—if they could write at all—generally leave a scrap of paper behind them, intimating that they had taken their departure. “Good-bye to you and the kids —I’m off for good,” was the commonest form of these messages. Occasionally it was rather unnecessarily added, “You must do the best you can.” Sometimes there was the promise, rarely fulfilled, “If I get on, I’ll send for you.”

The bulk of the grass widows of our district were, however, as they would inform you, when telling the story of their troubles, the wives of sea-going men who were “away somewheres foreign, and not a sending any-think home, not even so much as the scrape of a pen, and which they might be alive or they might be dead, or they might turn up again or they might not. Howsunnever, it was a cruel hard thing on them and their children; which they had never given any provocation, but the other way about.”

With so much premised, it is scarcely necessary, I think, to explain why a certain street in our district was nicknamed “Grass-Widows’ Alley.” It was the favourite place of residence for the grass-widows, who, like other birds of a feather, flocked together.
It was the poorest, most wretched, most-to-be-pitied spot in all Our District; and that is saying a good deal. It was not exclusively inhabited by grass-widows; other widows, widows in full, as they were called by way of distinction, lived there in considerable numbers. Some families of the poorest labouring classes, which counted both husband and wife in their number, also found dwellings there, and, as in most other very poor spots, there was a sprinkling of both men and women of the undesirable class who are usually described as having no visible means of support. It was a long narrow street running between the two principal thoroughfares of the district, and any person passing along either of those thoroughfares, who had cared to glance down it, would have seen that it was also a dirty, dismal, unhealthy, overcrowded street. But few passers-by did care to pause to look down Grass-Widows’ Alley—and for reasons good. At either end of the Alley, and having entrances in it, were “corner” gin palaces, which to a considerable extent were very visibly supported by the no-visible-means-of-support class. Around their doors were generally to be found loafing a number of slouching, low-browed gentlemen of the stamp that decent citizens with portable property about them instinctively avoid. This, added to the facts that the Alley was known to be a hotbed of contagious diseases, and was at all times pervaded with foul smells, led to the general public hurrying by it holding their noses, and keeping their eyes on their watch-guards, rather than pausing to gaze down it and note its outward aspects. Curious and characteristic enough those aspects were if taken merely as a "sight!" Heart-breakingly dreary and sad they were when you considered the terrible poverty and suffering of which they were the outward and visible sign. The "march of improvement" had marched past the place, and though the Inspector of Nuisances probably knew of its whereabouts, he had left it all alone, perhaps on the ground that his powers did not extend to removing it altogether. It was unpaved and undrained. Down its centre ran a stench-emitting gutter, choked and spreading out into more or less extensive mud pools at every few yards. What were by courtesy called the footpaths, were thickly strewn with all manner of refuse, and in the gutter swarmed innumerable hungry-looking, ill-clad, dreadfully dirty children, who for the most part had known nothing of "childhood's joys," and who were growing up to be street arabs in their girlhood and boyhood, worse in their man and womanhood. The houses in the Alley were six-roomed ones, and were let out in apartments by the superior landlords, the plan of allowing sub-letting tenants having been tried and proved a failure, as the sub-letters made a practice of going off without paying their own rent, after having received that of the sub-tenants. In so poverty-stricken a neighbourhood, arrears of rent were, of course, common. There were no goods worth distraining upon, or to repay legal expenses, and so taking the law into their own hands the landlords or their collectors summarily "bundled out" old non-paying tenants to make room for new ones who it was presumed would be paying ones—for a time at least. These ejections were often very painful affairs, but often too they had at least one pleasant feature connected with them, the manner, namely, in which they brought out into practical action the kindness of the poor for the poor. In many and many an already overcrowded room have we seen a corner cheerfully given up to shelter the ejected; many and many an already too scanty meal freely shared with them; shelter, food, sympathy being given in the most unostentatious spirit of charity.

The dwellings of the Alley presented an almost incredible state of dilapidation. They were old, had stood all the sack and destruction to which the desperately poor are wont to subject house property, and had never been repaired. When I came to know the place a knocker was a rarity in it, and metal door numbers, door handles, scrapers, and spouting had all long gone the way of the marine store dealers, while in not a few apartments even the grate had been taken away. A window with half the panes of glass remaining ranked high for light and respectability, many of them being utterly denuded of glass and roughly boarded up. Inside, the houses were equally dilapidated. The roofs let in the rain more or less freely, the ceilings and walls were smoke blackened, the stair-cases were dangerously rickety, and the floors broken. One noteworthy feature of the internal household arrangements was that, just inside the door of almost every house, a rough hole was knocked through the partition between the lobby and the front ground-room. It was large enough to admit the head and shoulders of a woman, and through it the tenant of the front room usually answered the door. It was "handy" in a variety of ways, but notably so in those cases in which women had been driven to pawning or selling their clothing to such a degree as left them scarcely sufficient to make themselves decently presentable—a state of things by no means uncommon in Grass-Widows' Alley.

Itinerant traders of the poorer kinds abounded in the Alley, and their "shallows" and baskets were at certain hours of the day to be seen piled in front of their dwellings, while at all times there exhaled from numbers of the houses an odour of stale—not to say stinking—fish, which, taken in conjunction with the knowledge of the sort of places in which the humble traders of the Alley must keep their "stock," was highly calculated to create a disrelish for such tea and breakfast relishes as shrimps, winkles, herrings, and haddocks. Speaking of the shallows and baskets only being visible at certain hours reminds us that the appearance of the Alley would, to any one glancing down it, have been somewhat different—and characteristically so—at various periods of the day. As early as three o'clock in the morning lights would be seen flitting about in some of the houses, indicating to the initiated that the buyers of the Alley were making ready to tramp up to Billingsgate, Covent Garden, and other central markets. A little later—especially in the summer months—the more industrious and more robust of the seamstress division of the Alley—the shirt-makers, button-holers, and "hands" of the slop-shop "sweaters"—would be seen at their windows, commencing their weary and ill-paid labours. From half-past five to six the few regularly employed labourers living in the place would be going off to their work. About seven, there commenced a scene of bustle. At that hour the buyers returned with their small stocks; and then it was a case of all hands to the pump to prepare the stocks for retailing—to tie the water-cresses into halfpenny bundles, sort herrings and haddocks into sizes, and so forth. With the hawkers of "relishes" set out also the hawkers of hearthstones, and a band of the girls technically known as "steppers," from their seeking work at step-cleaning. The other itinerants of the Alley—a couple of chair-caners; a tinker-and-grinder; a gentleman who made day hideous by going about the streets playing on a cracked cornet; an eccentric individual, known as "Look-at-the-Quality," who sold the mats that his wife and children made; and a collector of old hats and umbrellas—these would not start on their rounds till later. Between nine and ten the children begin to turn out for their day's play in the gutter, and a little later the relish hawkers begin to return; and, having breakfasted, the younger ones of the juvenile portion of them join the gutter brigade, while the elder ones go for a rake 'long shore until it is time to prepare for the afternoon round. From eleven till noon there is generally a sort of lull, and it is mostly about this time that the few outsiders, whom business takes into the Alley, are to be seen in it. The parish doctor and the relieving officer are often visiting there, and the sight of the work-house, fever, small-pox, and general cabs are familiar in it; and still more familiar is the sight of the parish hearse. Brave Christian-minded volunteer visitors also make their way into the Alley on missions of love and mercy; but the outsiders most frequently seen in it—alas that it should be so!—are the potmen from the corner "publics," already spoken of. Each morning they collected a string of pots from it; for, amidst all its poverty, as there generally is amid all such poverty, there was drinking. On each Friday morning a special scene was to be witnessed in the Alley. Numbers of its widows, both grass and full, were to be seen trooping out with cloths under their arms, and looking comparatively jocund—as well they might, for they were among those who received out-door parochial relief, and they were now on their way to receive their weekly allowance of money and bread. For this day at least they and their children were sure of "a good rough fill;" and the children as well as the parents knew it, as they showed by the eager manner in which they ran to meet their mothers when they returned laden with the loaves.

Such, so far as I have been able to describe it, was the outward appearance of Grass-Widows' Alley, the poorest spot, as we have said, in all our poor district, and one such is to be found in most of the poor districts of our great cities. Cheerless and wretched, however, as was Grass-Widows' Alley in its material aspect, it was of course in the home and inner life of its inhabitants that the sorrowfullest aspect of it lay—in their hand-to-mouth life, their desperate heart-breaking struggles to keep body and soul together. Ah me! when I think of these things, what mournful memories the name of the Alley conjures up! What remembrances of children young in years but old in suffering—of gaunt, hunger-pinched faces, of women with "only the ghosts of garments on," who do not sing, but live, the song of the shirt, labouring from weary chime to chime for a crust of bread, and rags.

What recollections of crushed and broken lives, hopeless and despairing hearts—sin, and sorrow, and death! As I write, such memories throng thick upon me, and standing out clear from the rest is the remembrance of a dead two-year-old little girl with the angel-look already upon its face—the child to whose death my first introduction to the Alley was incidentally owing.

On a rather warm October morning, I had occasion to call at the shop of one of the largest tradesmen of Our District who was not better known among those of his own standing as a shrewd and successful business man, than he was to the poor of the neighbourhood as a charitable one. To invoke his aid in this latter character was the purpose of my visit; but finding him with his hat on just about to go out, and the matter I had in hand not being pressing, I said that, seeing he was busy, I would call upon him some other time, when in a hearty tone he answered—

"Oh, I'm not in such a desperate hurry as that comes to; in fact I'm rather glad you have dropped in just now—but after you."

Taking this as an invitation to state my business, I did so. Having readily promised the assistance I had come to ask, my friend, taking a dirty, ill-written document from his pocket, asked as he unfolded it—

"Do you know anything of a Mrs. Cooper, of Grass-Widows' Alley?"

I replied that I had never heard of either the person or place, and finding that such was the case, my friend in a few words explained where in Our District the Alley lay, and why it was so nicknamed, and then placing the paper in my hand concluded, "As to Mrs. Cooper, why she is just the Mrs. Cooper of that; what do you think of it?"

Spreading the document upon the head of a barrel that stood convenient, I saw that it was headed in a sort of text hand:—"The humble petition of Mary Cooper, of C— Street, in St. N—s Parish, Shewith," and made out—not without difficulty, for in addition to being ill written, it was couched in a sort of semi-legal jargon—that the object of the petition was to solicit subscriptions towards paying the difference between the price of a pauper coffin and a plain coffin of the ordinary type. So far it was commonplace enough. My friend and I had seen scores like it; to save relatives, and more particularly children, from a pauper coffin, was a thing for which the poor of Our District would struggle more desperately than even to keep life in themselves. Some there were who, when appealed to on this ground objected to the feeling as one of false pride, arguing that it mattered not to "the departed mortals" in what sort of coffin they were buried, or whether they were buried in a coffin at all; but the general opinion of the neighbourhood was in favour of the feeling, and though it may have been—as I was often told it was—weakly sentimental on my part, I shared the popular opinion. The pauper coffins were terribly slap-dash affairs, and it was a common and recognised practice between the parish undertaker and the very poor, for the latter to pay for having the coffin "made decent" as they expressively put it—having them plainly covered and lined, and furnished with handles and plates. The additions were the cheapest of their kind, the charge for making them was not large, and petitions to raise the amount were, as has been said, frequent. What had struck my friend, what struck me, as peculiar in Mrs. Cooper's petition was, that it represented her as labouring under such a crushing accumulation of misfortunes as seemed scarcely credible—as in short suggested the petition being a fabrication, and as such martistically overdone.

"What do you think of Mrs. Cooper?" my friend asked significantly when I had finished my perusal of the paper.

"I don't like the style of the petition," I said.

"No more do I, as far as that goes," said my friend, "but she is scarcely to blame for that. I gather that she can't write, and I know the fellow who has written it for her. He is deputy at the common lodging-house, and thinks that this style of composition shows him a 'scolard.' He is just the sort that under the melting influence of a pot of beer or two, would write a thing of this kind without either knowing or caring whether it was true."

"If it is not true," I said, "Mrs. Cooper is very much to blame; if it is true, she is very much to be pitied—and if possible helped."

"Just so," assented my friend; "if this statement of the position of the family is even broadly true, it is a case for much more substantial assistance than is asked for here. I think it is a case to be inquired into, and I'm going to make inquiry—will you come?"

"Yes," I said I would go willingly, and without further words we started.

"That must be the house," said our companion, by a glance indicating one, across the paper-patched, up-stairs window of which was fastened some old piece of white stuff to serve as a blind. Tapping at the door, we found that it was the house.

"Yes, Mrs. Cooper lives here," said the grim old woman who answered our knock, "and she's at home, but she's in about as much trouble as any poor creature well can be and live. The wonder is how she has lived through it all; but what might you want with her?"

We said that we wanted to speak to her.

"And give her a tract, I suppose!" said the old woman contemptuously.

"We want to see her about this," said my companion, taking the petition from his pocket.

"Oh, that's another matter; I begs your pardon," answered the old dame, her tone becoming more civil. "She can stand by that; every word of it's gospel truth, for I got it wrote for her, and heard it read over, and it was about all I could do for her. I've never known much else than misery myself, and I've lived among it all my life, but such a dose of it as she has got now I don't think I ever did see before. Go up to her room, and you'll see such a picture there as I'll venture to say your eyes never rested on before."

And truly my eyes never had rested on such a sight. Since then they have rested on some scarcely less sad, but at the time I beheld it the scene in that room in Grass-Widows' Alley was the saddest I had ever looked upon. It was a picture that, if put on canvas, would have been condemned as overdrawn, and attributed to a morbid imagination, and yet there it was before us in sad and stern reality. The wretched old room darkened by the apology for a blind, the splintered hearth-stone, the rusty, fireless, fenderless grate, the shaky, uneven, disjointed flooring, the dirt-engrined walls, the ceiling smoke-blackened, and here and there fallen in, so that the rain soaked through; the bed of rags in a corner, and the one broken chair and rickety table that constituted the furniture! And oh the occupants of this so dismal apartment! On the solitary chair sat a man who, sound and well, would have been a fine able-bodied one, but who was now weak and wasted from hunger and disease. His left arm was in a sling, his right was thrown around the shoulders of a six-year boy, who was crying—for bread. On the opposite side of the fireplace from the father sat, on a rough block of wood, a patient-looking little girl of four, moaning from the pain of a badly-crushed foot, she having been run over by a hand-cart two days previously; and in the far corner of the room, heedless of our entry and all else, knelt the mother by the corpse of her youngest and prettiest child, an infant of barely two years. The dead face was the one happy-looking face in the room—the one thing of beauty amid all the wretchedness. It had been a beautiful little creature, regular-featured, blue-eyed, pure-complexioned, and, having only died in the small hours of this same morning, "Decay's effacing finger" had as yet set no unbeautifying mark upon it. It had died with a smile on its lips, and the smiling expression was still there, the eyes were gently closed, and in that dim room the bright soft golden hair cast a glory round the brow. The frail little body was laid out on the top of an old deal box, which had been draped with clean white window curtains, lent, as we afterwards learned, by kindly neighbours; and it was arrayed for its long dreamless sleep in a beautifully-white night-dress, drawn in at the waist by a band of pink ribbon. So it lay; its presence sanctifying the squalid room. Reverentially we approached it, reverentially roused the mother from the stupor of grief into which she had fallen, and tried to comfort her. She was a young woman, and had been good-looking; but now her eyes were sunken and lacklustre, her cheeks pale and hollow, and her whole expression haggard and hunger-pinched.

"Be calm!" she exclaimed passionately, in reply to something my friend had said to her, "don't you think I'd be something more than human if I could be calm, placed as I am? There's my husband, poor fellow, been out of work this seven months, with a diseased elbow. I'm expecting every day to be a mother again; you can see my one child lamed and requiring nursing, and hear my other crying from hunger; and there is my little Rose, that I think I loved better than them all—God forgive me, if it was a sin!—lying dead, and more through our hard living than anything else. Be calm, sir! I wonder I'm not mad altogether."

"Would not the parish authorities help you in your trouble?" we asked.

"They offered to take us all into the workhouse," she answered, in a tone of bitterness; "and though I'm perhaps wronging them in saying so, I believe they made that their only offer because they could see we were of the sort that would rather starve than go into a workhouse;—and we have starved, and are starving. I'm only nine-and-twenty; my husband is only three years older, and till this misfortune of the accident to his arm fell on us, we were decent independent people in our poor way, for he was only a day labourer, and unfortunately for us he was not in any club. Of course, we had to part with what we had bit by bit to get bread, and we moved into this place for cheapness, and what you see and these is what our home has been brought down to!"

"These" were a handful of pawn tickets that she took from a cupboard as she spoke.

"With pawning and selling," she went on, "and what I could bring in by washing and charring, we managed to scrape on till five weeks ago, by which time my little Rose was so ill as to require constant nursing, and then we did have the parish doctor, and parish medicine and nourishment, and now we are offered a parish coffin for her."

So far she had been comparatively self-possessed, but at this point she gave way to a wild burst of grief. Throwing back her hair and raising her voice, she continued:

"But she shan't be buried in it! Look at her, pretty little angel. Her last nest, at any rate, shall be a decent one, if I beg the money on my knees by farthings."

As she finished, she threw herself on her knees beside the dead child, and with her head lying close to its hand, sobbed hysterically.

Seeing her thus, the husband for the first time came forward, and laying his hand caressingly upon her shoulder, said—

"Don't take on so, Liza. I know you loved her dearly, and so did I; but at the same time, lass, remember that she has gone to a better place, and been took from a hard, hard world."

"I know she's better off, and that it's selfish of me to fret," she moaned, without raising her head; "but I can't help it, Jim; it tears my heart altogether; and to think how she suffered!"

"Try to bear up, lass," he said, in the same soothing tone; "my arm is on the mend now, and, please God, we may see better days again. Oh, sirs," he went on, turning to us, but still keeping his hand on his wife's shoulder, "it's a dreadful thing for a man to be chained, as you may say, and see his wife and children starving, and what is worse, being a burden upon them. If either of you could only get me anything to do for a while that a man might do with one arm, I'd be thankful. None but God and ourselves know how hard my wife here has fought against the workhouse, how hard we have all lived to keep out of it; but I'm afraid we shall have to go, after all, if we can't get some little help to tide us over the next few weeks. You may think it a poor way for a man to talk, but being placed as you see me here brings down pride, gentlemen. I'd do anything, however humble and however poorly paid, and be gladder than I can say to get it."

There was no whining in his tone, and there could be no-doubt of his sincerity. The passionate grief of the woman, touching though it was, was not more distressing to witness than the tearless agony of the man's face.

The latter indeed seemed to have the more powerful effect upon our companion, for whispering to us, "I can stand no more of this;" and assuring them that he would see something was done, he led the way from the room. Neither of us was in humour for talking, and we had got quite clear of the Alley, when my friend, drawing a long breath, exclaimed—

"Well, I shall never forget that sight the longest day I live. If I had stayed another minute, I must either have cried or choked. I can't tell you how much it has upset me, and yet I'm very glad I went. I thought on first reading the paper it was an imposture, and if—as I once thought of doing—I had taken no notice of it, and found, when it was too late to do anything, that it was really true, the thought of it would have haunted me."

"It was a case," I observed, "that showed, even more than the discovery of an imposture would have done, the advantages of personal investigation in such matters."

No more was said, but I trust it is scarcely necessary to add that something was done. Care was taken that the, at any rate, excusable wish of the poor mother was gratified—that the “last nest” of her dead favourite was a decent one; and help in the form most acceptable to people of their spirit was found to tide them over their time of trouble. A light employment was procured for the husband until such time as his arm was well, and he, his wife, and remaining children restored to health and strength. It is pleasant to be able to relate that within a year the family were, thanks to their own perseverance, able to leave Grass-Widows’ Alley. In a less poverty-stricken neighbourhood, they once more set up a comfortable little home, and lived happily, as they had done before their misfortune had brought them into the straits in which we had found them; though with a chastened happiness—the memory of that dark time of trouble being always with them.

Such was my first introduction to Grass-Widows’ Alley, and much of my after experience in it was also associated with death and misery—necessarily so, for they were the chief characteristics of the place, and it was curious, as well as sad, to note how calmly familiar with them were the inhabitants. While they struggled so desperately to live, many of them yet looked forward to death as a friend. I remember once speaking with one of the seamstresses of the Alley. She was a “deserted woman” with two children. She worked at the slop shirt-making, and with the aid of her eldest child, a girl of ten, could by working sixteen hours a day earn about nine shillings per week. Her other child, a boy of eight, by hawking hearthstone, brought in from a shilling to eighteen-pence per week, and this was the total income of the family when in full work, and very often they were not in full work. Their way of life was in consequence very miserable, and I was condoling with the mother upon such being the case, when, with a long-drawn sigh of relief, she exclaimed—

“Ah, well, sir, there’s one consolation—there’s no work in the grave! Thank heaven for that! There, at last, we will be able to fold our hands, and rest, rest, rest! No shirts to make there for three-ha’pence each, and no ‘sweaters’ to dock your pay on a Saturday night for pretended faults in the work; and we won’t feel hunger, or cold, or pain there—our long home is the best, after all; I often sigh for it.”

She did not speak bitterly or ironically, but in an unaffected spirit of thankfulness and satisfaction. Others in the Alley have I heard in the same spirit express the same longing for the last folding of the hands to sleep. It was wonderful to hear not only with what resignation, but with what a matter-of-fact air the inhabitants generally would, as winter was approaching, speak of a severe or dear season “thinning them off,” and in severe years many of them did succumb, and most of them endured terrible privations. The winter with its cold wet days and long dark nights was on many grounds their most trying time. The inclement weather sadly curtails the earnings of their out-door occupations; while the seamstresses and others following in-door employments could not work so well by candle or lamplight as they could by daylight—and then there was the question of the expense of light and firing. The latter was the great winter question of the Alley. Coals in anything like sufficient quantity were beyond the reach of the general run of the inhabitants. In the bitterest cold of notably severe seasons I have seen family after family shivering about in utterly fireless rooms, or almost fighting for a share of the scanty warmth of such a fire as could be got up out of a few sticks and cinders gathered from dust-heaps by the children. More than once I have seen a family that had been fortunate enough to get a charitable gift of meat unable to cook it for want of a fire, and compelled to barter part of it with some one who had a little fire—who had perhaps been so lucky as to secure the gift of a coal ticket. Relief tickets were the best hope of those in the Alley at these seasons, the greatest, almost their only chance of obtaining “seasonable” food or warmth. The terrible eagerness of look and tone with which they entreated any one even suspected of being entrusted with the distribution of the bounty of charitable associations or individuals was a sad sight to witness. That some of them were but little deserving there was no doubt, but there was equally little doubt that in the majority of instances they were in want, were hungry, cold, and without means, and often—at least, such was our experience—it was scarcely less hard not to be able to give than it must have been not to be able to get the urgently-begged-for ticket—the ticket for which the haggard, hunger-hollowed, cold-mottled face, as well as the eagerly-anxious voice, pleaded “trumpet-tongued.”

As regarded individuals, and individual families, there were occasional gleams of sunlight amid the darkness of Grass-Widows' Alley. From time to time truant husbands would unexpectedly return to their wives and children, bringing money with them. In some instances such occurrence would simply result in a "spree"—a few days' carousal and wild extravagance, followed by a fresh disappearance upon the part of the husband, a fresh sinking into poverty and want upon the part of the family. In most cases, however, "the return of the wanderer" meant other and better things—meant to a greater or lesser extent the redemption of the family from poverty. Sundry rather dramatic stories were current in the Alley, of men turning up "just in the nick of time;" just at a time, that was, when absolute starvation was staring their families in the face. There were other stories of men who had not turned up in the nick of time, who had not come back until it was too late for their return to undo or amend the mischief their desertion had wrought; until wives or children were dead or had "gone wrong." Again there were brighter and more romantic stories—mostly relating to the Australian and Californian gold fever periods—of men who had returned greatly enriched and had at once and for ever removed their families from the Alley, to comfortable and even luxurious homes, in which—figuratively speaking—they fared sumptuously every day, and were clad in purple. And in this connection it is a pleasing thing to be able to relate that, in some instances at any rate, the fortunate families did not, in the days of their unexpected prosperity, forget old neighbours and fellow-sufferers in the Alley; but, on the contrary, rendered them kindly and substantial assistance, so that the raising of one family out of the slough of despond was sometimes incidentally the means of rescuing another.

But such brighter bits of life were the rare exceptions in the Alley. Woe! woe! woe! was the rule, and of course there were occasionally cases in which the lighter and darker phases of the life of the place were strangely mingled. A picture of one such case there dwells on my mind with a vividness second only to that of the picture of that first scene in the Alley, of which we have already spoken. Generally speaking, the residents in the Alley "neighbourled" freely, but any who were so minded could "keep themselves to themselves" as closely as they wished without danger of interference or curious prying upon the part of others. Among those who did elect to keep themselves secluded was a young woman, who, as events showed, had only come into the Alley to die in it, and it was in connection with her death that this second mind-picture was imprinted upon my memory. She took a room for herself and her child, a pretty little girl of four years. It was noticed that she looked woefully ill, was very scantily clad, and had no furniture. When at home she shut herself in her room, speaking with no one, and when she went out she communicated to no one where she was going or on what errands she was bent. Finding that her desire was to be left alone, the other inmates of the house, with one exception, ceased to take any notice of her after the first day or two. The exception was an old woman who earned a precarious livelihood by keeping a small fruit-stall. Seeing that the young woman got to look worse every day, and arguing from what she saw of her circumstances and movements, that she was slowly dying of hunger, the old woman became extremely anxious about her, and anxiety making her bold, she entered the other's room, and forcing her into conversation after a deal of persuasion induced her to apply to the parish authorities for help. On doing so she was supplied with food—but it was too late. A few hours afterwards her illness assumed an alarming character, the parish doctor was brought in, and on seeing her he at once ordered her to be removed to the workhouse infirmary; but before the removal could be made the flickering life had passed away. It was immediately after her death that I saw her, not knowing that all was over until I reached the house. The apartment was literally without furniture, and was otherwise wretched and cheerless. But to her it mattered not now, her fight was over, and there was a look of rest on the wasted face, that had as yet scarcely become rigid. She was stretched on a pile of shavings that had served her as a bed, and was covered with some old dresses; and so she lay, one of the unknown dead, for none could say who she was, and she had died and made no sign on the point. So far as she was concerned there was nothing for us to do, and as we had no doubt that the parish would take charge of the child, we did not see that we could do anything for it either; and yet, though I scarcely knew why, I asked to see it. I was informed that I would find her in old Sarah's room—old Sarah being the fruit-stall keeper mentioned above. On ascending to her apartment I saw the little girl playing about it, seemingly unconscious of any loss. Thinking that I would be better able than those around her to explain to her childish intellect what had happened, I began talking to her. In reply to my first question she told me that her name was Milly; and after a little while I gently asked her—

“Do you know where your mother is, Milly?”

“Don to heaven!” she answered promptly, and in a tone and with a look that showed that in her own childish way she had realised that heaven was such a place that to have gone to it was a grand thing.

Old Sarah herself was seated in a corner of the room quietly regarding us, and on my looking up at her, with a pleasant astonishment, she observed—

“That’s what I’ve told her, sir, and have been trying to make her understand. I thought it was the best thing, and I hope it’s true; and if it is, death will have been a happy release for her, poor thing. When I found no one fitter came, I prayed for her myself as well as I could, and I think she understood, and bent her own mind to asking God to take her; though she was past speaking, there was a happier look on her face as she passed away than I ever saw on it in life.”

“I was truly rejoiced to find,” I said, “that there had been a praying Christian with her in her dying moments;” and I added “that I was afraid there were but very few in the Alley who could have prayed with her.”

“I don’t want to take any credit, sir,” answered the old woman, with unaffected sincerity. “I’m sorry to think that I’m not as prayerful as I know I ought to be. It’s not that I’m better than my neighbours, but I’ve had better opportunities than most of them. I haven’t always been in such places as this. I was comfortably brought up, and was taught to remember my Creator in the days of my youth. As a child my head was never laid on my pillow until I had said my prayers at my mother’s knee; while many a poor thing living in the Alley here has never been taught a prayer, perhaps hardly ever heard one. But under all their roughness they are very kind to each other. A woman that has been in prison half-a-dozen times for being drunk and disorderly nursed me through a fever like a sister, just because she saw I was alone, and because she remembered that I had once begged of the policeman to be gentle with her, while every one around was laughing at the way in which they were pulling her about. There’s plenty would have shared their own last crust with the poor creature lying dead up-stairs there, if they had only known how bad off she was, and I don’t suppose there was one in the house but that had the heart to have prayed for her when they saw her dying, if they had only known how.”

Knowing what I did of the kindness of the poor to the poor, and the notions which many of even the most ignorant of them had of the necessity for and importance of death-bed prayer, I could quite believe what the old woman said, and with a brief remark to that effect, I left the house thinking sadly of the young mother lying dead in that miserable garret, and hoping that she had indeed “don to heaven,” and that the fate of the child now left alone in the world might be happier than hers. Two days later she was laid in an unmarked pauper’s grave, no mourner by, the name in which she was buried, and by which she had been known in the Alley, presumably an assumed one. The child was removed to the workhouse; but happily not to stay there long. With the closing of the grave over the mother the darkness of the picture faded away, the brighter touches, the silver lining of the cloud began to show—the poor mother seeming to be destined to serve her child better in her death than she had been able to do in her life. Though there had been no inquest, an account of the case got into a local paper, and with a most pleasing result. In consequence of reading this account, a lady and gentleman applied to the relieving officer to see the child, and finding her a very pretty and lovable one, explained that they were a childless couple, and would be willing to adopt her as their own. It was arranged that they should do so, and she was taken to their home in such a manner that none but the few necessarily in the secret knew from whence she had come, or what had been her previous history, so far as it was known, nor on reaching years of understanding was she herself enlightened on the point. Had she met one of the gutter children of Grass-Widows’ Alley she would probably have shrunk from it in fear, little dreaming that it was but a picture of what she might have been.

Such as I have attempted to describe it, was Grass-Widows’ Alley; such life in it, such death in it. When I consider what manner of place it was, the saddest feature of it has yet to be named—to wit, that it is a typical neighbourhood. Such places are to be found by the score in the metropolis alone, and the thought that it is so, may surely make us humble, thankful, and charitable.

NO ROOM IN THE INN.

THE inn is full—but is there none to yield?

She is so weary—must she go afield?

O had I chanced that night to be a guest,
Thrice welcome Mary to my place of rest.
Are such thy thoughts? then, hast thou room for all?

Hands for the fallen, ears for every call?
Christ claims our love in many a strange disguise:

Now fever-stricken on a bed He lies, Friendless He wanders now beneath the stars,

Now tells the number of his prison-bars,
Now bends beside us crowned with hoary hairs;

No need have we to climb the angel stairs,
And press our kisses on his feet and hands;
In every saint who suffers here the Man of Sorrow stands.

GEORGE S. OUTRAM.

ON MONEY.

BY THE REV. A. W. THOROLD, M.A.

II.—USING AND SAVING.

IF the first thing about money is to get it, and the second to keep it, the third is to use it. And this, perhaps, needs the greatest wisdom of all. Remember what it implies, and what it includes. It implies foresight, so as to be ready for losses; self-control, to be able to go without things that we should dearly like, but cannot afford; patience, to know how to wait for what we wish for; discretion, clearly to perceive what will suit us best; self-denial, that we may help others; conscientiousness, that in all we spend we may please God; good sense, to draw the right line between extremes on either side; a joyous liberty of heart, to trust the kindness of God, that He means us to be happy. If not to offend in word is one sign of perfection, to make a right use of money is another. It is significant that Dives went to torment, not for viciousness, but for self-indulgence. It was the snare of his great possessions that stole from Christ the soul of the rich young man, whom to see was to love.

See, too, what it includes. Certainly three things; some would say four. There is maintenance, and usefulness, and enjoyment, and—may we not add—saving. Each of these has its own natural order; each its own relation and proportion to all the rest. Clearly we must live: in other words, we must eat and drink, and wear clothes, and live under shelter—the needs, it may be said, even of savages. But our artificial and civilised life makes other demands on us still. There are children to educate; servants to feed and pay; now and then doctors' bills; occasionally lawyers'; and for the absolutely needful claims of a middle-class English household, with its varied and complicated and incessant expenditure, the one word maintenance means a heavy drain of money. By usefulness, I mean that proportion of money which, before any other expenditure is incurred, next after our maintenance, should deliberately, methodically, and cheerfully, be put by for God. Enjoyment will include all that personal expense which, within just limits, and according to the discretion of the individual conscience, is a legitimate source of human joy. Saving or putting by, either in the shape of a life insurance, or in the private laying up of a certain amount of income for sickness or old age, will be, in the judgment of many, a prudent, if rather an Irish way of using by keeping.

Few things require more pains, show more character, or earn more results than the expenditure of money for household necessities. Several points strike one here as indisputable, but singular. How much more some people spend on mere eating and drinking than others. How this is true, not only of navvies, and pitmen, and artisans, but of persons of all ranks and circumstances. How such persons always complain of their poverty, and that they never have money for anything else. How easily such luxuries come to be looked upon as the indispensable necessities of life. How the simpler and more frugal people, who would equally like them, but go without them, because other things seem to come first, never get credit for their abstinence, but are assumed not to mind about them. How little any one gets for his money spent this way, except dyspepsia and a habit of self-indulgence. How quite the worst and silliest way of spending money is to eat and drink it!

But our household expenditure means other possibilities of extravagance than those of food. Costly changes in furniture, not for being worn out, but for being old-fashioned: what is called "stylish-living," so often the pretentious vulgarity of pseudo gentle-people, and so miserably and deservedly failing in procuring the consideration it spends so much to buy; an expensive way of entertaining, which gratifies nobody but the tradesmen who supply the goods; servants simply to minister to laziness; and incessant goings to and fro to this place or that, merely because home is dull: these are items of expense which swell the house bills of many a quiet family, with little in return but constant mortification, and the pressure of debt.

The plain truth is, and there is much consolation in it, that the actual necessities of life form a much less item in household expenditure than many of us are willing to suppose: that it is the extras, and the luxuries, and the superfluities that run away with the money; that the sooner a somewhat stern and decided check is put on modern habits of spending, the better it will be for all of us; and that if the present rise in prices helps to effect a little household economy, and compels some of us to ask ourselves if we could not be quite as well and as happy with cheaper and simpler ways, the country would be wealthier through its increased savings, and in many homes the purse at the end of the year would be much fuller than now.

In quite their proper place clothes have a claim for consideration among the other items of domestic spending ; and though the present age hardly needs encouragement in this direction, it is a real mistake to treat them as a matter of indifference. Whatever is worth doing at all is worth doing well ; and it is by no means an open question whether clothes are to be worn. The right thing to do is, to spend just that amount of attention and money on them, that in the end will prove the true economy. To care nothing for dress is, indeed, not quite such a snare as to care too much for it. It is no exaggeration to say that costliness of wardrobe is one of the glaring inconsistencies of fashionable Christianity ; and makes shrewd men and women of the world coldly and scornfully ask, where is the cross that such Christians carry. Yet when God gives any one personal attractions, He entrusts them with a means of influence which He expects to be made use of ; and there are two kinds of vanity, that which affects to despise natural gifts, and that which assumes a personal pre-eminence from them. But be there beauty or no, it is still reasonable and natural to wish to make the best of ourselves. For we should dress, not only for our own fancy, but to please those we live with. A true wife likes to please her husband's eye ; and a father is gratified by seeing his daughters dress as suits him. But clothes cost money ; and while extremes on both sides should be carefully avoided, quite the most wasteful plan is to give it no thought at all. "Can a maid forget her ornaments?" is an inspired question, which has its root in the intrinsic reasonableness of some kind of care being given to them ; and the elevated temperament that treats clothes and their cognate subjects with a lofty negligence is certain to be extravagant, and likely to be shabby.

The right spending of money also includes usefulness. And I choose this word in preference to charity, because it contains and expresses more. A Christian's hourly conviction about all his spending should be that he is a steward for God, both as regards himself and his neighbour. Among the rough tests of the genuineness of our religion, none is so sure as our habit of giving away.

But this is one of those matters in which the truest wisdom is to be at once methodical and free. A conscientious man should, as a matter of course, set aside a certain part of his income as belonging to God, and sacredly to be dedicated to Him. The principle, however, once recognised, the special application of it must vary according to the individual case. Are there many children or few? is the annual income professional and fluctuating, or permanent and certain? Here are, at least, two among other conditions, which will materially affect the power and so the duty of giving. Such proportion inflexibly set aside for the Master's use need not necessarily be all that is given. Sometimes it may be more ; though it never should be less. If it fall short in one year it should be made up in another. Any sudden accession of fortune, or great hit in worldly success, should be recognised by a special thank-offering ; gratefully, for it is He who gives us power to get wealth—promptly, for the sooner it is done the more likely it is to be well done ; a gift deferred often means a gift diminished. That it is set apart for Divine uses does not necessarily imply that it should all be devoted to strictly religious purposes. There are many doors into the Temple of Charity, and various are the altars on which our offering may be laid. Occasionally it is found a good rule to apportion the charity purse under the four divisions of religious, benevolent, domestic, and casual—part going regularly in annual subscriptions, part to collections in church, part to special objects, such as occur annually with almost inconvenient regularity, part not assigned at all, but left free for the discretion of the hour. Only let us take care that our charity be not so mechanical as to lose all its true vitality, so much a matter of habit, that we forget, when we give, humbly to offer it to our God. It is the motive that makes the gift precious—in the grateful love that lays it at the Lord's feet once pierced to save us ; in the noble joy that thrills through the heart, that God should accept anything from our hands. Then, when God is remembered, and his poor cared for, and his kingdom promoted, and our own flesh and blood not coldly pushed aside, are we free, as conscience shall permit us, and our means justify it, occasionally to think of our own wishes and gratify our own tastes. "Rather give alms of such things as ye have, and behold all things are clean unto you." When people ask if it can be consistent with simplicity and self-denial to buy a picture, or to own a carriage, or to take a tour, when all these things spend money that might be directly used for the glory of our Master, let us not fear to say, it is, if nothing else comes so near us as to make the indulgence unlawful. For two reasons. First, because one end of money is enjoyment; and God gives it us, among other purposes, to minister to this enjoyment, and He rejoices over our joy in his gifts, as a tender human parent is glad in his child's gladness at some present of his own. Oh, we do our heavenly Father wrong, if we suppose that No is the word He likes best to say to us. His is no austere nature that can neither smile nor bless; and if out of our superfluity we would sometimes buy something that to possess would please us, let us ask His leave and be free.

Another reason is, that society in all the immense varieties of its complex life exists and grows by the mutual interdependence of its members; that He who has implanted in us the love of art, or of music, or of books, or of nature, or of travel, must intend and sanction the moderate indulgence of them; that the Christian so far from needing to feel himself debarred these innocent recreations, may rather feel himself freer than other men for them; for is it not his Father's world in which he finds himself, and are not these mercifully given him to cheat the weariness of the way on his journey home. He who has wreathed the face with smiles, and endowed us with the blessed sense of humour, and given flowers their odours, and made the outer world so exceeding glorious, has taught us, as in a parable, that our joy is His joy, only let it always be in Him.

There are, however, two things more to say. It may be that at the moment when we are meditating such indulgence, some pressing necessity, or outside sorrow comes in, and a voice says to us, "Canst thou cheerfully deny thyself, and spare that money for me?" At such a moment—and it will not always, perhaps not often, come, God is too kind, too just to overtask us—let us lift up our heart for strength, and then, looking once more at our coveted treasure, for our Saviour's sake, bravely let it go. The quiet happiness that distils into the heart, when He smiles on us his thanks, must be felt to be known.

Or, there may be those in whose heart through the special and exceeding grace of the Holy Spirit there is now an utter deadness and indifference to such things, not because there never was any natural inclination for them, but because the power of the new life has crushed it out. The extent of their indifference is the measure of their victory. Well, blessed are they in their utter contentment with their Lord, and in their calm indifference to earth. They are on a height, which no one can reach without much steep climbing.

Lord Bacon, in his Essay on Expense, clearly points out that "he that is plentiful in expense of all kinds, will hardly be preserved from decay." While one hobby, judiciously and moderately indulged, can hardly hurt a poor man, half a dozen may make a bankrupt of a rich one. That idiosyncrasies of expense have, on the whole, been beneficial to society needs no arguing; since but for the costly enthusiasm of private, and sometimes eccentric collectors, there would be none of those accumulations of art and books and sculpture that give all classes a share in the enjoyment of their wealthier neighbours, and sow broadcast the fruitful seed of many a lofty thought and noble production. This, too, is certain, that pictures, plate, marquetrie, china, or vertu of any kind, when really good of its sort, is a valuable investment if you can wait for your interest; to buy well, even if you pay highly, is a safe protection against ultimate loss. No doubt the difficulty, however, that most men find in this direction is knowing where to stop, for every one can appreciate Dr. Johnson's experience, that abstinence is easier than temperance. Conscience has a voice that claims to be heard about every penny spent on self-indulgence; and when sternly silenced, it waits for a bitter revenge.

There are, however, two useful checks on our habits of expenditure, which, if hardly to be called moral, yet tend that way, since they act as helps to the conscience, though not to be recognised as quite on a level with it. One of them is the habit of saving; the other the practice of keeping accounts. It is hardly too much to say about saving that it is a primary instinct of human nature, and that in proportion to the savings of a nation will be the increase of its wealth, and independence, and power. Englishmen are, with one exception, probably quite the least thrifty of civilised nations; and if some of us need convincing that it is important to save, still more refuse to admit that it is possible. Many persons, indeed, appear to regard thriftiness as identical with a certain meanness of disposition, and think that no one can save but at the cost of his own dignity, and his neighbours' interests; and the easy indulgence so generally granted to the selfish thoughtlessness of young spend-thrifts indicates a fallacy latent in the popular mind, that any kind of waste is, on the whole, for the public good. Now, is it quite too bold to hazard two statements on this subject: one, that most people ought to save; another, that every one can? That most people ought to save is capable of proof, from the stand-point both of self-interest and religion. That every one can save—obvious exceptions allowed for—is plain from the fact that all of us waste a certain amount every year on some sort of superfluity, which, though spent gradually and almost unconsciously, and mostly in small sums, makes a considerable total at the end of the year, and which, if not spent, would have been still at our disposal.

The prudence of saving may almost be called self-evident. Illness, misfortune, the opportunity of an eligible purchase, putting out children into the world, the inevitable growth of expenditure as we advance in life, the immense comfort of a secret provision for emergencies, are quite sufficient in themselves to justify and reward the thrift that springs from self-denial, apart from the distinct motive of laying by for accumulation, which it may or may not be right to do. Though it may not tell directly upon our habits of benevolence, and in many cases it will not; in quite as many more it will tell indirectly, through promoting self-restraint, and placing additional means at our disposal. For if we are poor, through what we miss as well as through what we lose, we are rich through what we save as much as through what we gain. By all means let us admit that the habit of saving has a dangerous side to it; that to save merely to keep is quite a different thing from saving that we may give away; and that where pride, or stinginess, or covetousness, are at the bottom of it, it is but selfishness in a specious form. Nevertheless, much inconvenience would be saved, and even great distress avoided, if it was felt to be a rule of common prudence to lay by something yearly, whether much or little, against an evil day. No one is rich who lives beyond his income, but every one may be said to be so who lives within it.

The habit of keeping accounts to some people seems the only possible way of saving themselves from waste and debt, while others pooh pooh it as a piece of useless pedantry. And it is quite true that if the money is spent, writing down in a book how it is spent, will not get it back again. It is also true that for private individuals, at the end of every year, at the risk of their own temper and the comfort of their family, and the loss of much precious time, to insist on balancing their accounts to a halfpenny, is a kind of financial prudery which (all respect to Charles Simeon notwithstanding) good sense will usually repudiate as utterly needless. But admitting all this, there is still, however, a real advantage in the regular keeping of accounts which is quite worth a certain amount of small trouble, and, if not pushed to an extreme, is a valuable help to conscientious persons. Writing down the cost of something which perhaps you did not really want, or ought not to have paid such a high price for, may give you a useful qualm of conscience on being brought face to face with it, and may prevent your repeating the error. Those who are methodical enough to apportion definite amounts to the various items of their expenditure, and who would be honestly distressed if the allotment, say to personal expenditure, were seriously augmented to the injury of other claims, have an easy way of ascertaining from their private record how far they are fulfilling their own intentions. Any one who honestly feels that giving away a certain proportion of his income is a distinct and pressing duty will from time to time be careful to ascertain how far he is really giving in charity a due proportion, as God prospers him. But there is no readier way than that of glancing over his account book, and finding there, in the black and white of his own handwriting, how much he has received, and how much he has given.

It belongs to this part of our subject to observe how directly, and universally, and continually, and on the whole reasonably, social opinion claims to pronounce its verdict on the right use a man makes of his money. The question, "what is he worth?" may often be asked with a purely worldly meaning, and the answer given will usually be, nor that he is just, or pure, or true, or kindly, but that his income is so much a year. There is also seen in some people an impertinent curiosity about their neighbours' private affairs that cannot too instantly or too sharply be snubbed. Worldly wise men will always show a cautious reticence on this subject, and some one in "Coningsby" is made to say that the pleasant thing is to have ten thousand a year, and to be supposed to have only five. While, however, no wise man will ever wish to be thought richer than he is, an honest man will hardly try to make it out that he is poorer. Admitting what has been already observed about unjustifiable intrusion into other men's affairs, there is still a kind of rough, though sometimes inconvenient reasonableness, in the anxiety of a man's neighbours to discover what share he may fairly be invited to take in the duties and burdens of his neighbourhood; and while there is only too much disposition among Englishmen to act the flunkey to rich men, and to give a disproportionate influence to the possessor of money, it is on all accounts desirable to rouse in every one a real conviction of the responsibility of possessing it. Never should it be forgotten that the daily tribunal of public opinion, before which every one of us, consciously or unconsciously, willingly or unwillingly, is compelled to stand, is but the faint type and precursor of that final judgment-seat before which the rich and poor will some day meet together, and on which One who has himself been poor will judge his brethren without respect of persons.

It is probably the presentiment of this tribunal that induces many worldly men at the last moment to attempt to atone at their death for the shortcomings of their life, by giving their money away when they can no longer keep it for their own purposes, and, perhaps, to the injury of their own flesh and blood, to leave the world with a flourish of trumpets in the shape of ostentatious legacies to charitable institutions, for which, when living, they neither thought or cared. Such gifts can neither bribe God nor cheat men. When, however, they fitly conclude a life of consistent benevolence, they are the becoming farewell of a Christian's heart to the world he is leaving, whose woes he can no longer heal. And this brings us to a part of our subject which it is impossible to pass over without some consideration—the right disposition of money after we are dead by what is called a will. Superstition with some persons, indolence with others, indecision or changeableness with others, will often cause men to postpone to an inconvenient or hurried moment what, for the sake of others as well as themselves, should be done when the health is strong, the judgment clear, the leisure sufficient, and the will unbiassed. It is quite true that in some cases the law makes a man's will for him, even better than he could make it for himself; and that, unless he is able to keep his own counsel about it, the risk of disappointing those whose expectations he has excited may seriously affect his freedom of action if he wishes to change his mind. It is equally true that the absence of a will is often productive not only of great inconvenience, but also of wretched discord; and at a moment when a profound sorrow might be expected to bind together brothers and sisters by the sad tie of a common sympathy, they leave their father's grave to plunge into a miserable strife for the wealth he has left behind. It is a serious question how far in making their wills people are sufficiently aware of the life-long resentments that so often follow them; or, on the other hand, of the grateful kindness which the tender mention of a name, or the bequeathing of some trifling legacy, can stir in the heart that rejoices to feel itself loved. Injustice in a will rankles and cankers in the wounded memory for a whole lifetime. To be cut off with a shilling is a kind of malignant insult, now happily falling into general disuse; and, as a rule, the shorter wills are, the fewer complications they involve afterwards; but to be totally passed over in the will of one quite near to you, without your name being mentioned, is sometimes quite as vexatious to a sensitive nature. Our last thoughts of those we love should be tender thoughts; and it helps us to remember them, to know that they remembered us. Better than any costly legacy or accumulation is the memory of an upright and disinterested example, which it is in every man's power to leave his children if he can leave them nothing else.

SLEEP.

BY THE LATE ISLAY BURNS, D.D.

"I laid me down and slept; I awaked; for the Lord sustained me."—PSALM iii. 5.

MUCH of the force and beauty of these words is often lost from inattention to the circumstances in which they were recorded. In the title to the psalm we are told that it was composed by David on the occasion of his flight from Absalom his son. It is the record, therefore, of his feelings and exercises of soul during what was undoubtedly one of the darkest and most trying moments of his earthly struggle—that moment when he was not only assailed by enemies, but wounded and cut to the heart in the house of his friends. Yet even in that bitter hour, God that comforteth them that are cast down, supported the soul of his servant, and visited him with consolations and alleviations as precious as they were unexpected. Of these, not the least remarkable was that noted in the text, "I laid me down and slept; I awaked; for the Lord sustained me." That sweet restorer of the wearied body and the troubled mind visited him at a moment when it might well have been driven far away. Pursued by open enemies; surrounded, it might be, with secret treachery; distracted by a thousand anxieties and conflicting rumours of doubt and fear; his heart wrung with an anguish which none but a father's heart could know,—discrowned, forsaken, reviled, chased by enemies, betrayed by friends, his life every moment hanging by a thread, yet he lay down and slept soft and sound as an infant on its mother's breast. "I laid me down and slept." It is in circumstances like these that we learn to estimate in some measure adequately our common and every-day mercies—circumstances in which they are at once so inestimably precious, and yet so hard to attain. These blessings, which at other times are to us but matters of course, seem then the most blessed and wonderful gifts of God. Those old familiar friends become to us as special messengers of mercy, angels of light from heaven. An hour of deep and refreshing sleep amid the fury of a storm, or in the dread pause of a battle-field, or amid the exhausting toils and ceaseless perils of a siege, or in the weary sick-room after nights and days of watching, or in the lone prison on the eve of trial, or in the last extremity of sorrow, when the very vehemence of the lamentation defeats itself, and the poor sufferer at last weeps himself to rest in the arms of that kind friend which steeps the senses in forgetfulness;—how precious is the boon—how much of divine compassion and care is concentrated in that one gift! But surely, it is not alone on such rare occasions as these that we ought to mark and acknowledge the loving-kindness of the Lord. Such reasons only furnish signal instances of what is with most of us almost a constant mercy. Surely they should not be the less valued or thankfully acknowledged because they are so common. If the momentary interruption of such a blessing makes us more than ever realise its preciousness, should we not be proportionately grateful that it is so seldom interrupted? Because one hour of balmy slumber in the time of our great need is felt to be a blessing that cannot be told, shall we bless God less for thousands and thousands of such hours, when to the sweetness of rest there is added the additional mercy of outward quietness and peace? Hence the importance, both for the glory of God and our progress in true sanctification, to discipline and educate ourselves in the art of observing and duly estimating the common mercies of God.

The mercy here spoken of was twofold:—

1. "I laid me down and slept."

2. "I awaked, for the Lord sustained me."

Let us glance successively at each of these. Though poets and moralists have struggled for expression, and have vied with each other in their enthusiastic eulogies of sleep, yet no one who knows anything of what life is, will accuse their language of exaggeration. Though soaring to the highest heaven of inspired eloquence, they have in very deed spoken of it only the sober truth. It is, indeed, the "serene oblivion of the jaded senses and troubled soul;" it is "nature's sweet restorer," and its "soft nurse;" it is the kind hand that "knits up the ravelled sleeve of care," the "balm of hurt minds," "sore labour's bath;" it is the lowly friend of the poor and the toil-worn, "oft lying with the vile on smoky cribs, and leaving the royal couch;" it is, in fine, to use the powerful and pregnant words of the Christian poet Young—

"Man's rich restorative; his balmy bath,
That supples, lubricates, and keeps in play
The various movements of this nice machine,
Which asks such frequent periods of repair;
When tired with vain rotations of the day,
Sleep winds us up for the succeeding dawn,
Fresh we spin on, till sickness clogs our wheels,
Or death quite breaks the spring, and motion ends."

Sleep is the Sabbath of the day. It is the periodical wind-up of the weary mechanism of flesh, which else would run down and stop. It is a new baptism of the fainting powers, as in waters of renovating energy. It is the grave in which tired nature sleeps, to spring to life by a fresh resurrection on the morrow. Of its inestimable value we may form some faint idea when we consider what inroads on the health and spirits its absence, even for one or two successive nights, will make on the strongest frame; and that to be a stranger to its gentle visitations for months together is recognised as amongst the most terrible of all conceivable afflictions, issuing in an entire disorganization of the whole physical and mental frame, and not seldom in madness. Ah! we little know what a priceless boon we have to thank God for, every day we can say, "I laid me down and slept."

Then consider not only what this blessing is in itself, but what the presence of it implies. As the dews of summer night fall freely only in a calm sky, so the dews of kindly sleep visit us more willingly when the mind is at ease and the body free from serious malady. Racking pain, corroding care, agonizing suspense, wakeful fears for the safety of friends, or the course of events on which our earthly all may hang—any of these will scare away that timid guest, and doom us to a restless bed. When we lie down there and sleep, it is probable that we are largely exempt from these—we have, in great measure at least, a quiet mind in a sound body. We lie down and sleep; therefore, probably, our home is safe; our children and friends are safe; our goods are safe; our affairs and interests in the world are safe. By God's mercy, too—by his simple restraining grace, it may be—we are probably free from that which is far more terrible than any mere calamity—from the memory of such deeds as might strew our couch with serpents, and people our world of dreams with shapes of horror. So that this is no mere single and isolated blessing, but one which by its very presence implies the existence of many others. It is one only of a whole troop of blessings, which, like itself, are for the most part so familiar to us, as to be wholly unnoticed, and which we learn to recognise in their full preciousness only by their loss.

Then, once more, think how hard this blessing often is to obtain. It is one which no wealth will buy, no power can command, no prayers allure. The monarch might barter his crown and half his kingdom, and yet not purchase an hour of such balmy slumber as is the unsought meed of the beggar and the clown. That repose which flees the palace, nestles beside the houseless wanderer behind the wayside hedge. Oft it is farthest away, when it is most longed for, and creeps in unsought where it is least desired. The watchman slumbers at his post, even at the peril of stripes and disgrace, while his lordly master, on a couch of state, closes his eyes in vain. The obtaining of an hour's refreshing sleep would often be the saving of a dying patient; and yet all the care of attendants, and all the skill of physicians, cannot procure it. Every other medicine, and every other cordial, can be bought but this.

Oh, think of the thousands and thousands who last night tossed in strong pain, or feverish unrest upon their beds until the dawning of the day, and would willingly have bought at a dear price even a scanty share of that blessed repose which came to you unbidden, and thus learn what a mercy it is to be able to say, "I laid me down and slept."

Yet how often have you had to say this!

How many thousand thousand times has this song of praise been put into our lips! In the case of most of us, how few have been the exceptions to our continuous enjoyment of this blessing! Probably there are hundreds of us who do not remember for weeks or months or years to have been one night without this boon, and yet how easily might the occasions of its enjoyment have been as rare as the occasions of its absence! How many many are there everywhere with whom it is so! Oh, then shall we not praise the Lord for his goodness and for his wondrous works to us the children of men? Shall not our hearts burn with gratitude, as well as leap with gladness, when we say, "I laid me down and slept?"

But we must now hasten to speak of the second part of the blessing.

2. "I awaked; for the Lord sustained me." If it be a great mercy to lie down and sleep, it is a still greater to awake. If the suspension of our consciousness, and of our wearied powers, be a blessing, how much more the restoring of them! If sleep is the grave of ease and toil, waking is the birth of hope and of strength. It is a fresh resurrection, in which he who lately lay in helpless nothingness in the land of darkness and silence, springs to new life again, and goeth forth from his chamber as a strong man to run his race. Sleep, like death, is but a means to an end, that through that shady gateway we should be ushered into a new sphere and a new life of happy, joyous action. What a mercy, then, when we are spared thus to awake! It might not have been so. In thousands of instances it is not so. Multitudes have closed their eyes in sleep, never to awake or to see this world's sun again. They laid themselves down and slept, but never waked, because God did not sustain them. It might have been so with you. It might have been so on any night you have ever slept since you came into the world; it might have been so on the very night that has just gone. What if it had been so? How would it have been with your soul this day had it so been? If you had not awakened here, where would you have awakened? You slept soundly last night, and for this you have reason to bless God, the Giver of every good and perfect gift; but what if you had slept too soundly? slept that deep sleep which the last trump alone shall break? I beseech you, my beloved brethren, seriously to consider this question. To the Christless soul this precious boon, after all, is but an uncertain blessing. As a wise man says, "Sleep is death's younger brother, and so like him that I never dare trust him without my prayers." And yet do you trust him so? And then think how often you have experienced this deliverance from possible ruin—how many thousand thousand times, all godless and graceless as you were, you have slept and awaked on this side eternity, on this side hell? How has this been? Because God has sustained you. Had he slipped his hold, relaxed his sustaining grasp even for an instant, you had been gone, and undone for ever. And shall all this mercy, and all this long-suffering, be in vain? Shall you have been rescued so many thousand times as from the jaws of hell, only to drop down under a deeper weight of damnation at the last? Shall not the goodness of God now at length lead you unto repentance?

Again, let us look at the matter in another point of view. You have so many thousand times had to say, "I laid me down and slept; I awaked," &c. ; well, what use have you made of those awakenings, and of the new fields of opportunities of good on which they ushered you? Has the result been the glorifying of God, the good of your own souls, and the blessing of those around you? Has each fresh start in life been a new stage in the race to heaven, a new step on the ladder of glory, honour, and immortality?

Sinners, amid all those awakenings to the light of day, have you ever yet awoke to true repentance, seeking after God? As day after day, through successive years, you passed through the golden gates of the morning, into another stage of your earthly life, have you never bethought you of those far brighter portals by which you might have passed out of darkness into Christ's marvellous light? Oh, how many golden opportunities have you had of being saved, and have you missed them all? How often and often has the heavenly manna fallen on the dewy ground, and are you yet starving for lack of the bread of life? Has it been for the better or for the worse that you have been spared so long? Shall you have to lament with unavailing anguish through all eternity, that so many thousand times you laid yourselves down in peace, and awaked,—awaked only to increase the accumulated sum of your transgressions, and sink yourselves deeper in damnation?

And, believers, to what purposes have your awakenings been? As, day by day, you entered afresh on your Master's vineyard, have you entered ever with simpler faith, with deeper humility, with more entire consecration, with loftier aim and truer heart than before? Has it been with you as with the sun in spring, which seems to arise each day brighter and clearer than the last, till the freshness of the vernal morn passes into the genial glare and full splendour of summer? Oh, as we rise day by day from the tomb of unconscious sleep, should we not leave something of the slough of our old carnal self, something of the dross of our old sins behind, and rise to a purer, holier, diviner life than before? Should we not with a firmer, enterer heart, put off the works of darkness, and put on the armour of light? Surely, with so many separate starts in the heavenly race we should make some progress; with so many stations and stages by the way, we should go from strength to strength, until we appear before God in Zion.

Finally, remember we shall soon lie down in a quieter bed, and sleep a sounder sleep than we have ever yet done, and then there shall be an awakening such as you never knew or dreamt of before! You shall sleep in death, you shall awake to heaven or to hell. Take, then, in conclusion, these two rules with you:—

1. Lie down on your bed each night as if it were your last, with fresh repentance and fresh application to the blood of the Lamb, and fresh commendation of your soul and body to the covenant mercy and fatherly care of God in Christ.

2. Begin each day as if it were your first, with all the ardour of a fresh surrender, and of a warm first love; and remember that the holier the beginning, and the steadier the course of each day on earth, the brighter will be the dawning of that eternal morn when the Sun of righteousness shall arise with healing in his wings, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away.

AGAINST THE STREAM:

The Story of an Heroic Age in England.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE SCHONBERG-COTTA FAMILY."

CHAPTER VI.

AN excess of theology was not the excess prevalent in Abbot's Weir in my childhood. "High" and "low" in those days had reference rather to social than to ecclesiastical elevations; and "broad" was applied to acres or to cloth, not to opinions.

Whatever purposes the laity went to church for, severe critical analysis of my uncle Fyford's or his curate's sermons was not one of them.

I remember not unfrequently hearing strong comments on the extravagance of some people's garments and the imperfections of others', but never any derogatory remarks on the extravagances or defects, or "unsoundness" of any kind, of the various doctrines delivered to us.

Occasionally I recollect my father's gently protesting that the Doctor—my uncle was a D.D.—had "given us that again a little too soon;" but a suspicion that sermons were intended to be transferred beyond the church doors for discussion (or, I am afraid also, for practice), never crossed my mind.

Indeed, all the sects represented in our little town had subsided into a state of mutual tolerance which might have seemed exemplary, had not this tolerance extended to some things which all Christian sects are supposed not to tolerate.

Protests were not the style of the day. "Against the stream" scarcely any one seemed pulling. The effect was a drowsy tranquillity. The various pulpits would as little have ventured to fulminate against the enormities of the slave-trade, the intoxication common at all convivial gatherings, the rioting at the races on our Down, the cruelties of our bull-baitings in the market-place, as against each other.

"Were the feelings of the congregation to be wantonly disregarded?" my uncle Fyford would have pleaded. "Had not one of Madame Glanvil's sons been a slave-holder? and had not the enormities of the slave-trade been greatly exaggerated? Were there any of the most respectable of the congregation who did not occasionally take a glass too much?" (drunkenness was not then a mere low habit of the "lower classes;") "and were the little 'harmless frailties' of the 'most respectable' of the parishioners to be wantonly dragged into the light? And even the 'lower orders,' no doubt, must also have their amusements; poor creatures, their lot of toil was hard enough already without being further embittered by Puritanical austerities. What was the occasional discomfort of a bull, a creature without a soul (and without a literature to celebrate its wrongs); compared with the importance of keeping up a manly, ancient English pastime, a healthy outlet, no doubt, for a certain—brutality,—we will not call it, but—a certain recklessness of blood inherent in the very vigour of the Saxon nature? Was there not even a text for it? Had not St. Paul said (possibly not in precisely the same connection), 'Did God take care for oxen?' And should we be more merciful than St. Paul? No; let such pretences be left to the over-refined sensibilities of a Jean Jacques Rousseau, to a nation which could guillotine its sovereign and weep over a sentimental love-story (especially if the love were misplaced), or to the gloomy asceticism of an austere Puritanism now happily for England extinct."

I used sometimes to suspect from the vehemence with which my uncle defended this custom, he being at once a tranquil and a merciful man, that his conscience was a little uneasy at the sufferings to which, as a devoted entomologist, he exposed the various beetles which were impaled in the glass cases in the vicarage. He could always be roused on the subject of the nervous sensibilities of animals, and I remember a hot debate between him; and my father on Shakspeare's lines—

"The beetle that we tread upon
In corporal sufferance feels a pang as keen
As when a giant dies,—" which my uncle characterized as sentimental and pernicious trash.

I believe he would very gladly have stretched the same conviction to the nervous sensibilities of negroes; but his candour was too much for him; and with regard to the abolition of the slave-trade he had to take up other grounds, such as the general tendency of Africans to make each other miserable in Africa, if let alone, and the antecedent improbability that "Providence" would have created a substance so attractive to white people as sugar, and so impossible for white people to cultivate, and would have prospered our sugar plantations and sugar planters as it had, unless it had meant that sugar should be cultivated by blacks, and consequently that blacks should be brought from Africa.

Thus it happened, in consequence of all these various arguments, or rather in consequence of the prepossessions by which so many of our arguments are predetermined, that Abbot's Weir protested against very little, at that time, either in church or chapel. My uncle did indeed periodically protest against various evils mostly remote or obsolete, such as Popery on the anniversary of the Gunpowder Plot, the heresies of the fourth century on Trinity Sunday, or the schisms of the seventeenth century on the festival of King Charles the Martyr.

But he rejoiced to think that we had fallen on different times, when Englishmen had learned to live in harmony.

Did not he himself indeed exemplify this harmony by a cordial if somewhat condescending intercourse with the Rev. Josiah Rabbidge, the mild successor of the fiery Cromwellian minister who, at the Restoration, had been driven from the pulpit of the parish church?

Mild indeed had that Presbyterian congregation become, in doctrine, in discipline, and in zeal; and difficult would it have been for any one short of a Spanish Inquisitor of the keenest scent to fasten a quarrel on theological grounds on the Rev. Josiah Rabbidge, a gentle and shy little man whose personality was all but overwhelmed under the combined weight of a tall and aggressive wife, the fourteen children with which she had enriched him, the instruction of the boys of the town when they emerged from the mixed Dame's School of Miss Felicity Benbow, and a congregation which it was not easy to keep awake, especially on Sunday afternoons.

Of this last fact I had personal experience, one of our maids being sometimes in the habit of taking us to the chapel on Sunday afternoons, when Uncle Fyford was preaching in his second church in the country; attracted, I believe, not by the theology, but by the greater brevity of the service, and the greater comfort of the cushions.

I do not remember being struck with any great difference, except that Mr. Rabbidge's prayers were shorter, and not in the Prayer-Book, and that he generally used the term "the Deity" where my uncle said "Providence."

I suppose the terms were characteristic in both cases. Mr. Rabbidge's element, when he could escape to it, was literature; my uncle's, nature. To both human life was a subordinate thing. To my uncle, indeed, it was brought near by the household presence of his orphan nephew, Dick Fyford, and three thousand parishioners, who had at intervals to be married, christened, and buried; and to Mr. Rabbidge by the constant inevitable pressure of a wife to be propitiated, fourteen children to be fed, a large portion of the boy-humanity of Abbot's Weir to be taught, and that somnolent congregation to be kept awake. Still to both all this tide of human life was a disturbing accident, from which they escaped when practicable—Mr. Rabbidge to his dearly-prized ancient folios, and my uncle to his beetles. And as must happen, I think, to all from whom the human life around recedes, the Divine seemed to recede also; and on the very pursuits they cared for more than for humanity fell a lifelessness and a barrenness. Nature herself refuses to be more than a scientific catalogue to those who subordinate humanity to her. The thoughts and lives of the men of the past become mere fossils to those who neglect for them the living men and women of the present. If the present does not live for us, how can the past? If our "neighbour" has no personality we reverence and supremely care for, how can nature be to us more than a collection of things? If humanity does not come home to our hearts, how can God? Thus, in a measure, moderated indeed by the merciful duties they were inclined to look on as hindrances, the law of love avenged itself. Nature became to my uncle not so much a living wonder and glory, as a storehouse to furnish glass-cases for insects ; and history to Mr. Rabbidge rather a museum of antiquities than a record of continuous life ; and God not so much the Father and the Saviour as the " Providence " which arranges with marvellous ingenuity the mechanism of the universe, or the " Deity " which dwells afar off in thick darkness at the sources of History.

Of the Incarnation, or of the Cross, they had little need, in such a view of nature and of human life.

It was probably, therefore, rather by an accident of position, that my uncle retained the dogma in his creed, whilst Mr. Rabbidge had glided, unperceived by his congregation, and possibly by himself, into a mild and most unaggressive Arianism.

And yet in all this I speak rather of their theories, and of what these would have made them, than of themselves ; or rather of what they would have made themselves than of what God made them.

My uncle could not, with the best intentions live for beetles, nor Mr. Rabbidge for books.

That rollicking cousin of ours, Dick Fyford, was perpetually plucking him back to the roughest realities of human life in its crudest form of Boy ; to the crudest form of British Boy, a boy with an invincible inclination for the sea.

And to poor Mr. Rabbidge's discipline, no doubt, all Abbot's Weir contributed, from Mrs. Rabbidge to Piers and Dick Fyford, as Mrs. Danescombe did to mine. What fossils, what monsters, or what intolerable bores we should become if we could get rid of the things and persons in our lives we are apt to call hindrances !

The intercourse between my uncle and Mr. Rabbidge was, no doubt, made more amicable by the manifest differences in their persons and positions. There could, my uncle felt, be no danger of a man forgetting the social distinctions caused by the union of Church and State, who had, to begin with, to raise his eyes eighteen inches before they encountered his own, whose rapid, hesitating utterance contrasted characteristically with my uncle's slow, round, sonorous enunciation ; who had to compress sixteen people into the Old Abbey Gate-house, an appendage of the rectory for which my uncle declined to receive any but a peppercorn rent ; to whom the glebe cows and vegetables were as serviceable as to the rector himself.

Not that Mr. Rabbidge's independence of thought was in any way affected by these favours, or by the necessity of accepting them. No sense of favours past or to come would have made him indifferent to the value of a Greek particle, not, I mean, only in the Athanasian Creed, but anywhere : and he had heresies from the Oxford pronunciation of Greek and Latin, in defence of which he would have suffered any persecution, civil or domestic. In this the spirit of his Puritan ancestors survived in him, and not even the eloquent and forcible Mrs. Rabbidge herself could have constrained him to any compliance beyond silence.

But my uncle's sense of ecclesiastical dignity was satisfied by conferring these benefits. It was not necessary by any extra chill and polish of manner further to accentuate a difference already sufficiently marked. And therefore the intercourse was of the friendliest kind, Mr. Rabbidge's fourteen were welcome at all times to enter the rectory garden through the arched door, which connected it with the little garden of the Gate-house, Dick Fyford being after all a far more dangerous inmate than the whole fourteen together.

Meanwhile Mr. Rabbidge found recondite allusions to beetles in the classics, Greek and Latin, and my uncle returned the compliment by referring in his articles in the Sentimental Magazine to quotations suggested by his " learned friend Mr. Rabbidge." One point my uncle never yielded to " separatists." As an orthodox Churchman, and as the minister of a State religion, he could not be expected to concede to the alumnus of a Dissenting academy the title of Reverend. It would, he considered, be to eliminate all significance from the word. " Titles," said my uncle, " are titles ; to accord the right to confer them on any self-elected community was to undermine the citadel of all authority. Persons who began with calling a Presbyterian teacher Reverend, might naturally end with calling their sovereign ' citizen.' Mr. Rabbidge would, he knew, comprehend his motives." And Mr. Rabbidge did, and never protested.

For they had the link said to be stronger than a common love—a common hate ; if so fiery a word may be applied to any sentiment possible in zones so temperate.

They both hated " Jacobinism "—my uncle as a man of property, which any convulsions might endanger, and Mr. Rabbidge as a peaceable and not very valiant citizen, who in any contest was not likely to get the upper hand.

And they both disapproved of Methodism, the only aggressive form of religion they were acquainted with—my uncle condemning it chiefly as having a “Jacobinical” tendency to set up the “lower orders” and to “turn the world upside down,” and Mr. Rabbidge as an enthusiasm likely to set people’s hearts above their heads, and so turn their brains upside down.

And yet, such are the inconsistencies of the best balanced minds, Reuben Pengelly continued every Sunday morning to play the principal bass-viol in the choir gallery, every Sunday evening to take a principal part in the prayers and exhortations in the little Methodist meeting, and every day and night, everywhere when he was wanted, to pray beside the dying beds or broken hearts among my uncle’s parishioners.

And there were instances in which Mr. Rabbidge had even been known to call poor Reuben in, when he had found his somnolent and respectable congregation roused by some dim memory of the old Puritan teaching, for which their forefathers had fought, or by some of the terrible realities of life or death to an unquenchable thirst for something which he did not comprehend, which neither the mild Arianism of the chapel, nor the mild orthodoxy of the church afforded, but which Reuben seemed able to give; some dim orphaned feeling after One who is more than “Providence” and “the Deity,” whom Reuben trusted and called on, in no very classical English, as “the Lord, the living Lord, the Lord who died for us and liveth evermore, the loving, pitying, and providing God and Father of us all.”

My uncle and Mr. Rabbidge both thought it very strange; but human nature, especially in the “lower orders” and in women, is a strange compound; what classical author has not in one phrase or another said so?

Principle, sober principle, the incontrovertible precepts of morality, ought to be enough for rational humanity; but in all the relations of life, and even it seemed in religion, men and women, especially women, could not be satisfied without something more than sober principle to guide their judgment; they must have their hearts stirred, they must laugh for joy, and tremble, and weep—they must have emotion; and as this was so, perhaps it was well that a man, on the whole, so respectful to authority, and so trustworthy as Reuben Pengelly was to be found to supply the material.

Or as Reuben put it:—

“The devil took care there should always be sinners, and the Lord took care there should always be saints beyond the reach of anything but his blessed Gospel and his good Spirit.”

CHAPTER VII.

OPPOSITE our windows, across the Corn Market, was a long, low, rambling old house, once a dower-house of the Glanvil family, but long before my recollection the abode of Miss Felicity Benbow, the guide and the terror of successive generations of juvenile Abbot’s Weir.

Piers and I, sitting on the window-seat of the Stone Parlour, frequently observed the children going in and out of that wide arched door. The house and Miss Felicity herself had a kind of horrible fascination for us. Sooner or later, we knew those solemn portals would open on us, and engulf us also in that unknown world within, where dwelt the dark shadowy powers of discipline and knowledge, represented in the person of Miss Felicity.

Thither every morning and afternoon we saw the children, a little older than ourselves—some, it was rumoured, not older—tend in twos or threes, or one by one, with lingering and sober steps, the small satchel on the shoulder, and occasionally the book too late consulted being anxiously conned over; and thence, in a body at the appointed hour, we saw them issue with softened voices and quiet sobered paces for a few steps beyond the door, as far, at least, as the range of Miss Felicity’s windows, subdued by the restraints of those unknown powers within; and then through the narrow streets, in different directions, we heard the joyous voices sound louder and freer as they distanced the solemn precincts, scattering frolic and music through the town as they separated to their different homes.

There, also, on wet days the various maids of the richer families gathered with hoods and cloaks for their young masters and mistresses. And there every morning and evening the aristocrat of the school, Madam Glanvil’s little orphan granddaughter, was brought and fetched, by the old black butler in livery, on her white pony, a grave, retiring child with dark, pallid complexion and overhanging brows, and with large, wistful brown eyes, which often seemed to meet mine, and always seemed to speak to me from some mysterious new world. The rest of the children thought her proud and supercilious, but those strange, deep eyes with their wonderful occasional lights, not the dewy sparkle of English eyes, but a flash as from tropical skies, always had an irresistible attraction for me. They had a wistful longing in them like Pluto’s eyes, and yet a depth I could not fathom, which always drew me back questioning and guessing. Something between the mysteries of the dumb animal world and the mysteries of the invisible spirit-world was in them. I could not tell why ; but they made me think at once of the dog Pluto, and of my mother.

I could watch no one whilst she was there, and I grew to feel at last that the attraction must be mutual, for she always guided the white pony near our windows, and in a furtive way used, I felt, to watch Piers and me, although she always looked away if our eyes met. Occasionally, moreover, on stormy days, an old black nurse used to appear with two black footmen and a sedan-chair instead of the one negro with the white pony. The black nurse used to apparel the young lady in a mass of orange and scarlet splendours, and enter the chair with her, and then in stately procession Miss Amice Glanvil would be borne away to the fine old manor-house among the woods on the hill, called Court.

Altogether, therefore, Miss Amice was to me like a tropical dream of glow and gloom, such as our temperate zone could not produce ; a creature from a region of splendours and shadows, altogether deeper and richer than ours ; a region where the birds and flowers are scarlet and gold ; a land of earthquakes and hurricanes, and wildernesses of beauty, of magnificence, and tragedy.

For I knew that those black people were slaves, and the gleam of their white teeth, and the flash of their brilliant eyes when they pulled their woolly locks, as they used good-humouredly to do to us children watching at the window, used not to terrify me as it did many of the children in the town, nor to amuse me, but to make me feel inclined to cry. They always made me think of Pluto when he was chained up in the kennel and fawned and whined on us. Only Pluto was at home, and they were not ; and Pluto was a dog, and they were not ; which made all the difference, I thought, for him and for them. They were called also by the classical names which in France and in Italy have retained their dignity, but in England were only given in a sort of kindly contempt or facetious pity to dogs and to negroes. I had heard the black woman call them Cato and Cæsar ; and they called her Chloe.

Moreover we had, through Reuben Pengelly, an acquaintance with Chloe's history, which gave us a glimpse into the tragedy which underlay the splendours of Amice Glanvil's life.

Chloe had a whole woman's world of her own, in her own country in Africa, not dead, living and needing her, but buried to her irrevocably and for ever.

She used to come now and then, when she was allowed, to Reuben's prayer-meetings, and sometimes rather to confuse him by the fervency of her Amens, and of her shrill quavering singing, in the refrains of the hymns. One evening she still further bewildered the kindly man by breaking out suddenly in a passion of sobs.

Reuben told us the story on the next Sunday, in the silent Foundry Yard.

"I couldn't for the life of me tell why," he said, he having no oratorical vanity to explain such emotion. "I was only talking to the folks quite plain and quiet how the blessed Lord sate weary by the well, and asked the poor woman for a drink from her pitcher, and how she was slow to give it Him. Chloe stayed after the rest had gone, still rocking herself to and fro, as if she were rocking a baby, hiding her face, and sobbing fit to break her heart. So I went up to her soft and quiet, not to fluster her, and I said, 'The Lord has touched thee, poor dear soul. Cheer up. He wounds and He can bind up.' 'Never, Massa Reuben, never,' said she (poor soul, she always calls me Massa, she knows no better). 'Never bind up. He knows better than to try. Let the wounds bleed. No other way.' And then, in their sudden way, like children, she looked up and showed all her white teeth, and smiled, and downright laughed. It was more than a man could make out. 'It was all along of that pitcher and that well,' said she. And then she told how she had gone to the well one evening, years ago, by her hut, away in Africa, with her pitcher, to fetch water for her children, with her baby in her arms. The children lay sick with fever. But at the well the slave-hunters found her, gagged her, bound her, forced her away to the coast, and squeezed her down with hundreds of others into the slave-ship. She heard the sick children, day and night, moaning—moaning for her. Many of the poor creatures with her refused to eat, and many died ; but she had the baby, and tried to live. And as she went on telling she cried again, and then she smiled again. 'Never mind me, Massa Reuben,' said she ; 'it was only that pitcher. Seemed to me all the place, and all the years melted away. I was at home again at that well again with the pitcher, and instead of the slave-hunters, the good Lord Himself stood there, and said, 'Give me to drink.' And she seemed to answer Him her pitcher was gone, all was gone, she had nothing to draw with, and there was nothing to draw. And He said, all smiling, it was not the water He wanted, but just herself. 'Just me,' said she, 'sitting there weary, just as He did once, poor old Chloe, that He died for; me and my bit of love.' And she saw the hands and the feet all torn and bleeding, worse than dust on them that a woman's tears might wash away, blood on them to wash away her sins, and she seemed just to take her heart, as it was all dry and empty, and give it Him. 'And He looked as glad,' said she, 'as a thirsty man for a drink of water. All for me, Massa Reuben, all because He cared to be loved by me!' And then Reuben said, 'I cried too, just as she did, poor soul! The baby died just as the voyage was over, and then when they came on shore Squire Glanvil bought her for a nurse to Miss Amice. His wife had just died at her birth, and the poor fool loves Miss Amice like her own. It's wonderful," concluded Reuben, "what them poor creatures will cling to and catch at, just for anything to love, though for the matter of that, Priscy's no better. The women are like enough all the world over, poor souls. God bless them!"

Miss Felicity used sometimes to descend to the door with the little lady, and watch her across the market-place, which gave us ample opportunity of studying that physiognomy so important to our future fate.

She was a tall and rather a majestic woman, with a stiff erect carriage (a perpetual monition to all lounging little boys and girls), keen black eyes, high Roman features, and a severe mouth resolutely closed, as if her life had been a battle with difficulties harder to conquer than the little mischievous elves who could never evade her penetrating eyes, or the terrible instrument of justice they guided.

Yet it was not a face which repelled me, or made me feel afraid. I felt rather drawn towards her, as a kind of tutelary Athena; not very close, not exactly as a child to her heart, but as a subject to her feet, with a kind of confidence of justice in those steady eyes, and those stern grave lips. There was no fretfulness in the lines of the furrowed brow, or in the curve of the mouth; no uncertainty of temper in the large keen eyes. If she had carried the Ægis, I do not think I should have had any fear of her petrifying the wrong people by turning it on them.

There were two other inhabitants of that old mansion besides Miss Felicity.

Every fine morning in summer, before people were up, and every fine evening in winter as it began to grow dusk, from that arched door, where poured in and out every day the joyous tide of young life, came forth two very different figures, one the stately form of Miss Felicity, and the other a man tall as herself, but bowed and stooping, moving with uncertain and uneven gait, and leaning on Miss Felicity's arm. They crept away into the country by the least steep of the three roads which led out of the town, and in about an hour re-entered the old house and disappeared, and the stooping tall man's figure was seen no more till the next day. It was believed they went always as far as a certain ancient well by the roadside, called the Benit or Blessed Well; for they were often seen resting on the stone bench beside it, and had never been found farther on.

It was curious how people respected the mystery Miss Felicity chose to consider thrown around that ruined life. Keen as her perceptions were, sharp and definite her words on every other subject, around him she gathered a veil of fond excuses and illusions, so thin that all the town saw through it, and yet all the town recognised it for her sake.

To us children indeed something of the mystery really existed, taking the form of a half-concealing, half-glorifying mist which surrounded Miss Felicity with a halo, and through which the tall, bent form loomed, at once a tower and a beacon, like a ruined church set on one of the heights along our coasts, once meant to be a sacred shrine, but now, the sacredness shattered out of it, surviving only as a warning against wreck.

Lieutenant Benbow had been in the army, we knew, and had been a fine handsome man, and had grown suddenly old in middle life, not altogether by misfortune, but by something sadder, which hung like a sword of Damocles over the festival of life for any of us to whom life was only feasting.

To me especially those two had a terrible yet tender interest.

Lieutenant Benbow had been to Miss Felicity what Piers was to me. She had loved him, delighted in him, lived for him after the death of her father. (Happily for herself the mother had died early.) She had loved him with the kind of blind love which some think the truest and most womanly. To me the blindness always seems to come not from the love, but from the little alloy of pride and selfishness in the love which so far makes it false. It is possible so to love another as ourselves, that the very love comes to partake of the nature of self-love, exaggerating, concealing, untrue, unjust, falsely excusing, falsely gilding. And yet, not quite. The little grain of true love at the bottom of the most selfish affection, makes it by that grain at least better than mere selfishness. The miser who half starves his children in hoarding for them has surely in his hoard something a degree more sacred than there can be in that of the miser who hoards for himself alone. And with Miss Felicity that grain of true love was large, and for herself at least, fruitful; fruitful at least in sacrifice.

Lieutenant Benbow had followed his father's profession. Their means were not large; but her delight had been to have his appointments as choice and abundant as those of the richest. And the idol had accepted the homage, repaid it even by such small and symbolical acknowledgments as can be expected from duly incensed idols.

She knew he had at least one fatal habit. In a day when all gentlemen drank more than was good for them, he drank more than most, and unfortunately could stand less.

Once only Miss Felicity's eyes were all but opened. He persuaded a lovely young Quaker girl to elope with him and to marry him.

Miss Felicity did not wonder at the Quaker maiden's infatuation; but she did wonder at her brother's. The Quaker maiden's father was a tanner, and, true daughter of a general and of the Church, granddaughter of a bishop, Miss Felicity did not enjoy having to double her libations and incense in honour, not of her Adonis of a brother, but of his separatist wife, a person of "low trading origin who had enticed away his affections." To double her offerings and lose even the little return they had previously won was almost too much to bear.

The thirteen years of the lieutenant's married life were those, therefore, in which Miss Felicity's adoration was feeblest.

In thirteen years the lieutenant succeeded in breaking his wife's heart, and ruining his own health. He returned to his sister a widower with one little girl, his constitution and his fortunes alike wrecked, having some time before been obliged to leave the army, partially paralyzed, with a child's helplessness, and a spoilt child's imperiousness and irritability, to be a burden for the rest of his life on the woman he had scarcely noticed while he had another to worship him. But he returned; and that to Miss Felicity was everything. She blotted the tanner's daughter out of her memory, took the tanner's granddaughter to her heart, accepted her idol again, set it on its old pedestal, with all the strength of her strong will and strong affections, and with a kind of melancholy pleasure in the certainty that if her "Bel bowed down and her Nebo stooped, and were a burden to the weary beast," no one would dispute that burden with her any more.

So she toiled on, and bore her burden, and adored it, her old beautiful god-image, which "cruel circumstances," she said to herself, "and the excess of his own fascinations" had shattered, and crowned the old idol with a crown woven out of all the loss and all the possibilities, of all it had been, and of all it might have been.

Year by year she bought the finest cloth for his coats, and day by day she bought the best dainties for his palate, and seated him in the one easy-chair in the sunniest nook of the window in summer, and the warmest corner of the fireside in winter; and when he condescended to that milder degree of grumbling which was his form of thanksgiving, she rejoiced in the character which would have been so lovely but for "the selfish world and the ruthless circumstances which had made him what he was."

It was a provoking ritual to observe from outside, especially to me, not being a worshipper of the lieutenant, and having a reverence little short of worship for the daughter, little Miss Loveday, who was compelled to share in the sacrificial rites.

Of course Miss Felicity had a right to sacrifice herself; but who could have had a right to take all individual hope and pleasure out of that gentle, lovely patient woman's life with all her intellectual and spiritual power, and subordinate her entirely to propping up the ruins of what had never been better than a well-grown animal?

For Miss Loveday was the nearest approach to a saint I knew; and I thank God I had the grace to know it whilst she was amongst us. It is among the saddest of our irrevocable losses when we find out for the first time that some of the holy ones of God have been beside us, for us to consult, learn of, speak to, listen to, only when they have gone from us to be with the goodly company, who are indeed not far from us, but are just beyond speaking distance, out of reach for the time of voice and sight.

My father helped me to the recognition. Miss Loveday had been a friend of my own mother's, and he had the greatest reverence and love for her.

He used to say the poet Cowper must have seen her in spirit when he wrote the lines—

"Artist, attend, your brushes and your paint—
Produce them; take a chair, now draw a saint.
Oh, sorrowful and sad! The streaming tears
Channel her cheeks—a Niobe appears.
Is this a saint?—throw tints and all away,
True piety is cheerful as the day.—
Will weep, indeed, and heave a pitying groan
For others' woes, but smiles upon her own."

Certainly Loveday Benbow "smiled upon her own" woes with a smile so real and bright, that the woes and the saintliness, the burden and the strength which bore it, might easily have been hidden from a careless eye. As to the pitying groan for others' woes, not only could that be relied on for any woes, from the breaking of a child's doll to the breaking of a maiden's heart, but, what is rarer for one whose life is passed in the shadows, she had a smile true and heart-warming as a sunbeam for others' joys, from a child's holiday to a maiden's happiness in being loved, or a mother's joy in loving.

She was a little deaf, and had that sweet inquiring wistfulness in her grey eyes which belongs often to deaf or dumb creatures, human or canine; but so sweet and ready was her sympathy, and so wise her counsel, that she was the natural depository of half the love-confidences in the place; the difficulty and danger of shouting such delicate experiences being nothing to the recompense in the quickness of her comprehension and the fulness of her response.

Clever, or intellectual, were words you would no more have thought of applying to her than to an archangel; and with her heart and brain were so blended, that I have sometimes wondered whether it was that her wit was originally keener than other people's, or that it was sharpened by singleness of purpose; whether it was original force of thought and imagination that made her comprehend every character quickly, or love that quickened thought and imagination into something as unerring as instinct.

My stepmother's insight into character was that of a satirist or of a detective keen to scent out a defect. Miss Felicity's was that of an inspector of the human species, impartial, penetrating, severe but just. Miss Loveday's insight was that of a physician, as keen and as just as either, but deeper, reaching beyond symptoms to causes, to the springs where the disease can be touched and healed.

Sometimes, indeed, she would reproach herself with this quick penetration through disguises and excuses, as if it were not as necessary to the helpers of humanity as to its critics to see truly.

But it is true that the heightening of any one power of nature requires the heightening of every other power to avoid deformity; the growth of every spiritual, as well as every intellectual gift, demands the growth of every other to preserve harmony.

The very truth of Miss Loveday's character which made her perceptions so true would have made her a keener detective than my stepmother, and a severer judge than Miss Felicity, if love had not overwhelmed the bitter in the sweet, and made the justice glow into pity through a deeper faith and a larger hope in God and man.

She always had something of the dove in my eyes, as Miss Felicity had much of the eagle, and in my darker moments my stepmother not a little of the raven. Doves need sight as keen to defend their brood as eagles to descry their prey. And Miss Loveday's brood was all the human creatures that had need of her. Partly, no doubt, this dove-like grace that encircled her was assisted by her voice, which, as with many deaf people, had a peculiar under-toned softness, like cooings under thick summer leaves; and partly by her dress, which was chiefly replenished from her mother's Quaker wardrobe, in which the prosaic drab was ignored, and the poetical dove-colour and white predominated.

Miss Loveday's dress was what has always seemed to me the loveliest and most becoming of any to middle-aged and elderly women. It retained the Quaker quietness and the delicious Quaker freshness, without the Quaker peculiarities; and her manner was just like her dress. She is fondly enveloped to my memory in a soft grey and white cloud of clothing, which, when I try to analyze it, resolves itself into the whitest of caps, framing her pale sweet face, the neatest of white muslin neckerchiefs folded over her bosom, and the softest of unrustling grey woollen drapery falling in sweeping easy folds around her. Not one sudden, startling, dazzling thing about her in dress, or manner, or voice, not the rustle of silk, or the glitter of a jewel; except the irrepressible occasional twinkle of her kind eyes, and the occasional merry ring which was like an audible twinkle in her soft voice and her laugh.

She was just the opposite (I do not mean the contrary) of Amice Glanvil, who was all mystery and surprise.

The sorrows on which Miss Loveday smiled so radiantly were not sentimental. From her childhood she had been under the yoke unimaginable, unavoidable, of pain; the yoke which in some respects presses closer on the immortal spirit, and cuts deeper into it than any other, and therefore can in some respects mould it to a more delicate perfection, and furrow it for larger harvests.

No one in Abbot's Weir had been able to fathom the cause.

We had two doctors in Abbot's Weir. One, Dr. Kenton, was of a sanguine temperament, attributed all ailments to debility, and relied for cure chiefly on "nature" and port wine.

The other, Dr. Looseleigh, was of a melancholic disposition, had a strong faith in the depravity of the human constitution, attributed ailments to excess, and hoped for relief, as far as he hoped at all, from bleeding, blistering, and the lowering system in general.

Both medical gentlemen had patients who recovered, and patients who died. But in Abbot's Weir, although theological controversy was mild, the same could not be said of medical. Each generation, whatever its theological proclivities, desires to live as long as it can; debates on what man or system can enable it to live longest, are naturally therefore not liable to "periods of lukewarmness or declension."

The partisans of Mr. Kenton said that those patients of Mr. Looseleigh who died were killed, actually slain, by his remedies; and those who recovered, recovered by the force of nature.

The partisans of Mr. Looseleigh said that the patients of Dr. Kenton who recovered struggled through by miracle or the vigour of an exceptional constitution, and that those who died, perished the victims of neglect, sheer neglect, and faithless contempt of means.

Both systems had been tried on Miss Loveday, but neither successfully. She had been blistered and bled in childhood by Mr. Looseleigh into all but atrophy. She had been "built up" by Dr. Kenton and Miss Felicity into a fever. The only part of either system which she declined was the port wine or brandy. This she resolutely refused. She had promised her mother never to touch either. Dr. Kenton therefore had the advantage in the controversy, in which Miss Loveday's case was a standing weapon. If she could have been induced to break that absurd promise, port wine and nature might have overcome Dr. Looseleigh and disease, and the controversy might have been settled for ever, at least so far as facts can settle controversies. As to those deeper roots in the depth of our own consciousness, whence my father and other sceptical neutrals asserted both systems to arise, those, of course, nothing so superficial as facts and phenomena could have reached.

However, from whatever cause, thus it came to pass that Miss Loveday's yoke was not broken, and she had to suffer and conquer to the end.

Miss Felicity nevertheless, with whom permanent neutrality was an impossible state of existence, who found it necessary, and therefore practicable, to make up her mind quite decidedly about everything, remained faithful to Dr. Kenton and the port-wine "system," influenced partly, it was believed, by the necessity of seeing some root of good in the evil tendency which had sapped her brother's existence.

It was also believed that the weekly visits which Dr. Kenton continued to pay had, on his part at least, a tenderer significance than Miss Felicity chose to acknowledge. There had been days when the genial doctor had paid Miss Felicity the most marked attentions; and during the years when her brother's marriage had separated her from the one ceaseless object of her devotion, Abbot's Weir had believed that it detected a gradual softening of the tutelary Athena manner towards him. It was considered that the prospect of a pleasant home, a life without care, and an affection which manifested itself in the flattering form of respecting her judgment enough to carry on continual controversies with her, were beginning to melt the impenetrable heart of Miss Felicity, and that she would soon consent to be an illustrious case in proof of the success of the building-up system.

But her sister-in-law died, the lieutenant became a helpless invalid, and returned to receive once more his sister's homage; and from that moment Dr. Kenton's hopes were blighted.

Miss Felicity returned to her old life-long rôle of priestess and amazon, adoration at her old shrine, and unflinching conflict with infidels and with circumstances for its sake. And Dr. Kenton, after some vain remonstrances, and some years of comparative estrangement, came back, partly by means of his medical care of Miss Loveday, to his old position of admiration and contention; he ceased to sigh, but never ceased to think it worth while to endeavour to put Miss Felicity right on the various points on which they differed; and to the end the stately, brave old gentlewoman had some one who continued to see her with the light of youth on her, and to maintain that she was the finest woman in Abbot's Weir, and had more brains and more spirit than all the men of the town put together.

CHAPTER VIII.

It was about two years after my father's second marriage that Piers and I were called on to rejoice in the arrival of a step-brother.

Then Mrs. Danescombe's heart awoke. It was as if her whole nature, pent up for forty years, burst forth in that late passion of maternal love.

I believe she tried hard to be just to us all. I believe she tried hard to see what spots there might be in her boy's character. But it was impossible. The rest of the world she continued to see through the same cold, clear, cloudy, frosty winter daylight in which she had hitherto lived. Around this child glowed and palpitated ceaselessly a flood of tropical sunlight. Faults, of course, her Francis had, her judgment admitted he was human, and her views of humanity in general were unchanged, but with him the deepest shadows glowed with reflected light, like the golden shadows of some rich Venetian picture.

The very nature of the faults he had, moreover, helped to dim her perceptions. He had, from childhood, no vehement, impetuous outbursts of indignation like those which I was liable to; no earnest, entire absorption of his whole being with the subject that interested him, to the forgetfulness of all besides, such as characterized Piers. His character had an external smoothness about it which made the world go smoothly with him. His characteristic motion was gliding: so easy and noiseless was this movement that it was only now and then it struck you that he always contrived to glide into the best place, and into the possession of the pleasantest things to be attained. We children, of course, who thus lost the pleasantest things and places, early perceived it; but to our elders it was scarcely ever apparent. It was always we who created the final disturbance; and what can any government do when there is a riot but punish the rioters, deferring the investigation as to who is in the wrong to a time when the riot and its causes have ceased to be of moment?

Francis was found in tranquil possession of the coveted delights, toy or picture-book, or place in the game; possession is nine points of the law; tranquillity the desideratum of all governments in the world; why could we not have left our little brother alone?

Thus we were, who were continually being thus tranquilly robbed and wronged, the perpetual plaintiffs, and the world has no mercy on perpetual plaintiffs. Francis, "poor little darling," as his mother truly said, "was never heard to raise his sweet little voice," whilst I at least was in one continual wail and clamour.

Even our father often gave the verdict against us. "The world was large," he would say, "and Francis was little; why did we just want the one thing the poor little fellow had set his heart on, and was so peaceably enjoying?"

In vain we pleaded rights which we knew to be unquestionable; what can be more tiresome, or seem more selfish, than to be always pleading one's rights, especially against what is apparently the weaker party?

"Why were we always shrieking about our rights? Brothers and sisters should not think about rights. They should be always ready to 'give up' to each other, and to do as they would be done by."

So, between my stepmother's fondness, my father's generosity, and interpretations of the Sermon on the Mount which drove me wild with the impossibility of combating them, and the certainty of their being wrong, the tyranny of our little brother was established.

This was a state of things, however, that could not long continue unbroken.

At length my stepmother once more proposed that Piers and I should be sent to Miss Felicity's school.

My father had long opposed this, having certain theories of education, I think partly derived from Rousseau, not at all in harmony with Miss Felicity's.

He wished that education should be restored to what he considered its true meaning, of leading out the faculties, should be not so much a putting in as calling out, should be a development of growth from within, not the fitting on of an iron frame to contract and cramp growth from without. Theories which are now worn threadbare and colourless with discussion or not, were then fresh and full of bloom. And all such ideas Miss Felicity considered altogether chimerical and Utopian.

"Calling out faculties?" said she. "The only faculty she knew that could always be sure of coming at the call, was the faculty of mischief. No putting in? What then was the good of learning to read at all? She supposed Piers and I would not develop out of ourselves even the multiplication table, unless it was put into us, still less the history of the Greeks and Romans, or the gods and heroes. Not that she saw much use in history," she would somewhat cynically admit. "What was there in it but wise men's words and foolish men's deeds? things which, if they had happened in a neighbour's house instead of in palaces, you would have taken care the children did not hear. But the Greeks and Romans, and the gods and heroes, and the multiplication table, as the world was, had to be learned, and Mr. Danescombe might wait some time for a new world or for a generation of children who came into it with their little minds filled already."

My poor father had certainly seen considerable faculty for not getting on developed in Piers and me since our little brother's arrival, and accordingly at last he waived his theory, and abandoned us to Miss Felicity and the rote system. To us the school meant simply Miss Felicity, and a very awful personality we considered her. My father was in the second stage of human progress, the age of philosophical system and theory; whilst Miss Felicity had advanced to the third, contemptuously ignoring systems and philosophies, and recognising nothing but facts and phenomena; and Piers and I remained in the earliest, seeing nothing but persons and personifications.

From the beginning, I think, although most kindly disposed towards us, Miss Felicity nevertheless regarded us as rather dangerous little persons, brought up in no one knows what heretical persuasions concerning the rights and the wrongs of man.

The years of our school-life were among the most reactionary years England ever saw.

Not an abuse but was rooted in its place, and not a harvest of reform but was stunted and nipped by the French Reign of Terror.

Old Tories like Miss Felicity glorified their narrowest political prejudices into articles of the Creed, when the Revolution and his own personal patience had consecrated the French king into a martyr. Benevolent and tranquil men of progress like my father had to defend themselves as if they had been Jacobins. Mild Whigs like Dr. Kenton, who looked for the general improvement of the world on the same sanguine and genial principles on which he looked for the general recovery of his patients, simply turned a little round the other way, and became for the moment mild Tories.

"What do you say now, Dr. Kenton?" Miss Felicity would triumphantly demand, "to your Reformers and Jacobins?"

"I say, Miss Felicity," he would reply, "what I always said. Above all things no convulsions, no violence to the constitution.

If nature cannot throw off the ailment for herself, we must assist her a little, Miss Felicity, gently assist her. That is what I mean by reform. If our assistance fails, we must let her alone and wait, Miss Felicity, tranquilly wait."

Mild Tories, on the other hand, like my uncle Fyford and Mr. Rabbidge, those who were Conservative from fear, became rabid Tories, also from fear. They would have established a Reign of Terror of their own on behalf of our glorious constitution, would "keep the mob down, sir," said my uncle to my father, "by fire and sword, if necessary by the gibbet, or the—"

"The stake," suggested my father drily.

My uncle scarcely heeded the interruption. "Are we to have our houses burnt about our ears," he said, "by a set of fanatics calling themselves philanthropists and reformers?"

And it was through this tempest of prejudice and reaction that the noble band of religious men who had set their hearts on abolishing the great wrong of the African slave-trade, steadfastly went on with the conflict, and ten times brought in the measure ten times defeated in a House of Commons, excited to a fury of reaction, elected by a nation goaded to a contempt of all progress by the fury and madness of the three years' terrible reaction against centuries of oppression in France.

It was, no doubt, this state of things, of course at the time unknown to us, which brought me into the two difficulties which now recur to my mind.

One sunny Sunday afternoon Piers and I were sitting on the step of our arbour on the highest terrace of the garden. He was playing with Pluto and I was reading intently with my elbows on my knees, so intently, that I did not see my father and my stepmother with little Francis, my uncle Fyford, and Dick approaching up the steep slope until they were close at hand.

I was especially absorbed with the book because I ignorantly thought it was about to throw some light on the "Duty to our Neighbour," and the Sermon on the Mount, especially as connected with my stepmother and Francis, which might bring the Christian code within reach of my practice. There were passages in it about "natural rights," about the "great sin being making each other unhappy," which I thought excellent; also a passage asserting that "the Duty of Man is not a wilderness of turnpike-gates between us and our Maker, through which we pass by ticket from one to the other, but plain and simple, consisting in our duty to God as His by birth and family, and in doing what we would be done by," which I thought clearer than the Catechism, at least with my stepmother's commentary.

My uncle startled me by an approving pat on the head.

"Well done, little maid! Quite a little Lady Jane Grey! Is it Plato, or 'The Whole Duty of Man?'"

"It is not so much about our duties as about our rights," I said. "I found it in the Summer Parlour." And I gave the volume confidently into his hands.

He started as if he had been stung, dashed it from him to the ground, and ground his heel into it as if it had been a viper.

"Piers Danescombe, I could not have expected this even of toleration like yours: Tom Paine's 'Rights of Man'—such poison in the hands of this poor innocent babe!"

"Indeed, Uncle Fyford," I said, thinking that I had in some way compromised my father, "it is a Sunday book. It is not a story book. The gentleman who wrote it seems to dislike the Bastille and slavery as much as father, and war as much as Miss Loveday. And he speaks about our Father in heaven, Uncle Fyford. Indeed it is a Sunday book."

"Listen to the poor innocent!" said Uncle Fyford. "It is enough to pierce one's heart."

"Bride, my darling," said my father, in his dry quiet way, "Tom Paine's 'Rights of Man' is not exactly the book for you. If I had had any idea that your tastes lay in that direction, I would have labelled it, 'Not good for little girls.' But, Richard," he continued, turning to my uncle, "if wise men would take the good in that book and use it, they would do more to neutralise the harm in it than by railing at it in a mass for ever."

"Good in Tom Paine!" said my uncle, roused beyond his usual decorum. "I am sick of your 'good in everything.' I believe you would find good in the devil."

"There might have been! you know," said my father, very gravely. His simple quiet words startled me like a flash of lightning. They made me feel that he felt the existence of the devil to be a very real and sorrowful fact, instead of the half ridiculous, half terrible, mythical legend handed down to us in the nursery.

Mrs. Danescombe intervened.

"That is precisely what I am always saying to Mr. Danescombe, Dr. Fyford," she said.

"Good in everything there may be, though I confess I have not found it, and I believe it is not the Bible, but only Shakspeare that asserts it. But evil in everything most certainly there is, at least in every person. And I can never see we remove it by blinding our eyes to it."

"Well, Euphrasia," said my father, "you look for the evil and I for the good; so between us, I hope we shall strike the balance. Only, if we both reach the better world, you will be so unfortunate as to have lost your occupation, while mine can continue for ever."

"Wait till you are there, Piers," rejoined my uncle. "At all events, you won't find Tom Paine's 'Rights of Man' there."

"No," replied my father, "the book will have done its work, good and evil, here below."

"Evil enough," said my uncle; "good, only as Satan did good to Job by landing him, with his potsherd, among the ashes."

My investigations into the "natural rights" of man were, however, checked: a check the less painful to me because even Mr. Paine did not give me any light on the natural "rights of women" or of little girls. I was sent back to the Ten Commandments and to the Duty to my Neighbours.

The only result that remained from my inopportune pursuit of knowledge was the rare felicity of a little direct religious lesson from my father.

That evening he took me on his knee in the Oak Parlour. Piers had gone to bed, and my stepmother was putting Francis to sleep, so that we were alone. And above us was that picture of my mother, present to the consciousness of us both.

"Bride, my darling," he said, "Duties are better things for us to think about than Rights."

"If other people would only think about rights a little, father," I ventured to murmur, "then it would be very nice to have nothing to think about but our duties. But they don't. They only think about their own rights, and our duties."

"Very true, Bride," he said. "They don't, and they won't. And that is the way there is so much troublesome history for you and me to learn. But you know some one must begin. Suppose you and I begin at the other end. Our own duties, and other people's rights. You will find much more good come of it in the end."

Then, the only time I can remember, he led me to my mother's picture, and stood before it, with his hand on my shoulder.

"That was what she did, my child. God gave her one of his lambs to keep, and she kept it well as long as she was here. God help me to keep it for Him and for her better than I have."

"Oh, father, you can't keep us better," I said.

That lesson was brief, but it accomplished its end. It brought me back to my duties, instead of to his and to my stepmother's.

It was not very long after this that Piers and I fell into another difficulty, at Miss Felicity's school.

I remember this with especial distinctness, because it was the beginning of Piers and my entering into closer relations with Amice Glanvil and sweet bright Claire Angélique des Ormes.

A week before, the three spare rooms in Miss Felicity's house had been engaged and occupied by three foreigners, refugees from France, Madame la Marquise des Ormes, her little daughter Claire Angélique, and Léontine, a vivacious maid, who governed and protected them both, and would fain have governed Miss Felicity, and all Abbot's Weir, had this been possible to any Frenchwoman.

Madame had only been seen, a slight fragile lady, leaning rather feebly on the arm of Léontine, and greeting Miss Felicity as she entered the arched door with such a courtly reverence as Abbot's Weir had not previously dreamed of.

Léontine had been seen and heard abundantly, making her presence felt like a wind through house and town. Little Claire had only been heard prattling in a sweet voice to her mother in the parlour inside the schoolroom until that momentous afternoon when she appeared under Miss Felicity's wing, but not under her rod, as a kind of amateur scholar.

It was an August afternoon, very sultry. The room was long and low: Miss Felicity was fettered by no government regulations as to cubic feet of air and space. Of space there was enough; of air certainly not enough to keep forty children awake. Miss Felicity would on no account have exposed her lessons to the intrusion of the street by opening the window.

Want of ozone, therefore, was telling powerfully on the intellects of the pupils, and on the temper of the mistress. The flies were drowsily buzzing now and then against the panes, the black cat sleepily purring on the window-seat, too lazy even to wink at my stepmother's cat on the opposite window. Many of the children out of reach of the rod had yielded to sleep, and the rest were hopelessly struggling against it, when the question came in a sharp voice from Miss Felicity—

"Bridget Danescombe, who were the heroes?"

I must have been half asleep myself, for I remember instantly sitting up trying to look especially wide awake, as is the wont with persons so surprised, and responding desperately to the last word which I had caught.

"Father says there are some in France, Miss Felicity. He said so last night. They pulled down a wicked place called the Bastille."

Miss Felicity's colour rose. I think she did not know whether I said it in simplicity or in malice.

"Bridget Danescombe," she repeated, slightly rapping my fingers to recall my attention, "think what you are saying. Who were the heroes?"

"And some, father said, there are in England," I continued, divided between anxiety to sustain myself by that infallible judgment and dread of the well-known little ebony ruler. "They want to pull down the slave-trade and the impressment—he said impressment. These are our Bastilles. I know he said they were heroes. And the only name I remember is Granville Sharpe."

"Silly child, dreaming as usual," said Miss Felicity, diplomatically passing by the perilous answer, and admonishing me by a severe rap on my knuckles. "I pass to your brother—two years your younger and ten years your better. Piers Danescombe, who were the heroes?"

Whatever could have been thought of the spirit of my answer, there could have been no doubt as to that which rang through the tones of Piers. His was a response, not to Miss Felicity's question, but to her rap on my fingers.

"Sister Bride is right, Miss Felicity," he said. "Father did say so, only last night."

By this time the little community was thoroughly aroused, with true British instinct scenting the battle from afar.

"Yes, indeed, Miss Felicity," I ventured, "father said impressing seamen and trading in slaves was as bad as shutting people up in the Bastille, and Mr. Granville Sharpe was a hero for trying to stop it. I remember quite well that was the hero's name, and also that he wants to stop people having slaves, because that is wicked."

I had rushed on impetuously, forgetful of all but the purpose in hand, when, looking up, I saw Amice Glanvil's great mysterious eyes fixed fully on me, not in anger, but with a look of grave wonder and questioning.

She looked a shade more pallid than usual, but I flushed crimson. I remembered the black nurse and the negro footmen, and I felt so sorry I should have said anything to grieve my princess.

But I had not much time for reflection. For then out and spoke Dick Fyford.

"Miss Felicity, if Bride Danescombe were not a girl, so that no one can do anything to her, she would not dare. My own uncle is a sea captain, and I am going to sea, and he says people who cry out against impressment are traitors and fools. I heard him. The king's navy could not be kept up without, and then the French would come and kill the king and burn up London, and Abbot's Weir, and all of us."

The conflict was becoming perilous. Was Miss Felicity's class of mythology—extra—to prepare the more aristocratic classes for Mr. Rabbidge, and to distinguish them from the common herd, to end in this?

Had not Mrs. Rabbidge, always a little too eagerly alive to the growth of Miss Felicity's pupils into her husband's, denounced the mythology as a poaching on his demesnes? And had not Mr. Rabbidge himself mildly admitted that Miss Felicity was meddling with matters too high for her?

And was it to be said that such frightful Jacobinism had been uttered in her presence unavenged?

The case was perplexing. On the score of politics it could not be taken up. Piers and I had appealed to Cæsar in the person of our father, and to Miss Felicity paternal authority was a foundation of all other authority, by no means to be lightly interfered with.

She therefore recurred to history, and wisely chose to treat me as a dunce rather than as a heretic.

"Bridget Danescombe knows better," she asserted. "The heroes lived in Greece. They come after the heathen gods. There were Hercules and Perseus,—and others," said Miss Felicity, not having a book, and judiciously becoming vague. "They fought with dragons. And the heroes and the dragons have all been dead and gone thousands of years. Bridget Danescombe, I am sorry; but I must put the foolscap on you, and you must sit on that stool in the middle of the school. Take this book and learn the names of the heroes. When you have learned them you may come down."

And so saying she took off my little mob-cap, put on the terrible cone of brown paper, and made me climb on the tall stool. Thus were the germs of Jacobinism crushed; and thus was I set up as a beacon to juvenile Abbot's Weir. Piers came and stood beside me, his eyes flashing and his face crimson, in defiance of authority. Wisely Miss Felicity took no notice. Her government was too strong for her to delight in petty irritating revenges.

I was too proud to cry, and too bewildered by anger and shame to learn. And yet by some strange instinct of justice, I made a distinction between my stepmother and Miss Felicity.

My stepmother had never rapped my knuckles or set me on a stool, or punished me in any way. And yet her cold "Bridget!" hurt me more than Miss Felicity's ruler, or even her fool's-cap, terrible as that was.

I felt that Miss Felicity in some unaccountable way had misunderstood my words. I did not feel that she misunderstood and misjudged me. And after a little while, getting used to my position, I found myself endeavouring to account, not for my conduct, (in this instance I had the great and unusual happiness of a clear conscience), but for Miss Felicity's, and to justify her.

This, of course, did not help me to learn my "heroes," but it quieted my mind, and the book served as a veil as I held it before my face.

And so the minutes passed on, until the bell rang for the school to close.

We always finished in the morning with the grace before meals, and in the evening with a verse of evening prayer.

For this purpose Miss Felicity told me to come down from my elevation.

To this instant my heart beats faster as I think how that sweet little French girl Claire, not of course being in the awe of our punishments and rules of ordinary scholars, glided forward to me before any one could stop her, with her easy French grace, and helped me down, and kissed my cheek, her first kiss, with the fool's-cap still on, and led me to Miss Felicity, and asked her in sweet broken English to take the cap off, which Miss Felicity very kindly and rather nervously did. And then Claire herself, with her lissom fingers, arranged my hair under my little cap, and kissed my quivering lips, for I was bursting into tears. Then, apparently summoned from the room within, she waved her hand to all of us and curtsayed.

"AGAINST THE STREAM."

like a fairy queen, and disappeared within the door of her mother's apartment.

Piers and I, of course, were kept-in that day, until I had learned the mythology. And meantime Miss Felicity went out and left us alone, with Amice Glanvil, who was kneeling on the window-seat, waiting for the negro nurse.

When Miss Felicity was gone, Amice came down noiselessly from the window-seat, and suddenly stood before me.

I looked up from the book, and met those dark wistful eyes for the first time, not turned away from me, but gazing steadily into mine, through my eyes, I felt, into me.

"Who said it was wicked to have slaves?" she asked.

My eyes sank before her gaze.

"It was my father," I said in a low voice. I wished to say something in excuse, but I could find nothing.

"But people need not be wicked who have slaves," she said. "My father was good, and he had slaves. And he is dead. He was not wicked. And I was born with slaves. How can we help what we are born with?"

She spoke very low, with a deep voice and a clear lingering utterance, which to me sounded foreign. The question was beyond me.

"You can be kind to them," I said feebly. That was all I could think of.

"Some old Greek people set them free," said Piers thoughtfully, more childlike than I; "that is what my father said Mr. Granville Sharpe wanted. You can set them free," he said, with a boy's directness, "that is the only way, I think, of being kind to slaves."

Amice Glanvil turned her penetrating glance on him, as if to look him through; but his frank, blue eyes met hers, with a steady gaze, and bore the scrutiny.

"Set them free! Piers Danescombe," she said. "You do not know in the least what you are talking about. But you have given me the answer at the very bottom of your thoughts, and I thank you." For she was not in the least like a child, our princess.

The negro nurse came to fetch her, and interrupted our conversation.

But when she was wrapped up in her gold and crimson splendours she turned back to us and took one of our hands in each of hers.

"Bride Danescombe," she said, "I like you, I have known and liked you a long time, and I like you better to-day. Piers Danescombe, you are a little boy, and do not know in the least what you said. But you speak the truth, and hardly any one does. And I like you too. I will ask Granny. And you will come and see me. Good-bye."

I felt honoured as by a royal invitation; but Piers was cooler, and said, "We will see."

I got up on the window-seat and looked after Miss Amice in a flutter of delight. I forgot all about the heroes. I felt sure I had found my heroine. The spell of silent years was broken; our princess had spoken to us, and the enchanted palace would be sure to open.

Then a soft voice called me from the corner where little Miss Loveday had been lying on her couch, correcting exercises unobserved by any of us.

"Dear child," she said, "dear little Bride, let me help thee. Aunt Felicity will come back, and thou wilt have learned nothing."

In a few minutes she had taught me the lesson.

And when Miss Felicity returned I said it to her perfectly.

I think she was anxious to make some amends to me. I had suffered as a victim to great public considerations, as I did not know, but she did. But I felt there was no personal wrong intended, and I felt no resentment against her. And when she took my hand kindly, and said I had a good father and mother, and she hoped I would be a good little girl, I took courage, and looking up in her face said, "Miss Felicity, father said you were one of the heroes, too."

"Nonsense! nonsense, child!" she said, colouring. But I saw that the keen eyes moistened, and she took me to Miss Loveday and said, in a tremulous voice—

"Loveday, the child grows more like her poor dear mother every day—I saw it on that stool to-day—and she has just that sweet forgiving temper. And, please God, the poor little maid shall never stand there again. It was a mistake of mine, and it cut me to the heart. There," she added, laughing, "there's a foolish thing for a mistress to say to a child. Foolish old woman and foolish little Bride. How shall I keep you in order now? You will never be afraid of the ruler and the fool's-cap more."

But I began to love Miss Felicity. And oh the good it did me to hear a grown-up woman actually confess she had made a mistake and done wrong!

It restored to me my ideal of justice. It made me feel there was one right way for little children and grown people.

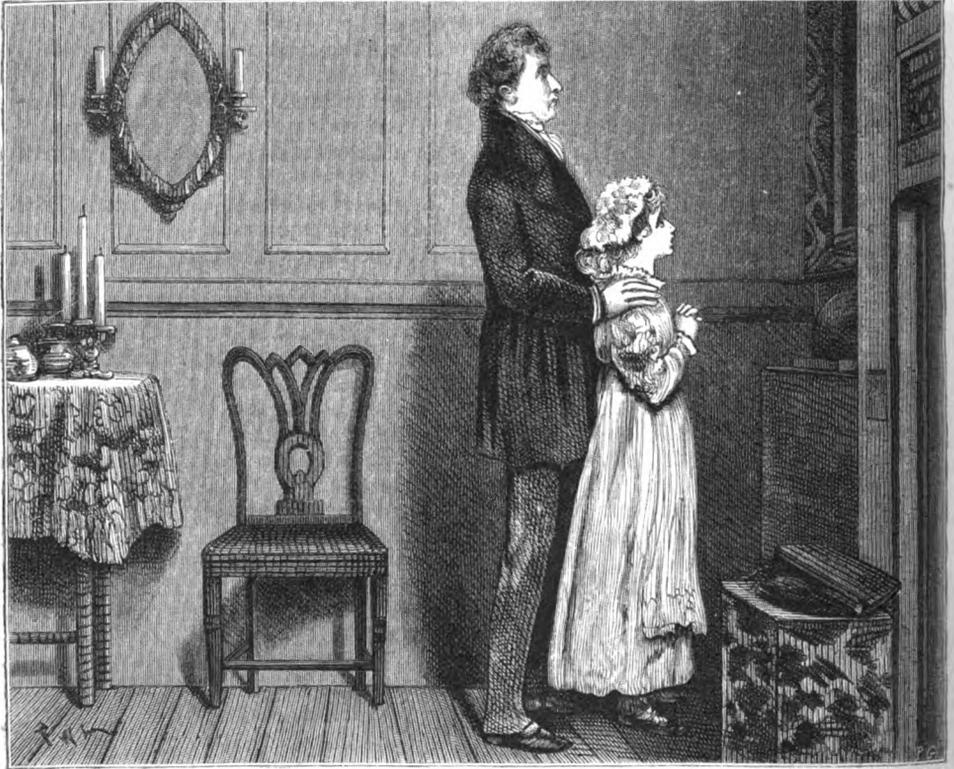

From that day I would not have offended or grieved Miss Felicity for the world.

But when she left the room Miss Loveday put her arm around me and said—

“Little Bride, it is quite right to learn about the old heroes. All little boys and girls must. But never thou give up believing in the heroes and saints now. That is the great matter for us. Never give up looking for them, little Bride, and always expecting to see them. It is a pity not to know the heroes of long ago. But the most terrible mistake we can make, any of us, is not to learn to know the heroes and saints God is making to-day, who are with us now, because that is like misunderstanding God himself, and our dear Lord and Saviour, and the blessed, loving Spirit, and putting Him far back into history, among the Greeks and Romans.

“Never think the saints and heroes are all dead and gone, Piers and Bride. It is like thinking our Lord is dead, and his living Spirit with us no more. That is the mistake people who went wrong made in every age. Look for them, expect to find them in the world—in your little world—now, and look to God, who is always making them, and you will find them. And then stick close to them, my dears, and follow them, whatever they are called and whatever they look like; and, in that way, you may grow like them too. Oh, thank God, Bride,” she added in a low voice, “I did ask God long ago for this; and He heard me, and showed me your mother. He showed her to me before she went away. And that has helped me all my life. Never, never think the saints and heroes are living no longer upon earth. The heroes are not dead, nor the dragons; nor are the saints gone to heaven, or their crosses. Look up and keep your heart open, and you will find them, my poor little ones, never fear.”

I tried to say something to her, but I could not. My voice would not come.

For when father had said Miss Felicity was a hero, he had said also that Miss Loveday was a saint.

But I smiled all through my heart as I went across to the market-place, to think how much sooner than Miss Loveday had expected her words had begun to come true.

THE FUTURE OF THE WORKING CLASSES.

III.—“THE TREE OF KNOWLEDGE.”

IT is surely more than an accidental coincidence, that at one and the same time three things should have taken place: first, that the British workman should have come to know something of leisure; second, that a national system of education should have been established; and third, that while so many articles in ordinary use have become much dearer, a very singular exception should have taken place in one article, viz., books; the price of which is now so wonderfully reduced, that a New Testament may be had for a penny, a “Pilgrim’s Progress” for a penny, the whole works of Sir Walter Scott at less than the original price of any one of them; and in exchange for the labour of a couple of hours the workman may possess an entire Bible, an entire Shakspeare, or an entire Newton. Any one who should be asked to put these three facts together, and to say what was the natural outcome of them, could but at little loss how to answer the question: He would say that they conspired to give a noble opportunity to the working man of the present day, to improve and enlarge his mind, and that, though the present generation might not reap all the benefit, there could be no doubt for his children if they were not far behind the point of intellectual attainments, that any that had ever preceded them.

It is wished to show what education can do for the working man, Scotland affords a happy, but not altogether an adequate answer. For generations past, her schools have given to the children of workmen an opportunity of acquiring a certain amount of knowledge and mental training. But let it be remarked that the problem has never had fair play in Scotland. For in the first place, till quite recently the Scottish workman, after becoming a workman, has never had the benefit of leisure; he has had to work his ten or twelve or even fifteen hours, at the plough, or the bench, or the loom; for mental improvement he has seldom had more than an hour or two at night when the body is exhausted, and when most men are more disposed to chat or to sleep than to study. Secondly, until the present generation, the Scottish workman has not enjoyed the benefit of cheap literature; in the days of our fathers and grandfathers books were extremely dear. Scotland therefore, during her past history, has enjoyed the benefit of but one of the three factors that are now conspiring for the intellectual benefit of workmen, and that, often, in an inferior degree, for the education of the schools has often been extremely defective.

And then as to results. It is very true that on the whole the Scottish people have been marked by superior intelligence; but what chiefly attracts notice, in connection with their education is, that by means of it they have often been enabled to rise to a higher sphere of life than that in which they were born. We think of James Ferguson, the shepherd boy, becoming the distinguished astronomer and savant; of Alexander Murray, the labourer’s son, becoming the eminent orientalist; of Hugh Miller, the stone mason, making for himself a name in science and literature, that will adorn the Scottish firmament for generations; of raw lads going forth to foreign countries and distant colonies, and becoming grand viziers or generals of armies; or of gardener’s apprentices getting charge of ducal domains, and acquiring a power hardly inferior to that of the proprietors themselves. But what is now chiefly to be desired is, not that a few educated workmen should rise to the middle class, but that the whole body of workmen should be raised by education and mental training to a higher intellectual level. It is indeed a great advantage to the individual workman that he has the chance of raising himself and his family to a place in the middle class of society. This affords him in many instances a great stimulus to self-denying exertion. But the working class, as a whole, are not benefited, but rather impoverished by his elevation. They lose one of their ablest and most creditable members. Unless the whole platform of labour is raised, so to speak, the general good that results is but small. Now, what we deem so important in the present conjunction of events is, that it affords the opportunity for this general elevation. It is not merely that it may help Dick Whittingtons to become Lord Mayors of London, but that it opens to the whole army of labour the door to a mode of life more worthy of men who are really the brothers of Bacon and Newton, and whose minds were made in the image of God.

Let us, for the sake of illustration, take the case of the army. It is so far a great benefit to the common soldier when the door is open to him to advance to the position of a commissioned officer. To many a deserving man this would prove a stimulus of no ordinary power. But it would be a poor reform of the army that did not aim likewise at elevating the condition of the common soldier as such. If the rank and file were left to sink or swim as they pleased, and every well-conducted man were drafted into the ranks of the officers, the mass of the common soldiers would be rather impoverished than enriched by the change. A right system must contemplate the elevation of the common soldier as such; surrounding him with happy domestic influences; making marriage, for example, the rule rather than the exception; affording full scope and encouragement to intellectual capacity and moral worth; in short, making the common soldier's life such that respectable men might look on it as not less desirable and honourable than that of the ordinary craftsman. We use this illustration merely to show that what is to be desired for the working classes generally is not merely a chance of rising to the class above them, but a general elevation of the whole order.

It will be observed, however, that we are very far from despising the chance of rising to the class above them. Under any system that may be devised for general elevation, there will always be such transferences; and it is well that there should be. There will always be commoners rising to the House of Lords, workmen becoming employers of labour, small tradesmen rising to be merchant-princes, Dick Whittingtons becoming Lord Mayors. The working class will always be losing its foremost members. But what of that, if influences are at work elevating the whole mass—if a new crop is being raised as fast as the old one disappears—if those who rise retain respect and affection for the class they have left, and, knowing the difficulties and trials that beset them, lend them a helping hand and give them a word of encouragement? Is this last supposition particularly Utopian? Why should it be so? Why ought not those who have risen from the ranks to retain a warm regard for their struggling brothers? If, as a rule, the case has been different, it is not creditable to the "men who have risen."

But now to come back to the subject in hand—the opportunity of a general intellectual elevation afforded to the working classes by the present conjunction of events. Undoubtedly they have the opportunity; everything depends on their making strenuous efforts to turn the opportunity into a reality. Whether or not they will make these efforts depends on the view which they take of the worth and desirableness of the object to be sought. What is the likelihood, then, of their coming to have such an appreciation of education, and of mental riches generally, as to set themselves very earnestly to the pursuit of these things?

One aspect of the case will make an impression on one class of persons, other aspects on other classes. Thus, (1), some may be attracted by the sense of personal gratification which mental riches bring. The best books in such a language as ours have in them the materials of a perpetual festival. In the middle classes of society there are not a few who feel this and act upon it. Books are their personal friends, furnishing to them without stint "the feast of reason and the flow of soul." There is no reason why there should not be found a like proportion of persons in the working classes with a similar feeling. Here is one great inheritance from which no law of entail can shut them out. Here are gardens ever blooming, with no fee for admission, and no long road to traverse in reaching them, as open to the blacksmith, the weaver, or the miner, as to kings or princes. Would it be wise, would it not be absurd for the working man, now that he has got some leisure, to let such treasures pass by, as if there were nothing in them for him to care for?

(2.) Others may be impressed with the fact that mental cultivation is a manly thing, an attribute of true manhood. It is a degradation to be mere animals. Prize horses and prize oxen may be very well, but a prize ploughman, unless he be something more, is less than either. It is not mere bone and sinew that makes the man. It is not in mere animal force that compensation is found for the want of rank and fortune, so that "a man's a man for a' that." "There is nothing great in the world but man," said the old philosopher, "and nothing great in man but mind." Will the working classes not awake to a sense of the greatness of mind? And if mind be great, must it not be cultivated and all its powers improved by the process? Who would ever make a comparison between the millions of working people swayed by their animal passions like herds of cattle, and the same millions alive and astir intellectually—intelligent, thoughtful, reasonable, reflecting the image of God?

(3.) Another class will feel that "knowledge is power." To know the principle on which things are done is a great help to the doing of them. To have the powers of the mind quickened by education so as to apprehend the proper relation of things, is found to be of immense service in almost all the processes of the arts and manufactures. Doubtless it is out of this that the proverb has sprung,—“Nothing like education.” Such proverbs sum up the result of much observation and conviction; and wherever they are prevalent they indicate a wholesome feeling. People may have a very misty idea of what it is about education that makes it valuable; but if the impression prevail that somehow it is of great value, a most important end is gained.

(4.) There is room for impressing still another class with the benefit of intellectual culture, as being the source of no small social gratification. For example, it makes a happy bond of intercourse between young men. It lay at the foundation of some of the most interesting of Hugh Miller's friendships. What more pleasant than to talk and to correspond about books which you and your friend have been reading together, and to multiply your own enjoyment by hearing of his? Nay, even a friendly disputation over some of the topics discussed in the books may be alike profitable and pleasant. And when one has more serious matters to discuss and arrange with one's friends, the benefit is still more important. When you are forming opinions on the most vital concerns of your life; when you are laying plans for the good of your fellows; when you are making up your minds on points whose bearings reach further than life itself, and, as Milton says, “travel to eternity,” the ability to avail yourselves of the thoughts and convictions of an intelligent and enlightened comrade is a benefit of inestimable worth.

(5.) Still another force that may urge the masses in the direction of intellectual culture is—the political. Their interest in questions that are undergoing public discussion will prompt them to take pains to read on these subjects, and stimulate their minds to form a judgment regarding them. However unwholesome and undesirable the atmosphere of mere secular politics may be, there can be no doubt of their educating power. Politics stir the torpid mind, they waken up the slumbering faculties; they lead to observation, reasoning, and reflection. The politician may often be a disagreeable animal, but he is more than a mere animal. There is something in him that, if it be allied to higher influences and brought under the control of a nobler spirit, will give him a real elevation, and secure for him a sincere respect.

(6.) But stronger far than any of the forces that we have as yet adverted to, is the impulse towards intellectual culture that comes from vital Christianity. In adverting to this force as one of several, we must not be supposed to regard it as differing from the rest only in degree. It differs in more vital ways. If the other forces are separated from its influence, their effect is uncertain, and there is no security that they will not be turned to evil instead of good. Christianity has a double mode of operation on the intellectual faculties—the one direct, the other indirect. Directly, it gives a most impressive lesson as to the value of man, and the obligation and responsibility of redeemed man. It gives extraordinary value to every part of man's nature, for it makes him a member of that body of which the Son of God is the Head. It lays him under obligations of incalculable force—binds him to live not to himself but to Him who loved him and gave himself for him. In his service there is to be no waste and no idleness. No talent is to be buried in the ground; it is to be lent at interest and doubled ere the Lord's return. No fragment is to be wasted even after a miraculous meal; it is to be gathered into baskets that nothing be lost. Everything urges the disciple of Christ to the improvement of every faculty, that he may be to the praise of his glory, and that he may be the more powerful instrument in helping on his cause. That he may do the more good he must have the more mental power; ignorance and awkwardness must give place to knowledge and skill. To help to enlighten the minds of others, it is of prime necessity that he have ample light in his own.

Indirectly, too, vital religion tends to mental culture and enlargement, by the very grandeur of the subjects which it presents for the consideration of man. What vaster theme for human thought can be found than the being of God, the infinite, eternal, and unchangeable One? How great concentration of the mind is needed even for an approach to a right conception of the Infinite, and of our relation thereto? The thoughtful reading of the Bible, too, has a wonderfully enlarging and elevating effect upon the mind. Its jurisprudence, its theology, its philosophy, its poetry—have all a remarkable power. And in point of fact, wherever a people have been devoted to the Bible and impregnated with its spirit, they have been marked by an intelligence beyond the common. And this consideration must not be lost sight of in accounting for whatever intelligence beyond the common may have been characteristic of the Scottish people.

(7.) To the forces now enumerated, which are somewhat general in their influence, we have now to add one of a special kind—the fact that education has been elevated to a place of commanding national interest, and that attention to it, on the part of parents, is to be rendered compulsory. Whatever other results may spring out of our long educational debates and our modern educational enactments, they will at least have the effect of giving to education a place in the eye of the nation such as it has never had before. The very budget of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, with a long row of figures opposite the education estimate, will have the same effect. But most of all will this be the effect of the measures now to be taken for compelling careless parents to provide for their children's education. The question cannot fail to be raised—what is all this meant for? And if the answer to the question be what it ought to be, it cannot fail to give a stimulus to the intellectual progress of the nation.

These, as it seems to us, are the chief considerations which will contribute to commend education, and the culture of the mental faculties generally, to the working classes of the future. And now the question arises, how far will they have this effect? How far will they stimulate the masses to overcome the vis inertiae of laziness, the tyranny of animal passions, the force of ancient customs, and it may be the fascination of foolish superstitions, and to apply themselves energetically to turn to account their present remarkable opportunity of intellectual elevation?

For our own part, we do not expect that the change will either be very general, or very rapid. There will be two currents, we apprehend, a forward and a backward; and the backward may for a time present us with a more humiliating phenomenon than has ever yet been witnessed among us. Drunkenness, gluttony, and other polluting vices may in some instances swell to dimensions beyond any that they have hitherto attained. Where the carcase is, there will the vultures be gathered together. Where the means of riotous living are multiplied, riotous living will become more common. It is most painful to think of this, most painful to write it. One would fain go to a distance, like Hagar in the wilderness, and not look on a sight which is more distressing by far than the death of a child. One would rather see a troop of wild Esquimaux glutting themselves with the putrid blubber of a stranded whale, than a body of well-paid British workmen debasing themselves with the brutalities of the ginshop, till God's image is obliterated from soul and body together. On the other hand, we fondly believe that the more intelligent and Christian members of the working classes will take heart of grace at the present remarkable crisis, and seek, with God's help, to create a deep and active public sentiment in their ranks, in favour of a new era of enlightenment and mental culture. They must not be discouraged by little apparent progress. Deep waters move slowly; discouragements may be very numerous; but amid all, Abraham Lincoln's advice to his generals will be serviceable—"Keep pegging away."

The end to be gained is worth a deal of pains. The great body of labouring men and women over the country furnished with new organs of enjoyment, and new sources of refreshment—getting mental eyes opened that reveal a new world of beauty and interest; finding palm-trees and fountains of water in nooks of the wilderness where the burning sun used to beat on them; hearing in all the voices of nature—

"Songs that have power to quiet
The restless pulse of care,
And come like the benediction
That follows after prayer."

Oh working men and women, aspire to this elevation! It is not the highest by any means that we would set before you, but it is surely something to see our friend Hodge transformed into an intelligent and thinking being, who can see something heavenly in earth, sea, and air; enter into the thoughts of some at least, of our great poets, orators, and divines, and feel, both with his comrades and his family, that there are other things to be talked of and thought of, than bread and butter, beer and bacon.

We have very little sympathy with the fears of those who are afraid that our people may be overtaught. Unwisely taught they may be, and we fear they sometimes are; overtaught we do not think that they can be. No doubt the idea lurks in some, and is openly expressed by other persons, that many classes of persons are better fitted for their work, and will perform it more efficiently when they know little than when they know much. As the phrase runs, too much education makes them too fine for their work. With this, we say, we have very little sympathy. It is based on the prejudice that mental culture is the exclusive right of the upper classes, so that if any one has come to possess it, it is degrading to him or to her to continue to labour with the hands. The removal of the prejudice will go far to counteract the practical result of it. Indeed, it seems to us to involve a slur on the wisdom of the Creator, that He should be supposed to give to his creatures the rudiments of faculties which it would be wrong for them to cultivate and develop. It cannot be supposed that the Creator requires his creatures to perform work of such a kind that they must renounce that knowledge which was one of the original features of the divine image. Ignorance may make a man a more abject and submissive slave, but it cannot make him a more efficient helper in the true work of the world, which is the work of God. At the same time, there may be an injudicious kind of teaching, and an injudicious selection of branches, fitted to make young persons pedantic and conceited, instead of helpful and humble. Ordinary boys and girls cannot be Admirable Crichtons—cannot all know everything; especially boys and girls of the working class. Having but little time to devote to education, it is of great importance for them that what they do learn is judiciously selected. Branches of instruction that are far removed from the region of practical utility, are hardly suited for this class. Fancy needlework for girls in place of plain sewing and knitting is surely not the right thing in the right place. It happened to the present writer a short time ago to pay a couple of visits one forenoon in a mining district. One of the visits was at the bottom of a coal-pit, the other was at the village school. The visit to the coal-pit was a very instructive one, though, for physical sensations, the hour we passed in it was one of the most uncomfortable we ever spent. It gave us, however, an intelligent sympathy for the miner, and a strong desire to see him well educated and well provided with all the compensations that would make up for such a repulsive employment. Passing from the pit to the school, we found the teacher hammering the rules of syntax into the somewhat thick heads of the children, and very hard hammering it was. Well, we do not say that it was an improper subject to teach, far from it; of course the teacher must think of the "standards" and examinations for results; but we did long for something more practical and more suited for the special circumstances of miners. School-books have undergone a great improvement of late years, but it seems to us that they may yet undergo a greater.

We need more about common things—about health and its inviolable rules, political economy and its stern lessons, domestic life and the common occupations and temptations of the working people. Why ought not the minds of children at school to be impregnated with these useful lessons? It is one of the results which we anticipate from the more direct influence of the working classes on our common schools, that without neglecting the culture of the higher powers of the mind, more attention will be paid to training the children for the common pursuits of life.

There is no better way of showing what we have in view for the working classes in connection with the progress of mental cultivation than by good examples. And the best example that we know of is that of Hugh Miller. It was his lot to be brought up in the Scottish Highlands, among a people who were by no means strangers to religious knowledge and impression, but who knew comparatively little of intellectual culture. To supply this void to working people was what he deemed his mission. Careful as he was to recognise the one foundation for all true improvement as it is recognised in the Word of God, he laboured to rear on it the structure of intellectual attainment. One of his earliest discoveries about himself was that he had a mind. He came to understand what that meant. He saw that it meant a capacity of attainment and enjoyment such as few men in his sphere reach. People might say to him, and did say to him, "You are a working man, and you can never be a scholar. What nonsense it is for you to be shutting yourself up in the evening and poring over books, when you might be free and jovial and happy, like the mass of your fellow-workers!" If people said so—and they did—it made no impression. He felt that his being a working man did not necessarily exclude him or any man from the pleasures of a cultivated mind. And what he felt for himself he wished that other working men should feel. He never desired to leave the ranks of working men; and even after he did leave them, his heart remained among them; and his great desire was, as one of themselves, to guide and spur them on to a higher, more noble, more blessed kind of life than many of them were leading. He wished to dissipate the notion that a working man was not, and could not be expected to be, anything better than an inferior animal, with the intelligence of a drudge and the passions of a brute. He wished to show that there was no incompatibility between a life of hard toil and the pleasures and refinement of mental cultivation; that in dooming the great mass of men to eat bread in the sweat of their brow, God did not mean to exclude them from the thousand elevated enjoyments that spring from knowledge and culture. He wrote his "Schools and Schoolmasters" to show that one really seeking it might attain this enjoyment mainly through his own self-reliance and self-control, with the blessing of God; and if this could be said in his day and under his disadvantages, much more may it be said now! Would only that the whole mass of working people might be fired with his enthusiasm; scorn, as he did, the mere pleasures of sense, and reap as rich a harvest both in the domain of intellect and in the garden of the soul!

W. G. BLAIKIE.

THE SWORD OF GOLIATH.

"THERE IS NONE LIKE THAT."

BUT a little while before we find David enjoying all the glory of his victory over Goliath. The shoutings of the multitude are in his ears. He is made a companion of princes, and has the king's daughter given him to wife. But the sky soon overcasts. Saul's envy is stirred, and he seeks to slay him. David is warned of his danger by Jonathan, in a noble, loving, unselfish way, which has embalmed his name to all time.

David flees away from Saul, glad to escape with his life. Hungry and sad, he comes to Nob, a city of the priests, where the tabernacle was then stationed. He finds Ahimelech, the priest, who wonders at his plight. He asks for bread. There is none but the hallowed bread. But he must have it. Strengthened, he asks, "Is there not here under thine hand spear or sword? for I have neither brought my sword nor my weapons with me." Yes, "The sword of Goliath the Philistine, whom thou slewest in the valley of Elah, behold, it is here wrapped in a cloth behind the ephod: if thou wilt take that, take it; for there is no other save that here." David greedily catches at it. "There is none like that; give it me." He is deeply moved. What is there in this sword which so inly stirs his soul, and makes him feel that there is none like that?

THIS SWORD REMINDED DAVID OF THE TIME WHEN HE SLEW THE GIANT.

It often does a man a world of good when past scenes are brought vividly before his mind. The fears of to-day are banished, not merely by the hope of coming help, but by the thought of past deliverances. That man who has no notable past history is a man easily cast down by trial. A nation which has passed through a furnace of trials victoriously, does well to treasure up the memory of these events in enduring monuments. The thought of the past may cheer when dark days come, and the conflict wages.

A time of trial was at hand for David. He was the subject of a heartless persecution—an ungrateful returning of evil for good. He must have been deeply pained at heart. He may have been somewhat fearful of the issue. What can he do against the king? Ah! doubtless he was disconsolate.

But this sword of Goliath stirs his heart, as if its blade cast light across his gloomy path. "There is none like that; give it me!" It moves him as with a strange electric power. There is none like that. How it floods his mind with the recollection of the most memorable event in his life! In a moment it calls up all. He thinks of his father Jesse sending him to the camp of Israel, to his three brethren, with the parched corn and the ten loaves. He remembers how his anger was stirred, when he heard the armies of the living God defied by the blustering Philistine. All unarmed as he is, just come from feeding his few sheep in the wilderness, he is willing to go forth to fight this uncircumcised blasphemer. With his staff, his sling, and five smooth stones out of the brook, he goeth forth, strong in the Lord. On the great boaster came, cursing David by his gods. He will give his flesh to the fowls of the air, and to the beasts of the field. Ah! will he? The words were scarcely out of his mouth, when a stone, slung by David, smote him in the forehead, and he fell mortally wounded. Then he stood over the giant, and drew his sword, and cut off his head.

And here is the very sword of Goliath again, it may be with its brightness yet dulled by the stains of his blood. There is none like that! Let him have it—it revives his courage. Having passed through that great conflict, what has he to fear now? He finds strength in the thought. Like the honey, of which Jonathan tasted, when weary with pursuing the Philistines, it enlightened his eyes. The darkness is gone. David feels that he can face anything now. This sword has a talismanic power: there is none like that.

THIS SWORD REVIVED HIS FAITH IN THE LORD.

A man is strong just as he believes in God. Nothing so unnerves a man, and unfits him to face trial as a doubting spirit. Like all men of a sanguine temperament, David was the subject of great mental disquietments and melancholy fits. No man had brighter thoughts at one time, or darker at another. Sad at heart before, this sword revives all his old faith and ardour. His first love, and trust in God, burst forth again. In those days gone by he walked in the strength of the Lord. He felt Him near—his joy and strength. He was but a ruddy lad come from tending his sheep, and re-buffed by his brothers. Yet while big Eliab, and all the soldiers of Israel, are craven-hearted, he is ready to fight the giant. The candle of the Lord shone upon his head, and through His name he can face any enemy.

This sword calls up his old faith. It rebukes his unbelieving thoughts, and bids his fears be gone. There is none like that. Thus the twelve stones set up at Gilgal must have exercised a mighty power in the minds of the old Israelites. As they looked upon those stones, which once lay in the bed of the Jordan, now standing there, how they must have thought of the Lord dividing the waters, that his ransomed people might go over to possess the land promised to their fathers, each stone saying, "Have faith in God!"

All this is true to nature. Thus the heart is moved still. It may be a small thing indeed, but it fills the soul with the tenderest feelings, and draws powerfully to God. Have we not oft felt our hearts thus affected? A church where first the word of life found its way to our hearts, and drew us to Jesus for mercy; some old book we once, in a sad time, read with joy; a mother's Bible, her choice texts marked there with her own hand; or her dear treasured letters, full of love and tender counsel—these, and a hundred other things, are like this sword of Goliath to David. They are full of blessed associations. They lift up the heart when it is sad and weary, and lead it anew to trust in the Lord.

THIS SWORD ASSURED HIM THAT HE WOULD CERTAINLY TRIUMPH IN THE END.

How oft David's mind must have gone back to that scene at Bethlehem, when Samuel came and anointed him with oil, when he was so strangely filled with another spirit! Doubtless he pondered its significance much, and premonitions of coming greatness would fill his mind. He knew that Saul feared him; jealous of his being king. He is low enough now, a mere fugitive, with manifold straits and dangers in store. Ah! but this sword reminds him how the Lord delivered him from the lion and the bear, and stood by him when he encountered the giant, and delivered him into his hands. It flashes out clear in his mind's eye that he will yet triumph over Saul, and find rest upon the throne of Israel. He is assured the Lord will carry him through. There was the bondage in Egypt, and all the trials in the wilderness, where their fathers found rest in the promised land. There may be many conflicts and privations before him, but He who enabled him to win this sword, will be his shield and buckler still. There is none like that: let David have the sword of Goliath.

Let us treasure up the thought of all the Lord's gracious leadings, his help in the day of trouble, times and scenes when He granted wondrous enlargement, and opened wells of water for our refreshment. Let us set up our Ebenezers each day, so that looking back, there will start up in our ready memory many a "stone of help," shouting "Ebenezer!" Dark days will come, when "our sore will run in the night," and our "spirits be overwhelmed." Then let us remember our "songs in the night," and we shall find, however sad our circumstances may be, that assured hope in the Lord is begotten, telling us, even when cast down, that there is a glorious "lifting up" in store that, when all clouds and darkness have gone, there will be "clear shining after the rain."

JAMES B. JOHNSTONE.

EVERLASTING LOVE.

“COME and sit by my bed awhile, Jeanie ; there's just a little space
 Betwixt light and dark, and the fire is low, and I cannot see your face ;
 But I like to feel I've hold of your hand, and to know I've got you near,
 For kind and good you've been, Jeanie, the time that I've been here.

“Kind and good you've been, Jeanie, when all was so dull and strange ;
 I was left to myself, and was not myself, and I seem'd too old to change,
 And I couldn't get framed to the House's ways ; it was neither work nor play ;
 It wasn't at all like being at home, and it wasn't like being away.

“And the days slipt on, and the years slipt on, and I felt in a kind of dream,
 As I used to do in the noisy school sewing a long white seam ;
 Sewing, sewing a long white seam the whole of the summer day,
 When I'd like to have been in the open fields either at work or at play.

“But now I feel as I used to feel in the summer evenings cool,
 When we bairns would meet at the end of the street, or the edge of the village pool ;
 Or like when I've stood at the gate to wait for father home from the town,
 And held him tight by the hand, or held my mother tight by the gown.

“And I feel to-night as I used to feel when I was a little lass,
 When something seem'd alive in the leaves and something astir in the grass ;
 And all in the room seems warm and light, and I'm pleased to go or to stay ;
 But I've got a word in my heart, Jeanie, that's calling me away.”

“Oh, what have you seen, Nannie, have you seen a blessed sight Of angels coming to meet you ; have you heard them at dead of night ?”
 Oh nothing, nothing like that, Jeanie, but what saith the Blessed Word ?
 ‘God speaketh once, yea, twice, unto man when never a voice is heard.’

“And He's given a word unto me, Jeanie—a word and a holy thought,
 Of something I've never found upon earth, and something I've always sought ;
 Of something I never thought that I'd find till I found it in Heaven above ;
 It's Love He has given to me, Jeanie, His everlasting love !

“I'm old, Jeanie, poor and old, and I've had to work hard for my bread ;
 It's long since father and mother died, and ye know I was never wed ;
 And the most of my life's been spent in Place, and in places where I have been,
 If I've heard a little talk about love, it's been work I've mostly seen.

“And in summer the days were long and light, and in winter short and cold, Till at last I was good for work no more, for you see I'm getting old ;
 And I knew there was nothing left for me but to come to the House, and I cried,
 But if I was not good for work, what was I good for beside ?

“ And still when I went to chapel and church, I heard of love and of love ;
It was something I hadn't met with on earth, and that hadn't come down from above ;
It was something I'd heard of, but never seen, that I'd wish'd for and hadn't found,
But I liked to hear of love and of love, it had such a beautiful sound.

“ And I used to think, perhaps it was meant for richer people and higher,
Like the little maid that sits at church beside her father the Squire,
For the angels that always live above, or for good folks after they die ;
But now it has come to me I know, it is nigh and is very nigh.”

“ Oh tell me, what have you seen, Nannie ; have you seen a shining light ?
Have you heard the angels that harp and sing to their golden harps at night ?”

“ Oh Jeanie, woman, I couldn't have thought of such things as these if I'd tried ;
It was God Himself that spoke to me ; it was Him and none beside.

“ It wasn't a voice that spoke in my ear, but a word that came to my soul,
And it isn't a little love I've got in my heart when I've got the whole ;
It is peace, it is joy, that has fill'd it up as a cup is filled to its brim ;
Just to know that Jesus died for me, and that I am one with Him.*

* “ I knew that Jesus was my Saviour, and that I was one with Him :” words used by an aged, humble believer, in describing a manifestation which had conveyed unspeakable peace to her soul, at a time of great bodily weakness, and in the near prospect of death.

"It's love, Jeanie, that's come to me as nigh as you're now, and nigher ;
It's love that'll never change, Jeanie, it's love that'll never tire.
Though I'm old and I'm poor, and deaf, and dark, and the most of folks that I see,
Be they ever so kind, I'd weary of them, or they'd soon grow weary of me.

"And this isn't the House any more—it's Home ; and I'm pleased to go or to stay ;
I'm not a woman weary with work, or a little lass at play ;
I'm a child with its hand in its father's hand, its head on its mother's breast ;
It's Christ, Jeanie, that's bid me come to Him, and that's given me rest.

"And it isn't little God's given to me, though He's kept it to the end,— It's wealth that the richest cannot buy, that the poorest can never spend ;
And I needn't wait till I go to Heaven, for it's Heaven come down from above ;
It's love, Jeanie, God's given to me, His everlasting love!"

DORA GREENWELL.

FROM ROME.

BY JOHN KER, D.D.

CIRCUMSTANCES having occurred in the course of providence to hinder me, meanwhile, continuing my series of papers either under their old name of the "Charities of London," or their new one, of "Among the Stricken"—a class to which, in a sense, I myself at present belong: it is a great satisfaction for me to be able in these circumstances to lay before the readers of the SUNDAY MAGAZINE such an interesting letter as the following; it supplies, and more than supplies, my lack of service.

To explain certain of its allusions, I may state that it had been arranged that I should pass this winter in Rome, ministering to the congregation of my late much-esteemed friend the Rev. Dr. Lewis. It forms one of the six or seven congregations that constitute the Presbytery of Italy, which, though far removed from our island home, is represented in the Church Courts, and forms an integral part of the Free Church of Scotland. This, of course, was a temporary arrangement, the Church at home supplying the congregation at Rome with ordinances until a fixed pastor had been appointed to succeed Dr. Lewis. No longer able to take two services each Sunday, I opened up, in conjunction with the Continental Committee of the Free Church, negotiations with Dr. Ker, of Glasgow, one of the most distinguished ministers of the United Presbyterian Church in Scotland, and author of a volume of sermons which, for soundness in the faith, genius, and piety, are surpassed by none, if equalled by any, that have issued from the press for many a year and day. He undertook to be our co-pastor at Rome for part of the time we had engaged to serve there; and negotiations having also been entered into with the Continental Committee of the Established Church of Scotland, it was further arranged that Dr. McGregor, one of its ministers in Edinburgh, distinguished alike for his powers and popularity, should take Dr. Ker's place, and become my colleague when the time came for Dr. Ker leaving Rome.

By this arrangement the Established and Free Churches of Scotland would no longer, as for some years past, stand there as rivals, weakening each other's hands, burdening the Churches at home with the maintenance of two charges, where one was sufficient, and—worse evil still—giving occasion to the Romanists to say, See how these Protestants are divided!

Man, as the proverb runs, proposeth, but God disposeth. A serious illness has shunted me aside, depriving me of the pleasure of taking my part and place in this happy union. Not that the scheme itself has miscarried, for while the United Presbyterian Church has in Dr. Ker, and the Established Church will have in Dr. McGregor, representatives who will do them honour and true religion, with God's blessing, important service, the Free Church will have in Mr. Miller, who leaves Genoa this winter to take my place in Rome, one every way worthy of those with whom he is associated.

Whether Episcopalian, Presbyterian, or Independent, our readers will rejoice with us that this charge at Rome is not only to present such an aspect of harmony, but to be supplied with preachers of such an order. Constantly exposed to influences not at all favourable to religious life, none need the services of such men more than our countrymen and countrywomen who are sojourning on the Continent. Amid the hurry and bustle, the irregular hours and various distractions of travelling, it is always difficult and oftentimes impossible to secure those daily and regular periods for devotional exercises, without which personal piety, like a plant but irregularly watered, is apt to fade and wither; and even when travellers can prolong their sojourn in any continental town, their minds are so much dissipated by the pursuit of pleasure, the sights constantly before their eyes, and all their surroundings, are so much calculated to blunt the fine edge of conscience and lower the tone of morality, and familiarise them with what is evil, that many, alas, too many, have returned to their country and old homes melancholy examples of the saying, "Evil communications corrupt good manners." In these circumstances we are convinced that the Churches at home have no higher duty than supplying the continental charges with their foremost preachers—men fit to hold the high places of the field, and stand in the breach when the enemy cometh in like a flood.—THOMAS GUTHRIE.]

ROME, 32, VICOLO DE' GRECI,
Nov. 12, 1872.

MY DEAR DR. GUTHRIE,

I could not be here without thinking of you very much, and I have been hearing of you also a little . . . I took about a week to come here by Paris, Turin, and Florence, staying a Sabbath at the first town, and hearing G. Monod, a venerable man of God, with a warm Christian heart. After arriving here I spent two days in a hotel while looking out for a lodging. It was a wearisome and difficult search, for Rome has received an addition of forty thousand inhabitants since the Italian occupation, and building is only commenced. House room is therefore scarce, and, as a consequence, dear, which pleases proprietors and makes all others grumble. At first Mr. Miller and I thought of pension at a hotel, but this also is expensive, and would have deprived us of liberty. So we resolved to join forces, and have thereby got rooms better than we otherwise could have done at the same money. We have two very good bedrooms, a small sitting-room, and a good-sized drawing-room (salone), which we shall use for our prayer-meetings and such other gatherings as we find likely to serve the cause. Such a place is necessary, as our church is outside the city, and we need a centre that is accessible. We are in a small but respectable street not far from the Piazza di Spagna, and though our view to the front is limited enough, we have behind a good-sized garden belonging to the Monastery of Gesu e Maria, with vines, and fig-trees, and orange-trees, the last laden with the golden apples of the south, gleaming through the dark green leaves. All day long we have brown, mantled, barefooted friars creeping under our eye, engaged in the Italian occupation of "dolce far niente." At least they do not look like students, and I never see them with a spade. Lest we should grow moody, we have a glimpse from this same side, down between narrow roofs, into the gay Corso, along which sweeps the Roman Vanity Fair, and up to our right is discerned a corner of the Pincian, with white villas shining out from dusky pines, where one might well fancy the ghost of Nero to be wandering, as popular superstition affirms. We are three good flats up, but the stairs are the best I have seen in Rome—broad, shallow, and of pure white marble. For all this we pay 425 francs a month, equal to nearly £17 sterling—very dear, but the cheapest we could get. We take our breakfast and tea in the house, getting in our own supplies, and paying for coal to cook them and wood to heat our stove or burn on our stone hearth, according to the room; the wood costing, one staccato (or cart-load), 20 francs. For our dinner we go to a trattoria, where we get two or three simple dishes for about 1½ franc. So you will understand our establishment; and I have to say that in commencing it we were largely indebted to the kind offices of Dr. Philip, missionary here to the Jews, and in maintaining it I rely on Mr. Miller, who is a most excellent house, as well as church, yoke-fellow.

We have now had two Sabbaths in our church. It is outside the gate, as you know, on the left hand, a little back from the street, with open gardens round it, and the yellow Tiber within a stone-throw. It is a neat edifice, holds from two hundred to two hundred and fifty, and is altogether very comfortable. Our audiences, as yet, have not been very large —about sixty or seventy in the forenoon and twenty or thirty in the afternoon—for in Rome, as elsewhere, half-day hearing prevails. The winter residents begin to come about the end of this month, and after that we hope gradually to fill up. We have had very pleasant, and I hope profitable, meetings, though small, and every one expresses great satisfaction at the union of the three Scottish Presbyterian Churches in the service. It has taken away one stumbling-block, and I trust may serve as an example. I have heard American friends express themselves as gratified with this feature. We commence our prayer-meeting this evening in our saloon, and I hope it may prove useful in promoting a friendly social, as well as spiritual, tone in visitors. We purpose also having a meeting for choir practice. It is out of our power to get a precentor; no single friend has courage to lift up his or her voice alone, and so we shall try union for praise as well as in preaching. The service of praise ought to have an important place with us here, to let strangers see we look to beauty as well as strength in our Presbyterian sanctuary. Our church library, too, is getting into order, and will be opened at the close of our next Sabbath service with some new books. This is really a religious agency, and if you ran your eye down the catalogue of an English (Roman) circulating library, with its fritter of frivolity and sensation, you would be convinced that we must do something for the intellect of residents as well as for their moral and religious principle. By-and-by we hope to make all these means more efficient, and perhaps to introduce others as experience may suggest.

I must give you some idea of the different agencies at work here, that you may understand our position. And first of the English speaking. There are two Episcopal High Church clergymen; the one from England, the other from America. They have their churches outside the Porta del Popolo, near the rest of us, but we see as little of them in any of our meetings as we do of the Vatican Pope. Then there is the Low Church Episcopalian cause, which meets in Dr. Lewis's old place, and which has for its minister the Rev. Mr. Hamilton. He is a warm-hearted Christian man, and we have found much pleasure in intercourse with him, and readiness to co-operate in common evangelical work. There is besides this a new church, either already commenced or about to be commenced (I have not learned which) to be called "The American Union," and to be served by American ministers of different denominations who may visit Rome. Several Americans have expressed to me their regret at this step as really unnecessary, since all non-Episcopalians who hold evangelical truth can unite here on common ground. Our duty, however, is quietly to keep on our own way, without complaint or recrimination, leaving the conduct of others to their own conscientious judgment, and prepared to give the right hand of fellowship to all who hold the Head.

I am increasingly convinced that there are few more useful agencies anywhere than evangelical churches in our own language scattered over the chief towns of the Continent. They help to prevent our tourists and temporary residents from being overcome by the enticements of Rome, or from being utterly secularised by a kind of life so different from what we have at home. Now that there is a growing stream of visitors every year, we must try to guard their spiritual interests, and to prevent them coming back chilled and frost-bitten like travellers to the arctic circle. The importation of foreign ideas of religion and of the Sabbath in this way will become a serious evil if we do not guard against it, and all the home churches should combine for harmonious and efficient action. Then such stations are able to keep British Christians advised of the religious state of the Continent itself, and to guide them in aiding native evangelistic work. They are watch-towers along one of the most important lines of battle in the modern Christian Church, whether we look upon it as having to deal with Romanism or Materialism.

So far as I have been able to observe, the Home Church has been singularly favoured hitherto in the character of the men in charge of these stations. They are, many of them, men of great ability and energy, acquainted with the language and condition of the country they live in, refraining from mixing themselves up with its politics, but taking a deep and active interest in the moral and spiritual condition of the people. I attribute the increased interest in continental work very much to their influence; and to help the Continent of Europe to the Gospel is, I believe, the main and most pressing duty of the Protestant Churches of Britain and America, if we are to assist in saving even its civilisation. Indeed, to gain Europe for Christianity is to gain the world. If pleasure-seeking tourists, calling themselves Christians, besides the quest of recreation and the pursuit of art and antiquity, could be induced to take some interest in this, it would bring them back a better class of men, a greater strength to us in every way, than they sometimes return. The continental stations do contribute to this, and home ministers might aid it by turning the attention of their members, who propose visiting the Continent, to these objects, and by bringing them into connection with ministers here. So I do not regret the multiplication of new evangelical causes, which may react on home Christians in all parts of Great Britain and America. Only it were well that we should economize our means so as to cover the largest possible area, and, above all, preserve the unity of the Spirit.

It is scarcely so easy to give you an idea of the Italian agencies in Rome, but I shall try. The opening of the Porto Pia gate to the army of Victor Emmanuel brought in evangelists of almost all the Protestant denominations, and they have not yet settled into fixed place and shape. This exuberance of life is something to be glad of, but it brings its difficulties. First of all, there is the ancient Waldensian Church, who long did battle in the mountains, and who are now come down to show that their God is also the God of the plains. Their only minister at present is M. Ribetti, as M. Pons has been removed to Venice to take the place of M. Comba, called to a professorship at Florence. A successor is expected immediately in the person of young M. Meille, son of the pastor in Turin. The Waldenses have two places of meeting, both merely on lease, and neither of them suitable in accommodation—the one off the Corso, the other near the Piazza Navona. Next there is the Chiesa Libera, known to friends in Scotland through the name of Gavazzi. He is not at present in Rome, and M. Conti is the evangelist at work, between the Piazza Navona and the Tiber. Distinct from both is M. Ravi, who has his centre of labour in the Arco del Parma. The Baptists have two workers in the field, Mr. Walls and Mr. Coat, and the Methodists have M. Sciarelli. These last have the advantage of having secured a good site and premises of their own not far from the Palazzo Borghese. They have paid for them £10,000, and it will require a considerable sum additional to adapt them to their purpose, but this is the first step to any permanent or decided work of evangelisation. Unfortunately, the very event which opened Rome to Christian effort, has made it necessary that it should be carried on at enhanced cost, so greatly have the prices of ground and of the necessaries of life risen since the Government transferred its seat here. But there is no help for it. The influence of the priesthood, and the bigotry and fears of the people, are still sufficient to prevent the lease of places where meetings can be held; those which can be got are often of the most unsuitable kind, and it would be a waste of money to try to adapt them on a short lease. If Protestant Christians wish to act on Rome with reasonable hope of success, they must make up their mind to expend considerable sums at first in breaking ground, and must emulate the effort which Rome is making to gain our own country.

I am not going to say anything about the success which attends these different agencies—this would be rash, and might be invidious. I have looked in upon and listened to some of them, as well as my acquaintance with Italian will permit, but I desire to see and hear much more before making up a judgment even in my own mind. I shall only say that I have heard the Gospel faithfully preached and seen it attentively listened to in Rome, within less than chassépot range of the Vatican—strange that one should have to adopt such a measure of distance from the place! Is it not much to be able to say this? Who could have dreamed of it even three years ago? And when the walls of Jericho are down, is it not a summons to go up and take possession? It is also evident to a casual observer that while plenty of superstition remains, and while the Pope frightens some by his unqualified prophecies of recovering lost ground, he and his system are an object of indifference or of derision to a large mass of the people. The other day, looking at a procession of priests and monks with lighted candles crossing the Ponte Sisto, I heard a man at my side say, "Che mascherata!" What a masquerade! The tone of the daily papers which are most generally read, and the way in which people gather round the caricatures of the priests in the shop windows, are indications of the public feeling. Religion itself suffers much in this state of feeling, and no right-minded man can sympathize with the spirit in which some of the attacks on the Romish clergy are carried on; but this is greater reason why we should be more anxious to present that view of Christianity which will prevent liberty from degenerating into license.

Besides these agencies there are others which I can do little more than name. There are schools for Italian children, prominent among the founders of which is the Rev. Mr. Van Meter, who has lately come from America, and who is distinguished for his success in his own country in this department of work. He has formed already a considerable number, and is seeking to conjoin with them Italian preaching, while at the same time he has opened a large room for reunions of British and American Christians, that visitors to Rome may become acquainted with one another in a way that will do them and the city good. Then there is the British and Foreign Bible Society, with its depot in the Corso and its colporteurs; there is the Italian Bible Society lately formed, but comprising, it must be understood, as yet very few native Italians either in its committee or subscription list; and there is the Tract Society, with its depot near the Pantheon. This seems a long catalogue of agencies, and may lead friends at home to expect speedy and great results. But when you scatter them through a population of about 250,000 they are not so great. Then let it be remembered that the places for Italian preaching are generally small, uninviting, and in out of the way localities, and you will see that this must tell much against them. No such assemblies are possible as seem to have been convened in Madrid, and it is a prime necessity, as already observed, to secure, as early as may be, opportunity for this. The crowds which assembled at the discussion on the Episcopate of Peter and at the formation of the Italian Bible Society, show that the Roman mind is quite open to consider the claims of Protestantism, and, in some degree, also to the message of the Gospel. There are those who have received it and have given evidence of its power. No doubt there is a superabundance of materialism and indifference, and plenty of hatred of Rome, without the least desire for Christ, but there are signs of thoughtful men who are aware of the deeper wants of our nature and of the true strength of a nation. The other day, for example, I read a lecture by Professor Ercole Vidari, delivered at the University of Pavia, as one of a popular course, in which he speaks of the necessity for a positive religion of the heart and home in a way that would give one great hope of Italy, if there were many like minded. Before leaving the matter of churches and agencies, I may say that one thing is very necessary, viz., some agreement among them to secure co-operation, or at least to prevent collision. Some unseemly things have been done already which are a scandal in the face of the common adversary, and which lower the tone in which the servants of God should labour in so great a work. A proposal has been already made to secure this, not for Rome only, but Italy, and it is earnestly to be desired that it may prove successful. True heartfelt prayer for an outpouring of God's Spirit, so indispensable, can only come when men lift up holy hands without wrath and doubting. There are one or two other things to which I would have alluded as hindering rather than helping the work, viz., indiscriminate feeding of the children at some of the schools, and the gratuitous distribution of the Bible to all and sundry. Those who know Italy best and longest agree that these measures are prejudicial in the end. They may allow of so many scholars being counted for a little while, and so many Bibles disposed of, but the Bibles too often go into the stove or the hands of the priest, and they obstruct the work of the colporteur, whose sales secure so far that the Book will be preserved and read.

But I have already been too long. I believe that with all the difficulties and drawbacks there is a genuine work being done in Italy. Seed is being sown which, with God's blessing, will spring, or, to change the figure, wedges are being driven in which will shake and splinter the Papal rock, boast as it may of its strength. "Is not my word a fire and a hammer?" saith the Lord." It is very likely that beginning at first with small stones, which indicate the slope, it will end at last by a landslide. The first workers require great faith and patience and wisdom; let us ask it for them. The other day there was found in the excavations of the Palatine an old altar, with the inscription, "To the unknown God" (or Goddess)—the seeming counterpart of that which Paul saw at Athens, and which furnished him with his text. It is a curious coincidence that when the Gospel enters Rome again, it finds the old legend turning up, and in the devotions round it, it has still reason to say, "Whom ye ignorantly worship, Him declare I unto you"—that Saviour who is the perpetual need, the only satisfying inmate of the human soul.

I have not time left to give you general news. You can get them, I daresay, as well in the home papers, as we here—only that here they bulk as more important. The Italian Parliament meets this month in Rome, and has several matters of consequence to consider. There is the progress which must be made in the secularisation of monastic property. Several monasteries in Rome have already been occupied by the Government, but public opinion demands more radical measures. The present ministry seem to hesitate very much. They are afraid to raise too loud an outcry from the Papal party, and are, I daresay, fettered also by foreign relations. But it will come soon or late. Then there is the question of reclamation of waste land, and specially of the Campagna, so necessary for the health of the capital. This is connected with the previous matter, for a good deal of the property is in the hands of religious fraternities, and they will neither sell nor improve it. A bill is to be brought in regarding the Pontine marshes, compelling the owners either to drain their land or dispose of it. And there is lastly the subject of the finances, which bears on the ecclesiastical question as well, for, in the straits of the Italian exchequer, the church property is a tempting reserve fund. For years the national revenue has not been meeting the expenditure, and yet the taxes have been increasing till they are the subject of universal murmuring. The income tax amounts to thirteen per cent., and comes down much lower than with us, pressing upon the weekly wages of workmen. There is a perpetual battle between the officials and the rate-payers, as to who shall outwit the other, with great complaints of injustice and deception, and it is calculated that with all possible stringency which bears heaviest on honest men, the income tax does not realise more than seven per cent. Worse than the income tax, but less consciously felt, are the imposts on all the main necessities of life, which make them dear and bad. You ask what becomes of all the money, and there are several answers. Italy will have a large army and a powerful navy, and these cost many lire. Officialism prevails to an extraordinary degree, aggravated by the fact that so many states have been thrown together into one kingdom, and that sinecures and salaries cannot be at once reduced. And in addition, there are plentiful charges, whether just or not I cannot say, of corruption and speculation. In the midst of all, the Pope gets his yearly offer of three millions and a half of lire, which is the sum allotted him by the Italian Government in lieu of all claims. It was made to him again yesterday, and Cardinal Antonelli again refused to touch it, saying that the Pope could not and would not acknowledge the usurpation of Victor Emmanuel, and that the free-will offerings of his children were still a sufficient support for him. It is matter of congratulation that the temporal and spiritual powers here have been so long unable to come to terms, as it leaves religious liberty time to establish itself. It is surely also a thing of Divine Providence that the civil law of Piedmont is the one which has become the prevailing law of Italy, for it alone contained the principles of toleration. In no other State was there occasion for that question to arise, but Piedmont had to deal with it because she had the Waldensers as subjects. It was with special reference to them that the clause was inserted which has secured religious freedom for Italy. That small garrison in a cleft of the Alps has already, in God's hands, been made to gain this great result. May we not hope that greater things—Gospel truth and life, as the result of freedom—are in store through them and their fellow-labourers? . . . I am ever affectionately yours,

JOHN KER.

P.S.—Since I began writing this letter we have had a meeting of the Italian Bible Society's committee to frame a constitution. There was a strong disapproval expressed of indiscriminate Bible distribution, and I hope it will be checked. It is for the most part a great waste of time and money, brings the word of God often into disrepute, and makes the honest colporteur be looked on as a deceiver, who wishes to make gain of godliness.

We have had in our rooms a meeting of five colporteurs of the British and Foreign Bible Society to meet Mr. Burn, the travelling secretary. They recounted their experience in a simple, touching way, and seem to be men of sincere faith and good sense. The chief obstacle is not so much bigotry as indifference, but they are well received by the mass of the people, and gave some instances of decided good having been done. I was pleased with the thorough manner in which accounts of their work were required and given. At the close they were very suitably addressed in Italian by Mr. Miller, and one of themselves concluded with a fervent prayer. This same man gave some interesting accounts of encounters with priests. In one of them a Jewish Rabbi came to his aid, and challenged the priest to point out any unfaithfulness in the translation of the Bible. The people took the side of the colporteur and the Rabbi.

ACCEPTABLE SERVICE.

I LONGED to bring an offering to my King,
I longed for song that I His name might sing,
I longed for wealth to buy Him incense sweet,
I longed for rank to throw it at His feet.

But I was poor and crippled and alone,
I'd nothing but my trials to call my own ;
And whiles I let my heart grow hard and sore,
That some could give so much who loved no more.

The bitterness crept even to my prayer,
Crying, "O Lord, doth not Thy pity care?
Thou givest all, but givest nought to me,
Who crave it but to give it back to Thee !"

One day I slept and dreamed. Methought there came
An angel with the loved Apostle's name,

And he looked sadly on me as he said,
"Thine offering before the King is laid.

"Thy poor spoiled offering ! Was it meet that such
Be paid to Him whose love gave thee so much,
Gave thee His rarest gold—need's heavy chain ;
Gave thee His highest rank—the crown of pain ?

"For richest gifts should come from hands like thine,
Since Patience, Faith, and Peace build God's best shrine.
But thou hast wasted all. Thy discontent
To feed itself hath all His bounty spent.

"Put on thy crown of pain : it pricks thee less
The more thou wear it with contentedness ;
Lift from the dust and mire thy spirit's chain,
Turn thou thy life—such remnants as remain."

And I awoke with glory in the room,
For day had dawned and chased away the gloom ;
And Pain and Need and Loneliness stood round,
Their robes were ragged, but their brows were crowned !

They used to look so hard and cold and wild,
But now they stretched kind hands and sweetly smiled.
Lord, Lord, Thy pity cares so much for me,
Thou makest cheap the gift I offer Thee !

I.—NOTES AND COMMENTS.

AT PRAYER.

FOR six-and-twenty years, a large number of Christians in all parts of the world have been in the habit of spending a part of the first complete week of the new year in prayer for a larger measure of divine blessing to the world. Year by year, the number of persons uniting in this exercise has been enlarging, and now it is rapidly becoming a great catholic institution. It is a beautiful thought. Christmas and the new year are seasons of overflowing good will, of family unions, giving of presents, and hearty endeavours to make all around us happy. It is quite in keeping with the spirit of the season that all who are the children of God through faith in his Son should gather to the dwelling-place of the great Father, thank Him for his past mercies, and earnestly represent to Him the necessities of a world where so much darkness and so much misery still prevail. At such a time we may well feel with more than ordinary force that beautiful argument of our Lord—"If ye that are evil know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more will your Father in heaven give his Holy Spirit to them that ask Him?" If Christmas and the new year enlarge our hearts, may they not help us to believe more in the largeness of the divine heart? If we experience then the pleasure of giving gifts and conferring happiness, how readily may we believe that God has pleasure in doing the same? We therefore recal with peculiar delight this opening exercise of the new year. It is most interesting to think that almost without interruption the stream of intercession rose on high—that when it was night to one part of the family it was day to another, and that day and night the cry came to the divine ear, "Father, we thank thee for thy mercies to us—O pour thy blessing on the wide world around us!" Year by year may the cry swell, and may the number of hearts joining in it multiply; and never may the day come when the idea that prayer is lost labour shall check the flow of petition, or send back any member of the family as he hastens to join his intercession with that of the great multitude which no man can number.

One very attractive feature of these catholic movements is, that they bring out in an unalloyed form the pure, beneficent character of the Christian spirit. Viewed in our sections and denominations, we are apt to present to the world a mixed aspect—our sectional interests and aims rise into prominence; we appear eager to secure for our own cause or corporation more consideration, more money, or more fame. At least the world seizes on this, represents it as the great aim of all our sectional movements and even prayers, and sets us down as in the main just as selfish as itself, only less honest in our selfishness, professing to care so much for others, and really caring so much for the cause or corporation to which we belong. In this, while there is, no doubt, a measure of truth, the world certainly does no little injustice to the churches. But in a great catholic convocation to prayer, in which, sinking what is peculiar to our denominations, we simply set ourselves to ask for the world all that is best and highest in the blessing of our Father, the bright, beneficent aspect of the Gospel has a better chance of recognition. Surely it is a great thing to ask God to pour his best blessings on all mankind. To fill the whole earth with Himself and with his love; to reveal to every heart the glory of the Only Begotten, the Word made flesh, full of grace and truth; to bring souls without number into that fellowship from which all sin and sorrow, all tears and temptations, all disease and death are ultimately to disappear; to link men on to the Eternal, secure for them all divine light, grace, and purity, so that they shall at last be presented to the Father in all the perfection of their being, without spot or wrinkle, or any such thing—surely the aim is alike grand and blessed.

II. N.S.

EMBARRAS DE RICHESSES.

Fresh proofs of the unexampled material prosperity of the country are constantly occurring. The public revenue grows apace, and the golden image of a large surplus already dazzles the financial eye. The value of our exports has increased beyond all precedent. Industry is beginning to reap the benefit of the improvements which modern science has brought to bear upon it. Commerce is obviously profiting vastly from the facilities for communication which the railway, the steamboat, and the electric telegraph have multiplied so wonderfully. Evidently we are on the verge of a great and unexampled expansion of commercial transactions between the different parts of the world which are now coming together in so marvellous a manner. If no violent check be experienced, the enlargement of wealth is likely to go on in a more rapid ratio than ever. There are, however, many things involved in the "if;" and even those financiers whose eye seldom travels beyond the limits of the financial sphere, having a terrible dread of panics, feel that in this prosperity reasonable men can only rejoice with trembling.

One feature of the times is, that out of this wealth, large fortunes are made by some. The list lately published of men who had died during the last ten years leaving personal property exceeding in value a quarter of a million sterling, filled more than a newspaper column. Of this number there were doubtless some who made a noble use of their wealth; but such men are few, lamentably few. The greater part can think of nothing better as the result of all their pains, anxiety, and struggle, than to secure for those whom they love best a life of luxurious and listless idleness, and the right to choose for the family motto, "Vanity of vanities, all is vanity."

In many minds a bitter feeling is roused, that it is unfair that so great wealth should go to the few, and so poor a pittance to those through whose assistance they have been enabled to realise it. Hence strikes and struggles between labour and capital, with all their ugly offspring, in every branch of industry.

Much attention has been bestowed on the fact that it is the excise branch of the national revenue that shows the greatest increase. As the excise income is derived chiefly from intoxicating drinks, the inference is obvious that a large increase in the consumption of these has taken place even within the last twelve months. From this it is inferred that the working classes have spent in drink a large share of the increased earnings they have recently received. The inference is a sweeping one, and if it be made harshly and without discrimination it is liable to be resented. There can be no doubt, however, that, in certain industries, there has of late been a vast increase of drinking and of drunkenness. And, generally, there seems too much reason to fear that the drinking habits, which certainly sustained a check in the last generation, have received an impulse during the last two or three years. This is, perhaps, the most staggering consideration that has yet presented itself to the view of those who have been cherishing the thought of a more prosperous and blessed future for the people of this country. It shows with what redoubled earnestness and prayerfulness the class who labour for the good of their fellows have need to rouse the community to the habit of self-control, and to conscientiousness in the spending of their money.

It gives us pleasure in this connection to advert to the progress of the institutions termed "British Workman Public Houses." Their purpose is to provide the social comfort and refreshment of the public-house without its drinks that stupefy and intoxicate. And in lieu of those theatrical and musical attractions by which the ordinary class of public-houses often try, and with much success, to increase the number of their habitues, to substitute instructive and amusing readings, with songs and other musical recreations, free from all the objectionable features of the dancing and music halls of the other. We are glad to know that in Leeds this movement enjoys success, as well as in other towns of Yorkshire, and that public-houses of the same class have been introduced in London and in Edinburgh. We earnestly hope that they will become popular, and will aid in diffusing among the people a purer taste in the matter of social enjoyment.

● PAST, PRESENT, AND FUTURE OF RAGGED SCHOOLS.

The Committee of the London Ragged School Union, of which Lord Shaftesbury is chairman, have been considering very deliberately what course ought to be taken in the present crisis, in order to carry out the great ends for which the Ragged School movement was begun. They have come to a decided conclusion that there is still an imperative obligation on them to prosecute their movement with unabated diligence and liberality.

When the schools were started they were called "Ragged Schools," to make it obvious that it was the very lowest class of children that were sought to be benefited, and they were made free because in many cases the parents of the children could not, and in other cases they would not, pay even the smallest sum to secure for them the benefits of education, or any other benefits whatever. It was even found necessary, in many instances, to provide food and other things to induce them to attend. The great object of these schools was not merely to give the children the elements of a secular education, but to bring them under the saving influence of the Gospel, and secure their welfare for time and for eternity.

The establishment of School Boards, with power to compel the attendance of children, and to purchase sites and erect schools wherever required, has in some degree altered the aspect of the case as it regards Ragged Schools. There has arisen in some minds a feeling that they will be less needed, in consequence of the operations of the Boards; and likewise a feeling that contributions will be less willingly supplied, partly as not being so necessary, and partly because the rates will be an additional charge on contributors for educational purposes.

On reviewing the whole circumstances of the case, the committee have come to think that ultimately there will be less need for the day schools of the Society, but that as the absorption of the lowest class of children into day schools by the Boards will be attended with considerable difficulty and delay, they ought to be supported in the meantime wherever required. And instead of diminishing other operations, such as Ragged Sunday Schools, Penny Banks, Bands of Hope, Clothing Clubs, Mothers' Meetings, and Evening Classes, these ought to be more energetically supported than ever, and additional efforts should be made in other ways, including Infant Nurseries, Labourers' Clubs, Ragged Churches and Children's Services, Medical and Gospel Missions, Parents' Lectures, and Prizes for good conduct to boys and girls remaining for twelve months in their situations, and giving satisfaction to their employers.

And inasmuch as in the schools maintained by the Boards the religious education must be very defective, the committee will do their best to supplement it by other means. If necessary, they will employ paid agents for this purpose; but, meanwhile, they will see what can be done by the three thousand volunteer teachers who have so long engaged in the work.

Such are the arrangements which Lord Shaftesbury and his friends are preparing to carry out in connection with the Ragged School Union for London. Whatever may be found best in other places, there can be little doubt that for the enormous mass of London, the resolution come to is a wise one. It is eminently satisfactory to find that the Gospel element is not to be excluded from the machinery brought to bear for the recovery of the unfortunate children so sadly neglected. Little can, indeed, be looked for them from the alphabet and the multiplication table without something higher and more efficient. The very confinement and restraint of a school life will of itself rather irritate than allay their wild and restless spirit; it must be accompanied with something that shall have more power to excite sorrow for the past, joy in the present, and hope for the future. We trust that entering on this phase the ragged school movement will acquire a fresh impulse; and if there is to be less need for the efforts of its agents in the direction of mere secular instruction, we hope that with renewed energy and faith they will devote themselves to the moral and spiritual region which, to so large an extent, will yet remain for them to occupy.

LORD LAWRENCE'S VINDICATION OF MISSIONS.

The Times having published an article in connection with the day of special prayer for missions, charging the Church of England with failure in all her mission enterprises, many remonstrances were addressed to the Editor. Conspicuous among these was a remarkably calm and well-written letter of Lord Lawrence, the late Governor-General of India. Confining himself to the country which he knows best, he says the results of missions are far from insignificant. It is to be remembered that for the eight hundred years during which India was under Mahometan sway, the Hindoos clung to their own faith, and the Mahometans were baffled in their proselyting efforts—a thing that never happened anywhere else. The number of native Christians in India was some 300,000, by no means a contemptible number, considering that missions began only in 1813, and that missionaries are only to be found in a few large towns, and in many cases only one missionary to a town. Besides, it was becoming plain that the fabric of Hinduism was tottering. Many missionaries were men of the highest character, and there were native Christians at the time of the mutiny who submitted to death rather than renounce their faith in Christ. There were other grounds on which he considered the presence of missionaries and their families in India to be of the highest consequence for the stability of our Indian empire. It was unfortunately true that many of our countrymen gave to the people of India a most unfavourable idea of the English spirit and character. In fact their behaviour constituted one of the greatest difficulties that missionaries had to contend with. "But the more baneful the effects of such examples, the more necessary is it that we should apply the Gospel as an antidote. Apart from the higher interests of religion it is most important in the interests of the empire, that there should be a better class of men of holy lives and disinterested labours living among the people, and seeking at all times their best good." Lord Lawrence adverted too to the divisions of Christians as a hindrance to missions, although happily in India these were kept in the background.

The best thanks of the friends of missions are due to Lord Lawrence for this letter. Is it because missions and missionaries are deemed liable to create risk to commerce that the Times goes against them? Such a policy we regard as equally mistaken in its object, and miserable in the spirit inspiring it.

MR. DICKENS'S CARICATURES OF RELIGIOUS MEN.

Many are the friends of the late Mr. Dickens who have lamented most deeply the unfair representations of the religious world which are met with in his writings. Whenever any one is introduced professing to belong to a "serious" circle, we commonly find a noisy, fussy, coarse, repulsive being, selfish and false to the last degree, cunning and crafty in the accomplishment of his aims, wanting in every gentle and estimable feature—a being to be hated and abhorred. On the other hand, those that win our regard and affection, as model men or model women, have no special religious views, merely a touch of natural religion. The thing has become so common in other writers of fiction as to amount to a nuisance, even in a literary point of view. Thackeray has his Mrs. Hobson or Newcome in "The Newcomes," and in "The Virginians" Mr. Whitefield himself is exposed to his detracting sarcasm. Mr. Kingsley has his New Zealand missionary in "Alton Locke;" Mrs. Oliphant has a weakness for the dissenting minister; Miss Braddon can at least give to the religious character a passing fling. When names of such authority set the example, it is no wonder if the smaller fry of authorship most readily follows in their wake. No one denies that such characters are to be found; to the upright portion of the religious community they are a source of daily and bitter lamentation. But they are not the rank and file of the religious world, the fair average specimens of its membership. It is in representing them in this light that the great injustice of our fictitious writers lies. They are to the rest of the community as spurious half-crowns are to the true coin, or as pretended unfortunates, begging at our door, are to the really needy. And unfortunately it is not difficult to find a motive for the effort of novelists to give them the position of representative men, and virtually say to their readers, Ex uno disce omnes.

If it were not for the importance of the subject, and the great injustice which is done by these representations, we certainly should not advert to an incident having an important bearing on the practice which has recently come to light, and which is not creditable to the late Mr. Dickens. In the second volume of his Life, by Mr. Forster, there is published a letter written thirty years ago by Mr. Dickens to a friend in America, descriptive of a scene which he says he witnessed at the funeral of Mr. William Hone, the bookseller. Mr. Dickens says in that letter that when he went into the parlour where the family and the company were, there was present an Independent clergyman, with his bands on, and his Bible under his arm, who in a loud, emphatic voice thus addressed one of the company, Mr. C. (Cruikshank):—"Mr. C., have you seen a paragraph respecting our departed friend which has gone the round of the morning papers?" Mr. C. replied that he had. "Then you will agree with me," said the clergyman, "that it is not only an insult to me who am the servant of the Almighty, but an insult to the Almighty whose servant I am." "How is that, sir?" asked Mr. C. "It is stated, Mr. C., in that paragraph," says the minister, "that when Mr. Hone failed in business as a bookseller, he was persuaded by me to try the pulpit! which is false, incorrect, unchristian, in a manner blasphemous, and in all respects contemptible. LET US PRAY!" "with which," adds Mr. Dickens, in the same breath, "I GIVE YOU MY WORD, he knelt down, as we all did, and began a very miserable jumble of an extempore prayer. I was really penetrated with sorrow for the family. But when C., upon his knees, and sobbing for the loss of an old friend, whispered me, 'If that wasn't a clergyman, and it wasn't a funeral, I'd have punched his head,' I felt as if nothing but convulsions could possibly relieve me."

It turns out that the "Independent Clergyman" who officiated on that occasion was Mr. Binney, of the Weigh-House Chapel, whose high and noble character, in every sense of the term, is enough to falsify Mr. Dickens's narrative, and to turn the tables against him in a way very serious to his reputation as a correct observer and a truthful witness. Mr. Binney has written a paper in the Evangelical Magazine exposing the gross incorrectness of the whole statement. He never went to funerals with bands on. It has not been the practice of Independent clergymen at funerals to begin with prayer, but with reading the Scriptures. The loud, emphatic voice Mr. Binney says is purely imaginary. The paragraph to which reference was made was one in which Mr. Binney was represented as having advised Mr. Hone to take to the pulpit when he had failed in certain speculations, as if the pulpit was just such another speculation. This, along with the family, Mr. Binney thought insulting to Mr. Hone's memory, while, at the same time, it was insulting to him and his denomination that they should be represented as giving him so low advice. Mr. Cruikshank has written to the papers denying that during the prayer he whispered to Mr. Dickens the words ascribed to him in the letter. Mr. Binney hardly needed to impugn the accuracy of the statement, since no one who knows him could suppose him capable of the base, heartless and irreverent conduct ascribed to him in Mr. Dickens's letter.

Mr. Dickens may have become accustomed to view such things through the spectacles of exaggeration to such a degree as to be unconscious, or somewhat unconscious, of the liberty he was taking with the facts. If this explanation mitigates in some degree the blame to be ascribed to him in this particular case, it shows at the same time how little trust can be placed in him in any similar case. Even his statements of what he saw—of what he gives his word for—must be received with very considerable allowance. And as to his imaginary scenes and characters, we must make a very large discount for the effect of prejudice and dislike—the hatred he evidently had for religious men, and his disposition to draw their character in the most unfavourable colours.

A NOBLEMAN'S WORK IN A SUNDAY CLASS.

It is very singular, and matter for much thankfulness, that two successive Lord Chancellors of England should have been teachers of long standing in Sunday-schools. The "good old times" of Lord Chancellor Eldon could boast of no such phenomenon. The "Sunday-School Magazine" for January of this year has a portrait of Lord Selborne, better known among us as Sir Roundell Palmer, and an account of his labours as a Sunday-school teacher:—

"From twenty to twenty-five young men and lads of sixteen years and upwards," says the Magazine, "still find the Lord Chancellor regularly at the schools of All Souls' Church, Langham-place, Sunday by Sunday, with his Bible-lessons ready for them. Many of our readers know what it is to be hard-worked during the week; but let us assure them that they have no idea of the overwhelming character of the labours of a Lord Chancellor. Their work may be toilsome while it lasts; but in the vast majority of cases, the hour does come—however late at night—when it is over, and when their minds are free until the time for beginning again. But a Lord Chancellor's work, during the greater part of the year, is never done. Its responsibilities and anxieties never leave him; and it is almost impossible that he should ever be without the burdensome sense of accumulating arrears. The example of perseverance, therefore, which Lord Selborne has set, is one that should animate every faint-hearted or weary teacher to fresh exertions in the high and holy mission to which we have all been called. Two other features of Lord Selborne's work as a teacher we may without impropriety refer to, in both of which he sets an example worthy of universal imitation. In the first place, he does not rely even upon his well-stored mind, or upon his long practice in the arts of clear exposition and effective appeal, and go to his class unprepared. Most thoroughly is every subject specially studied for the purpose; most carefully are the notes drawn out in which the materials so gathered are woven into a well-constructed lesson. In the second place, he is not content with meeting and teaching his boys on Sunday. Each one has a place in his memory at other times; and those who have left are not lost sight of."

We do not copy this extract from any vulgar desire either to add to the eulogy of the Chancellor, or to throw round the humble work of the Sunday-school teacher the halo of an illustrious name. If Lord Selborne be the good man we take him for, he will care very little for the eulogy of his fellows. But there are two things well worthy of our notice here. In the first place, our busy men are our men for extra work. We find this alike in Church and State. The men who have most to do of their own are the men who do most for others. If we think to get much service from people who have plenty of time, we shall most likely be disappointed. When there is some pressure on a man, and his mental machinery is in full active operation, he is compelled to be methodical, and he hates to be idle. The other remark is, that if all labourers in Sunday-schools were as conscientious and careful as Lord Selborne, the results would be very different. Probably there is no body of professed workers where there are so many unskilled and uncared members as in the ranks of Sunday-school teachers. Many have been the recent complaints of the comparatively insignificant results of Sunday-school teaching; but would such results be experienced if all teachers took as great pains, and were as devout and earnest in their work as the Lord Chancellor?

MORE ABOUT ASSYRIA.

At the University of France, M. Jules Oppert, one of the great Assyrian scholars of the day, has commenced a course of lectures on Assyrian philology and archæology. He spoke of the new cuneiform record, relative to the Deluge, which has excited so much interest in this country. In regard to that document, it was of much more importance in reference to Assyrian archæology than in a Biblical point of view. The fact was, that the account of the flood preserved in Berossus was more close to the Biblical narrative than this newly-discovered record. What gave its chief interest to the latter was, that it explained the origin of the Assyrian myths transmitted by Ctesias. After commenting on it in this point of view, he remarked that the real discoverers of the document were Mr. Layard and Mr. Loftus.

Mr. Smith, the more immediate discoverer of the record, has made an interesting communication as to the probability of further documents being discovered in Assyria, and their probable contents and value. It is all but certain that immense stores of such material exist under the ruins of the ancient cities. The natives do not care for them one rush, but they have the idea that vast treasures are to be found in the localities, and that circumstance may quicken their research. Among the interesting topics on which light may be expected to be thrown by the coming discoveries, one of great importance is the origin of that Semitic race of which the Jews were a branch. Western Asia was originally peopled by a race quite different, with whom originated the Chaldæan civilisation. Another point relates to the early history of the Jews. Abraham left Ur of the Chaldees before the time of Chedorlaomer, and if the documents throw light on the time of the latter it will be useful in connection with the life of Abraham. The history recorded in the Books of Kings may likewise receive important elucidation. Then we may look for samples of the Chaldæan literature; a celebrated treatise on Chaldæan astronomy, for example, may be restored. And in other departments of literature the Chaldæan excelled, and our curiosity may be gratified in reference to these.

In connection with these things it may be added that an announcement has been made by M. Manch, an African traveller, that he has no doubt but that he has discovered the ancient Ophir, containing the ruins of a temple on the model of Solomon's, and a palace with surrounding edifices, which he believes to have been inhabited by the Queen of Sheba and her suite. The reasons given for believing in his discovery are too brief to be as yet of much value. The temple was of granite, with beams of cedar, and much cedar had been employed in the erection of the palace. The ruins were in tolerable preservation, and the ornamental designs indicated a high measure of antiquity.

SPIRITUALISM AND SCIENCE.

A controversy has been going on about Spiritualism. A long paper appeared in the Times, narrating what had been seen by the writer, and challenging the scientific world to tell how the phenomena were to be accounted for. Some of the phenomena were inexplicable so far as the known laws of nature went; and in calling on the leaders of science to throw light on them, the writer of the paper used a tone of sharpness that seemed to reproach them for their silence hitherto. A somewhat varied correspondence followed; and other journals took up the subject. According to some the whole phenomena of spiritualism are the result of trickery and deception. According to others they result from some law of nature hitherto unknown. According to the Spiritualists themselves they are caused by the spirits of the dead, or even of the living, entering into mysterious relations with men. And according to others—though this section has hardly been represented in the recent discussions—they are caused by Satan and his emissaries, who seem to act differently, at different periods of the world's history, in exercising a malign influence upon the sons of men.

For our part, notwithstanding the hasty and scornful manner in which the whole subject is in some quarters dismissed from view as degrading and unworthy of serious notice, we are disposed to agree with the writer in the Times, that the alleged phenomena do demand more careful scientific inquiry than they have yet obtained. Not that we have any sympathy with those who ascribe them to the influence of departed spirits. If ever there was an hypothesis that carried its own refutation, it is that the spirits of the departed occupy themselves with the silly, contemptible, and useless proceedings done under the auspices of spiritualism. It is hardly possible to conceive anything more strange than that certain men and women should reject all the evidence for the Holy Scriptures, and yet believe in the presence and operations of departed spirits through the turning of tables, and rappings performed thereon. But it is of some importance that the public should be helped to decide whether the alleged phenomena are due to deception, or to a subtle law of nature, or to the influence of evil spirits, or to these causes conjointly.

For ourselves, we do not profess to be able as yet wholly to solve this question. If there be in the phenomena any facts inexplicable on the ground of deception, or on the ground of some subtle law of nature, there remains only the agency of spirits, and these certainly not good spirits. We fall back on the old Scripture doctrine so much ridiculed by some, of satanic influence and "familiar spirits." In its wisdom "modern thought" has leaped to the conclusion that all the statements of Scripture on that subject are proofs of the dark superstition under which its authors laboured. The Duke of Somerset, in his recent book, now so nearly forgotten, laid it down as certain that the Gospels could not be historical, because they admitted the agency of evil spirits. Modern criticism, too, has been very hard on our forefathers for believing in witches, and punishing them severely. Perhaps this age is not quite so enlightened as it thinks. Evil spirits may get nearer to some of us than many suppose. And it needs not to be remarked that the result will be pernicious. In so far as modern spiritualism is concerned, we know of no instances in which contact with it has elevated the character or brightened the life. We know of many in which it has been degrading and demoralising. It is admitted generally that many who have taken it up have become insane. We do not wonder much at the repugnance to it of men of scientific power. But to solve the perplexities of many who know not what to make of it, it does seem desirable that it were examined more closely.

II.—GLANCES AT WHAT IS DOING ABROAD.

FRANCE.

While President Thiers has been fencing with his friends in the Assembly, who, not disguising their wish for a monarchy in some shape, have been eager to prevent too decided recognition of the Republic, Providence has so far cleared the boards by removing from the scene the late Emperor Napoleon. What Orsini and others tried in vain to do by bombs of terrible construction, God has done by a little bit of lime. The death of one whose name at one time was such a power, has been received very quietly, and indeed it would have been better for Napoleon's own reputation had it happened some three years sooner. He had outlived his power, and his name had lost its fascination. Misfortune had already caused men to form a more tender judgment regarding him; and within the few weeks previous to his death the knowledge that he was afflicted with one of the most tormenting of maladies, and that he could have no royal road to relief—nothing different from what avails for the poorest labourer—brought him closer to the hearts of men. The quiet domestic scene too, the distress of the Empress, the emotion of the boy of seventeen, and then at last the sudden falling of the shadow of death, have drawn to Chiselhurst the genuine sympathy of very many hearts.

Viewing the career of Napoleon in its relation to Christian interests, it is generally admitted that in France his rule was favourable to toleration. The Protestants had more freedom under him than under their previous rulers. As to his personal character, there seems to have been a remarkable absence of religious sensibility or impression of any kind. What were his views, or whether he ever examined the subject with any attention, seems to be hardly known. In regard to the interests of the Papacy, much though he long strove to maintain them by his troops in Rome, he undoubtedly helped to deal the blow under which it has reeled so terribly. Whatever may have been his intentions regarding Italy, he undoubtedly helped to give it that unity and independence which have been so fatal to the temporal power. And in so far as Great Britain is concerned, he ever strove to maintain a cordial friendship with us,—all the more remarkable that from his uncle he might be said to have inherited a legacy of enmity. His removal seems to make little difference either to the present or to the prospective condition of France. For anything that yet appears, the name of Napoleon may be held to belong only to the past.

GERMANY.—AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF A CONVERTED PRINCE-BISHOP.

An interesting work has just appeared in Berlin in the autobiography of Count Leopold Sedinitzky von Choltitz, once Bishop of Breslau. The current of conversion has been flowing so largely in this country from the Protestant to the Romish Church, that it is with equal surprise and gratification that we find an instance of the contrary taking place within the last ten years, in the case of a member of an influential Roman Catholic family, once the holder of the largest bishopric in the Church of Rome. The particulars of the case are mainly these:—Sedinitzky, while a child, being the member of an old patrician family, was designated and set apart for the priestly office, and, somewhat to the surprise of his friends, who thought only of the dignities he might attain, he gave himself earnestly to his serious calling, showed a great interest in theological study, and had a real and devout regard for the advancement of the kingdom of God. He was particularly marked for his unsectarian and candid frame of mind, fitting him for acting with great moderation in Silesia, where the population was partly Protestant and partly Catholic. Hearing of a Bible Society which had for its object to give the Scriptures to all without regard to sect, he was greatly captivated with the idea, and joined the Society, though ere long the chapter of which he was a member let him know emphatically what an imprudent step he had taken. Deeply interested in educational matters, he observed that the Protestant institutions were generally more efficient than the Romish, and he applied himself to increase the efficiency of the latter. His fair and liberal spirit did not suit the genius of the ultramontane faction, who were driving hard to get their views paramount in Silesia. In consequence of this he fell under the suspicion of the Pope, who, urged by the Jesuits, very plainly indicated to him that he had lost his confidence. By this time he was Bishop of Breslau, but seeing the energy of the Jesuits against him, and despairing of being able to reverse their operations, notwithstanding that he had the support of the Prussian government, he, after a time, resigned his see. Then he went to reside at Berlin. His further investigations into the great questions at issue between Protestants and Romanists terminated in 1863 in his slipping quietly into a Protestant Church at Berlin, and receiving the Lord's Supper. Throughout his declining years he retained the same interest in religious matters, the same candour, geniality, and conscientious attachment to duty which had characterized him before. Deeply interested in the German war with France, he lived to see its successful termination for his country; and his last recorded utterance was, "May Germany continue united, and become a land of peace and devoutness, never forgetful of what the Lord has done for it, and what it owes to Him." Memorable words!

THE POPE SCOLDING GERMANY AND ITALY.

The Pope has been raging against Germany, and Germany is raging against the Pope. There are some men that are hardly aware of the strength of the language they employ, and we would charitably hope that the Pope is of their number. To be an amiable man he has a large command of strong language. We have known a good man to affirm that a much-esteemed brother had been guilty of the lowest trickery and most consummate Jesuitism, and when remonstrated with explain that he meant to ascribe to him nothing more than the average share of indwelling sin. Whatever may be the Pope's meaning, his language is sufficiently strong. The Germans are persecuting the Church, not only with concealed machinations, but with open force, in order to destroy her, root and branch. Yet they impudently declare that they mean her no harm. The German papers say that the Pope has cut the last thread that bound him to the new Empire, and that there must henceforth be war. The Pope has offered an insult to the German nation. The path of the Government hereafter will be clear, and their action against Ultramontanism more decided.

The Ultramontane papers represent the Pope as having let in light on some den of dirty vultures, and "in the interior of their unclean hearts, liberals are now tearing and roaring as if the State were coming to pieces, and the earth opening upon them."

The Minister of the Interior, Count Eulenberg, prohibited the publication of the papal allocution as containing insults to the Emperor, and misrepresentations, fitted to bring the Executive into contempt.

Such having been the allocution of 23rd December, it does not appear that the Pope was in more amicable mood on the 1st January. The Governments that are going against him and their cities are like the Pentapolis of Scripture—the five cities of the plain. Rome and other places were revelling in festivities while the fire was descending that was to burn them up. When Goliath fell under David it was with his own sword that David cut off his head; when Judith slew Holofernes, it was also with his own weapon. "Thus," said the Pope, "will the revolution fall by the very weapons which it has brandished against truth, justice, and the Church." In the midst of his other trials, the Pope has learned that France will make no effort for the restoration of the temporal power. She cannot listen to the counsels of the clerical party; she requires peace and concord; and the counsels which they offer would lead her in the opposite direction.

III.—JOTTINGS FROM THE MISSION FIELD.

JAPAN.

A very remarkable degree of missionary interest is now drawn to Japan. From having been looked on, as it was very lately, as about the most hopeless of all fields for missionary labour, it has come to be regarded as one of the most hopeful. The reason of the change is partly owing to reforms in the civil government of the country. The day of the Tycoons has set; the government is now in the hands of the Micador. The new government has shown a remarkable tendency towards liberal views. As is well known, an influential embassy has been visiting this country, inquiring into our government and civilisation, and endeavouring to find out the causes of our prosperity. Members of that embassy have been brought into contact with our Christian institutions, and have been made to understand the share which these institutions have had in bringing Britain to the stage of civilisation and prosperity which she has attained. A member of the embassy visited the house of the Bible Society, and showed a great interest in the work there going on—of supplying all nations with the Word of God. Unfortunately there is not at present a complete Japanese Bible, the one printed some time ago being out of print; but a copy of the Bible in Chinese was given to him, and also a copy of the English Bible, which he had expressed a desire to purchase.

It is hoped that a new era will now open for the Gospel in Japan. The Government has been trying to discourage the imported religions of Buddha and Confucius, and to give support to Shintooism as the national Japanese religion. Amid the confusion incident to this policy, there is more chance of attention being given to the claims of Christianity. It is said that the Japanese have been accustomed to preaching on the part of their own priests, and will, therefore, be so far ready to receive it from our missionaries. It is also said that access to the female sex for instruction is by no means so difficult as it is in some other Eastern countries.

In connection with these changes in the prospects of Christianity in Japan, an interesting conference has been held by the various American missionaries (who have been the chief instruments, hitherto, in the Protestant missions of Japan), and a few others, in order to come to some understanding about future operations. Among the points agreed on are the following:—1. That a committee be formed to translate the Scriptures into the Japanese language. 2. That all native churches organized should be on the same plan—the government to be through ministers and elders, with consent of the brethren. 3. That a native ministry be raised up as speedily as possible. 4. That a committee be formed to take steps for the formation of a Christian literature. 5. That medical missions be associated with the other evangelistic agencies.

It was also resolved to encourage as far as possible the substitution of Roman for Chinese characters in printing works in Japanese, a change by which great saving of labour would be effected.

Encouraged by the hopeful changes that have taken place in Japan, the United Presbyterian Church of Scotland have resolved to establish a mission to that country. They propose to begin by sending out three missionaries, and in order to do so efficiently, they are to raise a fund at the beginning of eight or ten thousand pounds.

IV.—OUR MEMORIAL RECORD.

DEAN RAMSAY.

Edward Bannerman Ramsay belonged, if ever man belonged, to the church catholic, and would be entitled to a place in our memorial record, even if his numerous and valued contributions to the earlier volumes of this magazine did not demand such notice at our hands. Such was the fragrance of his character, that while we are embalming his memory his name gives fragrance to our page. The younger son of a titled family, he gave himself to the ministry of the Scotch Episcopal Church, without any left-handed view to family livings or ecclesiastical dignities. He himself has recorded in these pages some memorabilia of his English curacy in Somersetshire,* but his active life and ministry were spent in Edinburgh. When first his voice was raised in the community, the message of grace which he delivered was less frequently heard than it is now; and those whose recollections go back to that period speak of the affectionate earnestness with which he used to proclaim the great truths that concern the salvation of sinners. In mature life, the character of Mr. Ramsay was remarkable for its mellowness. The mildness of his natural temperament, raised to a higher tone by the Christian love which impregnated it, fitted him for exercising that gentle influence which more than any of his contemporaries he wielded over the community of Edinburgh. He had a great dislike to the extremes of party, and found it difficult enough at times, when pressed by men of more partisan spirit than himself, to maintain the calm and catholic position to which his principles and his feelings alike drew him.

In schemes for ameliorating the condition of the helpless and distressed, for rescuing the neglected and aiding the infirm, Dean Ramsay was peculiarly in his element. Our own pages have contained evidence of his affectionate interest in cabmen,† a class of men exposed to much hardship affecting both soul and body, for whose Christian and domestic welfare he had many earnest longings.

Dean Ramsay had a hearty appreciation of the character of his countrymen of all ranks, and his "Reminiscences of Scottish Life and Character" were designed to extend that appreciation, and deepen kindly feelings between class and class.

Towards his brethren of all denominations in Edinburgh he had the most brotherly feelings, and with some of them he was on terms of more than ordinary intimacy.

Bishop Cotterill and Dr. Lindsay Alexander, in their funeral sermons on the late Dean, have both touched on the manner of his death.

"He did not speak much of death itself," says the Bishop, "but repeated over and over again the lines of the touching Scotch song—

'I'm wearing awa'
Like snaw wreaths in thaw.'

It will interest many to know how the prospect of death as it drew nearer affected his own mind. Early in his illness he asked me to say the prayer in the end of the Communion Service:—"O most mighty God and merciful Father, who hast compassion upon all men." He asked also, as most people do, for the 14th chapter of St. John's Gospel, and for various hymns in Lord Selborne's 'Book of Praise,' most frequently of all for two which were his special favourites, and expressed the deepest feelings of his heart, 'When I survey the Wondrous Cross,' and 'Rock of Ages, cleft for me.' These two hymns were repeated frequently to him at his earnest request, and also sung by a kind and dear friend, whose rendering of them soothed and delighted him by its perfect music, and its devotional and feeling character. When, on Friday afternoon, he grew much weaker, and the doctors pronounced that he could not live many hours, his mind remained quite clear and tranquil. I repeated from time to time verses of Holy Scripture, which he took up and finished in every case himself. So, too, with the 23rd Psalm, and various short prayers and passages from the Litany. He asked for the 103rd Psalm, and went along with me in saying it to the end. Then he began the 'Gloria in Excelsis,' from the Post Communion. His articulation was beginning to fail, and at first I did not catch the words he was trying to utter. But when I did, and went on with the Eucharistic thanksgiving, he seemed pleased and said it after me, though with increasing difficulty, till it was finished. And it proved to be his last utterance on earth. He was only about an hour or so less conscious. I happened to be out of his room speaking to a person on business, when I was recalled suddenly as he had begun to sink more rapidly. It was evident that his end was very near, and so we knelt, and I said the commendatory prayers—"O Almighty God, with whom do live the spirits of just made perfect," and, 'Into Thy merciful hands, O Heavenly Father, we commend the soul of Thy servant now departing from the body;' and just as the final amen was said his spirit passed to its rest in God."

"After death," says Dr. Lindsay Alexander, "his features composed themselves into a statue-like repose. All signs of age and decay had passed away. The wrinkles were smoothed from his brow, and he lay like one who in the vigour of life had fallen asleep. It seemed to those who looked upon him as if they heard a voice from heaven saying, 'Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord from henceforth: Yea, said the Spirit, that they may rest from their labours; and their works do follow them.'"

DR. WILLIAM ELMSLIE.

We must spare a niche for the name of the devoted medical missionary who did so good a work in Cashmere. Hardly had he returned to India, in company with his young wife, when he was prostrated by illness, and when he sank amid the hardships of a laborious journey. Many a tear has been shed over his premature removal—and many a prayer offered that the work he carried on may have men of as devoted spirit to continue it.

AGAINST THE STREAM:

The Story of an Heroic Age in England.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE SCHONBERG-COTTA FAMILY."

CHAPTER IX.

HERE are many mornings in our lives, many moments which are as fountains, from which the rest of life continues to flow.

The old promise has been kept. Day and night, winter and summer, seed-time and harvest, have not failed.

And hereafter, also (I trust), it will be thus. It is in a pagan Elysium, not in a Christian Paradise, that "everlasting spring" abides.

What are blossoms which never ripen into fruit but painted shows? What is childhood which never awakens into manhood but a dwarfed or undeveloped humanity? What are seed-times which have no harvest but promises perpetually renewed and never fulfilled?

"No night there" must mean no darkness, no bewilderment, no losing our way, no missing our end, no horror of doubt, no shadow of death; certainly not, no fresh mornings. So often we confuse divine suggestions by vulgarising symbols into pictures, or by hammering out poetical images into prosaic parables!

Again and again in our lives "God takes us by the hand," as the old Moravian hymn sings, "and says, Start afresh."

Here, indeed, our fresh startings are made necessary, too often, by our wanderings from the way, or our weariness of the way. But the fulness of life there will surely not be less rich in variety and glorious growth than the hindered and fluctuating and failing life here. For ever it will be walking in "newness of life." O wondrous fulness of joy, when all the past shall enrich, not burden and sadden, the present; when before the heart, satisfied with the present in His presence, shall spread endless ranges of hope in the unveiled future, also in His presence!

We shall not be gods hereafter, but children of God; and, for ever, in our Father's hand, will be infinite possibilities of growth unforeseen by us, and divine surprises of bliss.

One such morning, or fountain head, in my life was that memorable afternoon when Miss Felicity exalted me to the stool of repentance and crowned me with the fool's-cap, and afterwards exalted herself and human nature in my sight by confessing herself in the wrong, and crowned me with the kiss of reconciliation, which sealed me her loyal subject thereafter.

For then and there three great friendships of my life began: that dear discipleship to Loveday Benbow—that tender affection to Claire des Ormes, half motherly, half lover-like—that faithful "cameraderie" with Amice Glanvil in many a pull "against the stream."

Before that day, in looking back, it seems as if life had still been cradled in the mountain tarn, mirroring the little world around, filling its own little cup. After that it began to flow.

And not mine, but my brother's also, which was in many ways more than my own to me. Our lives began to flow; and they began to part, into those two streams of womanhood and manhood which are each one so much more for being two,—so much more to each other, so much more to the world.

In the first place, it was just after that morning that for the first time I remember Piers took an opposite course to me.

When, in due time, the invitation came for us from Madam Glanvil to spend a holiday with Amice at Court, he would not go.

He was not quite ten, and I was not quite thirteen. I had in my small way been "a mother to him" for so many years. His refusal surprised me greatly.

My father did not seem displeased at Piers declining; indeed, he appeared to wonder a little at my delight in accepting.

Mrs. Danescombe, on the contrary, commended me. She said it was a very desirable house to visit at, and she was pleased to see me appreciate it.

"It is a big house certainly, Bride," said my father; "but you know we do not grow bigger by being in big houses."

"Mr. Danescombe," remonstrated my step-mother, "let me entreat you not to teach Jacobinism to Bride: for girls at least it cannot be suitable."

"It is not the house, father," I said; "it is Amice."

"Amice, with the glory of the big house about her," he said, "and the black servants, and the sedan-chair. How long have you known Miss Glanvil?"

"Oh, father," I said, "all our lives long."

"A very extensive period," he said. "I did not know you had ever spoken to each other."

"No, not exactly spoken until yesterday," I said, "but looked, and understood each other always."

He laughed, and said no more.

But in the evening I endeavoured to shake Piers's resolution.

We were sitting in that very miscellaneous lumber-room, music-room, and workshop of my father's, called the Summer Parlour.

I was planning Armadas, and talking of great naval campaigns. (We were just at the outbreak of the first war with the French Republic.) Piers was constructing a little ship; a division of labour frequent between us. He was essentially a maker, not a critic, except as far as criticism is necessary to construction. Whilst I was content with anything that would float, his quick eye caught the angles and curves which made the difference between swift and slow sailing. He was never satisfied until the little vessel was as perfect as his accurate hands could make it. I believe from early years he had an opinion that the talking of the world is mostly to be done by women, and by men who cannot, or will not, work.

"You will not go to Court, Piers?" I said. "It never can be because Amice called you a 'little boy?'"

He laughed.

"How like a girl, sister!" he said (not satirically; I never heard him say a satirical thing in his life, his nature was too downright and too sweet). Later in life I know he thought satire only the poor refuge of people who could not fight the battles—"not like you! What difference can calling me anything make? Besides, I am a little boy, rather; and I like Amice Glanvil. She is almost as good as a boy herself."

Feminine and masculine distinctions were becoming very pronounced. My Protectorate was evidently tottering; and also I felt a little jealous.

"I don't believe boys like girls better for being like boys," I said; "at least only quite little boys do. Claire des Ormes is not like a boy; and I am sure you like her."

"She is not like a boy or a girl, or anything," he replied.

"Less?" I said.

"No, you know very well, sister," he said, "more!"

"Yes, I think so," I said. "When she kissed me, it felt as if it had been the queen. What is she like? A fairy? or a princess? or an angel? or a hero?"

"How can we tell, sister? We never saw either. Only it would be worth while to do something for her, like what she did for you."

"Yes," I said, "it would. But there is nothing to do."

"Something always comes to do," he said, "when we are ready."

It was a cheerful view of life, and more axiomatic than Piers knew.

We had wandered from Amice and Court.

"And you will not go to Court? Not if father wishes it?"

"Father does not care," he said.

Which I knew was true.

"Not to see Amice? who is nearly as good as a boy, and all those wonderful monkeys, and parrots, and models, and museums?"

"I can see Amice at school," he said.

"Oh Piers, why won't you? Not with me?"

"Sister Bride, I cannot," he said. "I cannot be waited on by slaves."

We had heard so many stories of the wrongs and cruel hardships of slavery!

I had cried over them so many times; and planned so many wonderful schemes of rescue; and had sometimes thought Piers rather lukewarm on the subject.

And meantime, the griefs which had melted into tearful dewdrops with me, had been entering into his very heart.

I could say no more.

So, I went alone to Court.

It was more awful than I expected. I was met at the door by the two black footmen, and ushered with bows through the hall, museum, and dining-room, into the large withdrawing-room.

No one was there ; and alone in those great stately rooms, among the ancestral portraits and the ancestral chairs, and the Japanese cabinets ; alone, without Piers to matronise, I felt a very little girl indeed. And that uncomfortable consciousness of clothes not quite duly identified with me, which through my stepmother's monitions had become the spectre of my darker moments, came on me.

Only until Amice came in, and by her presence filled the grand old rooms with life, not rushing or gushing, by any means, but with that essential reality and absence of self-consciousness about her which always made everything of the nature of clothes and conventionalities sink into due subordination.

That, I suppose, was partly what Piers meant by her being like a boy.

She came forward and took my hand.

"Where is Piers?" she said, "your little brother?"

My eyes fell.

"He could not—did not—come," I said, in some confusion.

"Would not," she said decidedly. "He is a strange little boy, but I like him."

She seemed to me rather candid about my kindred.

"He is the dearest brother in the world," I said.

"No doubt," she said, "to you. He is your own. You are not in the least alike. But I like you."

She never asked if we liked her.

"You have another brother who is not like either of you," she said, "very little. I do not like him. He looks as if he had been born old."

That was unfortunate, for my stepmother, I knew, looked on my friendship at Court as an introduction for Francis.

I began to think her confidences as to the family had better stop.

But she continued.

"I like your father; he is a gentleman, although he does think it wicked to have slaves. I am glad your mother is only your stepmother. She is like your little brother. And I always want her to be well tossed about in a wind. A storm at sea would be best. That shakes one out of many things."

It was very curious to find we had all been looked at and through so long, by those wistful, inquiring eyes.

And here was a new and most interesting glimpse into her former life!

"You have been in a storm at sea! That must be wonderful," I said, not sorry to reverse the telescope and turn it on her own life.

"Yes. I liked it," she said; "especially when it was dangerous."

She had her hat in her hand; she put it on and led me into the garden.

"The waves were very high?" I asked.

"It was not the waves I liked," she replied, "it was the people. It was as good as the play, indeed it was much better, because it was the other way. Every one changed characters—changed into themselves. It was great fun. People who had told wonderful stories of their killing lions and tigers, and frightening slaves, turned quite white, and wrung their hands, and kept questioning the captain, like women, if there was any danger? And one man, who had laughed at the Methodists, and had sworn big oaths, actually came and asked my poor Chloe to pray for him. It was capital fun."

I began to think her rather elfish and hard-hearted—"cynical" I should have said had I known the word.

"Chloe is a Methodist," I replied, rather evasively. "I know a Methodist too, old Reuben Pengelly."

"Yes," she said; "the old man with the violoncello, in a scarlet waistcoat. Chloe loves him like a brother. And Chloe heard from him about you. He loves you all so much. Only Granny won't let her go often to the meetings. She says it gives those poor creatures notions."

"What notions?" I said, rising out of my life-long awe of Amice, with some indignation. "No one would get anything but good notions from Reuben."

"Good notions for white people, very likely," she replied; "but white people and black are not the same. At least so Granny says. I am not sure; however, it makes very little difference to Chloe. For she has her notions, wherever she is, and they make her very happy."

"What notions made her happy?" I asked.

"That God is very good, and loves every one, black and white. That He can make black people have white hearts," she replied softly. "It makes her very happy. But I cannot quite see it. At least if I were black I should find it difficult to think God had cared much, or taken much trouble about me."

"I did not see it once," I said, "till Reuben showed me."

"Did not see what?" she said, looking full into my eyes.

"That God was good to me," I said.

"To you!" she replied, rather scornfully. "Then you must certainly have been very cross and ungrateful. I can see that plainly enough. You have a father and a brother!"

"He had taken away Mother!" I said. It nearly choked me to say it, but I felt I must. "And I was ungrateful, and did not understand Him. But I do now!"

She smiled a little peculiar smile of her own, sarcastic but not severe.

"Understand God!" she said, with a strange depth in her tone. "That is a good deal for a little girl. You are a year younger than I am. Reuben told Chloe."

"Understand that He is my Father, and is good, always," I said, "to every one."

"That is a good deal too!" she said; "more than I do. But Chloe does. She says our Saviour let a black man carry his cross. I am not quite sure of that. Because, they were not all black then in Africa, the history says. That is the worst of history. It disturbs so many nice notions. But Chloe knows nothing of history, at least only that one History. And it comforts her to think of that black man carrying the cross. Why I can't exactly see, even if it is true."

"Ah, Amice, I can see!" I said. "Wouldn't you have liked to carry it for Him?"

She paused a moment, and then said, very slowly and gravely—

"If He had given it to me. But He did not. It was only the Romans."

"It is almost always the Romans or the Jews who do lay things like that on people," I said. "But it was His cross. Ah, I do think I should have liked that! To have helped Him a little!"

"I think you would," she said, with a sort of tenderness that had not been in her voice before. "I would rather have beaten off the Jews and the soldiers."

"I should not like to have been the Romans!" she added, very low and sadly. "Do you think any one can be like that now?" she asked, with one of her sudden, inquiring looks, as if she would surprise an answer out of one's eyes.

The whole meaning flashed on me, and I was dumb.

"Because," she said, "if that History is always going on, as Chloe seems to think, there must always be the two sides, and one would like to be sure on which side one is."

"Do you care for flowers?" she resumed, changing her tone and subject suddenly. "I don't; unless they are wild. Furze and heather on the down, when one is galloping over it, are nice. But in beds they are tiresome. And especially in green-houses—mere things in pots. It is dreadful to have to grow up. When I am seventeen I shall have to show Granny's visitors round the green-houses, and listen to them saying how gorgeous this flower is, and how lovely that leaf is, on and on for ever. Animals are what I like. They are so queer, and yet so fond of one. And one can so easily make them happy. And they have no souls, which is a great comfort, when creatures belong to one; it saves one from so much perplexity. At least no souls that can be lost; no conscience; that is the troublesome thing. Are you sure they have no souls of some kind? Dogs now, and some horses look as if they had some kind of souls growing in them, something beginning to be a soul. Don't you think so?"

I had never speculated on the psychology of animals. My chief personal attachments had been among cats, except indeed Pluto.

"I certainly never thought my step-mother's cat had a soul," I said. "If it has, it must be such a very bad one, I am sure I hope it hasn't. And I am sure it has no conscience. Nor my own kittens. They purr and rub against one, and are so soft and comfortable that I never thought of their wanting anything more."

"Cats? Certainly not!" she replied, decidedly. "I always think, one could have made a cat oneself, almost. All fur and purr, and wanting to be stroked. That is, some cats. There are others, like tigers, all cunning, and stealth, and spite, one could not have made, would not if one could. Ah, Bride! (may I call you Bride? It is so much more like you than Bridget) how many puzzles there are! Does it not seem as if the devil must have created some things?"

"The devil create anything!" I said indignantly. "No! God—the good God—created everything, and created everything good."

"It is not all very good just now," she said, shaking her head. "At all events, the devil has spoiled a great deal."

All this was said at intervals, as she was showing me round the place, garden, rabbit-hutches, pheasantry, poultry-yard, her own horse in the stables, where the great blood-hound fawned on her, and the large stag-hound put his paws on her shoulders in a rapture of welcome.

"There!" she said, "down Leo! poor fellow! Dogs one certainly could never have made."

"Some creatures love me, Bride, you see," she added. "I am not sure that you do. You think me too like a boy. You see I was the only child, there was no son, only a daughter, and I have to do for both."

"AGAINST THE STREAM."

She did care, then, to be loved. So daring and apparently independent, yet so sensitive to every change of feeling in those she cared about—she, too, had need of love, as much as I had.

For I had been feeling just a little doubtful about her; and she knew it as well as if I had said all I felt, in plainer words than I could have found.

We came to the kitchen garden.

"I like this," she said. "The vegetables have something to do. They are not like the flowers, fine ladies living to be looked at. Especially geraniums and dahlias, and camellias. They are as if they were stiffening into wax-work. Some of the flowers are just sweet and lovely because they cannot help it; and so natural and full of life, no gardeners can spoil them. Roses, lilies of the valley, the great white queen-lily, and violets. But vegetables, poor things, are always doing their best in an honest and simple way, and not thinking about themselves. And the flowers in kitchen gardens are always the nicest, don't you think? I suppose the company of the useful humble creatures improves them."

Then she led me silently to a mouldy little arbour in an angle of the wall.

"Don't you hate arbours?" she said. They are the most ridiculous things. They are neither open air nor indoors. And I hate all things and people that are neither one thing nor another. There is Clapham, for instance; stuck-up houses and bits of gardens always trying to look like country. How I should hate to live there; although your hero, Mr. Granville Sharp, does live there, and other people who are something like him!"

How much she had seen! Clapham, I knew was near London. My father had a first cousin there, to whom one day we were to pay a visit.

"What is it in you, Bride Danescombe, that makes me like you, and say everything I ought and I ought not to you? You don't say much. And I am sure you don't always like what I say. But you know it is quite useless for me to seem somebody else, and make you like that somebody else, and then wake up and find it was not me."

I wanted to say how much I did like her. But I could say nothing.

"Now," she said, with a little monosyllabic laugh—(she never laughed in peals, only with her lips and eyes, and that one little quiet musical dropping of laughter)—"I will show you my likeness. I have kept it for you since the day you called Granville Sharp a hero."

And from a corner of the seat she took a little crocus-bulb. It had a curious long appendage to it like an ivory knitting-needle. "I found it, lying forgotten and forlorn, in a piece of turned-up ground," she said. "It could not get at anything to root itself in, in any natural, proper way, like other crocuses; and so it shot down this ugly thing, feeling and feeling for something to twist its roots about. And at last it found something."

"Oh, Amice, Amice," I said, feeling those motherly wings fluttering all warm in my heart once more, "you mean you found me!—Me!"

And I knelt down and put my arms all around her, and hid my head in her lap, and began to cry.

"I do love you. We have liked you so long, Piers and I. But oh, indeed, you want more than me. What am I?"

"You are a good, dear little soul," she said; "as kind as old Leo or poor Chloe. And with a kind of soul and conscience which makes you, on the whole, better than Leo, especially as I have nothing to do with it."

And she gave me such a long kiss, and such a long, close hug—her whole heart seemed to come into mine.

And then, with her little short laugh again, she gently pushed me away, as one puts down a little child.

"There! what would Granny say? She would call it a 'scene.' And Mrs. Danescombe? All your pretty feathers ruffled as if you had been out in a south-wester. Come in and preen yourself, and Chloe shall help you."

Then again, with that quick sympathetic interpretation—"Not Chloe? Well, then, I will. But you may tell your little brother, Chloe is not a slave. There are no slaves in England now. Your Mr. Granville Sharp got that settled years ago, as you might have known, if he is such a hero, and you such lovers of blacks."

On our way in we met Madam Glanvil, as she was usually called in Abbot's Weir.

I had never seen her before, except at church, or in state in her coach. And now she was in her ordinary attire, a plain, closely-fitting woollen dress (woven in the cottage-looms of Abbot's Weir), rather short, with a hood, all grey—not Miss Loveday's grey, dove-like, but prosaic, black-and-white grey.

A very fine, erect, manly old lady, pacing through her fields and gardens in stout leather boots, with her steward.

"Grannie is like me," said Amice. "Since my grandfather died, she has to do for both."

Described in colour, her whole effect was steel-grey, as Loveday Benbow's was dove-colour. Her eyes were steel-grey, with clear, steely gleams, and also stormy, thunderous flashes.

She looked me all over, not, however, in a way which made me conscious of clothes. Then she nodded, rather approvingly, and then she said—

"Go in and get ready for dinner. You have seven minutes. Do you think I can wait for children?"

"She says whatever she likes, and no one can answer her," said Amice. "She is deaf, you know—so deaf that she never hears anything but what she likes, so that it is quite useless to be angry or to defend one's self. But she likes you, I see from her nod. Grannie's nod is like Jupiter's, you know, in the Homer; so don't be afraid."

The dinner was silent. And again, the weight of the big rooms, and the black footmen stepping as softly as my stepmother's cat, and the plate, and the Nankin china, like our very best, which was never used—were a little oppressive to me.

After dinner Madam Glanvil settled herself to her nap in a great chair by the window, and told us to go and amuse ourselves. But before she spread the Bandana silk handkerchief over her face, to keep off the flies (of which she spoke in language so strong, it sounded to me rather like swearing), she called me to her.

"Stand there in the light, Bridget Danescombe," she said, "and let me look at you."

There was something in her direct, imperious way which amused me; and not feeling under her sceptre, I stood fearless, looking up occasionally into her grey eyes, wondering what she would say or do next.

"That will do, child," she said, with her Jupiter nod. "You may go away and play. You are like your father, except bits of you that I don't know—your eyes and eyebrows. I suppose they are your mother's. The Danescobes are not a bad stock to come of, as old a family as any in the county, only on the wrong side, generally, as to politics, when there were politics worth thinking or fighting about: the older branch, but Parliamentarians; the younger branch managed better, stuck to the king, and are in the House of Peers. And I hear your father is following the family ways—Whig or even Jacobin, or one of those philanthropists who are worse, always minding other people's duties. Don't flush and blush, child. People cannot help what they inherit. I have no opinion of people who change their family politics or religion; although it is a pity for them, of course, if they happen to be wrong. Your father is a gentleman, and a Danescombe—Danescombe of Danescombe. The pedigree is right enough. One thing I regret—he should not have gone into trade; though, certainly, younger branches and decayed branches sometimes must. It is better than begging, or than that vile law. I've seen enough of that—always leading one on, and then turning against one, and making charges for talking and writing. Beggarly! And the king's service certainly does not pay, or the Church, unless there is a family living. However, that's no affair of yours. You may come here whenever you like, and Amice likes. Only don't flush and blush, or throw yourself into raptures. And if Amice lends you a horse, which she may, to ride over the Down together, don't be nervous and throw it down, as town children are apt to do. And, if you can help it, don't be a philanthropist. I will have nothing to do with philanthropists. You look a sensible little maid, but rather soft and melting—the kind of stuff those people are made of. And being in the family, it is dangerous—infectious too. And, remember, I will have nothing to do with philanthropists. There, go and play, or ride, or anything you like."

And drawing the Bandana handkerchief over her face, she dismissed us.

"But," I said to Amice when we were alone, "it is a little trying that your grandmother should be deaf just in that way. It makes one feel dishonest not to answer her, especially when she says things about other people. If my father is what she calls a philanthropist, I am sure the last thing he does is to mind other people's duties. The motto he gave me was, 'Other people's rights, and our own duties.' Is it quite impossible to make your grandmother understand? at least about father?"

"Quite," said Amice. "And if she did hear that motto, she would not like him any better for that. She would think he meant it was his duty to look after people's rights and wrongs; and that is exactly what she objects to, as to the black people you are all so fond of. But I like the motto, Bride. Only, it might lead one, no one can tell where; at least me."

The nearer I came to Amice the deeper the mystery in her seemed. It was like wandering through a great northern pine forest, in the twilight; glimpses here and glimmerings there, and everything seeming to lead into a new infinity.

What had the shadows been which had lain so deep in her early life that they had made the faith natural to her a Manichean dualism? that terrible faith always ready to spring on us from the darkness of sin and sorrow, that evil is co-eternal with good, and in might perhaps co-equal.

CHAPTER X.

A WHOLE ocean of new life and thought was opened to us through the advent of Madame la Marquise des Ormes, Claire, and Léontine. There was also an Abbé, madame's brother, who occasionally appeared, but preferred to live in a large sea-port town about fifteen miles off. M. l'Abbé, like many of his countrymen, was not complimentary to his land of refuge. He said the most comprehensible thing to him in the character of the English was their passion for the sea. He could for himself see no way of living in such an island of "brouillard" and "bourgeoisie," except by keeping constantly in view the one means of escape from it.

Among the four we had brought before us four sufficiently characteristic phases of the France of our day.

Madame was Royalist to the core, with the chivalrous old French royalty which the death of Louis XVI. and Marie Antoinette enkindled into a passion and exalted into a religion. Monarchy and martyrdom united had surrounded the son of Saint Louis with a halo so mystically interwoven of earthly and heavenly splendours, that to see prosaic fact through it would have passed the penetration of any mortal vision. In the later days of Louis XIV., and through the reign of Louis XV., her family had lived a good deal in retirement on their estates. The ladies of the race especially had not shared in the sins and splendours of that corrupt and corrupting court, but had lived in familiar and gracious intercourse with their peasantry, never contemplating the possibility of a state of things in which great ladies could do anything but reign and distribute alms, and peasants desire anything but rapturously to receive alms and serve.

That there could be any great fundamental wrong in the nature of things which made it the highest hope of the majority of labouring men to end life as dependent pensioners on the bounty of the minority never occurred to them. How could it have done so?

Such wrongs intertwined with the innermost fabric of society are, I suppose, seldom perceived from within, until the slow growth of abuse at last interferes with some elementary law of gravitation or cohesion, and the whole edifice crumbles into decay or crashes into revolution.

Besides, unfortunately, it is precisely those who would most gladly correct such abuses who naturally come least in contact with them. Their own virtues clear the region immediately around them, and if anxious and foreboding politicians talk of "Augean stables," they reply, incredulously, "Was ever stall cleaner swept than mine?"

Madame des Ormes from the first seemed to single out our family. She was sure there was French blood in our veins—the highest compliment she could pay; there was a peculiar curve of the eyebrow in my mother's picture and in me, never seen in pure English faces. It was true. My mother's grandfather had been one of the exiles in the Huguenot persecution. Ours was the only house in the town she volunteered to enter. My stepmother she considered a little "bourgeoise," but my father's manners she approved. Some people's manners she said were too much for them. Like badly made dresses, you could never forget that they had them on; and some people were unfortunate enough to have no manners at all. In the last category she included Madam Glanvil, who was the only person I remember her speaking of with a little tinge of hauteur.

Her natural social level was that of the Countess of Abbot's Weir. And I well remember the glory reflected on Madame and Claire, and even on Léontine, when the Countess's coach stopped at Miss Felicity's door, and the Earl and Countess went up into Madame's apartment.

I never knew what happened at Court. Madame, with M. l'Abbé and Claire, had been invited there with all ceremony, and entertained with all state; and Claire told me Madam Glanvil had offered to have them driven home in the family coach. But her mother had declined. "She was only a poor émigrée," she had said to Madam Glanvil, "and must disuse herself from such pomps." To Claire she said that nothing was so intolerable as that etiquette of the province, or "the great airs of the little noblesse." And she would never go to Court again.

Nor was Madame altogether charitable to Amice. She pronounced her a little wild: Madame "liked wild creatures in the forest—they had a fine free grace of their own; but in the salon one never knew what they would do next." "In a word, the whole household was Insular." I am afraid to Claire, Madame said, with a little compassionate shrug, "in fact, English."

Madam Glanvil, on the other hand, whose classifications were rather generic than specific, at once set down Madame la Marquise as frivolous and given up to vanities, M. l'Abbé as an ancient dandy, and Claire as a butterfly, and all three as, "in short, French." The only person of sense and character among them, she considered, was Léontine; but then Léontine was a Protestant, and made bargains, and did her work, and came to church like any other Christian, "so that she was scarcely to be called a Frenchwoman." I tried often to bring my two groups of friends together, but in vain.

The inevitable result of contact was effervescence. Pressed closer, it would have been explosion, at least, on Madam Glanvil's side. So I had to desist.

Meantime, whatever else we learned or unlearned, the meaning of many words expanded wonderfully through our intercourse.

French and English ceased to be the simple, plain definitions they had been. It was evident to us there were so many kinds of French. And to Claire, at least, it soon became evident that there were many kinds of English.

Then that word "bourgeois," how many puzzles it made for me; and also how many it helped to explain, in endeavouring to translate it to myself or to Claire! How much of English and French social life and politics lay wrapped up in it! Had we absolutely no synonym for it?

I had heard Madam Glanvil use the expression "town's folks" with something of the same unflattering emphasis. But then, with her, that meant not merely the lack of a social distinction, but of country habits. She would have used it with little less depreciation for fashionable men about town than for unfashionable men and women in Abbot's Weir. It meant people who could not ride, or hunt, or tramp about ploughed fields; effeminate creatures who carried umbrellas, and could not brave a herd of cattle. It had indeed to do in some measure with trade. Certainly trade was not to be accepted except as a last resource, and people who contrived to get rich by trade were to be set down.

But, there even, was no sharp impassable barrier between gentry and "town's folks." People of good family had (unfortunately, of course) to live in towns, and to go into business. Claire's father, on the contrary, under the Ancien Régime, would have had formally to resign his sword, and his cachet of nobility, before he could demean himself by trade.

In England there was, indeed, an aristocracy prouder, perhaps, than in France; but prouder because less fenced in. Pride had to hold firm the barriers law had left open. Titles which in the third generation ceased entirely, and a nobility continually recruited from the bench, the manufactory, and the counting-house, were, in a very different sense, sacred from the great old noblesse of France.

"Middle classes"—did that express the thought better? In some respects. But it also expressed the difference. Middle; that is, between the upper and lower. But where the upper ended and the lower began, who could say? Especially as neither upper, middle, nor lower, were stagnant waters resting at their own level, but all in a continual state of ebb and flow in and through each other; so that, with all due respect to the catechism, the "station to which God has called us" is by no means a fixed line, always perfectly easy to determine in a society, where nothing is stationary.

"Pleasant old barriers," Madame des Ormes thought, "when people were not always struggling upwards, but content with each other, themselves, and their station." There were "stations" in those days; and people had "leisure."

"Pleasant, picturesque old barriers," my father said, "except that, within them all the time was gathering the flood which swept all barriers away, and much soil, and much life, which no floods could restore."

Pleasant evenings they were, when Madame des Ormes and my father sat on each side of the great chimney in the Stone Parlour. Madame always preferred the Stone Parlour. She said to Claire, who told me, that the Oak Parlour was like a state-chamber without the court; and the great drawing-room like a mortuary chapel without the sanctuary, only entered once a year, and terribly bourgeoise. But the Stone Parlour was like France, like the hall of an old château where they met after the chase. There were the sporting-dogs, and the great logs flaming and crackling, and cheerful talk, and going in and out.

My father spoke French easily, and understood it perfectly, a rare accomplishment for Abbot's Weir in those days; and to Madame his manner had a deferential courtesy which she said always reminded her of the Old Court.

Her dress I cannot so clearly recall; I suppose because it always seemed such a natural part of herself. But her manner charmed me inexpressibly. There was such vivacity and such suavity in it; such grace and such freedom. And then her whole person seemed an organ of speech. She spoke not only with her voice; or with her eyes, like Amice; but with every graceful bend of her throat, and turn of her arms. And as to her hands, their movements were like music. They made her conversation as sweet and as varied as singing.

She was, however, not without serious anxiety about my father. She thought him, like her poor brother the abbé, too "philosophe;" and had not they proved in Paris to what that led? Many a fragment of their conversation used to drop into our minds, as I was playing with Claire or Piers by the window, or as we sat silent by the fire, and interested me more than anything we were doing.

They had many a debate over Arthur Young, the traveller, in the course of which all kinds of curious details of old French manners and customs used to come out.

And those debates were sure never to spoil any one's temper. Many sparks were struck, but there were no explosions.

There was a common ground of tender pity for human creatures in general; and a sense that the world, and even the Church, in every corner of it, even to that most unsearchable corner within ourselves, needs a great deal of setting right.

Mr. Young, she would admit, might draw but too truly, gloomy pictures of famished men, driven in herds across the hills, unfed and unpaid, leaving their own fields untilled to render serfs' service to the seigneur.

"But, Mr. Danescombe—he should not have left out the other side—there are hard masters and hungry labourers in all societies. Or are you, perhaps, so fortunate as to have none? Are those parish apprentices you spoke of all exactly content, and well fed? Mr. Young should have come to Les Ormes; and you also, Mr. Danescombe. We would have entertained you with an hospitality not quite, I hope, unworthy of your own. You should have seen how the services our peasants had to render us in harvest or vintage or even on the roads were made quite a fête to them. We killed our oxen and our fatlings, and spread tables for them on the terraces of the château; and we, the ladies of the Castle, waited on them ourselves, and the sons and daughters of the Castle danced with them afterwards on the greenward. It was Arcadian; the costume of the peasantry blending with the toilettes of the old Court (each, of course, keeping to their own), the prince hand in hand with the peasant. Our peasants complain of our preserving forests for the chase? They were never so happy as when they accompanied us in the chase, and I assure you many a fine brace of game found its way from the seigneur's pouch to the labourer's pot au feu. They were afraid to complain, perhaps, you think? Quite the contrary. I see here nothing of the free speech there was between our people and ourselves. The quick wit of our countrymen and countrywomen, moreover, I assure you, could give us as good as we gave."

(I had heard Amice say much the same of the negroes.)

"They say our noblesse did not care for the poor. Mr. Danescombe, never believe it. Did not our mother teach us to make petticoats and jackets for the old women? And did not we dress the young brides from our own wardrobes with our own hands? Did we not make dainties for our sick, and tend them by the sick-beds? You should have seen our Christmas fêtes and distributions. The people adored us. So completely of the past as all that is, I may say it now without vanity. They said no garments wore, and no dainties tasted, like those which came from our hands. Ah, Mr. Danescombe, they make me forget the Sermon on the Mount, those false accusers. But in those days, believe me, there were little secrets of that kind between us and the good God, which, if the poor deluded people forget, perhaps He will not. You think we were an exceptional family? My mother was perhaps an exceptional woman. Her piety had been learned at Port Royal, and some of our friends did sometimes accuse it of being 'tant soit peu Janséniste.' One of our estates was not far from Port Royal des Champs. As children, we were sometimes taken to see the ruins. My mother could explain them: the church which they filled with corn for the poor, the gardens and fallen cells made sacred by their prayers, made doubly sacred by their charity; and she would never leave those poor up-turned graves without praying in memory of the holy souls of those who had lain there. As a child, I never quite knew whether, because by some inexplicable mischance they had missed the way of salvation and needed our prayers, or because we needed theirs. It was difficult. They were so saintly, so heroic, and yet condemned by those who should have known. Ah! Mr. Danescombe, sometimes a sad thought comes to me about our France. I wonder whether it can be possible, what our poor Léontine says, whether indeed we have driven away our heroes and saints, who could have rescued us; and so have nothing left to our country but the martyrs, who can only die for us. These, you know, the good God, and the malicious foe, suffer not to fail in any age or communion. The tradition of those good men and women of Port Royal lingered long among the poor of the district. And we called our little daughter herself after one of them, Claire—from the friend of St. Francis, founder of the poor Claires—and Angélique after the Mère Angélique."

"It was a beautiful and tender tribute, Madame," my father said. "May Mademoiselle be worthy of both her patronesses."

"I do not say there were no evils that deserved chastisement, and needed correction," she would say. "God knows there were many. Our Great Monarch had been too much like a god, for a mortal man, though a son of St. Louis, safely to endure. There are traditions of Versailles we would willingly blot out. But we were changing all that. We! Mr. Danescombe, the poor noblesse whom your Whigs abuse, and whom our Jacobins have guillotined. Was it not we, alas! who commenced the Revolution? Did not M. de Noailles (M. le Marquis) propose equal taxation, the purchase from our order of certain feudal rights, and the absolute abolition of others, such as the corvées, or any compulsory service without compensation? And Mirabeau, and M. de Lafayette, mistaken as some of us may have thought them, were these men of the bourgeoisie or of the canaille? We had true instincts. We felt the tide must turn, was turning, and that we must lead it. And did we not try? We, and even our king?"

"You did try nobly, madame," my father said, sorrowfully, "at last."

"Ah, I know; it was too late. The stream was a flood. The tide was a deluge. But how could we tell? What could we do? It was, indeed, too late."

"Ah! Madame," my father said very gently, "I am afraid all reforms are too late which wait until the tide turns. All reforms which save from revolution must be not with, but against the stream. God grant we find this out in time. God grant England may not silence her heroes, and only be left her martyrs!"

But little Claire! Madame des Ormes, charming and sweet as she was always, remained a foreigner, an exile, with all her sweet familiar grace, a little apart, on a height we never forgot, and I am not sure that she did.

But Claire was our own from very early days, our very own, with a difference, a fascinating difference of nature, of tradition, of ideas, of tastes, which made her always as fresh and interesting as a new story.

If Amice lifted me outside our home, not without a shock, so as to see that in a new light, Claire lifted us outside Abbot's Weir, and even England, and that without any shock. She saw everything and every person through such a sunny medium, and made the world so delightfully larger.

For one thing she learned English, which her mother never attempted, and Léontine and M. l'Abbé never achieved further than as a means of commercial intercourse with the "barbarous people" who had, they confessed, received them "with no little kindness." She learned it carefully, thoroughly, only to the end deliciously blending her own idioms with ours, and giving to our English a clear staccato definiteness and delicacy which pointed it, as often she pointed my work, with the last finish of her accurate fingers.

And she taught Piers and me, in return, her clear graceful French, enjoying our amusement with her mistakes, and never laughing at ours.

Claire was not exactly a child, according to our English ideas. She had no shyness, or awkwardness; she seemed to have been born with that gracious tact, and that ready savoir faire which made the wheels of every day's life run smoothly. Where we were self-conscious, possessed by self, she was self-possessed, possessing herself, and all her faculties.

It was her natural tendency to agree with people, and please them if possible; to find out their angles to avoid them; just as in our Teutonic natures there is often a natural tendency not to agree with people, and to find out their angles to rub against them. Hers was the graciousness of a true aristocracy, not instilled by maxim, but infused by the life of centuries. Stiffened into a maxim, it might have read, "Yield; because it is our right to command." Through all the courtsey there was a touch of courtly dignity which made half its charm.

It was a sunny atmosphere that Claire lived in, a positive sunshine, like that of her own land of purple vintages and golden harvests; she actually saw things softened, illumined, with all possible lights brought out, and the shadows glowing with reflections of the light that dwelt within herself; whilst many of us see things at best through a grey, clear, defining, unilluminating daylight, and pride ourselves in consequence on our truthfulness; as if sunshine were not as true as mere daylight. If Amice was like a Northern forest, full of glades and mysteries, Claire was like her own sunny land of vintage and harvests and valleys, that stand so thick with corn that they laugh and sing.

To make every-day life as pleasant as we can to every one around us may not be the very highest aim, but it is a good golden background for the severer work of life to be relieved upon. And it was on that golden ground Claire's world was painted.

Brave she was by instinct, and by chivalry of race, and ready to make her little person a shield against the world for those she loved or pitied, as she proved that memorable afternoon when she kissed me with the foolscap on.

But the joys of the fight were not at all comprehensible to her. Her delight was to make every one at peace with one another, and pleased with one another, and also with themselves.

When she came into your house, she always found out something pleasant in it you had scarcely noticed before. If your windows looked south, there was nothing so pleasant as a sunny aspect; if due north, there was nothing like looking out from the cool shadow into the sunlight.

She taught us first to see how beautiful our quaint old town was, in its green hollow of the hills. She had especial delight in our wild flowers. The banks of the three ancient roads which wound from it up the hills, worn deep by the rains and tread of centuries, were, she said, each one a hanging garden of delights, from spring to winter. She and Piers and I used to go on endless expeditions laden with baskets, which in spring were filled with masses of primroses, violets, or blue hyacinths. These, of course, we knew and loved of old; but Claire had a liberality in her love of flowers beyond ours. Everything came well to her; things we had called weeds and rubbish, she contrived to make lovely nosegays of; ragged robins, "twelve o'clocks," foxgloves, woodruffe, blue corn-flowers. She made her mother's little apartment gay all the summer through; and when flowers failed she brought in leaves. Leaves were her speciality, she said, bramble leaves above all. She said the flowers were her English china, better than all the old majolica and Sèvres in the château, and the autumn leaves were her English bijouterie and bric-a-brac, richer than all the old bronzes, and ormolu, with their metallic crimsons, and bronze, and gold. And "in shape" she said, "flowers were nothing to leaves." "The good God," she thought, "having left out the colours and perfumes, had all the more beauty to spare for the design."

How choice and fair she made that little room of her mother's!

In the corner was a little, low, narrow bed, like a couch; but Léontine had draped it with white muslin, always fresh, and contrived a coverlid out of some antique brocade, so that it looked like a canopied throne.

Then there was a little table, with a mirror behind it, and upon it a few relics, such as a jewelled snuff-box, with a portrait of a grandmother, powdered and frizzed, and one or two toilet ornaments. And in the window a common deal table, draped with muslin and frills, and always set with those rich masses of flowers, or leaves, in common white earthenware dishes, but looking as natural and at home as if they were growing on their own green banks. In a corner, a little table like an altar with a crimson antependium, and a delicately-carved, pathetic ivory crucifix on it; and a richly-bound prayer-book. On the walls were four or five miniatures grouped, and one larger head, often tenderly garlanded, of the king, Louis XVI.

We had nutting and blackberrying expeditions, Piers and Claire, and Dick Fyford and I, Claire declaring that no fruit in the garden was equal to blackberries; and many an opportunity was afforded to Piers of risking his life by gathering nuts and berries from impossible places up precipices and over rivers.

Our old abbey buildings, also, were great bonds of union between us.

These, Claire said, were as much hers as ours, being built by the monks, who belonged to all Christendom, when there was one Christendom, long ago. And she made the old arches and towers live to us, by telling us of an abbey close to her father's château, where real living nuns had been cloistered, where the lamp was always burning night and day in the church before the altar, and a sister kneeling before it, until the Revolution had quenched the lamp, and scattered the sisters, and turned the convent into a factory, and the church into a granary.

I suppose Claire would not have been a great reformer of wrongs; although she certainly would not consciously have inflicted any. She would scarcely have pulled of her own will against the stream. Side by side with any one on whom that strain of energy devolved, she could lighten the strain inconceivably by delicately indicating how to avoid all avoidable collisions, by keeping rowers and steersmen awake to every counter-current and every possible favouring breeze, above all, by keeping alive in the hearts of the toiling crew, that generous candour, open to every palliation and every excuse for opponents, which is not a little hard to maintain when the stream against which they pull is the injustice and selfishness of angry human beings.

As a sufferer of wrong, nothing could be sweeter than she. Her hardest epithet for those who had murdered her father, and driven them all houseless and destitute from their fair, bright country home, was "deluded." Or if any severer denunciations ever passed her lips, they were always levelled at an impersonal "On," which had deluded every one. "Our poor, dear, deluded people," she would say, "they ('on') persuaded them that they would find gold mines in our châteaux, that they would be Rentiers, and all their starving children live like princesses, without impoverishing us.

I am sure they never meant to ruin us. How could they, with all mamma and papa had done for them all their lives, and grandmamma before? We loved them, these poor peasants, and surely they had loved us. They had danced us on their shoulders, and sung us songs, and laughed with delight when I lisped in imitation. I was their own in a way much as my mother's. And all at once they (on) came from Paris, and told them a quantity of falsehoods about the cruelties of the noblesse; perhaps also some true things, but certainly not what we had done. And those poor peasants went mad. And one night Léontine came in the middle of the night, and drew me out of bed, and huddled on anything she could find, and took me by the little back door, where my mother was waiting, through the wood, up the hill, to a cabin, our woodman's hut. And there we looked down and saw the dear old château illuminated more brightly than for any of our fêtes, but for the last time; flames breaking out of every window, and those poor, mad people shouting and dancing round it, where they used to dance with us, or wait for alms. They did not steal our things. They burnt them, Léontine said. And all because of what some wicked nobles had done somewhere else to other people. Was it not strange? Léontine said it was because of things further off even than that. She said things more precious than ormolu and ebony had been thrown into the flames, in old times; men and women, men and women of God!—her forefathers, she meant,—the Huguenots. She said it was God 'avenging His elect' at last. But we did not burn the people, nor hurt them, nor any one that we could help. And it seems a very strange kind of justice that my father, who was good to every one, should suffer because some one else's grandfather was cruel to people we never saw."

Poor little Claire, "solidarité" was a word that did not exist in her French. And yet in other ways she understood well that nations are not mere conglomerations of independent atoms, but that there is a deep and terrible reality in the words "national life."

Léontine had her own interpretation of events, to which she steadily adhered. She was the only one among them to whom the history of the Revolution did not seem an unintelligible chaos. "Generation after generation, Monsieur," she said to my father, "our poor France has driven away her heroes, those who could and would have saved us. It was not only that they hunted the Protestants away. It was the strongest and bravest of all the Protestants they hunted away. The gentle, and timid, and helpless, and womanly remained. The men, the soldiers of the faith, the heroes, fled or escaped, to you, to Holland, to Prussia. Our strength and courage went to strengthen you, in Holland, England, and Prussia. And so when the flood came, there were none strong enough to stem it. Even the ladies and gentlemen of Port Royal, Catholics of the truest, spoke too much truth for France, and they were trodden down. Generation after generation our poor France has driven away her heroes, and silenced her prophets, and now she has none but her martyrs left. But those, Monsieur, believe me, of the best. All our great ladies and lords can suffer, cheerfully, nobly, piously, like apostles. There is blood in France as pure and noble as any in the world. But, alas! it seems only to flow for the scaffold."

CHAPTER XI.

VERY soon after my first day with Amice Glanvil at Court, it was decreed that Piers's path and mine were to separate; that he was thenceforth to attend Mr. Rabbidge's boys' school, whilst I was to continue with Miss Felicity, with the understanding that three afternoons a week were to be spent with Miss Loveday learning embroidery, fine needlework, dress-making, and millinery in general, as far as Miss Loveday's exquisitely neat fingers and her very subdued tastes could instruct me.

It was a terrible day to me that first morning when Piers and I had to go our different ways to school.

He had a longer walk than mine, and had to start first.

He was full of glee. The last remnants of childish attire had been laid aside. There was in those days at Abbot's Weir no intermediate boy's costume. Piers sallied forth, fully equipped in a miniature edition of my father's "coat, hosen, and hat."

His very shoes had a manly tramp in them, as he marched down the street. And I stood alone watching at the old arched door, feeling terribly feeble, "female," and forlorn.

At the corner he had the grace to halt and turn, and give me a protective masculine wave of the hand, before he disappeared, so glad and free in his sensible tight garments, made of things that would not tear, made so as to be convenient for climbing and racing, and everything I delighted in, and in general with a view to being as little obstructive as possible; while mine seemed expressly constructed with a view to being obstructions in the way of everything it was best worth while to do, and filling up all the leisure spaces of one's life with making and mending them.

He had good reason to be glad; and for him I was proud and glad too. I would not have had him go a day longer with me for all it cost me.

To him it was a beginning, and through him for me also. But to me it was an ending also: so many things that are beginnings to brothers are endings to sisters.

He was to go on and out in so many ways—out into the world of boys, and of men, out into the world of Greek and Latin, and all kinds of wisdom, ancient and modern—whilst I was to go no further than round and round Miss Felicity's history and mythology lessons, the geographical lists of countries, provinces, and capitals, and the first rules of arithmetic, my only progress being, out of "round hand," business-like and legible, into "small hand," angular, ladylike, and indefinite.

In my double relation to Piers I felt smitten. As his sister, I was never more to be his constant, hourly companion; as his "little mother" I could watch over him and protect him no more, except as a helpless hen-mother a brood of ducklings. He was launched into an element where I could not follow him; he must make his own way, meet his own temptations, encounter his own dangers, fight his own battles, whilst I could only cluck and flutter my wings on the shore.

And he liked it, of course; he delighted in it, felt a generous trust that I delighted in for his sake, and had no idea, should never have any idea, I determined, that when he was quite out of sight, I went into the Stone Parlour, and seizing the kitten, rushed up with her to the inmost recess of the old nursery, which was now my bed-room, and seating myself on the little cot that had been his, where I used to say my prayers beside him, and had felt like his little mother, cried bitterly, and sobbingly told pussy that now I had no one to take care of but her, "no one in the world!"

The old church bell striking the school-hour broke in on my lamentations. I symbolically anointed my head, and literally washed my face, crossed the market-place, and got into the school before the chimes had finished; so that no one, I flattered myself, would see I thought it anything but a step onward in life, to have a brother at Mr. Rabbidge's.

But all the morning the tears kept very near the brim, and I felt Amice Glanvil's searching, wistful eyes on me.

At the end of the morning school, when we were left alone, as we often were, whilst she took the dainty little repast prepared for her dinner, she came up to me and grasped both my hands with one of her abrupt passionate movements.

"Bride, I cannot be sorry for you," she said; "I have tried. But it is of no use. Next to being a man oneself, there can be nothing better than to see one's brother beginning to be on the way to be a man. Think of what they can do! Think what he is going to learn to be, he and Dick Fyford, and all of them. They are gone to learn to be soldiers, to fight for England, and sailors to man great ships for England; and doctors to cure people's diseases, and lawyers to set people's wrongs right. (For that is what I think lawyers are for, though Granny says they are only to puzzle right and wrong together so cleverly, that no one can find the way through without paying toll to them.) And masters, to employ men; or writers of books, to teach men. How can you be anything for a moment but glad that Piers is beginning?"

For she knew quite well I was not very glad.

"I shall be very glad to-morrow, Amice," I said.

"Then be glad to-day," she replied. "I have no patience with people who keep turning their faces the wrong way, and sighing and crying because we must leave things behind. Of course, we are always leaving things behind. Look the other way, and see what is before you, Bride Danescombe."

"I do not mind leaving things behind, Amice," I said, thinking her a little hard. "It is being left behind that is hard to bear."

"Then don't be left behind," she replied, with her rare little laugh. "Go on! I mean to go on, although I am only a girl. But then, of course, I have no brother, so I have to do for both. But if I had a brother—a brave little brother like Piers, wouldn't we set some things right, together!"

"But I cannot go on, Amice," I said. "You know I have come to an end of Miss Felicity's lessons. And there is nothing to do but to go round again, and to sit still and sew."

"Sitting still and sewing is dull," she said emphatically. "Happily for me, Chloe does all that, and there are plenty more." Then, suddenly, her face flushed as with a new thought, and she added, "Do you know, Bride, I think I will ask Granny to let me learn sewing with you. One never knows what one may have to do. And in learning of Miss Loveday one learns so many things more than she knows she is teaching."

That was a bright prospect for me—afternoons with Amice and Miss Loveday; and I left the room greatly cheered.

But in the afternoon little Claire had made some excuse of a message to our house, and we crossed the market-place back to Miss Felicity's together.

She said nothing; but as she put her dear little hands in mine, I knew well what she meant. She wanted me to feel I had some one to take care of still. And in the evening, between Amice's bravery and Claire's soothing, I felt almost as bright as Piers himself when he swung into the passage, and his joyous voice rang through the house, calling for me.

There was a button to sew on and a rent to mend in those clothes which I had envied as so imperishable. And there was a history, brief but vivid, of the encounter with a bully of a big boy, which had occasioned the damage.

Piers had begun his battle of life with wrestlings literal enough. He did not tell me the name of his adversary, nor could I gather quite clearly the issue of the encounter, except what might be inferred from the explanatory statement that "he could not help it, he could not see any fellow, whatever his size, throw stones at old black Cato, and call him names, and not try to stop it, and if the big fellow were to try it again, he must do the same."

He had, moreover, a suspicious mark on his eyebrow, which, with all his anxiety to conceal it, and all my bathings, grew deeper in tint, so that Piers had to select retired places, lest my stepmother's vigilant eyes should detect that he had begun boy life so pugnaciously.

It was plain that there would be points enough at which my brother's life and mine would meet, and that he would need his little mother at many extremes yet.

Apparently, the "big fellow" did try it again, for Piers came back a few days afterwards with a peculiar twinkle in his eyes, and with a scar on his cheek.

"He did not give it me," was all he vouchsafed in explanation, "it was only a corner of a stone I came against in falling. But he was under, and I don't think he will try it again."

"Other people's rights and our own duties?" I ventured to ask.

But Piers would explain no further.

"It was a mean thing, in his opinion, to brag of things out of school before girls."

The force of the contrasts was strong on him.

Dick Fyford, however, told me enough to show that Piers had won his spurs.

Claire and I were decidedly proud of Piers's black eye. It consoled us for being girls and being left behind, to find him so unmistakable a boy.

But all our small public opinion was by no means unanimous on the subject. My stepmother "must beg that for the future, if Piers could not keep out of quarrels, he would quarrel in a gentlemanly way, with gentlemanly boys, and not get his face disfigured in a manner which made it unfit for ladies to sit at meals with him; and, above all, not in his new coat. She wondered Mr. Danescombe did not take the matter more seriously. But it was so difficult to persuade him to take anything about the children seriously."

My father merely said—

"My dear, it is impossible not to envy a little the sanguine Quixotism of these young people. Piers," he added, "if your black eye would begin to set the whole world and all its wrongs right, it would be a very well-invested black eye; and no doubt you are of opinion it will. But remember you have only two eyes, and only one new coat, and for our sakes, please take proportionate care of each."

Piers and my stepmother were both silenced, neither seeing clearly where the little sarcasm fitted best.

But Miss Loveday was profoundly serious on the subject.

"My dear Piers," she said, in her gentlest voice, falling, as usual with her in agitated moments, into the "plain," Quaker mode of speech, "thee will never win the true battles in that way. The weapons of the true warfare are not fists."

"But boys have not any others, Miss Loveday," he said.

"It is written, 'Love your enemies,'" said Miss Loveday, with tears in her eyes; "Forgive them that hate you."

"But I have no enemies," replied Piers; "and as to forgiving people who hurt other people who are helpless, I cannot. I might have hated him if we could not have fought it out; but now there is no need to think of it any more."

Miss Loveday shook her head.

"Pride can forgive an injury it has avenged," she said. "Besides, we are told what to do if we are smitten."

Piers made no reply; in the art of verbal self-defence he was not strong. Besides, Miss Loveday was a woman, and deaf; and to defend oneself against a woman in the vehement form argument is apt to appear to take with deaf people seemed to him, I believe, unchivalrous. But he said afterwards to me—

"It says nowhere, Bride, that we are to do nothing but be patient if other people are smitten on the cheek. And if the Sermon on the Mount means that, it must be meant for men, not for boys. Grown men have the Assizes and the Parliament, and all that kind of thing to stop other people from doing wrong; but we have nothing except our fists. Besides, there is the Old Testament. David and all of them often had to fight."

"Claire and I don't think you at all wrong," I said, "nor, I think, does father."

But this did not console Piers. I think he was more ashamed of our admiration of Miss Loveday's remonstrance.

"It is hard to have such a fuss about nothing, only because I was so unlucky as to get hit where it would be seen. Boys are always getting hit, of course."

In Ulphilas' translation of the Scriptures for the Goths, we are told that the translator left out the Books of Kings, thinking his Goths too likely to draw such encouragement as Piers did from the warlike proceedings therein recorded.

But Piers had plunged into the primitive age of Lynch-law, and "vigilance committees," with which the world is always renewing its boyhood for young human creatures.

Homer seemed to him an imperishable picture of life; only he could never make out how the Greeks could both scold and fight. The scolding, he thought, was the natural share of those who could not fight; and the talking, of those who could not work, or make.

Criticism he considered the natural province of women, or of men who have nothing to do. It was not till later that he learned how some talking is making, and some words are battling.

The streams of our lives seemed running very far apart. For as Piers's life went forth more and more into the din and tumult, mine withdrew more and more into retirement.

So much farther apart are boyhood and girlhood, than womanhood and manhood, the parting and distribution necessary to the deeper meeting and uniting.

Even our amusements separated. Claire and I pursued our strawberry, and flower, and blackberry gatherings, and nuttings, our gardenings, and rambles alone, whilst Piers and Dick Fyford were shouting over cricket and football.

It was chiefly in making and mending that our lives seemed still linked.

For ministries in the form of mending there was no lack of opportunity. And Piers, now promoted to a real carpenter's bench and perilous workman's tools, constructed many a basket and box, and even chair and table, for Claire and me.

Amice, he always continued to maintain, was "almost as good as a boy;" besides, she had the glory of three additional years; and with her (his self-banishment from Court having been tacitly annulled in consideration of Granville Sharp's achievements) he had many a daring gallop, not to say, steeple-chase, over the downs and moorlands.

But it was always the flowers which Claire loved that he contrived to remember, and to pour out now and then in a careless, casual way from his pockets, when he returned from his expeditions, and to empower me, if I liked, to carry over the way.

Meantime, we sewed, and Loveday listened, like Joan of Arc to her "voices," and talked to us. That longing for the liberation of the negro slaves which she had inherited from her Quaker ancestry, and which had been as a patriotic passion to her lonely life, could not but come out in those long quiet afternoons. At first she hesitated to speak of it before Amice. But one day, when she had broken off in some story of wrong, Amice rose, and coming close to her, said, in those low clear tones Loveday always heard so well—

"Do not stop. You cannot tell me worse than I know. When I was a child, I heard the cries from the punishment house; I saw the spiked collars, and the scars. You cannot tell me worse than I fear. Tell me, if you can, anything to give me hope."

And Loveday told us the story of the struggle, so that the far-off fields of Pennsylvania and New England, where John Woolman and Anthony Benazet toiled for emancipation until not one Quaker held a slave, grew to us a land of sacred romance.

Dear to us also was the story of the poor bruised and half-blinded slave, Jonathan Strong, left to starve by his master, how he was nursed, and fed, and tended, and clothed by Granville Sharp and his brother the surgeon; and then how out of that movement of natural pity, obeyed, grew the whole noble immortal work of Granville Sharp's life; how, alone, against the stream of lawyers and judges, and against the law itself embodied in an iniquitous decision, and confirmed by the opinion of Blackstone, he turned the stream, and brought round lawyers and judges, and at last the very law itself, constraining Lord Mansfield to demand the broad issue which he had so long evaded, and to pronounce the liberating words, that whenever a slave touches English soil he is free, thus virtually pronouncing slavery itself a wrong, and laying the axe at the root of the tree which from that moment began unperceived to totter to its fall.

So we sate and sewed and listened afar off to the echoes of many warfares, until under Miss Loveday's influence, sewing itself became ennobled to me, and seemed an essential part of the warfare.

"For in all wars," she said, "the battles are but the crises of the campaign, the tests of strength long-trained and long-tried. People are victorious by virtue of what they were before the battle. It is not only the men who wield the weapons that fight, but the men who bring the meat and bread, the men who till and plough, and sow the corn and herd the cattle, and," she added, with a growing intensity in her voice, "the women who bake, and milk, and churn, and sew, and bind up the wounds."

Men's work: tilling, herding, ploughing, and fighting.

Women's work: cooking, sewing, and nursing; that is, making raw material of all kinds, material, mental and moral, corn, axioms, principles, into bread for daily use and lint to bind up actual wounds.

Claire and I grew quite content with our feminine lot. But Amice said, "some women had to take their share in the actual fighting, she believed."

"Queens," I conceded.

"All women have to be a kind of queens," she said, "when there are no men in the family. There is no Salic law which screens orphaned or widowed women from taking their place on the throne, or their part in the battle."

And sometimes, she said to Miss Loveday, "It is the waiting that is so trying. If it were all real working, I would not mind a bit what the work was. It is the waiting and doing nothing for any one that eats into one's heart like rust."

"Waiting need not be doing nothing," Loveday said. "I have had a good deal of it, and I have not found it so."

"Waiting may be waiting on God," she added very softly, "and I think there is little work as good as that."

And as we looked at her patient face, so pale and worn, and yet so often radiant from within, we understood something of what she meant.

ON MONEY.

BY THE REV. A. W. THOROLD, M.A.

III.—LENDING AND BORROWING; AND CAREFULNESS AND CONTENTMENT.

AMONG the practical lessons which a careful parent will constantly inculcate on his children, and the pithy maxims that will be falling from his lips, almost without his knowing them, none can be more important in their nature, more incessant in their influence, or more permanent in their result, than those which bear upon money. It is easy to make too much of it, and it is possible to make too little. Where the one aim of the head of a family is plainly seen to be rich; and the constant burden of his talk is on the power and importance of money; his children will inevitably be trained for their father's Mammon-worship, and the air of filthy lucre they daily breathe will insensibly impregnate their moral character. If, on the other hand, they see money treated as a matter of utter indifference; if before their eyes day by day, expenses are incurred without means to meet them, and the last question ever asked about anything is what it will cost, there will be a tendency in the other direction to impair the quickness of the moral sense in money matters generally, habitual self-indulgence will seem to be the natural order of things, and to wish for anything, will mean instantly to try to procure it. No doubt in many persons there are what may be called hereditary ideas about money: some are born frugal, others extravagant; and be the circumstances of life what they may, the original bias will assert itself from the nursery to the grave. But a great deal may be done by carefully educating children in the true value of money as means to an end. There are various ways of doing it, and some of them will at first be disappointing. Different characters must be differently treated, and an age, which might be suitable for one young person to be trusted with money, might be very unsuitable for another. You begin to give your boy an allowance, with much good advice on the right way of spending it; and you are mortified, when he returns for his first vacation to find that you have to pay the money twice over; for his allowance is all spent—he really does not know how—and the bills, which it ought to have paid, are sent home to you. Well, give him a sharp scolding; be sure not to let him think you feel him capable of having wilfully deceived you; cheerfully trust him again, and the chances are it is the last time it will happen. If it is good for lads to be gradually trained to the use of money, it is quite as important for girls. Not only is it an additional interest in their life; but it prepares them for the time when they will have to keep house for a husband or a brother; and it is a constant opportunity of secret self-denial to devout hearts, that love to spare what they can for God.

The chief thing, however, that wise parents should din into their children's memory, and impress on their consciences almost from the first hour they are capable of understanding it, is the misery, and bondage, and even disgrace that come with debt. Borrowing seems so easy, and lending so natural, and youth is buoyant with hope, and conscious of integrity. "It is only for a short time, and payment will easily be made; and who need know?" But a tendency of this kind should be burned out of a young man's nature as with a hot iron. It is a fault towards which an inflexible sternness is at once the kindest, and the only effective remedy. An indulgent easiness in the early days of youth may foster a habit, which will paralyze the sinews of robust action, and reduce ultimately its victim to the contemptible condition of being either a mendicant or a thief. If the earliest commission of a fault of this kind is severely punished at the moment, the first fault may be the last; while one condoned offence may be, not only to the offender, but to all the rest of the family, a false symptom of parental weakness, that may result in a harvest of sorrow. It is true that if no one would lend, no one could borrow. But not all lending is to pay debts, and not all borrowing is to discharge them. As a rule, it is sometimes better where there is a claim of blood or friendship on you, to give half rather than lend all. Where there is delicacy of feeling the request is not likely to be repeated from the same quarter, and often you are as happy to aid, as your friend to be aided. There will often also be cases where, from the conviction that the granting of a loan would be mischievous or useless, for very friendship's sake, though painful, it is our duty firmly to say No.

But lending as a rule from friend to friend or relative to relative is always a very hazardous proceeding on one side, if not on both; for the time of repaying is never quite convenient, and a borrower's memory is often treacherous. It is a cynic's remark, founded on painful experience of average human nature, that to get rid of a man you don't want, the shortest way is to lend him money; and it is beyond question, that in money transactions between near kinsmen,—to avoid a feeling of painful obligation to the one, and the possibility of real inconvenience to the other,—the best way of managing it, is as a matter of business.

A dry and somewhat dull subject is now drawing to its close; and it is not easy to light it up either with the gleams of fancy or the touches of feeling that float other topics on a reader's sympathies. There are still, however, two points of view, in which it may be usefully considered for the benefit of those who have but little of it, and for the study of all, who have yet to be convinced that be it much or little, it never leaves us as it finds us, it makes us worse or better. One of the wisest and kindest of our living authors has said, "How happy life can be with plenty of employment and very little money;" and his words will perhaps more easily find acceptance with those who have made their money, than those who have it yet to make. It will, however, seem less of a paradox, if we limit its application mainly to that period of life when the character is full of energy, the body active with vital power, and when the exquisite and unsated instincts of enjoyment find an ever-varied scope in pursuits and engagements to which advanced life is unequal. But paradox or not, it is true. In the increase of wealth there is ever an increase of worry. Your money must be invested, and you cannot easily decide as to the right way of doing the best with it. Or you make costly purchases, which often want more looking after than you ever bargained for. The more you buy the more the margin of your cares is increased, the more numerous are the hostages that you give to fortune. You can't lose what you don't possess. Burglars will not steal your simple plate, which they never suspect to be silver ; no one cheats you with the horses you do not wish to buy ; you are saved perhaps a week's vexation by never being outbidden for a picture which you had resolved on securing ; the storm that sweeps down the lofty forest trees spares the humble shrubs that clasp the hill.

To have just enough, and to know that it is enough, and to be thankful for it,—this is the secret which the Gospel long ago proclaimed to mankind, but which the wisdom of this world rejects with scorn. And to suppose that a modest competence, such as modern times would call utter poverty, has no real charms or vivid enjoyments of its own, is a profound mistake. It is full of joy, though of the simplest and sweetest kind. Let some of us old married people who, after twenty or thirty years hard work, have a little more to live upon than when we first started (though, indeed, we have very much more to do with it), look back to the days long ago, when, in a tiny house, and with simple furniture, and the whole world in front of us, each other's love sweetened every care of life. Are we so much happier now, when every half-crown does not want such sharp looking after, than when we had seriously to consider if we could afford a week's holiday, or invite the visit of a friend ? How rich, too, we thought ourselves then, if we had once in three months a five-pound note to spare and spend ! How we talked over this way and that of doing the best with it ; and at last picked up something to make the little drawing-room brighter, or perhaps bought some second-hand books for the shelves. The enjoyment was so keen because the pleasure was so rare. Incessant work brought its own reward with it ; never to expect is never to be disappointed. This is also just as true in the question of holidays. Many people now travel third-class without being in the least ashamed of it ; and if they are a little more tired at the end of the day, they have the money in their pockets which the difference in the fare has saved. A country farmhouse where you have to keep your jar of live-bait in the same room where you eat your meals, and where you share your simple shelter with the dogs of the house, if not with the pigs and chickens, will cost less, but be every whit as enjoyable as the well-furnished villa, with its walled garden and greenhouse, but where at the end of your stay, you have to pay for every dent in the wall and scratch on the paper, the air no fresher, the country no lovelier, but the rent greater, and the life so much less of a real change.

Besides, a certain scantiness of purse makes the wits strangely keen in ways of laying out money to the best advantage. You take trouble, you make inquiries, you hunt, and compare, and calculate ; and when you have run down your game, it seems doubly earned. Majestically to walk into a shop, calmly to select the first thing that suits you, always to have money enough to pay for it, never to be compelled to choose what is worse because it is cheaper, no doubt has its advantages ; and who would undervalue them ? But there are real compensations for the multitude, who, so to speak, have to make an appetite for their food by first earning it ; and among the simple and innocent enjoyments of quiet people, none, perhaps, has more zest in it, or reward after it, than a long day's search for some special object, which they cannot give more than a certain sum for, and which they know is to be had if they are not afraid of trouble.

Besides, there is not only much happiness to be enjoyed consistently with the circumstances of what is now called poverty, there is also much happiness to be given. The secret of being well off is to know how to do without things. The secret of helping others to be well off is not the monopoly of those who can give great presents or confer big favours ; it is also with those who can make trifles go a long way on the errands of kindness, and who can brighten their gifts with love, if they cannot gild them with splendour. This age is dear in some things, but it is cheap in others. All round, probably, it takes much more to keep a family even in the simplest fashion than a generation ago. But life is much less dull, and shut up, and commonplace, and uninteresting, than it used to be, when there were no railways, no cheap press, no penny postage, no croquet, no Mudie's library. There is more refinement in some homes, if there is more luxury in others ; and if meat and rent cost more, clothes and tea cost less. But all this bears on the possibility of making others happy, limited as our means may be ; in the occasions of simple hospitality, in the lending of books and writing of letters ; and interchange of trifling but pleasant gifts. No doubt it is delightful to receive a fifty-pound note from a kind grandmother, and to be told you are to do with it just what you please ; but sometimes that which costs only five shillings gives just as much pleasure ; and a bright heart that loves to see a child smile may buy as many smiles as it wants for sixpence apiece.

Money, too, is character, in the way it indicates and develops the moral disposition, whether for evil or good. Almost the first advice that a kindly man of the world would give to a youth just entering upon it would be, "Never treat money affairs with levity." It has been said of horses that they are noble creatures in themselves, but that somehow they contrive to demoralise all who have much to do with them. It may with equal truth be said of money, that in itself it is a necessary and useful thing; but unless we handle it carefully it will burn our fingers. A professional man who permits his wife to open his letters, had better keep his counsel to himself, for cautious clients may not like it; and when a person entrusted with other people's money permits any one but himself to sign his cheques, he runs a risk which it may be hard to justify.

Then every one has some weak point about money, and almost every one is extravagant in some things and penurious in others. A noble nature is noble with money. It is just what one would have expected of gallant King Amadeus, that he should insist on restoring the Escorial out of his own purse. Small-natured people are small with their money, and to get sixpence out of them is like drawing a double tooth. Wasteful people are often stingy; for this is their only way of recouping themselves for their improvidence. Stingy people are often wasteful, just because they are stingy. A stitch in time saves nine. Timidity often defeats its own purpose. Rome in the end had to pay as much for the three remaining books of the Sibyl as would have bought the six others; and a little courage in buying is sometimes the truest economy. It is an inspired maxim, "that he that hateth suretiship is sure." But it does not need inspiration to see that no one should consent to be a trustee for others who is not prepared to take the necessary trouble, or who is not qualified by the proper experience for fairly doing his best. Money committed to us for a particular purpose should, in the absence of discretionary power, be strictly spent on it, or fresh instructions procured. With certain persons it is a necessary precaution, not only to indicate the way in which your money is to be expended, but to take care that it gets there. Some people have a deep crack running from head to foot through their moral nature. If you send them money for a child's schooling, it is spent on a silk gown; or the cheque that you intended to fill their coal-cellar is as likely as not to go for a trinket. Where some people make their money go much farther than others do, it is not necessarily because they are so much more clever, but because they give their minds to it, and feel it a duty, as well as a pleasure, to make the most of it. It is almost always those who have least money who indulge themselves most, and those who have most money who indulge themselves least. Do you doubt it? the reason is clear. When you have something to lose, it is a matter of importance not to lose it. If you have nothing to lose, to plunge a little deeper under water can hurt no one but the unfortunate tradesman who gives you credit. In solemn truth, there can be no kind of doubt that excessive expenditure of living is one of the great vices of the time; and it would be well for all of us if the power of the pulpit were more frequently and vigorously exercised in sternly discountenancing the selfish thoughtlessness that buys what it cannot pay for, and in stigmatizing a deliberate and persevering extravagance by its proper name of fraud.

Yet carefulness about money has its own dangers. When an Apostle wrote to the Church of God, "Let your conversation be without covetousness," and a Hebrew prophet ages before him sternly denounced the then growing habit of adding house to house and field to field, it was because then, as much as now, every virtue has a tendency to deteriorate into a corresponding vice; and if to waste money is a fault, to love it is a sin. Now it is much easier to come to love it than some of us may suppose. To be always worrying about small expenses, or regretting past losses, or talking about prices, or even comparing too closely and anxiously one year's accounts with another's, will secretly, but inevitably mildew the spirit with a kind of sordid earthliness. To give away will become harder, for we shall soon fancy we cannot afford it; and what at first was but a just carefulness about daily spending, if not watched against, will presently change even a liberal man into an utter screw. And then your punishment will come in the shape God sees you to need, and in the shape you will most dread. Either the wealth itself will be taken from you, and the idol of gold will be shattered before your eyes; or some child or heir for whom you were destroying your very soul is taken from you, to the incorruptible treasure of the better country; and then the psalmist's sentence comes home to you as with the thrust of a sword-point—"He heapeth up riches, and cannot tell who shall gather them."

Perhaps there is hardly any sin to which religious people are more prone than covet-ousness; nor any kind of inconsistency which worldly people are more quick to detect, and more severe to denounce; nor any which a righteous God hates with more perfect hatred, and more inflexibly pursues with his loving chastisement until either it is scourged out of the soul, or the sinner is left to his idols.

The end of it all is this. If money comes, let it come. He who sends it does not mean it to hurt us. We need not fear it with a feeble terror, though no one sin has ruined so many souls as covetousness. We will not spring at it with a flutter of excited joy, for it is a grievous trial to the humblest and simplest.

And if money goes, let it go. Only let us see that it does not go through folly or sin of ours. Job lost his in one way, and Lot lost his in another. The end of Job was a crown of glory, but the candle of Lot went out in hideous night. Probably there are few of us who have lived to middle life, very few indeed who have passed it, to whose door could be laid no error of judgment in spending their money, no taint of conscience in making it. In this greatest of great trusts who has not sometimes failed? Conscience has said, "Give," and we have not given. We have steeled our hearts, and summoned our coldest judgment to justify us in refusals, which now we would gladly get back; but it is too late. Witnesses to our self-indulgence surround us in every room we enter; if we have done something for our Lord, our heart whispers we might have done so much more!

But there is time in front; and He who gives us power to get wealth will also give us wisdom to use it, if we really ask Him. Let us be wise, simple, and kind.

Wise as those who have been called to liberty, and mean to use it; believing in God's love to us, understanding that He intends and expects us to be happy; with a healthy conscience that does not chafe us about every halfpenny, yet guided in all we do by the steady purpose of a heart that has been taught to value the precious things of God.

Simple, so that money shall not spoil us with its influences of power, nor vulgarise us with its tendencies to vanity, nor coax us with the softness of its luxury. Surely some allowance should be made for rich people as well as for poor. If God, who knows their difficulties, must be ready to bear with them, let us bear; but let us also see how blessed is the lot of those who, being neither rich nor poor, dwell in the temperate zone of a kind of safe table-land, which is neither chilled by want, nor swept by tropical storms. Oh, how terrible must death be to a rich man, who has never so used his riches as to have friends to welcome him into the heavenly habitations, and whose only idea of Lazarus, in the other world, is that he should still wait upon him there!

And kind, for "blessed is he that considereth the poor;" and if every one is poor in something, in which some one else is rich, great are the opportunities of little kindnesses, not only from equals to equals, but from one class to another class, whereby but a small amount of money will enable thoughtful hearts to smooth the hard pillow of their suffering kinsmen. There are many and various cups of cold water which tender hands can lift to hot lips with the promised blessing of their Divine Redeemer; many little gifts, and many secret offerings, which He will publicly recognise in the Great Day. Do we all quite see what is put into our power if our hearts are kind, though our means be scanty? Do we clearly understand that the true virtue of almsgiving is in being our own almoners? that the trifle from our own hand pressed into hot and thinned fingers, with a smile that gleams with sympathy, and a word that recalls the presence of Christ, is worth ten times more to man, perhaps also to God, than a purse of gold sent through a stranger. Oh, there are so many ways, if only we cared to think of them and walk in them, of softening hardship and cheering sadness, of lifting off burdens from heavy shoulders, of making the breaking heart to leap with joy. If the night is wet, and times are hard, and my heart moves me to it, no police table of fares shall prevent my giving a sober cabman half a crown, if I please, instead of a shilling. Street beggars let no one aid, they are a cankerous imposthume on English life; but political economy shall not terrify me into totally surrendering my private conscience to the cast-iron orders of mendicity societies; and no amount of annual subscriptions to philanthropic institutions can excuse a Christian man from personal assistance to the want that meets him at his own door. To love, even as we are loved—here is the effort of earth and the blessedness of heaven! No doubt there are many ways of showing it; but one way is money, and God asks for it. "The silver is mine, and the gold is mine, saith the Lord of Hosts."

PASQUALINA—THE YOUNG MISSIONARY OF ELBA.

By Miss WHATELY.

IF you were to stand on the sea-shore at Leghorn, where the Mediterranean rolls in on a flat sandy beach, you could see on the horizon, on a clear day, the faint outline of the coast of the Isle of Elba.

We have all read and heard much of the first Napoleon's being exiled to this little island, and reigning over it for a few months, before his last attempt to recover the Empire; but it is not of these things we are going to write.

The inhabitants of Elba are mostly seafaring people, and till lately were all of them very ignorant and bigoted Roman Catholics, praying to the Virgin and saints, looking to the priest to forgive all their sins, and knowing nothing of the Bible. But the Elba sailors in fishing and merchant ships often touch at the towns on the mainland of Italy, along the coast of the Mediterranean; in one of these towns, a Christian lady was living who made acquaintance with the captains of some of these ships, and being anxious to do all the good she could, she used to read the Bible with them, and give them copies of the Scriptures and tracts to take back. In this way many of the Elba people began to know and love the Word of God, and at last they wished to have a pastor to come over and teach them more. One was sent by the Waldenses, and before long there was quite a little church formed of people who chose to worship God as the Bible tells us to do, and would not follow the ways of the Romanists. The next thing to be thought of was a school for their children, as these Elba Protestants did not wish their little ones to be taught as the priest would have liked: and it so happened, that about this time the schoolmistress of the priest's school became a Protestant herself, and was made mistress of the new Protestant school. She was so much loved by her pupils that nearly half of them followed her; but there was one little girl, Pasqualina, a child of seven years old, whose mother would not let her follow her schoolmistress. The child loved her so dearly, that all her wish was to go wherever her dear kind teacher went; but her mother said, that would never do, she must keep to the priest's school.

Poor little Pasqualina was in sad trouble. She could not bear to give up her old teacher; but at last a plan came into her mind. She set off very early in the morning, before it would be time to begin at her own school, and went round by the place where her old schoolmistress was keeping the new school. Then she peeped in, and listened to what they were doing there. It was only what you are all used to see, at our schools at home. They first prayed to God to bless their day's work, and then they sang a hymn, and read a part of the Bible with their mistress. But all this was new and wonderful to little Pasqualina. She had never heard prayers said except in Latin; she had never joined in singing sweet hymns about Jesus and his love; she had never heard anything of God's holy word, and all the beautiful Bible stories which we have been familiar with all our lives were new to her. She had come first, perhaps, out of love to her teacher; but she stayed out of love for what she heard. She could not stay long; she had been ordered to go to the Romanist school; and she would not disobey her mother: but every morning she made a round, came by the Protestant school, and listened to the opening prayer, singing, and reading, and then reached her own school in time to begin the lessons.

This went on for some time; but the more Pasqualina heard of the Bible teaching, the more she longed to know; and she was constantly begging her mother to let her go to the "Scuola Evangelica," or "Evangelical School," as they call in Italy the schools where the Bible is taught. "Oh! mamma," she would say to her every day, "if you would but let me go to the Evangelical school! They teach such beautiful things out of the Bible there!"

At last, tired with the little girl's entreaties, her mother said, "Listen, Pasqualina; I will allow you to go to that school if your father consents when he comes home. You must ask him." Now, the father, who was a sailor, was most of his time away from home, and at that time was on a voyage to Spain. However, the day of his return came, and Pasqualina ran to meet her father as he entered the house, and sprang into his arms, and, almost before he had time to speak, she cried, as she clung round his neck, "Oh, father, do let me go to the Evangelical school!"

The father knew and cared nothing about this school, most likely, and could not make out what his little girl meant, but he saw she was very eager about it. "Would it make you very happy to go there, my child?" he said.

"Oh, yes, yes. Do say I may go!" cried she. "I wish it so much."

"Well, I have no objection; go, if you like it."

You may fancy how quickly Pasqualina flew to her mother. "Mamma, papa says I may go to the new school."

The mother had nothing to say, as she had promised to let her go if the father consented; and from that day little Pasqualina never missed the school. She learned quickly to read, and, having a clear, pleasant voice, she used to read to her father and mother, neither of whom knew a letter. It was quite a new pleasure to them to hear the reading lessons and Bible histories read to them by their little daughter, and they grew more and more interested in what they heard. She learned texts and hymns by heart, and repeated them to her parents, telling them how these things had been explained to her at the school. She had learned now, young as she was, what it is truly to come to Jesus to be saved, and her great joy was to try and lead others to Him; and, at last, this little missionary was the means of bringing her father and mother, and her aunt, who was with them, to know really and trust in Jesus alone, and to give up all the foolish superstitions they had been taught. But she was not content with doing good in her own family. She had many relations who lived near her. She used to go and visit them in their houses, and, while she was there, she would begin to sing one of her school-hymns with her sweet, clear voice. They liked to listen to her, and often would ask her to sing. Sometimes, however, she would be asked mockingly, and they would be inclined to laugh at her for her love of hymns. If she perceived this, she would leave at once; but if she saw they really wished her in earnest to sing, she would go on with hymn after hymn, and then tell them the meaning as she had learned it at school. In this way she was the means of bringing several of her relations to God.

But Pasqualina could not be satisfied while she saw her parents going constantly to the Romish mass, praying in a strange tongue, and worshipping images. She would say to her mother, "Mamma, do you understand what you hear at mass?"

"No, of course, child: it is all Latin."

"Well, if you would come and hear the minister, you would understand all he says quite well; he explains it all, and makes it so clear! To-day he told us so-and-so—" And she would repeat what she had heard at the sermon.

At last, her mother began to feel curious to hear for herself, and thought she would try and go; and, by degrees, Pasqualina was able to persuade all her family to come to the Protestant church. They came first in the evening, when they would not be so easily known; but, at last, they got courage to come in the daylight, and, by God's grace, this whole family became decided, earnest Bible Christians.

But little Pasqualina's work was nearly done. In her short life she had been an active missionary for her Saviour; and now He was going to take her to himself. When she was nine years old she became very ill, and soon she felt that she would not recover. One morning, after a night of great suffering, she repeated the 121st Psalm very earnestly—that beautiful Psalm which begins, "I will lift up my eyes to the hills, whence cometh my help." Then she prayed, and then, turning to her aunt who was watching beside her, while her mother, quite worn out, was in another room resting, she said, "Dear aunt, listen! I know I am going to die, I shall soon be in heaven. I know I shall not be here long. I am afraid when I am taken there will be a bustle and noise which would disturb poor mother; I want her to sleep. Will you carry me to your room, where she will not hear the noise?" Her aunt took the thoughtful child in her arms, and carried her to her room, and there little Pasqualina presently fell asleep in the Lord. Her work on earth was ended; but the joy she was looking for is only just begun.

She left her poor parents in sad affliction. "What shall we do without our Pasqualina!" said the sorrowing mother. "She was the light of our house, she taught us the truth, she read the Word of God to us, and we cannot read it for ourselves."

But Pasqualina left a younger sister who went to the same school, and was soon able to read the Bible to her parents, and, we hope, tried to fill the place of the precious little one who had left them for a happier home.

Are we, who live in the land of Bibles and schools, as ready to profit by our advantages, and as earnest to work for Jesus as this little girl of the Isle of Elba?

A POSSIBILITY.

The Thought of a Mourning Mother.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "JOHN HALIFAX, GENTLEMAN."

MY little baby is buried to-day;
Gone—down in the depths of the churchyard
clay,
Up in the sky so dim and grey.
Who will take care of my little baby?

Who will kiss her?—her waxen feet,
That have never walked, and her small hands sweet,
Where I left a white lily, as was meet—
Who, who will kiss my little baby?

Who will teach her?—her wings to fly,
Her tiny limbs their new work to ply,
Her soft, dumb lips to sing gloriously—
Oh, who will teach my little baby?

I have a mother—who long ago died;
We speak of her now with our tears all dried;
She may know my pretty one, come to her side,
And be glad to see my little baby.

Christ, born of a woman, hear, oh, hear!
Thine angels are far off—she seems near Give Thou my child to my mother dear,
And I'll weep no more for my little baby.

Surely in Heaven, Thy saints so blest
Keep a mother's heart in a mother's breast,—
Give her my lamb, and I shall rest
If my mother takes care of my little baby.

ON CONFESSING CHRIST.

TO THE YOUNG.

THERE are different significations of the word confession. In this paper it will be used in the sense of open avowal, in some way, of internal Christian faith. No one can read the New Testament without seeing that confession—in forms and degrees of strength however various, according to circumstances—is a perpetual and peremptory requirement of the Master on all, without exception, who are really his disciples. Think of Him for a moment, as here. No strange or violent supposition surely, for when is He not here? Go up into his presence, and you will hear such words as these—“Whosoever therefore shall confess me before men, him will I confess also before my Father which is in heaven. But whosoever shall deny me before men, him will I also deny before my Father which is in heaven.” He spoke them when He was here in the flesh to a little group of listening men. He speaks them still when He is here in the spirit, to a vaster assembly—to the whole Church, in every country and of every tongue. Nor to the Church alone—to all who read the Scriptures, to all who in any way hear the gospel. Whatever the words may mean to each individual particularly, they do, beyond all question, convey to each a demand for something which cannot be denied without forfeiting all right and title to the name of Christian. If Jesus Christ should come to make this claim, tenderly but peremptorily on each one who comes to Him, on each one who but begins to look his way, it would be a sign that he no longer wished to draw the attention of mankind.

First, then, let us try to ascertain what the confession involves as its abiding substance. The language we have quoted is, on this point, or seems to be, very plain. He is to be confessed—“Whosoever shall confess me.” In some way this single expression comprehends all. A Christian confession is the confession of Christ. The confession of Him before men, faithfully and unto the end, will bring to him who consistently makes it, Christ's public and approving acknowledgment before God and the angels.

Yet our Lord's language, when we thoughtfully consider it, is not quite so simple as it looks. It has heights and depths in it, and fact linked to fact; and argument and inference, and far relations, and profound experiences. Not that the language is therefore abstruse or inexplicable. It is simply comprehensive, as it was designed to be, and needs for explanation the facts of his life from first to last, and the inspired apostolic teachings relating to them. It is certain that some of our Lord's simplest and grandest words could not be understood at all, and in fact would not have a meaning, without the historic events that came after, with the apostolic commentary on them. It should be no matter of wonder to us, therefore, that we need, in addition to the words of our blessed Lord, some of the words of the Apostle Paul to instruct us as to the heart and substance of this confession of Christ. In writing to the Romans he says that the word of faith which he preached was this—“That if thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, and shalt believe in thine heart that God hath raised Him from the dead, thou shalt be saved. For with the heart man believeth unto righteousness, and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation.” Here we have the needed exposition of our Lord's requirement—“Confess me.” First of all it is made clear that this confession is not a thing of words merely; is in fact nothing if not springing from, and associated with, heart belief. It never can be a duty, it never can be less than a sin, to confess, in religion, what is not believed. We are to confess only what we believe. Then what are we to believe in order to a saving confession? The answer is clear and very striking. A fact. We are to believe one historic fact. That and no more is requisite, together with the open confession of it, to secure salvation. To believe that God raised Jesus from the dead, that and no more is required as the heart-faith of the man who, then, with his mouth, i.e. in every practical outward way, may make confession unto salvation. But any one may see that it must be that fact in its historic and moral relations, the belief of which has this saving power. The fact of the resurrection as an isolated thing, would be nothing. That fact, as the representative of many more which are gathered inseparably about it, is everything for the case. It becomes the most significant, the most illustrious of a whole train of facts and things, antecedent and consequent. As thus:—To believe that Jesus was raised from the dead, is, of course, to believe that He died. To believe that He died is to believe that He had lived. To believe that He had lived a human life is to believe that He had been born. So far by natural necessity, by the simple logic of the things, every man must go. He cannot believe the one fact without comprehending in it the others also.

But more than this. For these facts might be received as such, and yet have to the mind of the believer of them no particular significance. A young man might say, "Yes, I believe them, because I think the historic evidence on the whole is sufficient to establish them. Unquestionably a person named Jesus of Nazareth did exist—did live, and teach, and get a wonderful power among his countrymen; did suffer crucifixion at their hands; and (according to the same testimony and evidence which make these things undeniable) did rise again from the dead. But I do not know the meaning of it all." There must, therefore, be something more received than the mere shell of the facts. They have moral relations, indwelling powers and influences, divine meanings which come out in the Scriptures as doctrines or teachings of God.

We have such teachings condensed in the phrase, "God hath raised Him from the dead." The direct action of God in the resurrection of Christ is the supreme circumstance in the case which gives interpretation to all the rest. It is like the seal of a great monarch put to anything to give it the highest sanction and the strongest confirmation. There is the seal! Let men give heed. Let them render obedience. The resurrection of Christ is like the broad seal of God on the whole earthly life of his Son, from the moment when the angels sang his coming to the moment when the soldiers watched his dying. All is confirmed and approved, and in a sense transfigured and glorified, by the resurrection from the dead. It is the public acceptance in this world, as his ascension into heaven was the public acceptance in that world of his whole earthly work. He was "declared to be the Son of God with power, according to the spirit of holiness, by the resurrection from the dead."

Then on the other, the hitherward, side of the resurrection, there is a whole series of facts and their involved and related truths—the ascension which followed soon and which was seen; the entrance into heaven, which was not seen by mortals, but which was proved to have taken place by the wonderul pentecostal donation and outpouring of the Spirit, and by the rapid progress of the gospel among the nations. The coming judgment, too, follows as a consequence from the resurrection. God will judge the world by Jesus Christ, "whereof He hath given assurance unto all men in that He hath raised Him from the dead."

The resurrection, from its relative position among the facts of Christianity, has often been likened to the keystone of an arch. If a man looking at an arch says, "I believe in the keystone of it," he must believe in the stone next to that, on each side, for it could not hang in the air; and he must believe in the stones next to them, for they too must have support, and so down to the foundations. A man who believes in a keystone must believe in a whole arch. So he who believes that God raised up Jesus from the dead, believes in advent, incarnation, atonement, sacrificial death, and in ascension, in heaven, in coming judgment, in eternal blessedness. The great scriptural facts carry in them the doctrines of religion, certain moral relations to each other, and to God, and to us, and certain moral energies, which make them vital facts when believed. This peculiar combination of fact and doctrine will always give Christianity immense superiority over any system that may dare to compete with it. No other system has any such facts substantiated; no other system can make any such uses of facts which it has.

Such is the Christian truth; and it becomes saving by a full and free entrance into the whole nature of a man. Then it is believed "in the heart;" not in the emotional part of the nature as distinguished from the intellectual, but in the whole nature. Indeed, it will not do to say that truth is to be embraced by the heart considered as the affections, although the judgment is not satisfied concerning the value or validity of its claims, for that is simply impossible. Reason is as divine as emotion. To "believe with the heart," in the scriptural sense, is to believe with the reason. Nor will it do, on the other hand, to rest in a simple intellectual assent which does not touch the emotions, which does not command and guide the will. The Christian truth is of such a nature, and carries within it such relations to us, and such stupendous possibilities of advantage, that a man, let him be of the coolest temperament imaginable, may be sure he is not believing it as he ought, if there passes no vibration from the act of mental acceptance of the truth into the inner world of feeling.

The faith of "the heart" is thus the faith of the whole nature. The Christian truth irradiates the understanding, wakes up the reverence, quickens and cleanses the conscience, gently, yet with almighty power, engages the affections, summons the will to life-work, dwells in the memory as a life-treasure, claims the whole of the practical spheres—and all this is meant, and nothing less than this is required by our Lord when He says—"Confess me before men, and I will confess you before God and the angels."

2. Now, secondly, as to the confession itself—does it not spring naturally out of such a faith as we have described—a faith in Christ Jesus, held in the very heart? Could Christ release us from the obligation even if He would? Ought we not to be true to our profoundest beliefs? Ought we not to obey our deepest convictions? Are we not inflicting an injury upon our own souls, which may in a while even be irreparable, by failing, in whatever way, to speak out and stand by what we undoubtedly believe? Is there a reader of these lines who has, through grace, begun to cherish in his heart of hearts one great dear name—and yet is he going about the world, from day to day, in secrecy, and even in a kind of disguise, dark and undeclared—sometimes even a little nervous and anxious lest the secret should be discovered and made known? If that be the state of things with any of us, it will not continue to be the state of things for long. The great name which now fills, and, at moments, floods the heart with tenderness, will grow less sacred and dear, and in a little while, either the charm of it will have passed away before the advancing chill of spiritual death, or we shall have to come, by a very sharp repentance, into honesty, and truth, and boldness. "With the heart man believeth unto righteousness"—not unto fear, cowardice, concealment. Salvation, the salvation of any man, but especially of a young man, considered as a thing, which at least in its beginnings, is to be substantiated and wrought out in this world, consists in having the nature all together, knit up into closeness, composed into a divine harmony—power with feeling, passion with principle, from centre of inmost emotion to circumference of outmost habit, from circumference of outmost things back again to inmost and deepest faith, heart with lips and lips with life. We say this, attained, is salvation. For such unity as this never can be in sin. No man can be so sinful that there are no protesting powers, no soft relentings, no tender memories left within. But such unity as this may be in religion and by the fulness of its indwelling power. Sin divides, weakens, rends, scatters, and leads on towards complete disorganization, which is "death." Religion, or Christ in the heart, is the centre and fountain of unity. He recovers, restores, knits together in harmony all powers and affections, and builds them up after his own image, "into one new man." He "unites our heart to fear his name."

As to the methods and ways of confessing, it is not possible to be very definite; and, therefore, it is not wise or just to be rigid or exacting. Much must be left to each individual—temperament, circumstance, opportunity being so various. Only this much would we insist on very earnestly, and with full conviction of its inestimable value, that young people should, when inwardly resolved on the Christian side, in some way form open connections with Christian people. In work, in communion at the Lord's table, in church membership, in prayer—there are many ways by which we can, and ought, to show where our heart is, by which we make "confession with the mouth unto salvation." Of course all is included in leading a consistent outward life. But a life cannot be outwardly consistent if the inmost convictions are hidden or denied. The first disciples "were all together:" and still, Christian people in all the different sections of the Catholic Church, under a felt need and by a common impulse, go much into companies in order the better to celebrate their worship and do their work. Happily, now, association may be made with any church or company of Christian men in the simplest and most unostentatious way. No ordeal has to be endured. No violence is offered to sensitive feeling. Indeed, some think there are hardly walls of sufficient height around the spiritual Church in these latter days. At any rate, all must allow that the gates are thrown wide open, and that admission is given to all who reverently come seeking it. In this we cannot but rejoice. But it makes abstention the less excusable and the more serious. Still to hold back, and tread the solitary way, and keep the life-secret shut up in the heart, cannot be harmless.

And now may I speak with some of the young on this matter, as though "face to face?" What is the hindrance? Is it that you are not always quite sure of the reality of the faith you are thinking of confessing? You look, you feel, within, and sometimes it is there, and sometimes it is not there. The glow comes into your breast and then the chill. There is a flush as of the morning, and then something like a deepening of the night. What if your hope should not be the good hope? What if this early promise should be illusion? Would it not be, in such a case, a heavy addition to the sin of insincerity and unbelief if you were to make any public profession of that which has no existence? I answer that it is purely imaginary to suppose any guilt contracted by such a profession, if it be in the main honestly made. Of course it is desirable there should be a conscious faith and some glow of a present love in the breast before making any open profession. But on the other hand, to wait until these and kindred feelings are in full strength and activity before giving the least hint to others of their presence, is to wait for what will probably never come—never come in that way. Even experienced Christian people are subject to great vicissitudes of feeling. Sometimes everything is bright with them; and sometimes all is dark enough. There are comparatively few who dwell in unruffled peace. It therefore is too much for a young or new disciple to demand and wait for that at the very threshold of his course, which but few attain in perfectness even after much experience of the divine ways. Come forward, humbly and modestly, although the balance may incline but slightly to the favourable side, and you take the surest means of driving away the fitting shadows of uncertainty, and reaching some true "establishment" in grace, in which you will be able to say, "My heart is fixed, O God: my heart is fixed. I will sing and give praise with my glory."

But still, you ask whether it were not better for you to wait a little while, say another year, before pledging yourself, in order that the faith which you are thankful to be able to regard as real and true—not a merely vaporous emotion and transient glow in the breast, but something gracious, steady, growing—may have time to grow, and be a little, if only a little, stronger? It is real and true. You do believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of the living God, and that He expresses a Father's love, and that He brings to us in all practical forms a Father's grace, and that "his blood cleanseth from all sin," and that his death is your death unto sin, and his rising your rising unto righteousness; and, in brief, that you have all in Him, if only you had receptive power and sensibility to take of the all according to your need. But, alas! that is just what you lack. Your faith is so weak, so young, so little to be trusted yet! You feel yourself truly described in a single phrase occurring in the message to one of the seven churches—"Thou hast a little strength." Very, very little it seems to you! It certainly is not battle-strength, or racing-strength, or hard-working strength, or long-enduring strength. No epithet is so truly descriptive of it as "little," and you want it to be more, and you think it will be better to wait until it grows!—Which is to say that you think it will be wise to decline the use of at least one divinely appointed method of growth—and this, in order that you may grow! You have come from famine to plenty, but you will not eat at the table with the children—you will take your food in dark corners and hidden places where no one sees you, and will try, in fact, to keep it a secret that you are eating at all until you are plump, and well fed, and full of health. You have come from the "far country"—not perhaps that you have been in the ordinary sense "a prodigal," wasting your substance in riotous living, but—you have felt as every one feels on coming home indeed, that he has been in a far country while living without God, although clad the while from top to toe in respectabilities, with ample change of raiment—you have come from the far country; you have been met, embraced, welcomed home! And you have heard that word to the servants that they should bring forth the best robe for you! and the ring for your hand! and the shoes for your feet! But you say, "Nay, not yet. It is too soon to be washed and clothed and set among the children. Keep the best robe in its ward, and the ring in its casket, and the shoes in their place. I must sit down somewhere as I am—with soiled hands, with bleeding feet, with matted hair, in rags, in weariness, I will sit down to meat with the servants, or somewhere out of sight, until I can dress myself, and learn how to behave." Oh, when will men learn the very simplest things in the religious life? That the way to banish hunger is to eat, that the way to slake thirst is to drink, that the way to be warmly clad is to put on suitable provided raiment, that the way to make progress is to go on step by step, that the way to honour Christ is to obey Him in everything, and that the way to grow stronger in his grace is to use that grace in every form in which it is administered.

Once more. It is often alleged or felt that confession may, with propriety, be delayed, from fear of failure. This excuse has great force with many; and they evidently think there is something reasonable in it, and that it goes far to justify delay. Yet when closely examined it is found to be one unmitigated fallacy. Suppose the worst, or what is considered the worst that could be—confession made, and then failure. Is that really worse than failure without confession? I mean to the individual so failing. I own I cannot see how. The difference on either side must be infinitesimally little. But I am not sure that the balance of advantage does not lean a little to the side of profession rather than to the other, and that the responsibility is not lightened rather than enhanced by making it—always supposing it made sincerely. Here is something to be done, difficult but full of advantage. Two men are asked to do it, and are told that there is one way better than all other ways of beginning to do it—that there is as it were a gate leading to it. One of the two says, "I will not pass that gate. I dare not. Failure is much too serious a matter. I will not begin." The other says, "Failure? Why this is failure—not to begin. I fail in the whole enterprise unless I do. And if I begin in some hidden manner, passing through some gate of my own making or finding, or through none at all, I am far more likely to fail than if I go to the business at once, boldly, and in the appointed way." Which of those men has reason on his side? Young people sometimes fall into a mere dream, and persuade themselves that there will be no failure at least if they do not confess! As if the missing of opportunity, and the neglect of grace, and the loss of time, and the sinking of the living soul into ruin, day by day, were not failure enough! The soldier who dies on the field on the way to the fort or city he wishes to take is nobler surely than he who sits shivering in his tent and dies there. Nobler too than he who starts for the city on his own account and by his own paths, hoping to steal into it under cover of the darkness—and, being found, is shot as a spy. There is no way so good as to stand out among the soldiers. Answer to your name in the roll-call. Go with the king's army, and you will get into the city. For "the kingdom of heaven suffereth violence, and the violent take it by force."

Nor is there much more in the objection akin to that we have been dealing with, that you fear the greater dishonour which will come to the name of Christ, and the greater discredit which will be done to his religion among men by a Christian profession inconsistently maintained. You cannot help doing dishonour and bringing discredit now, and where and as you are, if you do not lead a Christian life. How thoughtlessly some people regard this matter! Hearing them talk, you might suppose that between Jesus Christ and themselves there are, as yet, only the most indefinite and the most indifferent relations, and that it quite depends on themselves whether those relations are strengthened and made more vital, or neutralised and almost annihilated! And yet Jesus Christ died for us! and loved us, individually, before we were born! and loves us now! And has, himself, brought down a kingdom of God out of heaven for us, and has so settled it here that it cannot be driven out of the world; and has given us birth, in a sense, within it; and many of us our first home in the Christian family; and our first growings amid Christian things! Here, undoubtedly, we are, and here we are living through our life, where we see every day many buildings which stand only for his worship, where the bells sound his name, where is sabbath silence every week, where literature, and law, and many social institutions, all do—in form at least—what some of the young are declining to do—they "confess," in their own way, the power of his name. Yet you say, that you can, if you choose, live so, that if Christ gets no glory by you, at least He will get no dishonour. He is dishonoured by every formalist that lives; and by every laggard that lingers; and by every procrastinator who has no to-day, whose whole religious life consists in writing, "To-morrow, and to-morrow, and to-morrow;" and by the miser who grips; and by the spendthrift who squanders; and by the great man who is vain and heartless; and by the poor man who is envious and bitter; and, in short, by every one who is not "for" Him, because that is to be "against."

In saying all this, I am supposing that you really wish to honour Him. Then you will trust Him, and you will obey. You will go where He leads; and be where his loved ones are; and his grace will be sufficient for you also; and you will do Him no dishonour which He will not soon wipe away; and you shall do Him loyal service which He will abundantly reward; and none shall pluck you out of his hands.

ALEXANDER RALEIGH.

CUTHBERT OF LINDISFARNE.

PART II.

THE triumph of the Roman party over the ancient British Church at Whitby, all-important as it was in its after results, at the time involved few, if any, changes of belief. The Asiatic Greek who ruled the English Church in St. Peter's name had no especial love for Roman innovations, and is known to have been unfavourable to sacramental absolution, as he pronounced "confession to God alone sufficient for spiritual safety." Gregory the Great repudiated the authority claimed for his see, and disapproved of the adoration of images, and the English Church, though it received the Roman Easter and St. Peter's tonsure, continued long after Cuthbert's day to reject the dogma of transubstantiation, and its religious system differed widely from that put forward centuries later by the Council of Trent. The great resemblance was in ritual, the great variation was in doctrine.* It is necessary to bear these facts concerning doctrine in mind, when we contemplate Lindisfarne and its inmates. That great missionary monastery was widely different in belief and practice from those which were righteously swept away at the Reformation, and the carrying out of the decision of the great historic council at Whitby by Eata and Cuthbert, by no means subverted as a whole the early British system under which both had been trained at Mailross.

Although Colman, with all the Scottish monks and thirty of their English brethren, had abandoned Lindisfarne, and most of the monks were new-comers, there was still nothing like harmony in the holy island on the subject of the paschal dispute. Cuthbert, whose leading ideas were personal holiness and evangelistic work, who was not learned nor scholastic, in a word not theological, found himself precipitated into the midst of a community agitated by the sweeping changes consequent on the decision of Oswy. The great power of his character here became speedily manifested. To a brotherhood vexed by jealousies and dissensions, he brought a nature which had no selfish aims to prosecute, and a sweetness and cheerfulness which nothing could disturb; a heart as pure as when the good Baisil recognised in him a Nathanael without guile, and that rare combination of imaginative fervour with great practical wisdom, which had given him the mastery over the shrewd churls of the Northumbrian border, and had been felt in every detail of the great missionary operations originated at Mailross. Rich in the sympathies which move men's hearts; meek, fervent, zealous, self-denying; living at once a life of the highest spirituality and the lowliest service, Cuthbert all unconsciously became the master-spirit of Lindisfarne, and imbued its inmates with his own tolerant, loving, forbearing spirit. Monastic duties alone might have seemed sufficient for the prior of this great and growing monastery, but the spirit of evangelism was still strong within him, and for several years he preached throughout Northumbria, travelling on foot and horseback through its wildest regions, by vigorous truth-speaking correcting the perpetual tendency to ally the new faith to the old superstition, deferring to none, neglecting none, spending the days in preaching and baptizing, and the greater part of the night in praying and chanting psalms.

But during the later years of his residence at Lindisfarne, Bede recalls less of apostolic labour, and more of growth in a mystical piety. He imposed upon himself the most severe austerities, and spent whole nights in prayer, warding off sleep by manual labour and walks round the island. It might be that the melancholy situation of Lindisfarne, and the unaccustomed murmurs of the northern sea, affected with too deep a gloom his highly susceptible and imaginative nature, which required the wholesome influences of long walks and rides, hearty meals and outdoor evangelization, to preserve it in health. His fame, which now brought crowds to Lindisfarne for advice and sympathy, might well be a burden to him, and human beings stimulated his emotional nature to assert itself at this time in various ways, some of which had a great power over men. He never celebrated the last supper without weeping; he moved congregations not so much by words as by groans, which evidenced his own agitation; and when penitents came to him for confession, he wakened in them a deeper penitence by his passion of tears over their sins. But the cœnobite life, so abundant as it was in fruit, so rich as it appears to have been in beatitude, was insufficient to satisfy the cravings of this remarkable man. He groaned under the burden of indwelling sin, he saw Him who is pure, and yearned after that communion with Him on earth which can only be realised in heaven. He wearied of the strife of tongues, and gradually but surely fell under the power of that spirit which impelled the eastern anchorite to the grim gorge of the Kedron or the solitudes of the Thebaid. We live in an age of rapid movement and "ceaseless toil and endeavour." Our religion has caught the infection, and our piety tends rather to be restless, militant, and aggressive, than contemplative. God forbid that we should undervalue the zeal and effort of any of our brethren! But the spirit of that early day tended rather to the perfecting of individual holiness, the development of the individual regenerate life, the attainment of unbroken communion with the Father and the Son. God forbid, likewise, that we should sneer at aspirations so lofty, though they were allied with the mistake, that in this sullied world, the spiritual could be completely sundered from the carnal, and that the mortification of the body could secure the enfranchisement of the soul! Cuthbert was completely in sympathy with the spirit of his age when he bade adieu at once to the dear friendships and labours of Lindisfarne, and withdrew to a cave on the main-land at no great distance, to seek unbroken communion with God. Did he find it? we ask with earnest inquiry, or was not his old adversary the devil near him in a thousand shapes, driving him from his caverned retreat on the slopes of some low-lying hills, to seek a yet deeper seclusion in the tempestuous solitude of Farne? Did he find it there? we ask still more earnestly, as the tale of his austerities and conflicts becomes more vivid and detailed. But the anchorite himself has left nothing to tell us whether the thick walls of his cell shut out the darts of temptation, or whether his eyes, deliberately closed on the troubled world of his day, were open in perpetual beatitude to behold the Father of lights.

Farne was an island of evil repute, demon-haunted the people believed, so that no man dared to dwell upon it, and much all men wondered when the saintly prior of Lindisfarne withdrew to its ill-omened solitudes, and took possession of them in the name of Christ. Farne, the largest of the sixteen islands which now bear its name, is a little more than two miles from Bamborough Castle. It is hemmed in by an abrupt border of basaltic rocks, which on the landward side rise to a height of eighty feet. On the ocean side there is a gentle slope, on which Cuthbert fixed his abode. It is only a few acres in extent. Now that it is civilised by a trim lighthouse on its summit, it is not easy to recall its unutterable loneliness and desolation when the prior of Lindisfarne chose it for his home. The dark wall of rock, the coarse tufts of grass hardly concealing the sand, the clouds of undomesticated birds for ever sweeping with wild cries round their rocky dwelling, the bleak and inhospitable coast of Northumberland looming grimly through the unlovely mist which for half the year broods over the chilliest and stormiest of the lesser oceans; these were the surroundings of the hermit's cell. Nor was this all. Popular beliefs had located a whole army of the infernal powers in Farne, and Cuthbert's first and severest task was to dispossess them.*

This, however, being successfully accomplished, the hermit, assisted by some beloved brethren from Lindisfarne, built a cell and an oratory. Bede and Symeon minutely describe the dwelling. A part of it was excavated out of the rock, and the rest was enclosed by a rude wall of stones and turf, and had a roof of timber roughly thatched with coarse grass. The hide of an ox hanging at the entrance protected him slenderly from the fury of the climate, and a hole in the roof gave him light. A window with a shutter was added for the use of visitors. A slight partition divided this structure into a cell and an oratory, for even in Farne the recluse must dedicate a place for prayer to Him that seeth in secret. At the landing-place they erected a larger abode for the use of visitors, and then the brethren departed with many tears to Lindisfarne, leaving their beloved prior alone. By that wise arrangement which preserved the earlier British monks from some of the worst evils of the monastic system, manual labour was combined with devotion, and Cuthbert cultivated a plot of barley for his own sustenance, though he provided richer viands for his guests. He had now attained the position which he had sighed for during the twelve years of activity at Lindisfarne.

During the earlier years of his life at Farne

* They were supposed to have seized upon an adjacent island, and a hermit named Bartholomew, who died on Farne in the twelfth century, minutely describes their diabolical appearance. "They were short in stature, with black locks and long beards. They wore black cowls, bestrode she-goats, and brandished lances like men-at-arms! For some time their machinations were frustrated by brandishing a cross before their faces; but this seemed only a temporary expedient, for they became so outrageous and turbulent, and interfered so abominably with the Christian burial of the monks on Wedum, that it became necessary to enclose the plot with a boundary of straws, signed with the sign of the cross."—Vit. S. Bartholomew, MS. Harl. 4843.

he was easily accessible to his brethren. He received them upon the beach, entertained them in the refectory, and even ate with them, bathing their feet in warm water, and receiving once a year the same service from them. Otherwise he never removed his sandals. He entered warmly into the conversations and discussions of the monks, occasionally enforcing a pause for watchfulness and prayer. Bede has preserved the remonstrances addressed to him on this practice, showing that the worthy brethren were as anxious to enjoy a holiday as secular beings. On one occasion they came to celebrate the feast of Christmas with him, and when on this, as at other times, he exhorted them to pious duties, they replied, "Nothing is more true, but we have so many days of vigil and of fasts: at least to-day let us rejoice in the Lord." This is very touching, very human. It is pleasant also to read that the anchorite who himself subsisted on the produce of a barley field was so genial as to reproach his monkish guests for not eating a fat goose which he had hung in the refectory for the express purpose of fortifying them against the fatigues of the return voyage to Lindisfarne.

Placed upon a pinnacle of holiness by the whole Northumbrian population, who attributed to him power with God, men, and devils, he preserved a humility worthy of a disciple of Jesus. "It must not be supposed," he said, "because it is my preference to live out of the reach of secular cares, that my life is superior to that of others."

For once, in order to do honour to an abbess eminent for her saintliness, Cuthbert left his cell at Farne. The woman, to whom he paid a tribute most singular in one whom tradition represents as a confirmed misogynist, was the youthful abbess of Whitby, the Princess Elfreda, niece of King Oswy. Like other Saxon princesses, she exercised a great political influence, and it was as much to gain from Cuthbert an opinion concerning the future of the Northumbrian kingdom, as to seek his advice in ruling the great company of souls gathered under her crozier, that she induced him to grant her an interview on a small island on the Northumbrian coast, called then, as now, Coquet Island. It appears that when Cuthbert had answered all her questions concerning the government of her monastery, she threw herself at his feet and besought him to exercise his reputed prophetic gift, and tell her whether her brother Egfrid should be "long living and reigning." "I am surprised," said he, "that a woman well taught as you are, and versed in Holy Writ, should use the word length in regard to a human life, which is of no longer duration than a spider's web: as the Psalmist saith, "Quia anni nostri sicut aranea medi labuntur." How short then must life be for one at whose door death is!" At these words Elfreda wept long, but still persisting in her desire to gain light on the future, she implored Cuthbert to tell her whence Egfrid's successor should come? Turning her attention to the numerous islets which fringe the Northumbrian coast, he said, "You see how many isles there are in the vast ocean. It is easy for God to bring a king from one of them to reign over the English."* So when Egfrid was slain in battle, and a prince whose life had been spent as an exile in Iona ascended the Northumbrian throne, this vague remark was construed into a prophecy.

The comparative sociability of the early period of Cuthbert's residence at Farne gradually changed into confirmed seclusion. He conversed with his brethren only through the window, and shortly even that was closed, except to the few who ventured to ask his advice on difficult matters, or came from far to seek his blessing. Of this lonely and (to our thinking) least profitable time of his life we know nearly nothing. It may be that in those nine slow-moving years of fasts and vigils, he won nothing except the reputation of being the holiest man in all the north. Meanwhile, England was torn by the struggle concerning Roman unity and the supremacy of the see of Rome. Wilfrid and King Egfrid were waging bitter war; but the news of Wilfrid's expulsion from the see of York, his first appeal to Rome, and his return with a decree in his favour, the determined resistance of Egfrid ending in Wilfrid's imprisonment and exile, if they were heard at all, made no impression on a man whose ambitions were higher and whose conflicts were more deadly, though these events were destined to bring his seclusion to a close. But Cuthbert, though separated from the outer world, was still held in remembrance, and the story of the apostolic successes of his earlier years, was kept alive in Egfrid's court, where not only the king but many of the nobles must have remembered the personal appearance of the athletic young Prior of Lindisfarne, who was often at court in the days of the Queen Etheldreda, and the marvellous stole, and maniple stiff with gold and precious stones, which she had embroidered for him with her own hands.

CROOKED PLACES:

A Story of Struggles and Hopes.

BY EDWARD GARRETT, AUTHOR OF "OCCUPATIONS OF A RETIRED LIFE," ETC.

PART III.—MILLCENT'S ROMANCE, AND WHAT IT WAS MADE OF.

CHAPTER IV.—COLLECTIVE WISDOM.

IT might be amusing, but it would scarcely be profitable, to detail all the domestic difficulties which Fergus Laurie had to meet before his party came off. Fergus said that the dwindle down to the veriest minimum of cups and saucers. It was now found to be as unique as if of the rarest porcelain. Robina wasted a whole day, and ever so many omnibus fares, going hither and thither vainly trying to match it. Fergus was so angry at this revelation of shiftlessness that Robina felt there was nothing for her but to obey without protest when he summoned her to accompany him to buy a new service, though it was a dreadfully wet evening, and she knew she had neglected to have her boots mended. Next day she was laid up with a cold, consequently the new service was not washed or arranged till the afternoon before the visitors came, when the charwoman did it in a great hurry, with considerable results of breakage.

However, everything was ready at length. During the last few hours, Robina made what she considered to be superhuman efforts, with marvellous results. In the morning all arrangements were chaos, by the afternoon they were just what they should be, but by such a strain upon Robina's temper, that when her brother came in and suggested some trivial change, her endurance gave way utterly, and she rated him soundly, and inconsequently—the two essentials of a fine scolding—till she was interrupted by a double knock.

George Harvey and his wife were the first arrivals. Mrs. Harvey and Millicent came next. David Maxwell and Mrs. Maxwell were the last. Mrs. Maxwell was invited because she was "a professional gentleman's" wife, and Mrs. Laurie and Robina thought that her presence would show that Christian was not their only opportunity of genteel society. Mrs. Maxwell, in her turn, having in reality no place to keep, was very particular "to keep her place," and her way of doing it was to cause tea to wait for her fully half-an-hour.

Mrs. Laurie and Robina intended to be very polite to Mrs. Harvey and Millicent. They said to each other—

"We must pay them a good deal of attention, poor things."

They had made up their minds to pity them, because they were self-dependent, and Mrs. Laurie and Robina had their own private opinion that it was such hard lines to Harveys had a full, bright flower-stand, and he could not understand why they should not have the same. Now the Harveys' flowers were always supplied by Mrs. Webber, who kept her old skill and luck with them, and fostered a few pennyworth of seeds into plants worth half-a-guinea. However the Lauries bought six flowers in pots at a shilling each. They had only been transplanted on the morning of the purchase. Robina deluged them with water, and set them out in the sun and wind. Then she forgot all about them for three days, in fact till Fergus lifted them in again to adorn the room. They held their heads up fairly, poor things, for the evening of the party, and after that died as quickly as they possibly could.

It was the same with everything. Also Fergus found that money was not only needed for the few "extras" which he had sanguinely calculated as within an easy expenditure of two or three pounds at most. Money was also needed for the sudden supply of things which should have always been kept replaced and repaired. Their tea-service, of a pattern which could once have been easily and cheaply matched, had been allowed to earn one's own living, that nobody would do it who could get any one else to do it for them. Mrs. Laurie used a sympathizing tone whenever she happened to name George to his mother—for surely Mrs. Harvey must have "felt" his marriage. Mrs. Harvey caught the tone, but innocently wondered what it could mean, and only hoped that Mrs. Laurie did not think George looked delicate.

Milly was very glad to see David Maxwell again: indeed, she was too glad, for her pleasure was as frank as it could have been had he been a girl! All unsophisticated as he was, David's heart taught him the difference between the gay, cheery greeting which he got, and the deferent reserve with which Milly received Fergus Laurie's welcome.

"Of course, she must prefer him," he quietly settled it within himself. "What could she see in me, and what does she know of me, and what can she ever know? Now, Fergus is so clever, and is able to show himself her friend. It is only to be expected."

It was strength and not weakness which helped David straight to this conclusion. For what was happening was really quite natural, and also quite right in its way, and it is not courage but infantine perversity which kicks against pricks that cannot be removed. But David himself did not know his own strength. He thought that he was constituted not to feel things as hotly as some people. He supposed that he was not "high-spirited"—like Fergus for instance—and forgot how that which is called "poorness of spirit" is the very chivalry of heaven!

"How do the pictures get on?" Fergus inquired of Milly when the tea was fairly served and the little party had settled down in something like composure.

"I have nearly done them," Milly answered brightly; "that is to say, I have done their hardest part, but they will take some time yet, for I must take care to make the vegetation what it would be in such a place, time, and season."

"Ah," said Fergus, with that peculiar critical voice which Milly was already learning to hear with respect. "Mind you don't let your details run away with you. Don't smother your ideal. Treat it largely."

What a wonderful young man for a mere clerk! Who was to remember that he had an art-loving master, and that artists and art-critics gossiped sometimes in the counting-house? Not that this need depreciate his talents. They were very real. Power to adapt and to apply is a great talent, and one without which all others are useless. Yet it, too, must have talents to work upon, and when it has not them within, but must grasp them from without, it often has a peculiar vanity of desiring to merge its own individuality in theirs. The quick to learn are prone to think that they taught themselves, and many a "self-made man" seems to forget even that he himself did not put his own brains into his own head.

But George Harvey was not so likely as his other hearers to let these dogmas pass unquestioned.

"I do not see that truth in a detail need destroy truth in the whole," he said. "God individualised every moss which He spread as an unnoticed carpet over the world. And however careful a grass is drawn, it will not be its finish, but its want of finish, which will give it undue importance in a picture. In proportion to its degree of finish it will fall into its proper place in art, as in nature."

"Yes, truly," Fergus responded. He had not followed George's argument beyond its first proposition, because he had been thinking what he should retort in his turn. "What I mean is, that we do not want the bare truth, but something more than the truth. For instance, there is a truth in the dry correctness of botany-book delineations, but that is not all the truth about flowers that grow in dew and sunshine. Nay, it is not the truth at all, for the very self-displaying attitudes in which the flowers must be posed for botanical purposes is a lie."

"Granted," George answered readily, "but I maintain this, that an artist who would give flowers their proper human interest, who would make a heartsease, Bunyan's 'herb-heartsease,' or a lily to outshine Solomon in all his glory, had best know about these flowers all that the botany-book can teach. Who could accept an emblem of cheerfulness and content with less petals than it ought to have, and the wrong sort of leaf!"

"Those who did not know," said Fergus lightly; "and that would be most people!"

"And what, when they grew wiser?" George asked seriously. "When they learned to mistrust and condemn the symbol, would they grow in trust and love for the thing symbolized? Wherever a feeling is to be produced there should never be a jar or a failure in fact."

"Nor in fiction either," added Christian half-playfully; "I mean when anybody is writing a story he should not be so carried away by his heroics as to change his hero's name, or age, once or twice, and forget all about dates and times and seasons. It is done sometimes, though, and it destroys all my interest. I can't sympathize with a Harry whose name is occasionally Dick, and who keeps Christmas within a month of Midsummer. I know such a being never shed a tear or felt a pang. In fact, I can't believe in him."

"No, and that destroys one's pleasure," observed David: "one likes to believe."

"Do you?" Fergus asked half-scornfully. "Then, I suppose, your highest praise is to say a book is 'just like life.' I want something more than that."

"A good deal depends upon what one thinks 'life' to be," said Christian in an undertone.

"Oh, I do think books would be dull, if they were exactly real," said Robina Laurie. "One likes one's heroes and heroines to be something better than the common people around one—more beautiful and braver, more forgiving and more interesting altogether."

"But don't you think that is real, after all?" Milly interposed. "Don't you think it is only our own fault for not seeing it? It seems to need less insight to admire a shadow than a substance. Haven't you known people delighted with the picture of a place, in which they never noticed any particular beauty? I think that is like most of us with stories and real life."

"There is a great deal in that," said Fergus meditatively.

"Is it not dreary work to separate the ideal from the real?" she went on eagerly. "Are they not the same? Is not the ideal simply the best view of a thing, and is not the best likely to be the truest? Would you not take a man's character from his friend rather than his foe?"

"I am entirely with you," Fergus observed emphatically, with a quick response in the hazel eyes that looked so grave and keen.

"Well," suddenly put in Mrs. Maxwell, "I am sure it is generally those who know most about people who think least of them. I'm sure I don't think much of anybody I know."

The acid tone, even more than the bitter words, damped everybody for a moment, and made David's heart ache and sink.

Mrs. Harvey spoke first. Her words seemed to ignore the sour interruption, and yet they bore subtle rebuke for it and healing for any whom it might have wounded.

"The nearest may be wrong in judgment or in praise as well as the farthest off," she said. And then she gave a kindly illustration. "Don't you remember a certain poor old neighbour of ours, George, who would look at one out of two blackened eyes, and say that nobody need wish a better and kinder husband than her man, take him for all in all!"

"But who shall say she was not right?" answered Milly, with flashing vivacity. "Perhaps he was really good and kind, although circumstances and temptations of many sorts made him appear otherwise sometimes. Perhaps when God made him, He meant him to be specially kind and good, and the eyes of love could see that meaning still, like writing under a smear!"

"I think God means us all to be kind and good, but if He designs it specially for some and yet they fail in it, I think they are the worst of all, and least deserve charitable interpretations." Christian made this observation in an undertone, and only David Maxwell heard it.

"I am with you entirely, Miss Harvey," said Fergus.

"Only be quite sure, Milly, that your faith in another is not mere stubborn sticking to your own opinion," observed George. "But more seriously, are you not stating a truth which while whole in itself, is only half of another and greater truth? Did not we hear you say a minute ago that it seems to need less insight to admire a shadow than a substance, and that many people would value the picture of a spot which they would not walk half a mile to see? May not that be also true in your metaphysics? When people are often so undeniably short-sighted on the lower levels, must they always gain correctness of vision on the higher ones? Is it not possible that there too, the semblance may command more attention than the substance? Is it not so in our commonest experience,—is not the man who simply does, what under circumstances is easiest and pleasantest for himself and others, constantly called gentle and kind-hearted, whilst he who does what is right at the expense of an unspoken inward struggle and some temporary inconvenience to others, is pronounced hard and unfeeling? Nor is the judgment readily reversed, even when time destroys the one man's work and establishes the other's. The one is only pitied, but though the other may be praised, it is with a grudge. No, Milly, though I am ready to grant your propositions so far as to say that if we could get a perfectly wise and good man, his idealisations would possibly come nearest God's truth, I am not prepared to trust all ideals. A telescope shows us more of the truth of the firmament than the naked eye. But what if the telescope itself be defective?"

Milly shook her head gently. She was not an easily convinced person, which was not at all against Milly, since it at least proved that she was not made of that stony ground, where if seeds take root quickly they are as quickly dried up. Not that she did not at once see and acknowledge the force of her brother's arguments, only while they appeared to her to dash something good and grand in her own, she would not wholly accept them.

"Then is a friend's love and faith to go for nothing?" she said wistfully.

"Oh surely not," said Christian warmly. "But don't you think they may have quite a different value? Don't you think they may be God's sign of a relationship between souls, upon which He ordinarily chooses to work spiritual good and blessing, just as He generally blesses our outer life by our physical ties? I don't think we ever do good to any one unless we love them and believe in them."

"But we ought to love everybody," put in Robina Laurie.

"Those who don't trouble themselves about the practice, are always very strong on the theory," observed Fergus, half-aside to Milly.

"Certainly we should love all in the sense of wishing and trying to do them good, or to be good to them," said Christian. "But with some, I believe our very wish and endeavour to do them good will cause us to place them under other influences than our own. I once had a certain child in my Sabbath class. I had myself secured her attendance, and whenever it flagged I hunted her up. I tried to give her even more attention than I gave the others, because she seemed to need it more. But there always was a barrier between us. That child's eyes were no sooner fixed on my face than my thoughts seemed to freeze on my lips, no matter how warm they lay in my heart. It distressed me dreadfully; for I made every effort in my power, and was still baffled by a mysterious law that lay beyond it. Suddenly a fellow-teacher said to me, 'What an interesting child your little pale pupil is! It ought to be quite a help to you to have such a face in your class.' And I had grace given me to be frank, and answer, 'If you feel so, you will do her the good that I shall never do her. Take her into your class.' And it was so arranged, and I saw the child's face gradually brighten and her soul come forward until even I could recognise its lovable features. I know she never liked me while she was in my class, and was always glad to run off without any good-bye. But afterwards she always came to kiss me every Sunday afternoon. And if she could come to my class now, I am sure we should get on capitally together. The ice between us is thawed, though we could never melt it by ourselves. And in this way I am sure that there are many circumstances, when the best that our love can do, is to stand aside and make way for the appointed love that can do more."

"Yes, that is true," said David, "and if love cannot so stand aside, it is not love but selfishness. But it is hard sometimes," he added, with a checked sigh.

"Yes," responded Christian, "its present 'is not joyous but grievous,' and yet it is the only way to joy. If love could be content to grasp what it could for itself, regardless of its object, it would not get what it really wanted, but only a very poor substitute. While if it invests itself entirely in its object, God himself secures it a rate of interest which shall suffice its needs, and keeps its principal safe in that bank of his, which transmutes poor stock of earthly affections and hopes into rich store of everlasting treasure."

"How do you know that?" Fergus asked in his abrupt way. "Don't you think now that you may be putting faith in your sweet fancies?"

Christian answered gently, "Who spake saying, 'There is no man that hath left house, or parents, or brethren, or wife, or children, for the kingdom of God's sake, who shall not receive manifold more in this present time, and in the world to come, life everlasting.'"

"And how many have proved it true!" said Mrs. Harvey.

"Ah, but that speaks of surrender for 'the kingdom of God's sake,'" Fergus replied, rather triumphantly.

"And what is the kingdom of God?" Christian asked; "and while we are in the flesh how are we put in any relationship to it? Is not the kingdom of God, like his chosen, something in this world, though not of it? Is it not that the law of equity and harmony which underlies everything? Is it not the duty which every circumstance holds for somebody? I believe every action, nay, even every spiritual motion of each of us, is either a stone contributed or taken from that 'building of God not made with hands, eternal in the heavens.'"

There was a pause, but Milly, who had been wanting to speak for some time, broke it.

"Is not what Christian says almost exactly what I said, after all?" she asked. "I said that I thought the ideal was God's truth, and is it not likely to be so, if, as she says, it is one of the most powerful instruments of good?"

"I think I can see a vital difference between your propositions," George answered. "You give the value of the ideal to the idealised. Christian keeps it for the idealiser. You make it a mental insight. Christian considers it a moral influence. You maintain that in some mysterious way a man really fulfils the highest ideal of himself, however he appears to fail. Christian, on the other hand, asserts that the ideal may be far above his head, not the measure of his soul at all, but the measure of the soul which creates it, but that it is his best help upward, and that its very height gives it the more strength to help him as far as he can possibly go."

"Yes," said Mrs. Harvey, "I have once or twice seen that a mother's faith in the superior industry and ability of scapegrace sons, has shamed and encouraged them, till it has finally made them just passable members of society."

"Well, I don't know," observed Mrs. Maxwell, "I've heard it said, 'Expect nothing, and then you'll not be disappointed.' I think there's a deal of truth in that!"

"I'm sure it wouldn't matter much what I thought of Fergus," said Mrs. Laurie. "He'd take his own ways, and be what he chooses, anyhow."

"Well, I can see a great deal of truth in your idea," Millicent observed to Christian, "but I still think there's a little truth in mine."

"Don't you know, Milly," her brother went on, in further explanation, "that many people have to give up their ideal at last,—that somehow, however much they try, they can no longer believe that their friend is what they once thought him."

"It may be their own fault," Milly responded; "some anger or enmity in their own hearts may have come like a mist between them and their ideal. When we cannot see the opposite side of the street on a foggy morning, we do not say that it is not there. We know it is only lost in the fog, and wait till it clears."

"Milly is right so far," said Christian.

"But suppose there is no anger or enmity," David suggested quietly. "Suppose one only loves more than ever, and longs as much as ever to be kind and faithful, and yet can't help not being able to believe any more."

"I can't understand that," said Milly fiercely, with a biting flash in her dark eyes. "If I had loved and trusted anybody I would do it till I couldn't—couldn't—do it any more, and when I couldn't—I should hate him!"

"I can believe you would," said Fergus Laurie, so quietly that nobody but Milly heard it, amid the storm of disapproval that her hot words called forth.

"That's always the end of thinking too much of people," observed Mrs. Laurie, shifting her knitting-needles; "those that are called 'dears' one day are generally 'devils' the next. I suppose they shake the two up together till it comes even."

"People that have fine ideas have the same feelings as common folks, it seems, and so it all comes to one in the long-run," said Mrs. Maxwell, "only it's more shame to them."

"Those who feel so when they think of such a thing beforehand," Christian remarked, "are sometimes the first to be patient and forgiving when the trial really comes."

"But such would be happier if they prayed God to regulate their minds as well as their actions," said Mrs. Harvey, with a gentle rebuking gaze at her daughter. "I think I know Milly's real meaning, and that her words don't exactly give it."

"But people must expect to be understood as they speak," added Robina, in her little clipping, satisfied style. At that moment Millicent did not like Robina Laurie, and thought within herself that her sister Hatty was generally very shrewd in her judgments!

David's gentle words had seemed the spark to Milly's gunpowder. It is often so, nor is it thus unreasonably. The voice of love and patience suggests their long-suffering and agony, and the bitter rejoinder it calls forth is often half-sympathy, half-outraged justice. The tempter has a peculiar temptation for the soul which has a strong sense of justice—he deceives it into a fancy that God's justice is asleep, and must be aroused by some shrieking vengeance on its own part.

But Fergus Laurie's quiet "I can believe you would" rankled in Milly's heart after all the other rebukes, spiteful or kindly, were forgotten. Did he mean that he could understand the feeling? or did he mean that he could understand it as consistent with her character?

"I dare say he thinks me a vixen, only caring to hold my own," said poor Milly, within herself. "Well, well, never mind, perhaps he will know better some day."

When the evening was over, and all the visitors were gone, the three Lauries drew their chairs round the fire, and talked everything over among themselves. And Fergus found his mother's and sister's spattering tattle very wearisome, and presently went away, and sat by himself in his bed-room.

"These Harveys are the right kind of people for me to associate with," he said. "They are all clever and have beautiful ways of thought. One can quite understand how such would grow in such conversations as we had this evening."

It never struck Fergus that one's thoughts must be the growth of one's life, if they are to be warm and stimulating lights, and not mere fireworks struck off by the friction of brain with brain.

"This is the right life for me to live; hitherto I have only existed. But judging from what Robina says of the cost of this evening, intellectual pleasures cost a great deal. We've always lived so up to my salary, that I shall have to take four or five pounds from next quarter's to pay to-night's expenses. And yet I can feel this enjoyment is as necessary to my mind as air or food to my body. I must have it. And as my present means will not suffice to procure it, I must try something else."

Alas for the schemes that are concocted, and the ventures that are taken, not because of a comfortable surplus, but because of a gnawing deficit—not in reasonable hope, but in self-willed desperation!

CHAPTER V.—A MESSENGER IN THE NIGHT.

WHEN Mrs. Maxwell and David returned to Blenheim House, they were not admitted very quickly, and when at last Phoebe Winter came to the door, she said not a word, not even in answer to David's cheery words; but followed them into the parlour, and there resumed a position, physical and moral, which she had evidently been holding before. Her master sat leaning back in the great leather arm-chair, in an attitude at once defiant and cowering. The defiance, or rather indifference, was assumed, with all dramatic exaggeration, the cower was very involuntary and subtle. But David could see it.

"Either do it or don't do it, now I've told you the consequences," said Phoebe, in her harshest judicial voice. "I'll not go from my words, you may know I'm not the sort o' woman. A woman that'll starve on here, year after year, and put up with her sauce" (with a significant movement of the head towards Mrs. Maxwell), "for an objec' that she has, is not a woman to say one thing an' mean another. You know I don't want to shame your son, an' if it has to be done, it ain't me, it's yourself as does it, an' as it can't be helped it'll be overruled for the best. Maybe, when I didn't do it, when I first could, a good bit more than twenty year ago, now, it were a doing evil that good might come. I didn't think so then. I thought it might be called a showing o' mercy; but it's a dangerous thing to call it showing mercy, when one's an objec' in view. But there's some people that you can't save, whatever you do. If you take 'em from the very gallow's-foot, they'll get a rope an' hang themselves. I spared you before most for your boy's sake, and because what was done couldn't be undone; but if I spare you again, it's a helping o' your sin, and it'll get him into it as well; for Phoebe Winter knows what the world is, bitter well, and that there wouldn't be one in a dozen that would think but what he aint as bad as yourself."

"Now you've done your wild Irish oration, Phoebe," said the surgeon aggravatingly, "perhaps you'll go and draw me half-a-pint of ale."

"I know I'm your servant, sir," Phoebe returned, "and I do what you tell me, and you can't say I haven't served you faithful, whatever I've done it for; but Phoebe Winter isn't going to stand by and watch while dirty ways is going on, though once she did think it was maybe no harm to hold her tongue, and let bygones be bygones." And Phoebe stalked back to her kitchen to fetch the ale.

"A pretty thing for me to come home and find you being lectured by that woman, Mr. Maxwell," said his wife, in her high-pitched cantankerous tones. "A nice degradation for a respectable married woman! I've always felt there was something behind the scenes, sir. I suppose she knows all about your wicked early life, sir, and the woman that David belongs to. She may know something very pretty about her, I've no doubt, sir, although you've had no more proper feeling than to let her brat live in the same house with your lawful wife, sir."

The door flew open, and Phoebe stood blazing on the threshold.

"An' what if I did know her?" she cried. "I won't say she was as good as you is, for them's not the words for either of you; but I will say, you're as bad as she were! There ain't a pin to choose between ye, 'cept that you've lived to have one sin more and be a self-righteous Pharisee! I ain't lived twenty years in this here den of iniquity for nothing. I knows the date when ye first come home as missis, an' I should like to see the date o' the fine marriage certificate that you're so proud on! It were against the grain o' Phoebe Winter to stay in the house wi' the likes o' you, I can tell ye. I've heard say ye may gen'rally know the ways that's right, 'cause they're the hard uns. But I can tell you it were as hard for me to stay as to go; it were a precious sight harder to stay, 'cept for the objec' I had. And as for the 'brat' that affronts ye so much, it's because o' that brat that ye haven't had to go to a prison to see the man that you're so proud to call your husband, though any woman that hadn't evened herself to him, would be ashamed o't. 'Brat,' indeed! Many's the time I'd ha trembled to be where I was; only thinking that the Lord who'd ha' spared great big cities if they'd had five good people in 'em, would perhaps spare this wicked house for the sake o' the young soul that I b'lieve He's taken up and redeemed to himself."

"Oh, Phoebe, do be quiet!" David entreated.

And Phoebe looked at him, put down the flagon and glass, and withdrew with that high step which all her household moil had never made heavy or shuffling.

"Oh to think I should have been brought to have to bear this!" said Mrs. Maxwell, with dry sobs. "It's a regular shame, and that it is! I expected everything to be so different. I'm sure I've hardly had better dress or victuals than I could have got myself, and I've not been taken about or spoken to, except like a dog. Lots of girls that have stuck to their work have done better, and yet I've had to give up a good deal, and live like a hermit, and put up with that woman, and with seeing your child, that wasn't mine. It's a regular shame, Mr. Maxwell, and that's what it is, and it shows that you're not a man, sir, to stand by and see me bear it!"

"Hey, what, what, what?" said the surgeon. "What are you talking about now, Poll? What do you know about it, eh, Poll? Eh, Poll? Hadn't you better hold your tongue?"

David stood sorrowfully looking at the pair. There was nothing remarkable in his father's irritable incoherence. It was but too common. David knew by many a painful experience that it was worse than useless for him to offer a soothing word. Because it was his word, it would be but oil on the fire to Mrs. Maxwell. He might have tried to speak to his father had he been alone. Early influences that had been about the surgeon, and even the cultivation that had necessarily come to him by his profession, had kept one or two spots in his character, which though not soft, were at least not always actively repellent. His son could reason with him sometimes, even though it always proved fruitless. David wished he could be alone with his father just for five minutes that evening. Next morning he was glad to remember that wish.

He did what he knew to be best—left the husband and wife together. Quarrels always died out so. Two people, full of mutual indifference, only enlivened by a little hatred, did not quarrel when they are alone. They are quite aware that nothing either can say will pain the other, when safe from the humiliation of outer eyes and ears.

David went along the stone passage to the kitchen. When he opened the door, he found Phoebe sitting poking over her dim candle darning one of his stockings. There was no trace of the recent storm about her, except that she did not even look up when he entered, but went on darning as if there was nothing in the world but herself and the stocking.

"Phoebe, what is all this about? What has made you say such things?" he asked, gently, standing beside her—rather behind her.

Phoebe did not answer. Perhaps she thought she had given her darling a shock about his mother, and that he had come to claim some withdrawing explanation. But David had been wiser than she guessed. A man's knowledge of the world had long since translated the once unintelligible sense of inferiority which had been forced on him by Mrs. Maxwell. Perhaps he had cherished a hope against hope, but it had not sufficient vitality to die hard. Still, he had a natural yearning to know something of the mother whom he had never seen or heard about. If Phoebe knew anything, as he strongly suspected she did, surely she would tell him. He remembered asking her about his mother years and years ago, when he was quite a little child, but the only answer, a curt command that he should never speak about her, had made itself imperatively binding on his sensitive nature. It was all the only thing he could remember Phoebe's speaking sharply to him. And though looking back upon this of late, he had argued within himself that Phœbe must be able to give some cogent reasons for such repression, still he would never have re-opened the subject had not others done it for him. Even as it was, the living present, with its possibilities, rose nearest to him, and crowded out the past.

"Phœbe," he said again, "what is the matter between my father and you? What makes you speak so to him?"

This time Phœbe dropped her stockings, threw her apron over her head, and burst into loud sobs.

"It's hard to know right fra wrong, and I'm only a poor ignorant woman. And it's hard to think you've bin doin' wrong when you've put your whole life in it, and to find that it'll be right to do what'll waste years and years o' patience. But I'll do it! I won't go on doing wrong the minute I sees it, and there's none o' us can leave off afore. And come what may, David, I'm glad I've stuck by ye all these years, and ye are a bit the better for't, ain't ye, David?"

"Very much the better, Phœbe," the young man answered soothingly. "You have been my best friend always."

"An' that's where it is!" she cried passionately. "And yet if I hadn't done what seems wrong, I couldn't ha' bin your best friend without doing of it. It's all in a muddle—there's something that you can't say is certain right or wrong, neither black, white, nor grey, and yet it lies in the way to something else that's certain great glorious good! For why, I ask, ain't I your best friend? Because I think I'm the only one that's tried to lead you to Him that's the Father of the fatherless and the motherless, as you a'most are and allays have been, David. I can't make out why God sets things so."

"But He does not," David argued gently. "If there's a right thing to be done, and we seem to have to pass through a wrong thing on our way to it, depend upon it, Phœbe, there's another way to it, and a better one, and it's our own fault, and not God's, that we do not find it."

Phœbe spoke more quietly. "It's comfortin' to hear you," she said. "Whatever I taught ye once, ye've made a precious deal more out of it than ever I could. I can bear a'most anything 'cept gettin' mazed and puzzled about the ways o' the Almighty, and kind o' thinkin' that either He can't know or doesn't care. That puts me fair past myself."

"That is because it is not a trouble sent from God, but growing from our own faithlessness," said David; "and I think it generally begins, Phœbe, when we've been letting in wrong feelings of some other kind. We do what God tells us not to do, and then grow unbelieving and impatient because the light of His countenance is withdrawn. We walk in roads which He has told us are dark, and then murmur because we stumble. I do not yet know what has been the matter to-night, Phœbe, and you will not tell me of other things which I feel sure must have happened to trouble you, so that I cannot tell what may have been your provocations; but still, dear old Phœbe, don't forget that the wrath of man never worketh the righteousness of God."

"It's a true word, David," she said, wiping her eyes; "and yet things is so peculiar. There's something I didn't do, years ago, which, maybe, I ought, and yet, if I had done it, maybe it would ha' been wi' a good bit o' vengeance an' spite. But there's no good sittin' up a' night talking o't, or I'll not be up in the morning, and there'll be words agen. I've heard the master and missus go off quiet enough to their room, and now you go to yours, and get a good sleep. Things mend theirselves while a-body's napping."

David needed no second bidding; but slumber did not come so easily. In spite of his strengthening words to Phœbe, he held to his own faith in God much as a poor mariner clings to a rope in the dark, rough, midnight sea.

Oh, it seemed so hard to pass from the bright, wholesome atmosphere of the early evening into this murky cloud of mystery and degradation. It was like going from sunshine and breeze into the dark, tainted chill of a charnel-house. What must it be to be like George Harvey, with such mother and sisters, and such a wife—helped, encouraged, stimulated, comforted on every hand, just as naturally and simply as a plant is nurtured by showers and sunbeams! The past evening had been as a festive robe to David's spirit; it was the others' every-day wear! And there must be so much of it in the world, and yet none for him who longed for it so much. The doubts which he had allayed in Phœbe returned to torment himself. Why did God create yearnings to leave them unsatisfied? "It must be right, it must be right," he cried in his heart. "But, O God, keep hold of me, for I cannot keep hold of Thee!" And yet better to be he, believing in the bright and innocent and happy, though shut from them, than Mrs. Maxwell, who concluded that everybody's home was like her own, "if one only knew."

He lay wakeful for a long time, but was just in the midst of a troubled dream, when he was awakened by a piercing scream, followed by Mrs. Maxwell's voice, crying—

"David! David! Phœbe! Mr. Maxwell is in a fit. He is dying!"

The son was in his father's room in less than a moment. He had sufficient professional knowledge to perceive that the surgeon was in no fit, but in a paroxysm of angina pectoris, slight touches of which he had suffered once or twice before. But this was no slight touch; and Phœbe no sooner appeared than David hurried her off to fetch some brother medical man, even though it might be the humdrum parish doctor, at whom the sharp surgeon had so often scoffed. Once or twice the anguish abated a little, only to return with renewed force; and when the hastily-summoned doctor turned from his patient's bedside, his face spared David from asking a single question.

The dying man tried to speak once or twice and failed. It brought the agony upon him like a fate. Oh the poor opened mouth and hungering eyes! they stamped themselves on David's heart, and he ever afterwards remembered his father so. And it was well! For it was a kindlier memory after all than any other could have been!

He got a word or two out at last. Oh if he had only wrestled with his spiritual foes, as he did with the physical agony that he might accomplish this! Only by putting his ear close to his father's mouth could David catch his meaning.

"You will do what is right. Phoebe is a good woman, and——"

No more! The fierce agony was down upon him again, and as it passed away life passed with it.

And next day the windows of Blenheim House were blinded, except the kitchen window, which had no blind to draw.

"I suppose my words killed him. I know them sort of diseases come when people are put out." Phoebe vehemently sobbed this out in the presence of her mistress, whose philosophic composure was such as not to render such a statement unfeeling, while Phoebe seemed eager to take a wild revenge upon herself by draining the deepest cup of remorse and humiliation before the very woman who had aggravated her bitterest invectives the night before. "That's where it is," Phoebe went on; "when one begins to think one may have been wrong, and to try to be right, it's just then that one gets punished, and one seems to bring it on one's own head."

Phoebe's rough hand was unconsciously laid upon one of the deepest secrets of divine government.

"Well, let it be a lesson to you," said Mrs. Maxwell, without one thought as to her own share in the excitement of the previous evening; "and of course you'll always feel like a murderer, and can't ever expect to prosper. With all his faults, Mr. Maxwell was a good man in his own way, and that's more than you'll ever be with your violent temper."

CHAPTER VI.—"THE HACKNEY MERCURY."

The death of the head of a family generally brings many changes with it. It could not fail to do so in Mr. Maxwell's case.

There was no will, and David knew he had no right to anything. His father's private income had all been derived from funded property of increasing value. Mrs. Maxwell would take her widow's moiety, and the rest would go to the next of kin, the surgeon's only nephew, who had never even been seen at Blenheim House. David would scarcely have wished it otherwise, nay, would positively have rejoiced in it, but for the actual pinch of necessity. There are certain ties of life which seem to pollute and corrode any gold that passes over them. And though David had loved his father in a way, and would have taken any kindness from him in life when it might have savoured of a personal affection, in his heart he rather preferred the plain legal cutting off of a legally nameless child, to any subterfuge.

Mrs. Maxwell promptly announced her intention to leave Hackney instantly, and go into apartments at some watering place, until she had time to secure a suitable permanent residence. She had secret visions of visiting and visited dowagerhood, wholly free from the cloud that had hung over her in Hackney. Mrs. Maxwell was so densely ignorant as to think nothing of her own defective grammar, or even to suspect that her manners were coarse and ungainly. Everything would be well so long as her dress was rich, her apartments spacious, and her table good. She judged thus in unsuspecting vulgarity. Other people might have confirmed her judgment in worldly cynicism.

On the very early date when she left Blenheim House "for good and all in every way," as she elegantly expressed it, David received a letter from the next-of-kin. It was couched in very courteous terms, asking him as a special favour to retain possession and keep everything going as usual until this unknown relative could himself appear upon the scene and wind up matters.

David was not ungrateful for this breathing time, for his future course was sufficiently indeterminate. His medical studies had proceeded so far as to render their completion desirable, and it seemed to David that his best plan was to offer his services to the parish doctor until such time as he could pass his examinations, since he believed he could make himself quite useful enough to deserve some salary in the meantime. He had a very natural desire to have arranged his future before his father's relation arrived. Phoebe's future he carried with his own, in his mental eye. He had never sought further to probe the mystery about her. It was connected wholly with his father, and he had in remembrance his father's dying encomium, and knew the surgeon well enough to have full faith in it. David would have been glad to receive Phoebe's confidence, yet he would not ask it. But he was determined to provide for her to the very best of his power. She had, indeed, been more than a faithful servant to him, and he was resolved to do his utmost for her, to keep her with him all through, if possible; if not, to aid her as much as he could at present, and hasten to bring about a speedy re-union. He did not hesitate in bringing this tie upon himself, nor forecast that there might come a time when he should have other uses for the income that must certainly be very narrow for a long time. David's was one of those simple, straight minds which, beneath the scriptural warning, "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof," reads a command, "Sufficient unto the day is the duty thereof."

With quick tact he felt that Phœbe must be anxious about many things of which she would be too reserved and delicately-minded to speak. For with all her homely bluntness, Phœbe was a woman of many fine perceptions, and nobody knew it better than he who was almost her foster-child. It was not lost upon him that the moment he became the apparent head of the household, Phœbe prefaced her old nurse-like "David," or "Davie," by the title of "Mr." He was made owner of nothing else, neither acre nor coffer, but to that one plain faithful woman, he had become "master."

So, in pursuance of his desire to set her heart at rest as much as possible, he announced to her—

"I am going to call on the doctor, Phœbe, to see if he will take me into his surgery until I can set up for myself. Perhaps he will give me a salary to live out of his house, and then we must manage so that you can be my housekeeper. I know you are not particular about doing any sort of work that may come to hand, and I should prefer one kind woman overlooker all to myself to paying heavily for part shares in faithless landladies, laundresses, and needlewomen. It would not only be happier for me, but really cheaper, I think, Phœbe."

"No, it wouldn't; tho' I've got clothes for two or three years, and needn't take any wage, and can live on taters, as I used to, once't before. Why can't you speak truth, Mr. David, and say you're doin' it out o' kindness to me?"

David laughed. "Kindness to myself," he said. "If you will have it that it is dearer, be it so, but what should I have to give elsewhere for the same article? What is the market value of care and kindness like yours? Can a king's revenue buy them? So, when I have the chance of them, I think they are dirt-cheap even if they do cost an extra shilling or two. Why, I set such store by them, Phœbe, that if the doctor wants me to live in his house, I was going to get you to take a little retaining salary, so as to be ready to come back to me whenever I want you."

"I'll be that without taking a wage for it," returned Phœbe, with a toss of her head.

"Trust me. Bless us, if it wasn't for the look o' the thing, I'd be your housekeeper, and keep myself, and bring home money into the bargain. It's made my fingers itch to hear what women get a-washing and charing. There's a poor fal-de-ral of a thing down the lane that gets three shillings a week for dusting out an office before eight in the morning, and cleaning the doorsteps o' Saturdays. And don't do it, either. For I troubled myself to walk past one Saturday night, and I'd ha' been ashamed o' them steps, and couldn't ha' gone to church on Sunday wi' such slobbered work on my mind. I ain't going to take your money to live idle away from ye, Mr. David. An I'll never engage myself for more than a day, wi'out telling the folks that I may have to go off without notice if my old master wants me."

"I think there'll be no need for that, Phœbe," David answered, and then he went off, to call upon the doctor.

That gentleman received him kindly enough till he knew his errand, and then he grew cool, except in eager reiteration of his belief, that he believed his visitor to be personally all that he should desire either as assistant, colleague, or housemate. And though the good doctor did not intend it, there was an emphasis on the word "personally" which gave David an insight into his real meaning, and prevented him from seeking any detailed explanation, when the doctor went on to repeat "that though personally you are all that I could desire, and though for some reasons such an union of our forces might be highly desirable to both, still—there are—other considerations—certain drawbacks—things that cannot enter into any agreement."

The worthy man could have thanked David heartily when he put him out of his misery by courteously acknowledging the civility with which he had received his unwelcome overtures, and then rising and taking his departure.

The doctor meant what he said when he followed him to the door, and shaking hands with him twice, begged him "to let him know if he could serve him in any other way. He should be only too delighted—in any other way."

David understood, and yet he did not understand. As we have said before, from the inside and from the outside, things show differently. He knew his dead father was as far removed from what a doctor should be as he was from true Christian manhood, which, in fact, must be the foundation and finishing of all technical excellences. But David knew that his own ideal was founded on standards which the world in general ignored. He believed that all professional etiquettes and prerogatives should be so permeated by Christianity that no lawyer should accept a client, unless assured that he had true and sufficient legal or moral claims for plaint or defence, and should find his sweetest professional success in the weight which such a man's name would presently carry with it; and that a medical man should be as severe and as curt to the criminal or imaginary diseases of his rich patients as he would to those of his poor ones, and as gentle and patient to the really suffering and dying poor as to the afflicted millionaire. But just as David knew that many lawyers were honoured and prosperous in the world, mainly because they could successfully make the worse appear the better cause, and show trophies of doubtful titles established, and criminals set scot free, so he knew that many a medical name stood high and fashionable, not only although he did not keep these ways, but partly, perhaps, because he did not! Whenever he had reasoned with his father on this or that grasping, selfish, or hoodwinking practice, his father, whether he yielded the point or not, had always proceeded to justify it by precedent, gilded by some name, often truly great in scientific skill, and in undeniable possession of the world's good opinion and respect. Therefore David had never supposed that his father stood condemned in the world's eyes save as an eccentric, coarse-mannered man, who failed to make the best of his talents either for himself or for it. Truly, David was never quite sure that he knew all, and Phœbe's speech to his father the night before his death, had changed his suspicions into certainty. Still the style of Phœbe's hints, and, though inconsequently, the heat shown by Mrs. Maxwell, had led him to conclude that this something was a skeleton in the household rather than the surgery.

Therefore, though he felt that some cloud about his father overshadowed his prospects, he was mystified. He half shrank from any attempt to analyze it, and he walked moodily along, wondering, with the vagueness always attendant upon a new groove of thought, into what other channels beside medicine he could possibly turn his knowledge of chemistry and anatomy. The former was his favourite, and this instantly struck him as fortunate, being the more adaptable of the two. He knew that the world was all before him, but dismissed that thought in an instant. There were three reasons why he should remain in Hackney. They must be written down in succession, but it need not, therefore, be inferred that they presented themselves so to David. He might have seemed more heroic if they had, but, in fact, they all came together, shading into each other, so that it was hard to say where one ended and the other began. First, he would not wish to extort from ignorance a confidence which was not to be obtained from those who knew his antecedents. Second, a confidence that goes so cheaply is seldom worth having, and in his case could scarcely be procured without evasions stronger than silence. Third, a charmed link held him to Hackney; had it been stronger, it might have been elastic; as it was, the least strain would snap it at once, and for ever. If he stayed where he was, he might in time become Millicent Harvey's friend, her second brother, a familiar face in whatever household she blessed with her presence.

David kept his castle-building within these modest limits, and yet somehow it brought the blood to his pale face, and it was still flushing there when the corner of a cross-road brought him face to face with Millicent herself.

She paused and greeted him; and then, as for some few hundred yards their ways lay in the same direction, they walked on side by side. They had not met since the evening of the Lauries' party before his father's death. And Milly wondered rather awkwardly what she ought to say, which wonder resulted simply in more emphatic inquiries after Mrs. Maxwell's health and whereabouts, and in an observation that her sister, Mrs. George Harvey, had been telling her husband that he should call at Blenheim House, but that George had said he feared it would be too early an intrusion.

"Tell your brother that I shall only be too happy and honoured," David responded. His very earnestness gave a hesitation to his manner, and Milly scarcely thought he was sincere. After a few moments' silence, he asked whether she had seen Fergus Laurie lately.

"Oh yes," she replied, "he was with us last evening. I am very busy—just as busy as I can be—for him!"

"Dear me, has the firm so much on hand?" David observed.

"No; I am working for him," and Milly became a little embarrassed. "I am working for him apart from the firm. Of course you know he is soon going to set up in business by himself. I thought you were sure to know. I thought you were the same as himself!"

"I did not know," said David. "I have not seen him much this last week or two. I knew he was very busy. You see there was no object in his telling me. Dear me, and he is going into business by himself. Once he starts, Miss Harvey, he will be a great manufacturer. You can't think how clever he is, nor how generous!"

"I can fully believe it," Milly answered; and thought to herself, "Of course Fergus did not tell him about his plans, because it would have seemed so heartless, when this one is so miserably circumstanced." For in course of conversation Fergus had imparted to Milly all that he knew, believed, or imagined about the Maxwells. And then as they parted Milly said in her frank, off-hand way, "Tell Mr. Laurie that I told you. I did not think I was revealing any secret. It would have been safe from everybody else. Good-bye."

David walked on homewards. He knew that he was Fergus's nearest friend, but for all that he was not so near as the girl whom his friend had scarcely spoken to six months ago! "Well," David thought to himself, "it is only natural; in fact, it is as it should be."

He pushed open the garden gate at Blenheim House, and made his way to the back door to save Phoebe the trouble of leaving her kitchen.

He lifted the latch and went in. The room was bright with what Phoebe would call a fine "cooking fire," and there were savoury smells rising from sundry pots and pans grouped about the grate. But Phoebe, active, bustling Phoebe, sat apart, leaning heavily on the table. A local newspaper lay a little way from her, as if she had given it an impatient push. She sprang to her feet as David entered, and her face was ablaze with wrath, and sorrow, and tears.

"Ye might as well read it at once't," she said, holding out the journal. "There'll be plenty that'll speak on't, and it's well to have on your front ready. Says the baker's boy to me, 'You look in the second column, third page of our Mercury,' and I saw the milk-man a-smirkin'. There's no use in a-hushin' and a-hidin', I sees that. The only way to get rid o' dirty clothes is to wash 'em. Shut 'em out o' sight and they smells! It's a poor work to have set one's life to, that can be all unpicked in a minute, like mine. But oh, Mr. David, Mr. David, don't turn like that, but remember that the Lord himself says that the son and the father may differ as dark and light, and anybody that reads the Bible knows it!"

For David's face had grown white and rigid over the paragraph which poor Phoebe's thumbing had made painfully conspicuous. But he gently stroked the hand she laid on his arm.

"Don't fear for me," he said.

Still he gathered up the paper in his hand, and went off to his own room and shut himself in.

THOUGHTS BY THE WAY.

III.

THE pitiless anathema belongs to ecclesiasticism—the hard sneer to infidelity. True religion does not curse, and honest doubt will not scoff.

Because mental force draws on the physical system and exhausts it, materialists argue that mind is only a manifestation of matter. In proportion to the exercise of thought there is brain expenditure, and therefore thought is only action of the brain.

This argument makes large demands. When I see the substance of a candle passing off into flame, can I justly conclude that the flame is nothing more than the etherealisation of wick and tallow? I have left out the invisible oxygen, which is the most essential of all. And in thought, may we not hold that there is as large a residuum unaccounted for, when these physicists make mind only the flame of matter? The spirit-oxygen is the one grand requisite.

It is not isolated great deeds which do most to form a character, but small continuous acts, touching and blending into one another. The greenness of a field comes not from trees, but blades of grass.

A religion of the bare intelligence makes everything disputable ; of the feelings, everything vague ; of the conscience, everything rigid. Intelligence in religion gives form to feeling, feeling gives warmth to conscience, and conscience gives a firm basis to both.

To think of the infinite, say some, limits it ; therefore we must ignore the infinite. When I look on the sea, I limit it on my side, but only on my side. On its own side it is to my view boundless ; and man's spirit can so stand on the shore of the absolute.

When some great man dies, there is often a class of men who entrench their opinions behind his grave, because they think regard for the dead will protect them. They remind one of the Communists of Paris taking refuge at last in Père la Chaise.

A man who receives the truth of God to give it forth again is like the sea of Galilee, through which the river Jordan flows. He is kept clear and sweet by the passage of the stream. He who absorbs without giving back is like the Dead Sea, which is left stagnant and bitter, because it has no outlet.

There is a second growth sometimes on grain, in abnormal seasons, which blights the good of the harvest ; and there is occasionally a re-appearance of youthful follies in old men which is one of the most painful sights in human nature. It is a happy thing when men come to their graves neither before their time, nor after it, but " in a full age, like as a shock of corn cometh in, in his season." May not the ancients have been thinking of such an after-growth in old age, when they framed their proverb, " Whom the gods love, die young ?"

Great thoughts and books sometimes disappear for generations, and turn up again unexpectedly, like messages dropped in the sea, and carried to far-off shores. The ocean of time has its hidden currents, as well as that of space ; and a curious history of them might be written from these reappearances.

They help us to believe that no true word or deed is finally lost, and that a time is coming when, in this sense also, the sea shall give up the dead which are in it.

There are few things which prove more strongly our disordered state in this world than the steady downward tendency, both in society and the individual, unless there be a constant counter-struggle. There is an abrasion of the spiritual strength going on, a cooling down of the soul's warmth, a gravitation earthward. Of the soul's world it is also true—" The mountain falling cometh to nought, and the rock is removed out of its place." For the waste of external nature, God has provided a gradual counter upheaval, or intervals of convulsive elevation, or both together. And so there are needed in the spiritual world steadfast resistance against declension day by day, and also those seasons of reviving impulse which God sends to churches and generations. The decay of the created, and the counter-working of divine life, are the law of the present world both in its material and spiritual elements, until a higher order enters in the creation of the new heavens and new earth wherein DWELLETH righteousness.

Infinite power embraces the outmost circle of the universe in stars and constellations. Wisdom shines through power in the next circle, in the balance of planetary worlds in our solar system. Goodness comes distinctly to view when our earth is reached, in the constitution of nature, animate and inanimate. Justice appears in the history of the world, in the fate of nations dependent on a moral law. Last of all, mercy addresses the heart of man. Zone within zone, the divine attributes girdle us round, till God himself visits the soul, the gospel tells us how. And when He is admitted, the circle of his presence widens again and fills all things, till the stars tremble to its living pulse. The outmost circle proclaims God is Power ; the inmost responds, God is Love.

The Bible is a transparency, but it can be truly seen only when it is lighted up within—by God's Spirit.

A sign of divinity in the Bible is the way in which it never falls into mysticism while keeping close to the edge of the deepest feeling, and rises at the same time above materialism when it is dealing with the plainest practicalities.

That the world should admire its own heroes, and not God's, is natural enough. It is merely a case of mutual flattery. It praises those who show that they value its praise. It can understand them and appreciate their motive, but not that of the others, unless it were ready for their self-sacrifice.

Not to join the world's flattery of success, when it is unaccompanied by moral worth—not to bow at the shrine of mere wealth, however it may have been gained, or however it may be used—is one scriptural token of a good and brave man:—"In whose eyes a vile person is contemned; but he honoureth them that fear the Lord." The judgment of the common mind is struck in this:—"Men will praise thee, when thou doest well to thyself."

Some men seem to think they strengthen the barrier against unbelief by increasing the number of things they believe. They turn Romanists out of fear of infidelity, as if a man should think that by filling the bottom of his boat with stones, he keeps the sea farther from him.

Ballast is good, but it is most profitable when made up of sound cargo.

One reason why Christianity has so little success in the world is because professing Christians subordinate it to so many other considerations. Local residence, occupation, friendship, marriage, are settled, and the question of religion goes for little or nothing. It is compromised, and a compromise is close to a surrender. Were it the ruling principle with Christians, it would be on the sure way to the world's throne, though it might be through suffering. "Art thou a King then? He answered, Thou sayest. To this end was I born, and for this cause came I into the world, that I should bear witness unto the truth."

Half truths are very attractive to some minds. They admit of forcible statement, from the absence of all attempt at modification, and they appear to possess simplicity and unity. They can be overcome not by the other half-truth, but by the presentation of the whole.

Truth consists not so much in the elimination of error—that is, in contraction—as in comprehension, in the taking of what is true in error into our truth.

Another way of stating this is, that error is always more or less superficial, and the only effectual way of supplanting it is to go deeper. The mine, as in military matters, is best met by the countermine.

That which is most pure in man is most divine:—"Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God." That which is most tender in God is most human:—"Like as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear Him."

These two rays of light meet in Christ. Do they neutralise each other as light beams sometimes do? Does the divine weaken the human? the pure diminish the tender? The reverse. It is sin that hardens and dehumanises us. See, then, with what confidence we may cast ourselves on a sinless Saviour, "holy and yet harmless!"

If we admit the agreement of revelation with conscience to be an evidence of divinity in the Bible, do we thereby make conscience the criterion of what is divine in it? Some say so, and make this the door to rationalism. But it is surely possible to make conscience a witness, without exalting it into a judge.

There are two safeguards against rationalism. First, there are other witnesses. Second, the conscience in the enlightening, purifying process which it undergoes, through contact with the Bible, feels its own incompetency to be a judge. In other words, it becomes aware that sin has darkened it, not so much as to unfit it for the recognition of the Teacher, but enough to unfit it for dictating to Him.

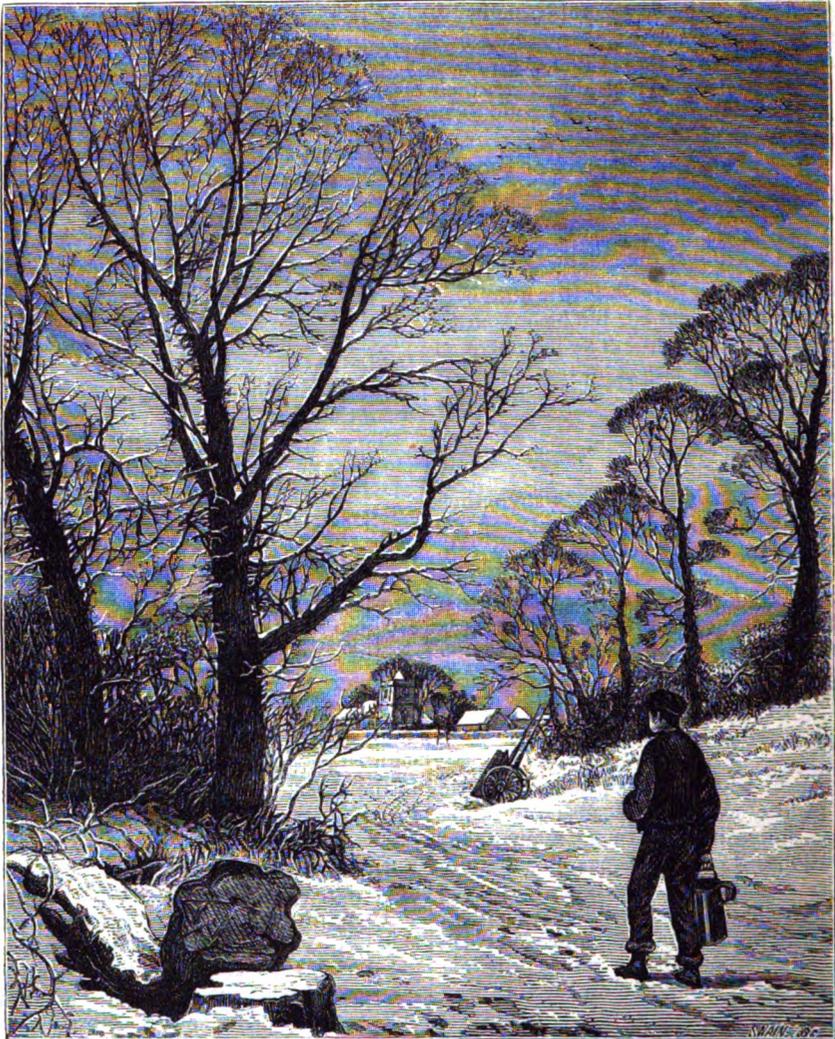

JOHN KER.

FELLOW-SUFFERERS.

ALAS, poor tree,
 Had I thy bravery,
 Or couldst thou weep in concert to my sighing !
 Snow-hid, thy leaves lie dead ;
 I wail, but thou dost spread
 Bare arms of benediction o'er the dying.

Thou their first stay, and last—from bud to leaf ;
 And this thy thanks, poor tree,
 That they all fell from thee,
 Like summer friends when summer days are over :
 That thou dost stand alone,
 With all thy greenness gone,
 For winds to rock, and winter snows to cover.

Lightly the zephyr came, as lightly hied ;
 But these, when first he wooed,
 Forsook their real good,
 Knowing thee faithful and the wind untried.
 Reproach them, they will hear,
 Their graves are very near—
 Close at thy roots thy prodigals abide.
 Ah, not reproach, but rather dirge and prayer !
 They, as they lie and die,
 So low, who late were high,
 Fare worse for loss of thee than thou canst fare ;

The wind that whispered lied,
 Kissed once, and flung aside,
 And scent of death soon filled the autumn air.

Alas, poor tree !
 Thy fate and mine agree :
 All desolate, but we will not despair :
 A thousand leaves left thee,
 An earthly hope left me—
 Yet another Spring may clothe our branches, cold and bare.

ALICE HORTON.

THE SYRIAN LEPER.

2 KINGS v.

GOD'S election of Israel as the covenant people was not designed to be private to all other nations. He elevated them above the rest of humanity in order that the blessings which He bestowed upon them might stream down from them and bless the whole world; just as in the economy of nature He raises aloft into the sky a certain portion of a country in the form of mountains, on which the clouds of heaven may be precipitated in snow or rain, and from which streams and rivers may flow down to fertilise the plains and valleys at their feet. Were there no elect nation—no people selected to enjoy exceptional privileges, and to be tried and disciplined by special dispensations of grace—then the knowledge of the living and true God would be hopelessly lost, and one great tide of moral corruption and idolatry would sweep over the human race, and obliterate every trace of true religion; just as in the absence of mountains all the land would be worn down to one uniform level, and one shoreless ocean would tumble round the globe. In the history of Elisha this universal design of God's special dealings with Israel comes out conspicuously to view. We find in him a closer resemblance to the Son of man, both in his personal character and in the nature of his work, than in any other of the prophets and godly men of old. His comprehensive beneficence and generous toleration of other creeds and nationalities, contrast in a very striking manner with the spirit of his age. By the story of Naaman the Syrian leper especially he is brought very closely into contact with our Lord. Not only was the nation to which this man belonged the hereditary enemy of Israel, and given up to the worship of false gods; but their national idol was that very Baal which Ahab, by his disastrous marriage with the Syrian Jezebel, introduced with such terrible consequences into the land of Israel, and which it was the special mission of Elisha's life to overthrow. And yet the prophet overlooked all these circumstances of prejudice, and regarded Naaman on the common and wider ground of his humanity as a suffering fellow-creature, whom it was in his power to relieve. And our Lord brought forward this example of Elisha's unrestricted philanthropy as a reproof to His own bigoted countrymen, who wished to confine the benefit of His miracles within the narrow circle of their own district—as a general reproof to all the Jews, who could not bear that the Gentiles should be made partakers with them of the common salvation. “Many lepers were in Israel in the time of Eliseus the prophet; and none of them was cleansed saving Naaman the Syrian.” The case of the Syrian leper showed that, even under the old covenant, God had purposes of mercy in regard to the alien races.

By the cure of Naaman's leprosy, Elisha anticipated the miracles of our Lord, several of which were wrought upon lepers. Leprosy was the typical or representative disease of Palestine. The ideas usually entertained regarding its infectious or contagious character are erroneous. It is purely a disease of the blood communicated only by hereditary taint. In this light the restrictions imposed upon leprosy by the Mosaic ritual assume an altogether different significance from that which is usually put upon them. They were meant not to prevent the spread of the disease, but to remind the Hebrews that they were God's peculiar people, brought into covenant relation with Him in order that they might be pure as He is pure, and perfect as He is perfect. Leprosy, like every kind of disease, was an outward symbol of sin—a symptom visible in the flesh of the spiritual disease of the soul. But as it would have inflicted endless inconvenience upon society had every illness and disease been regarded as ceremonially unclean, leprosy was selected, owing to its peculiar loathsomeness, its hereditary contamination of the blood, and power of disfigurement, to represent the rest, and to be vicariously burdened with the ceremonial laws applicable to them. Among the Syrians, however, these laws of social isolation in regard to lepers did not exist; and therefore the leprosy of Naaman, although of the most malignant type, requiring in itself no sanitary regulation, did not disqualify him for the performance of his public duties. He was permitted to hold uninterrupted intercourse with the royal household, and to worship with his master in the house of Rimmon. But, in spite of the high position and the freedom of social communion which he enjoyed, the lot of Naaman was truly a pitiable one. His disease was a living death—a poisoning of the springs of his whole being. There is a touch of tender compassion in the way in which the Scripture narrative introduces him to our notice. He was the noblest subject in Syria, a victorious general loved by his soldiers, a prime-minister trusted and honoured by his king, the husband of a loving wife, and the head of an attached household. He had all of fame, and wealth, and honour, and love which the world could give him; but—and how suggestive of vanity and vexation of spirit in such a connection is that little word but—he was a leper!

But in the dark leaden sky that hung over the life of the Syrian leper, a little spot of blue suddenly opened up in the most unexpected manner. There is a Jewish tradition recorded by Josephus which identifies Naaman with the unknown person who drew his bow at a venture, and smote Ahab with his fatal wound at the battle of Ramoth-gilead; and thus, as the sacred narrative says, "gave deliverance to Syria." If the tradition be genuine, it is probable that it was in this campaign against Israel that the little Hebrew maid, whose story is so briefly but touchingly related in the general narrative, was taken captive. Brought into Naaman's household, and made the slave of his wife, this foreign girl had daily opportunities of seeing the distress caused to the whole family by the leprosy of its head. Forgetting all the wrong that had been done to herself, and all the prejudices of her race and religion, she sympathized deeply with the afflicted leper. She had heard of the cures effected by the prophet of the Lord, and more especially of the raising of the Shunammite's son; and she reflected that he who could restore the dead to life, could also cure her master's leprosy. Full of this idea, she one day said to her mistress while waiting upon her in the course of her ordinary duties, "Would God that my lord were with the prophet that is in Samaria, for he would recover him of his leprosy." It would be very interesting to dwell upon all the suggestive features of this little episode, but I draw attention to it solely to show how essential, in the cure of Naaman, was the mediation of this little maid. The Hebrew slave was nothing in the eyes of the great Syrian general; and yet without her aid, he would have died a miserable leper. She made known to him where and how he could be healed. And does not this incident teach us, in a most striking manner, that no human being is independent of another? The highest person may need the help of the lowest. Especially in the matter of our salvation are we taught our mutual dependence upon each other. This is the great lesson which is conveyed to us by what are called the miracles of intercession in the Gospels; that is, the miracles in which the help of friends was needed to bring the case of the sufferer before the Saviour. A father beseeches Jesus for his son; a master asks a cure for his servant; and neighbours with wonderful perseverance and faith, bring their friend through the roof into the presence of the Redeemer. The case of Naaman the Syrian, guided to the prophet Elisha by the captive Hebrew maid, is the Old Testament counterpart of the case of the man sick of the palsy carried to the feet of Jesus. It is in spiritual as it is in social life—we need the help of our fellows. God has left His work of redemption to be completed, in a sense, by man's ministry of faith and love, as He left the work of creation to receive the finishing touches from man's skill and labour. He who put man in the garden of Eden to dress and keep it, after He had made all things very good, said to the disciples, "Go ye and preach the gospel to every creature," after He had said of the work of grace on the cross, "It is finished." It is by man that God saves man. We become, as one has expressed it, sub-saviours. We lose our hope and strength, and we are refreshed and invigorated by another's prayer. We grope for the wall in our blindness, and another guides us to the True Light. We are in the valley of the shadow of death, and another reaches to us the rod and the staff by which we are comforted, and led out into the green pastures and beside the still waters beyond. We are carried in our spiritual weakness in the arms of a friend's intercession to the feet of Jesus, and the blessing of faith won for us becomes the starting-point of our own personal faith.

The hint which the Hebrew maid threw out was speedily acted upon by her mistress, who grasped eagerly at anything that might afford a prospect of deliverance. It reached Naaman's ears, who immediately repaired to the king and begged his interference. Benhadad imagined Elisha to be one of those diviners or magicians—of whom there were probably numerous examples in his own court—employed by the king of Israel as a worker of prodigies. Under this impression he sent to Joram a proud letter, commanding the king of Israel to place the services of Elisha at the disposal of his prime-minister, so that his leprosy might be cured. Struck with consternation at the imperative tone of the letter, and at the seeming extravagance and unreasonableness of the request, Joram rent his clothes, and called his courtiers to witness how manifestly resolved the king of Syria was to pick a quarrel with him, and make it the excuse for an aggressive war. Leprosy in Israel was considered to be so peculiarly a Divine judgment, and therefore incurable by any human means, that the hostile interpretation which the king of Israel put upon the message of his brother monarch seemed the only natural one. But had Joram been as well acquainted as he ought to have been with the character and position of Elisha, the message of the Syrian king would have occasioned him less surprise and alarm. He would have seen at once a way of escape out of the difficulty. But it is evident that this was the first intimation which the king of Israel had of the life and labours of the great prophet. Elisha had no honour in his own country and among his own people. His own king seemed to be utterly ignorant of his existence. The mighty works which he had wrought, and whose fame had penetrated even to a captive slave in Syria, were entirely unknown in the high places of his own land. This circumstance shows how thoroughly engrossed in sensual and idolatrous practices were the aristocracy of Israel at this time. On the higher and more cultivated classes the sin of Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, had done its evil work. The steady growing corruption had entered every channel of society. Its language, its habits, its worship were steeped in one pervading pollution; and the heroic energy which Elijah and Elisha displayed, and the supernatural works which they performed, had not succeeded, even in the most partial manner, in stemming the fatal tide. No voice was raised for Jehovah; no sign was made that Israel had not utterly forgotten their God. In the midst of this spiritual darkness and deadness, the incident of Naaman's quest for the prophet of the Lord seemed like a solemn rebuke of the national apostasy. From the very centre and cradle of that Baal-worship which had ruined the land came to them, as if for the purpose of shaming them out of their ignorance and hardness of heart, a revelation of the wonderful works which He had been doing in the midst of them for their reformation. Out of the mouth of heathen and enemies God ordained the praise of His glory when the lips of his own people were mute.

When Elisha heard of the king's alarm and perplexity he sent to him a message of mingled reproof and comfort. "Wherefore hast thou rent thy clothes? Let him come now unto me, and he shall know that there is a prophet in Israel." Naaman accordingly went to the abode of the prophet with great pomp—with a splendid train of chariots, horses, and camels laden with costly presents—filling the whole street before the prophet's house. This was not the condition in which Elisha wished him to come for a cure. Such pride and pomp were unsuitable for a man who was afflicted with a loathsome disease—peculiarly representative of human guilt and vanity. Such a mode of soliciting help might have been in accordance with the character and working of heathen religions, which cared only for outward homage and disregarded the state of the heart. But the God of Israel must be approached in a very different fashion. He who searcheth the hearts and trieth the reins of the children of men requires humility, contrition, and self-sacrifice. The leper must be brought to the knowledge and confession of his own uncleanness. While in Israel he must be brought under the Levitical laws and restrictions of leprosy. A sense of the true value of the boon he seeks must be awakened in his heart. And most wisely were the means to effect these purposes adopted. They were admirably adapted to correct the mistaken ideas which Naaman entertained regarding the God of Israel and His prophet Elisha, and to impress upon his mind the salutary truth that there was an essential difference between them and the gods and magicians of his own country. Elisha would not admit him into his house—would not even come forth to speak to him. Sitting calmly in his chamber as on a throne raised high above all earthly dignities and powers, he sent out his servant with the simple command that Naaman was to go and wash himself seven times in the waters of the Jordan, assuring him that in this way only would his disease be eradicated.

This was not an arbitrary command—an act of caprice on the part of the prophet, for which anything else would have done as well. The tests of the spiritual realm are as precise and severely rigid as those of the chemical world. There are no chance processes or results. Elisha's injunction had a special appropriateness and a deep religious significance. In the first place, the command to wash in the Jordan implied that as a man in order to bathe, strips himself of his clothes and all the adventitious distinctions of life, and reduces himself to the condition of primitive simplicity, so the proud Syrian was to divest himself of all his pride and dignity, and the distinctions and circumstances upon which he set his heart—to come down from his chariot, to leave behind him his attendants and treasures, to strip himself naked of all that served to separate him from his fellows, and to humble himself before God as having nothing to boast of, no confidence in the flesh. His disease had shown no deference to his lofty position; it reduced him to the level of the lowest; it showed him that he had really nothing but his human nature. His cure, therefore, must impress this humbling truth still more deeply upon his mind. Not as the proud Syrian general with all the pomp and circumstance of his high position, seated in his chariot, and laden with costly presents, is he to be cured; but as the poor leper stripped of everything, reduced to a naked condition, having nothing but his disease. Then, in the next place, according to the Levitical law, washing with water was an essential element in the purification of a leper. Two birds were chosen; one was killed above a vessel of water taken pure and fresh from the stream, and its blood was allowed to drop into the vessel; the other was washed in this blood-stained water and set free; while the leper himself was sprinkled with the water seven times. Elisha adopted as much of this ritual as was suitable to the case of a heathen like Naaman, preserving the essential feature that he was to be washed in water, clean and fresh from the stream, seven times, to indicate the thoroughness and perfection of the cleansing process.

Elisha's treatment of the haughty Syrian was like the first effect of purifying a stagnant pool, stirring up all the pollution that had lain quietly at the bottom, and bringing it to the surface. Incensed at the apparent neglect and incivility of the prophet of Israel, and bitterly resenting what he considered a slight cast upon the natural glories of his country, he turned away in a fury. "Are not Abana and Pharpar, rivers of Damascus," he said, "better than all the waters of Israel? May I not wash in them and be clean?" What were the paltry streams of Palestine, that were full only in the rainy season, and whose channels in the hot summer became dry and white as roads; what was the Jordan itself, a low-lying ditch of a river with turbid waters, that for half the year did not fill its inmost bed—compared with the clear, swift-flowing rivers that swept down from the snowy Lebanon, full from bank to bank all the year round, watered all the rich plains of Damascus, supplied the wants of a dense population, and made the surrounding country the loveliest and most fertile region in all the East? Besides, the idea of washing in any river for such a purpose is perfectly preposterous. What can water do to cleanse my leprosy? Have I not washed myself a thousand times, and my disease has remained? It is too deep-seated to be removed by such superficial means. The prophet of Israel only mocks my infirmity. Such were the mingled feelings of Naaman when he heard the message of Elisha; and were it not for his servants, who well knew how to deal with the irascible but not ungenerous temper of their master, he would have gone away in an implacable mood, resolved perhaps to wipe out the insult in blood. The servants represented to him that the simplicity of the prescription, so far from being an objection, was a strong recommendation in its favour. "If the prophet had bid thee do some great thing," they said, "wouldest thou not have done it? How much rather then when he saith to thee, Wash, and be clean!" Here again we have a beautiful illustration of intercessory faith, and of the help which one human being receives from another in matters the most vital to him. The Hebrew maid, by her faith and devotion, guided her master to the feet of the prophet; the servants of Naaman, by their faith and devotion, carried him farther as it were to the place of cure. Without the Hebrew slave he would never have heard of the means of cure; without his heathen servants he would never have adopted these means. It is not wonderful that seeing such strong faith and pure devotion on the part of these servants, the Great Healer Himself should virtually have said to Naaman as He said to the man sick of the palsy, "Thy sins are forgiven thee, go in peace."

Calmed down by the sensible advice of his servants, the Syrian soldier was induced to put the prescription of the prophet to the test. He went down to the Jordan alone, stripped himself of everything, and as a naked unclean leper dipped himself seven times in its waters; and, wonderful to relate, he found that the words of the prophet came true. The loathsome virus of leprosy was cured; the dry white scaly skin peeled off, and his flesh came again as the flesh of a little child. The Jordan was indeed to him a fountain of youth. The miracle wrought upon him was a miracle of rejuvenescence. You have seen an aged and warped tree, with dry, rough, weather-beaten trunk, and stunted boughs, producing in spring, from a bud in its side, a tender young sapling, perfect in form and colouring, reproducing once more the beautiful ideal which the parent-tree had long outgrown. So was it with Naaman when he washed in the sacred river. A new spring came into his sear and yellow leaf. The scarred and disfigured flesh became metamorphosed into the soft, brightly-tinted, and roundly-moulded flesh of an infant. And what is every miracle of healing but the coming of the spring-time of the power from on high upon all the blighted and withered work of the curse; but a renewal of youth? Sin had made the body old and worn out; the Divine miracle brings it back to the Edenic state, when it issued fresh and fair from the Creator's hand. Every miracle of healing is a specimen and a prophecy of that new genesis, under which the old sicknesses and diseases shall pass away, and all things shall be made new.

The outward restoration of the body to health and soundness was the symbol of the inward restoration of a benighted soul to the knowledge of the living and true God. "Behold now," said Naaman, "I know that there is no God in all the earth but in Israel." A change as great passed over his religious sentiments as over his corporeal frame. That dipping seven times in the Jordan was a spiritual baptism, in which his old leprous life of sin was washed away from him and carried down by the river into the Dead Sea, and he emerged into a fresh, fair, youthful life of grace. He crossed, in that baptism in the Jordan, the boundary which separated him as an alien from the commonwealth of Israel and a stranger to the covenant of promise, and he became identified with the peculiar people in all their privileges and blessings. He yielded a testimony to the truth, such as neither the king of Israel nor any of his courtiers had ever paid. That expression, "his flesh came again as a little child," connects itself in our minds with the fact that it was the children of those who left Egypt who crossed the Jordan and so entered the promised land—a fact which seems to have suggested to our Lord the beautiful and significant precept, "Except ye be converted and become as little children, ye cannot enter the kingdom of heaven." As a little child of faith, ignorant and simple-minded, but trustful and susceptible, Naaman entered the kingdom of heaven. But not only as children did the Israelites enter the promised land; they also entered it at the lowest point; for the valley of the Jordan is much lower than any other part of Palestine, and is the deepest depression on the face of the globe, being thirteen hundred feet below the level of the Mediterranean. And this fact, too, found a spiritual interpretation in the cure of the Syrian leper. Through that wonderful baptism in the Jordan, he crossed the boundary between the sad life he formerly led and the new life of faith and joy at the lowest point, stripped of everything—in the poorest condition to which a human being can be reduced.

I will not dwell upon the gratitude and devotion of Naaman—upon Elisha's refusal of the splendid offers of remuneration which were made to him, on the plea which the Apostle of the Gentiles afterwards urged upon his converts, "I seek not yours but you,"—a noble disinterestedness which completed the conquest of the Syrian's faith which the miracle had begun, and convinced him that a religion whose ministers could not only heal the leprosy of others, but conquer the covetousness of their own souls, and tread under foot the world and all its vanities, must indeed be the true one. I will not turn the other side of this beautiful story, and show the complete contrast throughout which the conduct and fate of Gehazi exhibit. The miracle of mercy has an opposite pole in a miracle of judgment. The leprosy removed from a Gentile because of his faith, cleaves to an Israelite because of his heartlessness and sacrilege. This side of the story is as full of significance and instruction as the other. But I must pass from it to notice in conclusion the spiritual application of the cure of the Syrian leper.

The case of Naaman is regarded as typical of the case of the spiritual leper coming to Jesus for the healing of his soul. He hears of the great prophet, the Saviour of Israel, of whom Elisha was but a forerunner. The gospel is preached to him by some servant of the Lord. He is made anxious about his state. But he comes to Jesus as Naaman came to the prophet in all the pride of his worldly position and spiritual sufficiency, loaded with his own good works, to make a present of his good thoughts and feelings and intentions to Jesus, and to be accepted on account of them. He comes as Nicodemus came to Jesus, having whereof to glory in the flesh, being according to human estimation a righteous man. He recognises Christ only as a Divine teacher, and seeks from Him instruction, and not salvation, conscious that he has something yet to learn, but ignorant that he is totally corrupt. He looks upon Christ as one who is only to add something to the law of Moses, instead of owning Him as the living source of grace and truth. He says, like Naaman, "Behold, I thought he will surely come out to me and stand and call upon the name of the Lord his God, and strike his hand over the place, and recover the leper." But the processes of grace are not supplementary, but radical. Christ says to him as to Nicodemus, "Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God." What you need is not an addition to your virtue—some good thing that you must do to complete what you lack yet—but a new birth, a new life altogether. You must go back to the very beginning. You must be born again of water and of the Spirit; and in entering into life the second time all that pertained to your previous existence in the flesh must be entirely and eternally washed away, and a new spiritual, holy life communicated. Your leprosy must be removed and your flesh must come again like the flesh of a little child. You must wash in the fountain opened for sin and uncleanness. You must strip yourself of all your self-righteousness, and simply as a sinner cast yourself upon the mercy of God in Christ. You have nothing to plead but your sinfulness and necessity. I have often thought that it would be no inconsiderable success of their preaching, if ministers could only bring men to believe that they do not believe; for thus stripped of all their gaudy garments of self-deception, they might, in the very shame and coldness of their nakedness, be induced to seek the covering of Christ's righteousness.

To all who are in this state I would seek to act the part of the servants of Naaman. I would say to you, If Jesus had bid you do some great thing, would you not have done it? How much rather, when He says to you, "Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved!" In the unhumiliated pride of your natural heart, you feel insulted by the very simplicity of the terms. The remedy proposed seems to you utterly inadequate. Christ crucified is to you foolishness. "Are not Abana and Pharpar, rivers of Damascus, better than all the waters of Israel? May I not wash in them?" "If I do my best," you say, "shall I not be saved? Why should I despise all my own goodness, and trust only in the merits and righteousness of another to be saved? What efficacy can there be in the blood of One who died eighteen hundred years ago to atone for my guilt and make my peace with God, so that a simple faith in Him avails to secure an interest in His salvation to every humble penitent believer? I cannot receive it!" So you reason; but, notwithstanding, there is only this one way of cure. You have gone to physician after physician; you have tried one remedy after another, and have been nothing bettered, but rather have become worse. Cast now all reasoning aside, and put the simple means of cure to the test. Make the easy experiment at once. See whether the Saviour will do in your case what He has done so often and in such myriads of cases already. "Do not talk to me," said Coleridge, with an emphasis which will sink the deeper the more it is considered, "Do not talk to me of the Evidences of Christianity;—TRY IT." Try this absurd, this obsolete faith, as some would presume to call it; and you will find to your astonishment that in doing the will of God, you will know the doctrine that it is of God. The effect will disappoint all your fears and exceed all your hopes. You will be cured and saved; and by being made thus childlike in soul by a simple faith, all other and after things of the kingdom of heaven will be possible to you.

HIDDEN IN LIGHT.

WHEN first the sun dispels the cloudy night,
 The glad hills catch the radiance from afar,
 And smile for joy. We say, "How fair they are,
 Tree, rock, and heather-bloom so clear and bright!"
 But when the sun draws near in westerling might,
 Enfolding all in one transcendent blaze
 Of sunset glow, we trace them hot, but gaze
 And wonder at the glorious, holy light.
 Come nearer, Sun of Righteousness! that we,
 Whose swift short hours of day so swiftly run,
 So overflowed with love and light may be,
 Lost in the glory of the nearing Sun,
 That not our light but Thine, may brightly shine,
 New praise to Thee through our poor lives be won!

FRANCES RIDLEY HAVERGAL.

OUR DISTRICT.

By A RIVER-SIDE VISITOR.

VI.—OLD FEND-OFF.

AS a mere go-to-meeting, is regarded as "a character" in Our District, it is easy to understand that a call-to-meeting would be looked upon as something approaching the eccentric. It was in the latter light that the neighbours of "Old Fend-Off" viewed him—though it is due to them to state that they spoke of what they conceived to be his eccentricity as of an amiable, even a noble, kind, and while they sometimes laughed at, they always respected him. Not to know Old Fend-Off would, in our district, be to argue yourself unknown, and yet it so fell out that I had been a considerable time in the district, and made the acquaintance of many of its more commonplace inhabitants, before I even heard of Old Fend-Off; but at length I did come to hear of him, make his acquaintance, and learn his history.

The Industrial Home for Destitute Boys, in which a haven had been found for Captain Rust,* was mainly supported by local subscriptions; and numbers of the contributors not only gave their money, but also visited it, and by advice and otherwise aided the managers in their work. One of the most valuable of these friends was a master rigger, in a considerable way of business, and one evening when we were going through the Home together, he asked:

"Can any of your boys do rope work? Mats, and nets, and that kind of thing?"

On inquiry I found that they could not, and answered accordingly.

"Ah, that's a pity," said our friend; "it just occurred to me that if they could do such work I could put a goodish bit in your way."

"In that case we might have them taught," I observed, in a questioning tone.

"Well, I almost think it would be worth your while," was the answer. "Who would you get to teach them?"

"Well, I don't exactly know," I replied; "couldn't you recommend us a person?"

My friend, shrugging his shoulders, replied that he could not; that his own men were union men, and that the union would be horrified at one of its members being employed for such a purpose, that it would cry aloud the trade was being ruined, and "call out" his men. "In fact," he concluded with a laugh, "now I think of it, I would have to give you the work on the quiet, or by the 'kind permission' of the union. However, I would give it to you, and doubt not you'll be able to get some outsider to teach the boys."

"We will try anyway," I said; and on the following day I commenced to make inquiries, applying in the first instance to a friendly old waterman, Bill Scott, by name, who had lived in the district all his life, and had an extensive acquaintance among its inhabitants. Old Bill, as he was familiarly called, did perhaps, the best trade of any man plying at the stairs; but steam ferries, and other modern improvements, had seriously interfered with the waterman's calling since his young days, and now even he had a good deal more time on his hands than he would have wished. During his long waits for fares he was generally to be seen perched on top of a tall make-fast post, and here we found him enjoying a pipe of particularly strong tobacco.

Having explained matters, I asked—

"Can you tell me of any such man?"

"Well, I don't know as how I can, speaking right off," he answered; "but let me think a minute."

His thinking was accompanied by such hard puffing that he was soon enveloped in a cloud of smoke. Presently dispersing it with his hat, so that we could see each other's faces again, he observed :—

"Well, I know of a feller as could teach the rope work, and as would be glad enough to pick up a trifle that way; but you see, wuss luck for himself, he's been misfortunate in his day, in fact it was in prison he learnt the rope work. I think he's had his lesson, and won't want no more, but I know that there's them as thinks that a man as'll go wrong once will again if he gets a chance; and I suppose you must think of the look of the thing and the 'say so.'"

"Well, yes, both for the 'say so,' and for higher considerations," I answered, "the man, whoever he was, should be of good character. Can't you think of any other?"

"Let me think a minute," he repeated, proceeding to blow another and denser cloud, which, after brief silence, he energetically brushed away, exclaiming as he did so—

"I've got it! Old Fend-Off's your man. You couldn't have a better for the job if you had a man made to order."

He had spoken with evident assurance that I must know the man, and was quite taken aback when I asked—

"But who is Old Fend-Off?"

"Ain't you come across him, then?" he questioned, looking at me in surprise.

"No," I answered; "at least not by that name!"

"Well, I don't suppose you've heard of him by any other," said the old waterman. "Of course he has a proper name like other people, but there ain't one in a hundred as could tell you as it was Joe Barber. Everybody calls him Old Fend-Off."

"What is he?" was my next question.

"Ah, that's a bit of a puzzle!" answered the old waterman reflectively; "he's a lot of things. He's Jack of a good many trades, but he is master of one. His fends-off are more run upon than any other small maker's, and making them is his leading job—that's why he's called by that name.* But, beside that, he's a regular handy man; he can repair a clock or a sewing machine, frame a pictur', make a table, paper a house, do a bit o' tailoring or shoe-making, and I don't know what beside. And then he's a Methody, and a preacher. None of your high-flying sort as talks over your head, mind you, nor yet one of those as is always making out to be miserable themselves, and wanting every one else to be the same. He smokes his pipe, and he'll laugh at a joke, and he won't turn his eyes up as if he was going to faint, even if he's chaff'd a bit—for one thing, he can generally turn the tables upon any one as does chaff him. He is a ranter, but he ain't a canter—he practises as he preaches, which is more than can be said of a good many. He's as kind-hearted an old chap as ever walked; why, his house is a regular menagerie, as you may say."

* A fend-off is the technical term for the rope-encased oakum-stuffed buffers which are put over the sides of steamers and other craft when there is danger of their being brought too sharply against a pier or another boat.

My friend had spoken with sincere enthusiasm, and I had listened with unfeigned interest until the conclusion of the speech, which certainly struck me as being in the nature of an anti-climax. To have a house like a menagerie was not after all, I thought, the highest proof of kind-heartedness that might have been adduced, and I was conscious of a coldness in my tone as I observed—

"Is he very fond of animals, then?"

"Animals!" exclaimed Bill Scott, pausing in the act of carrying his pipe to his mouth, and looking confused. "Ah—drat it, that's wot comes of being wi'out book-larning. Of course a menagerie is for animals, now I think of it. I should have said the other thing; you know, a place for people as hasn't a place of their own, and as are too broke down to be able to make a home for themselves."

"A refuge," we suggested.

"That's it!" he exclaimed; "his house is a regular refuge for the destitute. He's got neither chick nor child of his own, but he's always got a lot of misfortunate beings about him as no one else would harbour. The chap as helps him to stuff the fends-off has been crazy these nine years, and is a lot of trouble to manage. 'Poor Dick,' says he, 'I knew him before his calamity—he was druv off his head by a sudden fright'—as if plenty of those who would make game of his foolish ways, if they weren't afraid of Old Fend-Off, hadn't known him before too. Then there's a younger fellow as helps him, as he's kep' and edicated ever since he was a boy, just because he was by when his mother was drowned; and as to the old woman as he lets call herself his housekeeper, he's a great deal more a nurse to her than she is a housekeeper to him, and it must cost him a little fortin, a paying doctors' bills for her, for she's mor'n half blind and a'most always laid up with the rheumatics."

I felt decidedly interested at hearing this, but knowing that with Bill Scott "old age was garrulous," I made no attempt to draw him out, merely observing—

"Well, from what you say of him, I should think he's just the sort of man we want; where does he live?"

Bill gave the required information, and within the hour I was at Old Fend-Off's place. It was a good-sized, old-fashioned house, abutting on the river-bank, one of a row mostly let out in rooms, to watermen, lightermen, coalheavers, and dock-labourers.

We had knocked for the second time, and were still waiting for some one to answer the door, when a boy who, to judge from his rolled-up trousers and a little basket of coal slung at his back, was just returning from along-shore range, asked—

FIGURE 425.

"Does yer want Old Fend-Off?"

I replied that I did.

"You'll have to go through, then," said the boy; "he works in a shed at the back."

"Ah, but how am I to go through?"

"Easy; look here!" and as he spoke he advanced, and taking hold of a string that I had not noticed hanging through the door below the handle, pulled up a latch, and let the door swing back.

I could see straight through the passage into the yard, and waiving ceremony, went forward.

On reaching the end of the passage, I could see right into the work-shed, the occupants of which were too busy to notice me. They were five in number, three men and two boys, and I had no hesitation in singling out Old Fend-Off himself. He was a broad-shouldered, deep-chested, ruddy-faced old fellow, with long, iron-grey hair and beard; and, though he was seated, it was easy to see that he was long as well as large or limb—at least a six-foot man. He was plaiting the outer casing of rope round the body of a fend-off, and as he worked was singing in a good bass voice,— “O God, our help in ages past,

Our hope in years to come,
Our shelter from the stormy blast,
And our eternal home.”

At the side of him nearest to us, another man, whom I set down as being the one Bill Scott had spoken of as crazed, was busy ramming down the stuffing into fend-off cases. He was a stout-built man, somewhere between forty and fifty, and had nothing specially striking in his appearance. The third man was sowing up the canvas cases that were already stuffed. He seemed to be about five-and-twenty. The two boys were seated in the corner of the shed “teasing” the oakum for stuffing, or rather they were supposed to be “teasing,” for they were playing at “odds or evens,” a game which consists in the one player trying to guess whether the number of marbles held in the other one’s hand is odd or even. Old Fend-Off happening to lift his head, however, they made a sudden dash at their work, but not before the old man had seen how things were.

“Ah boys!” he exclaimed, “that’s bad. Don’t learn to be eye-servants; an eye-servant is always a bad servant, and will never get on in this world, to say nothing of the next. There’s always One Eye that sees you, remember. Open skulking is bad enough, but eye-service is worse. It ain’t for sake of the bit of work you’re shirking now I’m jawing you; it’s for your own sake: I want to make honest men of you. Don’t you see what mean skunks they must be as’ll only work when their gaffer’s eye is on ’em? There now! there’s no occasion to be breaking your neck over it; work away steadily and be good boys, that’s all that’s wanted.”

Just as he finished speaking I stepped from the shadow of the passage, and the elder of the adult helpers being first to catch sight of me, he plucked the old man by the sleeve, and in a startled tone exclaimed—

“Cap’en, look there!”

Laying down his work, he came forward to meet me with a smile upon his face.

I found that he knew who I was, and I had, therefore, only to explain the object of my visit. Having done so, I asked—

“Would you be willing to undertake it?”

“Well, as far as I see, I think I would,” he answered; “but there’s a many things go to everything; would you mind just stepping inside and talking it over a bit, before I say the word.”

I replied that I would be very happy to do so; whereupon the old man led the way into a cosy little parlour, in the furnishing and ornamentation of which his genius as a “handy” man was conspicuously displayed. The apartment was fitted up neatly, compactly, and with as much ingenious economization of space as a state cabin, of which, indeed, it strongly reminded me.

“Of course,” I observed, by way of commencing the conversation when we were seated—“of course we couldn’t give much pay.”

“Would it be a case of reg’lar hours and must come?” Fend-Off questioned.

“No,” I answered; “we thought the boys might be taught at odd times, as might best suit the convenience of the teacher.”

“Then I’m with you!” he said.

“At such pay as we can give?” I put in.

“Without pay at all, brother,” he answered gravely; “as I can do it in my own time, I see it as Lord’s work. Don’t I know the poor little chaps? Don’t I know that they are as lambs that are being brought within the fold? And shall I sell ’em my bit of spare labour, and yet look upon myself as a worker in the vineyard, however humble? God bless ’em, and prosper the work with ’em, I would think I was robbing ’em if I did.”

“Well,” I said, “we thought it right to make the proposal on a business footing, in the first instance, at any rate.”

“That’s right enough,” he answered; “many would take it as business, and no blame to ’em; it’s accordin’ as the light is given. I preach sometimes, as you may have heard, and I may say for myself that I am a prayerful man in season; but I’m not one of those that look upon preaching and praying as the only Lord’s work. We can serve Him with our hands as well as on our knees.”

To this I assented; and having accepted and sincerely thanked him for his offer of gratuitous service, I observed—

“You belong to the Methodist body, don’t you?”

“To the Primitives,” he answered; “they brought me in, and my call is to them in many ways. At the same time I'm no wrangler over creeds; Christians may be many flocks, but they're one fold, and one Shepherd's care. Don't let us say that ours is the best sect or anybody else's the worst; let us suppose that each one feels called to his own, and remember that in our Father's house are many mansions."

I said that that was the proper spirit in which to regard the matter; Christians should be united, seeing the enormous amount of work in common that lies waiting to be done.

"Right you are, sir!" he exclaimed. "Pull together is as good an all round motto for Christians as ever it was for a boat's crew. But speaking of work reminds me of your youngsters—when shall I start with them?"

"Whenever it suits you," was my reply.

"Well, let me see; this is Wednesday," he observed, reflecting for a moment; "shall we say next Monday evening at seven?"

I nodded assent, and then he asked—

"How do you think of doing?"

"Well," I said, "the boys who have been longest in the Home are already broken in to certain kinds of work; and our idea was that some five or six boys who had just been admitted should be taught the rope work."

To this Old Fend-Off was quite agreeable, and accordingly entered upon his labour of love—for a labour of love it was to him—on the following Monday evening. A little outhouse, which from that time was dignified by the name of "The Ropery," was set apart for him, and here he assembled the boys, two of whom he immediately recognised. Placing them in line, he opened proceedings by a characteristic address.

"Now look here, boys," he commenced, "you're in luck. You know how you were living before you came here, lurking about long shore living how you could, and where you could, and making a precious hard live of it."

"It worn't our faults, Fend," interrupted one of the boys to whom he had spoken.

"I ain't sayen as how it was," replied the old man, deftly coming down to the boy's style of language; "not," he added, with a slight smile, "but what it might a been, just a little bit, you know. However, take things altogether, I know it was a lot more your misfortunes than your faults; but, all the same, it was you as had to smart, worn't it? Wasn't it you as had to go hungry-bellied, and ragged-backed, and had to sleep in all sorts of holes and corners, and put up with all sorts of knockin' about—wasn't it, eh?"

"I should just think it was," answered the boy; "rather."

"Well, that's just what I was going to say," resumed Old Fend-Off; "you know what hard lines you had of it then, and you see how comfortable you are here. Boys," he added, his manner suddenly becoming solemn, "God has been very good to you, and you should thank Him night and day for bringing you into the hands of your kind friends here. Only think," he went on, after a pause, "how many poor little fellows still have to lead the hard life that you've been taken from. Speaking of that, what has become of Humpy Crockett that used to pal with you?"

He put the question to the boy who had already spoken, and the latter answered—

"Oh, he's been dead nigh this whole year. I were away at the hoppin' at the time. Some people found him in an empty house drefel bad, and took him to the wukhouse, but it warn't no use; he turned his toes up the same night."

"Ah, poor little chap, see there!" exclaimed the old man, "he had no such shelter as this. However," he went on, changing his tone, "that ain't exactly the thing I've come to talk to you about. Your friends here mean to make men of you, if you'll only let 'em. They're a going to put a good trade into your fingers; you've been told-off to be taught the rope work, and I'm the man as has come to put you through your facings, and you may depend that I shall do my best to teach you, if you will only do your best to learn—will you, now?"

"Yes," they answered in chorus.

"That's all right, then," he said, and without further delay he set the boys to work. He was very successful in teaching them his art; nor was that all that he taught them. We had prayers before the boys went to bed, and after having stayed to these several times, he remarked with a serious air—

"You don't teach 'em singing, I see."

"Well, no," I answered; "none of those directly connected with the Home could teach it; and moreover," I added, "we were afraid both subscribers and the public might think it was going a little too far to add music to the things taught at such an establishment."

"Oh, I don't mean teaching 'em accomplishments as they call 'em," he exclaimed; "not piano playing or Sol-Fa-in', or demi-semi-quavering, or anything of that kind. I only mean plain singing by ear, as the saying is; lifting up their voices tunefully in a few simple hymns. To my thinkin' music is a chosen means of grace. I fully believe that souls can be reached through the ear—and have been. I know some of these boys were quick enough at picking up street songs, and would soon learn songs and hymns of praise, and come to have delight in them. I would teach them if there was no objection."

On consultation I found that others, like myself, were pleased with the idea, and accordingly Old Fend-Off, like the ancient mariner, "had his way." In the course of a few months he had trained the boys into a really tolerable choir, and as he had predicted would be the case, they came to take great delight in their singing. Before long, one of their proudest privileges was to be allowed to sing their hymns before visitors; while in working hours there was generally to be heard in some part of the building the humming of the burden of "A Day's March nearer Home," "Jerusalem the Golden," "I'm a Pilgrim," or some other of the hymns their old friend had taught them. That he was their true and loving friend the boys speedily came to recognise. He told them stories, he built a model ship for them to rig, he made them a set of cricketing implements, and fitted up a large swing for them. He was as kind with them as any man could be, but withal firm when occasion required; and while in a becoming way he made himself a companion, he never forgot that he was also a mentor to them. Altogether, both by moral influence and material service, he proved himself a benefactor to the Home and its inmates.

During these months I saw a good deal of him, and his out-door preaching being a frequent subject of incidental mention, I came to have a rather strong curiosity to see him in his character of parson. At length I determined to gratify this feeling, and one Sunday evening set out for the spot at which his open-air gatherings were held. It was a piece of waste land just outside a large foundry, and a mound of slag from the works served him for platform. When I arrived, he and a few members of "the connection" had already taken their stand upon the mound, and were faced by perhaps as strange a looking congregation as was ever gathered together. A number of fish-hawkers' and costermongers' "shallows" were drawn up in lines, and occupied as seats by their respective proprietors and their friends, who had evidently come prepared to listen at their ease, as many of the men were in their shirt-sleeves, and most of them were smoking, while one or two parties had bottles of drink with them. Behind the "shallows" the standing portion of the congregation was ranged in close order; and behind them again were the stalls of sundry vendors of penny ices, ginger-beer, and fruit, who were on the spot with a view to "pushing trade." Rough labourers, and still rougher loafers, made up the bulk of the assembly, and had probably never before been inside a place of worship. Unpromising congregation as they looked, there was still something promising in the mere fact of their being gathered together as a congregation. I gathered that, generally speaking, they were there simply with a view to fill up a "nothing-doing hour;" and that the strong point of Old Fend-Off's preaching was—in their estimation—its anecdotal character. The general sentiment upon this point was pretty well summed up in the remarks which I heard a middle-aged lighterman making to a companion, who, like myself, appeared to be a stranger to these gatherings.

"I come pretty nigh every Sunday," he said, "and in fact I should miss it now; I've got to think of it as a kind of treat. Old Fend-Off gives it you plain, and he always brings in a story or two pat, and that's the draw to most of us. He knows his way about; he knows fast enough that a bit of a yarn will hold us together, and he makes 'em hit his nails on the head, and drive 'em home."

At this point the lighterman's talk was brought to a close by the commencement of the service. One of the group on the mound gave out the hymn with the burthen—

"I do believe, I do believe,
That Jesus died for me;
That on the cross He shed his blood
That I might happy be;"

and it was pleasing to find that a considerable number so joined in the singing as to show they were familiar with the hymn.

Another member of the connection offered up a prayer; and then Old Fend-Off gave out as his text, the words from the fourteenth chapter of Proverbs:—"Fools make a mock at sin." Sinners generally thought themselves very clever people, he said; but as a matter of fact those who made a mock of sin, who, because sin seemed for the time to prosper with them, spoke lightly of it, were really fools, as a little thoughtful consideration of the matter would show. "Be sure your sins will find you out," he went on, was a proverb with a great deal more truth in it than the sinners who hugged themselves in their supposed cleverness seemed to imagine. Of course all sin would be found out at last, and have to be answered for, but independent of that—though that ought to be sufficient for all who were not fools—most sin was found out and in some way punished even in this world. He had no doubt that every one within reach of his voice had had experience of that. "At any rate, I have. I remember, for instance—"

As the last words left his lips, there arose a buzz of expectation; then came a swaying movement towards the mound, followed by a silence of eager attention.

"I remember, when I was in the marines," he resumed, "the regiment I belonged to was sent to Jamaica. Well, there was a great many drunkards among us—and I'm sorry to say that I was one of them—and as soon as we were settled on the island, we began drinking and rioting about. A Christian missionary on the island, who was a great advocate for teetotalism, hearing of our goings on, and thinking, I suppose, that we stood quite as much in need of a missionary as did the blacks, came to the barracks, and in a kindly way pressed us to sign the pledge, saying that he had just received a box of cards and medals from England with a view to establishing a temperance society; and that he would like to have us as the first members of it. We thought we would show our cleverness by 'taking a rise out of him,' and agreed among ourselves that we would all pretend to be teetotalers, and so clean him out of the cards and medals—and we did. The next day, behold, he met some of us on the drink again, and of course reproached us, but we only laughed at him; only made a mock at sin. However, those laugh best who laugh last; and, sharp as we thought ourselves, and simple as we thought the missionary, the last laugh in the business was at our expense. A few days later, one of the gang happened to show his medal to a nigger, and the darkie innocently enough turns up the whites of his eyes, and cries out, 'O golly, what fine big new dollar!' This was a fine hint for us. Like the blackguards we were, we took to persuading the poor ignorant blacks that they ~~were~~ fine new dollars, and worth more than a dollar at Kingstown. By means of this yarn we sold them the medals at a dollar a piece, and spent the money in drink. After a while, the niggers began to find out how they had been swindled, and some of them came to the particular men that had cheated them, only to get laughed at or be ill-used. But one morning a crowd of the blacks came to the barracks crying out about it, and one of the officers hearing them, had them in to explain; and of course they told him how bad 'buckkra' man soldier had sold them fine big dollar, no good, no changee at Kingstown, no buy nothing. Well, the officer was a just man. He asked how many had been swindled in that way, and found that there were forty. Next he paraded the regiment, and asked the blacks each to point out the man who had sold them a medal, which they did. Being children of the father of lies, we denied hard and fast that we were the men.

"Very well, our officer said we would see, and he sent for the missionary, who, when he came, picked us out as the blacks had done, and showed the list of our names. This was enough for the officer. 'I'll soon settle this,' he said. 'All you whose names are down here produce your medals, if you can. Every one who can't must pay a dollar to one of these negroes here.' And to this he stuck; and the money was stopped out of our pay. The niggers and every one else had the laugh of us, and our officer, a man whose good opinion we all liked to have, was brought to think meanly of us; in short, our sins found us out."

I have told this one of Old Fend-Off's anecdotes, as illustrating not merely his style of preaching, but a style of preaching that "goes down," with such a class as he was addressing, better perhaps than any other style. He recounted the story dramatically, and was listened to with the greatest attention; and though there was at parts of it some slight laughter, he, to use the point of the lighterman's simile, drove home his nail in all seriousness, arguing from his story that the wisest as well as the happiest man was the sincere and humble Christian.

While listening to Old Fend-Off I had kept well in the background and escaped his observation; but being with him later in the week, I mentioned to him that I had been there, and, after a little preliminary conversation, asked in a friendly way—

"Do you think now that your preaching really has any good effect upon such characters as were listening to you?"

"God moves in a mysterious way His wonders to perform,"

he quoted, by way of answer.

"Yes," I said; "what seemed strange means of grace were often successful: but do you, as a matter of fact, know that any of the rough characters of the neighbourhood who listened to your preaching, have thereby been brought to live a better—a religious—life?"

"Thank the Lord, who made me his humble instrument," he exclaimed, reverentially, "I do. Without taxing my memory, I can think of at least half a dozen souls who have been made happy in the Saviour's love, through hearing the word as it was given to me to speak it. I speak in all humbleness, sir, but I know how to 'fetch' these rough people—as they would put it themselves—better than a better man. The Lord, sir, sends the special means of salvation; He did with me, and I was a worse, a more hardened, and seemingly more hopeless case than any of those you saw listening to me. When I think of myself as I am, and as I was, I cannot but look upon myself as a miracle of God's goodness."

"And what were the special means by which you were brought to your better life?" we asked, becoming interested.

"Well, it wasn't preaching in my own case," he answered, "it was practice; it was a noble act done in a Christian spirit. It's a longish yarn, but I think it's worth hearing; and I'll tell you, if you don't mind."

I said that I should be very pleased to hear his story; and without further preliminary Old Fend-Off began to tell it.

"I'm not London bred," he commenced. "I was born and brought up in the Black Country, and when a young fellow worked there as a miner. They're a rough lot there even now, and they were rougher in my young days, and I was one of the roughest of the rough. I was given up to gambling, and to dog-fighting, man-fighting, and poaching; while drinking and swearing were my daily habits—notably swearing. So much was the latter the case, that to distinguish me from another miner named Joe, who was a Methodist and a local preacher, our mates called me Swearing and him Christian Joe; and he was a Christian, and a brave one. He wasn't content with not sinning himself, he reproved sin when he heard or saw it, and that was no light thing to do among such a set as us miners. Many a time when he had checked me in my vile swearing I've turned to knock him down; but he always used to meet me with a look that somehow or other made me feel ashamed of myself."

"And his example and influence at length made a second Christian Joe of you?" I put in, as the old man paused for a moment.

"You'll hear," he resumed. "After a while I got mixed up in a poaching affair in which a keeper was wounded. To escape being arrested I made my way up to London, and in a drunken fit I enlisted into a regiment of marines. I was soon afterwards sent abroad, and was out of England for three years. When I did come back I was tired soldiering, and the poaching business having blown over, I wrote to some of my old com-
