panions; and as they were generous after their fashion, and earning big wages, they raised a subscription and bought me off, and I went down to my native place again. Trade was rather slack at the time, and I could not get a job directly, but I could get plenty of drink; there were scores ready to treat me. Well, in the dinner hour of the fourth day after my return, I was coming out of a public-house blustering and swearing, when who should I meet but Christian Joe. Hearing how I was going on, he spoke to me in his old style about my swearing; and this time, the drink and the devil being strong in me, I did hit him. The blow staggered him, but the instant he recovered himself he looked me straight in the eyes, and said, in a quiet, sorrowful sort of way, 'Brother, I'm afraid you've come back a worse man than you went. I did not think you would have struck me; you know I would not strike again, and you know, too, that I speak to you for your own good. However, I freely forgive you, and I shall not cease to raise my voice against your besetting sin, or to hope that I may live to see the day when you will have put that sin away from you, and be ready to raise your voice in reproof when you hear the name of God taken in vain.'"

"You said rightly that he was a brave Christian," I put in, as Old Fend-Off once more came to a brief pause.

"He was," Fend-Off assented, "but those standing round didn't see it in that light. If he had struck me back they would have sided with him, but they thought that, Christian or not Christian, he ought to have hit again, and they set down his not doing it to cowardice. As to myself, I felt ashamed of the blow the moment I had struck it, but I wasn't man enough to say so; I only went back to the public-house and tried to drink down the feeling of shame. This was what I was doing when there came into the house a reckless sort of fellow, who was in a small way of business as a shaft sinker. Whether he had come specially after me, or seeing me there had put the idea into his head, I never knew; but he struck up a conversation with me, and got telling me that he had a job he just wanted to finish; that the men he had had working for him had turned out milk-sops, and gone away, saying that they were afraid the shaft was going to give way, though it was as safe as any shaft could be. If he had only one good man to help him he could finish it in two or three days, and could afford to give a sovereign a day for that time—did I care about the job?"

“Yes, I would take it,’ I said; and we shook hands on the bargain, and went straight away to the shaft—and down it. When I’d been at work an hour I began to get sober, and then, looking up, I could see why the other men had left the job. A good many yards towards the bottom was loose, nasty-looking stuff, and all the way up the bratticing was bulging out in a style that meant danger. I pointed this out to the other, but he only pooh-pooh’d it. However, I insisted upon going up a long ladder that we had down with us, to drive in a cross-beam at a spot that looked particularly shaky; but I had scarcely climbed to the point, when with a sudden crash the earth below it fell in, burying him, and jamming me in, with just my head and shoulders free. From where the shaft had fallen in up to the top the earth was overhanging, and was liable to fall in at any moment, and every second I expected it would come crushing down upon me. In my agony I roared out, and I suppose made somebody hear me, for presently I saw some one peep over the edge of the shaft, and directly afterwards I could tell by the sounds that a crowd had assembled near. I was wedged in with some of the broken bratticing, and I knew what a risky job it would be to attempt to rescue me; as it was a hundred to one that the pulling and shaking necessary to release me would bring the overhanging earth down. I had just one shadow of a hope. I was the friend of all the dare-devils in the neighbourhood, and I thought that hearing it was one of their own set that was in such desperate strait, one or other of them would run the risk. Several men crept to the edge of the shaft and looked down, and the look seemed to be enough, for nothing came of it. I had given up my last faint hope, when I became aware from a sudden bustling and shouting that something was going to be attempted. In about a minute I could make out a skip being put over the side and a man stepping into it. My heart went out towards him whoever he might be; and though when I had tried to pray for myself I couldn’t, I did manage to think a prayer for him. Those who were letting down the skip knew what they were about, and lowered very slowly, so that it was some seconds before I could make out who it was that was risking his life for me; but at length, when he was within a few yards of me, I knew the face—and it was Christian Joe’s.

“Be of good cheer, brother,’ he said, shaking the rope for them to stop lowering when he had got on a level with me—‘Be of good cheer! if it’s the Lord’s will, all may be well yet.’

“He had got a saw with him, and as he spoke he commenced sawing for dear life at the piece of timber that I was wedged in by. As he worked, the loose earth came rattling down upon us, and I whispered to him, ‘I’m afraid we shall neither of us ever be got out alive.’ ‘Well, it is in the Lord’s hand, brother,’ he answered cheerily; ‘but lest we should not, let us each ask with our hearts that He will take us to himself.’

“Half a minute later he had cut me free and I stepped in. The signal was given for winding up; and though we got some bruises from falling earth, we were drawn clear a second before the general fall-in came.”

“Well, Joe certainly deserved his title of Christian,” I observed, when Fend-Off had concluded this thrilling portion of his story.

“He did,” said the old man, with an emphatic toss of the head, “and that wasn’t all he did for me. I had been badly crushed, and he took me to his home, and he and his sister kept me and nursed me through a month’s illness; and, what was more, they made a Christian of me. To make short the rest of my story, I fell in love with the sister, and she promised to be my wife at the end of two years if, during that period, I held firm to my resolve to live a Christian life. I did remain firm, thank the Lord, and we were married; but she was only spared to me for a year. Feeling unsettled when she was gone, I came up to London, and, joining a steamship as fireman, followed the sea for some years. Afterwards I was one of a light-ship’s company, and it was there I learned the rope-work. Then—my brother-in-law being dead—I settled on shore here, and started in my present way of business; and coming to feel the call, took to doing whatever of Lord’s work was brought to my hand. And remembering what I was before I was brought in,” he concluded, “I would consider myself ungrateful for all the mercy and goodness that has been shown to me, if I doubted that even the worst of the people I try to speak to were beyond the reach of salvation; or gave up the hope that in some stray instance my humble efforts might be the appointed means.”

Strong in his simple faith Old Fend-Off preached and taught on; and his example has a Christianizing influence upon many in the neighbourhood, who would otherwise stand little chance of being brought under any ordinary form of Christian influence.

NEW AND OLD.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "PATSY'S FIRST GLIMPSE OF HEAVEN."

NEW little feet
 Patter on the floor ;
 New little faces
 Peep through the door ;—
 New little souls
 Have entered into life ;
 New little voices
 Speak in love or strife ;—
 New little fingers
 Tightly clasp our own ;
 New little tendrils
 Round our hearts have grown.

Still the old voices
 Echo in one ear,
 And the old faces
 Hallowed are and dear ;
 Still the old friends
 Who have passed away,
 Live in our affection—
 Love has no decay ;

And the old words,
 Spoken long ago,
 Keep the heart tender,
 Make the tears flow.

Thus New and Old
 Mingle in one,
 Each has its blessing ;
 And when life is done,
 Old faces, old friends
 Will meet us again—
 Treasures long buried
 We shall regain—
 All that is lovely,
 All that is true,
 Will live on for ever,
 The Old and the New.

L.—NOTES AND COMMENTS.

QUIET WORK.

IT is strange how much of warlike noise and commotion there is about those movements in the religious world that come most under public observation. The warlike imagery of the Apocalypse has been wonderfully verified during these eighteen hundred years. It is worthy of remark, by the way, that the prevalence of such imagery in that book is a proof of its inspiration. A man like St. John, bred a fisherman, working quietly for his Master all his life at the outskirts of the Roman empire, and at whose death the followers of Christ were a poor persecuted sect, could never have thought that the Christian faith would for ages have a career appropriately symbolized, in certain of its aspects, by trumpets, thunders, bloodshed, earthquakes, and volcanoes. Yet so it has been, whenever light and darkness have come into collision, and so it is. And the thought is pressed upon our mind when, on glancing at the more prominent proceedings in the religious world at home, we see how predominant the element of conflict is everywhere. At one place the battle rages round the Athanasian creed; at another it is about the place of religion in education. At a third the strife is concerning men alleged to have made shipwreck of the faith; at a fourth the ultramontanist is pressing forward, and the Protestant is indignantly driving him back. We cannot make up our mind to open our monthly chat with our readers by dwelling on these things. We must take something more directly refreshing and improving. In the Apocalypse there are quiet as well as warlike scenes. There are still waters and green pastures as well as battle-fields soaked with blood. And so, amid all our religious din, there are, thank God, many quiet corners where men and women whose souls have been filled with Christ and his love are making the wilderness rejoice and blossom as the rose.

Here, for example, in Edinburgh, a Christian lady from England, forsaking the ease of a drawing-room life, has undertaken the charge of the nursing operations in the Infirmary, and others like-minded are aiding in the work. May God help them and all such in their noble toil! How much of this is due to the example of Miss Nightingale and Miss Jones it would be difficult to say. But theirs has been a fruitful example, both at home and in other countries. We have before us an American religious journal, containing, among other interesting matter, a communication from Nathan Allen, M.D., entitled, "Christ in the Workhouse." A few months ago, this gentleman was paying a visit to the great workhouse in the east of Liverpool. He does not seem to have heard of Agnes Jones. After passing through wards and corridors, marking with great pleasure the beautiful texts of Scripture that were everywhere to be seen for the instruction and consolation of the poor and needy, he became curious to learn through what means so unusually ample a testimony for Christ came to be borne in the institution. While attending worship in the chapel on the Sunday, the problem was solved. At the side of the pulpit, he saw a marble statue of a woman with a most angelic countenance, and on its base he read the inscription, "In Memory of Agnes Elizabeth Jones, daughter of Colonel Jones, of Fahan, Ireland, who, under the auspices of the Liverpool select vestry, first instituted the system of trained nursing among the sick poor of a workhouse. In this service she lost her life. Her only desire for herself was that at the resurrection, her Lord might say, 'She hath done what she could.' Born November 10th, 1822. Died February 19th, 1868." On the other side, Dr. Allen read the words of Miss Nightingale: "She came to her Lord, offering to Him for his poor and sick, no sad and disappointed spirit, but the firstfruits of her heart, in days when she was full of health and cheerfulness. She brought the world's sense and practical ability to good works, and God's faith, hope, and charity to the world's work, earnestly seeking the Saviour's spirit in following the blessed steps of his most holy life. She died at her post among the poor and sick while yet in the flower of her age. And thus she lived the life and died the death of the children of God, who are the children of the resurrection."

On this side, the name of Agnes Jones is a household word; but it is spirit-stirring to find it wafted across the Atlantic, and through such notices as this, and more fully through her Memoir, which has been reprinted there, beginning a new campaign, a new crusade, we may say, on behalf of Christ, and his sick and suffering members. Happy they who, like Samson, do more in their death than they have done in their life; whose names become symbols of the highest Christian devotedness, and as they are wafted from country to country, and from home to home, carry to this heart and the other a trumpet-like summons, "Go thou and do likewise!" And happy the country that, amid all its ecclesiastical contentions, has such names to look to, as visible proofs that the spirit of Christ is the spirit of love. And blessed it is to think that other ladies are catching up the spirit and following the example, and that, among those in easy circumstances, nursing the poor for Christ's sake is becoming more and more common.

THE ATHANASIAN CREED.

It is the surprising, we are told, that happens. And most persons, we doubt not, will feel that the reaction that has taken place in favour of the Athanasian Creed is remarkable. When Lord Shaftesbury and his lay-memorialists craved no more than that the reading of it in church services might not be compulsory, it seemed as if so moderate a proposal could have little active opposition. And yet the opposition is most intense, and when a public meeting is called in London to give expression to that opposition, it is found that a single hall is not enough to contain all that desire to be present. And, strange to say, as Dean Stanley and Mr. Ryle were on the same platform in opposition to the compulsory use of the creed, Canon Kingsley and Canon Liddon are on the same platform in support of it. The one, Canon Kingsley, expresses by letter his sense of the great evil that would be done alike to the theology and the metaphysics of England should the Creed be disused; the other, Canon Liddon, expresses himself in still stronger terms. The three Creeds, he says, are more sacred than any part of the Prayer-Book; they approach in authority to the very Scriptures themselves; they are the very heart of the Church of England. Any tampering with them would be a tampering with the most vital thing in the Church. He spoke with admiration of the late Bishop of Salisbury, who had told him that if any such tampering took place, he would resign his see. To him it appeared that to meddle with this Creed would virtually be to declare that they were no longer concerned to maintain the honour of the Lord Jesus Christ as God. He read a letter from Dr. Pusey to the same effect, and joined with him in thankfulness that the dark cloud that had hung over them a year ago might now, he trusted, be regarded as dispelled.

TWO PHASES OF ENGLISH LOYALTY.

We have lately had two very opposite expressions of English national feeling, or rather of feeling in England—one from Archbishop Manning, head of the English branch of the Roman Catholics, the other from the Poet Laureate. The transition from the one to the other is like the transition from harshest discord to the softest melody. At Sheffield the Archbishop did not scruple to repeat the offensive utterance that he was first a Catholic and next an Englishman. And as if to justify it, he presumed that most men would say that they were first Christians, then Englishmen. As if our supreme subjection to the Eternal Son of God was to be placed on the same level with subjection to an Italian priest, calling himself his vicar! Let the Ultramontanists of England succeed in their aim, it is not difficult to tell who will be the real sovereign of England. It is as contrasting with this fiery ecclesiastical spirit that the gentle tone of the Poet Laureate is so full of music. In an address to the Queen closing the new issue of his Idyls, he pours out the warm love of his heart to her who has been so "loyal to the royal in herself and loyal to her land." The signs of the times are not without their uncomfortable portents, but his trust is "that heaven

Will blow the tempest in the distance back
From thine and ours: for some are scared who mark
Or wisely, or unwisely, signs of storm,
Waverings of every soul with every wind,
And wordy truckings to the transient hour,
And fierce or careless looseners of the faith,
And softness breeding scorn of simple life,
Or cowardice, the child of lust for gold,
Or labour with a groan and not a voice,
Or art with poisonous honey stol'n from France."

Not such are the breathings of Archbishop Manning. Nothing will do but Ultramontanism. "The Christian world was created by Christianity. Christianity was the Church; the Pope was the head of the Church; the Papacy was Ultramontanism, and Ultramontanism, therefore, had brought about the advancement made up to the sixteenth century." Ultramontanism was the great power that would yet govern and bless the world. The decree of infallibility had been received by every priest and bishop, except the handful of Alt-Catholics in France and Germany. The Church of Rome is the despoiled but rightful owner of the highest influence and authority on the globe. It is evidently the purpose of Dr. Manning to accustom the ears of the English people to this thought. The time seems to be regarded as having come for talking contemptuously of the Church of England, and of every other power or authority that might be a rival to that of Rome. Bishop Vaughan, in his late utterances at Manchester, spoke in the same strain. Evidently the little horn with the eyes as the eyes of a man, is framing its mouth to speak great things. That such a tone cannot but rouse the intense antagonism of the great bulk of the English people cannot be doubted. Yet we do not suppose that Dr. Manning regards that indignation as the most serious obstacle that his schemes may have to encounter. An intelligent acquaintance with the Bible, and familiarity with its saving truths; a hearty appreciation of the way of salvation for sinners through faith in a crucified Redeemer; a cordial interest in the spiritual kingdom of Christ, and a sincere readiness to promote it by prayer, by service, by gifts and sacrifice, and, if need be, sufferings—such a spirit on the part of the great mass of the people would be the true safeguard of our Protestantism, and the one invincible opponent whom neither force nor fraud would be able to conquer.

THE EDUCATION QUESTION.

There does not appear to be much likelihood of our education question getting soon into smooth water. From the Nonconformist section of the people there are loud complaints that the denominational schools are not national schools, and the demand for a change is all the more earnest that the question was at first believed to be settled on a broader basis. It is one of the most serious evils that arise from the divided state of the Christian Church that it is so difficult to provide for the teaching of religion, except in connection with a denominational system. The cry for combined secular and separate religious instruction would never have become so loud and so strong had it not been for the number of religious denominations, and the views that have thus arisen as to the teaching of religion. In the coming conflict of parties, considerable anxiety may well be entertained as to the interests of religious instruction. Whatever happens, we trust that a place will be secured for the Bible in our schools; this homage is due to the book of books; and little good in the highest sense can be looked for from a system that should expressly refuse to make use of the best instrument of education, to say the very least, the world has ever known.

DR. WALLACE AND MR. KNIGHT.

The ecclesiastical firmament in Scotland has been considerably agitated by the cases of Dr. Wallace and Mr. Knight. The unexpected appointment of Dr. Wallace to the Chair of Church History in the University of Edinburgh has brought up the rumours of unsoundness in the faith which have been floating about for a considerable time past. The very peculiar way which Dr. Wallace takes to propagate rationalistic views makes it difficult to proceed against him in the way of formal prosecution. It is not his custom to say whether the views be his own, but rather to give them forth as the views of others, but with such an obvious leaning as to make the inference easy what his own opinion is concerning the old orthodoxy. Thus, in a paper on the "Tendencies of Religious Thought in Scotland," published three years ago in a volume of Essays already forgotten by the public, it is announced that religious thought is "moving away from an external authority toward self-reliance; from an objective towards a subjective standard of truth." "There is much sympathy with what is called the modern or liberal school of theology" in the intelligent, but only the intelligent, circles of Scotland. Men in these circles believe statements in the Scriptures, "not simply because they find them in the Bible, but inasmuch as for themselves they perceive them to be true." The "cultured sense of right and truth," and not the authority of the Bible, is declared to be the standard in these intelligent circles. They believe only "what commends itself to their innate sense of truth, fitness, beauty, or usefulness." Even the Free Church, he affirms, has shown that she can be guided "by the principle of common sense, as against being hampered by the mere letter of Scripture." What ordinary mortal, in reading all this, could fail to suppose that it was Dr. Wallace's own sentiments that it expresses? But, on a closer inspection, it turns out that Dr. Wallace is only recording historically what are the views of the intelligent class, and as he does not expressly claim to belong to that class, they cannot be brought home to him as his own. Moreover, as he has again signed the Westminster Confession of Faith, and declared it to be the confession of his own faith, he has probably placed himself in an attitude of safety.

The case of Mr. Knight is materially different. Mr. Knight has ever maintained the character of a devout believer, but has been disposed to give a prominence to the philosophical mode of dealing with divine truth that threatens to land him in very perilous positions. In a recent article on Prayer, with a view to prove to our men of science that there is a true sphere for prayer as a real force in the universe, he lays it down that for any matter which is directly dependent on physical causation, prayer is quite inapplicable, and that its proper sphere is only in the region of the moral and spiritual forces. We may lawfully pray for wisdom, for holiness, and for strength to battle with sin, because these matters lie in the region of the spiritual forces, where God is free to act according to circumstances; but we may not pray for rain, or for calm weather, or for protection or deliverance from disease, because such things lie in the region of physical causation, where everything is regulated by fixed and unalterable laws. The Duke of Argyll has answered Mr. Knight, in a short, pithy, and very able paper, turning his flank very thoroughly, and meeting all his principal positions. It is more than doubtful whether Mr. Knight's concession would be accepted as sufficient even by the class whom he desires to conciliate. Certainly the more materialistic portion of them would loudly challenge the broad distinction he makes between the natural and the moral world, and would not allow that what we call the moral world is less under law than the physical. And as for devout believers, Mr. Knight's view can never be contemplated without giving a shock to their Christian instincts as well as their scriptural belief. It is the venerable Guizot, we think, that in one of his volumes entitled "Meditations on the Christian Faith," maintains that belief in prayer is an intuition of the human spirit. And it is certain that devout minds will not admit the distinction which Mr. Knight attempts to draw, and never will believe, and never ought to believe, that in modifying or adjusting the forces that operate in the physical world, the great Creator has less in his power than is seen to belong to his creature man. If the spirit of man has a certain power to modify and control the forces of nature, and bend them to his purposes, how can we ever be persuaded to believe that a similar, nay, an infinitely higher power of the same sort does not belong to the infinite God?

PROGRESS OF COLPORTAGE.

Since last October, when special attention was directed to the subject of Colportage in this Magazine, another annual report has been issued by the Society that superintends this department of usefulness in Scotland. This Society, we are glad to find, continues to advance. The number of its agents is again greater than in any previous year. And not only is its number greater in Scotland, but the effort to plant the colporteur in England has been renewed. More blue bonnets have gone over the border; and of these, two are at work in Bedfordshire, and one at Aldershott. The directors express the greatest anxiety that English friends would take this matter into their own hands, and would extend an agency which has been so useful in Scotland, and which seems to be equally capable of becoming a blessing in England. In so far, they say, as they have tried the plan, there has been the greatest encouragement to continue and multiply the agency. Their labours and sales have been attended with great success. A travelling agent has been secured to endeavour to promote the cause in England. It does seem strange that it is not taken up more enthusiastically, and we can account for this only on the supposition that the real nature of the agency is not understood, and its missionary character not taken into account. It is certain that the efforts made to circulate a frivolous and sensational literature among the masses of the people are very great. We lately made some inquiries in a large town in Scotland as to the effect of the larger earnings of the working people in increasing the ordinary sale of wholesome and solid literature. We regret to say that the answer was very discouraging. All goes to show the necessity of judicious effort to stimulate a wholesome appetite for reading, and to feed it when it has been called into existence; nor do we know of any subsidiary agency better fitted for this purpose than that of the colporteur. And we repeat what was said before, that the ultimate effect of this movement cannot be otherwise than to give a powerful impulse to the ordinary book trade.

II.—GLANCES AT WHAT IS DOING ABROAD.

QUIET WORK IN PARIS.

Belleville is a suburb of Paris, inhabited chiefly by Communists. A devoted Christian lady, Mdlle. de Broen, has been doing a good work in the district, providing employment for the women, and using her opportunities of intercourse to speak to them of the love of God and the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ. The poor women who frequent her meetings are wives and mothers of Communists, who are either dead, banished, or imprisoned. The desolation and destitution the women were plunged into when the Communist cause collapsed, and their relatives were separated from them, may be imagined.

"We were going to Belleville and La Villette," says Mdlle. de Broen, "to distribute books and Gospels, and found that the misery was indeed overwhelming; women separated from their husbands or sons by death or imprisonment, often unmerited, refused to believe that there was a God in heaven. Forsaken by the priests and sisters of mercy, they were left to cherish their feelings of hatred and revenge against their richer brethren, and of unbelief in God. . . . About four hundred have attended my meetings; with few exceptions, all Roman Catholics. Drawn together in the first place for the sake of the trifling remuneration for work in a sewing class, they have been brought under the wonder-working power of the gospel, hitherto almost unknown among them. The countenances, which at first were hard, sullen, and even fierce, have been so softened by Christian influence that they are hardly to be recognised."

"In addition to the sewing classes, mission meetings are held twice a week, the one at La Villette being attended by nearly two hundred men, women, and boys; night schools twice a week for men and boys, and also for women and girls, which are well attended. One woman sixty-five years old learned to read and write in six months."

One of the women brought her husband to Mdlle. de Broen, newly released from prison, entreating her to convert him. "He is a very good husband," she said, "but he will be still better if he loves Jesus." It turned out that the man had been an unbeliever;

the priests had driven him away. Then he had turned spiritualist, but had got no peace. But when he heard of the blessed work of the ladies, his faith revived so far that he felt that they believed; and his anxiety was to share their faith and help in their work. What a reward are such things for loving and patient labour, and what an encouragement to be "steadfast and unmoveable, always abounding in the work of the Lord!"

THE BIBLE IN FRANCE.

The report of M. Monod, the agent in France for the British and Foreign Bible Society, presents us with some interesting particulars—little bright specks of green amid the surrounding desert of infidelity and worldliness. Colportage in France, he admits, is difficult work, and some of the old agents have had to be parted with as not being in all respects equal to the work. In Paris it is particularly difficult; the police forbid sales in thoroughfares; private houses are guarded by porters, and shops are protected by the genius loci. To be a colporteur in such circumstances requires no common measure of earnestness, tact, and love of the work. Sometimes the colporteur gets help unexpectedly: at Meux, where there are a good many Protestants, a woman took him under her protection, and introduced him to a number of tradesmen, saying, "You Huguenots, here is a Huguenot—you must buy his book!" A man said to him, "This is a good book; the Prussians took the copy I had, and I am very pleased to have you to replace it." At another place, the Bible is at a great discount: a man is making a fortune by exhibiting a girl in one of whose eyes is to be seen a picture of Notre Dame de Lourdes. (The girl has a false eye of glass, and the picture is painted thereon!) At another place a man wishes a Bible, but he has no money; suddenly he remembers that he has a hen; he runs and sells it, and with the money buys a Bible—reminding one of the parable of the treasure in the field. In another district, an old man, when offered the Bible, glanced over it, and then called his children, and said with great emotion, "Children, here is at last the book of which you hear me constantly speaking, and from which are taken all the stories I tell you."

In some parts of France, we are told that whole villages are thirsting for the gospel; but there, as in other places, the great difficulty is to find suitable agents. Who can doubt that if a sufficient supply of men of the right stamp, spirit-stirred and spirit-stirring, could be obtained, not only for France, but for other countries equally destitute, there would result, with God's blessing, a glorious change? Everything points to the need of prayer to the Lord of the harvest to send forth labourers into his harvest.

BOHEMIA—AMERICAN MISSION.

The American Board of Foreign Missions having resolved to establish missions in the papal countries of Europe, the city of Prague in Bohemia has been selected as the first, though possibly not the permanent scene of their operations, and three missionaries have been sent thither. This movement has been begun in cordial co-operation with the Protestant missionaries and pastors already in the field, and with the warm desire to strengthen the hands of all good men engaged in the work of evangelisation. The land of Huss, as our readers know, has lately exhibited a real desire for the gospel. The light kindled by the holy martyrs, Huss and Jerome, has begun once more to burn. Here and there evangelical stations have been formed, and evangelical agencies started. At the Free Church College in Edinburgh, several godly Bohemian students have been preparing for the ministry, and some are now engaged in the active work of the gospel. There is ample room for the new labourers that have entered the field, and if their work is carried on in the same spirit as that of their brethren in Asia Minor, and with similar results, there will be good reason to hail their advent to Bohemia as one of the greatest blessings that could have been bestowed on the land.

III.—OUR LETTER DRAWER.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

SPIRITUALISM AND ITS PRETENSIONS.

I need not tell you that on this side of the Atlantic we have had not a little to do with spiritualism, about which, I perceive, that you have lately been having some discussion in your journals. We have had men professing to be converted from blank atheism by spirit rappings, but we have not often found that their conversion proved a turning "from darkness to light, nor from the power of Satan unto God." The more sober-minded part of our community are disposed to regard spiritualism as sheer imposture and delusion, cleverly grafted on some singular mesmeric or magnetic phenomena, which are certainly fitted to bewilder ordinary minds. We have indeed had some remarkable instances of respectable men giving themselves up to it, or to something like it. Dr. Prime, of the New York Observer, in a recent communication to that paper, narrates the case of the late Professor Bush, at one time a well-known and learned professor in a Presbyterian college. Dr. Bush's conversion, however, was not properly to spiritualism, but to Swedenborgianism. He believed Swedenborg to have had a divine mission, and he believed in that intercourse with the spiritual world which Swedenborg professed. With Swedenborg he held that angels are the spirits of departed men, and that it is impious to believe in an order of created beings higher than man, seeing that man was made in the image of God, and anything higher than that cannot be conceived. Dr. Bush professed to be able by passing his hand over a piece of writing to tell the character of the man who wrote it. He maintained that certain emanations from the man hovered even about what he had written, and that one en rapport with him could through these declare his character. He thought that in the mesmeric or trance state the ordinary properties of the body were suspended, so far as the spirit was concerned, and that the spirit acted in the same manner as if it were disembodied. It need not be said that by these vagaries, Dr. Bush lost caste in the community. He died at Rochester, an apostle of the Swedenborgian faith.

In the same letter, Dr. Prime gives an account of various interviews which he has had with other assertors of spiritualistic views. Conspicuous among these were the famous Fox ladies from Rochester. They were such dexterous manipulators that they could bring the spirits into conversation, not merely with believers, or persons of mesmeric susceptibility, but with any one, for the small charge of a dollar. Dr. Prime spent an evening with one of them, but out of some fifty experiments that were performed, not a single one was satisfactory, and he left convinced that the whole affair was a piece of imposture and delusion. He sums up by admitting that there are some facts at present inexplicable, as there are also in the feats of jugglers. Also, that there are as yet mysteries about magnetism, and that the influence of mind on mind is an obscure subject. "Since the world was made," he adds, "the soul of no dead man has made signs to a live one of what was going on in the world of spirits, and apart from what we know of the spirit-world in the book of Revelation, the veil is unbroken, and beyond it all is mystery."

PROFESSOR AGASSIZ ON THE DEVELOPMENT SPECULATION.

Let me call your attention, further, to an important address of Professor Agassiz at a late meeting of the National Academy of Science. The name of Agassiz has been so long conspicuous in the ranks of science that great weight is inevitably attached to his judgment on any scientific question. It has been attempted indeed to pull him down from his eminence, as the same thing has been attempted in the case of other men who have stood firm to their faith in the Creator. "The longer I live," said Agassiz, "I feel more and more the danger of stretching inferences from a few observations to a wide field. I see that the younger generation among naturalists are at this moment falling into the mistake of making assertions and presenting views as scientific principles which are not even based on real observations. The manner in which the evolution theory in zoology is treated would lead those who are not special zoologists to suppose that observations have been made from which it can be inferred that there is in nature such a thing as change among organized beings actually taking place. There is no such thing on record." He went on to say that it was utterly intolerant to proclaim men as deficient in science because they would not give in to theories based on mere assertion. Yet that was what was done now. There was no evidence whatever of evolution, there was no evidence of a tendency to evolution; the whole theory rested on certain resemblances. Darwin had done much in scientific research, but he had been woefully injured by his adherents. He had had doctrines fattered on him which existed only in their imagination. In his several writings Professor Agassiz has often expressed himself to the same effect; holding, indeed, that instead of creation having gone on by a continuous law of evolution, breaks have repeatedly occurred, showing the interposition of a designing and intelligent Creator.

THE FULTON STREET PRAYER-MEETINGS.

The daily prayer-meeting still goes on, and the spirit of faith and hope prevails at the meeting as much as ever. Faith in the efficacy of prayer, indeed, has ever been the mainspring of its operations, and the records of answers to believing prayer multiply week by week and day by day. If any one were to enter the meeting in doubt as to whether prayer could have any effect in heaven, he might possibly not be convinced himself of this truth, but he would be obliged to feel that other men are profoundly convinced of it. The number of requests for prayer, amounting sometimes to fifty or sixty in a day, show how extensive is the trust in its efficacy. And the remarkable records of answers given is a further proof of the reality of the work. At a recent meeting in Chicago, for instance, a young man stood up, holding a slip of paper in his hand. "This is a telegram," he said, "from Philadelphia; it says, 'Uncle Jack is dying, come on immediately.'" Uncle Jack was a rich worldly man in Philadelphia, whom his young friend had been urging to believe on the Lord Jesus Christ; and now, when he was dying, he could think of no one likely to be a comfort to him but the young man whose faithful counsel he had been far from relishing. He telegraphed that he could not go to Philadelphia, but if Uncle Jack would believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, as sure as there was a God in heaven he would be saved. He came to the meeting to get their prayers for a blessing on the message. In the afternoon he had another telegram from Philadelphia:—"You need not come. Uncle Jack is very happy in believing on Jesus." For some time past there has been unusual earnestness at many meetings.

IV.—JOTTINGS FROM THE MISSION FIELD.

THE WANT OF THE TIME.

When missions and missionaries are assailed as they have lately been, the instinct of fair play and the demands of truth require that they be vindicated from bitter calumnies. Yet it must be owned that there is something in the representations that are often made of the comparative feebleness and uselessness of some members of the band. Mission life undoubtedly demands something very unusual in the way of qualification. A half-hearted consecration is specially unsuitable in one who goes to win the heathen by his life as much as to convert them by his words. A left-handed look-out for worldly comfort and consideration, betraying itself in many a little matter easily detected by the native eye, is not likely to have much good effect in inclining the heathen to Christianity. As Dr. Parker, of London, remarked the other day, we need valiant men. And we feel very much disposed to act the part of the King of Israel:—"When Saul saw any strong man, or any valiant man, he took him to him." Dr. Parker refers, and with justice, to the obstacles often put by fathers and mothers in the way of their sons going out to the mission-field. His words are worthy of being pondered:—

"Truly, in view of this family aspect of the case, we may, first of all, pray that fathers and mothers may be made 'valiant.' They are by no means to be forgotten in these prayers. They may have a great battle to fight with themselves in secret, when they know that God is saying to them: 'Take your son—your only son—your only son Isaac whom you love, and set him apart for the service of the Cross,'—a form of message, however, which, by the very lingering of its emphasis, shows that the whole case has been measured, and that not one drop of the life-offering shall be wasted in the dust. O Thou, who didst not spare Thine only begotten Son, but didst freely give Him up for us all, take this matter into Thine own hands, that it may suffer nothing from our roughness, and by the voice of the Holy Ghost, the Comforter, speak to fathers and mothers as Thou only canst speak; mercifully give them such extent and clearness of out-look as shall enable them to see that, in the long run, love renews itself by sacrifice, and that, though weeping may endure for a night, joy will come in the morning!"

To young men he says with equal power:—

"Others are going abroad for secular purposes; servants of the State brave the sea; speculators and adventurers break through every difficulty, that they may seek their fortunes in lands far away; navigators, geographers, merchants, leave home and friends behind, that they may realise the purpose of their hearts: if they do all this to obtain a corruptible crown, will you not emulate their enthusiasm, when a crown incorruptible is set before you? Endure hardness as good soldiers of Jesus Christ; fight the good fight of faith; endure afflictions; do the work of evangelists; and when the Chief Shepherd shall appear ye shall receive a crown of glory."

ON THE SHORE OF LAKE SUPERIOR.

There is always a special interest in the reception of the gospel by simple races, like the American Indians. The mixture of childlike simplicity with manly decision, which is often found in such a case, is not often to be met with in more sophisticated races. The speeches of their chiefs and others at missionary meetings and the like have generally a considerable combination of simplicity and shrewdness. A Wesleyan meeting of this kind took place some time ago on the north shore of Lake Superior, presided over by Chief John Waiskey. The chief referred to his early recollections of the first visits of the Black Coats, as he called the missionaries, when he and his father's family were steeped in heathenism. When his parents were baptized, he hesitated for a while, till the minister offered him a little book, and as he wanted the book he consented. What was it? A volume of Ojebwa hymns. "Oh," said the chief, "that precious little book led me to Christ! Oh, that book! the greatest blessing that the Missionary Society ever gave to the Ojebwa Eneshanabeg." Another chief, bearing the genuine name of Pe-au-pe-dau-sonne, next spoke. He said he was perhaps the oldest man present at that missionary meeting, and he expected that his sun would soon go down, but it would shine brighter in heaven.

He was one of the first converted to Christianity in those parts, when John Sunday and others first came with the Word of God. He had been sometimes long years without seeing a missionary, but he always tried to keep that religion which made him so happy to-day. Last winter the priest tried to get him to turn Papist, but he said, "No." He had seen Methodists live and die well; he had never seen Catholics live very well or die very well, nor be very happy. The Methodist people were his people, and their religion his, and he wanted to be with them in heaven. He thanked God for missionaries.

It is pretty well known that the American Government has lately adopted a more conciliatory course towards the various tribes of Indians who have often been so troublesome in the new settlements. On the 15th of last January, a meeting was held between the board charged with the business and representatives of the various Christian Churches which carry on missions among the Indians. The representatives of Congregational, Catholic, Quaker, Methodist, Episcopalian, Presbyterian, Baptist, and Reformed Churches were present, and with hardly a dissenting voice, expressed themselves favourable to the policy of the government, and hopeful of the advance of the Indian, both in civilisation and in Christianity. The only decidedly remonstrant voice was that of the Roman Catholic representative, who complained somewhat dictatorially, that he and his brethren were not allowed to manage the affairs of the Indians in the place where they had their mission. It would be a happy day both for the Indian and the United States if peace reigned unbroken between them, and the word of God had free course and was glorified.

THE GOSPEL IN MEXICO.

Dr. Riley, of the Episcopal Church, is at present on a visit to the United States, collecting funds for the advancement of the work of the gospel in Mexico, where he usually labours. The story of the gospel in Mexico has been formerly alluded to in these columns, but some facts are mentioned by Dr. Riley probably new to most of our readers:—

"A few years ago a priest was converted in Mexico, and commenced preaching Christ; but this ray of hope was extinguished and crushed by poverty. Then I went there, and immediately thousands came to listen: the private rooms in which we met were crowded; our chapel was overflowing. We obtained the grant of an old church, but it needed painting and other repairs to make it tenable; we needed funds, but none were forthcoming, though we had appealed to you, rolling in luxury. At length a poor brother in the faith, a painter, took the contract at a nominal price, and having nearly completed the work, fell from the scaffolding under the dome with such force as to break through the flooring beneath. When I visited his crushed body in his bare home of poverty, he told me that finding the terms of the contract would barely pay for the paint, he had restricted himself to so small an amount of food, that the dizziness of hunger caused his fall. He died, after a painful operation, saying, 'Jesus is more precious than ever.'

"We got into the church, and the dedication sermon was preached by Manuel Aguas, formerly a leading priest of the Romish Church. He fell in with one of our tracts; that led him first to the Bible, and then to Jesus, in whom he found peace and joy unspeakable, and he gladly gave up his brilliant position and prospects to cast in his lot with our penury and distress. His conversion was to Mexico what that of St. Paul was to the early Church, and he was doing a work in which it seems as if no other man could ever be his successor. We were inundated by petitions, which we could not grant, to send out labourers, and establish service in villages and towns all over Mexico; another large church was placed at our disposal, but it needed flooring, seats, and windows, and he urged me to come to America and to try and obtain a little help to keep us from perishing.

"I came. I shall never forget his parting look of anguish till I meet his recognition of rapture above. He undertook to do my work as well as his own, preaching twelve times a week—you know the rest of the story. At his last service he was assisted in and out of the pulpit; and in three days Magnus Aguas, the apostle of Mexico, died rejoicing in the 'most precious blood of Christ,' but crushed by want, privation, and overwork."

The loss caused by the death of Manuel Aguas to the rising Evangelical Church of Mexico cannot be over-estimated. It is one of those mysterious events which baffle all our efforts to understand them; our comfort is, that if God has work to be done there, He will not fail to provide the instruments; having laid the foundation of the temple, the headstone will be brought forth one day with shoutings of "Grace, grace unto it."

V.—OUR LIBRARY TABLE.

Notes of Thought, by the late Charles Buxton, M.P., is not, in the strictest sense, a religious book, but it bears to the more spiritual region a relation somewhat similar to that which the Book of Ecclesiastes bears to the Epistles of St. Paul. It is a series of observations on men and things as they are looked at by an earnest, thoughtful, religious man. From the biographical sketch of Mr. Davies we get a brief glimpse of the personal and social life of Mr. Buxton. He was the youngest son of the late Sir Thomas Fowell Buxton, a name so memorable in connection with the struggle for the abolition of West India slavery. Brought up under the auspices of such a father, and of a mother of a very noble and Christian character, Hannah Gurney; enjoying all the advantages of education, wealth, and social position; happily married and prosperous in all the relations of life, it might truly be said of him that the lines had fallen to him in pleasant places. In many respects his character was most attractive. His heart was essentially diffusive, finding his chief enjoyment in sharing his blessings with others. He did not like his house to stand empty in summer, if any poor clergyman or other overworked man could have the use of it. He died suddenly at Lochearnhead, before he had completed the age of fifty.

Of the Thoughts, which, strung together as mere paragraphs, nearly seven hundred in number, form a substantial volume, we shall merely say that they indicate a mind of a deeply reflective kind, always seeking out the roots of things, but seeking out the roots with a view to the fruits—the aim being constantly practical. We take samples almost at random.

Sin seen in Christianity.—"One radical distinction between Christianity and all other religions, is this. All others tell a heap of tales about gods and goddesses, and demand certain ceremonies to be performed. Christianity flies at the throat of sin. She throws her whole force into the endeavours to make man good instead of evil. Christianity is intensely practical. She has no trait more striking than her common sense."

The Cause of Misery.—"This is a question worthy of deep thought—whether the misery of large masses of the lower orders, in almost every country, is an inevitable and necessary, and so to speak, natural evil, or whether it is the handiwork of man, and is caused by the stupidities of his government. For my part, I feel no question that it is not to nature, but to man's thwarting her, that we owe these masses of misery. But for war, taxation, protection, every man might have so easily lived at his ease that, though here and there a family might have been poor, there would have been no morasses of poverty. Depend on it, Nature never strikes the first blow."

In the Memorials of the Life and Ministry of the Rev. W. B. Mackenzie, M.A., late Vicar of St. James's, Holloway, by the Rev. G. Calthrop, M.A., will be found the record of one of those laborious, earnest lives which in the end produce a wonderful measure of fruit, but are not marked by any special brilliancy. Mr. Mackenzie spent his life in a district of Holloway that at first was to him an absolute desert. When he went to it, there was no congregation, and hardly any church-going people. He set to work, however, with the utmost assiduity, labouring diligently from house to house, although at first with so little success, that after some time he records it as a remarkable encouragement that in two houses his visits had been received with something like a smile. His preaching at first was not popular, yet at the end of eight years he had gained such a hold of the district that his church had to be enlarged to hold two thousand people. His sermons (of which this volume is chiefly made up) are very plain, show little or no originality in opening up Scripture, and hardly an attempt at illustration. But they are substantial and careful, scriptural and real. Their effect must have been due mainly to the earnestness of the preacher. On the whole, we conceive this memorial to be eminently fitted to encourage clergymen of fervent spirit, laborious, persevering, regular habits of working, and deep dependence on the blessing of God.

The Authorship and Historical Character of the Fourth Gospel, considered in reference to the Contents of the Gospel itself: a critical Essay by William Sanday, M.A., Fellow of Trinity College, Oxford.—This volume bears on the much controverted question whether or not the fourth Gospel was written by St. John. The author devotes himself to an examination of the internal evidence alone. He examines every verse and line with this view, and draws out proofs without number that the Gospel could not have been written in the second century, but must have been the production of a Jew, a contemporary, an eye-witness—no other, in short, than St. John.

Synoptical Lectures on the Books of Holy Scripture. Second Series. Isaiah—Acts. By the Rev. Donald Fraser, D.D., is an interesting sample of a form of pulpit instruction which might be far more common than it is at present. This is the second volume of a series of pulpit discourses, the object of each of which is to present a summary view of the contents, scope, and spirit of a whole book of the Bible. They form what we may call popular introductions to the books of Scripture. They bear the same relation to the pulpit that the introductions of the German professors bear to the theological class. What we like most is the earnest effort to make the people acquainted with the scope and drift of the different books, and to prepare them by this means for a more intelligent and devout perusal of them, and application of their lessons to themselves.

Sunday Echoes in Weekday Hours.—A tale illustrative of Scripture characters, by Mrs. Carey Brock. The object of the writer is to bring in each leading incident of Scripture history to illustrate some point which acquires a practical meaning and importance in the life of the boy and girl who are the supposed heroes of the tale. This is done in an interesting way, and the young reader can hardly fail to perceive a new meaning and significancy in many passages which he might otherwise have passed over.

VI.—OUR MEMORIAL RECORD.

Death has been busy among conspicuous men; Lushington, Sedgwick, Lytton, have been carried to their long home; and on one of them a distinguished scholar has preached a funeral sermon which makes him out to have been a saint without specifying anything distinctively Christian. Among the recently departed who have at least given to the world proofs of a different order of their Christianity, the names of Henry Venn and Baptist Wriothsley Noel demand a special niche. Mr. Venn, connected by name and by family with one of the pioneers of the evangelical revival, who knew what it was to struggle against the stream, was chiefly known to the church catholic as Secretary of the Church Missionary Society, but won the affection of his friends by many private virtues. Mr. Noel was long a living representative of all that is pure in character, mild in temper, steadfast in principle, and earnest in pastoral work. In leaving the Church of England about twenty years ago, while the purity of his character could not fail to command more honour than ever, he was subjected to that diminution of prestige which takes place when, by an apparently sudden jerk, a public man changes his orbit. But a man like Mr. Noel is one of the best gifts of Christ to any church which may enjoy the privilege of his ministrations.

THOMAS GUTHRIE, D.D.

IN MEMORIAM—THOMAS GUTHRIE, D.D.

By WILLIAM HANNA, D.D.

A STRIKING and stately figure, a beaming and benignant presence, has passed away, darkening a wide circle by its departure. In the busy and now crowded work-rooms of Christian beneficence, a power that had been working sweetly in harmonious concert with all the diverse instrumentality around, has been withdrawn, and the absence will long be felt. No Scottish clergyman of our times has won a larger admiration and love from his fellow-men; none has lived for greater good than Dr. Guthrie. Some, the idols of sect or party, have been unknown and unhonoured, or misjudged and depreciated, beyond the narrow limits that they filled with their fame. He was known and honoured by the members of all sects and parties among us. Some, of great repute in their own land, have had so much of national peculiarities or national prejudices about them, that the applause which greeted their presence at home fell off or dwindled away as they crossed the border. He was as well-known and as fully appreciated in England as in Scotland; was as popular in London as in Edinburgh. He was stopped lately on his way to America. Had he reached that country, an ovation like to that given to Dickens, but of a deeper and more lasting kind, had followed him throughout the United States. This winter, had life and strength been prolonged, he would have been ministering side by side with the Rev. Dr. Ker at Rome. With all the strangers there gathered from all quarters, he would have been as great a favourite as he ever was in his own city of the north. We question if His Holiness himself could have resisted that benignant smile, or the College of Cardinals kept a trowning front in face of the battery of his broad, good-humoured laughter. What was it about this great and good man whose loss we all now mourn, which drew to him such universal and such deep regard?

It will fall to his biographer to tell us all about him that we desire to know: of his birth at Brechin in 1803 of an ancient Scandinavian stock, which numbered a still popular writer and a martyr of unflinching courage among its earlier members; of his being licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Brechin in 1825, and of the long delay before any appointment in the Church came to him, in course of which he acted for a time as a bank clerk, and walked the hospitals for a winter in Paris; of his settlement in 1830 as minister of the parish of Arbirlot, and of the pains he took there to make full proof of the ministry, especially of the care bestowed upon the composition of his sermons; of his transference in 1837 to the Collegiate Church of Old Greyfriars, Edinburgh, and of that wonderful career as a pulpit orator which then began, and which continued not only with an unabated but with a growing popularity for nearly thirty years; of the part he took in the Voluntary Controversy, the Ten Years' Conflict, and the setting up of the Free Church; of the great project that he devised for building a manse for every minister of the Free Church, his travelling in 1845-6 over the length and breadth of Scotland in furtherance thereof, delivering on its behalf some of his most telling speeches, and gathering in upwards of £100,000; of the publication of the first "Plea for Ragged Schools," and of all the philanthropic labours that followed, which mainly have contributed to give him the place he holds in the regards of his countrymen; of his retirement from the active duties of the ministry in 1864; his travels in other lands, particularly his visit to the Waldensian Valleys, followed up by his manifold pleadings for the Vaudois ministry all over England; his editorship, during the closing years of his life, of the SUNDAY MAGAZINE; and of his peaceful departure from this life at St. Leonard's—in the land, indeed, of the stranger, but in presence of nearly the whole of that numerous, attached, prosperous, and happy household over which the "shadow feared by man" had never passed but once before. A biography which, besides all the interests of domestic and social life (the latter in his case so wide and varied), has such materials supplied for it, will be anxiously awaited. Meanwhile, a word or two in the way of personal recollections may be permitted.

It was the happy privilege of the writer of these lines, counted by him among the greatest he has enjoyed, of being for fifteen years Dr. Guthrie's colleague in the ministry of Free St. John's, Edinburgh. To one coming from a remote country parish, ten years residence in which had moulded tastes originally congenial with its quiet and seclusion into something like a fixed habit of retreat, the position was a trying one, to occupy such a pulpit every Sunday, side by side with such a preacher. But never can I forget the kindness and tenderness, the constant and delicate consideration with which Dr. Guthrie ever tried to lessen its difficulties and to soften its trials. Brother could not have treated brother with more affectionate regard. Those happy years of colleagueship with him gave me the opportunity of hearing Dr. Guthrie preach more frequently than has fallen to the lot of any other clergyman. I often spoke to him after the service of anything in the discourse by which I had been particularly struck, and with that frank cordiality so eminently characteristic of him, he told me of the time, and place, and mode of the composition of his sermons; exhibiting at times the manuscript, showing me the changes and additions made in the course of their preparation, and the abstract upon a single sheet of paper which he had before him in the pulpit to aid him in their delivery. No discourses ever delivered from the pulpit had more the appearance of extempore addresses. None were ever more carefully thought over, more completely written out beforehand, or more accurately committed to memory. If ever there was any one who might have trusted to the spur of the moment for the words to be employed, it was he. No readier speaker ever stepped upon a platform; but such was his deep sense of the sacredness of the pulpit, and the importance of weighing well every word that should proceed from it, that he never trusted to a passing impulse to mould even a single phrase. Yet in the manuscript there were often phrases, sentences, illustrations, that one on hearing them could scarcely believe to have been other than the suggestion of the moment, linking themselves as apparently they did with something that was then immediately before the speaker's eye. The explanation of this lay in the power (possessed in any considerable degree by but few, possessed by him in perfect measure,) of writing as if a large audience were around him, writing as if speaking, realising the presence of a crowd before him, and having that presence as a continual stimulus to thought and constant moulder of expression. The difference in fact that there almost invariably is between written and spoken address, was by his vivid imagination and quick sympathies reduced to a minimum, if not wholly obliterated. Herein lay one secret of his great power as a preacher.

Another lay in the peculiar character of the imagery and illustrations of which he made such copious use. It has been re-

that you could stop or dry up the spring of story-telling in Dickens or in Scott as you could that of his own form and kind of illustration in Dr. Guthrie. Not even the icy fingers of death could do it. How touching so near the close to see him hold up the mirror to the features which those fingers were fashioning for the tomb, saying that he was doing as the sailor did who climbed to the mast-head to try if he could see land! How touching as sight began to fail, and things look dim, confused around, to hear him compare it to the "land birds lighting on the mast presaging to the weary mariner the nearness of his desired haven!" It was the ruling faculty strong in death. It was to the unfailingness of that faculty that he owed his sustained popularity as a preacher.

I believe that there is not on record another instance of a popularity continued without sign or token of diminution for the length of an entire generation. Nor is there upon record the account of any such kinds of crowds as those which constituted continuously, for years and years, Dr. Guthrie's audiences in Free St. John's. Every afternoon crowds gather round the church, long before the hour of meeting. Soon as the doors are opened, they break impetuously in, soon filling every pew, and blocking up all the passages, till standing room for one man more is not to be found in all the area of the building. Look round while all are settling themselves as best they can; you have before you as mixed and motley a collection of human beings as ever assembled within a church. Peers and peasants, citizens and strangers, millionaires and mechanics, the judge from the bench, the carter from the roadside, the high-born dame, the serving maid of low degree—all for once close together. But in the crowd there is always one conspicuous figure. Looking only at the rough, red, slaggy hair, or at the chequed plaid flung over the broad shoulders across the manly breast from which it seldom in any circumstances is withdrawn, you may think that it is some shepherd from the distant hills who has wandered in from his sheiling among the mountains to hear the great city preacher. But look again. The massy head, the broad projecting brow, the lips so firmly closed, the keen grey eye, and, above all, the look of intelligent and searching scrutiny cast around—all tell of something higher than shepherd life. It is Hugh Miller, the greatest of living Scotchmen, never to be missed in this congregation, of which he was not only a member but an office-bearer. How often as I sat opposite him, Sunday after Sunday, have I gazed upon his mysterious countenance; the head inclined always to one side, bent half way down; the eyes askance, fixed generally upon the floor, but occasionally lifted up, scanning curiously the uplifted faces of the crowd; and ever and anon, as the preacher warmed into some glow of high emotion or spread out some new picture, turning up to and concentrating upon him for a moment or two such a look as could come from no other eyes than his! How little, as I gazed upon him there, for the last time, did I dream that so soon thereafter I would be looking down upon that face as it lay back upon the pillow, serene in the calm majesty of death! Would that he had survived. What a picture should we then have had of those afternoons in St. John's, and of his own loved minister and friend!

I remember Dr. Guthrie once telling me in the vestry-room that he was greatly perplexed about Hugh Miller. The harassing work of Editorship of the Witness newspaper—more than enough for any man—was being carried on by him along with literary and scientific labours of the most arduous kind. The two were interfering with one another, the whole burden of them telling seriously upon his health and spirits. A lucrative situation in a public office had just been offered to him, which he was hesitating to accept. Dr. Guthrie, who, doubtless, had a large share in getting him the offer, was greatly concerned about this, not only from the desire that Mr. Miller might be relieved from all mere literary drudgery, and left free to follow his own chosen paths, but from a kindly care for his family now growing up around him—an ample provision for whom it seemed so unreasonable to reject. That we might bring our united influences to bear upon him to prevent this, Dr. Guthrie suggested that the three of us should breakfast together in my house to talk the matter over, and should go afterwards to the agent of the Marquis of Breadalbane (by whom the offer had been made), who was fully informed as to the nature of the duties which occupancy of the office imposed. At the breakfast-table Hugh Miller could not be got to speak much about the matter. We proceeded to the agent's office. His explanation was clear and full, and, as it seemed to us, perfectly satisfactory. No other responsibility was to be incurred than what is laid upon all public functionaries. While we, by our questions, were bringing out this explanation, Miller sat silent with head inclined and down-cast look, as usual. He asked but the single question—"Would I be responsible for all the public moneys that passed in the course of the year through that office?" "Of course," was the reply. He said nothing more, and we fondly hoped that he would accept. The interview over, we passed out of the hall door, and stood together upon the pavement of Fettes Row. "Well," said Dr. Guthrie, "you are going to take it." Miller gathered himself up, and stood erect. "I find," he said, "that lately my memory has been failing. I cannot trust it as once I could, and no power on earth will ever induce me to take on me a responsibility which I am doubtful of my capacity to discharge." We poured all kind of arguments and remonstrances in upon him. He stood as the rock stands among the billows, utterly unmoved. As the two men, he and Dr. Guthrie, stood fronting one another upon that pavement, which was most to be admired, the overflowings of brotherly kindness in the one, the steadiness, nay, sternness of principle, in the other? Miller, we may be all quick to say, was wrong, but was there another man in Scotland who, in such circumstances, would have rejected such an offer upon such a ground?

There was but one part or sphere of our mutual ministry as to which Dr. Guthrie and I were not of the same mind. We never sat together upon the platform of a congregational soirée without his saying that the only thing he knew of on which he and his colleague differed was in the liking for soirées—he liked—I shrunk from them. The truth is, that I had neither the taste nor the talent for those quick successions—blending so closely the serious with the comic by which such assemblies are often, if not ordinarily, characterized. But no wonder that he liked them, for the platform was to him still more, perhaps, even than the pulpit, the instrument of power for good—the theatre for the fullest and most effective exercise of all his various gifts. Among these the sense of humour—the power of evoking hearty merriment—was dominant, and he sought and found free room for its exercise upon the platform in the crowded weekday meetings of all kinds. Few clergymen of churches in which large "liberty of prophesying" in the pulpit is permitted, and who were as great humorists as Rowland Hill or Dr. Guthrie, have been able to restrain their natural propensity so far that a rippling and suppressed smile has not been seen occasionally stealing over the faces of their congregations. But so completely did Dr. Guthrie hold this faculty in check that I never saw even the shadow of a smile pass over the congregation of Free St. John's. All the freer did he feel himself at other times and in other places to indulge his bent—to give ample scope and verge to the exercise of that high "prerogative of man," the faculty of laughter. Mrs. Piozzi tells us that Dr. Johnson used to say that "a man's understanding might always be justly measured by his mirth. And his own," she adds, "was never contemptible. He would laugh as heartily and freely as I ever yet saw any man, and his laugh was irresistible." Davies, indeed, tells us he had a laugh like a rhinoceros, whatever that may be; and Boswell says of it that it seemed to him in their midnight walkings to resound from Temple Bar to Fleet-ditch. Mr. Forster in referring to this adds, "Some of the most famous living writers with whom I am acquainted are as famous for the loud laugh as for the well-stored mind."* And who that ever heard it can forget the loud, broad, genial, unrestrained, and most infectious laugh of Dr. Guthrie. Yet it was not a laughter that dulled or deadened any one of the deeper or finer susceptibilities—natural or spiritual—human or divine. "With his eyes in flood with laughter"—how quick were tears—"the pure messengers sent from his heart" to come and fill them with a flood of grief. Tell him when at his topmost point of ringing merriment some simple tale of woe, and see how instantly it acts, "stopping the career of laughter with a sigh"—so marvellously flexible the emotional element that smiles and sighs and tears and laughter would chase each other across that April heart of his as the shadows and the sunbeams chase one another across the lawn.

Linking itself with his love of humour, was his desire for sympathy, his fondness for society. The greatest martyrdom to which you could have doomed him to would have been to make him live alone, or see none but the members of the same half-dozen households. Let him witness a scene of sorrow, or listen to a stroke of humour, he could not rest till he had taken some one into his confidence and made him the sharer of his sorrow or his joy. A deep retreat was opened to him at the remote extremity of a far-off lonely Highland Loch, where he might have tasted to the full the sweets of solitude; but he would always have friends or acquaintances with him there. He was a great fisher; but even the "lonely office of the rod" he liked best to discharge when some one was looking on. Meant for mankind, to mankind he gave up all that there was in him of power to profit or to please. Freely he had received, freely he gave; getting as he gave, giving as he got. For he often said that the world was very much as you made it; men to you very much what you were first to them. Smile on them, and they would smile; frown on them, and they would frown; turn you away from them, and they would turn away from you. With heart and hand open as day to every sentiment and deed of kindness, he went abroad among his fellow-men, and open, hearty, and joyous the greeting that everywhere he got. His bright smile, his cheery laugh, his varied information, his store of anecdotes, his readiness and felicity of phrase, his broad and genial human-kindness, his conversational gifts, made him a great and general favourite in society—as welcome in the salons of the noble as in the dwellings of the poor.

The fine and full blending of all the humanities—the strength especially of the sympathetic element—inclined him to and pre-eminently fitted him for those philanthropic labours to which so many of the later years of his life were devoted. The controversies of earlier years over, his contribution to the secure establishment of the Free Church made, he was at liberty to look around and see to what, as a minister of Christ and a citizen of Edinburgh, he should put a hand, whose power in moving others he had now tested. It had been long apparent to him that the one great opprobrium which lay upon the Christianity of our country was the debased and degraded condition of such large masses of our city populations—the ignorance, the drunkenness, the debauchery, the crime, the godlessness—simmering and seething, boiling up and running over within those half-lighted, half-heated, defiled and uncleansed dwellings, in which thousands upon thousands of our fellow-creatures are living and dying within arms' reach, yet comparatively uncared for.

Upon this reproachful and revolting spectacle he looked, not so much to condemn, as to pity and to sympathize. He knew and felt how much of the sinning and suffering was due to early training, to the force of example, the power of moulding circumstances, the absence of all encouragement to truth and temperance, thrift and piety, the presence of all kinds of temptations to all kinds of sin. It was neither in the spirit of the censor that he desired to speak, nor in the spirit of the lictor that he desired to punish, nor in the spirit of the patron that he desired to help. It was comparatively easy to condemn or to punish, or even pecuniarily and otherwise to aid. The one thing wanted was to get, if possible, at the root of the evil, and dry up at the fountain head the sources from which all this evil flowed. If, as all experience proves, it is the character of a community that determines their condition, to work upon their motives, principles, and habits—upon all in fact by which character is formed, was the thing most needed. No other method of doing so appearing to him half so hopeful as those Territorial Churches by whose multiplied and concentrated agencies the lessons of the Gospel of Jesus Christ are brought home to every heart, and pressed upon every individual conscience and heart. He sought to turn his own parish church, when he got it uncollegiated, into a Mission Church of this character; and when, through no fault of his, that project fell through, he took vigorous and effective part in the establishment of the Mission Church in the Pleasance, which his congregation originated, and by which, for many years, it was sustained. Seeing in the one habit of drunkenness the pregnant spring of far more than half the existing wretchedness and crime, he headed for a time the temperance movement, and to the last was ready to aid every feasible effort for the mitigation of this monster evil. But his long experience taught him that by far the most hopeful field of labour was the education and Christian training of the young. It must be left to others now to tell how it was that within this field he chose for himself a limited space, and erected an enclosure, and gathered into it the wandering Arabs of our streets, and published his "Plea for Ragged Schools," and built his own Ragged School upon the Mound, and wrote for it, and begged for it, delivering those annual orations which thrilled the hearts of thousands, till he raised it into the condition of one of the most important and permanent institutions of the city, and lived to see hundreds of outcast children who otherwise had been doomed to wretchedness and vice, turned at least into well doing, creditable citizens, many of them, let us hope, into Christian men and women.

The object, however, of these hurried lines is neither to describe Dr. Guthrie's philanthropic labours, nor to delineate his character as a religious man and a Christian minister. The one could not be done without access to sources of information from which I am for the time far removed. The other is not for a hand so enfeebled as mine has lately been. Precluded from following his remains to the grave, and from speaking of him from the pulpit we once shared together, I have sought imperfectly to discharge a great debt of gratitude, and to joining those who are laying their tributes upon his tomb—by reviving and recording a few memories of past intercourse, and attempting to trace one or two of the more prominent features of his character as a man; those especially which served to give him such a wide, deep hold upon the hearts of others, those which helped to make him one of whom it might well be said—

“The elements were so mixed in him
That Nature might stand up and say—
This was a man.”

And Grace, too, might stand up and say—
And this man was a Christian—taught of the cross of Jesus—imbued and animated throughout by the Spirit of Him “who came not to be ministered unto but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many.”

WILLIAM HANNA.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH OF DR. GUTHRIE.

OUR readers, we are sure, must regret deeply that Dr. Hanna's state of health and absence from Edinburgh have prevented him from extending the tender tribute which he has paid to his late colleague in the preceding paper. It is mainly as a supplement to Dr. Hanna's recollections that I proceed to state briefly, in chronological order, the leading occurrences of his life.

The name of Guthrie, like that of Argyll, is a consecrated name in Scotland. In the same week in which the Marquis of Argyll was beheaded (May and June, 1661), James Guthrie, one of the most eminent and godly ministers of the Church of Scotland, who had been convicted of high treason, though most unjustly, was hanged in Edinburgh. He met his death with singular composure, commending Christ with all his heart to the people, and appropriating the Nunc dimittis of Simeon as his closing prayer. According to the barbarous custom of the times, his head, separated from the body, was fastened to the gate of the “Nether Bow,” where it remained for a long time; and a story was current that on one occasion, as the King's Commissioner was passing through the gate, some drops of blood from the martyr's head fell upon his carriage, which could by no means be wiped out.* Whether Dr. Guthrie was or was not a descendant of James Guthrie the martyr, he was, at all events, of the same stock; and as he often referred with a glow of triumph to the martyr and his noble self-sacrifice, it may well be believed that he drew some inspiration from his example in the consecration of his own life to Christ.

A branch of the Guthries has been connected with the town of Brechin, in Forfarshire, ever since these martyr-times. Strictly, we ought to call Brechin a city, for it was the seat of a bishopric and of a cathedral church, founded by David I.; but it never grew to such dimensions as to make the more pretentious title sound very natural. In an antiquarian point of view, it is memorable for a round tower of solid masonry, still standing close by the cathedral, built in times too remote for record—a structure not uncommon in Ireland, but of which only two now exist in Scotland. The father of Dr. Guthrie was a merchant and banker in Brechin, and like several other members of the family, was chosen to fill the office of chief magistrate. Thomas Guthrie was born on 12th July, 1803, and was one of the youngest members of a large family. From Brechin he was sent to the University of Edinburgh; but at an age far too young to enable him to attain any distinction as a student. From an early period of his life he had resolved to study for the ministry of the Church of Scotland, and after completing the usual course he was duly licensed as a preacher of the Gospel by the Presbytery of Brechin, in 1825.

Dr. Guthrie was one of that long list of eminent Christian men who have owed to a godly mother their first impressions of Christian truth. “With my mother's milk,” he said, in a speech in the General Assembly of the Free Church in 1863, “I drank in an abhorrence of patronage, and it was at her knees that I first learned to pray, that I learned to form a reverence for the Bible as the inspired Word of God; that I learned to hold the sanctity of the Sabbath; that I learned the peculiarities of the Scottish religion; that I learned my regard for the principles of civil and religious liberty, which have made me ever hate oppression and resist the oppressor."

How deeply and fondly he cherished the memory of this excellent woman, who may well take rank with the Anthonys, the Nonnas, the Mærinas, and the Monicas of the early church, was shown on one of the last days of his life, when deeming that he drew nigh to the better land, he spoke with delight of the prospect of seeing his mother, as well as an infant child, the only member of his own family that preceded him, whom he fancied running to meet and welcome him at the golden gate. In one of his contributions to this Magazine Dr. Guthrie recorded the deep impression made on him by the character of another relative, a godly farmer, who had reached the age of eighty years, at the time of his recollection: "His appearance was at all times venerable, but at the table, when seated beside his aged partner, bowed down and blind with years,—also a devout Christian, though of stern mould, who fasted one whole day each week, nor ever told husband or children why,—his manner when he asked the blessing rose into the sublime. Uncovering his aged head, taking off the broad bonnet, which, the fashion of his early days, he wore to the last, he turned his face upward with an expression of deep solemnity. There was a moment's silence, as if he was gathering up all his mind to enter the presence of the Heavenly Majesty. And when the blessing came forth in slow, and measured, and trembling accents, what a contrast it afforded to the mumbled, curt, hurried 'For what we are to receive, the Lord make us thankful,' we often hear. The words were few and well chosen, but there was that in the old man's voice, face, and manner which communicated feelings of solemnity even to thoughtless childhood, the venerable worshipper looking like one who stood before the throne, and saw the august Being whom he addressed."

On being licensed as a preacher, Mr. Guthrie appeared for the first time in the pulpit of the parish or cathedral church of Brechin. One who heard him on that occasion has informed me that his manner then gave no indication of that eminence as a preacher which he was afterwards to attain.

His text was from the words, "Did ye never read in the Scriptures, The stone which the builders rejected, the same is become the head-stone of the corner? This is the Lord's doing, and it is marvellous in our eyes." The delivery is said to have been somewhat rough; but neither then, nor on any future occasion in his life (except a few times experimentally when he was in ill health), did he read his discourse. In another respect, his first sermon was a fit representation of all that followed—it set forth the true foundation of the sinner's acceptance, and probably consisted of the pith and substance of the gospel message.

Brechin Cathedral and Tower.

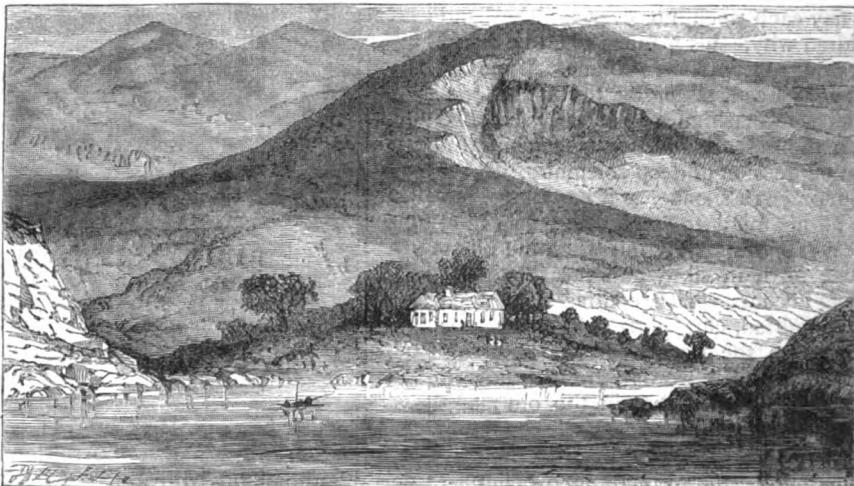

At length, in 1830, Mr. Guthrie received a presentation to the parish of Arbirlot, in the neighbourhood of Arbroath. "Arbirlot," to use his own description in this magazine, "hung on a slope that gently declined to the sandy shores of the German Ocean. There was wood enough to ornament the landscape, but not to intercept the fresh breezes, that curling and cresting the waves, blew landward from the sea, or swept down seaward from heights loaded with the fragrance of mown hay, or blooming beanfields, or moors golden with the flowers of the gorse." It was a purely agricultural parish, with a population of about a thousand, so well educated that but one grown-up person could not read, so regular in religious duty that but one person did not attend church, and so free from intemperance that the one public-house depended chiefly for its customers on the neighbouring town. "The moral aspects were much in harmony with the physical, of a scene where the fields yielded abundant harvests, and the air, loaded with the fragrant perfume of flowers, sung to the song of larks and woodland birds, and long lines of breakers gleamed and boomed upon the shore, and ships with white sails flecked the blue ocean, and the Bell Rock tower stood on its rim to shoot cheerful beams athwart the gloom of night, a type of that church which, our guide to the desired haven, is founded on a rock, and fearless of the rage of storms."

These seven years of Mr. Guthrie's incumbency of Arbirlot were memorable in the history of the parish. A new parish church was erected, and a new manse for the minister; but better than these, new life began to stir in the hearts of the people. To this day there lingers in the parish the tradition of a Bible class which the minister conducted after service on Sundays. His activity in organizing Sunday-schools is also remembered, as well as his assiduity in all his pastoral duties, and his interest in all that concerned the temporal as well as the spiritual welfare of the people. And here Mr. Guthrie began to study in earnest the art of preaching. Observing the tendency of some of the people to drowsiness, he resolved that whatever else he might do, he would compel them to attend. For this purpose he taught himself to look them right in the face, and go through them, as it were, with his eyes. Watching to see what parts of his sermons were most interesting to them, he discovered that it was his illustrations, and he determined to cultivate that department most assiduously. In the Bible class already referred to, he went over the sermon just delivered, and found readily what parts of it were understood and remembered, and what parts were not, skilfully guiding himself in future by the experience he thus gained.

The fame of Mr. Guthrie as a preacher was now fast spreading. Even to Edinburgh the news had gone that a broad-speaking Forfarshire man, in a Forfarshire parish, was doing great wonders among the people, and a vacancy having taken place in the collegiate charge of Old Greyfriars, some persons were beginning to wonder whether he was the suitable man. The late Mr. Murray Dunlop had gone down to Arbirlot, and now helped to spread the fame of Mr. Guthrie in Edinburgh. A sufficient number of names in his favour was obtained in the congregation, to place his name in a short list from which the Town Council were to select. It turned out, however, that he refused to come to preach in the church—a great discouragement to his friends. His chief opponent was the Rev. Mr. Clark, who was afterwards appointed to St. Andrew's Church—the brother-in-law of the late Lord Rutherford, who became one of Mr. Guthrie's most admiring hearers. The election of Mr. Guthrie by the Council was secured by a small majority, and in due time, in 1837, he was translated from Arbriot to the church and parish of Old Greyfriars.

We have again only to turn to the pages of this Magazine to get Dr. Guthrie's own description of his new sphere of labour. He tells how one gloomy day, in the fall of the year, he stood on the South Bridge, looking down on the foul crowded closes that stretch like ribs down into the Cowgate. "The streets were a puddle; the heavy air, loaded with smoke, was thick and murky; right below lay the narrow street of dingy tenements, whose toppling chimneys and patched and battered roofs were apt emblems of the fortunes of most of its tenants. Of these, some were lying over the sills of windows, innocent of glass, or stuffed with old hats and dirty rags; others, coarse-looking women, with squalid children in their arms, or at their feet, stood in groups at the close-mouths, here with empty laughter, chaffing any passing acquaintance, then screaming each other down in a drunken brawl, or standing sullen and silent, with hunger and ill-usage in their saddened looks. A brewer's cart, threatening to crush beneath its ponderous wheels the ragged urchins who had no other play-ground, rumbled over the causeway,—drowning the quavering voice of one whose drooping head and scanty dress were ill in harmony with song, but not drowning the shrill pipe of an Irish girl who thumped the back of an unlucky donkey, and cried her herrings at three a penny. So looked the parish I had come to cultivate; and while contrasting the scene below with pleasant recollections of a parish I had just left—its singing larks, daisied pastures, hedges of hoary thorn, fragrant beanfields, and smiling gardens, decent peasants, stalwart lads and blooming lasses, and the grand blue sea rolling its lines of snowy breakers on the shore,—my rather sad and sombre ruminations were suddenly checked. A hand was laid on my shoulder. I turned round, to find Dr. Chalmers at my elbow. . . . Contemplating the scene for a little in silence, all at once, with his broad Luther-like face glowing with enthusiasm, he waved his arm to exclaim, 'A beautiful field, sir; a very fine field of operation.'"

In this "very fine field," Mr. Guthrie set nobly and most assiduously to work, and for several years his parochial labours in these dingy and repulsive tenements were unceasing. The earnestness of his work in the Cowgate was the more remarkable that the Greyfriars' church was already crowded with admiring hearers, comprising many of the élite of the new town of Edinburgh. The third Sunday on which he preached, the passages were crowded, and so they continued to be, whenever he officiated, to his very last appearance in the pulpit. But his heart lay with the poor. To elevate them from their degradation was constantly his aim; and as Greyfriars was a collegiate charge and his services in its pulpit were needed but once a day, he opened the old and venerable Magdalene chapel in the Cowgate, and preached there to the poorest of the poor. It is only the want of space that prevents us from quoting his description of this ancient sanctuary, where John Knox and his coadjutors held their first general assembly, and which has passed through so many changes of fortune, and been put to such a variety of uses in its day. In the Magdalene chapel the rule was, that the people of the district were to be accommodated with seats before the strangers, who could not be kept from flocking to the chapel; and it was often remembered as a singular sight—rows of gentleman in broadcloth and ladies in silk, standing patiently, while labourers in fustian and women in limp and faded cotton passed along to occupy the seats.

It had always been intended that the Greyfriars' Church should be uncollegiated, and a new church and parish given to Mr. Guthrie. The parish of St. John's was accordingly erected, the church being built, to a considerable degree, through the help of a donation of about £1,700 from the managers of the Savings' Bank, made up of certain odd halfpence in calculating interest, not added to the sum at the credit of the depositors. The arrangement of the seats in St. John's showed how thoroughly Dr. Guthrie was devoted to the interests of the poor. The area of the building was to be allocated to the parishioners, and the ladies and gentlemen were to be accommodated in the pews in the galleries, for which, but only for which, a considerable seat-rent was exacted. The arrangement was a fine moral testimony to the value of the souls of the poor, conceived in the spirit of St. James, and was particularly valuable at a time when it was desired to show that the Established Church was the church of the poor as well as of the rich. The experiment, however, was short-lived. Hardly had Mr. Guthrie taken possession of St. John's when the shadow of the impending disruption of the Church of Scotland began to fall. In the controversy that preceded that event he took a most lively interest. His sympathy for the people, and his regard for their souls, roused his opposition to the high-handed exercise of patronage which was attempting to intrude unacceptable ministers on congregations unanimously opposed to them. Not less was he distressed at the attempt of the civil courts to interfere, as he believed, with the freedom of the Church, and to prevent her from giving effect in spiritual matters to what she believed to be her Master's will.

No doubt, as he afterwards remarked, there were faults on both sides. "They gave us hard knocks sometimes, and we gave back hard words, when, I believe, we should have held our tongues." For the rights of the people and the freedom of the Church, no man was more strenuous than Mr. Guthrie. He went to Strathbogie and preached there in defiance of an interdict from the Court of Session, when as he knew, if complaint were made, he must be sent to prison for the offence. At the great public meetings that preceded the disruption, no voice was more eloquent than his, and no heart more brave, in urging his brethren and the people to be steadfast to their principles. Much though he had valued the advantages of an establishment, he valued far higher the rights of the people and the freedom of the Church. In May, 1843, when the legislature had given their ultimatum, he was in the very van of the new movement. Already his heart was stirred to its depths by the sufferings of some of the country ministers, and we can conceive the idea of the manse scheme fitting vaguely across his mind as he poured out his feelings in regard to a case that had been reported:—

"There is a parish in Scotland where there is a minister who has a sister, a brother, and a venerable mother under his roof. That mother was a minister's daughter, that mother was a minister's sister, that mother was a minister's wife, and now she is a minister's widow. And, sir, that man of God, that man of holiness, must carry away his venerable mother, with the grey hairs of age upon her head, who never knew a home on earth but a manse, he must drive her away because not even a Highland sheiling can be got to lay her head in, he must send her away seventy long miles from the scene of his own labours. Will not Scotland cry shame on the man who compels him to do this?"

Notwithstanding the vehemence of his feeling on this occasion, roused as it was by the thought of a brother's suffering, his heart was already fondly cherishing those catholic yearnings after unity, or at least co-operation among all good men, which, throughout his life, were among his most characteristic feelings. Referring to the voluntary controversy, in connection with the seventeenth chapter of St. John, which had been read at the beginning of the meeting, he said:—

"What is first and foremost in that prayer? What is mentioned once, twice, thrice, four, and even five times,—'that they all may be one, as we are one.' I will never rest contented, I will never cease to pray and work till that end is achieved; and as I do so, I will bury in oblivion the memory of former controversies. Yes, sir, O that the day were come when I might meet with my brethren over the grave of all former controversies, that we might shake hands and join hearts, and be one in Christ Jesus; one regiment, bearing the same colours, and going forth like an army mighty for battle, against one common and tremendous foe!"

In 1845, two years after the disruption, the Free Church Assembly set itself very earnestly to procure the erection of manse throughout the whole Church, for the accommodation of the country ministers. The management of this very extensive undertaking was committed to Mr. Guthrie. The object was to erect some five or six hundred houses, many of them in very poor localities—Highland glens and islands—where such an undertaking would have utterly baffled the congregations. It was resolved to grapple with the scheme by means of two funds,—a general fund for the whole Church, and a local fund for each congregation. The general fund was fixed at £100,000; and, considering that the people during the last two years had been raising fund after fund, for all manner of purposes,—church-building, sustentation, missions, schools, colleges, and what not,—it needed no ordinary boldness even to name a fresh appeal for such an amount. Never did warrior gird on his armour with more alacrity and purpose-like energy than Mr. Guthrie prepared for this great undertaking. The year 1845-6 was devoted to it; for twelve months he was separated from his flock and his family; he travelled over the country from Maidenkirk to John o' Groat's, held public meetings night after night, preached on Sundays, called on all who were likely to advance the scheme, demonstrated its necessity, and painted in glowing terms the blessings it would confer; and while doing this, he was at the same time counselling and encouraging the ministers and people, many of whom were considerably disheartened by the difficulties they had to encounter. Through God's blessing on his labours, he was able to assure the General Assembly of 1846 that the amount subscribed largely exceeded the proposed £100,000, being no less than £116,370 14s. 1d. But this magnificent result was not achieved without a legacy of evil; the strain had been too great even for the physical strength of Mr. Guthrie; symptoms of heart disease began to show themselves; two years after, an acute attack was experienced; in fact, the disease was contracted which, though kept under for many years, at last laid him low; not, indeed, till he had touched the term of threescore years and ten, but at the same time sooner by several years than a frame so unusually powerful might otherwise have been expected to succumb.

For some time after the disruption, Mr. Guthrie's congregation met in the Methodist Chapel; but by-and-by, St. John's Free Church was built and opened, and Dr. Guthrie's popularity as a preacher became greater than ever.

Of his pulpit oratory Dr. Hanna has given so vivid a description as to leave no room for further remark. It may be well, however, to call attention once again to the great blessing from above that often attended his sermons. There is no room here for details; but there is ample reason to believe that many an arrow, shot at a venture, stuck fast in the heart of some hearer. Unbelievers and indifferent men and women were sometimes arrested by the truth; persons of the upper class, who had been given to mere frivolity, became earnest in the work of faith and labour of love; and many young men received either their first impressions, or such an impulse in the ways of godliness, as turned them into devoted servants of the Lord. When Dr. Hanna, as colleague-pastor of St. John's, organized a new congregation in the Pleasance some years afterwards, on the principles so powerfully advocated by his father-in-law, Dr. Chalmers, it must have been a great gratification to both the pastors that the first minister was a young man who had received spiritual benefit from Dr. Guthrie's ministry—one who has proved a most laborious and highly successful minister of the gospel.

I have been told that the only occasion on which Dr. Guthrie was ever seriously opposed by the elders of his congregation was in a proposal which he submitted to them to turn to account in a particular way a large unoccupied schoolroom under his church. The idea of a ragged school had taken possession of his mind, and his first thought was that in this schoolroom such a school should be opened in connection with the congregation. I do not know what the difficulties were which drew forth the opposition of the elders, but the result was one in which the whole Christian world must rejoice; that instead of a comparatively obscure congregational school, he was led to institute one on a more catholic basis, and to appeal to the whole Christian community for the means of carrying it on. The effect of this change of plan was indeed very wonderful. A standard was unfurled, under which many good men, who had parted company in their church connection, were enabled to meet; a great platform of Christian co-operation was brought into prominence, and the ecclesiastical atmosphere was manifestly sweetened. On Dr. Guthrie himself the effect was great. Henceforward, whilst quite loyal to his own Church, he became more a catholic man—the common property, as it were, of the whole evangelical community.

No one will need to be told how it was that a man of Mr. Guthrie's heart, who could never look with out pain on the suffering of another, familiar as he was with the Cowgate and its wretched closes, should have caught at the idea of schools where ragged, starving children should have a dinner as well as a lesson. In his "Plea for Ragged Schools," which afterwards became so celebrated, Dr. Guthrie vividly pictures in the Grassmarket the class that it was designed to benefit.

"On a summer day, when in the blessed sunshine and warm air, misery itself will sing; dashing in and out of these closes, careering over the open ground, engaged in their rude games, arrayed in flying drapery, here a leg out and there an arm, are crowds of children; their thin faces tell how ill they are fed, their fearful oaths tell how ill they are reared; and yet the merry laugh and hearty shout, and screams of delight, as some unfortunate urchin at leap-frog measures his length along the ground, also tell that God made childhood to be happy, and that in the buoyancy of youth, even misery will forget itself.

"We get hold of one of these boys. Poor fellow! it is a bitter day, he has neither shoes nor stockings; his naked feet are red, swollen, cracked, ulcerated with the cold; a thin, thread-worm jacket, with its gaping rents, is all that protects his breast; beneath his shaggy head of hair he shows a face sharp with want, yet sharp also with intelligence beyond his years. This poor fellow has learned already to be self-supporting. He has studied the arts—he is a master of imposture, lying, begging, stealing; and small blame to him, but much to those who have neglected him, he had otherwise pined and perished. So soon as you have satisfied him that you are not connected with the police, you ask him, 'Where is your father?' Now, hear his story; and there are hundreds could tell a similar tale. 'Where is your father?' 'He is dead, sir.' 'Where is your mother?' 'Dead too.' 'Where do you stay?' 'Sister and I and my little brother stay with Granny.' 'What is she?' 'She is a widow woman.' 'What does she do?' 'Sells sticks, sir.' 'And can she keep you all?' 'No.' 'Then how do you live?' 'Go about and get bits of bread, sell matches, and sometimes get a trifle from the carriers for running an errand.' 'Do you go to school?' 'No, never was at school; attended sometimes a Sabbath school, but hadn't been there for a long time.' 'Do you go to church?' 'Never was in a church.' 'Do you know who made you?' 'Yes, God made me.' 'Do you say your prayers?' 'Yes, mother taught me a prayer before she died; and I say it to Granny afore I lie down.' 'Have you a bed?' 'Some straw, sir.'

More than five-and-twenty years have made us so familiar with this sad phase of life that it is difficult to realise the impression when, like the first traveller's account of some unexplored country, these sketches were given to the public. Of the "Plea," edition followed edition almost as fast as the press could throw them off, and that mighty tide of sympathy and support set in on behalf of the Ragged School which has hardly ebbed during all the interval. The proposal in the "Plea" was to establish schools in which the children should be fed as well as taught, but for the most part allowed to return at night to the houses of their parents. The education to be given was emphatically declared to include instruction in the gospel, and the whole "Plea" was constructed on the principle that no power short of the grace and love of God, as there revealed and applied, could suffice to reclaim these miserable outcasts. But this proved the rock of offence to some. In their great liberality they thought that the miserable waifs, whose condition in nine cases out of ten was due to the profligacy of their parents, ought as a sacred duty to be brought up in the religion of these parents. It was somehow quite right to teach them to discard the morals of their parents, and the habits of their parents, and the example and lessons of their parents in stealing, in idling, in drinking, and all kinds of debauchery. But the religion of their parents—that was a different thing—that was to be held in inviolable honour. Dr. Guthrie and his friends maintained that when they undertook the training of these poor waifs they assumed toward them the duty and responsibility of parents, and were bound to teach them as they would teach their own children—to teach them what they believed to be the saving truth of God. The case came to a battle. Trumpets called to arms, in the shape of requisitions to the Lord Provost to call a meeting, and have the matter discussed. A meeting was accordingly summoned, and on the 2nd July, 1847, the duel came off in the Music Hall. The encounter began by the late Lord Murray setting forth the objections of his friends and himself to the principle of the school in religious training. Mr. Guthrie met the charge in one of his most powerful and telling speeches.

"What is my position?" he asked, "in regard to these outcast children? I deny the right of the priesthood—I deny it before God or man—I deny the right of any man, be he parson, or priest, or clerk, or whatever he choose, to stand between a perishing sinner and God's saving word. Mark how I stand. I say that the responsibility for the religious upbringing of the child lies upon the parents; and if there be no parents, or none to act a parent's part—if the parent be a worthless, profligate, wicked, cruel, monstrous mother—on whom does the responsibility next lie? I join issue with the Catholic here. He says that it lies with the priest; I say it lies with the good Samaritan who acts the parent's part. . . . Let me put a case. A ship has stranded on the stormy shore. I strip, and plunging headlong into the billows, buffet them with this strong arm till I reach the wreck. From the rigging where he hangs, I seize and save a boy; I bear him to the shore; and through the crowd who watched my rising and falling head, and blessed me with their prayers, I take him home. What happens now? Forth steps a Roman Catholic priest, and, forsooth, because yon ship contained its Irish emigrants, claims the child—the half-drowned boy that clings to his preserver's side; he would spoil me of my orphan and rear him up in what I deem dangerous errors. I have two answers to this demand. My first is, I saved the boy. The hand that plucked him from the wreck is the hand that shall lead him in the way to heaven. My second is, to point him to the wreck, and to the roaring sea. I bid him strip and plunge like me, and save those that still perish there."

If it were possible to speak in a Christian sense of "the proudest moment of one's life," I believe that in Dr. Guthrie's case such a moment must have been when, on a show of hands being taken at the close of this meeting, a whole forest was held up for his motion, and five only for that of Lord Murray. It was a signal thing to have carried a vast assembly so thoroughly, and drawn from them an all but unanimous testimony in favour of Bible instruction as an integral part of the training of this new school. Nor do I suppose that his satisfaction was diminished when his opponents set up another school, to be conducted on the principle of combined secular and separate religious instruction. For he had frankly recognised their right to do so if they chose to plunge into the sea and bear to shore in their own arms some of those that were yet clinging to the wreck; and he believed that, in certain circumstances, combined secular and separate religious training was the only method of instruction that could be followed. What for his own part he never could acquiesce in was, that when he had been virtually constrained to adopt a neglected child, and to do him a parent's part, he should be prevented from trying to train him in the knowledge of that blessed salvation which it was his first duty and most anxious wish and prayer to impart to his own children at home.

I believe that the success of his ragged school and of many similar schools was one of the great joys of his life, and one of the things that contributed mainly to make that life so radiant and happy. Everything about ragged school movements charmed him. To read the statistics of the jail, and find how juvenile commitments had dwindled; to survey the streets and see how comparatively free they were of young beggars and wandering gamins; to follow the history of some boy or girl to Canada or Australia, and learn how well they were doing; to get letters from them, quaint and queer, but full of gratitude and sound principle; to hear the story of a death-bed, of the "bairns' hymns" the little sufferer sang, and the hope in Jesus that brightened the departing spirit; to receive calls from well-to-do people, and have cheques for fifty or a hundred pounds for the ragged school placed in his hands; to get letters from maid-servants, or from soldiers or sailors, enclosing the tiny money order that sent a month's pay or half-year's wage for the support of a destitute child—such occurrences were like streams from Lebanon, or cold waters to a thirsty soul. The ragged school was indeed "a very fine field of operation"—it was a thing of beauty, and a joy for ever.

But ragged schools did not exhaust his affection. There was not a social movement, contemplating the good of the people, that did not awaken his interest, and as opportunity was offered, enlist his support. In his first Plea, there occurs a quotation from "the Antiquary"—one of his favourite story books, that seems to me to reveal a great deal of his mind—a great deal of what he thought about the temptations incident to the hard life of the working classes, and the extreme desirableness, in a Christian as well as a common point of view, of the elevation of their temporal condition. The laird and Maggie are haggling about a fish bargain. "I'll gie them," says Maggie, "and—and—and—half a dozen partans to mak the sauce, for three shillings and a dram." "Half-a-crown, and a dram, Maggie," replies the laird. "Aweel, your Honour maun hae't your ain gait, nae doot; but a dram's worth siller now,—the distilleries is no working." "And I hope they'll never work again in my time," said Oldbuck. "Aye, aye, it's easy for your Honour, and the like o' you gentle folks, to say sae, that hae stouth and routh, and fire and finding, and meat and clait, and sit dry and cannie by the fireside; but an' ye wanted fire, and meat, and dry claise, and were deein' o' cauld, and had a sair heart,—whilk is warst ava!—wi' jist tippence in your pouch,—wadna' ye be glad to buy a dram wi't, to be ealdin' and claise, and a supper and heart's ease into the bargain, till the morn's morning?"

Well did Dr. Guthrie know the truth of this; and from the depths of his heart he desired success to every scheme of social improvement that, by modifying the hardships of a life of labour, tended to diminish the disastrous temptations of "the dram."

A serious illness in 1848 led to his receiving the invaluable aid of Dr. Hanna as colleague-pastor of St. John's. In 1849 the University of Edinburgh conferred on him the degree of Doctor of Divinity, the single distinction that was ever attached to his name.

It was not till 1855, when he had passed his fiftieth year, that he came out as the author of a book. We have no space to speak of him as an author, and can only state that "The Gospel in Ezekiel," dedicated to Dr. Hanna, appeared in that year, and that the sale in this country has exceeded 40,000 copies. "Christ and the Inheritance of the Saints," dedicated to his friend Lord Panmure, now Earl! of Dalhousie, appeared in 1853. The list of his publications includes nearly twenty volumes, and of those "Out of Harness," and "The Parables read in the Light of the Present Day," appeared in GOOD WORDS; and "Our Father's Business," "Studies of Character from the Old Testament" (two series), "The Angels' Song," "Sundays on the Continent," and "Saving Knowledge," were mainly collections of contributions to the SUNDAY MAGAZINE.

In 1864 a renewed attack of illness obliged him to retire wholly from the active duties of his charge. The interdict of the doctors debaring him from pulpit and platform for the remainder of his days, was as hard to bear as the interdict of the Court of Session against his opening his lips in Strathbogie, and seemed like a sentence of imprisonment for life. The spirit was still willing for work, though the flesh was weak. The fire burned in his soul with unabated intensity, and struggled for utterance, as it does in all born orators and in all men whose lips have been touched with the live coal from off the altar. But he was enabled to discipline himself into submission, wondering to what use his Master might design to put the last years of his life.

It was at this very time that the proprietors of the SUNDAY MAGAZINE communicated with him on the subject of their projected journal, and offered him the post of editor. The proposal was a somewhat startling one, and at first he shrunk from it. He was unfamiliar with the duties of editorship, and not in much strength to grapple with them. But when he learned that all possible aid would be given him in the details of editorship, and that many like-minded men were willing to co-operate with him in the undertaking, he accepted the offer. Having been one of those who, to a certain extent—a limited extent—aided him from the beginning, I gladly embrace the opportunity of bearing testimony to the singular generosity and confidence with which he treated me. In the general management of the Magazine there were two features of his character which were always apparent—his manifold philanthropy and his catholic spirit. It was a delight to him to see on the cover of the Magazine the names of the good men of so many denominations,—a symbol, as it were, of that united church of the future to which he looked forward so ardently. His own papers, like everything he said and did, were thoroughly based on evangelical doctrine, though generally with more in them of the human and the catholic than in most evangelical writings. It may interest our readers to know that his last piece of work was to prepare for the press a paper, "The Lepers' Lesson," which will appear in the next number of this Magazine. During his last days he selected from his manuscripts a number of sermons designed for publication in these pages.

The last letter I received from him expressed his satisfaction that some difficulties in the way of my continuing to help him had been removed. We shall want the invaluable benefit of his counsel, his influence, his prayers, and of that singularly cheering spirit that, by a kind of magic spell, made one forgetful alike of labours and anxieties. But in other respects the magazine will be conducted as it has been during the last seven months. And in the sermons which he selected for its pages at St. Leonard's, with his dying hand, he, being dead, will yet speak to its readers. It may be mentioned that, taking a hint from the recent book of Sir Henry Holland, he had been engaged for some time in preparing an autobiography, which he had brought down to 1843. This will be published, along with a continuation of his life by two of his sons, to whom he bequeathed the charge of his manuscripts.

Our space is nearly exhausted, and what remains must be given to his last days. For a year his health had been very much broken; and in October he had an attack which had all the appearance of proving fatal. Contrary to expectation, he rallied, though he never gained such strength as to give a fair assurance of recovery. Our readers know of his journey to St. Leonard's, in the hope of prolonging his days, and the fatal attack which almost immediately ensued. The week between the 16th and 24th February was one of great suffering and great struggle. With literal truth he might have said, "I die daily." It was a fight all the week, between a strong frame and a strong disease. He never murmured, but he felt the struggle intensely. At an earlier period of his illness he referred with something like envy to the death of his martyr-kinsman, James Guthrie, and said how much more desirable it would be to have life ended by a single blow than by an almost endless succession of pains and struggles. Later, he said that he had wished for a translation like that of Chalmers or that of Andrew Thomson; but it appeared that it had been ordered otherwise. On his death-bed the expressions of affection for his family and friends, and of his trust and hope in the Saviour were exceedingly touching and beautiful. That striking poetical faculty which had given such beauty to his oratory in life, lent its charm to some of his sayings in death. Calling for a mirror that he might look whether his features showed any sign of the approaching change, he said he was like a sailor going aloft to look out for signs of land. One day, his sight being somewhat confused, he said it was like the land-birds lighting on the mast that pre-sage to the weary mariner the nearness of the desired haven. Referring to the kindness of a Highland girl who had nursed him in his sickness, he said, "Affection is very sweet; and it is all one from whatever quarter it comes—whether from this Highland lassie or from a peeress—just as to a thirsty man cold water is equally grateful from a spring on the hillside or from a richly ornamented fountain." "Death," he said on another occasion, "is mining away here, slowly but surely, in the dark." His affection could not be suppressed, even in the lowest stage of exhaustion. To most persons when dying a child in the room would be somewhat of a trouble; but the sight of a little grandchild of four years was to him full of interest. "Put her up," he said the moment he saw her; and when, having been lifted up to the bed, she crept up to him and kissed him, he nodded to her and whispered, "My bonnie lamb." During his illness he was often soothed by hymn and psalm-singing, and of none was he more fond than children's hymns. "Give me a bairns' hymn," he would say to his children, and when they sung "Jesus, tender Shepherd, hear me," or "There is a happy land," his spirit was refreshed. He often thanked God that he had not left his preparation to a dying hour, and spoke of the unutterable folly of those who do so. To those absent he sent loving messages, saying to one of them, "Stand up for Christ in all circumstances." The peace and confidence of his deathbed completed and crowned that testimony to the saving power of Jesus, which in his words and his works alike had been borne by his life. At length early on the morning of Monday the 24th February, the long-desired haven came in sight. The Highland servant who supported him in her arms, observed the signal. "The wrinkles," she said, "are smoothing away." At twenty minutes past two the breathing ceased. He entered the house not made with hands.

The funeral in Edinburgh, in the classic ground of the Grange Cemetery, amid a concourse of some thirty thousand spectators, was a marvellous testimony of the regard in which he was held.

Dr. Guthrie, when he went to Arbirlot, married Anne, daughter of the Rev. James Burns of Brechin, the cousin of William Burns the missionary, and kinswoman of many other well-known ministers. We are restrained by the wish not to be obtrusive; but many know well what a blessing she was to her husband and children; with what completeness of devotion she gave herself to care for him, especially when sickness had set its mark on him; and what a rich reward she enjoyed—unspeakably precious to think of, even in her bereavement—in the warm love of her husband, and the sight of a large and almost unbroken family of ten, all full of the desire to do honour to their father's name, and to walk in his steps.

SONNET—DR. GUTHRIE'S FUNERAL.

THE city weeps: with slow and solemn show
 The dark-plumed pomp sails through the crowded way,
 And walls and roofs are topped with thick display
 Of waiting eyes that watch the wending woe.
 What man was here, to whose last fateful march
 The marshalled throng its long-drawn convoy brings,
 Like some great conqueror's, when victory swings
 Her vans, o'er flower-spread path, and wreathèd arch?
 No conqueror's kind was here, nor conqueror's kin,
 But a strong-breasted, fervid-hearted man,
 Who from dark dens redeemed, and haunts of sin,
 The city waifs, the loose unfathered clan,
 With prouder triumph than when wondering Rome
 Went forth, all eyes, to bring great Cæsar home.

A Story of Struggles and Hopes.

PART III.—MILLCENT'S ROMANCE, AND WHAT IT WAS MADE OF.

CHAPTER VII.—DARKNESS AND DAWN.

DAVID
kneeled
side of his bed with the horrible local newspaper in his hand.
He was guided by the same instincts
led the

dean monarch up to the Temple of the Lord to spread out Rabshakeh's letter before the mercy-seat. There is a bitterness which cannot be uttered even in a prayer. We can only show it to God.

There he kneeled, nameless, and with a new shadow resting even on the name that he bore from custom. There lay the local Mercury, with its cruel readiness to make capital out of a shameful story about the dead, which could serve no purpose, except to pain the survivors. There could be no mistake as to who was referred to in its paragraph, though dashes were liberally employed, and X, Y, and Z, the only initials used. The phrases of "recently deceased medical man," "questionable popularity," "peculiar domestic arrangements," gave it an individuality which nobody who knew anything about Blenheim House could fail to recognise. Nor could David dare to doubt the particular instance of sin—sin, revolting and futile—which the newspaper reported. The revelation shed a flood of light over Phoebe's mystifications,—and over the friendly doctor's disinclination to any professional connection with himself.

II. N.S.

We must all look at trouble somewhere. The only question is, where? Shall it be in the glare of our own passions? Or in the cold hard light of the world's opinion? Or in the softened glory of God's presence? Or in the last light does not hide any hard facts which the others could reveal. It does not even veil their ugliness. Hideous things look more hideous in the sunshine than in gaslight or candlelight. But the sunshine has a promise in it. It says, "I will dry up this stagnant pool." "I will clothe this yawning chasm with sweet flowers and soft mosses." "I will bring beauty out of burning: I will bring life out of death." So it is with the glory of God's presence.

As David kneeled there, sin and sorrow and shame, empty present and darkened future, passed before him, and showed themselves exactly what they were. God's proper gifts are sight, not blindness, memory, not forgetfulness, clear comprehension, not dull credulity. Because David drew near to God, he only saw more plainly all the happiness that might have been, and all the misery that was, and must be. For God himself knows, better than any of us, what our lives have lost. And what a comfort it is to know that He knows!

Kneeling there, too, he remembered the text which lay hidden in the secret drawer of the old bureau, "Delight thyself in the Lord, and He shall give thee the desire of thy heart."

And for a moment a mist closed about his soul.

Only for a moment. And then it cleared gradually. You and I, reader, who perhaps have but one sorrow in a life of happiness, may be left to walk in that mist for years, having only faith and not sight, concerning the brightness above it. God leaves us there, to let us learn that there is something in every sorrow, which no other mere blessing can heal.

But those who have no comfort, God comforts utterly. "When father and mother forsake us, then the Lord taketh us up."

David suddenly felt like one who stands on a mountain overlooking a fierce struggle in a dark valley below. Sin, and sorrow, and shame, empty present and darkened future were there, but they lay below him. There were also beautiful things among them, love and joy, and domestic comfort and worldly prosperity, but they, too, lay below him. They were not the very life of the soul. It might have them all, and yet be dumb and dead in misery. The very life of the soul was something above all these. They might come up to it. It could not go down to them. They could not live well nor long without it. It had them all, and more too, in God himself.

And David felt that as he had gone up himself, he had carried God's promise with him. "Delight thyself in the Lord, and He shall give thee the desires of thy heart." The true desire of his heart now, and henceforward, would be something between God and himself,—something that no earthly chance or change could touch. They might go and come over it, like clouds floating across a mountain, but it would remain the same for ever.

Now, he knew what the Psalmist meant when he said, "Those that trust in thee, Lord, thou shalt hide in the secret of thy presence from the pride of man: thou shalt keep them secretly in a pavilion from the strife of tongues."

Oh, it is in the paths of special sorrow and shame, that the bleeding footprints of the Saviour show the plainest, and we can best plant our own steps therein. And it seemed to David as if he heard a brotherly voice—

"I bore all this and far worse for thee: canst thou not bear this for me? No, thou canst not without me, but I will be with thee, to make thy bearing easy. My cross was made of this cross of thine, and of every other cross that has ever fallen to any man. And there was none to help me to bear mine, for when they compelled Simon of Cyrene, he could only take it from my back, not from my heart. But I will be with thee to bear both thee and thy cross."

That is how God deals with his foundlings; that is how He deals with all of us, if we only break through all barriers of earthly comforts and throw ourselves straight upon his heart. And oh, what tender mercy and loving-kindness there is in such dealing with his foundlings! For unless He was kind to them first, they would repel other kindness. To their sore hearts sympathy would come like a blow, and help like an insult. But He says, "You see I can comfort you, because I am your Father and your Brother, and because these are your brothers too, it is well for them if they can give comfort, and well for you if you can take it from them. All the good things of my royal table are thine already, but let thy brothers hand them to thee. Take them so, gladly and thankfully and patiently. If thy brethren's touch seem sometimes rough, bethink thee it may rather be thy great weakness."

Still kneeling there, with the storm within him hushed, and a great calm in his heart and eyes, David heard Phoebe beginning to go to and fro below, and to make an over-ostentatious rattling of dishes. He would fain have stayed where he was a little longer. He needed no food but the spiritual refreshment he was enjoying. But he thought that he had left Phoebe rather abruptly, and that she would be worrying about him, and that it was unkind to waste her housewifely labours by letting the dinner cool untasted. So he rose; he folded up the newspaper and put it away. He would not burn it, that seemed like helpless spite against an enemy he could not destroy. And then he went down-stairs. He had a curious feeling as if he had parted from somebody—one of those partings where a sacred solemnity enwraps the sorrow as with a robe of consecration. And it was so. He had parted from self. He had given it wholly to God.

Though Phoebe saw he was pale, she saw also that he was calm and cheerful. In a far different sense to what she meant, "he had on his front."

"There's a letter just come for you," she said. "A boy brought it. It's on the parlour table. I don't know who it's from."

David felt the half-recoil of a recently wounded heart, but was reassured in a moment. Whatever happened, all was in God's hands.

The handwriting was quite strange to him, which was no wonder, for it was Christian Harvey's. George had been intending to obey her counsel, and visit Blenheim House that very morning, but had awoke with a severe cold, which would probably confine him at home for some days. In the course of the morning he and Christian had seen the ugly paragraph in the Hackney Mercury, and had conferred together thereon. Visiting David being out of the question, Christian proposed that they should invite him.

"It is a breach of all etiquette," George had said.

"My dear," said Christian, laughing, "let etiquette, as the school-books say of temper, be your servant and not your master. Would you stand on this etiquette if David Maxwell were your brother?"

"But then he would be sure to understand and not to take offence," George answered.

"I think that now," pleaded his wife, "I see your argument, and it would be right in many cases. But I do believe from all I heard of David Maxwell whilst I lived in uncle Devon's vicarage, and from all I have noticed of him since, that he is a true Christian, and quite ready to believe the same of other people, if he can only find the least reason. Therefore he will not suspect me of telling a lie, when I write the truth, that you are unable to leave the house, and he will credit us with the kindly intention of drawing him a little out of his loneliness. I feel sure he will, George, because if he declined the invitation, I feel that I myself shall believe the excuse he gives, and shall not fancy that he has taken a tiff."

"Is that womanly logic?" George asked playfully. "Whether it is or not, there is something in it, Chrissy. So take your own way, and write the note yourself, for you have a wonderful knack of conveying your own kind heart between the lines of the commonest compliment. You have a genius for writing notes, Chrissy."

"I do wonder whether he will come," George remarked, presently, as his wife sat down to her desk.

"I am sure he will," she said.

There was an under-note of meaning in her voice which made George look up, and observe—

"Why, you inconsistent woman! You said just now, that you would quite believe any reason he gave for staying away."

"So I should," said Christian oracularly; "for it would be a very good reason that would keep him away from us."

"Why from us particularly, in the name of wonder?" George asked.

"Because you are Millicent Harvey's brother," his wife answered succinctly, and looked at her husband, who looked back at her. Their own courting days were not so very long past; and George Harvey understood at once.

Somehow he exclaimed, "Poor fellow!" It was not in reference to David's circumstances; for George Harvey did not know very much about them. The details that Milly had heard from Fergus Laurie she had kept to herself. George quite supposed that David would be thrown chiefly on his own resources; but it never struck him that the revelation of that day's Mercury would be almost fatal to his medical pursuits, and so set him back once more at the very beginning of life. But even so, one with George Harvey's past was not very likely to despair of anybody's future. Still, George's first exclamation was, "Poor fellow!" Then he asked, "How do you know about it, wife?"

"By my wisdom," she replied, with a smile that was half sad. "I can't help knowing."

"And does my Chrissy think she will try her skill at a little match-making?" George asked rather gravely.

"No," said Christian quickly, looking up from her letter: "in this particular instance, I almost wish I did. Milly does not care for David Maxwell."

"Not now," said George, rather archly; "but these things grow. I don't think it is doing you justice to say that I fell in love with you the first evening we met at the vicarage. But I may admit that I was deeply impressed. Yet of course you did not care in the least for me till a long time afterwards."

Christian's colour deepened, and she gave just the least little pout. "That has nothing to do with the present instance, sir," she said loftily. "For at any rate I cared for nobody else."

"That implies that Milly does," said George.

His wife gave him another quick look. "I know it," she answered.

"Who is it?" George asked with keen, brotherly interest.

"I shall not tell," replied his wife, laughing.

"Secrets!" said George. "Chrissy, I am ashamed of you. You should hear nothing that you cannot tell your husband."

"I have heard nothing, and seen nothing, except what your majesty's self has also seen and heard," Christian replied. "Yet I know, notwithstanding. I can feel when there's love in the air, just as I can when there's thunder! But I never frighten people by prophesying storms, only just get them to take their waterproofs as a precaution against a possible shower! And so, I just watch the poor things who are getting into love, and help them where I can, without frightening them by telling them what a terrible bit of their life they are coming to!"

"Do you mean to say you know before they know themselves?" George asked.

"Oh, dear, yes—long before," said Christian. "The parties concerned always seem the very last to find it out. Dear Milly does not know in the least!"

"If I may ask so much," George went on, "I should like to inquire if the mysterious somebody is also in love?"

"Well, yes, in his own way," Christian admitted, half reluctantly.

"That is all you can say for him," said George; "and do you think he knows of Milly's liking?"

Christian paused half a moment. "A great deal better than she does herself," she said energetically.

"It is clear to me that if you had your own way, you would depose this favourite and substitute David Maxwell," observed George.

"Yes, I should," said Christian. "But then I have no right even to wish for my own way!"

"You must find it wonderfully interesting to be in secret sympathy with all these matters, Chrissy," George remarked.

Christian shook her head thoughtfully. "It is and it isn't," she answered. "It may be always interesting, but sometimes it is sad too. It is pleasant enough when, in all apparent innocence, one can contrive to convey a little counsel or comfort. But it is dreadfully painful when one daren't say what one knows, and yet see help is needed that can't be given without doing so. But one can always pray, George, and that is really the safest interference in love affairs, at any rate, till all is over, and people want cheering or keeping up to their own best selves."

"I suppose my mother felt that," said George, "for though I know what a deep interest she must have taken in our marriages, it was wonderful how she never gave any advice. In my sister Hatty's love affair, before she married Webber, Milly and I were very ready with our dogmas, but mother was only especially silent and sympathetic, till, as you say, it was all over, by Hatty's own act, and then she made no secret of her approbation."

"Ah!" said Christian, "I have always admired Hatty so much for the courage with which she did what she felt was the right and just thing both for herself and her lover. For it takes a great deal of courage to do it, George. The world does not help one. It either believes that the heroine of a broken match was 'jilted,' or it insinuates that if it be possible the breaking was her own act, then she is no true woman, but a false and fickle coquette. As if the mistake of a foolish engagement could be cured by carrying it on to a foolish marriage! Why, when the love is gone, it is the very kindest thing left to do, to remove the vow which is not yet irrevocable."

"I believe it is," said George thoughtfully. "I remember that Hatty's final refusal seemed to stir up that young Westbrook into a new manliness. I should not have thought it was in him to write such a sensible, sorrowful letter as he wrote to Hatty before he went away. I wonder what has become of him?"

"And now," observed Christian, as she sealed up her letter, "as we are to have a visitor to supper, it is time that I retired to the kitchen to superintend the pudding."

This therefore was the letter which half-an-hour after, David stood reading in his dreary parlour:—

"DEAR MR. MAXWELL,—My husband has been intending to call on you for some days, but delayed, fearing lest he should intrude too soon. Just as he had resolved to procrastinate no more, he finds himself confined to the house by a severe cold. Under these circumstances, we take the freedom of asking if you will give up this evening to us here? We shall be quite alone, and supper will be ready at nine. We both trust you will excuse the great informality of this invitation, and with the assurance of our deepest sympathy,

"I remain, yours faithfully,

"CHRISTIAN HARVEY."

"Phoebe," said David, as she came in to remove the dinner dishes, "I shall be out this evening. I am invited to Mr. George Harvey's."

"I'm glad to hear on't, Mr. David," returned Phoebe sincerely. "Dearie me," she added to herself, as she went down the passage, "he isn't invited out so often but that it's real wonderful it should be this evening. Those Harveys 'll have seen the Mercury. Well, one can do with an enemy, if one's friends closes round 'em. Them Harveys are the right sort of people."

CHAPTER VIII.—OTHER FOLK'S TROUBLES.

THERE was nothing special to relate about David's visit to Mr. and Mrs. George Harvey. Indeed, its charm lay in the absence of anything special. It was an evening "at home," in the true sense of the word. There were just two candles lighted, as there would be when George and Christian were alone. And though Christian sat unemployed during the first hour's conversation, she had a little work-basket at hand directly George brought forward the chess-board. Then, though the supper-table was graced with a pudding, all of its arrangements were of that easy, simple sort which assure a guest that he is neither troublesome nor expensive. It is fitting to make elaborate festival in honour of the friend who can be expected but seldom: the best compliment to the near neighbour who may become the familiar visitor, is to admit him at once to the private style of home. Then the little servant was summoned to family prayer and dismissed to bed, and David felt that the evening which had been such a pleasure to himself had been no hindrance or burden to anybody else.

There was not much "clever" talk. Both George and Christian knew of better mental exercise than metaphysical gymnastics. They preferred to think less about thinking than about the common world around them, and found that upon the whole, this training gave them an immense advantage in the metaphysical gymnasium, whenever they chose to trifle there awhile, just as athletes are made by climbing genuine mountains, not by trudging useless tread-mills. Neither of them were at all averse to such "rounds" as they had taken with Fergus and Milly at the Lauries' tea-party, but they and their opponents set a far different value on them. With George and Christian they were scarcely a means to an end; just a pause in the business of life, to count up the items. With Milly, they were a delight, a holiday, something to which she felt as a child feels to household work while it is still "play," before it has set duties of dusting rooms and bed-making. With Fergus, they were the end. To have grand ideas and to associate with those who had, and to live a life that might be filled with such an atmosphere, was the form into which his ambitions were gradually shaping themselves. He never reflected that even a marble palace, with all its beauty, is not a desirable residence, unless its foundations are sound and right!

The group in George Harvey's parlour talked about very much the same subjects as were probably being discussed in the labourers' cottages just behind their house. They talked of the good works that were going forward in the parish, of the recent proceedings in parliament, of chess tactics, of the quality of the muslin that Christian was embroidering. But it was the talk of cultivated people. A pedant cannot hide his vulgarity in his learning, and thought and refinement will come forward even in chat about dusters and darning-needles, just as a beautiful woman remains beautiful in the homeliest garments.

Even with the shadow of death new upon him, and the still more recent horror of the weekly paper, David was far less silent than he had been at the Lauries. He quite wondered at himself. But the mute of one circle is frequently the wit of another, and the characters that we get are often the reflection of those who give them!

But after they had read the evening lesson, and sung Ken's beautiful Evening Hymn, and kneeled together round the family altar, and the servant was gone, and the curious hush of a completed day closed over the little household, a kind of silence fell upon the three, in which they seemed to draw nearer to each other than in the conversation which had gone before. They spoke in low voices of the chapter which had just been read, and then they sat and gazed into the fire. And they all knew what was in each other's thoughts, and David felt a comfort in the knowledge. It was like the grasp of a friendly hand on a dark and dangerous road. And when he rose to go, he could not depart without letting them see the gratitude with which his heart was overflowing.

"It was so good of you,"—it was Christian he addressed (perhaps it was easier to look into her face, because her eyes were not so like Milly's, as George's were),—"It was so good of you to invite me here to-night. I know why you did it, Mrs. Harvey."

"It was so good of you to come!" Christian answered, with straightforward kindness. "And it has been such a pleasure to us to have you! And I don't think you will be any the worse for it."

David turned away for a moment to regain his voice. George laid his hand kindly on his shoulder. "Come in and see us as often as you can," he said. "I think I shall like to talk over old times with you. I can't do that with many new acquaintances, and I can't make friends without it."

And David was only able to grasp their hands, and rush out into the night. He had said in his heart that morning, "God, though thou slay me, yet will I trust in thee:" and this was God's slaying.

When he regained Blenheim House, he found somebody waiting for him.

"Mr. Laurie's been sitting here a long while," Phœbe said. "I told him I did not think you'd be very late, and so he said he'd stay. No, Master David, he's not in the surgery. He went towards the dining-room, and I thought he might as well, so I stuck a bit of fire in the grate, and giv him the newspaper to amuse hisself with."

Fergus was seated in the easy-chair, with his feet on the fender. It might be but the effect of the great dingy room, or the big black chair, but somehow he looked particularly small and delicate. He jumped up, and responded rather heartily to David's shake of the hand. It was not a habit of his, and David thought the extra warmth was a special sign of friendly sympathy. This young man was David's nearest friend, and David's heart felt so warm and open that he could lay candid claim on his fellow-feeling.

"I suppose you've seen the Mercury to-day, Fergus?" he said. It was a relic and proof of their old boyish intimacy that they always called each other by their Christian names.

"Yes; no. I never read the Mercury—it is not worth the trouble. Oh, I know what you mean, though. I did not see it. But Robina told me. It won't matter, David. Don't let it hurt you, and then it won't."

It was all true; and now that far other treatment had warmed and opened David's heart, he could accept its truth, and feel the better for it, just as the carefully nursed convalescent grows strong enough to bear and benefit in a strong sea-breeze.

It braced him to say frankly, "But I think it will make it hard for me to be a doctor. I must try something else."

"Well," said Fergus, almost impatiently, "you've only got yourself to take care of, and I don't pity any man who can't do that."

"No," David answered, and passing from his own difficulties, went on; "and so you are going to set up for yourself, Fergus? Miss Harvey let me into the secret, because she thought I would be sure to know it. She told me to tell you this."

"She has told me all about it herself," said Fergus. "I called upon her this evening, before I came here."

And he had been there yesterday too, David knew. Two consecutive evenings—well, well!

"Yes," Fergus observed, "I am determined to make a plunge for myself. I can't go on any more in the old humdrum, stupid way. I've been out of my element for a long time. I had no scope, and I must have some."

"I don't doubt you'll get it, Fergus," said David; "I think you will do admirably. You're so clever and persevering."

"If I only had the start!" Fergus ejaculated, almost bitterly; "but it is awfully hard to be kept down in slavery for want of a little paltry money. You see I've nothing of my own to turn over, David. I've never been able to save anything. I might, if I had not had duties to perform toward others."

David kept silence, almost wishing for the first time that his father had left him some small legacy, which he might put into Fergus's hands, the loan to be regarded as a small recognition of the profit and pleasure he had derived from Fergus's friendship.

"I could do a great deal with so little," Fergus proceeded, "for the business is one where most of the profits are so quick that one may safely take credit for everything but a very small outlay."

"You think you could get credit if you fairly stated your case?" said David. "I suppose the dealers are kindly inclined to give a young beginner a start."

"Kindly!" echoed Fergus, with scorn: "they know it's the best thing they can do. It is for their own interest. They secure a customer who perhaps would not come to them if he had his money in his hand at the time. It is everybody's interest to serve a beginner, because it is the only chance of binding him to themselves. By-and-by his good-will is not to be bought at any price. But of course, it is, as you say, very kind of them."

"Have you made any arrangements with anybody yet?" David asked, being sincerely interested.

"I can't ask those who have dealings with the old firm," Fergus answered. "It would be no use, they would not do it."

"Why not?" David inquired.

"Because they would think I was planning an opposition. Of course, it is not. I shall do good to myself without harming the old firm. I believe in competition. I have a right to sell a little cheaper than them, if I choose to work harder for smaller profits."

"I suppose so—yes," David assented, with a voice more dubious than his words.

"Still, as I say, there might be an adverse feeling in that quarter," Fergus went on, "and therefore I would rather begin on a new field altogether. Who do you think I have been talking it over with to-day, David?"

David would not attempt to guess.

"With Webber, the stationer, Millicent Harvey's brother-in-law," Fergus stated with a suppressed sense of triumph. "You see some of his dealers deal also in the class of paper which I require—paper for decorative purposes—it is that branch of our business that I shall keep to chiefly—at any rate, at first. I went to him and explained what I thought of doing, and how I was situated, and asked if he would mind speaking for me to the dealers. I put it in this way: I asked him if he would mind trusting me a little himself, and he said no. Then I said would he just mention me to the dealers, and say as much for me to them. And he said that was a small thing to do to serve an industrious young man, and he was only sorry that he could not be sure it would have more influence. But I know Webber has weight. He is not a large customer, but he pays as he goes. He might make a splendid thing even of that little business of his if he had more spirit, and launched out a little. But Webber has settled down in a rut, and just jogs on. Yet he's a good fellow in his way. He quite took to me. I daresay he felt I might bring a little new blood into his own commercial transactions. He asked me to dine with them. So I did."

"Then you saw Mrs. Webber?" David asked.

Fergus gave one of his expressive sounds of dislike. He had a whole vocabulary of these.

"There's a narrow, commonplace woman for you," he said. "I don't believe she thinks of anything but her needlework and cookery. And she's so afraid of losing the penny she has, that I don't believe she'd open her hand to grasp a diamond that was held towards her. I know she was worrying herself in wonder over what business was passing between Webber and me. That's the kind of woman to keep a man down, David."

"If she is what you describe her, she must be very different to her sister," said David, who had never met Hatty Webber.

"So she is: indeed not a pleasant woman to have in one's family at all, in my opinion. I don't think she likes me. I fancy Webber does. Well, if he serves me, perhaps he'll find the benefit does not end there."

There was a pause. Then David observed—

"So I understand Miss Millicent is engaged to work for you."

"Yes. It will be better for her. They don't treat her in the right spirit, and she can't find it pleasant to work for them. In fact, she has powers above the work which they have for her. You know, David, I have a great ideal of business life, and it has been growing upon me very much lately. I think a firm and all its assistants should work together harmoniously—each for each other, as well as for himself. Does it not only seem right, David, that each man in a concern, down to the porter, should be so respected for his share in it, that he should be drawn up from feeling that his sole interest therein is how much wages he can get for how little work?"

"Certainly, that is most desirable," said David, "that is the teaching of the gospel itself—the abolition of mere eye-service, the working as 'unto God and not unto man.'"

"But how is it to be done?" Fergus went on. "While we are dealing with 'human nature,' we must appeal to ordinary human instincts, not to extraordinary spiritual aspirations. To give an instance: I happened to hint to Miss Millicent, that I should like her to do her very best, because so much would depend upon the beauty and originality of the first designs issued by a new house. And under that stimulant, doubtless, she really has excelled herself! That is what I mean. I think every one should have an actuality set before him, beyond his mere cash receipt."

"But every man has that already," said David. "Because it is his duty to God and man to do his best."

Fergus gave an impatient gesture.

"Granted," he answered; "but may not duty be taught by making it interest as well? If a man cannot climb a hill by his unaided strength, is it a sin to give him a stick to help him up? That is what I purpose to do. To make the interest of all whom I employ identical with my own, so that my workers will not be getting their ordinary wages the week before I am bankrupt, and getting no more than their ordinary wages when I become a millionaire. To give each an interest in our prosperity and adversity proportionate to his position therein, and to recognise other duties between us than the hard coarse tie of so much work done so much money paid."

"It is a grand idea," said David. "It is something like Robert Owen's theories. And yet they did not work well."

"I have read his works," Fergus answered, "and I think I can account for his failures. He carried them outside the beaten track, and put them in practice in ways that can only be exceptional. My scheme would be to keep them in the beaten track, and apply them to necessary conditions of life. Not to found communities, sure to attract the dreaming and unsettled. But to start a practical business, in no outward respect to differ from its neighbours on either hand."

"It struck me," said David, "that Mr. Owen had tried to get Christianity without Christ."

"Well," said Fergus, unheeding this remark, "to this dream I devote my life. Not to money-making, though if its fulfilment brings money, well and good. I think I know how to use it. Do you know, David, it is far harder to be kept from this dream of mine for want of a little money, than it would be if it was purely an ambition for myself!"

"I can believe it, Fergus," said David, quite tenderly, with his hand on his friend's shoulder. We can often sympathize with feelings presented to us by another, though they would never have entered our own hearts, whether because above or below them. David himself would have trusted God to find capital for His own work; nay, would have doubted his own call to it, till God gave a leading by clearing the way. Certainly, any undue longing of his own, David would have checked as the sign of a self-seeking, at variance with God's will. But in Fergus, it looked like nothing but the ardent zeal of impatient benevolence.

"There will be a way found for you, Fergus," he said gently, with a reverend reticence.

"Yes, I don't doubt it; as fast as one is disappointed in one chance, another rises, if one keeps one's eyes open," said Fergus. He had almost thought that David himself, in the dismemberment of his home, might have a little money at his own disposal. But it seemed not so. For Fergus felt sure David would have volunteered it if he had. "Why should he not?" Fergus would have argued. "It would be sure to be a good investment, and, besides, people should risk something for friendship."

So Fergus went home, to think out new schemes. And David went to bed. And that night prayer with him meant thanksgiving for God's goodness to himself and petition for help for "his dear friend struggling with difficulties."

CHAPTER IX.—A NEW FIRM.

THE next day, the dead surgeon's next kinsman came to Blenheim House.

He sat closeted in the surgery with David for more than two hours, while Phœbe went about her kitchen, dumbly agitated, hoping that nothing was happening to "worrit" her darling further.

This country cousin, a Maxwell, only comes into this history at this point. But his character colours it, as any character may colour whole histories that it touches but once.

He was a just man, who sought to give everybody full measure, and then a little over, in case there was any mistake in the pressing down. He kept a mill and a great corn-chandler's shop, and most of the poor people in his native town dealt with him, because he served them more liberally than anybody else. But he never gave any alms.

He had not seen Mr. Maxwell more than once or twice, and had as little regard as respect for him. He was not a rich man, though well-to-do, and most of his property was of that business-like kind which would be sure to suffer in transmission to his family of five daughters. It was a pleasant prospect to contemplate funded property worth already nearly three hundred a-year, and which could be set wholly aside to accumulate for his girls. It was none the less pleasant for being a great surprise, for though he was fully aware of the unhappy circumstances of Mr. Maxwell's household, he had always concluded that there would be a will to bestow the rights which the law withheld. Had there been any such will, he would not have looked too closely into it, nor raised any point that the lawyers could pass over. But as there was none, as his uncle had not thought fit to take the trouble of protecting those whom he might have felt their kindred were likely to regard as natural enemies, this kinsman felt quite ready to have his rights, and determined to be sure that he had them all. He would himself see the certificate of the surgeon's tardy marriage, and being forced to accept it, did so with a grunt, and felt as if Mrs. Maxwell had wronged himself, and the woman that had gone before her, and that woman's child. Very likely his note to David had been kinder for that feeling. We are the friends of those who have a common enemy.

"Your father must have known that he had put that woman in a position to benefit by his property," he said, "and therefore it becomes doubly shameful that he made no provision for you."

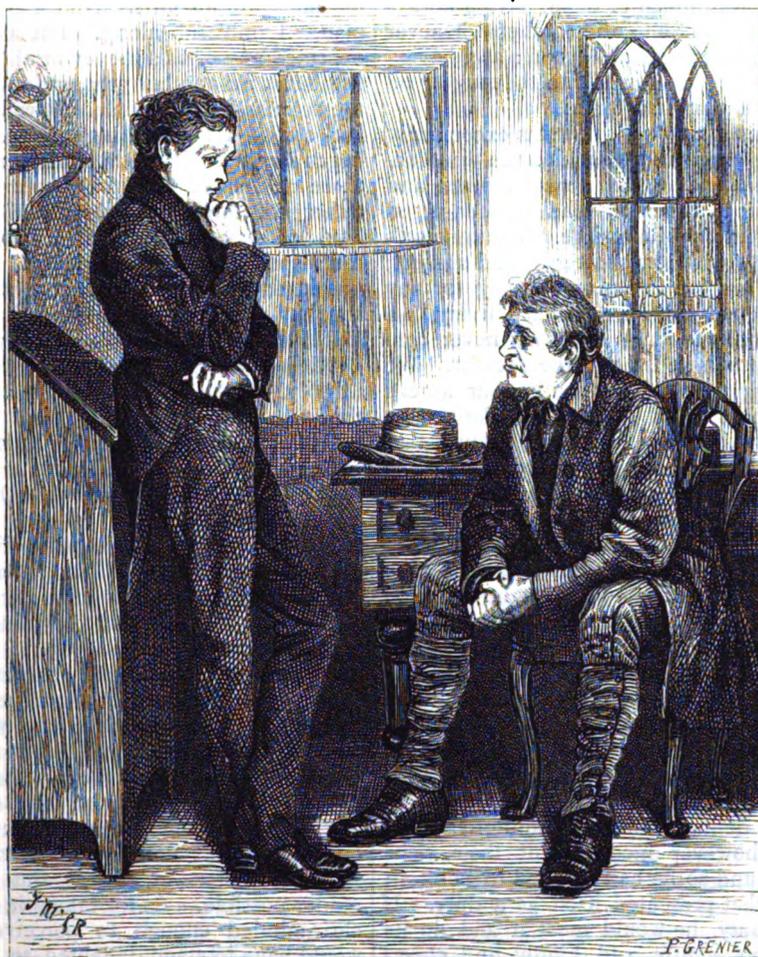

"It does not signify," David answered quietly. "I am now in no worse position than many lawfully-born children whose parents have no money to leave them."

"No, I know you are not," said the other; "but it seems so hard that you should be outside the law, and she within it, though she has no more moral right. More moral right! A thousand times less! I must speak plainly to you, young man. There is no help for it. And you must set the pain at the door of those who do the deeds, not at theirs who have to name them afterwards. You must know yourself that it was very bitter for all our people when your mother went astray with the surgeon. But there was a different feeling about her and this other woman. She was a poor young thing, five years younger than he was. And her friends, though they were poor, were honest people, and were just as angry and pained as we were, and were ready to move heaven and earth to get her to leave such a man and such a way of life.

And then she soon died—dwindled away, as we heard. And at the very last she got a man to take her in his cart twenty miles across country to some of her own people. We heard that she could not speak when she got there—but I daresay you know all the story well.”

“Is it really so? Well, we heard about her in the different ways that people do hear. That was all we heard; but her going back, and dying as it were on the very threshold of decent folk that she knew would have nought to do with her unless she was repentant, made us have gentler thoughts of her, don't you see—the blame dropped in two, as it were, and half of it turned to pity. But this other woman was of quite another sort. She was older than the surgeon to begin with—three years older. And she knew all about his family and the property he had. And she went into her bad ways, in a business fashion, with her eyes wide open. Don't talk to me of 'seduction' when the man is three years the younger and has money! And her own family never thought any shame of her, but said that if she kept faithful to him it was marriage in the sight of God. Faithful to his money! I'd have liked to see the faithfulness of such a woman if she'd had a chance of bettering herself! And they visited her, and came back to our town, taking airs about the fine place their sister lived in! I suppose you've seen them here, sir."

"Yes," David said, not adding that he had never seen much of them, having always been hustled off into the kitchen whenever they came, during his childhood; and having voluntarily betaken himself to the surgery on such occasions in later times.

"I can assure you all this was exceedingly bitter to our family," the kinsman went on. "I know that your father's own mother, and his sister too, my poor dead mother, urged on the ceremony of marriage. The surgeon's way of life gave them great grief and anxiety, and they felt it was no use hoping for any improvement while he continued living in a course of direct sin. But they never contemplated such an issue as the present. We always supposed that a man in your father's circumstances would be sure to make a very explicit will. It seems awfully unjust, that by a mere legal superiority, that woman gets her full rights while you have nothing!"

"I have a right to nothing," said David, "therefore I am not the loser by her gain."

The miller shook his head. All his speech was but the preamble to a thought that had been in his mind all the way up to London. It had kept him awake two or three nights, and had made him deny his wife when she had suggested the purchase of two or three mild luxuries as a fitting mark of their accession to property. It was a thought which he had not welcomed. He had only not thrust it away or silenced it. He was a man who had never denied himself to landlord or tax-gatherer, however inconvenient their visits might be, and so he had learned to confront any idea that presented itself as a duty. If it was a duty, he would meet it and do its behests, not gently and kindly and cheerfully, as we drop our Sabbath offerings in the Holy House, but fully and painfully, as we pay a bill, even when we think it overcharged. This thought at last framed itself reluctantly into words.

"I must do something for you myself, David Maxwell," he said.

And then he went on, more briskly, putting out his ideas just as they lay in his mind, with that strange lack of connection common to people not given to utter thought, especially thought made half of feeling:—"I've said so to myself ever since I found that though I can take your share, I can't touch that woman's. I'm sure you'll be a credit to us to what you might have been, my lad. You've got your grandmother Maxwell's face, and she was as much a saint as any woman can be. I don't know who your father took after, but not after her. You're the most of grandson she has left behind her, for mine are all girls. And I'm not a rich man. I only rub along. But as we never expected any of this money at all, we can do without it for another year, and give you over the three hundred pounds. It will give you a fair start. I'd only five hundred when I began life myself, for though my mother had share and share alike with your father, my father got through nearly all of it. It's a kind of way in the world. Some people can't spend money fast enough, and others find it terribly hard to get. I've often worried over my poor girls. But that's all right now; and they won't be poorer for giving you a help."

"It is so very good of you!" David answered warmly. "But ought I to take it? Let me think."

"Of course you ought to take it," said the miller; and having stoutly made the offer, began to feel lurking wishes that David would resolutely put it aside.

David would have done so directly, but that it seemed to him that this might be a godsend, given by his hand to Fergus Laurie. Once this idea flashed into his mind, practical arguments came trooping up to support it. He had certainly not been chargeable to his father for years,—never since he first took the teacher's place in the Hackney Academy. And of late, since he had been in the surgery, he had positively saved his father much expense, and consequently increased, so far, his property. Then, again, it had certainly been his father's bounden duty to give him some such start in life as this gift would render possible. As for taking it, David was clear-minded enough to perceive that he would have to stand indebted to somebody, and to whom more fairly than to this blood relation, who was at least a greater gainer by the poor, disreputable, dead surgeon, than anybody else could be? Then, again, David reflected that if he prospered in life, he could amply repay this gift in many ways, without even seeming to turn restive under the burden of gratitude. And if he did not prosper, this did not defraud any of what was really his own—a comfort that could scarcely attach to help from any other quarter.

"I will take it, sir," David said, at last, looking straight in the miller's troubled, watching face. "And I cannot thank you enough in words."

"It's all right," said the miller; "of course, I know you thank me. And I suppose, from what I hear, you'll be made into a doctor."

"I think not," David answered. "Something has come to light which will go much against me in that character. I will show you what it is." And he went to his own room, brought down the Hackney Mercury, and put it into the miller's hands.

The miller read it, and would have liked to put his thoughts into some bitter words, but refrained, and only asked, pointing to the paragraph—

"Is it true?"

"Yes," David answered. "I myself could bring forward proofs, though I never knew what they proved, till I read that."

"Was it infatuation for the study that led the surgeon into such mean dastardliness—surely he could have afforded to prosecute it in far different ways?" groaned the miller.

"He never prosecuted it at all," David answered sadly. "At least, never since my time. He always said he meant to do so, but did not. I think he must have done this for that purpose at first, and then went on, as a kind of habit."

"That a habit," said the miller, "and for no purpose! Habit indeed! Rather madness!"

David made no answer. He had not lived where he had for six-and-twenty years without learning that wickedness is either an idiocy or a lunacy of soul.

"I shall go into some business where my knowledge of chemistry will be useful," said David, forcing a cheery tone of voice, as people do when they step out of a charnel-house into the sunshine.

"Well, I hope you'll get on. Anyhow, I believe you'll be no discredit to our name, as you well might have been, all things considered."

The miller stayed in Blenheim House for some days, winding up affairs; but this conversation, with its result, was the only point where he touches our story. Most readers will not regret that he stayed in it such a short time; but will be almost as glad to get rid of him as of Mrs. Maxwell. And yet this single recorded action is a good one. But his is a character which never gets its share of the toleration and charity which goes about the world, begging to be allowed to enfold all shades of profligates and prodigals.

There is patience for weakness, but no patience for hardness. Folks make excuses for the man who slips into the slough of his worst nature, but cannot endure him who struggles out of it so hardly, that he cannot sit gracefully on its edge! In the world's eyes, it is better to have no line of duty at all, than to have one with no beauty curves about it! There is no joyous welcome about an iron stove, though it may give out twice the heat of the dancing wood fire. But it is better to have virtues hidden within one's fleshly temperament, than virtues which will drop off with it, as will much that passes as good feeling and generosity. There are some people who have cause to thank God for nothing so much as "that He is greater than their heart, and knoweth all things."

David's first proceeding was to consult Fergus. He told him all the history, adding that Fergus could have the whole use of the three hundred pounds, at least until such time as he required a portion of it. Or he might not need any, if he got a situation, and Fergus stood for any security that might be required.

"Why shouldn't you join me?" Fergus asked abruptly. "Your knowledge of chemistry is just what is wanted in our trade. Put your money and your skill along with my business faculty and connection. You will always have an eye on your capital, and a full share of whatever prosperity comes to us. I will guarantee you something of a salary if you like; but I can't be particularly tempting in that way, at first, David. You might get more of a certainty elsewhere, but scarcely such a prospect. If you come, you must regard your time as well as your money, as an investment, safe indeed, but a little slow at first."

"I would do it instantly; I should only be too glad to do anything to serve you; I know it would be serving myself too," David answered eagerly; "only I should like to be sure of enough to keep Phœbe, or I have no right to hinder her getting another place. If it was only myself, there would be no risk,—I would pull through, at a pinch, on thirty pounds for a year. But, I couldn't, with Phœbe, though she's as cheap a person as there can be. If she knew there was any difficulty, she'd want to go out working for herself, and waiting on me beside."

"I don't see why she shouldn't," said Fergus, "she's always been used to that sort of thing."

"If she must, of course she must," David replied; "but I will not make any arrangements that will bring on the necessity. I know you wouldn't if it were you, Fergus."

"Ah, well, perhaps not. Anyhow, you are right. You say you could pull through at a pinch on thirty pounds. Surely, Phœbe could do the same," Fergus answered, half-carelessly.

"Of course she could. But that would make sixty," said David.

"Well, I should hope you don't think you are likely to get less than that the first year you work with me?" Fergus observed, almost angrily. "Double that, three times that, I should trust and believe."

"Then I shall be only too glad to accept your offer," said David. "The barest-living secured, especially for Phœbe, and I can cheerfully trust all the rest."

"I hope you will," Fergus answered gravely. "For if we are to work well together, you will have to trust me a good deal, David. Business tactics are peculiar, and I understand them, and you do not, and you may often fancy that I am doing queer things. I should not like to work with anybody who did not feel the greatest confidence in me."

"I don't think I've ever given you reason to fear I should be mistrustful and suspicious. You must trust me to trust you, Fergus," said David, and so the compact was sealed.

After that Fergus worked with a will. He secured suitable trade premises—parting at once with a large slice of David's capital to pay rent in advance. Many departments of work which old, long-established firms did at home, he was compelled to arrange for with other houses, from the utter impossibility of procuring heavy, expensive plant. About all this he was very candid with David, explaining that it must seriously reduce their profits, but was better than incurring large burden of debt, which candour and caution led David to the erroneous conclusion that all that was there was paid for—a mistake he easily fell into from his ignorance of the prices of machinery and office furniture. This candour on Fergus's part prevented David feeling any delicacy in making a few inquiries, and with a sense of his ignorance, and a simple-minded desire to remove it, he asked two or three questions as to prices, &c. To these he always received the fullest and most satisfactory answers, but given in a tone and manner that led his sensitive kindness to fear that Fergus writhed under the idea that his honest wish for information was only disguised criticism and doubt. So David said to himself that he was quite sure Fergus was willing to tell him everything, but that it would be kindlier to let pass any accidental omission of information, even at inconvenience to his own future usefulness. David had not a legal mind, and did not in the least understand that the most voluminous affidavit may crumble beneath a monosyllable of cross-examination. He innocently thought that perhaps it was as natural for Fergus to be a little reserved on some points, as for himself to keep secret that he had been to a lawyer, and made a will, bequeathing to Jemima, Sarah, Emma, Kate, and Anne Maxwell, daughters of John Maxwell, miller, of Yarmouth, any property that he, David, might leave, not exceeding four hundred pounds in value; anything exceeding that sum to go to Phœbe Winter.

Robina Laurie paid a great many visits during those weeks of preparation. She called on Mrs. George Harvey. She called on Mrs. Webber. She connected herself with the Dorcas society, and called at the Vicarage. She called over and over again on Mrs. Harvey and Millicent. Fergus instigated all these calls, but he found she obeyed him more readily, and he commended her for it. Robina Laurie was a woman whose courage and sociability lay in her garments, and Fergus had given her ten pounds of David's money to thoroughly replenish her wardrobe, which, with Robina, meant to purchase two dresses, a cloak, and a bonnet with a feather. Robina knew nothing about her brother's affairs, except the fact, which ought to have had a significance even to her—that he had certainly no means of his own. Other people knew that he was poor, but nobody except his mother and sister—not even David—knew that he had nothing, in the literal meaning of the word. But Robina felt that she was gaining the highest aim of her life when she was buying her finery, and this eagerness made it easy for her to persuade herself that of course his superior talents could command plenty of cash on every side, and that she need ask no question whence came the particular cheque to decorate herself. She was very condescendingly affable to David Maxwell, remarking to Milly that her brother's ability to receive him into business at this particular juncture "had happened like a good providence for him."

All preliminaries were adjusted at last, and one fine Monday morning a smart errand boy opened the shutters of a newly-painted house, and disclosed a blind which announced to the world the new firm of "Fergus O. Laurie and Company."

GOD'S JUDGMENTS.

Being Thoughts on the Fiftieth Psalm.

BY PRINCIPAL CANDLISH, D.D.

I.—THE PREPARATION.

THIS Psalm describes a judicial procedure, or some transaction on the part of God partaking of that character. The silence of forbearance is broken: the Lord comes and sits as Judge. He is here now to take a reckoning with his Church; to summon its members before Him, and pronounce a critical and judicial verdict upon their character and standing. According to the customary method of prophetic delineation, the scene has, for its background, the final day of doom. It is painted in colours fitted to call up before the mind's eye, or the eye of conscience, the awful sublimities and solemnities of that closing catastrophe or consummation of this world's or the Church's history. Then the silence of forbearance is broken at last, and broken finally and for ever! Up till that terrible day, while the season of gracious long-suffering and offered mercy lasts, the rule or principle of the Lord's providence is his keeping silence. He holds his peace. To the last He holds his peace. His trumpet does not sound. His voice is not heard. Men say, "All things continue as they were: where is the God of judgment?" Suddenly, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, the sky is overcast, and instantly opened. The loud signal of the trump of doom thunders. The great white throne is seen.

In the light, or upon the darkness, of that tremendous judgment for eternity, judgments in time and for time, are usually in Scripture pictured. And rightly so; for they are analogous, so far, in their nature and design. Like that last judgment, they interrupt the even tenor of the dispensation of seeming indifference or acquiescence on the part of God. And they do so also, at least in part, for the same purpose, to vindicate his holy character and righteous sovereignty, to awaken a slumbering world or a slumbering Church; to convict the guilty to their faces, and with whatever reserve of rebuke and admonition, to acknowledge the faithful as his own. Of this sort are the convulsions which, on a large scale, shake the foundations of states and empires, overturn great cities, overwhelm in mighty floods the high places of the earth. And so also are those more private and personal visitations which bring sorrows manifold upon poor suffering souls, and sad changes upon mourning households. These are occasions when the Lord is to be seen, with the eye of faith, coming forth from the darkness, or the repose of tolerance, in which He appears to enshroud himself when the ongoings of his providence are smooth and even; coming forth thence for a judicial dealing with those under his authority; who, but for some such breaking in upon them of a season of trial, might be apt to sink into indolent security, or harden themselves in the postponement of the question, "Is it well with me and mine for eternity?"

The Psalm then brings before us a day of judgment. The first six verses represent the preliminaries, or, as it were, the accessories and accompaniments, of the grave transaction. And the representation is well fitted to awaken profoundest awe. There is a solemn and significant opening of the Divine Assizes.

1. "The mighty God, even the Lord, hath spoken, and called the earth from the rising of the sun unto the going down thereof" (ver. 1). A voice is heard; sudden, loud, far-sounding, all-powerful; of boundless range; of resistless force. It is the voice of God; who is introduced here, or comes in view, under three aspects indicated by three different names, for such they are, rising one above another in sublimity and majesty. For the adjective, "mighty," should rather be translated as a proper noun; the first of three titles or designations—El, Eloi, Jav or Jehovah, descriptive of the Judge in this great trial. First, He is God absolutely; the one only God; "unto whom power belongeth;" who alone is strong and mighty. Secondly, He is God relatively, if I may so speak; or God acting, working, making; putting forth his power; strong, not merely as himself great in might, but as exerting his great might out of himself in creation, providence, rule, and judgment, both generally and in detail. The singular form of the noun, El, becomes the plural form, Eloi, as in the first chapter of Genesis, and elsewhere throughout Scripture, when it is as "working hitherto," always working, that the Supreme Being is contemplated. For in all his working, in all that He does, He is the Triune God, the great Three-in-one, doing all, working all, according to the counsel of an eternal purpose in which Father, Son, and Holy Ghost are one. Lastly, in the third place, He is the I AM, the unchangeable; Jehovah; the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever; claiming the confidence and commanding the reverence and fear of all, as being "without variable-ness or shadow of turning." So God sits as Judge; strong and mighty upon his unshaken throne; prompt and powerful to execute judgment; true and faithful, "keeping covenant and mercy, but by no means clearing the guilty." Who may move his dread tribunal? Who can arrest his uplifted arm? Who can challenge his unchanging sovereignty, or think to bend it into accommodation and accordance with any poor wish of his own? It is a solemn, terrible alarm, a startling trumpet-sound, when it is such a Judge that can no longer keep silence, but must speak out.

2. "Out of Zion, the perfection of beauty, God hath shined. Our God shall come, and shall not keep silence: a fire shall devour before Him, and it shall be very tempestuous round about Him" (vers. 2, 3). The mention of Zion as the place from which God speaks and shines, is significant. It indicates the character and nature of the judgment, as meant to be not legal but evangelical. Zion, not Sinai, is the seat or throne from which the Judge rises; Zion, the centre of grace and peace; where the Temple ministry of reconciliation goes on. Whatever business is to be transacted, be it ever so judicial, or corrective, or disciplinary, is business belonging to the dispensation, not of the law, but of the Gospel. Whatever dealing, whatever reckoning, the Lord is about to have with the parties to be summoned to his bar, must proceed upon the principles of the new covenant of mercy, and not on those of the old covenant of merit or of works. The assize is held in the Church; the Church of which Zion is the symbol and type; the Church in which redeeming love, atonement by blood, substitution in righteousness, salvation by free and sovereign grace, are the leading and ruling elements of the divine administration.

This aspect of the august scene may in one view be felt as partly divesting it of its terror; but, in another, it deepens its solemnity and awe. It is as having himself made provision for your being justified and saved, that God calls you to account for your treatment of Him. For it is "our God who shall come." He comes as our God; ours, by his own free gift of himself to us, in his Son, whom He "has set his King upon his holy hill of Zion." As our God, shining out of Zion, the perfection of beauty,—the beauty of holiness, the beauty of peace, the beauty of grace and truth and love,—He comes; as "our God," well entitled to speak to us and deal with us as sustaining that relation to us, and to try and judge us accordingly. In that character "He shall not keep silence" (ver. 3). He shall not, He cannot, keep silence always. Strange it is, indeed, that He should keep silence at all; that He should keep silence so long; when such things are done within the very precincts of his own holy hill of Zion as are ever presenting themselves to his pure eye! That He should sit as if unmoved in heaven by what vexes many a righteous soul on earth, and makes rivers of water to flow down from many an eye! For God thus, as it were, to restrain himself, to be silent and not speak out, is like the smothering of hidden fire, the enforced shutting up of an explosive mine! No wonder, therefore, that when the silence is broken, it should be as when a conflagration rages, or volcanic charges violently rend the mountains. No wonder, if "a fire shall devour before Him, and it shall be very tempestuous round about Him."

3. At this great judicial transaction there is an audience meet, and not few—a vast gathering of deeply attentive and interested on-lookers. At the first opening of the Lord's mouth, the earth from east to west has been summoned. And as the startled Church awakens to an apprehension of the awful solemnity, and awaits in silent suspense the close reckoning of her glorious Head with all her members, she hears a renewed summons given to the entire universe of created intelligences. There is a "call to the heavens from above and to the earth." All who can understand are invited to witness the proceedings, and to learn how God judges his people; by what rules and on what principles; that the very highest among them may see and own the vindicated justice of God; his justice openly vindicated at last after the long delay of his silent forbearance. Thus "the heavens shall declare his righteousness, for God is judge himself." All other judgment is superseded by his judgment. That justifies all his ways, and satisfies or silences all his thinking creatures. The hitherto inexplicable anomalies, the irreconcilable contradictions, the perplexing irregularities, the capricious distributions of good and evil—all the difficulties which, in the view of finite minds, characterize the course of things, when the government here below is left apparently to second causes, and the Lord shrouds himself in dark reserve, all then take end. He assumes into his own hands the charge of his own government. He is judge Himself.

All this is fully and finally done in the last great day. But there are foreshadowings of it in the chastenings and visitations of his providence now. There are critical seasons in the Church's history—times of visitation in the experience of individual members of the Church and their households—marked interpositions of Providence—signal and striking indications of a divine hand in human affairs—personal and family events—that ought to be regarded in the light of a close dealing on the part of God with us, meant to sift and try and test. There are occasions—with some of us, it may be such an occasion even now—when the even tenor of life's commonplace routine is broken up, and we should pause to hear what God the Lord will speak; what He has to say to us; what complaint to bring against us; what censure to pronounce upon us; what fault to find with us; what lesson to teach us. "Teach me thy judgments, O Lord! Quicken me according to thy judgments."

4. The parties cited to the bar for this judicial procedure on the part of God are viewed first collectively (ver. 5), and then separately in two companies (vers. 7, 16).

First, collectively, they are "his saints, who have made made a covenant with Him by sacrifice." They are his saints: not merely as being consecrated, dedicated, separated, and set apart to be his, but as being personally well inclined and well affected towards Him. That is the exact meaning of the term "saints," or holy ones, here. It is not that word "holy" which signifies being taken out of the category of common things or persons, and invested with a sacred stamp or impress, devoted to a sacred use or purpose. It is that other word "holy," which indicates, not a state or relation merely, but a personal frame of mind, a personal disposition of heart: not relative holiness, so to speak, but real holiness—real inward and indwelling holiness. Those called for judgment are the professedly pious. The character which they have to sustain is the character of piety, of godliness, of divine charity or love. That is the standard by which they are to be tried. They have to make good and verify their possession of personal holiness. And the holiness is holiness of a particular or special type. It is connected with their "having made a covenant with God." It rests upon the basis of a covenant; a distinct agreement or engagement into which they are understood to have entered with the Holy One, binding them by a solemn vow to be holy as He is holy. It is not a mere spontaneous impulse, or influence, or sentiment. It is a serious and awful pledge, having in it all the validity and force, all the binding obligation, of a strict and stern covenant. And the covenant is "by sacrifice." It is a sacrificial covenant in the fullest sense. Not only is it a covenant ratified and sealed by sacrifice; it is a covenant of which sacrifice is the source and the very substance; into which sacrifice enters as its constituent principle, its living essence. Sacrifice used often in the olden time to follow covenanting. Two parties agreeing beforehand in covenant, confirmed their covenant agreement afterwards by a sacrificial offering and a sacrificial meal. That may partly explain the connection here between making a covenant with God and sacrifice; but that does not exhaust the meaning. Nor is it the principal and primary thought. For here sacrifice precedes covenanting, in the order of connection, if not of time. The covenant is not merely sealed by sacrifice; it is itself made by sacrifice; it originates in sacrifice, and springs out of sacrifice; and the sacrifice by which it is made is plainly sacrifice expiatory and propitiatory. It must be so, for it is the condition and the cause of the covenanting. It opens the way to my making a covenant with God as my God. It is the means of my making a covenant with my God. It is itself the very essence of my making a covenant with my God. For it is my reconciliation to God. It is the ending of the long and sad estrangement which sin has caused between my God and me. It is the expiation of my guilt—the absolving of me personally from all criminality, through the acceptance on the part of my God of a voluntary and infinitely worthy substitute in my stead. It is on my part a glad sense of justice satisfied, sin purged, myself absolved, acquitted, sanctified, restored to the favour, fellowship, and likeness of my God. On the footing of such a sacrifice I make a covenant with God. And as thus covenanting, I am one of his holy ones.

Such is the ideal according to which the divine judgment is to be conducted; such the standard of this august and heavenly judicial procedure. It is an ideal, a standard, pitched very high ; at the very highest pitch indeed. And rightly so. For, whatever modifications or explanations, if any, the subsequent application of the principle of this great assize may allow or require—and that may be a question for the rest of the Psalm—the principle itself must in the outset be conserved and asserted in its integrity. It is the perfection of the religious life that God, “shining out of Zion, the perfection of beauty,” must needs set up as the rule of judgment and test of character ;—the full-orbed type or model of the perfect spiritual man. As such, it has in it these three elements—holiness, covenant, and sacrifice. They are intimately connected with one another, and mutually dependent on one another. They hang together. Each is to be viewed as coming out of the other. There is, first, your being the Lord’s holy ones, his saints, his pious and devoted ones. For we need not now and here discriminate nicely the two senses of the word. In fact, they reciprocally imply or involve one another. You are the Lord’s holy ones ; consecrated, set apart, sealed ; renewed, purified, sanctified ; the Lord’s dedicated property ; bearing the stamp of his image and likeness. You are his holy ones ; holy unto Him, holy in and after Him. And you are his holy ones as having made a covenant with Him ; bound and pledged and sworn to be his holy ones ; solemnly engaged ; under the sanction of an oath or a vow. And the oath, the vow, springs out of sacrifice—a sacrifice of reconciliation, a sacrifice of peace. It is the fruit and forthcoming of a great sacrificial transaction, bringing God near to you as yours and you near to God as his, on the footing of a full and perfect settlement of all that ever did or ever could keep you apart. So “God is judge himself.” Such must be his manner of judgment when it is his Church, or any branch or any members of his Church, with whom He is judicially dealing.

It is, indeed, in one view, an awful ordeal. It demands a high attainment. It admits of no lower aim on our part if we would hope to meet and stand it. But yet there is encouragement for the poor and humble in the threefold Jacob’s ladder, as it were, here let down to us. It reaches heavenward ; it begins from heaven. But it reaches also earthward ; it comes down to earth. Let me revert the order of its steps from what it is as given in this text.

There is, then, first, sacrifice. That, at any rate, comes low enough. It comes to the lowest who will say with Paul, “It is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners, of whom I am chief.” Sacrifice ! Yes ! That is a step on which the least and lowest, the worst and vilest, may here and now plant his foot. “God is Love. Herein is manifested the love of God, that He sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins.” Sacrifice ! Yes ! I can lay hold of that ! “Lord, I believe. Help thou mine unbelief.” Sinner as I am, I cling and cleave to thee, “O Lamb of God that takest away the sin of the world !” That first round of the ladder—wilt thou not help me—enable me—to mount ? Yes. Thou wilt ! Assuredly thou wilt ! Then I will venture, on the footing of that great sacrifice, and in the faith of its being in all its efficacy available for me, to make a covenant with thee. Otherwise, the very thought of my doing that would be intolerable presumption. What ! For me to venture on making a covenant with thee ! For me, a worm of the dust, vile in thy pure sight, guilty under thy righteous law, to aspire to the position of one covenanting with thee ! Yes, I may venture, I may dare, if it is by sacrifice that I do so. Nay, I cannot but make the covenant with thee if I accept the sacrifice. For the sacrifice involves the covenant. I cannot have the one without the other. Nor could I wish it to be otherwise. The recommendation of the sacrifice to me is that it has in it the covenant ; my covenanting with God on the faith of it. That is why I welcome and embrace it. Freeing me from guilt, restoring me to favour, renewing at once my position and my nature, it entitles and enables me to covenant with my God ! And to covenant for what ? To covenant that I mean to be one of his holy ones ! Yes ! To that high aim I may rise. Thus I may rise to it. And here and now. The sacrifice is mine, here and now ; mine, in all its virtue and power if I will but have it to be mine. The covenant upon the sacrifice is mine ; mine, here and now, if I will but make it mine. And oh ! how high may I thus rise here and now ! I may reach the position of God’s own holy ones ! Let nothing short of that content me. Nothing short of it will stand the test or ordeal of the judgment of God.

AGAINST THE STREAM:

The Story of an Heroic Age in England.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE SCHONBERG-COTTA FAMILY."

CHAPTER XII.

This characteristic of all truly upward paths that as we rise the little hills grow less, and the high hills higher.

Happy for us when the heights of our childhood are so truly high that they do not sink, but rise, with our rising, and only seem the more above us the nearer we approach them. It was always thus with Loveday Benbow, as through the years I grew to understand better what she was. She was in so many ways a centre to our little circle; partly by virtue of the very stillness and unchangeableness of her life amidst our changing revolving conditions; by the simple fact of her being always there, and much more by the fact of her being always all there."

Invalids have little idea how much the very stillness and monotony of their sick chambers (so hard often for them to comprehend or bear) tend to make them a sanctuary where others, stepping aside from the tumultuous world outside, are calmed, refreshed, and rested.

Loveday was our centre also, because she lived so near the true Centre, which is the Sun, and therefore with her heart in the glow of that central sunlight, her mind looked freely all around, and saw things in their true relations and proportions, for us all; as we, in the coil and tumult could seldom do. She became the "eye" of our little landscape, as still waters do, by simply reflecting the light. Against the stream, as many of her convictions were, she never seemed contending so much as following; calmly floating, or rather sailing on, because her inmost spirit had found the "rushing mighty wind" which "breathes upon the slain, and they live;" the Spirit which broods on the face of the waters, and they are full of the living. She was borne on, calmly, by the breath mightier than all the torrents of the world. With her the deepest things in us all were opened, to ourselves and to her.

If Amice had lifted me first to a point of view outside my home, and Claire to one outside our England, Loveday lifted us all to a point of view from which we felt there was an outside, a glorious "expansion" a starry "firmament" beyond our visible world.

Piers was her prime favourite. She loved him almost as much as I did, and more than she did me, which was saying much.

His school-life was not an eventful one. After that first conflict, he was seldom in the wars, or at least we did not hear of it. The joys of battle were dear in themselves to Dick Fyford. But helping, not fighting, was what Piers delighted in; although, if the fighting came in course of the helping, he took to it heartily enough. The energy which in Dick was apt to turn to destructiveness, in Piers went to construction. He had as much boyish delight in making a ship, or a shed, or a model water-wheel, and making them well, as Dick had in maiming his uncle's trees and his own limbs by reckless climbing.

I cannot say that in "book-learning," as taught by Mr. Rabbidge, he excelled. He looked at that time on the writers of books, rather as mere talkers on an extended scale. And talking, as I have said, he regarded as the especial province of women; or of people in general who could not or would not work. Thus, on all professions of which speech was the medium, he looked not without contempt.

Two careers in life commended themselves to him. He wished either to be a manufacturer or a doctor. Doctors and manufacturers, he said, knew what they were about. To cure men, and to make things, was plain, honest work. That is, the ideal of those callings, was clear to him. They were something like keeping the garden, and tilling it, or keeping down the thorns and thistles of the wilderness. To be a doctor he thought the best. The delight in watching the ways of birds and beasts, which was natural to him, inclined him to natural history, and the skill and accuracy with which he handled things, might avail him in surgery.

What his conversations with Loveday were about, I often did not know. She used to say the boy's spirit dwelt among the "realities," among "the things that are—justice, goodness, and truth," unconsciously quoting Plato. She greatly longed for him to become a physician. There was a passage in George Fox's journal to which she especially delighted to refer. "The physicians," George Fox wrote (lamenting over the declension of all the professions from their true ideal), "were out of the Wisdom of God, by which the creatures were made, and so knew not their virtues. But they might be brought back into the true wisdom of God, the Word of Wisdom, by which all things are." And to this end she believed Piers, with his honest heart, clear judgment, his delight to "hear and to ask questions" of every one and everything, his determination to see and know things as they are, might greatly help.

I suppose his early revulsion from literature was owing partly to Mr. Rabbidge's mode of instruction. With Mr. Rabbidge literature was strictly "letters," in the literal sense; the instrument was everything. Even the great old Greek dramas and histories were to him rather herbariums of classical expressions, than living fields of thought and beauty. The climax of attainment set before Piers was not to understand Æschylus or Herodotus, and through them Greek life and thought, but to write Greek verses, in which what was said was immaterial if it was classically said. It took years of living to counteract the effect of those years of learning, and to bring him back through the realities of the present to the glorious realities of the past.

Also it was natural to him not to take the same turn as our brother Francis; and Francis took at once to literature in Mr. Rabbidge's sense of it. "Words for the sake of words" did not at all repel him. To be an "elegant scholar" seemed to him, and to Mr. and Mrs. Danescombe, a lofty ambition. Francis became Mr. Rabbidge's favourite scholar. His memory was accurate, and his taste in a certain cold and superficial way correct; and the glory of prizes of the "first place" and of public recitations was exactly the kind of glory he appreciated and his mother delighted in.

Very early she began to suggest that it would be a loss to the reputation of the town if Francis were not sent to the university; whilst at the same time a year or two more or less of school could make no difference to Piers, whose tastes were not in any way opposed to commerce. My vanity and ambition were often aroused on behalf of Piers. But Piers was not to be thus roused. He had ambitions; but not on that level.

That Amice Glanvil and I should be at home with Loveday, and even Piers, and open our inmost world to her was natural enough, she being the dovelike winged creature that Amice Platonically said she was, and we sorely in want of such brooding warmth.

Amice having free range of her paternal library at Court, had been greatly delighted on behalf of Loveday when she discovered in an old translation of Plato his theory of "wings secretly growing in the soul here preparatory to her free expanded life hereafter."

Loveday's spiritual wings were, Amice felt sure, already fully developed; wings that could make a nest anywhere—on any rock, for her nestlings, and could also soar far beyond our ken. It was only natural, therefore, that we motherless creatures should nestle beneath them.

But with Dick Fyford, the most militant and un-Quakerlike amongst us, it was the same. From very early days he was always either falling into desperate quarrels, or in desperate love, not unfrequently both together. And in all cases Miss Loveday was his chosen confidant.

"She always took things so seriously," he said, "and did not make fun of a fellow." And a serious tax on any one's sympathy it must have been to take Dick Fyford's loves and wars in earnest, so frequently were the "scoundrelly dogs" of his limited but strong vocabulary, yesterday, "Not at all bad fellows after all," to-day; and the hard-heartedness and cruelty he should never get over to-day, in a few weeks obliterated by the unequalled fascinations of the next heroine.

It was a relief to Loveday when Dick went to sea, although she had many scruples about seeming to sanction it. "Making climbing at the risk of the neck a matter of duty," she pleaded, "does seem the only way of saving some lads from breaking their necks as a matter of choice. And a sailor need not absolutely be a man of war, although in these days it does seem too probable he will."

It was so also with Madame des Ormes. Nothing soothed her so much as to sit by the little couch where Loveday had to spend so much of her life, in the plain unadorned room, where the only lustrous thing was the old oaken floor, polished with the rubbing of generations. She said it made her think of Thomas à Kempis, and made luxury seem a folly and a vulgarity.

The contrast of the stately gracious lady with her animated face and movements, and our dear dove-coloured Loveday with her still soft face and voice, often charmed me.

With most of us, Madame was, on religious questions, a foreigner. There were mutual suspicions, mutual reserves, mutual antagonisms concealed or confessed, mutual ignorance of the real basis of one another's daily life. Even with my father the sympathy did not reach beyond "questions of the Second Table." She recognised him fully as her "neighbour," and loved him as a lover of mankind, but as to his ecclesiastical position she was not without disquiet.

With Loveday Benbow she was at home. To her she opened the inmost sanctuary of her constant heart. To her she spoke as to none beside of her husband, cut down by the mob of Paris, at the door of the prison of the village, at the terrible sentence "A La Force;" the terrible revolutionary formula corresponding to the masked sentence of an earlier inquisition, "To the Secular Arm."

"They dared not cry to all those innocent victims," she said, "'A la mort.' So terrible has God made crime to conscience, my friend, that the worst of us dare not utter the worst they can do."

They sate together under the great shadow of death, but they found it the shadow of the great Threshold. One day the gate would open, they knew, and let them in. To their victorious Christian faith in the unity of the Church, that barrier, so terribly real to most of us, which separates the Church visible on earth from that invisible in heaven, had become a mere "veil," transparent altogether from the other side, and if not transparent, at least translucent often here.

The Church for them was divided not into Roman and Anglican, Catholic and Protestant; but into the wrestlers and the victors, the combatants and the crowned, the faint and few, struggling still through the waves of this troublesome world, and the glorious multitude innumerable, welcomed and welcoming on the other shore. Yet Loveday Benbow was in the whole type of her piety a Quaker. She had indeed been baptized in infancy, with Miss Felicity as one of her sponsors. And whatever had been her convictions, her health would have prevented her attending the public services of the church.

Moreover, the Sacrament was not administered in Abbot's Weir more than four times a year, and the office for the Communion of the Sick was regarded chiefly as a mild mode of announcing the medical sentence of death.

Had her belief as to the Sacrament been that of the nuns of Port Royal, she must have been practically reduced by circumstances, as many of the nuns of Port Royal were by persecution, after their dispersion, to "spiritual communion." Yet the mutual attraction between her and Madame des Ormes was not an isolated instance of union of heart between Roman Catholics and Quakers, nor do I think the attraction was merely one of personal character.

The Holy of Holies in all forms of Christianity is surely the same. For Friends the outer sanctuaries and courts do not exist; for the most spiritual saints in all communions they only exist outside. The very multitude of dogmas and complication of rites in the Roman Church has, in many instances, driven her saints inward to find their rest in the bare simplicity of some great first principle.

For Brother Lawrence, as for John Woolman, alike, the true dwelling-place and "covering" of the spirit is in "awful retirement inward in the presence of God."

Also, both Loveday and the Marquise were sufferers. To both the whole world lay under the shadow and the shelter of the Cross of Redemption.

By both it was never forgotten that the only perfect life ever lived on earth had ended visibly there; and with both it was the deepest conviction of the heart that this apparent end was not an end, but a beginning, and meant not defeat but victory.

On both, moreover, had been laid a life-long burden, which could never more be laid aside—the burden of irreparable bereavement, and of irremediable pain. To both, therefore, life had made it plain that the Master's Cross was not only to rescue from suffering, but to empower to suffer; not to abolish the Cross for the disciple, but to consecrate the yoke into the Cross, by the simple act of willingly taking up the involuntary burden daily after Him. Thus, neither Madame des Ormes nor Loveday Benbow were in the danger which besets the prosperous "religious world" of making their ideal of religious service a beneficent dispensing of alms from the throne, instead of, like the Master's, a sympathetic bearing of the yoke with the suffering.

"Quærens me sedisti lassus," for the pattern of life, was as present to them as "Redemisti crucem passus,"

for its motive power.

I have always been glad that my first acquaintance with holy people was among those who dwelt in the shadow, rather than among those who dwelt in the sunshine.

It made it clearer whence the inward sunshine came. It made me see a little into the depths of Christian life before learning more of its expansions.

Yet there was a difference as well as a resemblance between Loveday and the Marquise. It arose, I think, partly from their types of faith, but also partly from their differences of character and experience.

The element of hope was far stronger in Loveday Benbow,—not the imperishable hope of the immortal life, this was equally strong in both,—but hope for this struggling, sinning, suffering world,—hope for humanity.

In representing the life of the two symbolically, I would picture Madame des Ormes kneeling with clasped hands and upturned weeping face at the foot of the Cross—the Crucified still fixed there; but Loveday should stand by the empty Sepulchre, her hands outstretched to clasp the feet that were to "go before into Galilee," and on her lips and on her radiant face the rapturous "Rabboni."

The words that seem to vibrate on the ear of one are, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" on the other falls the inspiring message, "Go tell my brethren that I am risen and go before you."

But the thing about Loveday Benbow that was characteristically "Quaker" was the listening attitude of her whole being. Of all the titles given to the early Church before she received her Christian name at Antioch—"brethren, saints, believers, disciples"—the one most applicable to Loveday would have been that of "disciple." You felt always that she was a "learner," only a teacher because always learning. With her no pupil came to drink of a stagnant water.

The well of living water did indeed spring up in her heart continually—the Dropping Well from the Rock; and she listened to its musical flow, and drank of it, and drew from it always fresh for every fresh pitcher presented to her, every thirsty heart that came to her.

When you came to her for counsel, she did not supply you in a moment with some ready-made maxim. She herself had to consult her authority, and her authority was no library of old parchments, no mere record of decisions on other cases. It was a voice, a living voice, with a fresh decision for every case. There was indeed a Book more precious to her than gold and sweeter than honey; but to her that Book was the utterance of One who lives, and speaks, and inspires still.

The Revelation of God through the History of One People, and above all of One Life, was she believed inspired into the hearts of all people to be the food of every life by a Spirit who communes for ever personally with the spirits of men, who teaches, reminds, pleads, enkindles, rebukes, exhorts, comforts,—does all that is involved in the manifold word Paraclete.

In this great Catholic truth, brought forward and pressed on the consciousness of the Church, as so many truths have been, by one section of it, often in disproportion, and with that one-sided intensity which seems the condition of the progress of truth amongst us (who having a mountain to climb, have to climb it for the most part by a road engineered in zig-zags), Loveday had been nurtured by her Quaker mother.

When first I remember her she must have been still young, scarcely twenty. To us she never seemed either young or old. In the external sense youth, with its vigour and eager impulse, was never hers. In its deepest sense youth was hers, with all its freshness and glow of hope, always. Scarcely twenty, yet her life as to personal incident and action was already finished.

Mother's love for her had early passed into the heavens; father's love—protective, self-denying, provident, generous—she had never known. From earliest childhood she had seen her mother pining, fading, dying under her father's neglect and extravagance. The very love which made her quick to see and wise to soften her mother's sufferings, rendered her keen to see and quick to hate her father's selfishness.

Terrible are the lives thus poisoned at the fountain, for which the instinctive affections which are at the root of all love, are at war with the moral principles which are at the root of all right; for which the alternative lies between "calling evil good," and not being able in the inmost heart to "give honour where honour is most due." Terrible when the great sacred parable of human relationships is reversed and falsified, when the stone is given to the children for bread, and the poisonous serpent laid in the child's bosom by the very hand that should have guarded from it. In such a chaos there is no resource but one, to look up from the broken mirror to the unbroken light it should have reflected, from the love which has failed to the eternal love, which is fatherly and motherly at once, and never fails.

And this Loveday Benbow did.

The solitude in which her mother's death left her was, for heart, and mind, and spirit, for all that makes "me," as absolute as that of Moses on Sinai. Below was Miss Felicity worshipping her idol, which she had robbed herself of gold, and jewels, or such equivalents as she possessed, and every precious thing to make what it was; happy once more to be sole priestess at its shrine.

To little Loveday it was no shrine. The utmost which her patient and injured mother had been able in dying to leave her was a legacy of reverent pity, reverence for the unfulfilled relationship, pity for the lost man.

And in this solitude came to her the voice of God. Direct, through no mediating mortal lips, but immediate from spirit to spirit, piercing through all the weeping and the wailing of the people, that voice had reached her; and direct, by no tender human links, except the humanity of God made man, by no gentle steps of love ascending softly from higher to highest, her spirit darted with an arrow's flight to Him. She felt Him always nearest, His voice the clearest to hear, the easiest to understand, the dearest to follow, His love not only the sublime crown and climax of all, but the most familiar and home-like of all; what He cared for, her closest care; what He hated, her most natural indignation. For to her the voice of God was no mere inarticulate music, but a living voice whose "Woe unto you" was as real and as needed as its "Come unto Me"—"Woe unto you" to the oppressor under any disguise, "Come unto Me" for the weary and heavy laden of every colour.

Well for her that her love for God was so true, that like all true love it brought its burden as well as its joy. She did not perplex herself with theories about anthropomorphism. She believed in the possibility of the Incarnation with all its attendant possibilities, and in the fact of the Incarnation with all its results. That God should be "grieved at His heart" to her meant, at all events, something quite real, something at which those who loved Him must be grieved at heart too. That God should be afflicted with the afflictions of Israel of old meant not that He had been roused from the calm of the serene upper heavens to a transitory exceptional pity, but that He pitied all the creatures He had made, and was afflicted with their afflictions always.

And the wronged people of the time, her mother had taught her, were the "black mankind" whom the English people in the West Indies and in America stole, and bought, and sold, and held in bondage, whom the Quaker Society, alone of all sections of the Christian Church, had voluntarily emancipated and refused to hold in bondage, and were labouring to set free throughout the world.

There was something surely in the "listening," the stillness, the "waiting," on which fell clear as a church bell when the whole church was asleep and heard nothing, the conviction that to buy, and sell, and hold in bondage "black mankind" was a sin. During her long nights of weariness and days of pain her spirit had suffered with that suffering people. She had identified herself with them as Kosciusko with his Poland, or Hofer with his Tyrol, or the most loyal Vendean with the fallen race of St. Louis. She had made that wronged people her people, as truly as she believed her God her God.

Not with a blind enthusiasm. She loved too much to idealise. She longed to help too much to suffer herself to be deceived as to what help was needed. That the degradation was also moral, that the chains bound round them were also chains of sin, only made her pity more intense.

Taking them at their worst, stupid, childish, helpless, brutalised, idle, vulgar, as their hardest enemies could picture them, at their worst, and because of the worst oppression had made them, her heart glowed towards them with indignant pity and agonizing love.

To me, through her inspiration, that great anti-slavery conflict became like one of Homer's battles, or the story of the Peninsular War, or of Waterloo, as I have heard them from those who fought there. Pennsylvania and New England, where John Woolman went on his weary foot-pilgrimages of compassion to rouse the "Society" to the wrongs of the slaves, were to me romantic and sacred names. Those quaint old volumes of Quaker literature which she loved to read, with their old-fashioned printing and their more old-fashioned wording and thinking, conscientiously, or unconsciously, plain, to the utmost limit of plainness, as to the picturesque and the æsthetic, even now make my heart throb like some new message from a dear voice of the many now out of sight and hearing to me. As Amice Glanvil used to say, "if the slaves had been white, or olive, or any artistic colour, and instead of woolly hair had rejoiced in raven tresses" or "radiant masses of gold," the world would have awakened up earlier to their wrongs. But Loveday took them at the worst, thick-lipped, woolly-haired, ungraceful, and loved them better for their very ugliness, as a mother her ugly child. In her heart, Amice declared, Loveday called them not black, but bronze, a kind of duller gold.

Too often, indeed, the picturesque of things seen and temporal may blind us to the true poetic of the things unseen and eternal. The whole history of that great wrong was vivid and distinct to Loveday as her own. "How nearly," she used to say, "the monstrous evil of modern slavery had, at the very beginning, been crushed in the germ; how irresistibly and swiftly, once allowed to live, it had grown!"

For centuries the Christian Church had protested against slavery, had fought against it. For two centuries she had vanquished it, and driven it from every realm where she had sway. First of the nations, Ireland, on this point twice in this long campaign, wisest of all by virtue of the wisdom of the warm heart, had renounced this wrong. In 1172 her clergy forbid all traffic in human beings, and accomplished the emancipation of those who had already been sold into bondage, chiefly English men and women, kidnapped and shipped from Bristol. In France the burden of the wrong had rested on the heart of her king, and in 1315, Louis X. enfranchised all crown serfs, declaring that "slavery was contrary to nature, which intended that all men should be by birth free and equal."

And so for two centuries the cry of the bondsman had ceased to go up to heaven from Christendom, at least for any of the children of the Church.

That victory might have seemed won for ever. But, alas! the banner under which it was won was too narrow. And, moreover, the religious wars of the Cross checked the progress of emancipation. It was held unlawful for any Christian to enslave his brethren; but the followers of Mohammed were not "brethren," they were aliens, enemies of God and man, and accordingly numbers of Saracens were sold into bondage without remorse. For broad as the field of Christendom is, humanity is broader. The Church had nobly thrown her shield over all her children down to the meanest. She had freed all Christendom from slavery. She had yet to learn that the pity and the justice of God reach further than the most Catholic Church that has learned to believe in them, and that creation is an earlier claim on His love than baptism.

In this mediæval limitation of emancipation, noble as mediæval Christian emancipation was, lay the little rift which was again to spoil all its music. Through this one weak place came in, slowly at first, and then in overwhelming force, the whole monstrous iniquity of modern slavery, worse than ancient, by all the Christian pity it had to stifle, by the "little grain of conscience" which "made it sour."

The Spanish conquest of Mexico and Peru caused the desolation of two countries. The native races of America were crushed beneath the weight of forced labour, and the native races of Africa were torn from their homes to supply their places. Not without individual protest. Again and again the merciful heart, always beating in the Church, beneath all slumber, and all disguises, rose against this great wickedness.

Cardinal Ximenes refused (even at the instance of Las Casas, in his mistaken hope of saving the Indians,) to sanction the African slave-trade. Charles V. abolished slavery throughout his dominions. The Dominicans condemned it, in contradiction to the Franciscans, and Leo X., when the contending orders brought the question before him, gave decision on the broadest issues. "Not the Christian religion only," he said, "but Nature herself protested against a state of slavery." On two other sovereigns this great wrong weighed heavily—Louis XIII. of France, and Elizabeth of England.

The conscience of Christendom on the heights, above the temptation, was clear. But great torrents of wrong are not stemmed by voices from the heights, but by humble men on the levels, pulling against the stream, or laboriously building dykes of common earth, to turn its course. If kings are to serve a kingdom, it can only be by coming down to serve. And Elizabeth and Louis XIII. did not come down and serve; they stood on the heights and protested. And the thing against which they protested paused for a moment, and then went on.

Self-interest proved stronger than monarchs and Popes. Slavery rooted itself North and South through all the continent of America.

Louis was "uneasy" at having to sign an edict consigning all Africans who came to his colonies to slavery.

Elizabeth had a "religious scruple;" and sending for Sir John Hawkins, the founder of the English slave-trade, expressed her horror at Africans being taken from their country "without their free consent."

To Louis XIII., for the first time probably, the religious argument was used. It was suggested that slavery would be an effective means of propagating the Gospel among those benighted Africans. And the edict was signed.

To Queen Elizabeth Sir John Hawkins promised obedience; a promise which he kept by kidnapping as many natives as he could from the African coast on his next voyage.

Something stronger than "religious scruples" and "uneasiness" is needed to combat such evils.

The Puritan forefathers of Massachusetts also protested. In the first instance, fresh from English political freedom, and their own struggles for religious liberty, they did more than protest. They threw two masters of slave ships into prison, and threatened all future kidnapers with death. In Rhode Island (1527) Roger Williams, the founder, declared all negro servants free after ten years of service.

Yet self-interest and love of money prevailed. The evil crept on. By the middle of the seventeenth century every State south of Rhode Island was slave-holding; and even the Quakers of Pennsylvania were involved both in the traffic and the property.

The mediæval day of emancipation was dying fast, and thick night was coming once more over the nations. The last voices of the nightfall have their especial interest as well as the first voices of the dawn.

Of these Baxter and George Fox are among the last solitary protests.

The last cry of warning from any body of men comes in 1688 from a little community of German Quakers, driven from Kreishiem in the Palatinate to Pennsylvania. Coming, as they believed, to a land of light and freedom, they break into a cry of indignant astonishment at finding "black brethren" held in bondage there by Friends.

"Ah, do consider well this thing," they wrote to the Monthly Meeting at Philadelphia, "you who do it, if you would be done unto in this manner. And if it is done according to Christianity, pray what thing in the world can be done worse unto us, than if men should rob or steal us away, and sell us for slaves into strange countries, especially husbands from their wives and children? If this is done well, what shall we say is done ill?"

Clear and strong, the protest of these humble, single-hearted men rings out through the growing darkness; and then falls the silence of night. The chains of darkness are riveted on America north and south, on the bodies of black mankind, and on the souls of the white. Yet even through the night the silence is not unbroken. There are voices mild and slumbrous as of those who mutter in sleep, or isolated and piercing as of the watchers who dwell in the presence of Him who neither slumbereth nor sleepeth.

In 1727, a London Quarterly Quaker meeting, "uneasy," like Louis XIII., resolved, that the importing of negroes from their native country by Friends is "not a commendable nor allowed practice," and is therefore censured. And in America similar mild rebukes were repeated from time to time. But however uneasy the censure may have made those it concerned, the uncommendable practice went on. Until at last began what Loveday used to call the first voices of the dawn, the morning spread upon the mountains, which she was persuaded should never again die into darkness.

Solitary, scattered, too far apart, and too feeble to be echoes of each other; each separate voice called forth in response to the Voice of the Shepherd; each separate witness, concerned not to "deliver his own soul," but to deliver the oppressed whose burden lay upon him. At last in a few human hearts a love to God and man had sprung up as determined and active as the love of gain in the oppressors.

Self-love had encountered a love of man as real as itself, and when real always stronger, as God is stronger than the world.

In Long Island, William Burling, true to the last to the generous sympathies of his youth, "abhorring slavery from his early youth;" in Philadelphia, the merchant, sober Ralph Sandiford, refusing to accept pecuniary aid from any who held slaves; and Benjamin Lay, scarcely four feet high, with his long white beard, and stoical life, driven nearly to madness by the scenes he had witnessed among the negroes in Barbadoes.

And then, no longer solitary, but leading on a chorus which was swelling daily, Anthony Benezet and John Woolman.

It was good, Loveday thought, to observe that each of these to whom it was given first to wake at the Master's call, and to carry it on to others, and so to wake the Church, had been listening for His voice, were men who had already risen above the common idolatry of the age, who having refused to bow the knee to Mammon, had learned to say No to the prevailing sin around them, before they said Yes to this high especial call.

It was no sin, she said, to buy and sell in the market-place, but it was not in the market-place that the heavenly voices sounded clearest.

Anthony Benezet, coming of a race trained for generations to endurance, son of a father exiled by the revocation of the edict of Nantz (one of the many heroes France had driven from her), holding that the noblest service is rendered with the noblest part of us, that in God's kingdom the highest offices are those which serve men directly instead of paying others to serve, chose the career of a teacher in Philadelphia, rather than that of a merchant. Of silver and gold having none, better gifts were given him; impotent hearts leaped at his word to action.

His tract on the history of Guinea furnished Clarkson with material for his Essay on the Slave-trade, and so gave the impulse to the English abolition movement. His pupil, William Dillwyn, formed the link between the American abolitionists and the English. But most of all Loveday delighted in some manuscript fragments which she possessed from the journals of John Woolman, of New Jersey, a "Minister among Friends," who had died at York in 1772.

"From what I had heard and read," he wrote, "I believed there had been, in past ages, people who walked in uprightness before God, in a degree exceeding any that I knew or heard of now living. And the apprehension of there being less steadiness and firmness among people of this age than in past ages often troubled me while I was a child."

There Loveday used to say was the well-spring on the hills from which the river flowed. John Woolman had learnt that in the Church of God there is no irrevocable Golden Age in the past. The child in the new colony in the new continent of the far West was as near the source of "uprightness," of truth, theological and practical, as the children in the old country in the far East, on whom Divine hands were laid eighteen centuries ago; as the young man whose name was Paul, at whose feet the murderers of the first martyr laid their clothes, on whose dazzled eyes broke the light brighter than the Syrian sun, on whose ears fell the transforming "Why persecutest thou Me?"

The dragons are ever springing anew from the earth, and the heroes are ever needed to encounter them. The Church is a living body, as her Lord is living, not a sculptured copy of more glorious sculpture of olden days. The good Shepherd leads, the good Spirit inspires, now as of old.

Around John Woolman doubtless were countless religious men, admirers of prophets, apostles, and martyrs, and all the dragon-slayers of old, quietly tolerating the dragon of their own days, and even persuading themselves that he was a necessary beast of burden, without whom the soil by which they lived could not be tilled. To John Woolman, "whose concern it was to attend, with singleness of heart, to the voice of the true Shepherd, and to be so supported as to remain unmoved at the faces of men," he appeared in his true form, as the destroyer of moral and spiritual life,—not to be tolerated for an instant, whether the fields could be tilled and the owners live without him or not.

To the sober New Englander the first encounter came in prosaic New England shape. He was asked to write a will bequeathing black mankind as property.

"As writing was a profitable employ, and as offending sober people was disagreeable to my inclination, I was straitened in my mind, but as I looked to the Lord He inclined my heart to His testimony; and I told the man that I believed the practice of continuing slavery to this people was not right, and that I had a scruple in my mind against doing writings of that kind; that though many in our society kept them as slaves, still I was not easy to be concerned in it. I spoke to him in the fear of the Lord, and he made no reply to what I said, but went away; he also had some concerns in the practice, and I thought he was displeased with me.

"In this case I had a fresh confirmation, that acting contrary to present outward interest from a motive of Divine love, and in regard to truth and righteousness, opens the way to a treasure better than silver, and to a friendship exceeding the friendship of men."

He was not lifted above the level of his neighbours. To him sober accumulation of silver would have been pleasant; and to lose at once silver and approbation was not pleasant; but truth and righteousness and the friendship of God were better, and he chose them. The sacrifice required of him was not great, a few silver coins,—the sullen silence of a neighbour. But the principle would have led to any sacrifice. The faithfulness which enabled him to refuse the shillings would have strengthened him to choose the stake.

His testimony began in 1759.

The Hand whose slightest indication he followed led him on. His mind being "in awful retiredness inward to the Lord," the things which grieve the Merciful One became intolerable to him. He could not bear in his journeys as a minister, to "eat, drink, and lodge free cost" with those who lived in ease on the hard labour of their slaves; he could not bear to ride at ease, while the oppressed were toiling, "hardly used," for those who welcomed him. Often weakly, and with a weary body, he travelled on foot from place to place to bear his testimony.

"Though travelling thus on foot was wearisome to his body, it was agreeable to his state of mind," whilst his spirit was "covered with sorrow and heaviness," on account of "friends living in fatness on the labours of the poor oppressed negroes."

In these lonely long walks and "in this state of humiliation, the sufferings of Christ and His tasting death for every man, and the travels and sufferings of the primitive Christians were livingly revived" in him.

His spirit grew freer under the yoke, and he "expatiated" at one of the quarterly meetings "on the tenderness and lovingkindness of the Apostles as shown in labours, perils, and sufferings towards the poor Gentiles," and contrasted with "this the treatment which those Gentiles the negroes received at their hands," and "the power of truth came over those present, and his mind was united to a tender-hearted people in those parts."

Many journeys he made from house to house, earnestly warning the slave-owner against his sin. In 1772 he came on a religious visit to England, and laid before the quarterly meeting at York the wrongs of this oppressed people. And soon afterwards he died.

But in 1774 the Quakers of Pennsylvania and New Jersey disowned any of their members concerned in the slave-trade; and in 1776 they disowned any who refused to emancipate their slaves. Twelve years afterwards not a slave was held by any member of the Society of Friends.

But these were dead. Who held the banner and carried on the fight now?

It was a way of Loveday's that she never spoke of "the dead." Death, she taught us, was not a permanent condition, but a momentary transition, a commending of the spirit, not for the first time nor the last, into the hands of God. "From the hand of God to the hand of God." They lived by the hand of God. They live in his protecting, moulding, perfecting hands for ever.

"These all died in faith," she said, "not having obtained the promises: they embraced them in weakness and in the darkness afar off. Do you think they will not embrace them now, when they are in the light, in fulness of strength, when the fulfilment comes near, as it is coming every day?"

She could never endure a word which seemed to give the visible precedence over the invisible just made perfect.

"We shall not prevent (precede) them that are asleep," she would say. "They went before, and they shall be first."

"But, Loveday," I said one day, "these have overcome, and the battle goes on; you say the great thing for us is to find out the dragons and the heroes now."

"Yes," she said. "It is because God is not the God of the dead, because the prophets are living now, that it is such empty work to build their sepulchres. They are not caring for their sepulchres, but for the issue of the battle in which they shared."

"But how shall we find out the heroes and the dragons?" I asked, thinking that the Frenchmen who destroyed the Bastille, in whose cause (partly) I had worn the foolscap, had not exactly proved the right heroes, and hoping that Granville Sharp would not similarly fail.

"By fighting your own little bit of the battle well under the Captain's eye; by pulling against the stream of little temptations," she said. "It was by refusing the ill-earned shillings John Woolman was made ready to embrace the emancipation of a race. In the intervals of the battle, if there are any, by keeping our armour bright, and listening for the Master's word of command, and being ready to obey it at all costs. Above all by listening. He can direct us through any voice, if we are awake and listening. John Woolman was guided into his right path by a temptation to forsake it; Granville Sharp by an appeal to his kindness from a poor bruised and wounded runaway slave, Jonathan Strong;

Thomas Clarkson by an invitation to write a prize essay; William Wilberforce, by an appeal from Thomas Clarkson. But neither of them would have followed the call," said Loveday, "unless they had been listening for the Voice, and had cared before all things in the world to follow it."

CHAPTER XIII.

It was New-Year's Eve; the eve of the birthday of the new century.

It had been proposed that the most intimate members of our circle should welcome it in together in our house. But this fell to the ground.

Madame des Ormes could not trust herself to be in company on that evening. The old century had slain and buried too much. Its last day would to her but be a "jour des morts." She would keep the vigil alone; and her Claire would, she hoped, sleep it in, and see the new century first in the light of dawn. Her poor child's face ought to be towards the dawn; but scarcely her own.

Miss Felicity preferred being under the same roof with her poor brother, though to him years or centuries could bring but little change.

Loveday was not an observer of days and months, and times, and years. To her every morning brought its new mercies, and began a new life. She sate beside the river which makes glad the city of God; and the river of time flowed by her less heeded. It came from the exhaustless clouds and flowed to the boundless seas, and was flowing always. There were breaks in it, rapids, and calms, but they were not affected by the commencement of what we call centuries. Days and nights were realities; and mankind had its days and nights, but they did not date from such artificial barriers. History and life did not, for her, divide themselves in that way.

So our New-Year's gathering was reduced to our own family and my uncle Fyford. Dick was far away in the Mediterranean, blockading Malta, and defending indefensible Naples; his brief letters, when he wrote, full of nothing but Nelson.

Mrs. Danescombe had desired to have introduced the new century in state with the amber damask uncovered, in the drawing-room, but my father for once overruled her decision, and we met it gathered around the wood fire in the old Stone Parlour.

"Yesterday," said my uncle, "the king will have closed the session; in three weeks the Irish members will be flocking to London, and we shall have the first United Imperial Parliament."

"Scarcely united, I am afraid," said my father. "The old Irish Parliament died hard."

"Everything in Ireland dies hard," retorted my uncle. "Dying and massacring is their strong point. Seventy thousand in the last rebellion, '98. If they could only live and let live, it would be another thing."

"Well," said my father, "in one good thing they are strong—they are against the slave-trade to a man."

"Poor creatures," said my uncle, "they never had any slaves. Property of any kind is not at all events their strong point, and it is easy enough to be generous with other people's."

"You are right as to the slaves, Richard," replied my father rather warmly. "They have never had any slaves since the Irish clergy denounced the Bristol slave-trade in 1172. I should like to see our clergy follow their example now."

"Pray, Mr. Danescombe," said my step-mother, "let politics be banished this one evening. Let us speak of something more suitable to the occasion."

"What would you have, Euphrasia?" he replied, smiling. "Politics are only the gossip of centuries. I wish Dick were here," he added. "You have a letter from him, Piers. Did he say anything about himself?"

"Nothing about himself," said Piers; "scarcely anything about anybody but Nelson."

The "scarcely" meant Amice Glanvil, with whom at the moment our cousin was vehemently in love; "this time," he said, "no boy's fancy, but serious—a matter of life and death!"

"I wonder if the lad says true," said my father. "I should not wonder. The judgment of the people who work under a man, especially that of the young, often squares more with the decision of the centuries, than the judgment in high places. Pity he should be defending that abominable Neapolitan tyranny!"

"There is something in the letter about the execution of a Neapolitan admiral," said Piers, "and the corpse rising up out of the sea and following the ships upright. It was horribly like the Day of Judgment, Dick says; and the poor fellow was called a patriot."

"Poor Caraccioli!" replied my father. "It was a sad business. The noblest helping to sustain the vilest. No wonder the sailors shuddered."

"It was only the weight of the stones attached to the feet, which caused it," said my uncle drily.

"Very probably," replied my father. "I suppose the Day of Judgment will be brought about by some weight proving too heavy at last. Everything must sink or float by some balancing of weights, — even Neapolitan courts. The wretched thing is to keep up things that ought to sink, by weights unfairly attached,—the weight of Nelson's nobleness and England's freedom, for instance, attached to a defunct tyranny, making it float after living men with a ghastly semblance of life."

We were drifting into politics again.

"At all events," responded my uncle, "I suppose you are not too cosmopolitan to rejoice in the capture of Malta."

"One defunct thing safely buried, at all events, that old order of the Knights," said my father. "Yet that had a grand life and meaning in it once."

"Your old admiration, the French republic, has life enough in it, at all events," said my uncle. "As to meaning, I cannot say. Not exactly the same as it began with, certainly. War and victories on all sides. In Italy, Marengo; in Bavaria, Hohenlinden on the 2nd, a month since. The Czar an adorer of the new Alexander—Napoleon Buonaparte. And even as to your blacks, the Convention decrees emancipation in 1794, and their ships ravage your Free Black Colony in Sierra Leone the same year. What French liberty means, is not so plain."

"It means the First Consul!" said my father, very sadly. "Richard, you are a little hard on me. How could I help hoping? Every one hoped twenty years since. Religious men hoped; and even scepticism hoped. Rousseau, and Tom Paine himself, only wanted to destroy the old beliefs, not for the sake of destroying, but because they fancied they had a new panacea for humanity. For once the toiling, silent multitudes—the multitudes the Master had compassion on, Richard, made themselves heard, and not having learned letters, they spoke in whirlwinds. And the first breath of the whirlwind swept away the Bastille, and seemed to let in a flood of light, and make a world of room for men to think, and form, and reform in. No one thought whirlwinds would build. We only thought they would clear the ground for the builders. But so far, in France at least, the builders have not come, and the whirlwind having destroyed the Bastilles, whirls round the dust of their ruins, on and on, blinding men's eyes and stifling their breath. In England, please God, we will begin with building, not with destroying. It makes a very irregular edifice, but at least it does not make a world of ruin. The difficult thing now, Richard," he concluded, with a tremor in his voice, "is not to repent, but to hope. You are a teacher of Christianity. Teach us to hope."

"It is five minutes to twelve!" interposed Mrs. Danescombe.

We had made no plan of greeting the coming century. But silence fell on us all. My father went to the window and opened it. We stood near it with hushed breath, hand in hand, mine in Piers's and father's. I knew Reuben Pengelly and the Methodists were watching in the New Year together; and at the old house across the market-place Madame des Ormes, and Claire, and Loveday were keeping vigil. The still air seemed palpitating with prayer. And clear and deep at last fell the twelve midnight beats of the fine silvery old church bell. It was not tolling in its first new century!

And then, through the still, frosty night, the chimes rang out in their slow, lingering music the Old Hundredth Psalm. We all stood still until the last vibration died away along the empty, unlighted, silent streets.

"The old sacred voice is teaching us to hope!" said my father at last. "'Praise God'—there is no surer path to hope." And then in a lower voice he added, as if to himself, "'all creatures here below.' Yes, we are only below! The whirlwind and darkness are only below. 'Praise Him above, ye heavenly host.' They are doing it. They have learned the way to hope, the only way. Richard," he said, grasping my uncle's hand, "let us have a prayer, and part."

My uncle looked perplexed. Family prayer even was not then a common institution, extempore prayer was an idea that would never have occurred to him, and the Liturgy itself was scarcely conceivable to him, except, as a whole, in its ordered sequence. And no prayer-book was at hand to read out of. Moreover, there was something curious in kneeling except in a pew or at a bed-side. Yet, he did not like to decline. He hesitated a little, and then did about the best thing that could have been done.

We all knelt at the long, low window-seat, the stars twinkling on us through the frosty air, and the little star in Loveday Benbow's window and in Madame's shining across the market-place; and in a low voice my uncle said, "Let us pray for the whole state of Christ's church militant here on earth."

So we entered the new century, as I trust, in communion with the whole church, suffering and battling in this transitory life, and departed from it to the King in his heavenly kingdom; always militant here, and always militant in hope.

CHAPTER XIV.

THE next morning I remember feeling it almost strange how unchanged the world looked. The sun dawned, not on a new century, but simply on a new day.

But then, how much a new day means! A new morning and evening, the only eras nature recognises, illuminating the heavens for their birth and close, with unwearied varieties of festive ceremonial, of gladness and of tender solemnity.

Daily life began again, grouped not around centuries, but around its own endlessly varying work and interests.

Although a century had begun, I could not forget the important event immediately before me and Piers; for it was settled at last that Piers and I were to pay the long-promised visit to our cousins the Crichtons at Clapham.

A journey to London was not indeed as formidable a thing as fifty years before. It could be accomplished, travelling early and late, in three days. My father had been to London six times, Mrs. Danescombe once. There were at least twenty people in Abbot's Weir who had spent some days, at one time of their life or another, in the great city. The chief mantua-maker, if she had not achieved the journey herself, procured her fashions from a friend in the neighbouring large town, who went annually. Still it was distinctly an event. Preparations were made for it about on the same scale as in these days for a voyage by the overland route. It was still a popular belief amongst us that the denizens of the metropolis were, in the lower strata, a people of preternatural cunning and acuteness, against whose machinations inexperienced young persons should be carefully warned; and among the higher classes, endowed with a preternatural perfection of good manners, of which provincial young persons were to stand in awe.

People warned you, congratulated you, gave you solemn auguries, or anxious good wishes, according to their experience and disposition, as at the beginning of a new stage of your existence. Madam Glanvil, indeed, who prided herself on a certain fine old county flavour, and would have held it a degradation to tone down even a certain rough provincialism of accent, to the common smoothness of people who were "no better known in one county than in another," by no means shared this sentiment. I had rather a shrinking from her rough handling of the subject. But that day I had to encounter her; my first New Year's greeting being promised to Amice.

Madam Glanvil received me with her most critical air.

"Don't bring back any fine London airs to me," she said, sitting in her high-backed chair, and pinching me mentally between her fingers, like the pinch of snuff she was taking, "or come mincing your words small like the stones in those new roads of Mr. MacAdam's, till there's no telling what they are or where they come from. Townsfolks are townsfolks, and nothing better, whether the town is where the palaces and Parliament Houses happen to be, or any other. And you Danescobes are better than that, at least on one side. And above all," she added, her manner changing from rough play to sharp and serious warning, and her eyes giving out one of their stormy steely flashes, "don't bring home any new-fangled nonsense of religion or philanthropy. I know where you are going well enough, and the kind of cant they talk at Clapham; calling themselves 'poor sinners' and 'worms of the dust,' and all the time fancying they can see everybody's duties and set everybody right all the world over! That they call 'saving faith.' Believing any wicked lies against their own countrymen and countrywomen, and crying and sighing over any lazy runaway of a black that comes whining to them! And that they call philanthropy. All I know is such religion and such philanthropy don't set foot in Court while the breath is in my body. And that, Bride Danescombe, I hope you quite understand. Methodists there will be, I suppose, as long as there are poor ignorant fools to listen to them, and, as far as I see, among such they do no great harm. It keeps them from worse, as we set fire to the furze when it grows too wild. And I allow they are better than Jacobins. But Methodists in Mufti, Methodists turned parsons, or parsons turned Methodists, and worse than all, Methodists turned philanthropists, that is Jacobins and Methodists in one, I never will abide. And that is what they are at Clapham. I would as soon send Amice to Paris, to learn religion from the French Convention. But there's your father's weak point, and he must take the consequences. Only you understand, I mean what I say. Forewarned is forearmed."

Then, half amused at the warmth she had worked herself into, and pleased to see me unmoved, as I always was when her assaults in any way touched my father, she added, "Poor little maid, you stand fire pretty well. Come with me, and I will show you something, I'll be bound you care for more than Methodism or philanthropy, black or white." And she walked before me up the old oak staircase into her own bedroom, and there, drawing out from a Japan cabinet sundry treasures of lace and ancient jewellery, she presented me with a piece of choice old English point, and with a pendant of amethyst.

I should greatly have liked not to take them. They seemed to me missiles thrown at Granville Sharp, Mr. Clarkson, Mr. Wilberforce, and all the Clapham names I delighted to honour. But Amice clasped the jewel round my neck.

"I know you would like to throw them at Granny's feet," she murmured, "or to subscribe them to an anti-slavery society. But one would be melodramatic, and the other dishonest. So submit."

And I submitted.

Amice and I walked back through the woods to Abbot's Weir. The air was clear and frosty; the river beside which our path wound mingled its tinkling icicles with the rush of its many waters over the rocks.

"I like a day such as this," Amice said. "There seems room in the world to breathe. The sky seems so boundless and yet so near, and one's own body, like the river, so strong and free; not a burden, but a power. But I am not a power!" she added suddenly, "not a river, indeed, nor a rock to stop it,—only a pebble. All women are no more than that."

"Nothing is really a power," I said, "except in its own place."

"Yes, that is your religion," she said; "God in everything. Do you know, Bride, I have been puzzling out church histories and philosophies, and all kinds of books, in my grandfather's library. Books are the only world in which I am free—free to think; and that is why I care about them. If Piers could not make and work, he would understand what books are better. By-and-by he will; and I have come to the conclusion there are only two religions—Pantheism and Dualism. Polytheism is only the popular side of Pantheism."

"Among the heathen, you mean," I suggested.

"Not at all," she replied. "We may call ourselves what we like, but you are a Pantheist and I am a Dualist. You believe in one power—good; and I in two—good and evil."

"Of course I believe there is the devil, Amice," I said.

"You think you do," she said, "but you think of him as of Attila, the scourge of God; vanquished and swept over by the tide of victory ages ago; or as of an extinct race of wolves or tigers, prowling maliciously around the folds, they dare not ravage. I believe in him as I believe in this terrible Napoleon Bonaparte; and I have not the least idea how the war is to end."

"He is vanquished," I said. "I am quite sure how the war will end. But of course I am not sure how this campaign will end."

"You are thinking of Clapham," she said, "and its campaigns against wrongs, against us, Bride Danescombe, the slave-holders. I can tell you how that will end. Slavery will be abolished, sooner or later, in ten, say, or twenty or forty years; that is, such slavery as Acts of Parliament can abolish. But things are not so simple as you and Piers and Clapham think. That is the perplexity about the Bible. All the problems there are so simple. There is Christ and Satan, the world and the Church, light and darkness, scarlet and white, Babylon and the Bride. But here nothing is simple; it is all twilight, and intermixing of every colour, and complications of every form. While this contest is going on in Parliament, generations are finishing the warfare, and passing away to be judged. I am passing on to be judged, Bride, and my poor slaves are passing on, and we shall meet there, and we cannot meet here; and it seems as if I might do everything, and I can do nothing. How can I help believing in two powers?"

Her voice and her whole frame quivered, and she stood still.

"How could I help believing them almost equal?—at least," she added, with a sudden illumination of her whole countenance, "I did believe so till last night."

In all our intercourse, intimate as it had been, implied as all this had been, she had never spoke directly thus before. She sat down on the stump of a tree, and, looking down, began to write on the ground with her foot.

"Where do you think I spent last night?" she resumed, suddenly looking up, her whole face radiant. "In the church, by the tombs of my forefathers. Granny does not know, of course. But I was quite sure it would do me good, and quite sure she would not let me go. So I took Chloe and went. To-day I shall tell her. She will storm, and then she will smile, and she will call me mad, and like me rather the better for doing it, and for daring her. It was so strange, Bride, in the night. The wood was as weird as the church; indeed, the church felt quite homelike after it. Nature is not all good and sweet. She is dualistic at all events. She has tigers and serpents, and hurricanes and volcanoes, and earthquakes and avalanches; and even in her tame state here in England her winds and rivers moan and roar with voices not altogether angelic. They did, at least, last night. To-day the wind is a playmate—the waters are trickling and sparkling, leaping and coursing like horses set free on the moors. Last night they crept and whirled and plashed sullenly into dark, deep pools, where they could drown people; and the winds wailed and laughed and jabbered and made sudden angry rushes at us."

"'Tis conscience that makes cowards of us all," I said, smiling.

"It was not conscience," she said, "and I was not afraid. It was simply the night, the dark side, which is always there. It was the beautiful tamed leopard showing her teeth. They may call her a nurse of men if they like. But she is a nurse of another race, a passionate, tropical creature. If she loves us sometimes, at other times she turns on us, and envies and hates us, and in her rage will do us any mischief she can. One does not know what dark old memories are haunting and maddening her; perhaps it is those mighty fallen spirits of Milton's. Their memories are bitter enough. At any rate, it is very strange to me that men, poets and others, can go on sentimentalising about nature as if she were a beautiful, meek, passive creature, that meant us nothing but good."

"But you got into the church?"

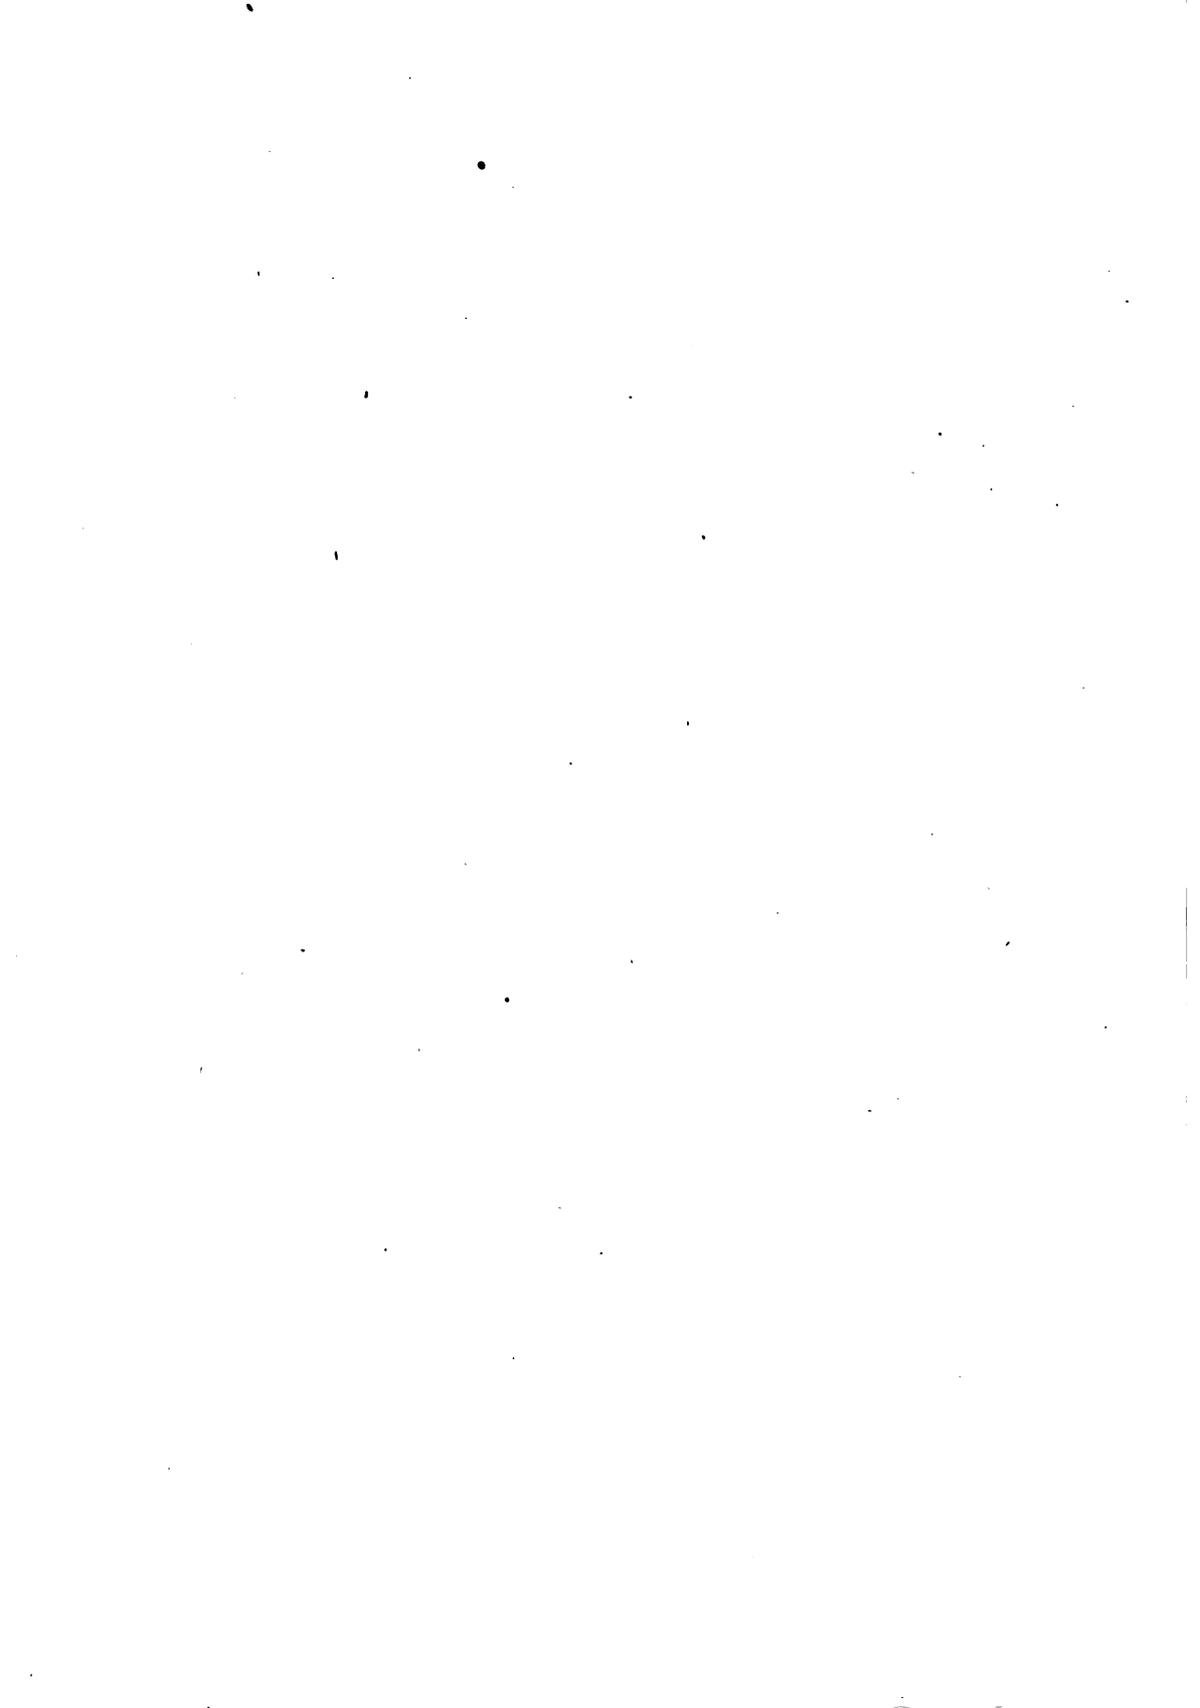

"Yes; there it was different; there I felt at home."

"Yet," I said, "some people would think the church, with the tombs and the silence, far more dreadful at midnight than the woods."

"Because they think the dead are there. We are Christians, and we know there are no dead," she said in a low voice. "The dust of those who died is there—all that nature can touch or dissolve. Certainly I am not afraid of that, no more now than on the first day when they let us kiss the cold hands. If those who have died were there, Bride," she added, her rich voice becoming tremulous, "certainly you and I would feel something very different from fear. There are two tombs there, you know, of my ancestors. I knelt between them, and it helped me. One was the Crusader's, with the crossed feet, the rigid, recumbent, stone limbs and helmed head, and the reverent clasped hands. That helped me. He had lived in his day for something more than hunting and feasting, doing what he liked, and adding field to field. He had toiled through mountain and plain, and done things he did not like, fought and hungered and suffered just to rescue that little sacred spot of earth from the Infidel, just because for three days the Lord who died for us had been buried there. How simple the combat seemed to him! Infidel and believer, Turk and Christian, a plain, visible piece of earth to rescue from undeniable visible flesh-and-blood foes, and he would have done his work, and pleased the Master; as simple as for Abraham, or Moses, or David, or Daniel. How easy for him to dare or to sacrifice anything, everything! So sure he must have been and so single-hearted."

"But it was not so sure! at least it does not seem so to us," I said.

"That is the worst of it. The ways which seem so plain at the time are not always those which shine out unquestionable afterwards. The Elizabethan monument helped me more. The husband on the couch, not recumbent, reclining. I like the recumbent, prayerful effigy better. But of course he would not be there reposing if it did not mean that the active work of life were over for him. Beside him the wife kneeling in prayer, with all the children in the quaint ruffs and robes kneeling behind her. I have always been attached to that family of my ancestors. The whole of them seem waiting, just as I am. The father waiting for death and its awakenings; the mother and the children for life and its duties. So they have knelt for two hundred years. I knelt beside them, and tried to pray. Their path could not have been so simple. The Reformation had come, and the world had grown very entangled and complicated. What numbers of good people thought the word and will of God, others thought heresy and self-will. It must have been like it is now: They had need to pray and wait. It was good to kneel beside them in the silence. There is wonderful help in silence."

"We can seldom have silence like that," I said.

"No," she said; "it seemed to take substance—a silence and a darkness that might be felt. The wind moaned a little through the churchyard trees, but it seemed in another world. It was in another world. It is not spirit, with all its spiritual seeming; it is of the earth earthy, as much as the dust it raises. There was no sound near me but poor Chloe's breathing, and she was too frightened to do anything but breathe, or rather pant. But Chloe was not in any other world. She was not of the things that perish, poor dear, but of the things that abide, for love abides; and she is little else, to God and to me, and to all. She helped me most of all, most of all, Bride. It was through Chloe, Bride, that this wonderful light came to me. It was so strange. It came down on me with overwhelming power, that our Lord, the Son of God—oh, Bride, think!—had died the death of a slave; a death only slaves could die!

"The nature He stooped to is ours—and what stooping!—but the place He stooped to, the death He was obedient to, is that of the Cross, that of the slave.

"I cannot tell you what I felt. It seemed to me as if the Blessed Lord Himself were kneeling there beside me, as He did in Gethsemane, identified with poor Chloe, looking up to God and saying of her and her poor, low, despised race, 'I in thee, and they in Me;' and then round on His Christendom—His England—on me, Bride, saying, 'Why persecutest thou Me?'"

"One with Chloe—that seemed clear! But, oh, Bride, yet also one with me! Stooping as low to reach me as to reach her—lower, since pride is lowest of all, and love is highest of all; and I was full of pride, and she was full of love.

"And I wept as I never wept before. And I said in my heart to Him that I would be one with those poor, despised ones, would live for them and under the burden of their wrongs, until they could be lifted off, and do my best to lighten their wrongs, and succour and sustain them, and lead them to Him, all my life.

"And then the great church bell boomed out midnight, and the chimes rang out, 'Praise God.' And it seemed like a voice of which others might say, 'It thundered;' but to me it said, 'This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased, hear Him.' And my vow was accepted, and I was consecrated to His service, in the least of those His brethren, for ever.

"Oh, Bride, I rose so joyful. And then I kissed Chloe, and we cried together. Poor Chloe is always ready for that. And even the 'how' perplexes me no longer. If He will take us as His servants, it is His work not ours, and He has to show us the way. That is his part, you know, and He will not, cannot fail. But still I am more of a Dualist than a Pantheist. I am sure the battle is very real, and I cannot tell how my part of it will end."

Then we gave each other a long embrace, and at the little gate of the wood we parted, and her last words were—

"Perhaps at Clapham you may find out something, Bride, to help me to help. We are women, you know, now, and it is time our work should begin."

CHAPTER XV.

THE leave-takings before our journey to London were numerous.

Piers and I were, in a way, the property of the whole town. My father's genial ways, his large employment of labour, his real "public spirit," which made the well-being of Abbot's Weir a matter of as grave interest to him as that of his own affairs, his countless unostentatious private kindnesses, of which we were often the ministers, the long establishment of the family in the town and neighbourhood, gave us a relationship to the little community, isolated from all other communities by the steep and muddy lanes which led to it, and by the rocky moors and furzy downs, which bordered its territories on more than one side.

One custom instituted by my own mother had brought me into contact with many of our neighbours. Every Saturday, in my childhood, I, and afterwards Piers, had been dispatched laden with a great basketful of fresh fruit and vegetables from our large garden to various people who had known, or might have known, better days, and who could only be relieved without being wounded, in the form of a kind of hospitality. "You know the sunny slopes on which they grew," my father would say, "and that always makes things taste better." Then there were the workmen, who, according to their prejudices or intelligence, regarded our going as a glorious voyage of discovery, or a perilous venture; and the waggoners, who warned us solemnly against "them racing fast coaches;" the shopkeepers, especially Mrs. Burnaby the confectioner, who made the most original and artistic sweetmeats, and whose shop we only avoided through delicacy, so liberal was her heart, who "expected we should think little of her tarts when we came back, and yet we might find there were a few things they did not do better in London;" and Mrs. Wilmington, the bookseller, whose whole little store of books used to be at our service when childish illnesses drove us to literature, and who always in after-days kept for us the first reading of Sir Walter, and who, having an enlarged mind in her prim little body, assured us that "the best books had not been written in London, whatever anybody might say." And, above all, there was Priscy Pengelly, who condoled with us, and ominously "hoped that we might find things as we left them;" and Reuben, who admitted that it would be a fine thing to see John Wesley's great chapel at the Foundry, "up to London," and to see Squire Wilberforce, but reminded us that London was no nearer heaven than Abbot's Weir, "though, sure enough, it was as near." "As near," he concluded, passing his rough hand over his eyes, "never you forget that. And God forbid I should, though it does seem cruel far away."

And there were all the things and persons that could not be taken leave of—the dear familiar dropping-well, and garden slopes, and the Leas and the Leat, and the hills, and the little children, who could not understand leave-takings, and would so soon forget, and the dear dogs, who did quite understand to their distress that we were going away, but could not understand we were to return, and would not forget.

And Madame des Ormes, who said—

"Your London is not to you what our Paris was to us. That was like the heart of France—poor, passionate, foolish heart—which we loved, and which has lost itself and betrayed us. London is only brain, I think, to England, very busy and clever, but I do not see that you love it. It will not absorb you, my child, or make you forget us; I am not afraid. London is very large," she continued, "but perhaps you will be able to give this packet into the hand of my friend. It is a letter of our martyred Madame Elizabeth, which she will like to see, too precious to send by post. And for you, you must take some little souvenir of the old Frenchwoman for whom you had so much goodness." And she placed in my hand a little bracelet of the Renaissance work, with a locket enamelled with roses and Loves, and also, I suppose to neutralise my vanity, a copy of Thomas à Kempis in French. "You will not object to the little Loves?" she said, clasping it round my arm. "Baptize them, my child, with your own tender spirit, and they become little angels."

In Claire's eyes there were tears, and a tremor was in her voice.

"I have painted you a flower," she said; "I had nothing else."

And she gave me a little painted velvet pincushion, with forget-me-nots.

I missed it the first day of our journey, and never found it till long years afterwards, poor little faded treasure.

Miss Felicity shook her head and compressed her lips. She had never liked people wandering from their kith and kin and all belonging to them, and it was of no use to pretend she did. She had seen no good come of it. People, especially young people, came back fancying themselves half a head taller because they had stood on the top of St. Paul's, and a whole world wiser, because they had seen a few miles more of it. But when you came to think of it, crowds were made up of men, women, and children, and men, women, and children were no bigger and no wiser because there were a hundred thousand of them at hand instead of three. However, she had done her best to ground us well, and she hoped we should come back as good as, on the whole, we went.

Loveday said little. But her dear eyes shone more than usual.

"You will see the men who are fighting the battle for us all," she said. "Don't let anything make you mistake them. The good fight is fought, visibly, remember, not by angels, but by men and women and little children, by poor King David, and by Jonathan, who could not do without the honey. You would not have thought the dear Apostle Peter had walked on the sea, and would die on the cross, if you had heard him that dreadful night, and seen him warming himself at the fire. Did you say you wish I were going with you, my dear? It seems as if it would be a wonderful help; and I shall so miss you, Bride and Piers! But we shall see them all one day, you know," she added, "see them at their very best, and for a long time be at home with them, Bride!"

And she looked so near seeing the just made perfect, with her dear pallid face, and the far-away look in her eyes, that I could do nothing but cry and feel as if the parting were for ever, though I insisted to her that it was but for a very little while.

My father made less of it than any one in words.

"One would think the children were going to be married, or going to emigrate to Nova Scotia," he said, "from the fuss made about it."

He entirely declined to allow that the expedition was anything of importance, but meanwhile he was constantly recurring to it with a tender solicitude which often made me ready to give it up, incessantly planning one small comfort or another, with a certain uneasy sense that he had to be both mother and father to us, and did not exactly know how.

Mrs. Danescombe, on the other hand, told me that it was a most momentous crisis of my life. One could not tell what might not depend on our making a pleasant impression on our cousins, who were, she understood, most influential and highly cultivated people. And she gave Piers and me directions as to forms of address and behaviour which would have infallibly given us an air of elaborately concealed rusticity, had we not forgotten them all and fallen back on our natural manners.

She was most solicitous also as to preparations of clothes, deeming no mantua-maker in Abbot's Weir sufficiently fashionable, until my father suggested that a smaller wardrobe and a fuller purse would be far more advantageous; in consequence of which suggestion we were sent away with light luggage, well-filled purses, and recommendations to observe and bring back the fashions which our "influential" cousins affected.

At the last moment there were so many forgotten trifles to be remembered, and so many last directions to be received, and so many fears of being late, that there was no leave-taking at all.

We were in the weekly coach struggling up the steep hill which led out of the town, Piers and I, launched on the wide world together, in the dusk of the winter morning, before I had time to think.

It was not, however, until the last familiar grey Tor had vanished out of sight, at the next town, where we were to change from the heavy Abbot's Weir coach into what was considered the marvel of speed and convenience which was to convey us by the main road to London, and until the last face and voice familiar from childhood had been left behind, that I felt we were really off.

From the warm nest into the world—"the cold world," as some people called it.

I did not think the world seemed cold at all. Every one was very protective and kind to us, more protective than Piers always altogether liked, he being now for the first time my "natural protector." But how warm the nest had been I had never felt before.

Yet, after all, some of the best warmth of the nest was with me. I had Piers to watch over; and Piers had me. And most delightful it was to belong entirely to each other, and to have the world before us. Since we were children we had not had such long unbroken talks. And now we were better than children, it seemed to us, and the things we had to talk about in what seemed then the long common past, and the long unrolled future, were of endless interest.

And Piers reminded me in so many ways of father, countless little turns of manner and little dry, droll sayings, and little thoughtful attentions to one's comfort. And yet so different: more reserved, more decided, more definite, more of the master about him; people did what he said as a matter of course; less seeing on all sides, perhaps seeing better the one point to be reached; less sanguineness, yet more hope.

It distresses me that I can picture him so little in words; that picture always so clear to me: especially Piers. It was the absence of self-assertion, with the quiet power of commanding because he knew what and when to command, and did not care in the least for ruling for its own sake, but only for getting things rightly done, and people effectively helped, the gravity, with the under-current of joyousness, the quick sense of ludicrous incongruity, with the under-current of tender, helpful, chivalrous sympathy that made satire impossible to him. And when I have put down all these words, I find I have only balanced one tint against another, and left no colour at all; no picture, no individual, but a type. And he was altogether individual, and so full of life and variety, entirely unlike any one else. Well, it would not be easy to describe an oak, the most individual tree in existence, to any one who had not seen it. A branch here, and a branch there, and leaves everywhere, and the branches full of every conceivable twist, moulded by winds of circumstance, and the whole full of all conceivable majestic symmetry, growing by inward laws of life, and the root grasping the earth as if for eternity, and the leaves fluttering each with its own delicate variety of tint and form, and the shadow a shelter that has sheltered and will shelter generations. But there my oak was, and that was enough for me.

THE CHARIOTS OF GOD.

"The chariots of God are twenty thousand, even thousands of angels: the Lord is among them."
"There is none that can deliver out of His hand."

LORD of the howling wastes of life
Where evils watch for prey,
And many a guardian gleam of good
In shadow dies away,
Borne on by Thee in paths unknown,
Well may we trust Thy hand alone,
And suffer angels of Thy own
To shield us while they may.

That hand is faithful to its charge,
It wins no hold in vain;
It brings us under many powers
To one eternal reign;
It bends the will to things that bless,
It hallows their imperfectness,
It sanctions trouble and distress
To make its goodness plain.

Revealer of a heaven encamped Where'er Thy servants go,
By ministries of love to each
That none beside may know,
By wings at many a pass outspread,
By winning joy and warning dread,
We learn the word which Thou hast said,
The truth which Thou wilt show.

And ever to the heavenward eye
On noble aims intent,
Some vision from a farther gaze
At every step is sent.
That which could guide us in Thy name
Beyond the rule of sin and shame—
We shall not question whence it came
Or wonder why it went.

Oh, blessed, blessed is the light
That in Thy light we see,
While good and harm in one restraint
Prevail to prove us free.
Oh, blessed from before Thy face,
With all its bonds of time and place,
The changing convoy of Thy grace
That leaves the heart to Thee.

FROM ROME.

By JOHN KER, D.D.

II.

ROME, Jan. 22, 1873.

MY DEAR DR. GUTHRIE,—I wish to give you some account of the religious services which have been held in Rome at the beginning of the year, as these will convey some idea of how matters are moving both among the English-speaking and the native Christian communities. First, however, it may be well that I should tell you of some corresponding services of the Roman Catholic Church. There used to be a great demonstration at the commencement of the year in the Propaganda Fide College, the immense pile which every English tourist is acquainted with, as abutting on the Piazza di Spagna, just beyond the column of the Immaculate Conception. Since the Italians entered Rome, however, this has ceased, with many other things of the kind, and the chief token of activity there is in pamphlets and almanacs, which occupy the windows of the Bookselling Department. The almanac has its work to do at this season in religious attack and defence, for naturally enough it brings up the question of saints' days and their claims. The Amico di Casa (Home Friend), edited by the late Dr. De Sanctis, did and does good service for gospel truth, and has a circulation of many thousands throughout Italy, spreading salutary information both for body and soul. I observe that one of the publications of the Propaganda is a travestie of it, which shows a sense of its power. But though the demonstration at the great missionary college has ceased, there has been another, held also annually, in the Church of St. Andrea della Valle. This church is in one of the most populous parts of Rome, immediately beyond the Pantheon, and is said to occupy the site of the Curia of Pompey, where the senate sat on the day of the assassination of Cæsar. The statue of Pompey, which stood here, and at the foot of which "great Cæsar fell," may still be seen in the Palazzo Spada, not far distant. The modern church of St. Andrea is large and handsome, and contains, among other monuments, the tomb of the well-known Pope Eneas Sylvius, who held the Council of Basle. It is, beyond others in Rome, devoted to the celebration of Epiphany, and is therefore selected for missionary services at this season. Behind the altar there is an immense structure representing the stable, with the Virgin Mary and the Child Jesus, the shepherds and the Magi, all dressed in the gorgeous and somewhat fantastic style common in Roman churches, and very unlike what one would think of as the humble reality. The oxen fill up the background, with a distant landscape and sky, where the star appears, and the whole, as one may suppose, draws crowds of spectators throughout Epiphany week. Mass is celebrated according to different rites, Latin, Greek, and Armenian, and sermons are delivered by celebrated preachers in various languages—English, German, French, and Italian. At the side of the church are erected a lofty and roomy pulpit, and, for those whose fervid style of oratory demands it, a still more spacious platform, with a chair and table, and large crucifix standing beside them. Owing to our own services in the Week of Prayer being held at the same time, I was unable to be present until the last day, but it gave me a general idea of the whole. In the forenoon, Monday, the sermon was in English, by the Rev. P. G. Lambert, of the Society of Jesus, on the Adoration of the Virgin. The preacher, a spare, elderly man, took the pulpit, and gave a quiet, unimpassioned, and, as it seemed to Protestants, weakly discourse on the merits of the Virgin, beginning with the Council of Ephesus and Pope Celestine, and ending with the decree of Pius IX., "a greater," as he said, "than Celestine," affirming the Immaculate Conception. The world was in a sad state just now with revolution and materialism, but one great comfort was that so many confraternities for the veneration of Mary existed, and that such miracles as those of Lourdes were testifying to her power. He deplored the state of England, which was so rich and prosperous, but had such masses without any consciousness of God, while here every street corner showed the regard for the Blessed Mother. In London there were once thirteen churches dedicated to the Virgin, but now their sites were known only to antiquaries. Yet there was hope for England; faith was returning, and there was one country united to her, Ireland, which had never ceased to call the Virgin "blessed." There might be some thirty English present, conspicuous most of them by their Murray, and about as many more English youths connected with Roman seminaries. I know of one effect of the sermon. An English lady who has been led through High Church teaching to the verge of the Church of Rome, but whose chief difficulty consisted in the adoration of the Virgin, was brought here by her guides to have it removed. Meanwhile the result has been the reverse. The dose was too strong, and has driven her farther from joining the Church than she was.

The afternoon service, however, was much more interesting. It began at 3.30 P.M., and lasted till hundreds of tapers lighted up the shrine of Bethlehem, leaving the rest of the church, in twilight gloom, filled by a picturesque audience of not less than two thousand persons, chiefly of the lower class of population, in all attitudes and in rapt attention. The preacher was the Rev. D. Rinaldo Deggiovanni, apostolic missionary, one of the notable orators of the church, and prior of St. Mary of Consolation, a dark young man, of middle size, in the black robe of the seculars, girt tightly round the middle, and leaving him free to traverse the platform, which he preferred to the pulpit, and to use all the skill of dramatic action, which he employed to perfection. Sometimes he paced it in its length, poised himself on its edge, beseeching those nearest him, drew himself up, and appealed to God or the Virgin, apostrophized the cradle at one time, the crucifix at another, exhausted himself in stormy passion, and threw himself into the chair till he and the audience recovered, and then commenced slowly again while he sat, started to his feet, and wrought his way to another climax. The sermon, which lasted more than an hour, was on the Pontificate of Rome, and there was great tact shown in the way in which he sought to enlist sympathy for the Pope without exposing himself to the charge of sedition. "The Vicar of the Infant of Bethlehem" was the favourite appellation, varied occasionally by "the aged prisoner of the Vatican." He spoke first of the duration of his throne, while others had perished. Assyrian, Greek, Roman, where were they? while his remained; and now to demonstrate it to this age, the man who three short years ago was master of Europe, but who deserted the Church in its crisis, was being laid in his sepulchre in a foreign land. He numbered up the sects in long array that had opposed the Church—Arians, Pelagians, Donatists, Albigenses, Lutherans, Calvinists, ending with Evangelicals. He enumerated the disputes of councils that had been hushed at last when the Vicar of the Infant of Bethlehem spoke, closing with the greatest, the Immaculate Conception and the power of Infallibility. It might be said there were unworthy popes, but the authority lay not in the man but in the office, and even as to men where had there ever been such an array of heroes, saints, and martyrs? Of above two hundred and fifty, not more than five or six had fallen short of their position; and was not this proof of a divine hand? To whom was Europe indebted but to the Pontiff of Rome for civilisation, for schools, and universities? Who but he had given to this city all the attractions of art and literature that drew to her the nations of the earth, and what benefit would the citizens of Rome derive from it, if by their ingratitude they compelled the Holy Chair to seek for its utterances another centre? Towards the close he held up a tract which he said had been given to him by an old woman, and which had the title "Come to Jesus." She had received it from some of these English Protestants who were doing so much mischief, and telling simple people that they could come to Christ and be saved without priests, or fasting, or prayers. By what means he wondered were they then to come? These English Protestants, he continued, did not know the harm they were doing, but let them go back to their own country and meet Catholicism there, where it was returning to its old seats, and let us pray for the conversion of England. The sermon finished by a vehement appeal with outstretched arms to the Virgin, who held the infant Christ in her arms, to interpose in this crisis of the Church's history. "Cause Him," were the closing words, "Blessed Virgin, cause thy Son to listen."

The sermon was very complete as a rhetorical effort, and was evidently listened to by the dense audience with deep interest. It did not, however, appear to produce much practical effect, if one might judge by the way in which the pecuniary appeal was responded to. It was in behalf of the restoration and adornment of the altar of St. Andrew, which had fallen into disrepair, but though the collecting bags were shaken in the faces of every one around me, I scarcely saw a single soldo cast in. It may be this is no test, for the difficulty of inducing Italians to part with money for any public object is confessed by all. Yet they are admirers of the powers of speech, and where sermons are advertised, especially if there is any attraction in the speaker, there is sure to be an audience. One can see still the shadow of that power which was wielded by a Hortensius and a Cicero. It is a ground of hope for this country when divine fire shall go forth with winged words. I could not help feeling sad at heart for the hundreds round, while the orator ran nimbly over the ages and councils and schools, and wrought himself into frenzied passion about the wrongs and insults heaped on the martyr Pope. It was not merely the utter absence of reason or argument, and the low estimate his appeals set on their understanding, but the entire want of any attempt to touch the heart or conscience, or to deal with his audience as men and women possessed of souls. The whole effort was to build up through the pontificate an external wall round them, and to cut them off as much as possible from every influence that would bring them into direct and independent contact with God and his truth. It is the tendency of the system in all its parts, and it has brought about that pupilage of Roman Catholic countries which shows itself so much in political and civil life.

But it is time for me to leave this, which was meant to be merely introductory, and to pass to some account of the meetings that have been held by the Protestants of Rome in the beginning of this year. They took place, as you know, in union with the Week of Common Prayer, which is now held so generally by Protestant Christians throughout the world, and nowhere, perhaps, with so much enjoyment and profit, as where they are separated from the great body of their brethren. The services occupied a week, alternating generally between the forenoon and evening, and the subjects of address and prayer were those recommended by the Council of the Alliance, adapted to the special circumstance of this place and time. They were held in the large room of the Rev. Mr. Van Meter, not far from the Piazza di Spagna, which will hold above one hundred, and which was always well filled, the attendance and interest continuing unabated to the close. Ministers and members of all the different Protestant Churches joined in them, Episcopalian, Presbyterian, Congregationalist, Baptist, and Methodist, and whatever little mannerism there might be in the tone caught in the particular family, the spirit was one of the most marked unity, and it would have been impossible from anything in doctrine or sentiment to have said to what section of the Church of Christ any one speaker belonged. I see that the Tablet has been speaking of the jangling mixture of the Protestant sects in Rome, and the discord among them; but it is their acknowledged presence there, and specially this peaceful union in prayer, that forms the great grievance. One could not but recollect the time, not long gone by, when English tourists were watched by the papal spies in the street and hotel, when the possession of a Bible subjected its owner to serious trouble, and when the smallest meeting of Christians for prayer was a criminal offence. The great wrong felt by the prisoner of the Vatican is, that he is deprived of the power of persecution, and one of the strangest things felt at present by Protestants in Rome, is this sense of freedom in the old home of the Inquisition. The cluster of Protestant churches to be found outside the gate at the Porta del Popolo is one of the remaining signs of the past times of restriction, when service even in English was thrust out of Rome, and driven to occupy secluded spots, with the constant threat of prohibition hanging over it even there. One of these churches, the Presbyterian, was granted to the Italian Protestants for their meetings during the week of prayer, as no place could be found by them, in Rome itself, commodious enough for their gathering. They assembled here for six evenings, from Monday to Saturday, and the same harmony was seen and felt as among the English-speaking communities. There were never less than two hundred, and sometimes considerably more, and the services were conducted by the different ministers and evangelists, whilst members of the churches joined also in prayer. I was present at two of these meetings, and it was deeply interesting to hear the thanks they gave to God for the new position in which they stood to Him, not only as free before men, but in the liberty of Christ's gospel. I observed that many of them joined in singing the hymns without book, though they had it at hand, which showed an acquaintance with the contents, and was a test of attendance on ordinances, for the knowledge they possess has been gained by most of them in two years. The Protestants, as might be supposed, have been drawn almost entirely from the class of the population that can read, though most of them are in humble rank in society. Another thing I remarked as being in contrast with the Roman Catholic churches, was that the men were more numerous than the women. This is usual in the Protestant Italian meetings. The women remain longer attached to the Romish Church, and are often a source of difficulty to the Protestant husband, but when they once embrace evangelical truth they are the most zealous. The opposition these converts have sometimes to meet among their friends is a good test of their sincerity, for the saying of the Saviour holds good, that "a man's foes are those of his own household."

On the week following that of prayer, two meetings were held in the large room Vicolo d'Alibert, at which the labourers among the Italians in Rome gave some account of their work. These meetings were well attended, and a few of the particulars given may be interesting to you, remembering, as before mentioned, that all these agencies have been in operation for little over two years. M. Ravi, Presbyterian minister, has been twenty months in Rome, and has generally about eighty hearers, as many as the place will hold. About forty have formally left the Church of Rome, and give evidence of having received the gospel truth. Interesting facts regarding some of these were given. He preaches four or five times a week, and has schools and classes at work. MM. Ribetti and Meille, Waldensian, have two localities for preaching, and four regular services. In the one, Via Sodderini, near the Corso, they have above a hundred of an audience; and at their communion, lately, eighty sat down in fellowship. The greater part of these were Romans who have joined the Church since freedom entered. They have three day-schools attended by more than one hundred children, and a Sabbath-school attended by sixty. Mr. Cote, of the American Baptist Church, has no locality as yet in Rome, but preaches in Mr. Van Meter's school in the Trastevere, and visits the villages and towns around Rome. He gave some details that showed an awakening of the attention of people to Bible truth in some of these places. M. Gavazzi said he was not a local, but a travelling evangelist. He preached from time to time in Rome, and they had a regular labourer, M. Conti, at their locality, 9, Via di Corallo. They had seventy-five converts from the Church of Rome, and had added five during last month. They have female readers of the Bible, and a sewing society for assisting the poor in household work. They have day-schools, with a hundred and ninety pupils, and a Sabbath-school with about eighty in attendance. M. Sciarelli, of the Methodist Church, has at his regular worship fifty, and at his meetings of evangelisation a hundred and twenty, the latter being directed more to those who are feeling their way to truth either from the Church of Rome or from materialism.

This kind of service is in use also by the other evangelists, and is useful, indeed indispensable, in the state of mind of many of the people. There are fifty-eight regular members in the Methodist Church, and different agencies at work, which they hope to make greatly more efficient when the new property they have acquired, at a price of £10,000, is fitted up. Mr. Wall, of the English Baptist Church, has not yet secured a fixed place, but preaches in the tent belonging to Mr. Van Meter, in a small garden in the Via Laurina, off the Corso. He has above a hundred regular hearers, and very interesting classes of young men and women. At a meeting on the evening before, twenty came to converse with him as inquirers, several soldiers among them. A young Italian, in connection with no society, and on his own responsibility, has been meeting with soldiers to read the Scriptures, and has a class of thirty-five. Some very interesting statements were given by Mr. Wall and others, illustrating the peculiar state of mind among many of the people just now, struggling out of Romanism, and ready to stumble into materialism, from having lost faith in the priests. They look with jealousy on any one who speaks of religion as if it were an attempt to fasten on them the old fetters. Besides these agencies, there are the schools carried on by Mrs. Gould, including above a hundred children; and those of Mr. Van Meter, which had nigh three hundred, till they were closed lately by the government, on the ground that some regulations had not been complied with. The difficulty has been obviated in regard to one of the schools, the most important in the Borgo Vecchio, near St. Peter's, and there is good hope that the others will be re-opened in due time. The government requires a certificate of fitness from all who engage in secular teaching, but on the religious question they observe neutrality, and, so far as I can see, are equally just to all parties. The great difficulty, however, in establishing evangelical schools is the procuring men and women who are capable of teaching the secular branches, and who will, at the same time, infuse a Christian spirit into all the instruction. This is a question for time, wisdom, and patience, but it is worth them all. As it is, upwards of six hundred children are now in Protestant schools, and are obtaining not only the ordinary elements of a good education, but an acquaintance with Bible truth of the most important kind. I have been present at a number of them, on examination and on ordinary days, and remarked the care bestowed both on the mind and heart. They are taught to repeat such portions of the Scripture as the parables of the good shepherd, the good Samaritan, the prodigal son, the sermon on the Mount; and these carried into their homes, will spread the knowledge of the gospel, and awaken the desire for the entire New Testament.

Besides the meetings on Italian evangelisation, we had one on the Jewish mission in the Ghetto, when the Rev. Dr. Philip and the Rev. Mr. Burtchael gave some account of their work there. There are five thousand Jews in that part of Rome, most of them in a condition of the most abject poverty. The long persecution of ages was lightened by the present Pope, and has entirely ceased with the entrance of the Italians. No part of the population of Rome welcomed the flag of Victor Emmanuel with more enthusiasm than the poor Jews. There was a tax which had been imposed on them by Vespasian, the equivalent to what they had been accustomed to contribute for their own temple, and during all these centuries they have had to pay it at the Capitol till two years ago. Now at last, for eighteen hundred years, they are on the level of their fellow-citizens in political liberty, but it will require much labour and Christian sympathy to raise them from the social degradation into which ages of oppression have sunk them. They receive visits kindly, thought is being stirred, but schools provided with some industrial department are necessary, and the difficulty is the same here, as elsewhere, to procure building ground at a possible price. Most of the property in the Ghetto and neighbourhood is in the hands of cardinals, religious houses, or princes under their influence, and there is almost no means of leasing a small place. Yet the surface of Jewish prejudices is softening, Rabbinism as a system is dead, and the question turns upon the Bible with those who have any faith in the religion of their fathers.

I had intended in this letter to give you some account of the Protestant publications in Rome and Italy, which are now considerable; also of what is being done by the Bible and Tract Societies, and the religious tone of Italian literature in general. But I must defer this. From what I have said, you will see that there is a good deal of work going on with some measure of result. Sometimes I fear that a false impression is created unintentionally in enumerating all the agencies, for, after all, they are little in the midst of the mass of indifference which prevails. I say indifference, for this is the great evil to be feared in the future. The fire-damp of a false religion is followed by the choke-damp of materialism. One of the worst things about Romanism is, that it corrupts in so many the religious appetite, vitiates it so much, that it becomes unfitted for the most wholesome food. In multitudes the capacity of faith seems burned out, and only dead ashes are left. If the mother of all the churches, they say, is false, what trust can we have in those which have sprung from her? Religion is an invention for the benefit of interested parties, and we have had enough of it. Others again say that positive forms of Protestantism are good for the northern nations. We see that the Teutonic races and North America have grown strong by them, but they are unsuited to the taste of southern races. How long it may take for the tone of religious feeling, so terribly abused, to recover, we cannot say. There is, as yet, no general awakening in Italy as a whole, nothing even approaching to what took place at the era of the Reformation, when almost every town had its sympathizers with the gospel, and its earnest students of the New Testament, when men like Michael Angelo, and women like Vittoria Colonna, loved it in their heart. The movement was then quenched in blood, burned out in the fires of the Piazza dei Fiori—the Smithfield of Rome—or buried in the dungeons of the Inquisition, worked here, as in Spain, with tremendous energy. In our day, we have one great advantage, the possession of religious freedom, and the prospect, humanly speaking, that the political despotism of the Roman papacy has seen its close. But we have the consequences of the terrible wrong it did to conscience and reason and Christianity, to contend with. Nevertheless, the time of reaction from indifference and religious apathy will also come. Men cannot remain for ever satisfied only with the things they see and handle. The effort to evangelise Italy, though small in result compared with the field, is sowing seed throughout the land that will appear some day. There is evidence that it is laying hold. Here and there, single individuals, and small companies, where they were not expected, come to light as friends of Bible truth, and when God sends the man, or men, whom He keeps in reserve for his great times of spiritual upheaval, they will gather in the fruit of what is now being done by humble but devoted workers in preparing the way.

Yours ever sincerely, JOHN KER.

PERFECT PEACE.

By H. A. PAGE.

LIKE a Dead Sea, lie behind me
 Sinful pleasures of the past :
 My good Master hath inclined me
 To his holy law at last.

Long and patiently He bore me,
 While I wandered far astray,
 Till the briars and thorns tore me,
 And I fell beside the way !

Seemed no sweetness on the token
 He held forth to me the while !
 Though my spirit proud was broken,
 On my face no more the smile.

Sadly rough the ways around me ;
 Desert lands behind, before ;
 Strong the terrors were that bound me,
 As a slave, lashed to his oar !

Yet would I make no surrender,
 I would walk my way alone ;
 Heard I oft his accents tender,
 But their might I would not own.

Still my pain pressed keen and keener,
 Till I cried in my despair :
 "Have mercy, Lord, on me a sinner—
 Poor and bleeding, torn and bare !"

Then He touched me with his finger, Saying, "I will make thee whole :
 Arise, arise, no longer linger ;
 Rise, press onward to the goal !

"Still the rocks and thorns may wound thee,
 Bleeding feet make heart to fail,
 But a peace complete is found thee,
 'Anchor fixed within the vail.'"

Honey on the rod I tasted,
 Joy stole on my heart anon ;
 Thought of all the strength I'd wasted,
 Made me eager to atone.

Storms, I know, are still before me,
 Seas of trouble run not dry ;
 Faith is mighty to restore me,
 Though the waves swell mountains high.

CUTHBERT OF LINDISFARNE.

PART III.

WHILE Cuthbert was seeking communion with God amidst the loneliness of Farne, a formidable plot to withdraw him from his solitude was being concocted at Twyford on the Alne. Wilfrid having been uncanonically deposed from the see of York, a synod of bishops, robed and mitred, and presided over by Theodore, Archbishop of Canterbury, met to dispose of the sees of Hexham and Lindisfarne, parts of the deposed prelate's diocese; and it was unanimously resolved, with the concurrence of the king, to elect to the bishopric of Hexham Cuthbert, erewhile the missionary prior of Mailross and Lindisfarne, now the renowned anchoret of Farne. In disposing of these dioceses, the archbishop, as well as the king, acted in direct defiance of the decree of the Bishop of Rome.

Vainly was messenger after messenger dispatched to Farne to require the presence and concurrence of the bishop elect. For never limpet clung more closely to the rocks of Farne than did this hermit to his solitary cell, endeared to him by the struggles and the victories of nine quiet years. But the synod of Twyford was by no means discomfited. Scarcely had the last messenger brought Cuthbert's final refusal, when King Egfrid equipped his royal bark, and sailed for Farne with many of the nobles of his court, Theodore, Archbishop of Canterbury, an imposing array of mitred prelates, and the Abbot of Lindisfarne in dark coarse clothing. The hermit, who for some years had scarcely been seen by men, came down to the landing-place to receive the august visitors. His face and form were worn by fasting and vigils, his figure was somewhat bowed, though he was hardly in middle age, and his whole appearance bore traces of feeble health and prolonged austerities. His coarse garment of undyed wool had been worn all too long, and his sandals had not been removed for six months. Then there was King Egfrid in his royal robes, embroidered with gold, and with the crown upon his head, the prelates in all their ecclesiastical splendour, and the attendants gorgeous in those richly ornamented and brightly coloured garments which the Anglo-Saxons loved. Nothing removes this incident more completely into the sphere of a simpler religious age, than the fact that this brilliant assemblage fell down as one man at the feet of Cuthbert, beseeching him with many words and abundant tears that he would reconsider his determination. He resisted, with weeping and urgent entreaties that he might be left to his solitude, and surely the nolo episcopari never came from truer lips! But persuasions so influential, backed as they were by the solicitations of the community at Lindisfarne, at last prevailed, and on Easter Sunday, 685, he was consecrated Bishop of Hexham, at York, by Theodore and six assisting prelates. Soon afterwards, however, he effected an exchange with Eata, Bishop of Lindisfarne, and once more found himself among his beloved monks in the sea-girt monastery of Holy Island.

The bishopric of Lindisfarne still continued to be mainly a missionary bishopric, dealing chiefly with a population of conquered races, including the Britons of Cumbria, a province which had recently succumbed to the Northumbrian arms. The needs of such a people rekindled the old evangelistic fire in Cuthbert's breast, and we know not which is worthiest of our admiration, the athletic monk who in the enthusiasm of youth re-conquered Northumbria for Christ, or the feeble-bodied recluse of Farne, coming forth from his congenial retirement to lead the toiling life of an itinerant preacher to newly-baptized barbarians. Cuthbert retained the simple dress and habits of the cœnobite, scorning the worldly pomp with which Wilfrid and others had already surrounded the episcopate. No obstacle frustrated his intention of preaching in every corner of his diocese. He spent two years in itinerating, baptizing, confirming, instructing, preaching, giving alms, crowds hanging upon his words, and fame, not content with celebrating his almost superhuman labours, attributed to him the possession of miraculous powers. He seems to have been very familiar with the New Testament, and to have drawn his chief inspiration from its unsullied spring, and it is not wonderful that the words of St. John, read with the good Baisil many years before on the banks of the river of death, were continually on his lips. The parochial system, introduced into England by Theodore, was yet in its infancy, especially in the north; so the converts were altogether dependent on the ministrations of itinerant monks. As the chief pastor, Cuthbert followed the sheep as of old, sometimes on horseback, oftener on foot, fording rivers, crossing bogs, climbing hills, and scaling cliffs, penetrating forests, seeking souls for Christ everywhere. There was no hamlet so obscure as to be unvisited, scarcely a dwelling too isolated or difficult of access to be reached by the untiring evangelist. Of the many hundred discourses delivered during his episcopate, we have unfortunately no record. But Bede describes his eloquence as a torrent, and its results testify to its power.

But another source of power lay in his large-heartedness, sympathy, and tenderness. The hermit, who in his deepest seclusion never refused consolation and counsel, was brought as the bishop into direct contact with the lives and woes of men. In the various accounts which have come down to us of his intercourse with all classes, from the nobles of Egfrid's court, who knelt before a higher nobility than their own, to the thralls who fell with superstitious reverence at the feet of the "saint," the feature on which we linger the most lovingly is the intensity of the tenderness and sympathy of that altogether human heart. The memory of the anchoret might have perished, but that of the loving man who had an ear for all sorrows and difficulties, whose genial presence enhanced the domestic joys he could never know, whose active sympathies lightened the woes he could not remove, and who sent none empty away, abides in the freshness of perpetual youth in the northern counties of England. There is a great beauty about Cuthbert's character. He was unworldly in the highest sense of the word. For himself, as for others, his highest aim was personal sanctification. Everywhere in that troubled day he appears as a mediator, a healer, a peace-maker. While the development of the essentially Roman spirit produced Wilfrid, Cuthbert, though he had much in common with the early solitaires of the Thebaid, and with the austere ascetics who followed the rule of the great Abbot of Iona, was the representative of the distinctively Christian spirit. He was a man of prayer and solitude and intense mortification of the flesh. But the evangelistic spirit was stronger in him than the ascetic spirit, as is seen in his acceptance of the bishopric. For it was not to enter into the great strife of the day that he left Farnes, not to range himself among Wilfrid's friends or Wilfrid's foes, but to preach the gospel and seek Christ's lost sheep. He was a true Englishman, alike in his virtues and failings, he grew out of our native soil as a man of the people, he spoke with the unpolished accent of Northumbria, he had tilled the ground and kept the sheep, he knew the hopes and the sorrows of rustic life, his hands were hard with manual labour, he was not indebted to Italy for learning or polish, he practised with true English sincerity every precept that he taught, and preached the sternest truth with a boundless charity. His unfeigned piety and humility, his simplicity of manner and unostentatious deportment during his brief episcopate, entitle him to profound respect. Not all the varnish with which his character has been overlaid by his biographers, nor the absurdities attributed to him by the credulity of later periods, have been able to conceal the purity and brightness of his piety, which, amidst the darkness of that age, burns and scintillates like a light shining in a dark place. That for eight centuries he was the most popular of British saints, and that the ruthless iconoclasm of the sixteenth century defaced, but was unable to destroy his memory, are testimonies not to be either overlooked or despised.

When two years of his episcopate had expired, his health gave way under exposure and over-fatigue, and feeling that he must shortly resign his diocese, he set out on a last visitation, the earnestness with which he exhorted men to repent and believe being intensified by his own approaching departure. On this, as on every other occasion, crowds flocked to hear him, and the sick were everywhere brought to receive his blessing. One of his last public acts was the consecration of a church at the great monastery of Whitby, where he was the guest of the Princess Elfreda, the abbess who had some years before obtained an interview with him on Coquet Island. Both knew that this was their last meeting, and the beautiful abbess somewhat exhausted Cuthbert by her urgent hospitalities, and "her eager and pious curiosity, anxious to know and do everything." As they dined together, and she, woman-like, pressed him to eat of every dish, he became abstracted and dropped his knife, upon which she remonstrated, when he laughingly replied, "I cannot eat all day; you must give me a little rest." During the consecration, she rushed up to the bishop in breathless haste to ask him for a memento of a monk whose death she had just heard of, and it appears that her youth and earnestness were an excuse for the ill-timed request. At Whitby, oppressed by Elfreda's hospitalities, his episcopal duties, and the growing feebleness of his health, he became sleepy at the times which he usually spent in devotion, and it was noticed that he used to stand several hours in the water to ensure wakefulness enough to enable him to commune with his God. But disease gained strength, and feeling death approaching, he paid a last visit to Verca, abbess of Tynemouth, a holy woman for whom he had a great esteem. He was received magnificently, but his sufferings and evident feebleness so impressed his friend that she presented to him as the last pledge of friendship a piece of fine linen for his shroud. Nor was the singular gift thrown away. He then resigned his bishopric, and after celebrating Christmastide with the beloved monks at Lindisfarne, retired to Farne. As he left the Holy Island, the monks crowded into the sea round the boat, inquiring earnestly when he would revisit his cathedral, Walshead, an aged man, asking him definitely, "When may we look for your return?" "Then," replied Cuthbert, "when you shall convey hither my dead body." So retaining no token of his office but his pastoral staff, he tore himself from the brethren who pressed into the sea with many tears to receive his parting blessing, and went forth alone to die.

It was the depth of winter, and the frequent storms often rendered Farne inaccessible. Cuthbert only lived two months. Stretched on a bed of stone, dressed in the coarsest clothing, emaciated, tremulous, exhausted, untended, the fierce winter winds penetrating almost unchecked into his cell, suffering from a most painful malady, while the furious surges made discordant music without, he tasted supreme joy in the presence of his God. No fears, born of error, disturbed his holy calm. His feet were on the rock, and He who in all ages has been with His sheep in the wilderness led him beside the waters of comfort. On the 27th of February, 687, Cuthbert was attacked by the serious illness which in three weeks carried him off, and from this date we have touchingly minute details, Bede having taken down the narrative from the lips of Herefrid, abbot of Lindisfarne, evidently a careful as well as a loving recorder of the events.

Herefrid happened to visit the island on the very morning of the attack. He went with the object of receiving Cuthbert's exhortation and blessing, and on arriving at the cell made the usual signal. A groan was the reply, as Cuthbert feebly advanced to the window. It was known that he had suffered from a tumour ever since his recovery from the plague at Melrose, and Herefrid asked him if he were experiencing a relapse of this malady. His answer was so far dubious, that the abbot believed that it was "his old infirmity," and as the tide was favourable, he was preparing to quit Farne after craving a blessing upon himself and his brethren. But Cuthbert's further words filled him with uneasiness. "Do as you say—embark and return home in safety, and when God shall have taken me to be with Him, bury me in the front of this, my oratory, close under the eastern side of the cross which I have carved with my own hands. You will find on the north side of my dwelling a stone coffin hid in the ground, the gift of Cudda, the venerable abbot. In this place my body, wrapped in the linen which I have kept for my shroud out of love for the Abbess Verca, the friend of God, who gave it to me." On hearing this, Herefrid begged Cuthbert to allow some of the monks to remain to attend on him, but he refused, as he desired to be left alone with his God. He requested his friend, however, to return before many days. So the abbot and his monks sailed back to Lindisfarne with heavy hearts, and after they had fully detailed their grievous tidings, they resolved to unite themselves in ceaseless prayer. By night and day were supplications made by hearts smitten with a common grief, and tear-dimmed eyes all through the short day were turned to Farne, where the beloved bishop lay on his bed of stone, unsustained save by the everlasting arms. Through five dreary days of storm the monks prayed, watched, and waited, and when the gale moderated, some of them sailed for Farne, where they found Cuthbert not in his cell, but in the guest-chamber at the landing-place, almost speechless with exhaustion. Only Herefrid remained with him. After bathing with warm water one of his feet, which was in much pain, he supported him tenderly, and administered to him some warm wine, which enabled him temporarily to rally. Herefrid then told him that he perceived his dying state, and remonstrated with him in the most pathetic terms for not having suffered himself to be tended by some of the brethren. Cuthbert, in reply, only spoke in glowing words of the divine presence and consolations vouchsafed to him in the five preceding days, and added that he had dragged himself down to the place where he then lay in order to be nearer visitors from Lindisfarne. On Herefrid's marvelling how he had sustained life during this period of five days, Cuthbert drew from under the coverlid five onions, with the half of one of which he had moistened his parched and fevered lips. His own desire was that he should be buried in Farne; but, at the earnest request of the clergy, he yielded his own choice in favour of the cathedral church.

He was now left in peace, but his strength failed rapidly; and, feeling that the time of his departure was at hand, he desired the monks to carry him to his oratory. At nine the next morning the mournful procession set out from the guest-chamber, the brethren bearing Cuthbert's emaciated form tenderly across their arms. At the door of the oratory they paused: none but himself for many years had crossed its threshold. Here they entreated him that some one of their number might enter with him to minister to his necessities, and looking round on his sorrowing bearers, he selected the aged Walhstad, who, two months before, had inquired so earnestly when he would return to Lindisfarne. He had formed many warm friendships. His genial nature was utterly uncorroded by his ascetic habits, and he not only possessed the fascination which made men love him, but the power to love in return. Even the near prospect of being forever with the Lord failed to dull his warm human affections, or rendered him indifferent to the solace of Christian companionship as he went forth into the Unseen. His friendships had nothing of the sickliness of the later cloister atmosphere about them: they were manly as well as tender, cemented by wholesome co-operation in manual labour as well as in devotional exercises and energetic evangelism. So when he came near the shining presence of the Love ineffable, the human love inexpressible and imperishable, surrounding him with all tender ministries, became yet more precious.

For many hours after he was laid on the floor of the oratory he suffered severely from intermittent pains, and grew weaker with each attack. At three P.M. he sent for Herefrid, who remained till all was over. During the brief intervals of relief from pain, he gave the abbot various counsels and farewells to the Lindisfarne brethren, one of which, through a series of marvellous circumstances possessing all the authority of history, led to the foundation of Durham, with its magnificent endowments. The dying man spoke with difficulty, but with extreme conciseness, insisting upon holiness, the preservation of Catholic unity, peace, humility, brotherly love and hospitality, alluding energetically to the sin of schism.* After this great effort Cuthbert spoke little, the paroxysms of pain became more violent and the intervals shorter. Later, he lost the power of speech, and at midnight, after receiving in assured faith "the most Holy Communion of the body and blood of Christ," he breathed his last in the arms of Herefrid, raising his eyes and hands to heaven. Herefrid at once communicated the news to the monks who were waiting outside, whereupon one of them went up to the eminence on which the lighthouse now stands, and waved a lighted torch, the preconcerted signal which was to announce to the monks of Holy Island that the longing soul had passed into the heavens. A monk on the watch-tower of the abbey saw the red gleam flicker over the dark sea, and ran with the tidings into the church, where the brethren were singing the 60th Psalm. While the monks at Lindisfarne were spending that night and the next day in solemn services, strangely marred by outbursts of weeping, the abbot and the brethren in Farne wrapped Cuthbert's body in the shroud woven for him by the abbess Verca, clothed him in the robes of a priest, and placed the sacramental elements upon his breast, and sandals upon his feet, that he might go forth to meet the Lord.† The following day being calm, they conveyed the corpse to Lindisfarne, and buried it in a stone coffin on the right side of the altar, with much weeping, and all fitting solemnity. Cuthbert died on March 20, 687, being, as is supposed, nearly fifty years old. At once type and outgrowth of his age, it was with faith marred by superstition, with trust alloyed with trembling, but yet withal with a boundless love and devotion centred solely in Christ, that his spirit passed from the cold mists of the morning twilight into the full noonday of "the Light which no man can approach unto."

ISABELLA L. BIRD.

* Gasping for breath, he faintly spoke these words into the ear of Herefrid, who was supporting him:—"Hold no communion with those who withdraw from the unity of Catholic peace by practical ill-doing, or by the illegal celebration of Easter. Know and remember that if necessity shall ever compel you to choose one of two misfortunes, I had much rather that you would dig up my bones from their grave, and, taking them with you, sojourn where God shall provide, than that you should on any account consent to the sin of schismatics, and have your necks under their yoke."

† The learned Mr. Waring supposes that was a Christianized relic of the death-shoes of Pagan burials. In the Gilsarumar Saga, on the death of Vestein by the hands of Thorgrein, when the burial draws near, Thorgrein approaches the corpse, saying, "It is the custom to furnish men with death-shoes, to tread their path to Valhalla. This office I will render to Vestein."

OUR DISTRICT.

By A RIVER-SIDE VISITOR.

VII.—THE BUTTON-HOLE QUEEN.

PASSING along one morning, I saw, standing at her door, the woman whose conversation with me I recounted in describing the life of that spot of Our District known as "Button-hole Row."* She was stitching away as usual, or rather, not as usual, for it was something unusual in her air that caused me to stop and speak to her. Generally her manner was bright and cheery, her every movement active, and her eyes noticeably clear and steady for a button-holer; but now she seemed jaded, downcast, and heavy-eyed; and though she plied her ever-busy needle with what to a stranger would have appeared a marvellous rapidity, it was easy to see that she worked slowly—for her. Having returned her "Good morning," I observed, in a friendly way, that I was afraid she had been overworking herself, and that she should be careful of her health, and particularly of her eyes—weakened and failing eyesight being the most prevalent complaint among the button-holers.

"Well, I do feel a bit out of sorts this morning," she answered; "but it ain't as you think, though thanking you kindly all the same, sir. I wouldn't go to overwork myself that much, not in a regular way, not from laziness sake, or being afraid of work, but because I know the value o' eyesight too well to go taxing 'em any more than I can help. I'm only a bit heavy-eyed for want of sleep; my eyes are as strong as ever they were; and, though there's some as wouldn't be of that opinion if they were as poor as me, I often think I have a deal to be thankful for when I look round and see how the hand of affliction is laid on some. Poor Mrs. Johnson! Just see how she's placed; it's heart-breaking only to think of it."

I remembered that George Johnson was the name of the youngest of the two sickly men whom I had noticed engaged in the feminine occupation of button-holing on the occasion of my first visit to the Row; and on the kind-hearted but voluble seamstress coming to a pause, I asked—

"Is her husband much worse, then?"

"Oh yes, sir," she replied, shaking her head; "he's as bad as he well can be, to be alive at all; though, being consumption, he don't think so, and she, poor thing, tries to believe for the best. He keeps saying as it's only weakness, and that he would get better if he could only get home to Herefordshire, where he come from; but, bless you, sir, the only home he'll ever go to will be his long home, and he'll go there soon; and, seeing how poor they are and that he can't work, I don't know but what it'll be a happy release, if only he's fit to go. Not as I say he isn't fit; I believe he's always been a steady, decent man; but all the same even the best, I suppose, have but one way to make their peace, and would like to ask Christ to take them to Himself when the hour of death comes. I sat up with him all last night, and I had my thoughts of speaking to him about making ready for the great change, but when the cough left him breath enough to speak he talked so confident like about doing this and that when he was better, and about going back again to the green, pleasant country, as he called it, that I hadn't the heart to damp him; and beside there was the wife, poor thing, to think about, and she was heart-broke enough already. She was fairly worn off her feet, and so I forced her to let me take her place for that night, but bless you, she couldn't sleep, she was that anxious about him. They've only the one room themselves, and so I wanted her to go to my bed, but she wouldn't hear of such a thing, and, though to please me, she lay down in her clothes on a bit of a bed that I got together for her on the top of a box, and closed her eyes, I knew that she was listening whenever he spoke, and that she would have heard anything I had said to him. It would be the truest kindness to tell him the truth, though; for you may take my word that the only country place he'll ever go to in this earth is the cemetery, and that when the fields are green again the grass will be growing over his grave."

"Do you think it would be well for me to go and see him?" I asked.

"That is just what I do think, sir," she answered; "it came into my mind directly I saw you coming. I thought that as I hadn't spoken myself, the least I could do was to ask somebody else to speak; it's a serious thing, a man dying, but not knowing it, and all his thoughts and talk of this world."

"It is a serious thing," I agreed; and then, without further delay, I proceeded to the house in which the Johnsons lived. Their room was a back one on the ground floor, and Mrs. Johnson herself answered my knock. She looked very thin and wan and grief-stricken. Though little more than thirty, trouble and want had already bowed her frame and streaked her black hair heavily with grey. She seemed much more fit to be on a sick-bed than attending on one night and day; but I felt that she would have considered this no time to have spoken of her looks of illness, and therefore I merely observed that I had heard her husband was very ill, and thought that I would look in and see him, if it would not be putting them to inconvenience.

"Oh no, sir," she answered promptly; "you know well enough what very poor folks' homes are like, and if you don't stand on ceremony, I'm sure we needn't. George will be glad to see you, he's very dull, poor fellow, and is glad for any one to come and talk to him a bit; not as I'm saying as no one has come to see him, for our neighbours have all been very kind to us, both in that way and other ways, God bless them all for it."

As she spoke she led the way into her room; and though, as she had said, I knew well enough what the homes of the poor were like, I was struck with the unusual sadness of the picture presented by this home. One lying in mortal sickness in it, ghastly and wasted from disease, might well make any room look gloomy, while this sick chamber was dark, dirty, and dilapidated in itself.

"Here is Mr. — come to see you, dear," said the wife, as her husband languidly turned his head towards the doorway as I entered. "Take the chair, sir," she added, in the same breath, indicating the only chair in the apartment, and at the same time seating herself on an old trunk, which, with a deal table and the bed, made up the whole furniture of the room. There were medicine bottles upon the mantelpiece, and the wife, while resuming the button-holing, kept an eye upon the making of some beef-tea that was simmering in a battered saucepan, which had been made useable by an old chair-leg driven tightly into a hole to serve for a handle. The sick man was propped up in bed, with a view to relieving his painfully laborious breathing. His deeply sunken eyes and cheeks, the deadly pallor of his countenance, and the cold sweat standing like dew on his forehead, showed but too conclusively to any one used to reading such signs that he was dying. But he was dying in harness! As he lay there, he was working as busily as his ebbing strength would allow him—feathering or "flossing out" long bands of dress material, to form the trimming, technically known as ruching. The wife noting my look of surprise at this, hastened to explain—

"It's not with my will he's doing it, sir," she said; "he's not fit to be doing anything, but he was that anxious to be doing something to earn a few ha'pence, that he made himself worse with worrying over it, and so to please him the Queen got him this ruching to do, as being the lightest thing she could think of."

"The Queen!" I exclaimed, looking at the woman in amazement.

"Yes, the Queen—our Queen," she answered, evidently surprised, in her turn, at my being surprised. "Why, you know Mrs. —, as gives us our work," she went on, with a tinge of impatience—"the Button-hole Queen, as every one calls her hereabout; and a Queen she deserves to be as far as goodness goes. I don't know what would have become of many that work for her, if it hadn't been for the help she's given 'em in times of need; and I'm sure her kindness to us since George has been so ill has been more almost than you would expect from a sister, let alone a stranger—not as she'll be long a stranger to any one that is working for her regular, especially if they are in distress. There is never a morning passes that she don't come in to see George, and she never comes without something in her hand; in fact, I thought it was her when you knocked: it's just about her time for calling."

The woman spoke with a fervency of heart-felt gratitude that any one might well have been proud to have inspired; and, catching something of her spirit, I answered that I had heard of the kindness of the lady of whom she spoke, even though I had not happened to hear that she was known as the Button-hole Queen. Then, remembering the special purpose of my visit, I turned to the man, and gently asked him how he felt.

"Weak, sir, dreadfully weak," he replied, speaking with an effort; and even then in a faint, hollow tone. "But there's not much else beside weakness the matter with me now," he went on, "I haven't anything like the pain I used to have. I only want pulling together now, as you may say; and what with the nourishment the parish allows me, and the tasty, strengthening things the Queen brings me, I hope to be on my legs before long, and then I shall soon be myself again, especially if I can manage to get down to my native place, as I shall try to do."

It was easy to see from his manner how true were the words of the kindly and thoughtful seamstress who had suggested my call. It was evident that he dreamt not of death, though its icy hand was already on him. Seeing him thus, I shrank from the task I had tacitly accepted. But reflecting how cruel a kindness it would be to leave him undeceived, I nerved myself to enter upon it, and did in part fulfil it—but only in part. He was young; and hard as the world had been to him, little of happiness and much of suffering as he had experienced in it, the love of life was so strong in him that I scarcely had the heart to, as it were, pass sentence upon him—to tell him that he must die, that his hours were numbered, his last sands of life running out. But even under my guarded talk he became painfully excited, and with bated breath and look of haggard entreaty, asked, "Do you think I won't get better, then?"

"Your getting better or not getting better," I answered gently, and avoiding the eager glance with which he regarded me, "is in the hands of God. It may be his good will to take you from this world, and in case it should be, you should turn your mind to getting ready to go."

This was the utmost I felt justified in saying at the moment, though I hoped to be able to speak more pointedly on the occasion of a second visit, nor, greatly as he was distressed by what I had said, did I regret having spoken, for I could see that he had in a measure at any rate realised the danger he was in. But I then asked him if he would let me read to him a chapter from the New Testament, choosing the 3rd of John. I explained what was meant by coming to Christ—that whether well or ill, strong or weak, it was wise in us to do so at once. Even as I was preparing to go his excitement was visibly subsiding, and in a comparatively collected tone he asked, would I look in again, and read another chapter.

I was turning to leave the room when there came a low but firm knock at the street door, and the next minute, bearing a custard pudding in her hand, there entered a woman whom I instantly guessed to be the Button-hole Queen. From what I had heard of her good deeds, I had imagined her a woman with soft kind eyes, an ever-smiling face, impulsive in action, bright and cheery in manner. But this woman was of a very different stamp. She was tall, and though shapely of limb and comely of feature was somewhat masculine looking. The general impression she gave was rather that of an able and pushing woman, than of a specially good-natured one. There were touches of both sadness and sternness blending with the thoughtfulness that seemed to be the characteristic expression of her face; the squarely cut chin and tightly closing lips told of firmness of character; and her piercing blue eyes were of the hard glittering steely-blue order, and not the deep melting blue that would have suited the sort of woman I had imagined. She looked about five-and-forty, though perhaps the circumstance of her once black hair being now for the most part iron grey caused her to appear a little older than she really was.

Giving a quiet self-assured nod by way of reply to my softly-spoken good morning, she turned to the sick man, and, in a voice that was softer and kinder in its tone than I expected, now that I had seen her, asked—

"How do you feel to-day, Johnson?"

"Weak, still very weak," he answered faintly; "but I've hardly any pain now except just when the cough takes me."

"Well, that's a deal to be thankful for," she said; "your sufferings were very great."

"They were," he replied, and it was evident from the expression that came into his face that he was about to add something about the comparative freedom from pain being a good sign, when she hastily asked—

"What does the doctor say?"

"He doesn't say anything particular," said the wife, taking up the answer. "He just orders him nourishment, and says he may eat or drink anything that he fancies."

Turning her head for a moment the Button-hole Queen stole a glance at me—a glance which said as plainly as a look could, I'm afraid there is no hope here, and in the same way I replied that I feared not.

While this had been going on the dying man had begun to work at the ruching again, and seeing this on turning to him, she laid her hand on his, and shaking her head said—

"You mustn't make labour of this, you know. I only got it you to amuse yourself, as you may say."

"Oh, a child might do it as far as strength goes," he answered, with a faint smile; "and after all it brings in a few ha'pence."

"Don't trouble yourself about the ha'pence, now," she said, with just a touch of authority in her tone—"that can be made right; and you, Mrs. Johnson, don't let the collars interfere with your nursing or getting a little sleep. I can always let you have the price of two or three gross in advance, and you can work it off by degrees, after—some other time.

"I've brought you a little custard," she went on, turning to the man again, without giving the woman time to answer: "do you think you can eat a bit of it?"

"I think I can," he answered feebly.

"Or is there anything else you fancy better?" she questioned. "An egg beat up in a drop of brandy, or anything of that sort?"

"No, thank you," he murmured, a slight smile flitting across his countenance, "the doctor's order gives me brandy, and I'd sooner have the egg in the custard."

"Very well," she said, "I'll leave you now," and then turning to the woman, she added, "If you find you do want anything else send round; you needn't distress yourself about the work for the next week or two."

I followed her out, and as soon as we were clear of the threshold, she exclaimed—

"I suppose he is dying."

"There can be no doubt of it," I answered.

"Have you told him so?"

"Well, not in so many words, but I have hinted at it in a general way."

"It's been in a too general way then, I expect," she observed. "They tell me it's very often so with consumptive people; they think to the very last that they'll recover, and the more so the nearer they get to the last—don't you think he ought to be told plainly?"

In reply I told her how I had been led to enter the house, and what had passed there previous to her arrival. I added that I would see the doctor in the course of the morning, and that if he confirmed my views as to the state of his patient, I would, on returning to Johnson's home later, tell him plainly how it was with him; but I confessed I really had not had the courage to tell him on first seeing him—he seemed to cling so fondly to life.

"That's how it is with me," she said, in a softer tone than she had hitherto spoken in. "I try to do my duty as far as I can in other ways, but when it comes to that I flinch. If I hadn't met you in the house though, I would have sent a clergyman, or some one, in the course of the day." She paused for awhile, and then in a musing tone went on—"Well, of course, life is sweet; but all the same it seems wonderful to see how strongly the very poor will want to live when it comes to the point. They know they die faster than others, and when they are well they'll say there isn't much for them to live for, and when their neighbours are ill, they'll say that death'll be a happy release for them; but when death is staring them in the face, how most of 'em will fight against the idea of it!

Is that your experience?" she concluded, turning her hard blue eyes upon my face.

"Not an invariable experience," I answered, "though I have seen many instances of it."

"Well, taking it at that, don't you think it strange that you should see many instances of it;—how do you account for it?"

The manner in which she emphasized the you suggested that she had views of her own upon the subject, but was desirous in the first place of hearing mine, and convinced by this time that I had fallen in with an original, I yielded to her humour.

"The point has not struck me as it seems to have done you," I said; "but speaking on the spur of the moment I think that the instinctive love of life and fear of death sufficiently account for the feeling you consider so strange, and I doubt not the feeling would be found equally among rich and poor."

"No! not equally," she exclaimed; "not so much among the rich as the poor, that's what looks to me the surprising part of it. Wouldn't you think, now, that the rich would be the most loathe to leave this world?"

Again I pleaded that I had given no especial thought to the subject.

"Well, I have," she said; "I've thought about it, and I've spoken about it to many, and doctors and others who ought to know have told me that the rich who have known all this world's goods will often leave them without a sigh, while the poor who have never enjoyed the good things of this life, grieve to be taken away from its hardships. They accounted for it," she went on, "by saying that the rich had learned by experience that all is vanity, while the poor still wished to live in the hope that a share of the good things that seemed so bright at a distance, might yet fall to their lot."

"There may be something in that," I said, scarcely knowing what to say at all.

"I dare say there's a good deal in it, if you only look at the matter in a worldly light," she said; "but I look at it in another light as well, and I have quite another opinion as to the chief cause of it, so far as regards the very poor, that is."

"And what may your opinion be, then?" I asked, with something of her own bluntness.

"That they have not enough of sweet religion in their lives," she answered promptly, but gently and solemnly. "Not that I look upon them as heathenish, or would speak hardly of them in the matter," she went on; "the Lord forbid, knowing as much as I do of their trials, and struggles, and sufferings. The flesh is weak and its cravings strong;

when it is so hard a fight to supply its barest wants, things spiritual are but little thought of. To the poor seeking for bread, and not finding a sufficiency of it, I believe it does—as they often say—seem like offering them a stone to talk to them of religion as the remedy for their trouble. I don't say it as blaming them, but as grieving that it should be so. It is right to do what else we can, but if we could but give them true religion, with all its comforts and consolations, it would be the grandest thing of all—it would make them happier in their lives, and resigned, and more than resigned when the time of death came."

"It would indeed!" I assented.

"Then death would lose its sting," she resumed, "and none would need to shrink from telling them that their hour was come. They would know then that though called to pass through the valley of the shadow of death they need fear no evil, that their Lord would be with them in their journey to his mansions in the sky. In their hardships they would then find comfort in their Saviour's love, and in the hour of death see him waiting for them beyond the beautiful river. I have known one or two who were religious in that way, and though they were wretchedly poor, oh, how much happier they were than those around them who had not the hope and comfort that their religion gave them!"

She had been speaking in a low, earnest tone, and gazing before her in the unobservant manner of one lost in thought; but at this point turning her piercing eyes upon me again, she concluded by asking—

"Don't you think I am right? I ask you because you see more of the poor even than I do; don't you think that a want of religion—religion in its best and most comforting sense—is their greatest want?"

"Rightly considered, it is undoubtedly their greatest want," I answered; "but at the same time we should not forget that they have other wants, very pressing wants some of them, and calculated to stand in the way of their attaining to this religious feeling."

A slight smile flitted across her face, and, shaking her head, she said—

"Ah, I see you think I am too enthusiastic. I do speak warmly on this subject, I know, because though I think a deal, it is seldom I do open my mouth about it; only when such a sight as that poor dying man brings it home to me. All the same I am practical—there are not many better business women than I am, though I say it that shouldn't, and I have been no worse a business woman since I have known the happiness of true religion. I don't lose sight of the fact the poor have other wants, but the hymn tells us that and I am one of those who believe that it was never designed to make us less capable of earning our daily bread. In my opinion it not only makes you more fit to live, but better able to make a living—gives you strength and comfort for this world, as well as hope for the world to come."

'Religion never was designed To make our pleasures less;'

During this conversation we had walked out of Button-hole Row, and a little way down the main street; but as she said the last words she came to a stand-still, and merely giving a nod by way of reply to my remark, that I fully agreed with her, she pointed to the house opposite saying, "This is my place, if you'll step in I'll show you such a little hive as you don't see every day."

racter was evident. Even in the short time I had been in her company I had seen enough of her to make me desirous of seeing more; and I promptly availed myself of her offer.

"Come along, then," she said, leading the way; and the next minute we were in the house. Truly enough I did find it such a hive as I had never seen before, and such a hive as was not to be seen every day. The apartment that in an ordinary private house would have been the parlour, was turned into a workroom. A narrow deal workboard upon tressels extended the whole length of the room, and seated at it, I counted sixteen children, fourteen girls and two boys. The girls were busily button-holing; while the boys, both of whom I noticed were lame and sickly, kept the sewers supplied with relays of ready-threaded needles. The oldest child did not appear to be more than twelve, and one or two of the younger were certainly not above half that age. The majority of them looked clean, and comfortable, but in a few instances they were woefully ill-clad, and if one might judge by their pinched faces woefully ill-fed also.

"Those are a young set of heads now," she said, when I had finished my survey.

"Very young," I said; "in fact too young; for, speaking without the slightest intention to reflect upon you, I think it a sad sight to see so very young children working at all."

"It is indeed a great pity," she assented, with unmistakable sincerity, "but it is the least of two evils. If they were not here they would be in worse places, poor little things; in the streets, or crouching in some miserable room for want of sufficient clothing for even a gutter child. That was the condition in which I found some of them, and of most of them I can say that their lot has been a very hard one. They are badly enough off even now, but they would be worse if it wasn't for the bit of work I give them."

"I have no doubt you employ them with a good motive," I said.

"Well, I do, though I say it," she answered; "but understand me, it is a business affair. I am one that thinks that the best way to assist the poor is to help them to help themselves, and taking these children to work is doing that. It helps both them and their mothers, for they are mostly widows' children. I only pay them what they earn at the usual piece-work prices, but, believe me, I wouldn't grind their young bones to make my bread; it's of their bread I think, for there isn't one of them that wouldn't sometimes be without a meal if it wasn't for the trifle they earn here. I could make more money with less trouble by having young women for my indoor hands, but for the reasons I've named, I have had children for the last two or three years. I have two sets of them—one morning, one afternoon—each set coming here to school the half of the day they are not at work."

"Ah, I'm glad of that!" I exclaimed; "for if the work does not prevent them from getting a little education it loses half its hardship."

"Oh, I see," she said, with a slight smile, "I ought to have mentioned this first: I see what you've been thinking, and you're right. It would be curious friendship to keep such children at work all day, but there being half-timers here, so far from preventing them from getting a little learning, is about the only chance that most of them would ever have had. Their mothers have not been educated themselves, and don't know the value of it, and they think it hard that I should insist upon the children being sent to school; but I do—I make it a rule, 'no school, no work.' An old lady a few doors off who keeps a school and really brings children on in their learning, takes my large family, as I call them, on the principle of a reduction on quantity. She lets them go half-time at a penny a week all round, and every child is stopped that penny a week, and every girl another penny for the threaders. After paying that, they'll take home from one to three shillings a week, according to their age and quickness with the needle; and, as I told you, I keep a look-out to see that they reap the benefit of it. If I notice a pair of boots very bad, or a frock too thin or worn for the season, I just drop round and give the mother a hint, and it generally has the desired effect. I know pretty well how each family is situated, and ask the mother to do only what I know can be done by trying, and where it is necessary I advance a trifle and stop it out of the child's earnings, at threepence or sixpence a week. I would rather see the children at school all day, but, as I said, they wouldn't be at school if they were not here. My out-door hands mostly have their children helping them in their own houses, but the mothers of these young hands are often out all day charring or washing, so that this place is a sort of home to the children."

Though her manner was somewhat melancholy and at times a trifle hard, it was impossible not to admire her thoughtfulness, and it was with the utmost sincerity I remarked that it was no flattery of her to say that she was a blessing to the neighbourhood.

"Well, in a small way, I am sometimes a means of good," she answered unaffectedly;

"but if those who benefit by it only knew it, it's not me but another they've got to thank."

She spoke in a tone that courted question, and so I put in—

"May I ask who the other is?"

"I'll show you if you'll just come to my room," she answered; and as she spoke she led the way to an adjoining apartment, furnished as a sitting room.

"There! that is the one that any I do a good turn for have to thank!" she exclaimed, pointing to an enlarged photographic portrait of a pretty-looking, gentle-faced girl, which, handsomely framed, formed the chief pictorial ornament of the room. "My daughter," the 'Button-hole Queen' went on, regarding the portrait with a look of intense affection; "she's in a better place now; she was only eighteen when she died, but before she went, she taught her mother to be a Christian, and to understand what our duty towards our neighbours really meant. Before that change, I was a hard one. I used to grind them down, taking advantage of their necessity. So that they worked cheaply I didn't care whether they lived or died, and if they talked much about their distresses, I took the work from them. Many a bruised spirit I wounded in those days; I was strong, and pushing, and successful myself, and instead of pitying those who were weak and helpless, I felt contempt for them, and showed it; but Agnes altered that, thanks to her, and with God's help I conquer myself in those things now, and, in the strength of Jesus, try to bring them to see things in a better light."

She paused for a moment to ask me to be seated, and then, without question or remark on my part (for it was evident she was on a subject she loved to talk about), resumed "the story of her life" as the Button-hole Queen. "My husband when I married him," she went on, "was a well-to-do tradesman. His father had made the business and had just left it to him; but though as good and loving a husband as ever breathed, he was no business man. Things went bad with him, and after struggling for five years, he became bankrupt, and our very beds were sold from under us. The trouble and shock was too much for him, and he died a few months later—more of a broken heart than any bodily illness. I was left penniless, and with my little child as well as myself to look after. Under any circumstances, I wasn't the sort of woman to sit quietly down under trouble; but when I used to look at my child it gave me double courage and confidence. I said to myself that I would be both father and mother to her, and that she should want for nothing. I had a slight knowledge of the collar business, and knew a manufacturer in that line, and I asked him for work at the button-holing. He gave it me, and as I got on he gave me more, and I got some from other firms, and so worked on and on until I had that much work that in the busy season I had as many as three hundred hands working for me. I worked hard myself, and as I told you made the most I could out of my hands. I was able to keep a nice house and to dress Agnes well, and gave her a good education. I kept her at school till she was nearly sixteen. Then I apprenticed her to a West-end milliner and dressmaker, paying a large premium, meaning in time to set her up in business for herself—but it wasn't to be. She was always delicate, and sometimes when she came home on Sundays she used to look quite ill; but when I spoke to her about it she always put it off lightly. It was only when it was too late that I knew she had been worked the killing long hours that milliners' girls are worked in the season. I was under the impression that my child being a premiumed apprentice was exempted from working such hours, as by rights she ought to have been; but her mistress was one of my own stamp; she went on the plan of grinding the most out of everybody, and so made Agnes work as long as the others. She got through the first season without breaking down, but the second was too much for her. One afternoon a cab stopped at my door; and a man—a doctor—coming out of it, told me that my daughter had been taken suddenly ill, had burst a blood-vessel, and that as she begged to be taken home, and was sufficiently recovered to bear the removal, he and one of the hands from the shop had brought her. I was at the cab before he had well finished speaking, and there my poor Agnes lay back, propped up with pillows, and with a face as white as death, except one or two spots where it had been flecked with her own blood. She smiled when she saw me, and then we carried her in; and when the others were gone she clung round my neck, and, laying her pretty face on my shoulder, whispered, 'Mother, my own mother, I've come home to die!'—and she had, though she lingered for three months."

While speaking, she had striven hard to suppress all outward signs of emotion, but her feelings proved too much for her. At this point her voice failed her, and tears gathered in her eyes. It was but for a minute's space, however; recovering herself by an effort, she went on: "I had always kept her regularly at Sunday-school and church; and with her the seed had fallen in good ground. She had been led to remember her Creator in the days of her youth, had come to feel happy in her Saviour's love while yet a child; and so when at an age, at which the world is generally dear to us, the hand of death was laid upon her, she did not fear to go. Sometimes when she would notice that I was more downhearted than usual, she'd say in her sweet way, 'Don't fret, mother, I would like to have stayed with you a little longer, for I know you'll feel lonely when I'm gone, but remember, I shall only be gone before. You know what the dear old hymn says:—

" Here we suffer grief and pain,
Here we meet to part again,
In heaven we part no more."

That is how she would talk: and one day, among other things, she said, 'Perhaps it is all for the best, mother; this is a hard world, and though, thanks to you, I've been very comfortable and happy in it so far, if I was left after you, I might be in great misery. Look at your hands, what hardship some of them must have to endure.' She was getting very weak at this time, and when she had said so much she lay back exhausted, but after a while she opened her eyes again, and with a pleading look in my face, said gently, 'Be kind to your hands, mother.' 'Kind to them!' I said; 'I always pay them what they earn. I don't see what more I can do. I suppose I give them about as much as others; and in any case I don't well see how I'm to give them more without robbing myself; you know how badly the work is paid first hand.' 'It wasn't altogether about the pay I was thinking,' she made answer; 'a kind word to them or a little thoughtfulness for them may sometimes give strength and comfort to those who are broken in spirits. And remember, mother, how our dear Saviour did for the poor people when He was here on earth. Our works can never save us; but Christ accepts our service, and helps us to serve Him more and more.' Once or twice afterwards she spoke in the same strain; but it was not till the morning of the day on which she died, that she fairly conquered me. It was very near the end, and she could only speak with great effort, and in whispers; but getting her arms round my neck, and looking straight into my eyes, as her own were growing dim, she said earnestly, 'You will have thought for your hands, mother, and be good to them; now, won't you, for my sake? I shall go all the happier if you do, and you will feel all the happier, and be none the poorer; you will promise me now, won't you?" I couldn't speak the promise, my heart was too full, but I looked it, and with the Saviour's help I have tried to keep it. She understood me, and sank back, with a smile on her face; and all that she ever said after was a few words of prayer, and 'Good-bye, mother, we'll meet again in heaven!'"

Again the emotion of the Button-hole Queen was too much for her, again utterance failed her, and this time the tears rolled down her cheeks unchecked. Her grief was not violent or bitter, the memories that evoked it had much in them that was sweet and comforting; and so I remained silent until she was once more sufficiently composed to speak. When she had dried her eyes, she quietly resumed her narrative.

"When I was left alone I became more civil with my hands, and kinder, as far as words went; but it was not till one Saturday night about two months after my child's death that any real good came of the lesson she had impressed upon me. I had had a hard, worrying day, and was in an irritable state of mind, when my servant girl came to tell me that a woman I had given work to for the first time that week, had come to ask if I would pay her for the collars she had sent in up till then. My plan with my hands was to give the work out three gross at a time, and pay when it was all brought in, but this woman had not sent in quite one gross, and my promise to my dead child not being in my mind at the moment, I said to the girl, 'Tell her I can't be bothered, I'll pay her as I pay my other hands, when she sends the batch of work in; and if she doesn't like that, she can give up the work altogether.' The girl took the message, and the woman went away. I thought no more about it; but going out directly afterwards, and walking sharp, I passed the woman in the street, and as I passed, I caught a sound that told me she was crying bitterly; then my promise flashed on my mind and pricked my conscience. I spoke to the poor thing, and as well as her sobs would let her she told me her story. She was a widow with three young children. She was wholly dependent upon herself, and was not strong; one of the children was sick, the other two were hungry, and she had no food in the house; and made desperate by her position, she had come to me to try and get money wherewith to obtain a little medicine for the one child, and a little bread for the others. I thought of my daughter's words, 'Be good to your hands for my sake,' and I acted at once. Could she describe her child's illness? I asked, and she answered that she could. When she had done that, I said, 'Very well then, come along,' and we turned into a chemist's and got some medicine, and as we went further we bought food, so that when we got to her house we were not empty-handed. She had spoken but too truly! The children were actually starving, and I shall never forget the look that came into their faces as their eyes fell on the eatables—for at that time I had never seen such looks before, though, more's the pity, I've seen the like often since. I made her eat a bit herself too, and giving her a trifle of money, and promising to send her some of my Agnes's clothes to make down for her little girls, I left her, she following me to the door, and, with tears in her eyes, and her heart that full that she could hardly speak, crying out, 'God bless you and reward you for your kindness to me and mine!' For the first time I felt the happiness to ourselves of being the instruments of good to others."

"These poor creatures are grateful for very little, sir," she said after a pause, "for even a word of kindness or sympathy, and in the way that seems best to me, I do what I can, and though that is but little, I'm glad it does bring me the good wishes of the poor, for I believe those wishes do bring a blessing with them. Since I have come to live in the same neighbourhood as my hands, and to have a little Christian regard for them, health nor strength have never failed me, and work has never been slack, and I believe I am quite as well off as I should have been had I continued to act in the old fashion, and I know I am much more happy and contented."

"I can fully believe that," I said.

"Understand me, sir," she resumed, "I am saying all this because I love to speak of the dear child whose portrait you see. I do not speak as boasting of any little good I may be the means of doing; the Lord—who enables me to do it—forbid that I should. Looking at myself as an instrument in the matter," she continued, "I often ask myself very anxiously whether I am doing the best in my power."

"Your experience should be a good guide on that point," I said.

"Well, it is by that I go," she said. "To a stranger the best way of helping my hands might seem to be to give them a higher price for their work; but as I already give them the highest rate of pay in the trade, that doesn't lie with me except to a very limited extent, the little more that it would be possible for me to give if I only left myself a bare living, if added to the little all they get now would still not make up enough for a decent living; all would go then as it goes now, for the common necessities of life, and when sickness or any emergency arose they would still be without anything to fall back upon, while I then would not be able to help them. That is why I mostly reserve what help I can give for special occasions. It's being cruel to be kind, as the sayin' is; seeing them half-starved every day, in order to save them from being wholly starved in the day of trouble."

"I think your hands are as much indebted to your good judgment as they are to your kindness," I said, filling up a pause.

"I hope so," she said, simply, with no shade of boasting in her tone, "for I do try to be thoughtful for them. I know, too," she added, "that I am only one,—and a very humble one—among many who do take thought for the poverty-stricken; but for all that is done for them in the way of kindness, the lot of the very poor is a terribly hard one in this world, and that is why I say that the consolation and comfort that lies in religion would be such a blessed thing to them—speaking of that, you won't forget to see Johnson again?"

The last words were uttered in a tone that sufficiently indicated the view of the speaker, that the conversation having come back to the point from which it had started, might as well end. Tacitly accepting this view, I took my leave of the Button-hole Queen, simply remarking that I would see Johnson again. I did see him a few hours afterwards, and as gently as I could discharged the painful duty with which I had charged myself—read the Scriptures to him, which calmed him wonderfully, and told him how Christ had borne all our sins on the tree, so that our sufferings might be lightened and our souls drawn to Him. It was well for the poor fellow that such duty was discharged towards him, as two days later he died—we have reason to hope in peace.

A good deal might be said in the way of moralising about The Button-hole Queen, her ways and opinions, but I think readers may be safely left to draw their own moral from it.

MUSIC FOR THE BLIND.

IN the United Kingdom there are thirty thousand blind persons. The institutions which receive many of them, for careful training in industrial arts, and for such amount of musical development as has hitherto been attempted, enable very few to earn the entire cost of their support, and only one per cent. to maintain himself or herself by the profession of music. In Paris thirty per cent. of the blind earn their living as pianoforte tuners, graduating at their institution, and obtaining incomes which vary from £80 to £150 a year.* This single statement is surely enough to show that some better means of education than has hitherto been attainable by the blind is needed in England. The need is now supplied—that is to say, the beginning is made; it will be a national reproach for ever, if funds cannot be found for maintaining and developing it.

The "Normal College for the Blind, 5, Paxton Terrace, Upper Norwood," has been just a year at work among us. Its work proceeds on the assumption that among blind persons there are many capable of receiving a thorough intellectual education in the highest sense of the words. A thousand devices of loving ingenuity neutralise the one physical disqualification. The mind, addressed through all channels but one, responds, how readily, how gratefully, and with what delightful results, they who choose may now judge for themselves. There is no limit to the area of instruction but the capacity of the student, and that capacity is found to enlarge by cultivation, just as it does in the case of those who see. Neither music nor any other art can be practised with aught save the lowest results by those whose mental faculties are sluggish, imperfect, or unexercised. Idiots are sometimes born with the finest musical organization, physically considered, but they never become musicians. They astonish you by their faculty, but it is for ever fruitless; for it is a body without a soul. Therefore it is intended that these students, through whom it is hoped that the public will one day learn of how much the blind are capable, should be completely educated in other things besides music. And after only one year's training it is found that their musical performances (to speak of nothing else) have a refinement, and promise a completeness, which you would vainly seek among those similarly afflicted who have been trained on the system hitherto practised in England. A short account of one afternoon's visit to the institution may help to give some idea of what it is doing.

* Thirty per cent., also, are professional musicians, but I do not know what incomes they earn.

We were ushered into a school-room containing forty-one students—as many, alas! as, with its present poor accommodation and small funds, the institution can receive. Applications are constantly refused for this sad reason. The principal, Mr. Campbell, told us with regret how he had very recently been forced to reject two most promising applicants. Sir Rutherford Alcock, who presided at the meeting, briefly recapitulated the objects and hopes of the institution, and after a few modest words from the principal, who told us that he did not profess to do more than show us the beginning of a system which had been working a very short time, and which was, he hoped, improving every day, the examination of the pupils commenced. It was conducted chiefly by two young lady-teachers, thoroughly trained, the musical part being entirely left to Mr. Campbell. First came a lesson in physiology, not perhaps specially interesting in itself, but showing quite unmistakably the power of the scholars in following out a subject intelligently, and remembering a series of facts with perfect accuracy. Then we had an exhibition in arithmetic, which was really astonishing. Complicated sums in Proportion were solved aloud, step by step, with just that slight hesitation as the pupil repeated the terms of the problem, and arranged his attack upon it, which must have convinced the most incredulous listener that it was genuine mental work at the time, not mere remembrance of what had been learned by rote. As for the lengths of multiplication which were wound off in a minute, they literally made one giddy. Then followed a most excellent examination in geography, not quite of the conventional type, but introducing the historical associations of the places named, as well as their “products and governments.” During this lesson, a bright-faced little fellow about ten years old (it was strange to see how bright and expressive many of these sightless faces were), knelt on a chair at the table and followed the answers with his fingers on an embossed globe, finding every place as it was named. Mr. Campbell interrupted the lesson to remind this pupil that he had, some days before, “taken a ship” half round the world to oblige him; did he think he could take one from Liverpool to Yokohama now? Well, he thought he could; and he began at once; passing rapid little fingers from point to point, naming land and water as he passed, and bringing his vessel safe into port at last, to the evident satisfaction of his fellow-pupils, who followed the proceeding with close attention and constant smiles of approval. Afterwards Mr. Campbell told us that this boy had been, only six months ago, a gutter child in the streets of Liverpool, absolutely without education of any kind. He has unusual talents, and is to be trained as a teacher.

The exhibition began and ended with singing, and was interspersed with performances on the pianoforte. There were some remarkably sweet voices, and I think there can be no doubt that the part singing is already superior to what is generally heard at the age of the performers. I cannot but believe that the highest musical development attainable under any circumstances is within their reach. Exceptionally fine voices may furnish hereafter first-rate solo singers; average voices may give us glees, quartettes, choirs, as good as any that we possess elsewhere. It is impossible to estimate too highly the advantages of complete training in this respect. Perhaps, however, the instrumental achievements were even more interesting because they implied a triumph over greater natural difficulties. Some of the younger pupils played short pieces with great intelligence and correctness. One girl, about sixteen years old, promises to be a very brilliant executant. Mr. Campbell told us that she has been not quite a year under his instruction, and her progress is now so rapid that it can be observed from day to day. “I promise you,” said he, “that in three years she shall play with the Crystal Palace Orchestra.” In order to give an idea of the manner in which musical knowledge is imparted, Mr. Campbell dictated to his class in our presence the first phrases of a new piece. There is an ingenious and peculiar system of notation by pricks on a tablet of stiff paper placed in a frame, each prick causing a raised mark on the surface which can be easily felt by the finger. Six such marks variously arranged suffice to represent all the notes of the scale, and to indicate their value in time. In dictating the bass, the lowest notes only are named, the chords being described by their intervals, reckoned from the lowest notes, upwards. In the treble the process is reversed—the melody is dictated, and the intervals of chords are reckoned downwards from the melody notes. When a passage has been pricked out in this manner, the pupil is summoned to the pianoforte, and it is found that she can play accurately what she has written, using first one hand and then the other on the keys. Then comes the work of the ear in noting and remembering sounds, but, as it has been preceded by the mental process, it is not the sole agent, and by this means it is ensured that music shall be understood as well as executed. Much sympathy with Mr. Campbell's efforts has been shown by the musical profession. Several great firms have given or lent instruments, and Madame Schumann, herself a member of the council, frequently plays to the pupils. They are also allowed to attend the rehearsals of the Crystal Palace Orchestra.

Mr. Campbell, speaking with a controlled enthusiasm, which irresistibly conveys the idea that he will do whatever he promises to do, told us that they would be made acquainted with the best work of the greatest masters; that nothing shallow, and nothing merely mechanical, would be allowed in their musical training, but that mind and taste would be incessantly cultivated while the hands were acquiring power and facility. What has been already achieved makes the future sure. No one on hearing the performances of these children would feel inclined to say, "These are very good, considering—." They are good absolutely. And what can I say, in conclusion, of the wisdom and tenderness which pervades the whole system? We were told of incessant vigilance over health both of mind and body. No study is pursued for more than three-quarters of an hour consecutively; then follows a quarter of an hour's rest, lest the mental strain should become injurious. Games and recreations of all sorts are shared by teachers and students, and many slight caresses and gentle touches supplied, as we saw, the place of glances of affection. In truth, we were so deeply moved that we did not know how to express what we felt. The spectacle was profoundly pathetic, but the tears, which it was almost impossible to restrain, were tears of real joy. Looking round upon this band of earnest, hopeful, happy workers, who could help thinking of what they were and of what they might have been, in sharp contrast with what they are and what they may become? We know the terrible denunciation against those whose light has been turned into darkness; surely there must be a special blessing for those who out of darkness bring forth light. The human teacher cannot, it is true, say to the blind, "Receive thy sight!" but he goes as near to his divine Master as he can, the development which it is his privilege to effect is almost a new creation, the work is itself little less than divine.

DE PROFUNDIS.

I WANDERED far from Wisdom's road,
Her warning voice forgot;
In sin and shame I madly sowed,
And hoped the seed would rot;
But now my wiser spirit reaps
The harvest, in these joyless deeps.

Yet, blessed be His Holy Name,
He gives me strength to bear
Each throe that wastes this mortal frame,
Each daily cross and care;
The sinner's Friend, who never sleeps,
Walks with me in these joyless deeps.

Then, Lord, forbid that I should shun
One billow of the sea,
Till, when Thy work of grace is done,
And I am meet for Thee,
My way-worn soul no longer keeps
Her vigils, in these joyless deeps.

GEORGE S. OUTRAM.

Seen through their gloom this world is vain,
And all her treasures nought;
The grave is sweet, and death is gain,
Beyond all human thought;
Through storm and cloud the glory peeps,
Whilst yet I buffet with the deeps.

And what says that bright spirit band
Whose tears the Lord has dried?
"We waded to this promised land,
Through waters dark and wide;
To these high city towers and steepes,
He led us, through the joyless deeps."

I.—NOTES AND COMMENTS.

THE LIVES OF OUR SEAMEN.

THOUGH slavery and the slave trade are both abolished, at least in British territory, it would appear that there is still a loud call in other departments of philanthropy for the spirit that struggled in that cause "against the stream," and that in one very important case, the man has come out who is to head the struggle. In the first place, let us say that the best thing a man can do, on some occasions, to help his cause, is to make a blunder. Whether Mr. Plim-soll, M.P. for Derby, has really been guilty of doing a wrong to some of the gentlemen on whom he has reflected in his "Appeal for Seamen," is a question which the law courts will have to decide, and with which we do not meddle. But it is certain that his efforts in parliament during the last few years to reform the merchant-ship service, and to protect the lives of British sailors, attracted very little attention, and it is probable that they would have been equally unheeded for the future, but for the blunder by which he made himself liable to the penalties attached to a breach of parliamentary privilege. Having in his book made statements which were interpreted in this way by certain of his brother M.P.'s, it became his duty to rise in his place in the House of Commons, and, with a manliness and a modesty that attracted general admiration, express his regret for his unconscious violation of parliamentary rule. Besides running the gauntlet of parliament, he is to be prosecuted at law for having issued the statements complained of; but the public conviction is so strong that he is heartily and honestly endeavouring to do a good turn to the British seaman, that a defence fund has been got up in his favour, though not at his request or even with his will. But the interesting thing is, that the public are now thoroughly interested in the cause to which for several years he has been trying to rouse attention. The newspapers have taken it up, and it has become one of the themes of the day. It is perfectly wonderful how much more interesting a man becomes when he requires to fight for his life. It is a happy thing that in the millennium there will be no abuses to rectify, and no respectable sins to put down; it is difficult to see how, if there were, any one would be able, without either suffering a persecution or a prosecution, to rouse attention to the evil.

It turns out that Mr. Plim-soll has had a singular career. The reason he knows so well about British seamen is that he has lived with them and shared their lot. For months and months he lived in one or other of Lord Shaftesbury's model lodging houses,—lived on 7s. 9½d. a week—and there met with many a workman and seaman, out of work, out of means, and out of heart. One thing that greatly interested him was the kindly consideration of workmen for each other in these circumstances. A man with a small enough morsel for his own meal, would share it with one who had none; and a heart low enough on its own account would throw out a ray or two of hope and comfort to some one who was even more inclined to give up the battle. The references to "the old woman," or "the kids" at home, often showed a manly tenderness that made want of employment—for the times were hard—very difficult to bear. Mr. Plim-soll learned to respect and love such men, and remained voluntarily with them for a time to know them better, and to think how he could help them. And now on the floor of the House of Commons he is struggling to get justice for the seaman. The facts which he proceeds upon are very sad and awful. Of the hundreds of British seamen that are lost every year at sea, there seems no reason to doubt that at least a half perish through the effects of sheer and shameful greed. Vessels are often sent to sea in an utterly unseaworthy state; or they are overloaded, and cannot fail to founder in the first gale; or they are so leaky and crazy that they go down even without a gale—and this because the owners for greed refuse to take the steps necessary for the protection of the men, or because the underwriters, who each insure for small amounts, do not care about contesting claims in suspicious cases. Of course it is but a section of shipowners or ship-dealers to whom this remark applies. Many are most eager to promote the safety of their seamen, and a few are not only most careful of their temporal safety, but deeply concerned about their eternal salvation. There are shipowners and shipowners. The Board of Trade has had, from time to time, to punish and pillory certain neglectors of the common duties of humanity—and many more who equally deserved the treatment have had to be let off. Many a man, it is said, could unfold a tale whose lightest word would harrow up the most phlegmatic soul, but he is restrained by the fear of a prosecution for damages. If only due precautions were used for the safety of vessels, and all in charge maintained a constant sobriety, shipwrecks would occur very seldom. It is said that for more than twenty years the Cunard Company have never lost a ship nor a life. Who does not feel warmly for the British seaman, and earnestly desire that the effort now making on his behalf may be crowned with success?

CO-OPERATION AGAINST INTEMPERANCE.

Among the signs of the times there are several indications that in the cause of temperance there is about to take place a greater combination of forces than has hitherto been common. Ever since the teetotal movement, there has been something like a repulsion between those friends of temperance who go on the principle of total abstinence, and those who do not. The vigorous and persistent efforts of the teetotalers have been of wonderful service; but hitherto they have tended to make all who were not prepared to join them hang off from the temperance movement, and some of them to feel as if they were unworthy to take part in the cause. Of late, however, there has obviously been more of a disposition to cooperate, where common action is possible. To limit the number of public-houses, for instance, is an object sufficiently definite in a practical point of view, yet such that all real friends of temperance, whether total abstainers or not, may join in it. And this, we are glad to see, many are beginning to do. We observe, for example, from the Guardian newspaper, that a Church of England Temperance Society has lately been organized, under the highest auspices, which shows its earnestness on the subject by proposing to raise a fund of £10,000 in furtherance of temperance objects—closing public-houses, opening recreation-grounds, and promoting such other objects as are fitted to lessen the prevalence of our great national vice. In Edinburgh, Glasgow, and other important towns, a very great degree of interest has been awakened in the recent temperance reform that has taken place in the kingdom of Sweden. A gentleman of property in Perthshire—Mr. Carnegie, of Stronvar—formerly a merchant in Sweden, has drawn attention very effectually to a double reform in that country—the reform of the laws regulating distillation, which has produced an immense improvement in the morale of the people generally; and a reform in the system of public-houses, which has been carried into effect in the town of Gothenburg. Acting on powers allowed by statute, the corporation of Gothenburg have made arrangements whereby a great reduction has taken place in the number of public-houses. It was thought, and very reasonably, that it was altogether a false principle to give to the managers or proprietors of public-houses a direct interest in the amount of liquor sold by them, and thereby in the drunkenness of the people. Accordingly, a public company was formed, by which the proprietorship of a great part of the public-houses has been acquired. This company contents itself with a moderate fixed percentage on its capital, and pays over all its profit beyond that point to the municipal authorities, by whom it is applied in reduction of the public rates. The managers of such of the public-houses as the society continues to keep open, account to the society for all sales of drink; but are allowed a considerable profit on other articles of consumption. Mr. Carnegie, and other gentlemen acquainted with Sweden, speak of this arrangement as one that has been highly beneficial. The principle is unquestionably sound; to give to a large and ever-increasing body of men a direct pecuniary interest in the spread of drunken habits in the population, is about the silliest proceeding which an intelligent community can adopt. The subject is undergoing a careful investigation in Edinburgh, Glasgow, and possibly in other towns, and there is a strong disposition among the friends of temperance, whether total abstainers or otherwise, to make the Swedish plan, if it be deemed practicable here, a basis for united operations.

MR. FROUDE ON THE SPREAD OF POPERY.

Vid America, we have been getting the opinion of Mr. J. A. Froude on the recent revival of Popery. In writing to an American journal he comments on the fact that while Popery has been losing ground in all the Popish countries, it has been visibly and wonderfully gaining ground in the Protestant. Wherever that liberty prevails which has ever been its great antagonist, wherever that culture of the reason which it has so constantly discountenanced, there it is gaining converts in multitudes, acquiring a power over the public education, getting a good share of the public money, in short proving itself a formidable power. In England and the United States, the two most Protestant countries in the world, this revival has been most conspicuous. Italy and Spain treat Rome with contempt, confiscate her property, and are disrespectful to her officers; Germany, not yet quite free, shakes her fists at her, and vows that every one of her priests and bishops shall obey the laws of their country; the Jesuits are checkmated in Austria; in Protestant countries alone can they work with vigour. What are the reasons of this? Mr. Froude ascribes part to the better organization of the Papists; part to restlessness and love of change in Protestant countries; part to the weariness of people floundering amid difficulties, unable to find rest, unable to find in Protestantism that authority which they crave in connection with religion, and flinging themselves as a last resort into the arms of Rome; and part to that want of absolute truthfulness and honesty which used to be the distinction of Protestants, but now that men sign articles in one sense and explain them in another, has unfortunately ceased to characterize them. As to the Jesuits, they find that the machinery of a free country is less able to deal with them—a government requires a dash of arbitrary power to be able to come down on their peculiar mode of working. As for the Tractarians, they thought to supply to their Church the element of authority which it appeared to want; but, in doing this, they only prepared the way for the passage of thousands of their people to Rome. The case, according to Mr. Froude, is very serious, and it looks as if our children would once more have to conquer their spiritual freedom from the hands of Rome. In his further observations on the subject we shall be curious to see what he says about Scotland; the case is certainly peculiar, for though popery is undoubtedly as active there as anywhere, it has received the smallest possible amount of accession from the native part of the population.

IRISH UNIVERSITY EDUCATION.

Of the bill introduced by Mr. Gladstone for the establishment of a university in Ireland, defeated on its second reading on the 12th instant, we are reluctant to say much in this place, the matter being so entangled with political considerations, which on every account we wish to avoid. The country has shown itself most jealous of any measure which would commit public education in any of its branches to ultramontane hands; yet ultramontane influence defeated the measure, as if it cherished the expectation of more favourable terms. What has happened will make the country more vigilant than before, and will probably show more clearly how little ground there is for hope of coming to terms with Rome.

II.—GLANCES AT WHAT IS DOING ABROAD.

We have seen so many changes in the present age, that we have learned to look with comparative indifference on commotions that would have terrified a previous generation. The contest in France between Thiers and the Thirty, between the Republic and the Monarchy, between Liberalism and Ultramontanism, that thirty years ago would have thrown this country into a panic, is now regarded with singular coldness. Spain undergoes a change from monarchy to republicanism, and as a republic becomes exposed to numberless risks of anarchy and civil war; yet in this country the whole is regarded with only the most languid interest. We seem to have been hearing the cry of "Wolf" so often that we have ceased to be alarmed by it. Yet, undoubtedly, these changes may come in a very serious manner to effect the progress of the gospel. "Work while it is called to-day" seems to sound in our ears with every report of actual change, and every rumour of change to come. The unparalleled opportunity we now enjoy to preach the gospel and scatter the Bible, is one that ought to be accepted with an earnestness about which there should be no traces of languor.

THE CONFLICT IN SWITZERLAND.

The chief ecclesiastical interest on the Continent is in the battle which is going on between the Ultramontans and the Governments that have spirit enough to contend with them. During the last few weeks, Switzerland has come to the front in connection with this struggle. The opposition of the Catholic population to the Infallibilist decree has come out with remarkable decision in connection with the Bishop of Bâle. The jurisdiction of that gentleman over his diocese, which embraces the seven cantons or half cantons of Bâle, Campagne, Soleure, Thurgovie, Argovie, Lucerne, and Zug, is regulated by a concordat, which requires the consent of the civil authorities to ecclesiastical proceedings within the diocese. The bishop was very quiet for a considerable time after the Council of the Vatican; but summoning courage, proceeded, among other steps, to depose a popular Abbé, because he did not in his teaching accept the decree of Infallibility. This roused the civil authorities, who met in great indignation, and took the strong step of declaring the see of Bâle vacant, in consequence of the unconstitutional proceedings of the bishop. Two of the cantons, Lucerne and Zug, did not go so far as to depose the bishop, doubting whether that was a competent act; but the opposition to the decree of infallibility is intense, and the resistance to the imperious policy of Rome is not less so. The Roman Catholic clergy look upon the bishop as a martyr; and there are not a few Protestants who are unable to reconcile the action of the civil power to their ideas of toleration and religious liberty.

The collision at Geneva between the civil and the pontifical authorities is of a somewhat different kind. Contrary again to an ancient agreement, the Pope interfered in the ecclesiastical arrangements of Geneva without any understanding with the civil authorities. Hitherto there has been no Bishop of Geneva; but recently the Pope appointed a well-known priest, M. Mermillod, Vicar-Apostolic of Geneva, as a stepping-stone, it was commonly believed, to his appointment as bishop. This step has been so resented by the civil authorities of Geneva that M. Mermillod has been banished from the canton. The inferior clergy, who preferred to give obedience to him, have paid the penalty, in the shape of the loss of a quarter's allowance from the State. Much may naturally be said for the civil authorities, who have acted in this matter in accordance with the concordat agreed on by both parties; but in the Protestant community of Paris, as well as elsewhere, it is said that grave doubts exist as to the expediency and moral propriety of so summary and severe proceedings. Geneva, in its early history, got great celebrity for the vigour with which it espoused the cause of the Reformation. Now, however, her vigour is rather political than religious; and the earnest feeling under which she acts springs more from the sense of personal hurt, than from a burning regard to the interests of divine truth. Everywhere these proceedings have created the deepest interest; for the moral weight of what is done by Switzerland in this cause is quite out of proportion to her territorial magnitude.

IN GERMANY.

In Germany, too, the battle continues to rage—rages in newspapers and periodicals, as well as in fields of another kind. The bills before the Prussian Parliament for repressing Roman Catholicism continues to engage the attention of all. The Catholic clergy have expressed their determination to resist them even to the death. And if they do so resist, the Government is pledged to meet them with the most decisive measures—to suspend and finally suppress them. To all present appearance, this is the consummation to which matters are tending. The great difficulty of the Prussian Government in such a case would be to obtain new bishops in the place of those superseded. There would be one difficulty in finding men willing to accept the situations, and another in getting them consecrated. The Old Catholic movement might supply at least one of these wants, and in that direction the Prussian Government would probably turn.

And certainly in some places the Alt-Catholics are showing a remarkable degree of vigour. In Constance, for example, in the State of Baden, after hearing addresses from Michelis and Friedrich, a plebiscite of the Catholics was resolved on, and out of 1,500 Catholics, notwithstanding the most vigorous opposition of the priests, 657 voted against the Infallibility dogma. A deputation then proceeded to the Baden Government to ask the use of one of the churches for their worship. This request was granted at once. It is believed that other towns in Baden will speedily follow the lead of Constance, the more especially as the State is fettered by no concordat, and there are no political difficulties. It would appear that in Bavaria, once so keen, the movement has become languid, but that the fire has spread to the district around.

III.—JOTTINGS FROM THE MISSION FIELD.

MISSION CONFERENCE.

An important missionary conference has been held at Allahabad, in India. No fewer than one hundred and eighteen missionaries were present; and to show how many different denominations of brethren are capable of dwelling together in unity, it may be mentioned that twenty-two belonged to the Church Missionary Society, seventeen were American Presbyterian, thirteen American Episcopal, twelve Free Church of Scotland, eleven London Missionary, nine Baptist, four American Board, three Church of Scotland, three United Presbyterian of America, three United Presbyterian of Scotland, and several of other communions. The conference sat for five days, discussing all manner of questions of missionary interest, and in a spirit of great harmony. In India itself, the state of Christian missions, while far from fitted to cause despondency, is not outwardly very prosperous; but a great change is believed to be going on under the surface. Among tribes like the Santhals the progress is much more rapid. "We do not tell our converts to preach," said a missionary; "when they are converted they go of themselves, and say to their friends, 'Come, we have found something good.' People come by whole villages to see the missionary. Many villages have been entirely christianized, and support their pastor, as they formerly supported their priest, by allotting him a portion of land to work. One single man among them has brought no less than five villages to Christ." Medical missions had a prominent place at the meetings of this conference, and the real importance of medical institutions for training up the native converts, or some of them, to qualify them for practice among the natives, was much dwelt on. To those outside it is interesting to ascertain the views of mission work prevalent among those who are bearing the heat and burden of the day; but the main effect of such gatherings must be to quicken and encourage the workers themselves. The judgment of a missionary father, Dr. Wilson of Bombay, is—"The effect of the meetings has been to produce great hopefulness and joy at the prospect of the steady and sure progress of the work of the Lord in India."

AMUSEMENTS FOR NATIVE CHRISTIANS.

The subject of amusements for native Christians has been pressing itself on the attention of missionaries, and was recently under discussion at a conference in Calcutta. The question arose from the fact that in the large Christian community of Backergunge, under charge of the Rev. J. Sale, of the Baptist mission, some of the native Christians expressed a desire to take part in the boat-races connected with the festival of the Durga Pujah. There is so much connection between amusements and idolatrous practices, and likewise between amusements and lax moral habits, that the whole question connected with them becomes both delicate and difficult. The conference recognised the benefit of amusement in all wholesome forms, for the enlivening and refreshing of human life. It wisely abstained from directions as to particular cases, laying down general rules and cautions which each missionary must consider in each particular instance. Boat-races, when held in honour of heathen gods, could not be sanctioned, nor when accompanied by impure songs; but the case would be altered if they were held at other times and accompanied by better songs. Miracle-plays, representing the passion of our blessed Lord, corresponding to the jātrās, or plays in which proceedings of the heathen gods were often represented, were painful to witness, and injurious in tendency. But popular musical performances of a different description might be rendered very serviceable in spreading among the Hindoo and Mahometan population a knowledge of Scripture history and truth; and with due care, in aiding to produce an impression on the mind. The conference expressed its opinion, "that great strictness in the prohibition of instrumental music must defeat its own end, and that in all probability it is better not to denounce such music as injurious in its tendency, nor to attempt to regulate it in connection with the exercise of church discipline, as long as the words sung are not tainted with idolatry or impurity."

IV.—OUR MEMORIAL RECORD.

In the preceding part of this Number of our Magazine, we have given full expression to our sense of the loss sustained by the whole Christian Church in the removal of Dr. Guthrie. To that mournful subject we do not return here. We are desirous, however, of giving a niche to an eminent man of science, recently removed, full of years—

PROFESSOR SEDGWICK, OF CAMBRIDGE.

Of his eminence in science we do not need to write. Of the devout spirit in which he prosecuted his researches in geology and the study of nature, his own writings bear abundant evidence. He could never bear, while inquiring into the phenomena of nature, to feel himself "dangling in mid air without a resting-place for the sole of his foot." And from a funeral sermon by the Rev. Robert Burn, M.A., Senior Fellow of Trinity, we rejoice to learn "that his last hours were spent in earnest prayer for sanctification by the Holy Spirit, in submissive resignation to the will of his Creator, and in the firm trust that he was washed from the guilt of his sin by the atoning blood of his Saviour."

AGAINST THE STREAM:

The Story of an Heroic Age in England.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE SCHONBERG-COTTA FAMILY."

CHAPTER XVI.

E traveled for the most part outside the coach, and not through an altogether happy land. A series of bad harvests had raised the price of bread, while the French war barred our access to the abundant cornfields of the Continent.

The people, often so heroically patient in sufferings they feel to be inevitable, were by no means persuaded that the hunger they had now to endure was inevitable.

The one gigantic imperial form of Napoleon had scarcely yet effaced in the popular imagination the promises of the Republic. England was by no means of one heart and soul in the war, in any class or station. There was a suspicion in many minds that we were starving ourselves to enslave our neighbours. From the commencement, not only Mr. Fox, but Mr. Wilberforce, courageously abandoning his party, had been against it; and by this time the majority, enlightened by the failure of our large subsidies and our little army on the Continent, and not even consoled by our splendid successes at sea, were brought round to his opinions.

Moreover there was another gigantic imperial power rising not before the imagination, but before the eyes, and in spite of the hands, of the people; the power of Steam.

Against this the people had dashed themselves again and again in blind fury, in what were even now beginning to be the manufacturing districts in the north, burning the machinery, and hunting the inventors out of the country; poor human hands and hearts wounding themselves like children in vain assaults against the impassive irresistible force of material progress!

Our way, however, did not lie through these more disturbed districts, but through the agricultural lands of the south.

It was not so much riot and ruin that we saw as quiet uncontenting misery; hollow-eyed, hungry faces, feeble bent forms that should have been those of strong men, and worn old faces that should have been those of children. Misery, hunger, starvation; patient, not through hope, but through hopelessness.

In one town indeed through which we passed, we found broken windows in the bakers' shops, and men still hanging about in muttering groups, the sullen remnants of a mob recently hindered from burning the flour-mills.

The bewildered magistrates had met, and having consulted how to compel a reduction of prices, had felt the bakers and millers too strong to be assailed, and had therefore valiantly directed their attack on the market women, who were solemnly and severely commanded to sell their butter at tenpence a pound!

The Government mode of relief was scarcely less blind than that of the mob. Whilst the mob attacked the bakers, Parliament passed a Bill enjoining the use of brown bread.

Through this hungry and bewildered England the four horses of the stage-coach bore us, toiling up the green hills of our southern counties, and galloping across the many heaths and commons then still free; over plains historical with battles of old civil wars; passing in the twilight the weird giant stone-circles of a forgotten faith; seeing the spires or fretted towers of old cathedrals grow from grey delicate lines into majestic solidity as we approached; everywhere our arrival an event; welcomed in village and city inns by facetious hostlers, officious waiters, jolly landlords, and patronizing landladies. But always behind and around were those silent languid groups of hungry-eyed men and women, and grave children.

At last we drew near the great City. Two masses stood out distinctly, through the smoke and the twilight, the dome of St. Paul's, and the twin towers of Westminster Abbey. With these last we claimed a kind of kinship through our old Printing House in the Abbey churchyard of Abbot's Weir, where one of the earliest printing-presses in England had co-existed with the Caxton press at Westminster.

My father had often told us of it, and the little link seemed to make those abbey towers like a welcome.

There was little time, however, to observe buildings, at no time the characteristic glory of London.

We had entered the streets; and the multitudes and masses of human beings seemed to seize and overwhelm me, heart and mind, like a great Atlantic wave, and take away my breath. I seemed to pant to get to an end, a shore. And there was no end, no shore! only always, on and on, those busy, crowded streets, those wildernesses of human dwellings. I felt altogether lost, my individuality swept away and drowned, in the bewildering, busy whirlpool of those unknown crowds.

I could not account for it. If I could not have held Piers's hand I think I must have cried out, like somebody drowning. As it was, I squeezed his arm as if I were clinging to him for life. He laughed, and asked if I was afraid, and said it was as easy to the coachman to drive through London streets as to one of our waggoners to plod through the lanes of Abbot's Weir.

I knew the feeling was exaggerated and unreasonable, but I could neither explain nor help it.

And then, all at once, floated on my heart the words—

"And Jesus seeing the multitudes, had compassion on them."

That relieved me. Tears came, and I let them flow quietly.

All the majesty of that pitying Presence came over me! And I seemed to nestle like a child to that tender mighty Heart. I felt there was room for every one of those overwhelming crowds there, and feeling this I was at home.

At the coach door we were met by Cousin Crichton. He did not look in the least overwhelmed by the din or the crowd. He looked too solid and, at the same time, too buoyant to be overwhelmed by anything. The evils he could not beat off like a rock, he would float over like a buoy. He welcomed us as if he had known us for years.

"No more luggage than that!" he said, stowing away our boxes in the hackney coach he had ready for us. "Well done, Cousin Bride, I will take you to the Wall of China, if you like, with the same equipage, if only as a standing protest against my girls."

I felt a little abashed. He did not mean to be sarcastic, I was sure. His voice and his face were too round and hearty for satire. But in the grave footman who helped me into the carriage I detected a shade of condescension, inevitable from so solid a personage towards a young lady whose wardrobe could be compressed into one trunk. Also, I felt it necessary to justify the liberality of my father's arrangements.

"We thought Cousin Barbara would help us to buy suitable things," I answered, apologetically.

"Apologizing for your virtues? Don't, my dear! At least not before your cousins, I pray."

We crossed Westminster Bridge. The last faint gold of sunset was dying away over the broad river and in the frosty sky, but there was just enough colour to contrast with the dim grey of the Abbey towers, and the roofs of the old Houses of Parliament.

Again that absurd inclination to tears came over me. The Abbey brought back our abbey, and Abbot's Weir, and father; and the Houses of Parliament seemed sacred with memories of Loveday, and of the eloquent voices that had pleaded there for the slaves, and would go on pleading there until the great wrong was righted.

As we went on, Cousin Crichton poured out information which he thought would interest us. He pointed out Mr. Wedgwood's works, in Greek Street, Soho, and thence diverged to Bolton and Watt's, at Soho near Birmingham, and spoke of engines of a thousand horse power, and said they were beginning a social revolution greater than the French.

He showed us Covent Garden Theatre. "National!" he remarked, "whether we approve of it or not, and historical. David Garrick acted there; Hannah More's friend, you know."

He told us, as we drove over Westminster Bridge, that there was a larger mass of stone in that bridge than in St. Paul's.

I felt I ought to be astonished at everything. Piers evidently took it all in, and was much interested.

But I had very vague ideas as to "horse powers" and comparative quantities of stone, and although I had certainly heard of David Garrick, I felt in disgraceful ignorance as to Mrs. Hannah More, apparently, in my uncle's eyes, the larger celebrity of the two.

At last I ventured to ask if it was really there, under those roofs, that Mr. Wilberforce spoke, and Mr. Clarkson got all that terrible anti-slavery evidence listened to, which it cost him such labour to collect?

He turned on me with a look of pleased surprise.

"Then the echoes of our battles have reached the quiet old town?"

"My father cares for nothing, more!" I said. "We have heard about it all our lives."

He seemed moved, and gave my hand a hearty shake.

"Have you West Indians, then, in Abbot's Weir? What has roused up the dear, sleepy old town?"

"I don't think the old town is roused up," I said. "It is only father and Loveday Benbow."

"Benbow! I seem to know the name," he said.

"Her father is Lieutenant Benbow, and her mother was a Quaker, and she is an invalid, and has suffered much," I said; "but she cares for what the slaves suffer more than for all her own pain."

"Ah," he said, "the Quakers were always sound on that point; some of our best men are among them. So you have not had any abolition meetings?" he continued, with a business-like practical eye to "the cause."

"Any slave-holders?"

"One," I said, "one of our dearest friends. But she hates it."

"Ah," he sighed, "she has seen it, I suppose."

And then he pointed out to me the house where Granville Sharp lived.

"He is an old acquaintance, too, I suppose," he said, smiling.

"The oldest of all," I said. "We like him best of all."

"A very sound man," he replied; "a little crotchety; peculiar views as to prophecy, but very sound."

I felt a little chilled at the term. Would Andromeda have liked to hear Perseus called nothing more sublime than "sound?"

"There he is!" exclaimed Cousin Crichton.

He stopped the coach, and I actually saw him; looked into the fine face with the broad forehead, the delicate, feminine curves of the lip, the massive, resolute chin.

"Here is a young lady who is quite sound as to the Blacks," said Cousin Crichton.

And Mr. Sharp smiled benignantly in at the coach window, and I actually shook hands with him; had my hand in the friendly grasp of the hand that had rescued poor bruised and battered Jonathan Strong, and searched among the law-books and records, against the counsel of lawyers and judges, until it drew the true law of England to the light, and laid the foundation of the liberty of all slaves in the righteous judgment of one free country.

I was quite beyond tears then.

"Thank you, that is worth coming to London for, Cousin Crichton!" I said, as we drove on again. "The first of them all; he who began it all!"

"Shall we see Mr. Clarkson?" I ventured to ask, feeling as if everything good were possible now.

"Clarkson? Ah, I am not sure. An excellent hard-working man; but he does not belong to Clapham" (the "but" sounded like "although"); "a good hand at the foundations, Clarkson. But to-morrow you shall see Mr. Wilberforce's house, perhaps himself."

And that, I felt, was like saying, "You have seen the ministers; to-morrow you shall see the king."

The coach drove through a handsome stone gateway, and round a wide sweep of lawn, and stopped at a porch, very Grecian and impressive, though vague as to style.

In a moment we were in the brilliantly-lighted drawing-room, with lamps in various places, and a table set with silver and with flowers, and a steaming urn, and a great glowing coal-fire, and a party of most cordially-minded cousins, who kissed us as if they had known us for years, and their father, as if they had parted from him for years, and all fell on us at once with various hospitable propositions, until Cousin Crichton came to the rescue.

"Stand back, girls. You set all ceremonial at defiance. Cousin Bride Danescombe, let me introduce you one by one, beginning at the beginning. You have heard of the Admirable Crichton. These are all Admirable Crichtons. This is Hatty, who has a talent for finding out the most wonderful people to admire; and this is Matty, who has a talent for finding out the most uncomfortable people to comfort; and this is Phœbe, who has a talent for finding out the most impracticable people to reform; and this," he added, placing my hand in his wife's, "is your Cousin Barbara, the Admirable Crichton, who has a talent for loving every one lovable or unlovable, and will certainly take to loving you. The boys may introduce themselves," waving his hand to three tall young men. "And," he concluded, "there is the Lower House in the nursery. And there is little Martha up-stairs." As he spoke of little Martha he unconsciously lowered his voice, as we do in speaking of something sacred; and I noticed she was the only one who had no pet name; the one little patient sufferer in that prosperous, joyous home. Any name that belonged to her became a pet name only by its being hers. To me, indeed, when I learned to love her, she made the prosaic-sounding name of Martha as sweet and high as "Mary," so that I had always, after knowing her, a prejudice to overcome against any of the many occasions in which poor Martha and her blundering love were held up to severe animadversion.

There was a wonderful glow about the whole evening; the welcome, the lights in such abundance as I had never seen, the glowing masses of coal in the large grate, to which I was not accustomed, the rosy glow on my cousins' faces, the tender motherly light in their mother's eyes.

Cousin Crichton declared I looked as fresh as if I had come out of a bandbox. "But, talking of bandboxes, girls," he added, "I should like you to see what your cousin can do with—or without!"

But Cousin Barbara said I must be tired, and gently led me up-stairs.

Into such a bedroom! and with such a fire! I had never had a fire in my bedroom, except for a week when I had the measles. I felt I must in honesty disclaim such luxuries.

And there were book-shelves, and a sofa, and a writing-table with lovely exotic hot-house flowers on it, and a cheval-glass with lighted candles in brackets, and the fire-light flickering on the crimson damask draperies of such a magnificence of a bed! It would require a special ceremonial to get into it. The room was a residence; a house, a garden, a palace! My poor little trunk did look very meagre in it.

"How kind!" I said, "how luxurious and beautiful everything is! So much too good for me, Cousin Barbara. You must put me in some little room fit for a girl."

"I hope you will be comfortable, my dear," she said; "we do not wish to have luxuries, but we do try to make people comfortable."

She left me, and in a few minutes her kind soft voice was at the door again.

"My dear," she said, "you will not mind just looking in on little Martha. She has been expecting you, and she wants a kiss."

We went in.

There she lay, on a couch near the fire, her eager face welcoming me; her eyes with that wistful look of suffering in them questioning mine; her long, thin little hands still holding mine, so as not to let me go, when she had kissed me. The large eyes seemed satisfied with their answer, I suppose partly because I could scarcely meet them for tears.

"Kiss me again, Cousin Bride," she said.

And the second kiss was not that of a stranger.

I felt there was one place at least in that great, glad, wealthy household where I should be wanted, and therefore should be at home.

Then one flying glimpse in their beds in the nursery at the Lower House, which unconstitutionally refused to go to sleep without seeing the new cousin.

Then down again to the full, bright room.

"You will excuse our having only brown-bread, and no pastry, and no sugar," said Cousin Crichton. "The brown-bread is law, of course. The no pastry is our voluntary contribution to the scarcity; it seems a shame to be making into luxuries what others cannot get enough of to live on. But the no sugar is not compulsory. That, you know, is our protest against the slave-trade. Perhaps you take sugar."

Piers and I had given it up for years.

"Three hundred thousand, Clarkson found in one of his journeys had done the same; and some persons refuse to sell it. A little self-denial does none of us any harm."

It seemed strange to me to associate the thought of self-denial with that abundant table, with its cold and hot meats and elaborate cakes, and foreign preserves and dried fruits, and hot-house grapes, and many luxuries new to my provincial imagination. But it seemed to gratify Cousin Crichton to feel we were seasoning our dainties with that little pinch of self-denial, so of course I said nothing.

I think the thought of those starving men and women and little children, of whom we had been seeing so many, would have made it difficult for me to enjoy anything as my cousin wished that evening,—(of course I was over-fatigued and over-excited,)—if it had not been for the thought of that dear little worn face up-stairs.

This family also was, after all, bearing some share of the burdens of the world.

We had family prayers, (not then a matter of course), commenced by a very impressive procession of servants, headed by the portly housekeeper, a far more majestic person than

"AGAINST THE STREAM."

Cousin Barbara, and closed by a frightened-looking little maid, whom I concluded must be either one of Cousin Matty's uncomfortable people to be comforted, or one of Phæbe's impracticable people to be reformed.

Very hearty and benevolent those prayers seemed to me, and very humble I am sure they were meant to be. Our unworthiness and absence of all merit was much lamented in them; and the whole world, black and white, heathen and Christian, were most affectionately remembered, our "poorer brethren" (amongst whom my cousins diligently laboured); the millions of India and China, for whose sake the Church Missionary Society had just been instituted.

But somehow it felt as if we were people on a safe and sunny island interceding for those still struggling in the cold and perilous sea; people set apart in an oasis of exceptional plenty to shower down our alms and blessings on a hungry world.

Except in one tender little sentence, in which "the beloved member of this family who cannot be with us," was in few words and tremulous tones commended to the merciful Father.

As I lay awake in my regal bed that night watching the delightful friendly flicker of the fire-light on the mirror, the books, the mahogany wardrobe, the crimson damask curtains, I felt that "comfort" was a word that covered a good deal in the Crichton vocabulary; and that the distinction so clear to kind Cousin Barbara between "comfortable" and "luxurious" was rather too subtle for a provincial mind like mine.

I had never before known intimately a full complete family life such as this. It had so happened, I saw as I looked back to Abbot's Weir, that my little world there was a world of fragments. Our own home, happy as I was there, had never been complete since our mother went, and never could be more. Amice, Loveday, Miss Felicity, sweet little Claire and her mother, Uncle Fyford, and Dick Fyford were all fragments, more or less rugged or rounded, broken off from complete family life, or never having been moulded into it.

But this was a complete, warm, sunny, healthy, rich, round world, with all that were therein. Its sun and moon, and all its stars were there. The father lovingly providing, generously bestowing, ruling, delighting in the children; the mother loving, sympathizing, understanding, serving; all the brothers and sisters so full of life, and activity, and happiness—so full of trusted and trusting love.

How beautiful, how dear, how warm it was! And how much warmth it must shed all around! What a picture of "the Father's House" to those around it; what a foretaste of it to those within!

Yet my thoughts would wander back to that bewildered, battling, toiling, struggling England; that bewildered, battling world outside, and could find no rest.

Until they came back and did find rest in Cousin Martha's sick-chamber.

Little Martha seemed to link that abounding prosperous family with the suffering, weary, struggling world outside, and to make the contrast less oppressive.

Our blessed Lord did not live in an oasis, when He was visibly in this world, any more than he lived in the deserts; but on the open hillsides; in the city streets where the lame and blind were, and the sick were brought to the doors; on the dusty roads; by the village well, thirsty and weary, really poor.

It seemed to me good for that prosperous household that the footprints of poverty should have come into one chamber of it, poverty of all that makes wealth enjoyable; thirst and weariness no wealth could relieve; good that there should be one on whom the light of the Beatitudes came down direct with no necessity for symbolical explanation; not as a general declaration, but a personal benediction; not only, "Blessed are the poor in spirit, and they that hunger after righteousness," but "Blessed be ye poor; for yours is the kingdom of God. Blessed are ye that hunger now; for ye shall be filled."

CHAPTER XVII.

THE history of the anti-slavery struggle is not picturesque, at least the English portion of it. Its battle-fields are committee-rooms of the House of Commons, at no time the most picturesque of assemblies, the low taverns whence Clarkson hunted out witnesses, platforms of abolition meetings, largely attended by Quakers, the House of Commons itself; none of them very manageable material from a pictorial point of view. Its chief pictorial achievement is a terribly geometrical drawing of a section of a slave-ship with a cargo of black men and women stowed in it "like herrings in a barrel," only alive (at least, alive when they were packed), six feet by one foot four inches being the largest space allowed to any. Few historical pictures, however, have been so effective. It moved the House of Commons. "It seemed to make an instantaneous impression of horror on all who saw it."

Nor are the sacrifices made by the abolitionists such as sensationally to impress the imagination. Even such "a sacrifice to virtue" as three hundred thousand persons giving up sugar, scarcely means as much to us as it appears to have meant to the sufferers, who, it is recorded, on the promise of the abolition of the slave trade in 1796, experienced "great joy," and "several in consequence returned to the use of sugar." And, excepting sugar, the majority of its advocates were not mulcted of a luxury. The heart-anguish endured by men like Clarkson in hunting up evidence among the lowest haunts of seaport towns, or on the decks of slave-ships (steeping his soul in that bitter cup of cruelty and wretchedness until often sleep was impossible); and even the real personal danger he encountered; being once all but drowned in a storm he had braved to secure a witness, and once all but hustled into the sea by a band of slave-traders in the Liverpool docks—are not subjects to be dramatically represented.

Nevertheless, in the quiet heroism of "patient continuance in well-doing," strong to keep alive through half a century the glow of sympathetic enthusiasm, with no romantic visions or incidents to revive it, through the damps and chills of prosaic details of wrong and repeated failures of redress, the world has had few nobler examples.

The extent to which the trumpet was blown in some quarters afterwards, may have given subsequent generations a tendency to undervalue the work.

But Granville Sharp, and Clarkson, and Wilberforce, and the leaders of the contest, themselves blew no trumpet before them, called their deeds by no grandiloquent names, and never gave themselves out as martyrs or heroes, or anything but Christian men determined to lift off a great crime from their country and a great wrong from a continent.

I was a little disappointed at the feeling of my cousins with regard to the slave trade. They were quite "sound" on the subject, of course; they wore Mr. Wedgwood's cameo of "a man and a brother;" they abstained from sugar; but they were a little tired of the contest. "It seemed as if it would never come to an end." It had gone on in the House of Commons more than ten years; and ten years to my cousins was the whole of conscious life. "It was remarkable," Mr. Clarkson says, at the beginning of the century, "that the youth of the rising generation knew but little about the question. For some years the committee had not circulated any books."

Nor was the anti-slavery literature very attractive, or very "suitable for circulation in families."

The mere brutality of the wrongs inflicted make their records as unreadable as the criminal columns of a sensational newspaper. Besides, the "newest thing" whether in bonnets or baretas, in vestments, secular or ecclesiastical, in heresies or in philanthropy—will have irresistible attractions for "the youth of both sexes." And anti-slavery was by no means the newest thing in philanthropy. I found that, through Loveday's burdened heart and Amice's stricken conscience, I knew and felt more about it than my cousins. Except little Martha. "I cannot go with my sisters to the schools and the poor and the missionary meetings," she said; "but I can be as near the negroes as they can. They say the abolition struggle has gone on so long! but then, you know, that is because the misery is going on so long. I can sometimes make things to help the Moravian missionaries in the West Indies; and I can always ask God to help," she added, "at least almost always, when my head is not too stupid. And in the night when I cannot sleep, I often say over the poems and hymns about them by Cowper. They make my own little troubles seem nothing."

Moreover, the period during which I first visited Clapham was the time of a lull in the battle, although the preparations were continued, as Mr. Wilberforce said, "with uncooled zeal."

In 1800, 1801, 1802, and 1803 it was judged expedient to bring forward no motion for abolition in the House of Commons.

My cousins, however, were by no means irresponsive to my enthusiasm. They were quite ready most generously to acknowledge that perhaps they had not cared as much as they ought. "It was all so terrible and so hopeless, and there seemed nothing girls could do in it, and there were thousands of things so full of hope in which they could help!" "They had rather left slavery to papa and Mr. Wilberforce and the House of Commons." "I must come and see the day-schools and Sunday-schools, and attend the meetings at Exeter Hall for the Bible Society, and the London Missionary Society, and the Church Missionary Society."

However prosaic and old-fashioned those words may sound now, to us, then, they were full of spiritual romance, fresh as young leaves, fragrant as spring flowers, strong and glad as a river just set free from the winter ice. It was a joyous tide of new life, and I was swept away in it.

England had begun to awaken to the fact that she had millions of ignorant children to be taught the elements of Christianity, and millions of heathen subjects to be evangelized, and a whole world within and without in sore need of help. During the next few years, she was to get used to the necessity of standing alone against the world in more ways than one; and she was also to rise to the duty of standing alone for the world, until the Christian world awoke to help her. As certain as it is that there were years—at the beginning of this century—in which our country alone stemmed the desolating despotism of Napoleon, until nation after nation awoke not at her call but by her deeds; so certain it is that at the beginning of this century she alone, with anything to be called a national enthusiasm, stemmed the torrent of a thousand wrongs; negro slavery, the cruel miseries of the mad in lunatic asylums, of the unfortunate and the guilty in prisons, ignorance and darkness in Christendom and in heathendom, until nation after nation arose at the light of her shining, and the whole world is warmer and brighter for it, down to its darkest corners.

And equally certain is it that these philanthropic movements began not as the silent spreading of morning or as the gradual, insensible diffusion of an atmosphere, but by the honest, hearty, sometimes blundering and ungraceful struggles against the stream of a few earnest Christian men and women, not a few of whom lived at Clapham.

Whatever else the religious life at Clapham was or failed to be, it was hearty, healthy, helpful—not occupied with its own sensations, but with its work; using its strength, steadily and joyfully, in “going about doing good.” “Doing good” was the aim, the motto of the school. “Being good” no doubt should come first; but the “doing” and the “being” are so intertwined that it is not always easy to see which begins; and it is easy to see that towards the “being” few means are so efficacious as the “doing.” Nor is “doing good” a propensity I think likely to be at all generally pushed to a dangerous extreme; although talking about it certainly may.

Those first weeks at Clapham shine back on me like one of Cuypp’s sunny landscapes. They were spent in a golden haze of piety, philanthropy, prosperity, and personal petting of myself. My cousins could never make enough of me. They were much given to superlatives, not from exaggeration, but from a certain glow through which they saw things and people. The boys accepted me as a kind of younger sister, with a variety which was piquant; and, in their way, were as good to me as the girls. Happily (although I believe to Mrs. Danescombe’s disappointment), no thoughts of matrimony intruded themselves. Indeed, people were not in the habit of falling in love with me, as they were with Claire. The only persons who made that mistake in those days, were two elderly gentlemen, one of whom had an idea that I should devote myself efficiently to his eleven children, whilst the other considered that I reminded him of his first wife, an elderly lady recently departed; and a young curate, who, I believe, thought I should be a mother to him and his parish. On the contrary, people were in the habit of confiding to me their love affairs, as if I had been a venerable and indulgent grandmotherly person of seventy. I took it as a compliment, this being a prerogative of Loveday Benbow’s, although it did seem beginning rather early.

The first Sunday at Clapham was a decided novelty to me. Instead of every one rising a little later in homage to the day of rest, every one was down half-an-hour earlier to begin what, to my cousins, was the busiest day in the week.

There was an amicable contest among my cousins which should have possession of me to introduce me to her own special field of work. They all taught in Sunday-schools—Hatty, the class of young women in the school belonging to the church they attended; Matty, a class of infants in the same school; and Phoebe, a class of boys in a new school recently opened in a very poor and neglected district, which had sprung up like a fungus, with its crowded, ill-drained little houses, at some distance from the classic groves of Clapham, in a ragged outskirts of the great city.

To me, strange as it seems, Sunday-schools were altogether a new and unknown institution. No one had thought of establishing one in Abbot’s Weir. With some reluctance I had to confess it. We had not even a day-school, except a few collections of little ones, in scattered cottages, on a very limited scale as to numbers and instruction, kept by a few old women, chosen on the principle Oberlin superseded among his mountains, “too old to keep the goats, and therefore set to keep the children.”

I supposed the good people taught their own children, as best they could, and the indifferent people let their children do what they liked. Of the bad people I could give no account. I had not met them; they seemed to keep out of the way. And as to how we spent Sunday? We went to church, read good books, and had long talks with my father.

"But, dear Cousin Bride," said Phœbe, "the bad people generally do keep out of the way, don't you think? They have ~~lost~~ their way, you know. So we have to go out of the way to find them. And we have so many days to read good books in."

It was a new view to me.

If ever "false witness" was borne "against our neighbour," it is in the accusation that the "evangelical party" were supremely occupied with "saving their own souls." They might, some of them, have narrow and shallow ideas of what "salvation" means, (which of us has conceptions of that great word, deep and broad enough?), but at their own souls they certainly did not stop; labouring to save other people's souls was of the very essence of their religion.

Whatever else they believed or disbelieved, they believed most really that they had in their possession a remedy for the sins and sorrows of the whole world; and it was their duty and their delight to bestow and apply it; sometimes, no doubt, not discriminatingly or successfully. Have we found yet the school of spiritual medicine whose diagnosis is perfect, or whose treatment never fails?

The bright faces of my cousins did a large portion of their evangelizing work, bringing sunshine wherever they came.

Hatty's class of young women surprised me a little by the spruceness and fashionableness of their attire. Many of them were dressmakers and young shopwomen. But there was no mistaking the intelligent interest in the young faces gathered around the table where they read the Bible together, while she endeavoured to make it plain to them, by a system of "references" which was altogether new to me; no doubt, not always involving a very discriminating study of the different authors and books, but securing a familiar acquaintance with great scriptural revealed truths, in those inimitable words of the English Bible which would come back to the learners in many an after-hour of sorrow and pain and bewilderment, when none but familiar words would be able to penetrate the heart.

Matty's "babies" were, however, my especial delight. Here the aid of art was not despised. There were pictures, not exactly after the old masters, but very brilliant and attractive, of little Samuel, to whom God spoke, and of the boy Joseph, and of Ruth among the corn-fields, and of the child Saviour in the manger, and the good Shepherd carrying the lambs. There were songs about "busy bees," and "early blossoms," and "twinkling stars," and about the manger at Bethlehem, and the "little children" on whom the merciful hands were laid, and the fold where little lambs were safely folded, by which a thousand tender touches of "the Creed of Creeds" were sung and shone into the hearts of the little ones in tender tones and tints they would no more lose from the memory of the heart, than their mother's voice or their mother's kisses.

Whatever might elsewhere have been dry or over "doctrinal" in the creed, had for the children to be made living and tender and human. With them, at least, there was no danger of the gracious meaning of the Incarnation being forgotten.

But the work of Phœbe, the youngest of my cousins, who, according to her father, had the talent of finding out impracticable people to be reformed, interested me most of all.

With her I went, in the afternoon, to the people who lived, in every sense, "out of the way," and accordingly had to be sought.

The other Sunday-school was already an established institution. The children came to it as a matter of course. They were orderly and well-dressed, and naturally, therefore, more disposed to take the teaching as a matter of course. Many of the parents also were in the employment, in one way or another, of the rich people around, and they had thus a hereditary habit of orthodoxy, respectfulness, and respectability. But Phœbe's school was still experimental. It was a room in an alley, in which it was by no means a matter of course for the inhabitants to do anything they ought to do, or not to do anything they ought not to do, and in which very few were disposed as a matter of habit to be either respectful or respectable.

She could not well have gone there, but for the protection of two of her brothers who accompanied us.

The little persons to be influenced had a most real and independent personality of their own, and the influence over them had therefore to be real and personal.

If they were not interested, they made no polite pretensions of appearing to be. Uneducated, indeed, they were not. In their own narrow line their education had been terribly complete, only unfortunately in the wrong direction.

They knew far more of "life" and the "world," the youngest of them, than my cousin Matty, brought up in the sunny oasis of Clapham. With intelligence preter-naturally sharpened, like that of wild animals, in all that concerned themselves, acute, sagacious, cunning, because suspicious of traps, acute as one of those sharp-eyed terriers of their own, which Phœbe had such difficulty in keeping out of the school, in detecting an adversary's weak point,—and trained to look on all human beings, especially well-dressed human beings, as adversaries,—it was not in the direction of a contest of wits that my gentle cousin could cope with them.

Her power was that she had something altogether new, terribly, gloriously new, to bring them. She brought them love, and she brought them hope. At first, apparently, the whole thing was regarded, in the alley, by the gloomily disposed as an insolent invasion, and by the cheerfully disposed as a practical joke, which they returned by breaking the windows with brickbats. But by degrees, as one by one awoke to the fact that she and her brothers really cared for them, cared that they should grow better, and do better, and be all that is meant among those who are but too obviously "lost," by being "saved," a little band of chivalrous defenders gathered about her, always ready to execute summary Lynch law on any of their companions who presumed to create a disturbance.

That afternoon she had to rescue a victim who was being liberally "punched" for not "holding his jaw."

And when we came to the closing hymn, and the poor fellows shouted out a chorus about "sweet fields," and "living streams," and "Jesus, Shepherd of the sheep," these innocent pastoral images altogether overcame me.

To these outcasts to whom the world had denied all the innocent joys of home, Christianity, through a woman's words, was bringing childhood, for the first time. These little ones, hardened from the cradle, were now learning to come as little children, (children for the first time in the new life,) to the Master's feet, to the Saviour's arms, to the King's kingdom. And looking across to Piers, I saw that he also was not a little moved.

These teachings were in the intervals of the church services.

The church services themselves also had in them much that was very new to me.

In the first place there were distinct Christian hymns, altogether an unknown institution in Abbot's Weir Church, except at Easter and Christmas, when Reuben Pengelly, with an especially radiant face, used to perform "Hark, the herald angels sing," and "Jesus Christ is risen to-day." We had also occasionally an anthem at Abbot's Weir, with violins and bass-violins, but the whole performance was considered as a speciality of the choir.

It moved me therefore, particularly when the whole congregation, with soft united voices sang "Jesus, lover of my soul," and—

"O Lord, my best desire fulfil,
And help me to resign
Life, health, and comfort to Thy will,
And let that will be mine."

Both hymns were familiar to me; the first from Reuben's singing it to us in the Foundry-yard, from the days when he used to carry Piers about in his arms among the silent machinery on Sunday afternoons; the second, being his favourite Cowper's, my father used to make me very often say to him.

They brought all home before me; Reuben and the sabbatical stillness of the old Foundry-yard, the Stone Parlour fire on winter evenings, the arbour at the top of the garden on sunny summer afternoons.

All home, and all heaven; those "kindred points," which so often meet in the heart with overwhelming power, through the early associations of the simplest hymns!

The preaching was quite as new to me as the hymns. In the first place it was preaching. Hitherto I had heard nothing but meditations or essays. But this was a proclamation, a message, a speaking direct from heart to heart.

At this distance of time I cannot in the least remember the subject, the words spoken—perhaps they might not bear acute criticism; but I remember as distinctly as if it were yesterday the impression on my own heart.

A message from God, from the Father, from my Father, from the Saviour, from my Saviour, to me, searching into my heart what I was loving, searching into my life how I was living, making me feel how poor my life was, making me see how rich it ought to be, bringing God before me, bringing me before God.

It moved me much.

I felt too much to speak, when I came out of church. But whatever emotions my dear cousins experienced were not wont to express themselves in silence. The Quaker element was not strong at Cousin Crichton's.

"You enjoyed it, Cousin Bride," said Hatty and Matty simultaneously.

"I was not thinking exactly about enjoying. It searched quite down into one's heart!" I said.

They were satisfied.

"It was very good," said Hatty, "but it was not one of the most striking. It was only the curate, you know."

"You should hear Mr. Cecil, or dear old Mr. Newton, or"—and she went through a long string of celebrities whose names I, and perhaps a fickle world also, have forgotten.

But the comparative anatomy of sermons was a science altogether beyond me.

The Sunday always concluded with a family gathering at supper, when the spirits of all the family seemed to rise with especial elasticity after the day's work. Never was there more innocent glee at Cousin Crichton's; never were more good things said, or things not very brilliant in themselves, made to sparkle more in the glow of that bright home, than at the Sunday suppers.

But that first evening I was too much moved and too tired with all the day's happy excitements to be able to enter into it.

I had a headache, and was suffered to take refuge in little Martha's room.

"I never heard a sermon, you know, Cousin Bride," said she, when I said a little to her of what I had felt.

"And I have only heard one, Cousin Martha," I replied.

"You have no sermons at Abbot's Weir, dearest Bride?" she exclaimed, evidently looking on us as a case for a new missionary society.

"Not sermons that speak to the heart like that," I said, "Of course Uncle Fyford reads us what is called a sermon. But preaching is something very different."

Preaching seemed to me that evening such a glorious word, and a pulpit such a royal place!

St. Peter and the three thousand who were smitten to the heart at Jerusalem, and St. Paul's, "Woe unto me if I preach not"—if he had, indeed, had such a message to give, seemed to me quite comprehensible.

I pitied Martha very much that she could not go to church, or teach in Sunday-schools. I suppose she felt it by something in my looks or tones, for she said—

"Yet I do get sermons even here, Cousin Bride, from so many things, from everything, sometimes; from the fire and from the trees waving in the unseen wind, from the stars; if sermons mean messages from God."

"Yes," I said, "you have learned to listen." And I told her about Loveday, of whom she always delighted to hear. "But oh, Martha," I said, "it is these plain strong words piercing into the hearts that have not learned to listen. Surely if men go on preaching like this, the whole world will turn and listen, and love, before long!"

She hoped it would. She thought it must. The news was so good, the need so great.

And in that glow of hope I went to sleep that night in my princely bedroom, planning and dreaming all manner of philanthropic enterprises for Abbot's Weir and the world—day-schools, Sunday-schools, missionary societies; and feeling not a doubt that the result would be such as Abbot's Weir and the world had never known before.

It was an era of youth and hope, and Clapham was a land of hope. A thousand good works were beginning, and from each of them the founders expected a new era for the world.

CHAPTER XVIII.

ON looking at the little packet Madame des Ormes had given me, I was a little alarmed to find that it was intended for no less a personage than our local dignitary, the Countess of Abbot's Weir, whose town house was in Cavendish Square; and that it was to be delivered into no hands but her own. I suppose the Marquise had rather vague ideas concerning the size of London, and concerning the awfulness of our distinctions of rank.

Cousin Barbara could give me no light on the subject. Cousin Crichton and his family "dwelt among their own people," and had far too much simplicity and self-respect to wish to attain, through any irregular by-paths, religious or secular, to a social level above their own.

I wrote to Claire, therefore, to explain what I could of the difficulty; and we were waiting for the reply, when one morning a coach, a little beyond the usual sober and subdued splendour of Clapham, swept round to the porch.

In a few moments Mrs. Beckford-Glanvil was announced, and a lady sailed into the room, in whom I recognised at once the form in which Clapham had embodied itself to Amice.

There was a certain overpowering atmosphere of opulence about her, a pomp in the solidity of her tread, a sonorousness about the rustle of her silks; you felt instinctively that she was a representative figure; the wealth of the new wild West seemed represented in her sables, the wealth of the ancient East in her cachemires and her aromatic perfumes; the whole "haut commerce" of England in the magnificence of her presence; the whole "petite noblesse" of England in the condescension of her courtesy. She was not only a Beckford, but a Beckford-Glanvil, and not only a Beckford-Glanvil, but a Beckford-Glanvil consecrated and further illuminated by Clapham.

She saluted Cousin Barbara with a prolonged pressure of the hand, my cousins with a general gracious acknowledgment, and me with a particular and rather embarrassing inspection.

"Our niece Amice has written to her cousin Cecilia about you, Miss Danescombe," she said. "She is dying to see you; but to-day there was the music-master, the poor Chevalier d'Este, and the French mistress, the Comtesse de Montmorency, and the Italian master, the Marchese Borgia; really, Mrs. Crichton, there are so many refugees it seems a charity to take lessons from, one's children have scarcely leisure for friendship or society, or charity, or anything. How do you manage such things?"

"I do not manage at all," said Cousin Barbara, which was certainly a correct account of her mode of government. "The girls seem to enjoy everything, and so to find time for everything."

"Certainly, your sons and daughters seem to have time for everything," Mrs. Glanvil resumed. "I hear of them in the Sunday-schools, at the District Visiting Society, in the Missionary Collections—everywhere. Quite models! I am always holding them up to my poor dear Cecilia and to my sons. But then we all know, Mrs. Crichton, as dear Mr. V—— said so beautifully last Sunday, 'Paul may plant, and Apollos water.' And my poor Arabella, you know, married so very early; and her husband, Sir Frederic, so idolises her that he will not suffer her to enter a school or a cottage. You know there is danger of infection; those poor creatures are not so clean and careful as one could wish. How do you escape?"

"We do not always escape," Cousin Barbara replied. "But my children have good health, thank God, and they take care."

"Ah, some people are hardier than others.

My poor darlings are delicate plants, Mrs. Crichton; a little too tenderly nurtured, perhaps; rather too much hot-house plants, I fear."

But she said this in a way which decidedly implied the superiority of the hot-house products to the hardy natives of the open air.

"Our girls are not hot-house plants, certainly," said Cousin Barbara, a little nettled, "and I trust they never will be."

"But talking of hot-houses," continued Mrs. Glanvil, "your own conservatory is really beautiful."

Cousin Barbara rose and led her into it.

For a minute or two the murmured "gorgeous," "superb," "really, quite a novelty," from the conservatory, which opened out of the drawing-room, reminded me of the dread of Amice's childhood, of growing up and having to perform show-woman to her grandmother's greenhouse. "We have five gardeners—the head man a Scotchman," was the conclusion—"but really nothing quite equal to some of these exotics."

Whilst praiseworthy, it was evidently also a little presumptuous in Cousin Crichton, who only kept two gardeners, to reach this eminence.

We returned to politics and philanthropy.

With regard to the slave-trade she confessed that she and Mr. Glanvil did sometimes think Mr. Wilberforce a little unreasonable. Of course every one agreed it was doomed ultimately, but there were important interests not to be neglected; and wise regulation and discouragement leading in the course of years to gradual abolition, was what many sensible men thought the safest and most practicable scheme.

Cousin Barbara quoted Mr. Fox's words that "with regard to the regulation of the slave-trade, he knew of no such thing as the regulation of robbery and murder."

Mrs. Glanvil said women must leave these practical questions to men, and changed the subject.

The peace with France was beginning to become a general topic.

Mrs. Beckford-Glanvil had much information on the subject "from private sources," no mere newspaper reports, but things Mr. Beckford-Glanvil had heard at the House of Commons, which she liberally communicated in confidential tones, with a suggestion that perhaps at present "it had better not go further"—opinions of cabinet ministers and various great men and honourable women whom they had met at various dinners; sayings even of a Higher Personage still; what

Mr. Pitt intended, and Mr. Fox thought, and what his Majesty had said in confidence.

She was floating away in the midst of this tide of greatness, when the door opened and the butler announced "The Countess of Abbot's Weir," and a tall, majestic-looking woman in deep mourning advanced towards Cousin Barbara.

"You will excuse my coming without introduction, Mrs. Crichton," she said. "I had a message from a dear friend of mine, Madame des Ormes, through Miss Danescombe. It is a pleasure to escape from London," she continued, looking at the conservatory, "to have a glimpse of the country, gardens, and flowers."

If she had sought far and wide she could not have lighted on a compliment sweeter to the heart of Clapham than to call it "country," as I had learned by my cousin Crichton's face when in my first inexperience I had called it "wonderfully pretty for a town."

Cousin Barbara introduced me.

She took my hand, and held it a little, so kindly.

"You have done much," she said softly, "to make my poor friend's hard fate easier. She cannot write enough about you and yours. You must tell me about them all, and that sweet little Claire who loves you so much."

How at home she made me feel, with her gracious easy ways, and with the dear familiar names!

We had all been gradually freezing in the icy circle of that aggressive self-consciousness, which made all the world seem for the moment as if it had forgotten the Copernican system, and were perversely revolving round the house of Beckford-Glanvil, and which set one, (or at least set me,) on a foolish course of inward self-assertion, enumerating my own claims to consideration, and recalling all the distinguished people I had known or might have known; crystallizing us generally into separate spikes and blocks of ice.

And now all at once, as if with the touch of a sunbeam, we recovered and began to flow together. It was certainly not merely the fact of the rank of the countess, (although doubtless it is one of the privileges of mountains to allay the pretensions of the little hills,) it was that she was "at leisure from herself," and simply by virtue of her sweet graciousness set us free from the spell under which we had been growing rigid. In a few minutes I found myself talking to her about Madame des Ormes and Claire, with that certainty of her really caring which makes intercourse easy and natural.

I rose to fetch the little packet. Mrs. Beckford-Glanvil also rose, said again how her Cecilia was longing to see her cousin's friend, and hoped I would fix a day to spend with her, and that my cousins would accompany me.

The prospect was appalling, but Cousin Barbara having rescued me by saying we would soon do ourselves the pleasure of returning Mrs. Beckford-Glanvil's call, I was set free to execute my commission.

When I returned the countess was quietly talking to Cousin Barbara on the universal topic of the peace. But her information was by no means so assured as that of Mrs. Beckford-Glanvil. The earl, she said frankly, had never liked the war, and she had always thought it one of the finest things Mr. Wilberforce had ever done to stand out for peace against his political friends.

"It is so much easier," she said, "to differ from the whole world than from one's own party."

But she risked no other name by quoting it in support of any opinion; and of the King, when there happened to be occasion to mention his name, she spoke with the far-off loyalty of an ordinary subject who had never seen his Majesty nearer than in a procession.

"But there is one gentleman at Clapham," she said, "to whom I had once the honour of being introduced, and whose house I should greatly like to see. No doubt you can tell me. Mr. Granville Sharp. He has always seemed to me like one of the old knights before the ideal of chivalry was spoilt. The grandson of an archbishop and brother of an archdeacon, contentedly serving his apprenticeship to a mercer; and then, alone, turning the whole law of England, corrupted by false precedent, back to its true, older precedents of freedom. Then, afterwards, (which seems to me as noble as anything,) giving up his appointment in the Treasury and his income, rather than be involved in sending out ammunition for what he considered the unjust war against America. Content to be alone against the world, such men end in bringing the world round. I think there was never a nobler English gentleman."

My heart beat quick, and I felt my face glowing crimson at the praises of my hero, with the homage of my cousins to whom I had not been quite satisfied.

Cousin Barbara smiled, and said very kindly to me—

"Bride, you know Mr. Granville Sharp's house, if any one does."

"Will you get into the carriage and show me?" the countess said; "and will your cousin come with us? And will you let me drive them home with me, Mrs. Crichton, that we may have a long talk over our common friends and our common heroes? If you can, I should like it so much; the earl is away, and it will cheer my solitary evening; and I promise to send them back safely in the evening."

It was impossible to refuse, and Hatty and I spent a most happy day at Cavendish Square seeing all kinds of interesting ancestral portraits, and relics, and autographs, and feeling as if we were personally drinking draughts of delight at the very sources of English history.

Simple and natural her life seemed, as ours at Abbot's Weir, or my cousins' at Clapham, in the great world of London, which was her native place, or among their tenants in the country, whom she loved to help; its deep places, simply such as mine or Loveday's, or Reuben Pengelly's. Into these depths she gave me one glimpse, which drew my heart to her. Taking me into her dressing-room, she drew back a veil from the portrait of a lovely child about the age of Claire.

"Last year she was with us," she said. "Tell Claire. They used to play together in old days in France."

And on taking leave she kissed me, and said she must see me again at Abbot's Weir.

The visit to Mrs. Beckford-Glanvil could not be evaded, but the good nature of my cousins, great as it was, could not stretch so far as to accompany me. All they would concede was to attend a drawing-room missionary meeting in the evening, at which several of the Clapham lions were to be present, and a "native" of some oriental country in native costume.

Cecilia's longing to see me was not very apparent; but it was the less disappointing because she was not demonstrative on any subject. A kind of mental limpness seemed to pervade her, which was perhaps what her mother meant by her being a hot-house plant.

In Mrs. Glanvil's presence she said little. Her mother spoke for her. She was sure her dear Cecilia felt charmed with this, and interested in that; and Cecilia did not take the trouble to dissent. Mrs. Glanvil's own interest seemed concentrated on Madame des Ormes.

"It is curious," she said, "my mother-in-law did not mention her. Quite a person of distinction apparently. But, then, to be sure, there are so many foreign persons of distinction staying at this moment in England, that with all the princes, and marquises, and countesses, and chevaliers who have to be helped, one is quite bewildered with titles. Mr. Beckford-Glanvil often has to warn me that, after all, charity begins at home."

I pitied the poor patronised princes and marquises from my heart.

"But," I said, a little indignantly, "Madame des Ormes is not in want of charity. She lives at Abbot's Weir because she likes to be quiet, and (she kindly says) because she likes us. That is all."

"Of course, Miss Danescombe, of course. No one imagines a Marquise would settle in Abbot's Weir from choice. I suppose the Countess of Abbot's Weir knew them in better days?"

After a time Cecilia took me into her boudoir. When I was alone with her she came out in a new light.

To my cousin Crichtons the presence of their parents seemed a free atmosphere in which all their thoughts and hearts expanded; to Cecilia the absence of her mother seemed a liberation. She was surprised that I liked Clapham. It seemed to her and her brothers the dullest place in the world. She supposed it was because I came out of a deeper depth of dulness at Abbot's Weir.

She seemed to me terribly tepid and old. She admired nothing: she hoped in nothing. She was "désillusionnée" at nineteen. The slaves she considered only less wearisome than the anti-slavery people. She could not at all comprehend the fuss made about them. "If they were emancipated, they were still black and still poor, and how was the world to be made an agreeable place for blacks and poor people?"

The only thing she warmed into energy about was her detestation of missionary meetings. Her sister was married and never meant to attend another in her life. "All kinds of people brought into your drawing-room," she observed, with disgust, "that at other times would not come beyond the servants' hall. And my brothers say the whole thing is such an imposition. Converts bought at so much a head to come here and be shown like the zoological animals, and all the ladies and platforms trying who can have the newest or most curious. But I suppose every one must have amusements; we have ours, and mamma has hers. I don't think anything is very amusing; but religious amusements are certainly the dullest of all."

Piers and I had often found amusements, or trying to be amused, tiresome; and I supposed if religion could be brought to that level she might be right.

She depressed me dreadfully.

It was the first example I had encountered of that reaction from unreal enthusiasm to a cynical contempt, or a languid "nil admirari" which besets the second generation of religious parties, as far as they are merely parties; the Nemesis of all unreal religious profession.

Mr. Beckford-Glanvil appeared just before the late dinner at five o'clock. He was interesting to me for the sake of Abbot's Weir and Arnice, as the future proprietor of Court. But Mrs. Glanvil continued to dominate the conversation. He was polite but impenetrable, and seemed to me rather to endure his wife's social amusements than to enjoy them. But this is a peculiarity not limited to religious families.

At dinner there was general discourse about Abbot's Weir, the peace with France, and various political prospects, concerning which Mr. Glanvil was far more reticent and less informed than his wife. After dinner the hostess employed herself in impressing me with the importance of the expected guests, and especially expatiated concerning Mr. Wilberforce; how he "maintained religion in the eye of the world by having a large house, giving hospitable entertainments, and indulging himself in those congruities to his taste and fortune which became the English gentleman and the Christian."

A chill fear crept over me that I should find the lions of Clapham whom I was to behold that evening, and even Mr. Wilberforce himself, removed far from me into that world of clothes, congruities, proprieties, and conventionalities in which the "Me" and the "Not me" were so inextricably confounded, and in which my "Me" always became so terribly isolated.

Vain and foolish fears.

That sparkling wit, lighted up from that tender and benevolent heart, that social genial nature which in all society drew its deepest glow from the Presence it never quitted, that natural, courteous, considerate, easy, happy English gentleman, that lowly, loving, generous-hearted Christian man had not been in the room five minutes before the icy spell of self-importance and self-consciousness, of cynicism and "nil admirari" melted away, unconsciously, and entirely in that genial presence. Every one seemed to become real and natural; their best, because their true selves. Everything in God's creation seemed worth caring for. Every creature in His redeemed world seemed worth loving and serving.

Before the evening ended I was quite reconciled to Clapham, and quite inspired with its devotion to its chieftain.

CHAPTER XIX.

OUR cousins would not hear of our return. As our visit was prolonged, I began to have pathetic letters from Abbot's Weir.

Amice wrote—

"You seem fairly launched into the millennium; for you, that is, the reign of righteousness and peace; and for poor forsaken me, in the meantime the 'thousand years' of pining, without you. It seems just that since you left!

"Granny is more deaf in her discriminating way than ever, and more disposed to be didactic to me. She suspects that I have a turn for negroes and philanthropy, and accordingly finds and makes countless opportunities for depreciating philanthropists and negroes. And I am horribly torn between the conflicting duties of 'submitting myself to my governors' and being 'true in all my dealings;' between the emotions of indignation against what she says, and a reverent tenderness for her. For she loves me more from year to year, I know; and she would feel my crossing her will like a great blow from the hand she loves best in the world; her will, her heart, and her opinions being so inextricably entangled, that nothing would ever persuade her my differing from her opinions was anything but a heartless, wilful revolt against her love and authority. And moreover I cannot help seeing, brave and resolute as she is, and scornfully rejecting help as ever, that she grows weaker as I grow stronger, so that a blow from me now would be like a man striking his aged mother. It is all terribly entangled. Come back, my single-hearted Bride, and walk quietly on through all these tangles, in your wonted way, scattering nets of ropes like cobwebs by merely going straight forward, without an idea of what good you have done, of what perplexities you have made, or what perplexities you have unmade!

"Alas for me! I cannot help seeing and feeling all round, feeling every one's excuses and difficulties so strongly that I seem unable not only to go boldly forward, but to go on at all, and can only sit still, and let the net coil and knot itself about me tighter and tighter.

"Oh for the days of Moses, or of St. Paul, or of the Crusaders! And yet I suppose Moses had some conflict of doubts as to abandoning Pharaoh's daughter; and perhaps St. Paul as to Gamaliel; and perhaps even my crusading ancestor as to the wife, and babes, and 'villeins,' he left at home.

"But I am trying to listen, Bride, as our Lovedaysays, and sometimes I think when the call comes I could count it all joy to follow, anywhere, in any way.

"But can it have come while I was asleep?"

And Claire wrote:—

"I long for you always. Is London, then, after all, as strong in its attractions as our poor Paris of the old days? Or are you so strong in your attractions that London will not yield you back to us? Yes, that is it. The Countess writes to my mother in ecstasies about you. You are a sweet violet, a fresh breath from the moors, a demoiselle de la haute noblesse by nature,—a creature whose natural naturalness no Court could spoil. All this she says or means, when her words are translated.

"As if we needed to be told all that! I call it an impertinence to bestow all these beautiful phrases on us, as if they were anything new to us.

"Besides, I am not so sure about the manners of the noblesse. There are bourgeois souls among the haute noblesse, and there are Bayards among the bourgeoisie. They may create equality of possessions in our poor France if they can; but equality of persons never!

"And here are your violets and primroses sighing and growing pale for you! while Reuben waits when he brings me your letters, like your Newfoundland dog in his company manners trying not to seem solicitous for a bone. Mr. Danescombe grows hypocritical, and endeavours to persuade us and himself that he is delighted you are enjoying yourselves; and Miss Loveday grows monastic, and lectures me on the inordinate love of the creature, until I have to contradict her from her own Bible, which says so much about loving fervently, and never a word that I can see about not loving.

"Piers, no doubt, is well occupied, and forgets us all. That is but natural, when one has so many marvellous meetings, excellent and wise men, charming cousins, and steam-engines, to care about.

"But meantime we, your natural enemies, are possessing your land. And Mr. Danescombe said the other day, I recited some of Cowper's poetry like you! Take care, ma chérie, when hearts are left too long empty, they will fill themselves at any poor cup."

And Loveday wrote:—

"My heart is glad for you. You are learning by sight, on the Pestalozzian system, the best way. Perhaps, after all, nevertheless, one does not lose everything by being a little way off. At Corinth, you know, they were not quite clear which was the greater, Paul the Apostle, or Apollos."

And my stepmother:—

"I am gratified to find you are making wise use of such a golden opportunity. I am gratified also from your excellent cousins' letters to find they make such amiable allowance for any little rusticities your dear father's rather unrestrained ideas of liberty might have produced."

And my father:—

"My children, your cousins are all kindness. I cannot wonder that they delight to have you, as much as my judgment tells me I ought. And I am sure you ought to stay on, although I cannot wish it as I should, and as they so kindly seem to do. We grow miserly over the years, as there are fewer in the heap before us. But I think your home will be not less dear to you for all the luxuries of your cousins'. You have a love for helping to bear other people's burdens, my children, inherited from one better than I am. And God knows, He and you and every one have made the burdens of life light to me.

"Your letters glow, as if they came out of some tropical land. You are among those who are helping to lift off many burdens from mankind. And I trust you may bring us back some good lessons. We in Abbot's Weir have scarcely done all we might."

THE TANGLED SKEIN.

THE world's a tangled skein, my child, like that ye hold i' your hand,
 There's nought but sometime goes amiss, be it ever so well plann'd ;
 Life's best may be patient waiting, when our heart is at its ease,
 As they say there's always quiet at the bottom o' the seas :
 However wild the waves, they say, deep down is quiet rest ;
 And so the great peace, my child, lies in God's deep o' the breast.
 And I think if we took counsel of what our spirit tells,
 And thought of our good Maker more than of any object else,
 That each of us might do our part to bring that peace to all ;
 And so the world become again like it was before the Fall.

But we run, and, all impatient, break and pull the threads awry,
 And we seldom think we're much to blame, although we never try
 To gather up the ragged ends we've left there in our haste,
 But fancy God will knit them up and pardon all our waste.
 And, I think, our God does knit them up a scourge for us at last,
 For every fault comes back to us with other faults o'er cast ;
 Till of the whole it looks as though God's Providence was bent
 A patched and ugly dress to make out of our foiled intent,
 To wrap us round with misery, unless we strive to show
 Our penitence, and willingness to work for Him below ;
 And then He takes the garment, and dyes it all of one,
 Till it shines a spotless token of the beauty we'll put on,
 When the Son will lead us glorified before the great white throne.

I love to talk of heavenly things and tell you what I think,
 As here we sit at evenings when the sun begins to sink ;
 When father chats with sister Kate, and the great mill is at rest,
 It's like a foretaste o' the joy that's promised to the blest.
 I dunno think I make it plain, as parson does, you know ;
 But of my words you'll maybe think when I lie still and low.
 I'm sure of this that happiness ne'er comes by heaping gain,
 But only to a humble mind, contented to remain
 In patient, meek obedience to God and his commands, Leaving all the things of time completely in his hands.

THE TANGLED SKEIN.

ON MAINTAINING A HIGH IDEAL.

EVERY one who observes the lives of individual Christians must become sensible, not only of that natural and great diversity which may be traced back to variety in the original types and inherent qualities of individuals, but of a very great, and almost unaccountable difference in actual Christian character and progress. Persons not apparently dissimilar in original constitution, and not unequally placed as to outward circumstances, yet develop so differently, become, in plain truth, so much less, and more, Christian than each other. There are many reasons for this diversity, but there can be little doubt that one general reason for it may be found in the difference of the original or early idea formed as to what it is to be a Christian. Necessarily, in the quickened thoughts of young disciples there will arise certain prefigurations of what they wish and hope in a measure to realise and embody in after life. If those prefigurations are clear and high, and morally beautiful, there is a greater likelihood of high practical attainment in after life, than if they were commoner and narrower, and less fair. I will now speak therefore for a little on the importance of forming and maintaining a high ideal.

1. By a high ideal is meant not something vast, and vague, and unattainable, but what each, by God's help, in the full development of his own nature, may attain. Neither less nor more. To aim at less would be to be sluggish, undutiful, unfaithful. To aim at more would be to enter the mist, and become unreal. But indeed it is hardly possible to aim at more. For, speaking generally, it will be found that whatever can be intelligently and conscientiously aimed at, can be attained. The aim itself is a prophecy, and "shadow of a good thing to come." In the very ideas we entertain, and in the endeavours we make, God gives us the assurance that what we thus think of, and strive after, may be attained. It was the notion of Plato that each individual human creature is offspring or product of an eternal "form" or idea in the divine mind. Something of this kind must be supposed in reason: something of this kind is indeed taught by the Christian revelation. Our Lord speaks of "the light that is in a man" as something original and potential, and which, in result, may either bring "fulness" of light to "the whole body" or being; or through neglect or misuse, "greatness of darkness!" but in either case, He teaches that the light-fountain is within. There is an original divine idea concerning the man, and the germ of that idea is wrapped up in the centre of his being. By evolution, and under the nourishment of grace it blossoms out, and becomes a manifestation of the thought of God, answering so well to the original picture and purpose in the divine mind, that we are said to "put on the image of the heavenly." St. Paul's doctrine of "the old man" and "the new man"—the flesh and the spirit—is substantially the same thing. The natural man and the spiritual man are not two divine formations, thrown together in one being at hazard, and left to struggle or "lust against" each other, until one shall gain the victory. The deep underlying thought of the Apostle evidently is that one is original, organic, divine,—"To be spiritually-minded is life." The other is a misbegotten thing—a malformation—a spiritual disease tending to dissolution—"To be carnally-minded is death." Redemption—what is it, but the rising up of a human being to look upon his better self as it exists in the original thought of God, as it is portrayed in the life and work of his Son? Every child of God is like the prodigal son at least in this, that "he comes to himself"—slowly, and unconsciously, and from the first, or more suddenly and amid fleeings, and escapings, and alarms. He comes to himself in coming to his God, and recognises, not without shame in the memory of the poor and sinful past of his life, yet with overmastering gratitude and joy, that it is the loving will of God, and always has been, that he should be as much as, and indeed far more than, in his best moments he can conceive or desire. He cannot surpass the thought of God in regard to his own being. It transcends in majesty and beauty his highest conception. It is purer than his holiest desires. God thus, as we may say, keeps "the secret" of every life, its true image and proportions, and opens that secret to each as he comes to Him. He has a picture in his own mind of which each may be through his grace, a living reflex. O beautiful, inspiring thought—touching us with fear and yet raising us to rapture—that each of us can find himself truly, only in his God, and that the discovery is certain to be eternal advancement and salvation! If we are "made partakers of the divine nature," if we grow up into the divine image, we cannot but be sharers in divine blessedness.

2. To maintain the ideal high we must be continually striving to enlarge it. Our first conception of our true self, even when it is given to us of God, is comparatively meagre and common. At any rate it is very imperfect. It is a dull shadowed view of a bright thing. We need higher standing-ground, and clearer air, and a purified sight. "It doth not yet appear what we shall be," but in a progressive life it ought to be appearing more and more. If it does not appear more and more, it will but too probably appear less and less. Our moral conception of our own proper nature must either grow larger and more luminous, or fade down into narrowness and darkness. Nothing on earth, mental or material, can continue in one stay. "The world passeth away and the lust thereof." But that is not all. There is in which our best thoughts and noblest purposes are "passing," and dying too; and our only safety lies in raising still better thoughts and still nobler purposes from the ashes of those that have died. There is to be a "daily renewing of the inward man," which clearly betokens a daily waste. Swift, and subtle, and sure is the passing away of our most ethereal thought, our most glowing emotion. Swift and sure also be the reproduction and expansion of them, so that while there is dying and coming into life perpetually, there shall yet be to our consciousness only an unbroken continuity, and a going on of our life "from strength to strength." "I follow after if that I may apprehend that for which I am apprehended of Christ Jesus."

3. In seeking to maintain, and still enhance this spiritual and great idea of our own life, we shall be much assisted by an assured belief that it is the very thing which God wishes and will help us to realise and be. This is his "good, and holy, and acceptable will." In moments of penitential sorrow and discouragement, when "our own hearts condemn us," we are ready enough to believe that "God is greater than our hearts," and "knowing all things," will condemn us far more deeply than we do ourselves. In moments of vision, when our hearts pant and strive after more wholesome conditions, and holier thoughts, and happier fellowships than we have ever known, we are not so ready to believe that God is still "greater than our hearts," and "knowing all things" on the upper and better side of our life, as well as on the lower and darker, will meet the upward strain of our thought, and every passionate yearning of our breast, with every needed help from his own "light" and "love." But this is true. Nothing can be true to us, or worth being true, if this is not true. If God will not help us in this way—by the breath of his own infinite sympathy, by the uplifting of the light of his countenance upon us, our life is indeed a dark and hopeless thing. It never can expand into summer breadth and beauty. Its winter can never pass away; nor can the time of flowers or the singing of birds ever come. But who of us dare say or think that the great helper will not help? That the great Father from whose heart all human affections have sprung, will no more "pity" his children! How it pleases a father or a strong elder brother, to take the hand of some youthful climber and help him up the rocks and along the giddy and perilous ridge towards some sunny and safe elevations of the mountains! Will it please the heavenly Father less to help those who, already called and quickened by his grace, are aiming as they can after entire conformity to the very image of their Father? Verily this is "the good pleasure of his will." We can ask for much, and we can think of more,—but God is "able," and of course He is willing, "to do exceeding abundantly above all that we can ask or think,"—and how? "according to the power that worketh in us" already—along the line of our own life-development—by the continuity of what has been begun—sometimes by the strengthening of what "remains and is ready to die," and sometimes by the strengthening of what remains, and is endeavouring more fully to live—in many gentle and quiet ways the heart settling itself into a deeper peace, under the brooding and breathing of his Spirit, and also by strong and pleasant awakenings of the soul under the pull of the celestial attractions—but always "according to the power that worketh in us," and with a view to aid us, and lift us onwards and upwards, and ever nearer to the accomplishment of all our best desire.

4. Once more; if we would maintain a high sentiment and a pure idea about our own life, we must learn to believe in the actual goodness of others, as well as in the possible growth of our own. To use technical, but perfectly appropriate, language, we must learn to believe that God has a people in the world. All people, indeed, are his people. But some people are more nearly and dearly his. There are receptive souls. There are those who hunger and thirst after righteousness—who are trustful, and teachable, and obedient. To deny this would be, in effect, to deny that God has been practically working in the world at all; for there is nothing conceivable as God's chief work in this world except something which goes directly to the production of character. The glory of God in this world is the production of his own likeness in the hearts and lives of men—his own likeness, which also, by original birthright, is theirs. But in this, as in so many other things, very much depends on habit—on how we look, and where we look, and what we look for. If we are to see much of God's glory in man's life, in the lives of his own children, no doubt we must be practically expecting to see it.

It is recorded of that mysterious man Balaam, that, at a critical moment, and apparently even a kind of turning-point in his strange history, he "went not, as at other times, to seek for enchantments, but he set his face towards the wilderness," i.e. toward the uplands and mountains of Moab, where, as he knew, the chosen and guided people lay encamped. And then he saw the tents! And then the whole picture of the coming prosperity and power of this now pilgrim people came floating into the sphere of his rapt vision. And then he sang, "How goodly are thy tents, O Jacob, and thy tabernacles, O Israel!" We, too, Balaam-like in this at least, must look where God is working if we wish to see the work of God; and where God is working most graciously if we want to see that work in its best forms. And there are so many other directions to look in, and so many other things to see, if we will. The devil has work enough on hand in this world; and men are working for themselves; and passion, and individual interest, and all the social "enchantments" of modern life, which are greatly more potent than poor Balaam's ever could be, are cast as softly as the air about men as they go. And all the sins are being sinned, and all the crimes committed, and all the miseries and sufferings are being endured; and a young man may look at all this and say, "I see no glory of God." No. Because, morally, you are not looking in the right direction. You are not looking in the right way. In fact, you are not looking for the thing. "We bring with us what we find." Balaam expected to see the tents of Israel, and he saw them. If we wish to see real goodness, if even we are only willing to see it, it will not be hid from our eyes. But there are those in our time who, worse than Balaam, expect little or nothing, and find as little as they expect. The sight of the tents, if we may for a moment allegorize, almost sets them cursing—mildly perhaps, but really. There are certain words and terms, and those as significant and holy as any in the language, which when heard or read, seem to excite in some breasts only the most undesirable emotions—ridicule, scorn, mistrust, even enmity. "A Christian," "A child of God," "Church," "Bishop," "minister of the Gospel." See how the lighter literature is spiced with contemptuous, and disdainful, and sometimes even thoroughly ill-tempered allusions to such things and persons. Or, when the element of ridicule is absent, and there is no malignity in those who write, how often is there an utter want of sympathy, a lack of the very faculty of appreciation and apprehension; in one word, a profound disbelief in all high and real goodness, either human or divine. Is not there a new creed something like this—"that men are sincere enough, and Christians among the rest. They—the Christians especially—honestly think themselves sincere, and disinterested, and in a measure self-sacrificing. But the world is really governed by selfishness all the while. Men are seeking enjoyment in different ways. Some find it in the indulgence of the passions; some in the culture of the higher affections, some in the discipline of conscience, and the upholding of the moral rule in life; and some in religious faith, and the making of supposed good investments for a world to come. But in reality 'self-seeking accounts for it all.'"

That we may be somewhat reassured, those who hold a creed like this tell us that they make no complaint of this state of things. It seems to be, for the present, a part of the constitution of the world. All they seem to complain of is, "the hypocrisy, conscious or unconscious, which affects to deny this, and puts out a scheme of celestial virtues which are utterly unattainable, and, of course, as they think, unattained by man." All this, no doubt, is what may be called outside sentiment. True. But whatever exists in any great strength outside the Christian Church, casts shadows within. And the chill is felt, and the darkness is seen, oftentimes, without knowledge of whence they have come. And we may depend upon it that in a state of society like ours, permeated all through with the cynical, critical temper, and characterized by a constant distrust—sometimes fierce and sometimes sorrowful—of everything like saintliness in human beings—i.e. of everything like high, steady, growing virtue and goodness—a beautiful ideal, in short, ever growing more beautiful, we need all to be on the watch. Pray God to preserve in you, or restore to you, a child-like trustfulness of heart and disposition, and to give you the clear, open sight, the single eye which will see things as they are, with the inward habit of believing that, in the main, things are what they seem to an honest look, and, in some instances, even better than they seem. Look for goodness, and it will shine out upon you, unless you yourself are evil. Look for humility, and you will find it, unless you yourself are proud. Look for truth and honesty, and they, like the living, personal fountain whence they spring, "will not leave you comfortless, they will come to you." Look, in a word, for the love and tenderness of Christ, which yet are found in so many human hearts, and you will soon be refreshed by the breathing of that love and tenderness as though He himself were near.

Discoveries of these qualities in men and women, and even in little children, are constantly being made in a very affecting way. All at once, and ah, how often! the truth comes out to view, as by revelation, and we doubt no more. Who is the revealer? Death.

"It clothes their every gift and grace
With radiance from the holiest place,
With light as from an angel's face.

"Recalls the loving fond device,
The daily act of sacrifice,
Of which, too late, we learn the price.

"It sweeps their faults with heavy hand,
As sweeps the sea the trampled sand,
Till scarce the faintest print is scanned."

"Thus doth death speak of our beloved
When it has laid them low.
Then let love antedate the work of death,
And do this—now."

God had been with Jacob, and "he knew it not." God's children are with us, and we hardly ever know them fully, until they are gone. But certainly the more we see of the goodness of others, the better will it fare with our own. No one who does not believe in the goodness of others, can hope ever to attain real goodness himself. He dooms himself, by this very scepticism, to eternal selfishness. He cannot hope to be the one exception to the universal law, which sweeps everything before it. And what a fate for a man to choose—to be eternally shut off from goodness, and alienated from God! What a fatal conclusion, for himself, a man reaches when he has demonstrated, as he thinks, that there is no such thing as virtue in the world! Far wiser and happier are they who, in the true filial spirit, first look up to the Father, and then, with almost an equal confidence, look around to see the sons and daughters. None of them perfect, some of them only beginning to put on the beautiful image, but all cherishing the common hope, and striving in the one grand aim which will be reached and realised in fulness only in the final "manifestation of the sons of God." Is there any human society which can be better, morally, than those associated companies of Christian believers whose very profession it is that they are profoundly dissatisfied with themselves, and whose constant aim is to attain a higher character, and lead a nobler life—who strive to hate all evil and to win all goodness? Is there anything in human life sweeter, in its way, than the Christian quietness? anything more touchingly beautiful than patience under lengthened suffering? anything grander than faith in things invisible? or a hope so sacred and sublime as that which burns in many a heart, undimmed and undiminished through the dank and cold mists of death? By association, less or more, as God gives opportunity, with those, the excellent of the earth, we shall be the better able to relume our own sometimes flickering lamp, to raise again our slanted aim, to keep our ideal pure and high, and to press on with tireless feet towards the dark death-gate of exit, which we believe to be on the other side, the bright gate of entrance into the everlasting kingdom of the Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

5. Also the contemplation of the goodness of the sainted dead will be found, in the case of most young persons, to operate powerfully in the same direction—towards raising and keeping the standard and tone of life pure and high. Most people, young or old, are conscious of a quite peculiar feeling, and of the movement within them of an influence quite unique, as the result of biographical or autobiographical reading of a really interesting kind. Nothing touches life so deeply and sensibly as life. Nothing moves it to finer issues. One excellence and another, which perhaps had seemed too ethereal for realistic embodiment in an actual human life, and amid common conditions, are found to have been actually embodied and expressed: "Ah then, my secret thought is, after all, a possibility! The secret sighs of my discouraged imagination may yet break into songs. With God all things are possible." Nor need there be to our thought much subtraction from this influence in consequence of unconscious exaggeration of the good qualities of the departed in the glowing portraiture drawn by the hand of friendship or love. True, some qualities are exaggerated. But 'tis equally true that some are forgotten, or unknown. And after all, the exaggeration, where it is honest, is only, as it were, an acceleration of the development which is actually going on—only an enlargement along the lines of the truth, only a heightening of colours already existing; and the perfectly legitimate feeling of the reader is, "I am looking not at a picture of the fancy, but the very man himself as he is growing to be. The ideal will become the real in a while." It is so. The great artist begins his living pictures here, and we never see the finishing. But we see how the finishing is to be. Face and feature begin to come out to view, and gleam of intelligence and glow of love. Wonderful process! The canvas of this picture is the organic substance of the human soul. Thoughts and feelings make the colouring. An unseen hand—light as a "wind blowing where it listeth"—is busy, without ceasing, in the living work, and then, suddenly or slowly, by the same unseen hand, the picture is removed from sight. But can we help anticipating and believing in the perfecting of a process so beautiful, so good, so worthy of God? And can we but be thankful that we have been permitted to see the beginnings of it? and—best of all—looking then with appreciative eye on God's selectest work in others, can we fail to receive some increase of the same good work in ourselves? Is it not certain that, looking, we shall become like? being changed by the subtle, benignant laws of grace into the same image we thus see and admire—"from glory to glory as by the Spirit of the Lord."

6. Lastly, and above all, we must maintain a constant, vital connection, a connection by faith, love, admiration, with Jesus Christ. None among us, old or young, can maintain a high ideal of our life without Him. We need Him—for our reverence, and for our admiration, and for our enthusiasm, and for our love! and for our frailties, oh how much! and for our great unworthiness. And for failures, and hindrances, and fears, and discouragements—his cleansing sacrifice, his killing cross, his quickening grave, and the reviving airs and all the refreshing powers of his risen life. "Without Him we can do nothing," either in the way of escaping from evil, or achieving good. But by his "strengthenings" we can do all things. The good-will of God, in which, as we have seen, it is so necessary to believe, is expressed and embodied by Him, brought into closest nearness, translated into helpfulness. A human life is then simple, pure, and high, when it is a "growing up into Him in all things who is the head." Human beings will be in their perfection, in glory and eternal blessedness, when it can be said of them that they have "come to the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ." ALEXANDER RALEIGH.

KEEP THY FOOT—A WORD FOR WORSHIPPERS

BY THE LATE ISLAY BURNS, D.D.

"Keep thy foot when thou goest into the house of God, and be more ready to hear than to give the sacrifice of fools; for they consider not that they do evil."—ECCLES. V. 1.

IT is possible that the opening clause of this text bears a special allusion to the words spoken of old to Moses from the midst of the bush: "Put off thy shoes from thy feet, for the place whereon thou standest is holy ground." In that case the specific duty they enjoin is reverence. We are to draw near to God in his house of prayer with the same sentiments of holy awe and fear with which he turned aside to behold that great sight. We are to recognise God as really present here, even as He was present there, and tread softly and heedfully as feeling that we too stand on holy ground. We are to demean ourselves alike in the inward worship of our hearts and in the outward posture of our bodies, as in the presence of the august majesty of heaven. We are to cast off the shoes from our feet, leave all our ordinary thoughts and feelings and habits of soul behind us, nor dare to tread the cloth of gold before the eternal throne with sandals soiled with the dust of earth. "We are to worship," in short, "and fall down, yea, kneel before the Lord our Maker." In this way the words would not express the whole of that state of mind and heart which God requires in his worship here, but only a part of it. They would inculcate the fear only, not the love; the reverence, not the confidence; the spirit of the servant rather than the spirit of the child. They would thus breathe a more exclusively Old Testament spirit, and bring home to our trembling souls the thought of the great and terrible God, rather than the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. But we may take the expression in a more general and comprehensive sense. We may regard the words "keep thy foot" as simply expressing the sense they would bear in the every-day language of life. To keep our feet, or, take heed to our feet, is just to walk heedfully, carefully. To mind what we are about, to remember where we are, and take care that we do not stumble. So, to keep our feet when we go to the house of God, is just to go about the sacred business seriously, thoughtfully, circumspectly, as those who realise the grand importance of the occasion, and are resolved by God's grace not to miscarry therein. It includes, therefore, everything that belongs to a right approach to God. The serious preparation beforehand, the earnest attention at the time, and the prayerful improvement afterwards; the attitude and behaviour, in short, throughout, of a man in earnest, in contradistinction with one who heedlessly trifles with holy things. "Keep thy foot;" realise the nature of the business in which you engage; deal with it as a serious and weighty affair. Remember the momentous issues that hang upon it; the joy, the peace, the strength, the victory which, on the one hand, it may bring you, and the withering and deadly blight which, on the other, it may entail; and as you remember this, draw near with anxious heed and holy fear, praying the while as you think of the manifold snares and stumbling-blocks in your way." "Hold up my goings in thy paths, that my footsteps slip not." "O send out thy light and thy truth; let them lead me, and bring me to thy holy hill, even unto thy sanctuary."

1. "Keep then thy foot." Take heed lest thou stumble to thy soul's damage and hurt, and to the dishonour of thy God on the very threshold of the holy place. For there are many stumbling-blocks. Satan, who is at all times watching and waiting for our halting, has his eye specially on those who are drawing near to God, the fountain of life and salvation. He would fain trip us as we go in, or failing in that, when we are coming out. One stumbling-block is thoughtlessness: a heedless forgetfulness of the grandeur and awful importance of the occasion; rushing lightly and without fear where angels fear to tread. Another is formality: going through the whole as a matter of mere custom and lifeless form in which the heart and soul have no share. Then there is unbelief: blotting out from before our eyes the whole spiritual world with which the soul in its sacred moments has to deal, and making the living God himself but a shadow and a name. Then there is a distractedness of thought, carrying our hearts away in chase of a thousand vanities, while our bodies perform their miserable automaton service before the Lord. Alas! by how many dangers are we encompassed! What a crowd of enemies and betrayers throng around the holy place! What need of watchfulness and fear and strenuous earnestness, and above all of continual prayer, if we would not have our holiest duties turned to vanity and shame—the most golden moments of blessed opportunity snatched from our hands! Oh, then, let us give the more earnest heed to these things, lest by any means we should let them slip. "Keep thy foot when thou goest into the house of God."

2. "And be more ready to hear than to give the sacrifice of fools." The best and most effectual way to avoid the dangers which beset us in sacred duties, is to keep clearly before our eyes the real nature of the work in which we are to be engaged, and the attitude of soul which it requires. Of this we have a brief but comprehensive statement in this second clause. "Be more ready to hear." In approaching to the Most High, our great business is to hear. In entering the audience chamber of the Great King, our part is not to listen to our own voice, but to his. "I will hear what God the Lord will speak;" "I will stand upon my watch and set me upon the tower, and will watch to see what He will say unto me, and what I shall answer when I am reproved." "Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth." "My sheep hear my voice, and I know them, and they follow me." Such passages as these unveil to us the deepest springs of the new nature and of the rule and exercise of holy living. The listening heart; the waiting heart whose ears are stretched to catch the least whisper of the voice of God; that is the secret and starting-point of all spiritual and acceptable worship. Wherever it ends, here, at least, it must begin. Man in his higher, as well as in his lower nature, lives not by bread alone, or by what men may call bread, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God. By that Word He gave us life at first, and by the same Word He sustains that life, and strengthens it more and more unto the end. Therefore, we must listen for that Word, for listening is to that food of the soul what eating is to the food of the body; therefore, if we would thrive in our souls, and grow strong within, we must have ever a sharp appetite, and a keen relish for that heavenly food; we must "be more ready to hear than to offer the sacrifice of fools." Not, indeed, that our intercourse with God is to be all hearing.

If God is not to be silent to us, no more must we be dumb. If He graciously speaks, He as graciously listens. He is the hearer of prayer, and to Him shall all flesh come, with their confessions, their petitions, and all the sad detail of their sorrows and their sins. It is ours, oh blessed and priceless privilege! to lay our petitions on the steps of the throne, as well as wait and hear the answer of the King. But even then it becomes us to demean ourselves as those who are coming to a King. If our petitions may be large, let our words be few and well weighed. Let them not outrun the sense, outrun and overshoot the real conviction and inward feeling of our souls. Here, of all places in the world, let us beware of words that are mere words—meaningless, hollow words. Better be silent altogether than thus to trifle with the holy majesty of heaven. "Be not rash with thy mouth, and let not thine heart be in haste to utter anything before God; for God is in heaven, and thou upon earth; therefore, let thy words be few." In short, say only what is true; say only what you feel; pour not out words from your lips which have no corresponding reality and meaning in your heart. Do not utter raptures you feel not; contrition and heart-grief you know not; vows of holy obedience you mean not, and never intend to pay. Such prayers are nothing better than an hypocritical pretence and impious mockery of Heaven! yet what else can we do, if we are resolved to speak in many and inflated words to God? If we feel little and yet speak much, what else can the greater part be but such meaningless, soulless words as these I have described? Therefore let thy words be few. Let them be like the prayer of the publican—of the Syrophenician—of the dying thief—swift arrows of the heart, piercing the heavens. Let them be the fruit of much thought, much meditation, much searching of the Divine Word, much silent waiting upon God, and listening to his voice; but let the words themselves be few.

Better one spark of living fire, than a whole heap of ashes. Better a single grain of genuine wheat, than a whole mountain of chaff. Better to utter even one word of real heart-prayer once in our life, than walk amid a cloud of empty words all our days. Still, the primary element in all true communion with God is hearing. This must be the groundwork of the whole. By it faith lives; hope gathers fresh courage, and devotion receives at once its sustaining aliment, and its quickening breath sustains its flame. Hearing, I say; but not in any narrow sense. Hearing, but not by any means mere hearing. In Scripture language, hearing implies obedience. It is hearing, not of the mind only, but of the heart; not of the speculative reason or curious fancy, but of the loyal loving will. The true worshipper hears that he may believe, hears that he may follow, hears that he may obey. He listens to God's words that he may make them his own, and makes them the very life of his life by carrying them into action and by turning them into prayer. "My sheep hear my voice, and I know them, and they follow me." "As the eye of a servant looketh unto the hand of his master"—looketh! for what end? surely that he may catch by every slightest sign or token his master's will, and promptly follow it. In this spirit, let us go to the house of God, and wait upon every means of grace which He hath appointed for bringing us nearer to Him. Let our language be the language, not of our lips only, but of our hearts; their feeble, broken utterance, it may be, finding vent rather in sighs and unuttered groanings than in any articulate words, but still the utterance of our very hearts. "Speak, Lord, and open mine ears to hear thy voice. Show me thy ways, make me willing in the day of thy power; not only to know, but to do thy will; not only to hear, but to love, to obey, to trust, to follow." Then, "not being forgetful hearers, but doers of the word, we shall be blessed in our deed."

KING DIVINE.

(FROM THE FRENCH OF ALEXANDRE VINET.)

KING divine!
 Song of mine—
 Can it reach Thy heaven and Thee?
 And wilt Thou
 Stoop so low
 That Thy love shall visit me?
 Deeps profound!
 Who shall sound,
 Without faith, their mystery?

Could my prayer,
 Father! dare,
 All so weak, to rise to Thee,
 But that Thou
 Deign'st to bow
 In Thy tender love to me?
 Love untold!
 Humbly bold—
 Faith adores the mystery.

From the deep
 Toward the steep,
 Toward my King's eternal throne,
 Mounts my prayer,—
 Waiting there,
 Waiting on His grace alone:
 Saviour dear!
 Bend Thine ear;
 Of my faith the tribute own.

Lord of all!
 Hear my call:
 For Thyself, Thyself, I cry.
 Art Thou near?
 Nought I fear:
 Art thou absent? then I die:

Helper mine,
 King divine,
 In me reign eternally!

H. DOWNTON.

MRS. MARY FLETCHER.*

MARY BOSANQUET, who afterwards became the wife of Fletcher of Madeley, was born in the autumn of 1739, at Leytonstone, in Essex. She at a very early age wished to become a Methodist, and when she had joined the Society, she devoted herself during a long life entirely to the advancement of Wesley's doctrines, and to the education and improvement of the poor children and women whom she received into her house. Her copious journals (which were published about twenty years after her death) give a most interesting account of her life and work, and from them the following sketch of her history has been taken.

When quite a child Mary Bosanquet began to ponder upon her spiritual condition. She says—

"When I was five years old I began to have much concern about my eternal welfare, and frequently inquired of those about me whether such and such things were sins. On Sabbath evenings my dear father used to instruct us in the Church Catechism. At those seasons I can remember asking many questions. I wished to know whether any one ever did love God with all their heart, and their neighbours as themselves; and whether it was really the command of God that we should do so; also, if the Bible really meant all it said. It seemed to me that if it did I was wrong, and all about me in danger; for there appeared to be a great difference between the description of a Christian given in the Word of God and those who walk under that name. As I was a backward child, and of weaker understanding than the others, I was not well read in the Scriptures at that very early age; but sentences out of the Word of God frequently occurred to my mind and made a deep impression, such as—'Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart.' I would answer, 'But I do not love God at all; I do not know how to love Him; and with respect to loving my neighbour thus, I am sure I do not; for though my sister is dearer to me than anybody else, I do not love her as well as myself.' Again, that word struck me much where St. Paul says, 'I have fought the good fight,' and when I was baptized the minister said I was to be 'Christ's faithful soldier and servant, and to fight manfully under his banner.' This amazed me greatly. I thought, I am sure I do not fight, neither do I know what to fight against. But, above all, that sentence would follow me, 'Narrow is the way which leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it,' and, 'If ye are not of the world, the world will hate you.' I did not feel it a narrow way, neither did the world hate me; therefore I questioned often whether I was not quite out of the way, yet it was not with any terror. I believed if the Lord saw that I was wrong He would make me right, and sometimes I prayed for it. At other times I was very careless."

About this time a Methodist maid-servant came into Mr. Bosanquet's household, and frequently conversed with his eldest daughter, who repeated all she heard to her little sister Mary. The child then thought that if she became a Methodist she should be sure of salvation, but after reading with her sister some of the servant's little books, she found that to belong to any sect was not enough, that the Methodists said she could be saved only by believing in Christ, and that that belief would make her holy. This the poor little girl could not understand, and as the maid went away there was no one to explain it to her. She says—

"My heart rose against the idea of being saved by a faith which I could not understand. One day, looking over the pictures in the 'Book of Martyrs,' I thought it would be easier to burn than to believe, and heartily did I wish that the Papists would come and burn me, and then I thought I should be quite safe. Yet these troubled thoughts were mixed with a degree of hope. I thought, 'God does love me, I believe, after all; and perhaps He will show me what it is to believe and be converted.' When I was between seven and eight years old, musing one day on that thought, 'What can it be to know my sins forgiven, and to have faith in Jesus?' I felt my heart rise against God for having appointed a way of salvation so hard to be understood, and with anguish of soul I said, 'If it were to die a martyr I could do it; or to give away all I have; or, when grown up, to become a servant, that would be easy; but I never shall know how to believe.'"

"I fell into an uncommon lowness, and weakness of nerves, which was accompanied with grievous temptations. I was oppressed beyond measure with the fear of sin, and accused in almost everything I said or did, so that I was altogether a heap of inconsistency. This was followed by temptations unspeakably afflicting. It was continually suggested to my mind that I had blasphemed against the Holy Ghost. The consequent effect of these temptations on my temper drew on me very grievous burdens, and exposed me to so much anger and reproach from my parents as made me weary of life. It appeared to them that I was obstinate and disobedient, and my flesh has seemed ready to move on my bones when I have heard my dear mother say, 'That girl is the most perverse creature that ever lived; I cannot think what is come to her.' My heart used to sink like a stone; for I knew not what to do, and the grief of my mind quite destroyed my health. . . . This heavy season lasted, I think, nine weeks, when one day opening my mind to my sister (as indeed I had often before attempted to do, but could not explain myself), she providentially used these words in her answer: 'Why, you do not mean to blaspheme, do you?' A light immediately struck into my mind; I weighed the thought over and over, and could truly say, 'Lord, thou knowest I do not mean to blaspheme.' I then recollected that I had heard something about temptation, and often wondered what it was. I thought, it may be Satan whispers this into my mind. . . . I determined never to regard it more, but always to answer with these words, 'I do not mean to blaspheme, I will acknowledge Christ for ever;' and in a few days I was perfectly delivered."

The unnatural and excited condition of mind into which Mary Bosanquet had fallen was a source of great anxiety and distress to her parents. They were most kind and lenient in their treatment of her, but they could not understand her religious opinions, nor could they overlook the insolent and disobedient spirit which, as she herself admits, she showed towards them. She had no one to advise her, for as she considered her parents to be irreligious, she would not consult them, and she continued to follow her own course with great obstinacy and without the least regard to the wishes or feelings of her family. A Mrs. Lefevre, with whom she made acquaintance in London, exercised for some time a healthy influence over her, and induced her to show some consideration to her parents; but in 1756 this lady died, and Mary, again left to herself, made her home almost unbearable. Her sister married, and she herself received an offer from a religious gentleman, whom her friends entreated her to accept. But she refused him, saying that her "present light was to abide single;" and, after many consultations, her parents decided that, though they were grieved to part with her, it would be better for the whole family if she lived by herself. Her income was ample, and lodgings were taken for her and her maid in a respectable family. Her parents seem invariably to have treated her with the greatest kindness and forbearance, and they now frequently visited her. She as often spent the day with them, and they were continually adding to the comforts of her home.

Mary had already formed a friendship with Mrs. Ryan, one of the earliest as she was one of the most earnest Methodists. They now agreed to live together, and continued to do so till Mrs. Ryan's death in 1768. At first they resided at Hoxton, but when Mary inherited a house at Leytonstone, they removed there. Mary was, in spite of her undutiful conduct, sincerely attached to her parents, and trusted that she "should not be called to offend them any further." But she and Mrs. Ryan had determined to receive the Methodist preachers, and she feared that her father would object to the plan. However, when she consulted him, he only replied with a smile, "If a mob should pull your house about your ears, I cannot hinder them." Mary rejoiced that he did not oppose her wishes, but she never seems to have felt the least gratitude for the generosity and forbearance which he showed towards her, and certainly she never reflected that her own conduct had not been so regulated as to raise his opinion of the Methodism which she professed.

Mary Bosanquet and Mrs. Ryan began at first by holding meetings in which they prayed, read a chapter, and spoke from it. They had soon twenty-five persons joined in Society, and applied to Mr. Wesley for a preacher. Their house was once or twice surrounded by a mob, but they were never really molested, and they soon wished to undertake more work. They decided on receiving little girls, whom they would clothe and train as servants, but they would take none but destitute orphans, in order that no one might interrupt their plan of education. At first they received six children, and attended to them themselves; but, finding that they had not time for this and their other work, they engaged a young woman to act as governess, and to wash and comb the orphans! Mary Bosanquet says that she "found great need of wisdom and patience," but her undertaking prospered, and she had soon thirty-five children and thirty-four grown-up persons in her house, though not all at the same time. Each had separate duties and employments, and in order to avoid conformity to the world, as well as needless attention to dress, the whole family was clothed alike in dark purple cotton. The following account of the daily arrangements of the house is given in Mary's diary:—

"The eldest of the children arose between four and five, and the youngest not much later. At half-an-hour after six we had family prayer. At seven we breakfasted together on herb tea, or milk porridge; the small children then went into the garden till eight. At eight the bell rang for school, which continued till twelve. Then after a few minutes spent in prayer, they came down to us, at which time we either walked out with them, or if the weather did not permit, we found them some employment in the house, endeavouring at the same time to give them both instruction and recreation. We invented various employment for those hours in order to remove the appearance of idleness, as from the first we endeavoured to impress that lesson on their minds, 'An idle person is the devil's cushion, on which he rolls at pleasure.' Likewise, that in the choice of their employments they should always prefer those that were most useful, and be always able to render a reason for everything they did. At one we dined; about two the bell rang again for school, and at five they returned to us, and were employed as before till supper-time. Then, after family prayer, they were washed and put to bed by eight. Four or five of the bigger girls were each week kept out of the school by turns, and employed in house work, cooking, &c., that they might be accustomed to every sort of business; and there was work enough in so large a family. Several of the children were very young, though I do not remember we had any under two years of age, except one of about a month old, which was laid, very neatly dressed, late one night at our door, but it only lived a fortnight."

In spite of the want of recreation (which surely ought to have been more considered in the education of these little creatures), and in spite of a somewhat stern doctrine both as regarded religion and morals, this first Home for Orphans prospered, and repaid Mary Bosanquet by its success for the trouble and anxiety which it caused her. The children of course contributed nothing to its support, neither do the women (whom she received as sisters) appear to have given any further aid than occasional assistance in household work; the expense, therefore, was entirely borne by herself, and she at times seems to have been much alarmed by the prophecies of her friends, that she and all her household would come on the parish. But her income, as has already been said, was large, and she occasionally received presents of money from her family. Her father, during his last illness, spoke to her with the utmost kindness, and regretted that he had not left her better off. He offered to alter his will, but she refused this, and afterwards found that the sum left to her was more considerable than she had expected it to be. She set up a box in the hall of her house, into which any contributions towards maintenance of her Home might be dropped, and she often found it well filled. So that, with the advice of Mrs. Ryan (who seems to have been a good woman of business), Mary's money matters were tolerably well managed, and she had no lack of means to carry on her work.

It is at this time that, in an account of a dangerous illness of Mrs. Ryan's, Mary Bosanquet first speaks of Mr. Fletcher. She does not say where she had met him, nor does she describe the progress of their acquaintance. She merely observes that she remarked to Mrs. Ryan that it was sometimes presented to her mind that she should be called to marry Mr. Fletcher. Mrs. Ryan quite approved, but the subject does not appear to have been again discussed between them. Mr. Fletcher, in a letter to Charles Wesley, said that "Miss Bosanquet's image had pursued him warmly for some hours," and that he had "considered matrimony with a different eye" since he had known her, but he resolved not to think of her, as he did not wish to marry a woman with so large a fortune of her own. He gave as his reason Juvenal's proverb, Veniunt a dote sagitte, "The arrows come from the portion."

In 1768 Mary Bosanquet made up her mind to leave Leytonstone, and to take a farm in Yorkshire. Her present house was too small for her very large family, and she found great inconvenience from having no land in her own hands. Her friends assured her that in the north of England her income would go as far again, and she was strongly urged to remove by several of her most trusted advisers. A Methodist, named Richard Taylor, who had, as he said, been driven by misfortune from his home in Yorkshire, came to London in the hope of settling with his creditors, and two of Mr. Wesley's preachers recommended Mary to invite him to her house at Leytonstone. She did so, and after a time he persuaded her to go with Mrs. Ryan and all her large household to Yorkshire, to stay with his wife's parents till a suitable farm could be bought. Mrs. Ryan only survived the journey two months, and her death was in all ways a very great loss to Mary Bosanquet. She now relied entirely on the advice of Richard Taylor, whom she believed to be as disinterested and honourable as herself, and found that the want of judgment and neglect of even common prudence, which had brought his own affairs into so lamentable a condition, rendered him the worst of counsellors with regard to hers. He was perhaps not otherwise than honest, but his careless management of her property led her into great difficulties, and though she supported and believed in him throughout, she allows herself to observe that he was not to be trusted in worldly matters. He induced her to buy a large farm near Guildersome, in the West Riding, and to build a house on it for her family, besides the farm-house which already existed. On this estate were malt-kilns, which Mary was assured would be most profitable, and would repay her for the very heavy expense of stocking so large a farm, and of building her house. The first year the kilns did answer, and she cleared £50 by them, but this was not nearly enough, and she spent £300 in settling Taylor's affairs with his creditors. Her meetings, however, were well attended, for as many as fifty persons came to her every Wednesday evening. She founded a number of smaller meetings, and had the satisfaction of seeing them prosper.

But in spite of this pleasure Mary's affairs fell into such disorder under Taylor's management, that she was filled with anxiety. He undertook too much, employed too many men, and gave credit so easily that numbers of debts were owing to him. The malt-kilns cost far more than had been expected, the farm did not pay, and Mary had to incur great expenses in the entertainment of the number of persons who came to stay with her for her meetings. She was in the utmost perplexity when a gentleman, who was said to be "the only man of business in the country," offered her his advice, and then begged her to marry him. This proposal she refused, because she "could not see in him the man her highest reason chose to obey," but he entreated her to allow him to continue to advise her, and added, "You cannot do without me. You will be ruined. God has made me your helper, and if you cannot see or feel as I do, we will be only common friends. I will say no more on the subject so disagreeable to you." This generous man continued for years to give Mary Bosanquet his best advice and assistance. She would not consent to part with Taylor, chiefly from pity for his wife and children, but she was persuaded to give the farm and kilns up to him, and to receive £60 a year from him, hoping that, as her agent, he would make it answer better, and at least spare her expense. For three years all went on pretty well, but at the end of that time Taylor was found to be £600 in debt, and this large sum had to be paid by his unfortunate mistress. The gentleman before mentioned once more begged Mary to accept him, but she again refused, and he, with some difficulty, induced her to borrow from him the £600, as she could in no way raise it herself. She also took all her affairs out of Taylor's hands, and as she could not sell the farm, she determined to manage it herself, taking her kind friend as partner, though she would not accept him as her husband. Her behaviour to this man appears rather heartless, but it must be recollected that he urged his friendship upon her, and was anxious to advise and assist her. Her relatives and friends blamed her, for her marriage would have relieved them from the continual anxiety which they felt on her behalf. One of them spoke plainly to her, and expressed the feelings of the rest, when he said, "I cannot approve of your proceedings; I fear you fight against Providence. Here are several doors open before you. If you object to Mr. —, why do you not accept some other of those good men whom the Lord seems to have cast in your way? You stand stiffly in the choice of a single life. . . . The end will be ruin. You will be brought to a prison, and all the reproach will be cast on religion."

But Mary remained firm. Perhaps a reason for this persistence may be gathered from the constant allusion in her diary to Mr. Fletcher's "Checks to Antinomianism." She had not seen or heard from him for fifteen years, when, in the midst of her distress, a friend said to her, "Do you know that Mr. Fletcher, of Madeley, is dying? Indeed I know not but he is already dead. If he holds out a little longer, he is to go abroad, but it is a pity, for he will die by the way, being in the last stage of a consumption." Mary says that she received this news with the utmost calmness, but she adds, "As I was one day in prayer, offering him up to the Lord, these words passed through my mind, 'The prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up.' But I said, 'Lord, I dare not ask it; I leave it to thy sacred will. Thy will be done.'"

She threw herself with greater earnestness into her work, frequently preaching in the neighbourhood of Cross Hall, her farm. She consulted Wesley as to the propriety of her preaching, but though he never sanctioned a regular female ministry, he considered that she had an extraordinary call to the work; and as she never interfered in the government of the Methodist Society, or (in the words of her biographer) "usurped authority over the man," he encouraged her to continue. But, notwithstanding the gift of eloquence which she evidently possessed, Mary never overcame the great reluctance which she felt towards speaking in public. She frequently mentions this in her journal:—

"May 28, 1775.—This day I set apart for prayer, to inquire of the Lord why I am so held in bondage about speaking in public. It cannot be expressed what I suffer; it is known only to God what trials I go through in that respect. Lord, give me more humility, and then I shall not care for anything but Thee. There are a variety of reasons why it is such a cross. The other day one told me he was sure I must be an impudent woman; no modest woman, he was sure, could proceed thus. Ah! how glad would nature be to find out Thou, Lord, dost not require it. Then Mr. William Brand observed to-day, 'The reason why your witness is not more clear is, because you do not glorify God by believing and more freely declaring what He hath done for your soul.'"

"Sept. 10, Sunday.—I rose this morning with a sore weight on my mind. It was given out for me to be at D—. There was much wind and rain, and the roads were very bad. I feared the journey. I feared also I should have nothing to say when I came there. I feared all manner of things. Those words, however, came to my mind, 'Take no thought what ye shall say.' I then felt myself led to consider those words, 'Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand.' I found some liberty in speaking from them, and the people were affected. As I was riding back I clearly saw I was called to stand still, to live the present moment, and always to praise the Lord that his will was done though I might have much to suffer. I had a clear conviction God brought me to Yorkshire, and that I had a message to this people, and that notwithstanding the darkness which hung over my situation I was at present where God would have me. Well then, answered my heart, if I am but in his will I am safe; for where the Lord leaves me, there He will be my light.'

"Aug. 30, 1776.—Yesterday it was given out for me to be at —. For a whole month it lay on my mind. None, O my God, but thyself knows what I go through for every public meeting; I am often quite ill with the prospect."

Almost the first place at which Mary Bosanquet preached was on the side of a coal-pit. She says, "Here I saw a little of what the Methodist preachers see much, viz., deep poverty, dirt, and cold; but the Lord gave me freedom of speech, and some seemed to have an ear to hear. Lord, let me not be a delicate disciple!" Once, when she was at Harrogate, drinking the waters there, the "ungodly company" who filled the principal inn requested her to preach to them in the ball-room. She remarks:—

"This was a trial indeed. It appeared to me I should seem in their eyes as a bad woman, or a stage player, and I feared they only sought an opportunity to behave rudely. Yet I considered, I shall see these people no more till I see them at the judgment seat of Christ, and then it shall be said to me, 'You might that day have warned us, but you would not.' So I answered them immediately, that I would wait on them at the time appointed. They behaved very well, and the presence of the Lord was with us. The following Sunday they made the same request, and much more company came in."

Her account of her preaching at Huddersfield must be given at full length:—

"Sept. 17, Tuesday, 1776.—Glory be to Thee, my faithful Lord. Oh that I could always trust! then I should always praise! Last Sabbath morning I went, according to appointment, to Goker. I arose early, and in pretty good health. The day was fine, though rather hot. About eleven we came to Huddersfield, and called on Mrs. H—. She had asked me to lodge there on my return and have a meeting, saying many had long desired it, and there would be no preacher there on that day. I felt immediately the people laid on my mind, and that I had a message to that place, and said, 'If the Lord permit, I will.' She then said, 'We will give it out at noon.' We rode forward, and Benjamin Cock met us and kindly conducted us over the moors. When we came to his hut all was clean, and victuals enough provided for twenty men. But I was so heated with the ride (near twenty miles) and with the great fire on which they so liberally cooked for us that I could not eat. My drinking nothing but water seemed also quite to distress them. They said the meeting had been given out in many places, and they believed we should have between two and three thousand people. That I did not believe, but there was indeed such a number, and of such a rabble as I scarce ever saw. At one we went out to the rocks, a place so wild that I cannot describe it. The crowd which got round us was so great that by striving which should get first to the quarry, (where we were to meet,) they rolled great stones among the people below us, so that we feared mischief would be done. Blessed be God, none were hurt. I passed on among them, on the top of the hill, not knowing whither I went. Twice I was pushed down by the crowd, but rose without being trampled on. We stopped on the edge of a spacious quarry filled with people, who were tolerably quiet. I gave out that hymn, 'The Lord my pasture shall prepare.' When they were a little settled, I found some liberty in speaking to them, and I believe most heard."

After Mary had finished preaching numbers followed her to the hut, and she was quite exhausted by speaking to them till the time came for her long ride back to Huddersfield. On the way Richard Taylor begged her not to stop in the town, as he had heard there were persons there who objected to female preachers, and he feared she might meet with something disagreeable. But she recollected the hymn she had given out in the quarry, and determined to do as she had been asked, though if the friends who had invited her should think it better for her to go on without preaching, she was ready to do so. She was, however, again urged to hold a meeting, and not to disappoint the people, and she went into the house which had been prepared for the purpose. But the room was so crowded, and the heat so great, that it was impossible for her to speak. She continues: "We came out. My head swam with the heat; I scarce knew which way I went, but seemed carried along by the people till we stopped at a horse-block, placed against a wall on the side of the street, with a plain wide opening before it. On the steps of this I stood, and gave out the hymn, 'Come ye sinners, poor and needy.'" She preached at considerable length, and observes: "Deep solemnity sat on every face. I think there was scarce a cough to be heard, or the least motion, though the number gathered was very great. So solemn a time I have seldom known; my voice was clear enough to reach them all, and when we concluded I felt stronger than when we began." But a few days later she writes:—

"I have been more abundantly led to reflect on the difficulties of the path I am called in. I know the power of God which I felt when standing on the horse-block in the street at Huddersfield; but at the same time I am conscious how ridiculous I must appear in the eyes of many for so doing. Therefore, if some persons consider me as an impudent woman, and represent me as such, I cannot blame them. Again, many say, 'If you are called to preach, why do you not do it constantly, and take a round as a preacher?' I answer, Because that is not my call. I have many duties to attend to, and many cares which they know nothing about. . . . Again, they say, 'Why do you not give out I am to preach?'

Why call it a meeting?' I answer, Because that suits my design best. First, it is less ostentatious; secondly, it leaves me at liberty to speak more or less as I feel myself led; thirdly, it gives less offence to those that watch for it. Others object, 'Why, yours is a Quaker call; why then do you not join them at once? You are an offence to us. Go to the people whose call is the same as your own; here nobody can bear with you.' I answer, Though I believe the Quakers have still a good deal of God among them, yet I think the Spirit of the Lord is more at work among the Methodists, and while I see this, though they were to toss me about as a football I would stick to them like a leech. Besides, I do nothing but what Mr. Wesley approves. . . ."

Besides these annoyances, Mary Bosanquet was much troubled about her farm. She wished to sell it, nobody would buy it, and she seemed to find fresh difficulties and expenses on all sides. Mr. — again repeated his offer, and she thought it better to go away for six months to Bath, hoping that matters might mend. She writes, "I shall be glad to be at a distance from poor Mr. —. Oh, how sad it is! I fear while he helps me I hurt him. Lord, what a situation is mine!" She found her sister at Bath, and she so far helped her as to undertake the expense of Taylor and his numerous family. But on Mary's return things seemed worse than ever. She says she returned "with that kind of sensation which a scourged child would have in returning to the rod," and she found that, in spite of the efforts of Mr. —, the farm did not pay. She knew not what to do, and thus describes her perplexity as to one course which was open to her:—

"In the midst of my trials it is sometimes presented to my mind, perhaps the Lord will draw me out of all this by marriage. Opportunities of this kind occur frequently; but no sooner do I hear the offer but a clear light seems to shine on my mind, as with this voice: 'You will neither be holier nor happier with this man.' But I find Mr. Fletcher sometimes brought before me, and the same conviction does not intervene. Yet I fear lest it should be a trick of Satan to hurt my mind. I know not even that we shall see each other on this side eternity. . . . Well, this I resolve on, and strive against the thought, never to do the least thing towards a renewal of the correspondence."

In 1781 Mr. — said that he was at a loss what to do for Mary Bosanquet. Her affairs seemed more involved than ever. He added, "You are ruined, madam. You withstand the order of God. My fortune is enough for you and me. But you cannot see in my light. May the Lord stand by you! but I cannot think of a partnership any more, the blame would fall on me." Poor Mary turned again to the thought of Mr. Fletcher, knowing that now he was much better, but an intimate, though mistaken, friend assured her that he intended to live abroad, and to see England no more. "Thus," she adds, "was I cut off from the prospect of any human help, but I kept to my old word, 'My soul, wait thou on God, from Him cometh my salvation.'" Mr. — further added to her distress by saying that the farm was so much impoverished he was sure that she would not get more than £600 by the sale of the whole place. She was almost in despair, and wrote in her diary that all was dark before her; she could see no light. But, quite unexpectedly, on the 8th of June, 1781, Mary received a letter from Mr. Fletcher, in which he said "that he had for twenty-five years formed a regard for her, which was still as sincere as ever; and though it might appear odd that he should write on such a subject when but just returned from abroad, and more so without seeing her first, he could only say that his mind was so strongly drawn to do it he believed it to be the order of Providence."

Mary Bosanquet does not tell us what answer she made, but she says: "We corresponded with openness and freedom till August 1, when he came to Cross Hall, and abode there a month; preaching in different places with much power;—and having opened our whole hearts to each other, both on temporals and spirituals, we believed it to be the order of God we should become one, when He should make our way plain." After several weeks of anxiety Mary's farm was sold for £1,620 (far more than she had expected), and she was enabled to provide in different ways for the numerous members of her family. She goes on: "So on Monday, Nov. 12, 1781, in Batley Church, we covenanted in the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, to bear each other's burdens, and to become one for ever." Early in the following January, Mr. and Mrs. Fletcher went to Madeley, and began their happy life together there—which was only to last for four years. Mary's diary becomes less copious, but in every entry she mentions her perfect happiness with her husband. "He is," she says, "in every sense of the word, the man my highest reason chooses to obey. . . . His constant endeavour is to make me happy. . . . What a helpmate he is to me! . . . What a tender, kind friend, hath he proved himself in every circumstance of each situation!"

In July, 1785, a sort of typhus fever broke out in Madeley, and Mrs. Fletcher was one of the first attacked. She was for some days in the greatest danger, and almost as soon as she recovered Mr. Fletcher was seized with what proved to be his last illness. She gives a most touching account of his death, dwelling, in all her grief, upon one of his last sayings to her, "Polly, let us not fear, God is love. What canst thou fear, my dearest, when God is love?" It had been his conviction that she would not survive her attack of fever, and after he had spoken for her at a meeting, he said to her, "My dear, I could scarcely speak to the people. I felt I know not how, as if thy empty chair stood by me. Something seemed to say we should soon be parted, and I thought, Must I meet these people, and see my Polly's empty chair always by me?" "But," adds poor Mrs. Fletcher, "now that cup was mine. I am truly a desolate woman, who hath no helper but Thee."

She was much perplexed as to what she ought to do. Mr. Fletcher had expressed a wish that she should remain at Madeley, but there were difficulties about her doing so. She says:—

"I thought on two places the most likely, and had some desire to draw a lot concerning them. I had the paper in my hand in order so to do, when the remembrance of my dearest love was presented strongly to my mind, as speaking again those words, 'Polly, do not let us look for signs; let us leave ourselves in the hand of God.' I felt an immediate light of faith, and throwing the paper out of my hand, I took up the Bible, intending to read, and for the present to drop every other thought. It opened on those words, 'God shall choose our inheritance for us.' All my spirit acquiesced, and I answered, 'Yea, Lord, thou hast chosen for my dear the bright mansions above, and thou wilt choose for me all my wanderings below.'

Mr. Kenerson, the son of the patron of the living, became vicar of Madeley, but he did not reside, and Mrs. Fletcher was allowed to recommend as curate Mr. Melville Home, whom Mr. Fletcher had wished for as his successor. She continued to rent the house in which her happy married life had been passed, and remained there till her death. Her life was most quiet and uneventful; she passed her time in caring for the poor, and in holding meetings—always bearing in mind one of Mr. Fletcher's sayings to her, (made in reference to her view of the importance of a happy death,) "Let us get holy lives, and we will leave the rest to God." She died, after a short illness, December 9, 1815, aged seventy-six, having survived her husband thirty years.

JESUS HERE.

SAD voices far and wide have said,
"The letter of the Word is dead,"
And wistful travellers through the gloom
Seem but to see the yawning tomb:
When dawn is chill, and evening drear,
What would we give for Jesus near!

The earth is white with wintry snow,
And death hath laid our dear ones low;
Feel as we may, and yearn how much,
We miss the tender voice and touch:
Our hearts sink down with dismal fear,
What would we give for Jesus near!

'Tis then we seek with fond accord
Their presence who have known the Lord!
Whose eyes by faith have surely seen Luminous tracks where He hath been:
As once when angels brought good cheer,
Even to us is Jesus near!

His footsteps are not far to seek;
Where Patience turns the unsmitten cheek;
Where Conscience thrills beneath the rod,
Owning the judgment sent of God;
Where perfect Love absolveth Fear,
What can it be but Jesus near!

He hallows love, He softens grief,
He brings the aching thought relief.
He stills to peace the stormiest lot;
What were a world where He were not!
The waves subside, the heavens grow clear;—
Could it be else with Jesus near!

What word so coins the Saviour's thought
As image He in us hath wrought!
What Church can fold or preach His name,
Better than souls He sets aflame!
The seeking eye, the listening ear,
Know at a touch is Jesus here.

So, Lord, at last, when one by one,
The minutes, hours, and days are done,
And all that we could do for Thee
Is garnered in Thy treasury,
The old fond call we fain would hear,
To Jesus there, from Jesus here.

CROOKED PLACES:

A Story of Struggles and Hopes.

BY EDWARD GARRETT, AUTHOR OF "OCCUPATIONS OF A RETIRED LIFE," ETC.

PART III.—MILLICENT'S ROMANCE, AND WHAT IT WAS MADE OF.

CHAPTER X.—EUREKA!

FERGUS LAURIE was already established as a domestic friend at Mrs. Harvey's hearth.

He seemed everybody's visitor as much as Milly's, and yet he would have been nobody's visitor but for her, for he was no special favourite with any one else there. But all the Harveys had a genuine tolerant respect for each other, and for each other's tastes and wishes, and once they found there was a substantial friendship between Fergus and Milly, they refrained from little criticisms, and opened their eyes fully to all that was really likeable in Mr. Laurie. And they each found something. Even Miss Brook and Mrs. Webber were obliged to own that he was remarkably industrious, energetic, and quick. George could fully appreciate his enlargement of mind and aim. Christian acknowledged his wonderful will-force, saying that "it was half the material for the finest character." And yet her feeling towards him was curiously touched with a pity, which she never seemed to bestow on him whom most of the others called "poor David Maxwell." Milly was not affronted when she noticed this,—there was a mysterious dash of pity in her own admiration,—as indeed there is in most feminine admiration, where the hero is mentally summed up as so much courage, so much fortitude, so much wisdom, and such a broken leg! Only Milly felt that Christian's pity was not a component part of any admiration, but stood quite alone.

It can easily be understood that the new firm had a hard battle to fight. Not with anything but its own circumstances. Fergus's old masters were quite kindly disposed, and actually bestowed two or three signal favours on the early days of "Laurie and Co." David was delighted, hailing these, not only as practical benefits, but as proofs that Fergus's ideal of mutual help and honour was already not unknown in business matters. But Fergus was not so pleased as might have been expected. He acknowledged these favours with cool reserve, putting down David's eager gratitude with a quiet remark that he knew what these people were, and what their kindness was worth. When one of these kindnesses was shown, when the firm was sticking in a transitory difficulty, he hinted it was done because the old firm considered it no rival at all, but a mere helpless protégé, who might safely be petted and patronised, but that they would soon see differently! When another was bestowed just after a brilliant little success, Fergus said triumphantly that everybody was the friend of those who could befriend themselves. His friend's cynicism a little disappointed David. But Fergus declared that it was not because he thought evil of human nature, he only knew it,—that was all,—and he liked it too, though he despised it, and it could be made very useful in its own way.

Still, as months and months passed on, the new business did not make way. It scarcely paid its current expenses, setting some of them—David's remuneration for instance—very low indeed.

David worked hard among his chemicals, striving after certain results which were the desiderata of the trade. Nobody knew much about that, because he was always at it, and never had to make it his excuse for declining or curtailing visits, because he never paid any, except to George and Christian, and somehow he had fallen into the habit of spending Sunday afternoon and evening with them, and accompanying them to church. That began when Christian's baby came, and George for a while was without a companion. But everybody heard a great deal of the midnight oil which Fergus consumed over his ledgers and correspondence, because after he had spent an evening hour or two chatting with Mrs. Harvey and Milly, he would tell them that he had oceans of work to get through before he could go to bed. And as Milly combed out her tresses in her secret chamber, she would think of him bending over his dreary ciphers, and would smile with a happy womanly pride to think that he had doubtless felt he could go back to his toil refreshed after a little talk with—her! She could quite understand it, and she wondered how Miss Brook could not do the same, but was so unfeeling as to say—

"He'd better work while there's daylight, and save his candles."

Still in spite of the immense amount of work that was really put into the young business, it did not prosper. Debts which should be paid immediately began to be delayed. David grew frightened, Fergus smiled serenely.

"It is always so," he said, "a great deal must be sunk out of sight before anything appears."

"But if there is not much to sink?" David suggested, and got no answer, except a dark cloud on his friend's face.

On a certain morning, Fergus averted paying a debt of six pounds—a small affair, truly, but due to a man who was somewhat pressing, and even menacing. The account was not rightly due, according to its terms of credit, till a week later, and Fergus curtly declined paying it till that date, saying that unless things were kept in their regular order, his books would get hopelessly confused. David acknowledged that the principle was right enough, but knew in this particular instance that it was the cash-box rather than the ledger which would be inconvenienced. In the afternoon, Fergus sent this very creditor an urgent order for another article from his workshop.

"We have done without this implement till this time," David said; "don't you think we might do without it a little longer, and pay his bill before we increase it?"

"No," said Fergus shortly. "He will trust us the more, the better customers we make ourselves, because he will not want to offend us. And we are no cheats. We mean to pay everything."

"Of course, we mean so. But can we do it?" David asked, rather timidly. The cash in the affair being chiefly his own, he felt as if any shame that there was not more of it was his too!

"I should rather think so," Fergus answered drily. "You can scarcely have made this scheme worth less than it was when you came into it! It was worth your sinking your money in it then. It will surely be worth other people sinking more money in it now. I knew from the first that we could not really succeed without more capital. But it is easier to borrow for a tangible affair, with a local habitation and a name, than for a mere airy castle, as this was when I came to you. Why, at the very worst, we can but arrange to give our creditors an interest in our business corresponding to their claims. But we shall have a fine sale next week."

David said nothing more, but returned quietly to his chemicals. He spent twelve hours a day in his laboratory, and he wondered what else he could possibly do to help or spare the cash-box, whose "Debtor" and "Creditor" compartments were now alike empty. He remembered that he had an old schoolmate, who had succeeded to his father's business of law-stationer. So next day David nibbled his luncheon sandwiches as he walked from Bow to Chancery Lane, and there presented himself to his old acquaintance, and asked if he had any copying to give out. Law copying was very plentiful in those un-lithographic days, and the friend had some—yes, as much as David liked. David could not take more than he could do in six hours a day, he had no more time to spare. The experienced friend computed that sixty folios was a good allotment for that time, and entrusted him with an enormous abstract which would occupy him six hours for six days. As David left him, the good-natured tradesman privately reflected—

"Maxwell can't be doing much good for himself to want this kind of work, at his age, and with his capabilities. Surely he must be either shiftless or thriftless."

But David himself went back to Bow, rejoicing that he should be able to keep his own and Phoebe's immediate necessities supplied without himself becoming a troublesome creditor to his own needy firm. He must just work eighteen hours for a little while; it would not be for long, he thought cheerily. He had a humble-minded confidence in Fergus's talents, which was at least its own reward, since it gave him a bright belief in his sanguine prophecies. And besides, David had a private hope of his own, which he never mentioned to Fergus, lest delay or possible failure in its consummation should give more pain than the prospect could give pleasure. This was something which had been David's chemical aim and ambition even before he had left the Blenheim House surgery; in fact, ever since Fergus had accidentally enlightened him as to the extravagant cost at which a certain very imperfect result in colour was obtained. David felt quite certain that a much better effect was to be had at a much lower rate, and had been diligently experimenting for this purpose. Over and over again he seemed almost to have solved the problem, and over and over again something—a very small something it seemed to him—had baffled him. David's utter humility gave him courage and patience. He thought that "accident" had put him on the right track, and that if only other people had happened to get there, they would have smoothed away all difficulties and got straight to the end directly; but that his "stupidity" must be content to take double the time and trouble that any one else would require to use. "If one is rather dunder-headed, the least one can do is to try the more," was his only reflection. At the same time, he had the prudence to remember that it was impossible to keep temper and judgment for such work for more than twelve hours a day, and that the mind would be all the clearer if free from fears of debt. His copying might tire him a little; but not so much as the wonder where next week's housekeeping was to come from.

Phœbe looked glum when he spread out his pen, ink, and paper.

"I should think you needn't be such a slave in that 'boratory, sir, if it isn't worth enough without other work," she said.

"If you were in the laboratory all day, Phœbe," David answered playfully, "you would be like me, very glad of a change of occupation. This washes my mind. Minds want washing as well as bodies, I can tell you, and if they don't get it, one's thoughts are as dim as writing on a smeared slate."

Phœbe grunted. "I can't be up to you, sir," she said; "but yet I know you are gammoning me somehow. If it ain't beneath the likes o' you to do this here, it ain't beneath the likes o' me to get a half day's washing or charing, an' I'm sure I've more time to spare. And besides, sir, you'll excuse me a-speaking; for I know I've no right, being your servant, anyways; but you'll not be able to go on without your natural rest."

"I'm always in bed for nearly six hours," said David, "and don't you know the old saying, 'Six hours for a man, seven for a woman, and eight for a fool?'"

"Ah well," Phœbe retorted, "there's no knowing how many hours he slept that said that; or if not, I'll go bail he lived to grow wiser. I don't hold with slug-a-beds. Down at ten and up at six has always been my way whenever I could; but down at twelve and up at six won't do for any folks that ain't made o' bell-ropes and wash-leather; an' you ain't, Mr. David. You're not that strong. You've got a go in you, sir. You're like them animals that win races and drop dead at the end. You'll not be able to keep on at this rate."

"I don't wish it, Phœbe," said David seriously. "I hope and believe everything will soon be quite different." And then he added in her own pithy style, "If you put your shoulder to the wheel when the cart is in a rut, the cart will carry you to your journey's end."

And so he had the last word.

But at last, one day, when things were looking very dark, so dark that Fergus Laurie sat glumly over his ledgers, and said that nothing prospered in this world but iniquity and money-grubbing, David ventured to whisper that he thought they must really take heart and struggle on a little longer, for he fancied he was on the eve of a great discovery. But Fergus was altogether out of sorts. In fact, his private cash-book was actually claiming more money than his trade creditor column could supply. For of late his sensitive pride had been conscious that people were beginning to wonder how he was getting on, and he had even felt it like an insult when some of his friendlier customers had been particularly prompt in their payments. And he had tried to cast off the suspicion of struggle and poverty by directing Robina to be liberal in her housekeeping, and giving her leave to go again to the draper's, not with money in her hand, but to "open an account." There was still no considerable hesitancy on Robina's part. "He must know best about his own affairs," she decided within herself. "She had nothing to do but to obey; that was her place,"—a dictum whose force she never felt when it had reference to her geniality or hospitality, or in fact to anything, except spending money on herself! This sense of private involvement superadded to outraged pride, acted on Fergus Laurie absolutely like a nervous disorder, when the patient will not attempt any ordinary method of cure, but will place faith in any preposterous quackery. It would have been really easier for him to imagine that relief might come to them wildly—from an unexpected legacy, or even the discovery of a treasure buried in the counting-house, than to hope for it in the success of David's persevering experiments.

"I think I shall have it to-night," David said eagerly, "for I am sure I should have had it last night, but for a slip in the last combination."

"Ah, that's the way it'll always be," Fergus answered bitterly. "It's the way it always has been since the old alchemists sought for gold."

"This will be as good as gold when we have it," said David, choosing to take up the words without their despairing meaning.

"Ah, if it was to be done, others would have done it long before," Fergus returned, shaking his head. "What do you say—get the effect twice as beautiful at one-third the cost? You need not think that it has not been often tried before by better chemists than you, with far finer laboratories. It is a discovery which would be a fortune. But I don't suppose it is to be made, or it would have been made already. It is just a sheer waste of ingredients, David, and we need every penny that we have—and a great many more—to even keep up the merest show of going on."

"Well, I'm just going to try to-night. And to show you how sure I feel, I shall ask you to wait here an hour or two. I believe you will hear some good news the sooner. Will you grudge waiting?"

"I should, if I hadn't plenty of work to employ me. As it is, I may as well write my letters here as at home."

This was all the answer David got. Fergus's want of faith in his success would have shaken his courage had it not been founded in the deepest humility.

"It is no wonder that he can't expect me to do such a thing as this where others have failed. Well, it will save him from disappointment if I do fail after all. And if so, I must do a little more copying, and put aside something towards the chemicals I have wasted."

Such was the content and quiet spirit which David carried to his labour. But there was something to be done before he set to work. Perhaps it was this something which the other experimenters had omitted.

He knelt down and prayed. "O Father, I am all ignorance, but thou art knowledge. Teach me, Father; I am seeking my daily bread, and if this is the way where-in I am to find it, help me. For Christ's sake. Amen."

He rose up. His spirit had been to God, and had spoken to Him. Do those who say that prayer is nothing, say also that it is nothing to speak even with a wise and good man? Many a man goes to beg, and his boon of pence is denied him if it be not good for him; but such counsel and encouragement is given him, that he goes out strong to earn for himself, and perhaps comes back to thank his benefactor, saying, "When you refused the paltry gift, you made my fortune; for you gave me a share of your free spirit instead." Oh, while friend speaks with friend, while ignorance takes counsel of wisdom, and sorrow of sympathy, let no man say, that it is no good to speak with God! If the Lord himself cannot hear and respond, it were best for us all to walk silent through a heartless universe.

An hour passed. Fergus sat scribbling his letters, absolutely forgetful why he was waiting there. Another hour passed; and then a quick step rattled half way down the laboratory stairs, and David's voice cried eagerly—

"It is done, Fergus. We have succeeded!"

In less than a minute the two young men stood together bending over the perfected discovery, comparing the soft, lovely new tint with the old, dim, thickish hue which had hitherto been the nearest approach to it.

"What a difference!" said Fergus; "and do you mean to say this will also be cheaper?"

"For every shilling which that old horror cost, this loveliness will cost but fourpence," David answered triumphantly. "God has given us a fortune in this secret, Fergus."

Half-an-hour later the two were pacing down the dark road, arm-in-arm, speaking in whispers like those of men who have a mutual knowledge of a hidden treasure.

"Plenty of work for Miss Harvey now!" said David, as they came in sight of the lamp-lit window of the Harveys' cottage. "This new discovery will come before the world first in her designs. Eh, how lovely it would have made some of those that have been carried out on the old principle!"

"Millicent Harvey has fancied we have not been very successful lately, I think," Fergus observed. "I believe her family mistrust us."

"Well, it is only likely they should be anxious," said David; "for you see we withdrew her from regular work for your old firm—got her to leave a certainty for a hope."

"A fine certainty, truly!" Fergus answered. "They will see now that it was well worth her doing so."

"I know the old firm did not appreciate her," David went on, "or they would not have restricted her to the most ordinary class of designs, as you say they did. Didn't I always say so? But what did Mr. Smith think when he found she was capable of those illustrations to the Leech Gatherer?"

"He never knew she did them," said Fergus. "He offered only five guineas in the first instance, and I afterwards got it raised to ten. But I should never have done that if I had not kept the artist a mystery. Why, most likely, if old Smith had known she was somebody who was drawing more than a hundred a year from the firm, he would have thought she ought to let him have those pictures for nothing, or next to it, as a kind of bonus."

"When will Miss Harvey have occasion to come over to our place again?" David asked.

"Not for a week," said Fergus.

"Then might it not be kind, considering all circumstances, if we just dropped her a hint that we have had a great success, something far better than a gift of a thousand pounds?" asked David.

"Well,—yes," said Fergus; "it seems only right. And it might be wise in many ways. But it is rather awkward for us two fellows to go rushing in there at this hour. I daresay they are at supper."

"You can go,—not stay a minute,—and I'll wait for you," said David, releasing Fergus's arm.

Fergus did truly stay only a moment. For Milly herself opened the door, and he just spoke to her there, under the clematis.

"Miss Harvey, I just call to tell you that we have made a great hit. We are certain to prosper now. Nobody knows yet, but you. You have a right to know. I shall never forget your confidence, and now, good night, Miss Millicent."

And Millicent turned back into the house and sang this thanksgiving in her heart.

"God, I thank thee that thou dost reward the diligent and the energetic—that thou puttest the power to bless into hands that will bless. Prosper my friend still, let him find that the cup of success thou givest him is not only full, but runneth over. And oh, I thank thee, O Lord, that thou makest this strong silent heart of his, which cannot confide everywhere, to find pleasure in confiding in me. Make me worthy of it, O God."

Ah, well it is for us that God is a loving Father, who takes our very prayers and thanksgivings rather for what we mean them to be than for what they are, just as parents smile on the trailing weeds that their ignorant little ones bring them for flowers!

Then Fergus rejoined David, and the two young men went on together to the cross roads, where they parted.

"Our fortune's made," Fergus Laurie announced to his mother and Robina. "We've hit on a discovery that I would not sell for five thousand pounds. You see what a good thing it is to have the faculty of selecting fit instruments. I chose David, and told him what it would be a fine thing to discover, and he has discovered it!"

"Couldn't you discover it yourself, without bringing any one else into it?" asked Mrs. Laurie, who wanted her share to be exactly all, and everybody else's nothing.

"It was not in my line," said Fergus curtly.

"But David could never have discovered it, if you had not told him of the want, Fergus," said Robina, "could he, now?"

"No," Fergus replied, more conciliatingly. "And now we must think what it will be right to do, under circumstances that are altering as ours are. We must take a larger house, and live in altogether different style. We shall have to keep two female servants, at least."

"I hope you'll mind what you are doing, Fergus," said his mother. "You might just make us comfortable in a small way, and let me always have a fire in my bedroom."

"Oh, he knows what he is about," observed Robina. "And other people know he does, too. Those Harveys would have had nothing to do with him, unless they were sure he would prosper."

"There isn't a truer-hearted woman in the world than Millicent Harvey," said Fergus, speaking stoutly from the depth of his better nature.

"When did you see her last?" asked his sister sharply.

"I—I just called in at their house to-night," answered poor Fergus.

"Oh yes, I see it all," said Robina, "I may have all the work of getting up your fine house, and then be turned out to make room for certain other people."

"Well, at any rate, you will have had a better living in the meantime than you could have got for yourself," replied Fergus coolly.

"Oh yes, I know that it is only by toleration that an inferior creature like me is allowed to occupy a place in the same world with Miss Millicent," sneered Robina.

"You ought to be ashamed of yourself," said her brother, thinking to himself that he must keep up his dignity, and yet conciliate her at the same time. It would be so awkward to quarrel just now. "I answer you according to your folly, but you are talking what you do not understand. What reason have you to think that Millicent Harvey or any other woman has any influence on me? As for your working in my interests, and then being turned off,—you are my sister, and you can surely trust my honour to give you provision befitting my position, and the duties you may fulfil towards me."

"I am sure I love you too well to be bitter about anything that would be good for you, Fergus," said Robina, with melting reproach.

"As soon as my income is at all settled," Fergus went on, "I will fix you a handsome salary as my housekeeper, and another sum for household expenses, and then if ever we want to part it would be with perfect satisfaction, and no sense of injury on either side."

"I'd rather trust you entirely, brother," said Robina. "I would rather just ask you for whatever was needed for the house, and just let you give me what you choose for myself. I can't bear anything to make us seem independent strangers, Fergus."

"Well, so be it then," said he, "I own I like living and working together in perfect confidence rather than on strict business footings."

And so their squabble ended, and Fergus went to bed, and pondered over the prices of drawing-room suites, while Robina and Mrs. Laurie lay awake half the night, discussing dresses, the old lady saying that she did not wish to go into any extravagance, but she thought she might have a new satin dress, and could not make up her mind whether its colour should be sage green or maroon; while Robina stated that she should not care for much better dresses than she had already, only she should like them always fresh, and at least as much spent on their making and trimming as on their material.

When David reached home, he found that the unconscious Phœbe had set up his candles as usual, and arranged his writing-table. He felt weary and excited, and little inclined for his self-imposed task of copying, but he put the disinclination aside with the reflection—

"What I've done so long already, I can surely do a little longer. Besides, I should like to finish the work I have undertaken. And there are plenty of claims coming in upon us, and nobody is the worse off for a little ready money. If I don't need it myself, I can give it away."

It was long past midnight ere he permitted himself to lay down his pen; and then in his evening prayer rose the meek thanksgiving—

"I thank thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, that some things which thou hidest from the wise and prudent thou revealest unto babes, choosing the foolish things of the world to confound the wise, and the weak things of the world to confound the things which are mighty, that no flesh should glory in thy presence. Even so, Father, for so it seemeth good in thy sight."

CHAPTER XI.—TWO HOMES AND ONE HERO.

It was presently clear to everybody that a great change had come to the young firm of "Laurie and Co." Samples of the beautiful new tint, fully displayed in one of Milly Harvey's most tasteful designs, were circulated among the trade, and orders came streaming in—only too fast to be executed. A neighbouring firm, old established and wealthy, actually made advances which might have easily been converted into overtures of partnership; and David was inclined to listen, and to think it would be wise to accept. But Fergus Laurie would not hear of it, declaring that they could now get the use of plenty of money on terms that would not hamper their freedom of action. And Fergus seemed right; for he was certainly able to obtain large loans on comparatively small interest.

David was quite ready to understand that as far as the perfect adjustment of money matters was concerned, sudden success had been almost as perilous as failure. Fergus was the head of the firm, with all its privileges and responsibilities. Definite adjustment of finances was found to be simply impossible. And so, in the meantime, it was merely arranged that Fergus was to take what was required for all the varying expenses necessarily falling on the head of the firm, while David was to be guaranteed a minimum allowance, with such additions as the profits of each year would permit.

David had no difficulty in settling into a proper style of life, because that seemed to him the proper one, which gave him and those connected with him the most genuine comfort with the least toil and expense, and was so safe within even his moderate minimum, that every addition would be left a wide, free margin for those true luxuries of life—the pleasures and duties not absolutely demanded by our circumstances.

He took a tiny house within a few paces of George Harvey's abode. Its miniature chambers were easily furnished by the cumbersome old articles which he had rescued from the sale at Blenheim House. Even Christian's large organ of veneration could scarcely understand how he held the wrecks of his so wretched past as precious salvage. Christian was his great stronghold in the days of his furnishing. David would come to her for advice, and then she and George would return with him to his cottage, and consult and plan "on the spot." She chose his parlour carpet and his bedroom curtains; she took counsel with Phœbe as to the best "range" to be put up in the kitchen; she knew of wonderful dainty ways which made beauty economical, and economy beautiful. Hatty Webber bade her send the sheeting and house linen round to her house, saying, that the Webbers' own "white sewing" was done up for years to come, and that the little stepdaughter Ellen needed something to learn needlework upon.

The two sisters-in-law had one day been making some helpful call upon the busy, important Phœbe, and while they were there David happened to come in, and took them out to the little back grass-plot, to consider whether there should be a tiny flower-bed in the centre, or only along the sides. David himself inclined to the former, and so did Christian and Hatty, too, "only," the latter remarked, "there was something in Millicent's idea, that it was a pity to have flowers where one could not gather them after a shower without crossing wet grass."

"Ah, so it is," said David; "we won't have one. And as for brightening my window view, I can easily put a flower-box on my sill instead."

Christian withheld her eyes from a glance, and so forgot to repress a sigh.

Phœbe watched the three from her kitchen window, and when the two visitors had gone, she herself went out to take "a look round."

David came back from the gate with a beaming face.

"They are the sort of friends to have, Phœbe," he said. "How different it makes things!"

"You're right there, Mr. David," the old servant replied; "only I could not help being a bit vexed that they're but outside the place after all. I'd have liked it well if it was the young lady that'll be missis someday that was givin' an eye and a word about her home that is to be."

David's bright face grew a little grave—not sad. "You are the most of mistress that this house is likely to have, Phœbe," he said.

"Ay, I suppose you'll be always movin' from one house to another, each finer than the last, Mr. David."

"I don't think that's my way, Phœbe," said David; and then he turned, and walked into the parlour.

Everybody supposed that Fergus Laurie would also select another dwelling in the same lane. There were vacant some much larger houses than either George Harvey's or David Maxwell's homes,—old-fashioned, Georgian houses, with a sort of ready-made order in their prim internal arrangements, and with one room, at least, quite fit for the reception of a limited number of guests. People who supposed that Fergus Laurie's original "nothing" meant, at least, only "not much," and whose imagination set Mrs. Laurie's pension at more than double what it really was, concluded that the Lauries, being ambitious people, might possibly venture to take one of these residences, not as a family luxury, but as a business propriety.

Judge of the universal astonishment when it oozed out that Fergus had taken the lease of a substantial old family mansion standing in its own grounds, the wall of which came up to the vicarage-palings!

"I don't suppose it is true," said Mrs. Webber, as she reported the rumour during a visit to her mother.

"Yes it is," Millicent observed, raising her head from her drawing, with a slight flush on her face. "At least, he told me he thought of taking that house."

She did not look up as she spoke, or she would have seen that her sister and Miss Brook involuntarily glanced at each other.

"Well, great fortunes are raised by such hits as he has made," said Hatty, "but that house will be a great responsibility."

"He'd better walk before he flies," remarked Miss Brook. "That house will take a fortune to furnish."

"He won't furnish completely at once," said Millicent. "But there is so much more satisfaction in having a home where one can hope to settle permanently than one from which one is sure to wish to remove."

"He'd need to keep twenty fires burning in that great mansion, or else he'll have a doctor's bill as part of his regular family expenses," Miss Brook went on practically.

"One's house is the thing that most directly gives one status, and all the expenses belonging to a good house are small compared with any other kind of expense," Milly pleaded. "Look at the Lewsons with their carriages and horses; and look at the Benhams with their shooting-box. And Fergus Laurie is really in as good a position as they are."

"Only that the one family is in the second and the other in the third generation of successful business people," observed Mrs. Harvey. "I remember old Mr. Lewson myself, and his hair was white before he thought of leaving the little house by the warehouse, where the managers live now. And he himself never kept more of an establishment than two female servants, a middle-aged woman and a girl. That is the way the wealth accumulated through which his descendants enjoy their luxuries."

"Well, I think he would have done wiser to spend it himself in a more liberal way of life," Milly argued. "If the present Lewsons were not able to drive everything before them by their sheer force of £ s. d., may be they would be more sensible women and more gentlemanly men. When a sensible man gets money in his hands, he had better spend it wisely and rightly than let it accumulate for he knows not who."

"You're right so far, Milly," her mother answered. "A wise liberality would keep down many an unwieldy fortune, and do in a natural way what charities do in an unnatural one."

Miss Brook grunted. "It's very well to say 'Don't hoard money' when you have it in your hands, but you might safely add, 'Don't spend it before it is there,'" she said.

"I am sure that Fergus Laurie wishes for position and influence only to do good," said Milly, disregarding the old lady. "And we, who owe so much to him, should be the last to criticize him unfavourably. See how much more he gives for my work than the old firm did."

"But then your work is so much better than it used to be," Hatty interpolated.

"And he gives me better than money, too," Milly went on enthusiastically. "The interest he takes in my work always quite inspirits me. It is so different to being left to plod on without a word, as I used to be. If you knew how he has made my daily work a daily pleasure, I think those who love me would only wish him God speed and all prosperity, instead of carping at him."

"I am sure we all wish him well most sincerely, Millicent," said her mother soothingly. "You see, Miss Brook and I are elderly women, and perhaps don't know it quite well enough, and are a little dumfounded to see such young people coming forward and taking the lead in life. I'm sure when I'm reading George's books, I often keep thinking they are written by some of the wise old professors and poets, whose works I used to read in my young days. It is hard to realise they are by my own boy, whom I taught to read. But those old writers were other people's boys, in their time. If my dear mother could come back to earth, I believe she would think I was a great deal too young to be wearing caps, and I don't believe she would have any particular confidence in my housekeeping! It's the way with old people, Milly. They don't feel old in themselves, dear, and that makes them think that everybody younger must be babies. I am sure I wish Mr. Laurie well, and so do we all."

Milly allowed herself to be pacified. She felt her friends' doubts very keenly, for this ample reason, that they had sprung up in her own mind, the moment Fergus had confided his intention, and though his arguments had cut them clear down, their roots remained, and gave an uneasy shooting in her mind, which she did not understand herself.

The great house was taken, and a few of its many rooms made habitable. The Lauries brought no old furniture with them. Even Mrs. Laurie's own bed-chamber was all spick and span new. The moment the old lady saw her mahogany wardrobe and marble-topped washstand, she parted without a sigh from her spindle-legged chairs and shaky tables, and from all the past associated with them. Of the three Lauries, it was actually Fergus himself who found it hardest to make himself quite at home in apartments, whose fashion and freshness made them look like an upholsterer's show-room. He would really have liked to keep some of the old things. But his mother and sister declared positively that the old parlour chairs would never do for rooms that were to be dining and drawing rooms, and that they would be out of harmony with the necessary new bedroom plenishing. So they went. The same plea availed to sacrifice everything. There was an old cradle in which had slept in life and death, a little baby-boy Laurie, for whom Fergus had felt the strange passionate tenderness which wilful reserved children often pour out on helpless infants. Even in his self-contained intellectual manhood, Fergus would pause to smile upon and pat a child who had a look of little Jamie. It was a peculiarity of his nature that it would have been torture to him to acknowledge this clinging remembrance. The nearest words he could find, was to say coldly to his mother, pointing to the cot—

"I suppose you would like to keep that."

"What use is it?" she asked. "If you ever have children, you'll want to give them a better bed than that."

"It won't fetch anything. People would almost want you to pay them for taking it away, mother," said Fergus.

"Well, then, let it be chopped up for fire-wood. Anything better than lumber standing about useless and gathering dirt."

And so the first fire round which the Lauries sat in their new home at Acre Hall, was built with the old cradle!

They were a family who had never possessed many of those relics on which Fergus could secretly lay hold and stow away. What he could he did. They had an old framed print, and a black profile of somebody. These he thrust into his own portmanteau and carried off himself; the first he put up over his bedroom mantel; the second he hid in his private drawers under his gloves and handkerchiefs. They had very few books, except what Fergus had bought himself, and these few were nothing very attractive, being controversial theology, old dictionaries, and antiquated ready-reckners. But those also he conveyed to his own room, and arranged on a bracket that he caused to be put up there.

This room of his was the smallest and barest in the house. It did not even command the lawn with its two or three fine old trees, but looked out on a strip of yard, bounded so narrowly that one standing at the window could almost touch the wall. When Fergus showed David through his new abode, this was the last room to which he led him. And when David saw the coarse druggot, the cane-chairs, and the poor, blue-checked bed, he reproached himself bitterly for sundry fears as to his friend's luxurious and extravagant tastes, which had been rising during the earlier part of his survey.

"You see what my own tastes are," Fergus remarked, as if reading David's thoughts. "I do not care for anything more than this. If I were an independent man, this is how I should live. All the rest is forced upon me by my position. It is nothing more than my stock in trade—one of the weapons with which I must carry on our warfare."

"Well, prosperity is certainly a trial as well as adversity," David answered. "It seems really hard if one must thus invest one's first success, when one would rather use it in providing solidly for the future."

"It is," said Fergus. "My peculiar post in the firm, as its ostensible head, compels me, for the benefit of everybody, to take the lion's share of the profits this year; yet I daresay by Christmas your own balance at the bank will be larger than my private one."

David did not for one instant dream that though Fergus told the truth when he said he had bought his lease, he did not tell the whole truth, namely, that he had paid for it with money raised by a mortgage upon it. David only knew that there was a great deal of business come into their firm. His place was in the laboratory, not the counting-house, and he knew too little of the practical part of the trade to be able to make any approximate estimate of the actual profit. In fact, David had not received a commercial education, and his simple faith in others exceeded his shrewdness. The accident which had put him in business connection with Fergus Laurie had so brightened and settled his life, that he never thought of stopping to gauge his exact rights. He often wondered what would have become of him if Fergus had not taken him into the firm, but he never thought what might have become of the firm, if he had not made his discovery!

There was also a sunny glamour bewitching his simplicity. He had not the least doubt that Acre Hall would one day be Millicent Harvey's home. Poor fellow, the only love-dream that his new prosperity brought him was, that he might very likely make more money than would pay his self-imposed debt to his cousins, and provide for Phoebe, and then he would leave it as a legacy to the children of Fergus and Milly, perhaps to some bright-eyed Milly, the picture of her mother, who, maybe, out of old family friendship, would adopt him as "Uncle David." There are many such shadowy relationships in the airy castles of loving, lonely hearts like David Maxwell's. But such a dream of the future was certainly not calculated to make him very exact in his present monetary transactions with Fergus.

Millicent Harvey had set up a certain figure in her own ideal temple of supreme energy, patience, and self-sacrifice. It was a sufficiently grand and pure temple, the pity was that like the great heathen temples of antiquity and orientalism, the wrong name was on the altar! Perhaps, by some instinct similar to Christian's about love affairs, Millicent was aware of the neighbourhood of a hero, and only made a mistake by looking for him in the library of Acre Lodge, rather than in the tiny parlour of David's cottage! Half the mistakes in life come in just at that point.

Oh, giving the heart's love is often a "crooked place," and so is "getting on in life." And though God has promised that "He will go before us, and make our crooked places straight," He has not promised that we shall lose nothing in our stumbles, nor that his guidance will avail if we do not follow.

"Milly has my mother's face," said Mrs. Harvey to Miss Brook one day; "but she is like her father too. She has her will and keeps to it."

"Ay, she has so," responded Miss Brook. "May God bend her himself; for He upholds with one hand while He strikes with the other. If anything else breaks those strong wills, it breaks the soul's back with it."

The mother sighed.

CHAPTER XII.—RISING AND FALLING.

AND then time passed by, and months grew into years. More than one of the Harveys secretly wondered when Fergus Laurie meant to take Millicent out of her own family, and make her the mistress of Acre Hall. They had reason for their wonder. For there was many a merry-making at the Hall, and never one to which she was not invited. Apart, Fergus delighted to stand by her utterances on subjects which she might be fairly supposed to know better than he, and made it his highest praise of others to trace a likeness in them to "Miss Millicent."

"Laurie and Co." had certainly made their way in the world. Their name stood among the highest of their trade. And in social style and expenditure, Fergus, with his sudden ascent from "nothing," managed to hold his own with the best. People shook their heads at first, and thought "he was pulling the reins too hard," but as the reins did not seem to break, most of the heads left off shaking, and their owners concluded that the aspiring young merchant was right after all, and was justified by his success. And then he was naturally expected to head every subscription list, and to organize every local movement or gaiety, and to exercise every species of hospitality. The man who goes into the way of temptation need not be surprised to find temptation there!

Fergus presently began to realise that he was standing on a mine. He had not over-estimated his success, but he had under-estimated its cost. The early profits, which should have been husbanded to meet the further demands for capital, were swallowed to satisfy his private creditors. Nor were the later profits as much larger as had been expected, because, in spite of the immense increase of business, the firm still continued too short of cash to buy in the cheapest markets, or to work in the thriftiest way.

Then, one fatal day, Fergus found that he was the possessor of a fortune as bewitching and beguiling as a pot of fairy gold. It was Credit.

He felt quite happy on the first evening after he had satisfied a creditor by a "bill." He found Milly taking tea with Robina at Acre Hall. And afterwards, when they chanced to be alone together for a few minutes before the candles were lit, and the soft early moonlight came stealing down through the elm-tree, and Milly said gently, "How lovely!" he was very near saying to her, that all beauty, and all success, would be nothing to him without her. He had been much harassed of late, and she looked so kind and good and sensible that he thought it would be a comfort to tell her about it, and what a rest it was to be out of it for a while. Only he somehow felt that Milly would be sure to say, however sympathizingly, that it was a pity he had taken so much expense upon himself, and would it not be better to retrench. And he felt he could not do that, and therefore he must not tell Milly of his troubles. He must keep that to himself, even if he told her that he loved her. He would like to share his sorrows, but not with any one who would be so prompt to remove them by unpleasant ways. Besides, it would be kinder to Milly not to tell her. Why should one's "wife," (Fergus's heart leaped as he thought the word) be tormented with one's business anxieties?

And while he sat in silent cogitation Robina returned with a servant and the candles, and began talking about a poor tradesman in the neighbourhood, whose wife had given a large order at the draper's the day before he committed suicide through severe pecuniary distress.

"What a shock it must have given her!" Robina remarked. "People are beginning to blame her; but it is not likely that she knew anything about her husband's affairs. Sensible men do not talk to women about business."

"And show their sense by such a dreadful result as this!" exclaimed Milly. "I cannot understand a husband and wife standing on such a footing towards each other! If it is not the wife's fault, if she had been always attentive and sympathetic and obedient, I can scarcely see how she can forgive the sin her husband has committed against her."

"But it would often trouble a wife unnecessarily," Robina observed. "There are so many business bothers which eventually settle down without affecting private life in the least."

"I should like to be in all my husband's 'bothers,'" said Milly. "I almost think if he didn't tell me, I should still be able to find them out. Oh how dreadful it would be to be a wife, quite unconscious of things that many other people must know, quite innocently thinking she has a right to money to which they know she has none! Better and happier to live on bread and water, and wear one's old clothes year after year!"

"Everybody's not such a Spartan as you," Robina said; and so ended a conversation, not without its result, as nothing is in this world. For Fergus felt thankful that he had not "spoken" as yet, and resolved that he would not do it, until he was fairly clear of business difficulties, saying to himself that Milly was a noble woman, but rash and unbusinesslike, and apt to cut down where trimming would do. So that he must be content to wait for her, till he had settled his foundations too strongly to be overthrown by any of her brave, self-sacrificing impulses.

Poor Fergus! May we not pity him as we would a man who tried to build a pyramid from its apex?

Time passed by, and bills were met by bills, and though a few city men smiled cynically at the name of Laurie and Co., still local society, and society at large, found it quite easy to believe that Fergus Laurie's success had grown into wealth.

He had not repaid a loan of a few hundreds which Mr. Webber had advanced to him in the early days of the firm. Why need he? He gave good interest. He always spoke as if he gave such a very good interest that it must be really a help to such a man as Mr. Webber, in comparatively so small a way of business. Nobody ever thought of asking what security Mr. Webber had, or if any. In fact, Mr. Webber would never have made so rash a loan to anybody but a struggling young man who he thought had talents and wanted help. And Mr. Webber would have asked for the return of his money, but for one of those influences, which have more weight with all of us than we know. Hatty had been rather vexed at his lending it, had prophesied hard things, and, cruellest of all, had finally comforted herself by the thought, that its loss would not absolutely ruin them. Her husband had been glad when, with this conclusion, she let the matter drop, and he felt reluctant to bring it forward again. Whenever he thought of asking for it, he always fancied it might be a particularly inconvenient time, and as long as the interest came in regularly, surely Hatty must be convinced it was quite safe! These were poor arguments, and this was a weak course of action; but if you or I, dear reader, cannot recall similar conduct of our own, it is probably only because we do not "know ourselves."

Bills! bills! There was plenty of success still. Fergus was working in a system which made success more disastrous than failure is to other men, but he still looked for new successes, to retrieve the irretrievable.

There was one who often looked very grave in those years. That was David Maxwell. David had once imagined that he was to be some sort of partner, but it was without any soreness that he discovered he was to be but a paid official. He turned his mistake into a blessing.

"A regular salary is the best income for anybody who is not very business-like," he decided. "And though mine is too narrow to save much, I shall always be able to save all my bonuses."

For he always kept in mind those five unknown girls in Yarmouth, none of whom either died or married!

David still knew little or nothing of the finances of Laurie and Co. But he felt something was wrong. Year after year, his bonuses were either infinitesimal or nothing. Year after year, Fergus' private "necessary expenditure" increased. David would not have heeded the fact if he could have discovered a justifiable reason for it.

But it was a something changed in Fergus himself which pained his old friend so sadly. David began to question what had been his former thoughts about his friend's spiritual state. He concluded that he would never have declared that Fergus was a decided Christian, but that he had seemed one of those "not far from the kingdom of heaven." Now, a looser tone was creeping in. The Lauries were growing very slack in their church attendance, and Fergus was falling into that tone of thought which decides that because the "form" is not the "spirit," therefore the spirit is never in the form! Quite unaccountably to David, he had made some very unaccountable friends—worldly, light-living men, "who feared not God, neither regarded man," and though Fergus did not run immediately to their excess of riot, he tolerated and excused it in a way which made a strange discord with former days.

Perhaps this declension was not spiritually so great as it appeared to David. When Fergus had been a poor clerk, living in a needy household, an outward form of religion had been a social distinction, indeed in one way, almost the only one then at his command. Apparently devout and regular habits had won him the confidence of his old masters, the friendship of the Harveys, the notice of the vicarage. Alas, alas, godliness is so profitable even for this world, that its mere simulation is worth something!

Do not let it be understood that Fergus had been a voluntary and cold-blooded hypocrite in those former days. No. He had only been self-willed and ambitious, ready without question to take the nearest path to a desired end. When he had been in a class of life to which only religion can bring much refinement of mind and habit, he had been attracted to religion. When he could get something of these without it, its charms were gone. He could visit plenty of well-appointed houses now, and talk to plenty of intellectual people, and so he could afford to drop the vicarage, and did so, with a graceless pointedness, which had its true origin in a little pang of remorse.

For he satisfied himself that he was "obliged" to do it. The vicar had looked very gravely upon some of the visitors he had met at Acre Hall—the very men who awakened the doubts even of the charitable David Maxwell. Now, they were holding "bills" of Fergus's, and were being very "accommodating," and he said to himself that he "must not" offend them. The vicar ought to stick to him in spite of his backslidings, and if he did not, then so much the worse for the vicar's care of souls! He quite forgot that he would not allow the vicar to keep to him, unless he also kept a smiling silence which would have made him partaker in his sins.

Fergus Laurie developed "tastes," and so did Robina. Acre Hall was soon not only handsomely, but singularly furnished, so that everybody remarked it and remembered it. Robina's dress was a model for a duchess. To be sure she talked too much about it, especially about its quality and its style. She could never wear any but the best of everything—the best was the most economical.

"Yes, that is quite true," Hatty Webber said one day, rather bluntly. "Only some people cannot afford it, and some people do not make their first-class things look or wear so well as other people's poorer ones."

Millicent always preferred to keep Robina and Hatty apart. It did not require much finesse to do so. Milly herself did not always like Robina. But Robina, with all her aversion to women's taking interest in business, could make very uncomfortable remarks about Milly's designs, and often vaguely suggested that, of course, she would always like to stand her friend, and take her part with her brother.

Out of all the Harveys it was only Milly who ever went and came familiarly in Acre Hall. Hatty Webber and Miss Brook were never there at all. Mrs. Harvey called once or twice, and George and Christian went when they were formally invited. Fergus spoke very freely to Millicent about David Maxwell's family misfortunes, with tolerably broad suggestions of the shield and shelter that David had found in his friendship. But in all David's friendship with George and Christian, he was never so candid about other folk's business, or about his own where it mixed with other folk's. They never knew of the little capital he had brought to Fergus, and though they could not help knowing that his had been, as it were, the hand that made the prosperous discovery, even they did not know how little any other head had been concerned therein.

When Milly returned from her visits to Acre Hall, she never said much about its splendid furnishing or entertainment. One does not speak about things which one wishes to veil, even from one's own soul. What she did tell was of Fergus's liberal payments, and of his active interest in his work-people,—the little fêtes he gave them, and the way in which he sent them to the seaside or elsewhere when they were sick.

"There's many can submit to their inferiors that won't to their superiors," was Miss Brook's grim comment. "He'd have turned round on Mr. Devon if he had spoken out to him. It's a kind of humility that pride is made of. It's like some women who obey their children instead of their husbands."

It remains an open question whether Milly would have married Fergus, had he asked her in those days. She certainly would not have married any one else. All of her heart which was open to her own knowledge was filled by him. But Milly was one of those women who keep some chambers of the heart which another hand must open before they themselves will enter.

Had he asked her to be his wife—had he even broadly shown her that he had hopes beyond those of a near and dear friend, very likely Milly would have paused and owned to herself that even some of the fairest points in his character might be but treacherous peat mosses, unfit to bear the heavy tread of daily life and companionship.

It was not a happy state to be in. The wall between love and friendship is not a fit standpoint for any one. On either side are happiness and content, but betwixt, neither.

David Maxwell could not understand what it meant. Fergus and Milly were still friends. Milly's praise was still on Fergus's lips. Milly still confided in Fergus. How was it that so much did not grow into a little more?

Once upon a time, David might have ventured to suggest his thoughts to Fergus. But not now. As those reckless, ungodly men had grown into familiarity, David had grown out.

And David almost asked himself, "Would it do Fergus good to marry Milly? Or would it do Milly harm to marry Fergus?"

And he thanked God that it was not in his hands, but thought that Milly was too good for anything to harm her.

Only he saw she was growing to look older than her years, and was generally grave and often weary.

SCRIPTURE VERSES.

BY ONE OF THE AUTHORS OF "POEMS WRITTEN FOR A CHILD."

I. THE WEDDING FEAST.

A KING prepared a marriage—
 A marriage for his son,
 And gave a very sumptuous feast,
 As kings have often done :
 He sent his invitations
 To noble and to dame ;
 But to this feast, from west or east,
 Or north or south, none came !

The king sent forth his servants
 To seek each tardy guest,
 And say the feast was all prepared,
 And of the very best.
 But though the servants found them,
 Their mission was no use,
 For every man had his own plan,
 And made his own excuse.

One said, " I pray excuse me ;
 I bought a piece of ground,
 And to inspect that ground to-day
 I am in duty bound."

Another said, " I've purchased
 A yoke of oxen new ;
 And I must see how we agree—
 Pray thee excuse me too."

Another stayed, contented,
 Within his quiet home,
 And said, " I'm married to a wife,
 Therefore I cannot come !"
 The king was very angry
 They disobeyed his will,
 And when he heard each spoken word
 He was more angry still.

Then said he to his servant,
 " A remedy remains :
 Go forth into the city streets,
 And to the narrow lanes ;
 Go forth and bring me quickly
 Each creature you can find—
 The lame, the poor, who much endure,
 The beggar, and the blind."

The servant did his bidding.
 In crowds the people come ;
 But still the table is not full ;
 Its wealth leaves room for some.
 " Go forth into the highways,
 And from the hedges win ;
 Or near or far, whoe'er they are,
 Compel them to come in !"

So spake the angry monarch,
 Determined there should rest

No place at the delightful feast
 For one invited guest,
 Many may be the summon'd ;
 The chosen are but few.
 Let us beware, with anxious care,
 Lest we are banished too !

For we have been invited
 By the great King's command,
 Baptismal drops upon our brow
 And Bibles in our hand.
 Dare we for earthly pleasure,
 Or earthly duty even,
 Refuse to grace the promised place
 God keeps for us in heaven ?

II. THE LOST SHEEP.

WHAT man of you having a hundred sheep,
 If he lost one, and one alone,
 Would he not dream of it in his sleep,
 And think of it as his very own ?

And would he not leave the ninety and nine,
 And climb the steepest and roughest ground ?
 And would he not cry, " Here's that sheep of mine !"
 With exceeding joy when that sheep was found ?

And would he not call his neighbours and friends,
 Call in a loud and cheery voice,
 " For all my toil I have sweet amends ;
 I have found my sheep—O my friends, rejoice !"

I tell you that mid the other bliss
 That is up above in the perfect heaven,
 There is a beautiful joy like this
 When a man repents and may be forgiven.

III. THE SILVER PIECE.

IF a woman a silver piece hath lost,
 She lights a light, and she looks for it ;
 And of all her treasure she prizes most
 That one little missing silver bit.

O silver coin, how beloved thou art !
 She calls it the one she cares for best ;
 And if she finds it, with happy heart,
 Her friends rejoice, and she takes her rest.

I tell you that through the heaven above
 A beautiful joy like that is sent—
 A joy made up of pity and love—
 For ev'ry sinner that doth repent !

THE FUTURE OF THE WORKING CLASSES.

IV.—THE GORDIAN KNOT—MASTERS AND MEN.

OF all the subordinate duties of the clergy, one of the most difficult and undesirable is to act as umpire between man and wife, or between parent and child (especially step-child), when their relations to each other have got into disorder. To give a sound judgment on the particular points of difference is usually easy enough; the "faults-on-both-sides" formula serves for most cases; but to heal the morbid temper, to clear the jaundiced eye, to dispel the suspicious habit, to gender that spirit of love and forbearance that will keep everything sweet for the future—here, truly, is the difficulty. We may hope that by-gones are to be by-gones; we may entreat the parents to remember the example they set to their children; we may call up the memory of happier days; we may even kneel with them before God, and beseech his grace and mercy, and we may get them to shake hands as if all were past and gone; yet if we were asked to forecast the future, and tell how matters were likely to go in the family, we should probably be greatly at a loss—unable to determine whether STORMY or SET FAIR was the point at which the domestic barometer would be most likely to stand.

We must own it is with a strong kindred feeling that we approach the question which is now convulsing the world of labour—the relation between masters and men. At the present moment, beyond all doubt, the mercury stands at STORMY, and tap the barometer as we may, it stubbornly refuses to rise. How is this question going to be practically settled? What are to be the future relations of capital and labour? What is to be the issue of unions and strikes? Are the workmen of the future to be as dependent on their employers as the workmen of the past? Are the employers of the future to be as dependent on their workmen as they say they are now? Is there any reasonable or practicable way of establishing a relation comfortable and satisfactory on both sides? These are the questions now before us; they are questions, we confess, with which we are loath to meddle, and to which we address ourselves only because they are quite unavoidable when the subject in hand is the future of the working classes.

It may throw some light on the future if, in the first place, we look a little at the past. Who is to blame for the present state of things? How is it that employer and employed have come to be so thoroughly at loggerheads? If we can find out the cause, it may help us to the cure; and if we can find a practicable cure, the difficulty and obscurity of the future may be thereby considerably lessened.

It is after very much thought and inquiry that, for our part, we have come to the conclusion that, in the first instance, employers are to blame for the present collision between masters and men. When, about half a century ago, the industry of this country got that remarkable impulse which came from the introduction of steam, a new class of lords might be said to have arisen, beyond the pale of the feudal system. Whole regiments of workers came to be employed together, many times more numerous than it was possible for their employer to know or care for individually, even if he were disposed to do so. These were bound to work for him to the full compass of their working ability; but instead of being cared for and protected by him, as the retainers of the barons under the feudal system, they simply received a weekly wage, and in all other respects had to shift for themselves. In short, the factory and workshop system was essentially the feudal system without its attractive and compensating features. The services of the men were hired by the master; the men were to work on day after day at the stipulated rate; but instead of being looked after in sickness or old age, as the theory at least of the feudal system implied, they were left to struggle through the one, and drag through the other as best they might; their employer bargained only for their labour; and when through whatever cause they had no labour to sell, he had nothing more to do with them than the Emperor of China or of Japan. If business should thrive, and great wealth should flow into his purse, he seldom thought of making them the better for his prosperity: "No," he reasoned, "if I had sustained heavy losses they would not have proposed that I should lessen their earnings, and when I have realised large profits they must not expect that I shall offer them an increase." As a general rule, men were treated as machines or animated tools, whose labour was to be bought on the principle on which machinery was bought; the cheaper it could be got so much the better, provided always that it was not too cheap to be efficient. As for the idea that the "hands" were men and brothers who might get tired of working for a sum of money not enough to keep them far off the edge of pauperism—who might think it reasonable to share somewhat in the prosperity they created, and who might wish to have their humanity recognised, and to be encouraged to fulfil the higher purposes of life—every such idea was apt to be set down as nonsense, which it was a real service to the men to stamp out in the most summary way.

By-and-by the first symptoms of the social rebellion showed themselves in fitful efforts in the direction of strikes. It became apparent that if the feudal system could not live even with its paternal compensations, much less could it live without them. The mutterings of a volcano began to be heard, and it was plain that the forces gathering below ground were of no ordinary strength. Now was the time for employers to lay to heart the inherent defects of the system hitherto pursued, and encourage measures for a more satisfactory relation with the men. That golden opportunity the employers, as a body, not only failed to seize, but, like the counsellors of Rehoboam, they rather turned it against the men. When Lord Shaftesbury and others, in order to lighten the pressure of toil, introduced the Ten Hours' Bill, the employers, as a body, were keenly against it. Then, in some quarters, there prevailed the truck system, an arrangement hurtful to the workmen, but a source of profit to the employer, who of course resisted its abolition. When certain arrangements were made for the benefit of the working man,—provision, for example, in mining districts, for medical attendance or schooling,—it was alleged that they were sometimes so managed by the employer as to afford pickings and parings for himself. So late as 1871 the provisions of the Act of Parliament for the safety of miners were vigorously resisted in both Houses in the interest of the employers. It grieves us to say it, but taking the great employers as a whole, their spirit has been painfully selfish, and the country has good reason to complain of them as the original cause of the social anarchy, the fruits of which are now so disastrous and distressing.

The impression made on the men by the general resistance of employers to parliamentary and other measures for their relief and protection was very profound. It made them despair of friendly relations being established between them. It led them to contemplate resistance as the only effectual means of securing any improvement in their condition. More than that, it hindered them from appreciating duly the efforts of individual employers to act a brotherly and Christian part towards their men. The revival of earnest religion and of Christian philanthropy, which has been so active during the last thirty years, has led many an employer over the country to think of his responsibilities, and to endeavour in his own sphere to remedy the evils affecting the system of labour. These efforts of individual employers have not been altogether in vain, but they have not succeeded to the degree that might have been expected. In "Heads and Hands in the World of Labour," I collected, in 1865, many interesting samples of kind Christian effort by employers in various industries for the benefit of their men; but it is impossible to resist the conclusion that many such employers have been quite discouraged, and that others have been prevented from trying anything of the kind. The impression of the selfishness of the employers has dominated among the men; and the exceptions to this spirit, interesting and beautiful though they have been, have not been enough to change the current, or to modify the attitude which the men have assumed.

If employers fifty years ago had opened their eyes to facts that are now forcing themselves on their minds, and had showed the kindly spirit of which there have been many examples more recently, the wild turmoil of the present strife would probably have been avoided. But they lost their opportunity, and the natural consequences came. The forces of human nature cannot be permanently dammed up. It is natural for toiling men to desire a proportionate interest in the wealth which they help to create. It is natural for them, especially when they get political knowledge and political rights, to desire to be more than bread-making machines. The drudgery of constant toil pursued from morning to night, and meeting with no recompense that suffices to do more than keep the wolf a little way from the door, sours the mind while it exhausts the body. Supercilious treatment, as if a great favour were done to them by those who use their work and pay their wages, is an additional irritant. Men made in God's image crave some recognition of brotherhood, some encouragement to aim high and struggle hard, some impulse in the direction of the higher purposes of life. Had this been felt generally a generation ago, had the men been met frankly by their employers, had they received an occasional bonus on their earnings in prosperous times, had some consideration been shown for the obvious drawbacks of their position, the peace might have been kept, and kindly relations sustained. We say so with some confidence, because we know of particular districts and industries where this policy was followed, and with good effect. We know of such districts both in England and Scotland, where strikes have been all but unknown. The employers entered into the feelings and circumstances of the men, and tried to make provision for wants and cravings which it was reasonable and Christian for them to consider. It is hardly possible to over-estimate the value of a little spontaneousness in such matters. If a similar course had been followed all over the country, the relations of capital and labour would not have been in the somewhat hopeless condition in which they are at the present hour.

But let us now turn to consider the course of the men. Believing that they would not obtain what they deemed fair and reasonable terms by the spontaneous action of their employers, they fell back on the principle of union, in order that they might have strength enough to obtain what they sought. At first the combination laws shut them out, though with a bitter sense of wrong, even from the attempt to unite. Of late years, however, they have been free to do so. And it is but fair to the workman to say, that his trades-unions have been a great educating power. They have stimulated his intellect, and in many ways made him much more of a man. And what ought always to be frankly acknowledged, they have taught him a great lesson,—how to make great sacrifices in the present in order to secure benefit in the future. We have the conviction that the public has never yet done justice to the moral grandeur exhibited in certain aspects of a workman's strike. The attention of those outside is so apt to be fixed on the uglier aspects of the proceeding that they overlook what is really great in it. But for a great body of the working mass to surrender present benefit in the hope of realising future advantage, and patiently endure indescribable privations, hour by hour, day by day, week by week, indicates a power of self-discipline which, under happier circumstances, may one day be a great means of moral elevation. No mere animal could do this. No savage or body of savages could attain to it. Whatever drawbacks may attend it, and however any may disapprove of the immediate purpose for which it is done, it shows a great power of sacrifice, and among human forces the power of sacrifice is the one that is capable, under high direction, of achieving the greatest amount both of glory and of good.

But while we say this frankly, we must with equal frankness add that the working out of the policy of union has often, in our judgment, been most injurious. We will not go into the economical aspects of the subject; but, confining ourselves to the moral, we will specify three particulars to which we consider that this observation is specially applicable. In the first place, the tendency of this policy has been to bind up good masters and bad in one and the same bundle, and make war equally on both. We have no doubt that this has often been regretted, but still it is the tendency of the system. We have in our eye a branch of industry in which two employers have been conspicuous for their considerate and Christian treatment of their men. The union declares a strike, and in these establishments the same terms must be exacted, and the same result of refusal must follow. Some of the men leave weeping, and we believe the masters weep too. Strong men do not weep for the loss of sixpence a day; they weep for wounded affections, for heartstrings torn rudely up, for the best treasure of the heart rent from its embrace. This is an awful kind of violence, a dreadful thing to do in a world where such love is rare, and where the want of such love is the very cause of the evils sought to be remedied. In the second place, there is an irresistible temptation to interfere with the free action of men who do not concur in the policy of the union. That such men should be left free to follow their own course, should escape persecution in some shape, if that course be contrary to the interests of the rest—is all but impossible. Then, in the third place, there is a temptation to bring work to a stand-still at a time singularly inconvenient for the employer, and for his customers. If he be pressed for time to finish a contract—if a season approaches when he has many urgent orders—the moment is often chosen to declare a strike. This is a proceeding which can never meet with the approval of a Christian mind. The workmen may say, "Our employers desire nothing but to buy our labour as cheaply as possible, and we desire nothing but to make our bargain when they feel its value most. If at any moment we ask more than they care to give, they may simply let us alone." True; but there is a prior rule binding on every Christian workman—"Do to others as you would be done by." There are undertakings we all enter upon in the confidence that old understandings will not be broken up at an hour's notice. Suppose that a steamer sailing to remote places has been accustomed to take in coal and water at a certain island-station, hundreds of miles remote from any other; suppose that, trusting to the old arrangement, the sailing-master has made himself absolutely dependent on the merchant there; but that one day the merchant refuses further supplies except on terms enormously higher than before,—he may be doing what is legal, but he is dealing shabbily with one who has become dependent on him by trusting him—he is not doing as he would be done by. It is no small offence to disappoint one who has become dependent on you because he has trusted you. It is a course very distasteful to an honourable mind. You pay a man a compliment when you become dependent on him by trusting him; and he who betrays such a trust is like a man who holds out his arms to a child on a high bank, encouraging it to leap into them, and when it has taken the leap, suddenly withdraws them, and leaves it sprawling on the ground.

We have tried to state fairly the cause of the present unhappy collision between employer and employed. It is quite probable that by what we have said we may incur the displeasure of both. But we are too much in earnest in the matter to be greatly moved by that, much though we should regret it. If there be truth in our diagnosis—our attempt to find the cause of the evil—we shall be the more likely to reach the remedy. One feature of the remedy is, indeed, suggested by the very statement of the causes that have bred the disease.

The disease has been caused by selfishness; the cure can come only from the opposite spirit. Let us suppose that by some unearthly power, the tone of the employers were to change. Going frankly to their men, let us suppose them to admit that it is reasonable for them to desire more leisure, less drudgery, a higher place in the social scale, the means of better living, the removal of what hurts their health or endangers their life, and generally, such arrangements as would help them to fulfil the higher purposes of their being. Let the confession be made, that as a rule employers have been too neglectful of the comfort and well-being of their men, have been lordly and not brotherly, have embittered the feeling of inferiority instead of trying to smooth it down; and let this expression of a livelier interest in the welfare of the men be accompanied by substantial tokens of willingness to treat them more considerately in the future. This would be a right Christian course. And if only our supposition should become a reality, we cannot but believe that under God's blessing this course would ere long gain that reward which Christian love and Christian gentleness have so often gained amid the stormiest elements. We cannot believe that it would produce no better result than that which comes from the common method of storming against the proceedings of the men as intolerable, and swearing that they shall be brought to the masters' feet.

Let us suppose next, that the same unearthly power were to operate on the men. Under its influence, would there be no regrets to come from them? No expressions of sorrow for having wounded the hearts and hurt the interests of some masters who deserved better treatment—for having spoken bitterly and acted cruelly to old comrades that took a different course—for having rejoiced over the misfortune of the master when he could not finish his contract—for having stirred up in themselves and in others a fierce spirit of hatred and enmity? Is all this Christian and Christ-like? O working man, if some Nathan were to unfold his parable to you, and veiling all this under allegoric guise, were to ask your judgment on the doer of it, what would your answer be? And what would be your feeling when Nathan turned and said, "Thou art the man?" Would you not hasten, if it were possible, to blot out the memory of much of the past by your eagerness to realise a more Christian future?

We have supposed all this to be brought about by some unearthly power. We can easily fancy most scornful treatment of this supposition. "Why," we may be told, "you have only to suppose the same thing, and France and Germany will be hugging one another like bosom friends; the Pope will be calling Bismarck and Victor Emmanuel his dearest allies; the International will be holding a Wesleyan love-feast; Mr. Huxley will be conducting a prayer-meeting; in short, the wolf and the lamb will everywhere be dwelling together. It is only trifling with a pressing practical question to propose such a cure."

From those who treat the supposition of an unearthly power with contempt, we fear we must turn away. We must address ourselves to a smaller circle who still have faith in God and in his word. Undoubtedly it is a Christian doctrine that there is an unearthly power, promised to those who seek it, capable of finally accomplishing all the results that have been adverted to. And all who know anything of Christian discipline, know well that even when the blessing sought seems most remote and unlikely, it is our privilege to be cherishing the hope of it, to be working towards it, to be praying and longing for its advent. If we do not get the whole, we may get an instalment. But one day faith is sure to get the whole. We read in the last of the prophets that one day a single messenger of God's is to do a work not unlike the work now needing to be done—he is to turn the hearts of the fathers to the children, and the hearts of the children to the fathers. Change two words, and have we not that which we crave? "He shall turn the hearts of the employers to the workmen, and the hearts of the workmen to the employers." Who shall say that there might not be raised up in these islands a great apostle of social Christianity, full of God's Spirit, who securing the ear and the confidence of both classes, might do much to restore love and confidence between them?

But even without such a prophet, if the whole Christian Church would take up this matter, some good thing might surely come out of it. If our fifty thousand pulpits should strike the true key-note, might they not do something to sweeten the relations of labour and capital? If fifty thousand congregations should unite in prayer for the descent of the spirit of love and confidence, would it not come? Yet how extremely seldom do we find any allusion made to the subject either in church or chapel! Once only do we remember to have heard it made a special subject of prayer—at a religious conference where several landed men were present, and where in praying for better weather, it was suggested that it would be well to pray that tenants might be led to think kindly of their landlords, and landlords to think kindly of their tenants. The petition was excellent, so far as it went; but it seemed strange that it should have occurred to no one to suggest a prayer for a blessing on the much wider relation of masters and men, employers and employed, including farmers and labourers, so that the sin and misery which are so often connected with that relation now, might be turned into a corresponding measure of love and happiness.

But in settling the affairs of life, we are often compelled to come down to a lower platform than that of mutual Christian love. If we cannot get the south wind to blow, we must see what can be done under the influence of the north. In any case, many questions of detail would still arise between masters and men. Is there then no better way of adjusting the relations between capital and labour, so that the occasions of strife shall be removed, or at least greatly diminished? Undoubtedly, if there be, it is indispensable that it be applied. Several such remedies have been proposed:—conciliation courts, councils of arbitration, industrial partnerships, and schemes of co-operation. A lengthened discussion of these in the columns of this magazine would be out of place; we can but bestow a few passing words upon them. This, however, must be postponed to our next paper.

W. G. BLAIKIE.

A FAREWELL.

SWEET friends, why do you grieve that I am dying?

Such farewells should be made with smiles, not tears.
I go and bear no fears,
Into the unknown world before me lying.

For death is but a bridge from earth to heaven,
Linking two worlds, and heaven is most fair;
And we shall gather there
Glad harvests of repose after much sin forgiven.

Upon that bridge stand angels waiting for me,
With looks of love and smiles of welcome sweet,
To guide my trembling feet
Into the presence of my Master's glory.

Oh! very radiantly the bright transition
Prophetic breaks upon my wondering mind,
Till all I leave behind
Is shadowed by the splendour of the vision!

Farewell, O friends beloved! A glad to-morrow
Treads close upon the footsteps of to-day;
Soon ye shall pass away,
Like me, into a world where friendship hath no sorrow.

M. BETHAM-EDWARDS.

OUR DISTRICT.

By A RIVER-SIDE VISITOR.

VIII.—AN EVENING WITH OLD BIBLE.

AMONG those who knew him Bible Braidy was familiarly spoken of as "Old Bible;" but in his case the familiarity of expression was the outcome of respect and affection, and I also soon fell into the habit of so speaking of him. To meet the old man once, was to desire his further acquaintance, to know him was to love him. After our first meeting, I availed myself of every opportunity that offered for talking with him, and I was gratified to find that, in addition to being a sincerely religious man, he was also highly intelligent and well read, and, though grave, was neither gloomy nor severe—had indeed a touch of humour in his composition. When we encountered each other it was by chance, and our conversation on such occasions was of a very general kind—not at all calculated to gratify my curiosity to know more of him. Having this curiosity, however, it will be readily understood that I at once accepted his invitation when, after some months, Old Bible one morning suggested that I should "give him a look in at his home some afternoon or evening."

Happening on the following day to run against Shiny Smith, it occurred to me that probably that volatile gentleman would be able to tell me something about Old Bible—something that would give me a hint as to the best line to take in order to "draw out" the old man. Having mentioned Braidy's invitation and my acceptance of it, I asked—

"What is Braidy?"

"A man, take him for all in all,
We shall not look upon his like again!"

exclaimed Shiny by way of answer.

"Aptly quoted," I said; "but not quite what I wanted."

"Of course not," replied Shiny, "don't think, I don't take. The bit of flowery came in pat, and so I gave it mouth. 'It is my nature to'—another bit of flowery. I know what you want. You don't want a multum in parvo definition of him; you want a few details—who he is, where he came from, what makes him live in such a neighbourhood, what he does for a living, and, in fact—to give another bit of flowery—'the story of his life from year to year.' That's about what you want; but giving you the information is up another street. The old man knows more about others than they do about him; he's the oldest inhabitant. I don't suppose he has got anything to conceal; but he never talks about himself, at least, he never has to me. If any one knows his history hereabout it will be Larry H—, a talkative Irishman, who sets up as his friend and gossip; but who, it is my opinion, takes advantage of his simplicity to get trifles of money out of him, and that sort of thing, you know. All that I know about Braidy is, that he was in the Dockyard for many years, as a storekeeper or timekeeper, or something of that sort; that he has a small pension, and that with this and the interest from some savings he manages to rub along pretty comfortably. He always dresses as you see him, is plain in his eating, and neither drinks nor smokes. His only extravagance—if you can call it extravagance—is laying out a few shillings now and again in books. His idea of a day's pleasure is rummaging over second-hand book-stalls, and coming home at night with a volume tucked under his arm. He has got a very tidy collection, and mighty proud he is of them; in fact, they are his pets."

This was all that I knew of Old Bible's private life when I set out to pay my promised visit to him. He occupied a couple of rooms over a "general" shop, which was so situated that I had to traverse nearly the whole length of Barker's Buildings to reach it. In making this passage I found Braidy's name was a safeguard and passport. The sight of an outsider was a novelty in the Buildings, and from doors and windows I was furtively but closely scanned by fearsome-looking customers, who were evidently making mental calculation as to the probable value of my clothing, and speculating on the chances of my carrying a watch or purse. But with recognition danger passed, and I could hear such whispers as, "Oh, I know him, he'll be going to Braidy's," "A bit of a pal of Old Bible's," "Don't you remember he was down here with the old man on the day Fly Palmer was 'corpsed?'"

Picking my way along the dirty footpath, and among the equally dirty children who were playing about on it, I at length came to Old Bible's abode. Hearing my voice in the shop, he hurried down-stairs, and, with a face glowing with satisfaction, ushered me up to the apartment which served him as sitting and living room. It was plainly but comfortably furnished, and the whole of one side of it was fitted up with well-filled bookshelves, the volumes being such that, independent of what I had been told by Shiny Smith, I should at once have guessed to be gatherings from the second-hand stalls.

"Here you are then, sir," said Braidy, taking my hat from my hand, and placing a chair for me. "Be seated. I'm delighted to see you under my roof-tree. I have been looking forward to your visit; for, I can assure you, it is quite an event for me to have an educated man to talk to. It's a thing I often long for, the want I feel most; for my nature is social, and I feel as if I could give anything to have some one of understanding mind to converse with. But great are circumstances, and they will prevail; as Cowper says—

"Where penury is felt, the thought is chained, And sweet colloquial pleasures are but few."

So far as the gratification of my wish is concerned, I might almost as well be a Robinson Crusoe; placed here, I am alone in a crowd."

"But you are not bound to be placed here?" I said questioningly.

"Oh no, I'm a free agent in the matter," he answered, smiling and resuming his ordinarily quiet tone and composed manner. "I could if I liked live anywhere where a man with a guinea a-week might live honestly. But I lived in the Buildings here when they were inhabited by a very different class from those who occupy them at present. When they first became what they are now, I stayed on from force of habit, and later I remained from a sense of duty; because I felt a call to do so. And, after all, I believe I have been happier here than I would have been elsewhere, and I am certain I have done more good than I could have done in a better place. I do sometimes feel the want of companionship, and yet it is wrong of me to complain; for it has been given to me—and it is a great gift to a poor, childless, kinless old man—to be able to find companions in these." And as he spoke he walked to his books, and placed his hand upon them. "There they are to be taken up or put down at will, the best of all good company. There—" pointing to one shelf—"are the sermons of great divines; there—" pointing to another—"the lives of great and good men; and here—" he concluded, again laying his hand carelessly upon the shelf, upon which was arranged copies of the works of most of our great poets from Spenser downwards—"are the veritable

'great of old,
The dead but sceptred sovereigns who still rule
Our spirits from their urns.'

"Well, it is a pleasant thing to be able to make friends of books," I said, feeling called upon to make some remark.

"It is," Braidy assented; "and yet there are times when you tire of them alone; when you long for the sight of a human face, the sound of a human voice; when you want to disburden your mind as well as to fill it; when you would be glad even to be contradicted. However, if I keep on in this strain you'll be setting me down as an old grumbler. But it is only the novelty of your visit that has set my tongue running on that theme, and after all I am not quite companionless, I have one friend that often drops in to have a crack."

"Larry H——," I said, making use of what Shiny Smith had told me, in order to give Braidy a little surprise.

"Do you know Larry H——?"

I explained that I didn't know him, but that I had heard of him, and, from what I had heard, thought there was no danger of conversation flagging where he was.

I am afraid there was a sneer in the tone in which I spoke. At any rate Old Bible caught what was intended to be the covert meaning of my words.

"Well, we all have our failings," he said, smiling, "and it is no libel on Larry to say that he has a flux of words, and loves to hear the sound of his own voice; but then he has ideas and knowledge as well; and you should bear in mind that I must judge him by comparison. When I compare him with the bulk of my neighbours, I can paraphrase the poet's line and say, 'Better a year of Larry than a cycle of the rest.' There are great doings in the way of talk when we get together. Larry is a strong politician; and we settle the affairs of the nation, argue as to the relative merits of our favourite authors, and discuss whatever general topics may turn up; and, if we do no good to others by our talk, we certainly do no harm, while it pleases us, and, I hope, improves us a little. I enter into these details, because otherwise Larry's ways might seem strange, and the fact is I have asked him to drop in after tea,—speaking of that, I must see about getting tea ready; you must know that I 'do' for myself."

I murmured something about not wishing to put him to expense or trouble.

"It's no trouble, sir," he answered promptly, "and a plain cup of tea, and a slice of bread and butter once in a way, can scarcely be considered an expense. I look upon the hospitality of a first visit as incomplete unless my guest takes bite or sup with me."

I made no further objection, and in a short time Old Bible, who had everything handy in a neatly-arranged cupboard, had tea upon the table. We lingered over the meal, more intent on conversation than eating or drinking. We had been speaking of the death of parents being so frequently the cause of children drifting into the criminal classes, when the old man with marked earnestness exclaimed—

"I can speak feelingly there, for I have much to be thankful for in that relation. I was left an orphan at so early an age that I have but the faintest recollection of my parents—so faint, in fact, that I can scarcely tell whether it is recollection or only imagination. My father, a common sailor, was lost at sea when I was about five years of age, and my mother, a loving but weakly woman—as I knew afterwards—died a year later, beaten in the struggle. Her death is the earliest event my impression of which I can be sure is a recollection, and not a mere self-formed mind-picture. I can remember being lifted up to look at her as she lay dead, and crying when I found that she did not speak to me; and the neighbours coming in and out the house, and taking unusual notice of me. The parish buried my mother, but fortunately, as it turned out, they objected to take charge of me. There was some technicality that they said relieved them from the obligation to do so. Portsmouth—for it was there these things happened—was not my mother's settlement, or something of that sort. They found some old letters in her room, giving the address of a sister in London, and to this sister they wrote with a view to obtaining some information as to the settlement; but she settled the matter out of hand by writing to say that if they would send me to her, she would keep me, and they did send me, packing me off by coach under charge of the guard, who, I remember, was very kind to me.

"So I came under the care of my aunt Martha, and I can truly say that from the moment when she took me in her arms as the guard lowered me from the coach, till the hour of her death, I was never allowed to feel the want of parents. She was all to me that the best of parents could have been, and I loved her as a parent. The proudest thought of my life is that I was able in part to repay her in kind. She kept me when I was a helpless child, educated me and made a man of me, and her kindness was so far blessed in this life, that when years and infirmities had made her helpless, I was in a position to support her in comfort; and, when at a good old age she sank to her last rest, it was in my arms, and with my parting kiss on her lips, that in life had never spoke ought to me save words of kindness and good counsel."

He spoke with evident feeling, but still in a quiet, even, and indeed rather musing tone, and on his coming to a pause at this point, I merely asked, by way of saying something to lead him to go on with his story—

"Was she a single woman?"

"Yes," he answered; "what she herself would have called a lone woman, dependent upon her own exertions. She lived in this very street which, at the time I speak of, was quite a new one, and inhabited almost exclusively by artizans engaged in a neighbouring Government establishment. She took in the washing of a number of the unmarried men among them, and the washing of their black greasy working clothes was no light task. She was slaving at the wash-tub from morning to night; but she never grumbled, and when work was over and the place 'tidied up a bit,' she would take her seat by the fireside, and with her knitting in her hand, and her old large-print Bible—the one book she read—open before her, would be as happy as any lady in the land. She was an ignorant, ungainly, hard-featured woman, and to a stranger her manner might have appeared austere, and even crabbed; but she was at bottom as kind-hearted a creature as ever breathed; and a true Christian. It was she—poor, ignorant, and uneducated as she was—who, while I was yet a child, implanted in me a reverence and love for the Bible, and both by precept and example led me to aim at living a Christian life. Before I could read she used to read the Bible to me, and explain it in her simple way; and when I was better educated she used to call upon me to read her a chapter every evening. I have often fancied that we would not have made a bad picture as we sat there on either side the fireplace; she busy with her knitting, her eyes fixed on me, with a look of listening attention on her homely countenance, and I, a little fellow of ten, perched up at the table, with my head bent over the book or with my finger marking my place, looking up at her as she asked a question or made some remark as it was her practice to do each time that she snuffed the candle—the snuffing being her duty at these evening readings.

"She was a regular chapel-goer too—I mention it because it is connected with something that is to follow, and I can see us now in my mind's eye as we used to troop out of a Sunday morning dressed in our best. She had a little pew of her own that just held us two. 'Not, Jim,' as she once explained to me, 'as I'm above the free seats; but the minister has to depend a good deal upon the lettings, and even a preacher of the Word has to think about making ends meet as well as other people, and if he has to think too much of that he can't think enough of other matters, which is a bad thing for his congregation as well as himself. For that reason it's your duty to pay for your seat if you can manage it at all; that's live and let live, as the saying is, don't you see?' And I answered that I did see, though I'm afraid I was not very clear upon the point at the time. Her chapel-going was no mere form. With her hymn-book before her, and her heavy tortoiseshell-rimmed spectacles on her nose, she lifted up her voice boldly in the singing; her Amens were loud and fervent; and, though she was ignorant and had certainly not the gift of tongues, her voice was sometimes to be heard at the evening prayer-meetings. Her one idea of pleasure was a chapel tea-party, and though necessarily a small, she was always a cheerful giver to the collections that were frequently made. In short, though only a poor illiterate washerwoman, 'Sister Simpson' was somewhat of a personage among the congregation to which she belonged.

"There was a school in connection with the chapel, and there, by the time I was thirteen, I picked up the rudiments of a good plain education. Through the influence of a foreman, for whom my aunt washed, I was then taken as office-boy into the Stores' Department in a Government establishment. I suppose I gave satisfaction, for by the time I was sixteen my wages were sufficient to keep me respectably, and on my twenty-first birthday I was in a position to say that my aunt should slave at the wash-tub no longer, but simply manage the household. In the meantime I had joined a Mechanics' Institution, and read a good deal; I belonged to a Debating Society, in which friends said I was by no means the worst speaker, and—a thing of which my aunt was prouder than all the rest—I was actively engaged as a Sunday-school teacher at her chapel. Among the teachers was an exceedingly pretty girl, the daughter of a moderately well-to-do tradesman. I was not the only one that fell in love with her, but I proved to be the favoured suitor, and after a time we became regularly engaged. I was received at her father's house as her accepted lover, and I took her to my aunt's as my wife that was to be. On the very first occasion I saw that she did not like my aunt, but took a dislike to her. From words and hints dropped at various times, I found that she considered her old-fashioned and vulgar, and was inclined to be ashamed of her. At first I tried to reason her out of this prejudice, but finding that this only made matters worse, I avoided the subject.

"At length, however, when we came to speak definitely of being married she brought the point to a crisis. After a good deal of argument, and beating about the bush, she spoke out most unmistakably. She wouldn't, she said, live under the same roof with that horrid old woman, and so I must choose between my aunt and her. Well, I loved her very dearly, but not less dearly in another way did I love the woman who had been a mother to me. Without hesitation, without a quiver of the lip or a shade of either anger or reproach in my voice, I spoke the words that were to part us for ever. 'So be it then,' I said, 'I do choose, and I choose to stand by the woman who from infancy has stood by me; a woman to honour, not to be ashamed of, and who, homely as she is, is at heart as noble a woman as any breathing.'

"I meant what I said, and I knew even while I was speaking them that the words would make me a lonely man, I did not then regret what I had done, or at any other time wish it undone. I never let my aunt know why the affair was broken off—the knowledge would have made her uncomfortable."

This portion of Old Bible's life history, though containing nothing specially striking, I had listened to with a considerable feeling of interest. Still it was not exactly the sort of thing I had expected to hear, or that I was most wishful to learn something about, and so, after a brief pause, I asked—

"How did the Buildings here come to fall into their present condition?"

"The explanation is very simple," he answered. "The work in which the bulk of those living in the Buildings in its respectable days were engaged was stopped. Hundreds of men were thrown out of employment, and there being no work of the same kind to be got anywhere near, they had to go elsewhere. Nearly every house in the Buildings was left empty, and they remained empty so long that at last the landlord was fain to lower the rents and take whatever tenants offered. The first of the new-comers were very poor, the sort of people who live a family in a room and have a lot of ragged, dirty children, who run about the street regardless of whom they annoy or what mischief they get into. But after a while there came into one of the houses a couple of families, who, though calling themselves costermongers, were really thieves of the type known as farmyard poachers. They had a fast-trotting pony—which they stabled in the kitchen—and a light trap, with which they used to go out on night expeditions to plunder market gardens and farmyards. So much was well enough known, but they conducted their operations so cleverly that though the police came after them several times, they could never succeed in substantiating a charge against them. Getting their stock in this way, they made a goodish bit of money, the greater part of which they spent in drink, and being quarrelsome and riotous they soon made things so 'hot' for their neighbours that the more peaceably disposed among them were driven away. They were replaced by a worse class of tenants, who, in their turn, drove away the decenter sort, and so matters went from bad to worse, till the place became what it is—a refuge for criminal men and lost women, the terror and disgrace of the district."

Again, what Old Bible had said had been interesting enough in itself, but it had not explained the point about which I was chiefly curious, namely, why Braidy himself should be living in such a spot, and, with a view to leading him to that subject, I observed—

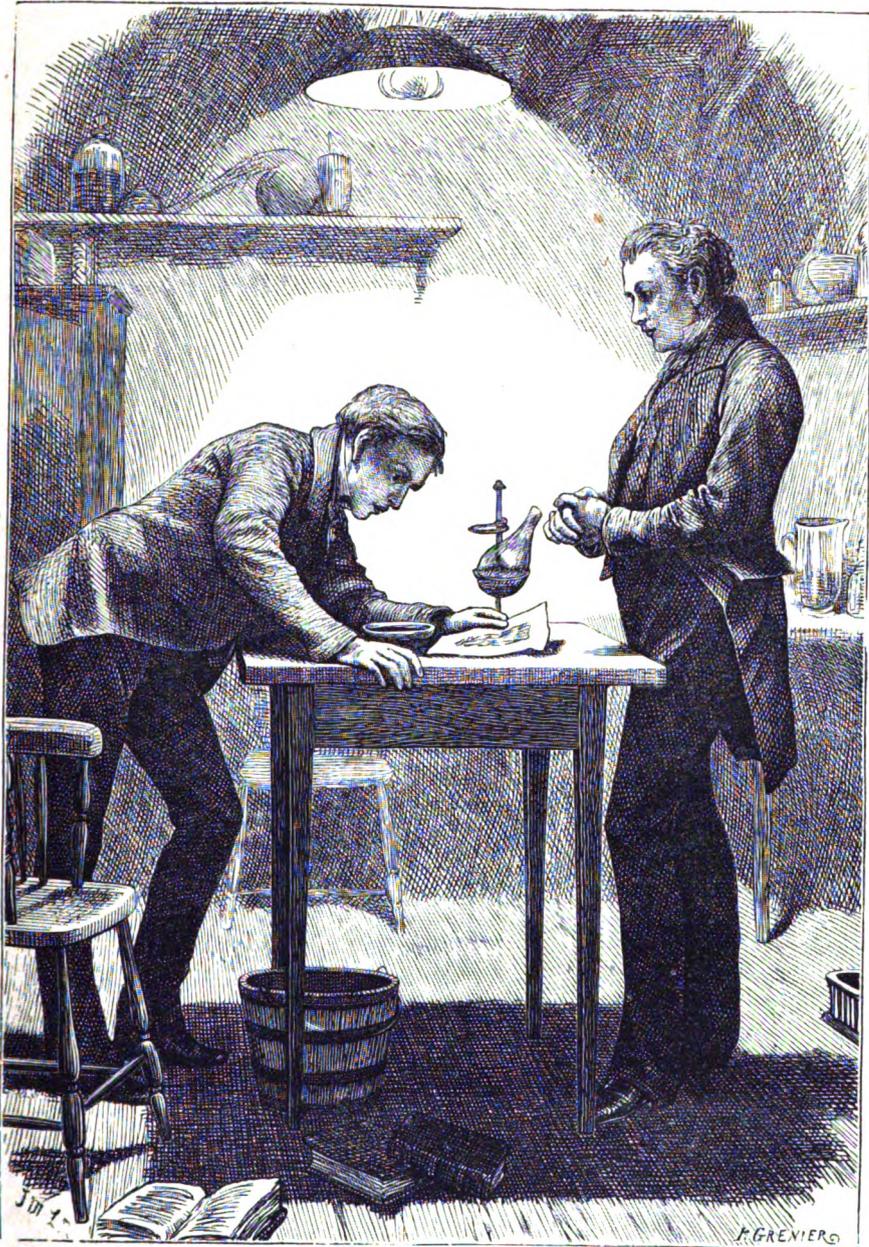

"Well, it appears you held your ground against all comers."

"I did," he said, smiling with a good-humoured knowingness of expression, "and now I'll tell you how that came about. It was through a feeling made up of indolence of disposition, force of habit, and aversion to 'bother,' and afterwards it was through my feeling called upon to stay, and providentially, as I think, the last-named feeling became operative just at the time when things had reached such a pass as to have conquered the first feeling. When, like others in the street, I was thrown out of employment by the closing of the establishment in which I had been engaged I was a middle-aged man, and was at the time just recovering from the accident that caused my lameness. I was alone in the world, and was of the type that really thinks 'man wants but little here below.' I was entitled to a small pension, had saved a few hundred pounds, and was, by means of clubs, provided for the rainy day of sickness. So, as I had no other situation in view, was troubled with no ambition, and had no greater idea of pleasure than being allowed to potter about at will, I made up my mind that I would lie by for a bit. I took to going in the mornings to the reading-room of the Mechanics' Institution, at first for the purpose of looking over the advertisements of 'Situations Vacant,' but soon I got acquainted with a set of old fellows who, despite the institution rule of silence discussed as well as read the news of the day, and by-and-by I became one of them. In the afternoon I would go for a walk, or sit down with a book according as the mood took me, and in the evening I would either read on or go out to some lecture or meeting connected with the institution, or to my chapel. Finding this style of life very pleasant, and a situation very difficult to get, and being, according to my plain notions, secure against want, I gradually gave up the idea of going to work again. Meanwhile, the Buildings had been so degenerating that they were no longer a suitable place of residence for a honest, peace-loving person who had the means of living elsewhere, and I was constantly saying that I would get away. But I had been there many years, I was used to my landlady—one of the few respectable inhabitants who had remained—and she to me; I had my books and everything comfortably around me, and I disliked the idea of going into a new household unused to my ways, which I know some people would have considered eccentric, and what was of more immediate consequence, troublesome, for your ordinary landlady will tell you that above all things she detests a man pottering about the house in the day-time.

"So it came about that while I was constantly saying I really must clear out, I delayed taking action. At last, however, the drunkenness and ruffianism, the night rioting, woman-beating, shoutings of murder, smashings of windows, and so forth, became so rampant, that I screwed my courage to the moving point. I was devoting my afternoon walks to a search for fresh lodgings, and had already partly decided upon a place, when the event occurred that led to my changing my mind and coming to the conclusion that I was called upon to stay in the Buildings.

"One winter's night, or rather morning, for it was in the small hours, I was awoken by a sharp but cautious knocking at the street door. I lay still a while to hear whether my landlady would answer, and finding that she didn't, I got out of bed and opened my window. It was very dark, and I could just make out the figure of a man standing below. He had heard the window open, and in a gruff undertone said—

"CROOKED PLACES."

"I want to speak to Mr. Braidy."

"You are speaking to Mr. Braidy," I answered, and before I could ask what he wanted with me, he put in—

"I'm in luck so far, I thought it was the old woman."

"As he spoke he turned on a dark lantern, and by its light I recognised one of the greatest ruffians in the Buildings, a fellow known as Gipsy Johnson, the leader of a gang who went about at nights stripping roofs of lead, and untenanted houses or unfinished buildings of brass, or other metal fixtures.

"My first feeling on seeing him was one of alarm, and I daresay my face showed it, for he said in a tone meant to be reassuring—

"I begs yer pardon for knockin' of yer out, guv'nor; but it's a case of needs must, as yer may say, and there's no harm meant to you; honour bright on that!"

"Well, but what do you want with me?" I asked.

"He seemed to consider for a moment, and then in the tone of a man who had come to a decision with himself, answered—

"Well, the shortest way will be to tell the truth; and so here goes, for time's precious. Our lot was doing a strip in a empty house, and just as we were a packin' the swag we was fluttered by a blue, and in making a bolt Caroty Blake tumbled smash out of a second-floor window. We picked him up alive, and we've managed to carry him home, but he's booked for kingdom-come as certain as if it had killed him on the spot, and knowin' as he's done for, pore chap, he's a takin' on badly, which perhaps any of the rest of us would do the same. He's a cryin' out for a parson, but none on us know'd where one lived, and agen we could a ferreted one out and a persuaded him to trust hisself down here it would be all over, for it don't want no doctor to see as he'll be a dead man within the hour. It comed into my head though as how you was a square party and a go-to-meetinger, which I'd seen you myself stumpin' off with yer books under yer arm. So says I to him, 'I don't see my way for to gettin' a regular parson, but there's Braidy as lives in the street here, he's a proper religious chap according to all accounts, and after all a parson couldn't be much more. I'll knock him up if you like.'

'Do, for God's sake!' he says, 'don't let me die here with no one better than myself to say a word to me.' So here I am to ask you to go in to him; and look here, meanin' no offence, if yer religion is worth anything you'll go, for beside the way he's takin' on in his mind, there is only a old woman with him. We've sent for a doctor, but he ain't come yet, and as what's happened to Carroty will blow the gaff on us, we must step it; the others have gone, and now, as I've done what I promised, I'm off.'

"I'm telling you all this calmly," Braidy went on, "but it passed much more quickly between Gipsy Johnson and me. I was dressing before he had finished speaking, and in a very few minutes after he had gone I was with the dying man. He lay moaning on a bed which nearly filled the little room, while leaning over him with one hand on the bed, and the other holding aloft a spluttering tallow candle stuck in a bottle, was the old woman spoken of by Gipsy. With the hand on the bed forming, so to speak, a pivot, she was swaying slowly to and fro, evidently muddled with drink and fright. On hearing me enter she managed to straighten and steady herself, and in a tone of relief exclaimed—

"'Oh, dear, I'm so glad you've come, I can't make him out a bit, I do believe he's a going off he's 'ead, and in course I couldn't manage him myself; they say—'

"'Who has come?' he asked suddenly, but speaking in a faint tone and without opening his eyes.

"'Why, you know,' she answered; 'the square seller as Gipsy went arter.'

"He opened his eyes on hearing this, and murmuring, 'You are very kind,' motioned me to the bedside, and obeying him, I could see by the dim light of the candle—no, I was in such matters at that time—that he was indeed nigh unto death. I needn't go into the details of what passed. There was the usual terror and hopelessness, the usual questions—was there, could there be any chance for the like of him? what should he do? would I pray for him? would I teach him how to pray? would I read him something out of the Bible? and so forth. His was a very common story in another respect too, namely, that it was 'the drink' that had brought him to crime. He was utterly ignorant as regarded education, but he must have had a fair share of natural understanding, and power of observation, and I always remember what he said on this point of the drink. 'There's plenty,' he said, 'as'll tell you they was fust druv to steal through hunger, and very likely many on 'em was in want when they laid hands on what wasn't their own, but if you on'y knew all you'd find that drink had in one way or another done the biggest share in bringing on the want with most of 'em. If it hadn't been for drink I might 'a lived and died a 'onest labourin' man as my father did before me. I was a honest working chap till I took to drinking, and then it was all up with me. I drank myself out of work and out of character, and then of course I got hard up, and I actually was in want when I did my fust bit o' thieving, but I was in drink at the very time I did it, and spent most of what I got by the job in drink. I've heard talk of the devil fishing for souls; if he does you may take my sinful word for it drink is his favourite bait."

"Coming from such a man and under such circumstances, those were expressions to be remembered," I said.

Braidy nodded assent, and then went on: "I spoke to him," he said, "in such a manner as it was given me to do, and when about three-quarters of an hour after my arrival had passed away, he was calmer and seemed more hopeful than he had been when I came. I trust that his late repentance was acceptable. I went back to my own bed full of thought. The general conclusion to which my reflections led me, was that the life I had been leading latterly, and which I had intended to continue to lead, though pleasant to myself, was such as I had scarcely a moral right to lead, being as it was utterly useless to my fellow-men; while here I thought was a way pointed out to me in which I might be of use. I determined that I would remain in the Buildings, and try as far as in me lay, and as opportunity should offer, to bring my neighbours to a sense of better things. At first I was very enthusiastic in my new resolution. I gave them tracts, forced myself upon them both in and out of season, and tried to get up open-air preachings among them. But it wouldn't do. I soon found that if I was to do any good among them at all, I must do it, not as I would, but as I could;—as they would let me. At ordinary times they wouldn't listen to 'patter' as they call it; but in times of sickness and death they took to sending for me; and, acting to the best of my judgment, I learned to restrain myself and wait till I was sent for, and then when called upon to try and soothe the dying I was sometimes able to say a fruitful word to the living as well. My being called to see Carroty Blake proved a turning-point in my life, and since that night I can say that—

'By many a death-bed I have been,
And many a sinner's parting scen.'

And terrible partings they were to some of them, for it is most true that 'the way of transgressors is hard.' I remember——" Old Bible was proceeding, when we were disturbed by the sound of some one ascending the stairs, and the next moment Braidy's friend, Larry H——, entered the room. He was a middle-aged man, smart looking, with erect carriage, grizzled hair, smoothly shaven face, clearly cut features, and bright restless eyes. His clothes, though stylish as to cut, were decidedly shabby, despite the "furbishing up" that had evidently been bestowed upon them. In a word, his outward appearance was "seedy," and I was not long in discovering that Shiny Smith had done him no injustice in describing him as "bouncing" and talkative. He slapped Braidy upon the back, and was very effusive in expressing himself "delighted" to meet me. I soon made out that he had in a great measure invited himself upon this occasion. A minor parochial office was vacant, and he was among the candidates for it, and to ascertain whether I had any influence in the matter was palpably the chief object of his visit. He had been canvassing those with whom the election lay, and professed to be astonished to find that they had been unable to realise that he had been conferring an honour upon them by offering himself for so humble an office. If they would only have given him ten minutes each, he went on, he could have demonstrated to a mathematical certainty that they ought to give him the place, and that he was fifty times a better man than the one whom he had reason to believe they did intend to elect. He could get "quoires" of testimonials from people about, he continued, but did I think it would be better for him to get "one master-testimonial signed by a score or so of Members of Parliament and the like." He asked the question with the most matter-of-fact air, and taking the same tone I answered that I thought the master-testimonial would be the best if he could get such signatures as he spoke of. There would be no difficulty about that, he answered, loftily. Though he had been down in the world of late years, he was well connected, had in better days largely devoted himself to literature, and had at one time or another submitted some of his writings to most of the men of note in the religious and political world.

Had his writings been published then?

No, they hadn't been brought out; they were over the heads of your general reader, and so publishers did not care for them. But he had sent the manuscripts to public men who could not but have been influenced by them, and speaking of that, he might say that some of them had been published after a fashion; for editors, though refusing his articles, had not scrupled to appropriate his ideas. He cited a number of what he chose to consider cases in point, and then proceeded to tell a story so richly illustrative of the overweening self-esteem characterizing him as to be worth relating. Having premised that politically he was "a scathing, he might say, an annihilating writer," he went on to state that he sent an article condemnatory of the character and policy of a prominent public man, to a well-known weekly newspaper. As after a considerable lapse of time it was not printed, he wrote for it to be returned. Getting no answer to his letter, he called at the office, and obtaining no satisfaction there, he resolved to "waste a cane on that same editor's carcase." Armed with a cane, he accordingly paraded in front of the office for some hours; but the editor not coming forth, he went to the police-court to apply for a summons against him. Being asked the name of the person against whom he wanted the summons, he found that he could not give it, and was so enraged at finding himself baffled at every step, that, cane in hand, he rushed back to the office and attempted to force his way to the editor's room. He was prevented from doing so: but was also promised that his manuscript should be looked out and sent back to him; and two days later he received it. But of course by that time it had served the purpose for which it had been kept back.

"What might you suppose that purpose to have been?" I asked.

"Why, don't you see!" he exclaimed. "It was made use of to put the screw upon ——" (naming the statesman reflected upon). "It would be taken down to him, and he would be told, 'Now here is an article that would be a death-blow to you as a public man; if it is printed, down you go. Whether it is printed or not lies with yourself—you understand.'"

To have tried to convince the man that he was talking arrant nonsense would have been simple waste of time, and I did not attempt it. After a number of fruitless endeavours to bring the conversation back to the point at which it had been interrupted by the entry of Larry, I at last succeeded in my object.

"Yes, I should say that Braidy had witnessed some as curious death-bed scenes as any man living," said Larry, commenting upon an observation of mine, "and heard some strange confessions too; eh, Braidy?"

"I have heard enough," answered Braidy sadly, "to convince me that it is often but too literally true, that 'the heart is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked.'"

"Have you shown this gentleman your cabinet of relics, as I call them?" asked Larry, who now that he had been induced to turn to the subject of Braidy's position in the Buildings, seemed disposed to further my views.

"No. I scarcely thought it worth while," answered Braidy with a slight smile.

"What are they?" I asked.

"Well, they are a few trifling—very trifling—things that some of those that I have been with in the hour of death, or relations for them, have given to me as remembrancers. I suppose the wicked, as well as the just, sometimes desire their memory to be kept green; especially those of the wicked who have fallen into, rather than been born to, evil courses; at least, those are the class who have given me the relics, as Larry calls them. There they are."

While speaking he had risen, and going to a box in a corner of the room, had taken a till out of it, and returning placed it upon the table before me as he finished his speech.

The contents of the till were certainly very trifling; but at the same time they formed a very curious little collection of articles. There were two or three cartes-de-visite; a German-silver thumb-ring, such as sailors sometimes wear; a necklet of coloured glass beads; a dark lantern, ingeniously constructed so as to fold, so that it could be easily carried in the waistcoat pocket; an ivory tobacconist in the shape of a hand and hammer, a fancy pipe, a snuff-box, two tobacco boxes, a crooked sixpence with a hole in it, that had once been treasured as a lucky sixpence, a pocket knife, a lock of hair, a packet of letters, and two small Bibles.

Each article had its story, most of them, however, being much alike as to their broad outline and the moral to be drawn from them. The story connected with the dark lantern was the most dramatic and "thrilling," being, as it was, the story of the life and death of a noted burglar, of whose "kit" of tools the lantern had formed part; but the saddest stories were those associated with the two Bibles. One of them, as an inscription of the fly-leaf showed, had been a Sunday-school prize to a young girl. She had been the child of decent labouring people, who had given her a plain education and set her a good home example. When she was of sufficient age, a respectable place of service was obtained for her, and her life seemed in every way to promise fair. But she had fallen—and as the event proved, fallen to rise no more. She had rapidly sunk lower and lower until, while still quite a young woman, she had found her lowest level as an associate of the ruffianly men and abandoned women who constituted the bulk of the inhabitants of Barker's Buildings. In these latter days she had taken to drinking, and in an evil moment, when maddened by drink and the ill-usage of a man with whom she consorted, she took poison with a fatal result. The Bible was the one memorial of the days of her innocence that she had treasured through all her downward career, and with her dying breath she had confided it to old Braidy's hands, as the only one she deemed fit and worthy to receive it.

The other Bible had been the parting gift of a mother to a favourite son about to go out into the world. He had broken that mother's heart—had brought her grey hairs with sorrow to the grave. He had "gone wrong"—had embezzled, and had been imprisoned for his crime. He had come out of gaol only to sink into the position of a habitual criminal, and being of a delicate constitution, that life had soon worn him out, and he was not quite thirty when he died. His last words were of thankfulness that his mother had died without seeing the worst to which he had come, and of bitter regret that he had not acted upon her advice and taken the Bible for his guide. He had meant, he said, that the book should be buried with him, because he had not thought he would again meet with one who was worthy to receive his mother's Bible; but, if Braidy would accept it, he would rather leave it with one who, as his dead mother had done, loved the Bible and lived by it. Braidy had accepted it, and it struck me that it was the one, of all his curious assortment of relics, that he had the most reverence for—and that for sake of the loving and disappointed mother whom he had never seen. From speaking of the death of such as the dwellers in Barker's Buildings, we came to speaking of their lives, and, as I expected, Old Bible's larger, longer, and more intimate experience of the class, confirmed my own opinion that their life is a hard one—not at all the rollicking life, even as regards mere material wants, that some people imagine it to be. It is true, he said, they have their feasts occasionally, but they have their fasts too, and as a rule, they are, in their own phrase, "hard up." Many of them will tell you, their life is a burden to them; they find by experience that suspicion haunts the guilty mind. They go in constant dread, "fearing each bush an officer," each unknown face a spy, each associate a traitor.

Of course on all these subjects Larry had had his say. Though friendships between men of widely different characters are by no means uncommon, the friendship between these two men—the one so humble and unaffected, the other so vain-glorious and forward—struck me as one of the most curious points in Old Bible's life. That their friendship was genuine there could be no doubt. Judging from circumstances that subsequently came to my knowledge, I am afraid that Larry did occasionally negotiate trifling loans with his friend, and was not always as strict in the repayment as he might have been; but still he had a true affection for the old man, a warm admiration of his many good qualities; while Braidy was disposed to look upon Larry as an unappreciated genius.

When I took my departure well on in the evening, I left the two still together, and just entering upon the discussion of a theory of Larry's, to the effect—so well as I could make out—that poverty was an artificial evil, a thing which had no right to be, and which, were Larry allowed to witch the world with noble statesmanship, would speedily be numbered with the things of the past.

In conclusion, I may be allowed to remark that the life of such a man as Braidy is at once answer and rebuke to the question, "What good can one person do?" so often asked by people desirous of excusing themselves from labouring and sacrificing to help the needy and raise the fallen.

THE LEPERS' LESSON.

BY THE LATE THOMAS GUTHRIE, D.D.

"QUEM deus vult perdere, prius dementat," was the proverb in which the heathen embodied their views of men acting against their manifest interests. Such outrageous folly they attributed to the intervention of the gods; saying, to turn their Latin proverb into our mother-tongue, "Whom God designs to ruin he first makes mad." And Holy Scripture has words much to the same effect. "Stay yourselves and wonder," is the exclamation of Isaiah; "cry ye out, and cry; they are drunken, but not with wine; they stagger, but not with strong drink. For the Lord hath poured out upon you the spirit of deep sleep, and hath closed your eyes;—and the vision of all is become unto you as the words of a book that is sealed, which men deliver to one that is learned, saying, Read this, I pray thee: and he saith, I cannot, for it is sealed: and the book is delivered to him that is not learned, saying, Read this, I pray thee; and he saith, I am not learned."

There is a sense in which sinners, to use the heathen's expression, are mad. They are deaf to the voice of reason; arguments, however unanswerable, are of no avail; they are proof against the loudest and most solemn warnings; and are neither to be won by the goodness of God, nor subdued by the terrors of his law. In respect both of their character and of their fate they have their type in Benhadad, the king of Syria. He would not be turned from his fatal purpose, but rushed, like one blindfold, on his doom. "Who was the Lord, that he should serve him?" So he sat down before the walls of Samaria to besiege the city, and measure his strength with Jehovah, and learn to his cost, too late, alas! for his profit, as all God's enemies one day shall do, this truth: "Let the potsherd strive with the potsherd of the earth, but woe to the man that striveth with his Maker."

Benhadad, this king of Syria, had more than once made such skilful arrangements as could hardly fail to have caught his foe, the king of Israel. Somehow or other the bird had been warned, and escaped the net. In these circumstances, with plans that should have succeeded, and yet had been balked, Benhadad suspected that his secret had been betrayed for Hebrew gold. Certain that some one in his council was playing the spy and traitor, able in no other way to account for the discomfiture of his well-concerted plans, he said to his servants, "Will ye not show me which of us is for the king of Israel?" He received for reply an explanation of the mystery that would have warned him, unless he had been bent on his own ruin, to turn his arms against other enemies. "None, my lord and king," was the answer of one who vindicated the loyalty of himself and his companions, "None, my lord, O king, but Elisha the prophet, that is in Israel, telleth the king of Israel the words that thou speakest in thy bedchamber."

On hearing this, instead of turning from his purpose, Benhadad became more intent on it. Concluding that a man possessed of such mysterious and mighty power was in himself worth a host, being as valuable as a friend as he was formidable as an enemy, he resolved to seize on the person of the prophet; heedless of this, that if he could not entrap the man whom Elisha warned of his danger, he was less likely to entrap Elisha himself. "Go," he said to his servants, "spy where he is, that I may send and fetch him." They did; and the consequences were such as should have warned him to let Israel alone, and beware of rushing again on the bosses of Jehovah's buckler. His spies informed him that the prophet Elisha was lodged in Dothan. He dispatched a large force to that place, which it reached by a rapid night march; and the inhabitants woke in the morning to see, to their astonishment and terror, the walls of the city encompassed by a mighty host, that seemed to have sprung out of the earth, or dropped from the skies. Seized with the common panic, Elisha's servant rushed into his master's presence, crying, "Alas, my master, how shall we do?" Nor did he wait long for an answer. The prophet opened his eyes to behold another host there besides that whose banners were flaunting and spears were gleaming in the morning sun. The mountain side was all ablaze with chariots and horses, not of flesh, but of fire. God had sent a host from heaven to cover his servant's head; and in an instant the forces of Benhadad were smitten helpless.

Woe, indeed, to the man that striveth with his Maker. "Smite the people, I pray thee, with blindness," cried Elisha, and in answer to his prayer, the Power that instantly opened the eyes of his servant to see things invisible, instantly closed those of all this host to sun and city, earth and sky, friend and foe—all things visible. Thus this single man took an army captive; and, strange spectacle to see, with his staff in his hand, and Elijah's mantle on his shoulders, he places himself at their head, marching them right off into the presence of the king of Israel. So soon as they were conducted into the lion's den, how great was their astonishment! Their eyes being as suddenly opened as they had been shut, they find themselves within the walls of Samaria; in the presence of the king of Israel; surrounded by troops who but wait the signal to cut them in pieces; and now abject terror succeeds astonishment as, knowing that their doom hangs on his lips, they hear the king say to that terrible prophet,

"My father, shall I smite them?" These heathen had seen the terror of the Lord, they were now to see his goodness; goodness that, in this case as in every other, should have led to repentance. Their soul escaped as a bird out of the fowler's snare. "Thou shalt not smite them," replied Elisha; "set bread and water before them, that they may eat and go to their master, and drink"—which they did, to relate events calculated by their terrors to persuade, and by their goodness to melt the heart of Benhadad.

A signal deliverance or a great danger will produce serious and favourable impressions for a time on the most thoughtless and ungodly. So it befell Benhadad; but, as happens with other impenitent sinners, his goodness passed away like the morning cloud and the early dew. Ere long he is the old man again; and his grasping ambition breaking out afresh, he bursts in on the land of Israel with a host that sweeps all before it. They shall not escape him now, for he has both king and prophet now shut up within the walls of Samaria. In consequence of this blockade, there was, as the story tells us, "a great famine in Samaria," as otherwise it could not be, no man being allowed to get out and no provisions to get in.

Fancy paints no picture so terrible to a father's imagination as children with faint cries, hollow eyes, faded cheek, and emaciated forms, perishing through famine. It is terrible to imagine ourselves woke at dead of night by a cry that the ship is sinking, and then father, mother, and children clinging to each other, one sad group, and waiting the time till the vessel giving a sudden lurch, buries them in one watery grave; yet that is but a brief struggle,—one wild scream, one bubbling cry, and all is over. It is terrible also to think of plague or pestilence entering our dwelling, snatching away child after child, till one funeral procession succeeding another the house is emptied and the grave is filled, and an oppressive silence reigns where 'pattering feet and infants' voices, and the merry laughter of boys and girls once filled the rooms. Yet to harrow one's feelings to the utmost we must imagine a family dying of famine,—the roses fading from every cheek, the flesh wasting from the bones, the cries of the infant that hangs on a withered and empty breast, the silent sufferings of those who, despairing of relief, ask for none; and the moans of children, who turn their sunken eyes and stretch out their skinny hands with cries for bread to a mother who has none to give them. Alone—whatever be the pangs of hunger—suffering them alone, I can fancy a good man, in the majesty and greatness of his faith, soaring above life's darkest clouds, and saying, as he basks in the realms of perpetual sunshine—in the effulgent light of God's reconciled countenance, — “Though the fig-tree should not blossom, and there be no fruit on the vine, though the labour of the olive should fail and the fields yield no meat, though the flock should be cut off from the fold and there be no herd in the stall, I will rejoice in the Lord, and joy in the God of my salvation!” But to be surrounded by our nearest and dearest pining before our eyes under the pressure of famine, to hear the cries, as they grow fainter and fainter, of those dear ones who are dying of hunger, were enough, one would think, to drive a father mad.

Yet, what fancy shudders at in the picture was a reality in Samaria. Men lost their reason, women their tenderness, the mother forgot her sucking child and had no compassion on the fruit of her womb, and deeds of horror were done in that city under the pressure of a famine, and as the fruit of war, which we cannot read without praying for the time when the sword shall be turned into a ploughshare, and the spear into a pruning-hook, and wars shall cease.

It has been said that man's extremity is God's opportunity. So it fell out in Samaria, when four lepers read to themselves, and to us also, a lesson we should do well to learn. Having discovered that through a remarkable interposition of Providence the Syrian host was destroyed, the blockade was broken up, and with all the spoil of the Syrians left behind them, Samaria had only to come forth from her gates to find in the deserted camp an ample supply for all her wants. These lepers, so soon as they had gratified their own appetite with Syrian luxuries, and their avarice with the spoils of war, turned in pity to the city, and commiserating the condition of the thousands perishing within its walls, they took shame to themselves, and said one to another, “We do not well; this is a day of good tidings, and we hold our peace; if we tarry till the morning light, some mischief will come upon us; now, therefore, come that we may go and tell the king's household.” So, as the history goes on to tell us, they came and called unto the porter of the city, and they told him, saying, “We came to the camp of the Syrians, and, behold, there was no man there, neither voice of man, but horses tied, and asses tied, and the tents as they were.”

1. In the gospel of Jesus Christ we, as these lepers had, have good tidings to communicate to others, and should learn the lesson their conduct teaches.

The sun had set once more on the famine-stricken city. Amid the fading lights of day the sentinels had been planted for the night; and having cut off all hope of escape from the inhabitants of Samaria, the Syrian host had retired to their tents. All of a sudden, a strange noise breaks on the silence of the night. In the name of heaven and earth, what is that? It is not the wail of the famishing, but the hurried rush of many thousand feet, the rattle and crash of armour, the grinding of chariot wheels; mingled with the snorting of horses and the shouts of men. It waxes stronger and stronger: comes nearer and nearer, like the roar of the ocean, pouring on their astonished camp. The outposts fall back, the alarm spreads; it is no time to call a council. Confusion, aggravated by the darkness, fills the ranks; and a cry being raised that the kings of the Hittites and Egyptians—the allies of Israel—were on them, a panic seizes the bravest, and each man intent only on saving himself, one wild crowd—king, counsellors, captains, men-at-arms, women, and slaves—they fly discomfited by a sound, or rather by Him who made the bravest hearts melt within them for fear. “There were they in great fear where no fear was;” at a sound “they were troubled and hasted away; fear took hold upon them there, and pain as of a woman in travail!” So it befell the hosts of Syria. The lepers sought that proud host at night, and the Samaritan sought in the morning, and it could not be found.

Separated from the society of their fellow-men, four lepers sat on an evening at one of the gates of the city. They were starving, and having no hope of relief in their present circumstance, argued thus with themselves:—“Why sit we here until we die? Should we be admitted into the city the famine is there; there we die, and if we sit here we die: one and only one chance is left; let us go over to the camp of the Syrians; they may spare our lives and allow us to share in their abundance; if not, we are none the worse, we but die!”

We but die—suffer a few short-lived pangs, and there is “rest for the weary”—the body is at rest, and the soul in heaven. Such thoughts have inspired the martyr with indomitable courage; and feeling that his persecutors, although they could kill the body, could do no more, he has overcome the fear of death and trode the reeking scaffold with a firm step. Inspired with the courage of despair at least, reckoning that no worse thing could befall them than that impending over them while they sat starving by the gate, the four lepers rose, and passing the lines, they entered the enemies' camp; wondering why neither outpost nor sentinel challenged. The camp was there, but no enemy; frightened with a sound—as they fancied, the midnight march of a host, the allies of Israel come to raise the siege, man and woman of them had fled, leaving all behind.

What a revel and rejoicing to the poor lepers! They fall like hungry wolves on the plenty spread out before their eyes. Seated at tables prepared for other guests, pledging each other in golden wine-cups, they gorge to the full, and then proceeding to pillage tent after tent, they load themselves with wealth. Betimes their thoughts turn to the city—its horrible and unheard-of sufferings, the homes where children lay dying in their mothers' lap, where hunger had banished sleep, and the wail and moan of famine, wrung from blackened lips, filled the midnight air. Humanity, their pity and patriotism, were kindled. They felt their selfishness a reproach. They might and should carry the good news to their miserable countrymen to the miserable city, and burst in on households dying of famine, with the tidings that the enemy had fled, leaving abundance behind them of provisions and wealth—enough for all and to spare. Yielding to such humane and right convictions, they drag themselves from the tables, and tossing away the foaming cup, lest any should perish by the delay they hurry off to the city, saying, "We do not well; the day is a day of good tidings, and we hold our peace."

Blessed tidings theirs, and a blessed sight next day, to see the wine-cup pressed to fainting lips, happy mothers hanging with hope over their dying children, and fathers weeping for very joy as they blessed God for the food, which has come to them like manna from the skies. But we have still better tidings, and do not well if we hold our peace, nor go to others to tell how God has interposed to save them—that He is not willing that they, though the chief of sinners, should perish; that He so loved the world as to give up his only begotten Son that whosoever believeth in Him might not perish, but have everlasting life; that Jesus died on the cross to save them, and that now there is forgiveness enough for all—bread enough at our Father's table, and room enough for all in our Father's house, in the many mansions which Jesus has ascended to prepare for his people's coming. It is an affecting, and yet a blessed spectacle to carry food to a house where we had been horrified to find neither bed, nor bread, nor Bible. To still the cries of hunger, and see hollow-eyed and famishing children fall on the food our bounty has provided, is a feast worth any cost, and such as epicureans never enjoyed. But it were a better and still more blessed sight, when we had carried the message of salvation to some poor perishing sinner to see it, like a rope thrown to a drowning man, thankfully, gladly, eagerly accepted; while on us, the instruments—the happy and honoured instruments—of bringing a sinner to the Saviour, were poured in grateful prayers the blessings of one that was ready to perish.

2. We commit a great crime unless we communicate these blessings to others.

"We do not well! We do not well!" Gentle terms these; much too gentle to describe their guilt, had these lepers tarried in the camp to eat and drink and hold their peace. Close by them lay the city from within whose walls, in the stillness of the night, they may have heard the moans of suffering, varied with the shouts and shrieks of those who fought over a morsel of bread; and had they tarried by the wine-cup, or after a full repast thrown themselves on the royal couch to draw its silken curtains and go to sleep, saying, "It will be time enough in the morning to carry the news to the city," God, and man also, had held them guilty of the death of all who perished that night of hunger. Besides, within these miserable walls pined many a mother and tender child, whose feeble life stood more in need of immediate help than theirs.

There is a most generous and gallant deed—one of many such recorded of British sailors—a castaway in a boat on the wide waste of waters, without water or food, some lying dead, others dying, and all, almost without a hope of meeting a ship or reaching shore, he had reserved for himself, with much pains of self-denial, a morsel of food. Carefully concealing it from the knowledge of others, it was reserved for the last extremity. And along with him and others in that boat sat a mother and her boy—a sweet child, who lay moaning in her lap with his dying head resting on her bosom. With nothing wherewithal to still his cry or moisten those parched and blackened lips, in vain the poor mother strove to sooth her child; but not in vain were her sad and motherly efforts observed by this rough and hardy seaman. He forgot his own in these greater sufferings. He could die like a man, but his heart gave way before a sight so touching, and ere the cry of "A sail! a sail!" on the far horizon had revived the dying and raised hopes in every bosom, which God's good providence fulfilled, his hand had sought the precious, hidden, hoarded morsel—a shell-fish which he drew from its concealment, to place, amid the silent gratitude of a dying mother, in the mouth of the dying child. And it had been a noble thing to tell of these four lepers, not that they did eat and drink, and enriched themselves with gold and silver and went and hid it, but how, taking only one morsel of bread and one cup of wine to lend them strength, they left all the spoil to hurry off to the city with the blessed tidings; not saying as they did, when they had ate like gluttons, and quaffed the wine-cup, and hoarded up the gold, "We do not well; this is a day of good tidings, and we hold our peace!" Better spake Eliezer, when brown with the dust, and worn with the toil of travel, he reached the home of Rebekah in search of a wife for Isaac, saying, in reply to her father's proffered hospitality, "I will not eat till I have told mine errand."

But though the lepers did not rise to that height of humanity, generosity, and patriotism, though they did not play a noble part, they did well. I wish we did all as well! How shall these lepers stand up in judgment against the men of this generation? Absorbed in the pursuit of wealth, in heaping up gold though they know not who shall gather it, they have no pitiful or Christian compassion for the thousands that, near or far away, are perishing for lack of the bread that never perisheth! With such tidings to tell of the pity, the mercy, and the wondrous love of God, of a Saviour, and the blessed story of the Cross, it is not well, but the worst of crimes if we hold our peace. Who would, if he saw the fire bursting from a neighbour's house at the dead of night?—or a blind man with but another step between him and the edge of the dizzy precipice?—or one who, swept off his feet by the red roaring flood, was borne away on its bosom, either wildly crying for help, or—equally pitiful case—insensible, and unconscious of his danger? And if it is not those who kill the body but the soul, that are guilty of the greatest crime, of the greatest inhumanity, who that knows how they may be saved, should hold his peace, where souls are in danger—within the bosom of his family or anywhere beyond its circle, that his efforts and arm can reach? Let us, as we have freely received, freely give, in the bread of life, in the riches that take not to themselves wings and flee away, bestowing on others what enriches them and does not impoverish us; with our kindly warnings and expostulations, knocking at the door of man's heart, and with our prayers for a blessing knocking at the door of Heaven—ours the charity, that in the words of St. Paul "seeketh not her own."

3. To neglect the salvation of others is a sin which we may expect to be visited with retribution. When the lepers thought of the misery inside the city, the living spectres that walked her streets, and, brave to the last, manned her beleaguered walls, the dead, and the living loving ones who had no strength to bury them, the mother expiring with arms still encircling the wasted form of her lifeless babe, and babes attempting to draw nourishment from fountains death had sealed for ever, how some were praying for death, and others in their wild delirium cursing God and man and the day that they were born, their hearts reproached them. So under the sense of conscious guilt and dread of impending evil, they said one to another, "If we tarry till the morning light some mischief will come on us." What profit to them the gold, silver, and goodly raiment of their midnight plunder, if a people, indignant at their selfishness had seized these guilty wretches and hanged them up before the sun? Right or wrong, famine has driven men to seek even more terrible revenge. Does not history tell of one, who, to realise a still larger fortune when the famine grew harder, concealed great stores of corn in a city where the people were dying for food; and how, on discovering his treasures, they took him, and nailing him to the floor within sight and all but touch of his ill-hoarded stores they left him there, beside plenty, to die of want—in sight of food to pine slowly away—and learn as he suffered the kind of death his selfishness and avarice had inflicted on others. How true the proverb, "He that withholdeth corn, the people shall curse him!"

Ignorant of the value, and unconscious of the need of salvation, poor sinners may now reserve their curses for such as withhold from them the charities of the world—not those of the gospel, nor the bread which never perisheth, but that which perisheth in the using. So soon, however, as death has unsealed their eyes to the true relations and realities of things, what curses shall they pronounce on those who left them to perish in their sins! And though God's mercy in Jesus Christ be sufficient for the pardon even of so great a sin, and escaping the fate which the lepers dreaded, he should not even "chasten us in his hot displeasure," how painful and awful the thought that some lost soul, some one we tempted to sin and neglected to save, is now cursing us in hell! Fancy one, not one we loved and who loved us, but our bitterest foe, as he is dragged from the bar of judgment to the place of torment turning round on us in his despair, fixing on us looks of horror and hatred, to cry, "Had you done your duty I might have been saved! You left me to perish in my sins—gathering your cursed gold, indulging your appetite, taking your ease—you left me to perish; knowing my danger, you never warned me, nor entreated me, nor prayed with me, nor wept for me, nor told me how I might be saved."

Followers of Jesus, how different his bearing toward sinners!—the lovely, blessed, benevolent, beneficent spirit, of our humane as well as holy faith?—with such lessons as these—"Charity seeketh not her own"—"Let no man seek his own, but every man another's wealth"—"Look not every man on his own things, but every man on the things of others"—"Let the mind be in you which was also in Jesus Christ." Others' gain is yours; and by a benevolent law which makes a brother's case my own, the very efforts I put forth to bless others are made blessings to myself.

So it happened to the traveller who was pushing his perilous way in early spring along a pass among the higher Alps. Benumbed with cold, exhausted by his exertions, with no help nor human habitation near, a fatal sleep was stealing on his slow and tottering steps. Alarmed, he cried for help; but no other sound fell on his listening ear but the mocking echo of the rocks and the roar of the torrent that far below seemed like the dirge of death. A few steps, a few struggles more, and he had laid him down to sleep the sleep that knows no waking—but was saved. And how? At a turn of the road his eye fell on a snow-wreath that had something of the form of humanity. He bends over it to find there a fellow-creature in the last gasp of life. Though feebly, the heart is still beating. He forgets his own misery in pity for another; shakes off his lethargy, bends over the unconscious body, chafes into warmth the frozen limbs; and his efforts redoubled as colour returns to the cheek, at length a sigh escapes from the frozen lips, the eyes open, and he who was "ready to perish" rises to his feet to bless and embrace his benefactor.

His efforts on behalf of another he happily found to be not loss but gain to himself; his own cheeks were glowing with ruddy heat, his limbs had lost their numbness and regained their strength, his heart sent its tide of warmth through every limb and organ of his body; and resuming his journey with renewed vigour in the company of one his generous efforts had saved, he by-and-by hails his sweet mountain-home, and, safe in the arms and bosom of its happy family, is seated round the blazing logs to revive exhausted nature and relate the perils of his journey. Blessing another, he had blessed himself. And such is the reward with which God crowns every Christian effort. "There is that scattereth and yet increaseth. There is that withholdeth the hand, and it tendeth to poverty." Let us exhort one another daily. Let us live not for ourselves only, but for others, looking unto Jesus, to find in Him our pattern as well as our propitiation. Let us endeavour by the help of the Spirit of God to tread in his steps, to follow his example, and we shall find that he who converteth the sinner from the error of his way shall save a soul from death, and shall hide a multitude of sins. AND THEY THAT BE WISE SHALL SHINE AS THE BRIGHTNESS OF THE FIRMAMENT; AND THEY THAT TURN MANY TO RIGHTEOUSNESS, AS THE STARS FOR EVER AND EVER.

THE FISHERMAN'S PRAYERS.

OUR little craft left astern the grey crags and tawny beaches of Loch Carron, with their memories of "A Highland Question-Day," formerly depicted in these pages. Round the "Heads of Skye" we drifted to an anchorage in Loch Pooltiel, open to the Minch and the wild sea that sweeps that strait from Barra Head to Cape Wrath.

Through the summer day the breathless deep plashed wearily about the shores, but the dusky west betokened changing weather. Beyond Ben Eval and the Streak of Benbecula the sunset darkened, while about the verge of Harris touches brightened the northern gloaming; the Hebrides lay a violet belt between the sapphire of the heavens and the sea; and the Minch was tumbling and fretting in the breeze. It was freshening for a blow out of the west, and squalls were listing our little craft at her chains. Whether in the midnight we should run for Canna, weather Dunvegan Head, or drive upon the beach in-shore, left no long debate. The chain was shortened, the reefed canvas set, and the yacht got under weigh, but the sea lifted us shoreward in the shifty wind. With a blast the yacht gathered speed, and we fetched out under the dusky land. Black and angry the sea swept from Harris, thundering in the darkness and lashing white along the cliffs. From far Uist the smoke of the kelp fires was tainting the air, but the westerling wind would lift us round Dunvegan Head. We stayed and headed for the Point. Into our low canvas the spray was sweeping; but we were nearing the Head, and it might blow as it listed.

Suddenly the yacht lifted, a squall from the shore brought the wind ahead; we were laying for the Sound of Harris with the head-sea coming green across the windlass. With no star in all the sky it was freshening badly, and a harbour must be made at all hazards.

"For three nichts there's been a bricht star near the moon," said the skipper; "and I niver knowed that fail o' a gale. I wish we were in Maddy or the Kallin, for we winna wather Dunvegan Head this nicht!—There's a sail!" and he pointed through the darkness. The black canvas of a low set sail drove across our bow; we could hear shouts as the big lumbering skiff lifted with the sea and left a cloud of spindrift in her wake. "Up helm!" cried our skipper, and with our sail eased we were in the wake of the fishing-boat, running for shelter to the lochs of Uist. We had its shining trail against the dim canvas to guide us, as with anxious hearts we hurried for the land. The wind was again sweeping round with the hills and blowing off the Harris shore. "This is bad, bad!" said the skipper. "I donno if we'll fetch Loch Maddy, but we'll get the boom aboard and follow into some berth about the back of Ronay or the Kallin, for them east-country men are handy at knowin' holes to shove into and disappear like the craws when the wather breaks." The wind and the sea were gaining, and an hour sped slowly before we caught the loom of the land. With lowered canvas the skiff hung for us, and beam to beam we shot through the narrow sound. Through a turmoil of foam we were running, with the black rocks about us, and the roar of the sea in our ears. With a sudden luff the skiff run under a wall of rock, and following the fishermen's shout, our anchor fetched us up. The spent pulse of the sea lapped all about our haven, a mill-pond within hearing of the storm. And down the stony sides of Ben Eval came the north wind, rending the sea into flying drift, but harmless to hurt us. Lights were shining in the skiff, we forged alongside, and spoke to our friends.

"A bad nicht, but far be ye frae," was our salutation, spoken in the mellow tongue of the Moray coast; and the speaker added, "We were on our passage home, through the Frith, when it came in a lump upon us, and we ran back for a ken't harbour." We told our own trouble, and were invited aboard the fishing boat.

Against the dusky sky the fishing skiff's mast, some forty feet, loomed still higher; how she carried her canvas in such weather was wonderful. The rough decking was tumbled about; the sea had been sweeping over the gunwale from stem to sternpost. The broken water had washed the rough ballast as clean as the stones in a hill burn; nets, canvas, whatever lay about was drenched. One of the crew pumped constantly, while another—the water level with his sea-boots—bailed with a bucket. They had taken the sea in over their bow as badly as it had come over the stern—they had not "a dry stitch" in all the boat.

It was long before the damp matches would light the lamp under the fore-castle deck, the only safety for the open craft. When the glimmer of the light brightened we crawled into the fore-castle, where the crew slept. The den was blackened with tar, and through it the sea had been washing. Wet sacks, filled with wet heather, lay against the planks, and upon these some of the men rested. They were mostly fair, sandy-bearded men, with blue eyes and sharp noses. Under an old "south-wester" shone softer eyes—the hazel eyes of a nice-looking lassie, drenched and dripping like the men. Further from the light, another girl turned to look; she was fair, and freckled with the sun, and had her wet yellow hair bound not ungracefully about her head. A red cravat, a yellow oilskin jacket, a white handkerchief, gave dashes of colour to the limp figure. No art could have hit the chastened touches that faded into the blackness. At our surprise the girls smiled. Why they were there was soon explained. They were sisters to two of the crew, and had been to "keep house" for two crews at the Boisdale fishing. For a couple of months they had lived in the boat, or in the peat-built hut on shore, cooking and working for the toilers absent on the deep. Living without comfort or motherly care, their gentle voices had only softened the ways of those about them. There was no shelter in the boat but what was theirs; they had the coats and cravats of the mindful men about them; they were cared for as the gently nurtured never are cared for, since they never risk such danger.

Chilled and cold as all the crew were, our whisky flask was handed out. "Nae, thanks," said the fisherman, in return, handing back the flask; "nane here drink whisky, and we get on brawlies without it." The temptations of a "dram" could not be stronger, but they would not be tempted. Among the wet ballast, the fire-place—an old broken pot—was set up, and with trouble the wet peats were kindled. A kettle for coffee was set over the fire, and a slender store of sea biscuit was divided. Before the meal was begun, one of the men said, "We'll take the books."

From crannies behind boarding small hymn-books were brought out by the girls and the men. The books were drenched, were without boards, and the wet leaves were difficult to turn. The hymn was named and the first line sung. "Your owre heich, Wullie!" said one of the girls; to which Willie answered, "I'm nane owre heich, Mary!" and he continued to lead the tune. Under the lamp, in his red night-cap, he sat, with the dull light falling on his weather-beaten cheeks, his tawny beard, and worn oilskin. Beside him sat, as they best could, the other fishermen and the two girls bending towards the light. They were but rugged people to vulgar eyes.

While they sang, through their thin music broke the storm, deadening its pathos in the thunder of the squalls. And the stricken worshippers paused betimes to listen, with their voices silenced in the blasts from Ben Eval, blanching the Minch into spray.

With fervour the old man prayed their sins might be forgiven, and their hearts softened to God, and to one another. He prayed thankfully for the mercies shown to themselves; and it seemed as if that humble service, amid peril and hardship elsewhere unknown, bore another sense from the tutored words spoken in carpeted mansions.

The hot coffee was handed round in tin cans and such dishes as remained unbroken. It was some comfort in the cold and the wet, and the meal was further helped by timely supplies of bread and butter handed from the yacht by our own skipper. The fishermen laughed over the unexpected succour, and had pleasantries with the girls over their good appetites. There was no want of mirth among these Christian men; but their laugh was neither straitened nor boisterous; they were in all their ways as other men.

When their pipes were lighted we could tell them of later news than they had heard; of scant fishing at Campbelton, and of a heavy fishing at Dunbar. "That's what we have been waiting to hear," said one of the crew. "What say ye, lads, to take the Grangemouth Canal, and send the lassies home with the steamer?" "But fat ken ye of the road?" said one of the men. "Some o' us hae been to Lismore afore," he was answered. "But what about the Gulf?" said the dubious speaker, referring to the whirlpool of Corryvreckan, known as the "Gulf" all about the West Coast. "It is a bad place to fa' in wi'," one said. "It's no' to be recommended," our own skipper hinted, with some humour in his voice.

We offered them a chart; but a hand sketch would better suit their purpose. Not a bit of paper could be found but the blank leaf of the Bible; and not without doubt of irreverence was it torn out, to prevent the sketch being made while the paper was part of the volume. But the touch was not without its own suggestiveness.

At the forecabin stove of the yacht the two girls dried their clothes and warmed themselves. It was proposed they should keep the cabin for the night. "Nae, nae," said the captain of the crew; "the lassies are well enouch in their ain boat." And to press the invitation further would have been rude. But wet soldiers in the trenches were not in poorer shelter than the sisters of these fishermen, who were without thought of repining. In their own homes these fishermen's daughters are spoken of as exemplary, and we were ready to believe the fact. Hardship mates nearer with virtue than vice, and a life of fortitude grows fearless of temptation.

On their wet sacks, in their oilskins and sea-boots, the fishermen lay down to rest with the feeble lamp swinging over their bronzed faces, and the stars of the clearing heavens shining through the open seams of their shelter.

THE EDITOR'S ROOM.

I.—NOTES AND COMMENTS.

CHRISTIAN COMMEMORATION.

AFTER a great part of Christendom has just been engaged in commemorating two of the grandest events in Christian history, one naturally asks, What is the permanent result? It is surely reasonable after such a commemoration to expect to see more beauty, and smell more fragrance in the garden; if the south wind has blown, shall the trees of frankincense, the myrrh and olives, and all the chief spices not make their influence felt? Yet on the outer surface of what is called the Christian world, one finds but little change. It would be hard to say that society at large shows any sign of being more impressed with sin, or more alive to its obligation to the Redeemer, or more intent on a purer, less selfish, more godly and loving life at this time than at any other period of the year. The number, we fear, would be reduced in something like the proportion of Gideon's army if none were left but those whom each commemoration of Calvary and the Sepulchre urges steadily and visibly to a purer and better life. Yet, beyond doubt, no commemoration of the kind ever passes without some such results. Could we trace the history of the hidden life we should doubtless discover instances not a few of holy resolution and blessed change: men and women laying their lives at the feet of Him who gave his life for them. Who knows how many have at this time entered on this life of holy service, catching up the spirit of Him who came not to be ministered unto but to minister? Would only that such instances were the rule, not the exception, and that as the seasons roll on, we could see some visible progress towards a truly redeemed and risen world! Would that the vision of Him "who liveth and was dead and is alive for ever" would rouse a slumbering world, and a half-slumbering church, and urge them to pray for the coming of the Holy Ghost, like the little Christian band in the upper chamber. The change that would then come over the moral world would be but feebly shadowed by the beautiful transformation which the breath of Spring is now working in the world of nature.

THE NATIONAL CORNUCOPIA.

In its financial reckoning, the nation sticks to the old and, as we think, true plan,—beginning the year, not in the depth of winter, but in the dawn of spring. The first week of April strikes the national balance, and sets us forward on a new estimate of income and expenditure. Looking back, we find ourselves in receipt of a national income from four to five millions beyond what was estimated. It is a great sign of abundance, but as a great part of the income is derived from the duty on spirits, it is not a sign of abundance well applied. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, who might naturally be disposed to take the most hopeful view of the increase, finds himself obliged to rejoice with trembling; and while glad that the labouring masses have had so much more to spend, has had to regret that so many of them have spent it with but little wisdom. Lord Shaftesbury expresses his opinion that increased wages bring no increase of comfort, but rather an increase of misery, and refers to the testimony of an engineer who was induced to give an extra half-crown weekly to his workmen, and found that, in almost every case, it went to the public-house. Master engineers, however, are not likely to state the case either very accurately or very favourably for the men, and it ought to be admitted that a great body of the working class spend their earnings with admirable propriety. Lord Shaftesbury hit the nail on the head when he gave it as his conviction that self-control was one of the most indispensable lessons for the workman of the present day. Without this, indeed, his elevation is hopeless. If he cannot be brought to turn aside from that which is ultimately pernicious because for the moment it is agreeable, he can never rise. Self is often an ugly word; yet no threefold cord, constructed of human material, can be more serviceable than that formed by three members of the self family—self-respect, self-reliance, and self-control. Upper, middle, and lower classes alike need this cord; and they need it very specially at this time, when one of the greatest risks of the nation arises from prosperity ill employed.

SIR HENRY THOMPSON ON TEMPERANCE.

In our last number, we adverted to certain special efforts within the English Church on behalf of temperance. For the encouragement of these efforts, an eminent medical authority, Sir Henry Thompson, has written an important letter, giving a medical view of alcohol and its effects, worthy of the most earnest study of all. The matter belongs to what is beyond all doubt the true province of the physician, and not, like a suggestion on another subject commonly ascribed to the same gentleman, to a region beyond his proper beat. "I have long had the conviction," says Sir Henry, "that there is no greater cause of evil, moral or physical, in this country than the use of alcoholic beverages. . . . I have no hesitation in attributing a very large proportion of some of the most painful and dangerous maladies which come under my notice, as well as of those which every medical man has to treat, to the ordinary and daily use of fermented drink, taken in the quantity which is conventionally deemed moderate." He then expresses his great satisfaction at efforts being made against drunkenness in connection with the English Church, believing that no society in the world has power to do so much in this way, if it earnestly takes the matter up. Further, he expresses his belief that there is "no single habit in this country which so much tends to deteriorate the qualities of the race, and so much disqualifies it for endurance in that competition which in the nature of things must exist, and in which struggle the prize of superiority will fall to the best and to the strongest."

We are glad to observe the earnestness with which the Primate of England has taken up this matter. Though the line is one somewhat new to an archbishop, we are persuaded that it is entirely worthy of his earnest efforts. The advancement of a cause which pertains not to one section of the church only, but to humanity at large, is eminently suitable, and, we may add, truly honourable.

THE SCOTTISH SCHOOL BOARDS.

Many are the prophecies that have been hazarded during the last twenty years as to the probable effect of handing over to ratepayers the management of the parish schools and other schools in Scotland. The direst results have been apprehended by some, the banishment of religion from the schools, and the predominance of utter secularism and ungodliness. The result of the elections has quieted such fears. In the overwhelming majority of cases the School Boards elected consist of men and women favourable to the mode of instruction formerly prevalent in the schools. In cases where efforts have been made by secularists to get in, the result has in almost every case been defeat. In the large towns the Roman Catholics have obtained one or two members, the qualification of a four pound rent having admitted shoals of Irish voters, and the cumulative method of voting having enabled them to plump for their priest. But the general result is fitted greatly to reassure the friends of religious education. The conviction held by many that religion ought to be supported wholly and solely from private resources, has not been carried to the extreme of making public education wholly secular. Common sense has shown that tyranny of logic needs some check, and that any logical position that would exclude the Bible from the education of the young is an extreme position needing to be modified by more practical considerations.

The manner in which the School Boards will do their work, of course, remains to be seen. A great deal of trouble will be required, and some confusion may ensue before the new machinery gets into smooth working order. But a great opportunity presents itself of working out a system that will give to Scotland a complete education. Though the question of religious education has been the only one at the front in the election contests, the Boards must give very earnest attention to other questions, prominent among which is the improvement of the matter of instruction, and its adaptation to the purposes of life. We hope, too, that the School Boards will not interfere unduly with the teachers, but act largely on the principle of reposing a generous trust in a body of men who, by being trusted and encouraged, are more likely to have a good influence than if they were constantly interfered with. And then we hope that something efficient will next be done for dovetailing the parts of the system into each other—forming full and regular steps of communication between all the schools of the country, from the humblest infant-school in the Highlands up to the highest classes in the universities of the country.

DR. MOFFAT'S TESTIMONIAL.

No public testimonial, we are sure, that has been recently given can have been more approved of than the gift of nearly six thousand pounds recently presented to Dr. Moffat, the missionary of South Africa. It is true that no money testimonial can repay such men for their services. But something was unquestionably due to Dr. Moffat in the shape of money. In the early stage of his career his pay was on a truly apostolic scale; the sum allowed to an unmarried man being just £18 7s., with £5 5s. added if he took a wife. Some £25 were allowed for building a house and stocking a farm, by which the missionary was to be supported.

It was well for Robert Moffat that in his youth he had been accustomed to live on the plain fare of a Scotch workman, and that he knew, like the Apostle of the Gentiles, how to labour with his own hands. The life of Dr. Moffat has been a singularly beneficent one. We think it was Sir Bartle Frere that told the story of an English officer who used always to scoff at missions and missionaries, till something took him to Mr. Moffat's neighbourhood, after which his mind became totally changed. It is a most convenient thing in argument to be able to utter one well-known name that represents in the best form the whole argument on the subject. It is like one of those microscopic photographs that appear to the naked eye like a speck, but are found, under the magnifying glass, to contain the whole Decalogue or the whole Sermon on the Mount. Happy the Christian church that contains in its firmament many such stars. Such men are indeed worthy of whatever recognition the Church at home can offer them. Mr. Moffat has, we believe, touched the patriarchal age of fourscore; it cannot be long ere he enter on a higher reward; but one cannot refrain the wish that ere he is called thither, he may yet have the privilege of embracing his son-in-law, David Livingstone, and blending his prayers with his for the true good and happiness of Africa.

II.—GLANCES AT WHAT IS DOING ABROAD.

FRANCE.

That France should have been able to arrange for the payment of the last instalment of her enormous indemnity to Germany two years earlier than she at first agreed, was a surprise and a joy to all her friends, who saw in this circumstance a proof of her energy as well as her resources, and a hopeful omen for future prosperity and tranquillity. It is a pity that the satisfaction arising from this circumstance should have been clouded by the too characteristic scene that took place almost immediately after in the chamber of Versailles—one member scornfully calling out "bagage" to characterize a speech, another vehemently protesting that the use of such a term was an "impertinence," the President vainly attempting to exercise his authority, resigning his office in consequence, and giving occasion, in connection with the election of his successor, to the excitement of a little political crisis. Such proceedings hardly exemplify the dignity and self-restraint, the moral discipline and elevation of tone, which seem so emphatically needed in the present condition of France. In some quarters, however, we see great efforts to arouse the country to a sound moral tone. The conviction is proclaimed that unless such a tone is realised, there is nothing for the country but anarchy on the one hand, or despotism on the other, and either of the two alternatives is sufficiently horrible.

ULTRAMONTANISM AND ITS GERMAN ANTAGONIST.

The struggle in Germany against Ultramontanism goes on with the greatest earnestness. Prince Bismarck has evidently one conviction on the subject, that if Germany does not crush Ultramontanism, Ultramontanism will crush Germany. Each side in the conflict seems resolved to carry it on to the bitter end—the State to enforce its extremest penalties on rebellious ecclesiastics; the Church to launch its most ghostly missiles at sacrilegious statesmen, as well as at compromising and hesitating churchmen. The sympathies of the Protestant world are much divided. The general feeling is that Bismarck's violence is excessive, and that it will bring about a reaction in favour of the cause which he is so fiercely opposing. On the other hand, there is a feeling that undoubtedly there is something both in the assumptions and tactics of Ultramontanism that deprives it of the toleration to which a religion is entitled, and places it in the category of a rebellion against the lawful authority of the State. The employment by the Ultramontanists of a body of men so notoriously associated in past history with treachery and disloyalty as the Jesuits gives to Bismarck a powerful popular argument, and greatly aids the policy of antagonism. As a proof how full men's minds are of the subject, it may be noticed that the late political crisis in England has been regarded in Germany as a proof of the impossibility of any friendly compromise with the Roman Catholic bishops, and the necessity of abandoning any such hope for the future.

SPECULATIONS ON A NEW REFORMATION.

Father Hyacinthe has been in some degree disappointing the more eager sections of Protestantism. While addressing meetings in Protestant chapels and in Reformation halls, he declines to commit himself to Protestantism. He longs for a reformation of the Church from within, and seems to believe in the possibility of a Catholic Church emancipated from the leadership of the Pope. It is the old dream,—the dream of Huss, the dream of Luther in his earlier days, with the superadded feature of getting rid of the headship of the Pope. It agrees substantially with the notion of the Anglicans, and it is not far from the position of the Alt-Catholics. But in many minds it will be an insuperable difficulty to such a scheme that the supremacy of the Pope is the natural culmination of the Romish hierarchy, and that it has been for many centuries so clearly in accordance with the mind of the Church, that if the mind of the Church Catholic in all ages is to be the recognised authority, the supremacy of the Pope cannot be got quit of.

Some well-known Protestants lean to the opinion that the conservation of the Church of Rome in some sense is indispensable. Guizot has long been identified with this view, and in a recent work he reiterates it, counselling that the Catholic Church and Protestantism should unite, without being identified with each other. M. de Pressensé, too, holds that the Roman Church must be transformed from within, and seems to cherish the thought of the possibility of such a transformation as would turn it into a branch of the great community to which the Protestant churches belong.

THE COLLAPSE OF MORMONISM.

Brigham Young, it appears, has addressed a letter to the American community announcing his resignation of his offices at Utah, and his intention of retiring from the scene of all his labours there, and founding a new settlement at Arizona. The pressure of the outer world on him has been too strong. Mormonism is a system which revolts every sympathy, and even in its disaster forbids all compassionate feeling. We are rather disposed, on the occasion of its downfall, to adopt the Apocalyptic congratulation, "Rejoice over her, thou heaven, and ye holy apostles and prophets, for God hath avenged you on her." Its history has certainly been most singular. In the midst of the light of the nineteenth century, a coarse delusion was propagated, received, and followed. A system of life, combining the laxity of the East with the energy and industry of the West, received the highest encouragement. The new sect had its persecutions and even its martyrs. Persecuted in one city, the Mormons fled to another, and settling at last in the far West, in a territory too barren to attract any covetous eye, they seemed to find the repose and solitude they desired. But man proposes, God disposes. A new and most unexpected occurrence, the discovery of gold in California, has eventually proved the means of their overthrow. We remember, on one occasion, remonstrating with a leading American statesman on his Government not taking steps to suppress Mormonism. His reply was, that the Pacific Railway would suppress it for them. Utah became a thoroughfare. Gentile eyes looked freely on the sacred enclosure. Gentile pens exposed it. Gentile missionaries bearded it on its own ground. It has proved unable to endure the exposure. We only hope that its extinction, so far as it gives sanction to immorality, will now be root and branch, and that any attempt to revive it at Arizona will be dealt with energetically. Sure we are that every American patriot and every friend of America will breathe more freely when it is numbered among the things that were.

III.—OUR MEMORIAL RECORD.

BISHOP M'ILVAINE OF OHIO.

The name of Bishop M'Ilvaine is one of those that clearly belong to the catholic church. Sprung from a family of Scotch origin, he was born in New Jersey in 1799, and educated at the college of Princeton. During a remarkable revival there, he was won to Christ along with Dr. Charles Hodge and other men well known in the American Churches. Having studied divinity in the Presbyterian seminary of Princeton, he was ordained to the ministry of the Episcopal Church of America, and in 1825 was appointed chaplain and professor of ethics in the military seminary of West Point. Here he laboured with much earnestness, but during the first year, he was so little in favour that the cadets seemed all to avoid him. At last, however, they began to come to him, one by one, under the influence of religious anxiety, and by-and-by an awakening took place among them, calm and earnest, which gave many Christian men to the service of the church, both in civil and military life. In 1832 he became Bishop of Ohio, and during an episcopate of unusual length, besides governing his diocese with great success, he rendered many services to Christian literature, and to the Christian Church. His name has long been a household word as that of an eminently consistent, faithful, and devoted minister of Christ. His writings too have been useful and popular. Failing health led him last winter to the continent of Europe, but instead of finding the improvement he hoped for, he was called while there to his Father's house. The church of the old world joins with that of the new in honouring the memory of so good and faithful a servant.

ARCHDEACON SANDFORD.

The Archdeacon of Coventry is known to the general public chiefly in connection with his labours in the cause of temperance. Born at Edinburgh in 1801, the third son of the late Bishop Sandford, he held various positions in the Church of England, became Archdeacon of Coventry in 1851, and Bampton Lecturer in 1861. The subject of his Bampton Lectures was—The Mission and Extension of the Church at Home. The bent of his mind led him to desire that the influence of Christianity should be more felt in society, in repressing evils and promoting benefits connected with our ordinary life. It is not of such clergymen as Mr. Sandford that Mr. Froude would have found occasion to make the complaint that they "withdraw into the affairs of the other world, and leave the present world to the men of business and to the devil." When he moved for the appointment of a Committee of Convocation to inquire into the prevalence of intemperance, some opposed him on the ground that such matters were not the proper function of Convocation. Afterwards, when his report appeared, containing a most valuable mass of accurate information, and showing how closely the subject bore on the cause of religion, some who had opposed him bore a cordial testimony to the value of his labours. It is acknowledged that he contributed in a very marked degree to gain for the subject the increased attention which it has recently received in the Church of England.

FATHER JACKSON.

We give the familiar title of a well-known Wesleyan minister, who had touched the patriarchal age of ninety, and been a preacher in that Connexion for eight-and-sixty years. The son of an agricultural labourer, he came under religious impressions through the influence of his mother and of a female Methodist preacher. Besides serving for a long time in the ordinary ministry, he was, during another period, an editor of Wesleyan publications, and during still another, a tutor in a theological college. Twice he filled the office of President of the Conference, and in the course of his public life he wrote several works, mostly connected with the history of Methodism. His sagacious counsels, patriarchal years, venerable appearance, and winning manner made him an object of universal interest and regard among Wesleyans, and constituted him, in more senses than one, the father of his Connexion. Living calmly, he died peacefully and happily, in the full hope of that gospel which he had spent such an unusual period in proclaiming.

BENJAMIN HOBSON, M.B.

The name of this gentleman is well known in connection with his labours as a medical missionary employed by the London Missionary Society, and still more as a medical author in China. Independently of his constant labour in the Chinese hospitals, the great work of his life was the writing out and translating into Chinese of certain medical works. These consist of five treatises—on Anatomy, Surgery, Medicine, Midwifery, and Natural Philosophy—largely illustrated. These works have had a very wide circulation, and been remarkably well received. They have also been translated into the Corean and Japanese languages, and had great popularity in these countries. The demand for them is still on the increase, and edition after edition has been called for.

Dr. Hobson had to return some years ago to this country on account of health, and while suffering from heart disease, was cut off, at the age of fifty-seven, by a somewhat sudden and sharp attack of bronchitis.

CROOKED PLACES:

A Story of Struggles and Hopes.

By EDWARD GARRETT, AUTHOR OF "OCCUPATIONS OF A RETIRED LIFE," ETC.

PART III.—MILLICENT'S ROMANCE, AND WHAT IT WAS MADE OF.

CHAPTER XIII.—MILLICENT'S WAYS.

ALL those years Mrs. Harvey, Miss Brook, and Milly had still continued to live in the same pretty, leaf-covered cottage, which they had taken in the early days of George's prosperity. It was much prettier now. They had never spent much upon it. But very small spendings for many years fast accumulate in beauty and comfort. And Milly's taste was never idle, and her mother's fingers were always busy. And now that the family had grown so small, there was room for elegance of arrangement, and there were a little dining-room and drawing-room, and each had a chamber to herself. Milly had the largest, with a big closet off it, because she made it serve as a studio as well. Mrs. Harvey had the one with a western window.

It was a very pleasant, peaceful home. The old ladies seldom went out, except to George's or Harriet's, but Milly's professional life kept the house astir with plenty of interest and excitement. Her mother and Miss Brook enjoyed it more than she did herself.

For the bright fragile girl had developed into a pale, keen-eyed woman. Strangers thought that she must be very delicate, but in truth she had the high-bred strength of a fine tempered blade. Altogether Milly was not unlike a swift, sharp sword.

Her habits were much the same as they had always been. She had never been a notably early riser, like Hatty, but still she was always punctual at the breakfast table, as scrupulously neat in her attire as when she was going out to dine. Nay, more so; for Milly's personal neatness could never pass a certain point, and always failed where details grew elaborate. That was one sign of her impatience:

There was a little shelf at her bedside, filled with the quaint devotional books that were still her favourite religious reading. Perhaps, if anything were omitted from her daily orisons, it might be the Bible itself rather than these. Perhaps because, in it, she was left free to choose, instead of a passage being marked hard and fast for each day. But if Milly omitted the Bible occasionally from her morning and evening devotions, she studied it earnestly at other times. She almost knew the Psalms by heart, and even the book of Job, and some of the minor prophets. In her Bible the Old Testament was much more worn than the New.

Her professional work seldom occupied her more than four or five hours a day, often not so much. She was a rapid worker, one who was accustomed to say, "that if she was not doing a thing quickly, she knew she was not doing it well." She made no scruple of speaking about her methods, for she was wholly devoid of that professed humility which is often masked conceit. She did not work constantly, but with frequent intermissions, varying from a single day to a whole month. Her own explanation was that she "waited" for new ideas. "When I have done all that is in me, I stop till more comes," she said.

"Do you feel it coming?" people would ask her.

"No," she replied with a mysterious half-smile. "There is no need to watch the pitcher at the well; it is time enough to move it when it brims. All of a sudden I want to go to work again; and then I go."

"And you have not been thinking about it all the time?" they would inquire.

"No," she said. "At least, if I do, I have to wait just twice as long."

"Arn't you frightened lest it should not come?" said some.

"I should be if I could help it," she answered. "But it does not depend on me."

And that faith of Milly's always seemed to Mrs. Harvey to be the best part of her daughter's special inheritance. It was like a parent's letter sent with a birthday present. It was the very hand of God conveying his gift. And we cannot see all of any blessing that we have, unless we see also the hand that holds it. Mrs. Harvey herself, secretly confessed to some slight uneasiness, when Milly first indulged in these intermissions of labour, which was almost immediately after the household became mainly dependent upon her exertions. For though George still persisted in his allowance to his mother, Milly, in her turn, proudly insisted on returning him as much as she could, in presents to his little Robert, so named after his wife's uncle, and his own first benefactor. But Mrs. Harvey presently learnt that there are still barrels of meal and cruses of oil that do not fail. It inspired her with confidence to find that her daughter looked upon these snatches of leisure with calm delight, and planned little pleasures to occupy them. But even when Mrs. Harvey shared her daughter's faith she never ceased to wonder at and admire it. It was a comfort to her for Milly's own sake. For Milly seemed to trust herself rather than God in so many things.

Milly still continued fond of needlework. But when Mrs. Harvey ceased to be a breadwinner, she took the family mending upon herself, and Milly now entirely eschewed all repairing, altering, or trimming. In honest truth, her mother even mended her gloves, and sewed on her straying buttons. But whenever new white work was needed, especially if the seams were long and the material tough, Milly took it in her charge and got it done in an incredibly short space of time.

She never dabbled in household matters, as they arose day by day. In "spring-cleanings" Milly would give herself up for a week, as if there were no such thing in the world as art, and as if she had wielded brushes and spied out "corners" every day of her life. But once the house was set straight again, she retired into her own duties, oblivious of all beside them. She would wait for her mother to make tea or order dinner with quite masculine helplessness. Yet when her mother went away for a week to stay with Christian, she guided the house well, and Mrs. Harvey found nothing neglected during her absence. She was not an useless woman, but an absorbed one, who could set herself aside for a time, but could not bear to be broken in upon. She could make her own little crosses of spiritual discipline after her own ideal, but shirked those which God makes for each of us, and puts where we are sure to find them, unless we turn out of our way to avoid them. It would have been easier for Milly to wear sackcloth, or to fast utterly on certain self-appointed days, than to bear with good humour an unexpectedly spoiled dinner or an accidentally torn dress. Perhaps she was no wiser than those housewives who shut out the healthy fresh air lest its current should raise the dust! It might be that Hatty was somewhat right, when she said to her husband and in her abrupt, off-hand way—

"If our Milly would sometimes infuse the tea, and go to market, she would find there is something else in the world beside those Lauries."

Milly kept up a pleasant chatter with her mother and Miss Brook, and many strangers would have thought her an unreserved woman. But her mother, at any rate, knew better. Milly's life and heart were large, and had many open chambers, some free to all, others cheerily open to those she loved. But her mother knew that there were many unaccounted for spaces among the windings of her daughter's experience.

Milly received and paid many visits, and had a wide circle of acquaintance. But there were very few who rose above this level. Milly herself was in the habit of saying "that she had not patience with people." Clearly she did not cultivate it. Where she had no affectionate prejudice she was quick to see faults and unsparing to condemn them.

"She can't take folks as she finds them," Hatty would say. "She makes their characters out of her own head, and when they don't fit, she just throws them away."

The few people who did get near Milly's heart were a strange jumble. She and Miss Brook were always sparring, but Miss Brook's voice was in all Milly's thoughts, and one light would die off Milly's world whenever her keen eyes were withdrawn.

Milly did not care much for David Maxwell. He was somebody who might be always invited when there were visitors, and he would never feel himself neglected if other people had to be entertained, and would be sure to entertain anybody else in danger of feeling neglected. Milly always said that "Mr. Maxwell was very kind." But she had never "made up" any character for David. Such of his early history as she knew had repelled rather than interested her. It did not clearly manifest those lines of independence, and struggle, and daring, to which Milly's sympathies ran. Its manifold virtues were rather patience and submission, which were set down in Milly's secret heart as rather poor things, the resort of those who had nowhere else to go. Then the ugly rumour in the old local paper, which Milly would never have happened to see if Fergus Laurie had not shown it, with a hinting explanation, would return upon her mind sometimes, like a nameless horror between her and David, and give her an almost physical shrinking.

But Milly enjoyed Phoebe Winter. Her voice at the back door, discussing some kitchen loan, or other business, would always bring Milly down from her studio. Milly called her "a grand type," and revelled in her old-world shrewdness and dogged loyalty. It was perhaps a proof how much Milly's faith in ideals was, after all, as George had once warned her, rather a faith in her own opinion, that she never thought the more highly of David Maxwell for Phoebe's great love and belief in him. She only delighted in the love and belief as part of Phoebe's own character.

Perhaps Milly's nearest friend was her sister-in-law, Christian, with whom she had much more in common than with her own sister Hatty. In this she was under the disadvantage which every maiden has, in friendship with a wife, especially a happy one—the idle heart claiming something more than the busy heart has left in its power to give. Yet Millicent was unusually fortunate in Christian, who, though she kept a lover's romance in her wifely affection, and was a very madonna whenever she looked at her boy—nay, rather because of this—was still never a mere "married woman," but had a strong, sweet individuality of her own, which the influence of husband and child only raised and softened, as saints' names give human interest to churches sacred to far higher worship. Millicent had always been free from any taint of small sister-in-law jealousy, and now she felt that she loved and knew her brother far better in Christian than she could ever have done without her.

Christian herself had a growing love for Millicent, and enjoyed far more of her confidence than Millicent guessed. In their talks over fiction and politics, poetry and pictures, Christian always felt when Millicent was giving out her very self, could always detect whether the blood of a thought came from the head or the heart. Out of her own full, happy married life, Christian Harvey pitied Millicent, not for her maidenhood—

Christian had no "married woman's" pity for that, but would even tell George sometimes, with a smile dying into gentle gravity, that she was sure she would have made a very happy old maid herself, if he would have left her alone! But she pitied Millicent for her overflowing heart, sealed up, and for all the pathetic heresies with which she tried to make herself believe that this was best. She felt that Millicent was like a foolish miser storing gold in a bottomless well, while lives around were famishing for lack of a single coin, and thinking himself rich only to find some day that he was as poor as the poorest. She would try to give Milly suggestive warnings, just as kindly physicians may strive to convey wholesome hints about sufferings that are not absolutely presented for their cure. But Millicent's intuitions were almost as quick as her own, and she so proudly shrank into herself, that it was precisely the point where Christian could have helped her most that she withheld from Christian.

But Millicent had still some confidants, who poured out their souls to her without any limit. Not Fergus Laurie. Limits there had always been to his confidence, and now it had nothing but limits. He still liked to talk with her, but it was very much "a talk of the lips." But she kept her faith in the sacred secrets of the heart that was all shut up now. She would not defend much that others blamed in him—his arrogance, his recklessness, the high-handed, forgetful spirit that so often brought inconvenience to others and loss to himself. But the woman who was generally so impatient, was patient here.

"I know him," she would say. "Everybody has faults, and his are just the faults that everybody is severe upon. You all have patience with the helpless, and the ne'er-do-wells; you all stand still to pick up the man who has tumbled down, and to heal his scars. Let me trust in the man who tumbles up, and let me at least pity the scars which his reserved and sensitive spirit hides unhealed."

"I should think it was the will of God, for it seems a beautiful idea, and a sweet softening in Milly," said poor Mrs. Harvey to Miss Brook, "only it does not grow in her. It stays just there. When patience and pity begin, anyhow they generally spread."

"This isn't patience or pity," retorted Miss Brook. "It's just pride. But it isn't the worst kind."

No. Fergus Laurie had ceased to be Milly's familiar friend, in the old, pleasant way. The freshest breeze that now blew into her guarded life, came from the lives of her sister's step-children.

The Webbers' home was quite uncommon, because it was directly matter-of-fact. It was a very comfortable, well-to-do home, but all affectation was left outside the door. Artistic taste might have scorned every detail of that house, but the best artists would have loved the whole. It was a jovial place, where one might put everything to the use it was intended, and where nothing was too good to wear out, but had a curious trick of improving in the process. How the bright big-patterned carpets had horrified Millicent, and drawn forth sneering jests from Mr. Laurie and his sister! Yet how handsome and respectable they looked, when the bustle of active feet had toned their hues and melted down their lines! But perhaps the peculiar style and spirit of the house is best revealed by the fact, that the boys' friends delighted to frequent it, and that those who elsewhere seemed all arms and legs, shyness and titter, astonished themselves and everybody else, by appearing respectable members of society in Mrs. Webber's "sitting-room."

The young people all adored their step-mother, and hung about her in all her rapid busy ways. The worst of Hatty was, that her immense capacities of loving service seemed to leave her no leisure to be served by love. All their affection had to be concentrated in the morning and evening kiss, an occasional five minute's hand-clasp in the twilight, and a yearly birthday present. And so they repaid her vicariously, by pouring out the love she awoke, on others whom she loved—"dear Grannie," and "Aunt Millicent."

Yes, it was really to Hatty's lowly, loving ways that Milly owed the bright, wholesome affection of these lads and lass. She would never have won it for herself,—nay, her absorbed heart scarcely knew that it was worth the winning. She would have often preferred a solitary walk, to their volunteered companionship, while their eager confidences, the hopes and dreams of their young lives, seldom seemed to her really worth the smile or the sigh which she gave them.

Milly was a great walker. Hatty took her exercise chiefly "running in and out," as she called it, bargaining in the market, looking up sick neighbours, slipping round for a half-hour's chat with Mrs. Harvey. Mr. Webber was not a walking man. His wife said he stood too much in the shop, to care for anything but sitting down when he was out of it. Once or twice a year Hatty would dress herself ceremoniously, and go with Milly for a long walk. It was a true test of the healthfulness of her general "running in and out" exercise, that Milly, the pedestrian, never outwalked her. On her return from these excursions, Hatty would confide to whoever came nearest.

"I've enjoyed myself very much. Milly and I always talk more freely walking side by side than sitting opposite each other. But it is one thing for me to enjoy myself walking with her, and it is quite another to understand how she enjoys flying along by herself, as she does—just up one way and down another, as if she was hunting something."

It was a touching revelation, that as her brother George had walked and wandered in the days of his restless, yearning youth, so his sister Millicent walked and wandered in her middle age.

For Milly was middle-aged now, and knew it, and ached wearily as she knew it. Happy women do not sigh to know their youth is past. The blossom is better than the bud. But if the bud has never blossomed?

People would turn to look at Milly as she passed them in her lonely walks. She went so swift and straight that they wondered where she was going, and what she was going to do. But she was going nowhere, and to do nothing, except to turn back at an appointed time!

CHAPTER XIV.—A PAIN AND A DOUBT.

NOBODY ever knew anything about Milly's business transactions. She never talked them over. She never asked advice. Mrs. Harvey herself had always shrunk from pointed inquiry, feeling, from her own experience, that the burden of responsibility is often increased by the lightest touch, and that some hard things that must be done are easier to do in silence. Latterly—that is to say, for years past—she had been silent and uninquiring, out of utter satisfaction and content, just as in the earlier and prosperous years of her own married life.

But, at last, Christian began to detect in Milly a despondency that was quite a new thing. Sundry extreme economies, long laid by, began to reappear. Not any that touched her mother or the home, but Millicent wore her gloves shabbier, and bought no new dresses. She spoke more tenderly of failing people, whose work was not quite what it had been, but was still strong on the truth that they should be ready to acknowledge the fact, nor feel wronged when they were put aside. Once, when Christian accidentally entered Milly's studio, she found her practising the old humble kind of work she had done in her early girlhood. Milly thrust it out of sight, and nothing was said on the subject.

The fact was, business matters had not been going quite brightly between Millicent and Fergus Laurie. He had reduced the payment for several of her last designs, saying that their success had not been what he had expected, vaguely hinting at certain losses as if they had been incurred through these. Then his orders had come at farther intervals. But when Milly ventured to tell him, what had happened often before, but had hitherto been passed over in silence, that the old firm of his former masters had been looking her up, and inquiring if her hands were still too full to do anything for them, this was the response she got—

"Ah, they are wanting something cheap! But your real friends feel that you need the repose which brings fresh ideas rather than to go slaving on in the old groove, Miss Millicent. Don't have anything to say to those people."

And Milly obeyed, but with sundry puzzled, painful reflections as to what was hidden under the phrase of her "needing repose."

She thought she needed no further explanation when another new discovery of David's was put before the world, not this time in her designs, but in those of a young lady, upon whose head Mr. Laurie heaped the praises he had once showered upon herself, with the addition that this artist worked con amore, being wealthy, and having no mercenary needs mingling in her ambition to soil and impoverish it.

On the same evening that Millicent heard all this, sitting in the splendid drawing-room of Acre Hall, Robina, chatting, as it seemed, quite naturally over the affairs of some third parties, was full of praises of her brother's tenderness and loyalty of heart, which made him strive "to keep on" employés whom anybody else would throw off to sink to lower and fitter levels of work.

That night, Millicent, sitting in her studio, shed some very bitter tears. She said to herself that, after all, like most other failing people, she was not aware of her present falling off, though all the work she had ever done suddenly seemed poor, mean, and pretentious. But at any rate—and she shook back her high-bred head till the streaming tears flew right and left—she would be royally proud in her readiness to submit to the judgment of others, in a case where she had so often seen that it was worth so much more than the judgment of the person nearest concerned.

Poor, haughty, humble Millicent! How could she dream that Fergus would have been only too glad to put her drawings into this newest discovery, but that one of his largest creditors claimed this honour for his daughter, the con-amore artist, who for all her wealth demanded and obtained, for work which none but a debtor would have taken as a gift, twice the sum which would have satisfied Millicent? How could she, blinded by preconceived partialities, perceive that all Mr. Laurie's praises, past and present, were due not to a work in itself, but as done for him, and issued under his auspices—that Fergus was really scarcely a wiser art-critic than poor old Mr. Smith, of the "Leech-gatherer" order, and not half so simple and honest an one?

But all of a sudden Milly felt that her affectionate gratitude, which she had hitherto so proudly displayed, as if it were the very crown of life, had become a crown of thorns. The fact is, there are very fine lines drawn about gratitude, and it is well that it is so. The higher natures cannot easily be gracefully and contentedly grateful for any relief that comes to them by the pain of another. They can be bountifully grateful for the superior strength that can lift off, and carry readily the burden that was crushing themselves, but if they see that it is also a burden to its new bearer, their first impulse is to snatch it back crying, "Let me, rather than another, perish under mine own burdens."

This is one reason how it is that so many think they get least gratitude where they seem to have earned most. Noble hearts, such only as are capable of gratitude, would never have allowed themselves to get so deep in debt. The man whom we dare not help, except by a letter of recommendation, which we are ashamed to remember, feels himself indebted to us for ever. The other, who allows us to maintain him, shakes off the dust of his feet upon us, whenever we at last venture to hint that he may be self-supporting.

Nor can any man be grateful for what is done for him consciously, painfully, and with a grudge. Few of us could be made happy by the hospitality of a host, who kept an account of all we cost him—breakfast, dinner, bed, boots, and attendance, just like an inn-keeper, although he never sent in his bill, and only expected us to pay him by an exact return of his civilities! The fact is, we are grateful not so much for what we receive, as for the love or kindness which makes our benefactor feel it a pleasure to give. If any man does not feel it infinitely "more blessed to give than to receive," let him expect no thanks. It is doubtful whether we should weep for a man who died for us, if he claimed our tears as the reward of his sacrifice. The Great Sacrifice of the World, the just who died for the unjust, bade his mourners, "Weep not for me, but weep for yourselves, and for your children."

But poor Milly, sitting there in her darkened chamber, could not think—she could only suffer. Feelings came to her heart, rather than reflection to her head. Now it was a wild wish to repay Fergus for all the kindness he had shown her, and the inconvenience he must have suffered through it. Next it was a stabbing wish that she had found the truth out entirely for herself, instead of receiving it through the Lauries' hints. It would have been so easy to say to Fergus, "My powers have disappointed you; let me go," and all his kindness, and all her gratitude could have gone with her, stainless and unflawed, treasures for the rest of life to keep, if not to use. The terrible pity of it was, that Milly felt already they could never be so now. They had received a blow, and at the least touch they would fall to pieces, and however she might afterwards gather them up and mend them, they could never again be unbroken.

Other feelings would come. If Fergus were disappointed in her—if he had measured her powers amiss, and put her in places too high for her, had he been really kind to her after all? If in mistake, a man dubs a plain mister "his lordship," has he done him real honour? Milly almost felt as if she had small reason to be grateful to Fergus for taking her from the quiet, regular duties where she had always given boundless satisfaction, and that it was a poor thing to be raised to a pedestal only to be tumbled from it. She caught herself actually calculating that one year with the other, and one chance with another, she might easily have made as large an income with the old firm as she had with Fergus. It was true that she might not have saved as much, for Fergus' times of payment were always so dreadfully uncertain, that while the more improvident of those who worked for him were constantly out-at-elbows and living on borrowed money, Milly, from the experience of her youth, and her hereditary horror of debt, diligently kept down expenses in every way, so as to be forearmed against ever such long periods of waiting, a process which, regularly repeated for many years, had now resulted in a very respectable sum of savings. Out of considerate desire to save troubling Robina Laurie's brother, Milly's one black silk dress had worn out half a score of Robina's.

Then again, if Fergus was sometimes very liberal in his payments, Milly had long since been forced to own to herself that it was under particular conditions. If he had at first given her a higher class of work and paid her more highly for it, he had since paid her absolutely less than she would have got elsewhere. She had not heeded that—she had been glad of it—proud of it—delighted to feel that it was a fitting reward for his kindly faith in a beginner. But now she felt—and despised herself for feeling—that she would like to let Robina know this side of the subject, as well as the side of her brother's magnanimity.

Then again, she knew that Fergus was in the habit of indulging his generosity at the expense of justice, that lately he had been doing two or three showily magnificent liberalities, while she herself was very wearily waiting for her rightful payment. Once or twice, against her will, she had actually caught herself wondering if anybody—and who—had suffered in the long-ago days when her own receipts were always prompt and ample. Little did she guess the light that David Maxwell could have thrown on this question!

These shadows had fitted across her mind sometimes, just now and then, and only for a moment. Now they mustered in force. But the old, wilful womanly faith, roused itself from fainting, and gathered itself up to repel them. They seemed mean and paltry and below it, and it would drive them down and banish them as was fit. It was surely but the shadow of her disappointment in herself which was darkening over Fergus. Better to think one's sight is wrong than that the sun is growing black!

There are senses in which Millicent was both right and wrong. Common sense is one of the best of things, but there are grander things than it is. There are times when its dictates are the dictates of the devil. Poor Don Quixote appears a fool beside his Sancho Panza, but that is because he is wasting his knightliness in Sancho's proper domain of windmills and kitchen wenches. On Don Quixote's own level of daring and sacrifice, Sancho would be not only ridiculous, but contemptible into the bargain. Which would you prefer to be within ear-shot, if you were really a distressed damsel in extreme danger? But the mischief is—and it is a mischief—that Don Quixote will waste his heroisms on the windmills!

And so, all Milly's pain and doubt and bitterness ended in a conclusion and a wish. A conclusion that it was Robina and not Fergus himself, who made gratitude galling. And a wish to make some return, which without effacing her own gratitude—to which she clung like a drowning mariner to his last spar—should make Fergus grateful to her, and set them both once more on a noble equality, to be friends as they used to be!

So little did she know what it really was that had come between them!

CHAPTER XV.—A WOMAN'S GRATITUDE.

BUT at last, as the complications of "Laurie & Co." thickened and deepened, the creditors began to watch the business so carefully, that Fergus Laurie could snatch from it no more than barely sufficed to keep the wolves of last year at bay, while those of the present were clamouring at the door. The firm still kept up in respectable working order. Its creditors took care of that, for it was their only chance of repaying themselves. It was Fergus's private income alone which came to a dead lock. He was still deriving a tolerable sum from the business, but what was any sum with limits to a man who had launched into extravagance on borrowed money, and extricated himself from one loan after another, by contracting new and larger ones, at higher and higher interest?

One expedient by which he had often kept a little ready money in hand, was to defer the payment of those who worked for him, more especially those who were on friendly and trustful terms. Some of his people, with small means and heavy charges, had been driven to ask payment. They did it very reluctantly. He had held forth such brilliant pictures of his idea of the relation of employer and employed, that they absolutely forgot they had never derived any benefit therefrom. And if they forgot, how much more did he! Fergus's mind grew sore with his constant reflections on ingratitude.

Fergus had a special grievance against David Maxwell. David's minimum salary was in arrear, and he had received absolutely no bonus for the last twelve months. David had said nothing about this, and had not asked for any money for himself. But Fergus's old friend and faithful coadjutor had committed what Fergus held to be unpardonable sin. He could and did easily forgive some of the more thriftless of his people, who asked for money before they had earned it, and these often got it from him, while the others went without. He liked their "trust" in him; and to pay money that was not earned, in a dashing, unledger-like fashion, fostered the sense of magnificent autocracy, into which all Fergus's ambitions had finally resolved themselves. Paying what was due was a humdrum affair. Everybody did that!

But David, though kept in profound ignorance of all the larger concerns of Laurie & Co., could guess at something, by such fragments as from time to time accidentally dropped before him. And David would constantly remind Fergus that it was the date to pay this one or that one; nay, in cases where the people were elderly, needy, or unprotected, would so press the matter that Fergus could not shirk it without a plainer statement than it suited his pride to make. It was David's constant hints which had long kept Millicent's accounts from falling into hopeless arrear and confusion.

But, as the rude old saying has it, "one cannot get more from a cat than her skin;" and when there was positively no money in Fergus's hands (not even to pay Robina's dressmaker), David's hints on even this matter became ineffectual. Only the higher Millicent's debt rose, the more Fergus insinuated and insisted on the gratitude due from her to himself, the more he criticized her work, and the less he gave her of it.

Millicent writhed in secret tortures. If she could only recompense Fergus for the loss, which, rightly or wrongly, he and his family seemed to feel he had incurred through "taking her up," she would go forth happily, and earn her bread cheerfully elsewhere, wherever she could find it.

A chance remark developed in her an idea on the subject. Somebody said—it was the wife of a wealthy tradesman in the neighbourhood—"that for all the wonderful way Mr. Laurie had got on, he seemed always very short of money; perhaps his business took it all up."

Millicent turned this over in her mind; and it seemed to her that both the fact and the supposition were likely to be well founded.

Then it occurred to her that it might really be in her power to do Fergus a service. The savings of her lifetime amounted to seven or eight hundred pounds, duly invested in the Three per Cents. Her family knew she had money there, but they did not know how much. She had not allowed even her brother George to know the fluctuations of her affairs, having a proud fear lest he might at some time want to help her where she could help herself.

Milly knew nothing of the loan still existing between Fergus and her brother-in-law, Webber. She had heard something at the time, but had supposed that it was all settled long ago, as "of course" all the earlier matters of the firm must be. Hatty had never told her otherwise. Hatty knew how to keep counsel. In her own words, "she might gossip about what she guessed of her own wit; but when she was fairly told anything, she held her tongue."

Millicent thought to herself that she might really oblige Fergus by putting her little fortune at his disposal. She was a sensible woman, and at another time and with another person, would have understood that it could be no particular service to lend him a sum which he could have easily at command, simply by leaving Acre Hall, and living in a way more consistent with his antecedents and means. But pain, and grief, and pride blinded Millicent.

She had no wish to humiliate Fergus, by letting him think for a moment that she believed he needed the money. She wished to make it appear a mere business transaction, by which she might get a trifle more interest than from her stocks. Millicent was a magnanimous woman, and rejoiced in the hope of repaying something of whatever she might owe for the ease of her own heart, not for the pain of another's. She only hoped to make Fergus think of her, as a serviceable friend, as of old, instead of the burden which she had lately appeared. The moment that her plan formed within her, she said within herself that kindness can never be repaid, and that every kindness given in return is a new blessing bestowed by the first benefactor.

As she made up her mind to follow out this sudden plan, which seemed to her like an inspiration, the soreness died out of her heart, and she remembered it only as one remembers a fevered dream. Now it felt easy to accept much with which she had been fighting fiercely. After all, what did it matter if her drawings had never come up to the standard which Fergus had set for them. Having done this service in return, it would be quite bearable to go back to the old humble ways of toiling. Life was not in these things; the soul had a history distinct from these. To bind it to them was scarcely less ignoble slavery, than to bind existence to its trappings of dress and furniture—like—poor Robina!

For as she sat at her desk, planning her letter to Mr. Laurie, Millicent could not help thinking of Robina. She could forgive Robina now, for many a sting which had once seemed as if it must rankle for ever. Robina had a habit—common to most who know nothing of the real bliss of near ties—of making her relationship to Fergus a vaunt and a taunt to outsiders. Whenever there came forward any of those little questions, whether financial, legal, or political, which specially interest women, Robina was addicted to dismiss them from discussion because "they could not matter to her. She had her brother; she need not trouble herself about such things, though it was only natural that other people should do so, who had nobody to look after them." But Milly remembered this now with a smile, and forgave it. Poor Robina! Her idle, selfish life would never enjoy the privilege of offering even such a little service as this to her brother. Millicent thought of her in her heart as "poor Robina," and felt she would be able to bear all the helpless sister's boasts for the future.

She had no fears for the worldly wisdom of what she was doing. Amid all her doubts and anguishes, she still trusted Fergus. And in those events of life and death in which human faith and trustworthiness avail nothing, she felt she was willing and able to take all risk.

Her letter was very brief:—

"DEAR MR. LAURIE,—Forgive me for troubling you about a little matter of my own private business. I have saved money to the amount of nearly eight hundred pounds. It is now invested in Three per Cents.; but I think I might get a little higher interest. I believe some merchants consent to receive such loans from people at about four or five per cent. Would you do this for me? I do not ask my brother-in-law, Mr. Webber, because I do not like my family to know every up and down of my business life. Their knowledge, and perhaps wish to help me would be a pain and a burden to me. Will you let me have a speedy answer, as, if you consent, I shall like to make the change as soon as possible.

"Faithfully yours,

"MILlicENT HARVEY."

She put on her bonnet to post the letter herself. As she passed through the little hall, she found her mother dealing with an itinerant flower-vendor for groundsel for the canary. The man had some primroses and violets at the other end of his basket, and Millicent paused to admire them, and bought a dozen of the tiny bunches. It was a long time since she had spent even such a trifle on pure pleasure. But with her letter in her hand, Millicent Harvey felt rich.

Then she went swiftly down the long sunny road. She encountered a neighbour whom she had generally passed with a civil nod, but to-day she paused to say something about the bright, spring weather.

"It agrees with you, I can see, Miss Harvey," responded the old lady, "for you are looking quite blooming!"

Millicent smiled. She knew it was true. And yet it was only yesterday that somebody else had warned her that she should take great care of herself, she looked so fragile! Millicent's frame was like a transparent sheath—when the sword within was bright, the sheath was illumined.

Two or three hours later, the postman delivered her letter at the counting-house. At the same moment, a servant girl came running up, breathless, with another. The office boy carried them both to Fergus.

Fergus Laurie read them, one after the other. That which was delivered by hand he crumpled up, and tore into twenty pieces. He would need no memoranda to keep its purport in mind. For it was much like this:—

"The man has got in. I stayed on guard, as you told me, all the morning, but nobody came. I had only just gone to my room to try on my blue silk when a man came and said his boy had dropped his cap over our wall, and might he look for it; and the donkey of a cook let him in, and here he is. It is no use scolding me. You ought to be ashamed of yourself for leaving me in such a plight, and getting us into such disgrace. The man is smoking, and his vile tobacco poisons me. I do not see why I am to bear these things for you. I am dying.

"Your injured sister,

"ROBINA."

"Is the girl who brought this waiting for an answer?" Fergus inquired of the office-boy, with a coolness as perfect as if it had related only to the hour fixed for dinner.

"Yes, sir," said the lad. "I told her you was busy, but she said she daren't go back without something."

Fergus took up an envelope, and wrote inside:—

"Don't die till I return. Take a glass of wine, and go up-stairs and try on your blue silk again. Have not you any eau-de-cologne in the house?"

And having dispatched this cynical mis-sive, he re-perused Millicent's letter.

"There are women and women," he said to himself.

CHAPTER XVII.—FRIENDS AND LOVERS.

It was quite true that Acre-Hall had just received a new and very disagreeable tenant—a man in a brown great coat with frayed sleeves, who said it was thirsty weather, and asked where the beer was kept, and laid a long clay pipe on the beautiful hall table. He was not an unexpected visitor.

One of Fergus Laurie's private creditors had been pressing hard for a long while. He had written half a score of letters, civil and almost kindly in their very sternness. Anybody but Fergus would have seen that the writer meant to carry out his will, and so framed his demand like a request, and did not bluster. But Fergus thought this calmness augured patience, and superbly took no notice, till one day he found that legal processes were commenced, and next, that that sort of domestic barricade was necessary, which so often begins among ormolu and choice wines, to be set up again and again till at last there is nothing behind it but a pawn-ticket and a corpse!

To Fergus the bitterness of the blow lay in the fact that it happened to come from a man whose connection Fergus had scorned, and whose kindness he had slighted in his old lofty days. This was the kind of pang that Fergus really felt. He had grown callous to most but the sting of personal pique.

Fergus was always vaguely expecting a shower of gold to fall and fill the gaping purses of his creditors. The wonderful indomitable hopefulness, which might have been the greatest blessing of his life, had grown into his greatest bane, as great blessings have it in them to grow. Several times things had happened, as he put it, "just as they should," and he had found unexpected ways—though they might not be the cleanest—out of bogs of difficulty.

It seemed to Fergus, standing there with Robina's letter in fragments at his feet, and Millicent's in his hand, that the one might be the "providential" solution of the other.

Not that he thought of robbing Millicent of the savings of her patient laborious life. He expected that something else would happen which would enable him to pay her again, or at least to pay her interest in due course. He felt quite sure that he could get plenty of money from other quarters if he only tried hard enough, and he had a delusion that there were securities in his power to offer. Alas, a man is a poor deceiver if he is not the first person to be deceived by himself!

At that instant, he hastily thrust the letter away, for David came into the room. He looked even unusually quiet and grave. But Fergus could read a knowledge in his eyes and a regret in his voice, which made him say, within himself, as it seemed, inconsequently—

"Where would Maxwell be now if it had not been for me?"

"It is more than two months ago since you ought to have paid Miss Harvey, Fergus," David began.

"Well, I know it is," Fergus said tartly; "but she can wait. She has been too well paid to be in such extreme want of money."

"It is not a question of want of money or no," David went on. "It is a question of justice."

"Well, she cannot be paid now, and that must be the end of it," said Fergus.

"She must be paid," David returned steadily. "I have just found out what is going on in Acre Hall at this moment. It is known in the office somehow, and I heard it there. After this, there will be sure to be a settlement of everything. At the present time, Millicent Harvey is the only one among those who work for you whose debt is very considerable. The others have got into the habit of asking you for money, while my representations of her case have lately gone quite unheeded."

"So this is the end of your friendship, is it?" said Fergus. "To turn upon me in my day of difficulty!"

David's face quivered just for a moment. "I am Millicent Harvey's friend as well as yours, Fergus," he said. "And I am more your friend in this than you think. I want you to do what you will be glad to remember you have done, Fergus."

"How can I pay her?" Fergus asked restively. "I shall have to borrow money to pay this execution out of the Hall. It is a terrible revelation to find one's friends taking advantage of an awkward shortness of ready money, although there is plenty behind the scenes."

"I will advance you what is needed to pay Miss Harvey," said David. "It is just a hundred and fifty pounds. It can be set down to my account against the firm, and I can wait indefinitely. Call upon her to-night, Laurie, and tell her candidly how things are, and the circumstances under which you cannot give her so much work as formerly, and set her free from all tie to us; and tell her that if she calls here to-morrow, she shall be paid all up. It is the plain truth, Fergus, and you will never repent speaking it. If you will not tell her, Fergus, I will go and tell her myself. I had no idea how bad things were, or I should have said this before. Perhaps I ought to have known, so as to be able to help you to take the brave and right course. If there was any indolence and over-easiness in my ignorance, I hope you will forgive me."

Fergus looked up at David with a bright eager gaze, and David's heart leaped within him, as he thought that perhaps this time of hard facts and plain speaking might be also a time for the renewing of the old true, open friendship.

But this was the only interpretation of Fergus's eyes.

"Why not lend me this one hundred and fifty to pay out the execution, old friend? The debt is not so much as that. And then whatever measures I would have to take to pay it off, I will take to pay Millicent instead. It will not be so hard to sell something to pay her as to pay that fellow."

David shook his head sadly. "I am but a poor man," he said. "All my means could not extricate you from your difficulties, even if such extrication, by itself, would be any real service to you."

"But I am your old friend, Maxwell," said Fergus. "Why should not you wish to help me, as far as you can, as much as Miss Harvey? Miss Harvey is not in need. She can always be independent; and she has helpful friends. I don't know that I have any—unless it be you."

A faint flush passed swiftly over David's face. Through all these years his old boyish love for Millicent had seemed to linger in his heart, only as the faint perfume of faded flowers lingers in a shut-up room. But now it was as if a door was opened, and the flowers lifted up their heads as the breeze rushed through.

He walked slowly up and down the room.

"I have never said a word to anybody all these years," he said; "indeed, there is nothing to say. It is only a folly of mine. But I bless God for it notwithstanding. A man does not ask a woman to marry him if he is sure she would refuse. If I had thought there was the least chance for me, I would have asked Millicent Harvey to be my wife years, and years, and years ago. She is the only woman I ever loved in my life. There, Fergus, old boy, if I did not think of you as of a dearest friend, would I tell you this?"

He held out his hand to Fergus, who put his into it, saying, "I believe you are a good fellow, Maxwell. I know you are. I will see Miss Harvey to-night, or if not to-night, to-morrow. It will all be well again. And though I tell her she need not tie herself down to us, that's no reason why we should not give her so much to do that she won't think of any one else. I'll manage matters very differently to what I have done; and you'll stick by me, won't you, David?"

In those words—the suggested endearment, the fatally ready admission, the half-promise, and the groundless hopefulness—lay all the danger and all the promise of poor Fergus Laurie's character! David's words came to him like a guardian angel's whisper in a dream. The worst of it was that the world, represented by Robina's clamorous voice, was sure to seem to him the waking reality, to which he would turn, with half a sigh, for the sweet ideal gone out of his reach.

And so the two parted.

David went off to his lonely home thinking, "We will save him yet—we two, Millicent and I. He has been walking in dangerous paths; that he chose them for himself only made their greatest danger. I think he will confide in me now, as he used to do. And when he once begins to speak with her, he will be sure to confide in her, and she will give him so much help. Who knows but that this time of revelation and humiliation may be the very sealing of a life-long bond between Millicent and Fergus? If he has been false to himself and unkind to her, I am sure there are depths of pitiful loving-kindness and tender mercy in her."

David himself had forgiven the unknown mother who had left him but a legacy of shame: he had forgiven the father who had blighted his youth, and the woman who had embittered it. David had practised forgiveness till the power had grown so easy that he never even noticed when he exercised it!

Only as he went along, David thought within himself how selfish he was, and what an especial blessing it was to him that no goodness of one's own is any item in one's acceptance with God. For out of all the shock and pain, he felt a little bit of happiness shooting like a blue mountain flower from the devastation of an avalanche. In this time of trouble, he was the one who could advise Fergus, and shield Millicent. There was a sense in which, after all, he was useful and necessary to the two—man and woman—in whose life he had lived far more than in his own. He did not think he had ever wanted much more than this. At any rate, nothing else could have been half so good. Of other dreams, other hopes, he thought now as a grown man thinks of the toys he coveted in childhood!

Fergus Laurie went home to Acre Hall. He gave a contemptuous grunt at the clumsy salutation of the disagreeable man seated in the hall, and passed on to the drawing-room. There seemed something in the very atmosphere of the house which made him think within himself that David Maxwell's way of talk was all very fine and well-meant, doubtless, but that it must be modified in such a world as the real one.

Mrs. Laurie was in bed. She had retired thither on the first appearance of the disagreeable man. But Robina was ready to receive him, with a grievance longer than herself.

"What other woman has to endure such treatment as this?" she cried. "Is the vicar's daughter expected to entertain a man in possession? Does your fine Miss Harvey have to put up with such a humiliation in the sight of her servant?"

"Miss Harvey is in altogether different circumstances. You can't compare her with yourself," said Fergus. "If she had a man in possession, it would be of her own goods; she is the real mistress of her house."

"Then you ought to be ashamed of yourself to bring your house to such a pass," Robina retorted. "As you say, it isn't my affair, and I'm sure it is not my fault. Nobody can say I'm extravagant. I've never had more than a half-pennyworth of milk taken in for tea, just for the sake of saving; and whenever chance visitors have happened to come, I have had to send out for more; and one half the time they have known it, so they couldn't think me extravagant. And I've never given a single present,—so different to you who are always throwing away on strangers! You had no right to set yourself up in such grandeur if you can't keep it up."

"That's a true word, Robina," said Fergus carelessly.

"But you ought to be able to keep it up," she went on, only more angrily. "I don't believe it is a bit more than we have a right to. And now I suppose we shall have to go and live in some hokey-pokey hole, hardly better than the Harveys' cottage. Of course, it is easy enough for them who have never been used to anything else; but after what I have been accustomed to, it will be very hard. It will be unendurable!"

"What have you been accustomed to?" asked Fergus, with his provoking calmness. "Do you mean to Acre Hall, or to the single room over the tripe shop, where we all lived in father's time, when there were five of us to be supported on the pension that mother spends on her own washing bill nowadays?"

Robina gave him one unutterable look, and went out of the room, leaving him alone in the splendid saloon,—the same, only still more resplendent with satin and gilding, where, on that far-away summer evening, he had sat with Millicent Harvey, while the soft early moonlight came stealing down through the elm-tree, and he was very near saying to her that all beauty and all success would be nothing to him without her. He was not the first man who, having to choose between the princess and the palace, chooses the palace, only to find that all crumbles away without the princess, while she makes a palace wherever she goes.

Fergus had not sat there long before he rang the bell hard, and bade the servant bring up some brandy and soda-water. That was no unusual order. The excited, feverish life he was leading, deprived him of appetite.

Wholesome food had grown thoroughly distasteful, and the highly-seasoned, artificial morsels he could still enjoy, only fostered his craving for stimulants.

Fergus sat there sipping his glass, and felt himself a bitterly ill-used man. He took up the grand visions of his aspiring youth, and put them side by side with his blasted present, and set the two down as cause and effect, without reference to anything between them. He thought his ambition had been to make business but a wider and truer philanthropy, "therefore" he was a ruined man. Others had only aimed at fortunes for themselves, and so had made them. But it never struck Fergus that this purely unselfish philanthropy of his had grasped at the glories of fortune, without even the trouble of making it.

It was no new thing for Fergus to say to himself that "something must be done." What he had never yet dreamed of doing was to give up Acre Hall, and reduce his expenses to whatever trifle there might be to meet them. That alternative seemed now staring him in the face.

He had spoken truly—truer than he meant or knew—when he said to David that he was his only friend. He had given up his Friend in heaven. That sounds an awful thing to say: alas, that men find it the easiest thing to do! What can a man have to do with God who only wants help to pay for the wine that is destroying him, defence against claims which are just, wisdom and counsel to scheme for wrong and selfish ends? These are not the "crooked places" which the Lord has promised to straighten. And who were Fergus's friends on earth? Not the two hard selfish women who were ready to make up their minds that whatever he did was right, because it was his doings that fed them daintily and clothed them softly. Chance words of theirs were never likely to cast a gleam of sunlight on any storm-battered soul as the chance words of some women might. Help and inspiration did not grow wild in their conversation. Oh, had Fergus raised his eyes from the mean and sordid plague-spot that had crept over his young ambition, to see such a woman as Christian Harvey smiling love and peace beside his hearth, perchance he would long ago have started as from an evil dream, and awaked to his better self. But it was Fergus's own wilfulness which had shut him up with those two women as the genii of his life.

Gradually thoughts began to rise out of the whirl of heated feelings, and to link themselves together.

At first, "I am tired of this kind of life. What the better am I now that I am sitting on a carved and velvet chair? It might as well be a wooden one with a chintz cushion!"

Then, "I have never enjoyed what I have had in this way. There has been no time for anything but worry."

"Oh I wish I was young again! I wish I was just starting in business. What a different plan I should lay out!"

"And so David Maxwell has had a liking for Millicent Harvey. I used to think so. Lately I've forgotten all about it. She has never cared a straw for him. He was a wise man to know it. It would have been different with somebody else, I think. I did not refrain from proposing to her, because I thought there was no chance of acceptance" (and in all his misery, Fergus, alone in the twilight, smiled a vain man's smile). "I only wish I had proposed to her at the very beginning. I believe I should have got on better. At any rate, she would not be such a squeaking idiot as Robina."

"And so David Maxwell is paying my debt to her out of his romantic affection! Well, I can believe things of that sort of David better than of most men. But I shouldn't wonder that he has a sneaking idea that he will help her to get work, and so on, and that somehow she'll find out this is his money, and so forth! I don't say he does it for that, or that he knows in his heart he wants it, but yet he'll work it round so."

"And after that she might marry him, just out of gratitude. Women will do that sometimes. She'll think it is too late for her to do any better. What a pity!"

"I really do not see why I shouldn't marry her myself, after all. If I go myself to-night and tell her that we are going out of business, and that she will be paid to-morrow, that is what I promised David, and he will have no excuse to go there bungling himself. I shall say what he said I ought to say, and what more I say is my own business. I won't borrow her money—that, under the circumstances, would be only putting myself in a dangerous position. But once we are married, it would enable me to settle up these two or three little personal debts to people whom I can't bear to triumph over me. And then my business will be wound up, and I shall get a share of something, somehow. And then I'll begin again, in the quietest of ways. How can one be wise without experience? Robina must go away. She has never been satisfied with what I've done for her, and she can't expect me to forget her reproaches now. She can take a situation of some kind. Her manners have been polished up by the society she has met here, so she has lost nothing by being with me. It don't matter much to me what she is, for I won't set up in business in London again, but far down in the country. I'll allow mother a little if I can, but, anyhow, she has her pension, and must have more clothes by her now than she can ever wear out."

But while this undercurrent of thought really flowed through Fergus's soul, his self-knowledge went no deeper than the surface whereon rippled such self-delusions as these:—

"I have gone wrong for want of such a woman as Millicent to be my household friend. I don't think she is happy. Why should we not both endeavour to make the best of what remains for each other? She must be lonely, poor thing, for all the rest of her family have their own private interests. I can't be marrying her for her money—nobody can say that. What are her seven or eight hundred pounds to a man in my position? And I could get them if I liked without marrying her. If I wanted to marry money, I would marry tens of thousands. No, I want herself. I could face poverty, or any change with her; and I am sure I shall be a great comfort and stronghold to her. I'll tell her at once that I won't borrow her money, nor have anything to do with it, except by our both having one purse henceforth. We'll be married as soon as possible—in about a week, say. And there is no need to trouble her about my business arrangements. I'll tell her the truth that I'm going out of business, and really she could not understand the ins and outs if I tried to explain them; and, besides, I myself know everything will be all right, though she, as a woman, might be nervous. We shall be in Acre Hall for another six months, while things are wound up. Mother and Robina can go and stay at the seaside for that while."

The thought of six months in the glories of Acre Hall, in Milly's society, and with the responsibilities, at least, of business lifted off his shoulders, was a prospect beyond which such a mind as Fergus's did not care to look. To others, it might have seemed only a respite. But that was all his ambition now. He lived in such a hot momentary struggle, that the thought of even a week's freedom was like ages of paradise.

The last ray of spring daylight had just faded as he took his hat from the rail in the hall, and started off for the Harveys' cottage. He seemed no longer to notice the presence of the disagreeable man in the hall—an omission which that worthy resented by grunting to himself.

"I should think that difficulties is that gemman's native air. His eye seemed to take me in as natural as if I was a walking-stick."

LENDING UNTO THE LORD.

IN the year 1858, I was sent by the Home Mission Committee to evangelize in the north of Scotland, among the fishermen around Aberdeen. My head-quarters were in the "Granite City," where I lodged in Marischal Street. Going up and down the street, my attention was attracted by an old blind man who sat by the bridge there, with a dog with a tin cup in its mouth. There he sat, day after day, chanting in a very dolorous way, these grand old words, in Proverbs xix. 17: "He that hath pity upon the poor lendeth unto the Lord; and that which he hath given will He pay him again."

Again in 1859, I was sent upon the same mission still farther north. I halted for a night in Aberdeen, on my way, and passing through the same street, I found the old man still by the bridge, with his dog and tin cup, crying as before: "He that hath pity upon the poor lendeth unto the Lord," &c. One was with me the second time, who dropped by my side ere twelve months more had gone. The Master came, all unlooked for, and called her, and she passed away into the unseen, to join the great company in the better country. Oft this old blind man, chanting these grand, but much-forgotten words, has come before my mind embalmed with endearing associations, telling alike of this high and holy duty, and of the shortness of the time given us to pursue this work of love, and how near the glorious reaping time may be, in which every deed of kindness will be rewarded a hundred-fold.

This old blind man, crying for alms, was just the tangible proof of our Lord's words, "The poor ye have always with you," and that a great part of practical Christianity is to act aright towards them. We have not the living Christ to minister to personally upon earth; nor his dead body to embalm with sweet spices now; but we have the poor with us always, and them He commends to the dearest sympathies of all who love Him. He himself was truly the friend of the poor when He was in the world, and all who follow Him are moved by the same spirit.

HE WHO HATH PITY UPON THE POOR.

This is the man we have set before us. He pities the poor. Poverty, poorness, is one of the evils which are found in a fallen world. But for sin it would have had no place. It would have been quite unknown, for there would have been all store of blessing in the Father's love. It was not in the father's house the prodigal son began to be in want, but in the strange country afar off, when he had spent all his living.

Poorness, "poorteth," is the outward characteristic type of the state of misery into which man has fallen by forsaking God. It is not, however, in all cases immediately associated with sin, though it is oft directly caused by it. The poor are in want of all that nature urgently calls for. They lack bread and raiment—the two great common wants. They are in sore straits, having no resources—no power to help themselves. They are sunk in deep misery—their homes are desolate. All is sad, and full of sorrow, and weakness, and disease. No joy casts its light across their paths—cold and chilling shadows are ever over them.

But here is one who pities the poor. Pity is one of the noblest features which characterize our common nature. It is that which binds the heart of a mother to her child in loving affection, leading her to sacrifice her own comfort for its life, and to watch over it night and day with untiring, uncomplaining care.

The pitiful man is a gracious man, full of tender mercy, ever ready to help. His heart beats responsive to every cry of distress. He locks not up his sympathies in unlovely, base selfishness. He is a man of a warm heart, which guides and constrains him unto all loving ways. He seeks not his own, but another's wealth. He looks out for the distressed and needy. He thinks of his "poor brother," and he, whatever priest or Levite may do, does not pass by on the other side. His is an operative, giving pity, which cannot be satisfied with saying, "Be ye warmed and filled." His gracious heart opens his hand, and even his home for the needy.

We should note this well, it is pity which gives, and it is given in pity. The pitying heart bestows the gift, and the gift is given in a loving, delicate way—so unlike the bishop who would not give a penny to a beggar, but when asked was quite ready to bestow his blessing: "Keep thy blessing," said the beggar, "for were it worth a penny I should not have it." No, he who pitieth the poor is like good Bishop Wilson, of Sodor and Man, who prayed God thus: "Give me grace that, while I am able, I shall never turn away my face from any poor man, that thy face, and the light of thy countenance, may never be turned away from me."

HE LENDETH UNTO THE LORD.

We have hitherto had before us only these two; the poor with their sad wants, and him who has pity upon them. But now another appears upon the scene—the Mighty God! Though he who pitieth is unconscious of any other, save the poor one whom he has helped, being privy to his kindness, and though he would be pained to think of its being known, it is yet known to Him who is over both rich and poor. Strange as it doubtless is, all which he did, as he thought to the poor alone, has in reality been done to the Lord. His pitying kindness, which made their hearts to rejoice, has made the Lord his debtor! We have his own word for it: "He that hath pity upon the poor leendeth unto the Lord."

How beautiful is the illustration our Lord gives of this in his account of the awards of the judgment day!—"Then shall the King say unto them on his right hand, Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world: for I was an hungred, and ye gave me meat: I was thirsty, and ye gave me drink: I was a stranger, and ye took me in: naked, and ye clothed me: I was sick, and ye visited me: I was in prison, and ye came unto me." Why, they know nothing whatever of this, and cannot understand what He means. "Lord," say they, "when saw we thee an hungred, and fed thee? or thirsty, and gave thee drink? When saw we thee a stranger, and took thee in? or naked, and clothed thee? Or when saw we thee sick, or in prison, and came unto thee?" They are amazed at his words, but He explains the whole: "And the King shall answer and say unto them, Verily I say unto you, Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me."

How wondrous is this, in entertaining the poor, they have entertained not angels, but the Lord himself! Having given of the substance with which He endowed them to those in need, not thinking of anything further, they have lent unto the Lord. For all He counts himself their debtor.

THE LORD WILL PAY HIM AGAIN.

The light in which the Lord regards it is remarkable; it is as a debt which He is due. He might indeed have looked upon it simply as the discharge of a duty to our common humanity, an act also imperatively due to himself, from whom life and all its endowments are received. Yet He esteems this kindness to the poor so highly that He is pleased to charge it as something done to himself, which He will pay again.

How this ennoble all deeds of kindness! Again and again in Scripture we have the same assurance: "Blessed is he that considereth the poor: the Lord will deliver him in time of trouble. He shall be blessed upon the earth. . . . The Lord will strengthen him upon the bed of languishing," "He that hath mercy on the poor, happy is he." "God is not unrighteous to forget your work and labour of love, which ye have showed towards his name, in that ye have ministered to the saints, and do minister." Here all is remembered, and shall be paid with interest, and with what blessed coin! The perishing gold of earth is transmuted into heavenly treasure, conferring happiness now, and insuring deliverance when dark days of trouble come. The Lord will remember all, when they are poor, and stand in need of the help and comfort which earth cannot bestow. Then He will appear for their help, and will sustain, and comfort, and deliver, and the peace of God, which passeth all understanding, will keep their hearts and minds through Jesus Christ, assuring them of life and joy for evermore. "Let the hands of the widow," says an old writer, "the bowels of the poor, be thy storehouse. Here it is sure, no thief can steal it, no time can rust it, no change can lose it, and here it is improved. A temporal gift is here turned into an eternal reward. No ground so fruitful as the bosom of the poor, that brings forth an hundredfold."

The Rev. Thomas Scott, the "Commentator," gives a striking illustration of the Lord's paying again, in the case of an estimable female servant in whom he was interested. She had in her early days laid past some money for the time when she could no longer labour. But her aged parents, falling into want, she unhesitatingly devoted all her savings to their support, in the full confidence that if she ever came to stand in need of help, the Lord, in whom she trusted, would provide for her necessity. She found, years after, that her confidence was not misplaced, for though she was entirely laid aside for many years, in the latter part of her life, with an incurable disease, and might have been forced to seek a home in the workhouse, the Lord, who is ever faithful to his promise, raised up a friend for her in Mr. Scott, who, knowing her worth, and feeling how uncongenial the workhouse would be to her, determined to take her into his own home. He felt, during the seventeen or eighteen years that he kept her, that he was preserving from very great distress a poor sufferer whom, he doubted not, the Saviour and Judge of the world would own, in the great day of retribution, as intimately related to himself, and an heir of his kingdom.

And Thomas Scott himself, who was far from being in affluent circumstances, found also a gracious reward. He was not left to bear this burden alone. Different persons, whom she had served, sent him sums of money on her account, and at one time, when he was quite in a strait for funds for his parsonage-house, which he was building, one of them left him a legacy of £200, which quite tided him over his difficulty, "the whole forming," as he said, "a remarkable illustration of the text, 'He that hath pity upon the poor, lendeth unto the Lord; and that which he hath given will He pay him again.'"

The first great thing to make sure of is to get right with God, to be reconciled unto Him by Jesus Christ, that we may have a happy sense of his love, and be under the gracious guidance of his Spirit. Then let us seek to live out this life, following Him who, though "He was rich, for our sakes became poor, that we through his poverty might be rich." This is true Christianity, which even the world can understand and appreciate.

Let the rich know their great responsibilities. The good of riches lieth in its use. "Charge them that are rich," said the Apostle Paul, "that they do good, that they be rich in good works, ready to distribute, willing to communicate." "He is not rich that lays up much, but that gives much." "There is a sore evil," says Solomon, "which I have seen under the sun, namely, riches kept for the owners thereof to their hurt."

May God grant that we, knowing his Son, and filled with his Spirit, may rise to all the nobleness of this heavenly life upon earth, going about doing good, as we have opportunity.

DEATH AND BIRTH.

"The day of death is better than the day of one's birth."—ECCLES. vii. 1.

THY tasselled clouds, O Morn, are bright,
Hung in the amber of the sky ;
When on the world dawns thy young light,
And day walks forth in majesty !

But richer hues those clouds o'erspread,
Which gather round the glowing west ;
When day's great monarch stoops his head,
In curtained glory to his rest.

And bright, O Spring, thy myriad leaves,
Checkering the earth with gold and green ;
When year's young sunlight through them weaves
Its robe of many-coloured sheen !
But colours, deeper in their dye,
Golden and glorious, gleaming wide,
Clothe Autumn's woods, while through them sigh
The winds which mourn their short-lived pride.
II. N.S.

Each passing year, each parting day,
The radiance of its youth outvies,
And Nature, swan-like, pours her lay,
In sweetest measures, when she dies.
Soul, fear not, though thy day declines !
Life's echoes wake from dying earth ;
Heaven's gold in every sere leaf shines,
"Thy death is better than thy birth !"

OUR DISTRICT.

BY A RIVER-SIDE VISITOR.

IX.—SHINY SMITH.

ALTHOUGH, as my readers will have inferred, I often met "Shiny" Smith in my walks abroad, and generally entered into conversation with him when we did meet, it was all in vain when I attempted to gratify my curiosity regarding him. Whenever I tried to "draw" him, either as to his antecedents or any detailed explanation as to the means whereby he then "knocked out" a living, I found that he was not to be "had." I tried others with little better result. "You see," explained one worthy to whom I spoke, and who had sought Shiny's advice on sundry occasions when he had been "in trouble," "you see Shiny came into this quarter promiscuous like, and though we could guess as he must a' been up to some cross game, none of us knew exactly what it was, and he worn't the chap to tell. And right he is! A cove as is on the cross shouldn't let no one—neighbour, nor pal, nor no one—know any more about him than he can help. The more they know about you, the more likely they are to have a pull over you; and I pities the feller as a pal can put the screw on. Very often you'd be skinned alive almost, only it mostly happens as it's a case of screw for screw, so as the one's afraid, the other daren't. Any one would have to get up early though, to get a pull on Shiny. He's the knowigest cove as ever I come across. He's up to every move on the board; he can talk like a book, and do anythink that needs to be done with a pen. Them's his tools,—his head-piece, and his tongue, and his pen, I mean,—and whether you're square, or whether you're cross, them seems to be the best tools to make your way with. He does a lot better than any of us roughs,—you should see his crib, it's quite a spicy affair."

This was the most I could learn at second hand. After my unsuccessful attempts to "draw" Shiny himself, I wished I had accepted the invitation to enter his dwelling, which he gave me on the morning on which he suggested the organization of the Sugar-Bags Defence Fund. I would, no doubt, in the mood in which he then was, have got his story from him. I fully determined that if another such chance occurred I would not fail to avail myself of it; and at length, by the merest accident, the opportunity did offer.

One day, when passing through the street in which Shiny lived, I came upon a crowd that had been drawn together by the sight of "a horse down." It was attached to a cart heavily laden with stone, and had fallen in a painful position. Shiny, with his coat off and his shoulder literally to the wheel, was giving directions to a number of the men, who worked with a will—harder probably than they had worked for many a day before—to release and raise the horse. After a great deal of pulling and tugging and a little cutting of straps, the poor creature was loosed from its harness, and lay, only held down by the shafts, while Shiny called for all who could find room to bear a hand in backing the cart. I joined in the work. I got a station at one of the wheels, and when, after several unsuccessful attempts, we at last effected our purpose, I found—the day being wet—my hands and parts of my clothing covered with mud. It was not till the horse was upon its legs that Shiny noticed me, and then he greeted me with—

"Halloo, sir! I see you've been putting your pound in like the rest of us. I didn't know we had one of the broad-cloth brigade among the helpers."

He spoke with the utmost good humour, and in the same way I answered—

"Oh, people don't think of their cloth in such an affair as this!"

"Say, some people," he answered; "I think I've known 'highly respectables' who would have thought twice—and had 'don't' for their second thought—over any such idea as soiling hands or garments to lift a poor old cart horse out of the mud. Save me from such men, say I. However, I see you stand in need of a wash and a brush like me. Will you step into my place?"

I replied that I would be glad to do so; whereupon Shiny, nodding an adieu to the knot of men who were still standing by, led the way to his home. When we had, in Shiny's phrase, put ourselves straight, in a neatly appointed little bed-room, we returned to the second of Shiny's apartments, which was furnished partly as a sitting-room, partly as an office. It was carpeted, there was an array of glass ware on a cupboard-sideboard in one corner of it, and a number of fairly good engravings hanging upon the walls, a good-sized pier-glass over the chimney-piece, and on the chimney-piece, by way of smaller ornaments, were a tobacco-jar, with lucifer and spill-holders to match, a fancy cigar-case, and a number of pipes. But across the window stood a pedestal writing-table plentifully bestrewn with papers; a smaller writing-table for fireside use was put away in a recess, and against the wall opposite to the fire-place was a small, well-polished, mahogany book-case. Stepping over to the book-case, I saw that two out of its three shelves were filled with cheap novels; the other with a number of law books, several volumes of a racing calendar, and a few other works also bearing upon horse-racing. Having before heard that Shiny was a sort of irregular lawyer, I was not surprised at seeing the law books, but I was at seeing the racing ones. Though slangy, Shiny was not horsey in his talk, and I knew sufficient of his habits of life to be certain that he did not, in racing phrase, "follow the horses." My curiosity was excited, and by way of saying something that might induce him to talk on the point, I observed, running my finger over the backs of the books as I spoke—

"Law and racing is a rather curious combination, isn't it?"

"Not more curious than racing and commerce, or racing and almost any other profession or calling you might name would be. Horse-racing—or I should say betting, the end to which horse-racing is the means—is a disease that has affected members of every class, as few know better than I do. It has just struck me," he added, laughing, though in a forced manner, and with a tone of bitterness, "that law and betting, for that is really what racing comes to, are rather an appropriate combination. They are both games of chance, only while law ruins its thousands, betting ruins its tens of thousands." He paused for a moment, and then, looking me hard in the face, slowly added, "betting brought me to be what I am—made first a fool and then a rogue of me." As he uttered the last words it seemed to occur to him suddenly that he had said too much, and, instantly resuming his usual jerky, voluble, don't-careish manner of talk, he went on—

"But as the poet says, 'thereby hangs a tale,' which there is no need to tell now. This"—waving his hand round the room—"is my little crib, not exactly in the marble-hall style, but I think I may say cosey, eh?"

"It is a comfortable little room," I said.

"Ah, yes!" he exclaimed, "the room is well enough, but what sort of things are done in it, that's about what you are thinking, eh?"

"Well, something of that sort," I answered, imitating his own bluntness; "I was thinking that you were a strange character, and that, for more reasons than curiosity, I would like to know more about you."

For about a minute's space he stood biting the corners of his moustache silently, then, with the air of one come to a resolution, he placed a chair for me—we had been standing up till this time—and, seating himself on the other side of the fireplace, said quietly—

"Well, you shall, and I'll tell you why! Not because I can give you a tip or two about 'things not generally known,' but because mine is a horrid example story, and you may be in a position to turn such a story to good account. I know I'm a bad lot, but, I'm not quite so far gone as to wish to see others come down as I have. To give you a touch of the flowery—you know my weakness—'I know myself a villain,' but I do not

'Deem
The rest no better than the thing I seem.'

And now here goes! In the first place, my name is not Smith, but as in this case there is nothing in a name, I'll still be Smith to you—for my parents' sake, though they are now in their quiet grave. My father was a tradesman in one of the smaller county towns, and was a bit of a somebody there—was twice elected a member of the Town Council, and that sort of thing, you know. He died while I was a boy at school, but left my mother sufficient for what her friends styled 'a genteel subsistence.' It wasn't so much, however, but what she had to pinch hard to be able to article me to a solicitor in the town, and find me in clothes and pocket-money while I was serving my articles. She did her duty by me like the loving, self-denying mother she was, but I did not do my duty by myself, and, above all, I did not do it by her. I was a handsome, healthy young fellow, and I went in for being a dashing, go-a-head one. I formed acquaintance with a set made up of fast clerks and tradesmen's sons, and a number of well-dressed loafers, who hung on to rich relations. In company with this set, I took to haunting the billiard-rooms of one of the hotels in the town, and soon fell into bad habits—late hours, drinking, playing, and betting; especially betting. From joining in lotteries on the big races, I gradually progressed to 'backing my fancy' for them, and 'making a book' upon them. I took to studying the sporting papers—to watching the betting on and results of races, and looking forward for the 'tips' of the 'prophets.' From betting half-crowns and crowns, I got to half-sovereigns, and sovereigns, and so on to 'fivers' and 'tenners.' Occasionally I 'picked up a trifle,' but as a rule I lost, and was consequently nearly always hard up, and drawing upon my mother to the utmost extent that she could let me, for, fortunately for her, a part of her money was 'tied up.' At last—for though it was three years before the smash came, there is no use in dwelling upon details—I had got hold of what I was assured was a 'dead certainty,' and I had an opportunity of backing it at a long price. If I could only raise twenty pounds I could 'put it on' to win me a thousand, and then I could put myself straight, and drop betting. But how to get the twenty pounds? that was the rub. I had pumped my mother dry for the time being, and I was already in debt to every friend who had anything to lend; and yet it was such a pity to miss this chance for the sake of a paltry twenty-pound note. Well, I dare say you guess the rest! Satan finds mischief for wicked brains, as well as idle hands, to do. By this time I had got to such a position in the office that most of the money paid in to it passed through my hands, and—to make a long story short—being in a position to do so, I borrowed twenty pounds of the money of my principal. Of course I said to myself that it was only borrowing, for I would pay it back out of my winnings the moment they were paid to me. I had scarcely sent the money to the agent who was to 'put it on' for me, when I repented having taken it. My sin was swift in finding me out. My bet was made a month before the race on which it depended, and during that month I was in an agony of suspense, and was tortured by the recollection, which I had managed to stifle till the wrong was done, of the many other 'tips' that had been given to me as dead certainties, that had turned out to be dead losses, and I vowed that if this only did prove a win, it should be my last betting transaction."

Before he had reached this point, Shiny's usual jaunty manner had deserted him. He spoke earnestly and was evidently agitated, and now paused to moisten his parched lips; and having done this and drawn a long breath, he resumed his narrative.

"I dare say I shouldn't have kept these vows," he said, "but anyway, I wasn't put to the test on that score. I went a hundred miles to see the race run. There were seventeen started for it, but practically it was reduced to a match between my horse—as I called it—and another, and during the greater part of the race mine looked as if it was going to win. As it led the way round the last turn, I was already mentally disposing of my gains, and saying what a fool I should have been to have missed such a chance; but it was a case of counting chickens before they were hatched. The other horse began to gain inch by inch, till at a hundred yards from the winning post they were head and head; and they ran the rest of the distance so closely locked together that it was impossible for any one but the judge to be certain which had won until the numbers were hoisted on the telegraph board. When the numbers did go up that of my horse was second; and as I had backed it for an absolute win, it might as well have been last so far as I was concerned. When I looked at the numbers I felt my heart grow cold and my head dizzy. I felt like a branded man, but neither on the race-course nor when I got home did any one seem to notice anything special in my appearance. All the same, I suffered horribly in my mind. I couldn't sleep at night or rest by day. My one thought was that I must make up the stolen money somehow, and I saw but one way;—to take more money and continue betting, in the hope that luck would turn, and that by some fortunate hit I should be able to replace all. This was the plan I acted upon; but I no longer called it borrowing even to myself. I had got to the desperate stage; and only argued that, if luck didn't turn, I might as well be hung for a sheep as a lamb. Well, luck didn't turn; I lost bet after bet. I grew more and more reckless and dissipated; so much so that my governor received a very pointed hint that I was going fast, and people were wondering how I did it. That meant, Look into your accounts; he interpreted it aright, and the result was the discovery of my defalcations. I was given into custody. I had, of course, been in a certain measure prepared for such a possibility; and I can honestly say, that I believe my chief feeling on being arrested was a sense of relief. But to my poor mother the news was a terrible blow. She almost lost her reason. She offered to pay the money and more; to sacrifice all she had in the world if I was only allowed to go free. She went down on her knees to the man, and grovelled at his feet to beg for mercy for me; but he was not to be turned. I was taken before the magistrate, and then for the first time I felt the full bitterness of my humiliation. It was on all hands voted an interesting case, and the little court was crowded; and as I glanced round it I saw scores of faces that I knew looking down on me, and scarcely one with a touch of pity on it; and yet, guilty as I was, I might well have been pitied, for I was utterly bowed down with shame and remorse. In one place were my boon companions sneering and sniggering; in another, a group of my mother's friends, looking sad for her sake; and the magistrate himself had been a friend of my father's. I pleaded guilty, was committed for trial, and sent to prison till the assizes.

"At the assize trial there was much the same scene, but with one difference, that was very material to me. My mother had, despite the advice of her friends, insisted upon being present; and when I was sentenced, her grief found vent in a cry that told her heart was broken. I shall never forget that cry; it has rang in my ears a thousand times since in my sleeping as well as my waking hours, and I believe I shall hear it when I am dying."

He spoke in a quiet, even tone, but with a depth of feeling that one would have thought him incapable of under any circumstances. Despite his efforts to master his emotion, for some moments he was unable to proceed; and, to fill up the pause, I observed—

"Well, seeing with what fair chances you started, yours is a sad story."

"Yes, as bitterly bad and sad as it is true," he answered, "and none the less sad a story from being a common one. I've no doubt that, as in my case, it often means ruin for more than one, and the bringing of grey heads with sorrow to the grave. However, to go on with my own story! The judge argued—justly enough, I dare say—that my being educated and in a fair position was an aggravation of my offence, and gave me five years penal. I served it out within fifteen months, and then I got my ticket. My mother had died a year before that, and had left me what little she had by that time to leave; for, what with the drag I had been upon her, her having been under the doctor's hands from the day on which she heard me sentenced, part of her income dying with her, and one thing and another, a little over a clear hundred was all I had to draw. What I ought to have done when I got the money was of course to have gone to a new world and started life afresh as a new man; but I didn't. While I was doing my time I gave full rein to the very tidy share of devil-may-careishness that was in my nature; and I went back to my native town in high-flying style, dressed within an inch of my life, looking in the 'I-care-for-nobody-not-I' style, and fully determined not to knuckle-down. I spoke to old acquaintances as if nothing had happened; but it wouldn't act; those of them whose good opinion was worth having cold-shouldered me. So, shrugging my shoulders, I said to myself 'Very well, good people all, so let it be. If you won't have me at any less a price than doing the "umble," you shan't have me at all. You go in for treating me as a black sheep, and I shall go in for being one. So here goes for some racket in the world's-mine-oyster line.'

During the latter part of his speech, his manner again underwent a change. The earnestness and sadness that had previously characterized it vanished, and he was again the rattling, slangy, self-possessed customer I had always found him before. Marking the change, I could not refrain from exclaiming—

"Shiny's himself again!"

"Yes, Shiny's himself again," he answered promptly. "We've all at least one weak joint in our armour, and you've just seen me touched in mine. When I speak of my mother I am for the moment another self than Shiny Smith—the self I might have been. And now we had, perhaps, better drop the subject; what I have told you is really the horrid example part of my story; the only part of it I expect that you would ever be able to turn to any beneficial purpose. I don't see myself that what else I have to tell is calculated to point a moral; still, as I've broken the ice, I'm good to go on if you wish it."

As it was to know something of his present way of life that I was chiefly curious, I replied that I would like him to proceed.

"All right, then," he answered; "anything to oblige, so here goes. In the first place, I had quite made up my mind not to put myself within the clutches of the law again; and being limited to that extent, I came to the conclusion that Flat-catching must be my game."

"And what might flat-catching be?" I interrupted, seeing that he was taking it for granted that I knew the meaning of the term.

"Well, broadly," he answered, smiling, "it means swindling—in detail it may mean anything, from promoting bubble companies, down to revealing the future for seven stamps. The only question with me was, what particular line of the business I should take to. Circumstanced as I was, the bubble company sort of thing was several cuts above me, while I felt several cuts above the lowest branches ; such, for instance, as professing to sell purses with a couple of half-crowns in them at a shilling each, or doing the sham smuggler, who tackles your neither-man-nor-boy flat, saluting him as 'shipmate,' and 'having' him over lettuce-leaf cigars, which he tells him are the real right sort, and have never paid duty, shiver his old timbers. At length came the right idea! You've been pretty well fleeced over horse-racing, it said, now take to fleecing—turn tipster."

"Tipster!" I interrupted again, as Shiny would have hurried on.

"Yes, advertising prophet, you know," he rejoined. "'The certain winner of any race sent on receipt of thirty stamps and a stamped addressed envelope. Fortune-maker. Box A.' That's about the simplest style of it, but you generally stick it in warmer than that. However, that's a digression at the present moment. Having decided on the tipster line, I went in for it scientifically. I had about sixty pounds of my money left, and I went and took a lodging in the neighbourhood of a great training district, in order that my address might have a business-like smack about it. I bought those volumes of racing matter that attracted your attention just now, and I may say for myself that I studied them and the sporting papers, and otherwise did what I could to form a sound judgment on the coming events, for the benefit of my especial flats. It was then too, I ought to mention, that I took the not uncommon name of Smith—for the benefit of those I came in contact with, understand, not as my advertising signature, that was of a more flowery character. By way of a start I put forth a special 'draw,' running in this style: 'The advertiser, who has long been connected with racing stables, has got hold of so great a "moral" for the C— Handicap, that he has backed it for all he is worth ; but, as it is still at long odds, and is such a chance as only offers once in a life-time, he is anxious to raise a little more to put on, and in order to do so is willing to send the name of the horse to a limited number of subscribers, on receipt of sixty stamps, and a promise of ten per cent. on winnings from each. Address, &c., &c.' I put this into half-a-dozen sporting papers, and though a first web I flatter myself it looked as pretty a little parlour as ever any sportingly inclined fly was invited to walk into. They walked into it to the tune of fourteen pound over and above the cost of advertising. Nor was that all ; I sent the name of one horse to some, and of other horses to others, and lo, and behold, one of them did prove the winner ; and those who had received that name sent me something like another ten pound, as the promised percentage on their winnings. I did a number of other 'specials,' with much the same profitable result. Then as that line could only be followed over some half-dozen of the biggest races of the year, I adopted a signature, and started as regular professional tipster, offering to tell the winners of every race of the season, and coming down to a thirteen stamp 'inspirer' for ordinary events, and thirty for the more important ones. I flatter myself that my advertisements in that character were second to few in their draw-power. I seasoned high, come what would. Whether I happened to spot the winner or failed to name it in the half-dozen or dozen that I sent out to my 'subscribers,' it was all the same. I always promised the certain winner, and invariably announced 'Glorious success! Glorious success!' and the flats gorged the bait freely. I used to have fifty and sixty letters a week in a general way, and sometimes a hundred or more."

At this point I once more interrupted the flow of his narrative to observe that it was surprising that any person capable of writing a letter should be so easily duped.

"Ah, that's where you make a mistake," laughed Shiny ; "it's seeming surprising to you only shows your innocence. It's true some of the letters show their writers to be ignorant, but the majority of them are from people of fair education and position. If you had seen the names and callings of some of the writers you'd have been a lot more surprised than you are now. But there, it's only at a first glance that there appears anything wonderful about it ; if you look into it you'll see it's only a case of 'poor human nature.' The man that said there was so many million people in the world mostly fools, was a deal nearer the mark than I dare say he supposed—you must be a knave to know how many fools there really are in the world, and how very foolish they are. As another flat-catcher that I was acquainted with used to say, fools make knaves ; they are so plentiful and so tempting."

"And did you never experience any compunction in the matter?" I asked.

"Well, compunction is a weakness in a flat-catcher," he answered, smiling ; "still, I don't mind owning that I did have sharp touches of it at times. In some of the letters it was easy enough to detect the germs of a case of bankruptcy, or embezzlement, or robbery from an employer, and when I came across these a fellow-feeling made me wondrous kind. But, to have warned the flats I should have had to blow the gaff upon myself; to have written saying that tipping was all humbug, tipsters all rogues, and that the only really reliable and profitable advice I could give in connection with betting was not to bet at all. If I had possessed courage and principle enough to have acted in that self-sacrificing manner, I should have had a lot too much principle to have ever been a flat-catcher. When, over some particular letter, my conscience did prick me, I always got cornered by the thought that to warn the flat meant to extinguish myself. So in the end I just let things drift, salving my conscience by saying to myself that perhaps my warning would be of no use if I did send it; for to tell a flat that he is a flat, is, generally speaking, to put his back up, as he is the man of all others who is most given to think himself a sharper; and that as fools will part with their money, they might as well part with a little of it to me as to anybody else. If it had only been the thirteen or thirty stamps they sent me, I should never have had a second thought about the matter in any case; but sending for the tip is only the beginning of the bad end—it's backing the tip that does the mischief. The tipster tells his subscribers that the horse he names can't lose, and advises them to 'lump the money on it,' back it for all they are worth, and the like. Acting upon the advice, they in too many instances lose all they are worth; and then, as was the case with me, they console themselves by thinking 'better luck next time,' and 'borrow' some one else's money to perform with, and, as I did, come to grief through it. I'm doing the open confession business with you now, and you may take my word for it that thousands are ruined through betting who are never seen on a racecourse, and could scarcely tell the difference between a race-horse and a towel-horse, simply through the facilities that the sporting papers give for ruination. If I had happened to be a lawmaker instead of a law-breaker, it is one of the things I would have gone in for putting down."

"As it was, you appear to have made a pretty good thing out of it," I said.

"Very fair," he answered, quite unabashed. "But it turned out to be too good to last. I received letters accusing me of not having given tips in return for stamps sent, and some complaints of the same kind were sent to the sporting papers. As a matter of fact I had never received the letters. I said so. The others could only repeat that they had certainly sent them, and the upshot was that a sorter in the local post-office was taken up for stealing letters addressed to me. It was his own superiors who entrapped him; but I was obliged to give evidence before the magistrate, and this gave an opportunity to the solicitor for the defence to show me up as a flat-catcher. The case attracted notice, and turned public attention for a moment to the subject of racing tipsters: and then, behold, the sporting newspaper, without which I should have been powerless and the flats safe, turned moral against me. It certainly assumed a virtue when it had it not. I fancy people had been writing to it about its share in the business, for it was through its answers to correspondents that it attacked me. It would look better of the fellow, it said, to disgorge some of his own plunder than to help to send a poor sorter to prison. It suggested that I probably knew as much about the points of a race-horse, as a race-horse did about shorthand; and finally it intimated that it would insert no more of the fellow's advertisements. Under these circumstances I changed my signature, changed my newspaper, and varied the style of my advertisements. That would have been quite sufficient as far as the flats were concerned; but it wasn't good enough to take in the paper that was down on me. The fellow was at it again, it said, and pointed out how and where, and it stuck to me so close that there was nothing left for me but to shut up shop as a tipster."

"What did you take to then?" I asked, as Shiny made a rather lengthy pause.

"I didn't take to anything for a while, though I thought over a good many things. My first idea was to start a loan office."

"Had you capital enough to turn money-lender then?" I exclaimed in surprise.

"No, not to turn money-lender," he answered, with significant emphasis; "but more than enough to work the inquiry fee dodge with."

"And how might the inquiry fee dodge be worked?" I asked.

"Well, it's done on the bounce," he replied. "You advertise yourself as say 'The Metropolitan and Provincial Discount and Loan Association. Money advanced in sums of from £5 to £500, at five per cent. interest, with or without security. Forms of proposal on application.' Of course your forms of proposal are immensely business-looking papers. They are form 16, number 30,814, are officially headed, and printed in with as much legal and financial sounding jargon as they can well stand. You send them to all who ask, and when they come back filled up, you strike your fish. On another form you write to say that the Board of Directors having considered the proposal are prepared to advance the sum required immediately upon receiving the report of their district agent, who will be instructed to forward the business, on receipt of the usual inquiry fee, which, owing to the extensive character of their business, the directors of the M. and P. Association were enabled to fix at half a guinea instead of the guinea charged by other offices. In nine cases out of ten the half-guinea is sent, and then, after waiting a day or two, you write regretting that the report of the district agent is such that the directors have decided that they cannot make the advance at the low rate of interest at which they do business, and as they strictly confine themselves to the one class of business, they must decline the proposal."

"Then the inquiry-fee dodge, as you call it, is simply a more elaborate system of flat-catching than the racing one," I said.

"Just so," he said, "more elaborate and more profitable. I knew two who were in the line, and their worst weeks used to be better than my best at the tipping."

"How was it you didn't take to it, then; not from tenderness of conscience, I suppose?"

"No, but from tenderness of feeling about myself," he answered. "I had had enough of penal servitude to be extra cautious about running the risk of that again. It was a hundred to one that the game could be carried on safely, but still, by being the secretary, the board of directors, the district agent, and everything else all in one, you did leave yourself open to a charge of obtaining money under false pretences. This made me hesitate about the inquiry fee business and other things of the kind that I thought of, though I dare say I should have gone in for something of the kind at last, if I hadn't drifted into this quarter of the world."

As he finished speaking, he pushed his chair back from the fire a little way, took a pipe from his pocket and began to fill it, like a man who had come to the end of his subject; but adopting something of his own freedom of manner, I said—

"But how did you come to drift into this quarter of the world? It's hardly fair of you to want to leave off just at the part of your story in which, you must know, I am most likely to be interested."

"Well, it's not that," he said; "I don't want to come the to-be-continued-in-our next stroke over you."

"Of course, if there is anything you think it would be imprudent to tell me," I answered, "I have nothing further to say."

"Well, what further I have to tell of myself is, I suppose, neither better nor worse than what I have already told, as it is all to the same effect—that I am a bad lot. I hesitated about speaking about the game I'm up to at present because it occurred to me that I might let out something that I had no right to do about others. However, I can tell you in a general way, and put you fly to a wrinkle or two without injuring any one. While I was still thinking about what I should do, after being knocked out of time as a tipster, I met a publican with whom I was acquainted through having been in the habit of going into his booth at race meetings. I found that his publichouse was down here, and had a small music hall attached to it, and that he was in search of a person to act as chairman and manager of this hall. After some talk it was arranged that I was to have the berth at a pound a week and my board and lodgings, and so I came into the neighbourhood. The hall was a very low one, its chief frequenters being the thieves, crimps, and other queer characters of the district; drunken sailors, and the sort of women that are likely to be found in such company. And here I got to know all the 'queer' set. Well, as I dare say you know, in most queer districts there is a character known among the initiated as the Penman, or the 'Scolard.' He is Jack the penman, or Scolard Johnson, or some such name; and he is usually a man of blown character, but of some education and cleverness. I soon found out that there was no such character in this district, and on the other hand, some of the cleverer and more high-flying customers among the queer set soon found out not only that I was a bit of a penman, and a bit of a 'scolard,' but a bit of a lawyer too. They took to coming to ask me just to write them that bit of a thing, or advise them over the other; and sometimes they voluntarily paid very liberally for those slight services. This suggested to me that here was an opening, and acting on the idea, I set up as what I may call attorney and correspondent general to the neighbourhood, giving up the managership but retaining the chairmanship of the music hall, which brings me in fifteen shillings a week."

"What might an attorney and correspondent general of your stamp do?" I asked.

"Oh, a thousand and one odd things."

"But name some of them," I persisted.

"Well, he will advise with the friends or relations of people 'in trouble;' he will give opinions upon cases which, if he knows his business, he will have put to him supposititious ones, he will—if he can—explain the nature or value of papers which a client may have chanced to find. He will write—for friends who are not able to write—to people who are under hiding because they are 'wanted;' he will read the answers when there are any; and in the way of smaller things he will draw out subscription-list headings, cards for 'Friendly Leads,'—that is, raffles for the benefit of people who have just got into or out of 'trouble,'—and begging petitions. Sometimes, too, he may do a little in the way of such things as 'touching up' a rent book which is going to be used as a reference by a person seeking a house, and which would be the reverse of a recommendation if not touched up; or putting a crimp's accounts against sailors into shape."

Such was the story of Shiny Smith's life, as told by himself, such the chances he had thrown away, such the misery he had brought upon himself and others, such the disreputable means by which he had lived—by which he was living. I felt that it was a most wretched story—a story which he who had told it had well classed as of the "horrid example" class. At first, as I have mentioned, he spoke with evident feeling, but during the latter part of his discourse he had spoken in much his usual manner. It was apparent, however, that to a certain extent the manner was on this occasion forced ; that "the still small voice" was making itself heard : that he felt, if not remorse, at least some sense of his degradation. Seeing this, and remembering that I had more than once heard of his doing really kind acts, I felt that there must still be some good in him, and while I could not but condemn, neither could I but pity him. I appealed to the good that I believe was yet left in him. I urged upon him to give up the life he was leading ; to seek out some honest way of earning a livelihood. He admitted that his present mode of life was degraded, that at times he keenly felt it to be so, and that an honest life would be infinitely preferable. But that sin of pride by which so many have fallen, prevented him from attempting to raise himself out of the slough into which he had sunk. To be admitted into the ranks of honest men again, he said, he would have to do the humble and penitential, and start at the very bottom of the ladder. It was what he ought to do, perhaps, might be a fitting part of his punishment, but for all that he couldn't bring himself to do it—he wouldn't "knuckle down." This was all I could get out of him, either on this or the several subsequent occasions when as opportunity offered I renewed the subject with him, and again urged him to turn from his wickedness.

But what my weak endeavours had failed to effect, a Higher Power brought about in its own good time and manner. The hand of affliction was laid upon Shiny. He was prostrated upon a sick-bed, and for the rainy day of sickness he had made no preparation. In the course of a few weeks he was reduced to a state of destitution, and might have died of want and neglect had it not been for the kindness of Bible Braidy. The old man assisted him so far as his own scanty means would allow, and finally got him removed to the workhouse infirmary. There, after many weeks of suffering, the disease was mastered. At this stage, Braidy informed me that Shiny wished to see me. I found him much broken down, and very weak ; and I could see tears gather in his eyes as I shook hands with him, and expressed my sorrow at seeing him so ill. He murmured some expression of thanks ; and then, having lain still for a few minutes, he said, in a trembling voice, but with a faint smile creeping over his wasted features—

"I hope you believe in the old adage that it is never too late to mend."

"I do," I answered.

"Well, I'm sorry I should have left it so late ; but I do mean, with God's help, to mend now. I have been brought back from the verge of the grave, so that I may call myself a new man ; I feel as if a new heart had been given to me, and when I get about again, I want to lead a better life. Will you help me?"

"Willingly ! In any way that I can," I answered promptly. "What is your own idea?"

Briefly put, his views were that he must leave the neighbourhood, and that he would like to leave England altogether, and commence a new life in a new world.

The latter idea I thought was a good one ; and, after I had left him, it occurred to me that I could perhaps enable him to carry it out.

I had, a week or two previously, made the acquaintance of an agent of a large firm of railway contractors, who had come down to our district to superintend the fitting out and loading of a vessel that was to take out a number of men who had been engaged for the construction of a railway in New Zealand. Report said he had been a navy, and had worked his way up to his present position. He was a big, burly fellow, rather coarse of feature, and rather blustering in manner, but, under his roughness of exterior, there was a good deal of shrewdness and kindness of heart. To this man I spoke about Shiny ; and the result was that, after some little negotiation, he agreed to take him out as his own clerk. On the day of sailing, Braidy and I saw him off, and, though, being still weak, he was much affected at parting, he went away in a hopeful spirit. He arrived safely at his destination, and occasionally wrote to old Braidy. From his letters—which were very modestly written—we gathered that he was doing very well, and was faithful to the good resolves he had made. Three years after his departure, the agent who had so kindly afforded him the opportunity of retrieving himself, returned to England, bringing with him from Shiny a handsome present for old Braidy, and a graceful little token of remembrance for myself. He amply confirmed all that Shiny's letters had said. He had been so satisfied with Shiny's behaviour, and so pleased with his ability, that he had been strongly desirous of retaining him as his clerk ; but Shiny had not cared about coming back to the old country. He had got another engagement in the colony, and there, liked by all who knew him, he was leading an honest, respectable, God-fearing life. The path of reformation had been made easy for him ; he was humbly thankful that it had been so, and grateful to all who had helped him in that path.

GOD'S JUDGMENTS.

Being Thoughts on the Fiftieth Psalm.

BY PRINCIPAL CANDLISH, D.D.

II.

THE judicial dealing itself is now to be considered. It is a dealing, first, with the true Israel of God (vers. 7—15); then, secondly, with worldly professors, or believers lapsing, or in danger of lapsing into worldly conformity (vers. 16—23).

This division of the parties cited for trial and judgment is not perhaps very distinctly marked. The description of the entire company placed at the bar (ver. 5) might seem to single out and identify only the honest and truly godly portion of the Church, or of Zion's children, to the exclusion of all mere pretenders and false professors; while, on the other hand, the affectionate appeal made in the first instance (ver. 7) to the true-hearted, on behalf of true and spiritual worship, as distinguished from the stern rebuke of hypocrisy and formalism at its close (ver. 16), is so general as apparently to embrace the whole nation or community of Israel; the entire professing church.

There is a meaning in this. It is of set purpose that this relaxation in the style of address is considerably made.

When the citation is issued generally to all and sundry in Israel, it is framed in language appropriate strictly and properly to the spiritual portion of the Church. For that describes, and that alone can describe, the mark to which they are all required to come up; the standard by which they must all be tested and tried. But when the truly sincere and spiritual in the mixed nation or society of professed believers are singled out, as they are the first who are required to stand for judgment, they are invited under a less precise form of citation:—in more vague and general terms.

There is here an important practical lesson.

When God comes forth to deal judicially with his Church, as visible on the earth,—embracing all who profess the true religion and their households,—he is entitled to take his stand upon the highest estimate that can be formed of the position which they profess to occupy. That must be the standard of his judgment. It is in the view of that standard that the collective Church is brought to trial. But it is otherwise when a distinction is recognised; when the true and real members of the Church are viewed as separate from mere nominal professors, and are singled out in the first instance, and called upon for some special dealing. These, the more conscientious and earnest-minded of the body,—whose very conscientiousness and earnestness of mind may cause undue timidity or scrupulosity,—the Lord may with great condescension, and a kind and considerate accommodation to their infirmity, summon upon a somewhat lower or wider call. He may call them simply in the character common to all, without any special designation of distinguishing spirituality such as they themselves might be the last to recognise and appropriate as theirs. ~

Thus, to give an illustration. If, as an officer, I have to review the entire troop under my command, I summon them all collectively in terms descriptive of the highest style and standard of qualification, and the highest code of honour, which true and genuine soldiership knows. But if I have to make a selection, and single out the élite of my company for admonition and encouragement, I may avoid, of set purpose, the mode of address which I used before;—that which, in its fullest import, the very men whom I wish to gather round me might be the most apt to hesitate about applying to themselves. I invite them therefore now in the most general terms I can find, to indicate simply their position as soldiers, and their relation to me as their captain. In the one case, I wish to deepen the feeling of responsibility. In the other case, my desire is to overcome bashfulness and encourage freedom of access. When I call the whole body miscellaneously, I call them in terms fitted to raise to the highest pitch their sense of what they ought to be. When I seek to win the well-conditioned and well-disposed among them, that I may hold a separate and special dealing with them, as to anything I have to allege against their general conduct, or anything I have to complain of particularly in their intercourse personally with myself, I appeal to them in language to which they may readily respond. I do not say, Come to me as heroes; but, Come to me simply as soldiers. All who are willing to appear before me as soldiers, I am prepared to examine, and try, and judge; according to the fair tests, not of highest heroism, but of simple soldiership. "Hear, therefore, O my people, and I will speak ; O Israel, and I will testify against thee."

I. "I am God, even thy God" (ver. 7). This opening of the appeal is in the same gracious line. It is fitted to encourage an approach to the throne of judgment, as being still the throne of grace. In the near view of this solemn scene, the Church, the tried and spiritual Church, embraced in the mixed company professing godliness, had been moved to say, "Our God shall come." And He comes as her God accordingly. I am God, greatly to be feared. I am thy God, on whom thou canst rely, even when I have occasion to plead with thee.

Thus, before I speak of anything I have to testify concerning thee ; before I set in order my case or my complaint ; I must remind thee of what I am in myself, and of what I am in my relation to thee. Thou must be prepared to recognise, both my sovereignty and my grace ; my sovereignty as God, and my grace as thy God.

If I am to thee God merely, and not thy God ; if thou regardest me vaguely and generally as God ; with no definite apprehension of what personally and relatively I am to thee ; then, whatever emotions of wonder, gratitude, and awe may occasionally visit thy bosom, I can have no real place in thy heart. Thou feelest as if thou wert in the presence of a goodly picture or imposing statue. Thou art affected as by a touching tale or poem. But real and actual fellowship between me and thee—mind with mind and heart with heart—there cannot be. I am a sort of abstraction or abstract idea to thee ; and when I speak to thee of what I most of all desire to have from thee, and indeed cannot bear to want,—the intelligent, confiding love of thy whole soul,—it is as if I asked thee to adore an image or embrace a cloud.

If, again, I am thy God merely, and not in thy esteem God over all ; if thou simply reckonest on me as accommodating myself to thee, and becoming what thy natural mind would wish me to be ; if thou makest a convenience of me, and conceivest of me as if I had nothing to care for but only thy ease and safety, and existed in fact only for thee and for thy sake ; then, whatever dreamy ideas of gratitude may flit across thy selfish fancy, thou canst have no real sense of what must ever be the uppermost consideration when, as the one only living and true God, I come to plead with my creatures and my children ; made originally in my image, and through grace remade in that likeness again ; made thus, and re-made for my service, and for the glory of my great name. Know therefore, and understand, that when I come forth to search and try and judge thee, in order to the clearing up of all that may be outstanding between us, I come as "God, even thy God."

II. In accordance with this principle, the Lord indicates what he will not make matter of complaint in this trial:—"I will not reprove thee for thy sacrifices or thy burnt offerings, to have been continually before me. I will take no bullock out of thy house, nor he goats out of thy folds. For every beast of the forest is mine, and the cattle upon a thousand hills. I know all the fowls of the mountains: and the wild beasts of the field are mine. If I were hungry, I would not tell thee: for the world is mine, and the fulness thereof. Will I eat the flesh of bulls, or drink the blood of goats?" (Vers. 8—13.)

We have here one of the many passages in which sacrificial offerings and observances are spoken of, as it might seem, in disparaging terms. This is to be accounted for in one or other of two different ways. Sometimes these services are brought into comparison with the atoning work of Christ. In the anticipated glory and excellency, the fulness and sufficiency of that great propitiation, by the blood of the Lamb of God who taketh away the sin of the world, all the legal and Levitical methods of expiation are swallowed up and superseded. On other occasions, they are brought, as mere outward observances, into contrast with the inward and spiritual graces of faith and love; the religion of the heart as distinguished from that of form and ceremony. The previous explanation, however, is never to be overlooked. It is always assumed that the question of the expiation of our guilt and our consequent peace with God, is settled upon the footing of an adequate substitutionary sacrifice, offered and accepted on our behalf, and appropriated by us as ours. The only outstanding inquiry is held to be, what kind of offering or service is now to be rendered; not in order to the making of our peace with God, but upon the faith of our peace with God being already and otherwise secured. That is evidently the case here.

To the question thus put, the uniform and only answer is that all ritual observances whatever must give place to the cultivation of a pure heart and a holy life. Even when the law appointing them remained in force, they were utterly worthless when weighed in the balance against godliness, brotherly kindness, and charity. And under the more spiritual dispensation of the gospel, the pre-eminence of the moral over the formal, the obedience of the inner man over the bodily exercise of mere routine, which indeed profiteth nothing, is still more clearly and conspicuously seen.

Hence, such passages as Samuel's rebuke of Saül (1 Sam. xv. 22); the query and reply in Micah's prophecy (chap. vi. 5—8); or David's pathetic and plaintive strain of penitence (Psalm li. 16, 17). And hence the grave, indignant irony of the Lord's pleading here with his holy ones, who have made a covenant with him by sacrifice, the one all-sufficient sacrifice of the great atonement.

The irony, if so solemn an expostulation may be so characterized, has in it a twofold argument. It is based, first, on the Lord's independence of them (vers. 10—12), and secondly, on their unprofitableness to Him (ver. 13). It thus gives the double death-blow to the religion of ceremony, whatever guise it may assume. For beneath every formal system of worship, underlying it and pervading it, these two elements of self-deception are to be always found. On the one hand, I have the presumption to imagine that somehow God has occasion for me and for my services; while, on the other hand, I have the lurking impression that what I offer may be something that, for its own sake, God will value. With strong disdain the Lord, as it were, spurns away both of these delusions. Have I any need of you or your gifts? Can you minister to my gratification or aggrandisement? Are you not at the very best unprofitable servants? It is a humbling and mortifying remonstrance! Yes; in one view. But in another view, it is altogether gracious. It sets you free, if only you are guileless and true-hearted, from all embarrassment in drawing near to God: all uneasiness that might spring out of an apprehension of failure in some circumstance of state or point of form. There is relief as well as rebuke in this affectionate appeal.

Let me be called into the audience-hall, or rather invited into the secret chamber, of one whom I hold in highest esteem, and with whom it is the first desire of my heart to stand well. I linger long on the threshold of the door. I have undefined misgivings and alarms. And these are apt to turn far more on the formal details and ceremonials of the anticipated interview than on the essential merits of any question that is likely to be raised. I fear lest I may be found wanting in the observance of some of the rules of courtly etiquette, and should fail to render some customary act of homage, some minute outward expression of respect, in the confusion of mind and manners caused by my being ushered into so august a presence. What a deliverance to hear from the great and good man's own lips that I am not to stand upon ceremony with him; that he has no intention of dealing with me on the score of any of those civilities about which I have been so nervous. He graciously assures me that in regard to mere external matters of that sort, he is not at all fastidious, or sensitive, or ready to take offence. He desires and encourages me to lay aside form or state; to get out of it and beyond it. He has something else to confer with me about, and something far more serious. There is no time for trifling scruples of "meats or drinks." The essentials of the kingdom are the real matters at issue, the only subjects of consideration and conversation; "righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Ghost."

III. Thus the Lord, in this kindly but yet faithful judicial reckoning with you, comes at once to the point. And what is the point? The answer is, like himself, full of grace and truth, "Offer unto God thanksgivings." Sacrifice to God praise.

There is to be a sacrifice. Only let it be the sacrifice of praise; the offering of thankfulness; a thank-offering. Other kinds of sacrifice he asks not. He will not accept them at your hands. Most certainly he will not upbraid you for the want of them. But thanksgiving is grateful to him. Praise is welcome. Your thankful hearts may have the satisfaction of presenting to him something with which he will really be well pleased. Some acknowledgment, some expression of your dependence on him and his goodness to you, may be expected from you as an unburdening of your own grateful souls and a tribute due to him. What is the acknowledgment, the expression to be?

1. "Pay thy vows unto the Most High." Let there be fidelity to your covenant engagements. It is assumed that you are under covenant engagements; having "made a covenant with God by sacrifice." That implies, not only his covenanting with you, but your covenanting with him. You have, therefore, vows to pay. They may be vows of a special sort, on special occasions. You have been in trouble, and have experienced seasonable and signal deliverance. It has been manifestly all of grace. Under a grateful sense of it, you have been moved at the time to make vows to the Lord. That must have been your experience under your first apprehension of the grace of God, in your being persuaded and enabled to embrace the offered Saviour, and believe in him as loving you and giving himself up for you. It must have been your experience often since. It should be your experience now. It is your position under every new instance of the Lord's mercy. You are under vow. It cannot be otherwise. You cannot help it. There may be no articulate utterance of a promise in words; no signing and sealing of a written pledge; no registered deed of formal and explicit engagement. Still, virtually and substantially, there must be what is equivalent to vowing, in your "making a covenant with God by sacrifice." There must be a recognition of the obligations under which your thus making a covenant lays you. You do form, you cannot help forming, you ought to be forming, suitable resolutions. You may not, perhaps, cast them into the technical mould of formal oaths. You may choose rather, and it may be safer, to frame them after the fashion of prayers. Still, to all intents and purposes, they are vows; and they bind your consciences as vows. And your first sacrifice thanksgiving consists in your paying your vows. Let it be a prompt and honest paying of them.

(1.) Let it be prompt. "When thou vowest a vow unto God, defer not to pay it; for He hath no pleasure in fools; pay that which thou hast vowed" (Eccles. v. 4.) For surely it is folly to defer or postpone the paying of your vow; to think of gaining time or gathering courage for the carrying out of measures, upon which, in an hour of seriousness or a day of awakening, you have been led and moved to resolve. Proverbially, delays are dangerous. Your only safety in this matter lies in your obeying the precept, "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might." If you have a right hand to cut off, or a right eye to pluck out, what do you gain by temporising? What but the ebbing of your fortitude and firmness, and the relaxing of your determination? Whatever, at any season of your spiritual history, whether your first coming to Christ, or any subsequent instance of his gracious dealing with you; whatever here and now occurs to you as in your present frame and in your present circumstances right and expedient, in a spiritual point of view; right, as the owning of grace got; expedient, as a precaution against the risk of grace being lost; be it but a dim and doubtful idea that is now presenting itself to you, that if you were in some one slight particular to change or modify your course of life,—your way of thinking, studying, feeling, acting,—it would be the better with you and for you; and you might the better hope rightly to own the past mercy of God, and to see more of that mercy still: entering more into the full blessedness of the "covenant which you make with Him by sacrifice." Brother! It is a vow! It is as truly and solemnly a vow as if it were written with thy blood. It is written for thee with the blood of that awful sacrifice. Trifle not with it. Pay it now.

(2.) Let the paying of your vows be not only prompt and instant, but honest and full. "It is a snare, after vows, to make inquiry" (Prov. xx. 25). That is a seasonable and most needful admonition of wisdom. There is indeed a snare here. Did I commit myself so far? Am I so deeply pledged? Did I after all mean to go all the length in the way of a close walk with God, a complete separation from the world, and a strenuous course of good-doing, as some of my Christian friends would persuade me, and even my own heart testifies, or all but testifies, that I did? Surely there must be some exaggeration here, or I was too enthusiastic and too sanguine. There must be room for reconsideration in cool blood. I may have been misled by the persuasion of others, and by my own excitement. I can judge more calmly and more coolly now.

Yes, brother. And thou canst judge more heartlessly too, and more selfishly, and more dishonestly and dishonourably.

Pay that which thou hast vowed. It is to the Most High that thou hast sworn. It is with him that thou hast made a covenant by sacrifice. "Neither say thou before the angel that it was an error" (Eccles. v. 6). No human witness may be forthcoming to convict thee of unfaithfulness in saying that. But the Angel of the covenant knows what thy vow was. And any angel sent to minister to thee knows it too. Make no inquiry after vowing, neither say, It was an error. Grieve not the Holy Spirit.

2. All the more may you be moved thus promptly and honourably to pay your vows unto the Most High, when you take into account the other part of the offering of thanksgiving about which the Lord is dealing with you; "Call upon me in the day of trouble: I will deliver thee, and thou shalt glorify me" (ver. 15).

There is a natural connection and sequence here. Faithfulness in paying your vows, out of gratitude for deliverances already experienced, must tend in its very exercise to give you confidence and courage in addressing to God renewed applications for fresh deliverances, as they are needed from time to time.

That, however, is a low view to take of this singularly loving word of God to you.

For what rich grace is here! What tender condescension! What fatherly consideration! To make your calling upon him in the time of trouble, not a privilege merely, but a duty! Nay, to make it a part, and the chief, the crowning part, of the only service or sacrifice of praise which he is inclined to ask or cares to accept at your hands! What amazing kindness!

And yet, if I am indeed his child, understanding and entering into his fatherly heart, I can partly comprehend and sympathize with it.

I am myself a father, and my son has fallen into grief or met with misfortune, out of which it has been my joy to get him extricated. At a great cost of time and treasure, of tears and pains, and it may be even of blood, I have rescued him from destruction, retrieved his ruined fortunes, repaired his shattered health, and placed him on a right footing before all men. Well. He is not ungrateful. He loves my house and company. He is desirous of testifying his sense of my bounty and his attachment to my person. I see him always as he goes in and out, anxious to devise means and methods of showing his thankfulness; ever having recourse to new ways of proving that he is not ungrateful, or reproaching himself for the inadequacy of the returns he makes to me for all my favours. But I cut short his uneasy efforts to repay me. I put an end to his misgivings and his strainings. No, my son! I want no such gifts or offerings—no such acts of homage or humiliation—as you are troubling yourself about. You and I are surely now on such terms with one another as to make unnecessary all mere formal state on my part, and all mere formal services on your part. All I am concerned for is, that you should faithfully fulfil the good purposes you formed in the day of your deliverance from the calamity that was overwhelming you; and that if a similar calamity befalls you again—if a like serious crisis meets you again—or, indeed, any trial, be it ever so trivial—you will pay me the compliment, do me the favour or the justice, give me the pleasure, of helping you again as I have helped you before. So you gratify me by giving me the opportunity of delivering you again. So you best honour me by showing that you know and trust me. “Call, therefore, upon me in the time of trouble. I will deliver thee, and thou shalt glorify me.”

CHRISTMAS DAY IN PARIS,

TWO GIRLS.

CHRISTMAS again! One year ago
I danced these dreary streets along,
As if a bird should thrust its song
Against the bosom of the snow;
Birds hold their peace, by winter smit,
But we sang spring-time into it.
I had forgotten till to-day
That we had ever been so gay.
But when the bells, so tender then,
Rained through our dim and deadly air
Their irony of Peace and Prayer,
The Past leapt back to me again,
And I remembered and believed
There was a life before we grieved.
Only a year ago that chime
Crept to our pillow like a kiss,
Waking to hope and light and bliss,
And sweetness of the holy time;
(Silence it now, it wrings my soul—
Our Christmas bells should only toll.)

Forlorn Cécile, who, by my side
Wins one late hour of pale repose,
Was then as radiant as a rose,
And kept her state, a promised bride;
(O! touch her not! Perchance her eyes
See Christmas kept in Paradise,
Where he for whom she lived, forgets
The last long misery of Metz!)
Then daybreak shouted, “Wake! Arouse!
The gap between two joys is past!”
And up we answered to the blast,
And shook the sleep-dew from our brows,
And smoothed our robes, and tressed our hair,
And found the harvest of the night,
Greeting and gift and quick delight,
Like manna, fallen everywhere.
I, gathering all with laugh and jest,
While she, all breathless, in her breast,
Hid his first ring, nor wore it till
He bent her blushes to his will;

(You see, she hides it there this morn ;
 His mother weeps to see it worn.)
 Then forth, scarce reining in our smiles,
 We went to worship—we were nine—
 The chorus seemed to soar and shine
 Like summer through the misty aisles ;
 We knew each other's tones, and leant
 On all the spreading links of love,
 While the great windows blazed above
 Like doors into the firmament,
 And taught our heavenward hopes to climb,
 Because our hearts were then so bright
 We might have thought that upper Light
 Less than the loveliness of Time.—
 Christmas again ! Oh, day of woe !
 Can that have been one year ago ?
 The habit of this daily weight,
 Which is so heavy and so great,
 Has grown about us till we deem
 That our lost life was but a dream ;
 And yet we had it ; well I know,
 The loss and the remembrance rise
 Bare, black, and leafless through the snow,
 Confronting our bewildered eyes
 With all we had one year ago,
 Without a trace, except the pain,
 Of what can never come again.

When first we knew what was to be
 They bade us go, Cécile and me,
 We were too young, they said, to bear
 The torture of this slow despair ;
 Ay, even my father bade us go ;
 " You are but flowers," he said, " and so
 What can you do ? Go hence and bloom,
 That is your business." We repeat,
 " Flowers let us be about your feet
 To make a pleasance through the gloom."
 And then he yielded, and we stayed,
 And, hour by hour, the world decayed.
 We know it now ; the secret touch
 Of Death reveals itself at length,
 And all the signs of failing strength
 We would not recognise as such,
 We can interpret now. It seems
 They all meant dying ! Shallow gleams
 Flitted around us in the haze,
 And clarions made a noise of hope,
 Which fell to silence, and the rays
 Sank to that night wherein we grope,
 For Doom is speaking loud and clear,
 " Watchers give up ! The end is here."

" Why," cries my father, " have you stayed ?
 You are but flowers, and you must fade."
 So be it,—grace us with a glance,
 Flowers, cast upon the corpse of France.

The day begins again, and we Go forth to worship—we are three ;
 The mothers, his and ours, abide
 At home, made feeble by their tears,
 For each has lost a son, and fears
 Lest any tell her how he died
 Where, in the battle-twilight, lie
 Those dread dark heaps of agony.
 Victor—he's just eighteen—we know
 Was with D'Aurelles ten weeks ago,
 But walls of silence round us close
 Even harder than the wall of foes,
 And when they bring the wounded in,
 And, with unpractised hands, we strive
 To keep some gasping soul alive,
 Or soothe his passage out of sin,
 'Mid all the sights we dare not see,
 And sounds we cannot cease to hear,
 " Lies Victor in such jeopardy ?"
 We think, " and are there helpers near ?"
 Thérèse we name not ; she lay dead
 Before the siege was two months old—
 Our little lamb, that brooked not cold,
 Slain by the strangeness and the dread.
 To hide her with our hearts we thought—
 She took them from us, and is gone ;
 What can we pray for now, since nought
 Is left for hope to fix upon ?
 Vague though our knowledge be of all
 Beyond the inexorable wall,
 The curtain which no cry can lift,
 We know the wreck is there, adrift
 Against some sinking strip of light,
 And dropping into desperate night,
 We know God's promise is made void,
 Seed-time and harvest are destroyed ;
 The common heart, the simple home,
 Are wrung with fameless martyrdom ;
 The days to come die in their birth,
 And the great Past, with all its names,
 Shrunk to an epitaph, proclaims
 " Here was the Joy of all the earth."
 Lord Christ, thou art so long withdrawn
 The faithless world forgets Thy face—
 Break through upon this bitter place,
 And tread our darkness into Dawn !

M. B. SMEDLEY.

AGAINST THE STREAM:

The Story of an Heroic Age in England.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE SCHONBERG-COTTA FAMILY."

CHAPTER XX.

THAT letter of my father's made me passionately long to return, not from its words so much as for the absence of any of the dry little sayings which were natural to him, when no weight was on him. And I could not bear the humility. Clapham was not better than he was.

However, engagements had been made for us until June; and through May, at all events, we must stay.

Moreover, at the period when that letter arrived, I was a little indignant with Clapham on more grounds than one. I had expressed a wish to see the chapel in which John Wesley preached. Cousin Crichton had replied by some disparaging remarks about the Methodists,—excellent people, he admitted, in their way, in their day, and in their place. Also, one of my cousins (it was dear good Phœbe the reformer) had said to me something that offended me about Piers. I cannot remember the words. They were, I know, very circumspect and very kind; but they implied that Piers was not up to the Clapham standard of religious experience. I was very indignant, and as that was the first time I had appeared in that character at Clapham, my cousins were proportionately astonished.

I said they were as bad as the people who would not tolerate any one if he lisped, or said sh instead of s; that they would not have recognised St. Andrew, or Nathanael, or any of the dear quiet saints, who would not protest and talk;—that they would have believed in Apollon more than in St. Paul.

I said there was the Age of the Heroes who fought the dragons and founded the cities, and the Age of the settled, comfortable citizens, who lived in the cities and kept festivals over the skeletons of the slain dragons; that King David had his "first three," and then his thirties, and his thousands; that Clapham and its citizens and its festivals were excellent, but where would Clapham have been, unless the Wesleys and Whitefield had faced the mobs of heathen miners and colliers, led on sometimes by worse than heathen rich people, had drawn the colliers out of their dens and holes, and conquered them for Christ—risking life over and over again, "being destitute, afflicted, tormented;" hunted out of the church they loved—for too much love to her lost children; hunted down by lost multitudes for determining to save them from their sins; avenging themselves on the church by bringing back to her countless of her lost, to inspire her with new life,—avenging themselves on the savage mob by bringing back thousands of them to God. I said it was not true that the Wesleys were separatists. They had been hunted out for beginning the very work the Church was now waking up to share. England had driven the loyal colonists in America into becoming a nation, and the Church of England had driven the orthodox Methodists into becoming a sect.

I said it was excellent to preach good things to reverent hearers in orderly pulpits, and to contend in great meetings against great wrongs; but that it was something more to go alone after one lost sheep into perilous wildernesses, and to face alone for Christ's love a crowd of angry men ready to stone you.

I said that the men and women who welcomed shipwrecked men to the shore, and fed and clothed and attended them—were dear and good and Christian; but that the one man who swam through the surf with the rope to the wreck was more, and his work such as the shipwrecked men and those who helped them should never forget.

I said, finally, that Piers was better ten thousand times than I was, who was always imposing on people just because I had a miserable, un-English way of saying out all I felt, whilst he never could say a tithe of what he felt, and so did it. I said I did think there might be too much religious talk, and I was sure there might be too much religious judging; and that there were good people in the world at other places besides Clapham, and there had been in other ages before 1801, and in other churches besides our own.

And I said I did sometimes wish that every one at Clapham was not so terribly rich; and that if the apostles, even, had had to live among them, I thought after a little while it must have been hard for them not to have felt it a sin of omission not to have some thousands a year.

Cousin Phœbe was evidently a little tempted to admit me among her company of impracticable people to be reformed. She said, with a funny little buttoning of her lips, "that, at all events, there was no danger of mistaking me for one of the silent saints."

But they had all the sunniest and sweetest tempers. Cousin Matilda at once adopted me as one of her "uncomfortable people to comfort;" and Cousin Harriet, the most open to new convictions and new admirations, generously conceded that she did think, from my descriptions, Abbot's Weir must have some of the best people possible in it.

And afterwards, dear little Martha having heard of the little passage of arms, put her thin arms round me and said—

"I like you for being in a little fury about your brother, Cousin Bride; for I think there never was any one, any boy, I mean, so kind and helpful and gentle. He saw why it was my head was a little uncomfortable on this couch, and he made me that little wooden support, you know, to keep up the pillows. I do wish he could have been a doctor! He says so little, and does so quietly and exactly the right thing. It is such a rest!"

The little sufferer had attracted out of Piers the secret he so rarely spoke of, of the studies and ambitions he had freely relinquished without ever letting my father know he had sacrificed anything—to be able to help him in his business, and that Francis might go to the University.

But Piers was the most trying of all. For when I told him of these fears of Phœbe's (being anxious moreover to draw him out of a little cloud of reserve and gravity which I had observed on him lately), he only said—"Perhaps she is more than half right, Bride. I am sure I am not what I want to be; and will be, I trust," he added softly.

This humility of Piers, and now of my father's, in this letter, were too provoking; more especially because they really meant it.

Humility was not precisely the characteristic of my cousin Crichtons, or of Clapham, as I saw it, except of dear Cousin Barbara, who was not "gifted" in any way, she said, and greatly marvelled at and delighted in the powers of utterance of her daughters. In secret, no doubt, they thought humbly of themselves; but then I did not see them in secret; the diaries which, no doubt, they all kept, not being yet published. But in public the whole active, benevolent, flourishing community admired each other too sincerely and too demonstratively not to see reflected in themselves some of the glow they shed on others. They did not blow trumpets before themselves, but they did liberally serenade each other.

And I considered that Piers and my father had been over-impressed by those triumphant clarions.

However, it was only when summoned by such self-depreciation or such suspicions, to little counter trumpeting of my own, that I lost the joyous sense of the stir and the victory around me, and left for a minute that Gulf Stream of love and life which swept me on in its full warm tides, and swept summer to so many shores.

CHAPTER XXI.

CLAIRE wrote of the shady violet-banks and primroses in the dear old fields and lanes around Abbot's Weir, and of the carpets of hyacinths in the woods by the river.

At Clapham, too, it was May; and what May meant at Clapham was indeed as unknown to Abbot's Weir as the sudden rush of floral life in the springs of Lapland. Externally, Clapham had its own share of the glories of spring. Ranges of real country-fields, and of useful farm buildings (picturesque, if picturesque at all, by necessity or accident, not by self-conscious design), lay between the Common and London.

Every garden overflowed with treasures of blossom into the roads, laburnums, "dropping wells of fire," thorns, pink and white, lilacs, and, in the regions around, avenues of horse-chestnut, like processions awaiting some joyous bridal,—trees unknown to Abbot's Weir, embosomed in its ancient oak-woods. And in sunny nooks, under those walked paradises, beds of sweet violets, crocuses, clusters of anemones. And harmonizing all, the green of well-kept lawns, penetrating in little creeks and bays under the shadow of the groves and shrubberies.

Little paradises walled in from the wilderness, where certainly no thorns and briars, and apparently no serpent could enter; between these paradises incessant interchanges of kindness and friendly intercourse; and from these paradises, full of "all that was pleasant to the eye or good for food," incessant ministrations of mercy towards the wilderness which, unhappily, still existed outside, through ministering men and women who frankly recognised each other as little less than angelic; rivers of beneficence, flowing forth East and West and North and South, and "glad tidings of great joy," sincerely dearer to many of the happy dwellers than any treasures besides, sounding forth far and wide from that oasis of exceptional bliss.

As to me, I felt often, during that May, altogether lapped in paradise, body, soul, and spirit. Never can I forget the effect of the first of those May meetings, since become the butts of so many witticisms, on me. Exeter Hall was not built until thirty years afterwards, but the human materials of Exeter Hall were there. It was the meeting of the London Missionary Society to which I was first taken.

We met in Freemasons' Hall.

The Church Missionary Society had been established three years before, in 1798. The Bible Society, to meet a dearth of the Scriptures, to which all existing means of supply were inadequate, was instituted two years later (1803). The Baptist Missions had been commenced, with their first subscriptions of £132s. 6d., and their one man ready for any sacrifice, William Carey, in 1786. Earliest of all in this new spring-tide, many years before, in 1731, the Moravian Brethren had sent out their first missionaries, and had sent them to the most despised and rejected of all—the slaves in the West Indies.

The London Missionary Society had been in existence five years, called into being by the dying request of Lady Huntingdon. It was intended to embrace all sections of the Christian Church. This original purpose has been, in a great measure, frustrated, partly perhaps by the narrowness of human prejudice, but chiefly, I think, by the largeness of Divine purpose, working out that deeper unity which is to be attained, not by a neutralising mixture of all the elements in a mild and ineffective compound, but by a free development of all in the fulness of life. It was found impossible for the various Christian societies to work together, when the proclamation of the gospel of the common Christianity had drawn together communities of converts. But in those days the various societies not having increased to the dimensions they afterwards reached, there was leisure and good-will for each to sympathize with all.

Accordingly my Cousin Crichton, although a firm and orderly churchman, took us all to the London Missionary Meeting.

Those who think Christian missions have effected nothing, would do well to consider the state of the world outside Christendom at the commencement of this century. At that time all the societies were groping their way in the thick darkness. In India, the British merchants were still strenuously opposing the disturbing of the natives, and of their own commerce, by the introduction of Christianity.

A year before, barred out by England from all her stations, Carey had landed at the Danish settlement at Serampore.

Except a few scattered converts of Schwarz, there was not a native Protestant church in India. The words of Carey, on his outward voyage, "that Africa, for missionary work, was not far from England, and Madagascar very little farther," seemed to us then a wild visionary speculation.

There was not a single Christian in the Pacific Islands, or in Madagascar, scarcely in Africa; not one in connection with the reformed churches in China or Japan. It was not until nearly three centuries after the Reformation era, that the Protestant churches awoke collectively, to the fact of the existence of an outside world to be evangelized.

And now at length, at the beginning of the century, England, "mistress of the seas," and mother of almost all the European colonies that live, had wakened up to her great work of evangelization.

At that time the societies had yet to investigate the distinctions of heathenism, ranging from savage fetish worship to religions with systems more subtle than any European philosophies, and with sacred books older than the New Testament; and had yet to invent the various weapons needed to meet these various antagonists. All the battle-field had to be reconnoitred; all the weapons had to be forged. The Bible had to be translated into almost every language of the heathen world. Carey alone translated the whole, or portions of it, into thirty of the dialects of India. For this purpose the grand armoury of the Bible Society was gradually extended.

In many cases the written language had to be created. Between the translation of the Bible into Gothic by Ulphilas in the fourth century and the work of the Bible Society in the nineteenth, not a translation of the Scriptures had been made for the instruction and conversion of races outside Christendom.

It is true that only three centuries since the third—namely the tenth, eleventh, and fifteenth—are unmarked by fresh translations; but these were made for people already within the pale of Christendom.

Nearly three hundred years ago Luther's "German Bible for the German Folk" had begun to create a German people and a German language; but now first the Christian church arose to place the Testament of her Lord in the hands of the whole race. He came to redeem and to rule.

In India the missionaries found the Sacred

Books of the Buddhist and of Mahomet, but not that of Christ. In Africa and the islands of the Pacific they found not only no Bible, but no grammar, no alphabet, no written language. In other regions of the East they found indeed translations of the Scriptures, but in ancient forms of speech which had died out of the comprehension of the people for more than a thousand years.

Every missionary in those days went on a voyage of discovery. What missionary meetings and reports were in those days it is difficult almost to recall in these. The centuries of slumber were over—

"And all the long pent stream of life Dashed downward in a cataract."

All this was embodied to me, and to hundreds besides me, in that unpicturesque assembly in Freemasons' Hall.

Do we not, indeed, often aim too low, in our æsthetics and symbolisms? Is not sculpture higher than architecture? Is not a statue of Phidias, a Venus of Milo, more than the temple which may enshrine it? What do we mean by a shrine, but the sacred casket which the temple, as an outer case, enshrines? What do we mean by a shrine, unless the jewel is more precious than the casket?

And through the religion which centres in the Incarnation, the truth that "the true Shechinah is man," receives a new force which is simply infinite. More precious, capable of a diviner beauty than the most glorious cathedral, is the simplest, the lowliest of the crowd of human beings gathered in it.

To me, in those youthful days, when the hymn of glory to Christ was sung in unison, it seemed like nothing so much as that "voice of a great multitude, and of many waters, and of mighty thunderings," heard of old in heaven.

I knew some of the quiet fountains from which those many waters flowed, the little clouds, "no bigger than a man's hand," in which the electric force was gathered, which burst forth in that thunder of thanksgiving. I knew not only the Claphams, but the Abbot's Weirs.

This crowd had not been formed, did not live as a crowd. It was gathered, the best part of it, one by one from quiet hidden places, scattered through the land, where the little band, and the solitary worker, were pulling "against the stream" of their own little district. It had been gathered, one by one, as I believed, in quiet hidden hours, when each human spirit there had been brought into solitary communion with the Divine Spirit.

Fastidious criticism may pull its rhythm and symbolism to pieces; but to me the sung by the thousand earnest voices, was like a great coronation anthem.

I seemed visibly, audibly, as well as inwardly—"body, soul, and spirit"—translated into some glorious cathedral, into the temple which all cathedrals symbolize, "the pattern showed in the Mount of God."

I thought, I felt—all Clapham, all "evangelical" England felt—that the whole Church was entering on a new era, a new spring-tide, a new outpouring from the pure well of life, a new enkindling of the divine fires.

Were we altogether wrong? Was there nothing of Pentecost in the fire which has cleansed the actual literal hell of our prisons, consumed the devilish iniquity of slavery out of nation after nation, enkindled the light of the love of Christ in countless dark places which knew not a ray of it, in India, China, Africa, and the islands of the sea, given the Bible in nearly eighty new tongues to those who speak them?

Has there arisen before or afterwards, since apostolic days, a movement which has accomplished more in the divine literature written on "the tables of the heart," which, as we believe, shall never be superseded and become obsolete? or in that Church Architecture which no fires of Advent judgment shall dissolve?

CHAPTER XXII.

It was on the last day of May; the day which at Abbot's Weir troops of children still celebrated by singing old songs from door to door, carrying garlands festooned with strings of eggs. Every incident of that day is as clear to my memory as a proof-engraving, bitten-in by the event of its close.

I was sitting by the open window in Cousin Crichton's drawing-room, all kinds of sweet English fragrance wafted in from the garden, and all kinds of delicate aromatic exotic perfumes breathing out of the conservatory.

Mr. Twistleton, the curate, has just come in, and was hovering about in an indefinite way. At length he approached the window, and looking out on the sunny lawn, turned to me and exclaimed, in a kind of mild rapture—

"Ah, Miss Danescombe, 'all this, and heaven afterwards!'"

The last words were a quotation from a tract about a thankful old woman.

"Oh, please not, Mr. Twistleton!" I said. "It was just the old woman's 'all this' being her poor bare old solitary room, that made it so beautiful in her to say it. Please not to talk of our 'all this'; it makes me so afraid heaven might be like it."

"My dear Miss Danescombe," he replied, surprised, apparently, at the vehemence of my tone, "surely such foretastes of Paradise are given to prepare us for the reality."

"Oh, I trust not," I said; "I think not, I am sure not. God will never let heaven be just a little bit of exclusive bliss, without even as much power of spreading it as we have here. It is so unlike Himself."

He looked perplexed at my ideas, and a little hurt at my fervour. I believe he thought I was getting into dangerous speculations, and had rather a dangerous temper, and in a short time, after a few indifferent observations, he left. My cousins always insisted I had unconsciously checked a declaration. But I never thought so. And if I had, it was very fortunate for us both, inasmuch as he married very wisely and well a month or two afterwards.

All day my cousins and I were busy about some of their countless bountiful and considerate kindnesses; cutting and binding up flowers to take to invalids, hunting out truant Sunday-school children, carrying little dainties and tracts to the sick poor. It was one of Cousin Barbara's plans always to connect body and soul in her distributions, especially because, tracts not being expensive luxuries, she could not bear that her pensioners should think she commuted costly temporal help for cheap religious benefactions. Political economy did not trouble her any more than it did St. Francis. How to sustain without weakening is a problem at no time easy to solve, with which she did not perplex herself.

My cousin Harriet and I were coming in at the garden-gate after our last expedition, when we met Piers. He was walking with a languor quite unlike himself. Something in his face smote through me like a sword. He looked stricken.

"Where have you been?" I said.

"Through some of the gaols with John."

"They were very terrible?" I asked.

"Too terrible to speak of, sister," he said.

There was something in his voice, and in his going back to that old name of our childhood, which touched me unaccountably.

"You are ill, Piers," I said, clinging to his arm. It felt no support. He needed support from me. He let me go silently up with him to his room, and then he lay down on the bed and closed his eyes.

And so that terrible time began; unannounced, unforeseen, as the terrible things do come to us in life, whether they creep on us with footsteps slow and noiseless as those of Time, or crash on us in the earthquake.

The earth opening her mouth in the midst of the tents where the family meal is preparing and the little children are at play!

Down into the dreadful chasm we went, Piers and I; the valley of the shadow of death, so close always to us all; he lying on the bed of fever, I watching beside him hour by hour and day by day, watching every look and movement, yet separated from him all the while farther than by continents.

Week followed week, unnoticed, in that land where Time was no more. Delirium came; and the secrets of that brave tender heart were unveiled. My father joined us; and we watched together, yet still apart from each other as from Piers, afraid to murmur our fears, unwilling to enfeeble the little gossamer thread of hope to which we clung by trusting it to words.

* * * *

We watched together, yet alone, in that land of chaos and thick darkness, where all the billows and waves go over us, yet we live, if it can be called living to lie, breathing, but stunned and blinded; that land of desolation where every one is alone, where prayer becomes nothing but a cry without words, a lifting up of the soul like the eyes blinded with tears, not to see, but to appeal, or at best (if such faith is given), a helpless, speechless falling on the heart of the Father, and resting for a sustaining moment there.

* * * *

And at last we touched the ground at the bottom of that awful chasm, and found that this time it was not to be unfathomable; that this time the earth was not to close over him visibly, and over us in soul.

At last, one morning, after a quiet sleep, he said in a quiet, feeble, natural voice—

"Sister, I have been very ill. I must have given a great deal of trouble."

Then I called my father, who was trying to sleep in the next room; and with quiet voices, as if it was all a matter of course, but with hearts beating with a tumult of joy, we spoke to him—to him—yes, to himself, once more, and he answered. The dreadful chasm cleaving us into separate existence was gone.

We were one once more; we lived, and our lives flowed together; and oh, how much closer, how much deeper, how much fuller, for all we had gone through apart!

I have gone down into that gulf of terror more than once since then. I have crept up out of it alone to the poor common earth, whilst the one I watched has risen out of it, unseen, into the higher, fuller life awaiting us beyond. I have learned slowly, slowly, and with what anguish, that there is "a better deliverance" from sickness than recovering to this fettered life. I have learned to believe, and sometimes to feel, that the joy of that restoration to health—overwhelming, intense as it was—is but a faint picture of the joy of the rising to live the immortal life, over which death has no dominion. But to this day that joy of welcoming my brother back to us, of seeing him rise step by step to life and health, and risen enriched with treasures from the depths into which he had descended, remains to me purest type of that other joy—"incorruptible the and undefiled, and that fadeth not away," which now I embrace by faith for my beloved; and hope ere long with them to know.

How tender they all were, those cousins of ours, the servants of the house, every one, in their sympathy in our joy! How near they seemed, they who, during that time when we were watching in the darkness, had seemed as far off as creatures in another planet; how ungrateful I felt I must have been for all their help; how grateful I felt now!

Cousin Barbara had some new surprise every day from those countless, hospitable luxuries of hers which she persisted in ascetically calling "little comforts;" flowers, dainties, cushions, easy-chairs, the easiest of carriages.

I could not help feeling that the rather oppressive necessity, or rather "duty" of being rich which had occasionally weighed on me at Clapham, had its very pleasant side when one had to be convalescent in such a Castle Bountiful as Cousin Crichton's.

Yet I could never forget that there were depths into which no Castle Bountiful could pour one drop of consolation. I could never forget that in all that terrible time the only human comfort that had reached me was from the one chamber of suffering in that beautiful, bountiful home; that the only tears I had been able to shed were one night when, at the very darkest of all, I had crept into little Martha's room, and she had clasped her poor thin arms round me and sobbed—

"Cousin Bride, I do love him so dearly! But oh, indeed, God loves him better! 'Lord, he whom Thou lovest is sick.' Poor dear cousin Bride!"

CHAPTER XXIII.

ONE day we were driving together, Piers and I, in Cousin Crichton's carriage alone through the green lanes and over the commons which then stretched beyond Clapham, alone in that delightful uninterrupted solitude one feels in a carriage, where no one can get at one, and when one has no duties to any one to summon one away.

It was one of our first drives.

"Bride," Piers said to me suddenly, "I was delicious, was I not?"

I had to admit it.

"Did I say anything?"

"You thought you were a doctor, sometimes," I said, "and seemed very pleased."

"I hope father was not there," he said.

"Oh, you dear blind boy!" I said, "hiding your wise ostrich head in the sands. Do you think we do not know what you gave up to help us all? And do you think we do not love to know it? Or that you will make us forget?"

"Was that all?" he said.

There were two other seals broken.

"Must he know?"

"He must know."

Now, which seal should I break first? I turned away my head.

"You spoke a little—a great deal—of Claire," I said.

"Was any one there?" he asked, very earnestly.

"No one but me," I said; "and I always knew."

"That will do," he said.

And then there was rather a long pause.

"Nothing else?" he said at last, with some relief.

"Yes, something else, brother," I said—"scarcely anything continually, but that one thing."

He looked inquiring.

I could scarcely speak of it yet. I scarcely knew if he was strong enough to bear it. Such anguish had been in his bewildered eyes, and in his clear, strong, unnatural tones when he spoke of this. At last I resolved to say—

"It was sin, brother. You kept saying your life had been lost, lost. You kept asking if there was forgiveness for you; for you. You kept on telling me to be ready; ready—as you were not. Oh, do not ask me to speak of it! while all our agony was that you were ready, ready to leave us and go away among the redeemed and holy, and be blessed for ever, and see God, and we see you no more on earth for ever! Do not ask me. I cannot speak of that."

"I was not ready, Bride," he said quietly.

"Do not say so, Piers," I replied, "you who had always lived for us all!"

"Bride," he said, "I had not lived for God."

"Surely," I said, "to live for those He has given us is to live for God."

"I used to think so," he said; "and certainly loving our neighbours as ourselves is not always so easy, Bride, especially when our neighbours are very near, and we cannot quite like them. But there is something more. There is the first great commandment, you know, as well as the second; before the second, the foundation of the second. I do not think I had ever even tried to keep that. To love God with all our heart and soul and mind and strength must mean something else than loving our neighbour as ourselves. Our Lord did not use vain repetitions. To love God Himself for His love to us, for Himself! Sister, I had been learning for weeks that I have never done it. I felt it by the lives around me, which had something I had not. I saw it in Mr. Wilberforce's book on Practical Christianity. And if to break the greatest commandment is sin, I have sinned; not once or twice, or seventy times seven, but always."

"But," I said, "to obey is to love, to submit is to love. And you had obeyed, and had submitted, God knows."

"To love is to obey," he said; "to love is to submit; but to love is more. You know that, Bride, well."

I did. It was useless to attempt to argue or to justify him to himself. There is no filling up chasms God has rent, with dust, or with rose-water.

There was a long pause.

At length I said—

"But you are not so sad about yourself now. What did you do?"

"I went in heart to God," he said, "and confessed to Him that he was my Father, and I had not honoured Him; that He was my Redeemer, and I had not been grateful to Him. And I pleaded with Him, because He is my Father, to forgive me; and because He is my Saviour, to save me; to give me to know and to love Him, to reveal Himself by the Holy Spirit to me. For I was sure that if I knew Him as He is, I must love Him. It must be only some crust, or veil, or cataract, in my eyes that hindered my seeing; and it could be only not seeing that hindered my loving. There was nothing to be created for me to see, only something in me to be removed that I might see. He, with His infinite love, was there. I asked Him to open my heart that I might see and love."

I could scarcely speak.

"He was sure to hear," I said.

"Quite sure," he replied. "There was but one answer—Christ. He gave me to see Christ."

"You had no dream, no vision?" I said.

"What do we want of dreams and visions?" he replied. "Of old it was in divers manners. In these last days He has sent his Son. It is day, Bride, now—not night. It is revelation, not clouds and darkness. The brightness of His glory has been unveiled, the express image of His person has come, full of grace and truth; has been a little child; has taken the little children in His arms; has touched the leper and healed him; has let the sinners touch Him, and has forgiven them; has let them nail Him to the Cross, and has prayed for their forgiveness; has loved us, and given Himself for us; has borne our sins in His own body on the Cross, and has redeemed us; has done all the holy Will we have failed to do, to enable us to do it; has suffered what we could never have borne, to enable us to suffer; being for ever one with God, has made Himself for ever one with us, and is touched with the feeling of our infirmities; not pitiful only or beneficent, but touched; has loved me and given Himself for me; for with Him "us" means not a mass of humanity, but a multitude of men and women. And I know it, sister. Thank God, I know it, now, for myself. And now that first commandment sometimes seems as unnecessary as a command to love my father or you; as much an instinct as breathing."

We were silent a long time. Then the carriage swept up to the porch. And Piers went to his room to rest, and I to mine.

There is no filling up chasms sin has made or God has made in humanity, or in the heart or conscience of any one of us, with anything but Himself.

CHAPTER XXIV.

WE returned to Abbot's Weir through a very different land from that we had traversed on our way to Clapham at the beginning of the year. It was late in October. Once more there had been a good harvest. Everywhere arose the golden wheat-stacks of the plentiful crop just harvested. There seemed a new elasticity in the very air as we went back through the land relieved from the pressure of famine, with Piers restored to us—restored, as he felt, to more than a few added years; to life essential, spiritual, immortal.

The voices of the ploughboys as they followed their teams through the brown fields which had just yielded their abundant stores, rang clear and joyous through the crisp autumn air. The men seemed to step with a firmer tread; the women sang to their children at their work by the cottage doors as we passed through the villages; the children ran after the coach with vigorous limbs and lungs. The hollow-cheeked groups that had hung about the inn-doors had vanished. The land was full of stir, and work, and hope. Eager groups there were, indeed, everywhere, watching what further confirmation of the new glad tidings we might bring. For all England was in an intoxication of joy at the new peace with France; the peace of Amiens. A week or two before, crowds had met in London to welcome the French Ambassador, had taken the horses out of his coach, and dragged it by Whitehall, through St. James's Park, to the park-entrance of the Admiralty, where the gallant Lord St. Vincent had soberly recommended them, "if they were bent on doing the gentleman this honour, at all events, to control their enthusiasm so far as not to upset the coach."

The French Ambassador must have received a shock to the national theory of the phlegmatic character of Englishmen.

In Bath, Mr. Wilberforce found the people "mad with joy." In many of the towns through which we passed, bells were ringing, crowds were hurraing; in some, the streets had glorified themselves with arches of greenery, and such spasmodic displays of flags and boughs as England, puritanised out of her mediæval picturesqueness, and as yet unenlightened by imitative modern æsthetics, could conjure out of her own unassisted brain.

"Peace, peace!" The glad tidings rang through the land, and the nation burst into one of those outbursts of great joy which are so pathetic when we think either to how little fruition they led, how much aspiration they expressed, or how much they symbolize.

All Europe, for the moment, was at peace. What murmurs there might be from the ashes of burnt villages in Switzerland, from cities in Italy or in Belgium plundered by armies or by tax-gatherers; what apprehensions in the hearts of emperors at St. Petersburg or Vienna, and among the people everywhere, at a propaganda of liberty and fraternity, carried on like Mahomet's—by fire and sword—did not at that moment affect us.

The forms of the republic, in France, were as yet preserved intact; indeed, they had become more classical than ever. The edifice was crowned with a First Consul. What dangers to freedom or peace could lurk under a title so modest and so democratic?

There were, it is true, a few anxious and forecasting spirits who did not hope. The king, it was said, did not hope. He thought the peace only experimental. But then the king had been wont to hope at wrong times. He had hoped obstinately to crush the opposition of the American colonies; and the American colonies had become a nation.

Mr. Pitt did not hope. But Mr. Pitt was out of office. Many military and naval men did not hope. But then military and naval men naturally liked war. And so we gave France everything she asked, except Naples and the Papal States (whether it was ours or not to give), settlements in India, and at the Cape of Good Hope, West India Islands, Italian protectorates, Rhine frontiers; and then, like a fond and indulgent parent, fell into a rapture over her at consenting to be reconciled. Having everything she could possibly want, what could the result be but that she would be satisfied and keep quiet, and never disturb the family peace again?

Meantime there was bread enough and to spare, and work for every one who would work; and our England was a very merry and contented land to travel through in that genial October sunshine which had done such good work for her harvests, and was now touching her woods and downs with every choicest and richest tint of bronze and gold.

How beautiful the dear old grey town looked in the depths of its green chalice, embossed with its crimson and golden woods, and rimmed with the warm tints of its fern-covered moors, and the soft blues and purples of its rocky "tors!" It must be confessed that its solid old monastic bridge looked a little diminutive after Westminster, and the streets a little narrow, and the houses, which had once seemed so tall, rather low, and the whole town dwarfed and unimposing to an extent that it seemed a disloyalty to admit even to oneself. But then the land around it was so large and free; the long sweep of the valley; the wide world of those well-known woods free to every one to gather endless primroses and bluebells in; the range beyond range of its wild moorland hills.

A sense of freedom came over me in more senses than one; for in more senses than one I felt as if our little human world of Abbot's Weir, like the place itself, though small in itself, opened out into a wider world than that of Clapham.

I felt it first when Amice, in herself so wide a world, stopped the postchaise we were in for a moment of welcome at the great park-gate of Court; again, when Madame des Ormes, leaning on the arm of our Claire, greeted us in her sweet French at our own old arched doorway ; when Reuben Pengelly blessed God that we were safe back again ; and most of all when I sate alone for half an hour that evening with Loveday Benbow, and looked out once more with her eyes into that wide world of which not Abbot's Weir or Clapham only, or only England, or even Christendom, were mere fragments, but this whole visible world of space, and all this transitory age of time.

Beautiful and sheltering as the woods and forests are, the finest and freest tree cannot be the product of the forest ; it must stand apart, where it has need of a more robust strength to maintain its own unaided battles, and space to develop into a freer individuality and a larger symmetry. At Clapham, the current against the stream was in itself so broad and strong, that there was little demand on spiritual nerve and muscle in gliding along it.

Very delightful it was to come back to Loveday, and find her all I had left her and imagined her, and more than all I had found since. The deepest and highest life is by necessity also really the broadest ; broader by all the space of heaven and the infinity of God. If we deepen the channel enough, and connect it with the Fountain of Life, as with the ocean, we need not fear that it will be narrow.

With every one else one seemed to take up the old relationship just on a slightly different level, at least at first, with just a touch of strangeness. With Loveday one seemed to have been present all the time, simply to go on, and not begin again at all. She always seemed a creature over whom time had no power. There she sat, as of old, dove-coloured and white, with her dove-like voice and spiritual dove's wings ; and her youth, renewed like the eagle's, as of old, to defend that great multitude of the heavy-laden which were her brood.

No ; Loveday was no dream. She was quite unchanged.

Mrs. Danescombe also was unchanged. And I felt she felt I was unchanged, and felt it with a shade of reproach and disappointment.

To have spent nine months at Clapham, in the society of my "influential cousins," and with all the superior clothing and manners of London at hand, by which to remodel my own, and to have come back just the same Bride Danescombe, unmodified, unengaged, it was difficult to understand, and not a little difficult for her to sustain; especially as every one else seemed to like it.

Reuben was not at all surprised.

"Didn't I tell thee, old woman," he said to Priscy, "she would bring back no London airs? What is London to such as she, beside old times?"

Priscy was surprised. She met me with a very elaborate courtesy, and was delightfully ruffled and taken aback when I returned it as for twenty years by a kiss.

And Madam Glanvil decreed with a nod that I was as well as could be expected, and would do, provided there were no hidden germs of Claphamic philanthropy lurking undeveloped.

"Infection does not come out at once, in some diseases," said she. "It was a dangerous experiment. But in a little while we shall see."

My dear cousin, Dick Fyford, was not a little changed; changed for one thing into a lieutenant, having been with Nelson at Copenhagen, and Nelson being a leader of the kind that leads in more ways than one to promotion; showing the way by being foremost, inspiring men to be their best, and also clearing the way by his terrible alternatives of victory or death. He had compacted into a man, having found a calling in which no amount of energy was superfluous, and no amount of daring out of place. Moreover, much of the hardness, as well as the aimless restlessness of the boy had passed from him, or fitted into the right place in him. He privately confessed to me that the wrongs of the common seamen were all but intolerable to see; say nothing of suffering.

"You were not so far wrong about impressment, Cousin Bride," said he, "as I thought you were, long ago, when I wished you were a boy, at Miss Felicity's; and would have fought you had you been one. There is work for your anti-slavery people nearer home than in the West Indies. Kidnapping, bad and little food, flogging, turning out to die like dogs when wounded and sick; terribly like negro slavery. Enough to make a man a Whig, or a Jacobin, or anything to set it right." (Dick's politics were never abstract.) "The mutinies at the Nore and at Spithead were put down three years ago.

And while Buonaparte keeps the old country awake, and Nelson keeps him down, all may go right. But to be fed and flogged as those poor fellows are, and to fight as they do, is more like patriotism and the old Greeks and Romans and all that," (Dick's history was never very definite), "than a deal of the work people get stars and peerages for."

Dick was not indeed changed in his "constancy in loving," nor as yet in the object of that constant love. He had fallen deeper than ever into what he believed his unconquerable passion for Amice Glanvil.

This time it was "no child's play, no changing dream, but only too serious; presumptuous, he felt; desperate, he feared; but, hopeless or not, only to be torn from his heart with life."

"You are her friend, Cousin Bride," he said tragically; "you will understand."

I wished to be sympathetic, but I could not be encouraging. They seemed to me too far apart—she with her early depth of womanhood, under all her girlish impulsiveness, he with so much of the boyish yet about him, man as he was in courage and in command, where command was called for—to be at all likely to fit each other. But the difference between them seemed to Dick exactly the hopeful symptom in the case.

"Similar in friendship, Cousin Bride, opposites in love!" he said, with the sententiousness of long experience. "You and I, you know, have always understood each other better than any one; and you are the best friend I have, and always were. Amice Glanvil and I do not understand each other, and never did. And there is the hope, feeble, I confess; but one could live on a crumb from that table."

Those early "little loves" of my cousin's often reminded me of Amice's "portrait," the crocus-bulb, sending out its long feeler into the soil to find something to root itself to. They were no dilettante fancies; they had all the humility of a genuine passion, and so, in their measure, raised him. He never fancied any one was in love with him.

I said, he knew I always liked to do what I could for him.

"He did know. I had always been as good as a mother to him."

"Not quite that!" I remonstrated. "I thought that was too much even to try to be to any one."

"Well, as good as a grandmother, at all events, Cousin Bride," he said; "as good and indulgent and ready to help as the best grandmother that ever was!"

"AGAINST THE STREAM."

He meant it as a compliment ; just as the old gentleman at Clapham, old enough to be my grandfather, had meant it as a compliment to ask me to be his wife.

It was plain I must accept the dignities of advanced age. Perhaps I should grow younger as my years increased. Meantime I would be as grandmotherly as the duties of such a generally recognised protectorate demanded.

Miss Felicity was rigidly changeless. As the tutelary Athena of Abbot's Weir, she seemed to grasp the Ægis with her firmest resolve, ready to turn it on any dragon's brood which might have sprung up in Piers or me, of presumption, or conceit, or London pride ; and to appal them instantaneously into stone. However, she was soon reassured, and the Ægis vanished, and all the militant bearing disappeared, when I ventured to give her a snuff-box full of what Cousin Crichton had called "the finest Rappee," which I had brought for the Lieutenant. It moved her much that any one should lay the smallest offering on the shrine, on which it seemed to her nothing that she should lay her life.

"You are a kind child, Bride Danescombe," she said, going back to the beginning of our friendship, to the foolscap and the stool of penance ; "you are a dear, generous child. If any one wants you to be good to them for life, they have only to begin by doing you an injustice."

And Claire, was she changed ?

She was nearly a year older. Yes, quite a year, and that is a great deal at sixteen.

She was a year older, for one thing, because her mother was a year older, too obviously.

A little more of a stoop in the dignified figure, of slowness in the step ; the fire with which she spoke of the past no longer only subdued, but fading ; the light in which she saw the present a little dimmed ; the fears with which she saw the future a little darker,—the future which was to her all embodied in her Claire, on whose face her eyes would rest so long with such a wistful solicitude.

An era of tender concealments had begun between the mother and child. When that long gaze at last would meet the quick, anxious glance of Claire,—Claire, who had been feeling it so long, and had not dared to look,—the solicitude would melt instantly out of both faces ; and on one side or the other, some tender pleasantry would dart out to veil the anxious care which lay beneath.

And so, thinking, dear souls, or trying to think, they had quite imposed on one another, they went on. And meantime their little stratagems had imposed on Léontine.

"Ah, Mademoiselle," she remarked to me one day, soon after my return, mournfully shaking her head, and glancing from Claire (who was humming an old nursery chanson as she arranged her autumn leaves in the next room) to her mother, watching her from the couch. "That poor cherished child, she knows no more than the babe unborn what is before her !"

"Do any of us, Léontine ?" I said. "If she did know, what better could she do ?"

"But the shock, Mademoiselle Bride, the waking up, think how terrible !"

"What is to prevent what is terrible from being a shock and a waking up, Léontine ?" I said, thinking of Piers's illness. "Would fear help us ? or foreseeing ? seeing the next step ?"

"But when the next step may be a precipice ?"

"What can we do, Léontine, but look to Him who sees beyond the next step ? What can we wish for them more ? Besides," I added, trying to combat my own fears, "Madame is not old. She may revive. She has such a power of life."

"Alas, Madame is old," Léontine replied. "What does Revolution mean but that the whole machinery of the State has gone wrong, and the wheels spin madly round like a whirlwind instead of stealing round imperceptibly like the hands of a clock ? Madame lived a thousand revolutions of the years in one day ; one day, Mademoiselle, which she never speaks of to any unless to Miss Loveday ; one day when the best blood of France was shed between L'Abbaye and La Force. There is no turning the sun-dial backwards, Mademoiselle, over such degrees ! But to you and that angelic child there is yet sunshine ; and in the sunshine the birds must sing. Let them, poor innocents, while they can ; while they can !"

But if Claire had grown a year during those months of separation, Piers had grown and gained more.

No life, worth calling life, is to be measured by years ; and he at eighteen was a being one could rest on, who cared for us all, instead of needing to be cared for ; and if that does not mean the best part of manhood, what does ?

Claire met him, when we returned, frankly, joyously, just as of old, with that combination of French and English manners which was in her so charming, with a gracious little courtesy, and a frank shake of the hand, and a little pleasantry about his steam-engine. But when she looked up with her happy eyes and met his, something silenced the little pleasantry, and flushed for a moment the bright face.

Was it a look in his, or only that his face was still pale and thin?

However it was, so it happened that they changed towards each other. A distance came, and a reverence, and a doubting of one another, and a comprehension of one another,—and a death of old things, and a creation of new, which made them farther from each other and nearer each other than all the world besides; yes, all the world, Piers and I, and Claire and I, included.

On one ground they still met free from self-consciousness, or that double self-consciousness of love. One sacred care united them, old and yet mournfully new, the tender thoughtful care for Claire's mother.

I could not but see how her eyes followed them both, and seemed to embrace them in one deep, motherly gaze. Sometimes I used to wonder whether, just in this one case, her old French customs would not have been better than ours.

Madame and my father could have negotiated it all so amicably, and watched as a double providence over their two children, and betrothed them quite simply, and given them sanction to love each other as much as they could, that is, as much as they did. The sweet sacredness and mystery and reverence would have remained, and the anxious questionings, the unreasonable fears, the distracting doubts would have vanished. Yet, would the one have remained? or would the other have vanished? Could any arrangement have helped them to find each other?

And, indeed, could Madame or my father have dared to initiate any such treaty? To accept it was another thing.

To attend mass and be a little philosophe was one thing; not to attend mass, to be definitely Protestant, and religious to the heart's core, was another. Infinitely better, I believe, Madame felt, for Piers himself. But for Claire? That Protestant world, with its endless divisions, and its thin rigid partitions, seemed to Madame such an inextricable labyrinth, such a seething chaos. It was true that France was a chaos, but then France had for the moment abandoned religion. When religion itself, the Church itself became a chaos, what hope for the world—what hope for little Claire drifting to and fro on that deep? Death might, indeed, break down those partitions, might reconcile all faithful souls in Him who came to atone; for her these perplexities already grew thin and faint; but Claire had to live, and who would guide her through?

All this and a thousand things more were in Madame's softened eyes as she watched those two together.

Perhaps it was well for her and for them that the guiding thread could not be in her trembling hands.

Our brother Francis was not changed. We had talked very often of him, Piers and I, during his convalescence—in our drives, and in quiet moments on the journey home. I knew well it was of Francis Piers had thought when he had said in that first long conversation in Cousin Crichton's chariot, that it was "not always easy to love our neighbours as ourselves, especially when they were very near neighbours and we couldn't like them."

We had confessed to each other that the feeling which had grown up in our hearts to Francis was very little like love.

"Hating our brother whom we have seen" is not altogether such an impossible sin, when we see in our brother exactly the things we hate, and feel we ought to hate. And Francis had so many ways and qualities that we could not even try to like. Little selfishnesses with a disguise, little untruthfulnesses with a purpose, little unfairnesses which it seemed mean to notice, little pretensions which it seemed petty to resist, which nevertheless fretted one more than a great injustice; a general shallowness all through, which had a fussing, fretting way of making little things seem great.

"If one might believe in transmigration" I once said, "it would be a comfort as regards Francis. Then one might take him for a larva—all outside—and one might hope that inside was developing some imperceptible creature, if it was only a butterfly,—which was the real Francis; to appear in some future state of existence. As it is there is only the shell of the larva."

"There cannot be only that shell, Bride," Piers replied. "That is the point. We have to find out the creature inside. It must be there, and we must get to it. When we get home we must try."

In that distance, in that sunshiny atmosphere of Cousin Crichton's, in the joy of renewed strength, and of that new life of faith, every victory seemed so easy, every victory so sure to inaugurate a conquest!

So we came home; and we did try. It seemed as if Francis must have changed too, and must recognise our new purpose and meet us in it.

But there he was, as smooth and impenetrable as ever, with no more idea there was anything which required change in him than the Apollo Belvedere. One misfortune was that he combined my father's genial manner with my stepmother's cold and superficial character. It seemed to me sometimes as if their natures were so unlike, that the nature which sprang from them had a kind of necessity of falseness in it, from the impossibility of any true blending of the elements.

He had taken to one habit which was new, at least new in form. In childhood he always, as I have said, continued to glide into possession of our rights, our toys, coveted places in games, in short of whatever coin was the currency of our childish treasures, whilst we had been referred to the Sermon on the Mount to satisfy our claims.

Now that he was sixteen and money—the coin of the large world—became his currency, he began to borrow money. In the easiest way. His week's allowance was not due until tomorrow, or he was just out of cash, and a marvellous bargain had offered which would be lost to-morrow; or some one had lent him a trifle, and he knew neither our father nor Piers would like the family to be in debt for such a bagatelle. And of course the morrow of payment never came.

To all our remonstrances he opposed his cool impenetrability and his genial manner.

Once indeed he was so far roused by a very earnest warning, as to say that if Piers made it so unpleasant to borrow, he would take care not to trouble him again.

But he found it more unpleasant to do without the things he wished for, forgave Piers his "rather unbrotherly" conduct, and consented to mulct our treasury again.

What ought we to do? Each successive grievance was so small, it seemed impossible to trouble our father with it, deep as his hatred of debt, and his love of us all was. And, moreover, not only our tenderness for our father, but our very fear of being hard on Francis, kept us back.

"What will be the end of it, Piers?" I said.

"Debt, hopeless debt," he said gravely. "Disgrace for us all, perhaps. Because, happily for Francis, this is not a world constructed so as to make debt in the long-run either pleasant or possible."

It was on a wintry Sunday afternoon. We were walking on the hillside behind the garden, over the field-path, iron-bound with frost, cakes of ice in the creaks of the Leat where we used to harbour our fleets, blades of grass stiff and white with frozen dew.

From the grey Tors sharply defined against the frosty wintry-blue of the sky, came a keen air, bracing every nerve and muscle.

From the philanthropic combats of Clapham we had come back to such little pricking difficulties! And yet the whole atmosphere—moral, mental, and physical—felt to me more invigorating, more such as one's strength might develop and do its finest work in.

I, in my way had brought with me countless schemes for the transplanting of Clapham philanthropic works into the virgin soil of Abbot's Weir. Piers, in his way, had set his heart on one small good work, which he intended forthwith to begin. This was neither more nor less than a Sunday-school. We were on our way that afternoon to Reuben Pengelly, in the Foundry-yard, to consult him as to the best way of carrying out what we believed to be altogether a new idea in Abbot's Weir.

Long icicles were hanging from the stationary water-wheel. The most beautiful fairy-like fretworks were circling and fringing the cascade. The old yard was absolutely still; Reuben's porch empty.

We knocked at the door, full of our project, and then lifted the latch. Around the old man's knees were gathered three little children, to whom he was telling Bible stories.

"Here have we been making our grand schemes, Piers," I whispered, "and meanwhile Reuben has begun! How many things the Methodists have begun!"

"Yes," said Piers, "the Thames at Westminster is something. But the little springs that run among the hills come first."

"And they are more!" I rejoined.

"At all events," he replied, "there would have been no river without them."

CHAPTER XXV.

BUT most of all I found the change in Amice. She had changed outwardly, as no one else had. Her face was thinner, her great dark eyes seemed larger, and looked further away, and further into one, than ever. I saw it even in that minute when the postchaise stopped at the gate for her welcome to us. And the first day I spent at Court I felt it more.

She said she had missed me and my "good in everything," and had fallen deeper than ever into her "dualism." "Except," she said, "that the dualism is only on the surface now, far enough down indeed, Bride; yet underneath is something else. Underneath is the Atonement, Bride, the Father and the Son, the Manger and the Cross, and man reconciled. At the very root of all is not dualism, but the incarnate crucified Christ. At the very heart of all is the light. That I never lose. But oh! the conflict between the light and darkness goes down terribly far, and goes in terribly far, and goes on terribly long!"

She looked to me like some of the old pictures I had seen in London of Roman Catholic saints; not ecstatic, though she was capable of ecstasy, but full of high resolve.

Certainly, also, there was deeper dualism in the household. Madam Glanvil's steel-grey eyes seemed absolutely to cut with their sharp suspicious glances. And she missed no effectual opportunity of using that two-edged sword which, by prerogative of age and deafness, she wielded.

Formerly, if the conflict between Amice and Madam Glanvil had perplexed me, it had amused me far more. The combat seemed all tournament work; Amice often had the best of it, and the militant old lady was more than half pleased that she had.

But now something was there which showed the conflict to be in earnest.

The air was charged with thunder. The Jupiter-nod had given place to the bolts of Jove; no mere theatrical thunder-rolls, but real lightnings ready to fall, no one could tell where or when.

Not half so many cutting things were said by Madam Glanvil, but when they came the thrusts were from no tilting-sword. They were meant to tell; and the pain to me was that they did tell. Amice did not ward them off, or even seem to evade them. Something seemed to have taken possession of her heart which compelled her to receive those stabs, and let the iron enter into her soul.

A severer legislation also prevailed with regard to Chloe and those "lazy brutes," Cato and Cæsar. "They should be made to understand their place, if other people did not understand it for them, Madam Glanvil was determined."

Poor Chloe and Cato and Cæsar were entirely prohibited from attending the Methodist meetings.

"Happy enough for them if they were allowed to enter the church, like their betters. In their own country they would probably have been knocked on the head long before this, as sacrifices to some idol or devil. In the plantation they would have been driven to the cane-work, and might have been glad, idle creatures that they were, if they escaped Sunday without a flogging.

She was cruel in words, Amice thought, because deeds were impossible. The possibility of cruel deeds, Amice always said, would have awakened her to mercy.

It is said words do not break bones, but they break worse than bones. Altogether, the three negroes had now a cowed and humbled look, dreadful to me to see in a dog. And it was not only the cowed and anxious look with which they followed Madam Glanvil's eyes; it was the fawning and cringing on every one, that I could not bear to see. The one was merely the cowed animal, the other was the degraded and humbled man.

And Amice could do nothing, except keep Chloe as much with herself as possible, that they might bear the blows together.

Indeed, of all the household, Chloe seemed to me the only really free and happy person.

I said so to Amice.

"Yes," she replied, "Chloe went down into the depths long ago, and has picked up all the Beatitudes there. Besides, Bride," she added, "Chloe has only to suffer; she has not to be the cause of suffering. She has not to choose. She is free because she is a slave; for slaves they are still, practically, exiled and helpless, and ignorant, as they are. But I, on the other hand, am a slave just because I am free."

We were in the library. She was leaning against the library ladder.

"You know, Bride," she said, "I could leave Granny altogether; I am of age, and my fortune is my own. But just because I could, I cannot. If she kept me in within bolts and bars, or in chains, I feel sure I should break them and escape. But the terrible thing is, she keeps me in, fetters and imprisons me with love. Yes; you may look astonished—with love. Granny loved my father better than her own life; and now she loves me better than my own happiness. She has nursed me like the tenderest mother through dangerous infectious illnesses—through a fever I brought with me from the West Indies, and through small-pox. She took the small-pox. You can see the marks now in her fine stern old face. Only one or two; but there they are. And she bore it for me. She loves me in that kind of way, that if, for instance, I were in love with some one she thought it unwise for me to marry, she would let me pine away and die, rather than let me marry as she did not like. And then she would sit alone until she died, and never take another creature to her heart, and never have a doubt that she had done the best thing for me that she could. Remember, she has never had her will crossed all her life; and she clings to her own will as a martyr to his faith. She loves me, and hates what I care most about—my poor slaves, and religion. She thinks the negroes a set of idle savages, unfortunately necessary conditions of West Indian property, who are always, by their obstinacy and folly, defrauding me of the revenue my father's plantations ought to yield. She will no more go into the question, what right we have to enslave them, than into the question, what right we have to break in horses. Of course, neither horses nor negroes like it; but, except for our convenience, there is no need for horses or negroes to live at all. They would be hunted down like wolves. They do hunt each other down like wolves in Africa, she says. Then as to religion. She declares that the Methodists, Moravians, Baptists, all of them, set the negroes on to insurrection; and of the horrors of negro insurrections she speaks with dreadful plainness. And as you know, her beliefs are not in the least degree dependent on evidence. Of course there is no moving her. Towards the negroes she is simply merciless; towards the philanthropists and missionaries she is absolutely fanatical."

"But to you, Amice!" I said; "she is changed to you. You have had some encounters, I am sure."

"Yes," she said. "I was firm about Chloe and the Wesleyan meetings. I said Chloe had lost all she loved in the world but me, and had saved me, life and soul, as Granny knew, left a motherless child in that perilous climate, in the midst of that hardening, iniquitous system. I said Chloe had only that one delight, those prayer-meetings of Reuben Pengelly's, where they prayed prayers and sang hymns she could understand, and that this Chloe must not be robbed of."

"And you did not succeed?"

"I did succeed with Granny. She was very angry. She stormed and raged at me; but she said Chloe might go, at her peril and at mine. She had been brought up in devil-worship, and it was but natural she should like it. For that the Methodists set on the slaves to deeds of devils there was not the shadow of a doubt."

"So Chloe went again?"

"No, Chloe would not go. She laughed and cried, and asked if I thought the dear Lord could only be found at meetings. The prayers were good; but soon we should get where we were beyond praying; and the hymns were good, very good, and very comforting, and we should have plenty of them soon. Was she going to make missis and missie at war because of her getting a little bit of comfort a little bit sooner? Was that like the good Lord? And so Chloe will not go."

"And Madam Glanvil still persists that the negroes if different from brutes, are only different because they can be savages?"

"Yes, you know, she always persists. The persistence is from within; anything outside does not affect it. The trial is to love both, Bride—Granny and the slaves, and the missionaries; oppressor and oppressed; to love all, and to be able to help none."

"That will not last long," I said.

"Not always," she replied. "But it does last rather long. However I have found some comfort."

She went up the ladder, and took down a book from the shelves; a clumsy, badly bound old book, on yellow, coarse paper, in what seemed to me Black Letter. For at that time the German language formed no part of an English girl's acquirements.

It was a German narrative of the missions of the United Brethren, the Unitas Fratrum, called Moravians.

"At last I have found the Christians who take up the cross, the real hard, heavy, disgraceful, slave's cross," she said, "and care for people because no one else does; the Christianity that can help me, and the Christians who have helped my poor slaves."

I took the homely old books in my hand; the first German books I had ever handled. What a world of difference that implies in our English thought and education!

"They are queer, clumsy old books," said Amice. "They look as if my good Brethren had had them printed and bound in some experimental brotherly workshop, as I dare say they had."

"They look as quaint and dry and old-fashioned as some of Loveday's Quaker books," I said. "And very likely they are as living and true."

"As fresh and living as the New Testament, almost, they seemed to me," she said, kissing one of them—"a great deal fresher and younger than the Apostolic fathers, except Ignatius, and bits of that epistle to Diognetus." She had explored so many odd corners of thought in that library. "And it is such a comfort they are in German," she added, "because Granny is not suspicious of them, as she has grown to be of some of my books. Unfortunately (no, not unfortunately!) she discovered the other day a copy of John Wesley's 'Thoughts upon Slavery,' and threw it into the fire. However, she had read it first. She had read it through, and the plain, strong English has sunk into her heart, or, at least, into her conscience, I know, as it did into mine; for she is continually bringing out bits of it to worry, or to throw at me, by which I know they worry her. Anti-slavery societies will never create a nobler appeal than that. I know much of it, happily, by heart, as Granny does by conscience.

"Can human law turn darkness into light, or evil into good? he writes. Notwithstanding ten thousand laws, right is right, and wrong is wrong still; there must still remain an essential difference between justice and injustice, cruelty and wrong.

"One by one, besides, it answers all Granny's favourite arguments.

"'You say, It is necessity!' he says, speaking of the dreadful slave-stealing and slave-ships; 'I answer, You stumble at the threshold. I deny that villany is ever necessary. A man can be under no necessity of degrading himself into a wolf. You say the blacks are stupid and wicked. It is you who have kept them stupid and wicked.'

"'You call your forefathers wolves,' said Granny, in unconfessed reply to this. 'You say we made the slaves stupid and wicked. That is what, in modern days, is called filial piety!'

"'It is necessary to my gaining a hundred thousand pounds,' Wesley goes on, dramatising the objector. 'I deny that your gaining a thousand is necessary to your present or eternal happiness.'

"'The Methodists are Anabaptists—Communists,' says Granny. 'They would reduce every one to their own beggarly level.'

"'It is necessary for the wealth and glory of England,' Mr. Wesley continues, still quoting the objector. 'Wealth is not necessary to the glory of any nation,' he replies; 'wisdom, virtue, justice, mercy, generosity, public spirit, love of our country—these are necessary to the glory of a nation, but abundance of wealth is not.'

"Glorious old John Wesley," I said parenthetically. "I wonder if they have read that book at Clapham?"

"Granny has read that, at all events," she replied. "I know it, because she called Mr. Wesley a traitor to his country, worse than a Frenchman,—whethera Jacobite or a Jacobin, she is not clear—probably both in the germ. However, the book has burnt itself in. What I long to know is, if the tender appeal at the end to the hearts of the slaveowners, and to God for help to the helpless, has touched her. I think it must. It is good, Bride, to have the planters appealed to as if they also had souls and hearts. Sometimes I think some of your anti-slavery friends a little forget that. It is difficult to love oppressor and oppressed as both human creatures; after all, both astray and lost, and sorely in need of help. Perhaps there is some good, after all, in having to do it, not with one's wise, philanthropical heart only, but with one's foolish, trembling, quivering, natural heart, as I cannot help doing; painful as it is.'

Then, hugging her clumsy German books to her heart, as she might a living creature that felt being petted, she took me up-stairs into her bedroom—that delightful old room in the oldest gable of the old Elizabethan house, partly in the roof, with low mullioned windows, looking far over the woods and the river to the grey moorland hills.

On the floor were piled heaps of books on all subjects, in many languages. Amice had no fancy for dainty fittings. Her luxuries were of another kind from those of Cousin Crichton's house; poetical, rather than comfortable, or picturesque.

The sole luxuries of that room were the capacious old escritoire that had belonged to her father, with a fascinating treasury of small drawers and pigeon-holes, and a desk that drew out; and those ever-increasing heaps of books which were poor Chloe's distraction; with that low window-seat on which we had spent so many hours of talk, in winter twilights, or in the heat of summer noons.

"Now," she said, as we seated ourselves. "I will tell you the history of me and my German books. When you went away last January, and I had nothing but books left to talk out my heart to, I came, in a corner of a cupboard of the library, on some records of the Missions of 'the people called Moravians' in Greenland, and in the West Indies. And I saw that the first mission to the West Indies was begun by a man called Leonhard Dober, a Moravian potter from Herrnhut, who, on a journey to Denmark with Count Zinzendorf, met a West Indian negro slave, and was so touched with compassion for the misery of those poor helpless blacks, that he set his whole heart on going to tell them they had a Saviour. He set his heart on this so fixedly, that being told by objectors there was no other way of teaching the slaves but by becoming a slave, he proposed to become a slave himself, that, driven to the daily toil with them, working in the plantations among them, and sharing their burdens, he might by any means save some of them. It seemed to me as absolutely taking up the Cross as anything in this world ever was."

"Did he do it?" I asked.

"My English book did not say. It stopped just there. But in the same cupboard I found some German books which, by the words Unitas Fratrum on the outside, I knew must be about these same Moravians. Of course I was determined to find out, and if one has set one's mind on finding out anything, of course one does not let a language stand in one's way. Granny seeing me one day with those books, gave a sigh, and shook her head pathetically, for her.

"'Poor foolish Aunt Prothesea!' said she. 'Yes, that comes of being wilful, and taking up with strange notions. She went to London and met a crazy foreigner who called himself a Count, as they generally do. And this Count made her as crazy as himself. Some new religion he had, not altogether Popish or Protestant. They used crucifixes, and lived in communities; not exactly monasteries, for they married; which was, of course, better than being monks and nuns—unless they married the wrong people, which poor Aunt Prothesea did. She went to some unpronounceable place in Saxony, married some one they called an Elder of the Church, not ill-born, they said, but older, at all events, than herself about half a century, I believe. And naturally he died; and unnaturally she pined for her Elder. They put her into a widows' house, as they called it, and she didn't like it; who would? To be classified like the vicar's beetles; or like adjectives and substantives in the grammar; or like all the people who are one-eyed and one-armed; classified, and penned up with a lot of women. So she came back to Court, and had a room given her; your room it was, by-the-bye. And I remember she brought back a heap of ridiculous foreign books with her, not only not in a language, but not in an alphabet any rational person can read.' You know, Granny thinks all foreign languages either an impertinence or a joke; and would consider it an intolerable affectation to attempt to pronounce them in anything but English fashion."

"But did she tell you anything more about the books?"

II. N. S.

"She said they were half in that cupboard in the library, and half in an old closet in the wall in my bedroom. And there I found all I wanted; a dictionary, German and Latin it was, and a grammar, German and French. And so, all this summer, Bride, you having deserted me, I have been living with my great Aunt Prothesea, and her United Brethren. And you cannot think how doubly delightful this old room has become to me, or what a companion and friend my great aunt has become to me. I read the hymns as if she sang them to me. They are marked and underlined, Bride; in more than one page, stained as if with tears. And I read the old 'Berlinische Reden' of Count Zinzendorf; and better still, some older books by Martin Luther; letters, table-talk, sermons, commentaries. They are so strong and daring, so quivering with life, those words of Martin Luther, so delightfully one-sided, and so gloriously many-sided; one side, at a time, I mean—unguarded, unbalanced, bold, full, free, like the Bible; and then a thousand other sides, like our human hearts, like the Bible, and like no other religious books that I know. Not a bit of grey in them, not a neutral tint; every colour and every tint and every shade, to meet all the countless shades and colours, the countless thirsts and hungers, and joys and sorrows of our hearts."

"But Luther was not a Moravian?" I said. How dim the name of Luther was to me! like a mere Heading in a Catalogue; and to Amice he was a living man—yes, living, then and now, once and for ever!

"No, certainly," she said; "Luther was not a Moravian. He was Luther. Nor am I a Moravian," she added, with her quick dropping of laughter. "I am Amice Glanvil, your Amice. Your Amice, who goes to church every Sunday, and has no intention of becoming an adjective, or an atom, in any community, married or unmarried, even the best in the world. Were you afraid I was in process of transformation?"

I had been a little afraid as to what those curious black letters might lead. They connected themselves in my mind in some unreasonable way with black arts and mystical ideas. There were Jacob Böhme, Swedenborg, and sundry mystical and unutterable Teutonic personages, of whom I had a vague idea that they were a kind of Protestant Simeon Stylites, or Faqueers, who, in some symbolical way, adapted to European practicabilities, lived on pillars, or stood permanently on one leg, or symbolically stretched out one arm until it grew immovable, or contemplated "the Silent Nothing," or their own consciousness, until consciousness ceased to be conscious.

Moreover, I had some idea that Reuben Pengelly had once spoken doubtfully of the Moravians, as "Antinomians," whatever that meant, or as opponents of Mr. Wesley, which was Reuben's strongest form of Anathema.

Amice admitted that this was true. But she told me that the Wesleys had first learned the possibility of a liberating and gladdening religion from seeing the fearlessness of some Moravians in a storm, on the voyage across the Atlantic. She said that as far as she could understand the matter, Mr. Wesley and Count Zinzendorf were both kings, and that it being simply impossible that they should both reign in one kingdom, the division of the kingdom had become a necessity; but that the difference of opinion which divided them was a mere accident.

She thought they meant essentially the same on the very point on which they separated. Indeed, Mr. Wesley himself had said to the Count, at one moment, that the difference between them was only one of words.

Mr. Wesley contended for growth in holiness, and possible perfection, by which he seemed to mean a state in which holiness became instinctive.

Count Zinzendorf contended for holiness as being not so much a commandment as a promise to the Christian; in other words, for faith in Christ as making the desire of holiness an instinct; for sanctification, not as a constrained work, as the spontaneous free fruit of the Spirit.

Both looked on holiness as the great aim and the great promise; both looked to Christ as its source; both regarded faith as the surrender of the whole being, the dependence of the whole being on God, as the means.

If there was a difference, it was that Wesley looked on this free, glad, instinctive goodness as the attainment of the advanced saint, Zinzendorf as the right of the simplest child who lives by the new life; that Wesley dwelt on the Christian life more as a warfare—the Moravians more as a growth; Wesley more on the resisting evil, the Moravians more on the conquest of evil by good.

Amice at all events had evidently found her intellectual element in the German literature, and her especial spiritual element in that old book of German hymns. Her beautiful, white spirit-wings seemed to expand in it.

I cannot say whether there may not have been some unreasonable and exaggerated hymns among them. I have yet to find the hymn-book which I should not think enriched by omissions.

But, first through Amice's sympathetic translations, and afterwards by their own simple profound, inimitable words, those hymns have grown into a portion of my own life; so that I feel as unable to judge them critically as the voices which sang me lullabies in infancy. To her, I believe, the original attraction was the contrast of their profound peace to the war in her own heart and life; the contrast of their singleness of aim with her natural tendency to see everything in its subtlest relations, and on every side.

"Redemption, liberation, reconciliation, atonement, breathe through every line," she said. "Redemption, liberation, reconciliation in Him Who is the Redeemer, the Mediator, the Sacrifice, the Sufferer, the Conqueror, but most of all the Sufferer, with us, for us, in us; and all never for one instant to be separated, or to be conceived of, to all eternity, as separate from Him."

Their theology is Jesus:—

"Du dessen menschlich Leben, Das unsore selig macht;
Du dessen Geist aufgeben
Den Geist uns wider bracht
Den wir verloren halten:
Du unser Fleisch und Bein;
Ach, unter deinem Schatten
Ist's gut ein Mensch zu seyn."

"Yes," she said, "under His shadow it is good, good,—good for ever, everywhere, and for every one, to be a human creature; good for me, for Chloe, for all."

"And those are the words my poor widowed Aunt Prothessea loved," she said. "I smile sometimes when I think how sorrowful and stricken they thought her, and how her heart must have sung, and been at rest here over these dear old books, in this dear old room.

"And these are the words, Bride, in which Leonard Dober taught our poor black slaves. For I found the end of that story. He went in spite of all discouragement to those poor outcasts, not exactly as a slave, but poor, despised, as one ready to be, in all things except sin, one with them. He reached those poor broken hearts. 'Sweet, too sweet,' they said, 'are the tidings you bring to us.'

'That deep abyss of blessed love
In Jesus Christ to us unsealed,' was unsealed to hundreds of those parched and weary hearts. So easy it was to them to confess themselves to be 'nothing,' wretched, sinful! In Antigua the planters acknowledged that Christianity as taught by the Moravians made the negroes worth twice as much as slaves. And now there are congregations of Christian negroes in many of the islands; some Moravian and some Methodist. Zinzendorf's followers and Wesley's do agree there. Ah, Bride, I often think, if we could get down low enough, we should all agree here; as when we get up high enough, we shall surely all agree there."

"But, Bride," she added, "I have a little hidden hope, that it seems almost a treachery to you to have; yet almost a treachery if I have it, to hide from you."

We were sitting on that low window-seat. The moon had come up and was shimmering in a quiet pool of the river below.

A shiver went to my heart, as she took my two hands, according to a custom of hers, and pressed them against her face.

"I cannot set my slaves free yet," she said, "whatever you or Piers may think. The fines, legal expenses, &c., for setting them free, would take more than the estate is worth, and after all, the poor enfranchised creatures would be left quite helpless, and might become the slaves of any avaricious white who chose to claim them. It is more than mere money that I want one day to give to my slaves."

"I know, I know!" I said, "you want to give your life, yourself. You want to be a martyr. I do wish, I almost wish—your Aunt Prothesea had died before her Elder, in Germany, and all her books had been buried with her. I cannot, cannot part with you, Amice. How can I? Piers will marry—and every one else will die or change. How can I let you go, and go there? For the blacks are savages, and the planters are some of them worse."

"I shall not go, I hope, Bride," she said, smiling, "until I am sent;—and when I am sent you will have to help send me. And you will. You will help me more than any one, as you always do. And meantime if I have a taste for martyrdom, I think it may be gratified as easily, in my small way, here as in the West Indies. Only my Moravians will not hear of self-denial. 'Do you think it was self-denial to the Lord Jesus,' Count Zinzendorf said to John Wesley, 'when He came down from heaven to rescue a world?' No, Bride, it was love, and that swallows up everything; and first of all self, which it has not done yet for me."

"HONOUR ALL MEN."

WHOM shall we honour? Kings on thrones all golden,
 With crowns of orient pearls, and Tyrian robe,
 Heirs of the might of generations olden,
 Stretching their sceptre over half the globe?
Whom shall we honour? Statesmen sage and hoary,
 Wise to retain and wiser to reform,
 Stirred by no thirst but that of life's true glory,
 Bold pilots through the darkness and the storm?
Whom shall we honour? Poets chanting sweetly
 The lays of might that thrill a nation's heart,
 High souls that do their Master's bidding meetly,
 And on the mountain summits roam apart?
Nay, not these only: infants in their weakness,
 Slaves in their galleys, prisoners in their cell;
 Young girls that shrink and quail in maiden meekness,
 Sick, poor, unknowing:—honour these as well.
Calm let the voice be, kind as angel's greeting;
 Gentle the words, as one who fears to pain;
Reproach with pity, wrath with love still meeting,
 Searching how best thy brother's soul to gain.
So spake true saints of God, and won men's favour;
 So lived meek Paul, in pure and blameless guile;
Now with clear joy, and now in accents graver,
 Rousing each conscience, winning each to smile.

So, subtly truthful, courteous, calm and gentle,
 Drawing all hearts with cords of trust and love,
 His true sons guarding with a love parental,
 He moved, as bright stars through the darkness move.
So spake our Master, patient, meek, and lowly,
 To way-worn travellers, Israel's wandering sheep;
 He the All-pure, receiving men unholy,
 Sharing their joys, and weeping as they weep.
Yea, doubt it not; each soul deserves that honour;
 We may count none as common or unclean;
 She beareth still the King's true stamp upon her;
 Marred, half-effaced, His likeness still is seen.
Flushed be each word and thought of wrath and scorching;
 Turn not away in weariness or pride;
 When the light dawns of life's eternal morning,
 The poorest, frailest, may be at thy side.
Yes, honour all; but keep thy heart's best loving,
 For those true brothers, children of thy God,
 On the same pathway, to the same goal moving,
 The strait and narrow way our Master trod.
Love with a love that does not fail nor languish;
 Enduring, zealous, hoping, helping all;
 Quick to console all sorrow, soothe all anguish,
 Still burning brightly though the thick night fall.
 E. H. PLUMPTRE.

THE SHEPHERD OF THE STONE OF ISRAEL.

GEN. xlix. 24.

AS Jacob lay a-dying, he broke into prophetic song; the past and the future grew clear to the eyes that were closing on the familiar scenes of earth; he bade his sons farewell with blessings which foretold their future destinies. His song lingers over his first-born, the unstable Reuben; over Simeon and Levi, who had brought upon him the great shame of his later days; and over Judah the Lion, from whom the sceptre was not to depart till Shiloh came; but then presses rapidly on, briefly characterizing each of his other sons, and obscurely indicating their fate, till he reaches Joseph, his darling and his pride. At this beloved name he pauses, opens the very floodgates of his heart, and pours out upon him the fulness of his love. He multiplies benedictions upon him, and cannot cease. All that is most precious in heaven and on earth is to come upon him. His words roll and swell with the very passion of desire: one phrase grows out of another; the same word is repeated again and again with more eager emphasis, in new combinations.

It is almost impossible to read "the blessing on Joseph" and not be moved by it, so high is the strain in which it is conceived:—

"Son of a fruit-tree is Joseph;
 Son of a fruit-tree by the well,
 Whose branches run over the wall.
 Archers provoke him,
 And shoot and hate him;
 But his bow abideth in strength,
 And the arms of his hands remain supple
 From the hands of the Mighty One of Jacob,
 From thenceforth the Shepherd of the Stone of Israel,
 From the God of thy father—may He help thee!
 And from the Almighty—may He bless thee,
 With blessings from heaven above,
 Blessings of the flood that coucheth beneath,
 Blessings of the breast and of the womb!
 The blessing of thy father surpass the blessings of my fathers,
 As far as to the summit of the everlasting hills!
 Let it come on the head of Joseph,
 And on the crown of him who is illustrious among his brethren."

Rendered into prose, this exultant ode predicts that the descendants of Joseph are to enjoy the very blessings which the Hebrew race accounted most precious: they are to be fruitful and multiply; harassed by many foes, exercised by many wars, they are to acquire a steadfast valour which will lead them to victory; and their inheritance is to be a fertile land, enriched by brooks and streams. High as the everlasting hills rise above the earth, so high is the prosperity of Joseph's sons to rise above that of their progenitors.

The whole tone of this song is so joyful and triumphant that it can hardly fail to make an adequate impression on our minds. And yet, probably, the very lines in it which express least to an un instructed ear are precisely those which, to a student, carry the heaviest weight of meaning. As a warrant and guarantee that so large a promise of good is to be fulfilled, the patriarch pledges Jehovah to it by a name new even to his sons. The blessing is to come—

"From the hands of the Mighty One of Jacob.
 From thenceforth the Shepherd of the Stone of Israel."

No careful reader of the Old Testament can fail to have noticed the immense significance attached to the introduction of a new Divine Name. It invariably marks a crisis in history;—the opening of a new era, or the coming in of a new and larger revelation of divine truth, or the ratification of a new covenant. Thus, for instance, Abraham and Isaac, so soon as they entered into covenant with Jehovah, were permitted to call him "the God of Abraham" and "the God of Isaac." Thus, again, when Moses was called to be "the mediator" of a covenant between God and Israel, God revealed himself by a new name, and bade him say to the captives of Egypt, "I AM hath sent me unto you." Thus, too, when Joshua was about to commence war against the valiant nations of Canaan, God revealed himself to him as "the Lord of Hosts." In each case the name marks a crisis, a step in advance, a larger disclosure of the Divine character, a new engagement of promise and benediction with men.

There had been such a crisis in the history of Jacob, a crisis in which the Divine Ruler of the world, hitherto known to him only as "the God of Abraham," or "the God of Isaac," became "the God," or "the Mighty One of Jacob." The story of that crisis is familiar to us all. Jacob had sinned a great sin, cheating his father, cheating his brother, defrauding Isaac of the most valuable gift he had to bestow, defrauding Esau of the blessing which would have made him "ruler of his brethren." Esau's anger was kindled against him. The smooth supplanter had to leave Beersheba, and to wander eastward through the desert to Haran. On the first night of his journey he halted at a place called Luz. As "the sun went down," he found himself on the central ridge of the mountains of Palestine. The ground was strewn, then as now, with wide sheets of bare rock, amid which there stood up here and there, isolated fragments like the cromlechs and other Druidical remains of England. He lay down on the rocks to rest, a rock his pillow; and in the visions of the night, when deep sleep falleth on men, he dreamed that the rough stones formed themselves into a vast staircase, reaching into the depths of the broad and open sky. On the staircase he saw angels ascending and descending on the errands of their gracious ministry, while, from its summit, there came a Divine Voice which assured the homeless wanderer that even there he had a friend and a protector; that on the bare exposed rock, as in the consecrated tent or grove, God was present, beholding the evil and the good. The Lord was in the place, though he knew it not; and because God was in it, even the bare rock was "the house of God" and "the gate of heaven."

This was "the conversion" of Jacob, and it was here and now that, for the first time, he recognised God as his God. Heretofore he had conceived of Him as the "Friend" of Abraham, or the "Lord" of Isaac, who might be evaded and defrauded as Isaac was: henceforth he knew Him as "the Mighty One of Jacob," from whose presence there was no escape, who was in the desert as well as in the tent where He was worshipped; from whose presence there was no motive of escape, if He could shew himself thus graciously to one who had so grievously sinned, so friendly to one whose very brother sought his life.

To mark and signalize this crisis in his experience, this new revelation of God, Jacob took the stone on which his head had rested through the night, set it up for a pillar among the other stones which lay around, "and poured oil on the top of it." Such consecrated stones are to be found in our own Druidical remains, and throughout the world: they are familiar in the East. At Delphi, for instance, before the magnificent temple was built, there were rude stones which were held in veneration by the Greeks, and anointed with oil by the pilgrims who sought this holy place. The black stone of the Arabia Caaba dates back to the remotest antiquity; and the Mahommedan pilgrims still flock to it by myriads from the remotest parts of the East every year, often breeding among them the cholera which afterwards scourges our shores.

The consecrated stone which Jacob set up at Bethel would, we may be sure, fill a large space in his memory and imagination. It was the turning-point of his career, and must have continually recurred upon him, presenting itself in many lights. And in process of time he seems to have woven out of the materials it supplied a new name for the God who then first manifested himself to him, a name which he carried about in his heart as a secret charm, not disclosing it even to those who were nearest to him until death and love opened his lips. He could speak to his neighbours and children of the "God of Israel," or of the "Mighty One of Jacob," and thus avow his personal relation to the Almighty, and glory in it. But there was another name which was never heard from his lips till, as he lay a-dying, he blessed Joseph, his darling and pride. His name is rendered in our English version, "the Shepherd, the Stone of Israel;" but it is, I think, in the Hebrew an abbreviated and abrupt form of "the Shepherd of the Stone of Israel." And the reference of the phrase is sufficiently obvious. It embodies the memory of the night which Jacob spent amid the rocks of Luz.

A dreadful day for Jacob was that on which he fled from Beersheba! He was not bold and brave like Esau; his timid home-keeping youth had not inured him to hardship and self-reliance. And yet he was to wander forth alone, without tent, or camel, or waterskin. His father Isaac is dying, may be dead; fond, beautiful Rebecca sits weeping for him in her tent; Esau the hunter may be on his track, breathing out threatenings. With a foreboding heart, conscience making a coward of him, he wanders on, climbs the mountain, and looks round with apprehensive eyes. The sun is sinking, night falls dark and fast upon him, no shelter is at hand save that of the bare rocks. Solitary, weary, forlorn, he lies down, a stone his pillow. He weeps and dreams—but, lo, as he dreams, the darkness lifts; all heaven breaks in upon his eyes; the bare rock grows populous with ministers of grace; and God, the distant awful Inhabitant of heaven, who as yet has been only a shadow to him or a terror, bends over him with kindly looks and words of grace.

So marvellous a disclosure of the divine mercy might well surprise one who had suddenly become a fugitive and a vagabond in the earth—might well take many forms in his after-thoughts. One of these forms appears to have been this:—Like a silly wandering sheep he had broken from the home-fold—gone astray on the hills where foxes and wolves were lying in wait to devour. Helpless, and without a guide, he had wandered on and up till he came to the bleak desolate rocks, night with its dangers falling fast; and there, crouching fearfully among the rocks, he had been found by the Good Shepherd, who, rejoicing to find the sheep which He had lost, took him in his arms, and carried him through all the dangers of the time. Is it any wonder that "from thenceforth" God was known to Jacob as "the Shepherd of the Stone," "the Shepherd of the Rock?" or that he hid this name in his heart as a talisman, a secret of hope and strength? When, at the point of death, he poured out his heart in blessings on his favourite son, what more natural than that this cherished secret should escape him? What more natural than that, to assure the faith of Joseph in prospects so large and bright, he should offer as his guarantee, not only "the Mighty One of Jacob" and "the God of thy father," but also "the Shepherd of the Stone of Israel?"*

A Name so precious to Jacob can hardly be without value for us. And indeed few of the Divine Names are more suggestive of comfort and hope. Most of us have been at times "in the place which is called Desert." Like Jacob, we have sinned against both God and man; and when the painful results of our sin have come upon us, conscience has made cowards of us; we have felt as though our guilt had isolated us from our kind and alienated us from God. Dark clouds, clouds, so at least our fears prophesied, big with punitive lightnings, have obscured our heaven and swept their cold shadows across our earth. We have stumbled among the rocks, and sunk down on the stones to court a rest that would not come. Like Jacob, we have dreamed, our fears peopling our dreams; perchance, unlike him, we have risen from our dreams un comforted by any bright vision of ministering spirits, unconscious of the divine Shepherd, who nevertheless has watched over us while we slept. Like Jacob, we do not know God for our God; like him, we cannot conceive of a mercy which follows us along every path in which we stray, a mercy which is never nearer to us than when we think ourselves at the farthest remove from its presence, a mercy never more open to us than when we most need its aid, a mercy which is with us even before we turn and seek it.

And therefore we need to know and re-

* This conception of Jacob's motive for never uttering the Divine Name so sacred to him, and of the allusion latent in that Name, seems confirmed by the previous chapter, which describes the blessing pronounced by Jacob on the two sons of Joseph. That his mind was now full of the earlier and more impressive memories of his life is indicated by the words (Gen. xlviii. 3, 4): "And Jacob said to Joseph, God Almighty (El-Shaddai) appeared to me in Luz, in the land of Canaan, and blessed me, and said to me, Behold I will make thee fruitful, and multiply thee, and I will make of thee a multitude of people, and will give this land to thy seed after thee for an everlasting possession." That the thought of God under the image of a good Shepherd was present to him is evident from the words (ver. 15, 16), "the God who was my Shepherd from my birth to this day . . . bless the lads." member God as "the Shepherd of the Stone of Israel." God was with Jacob even in the desert, far away from the sacred places in which He commonly revealed his presence. God was with Jacob, even though he was in the desert for his sins, with him to keep him and to do him good in turning him away from his sins, with him to overcome his evil with a divine goodness. And God is with us when we are lonely and weary, even though our weariness and loneliness be the due reward of our deeds. The Good Father does not cease to love his children, or fail to watch over them, because they are foolish and wayward, or even because they waste their substance in riotous living. He knows, knows and pities, the penury and distress to which their folly or their riot has exposed them. Nay, outdoing even the gracious father of the parable, He often follows them into the "far country," smitten with "famine," that He may bring them home again. The Good Shepherd, the Shepherd of the Stone of Israel, thinks more of the one sheep lost among the dark barren hills, than of the ninety and nine safe in the pasture or the fold, and will even lay down his life rather than suffer the wanderer to be devoured by the wolf. In after years Jacob knew well what it was to be a shepherd in the Syrian plains and hills. He tells us that "in the day the drought consumed" him, and "the frost" in the cold eastern night, and that "his sleep departed from him." And all his remembrances of the hardships of the pastoral life would lend new force and pathos to his conception of God as "the Shepherd of the Rock," the Shepherd who never "slumbers nor sleeps," but who, night and day, goes forth after the sheep which are lost—lost, and not lost, because, wander where they will, He is with them.

But we are ingenious in self-torment; and when we have done wrong and gone astray, our hearts are full of fears. If we so far rise toward a due conception of the infinite mercy of God as to believe that He will be with us even when we stumble among the rocks, we forthwith begin to question and doubt afresh. We say, "Yes, no doubt He will be with us despite our sins, if only we repent, if only we turn and look for Him and ask his aid. If we seek Him, He will be found of us. But, at times, so foolish are we that we do not seek Him, or do not seek Him in the right way. Will He be with us then?" Yes, even then: for the Divine Shepherd stands beside every stone on which we sleep, every rock at which we stumble and fall, and can make every desert and solitary place in which we wander blossom and rejoice like the rose. Jacob did not know that "God was in that place;" none the less it was "the house of God and the gate of heaven." We are not so much as told that Jacob was sorry for his sin, or even that he knew it to be a sin: God came to make him sorry, to quicken in him a repentance unto life, to kindle a fire in him which would burn out the baseness and treachery of his nature. We are left to infer that the natural terrors of the time and place excited some dread of the deed which had haunted him, homeless and forlorn, on the barren hills. The Lord who stands at the summit of the ladder utters no reproof, no threatening, but only words of comfort and promise: yet Jacob is won, by love, to a consecration to which no mere terror could have driven him. And why should we doubt that God, our Father and our Shepherd, will be good and kind to us? When we first met Him and came to know Him as our God—ours, and not simply as the God of our fathers—was He not found of them who sought Him not? Has He ever been slow to find and keep us? Have we ever received aught but grace and kindness at his hands? Has He not been most kind when He has left us for a little space to eat the fruit of our own doings, that He might return in great mercy so soon as we strove to make our ways and our doings good? If there be any good thing in us, has it not come of his goodness to us? If, then, we have sinned, and are even now banished by our sin from some place of rest and comfort in which we hoped to abide, let us not waste too much time and energy in lamenting the irrevocable past, in crying over water that has been spilt upon the ground and cannot be gathered up again; but, trusting in the constant mercy of our Father and Guide, let us rather, like Jacob, address ourselves to a future obedience, and devote ourselves anew to Him who has come to us, in the night of our darkness, to speak comfortably unto us.

Another hard cold stone on which we are apt to lay our heads when we have strayed into the bleak hills, is this:—"If we were wiser, if we knew more, and could see farther, if our conceptions of God and his truth were more accurate and large, we might take heart for the future, and hope to guide our lives more wisely. But we know so little; we are so little sure even of the little we know: mysteries so dense hover round our life and duty, that our faith cannot but be unsteadfast, and our hope flicker in the wind." How much did Jacob know, then? Were his conceptions of God, and life, and duty remarkable for their accuracy and their breadth? When he laid his head upon the pillow, he did not so much as know God to be his God; to him the Lord was only "the God of my fathers;" and when he lifted his head in the morning light, his first thought—surely rather a Jewish thought—was to strike a bargain with the God whom he has just discovered to be "the mighty One of Jacob." Very much as though "the Shepherd of the Rock" were only a good-natured generous Laban, Jacob begins to make a contract, to guard himself by this stipulation and that,—“If God will keep me, and feed me, and clothe me, and bring me back in peace—then He shall be my God; I will build Him a house, and give Him back a tenth of all He gives to me.” Not a very liberal offer! not a broad or spiritual conception of the Father of an infinite majesty! Yet God accepts the offer, submits to the stipulations, seals the bargain. Will He not accept us, then, and our services, though our knowledge be imperfect and our faith unstable? All the good men who have gone before us, even Jacob himself, a man only very imperfectly good at the best, have taught us some lesson of heavenly wisdom. And if we try to use such wisdom as we have, and to live by it, we may be very sure that God will give us more.

And here we come on the only proviso which these comfortable assurances require. If God meet with us in the desert place to which our sins have conducted us, it is that we may abandon our sins, and henceforth abide with Him. He visits us where we look not for Him, and finds us when we are not seeking Him; but it is that He may teach us what as yet we know not, and constrain us by his kindness to us to consecrate ourselves to his service. In short, the Shepherd follows us to the rocks, that He may bring us back to the fold. The story of Bethel, therefore, has slight comfort for us if we refuse to learn what God reveals Himself to teach. But if we are willing and docile, then, indeed, the story is full of comfort for us. Our errors and sins will not keep God at a distance. Our ignorance of his presence will not debar us from the protection of his presence. He is the Shepherd of the Rock; and so often as we wander into the place of rocks, and sink wearied in the darkness, He will come to us, to renew his covenant with us, and to lighten our dejected spirits by visions bright with an eternal joy.

FULL ENJOYMENT.

"O God, Thou art my God;
My soul thirsteth for Thee."

MANY a bright and beautiful thing
Thou hast given us to enjoy;
Yet is none without a sting—
None is quite without alloy;
Nothing can full joy afford
Save the love of Christ our Lord.

For our hearts are large and wide,
Formed for Heaven, and not for earth;
They can ne'er be satisfied
With these "things of lower worth;"
Only on a love Divine
Truly can those hearts recline.

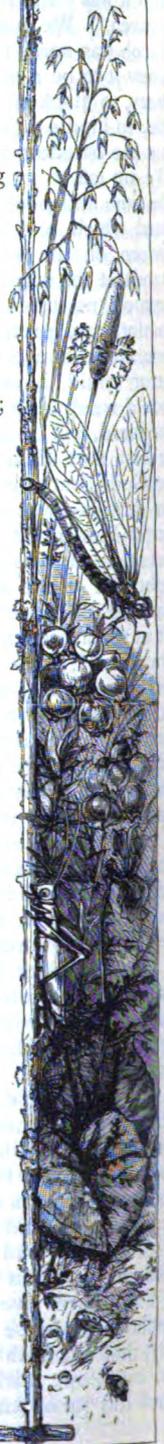

Beauty, riches, earthly love,
Talent, science, art, and might—
These are blessings from above,
Let us value them aright:
But, so valuing, still look higher,
And beyond them still aspire.

Jesus, Lord, to Whom I owe
All I have in earth or heaven,
Let me never rest below
In the gifts that Thou hast given,
But climb on from grace to grace,
Till I stand before Thy Face.

Could my fancy ever paint
Anything so fair as Thee?
Could archangel e'er, or saint,
Fill my soul's immensity?
Ah, my God!—my only Rest—
Thou alone canst fill this breast.

Make me then entirely Thine,
And, when this brief life is done,
Take me where Thy glories shine
Brighter, purer than the sun:—
And where Thou immediately
Shalt my full enjoyment be.

ASSOCIATION OF COMETS AND STAR SHOWERS.

BY THE REV. J. CRAMPTON.

"And behold a great red dragon . . . and his tail drew the third part of the stars of heaven."—Rev. xii. 3.

COMETS may truly be considered as the enigma of the heavens. Suns and planets have yielded their many wonders, in some degree, to the insatiable curiosity and intelligence of the little restless Being who, stationed on his grain of sand called earth, has surveyed and scrutinized them for thousands of years. Misty nebulae, and flying meteors, and distant firmaments have surrendered at discretion and laid open their wonders and real nature, and laid down their arms before the eye and intelligence of man armed with his telescopic tube or spectroscopic weapon; all have more or less been conquered, but comets—these flaming swords of heaven, these mysterious startling apparitions, still defy research, and, though they spread themselves ostentatiously across the whole hemisphere as though to invite deliberate attention and investigation, they still continue to evade scrutiny, now awing the ignorant or superstitious, now challenging and puzzling the scientific world. Though every motion has been observed and ascertained, their orbits calculated, their inner movements watched by thousands of curious eyes and telescopes, all as yet is in vain. There shines the mysterious head with its dull vaporous light and brilliant nucleus within; there spreads the wondrous tail, now fanned, now forked, now multiplied into many tails, and spread over millions and millions of miles of the heavens; but what is actually known about comets? What is their nature and what their purpose and use in creation? To what class of bodies can they be referred?

No reply that can be depended on has as yet been given to any of these questions, and comets are still one of the mysteries of creation which remains yet to be unfolded. Many ingenious solutions of it have been suggested of more or less weight; but after all they are but guess work, and most of them as improbable as they are unproved.

Yet in these days, at least within the last five years, it has been thought a recent light has been thrown upon their nature, which may possibly lead to the resolution of at least a portion of the mystery in which they are enveloped. The recent discovery of the remarkable and exact coincidence of the orbits of two comets—that of 1862, called Tempel's, and 1866, with the orbits of the two principal systems of meteors, forming the splendid meteoric showers of August and November, 1866—has led astronomers to the natural conclusion of the association of these systems in some way with comets, but in what way has not yet been proved. There are many other meteoric systems that have been associated with known comets; but those of the August and November meteors are the only periods that have been actually determined to be identical with the orbits of the two comets in question. This discovery, first noted by Schiaparelli, seemed at first to give some possible clue to the nature of these strange bodies, and when ascertained startled the scientific world of astronomers not a little.

An association of some kind of these great systems with the comets could no longer be doubted, and expectation was consequently raised that we had at last got the key to the mystery of the being of these strange visitants, and a shower of meteors was in fact but the encounter of the earth with some portion of the comet, or something attached to it and inseparable from it—possibly a portion of its tail constituting the innumerable meteorites that flashed upon us in 1866, and into the midst of which the earth plunged, and through which she passed on that memorable night. If so, comets would be but the condensed material of which the meteors are composed, leaving their tail or wake of star showers or cometary matter behind them as they rushed on their orbit.

Thus we seemed to be on the eve of a great discovery, and for aught I know we may be still; but as yet, at least, it has not advanced a single step further, and no such conclusion has been adopted positively or universally by the astronomical world of science—nor can it be proved; and though a most remarkable association between the star showers in question and the two comets referred to has been shown and acknowledged, the actual nature of the association has not been ascertained, and the mystery of the physical condition of these bodies and their use in the universe is as great as ever; indeed, remarkable as the association is, there is nothing in the appearance of a comet to warrant its relation to the meteoric showers in any way, except in the identity of its orbit with those systems. On the contrary, examination with the telescope reveals the very opposite, and nothing that would lead to such a conclusion. Any one who has ever seen a comet with the naked eye, or with a telescope (even the most powerful), would at once and at first sight reject the idea of its substance being composed of meteorites, or the cometary matter we then behold being in any way connected with or having a resemblance to the star showers with which we are familiar, and the composition of which we are well acquainted with; in fact, there is no resemblance whatever between a star shower and a comet, from its head to its tail (i.e. if it has such an appendage, which all have not), such, for instance, as Enke's short-period comet, or Biela's, of which we shall afterwards speak in reference to this theory, though here, by the way, it may be questioned whether such a body should properly be classed at all with the large-tailed monsters to which we are accustomed to give that name. A nearly circular or elliptic nebulous and misty mass, with a faint bluish light, and an equally faint nucleus in it, hardly conveys the idea of its belonging to the class of such grand objects as that called Donati's comet of 1858, or other long-period and long-tailed comets, such as that of 1811 or 1843, the tail of which latter extended two hundred millions of miles, with many others that could be mentioned, such as Halley's; but not one of these convey the idea to the mind of their consisting of numberless discrete or separate bodies, or shreds of matter, such as constitute the meteoric showers. The most powerful telescopes directed to them have failed to resolve any portion of them into separate stars, or meteorites, as can be effected even in those distant nebulae, which though to the naked eye, or a low power of a telescope, seem as misty as any comet, yet resolve into firmaments of separate stars under a high power telescope; in fact, the idea formed in the mind of the best astronomers of the ordinary and, what may be termed, legitimate comet, is a gaseous-looking body, containing a bright nucleus, more or less condensed, but the entire so transparent that stars can be seen through any part of it, while both nucleus and tail are subject to the most sudden and violent changes of size, shape, and direction, wholly inconsistent with the idea of their identity with star showers. Such phenomena were witnessed in Halley's comet, among many others, in the year 1835—a comet, one of the most remarkable of all, as verifying the calculations of Halley as to the elements of its orbit, and fulfilling accurately his prediction of its returning after an absence of seventy-five years.

The close and searching examination to which this comet was subject seems to put out of the question almost its association with star showers, or any relation whatever to them, but seems rather to indicate some powerful magnetic or electric force, specially manifested on its approach and departure from the sun. At these periods it was carefully observed and noted, and drawings were made of it in all its different phases by some of the most eminent astronomers of the time, among which were Struve, Bessel, Schwabe, Sir John Herschel, and Maclear. Some of the remarkable phenomena then displayed we may here mention.

At its first appearance in October, 1835, when the present writer saw it with the deepest interest, it appeared to have no tail, and seemed but a small round nebula. The tail, however, very soon began to be formed, and, increasing rapidly, on the 20th of October attained its greatest length, which was 20 degrees; after which it decreased as rapidly, and by the 29th of October had diminished to 2½ degrees. The circumstances accompanying this increase and decrease were remarkable, and such as in the opinion of the writer would seem to be opposed altogether to such an association of meteorites, or star showers, with comets as would imply that they were actually composed of the materials or tails of these objects.

On the 2nd of October the formation of the tail took place by a violent ejection of nebulous matter from that part of the comet that was presented toward the sun. This ejection, however, was neither uniform nor continuous, but, like the fiery matter from a volcano, it was thrown out at intervals. After this no ejection was observed till the 8th, when it recommenced more violently than before, and assumed a new form. A second tail appeared and presented a direction opposed to that of the original tail, and therefore away from the sun. This was regarded by Bessel merely as the renewed ejection of nebulous matter, which was afterwards turned back from the sun as smoke would be by a current of air blowing from the sun in the direction of the original tail. From the 8th to the 22nd the form, position, and brightness of the nebulous emanation underwent various irregular changes: the last alternately increasing and decreasing; at one time two, at another three nebulous emanations were seen to issue in different directions, something in a swallow-tailed form, like the flame from a fan gas-burner. Sometimes the entire tail oscillated violently from one side to the other of the line from the sun through the head of the comet, as a compass needle oscillates between one and the other side of the magnetic meridian. So rapid was the oscillation that the direction of jets was visibly changed from hour to hour, the brightness of the matter being most intense at the point where it was ejected from the nucleus, and faded away as it expanded into the coma, curving backwards in the direction of the principal tail like steam or smoke before the wind.

On the 12th the comet appeared in uncommon splendour. The nucleus and flame, however, being alone visible, its appearance was most beautiful, resembling a jet streaming out from the nucleus like flame from a blowpipe, or the flame from a discharge from a mortar, attended with the white smoke driven before the wind.*

Through all these wonderful transformations the stars were distinctly seen through it without diminution of their splendour, even through the very centre of the nucleus, as was the case with Donati's comet, through which Arcturus shone with undiminished lustre. Drawings by Messrs. Maclear and Smith of the strange phases of Halley's comet illustrate this fact most beautifully.

Sir John Herschel's deductions from these phenomena as seen by him at the Cape are as follows:—

1. That the matter of the comet vaporised by the sun's heat escaped in jets, throwing the comet into irregular motion by its reaction, and thus changing its own direction of ejection.
2. That this ejection takes place principally in the part presented to the sun.
3. That thus ejected it encounters a resistance from some unknown force; probably an ethereal medium, by which it is repulsed in an opposite direction, and so forms a tail.
4. That this force acts unequally on the cometary matter which is not all vaporised, but a considerable portion is retained to form a nucleus.

Putting all these facts together which have been collected by the very first astronomers and observers of the age, and accepting Halley's comet as a sample of all others—for there is no reason to believe there is any difference in their materials—the question of the nature of the association of showers of meteorites with comets must be very doubtful; and the idea suggested by many, that on the night of the 13th of November, 1866, we were actually plunged into the depths of a portion of a comet is more than problematical. The changes of form and shape, and violent emission of matter, the contraction and expansion of the nucleus in approaching or leaving the sun, the entire loss and subsequent recovery of their tails, and the twisting and turning of those strange appendages in every direction, or the formation of several tails simultaneously, together with the cloudy and clearly gaseous transparent appearance of the entire body from head to tail, with the bright darting scintillations, proceeding from the nucleus,* leave the impression of electric phenomena, and the explosion of an electric battery, rather than showers of material bodies, whose substance we are well acquainted with—through the spectroscope—and which, though most of them, it is true, are very light, yet are accompanied by others of the very same material, large and solid, many of which doubtless struck the earth like a cannon shot on the night in question, and which do not seem to bear the slightest relationship with those strange transparent fire-mists, called comets, through which every star beams as brightly as though there were nothing between us and them, and whose weird and phantom shapes, successively adopted, stretch themselves across the sky—now as a flaming sword, now a glowing gas fan, now as a dim, hazy, tailless mass of nebulous light, now as a three-tailed, or even six-tailed, monster—flaming every way. All this seems to imply that, be that what they may, they are of a material unlike anything of a metallic or planetary origin, and are of so light and cloudlike a nature, that they are as easily acted upon by the agencies around them as smoke by the wind, or a soap bubble by the breath.

* This was visible to the writer in a remarkable manner in a comet which appeared in August, 1853, and which he observed most closely with a ten-feet refracting telescope of six inches aperture; continued flashes like those proceeding from an aurora or electric battery, or resembling what is called sheet or summer-lightning, played in the envelope of the nucleus, lighting it up and darting down along the tail. The nucleus itself was not condensed but semi-transparent, and the whole comet appeared like a hollow gaseous object. It was while engaged in observing this comet a strange object appeared in the zenith, and stretched itself across the heavens like a serpent, occupying two-thirds of the entire hemisphere. It was of a blue light, in some degree resembling that of an aurora, but in other respects not the least like one. It remained in view steadily and with equal lustre for nearly a quarter of an hour, when it gradually faded away. There was no coruscation or movement of light perceptible in it, and its breadth and strange serpentine form winding itself across the heavens would, a century ago, have been looked upon as most alarming. What its nature was I was unable to discover. There was a sketch of it, which appeared at the time in the Illustrated News, and it was evidently not a local object, but one visible throughout Great Britain, if not elsewhere. As the Russian war broke out before the year was out, superstitious people would see in these twofold signs in heaven the indication of its approach.

CUSTOMS AND CURIOSITIES OF MADAGASCAR.

PART I.

THERE are many points of interest connected with Madagascar. Its geography, geology, natural history, botany, ethnology, and language, are all full of interest to the man of science. Its martyr history, and the marvellous success which has been achieved by the Gospel in late years in this island, have attracted the attention of the whole Christian world.

The island of Madagascar is situated in the Indian Ocean, about three hundred miles east of the continent of Africa. It is the third largest island in the world, ranking after Australia and Borneo. It is nine hundred and fifty miles long, and about three hundred and fifty in its greatest breadth, narrowing towards either extremity, its average breadth being two hundred miles; and is thus considerably larger than Great Britain and Ireland together.

The physical aspects of Madagascar are striking. A narrow stripe of land runs round the sea-coast, level and sandy, which has been recently (geologically speaking) left dry by the receding ocean. This stripe on the east coast is, in many places, separated from the old sea margins by lakes, often communicating with each other, and with the sea. This wonderful series of lakes might be made the means of water communication, and afford a route for commerce for two hundred and fifty miles along the coast, were a few canals cut so as to open up a way for boats between the various lakes. The scenery all along this belt is exceedingly beautiful. The sandy soil is covered with vegetation, and in many places the level tracks gently sloping down towards these lakes, covered with short grass, and studded thickly, though not crowded, with the stately Filao (Casuarina laterifolia), would remind us of an English park, were it not that the margins of the streams and lakes are lined with pandanus, and other tropical trees. There are numerous small, wooded islands in some of these lakes.

Further inland, again, we come upon an undulating, knolly country. The soil is a red stiff clay, which is very general throughout the island. The rounded knolls are covered with grass, and the numerous valleys, where they are not cultivated, are clothed with palms, bamboos, and other tropical trees. This beautiful district is malarious, and, except during the cold season, is dangerous to Europeans. Along the greater part of the east coast this belt extends inland for about fifty miles, and all this way there is a gradual ascent, amounting in all to between two and three thousand feet. We next reach an elevated range of mountains covered with forest, and at an average elevation of three thousand five hundred feet above the level of the sea. This forest range, or other ranges which represent it, seems to run almost round and round the island; the greater part of it is as yet unexplored. A few difficult tracks or footpaths pass through it at various points; but there are no proper roads upon which any vehicle, or even beast of burden, could be used. Everything has to be transported by human labour; the palanquin is the only mode of travelling, except indeed going on foot. In the rainy season, from the absence of bridges, from the deep ruts caused by the rains and the slipperiness of the steep hills, these paths become scarcely passable even for the natives accustomed to this kind of work. Madame Pfeiffer, the celebrated traveller, pathetically accords to Madagascar the unenviable distinction of possessing the worst roads in the world. The difference between the roads in Madagascar and other countries has been thus not unaptly described—"Roads in other countries are for the purpose of helping on the traveller; in Madagascar they are designed to keep him back."

This forest is from thirty to forty miles broad. The trees are no longer of the distinctly tropical kind; palms and bamboos only thrive in the warm and more sheltered valleys. The hill-tops are covered with various kinds of exogenous trees, as mahogany, ebony, quassia, and ornamented with many different kinds of orchids.

Pursuing the usual route to the capital, and having traversed the forest, we pass through a grassy plain, destitute of trees, sixteen to twenty miles across. This plain farther south seems to become a partially wooded country. It is at a somewhat lower level than the forest range, and is named from the river which winds through it, the valley of the Mangoro. Passing across this plain, we reach a new line of high lands. In many parts along the border of this line there are outstanding, solitary, conical or rounded hills rising out of the valley like sentinels, and at the back of these a steep range of hills rising up abruptly, running along and bounding the plain like a wall. When we gain the summit of this range we meet another, but narrower line of forest, only about ten to fifteen miles broad, at an elevation of nearly five thousand feet. At this height the air is cooler and the climate healthier, and the vegetation more European in its aspect. Passing through this belt of wood, we come upon the great central table-land of Madagascar, running along, with some differences of elevation, for many hundred miles. This naked plateau is a mass of hills and knolls, separated by valleys, generally narrow ones, and united to each other by necks of land. The higher hills are usually steep, and being uncovered by trees, the heavy rains of summer have washed away the soil down to the valleys, exposing rounded boulders of granite of immense size and romantic shapes, projecting in threatening positions on the sides of the hills. Here and there, again, we meet picturesque mountain-like masses of bare granite rock towering up in solitary grandeur. A long, dry, rough, creeping grass covers the ground. In many places, however, the red soil exposed by the rains detracts from the beauty of the landscape. It is away up in this central tableau that the capital of Madagascar stands, and it is here that the governing race—the Hovahs—dwells.

We must now observe the houses and villages of the natives which we meet during this journey from the sea-coast to the capital.

We shall pass over the town of Tamatave, which, being the chief seat of trade and the residence of foreigners, cannot be looked upon as a model Malagasy town. Passing inland through the country I have been describing, we soon meet with numbers of little villages at various intervals all along the route to the capital. We are struck by the aggregation of the houses. We seldom find houses standing alone, or studded all over the country, as in England; they are collected into miserable little villages, numbering from ten to a hundred houses. In the low country the sites of the villages do not seem to have been chosen with any reference to security. The villages are simply an irregular collection of huts or houses huddled together in a disorderly manner. The larger ones have a flag-staff set up somewhere near the centre, and usually a house built by the village called "the queen's house," in which the sovereign's goods are stowed while they are being conveyed to the capital. It is simply a sort of shed, consisting of a single room without any furniture. The house of the head-man of the village is distinguished only by its size from those of the other inhabitants.

A Malagasy house in the low country is a framework of wood; the walls being usually made of the leaves of the pandanus woven into this framework. The door is made of the same material, and is not hung upon hinges, but is separate and movable, and at night is placed in the door-way and a piece of stick put against it to keep it in position. The house is elevated on poles a few feet above the level of the ground, to allow the heavy rains to pass underneath, and this space below the floor is the favourite resort for dogs and pigs, that nightly dispute the privilege of taking up their lodgings there, giving rise to considerable disturbance to the traveller unaccustomed to this sort of lullaby.

The houses are about twenty feet long by fifteen broad, and divided into two apartments by a slight partition, often only a few feet high, which the more supple-legged natives find no difficulty in vaulting, as I have sometimes found to my annoyance, when I had fancied that I had protected myself from the untimely intrusion of visitors by blocking up the door. One of these apartments is entered by the door, the other is lighted by a small window about four feet above the ground, without either curtains or glass, but furnished with a wooden shutter. Internally the walls of the houses are hung with mats, and the floors are covered with the same. When a stranger enters a clean mat is spread at the place where he is to sit down, or at least the clean side of an old mat is turned uppermost.

This practice, by the way, of showing the clean side of the mat to strangers, curiously, but most appropriately, gives rise to the Malagasy word for hypocrisy. The word is a compound one, and literally means "the turning out the clean side of the mat."

The outer apartment, or hall, is the sitting-room of the family, the reception-room for the less distinguished visitors, kitchen, cook house, and at night the sleeping place for fowls, ducks, and in some parts of the country for sheep and pigs, or even cattle. The other room is the dining-room, drawing-room, bedroom, and dressing-room of the simple native. The furniture is scanty and primitive, there are no chairs, tables, or bedsteads. The fire-place is in the centre of the outer room, and as there is no chimney, the wood smoke fills the house, and escapes by the door and window, or when these are shut, finds slow exit by the chinks in the walls and roof.

In the central province of Imerina, the villages are built on hills, and are surrounded by double or even triple lines of ditches or fosses. Many of the towns are enclosed by walls now ruinous, testifying to the disturbed state of the country in former times. The houses are built substantially either of wood or clay, and are in the form of a parallelogram, uniformly facing the west, and their length is thus, of course, always north and south. The common plan, as in the low country, is to have a door in one end, and a window in the other; the roof is neatly thatched with rushes, and its height and steepness formerly indicated the importance of the owner. These picturesque high-pitched roofs are, however, rapidly disappearing. To remove the weight of the roof from the wall, and give support, three posts are placed one at either end and the other in the middle of the house. In Imerina the houses are sometimes ceiled, and in that case a trap or ladder leads up to the garret, which serves as the kitchen. From this, the roof in old houses is seen hanging with soot and cobwebs, and the rafters receive a shining black polish, from continual smoking. This blackness or sootiness is looked upon as an honourable proof of antiquity, and the phrase "old sooty" is frequently applied as flattering distinction to an old and well-tried friend.

In the capital itself and the towns in its neighbourhood the state of things is very different. During the ten years that I have resided there, I have witnessed changes that may truly be called a revolution. Antananarivo, with its palaces and churches, schools and hospital, and private buildings, is to-day well deserving the name of a city. It contains eighty thousand inhabitants, and is built on the ridge and sloping sides of a Y-shaped hill, which displays to advantage its public buildings. It is beautiful and romantic, and all the more so in contrast with the villages by which it is reached.

No proper political division of the island has ever been made. The exact number of provinces is therefore variously estimated by different writers, some of whom by reckoning as one several of the divisions, which others look upon as distinct provinces, reduce the number to fourteen or even fewer.

The country generally is well watered and fertile, producing a considerable variety of fruits, as the banana, mango, orange, peach, and pine-apple. Rice is the chief article of food, and is carefully cultivated in the high lands by the spade, the plough being unknown. In the low country rice grows very easily, maize and potatoes are also cultivated, and wheat has been recently introduced.

The wild animals are very few; the buffalo, and wild boar, and a species of fox are the only ones worth notice: there are no lions, tigers, leopards, or elephants. Madagascar has, however, a few animals quite peculiar to itself. The most remarkable of these is the tribe of lemurs—popularly Madagascar cats. They are somewhat like the squirrel, but larger, with a fine, thick, soft fur, and bushy tails; there is a considerable number of kinds of lemur. Some of these in size and appearance have some distant resemblance to the monkey: they live in the forest among the trees, and are often to be seen swinging themselves from branch to branch, and making as rapid progress from place to place in their arboreal highways as a man running on the ground below. From these, the supposed continent, of which Madagascar, Mauritius, Bourbon, the Comoro and Seychells, and a few others form the only remaining portions, has been named Lemuria.

Another quadrumanous animal quite peculiar to the country is the aye-aye. This singular animal is somewhat like the lemur in its size and appearance. It is nocturnal in its habits, and arboreal in its habitat, and lives upon wood-boring larvæ, which tunnel beneath the bark of trees. It is provided with strong chisel-shaped teeth to remove the bark, and, in order to reach its food in the end of its hole, it has got a singularly long middle finger furnished with a scoop-like nail, which can readily extract the coveted morsel.

The Mammalia of Madagascar number only forty-nine species. Dr. Sclater, from a consideration of the zoology of the island, has concluded, first, that Madagascar has never been connected with Africa as it at present exists; second, that Madagascar and the Mascarene Islands must have remained for a long epoch separated from every other part of the globe; third, that some land communication must have existed in former ages between Madagascar and India.

Gold, silver, copper, lead, and iron, have been found in the island. Iron is plentiful and worked, the precious metals are forbidden to be worked under pain of death, or chains.

Now, from what has been said of the houses, villages, and want of roads, it might be concluded that the Malagasy are or were a barbarous people, and indeed some of the tribes are only a few steps removed from barbarism. But the Malagasy inhabiting the central and some of the coast provinces had a civilisation of their own, differing very much, it is true, from our nineteenth century civilisation, ages before they ever came in contact with Europeans. They had established forms of government, gradations of rank, and laws affording considerable protection to life and property, and as a part of their civilisation they had a number of interesting customs, strikingly similar in many of their features to the Jewish rites, with which we are all familiar. Another thing rendering the customs of the Malagasy more particularly interesting is this—they are undoubtedly very ancient—a fragment, as it were, of an early civilisation existing in modern times, carrying us back to Central Asia, the cradle of the race, and to the patriarchal age—the youth of the world.

Perhaps the best way of obtaining an idea of the Malagasy people and their condition, will be by considering in detail, but briefly, the race, language, government, social habits, religion, and religious customs.

The Malagasy are of middle height and well built, the features regular and good, nose prominent, generally somewhat aquiline, forehead broad and well developed, mouth pretty large, lips somewhat thick. In colour there is a considerable variety of shade, but they must all be classed amongst the yellow-skinned races. They are not black. The tribes inhabiting the sea-coast are dark compared with those occupying the higher and cooler districts of the interior. The difference in climate no doubt partially at least explains this, but it is highly probable that along the sea-coast the people are considerably mixed, not only with Arabs and natives of the East Indies, but also in some places with the natives of Africa.

There is a marked difference between the darkest of the Malagasy, and the negro. As regards hair—there are two kinds; the white-skinned tribes have long, straight, coarse, black hair, while the darker ones have short, curly hair. Still it is genuine hair, and not the tufty wool of the negro.

In the central provinces, irrespective of slaves, there are two classes, the Hovahs, or governing race, and the Andrians, or members of the royal family. The Andrians, are very numerous, and are divided into seven classes, according to the nearness of their connection with the reigning sovereign. They are not permitted to intermarry with the Hovahs, a law which is scrupulously observed by all, with the exception of the sovereign, who is above all law. There is no reason for supposing that the Andrians and Hovahs are of different origin.

While considering the question of race, we are naturally led to inquire about their language. It is abundantly manifest that it has no affinities with African tongues. It is an important fact that only one language is spoken through the whole island. There are, of course, considerable varieties of dialect, but less than might have been anticipated, in an island of such magnitude, and with so little intercommunication. The differences are not so important as to prevent any one knowing the Hovah dialect holding intercourse with every tribe in the island: this fact alone is presumptive of the unity of the various tribes. For assuming, as some have done, that the Hovahs have a distinct origin from the others, it is impossible satisfactorily to account for the unity of language.

The Malagasy language is a member of the great Turanian "stock," and is closely allied to the Malay, or Malayo-polynesian, confirming the conclusion, which the physical characteristics of the people point to, regarding their Asiatic origin. In examining, rather hurriedly, a Malay dictionary, I found above a hundred words manifestly identical. A careful study of the two languages would, no doubt, enable us to trace many more words to a common root, their identity being obscured by changes of inflection and phonetic substitution. It is interesting to notice the class of words which remain the same in both. Leaving out of view the numerals, which are wonderfully alike in languages by no means closely related, we notice that many of the great objects and phenomena of nature have the same names in Malay and Malagasy, as the sun, moon, and stars, the earth and heaven. The words for year and month, and for day and night, for lightning and storm, are alike. Then the names for a human being, for a man and child, are the same. Many parts of the human body have the same names, as eye, mouth, tongue, hands, blood, bones, and hair. In general, the words that are alike are those of a generic or indefinite import, rather than those of a particular signification. Thus the word for bird is the same in Malagasy and Malay, but the names of particular birds are different. The word for food is identical, but the particular articles have got different names in the two languages.

The verbs that are alike are generally those expressive of simple, definite, almost universal actions, such as to cook, to eat, to dwell, to die, to weave, to paint. But, apart from the identity or similarity of individual words, we have a much more trustworthy testimony to the affinity of these languages in their general and grammatical structure. By general structure is here understood figurative combinations, duplicative repetition of syllables, and syllabic formation of words.

As an example of the similarity of figurative combination, we may select the poetical and primitive figurative combination for sun. In both languages this luminary is called the Day's Eye. The Malay, like the Malagasy, seems to make frequent use of words formed by duplicative repetition of a simple word. This repetition is resorted to in order to modify the meaning of the primary word, as lehibe, big, lehibebe, pretty big; manoratra, to write, manorasoratra, to scribble. The syllabic structure of the Malagasy language is singularly simple, some would say babyish. The syllables are generally of two letters — consonant and vowel syllables, seldom vowel and consonant ones. This peculiarity is also observed in the Malay. As an example of this take the name of the present queen, Ra-na-va-lo-na, or of the late king, Ra-da-na, or the word signifying to pray, mi-va, va-ka.

Then the grammatical construction of the two languages is in several respects alike, and, what is of more importance, they agree in those anomalies by which they are distinguished from other languages. In neither of them is there any change of termination to indicate either gender, number, or case; and these distinctions are effected in both in much the same way. The mode of forming verbal nouns and of comparing adjectives is very similar. From a comparison of the two I should conclude that the Malagasy is the more primitive of the two; and the differences in the conjugating of verbs — the use of auxiliary verbs, especially of the verb "to be," by the Malays — demonstrate that a very long time has elapsed since the two nations spoke the same tongue.

The pronunciation of the Malagasy is soft and pleasant, its construction regular, and, one might say, philosophic. It is one of the mysteries of the human mind, how a race so rude could have elaborated a language so beautiful.

I.—HOME NOTES.

WINTER versus SUMMER.

WE have been having the usual struggle, at this season, of cold and heat; and the usual analogy between what goes on in the natural and in the moral world. Spring has had fully more trouble than usual in dispossessing winter; and winter, finding the conflict with spring useless, has been returning with sallies of more than ordinary bitterness, to hinder the advent of summer. Again and again, in the early months, a bright sky and a balmy atmosphere have been flattering us with the idea that the winter was past, and the rains over and gone; when, lo! we find we were mistaken. Winter, reinforced with east winds, chilling fogs, and occasional showers of hail, is again in possession of the field, and holds it so pertinaciously that we begin to despair. On goes the conflict between the two forces, with apparently doubtful issue, from week to week, and from month to month; until—happy omen!—the Arctic ruler finally disappears, and summer, without fear of a rival, greets us with her innumerable smiles.

Turn we to the moral world, it is much the same. Truth and error, good and evil, order and tumult, contending on every side for mastery. Sometimes we have been congratulating ourselves that the good and the true were fairly and for ever in the ascendant. From this pleasant but baseless dream we have been rudely awakened by a vehement irruption of the wintry forces of error and evil. The Reformation, we have been saying, can never be disturbed in England. In comes a rush of tractarianism and ritualism to dispel our dreams. Unbelief, we have been flattering ourselves, has been defeated at every point. What a glorious battle we fought for the faith in the days of French atheism, and what a noble chain of forts we erected, under the auspices of Butler, and Paley, and Watson, and Jones, and Lardner, and Leslie, and Campbell, and Littleton! No foe can ever break through these! We rub our eyes, and we see the Westminster Review, and Francis Newman, and Greg, and Colenso, and the "Essays and Reviews," and Strauss, and Renan, revelling like the boar from the forest in our choicest enclosures. But surely temperance has made a great advance of late years. What have we now corresponding to the wild orgies of the past, when a man was voted a muff and a milksop that appeared sober after dinner in the drawing room, and bacchanalian riot was the order of the day? Out of this reverie, too, we are shaken roughly by the inevitable and irrevocable statistics of the revenue returns, that show, as some one has said, how expertly we can drink ourselves out of the Alabama claims, paying off a bill of three or four millions by the mere duty on the extra drinking of a couple of years. No doubt all this in a sense is very discouraging, and yet it is only the fulfilment of the analogy that season after season makes us so familiar with in the world of nature. Happily, the analogy points to a happy issue; summer prevails at last, even though the wit described it as "setting in with its usual severity!" The final issue of the contest with light and darkness, good and evil, is no more doubtful than the issue of the contest between winter and summer; "In the evening time it shall be light;" "He that is for us is more than all that can be against us;" "Let us not," therefore, "be weary in well-doing, for in due season we shall reap, if we faint not."

THIRD SESSION OF THE IRISH SYNOD.

In dealing with the very important and difficult question of revision of the Liturgy, the disestablished Church of Ireland has made considerable progress in its third session. Alterations have been made giving a more distinctly Protestant sense to the doctrine of the Lord's Supper, though not so much as some desired; and in regard to Baptism, while the word regenerate has been omitted at one place, the voice of the laity was in favour of a more decided stand against baptismal regeneration than the votes of the clergy could allow. To show our readers the views taken by the different parties in England of the nature of the changes effected, we may quote first from a correspondent of the Record:—"We thankfully recognise the good hand of God in the result which was finally reached—[as to the Real Presence]—a result which, even if it be not all that could be wished, yet affords, in our opinion, ground for sincere satisfaction."

"The general tone of the discussion," says the Guardian, "allowing for a few incorrigible exceptions, to whom reverence and consideration for others appear to be things unknown, has been sober, thoughtful, and reverent. But it is unfortunate at any time, and in these days especially unfortunate, that the Church of Ireland should have thought [it necessary to lay down any definitions narrower and more precise than those which have so long proved to be sufficient for the whole Anglican communion. . . . The discussion of the baptismal service is not yet complete . . . but so far as it has gone, the attacks made on the enunciation of the doctrine of Regeneration in Baptism have failed. The Synod has declined to strike out the celebrated words, 'Seeing now, dearly beloved, that this child is regenerate;' although we observe with regret that there was a majority of lay votes and lay speeches for their excision. . . . Comparing the whole discussion now with what it would probably have been twenty years ago, we consider that it marks a considerable growth of Sacramental doctrine, in what has always been supposed to be a strongly Protestant body. . . . The great struggle, however, was on the proposed addition to the 'Black Rubric,' of a declaration to the effect, that 'whereas it hath been taught by some that by virtue of consecration there is in, or under the form of the elements a presence of Christ, or of Christ's flesh and blood, unto which adoration may be or ought to be done, it is hereby declared that such teaching is not permitted by the Church of Ireland." [It is explained that the effect of this is to exclude the idea of a presence for adoration, though not expressly for reception.] "It aims distinctly at shutting a door which in the Church of England is purposely left open; it pronounces a declaration from which we do not know what effect may follow in Ireland, and which would certainly cause serious division and perhaps disruption among ourselves. In that light it is that we consider it so serious and dangerous a step. . . . The resolution was approved of by very considerable majorities of both orders—by 120 against 52 clerical votes, by 185 against 36 lay votes; and the effect is to place the Synod in direct opposition to the all but unanimous voice of the Episcopal Bench."

OPINIONS ON THE BILL FOR FACILITIES OF PUBLIC WORSHIP.

A very important question, in its practical bearings at least, is involved in the Bill introduced into Parliament by Mr. Salt, which proposes to give a right of meeting for public worship, according to the forms of the Church of England, when twenty-five persons in a parish desire it, apart altogether from the parish church and the wishes of the incumbent. A very large number of objectors have appeared to this measure in the ranks of the Evangelical party; while Mr. Ryle has raised his voice very energetically in its favour. He admits that it gives a shock to the parochial system, and that it is liable to other objections; but he holds that it proposes the best remedy that has yet been suggested for a glaring evil. This evil is, that in all parishes where the incumbent is either careless on the one hand, or heretical on the other, nothing can be done to give the people sounder instruction or better guidance. Every species of sectarian teachers may establish themselves in the place and propagate their views, but the Church of England, as the law now stands, can do absolutely nothing. Mr. Ryle likes the bill of Mr. Salt, because it would enable earnest and godly laymen to bring preachers of the proper stamp into the parishes that most require them. The Record and many of its correspondents take the opposite view. They hold that, instead of tending to introduce truth where error prevails, it will give facilities for introducing error where the truth is taught; that very few persons will take advantage of it for the one purpose, but very many will do so for the other. This view is strongly urged by men like Dean Close, and Mr. Fox of Durham. But on the other side are some who maintain that, granting that equal facilities would be afforded for truth and error, it is better to have both in every parish than to shut out truth from some, and leave them to unmitigated error. It is held, likewise, that inherently the power of truth is greater than that of error, and that, if we believe that God's help is ever given to advance the one, there is no reason why we should be so eager to keep the door closed in order to prevent the entrance of the other. The case of Scotland has been appealed to as showing the inexpediency of the proposed change; a great many private chapels having recently started up in the Scottish Episcopal Church, in most of which a high ritualism prevails, much more fully developed than in the ordinary episcopalian chapels.

II.—THE MAY MEETINGS.

The first impression one has on looking over the Reports and meetings of the religious societies is that of bewilderment, pure and simple. It is as if the whole contents of the Post Office were to be tumbled into one's apartment, with an order to sort, read, and answer without delay. Bible Societies, Missionary Societies, School, Colonial, Home, Foreign, Continental, Jewish; and many of them multiplied by the number of Christian denominations, and some of them by the sections of these denominations, till the bare list of the more important fills a whole column of a newspaper. It is a grand result, if it were only simpler. No doubt it is the British way of it, and in this imperfect world and imperfect state of the church it seems inevitable that if work is to be done it must be done in such a way as to have a special interest for every section of Christians into which unhappily the church is divided. But whatever amount of wood, hay, and stubble the operations of these societies may contain,—however much there may be below the surface, of what is little, personal, and worldly,—the whole is a noble testimony to the disinterested spirit of Christianity, its interest in the souls of men, its readiness to spend its treasure and trouble in spreading its blessings. What other religion has such a force or such a faith? Men may exalt Buddhism and other religions as they please, but how small their heart compared to the great heart of Christianity!

GENERAL FEATURES.

For the most part the reports show an increase of revenue, not large, not much larger than to wipe out adverse balances, and make accounts somewhat square. Nothing like so large as the proportion of increase derived by the public revenue from the one item of excise. This is not very encouraging. We seem never to get far beyond the day of small things; we have yet to look forward to the time when moved by uncontrollable love, men shall bring their possessions and bring themselves as they brought them to the Apostles on the day of Pentecost. The same character for the most part distinguishes the reports of work. Good done and good doing here and there, but not yet any turning again of the captivity of Zion; not yet the signal given for sounding the trumpet of jubilee; the workers still sowing in tears, and scarcely ever coming again with rejoicing, bringing their sheaves with them. But no abatement of faith and expectation; no dread that it is a mistake to suppose that one day the cry shall go forth, "The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdom of our God and of his Christ." A kind of heavy feeling, all the same, that there is more hard work to be done than we used to anticipate; that the bulwarks of the enemy are much stronger than we fancied, and that the walls of Jericho are not to fall, as perhaps we half expected, the first time the ark is carried round them—not till we have completed the seventh circuit of the seventh day. But meanwhile, the world greatly needs the gospel, and no hint of a retreat is breathed from any corps of the advancing army. We are always disposed to give the prominent place to the though under this head we would include all the societies, English, Scotch, and Irish, that are engaged in sending abroad the wonderful Book which is ever renewing its youth and beginning its career. And here our factor for multiplication is no less than two hundred, that being the number of versions in which the Bible now exists. But we do not care to dwell much on statistics, whether of money received, books circulated, or branches and agents established. What we like to find is instances of the book showing itself to be the revealed Word of God, and the instrument by which He ever advances the welfare alike of individuals and communities. We have noted some incidental instances of this kind, not from the proceedings of the society, worthy of a word of record. At the Church Missionary meeting, a missionary from Tinnevely speaks of having gone to say good-bye to a native neighbour's family, and seen a Bible, and of being told by the man, "My wife never likes to close her eyes without reading a few verses of God's word." Visiting another house, he saw a little girl reading a Bible to her mother and two sisters. Next week, in another street, he found a family who had been bereaved of a son. The father was reading the 84th Psalm, and struck by the expression, "the sparrow hath found an house," was comforting himself with the assurance that his son's soul was not worse off than the sparrow.

THE HISTORY OF £100.

At the anniversary, a gentleman on the platform presented a donation of £100, on behalf of a person in Devonshire,—a memorial of a jubilee. Fifty years ago, the donor had attended a Bible society meeting, and his heart had been touched. Now he wished to commemorate half a century of the Lord's goodness by a donation to the society. And what had led him to think of this was the address of the Prime Minister—Mr. Gladstone—in Liverpool, on the grounds of our common faith. That address had stimulated the donor to hold fast by the truth; a new spirit and life had been breathed into his soul, of which this donation was the fruit.

HOME SOCIETIES.

The growth of our large cities has given, is giving, and will continue to give, a constantly increasing importance to our Home Mission efforts. We all know something of the power of sympathy in touching the masses. We all know that no man is more conspicuous for this sympathy than the Earl of Shaftesbury, who has spent a long life in Christian service for the good of the people. Possibly, however, we were not quite prepared for the announcement that his lordship had enrolled himself in one special branch of the working mass, making

LORD SHAFTESBURY A COSTERMONGER.

Here, however, are his lordship's own words at the meeting of the Working Men's Lord's Day Rest Association:—

"I am glad that you have begun to move among the working people of Somer's Town. I don't know any part of London where your operations are more necessary than in that district. I am glad to see an allusion in the report to Somer's Town, because it affords me an opportunity of speaking in praise of my brother costermongers in Golden Lane. I am a costermonger. I belong to the fraternity, and I have got a barrow. I saw my barrow a fortnight ago, with my name upon it; and I have lent it to a worthy costermonger who has no barrow of his own, but on this condition—that it shall not go out on Sundays; and I want to say that my brother costermongers have observed the law of the Sabbath most minutely, and that I don't believe that in the whole district of Golden Lane, St. Luke's, you would see on Sunday a single barrow in the streets, though you would see a number of small shops with their windows open."

We have been interested in going over Dr. Cumming's speech, at the City Missions, to read of the work done by him and others among some of the PERFORMERS IN THE THEATRES.

"The church in which I have long officiated," he said, "is in the centre of eleven theatres; I might pitch a stone from my pulpit into Drury Lane on my right hand, and into Covent Garden on my left. I have a little service on Friday evenings, and actors, actresses, and scene-shifters come in occasionally and take a mouthful of living bread and go away." He then told how Madame Grisi had attended for three months, and got much good. Once a number of boys and girls had been picked out of his schools to help at the pantomimes. He called on the parents, and, placing the case before them, said, "Your children go at eight o'clock at night, and do not get home till twelve or half-past; they are hung up with wires, and fly through the theatre as angels with wings; then they put on their dirty clothes and go home. Do you think this is for their good?" The answer was—"No; but we are starving, and get a shilling a night, and we can't afford to give it up." Once he had been preaching against the theatre, and got a remonstrance from an actress, who was sure, if he would come and see Manfred acted, he would alter his opinion. He declined to go, but said he would read it carefully, and comment on it next Sunday. He had a great crowd of actors, actresses, and scene-shifters. He told them that in the play there was one suicide, one murder, two or three lies, and two or three equivocal proceedings, and that he was quite disgusted with it. "I have been all round the neighbourhood of the theatres," he continued, "sometimes between ten and eleven o'clock at night, and you can have no idea, unless you have been there, of the scenes that take place in the gin-shops, and on the streets, and of the language uttered by persons who seem to be respectable. There is a tremendous moral degradation there, and it does strike me that the theatres have some portion of the responsibility of that degradation to bear."

FOREIGN MISSIONS.

In this field we observe the same results as before; very considerable success in outlying stations, islands, and primitive tribes; very hard work, indeed, among the adherents of the old faith in India and elsewhere. We observe that more than one missionary from India attests the feebleness of the half-and-half movement of the liberal Brahmo-Somaj. In several instances, the adherents have returned to their idols; proving that rationalism is not strong enough to effect a thorough separation even from the superstition which, viewed intellectually, excites its greatest contempt.

LORD NAPIER AND ETRICK'S TESTIMONY.

The late Governor of Madras, while bearing a very friendly testimony to India missions, has hitherto viewed them somewhat as a philosopher, and has interested himself chiefly in their tendency to improve civilisation and kindred interests. In this point of view his testimony has been of much value, and his being chosen to preside at the Wesleyan Missionary Anniversary was a graceful and well-deserved tribute. But evidently his lordship had no idea of the extent to which Christian hearts have been laid hold of by a sense of missionary obligations.

"The rev. gentleman (he said) who opened these proceedings with prayer, remarked that he hoped the heart of the chairman would be gratified and kindled by the glorious spectacle of Christian zeal manifested in this assembly. Indeed, gentlemen, I now for the first time feel, when I look around me, how intense and enthusiastic is the missionary spirit in the souls of the English people. It matters indeed little that my spirit should be animated in a cause in which I have so small, so transitory a part; but what must be the consolation of those labourers in the missionary field who stand behind and around me in the presence of such a demonstration of affectionate sympathy!"

CANON LIGHTFOOT ON THE SUCCESS OF MISSIONS.

At the meeting of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, this distinguished scholar read a paper which has an important bearing on the common allegation that Christian missions are a failure. The object of the paper was to show, by historical proof, that recent allegations of the failure of missions were "as unreasonable as they were faithless." Comparing the position of Christianity in the middle of the third century with its position now, he contended, upon the basis of various statistics, that whereas in the middle of the third century the proportion of professed Christians to the population of the earth was about one in one hundred and fifty, the proportion now was about one in five. He drew certain other comparisons and analogies between modern and ancient missionary work, and concluded a powerful address by pointing out that the special peril against which this society had to be on its guard, was the peril of conventionality. We must be prepared to give up the idea of transplanting every detail of our home methods to a foreign soil; "we must become as Indians to the Indians, if we would gain the Indians." In the proceedings of the same society notice was taken by the Bishop of Newfoundland of an interesting

RESULT OF THE RECENT DAY OF INTERCESSION.

"A young officer of the Royal Engineers, of great wealth and ability, who had long cordially aided mission work in British America, had lately come to him and avowed his determination to consecrate himself, as well as his property, to missionary work—only stipulating that he should be sent to the hardest, poorest, and most unpromising part of the field. Upon being asked what had led him to make this offer, he said that his final decision had been brought about by the perusal of the accounts of the day of intercession."

III.—GLANCES ABROAD.

THE GERMAN WAR WITH THE PAPACY.

Dr. Falk's four Bills have now passed the upper house, and become the law of Germany. The state has now control at so many points over the education of the Romish clergy, and over the administration of all church affairs, that the Church can feel that she has but a shadow of authority. What is to come next? "These trenchant measures," says a correspondent of the Guardian, "were put forward only as preliminaries; they were adopted as unusual precautions against unusual dangers, and more of the same class were to follow. Perhaps we must not expect any new regulations immediately: time will be given to let the present enactments root themselves, and to accustom the people to their object; for we may trust the Chancellor fully to estimate the dangerous nature of the stuff with which he is working. He knows better than most people how far he can tutor the commonalty without risking the exercise of the enormous power wielded over it by the priesthood. There is, at least, this element of hope to be drawn from the quiet reception which Dr. Falk's measures have met with, that the people are not so frantically bound to the priests and bishops as we believed, and that there is a deeper hold of the 'Old Catholic' spirit in the body hitherto called 'Roman Catholic' than appears publicly."

In the last number of the Edinburgh Review there is an elaborate article on the German Church question, in which the writer maintains that there are certain indigenous elements in the German Catholic Church disposing them to resist the extreme claims of the Papal party. Between the political movement of Count Bismarck, and the moral movement of Döllinger and his friends, the force that has been called into operation antagonistic to Rome is one of no ordinary magnitude.

ASIA—THE SITE OF BABYLON.

A recent number of the Church Missionary Intelligence contains some interesting particulars on the site of Ancient Babylon by a missionary, the Rev. G. M. Gordon. It is true, he says, in a sense, that there is nothing to be seen there, but that very nothing shows the striking fulfilment of prophecy. "Her cities are a desolation—a dry land and a wilderness—a land wherein no man dwelleth, neither doth any son of man pass thereby." It is difficult to realise the hanging gardens, the miles of streets, and the lofty walls that were formerly there. Proceeding to the town of Hillah, he rode to Birs Nimrod, which was supposed to represent the Ancient Tower of Babel. A high mound is surmounted by a ruined tower of brick, the summit of which is 235 feet above the plain. The cuneiform inscriptions Mr. Gordon was quite unable to decipher, but his Arab guides brought him to some letters which were far more easily read, and which to his great amusement he saw to be the names of Timothy Snooks, 1856, John Thomas, 1862, &c. Notwithstanding Mr. Gordon's impression, fortified by the opinion of Mr. Rich, we have to remark that the inscriptions, as interpreted by Sir Henry Rawlinson, do not bear out the popular idea that Birs Nimrod was the Tower of Babel. Its name was the Stages of the Seven Spheres, and it was dedicated to Nebo, repaired by Nebuchadnezzar, whose name appears on the bricks, but built by a former king. It is believed, however, that the Tower of Babel may have been on a similar plan, the Seven Stages representing the stars, the worship of which was one of the earliest forms of idolatry.

UNITED STATES.—A NEGRO CAMPAIGN FOR TWENTY THOUSAND DOLLARS.

Our readers must not be startled by the secularity of this heading; we are going to tell them of a most disinterested mission. Many of them know how eagerly, since the emancipation of the slaves, many friends of the negro have devoted themselves to the cause of Christian education. Some may call to mind an account given in this magazine of the Howard University at Washington—an institution for the education of the negro, set on foot by General O. O. Howard, a distinguished soldier and a very devoted Christian. In other parts of the country similar institutions have been organized. One of these is Fisk University, which is situated at Nashville, in the State of Tennessee. It is a very young university—only six years old. And probably any persons in this country, becoming familiar with its somewhat elementary arrangements, and remembering the kind of institutions to which we are accustomed to give the name of university in this country, might be tempted to smile at the Fisk University. But in America names are given to denote, not the attainments, but the aims of the promoters. And the pretentious name which is borne by this negro school seems to say, "Shan't we make it a university some day? Shan't we see young men aspiring to its honours with an enthusiasm that knows no bounds?"

But no university can be set up without the sinews of war. And the war in the south having absorbed most of the sinews, and desolated the country, unusual devices had to be resorted to, in order to replenish the treasury of the new negro university. And one of these was the device of a travelling singing campaign. It was found that among the negro students, male and female, at Fisk, some had a rare musical power. The idea occurred of forming a choir of them, and going from place to place, singing on behalf of the University. The idea was carried out under the superintendence of Professor White, who set out with his troupe on the 6th October, 1871, and returned on the 1st of May following, bringing 20,000 dollars as the financial result of this venture.

We learn these and many other particulars from a volume entitled, "The Jubilee Singers and their Campaign for 20,000 Dollars, by G. D. Pike," published at Boston during the present year. We have here both portraits and biographical sketches of the singers, and a narrative of their campaign. We could have wished that it had been found practicable to give an account of the band of singers without taking so much notice of each, for while singing in public is in itself rather trying to modesty, it must be still more so to have one's visage and history published, and one's merit as a singer specially enlarged on. At the same time it is touching to read the family history of these poor children, born in slavery; to be told at how many pieces of silver they were valued in the days of their bondage; or of their mothers or sisters being ordered to the slave-mart to be sold, and of the bitter separations, worse than death, which these transactions entailed. When brought under instruction they showed a great capacity for musical training—not merely for singing the simple hymns and songs of the slaves, but for rendering with great exactness and propriety difficult and elaborate pieces of music.

In reality, however, it was the negro hymns and songs that first established their popularity as they went along. It is to be observed that this movement is wholly of a religious nature, and that the proceedings were begun and carried on in the spirit of prayer. At first it seemed as if the enterprise was to be an utter failure. An audience could be got when there was no charge, but when a ticket had to be paid for, they sung to almost empty benches. In some cases the troupe had difficulty in getting lodging, their colour excluding them from some of the hotels. Nothing but faith and prayer could have carried them through their difficulties. At last the tide turned; prosperity began to attend them, and large audiences came to listen to their singing. After seven months, as we have said, they returned home with 20,000 dollars to build Jubilee Hall. The whole narrative is an interesting testimony to the capacity of the negro race, while it gives all a hint of a new way of keeping a talent from the napkin, and laying it out to usury in the Master's cause. We do not know how it may be in other parts of the country; but in our own neighbourhood, one single device is all that Christian ingenuity has yet devised for supplementing the method of direct contributions to good objects—we refer to Bazaars of Ladies' Work. Might not a leaf be taken from the book of the Jubilee Singers of Fisk University?

IV.—OUR LIBRARY TABLE.

A GROUP OF BIOGRAPHIES.

The Memorials of a Quiet Life, by Augustus J. C. Hare, have excited so wide an interest on every side that it is almost superfluous to be telling our readers at this time of day of the appearance of this very charming and instructive book. But as these notes were originally addressed "to readers out of the way," it may not be out of place to say that in these two substantial volumes we have the correspondence and journals of a lady of singular accomplishment, grace, and goodness—the wife for five years, and the widow for upwards of thirty, of the late Augustus Hare, Rector of Alton. Mrs. Hare was sprung from a very old family, the Leycesters of Toft; her elder sister was married to Edward Stanley, Rector of Alderley, afterwards Bishop of Norwich; her own husband was descended from the Hares of Hurstmonceaux; and her brother-in-law, Julius Charles Hare, rector of that parish, was the well-known Archdeacon Hare, brother-in-law of Professor Maurice, and author of the "Mission of the Comforter." At first, Maria Leycester appears as a girl of a strong but simple and affectionate nature, clinging to her friends with passionate attachment; by-and-by the love of Christ fills her heart, and the stream of her affections, now flowing both to God and man, is richer and stronger than ever. Her attachment to her husband is of the deepest and most solid kind, always growing with further intercourse and acquaintance; and the picture of their married life in a humble rectory among a few most simple and primitive people, is one that fiction could hardly surpass. Her terrible bereavement is borne with the calmness springing from the assurance that it was "well with him," and that her heavenly Father had work for her to do in this world in the way of helping, guiding, and comforting those who lay within her sphere. Having no child of her own, she adopted a son of one of her brothers-in-law, bringing up her little Augustus from infancy, and so binding him to her that no attachment between veritable mother and son could have surpassed in completeness and tenderness that between the subject and the editor of these volumes. Though of delicate frame, she survived to the age of seventy-two, very much benefited from time to time by visits to Italy, but frequently suffering in a very strange way, remaining for days in a state of syncope, without breathing or action of the heart. So like death did this appear, that when in Italy her friends had to lock the doors of the house, in case the people should insist on burying her. At length the silver cord was loosed, and the golden bowl was broken; the spirit that had lived so much in the sunshine of God's countenance went to its native element, realising one of the last wishes it had uttered, "Nearer, my God, to thee."

What this life exemplifies most is the human side of Christianity,—the heart pouring out its wealth of affection on its fellow-creatures, and the life cheerfully devoted to their highest good. Yet there is abundant evidence that this affection is not a mere natural product of the heart, but is fed from a glorious fountain—the love of Christ intensely apprehended and continually felt. The union of natural amiableness, rich English culture, and divine grace, gives rise to one of the finest products in the form of character with which one can meet. Warmly attached to her own Church, and finding in its services much nourishment for her soul, she was essentially of catholic spirit, and found herself at home wherever her Saviour was loved and honoured. In fact, she moved more freely through the world, and sat more loose to forms of doctrine, than most devout people can do with safety. But she seems to have been kept right by the intensity of her love. Persons with less love for the Lord, cannot dispense with the guiding lines of Christian doctrine, and the rules by which Christians generally find it necessary to regulate their intercourse with the world. Love has a wonderful compensating power; keeps the instincts wonderfully sound, finds the way to heaven by an unseen guidance like that by which some of the inferior animals find their way home; and recognises its kindred, not by the shibboleths of human speech, but by pureness, by knowledge, by long-suffering, by kindness, by the Holy Ghost, by love unfeigned.

We can hardly fancy a more complete contrast in the more outstanding features of Christian character and life, than that which is presented to Mrs. Hare in the subject of a volume entitled She Spoke of Him; being Recollections of the loving Labours and early Death of the late Mrs. Henry Dening. By her Friend, Mrs. Gratian Guinness. A bright, handsome, happy girl, moving in the upper circles of Bath, Geraldine Hooper (a lineal descendant, by the way, of the martyr-bishop), dipping freely into whatsoever amusements came in her way, is led to think solemnly about her soul, and under the impression of the text, "This man receiveth sinners," commits herself to the Saviour, and determines to use her life in some way of Christian usefulness. At first she is the district visitor, and while moving on her ministry of mercy, seeks in the ordinary way to benefit those with whom she comes into contact. By-and-by her labours take more exclusively an evangelistic turn, and her supreme and overwhelming concern is for the welfare of their souls. Under the influence of revival movements, she is led to address considerable numbers of persons gathered together in anxiety for their spiritual welfare, and almost accidentally she discovers that she has a talent for preaching. The way is opened up for a large and very wonderful exercise of this gift, and not only in a hall erected for the purpose in Bath, but at various towns, chiefly in the south-west of England, she earnestly addresses audiences that often numbered three thousand.

Her career was short. Before her marriage as Miss Hooper, and afterwards as Mrs. Denning, she laboured for a few years in her evangelistic work, closing her life in 1872, under an attack of erysipelas, at the early age of thirty-one. The memoir of her life is introduced by the Rev. S. A. Walker, Rector of St. Mary-le-Port, Bristol, who bears the most earnest testimony to the wonderful attractiveness of her natural character, and the marvellous power and effects of her public labours.

We remember a remark in one of the letters of John Foster to the effect that, often when he sat in his study, he felt a very intense desire to speak to men on their highest interests, and that it seemed to him then as if he could go and pour out upon them a whole stream of persuasive considerations, but that when he faced the actual world, all his earnestness seemed to forsake him and his heart as if turned to stone. Geraldine Denning was quite the opposite. This was just what she was enabled to do. Her soul could let itself out in the most free and natural manner to the audiences that she addressed. Her voice, her face, her hands, everything about her, lent themselves without effort of hers, to express what was in her soul. And as her soul glowed with a white heat, the whole process of speaking was aglow with the same. Instinctively, too, she seized upon that style of speaking which is most attractive to the popular mind. Her teaching, and her appeals to the soul and conscience were nearly all done through analogy. Her expositions of Scripture—of the story of Ruth, for example—were spiritualisings, finding in the incidents analogies to the truths of the Christian life. By changing the source or class of her illustrations, she would instinctively adapt herself to various classes. To children she would allegorize the rapacious animals of Scripture—the wolf, the bear, and the lion. To the frequenters of taverns, she would take up the names of the public-houses in the streets—"The Fountain," "The Shamrock," "The Lamb," "The Oddfellows' Arms," "The Lord Nelson," "The Garibaldi"—making each an excellent and striking text. Her labours were attended with a very large amount of blessing. One of her friends, for example, could not get a cabman to take any fare from him, because he had been with the lady when her words went to the heart of his "prodigal son," and brought him home. Doubtless she was a little hard on those who did not "speak for Jesus," at least on such as might be like the girl spoken of by Dr. Chalmers, that "could die for Him, but could not speak for Him." The whole force of her character lay in her directness, earnestness, openness. Real, womanly traits were not wanting. She was fond of fun. She wore a handsome dress, and lived in a handsome house.

She approved of the maid-servant who, being asked how she knew that she was converted, answered, "Because I sweep under the mats now"—a place she slurred over in her unconscious days. She attracted hearts with a wonderful power. Of course, she raised the question on every side, whether it was right for a woman to preach? To her mind, the power which she had received for the work, and the encouragement with which it was attended, were the conclusive answer to the question.

The Life and Times of the Rev. R. Burns, D.D., Toronto, is a narrative, partly autobiographical and partly supplemental, of one who might be said to be endowed with the perfervidissimum (one superlative is not enough) ingenium Scotorum. He was a member of a family of which one brother became the father of William and Islay Burns, and another the father-in-law of Dr. Guthrie. Energy—energy in act, and most emphatically in speech, directed to the maintenance of the doctrine, discipline, and godliness of the Scotch Church, according to its highest traditions, was the characteristic of the brother who, first at Paisley in Scotland, and afterwards at Toronto, made his power felt and his name respected. The biography confines itself pretty much to the details of a professional life, and may not, therefore, to a corresponding degree, awaken the interest of the general public. It is to be remarked that, with all his intensely Evangelical zeal, Dr. Burns was much impressed with the necessity of elevating the people, both socially and politically; and identified himself with movements for their good at a time when it involved some risk of reputation to do so. He wrote largely and elaborately on the Poor Law, and he was strongly in favour of pure water and savings-banks. He edited an edition of Wodrow's "History of the Church of Scotland;" and on one occasion, having obtained permission to present a copy to King William IV., he did so at a personal interview, of which he gives a graphic account. The good-humoured king introduced sundry topics of general conversation; and the ready divine, armed, as it were, with a royal text, started off into fluent and emphatic dissertations on each of them. He used to say that he had no difficulty in getting into the king's presence, but his difficulty was in getting out of it, as he had to walk backwards, and being very near-sighted, could not find the door. The excellent man lived to the patriarchal age of eighty-one, retaining his vigour to the last, having spent his life with a weapon in one hand and a building implement in the other, an unwearied champion of the Calvinistic faith, and a hearty builder up of the kingdom of God.

The Life of the Rev. William Anderson, LL.D., Glasgow, by George Gilfillan, introduces us to another minister of the West of Scotland, who left on the minds of his own brethren, and of the community where he laboured, an impression of remarkable originality and power. Expert as Mr. Gilfillan is in the more discursive walks of literature, we are not aware that he has formerly tried his hand at biography; neither can we say that he has been remarkably successful. He rather tells us what Dr. Anderson was held to be, than causes Dr. Anderson to show us what he was. It is rather a history of the man than a picture. Dr. Anderson was eminently a character. He was singularly fearless in the expression of all his beliefs and sympathies. When he came out a preacher of the Relief branch of Scottish Nonconformity, the use of manuscripts in the pulpit was detested in that communion. Mr. Anderson read notwithstanding, and read himself into great and overwhelming popularity. It comes with a surprise on us when we learn that one of such a rugged nature, and so much of the stern child of nature, was an ardent millennialist. And his millennialism was no mere theory; it worked deep into his nature, and guided his hopes for the world and for himself. He thought that the ordinary view would keep the world in darkness and misery an awfully long time, and he clung to the hope of its speedy redemption. He was a strong politician, preached in favour of the abolition of the corn laws, and other popular measures that he believed to have in them an ethical and Christian element. For thirty years he fought against slavery and everything that belonged to it. He was a keen voluntary, and no great friend of union; shrinking at first from the union of the Relief and the Secession, and shrinking also in his late years from the proposed union of the Free and the United Presbyterian churches. Towards Popery he had a very vehement aversion, and some of his chief energies were employed in opposing it. He had a kindly feeling towards the Morrisonians, as the party were called who opposed the Calvinistic view of the atonement. His love of independence generally threw his sympathies into the scale of men who were struggling against the stream. For fifty years he continued to minister in the same church, though in his later years the burden of work was borne chiefly by a colleague. Last year, he passed away; leaving to those who knew him a memory which is cherished along with that of all fearless defenders of the truth. His written works were chiefly sermons, or the product of sermons, and included, among others, a work on Regeneration, and a later one on the Filial Honour of God.

The Life, Journal, and Letters of Henry Alford, D.D., Dean of Canterbury, is a work of more varied interest than either of the preceding. Not only was the life spent in contact with interests of a more varied kind, but the materials are more abundant for studying the development of character, and gathering up the lessons of a life. But we do not enlarge on Dean Alford's life at present; but for unwonted pressure on our space, a paper by one well qualified to point out its chief features of interest and instruction would have appeared in the present number of the Magazine; in the number for next month our readers will become better acquainted with this excellent and ever-active minister of Christ.

The Life and Missionary Travels of by the Rev. J. Furniss Ogle narrates the remarkable career of a man, from his youth up, of singular devotedness to duties and to Christ, who finding himself unable to remain in the active duties of the ministry of the Church of England, became a sort of free lance in the mission field. First he spent some time in the Patagonian Mission, being attracted to South America by the thought that that vast continent had not then a single missionary. His subsequent sphere was in Algeria, where he worked for some years with rare self-denial and Christian zeal. In returning to Algeria after a visit to England in 1865, the vessel in which he sailed was lost in the night, and Mr. Ogle was one of forty who were drowned. Mr. Ogle's career is one of not a few that are fitted to refute the charge that the spirit of Christian chivalry is extinct. He was a knight of the cross of sterling spirit, one well disciplined in the art of denying himself and taking up the cross and following his Master.

V.—OUR MEMORIAL RECORD.

REV. W. PENNEFATHER.

The name of this clergyman is very well known from the conspicuous place he occupied in the revival section of the English Church, and in connection with the Mildmay Conference, and the Mildmay Hall, which owed their origin to him. He was a son of the late Baron Pennefather, and was brought up in Dublin, taking his degree at Trinity College. For several years he laboured at Christchurch, Barnet, and for the last nine he was incumbent of St. Jude's, Islington. Besides enlarging the church, he built the Conference Hall and school-rooms, and rendered valuable aid to the Deaconesses Home, the nursing homes, orphan homes, and various missions throughout London. His attractive disposition and earnest zeal brought him many friends, the number of whom was greatly enlarged by the annual conferences which he brought together for conference and united worship. The plan of these conferences has spread from place to place, and many Christians of both sexes look forward to them with eager expectation for pleasant intercourse with Christian friends, much personal quickening, and much stimulation in the work of the Lord. The next Mildmay Conference had been fixed by Mr. Pennefather to be held this month (June), and it is expected that it will assemble at the time proposed.

Fergus

with M i s s

alone.
As the

seated in the dining-room, he was shown into the little drawing-room, the same apartment, not much changed in character or detail, which had been "the parlour" of his first call years and years ago—the room which he had yearned to make the home of his heart. Nowadays, the value of one of Robina's brooches could have purchased the money-worth of nearly all its simple decorations. But Fergus was still conscious of the old charm, albeit he now saw it with a qualification. "If there was only a Turkey carpet on the floor, and a little oak carving, and a few bits of rare china, I should wish nothing better than this." And then it flashed into his mind that, after all, he might stay in London, and might even come to live here. There could be a very feasible excuse for such a descent from the magnificence of Acre Hall, in "that Millicent was the last daughter at home, and wished to keep her mother with her, and Mrs. Harvey could not be induced to leave her old quiet way of life." It was not ignorance of the world that made Fergus ready to believe that people would accept this subterfuge,—it was only an egotism which made him feel that if he himself could "make believe" to believe it, other people might surely do the same! Sitting in the quiet, shadowy room, as the fever of misery cooled down in poor Fergus's heart, the miserable old vanity and ambition rose again—no brave determination to face the worst, and make the best of it, but a cowardly resolve not to look at the worst, not to believe in it, nay, to stoutly deny it. So there have been commanders who have thought to turn defeat into victory by calling it such. Probably they have won very few real victories afterwards.

Millicent did not keep him waiting long. Nay, the moment she heard his voice in the hall, she rose from the table where she was drawing. Yet she lingered in the dining-room to allow the servant to retire to the kitchen, before she crossed the hall. Nor did she go straight into the dining-room, but paused at the little hall window, and looked up at the darkening sky where the stars were just coming out. Her heart was leaping within her. Think not that it leaped with any sweet, wild fancies. She knew what he was come about, and why he wished to speak with her alone. But this friendship had been the very soul of her life, and the merest stirring among its drooped leaves was more to her than the budding of any other flower. Millicent was not a woman to magnify trifles and flutter over small interests. But what is a trifle? Some faces that would not brighten at news of a fortune, would quiver and break into mingled smiles and tears over a found letter in a dead hand's writing. Some hearts that would bear with equanimity the smashing of old China, or the loss of gems and gold, would burn and break at the accidental destruction of some worn baby's shoe or old faded book. Ah, the veriest rag is priceless if a life is wrought into it! There was no thought of wooing between herself and Fergus Laurie, and Millicent never dreamed that the old friendship could ever again be more than a friendly way of doing business together. But in that very doing business, in curtest note, or driest transaction, would be concentrated the essence, not of what there was, or ever had been, but of that mighty "might have been" which lies around most lives as vaguely and as grandly as astronomical possibilities surround our little terra firma.

Then she went into the drawing-room, and the two sat down opposite each other. And Fergus asked after Mrs. Harvey and each member of the family, remarked on the weather, and commented on the public news, till Milly began to feel restless, and to say within herself that they need not sit there, tête-à-tête, to say things which might have been shouted through a speaking-trumpet in the street. At last, with her old frankness, she herself led up to the subject in hand, by asking directly—

"Did you get a letter from me this afternoon, Mr. Laurie?"

"Yes, I did," Fergus answered quickly, and gave her one swift glance, and let his eyes drop on the carpet. There was only a moment's pause, then he spoke again.

"As to the matter it mentioned, I cannot accept the loan you offer. You see the sum is but small, and it would involve our firm in as much responsibility and obligation as if it was ever so large. You might want it back at junctures when it might be inconvenient to return it promptly. You would feel harassed and nervous when you heard of the fluctuations of business. Altogether, there are a hundred reasons, some not easy to put into words, why it would not be right or wise of me to accept the loan of a sum which, while very important to you, is too small for commercial uses."

"Be it as you please. I had no wish that it should be a trouble to you." Millicent's voice was cold, and it was not every ear that could detect its repressed pain.

"And so you manage all your affairs yourself," Fergus went on feverishly. "I think that is too much, for however small one's affairs may be, they are still one's affairs, and a great burden and responsibility. I wonder your brother does not insist upon relieving you."

"He knows me too well; he knows it would not matter if he did," said Millicent. "He has his own wife and boy to look after, and mother too would come upon him altogether in some events. I don't approve of single women hanging like millstones about their men-folk, and what I don't approve, I try not to do, Mr. Laurie."

There was no malice in her words. Only strong pride. She had no thought of Robina; nay, in such a case, she would have freely granted that a sister who was fulfilling some of a wife's duties had a just claim to some of a wife's rights.

"But the more you speak thus, and the more I think of your life, and feel how noble you are, the more I think how much better and happier it would be for you if there was some one whose right to love and care for you, you would not even wish to gainsay."

Millicent writhed too much under the implied pity of these words, to reflect on any other possible meaning. She felt the colour rush to her cheek, in no womanly flush, but in a hot spot on each cheek. But she had her ready answer.

"Almost every fact in life has its better. But it has also its worse; and the two chances often lie very near together."

"But the strong heart in all its strength craves love and care as much as the weakest," said Fergus Laurie, "and it values them far more, because it gets them so seldom. It values themselves. The weaker value them for what they get. I know many a woman who think she loves a man because she loves the ease and shelter he gives her."

Millicent sat silent. She heard his words, but she scarcely connected them with him who spoke. They were like an echo, mocking through her emptied heart. Ah, so true! But she could love, Love. Ay, though it took from her such leisure and luxury as she had earned for herself, and made her a moiled, driven woman like this one or that one, whose prematurely old faces and bent grey heads rose before her mind's eye. But there remained a secret about this which Millicent did not know yet, and could not guess, or her eyes might have been as content, and her heart as full and satisfied, as are the eyes and heart of many a lonely woman.

Oh, Fergus,—poor Fergus, there is another chance in life for you yet! Young reader, fearful lest there be no bright possibilities in your own path, take this fact from one who has seen much. For one life that is dwarfed for want of "a chance," a thousand are ruined by the waste of scores of chances. Shakspeare himself tells us of the tide in the affairs of men, and of the disastrous consequence of losing it. Is it presumption for me to add that the tide seldom fails to return again and again, only that the loss of it is likely to be repeated? If pride, or indolence, or anger, kept us prisoner ashore when the last flood of fortune came in, we may lament its ebb how we like, but unless we set about building our harbour, we shall be no better off next tide.

Few of us poor shortsighted creatures ever really blame ourselves. We sigh over our past: the domineering parent regrets his undutiful childhood, the lazy matron censures her gadding girlhood, the money-making man blames his money-spending youth. But the old tree of wilful selfishness is left still growing, be it in blossom or in fruit. We might all of us be very wise and good if the old events happened again. But they never do. In moral as in intellectual schools, the habits are worth more than the lessons.

An over-weening vanity, an egotism that could be cold and cruel in its own assumed interest, had been the bane of Fergus Laurie's life. Looking back as he had looked back in the early part of this very evening, he had detected the wrong turns his career had taken. But the man who had put himself first in everything, who would be king before he had fought, and master before he had served, had not put himself in a way to be favoured with a grand self-revelation which should show him that "before honour goeth humility."

He wanted Millicent to love him and to help him: to be friend and counsellor: to give his downfall a glory which his prosperity had never had: he wanted her to give him courage: to bear him up on the strong pinions of her independent spirit. It may not sound very noble or heroic. But it was human. And it was the plain truth. And it has an appeal to the chivalry of womanhood. Many "a ladye" has tended her knight through sufferings not encountered in her cause, and then walked contentedly by his limping steps afterwards. But Fergus Laurie shrank from this truth as he had shrank from many truths. There is a species of cowardice which hides itself in haunted chambers.

"Millicent," he said, using her unprefix name almost for the first time during all these years, "I don't want you to go on working for me as you have done—I don't want you to continue burdening yourself with money matters. I want you to have no more work and no more care but the happy work and cares of a sheltered wife. I want you to be my own wife, Millicent. Won't you trust me to take care of you?"

For Millicent had sprung up, and crossed the room away from him. Perhaps he had tried to take her hand. Perhaps he had not. She did not know, and she never knew. Only her heart was ablaze with what seemed to her the bitterest insult she could undergo. Had she been left free, through her bright youth, to be asked in marriage out of pity, in the mellow days of maturity? Was it to this that her honest desire of friendly independence had brought her? Could he only construe her offer of business-like service as a forlorn feeler of a life craving his munificent support and protection? Was it possible that he could even imagine that she had made it as a sort of appeal? Robina might have suggested this to him. Robina was just the woman to do so. Was she not always imagining that every lady was angling for the glory of being the great manufacturer's wife, and hankering after the splendours of Acre Hall? But never mind that! The bitterness, after all, lay between their two selves, Fergus and Millicent. It was quite impossible for him to regard her as anything but a mere lay figure on which to drape his bounties! And suddenly in that moment of silence it flashed upon her that this man was a vain and paltry man,—a mere gilt image which only her own imagination had set up and hall-marked. Perhaps in her pain she was scarcely just to him, and became too bitterly sceptical of all the possibilities of a nature that had so grievously disappointed her. We are all apt to rush to this extreme. The strongest faith in physiognomy can scarcely credit that all absconding parties are as ugly as they are described, else it must have been only fools who ever trusted them!

The end had come to Millicent's dream. It had held but half sway over her for a long time. She had been, as it were, in the hour between darkness and dawn, that state when we wonder which is true, our dream or our awakening. But now her eyes were quite open. And she knew that though the man Fergus Laurie was still alive, and that his life was nearer hers than it had ever been before, still her hero was lost and gone, sunk for ever in that dark silent sea of bitter waters which never gives up its dead.

Then she remembered that he sat gazing at her, and awaiting her answer.

"Mr. Laurie," she said, slowly and quietly, "I have no doubt you mean to be very kind. But as you are so candid in your kindness, you will let me be candid in return. I have tried the work and the care, and the struggle for which you pity me. And I know by experience that at their best, they may be very happy, and at their worst, they are very bearable. The only real sting I have ever had came from none of these things. It came from a professed kindness. There are kindnesses which are like a couch of nettles, whoever has once rested on such will rather sit upright for the rest of his days than risk more of such repose! Do not mention marriage to me again, Mr. Laurie," she added, her manner softening a little. "Forget that you have ever mentioned it. As for our relations to each other, I have long felt that I was not giving you satisfaction, or at least, that something was wrong. I am sorry you did not say so plainly to me, I am sure I could have borne it, and it would have relieved you and myself from a great deal of uneasiness. Your silence did not prevent me from feeling that I was burdensome, and though it may be ungracious for me to say this now, it was only a desire to be in some little way useful and business-like, which prompted my unfortunate offer of my money. For I do not yet trouble myself much about the income from my savings. So long as I have something stored against a rainy day, I hope to earn—in one way if not another—all I need for many years yet to come. Your old firm renewed their many offers of work, oddly enough, this morning. I have not answered their note yet. I shall answer it favourably now. It will be best for both of us, Mr. Laurie," and she smiled sadly. "You see, there is a prosaic time when an offer of work is more acceptable than an offer of marriage."

"Ah, you will find it a very different thing to work for them," said Fergus drearily.

"Shall I?" asked Millicent, with the chill returning to her voice. "On the contrary, had I been working for them for the last ten years, at the terms they offered me then, and which they renew and improve now, I might have had savings better worth your investing in your business,—sixteen hundred pounds instead of eight hundred."

Fergus sprang up and walked hastily towards the door.

"I do not want to say these things," cried poor Milly. "I want to be friends—as much as we can!" (pathetic qualification). "I like to be grateful. It was awfully bitter when I began to doubt and wonder why I was so. Why should you want to set up your own self-respect on the ruins of other people's, Mr. Laurie? You have a great commercial name, and Acre Hall, and a grand circle of friends; will not all these content you without saying that even my wage is the dole of your charity?"

Fergus stood still. He wondered mistily how it would be, if he threw himself at her feet, and owned that his prosperity had been but a gigantic sham, and that he was really a homeless, friendless, ruined man,—far poorer than she herself was, not only in habit and courage, but even in purse,—thrown upon her pitiful woman's heart for forgiveness and comfort and upholding. He might have done thus an hour ago. But he said to himself that he could not do this now. It was too late.

Too late! And he turned and looked at Milly—one look, which she never forgot, though she did not understand it till afterwards. And without a word, without a good night, he went away.

Millicent went back to the family room for a moment, and excused herself on the score of a headache, and crept away to her own chamber. She lay down in the darkness, but she did not think. People never do think when their hearts are bruised by the fall of an idol, or broken up by the digging of a grave. Only picture after picture arose before her mind.

The first picture that rose was that sunny road where she had walked with David Maxwell that morning when he found she was something nearer to Fergus than he was himself. But memory repeated that picture as copies are made—somehow the faces were turned the other way.

Then she saw the great chestnut trees that overhung the walls of Acre Hall, and she seemed to look through the great gates and see the cool green lawn, and the fresh hyacinths and primulas planted out in the flower-beds. But it did not seem to rise before her as Fergus Laurie's home—as a house where she had been a familiar guest. Rather it was invested with the sleepy, scented mystery that it had for her in the days when she first came to Hackney, when it was inhabited by two old maiden ladies, whose peacocks she used to feed through the railings on Saturday afternoons.

Then her brother's figure came. But not as the well-to-do author, with a beautiful wife and a tall son of his own. The successful books and the wife and the son, all floated dimly round, like the phantasmagoria of a half-developed dream. The reality seemed those old, old days, when they all had to plan so cleverly to make him look nice for his evening parties, and when they watched so sharply for reviews and were so indignant over the naughty ones! Ah me, ah me, while we sleep we blend real sounds with the music of our dreams, and when we awake, all seem alike unreal.

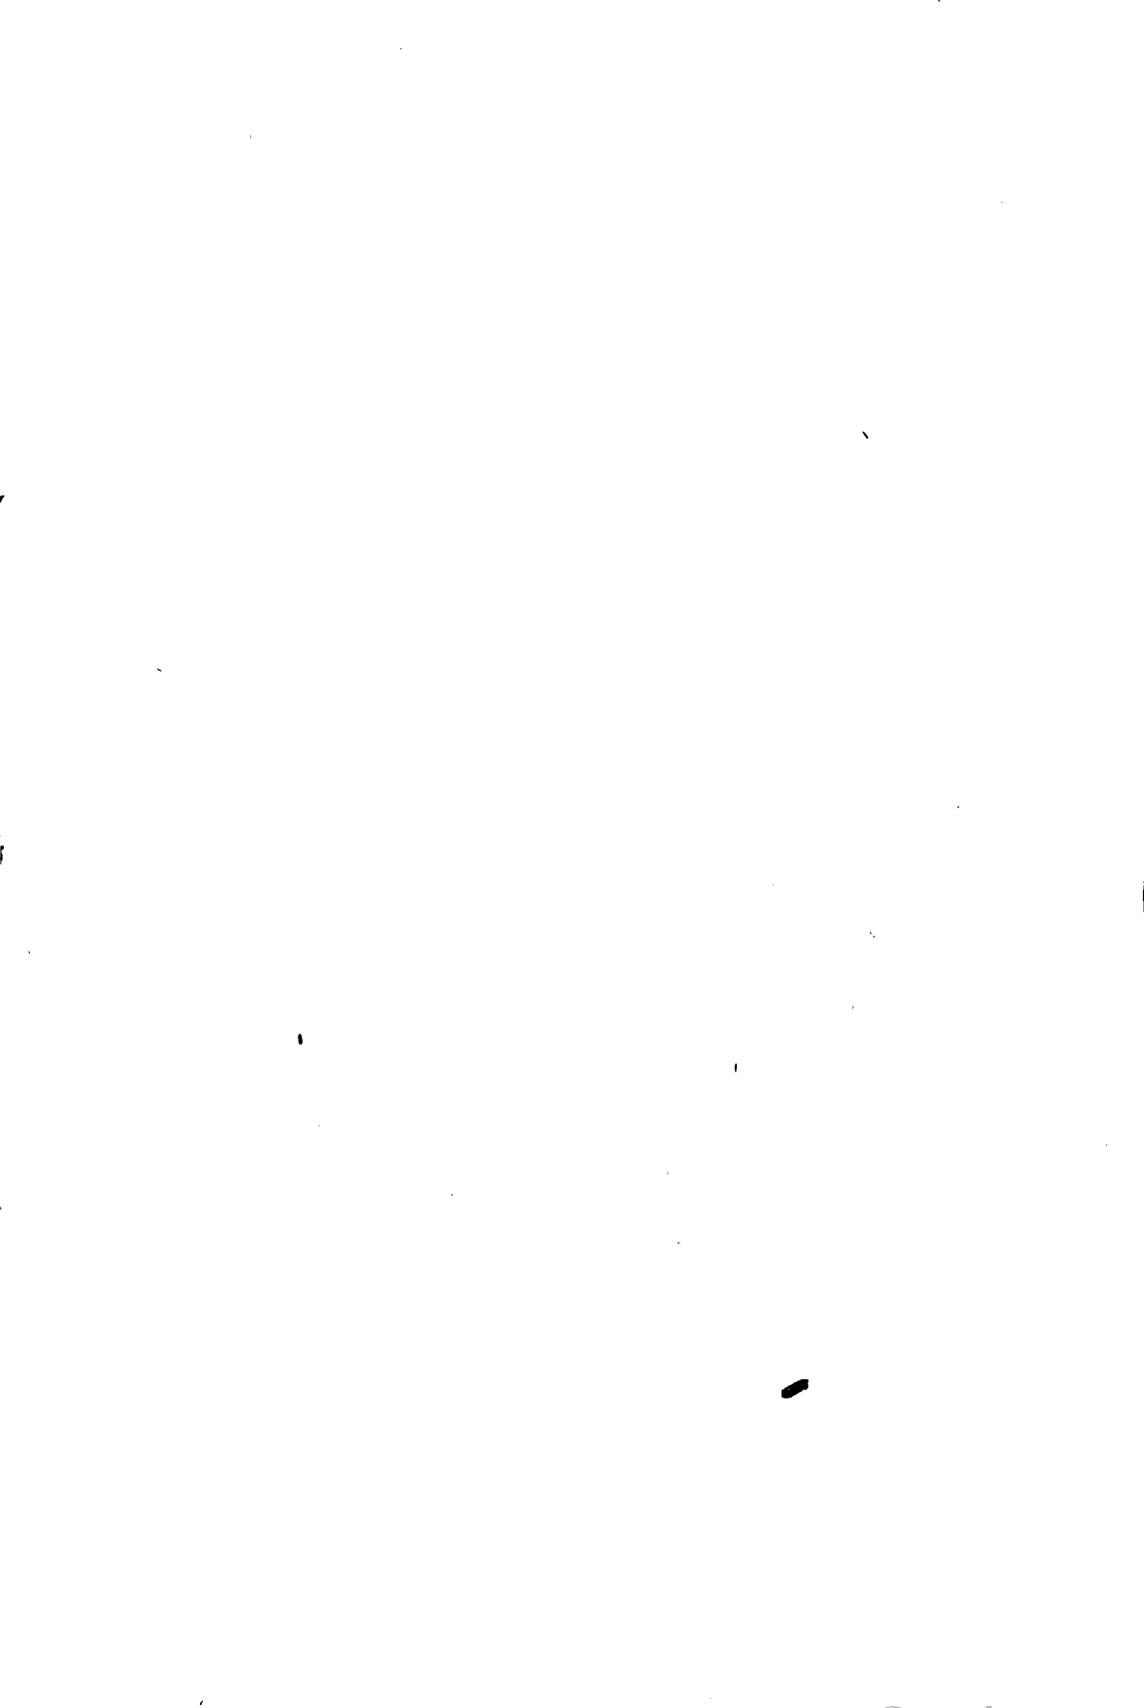

And through each of the strange disjointed pictures, there seemed to walk a shadowy, nameless figure, whose face she never saw.

The mind has its fevers apart from the body.

Millicent did not pray that night. Unless there was a prayer in the words, which she caught herself repeating, half-aloud, again and again—

"CROOKED PLACES."

"God knows—but I could not help it—God knows!"

CHAPTER XVIII.—THE DAY OF REVEALING.

THE common daylight brought back the simple prose of life. Millicent had to take her accustomed place at the breakfast-table, to profess enjoyment of the omelet which was their little servant's latest and highest work of culinary art, and to feign interest in the royal marriage of which the newspaper was full. Nay, heedless and indifferent in her self-absorption, she had often done these things less carefully than she did them to-day. We all of us forget and fail in our duties sometimes, but it is at bottom a sound heart which remembers them in the day of its calamity, and takes the broken spars of its wrecked hope to build up the household fire.

Only Millicent could not settle to any work. She went away to her studio, and toyed with paper and pencils. She wrote a note in answer of the old firm's offer, saying that she would call at their office in a few days and enter into negotiations. Then she sat down in what she called her "resting chair," and folded her hands and wondered, "Was it all over, or was it not? And what would come next? Was it really true?" She hardly believed anything yet. She would scarcely have wondered if she had woke up and found it was all only a dream; that she was a girl still, and Fergus a poor clerk as he used to be. It was like the first day after a death.

A knock at the street door roused her. It was a knock she knew, and yet it was strange. With haste and earnestness, she went to the stair-head, and listened to the voices in the hall.

It was she who was wanted again, asked for almost in the same words that had been used the night before. "Is Miss Harvey within? Can I speak to her alone? Tell her I will not detain her long, but my business is very urgent."

This time it was David Maxwell's voice, and Millicent having heard his request, made no pretence of awaiting a summons, but went straight down-stairs, and followed David into the drawing-room. She did not give herself time to wonder what had brought him. Looking back afterwards upon the stunned bewilderment of that morning, she compared it to the pause between the first rumble of an earthquake, and the final crash.

She held out her hand to Mr. Maxwell, and he took it, but instead of the usual commonplace words of greeting, he said eagerly—

"Has Fergus Laurie been here?"

"Yes," said Millicent, amazed; "he was here last evening."

"Ah, last evening, according to the arrangement he made before he left the counting-house. About what time was he here, Miss Milly?"

"He was not here more than half an hour. It must have been nearly nine when he went away," answered the bewildered Millicent, with that judicial precision which is natural to all of us when replying to questions whose drift we do not understand. "But why? what is the matter?"

"He has not been home all night; he has not come to the office this morning," David explained. "His visit to you is the last trace we have of him, unless indeed you can give us a clue."

Millicent was silent. And her womanly heart stood still. Had there been real love masked in Fergus's fantastic vanity, and had she wounded it to the quick by her sharp, stern words? A woman does not hate a man whose honest suit she has refused. Nay, often after her fiat has gone forth, there comes a spell of relenting and self-distrust, when a renewed appeal would be very dangerous to her firmness. And even when this could not be the case, when there stands between them a something which cannot be set aside, there will always be a latent tenderness in even her bitterest censure.

"No doubt he felt very deeply the necessity for speaking to you on such a subject," said David. "But he was quite calm when he talked it over with me. Did he show any excitement to you?"

Millicent looked up blankly into David's face. What could it all mean? Had he actually confided to his coadjutor that he was going to make her an offer of marriage to console her for the loss of the work he considered she was no longer fit for? Or had he only consulted about the loan she had proffered? Perhaps it was David who had advised him not to accept it. But there could be no particular cause for excitement over anything relating to that.

David thought he understood her silence. That she did not know how far Fergus had spoken to her in confidence, and was anxious to keep his counsel.

"I only ask you what his manner was, and whether he gave any hint as to where he was going?" he asked gently. "I will not ask what he said about his affairs. I know all that is urgent on that point. But these other questions I must press for his sake. They concern his well-being—perhaps his very life!"

"His life!" Millicent echoed, and sat down on the nearest chair.

"Will you not tell me what he said to you?" pleaded David.

"No, I cannot," she answered. "It would not be right for me to do so. But you can tell me what you expected he would say, and I will tell you if you are wrong."

"Yesterday afternoon," said David, "we agreed that he was to call upon you, and tell you that in the present precarious condition of the firm, it would be to your advantage to seek an engagement elsewhere, and that you should be immediately paid up the sum that is owing to you. The firm cannot be carried on any longer under its present management. You should not have had such a sudden notice, but that Fergus has struggled on and hoped against hope. But he felt it would be all taken out of his hands by his creditors, after one of them had gone so far as to put in a man in possession of Acre Hall. But Fergus seemed at once to take it calmly, and I thought he would find it rather a comfort than otherwise to talk it over to a tried old friend like you."

Millicent's face had grown grey while he spoke. "He spoke to me as a prosperous man," she cried, "and I answered him as such. I thought no other. Fergus Laurie is a dishonourable man!"

David sat silent for a few minutes, and then he asked softly, "Did he say nothing to you of what I have related? Nothing about the money?"

"Only that he would not take it. He said it was not worth while," said Millicent.

"Would not take it—not worth while!" David repeated, astonished in his turn.

"What money is this?"

"The eight hundred pounds I offered to lend him yesterday," Millicent answered helplessly. She did not feel like a middle-aged responsible woman—a woman who had done piles of work, who had saved money. She felt like a girl again, in the pitiful sense of the phrase, with a girlish sense of outsideness, a girlish belief that men must be different after all, and nearer to each other, much as she had fancied on that old day, that if she, a nobody, knew something, David, friend and fellow-man, must know so much more.

"I knew nothing of that," David said gravely. "The only money mentioned between us was the sum the firm owes you. As you did not call for it this morning, I have brought it with me now," and he laid upon the table, not a cheque, but notes for the full amount.

"He said nothing of that," Millicent replied. "He spoke of my not doing any more work. I thought nothing of the debt, I knew it would be paid sooner or later. And then the subject was changed, and not a word was said about anything you have mentioned to-day. Only it was quite settled I was not to work for him any more."

"Did you press the loan of your money?" David asked.

"No; he said it was too small a sum to be troubled with. I had thought that perhaps it might be serviceable using money, for I knew the firm must have great expenses, though I never dreamed it was not splendidly prosperous. I never did! If I had, I should not have chosen this time to speak as I did. But Fergus Laurie is a dishonourable man!"

David Maxwell sat before her with a secret and sorrowful guess as to what else his friend had said to her, and as to how she had answered. He thought of her patient laborious life—of her many brave responsibilities, but though he thought within himself that he was glad she had not offered her money till it was too late for Fergus to hope anything by grasping it, what he said was—

"I am glad at least that he did not accept your loan."

"Do you think I care so much for that?" she cried scornfully. "I would freely give all that I have that this should never have happened."

"God forgive him, and keep all of us," said David sadly. "Think what his sin is costing him. Poor Fergus! How different he might have been!"

"I doubt it," she laughed bitterly.

But at that moment there rose before her that first evening with the Lauries, and her outburst of girlish heat, and Fergus's quiet remark, "I can believe you would." And she covered her face with her hands, and two hot tears came, hard, as if drawn heavily up from the depths of her whole nature.

"Does anybody else know anything of last evening's interview?" David pleaded again. "I must ask, for we must find him."

"Nobody knows anything," she said drearily. "I supposed he was going straight home. He was quite cool. But I thought he looked at me strangely, and now I remember he did not say good night."

"Then, in fact, the simplest truth does not require that I should alter anything that I have already told Miss Robina, namely, that I believed her brother had arranged to come here on business,—in fact, to tell you that your connection with his firm had better cease.”

Millicent's face coloured hotly. “That is all that is to be told,” she said. “If you like, you can add that I spoke rather sharply—about business!”

David drew a long breath, and rose from his seat.

“What are you going to do?” Millicent asked, rising also. “What does Robina think? What does his mother say?”

“They are both excited,” David answered. “And they speak so. It is hard for them now, with this terror and suspense added to the misery of the man in possession, and the ruin of everything.”

“They have brought most of it upon themselves,” said Millicent sharply.

“Does not that add to the agony?” asked David gently. “Ay, whether they own it to themselves or no. Isn't that all the difference between the crown of martyrdom and the blot of capital punishment? As for your inquiry, what am I going to do, I scarcely know. Every moment may bring us some clue that we cannot dream of now. We must deal as gently with him as we can, we must leave him hope that there is a way up again even yet, poor fellow.”

Softer tears were gathering in Milly's eyes. She did not dream that it was the patient face and holy words of the man before her, that were touching the sweeter springs of her nature. She had not yet had leisure so utterly to abolish her old idol worship; she only thought the gentler mood came from old tender memories, even from a little remorse for the righteous judgment that she had dealt out at so unsuitable a time.

“I spoke to him last night as I should never have spoken to a ~~failed~~ and chagrined man,” she said. “If I can do anything to help you, I am ready. Do you think it would be any comfort to the Lauries to see me, as I was the last person who saw him?”

She asked it humbly, for Milly was a magnanimous woman, who would humiliate herself an ell for every inch that she sinned, and who wanted to do this so much, that she would even do it at the peril of laying herself open to the old sore accusation of coming to spy out the barrenness of the land. Perhaps she was more magnanimous than wise. If one does chance to tread on a serpent, that is no reason why one should take it up and warm it in one's bosom.

David stood thoughtful. He knew that Mrs. and Miss Laurie had been ready to say hard things of Millicent during his interview with them that morning. But he thought that was because they believed her cold and calculating in this their day of adversity. He thought of his own hard time of anguish, long years ago now, and how Christian's note of invitation had come to him like a burst of sunshine. He forgot that he rose from his knees to see that burst of sunshine. He thought that it would do those two poor desolate women good, to see a familiar face that had some share of its own in their trouble. It would surely soften them and save them from that spirit of hard defiance which is the deadly mortification of sorrow. They might writhe and cry out, and be petulant and reproachful, he could fancy that, but he could trust Millicent's patience now: it would never be fallen pride that she would humble, it would not be stung hands that she would smite. He had rather she had gone without asking his advice, but as this was done, he would give what seemed to him right for her and for them. If, as he half feared, Fergus already lay a dead man somewhere among the rushes by the river-side, it would be a comfort for her to know that she had laid the bitterness in her heart, and forgiven him and his before she knew it. Therefore he said—

“I think you could be a great comfort to them. I cannot quite understand them. They are much excited in one way, but in another they are strangely cool. That is often one feature in great excitement. Of course, they will know that you know, and you will speak with them as knowing all. I can understand their wishing to keep everything as quiet as possible, but they are making such efforts to set forth that everything is quite right. I suppose the very servants imagine that their master has gone away about business. Miss Robina went with the cook to market this morning, and I heard her tell the parlour-maid which flower they will have for their table decoration to-day. It is like setting up one's will to keep out the coming ocean-tide. It must be a terrible state of mind. But a little friendly sympathy will bring about a more natural feeling. I tell you all this, only that you may be prepared. If you will get ready now, I will take you with me as I go back.”

Millicent made no delay. She went into the parlour and told her mother and Miss Brook that there was great trouble at Acre Hall, adding frankly that she was not at liberty to tell them any more than, and that they need not mention even this meagre fact to anybody else. The two old ladies asked questions in a breath.

"Is anybody ill?" inquired Mrs. Harvey. "Because, if so, I ought to go instead of you. You are not strong enough for nursing or sitting up, and you will not lay by when you are done, but will go straight back to your work."

"Is he in difficulties at last?" asked Miss Brook. "I always knew you'd gain a loss by him some day, but he need not have failed when he was owing you so much, as I feel certain he does just now."

"Nobody is ill," said Millicent, "and as for any money due to me, it is sent to me in full this morning, and as I am not to do any more work for the firm, your evil prophecies are not true, Miss Brook."

"Then you've come off better than some folk will," were the parting words which Miss Brook threw behind her as Millicent left the room. But her mother followed her up-stairs and sat down opposite her as she hastily put on her bonnet and wraps.

"I wish you could say something else to me, Milly," she pleaded wistfully.

Millicent put her arms round her mother's neck. She had not done so for years and years. "Oh, mother, mother!" she wailed, "don't you remember you didn't love your mother less when you couldn't tell her everything?"

"God be with you, my darling!" said Mrs. Harvey. "There's many a meaning to the text, 'When father and mother forsake, then the Lord taketh us up.'" And she let her go.

David and Millicent did not speak much to each other as they walked to Acre Hall.

David opened the gates himself, and as they went up to the walk he said to Millicent—

"I will send in word that you are here, and then Miss Laurie can choose which room she will receive you in, as she prefers to keep all out of hearing of the servants."

The parlour-maid admitted them—a smart, saucy girl, who had caught the habit of the house, and had one manner for grand strange visitors, and another for familiar connected comers, especially such as Miss Harvey, whose dresses did not cost so much as her own Sunday best.

Millicent sat down wearily while the girl scornfully took in their message. The great, fair house, with its rich scents and its soft colouring, seemed so like a haunted palace—ay, haunted for her, not yet with disembodied ghosts astray from their spiritual homes, however soon that, too, was to be—but with wailing ghosts that had never found bodies, and had no abiding place above earth, or below it.

She was so shocked and stunned that she did not notice how long the girl was away, till she heard her mincing steps returning along the corridor. She had a conscious simper on her face.

"Please, ma'am, but Miss Laurie is very sorry that, as it is not yet visiting hours, she happens to be engaged and unprepared to receive visitors, and so cannot have the pleasure of seeing you to-day, as she could not think of asking you to wait. But if Mr. Maxwell will step into the library, she says she will see him in a few minutes, as she knows he is on business, and that mustn't be trifled with."

"Very well, I will return presently," responded David, offering his arm to Millicent, who said not one word, but rose up, white and stony, and followed him.

The servant shut the door behind them, and went back to the kitchen, where she put her own version on the incident.

"I shouldn't wonder but master is keeping that Miss Harvey out of her money, as well as other people, and that missis knows it. Lawks, but here's the new damask drawing-room curtains been put down in damp, and all stained. Well, how can anybody think of everything with a strange man about, and such a deal of changing and worry? I'm a doing my best, an' as for character, I reckon I'll have to go back on my old school certificate, and my aunt's good word, for a character from this house won't be worth much, I'm thinking."

Whether or not David believed that Robina, behind all her subterfuge, was anxiously waiting for news of her brother—he did not return to her till he had seen Millicent safe back in her own home.

He spoke to her as they went along—

"Never mind," he said, "you don't need any pity. She does, poor thing, most of all for this."

"What is the use of forgiving, if the forgiveness is rejected?" cried Millicent; "why need we make a missile to be flung back at ourselves?"

"Hush, hush," he pleaded. "The forgiveness is our part, the other is not. If people will not have our loving-kindness, I think God takes care of it. He looks after all wasted things."

"Why doesn't He look after them before they are wasted?" said Millicent hardy. "Is not a full heart and life better worthy Him than empty ones?"

"Not always," David answered quietly. "For perhaps there is something in them which will not let Him wholly in, and He empties them that He may fill them better."

"But can affection,—can friendship keep out God?" asked Millicent. "Are not all good things of Him?"

"Yes," said David. "All good things. But nothing ever takes those away. We can no more be separated from them than we can from the love of God itself."

"Was not your love for Fergus a good thing?" she asked. "And have you got it still?" she added bitterly.

David drew a long sigh. "Yes, I think I have," he said. "A great deal of something has gone away from it. God can't endure mistakes or falsities of any kind. They must go; they are not the love."

"Can anybody love a creature from whom they can expect nothing that is good?" Millicent asked again.

"Thank God, yes! God does. Christ knew the evil that was in human nature, and yet loved it well enough to die for it. And He did not say, 'I am willing to die for men, but not by their hands.' We could all of us make sacrifices in our own way—the burnt-offerings that God does not delight in, but we have to make them in God's way, even though they be but our own troubled spirit and broken heart."

Millicent walked silent till she came to her own door, and then she turned to him and said—

"If you think again that I can be of any use anyhow, do not fail to let me know. I will be ready. I can but try, and I will."

"I know it," he answered. "Do not imagine for a moment that I doubt it."

And she disappeared in her mother's cottage, and he went back to Acre Hall.

THE FUTURE OF THE WORKING CLASSES.

V.—LABOUR WITHOUT SORROW.

IT is only after the term of threescore years and ten, according to the Psalm, that labour and sorrow must be regarded as inseparable companions. We do not say companions, but inseparable companions; in actual life the partnership is too often contracted far sooner; in some very shameful cases even before infancy has had its happy dream. The sight of the poor little match-makers of Spitalfields is a scandal to humanity, and no bitterer tears have been shed by Charity in our day than over these poor toiling infants; or over weary children in agricultural gangs; or over boys whose gristle had not hardened into bone, that used to be compelled to squeeze themselves through flues and chimneys, or to drag trucks of coal along passages that brought on them the curse of the serpent—"On thy belly shalt thou go." In the case of children, we all see instinctively that the alliance of labour and sorrow is unnatural and repulsive, and we struggle hard to secure, within reasonable limits, that it shall not take place. The same feeling is animating the great mass of labouring men. Labour and sorrow, they feel, have been too constantly together; they are striving to set them apart. It is indeed a laudable and Christian effort, and capable of being followed by a large measure of success. Provided always we do not commit the error of seeking the living among the dead; but proceed under the shadow of the proverb, "The blessing of the Lord it maketh rich; and he addeth no sorrow with it."

In our last paper on the future of the working classes, we could not but remark how the efforts made to get quit of one sorrow were bringing another in its room. The sorrow of excessive work and inadequate wages, so far as it has been removed, has been succeeded by the sorrow of a state of war, or at least a state of suspicion, between masters and men. It seems one of our hardest problems to get the two classes to work comfortably and happily together. How is work to be freed in the future from this most distressing element of sorrow? We spoke in our last paper of the blessing that would come if the breath of divine love should warm the hearts alike of employers and employed. But even that would not put everything to rights at once. It would have to be followed by righteous conditions satisfactory on both sides, and by modes of conducting work in which there would be little or no danger of collision. For even if the best conceivable spirit were to come down, there could be little hope of its continuance if the temptations to collision were to be for ever at work.

One source of hope for the future is, that both employers and employed will come to understand better their respective positions, interests, and duties. Whatever clouds of dust may be raised in the course of angry discussions, after a time the dust commonly clears away, and silently and unconsciously, perhaps, the parties find themselves in possession of a better knowledge of one another. At the close of such lengthened battles as the present generation has witnessed between masters and men, the two bodies of combatants can hardly fail to know one another better. The working class will have come to see more clearly what their employers can or cannot reasonably afford, and the employer to understand better what the workmen may or may not reasonably look for. By anticipating reasonable expectations the masters may ward off many a collision; by making none but reasonable demands the men may do the same. If some of those who lead on the workmen of the day are mere selfish demagogues (we make the supposition only of some), their true character will be revealed by time, and the body of workmen will see the necessity of not allowing their order to lie at the mercy of such men. Time will thus have its healing effect. On both sides good sense and good feeling will assert their claims, so that even if the present system of work—by masters and men—should continue, it will not be accompanied in the future by such innumerable collisions.

We may surely expect, too, that boards of arbitration and councils of conciliation will have some good effect. It is often, indeed, difficult to show, in reference to particular disputes, that they are capable of being ended by arbitration or kindred means. Experience, however, will gradually make it plain what kinds of disputes may be thus dealt with, and will smooth the way for the peaceful decisions of such tribunals. Precedents will be established constituting a kind of common law applicable to such cases. Whatever difficulties may attend boards of arbitration and councils of conciliation, it cannot be doubted that they help greatly to carry out the Christian precept, "As much as lieth in you, live peaceably with all men," and are therefore eminently worthy of the support both of Christian ministers and of all Christian men.

For similar reasons we deem the experiment of co-operation an interesting one, though we can hardly say more. We do not refer here to co-operation in the purchase or sale of goods as it is carried out in the co-operative stores of Lancashire and Yorkshire; but to co-operation in production and mercantile business as it has been attempted in some few cases. It must strike every one acquainted with the fact as singular that more has not been done in this latter way. If workmen think that capital oppresses labour, why do they not become capitalists and labourers in one? It cannot be said that the working classes of this country, who during the last twenty years have spent millions in dwelling-houses, and a far larger sum in strong drink, and who by small weekly payments have brought up the accumulated funds of their societies to tens of thousands of pounds, could not have contributed capital for at least some large undertakings. The real difficulty does not lie in finding the capital. It lies in surmounting the difficulties of management. It is found to be most difficult to combine faculties so unlike as that of working with the hands and that of guiding a great business with the brains. Do what we may, things gravitate towards that division of labour which gives the work to the many and the management to the few. No doubt as workmen rise in education they will rise in the power of management. But we doubt whether any progress in education will counteract what seems to be the plan of nature—simplicity in the management coupled with multiplicity in the productive force. Strongly though we are disposed in favour of the plan of co-operation, we cannot see that it is so likely as some deem it to settle the great problem of labour. The form in which it seems most practicable is, when the workmen, in addition to their wages, are allowed a percentage of the profits of any concern, the management remaining practically in the hands of a very few proprietors. We wish very earnestly that the attention of masters were turned more in this direction. We have personal knowledge of a few cases in which such an arrangement has been carried out, and in all cases with the best effects. It tends greatly to the satisfaction of the workmen; it gives them a direct interest in the prosperity of the concern, in the excellence of the work, and in the economical management of all the details; and, more than any other plan that we know of, it sweetens the breath of the establishment, and genders affection and regard between employers and employed. It is in this direction chiefly that, so far as co-operation goes, we think there is ground of hope for the future.

There are other ways, however, in which labour and sorrow have been far too closely connected in the past, and in which it is desirable, if it be possible, to separate them for the future. There are some forms of labour towards which the progress of knowledge cannot but create a more repulsive feeling, by showing more clearly their destructive effects. Occupations that are directly destructive of health, such as the steel-grinder's, the stone-cutter's, or the coal-hewer's, cannot fail to become more repulsive as a knowledge spreads of physiology, and of the direct effect of such employment on the lungs and other vital organs of the body. And it is certain, too, that if men advance in education and refinement, they will have more dislike than is felt now to occupations that are dirty and disagreeable, such as that of the scavenger, the miner, or the chimney-sweeper. Is it possible to separate sorrow from these forms of labour, so that the workmen of the future shall continue to perform them cheerfully, and not feel them to be a bondage from which they would give anything to escape?

Now, in regard to work which is repulsive from being dangerous, if no direct method can be discovered of remedying the danger, the way to deal with it must be to pay for it at a higher rate, so that those engaged in it shall either have to work for a shorter time daily, or shall be enabled to leave the occupation at an earlier period of life than in other and healthier occupations. No doubt, this looks very Utopian, considering the habits and feelings that are commonly prevalent now; but with the progress of education, and especially with the progress of provident habits, and habits of self-control, there would be nothing Utopian about it. It is an unnatural thing for men to engage in work of a kind that is sure to kill them long before they have reached the age of three-score and ten. As a rule, it is the duty of men to endeavour to live to the end of their days. Under peculiar circumstances, it is sometimes their duty to take the risk both of disease and death, as in the case of the sailor or the soldier; or, we may add, the physician, who in a dreadful time of epidemic breathes the atmosphere of death ; or the missionary who goes among cannibals ; or the traveller who explores regions of the earth formerly untrodden by the foot of man. But in these cases the duty arises from the existence of evils or dangers that cannot be met except at the risk, and even the sacrifice, of some men's lives. If there be any feasible way of obviating the dangers connected with certain occupations, the sacrifice of life in them is inexcusable. The natural remedy is to limit the time spent in them, diminish the period of exposure, and increase the power of resisting the hurtful influence, by increasing the general vitality of the workman's system. In present circumstances, the misery is, that increase of pay is so often abused, and instead of being employed to improve his vital energies, goes to sap and mine them in the most lamentable way.

In regard to occupations that are simply disagreeable, or that involve a loss of dignity, we believe it will be a long time before education and refinement become so general that there will be any great difficulty in finding persons willing to undertake such labours.

But even if it should be otherwise, may we not expect that in a more intelligent, and certainly in a more Christian age, the idea of useful service of whatever kind will be associated, not with disgrace, but with honour? It is very interesting to observe how certain berths and employments that are sufficiently repulsive to natural feelings, become ennobled simply by the introduction of the idea, or rather of the spirit, of Christian service. What can be nobler than the late Miss Agnes Jones's service in the Liverpool Poor House? What drudgery, what horrid, repulsive drudgery, must such a life as hers have been, had it been spent apart from the ennobling spirit of Christian service! Or let us take Miss Nightingale's work in the Crimea Hospitals, or the work of many an obscure matron, or keeper, or attendant in lunatic asylums, jails, and penitentiaries. It is one of the cheering aspects of the times that a great improvement has taken place of late years in this class of functionaries. This improvement has arisen from the fact that, in many cases, the mere hireling has been superseded by the loving Christian worker. The thought of serving the Lord Jesus in their spheres of labour, has not only imparted a new impulse to the labourers, but a new dignity to their labour. And there has been elevation enough of public sentiment to appreciate the self-denying labours of such men and women. Their names rank among the best heritages of the nation.

Now, in a state of society, not merely more intelligent—for that alone is not sufficient—but more truly Christian, may we not expect that the respect due to useful service will gain ground, and that other things besides nursing and watching will be undertaken, or at least cheerfully performed, through the force of Christian devotedness? We have not yet come to see the full significance of our blessed Lord's beautiful act, when He washed the feet of his disciples. Applications of that divine example, of which we wot not as yet, may hereafter be brought home to the Christian conscience. And it is a great comfort to have this thought to lean on. The truth is, that the prospect of a community advancing throughout its whole strata in intelligence and refinement merely, would not in itself be at all reassuring. The airs that people would give themselves would be intolerable. Some persons at the present day have a foresight of this, and would fain keep down and keep back the education of the people. But the real safeguard, the true antidote, is the lowly spirit of our blessed Master. "Knowledge puffeth up, but charity buildeth up." Diffuse the spirit of intelligence alone, and high life below stairs becomes the order of the day. Servant girls become princesses, wielding sceptres in the kitchen and in the scullery. But let the true spirit of Christ be diffused—the spirit of loving service,—it will counteract the evil effects of mere knowledge. It will supply oxygen to the moral atmosphere, preserving its vitality and its sweetness ; and it will give to the lowliest members of the social body the real kingly dignity, the servant of all being the greatest of all, and the largest heart commanding the highest honour.

Not a little of the prevalent feeling against manual labour as being inconsistent with a cultivated mind and refined taste, is due to mere prejudice and fashion. Have we not the old story of Cincinnatus called from the plough to be Dictator, and the not less instructive fact of St. Paul following the craft of a tent-maker? On a wider scale, it is notorious that many members of the upper and middle classes, when they emigrate to our colonies, set themselves with great spirit, and without any sense of degradation, to the work of the farm, or the house, or the dairy. It is thought nothing of—every one does it. And strange though it seems to their friends at home, they do their work, when bodily health and strength allow, not only without the feeling of martyrdom, but with no small measure of zest and enjoyment. We have known young ladies deliberately preferring to rough it in the colonies, after having had pretty full experience of what that means, because they could not bring their minds to the insipidity of a drawing-room life. Probably one of the most wholesome changes in public sentiment in the old country would be rooting up the notion, that for an educated person, any of the harder kinds of manual labour is discreditable. Of course, it is not to be expected or desired that those who are peculiarly qualified for mental labour are to devote their energies to ploughing and digging. All that we contend for is, that the notion of ploughing and digging being, in all circumstances, unworthy of men of educated and cultivated minds is largely founded on prejudice and fashion, and that there is no reason, when the working classes shall be better educated, why they should seek to make their escape from such employments. The gardener need not be ashamed of his implements because he has become a botanist, and can enter with great zest and eagerness into the many fascinating questions connected with the structure and physiology of plants; or because he has learnt to admire the wonderful beauty of nature, and to comprehend something of the language in which she speaks to him in her ever-changing forms and aspects of beauty. The farmer need not take less interest in his farm because he knows something of chemistry, or the farm labourer either; or because they can enter intelligently into experiments with manures, and plants, and breeds, and find new interest in watching whether the results correspond to their expectations, and in trying to find out the reason if they do not. The old cathedrals of England and other countries—such marvellous products of taste and genius—are believed by many to have been built under the direction of men who developed the design as they executed the work. It seems to have been in the actual use of the chisel and mallet that they devised many of those exquisite pieces of work, on which the eye of generation after generation is never weary of gazing. The pencil alone would probably have been insufficient to bring out the beauties which the union of taste and mechanical skill enabled them to produce. And who knows but through the cultivation of taste our practical builders in the future may light upon new forms of beauty that will rival the old cathedrals themselves?

It is hardly necessary to remark how much a life of labour may be lightened and brightened by moral and spiritual qualities. The spirit of industry, carefully and habitually exercised, has a wonderful effect in making toil pleasant. We have only to make up our minds to a labour, and it is comparatively easy. But let us be continually dwelling on the hardship of the thing, we prepare a bitter draught for ourselves as often as we return to the toil. Or let us be for ever interrupting the regular course of things, going off, it may be, into a fit of drinking, and returning to labour only when the supplies fail, life becomes a scene of irregular painful jerking, and is filled with misery. Need we add how much a good conscience toward God and toward man lightens labour and sweetens life? And if a man be provident in youth, and make hay while the sun shines, he will have an additional source of contentment. But most of all, the burden of hard labour will be wonderfully relieved, if he has been attracted by the invitation, "Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." What can be compared to the feeling that God is our Father, wisely and kindly controlling our lot, and providing for us many blessed compensations when the natural sources of enjoyment run dry? Life then becomes an unbroken Sabbath—a time of fellowship with the kind Father, whose face, when we come near, and see it reflected in Christ, is so full of love, and so wonderfully fitted to kindle the spirit of trust.

Not that the compensations of religion ought to draw off working men from reasonable efforts to better their earthly lot. No class of people ever drew more solace from the compensations of religion than the Uncle Toms and other devout slaves of America; but no one would say that for that reason they ought to have been content with slavery. To rectify injustice, to remedy wrong, to lighten burdens that crush and kill, are duties to which the very instincts of our nature impel us. But when injustice, wrong, and heavy burdens cannot be got rid of, or wholly got rid of, there is still a resource for God's children—faith assures them that their Father's love never changes, and gives them bright glimpses of the Eternal Home.

CUSTOMS AND CURIOSITIES OF MADAGASCAR.

PART II.

THE form of government in Madagascar was, and we may say is, patriarchal. The unit, or simple element, is the family; and just as the father is the ruler of his children and dependants, so in a village the head man, along with the elders or old men, exercised the duties of magistrates. The king, again, was the great father of his subjects; and to the present day the sovereign is addressed as the father and mother of the people; and he in turn, reversing the compliment, speaks of the people as his father and mother. Thus, when the present Queen of Madagascar was crowned, addressing the people, she said, "O ye under heaven here assembled, I have father and mother, having you; therefore may you live, and may God bless you." Then, referring to the judges and officers, and explaining their relation to the people, she said, "I have made them fathers of the people, and leaders to teach them wisdom." The Malagasy are firm believers in the doctrine of divine right. The sovereign is, in their eyes, in very truth God's vicegerent. Indeed, until within the few past years, it was customary to salute him as God; or God seen by the eye. The late Queen Rasoahery was the first who forbade these blasphemous appellations. The very belongings of the sovereign are treated with respect. It is no uncommon thing, while being carried about the streets, for your bearers suddenly to run off to some side path to be out of the way. On looking for the cause of this, it will be found that a small procession is passing along, consisting of a forerunner with a spear, who duly shouts out to the passengers to "Clear the way!" Behind are two or four men, it may be, carrying water-pots filled with water for royal use, and followed again by an officer armed with a spear. The summons to get out of the way is obeyed by a rush to the side of the road, and the passers-by stand uncovered until the procession has passed. This is to prevent the water, or whatever else it may be, being bewitched. The queen, and some of the higher members of the royal family who have principalities in distant parts of the country, in addition to a good many other feudal rights, which I have got no time to mention, are entitled to the rump of every bullock that is killed in the island. The actual rump is conveyed to officers appointed to receive it. This is a custom curious to all, and is deeply interesting to the student of antiquities. Why, the very name anatomists give this part is suggestive. It is called the sacrum, or sacred part,—the part devoted to the gods in Greece and Rome. But tracing this up to a higher source, we find that in the Levitical law, this part was specially directed to be offered up to the Lord. Thus we read in the third chapter of Leviticus:—"And if his offering for a sacrifice of peace offering unto the Lord be of the flock, male or female, he shall offer it without blemish. If he offer a lamb for his offering, then shall he offer it before the Lord. And he shall lay his hand upon the head of his offering, and kill it before the tabernacle of the congregation: and Aaron's sons shall sprinkle the blood thereof round about upon the altar. And he shall offer of the sacrifice of the peace offering, an offering made by fire unto the Lord; the fat thereof, and the whole rump, it shall be taken off hard by the backbone; and the fat that covereth the inwards, and all the fat that is upon the inwards. . . . And the priest shall burn it upon the altar: it is the food of the offering made by fire unto the Lord" (ver. 6—11).

We may just mention, also, that the same part of the fowl is usually given by children or servants to their father, or superiors.

When the queen goes abroad she is attended by above a thousand soldiers and a great number of camp attendants. She is carried in a palanquin, as the roads are too bad to allow carriages to be employed. When a carriage which had been presented to Radama I. was carried up to the capital, he seated himself in it; and instead of being drawn in it by his faithful subjects, they lifted it, wheels and all, and he had the satisfaction of enjoying a carriage drive after a fashion altogether novel. The palanquin is preceded by attendants dancing, shouting, and singing, with music.

At coronations and other great occasions the leading people testify their allegiance in three ways. One of these is doubtless of great antiquity. As a sign of submission, they present to the sovereign a piece of money or silver, called hasina, or holy money. This practice of making submission by presenting of silver is referred to in Psalm lxxviii. 30:—"Rebuke the company of spearmen, the multitude of the bulls, with the calves of the people, till every one submit."

himself with pieces of silver: scatter thou the people that delight in war."

Another mode of testifying allegiance is by a ceremony which they call milèfon' omby, i.e. "the spearing the bullock." A calf is killed, and its head, tail, and legs are cut off and are placed in the reverse position in reference to the trunk, to that which they held naturally. The person taking the oath stands with a spear in his hand, while a judge administers the oath containing imprecations that he may become mangled like this bullock if he should prove unfaithful to his oath. The oath is ratified by the person being sworn plunging the spear into the carcass of the animal. This is regarded as the most solemn of all ways of professing allegiance.

The other mode is styled mièly ràno, or striking water. After having thrown in various worthless substances into water, whether a lake or river, or water taken from these, and placed in a canoe on land, an oath is repeated, and the water is then struck by a spear. I have seen these various ceremonies at the coronation of their sovereigns, and so far as I know they are peculiar to the Malagasy.

The Malagasy were not without a correct although faint knowledge of the true God,—a knowledge they had doubtless brought with them when they came to the island, and which had probably been becoming more and more shadowy, and had been gradually losing its power over the life of the people. The supreme being they called Andriamànitra—a word of somewhat doubtful etymology, probably to be translated "the king of heaven," or as frequently he is called Andrianàhary, or creating king, or Zanahary, possibly the son-creator. Could this be a faint ray of light from some early revelation of a truth which natural theology never taught, that the Son is the creator? "By whom also He made the worlds." I merely throw it out as a question which has often pressed itself upon my mind. That they had some conception of God's power, omniscience, and justice is manifest from the proverbs and traditional sayings handed down by their ancestors. I am afraid that these truths were not, however, so much preserved as fossilized in these proverbs. Take for example such proverbs as these: "Think not of the secluded valley, but of God overhead," breathing the sentiment of the biblical statement, "Thou God seest me." Then again the folly of the would-be atheist is taught thus: "He who says in his heart that there is no God, is like a man who leaps blindfolded," which is just to the same import as the statement, "The fool hath said in his heart that there is no God." Then we find the fear of God urged as a motive to avoid evil actions: "Cheat not the simple (or foolish), for God is to be feared." Again God's sovereignty is wonderfully recognised in another proverb which says, "The wilfulness of man is overruled by the Creator, for God alone is the disposer." God's forbearance with evil is spoken of, again, as follows: "Nothing is unknown to God, but He wills to overlook evil." Another proverb says, "Better be guilty in the sight of men than be guilty before God." This seems to suggest the idea of future rewards and punishments. That they had some glimmering of this truth, however faint, seems confirmed by one of their fables. "There was a man, it is said, named Andrian-anarand-raini-sy-reniny, that is, the man taught by his father and mother, whose wife's name was Ratsihitanandro, that is, 'the not seeing day'—both of them evidently allegorical names. This man being sick, he sent to inquire of the dead who lay in a row of tombs somewhere near, concerning the state of the departed, whether it was happy or the reverse. There were five tombs placed side by side, and beginning at the newest, the one situated to the south, the messenger puts the question to the inmates. The dead replied, with true Malagasy caution, 'Go and ask those in the next tomb to the north, for they have lain there two years, and we have been dead but one.' The messenger then went to the second tomb, by whom he was in the same manner referred to the third, who in turn begged them to call on the fourth, who sent them to the fifth for the desired information. The dead in this tomb replied in these words: 'Difficult indeed is the going out of life; but when the life is departed the good doers shall see good, and the evil-doers shall see evil.'" These proverbs, containing fragments of real truth, had become to the Malagasy nothing more than sayings of their ancestors, a sort of shadowy tradition—faith in these things had almost died out. And these truths had ultimately become petrified, as I have said, in their proverbs; but even these petrified remains of early traditions are to us deeply interesting, as casting light upon the religious condition of man in remote antiquity. Human sacrifices, widow-burning, self-torture, or destruction were no parts of their religion. They had idols, it is true, but these were not unlike the Teraphim that we read of in the time of the patriarchs—such as Rachel stole with her from Laban her father. The worst feature of the Malagasy religion was a belief in witchcraft, lucky and unlucky days, and divination. To discover whether any one had been guilty of witchcraft, trial by ordeal was used. A poisonous nut called the tangèna was administered; if the patients recovered they were looked upon as clear of the crime. The belief in lucky and unlucky seasons was very strong, and is so still. Children born during one of their months were exposed on the road, and a herd of bullocks driven over the place. If (as frequently enough happened) the infant was killed, then this was proof that it had been a bewitched, dangerous thing, whose destruction was to be regarded as a blessing; if (as also occasionally was the case) the bullocks avoided it, and it survived the trial unhurt, it was looked upon as a sacred child, whose good omens were beyond all question. I remember a case in point that occurred only a few years ago, in the time of the late Queen. One of the princesses gave birth to a child just a few hours before the expiration of the unlucky month. When the event was announced next day to her Majesty she was indignant that the affair had not been postponed for so short a time, and soundly rated some of the hospital attendants for professional incompetence or negligence. They appeased their offended sovereign by promising better behaviour in future. The Malagasy placed great faith in divination, and the diviners were consulted upon every important question. The evil results of such superstitions may readily be imagined, and were never better illustrated than in the history of Madagascar.

Connected with the religious beliefs of the Malagasy, there is one other custom deserving notice, as particularly interesting both to the student of biblical antiquities and to the ethnologist. This is called the fàditra. A fàditra is anything ordered by the diviner to be cast away or destroyed in order to avert evil, as sickness or death. The fàditra might be a fowl, a sheep, or even a bullock. Over this fàditra, a certain form of service was said, of which this is a part—"And the thanksgiving being finished, this on the right side is exchanged for the life of the sick man, is exchanged that it may be exchanged, is substituted that it may be substituted. This is devoted a hundred times, a thousand times, to avert all the evil from the sick person." This animal is then carried or driven to a distant desert place, in the hope that it may go bearing away the evil from the person for whom it is the substitute. This is strikingly analogous in several respects to the Jewish ceremony of the scapegoat. Messrs. Freeman and Jones, in their interesting work on the persecutions, relate a remarkable instance of the observance of this or a similar custom. Andriamihaja, the prime minister of Ranavalona I., having fallen into disgrace, and anticipating death, applied to a diviner and inquired what would be his fate. The diviner told him he would die a violent death—blood would be shed. He asked how he might avert the doom. The diviner gave him little reason to expect that anything could avert it, but directed him to mount a bullock, carrying on his head a vessel full of blood, and as the animal moved along he was to spill the blood on his head, and then send it away into the wilderness.

Leaving their distinctly religious beliefs and ceremonies, we shall now describe some of their social customs, several of which have so much of the religious element in them.

that they might appropriately enough have been considered in that connection. The way in which the Malagasy observe their New Year is altogether worthy of notice. The year is a lunar one, that is, twelve moons, so that it does not correspond to our year. The New Year is celebrated by a feast called the fandroana, or washing.

On the last day of the year, the people visit their relations; children, dependants, and slaves, visit their parents or superiors. The visitor brings a small piece of money, which he presents to the head of the house. The master of the house takes water, and sprinkles a little on the heads of his family, saying, "Blessed be ye of the Lord; may we live to see a thousand New Years, and may our family never be broken up."

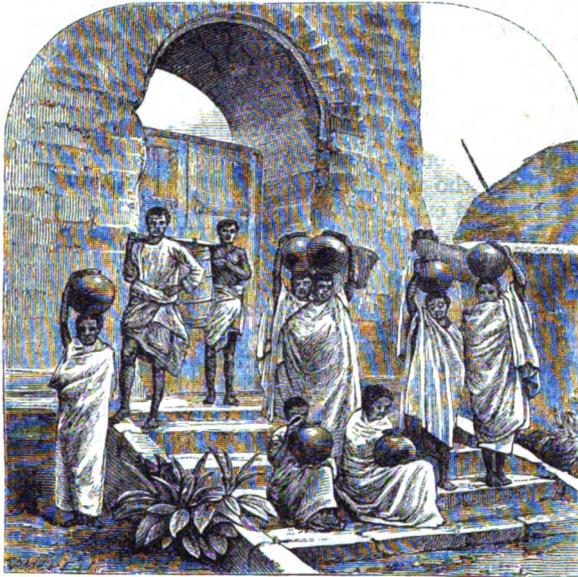

In a similar way the chiefs and officers visit the Queen in the evening, to be present at the ceremony of bathing. I may just relate what I witnessed myself on one of these occasions on which I was present.

The ceremony took place in the hall of the great palace, a room of about eighty by seventy feet. When I entered I found that it was already filled. The Queen sat on a couch at the north end of the room, surrounded by some of her family and her chief officers. A portable hearth, made by filling a wooden frame with clay, had been placed not far from where she sat, and a good fire of wood was being kept up by some of her attendants. Upon the fire were several earthen pots, some filled with water for the bath, others with rice for supper. The water having been heated, the Queen accompanied by some of her maids retired behind an improvised screen, of scarlet cloth, held up by several of her attendants. The bath is said to be of silver, but I don't know whether it be so or not. After a short time the firing of twenty-one cannons announced to the city that she had come out of her bath. She then appeared from behind the screen, dressed in her robes, and carrying a rude sort of calabash, went through the hall sprinkling the people, and saying, "May God bless you, and may we all see a thousand New Years." She then returned to her couch, and rice and honey were distributed, and pieces of banana leaves were supplied to us instead of spoons. After supper the chiefs and officers arose in turn, and presented hasina (money in token of allegiance), assuring her of their loyalty and wishing her long life. The Englishmen present did the same. Several hymns were sung, and the company then broke up. The same evening just after sunset, the children tie bunches of dried grass to a stick and setting them on fire, run about singing and waving these torches. The sight is beautiful as the whole country is instantaneously illuminated by this primitive kind of fireworks. This has been supposed to be a relic of the fire-worship of the east, just as the bonfires still lit up in some parts of England on Midsummer Eve, is traced to the same source.

II. N.S.

The next morning a number of bullocks, free from blemish, with symmetrical markings, and properly twisted horns, are taken into the palace-yard to be blessed and sprinkled by the Queen. These are then given away to the chiefs, to be killed. The people generally throughout the country kill their bullocks, and it was formerly the custom to take reeds and, dipping them in the blood, place them at the door-posts of their houses. No one can fail to be reminded by this of the Jewish passover. The bullocks, having been cut up, are distributed amongst friends.

THE GUIDING OF GOD'S PROVIDENCE.

BY THE DEAN OF CHESTER.

"In all thy ways acknowledge Him, and He shall direct thy paths."—Prov. iii. 6.

THE truth of God comprehends many parts, and one part is impressed more vividly on one mind, and another on another. This is an inevitable consequence of variety of temperament, and of variety in the experience of life.

It happens in my case—partly for reasons which I cannot explain, partly for reasons which I could explain, if this were the proper opportunity—that the doctrine of a Special Providence has been impressed upon me as a very sure and a very comforting truth. And no one will deny that the consideration of this subject is very suitable for our thoughts on Sunday. A writer, too, who desires to help such Sunday Meditations, gains this advantage in choosing a topic on which he himself feels strongly—that he may expect to speak warmly, even through the letters on the printed page, to the hearts of those who read.

It is essential that I should explain at the outset what I mean by the doctrine of a Special Providence. I mean much more than this, which no one but an Atheist will dispute, namely, that the general affairs of the world are governed by a wise, almighty, and benevolent Creator. I mean that God's guiding and controlling hand is over every step of every man; I mean that each of us is as much under that guidance and control, as if he were the solitary object of God's care upon the earth; I mean, in fact, the truth which is so often expressed in the Book of Proverbs—that, however carelessly we may live, however much we may deem ourselves the creatures of accident, "the lot is cast into the lap, but the whole disposing thereof is of the Lord"—*—that, however much men may trust to their own wisdom and discretion, after all it comes to this, that "a man's heart deviseth his way, but the Lord directeth his steps"†—and that, if we live piously and religiously, the promise of the proverb is fulfilled along with its precept, "In all thy ways acknowledge Him, and He shall direct thy paths."

It is, of course, this pious and religious view of the doctrine—this happy, cheerful, contented, practical view—to which I wish to invite attention. I am far from saying that there are no difficulties in the subject. But, on the whole, the difficulties are theoretical.

Difficulties indeed there are. You might, for instance, ask how it is that a Being so great as the Everlasting God should take an interest in the concerns of a creature so insignificant as any child of man. But such a question indicates a misconception of the true greatness of God, which consists in embracing the minutest, as well as the grandest, objects of creation. Go and look at the hedgerows in the spring season of the year, and you will discover that the same bright sunshine which is preparing the harvest and the orchard, is giving beauty to the meaneast flower.

Again, it might be asked (and with more reason), "How is the superintendence of my individual concerns to be reconciled with the direction of the great movements of human society?" There is certainly more in this question than we are able thoroughly to answer. But perplexities of the same kind exist in reference to the contrivances of man himself. When an uninstructed person pays his first visit to one of our great manufactories, one of the first questions he is likely to ask is this: "How is it that the various motions, the apparently conflicting motions, of all those separate parts are in harmony with the grand movement of the whole, and safely conduce to its general result?" We must not be surprised, if the machinery of God's Providence is as intricate as the machinery invented by man.

But a further and more difficult question might be asked. What are we to say when the sinful actions of men are the links in the chain of God's Providence? Is God the author of sin? and if not, how can sin be the instrument for fulfilling His purposes? Here, indeed, is a problem which defies complete solution in our present state of knowledge.

This dilemma may be stated in two very different tempers of mind. It may be propounded as a mere intellectual puzzle by those who cavil at the difficulties of religion. With such persons it is, perhaps, best not to argue at all, but to concede the whole case at once. To them we might speak thus: It is indeed true that Jesus Christ was crucified for your salvation, "delivered by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God," and it is true also that Judas was responsible for his sin, that he "fell by transgression," and went "to his own place."† Thus we hold up the difficulty in the most startling form in which

* Prov. xvi. 33.

† Prov. xvi. 9.

* Acts ii. 23.

† Acts i. 25.

it was ever presented, and leave the matter where we find it, with all its invitations of mercy, and all its admonitions of judgment.

But the same difficulty presses sometimes, in a very practical shape, upon persons of a totally different character. It may be asked in a sincerely anxious, desponding, tender spirit, "How can I look up with any confidence to the hand of God's Providence over me, when I am deeply conscious of the false steps which I have taken, when I know that my sins have brought me out of the path, which God Himself marked for me?" In reply to a question asked in this spirit, something, I hope, will be suggested in the course of the general consideration of the subject, to which I now proceed. Meanwhile, this may be said with confidence, that though Divine Providence does point out the path of human duty, yet man does not necessarily lose the blessing of that guidance, even when he has deviated from that path. God does not, indeed, make Himself responsible for our sins; but He does make Himself responsible, if we place ourselves on His side, for bringing ultimate good out of our worst evil. It is His own word, that "ALL things shall work together for good to them that love Him."*

Now the subject of a Special Providence may be conveniently considered in three points of view: first, in reference to the future; next, in reference to the present; and thirdly, in reference to the past.

1. I begin with the future; and on this aspect of the subject I shall dwell at greatest length. I address myself in the first instance, and chiefly, to the young, who are always in the habit of looking forward; and, on the whole, we would not wish it to be otherwise. The habit of looking backward, when the journey is just beginning, is hardly natural. And I am sure that the last thing I would wish is, to damp any innocent expectations of happiness. But remember, you who are so full of sanguine hopes, that after all it is God who will direct your steps. The accomplishment of your purposes depend on Him. Let those purposes, then, be such as He approves. If your hearts are set on mere earthly aggrandisement—still more, if they are set on what you know to be sin—it is in vain to speak to you now of the guiding of a Special Providence. You do not feel the need of any such guiding. Before you can welcome this doctrine, you must experience some of the sudden checks of life, you must suffer some bitter sorrow. And possibly God has some such discipline in store for you.

* Rom. viii. 28.

Or, perhaps, if you persevere in going where you are going now, a still shorter path is before you, with a still more abrupt termination. Remember the death of Ahab. He went disguised into the battle, and none of the whole Syrian army knew which was the king of Israel. But God's Providence was controlling that battle. "A certain man drew a bow at a venture."* He knew no more than the arrow which he shot whose life would be taken, if any life at all. But God guided that Syrian's hand, and directed the flight of that arrow, so that it struck and fastened itself in the joints of Ahab's harness. "So the king died" in the midst of his sinful career. There are many such cases in our own day, though, for the present, not recorded in any books of Kings or Chronicles.

But I would rather suppose that your desires are, on the whole, for what is good. I will suppose you to be prompt and obedient, amiable and cheerful, such, in fact, as Joseph was when his father sent him to visit his brethren and their flocks. Yet, even so, I cannot too earnestly entreat you to foster the sense of God's presence and the faith in His superintending care. You do not know how soon you may need this truth to support you. You do not know whether some small incident may not turn the whole current of your life. Watch the steps of Joseph as he goes from the vale of Hebron over the hills to Shechem. When arrived there he could not find his brethren; a man told him that they were gone with their flocks to Dothan: "and Joseph went after his brethren, and found them in Dothan."†

Now it was this little circumstance, viz., the moving of a few Arab shepherds (for so we may truly call them) from one pasture ground to another which decided all the future course of Joseph's life, and, indeed, determined the character of the first momentous passages of Jewish history; for in leaving Shechem and going to Dothan they came across the line which the Ishmaelite caravans took on the way from Gilead to Egypt. It happened that some Ishmaelite traders were passing that way with their camels, when Judah and Reuben and the rest were debating what they should do with their brother. You know the rest. You know what sufferings Joseph went through at that time and afterwards. It is true he became a great man in the end—more eminent, more justly respected, more widely useful, than the most ambitious and sanguine amongst you can ever hope to be. And this is one of the reasons why his example is so instructive in regard to the point in question. Joseph desired to serve God, and he did serve Him; but he was led by a path which he could not possibly have predicted or imagined. So will it be, more or less, with you who are looking forward. May you feel in your own heart and experience the power of that truth which was expressed, again and again, in reference to Jacob's son, "the Lord was with Joseph!"

* 1 Kings xxii. 34.

But this looking forward is not always attended with sanguine feelings. Sometimes the heart sinks when we think of the future. Few trials are more distressing than those which may be experienced by a conscientious and scrupulous mind at those times of life when new and active duties of some kind must be entered on, and yet various paths are open. I am not supposing the alternative of two modes of self-gratification. I am not supposing you to be at a turn of the road where Ambition points one way and Avarice another. These are the Devil's sign-posts, which it is better quietly to pass by. They lead to nothing but disappointment. I am assuming an honest desire to do right. I am imagining a man to be looking on two paths which lie before him, with strong reasons in favour of each, and feeling that the course of his whole life will be differently determined as he takes the one or the other. He asks himself, "Which is the better of these courses?" Various considerations must be taken into account before this can be decided. "Which am I most fit for?" This is sometimes a difficult question to decide for oneself. He asks the advice of friends; but he finds that, with all their kind intentions, they do not exactly understand the nature of his perplexities. He analyzes his motives. Here he is more baffled than ever. It is a great trial, the wretchedness of which is known only to those who have felt it.

Of course each case has its own special circumstances. Here I can speak only in general terms. One rule which is sometimes given for such occasions is that you should follow the course which involves the most self-denial. This rule is often a safe one, but it is by no means infallible. I believe no principle is so important at such a time as a firm faith in God's superintending, guiding, special Providence. If due consideration is given to all peculiar circumstances, due deference paid to the advice of really wise friends, due caution exercised with regard to preponderating temptations, I believe no rule will be found so applicable as that which is contained in the words—"In all thy ways acknowledge Him." Look to Him in prayer; expect His guidance; desire to follow it. Then there may indeed be perplexity for a time; but you will find, when you reconsider this passage of your life, that in some mysterious way God has indeed "directed your steps."

2. If now we turn to contemplate this doctrine of a Special Providence in reference to the present, it is evident that, when it is thoroughly believed, it must act as a strong cordial and a soothing medicine in many of the trials to which we are all exposed. A very few words will be sufficient for the consideration both of this and of the last part of our subject.

One temptation, to which most of us are liable, is a certain impatience of our present position if we think it is below what we deserve, and a sensitive irritation of mind if we do not receive from others the consideration which we regard as our due. How great a relief under such temptation is provided by the doctrine of Providence! "Here God has placed me. This then is the best place. Here let me remain till He calls me away. The pillar of the cloud and the pillar of the fire are for the present standing still. When they move I must move; but not till then. Let me do my duty cheerfully, and meet my trials manfully here where I am." How much of that restless ambition which makes men miserable is put to rest! How many mortifications are avoided, when men can thus "commune with their own hearts and be still!"

This state of mind leads to the conclusion that a lowly condition is usually the best. Many of those who read this must remember what is said of the Valley of Humiliation in the second part of the "Pilgrim's Progress." "It is the best and most useful piece of ground in all these parts," says the author. "I have also known," he continues, "many labouring men that have got good estates in this Valley of Humiliation, for God resisteth the proud, but gives more grace to the humble. Indeed it is a very fruitful soil and doth bring forth by handfuls. Some also have wished that the next way to their father's house was here, that they might be troubled no more with either hills or mountains to go over; but the way is the way, and there is an end." And then follows that happy song of the shepherd-boy, which there is a strong temptation to quote; but the reader may be tempted to refer to the passage. No man who is wise will be very anxious to rise from a lowly to an eminent position. David was troubled with few cares while he led a shepherd's life; but there was a sad emphasis in his prayer, when he had worn the crown, "Lord, remember David and all his trouble!"*

And if a firm belief in Providence is a safeguard against ambition and discontent, it is a true solace in the dark day of affliction: and the dark day will surely come. At such a time, it is an indescribable comfort to have faith in a Special Providence, and to be able to say, "This is God's hand. He is guiding me still, and proving me, and preparing me for better days to come." And even when affliction takes its worst form; when self-accusations rise up within the breast; when we know that sin has paved the road which led us into misery; even then the penitent heart may be assured of the best and closest providential guidance, and, acknowledging God even now, may receive of the promise, "He shall direct thee." Nay, He hath been directing thee even to the point of thy present suffering and discipline. Thy case can hardly be worse than that of Joseph's brethren. Never spake conscience more truly than when they said one to another, "We are verily guilty concerning our brother, in that we saw the anguish of his soul, when he besought us, and we would not hear; therefore is this distress come upon us." But never did words more truly express, both the forgiveness of brotherly love, and the certainty of God's mysterious Providence, than the words of Joseph himself, "Be not grieved, nor angry with yourselves, that ye sold me hither: for God did send me before you to preserve life. . . . So now it was not you that sent me hither, but God."†

3. Most true it is, that sin leads us into misery; but it is equally true that, wherever we are, God's Providence has brought us thither. To solve the difficulty theoretically is impossible. But the truly penitent and disciplined heart accepts both truths, and finds in one the motive for humiliation, as it finds in the other ground of holy confidence. As life goes on, and the religious principle works deeper, and experience is increased, the sense of Providence is more intimately realised. Great comfort is derived from the retrospect of circumstances which were formerly perplexing. What was gloomy in the future, and oppressively dark in the present, becomes clear, when viewed in the past.

When our younger days are over, the times of retrospect come frequently. We look back on some of the places where two roads met, and when we were forced to take one or the other. And again we ask, "Did I take the right one?" Then perhaps many things come to view, which we did not see before. We see that the path which we did not take would have led us very far astray. And sins also come in view in reference to the path which we did take—false motives not distinctly realised at the time—selfishness, worldliness, vanity, ambition, even when on the whole we wished to do right. But as our sins become more evident, the guiding of Providence becomes more evident too. The shame is ours, the glory is His. I seem to come back again and again to this point. A good illustration of it was once brought before my notice; and I believe I shall be pardoned for adducing it.

On a voyage in a sailing vessel across the Bay of Biscay, from the north-west of Spain to the western part of France, which is a notoriously dangerous coast, every precaution was taken according to the ordinary methods, and even peculiar care was exercised, to keep the ship well to the westward. The result, however, was, that when the first flash from a lighthouse on the coast was seen in a dark and stormy night, we found that we were close in with the shore, with the wind and the current urging us on the rocks. It was an anxious night. But by God's blessing on skillful management, the sailors worked out slowly and safely to windward, and we were in the open sea before daybreak. And why had we been in danger at all? It was ascertained afterwards that some iron guns were in such a position on board that they drew aside the needle of the compass, and prevented it from pointing quite truly. It is well known to scientific men that the question of compasses in ships which contain iron is a difficult subject. And a similar difficulty exists in reference to man's spiritual voyage. Even when there is, on the whole, the steady desire to do right, some disturbance may arise from the power of a prevailing motive. Conscience itself, the moral compass, even while we obey it, may be under an influence which causes it to deviate. And yet God leads those safely through spiritual trial whose desire is to serve Him, notwithstanding their infirmities, and exercises His gracious care to keep their souls from fatal harm. Such is oft the Christian's experience as he passes through life.

And then comes the last retrospect of all. Moses prepares in the plains of Moab for his predicted departure, and looks back on the long forty years.* Joshua gathers the tribes in Shechem, and resumes the history from the call of Abraham to the end of the campaigns which fulfilled the promise.* Never have two lives been more varied in incident, more full of downright hard work, more entangled with cases of difficulty and perplexity, than were the lives of Moses and Joshua. We all know how they spoke at the last of God's providential care. Perhaps one of the delights of the saved and glorified soul will be to look back on the path which it has travelled, from the first dawning of its human life till the arrival at its heavenly home, and to note how every step has been protected, guided, and blest. Even as an earthly traveller would feel delight, after a long and intricate journey, if his whole path could be set before him, and he could review with his eyes every scene and every incident—all the unexpected turns, the places where he sank with fatigue, the places where he rested or met with companions who lightened the toil, the bare mountain-side where all traces of roadway appeared to be lost, the dark wood which was full of dangers, the stepping-stones where he crossed the brook, the "green pastures" by "still waters," which came just when refreshment was most needed.†

But I must not detain the reader longer. The general truth which I have been endeavouring to illustrate is this,—that God guides all our steps. This is true of every man. The careless, ungodly man does not know this, or, at least, does not think about it, and therefore does not perceive it. But the godly man believes it, and finds comfort and strength in the belief. God's hand is hidden from those who will not see it, but "the secret of the Lord is with them that fear Him."* The Almighty's presence is with us all; but the tokens of it are visible in exact proportion to our watchfulness and prayer. If we are bent on following our own way, or what we fondly deem our own way, then the pillar of fire grows dim, and the cloud is lost in the general haze of the desert through which we are passing. But if we live close to God, He will make His Providence felt. The cloud in the day will move before us, and will kindle into a fire to guide us through the darkest night.

So it must of necessity be. Our sense of Divine Providence must be in proportion to our capacity for receiving it, to our sense of spiritual need, to our sense of God's goodness in Christ. Live, then, pray that you may ever live, within what has been well called "the inner circle of God's Providence."† So will you look forward with confidence to the future: so will you have peace in the present: so will you be thankful for the past.

THE SILENT HOUR.

WHO has not felt the awful power
Of darkness and the silent hour?
Unseen the objects ranged around,
Unheard the very breathing's sound,
The body's sense of being gone,
The spirit lives, alone—alone!

Yet not alone; for on my bed,
More deeply for that silence dread,
I feel Thy presence, Lord, and prove
That 'tis in Thee I live and move;
And in the darkness I can sing:
'Tis but the shadow from Thy wing.

O ye, who say there is no God,
Have ye no silence in your road?
Are there no watches in your night,
Wherein ye quail, and yearn for light?
Ah! tell us truly, can ye dare
The silence, or the darkness bear?

Confess!—with you 'tis oft, I ween,
As erst with some in woodland scene,

When lo! because we missed our way,
While sank the beams of parting day,
"Where no fear was," they were afraid,
Yea, trembled, and were sore dismayed!

And though ye say, we shall not see That fabled Judge, yet strong is He
To abase "the pride of evil men;"
Too late to give Him glory then!
Therefore, ere come those moments dim,
('Tis His own bidding) trust in Him!

O God our Maker, in the night
Thou givest songs, Thou sendest light:
By sorrow's smart our joys increase;
The blood of sprinkling speaketh peace:
Awake the harp! awake the voice!
We trust Thee, Saviour, and rejoice!

HENRY DOWNTON.

* The allusion is to a chance excursion made in company with certain distinguished and enthusiastic disciples of Auguste Comte, some twelve years ago, on a lovely summer evening, in the neighbourhood of the Lake of Geneva. The effect on them of sudden nightfall where there was no possible danger, is not exaggerated.

DEAN ALFORD.

DEAN ALFORD'S life is one of the chosen few that will bear the strictest scrutiny, and reward the labour. The more carefully we study it, the more clearly we see that his greatness lay close to his goodness. From those early student days, when he so honestly mourned over his "inconstancy," down to the period of full maturity, when he set himself to the great works which gained him a world-wide reputation, we find that the chief source of his strength lay in a strict sense of duty, sweetened by an unaffected desire to gratify those he loved. If some self-consciousness mingled itself with the finer traits in a character that owed little to suitable childish companionship, we need not wonder much. Alford tells us how he fortified himself against this result, and made up for the sad lack of the much-craved brothers' and sisters' society, by correspondence with his cousins. How the quick, ardent boy, disinclined to set study and full of vagrant tastes and curiosities that sought manifold outlets, formed himself into the systematic worker, is well worthy of study. Never perhaps was there a man who had in this respect more to contend against, or who contended more successfully. Facile within its own range, and apt at throwing off trifles, his mind was prone to repose in first results, and to eschew ordered labour and the pain of frequent reference and revision. Yet his great works were precisely such as show these results in fullest measure. Had he been the son of a wealthy gentleman, with abundant means for travel, and no incentive to hard study or steady labour, it is perhaps not too much to say that he might have subsided into the self-satisfied dilettante. But he had to work his way, and his early upbringing—simple, orderly, devout, subdued by a sad sense of loss, yet brightened always by Christian hope and example—supplied him with the best impulses. Astronomers tell us that we still see the light of stars that have ceased to exist. Who can doubt that the young Alford thrown into circumstances that so soon tended to draw a veil of gravity over the natural buoyancy of his temperament, became a medium through which the light of his dead mother's character might the more directly reach us? For the finest elements of Dean Alford's nature were after all interpretive. He took on fine impressions readily. And if culture had done much for him in this respect, grace had done yet more. He caught the note of spiritual and moral excellence as though by instinct. This instinct it was that enabled him to be such a powerful conciliating influence. The more closely that we contemplate him—the more we try to see him in the varied aspects of his character—the more do we discover how little of the mere ecclesiastic he was, and how, by reason of his wide catholicity and his consistent illustration of Christian manliness, he claims the regard of earnest men of every church. It is with a view of promoting this end that we proceed to outline the main facts of his life, as presented, with the tact of wifely love, in the biography recently issued.*

Henry Alford was born in London in 1810. His father was a special pleader—a man of frank and cheerful temper and noticeable decision of character, which is attested by the circumstance that, on the death of his wife, about four months after the little Henry's birth, he abandoned the profession in which he had just begun to have promise of success, and entered the Church. He was ordained deacon in 1813, at Quebec Chapel, London, with which his son's name was in after years to be so closely associated. That the early death of his wife made a deep and permanent impression on him, is proved by a remark in a short autobiography by Henry: "I knew very little of my mother, as my father seldom or never mentioned her to me, unwilling, doubtless, to tear open afresh a wound which time may have begun to heal,"—which passage is significantly followed by the touch, "They say I am very like her."

Whilst his father was yet unsettled, the boy resided for some time at Tamworth, under the care of his grandmother and aunts, who, womanlike, may have done something to encourage the precocity which he soon began to show. When not more than five years old, he wrote little histories, and entertained himself with selecting and copying out texts of Scripture—a suggestive forecast of his future determinations. When between eight and nine his father began to teach him Latin, in which he speedily made marked progress. During the few years that his father was curate, first at Steeple-Ashton, and then at Wraxall, great care seems to have been devoted to the boy's training. But the father's health failing, he was compelled to go to the

* "Life, Journals, and Letters of Henry Alford, D.D., late Dean of Canterbury." Edited by his Widow. Rivingtons.

Continent, and Henry was sent to school at Charmouth, where he was latterly taught by the congregational minister, Mr. Jeanes, to whom he made reference when, so late as the appearance of "Felix Holt," he took occasion to protest against the style of talk put into the mouth of Mr. Lyons, as a typical dissenter. The coast between Charmouth and Lyme Regis is very fine, and made such an impression on young Alford's mind, that many years afterwards he wrote of it with an eloquent enthusiasm. Evidences are abundant of his early love for all natural things—especially flowers—and of a keen, quiet sense of beauty that could dwell long on a loved object. For a time he was at school in Hammersmith; and in 1824 he went to Ilminster Grammar School, which had the advantage of being at no great distance from his father's house at Curry, where he now acted as curate of Drayton. Here the lad's character began to form. Mrs. Allen, the head-master's wife, speaks of him as a "delicate, gentle boy, whose wondrous memory was shown at a standing-up (a Winchester exercise); for he was able to repeat an immense number of lines in Greek, Latin, and English." And she remembered, "among his peculiar amusements, a practice of cutting out shades to represent the head of the blessed Saviour, and other objects; his arrangement of fragments of glass to imitate peals of bells, and his habit of writing verses. She remembered, too, as the cause of the only habitual complaint against him, his inclination, which many impositions failed to correct, to write in forbidden hours of and to the members of his home circle."

He confesses that he needs the aid of affectionate intercourse, saying that he must have some one to whom he may write fully and freely, and begging his cousins not to deny him this pleasure. Already he had begun the habit of constant self-review, sedulously watching his tendencies that he might correct his faults, which he very ingenuously acknowledges. "My two greatest failings, among many thousand others," he says, "are idleness and inconstancy; when I undertake a thing I set about it eagerly, and I have no doubt if I continued it all the way through, should not make a bad job of it (as we say in the country); but my ardour is like a storm, it soon abates, and leaves behind it a sort of lethargy." To aid him in his good resolutions, he began the keeping of a diary, to which habit he adhered through a long life. On his fifteenth birthday he sent to his father an address in verse, which drew forth a warning not to indulge in poets' dreams, but to bring his mind to view things through a more sober medium, and so lower his expectations of happiness from earthly objects. He seems, however, to have made acquaintance with several of our poets without detriment to his regular work—adding to his list of studies drawing and music. He writes to his cousin, Mary Alford: "Tis plod, plod, plod, step by step, dull work; but I have to console myself, while labouring up the hill, on the fine prospect and fresh breeze I shall enjoy at the top, should I ever arrive there. Diligence, my dear Mary, is the only way of acquitting yourself honourably in any station of life: it is what you owe to yourself and to Him who gave you your talents."

In August, 1827, he became a private pupil with the Rev. John Bickersteth at Acton, in Suffolk, where he took a great interest in Sunday-school teaching, and began the study of astronomy. He went up to Cambridge in October, 1828; and, as he had met Mr. Wilberforce at the house of Lord Calthorpe, and had been captivated by the "dear old man," we are not surprised to find him soon after deep in the study of "The Practical View," and delighted with the sermons of the venerable Mr. Simeon. He was frequently at Lord Calthorpe's, and derived great benefit from the people he met there, and was occasionally of service to them. This gives a characteristic glimpse: "To prevent the consequences of Mr. Wilberforce's earnestness in conversation, which constantly impelled him to advance nearer and nearer to the edge of his chair, Lord Calthorpe employed young Henry Alford to watch and take suitable opportunities of pushing the chair forward by degrees, so that it might keep pace with the advance of the speaker's person."

If the entries in young Henry's journal sometimes savour a little of self-analysis, they show an honest self-severity and a real desire for progress. "Excess of feeling is rather a failing of mine; when I hear it urged against a man who intends well, that he is too apt to let his feelings overbalance his judgment, I always hope well of that man." And certainly his habit of prayerful self-review deepened his earnestness, and wonderfully strengthened him for work. "He was known on one occasion, as he closed his books after a hard day's reading, to stand up as at the end of a meal, and thank God for what he had received."

As for Cambridge, he had gone thither with no great hope of distinguishing himself; for he felt he had little faculty for mathemetics; but, nevertheless, through sheer assiduity, he ran (Bishop) Wordsworth pretty hard in the contest for the Craven Scholarship, and he won the Bell Scholarship shortly afterwards. He was fortunate, too, in finding congenial companions. E. T. Vaughan, Blakesley, Tennant, Heath, Hallam, Merivale, and the Tennysons, were those whose friendship he most desired to cultivate.

With Arthur Hallam he sits up till four in the morning, talking of poetry and kindred matters. And it is very interesting to hear of Alfred Tennyson reading to his companions some exquisite poetry of his—"Anacaona," and "The Hesperides"—now so well known. As was almost to be expected from his meditative character, Alford soon became an earnest admirer of Wordsworth's poetry, on which he read a paper at the Union—the interesting supplement to which was a meeting with the poet himself at Spedding's rooms, which showed how quiet and efficient was the influence which the poet exercised privately, as well as by his writings. Alford was quite the type of character long to cherish such an interview. But he felt that he needed to guard himself from "the insidious undermining which study and literary habits carry on against the work of God in the soul; it is the springing up of those seeds of pride which an enemy hath sown in my heart, and which are working slowly, but I fear surely, towards maturity, the pride of intellectual, philosophical, and classical acquirements; it is these I have to dread!" The revolution in France and the disorganizations of society in England,—for this was the time of bread-riots and threatened insurrections,—gave him much to think of. He saw students armed to defend Cambridge in case of 'an expected attack; and no doubt these things led him to reflect on the great gaps that existed between the various classes in our country—an evil which he was ever earnest and active afterwards to remedy.

After a widowhood of twenty years, his father was now married again to a Miss Barber, for whom Henry had already learned to entertain a deep respect and affection. He now spent occasional delightful holidays at Ampton, where his father had got the living, and of these he thus makes record:—

“There are many joys and sorrows which skim lightly over, and leave no mark, but some that leave their footprints as they go. I have never known domestic comfort or enjoyment in the bosom of a family; and though my life has been an unbroken series of mercies, and I have everybody to thank for everything; yet I have always felt, in this one respect, lonely and disheartened. I had never known the care and love of a mother. You may therefore conceive the change to me, I cannot describe it; and certainly the thanks which I owe for it are beyond all measure. It has been in my case a very special answer to prayer; and God has done it all so gently and tenderly for me, like a kind friend, who, in preparing for you, has anticipated a thousand little wishes which you would have thought of after your arrival.”

Speaking of the examination, he says with very characteristic meaning, “Our college examination has been a very tough and fatiguing one, being for five days eight hours a day. I did not feel in the least anxious, for I knew I had done all I could, and I was only anxious to know what that was.”

In 1831 he came out as thirty-fourth wrangler and eighth in the first class of the classical tripos; and for a year he read for a fellowship and took pupils, anxiously awaiting the entrance on his twenty-third year, when he could take orders. He had proposed to his cousin Fanny and been accepted; he wrote some of his best short poems at this time, and began to develop the scheme of “The School of the Heart.”

In the beginning of 1833 he published a small volume of his poems, and was full of plans of authorship; but having been ordained, his conscientiousness and his determination to be in no whit behind his own ideal of requirements for the holy office, led him for a time to abandon these, that he might enter on a systematic study of divinity. “My best plan will be to study the Scriptures. At present going on with the Epistles in the early part of the morning, next Hebrew, and after that ecclesiastical history, Mosheim for the present. My sermons in the morning, and what time I can spare from that for classics and metaphysics, in which department Butler must be the first book.”

Immediately after ordination he went to Ampton, to act as curate to his father; and Mr. E. T. Vaughan tells us how he “threw all his heart and mind into his new ministerial duties, his sermons, and his pastoral intercourse with the simple villagers, in which already he seemed to find a happiness more congenial to his true taste than the restless intellectual activity of the circle in which he had lived in Cambridge, though he was as diligent in study as ever.”

He obtains his fellowship in 1834, but, having got it, says decidedly, “I shall now proceed to divest myself of it, as soon as possible.” In 1835 he was presented to the parish of Wymeswold in Nottinghamshire, to which, without delay, he carried his cousin Fanny as his bride, and settled down to the daily duties of a parish clergyman, eking out his income by taking pupils, one of them being Charles Buxton, who seems to have deeply attached himself to the Alford. Wymeswold was very quiet and secluded, with only twelve hundred inhabitants and an income of £110. The country around it, however, was very fine; Charnwood Forest hills being within an easy drive. “The School of the Heart” was now speedily published, and won high praise from Wordsworth, to whom its quiet meditateness and true feeling for nature must have warmly commended it. But literary work was in large degree suspended for more sober cares. He methodically studied his sermons, addressed himself to the complete reorganization of the parish, built a vicarage and schoolrooms, projected a restoration of the church, which had fallen into sad disrepair, and was always delighted to give help to the brethren near him. A neighbouring rector thus bears witness to his willingness to aid:—

“The advantage of your husband’s proximity to my parish I frequently found in his ready willingness to ‘come over and help us,’ when we wanted an address to a working men’s institute, or a lecture to a literary society, or a penny reading, or any subject which his varied accomplishments embraced. His readiness of speech and good humour made him a most valuable coadjutor on such occasions; and he used to say, ‘If I can get a laugh out of them I shall do.’ This he did effectually even in dry subjects such as acoustics, when, I remember, after maintaining that every substance in nature was capable of emitting a musical sound, he added with gravity, ‘To be sure, you can’t get much of a note out of a blanket.’”

His incessant labours told on his health, and he had to make a tour abroad, saw Mont Blanc, and enjoyed the Alpine scenery. On his return, much strengthened, he set himself to the fulfilment of his parochial duties more eagerly than ever. One of the best testimonies is that, before he had finished his twenty-eighth year, his own bishop offered him the new bishopric of New Zealand,—to which the venerated Selwyn was afterwards appointed. Not being yet the canonical age, Alford's decision was rendered the easier. But this fact suffices to prove that he must have impressed those he met with unusual sagacity and prudence. And yet there must have been something youthful in his appearance, if we may judge from an incident which occurred a short time afterwards, when he was appointed Examiner to the University of London. He writes :—

“There are four candidates at Somerset House. On my entering the room one of them said, ‘A fellow aspirant, I presume?’ on which I replied, with all disposable dignity, ‘No, sir, the examiner.’ The unfortunate individual has been apologizing ever since, and looks firmly convinced that I shall pluck him for contumacy.”

At first he rather felt the want of intelligent society at Wymeswold; but he soon found lasting friends among his neighbours, and his connection with Dearden's Miscellany, which for a time he edited, supplied him with a range of healthy interests. He not only wrote for it lively reminiscences of travel, critical essays, and passages of biography, but he discussed graver topics, such as national education and biblical revision, in a very thoughtful manner. On this last, his sentiments uttered thus early definitively foreshadow some of his later positions.

Whilst busy with his quiet parish work, he was visited with a great trial, in the death of his little boy, Clement. His grief was only relieved by the conviction that “the angel child had learnt the new song, while the father knew it not.” He now went the more heartily into the restoration of Wymeswold Church, in which his lost child was commemorated by a memorial window. Again he had the offer of a bishopric—that of New Brunswick; but probably the thought of his Greek New Testament, to which he felt more and more drawn as he went on with his preparations, was an element in determining him to decline. He now consulted with Dr. Trench and other scholars on various points, and finding they regarded his plans favourably, he set vigorously to work. To enable him to consult German commentators with facility and success, a short residence in Germany was deemed advisable, and he accordingly went to Bonn in June, 1847. There he made the acquaintance of Scholz, Dörner, Arndt, and other scholars.

He tells us that he worked ten hours a day at German.

“I hope I have facility enough now to read slowly all the commentaries I want. In spirits I have never drooped, as I have had too much to do. When tired of my German work I have taken up my journal, having the satisfaction that I was recording what would be hereafter interesting to myself, and that I was writing to my dear ones in England.”

Having, on his return, come to the conclusion that his work on the New Testament, if well done, would not leave him sufficient time to do conscientiously the work of the parish, he intimated his desire to find a change. He had, besides, been led to entertain the idea that his work in Wymeswold was done, and that the parish would have more chance of prospering under the charge of another; but, on the earnest representations of five hundred of the parishioners, he agreed to go on, with the aid of a curate. Writing to a friend to ask assistance in finding a proper person, he speaks thus frankly, with a forecast of some of his later movements: “I want him to teach and preach Jesus Christ, and not the Church; and to be fully prepared to recognise the pious Dissenter as a brother in Christ, and as much a member of the Church as ourselves.

. . . . Some little experience in parochial work is desirable; a very young man would not suit me. Above all, he should be a man of peace, who will quietly do his own work, and not breed strife.”

Meanwhile, though the difficulties in the parish grew instead of decreasing, his New Testament progressed; and the first volume was published in 1849,—at once taking its place as a work of value. As has been well said, it is not perfect, but it was the first effort after a complete work of the kind in England. It led the way; and the wonder is, not that it should have had defects, but that it was done at all.

Another shadow fell across Alford's life whilst he was pushing forward the second volume, and grappling with difficulties in the notes to the Acts. His son Ambrose, a promising boy of ten years old, suddenly died. “Of all the sorrows my husband knew in his life, none, I think, made so deep an impression on him, or so often came back to his recollection, as this.” As a relief, he now finished his translation of the “Odyssey,” and wrote some review articles, which brought him new friends,—amongst whom was Mr. Howson, now Dean of Chester.

Preaching and lecturing in London and other places, his fame spread; and, as his father on his death-bed, shortly before this, had advised him to try to get to London, he was the more gratified by an offer from the Rev. J. Hampden Gurney to become minister of Quebec Chapel, which he did in 1853. Some of his reasons he has given us.

"Untoward circumstances," he says, in a letter to Mr. Gurney, "have thrown me into false positions; and now that my Greek Testament withdraws me from the parish, I have, and must have, to the people in general the aspect of an idle shepherd, letting others do his work; and after eighteen years, as the generation grows up which knows not Joseph, this must infallibly get worse and worse. As to my Greek Testament, when the second edition comes out, I shall have arrived at a period of my work which will require more than any before that I should have access to public libraries. . . . As for preference, I fairly tell you I do not care two straws for it; but a high sphere of usefulness I own is tempting to me, and it has appeared to me that this place is the path by which God Himself is leading me to such a sphere."

A suggestion was made from more than one quarter that he should retain the living of Wymeswold along with the incumbency of Quebec Chapel. But to these representations he made this reply: "I have a decided objection to pluralities myself; where a man's duty is, there should be his residence; and one cure of souls is enough for one man." Considering that, with the increasing demands for the education of his family, he cannot but have often felt the advantage a larger income would be to him, his testimony on this head is all the more valuable.

The thoughtful earnestness and eloquence of his Quebec Chapel sermons soon drew together a large congregation; and on their publication in a series of volumes, they secured to their author a well-deserved reputation as one of the ablest preachers of the metropolis. There was a staid impressiveness, a quiet solemnity in his manner that was made all the more telling by his deep voice, with its fine and varied tones, and the grace and ease of his written style. His great achievement, however, was the afternoon service, which he used to speak of as being especially "his own child." This was a sort of exegetical lecture, in which the whole context was discussed, with the critical questions arising out of it. "I do not preach," he says, "but expound the Gospels; in fact, expand my Greek Testament notes; a sort of thing in which, as you may imagine, I delight much." Eminent men of all professions were soon attracted to this service in spite of the unfashionable hour.

So the years passed, with interests ever-widening—lectures, societies, philanthropic movements claiming his attention and help.

He had many thoughts about the best way of dealing with the poor, and was active in work for the improvement of the district. He tells us that he found this district-work most interesting, and managed to set on foot schools for the poor. "My situation, you must know, is no sinecure," he tells Mr. Vaughan. "I find it difficult to get time for my Greek Testament work." The monotony of this labour was broken now and then by a trip to the Continent, Scotland, or elsewhere.

But this happy London life was not to last. In March, 1857, Lord Palmerston rather unexpectedly named him to the deanery of Canterbury. Of Canterbury, with its mild and pleasant climate, the Dean was soon in high praise. "I find," he wrote, "this is a very good place for work, interruptions are few, and one's head is clear and fit for grappling with tough questions in a way which it never was in London." Instead of sinking into the slippared leisure, which one of our distinguished novelists would fain identify with the cathedral close, he multiplied his interests—sought to reform the cathedral system, interested himself more deeply than ever in social and political questions, and began to express in yet clearer terms his fears for the future of the Church to which he belonged, and to impress on others, by every means within his power, the necessity for more of consideration and conciliation towards those who, for reasons of conscience, remained outside her pale. He was anxious first of all to render the cathedral services really popular, and after much difficulty, he managed to institute an afternoon sermon, which was found to be of great service. His liking for music, and his knowledge of it, now stood him in good stead, and his fine artistic taste enabled him not only to go into the restoration of the cathedral with pleasure, but to direct and advise. The journeys which he now and then made—to Italy especially—he has recorded with unusual picturesqueness and vigour in his published books; but he differs from some travellers in this, that his love of art never led him into any apologies for what was associated with the evils of Popery. He was a true Protestant, and became more so the longer that he lived. He found many fit subjects for his pencil; for painting in water-colour he had studied whilst at Quebec Chapel, and he now found great pleasure in this art. His quick, quiet habit of observation, that sought to see everything in relation, his love of colour and tone, his precision of hand, and his patient eye for beautiful form, might, with due study, have made him an artist of eminence. Always when he travelled he sketched, and many of his pictorial records have become familiar to the public through Good Words and other magazines. And all the time he was faithfully following up, and endeavouring to further popularise, the results of his labours as a Biblical critic and commentator. Among the most noticeable efforts in this kind were his "New Testament for English Readers," and his popular adaptation of it, "How to Study the New Testament," which first appeared in the pages of this magazine, and did much to throw light on obscure and difficult points.

One of the most important events in his life was the establishment of the Contemporary Review in 1866. He welcomed the opportunity it afforded him for impressing on the public what he conceived to be the true ideal of the Church, the possibility of radical changes, necessitated by that complete clarification of the Christian conscience which he delighted to anticipate; and the duty of firmly upholding Protestant principles, while encouraging liberal feeling in all allowable directions, and trying to serve the real interests of literature and art. He had no patience with schemes of union with distant churches, which excluded one-half of the Christian community at home. Such was his programme. It was a high ideal for a monthly magazine; but it was very nearly realised—the Dean never missing an opportunity of clearing away obstacles that lay in the way of good feeling between Churchmen and Dissenters, and doing much to forward his old scheme of Biblical revision.

But even whilst it appeared to strangers as though a long life of work and benevolence lay before him, he was often visited with misgivings, with fears that he might be suddenly disabled, and he quietly made provision for such a contingency. Surely we may call this a characteristic note: "I wish to provide myself with a home in case I am unfit for my duties as dean, for I have ever disliked the conduct of men retaining office in the Church after they are past their duties; and I long ago resolved that, if such should ever be my case, I should resign and retire."

With this view a small country house, named Vines Gate, near to Brasted, Sevenoaks, was purchased, and there the Dean frequently betook himself for a day's rest and change of scene. But he would not let go any of his privileges in the way of Christian helpfulness. When, at length, the Bible Revision Committee was appointed, he devoted himself to the work with great delight, seeing in it a new opportunity for uniting members of all branches of the Christian Church in an important national enterprise. Owing to failing health and his growing desire to do for the Old Testament something similar to what he had already done for the New Testament, he resigned his editorship of the Contemporary Review in the beginning of 1870. But his activity was undiminished. He read, he wrote as much as ever, and showed no loss of energy in the work of the Revision Committee. At last his medical men stepped in with prohibitions. But ere long all aid proved vain—the vital energies had been too long overtaxed, and after a short period of prostration, in which he suffered but little pain, he passed away quietly on the 12th of January, 1871. Not only Canterbury, but the country mourned for him, and Nonconformists as well as Churchmen followed him to the grave in St. Martin's churchyard, where he had desired to be laid.

What is above all needed in our time is the sympathy and patience of culture, combined with the devout and stirring earnestness of deep conviction as to divine truth. Dean Alford was a happy instance of this combination. He kept well abreast of the knowledge of the time; was as ready as the most thorough rationalist to agitate for slight changes which he had convinced himself were needful in the sacred text; but he remained a sincere believer in the common doctrines of the Cross. He had been brought face to face with the difficulties that emerge in a strict scrutiny of Scripture; and yet he held firmly by the main evangelical dogmas. As a commentator, as a preacher, as a poet, and as an essayist, he did notable service. He was able to deal with the largest questions of doctrine and interpretation, and he uniformly did it in the most Christian spirit. He was, in the best sense, conciliatory, not by yielding up aught of his own convictions, but by exquisite consideration for others.

As a commentator, Dr. Alford's maxim seems to have been, "Never shirk a difficulty, but frankly face it." His practice was to examine, as far as was possible, and then unreservedly to admit the presence of contradiction or unauthorised reading. He had, perhaps, undergone more labour than any other English commentator to make sure his ground on his points; and his patience and industry were equalled by his singular ingenuousness. What could be more aptly illustrative of this than the candid manner in which he tells us that no countenance whatever is given to the episcopal office by the word in the New Testament which in Acts xx. is rendered "overseers" in our version? And this is only a sample of what, almost at every turn, meets the student either of his critical Greek New Testament, or of his valuable English Version.

As a preacher, Dr. Alford was earnest, unlaboured, unconventional. Simplicity was attained; but it was not affected. It sprang rather from depth of conviction, which made the thought easy and natural. His sermons are wholes; and, though he was not a great thinker, there is a diffused and gentle eloquence, which flows on smoothly, chastely, like one of the quiet English streams which he loved so well. He was poet enough to command ready illustrations; but these are never overdone. He was neither florid nor high-flown, deeming that the majesty of the truth should awe the ambassador into simplicity. Never failing himself to regard preaching as being one of the most important functions of the Christian minister, he spared no pains to give his sermons all allowable literary graces. He sought to draw men by the winning attractions of Jesus rather than to arouse them by the stern denunciations which also may often be effective in the preacher's hand; but occasionally he did wax the more powerful in his stirring appeals, from the prevailing quietness of his manner.

As a poet, Dr. Alford is not now so much spoken of as he deserves to be, though in that branch he received no lukewarm welcome. His poems have little intensity. They are meditative and full of joyful, gentle love of nature. Vivid in picture, they deal with the more striking moods of human feeling but rarely. They have lyrical sweetness and grace, but they want passion. Nor does he deal with the complex and involved moods said to be germane to the time. All is simple and calm. The atmosphere is peaceful; the distant sound of streams, the low buzz of insects, and the chirp and chatter of birds are the only noises that break the stillness of his mood. But there is much of beautiful self-revelation in them. It is, however, as a hymn-writer that Dean Alford will take rank among the English poets. A few of his best hymns will live, and must find a place in every hymn-book that in the least strives to represent the whole circle of Christian thought and feeling. "Lo, the Storms of Life are breaking," and "Forth to the Land of Promise bound," are familiar to most people; but several of his later ones, written expressly for his "Year of Praise," are quite equal to these. One of them, "Ten thousand times ten thousand," which was sung over his grave, we feel sure will recommend itself to the general Christian heart.

Of Dr. Alford as an essayist, there is little need to say much. He was no dilettante. He did not seclude himself with the remote and colourless topics which enchant the student and feed the egotism that looks askance at the hard work of life. He was eminently practical. When he retired to his study, he always carried some great interest with him. Latterly he was much exercised with the question of Christian unity. He would gladly have seen the Church of England disestablished, if true Christian unity could have been thus eminently secured. He was wont to laugh, in his own quiet way, at the idea that the Church of England could not exist without her endowments. He had figures at his finger-ends, proving the enormous amount of private endowment which would be forthcoming, and which was at present rendered unavailable.

And what shall we say of him as a man but that he was faithful, simple, childlike; devout in heart and open in mind? He "looked to the things of others," and was most ready to admit merits in those who differed from him. His extreme dislike to appear in any way to force his own advantages as against another, often made him appear timid, even vacillating. Of this the present writer could give many instances. Ready appreciation of merits, and wise considerateness for his associates, were qualities in the Dean known to many; but his large tolerance, his quiet patience, his willingness to overlook in others mistakes which had sometimes caused him to be not only misunderstood, but misrepresented and maligned, were qualities not so generally known, and indeed in one whose utter honesty made him prone on certain points to treat his adversaries with perhaps a little overplainness of speech, were hardly to be looked for. But these elements found a harmony in his character. His unreserved frankness indicated something of youthful freshness; his ready allowances sprang from a true counterbalance of youthful generosity which knew nothing of affectation or finesse. He never harboured secret dislikes; never brooded over injuries done to him. It is known to the writer that he would put himself to special inconvenience to ask for explanations in cases where his position might have been deemed to set him above thought of taking any such step. His openness, his readiness to receive hints, was a beautiful and amiable trait ; but sometimes it tended to affect his writing prejudicially in making it diffuse. His versatility was astonishing, and it was intimately associated with this characteristic. He needed many interests and mild reliefs in turn, and probably prized more the satisfaction felt in the first fresh brush of active production than in bringing himself and his work into relation with ideal and objective standards. Hence, together with real generosity, a certain innocent self-will even in self-depreciation. He does not over-estimate himself ; but he so far evades the force of real criticism by a frank confession that he lays no special stress on the particular product under judgment. Not without its characteristic side is the following, which occurred in a letter received from the Dean, along with a copy of his "Lord's Prayer" for review :—

"Do not cut me up more than you can help : my old muse has put on her bonnet and shawl for a promenade ; but, if snubbed, she will keep indoors for the rest of her life. No loss, perhaps, some people would be inclined to say ; but I know you will say it, if you must say it, in a kindly way."

The review was written, and it is superfluous to say that the Dean did not express himself as though he felt he had been snubbed.

He was astonishingly free from the astuteness which much contact with men engenders. He was slow to suspect. And to some extent his extraordinary capacity for labour may be thus accounted for. He kept his mind free from worldly ambitions and distractions. And his incapacity to become a powerful Church politician substantially helped him in this respect. He was so excessively frank and plain-spoken that no party could regard him as "attached." This he himself not only felt, but said ; for when a friend, on Archbishop Sumner's death in 1862, suggested that one of its consequences might be his appointment to a bishopric, he wrote thus :—

"I do not apprehend any such consequences as you picture, so I look round on all my comforts and thank God. I am too outspoken, and too little leaning to any party, for them to take me. If I am passed over by the fatal bolt this time, I am safe for the future. . . . If I am called I shall go ; but we are hoping to be let alone in our happy, pleasant home—I to finish my English Testament, now going on well."

Never, perhaps, did a man support ecclesiastical dignity with less of assumption or of affectation. He bore none of the marks of the dignitary. Of stately and impressive presence, there was yet in him an accessibility, a freedom and spontaneity of communicativeness, which must at once have struck and charmed those with whom he was brought into contact in ordinary society. And this lies near the prime quality of his character, which expressed itself in many ways. He was to the last young in heart. He delighted in simple pleasures. To escape from his books for a quiet ramble in the woods, or on the beach, or by the stream-side, was all the relief he needed. He would sit and sketch familiar or beautiful objects with a patient assiduity. He loved long rambles on foot, and had a keen eye for the aspects of nature. His wanderings in France and Italy were specially memorable to him because of the enfranchisement he then experienced from many rules and conventionalities from which he scarce could escape in England. He was personally without many faults of a positive kind. His ambitions were bound up closely with his self-respect, and therefore he had but slight experience of poignant disappointment. He had lived the studious life which he loved, and had met with but few great trials. Yet his sympathies were always warm, and prone to take the most practical form.

PRACTISING THE ANTHEM.

A SUMMER wind blows through the open porch,
And, 'neath the rustling eaves ;
A summer light of moonrise, calm and pale,
Shines through a veil of leaves.

The soft gusts bring a scent of summer flowers,
Fresh with the falling dew,
And round the doorway, glimmering white as snow,
The tender petals strew.

Clear through the silence, from a reedy pool
The curlew's whistle thrills ;
A lonely mopoke sorrowfully cries
From the far-folding hills.

A lovely night—and yet so sad and strange !
 My fingers touch the key—
 And down the empty church my Christmas song
 Goes ringing, glad and free.

Each sweet note knocks at dreaming memory's door,
 And memory wakes in pain ;
 The spectral faces she had turned away
 Come crowding in again.

The air seems full of music all around—
 I know not what I hear,
 The multitudinous echoes of the past,
 Or these few voices near.

Ah me ! the dim aisle vaguely widens out,
 I see me stand therein ;
 A glory of grey sculpture takes the light
 A winter morn brings in.

No more I smell the fragrant jessamine flowers
 That flake a moonlit floor ;
 The rustling night-breeze and the open porch
 I hear and see no more.

Great solemn windows, down a long, long nave
 Their shadowed rainbows fling ;
 Dark purbeck shafts, with hoary capitals,
 In carven archways spring.

And overhead the throbbing organ-waves
 Roll in one mighty sea,
 Bearing the song the herald angels sang,
 Of Christ's nativity.

Dear hands touch mine beneath the open book,
 Sweet eyes look in my face,—
 They smile—they melt in darkness ; I am snatched
 From my familiar place.

The summer night-wind blows upon my tears,
 Its flowery scent is pain—
 O cold, white day ! O noble minster—when May I come back again ?

To hear the angels' anthem shake the air,
 Where never discord jars,—
 The Christmas carols in the windy street,
 Under the frosty stars.

The dream-like falling, from the still, grey skies,
 With falling flakes of snow,
 Of mellow chimes from old cathedral bells,
 Solemn, and sweet, and slow.

To hear loved footsteps beating time with mine
 Along the churchyard lane ;
 Round the old blazing hearth to see
 Loved faces once again.

When may I come ? O Lord, when may I go ?
 Nay, I must wait Thy will.
 Give patience, Lord, and in Thine own best way
 My hopes and prayers fulfil.

IN REFORMATION TIMES:

Some Glimpses of Life at a Great Era.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "PAPERS FOR THOUGHTFUL GIRLS."

PART II.—BATTISTA DI ROSSI.

CHAPTER I.—BATTISTA'S SUPPER.

BATTISTA DI ROSSI was a member of a great Florentine banking house. He had not settled in Florence, however, but in the provincial town of Rossi, where he had emulated the prosperity of his kinsmen. There he had this advantage—he was the great man of the small town, ranking even above the fathers of the monastery. He had in a great measure the Italian characteristics—half aristocratic, half mercantile—of the princely merchants of Genoa, Venice, Florence, and her conquered tributary, Pisa. In this, his forty-seventh year, Battista was robust and many-sided—a hardy, healthy-natured man. Relishing his position and his ancestry, he yet went heartily into the business transactions of his estates and factories; enjoying the excitement and contest of trade like a born trader. He had married Monna Olympia, of the Panciatichi house, according to a desirable arrangement between his house and hers; but, with her secluded sickly habits, and his busy, active life, he had seen very little of her when death stepped in and separated them.

On the whole, Battista di Rossi was very well regarded by his fellow-townsmen. He was a man of too marked a character not to provoke enmity; but he was too open-handed and genial to be ill-spoken of. Besides, he was zealous for the honour of Tuscany and of Rossi, and fond of patronising young aspirants in law and art; and, as he managed to keep on good terms with the prior, and as his mother, Monna Francesca, was lavish in her charities, Rossi was proud of Battista and the Rossi house.

On the occurrence of his forty-seventh birthday his poorer townsmen gathered, in goodly numbers, below the loggia, to wake the day with songs, and hang up garlands; while the higher classes thronged in flocks to the supper with which he celebrated the occasion in his moon-lit September garden. Garden suppers were the popular feasts of the wealthy and the refined, whether held by the Tiber, the Arno, or the Po. To add to the charm of these meals, which were expected to be enlivened as much by the sparkle of native wit as by the glitter of bossed plate and Venetian glass, the lovers of beauty looked out on the pure soft radiance of the moon, reflected from the glossy leaves of myrtles, lemon-trees, and ilexes, and on the galaxy of stars, so kindling up the dusky blue vault that the bold outlines of the great mountain range in the background could be dimly descried, fraught with the fascination of mountains seen in cloudland.

Battista was an exceedingly courteous and jovial host. To do still more honour to his company, he had doffed his usual evening dress, and wore a scarlet doublet and hose. He was a towering, square-shouldered man, with a swarthy face—not handsome, but full of character. He looked a natural leader of men, and he was in this banquet once again asserting and vindicating his leadership. He capped quotations with his guests—many of them men of learning in its revival; and he bandied jests and pithy proverbs—homely, even coarse, it must be confessed, they sometimes were—in the middle of his apt sayings. At the close of the entertainment he rose, cup in hand, and drank, with sudden gravity, a long farewell to his guests.

A stir and murmur of startled surprise passed round. What was to happen? Was Messer Battista going to die? Had he been called to fill some high office in the State?

Battista did not leave his audience long in doubt. Looking round him with a slightly sarcastic smile he said, "My friends, were I a very prudent and cautious man, I should stop here and say no more, but permit your fancy to shape the end till it proved you to be good or bad guessers. But, in the first place, the end is so near, that it is not worth while to keep it secret; and in the second, I do not fear to speak of it though my worst enemy were present;" and here the light in Battista's eyes concentrated itself into a vindictive glow. "I have been falsely denounced to the Senate which has replaced the priori; the State has passed upon me a sentence of banishment from Tuscany."

A hubbub, rising to a half-stifled roar of indignation, showed that to the chief portion of the guests the communication was equally strange and unwelcome.

Battista listened closely, and with some sense of consolation, to the token, but he quickly arrested it when it threatened to become a riotous resistance to power.

"Well, well," he said, calming his friends by the philosophic serenity of his own voice and face; "I am not the first or the most illustrious person whom the State has banished to its loss. I may live to show you that you can trust Battista di Rossi for that; at the same time, I wish you to know that I submit to the decree of the State. I will have no rebellion and disorder in my name;" and with this peremptory assurance, he contrived, without giving offence to his guests, to show them that he would dispense with any further expression of sympathy and partizanship till the time was ripe. Battista had better be left alone, or with a few of his more intimate friends.

So it happened that, within an hour after the departure of the supper-party, while all Rossi, from the refectory of the monastery to the humblest home of the poorest artist whom Battista had bidden to the feast, was ringing with the great man's proscription, Battista was strolling along the fragrant terraces of his garden, on his way to the stately suite of rooms so shortly to be dismantled of the treasures with which he had filled them. Among other things, he had to break to his mother the disaster which had befallen him. But although he was too proud, in some respects, too stolid a man to shrink from a painful task, yet he lingered almost inadvertently. When he first came to settle at Rossi, he had been fascinated by the magnificent view from the height on which the town is perched over the woods of the valley beyond the Maremma, away to the slopes of "the thin sandalled Apennines," while to the west slept the blue Mediterranean, only less blue than the sky. On this spot he had been inspired and encouraged to project enterprises which had proved highly remunerative. Unlike the rude, ignorant nobles, who occupied the castles perched among the craggy spurs of the Apennines, and led lines of banditti, robbing and either feasting or fasting in their strongholds, Battista had delighted to pursue art and literature, and to surround himself with as many of the gems of ancient bronzes, marbles, MSS. in vellum, and paintings, as any man not a prince could collect. But far above his private aims and ambitions, Battista could tell himself now, in this solemn hour, that he had desired the prosperity and honour of the ungrateful State which was thrusting him from its bosom. What wrung his heart at this moment as much as his own degradation, was the conviction that if this factious policy were persisted in, whether by imposed sovereigns or by the relics of the old signori, Florence and Italy herself must soon bring to an end the promise of the Middle Ages, the exultant hope that she and States like her were to inaugurate a new Roman empire, and be a fresh mistress, not alone of the spiritual, but of the social, commercial, and artistic world.

As Battista revolved these prognostications, what was worldly in his face vanished, and it grew noble with the nobility which dignifies even a commonplace Italian face under the influence of the same devotion.

One of the many small owls which haunt the neighbourhood of Rome, but which had strayed to more northern regions, hooted eerily from a neighbouring cypress, at this stage of Battista's reflections. The sound reminded him that the night was waning; and he hurried into the house.

The burning heat and brilliant colouring out of doors, have made the subdued gloom and the half empty space of the vast rooms the greatest luxury which can be conceived. The life strangely simple and natural, preserving well-springs of tenderness even in the extreme cases when its men were at once effeminate and ruthless, and its women light-minded and corrupt, has not demanded the artificial aids to contentment which life has sought among other races.

But it was not in any of the large public rooms, but in her sleeping-room beyond that he went to meet his mother and his daughters. There was a wood fire crackling on that hearth, besides the surroundings of carved ivory, wrought steel, lace, and velvet, which marked the sanctuary of such a dame as Monna Francesca. It was an effort to announce to the little family group his misfortune, and to bid his mother prepare to forsake the house of many years and go, in her decline of life, where destiny called her; but Battista appeared in Monna Francesca's presence like the master of the scene and the circumstances, and showed himself equal to the strain on his powers.

Monna Francesca was not a very old woman, being but eighteen years her son's senior. In her elaborate head-dress—not unlike a canopy of dark blue velvet erected over her head—she appeared a very handsome woman of the magnificent large Contadina type. With her grand Roman matron's gait, bust, and great black eyes, and superabundance of rich black hair, just streaked with grey, she was as childish, simple, and gentle as her grand-daughters.

Agneta and Bona were two merry girls of thirteen and eleven. They wore carnation satin mitre caps on their curly heads, above dimpled brown faces, as if to atone to their rank in this way for the unvarnished primi-tiveness and homeliness of their undress gogram bodices and skirts.

"You keep early hours, my son," said Monna Francesca to Battista, with a little tranquil wonder and approval of his unexpected appearance.

"We hope the supper has gone off well, father," cried the girls with one voice, leaving the game of working puppets in which they had been engaged. "We watched the company assembling from the loggia, and then we stole down and begged Matteo for a dish of lampreys and a few of the confetti, that we, too, might keep your fête-night, father."

"And I don't doubt that you had the best of it, for it got as hot as an oven in the pavilion, and the speeches were not so fine as to make a deaf man hear," declared Battista with a yawn: "but now try and listen quietly to an affair of importance which I have to make known to the madre."

The girls were flattered by being admitted to a family consultation. They fluttered down into a condition of ostentatious stillness and attention as Monna Francesca asked—

"Are you going on a mission to Rome, Battista, or are you summoned to Florence? It will be dull keeping house without you; but you will bring us the gossip of the day, and the blessing of his Holiness, perhaps."

Battista was not only fond of his mother, but he was grateful to her. True, he was aware that there had existed women much more gifted and qualified to be the mates of able men, but, on the other hand, he was acquainted with folly, and worse than folly, in queen-like Italian women. In this experience he could not feel too much affection and thankfulness to the mother who was as innocent at the same time that she was as ignorant as his young daughters. Directed first by her husband and her father confessor, and next by her son and his father confessor, she had never dreamt of straying from the right path thus pointed out to her, but had walked in it docilely, according to her light.

Battista did not greatly fear the effect of the tale on his mother any more than on his young daughters. Monna Francesca was not sensitive or imaginative. Her own husband's life had been attempted in broad day, in the open street; and, while she was in her father's house, she had shared a yet more generally inconvenient misfortune from having the house attacked and plundered by one of the Florentine mobs. She exclaimed considerably and fanned herself with vehemence during her son's narrative. She was hurt that he should be basely misjudged; but as he appeared to accept the situation with equanimity, she prepared to accept it with the same calmness.

Removing with the tip of her fan the tears which had gathered in her eyes, she inquired, "And where do you propose to take refuge?" And she spoke as quietly as if she had been banished every year of her life.

"I have thought of the Castello of San Rocca; it is beyond the bounds, and yet within three days' journey, not too far up among the mountains; and you know I have a little shooting lodge there."

Monna Francesca reflected profoundly, "We might carry up feather-beds with us. The stores from Florence are expected to-morrow—they might be sent after us. But my fans—I am quite out of fans, Battista; you see this one is cracked, and admits the air by as many holes as are in my lace veil. I like my fans either black or green, and scented; but how should I get them of any kind in a poor people's nest like San Rocca?" she inquired with a resigned despair which would have become a Cornelia or an Octavia.

"Oh, we shall have you supplied before the warm weather," promised Battista with a little laugh; "never fear, madre mio."

"And only fancy," chimed in round-chinned Neta, "Bona and I shall feed and milk the goats, and ride on the bare backs of the mules! Why, it will be like the great festa, as good as the masks the madre speaks of."

Battista was thus delivered from trouble with his womankind in his new adversity.

CHAPTER II.—A SUMMONS OBEYED.

BATTISTA had hardly retired to his own room, when his servant Giovanni brought him a brief message, which had been left with the porter, to the effect that Messer Battista should go and speak with a friend who had come to lodge over the night in the third house in the Casa Ponte.

The message was not an attractive one in the circumstances. The time and its events were sufficiently out of joint, and Messer Battista was quite enough engaged with his own pressing affairs, to deprive him of any taste for evening expeditions claimed on the spur of the moment.

"Pista! What a fool you are, Giovanni, to deliver such an unreasonable request!"

"I thought the master liked all messages left with the porter to be communicated to him without exception," said Giovanni.

"So I did on ordinary occasions; but is this a time for me to hear how Messer Niccolo has come in from the country to consult a notary, and wants to tell me that his breed of silkworms are a failure this year; or that Mase out at the olive-garden finds his woodmen refractory, and desires me to bribe the rascals with a festa on their own account? But now that I think of it," declared Battista, stopping short, "neither Messer Niccolo nor Mase would lodge at the Casa Ponte, while I know another mad fellow. Quick, Giovanni! My cloak and my sword! No, I don't wish your attendance—thank you all the same, I shall not be gone long. If this be Luigi Gondi," added Battista to himself when he was out into the moonlit piazza of the mercato, "why, his straits are yet greater than mine. What can the hair-brained fellow mean by coming within leagues of the shadow of the monastery and the grip of the Prior Ambrose!"

In a tumble-down house in the Casa Ponte, occupied by an old woman, who had been nurse in a family of some distinction in the neighbourhood, sat resting, on the side of a bed hung with tattered tapestry, a recently arrived traveller. He was still wrapped in his cloak, with the hood drawn round his face, which, wan and jaded, had yet the perennial youthfulness which haunts some faces. The old woman to whom the house belonged was on her knees, regardless alike of stiff joints and good petticoat, striving to coax into flame the charcoal in a rusty, disused stove, while the damp from the river had come out in blotches and ran down in drops on the green-tinged walls.

"Never mind, mother, I can keep heat in me with my cloak," asserted the stranger with patient cheerfulness, but belying his words by shivering in spite of himself.

"Not mind it, my bambino!" she gasped between the intermittent puffs of her breath to aid the flickering flame—"not give you of the best! Oh, how proud I should be to have you here, were it not for one thing, and to change that one thing, I have said, between this and the Nativita, scores on scores of aves and salves." And as she spoke, she glanced round with fear in her puckered, broad face.

"Never mind them either," her listener told her decisively. But he muttered to himself relentingly the next moment:

"Well, that is harshly put, seeing how she regards them. Besides, in another light they are the expression of the poor soul's love for another, and may give her some relief and warm her heart, though the well-intended exercise does me neither good nor ill."

Did this man, with all his graces and gifts, possess the "bitter and pungent salt" required to recover an age from corruption?

At this moment, Battista's cautious knock called away the old woman in a state of tremulous agitation. The next moment Battista entered, and the stranger rose up to greet him.

"Luigi Gondi!" cried Battista before he caught the emaciated, taper hands extended to him, and embraced their owner. "What perversity has carried your feet to Rossi?"

Looking at the two standing together in the middle of the earthen floor, with the mistress of the house retiring respectfully out of ear-shot, it was hard to believe that Luigi Gondi was a contemporary of Battista di Rossi, and within ten years of him in age. It was not so hard for a student of human nature to perceive that the one man might possess a wonderful attraction for the other. Such men as Luigi Gondi are the Jonathans made to be loved by the Davids of all generations. Their uncalculating enthusiasm, magnanimous generosity, and sheer impracticability, expose them to be the prey of their craftier brethren, as it removes all temptation to jealousy and envy on the part of their true fellows. Battista had already engaged in considerable contention, and encountered serious risks to befriend and protect Gondi.

"I am on my way to Corvieto, Battista," replied Luigi plainly, "to brave the worst by making my opinions known where, believing them to be true, I was before guilty of letting them be hushed up. The archbishop has invited me to a contest with Fra Anselmo."

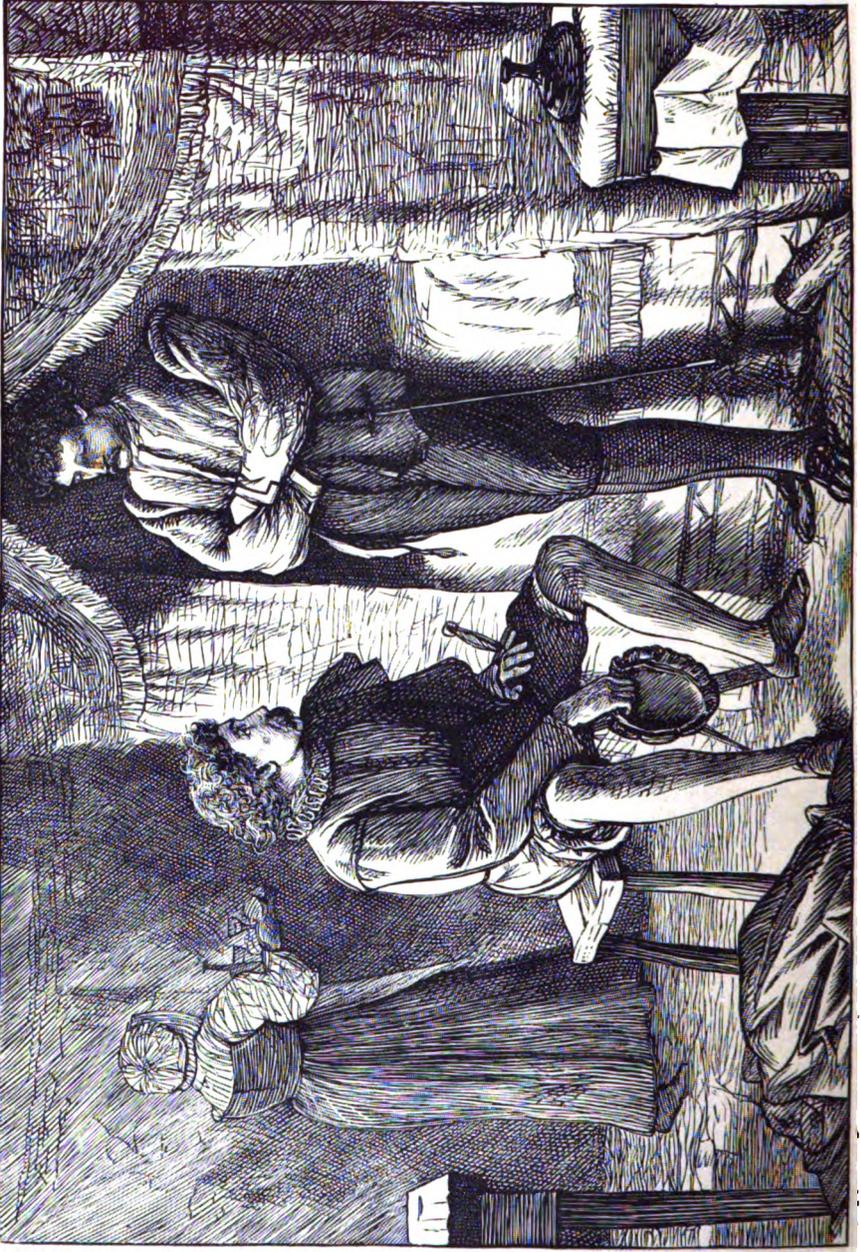

"But you know what such a contest means?" remonstrated Battista warmly; "you are prepared for its conclusion?"

"I hope so," answered Luigi in a low, pained voice. "I try to prepare myself by taking no thought of the rack and the risk, as the Lord bade, Battista, when He will lend his unconquerable strength. Obeying Him, I cannot fail. Oh, rest content," he added, with a burst of passionate reproach, which thrilled the hearer, as coming from one naturally tolerant and yielding, as the defiance of a timid creature, sheep or bird, turning at bay to defend its treasure, smites the conscience of the assailant; "you made me recant once; don't try it again, Battista."

Battista was silent, baffled by this agony of fidelity which renders the weak strong.

"The archbishop may not permit the contest, the proposal may have been a feint," he speculated half aloud, as a last hope. "A Gondi is too popular game to be flown at safely, in that quarter, except once on a time, especially when all the other Gondi remain faithful children of the Church. The hump-backed duchess in the north has not been brought round without more scandal than Rome liked—the persecution of Carmicchi has not answered the end. At least you are firm in offering yourself for the contest, Luigi?”

“Yes, and I did not come here to be dissuaded from the encounter by your too partial affection, Battista,” declared Luigi, calming down so soon as the opposition to his determination was withdrawn—showing himself desirous of proving how real and cordial was his regard for his old comrade and long-suffering associate; “but,” Luigi inquired earnestly, “there is no chance of my compromising you were this meeting known? You have become a great and prosperous man, it may be that the slightest suspicion of your having been in contact with a man known to hold heretical opinions, will be spied out and mischief made of it.”

Battista smiled with a scornful curl of his lip. “Not at all, man, I happen to be beyond suspicion.”

He said no more, his natural frankness checked by his equally natural Italian tendency to hold what he knew in reserve till he saw his way clearly.

Luigi also hesitated. “I am afraid you may not understand me,” he protested with a fretting trepidation stealing into his manner.

“No, I do not understand you, my friend; I never did,” declared Battista, folding his arms, and presenting a stern front to the apostle of a new evangel. How could you ever become a follower of the Pignoni? I know it was that visit to Naples, when Bernardine di Sienna and Peter Martyr were there before they went to Geneva, and the city of the old Guiscard was in a state of ferment with heresy. That visit was at the bottom of it.”

“You need not go so far as Naples to seek the origin of my heresy, as you call it,” retorted Luigi; “you know that Brucioli published an Italian version of the New Testament in Florence as early as 1530, and that before it was prohibited by the Council of Trent we all read it curiously. Ay, and you know well the prohibition did not prevent fresh versions being made. You know that the Oratory of Divine Love, the Society of Theatines, and the Society of Jesus, have been all insisting on the necessity of reformation in the Church, by very different modes, I grant you.”

“Who compels us to abandonment?” demanded Luigi fiercely; “who thrusts us out? And we are not such a narrow sect or such a small circle at Naples as you would make us out to be; there is not a town in Italy which does not contain some reformer of note who professes the doctrines openly or in disguise, and who is spied upon, threatened, or hunted down. There are thousands of schoolmen under the ban of the Inquisition.”

“There is not a town of Italy,” parodied Battista coolly, “which does not contain some hare-brained enthusiast; and, alas! he is generally a man of note. As for the schoolmen, in practical matters they are the greatest fools going.”

“But, how you, Luigi,” continued Battista, not heeding the interjection, “a lover of all that is beautiful and civilised, could join a faction which wages war with whatever is pleasant, is a mystery to me. I should as soon have expected you to join Barbarossa and his corsairs.”

“Ah, but, Battista,” explained Luigi, “you forget that truth must be at the foundation of all real beauty and wisdom, whether in art, learning, or in life itself. What is false can never be permanently lovely and excellent, though it may possess a transitory charm. Therefore, before presenting pure, goodly offerings of the intellect, the affections, the skilled eyes, ears, and hands to our Master, it may be necessary to consume the mixed, meretricious—often gross and shameful works of men’s genius—which interpose between the same genius consecrated to God the Father and Jesu the Son. The one is like a picturesque ruin, and the other a fit, glorious, perfect temple. Who would grudge sacrificing the ruin to the temple?”

“Show me the temple first,” interposed Battista sceptically.

“Why, you believe, Battista,” pressed Luigi, “that this green, luxuriant earth, on which so many sinful feet have trod, as well as the sinless feet of the Son of Man, on which so many horrible crimes have been committed, besides the mighty sacrifice, must be burnt up in order to be replaced by the new heaven and earth in which dwelleth righteousness.”

“I believe as I am told,” answered Battista evasively. “I am no frate, no embodiment of a council to settle a text or a tenet.”

“Now, Battista,” objected his friend passionately, “you would scorn to be so ruled in what concerns you infinitely less—your perishing worldly business—or a question of mere grovelling human knowledge as to who wrote that manuscript, or if this gem is a genuine antique, forsooth. You would have a decided personal opinion there. And to whom do you leave the most tremendous questions to be settled? To accomplished mockers in St. Peter's chair like Leo: to cold-hearted, wily trampers on men's rights and feelings, such as Clement, claiming to be sovereign pontiffs and vicars of Him who, when they sought to make Him a king, went and hid Himself. I thought we of Tuscany knew enough of the Medici to scruple to trust them with our inheritance for time, much less for time and for eternity. But I forget, Battista," the speaker broke off, disturbed by a sudden recollection, "that in your prosperity and power, perhaps you think you owe something to the Medici. There have been men among them who have been quick enough to discern and promote parts, and, it may be, probity which did not war with their own views. Any way, I ought not to speak evil of dignities, to a public man."

"Never mind me, Luigi," answered Battista, with something which sounded like levity, "if you have forgotten my obligations, I have much more forgotten them—supposing they ever existed. But you did not come out of your road to be within sting of a hornets' nest at Rossi—to rail at the Medici. Your friend, the sub-prior, is not more friendly to innovations, new lights, eccentricities, than of old."

"Forbid that I should rail at any one," protested Luigi, with a hasty, weary sigh. "Mei culpa, my own short-comings are so notorious, that he who runneth may well take up a railing accusation against me."

He began, in spite of the fatigue of his long journey, and of a recent illness, to walk up and down the earthen floor. "You cannot have forgotten how I temporised before at Corvieto, how I consented to be one in an idolatrous procession of the host, how I forsook—" he was pouring forth his confession when Battista gently stopped the stream of piteous self-abhorrence.

"Neither did you come here to rail at yourself for my special benefit, and at the tenth hour of the night, friend Luigi."

"No," acknowledged Luigi, restored to his right mind, smiling faintly indeed, but taking courage as he smiled at his infatuation, "for what am I and my sins to waste breath upon in this grand march of the ages? Better left to the mercy of the Most High and the grace of his right hand—the Brother Man—and forgotten with everything but the mercy and the grace blotted out. It was of yourself, dear Battista, and to yourself that I would say a parting word, for you know that it may very well happen we two may not meet again in this world. You are strong and prospering. All this is good; no man need gain-say it, least of all do I carp at your success and usefulness. Besides, I know you, Battista—that the best part of you craves to profit our country by agricultural improvements, by trading enterprise, and by taking advantage of political openings whenever they occur."

"Now you say well, Luigi," testified Battista.

"I am aware that you—a large-hearted, liberal-minded man—are fain to leave Italy the better for you. It is honourable, it is glorious, but there is a glory that transcendeth. There is only one way for a man to deliver his country as there is only one way for him to save himself."

"And that is?" questioned Battista.

"That is by losing it, as by losing himself. My country is, after all, but a trust, held like everything else for the great King only to come to true dignity and honour with Him as his fief when He is obeyed and honoured. Do you think, Battista, that there will ever be freedom on earth, or that men will recognise and respect each other's rights, till all the debasing superstition of intervening virgin, saints, priests, bought favour and bribed amnesty, be swept away; till He be fully recognised who has made of one blood all the nations of the earth, and appointed beforehand their bounds and habitations?"

"Will that ever be, Luigi?"

"Do you doubt it?" urged Luigi sharply; "then you are a greater heretic than I. But I have lost sight of the fact that you have not, even yet, stopped to ask with our countryman, 'What is truth?' Nay, that you profess there is no call for such a pregnant question from a layman."

Battista did not give a direct response. By one of those rapid transitions peculiar to southern idiosyncrasy, he remarked instead, as he shrugged his shoulders ironically, "My prosperity, on which you have been descanting so eloquently, Luigi, has taken to itself wings and flown away. I have been banished by the seventy and the irresponsible head. With the cock-crowing I begin the removal of my family and such of my goods as are transferable to the little Castello of San Rocca up among the mountains. There I may stagnate and sink into one of the more substantial and slightly-enlightened, for all your thrust about truth; or I may originate a new band of brigands instead of being any more Battista di Rossi—the well-born trader of Rossi—for anything that I can see.”

“I am glad of it—I am heartily glad of it!” exclaimed Luigi joyfully.

“You are not serious. Save me from my friends!” commented Battista drily.

“My poor Battista, it is not that I mean. I would give my right hand to have you rich and great,” urged Luigi; “but there is nothing so blinding, so blighting to most men as unbroken worldly prosperity.”

“It is what none of us quarrel with, and all of us aim at, my preacher,” interrupted Battista ironically; “even you, Luigi, would have no objection to being a popular and aristocratic reformer under court patronage.”

“Yes, blind bat that I am,” owned Luigi candidly, “because I, too, would have joined the cry to make my master a king, yet, in that case the earth ought to be pulverised without frost, and the corn to grow without rain. Now the scales will fall from your eyes, and you will have time to adjust other scales of responsibility and integrity, you will weigh evidence and sift testimony.”

“I beg your pardon, I shall do nothing of the kind,” contradicted Battista bluntly; “I don’t wish my head to be turned, neither do I wish to be at dagger’s drawing with all my neighbours—small and great. I shall rather study goat’s hair and the grain of the pine wood.”

“You cannot help yourself,” maintained Luigi confidently; “you will be rusticated in enforced idleness and solitude, without being crushed or distracted by the blow. You have too much independence to be destroyed by the most unrighteous state decree, which can but expatriate you from Tuscany and confiscate so much land and corn, so many bonds and orders. You will have space to ponder, to compare and contrast, to forget and remember. I predict a new life for you, Battista. I wish you joy for your good. You believe that, Battista?” appealed Luigi, wistfully, in the middle of his congratulation.

“Oh, yes, I believe it,” admitted Battista ruefully; “and I believe equally that you would wish me joy of the gracious intentions of the heavenly powers and my improving prospects, did you see me consigned to a prison cell or marched to the stake—all for my good, and as you would also have the greatest pleasure in bearing me company, I dare not take your wishes amiss, or even say decidedly that they are wrong, my poor fellow. What do I know, a matter of fact, worldly mule—sleek no longer?” finished Battista, as he prepared to take leave of his friend.

“There goes a fellow beyond redemption to his doom,” murmured Battista, as he went down the casa, “and the world of onlookers, whether orthodox or heretic, will pick holes in his coat to the end of time, because of his inconsistencies, his blunders and falls; yet how many of his judges and critics could be as honest, as constant, returning ever to the charge? Angry with him, poor fanatical Luigi! I should prefer kissing his feet to kissing those of his holiness the Pope, of whom, to be sure, Luigi spoke with scant ceremony! He ought to have lived in the good early days of the Church, and become a victim to the heathen, since any way, and in all times, till earth is nearer heaven, such men must be victims.”

CHAPTER III.—LIFE IN THE CASTELLO.

THE Castello of San Rocca was one of the walled villages with casements in its walls and a tower in the centre to serve as a citadel, which covered the lower heights of the Apennines. One would have thought that a village might have claimed exemption from the humblest defence on the plea that it had little to defend. But poverty is comparative, and rapine, which stooped to the meanest prey, had its special lodgings in the mountains. The hostile villages, the holds of robbers by profession and cut-throats by calling, the passing visits of free soldiers, alike of the Emperor and the Pope, when these worthies chanced to be in high latitudes, supplied swarms of locusts fit to devour the scantiest supplies of cheese, bread, chestnuts, milk, sour wine, linen and woollen cloth, belonging to the wretched peasants.

San Rocca was not even a place where “the villeggiatura”—a pretty play at out-of-door life, dear to Roman and Italian families of rank, when they occupied their country villas—could be practised with comfort, even had Monna Francesca been ever given to a practice which implied a lively and adventurous spirit. The habitation was a very different one from the family house in the town; the ground-floor was a single cave for two cows, three mules, and half-a-dozen goats; the upper stories were reached by ladders, and were divided into small, damp, little rooms. A residence here could only have been quite endurable during a pilgrimage or a hunting-excursion made in the early spring or summer. The gorge of every bubbling stream was then a Virgin shrine decorated with lilies, cyclamen, maiden-hair fern, and myosotis. The keen aromatic scent of the pine-trees mingled with the balminess of all the bursting buds on the exhilarating mountain air, and was supposed with justice to impart vigour to the sickliest frame. But it was no such holiday-errand which saw Battista di Rossi and his family established at San Rocca. The autumn rains had come on, the evenings were long and cold, the chestnut and beech leaves were yellow and red with more gorgeous tints than those of spring, and the shed cones of the pines helped to cover the sere grass and bracken with a sodden brown carpet. The stripped, battered ridges seemed to shiver in sympathy with the white mantle descending lower and lower on the mountains. Down in the plains myrtles were green as ever, the purple and golden fruit of figs and oranges was hanging uninjured, clusters of damask roses were blushing crimson in the silvery autumn haze; but here among the hills, October and November were a different experience.

Battista soon regretted the impulse which had induced him to cast down the challenge, of fixing on the nearest point to Tuscany in accordance with the terms of his sentence of banishment, when he might have gone to

Rome or to Naples, and led a social life, surrounded by all the luxuries and refinements of the age. At least he was the chief sufferer by his choice, for, strange to say, Monna Francesca and her granddaughters were less affected than he was by the isolation and deprivations of their position. Monna Francesca was dull certainly without her gossips, but she found a great resource in complaining by the hour of the absence of a hair-dresser's shop at San Rocca, which she professed to lament quite as much as other losses. In addition to that simple comfort, she slept a good deal—the close smoky atmosphere produced by the wood fire on the hearth, serving as a narcotic. For farther employment and diversion, Monna Francesca entertained every begging friar and travelling pedlar on whom she could lay hands. Her hospitable inclinations thus becoming known and responded to, she was not absolutely immured from intercourse with her kind. Neta and Bona showed girlish adaptability to circumstances. When they tired of feeding and making friends with the mules and the goats, and found that they could not stroll or ride bare-backed to any distance under the cloud-darkened skies, they took to learning from their admiring contadini girl-companions how to card and spin, to boil chestnuts, and bake bread.

But Battista was like a fish out of water, or a caged wild bird. He wriggled and gasped for breath and beat against his bars. All his other affairs had got into a dead lock, in which he could not venture to stir, so that his entire occupation was taken from him. He could not sleep and chatter with Monna Francesca, or be a graceful mocking bird with the girls. He did not take to goat's hair or to pinewood, as he had predicted. He went out moodily with his gun to shoot a wild goat or deer when it crossed his path, but spent the most of his time walking aimlessly, or sitting gazing abstractedly on the drooping landscape. Sometimes the sun would break through and the veil be lifted for a moment, but it was only to reveal splendid possibilities lost the next moment, like glimpses of success in the lives of men. Battista had not been altogether selfish in his aspirations. He had also schemed and striven to make the town of Rossi, in its favourable situation amongst olive and mulberry gardens, and not far from the great route between Florence and Rome, the nucleus of a great commercial city; and, to promote the welfare and renown of Tuscany until she should be independent of Rome. And the end of it was that he might retrograde into squalor and want, Florence sink into slavery, and Italy be boarded by the Turks and a second time swamped by the descendants of the Goth, for anything that he could do to prevent it.

He wished that he were at least one of the great men by whose losses the world was enriched. And the thought of the great men whose sorrows blossom into joys for others, reminded him of his encounter with Luigi Gondi on the eve of his banishment. Battista had not been able to learn what had been Luigi's fate, but now it haunted him like a shadow projected from another world into the worries and annoyances of this. He recalled his first acquaintance with Luigi when in Florence studying classics and jurisprudence under the same masters. The marvellous quickness and sympathetic power of the younger student had placed him at once on a level with his senior fellow-pupil, and the two had become fast friends. They had shared each other's pursuits and pleasures, seeing the same brilliant company, frequenting the same studios and patronising the same barber's shop.

They had visited Rome in one Holy Week, and assisted in the churches and their processions side by side. In all this intercourse Battista had been fascinated and allured by the single-heartedness with which Luigi threw himself into the interests of the hour.

The lives of the friends had separated from that epoch. Battista had entered on what is called the serious business of life; Luigi, having a small independent patrimony, and but little worldly ambition, had postponed settling down and protracted his experimental travelling days. He had gone to Naples, was won over to the intellectual circle of the Spaniard Valchy, led astray, as Battista was tempted to believe, by the very fires of persecution which certain doctrines kindled. Luigi had always shown a proneness to range himself on a losing side, such as that of the new religionists who were bent on introducing into Italy the views of the German ex-monk and the Franco-Genevese professor. These views had brought Luigi into a worse plight than that of Battista; for, whereas banishment and confiscation were common misfortunes in Italy, the suspicion of heresy caused a man to be regarded with loathing by his Roman Catholic fellow-creatures.

Where was Luigi? Battista often asked himself. He must either be rigidly watched and shunned, or be lying in prison, the iron entering doubly into his sensitive soul. Luigi knew the story of the monk who was taken to Rome and exposed to the most appalling test which the devilish spirit in man could conceive—put upon a diet of bread and water, which was diminished day by day, till the soul, deadly sick, offered any concession to buy a bit of mouldy bread and a draught of muddy water. Courage to die, that was nothing. There were other men in Italy who could shout "Victoria, Victoria," while blazing at the stake. But that might be a result of nerve and dogged obstinacy. There was something more in the courage which could face trials—superhuman to a man exquisitely human—who had already failed before them, and been lightly esteemed by both friend and foe for what they termed his pusillanimity. Yet, though Luigi Gondi was not a man of iron nerve, though there might be even some flaw in his faith, great and noble as it was, on account of which it could not remove this mountain; still this faith would face the mountain in the great invincible name of another, and try again and again till Luigi Gondi should die the truest of martyrs.

Battista di Rossi, like most natures of his cast, had hitherto warily avoided this principle, and had contented himself with more or less of an outward conformity to, and respect for, the rites and ceremonies of his religion. Would he continue to escape from this enthralling principle? Luigi had said that it would be so, and that compulsory inaction and solitude would have a message for him, as they had for Dante, for Mahomet, for Moses. Was this principle, indeed, the salt of the earth, the sole ingredient which could keep it from perishing in its wickedness, and enable all its work, its duties, its enjoyments to be done and taken in integrity and hope? Must it be the pith and marrow, the lamp and staff, of each individual? Possessed of more than its first slight outlines, might Monna Francesca rise from her feebleness and submission into moral heights of holy contemplation and steadfastness, until she should not need a son, or husband, or even priest, to tell her what to think? Thus endowed, might Neta's and Bona's childish laughter be educated, until it acquired full tones, which might have tears in them? If Neta and Bona could not shine as stars, might they at least be able to stand alone, with a Saviour who was as far above patron saints and the blessed Virgin, as divinity was above humanity; so that when Battista came to die he should be nearer dying in peace, even though he left his daughters in their nonage, with their inheritance and their hands to be fought for fiercely by contending claimants? Was there really one unmistakable, unerring clue, through this labyrinth of life, which was given to men to accept and hold? Had he, Battista di Rossi, been guilty of rebellious wickedness in resolutely ignoring the most distant indications of it? Was it necessary for him to go into banishment with chiefs of men so much greater than he to be compelled to look for this clue, and deliberately accept or reject it at its cost? Was this in a measure to see visions and have revelations with all the saints?

Over and over again, through the severe winter, and again into the soft spring, until he was almost half reconciled to his banishment, he revolved these questions — the legacy of his interview with Luigi. He studied quietly the few authorities which were within his reach, till a great calm followed the storm, a mild seriousness not to be disturbed.

It is not said that Battista actually joined the ranks of the reformers. "In Italy men did not adopt Lutheranism, though they approached it." It was their dogma, that "nothing could warrant or justify withdrawal from the Catholic Church, one and indivisible." Nevertheless, Luigi Gondi's words were borne out. Battista di Rossi's banishment and isolation constituted an era in his life, after which the passionate, vindictive merchant showed himself in many respects a new man.

THINE IS THE POWER.

OUR Father, our Father, who dwellest in light,
 We lean on Thy love, and we rest on Thy might;
 In weakness and weariness joy shall abound,
 For strength everlasting in Thee shall be found:
 Our Refuge, our Helper, in conflict and woe,
 Our mighty Defender, how blessed to know
 That Thine is the Power!

Our Father, Thy promise we earnestly claim,
 The sanctified heart that shall hallow Thy Name,
 In ourselves, in our dear ones, throughout the wide world,
 Be Thy Name as a banner of glory unfurled;
 Let it triumph o'er evil and darkness and guilt,
 We know Thou canst do it, we know that Thou wilt,
 For Thine is the Power!

Our Father, we long for the glorious day
 When all shall adore Thee and all shall obey.
 Oh, hasten Thy kingdom, oh, show forth Thy might,
 And wave o'er the nations Thy sceptre of right.
 Oh, make up Thy jewels, the crown of Thy love,
 And reign in our hearts as Thou reignest above.
 For Thine is the Power!

Our Father, we pray that Thy will may be done,
 For full acquiescence is heaven begun,—
 Both in us and by us Thy purpose be wrought,
 In word and in action, in spirit and thought,
 And Thou canst enable us thus to fulfil,
 With holy rejoicing, Thy glorious will,
 For Thine is the Power !

Our Father, Thou carest ; Thou knowest indeed
 Our inmost desires, our manifold need ;
 The fount of Thy mercies shall never be dry,
 For Thy riches in glory shall mete the supply ;
 Our bread shall be given, our water be sure,
 And nothing shall fail, for Thy word shall endure,
 And Thine is the Power !

Our Father, forgive us, for we have transgressed,
 Have wounded Thy love, and forsaken Thy breast ;
 In the peace of Thy pardon henceforth let us live,
 That through Thy forgiveness we too may forgive,
 The Son of Thy love, who hath taught us to pray,
 For Thy treasures of mercy hath opened the way,
 And Thine is the power !

Thou knowest our dangers, Thou knowest our frame,
 But a tower of strength is Thy glorious name ;
 Oh, lead us not into temptation, we pray,
 But keep us, and let us not stumble or stray ;
 Thy children shall under Thy shadow abide ;
 In Thee as our Guide and our Shield we confide,
 For Thine is the Power !

Our Father, deliver Thy children from sin,
 From evil without and from evil within,
 From this world, with its manifold evil and wrong,
 From the wiles of the Evil One, subtle and strong ;
 Till, as Christ overcame, we too conquer and sing,
 All glory to Thee, our victorious King,
 For Thine is the Power !

Our Father, Thy children rejoice in Thy reign,
 Rejoice in Thy highness, and praise Thee again !
 Yea, Thine is the kingdom and Thine is the might,
 And Thine is the glory transcendently bright,—
 For ever and ever that glory shall shine,
 For ever and ever that kingdom be Thine,
 For Thine is the Power !

ASSOCIATION OF COMETS AND STAR SHOWERS.

PART II.

THOUGH there does not appear to be any connection as to the matter of which comets are composed, and those strange systems of meteors or star showers, yet it is possible they may be associated with such systems in other ways, and for other purposes. Thus it is possible they may be the travelling reservoirs or dispensers of magnetic or electric power, and may, in their various orbits or courses, be as the sun and stars are in their own systems—feeders of magnetism and electricity to the universe. They do not themselves indeed seem to possess any attractive power so as to influence the more solid bodies of the universe in this way ; on the contrary, they are themselves subjected to the powerful attraction of our larger planets, Jupiter, Saturn, and Uranus. It is evident, however, that within their own substance there is something strongly resembling the phenomena of magnetic or electric force and action, and as dispensers of this they may possibly be of importance. As to their association with star showers; as yet, at least, it appears to be limited to a few, and this association therefore may be but the chance falling in of these light gaseous bodies with such streams of meteors as those of August and November, along which they might be borne as a boat is carried down a rapid stream. But the whole of the subject of this association is so involved in mystery that conjecture is vain, and the above suggestion is only given for what it may be worth, until future discovery shall have at length solved it fully.

In the meantime another and recent apparent association of Biela's comet with a stream of meteors has occurred, which adds to the interest of the subject; but which, although it has not yet served to clear up the mystery, has added another item of evidence in favour of the theory. On the 27th of November, 1872, at seven o'clock P.M., the writer witnessed a magnificent shower of stars. This shower, which he first imagined to be that, or part of that, which was due on the 13th, and which for some unexplained cause had been retarded, he soon perceived to be a different stream, having a different origin, and seeming to proceed from a different quarter of the heavens from the November shower of 1866, which latter came from the star Alpha Leonis, in the constellation of Leo, from the north-east, meeting the earth in its course; whereas this shower appeared to come from the neighbourhood of Andromeda, from a much greater height, and rather from behind the earth's course. This circumstance at once distinguished the two systems to the writer. The latter shower appeared likewise to be resolved at a more distant point from the earth, although in other respects the phenomena were identical.

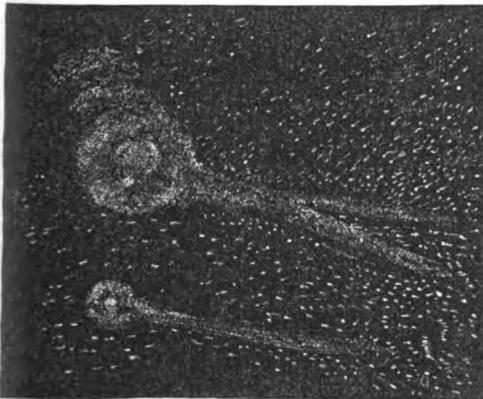

While debating in his mind to what to refer this shower, a report reached him that a German astronomer who had witnessed it had announced that this shower was but the stream associated with the comet known as Biela's, which has a period of $6\frac{1}{2}$ years, and whose perihelion was calculated for October 14th, but which could not be discovered at the time or place where it was due. Taking, then, the direction of the shower, and by it calculating the probable place of the comet, the astronomer mentioned communicated by telegraph with Mr. Pogson of Madras, requesting him to look for the comet, which by observation of the associated shower of meteors he assumed should be seen there, though not visible in Europe. Accordingly it is related that after two nights' vain search, something resembling Biela's comet was discovered by Mr. Pogson in the place described. The particulars of this observation have not yet been made known, but in the meantime grave doubts have been raised as to the identity of the object seen by Mr. Pogson with Biela's comet; and until this is ascertained beyond doubt no definite opinion of this strange matter can be formed. The following passage from the Athenæum of January 18, 1873, thus comments upon the matter: "Astronomers do not universally indorse the idea that the object discovered by Mr. Pogson on the 2nd of December was without doubt the lost comet of Biela. All that is certain is that Mr. Pogson turned his telescope on the track of the retreating meteors of November 27, and saw an object of cometary appearance. If really Biela's comet, something very extraordinary must have happened to that body, which, according to the very accurate calculation of its path, would have been in perihelion on the 14th of October, whereas the group of meteors which produced the shower seen here on the 27th of November did not arrive at its nearest distance from the sun till the 25th of December. The earth crossed the orbit of that comet with which the meteors appear to have so remarkable a connection on the 27th of November (the night in question), but the comet itself was far away unless some catastrophe had occurred to it since last seen (concerning which speculation is quite at fault). It is more likely that what Mr. Pogson saw was another concentration of cometary matter in the orbit of Biela."

The probability of the correctness of this last suggestion is confirmed by the writer of an elaborate and able article on the shower of November and star showers in general in the January number of the Cornhill Magazine, while in the mind of the present writer, likewise, it confirms the theory which he has himself already suggested in the pages, that these objects, such as Biela's comet and Enke's, should not be classified as considered identical in matter with the great comets, but are to be looked upon simply as clusters or aggregates of the matter of which the star showers are composed; in fact, what Mrs. Ward beautifully and poetically described as "the GEM in the ring" of star showers.

But the suggestion in the Athenæum seems to be confirmed likewise by the statements of the writer in the Cornhill, who asserts positively that Biela's comet has disappeared entirely from the heavens, not having been found where it should be at its perihelion on October 14th, notwithstanding the most careful scrutiny by Mr. Hind and other eminent searchers for the last two periods. He also suggests that probably a catastrophe has occurred to it which will prevent its ever resuming its place in its orbit, and that it will never be seen again. In a few days, however, after this paper had appeared, and subsequent to the star shower of the 27th of November, Mr. Pogson is said to have seen it in quite a different place from where it ought to be, and apparently uninjured by any catastrophe, and this just as the uninitiated readers were beginning to form their own conclusions, and to suppose that the star shower of the 27th of November was neither more nor less than the débris of the comet of Biela, into which the earth had come in contact.

Now, how are these contradictory statements to be reconciled? In the one place, Biela's comet is reported dead, smashed to atoms; in the other, alive and well as ever, only having taken a trip for its health or amusement to Madras, leaving a tail behind it to tell where it was gone. The eccentricities of Biela's comet, and its strange performances in another way, may perhaps render the latter achievement less wonderful. It is well known that Biela's comet some twenty years ago split in two, and the two comets thereby created travelled amicably together like a pair of coach horses, side by side, occasionally exchanging flashes with each other, for a whole period of seven years. Since that they have never been seen, till being searched for in October, 1872, and nothing found but their wake of star showers when they crossed the earth's orbit on the 27th of November, lo and behold, suddenly one appears at Madras—as we have seen a duck in the water when pursued by a dog, making a long dive and coming up a long way off, leaving its pursuers completely bewildered and baffled. In the meantime, however, the real dénouement is anxiously looked for by those interested in such subjects.

The association of comets with meteors is illustrated in a curious manner by a vision of St. John in Revelation xii. It is believed by many that St. John had a comet before his mind's eye, in vision, when he says in the 3rd verse, "There appeared a wonder in heaven. Behold a great red dragon, and his tail drew the third part of the stars of heaven." By the dragon, which is equally translated serpent, St. John means Satan, who is called in the same book "the old serpent, which is the Devil."

Now, the appearance of comets in the heavens has frequently been compared to that of a serpent. Thus a work of the sixteenth century,* describing comets, says, "There are some comets that bristle with twisted serpents, another draws after it the twisted folds of a long tail." The likeness to a serpent is indeed that which suggests itself most readily to the mind on seeing the long tail of a comet, which is frequently twisted like a serpent. Probably this, brought to the mind of St. John by "The Spirit," was used by him as an illustration of Satan. But in this case the celestial serpent, or Satan, was accompanied in the apostle's vision by stars, which he is represented as "drawing to himself—even the fourth part of the stars of heaven." Here then is a vision, associating stars with a comet, and illustrating by it the presence and power of Satan. Now, have we any evidence that St. John might have himself seen [such an association of stars in the presence of a comet as, impressing his mind, may have led ultimately to this magnificent description of Satan in his vision thus illustrated. According to the calculations for the return of the November star shower of 1866, reckoning back from that date fifty-three periods—of thirty-four years each—we should arrive at A.D. 64 for the appearance of the same system in the heavens. Now, it is remarkable that it is recorded by Seneca, in the month of October, A.D. 64, a comet appeared "from the north by the west;" and it is more than probable this comet continued visible for the succeeding month of November. Here then was the simultaneous presence of a comet and a star shower in the heavens at the same time; and if this shower proceeded from Leo, or was in fact our Leonides, or November star shower, of which there is little doubt, then the effect would have been just what St. John describes in his vision—the apparent drawing of the stars of heaven from the north-east by the comet to itself in the west. St. John, it must be remembered, was himself alive at the time referred to, and probably witnessed it.

Josephus refers to the appearance of what he calls a flaming sword in the heavens about the same time, A.D. 65, possibly the same comet that first appeared at the close of the preceding year, and appeared to St. John in the form of a serpent. This is brought forward not as a positive proof, but rather as a curious possibility of scriptural evidence of the remarkable association of comets and star showers.

But the able writer of the paper on meteoric showers in the Cornhill advances the theory that we must be prepared to believe that all meteoric showers and all comets must be derived from the large immatured planets of our system in a sun-like state, and with which space is filled; and that these bodies could have no other origin, but must have been shot out of their parent suns or planets, their orbits depending on the direction of the discharges, together with the attractive influence to which they are respectively subjected by other planetary or solar bodies. And a most ingenious theory is adopted as to the power of our greater planets to arrest or entangle, or prevent the entrance of, foreign star systems or comets that would come to us from without—from the interstellar space, and which derive their origin from other suns and systems, and the possibility of which the writer doubts. Yet of all this there does not appear to be a shadow of proof that can be considered satisfactory. Questions like these are beyond our reach; they are among the secret things that belong to God. The great fault of the present age, and of scientific writers, seems to be to find in secondary causes alone sufficient to account for what belongs to the First Great Cause and His immediate agency on matter; in fact, creation by the Creator. This is plainly beyond our faculties and knowledge. Who, for instance, can penetrate the mystery of the creation of our own globe or any planet in the heavens? They challenge us to explain their origin from their beginning to what they now are—to explain their varied motions and the nature of the power that impels them on their course, or, having fixed their axis, preserves their inclination permanently in it. Many ingenious theories have been brought forward, it is true, to explain all this by secondary agencies, but no one has answered such questions beyond certain definite boundaries, except by guess. So with star systems and comets and all the matter with which space is doubtless filled. It is but waste of time and thought to attempt to account for their origin by secondary causes. How, for instance, does the theory assumed by the writer referred to, "that comets and star showers must have been derived from other stars or planets," clear up the difficulty? Supposing that it was the case, it only removes the mystery another step, and leaves us bewildered. This question still recurs, From what were the stars or planets themselves derived? Did they each produce themselves or each other, or were they each shot out of each other?

Must there always be something visible from which another something visible is to be derived? The Apostle tells us, on the contrary, that "the things which are seen are not made of things that do appear;" or, according to another reading, "are made of things that do not appear."

Such I do believe to be the case of comets and star showers. They are independent races that owe no parentage but God, and have their own peculiar functions to discharge, which we know not; but they are not made of anything which we are enabled to see; we cannot trace their pedigree. There is, in truth, but one answer to all inquiries as to the origin of such bodies, which will serve as well for comets and star showers as for suns, and stars, and planets—"He made the stars also." While we willingly allow that the Creator works through secondary causes, and has graciously permitted us to investigate many of these to our delight and instruction, He has not admitted us to His creative counsels, nor permitted us to go one step beyond the limits He has assigned to our knowledge and experience of those facts of which we may be cognisant without presumption, and which have been positively ascertained.

SILENCE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "PATSY'S FIRST GLIMPSE OF HEAVEN."

SILENTLY falleth
 The pitying snow ;
 Bountiful rivers
 All silently flow,—
 Silently shineth
 The sun in the sky ;
 Silently twinkle
 The great lights on high ;
 Silently groweth
 The corn in the field ;
 Silently, quietly,
 Deep wounds are healed :
 Silently loving,
 A strong heart is won,— Silently working,
 A good deed is done.

Noisily waketh
 The thunder's loud roar,
 Noisily breaketh
 The foam on the shore.
 Loud is the cannon
 And fierce is the strife,
 When man against man
 Is warring for life.

Hatred is loud,
 And contention doth cry ;
 But softer than summer
 Is Pity's low sigh.
 Winds that are cruel
 Are heeded by all ;
 But no man regardeth
 When soft breezes fall.

Earth's loudest battles
 Will cease before long ;
 Goodness is silent,
 And silence is strong.
 The Temple was builded
 Without any clamour—
 No voices of workmen,
 Nor sounds of the hammer ;
 The kingdom of Heaven
 In silence is growing ;
 The nations, like rivers,
 Unto it are flowing.
 We hear of the wicked,
 Their vice and their woe,
 But the prayers of the saints
 Have no record below.

AGAINST THE STREAM:

The Story of an Heroic Age in England.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE SCHONBERG-COTTA FAMILY."

CHAPTER XXVI.

PIERS and I were very full of our project of establishing a Sunday-school.

The word has not certainly, in these days, an exciting or a romantic sound. It does not exactly represent an "advanced" phase of philanthropy.

But to us in Abbot's Weir, in those days, it represented an advance which to Piers and me, and to Claire and Amice, was more exciting than any romance. To the conservative element of Abbot's Weir it represented an element of progress, most daring, not to say Utopian and Chimerical. "Utopian" was my Uncle Fyford's term, "Chimerical" Mr. Rabbidge's.

"You will lift people out of their places," said my uncle, "and upset all orderly arrangements, until the country will be as unsettled as France. The principles of the Christian religion should be inculcated from the pulpit, as I endeavour to do. If sacred things are to be taught to ignorant infants by boys and girls, what becomes of their solemnity? And what guarantee have you they are not teaching heresy and schism? My opinion is that you will find these schools nurseries of separatists."

"But mothers have to teach, Uncle Fyford," I said.

"Then let the mothers teach, my dear," he replied, "the clergy, and parents, are undeniable authorities. Indeed, the more I think of it the more it seems to me a dangerous disturbance of the designs of Providence."

"But you cannot teach all the children, Uncle Fyford, and the mothers don't. If we only taught them the Catechism and a little of the Bible, it could hardly be heresy; could it? We can send them to say the Catechism and their texts to you when they know them."

"Thank you, my dear. But really I am not used to children, and the duties of my office are onerous enough already."

"We thought so, uncle. And so, you will let us try and help you a little? Perhaps you would even set us a few lessons? Or you will examine the children, and give the prizes, if they deserve any?"

"My dear, lessons for little children are really not in my way. If you do indeed keep to the Catechism and the Bible—the Gospels I should say—I daresay, after all, you will not go far wrong."

"You could always come and see us, you know, Uncle Fyford. And if you can only grant us the great favour we have to ask you, we shall be within easy reach. We want the old room near the Abbey Gatehouse for our schoolroom to begin with."

"My dear, it is a den of rubbish."

But he went with us, and soon his constructive mind was quite interested in the capabilities of the place, which we with Dick's aid had previously critically explored. There were blocked up windows which could easily be opened; and with a little boarding for the floor, and a little repairing of the roof, a fire-place, and a few benches and books, a desk and a bell, our preparations would soon be complete.

"Well, I suppose I cannot refuse you, Bride," he said, half good-humouredly and half resentfully. "Your 'Rights of Man' perverted you to getting your own way too long ago. But it is rather a pity I did not make the discovery before. It would have made an excellent museum for my Coleoptera. The scheme is certainly Utopian. But perhaps the world is a little better on the whole for some people having, or having had, Utopian schemes."

Mr. Rabbidge looked on the experiment from a high and philosophical point of view.

"My dear young lady," he said, pointing to several shelves of those ponderous folios, in which to him the delights of possession and of perpetual search were blended, "look at those venerable volumes. They represent the theological researches of the wisest men of many centuries. Each of them imagined he had reached a conclusion on which Christendom might repose, and be at accord. And you see Christendom is not yet at repose or at accord. And you hope to make all this plain to babes in a few broken hours! It does sound a little chimerical."

"But, Mr. Rabbidge," I said, "the babes have to grow up and to be good, if they can. And we cannot wait until the folios are finished, and Christendom is at repose, can we, to try and help them?"

"Theology is a difficult science for young ladies to handle," he replied, "although it is one which every tinker used to think he could fathom, and which, for the feminine mind, seems to possess irresistible attractions."

"We do not want to teach them theology, if that means the contents of all those folios," I said, "I am sure. How can we dream of such a thing? We want to teach them something about Christianity, how God has loved us, and how we can show our love to Him."

"Christianity also is a large word, Miss Bride," he said, "and has many aspects. This scheme I repeat, seems to me a little chimerical. Moreover, I confess I consider it rather an interference with the order of nature to take the children from their parents for religious instruction. But I have no doubt it will do the babes good to be an hour or two every Sunday with you and your brother. And," he added pathetically, "I hope you will find the instruction of youth an easier avocation than I have."

Miss Felicity's opposition was more immovable. "What are parents for," said she, "if they are not to teach their children religion? And what are Sundays for, if they are not to give poor working people one day to spend with their families? I consider the plan at once Jacobinical and tyrannical, upsetting parental authority, and intruding on family life. Depend upon it, the poor children will learn two things in your Sunday-schools; to despise their parents, and to dress like their betters. And meantime you set the mothers free to idle and gossip away the day as they like. If you want to teach any one, teach the mothers to mend the rags, not to gossip and scold, and to keep their homes tidy."

My father undertook our defence on this occasion.

"Miss Felicity, you would scarcely set Bride to teach the mothers as they are. And in teaching the children you know she is teaching the fathers and mothers that are to be. Let us hope the Sunday-schools will succeed so well that in the next generation none will be wanted." A hope which did not seem as Utopian to us in those days as it does now.

Thus, even so humble and peaceful a mode of reformation as Sunday-schools was begun "against the stream."

In the town opinions were divided. Fortunately our family was too well known for us to be suspected, as Mrs. Hannah More had been a few years before in a similar undertaking at Cheddar, of seeking to "entrap the children in order to sell them as slaves." Nor did our fame or the extent of our operations expose us to the self-contradictory charges brought against her, of "disaffection against Church and State," of "abetting sedition," of "praying for the success of the French," and of "being paid by Mr. Pitt."

Moreover, Mrs. Hannah More and her generous sisters were pioneers, and the success of her labours, closely following those of Mr. Raikes and others, had made Sunday-schools appear rather less of an extravagance. I often think that perhaps those self-denying and calumniated labours among the "actual savages," of the Mendips may outlive all those books of hers which were welcomed with a chorus of adulation by bishops, great ladies, and statesmen. "Aut Morus aut angelus" might be written with more permanent letters on these than, (as they were,) by Bishop Porteus on her "Estimate of the Religion of the Fashionable World."

In our part of the country, moreover, the Wesleyans had been at work for fifty years, and the discovery of the treasures contained in the Bible had inspired hundreds and thousands of our west country miners and labourers with the determination to learn to read it. Convince any body of people that there is something infinitely well worth reading, and they will find some way to learn how to read. Let any number of people have something worth writing, friends who care to be written to and the means of communication, and they will learn to write.

The religious revival among the people of England came before the educational movement, and gave it at once its stimulus and its food. Our educational aspirations indeed were of the most moderate. Hannah More herself entirely disclaimed the idea of teaching the poor to write. "She had no inten-

And we had decidedly no presumptuous intentions of surpassing Mrs. Hannah More. Indeed, we were not attempting week-day schools at all. The body of religious literature with which we began was not ambitious—Mrs. Hannah More's "Church Catechism, broken into short questions," the New Testament and the Prayer-book, a spelling-book, and Watts's Hymns for Infant Minds: pictures we did not possess.

But it was a great innovation; and our dear old England, conservative to the tips of her fingers in those Jacobinical days, did suspect us very much, and resentfully wonder what new-fangled treason we were plotting at Abbot's Weir.

Of the two "vested interests" we had to contend with, the parents, and the Dames of the day-schools, the parents were divided, and not inaccessible in a slow way to conviction; but the Dames naturally were unanimous and entirely immovable. They said the gentry were going to take their bread out of their mouths, and put grand empty words into the mouths of the children. In vain we protested that we did not mean to interfere with one of their schools, but only to keep the children in order for them. The Dames were wiser in their generation than we were. They said it was easy to sow the seed, but not so easy to keep the crop from spreading. They said we should make the children discontented with them, and no one could say where it would end. Education, they felt, and felt very sagaciously, as a means of maintenance for superannuated old women, would pass away, if it was to be regarded primarily, not with reference to old women, but with reference to the children to be educated. As in so many reforms, the people to be reformed saw more clearly whither these reforms tended than the reformers.

The West Indian planters foresaw the emancipation of the slaves, when the abolitionists only intended the extinction of the slave-trade.

The Dames of Abbot's Weir beheld in agonized vision vistas of day-schools—Lancastrian, British, National—and the abolition of Dames—while we only contemplated gathering a few children together on Sundays to teach them the Sermon on the Mount, Watts's hymns, and the Catechism.

In one sense the opponents of Hannah More were not so far wrong. The germs of a Revolution lay, awaiting development, in the first of Mr. Raikes's Sunday-schools.

The Dames, therefore, were naturally implacable. And, looking back, in my heart I pity them, more, certainly, than we did at the time. The gradual passing away of one industry after another by which poor bereaved toiling women could, by work in their homes, keep their homes together, has its darkly pathetic side. And after half a century of experience, the article manufactured in our wholesale national schools is not altogether so satisfactory as to bear no competition.

If Dames could be rendered efficient, I am inclined to believe girls at all events would be more effectively taught the things best worth a woman's learning, in small individual clusters than in great roughly classified crowds.

And if fathers and mothers could or would teach their children at home, I am sure no Sunday-school could or can compare with the moral and spiritual results of such home teaching.

But these two ifs involve the Golden Age.

However, these considerations make me more tolerant to the Dames and the Parents of Abbot's Weir, looking back from my old age, than I was at the time in my sanguine youth.

"Utopia!" What was there impossible for us in Utopia?

Piers and I, and Amice, and Reuben Pengelly, in that little school in the old abbey gatehouse, and the rest of us throughout England, were unsealing a fountain which was to rise, and spread, and float Abbot's Weir and England above all the rugged Ararats in the world, and begin a new era!

And the fountain of great waters did rise, and did float England, as I believe, above many a peril; although that

"Divine event
For which the whole creation waits" seems scarcely yet in sight.

Meantime the war with the Dames waxed hot. The Dames moved the grandmothers in general, and the grandmothers moved the mothers; and I scarcely know how it would have fared with us if Reuben had not adopted the Machiavelian policy of subsidising the most intelligent and indignant of the Dames, the one who could read and write, to take charge of the babies in church. It was, Amice protested, an infant sacrifice to Moloch; for she declared that subdued sounds of woe, as from pinched and cuffed infants, surreptitiously pinched during the singing of the Psalms, issued from the dame's charge. But the stratagem answered. A split was effected in the hostile cabinet. The babies grew up; in due time the dame grew too feeble or too mild to pinch, and the subsequent babies were mercifully suffered to sleep on warm afternoons, if they did it quietly.

Our beginnings, as in most undertakings that live, were small. We started with five teachers and ten children.

The mothers brought the little ones, and left them, not without anxious exhortations to us, and many encouragements to the children. They evidently regarded it as a loan in concession to some fancy of ours, for which the subjects deserved compensation.

One woman only addressed her exhortations to the child, and her encouragements to us.

"If you can make anything of he, Miss Bride, it's more than his father or me can, or the dame, and sure enough, you're right welcome to him."

A challenge which greatly stimulated our ambition.

A beginning was all that was needed.

Amice, herself permitted to come only under a kind of commission of lunacy (Madam Glanvil protesting that the world being turned crazy, it was as well to encourage the least frantic of its delusions), took the youngest class, the babies, as we called them, although we had none under five. She said to me that the babies suited her and her theology best, and as by-and-by she hoped to have to do with the lowest class, the children among the races, it was the best training for her.

She painted them Bible pictures, she brought them flowers, she taught them in parables; and they certainly heard her gladly. Her class was the most popular of all. The difficulty was to get any one to grow out of it.

Yet more than one darling little one did grow out of it into higher teaching than ours. Infant epidemics carried off far more in those days than now.

In long after years reminiscences would be brought out to me, by mothers, of little hymns and sacred sayings of some lost darling, and of the name of Jesus, blended by infant lips with that of "mother," and of "Miss Amice," as of One nearer, and dearer, and kinder, and better than all, to Whom it was nothing strange or sad to go.

And more than that, the hymns and texts the little ones had loved would be spelt over by lips and hearts often as simple, though not indeed as innocent, as theirs; and rough men would come to be taught the way the little lost children had found so pleasant, and to tread it, pleasant or hard, if only it led where they were gone.

Claire did not join us, but she sought out many a stray lamb to send to us.

The elder class fell to me; and many a lesson I learned in trying to teach them; among them, a greater allowance for my stepmother and Miss Felicity, and a general appreciation of the difficulties of teachers and parents, ministers, pastors, and masters, and all governing persons; many a lesson also as to the defectibility of my own temper, and the fallibility and general vagueness of my own knowledge.

For if there is no flattery so delicious as the attention of children, it is just because they are quite incapable of the flattery of pretending to attend when they are not interested, or of pretending to understand when they do not, or of accepting a rhetorical paraphrase instead of a clear explanation.

The school soon grew, so that we had to transfer the boys to one of the large workshops at the Foundry.

The girls soon became at home with me, as the lads did with Piers. They knew us already on so many sides, as, also, we knew them.

Amice and Piers and I found that we had to study the histories of the Bible in quite a new way, to make them real to our pupils, and to study the outer and inner world, nature and life, anew, to transfuse Christianity through them.

And so, if we and our friends did not altogether make a new era in England or Abbot's Weir, the little Sunday-school certainly made a new era for us, and I trust for not a few who came to it.

CHAPTER XXVII.

THROUGHOUT the winter of 1801, and the spring of 1802, the enthusiasm with which the people had welcomed the peace with France had been slowly cooling.

By March, 1802, when the "Definitive Treaty" of Amiens was announced, all idea of the peace being definitive had begun to fade away.

The most immovable of Tories in those dreary days had the best of it in prognostication. Those whose hopes of human progress had been largest and most enduring, had to confess themselves most deluded. But few kept hold, through those terrible years of the failure of freedom and the triumph of falsehood, of "blood and fire, and vapour of smoke," in which the last century set and the present rose, at once of faith in freedom, and of trust in the loving rule of God.

This world for Napoleon Buonaparte, and the next for justice and the just, seemed as much as the hopefulness of any could grasp.

To my uncle Fyford and Madam Glanvil, indeed, the question was entirely without clouds.

"The French had given themselves up to the devil," said Madam Glanvil, "and the devil had been sent them in the person of Napoleon Buonaparte. It was quite clear, and all fair; at least as regarded the French. And it would be quite clear for us if we did not resist the devil, that is, fight the French, as the Bible told us."

My uncle Fyford, in more clerical and classical language, observed, "The democracy of Paris has gone the way of all democracies—run to seed in despotism. If the democracy and the despotism are not to become universal, William Pitt and England will have to crush them."

France began to be embodied to us in the terrible form of the Corsican, terribly rising and growing gigantic before the eyes of the Democracy that, like Faust, had evoked the earth-spirit, and could not banish it. And, instinctively, England began to look around for some one princely will to encounter the foe.

Men began to feel bad weather was ahead, and to ask, like St. Christopher, for "the strongest, that they might obey him."

"Il parle en roi," said our ambassador, the Marquis of Cornwallis, writing of Napoleon from Paris. There was no trace of Jacobinism in the new French Constitution. No government could be more despotic. Also there was a concordat arranged by Napoleon between France and the Pope.

"Royalty without loyalty," Madame des Ormes said, "and religion without faith! The republic was bad, but this vulgar new pomp, how can any one bear it?"

Englishmen and Englishwomen in those first months of peace flocked to Paris, the Paris which since Englishmen saw it last had guillotined her king and queen, devoured brood after brood of her Revolution, deluged her own streets, and Europe, with the best blood of France, adored the goddess of reason, established tutoy-ing and the abolition of all titles, and now again was commanding men and women to call each other Madame and Monsieur (Madame being politely restored many months before Monsieur), nay, was even said to be rising to the height of Monseigneur and Votre Altesse, and secretly preparing the Temple to Cæsar in which her offerings for so many generations were to be laid.

Madame said mournfully, "All can go back to France except her own children. And yet what should we find there? Scarcely even ruins; they will be buried under the new constructions. Yet I would give something for tidings of our old terres and the peasantry. The château is gone, and the lands are confiscated; but I think the people—some of them—would remember us affectionately."

After that Piers began to think of an expedition to Paris. He set his whole heart on it, I could see, although he spoke little.

But to us the year 1802 was full of many events which prevented his departure.

The timber trade had been much disturbed by the war; my father had lost more than one cargo by privateers. Not a few of our merchants had effected a kind of Lynch law insurance by taking shares in privateers, paying themselves for piracies by robbing some one else. But this my father would never do. Piers, therefore, was peculiarly unwilling to ask him to incur any additional expense for him.

Moreover, Francis went to Oxford that year, which had involved many expenses, and among others the clearing out of Piers' and my purses, to clear off all the various small debts he had contracted in the town.

Piers hoped that an entirely fresh start, and the relief which he imagined it must be to any one to have the burden of debt altogether lifted off, would be the best possible chance for Francis's turning over a new leaf.

Francis himself, of course, was completely of the same opinion. He seemed for once really grateful.

"It was more than brotherly," he said, "and he should never forget it."

He acceded with fervour to Piers's declaration that this help was the very last secret help he would give. He admitted with decision that a young man at the university was in a totally different position from a lad at school, and must of necessity be a totally different being. "Besides, his allowance was ample, his outfit most elaborate—he never could want anything beyond." He smiled at Piers's apprehensions. "In fact, although he did not like to promise too much, he intended that neither Piers nor I should in the end be losers by our most generous conduct."

So the summer passed, without Piers seeing any means of accomplishing his journey.

But in our little circle at Abbot's Weir one act of Napoleon wrought more indignation than any besides. This was his expedition to restore slavery in St. Domingo.

All the previous winter Loveday Benbow had been watching with the deepest interest the movements of Toussaint L'Ouverture and his black republic in Hayti.

She thought, with thousands besides in England, that at last the despised negro race was about to manifest its capabilities. It was true that the supremacy of the whites had not been overthrown without bloodshed. This was to dear peace-loving Loveday the only doubtful feature. But if ever war was justifiable, it was to rescue the feeble and oppressed from slavery; if Leonidas and Wilhelm Tell were heroes, Toussaint L'Ouverture's banner was at least as pure.

The negro government once established, all seemed going on peaceably and justly. The trust of the liberated negro in liberated France, liberator of nations, is as affecting to look back on as the betrayed confidence of a child.

Looking back also, we can see that the whole movement was only too childlike; the reverence of the long oppressed for the ability of the dominant white race only too great, the copying too exact.

France had a republic, and permitted no title but citizen. Toussaint and San Domingo must therefore have a republic, and the ci-devant slaves own no dignity beyond that of citizen. Poor blind copies of what was in itself a poor parody of the institutions of grand old times and grand old races, without significance or foundation! Citizens who had been trained in no civic rights, had no civic life, indeed, no civilisation, except the thinnest crust of French polish!

Then France instituted a First Consul. Immediately, Toussaint L'Ouverture proclaimed himself First Consul, and wrote to the First Consul (intending it as a compliment), "The first of the Blacks to the first of the Whites."

Napoleon responded by a sarcasm, and an army. "He would not have military honours assumed," he said, "by apes and monkeys."

It is easy to see now how thin and imitative that black republic was; but its very childishness only makes its history in some ways more pathetic. To us, then, fondly catching at any sign of capability in our poor blacks, it seemed like the inauguration of a new era.

Cousin Harriet wrote enthusiastically from Clapham. "Some people," she said, "thought Toussaint L'Ouverture was inaugurating a new era, not only for the negroes and the West Indies, but for the Church and the world. Some one had said that the negro race would probably commence a new age of Christianity. The Eastern Churches had had their age of subtle thought and elaborate dogma, and the Latin and German races had shown the strength and ability of man. The negro race might be destined to manifest his gentler virtues; to develop on earth for the first time the sublime and lowly morality of the Sermon on the Mount. Greeks had taught us how to think, Romans how to fight, negroes would teach us how to suffer and to forgive."

It was a golden vision.

Only, as Amice suggested and Loveday mournfully admitted, they had not exactly begun in San Domingo with forgiving. However, the forgiving might no doubt come afterwards.

Madam Glanvil was naturally much irritated at the whole thing.

She was almost reconciled to Napoleon for characterizing the negro republicans as "apes." "Apes and monkeys they were," said she, "only he might have carried the comparison a little further home. The French aped the Greeks and Romans, Brutus and his conspiracy of assassins, and now they seemed likely to ape Cæsar, and more successfully; and the blacks aped the French. There was a difference; the French did it better. But apes they were, all alike."

Indeed Madam Glanvil had difficulty at times in not taking Napoleon Buonaparte as her hero. They had many points in common.

To her the great authorisation of the "powers that be" is that they be powers. Had Napoleon been a Bourbon, she said, there would have been no revolution. In his sarcasms against the republican theorists she greatly rejoiced.

His "Je ne veux point d'idologues" expressed her convictions better than any formula previously invented.

She was not a little inclined to agree with him, that the swallowing up of Piedmont and the Valais were "deux misérables bagatelles," not worth our disturbing ourselves about.

If he would have let England alone, she would have willingly consented to leaving the rest of the world, black and white, alone with him.

"Those foreigners," she said, "will never understand either loyalty or liberty, or a constitution. Some one is sure to tyrannize over them and make them uncomfortable. What does it matter who?"

But England was rising slowly to another mind.

In the spring of 1802 my cousins wrote to me again, mentioning the threatened French expedition against San Domingo. "Can you believe it?" they said. "English merchants have been base enough to assist in it with transports. Mr. Wilberforce remonstrated in the House of Commons; but Mr. Addington responded very languidly. Papa says we must have Mr. Pitt back, or everything will be lost—honour, commerce, negroes, and England." They said there must be meetings everywhere; the people everywhere must be roused and instructed. They only needed to know.

"Could you not get up a meeting in Abbot's Weir for the abolition of the slave-trade?"

It was so easy to get up meetings at Clapham! My cousins had no idea what a difficult thing they were proposing.

Father said of course we could.

Piers said then of course we would.

I felt ashamed of myself. I had thought so much of self-denials and tests of the reality of conviction, as a little deficient at Clapham; and here, at last, came a test to me, and I shrank back from it.

For an anti-slavery meeting presided over, as it must be, by my father, meant, to me, banishment from Court; and, to Amice, I knew not what, of perplexity and trial.

I dared not say anything for or against. I only told Amice; and she, after a pause, said what I knew she would say.

"It must be done, Bride. You must do it, and you and I must bear it. Think," she added, "if it was only the least little push onward to the lifting off of the terrible wrong! What does it matter what little trials we have to suffer? The wrong is there, the sin is there, the suffering is there, and that is the trial."

So I wrote, by my father's desire, to Cousin Crichton to say we would do all we could—receive the deputation, take the room, advertise the meeting, and explain its intention.

The year wore on. The French expedition reached San Domingo in February.

The reduction of the emancipated negroes to slavery was too plainly its object. Toussaint L'Ouverture and all the Blacks understood it, and made a determined resistance; not in vain, as a proof of what negroes well led could do, but necessarily in vain as to success against the veteran brigades of the French Republic; for the Frenchmen they encountered were veterans, and were Republicans. The First Consul was believed to have a double object in view in this expedition; to re-enslave the Black race, and to dispose of some troublesome Republican troops, which might be too austere to bend to his imperial purpose.

In the last object he succeeded completely. About fifty thousand French soldiers were slain in the conflicts with the Blacks, or perished of disease between February, 1802, and December, 1803. In the second object he succeeded but imperfectly. Toussaint L'Ouverture, the noblest and ablest of the Blacks, brave and not unmerciful; with his determination to liberate his own race, and his noble readiness to learn of the white race, whose superiority he acknowledged, was entrapped by false promises, and sent to France to die of starvation. But the Negroes continued the resistance under more savage leaders; and in the end the last French general, Ferrand, abandoned by France, blew out his brains "in despair," the Spaniards recovered the island, and slavery was re-established.

In August, Toussaint L'Ouverture was thrown into the Prison of the Temple in Paris, thence transferred to the Fortress of Joux, in a ravine of the Jura; the victim we all felt of too frank a trust in the honour of the white men he believed in, yet had dared, and dared successfully, to resist.

The lull of the parliamentary anti-slavery conflict, which had lasted since Mr. Wilberforce's defeat in 1799, continued. All the more important was it that the struggle should not be suffered to be forgotten in the country, and the campaign be carried on in detail. Accordingly our anti-slavery meeting in Abbot's Weir could not be deferred.

My cousins wrote of it with enthusiasm. They considered it quite a fresh launch for Abbot's Weir. Cousin Crichton himself was to come down to assist. At last, in October, the fatal day arrived.

Large handbills had been posted on various friendly walls and gates for a fortnight. The old town-crier had rung his bell and sounded his "Oyez!" although that was by no means an effective way of trumpeting any fact. The room over the market-house had been engaged.

Still Madam Glanvil had not apprehended the event which both Amice and I believed would involve a sentence of banishment from Court, for me and mine.

The meeting was fixed for Monday. On the Saturday before, Amice and I had a long walk in the woods of Court, the brown carpet of fallen leaves rustling under our feet, the gold and crimson canopy of fading leaves above our heads growing into a fine network, through which the blue sky shone on us; whilst below the river rolled with its full autumn volume of sound. For some time

I had avoided dining or spending the day in the house; nor had Amice pressed it. We felt it would have been a kind of treason to Madam Glanvil. Indeed, it was hard to know how far we ought to tell her what was intended.

Our hearts were very heavy. Amice and I had often an opposite feeling as to the sympathy of nature. To-day this was especially the case.

To me there seemed a deathlike weight on all the woods. The birds we startled flew with an uneasy cry from us like creatures who had no home to fly to. The river rolled sullenly on. Even the green fronds of the ferns were hidden under the withered and sodden leaves. Everything spoke of joys, and hopes, and life vanished. The very pomp was funereal. So often we had wandered about those woods together, free and glad; and now we only seemed to creep through them like trespassers.

I was very sad; and it seemed to me, in my childishness, all nature was sad too. But Amice entirely rejected the idea of such sympathy.

"Nature is too old and wise to mew and puke with her children like that," said she. "And she is also too grand and far-seeing. Our mother, if you choose to call her so, is a queen. She has her kingdom to care for, and if now and then she gives a kiss or a smile to our little miseries, it is all we can expect of her. She has seen so many such breakings of hearts healed. She is too stately and too busy, to heed our complainings overmuch. She knows nothing of death and parting. She only knows death as a phase of life. The dead leaves and flowers are dear to her as the cradle of next year's leaves and flowers. If they were dead trees or forests she would not care more. She would wear them down into mould for new trees and forests, or perhaps into bogs and coal mines. Nothing comes amiss to her. The war and torture even among her animals do not disturb her. She is very stately and philosophical, even if she does not enjoy it; like a matron of old Rome at the gladiatorial fights. She is healthy, and has strong nerves. And to imagine she would look downcast because you and I do not know what trouble to-morrow may bring us!"

We went home by the kitchen garden. We had determined to spend our last half hour at the window-seat in Amice's bedroom. All kinds of first things came into our memory, as so often happens, when we are, or think we are, on the verge of the last things.

We passed the old damp mouldy arbour.

"Do you remember your portrait, Amice, the crocus bulb feeling for something to root itself in?"

"And do you remember," she replied, "putting your arm around me, and half sobbing, 'You mean me, Amice?' so surprised and glad you were! and then half sadly, 'only me—what am I?'"

I remembered.

"We have learned that only me would not quite do, Bride. Only One will do to rest one's whole heart in. But your only me has been no little help. Ah, Bride, for how many years!"

We went up to her room, hers and once her Great-Aunt Prothesea's. We sat on the low window-seat, and she repeated to me two stanzas of one of her German hymns:—

"Du bist der Hirt der Schwache trägt
Aux Dich will ich mich legen,
Du bist der Arzt der Kränke pflegt
Erquick mich mit Segen.
Ich bin in Wahrheit schwach und siech
Ach komm verbind' und heile mich
Und pflege den Elenden."

"The Shepherd who carries the weak, and strengthens them by carrying," she said. And then rising into a more joyous strain, she began:—

"Nun ich will mit Freuden
Schen was Er thut
Wie er mich wird ansehen
Weil er doch nicht ruht
Bis er mir kann halten
Seinen theuren Eid,
Dass ich noch soll werden
Seine ganze Freud."

"No," she said with a quiet triumph in her deep tones. "He will not rest, until to us, even to us, He fulfils his dear oath,' that we, even we, shall become through and through, 'altogether a joy,' even to Him."

We sate some minutes silent, hand in hand, while through the open window came the colours of the autumn sunset, and the murmur of the river, and now and then a quiet song of a robin.

"Listen!" she said, "I will call nature no more irreverent names. She sings all through our sorrows, as the robin sings through the cold, as the white-robed multitudes in the Revelation sing on the Hallelujah, and 'again they cry Hallelujah,' through all the tumult of earth. She sings because she sees a hand within, an end beyond, a Face above. Or if she does not, we do, Bride! We see, and at all events, through all, we will sing. Some sighing, I think, is singing; and some silence is better, when patience and hope, who never seem long far apart from each other, make melody in the heart."

CHAPTER XXVIII.

WHEN I returned from Court that Saturday evening, Cousin Crichton had arrived.

He was one of those people to whom his own favourite epithet "sound" applied in every possible way. Health, heart, purse, judgment, doctrine, all with him were sound; not a flaw anywhere, nor an angle to make flaws in other people's health, persons, or hearts; his round, sound, solid personality, made the world around him seem more solid and better balanced, as if it had another broad-shouldered Atlas to bear it up.

Every one was in the state drawing-room. The amber furniture was uncovered. Mrs. Danescombe encompassed with crust after crust of clothes and conventionalities, a new tiara with an erect feather, a new silk that would "stand alone," and looked as if it would have liked it better. My father a little like an exiled potentate, as he always was in the amber drawing-room, trying to feel at home, and as little able to do it as the chairs placed at irregular angles with an elaborate pretence of being accustomed to be sat upon. And Cousin Crichton beaming with kind intentions and hospitality in esse or in posse, rubbing his hands with that effusive manner which always gave him the effect of being everybody's host; elaborately making the very best of Abbot's Weir, the narrow streets, the little houses, our church, our hills, our old grey tower and chimes, in a way which gave one the impression that he was perpetually apologizing to Clapham for having been born in so insignificant a corner; sanguine about the abolition meeting, about the peace, about everything, and yet all the while, one could not but feel, liable in the most placid manner, at every turn, to tread on all the uncomfortable toes of Abbot's Weir, as unconsciously as if Abbot's Weir had no toes to be trodden on.

"Well, Bride," he said, kissing me and laughingly rubbing his hands, "my fair Trappist, have you forgiven us yet for being so 'terribly rich' at Clapham?"

My stepmother looked,—petrified I cannot say, since the word represented rather her usual manner,—she looked as if she were going back from a fossil to a living madrepora, cold and gelatinous. Could I have said anything so rustic, so vulgar, so presumptuous?

"You have all but perverted your cousin Harriet into a reformer," he said. "I am half afraid of her going into bread and water, or Quaker bonnets, or starting off for the Indies, East or West. She does not seem able by any means to make herself as uncomfortable as she would like."

"Cousin Harriet to the Indies?" I said. "Is she to be married?"

"Quite the contrary," he replied; "unless she can find some one who is poor enough to make her as uncomfortable as she would wish. Seriously, Bride, she is a dear, good girl, but just a little wild about the prisons and the slaves, and the missionaries, and everybody's wrongs and rights. At last, you know, the Church of England has sent to the heathen not only the money you so magnificently despise, but a man, a Senior Wrangler. Henry Martyn (one of our West-country men, by-the-by) has given up the best career in England to devote himself to the conversion of the Hindoos. At last we have sent one of our highest; not a German, nor a shoemaker, nor a Separatist of any kind, but a first-class university man, and a sound English Churchman. But Harriet seems most inclined to the Moravians. I believe if I would allow her, she would go to-morrow to teach slave children in one of the Moravian settlements in Antigua."

A thought flashed on me, and with it a pang. Could it be that this was another cord being woven into the net which I was so afraid would at last sweep away Amice from me?

The next day was Sunday. After the afternoon service Cousin Crichton asked which was Madam Glanvil. He had pleasant boyish recollections of shooting over the covers of Court. He was anxious to see the lady of the manor; the earliest state ceremonial he could remember being Madam Glanvil's triumphal entry, as a blooming bride, with the young Squire, into Abbot's Weir, under arches of flowers, with the old bells clashing cannons, and ringing joyous peals; the tenants and townsmen hurraing, and the boys, himself among the number, indulged in an unlimited allowance of noise.

He had no idea in what a hostile form he was now entering Madam Glanvil's principality. The coach was at the church door before we had finished our inspection of various old family monuments and tablets of our own.

We came out at the old Lych gate, just as the two black footmen were drawn up in the usual form to usher Madam into the coach. But there was a variety in the ceremonial, to me terribly significant. Amice, instead of lingering behind, as usual, for a greeting from my father, was marshalled before her grandmother, who followed her without turning round for the imperial but friendly Jupiter nod with which she usually favoured us. For a moment I caught sight of Amice's face leaning eagerly forward and looking very pale. In another moment, by a stormy flash from Madam Glanvil's steel-grey eyes, I saw that her not seeing us was positive, not negative. Then the blind was drawn violently down, the footmen sprang up behind, and the horses pranced demonstratively away.

By this I knew that Madam Glanvil had heard of the abolition meeting, and that sentence had gone forth between us and Amice.

"I thought Miss Glanvil was your greatest friend, Bride?" Cousin Crichton said.

"She was," I almost gasped, my heart beating violently; "she is, she always will be."

He looked amused at the solemnity and terseness of my protest.

"Preoccupied to-day?"

"It is the abolition meeting," my father interposed.

"Ah, I remember. Her father was a West India planter. The young lady has slave property. I see."

"Indeed," Cousin Crichton, I said, "you don't see! She is more fervent for abolition, for emancipation,—than any one. We can all talk. That is easy enough. But she suffers."

"The old lady does not approve?"

"Approve!" I said. That mild phrase applied to Madam Glanvil's sentiments, indicated the depth of Cousin Crichton's want of comprehension. "She is furious, mad, against it, against missionaries, against philanthropy, against Clapham, against every one and everything that dares touch on the subject."

"Ah!" said genial Cousin Crichton, "very unpleasant for the poor girl! But not even fathers or mothers, much less grandmothers, must stand in the way. It is written, we all know, 'Cut off the right hand, Pluck out the right eye.'"

"Unpleasant!" yes, I should think it would be unpleasant for Amice! In the bitterness of my heart I said to myself that unpleasantness was the sharpest form of martyrdom Clapham knew, or chose to know in its own person. The plucking out of the right eye, being so rich, it naturally paid to have done by proxy—by Germans, Methodists, Baptist shoemakers. I was as unjust to prosperous Clapham as Madam Glanvil. Talking was so easy; and yet to me the talking to-morrow evening would actually be cutting off the right hand. My only consolation was to go and sit with Loveday. She knew, at all events, something of what right hands and right eyes meant; although for her, dear soul, the crushing and cutting had been done by an irresistible Hand, and had only been made her own act by acquiescence.

She was resting on the long cushioned window-seat, beside her a little table with a great nosegay of flowers from the conservatories at Court. Amice sent one, or when she could, brought it, every Saturday.

She had brought that yesterday.

That little trifling token of kindness melted me out of my lofty heroics. I burst into tears, and pointing to the flowers said—

“Oh, Loveday! It is the last! She will never bring them again.”

Loveday started.

“Amice ill?” she said. “What has happened? My dear, I am afraid my deafness increases, I am so stupid. I must have heard wrong.”

“No,” I sobbed. “The meeting; the meeting to-morrow! She was not allowed to speak to us to-day.”

Loveday leant back. Her lips quivered a little, but instead of tears came that smile of hers which was like music.

“It is beginning, dear child,” she said; “at last it is beginning!” taking my hand. “You know it must have come. And she is ready. It has not come before she was quite ready.”

“But I am not ready!” I said.

“No; naturally. We never are ready for our dearest to suffer. Therefore the cup is not in our hands.”

“But not to stand by her! Not to be able to help her in the least!”

“You can help her, Bride. You know how. And the bitter cup itself will help her more. It is good, Bride, it is God’s best to give us to drink ever so little of the cup He drank of; the cup itself strengthens, Bride,” she said, with the conviction of one who has tasted. “After so many thousand years, do you think the Master does not know how to mix the bitter herbs?”

The Anti-Slave-Trade Meeting was not impressive as to quality or quantity, “rank or fashion;” no chariots as at Freemasons’ Hall, no titles, clerical or lay.

We had one clergyman, a young man recently appointed to one of the parishes bordering on the Moor. Shy, he looked, and gentle, and rather overwhelmed by the prominence that had to be given to him. We had our one physician, and much to Dr. Kenton's credit it was that he came, running counter by that act to the prejudices of Miss Felicity and of his patroness, Madam Glanvil. Madam Glanvil, indeed, had never been known to be in need of a physician. But in attending this evening Dr. Kenton must have counted the cost to science and to himself, and must have known that whatever happened in the future, he abandoned the inmates of Court to being systematically "lowered" into the grave.

There were several small tradesmen attending at some risk of loss; there was one Methodist farmer, brought by John Wesley's "Thoughts on Slavery;" there were numbers of mechanics and labourers, many of them from our foundry and timber-yard; and there were all our Sunday-school children—the boys very impressive in stamping applause, when they understood it was allowed.

My father took the chair. The forms of "moving and seconding" seemed like parodies in that confidential little gathering. But Cousin Crichton was rigid in his adherence to them.

It seemed scarcely worth while to have summoned Cousin Crichton from London, and to have severed such ties, just to spread a little information among a few people, all of whom we knew, and to whom we could say so much more in confidence any day!

At least my cowardly heart said so.

But might not the same be said of all symbols? Was there not a moment in life when two people clasping hands before a few others meant union for life and death? Were not nearly all the testing acts of life from the first recorded, in themselves mere trifles, such as the plucking of one fruit?

Had there not been a moment when the future of the world depended on a hundred and twenty men and women, most of them poor and unlettered, meeting together in an upper chamber to confess that they believed One to be alive who was said to be dead, and waited for some gift He had promised?

Poor little meeting in the Abbot's Weir market-room! It meant something, perhaps, even above. It symbolized enough indeed to me.

But just as my father was beginning his speech, one figure quietly entered, and remained just inside the door, whose arrival took away all doubt as to the significance of the symbol to me.

Veiled and cloaked as the figure was, I knew it at once. It was Amice Glanvil.

My father recognised her also. I knew by the little tremulousness in his voice.

An officious porter would have placed for her a chair of honour, but my father motioned him to be quiet.

She did not remain cloaked. As the speeches went on, she threw aside her cloak, and her hood fell back unconsciously as she leant forward, listening, quite calm, and apparently seeing no one, but with a steady fire in her eyes.

I trembled, now, lest Cousin Crichton should say any severe indiscriminating things against the planters, as if they were all Neros, which she could not bear to bear.

But severity was not his weakness; and the audience was not impassioned enough to sweep an orator on into any wild statements.

Cousin Crichton began with praising everybody whom he could praise. And then a new and paralyzing fear came over me that he would round off a period with "heroic women forsaking their parents, and cutting off right hands." But happily either the bad light of our tallow candles saved him from the discovery, or his better genius interposed.

He much commended the shy young clergyman.

Conservative as he was, true to Church and King, Lords and Commons, and all the details of our inimitable constitution, he confessed he regretted that in this instance the Upper House had scarcely taken the lead in good works, as might have been hoped. The Bill for the abolition of the abominable trade had once passed the Commons, but never yet the Lords. We were told indeed that "not many noble" (in my presence he did not venture on the "not many rich"). "But he rejoiced to tell them—if they did not already know—that among those doubly ennobled by being first in this noble cause were their own Earl and Countess of Abbot's Weir; and that one at least of the royal dukes, the Duke of Gloucester, was with us. (Prolonged cheers.)

"He would have been glad also, loyal as any man in England to his Church, if her ministers, or, at all events, her bishops, had led their flocks in this crusade. But the bishops, as a body, had not yet taken this position. Two of their number, however, were firm supporters—Bishop Porteus, of London, and Bishop Horsley, of St. Asaph's. The exceptional names deserved mention, much as one regretted their being exceptional."

Then, with a tribute to the young clergyman present, to John Wesley, to the Quakers, and to my father, each of which brought its meed of cheering, and gradually warmed the audience into a readiness to receive the facts he had to relate, he began the serious portion of his speech.

First of all the decrease instead of increase of the slave population through cruelty and toil, which was the originating cause of the Trade; the inciting of the natives of Africa to war; the kidnapping and packing in the hold of the ship, illustrated by a large copy of Mr. Clarkson's dreadful diagram; the statistics of death on the voyage. Thus, in a calm, English, business-like way he went over the whole terribly familiar ground.

He would not dwell on isolated instances of excess or of cruelty. There was isolated excess in a thousand directions, among our parish apprentices, among our seamen. It was the cruelty involved in the mildest form under the mildest task-master, owner, or overseer, the cruelty inevitable in the traffic, on which he insisted. Unless the toil and the punishments in the plantations were such as to crush a race, a tropical race, it must be remembered, working in a climate congenial to them, the population would not have to be recruited from Africa, and the trade would not be needed. Unless a system of savage warfare, secret attacks, burning villages, kidnapping, and wrongs unutterable, were encouraged in Africa, the trade would not be possible.

Then he went into the history of the struggle, giving their due to John Woolman, Antony Benazet, Leonhard Dober, the Moravians and Wesleyans, and the American Quakers, and alluding to the labours of Granville Sharp and of Clarkson, and to the championship of Mr. Wilberforce, he concluded with a contrast between the professions of liberty, equality, and fraternity in France which had ended in this invasion of San Domingo, and in the imprisonment of Toussaint, the greatest negro, in the dungeon on the Jura—and the freedom based on a religion and a constitution like our own; between the noisy explosion of revolution ending in despotism to the white, and slavery for the black, and the great patient struggle against wrong, carried on now from the Houses of Parliament to every corner of our country, and before long, as he believed, to end triumphantly, or, rather, as he dared to hope, to begin a fresh era of conflict and victory, by the abolition of the slave-trade.

And all the time I was listening, not in my own person, but in that of Amice Glanvil.

When Cousin Crichton closed, I ventured to steal another look at her face. It was full of a great joy, although I could see it was wet with tears.

The young clergyman pronounced a benediction. We sang the Doxology; and then the meeting broke up.

Amice caught my eye, and I rose instinctively to move towards her. But she looked very grave, shook her head, motioned me away, and in another moment, with her rapid movements, had cloaked herself, and disappeared from the room.

I was anxious how she would get home. But before I could say so, Piers had disappeared, and did not return among us until he had watched her safely inside the gate.

At the gate she turned and shook hands with him; but she said nothing.

And as Piers came back he met Reuben Pengelly on the same errand.

"Poor lamb!" said Reuben. "We say the words, but she has to carry the wood for the sacrifice."

I felt sure I understood what she meant. She would resist her grandmother's will for what she deemed a duty, a confession of the right. But she would not by that means win for herself one moment of pleasant intercourse with us.

When should I know what or how she had suffered? Loveday said we did know how she endured, and that was much.

I knew sooner than I expected.

The next morning a letter came from Amice, saying, "I have told Granny I mean to see you, and to wish you good-bye. Come this afternoon to the old hollow trunk that hangs over the violet bank, by the river, just inside the gate. It is begun, Bride. I feel that my work, the work for me, has begun. And it will not be left unfinished."

When I came to the old trunk we had sat on so often, she was there. She took my hands and kissed them. I would have thrown my arms around her, but she would not have it.

"I am one of them, Bride," she said, "not by condescension or sympathy; but really, literally, by birthright. Granny says my mother, my father's wife, was a slave. Therefore I have a right to care for them. You see I am scarcely myself freeborn."

And as she said so, her eyes kindled, her form rose into such a majesty, and her face so shone with the feeling and purpose of the soul, as to give one some conception of what might be meant by a "spiritual body." Free-born indeed she was; free-born in the old Teutonic sense, every inch and every thought of her, free, that is, noble; possessor of herself and of who could say what besides, free and royal as the heir of a hundred generations of royalty.

"Granny would never have told me," she said, "unless she had been beside herself with anger. And I believe she would give much to have the words unsaid. It happened in this way. It was on Sunday afternoon, as we drove to church. On a bit of old wall fronting the gate was one of the advertisements, and in the large letters, 'Anti-Slavery Meeting, Monday evening,' and 'Piers Danescombe in the chair.' She was there in the morning, but she had not seen it. Instantly she leant out of window and stopped the carriage.

"Cato and Cæsar came to the window looking very conscious and sheepish.

"'Tear down that,' she said.

"She was too angry for epithets.

"The poor fellows tore the paper into shreds.

"'Take up the shreds,' said she, "and carry them to Mr. Danescombe's counting-house to-morrow with my compliments, and tell him I shall prosecute with the utmost rigour of the law whoever dared to fix that vile trash on my walls. Now drive on.'

"Cato trembled, but I caught sight of a grin on Cæsar's face as he retired.

"'Now,' she said, turning to me, 'when did you know of this?'

"'Some weeks since,' I said.

"'And that little silky creature from the town, too,' said she. 'Fool that I was to expect more from your mother's child.'

"And in that frame of mind we entered the church.

"How we left it you know.

"As for me, I could not help being more than half on her side. How could it look to her, but as a long course of concealment? How could she understand all the reasons which made us feel it hopeless to tell her beforehand? her deafness, her imperiousness, the hopelessness of arguing with her, the impossibility of abandoning what we considered right.

"Before the evening I should have made a determined effort, and told her all I felt, cost her and me what it might; and it might have ended, after a storm, in our understanding each other better than before.

"But for those words 'your mother's child!'

I think she would have withdrawn them, if she could, and have concentrated her anger on you and your father. But she could not tear the words out of my heart; nor could I suffer all she said of you.

"I need not tell you that, Bride; it would be ungenerous and unjust, You know her; and how much, and how little, such words mean."

I knew, indeed, that Madame Glanvil did deal largely in superlatives, although not at all in the style of the superlatives of Clapham.

"However, she roused me beyond endurance. I defended you,—I could not help it,—and said a thousand vehement things, which of course had a doubly vehement effect, shouted close to her ear. It is so difficult under the calmest circumstances, to discuss anything with a deaf person without seeming in a passion.

"I said you and your father were the very soul of truth and honour.

"Then she turned on me and said again,—

"'She had been a fool to expose me to low hypocritical influences, but that no influence would ever have persuaded a true Glanvil to do what I had done. What could the child of a slave know of honour?'

"As usual, her own passionate words, once uttered, cooled her.

"She became reasonable, and would have softened them.

"'I mean no insult to your mother or your poor father,' she said. 'She was a faithful wife and a good woman, they say, and her birth was not her own fault, however her beauty may have been his ruin. The misfortune was his, the fault was his, or her Spanish forefathers', at whose door it lies that these beautiful half-castes exist. I am sorry I said anything.' (She was actually apologizing to me for my birth.) 'Forget it, child. We will both forget and forgive. But never talk to me, and never expect me to tolerate one of that Danescombe set again.'

"And she did say very bitter and untrue things; more than I felt I ought to bear. I was perfectly calm then. And when I am quite calm I can always make Granny hear without shouting. I spoke quite slowly, so that she must hear, and I could see that she heard.

"First of all, naturally, I defended you; and then I said, 'Granny, I thank you more than I can say for what you have told me. For now my duty is clear. If my mother was a slave, the slaves are her kindred, and mine. I have a duty to her race and mine, not only because they are men and women—because God made them and our Lord redeemed them—but because they are my mother's people. And in one way or another, I will devote myself, body, soul, and substance, to helping and serving them in every way I can, as long as I live.'

"She did not storm any more, poor Granny. She looked actually bewildered and frightened, and began to contradict herself.

"Your mother was not exactly a slave,' she said, 'when my poor George married her. She had been, as an infant; but her parents were set free in San Domingo. They were more than half Spaniards: Musteers I think they were called in our islands. Three parts white, or more. They were free, and living on a plantation of their own, with this their only daughter, when your father saw her.

"Poor George! I cannot blame him much; though I did blame him bitterly, more than I should, perhaps. I am a hot-tempered old woman, now; at all events. She could not help her beauty, and no woman he loved could help loving him. Poor fellow! I wrote to him again before she died, and sent some jewels for her; and she sent me a pretty message, poor thing. And then she died, and he died, and there were none left but you and me. And you have been not so bad a child, or would not have been, but for those hypocrites. So let us forget and forgive.'

"It was much harder, Bride, to oppose her gentle, and pleading tenderly, like that.

"I ventured to take her hand. It was rigid, but she let me keep it in both mine.

"Dear Granny, I can never forget, I must never forget. I will be your own child, if you will let me, as long as you live. But now, and always, next to you, I will, I must, I ought to care for my mother's people and my father's servants, his slaves, and my kindred. My mother's people must be mine.'

"The little gleam of rare softness and tenderness vanished.

"She snatched her hand from me and went up-stairs. I took her candle as usual and followed her up to her bedroom. At the door she turned and said, with a concentration of suppressed passion, 'You may sit at my table still, if you like, being your father's child; as long as I live, as you say. And then, if you please, you may go to your mother's relations, to the King of Dahomey, to the Pope of Rome, or the Methodist madmen, or wherever you please. I dare say you will not have long to wait.'

"And so," Amice concluded, "I do sit at her table; and neither of us speaks a word. Her heart—poor dear Granny—burning with wounded love and pride, and a sense of bitter ingratitude and wrong; and mine overflowing with pity which I cannot utter or look; with reverence for all the long reticence which my many provocations never made her break through during all these years; and with sympathy for what she must feel about my 'wilful folly and heartless ingratitude.' Never once to have suffered me to see a glimpse of a fact which she believed must have at any moment brought me down on my knees in abject humiliation and subjection! And when she brought out this terrible, irresistible weapon, faithfully concealed so long, to find it indeed terrible and irresistible, but altogether turned, as she must feel, against herself. The thing I am most sorry for as regards myself and you, Bride!" she resumed, "is this appearance of concealment about the meeting. I don't think we could have done otherwise. But this made me more resolved to throw off all disguise, and come to the meeting myself. I thought over it all Sunday night, Bride. I hope it did not look like bravado, or any reflection on my father. You think I did right?"

"I am sure," I said, "it was not bravado; it was confession; and how are we to help confession looking like bravado sometimes to those who hate what we confess we believe?"

"Yes," she said. "And for those who are gone, whom we cannot see or consult any more, I always feel we must try to do, not what they would perhaps have wished when they saw in part, but what they would wish now that they see 'face to face;' that is, as far as we can find it out. And I think there is no doubt what would be wished in heaven as to not driving black men like brutes, or as to teaching slaves of Him who makes us all free."

"No doubt at all, I should think," I replied, "as to what is thought in heaven about the slave-trade."

"No," she said; "so I came."

"And now, Bride," she said, "good-bye. You may kiss me if you like, now you know I am the daughter of a slave."

"But why good-bye, Amice?" I said. "You told Madam Glanvil;—and now you are fairly in opposition!"

"For shame, Bride!" she said. "I shall begin to think 'Methodism,' as Granny calls it, does lead to insurrection, as she says.

I belong to the Church of England, and believe in the Catechism; and if I have any leaning to any other form of Christianity it is to the Moravians, who are the most conservative and submissive people upon earth. In my great-aunt Prothesea's hymn-book, there are whole sections of hymns on the stillness and resignation of the heart, on patience in inward and outward tribulation, on poverty and lowliness of spirit. Do you know, Bride," she said, with one of her brightest sudden smiles, "I really feel in some way nearer Granny now, and love her better than before. I am not sure sometimes that I do not really love her more than I love you or any one, as I ought perhaps always to have done, and never could do. I am so sorry for her. In every possible thing, Bride, I will submit to Granny, as far as possible; and in this thing, which costs me more than anything, most of all. I have told Granny that you and Mr. Danescombe, and Piers, are noble as Norman conquerors and crusaders, and saints and angels, of better blood than the Glanvils, and ten times better Christians than any of us. And I have also told her that until she sanctions it, I will not see one of you again."

There was no moving her. She had "begun" indeed; as Loveday had said. We neither of us said "good-bye."

We just gave each other one long kiss, and turned and went home our different ways.

So, as it seemed to me, the sun was blotted out of my life; and Amice's warfare began.

CHAPTER XXIX.

COUSIN CRICHTON went away in a state of radiant satisfaction.

"Who said the tone of Christianity in these days was lowered? Who said people were not ready to cut off the right hand, to go to the rack, the block, the stake, if duty demanded?" His sense of "solidarité" in such matters was keen, although the word was yet unborn. He felt, I am sure, as if he had cut off his own right hand, metaphorically. That is, he felt the virtuous satisfaction, and rejoiced in us who had to bear the pain. For Court was closed to us, as absolutely as any Bastille.

Of all our circle only Cousin Dick Fyford and the vicar continued to enter those dear old gates between the savage heraldic griffins.

And Dick's reports were anything but cheerful or cheering. I began almost to believe he had really fallen in love as I had "fallen in friendship" so long ago, deeply, hopelessly, and for ever.

"The gates of Court were like the gates of Dante's hell," he said. (He had been cultivating poetry of the severest and gloomiest kind. Byron was not yet available—had not yet written his satire on "English Bards and Scotch Reviewers." Despairing young persons had therefore to draw from deeper sources, and Dick had found a translation of Dante in Uncle Fyford's library congenial.)

"Abandon all hope, ye who enter here,"

"Lasciate ogni speranza voi ch'entrate," was, he considered, breathing out of the savage mouth of those heraldic griffins, written like ancient Hebrew texts on the posts of the doors, furrowed on the faces, black and white, of domestic and host. Only to find a similitude for Amice had he to rise to another book of the Divine Comedy.

She was radiant, angelic—more than angelic—tender and good as a dear child, beneficent, gracious, imperial, and, alas! far off as the Madonna Beatrice.

Madam Glanvil never spoke to her. Nor could it be said Madam Glanvil spoke graciously to any one. She seemed, he said, in a kind of way, defying the world to come nearer to her than the child she was thus rigidly keeping from her.

"Very strange," said Dick; "it seems as if those two really loved each other better than before."

I remembered Amice's words.

I thought it was very probably true. Madam Glanvil's speech was at no time exactly conciliatory, or calculated to promote tender feeling.

Perhaps the two were going through a "discipline of silence," as Claire suggested, and it was doing them both good.

But then, for a moment, came a little foolish pang, whether it could be possible that Amice was really not only outwardly but inwardly submitting to her grandmother's will, and making a sacrifice of me in her heart. She was not a woman to do things by halves. And if her conscience did get the upper hand of her good sense, it might possess her like a demon, and lead her to do anything, everything that was hard and dreadful and agonizing to herself. It is just of such strong, true, passionate, steadfast natures martyrs are made; of such natures, a little twisted, anchores, faqueers, Simon Stylites.

And I, feebler, smaller, with less rangeless tone, like a harpsichord to an organ, like my stepmother's spinet to the organ in Westminster Abbey, as I was beside Amice; yet she had always called me her "good-in-everything," her "good genius of common-sense." And I was not near to plead for myself or for her. And Dick said she never mentioned me, never asked for any of us, never alluded to us.

Did it mean that she was really giving me up; or did it only mean she trusted without the shadow of a fear that I would always trust her without the shadow of a doubt?

Yes, it meant that. In all my sane moments I was sure it meant that.

Loveday never had the least doubt it meant that.

Nor had she the least shadow of a doubt who would conquer in that contest between Amice and her grandmother. "Love is stronger than Death," she said, "and than all the shadows of death. After all, death, that is, hatred, pride, selfishness, has only shadows for its weapons, and can only conquer shadows. And Amice's love and truth and faith are no shadows. She will overcome sooner or later: she will conquer evil by good. And I think it will be soon."

It did not seem soon to me. And the evil thing which severed Amice and me seemed to me at all events a very substantial negation, as substantial as the negation of a rock to a ship breaking to pieces on it.

It was a time of negations and partings.

At last, Piers was able to fulfil his desire of paying a visit to France.

He had no need to gather fresh details as to the situation of the château where Claire had passed her childhood. That, I knew, was what the journey to France chiefly signified to him: but even I never said so, even to him. And to any one else it seemed the most natural thing in the world that any young Englishman, who was able, should take advantage of the closing of the war-gates, to enter the land those open gates had closed to us so long, and might close again so soon.

Madam Glanvil was the only person who looked censoriously on the expedition. And that she did so, was only implied in an observation Dick heard her make to Uncle Fyford.

"The First Consul is doing one good work, at all events," she said. "He is converting the Whigs. I understand he says he could buy all the French Republicans with a little money and gold-lace. He seems to buy ours without any such expenditure. Charles Fox was hand and glove with him, I understand, in Paris. No wonder if the small fry follow."

"You will pay homage, my friend," said Madame des Ormes, when Piers came to her room to take leave, "to Madame, or Son Altesse, the First Consulee, or whatever they call her, the Creole wife of the Corsican. They say she has a fine Court at the Tuileries, and dresses well. They have set up the opera again. Scarcely necessary, I should have thought. That new theatre at the Tuileries must be more attractive. And Italians and Creoles have talents for the drama, frequently. Of the older noblesse you will find more in England—I had almost said at Abbot's Weir—than at Paris. M. Buonaparte's corps dramatique is complete now, I hear. They have a Church as well as a Court; priests who take the oath to violate the confessional if the government demands information about what it is pleased to call a Plot; bishops appointed by the Corsican, and all the clergy paid by him. It is quite complete, and all absolutely in the Manager's hands."

"Mamma," said Claire colouring, "M. Piers said he would inquire about our dear old curé at Les Ormes. At all events he has not taken that oath."

"No, indeed; many of the old priests are in prison. God bless them," replied Madame. "See, my children," she added, "I grow bitter! Do not the books of piety tell us that all earthly glory is tinsel, all courts but a stage? Only some tinsel is in better taste. There is gilt paper and ornolu. And to us, children of time that we are, a thousand years will seem longer than yesterday."

"Mamma," said Claire in a whisper. "It has done one good work, that new government. It has abolished the festival for the guillotining of our king."

"That is always something," Madame conceded. "And the Fast for the Day of his Martyrdom, the prayers, and the weeping, no power in France or out of it can abolish."

"And," suggested sanguine Claire, "they have abolished the Decade, and restored the Week, and the Sunday, and opened the churches."

"Condescending certainly to old-fashioned people, so let them say September and Sunday, once more," Madame admitted.

"There is nothing you can give me to do, Madame?" said Piers.

"My friend," she replied, "my living are here. My dead only are there. Would you have me send you on a pilgrimage to tombs and ruins? I cannot even guide you to those! Our people are industrious. They will not let even the stones of our ruined Châteaux be wasted. They will have built useful little bourgeois houses with them. But the King, the Queen, Madame Elizabeth—who will tell you even where they sleep, that you might weep for them? My dead in France have no tombs. It is not until the third or fourth generation that men build the sepulchres of the prophets."

"Mamma, pleaded Claire, "there is M. le Curé, who instructed me for my first communion. He was so good, and all the people loved him. And there were many who would like to hear of us, of you, if M. Piers were near Les Ormes, any day."

"Ma chérie, Les Ormes is near nothing, except Port Royal des Champs. There are tombs at all events, although trampled on and in ruins."

"Madame," said Piers, glancing at Claire, "I will certainly make a pilgrimage to Port Royal des Champs."

"Strange that I have not an introduction to offer you," she said. "It was not so ten years ago. Stay, I will write a little letter for our poor curé."

"Mamma," murmured Claire. "My uncle, l'Abbé, says the First Consul has a strong secret police, and at the head of it a terrible M. Fouché, who was a Jacobin. If compromising letters were found——"

"True," replied Madame. "Take this," she said; and opening a little cachette, she took out a signet ring and placed it on his finger.

"This is our family devise," she said. "M. le Curé will recognise its bearer as a friend, and will tell you anything he can. Or any of our old servants. But what dreams am I indulging? Who knows where the curé is, or the church? And our old servants may have been made conscripts and killed long ago; or republicans, and may denounce you; or proprietors, and not too anxious for news to disturb their possession; or they may have been massacred, or noyaded as faithful men and women. Take care, my friend, how you use that token. But keep it always, if you will, as a memorial of the old days of our race, and of all the chivalrous kindness of you and yours to an old French citizenne. It is not a bad motto," she concluded—"'Foi, roi, loi,' in a circle—so that no one can say which comes first. Make it Divine, my friend, and then certainly it matters little where the circle begins."

He kissed her hand, as we had been used to do from childhood, grasped Claire's for an instant, and went away.

He was to start the next evening.

It was his birthday, in January, the month which had once given and taken away so much, in our home.

I went up to his room to help him pack, or rather to talk while he was packing. He was always independent of feminine aid in that matter. But carefully as I had looked over everything, there might yet be some stray button or string to sew on.

He talked very fast. He was in high spirits.

Once more it was a beginning for him, and felt like an ending for me.

"It is very unreasonable," he said, as he gave a last impressive stamp to his carpet-bag, "to feel as if I were going to do something important. It is scarcely farther, in time, to the French coast than to Clapham, scarcely as far, if the wind is fair."

"No," I said. "We have heard enough of that lately from Dick. He says the French say they could be in London in a few hours, from Boulogne. And he would greatly like to be under Nelson's command and to see them try."

"I hope they will wait till I come back, and have accomplished my mission, whatever it is," he said.

"Do you remember years and years and years ago," I said, "when you were a little boy, and when first we met Claire, and when Claire kissed me with the fool's cap on, and you said 'it would be worth while to do something like that for her,' and I said, 'there was nothing to be done;' and you said something always came to be done when it was the right time."

"Bride," he said, stooping over the port-manteau, and energetically snapping the lock. "Your grammar is getting very confused. Unhappily you never went to Mr. Rabbidge's and learnt about aorists and imperfects, and narrative tenses. Something has never come, you see. And to go to France to look for it does seem what Uncle Fyford would call Utopian and Mr. Rabbidge chimerical."

"Yet you are going," I said.

"It would be something to find there was nothing to be done," he answered. "To find, that is to say, that France can do nothing for her; and, so, that there may indeed be something for us to do for her."

And so the next morning, to Madame Glanvil's indignation, to Madame des Ormes's perplexity, and a little to Claire's, but full of purpose and hope, which, as usual with him, came out but little in words, in the crisp January frost, he went off across the moors to the sea.

THE EDITOR'S ROOM.

I.—HOME NOTES.

LABOURERS FROM MANY LANDS.

NO doubt among the men that laboured on the walls of Jerusalem under Nehemiah there were some that liked the sword better than the chisel and mallet, but there were not a few, we may be sure, that, despite their prosaic character, liked the chisel and mallet better than the sword. Comparisons are odious: both were necessary; the chisel and the mallet could have done nothing without the protection of the sword, and the sword could have effected no positive and permanent good without the chisel and mallet. Building up, however, is essentially a more satisfactory process than fighting—more godlike in itself, and yielding a more godlike pleasure. The sight of men actually passing from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan to God; the sight of the wilderness and the solitary place becoming glad, and the desert rejoicing and blossoming as the rose; and the sight of the building growing into an holy temple in the Lord, is refreshing to the spirit both of God and man. We ask our readers to take a seat with us at a quiet dinner-table in a private house, on occasion of one of the recent gatherings of labourers from different parts of the vineyard; and though the company is casually gathered, mark how many forms and modes of Christian activity they represent.

Here, first of all, is our good and noble friend, John Bost of Laforce, with a face radiant with faith, hope, and charity—far more so indeed than would be inferred from his portrait some years ago in this Magazine,—telling of his five blessed institutions, to which he is now about to add a sixth, supported at an annual cost of five thousand pounds, for the whole of which he is dependent on the spontaneous offerings of Christian friends. Under his wide-spreading wing the lunatic, the epileptic, the idiot, the imbecile, and afflicted persons of almost every type find shelter, and treatment, and overflowing Christian love, not to be met with (for Protestants) in any other institution in France. Here too evangelical religion presents its most winning recommendation; the real soul of Bible religion is seen in the work of faith and labour of love; and an impression of Protestantism is conveyed constraining men to feel that a religion so heavenly in its fruits must be heavenly in its origin. Glad are we to see that with all his heavy charge years sit so lightly on our friend's frame; his locks still bushy and black as the raven; no approach as yet to a "barren head," either in the ordinary or in his own peculiar sense of the term, when, as he still tells with much glee, on his first visit to Scotland he begged the indulgence of the General Assembly, seeing he was a Frenchman, and had never addressed an audience with so many "barren heads."

Next him, wearing a massive turban of white linen, that makes his swarthy face look more swarthy still, and, with the other peculiarities of an Eastern dress, is a converted Brahmin, Nerayun Sheshadri, for many years past an active and successful missionary in western India. He is wonderfully at home with the English language, more so, indeed, than Mr. Bost, who looks so much more like an Englishman. He is an excellent and impressive preacher of the Gospel,—simple, sensible, and spiritual; and in his own country he has combined the active missionary, the successful organizer of Christian labour, and the social reformer. Along a line of a hundred and twenty miles in length he has planted a chain of native Christian agents, catechists, teachers, colporteurs, and what not; and he has lately originated a Christian village, for which the children in Scotland have furnished the means (not inconsiderable) of building a well. His wife, we understand, is like-minded, and does valuable work in his absence in the way of superintending his varied organizations. To see and hear such a man goes a great way in refuting not a few of the disparaging stories we so often hear about the success of missions.

Two missionaries from India, one Scotch and the other American, and a missionary's wife, are also in the group. All have borne their share, and that in many forms, of the heat and burden of the day. In teaching, in the training of native agents, in translations, in Christian literature, in itinerating work, in Zenana labours, and even in Christian colonisation, they have done their part. They exemplify what one delights to find in missionaries of the higher type—the concentrating of the heart on individual conversions, as the only way of truly evangelising a heathen country, yet letting their desires and their efforts go forth in suitable arrangements for every species of domestic and social amelioration. As to the Christian colony which one of them has been engaged in promoting in India, we do not happen to have precise information; but whether it be a locality where British families of the humbler class may settle, in a somewhat healthier climate, and more adapted to bring up children, or one where converted natives may enjoy the full benefit of Christian fellowship, as an aid to the spiritual life, it is a valuable adjunct to the more peculiar work of the missionary.

Next we come on a minister, from the interior of the United States, who gives us very interesting information of what we may almost call a lost tribe of the house of Israel. About twenty-five years ago, as some of our readers may remember, there occurred a remarkable awakening among some of the Portuguese in the island of Madeira. Dr. Kalley, an earnest Christian physician, was the main instrument of the change. Mr. Hewitson, a Scotch minister, remarkable for his spirituality of character, was a helper in the work. The place became too hot for the converts. They were driven from Madeira, and thrown upon the world. Their case excited no little interest in the Christian Church at the time. Ultimately, they proceeded to the United States, and obtained a settlement in Illinois. In the interval between that time and the present, we confess that they had vanished from our remembrance. What was our satisfaction to find that they had settled in the immediate neighbourhood of our friend's residence, and are enjoying a fair share of prosperity? Better still, they continue steadfast in the Protestant faith, forming two congregations which, though still Portuguese, are probably on the fair way to undergo the absorption in the American race and the English tongue, which sooner or later all emigrants to that country must undergo. They have shown no tendencies back to Rome, but continue to cherish the hope that gladdened them when they first came to know "Christ in them the hope of glory."

In our group, there are several home labourers, with distinctive fields of work, two of whom we must notice. One is the Secretary of the Irish Colportage Society. He has but lately entered on his work. But he reports most encouragingly of it, and is full of the hope that it is to prove the means of great good to Ireland. Nor is it only in the North of Ireland that he finds a hopeful field. In the Roman Catholic districts also, he finds an encouraging sphere. The truth is, he says, the Roman Catholics have been pretty well educated, and their minds are groping after knowledge. They are by no means likely to remain long under the influence of the priests. To a large extent, they have broken away from it already. But what they may turn to—whether to infidelity or to the Bible—remains to be seen. Possibly, like the people of France or Italy—to infidelity and irreligion; but rather let us hope, through God's blessing, to a sincere and earnest biblical religion. We can think of nothing better fitted to stir men up to encourage the Colportage Society.

The other labourer is a lady—busy with the emigration of children. It is a branch of philanthropy akin to that of the Ragged School; only instead of waiting till the children (in this case girls) are ready for service or situations in this country, the arrangement is to dispatch them to Canada, after they have received some Christian training here, and commit them to the care, first of Miss Macpherson and her coadjutors, and then of the families where such children are readily and cordially received. We learn that some five-and-twenty children, after receiving a winter's training, not only in Christian truth and in the ordinary branches of education, but especially in domestic duties, are just on the eve of leaving the country and emigrating to Canada. The details of this movement are of the most interesting kind; we are shown photographs, making it apparent to the naked eye that the change to the children is like a change from death to life, and we learn that the arrangements are carried on in that trustful and prayerful spirit which, believing that the work is God's, believes also that He will provide the means, and send the blessing. Happy workers in a blessed service! may the Great Master encourage all your hearts and multiply your number even a hundred-fold!

CHURCH PROCEEDINGS IN EDINBURGH.

The ecclesiastical flood-tide of May sets in somewhat mildly in the beginning of the month with the meeting of the Reformed Presbyterians, gathers more volume as the larger body of United Presbyterians assemble in the middle, and becomes a great tidal wave, flooding the city, when Established and Free Church Assemblies muster together at the end of the month. Of all dissenting bodies, none has stood firm for so long a time to its original position as the Reformed Presbyterians. Dating from the days of Richard Cameron and the Revolution of 1688, and continuing from generation to generation in its place outside the Establishment, it has testified continuously against the defects which it found at first in the Revolution settlement. A few years ago, however, the majority took a position in advance, or as the few who separated from them thought, a step backward; and now, advancing still further, they are willing to unite with their Nonconformist brethren. But the great union scheme between the Free Church and the United Presbyterians having failed for the present, the smaller body of Reformed Presbyterians is left in a great dilemma, quite willing to unite with both, but by no means disposed to unite with the one apart from the other. For the present there is to be no general union; a scheme by which ministers of the negotiating churches may be called to congregations in any of the several bodies, on their signing its formulas, being the chief legacy of the negotiations of ten long years. We have no desire to enter into the controversy that has arisen, which of the two sides has gained the victory. Formally, there can be no doubt the opponents of union have conquered; but the other side are sure that decided progress has been made toward the consummation, and that the completion of the union, to which the Mutual Eligibility Scheme stands in the relation of a betrothal, is only a question of time. And as a further pledge of this they point to the fact that next year will witness an incorporating union between the representatives of the negotiating churches in England. The opinion seems to have gained strength that a more comprehensive union, in which the Established Church should be embraced, ought ultimately to be aimed at. A great difficulty in the way of this lies in the fact that in the eyes of the Free Church, the Establishment is unwarrantably under the control of the State, while the United Presbyterians object to it as receiving State pay. The whole of the United Presbyterians and the greater part of the Free Church are of opinion that disestablishment, or the renunciation of State control and State pay, is necessary to such a comprehensive union.

While the outer world is chiefly interested in the attitude of these several bodies to each other, many of their friends feel that the internal work of Christian enlightenment and conversion in which they are engaged is in reality more important than the other. And doubtless the various churches have had before them a vast amount of Christian work. They have been attending to their own discipline too, and perfecting their legislative and their executive arrangements. The Established Church has had under review the case of Dr. Wallace, accused of very advanced Broad Church opinions, but the case is not finally disposed of, having been remitted to the Presbytery of Edinburgh. Mr. Knight's case, which would have naturally been before the Free Church Assembly, was postponed in consequence of that gentleman's state of health. Although the nobility and landed classes have to a very large degree left the pale both of the Established and the Nonconformist churches, the contributions raised for their Christian and benevolent objects continue to make steady advance. In spite of all the adverse circumstances of the last thirty years, the Moderator of the Assembly of the Established Church said that she had never more vigour, or more success in her work; while the increasing attachment of their people to the Nonconformist churches is shown by the fact that, in the case of the two largest, the united contributions for the year are not much under £800,000.

IRISH GENERAL ASSEMBLY.

Hardly have the ecclesiastical echoes died away in Edinburgh, when they are heard reverberating in Belfast. Financially, the abolition of Regium Donum has proved a benefit, the new Sustentation Fund having contributed to raise the stipends of the ministers above the former point. As in the case of other churches, the quieter and more obviously useful proceedings, connected with the work of missions, colportage, education, Sunday-schools, and the like, was overshadowed by a great discussion, the subject being, whether instrumental music ought to be allowed in their churches. The subject not being ripe for decision, was virtually postponed to a future day.

DR. HESSEY ON PRAYER FOR THE SICK.

The proposal to test the efficacy of prayer by what was thought to be a crucial experiment in regard to one of the wings of an hospital was pretty thoroughly canvassed at the time, but some additional touches have been given to the argument on the other side by Dr. Hessey in the course of the Boyle Lectures which he is now delivering. He is reported to have said that the proposal "professed no disrespect for prayer, but only desired a quantitative analysis in reference to its effects." Taking the proposer on his own grounds, and accepting his medical terminology, Dr. Hessey suggested to him that in order for a quantitative analysis to come fairly into operation a qualitative analysis must first take place, i.e. it must be ascertained that prayer, which he had debased to the level of a drug, was actually present. He had not done this. In fact, the utterance proposed by him would not be prayer at all. "It absolutely demanded a result, it was not supplicatory or submissive. It was an experiment whether the Almighty would—not an entreaty that He might—grant. It demanded an immediate and sensible result: it did not wait God's time, and content itself till that time should arrive with inward consolations. It was made to be seen of men, it was not to the Father who seeth in secret." Besides, however, thus mistaking the nature of prayer, and neglecting a process which he would have applied of course to material drugs, the proposer had ignored the omniscience of the Almighty, and the impossibility of isolating one of the wards from the action of prayer. These mistakes the lecturer exposed at some length, and concluded with a discussion of the domain of prayer, and a denial that it was limited to petitions for spiritual blessings.

"More things were wrought by prayer Than this world dreams of."

VISIT OF THE SHAH OF PERSIA.

The visit of the Shah of Persia to this country is in many ways a notable fact. In the first place, it is a remarkable evidence, and one of many of the like sort, how much God is bringing the world together. The Duke of Wellington's striking remark in his day, that steam had bridged the English Channel, is now quite out of date. Steam has bridged the Atlantic Ocean, the Pacific, the Indian—indeed all the oceans of the world. The world is getting much more like one State. Prejudices and local customs, good and bad, are yielding to the influence of intercourse with the rest of the world. Evidence is multiplying of the extreme folly and evil of war between nation and nation, and the immense benefit to all, at least in a commercial sense, if the whole of the obstacles to easy intercourse were removed, and a highway existed from country to country all over the globe. There is a mighty call to the Christian churches to increased efforts for the extension of the Gospel, for it is very certain that the dream of universal brotherhood can never be realised without an outpouring of the spirit of Christian brotherly love. Further, it is interesting to us to have among us the successor of that Cyrus and the other Persian monarchs, who hold so conspicuous a place in Old-Testament history. And still further, it is interesting to find our friendship prized by the ruler of so distant a country, and to have the prospect of such a bulwark to our Indian Empire. It is said that the Shah feels a special interest in the manufactures of Great Britain; it is a pity that the living elements of our manufacturing world are in so disturbed a condition. We trust, however, he will see enough of the fruit of intelligence, industry, skill, and self-control to awaken his curiosity as to the deeper sources of our prosperity, and may be led to see how much it depends on the habits formed under the influence of our Bible training.

RACING AND BETTING.

The Derby Day is in more senses than one the climax of English racing. We fear the net results of it can be put down as only evil. It is universally admitted that among those more immediately concerned with the horses, a vast amount of trickery, bribery, and dishonesty in every form is practised. The whole betting system is obviously demoralising. In spite of the protection of Parliament, it is a scene of much and wide-spreading iniquity. Of course it has its attractions, especially to those who choose to shut their eyes to its uglier features. But it can never be too much impressed on all classes, and especially the young, that very often the highest form of duty is to turn away from that which in one aspect is bright and attractive, on the ground that in other respects it is wicked and pernicious. Does the moral and religious training of the day sufficiently recognise this? Is self-denial in such matters habitually and earnestly enjoined in our families, in our schools, and from our pulpits? We greatly doubt it; and until a higher tone is taken in these quarters we fear that racing and betting will increase. The space given to racing news in the secular press is alarming, and we are sorry to observe that some newspapers that might have been expected to act otherwise, are now conspicuously parading their racing and betting intelligence. We need an infusion of Spartan virtues, or rather we need to be reminded that Christian discipleship requires that a man should deny himself, and take up his cross daily to follow his Master.

II.—JOTTINGS FROM THE MISSION FIELD.

THE SPIRIT OF THE ANNUAL REPORTS.

I.—THE LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

We think that it may be useful to give a column month by month to the annual Reports of the great missionary societies, and let our readers know a little more about them than it is possible to do when they are all massed together. And we begin with the London Missionary Society, one of the oldest, and yet, in point of enterprise and vigour, one of the most youthful of them all. Its chief missions are in the South Seas, in India, in the West Indies, in Africa, in Madagascar, and in China. In the first place, it has a favourable report to give of its purse. Taking everything into account, there has been put into the bag no less than £115,070 8s., and of this sum £3,631 7s. 6d. has been contributed by children for a missionary ship. There is not much change in the total number of European missionaries, though several new ones have been sent out, but there is a steady increase in the number and efficiency of the native labourers, who now amount in all to one hundred ordained missionaries, and three thousand native assistants. In the South Sea missions, these native evangelists have been remarkably successful, and in Madagascar many of them are turning out most valuable. Mention is made of a Madagascar preacher who goes about over a large extent of country, usually preaching three times every Sunday, and travelling long distances to reach preaching stations, whose allowance per month from the native mother church is only thirteen shillings. In South Africa a young man of deep Christian spirit has been raised to the influential position of chief of his tribe, and, along with his like-minded brother, seems likely to render most valuable aid to the cause of Christian truth. The close of the Report takes

A Hopeful View of the Future.

"When with glad heart we see all the great nations of the Eastern world quickened by the great stir of life in Christian lands; when we see Japan opening her ports to trade, and inviting the aid of Christian men to improve her laws, re-shape her government and educate her people; when we see China yielding reluctantly and at last, and permitting other nations to hold intercourse with her on equal terms; when the Shah of Persia comes to see the cities and institutions of Christian Europe; and the Sultan of Turkey, the Caliph of the Mahomedan world, desires a responsible ministry, constitutional law, and religious liberty, for the various races of his dominions; when isolation, exclusiveness, ignorance and pride everywhere break down; when the civilised world knocks with a firm hand at the last stronghold of slavery, and demands that the natives of Africa shall no longer be sold, but shall be treated as free men, we cannot but wonder at the enormous results of the earnest zeal, the aggressive life and teaching and example of this great missionary age. The mighty love of the gospel, expanding as the race grows more numerous and spreads more widely, invites them all, the little and the great, barbarian, civilised, bond, and free; it is conquering their vices and superstitions; it is healing all their wrongs; it will not rest till the earth is purified from every stain. Kingdom and king and law it brings to every nation under heaven; and soon the acceptable year of the Lord, a new year of perfect life, and love, and peace, shall be proclaimed to all mankind."

A Voice from Savage Island.

Early at the anniversary meeting there rose up a speaker who said he was only a Savage Islander; but if every speaker at Exeter Hall had as remarkable a tale to tell, the speeches would all be well worth listening to. Savage Island, it appears, is a solitary coral rock, forty miles in circumference, standing all alone in the ocean, four hundred miles from the nearest land; it derived its English name from Captain Cook, who would fain have landed on it, but when he tried to do so, the people rushed on him more like a horde of wild boars than human beings, and the gallant captain was forced to retreat. The natives call their island Niue, and knowing of no other country, they used to consider it the world, and regard themselves as its only inhabitants. "No intoxicating drink was ever known in Niue, and there is now a law in existence," says Mr. Lawes, "and has hitherto been maintained, to prevent the introduction of any foreign spirit into this Good Templar's Paradise." But for all that, they were naturally an extremely savage people. They had no word in their language for hope, and none for sin; the aged and the sick were neglected, parents were often killed by their children, and suicide and infanticide were quite common. The missionary himself had recently had two servants in his family, a young man and a middle-aged woman, the former of whom had killed his father, and the latter five or six children of her own.

The Story of its Evangelisation.

About forty years ago the celebrated missionary, John Williams, landed on the island; but was hurried off just in time to escape a murderous troop whc appeared with their spears and clubs on the cliffs, as his boat was pushing off from the reef. It was nearly twenty years later before they would have the gospel. In fact, they lived in a continual fear of foreigners, and when a vessel came near, they would hurry to their temples and pray that the evil spirits might not be allowed to land, and to bring all manner of disease and calamity to the island. If a native once left the island and returned, he was usually killed, and several crews that had drifted to it were murdered. It was in 1849 that the work of conversion began. Their first missionary was a Christian teacher from Samoa, who might be called for his name was Paolo, and he was a man full of the Holy Ghost, with a remarkable faith in Christ, and deep trust in God, and a firm belief in the power of prayer. Before his death he had the happiness of seeing the whole island outwardly Christian, and a large number enrolled as members of the Christian Church. Very remarkably, this result had taken place before the first European missionary landed in 1861. The missionaries found "the Sabbath observed, a sanctuary in every village, a good road all round the island, the horde of wild boars turned into a peaceful community." All had been effected by the Gospel of Jesus Christ. Native Christians had preached the Gospel of the grace of God, and what was more, they had loved it. This native agency has been wonderfully blest in most things; but there were two things that were quite beyond their power—they could not translate the Scriptures, nor train up a race of pastors. There was not now a dwelling in Savage Island, said Mr. Lawes, from which the voice of prayer and praise did not ascend daily—often, it might be, a mere form, but a form preferable to the power of heathenism. The people had formerly been thieves and robbers; now, in the course of a year but five or six had been convicted of dishonesty. Some of them showed their forgiving Christian spirit by praying for the traders who, by carrying off their young men, did them the cruelest wrong. For Christian ordinances, they subscribed on an average about £230 yearly. In their clothing and their homes they had ceased to be savages, and had given evidence of the civilising power of the Gospel. Trade was now active among them. A literature had begun. Some books of the Bible, school-books, and tracts were in circulation. The same account in substance might be given of other

Two Hundred Islands in the South Pacific, which had received Christianity, and which contained 50,000 church members, and 250,000 adherents, connected with the various societies. But there were hindrances to the spread of the gospel, and of these the most formidable was

The Polynesian Coolie Traffic.

"I have known," says Mr. Lawes, "a great deal of this traffic, and my testimony is that it is a far greater evil and curse than in England you have any idea of. The Act passed last session will do good; the expression of public opinion in England will do good; but two or three vigorous sharp gunboats will do more, because you must remember that the men with whom we have to do, and for the regulation of whose traffic this Act has been passed, are men whose vocabulary does not possess such words as honour, honesty, and truth; and nothing save the said gunboats will bring them to their senses." Even when men that had been carried away returned, they returned demoralised, and they were worse clothed, lived in worse houses, and cultivated their land worse than those who had never left the island.

We leave the Report of the London Missionary Society with reluctance; it has been the means of doing much for the cause of Christianity. "I never doubted the conversion of Africa," were the words of Dr. Moffat; this Society might extend the saying; it does not doubt the conversion of the world. In praying for a continued blessing on its English missionaries, its one hundred native pastors, and its three thousand native assistants, we ask for great things for the heathen world; and let us remember we ask them 'of Him who is able to do exceeding abundantly above all that we ask or think.

WORK IN THE TURKISH EMPIRE.

Referring to some recent tidings of missionary work in various lands, a writer in the Watchman observes:—

"A great and glorious work is going on in various parts of the Turkish Empire, which seems to attract little notice in England, but which is, nevertheless, real and important in its connection with the advancement of the kingdom of Christ. The honoured agents in its accomplishment are chiefly American and Scottish missionaries of the Presbyterian school, who are well adapted for the work by their education, intelligence, and undoubted missionary zeal. This mission work in Turkey is carried on not so much among the Mohammedan population as among nominal Christians professedly belonging to the degenerate and decayed Greek Church, many of whom are almost as ignorant and as spiritually destitute as the most benighted pagan people in the world. By the faithful preaching of the Gospel, the establishment of Christian schools, both common and higher class, and systematic evangelistic effort in Constantinople, Smyrna, Beirut, Damascus, Jerusalem, and other places, thousands of these people have been enlightened and gathered into the fold of the Redeemer. At the eighteenth anniversary meeting of the Turkish Missions Aid Society, recently held, the Right Hon. the Earl of Shaftesbury presiding, interesting details were given of the progress of the work in all its departments. And J. C. M'Coan, Esq., of the Reform Club, lately bore the following testimony to its importance and genuineness:—

"As an old resident in and an extensive traveller through Turkey, I have had unusual opportunities of observing the course and results of missionary work in that country, and I can testify that of all the foreign agents thus employed, those of the American Board of Missions have been in every way the most successful. I have visited their great stations at Oroomiah, in Persia, where they have done so much to educate and evangelise the Nestorians; and again at Mosul, Mardin, Diarbekir, Erzeroum, Kharpoot, Beirut, and elsewhere, in the Asiatic provinces. I can bear witness that they have done more to civilise and morally elevate the nominally Christian populations of those districts than all the other influences that have been at work during the past fifty years. And so, too, in the capital. In and around Constantinople they have laboured with a zeal and success which cannot be too highly praised."

CHINA.—REMARKABLE MOVEMENT IN FORMOSA.

Whenever we hear of the rapid propagation of the Gospel in any quarter of the heathen world, we may almost certainly infer that the people are not connected with any of the great dominant races, nor their religion with any of the great ancient systems. Among races as among individuals, we are finding that what is often hid from the wise and prudent is revealed to babes. In the South Sea Islands, in Madagascar, among the hill tribes of India, among the Karens of Burmah, the Gospel has in our time made wonderful progress; but the people among whom it has triumphed have been neither Mahometans, Buddhists, nor Brahminists, but simply poor idolaters. A remarkable missionary movement of a similar kind has just taken place in the island of Formosa, in China, chiefly under the auspices of the missionaries of the English Presbyterian Church; but the converts do not belong to the Chinese family, but to an aboriginal race, a branch of the same people that are found in New Zealand, Tahiti, and the Sandwich Islands and Madagascar. In fact, in the island of Formosa, there are found two distinct races; the Chinese who inhabit the western portion of the island, and the native or aboriginal who inhabit the central and eastern portions. While the former have been barely touched by the mission movement, the latter have been wonderfully affected by it. At a recent meeting, Dr. Maxwell, medical missionary, stated that there were now twelve or thirteen mission stations in the island. There had been admitted as members of the Church during the short time when the mission had existed, about 450 souls; while the number besides these who came regularly to hear the Gospel, was 1,300 or 1,400. The people had been in a state of utter ignorance, but schools had been established, and during the last three years not less than from two to three hundred had been taught to read, and many of them also to write. The missionaries had also been able to a large extent to alter the marriage and the funeral customs of the people. The same remarkable power of conveying to their countrymen the impressions which they had themselves received, that had been established by the native converts in the South Seas, was also shown by the converted Formosans. Plain working men had sometimes been the means of forming new mission stations, and awakening large numbers of the community to inquiry and concern. Dr. Maxwell, with the caution of his countrymen, remarked that as the mission had existed only since 1865, it might be thought that sufficient time had not elapsed to test the stability of the movement; but his own opinion and that of his fellow-labourers was, that it was a true and honest movement, and in the faithful lives of the converts, and not a few death-bed testimonies, they had ample proof that they had submitted themselves to the truth.

III.—GLANCES ABROAD.

FRANCE AND HER RULERS.

The change from Thiers to Macmahon as President of the French Republic seems already a thing of the distant past. Without speculating on the political results which this change may possibly produce, we may remark, that there are not wanting persons who see in the elevation of Macmahon a presage of everything dear to ultramontane souls. In this we fondly hope that they may be mistaken; but seeing that the wife of the supreme ruler has often a predominant influence in religious matters, there is perhaps some ground for ultramontane gratulation in the fact that Madame Macmahon was lately one of those who headed a great pilgrimage to Lourdes. It appears, however, that though there was at first great joy in the Vatican when it was announced that Macmahon had succeeded Thiers, the joy passed into gloom when Macmahon made his official announcement that in foreign affairs he would adhere to the policy of his predecessor. The Bavarian Vaterland let out its feelings very freely in the interest of Macmahon and the Church, and ventured to foretell, as the speedy consequences of the step at Paris, the restoration of monarchy in France, the re-establishment of the Jesuits, the retirement of Bismarck to look after his nerves, and the sweeping away of that miserable king, Victor Emmanuel. Happily, however, the Bavarian Vaterland has not been entrusted with the reins of Providence.

POPULAR ENTHUSIASM ABOUT PILGRIMAGES.

"Pilgrimages," says the correspondent of the Guardian, "have now become so much the fashion that it is proposed to establish a periodical, to be called the Revue des Pilgrimages, which shall provide, besides a full account of such proceedings in themselves, a complete history of the different localities to which they are made, with the incidents, miracles, &c., which have given celebrity to their shrines. The Univers seems to regard such a revival of medieval usages as the chief means and hope of regenerating France in the present day; and has already intimated that various religious and political successes, in its own point of view, including the 'upsetting of M. Thiers,' and the accession, as it anticipates, of a clerical and Romish party to power, has been one of the fruits of these intercessions. It announced the other day, that a hundred and fifty Deputies of the Right (the number is probably greatly exaggerated) had gone off to a pilgrimage to Chartres, and no doubt expects a new display of zeal from them in the Assembly on their return. These pilgrimages, such as the one above mentioned for instance, are now arranged with all the exactness of a pleasure train or one of Cook's excursions, as regards prices, departures, &c. You can 'subscribe' for the trip at many of the sacristies of the Paris churches; where, if you like, you can pay beforehand both for the journey and also for bed, breakfast, dinner, and all other expenses. Most of them, of course, especially those which were organized during last month, were à la gloire de Marie. The announcements generally indicate the chief attractions offered in the way of relics, &c., which are exposed to the adoration of the faithful on such occasions. Thus, for yesterday, to-day, and to-morrow, there is a famous pilgrimage to Longpont, in the adjoining Department, where, besides a celebrated veil of the Virgin, there are preserved portions of the Cross, thorns, tunic, &c., deposited, we are told, in no less than forty caskets or coffers of great artistic value. The pilgrimages are always attended with processions, in which these reliquaries are carried about the town or village. A similar pilgrimage was recently organized to Argenteuil, where also a miraculous tunic was displayed. Another was also made to Pontoise; 'such a sight,' we are informed, 'as has not been witnessed there since 1638' for the numbers and enthusiasm of the pilgrims. The Dominican monk who addressed the assemblage pointed out how this 'miracle-working Virgin' might again, as she had done before, restore to France the three blessings of 'victory, peace, and national greatness,' which had been lost. Another pilgrimage to Notre Dame de Lépine, near Châlons, was for 'soliciting the protection of the Virgin upon France and the Church.' The Bishop was present and officiated, and the processions were on a splendid and imposing scale. The above, however, are only a few of the proceedings of a similar kind which are now announced on every side, and which promise to become again a national institution in France, quite ample enough to supply materials for such a review of them as that which is proposed to be established."

THE FRENCH ANNIVERSARIES.

Notwithstanding the terrible shock experienced of late years by the religious Protestant societies of France, the anniversaries this year showed an increase of interest and efficiency. The various institutions designed to promote the work in France have obtained the usual tokens of encouragement and prosperity, and in addition to this, a prosperous report is presented from the mission to the Basutos in Kafirland. There the French missionaries are assisted by 57 native catechists, and above 2,000 children are at work at the schools; and during the year there have been 321 baptisms of adults and 200 of children.

GERMANY—OPPOSITION OF THE BISHOPS TO BISMARCK.

The Roman Catholic Bishops have taken up the attitude of opposition. Their "pronunciamento" to the Government declares their purpose to resist the recent laws. "These laws," they say, "violate the rights and liberties which by divine appointment belong to the Church of God. They deny entirely the fundamental principle which acknowledges in the State and in the Church two separate authorities appointed by God, which, therefore, in the manifold points of contact and intermixings of their relations regarding the ordering of the boundaries of their authorities, are required not to proceed in a one-sided direction, but to come to an understanding among themselves." The bishops repudiate the heathen position that the Church has no rights save those which the State concedes to her. To acknowledge the new laws would be equivalent to a denial of the divine origin of Christianity, as well as a repudiation of all the special rights acknowledged by the State at other times.

This is moderate language for Roman officials. The old controversy between the imperium and the sacerdotium witnessed a higher style. Hildebrand and his compeers would not have been so willing to acknowledge in the State a separate and independent jurisdiction conferred by God. The German bishops no doubt feel the necessity of avoiding extreme assumptions in the perilous struggle on which they have entered.

ITALY—THE JESUITS AND THE PARLIAMENT.

It is well known that the conflict that has been raging at Rome whether the religious orders are to remain, has been settled by a kind of compromise, giving permission to the several "Generals," or heads of orders, to occupy a part of their present residence during their tenure of office. In most cases, the office of General is held for the limited period of four years, and at the end of that period, at furthest, they will be obliged to decamp. In the case of the Jesuits, however, the office is held for life. Now the Jesuits are of all the religious societies the most hated, and hated it would appear most intensely by those who have been brought up in their schools, and who know them best. Familiarity with them seems always to leave behind an awful impression of their hypocrisy, and of their readiness for any of those odious proceedings of which hypocrisy is often the screen and protector. An attempt was therefore made recently in the Italian Parliament to dissolve the Jesuits utterly, and to deprive them of any right of organization or association under any pretext whatever. This step, however, the Government and the Parliament did not take. All that is provided is that the General of the Jesuits—"the Black Pope," as he is called at Rome—will have to leave the house where he has usually resided, and find quarters somewhere in the Vatican. The Jesuits will not be interfered with in their special work, provided they comply with the laws of the country. The majority of the Chamber are not prepared for the rôle of Bismarck; they think that in the atmosphere of liberty and in the light of free institutions, the Jesuits like the owls will be unable to work.

IV.—OUR LIBRARY TABLE.

The Land of Moab: Travels and Discoveries on the East Side of the Dead Sea and the Jordan, is unmistakably the production of a working traveller, not of a diletante writer of books. It is entirely in the style of Dr. Edward Robinson's Researches in the Holy Land. Dr. Tristram, both as a traveller and a man of science, has earned for himself the high reputation of a man of work, a laborious, earnest investigator, who does not play at science, or at travelling, but sets himself vigorously to go forward in the interest of both. This, we may remark by the way, is what gives to Dr. Tristram so high a place, even among those who have least sympathy with his earnest evangelical views. The volume before us is a substantial book of four hundred pages, describing, step by step, a journey over a region that has very few features of interest except for a biblical traveller. The land of Moab is a parallelogram of some fifty miles long and thirty broad, lying to the east of the Dead Sea and the Jordan. In its general features it abundantly verifies the scriptural account of it, the ruined towns and villages that seem to occur every ten, fifteen, or twenty minutes, now utterly desolate, showing that at one time the country must have been one of extreme richness and abundant population. The chief results of Dr. Tristram's travels are, that he has brought to light a remarkable palace of singular magnificence at Mashita, which is believed to have been built in the seventh century, by Chosroes, King of Persia; he has minutely described Machærus, the fortress east of the Jordan, where John the Baptist was beheaded; and he believes that he has discovered the site of Zoar, the city to which Lot fled on leaving Sodom. At Machærus, he has found two dungeons—miserable places truly, in one or other of which he believes that the Baptist must have been confined. To have stood on the very spot where the Baptist suffered must have been singularly solemnizing; and as we read of Dr. Tristram's doing so, the thought arises,—How remarkable it is that our Lord should have suffered, not at this remote place, but at Jerusalem; and not by being beheaded, but crucified! One is apt to overlook the many circumstances that show how remarkably the Scripture was fulfilled in the whole circumstances of his birth, life, and death. Zoar is believed by Dr. Tristram to be represented by a considerable place—all in ruins—now called by the Arabs Zi'ara. It is situated to the north-east of the Dead Sea, and far from its southern border, where it is commonly believed that the five doomed cities were. The circumstances mentioned by Dr. Tristram seem very forcibly to show that he is right in his conjecture. But if so, and if, as the result, the cities of the plain were near the north of the Dead Sea, we must give up the traditional Usdum on the south, as the site of Sodom, for Zoar was "near to flee to," whereas Usdum is many miles from Zi'ara. On a former visit, Dr. Tristram identified Nebo, from which a most commanding view of the Holy Land is obtained. It is melancholy to read of the great wilderness of ruins the land presents. Morally it is a place of "spoilers." One of the people our traveller came across, Goblan, told him the story of his first crime. When a very young man, riding over the plain, he noticed a horseman before him on a splendid iron-grey mare; the demon seized him, he resolved he would have the mare, and watching his opportunity, he speared the rider and carried off the animal. He never found out who his victim was; but he feels sure that some one has vowed vengeance, and that he shall yet suffer retribution. "I cannot sleep," he said, "without seeing the grey mare and her rider before me. But she was a splendid mare. Who would not have killed a stranger for her?" Dr. Tristram describes Dibon, where the Moabite stone was found, which he believes had been thrown out by the earthquake of 1837. No more such stones could be come upon. The palace of Meshita had sculptured tablets, but the photographs of them were unfortunately lost.

Dr. Tristram set a good example to travellers in the East, by resting on the Sabbath day according to the commandment. Hard though it was to restrain his followers from shooting and hunting on that day, the impression produced on the Mahometans was highly favourable.

History of the Missions of the Free Church of Scotland in India and Africa. By the Rev. Robert Hunter, M.A.—The interest of these missions, especially those in India, is due in a large degree to their having been associated with Dr. Duff of Calcutta, and Dr. Wilson of Bombay. Few missionaries of modern times have commended themselves more to the esteem and confidence not only of the church catholic, but of the world at large. The origin and progress of their labours, and also of those of their colleagues, the steps taken for the erection of buildings, the plan of mission work in the several stations, the conversion and baptism of natives, and the ordination of native pastors, are all detailed in this volume, with a faithfulness that shows the industrious and most conscientious compiler, although the minuteness may sometimes be felt by the general reader to be de trop. To those who have a special interest in these missions, and especially to the younger members of families, this volume is fitted to be of considerable use.

Some Present Difficulties in Theology, with Preface, by Rev. J. O. Dykes, M.A., is a small volume of papers intended to guide young men in finding their way over the difficulties of the day. Mr. Dykes begins with a lecture on the Authority of Holy Scripture, in which he analyzes and vindicates authority in general and the authority of the Bible in particular. He shows the emptiness of the objection of Theodore Parker and others to revelation, as substituting a hard authority, ab extra, for the free and spontaneous exercise of a man's own faculties. He shows that legitimate authority is either the authority of evidence or the authority of law. It is out of the question for any man to object to either. The Bible makes its appeal to us and its demands on our submission in virtue of these two things. The other papers in the volume are—one by Dr. Lorimer, proving the unscientific character of disbelief in the Christian miracles; one by Mr. John Gibb, in which, after noticing the remarkable combination of adverse influences which Christianity overcame at first, he adverts with great ability to the revived opposition to its claims, and the efforts of such men as Mr. Arnold to find some via media between Christian faith and utter disbelief; and lastly, one by Dr. Chalmers, on the several theories of the atonement. Such addresses as the present collection are eminently needed in our day, and though fragments, they are fragments of a great subject, all too great indeed for treatment in any one book.

had been given him by a gentleman in the station early that morning. The man described the gentleman as "a short gentleman, quiet enough in manner, but snappy-like. Didn't know what train he went by, or whether he went by any. Guessed he did though, as it was the Harwich train guard that called him to wait upon him. Reckoned the guard would know all about that."

Robina had shown David the letter, which said nothing more than this:—

"The creditors may do their worst; it won't hurt me now. I will not see D. M. or M. H. again. It is too bad."

David only hastened to follow up the railway porter's information. The morning's train to Harwich must be just about its destination. So David telegraphed to the guard, if possible to detain the traveller who had called for the porter, and if not possible, to telegraph back at what station he got out, and what he did.

The answer had come speedily: "Passengers had all cleared off before message arrived. Gentleman got out at Harwich, and called a boy to carry his great-coat.

II. N.S.

Don't know which way he went. Don't know the boy; but have seen him at the station before."

David had rapidly come to the conclusion that he must go down to Harwich and pursue the search himself. It did not matter in the least that he felt he was the "D. M.," whom the poor wanderer did not wish to meet again; nay, that was the more reason that such meeting should be swiftly made an accomplished fact, will he, nill he. He could understand and pity Fergus, in his physical and moral humiliation, hiding away from the two pairs of eyes that had been used to regard him with such proud trustfulness. But in this state of covering misery, repentance was likely to be only useless remorse—a stone about his soul to sink it, not a staff to help it up. Therefore Fergus must be brought to stand upright in his altered position, and to bear to see affectionate faces with forgiveness and patience in them, instead of pride.

This was what he came to say to Millicent Harvey, and this was what she said to him:—

"Go at once; and in case I could be of any use in reassuring him—in case it would be well for me to soften some of the hard things I said last night, I will follow you in the course of the evening, if possible; if not, I will be there early to-morrow morning. I will invite one of my nephews to come with me, and then my sudden absence at the seaside will not provoke any comment out of my own family circle."

"I could not have asked you to do so much," said David warmly. "But the very fact that you, who, I am quite sure, know so much more than I know, will yet do this, will surely be his salvation, for earth and for heaven."

It was characteristic of Millicent that she instructed David. "Do not take rooms for us; we will take them when we arrive. I could not stay at any hotel. Let me choose my own place."

Millicent knew what was due to her mother. Though she was a middle-aged, independent, and somewhat unconfiding spinster, she would not take a step like this, leaving Mrs. Harvey wholly in the dark.

Her sense of justice and mercy too revolted from the over-common practice of treading down the feelings of a dozen true hearts, to spare those of a perverted one, which is a species of humanity that might possibly prescribe a bath of innocent blood to refresh the weariness of a satiated debauchee. Millicent had felt, though she had scarcely noticed, this same consideration in David Maxwell. In all his eager pity for the Lauries, he had never in one iota attempted to sacrifice her feelings or comfort for theirs. He had asked her to do nothing; he had left all to her own free will. If we have a right in this world, it is the right to sacrifice ourselves. But so many people think their right is rather to sacrifice others!

While she hastily packed up her clothes, Millicent told her mother about it all. She did not tell her all about it. She told of Fergus's gradual fall, of their conversation on the previous night, and of her own severity and his flight. She did not tell of the offer of marriage. But reading between the lines, Mrs. Harvey felt it was there, though she could not tell where—no, not whether it was years ago, or only yesterday.

Millicent's proposed escort did not fail her. "Grandmamma" went to invite him, and it must have been a strange request of "grandmamma's" that George and Christian did not instantly grant. The boy himself was glad of the holiday, and the glimpse of the ocean, without much thought of his companion; but when grandmamma, who herself went to the station to see them off, drew him aside and told him to take particular care of "Aunt Millicent," then the boy felt that she was in some way a charge of his, and tried to fulfil his duties by carefully adjusting the railway carriage windows, by pressing her to eat biscuits, and pointing out the noticeable houses and churches on the road.

There could not have been a more unromantic-seeming pair of travellers. Of the two, superficial eyes would have seen more possibilities of pathos in the bright-looking lad with his merry chatter, than in the prim woman, who looked quite elderly as the deepening twilight made shadows on her face. Though she answered him cheerily, Robert Harvey soon felt that she wanted to be undisturbed, and let her sit in silence, watching the sunset, one of those sad spring sunsets, which seem like the last good-bye of a young life, that yet has lasted long enough for its own happiness.

They reached Harwich at last, and found David on the platform, having come there for the chance of meeting them. Though he had obeyed Millicent's orders not to take rooms for her, he had reconnoitred the place, and discovered two or three houses that he could particularly recommend to her notice. And while young Robert Harvey started a British boy's eager talk to the briny lad who volunteered to carry their luggage, David and Millicent dropped behind to hear and to tell the latest news.

"He cannot be far off," David informed her. "I have found the boy that he employed at the railway station, and he took him to the principal hotel here where he lunched. He left soon after. No steamer has left Harwich today, since the hour when he came in, and nobody off his description has gone away in any coach. From his coming here, I fancy he must mean to leave by the German boat, and will probably stay in some quiet lodging till its time for starting. Very likely he will wander about after dark. I mean to wander too. There are not so many ways here, that we are very likely to miss each other. And I shall take care to see all the passengers go on board the steamer. You see, Miss Harvey, the question is not merely one of finding him, but of finding him quietly, and bringing him to a calm state of mind. Therefore we must resort to no means likely to defeat this end."

Millicent assented, but her heart felt sick within her, and her face looked so grey and worn that David was glad that she was satisfied with the first lodging to which he conducted her. So, with an assurance that he would see her early in the morning, he committed her to the care of the motherly landlady whose neatness and cheerfulness had attracted his attention to her very humble house.

"Now, you're just dead tired, miss," the good woman chattered; "an' if you'll take my advice you'll go straight off to your own room and stay there, an' I'll bring you up a cup o' tea and a bite of nice fish. Don't you trouble about the young gentleman, miss, I'll lay you my best china pot, he'll soon find his way into the kitchen to my old man, and then he won't want for yarning. They'll make up to each other, easy, miss, for our dog Gib has got her pups down under the dresser, and dogs, and pups especial, is a fine subject to begin talk upon."

Millicent was too tired in heart and limbs to rebel. Nay, she felt it a pleasure to be ordered,—a gratification which, like most strong-willed people, she was little likely to get from those who knew her best.

Nor had she any occasion to regret exchanging the little tawdry parlour for the sleeping apartment. This was a long low room running the whole length of the old house. It did not look like a room carelessly furnished for shifting inmates. There were two or three really good prints on the walls, and a lounging chair stood between the window and the fire-place, with an occasional table, and a bracket with books placed near it. Millicent noted all this half unconsciously. This would be her home for a piece of her life that could never fail to be memorable.

"Ah, it's a nice room, isn't it?" said the chatty landlady, going to a cupboard in the wall, and rattling out a little tea service. "These cups go with this room, and I always keep them and wash 'em up on the shelf outside,—they never go into the kitchen to be knocked up against the pewters and willow-patterns. This was my dear lady's room, and these were her cups, and this is how she left everything. Them's her books. Dear, dear, she were a blessed woman if ever were,—though I didn't dare say so to her, it made her that sad. 'I'm no better than the worst of the girls in the town,' she would say to me, so softly, 'and there's few of those poor things that have had thoughts of murder as I had once,' she would say. 'It's a wonder I didn't rush before God with my hands red with my fellow-sinner's blood.' I never knew the story rightly, miss, only she'd gone wrong in her young days,—most likely been awfully deceived,—for, anyhow, something cast up that made her hate the man she'd loved too well,—maybe she found out he'd been married all along, and she started off on a long journey, with a knife in her pocket to stab him. And then she said, 'God met her.' You should have seen her face, miss, when she said that! It was kind as if she saw Him before her. She never said a word more about it, no more than Moses talked much o' whatever he saw on the top o' the mountain. She turned off on her journey and came here. She was a fine-brought-up lady that could paint, and sing, and speak the languages, but there was no work to be had for the likes of her but a common servant's place at a little eating-house. And there she lived, and slaved, and by-and-by, she took to going among them poor bad gals that is always about where there's sailors, and many a good word she spoke, and many a good deed she did, unbeknown, while she was earning her bread—cooking and washing up. At last, a minister heard of her, and got her a little salary to give her more time for doing good. She didn't have it very long, but in the meantime she got into the way of getting the fine sorts of needlework, and she did as much, and earned as much as if she'd done nothing else, but every evening she was out, and many an one she's saved, and many an one she's snatched out the fire. She lived in this room, and she died in it; and whoever she was, and whatever she'd been, a saint went to glory when she was taken. She was mighty fond of her books, and I hope you'll amuse yourself with them, miss, for they used to sound very grand when she read bits to me, being as I don't know an A from a B myself."

Millicent turned to the "bracket" as the landlady retired. She had not given much heed to her story, though she would have been interested enough by it at another time. Nor did it even interest her very much to find among that slender store of books an old worn copy of her brother's early work, "Talks and Meditations." She saw that book often enough in many places. The terrible review had not laughed it down to nothing, and George's only pleasant regret was that in those guileless days he had parted wholly with its copyright.

Millicent had never heard of the incident of her sister-in-law Christian's long-ago journey to London. It is a way of breaking in halves that stories have in this world. And so Christian missed a happy satisfaction, and George lost a solemn delight. Only for a little while. Every kindly doer, and every faithful worker will find many such satisfactions and delights in heaven.

"What is that noise?" Millicent asked listening, as her landlady returned with the tea and toast.

"It's the rain agen the windows, miss. You've got safe under shelter none too soon. It's blowing great guns from the nor'-east, and the skipper says it'll be an awful night," replied the sailor's wife.

CHAPTER XX.—FOUND AND LOST.

THERE was one who was out in the rain and the wind.

David Maxwell had not failed in his proposed twilight wandering about Harwich town. He had lingered in the principal street, he had haunted the quay. He had let the cheery fisher folk enter into talk with him, if happily some scrap of their chance information might give him a clue. He found what seemed one, at last. Standing in a shed, for shelter from the rain, when it was past midnight, his refuge happened to be shared by a man, who stated he had seen "a strange gentleman carrying a big coat, on the road far down below Dovercourt. The gentleman had stopped him, and asked whether there was any place near where he could stay for the night, and he had recommended the Stars Inn. The gentleman had remarked that he was a stranger, new in Harwich that morning."

David's further questions elicited that this Stars Inn was situate about seven miles out of Harwich.

There was no time to be wasted in an endeavour, almost sure to be fruitless, at such an hour and on such a night, to procure any conveyance. David knew himself to be a quick walker. There was just time for him to reach the Stars Inn on foot, see this gentleman, and if he were not his missing friend, get back to Harwich in time to watch the passengers go on board the early morning boat.

David was tired and wet, but the moment he got this clue he forgot all about that, or remembered it only to dismiss it with the thought, "There will be plenty of time to rest when I have found him, and as for the bad weather, surely I can bear for once, what sailors and shepherds endure every month of their lives."

He had a long and dreary tramp. The road lay between hedgerows, sometimes stretching long and unbroken, sometimes dotted by a few houses; but the lights in these were all out, save where just once or twice, all the dreary seven miles, a winking taper was set to watch in a chamber of birth or death. The road passed through one village, with its tavern-sign creaking in the blast, and its old church standing back among its graves. Once or twice, struggling beneath his umbrella, David struck lucifer matches, to read finger-posts by their fleeting light. He had started with oilskin as well as umbrella, but both were presently unavailing, and there was nothing to do but to face the storm in dogged defencelessness. Once or twice in the earlier miles of his walk, David thought longingly of his snug parlour in Hackney, and of Phoebe's faithful ministrations. But when he was thoroughly wet through, it seemed easier to go on so. It even seemed to lay his anxieties,—nothing could be done for the next two or three hours, but walk straight on even as he was doing. Once or twice he sang, scarcely noticing what he sang, or even that he sang at all. But in one of the little houses, a young mother watching through her first night with her child upon her breast, laid it up as a good omen for "baby," that she heard a voice pass in the tempest, singing,—

"Then let our songs abound,
And every tear be dry;
We're marching through Immanuel's ground
To fairer worlds on high."

The "Stars" was reached at last, and after many knocks and shouts, the landlord's head was lifted off its pillow and thrust out of window. The host was rather grumpy, but he could hardly refuse answers to David's rapid questions, not put without ample apology for their untimeliness.

"Yes, there was in the house a gentleman who had come from Harwich that day."

"Did not know his business."

"Did not know his name."

"Is it a matter of life or death?"

"Just ask him to let me see him," David answered. "It may be life or death to whom I am seeking, and unless I see him, I cannot tell whether this be he or no. And delay may be of terrible consequence."

Up went another window: the stranger had evidently been listening at his casement to the alarm, and thus appealed to, he responded, in broad Scotch, and a gruff voice, unmistakably not Fergus Laurie's—

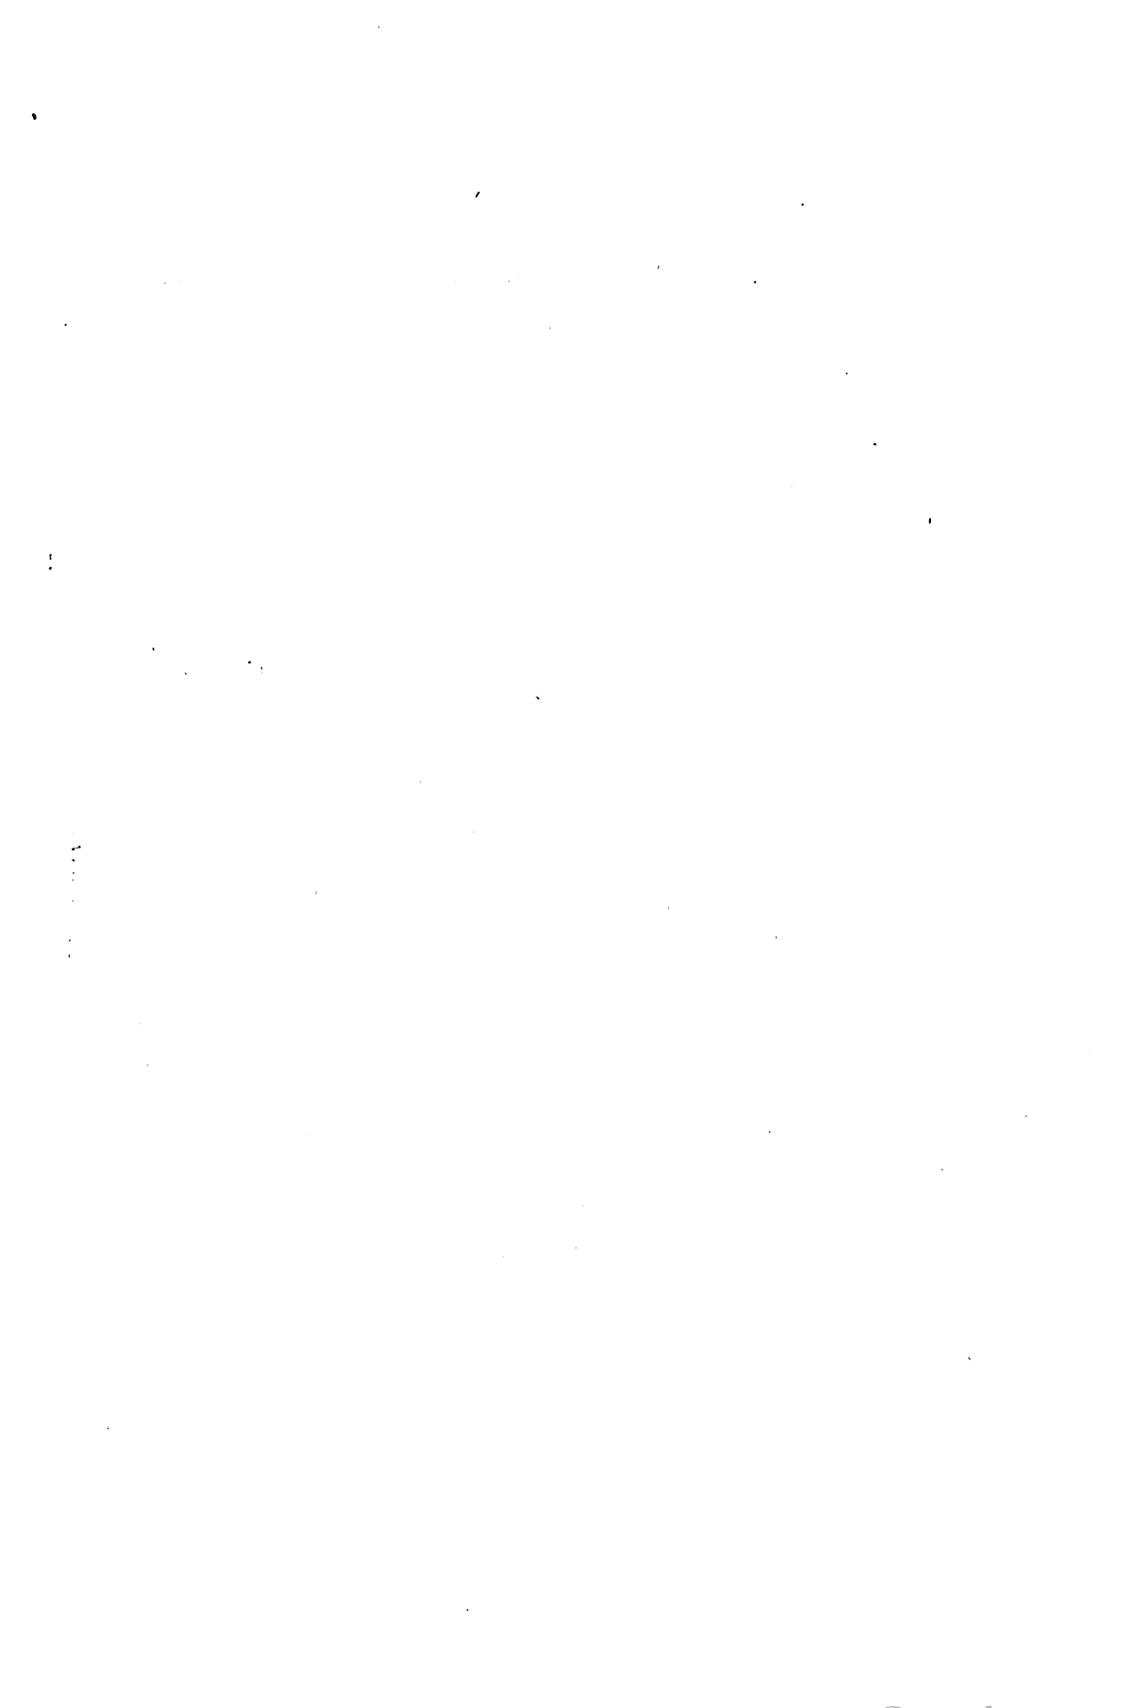

"I am Donald Gordon, traveller for Flockhart and Co. of Glasgow. If you winna believe it without seeing me, I'll away to the door and answer whatever you may speir."

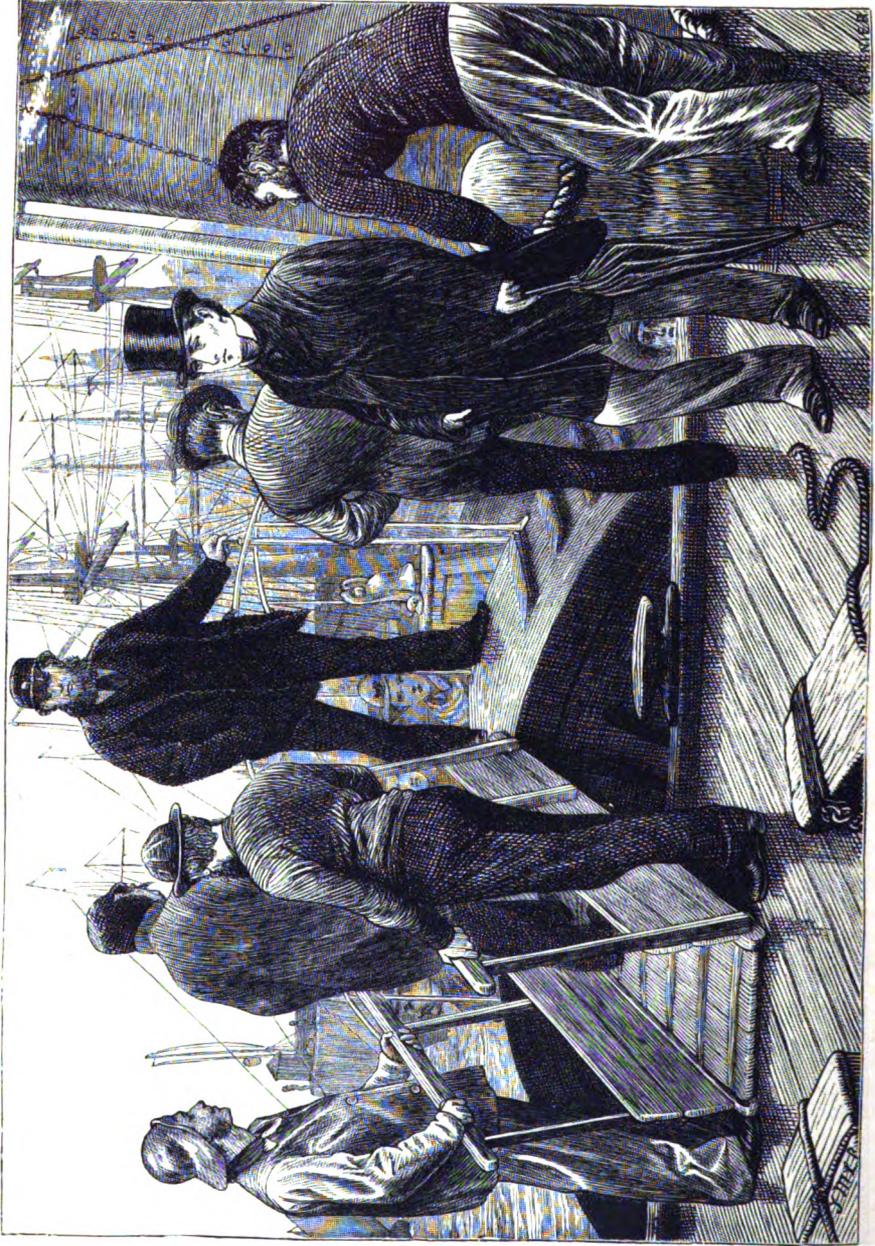

"Thank you, I won't trouble you, I am quite convinced," said David. "Pardon me for disturbing you all."

"There ain't another house for miles," interrupted mine host; "hadn't you better come in and put up till morning? It ain't a night for a dog to be out."

"Many thanks," said David; "but it will take me all my speed to get back to Harwich by the time I must be there." And so he swiftly retraced his steps, not at all disheartened by the failure, for he had prepared himself for disappointment, and kept up a strong faith in the German boat.

The rain ceased and the wind went down before the first peep of dawn. But the raw, yellow calm seemed colder and damper and more cruel than the tempest. There is all difference between the wrestle for life in the shipwreck, and the dull waiting for rescue on a desert island. While nature struggles, man struggles too, and the contest seems equal. But when she sits down and bides her time, his heart drops within him like lead. Her time is so long, his days are so short! David did not sing on his way into Harwich town.

He hurried down to the quay. The German boat lay alongside, and there were several people standing about. Nobody had gone on board yet, the sailors said. There were very few passengers, they informed him, and as the steamer would soon be off, he would not have to wait long.

Presently the first instalment settled themselves on board—a young lady and gentleman, palpably “a honeymoon pair.” The next party was a German family, whose father wore spectacles, and whose mother presently began to knit. After that, the passengers went on thick and fast, tourists, commercial travellers, “Herr Professors,” and scholastic “Frauleins,” navvies, and seafaring men. Then the cries and shouts grew deafening, and moorings began to slacken, and one more spectacled Herr Professor rushed breathless on board, and returned the captain an innocent “thank you,” for the curse he bestowed upon him. And then the other mooring was loosened, and last words were shouted, and handkerchiefs began to wave. And the Rhineland went on her ocean way.

But no Fergus Laurie.

This was when David's heart began to sink, and he began to think to himself that within easy distance of the little easy-going town there must be many and many a little creek which might keep any ghostly secret committed to its care, for many and many a month,—nay, for many a year. And his heart ached for Millicent,—for one so tried, so long patient, ay, and so ready to forgive, yet deceived and goaded into a wrath that might be a life-long pain to her soul.

All that he could do, was to go about the town again, renewing his inquiries at all the hotels and livery stables. A desperate sense of the puerility and feebleness of his endeavours grew upon him. He was tired within an inch of his life, he was wet through, he was hungry and comfortless, and yet he was unsuccessful, where a London detective would doubtless have succeeded, without the expenditure of a tithe of his vital force. He could only reassure himself by the recollection, that a detective's success would probably have been more fatal to their real wishes than even his own failure.

The town fully woke up at last, the shops were opened, and other people besides fishers and passengers by early boats, began to move about. Presently, coming out of a large house in one of the quiet, old-fashioned streets, David saw a figure which made his heart leap. It was at some little distance from the spot where he stood, yet he could have been quite sure it was Fergus, but for the fact—which seemed to him to throw doubt on it—that he was not alone, but in the company of an old gentleman, and a young lady in a severely elegant morning costume. David hastily followed them at a discreet distance, every moment growing more convinced that it was really his missing man. The three walked together down two or three streets, then the old gentleman and the young lady shook hands very cordially with their companion, and went off in another direction, while he very leisurely took the road to the railway station. Now was David's time. He overtook him, and laying his hand kindly on his shoulder, asked breathlessly—

“Where have you been, Laurie? We have been searching for you. Where are you going?”

The other gave his shoulder a hasty shrug, which did not shake off David's touch, and stood quite still. He stared at David for a moment, and answered coolly—

“I have been taking a breathing time and a blow of salt air. I am going back to London now. The train does not start for half an hour, so you needn't be afraid of hindering me.”

David put his arm through his. “Why have you done this, Fergus?” he pleaded. “You might have explained yourself clearly. You have given every one a fearful shock.”

“It is quite refreshing to hear that anything one does can do that,” said Fergus, with a sneer. “It is really quite worth while to withdraw oneself for a time to find out how one is valued.”

“I don't think there is anything remarkable in one's sudden and accounted absence alarming one's mother and sister,” said David plainly.

“I have always had to take care of myself, and of them too, ever since I was a boy,” Fergus returned. “I should think they might trust me perfectly by this time. Is Robina in a fit?”

“No, indeed; at least, not that I know of,” said David. “I thought she took it very calmly, wonderfully calmly in one way, for she was most assiduous in keeping appearances all right. But, oh, Fergus, when you knew how things were, and how agitated we might naturally suppose you to be, how could you go away like this?”

“I don't wonder that you should suppose

I would be agitated," said Fergus, "seeing you knew how you had badgered and deserted me in my day of difficulty; but I am thankful to say I can rise superior to such treatment, and build new hopes on the old disappointments. Go and tell Miss Harvey so, if you like. Was it a fearful shock to her? I daresay she was very much afraid that something would happen to make a public story of her insulting ingratitude. It would not have made a pretty chapter in her life."

"God knows what passed between you and Millicent Harvey," pleaded David, "I do not. I only know the message you promised to carry to her, and that you could have only carried half of it, for that she thought you still a prosperous man, and stung and passionate, spoke sharp words to you. What you said, and what she said, I do not know. But I do know, that she is here now, Fergus—in this very town—watching an opportunity to tell you that she would not have spoken so, had she known the truth, and to ask you to let us be your friends again, as we used to be."

They had wandered on to the esplanade while they talked, and just here, Fergus stood still and gazed out to sea. Not all his defiant self-command could control the spasm that passed over his face. She knew—the woman whose high opinion his better nature had valued above all other—she knew what a base, weak, mean man he was! In the face of that crowning ignominy, it did not much matter to him how close she kept her secret—nay, he hated her for doing it. He could deny to himself that he was base, or weak, or mean, but the very screen her pitiful silence threw over his fall, showed how low she felt it to be.

"It is too bad—too bad!" he cried passionately, struggling in the net of humiliation, where his own sins had caught him. "Let her go her way and leave me to go mine. I will not see her. I never wish to see her again."

"Oh, Fergus," said David, "all these petty interests are so short and small, but Love and Life are for ever and for ever. Do not defile the immortal with the mire of a stormy hour."

"Love!" he said, with a sneer so false and bitter that David's face flushed as if he himself had uttered a lie. "What love was, is, or ever can be between me and Millicent Harvey? Let us go our different ways. I never want to see her again in this life or the next. Tell her so."

They were walking on again, and they were silent for awhile, then David said—

"You are going back to town. What do you mean to do?"

"Oh, everything is settled very comfortably," Fergus answered, with a sudden return to that cool, light tone which made David's heart heavier even than the fiery outburst. "I am a man of too many resources to be easily ruined. I found that my chief creditor was staying down here, and I came away to consult him, and he is going to take everything off my hands. He sees quite well that by putting forth capital into my concern, he will soon gain an immense return. He will pay everybody and be his own sole creditor, and with his resources, that will soon be most profitable to him. We have never had an American agency—of course, with our means the idea was ridiculous—but I suggested it to him, and he grasped it eagerly. I am to be his agent out in New York. I can assure you I shall be very glad to get away from this worn-out old country, with its narrow ideas and sulky prejudices. You need not trouble yourself about me, Mr. Maxwell. I only hope that you may find yourself satisfied with the arrangements of your new masters. For the sake of old times, I have tried to forget your recent mistrustfulness and have spoken up for you, and I think with some effect, still it will be very different for you, from what it would have been, if I had prospered. I am sorry for you. You will repent that you did not make your interests identical with mine, even in such a paltry matter as the money you preferred to pay to Miss Harvey."

"I did make my interests identical with yours," said David quietly. "You will see it some day."

"It is time I went towards the station," Fergus remarked. "You need not come with me. I think we have nothing more to say to each other. Good-bye; I daresay we shall not meet again at the office, for I have business in all parts of London for the next day or two, and then I shall go to Liverpool. Of course, I shall take my household to America, but in the first instance I must go out and secure them a comfortable and suitable residence. I should not like them to be exposed to any hardship, or to have those wretched homeless feelings that any change brings to those who are not accustomed to it. So, I daresay I may not see you again. If you have any business communication to make, the best way will be, to address a note to the firm formally, and then it will get attended to in due course. Good-bye. Give my compliments to Miss Harvey."

"Good-bye, Fergus," said David simply. He could add no word of blessing or commendation to God. Such would have sounded so like a curse.

And Fergus went one way and David took the other. And as he went along, he looked out over the sea, and said to himself—

"O God, the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever, have pity on that poor soul! Whither can it go from Thy Spirit, whither can it flee from Thy presence? Though it say, Surely the darkness shall cover me, yet the darkness hideth not from Thee. And Thou remainest holy, O Thou worship of Israel—the Rock that standeth steadfast while the tide comes in and out."

CHAPTER XXI.—UNDER THE CORMORANTS.

MILLICENT was no fiery young girl, ready to snatch a flash of excitement from her anxieties like a bright foxglove from a covert of thorns. That night she went to the window for a moment and saw the rain beating on the pane, and heard the wind roaring outside in the darkness. But though she sat a little later than she used at home, she did not dream of spending the night in pacing her chamber, or voluntarily listening to the storm. She might not be able to sleep, but she would go to bed. She had gone past the age when life concentrates itself on points, and we see nothing beyond. Let not youth in its hasty scorn imagine this means that the fine power of suffering is lost. It is when the fever is over that the wound is felt.

She had a little sleep before the morning. And she dreamed that she and Hatty and Hatty's old lover, Harry Westbrook, were walking somewhere in a wood, and that Hatty suddenly began to sing the Magnificat. It seemed as if the singing awoke her. She had to make a strong effort to remember where she was, and what had brought her there. The room looked a little different since the night before: she felt sure that somebody had entered and gone out again, without awaking her. She rose quickly and drew up the blind. The sea was still high with the fury of the late storm, but the wind was down, and the sky was clear and bright, with a tender, tearful lustre.

She had neglected to wind her watch on the previous day, so that she could not guess the hour; but the number of people stirring on the shore below, convinced her that it was late. While she was hastily dressing, she heard somebody open the door very softly. It was only the landlady.

"You'll excuse my boldness, miss," she said, "but I've been in before and you were sleeping, and the gentleman bade me not disturb you till you woke of yourself. It's only the gentleman that brought you last night, and he's not been waiting more than half an hour. The young gentleman's all right, bless ye, miss, you needn't trouble about him. He took his breakfast as ours was going in the kitchen, like the real gentleman he is, and went off with my master in the boat to the bathing. I've got your breakfast-tray outside, ready to bring in the minute you're ready, for the gentleman below said you were to take that before you were bothered about any business. He looks as if he had been sore worried himself, but as if it were kind of all over now."

Millicent felt that the best acknowledgment of David's thoughtfulness was to obey it, so hastily swallowed a cup of tea and a scrap of toast, and hurried down-stairs. David heard her step on the stairs, and came to the parlour-door to meet her, and the moment she saw his eyes, she knew that all was lost.

"He is not dead?" she cried.

"No, he is not dead; he is on his way back to London. We must give him up to God's patience, Miss Harvey."

"Why did he go away? Where has he been, and what has he been doing?" Millicent asked.

"He came here to make arrangements with his chief creditor, who is staying here. He spent last night in his house," said David.

"He is a selfish, heartless wretch!" cried Millicent.

"Ah, but you see he did not start for this till he had spent one dreadful unaccounted-for night," said David. "Good and bad angels fought over him that night, surely, and the wrong ones conquered."

"Because he was on their side," remarked Millicent bitterly.

"If there had only been something to turn the scale!" said David, "such little things can do it. Such little things have done it for me sometimes."

"Did he speak of me?" Millicent forced herself to ask.

"Yes, he did; and he could not disguise that he felt very strongly about you. It was the only emotion he showed. I think it will be a witness within him which he will never silence. He knew you were here. Miss Milly, you were ready to forgive him. Forgive him still. He wants it more than ever. He wants it so much that he has gone past caring for it!"

"And what is to become of him?" Millicent asked, without any response to David's pleading.

"He is going to America. His chief creditor seems to have consented to take the business with all its responsibilities and profits, and Fergus is to be his agent in the States. If he has only learned a few lessons, he may do well yet," said David.

"The better he does for this world, the worse he will do for the next," remarked Millicent. "If God means to let him alone, He will let him prosper."

"That is true so far; but we must not be too sure about outward prosperities," said David. "A life may lie in prosperity like a corpse in a cloth of gold. Men look at the money-bags, but God sees the heart. A man may prosper, and prosper, and prosper, till he reaches the summit, and sees all around but 'vanity of vanities,' and he may turn to God from it, Miss Millicent. Some go home to the Father after eating husks among the swine; but others go after sitting appetiteless among dainties. But I think the Father is always waiting at the gate for either. And I think the elder brothers should be waiting there too."

There was something in his tone which made Millicent look up at him, not as a mere messenger from Fergus, a lay figure in this tableau of her life, but as himself, David

Maxwell. And the moment she did so, she was conscious of a loosening of the tension at her heart—that kind of relief from a great pain or a great care, that is afforded by a smaller pang or a petty anxiety. Somebody else had been wounded beside herself.

It was only likely that he should look worn and weary. A good meal and a night's sleep might put all that away. But Millicent saw something more than that—a strange, new youthfulness about a face that had never lost its youth, a spiritual life as of one who, still standing in the temple's outer court, catches a glimpse of the Holy of Holies, it may be as another's desecrating hand disturbs the awful veil. Millicent felt this even instantly, as we all feel it sometimes, though we can only say, as Millicent said—

"Mr. Maxwell, you have worn yourself out. Are you quite sure you have had a good breakfast?"

David started as if he had to travel a long way back to recollection of himself.

"Oh, I had supper quite late last night," he said; "and the morning is not very far on yet."

"That means that you have had none at all!" she answered. "Oh, Mr. Maxwell, it was really wrong of you."

"I forgot all about it till you spoke," he said, with a smile. It was thoroughly true. There was nobody's sake for whom he was bound to remember himself.

"And yet remembered to have my breakfast sent up to me before you would see me," said Millicent reproachfully, as she went off to give orders that the strongest of tea, and the most savoury of steaks, should be sent in immediately.

Young Robert Harvey came in fresh and ruddy from his sea bath, and not at all unprepared for a supplemental breakfast. The three sat down together. It was a charmed meal for David. To be sitting with Millicent, cared for by her. To know that the gentleness in her voice, and the solicitude of her eyes were actually for him, was enough. It did not matter that he knew quite well that his aching head and dazed manner explained her attentive kindness. That only seemed to make it sweeter. He thought within himself that it was like passing through a beautiful country, with a light mist hanging over it. Odder fancy still, for one tasting a brief happiness out of an old sorrow and a present pain, he thought that he felt something like one looking down from heaven upon the fulfilment of an old wish! Poor fellow, was he feverish?

They made their plans while they sat at table. David would go back to town instantly—Millicent and her nephew would follow later in the day. David suggested that they should stay a while by the sea, and make holiday, and Robert Harvey was certain that would be an excellent plan. But Millicent would not hear of it.

"I want to be at home, and to settle to my work," she said. "I have lost so much time already." She spoke and thought of her wasted hours and days of late, but it was really with the weight of lost years that her heart was heavy.

Millicent could gather from such slight conversation as passed between her nephew and David Maxwell, that David had been out in the severe weather of the previous night, but that he had spent the whole night in the storm she did not guess. Still there was something about him which told of a severe strain—some mysterious hint of a coming change.

"Will you take a note from me to my sister-in-law?" she asked. "It is best to let her know that her boy will be home again to-day. You need not trouble to call on my mother. It is farther out of your way, and Christian will send her a message in her turn."

This was the note she wrote:—

"We shall be home this evening. We have done what we could, and our part has come to nothing, but all is right with Mr. Laurie. I am afraid Mr. Maxwell has nearly worn himself out. If he is ill, I shall know what caused it. I suppose somebody's wickedness is at the bottom of most illnesses."

And then David went away. And Millicent and Robert went out together, and had a walk on the esplanade, and about the town. They stayed there till evening. Robert did not find his aunt a dull companion. For Millicent had not now to learn how to be a brave woman and a proud one.

In the sunset, they again took their journey. And Millicent found that the change and the bitterness seemed harder to bear, when she passed out of sight of the broad rich meadows and grey sea-line which had been the scene of the crisis, back into the rows of streets, and the reek of the great city where the old, easy, happy past had been lived. It grew harder and harder as the two walked into Hackney—past the end of Acre Way, past the old church—where it almost seemed as if the ghost of the old sweeper—her first model—was standing, so vividly did the old man's figure rise before her eye. Hardest of all, when she stood under her own clematis-covered porch, at just the same hour and in just the same light as on that evening when Fergus had stopped to tell her of the great discovery. The clock chimed half-past nine as she stood there. It had chimed so then.

If Fergus Laurie's way of life had only gone apart from hers, if he had died, nay, if having once loved him, she could feel in her secret heart that she loved him still, Millicent knew that it would be better for her. Loss and pain are treasures, albeit they may strain the poor human hand that bears them. But what are waste and emptiness? Those who have a past have a future too; the dullest lake reflects the hills that stand around it. But poor Millicent had walked through her mirage, and there seemed only sands beyond.

"It is hard for David too," she thought to herself, and drained the refreshment of that drop of sympathy, as a thirsty traveller drains the bitter water which he has procured at the cost of his last camel. It had been but a mirage, poor Millicent, but henceforth there would be no friend for her like him, who had seen the mirage too! Each would have tones and turns of thought which each other would understand. The secret of many friendships lies just there.

It was Mrs. Harvey herself who opened the door. And she put her hand on her grandson's arms, as with one hasty kiss he turned to run off to "his own home."

"You are to stay here to-night, my dear," she said; "while Mr. Maxwell was calling at your house to-day, he was taken very ill. He will have to stay there—till—he is better."

"I thought there was something the matter," said Millicent. "Is he really very ill?"

"Very ill," answered the old lady. "The doctors say—well, they told the truth, because they thought there was nobody who cared much, as he is a lonely man. It is a return of the old complaint he had when he was a teacher in his youth. They say they do not think he has enough strength to get over it now."

Like the doctors, Mrs. Harvey spoke plainly, because she thought he was a dearer friend to all the family than to Millicent.

"Fergus Laurie has killed him!" said Millicent. And then her mother, looking into her face, knew that her daughter was desolate with a desolation beyond that of her own uncomforted widowhood.

CHAPTER XXII.—A SECRET.

AND so it came to pass that David Maxwell laid him down to die, not—according to the sorrowful vision which had sometimes crossed even his cheerfulness—in his lonely house, with nobody near but his poor old faithful Phœbe. Nay, Phœbe was not even the watcher in his dying chamber. She could come in and smile brightly, and speak cheerfully, but then she had to rush out, and hide her face in her apron and weep. She could not keep a serene countenance, as Christian Harvey could. Therefore it was Christian who was the watcher.

Miss Brook was there to render what help she could. Old as she was, she was still a strong, spirited woman, one of those who are never "put out," and who hold that "what one's got to do one can do." She presided at George's table in his wife's absence, and guided the ticklish invalid-cooking ostensibly in Phœbe's eager but not too skilful hands. Christian knew that the secret of a peaceful, well-managed sick-room is efficient help from outside.

"One nurse within and two without," she said.

And so the queer old maid and the strong-tempered widow sat together over their pestles and pannikins. One called her companion "Ma'am," and the other addressed hers as "Phœbe;" but the two were on that genuine equality where all sound hearts meet at such sacred times. And they talked and talked,—yes, reader, as somebody will some day sit and talk about me and about you. Well, indeed, for us if they are such kindly talkers, and if they only have such kindly things to say!

"Says the chip of a milk gal to me this morning," Phœbe narrated, aggrieved, "'This about your master is a bad job for you. I don't wonder you're cut up: you are not very young for a new service.' I was crying when she said it, but that dried me up at once't. You've no right to cry unless you've got your 'tificate of relationship."

"Ah," said Miss Brook, "it's my belief that in heaven we'll be related according to how we love. The good Samaritan will be the fellow-countryman of the wounded Jew instead of the priest and the Levite."

"Well, there's likely to be a many things more wonderful than that," assented Phœbe. "And if so be, then Master David, that's belonged to nobody, as one may say, in this world, will be one in a rare large family there. Master David has been one of the quiet ones,—nobody ever knew what he gave away, and done, and he didn't know himself, an' he let it seem such a pleasure to him, that there were those that were not backward in coming forward to give him that same. There's some people that, I b'lieve, it's kindness when you give 'em a trifle, to make a mow, and tell 'em not to come again. Any-way, that was my mite towards Mr. David's charities, often an' often. There's some things I can't stand. I can't stand a great fat woman tellin' one she hasn't tasted a bite for two days, or that she's lived on three shillings a week reg'lar for the last six months. Many a one that's told me that, I've answered that if they've thrived so well on it, I'd advise 'em to go on, an' I'd be glad o' their receipt myself. I know what clemming is. Many an' many a time I've set down to a dry bit o' pudding with two or three raisins in it calling out to each other, 'Where are you? here am I.' I've had to save my appetite till I got my money a deal oftener than to save my money till I got my appetite; but there's folks in the world that can't save anything. I've lived on the fat o' the land these many years now, and not been allowed to save in anything, 'cept my clothes, an' I've had to keep my hand in wi' them! Whenever Mr. David didn't dine at home, he always asked me what I'd had, for fear I'd put off with cheese or eggs. An' there never was a puddin' that a share didn't come back for me, an' if a visitor came unexpected, Mr. David 'ud leave his own. It wasn't the way in Blenheim House, where butter was always running short, an' me to finish up wi' dripping. 'It's as good as you get in any home of your own,' the missus would say, drat her! 'It's as good as I'd wish there,' I'd throw her back; 'but I ain't a grumblin',—if I chooses to make you a present of half my keep, that's my own affair.'

"Phoebe, I think old servants could be as saucy as any young ones," said Miss Brook.

"I wasn't her servant; I'd engaged wi' the master, when she worn't in the bargain," Phoebe rejoined triumphantly. "Of course, you know, she wasn't Mr. David's own mother. Reckon she won't be even his stepmother in the next world—if she gets there at all. She'd an immortal soul, I 'spose, but I lunno know what she'll do with it, where here's no eating or drinking or dress. Why, that woman would ha' been quite enough excuse for any other boy a-going straight to the bad. He's been a miracle, has Master David. What mightn't he ha' been, if he'd took after his father or his poor mother too, for that matter?"

"Ah, God's grace is not hereditary," said Miss Brook. "It's some little time since Ezekiel taught us that. And if it's a law of nature that we should take after somebody of our race, there are few families that haven't a good wide pick of fools and sages, and saints and sinners. Did you know anything of Mr. David's own mother, Phoebe?"

"Well, yes," said Phoebe, almost evasively. "But I know nothing that it's much use saying after the way she went off wi' that man. When a girl does that sort o' thing, it's poor talk, and seems half wicked, to say she were pretty, and lively, and obliging. She'd no mother, poor thing, an' she'd a sister that maybe wasn't the best kind of sister for her. She meant well, but she were that foolish fond of July's pretty face and ways, that she'd be wiled into going without a good shawl for herself, that July might have a new bonnet, and yet she were half afraid for her, an' if she let her too loose at one time, she pulled her up real hard at others, and she'd a sharp, biting tongue. But July knowed her sister, good and bad. She knowed she might come back to her when she was sorry for the wrong she'd done. There was nobody to give her a nay, for her sister was a widow by that time, not that her husband would have had a hard word for poor July when once the sin was away and the sorrow left. And July comed back—comed through a snow-storm in an open waggon, though she were that far gone when she got there that she could only say, 'I'd have come long before, but for the boy.' And says her sister to her, 'July, I'll stick by your boy through thick and thin.' And she looked up in her sister's arms an' smiled. She knowed she could trust her old Phoebe! An' she died that night!"

Miss Brook looked up sharply as the secret of Phoebe's life dropped out. But Phoebe noticed neither her own slip nor her companion's glance. She was crying too bitterly.

"Well, I suppose Master David got a better bringing up, one way, than his poor mother's son had any right to," she went on. "But it wasn't his father that giv' him any start in life. He had to feel that out for himself, an' got some hard knocks while he was a-doing it. An' he might ha' had a nice profession of his own, and bin a doctor, an' a good one, for he's often near cured my tooth-ache by just looking at me, if his father had been an ordinary decent man, and not put a nasty idea into people's heads, that shut his poor son out of the small beginnings that people has to make at first. It wasn't likely that doctors would take up wi' a lad whose father had evened himself with resurrection men. There isn't a secret thing that isn't laid open, that I do believe now, for if I thought anything was secret that was, and poor old Mr. Maxwell himself, he thought so too, for he was always dreadful frightened of it's coming out, as people as ain't frightened of doing things generally is."

"Then you knew it before his death, Phœbe?" asked Miss Brook.

"Yes, I knew it. That was how it was I could say my say in his house, an' no fear o' being turned out. I knew it years an' years before, but I thought he were done with it. He was an awful man, ma'am. I could tell you things that would make your hair stand up."

And poor old Phœbe, standing in that comfortable kitchen, carefully skimming beef-tea, had in her memory a scene tragic enough for poem or picture. A dimly moonlit churchyard and two men stealthily digging at a new-made grave, with a young surgeon who had directed their attention to the death and burial of one of his own patients standing by, out of his sheer, brutal inclination for wickedness, soiling the still night air with low, vile laughter and miserable jest. The poem of the tragedy lay in another figure—a woman's—her own—watching the dreadful scene, restraining her own boiling indignation, all that she might have a power over this degraded man—a power that should enable her to serve and save his infant son—her own sister's nameless orphan.

"You should have spoken out, Phœbe," said Miss Brook; "there's no kindness in hiding a sin that isn't repented of."

"Ay, ma'am, an' Master David said just so, though he didn't know the rights of what he was talking about, poor boy. I'm sure I did it for his own self's sake, God bless him, an' he did own he was a bit the better for me."

"Why, he could have been only a baby when you entered the Maxwells' service," Miss Brook observed, with interest, and not without intent to develop the knowledge she had acquired so accidentally.

"And can't you do aught for a baby's sake, ma'am?" said Phœbe. "Ah, you've never been married, miss, more's the pity for the man that's missed you. You've never had no baby crowing in your arms. No more ain't I, ma'am. But me and my husband, we had to bury a bit o' a wee wax angel that had never looked up at either of us. It was a rare cuttin' up for my poor man; and he laid it that it happened through some sore troubles I'd had. He seemed to feel it more than me at first. But it's queer—I've never see a baby since that hasn't seemed as if my still-born beauty were somehow in it. They may be fatter or thinner, or fairer or darker, but I always feel to myself, if it wasn't just for that difference, they would be her very picter! An' after that, ye'll own a baby's sake may be as much as any other body's, more especial one that was born the very day mine was buried—and that was—that was—" and here Phœbe threw her apron over her head, and sobbed outright—"that was like another baby that you'd nussed and dragged about when you were little more than a baby yourself."

"I aint a good one to make things plain," Phœbe went on presently, "I can't speak right out: there's some things I won't say even while I want to, and I can't set it all plain while I'm a holding something back, as some folks can."

"Well, Phœbe," said Miss Brook, "keep something fresh to tell in heaven. We needn't be afraid of having a secret, if it's one we shall be able to speak out there."

"Master David's taking one or two such secrets with him," said Phœbe tearfully, "and may be, he'll hear one or two in his turn."

"Maybe, he won't hear them just yet," Miss Brook interrupted, rather fiercely. "Maybe, he's not going to die now, after all. I was given over by doctors twice before I was twenty, and here I am now, and believe I shall be till I'm a hundred."

"The Lord grant you're right," said poor Phœbe, "only I lose heart because he's grown so like—somebody—that I saw die years ago. I'd like to go first, and let him bury me. Many's the time I've told him so."

"Well, Phœbe," said Miss Brook, "if you are to stay behind, depend on't there's a reason for it. The withering leaves hold to the tree longer than the blossoms, that they may take care of them till the last."

"Ay, and that's so," Phœbe cried, with a light of battle kindling in her eye. "There's one or two things that I'll be even glad to stay behind, just for to say! That impident Betsey, the parlour girl at Acre Hall, had been telling over her lies to the laundress, who told me. Miss Devon was in calling at the Hall, an' she asked how Mr. Maxwell was, thinking they'd be sure to know, and says Miss Robina, 'O we want to hear nothing about him now: my brother picked him out of the gutter, and he proved ungrateful : that is all our connection with him.' But I know who lent Mr. Fergus the first money he got hold of! They two young men talked as free as could be before me, coming in an' out o' Blenheim House parlour. If Miss Robina don't mind what she's saying, I'll astonish her! Phœbe Winter won't hide the truth and encourage the devil a second time in her life! Picked out of the gutter, indeed! For that matter, howsomever, her brother picked Miss Robina hersel' out o' the gutter, and she'll smell of it to the end of her days. But don't let them tell no lies about my master—especially if he's taken, and can't any longer be a smoothing me down as he could and did. I'll die an old vinegar-vixen yet, I believe, if I'm left to myself." And Phœbe carried the beef-tea up-stairs, and wept so bitterly that she had to leave it at David's chamber door, and lost one of her few remaining "sights" of him.

CHAPTER XXIII.—THE END OF MILLICENT'S ROMANCE.

HEARTS might be aching, and fierce passions still throbbing all around. But in the chamber of death there was peace—the peace that passeth all understanding.

David knew that he was dying. He said so himself, and only added in a whisper, "It is so strange." And there came upon his face a look as of one who in a beautiful silence, listens for a burst of still more beautiful music.

He named Fergus Laurie once—only once. And fearful lest he might be repressing a wish that he thought would not be approved, Christian forced herself to ask if he would like to see him.

"No," he said. "Don't send for him, for perhaps he would not come, and then he would be sorry afterwards."

The nature of his illness as well as its great weakness, forbade him speaking often, or ever above whispers. He lay for hours with his eyes closed, and would then smilingly whisper to Christian that he was "dull company."

He liked her to read to him—especially from Isaiah, and the Psalms and Revelation. And as he lay with shut eyes, there were verses which she heard him saying softly to himself.

"They shall not hunger nor thirst : neither shall the heat nor sun smite them ; for He that hath mercy on them shall lead them, even by the springs of water shall He guide them."

"And they shall build the old wastes, they shall raise up the former desolations, and they shall repair the waste cities, the desolations of many generations."

"And God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes ; and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow, nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain."

"Delight thyself in the Lord ; and He shall give thee the desire of thine heart."

He said that twice, and then opened his eyes, and whispered, "Yes, He does, except when we desire a stone, and then He gives us bread."

Another time he said, "What a pity I didn't contrive to take better care of myself last week, and remember to eat my meals and to keep myself from worrying! Because this happening afterwards makes Phœbe think things that make her bitter. I wish she would see that I did nothing but what thousands do every day, and that I am dying because I am not worth life."

"I knew I had a very uncertain life by the rate I had to pay to insure an annuity for Phœbe. She don't know I did it. She'd have made a fuss, and opposed it. But when it's all over, I think it will be a pleasant surprise to find it out."

"I made my will years and years ago, and there is now but little more than the definite sum that is definitely disposed of there. That little goes also to Phœbe, and so, of course, does my furniture. If she takes a boarder, in my place, as it were, I think she may be very comfortable. You may recommend any one to her care. You may, really, on my word."

"But there are two or three little remembrances I should like to leave."

"I will write them down," said Christian, "and then your own words will go with them, and make them so much more precious."

"I want you to take my desk. It is only an old, old desk, that used to be in Blenheim House, but my hand had got so used to it, that I never cared to get another. It is not worth giving, only there are a lot of papers inside, and you are so kind, that I am sure you will look over them for me, and burn what ought to be burned. Will you?"

"I will," said Christian.

"I am afraid I have nothing fit to leave your husband, or even Robert. My watch is only silver, and I should like to give that to the lad who helped me in the laboratory. He has none at all, and it would be useful to him, for it keeps good time. Ah, but I have a little gold locket. You will find it in a drawer in my desk. I bought it years ago.

I don't know what made me buy it. It has A. E. I. engraved on it. Give that to your husband, and tell him he is to put your portrait inside. Ay, and there is the engraving from that picture of the men who went into church to scoff, but 'remained to pray.' Give that to Robert, with my best wishes. It will be a contribution towards his own furnishing," added the dying man playfully, thinking, with a smile, of the probable bright lines of the healthy young life that had touched his own so nearly just at its close.

"Give Mr. and Mrs. Webber that set of 'The Rake's Progress.' I remember hearing her say that she enjoyed Hogarth. So do I. One can dare to look at the gloom of the world, when one knows God sees it too."

"I won't ask you to give anything to Fergus Laurie. He might fancy it was only a kind of reproach. It's no use showing goodwill, when it is likely to raise bad will. Poor Fergus, he don't know himself just now. But if ever—if it should happen—that you should see him, and that he should mention me as if he didn't quite hate me, I should like you to give him my Prayer-Book, and to say that I asked you to do so whenever he should speak about me—but not before. Tell him I thought it might pain him to send him a dying gift in the middle of his angry thoughts. But that I wanted him to have this remembrance the moment he could think of me less bitterly, and forgive whatever he doesn't understand."

"And now"—and a pale, pale flush flitted over the sunken face, and there was a rail perceptible even in the almost voiceless voice—"and now, I should like to give my Bible to Miss Millicent. We have worked with each other so long, and been through so much together, you see. She won't mind my leaving it to her, do you think?"

"It will be a pleasure to Millicent—ay, and a blessing too," said Christian frankly.

"Then if you will hand me the book and a pen, I think I can write her name in it."

Christian obeyed.

The weak hand was long in obeying the loving will, and as Christian took back the volume, she glanced at its new inscription. It was only "Millicent Harvey." Nothing more. A life's love might lie between the failing letters, but only angels could read it.

"I have enjoyed nothing so much as those grapes Miss Millicent brought me," said David, faintly turning his face aside upon his pillow.

"I will tell her so," answered Christian, "and then she will bring some more."

For Millicent had called at her brother's house twice, and even thrice a day to ask after David. She had left clusters of grapes and bunches of flowers. That was all she could do. She had no right to do more. She had not been David's friend as Christian had. Nay, when without the slightest improvement, he still lingered till Christian needed a relief-guard for her watches by night, Hatty Webber had come. Even Hatty had been far more David's friend than Millicent Harvey.

After the exertion and excitement of expressing these last wishes, the dying man lay silent and motionless for hours. Christian did not know whether he slept. He did not stir when her tea was brought up to her. She, too, sat motionless, thinking and dreaming of those half-forgotten things which come back upon us in all their freshness when we watch in death chambers—looks, and smiles, and words of those who have gone before, and who seem not so far away then, but as though they had come down to their other shore to welcome the boat which we are watching drift away from ours, and perhaps to ask tidings of us.

The sunlight faded from the room, and the grey shadows of twilight had crept over it, before David spoke again. Then he startled his watcher from her reverie by a clearer tone than she had heard for days.

"I am getting so rested! I think I shall go into heaven quite fresh. I've heard some people say that they hoped heaven would give them a rest, and others that it would give them more strength for work. I think I understand now. Each will get what he is fit for. I think Jesus Christ will welcome each one—and to some He will say, 'Go first and take the sleep of my beloved,' and to others, 'Come at once and sit with me at our Father's table.' It will be just like going home after a long journey. If we had a rest by the way, we go in ready for work, but if not, we must take a slumber when we get there. But home is home, either way, and heaven is heaven."

"What a comfort it is to be sure that one is going to heaven, because it is nothing to do with one's self, but all with Jesus!"

"Dear friend, who have been so good to me! Has Miss Millicent been here yet this evening? If not, I want to see her when she comes, and Phoebe too, please."

"It will be too much for you. You will have a bad night afterwards," Christian reasoned.

"It will make no difference at all," he answered, and looked at her, with a strong light returned to his dim eyes, which told her he was right.

He did not speak again till Millicent came. Even when he heard her ring at the street-door, he only silently turned his face to watch for her entrance.

She and Phœbe came in together. He stretched his thin hand towards them, and smiled. Voice was far too precious to be used in any common greeting.

"It is different since we parted," he gasped to Millicent.

"It is well to be you, and go away," she said; with one tearless sob.

"And it is as well to be you, and stay," he smiled. "I should like to stay—for some reasons. But it is best for me to go. You'll never say that it was not, Miss Millicent? I am so sorry about Fergus—so are you, aren't you? We shall be so glad when he comes to his right mind again, shan't we? That is one of the things I should like to stay to see!"

"I shall be glad for your sake," sobbed Millicent, whose tears were coming fast now.

"Ah, you'll really be more glad for his own sake, though you mayn't own it, or know it, till you are lying as I am now. Good-bye, Miss Millicent, and give my kindest remembrances to your mother."

"Good-bye, dear old Phœbe," he said fondly. "But oh, Phœbe, I do wish I'd heard something about my mother."

"I'll tell you the best news you can hear of her now, Master David," cried the old woman. "She were a sinner that wanted pardon, and got it; and she'll tell you all the rest hersel'. She'd ha' told you hersel' if she'd lived, and I warn't agoin' to do it when she wasn't there to put in a word between, and kiss ye, an' take yer kiss at the end o' the story."

"Mother!" said the dying man, as he might have said it if he had seen her bending over him, with his image mirrored in her eyes. He kept hold of Phœbe's hand for a moment, and then let it drop, and Christian gently put the two weeping women from the chamber.

Millicent did not go home. She spent the night sitting in the parlour with Phœbe and Miss Brook, neither of whom went to bed.

When she left her brother's house next morning, all the blinds were down, and she went home with David's Bible in her hand.

"He is just gone," she said to her mother, and went straight up to her own room, and sat down and wept as she had not wept for years and years; and cried to God as she had never before cried in her life.

"Father, forgive me that I am not able to forgive! O Father, Father, I do want to forgive! O Father, I am outside Thy kingdom still, but do not shut Thy door! Forgive us our sins, as we forgive those that sin against us! O Father, there is no entrance there for me! Unless Thou help me to forgive, I cannot. I have tried, and my forgiveness has been thrown back to me, and lies in my own heart till it corrupts to bitterer hatred."

And a voice came into her heart and said, "I will help thee to forgive. See what a poor creature thou art. There was one of my saints beside thee, and thou didst not know him for a saint. There was self-righteousness in thy heart, which is the proof of unforgiven sin, yet thou thought thyself a Christian. It needed something to show thee these things. Thou seest them by the flaming ruin of another life. Henceforth thou owest something to that poor ruin. It has lit thee from a precipice—it has revealed to thee a hidden crystal. Canst not thou pity its own desolation?—canst not thou be prepared, if the day of its rebuilding comes, to carry a stone to its foundation, or a carving to its cornice? It might have been thy life instead of that life. Thou wast as far from God as that was. Who makest thee to differ?"

And Millicent rose up and faced the emptied life in which she had found her Redeemer. As Hatty had met Him in the spring morning sunlight of life, and George in the summer's noontide heat—so Millicent met him in the grey and sultry autumn afternoon. Nobody knew of the meeting. When the great Books of Life are opened, nothing will be more astonishing than some of the dates therein. Henceforth Millicent was not "her own," but "Christ's." And there was joy in heaven over a sinner that repented. It is strange how that sweet sentence has grown distorted on the minds of men. They cannot understand Christ's beautiful irony. All must feel sinners, and repent, before they can be forgiven, and the "just persons who need no repentance" are simply those lost ones who cause that mysterious undershade of divine sorrow which is cast by the yearning arms of divine love.

David was buried. They carried him out into the country, and laid him under an old Norman tower, in a grave that nobody else would ever share. And on his tombstone they did not carve the name that had darkened his life—that had been but the haunting ghost of sin and shame and sorrow—they simply put—

TO THE MEMORY OF DAVID,
A SERVANT OF GOD.

And there they left him. And Millicent went back to her work and to her duties. Oh how she wished that she had known him and loved him with a long, constant, familiar knowledge and love! Had it been so, her heart, now so poor, would have been rich with a treasure safe in heaven. Instead of which she had stored where moth and rust had verily corrupted it, till at last a thief had entered and stolen even the last remains!

It so happened that the Sunday after David's funeral Millicent went to church alone. The weather was stormy, and her mother was not very strong, and Miss Brook had a cold. Even the sacred service was trying to the lonely heart, left with blighted fields in its harvest time. There was comfort in the chosen text, "The grass withereth, the flower fadeth: but the word of our God shall stand for ever." Yet it was stern comfort, which braced for endurance rather than soothed into hope. It made her leave the church, when all was over, feeling strong enough to bear her own sense of loss and waste, and to face the long sterile prospect of the future without fancying a single flower to soften it. She went lonely down the churchyard path. There was no familiar group about her now to give sweet human meanings to the divine message. Brother and sister were now to other groups what her mother had been to them, and she had kept no place for herself in those groups, but they must be rent, as it were, however lovingly, to let her in. There was no Fergus watching to give greeting. There was no David marking the text for his Sunday-scholars, or holding the gate open for poor old women. No, of all MILLICENT'S ROMANCE, there remained but the Bible of the dead in her hand, and in her heart a burning pain of pity for the living.

SEVENTY YEARS.

AND is this age? There's wrinkle o'er her brow,
And snow has fallen on the nut-brown hair,
The rose is faded too—but where are now
The strain of struggle, and the stamp of care?

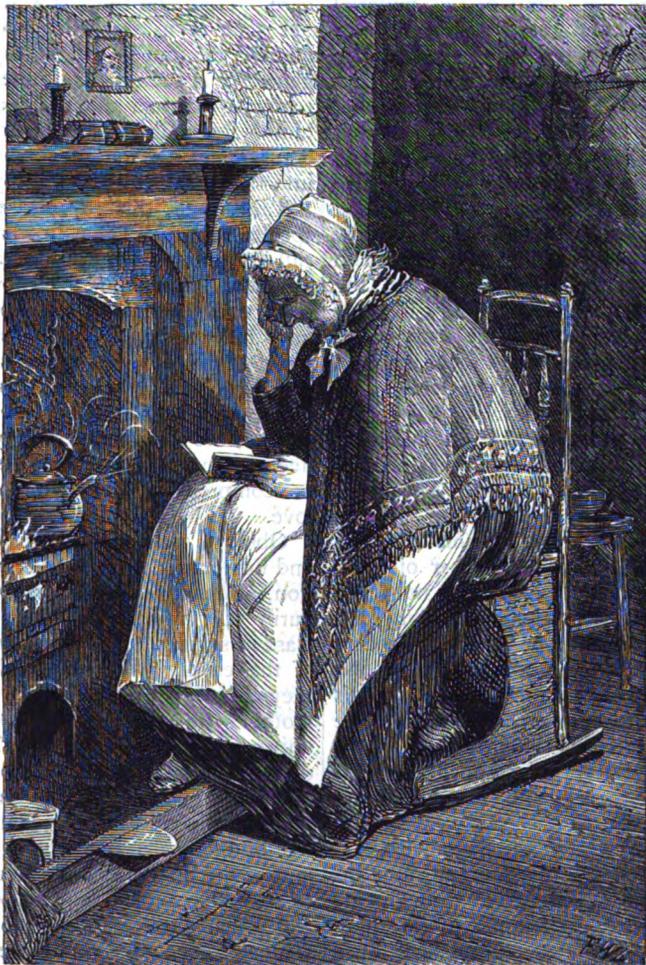

All gone. Her struggle's past, her care is dead.
Her only labour is to rest and wait.
And need one envy girlhood's restless joy,
Who sits and watches close at Heaven's gate?

Where is the love that cheered her youthful days?
Where all the faces that she used to see?
Ay, where, the darlings of her later age,
The child that learned to pray beside her knee?

All gone before her. Yet she is content.
Her pleasures now bloom freshly every day.
She's happy when her neighbour's linnets sing,
She's happy when her neighbour's children play.

She grieves (for with no pain, there is no peace),
She grieves o'er sorrows that are not her own.
She used to watch two brothers pass to school—
She sighs to see the elder pass alone !

And thus she sits and waits at Heaven's gates :
There's but one thought that ever shades her brow :
She had one son she lost before he died :
Long, long before—but he is buried now.

Yet, having seen much sorrow and much joy,
She has seen nothing that need breed Despair ;
So, when she thinks of Heaven's golden street,
She hopes to meet her missing darling there !

ISABELLA FVIE MAYO.

“THE JOY OF BIRTH.”

“Joy that a man is born into the world.”—JOHN xvi. 21.

HERE is mention of an event as constant, and as common, as any that occurs in human homes. Yet, while one of the commonest events in the world, it is also, by universal consent, and in the universal feeling, one of the most profoundly interesting. Nothing can compete with it, unless it be death, which, truly regarded and worthily reached, is a second birth—deliverance from the womb of this material world into ampler and freer worlds of the sky.

Born! The child is born! A little son or daughter, a little brother or sister, has come, and has come to stay! What other news could be so welcome? What other “joy” has in it the wide and varied human interest which is connected with the joy of birth? Among all the myriads of human homes where this event is transpiring, how very few are there in which it is the occasion of sadness or disappointment! Even the poor man who already has “God’s blessing in the way of children,” as the story saith, cannot easily frame his heart to feel that one too many has been sent. If he feels so in moments of care and weariness, before the birth, as soon as that royal event has happened in his cottage, his care is lightened, his apprehensions laid to rest. The event explains, defends itself. “There will be room for this one also!” is his thought. “The great Father of all is Father of each. We need not be anxious; we need not fear.” No herald is needed to prepare the way, nor any religious instruction or counsel to secure the young entrant a proper welcome and provision. The infant’s wail, the infant’s murmur, are quite enough to cast down the little mountains of apprehension, to fill up the valleys of anxiety, to establish the right to live, and be loved, and cared for, and nourished like the rest. Away, mistrustful thoughts! Be quiet, over-anxious heart! A very king has begun his journey, and his “way,” be it long or short, through the desert of time will be “prepared” for him. Easily, sweetly prepared. See, the little monarch is opening his eye; and that look, although far abroad and not easily fixed, is a look of command. All in the house are in turn its servitors. He is waving his little dimpled arm—no doubt in a very aimless manner—but an invisible sceptre is in the hand that can grasp nothing else, and all willingly bow to it.

“The joy of birth” rises highest in the mother’s heart. In her case it is preceded by “anguish,” which of course naturally heightens the joy. Her “sorrow” leaves no marks or memories. It ebbs far back “like waters which pass away,” to make room for the great tide of joy which now fills and purifies her heart. “A man has been born into the world!” We must not overstate the case. Here and there is a Rachel who, “as her soul is in departing,” calls her son’s name “Ben-oni”—son of my sorrow. But generally in such a case there is some Jacob ready to baptize the child afresh, and call him “Benjamin”—son of my right hand. Thus many a “son of sorrow” is yet born into the world of hope and joy.

Take, then, this joy of birth in its most specific form. Take it in what we may truly call its fountain-head, or, at any rate, in its fountain fulness, in the mother’s heart,—what does it mean? We may well inquire into this wonderful phenomenon. We may well stand beside this fountain-head of love and joy which is opened in every young mother’s heart, and consider;—until, perchance, we shall be led to yet higher and deeper fountains, and feel that we and ours are comprehended in a yet vaster and purer love.

Observe well, the emotion is instinctive and universal. It is not the result of education, although education may augment and purify it. It is not confined to any select class in society, or to any particular nations of the earth. Wherever children are born they are grasped and held in the arms of a mother’s joy. What is thus instinctive and universal is divine. We have here no merely derived, complex emotion, composed of the elements of civilisation, and refined by human culture. We evidently come upon one of the primary and unsophisticated feelings of the human heart. Here is one spring of life which sin has touched less than others, and which is less affected by outward circumstances, for all social and even all religious advantages do not much enhance or improve it in its primordial condition; and, on the other hand, the darkest gloom of heathenism, and all the rudeness of savage life, do by no means extinguish it,—in many instances hardly even modify or repress it. Now, just as we say that conscience is divine, men everywhere having that moral faculty or sense in them which points to an eternal and unchangeable right and wrong; so, in its own place and measure does this universal motherly joy justly claim to be divine, and, as a divine thing, to teach its own lessons. Some of these lessons we shall find by examining the feeling as far as we may, and resolving it, as far as we can, into its constituent parts. First principles are the strongest of any. Instinctive emotions, although we are not in the habit of examining them narrowly, will be found, when analyzed, to have the deepest and widest basis of truth and fact. They lie close upon, and, indeed, flow out of the infinite and unchangeable emotions of God. Why, then, does the young mother rejoice?

1. She rejoices in life. A new life is begun. Another stream has issued from the eternal fountain. As yet it is but a tiny rill, trickling, tinkling softly as it flows; but who knows what volume it may acquire, how deep and broad it may become as it flows on through interminable time? Another light has been kindled. It is indeed at first but a low flickering flame, which would soon be blown out if set and left in the open air of the world; but, shielded and nourished, that little flame, that dim rushlight in the corner of the house, that glimmering glow-worm of the dell that can guide no wayfarer's steps, may grow and brighten into a great steady light by which ships on the ocean and travellers on the land will direct their way, may at length become a very star in the firmament, set high, and for ever, above earthly mutations. At any rate, this is life, and there is joy among the living, on account of the more life that has come.

God loves life, as this teeming world bears witness in all her soils, through all her seas; and all who live truly, love life like God. Even those who live far from truly, have in them the ineradicable passion which flames out when occasion is given, and which, so far as it goes, lifts them out of isolation and death. Thus, alike in God the maker of life, and in men who receive and cherish it, joyfully, there is witness borne to its transcendent value. The way out of all this world's immeasurable difficulty, out of all its sin and misery—what is it? The stopping of the process of continuity? the burning of the world itself with all its seeds and springs of reproductive energy? Nay, just the opposite. The troubles of life are to be cured, instrumentally, by increase of life. God has no fear, for He still creates. The world's motherhood, which is one of the world's most sacred things, has no fear, for it still rejoices when the child is born. The unworn freshness of every infant's face, the rocking of every cradle, the chime of every nurse's song, and the quiet singing joy of every mother's heart tell, all, the same tale of hopefulness and confidence, and point on to a future of triumph, fulfilment, order, and peace. 'Tis true there are myriads of fathers and mothers who have no thought of this, in their own personal intelligence, and no purpose to promote it in their own or their children's lives; but not the less, in some sense all the more, is this the meaning and the teaching of this world-wide parental joy.

2. Again. To branch out the thought, is it too much to say that this joy in birth is the adoption, it may be unconsciously, of the principle of continuity by a line of succession which undoubtedly obtains in the manifestation and history of the human life on earth? Men are "born into the world"—to die. The little sleeper in the cradle will soon be wrapped in a deeper sleep in the coffin. It may be one year; or ten; or seventy—and that deeper sleep will have come. The difference between the one and the other is but little in the annals of eternity; but little even in the history of the race. The well-known emblems which signify the brevity of life are still true. It is "a vapour vanishing away;" a sound, dying in the air; "a flower," cut down or withering; "a tale" which at any moment may be all "told." Thousands of meditative men have surveyed and considered this process, until their very souls have been full of shadow and sadness. No serious person, however cheerful in temperament, can altogether surmount the gloom, and there are moments when it deepens into night. Man seems "walking in a vain show." The devouring grave is never full: hungry death is never satisfied. Brightest things fade the soonest. Fairest blossoms are the first to wither. Disappointed hope, swift disaster, unexpected sorrow for which the poor heart is in no way ready, and wrongs unrighted, and virtues unrewarded, and endeavours which miss the mark, and soaring aspirations which rise but a little way, and then fall back into the yearning bosom which sent them forth—these are the elements of which this human life is made. Why do men, knowing and seeing all this, keep up the stir? Why do they build cities and cover the ocean with their ships? Why do they not at once acknowledge that there is nothing to register but one long failure and defeat; and, casting aside the pen, the plough, the hammer, forgetting the lover's tale, and forsaking the marriage altar, resolve that the fleeting mockery at last shall end? Instead of this, what do we see? We see the newcomers, as they emerge out of nothingness, received with unusual joy. And although they are personally so helpless that they can for a while do literally nothing for themselves and would certainly perish, one by one, if they were not watched and cared for through almost every hour of the day, the care and watchfulness necessary are cheerfully given. No doubt there are neglected infants, who, in consequence, die, and get away to the summer world, where they will be nourished by the angels. But the rule is, among men, that the tenderest and most complete ministrations are habitually extended to the youngest and the most helpless. "Can the mother forget her sucking child, that she should not have compassion on the son of her womb?" Can a father feel that he bears in his arms but so much moulded clay? When an infant is brought into the centre of a group of little children, will they all look at something else?—why, every eye beams on the little wonder, and plaything and story are dropped for the time, that one and another may try the weight, and bear the precious burden, and by some miracle of youthful skill draw a smile from the chubby face. You might set a little tottering infant on the crowded street, and if you left it there, I believe it would be safer than you yourself would be in the same situation. The hurrying passenger would pause and give a hand. The reckless driver would draw the rein. Every one within view would feel a personal interest, such as subjects feel when their king is in jeopardy, and would watch until the little king of human hearts was rescued and set in safety. Now, my brethren, what is all this but a universal human protest, instinctively given, against those gloomy and depressing views of our life and destiny, which serious observation and meditation of the facts of human life are so apt of themselves to bring?

It still is true, of course, that life is short—that each is born to die—that all the living in ceaseless procession are marching into the grave. Yet those who know all this, and feel it sometimes to pain, hail the children when they come, and keep them and prepare the way before them, not as if they were mere shadows in a phantom procession, but as if they were, what indeed they are—creatures of God, who have their part and place assigned in the stupendous evolution of his providence, and who when they have served their generation according to the will of God, will, like their fathers, "fall on sleep." Thus while our fears protest against death, our instincts and affections do involuntary homage to God's method of continuity and succession. We mourn by the graves of our kindred, and we pensively anticipate our own decline; but we also rejoice when "a man is born into the world." The young mother represents us all. Her joy is the joy of humanity. It is as fresh now as when children first were born. It is the heart's deep assent to God's method of peopling and ruling the world, and clearly points to a time when death shall be swallowed up of life.

3. But, thirdly, what of the individual? Human life in continuity, the generations succeeding each other like the links in a chain, with a view to a grand future result, is a magnificent process and spectacle, if we can believe that all who thus have part in the process may be sharers in the joy and glory of the result when it is attained. But surely the whole interest of the process would be immeasurably diminished and saddened if we must regard the individuals and the generations as made up of individuals—as literally perishing on the way to it. If there is no personal immortality, what other immortality can there be? If still through every future age the individual must die, and never live again, no possible splendour of human achievement, no perfectness of human society could ever compensate for so stupendous a sacrifice. Say that perfection is reached at length—that sin is vanquished—that the reign of eternal peace begins, and yet that death still holds sway, and the grave still draws, no longer weariness, and sorrow, and sin, but brightness now, and virtue and every form of unselfish human love into the realm of eternal silence, "what have we gained?" Still "every man walketh in a vain show." Every man and all the world "at its best state is altogether vanity." The mockery of such a condition of things would be even more bitter and unendurable than the mockery of these sinful days. Justification of the divine goodness in such a case would be impossible, just as it would be impossible to say one good word for the policy of a commander who should sacrifice every soldier in his army, and every citizen and subject of the kingdom for which he fights, all his enemies perishing too, in order to attain an ideal victory. Nor can we worthily conceive of any refined selected part of the race raised to immortal existence by the sacrifice of innumerable generations. The thought of such amazing loss would poison all their felicity. All history would be to them a grave.

Immortality then is, and must be, the immortality of the individual, and our joy in the birth of children may be expected to have, more or less consciously, some reference to so great a destiny. I believe it is even so. It is not a little plaything the mother welcomes when the infant, newly-born, is put into her desiring arms, but a very child of God, into which He has breathed the breath of life, and which has thus "become a living soul." Her travail of body and spirit becomes nobler than the pangs of brute creatures only when she can think that something is born not to die. It is an awful while a blessed "heritage" which she thus receives "of the Lord." Well may her heart tremble with softest pity, and glow with a sacred "joy," when such a gift is put into her hands. Well may the whole house be hushed in reverence and full of gladness when it is said, "Unto us a child is born: unto us a son is given." Not in vain are we born when we know, or may know, that we shall never die.

4. It is this immortal life which is put into our hands for training, and in the joy that welcomes the new-born, there is, probably, some sensible appreciation of the greatness of this trust. "Lo, children are an heritage from the Lord." It is impossible for those who receive it, in any worthy manner, to evade the sense of responsibility which must come with it. It is a heritage to be kept, cultivated, improved, as long as it is in hand. "Bring them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord." Let the "sons" be "plants," green and freshly growing. Let the "daughters" be "corner stones, polished after the similitude of a palace." There is, however, in most cases, probably no desire to evade the sense of responsibility in general, which comes, in connection inseparable, with so great a gift. Every great gift is a trust, and is felt to be so, and the feeling is pleasant. If there be a gift which can only be received and laid past, or quickly used and ended—which can neither be increased nor diminished, it will be simply impossible to have the same feeling about it which arises instinctively in connection with the reception of a gift which comes to us in trust. "Here is something I am to care for, watch over, nourish, defend, improve, increase. This is the gift that wins my heart!" Within the whole sphere of human action no instance of care and self-sacrifice can be found more complete, and perhaps none on the whole so touching and beautiful as that which is so common—the unmeasured and uncalculating love of the mother to the child. She watches, cares, suffers, gives—"to the uttermost." Why? No doubt in part because mother is mother and child is child—because the law of love is instinctive and does not wait for reasons and justifications; but in part also, surely, because there is a feeling in the mind, as deep and true as any instinct, that there comes with the little infant a great and solemn stewardship, of which account shall be given hereafter. It is this which dignifies the countless little cares and services which attend cot and cradle, and run through the years of nursing, which makes a mother's patience interminable, and her faith and hope unconquerable. She has an innate and abiding sense of the greatness of the trust committed to her. She cannot help comporting herself like one high in office. It is not her own child alone who is in her hands for nurture; it is the child of the King as well—one for whom a crown and kingdom are in preparation, and who must one day either come into joyful possession, or suffer ignominious forfeiture. But the true maternal conviction is, that there need be no failure—that this solemn trust may be so borne and discharged that there will be joy in giving account of it, even as there is joy in receiving it when "a man is born unto the world."

That there may be failure and disaster is, alas! too certain. Every bad man and woman living once slept an infant's sleep of innocence. Most of them were welcomed with joy, and had omens and auspices of a hopeful kind hovering about them in their first years. Now all is dark. The life is stained and broken, and apparently crumbling into final ruin. How sad the change! How bitter the disappointment! Therefore it cannot be denied that failure is possible; nor that it may be, in its circumstances, inexpressibly sad. Fathers and mothers know this; and yet they rejoice when their children are born; and the joy over the last is in its kind the same, and generally as great as over the first. All which, surely we may say, imports this much, that there is a conviction, more or less conscious, in the parental mind, that the duties of the relation may be, through divine grace, effectually discharged; and that where they are so, we may confidently look for a good result. There are many things which go to corroborate this wholesome conviction—as that all seeming failure is not real failure, gracious growing going on amid many imperfections; that real failure is often retrieved; that ruins are built up by the wonder-working power of God; that, in last days of life there is sometimes a change, the storm becomes a calm, and the barque with broken masts and rent sails and leaking timbers, driven by a heaven-sent breeze, glides into the haven. But, at any rate, the conviction exists. Partly by a kind of instinct, and partly by inference and reason, there is deeply and broadly fixed in the human breast what we have called a wholesome condition, that for all relations into which we are brought, and for all duties required at our hands, there are full and adequate supplies of wisdom and strength; and that therefore that gift which, of all gifts, is among the most precious, that trust which, of all trusts, is the most solemn, should be accepted, while with solicitude and fear, yet also with great thankfulness and "joy."

Such, then, as it seems to me, are at least some of the elements of this joy in birth, which is universal, but which has its chief fountain-head in the mother's heart. It means love of life—like that of God to his children and his creatures—life as a good thing. It means compliance with God's method of bringing the human life into this world by succession of ages and generations in a chain of unbroken continuity. It expresses faith in a personal immortality. It is the acceptance of a trust, which while it is felt to be solemn and responsible, is felt at the same time to dignify those who receive it, and to bring with it the needful grace wherewith it may be safely borne and fully discharged.

By these, and such-like considerations, this joy in birth is explained and justified. It is not only a natural, but a legitimate, feeling. It is a true and bright prophecy. It is an echo, almost a forthflowing of the joy of God.

THE WORD OF CHRIST.

"And He laid his right hand upon me, saying unto me, Fear not; I am the first and the last."—REV. I. 17.

AS the mighty winds of heaven in their calm effect contest—
As the sound of many waters in a unity of rest—
So, beyond my plan or guidance, tossed upon an awful sea,
Softly amid reckless currents came the word of Christ to me.

Then with strength of tender meaning wind and wave my heart drew near,
In the boldness of their power owning that I need not fear.
And with his right hand upon me all their will I bade them do,
For these stern unbending forces are my Saviour's servants too.

They obey a gentle order in the worst their fury dares,
Sent to manifest the glory of a life that is not theirs.
Things that may not spare their portion leave the breathing soul in peace;
It will yield and live for ever—they can but prevail and cease.

And they shall prevail unhindered in a way they cannot heed,
Where destruction must deliver and the life is life indeed,
Where they lead the captive spirit under care beyond their scan
To the everlasting triumph of a joy in God for man.

Let the tyranny that passes have me at its own command,
In the circle of Thy greatness, in the shelter of Thy hand!
Thou Eternal, Thou Almighty, wilt the blessed secret see
That is with Thy human creature in this word of Christ to me.

CUSTOMS AND CURIOSITIES OF MADAGASCAR.

PART III.

THE funeral customs are not the same throughout the island. In the centre of the island they build stone tombs, part underground and part above ground. They are very careful about their tombs, the size and beauty of which are in proportion to the position of the family, and unfortunately sometimes out of proportion to their means. They pay far more attention to their tombs than to their houses. The door of the tomb is frequently closed by a large flat, roughly rounded stone, which is rolled up in front so as to close it, or rolled back to open it.

The tomb is always built on the borders of the family possessions, and the ground on which the tomb stands cannot be alienated. They never rent land to build a tomb on, it must be their own possession. This puts us in mind of Abraham's purchasing from the sons of Heth a burying-place for Sarah, given in Genesis, which to my mind, is the most beautiful and thrilling picture of patriarchal life to be found anywhere—beautiful, simple, pathetic, yet grand—perfect, both as regards the subject and the execution.

“And Abraham stood up from before his dead, and spake unto the sons of Heth, saying, I am a stranger and a sojourner with you: give me a possession of a burying-place with you, that I may bury my dead out of my sight. And the children of Heth answered Abraham, saying unto him, Hear us, my lord: thou art a mighty prince among us; in the choice of our sepulchres bury thy dead; none of us shall withhold from thee his sepulchre, but that thou mayest bury thy dead. . . . And he communed with them, saying, If it be your mind that I should bury my dead out of my sight; hear me, and entreat for me to Ephron the son of Zohar, that he may give me the cave of Machpelah, which he hath, which is in the end of his field; for as much money as it is worth, he shall give it me for a possession of a burying-place amongst you.” . . . Ephron said, “Nay, my lord, hear me: the field give I thee, and the cave that is therein, I give it thee; in the presence of the sons of my people, give I it thee: bury thy dead. And Abraham bowed down himself before the people of the land. And he spake unto Ephron in the audience of the people of the land, saying, But if thou wilt give it, I pray thee, hear me: I will give thee money for the field; take it of me, and I will bury my dead there.”

Not to be buried in the family tomb is reckoned a greater calamity than death itself. When the soldier or any other one dies in a distant district, his bones are brought back to be laid with his fathers. I have seen them carefully preserve an amputated limb in order to place it in the family grave. The first patient supplied with a wooden leg in Madagascar died a few years afterwards of fever. I wished to preserve the article as a curiosity—the first wooden leg in Madagascar, designed and constructed for me by Mr. Parrett, the printer; for although a surgical-instrument maker in England might not much admire the article, we looked upon it with no little admiration. After I heard that my former patient had ceased to require it, I promptly sent for it. I was put off in a polite way until after the funeral, when I was told that it was considered a part of the body of the deceased, and that they had buried it with him.

The Tanala, who live in the forest to the south-east of the capital, have a different way of disposing of their dead. They do not build tombs, but make a large box—often a tree hollowed out. This they place at a distance in the forest, and in this they place the body, previously wrapped up in mats. The Belsileo, again, more nearly resemble the Hovahs in their mode of burial. They build cenotaphs pretty much like the tombs we have described, but they dig a winding subterranean passage, somewhere near the cenotaph, in the further end of which they cut ledges upon which they place the corpse. The most singular practice, however, in connection with funeral rites, is that followed in the case of the Andriana or Princes of the Belsileo. No sooner does an Andriana die, than they kill bullocks and cut off their skin into stripes, and with these they tie up the body to one of the pillars of the house; at the same time they make incisions in the soles of the feet, and tightening the skin-cords daily they squeeze out in this way a good deal of the fluids of the body, which they collect in an earthen pot placed beneath the feet. They say that this process goes on until a worm-like creature, which they call fanano, appears. They kill a bullock and give some of the blood as an offering to this fanano, which they say contains the spirit of the departed. The body, by this time probably pretty well mummified, is then laid in the family tomb.

Amongst all the tribes it is customary to kill a number of bullocks at a death. There was some sort of idea that the spirits of the bullocks accompanied the owner into the next world. This ceremony was called Manao Afana. When the party deceased was rich, this was often ostentatiously shown by transfixing the heads of the bullocks on poles, and placing these near the tomb. Probably from some fancy that articles buried with the body might be of some service to the dead, they often deposited in the tomb those articles which had been most valued by the person while he was alive.

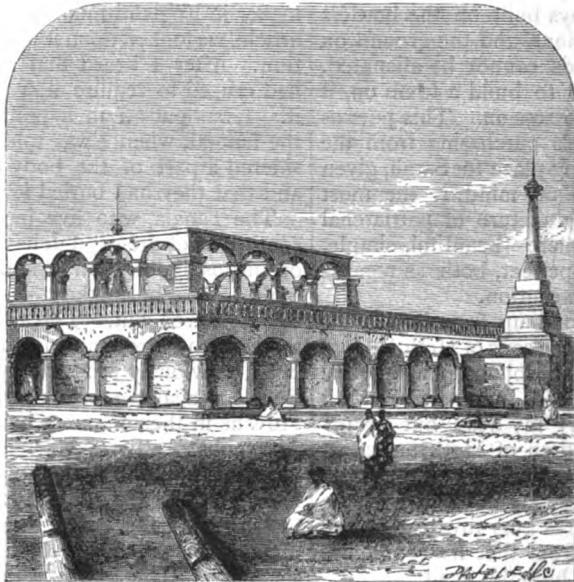

When Rasoahery died 11,000 dollars, besides much valuable property, was placed in her tomb, while the coffin itself was made of solid silver, constructed somewhat in the shape of a canoe, to form which they melted down no fewer than 22,000 dollars.

The Malagasy practise circumcision. It is not performed at any stated age, as amongst the Jews, but in some districts it is performed at any time that may be considered convenient. For the sake of doing it with greater éclat and have a general rejoicing, a whole village will agree to have it done at one time. In Imerina (the central province) it is performed every five or seven years by order of the sovereign. What it may have been originally I do not know, but it does not seem now to be looked upon as a religious rite. In May and June, 1869, while I was at the capital, I witnessed the observance of this ceremony, and indeed had to take a very active part in it, so far as the surgical procedure was concerned. It is a period of great rejoicing and extravagance. It was formerly a prolonged saturnalia, during which profligacy of every kind was not only practised but sanctioned. Although Christianity has not abolished the rite, it has wholesomely restrained this licentiousness.

In making agreements or bargains involving important interests, these were done publicly before the chief men of the city, and the parties concerned then proceeded to ratify them by presenting hasina, but since writing has been introduced, agreements of importance are generally written. Covenants of blood were solemn engagements between two or more persons to stand by each other in some emergency. The covenanting parties cut the skin over the region of the heart; each of them then tasted the blood of the other, repeating a formula containing terrible imprecations in case of unfaithfulness. Those who thus make a covenant by blood are considered to be under greater mutual obligations to friendship and service than those related by the nearest ties of nature. And so sacred is this held, that even the children of the covenanting parties feel themselves bound by the same obligations to befriend and help each other. We may observe that this custom is not peculiar to Madagascar, for the Dyaks in Borneo have the same way of ratifying covenants.

In many of the South Sea Islands a practice exists called the taboo. Certain things ordinarily common are restricted to private use by affixing certain arbitrary marks upon them. Something similar to this prevails in Madagascar: a bunch of grass tied to a pole, is placed at the entrance of a field or of a house or of a road, to notify that entrance is forbidden. The sign so stuck up is called a kiady or protector, and is looked upon as a mark of restriction, reservation, or private right, and is generally respected.

The mission history of Madagascar is of unequalled interest. Little more than fifty years ago, this country was entirely heathen, the people were superstitious and ignorant. They had no written language, and this fact itself pretty well indicates their position. They were not entirely ignorant of the primary arts of civilisation, such as working in iron, weaving, carpentry, and such-like; but they had not made much progress in these handicrafts. While by no means so debased, morally, as some heathen nations, they were licentious and deceitful. Purity and truth were neither generally practised nor much valued. Chastity, indeed, in unmarried persons was scarcely looked upon as a virtue.

Their superstitions were at once dark, degrading, and cruel. Thousands of infants born during an unlucky period were exposed, and perished. It was calculated that several thousands died every year by the ordeal poison called the tang-na, which was given in order to ascertain whether or not a suspected person had been guilty of witchcraft. They were really without

God, and without hope. Madagascar, favourably as it contrasted with many heathen countries, was no exception to the truth of the saying, "The dark places of the earth are the habitations of cruelty."

This was the state of things fifty years ago, and what is the condition of Madagascar now?

To-day there are little under half a million of professing Christians; there are about twenty thousand scholars attending the schools, and between six and seven hundred churches. The Bible has been translated, and many other books have been written in this language, and in one year above a hundred and fifty thousand different Malagasy publications were sold. The Christians maintain a hundred and twenty native evangelists to work in the remoter districts of the central province. It ought always to be remembered that these churches were built, and are maintained entirely by the native Christians.

Taking the whole Protestant mission field throughout the world, close upon a third of it (as regards numbers) is to be found in Madagascar. We may well ask by what means such results have been brought about.

Madagascar contrasts remarkably with most mission fields in this, that the results having been out of all proportion to the means employed. In China, for example, where there are about two hundred missionaries, representing no fewer than thirty different societies, the number of converts is under ten thousand. In Madagascar, with about one-seventh of that number of missionaries, the number of Christians is nearly fifty times greater. It would seem as if the religious education of the Malagasy has been, so to speak, taken by God out of the hands of man, and conducted by himself.

Village of Inawoka, in the midst of the Forest.

In the year 1820, missionaries settled in Antananarivo, by permission of Radama I. An attempt made a short time before to settle on the sea-coast, had proved a fatal failure; five out of the six who composed that party died of fever within the space of a few months.

The great aim of Radama, in encouraging missionaries to settle at the capital, was, the education, civilisation, and political aggrandisement of Hovahs. He desired to extend his authority over the whole island, and to effect this, he knew that his people required instruction. He had no desire to have them taught the truths of the Christian religion. The idea that his people would embrace the new religion did not seem very distinctly to have occurred to him. For the first few years the missionaries were occupied with the preliminary work of acquiring the language, and reducing it to writing, the compilation of dictionaries, grammars, and other educational works. They had not long begun the more direct mission work of preaching when Radama died, in the year 1828, and in him the missionaries lost their friend and protector. He was succeeded by Ranavalona II., who, although she seemed to promise well for a time, soon began to look with suspicion upon the progress of Christianity. Her known sentiments deterred the people generally from attending the mission services; but the mission schools were in the meantime encouraged, and were conducted successfully. The work of translating the Scriptures was vigorously proceeded with. Thus the whole Bible was translated into the Malagasy, and printed by the missionaries and put into the hands of the people, many thousands of whom had been taught to read it in the schools. In addition to all this, about two hundred persons had professed the faith of Christ. The work which God had intended the missionaries to accomplish was now done; and they were compelled by the government to leave the country. And now began one of the bitterest persecutions which we read of in history, a persecution, remarkable alike for its barbarity and its long duration. The Queen saw clearly that Christianity meant revolution; that it was incompatible with the old superstitions, and with many of the customs and habits of the people. She believed that the very foundations upon which the throne and government rested would be overthrown were the new religion accepted, but she did not see that it would afford a firmer, because truer basis for these. Christianity was regarded as rebellion. Having been unknown to their ancestors, it was treated as an innovation. Inasmuch as it was taught by foreigners it was regarded as unpatriotic. It changed the customs of their ancestors, it ignored the idols which they believed rendered their kings sacred, it taught that divination was a folly, the worship of the graves of the Vazimba, a sin, the trial by ordeal, murder.

Christianity was prohibited; baptism was declared unlawful. To partake of the Lord's Supper was to be guilty of rebellion. The Christian assemblies were forbidden, and the schools were shut up. The missionaries were expelled. But the word of God remained—it went with them into slavery and exile, comforting them for the loss of earthly honours and goods, and consoling them, and keeping alive their faith on the way to martyrdom.

This persecution endured, with one or two lulls, for the long period of twenty-five years. Every sort of punishment that malignity could devise and despotism inflict, was visited upon the Christians. They were crucified, speared, beheaded, sawn asunder, thrown over the rocks, burnt at the stake, put foremost into pits and boiling water poured over them; many perished by the tangena poison, others died miserably in chains which were as literally, as poetically named Be-rano-maso,—many tears. Loss of honours, slavery, floggings, and fines, were the minor punishments inflicted upon those who had shown favour to the hated Christians. But the old adage proved true, 'The blood of the martyrs is the seed of the Church.'

The Queen determined to stamp out Christianity. Little did she know what she had undertaken. So far from accomplishing her end, it actually grew and spread during persecution. While at the beginning of this persecution only two hundred had made any profession of Christianity, during the next twenty-five years above a hundred openly laid down their lives for the testimony of Christ, several hundreds indirectly suffered death for his sake, and at least two thousand more had suffered exile, chains, or loss of property, for their love to Jesus. And at the end of that period, so far from Christianity having been extinguished or stamped out, it was found that there were nearly seven thousand professing Christians when toleration was proclaimed. The work was of God, and could not be brought to nought. To relate the particulars of this persecution is impossible in a short paper like this. But the subject is deserving the study of all who doubt the living power of our most holy faith in our own day. It is not the dead, effete system that some suppose. The parting promise has never been forgotten or broken, "Lo I am with you always, even to the end of the world." It was his presence with his poor persecuted ones, One like unto the Son of man, walking with them in the furnace, which upheld and cheered them, so that they were enabled to sing the praises of God, even from the midst of the flames, and unitedly to pray for their murderers. Striking, indeed, is the testimony of an eyewitness to the sustaining power of this presence, with the four nobles who perished at the stake, on the 28th of March, 1849. "They prayed as long as they had any life, then they died,—but softly and gently. Indeed, gently was the going-forth of their life, and all the people were astonished who beheld the burning of them there."

When the Head of the Church takes his people through such a discipline, gives them the cross to bear, and so triumphantly carries them through, it is not unreasonable to suppose that He has some work for that people to do, and in this light we need not marvel at the victories which Christianity has recently achieved in that island.

We shall now briefly inquire to what extent the changed relation of the government to Christianity has influenced, and may be expected to influence, the religious, social, and political life of the country and the neighbouring continent.

It will readily be understood that during the time of the persecution the Church remained pure. Few, if any, were willing to associate themselves with a proscribed society. Those who joined the Church in these days were those who had become acquainted with its doctrines, and had come under their power. Every temporal consideration tended to keep the world apart from the Church. The almost-persuaded remained in their proper place. Those who entered into Christian fellowship were those who had counted the cost—who felt that any day they might be called upon to seal their testimony with their blood. This devotion was required to sustain them in the conflict, and this moral force led to their ultimate victory. The struggle of a quarter of a century ended in the toleration of what the people called, and still call, "the praying," and ten years of toleration resulted in the public abandonment of idolatry. Now for the results of this. It often happens, we may rather say it always happens, that a victory of this kind is not without loss to the victors. In such circumstances, if the cause of Christianity gains in one way it loses in another. Its growth and expansion is accompanied by a certain loss of vigour and activity. In the enjoyment of peace it becomes less aggressive. If the victory of the Church effects the comparative elevation of the whole society, it can hardly fail to result, to some extent, in the degradation of the Church. While the new life transfusing the old body politic quickens and purifies it, the converse action also goes on to some extent, sometimes indeed pari passu—the introduction of the world into the Church deadening and corrupting it. The very success which makes it more comprehensive and inclusive renders it less pure. Worldly motives bring many into its membership whom in days of trial the same motives kept apart from it. So of course it has been found in Madagascar, many now make a profession of Christianity simply because such profession is popular and profitable. We must accept all this as the necessary result of the new circumstances in which the Church has been placed, and there is reason to believe much care is being exercised to prevent the indiscriminate admission of applicants into church fellowship.

Another subject which necessarily crops up is the relation of the Church to the State. It is remarkable how closely the history of early Christianity has repeated itself in Madagascar. Christianity entered unobserved, and grew for a time unnoticed. When it was discovered to be a living thing, capable of leavening society, efforts were made to destroy it. When persecution failed it was tolerated, and finally the government felt themselves compelled to adopt the religion that they had failed to stamp out. This is just an epitome of the history of the Church from its foundation to the days of Constantine.

It is hardly necessary to say that the public acceptance of Christianity in a country like Madagascar almost inevitably leads to some kind of State Churchism. It is difficult to suppose that the Church and State can long remain friendly, separate, and independent in a country where the government is still absolute—almost patriarchal. What form the connection may ultimately assume, and with what results to the Church on the one hand, and to the State on the other, remains to be seen. In making these statements we do not mean to pronounce any opinion upon this much-disputed point in the abstract, nor upon the desirability, or otherwise, of such an alliance in the case of Madagascar. There are some who rejoice in the prospect of the infant church there being placed under the care and guidance of kind nursing fathers and nursing mothers. Others, again, who have the best interests of the country at heart deplore the prospect of state control, if they do not abjure the advantages of state support and countenance. Apart from any theoretical views upon this subject, it is doubtful if the State will permit the Church to remain permanently in the position of a simple voluntary association.

It must be remembered, also, that it has now become as much a political consideration for the government of the country to suppress as it formerly was to uphold idolatry. The kindly genius of the new faith will no doubt effectually prevent the grosser manifestations of intolerance, but we can scarcely suppose that the more distant tribes will be long permitted to continue in the practice of idolatry. We can observe here in our own day an illustration of the way in which some parts of heathen Europe were brought within the fold.

We have all read of northern kings, who, after having themselves become impressed with the truth, carried their rude followers along with them, by means which it is difficult for us nowadays either to understand or altogether justify. We often forget, however, that our tender respect for the conscientious convictions and prejudices of others is the outcome of ages of Christian culture—the ripe fruit of Christian civilisation—the growth of which, among ourselves, has been specially favoured by our political circumstances. In Madagascar, a certain kind of political pressure has been exercised to hasten the reconstruction of society on the new basis; but it is very remarkable to what a small extent other than moral means have been had recourse to in order to induce the people to fall in with the new order of things. The paragraph in the coronation speech of the present sovereign referring to religion, as sententious as sensible, grounds toleration upon the widest of all principles—“As to the praying there is no hindrance and no compulsion, for God made us.” This is certainly a noble argument upon which to base religious freedom. It was a good thing for Madagascar that the work began as it did among the middle and humbler classes, and that it was only accepted by the government after it had made its way and established itself among the people. It will be seen that a new task, and one of vast difficulty and magnitude, now falls to the Malagasy Church to perform. This is nothing less than the work of elevating and educating nearly half a million who have recently been brought within her bosom, as well as acting upon several millions as yet outside her pale. In proceeding with this task, she will have to encounter many of those difficulties that other sections of the Church have had to grapple with; and who can fail to be interested in observing the way in which she will deal with them? There is the question already alluded to of the relation of Church and State; the pressing question of education and evangelization; the delicate subject of domestic slavery. Several social difficulties have already been successfully dealt with, notably polygamy and divorce. Ten years ago polygamy, with all its attendant evils, prevailed throughout the length and breadth of the land. It is now virtually abolished in the central province. There is thus much in the present state of the country exceedingly hopeful, while there are doubtless other elements which lead us to look with some degree of concern upon the future.

The influence of Christianity cannot be restricted to the religious and social life of the people. It must tell, and that very powerfully, upon the political condition of the nation.

The Church organizations established over a considerable portion of the land are training the people in the art of self-government. The people being brought together in their assemblies are taught the habits of order connected with church-going and Sunday rest. They are being accustomed to united action, and encouraged to mutual confidence. They are trained in the selection of their own office-bearers and pastors, and in the discussion and management of their own business. They are habituated to submit to authorities who rule by moral means, and appeal to moral motives. They come to understand the principle of representation as illustrated in their assemblies; above all, a healthy public opinion is developed, and finds a means of manifesting itself, and of making itself respected. In these and numerous other ways Christianity is indirectly but powerfully working towards the political regeneration of the country.

These movements in Madagascar may be reasonably expected to have important bearings upon the neighbouring continent. The late Mr. Douglas, of Cavers, remarked many years ago upon the important relation which Madagascar bears to Africa, and pointed out that it might yet possibly form a centre from which the light of the Gospel and civilisation might spread to that long-benighted land. In speculating upon the future of Africa, we cannot overlook the existence in Madagascar of an intelligent, energetic race like the Hovahs making advances in civilisation. It certainly seems one of the providential coincidences with which history abounds that the opening up of that vast continent by Livingstone should be heralded by a great religious and social revolution in Madagascar.

ANDREW DAVIDSON.

THE PROPHET HOSEA.

BY THE REV. PROFESSOR STANLEY LEATHES.

"Who is wise, and he shall understand these things? prudent, and he shall know them? for the ways of the Lord are right, and the just shall walk in them: but the transgressors shall fall therein."—HOSEA xiv. 9.

IT is much to be feared that the writings of the twelve minor prophets are a portion of Holy Scripture but little known, and still less understood, and certainly the writings of the Prophet Hosea can hardly constitute an exception. But is it possible that people can be brought in large numbers to take an interest in lectures on Social Science at St. Paul's, and that a select and intelligent few cannot be found to countenance and take an interest in or derive benefit from a series of discourses on Sunday, which shall aim at giving a general, a popular, an interesting, an intelligent, and intelligible account and treatment of the writings of an ancient prophet? Surely there is no reason why Biblical studies should not be carried on in church, and form the subject of discourses from the pulpit, just as in the present day lectures are accepted as an ordinary and appropriate means of conveying instruction in and promoting the study of any subject or any science whatsoever. There is only one reason why not, and that is because people have acquired the habit of attending church for the purpose of gratifying some taste of ear or sense or sound, and not of being built up and edified in the knowledge of themselves, or of Scripture, or of duty, or of the Divine Mind as expressed in revelation, or in history, or in nature.

It is hard to swim against the current, or to strike out a new line, or to arouse an interest in a new subject; but I will try to do so to-day, and will look to God for the result.

Now, who was the Prophet Hosea? We know very little about him, if persons and places and names and dates make up the sum and substance of human life. We cannot tell where he was born, nor when he was born, nor who his parents were, nor where he was educated, nor where he lived, nor where or when he died, nor how he died. These things, for the most part, we know nothing about, and can never hope to discover them; and yet, after all, we do know a good deal about him, as I shall endeavour to show, for it is not these things that make up man's life. In this sense we can write no biography of Hosea; but just as our Lord said a man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth, so it is not the multitude or variety of incidents that happen in a lifetime that make up life, but the relation in which the man stands to them and to the God from whom they come. For character is life, and these things affect life according as they influence character, and the character may be formed independently and in spite of them, as it certainly can be estimated apart from them, and remains in its distinctive impress when the memory of them has passed away.

Hosea was the son of Beerli. Who he was we know not, but the Jews have a tradition that when the father of a prophet is mentioned by name, it is an indication that he was himself a prophet. This may or may not be the case, but the tradition is not usually considered to be of much value. There is mention made in 1 Chronicles v. 6, of a certain Beerah whom Tilgath-Pilneser carried away captive, who was prince of the Reubenites. It is just possible, setting aside the slight variation of name, that this man may have been the Prophet Hosea's father, whose extreme old age was thus clouded and embittered by captivity. There is, however, no other reason for thinking so than the barely possible agreement in point of time.

It is surely, however, something more than fancy if we suppose an intentional significance in the prophet's name. Standing, as it does, in a relation so near to Joshua on the one hand, and to Jesus on the other, and expressing in some form or manner the idea of saving or salvation, it can hardly be that in the Divine providence and intention there was not some allusion to his calling and mission in his very name. Oftentimes we know that names were expressly given that they might witness to moral truths. Our Lord's own name was expressly so called because He should save his people from their sins, and we at least may detect an appropriate if not a designed fitness between the name by which the prophet was known and the message which he bore.

But though we know so little of the prophet's life, we know a good deal of the time when he lived. This was in the days of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, kings of Judah, and in the days of Jeroboam, the son of Joash, king of Israel. That is to say, Hosea was contemporary with the great Prophet Isaiah, who saw his "vision concerning Judah and Jerusalem," in the days of the same kings of Judah, and, also, he was for a time contemporary with Micah, who prophesied in the reigns of Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, but not in that of Uzziah. In addition to the period of time extending from the reign of Uzziah to that of Hezekiah, which can scarcely be counted as less than forty years, since Jotham and Ahaz each reigned sixteen years, we have to reckon also the reign of Jeroboam II., the great grandson of Jehu, king of Israel, who died some five-and-twenty years before the death of Uzziah. Consequently, as Hosea prophesied in the days of Jeroboam as well as Uzziah, he must have begun to prophesy nearly thirty years at least before the death of Uzziah, which gives us the date of 785 B.C. on an average, if not on the lowest computation for the commencement of Hosea's prophetic mission.

Let us then try to estimate this epoch by comparing it with some of the dates and incidents with which we are more familiar.

And first, within some twenty years or so it was as long before the Christian era as we are now since the Norman conquest. All of what is commonly called English history has happened in that time. The long roll of our kings and queens has been filled up, our constitution has been formed, our laws have been framed, our national life has been developed and chequered with civil wars, and dynastic changes and continental struggles and intestine revolutions and convulsive reformations; and the interval which we survey in looking back through the long ages to the battle of Hastings, is only longer by about a quarter of a century than that interval of time which lay between the commencement of Hosea's mission and the birth of Christ.

But further, when the word of the Lord first came to the prophet, the foundation of Rome was not yet laid, nor was it for thirty years or more afterwards. All that we know, therefore, is, that Roman history has been developed and wrought out since the prophet's burning words were first spoken.

But more than this, the standard era of Grecian history to which its events are commonly referred is the first Olympiad, and the date of the first Olympiad is 776. So the Greeks did not begin to count their Olympiads for some nine or ten years after Hosea began to prophesy; but all the great names and incidents of Grecian history were then buried deep in the womb of time. Draco flourished in the thirty-ninth Olympiad, Solon in the forty-sixth. The first Messenian war was fought 743; the battle of Marathon two centuries and a half later, in 490 B.C. These contemporary landmarks will serve to give some idea of the vast antiquity of this prophet; while Herodotus, Thucydides, the Persian war, the Peloponnesian war, the Attic poets, Socrates, Plato, Aristotle, and the other glories of Greece and Grecian literature, were centuries later than Hosea.

Now let us pause for one moment to consider where we are. We are very far back in the eighth century before Christ, in fact, only some fifteen years from the commencement of the ninth. And about this era we are perfectly certain; it may be varied by a year or two, but it cannot be placed much later. We can calculate backwards by a succession of sure and certain steps, till we are brought without any reasonable cause for doubt to 785 B.C. We have in our hands the veritable writings of a man who began his prophetic career before aught of Greek or Roman history, properly so called, commenced. Surely, then, the wonder is not that we know so little, but that we know so much; not that the prophet is obscure, but that he is at all intelligible.

His ministerial life was a long one. Beginning as we must at 785 B.C., in order to embrace the close of Jeroboam's reign, when the prophet tells us he began to prophesy, and going down as far as the fifth or sixth year, say, of Hezekiah's reign, which is the other and lower limit, we are brought to the year 720 B.C., which gives us an interval of some sixty-five years. The actual period of his career may have been even longer, it cannot well have been much less. Supposing, then, that he was but twenty when his mission began, and the Lord does speak oftentimes by the young as well as by the old, he must have attained the age of eighty-five or ninety before he was called to his rest. There is, of course, nothing improbable in this age. We all of us have known persons who have attained or surpassed it, and we remember the words of Polycarp: "Eighty and six years have I served Him, and He hath done me no harm." The long life and mission of the prophet Hosea, then, affords a striking contrast to the brevity of his writings and the fewness of his words. But few and short as they are, they are of priceless value, as I shall hope to be able to show. They are, we may suppose, but the substance of many burdens, specimens of the topics on which the prophet dwelt, and of the manner in which he handled them. There can be no question but that at that early age the function of the prophet was discharged principally in speaking and acting, not in writing. That his words were written was an accident, not a necessity. Nothing remains to us of Elijah or Elisha, and yet the work of Elijah in his own day was very important. And so writing was not the medium by which Hosea worked. He doubtless spoke and preached and prophesied, and his written book is the substance of his words during a long period, which we know was spread over the reigns of no less than five kings.

The mission of Hosea seems to have been chiefly directed to Israel. He does, indeed, occasionally mention Judah, but it is rather in an indirect manner; whereas Israel, Ephraim, Samaria, are exposed to the full brunt of his vehement indignation and reproof. While he was delivering the Lord's message against Israel the political fortunes of that kingdom were hastening to their final catastrophe. The genius of Jeroboam II. had raised his throne to a higher eminence of power and splendour than had been attained by any former monarch, and he contended successfully with the strength of Syria on the north, and rectified the national frontier; but he was unable to consolidate his power. A period of confusion and anarchy followed upon his death, and his dynasty came to an end in the person of his son, in marked fulfilment of the promise to Jehu, that his children of the fourth but not the fifth generation should sit upon his throne. Then came there more troublous times for Israel. A powerful adversary appeared on the horizon of the north-east in the person of the king of Assyria. He was bought off with a heavy subsidy by the king of Israel, "to confirm the kingdom in his hand." It was a dangerous expedient, adopted in the spirit of Louis XIV., "After me the deluge," and consequently, in the next generation the king of Israel was conspired against, and slain by one of his own generals, who in his turn suffered a like fate at the hands of the last monarch who sat on the throne of the divided kingdom, as the representative of Jeroboam the son of Nebat who made Israel to sin. But this was not before another invasion from Assyria, under Tiglath-Pileser, had overrun "Gilead and Galilee, and all the land of Naphtali, and carried them captive to Assyria." Hosea, then, lived through all this period of national disaster, and must have witnessed the first great deportation of his countrymen, even if in his own family he was not a sufferer by it. Twenty years later came the final blow. The armies of Shalmaneser besieged Samaria, and Israel was no more a people, nor has her place been known again in history till the present hour. Thus, notwithstanding the long period that has elapsed since then, it seems as though there were still one link of association between the prophet and ourselves, inasmuch as in the particular line of his nation's history there is nothing but one unbroken waste between us.

Hosea stood not alone. In his own country the herdsman Amos had probably preceded him, and certainly, for some time during the reign of Uzziah, was his contemporary. Then in the kingdom of Judah came Isaiah, some five-and-twenty years after Hosea's mission commenced, and a little later still came Micah. Thus the old age of the prophet was cheered and his faith sustained by the knowledge that the same work in which his own life was passed was being carried on by others elsewhere. He may or may not have held intercourse with Isaiah and with Micah—we cannot tell—he can scarcely have been ignorant of their mission and work, while they must have honoured him as a noble servant of the Lord, who in his old age and in the midst of overwhelming national calamities was not ashamed to stand up alone in the alien kingdom and rebuke the vices of apostate Israel, and bear the same witness to the truth and righteousness of God that they bore in Judah.

And what was the message of that witness as we have heard it read to-day? "O Israel, return unto the Lord thy God, for thou hast fallen by thine iniquity." The old message of six-and-twenty centuries ago is the same as now. The latest and the newest can be none other. The cause of disaster and distress, whether national or personal, can be none other, and be it what it may the invitation is still the same, "Return." "Take with you words, and turn to the Lord, say unto Him" (these are the words), "Take away all iniquity, and receive us graciously, so will we render the calves of our lips," the sacrifices and vows we are so ready to promise, so loth to pay. "Asshur shall not save us," though we have exhausted our treasury to confirm the kingdom, lavished our wealth and our substance in the vain hope of peace. "We will not ride upon horses, neither will we say any more to the work of our hands, Ye are our gods, for in Thee the fatherless findeth mercy," and the one mark of the true God is mercy, as indeed his own words testify, "I will heal their backslidings, I will love them freely, for mine anger is turned away from him, and I will be as the dew unto Israel; he shall grow as the lily and cast forth his roots as Lebanon. His branches shall spread, and his beauty shall be as the olive tree, and his smell as Lebanon. They that dwell under his shadow shall return," and find their home evermore with Him, their rest and refuge with his God. "They shall revive as the corn and grow as the vine, and the scent thereof" and the memory thereof, "shall be as that of the wine of Lebanon." And then shall "Ephraim say, What have I to do any more with idols?" But the Lord saith, "I have heard him and observed him," crying in his self-complacency, "I am like a green fir-tree," wide-spreading, fair, and lofty, but still fruitless. O Israel, "from me is thy fruit found." From me alone, and from union with me is the regenerate nature which bringeth forth fruit. It is not in thyself, or in thy fair professions, or in thy natural strength, but in me, to whom thou shouldst look, and to whom thou must return to find new life. "Who is wise, and he shall understand these things? prudent, and he shall know them? for the ways of the Lord are right, and the just shall walk in them: but the transgressors shall fall therein."

AGAINST THE STREAM:

The Story of an Heroic Age in England.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE SCHONBERG-COTTA FAMILY."

CHAPTER XXX.

THUS Piers went out, it seemed to me, into the bracing air, and the morning sunshine, and I turned back to the dusk and the chill.

Such a dimness and chill fell on everything when he was gone! Such fears came for him, for England, for the slaves, for Amice, for our little Sunday-school, for everything! And indeed those winter days early in 1803 were dark months for England; and for Abbot's Weir; chill and chaotic—full of uncertainties and indecisions for us all.

In February England was thrilled to her remotest bounds by one of those great common impulses which now and then prove the living unity of national existence, and in proving quicken and raise the national life.

The trial of Peltier was going on in the Court of Queen's Bench. The prosecutor, our Attorney-general, on behalf of Napoleon Buonaparte; the defendant, an obscure Royalist emigré; the accusation, libel against a friendly government; the advocate, Sir James Mackintosh. In reality, England felt, and millions in silenced Europe felt, it was Liberty that was on her trial in her last asylum; the accuser, Despotism embodied in the First Consul; the advocate the last country in the world in which the press remained free.

Mackintosh's eloquent words vibrated throughout the land. England was quite capable of being simultaneously electrified to her remotest towns, villages, and homesteads, before the electric telegraph came into being; simultaneously, for all working purposes.

We make too much, I think, sometimes of these material inventions. Eager groups awaited the little badly-printed reports of the trial, and news from the passengers, at every inn-door, as the lumbering coaches passed through. Slow communications, clumsy reports; yet the heart of the old country beat warm and fast enough.

Mackintosh called on his countrymen to "pause before the earthquake swallowed up the last refuge of liberty. Switzerland and Holland once had a free press. Switzerland and Holland (two of Buonaparte's misérables bagatelles) existed no more. Since the prosecutions had begun, fifty old imperial free German cities had vanished. England's free press can only fall under the ruins of the British Empire. Her free government cannot engage in dangerous wars without the free and hearty support of her people. A King of England who in such circumstances should conspire against the free press of the country would silence the trumpet which is to call his people around his standard."

The verdict was given by the reluctant jury, as a matter of law, against Peltier. But the defence was translated into every European language (into French by Madame de Staël); and the challenge of England was virtually thrown down to Napoleon.

For in those months England was "drifting" into war, alone, without one nation in the world to stand by her, and without a hand she trusted at the helm.

Rumours reached us of insults offered to our Ambassador, Lord Whitworth, at the Court—they began to call it a Court—of the First Consul; insults borne by England with the kind of easy patience of large creatures, which so often misleads other creatures to provoke that large and careless tolerance beyond its limits. Remonstrances against Buonaparte's aggressions, met with a contemptuous sarcasm.

War was declared, or rather accepted. Two French privateers were captured. And in one of the dramatic rages with which he cowed the rest of the world, the First Consul, in revenge, seized ten thousand British subjects, who happened to be peacefully travelling in France; the ten thousand "détenus," who throughout the campaigns of Nelson and Wellington had to linger out the weary years in French prisons, or, at least, in a society which to them was all one prison.

And among them was our own Piers.

We refused to believe it for a long time. Piers, we said to each other, could speak French so well, he was sure to escape when others would be detected. But then, acting, or any kind of stratagem or disguise were so foreign to his nature; and his whole bearing was "so English," Claire said, despondingly, though far from disparagingly. But then, she added, there were sure to be kind souls ready to help a stranger in France; had not they found it so in England? and would her compatriots be outdone?

In March I had received a letter from Piers, quite long for him. He had made his way to two of the Marquise's former estates. He had looked for the Curé, but in vain. One hundred and fifty priests were in prison in the diocese of Paris, for refusing to take the oaths required by the government. "And yet," wrote Piers, "his Highness has placed the bust of Brutus in the Tuileries, to convince every one that liberty is as dear to him and to France as ever."

He did not find the peasants miserable. Mr. Arthur Young had said before the Revolution that more than half of the land of France already belonged to the peasants, only burdened by compulsory service (in making and repairing roads, for instance), and by other oppressive burdens. The Revolution abolished the burdens. Piers supposed it was so on this estate of Madame's. Her peasants affectionately remembered the Seigneur's family, spoke most cordially of them, asked for Madame and the little Demoiselle; but did not exactly wish to have the burdens re-imposed. The Department now made the roads and paid for having them made. And they had more to eat and drink, and better clothes to wear; at least they would have, were it not for the war and the conscription. They wished England would be tranquil, and the émigrés nobles would not excite her to combat, as it was reported they did. Then Madame might come back to live among them,—if not exactly as before—the château had unfortunately been burnt—yet to such wealth as was compatible with a republic.

Another of the Des Ormes estates had been purchased by the former Intendant for a nominal sum, and he and his aged wife listened with tearful interest to all Piers could relate of Madame and Claire. The old man regarded himself as only manager of the property, as of old, and looked forward to restore it one day to Madame. But he entreated that she would come back without delay. For, he privately told Piers, "he had a great nephew, his heir, brought up in the atmosphere of the new régime, if régime it could be called, and he could not be sure of his loyalty to any one or anything. He was a fine young man, however, and his mother a lady of the fallen noblesse—the petite noblesse certainly, not such a house as the Des Ormes. But he had sometimes thought whether an alliance might be possible?" Piers had seen the great nephew privately, and thought him an intolerable dandy and upstart. He could scarcely bear to write the words of the Intendant, but the old man had insisted, and as an envoy he thought himself bound to yield. In a fortnight, or less now, he hoped himself to be with us again.

He wished to say something cheering to Madame. But it was difficult. I must judge how much to mention to her. Ten years was a long time anywhere. In ten years babies grew into youths, children into men, young men into thrifty fathers of families. It was a very long period in a country which could not count ten years from its new era, in which an institution which had lasted a twelvemonth seemed almost antique. To come back to old England he felt would be like stepping from a raft, just lashed together out of broken pieces of the ship, to terra firma. He only trusted Madame might feel the same. England was perhaps a rocky, chill, cheerless region compared with her sunny France. But it was a rock. And just now the seas seemed very stormy. He felt he should have a little storm to weather in getting home. People's minds seemed excited by the news from across the Channel. Something about the conquest of Malta; and an émigré pamphleteer who had been libelling the First Consul. He hoped England would stand firm. George Crichton was returning that very day, and would bring the letter, so that, at least, was safe. He had one more journey to find the Curé Madame had wished him to see: and then, home.

George Crichton was all safe certainly, and returned home; and Clapham seemed to me a little self-satisfied as to its usual prudence and sagacity in keeping out of scrapes. George had warned Piers, he wrote to us, of the danger of lingering. But that one commission Piers had said he must execute. And so the fatal day overtook him. And he was detained, it seemed probable, near Madame's former home, not far from Port Royal des Champs, whither he had gone to make one more search for the Curé, who might, it was thought, be in hiding with some of the faithful among the peasantry.

Madame was, at first, much incensed at the proposition of her Intendant with regard to Claire.

"Poor man!" she said, "to such a degree have these whirlwinds turned the best brains and bewildered the most loyal hearts. But the great-nephew, insufferable young man! I suppose he would think it a condensation to endow my daughter with the remnant of the property of which they have despoiled our house."

"But, Maman," said Claire, "it is not said that the young man entertains the thought: at least let us exonerate him!"

"What can you know, my innocent child? Of course I do not suspect any young persons of taking such an affair into their own hands. This at least, the duty of parents to provide marriages for their children, the Revolution has not changed. From such disorganization France is yet preserved."

Yet, now and then she returned to the intendant's scheme.

"Perhaps pride is after all the sin which has brought down our order," she said one day to Claire. "M. l'Intendant seems to have spoken deferentially and loyally; and, as you say, the young man is not to be blamed. And if his mother were, indeed, of good blood! The poor great-uncle is fond, no doubt; but he says the young man is beautiful, let us hope also good. The family were always devout."

But, at this point, Claire, regardless of consistency, entirely abandoned the defence of the "beautiful" young man.

"M. Piers writes that he is an upstart, a 'dandy,'" said she.

"Ah, my child! the English have ideas a little different from ours. Those fine manners which we used to cultivate are not to their taste. And now, they say, they are not cultivated even in France. How could they, the root being cut away? On the whole, perhaps, it does not speak badly for a young man that he should in these republican days have manners an Englishman might think too elaborate."

"My mother!" Claire replied, "I think M. Piers would judge well of manners."

"No doubt, my child. For England, the Danescobes have excellent manners. And what has my poor child known better? I have been unjust to thee, my Claire. I should have accepted the Countess of Abbot's Weir's invitation for thee; then thou wouldst have seen the world. What should have been thy world; as far indeed as that can exist anywhere out of France; anywhere in the world, now."

"Unjust to me!" said Claire, "my mother! Never. Would I have left thee? But let us not be unjust to any who have been good to us. M. Piers went—is detained—for us, mother."

"It is true, my child; I weep for him, I pray for him, night and day. The most generous heart! But, for thee? I cannot always be with thee. Sometimes I feel as if every day were breaking some of the few threads that keep my body here. And before I go, I would fain do my duty for thee, if I knew it. M. l'Intendant was a brave and loyal servant always. I spoke hastily of him. God forgive me. I have failed in so much!"

And then the little tender veil of concealment for a moment was laid aside, and the two wept in one other's arms.

For a little shadow was falling on Claire—a little shadow from one human form; yet, within that shadow, an eclipse of the sun would, to her, have added little darkness. Slowly, imperceptibly, decay and ruin were creeping on all that made her home, on all that made the world home to her; ruin beside which, when it came, the crash of falling nations would for her have added little tumult.

No longer now so very slowly, or imperceptibly, the stages of declining strength were measured.

From the chair to the couch, from the couch to the bed, from helplessness to helplessness. The steps we all have to tread, unless for us the last descent which leads to the shining upward way, is a precipice.

And then came the keen March winds, penetrating irresistibly through the carefully guarded windows. And then a few days of bewilderment and anguish. And then the difficult way was over; and the mother was perplexed about her duties no more, or the duties of others.

She had been led at last "by the right way to the city of habitation." She received the last sacraments of her Church. There was no time for last words or last directions. Bequests there were none to make. Madame had nothing to leave to the world but her Claire, and scarcely anything to leave to Claire but her blessing.

She left her child to God. And as she breathed out this her last blessing and bequest in one, she smiled at Léontine, and then she looked with a wistful gaze at Loveday and me.

Then Claire pressed the crucifix to her lips, and breathing the one Name, which is above every name, the only Name for dying lips, the patient chastened spirit passed away.

We thought there was a light on her countenance, as of eyes that had met other eyes, long sought, and in one glance had understood all that had perplexed.

We knew that the patient, mourning, lowly, purified spirit was blessed at last with all the beatitudes, comforted, satisfied, seeing God.

Satisfied also for us, even for her child. And now, Claire also had to learn the old lesson of my childhood, to follow the motherly eyes "up to His face." And being sweeter and more trustful than I, she learned her lesson sooner and better. She was different from me; more reasonable, more disciplined, and also more able to take comfort in little things, refusing no crumb of comfort, no ray of light, from any side.

Sometimes I wondered.

To me the feeling in sorrow was,—

“My feast of joy has been swept away. I will not refuse the crumbs under the table as sustenance. That would be suicide. But to give thanks at the empty table for the crumbs, and pretend to say grace as for the feast, that would be servile, false. And I will not try. I will mingle ashes with my bread, and my drink with weeping. God is a Father, my Father, the Father. He will understand.”

But Claire, even in this sorrow which cleft her tender heart, as well I knew, was still like a guest at a king's table. It seemed to me as if the old habits of her high-breeding went through her soul, and pervaded her religion.

She would not fail in any gracious form of courtesy because her heart was breaking, any more than her mother when her life was ebbing; not even, if I may say so, with God.

She opened her windows literally and symbolically to the sunshine. She spread the little white tables with the primroses her mother had delighted in. She kept the room fair and pleasant, as if her mother were on a journey, and she had expected her home. And yet her dear brown eyes were often dim and red with weeping.

“The good God thought it worth while to make the primroses this spring,” said she, “and should I fail to show Him I see, and care, and am grateful? And then she cared, Bride. She cared so much! although she has so much that is fairer and better to care for now.”

“When I can give thanks, Bride, and be a little glad, I know I am feeling a little as she is feeling now. But,” she added, with a sudden burst of weeping, “I cannot; I cannot always! Only then I hope God is making something deeper in my heart, that by-and-by there may be more room, and I may be able to feel even more as she is feeling, yes, always more and more.”

CHAPTER XXXI.

THE seizure of the ten thousand English in France roused the nation from John o' Groat's House to the Land's End. At last England set herself resolutely against the stream, regardless who piled with her.

From that time till the end of the war twelve years afterwards, whatever some factious men might write about the futility of opposing Buonaparte and his “invincibles,” and however a feeble policy might reduce the war to “neat and ineffective expeditions,” the nation went heart and soul into the conflict, her spirit keeping firm in victory, and rising with defeat. For twelve years we felt ourselves, every inch of us, one Nation, and a nation standing alone, for all nations, for all the kingdoms of the world against one devouring Universal Empire. As long as England stood, Napoleon could not assume the coveted title of “Emperor of the West.”

It is difficult even at this distance, even for us who remember, to revive in our minds the preternatural terror that surrounded the name of Buonaparte. Why should it be deemed incredible that he should attain any height of power, the Corsican lawyer's son, the young artillery officer, whom emperors had become proud to call brother, who disposed of thrones to his kindred or his generals?

How could it be deemed incredible that he should commit any crime, who, as we all believed, had murdered the young Duc d'Enghien at midnight; who had caused Pichegru to be strangled in one prison, and Toussaint L'Ouverture to be starved with cold and hunger in another; who massacred his prisoners in Syria, and shot six thousand Russians kneeling helpless on the ice; who, when thousands of his own men fell, shuddered a little at the blood-stains on the white uniform they happened to be wearing, and as a remedy commanded “only blue uniforms” in future; who never hesitated at a falsehood or a slaughter; and for what object? The glory of France? He was not even a Frenchman. His own supremacy? No man disputed it. It was little wonder if to some he seemed an incarnation of some preternatural power without heart or conscience.

Three successive Augusts he fixed his camp at Boulogne, gazing menacingly across at our white cliffs,—and gathering his hundred thousand around him to cross the sea and assail us.

In the first August, 1803, England answered him by enrolling her three hundred thousand volunteers, to avenge her ten thousand detenus, and to meet the hundred and twenty thousand veterans at Boulogne.

We laughed at ourselves and our voluntary Defenders, freely, as the custom of our country is. Every town had its jokes against itself and its citizen soldiers (the old butt of wits from time immemorial), the cut of their uniforms, or the handling of their arms; and Abbot's Weir was not behind the rest. I remember well old stories of the heroic valour with which our gallant volunteers went forth with fife and drum to encounter a reported outbreak of prisoners of war, and finding the enemy to be nothing but certain white stones set to mark the road across the moors, returned safe but inglorious. And again, how on occasion of a review by some distinguished officer of the line, the manœuvres signally failed in consequence of the bugleman having blown a quid of tobacco into his bugle.

We laughed at each other, and grumbled at the powers that be, as our wont is; believing in each other and obeying the powers that be all the time, in that inconsistent manner which amuses us, and perplexes and sometimes misleads our neighbours not a little.

Not a groat did the Government pay, or would any Englishmen accept for uniforms, arms, or time.

Meantime, Mr. Pitt, still kept out of what most of us felt was his place at the head of the nation, was living at Walmer, commanding volunteers. Great drillings were going on throughout the land, in town market-houses, on village greens. Dibdin's songs were sung, and old Scotch ballads were revived.

It was an uneasy time for Quakers. To be a man of peace meant to most of us little less than to be a traitor.

How much did it all mean?

Disciplined, and under able leadership, it meant something at Trafalgar, in the Peninsular War, and at Waterloo.

Buonaparte never obtained a chance to prove what it would have meant on our own shores. It meant, at least, that the nation felt herself a nation; and that every atom of the body politic had become for the time an atom multiplied by the sum of the whole. It meant that we all knew there was something worth infinitely more than money; and, many of us, that there is something worth more than life.

On the 2nd of August, 1804, when Buonaparte came to threaten us the second time from Boulogne with his myriads, and his flat-bottomed boats, the pomp of his ceremonial was more splendid than at first. He had been decreed to be Emperor by the Senate on the 18th of May; and his Josephine was Empress. In form, nothing was wanting to the dramatic representation of the Roman invasion. The Imperial throne was set up on the coast, the legions paid homage around.

But on that same 18th of May, the Englishman we acknowledged as our chief had his hand once more on the helm.

William Pitt was Prime Minister of England once more.

Our little world at Abbot's Weir, indeed, had its separate shadows and eclipses. But hope was strong in us. We had a conviction, Claire and I, that the world must brighten again, simply because we were young. And I always thought Pitt and Nelson were about to finish the war, and set Piers free.

In one respect Claire and I had drawn nearer each other.

After much thought Claire had decided to attend our church. She thought the religion which made England what it was, must be stronger and truer than that which had either made or left France what it was; that the church which fearlessly gave the Bible to the people, and the faith which laid hold throughout the land, not only on the hearts of gentle women to sweeten them, but of rough men, to change and save them, which made freedom and loyalty possible together, could not have wandered far from their divine source. Perhaps, also, Léontine and her Huguenot faith had unconsciously influenced her, and that century of persecution which had robbed France of her noblest; certainly, Loveday and all she had seen in her. However it came about, so it was, that one Sunday morning she walked quietly across the market-place with Léontine, and asked if she might sit in our pew. And that Easter she received the Sacrament, kneeling between my father and me under the old altar window.

"If this is indeed the best I could do," she said to me afterwards, as we walked across the pleasant Leas where Piers and I used to stroll on Sunday afternoons, "my mother and yours would be glad, Bride. And I think it is. And I think they are."

She had always a strange sense, for one so buoyant, of the transitoriness of this life, and its continuity with the next. Perhaps her old Catholic training had helped her to it, linking the living and the dead, by more unbroken ties, than some forms of Protestantism. Perhaps, also, the convulsions which had desolated her country and her home. I always felt that to me life was in some sense more solid, to her more liquid; to me as the firm land which could only be parted by earthquakes, to her as the waves of the sea for ever heaving and parting, whilst bearing us on to the invisible shore.

She spoke of death more easily than I could; more as one of "the incidents of life," as one of its separations, and not always the worst.

Now and then little letters came to us from Piers, quite cheerful, insisting that he was not wasting his time, that he was well treated, was earning his living, and gaining experience. In the first he sent a message to Madame, very reticent and deferential, but not very bright as to the state of her property, although the ci-devant intendant was preparing, he hoped, to send her some remittances.

In the second, having heard of Madame's death, all his reticence was gone. He poured out all his heart to me about Claire. If I thought there was any chance of her caring for him, I was to tell her now; inferior in rank and position, in everything, as he was, he loved her. He was sure I must know; he almost thought she must know. He almost feared she must know so well that she could not care for him, or he should have known that she did. And if she did not, could not ever care, I was not to breathe a word, but to be as a sister to her always. He was sure our father would care for her as a child. But if only there could be the right to do it, &c., &c.

And I told our father; and quite simply he went to Claire. And so the perplexities and uncertainties were over. And Claire became our very own, and wrote, herself, a few words to Piers, only a few, because it was so doubtful if they would reach him. She said it was for her he had become a prisoner, and it was but his due. But the little letter did reach him, and seemed to be as satisfactory to him as a volume.

Thenceforth they corresponded, and those letters which I never saw wonderfully lightened the separation, even to me; they made Claire so happy, that the reflected light gave me faith in its source, through all the darkness of absence. Probably, moreover, the separation by seas and continents lightened the other separation between the brother and sister, which must have come for me, when, however the love might continue, the whole weight of his heart's confidence and care came to rest on another. I seemed to gain a sister in Claire before I parted with anything of a brother to Piers's bride.

Moreover, this betrothal, which my father wished to be known at once, had an unforeseen effect on the relations between Amice and her grandmother.

One morning when I was tying sweet-peas on the upper terrace of our garden, to my wonder and joy, Amice herself came out from the Aladdin's-lamp-like door of the little subterranean passage, and walked up the steep slope. I was too surprised even to run and meet her. The "honour due," as I knew Amice felt, to Madam Glanvil, had so sealed my lips, and made me shrink from anything like a clandestine interview.

We shook hands and kissed, without any extra demonstrations, as if we had only parted yesterday. Indeed we had lived together all the time, although it was a year since we had met; because I knew always what Amice was thinking and feeling about it. And Amice was at all times rather like a boy, as Piers used to say, or rather like her grandmother, as to demonstration of feeling.

"Granny sent me!" said she with a smile. "She said to me this morning at breakfast, when Cato and Cæsar had left us,—

"Child! with all your patience and submission, you are as proud as any Glanvil of them all; and that is the only excuse for you. If you had been humble enough to fret, and cry, and rage a little like other girls, it would all have been over months ago. I feel for Bride Danescombe. Why have you shut her out from Court all this time? Of course you might have known I did not mean it."

"Of course I made no apology or self-defence. And she continued,—

"I hope you are the better for the silence. I believe I am. But some one must begin to speak. And as I am deaf, and most used to speaking, I suppose it must be me. What is this about Piers Danescombe?"

"I told her of the engagement with Claire.

"Very ridiculous," she said, but she looked pleased. "The boy a prisoner, and the girl a beggar. However, it is better than your poor great aunt Prothesea and her Elder. If one is to fight any one, or love any one, but an Englishman, it had better be a Frenchman. It seems more natural. One's ancestors hundreds of years ago might have done the same. Besides it is rather a chance we Glanvils did not stay in Normandy, and then we might all unfortunately have been French. There are only two nations, after all, of really old family, the French and ourselves. The rest of them are children, parvenus, savages just civilised. Who had ever heard of Russia when the Glanvils came over with the Conqueror, or of Prussia, or even of Austria? Then, besides, I don't like this partition of Poland. Not that I think much of the Poles. But we got over our little pilferings in the dusk, before history began, we old nations and old families. It is discreditable to be caught doing these things in the daylight."

"I suggested that the Hohenstaufen and the Hohenzollern were not altogether of new blood, and that the Holy Roman Empire was rather ancient.

"Hohenstuff and Holy Roman nonsense," said Granny irreverently, not believing in history or in foreign languages, "that little French thing is not a Roman, at all events, I am glad to see by her coming every Sunday to church. You may have her here with Bride Danescombe."

"But Grannie," I said, "do not talk to her about things Roman, or English and French."

"Do you think that I do not know how to talk to young women in love? I was in love myself once, and am not such a monster after all," said Grannie; "and," she added parenthetically, as she rose from table, "by the way, I have been thinking a good deal. And as to packing the negroes in ships, perhaps John Wesley was right. Not that I think any better of the blacks," she concluded, "not a bit of it; nor of the Methodists. An idle, incorrigible, chattering set, all of them. They may do each other what good or harm they can for me."

"Which was Grannie's form of adhesion to the abolition of the slave-trade, and the toleration of missionaries in the plantations?"

"Claire always said 'the discipline of silence' would work well," I said, "and it certainly has."

"So," said Amice, with her little dropping of laughter, "I have lost my only chance of 'the red rose' of martyrdom, Bride, and am obliged to be as prosperous as your friends at Clapham, and do all my good works to the music of silver trumpets, in the sunshine. At least until I can get to my poor negroes myself. But oh, Bride," she said, her eyes moistening and her whole dear face radiant, "all this means so much, so much, for Granny! And do you know she told me I might have the servants in for family prayer. 'And a chapter from the Bible, or a Psalm, if you like,' she said. 'Not too long, and take care that it is out of the Lessons. I will not have any separatist rambling about the Bible wherever you choose. And a prayer out of a book. One or two of the collects will do.' And she concluded by saying, 'I think we might have the Confession. The Confession is very suitable. I have been saying it over often lately, and I hope it has done me a little good.'"

CHAPTER XXXII.

FOR two years our island was islanded as it had scarcely been before. The Continent was closed to our travellers. Few foreigners entered England, except reluctantly, as exiles or prisoners of war. Yet it so happened that our little world of Abbot's Weir was widened instead of being narrowed by the exclusion.

One of the prisons of war was placed among the bleak moorlands not far from us, where bogs and wild ranges of lonely hills made approach difficult, and escape, for a foreigner, almost impossible.

Our hearts ached often for the men torn from pleasant France to drone away the prime of life within those cheerless walls.

The Latin inscription over the gates, must have read like a mockery to many who entered them.

"PARCERE SUBJECTIS,"

However, with the buoyancy of their race, the French prisoners made the best of their circumstances, kept up each other's spirits by tale and chanson, carved delicate toys out of bones, twisted chains, bracelets, and ornaments out of hair, thought it worth while even in that depth and darkness to make the depth and darkness as light and as tolerable as they could.

With the Americans, men of our own race, who were brought there afterwards, it was different. They drank the cup to the dregs, as those of our race are apt to do, scorning small alleviations, refusing comfort.

Some of us console ourselves by saying that it is the nobler animals, to which freedom is as the breath of life, which beat their wings against the cage and break their hearts against the inevitable; that it is the very energy which makes our race strong against remediable ills, which renders them desperate beneath the irremediable. Yet the creatures who sing in their cages have surely also their merit and their strength. It takes at least as much courage to sing away despair, as to beat against the prison-bars.

Patience has its manly heroism as well as its feminine beauty, is a "virtue" as well as a grace; and certainly it takes a larger weight of Christianity to make us patient than some of our neighbours. Claire naturally made the French prison her "parish;" she and Léontine knitting and sewing warm clothes, and doing what was more difficult to her, making "quêtes" in all directions for money to help her compatriots.

In this work she found a fervent supporter in a young French naval officer, Captain Godefroy, who was taken in one of the earliest engagements, and sent to Abbot's Weir on parole.

I cannot say the French officers were admitted without precautions into our homes. Military men in general were in matrimonial respects not popular among our townfolks. And French soldiers were certainly not regarded as the least perilous to feminine hearts.

But Captain Godefroy was altogether an exception. In the first place he was not a soldier but a sailor, which in itself was something of a passport to our insular natures; in the second he was not a "Papist" but a Protestant; in the third, he was not gay, or debonnaire, or fascinating, or "French," according to any type we recognised. In the last place, (really in the last,) he was a man of some property, and had remittances, and paid his debts most rigidly. And so he became soon quite domiciled among us.

Even Madam Glanvil invited him. I was at Court when she first mentioned him. She had seen him at church on Sunday.

"Who is that fine, sad-looking man," said she to Amice, "in a French naval uniform, who sat in the free seats yesterday? He ought not to sit in the free seats. He is a gentleman. Ask him into ours. Or stay! the vicar might have him. I will speak to the vicar. He was quite an example, so grave and devout, never looked at any one, quite an example, especially as of course he could not understand a word of what was going on."

Page 777.

But Amice said hastily, "He does understand English."

"What is his name?" asked Madam.

Amice did not know.

"Very strange you should know he knows English, and yet not know his name," said her grandmother.

"I know he understands English, because he asked me a question at our gate, and understood my answer. But of course I had no necessity or right to ask his name."

"What did he ask?" said Madam Glanvil, "and at which gate?"

"The gate at the end of the wood, Granny," said Amice, "on the road to the moor. You know it is the limit of the parole for the French prisoners."

"I know no such thing. A very accommodating rule for us!" said Madam Glanvil, grimly. "I should recommend the French prisoners, as a rule, to walk the other way. There are three other roads. And I have no desire to have foreigners prowling about our cottages, among the maidens and the hens. Frenchmen eat eggs by the dozen, and no doubt think all fair in love and war."

Amice laughed, but her colour rose a little. She was not given to "flush and blush" as her grandmother accused me of doing.

"If you wish him to sit in our pew, Granny," said she, "you had better clear your mind first as to the eggs, or perhaps you might not enjoy saying the responses to the Commandments together."

"But you have never told me what he asked. Why cannot you tell plainly at once?"

"I can and will," said Amice. "There is hardly anything to tell. It is a very short story. I was coming up out of the wood, and he stood at the gate with one of Honor Rosekelly's grandchildren on his shoulder. He took off his hat, and, with a very serious look, begged my pardon for speaking. The little creature looked quite at home with him. And the grave, sad look went out of his face when he spoke to her. He said he had found the little maid crying bitterly in the road for mammy; she seemed to have lost her way, and could only point up the lane beyond the gate, "which," he said, with a slight momentary smile, "involved him in a case of conscience, the gate being the furthest limit permitted to his parole."

"Well, what did you do?"

"What could I do, Granny, but take the child from him, and carry it to old Honor's cottage myself?"

"No, poor fellow! You were very clever to understand him," said Madam Glanvil. "No doubt he has a wife and children of his own at home. Those sailors always marry early. I will invite the vicar, and Mr. Danescombe and his wife, and ask him to meet them. You should write at once, if I could only find out the name. And you can ask the little French girl. She will be somebody for him to speak to," concluded Madam Glanvil, unmoved as to her conviction of the impossibility of a foreigner speaking English in any intelligible manner:

"His name is Godefroy," I said, "Captain Hervé Godefroy. His family is from Normandy."

"Normandy!" said Madam Glanvil. Almost as good as a cousin. I have no doubt his forefathers fought side by side with ours. Poor fellow! pity they did not come over with us. His wife and children must be very sorry now, that they stayed behind."

And so Madam Glanvil, having provided Captain Godefroy with suitable domestic ties, and almost proved to her own satisfaction that he was scarcely a Frenchman at all, broke down her usual rule; and the young French officer obtained the entrée to Court.

And so, as my selfish heart cried out at first, my Amice was stolen away from me. And so, as love learned in the end, our Amice found the fulfilment of her life, and gave us Hervé Godefroy, and he gave her back to us worth tenfold all she had been before.

Madam Glanvil herself fell straightway into grandmotherly love for the young man.

He had a grave and tender deference for her, which brought out all the high breeding that belonged of right to her gentle blood. With him her manners took a sweet, old-fashioned, stately courtesy which surprised those who did not know that her eccentricities were but a crust underneath which lay, not only a generous heart, but a fine old polish, inwrought, as in her old oaken furniture, from the use of centuries. It was a pleasant sight to see him kiss her hand, the tender gravity with which he paid, and the lofty yet half shy grace with which she received the homage. The first time, I remember a faint blush came on the fine, fair, proud, old face, and gave one a vision of what it must have been before the strong lines of age, and of habitual care and command had stamped it. She said Captain Godefroy had evidently had a gentleman for his father, and a gentlewoman for his mother. Her courtesy entirely checked, as regarded him, the peremptory inquisition to which she subjected most people. She did not even ask him about the wife and children with whom she had endowed him. She thought it might be too painful for him to speak of them.

Indeed there was a kind of gravity and loftiness about the young French officer which prevented Abbot's Weir in general from gratifying its curiosity by direct questioning, and left a large margin around him for legends and myths on which any light thrown by casual revelations of his own, was welcomed, and multiplied into a hundred prisms.

Not that he made any mysteries about himself. No man could be more frank and straightforward. Intrusive curiosity he was certainly capable of baffling. But in general he was simply unaware that people cared to know about him. Reticent he naturally was. It had, moreover, not been the habit of the men of the "religion" in France to talk much about themselves.

The Protestants of France had passed through a two hundred years' "discipline of silence," living all that time deprived of utterance in public assemblies or in books,—by their very firesides watched by spies and invaded by dragonnades. The discipline had not been without fruit. It had not deprived them of the rapid and acute eloquence which belongs to their nation; but it had pruned from them the habit of boastful and superfluous speech. There had been little temptation to them to speak of what were their true glories, the gibbet, the stake, the wheel, the galleys, the massacred congregations, the violated hearth, encountered for truth and God.

My father from the first had taken greatly to him. They had had many hopes and many désillusionnements in common. And to Madam Glanvil he spoke freely. To all aged people his manner had a deference which was much more than manner. He believed in the venerableness of old age. And there was a clear ring in his rich tenor voice, and a distinctness in his measured and slightly foreign accent which always made his words intelligible to a deafness, as we knew of old, always a little arbitrary and discriminating.

And Amice, during these dialogues, took in a highly feminine way to knitting; now and then interposing with a low word in response to an appeal of his, and always constituting to him the chief part of the audience.

And I sat sometimes, and listened too, and watched my darling—my heroine's heart being won; at first, as it seemed, from me, but afterwards, as I learned, for me and for all.

His father was of an old family of Norman gentlemen. Not sixty years before, in Normandy, six hundred Protestants of the generation of his father and grandfather had escaped from a fresh outburst of persecution, happily the last on a national scale. Their homes had been broken into at night by officers of the king's archers accompanied by the curés of the parish, and their children, especially their young daughters, seized from them with cruel sabre-cuts and blasphemies, to be thrust into convents, there to be taught the Roman Catholic religion at the expense of their parents. Happily that district was near the sea coast, and the midday of the eighteenth century was nearly reached; and so the last large emigration of Protestant refugees escaped better than most of their forefathers.

"Pity," Madam Glanvil said, "your father had not been among those exiles, you would then have been fighting on our side."

Captain Godefroy's mother was a Guiton;—a descendant of the family of the brave Mayor Guiton, who held starving La Rochelle so long against the king's forces.

"Ah!" Madam Glanvil admitted, "I have always been sorry at my heart for that business of La Rochelle. I have often heard of it. One of my own ancestors was an officer of the fleet sent out with the succours which never reached the besieged; I fear were never meant to reach. A bad business. His Majesty had bad advisers, and but too faithful servants. It nearly drove our family over to the wrong side. If it had not been for the civil wars and Oliver Cromwell, and the martyrdom of King Charles, I doubt whether we should have held our politics."

"It was a sad affair for us," Captain Godefroy replied. "It was among our nursery tales how the starving citizens of La Rochelle three times saw, with unutterable grief, the English fleet in the offing, and three times saw—what we had been used to think incredible—England baffled and driven back."

Amice looked up with one of her bright flashes of intelligence and sympathy.

"Your nursery tales must have been of a high order," she said.

"We had certainly no need to turn to stories of loup-garous and witches' caldrons for horrors," he said.

"And little need to turn to Greece and Rome for heroes," she replied.

He smiled one of those rare smiles of his, which came from sources as deep as his sorrows and the courage which bore them.

"We ought to have gained some spiritual muscle," he said, "in pulling two hundred years against the stream."

"You can understand, Madame," he continued, "since you care for our history, how the Revolution, which has proved in many ways such a desolation, seemed to us a deliverance."

This was certainly a little difficult for Madam Glanvil to admit. Except for the amends she felt due for the miscarriage of her ancestors' expedition at La Rochelle, she could scarcely have let it pass.

"Time was beginning to set things right before the Jacobins took it in hand," she said, grimly. "And some of your forefathers were not altogether without turbulence."

"For a hundred years," he replied, "we had many rich, and many noble among us, and we fought for our rights. Would you have had it otherwise?" he asked, not without stratagem, for Madam Glanvil would certainly not have done otherwise. If her theories were for non-resistance, her sympathies were undoubtedly with those who resisted.

"Little good came of it," she said, evasively, applying to her snuffbox.

"So, many of us felt," he replied. "After 1685, the year of the Revocation, we were poor, and for the most part of lowly station, like the Apostles. Our rich men had escaped to enrich England and Germany. Our nobles were exiles. Some of them, Madame, did fight, not ignobly, in your armies. Our congregations assembled in deserts and caves, at the risk of fusillades. Our pastors were consecrated, as they knew, to the 'vocation of martyrdom.' But our pastors preached submission, and our people, for the most part, to the utmost limit of endurance (the rising of the Cevennes being ended), practised it."

Amice had laid aside her work, and was gazing far away.

"I weary you with my old histories," he said softly.

"No," she said; "I was only thinking of the West Indian slaves. If some of your people could have taught them the lessons of patience, they would have come with force from such lips."

He paused.

"You have West Indian property?" he said earnestly. "In St. Vincent a plantation was left to me. Once I wished to take charge of it, and prevent some of the evils there; and afterwards I often regretted I had not. I thought I had missed my vocation. But scarcely lately," he added, as if to himself.

This little interlude took place in very rapid words, whilst Madam Glanvil was expressing her divided state of mind by vigorously poking the fire.

"You should have kept to the old track," she said at last. "The pasteurs were wiser than the democrats. Revolution could do nothing for you."

"Not quite nothing," he demurred; "but it promised much. You will remember it is not forty years since in the Catholic churches at Toulouse they celebrated with pomp the anniversary of the St. Bartholomew of the South. It is not forty years since the Pasteur Rochette was hanged, and three gentlemen of Languedoc were beheaded at Toulouse for religion, or since poor old Calas, by long-since-disproved calumny—accused of the murder of his son for turning Catholic—was broken on the wheel, and took two hours dying. 'I die innocent,' he said. 'Jesus Christ, innocent itself, willed to die by torments yet more cruel.' The Catholic priests who attended him on the scaffold confessed, 'Thus in old times died our martyrs.' Voltaire pleaded for his memory. In three years the sentence was annulled, and fanaticism to that extent was never possible again. At least," he added sadly, "fanaticism upheld by the Church and the law. The fanaticism of mobs is a hurricane no one can provide against."

"Léontine says always that all our people die well," interposed Claire, who happened to be present. "Of our king also, and Madame Elizabeth, may it not be said, 'Thus in old times died our martyrs?'"

"Ah, Mademoiselle," he replied, "if you could know how eagerly we, who have been so long accustomed to be banished outside our national history as proscribed outlaws, take up and claim the heroic traditions we have in common with all our countrymen! To be exiled in France, as we were, was in some respects harder than to be exiled from it. To understand our isolation," he continued, "you must remember it is not thirty years since one of our pastors died in prison for religion, in La Brie. And it is not fifteen years," he concluded, his voice dropping to its deepest tones, and tremulous with feeling, "since all professions were closed to us and all means of livelihood except trade, or farming; since our marriages were illegal, our children unrecognised as lawful, the rites of Christian burial of our dead forbidden to us. It was only in 1787 that marriage and burial were permitted us. Was it wonderful that we welcomed the dawn of the Revolution?"

"Ah, monsieur," said tender-hearted Claire, breaking down into tears, "I wonder at nothing in our poor France. My mother taught me that. Only I like to think that we, of the Catholic noblesse, and our king, did a little to help you before we fell. In 1787, when these your wrongs were redressed, France had still a king and a nobility."

"Nobody doubts that your King Louis was a saint, or fit to be one," Madam Glanvil said; "if he was not a sage."

Madam Glanvil was a little impatient with tears. Amice had not used her to them. Their race was of the kind from which wrong does not draw tears, but strikes fire.

A little storm was gathering.

Captain Godefroy dispersed it.

"Mademoiselle," he said to Claire, "it was a happy moment for us when the aged Paul Rabaud preached the first sermon in the first temple granted us, at Nismes; when the women who had faded from youth to grey hairs, in the prisons of Aigues Mortes were set free. It was a proud moment for us Protestants when Rabaud St. Etienne, himself ordained, at twenty, a pastor of the persecuted Church, grandson of our noble Paul Rabaud, who had been from youth to past middle age a hunted Pasteur du Désert, was nominated President of the General Assembly of France, and said there to all the nation, 'My country is free. Let her show herself worthy of liberty by declaring that the very word tolerance shall be proscribed—that unjust word which represents religious differences as crimes.' But it was a moment which touched a deeper chord when the grandson of the persecuted pleaded for the life of the great-grandson of the persecutor. We could not silence the clamours which drowned the dying words of our king. We could only thank God for him that he died patient, calm, and believing as any of those forefathers of our religion, whose dying words had been similarly silenced long before."

"For me," he resumed, "I have, indeed, hoped too much, from every direction. I hoped from the National Assembly, with Rabaud St. Etienne at its head; I hoped from the Republic; did it not proclaim liberty and brotherhood? I hoped from Napoleon Buonaparte; did he not declare that 'the empire of the law ceases where the empire of conscience begins?' I hoped the old hatreds were to die out between class and class, between faith and faith, between nation and nation. My politics, therefore, are little worth any one's attending to."

"Yet," said Amice softly, "you would not wish to have hoped less."

"No!" he said; "to hope all and lose all is better, infinitely better, than to hope nothing and lose nothing. Is not hope itself something?"

So in many a talk by the fireside, in garden and woodland walks, the summers and winters wore on towards 1805. And all the while Amice's life and mine were separating and gathering around different centres.

More and more, the conversation, when we were all together, used to be between Captain Godefroy and Madam Glanvil. With Amice he had reached a certainty of understanding that needed little direct speech.

The different types of their religion, as of their characters, fulfilled each other wonderfully. With her religion meant forgiveness, love, the forgiving Father, the Incarnate and atoning Son; the loving, healing, softening Spirit; the reconciled, happy, obedient child. With him it meant power, majesty, truth, justice, the Sovereign to Whom the profoundest loyalty, unlimited self-sacrifice, and unhesitating obedience were due; at Whose lips we were to question nothing, from Whose hand we were to submit to everything, in Whose heart-searching presence a lie was impossible, on Whose awful altar of truth life was a light offering; the soldier sworn, to die at his post; the subject ready, to seal his loyalty with life.

His hereditary faith was that masculine Calvinism which has been the religion of so many strong intellects, of so many free nations, and of so many heroic hearts; the faith in a Supreme Will, unalterably just, which must conquer all wills, must be accepted, at whatever cost to reason or heart, must be obeyed, at whatever cost to heart or life; the faith which in men has combined as much of daring and duty; in women, of devoutness and heroism; in nations, of law and liberty, as any in the world.

Amice's faith was rather in the Supreme Love which must conquer all hearts.

Both met, and fulfilled each other's faith in that redeeming Cross where the Divine Love suffered to the utmost for man, and the human will gave itself to the utmost to God.

Both met and fulfilled each other's life in that lifelong service of the oppressed, to which they devoted themselves; every act and sacrifice of which, God, in giving them to each other, made for them, step after step, from light into fuller light, on and on, as we believe, for ever.

I cannot think or speak of that deep, perfect, ennobling love of theirs, except with the same gravity and reverence as I think of their religion. There were no misunderstandings, no fluctuations, no flashes of surprise in it. Their hearts were open all through to each other.

And at last, one morning in the winter before the Battle of Trafalgar, Madam Glanvil said to Amice, as Amice was rubbing her chilled feet by her bedroom fire (the old lady went out little now, and grew less arbitrarily deaf, and submitted sometimes to be a little petted and caressed), "I do not think Captain Godefroy has any wife or children, after all."

"I never thought he had, Granny," said Amice.

"I suppose, now, there is no help for it," Madam Glanvil rejoined; "and he may as well continue to come here as before." Which was Madam Glanvil's sanction to Amice's engagement.

And the next day she wore on her finger a chased gold ring, with a sapphire in it, which Captain Godefroy's mother had been used to wear on her wedding finger.

And Captain Godefroy ventured to salute the stately old lady's cheek; whereupon, rising from her high-backed chair (she still scorned an easy-chair), and taking his two hands in hers, she said, "You will understand her better, and be better to her than I have been. She is a good child, but a true Glanvil; perhaps not altogether the worse for that; certainly not the worse for being something besides. I never thought to have given one of our house to a Frenchman. But, after all, we were all Norman once; and it was a chance that your forefathers did not come over with us, or even your father himself in that emigration of the six hundred only sixty years ago. If they had, or he had, there would have been no difficulty; and I do not know that we ought to let a chance like that keep you apart. At all events, I suppose it is too late," she concluded, with a little dry smile, "for an old woman's word to keep you apart now; you seem to have taken the matter into your own hands. So, I may as well do like the rest of the wise despots, pretend to command by willing what you will."

And so saying, she took Amice's hand also in hers, and held them together one moment, and then, not without some quivering of lips and tottering of limbs, but declining all assistance, she left them together, and went slowly up the old oak stairs alone to her chamber.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

MADAM GLANVIL never walked down that old oak staircase again. Often, afterwards, with the unreasonable self-reproach of love, when death has made love sacred, and unable any more to serve, she would blame herself for not insisting on helping her grandmother up the stairs that night.

"The first time for years and years I had not gone with her, first following as a child, and then, in after years, supporting her, and always waiting for the kiss at the door! Even during the year of our silence—('which was indeed my fault,' she would say, 'all my fault, all my pride, my ungenerous misunderstanding!') And not even to have seen her go up that last evening! In my selfish happiness, taking her at her word, when I ought to have distrusted and disobeyed. She would have been pleased. And I can never do anything to please her more."

Tender trifles of everyday life, little unnoticed habits of love, which at any moment may give a shattering shock to our inmost being, simply by being stopped! And I, not knowing yet the austere sincerity of grief, would vainly try to excuse and comfort her.

But Hervé Godefroy understood grief, and Amice, better; the truthfulness of her nature, and also the terrible truthfulness of sorrow. And he let her grieve, grieving with her. He knew that such pain cannot be stilled, that the wound must have its anguish, if it is not to mortify, and spread the touch of death throughout the whole being; that, so the anguish may work itself into the whole heart, making it soft and deep and tender, patient and pitiful.

The very night of Amice's betrothal, the blow had come, that direct destruction of power, as if by the benumbing touch of an irresistible hand, without warning or pain, which we call a "stroke."

In the morning, Amice waited some time for her grandmother's appearance (Madam Glanvil having great scorn of aid in her toilet to the last, so that no one ventured to intrude on her privacy until she rang); until, at last she became alarmed, and rushing up the stairs, knocked softly at the chamber door.

An answer came, gentle and faint; and entering, she found her grandmother unable to move, although her speech was happily unaffected.

Dr. Kenton when summoned thought the case very serious; and he hinted that one of the gravest symptoms was the—"might he say?—unnatural gentleness and placability of the patient." But this Amice would not admit. She was persuaded, she told me, though she did not say so to Dr. Kenton, that this gentleness had been growing for some time, and that it was due not to paralysis, but to John Wesley's "Thoughts on Slavery," and to the use of the General Confession.

Yet she was not consistent with herself, for when I acquiesced, she burst into tears, and forgetting the moral source to which she had insisted on attributing Madam Glanvil's softened demeanour, she murmured, "Oh, if I could only hear Granny scold us all heartily once more!"

It was a vain wish.

Madam Glanvil retained to the last her objections to "scenes"—to anything melodramatic; otherwise, I believe, she would have found consolation in summoning all the household (including first of all Cato, and Cæsar, and Chloe), or, indeed, all Abbot's Weir around her bed, and telling them how hasty and proud she felt she had often been, and how, terrible as it had been at first to lie smitten and helpless,—she felt it happy, at last, to submit and lie low beneath the Hand that had brought her down.

But, as it was, she did nothing but be patient, and said little but to thank everyone for every little kindness—or now and then, when she thought herself alone, or alone with Amice, which was just the same—to thank God and ask Him not to let her be impatient—and often to breathe the name of Jesus, and say how much more He had suffered; Himself once helpless as she was, unable to move hand or foot, but also unable to hide His face from the mocking crowd, while she could still move one arm,—and saw around her nothing but love and reverence.

She took no farewells, except only of poor Chloe. And that was the longest confession she made, of sin, or of faith. Taking Chloe's black hand with the one hand she could use, she looked at Amice and said:—

"You took good care of her. She will take care of you and yours. I am going where people are not divided into black and white, or into slave or free. All free there. Perhaps one day all free here. You will come, and are sure to be welcomed on the right hand. Forgive me for hasty words, and pray that He may forgive, and that I may not be told to depart. Saviour of all, make us all free, that we may be free indeed."

To which poor Chloe could only reply by sobbing protestations of devotion and gratitude, and assurances that missis would get well, or be sure to have some high place in heaven, far above such as she, except for what the blessed Lord had done for all alike.

For Chloe had no objection at all to differences of glory in heaven, and could never quite get over a feeling that white people who, having all they could want, and being able to read and write, were humble enough to become Christians, must have some higher reward by-and-by, than black people, who being slaves, and having nothing that they wanted, naturally fled to the pitiful Saviour, as a hunted animal to its covert.

But when Chloe was led sobbing from the room, she said to Amice,—

"She will never live, missie! Poor dear missis! So like a lamb! so sweet and meek! She sees everything too dim, and too clear. No difference between black and white! Poor dear missis!—and asking me to pray for her! As if the dear Lord could not hear her better than me!—me who talk like a baby, and she who talks like a book."

"God gives the best things to the babes," Amice said; "and Jesus told us to be like the children. So, pray, Chloe! Pray!"

"Do you think, missie, poor Chloe has got to begin now to pray for poor dear missis? When missis called us lazy brutes and uglier still, need to pray, then! But now she so sweet, like a lamb! Nothing to ask, nothing to do, but praise the Lord night and day, and cry like a child."

Madam Glanvil spoke little, but once again she murmured, "Thou Saviour of all, make us all free, that we may be free indeed."

Strangely the simple words struck to Amice's heart; they were the last in those "Thoughts of John Wesley on slavery," which her grandmother had once thrown angrily into the fire.

So, all through that summer and autumn of 1805, the shadow of death lay on the old house at Court, and a high and brave spirit was slowly divesting itself of much that cannot be carried on that lonely journey; having already put away all sense of property, except as a provision for those who are left below, and now laying aside pride, and hard judgment, and much prejudice, that so, when the last step came, nothing might be left but to commend herself, bare and destitute, but redeemed and reconciled, confidently, into the Father's hands.

Following the slowly departing spirit along that silent solemn way, those in the old House had little thought to spare for the tumults in the world around; although, as winds and storms swept and wailed through the woods, and battered and cannonaded the old house with noisy display of force (so feeble compared with the silent foe within), all, except the sufferer, knew too well that a fiercer storm of war and peril was raging around England. The fleets of Nelson and Villeneuve were being tossed and driven by those autumnal gales.

Never, men said, since the Armada threatened England had her peril been as great as now.

Once more, as we all knew (and for the last time, which we knew not), Napoleon Buonaparte was menacing us on the shores of France, and with him the Grand Army, a hundred and thirty thousand men, with transports ready to convey them. "Give me the command of the Channel for twelve hours," he said, "et l'Angleterre aura vécu." And, meantime, Admiral Villeneuve, who was to give him that command, and Nelson, who was to restrain Villeneuve, were wandering, we knew not where, on the high seas. We only knew that the French fleet had gone to the West Indies, and Nelson after it, with a far inferior force, which numerical inferiority, however, in itself gave us little uneasiness.

The first good news we received was that Villeneuve and his ships, driven by Nelson from the West Indies, and then missed by him, had been encountered by Sir Robert Calder, cruising in the Channel, with at least this result of victory, that the French fleets had to abandon the protection of the flotilla intended to transport the invaders, and the Emperor withdrew with the Grand Army to carry on the war in Germany. For which service England, accustomed to naval victories more undeniable, administered in a lofty way rather rebuke than thanks to Sir Robert Calder.

Napoleon had withdrawn. But we were still in uncertainty as to the destination of the French and Spanish fleets. Nelson, shattered by his harassing pursuit of Villeneuve, was taking his last rest in his country house, when the news reached him that Villeneuve was safe, in a trap, at Cadiz. The irresistible call of patriotism touched his heart once more, he offered his services to the Admiralty, and, on the 22nd of September, arrived at Portsmouth, to take command of the fleet. Exultation and sorrow were strangely blent through England in that departure; as, a few weeks afterwards, when "Home they brought her warrior, dead."

We heard how the people crowded around him on the shore, not idly gazing, but weeping around him, and even kneeling to implore blessings on him. So he sailed, in the Victory, taking his coffin with him, made out of the mast of L'Orient.

Two days afterwards Buonaparte left Paris for his campaign against Russia and Austria; and our statesmen began to feel stronger than for many years, believing that they had, at last, secured in the alliance recently concluded with Austria and Russia a powerful coalition against Napoleon. William Pitt was full of hope in this alliance; but the heart of England rested not so much on his alliances, as on himself; on himself, and on Nelson, her two mighty sons; little dreaming that neither of them was to be with us by the new year!

The times were perilous, indeed, for England; but with Pitt and Nelson to think and to fight for us, we felt the world no chaos. Rapidly indeed the thinking and the fighting were wearing out the heart and brain of the two on whom all England was leaning. But this, in those days, we knew not. We had our Atlas and our Hercules; and they did their work cheerily and gallantly, as the heroes do, making little of it; whilst we little thought how heavily the world they bore up was pressing on the shoulders, or that the labours were draining away the life.

On the 21st of October, early in the morning, the long watching by the death-bed at Court was over. The hush of awe had succeeded to the hush of anxious watchfulness.

Amice had sent the weary nurses and servants to rest, and was left alone for awhile beside her dead.

She opened the window, and listened to the flow of the river, and the sweep of the wind through the autumnal woods, and the song of a few robins, calm, autumnal, full of a quiet content, all rapture of love and hope long past. It was the first time she had looked on the outer world for so long! And now it seemed such a long way off, "altogether the other world," she said. "My world was the spiritual world, the unseen, where she had gone, where the spirit really always dwells, as unseen always as hers now. She was near; and God, and our Lord, and the loving Spirit. The woods, the old familiar garden, even the singing birds, were far away. I felt it once before, in a measure, when I knelt beside Chloe in the church on the New Year's Eve of the century. The wind, the very sky, so pure and delicate in its morning tints, the birds, flowers, were material, mortal, corruptible. And she and I had always and had still what was incorruptible and faded not away. She has now that only. And in those first moments I felt her not gone, but brought nearer than ever."

It seemed a time when barriers were broken down, and veils rent from the top to the bottom. The world grew larger and nearer, the struggling, sinning, suffering world, with God loving it. And then two things came before her like visions. The French and English fleets, which Hervé Godefroy said he thought must ere long be joined in battle, the human beings, countrymen of hers and of his, fighting and struggling for the mastery, and dying there; and the slaves in the West Indies, men, and women, and children, too surely driven that very morning to their hard, unbroken work with threats and blows. What a chaos, what an arena of wild beasts it seemed! And Granny was at rest beyond it all. But was God really loving all? English and French, slaves and slaveholders? And was dying, indeed, to go and be with Him, with Christ, Who had seen the world and its battles, not from above only, but from within, from beneath—borne down in the battle, bruised and smitten?

If then God loved the world, those with Him must love the world, and if He could bear to look at it, having created it, and loved it so much as to give his Son for it; so could they.

What makes it possible for any of us to bear the sight of suffering in those dear to us? What could it be but hope? Hope of healing and purification through suffering; hope of rescue at any cost for the lost; hope learned from Him who not only loved the world enough, through all its sinning, to give Himself for it, but hoped for it enough to deem the joy set before Him of saving it from its sin well worth the Cross?

They through hope able to be patient; we through patience learning to hope.

What then are they caring for?

In its measure for every conflict, it seemed to Amice, against wrong, and injustice, and oppression without.

Supremely, for every conflict against sin and selfishness within.

For this terrible European war, then, in its measure, as far as truth and justice are involved in it.

Surely, for the struggle, through English law, against the great wrong of slavery.

Supremely, for the struggle, through Christ's Gospel, against sin and despair in the slave, and in the master.

To this last she had consecrated herself five years before; when that high and prejudiced spirit, latterly so cleared and softened, had been the only obstacle to the service. To this, beside that lifeless form, she consecrated herself again, as, absolutely and without reserve what the softened and lowly spirit which but that morning had departed, must now be caring for most on earth. The only obstacle now in her path was the great love which made life so precious.

Should she let that great gift of God be a hindrance to obeying His call?

She made no vow, she only knelt beside the pale, placid, impassive face, and repeated once more the words she had uttered a few hours before, responded to, then, with that last gaze, that wistful gaze not fixed any longer on her, or on anything on earth.

"Father, into Thy hands I commend my spirit; into Thy hands to guide, mould,—into Thy hands, absolutely, without reserve, to do with me what Thou wilt."

Then, rising, she went down-stairs.

It was daylight now, though not in the darkened house. She went into the dining-room, and at sight of the high old empty chair, daily life came back to her, with the new great blank, and the reality of the greater blank and sacrifice before her, yet. She had not been there long when Hervé Godefroy came.

And as he drew her to him, through her tears, she said at once, not daring to delay,—

"The only obstacle duty placed in the way of that great duty you and I have recognised so long is gone. Tell me, what shall I do? You come of a race long used to give up its best to God. Strengthen me to do what I ought."

It was evidently no new effort to him to measure what that duty might cost.

For, holding both her hands in his, and pressing them against his heart, and looking down into her tearful eyes, he said,—

"The like sacrifices were required of us for generations. But with us it was the women that risked their dearest, and the men only themselves. I see now how much greater their sacrifice than ours."

"You see I must go," she said, "and soon."

Then she led him up into the chamber of death. For a few moments they stood together there. And then, as they stood again together by the fireside beside the stately old empty chair, he said,—

"I see, my love; I know. We will go, in spirit at least, not apart but together. Our life here is but a moment of our life. And, whatever the moment be, the life shall be together, for Him and with Him for ever."

They did not speak of her return. That hope was too precious, too precarious to utter.

And thenceforth their only thought was how to lighten the separation to each other.

So that first day of death passed at the old darkened house at Court; not altogether dark; a day of death, but a day of duty fulfilled, of victory won.

And, all the time, that terrible day of victory and of death was wearing away at Trafalgar.

There, Nelson, smitten to death for England, was still inspiring Englishmen to victory. Wounded to death by a shot from a ship his humanity had twice spared, supposing she had struck, his face lighted up through all his agony, as cheer after cheer from his crew announced that another French or Spanish ship had surrendered.

Duty, not glory, was the glorious mark he had set before his men; sacrifice of self for England, let England's recognition of the sacrifice be what it might.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

THE winter months that followed were dark indeed for us all;—in the world of England, in our little world at Abbot's Weir.

The news of the surrender of the Austrian General Mack at Ulm, with his thirty thousand, had reached England more than a fortnight before that of Nelson's victory at Trafalgar; and had struck the other great Englishman on whom we leaned, to the heart.

Trafalgar seemed to make it yet possible for him to live. He struggled hard for life, and was often sanguine of recovery. But from the tidings of the union of the Russian and Austrian armies with Napoleon's, and of the coalition of Austerlitz he never revived. The fatal news came to him in December, and in little more than a month—on the 23rd of January, 1803—the great Minister, William Pitt, lay dead in his house at Putney. He was scarcely fifty years old. His friend Mr. Wilberforce said, "He died of a broken heart,"—broken for love of England.

The last words we knew him to have uttered—"My country; oh, my country!"—rang like a death-wail throughout the land.

They had done their duty to the death, for England, those two Englishmen. Better loved, the country could never be again; nor more fearlessly and disinterestedly served.

We had great names still,—Collingwood, and Charles Fox; and one we knew not yet, fighting and making order for us, far away in India. But these seemed to most of us in those days of mourning but of the second rank.

The heroes were gone, we thought, as men have thought so often. We had good and brave men left, but those whom we had lost had been something more.

Amice was in London by the end of December. She had gone to stay at Clapham, with her cousins, the Beckford-Glanvils; the present possessors of Court; to consult about arrangements for the property, and about her expedition to the West Indies.

Thus by war, and death, and absence, our little circle had dwindled sadly.

Piers still in that French village near Claire's old home; and for many months not a word of tidings from or about him. Dick Fyford, wounded at Trafalgar, and slowly making his way home; Amice away preparing to go to the West Indies; and Captain Godfrey, certainly not present with us in spirit; there was great need that we should "serrer les rangs," thinned as they were, and press closer to each other, if we were to "press forward" at all. Which, while we live, has to be done, and therefore can be done—always.

The Sunday-school especially occupied us. My father himself had undertaken Piers's class of boys. He could not bear to see anything Piers had begun languish or fall. He went to his Sunday task very meekly, and with a strong sense of his poverty in didactic power and dogmatic definitions, but as regularly as he went to his daily business.

believe (so strong was the Paganism, lurking under our Christian faith) that we should all have felt it ominous if any machinery set in motion by Piers had stopped. Whatever was laid aside, everything connected with him must be made to prosper. How deeply it used to go to my heart to see the dear grey head bending down among the boys; the teacher being quite as much in awe of them as they of him!
II. N.S.

My impression was, that, as with us of old, he did not directly inculcate much, but drew out what his scholars thought and felt, making them give shape to many a vague thought, and unfolding many a repressed feeling, leading them unconsciously to plough and water their own ground; and then dropping in seed; very little seed, and often unperceived in its sowing, but none the less taking root, springing up after many years.

And when he felt his poverty deepest, he had recourse to the "Pilgrim's Progress," or occasionally to portions of "Robinson Crusoe," which never failed to interest, and make them children together, teacher and taught.

Claire meanwhile prospered greatly with Amice's infant class.

Moreover, our Sunday-school began to grow in many directions; for one, in the direction originally foreseen by the dames. The instruction of the week had to be brought more up to the level of the instruction of the Sundays. And it was seriously in my father's contemplation that Abbot's Weir should have a week-day school on the Lancastrian system, combined with some hints from Pestalozzi.

Thus were the most desponding Cassandras among the Dames justified.

It was quite a serious battle. The French Reign of Terror was little more than a decade behind us. And my father was now proposing a measure even more revolutionary than any which had called forth accusations of sedition and atheism against Mrs. Hannah More. He proposed what she earnestly disclaimed, in a letter to one of her bishops. He actually proposed to teach the youth of Abbot's Weir—the youth of both sexes and all conditions—to write.

In vain Mrs. Danescombe warned, and Miss Felicity threatened. "The pen would banish the housemaid's broom, would supersede the spade, the plough, the needle. In the next generation there would be no more maid-servants, washerwomen, laundresses, or sempstresses."

"The men would write love-letters whilst the sheep were straying and the crops unsown; the maids would respond while the kettle was boiling over and the linen in rags. A deluge of correspondence would sweep away all honest work, and level all social distinctions."

"Mrs. Danescombe and Miss Felicity might not live to see it—they trusted not—nor poor dear Mr. Danescombe, who had opened the dykes,—on him, charity might hope that day of ruin might not dawn. On the one hand, Voltaire and Tom Paine and Jean Jacques Rousseau pouring in, through the sacrilegious breach of reading; on the other, sedition and heresy, envy, malice, hatred, and all uncharitableness,—and 'love-making' pouring out through the breach of writing! Our poor soldiers and sailors might as well give up the contest. Napoleon's army might be recalled from Boulogne, and his fleets lost at Trafalgar. But for England all was over."

Such were some of the murmurs of that stream against which, nevertheless, we pulled, not without success, though certainly not with the result of such a deluge of knowledge and such an universal fury of mental activity as was apprehended.

Uncle Fyford was neutral. The Sunday-school had not been so Jacobinical as he had feared. Mr. Rabbidge was tolerant, but not encouraging. He had not seen any alarming passion for literature result from letters, as he had taught them.

Reuben's comment was reassuring.

"The good Lord," he said, "had mercifully sent the good corn through John Wesley and others, before He set folks on putting up the mills to grind it, or the ovens to bake it. The preaching had come before the teaching, the gospel before the spelling-book, the converting Spirit before the letter; and now the good words were there, the more schools there were to teach them, and the more pens to spread them, the better."

Never was intercourse with Loveday Benbow more strengthening and hopeful than during those years of many changes and many perils. War was to her altogether evil, inhuman, diabolical. To her all victories were darkened, as that one victory of Trafalgar was to all England, by the shadow of death. The roll of glory was written within and without, to her eyes, with lamentation, and mourning, and woe.

Self-sacrifice in dying she could understand to the utmost. Self-sacrifice resulting in killing she would scarcely place higher than a highwayman's generosity.

For Toussaint L'Ouverture starved in the dungeon at Joux, for Andrew Hofer, the patriot betrayed and shot, she could weep. Over Nelson's dying agonies, lighted up by shouts of victory, she could only shudder. But throughout and underneath the great national conflicts, the old warfare was going on with which her life was identified. On this (however we might, any of us, be turned aside by personal anxieties, or by literal battles on sea or land) Loveday's heart and eyes were steadfastly fixed.

Once more the abolition of the slave-trade had been brought before the House of Commons; and once more, after a large majority on the previous year, it had been thrown out. Yet this defeat did not discourage the best informed among its supporters. At last, experienced eyes began to recognise an uncertainty and division in the enemy's ranks, as if they were on the point of breaking.

Not a few of the West Indian planters themselves began to waver; some, moved by the conviction of the injustice of the trade, and others by a persuasion of its impolicy. Those who were watching closely detected a thousand subtle symptoms that public opinion was veering round. Many hearts were touched to the deepest indignation. Many consciences were aroused, if not to "godly repentance," at least to wholesome fear. The very presence of the whirlwind and the earthquakes of war, of the immeasurable perils threatening the country on so many sides, were like the guillotine en permanence before the nations; and many began to ask what accursed thing we might be harbouring amongst us which might be blinding the eyes of our rulers, and weakening the arms of our soldiers.

The two great rival leaders, Pitt and Fox, were altogether one in their desire to redress this wrong. Pitt had supported it from the first; had (Mr. Clarkson said) been "steadfast to the anti-slavery cause from the beginning"; he had "vainly sought to enlist France for it in 1788," he had "fostered it in its infancy." Unable, Mr. Clarkson believed, from "insuperable difficulties which could not be mentioned," to do more; he had given the weight of his eloquence to it again and again, and had at least "kept it from falling."

And now that Pitt had died without effecting the abolition, Mr. Fox took up the work more untrammelled than his predecessor, and determined to make its accomplishment one of the foremost objects of his policy.

What Nelson's battles were to England, every turn of the anti-slavery debates in Parliament was to Loveday. She felt sure that the days when fifty thousand helpless captives could be kidnapped year by year in Africa and as many of them as survived the horrors of the voyage sold to fresh cruelties in the West Indies, were drawing to a close.

The very fervency of hope with which she looked forward to the approaching deliverance seemed too much for her sensitive and feeble frame. We had noticed with anxiety the gradual failing of her strength, the increase of the worn, hollow look, the reluctant abandonment of one little work after another. We scarcely dared to speak of these things to each other, or to her.

Miss Felicity, absorbed in her brother, did not seem to observe these downward steps at all. Physical, like moral infirmity, was to her a stain on the family honour, to be ignored as far as possible in adults, and to be rigorously repressed in the young. She would have held it an insult for any one to inquire for her own health; she was doing strictly as she would have others do to her, in never prying into Loveday's. Having abandoned the struggle to make her well, the only remaining course was to let her alone, to be an invalid, in peace. If you could not fulfil your duty to your neighbour by being well, the less said about it the better.

Loveday had accepted the practice, and in part the theory. She never mentioned her own ailments; and I believe she looked on her weakness as a humiliation, and in some way a wrong, which she inflicted on her father and on her aunt. She accepted her couch of pain and helplessness as a very low place in the kingdom. She felt, I believe, that there must be some especially bad possibilities in her, from which God mercifully had saved her through chastenings which He never willingly inflicted; and she acted as if she could never do enough for her father and Miss Felicity and the world in general, to make up for being such a burden.

Once, I remember, she said to me, during those dark months of 1805:—

"How can I ever repay Aunt Felicity for all her care of my father, for doing all I ought to have done? My heart and mind have been free to take up the burden of the slaves. But she has been a slave all her life or me and mine. And that," she added, "is what makes true Church History so absolutely impossible. The deaths of martyrs and the deeds of philanthropists are seen and heard, and can be told; but who can tell the anguish of the homes from which the martyrs came, or the sacrifices of those whose quiet work at home made the public work possible?"

"Who, indeed," I said, "can count the secret fountains? Many may speak of our Amice by-and-by. But what would Amice, or any of us, have been without this little couch and all we have learnt here?"

Which observation, to avoid controversy, I had to follow up instantly by presenting her with a letter from Amice.

Amice was more enthusiastic about Clapham than I expected; not certainly about her cousins, the Beckford-Glanvils, but about mine.

"It does one good all through," she wrote, "to be in such a wind of good words, and such a current of good work. It seems to me all so English, this Clapham world—patient, practical, conservative, reforming, impatient of abuses, patient of precedent in removing them. English in a very high sense, not perhaps the very highest—not exactly the English of Shakspeare, or Bacon, or Milton, or John Howe, or John Wesley; not blind to the value of earthly good things, not at all, yet really holding them not as owners but as stewards,—well-salaried stewards certainly, but faithful. The giving is large; almost large, I think, in proportion to the living. It is certainly not a case of 'no purse, and only one coat;' nor of John Wesley's two silver spoons, and out of an income of thirty pounds a year giving two, and out of an income of one hundred and twenty, ninety-two,—the private expenditure fixed, the giving only increasing. That is not the ratio. I do not say it should be. I confess also that sometimes the thousands of pounds subscribed do come out with a grand roll, as if they were equal to the 'two mites,' which, of course, they are not.

"Nor is the heroism so impressive, for instance, as that of the French Huguenots, or of St. Paul. The ships are too well built and victualled to be liable to frequent shipwreck, or to 'hungerings often.' Nor does the literature strike me as likely to be immortal, except perhaps some sayings of Mr. Cecil's. Everything strikes me as being on the second level. No Luther, no Latimer; no genius, no martyrdom; no perils, no glories; no frightful ice-chasms, no dazzling snowpeaks, no spontaneous paradises of flowers among the ice seas.

"After all, are not all second generations apt to be on the second level? Was it different with any of the Religious Orders? Was it different with the earliest Church? Must not the Church always be Protestant before it becomes Catholic? And becoming Catholic, in its midst must not new reformers have continually to rise and protest?"

"But, this granted, on this second level work of the truest, conflict of the noblest, charity of the tenderest; a wide grasp of the evils of the world, and a determination to combat them; a close investigation into evils at home, and patient labour to remove them. Homes pure and tender, full of Christian activity, and of generous charity, and of able, effective helpfulness as could be.

"And your cousins, Bride, are delightful. My heart warms through every time I enter the house. Harriet, 'the Reformer,' has set her heart on accompanying me to the West Indies. And I believe Mr. Crichton will allow it.

"A good, healthy, habitable working zone of the Church it is to live in.

"And yet, and yet, good as I feel the atmosphere to be, and healthy, my ideal is set a little higher and a little lower. You know you always thought me tropical. I want a little more sun, and a little more frost; a little more aspiration in thought; a little more poverty in life; a little more up on the heights; a little more down among the sufferers.

"Well, we must have different zones.

"My Moravians, I think, will suit me. They are very 'still,' which gives space for the heart to rise in contemplation, and very 'plain,' which disencumbers for pilgrimage.

"A little band will, I believe, go out with me, a detachment of them, to my father's estate. Mr. Crichton is a little apprehensive as to the 'soundness' of my Moravians. Indeed, a certain section of Clapham does seem to me as if it would be better for a little more of Nelson's childish experience. 'What is fear? I never saw fear.' It is afraid of so many things—of mysticism, and Methodism, and Moravians, and rationalism, and 'reason,' and science, and society. It sees so many 'dangerous' subjects. It is curious that on one point its courage is almost reckless. It is not at all afraid to encounter the peril of being rich. And yet, on the whole, there seems to me more in the New Testament about the peril of being rich than about the peril of any kind of curious opinions."

This was part of her letter to me. To Loveday she wrote:—

"The talking here is excellent and inspiring, but rather incessant. I shall be glad of a little 'stillness.' I want to listen, and look; and I want exceedingly not to be listened to and looked at so much, as if one were something wonderful. You have made me more than half a Quaker, Loveday, my friend of friends. I want some 'silent meetings.' I want to exercise myself by a good pull against the stream. Here one seems borne on the current. And I am afraid of merely drifting.

"The hour of deliverance from the slave-trade is, they say, fast approaching. I shall scarcely see it in England. But you will. And I shall feel it among my 'black mankind.' And we shall rejoice together."

I noticed that Loveday's eyes moistened, and her voice quivered, as she read aloud that last sentence.

"We shall certainly all feel it somewhere," she said; "and we shall certainly rejoice together. God knows where. And He knows best."

And in February Amice wrote me another letter:—

"I have seen the two great funerals," she said; "the mourners, all England. Not solemnity only and reverent silence was there when Nelson was borne through the crowded streets to St. Paul's, but weeping, and sobbing, and bitter lamentation.

"And in Westminster Abbey, little more than a month afterwards, England had to lay the other son in whom she trusted. Mr. Wilberforce, the friend of years, bore the banner before the coffin of William Pitt.

"Both, Nelson and Pitt, so young! In the prime of life! Both worn out for England. What last words they have left echoing through every heart—

'My country, oh, my country!'

And the great motto—

'England expects every man to do his duty.'

What words to nerve and to inspire! Country and duty; and that 'expect,' I delight in that. The very highest is but 'that which it was our duty to do.' What seed for heroic work in others!

"And yet, where are they, the heroes, now?

"Mr. Wilberforce is indeed a good soldier in a good fight. And I suppose the real heroes do have that easy, cheery look; not borne down by their labours, but bearing others up. And I suppose age after age has wailed the same death wail when its best were laid in the dust. In God's battles, I know, leaders cannot fail. But for England? Where can she look now?"

She did not know that among the mourners around the grave of Pitt was Arthur Wellesley, just returned from the Mahratta war, and his victories at Assay.

WORK OR PLAY?

“DO tell me,” said a child one day,
“Which God likes best—our work or play?”

“Which God likes best? How can we know?”

I answered. “Ask the flowers that grow,
In joy where'er their lot may fall,
Content to make earth sweet to all.
Ask of the happy birds that sing,
When busy building in the spring;
The little streams that fill the river,
Smiling, laughing, dancing ever.
Ask of the waves that sportive bear

Rich freighted ships from far and near.
Ask of the sun, whose smile is given
To every corner under Heaven.
And these I think will straightway tell
What service God approveth well.
A love like His, embracing all
Our fellow-creatures, great and small;
A joy that never waxeth dim,
And bringeth us anigh to Him;
A fervent soul, a deep content,
Whether on work or pleasure bent,
That so our life, a daily grace,
May make the world a happier place.”

stables, smithy, and barn. Behind the last lay the straw and poultry yards, and over against them, beyond the buildings on the opposite side, were the kitchen garden and the orchard. The outer court, where it was not intersected by the road to the house and offices, was covered by a thick carpet of short, fine turf, sheeted with silvery daisies, and here and there spotted with the pale or vivid gold of primroses, cowslips, and buttercups. Across the moat, bristling betimes with sprouting and budding flags, irises, myrtle-leaved forget-me-nots, and green of the meadow, floated—in a vague yet almost oppressively sweet combination—the perfume of violets, daffodils, and wall-flower, which bordered the flagged inner court.

The sound of the voices of servants came from the open windows of the house above. An under chorus of the babble of children, belonging to the labourers' cottages on the outskirts of the home-buildings, was heard, mingling with the lowing of cows and calves, the bleating of sheep and lambs, and the yelping of dogs; while the crowing of cocks, the cackling of hens, and the cawing of rooks from far and near, filled up the gamut of sound. Every tone was fitted in by Nature's fine adjustment, so that there was nothing harsh in the noise, neither was it so loud as to prevent a lark's song from piercing through and through, and rising as the lark rose, clear above all other sounds. The afternoon shadows were falling on fresh, cheerful life, Chevehurst was the seat of a country squire, homely, substantial, and slightly fortified, with an outer gateway, and a bridge across a moat, terminating in a postern, which formed the entrance, by a flight of stairs, to an upper and inner court. The low, two-storied timber and plaster quadrangle of the house met the bank of the moat, while the irregular square of the outer court owed its framework to the

and on a surrounding landscape of rich English meadows, sunny pastures, fields of wheat and barley, and belts of waving wood.

Both the old woman and the young would have attracted attention anywhere; but here the two figures fell into the picture with fine effect. The girl wore a green taffetas gown, with a partlet and sleeves embroidered with silver, and a silver netted cap on her head, and turned a pale, restless face to her companion, an old woman, with a white kercher on her head, and a white apron over her comfortable red woollen petticoat. Her aged cheeks were scarlet, streaked with former rosinness, and her figure retained traces of buxomness, even though she rocked herself slightly backwards and forwards on a stout blackthorn stick, and employed her apron to wipe the tears from her round, twinkling eyes.

"It will all come right, dear heart," said she, soothing her young companion; "see an' it don't. An old woman says it to you; and you'll settle yoursen and make t' old squire and t' young happy—ay, and make up for poor Mistress Elisabeth's misfortunes."

"No, dame," answered Joyce Barret, with the weariness of despair. "I've seen enough of marriage. It is not well to marry."

"Eh! hush now, Mistress Joyce," protested the old housekeeper in dismay. "Here is a proper speech for a proper young lady," she added, recovering herself. "An you be not trying to fool an old servant? Besides, it is an unrighteous speech, having to do with the old papistical superstitions, which the king's majesty, the squire, and all honest men have abjured. Didn't a hear with my own ears t' new vicar—him as the squire brought to bear on Mistress Selby—God send her peace, poor soul—dispute with t' old clerk of Chevehurst, and show from Holy Scriptures, beyond mistake, that to forbid to marry was condemned in the Bible, and denounced as a latter-day sin?"

"Spare me," cried out Joyce piteously. "I'm sick of controversies. They have left us neither right nor wrong, neither earth nor heaven. In our parish, Master Nye and reformed doctrines prevail; in the next parish, the people hold by the old religion and the Abbot of Mosely. The very priests do not agree whether the holy sacraments be two or seven. What the one side in our Christian country upholds, the other bans, and strives to overthrow; and the side which is uppermost to-day may be lowest to-morrow. Good lack! What are simple, unlettered folk, who cannot weigh the proofs, to think or do?"

"They can obey, and listen to their masters," suggested Dame Wade readily.

"And change like the wind with some of them," alleged Joyce scornfully. "Let who will study the signs of the times, and trim their sails accordingly, so will not I. I consider that to be the most godless conduct of all. As to marriage, Dame, you know that with the Catholics it is a sacrament, yet every man or woman who has the heart and the purse can buy a dispensation, and put away the lawful wife or husband, and be free to marry another, who is not called unlawful. And with the Protestants marriage is no more than a contract, into which they can enter with all except the nearest kindred, without so much as saying 'By your leave' to Church or Churchman. But to what end this freedom, when, as Catholics pretend, Protestants break their marriage contracts with as much ease as they form them, and do not even need to buy a dispensation, but find it ready made to their hands? I say again, it is not well to marry, for what can a poor woman do to save herself from the double danger?"

"Belike she can wait and trust to her master, Mistress Joyce," repeated the puzzled Dame; but it was to the master on earth that the simple woman, with whom loyalty was a second religion, pointed, and not to the Master of all in his heaven of heavens.

Joyce Barret spoke rebelliously, but she was groping her way darkly to the foundation. She was a reverent, honest-hearted woman. It was because she loved the place where God's honour dwelt, and would fain have loved and respected her fellows, that she had been nearly driven from all her moorings by what she had witnessed of the cruel inconsistencies of jarring creeds and motives. This England, which men called merry, had been sorely visited. It was not with the sweating sickness alone, nor merely with the common dearth produced by the rage for laying down land in pastures and rabbit warrens, that some might grow rich from the high price of wool and the general use of fur in dress, while the yeomen and peasant class fell into grievous decay, and troops of beggars, relieved by the proscribed religious houses, and unable to take up any other occupation, became thieves when young and strong, and, when old and infirm, wasted and died as they camped—an army of grisly skeletons—by the highways, the ditches, the kennels of streets in towns. A conflict had been waged which had shaken men's convictions to the centre, and had sometimes displaced the old growth of belief without planting and nourishing a new one.

The Reformation in England was not like the Reformation in Scotland; working gradually outward from the Church itself, and upward from the people, leaving the Stuart sovereigns stranded indeed, but doing more than it left undone. Certainly there were gallant, devoted Reformers in the English Church from the time of Wycliffe downwards. Tyndale, Ridley, Latimer, Gilpin, and many another such, wrote and spoke in prophetic indignation and fervour. But the king and his government stepped in hastily, and, completing the work prematurely, did much the same as the Czar Peter when he would create a great city. They succeeded in producing a reformed labyrinth—a part wilderness—where there were to be breaks of waste land and humble buildings, at all stages of rough progress, side by side with elaborate ecclesiastical edifices, untouched and uncondemned by the measurer's plummet-line, or else brought to perfection speedily by an excess of fervour. A chaos, not a cosmos, was the result in many instances, and the minds of the people were apt to be confused by this flood of change without a corresponding flood of knowledge.

In no respect did the English Reformation work more irregularly and with more discord than in its dealings with the marriage laws—the laws with which, in the famous case of King Henry and Queen Katherine it had been so soon, so closely, and so unfortunately, as men judge, associated.

Roman Catholic Scotland had presented the same marriage difficulties and abuses as Roman Catholic England, springing out of what had been esteemed the superior sanctity of celibacy, and likewise from the grasping and arbitrary appropriation by the Church of no less than eight degrees of kindred within which no man or woman might marry lawfully, unless he or she procured an express permission from Rome. To man or woman discontented with his or her choice of a mate it had always been open to feel a late vocation for the cloister, or to discover that he or she had married in ignorance within the forbidden degrees, so that the marriage, unless renewed by the grant and confirmation of the Pope, became null and void. Public opinion, the interest of children, the voice of humanity, might afford a safeguard against this burdensome, and at the same time perilously fickle obligation. But there were miserable men and women in those days, who had been chief friends, and who separated conscientiously, and walked apart for the rest of their forlorn lives; and this happened both under the Roman Catholic and the early Protestant régimes. Of the men and women who took the same liberty, there had been as plentiful examples in Roman Catholic Scotland as in England; but there was little abuse of the marriage laws in reformed Scotland. John Knox, with his brother clergy, sternly required the Earl and Countess of Argyle to do penance publicly at the date when their differences had gone no further than a temporary separation.

CHAPTER II.—THE PLUCKING OUT OF A RIGHT EYE.

AT Chevehurst, in the midst of rural peace and sweetness, and moderate prosperity, these tottering, crumbling marriage laws proved the hardly veiled skeleton—the consciousness of whose presence marred the joyousness of life's feast to the youngest and brightest of the guests. With their haunting dread and its agonizing realisation, never absent or suspended for a moment, they poisoned the very springs of existence.

Joyce Barret and her elder and half-sister Elisabeth were the orphan nieces of the squire of Chevehurst.

Hugh Barret, of Chevehurst, was an elderly man—a widower with one child, a son—the younger Hugh. The squire was a scheming, worldly man, who had made his own out of Church confiscations and charges of treason against his neighbours. His public morality, though it was not hypocritical, displayed the worst of the man. His private life showed the best of him. At home he was bluffly cordial and good-naturedly indulgent. He had been kind to the children committed to his care, and had been even warmly attached to the younger sister Joyce, who had come to him a baby to be dandled and fondled, still more fondly than his own motherless boy, Hugh, a year or two older. Elisabeth, eleven years Joyce's senior, had been married at the age of fifteen. Even then she was a grave and earnest young maid, like a pure, steadfast lily in her early fragrance. The marriage arranged by the squire was contracted with Master Selby, of Ditton, a young squire with a good inheritance of half-a-dozen farms, crowned by a mansion-house, within easy riding distance from Chevehurst.

Young Madam Selby did not at that time go and reside at Ditton, nor, as it happened, till a number of years had passed and many changes had occurred. The wedding had only taken place to make assurance doubly sure, for Master Selby was but two years older than his bride, and his education was not completed. After a week of nuptial rejoicings at Chevehurst, he started on his foreign travels, leaving his young wife to the care of her uncle. Elisabeth was not loth to remain behind, for she knew very little of her bridegroom, beyond what the four or five years old child Joyce could appreciate of his gay surcoat, the jewelled haft of his dagger, the boyish tricks of swaggering and vaunting, and the manner in which he wore his feather-fringed bonnet. She must learn to know him better through the brief formal letters of the day, and be ready to welcome him home with the duty and affection of a true wife. But Elisabeth never had to welcome Morris Selby home. On his travels he was struck down by one of those fatal fever epidemics which so often passed over Europe, reaping a goodly harvest of men and women. Joyce was a little older and more intelligent, a quick prattling girl of seven, when to her wonder and chagrin, and somewhat to her indignation, she saw Elisabeth divested of her bright-coloured suits, girdles, chains, and diamond buttons, and habited in the long morning sloop, tippet, and barbe muffling the lower part of the face, which indicated the loss of the widow of eighteen years.

Elisabeth took that loss more to heart than may be easily conceived in this generation. A meditative, tender-hearted girl, she pondered on what might have been, and, identifying herself with the dead whose name she bore, lamented with simple pathos the blighting of her hopes. She spent a large portion of her private income, in masses and alms, bestowed in the name of the dead, while religious study and practice became one of the principal occupations of her retired and still youthful life.

In the course of nature Elisabeth outgrew her tender, dreamy sorrow, but not till it had so chastened and refined her that she had won something like a reputation for saintliness in her neighbourhood, and was regarded with enthusiastic reverential affection by Joyce, to whom she had been half a mother. This unreasoning, exaggerated spirit of homage had been disturbed by a second marriage, arranged for Elisabeth by her uncle, but not so entirely by his authority and influence this time that the woman did not concur in the union. The second bridegroom was a second Master Selby, of Ditton, so that Elisabeth had not again to change her name; she had but to recur to her old visions, in order to picture herself presiding in state and bounty at Ditton.

Julian Selby was the younger, delicate brother of Morris, and had been originally destined for the Church; with regard to whom, it had been the will of Providence that he should survive and succeed to his hale and hearty elder brother. A judiciously framed appeal to his holiness the Pope had cancelled such obligations as Julian Selby had incurred, and altered his destination in life, eventually permitting him to marry, after his sovereign's fashion, his brother's widow, Elisabeth Selby. Elisabeth, the person who would have been most likely to have objected in the circumstances, was slow in rising to reason against the delusions of her Church—the Church of her first love. The squire of Chevehurst—who was the individual most mixed up with public affairs, and so most in the way of hearing the cautious whispers stealing abroad—did not choose to give ear or heed to a view which would overthrow long-cherished schemes of his own. Elisabeth should wed Julian Selby, and so finally accomplish the convenient alliance with Ditton, which had been balked before; and, if Julian died young, like his brother, which was not improbable, and Elisabeth, continuing childless, tarried in her second widowhood, her fortune would descend to the squire's favourite adopted daughter Joyce; who, by another dispensation from the Pope, should then marry her cousin Hugh, never forsake Chevehurst, but secure a kindly, cheery home for the provident squire's old age. So far he had his will, until even Joyce—a lively, affectionate girl of fourteen—learnt to laugh at her fanciful canonisation of Elisabeth, and declared that it was better she should go over to Ditton, and greet Elisabeth as her dear friend and equal; while she did not despise the brother's regard of her star-gazing, cythern-playing, herb and flower-loving, artist-born brother-in-law. He was dubbed half crazed, and was laughed at behind his back, by such stout, practical men as the old squire of Chevehurst; but there was so much craziness of a similar character scattered about in the world just then, that Julian Selby's oddness was tolerated and forgiven—generally attributed as it was to his bodily weakness, even by those who understood it least, for the sake of the young man's frankness and liberality.

Young Hugh, of Chevehurst, seemed also obligingly ready to gratify his father's wishes. He had been the companion and ally of his contemporary cousin Joyce since the boy had held mimic jousts for the girl's amusement, or the two had been taken as a special treat on their ponies, hunting and hawking with the squire. As they grew up they were thrown on each other for sympathy, in their secluded life; and those early relations had inevitably merged into those of lovers. This was particularly the case with the lad. Joyce was coy and sensitive in temper, and, with all her fine qualities, was difficult to deal with.

Gradually, "the king's business" became openly spoken of, the sharp echoes of the contention rang even into the corners of country places. Other women besides poor brave Katherine of Arragon shuddered and grew pale for the consequences. At the same time a new element in the Church was fermenting—the lump was being leavened with its first leavening. Heretical arguments, so long abhorred and visited with deadly penalties, were proved to have been only laid to sleep, not stifled or destroyed by such hideous forces as those of Smithfield. At a sign, a word, these dragons' teeth sprang up armed men on every side, openly acknowledged and received as the deliverances of reverent councils. "Mysteries" played on every village green, turned the unapproachable mummeries and abuses of centuries into open ridicule. The English translations of the Bible, at which men had been working in secret from the time of St. Cuthbert, and for which they had been hunted and slain at home and abroad, were authoritatively owned and privileged. Verily the good news which had been spoken in the ear was proclaimed upon the house-top. A fresh and more perfect translation of the Bible, to which one of the king's earned young daughters, Princess Mary, had contributed her far from mean Greek scholarship, was in preparation. For the present, English Bibles, by the king's orders, were to lie open in every church within the realm, only they were to be fastened by a chain to the reading-desk, because of their preciousness.

Think what was the state of England then, what the keen excitement experienced, the bewitching transition effected, when the Bible was offered as a new book, at the same time that it was held to be a divine revelation, to all except the handful of learned men who had read it in the original or in the Vulgate. The mass of men thought of it unquestioningly as their title-deed and chart to salvation, and here was it for the first time put into their hands and exposed, without reservation, to their close scrutiny and independent judgment.

All that such a right royal, noble, and faithful action (however much or little it might originate in state craft and human passion) could do was done in undermining for ever the monstrous tissue of casuistry, concealment, and false assumption. But men do not digest great truths in the hour in which they are presented to them; and the bonds of ignorance and superstition, like the bonds of love, are hard to loose. Still, enough of light had flashed in on people's eyes to make men and women in a very considerable number throughout the country renounce much of the old faith, embracing instead much of the new. Among those more than half Protestants were the Barrets and Selbys without an exception, unless it were the old squire, who was not behind in adopting Protestantism, but had adopted it from his earthly point of interest and to serve his own purposes. At the same time weighing the spiritual state of the man as nearly as one dares, the squire would have more fitly remained a Catholic; for with all honour to Catholics without guile who look for the coming of the Lord along with all true Israelites, it does seem that a thorough sadducee such as the squire was, belonged by right to a Church which claims most loudly an expedient confession and profession—sincere or insincere—and makes every allowance for worldliness in an indifferent arguer but a polite giver.

With the squire's Protestantism came a strange temptation. It chanced about the same epoch, by two unexpected deaths occurring in rapid succession, that Elisabeth Selby inherited an estate of many profitable acres in Wiltshire. A pity it was, it struck the squire then, that she had thrown herself away—he did not say to himself at his express instigation and with his entire consent—on two such mean squires, by comparison, as the Selbys of Ditton. Had she been single, or even widowed still, she might have contracted a much higher and more powerful alliance, and her original portion, enriched by this new estate of Rokeham, would have descended, and without fail, to Joyce and Hugh. Why, the last marriage contract was not a very sure one, if the king and his advisers had the rights on 't. He—the squire—might well know that, since he had taken enough trouble to keep such idle, troublesome considerations out of sight at the time, especially in putting them past Elisabeth. He might have been better employed, as it now seemed, but he should take no such pains in future. Nay, other people had consciences as well as the king, and he might begin to question whether, as the Protestant religion bade fair to be established throughout the kingdom, he did right to let his niece Elisabeth continue in the dark as to the doubtful legality of her marriage. Poor soul, it might break her heart and shame her into the dust to be enlightened and loosed from vows which had never been binding; still the truth was the truth, and ought to be told before more harm was wrought. The squire would consult the new vicar, who was a stringent reformer, and very zealous in the promotion of his opinions. Master Nye would rather enjoy an opportunity of showing how clean his fresh broom would sweep. If necessary, the squire would set Master Nye to open Elisabeth's eyes, to remonstrate with and exhort her, comforting himself that no reflection could rest on him.

Thus it came to pass that Master Nye went boldly to Ditton, where a happy and united household had dwelt in honour, peace, and love for half a dozen years, and launched a thunderbolt into the midst of the serenity and sunshine, by speaking brief words, to the couple who in their very childishness were all in all to each other—"it is not lawful for thee to have thy brother's widow for thy wife; it is not lawful for thee to have thy dead husband's brother for thy husband."

Julian Selby, peaceful and delicate student though he was, resisted the mandate furiously. Elisabeth, serious, earnest woman as she had always been, over whom the shadow of the coming woe had fallen, suffered the sentence to fall and rest on her heart like lead, and to pierce her like an arrow. She writhed for a time under the burden and the torture, and then sought respite, womanlike, in submission. She consented to go forth from the house of him who was decreed not her husband, in order to return to her maiden home with her uncle.

The master of Ditton, sick and sore in heart, had gone to London to take counsel there; and the result had been that he was compelled to send Elisabeth word that he could not get redress, or find a Protestant prelate who, in the face of the judgment which had divorced Queen Katherine, and proclaimed Queen Anne, to cancel or contradict Master Nye's declaration.

After this sorrowful avowal Master Selby could no longer oppose his sister-in-law's departure, should she desire it. Therefore it was arranged, to save a painful scene to both, that Mistress Selby should quit Ditton while its master was yet absent, and repair to Chevehurst. It was for this sorrowful arrival that Joyce Barret and Dame Wade watched. The old squire was intentionally from home that afternoon; but his son had ridden over to give a kinsman's countenance and support to that of the serving-maid and the yeoman who formed Elisabeth's escort.

"There they be," cried Dame Wade at last, as Joyce stood stiffened into stony silence by the spectacle; and then the old woman hurriedly recollected that she had stores to give out and furnishings to arrange; and so left Joyce alone to endure the meeting.

"I shall remember it though I live a hundred years," protested the girl, clenching her hands tight. "I'd liefer have been disgraced myself and led out to one of the blocks, which seem to stand handy as anvils on wheels, nowadays. I should go hide myself in the blackest dungeon, and refuse to show face again, but it would do no good; I should but fail her, my sister, my half mother. How fair and tender I remember her, and how happy they were at Ditton, in spite of Julian Selby's sickliness! Who will minister to his wants and wait on his every look now? He hath lost the fondest, most faithful companion, the best wife man ever owned!"

Joyce's exclamation was provoked by seeing Elisabeth close at hand, riding up to the gateway clad in deep mourning—the very stop, tippet, and barbe, as she fancied, which she could dimly remember she put on her sister when Elisabeth's girlish bloom was just a little nipped in the bud for the first Master Selby, to whom she had had the evil fortune to be allied. Did Elisabeth remember him, and that far away parting, when, wan as a ghost, and with all beauty, save the beauty of a noble and meek heart, dragged and crushed out of her haggard face, she rode within the gateway?

Joyce could not stop to ask. She had settled with herself, after the first startled surprise, that it was only too fitting that Elisabeth should come back to them in mourning. If she could have come in sack-cloth and ashes, it would have been still more appropriate to her who was again a widow, quite as much as if she wore her second weeds for Julian Selby.

The last time that Joyce had seen her sister, Elisabeth had worn her wife's bright-coloured rich silken gowns, the glittering wifely girdle with its keys, and a snowy lace curch, though she had worn them with a heavy heart. But whatever trappings she had laid aside, whatever grievance she had accepted, she was the same Elisabeth, only a thousand times dearer to Joyce, who was burning to fight her sister's battles with the world and the Church, terribly tempted to arraign Providence on her behalf, and resolute to abide by her and suffer with her.

So it happened that Joyce vouchsafed no token to her cousin Hugh, but tartly ignored his presence, while he, in soberest suit of russet, was looking wistfully for some kindlier sign as a reward for his execution of a distressful errand.

Now, it is well when girls like Joyce Barret can keep their minds in such a well-balanced state that, even in the midst of suffering of kindred and friends, they are exempt from prejudice, passion, and injustice. But it is beautiful also to see a sisterly devotion so strong that it can rise above the demand of ties and loves that are generally declared to be more absorbing to woman's heart. And even in the rough, old days of King Hal, a girl like Joyce Barret could be so moved by her sister's wrongs that she could cease to have eyes or heart for her lover, blameless though he might be. Perhaps better so, even to the doing him some slight despite, than that she should be so engrossed with his attractions as to be unable to think of her sister's broken heart and clouded estate. Yes, and to the credit of woman's nature, the fact was not unnatural. Joyce at that moment loved her faded, fainting sister to the jealous exclusion from her notice of her hearty young lover, with his life stretching far in fair promise before him.

"Dear heart, it is kind of you to be meeting me," said Elisabeth, trying to steady her voice and to reciprocate the love which was brimming over from Joyce's eyes.

"I should have come farther, thou knowest, Elisabeth, if I had been let know the time of starting," said Joyce in a low tone.

"It is best as it is," answered Elisabeth briefly. "Well, the old place looks as usual," she added languidly, glancing round as if she had half-expected some great change, and as if she were striving to speak indifferently. "The weather is fine for the season, and your grass is green and forward. I have heard from my cousin Hugh how my uncle fares, and since you are also well, I have only to inquire after Dame Wade and her calves, lambs, and chickens. Oh! Joyce, Joyce, what have I to do with such simple, happy things?" she suddenly broke off, bursting into a stifled cry of anguish, while she clung to her sister's arm as they crossed the bridge and entered the quadrangle.

The strain had been too much for her, or some quick, keen remembrance had suddenly confronted her. She had recalled in a flash how, on her last visit to Chevehurst, her husband had lifted her from the saddle and bade her note the small changes, and compare the look of autumn at Chevehurst with its look at their own home at Ditton.

Her mind had strayed in a second back to some episode of her one true wooing, while still half girl; the spring wallflowers, daffodils, and violets had smelt as now, when she had stolen lightly to the postern to welcome Julian Selby, and they had lingered without on the bushy bank of the moat till she had chid him for tarrying in the humid air, and refused to stay and listen longer to the songs of the birds, and he had gone in gaily with his hands full of daisies, as if he had been a little child, and not a curiously accomplished gentleman.

ILLUSTRATION OF THE BIBLE FROM ANCIENT INSCRIPTIONS.

By H. B. TRISTRAM, F.R.S.

IT has sometimes been remarked, in a tone of faintly disguised disparagement, that all the sciences, save that of theology, are progressive; that it alone is stationary and left behind in the advance of human knowledge, that it has no new facts to discover, no new relations to establish, nor any old ones to place on a new basis. The students of matter, in like manner, have not spared the sister science of metaphysics her full share of depreciation on similar grounds.

So far as theology is interpreted to comprise only the study of the dogmas laid down and accepted as of divine origin, the charge is in some sense true. But it is only true of those dogmas, in the same sense that the definitions, axioms, and postulates are immutable and fixed bases in mathematics; and that the great "laws," such as of gravitation, are fixed and accepted as immutable by every student of physical science. But just as the problems which the mathematician has to solve from his axioms and definitions are inexhaustible; just as the application of the great laws of nature are infinite, so the student of theology is no dull plodder on some familiar well-trodden path—he has no wearisome and unreasonable formula to recite again and again, beyond which his thoughts must not venture to stray; he is prepared to work out any problem of humanity from the dogmas or definitions which he accepts. He accepts them as divine and immutable, because he is convinced that their origin is divine, and that as such they must be in their nature immutable spiritual laws. But the theologian must be prepared to defend the claim of the divine law from attacks on each side. He must be prepared to prove them antecedently reasonable and probable; and not less to submit their claims of authority to the keenest and most minute scrutiny. And this scrutiny is now on one side, now on another.

The assaults on Revelation have varied in every age—each part of the line of defence has been attacked in turn, and frequently an oft-foiled assault has been repeated with new arms and under new conditions. Hence of all branches of theology the study of the evidences has been the most progressive. From the days of the Neoplatonists and Celsus, to those of the modern materialist and the positivist, the front of the defence has continually varied with that of the attack. We might almost say that to meet the assaults of to-day with the weapons of the last century were as futile as to furbish up the antiquated blunderbuss against the newest rifle.

And need there is none for confining ourselves to old weapons, where the system of warfare has changed. Each department of modern science and investigation has, we fearlessly assert, supplied means more liberally to the defenders than the assailants; and it cannot with truth be maintained, as in the struggle between marine artillery and armour-proof, that the attack always soon overtakes the defence.

Especially is this true of the line of historical evidence, the very line on which a superficial observer might have supposed that least advance could have been made. But historical analysis, historical criticism, and historical research have become almost new sciences since Gibbon relegated the annalists of the last century to oblivion. It is difficult so far to abstract ourselves from the historical knowledge which has been exhomed within the last fifty years, as to recognise the immense advance made in the historical illustration of the Old Testament narrative. We may briefly summarise a few of the corroborations of the Jewish records which have been brought to light within the lifetime of the present generation.

Let us remember that fifty years since there was scarcely a single contemporary illustration of any event recorded in the Old Testament, excepting one disputed Egyptian inscription. Such has been the progress of archaeological discovery that now there is scarcely an instance in which the Jewish history impinges on that of the neighbouring nations, which is not in some degree illustrated by contemporary inscriptions, or by the newly-discovered records of Egypt, Assyria, Chaldæa, and Persia. These corroborative records extend from the very earliest political event after the birth of Abraham, recorded in Genesis, down to the end of the latest of the historical books.

Nor is it merely or chiefly in the way of direct confirmation of facts recorded that historical evidence has advanced, but principally in the incidental illustrations of expressions, customs, rites, public life, and domestic manners, which our increased knowledge of the inner and outer life of the great nations of the Nile and the Euphrates affords us. In tracing the minute details of Egyptian life, the light of the antiquary's torch increases, as the darkness of the ruins among which he gropes becomes more intense; while with no uncertain voice the monuments of Assyria witness for the truth of the Bible since her history has been disinterred from her palaces, and her theology and poetry been restored from the mutilated walls of her temples.

Since the labours of the Rawlinsons, Layard, and their followers, we hear no longer of the "unhistoric character" of the records of the kings of Israel and Judah. We must not speculate how much further back the charge of "unhistoric character" may have to be relegated, when Mr. Smith shall have completed his excavations, and his cylinders shall have been deciphered.

To such an extent already have contemporary records been recovered, that instead of possessing merely two or three incidental allusions in Herodotus, we are now able to identify, either certainly or with great probability, with some known character in profane history, every monarch or great prince, with two exceptions, whether Assyrian, Chaldæan, or Persian, whose name occurs in the Bible from the time of Solomon downwards.

To commence with Daniel. The historical character of that book has been severely questioned, and on no ground more strongly than because the last king of Babylon has a false name given him by Daniel, and that "Belshazzar" nowhere occurs in profane historians. Three ancient historians—Berosus, Herodotus, and Ptolemy—who all lived centuries after the event, give Nabonadius, also called Labynetus, as the last native king of Babylon. Berosus tells us that Nabonadius, after the capture of Babylon, was taken prisoner in Borsippa, a town which he was defending against the Persians, and that he was not put to death. The differences seemed irreconcilable, until nineteen years ago, when several clay cylinders were discovered among the ruins on the Euphrates, and both Sir H. Rawlinson and Oppert deciphered on different cylinders the name of Bel-shar-ezer, the son of Nabonadius, and associated with him in the government. Bel-shar-ezer was governing as deputy in Babylon, and was slain, while his father outside escaped. Here the whole difficulty is suddenly solved in the simplest manner.

But Nabonadius was not of the royal stock of Nebuchadnezzar. How then could Belshazzar claim to be son of the great king of Babylon? This is easily explained by the eastern custom, which we may be sure the usurper Nabonadius would follow, of marrying into the blood royal, and so giving his children a double claim to his succession—a custom often followed since, as by the English Normans, and the Lancastrians. Belshazzar is spoken of as the son of Nebuchadnezzar by the Hebrew idiom, which has no word for grandfather and grandson, but speaks of all in the direct line as father and sons. Jacob speaks of Abraham as his father, Levi is called the father of Aaron, Saul is the father of Mephibosheth, David is the father of Asa and of Josiah. In fact the examples of the idiom are not soon to be reckoned up.

A curious incidental illustration of the fact first revealed by the cylinders, is the promise made by Belshazzar, that whoever interpreted the handwriting on the wall should be made the third in the kingdom. Why should he not have said second, as is proposed in other similar cases, as by Pharaoh, Ahasuerus, and Nebuchadnezzar? Simply because he was only second himself, reigning as the colleague and deputy of his father.

One other probable illustration, out of the many recently exhumed, bearing on the history of Daniel, may be adduced. No one but the prophet has related the seven years' insanity of Nebuchadnezzar. There is nothing to surprise us in this fact, when we bear in mind the fragmentary character of our Assyrian history, and also that during such a period there was not likely to be any great foreign enterprise undertaken which would mark the epoch in contemporary annals. Under an absolute monarchy, it would probably be a period of political paralysis. But Sir H. Rawlinson has deciphered a partially mutilated inscription, which can scarcely be explained, unless as referring to this portion of the king's life. It is translated thus :—

"Four years the seat of my kingdom in the city in which did not rejoice my heart. In all my dominions I did not build a high place of power, the precious treasures of my kingdom I did not lay up. In Babylon, buildings for myself, and for the honour of my kingdom, I did not lay out. In the worship of Merodach, the joy of my heart, in Babylon the city of his sovereignty and the seat of my empire, I did not sing his praises, and I did not furnish his altars, nor did I clear out the canals."

More of a similar character follows. Professor Rawlinson observes on this, that the whole range of cuneiform literature presents no similar instance of a king putting on record his own inaction. The inscription and the inspired record would certainly seem here to illustrate each other, and to explain what is otherwise unintelligible.

There is less to be found in recently discovered inscriptions which casts new light on the history of the Jews under the Persian rule, as related in Ezra, Nehemiah, and Esther, since their historical statements present little to which sceptical criticism could take exception. Of the first six kings of Persia, five are mentioned by Ezra, the fifth in order, Xerxes, who from internal evidence would seem to be the Ahasuerus of Esther, being omitted, from the simple fact that none of the events there recorded occurred in his reign. The Hebrew for Ahasuerus is the exact equivalent of the Persian name which the Greeks rendered by Xerxes. The second and the third in the list of Herodotus and other writers, Cambyses and Smerdis, answer to the Ahasuerus and Artaxerxes of Ezra. Even in Greek authors these Persian kings have different names.

We know that Cyrus was an earnest Zoroastrian, and as such would have great sympathy with the Jews and their pure worship, being himself a monotheist and an enemy of idolatry. His decree for the rebuilding of the temple, his surrender of the sacred vessels, and his grant of money from the treasury to defray the costs, are thus in accordance with his character. The third king, Artaxerxes, the usurper Smerdis, interrupts the building of the temple, he being a Magian, and as such the bitter opponent of the creed of Zoroaster. Under Darius, however, the work is speedily resumed, and he confirms the decree of Cyrus. Darius, we know from history, to have been a jealous disciple of the old Persian faith of Zoroaster, which at once explains his action. But we find an interesting corroboration of the record of Ezra in an inscription of his, in which he informs us, that he began his reign by "rebuilding the temples which the Magian (Smerdis or Artaxerxes) had destroyed, and restoring the religious chants, and the worship which he had abolished." "As it was before, so I arranged it." The frequent mention of the "Lord of heaven," the one Supreme Being, and the strongly religious character which pervades the decrees of all these Persian monarchs, excepting the Magian Smerdis, is abundantly illustrated by the Persian cuneiform inscriptions. The one supreme God, "Ormazd," is repeatedly mentioned in them, and to his providence is ascribed all the power of the king, and every success which he has achieved. The inscription usually begins with an ascription of praise to "the great God who gave both earth and heaven to mankind."*

When, following up the stream of Jewish history, we go back to the period of the kings of Israel and Judah, the cuneiform records of the East are rich indeed in corroborations and illustrations. They crowd upon us, and afford us confirmatory proof of almost every event in the history upon the testimony of contemporary and competent witnesses. In the sacred writings of this period, we find mention of six kings of

* The ancient religion of Persia, as reformed by Zoroaster, was the purest of all the faiths of the old world, or perhaps we should rather say, the least corrupted from the simplicity of patriarchal tradition. Zoroaster held that there was one supreme independent Being, and under him two principles or angels, one of light, the other of darkness, between whom there will be to the end of the world a perpetual struggle, when the angel of light and his followers shall go into a world of everlasting light and happiness, while the angel of darkness and his disciples shall be punished in a world of everlasting darkness. The Supreme Being gave the holy fire from heaven as the true Shechinah, and his followers worshipped forwards this and the rising sun. The sacred fire was never extinguished, and never blown upon by the breath; it was fed only with clean wood, and fanned only by pouring on oil and by blasts from the open air. Zoroaster introduced tithes, and regulated the order and support of the priesthood very much after the system of the Mosaic law. It has been conjectured that there were two Zoroasters, one the pre-historic founder, whose simplicity of doctrine and worship had in course of ages been much corrupted by the Magi; the other, the great reformer and purifier, not very long before the time of Cyrus.

Assyria,—Pul, Tiglath-Pileser, Shalmaneser, Sargon, Sennacherib, and Esarhaddon; of four Egyptian kings,—Shishak, So, Pharaoh Necho, and Pharaoh Hophra; and of three Babylonians,—Merodach-Baladan, Nebuchadnezzar, and Evil Merodach.

Of the last Babylonian kings, we have not yet found cylinders or contemporary inscriptions. They are, however, the less necessary, as the scriptural records of their time are not open to cavil, and are abundantly illustrated and corroborated by profane writers. But of the earlier king Merodach-Baladan, from whom Hezekiah received letters and a present, and to whose ambassadors he ostentatiously exhibited his treasure, the name could scarcely be identified under the form in which it had been handed down. Here the inscriptions again come to our aid. We find Sargon recording his victories over Marduk-val-iddan, King of Babylon. This king had two reigns, both recorded in the inscriptions, before and after the transitory successes of Assyria. The chronology exactly agrees with that of Scripture, and we can easily perceive the politic scheme of Baladan, who overpowered, and still threatened, by the rising power of Assyria, was anxious to secure alliances westward with Judah and Egypt, to prevent the absorption of all western Asia. Finally, however, he was, as we learn from the inscriptions, conquered and deposed by Sargon, and Babylonia reduced to a province.

Of the Assyrian kings, to commence from the latest mentioned, Manasseh is stated to have been taken captive to Babylon by the king of Assyria. This must have been Esarhaddon, son of Sennacherib. But it would be perplexing why or how a king of Assyria should have a state prisoner brought to Babylon, did we not discover again from the inscribed bricks of the Euphrates Valley, that Esarhaddon alone of the Assyrian kings resided there in person, and did not govern the great city by a deputy. The bricks tell us that he repaired temples and built himself a palace there. In another inscription Esarhaddon actually names Manasseh, king of Judah, among the subject princes who provided him with workmen for the building and decorating of his palaces.

Of none of the Assyrian monarchs have we such full accounts in Scripture as of Sennacherib, the father and predecessor of Esarhaddon, and of no one of them has the story as yet been so fully told as in his own records of stone, the famous discoveries of Layard at Nineveh. We had, indeed, in Herodotus, the story he received from the Egyptian priests, of the miraculous destruction of his army at night through myriads of mice gnawing their bowstrings, an evident distortion of the Scripture narrative. But now we have his campaigns even more fully told by himself than by Isaiah. These tablets in the British Museum are perhaps the most familiar contemporary illustrations of Holy Writ, and yet, we must remember, they are the discoveries of yesterday. The two invasions of Sennacherib are spoken of. In neither of them was Judah, but Egypt, the chief object of attack; but Hezekiah, by his friendship with the Pharaohs, drew down on himself the vengeance of the Assyrian. Sennacherib thus records his first campaign :

“And because Hezekiah, king of Judah, would not submit to my yoke, I came up against him, and by force of arms, and by the might of my power, I took forty-six of his strong fenced cities, and of the smaller towns which were scattered about, I took and plundered a countless number. And from these places I captured and carried off as spoil two hundred thousand one hundred and fifty people, old and young, male and female, together with horses and mares, asses and camels, oxen and sheep, a countless multitude. And Hezekiah himself I shut up in Jerusalem, his capital city, like a bird in a cage, building towers round the city to hem him in, and raising banks of earth against the gates, so as to prevent escape. . . . Thus, upon this Hezekiah there fell the fear of the power of my arms, and he sent out to me the chiefs and the elders of Jerusalem, with thirty talents of gold, and eight hundred talents of silver, and divers treasures, a rich and immense booty. . . . All these things were brought to me at Nineveh, the seat of my government, Hezekiah having sent them by way of tribute, and as a token of his submission to my power.”

We have here a simple amplification of 2 Kings xviii. 13—16.

There is but one slight discrepancy—eight hundred talents of silver instead of three hundred. The conqueror may have exaggerated, or he may have counted in all the precious metal given, the vessels and ornaments, as well as the money, while the sacred writer speaks only of the tribute-money. But while thus full on the subject of his first expedition, the Assyrian annals say nothing of his second. This, as it resulted in failure, is ignored; for these engraved tablets never are known to record the nation's humiliations; nor can we conceive it probable that they should. In like manner no Assyrian inscription records the death of a king. The hiatus is, however, easily supplied by the Egyptian records, which have preserved it, and its truth is thus corroborated by the very silence of Nineveh on the period.

Of Sargon, the father of Sennacherib, all that Scripture has to say directly is comprised in a single verse of Isaiah (xx. 1), "In the year that Tartan came unto Ashdod (when Sargon, king of Assyria, sent him) and fought against Ashdod and took it." No other writers had mentioned Sargon, and critics had variously identified him with Shalmaneser, Sennacherib, and Esarhaddon. But now come in the Assyrian inscriptions, and while for two thousand five hundred years the record of Isaiah had stood alone and unsupported, we find at last that Sargon was a real and distinct king of Assyria, the successor of Shalmaneser and the father of Sennacherib. We find that he is not only the captor of Ashdod, but that he is the unnamed king of Assyria of 2 Kings xvii., xviii., who took Samaria and carried Israel into captivity, replacing them by the men of Cuthah, Ava, Hamath, and Sepharvaim, while he planted Israel in Halah, Habor, and the cities of the Medes. He tells us in his inscriptions that he annexed the towns of Media to Assyria, and that he established fortified posts there in new situations. He also records his capture of Ashdod, and adds that he re-peopled it with captives from the extreme east, while elsewhere he mentions Media as the extreme east of his dominions. It was he too who overthrew Merodach-Baladan, and re-conquered Babylon after its seventy years of independence. He too was the first Assyrian general who defeated Egypt, and shook its supremacy over its neighbours, and his victories were only the precursors of the final conquest of that most ancient of states by the lords of the valley of the Euphrates. This, however, is scarcely referred to in Scripture. He was the builder of the Khorsabad palace, the mine where so many Biblical illustrations have been dug. He restored the palace of Sardanapalus at Calah, and repaired the fortifications of Nineveh.

From Sargon we ascend to his predecessor Shalmaneser, whose sceptre the usurper seized, and whose monuments he seems to have diligently effaced. Enough, however, is left to illustrate the Bible story, which mentions him as having twice invaded Israel, and having besieged Samaria for two years. We find Hoshea, king of Israel, named on one of his inscriptions, and Sargon claims that he took Samaria in his first year. It may have been taken by Shalmaneser, when Sargon had already seized his sceptre at Nineveh, and it is to be noticed that the book of Kings does not give the name of the king who actually took the capital.

Of Tiglath-Pileser, the predecessor of Shalmaneser, we have the fullest accounts from his own cylinders. The great cylinder inscription of Tiglath-Pileser is one of the most complete which have been exhumed, and covers a far more extensive field both of history and geography than is touched upon in the Jewish annals. These mention his two invasions of Israel; the first when he took Gilead, Galilee, Naphtali, and all the northern towns, and carried them captive; in the second, when he came as the ally of Ahaz, crushed Pekah, king of Israel, took Damascus, and slew Rezin, its king. His own cylinders illustrate every detail. He relates how in his sixth year he defeated the vast army of Azariah, king of Judah. After his twelfth year he tells us he made a campaign against Pekah, king of Samaria, and Rezin of Damascus, whom he besieged for two years, and at length, when he had taken him, put him to death, while he only took from Pekah a large portion of his dominions and carried a vast number of his people into captivity. He also mentions that at Damascus he received submission and tribute from the neighbouring sovereigns, mentioning among them Pekah, king of Israel, and Ahaz, king of Judah. Turn to 2 Kings xvi. 10, and we thus read that Ahaz, king of Judah, went to Damascus to meet Tiglath-Pileser, king of Assyria!

Menahem and Hoshea, the kings of Israel, are both mentioned in the records of Tiglath-Pileser.

One more Assyrian king of the second monarchy yet remains, who is named in Kings, Pul, king of Assyria, who extorted a tribute of a thousand talents from Menahem (2 Kings xv. 19), and might seem to have been the immediate predecessor of Tiglath-Pileser. He alone of the whole series has no place on tablet or cylinder that has yet been read. But he is mentioned by Berosus as a Chaldaean king, and seems to have been a pretender in the western and southern provinces, or perhaps a legitimate Babylonian king, who, in the weakness of the northern empire, seized upon its western dependencies.

Such are a few of the illustrations which the last ten or twenty years have added from the Euphrates alone, to a small portion of Scripture history. Not less rich shall we find the illustrations of even earlier epochs, from the newly-read records of Egypt and the scattered monuments of Syria and Arabia.

THE EDITOR'S ROOM.

I.—HOME NOTES.

OUT OF TOWN.

WHILE the world was going at a sober jog-trot pace, it was only school children that had their regular holidays; now that we are accustomed, even in our ordinary avocations, to railway speed, we must all have something of a vacation, and, if possible, a vacation ramble. It is an interesting and even a happy thought that the antidote often springs from the same source as the bane; it is in accordance with this provision, that the same agent that has made modern life so hurried, furnishes likewise so many new facilities for obtaining quiet and leisure. Steam, the great revolutionist of the nineteenth century, which has turned the life of so many into a perpetual whirl, as if relenting at the sight of its own hurry-scurry, has made it the easiest thing possible to get to the seaside, the lakes, the highlands, the islands, or wherever nature is calm, and quiet, and soothing. In numbers perpetually increasing, the well-to-do classes are off from the bustle of the town to the quiet of the country, returning, it is to be hoped, with a new bloom on their cheeks, and a new vigour in nerve and brain and muscle. The hospitable and kind-hearted like to have their friends and their children's friends about them in this happy season of leisure; it is a time for the growth of friendship, and the easy play of all kindly feelings. A happy institution! a real boon from Him that knows our frame, and remembers that we are dust; coming down from above, like every good and perfect gift, and worthy surely of not less profound acknowledgment than that of the heathen poet—Deus nobis hac otia fecit.

Yet, if care be not taken, the holiday puts all classes more or less out of gear; breaks in on regular family arrangements; disturbs the discipline of self-control; encourages something of a spirit of abandon; and undoes not a little of the effect of the regularity, the self-denial, the energy acquired in the season of work. In our religious life, this risk is especially strong. People are severed to a large extent from their ordinary Christian associations; those engaged in Christian work are removed from their Bible class or their district meeting; a considerable part of the Lord's day is left without definite employment; and in the case of those who travel abroad, there is a temptation to accommodate the observance of the day to the laxer standard of foreign countries. In proportion, too, as persons are useful in their ordinary place of residence, their temporary absence occasions a blank, and there must be more or less of languor in the operations in which usually they take a hearty share. In every point of view, therefore, holiday time needs to be guarded, lest the gain in one direction be more than balanced by the loss in another. We are glad to observe that in several quarters efforts are being made to rouse the attention of the members of Christian churches to such things, and lead them to put in operation the principle, "forearmed, forewarned." Instead of being a time of mere spiritual dispersion and ease, the holiday season affords many interesting opportunities of receiving and doing good; it may bring to the quieter and remoter districts the greater vigour and intensity of the towns; it may spread interest and sympathy and prayer; and it may lead to the commencement of blessed enterprises which will bear a great harvest of fruit. It is pre-eminently a time of blessing to those "who sow beside all waters," and whatever they may be weary in, are never weary in well-doing.

WORK NOT OFTEN HEARD OF.

A lady whose name stands high as a Christian worker and, as our readers know well, a cheerer of Christian work by her exquisite Christian song, Miss Frances Ridley Havergal, has, we observe, been giving expression to her great regret that while every journalist is eager to pounce on every black spot in the Church of England, there are so few caring to make known any good work going on in her borders. Let any clergyman go to an extreme in ritualism or rationalism, the circumstance, she says, is blazed abroad from one end of the island to the other, as if it were a fair sample of the ordinary state of things; whereas, even in large towns, any useful spiritual work, however important, is hardly noticed, and in country parishes it is utterly ignored. Yet, as Miss Havergal shows, by some interesting instances, there is a great amount of such work going on, even in places little dreamt of. For our own part, we have had occasion to make a similar observation very often, and especially in preparing the notes which we are accustomed to furnish from month to month in this department of our Magazine. It is a mistake to suppose that the phenomenon is limited to the Church of England. If we were inclined, we might very easily fill column upon column with the records of controversy, and with highly-coloured exposures, from the religious journals, of error and wrong. The material for such writing is very abundant, though for our part we are disposed to look at it shyly, believing that even as news it often has a hurtful effect. Undoubtedly, however, the public, or a large section of it, likes such provender. Man, we fear, retains for a long time a spice of the savage, and likes to hear of a fight. Nothing is more certain to draw a crowd—in the street, in the battlefield, in the senate, in the Church. Next to a fight, his curiosity is stirred by anything strange, sensational, monstrous. An ecclesiastical "Police News" would prove somewhat popular, we fear, in several circles. The taste, however, is obviously a low one, deserving to be discouraged by Christian journalists. It were a good sign if a more extensive appetite were shown for such narratives as Miss Havergal has brought forward.

She tells, for example, of a mission recently held in Bristol, at which fourteen parishes united. The churches and schoolrooms in each were open every night, not for routine services, but for heart-to-heart Gospel work—prayer, addresses, and after-meetings, while many additional addresses and prayer-meetings took place at other hours, the attendance being numerous, the people deeply impressed, and the Divine blessing largely poured out. "The very countenances bespoke the deep feelings within, and the large numbers staying for personal and private conversation during the after-meetings, told of the burning thirst for blessing." A similar meeting had been held at Birmingham a few months before. It was signalled by a celebration of the Lord's Supper, attended by some five hundred persons engaged in Christian work, who renewed their consecration to their Master with an earnestness that told mightily afterwards, especially on the work of the following week. Services of a similar nature are often held under the auspices of earnest Christians, though the ordinary newspapers contain no notice of them. Gatherings, too, like that of the Mildmay Conference, recently held, are now very common, at which hundreds are present; they are designed to impart information regarding the work going on in different places, and to stimulate all workers and all Christians to greater earnestness and heartiness. We observe that preparations are being made for a very extensive and earnest mission, similar to those in Bristol and Birmingham, to be held in the metropolis during the ensuing winter. Considerable difficulties are apprehended by some in the carrying out of this mission, in consequence of the great difference of views in Church matters characterising those who may be expected to take part in the services. There can be no doubt that services conducted without any break after the ordinary routine method are liable to become somewhat languid and tame; and that they may with great advantage be interspersed with special efforts, in which the most fervent Christians set themselves to ask a blessing, and the most rousing preachers strive to break up the prevailing languor, and summon men to a prompt decision on the solemn concerns of the soul.

THE CONFSSIONAL IN ENGLAND.

It is necessary, however, notwithstanding what has just been said above, to advert to the movement, recently made public, for obtaining authority to introduce the practice of what is called "sacramental confession," and to institute an order of confessors, in the Church of England. A few weeks ago, as is well known, upwards of four hundred clergymen presented a petition to the Convocation of Canterbury in favour of sacramental confession. The proposed re-introduction of this practice into the Church of England has created a very widespread and deep sensation. The Archbishops of Canterbury and York, though confessing themselves powerless to drive back the current of ritualism, have publicly expressed their high disapproval of the confessional movement, and their firm determination to do all in their power to discourage it. A public meeting in Exeter Hall, presided over by the Earl of Shaftesbury, has given forth a most vigorous protest against the proposal, and called on all members of the Church of England, who value the principles of the Reformation, to bestir themselves for defeating a movement which threatens to introduce among them the most odious corruptions of the Church of Rome. It is felt that there is something very bold in the movement of the confessionalists, seeing there is no feature of popery which has become more odious to the popular mind than the confessional; but this is only in accordance with what has been going on in the party for a number of years, its leaders being of opinion that they have made such progress in leavening the community with their views that what a little while ago they dared not whisper in the ear, they can now proclaim on the housetop. In the House of Commons, Lord Sandon, adverting to the progress of ritualism, asked the Prime Minister whether it was the intention of Government to bring in a bill for instituting a court by which violations of the law and Protestant customs of the Church might be promptly defeated. Mr. Gladstone said that they had no such intention, and that their attention had not been turned to the subject by the heads of the Church. On receiving this reply, Lord Sandon gave notice that at the earliest possible period of next session he himself would introduce such a measure. The serious nature of the crisis for England is becoming so apparent that none can shut their eyes to it; and it is obviously the interest and duty of all, whatever branch of the Church they may be connected with, earnestly to consider in what way they may prevent the return of errors against which some of the noblest spirits in the army of the martyrs strove so earnestly, sealing their testimony with their blood.

AN EVENING AT ALDERSHOT MISSION HALL.

Aldershot is one of those strange places of which one can form no right conception without having seen it. Like Tadmor in the wilderness, its situation is strange and unexpected,—a city in the midst of a moor; while its various camps and barracks, arranged with something like the formality of an American town, betoken a community very unlike any in America, at least, in times of peace.

In a conspicuous and convenient part of the town stands the Soldiers' Home, a commodious and attractive building that owes its existence to the exertions of the late Mrs. Daniel. If ever a place needed such an institution, it is surely Aldershot. The Home is an institution intended to foster piety, temperance, mental improvement, and profitable intercourse among soldiers; and if it be considered what large numbers of soldiers are to be found in Aldershot in the course of a year, how much annoyance, if not persecution, is the lot of the godly soldier, how absolutely impossible it is for him to obtain a moment's privacy for devotion or meditation, how many music-halls and theatres there are in the town to attract him by their amusements, and how many public-houses and houses of vice spreading for his feet the net of deadliest temptations, it is surely cause for thankfulness that there is also a Christian Home, presided over by ladies of culture, of position, and of warm Christian affections, furnishing by its reading-room, its refreshment-bar, its halls for meetings, its Christian services, the kindly and holy influence of the ladies who take charge of it, and its various other agencies for good, very precious help to the soldier for enjoying the best of his privileges and performing the highest of his duties.

On a recent visit on a week-day evening, we found the lecture-hall full of soldiers, and had the pleasure of listening to a very earnest and most suitable address from the vicar, who happened to be officiating that evening. We saw a number of the soldiers in their reading-room, got an account of a prayer meeting in which some of them took part, and also of some of their conversations with Miss Daniel, who takes down names for the Temperance Society, and gets much knowledge of the temptations and the history of the men. We heard of the meetings held once a week in Miss Daniel's drawing-room, with a view to the welfare of the officers; and now we have enlarged our knowledge by the perusal of the report for last year. The work of the missionaries and the Bible-women is here brought before us, and every page shows the heartiness with which the work is done, and the measure of success with which it pleases the Lord to own it. Among the fallen women that, alas! haunt the town to the number of between three and four hundred, some hopeful work is done, and the plan of cottage homes, at a distance from Aldershot, each presided over by a suitable Home mother, seems likely to be attended with success. We should like to see the operations of the Home more closely associated with those of the colporteur, who carries on his work here in connection with the Colportage Society for Scotland. We have oftener than once shown in this magazine of what signal benefit the labours of suitable colporteurs are productive; and we do not know that there could be a happier association than between the Home and the Colporteur.

Miss Daniel is one of those Christian ladies whose heart is ever growing larger, and whose success in her own neighbourhood prompts her to do something of the like kind for other places. Finding that the moving life of the soldier makes him very liable to lose at one place the benefit he may have got at another, she is now very desirous to get similar institutions set up at Chatham, and other military stations. In this good work we heartily wish her success, and we trust that through the liberal and considerate contributions of the Christian friends of the army, she may be able to accomplish this object to her entire satisfaction.

A DOUBLE BLOW TO THE AFRICAN SLAVE TRADE.

The newspapers have been so full of the double good news which has lately come to us—first, respecting the success of Sir Bartle Frere in bringing to an end the slave traffic of Zanzibar; and second, the safety of Sir Samuel Baker, and the complete success of the perilous enterprise in which he has been engaged—that we feel it necessary to do little more at present than record our thankfulness to God, and under Him to those who have gained these triumphs for humanity. We cannot but believe that the blows that have now been struck against that infamous traffic will effectually prepare the way for those further benefits which all hearts that make war on the slave trade desire for its miserable victims. One can see something of the final cause of the perils and anxieties that are suffered to befall such men as Livingstone and Baker in their benevolent undertakings. At first one might say that if any enterprises deserved to prosper, and did not deserve to be surrounded with perils of the most trying kind, it was such errands of mercy as the enemies of the slave trade go forth on. Yet no work is more full of peril and hardship. It is by means of them, however, that interest and information are diffused, and what is very important, sympathy is roused for the men, leading to cordial effort and warm prayer for the success of their work. The faith and prayer and patience of the Christian friends of Africa have had visible encouragement by Providence, and a new voice has sounded forth from heaven to bid them not be weary in well-doing.

THE SPIRIT OF THE ANNUAL REPORTS.

II.—THE WESLEYAN MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

Like its sister, the London Missionary, the Wesleyan has had more put into her purse last year than in previous seasons, the whole amount for the various mission fields—home, continental, colonial, and heathen—being £156,910 12s. 5d. This sum includes forty-three donations from £5 to £1,000. During the year thirty-five missionaries have been sent out. Several losses of unusual severity have been sustained, partly in the person of missionaries, and partly, in that of friends of the work. Conspicuous among these are Mr. Chubb of London; Dr. Hoole, for many years a secretary of the society; Mr. Shaw, one of the apostles of South African Missions; Mr. Jackson, the venerable father of the Wesleyan community; Peter de Zylva, "who for forty-two years preached the Gospel in Ceylon, and adorned it by a holy and stainless life, and was a wonderful example of Christian sincerity and purity;" and Edward Frazer, a negro, and forty-five years missionary in the West Indies, "an able and manly preacher of the cross."

The fields of the society's operations are—1. Nominally Christian countries (Ireland and other European stations), where 101 missionaries are employed; 2. Colonial, 85 missionaries; 3. West Indian, 97 missionaries; 4. Sierra Leone and Gambia, 21 missionaries; 5. Heathen countries, viz. INDIA (Calcutta, Mysore, Madras, Tamil, and Singhalese missions), 75 missionaries; CHINA (Canton and Wuchang), 11 missionaries; and POLYNESIA, 23 European, 63 native missionaries, 906 native catechists, and 1,796 local preachers. These last figures are very striking, indicating, what we have formerly noticed, the remarkable capacity of the converts in the South Seas to become themselves missionaries.

The annual meeting was presided over by Lord Napier and Ettrick, who purposely declined to say anything on the higher and more spiritual aspects of the work of missions, but, confining himself to their bearings on education, civilisation, and social order generally, bore most emphatic testimony to the great good which they have done.

The general tone of the meeting was expressed in an ingenious remark by the President of the conference, Mr. Wiseman, who found in an analogy to the feeling experienced in connection with mission work:—

"The musicians here present," he said, "will follow me when I remind them of the structure of the celebrated 'Dead March in Saul.' First of all there is a soft wailing dirge as the body of the fallen monarch is brought into view. Then afterwards the drums and trumpets are brought in, and there is a grand strike-up, as much as to say, 'After all, though the monarch is gone, and the beauty of Israel is fallen from her high places, there is the foe yet to be vanquished, there is the honour of Judah to be maintained:' and so, my Lord, we are prepared to say to-day. We are prepared, by the grace of God, to strike up a joyful and encouraging strain. The note to-day is most decidedly, 'Forward, forward!' 'Speak unto the children of Israel, that they go forward.'"

Mr. Barley, a missionary from the West Indies, referred in terms of the deepest interest to a remarkable Revival in Demerara.

The date was not given, but the movement began at a large meeting on a weekday evening, when some six hundred persons were engaged in earnest prayer, and appeared almost instantaneously to be filled with the power of God; a cry for mercy went up from various corners, and night after night meetings took place for weeks together, the fruits of which were very remarkable; one thousand five hundred members were added to the Wesleyan Church in the colony, and an evangelical alliance formed among the various ministers, and a Scripture Readers' Association, which were both in existence to the present time. "This revival originated in a leaders' prayer-meeting. We got the leaders together from week to week, and as their own hearts were graciously warmed, they became as living flames in the hands of God when they met their people."

The Rev. Frederic Greeves, from Polynesia, remarked on the wonderful fitness of the Gospel to all conditions of men. Missionaries have carried it to the wild Arabs of the East, and to the Red Indians of the West. They have preached it amid the polar snows to the Esquimaux, and in the tropics to the Negroes, and they are able to tell us that everywhere the voice of the Great Father is intelligible to all his children, and the blood of the Common Saviour is able to cleanse men from their sins. Mr. Greeves proceeded to give an account of—

The Change in Fiji.

"I have heard one of our Missionaries say, that he stood once in the presence of a savage Fijian chief—a man in whose presence a human life was not worth a fish-hook. He said to that man, 'What does your religion teach you to do to your enemies?' 'Kill them, and eat them,' said the chief, handling his club as if he were about to begin with the Missionary. 'Now,' said the Missionary, 'listen to my religion;' and he read to him some verses of our Lord's Sermon on the Mount: 'I say unto you, Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them that despitefully use you and persecute you; that ye may be the children of your Father which is in heaven: for He maketh His sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust.' 'O!' said the Fijian, 'that is a good thing; that would suit Fiji.' And then the Missionary turned to the 12th chapter of Romans, and read to him: 'Therefore, if thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, give him drink: for in so doing thou shalt heap coals of fire on his head. Be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good.' Again the Fijian chief said that this was a good thing, and would suit his people, and he sent for a teacher to come and instruct his subjects; and what has been the result of our Fijian Mission? Why, we have a King there a Christian; his name is Ebenezer, for hitherto the Lord hath helped us. We have a Queen there a Christian; her name is Lydia, for her heart the Lord hath opened. Her two daughters are Christians; the one is a Methodist Class-Leader, and the other is president of the Band of Hope in the island. We have given to these people a Christian literature, in which there is not a single bad book, and I hope it will be very long before there is any bad book in the Fijian language. We have given them a code of laws of which we can say this, at least, that it is quite as equitable and a great deal more intelligible than the law of Great Britain."

The same gentleman concluded a very interesting speech with some notes of

A Sermon by Dr. Guthrie.

"I remember hearing Dr. Guthrie preach a sermon once, which I will briefly sum up to this audience. This was the text: 'Lord what wilt Thou have me to do?' His divisions were, first, Divine authority,— 'Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do?' Thou art the Master; I must not choose my own work, my own station, the degree of my own labour. 'Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do?' Secondly, individual responsibility,— 'Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do?' It is not, What ought the Church to do? not, What ought this Missionary Society to do? The law comes to every man according to his several ability, and I am as much alone as though God had never made another man responsible for this work. Show me my work. 'Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do?' Third, practical religion,— 'What wilt Thou have me to do?' Not, What ought I to feel? Not, What ought I to speak? I can neither feel right, nor pray right, nor think right, unless I do my part in this great cause. And then to wind up with one of the Doctor's exquisite illustrations. Mark yonder ship, my brethren, the tempest's fury has broken upon her, fast she is sinking in the flood, the mariners are seeking refuge; some have already climbed on yonder rock, others are trying to get up by their side. I had rather see a man help his brother from the water than see him go down upon his knees and thank God he is safe himself."

Long may the Wesleyan Missionary Society continue to prosecute its blessed labours in this self-denying Christian spirit!

LETTERS FROM MEXICO.

Our readers are aware of the remarkable Protestant movement in Mexico which has had its origin and centre in Mexico City, and, under the auspices of the Presbyterian Church of the United States, has borne remarkable fruit, in the conversion of not a few Romish priests, and the formation of several active congregations. There is not much communication between the different parts of Mexico, and at Toluca, the capital of the state of Mexico, though only fifty miles from Mexico City, an English gentleman, Mr. Pascoe, whom business drew to reside there, had not heard of the Protestant movement elsewhere. Like St. Paul at Athens, Mr. Pascoe found his heart very much stirred as he saw the people wholly given to Romish idolatry, the worship of the Virgin being carried out there to a degree which he fancies must be unparalleled in the world. The class for whom he felt his sympathy strongest was the Indian population—the descendants of the original inhabitants of the country, who are well pleased with Romanism, because it is not like their own old form of idolatry, but who cling to their own language with a tenacity that cannot be conquered. Mr. Pascoe, with that ingenuity which compassion for souls never fails to generate, though himself poor, devised means, through the help of friends, for circulating Bibles and tracts among those whose spiritual condition he so deeply compassionated. The results, under the blessing of God, have been very wonderful. In a letter which we have received from a gentleman in England who is in correspondence with Mr. Pascoe, they are thus summed up:—"Toluca has a population of 30,000 inhabitants. Six months ago, he could not reckon on more than three persons as Protestants; now, he has a nice little place fitted up for worship, and there are a hundred earnest worshippers, all Protestants, and most of them he thinks are truly converted to God." Referring to a visit lately paid to Toluca, by Mr. Phillips, the agent of the Bible Society at Mexico City, Mr. Pascoe writes: "He said he was astonished, and it seemed evident that God's spirit is being poured out on us in great abundance, as he could see that every effort that I and my helpers make takes immediate effect, that wherever we scatter the seed, it seems immediately to take root. The Spirit, he thinks, seems to be only waiting to descend and bless the efforts to arouse the whole nation."

PERSECUTION AND MARTYRDOM.

In November, 1872, in a little town called Capulhuac, six leagues distant from Toluca, a small knot of native converts began to meet for worship. Their pastor is an Indian, a man of very humble position, and little or no education, but on whom God's Spirit seems to have been poured out largely. He had been a staunch Catholic, hating the very name of Protestant; till, being in the market of an adjoining town, he bought a Spanish New Testament from a bookseller, without knowing it to be a Protestant book. Taking it home and reading it secretly, the truth at once began to enter into his soul, and no sooner had he accepted the message for himself than he began to preach it to others. The little flock that began to gather in his home last year are twenty-seven in number, all poor. The pastor's dwelling is the usual Indian cabin, made of thin shingles tied together.

The curate and alcalde, or village magistrate, excited a persecution against them; on two occasions the pastor's hut was set on fire, and on one of these turpentine was used to expedite its destruction, but without effect. The Protestants are the objects of bitter annoyances; one girl in particular, who is alleged to be worshipped by them, being often hooted and mobbed, while the gamins kneel around her in mock worship. On the 12th of April, whilst the little flock were engaged in public worship, and a child was being baptised, the Romanists prepared to make a deadly assault upon them. At a couple of hundred yards from the place of meeting, they poured a volley of musketry upon the Protestants. A scuffle ensued, the Protestants trying to escape to a distance; one of them was killed, and other two wounded. In one place where they tried to find refuge, the people rose against them and would not let them enter, nor could they find safety or shelter, until they had buried themselves among the neighbouring hills. Mr. Pascoe is gathering funds for rebuilding the chapel, and trying to obtain justice and protection for the people. But the fact of the village magistrate being the leader of this cowardly attack is sufficiently indicative of the intensity of the feeling, and the dangers of the persecution.

Other towns in Mr. Pascoe's neighbourhood are showing similar signs of interest. In writing on 6th February last, he says: "I have received a visit from an inhabitant of a town some thirty-six miles from here, imploring me to do something towards helping them. For two years they have had a Protestant congregation of above sixty men, not counting their wives and families; but they have no pastor, no organization, no place of worship, no prayer or Bible meetings, and only two Bibles in all the congregation! I did all I could, advised them as to becoming better organised, and made a present of a few copies of God's word, promising to give more, and to take some steps towards helping on God's work."

SUPERSTITIOUS BELIEFS IN MEXICO.

In illustration of the influence of Mexican popery, we are told that amongst other titles ascribed to Mary are those of "Mother of the uncreated Light, Temple of the Holy Trinity, Wife of the Holy Ghost, and Throne of eternal righteousness!" In a volume of prayers, printed for the behoof of souls in purgatory, it is laid down that for saying No. 1. the Catholic will save himself from purgatory, and also take one soul out; No. 2. will obtain pardon for as many souls as there are stars in heaven, or sands in the sea, and grass in the fields. The eight from 3 to 11 gain each a pardon of 140,080,149 years! On Fridays each of the prayers obtains a pardon of double the above time; and on Good Friday each prayer obtains the same pardon, and in addition, also, obtains a pardon eight times over for perpetuity for every soul on earth! How the views of the Protestants are perverted may be judged from the following:—A priest who had got a copy of a tract on the Lord's Prayer took it to the pulpit, and told the people he would read it to them to show them what kind of persons the Protestants were. He read out, as if from the tract, "Our Father which art—in hell! The Protestants," he said, "thus openly acknowledged that the devil was their father."

"Look unto the fields, for they are already white unto harvest." Such seems emphatically to be the state of Mexico. It has a population of about eight millions, of whom it may be said that they have sat for centuries in the region and shadow of death. It is deeply interesting and instructive to find private individuals like Mr. Pascoe moved to begin so good a work among them. We own we do not much like the tone in which he speaks of the American brethren who are promoting the work in Mexico. Afterwards, experiencing their help and their kindness, he speaks of them much more pleasantly. The Gospel is infinitely more precious than any form of church government; yet it is sufficiently evident that, for the efficient protection of the Gospel against the arts of Rome, a form of church government is quite necessary. We repeat our cordial good wishes, and acknowledge the good we have received from Mr. Pascoe's letters on his work in Mexico.

III.—GLANCES ABROAD.

THE PILGRIMAGE FEVER IN FRANCE.

We learn from the correspondent of the Guardian and other sources, that the enthusiasm for pilgrimage in France has reached an unprecedented height. The month between 22nd July and 22nd August has been set apart as the month of pilgrimages, and arrangements have been made for special prayer during that month in all the churches of France. Three plenary indulgences have been accorded by the Pope to all who shall have said the appointed prayers, and received the communion at the appointed places, or helped in some equally substantial way to consecrate France to the Virgin.

But the friends of pilgrimages have not waited for the month. Processions to holy wells and sacred shrines have been going on with unrivalled enthusiasm. At Lyons more than six thousand children went in procession to the celebrated shrine of Notre Dame de Fourvière, some just able to walk, and some carried in the arms, the bigger ones carrying banners, counting their beads, and singing hymns to the Virgin.

The number of places to which the pilgrimages have been organized is very large.

Pre-eminent among these is the pilgrimage to Paray-le-Monial, in the Department of Saone et Loire, beyond Moulins. The expeditions thither are in honour of the sacred heart of Jesus, and are designed to make the amende honorable to Him, and to invoke the sacred heart on behalf of France on the anniversary of the day on which our Lord appeared to the blessed Marguerite-Marie, and said to her, "France shall be consecrated to my Divine Heart, and all the land shall be conscious of the blessings I pour out upon it. Faith and religion shall flourish anew in France, by devotion to my Divine Heart."

The committee in charge of the movement observes:—

"The movement which carries all France in the direction of the Sacred Heart of Jesus extends itself every day. Our great towns are in a state of commotion. Marseilles, Lille, Cambrai, Lyons, Paris, Nantes, Angers, Montpellier, and many others have come, or will come one after the other, to make the amende honorable, and consecrate themselves to our Saviour on the spot where he deigned to manifest his heart to the Blessed Marguerite-Marie. It is consoling to see the flood of pilgrims which is pouring into Paray-le-Monial praying and telling their beads without regard to human opinion, and chanting their pious canticles in our streets and public places, along our rivers and on our railways:—

'Sauvez Rome et la France
Par votre Sacré-Cœur!'

Such is the sentiment and the cry of all hearts. Our misfortunes, the hope of a better future before us, the glorious souvenirs of Patay, Mans, and Loigny, impart a patriotic character to the movement which is taking place among us."

The enthusiasm of the population for religious pilgrimages and fêtes is marvellous, and even newspapers whose tone used to be quite different are writing regarding them with hope and expectation. The explanation is partly that the feelings of France are profoundly stirred by her misfortunes, and partly that she has an intense desire to go in for the very opposite course followed by the Germans. The injudicious severity of Count Bismarck in his opposition to the Ultramontanes seems to invest their cause in France with an air of martyrdom and glory. At the bottom of these movements there is an intense impatience of the German yoke, and desire for the restoration of France to her former proud position. Whatever too is genuine in the religious feelings of the people is roused, and made to swell the flood of enthusiastic eagerness with which aid is solicited for the salvation of France.

FATHER HYACINTHE'S COMMENTARY ON THIS REVIVAL.

Father Hyacinthe has given his opinion as to the nature and causes of this revival.

"There are stories all over France," he says, "just now of strange apparitions, of supernatural occurrences. It is impossible to be wholly incredulous. Such delirium, such utter blindness, in a nation so conspicuous for its sense and intelligence, can hardly be accounted for by natural agency. . . . There exists a moral atmosphere of obscurity and electricity, which sits heavily on men's souls. The evil extends in another shape to statesmen and thinkers. And in those exalted regions we may now behold faith allied with politics, fanaticism hand in hand with scepticism—possibly with hypocrisy—with a view to conclude between heaven and earth an alliance equally repugnant to both. The self-styled Conservative and ruling classes are just now like those of whom Isaiah spoke—they err in vision and stumble in judgment. But no, they do not stumble—they unhesitatingly, 'resolutely,' lead the country into the abyss."

He traces this state of feeling to the forcible extinction of Gallicanism, the stamping out of Jansenism, and the attempt to harmonise faith and science, and the establishment of Ultramontane Popery as the only form of religion, the only thing left for men to cling to, who have any faith in God and the necessity of religion. Democracy was increasing this feeling. Not long ago he had seen, on the part of a democratic paper, an attempt to show that the Jews were the greatest enemies of modern society, because, but for the Jews, we should not have had Christianity; we should have been raised above that notion of the unity of God, which was a low form of religion, lower than the Grecian mythology. It was in this way that the minds of people were driven to Ultramontanism as the only refuge from the atheism that was so dreadful to the mass of Frenchmen who lived in country districts. The great thing was to proclaim to France the religion of the Bible.

His concluding observation is suspended between hope and fear:—

"Everything is dying in France—nay, possibly everything may be dead already, save the soul of France. That lives, will live; my country is in the position of the victim of that atrocious punishment which consisted in tying up a living man between two dead ones. On the one side, there is the ancien régime that refuses to die; on the other, the stillborn corpse of that gigantic and monstrous abortion, sham Democracy. France is yet alive between the two. She lives, for she hungers and thirsts for truth and justice; and I would tell her, in the words of the great Italian and Catholic poet—

'O, Living Soul, separate from what is dead!'

What we should try and do is to clear away the clouds that are artificially raised before our God, He who made our race, who fears no progress, the God of Pascal and Bossuet. We should try and extricate Him from behind the idol where He is concealed amid clouds of the incense of the virgins of Lourdes and La Salette, and the sacris causes of Paray-le-Monial, and show Him to the people of France and say, 'Here is not a new religion, but that which is ever old and always new, traditional, and progressive. We also are true Christians and true Catholics; we also are true Liberals and true democrats; we believe in the soul of the people, and we worship the God of the people.'

IV.—OUR LIBRARY TABLE.

The opening chapters of the Life of Sir James Y. Simpson, Baronet, by John Duns, D.D., have quite a romantic interest. From the humblest ranks of the Scottish working-class, as in the case of Robert Burns, there emerges a boy of singular qualities of head and heart, who in his own path reaches a fame scarcely inferior to that of the poet, and leaves his mark on his profession and on mankind as few have done before. The class from which he sprung, however, though on the lowest social level, enjoyed the benefit of a culture that aristocracy does not often transmit—remarkable industry, self-reliance, and self-control on the father's side, and godliness of a high type, with many of its real fruits, on the mother's. Through the force of "push and pluck" the boy finds his way to college, becomes a student of medicine, devotes himself to the department of midwifery, and begins early to achieve distinction in that branch. By-and-by he is the successful candidate for the chair of Midwifery in the University of Edinburgh, and from that time his fame grows with a steady and unchecked progress. The remark of Buffon that "genius is the power of making efforts" was never more wonderfully fulfilled than in the case of Simpson. The efforts he made were prodigious; had he not done with his might whatsoever his hand found to do, he would never have reached the position he attained. The greater part of his professional life witnesses him engaged in struggling for professional eminence, not, however, for his own sake only, but under the influence of a conviction that of secular professions medicine is the noblest. It must be owned, at the same time, that his intense professional ambition is not a pleasant object of contemplation, and that the many squabbles and controversies with brethren of the highest respectability in which he got involved, sensibly diminish the moral instructiveness of his life. His medical discoveries and applications were of most remarkable interest, and his delight in them, as fitted greatly to diminish the sum of human suffering, was in entire keeping with the singular kindness, the irrepressible benignity of heart which showed itself in his whole intercourse with his patients. At the age of fifty he became an earnest Christian, and at times he bore very noble public testimony to the riches of the Saviour's grace. To the Christian heart the finest of his appearances were such as those when, on the death of Sir David Brewster, he spoke to the Royal Society of Edinburgh of the Saviour to whom the venerable philosopher had given himself; or at the graduation ceremony, in presence of the University, urged the medical students to realise the love of Christ, and devote themselves to his service. The style of his piety was of the impulsive kind, very vivid at one time, more languid at another; and this circumstance, joined to the fact that the echoes of his professional squabbles never died away, doubtless obstructed his influence as a religious man. His biographer seems to regret that he came out so much as he did immediately after his conversion in public religious meetings, inasmuch as his previous study of the Bible, and knowledge of divine truth, were exceedingly imperfect; and fears that, had he persevered in that line, injurious consequences might have resulted.

Sir James Simpson's wonderful activity of mind and capacity of work were doubtless the means of shortening his life. To the subjects of his study and intense application he was always adding, and notwithstanding embarrassments which were sometimes painful, he seemed incapable of either restricting his practice or curtailing his intellectual labour. As in the case of Hugh Miller, though, mercifully, in a different manner, the effects of his unrepressed and irrepressible activity of brain appeared in the premature close of his life. It seemed as if he was incapable of turning away from any kind of work that had a living interest for him.

In one or two points we might correct the biographer, but we will notice but one, which has reference to this magazine. Dr. Duns says, that when Sir James Simpson was asked to contribute to the SUNDAY MAGAZINE, he declined. On the contrary, he very cheerfully agreed. At one time he offered to write on two most interesting Christian philosophers, Sir David Brewster and Michael Faraday, comparing their characters together. At another time he said that he would like very much to write on our Lord's miracles of healing, and that in particular he would like to say something on leprosy. Not a few efforts were made to obtain these papers—but in vain. Nor could one press him very hard when he said that Sunday was the only day on which he could put together his thoughts on such subjects. At this distance one sees clearly that it would have been well if Sir James could have let alone some of his antiquarian researches, or his controversies on such topics as that with Professor Smyth on the use of the Pyramids of Egypt, and written carefully on the miracles of healing. A permanent contribution to the right understanding of so remarkable a class of our Lord's mighty works, and a clear conclusion for their supernatural character, by one who had come nearer to them in his own practice than any other man, though of course by the use only of natural means, might have been a singular service to Christianity, and would have been a highly suitable field for the talents of one acknowledged on every side among the kings of medical science. But whatever may be thought on these and on other topics on which we do not enter, there can be no doubt that the name of Simpson will shine in all time in the glorious record of men of highest gifts and attainments who have been taught to bow at the cross of Jesus, and sing the new song in testimony of redeeming love. A heart peculiarly emotional was brought under the influence of the love of Christ, and sometimes it would pour itself out in words of rapture full of the music of heaven. Such intensity of emotion, especially in a Scotchman, is alike rare and beautiful. Granting that in Sir James Simpson it may have been but occasional, every expression of it by such a man was a remarkable tribute to the honour of the Saviour, and a remarkable evidence of the power of his grace.

Under his Banner: Papers on the Missionary

Work of Modern Times, by Rev. H. W. Tucker, M.A., is based on an excellent idea; for nothing is more needed than concise accounts of modern missionary enterprise, in a collected form. English Church missions are spread over a wide extent, and embrace a great variety of interesting localities. In the present volume, seven chapters are given to India, and its several presidencies; one each to Ceylon and Burmah; under Borneo and the Straits we have an account of the labours of Bishop Macdougall and his coadjutors; China and Japan come next; Africa and adjacent islands have no fewer than twelve chapters; then follow the West Indies and Gujana, Patagonia and Terra del Fuego, Australia, New Zealand, Melanesia, Hawaii, North America and its various sections; we have then a chapter on Roman Missionaries, one on the Eastern Church, one on the Moravians, the Heathen World, the Future of the Anglican Church, and Missionary Societies. The author writes with clearness and vigour, and shows no small share of that power of combining details and general views which is so needful in a book embracing so great a variety of subjects. He laments with much earnestness, and exposes faithfully, the deficiency of missionary zeal. We regret, however, that his point of view is so very High Church, that his book can be acceptable only to those who are at one with him there. When he treats of the Madagascar mission, for example, he writes of the excellent men, whose labours have been so successful, in terms of contempt and obloquy much to be regretted. What could induce him to speak of the Christian faith now professed there as "the spurious religionism of a semi-heathen island which is steeped in the foulest sensuality, while it repeats the intolerant shibboleths of the seventeenth century," or say that the missionaries have abandoned the coast "to fever and the devil?" We can only say that our disappointment has been great in finding a book which promised so well, open to objections which must interfere so seriously with its purpose.

Another little work of similar aim and purpose is The Light of All Ages, by the Rev. Gavin Carlyle, M.A.—The object is to work out the relation of Christ to the history of all ages and nations—the sun of our system, the enlightener of humanity in all directions, political and social, as well as religious. First, He is delineated in his own essential characteristics, then in his relation to all ages, especially as set forth in the Messianic prophecies, and with the seal of the resurrection set on Him; the connection of his life is then traced with the politics and social institutions of different periods, and its bearing on the future of the world, and on the everlasting life of the church in heaven. The field is a remarkably interesting and fertile one, and in the hands of Mr. Carlyle it is surveyed with a happy combination of thoughtfulness, devoutness, and scriptural simplicity.

standing straight before her in the church-yard path, raising his hat from a very stately iron-grey head. And as the startled Millicent looked up at him and answered, there came over her a confused recollection of long candle-lit evenings, very full of needlework, and a sound rang in her bewildered brain like Hatty's naughty whistle of old days. It was like a once familiar language forgotten. And then a trifle—a nothing characteristic in itself—made it all clear, as one translated word will sometimes restore the lost key of knowledge. It was only a worn signet ring on the stranger's little finger.

“I am Millicent Harvey,” she said, “and—I know you now—you are Harry Westbrook.”

“I am he,” he answered, grasping the hand she held towards him. “And thank God for the friendly sound of the old name—you are the first that have called me by it since I have been back in England!”

He turned and walked by her side. “I knew I could not be wrong,” he said, speaking with an eagerness of delight that contrasted half pathetically with his dignified figure and whitening hair. “I could not mistake a Harvey face. I should have known it if I had met it on the Himalayas.”

“I have not to question you, fearful what your replies may be,” he went on. “Only yesterday, I took a wandering about our old haunts in Mile End, and went into one of the shops where Hatty used to deal, and where the same old name was up. I asked after you all. ‘Yes, the old lady was still alive,’ they told me, ‘and looking finely. And Master George was married and had a grown up son, and was a great man. And Miss Milly was still at home. And Miss Hatty was Mrs. Webber, but she still looked in sometimes of an evening, and sat down, and was as friendly as ever.’ I did not need to hear that Hatty was Mrs. Webber,” he added, with a touch of gravity in his playfulness. “I knew that years and years ago. I saw an old newspaper with the marriage notice. If you think I may see Mr. and Mrs. Webber, I have something for them. If not, I will send it through you. It is only an inlaid chess-table, and a set of chessmen in Indian ivory.”

“I am sure they will both be very glad to see you,” said Milly, not speaking without authority, for Harry Westbrook, though seldom mentioned, was no tabooed subject in the Webbers' house—Mr. Webber having always stoutly maintained “that it had been a good sign in any young man to be taken with Harriet,” while Hatty, though a light shadow would flit over her merry face at the old name, was always humbly and thankfully conscious that she had been guided to do the right thing—not being one of those weak and foolish women who think that their hand alone has strength to save a man's life and soul, such women being generally those who would only seal his perdition. “I am sure they will be very glad to see you,” Milly reiterated; “but will you not come home first and see my mother? Our house is quite near. And Miss Brook is still with us—do you remember Miss Brook?”

“Indeed I do,” he said cheerfully, “she is not a woman to be forgotten. A very important piece of my home-coming triumph would be lost if I missed Miss Brook. It is a treat worth having, to put in a creditable appearance before those who predicted our disgrace."

"But nobody will be better pleased than Miss Brook," said Milly, "she really liked you."

"I know she did," he replied heartily. "I did not think so at the time, but it is now some years since I came to that conclusion."

And so Millicent led in the unexpected guest. The two old ladies were seated in their little parlour, Mrs. Harvey reading the Pilgrim's Progress, and Miss Brook perusing the book of Job. Mrs. Harvey caught the name of "Harry Westbrook," but thought such a possibility was so exceedingly pleasant that it could scarcely be true, and therefore rose and made her dignified old-world curtsy, with its accompanying "Very happy to see you, sir," with the added aside—"Who—who—does she say it is?" while Miss Brook promptly took it all in and shouted in her ear,—

"It's that young Westbrook, been and made his fortune, and come back wonderfully improved, as I always said he might be:" a turn of her prophecies which threw the whole party into a hearty laugh, out of which they all emerged as comfortably familiar as if they had never been separated for more than a week.

Of course Mr. Westbrook stayed to dine with the Harveys; indeed, it was instantly settled that he should remain with them for the whole day, and if the Webbers did not look in at the cottage before evening service, then Mrs. Harvey or Milly would take him to their house after it. In one way or the other the Harveys and the Webbers always saw each other every Sabbath. Mrs. Harvey and Milly still went to church, and the Webbers still went to chapel, so as they did not meet in God's House, they regularly met at the household altar.

There was no overwhelming amount of conversation, and the inquiries mostly came from the stranger, and the news from the hostesses. It is not "travel in far lands" which furnishes subjects which we care to talk over in the sacred first moments of reunion. Days would come when the three women would hang interested on their gratified visitor's stories of Indian life and society, on his sketches of Benares and the Himalayas, his descriptions of Hindoo ceremonies, and his specimens of oriental needlework and flora. But just now, it was far more interesting for him to hear about the death of his old minister, and how the house in which he used to live was pulled to bits and turned into a factory. The sight of the same old dishes of former days seemed to him more astonishing than the seven wonders of the world, and one or two old books lying about he lifted as reverently as if all the souls whom they had ever comforted still clasped their hands about them.

It is strangely solemn, that meeting of family friends, long parted in utter silence. Influences have been moulding each, of which the other knows nothing, which may have driven them apart, or may have drawn them nearer together. There is scarcely an ordinary phrase, a tune, a public event, a mass glory, or a moonlight shadow which has not acquired some secret meaning for each. These things escape speech—they are now so disguised as when clumsily clothed in words. What is there to tell of our histories? Somebody died—somebody married—somebody was introduced to us—everybody knows beforehand that such things must have happened to us. But the bare facts are nothing; and those who know them know nothing. These old friends of his knew all about Harry Westbrook's old love affair, and time will come when it will be frankly talked over among them; but they will never know—he will never be able to tell them—how it felt to sit lonely in the shadow of tropical trees, and know that Hatty and her husband were singing out of one hymn-book in their little East End chapel. Millicent, in her turn, mentioned both Fergus Laurie and David Maxwell to Mr. Westbrook, in the course of this his first visit, and in due time he will know all about the ambition and selfishness of the one and the saintliness of the other; but Millicent will never be able to tell how she felt when she wrote to Fergus and offered him her money, or when she watched the sun go down, as she flew through the country in the Harwich train. If others cannot see these stories in our eyes and hear them in our voices, they will never know them at all. Those who can read these open secrets know us better after one hour's talk than some who have lived with us all our lives.

To Millicent that Sabbath afternoon was like a peaceful dream; or rather years and years gone by seemed like a fevered delirium, all except David's Bible lying on the table, and David's grave in the sunlight not so very far away. She knew that Acre Hall was still standing where it did—that the man in possession was gone (though he might not be without his transitory successor), and that the household still remained unchanged; for Fergus had not yet started for America, but was going about in the most dashing of frys, buying for himself the most sumptuous of Russian leather-portmanteaux, and coolly assuming that all of his creditors had done a very good thing for themselves when they allowed him to get into their debt. Millicent only marvelled within herself how she had ever wavered in her judgment as to what must be the end of such way of life—how she had ever hoped to gather figs of thistles—to find a hero walking in the counsel of the ungodly—a saint sitting in the seat of the scornful. It must have done harm, too—this wilful judgment of hers—when, rather than own herself in the wrong, she had shut her eyes to the right, and accepted excuses where she should have uttered protests. Fergus might be saying to himself and to others that she had not been a true friend. It was a bitter lie as he meant it, but she owned to herself that it was but too true in a far different sense!

Mr. Webber and his wife did not call in at the cottage, and so, when evening service was over, Millicent and Mr. Westbrook went to their house.

The good little stationer himself received them, because, as he explained, Hatty was still up-stairs "taking off her bonnet."

"I'm proud to see you, sir," said the worthy man, "and it will be just as great a pleasure as you could give my Hatty. 'If he ever comes to England, he'll never come near us,' she's said often and often."

"Well, Mr. Webber, I can't say I meant to do so when I landed," said Mr. Westbrook, frankly; "but the worst of it was, there was nobody else to come to see, and there was no place I cared to haunt, except where we all used to live."

"I'll go up and tell her myself," said Mr. Webber, bustling away, and Mr. Westbrook sat down to wait their return.

The guest gave one glance round the room—Hatty's ménage. No, he wouldn't have liked such a room to live in. This would never have been his best home, as it was hers. This was fit for her, she had made it for herself in fact; but she never would have been able to make it if she had been linked with him.

Hatty came down presently. Not very quickly. She had had something to say to Mr. Webber first; probably she had also to give him a kiss. At any rate she had had to put her best pearl brooch, her husband's wedding gift, into her lace collar. "He won't notice what you are dressed in," Mr. Webber had reasoned; but Hatty persisted.

Mr. Westbrook rose and went forward, and the two old lovers met under the clumsy gilt chandelier, and shook hands, and said how glad they were to see each other.

"But you've grown, surely," said Hatty, trying to laugh.

"In some ways, I hope," answered Harry Westbrook rather wistfully.

One felt, as the two stood together, that there had never been a husband and wife like them in the world, though Millicent remembered thinking in the old time what a suitable pair they looked—quite a typical couple. But she had never seen an old settled husband and wife such as these now. Together they would not have grown so. Sitting gazing at them from her twilight corner, Millicent caught one of those curious revelations of possibilities in faces, which come to us all sometimes, understand them or not as we may. Sometimes they show us what people might have been, as well as what they may be. These two might have been a lazy, ill-conditioned reckless man, and a soured indifferent woman, with a useless, restless heart like a caged animal. And as Milly caught this glimpse of the escaped dangers of the past, even Hatty's rich silk dress seemed to cling about her, as would have clung the poor tousled shawl she was never to wear, and Harry's tall and stately form seemed to droop into the shamble of the drunken sensualist, that, thank God, he was never to be! No, the fondest love could wish neither but what they were, and what they were they never could have become together.

Before Harry Westbrook and Millicent left, the two sisters had a little chat in Hatty's bedroom.

"I'm just awfully glad to have seen him again," said Hatty, using her stepson's slang in sober earnest, "only I wish he was married and settled. He seems to have made plenty of money. Do you know whether he means to go back to India, Milly?"

"He says so; he speaks of going back quite soon," Millicent answered.

"I wish he was married. But you needn't fancy I'm such a donkey as to fear he is keeping single for my sake, unless it is in the way that I gave him a disgust at women."

"There's plenty in life besides marriage," said Millicent; "even the world admits as much in the case of men. Marriage is never said to be their chief object in existence, as is sometimes stated of women."

"But it's six of one and half a dozen of the other, for all that," said Hatty shrewdly. "Unless it's six to one and more than half a dozen to the other, for the world's talk generally goes by contraries. I can understand a woman looking at her future with only a side-glance at marriage; she can easily fancy herself living with kindred, or set in households somehow, as women always are. But I can't fancy a man looking forward and wondering whether he'll pay his housekeeper fifty pounds a year or a hundred. That's a dismal look-out. Mother is very pleased to see Harry, isn't she?" Hatty inquired, with a sudden change of subject.

"Yes, we all are," Millicent replied. "You don't know how much those old cheery times of ours have been in my mind lately. I had been thinking about them as I think Noah's family must have thought of the blue hills and green dells while they were floating over the face of the dull grey flood. It seems so odd that Harry should turn up just when my mind was full of the old memories which he shares."

Hatty kissed her sister. "No, I don't think it's odd," she said. "It always happens so. It is wonderful, but it does, and that only makes it more wonderful. It wouldn't be half so wonderful if the sun forgot to rise, or the trees to bud in spring as that they never do."

And the two sisters went down-stairs, and warm invitations to renew his visit were given by the Webbers to Harry, and then he escorted Milly home.

They walked in silence for a few minutes, then Harry said,—

"Well, I thank God that I knew your sister. I believe my knowing her saved me for this life and for the next. You see I had nobody of my own, Miss Harvey, no sister, no near relation. I had no ideal of home till I saw yours. It was God's providential blessing that it all happened as it did."

Millicent understood the thought in his heart, narrowed as was its expression. She knew that he felt now that Hatty had given him the utmost and the best that she had for him, that any giving more would not only have overflowed, but overturned the cup. There are men and women whom God makes brothers and sisters and sacred kin in spirit as in the flesh, and between these there is a spiritual barrier, similar to the lawful "impediment" between near relationships. They can be so much to each other, unless they lawlessly determine to be so much more! With them, transposing the poet's sentiment,—

"A little less, and how much it is!
A little more, and what worlds away!"

Yet Milly understood, too, that the heart of the dignified man beside her was conscious of a new loss, even the loss of his old crown of loss. A man who has fancied himself heir to an even irredeemably forfeited estate, feels himself beggared to find that there was a blunder in his genealogy, and that he never could have had the least claim to the alienated land. The bed where only rue and rosemary have grown looks drearier still when left empty for weeds to overspread. There may be shadow and rest under a yew-tree, and an alas when it is cut down. Harry Westbrook would never again sit on the Himalayas and soothe his solitude with sighs over the solace that had slipped from his life. But we cannot joyfully take the spoiling of our sorrow, if it be all we have!

Millicent's sympathetic reverie was broken by Mr. Westbrook saying, as if in answer to her unspoken thought,—

"Ah, but I am very glad I have come back to England. I don't suppose I shall ever lose sight of you all again, and I shall leave the country very differently to how I left it last time. Then I felt ready to run away anywhere—anywhere. Why, I went down to the cabin and lay down in my berth, just to miss the last sight of England! Now I shall watch the shadow of her last rock! No, Miss Millicent (as they paused at the cottage gate), I will not come in to-night, for your good hospitable mother would not let me go without another half-hour's chat, and I will not be drawn into breaking her wholesome custom of early hours. But I will come back in a day or two if I may? Yes? Then perhaps I may look in to-morrow. Good night."

"Good night," said Millicent, and went in, her heart full of thankfulness for the safety and welfare of the dear old friend, whose familiar face had returned to her like a fresh blossom from a tree planted long ago.

And the moonlight shimmered through the elm-trees round Acre Hall, and slept on David's grave beneath the Norman tower.

CHAPTER II.—LAST THINGS.

HARRY WESTBROOK kept his word. He did visit the cottage the next evening, and the day but one after that, and then the next Sunday. He went to the Webbers too, and took them his tardy wedding-gift—what fun the step-children made out of that, and young Dick would have it that it was for somebody else—for there was a second generation of weddings now in the very near future of the Webbers' household.

Under all circumstances it was only natural that Mr. Westbrook and Millicent should make the best companions for each other. They had such a mutual Past. Mrs. Harvey and Miss Brook could join in their laughing gossip over old times; but they were not their own "old times," which were twenty or thirty years further back. In the spring time of these those had been absorbed, anxious women. Then George and Harriet had each had the poem of life since the prelude, and their memories did not habitually go back so far.

Gradually Harry Westbrook spoke less of going back to India—actually said that there was no particular hurry for him to do so; it might even depend upon circumstances whether he went at all! And more significant than his words, was the fact that he began to give serious attendance at the London office of the firm in which he now had an important share.

Mr. Westbrook's was one of those characters that begin by being all possibility. Most of us have a little actuality to begin with, which is a splendid start at first. But you cannot tell the size of a flower by the size of its seed. Nay, a grain of mustard seed "is indeed the least of all seeds, but when it is grown, it is the greatest among herbs." The secret lies in that mysterious gift of growing.

Such a little thing means so much to such natures. The very easy goodness of Harry's nature—its sheer want of grasp—had made it seem possible that he could take the world without a struggle—enter into his inheritance, without proving his right thereto. The thing he had needed to learn was that giving goes before taking, and that the heir, so long as he is a child, differeth nothing from a servant. When Hatty sacrificed the sometimes treacherous joy of self-sacrifice, and did the right thing first instead of vainly striving to accomplish the beautiful one instead, she had taught him this. It showed him that the verb to be goes before the verb to have.

The native easy goodness stayed. He did not hurry on to any second lesson before he had thoroughly learned the first, and it had served his entire life hitherto. His soul had lived in that silence and solitude which for souls who are strong enough to bear it, is the tropical region of spiritual growth.

"When one has nothing else to remind one of God, I think it makes one hang the harder to one's own prayers," he said. "Why, a travelling missionary's sermon at a station sometimes had to serve me for a whole year. But it always did. The more

I turned it over the more came out of it; you see I was always a slow fellow."

And yet out of this silence and solitude, he stepped into a far wider world than Millicent knew, in her busy life. As she entered into his interests, it was as if a door in a convent garden was opened upon a breezy common.

To him the world did not seem a worn-out world, for himself to galvanise, as it had to Fergus; rather it was a great car rolling upward with so many pulling and pushing it, that his own shoulder to the wheel concerned himself rather than it. He did not stop short to sneer at the petty quibbles and human weaknesses of boards and committees, but lifted up his eyes upon the mission fields, white for harvest, and blessed God for the labourers there, however few. He looked upon the Church in the world, and saw her, as God Himself surely sees her—a queen in disguise, greater than she seems, with jewels hidden under her rags. He was quite sure that there was plenty of heroism and endurance and unselfishness in the world—quite sure; whether he saw it or not, he knew it was there. Perhaps he had learned this faith by a few untold heroisms of his own. It is a way people have of learning that lesson.

He thought thoroughly well of the prospects of humanity, because being a good man, he honestly judged that there were many a great deal better. One may generally know a man by that test.

Poor Millicent! She was conscious of a soft glory like autumn sunlight creeping over her life. She said to herself that it was very pleasant this renewal, this deification, as it were, of an old friendship. Surely it was something like the renewals of heaven—the same old familiarity and dearness—yet so much better. Nay, it seemed a faint, faint type of many of the mysteries of immortality. Had not their friend found his way back to them over all the time and distance, only because they had once been really in his history, and had not he fallen fittingly into a new place among their new ways of life?—not jarring, not disarranging, but completing and beautifying. How many tangles would be so unravelled There! And Millicent lifted up her eyes towards the pleasant fields beyond the swellings of Jordan. And her peace came back as the peace of a little child. For what makes childhood but trust and hope? Only the childhood which is of the kingdom of God trusts in Him instead of man, and hopes in heaven instead of in "growing up."

Only at last there came a something—a silence—a mystery—between Harry Westbrook and Millicent Harvey. Any stranger, seeing them, would have known at a glance that they were not brother and sister, nor familiar kinsfolk, nor merely old easy friends.

"Do you think that people grow too old for new love?" Mr. Westbrook asked abruptly, as they two were walking home through the lanes after a visit to George and Christian.

"I think it depends on the people themselves," said Millicent.

"Do you think that a love is the richer or the poorer for another love having gone before?" Harry went on.

"I think that too; all depends on what the first love was, and how it was lost," answered poor Millicent.

"I think, then, that I understand you hold the good, old-fashioned belief that there can be but one love, in the supreme sense, for each life?" observed Mr. Westbrook.

"I do think so," said Millicent, raising her dark eyes, where the passionate enthusiasm of youth was not dead, but only sleeping. "I do not believe in 'second love,' as the phrase is often used. I believe in the love that goes on into heaven. In an utter misconception of what love is, lay the grossness of the Sadducees' question about the woman with the seven husbands."

"And yet many second marriages are very happy," said Henry.

"Of course they are," Millicent argued. "Sometimes the second marriage and not the first is the real soul-marriage, and at other times it is a solid and substantial friendship, which after all is nearly as high as love and almost as beautiful, but different."

"And the last is like some so-called 'first love,'" said Harry.

"Yes, that is just so," Millicent answered, knowing in her heart that he was thinking of his own story, "and sometimes they are only blocks for love to be fitted upon, as it were, till it is ready for its proper wearer," and then she knew in her heart that she was thinking of her own.

"What do you think makes a true soul-marriage?" asked Harry.

"When two grow together, and because they are together grow the faster to the full stature possible to their natures," said Millicent, "while in the dearest friendship they may grow apart, and to different heights, till there is little in common between them but the old kindliness."

"Ah, and how precious that is!" said Mr. Westbrook. "If in youth there is a charm in very novelty, as we grow older the dust Time leaves behind him turns to gold."

"That is so true," Millicent responded.

"Let us turn down this way," said Mr. Westbrook, pausing at the end of a lane, where houses were but sparsely scattered between the hedgerows. "It will make our walk home the longer."

Millicent hesitated just half a minute, and then obeyed. Henry Westbrook was a wise man. That little complaisance put a great deal of courage in his voice, when he said presently,— "Millicent, do you think you could marry me?"

"I might try, if I were asked," she answered, with a smile about her mouth, though there were tears in her eyes. The pair had come to that time of life when sentiment masquerades in humour.

"You know I've had a 'first love,'" said Henry. "But we are quits, for I'm quite sure you have. It was not that good David Maxwell, and it couldn't be that humbug, Fergus Laurie; yet it seems to me to lie between those two. I think you ought to tell me all about it."

"It was between them," Millicent confessed, with tears brimming over. "They were together, you see, like a bright lantern and a dark one. And the light of the one shone on the other, and the shadow of the other overspread the one. There was a hero and there was a nothing, and I mistook them, don't you see. I made my love upon the block and fancied it was the real man, and only found out the mistake when he did not want it, not even for a shroud!"

Harry Westbrook caressed the hand that lay trembling on his arm. "I think we both got lost in the same jungle," said he. "There was a sister and a wife, and years ago I mistook them."

The playfulness of his tone did not jar the tenderness at Milly's heart. The analogy was fitting. He understood.

"We will both love Hatty better than ever," he went on, "and we will both pray for Fergus Laurie, and if—if we are ever very nearly concerned in naming a little boy-child, we will call him David Maxwell."

"Only—only"—and Millicent's proud head was bowed, and her tears came very fast. "only I feel so afraid that David's life lost something. He gave, but he never got. I don't mean that my love was any loss," she said. "I can't be sure that he ever cared for it. The kind of love I had then was not worth anything—it is worth more now."

because something of him is in it somehow, Harry. But I feel as if he missed something."

"No, Millicent," said her lover. "God has a secret for such as he. Be quite sure of that. And just fancy God keeping a secret for one! What must it not be when his common words are blessings and his open ways make straight the 'Crooked Places?' Such as David are the heirs of God's 'Last things,' and remember what His 'last things' mean—'Every man at the beginning doth set forth good wine; but thou hast kept the good wine until now.'"

CHAPTER III.—MADE STRAIGHT.

HENRY WESTBROOK and Millicent Harvey were married. A very, very quiet wedding, with no bridesmaids, and even Harriet and Christian only sitting in a pew as "friends." The bride's dress scarcely marked her as a bride. And during their six weeks of beautiful travel in Switzerland they might have been an easy middle-aged pair, taking a rest and a breathing-time on the summit of life, preparatory to jogging down hill together.

They came home, and settled down in an old house at Tottenham, an old red house with old brown rooms, and an old green garden. The Westbrooks were rich people in their quiet way, but they took so many duties along with their wealth, that they still got some pleasure out of their money. It was still a personal treat when they ventured to appropriate a trifle of their wealth for the purchase of an ebony cabinet, or a bit of old red or blue china. And affluent matron as she was, if Millicent still occasionally forgot to put on new gloves quite as soon as she ought, and absolutely neglected to purchase a sealskin jacket or an Indian shawl, till Hatty carried her to do so in triumph, and would not let her off with anything but the best in the best shop—at any rate Millicent never forgot anybody's birthday.

God sent two little children to the quaint roomy house, that seemed as ready for them as an old elm-tree for nests. "Elizabeth" came first, and was old enough to have a doll before "David" arrived. Dear Grandmamma Harvey gets into trouble about those children. Mamma says they really must not go to see her so often, she spoils them so. Poor grandmamma says that it is the spirit of the age that has demoralised her, she is sure she used to be a good disciplinarian; but she thinks the spirit of every age always demoralised grandmamas! Every day she promises to keep them in better order, if they only come again to-morrow. Little rogues! they ransack the sacred old workbox that her own grown-up daughters think it almost sacrilege to look into. They find the funny old yellow card whereon "Mrs. Devon (long since dead) desired her compliments and hoped that Mr. Harvey and his sister would give her the pleasure of their company at the Vicarage on a certain date." Fancy grandmamma keeping that. How funny! They run off, shouting, to show it to mamma, who takes it tenderly, as if it were a bit of her mother's heart.

All the Webbers—Richard, James, and Ellen—are married. Richard is in Calais, Ellen in the Isle of Wight, and James in Dublin. Mr. Webber's business is chiefly in the hands of managers now, and he and Hatty spend a great deal of time visiting among their children. Hatty's "step-daughters-in-law" all like her so well that their own mothers are in danger of being a little jealous, or would be, only that Hatty conciliates them by the way in which she says,—

"I'm not a mother-in-law, you see. I'm only Dick's stepmother—no real relation at all; don't you understand?" And when the mothers by blood want to give a little advice, they sometimes come to Hatty to suggest it, "because, you know, it is ticklish for relations to interfere. Young people think they are presuming on their rights, but our Dick, or my Jane, will be sure to listen kindly to you, as a friend." And Hatty always gives the advice, and the young people are generally under the impression that they asked her for it and got exactly what they wanted.

George and Christian are living where they did. Their boy Robert is a young man now, and has just taken holy orders. But he is not going to settle in England. He will presently start for the Far West of America, where he is to minister to a little township where the people will all be like himself—emigrants from the old country. They are all going from a certain western shire, in a village of which Robert Harvey is now serving as curate; James Webber, who is a doctor, is, with his young wife, determined to go too. "It is to-day's version of the Pilgrim Fathers," says Christian. "It is your poems in a crystal, my husband. And as for America being very far away, hearts make tracks," she adds, "and heaven is everywhere, and nobody are separated but those who will not be together." And she thinks of Fergus Laurie, who has been in England again and again since he migrated, and yet David's Prayer-Book is still left in her keeping. Christian has written out David's message concerning it, and the paper is laid inside the book, and the book is made up into a parcel, with "Mr. Fergus Laurie" put outside. It may reach Fergus some day yet. Who knows? None but God.

And here we leave the Harveys. Our story has come round to those with whom it started. Elizabeth Harvey, the widow, and Cicely Brook, the spinster, are left together in their little leafy cottage. They will have it so. They have not a want unsupplied, but Mrs. Harvey will not leave the old place for any of her children's houses. She tells Millicent (she finds there are now some things which Millicent understands better even than Christian) "I've never lived in a house with a master since I lost my Peter—your father, my dear, whom you do not much remember. I'd rather go on as I am."

The two old ladies talk over their simple, ancient gossip, and patiently darn their old lace (they will not have any new) and puzzle their failing eyes over their old books. "Spectacles and all, it takes me a minute to make out a word now," says Mrs. Harvey; "but somehow there seems a great deal more in it. I think we mostly read too fast, especially in our Bibles."

There is an old hymn which Mrs. Harvey is always crooning when she is left alone. She has it in manuscript, and she has set it herself to a favourite old tune. She has taught it to Bessie and Davie Westbrook. It is sweetly touching to hear them singing it—the dear old cracked voice and the pretty trebles. Sometimes all the family sing it when they are gathered together.

Listen to their blended voices! There are lines in that plain old hymn that seem made for each :—

“ Take the praise we bring Thee, Lord,
Something more than what we speak,
For the love within us feels
Words uncertain, cold, and weak.
Thoughts that rise and tears that fall,
Praise Thee better : Take them all !
Looking back the way we've come,
What a sight, O Lord, we see,
All the failure in ourselves,
All the love and strength in Thee.
Yet it seemed so dark before,
Would that we had trusted more !

We will shun no future storm,
Sure Thy voice is in its wind ;
We'll confront each coming cloud,
Sure the sun is bright behind :
Praying then, or praising now,
Only wilt Thou teach us how !

Use us for Thy glory, Lord,
In the way that seemeth right,
Whether but to wait and watch,
Or to gird our limbs and fight.
Marching on, or standing still,
Each is best, when 'tis Thy will.

When at last the end shall come,
What, O Lord, is Death but this,
Door of our dear Father's home,
Entrance into perfect bliss,
Peril past, and labour done,
Sorrow over, peace begun !”

The End.

MUSINGS AT EVENTIDE.

I.—SUNLIGHT AND SHADOW.

SUNLIGHT and shadow play upon the hills,
And chase each other on the restless waves,
Seeming to follow but their own sweet wills,
Yet to the powers above them faithful slaves,— Reflecting every changing cloud with ease,
Stirr'd by a leaf, and dancing with the breeze.

Oh, blessèd shadows ! who so kind as you,
So patient, humble, generous, and good ?
Obedient to the sun, and ever true,
Your presence beautifies the roughest road,
Lends to the sternest rock a tender grace,
And throws a charm upon the meanest place.

Oh, blessèd lights that make the shadows sweet,
That make the world so exquisitely fair !
Life is more full when lights and shadows meet
Than in the midnight gloom or noonday glare ;
And human hearts have little tenderness
Till grief and joy have met in fond caress.

II.—SUGGESTED BY THE CONTROVERSY ON PRAYER.

Wouldst thou then know the power of prayer ?
Walk with thy God, and pray ;
Just as a little child who asks
To learn his father's way :

Not doubting him, but looking up
And learning evermore ;
Thou canst not pray, unless thy heart
Will lovingly adore.

To ask a sign is unbelief—
Signs meet thee all around ;
In cloud and sun, in air and sea,
And on the hard cold ground.

If sternest Winter yields at last Beneath Spring's tender kiss,

Colder than Winter is the heart
That finds no sign in this.

If the sun's power can turn the clouds
That darken all the earth
To rainbow-coloured hues and tears
That give the flowers their birth,

Oh, may the Light that lights the sun
Do what is harder still—
Melt into tears the unbelief
That clouds man's darkened will!

Then will life's flowers bud forth and grow,
An Eden everywhere;
And none will ask, for all will know,
What is the power of prayer!

J. BESEMERES.

GOD'S JUDGMENTS.

Being Thoughts on the Fiftieth Psalm.

BY PRINCIPAL CANDLISH, D.D.

III.—RECKONING WITH THE FALSE AND SELF-DECEIVED.

THOSE with whom the Lord is now about to deal, in this judicial investigation or precognition, as it were, anticipating the final judgment, are professedly members of the Church—of the society or community cited collectively (ver. 5) as the Lord's saints, or holy ones; who have made a covenant with him by sacrifice. They themselves claim that character; and in that character they present themselves to God and to their fellow-men. This is implied in the indignant reproof with which the Judge meets them:—"But unto the wicked God saith, What hast thou to do to declare my statutes, or that thou shouldst take my covenant in thy mouth?" (ver. 16.)

They declare the Lord's statutes; his statutes of holiness and love; and by these they profess to stand. Not only so. They take his covenant in their mouth. They openly and solemnly own adherence and obligation to the covenant with God made by sacrifice. They receive with their lips literally the seal and pledge of its sanctity. So they come to be among the number of those whom the Lord, the Judge, is entitled, in this great assize, to call before him as bearing the character of holiness; and standing to him in the relation of reconciliation through the blood of atonement; bound therefore to make good that character and standing.

This is a serious thought for all professing

Christians. Come forth, O thou, whoever thou art, who namest the name of Christ—thou who avowest thyself a Christian—thou who wouldest not for the world be thought to have abandoned thy faith in Christ and thy hope of heaven; come out of thy hiding-place, whatever it may be; come "stripped naked of all but conscience into the open presence of the Holy One!" To be tried! tried! And upon what issue? Art thou what thou wouldest have thy God, or thy fellow-man, or even thyself, take thee to be?

Nor will it avail you to take shelter in any subterfuge; as for instance, in any supposed distinction, even in the Church itself, between the unequivocally devout and a less decided class. You do not aspire to be so very holy or to live so very near to God as some who are accounted eminent saints, and whose right to be so accounted you would be the last to question. The test of spirituality which they can stand might be too high for you. Beware of such a snare. The plea does not really satisfy yourself. It cannot satisfy your God. Debateable ground is always dangerous; evasion is dishonourable. Rather submit yourself out and out to be searched and tried now in the day of grace. It will be all the better for you in the day of judgment.

Let the trial then proceed. The indictment, so to speak, is framed with four successive counts; all turning virtually and substantially upon the command, "Be not conformed to the world." The instances specified of unsteadfastness and perfidiousness in the Lord's covenant, which you take in your mouth, are, in an advancing series, or a declining one; all of them in the line of worldly conformity.

L "Seeing thou hatest instruction, and castest my words behind thee" (ver. 17).

The first evil symptom pointed out is impatience of the Lord's discipline; his chastening and his teaching. The instruction here said to be hated is properly correction, chastisement, smiting (as in Jer. ii. 30; Prov. xxii. 15; xxiii. 13); or what partakes of that character and tends in that direction; warning, admonition, reproof (as in Prov. i. 8; v. 12; Ezek. v. 15).

That is the double meaning of the word "instruction." In that view it fits well into the other term here used to denote the Lord's gracious and salutary dealing with you; his words, his sayings, his teachings.

For these are the two component parts of that discipline of the Lord which you are charged with disliking and despising. What now have you to say to this charge?

Let it be assumed that you are the children of your Father in heaven, and that He is training you and guiding you as his children, as a father on earth trains and guides his son. You are yourself a father. How would you wish and expect your twofold discipline to be taken if your son is dutiful, respectful, loving? You have occasion to inflict upon him some merited punishment, or to threaten him with the infliction of it. He is sullen and sore displeased, and thinks he does well, or has cause, to be angry. If he may not venture to be openly insolent or contumacious, he nurses his wrath in secret. He resents the injury or affront which he thinks he has received, and broods over it gloomily. Or you take pains to teach and inform him as to what is right for him and safe. You tell him what you yourself know of life and duty. You converse with him affectionately, familiarly, confidentially. Alas! you are grieved to see, instead of the frank response of interest and attention, symptoms all too plain of weariness. Nay, in the slightly curled or pouting lip you detect the supercilious air of something like contempt, if not disgust, with which he listens. You painfully perceive that in his own esteem at least he is growing too wise to need such commonplace lecturing as yours; that your homely counsels and old-fashioned maxims command his regard no more.

Is there never any approach to a state of mind like that in your manner of submission to the Lord's twofold discipline?

First, as to correction, whether actually inflicted or only threatened. When God visits you with trial, how do you feel and act? You do not outwardly complain, nor even inwardly do you actually rebel. You make conscience of schooling or forcing your heart into an attitude of resignation. Nay, you really and honestly try to "be still and know that he is God; to be dumb, not opening your mouth, because it is God that does it." But ah! may it not be the resignation, the silence, the dumbness, of enforced and reluctant acquiescence? You dare not murmur. You will not fight against God. His will be done! But in your inmost soul there is a sense of your being specially unfortunate at least, if not specially ill-treated and ill-used. The burden is very heavy. You resolve through grace to bear it. But it is as in a mood of blank and calm despair!

Is it thus that, as a child of God, you should be affected when in fatherly wisdom and fatherly love he reproves and chastens?

Ah! when, instead of meekly accepting the punishment of your sin, and humbling yourself under his mighty hand, leaning your aching head on his bosom, going to him with the very wound his stroke is causing, opening your heart to him about it, expostulating even and remonstrating concerning its severity; yet still saying, "Though he slay me I will trust in him;"—asking him to show you its occasion and design, and to heal it when it has done its work;—then and not before; when, instead of thus pouring your loud moan into his ear, or your silent groan, as David did, or a greater than David, who "in the days of his flesh made supplication with strong crying and tears;"—you choose to keep your burning emotions pent up in your own breast, and will not speak as a weeping child to a loving father, but chafe and vex yourself in an iron effort of endurance;—can it be said of you that you take in good part the chastening of the Lord? Are you not rather "like a bullock unaccustomed to the yoke?" Is it not the carnal mind still working in you in subordination to the law of your God?

For, secondly, as to his words,—are you not, in such a frame of mind, apt to put them away? They weary you, these words even of wisest counsel and tenderest pity,—words most precious in season. They fall dull and heavy on your ears. Even when the Spirit brings to your remembrance what Christ has said, it is felt to be dull and stale: as if one were cramming you with old saws against the stomach of your sense, trying to 'charm ache with air and agony with words; to patch grief with proverbs.' The very Bible palls upon you. Its best lessons vex; its choicest consolations jar upon you.

Oh! beware of this first symptom of your heart not being right with God; of a worldly spirit supplanting in you the spirit of adoption. It is the beginning of what may prove a sad decline. Grieve not the Holy Spirit of God by refusing to fall in with your heavenly Father's discipline and teaching. Search me, O Lord, in this particular. Let me not despise Thy chastening, O Lord! or Thy words!

II. "When thou sawest a thief, then thou consentedst with him, and hast been partaker with adulterers" (ver. 18).

This is the second count in the indictment. It goes beyond the first. It indicates a farther step in the line of declension. The previous charge implied a departure from good; a decline from the right and safe position of sympathy with the discipline of godliness. Here there is sympathy with the principles and practices of the world of ungodliness.

Observe what is the precise charge at this stage. It is not that you yourself commit the sins named, or that any one of you is actually a thief or an adulterer. It is that in some way, and to some extent, you are fellow-partakers, or have fellow-feeling with other men in the commission of these sins. Observe the special danger here. It is very seductive and insidious.

You live in a circle within which there is large allowance made for liberties taken with the exact claims of equity between man and man; and with what is due to the preservation of personal purity, and strict chastity in heart, speech, and behaviour. It may be a circle which owns the law of decency, and of honour; perhaps even the law of chivalry as well. The men with whom you associate would repudiate with indignant scorn the imputation of a lie. They would be the last to make a prey of unsuspecting innocence. You are not the accomplice of thieves liable to be brought to criminal trial. You are not in the confidence of actual seducers, or of reckless profligates. The people with whom you consent, and with whom you are partakers, are not, in so broad and coarse a sense of the terms, thieves and adulterers. Nor is your consent or concurrence so deliberate and wilful as to imply actual partnership or participation in any such practices. But what then? What are they? What is their honesty? What is their purity? And how do you think and feel as regard either or both?

I must use great plainness of speech here. Thieves. Adulterers. Let the two opprobrious names be taken apart. They indicate the two different sets of worldly men, or the two different sorts of worldly manners, in one or other of whose entanglements you, as Christian professors, halting or hesitating, are but too apt to be ensnared.

Thieves! These are the world's covetous men; unscrupulous in their covetousness; or skilful in overcoming scruples. The world of trade and commerce; the business world, putting forth its eager activity in the counting-house, or the shop, or the writing-chambers; at the exchange or market-place;—has not, even among its own frequenters, any very high reputation for truth, or honesty, or honour. It is with a smile and pleasant jest, or at the utmost a passing frown, that any story is received which tells of gain shrewdly got by skill as against simplicity. What do you say to all that? Does it shock or scandalize you? Or is there a suppressed smile on your lips when you hear of such successful policy? and a wide mantle in your hand ready to be cast over such questionable proceedings?

Adulterers! A strong and coarse word! To charge the Church, or any portion of it, with such gross fellowship! How strange! But yet, look at the world of gaiety, as distinguished from the world of gain. And look at the attitude of many professing Christians towards it. If avarice or hasting to be rich, even on the verge of fraud, is the characteristic of the world of gain, is not luxury ever lapsing into lust, the characteristic of the world of gaiety? Luxury of the senses, of the palate, of the tastes, grosser or more refined; luxury, whether gratifying the animal appetites and instincts, or ministering to the higher sensibilities that are carried captive by the beautiful, the harmonious, the graceful, the sublime; luxury, with far too thin a partition from lust; is it not the atmosphere of fashionable life?—the intoxicating vapour breathed in circles in which it is "idlesse all,"—idle sentiment and idle mirth. And how do you, as Christians, stand affected toward it? Is there a prompt and holy recoil from its light frivolity;—a manly and godly protest against its aimless, listless, heartless effeminacy? Or are you beginning to inhale the seductive vapour, to tolerate the gay world's luxury; or, for I must speak it plainly, to tolerate the gay world's lust?

Beware of a very subtle snare in this matter. You may say and think that it is not for their success in the arts of gain, or for their loose habits of indulgence, that you frequent the company of your worldly associates. It is for some better tastes and tendencies which you have the discernment to detect, the candour to acknowledge, the tact to draw out. Lay not any such flattering unction to your soul. It is, I repeat, a snare. The very complacency of your supposed discovery betrays you. The conceit of your discrimination is your danger. You who can so well distinguish what is good in your associates from what is evil, may safely venture to have fellowships that might damage weaker brethren. So you think you may touch pitch and not be defiled. For your own sakes I say, Beware!

And for the sake of the lost world, for the sake of perishing souls, for the sake of victims betrayed, and prodigals yearning to return, for the sake of a loving Saviour waiting to be gracious, I say, Beware!

Men are startled now from time to time by alarming disclosures of gigantic fraud and shameless profligacy; morals and manners growing more and more loose. It might almost seem as if it were forgotten that "a false balance is an abomination to the Lord," that "whoremongers and adulterers," however society may regard them, "God will judge." Is the Church lifting up a decided enough protest? Is she denouncing with enough of energy in her own members whatever savours of these sins, or tends towards them? Are you individually keeping yourselves with enough of care, and your households, and all who will hear you, from these contaminations? Oh! see to it that, in addition to all else you may do to purify and elevate life all around you, you yourselves, and all who are yours, are clear from the imputation of "consenting with a thief or being partakers with adulterers," let the names by which they pass current in the world be as smooth and decent as they may. For any fault or failure in this matter soon leads on to what is the third count in the indictment:

III. "Thou givest thy mouth to evil, and thy tongue frameth deceit" (ver. 19).

The charge now is that of a reckless use of the faculty and opportunity of speech. The mouth is opened for evil. The tongue is loosed for folly and falsehood. The Lord's solemn warning is to be applied at this stage:—"Every idle word that men speak, they shall give account thereof at the day of judgment." It is a searching test. And it may well be so. For "out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh." The proud challenge of the ungodly is, "Our lips are our own, who is Lord over us?" The sad cry of the smitten penitent is, "Woe is me, for the uncleanness of my lips." And the sacrifice of praise, which, on the faith of the great sacrifice of atonement, you are to be offering continually, is "the fruit of your lips," cleansed and consecrated by the touch of "a live coal from off the altar." Your prayer, under every fresh experience of the Lord's mercy to yourself, and every fresh impulse to speak of that mercy to others, is, "Open Thou my lips, and my mouth shall show forth Thy praise." The joy of eternity will be to sing with your lips the worthiness of the Lamb that was slain.

Ah! what preparation are you making for this gracious use of your lips on earth, and this glorious use of them in heaven? Is it using them to join with the giddy throng in their idle words and their talk of lying vanities? When you go into the world you hear on every side the language of frivolity and untruthfulness. You dwell among a people of unclean lips. At first, and for a while, in seeing and hearing, you may "vex your righteous soul." In the company of associates, whom you will not, perhaps cannot well, shake off, you witness many things, and are forced to listen to many things that pain and grieve you. You cannot altogether restrain yourselves. You show displeasure. You hint disapproval and dislike. But soon you find that, if you are to be among them at all, it must be as silent endurers, not reprovers, of what is going on. You become schooled to good manners. You take no offence, and you give none. Gradually you are drawn in to bear your share in the genial flow of kindly familiarity and good fellowship. You join lightly in the conversation. You pass the flippant jest, the questionable tale. You can smile at evil, and dissemble truth, and make a mock of sin, and now and then trifle playfully with holy things as freely as the very best of your companions,—or the very worst of them.

And what next? Ah! what next? Satan has well-nigh got you as his own. One more step becomes all but unavoidable.

IV. "Thou sittest and speakest against thy brother; thou slanderest thine own mother's son" (ver. 20).

This surely is a charge fitted to startle and alarm: an accusation that may well call for serious and solemn dealing.

Look at that poor outcast, long since a wanderer from his early home, his father's dwelling. See him herding with the crew of profligates, by whose flattery and fair speech he has been seduced first, and then betrayed. He is at one of their bacchanalian orgies, seated with them at the table of drunkenness and debauchery. He is talking with them, alas, how familiarly! about their clever tricks and vile intrigues; their schemes of fraud; their lawless pleasures. You perceive that he has ceased to be shocked at anything that is done or said. Ribaldry, profanity, scoffing at truth, indecency, he can now, to any extent almost, endure or welcome. But hark! What noise is heard? What uproar breaks the harmony? One bolder than the rest has dared to utter a vile taunt against the home of that poor wanderer's early days—to question his father's truth, his mother's love—to insinuate a doubt of his brother's honour or his sister's fair name. The outcast's heart is stabbed. His blood is all on fire. He starts to his feet and clenches his angry hand. Woe betide the dastard caitiff who has ventured to touch the tender chord that still beats true in the exile's lone and desolate breast.

Ah! but if he sits mute under the cruel and unmanly outrage; if he takes quietly the unworthy insult; if, instead of resenting it, he is even heard to join in the abuse heaped upon the inmates of his childhood's pure abode, you turn away with sad and sickened heart. The last corruption of the deadly plague is upon him. He has no vestige, no remnant, of nature's kindness any more. He has ceased to be a man. You feel that you can but leave him in dark despair to his inevitable doom.

You see the parallel, and can make the application. On the downward sliding scale of your sad return to folly in a foolish world, you may reach sooner than you think even such a depth as I have indicated. Nay, the alarming symptom may come out very early. Mark how insidiously the subtle poison works.

On the one hand, to go back for a moment to the previous part of the Psalm (vers. 14, 15), you cease in your intercourse with God to be Israelites indeed in whom is no guile; offering to God thanksgiving; paying your vows; calling upon Him in trouble. Your religion begins again to be formal, ceremonial, self-righteous; a sort of attempt to please God by outward services, while the heart is not right with Him. There is no longer a clear understanding of the footing on which you should be with God as his holy ones covenanting with Him by sacrifice.

Then, on the other hand, flowing from this estrangement, and from the suspicion and dislike which it engenders,—First, There is a growing impatience of God's ways of dealing with you; his wholesome teaching, and salutary discipline. Secondly, There is a growing tolerance of the world's ungodly men and corrupt manners; a growing familiarity with evil. Thirdly, There is a growing disposition to take part in the world's loose talk; its vain and frivolous and false conversation. Fourthly, There is a growing willingness to uncover the nakedness of fathers and brethren in the household of God. You rather like to censure and criticize the righteous;—as if their infirmities might hide or excuse your faults. It comes to be a relief to you to hear a godly friend's character assailed. You are the easier for some good story about him lightly circulating round the company. A pang of shame may perhaps shoot across your bosom as you suffer your features to relax into a smile; you may have some misgivings as you suppress the word of explanation or defence that conscience is moving you to utter. But it does not last. You begin to relish tales that bring ridicule or discredit on Christian friends as heartily as any of your companions, and to tell them with as rich humour and as good a zest. It is high time surely to pause, to think, to tremble.

I have a few words to say about the closing verses of the Psalm. They indicate at once the root of the sad tendency towards backsliding and apostasy; and the only effectual remedy or safeguard against it.

1. "These things hast thou done, and I kept silence; thou thoughtest that I was altogether such an one as thyself: but I will reprove thee, and set them in order before thine eyes. Now consider this, ye that forget God, lest I tear you in pieces, and there be none to deliver" (vers. 21, 22). Forgetfulness is the charge here; forgetfulness of God; forgetfulness of his being a reprover, a setter in order, a tearer in pieces, with none to deliver. All that is traced up to his keeping silence; and to the misconstruction of his keeping silence; as if it warranted the thought of his being altogether such an one as ourselves. It is "the error of the wicked," against which the Apostle

Peter thinks it needful to warn even the faithful (2 Peter iii. 17), "Beware lest ye also"—even ye—"being led away with the error of the wicked, fall from your own steadfastness." It is the error of the wicked, "the scoffers who are to come in the last days, walking after their own lusts and saying, Where is the promise of his coming?" But it is an error with which you may be led away. For it is the error of the natural mind, misreading or misinterpreting the silent forbearance and long-suffering patience of God. It is a deep and deadly error, and lies at the foundation of all that loose and careless way of walking with God which exposes even his own people to the risk of being drawn away, or "falling from their steadfastness." It is the error of reckoning on impunity or indulgence; fancying that some venial instances of infidelity may be overlooked; putting back and far away the thought of a strictly righteous judicial reckoning; relying on indiscriminating mercy. Be sure that when that error leads you away—be the deviation ever so small—be it that in a single insignificant particular you are tempted secretly to say, as you venture on a doubtful liberty, "This may escape notice, or may not demand investigation," you really run all the risk of that onward and downward course which issues in the bold defiance—"Where is the God of judgment?" or at least in the fond imagination, "He is such an one as myself."

2. "Whoso offereth praise glorifieth me: and to him that ordereth his conversation aright will I show the salvation of God"

(ver. 23). Your real and only security lies in the line of the positive and active Christian life; offering praise such as is glorifying to God; ordering your conversation so that He may show you his salvation. For the Christian life, to be a reality, must be not a mere No, but a decided Yes! Not refusing to go back, but resolving through grace to go forward! To be safe you must be busy; for

"Satan finds some mischief still For idle hands to do."

Busy? About what? The praise of God and your own highest good; the glorifying of God and the right ordering of your whole conduct; and that with a view to see more and more of the salvation of God. Let there be a high and holy ambition in your souls to "grow in grace and in the knowledge of your Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ." For it is not the offering of praise that in itself will avail anything, but the giving of all glory to God; the owning of his sovereignty in the gospel of his Son. It is not the right ordering of your conversation, your conduct, in his sight, but his showing you his salvation. Follow on to know the Lord more fully. Let Him be all your salvation and all your desire. Be ever growing up into Him who is the Head, in all things. "O magnify the Lord with me, and let us exalt his name together. Let us worship the Lord in the beauty of holiness. Let us wait upon the Lord that we may renew our strength; that we may mount up with wings like eagles, that we may run and not be weary, that we may walk and not faint."

SEPTEMBER.

AN April burst of beauty,
And a May like the Mays of old,
And a glow of summer gladness
While June her long days told;

And a hush of golden silence
All through the bright July,
Without one peal of thunder
Or a storm-wreath in the sky;

And a fiery reign of August,
Till the moon was on the wane,
And then short clouded evenings
And a long and chilling rain.

I thought the summer was over,
And the whole year's glory spent,
And that nothing but fog and drizzle
Could be for Autumn meant:

Nothing but dead leaves falling
Wet on the damp, dark mould,
Less and less of the sunshine,
More and more of the cold.

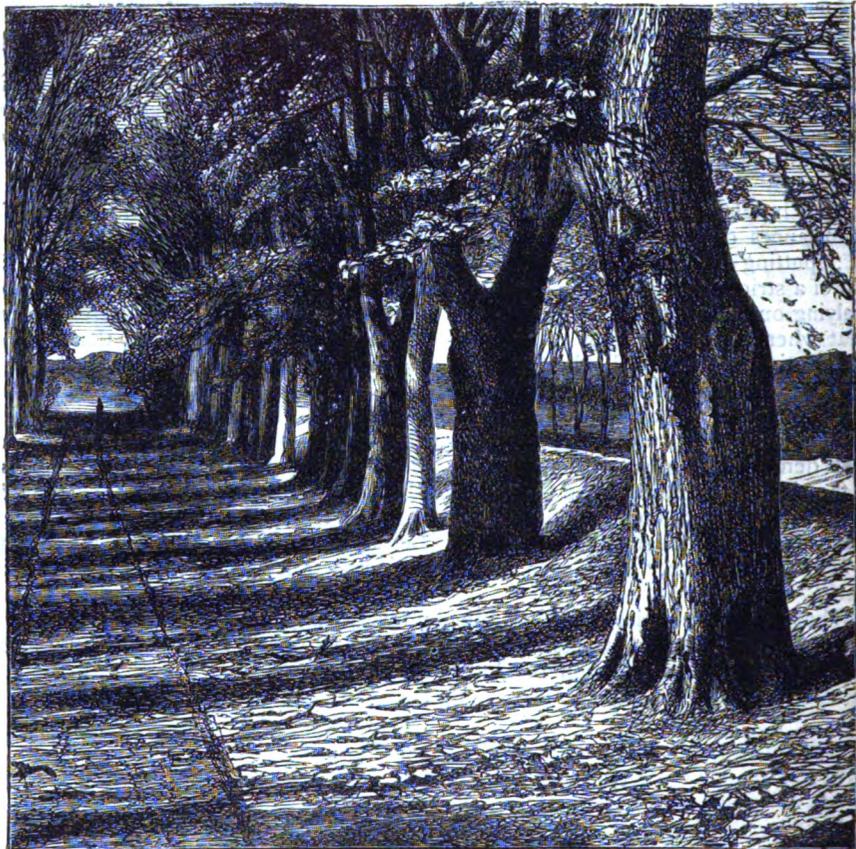

But oh! the golden day-time;
And oh! the silver nights;
And the scarlet touch on the fir-trunks
Of the calm grand sunset lights!

And the morning's bright revealings,
Lifting the pearly mist,
Like a bridal veil, from the valley
That the sun hath claimed and kissed;

And oh! the noontide shadows,
Longer and longer now
On the river margin resting,
Like the tress on a thoughtful brow.

Rich fruitage bends the branches
With amber, and rose, and gold,
O'er the purple and crimson asters,
And geraniums gay and bold.

The day is warm and glowing,
But the night is cool and sweet;
And we fear no smiting arrows
Of fierce and fatal heat.

The leaves are only dropping
Like flakes of a sunset cloud;
And the robin's song is clearer
Than Spring's own minstrel crowd.

A soft new robe of greenness
Decks every sunny mead;
And we own that bright September
Is beautiful indeed.

Is thy life-summer passing?
Think not thy joys are o'er!
Thou hast not seen what Autumn
For thee may have in store.

Calmer than breezy April,
Cooler than August blaze,
The fairest time of all may be September's golden days.

Press on, though Summer waneth,
And falter not, nor fear,
For God can make the Autumn
The glory of the year.

THE FUTURE OF THE WORKING CLASSES.

VI.—THE WORKMAN OUT OF HARNESS.

THE Englishman's house is his castle."

It may be a very good proverb to denote the Englishman's theoretical freedom, but it is rather grotesque when you come to particulars. When you inquire about this same castle, it becomes too often a castle in the air, or, rather, a castle underground—the donjon-keep, and nothing more. A cellar or a garret—a single room with half a window—an airless, cheerless, lifeless enclosure, as if constructed on principle to banish sunshine, propagate disease, and accelerate death. Of all material things that concern the comfort and general elevation of the workman of the future, during the very important part of his time which he spends out of harness, the most important by far is this castle. Of all the advices that could be given to the head of a household who has secured better wages and more leisure, and wishes to know to what use to turn them, the most urgent, so far as outward things go, is: Get into a better house. Make a solemn league and covenant against darkness, dirt, and damp; secure as much space as you can, the more the better; and let the house not only be well-built, but well-aired, well-lighted, and well-looking. If possible, let it be your own property. The wholesomeness of your dwelling, in its influence both on the mind and the body of yourself and of your family, depends far more on such things than is dreamt of by many.

But if it be needful to look to the quality of the house, much more is it needful to look to the quality of its living furniture. We are not going to repeat what has been said so often and so well about the housekeeper, —or dwell on her blessed function to make home bright and happy, and by the glow of the fireside, and the glow of a loving heart, by her blitheness, as the Scotch ballad expresses it, "but and ben," create an attraction that, out of harness, no husband can resist. We are not going to dwell on the duty of the husband to foster by kind and considerate conduct this radiant spirit in his wife, nor on the duty of the wife to strive to cherish it, even through all the chill and frost of a bad husband's bitter temper. We would rather spend a few moments in glancing at another aspect of the subject,—nothing less than the question, what means can be taken to secure that, with God's blessing, the young women of the working classes of the future shall be better fitted for the momentous duties of wives and mothers?

It is a question of the utmost possible interest, however trifling it may seem to some. Many a young woman becomes a wife with little or no capacity to make her home bright and attractive, and turns out, as the case may be, a slut, or a gossip, a vixen, a drunkard, or a thief. Is there no way of so preparing young women for their future duties that, at the firesides of our working men, treasures and jewels shall be multiplied tenfold, and the homes over which they preside shall be filled with "glints and gleams of heaven?"

Intensely vital though this question is, and much though it is pondered by many Christian philanthropists in the middle and upper classes,—by clergymen, authors, the promoters of mothers' meetings, educators, and the like,—it does not yet appear to have taken much hold of the working classes themselves, or of those among them who are forward to advance their interests. May we hope ere long to see it otherwise? To find working people taking a most lively interest in the question, What is the best education for girls? and what are the employments most fitted to prepare them for family duties? What can be done to chain the demon of licentiousness, which, worse than Sphinx or Minotaur of old, drags so many poor maidens to a beastly life and a horrid death? Is there no way of checking the inordinate love of finery in dress, and the still more pernicious thirst for frivolity and worse than frivolity in literature? What are the influences of example, of education, and, above all, of religion, that are best fitted to rear a race of intelligent, pure-minded, true-hearted women, who shall be a crown to their husbands, and whose children shall arise and call them blessed?

We start the question, but we have no time to linger over it. We must say, however, that we should have better hopes for the future of the working classes if we saw it looked at by them as earnestly as it is by some of their friends outside. We cannot readily forget, in this connection, the efforts of the late Mrs. Ellis, wife of the well-known Mr. Ellis, of Madagascar. She had spent her life in teaching girls of the middle and upper classes of England, and in writing books chiefly for that circle. Not far from fourscore years, the thought struck her forcibly that in these days of Mechanics' Institutes and popular lectures, many young men of the working class were getting beyond the point at which the young women of the same class were intellectually fitted to be their companions. To remedy this defect, to draw out the intellect of servant girls and others of the same rank, to lead them to use their minds, and to enlarge their conceptions, she formed a young women's class for common things. One night the subject would be astronomy. She would ask their theories of the stars. One girl said they were lamps hung in heaven; another, holes which the glory of heaven shone through. Some outline would then be given by Mrs. Ellis of the wonders of astronomy. Another evening, the conversation would be about books. What, after the Bible, do you consider the most useful book ever written? One answered, the Pilgrim's Progress; another—of the utilitarian stamp—Bradshaw's Railway Guide. There would follow an hour's talk on useful books, including a right estimate of the trash so often devoured. Other friends not less zealous have helped to teach girls of the working class how to knit or sew, how to cook and how to nurse, how to manage children, and generally, as far as instruction can go, how to make home bright and happy. And, more or less directly and earnestly, most of those of whom we now write have sought above all things to bring the soul under the saving influence of that divine grace which alone can truly fit either men or women for their highest functions. When will the day come when working people shall not only allow such things to be done by others, but actively and earnestly prosecute them themselves?

But much though we value home and its influences, we are well aware that the social cravings implanted in our nature prompt men to seek for a wider fellowship with their kind, when out of harness, than the members of their own families supply. And it is one of the advantages which the lot of the middle and upper classes has over that of the lower, that it gives them better opportunity for cultivating social life. The size of their houses, the extent of their means, and the assistance of their servants, make it comparatively easy for them to enjoy the society of friends; while for others the absence of these conditions makes it impossible. The cultivation of social life may, indeed, be said to be one of the chief distinctions of the aristocratic class; it lies to them to find out and put in practice all that goes to make the intercourse of friends agreeable; to form that code of social law which represses improprieties, and smoothes the tone of speech and manners; and by tact and courtesy towards those whom they bring together, to make the gifts and qualities of each contribute to the pleasure and good of all. This will always be one of the things looked for in an upper class; one of the things which, in consequence of their advantages, they can do better than any other, and would do better if common sense always prevailed over mere conventionality, and if their fellowship were always impregnated with a Christian spirit and directed by a Christian aim. The middle class, too, have generally considerable opportunities of enjoying social life; and as it comes to them more as a change from their ordinary way, and not as a constant thing, it has often more zest and real interest, and serves better as a refreshment and incitement to their more ordinary employments. But hitherto the working class have been in most unfavourable circumstances for enjoying the fellowship of their friends. Their houses have been unadapted for it; and hence the craving for society has generally led the men to the public-house; the women have had to limit themselves to the fireside chat of their neighbours; and the social inclinations of the children have found little outlet but in the stairs or the street. In the case of young men and young women, the opportunities of becoming acquainted in a seemly way have been very limited; their courtship has had to be carried on in all manner of strange ways and places; the refining influence of society has been lost, and so also has been the real brightness and enjoyment which come of a happy, easy blending of old and young, male and female, grave and gay, in social fellowship. Now, this is a real want in human life. It is the want of one of the lesser aids which God designed for the full and wholesome development of character, and the absence of which is liable to lead to artificial substitutes of a pernicious kind. If, then, the working classes are securing better wages and more leisure, let them consider whether something may not be done now for supplying this want. We write these papers with the more thoughtful and sober-minded of the class more immediately in our eye; and it would be wrong to insult them by asking, whether the course which we have indicated would not be unspeakably wiser than that followed by so many men, who, finding themselves embarras des richesses, pour them out in mere gluttony and debauchery. Can nothing be done to give them a conception of the real joys of social life? Can the younger men not lay the foundations of a new order of things, in which social enjoyment shall be wrenched from the dominion of Belial,—

“The dissoluteest spirit that fell,
The sensuallest, and after Asmodai,
The fleshiest incubus,” and made the handmaid of all that is pure and ennobling?

Another question is likely to present itself to some. Supposing the working classes, or many of them, to become well taught, and to share in the culture of the age; supposing them to acquire more refinement of manner, and to be able to express themselves without effort and awkwardness in conversation, what probability is there of class meeting more with class in social intercourse, of caste restrictions being abated, of a more free social fellowship among all ranks of society? To this question our reply is, that of such a blending of classes there is not much probability. There may be a greater degree of intercourse occasionally, but that the different orders of society will break down the fences by which they have commonly been separated socially does not seem in any degree probable. As a general rule, when men have the power of choice, they choose their associates and intimate friends from among those who have been brought up like themselves, and whose pursuits, associations, and sympathies are like their own. For the most part, too, men feel most at home, and enjoy intercourse most, with persons in the same circumstances of life as themselves. Occasionally, under peculiar circumstances, high and low may come together—would that they did so oftener! But we have no idea of a time coming when even the most cultivated of workmen will find himself the companion of more than a few persons outside his own order. Nor can we much regret this, because, for the most part, men are able to enjoy society far the most heartily among their own class. “Like draws to like,” and will continue to do so. The upper class, consisting of those whose wealth and leisure make them independent of all formal labour; the middle class, depending more on mental than on bodily exertion; and the working class, eating their bread in the sweat of their face, will probably continue to draw their society mainly from the members of their own orders. But the culture of mind, speech, and manners on the part of the working class would certainly tend to lower the walls of partition which at present keep them so separate, and perhaps to bring them nearer in sympathy and good-will. But far more powerful in this respect would be the influence of a common religion and a common worship; nothing genders the feeling of kinship, or promotes the sense of unity so much as fellowship in the experiences of the Christian life, a common reliance on the grace of the Saviour, and a common and active interest in Christian work. Would that there were more prospect of a time when everywhere the rich and the poor should meet together, and worship the Lord—the Maker and Redeemer of them all!

Among the things that contribute to the amenity of cultivated and intellectual society, there are some by no means beyond the reach of the working classes. For example, music. We know of no good reason why they should not avail themselves of this delightful means of refreshment and exhilaration far more than they have ever done. Now that singing is so generally taught in schools, and that musical instruments of tolerable quality are so much cheaper, the opportunity of enlivening their homes by music is wonderfully increased. Of course it has its temptations; music-worship is a common snare, and the younger members of families need to take special care that music in some form does not draw them off from more prosaic but indispensable occupations.

Could the working man aspire to travel? The question is a vague one, for what does travel mean? Already, on a limited scale, he finds it within his easy reach. Excursion trains convey him with great ease to favourite scenes in his native country, and enable him to become familiar with places that have either great historic interest or great charm of scenery. Is it vain to expect that he should transcend the limits of his native country, and see a little of the world beyond? We know that to see the world is often a strong desire in his breast; very commonly it is one of the great inducements to a sailor's life; the imagination of the boy revels in the thought of seeing strange countries, with all their wonderful features and products. In the United States of America the love of travel has reached a lower stratum of society than with us; cases are not unknown of working men struggling to accumulate enough to carry them over the European tour. Bayard Taylor was but a working compositor when he formed the plan of his travels, and with rare and almost reckless enterprise set out with the intention of working at his trade at sundry places in his route, in order to realise enough to carry him onwards. It is not to be supposed that more than a few of the more adventurous spirits among working men would think of such an undertaking as that of visiting foreign countries; probably the engagements of few would admit of it, but to some it is a practicable scheme. Many is the delightful tour in foreign lands that might be had for the money often spent in the alehouse, absorbing no more time than the sum of the days lost to labour in bouts of intemperance.

The changes that have recently taken place in the political world have brought to the great mass of working men the right to take part in politics. For the most part it is not an inviting sphere; but questions that bear closely on the welfare of the community, and the true progress of society, deserve the earnest consideration of all. There is one question of extreme urgency, that concerns the dearest interests of the working class, and that will probably be never satisfactorily settled except through their influence. We refer to the licensing system. It is the interests of working men and their families that are most involved in the question, whether at every corner in our great towns, and at every spot in the country where it is conceivable that men or women should be athirst for something stronger than water, public-houses shall send forth their temptations to all and sundry. It is the working classes that are directly concerned to set limits to a system that, like the lean kine of Pharaoh's dream, threatens to swallow up every given thing that the years of plenty may bring to the hands of the labourer. What is to be the attitude of the working classes towards the licensing system? Of course there is a division of feeling on the subject. There are many to whom the shutting up of the public-house would be the removal of the only institution that brings any feeling of ease and enjoyment to their jaded souls. But there are others who know well that, however sweet its revelry may be in the mouth, it is bitter enough in the belly, and who are grieved to the heart to witness the multitude of public-houses, each, more or less, a propaganda of drinking—a nursery of the worst habit that can enslave humanity. For our own part we do not hesitate to avow our belief that the public-house system is the greatest blunder, not to say crime, of our country. But we have little hope of anything effectual being done to lessen the number of such places, till the people themselves are more thoroughly roused to a sense of their evil, and until the argument that they are necessary, in all their overwhelming numbers, for the comfort of the working man, is disproved decisively by the working man himself.

There is another subject that tempts us strongly, while we thus touch on the salient points of what we would fain look for in the more disengaged hours of the working man of the future. Why should he not, if God give him the heart for it, contribute most valuable aid to the "work of faith and labour of love" of the Christian Church? After all, this is the noblest work. It is the only work that is thoroughly satisfactory—that reaches as it were to the bottom of things—that forms an adequate use for the superior benefits which the working man has lately been struggling to obtain. It is all very well to struggle for the opportunity of doing justice to the higher part of his nature; but when he has got this higher power, this ability to use his intellect, this opportunity to exercise his affections, this capacity of some of the more refined enjoyments of life, what is the highest use to which the whole may be put? Is the horizon of life not to widen with the higher altitude he has reached? Is there to be nothing in his experience corresponding to that blending of the earthly and the heavenly horizons, that union of earth and heaven which he beholds, when from some lofty point he gazes round and round? The working class has always been noted for the interest of its members in one another. What is the highest use to which that kindly interest can be put? To help on schemes that promote the welfare of mind and body is good; but to try to extirpate the disease that lies at the root of all disorder; to get introduced into the hearts of all working men the germ of a new life which will gather to itself all that is good and pure; to bring them back to their Father's house, and reinstate them in their lost inheritance, is surely better—is surely the best of all.

If the Christian working man of the future sets himself thus to help on the work of Christ, and benefit his fellows in the highest sense, it will be the brightest feature of the good time coming. Not but that in the past many a working man has borne his hand willingly and nobly in this work; but this has taken place only exceptionally, not as a general rule. The public are getting more used to the idea of laymen doing a measure of service in the Christian church; we hear much of "the universal priesthood of believers." In many cases, workmen would be the best missionaries to workmen. Missionaries, we mean, of the less formal type, endeavouring, by conversation and otherwise, to win their comrades to Christ. Foremen, elderly men, and even young men, in large works, how much have they in their power! How much have they sometimes done! And should the ardent soul pant for a larger sphere, might not some of our Christian mechanics follow the example of their German brethren, and go abroad to work at their trades, and at the same time act as missionaries? What glory could be higher and purser? What stars would more brighten the firmament of labour than the names of men whose irrepressible devotion to their Lord and love of their brethren, induced them to fill up every spare hour with the work of faith and the labour of love?

As we indulge in such anticipations, it almost seems as if "Time will run back and fetch the age of gold."

It is well to think of that age, and to work towards it, even though, like the promises made to the fathers, it may be yet afar off.

ILLUSTRATION OF THE BIBLE FROM ANCIENT INSCRIPTIONS.

By H. B. TRISTRAM, F.R.S.

PART II.

IN a previous paper on this subject, the course of Jewish and Israelitish history was traced back from the close of the Old Testament period to the epoch of the captivity of the northern kingdom, as illustrated by the records of Persia and Assyria, brought recently to light by the researches of the Rawlinsons, Layard, and others. The preservation of these Assyrian records has been certainly providential. The local conditions which have buried for so many ages all traces of the great cities of the Euphrates under undistinguishable sand-heaps, and have left scarce any monuments above ground, have contributed to the preservation of the national records. Timber and stone being equally scarce, clay was the almost exclusive building material. From the deficiency of fuel, sun-burnt bricks were principally employed. These having crumbled from the effects of time and occasional rains, have buried the contents of the palaces under the great mounds which stud the country, where, unsuspected and undisturbed, they have lain for ages. But clay was early adopted also as the material for the reception of inscriptions. The cylinders were moulded, the letters stamped upon the surface of the soft clay, and then the bricks were baked, and on this material the state calendars of Assyria have been written. Not perishable, like the papyrus of Egypt, infinitely more rapidly executed than the tedious engraving upon granite of semi-pictorial hieroglyphical characters, these cylinders have remained safe from exposure to weather, and fresh as the day when they came from the kiln, buried under crumbling masses of brickwork and sand, ready to be exhumed, when in due time the earth should crack, and yield up these contemporary evidences of the minute accuracy of the Scripture Record.

Yet, at the same time that Assyria has been supplying in rapid succession incontrovertible dates for the illustrations of the regal period of Israel and Judah, the evidence brought to light by the monuments of Egypt has been, though less profuse, not less decisive. In the later period of the Jewish monarchy, there are four points of contact in the Bible record between its history and that of Egypt. Four African kings are mentioned there by name—So, king of Egypt (2 Kings xvii. 4); Tirhakah, king of Ethiopia (2 Kings xix. 9); Pharaoh Necho (2 Kings xxiii. 29; xxiv. 7; 2 Chron. xxxv. 20); and Pharaoh Hophra (Jer. xlv. 30, and xlvi.).

Following the plan of tracing the illustrations up the course of the stream of time, we commence with Pharaoh Hophra. This monarch has been always admitted to be the Apries mentioned by Herodotus. But the Egyptian inscriptions give us more exact details, calling him by the name of Haifra, identical with the Hebrew Hophra, and fixing his reign as having ended some years before that of Nebuchadnezzar, while Egyptian history proves the accomplishment of Jeremiah's prophecy of his miserable end.

Of Pharaoh Necho, the next predecessor but one of Hophra, celebrated for his attempt to cut the isthmus of Suez, and for his successful circumnavigation of Africa, we have full accounts in profane writers; and the mention of his defeat of Josiah by Herodotus is well known. The Greek writer, however, who was ignorant of the topography of Palestine, makes the slight error of speaking of the battle-field as Magdalos, or Migdol, instead of Megiddo. He also mentions his capture of Cadytis or Gaza. Necho frequently occurs as Neku, on the monuments of Egypt, and his history is by them fully corroborated.

Psammetichus, his predecessor, does not occur in sacred history, and we find from the Egyptian records that he was too fully occupied in consolidating the kingdom of Egypt, which he had seized, to occupy himself with Syrian conquests. But in the reign of Hezekiah, we read that during the invasion of Sennacherib, Tirhakah, king of Ethiopia, came out against him. Now, Tirhakah is given by Manetho as the third king of the Ethiopian dynasty, under the Grecised name of Taracus. On the Egyptian monuments he is called Taharak, or Tehrak, the consonants of the name, T, H, R, K, being identical with the Hebrew. But from the chronology of the Egyptian monuments, we find that Tehrak did not ascend the throne of Egypt until about seven years after the date assigned for the death of Hezekiah. How then could he have been his contemporary? The solution is simple, when we observe that he is called in the Book of Kings king of Ethiopia, not of Egypt, and that probably he reigned over Ethiopia about ten years before he gained the kingdom of Egypt proper.

As Tirhakah is identified with the third and last king of the Ethiopians, So, king of Egypt, spoken of as having made a league with Hoshea, king of Israel, may be identified with the first of that dynasty. The name So does not occur on the Egyptian monuments; but the Hebrew word thus rendered into English consists of three letters, all of which may be consonants, S, V, H, i.e., Sheveh, and we find in the inscriptions that there were two successive kings, father and son, each called Shebek, immediately before Tehrak, so that the chronology would exactly fit. Shebek is called Sevech in Manetho's lists, and Sabaco by Herodotus. Thus the identity is unmistakable. But we are told (2 Kings xvii. 4) that Hoshea sent an embassy to So, when he attempted to shake off the Assyrian yoke, and that then Shalmaneser invaded Israel, and finally captured Samaria, thus ending for ever the northern kingdom.

One of the most extraordinary incidental illustrations of the Scripture history is connected with this circumstance. We see here clearly the kings of Assyria and Egypt brought into collision. Now, Mr. Layard discovered in Nineveh a most remarkable clay impression of two seals, which had been impressed on the same piece of clay, side by side, and had doubtless been attached, after the Egyptian and Assyrian fashion, continued in our own legal documents, to some treaty or deed written on papyrus or vellum. The Egyptian seal is that of Shebek, well known by its identity with his signet on Egyptian monuments, but also containing his name Shebek in hieroglyphics. The seal of the Assyrian seems to be that of Sennacherib, the immediate successor of Shalmaneser, but does not, like the Egyptian, give his name. It would seem thus that a peace having been concluded between the two monarchs, the royal signets were together attached to the document, which was deposited in the archives of the kingdom, and has mouldered away ages ago. But in the seal, now deposited in the British Museum, we have this singular proof of the meeting, or at least of the alliance of the two monarchs, preserved among the remains of the state papers of the Assyrian empire, furnishing, as Mr. Layard observes, one of the most remarkable instances of confirmatory evidence on record. As an illustration of Scripture history, for it was probably in consequence of the intrigues with Hoshea, mentioned in the Book of Kings, that Shebek was compelled to make the treaty with the triumphant Assyrian monarch.

Following up the course of contemporary history from the times of Uzziah to that of Jehu, more than a century, we have scarcely an allusion in the Bible to any of the neighbouring nations, none to Egypt or Assyria. At this time both Judah and Israel were strong, and were employed in extending their power over their respective neighbours, unmolested by either of the great empires on the Nile and the Euphrates. Here too the records of Assyria and Egypt corroborate, as much by their silence, as elsewhere by their detailed testimony. Both kingdoms were at this time torn by intestine troubles. The inscriptions of Egypt are entirely silent upon foreign events during this period; we have no records of Phœnicia at this time; and the only Assyrian record are a few short inscriptions, mentioning some campaigns, but none of them reaching as far west as Syria or Palestine, and also specifying internal revolts.

When, however, we reach the times of Jehu and Jehoshaphat we have an uninterrupted catena of references and illustrations back to the time of Solomon. The relations of the Israelite kingdoms at this period were chiefly with Syria, but of that nation we possess no continuous records, and its history, so far as it is supplied from profane sources, can be gathered only from fragmentary allusions in the annals of other nations.

In one of the most important records of the Assyrian kingdom, known as the Black Obelisk, discovered by Mr. Layard under the ruins of the palace of Shalmaneser II. (to be distinguished from his successor already referred to), and which is now in the British Museum, we have some remarkable incidental illustrations of the contemporary history of the Book of Kings. It mentions three expeditions against Benhadad, king of Syria, and a fourth, four years after the third, against Hazael. It makes no mention of any expedition against Israel, but it states that Jehu the son of Omri, king, sent tribute to the Assyrian king. This tallies with the Scripture record, so far as the omission of any invasion of Israel, whose king probably thought it prudent to propitiate the invader of his neighbour by a present. There might be some difficulty as to Jehu being described as the son of Omri, which indeed he may have been by the mother's side, but it is very probable that the Assyrians finding him the successor of that famous monarch, described him as also his descendant.

Another incidental illustration is the mention of the number of chariots captured from Benhadad, when, on referring to the account of the Syrian armaments of the same prince in Kings, we find his chariots twice emphatically mentioned. Shalmaneser boasts that on one occasion he captured eleven hundred chariots.

Tracing back the Bible history, we now come to a corroboration of one of its episodes, from a most unexpected quarter. It was in the year 1868, that the Rev. F. A. Klein, of the Church Missionary Society, discovered at Dibon in Moab the now famous monolith of King Mesha. Though unhappily since broken by the Bedouin, the greatest part of the fragments have been recovered, and we are in possession of a copy and squeeze taken before its destruction, so that there is little controversy as to the translation of anything except a few words of the inscription. The outlines of the history of the Moabite Stone must be familiar to all our readers. It may be sufficient to remind them that it is three hundred years older than the earliest monument with characters alphabetic like our own, which was hitherto known, the Phœnician Sarcophagus of Eshmunazar: that if we have not in it the original characters used in writing, we have the earliest known representations of them. The language is unmistakable Hebrew, with slight dialectic differences. Thus we see at once why in their intercourse with the Moabites the Israelites had no need to employ interpreters, as they did with the Egyptians and Syrians. The objection which has been raised as to the difference of languages precluding the intercourse described in the story of Balaam and Balak, is thus at once disposed of. It is remarkable, too, that in this inscription the words are all separated from each other by points. It shows also that the dialect of Moab was in accordance with the Hebrew in the use of the four consonants which represent vowels, and differed entirely from the Phœnician.

But when from the style we turn to the matter of the inscription, we find still further illustration of Scripture. We learn from Numbers and Judges that the district north of the Arnon, or one half of the original country of Moab, had been wrested from its possessors by the Amorite king Sihon, and was in turn taken from him by Israel, and colonised by the men of Reuben and Gad. But the Moabites had not in the course of three hundred years (as we see in Judges xi.) forgotten their ancient claim; and accordingly in the Moabite stone, King Mesha speaks of a part of the land having been for many ages in the possession of the Israelites, and mentions especially "the men of Gad," who had held Ataroth from of old. The Book of Numbers (xxxii. 3, 34) specifies Ataroth in particular as one of the cities along with Dibon, and others, which were allotted to Gad and Reuben.

With the exception of the temporary subjugation of Israel by Eglon king of Moab in the earlier period of the Judges, and the conquest of Moab by David, there is but one political episode recorded in which the history of Moab and Israel meet, and that is in 2 Kings iii., the war with Mesha. The exploits of the same king in this war are the subject of this the solitary Moabite monument which has been discovered. It tells of Omri, king of Israel, having oppressed Moab many days ; while the Book of Kings mentions that at the death of Ahab the tribute of Moab amounted to the enormous impost of one hundred thousand lambs, and one hundred thousand rams with the wool, meaning probably one hundred thousand fleeces ; and that the Moabites then revolted. A league was formed between the kings of Israel, Edom, and Judah, the latter probably provoked by the invasion of Judæa mentioned in 2 Chron. xx., who mustered a mighty host, and took the circuitous route by the south end of the Dead Sea, to invade Moab. The story shows the reason of this, for it states that Mesha had seized upon all the towns on the northern frontier and fortified them. Defeated in the open field, Mesha shut himself up in Kir-Haraseth, the still virgin fortress of Kerak. There he sacrificed his eldest son to his god Chemosh, and so raised the fury of his people to the highest pitch. The same writer adds, "There was great indignation against Israel, and they departed from him, and returned to their own land" (verse 27), i.e. had to raise the siege. Mesha's stone explains the result. Having failed in their attempt to reduce his great fortress, the Israelites seem to have been immediately occupied in their struggle against Hazael. Mesha seized his opportunity, and reduced successively, he tells us, Dibon, Bezer, Kirjathaim, Baal-Meon, Ataroth, and Nebo, at the very time when Hazael was beginning to cut Israel short in those regions east of Jordan, "from Aroer which is by the river Arnon, even Gilead and Bashan" (2 Kings x. 22). After this we learn from 2 Kings xiii. 20, that the Moabites were in the habit of sending in robber bands about harvest time, just as their successors have, until within the last few years, done against the fellahin west of Jordan : and we find from the prophet Isaiah one hundred years later, that the whole of these places enumerated on the stone as having been wrested from Israel were still completely Moabite.

Thus we gather, as well from the omissions as from the statements of the two records, a manifest corroboration of the truth of the history which has come down to us. Jehovah and Chemosh, Mesha and Omri, as well as all the cities of northern Moab, occur on the monolith in exact harmony with the biblical account, hitherto our only record of the history of that far corner of western Asia.

But it is not only Moab which has yielded a contemporary record of the days of Ahab and Jehoshaphat. Omri, as has been mentioned already, is mentioned on an Assyrian inscription. We also find Ahab mentioned expressly by name, and that with the name of the place appended, where, according to Scripture, he usually resided, "Ahab of Jezreel." He is there stated to have allied himself with Benhadad and others against Assyria, and to have supplied ten thousand footmen and two thousand chariots. The Syrian league was defeated, and we do not hear of any continuance of the war. Now, this episode is not mentioned in the Book of Kings, which records Ahab's frequent wars against Syria. But a period of three years' peace is expressly referred to (1 Kings xxii. 1). Ahab had had Benhadad in his power and let him go (chap. xx. 34), on condition of his restoring the Israelite cities he had taken. Dread of the common danger from Assyria seems to have suggested this clemency. Ahab had kept his fealty, and helped Benhadad, who afterwards refused to keep his faith, and thus was Ahab's tragic end brought about. A careful comparison thus perfectly harmonizes the two records.

Another incidental illustration of this period may be noted. Omri was the sole founder of the city of Samaria (1 Kings xvi. 24). The Assyrian cylinders repeatedly call Samaria Beth-Omri, the "house" or "city" of Omri, and for some ages knew it by no other name.

Passing from the foreign wars and alliances of the northern kingdom, we find that about a generation before the time of Ahab, Judah was invaded by an enormous barbarian host, led by Zerah the Ethiopian, who came up from the south-west, and was utterly defeated by Asa (2 Chron. xiv.). We know that Eastern monarchs did not chronicle their defeats, and therefore we could not expect to find any account of this expedition. But it is to be observed that Zerah is stated to have been an Ethiopian, not an Egyptian. There are two names found on Egyptian monuments which would correspond with the Hebrew Zerah, and both of them synchronize with the reign of Asa. One of these, Osorkon, a name of which the root-consonants are identical with those of the Hebrew Zerach, though a king of Egypt, was not of the royal line, but ruled in right of his wife, and may therefore have been an Ethiopian. The other, Azerch, whose monuments have been found at Napata, the old capital of the Ethiopian kingdom, in the isle of Meroe, in Upper Egypt, was king of that region. Either of these may have been the invader of Judah. It is also to be noted that for many years after this date, Egypt continued to decline, a natural result of such a disaster.

Thirty years before the invasion of Zerah, we meet with the first actual invasion of Palestine by Egypt on record, the invasion of Shishak in the fifth year of the reign of Rehoboam. It was the first great event after the severance of the kingdoms of Israel and Judah (1 Kings xiv. 25; 2 Chron. xii.). Shishak came up with twelve hundred chariots, sixty thousand horse, and foot soldiers without number, captured the fortresses of Judah, received the submission of Jerusalem, and stripped the temple and the palace of their treasures. Turn to the inscription of Sheshonk, as he is called in the Egyptian record, and on the great temple of Karnak we find engraved the story of the expedition, and of the countries and places subjugated. In the long list occurs the name of the kingdom of Judah. There are a hundred and thirty-three places named as having yielded to the conqueror. Arab tribes, cities of Judah proper, and also many in the northern kingdom of Israel, are mingled in the catalogue. Among the latter are such names as Taanach, Shunem, Mahanaim, Gibeon, Beth-horon, Ajalon, Megiddo, Edrei, Shocoh, Beth-Tappuah, &c., &c. Now, as Shishak's policy was to establish his vassal Jeroboam firmly in the northern kingdom, these names might present a difficulty, as there seems at first sight no reason for Shishak molesting the territory of the ten tribes. But Mr. R. S. Poole has observed that the places taken are all of them either Levitical cities, or strongholds of the Canaanites. Jeroboam was not firmly established on the throne, the Levites clung to the house and religion of David, and the Canaanites refused to submit to the rule of Israel. These Shishak subdued and handed over to his vassal. Thus an analysis of the list adds a fresh illustration to the political situation, as indicated in the sacred history.

We have thus briefly traced up recent illustrations afforded by inscriptions from the time of Daniel to the reign of Solomon. The illustrations of the earlier period of Israelitish history are, as might be expected, different in character, but not on that account less important or conclusive.

COMPLETED LIVES.

"It is finished."—JOHN xix. 30.

THIS is our Lord's verdict upon his own life and work. It is the last of a series of declarations concerning it which from time to time dropped from his lips. "I must work the works of Him that sent me." "I have a baptism to be baptized with, and how am I straitened until it be accomplished!" "I have finished the work which thou gavest me to do." In his judgment, his life was a mission—a ministry; and now, in the last hour of his life He declares its ministry fulfilled.

It is a significant and striking word, to be uttered at such a supreme moment. The calm, unperturbed, lofty Son of God again asserts himself. A few moments ago, and his complaint, "I thirst," brought Him near to the lowliest sufferer; He suffered as we suffer, and his cry seemed an appeal to our poor sympathy. Now He seems removed to an infinite distance. Half in self-communion, half in assertion to his Father, He utters this great word, as his self-satisfied judgment of his life. And yet it is uttered in the hearing of those who stood beside the cross. Like the self-communing which He permitted his disciples to overhear, "Now is my soul troubled: Father, what shall I say?" It is a tacit invitation to look into the consciousness which thus finds expression. It will be a great teaching for us, if we can understand what it was that, in this solemn hour of death, He thus recognised as finished.

It was his last word, almost the last moment of his life, the last agony of a painful dissolution. But it is not a mere exclamation, a vague cry of exhaustion; nor is it as when in Gethsemane He prayed that the cup might pass, nor as when a few minutes before He exclaimed upon the cross, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me," a cry of surprise and dismay at the bitter anguish which He felt.

It is a word of perfect self-control and composure—an intelligent, calm retrospect and judgment of life. Psychologically remarkable because it is composure immediately following extreme and mysterious agitation. He is manifestly as self-collected as when He sat with his disciple at the Last Supper.

There are two ways of dealing with sorrow and pain—a physical way and a spiritual way. A physician may dull it by anodynes, or the spirit may fortify itself with strong patience.

Christ refuses the anodyne, and conquers his sorrow by the piety and faith and patience of his spirit—his sublime "Nevertheless, not my will, but thine be done." Thus He regains his calmness—becomes the "king of sorrows." Sorrow does not overbear Him, He conquers and rules it. A sharp conflict between flesh and spirit, and the spirit is more than conqueror. His last word is a note of victory.

There is also a manifest tone of satisfaction in the verdict upon his life which He thus pronounces. Humility does not demand of a good man that he should affect a false consciousness, pronounce an untrue verdict upon his life and character; there are deep and legitimate satisfactions of the spirit which may fitly find expression even in the hour of death. Humility finds expression, not in denying the service or the goodness, which would be to confound moral distinctions, but in the feeling that they are solely of God's grace. Our Lord speaks of his consciousness of what his life had been. "I have finished the work which thou gavest me to do." And in the hearing of those who stood by He said it, that they might know his satisfaction with it. It is a manifest feeling of achievement, which rises to a note of triumph. It is the joyful sense of having fulfilled the great purpose of his life, a peace of heart in the recognition of it, which is a strength and a blessedness—a feeling akin to that which the author of the Book of Genesis attributes to Jehovah when looking upon the completed creation He pronounced it "very good." He felt perfect complacency in it, and He "rested." No blessedness is richer than the blessedness of completed work.

Men may say concerning their life and its work, "It is finished," with feelings widely diversified—with an unspeakable sigh of relief, for instance. Concerning a toiling, struggling, sorrowing, sinning life, a man may say, "It is finished," glad to have done with it; as if any change must be a relief, so weary of it is he, so profitless has it been. But there is no complacency in such a retrospect; rather is there the feeling of failure and disgust. When a good man closes a faithful, holy life, he does not escape from it as from an enemy—he does not desire that it may be buried in shame;—for him to live has been "Christ," although to die is "gain." It was not with a feeling of relief at escaping a life which had been a failure and a sorrow that Christ said, "It is finished."

Nor was it the sad verdict that disappointed hope pronounces over the unfulfilled promise of life. Youth blighted in its spring-time; the intellect maturing great powers; the heart ripening for rich affections; the hand preparing for great service; goodness blossoming for rare saintliness. Jesus of Nazareth died a young man, at an age when we should think death premature, and the chief work of life undone. He does not think or feel concerning his life, that his days have been shortened; there is no sense of untimely blight, of ruthless destruction; no feeling of great purposes broken off, of affections bereaved before their time, of the house of life broken into, of the reluctant victim that death takes captive. The sceptre is not in death's hand, the crown is not upon death's brow. There is no surprise or helplessness, as of one who submits to a fate. "No man taketh my life from me; I lay it down of myself." The peculiar death of the crucifixion enabled the manifestation of this. Had He died by stoning—the ordinary Jewish punishment for blasphemy—the discernment of it would not have been possible.

Clearly, too, the thought of God fills the mind of the dying Christ; and it does not trouble Him. He surrenders his human spirit into his Father's hands, gives account to Him of the work which had been given Him to do; and He does it with untroubled complacency. Good men often die joyfully, but the joy that inspires them is rapturous gratitude for God's forgiveness and forbearance. No good man so conceives of his own goodness as to die perfectly satisfied with it. There is no consciousness of being forgiven and saved in our Lord's feeling. His word, "It is finished," would have been no suitable verdict upon a salvation such as that of ordinary religious men. It is with himself and with his life-work that He is satisfied. He looks back upon what his life has been, and forward to his "going to the Father;" the thought of God and of the work given Him to do fills his consciousness, and He rejoices in it.

"It is finished." What? There is no specific reference, no antecedent; the thought had gathered, and it finds expression in a pronoun as if misapprehension were impossible. "It," not this or that particular thing among other things, but something in its entirety. Whatever can reasonably be supposed at that supreme moment to have filled the consciousness of the dying Christ. "It is finished." Whatever He thought of, it was in his judgment completed; it was not a process only begun, to be completed by those who were to come after Him. It was a "finished," a perfected achievement. Can we doubt that it was his judgment upon his entire life and work? All that He came upon earth to do—the entire ministry for which He was ordained of God. He had lived his life, discharged its ministry, perfectly fulfilled its purposes and aims.

It is a word which seals the volume of life, which avows his readiness to die, gives the summons to death, whereby he becomes "obedient unto death, even the death of the cross." A word which is a pivot upon which He turns away from the earthly scene of his service, to the rest and fellowship of his Father in heaven. It is the feeling of a completed idea and service of life.

Complacency in the completed work of life will be great in proportion to its nobleness and spirituality. There are many works of life, in which the worker may fitly feel satisfaction; many varieties and gradations of honourable labour concerning which it is a great word to say, "It is finished."

If, by honest industry, the patient self-denying labour of years, a man win competence for his feeble age, and for those dependent upon him, he will feel relief, rest, and joy. With the miser accumulation is never finished; he hoards when there is no rational reason for hoarding. But to the healthy soul of the wise, moderate man, there comes a time when he contentedly says, "It is enough; I have done all that is necessary. It is finished."

If, again, a man have achieved some great work of literature, a noble poem, or philosophy, that will elevate, and enrich, and gladden the hearts of men for generations—some "work that the world will not willingly let die," he will have the feeling that Gibbon records, when his great history was finished: or if he complete some great scientific discovery, like that of Stephenson or Wheatley: or if he achieve some great philanthropic reformation, such as that of a Howard, a Clarkson, or a Cobden; not in unseemly pride, but in humble, thankful, pious satisfaction, he may accept his earthly crown of life, and sing his Nunc Dimittis.

Suppose a patriot to achieve the emancipation of his nation, its deliverance from a foreign yoke or from internal anarchy and degradation—to erect upon his native soil a temple of freedom in which justice, virtue, and benevolence shall minister at the altar, and whose open portals shall be an asylum for all the oppressed; who shall be what Washington was, and everything that Napoleon was not; how purely, piously, and proudly he may say, "It is finished!"

Or, when a religious apostle—a Paul, a Luther, a Brainerd, a John Williams, a Bishop Patteson—sums up his life-work of Christ-like self-sacrifice, and consecration; with what a feeling of noble and exquisite satisfaction he may pass verdict upon it! How like the Divine Master's "It is finished" is Paul's "I have fought a good fight; I have finished my course; I have kept the faith!" Not a shadow of remorse or regret, but pure, perfect, blessed satisfaction, such as noble work always inspires. The verdict of our Lord upon his own life-work was the climax of all such retrospects, simply because his was the greatest work ever done, the grandest life ever lived.

Who may imagine the retrospect, the thoughts and feelings that gathered into his consciousness? It needs that we should appreciate his work with his own divine intelligence and feeling, to comprehend all that He meant. When He said, "It is finished," none of the great elements of his incarnate life would be absent from his calm apprehensive thought. As a completed whole, his wonderful life on the earth was finished—its revelation of the spiritual Father, its vital conflicts, its mortal sufferings, its perfect obedience, its redeeming achievement.

One scarcely knows what special points to indicate.

1. In every sense in which our Lord's life on earth was the fulfilment of divine purpose, preparation, and prediction, it was completed.

That in the fulness of time He should appear as the Redeemer of men, was the cardinal fact of God's councils of pitying mercy and salvation. From the merciful promise to the first sinning man everything in the spiritual history of the world had pointed to Him, typified Him, anticipated and prepared for Him. Divine promise, manifold type and prefiguration, the blazing sacrifices of almost every people, and through all generations, gathered into the formal and purposed prefiguration of the Levitical system; the gathering definiteness and deepening meaning of a long succession of prophets who "all spake of Him"—all had found their perfect fulfilment in his life and work. No objection is ever urged on the ground of the imperfect correspondence, much less of the failure of correspondence, between our Lord and the old prefigurations of Him. All admit that if the Gospel system of salvation is to be believed, this correspondence is wonderful in its exactness. No fact is more significant than that wherever Christ and his Gospel are received, sacrificial altars at once cease to blaze. He, the great sacrifice for sin, supersedes all other sacrifices.

What emphasis He himself puts upon his fulfilment of type and prophecy, "Behold we go up to Jerusalem, and all things that are written by the prophets concerning the Son of man shall be accomplished!" "All things must be fulfilled which were written in the law of Moses, and in the prophets, and in the psalms concerning me." "The testimony of Jesus was the spirit of prophecy." Even the most trifling thing was fulfilled with the most scrupulous care. "Jesus knowing that all things were now accomplished, that the Scripture might be fulfilled, saith, 'I thirst.'"

2. In every sense in which his life on earth was a ministry, a divinely-commissioned work, He had accomplished it.

It was a ministry of self-denial and suffering; for only by such could He accomplish God's great purposes. In no one point, at no single moment, did He fail. He hesitated at no endurance of poverty, of contumely, or woe. "The cup which my Father hath given me shall I not drink it?" He was drinking the Father's cup, even to its bitterest dregs, when He thus passed judgment upon the service of his life. Never was suffering so fairly met, so nobly endured. Happy the man who, having endured his Gethsemane, on his very cross can say, "It is finished," with the consciousness that he has failed in no faith, or patience, or unselfishness, or service.

His life was a ministry of truth—a revelation of the Father. He could recal it with a sense of perfect fidelity to its highest spiritual meanings and aims. "I have manifested thy name unto the men whom thou gavest me out of the world." "I have given unto them the words which thou gavest me." "I have declared unto them thy name." Neither to the Father whose glory and will He had revealed, nor to the men to whose ignorance, and sin, and sorrow He had ministered, had He failed in a single service. Is there anything that demands purer vision, a higher spiritual feeling, a more faithful courage than the ministry of spiritual truth? How easy to present spiritual truth, on its unspiritual, its intellectual, even its carnal side! How easy to tone down its ideal spiritual tone, to compromise its ideal spiritual claim; to reduce its divine elevation, its divine sensitiveness to men's dull and carnal conceptions! Happy is the man in whose ministry divine things have been sustained in their spiritualness; who neither through unfaithfulness nor unfit-ness has carnalised them.

His life was a mediation, an atoning sacrifice; of which the cross from which He thus spake, as from a judgment-seat, was the consummation and crown. He came to "put away sin by the sacrifice of himself," to "give his life a ransom for many;" as the "Lamb of God, to take away the sin of the world." How perfectly and greatly this expiation was accomplished! Men may question expiation itself, none doubt that if expiatory sacrifice can be offered, Christ offered it. He pronounced verdict upon his atoning sacrifice, declared its completeness and sufficiency, when He said, "It is finished."

He was manifested to destroy the works of the devil, to establish the new kingdom of God in the earth, to call men to a new life of God, and to enable their attainment of it. "I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me." Did He not, then, now declare the new kingdom established, its foundations laid, its principles and conditions determined? "My kingdom is not of this world." Henceforth men will be filled with a new inspiration, and will realise a higher and more spiritual life. The subsequent history of the Church, the quickening powers of Christ's cross especially, abundantly confirm this.

In a word, all that constituted the greatest life ever lived, the noblest service ever rendered—all that we are accustomed to think of and define as the redeeming work of Christ—He here declares accomplished—"finished."

Is it not the greatest word ever spoken? inasmuch as it declares the greatest moral achievement in human history? The divine counsel of the Father, the incarnate ministry and atoning death of the Son, the moral redemption of man were accomplished. "It is finished;" the word may stand for the entire evangel of the Church—for the sufficient confession of its faith, for the inspiration of all its joy, for its entire blessedness and hope.

We are always finishing something, something that will not recur, contributing some completed thing to the products of human life—to the forces of the world—sending before us some work to God's judgment. Every day, portions of our life are let go, and their works do follow them. And by-and-by the final winding-up will come, not of one thing only, but of all things in one; for the life of a man is a unity made up of many parts, each action separate, and yet a component part of the character and influence of the whole. Concerning something every day, we have to say, "It is finished," and at length we shall have to say this concerning the whole.

What will be finished, and what will the finished thing be? What the life to which we add the last touch, and upon which we pronounce judgment, as we surrender it to Him who gave it? Will it be a life of selfishness that is finished, a life of frivolous pleasure, a life of ignominious sin; or a life of mere merchandise, or intellectual pursuit, or climbing ambition? Or will it be a life of noble moral character, of unselfish service to men, of spiritual piety towards God; a life of great principles and holy preferences, of lofty spiritual pursuits and communings, and joys; a life of God, with God, in God—the eternal life.

It is a great and solemn thing to live; to finish a product of the living soul; to finish life itself. All must say, "It is finished;" but to be able to say it is grandly and holily finished—to be able to pronounce judgment upon it with pious satisfaction and humble faith—this is the grandest of all things next to the "Well done" of the Master.

What a quickening contagious power there is in a life greatly lived! A man's death is often the manifest embodiment of his whole life. "Mark the perfect man, and behold the upright; for the end of that man is peace." The centurion who saw Christ die, was constrained to say, "Truly, this man was the Son of God." The penitent thief who saw Christ die was constrained to address a prayer to Him. Even the hardened and unspiritual smote on their breasts as they beheld. The lofty dignity, the calm resignation, the magnanimous spirit, the moral majesty of the dying Christ could not be resisted. There is no testimony, no power of appeal like the completed life, the peaceful death, of a righteous man.

"The chamber where the good man meets his fate Is privileged above the common walks of life."

If concerning his mediatorial work Christ said, "It is finished," then no part of it remains for us to complete. "Once in the end of the world hath He appeared to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself." His atoning sacrifice has been offered "once for all." We need not, therefore, by supplementary penances, or pretended repetitions, think to add to his expiation, or to reproduce it. It is for us only to accept the atonement which He finished—to “believe in the Lord Jesus Christ.” The only sacrifice possible to us is “the sacrifice of thanksgiving.” What an infinite joy such a judgment of Christ upon his atoning work is calculated to give us! What a comfort and encouragement to those who are without righteousness and strength!

Only the urgency remains, that we “neglect not the great salvation,” that we do not refuse to come to Him who alone has life. “There remaineth no other sacrifice for sin;” there needeth no other. “It is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptance, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners.”

HENRY ALLON.

ON A VILLAGE GREEN.

By A SUMMER TOURIST.

A WALKING tour is one of the pleasantest ways of spending a short holiday. In this there is complete enfranchisement. You are not bound very strictly by hours and distances; you do not have the Time-table fluttering constantly before your eyes; you are for once, at least, as much your own master as you may well hope to be; and you have opportunities which you would probably miss otherwise for observing nature, and courting pleasant acquaintance with country-life. In the early morning, as you start fresh and enthusiastic, the hare scuds across your path, whisking the dew almost in your eyes; the scent of beanfield and meadow is then at the sweetest; sky and mountain then take on their most delicate colours; the teams are going forth; the shepherd and the labourer stepping along to their work; and the ear is constantly refreshed by the tinkle of sheep-bells sounding from field or moor through the clear air like a morning carol. If you love old places and buildings, you can turn aside into many an ancient churchyard, quaintly spreading itself and bulging over the wall, as though it would press over into the pathway, and so assert its share in the life that is drowsily going and returning; and if you are fond of natural history, you can take many a rustic by-path and short-cut by blooming bramble hedgerows breathing perfume, and find rare wild-flowers, butterflies of finest tints, delights unalloyed for ear and eye. Rest more pure and healthful is scarcely to be had than such a tour affords, and it is attainable in a short week's allowance, when a distant excursion would be useless, or nearly so, absorbing the whole time in the railway-train or steamboat. Knapsack on back, or bag in hand, the road is made pleasant by a score of cheerful delays and lingerings—a fine view here, a rustic bridge there; a sloping common backed by glowing sunset, or a village lapt in lazy sunshine; some old house, lichen-roofed, and etherealised by the wondrous magic of light and shade, or a corner of a green field astir with larks, rising in twos and threes into the air, flooding it with sweet sounds—taking the eye and arresting you. Not the least memorable things are the “surprises,” sure to occur, in such a journey—the unexpected meetings, the odd characters you encounter, and the unaccustomed things you see. It is of one such “surprise” experienced by me recently, that I propose to give a brief account.

After a three hours' tramp, I had just descended a slope of common, rich in fennel and purple wild thyme, as the twilight was beginning to gather, and was surprised to hear sounds of hymn-singing not far off, though I could see no chapel near the bulk of the village that I was approaching lying on the other side of the hill. Gradually it swelled and rose in volume; and the secret was disclosed when, turning sharply round a corner, there stood a little rustic congregation on a siding of the common, that had till now been hidden from me by a high hedge. Men returning from labour, with spades or mattocks in their hands, and leaning on them, stood listening; young men and boys with cricket-bats, fresh from their evening game, now grouped themselves in reverent attitude; women with children in arms, and older children squatted quietly beside them; some visitors from town, recognisable by smarter seaside garb, made up a group, motley enough to be striking, and yet with a unity of its own, notwithstanding the comers and goers, who merely turned aside from the main road for a moment to listen and pass on. The singing done, a common-looking man enough offered up a prayer, earnest, but showing some lack of education; and then, to my surprise, a young woman, in plain attire, came forward from beside a little group at one side, and began to speak, as though she stood in her regularly appointed place. There was a purity of style, a reverent quietness, and a wistful earnestness about her manner, that attracted me, notwithstanding that I have never been much in favour of women-preachers. As she read a passage of Scripture, I could not help thinking of Dinah Evans, and that other Dinah—her imaginative counterpart—who has laid such a hold on the mind of England, though she could never have been had the real Dinah not lived, and done even more nobly than the imagined one.

“He careth for you,” repeated emphatically in quiet, clear tones, recalled me. “Yes, my friends, how can you doubt it? Day by day are you not cared for, fed, clothed, and waited on? Your eyes, are they not blessed with the morning light, and is not the evening hour and the sleep that it brings very sweet unto them? You sow the seed in the wet spring days, and it rots and, to all appearance, passes into clay, and yet in the autumn up comes the wheat, and you go forth to harvest. In this, surely, God careth for you that you may be fed. Summer and winter come in their season; and night succeeds day; but, oh, my friends, how is it that we are so slow to see the blessings that God has given us even in the changes of season and the changes of weather, that do so much for us? Our souls are too like the seed that is sown—taking in all the good—the blessed dew, and the sweet rain, and the bright sunshine from heaven—and giving out but little of its own accord. It must be roughly shaken; it must be beaten on and dashed loose from the husk, and bruised in the mill, before it becomes bread, and blesses the hungry. It is for this the farmer has cared for it, watched it, and attended to it with every help he could get. And so, my friends, it is mostly with us. We would repose on our own strength—to use the phrase the Bible gives, ‘we would sit down on the lees’—we would be too ready to consume, to eat up, our own good—the good that yet is not our own, but given us of God—were we not so shaken and beaten and bruised. In our afflictions, in the trials of our daily life, if we look at them aright, we just see God shaking and bruising us to make us helpful—to render us bearers of the bread of life to others. O my friends, I can say it freely, that, looking back, I see now that no adversity, no pain, no cross, no disappointment, has ever come upon me that has not helped to enable me to come here, week after week, among you, to say a word to warn you, to cheer you, and help you towards the better life—to Jesus and his love. As I walk over these hills week by week to be with you, and as I return home again, my soul is filled with thankfulness for all the trials of my lot, and with hopes that grow out of that thankfulness that God may help me to save souls among you. I yearn for you, because I know the pain and the sorrow that comes of sin and disregard of God, the way that pleasure cheats the soul, and leaves it empty and wretched. So God makes our very trials and errors help us when we come to believe on Jesus. In this, too, He careth for us. Nay, my friends, here is proof of his best care. You know this holy book I have in my hand says, ‘Whom He loveth He chasteneth.’ Oh, blessed beyond words are they who know this—that their trials are sent to them because God their heavenly Father careth for them, will not leave them till they are filled full with the sense of his love in Jesus Christ!

“And then, think what a good thing it is that we are gathered into families as we are—the blessing of love between brothers and sisters, between fathers and children and friends. And yet how often does it happen that these are not blessed—that sons are set against fathers—that brother strives with brother, and sisters are filled with envy of each other, hating with a hatred more deep in that they are kin to each other. A new dress, a fresh pleasure, a little admiration from others, and there is strife and envy, which, as you know, the Bible says, is like the letting out of water. I am sure you each one know of cases where this is true. In these family affections God careth for us; but as it is with the seed that is sown, they often, often waste themselves unless the love of God comes in to preserve them and keep them pure. But when we have God for our loving Father and Christ for our elder Brother, we can grudge nothing, envy nothing—we rejoice in all gifts that others possess, if so be we can only be made to help consecrate them to his service, and we never let go hope of that. Oh, dear friends, it is only when we have got this love in our hearts that all other ties become light and joyful, and no work or labour is any longer slavery, however hard. Your child, so long as he is a child, how lightly will he do your bidding, run your errands, what trouble he will take on your account in the hope of the reward, the smile at the end, or the little gift you have in store for him! Even so is it with believers; they have got entered into a true and abiding family life, and count all men brothers in the tie of a blood that was once offered up, and they know there is a smile and a gift for them at the end. Oh, blessed blood of Jesus, redeeming blood of Jesus, may we be washed therein and made clean—fit to be of the glorious company that is gathered from near and far to serve Him for ever and for ever!

“You know it is only when you cease to be children that you cease to be glad in obeying. You pass away from your parents, and have different views from them—it may be, look on your interests as completely opposed to theirs. Well, so it is pretty much in our way with God. You fancy you could not want this bit of pleasure, that gay dress, that little self-indulgence, and so you shut out the way to pure enjoyment, to a pleasure that reaches to the bottom of the soul and fills it. If you put your little finger close before your eye, it will shut out the whole country from your sight, and if you were to persist in holding it there, it would by-and-by make you blind. So it is very often with our souls and the worldly trifles and enjoyments we strive after. You know that the heart of man is called a great deep, and so it is, for it takes a mighty deal to fill it. Don't you feel, after a night's pleasuring, a strange want in the morning, a craving for the same and more still over again? And if you do and can indulge yourself, don't you feel the want more and more, the next morning after? Oh, my friends, pleasure is like these birds of passage, the swallows, that fly and twitter about our houses in the bright summer days, and then vanish away and leave us, because the dark days of winter have come, when most we need such cheering visits. You know pleasure is called a bubble, and so it is; for it bursts as you try to hold it in your hand. And it is no good striving and trying to hold the bubble in this hand and the grace of God in the other. This is what many Christians—professed Christians—are trying to do. The worldly life is endless labour—a rush, a feverish snatching at something in the air, but never rightly got or enjoyed. But Christ brings life and happiness; once give your hearts to Him, and all the dulness and restlessness will pass out of your life. You will then have rest and peace; and hope that casts out all sorrow. My friends, I do not use vain words. I knew no real happiness till I cast in my lot with Jesus. He has given me a work, and He will give you one, and it will fill your soul so completely that no want will any more be felt. And He will lighten all your burden of care.

‘I lay my sins on Jesus,
The spotless Lamb of God;
He bears them all and frees us
From the accursed load.’

My friends, ‘He careth for us.’

“Yes, the way to be happy is to have work that you have complete pleasure in, that you never tire of—work that is always fresh to you, that, as the common saying is, you can put your whole soul into. And there is no work for this but Christ's work. Once begin it, give it fair trial, and it is like music, like magic. It sets everything in order; there is no more grinding and grating among the wheels of life as now, when it goes just like an ill-oiled mill, wasting itself away with every turn that it takes. Oh, friends, why will ye seek for the twilight, seek to stand between the darkness and the light, when you may be in the full and blessed light of day? Starlight, such as is coming down upon us now, is better than the darkness; but who would wish to be for ever even in the starlight? And the starlight is pleasant just because the sun, though he is hidden, shines through it, gives us promise that he will come forth again. And like to the starlight are all those pleasures—even those innocent pleasures of life—in comparison with the full joy of the life in Christ. So far as they are innocent and truly pleasant, these earthly joys and ties of ours are so because He is in them, and when you come to Him, you only find the way to enjoy them fully, you are in the sunlight instead of in the starlight. So ‘God careth for us’ in making Jesus Christ, his only Son, the Way, the Truth, the Life. In all pure and innocent things we may find Him, and, finding Him, enter by them into greater peace and rest. Oh, my friends, do not leave this place till you have anew consecrated yourselves; and if, alas! you have been hitherto out of Christ, and never had a thought for Him, come now, believe upon Him, receive the gift of his Spirit, that will work in you richly to renew you in the inner man. To think of one lost soul! lost, gone into outer darkness! We speak of the misery of the blind, shut out from the light of day, and all the varied colours that glide over earth's face, and flit over sky and cloud. But what is that to the endless darkness, and the conscience self-torturing, which, you know, is likened to the worm that bites and never dies. Oh, my friends, before you leave this place, resolve to be one with Christ, for there only is safety for to-day and for ever.”

Then the preacher raised a hymn, and having finished it, intimated that she would preach in the same place on Sunday morning as usual; and by this time darkness was falling, and he who had prayed before again raised his voice in supplication.

AGAINST THE STREAM:

The Story of an Heroic Age in England.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE SCHONBERG-COTTA FAMILY."

CHAPTER XXXV.

ANXIETIES deepened on us in our little home-world, as well as in our world of England.

Francis had not prospered, as had been predicted, at the university. Every one had expected much of him, and he of himself. But he had simply glided through; and, at the end of the second year, rumours had reached my father of debt.

He questioned me, and made me tell all that Piers had done to save Francis, for so long. I had never seen him so roused.

"Debt, to the middle classes, is like cowardice to a soldier," he said. "A man who has the habit of it—who does not mind it as long as it only inconveniences other people—has lost all backbone and muscle. He has done with living, and can only be dragged through life at other people's cost."

He reproached himself.

"Euphrasia, you were right!" he said, "I have been blind in refusing to recognise the evil."

Mrs. Danescombe endeavoured to excuse.

"They are gentlemanly debts, Mr. Danescombe," she said. "It is a comfort that my poor Francis has not degraded himself by throwing himself away on low associates. You see, his tastes are all so refined. Books, Mr. Danescombe! He was always so particular, poor fellow, about the bindings of his books. And no doubt these young noblemen and gentlemen of fortune he has written about, who were so pleased to come to his rooms, could not be entertained quite like ordinary people. He will learn the value of money in time. He was always open-handed."

My father shook his head.

"Euphrasia, for heaven's sake," he said, "let us call things by their right names. If it had been a young man's careless generosity, I would have had more hope. To give to equals or inferiors may, at least, be giving. To get into debt, to entertain people above us, is simply bargaining and swindling,—buying a position we have no right to with money we have no right to. It is the sin of the Pharisee and of the publican combined."

"But this once we must give him a chance," she pleaded to him.

II. N.S.

"The only chance," he said, "is to let him feel the weight; to let him feel that these easy, good-natured, selfish habits are binding him with chains more difficult to bear, in the end, than it is to say 'no' in the beginning."

"But these gentlemen who have accommodated him," she said. "It would be such a disgrace!"

"Gentlemen!" exclaimed my father. "Let it be a disgrace. It is a disgrace. I will pay the butchers, and bakers, and laundresses. The gentlemen may abandon him, and wait."

He was not to be moved. The rock at the basis of his nature was reached, and nothing would make him yield.

My stepmother turned to me.

A new tie began to spring up between us.

She wept, and bewailed herself and Francis, and thanked Piers and me for what she called our generosity; and—which touched me most—she said all might be right yet, if only Piers could come back.

The ice-crust between us was broken. I used to sit for hours with her in the Oak parlour, listening to her, and trying to respond in a way which would not wound her.

We had the whist-parties, and the tea-parties, as usual, and she was very complaisant and attentive to every one. She kept up all the old forms of entertainment. She was so afraid Abbot's Weir should scent out anything wrong about Francis.

But, afterwards, she would give way altogether, and declare she was a monster to be able to seem unmoved when that precious boy was perhaps starving, or in prison.

I felt very sure that starving would not be the form in which Francis would suffer debt to press upon him. But a debtor's prison was by no means an unreal, or a tolerable, dread in those days. It made my heart warm towards Francis just to feel how she loved him, and to her to feel how she could love.

The self-reproaches which I had inflicted on myself in my childhood, sitting at my sewing, on that window-seat, came back to me.

Surely, I thought, if I had loved my stepmother more, and Francis, things would have been better. I should have penetrated to her heart sooner. We should have been more united as a family, and more able to help each other.

And yet the excuses with which she excused him to herself were as repugnant to me as to my father.

At last, one morning came a letter in the laboriously neat handwriting of an uneducated person, addressed to Piers, with "Urgent" on the cover.

After a little hesitation my father opened it, and to his perplexity found it signed in our family name—"Dionysia Danescombe." Slowly the meaning dawned on him. It was from some one calling herself the wife of Francis. "He had wished the marriage to be concealed from his family for a time," she said, "desiring to tell his father himself."

She had consented. She wished now she had not. Her father, also, had objected. His family had lived for generations in the village. They had a little farm and a general shop, and he did not like marriages with gentlefolks. They had been hasty and wrong, she feared. But Mr. Francis Danescombe had told her everything was sure to come right, and every one was sure to come round. Now, however, everything had gone wrong. Some of the creditors had found out the marriage, and had refused to wait any longer; and Francis was in prison, and her father was very angry. He had never had any wish for his daughters to marry gentlefolks, but if they were gentlefolks, they must prove it, he said, by paying their debts; and she had always heard Piers was kind; and she did not know what to do but to write to him. She was sure every one would help poor Mr. Francis Danescombe, when they knew.

"To my surprise, my father was less disturbed than my stepmother about this letter.

"Impertinent creature," she said, "to dare to call herself my Francis's wife!"

"It is certainly no consolation if she is not," he replied. "But I have no doubt she is. The letter is straightforward enough. The poor child, no doubt, thinks Francis comes of the race of Croesus; and she has, I fear, the worst of the bargain. It is a sad affair. But it may teach them something."

"Them, Mr. Danescombe!" she exclaimed, with tears, "you never surely mean to acknowledge such a connection. That my poor boy should be tied for life to a creature that cannot fold or seal a letter properly!"

"My dear," he replied, "if the law acknowledges the connection, what can we do? The question, at present, seems to be to acknowledge the debt. And, indeed," he continued, endeavouring to console her, "I think there is a cheerful side to the affair. The father, you see, did not wish it, which looks respectable. He is a village shopkeeper and yeoman;—not one of the university tradesmen, who prey on young graduates. And a debtors' prison is the kind of lesson our poor Francis is not likely to forget."

Every article in my father's pleading was, I felt, telling the other way with Mrs. Danescombe.

"Indeed, Mr. Danescombe, I shall never be able to understand you," she said. "What consolation there is in the poor deluded boy's having made a low marriage (which I do not for a moment believe he has); and if he has, what comfort there is in her father being not only a tradesman but poor; and least of all, how you can think any good is to come of his being in a debtors' prison, you cannot expect me to comprehend. I confess I think this is not a subject for pleasantry."

"Pleasantry, my dear!" he exclaimed. "I never felt anything more serious or less pleasant in my life. But the most serious thing of all is the wretched habit which brought the poor boy to it. I was only trying to hope that might yet be cured."

"Wretched habits!" she said. "You talk as if Francis had been given to drinking or other vice, when he has not a fault, but that his temper is too easy and his habits are too refined."

My father gave up the debate, with a sigh. And then he sat down at once at his escritoire, and began to write a letter.

"To whom are you writing?" Mrs. Danescombe asked.

"To the girl's father," he replied, "to find out the truth and see what can be done."

"You mean to believe all that creature writes!" she said, "and to leave my poor son to bear the suspense and misery?"

"My dear," he said very gently, "if it is not true, let us hope Francis is not in prison; and if it is, what better way is there of helping him out?"

The letter was sealed and dispatched.

And every morning after it was at all possible an answer should arrive, my father, calm as he tried to be, went himself to the coach for the letters. And I with him.

On the third morning, the coach had already arrived, and there was a little stir and crowd around the door.

When we came there was a buzz of sympathy, and way was made for us at once. A tall, spare, bronzed young man, partly turned from us, was helping to lift a wounded person of some kind into the inn parlour.

A little subdued moan came from the sufferer, and then a cheery word of thanks, from a well-known voice.

And in another moment my father and I were standing with our own Piers, hand in hand, beside poor Dick Fyford, lamed at Trafalgar, and only landed, owing to some accidents of weather, the day before, on our coast.

"Picked him up at sea!" said Dick, indicating Piers.

With which vague vision of Piers floating from Lorraine to England on some ancient Ocean River, we had for the time to be content; Cousin Dick himself being the first subject of attention.

How content we were, I recollect to-day, as distinctly as if that were yesterday. It was like springing straight from the breakers to the fireside. The whole world became terra firma once more. Everything, I was persuaded, must go right now; the French war; the abolition of the slave trade; Francis and his debts and marriage; Amice and her love, and her work for her slaves; Abbot's Weir, England, the world. And all because that one parting was over!

So long ago! So many partings since, without meeting again! Without the meeting again yet. And now, at last, so near the meetings; so nearly past all the partings, at least the partings from being left behind, is it any wonder my heart should bound sometimes, more like a happy child's than an old woman's? Is it any wonder that looking back to that return of my brother, the tears of joy come into my eyes again, whilst I feel now it was nothing but a shadowy glimpse and a momentary vision of what is to come, and is not to pass away?

CHAPTER XXXVI.

THERE were so many people in want of help in our little world when Piers came back to us, that there was little time to discuss his own adventures. Besides, Piers's genius was not exactly narrative. For many years some casual incident or remark would continue to bring out new fragments of his French experiences. We had to put our "Odyssey" together as best we could out of stray allusions and episodes.

On one point he insisted; and this was, that he owed his escape to Claire, to the easy, idiomatic French into which we had naturally fallen with her from childhood, and to the friendly aid of the people who remembered her family, in reaching the coast. It was a fresh link between these two to have that terra incognita to all besides, the scenes of Claire's childhood, familiar ground to them.

Moreover, in those three years, the world of books had opened on Piers.

He had picked up fragments of the old libraries of the gentlemen of Port Royal, classical and mathematical, in farmhouses near the desolated abbey. He had found a safeguard from restless regrets and wishes in sharpening his mind against the old mathematical problems. In his banishment from those he loved and could serve in the present, the great men of the past, workers and thinkers, had come near to him; the life of the past had become a reality, and a school to him; and he came back to us with the bracing and bronzing of Greece and Rome on his mind, as his face was browned and bronzed by the suns which had ripened the vineyards and corn-fields of France.

In religious reading, he had been limited to a Port Royal copy of the Greek Testament, and to Pascal, so that in those years the incrustations and petrifications of Mr. Rabbidge's "letters" had been pierced in many directions by living springs of thought. But this, like the rest, only came out in glimpses. The first obvious and certain discovery was that our healer and helper had come back to us, and that we had immediate need of him.

His first labour was to extract Francis from prison, and to extract from him the truth concerning his debts and his marriage.

Piers did not indeed find Francis in one of the miserable dungeons in which John Howard had discovered the prisoners for debt twenty years before. The walls had been whitewashed, and some of the more fatal grievances had been removed; but he found him penned in with a forlorn company composed partly of destitute creatures fallen there through wrong and misfortune, and feeling the humiliation bitterly, and partly of reckless men brought there by vice, and minding it very little, as long as they could gamble with each other, or bribe the gaoler to get them food and drink.

Francis was depressed and remorseful. He regretted his debts, and rather repented his marriage. He felt he had lowered himself; but at the same time he felt the punishment so far beyond his deserts, that he was half disposed to regard it as a wrong, for which the only amende his family could offer him was to pay his debts, and to enable him to make his married life as comfortable as circumstances would admit.

"If you had been here, my dear fellow," he said pathetically to Piers, "it would never have come to this."

He had, he admitted, been too "openhanded," but at the same time "he could not but be sensible that much of the result had been the consequence of our father's being a little unsympathetic, and of the scandalous detention of the Ten Thousand by Napoleon Buonaparte."

He felt himself a prodigal son indeed, but arrived at a very touching and hopeful point of his career. He had come to the husks. He found them unsatisfactory. He was ready to return. And no doubt his family were ready and even eager to receive him. None of them, he felt sure, were like the Pharisees. Piers was not a brother to begrudge the fatted calf. And thenceforth there was no danger of his trying the husks any more.

The parable was complete, with one omission.

The "father, I have sinned" was not there.

Although outwardly certainly much in the prodigal's position, Francis seemed inwardly to have a great deal more resemblance to the Pharisee.

He acknowledged that he had made mistakes. He had been too careless. But, after all, at bottom he felt himself a person of finer tastes and of a better heart than those who had stayed in the father's house. He had, moreover, been reading religious books. He felt that he had lived hitherto in too legal a spirit. He had not apprehended the mercy of God, the freeness of pardon, and the imputation of righteousness. There was something very affecting in the illustration afforded by his present position. His father would pay the debt, and he would be liberated. But he should go out of prison an altered man, ready to take his degree, and to preach, he trusted, not without effect, as soon as he could be ordained.

At this proposition Piers was infinitely dismayed.

To him those words, which glided so smoothly from the lips of Francis, were such profound realities; and so inseparably united with other great moral realities of which Francis seemed to have no conception!

Sin, as the one evil of the world; Divine Love spending itself in redeeming agonies to rescue from sin; giving itself perpetually in discipline which wounded and probed, in pardons which bound up and healed, to raise the fallen soul from the slough of selfishness up to itself,—were so engraven on his heart,—that to see any one grasping at the pardon not as a call back to the heart of the Father, but as an escape from the discomfort of regret, was to him the most terrible profanation.

His greatest hope was in Francis's marriage. He thought Mrs. Dionysia a young woman of considerable will and shrewdness; and he was inclined to believe, that once convinced that a certain income had to suffice, she would have conscience and sense to keep Francis within it.

Francis would teach her "letters" (especially the letter "h"); and she would keep Francis within the limits of the law, and, probably, secure him a "respectable" career.

The creditors were therefore, by his advice, satisfied. Mr. and Mrs. Francis were established in suitable rooms, with an allowance of which she was to be the chief steward. And Francis had every prospect, Piers thought, of becoming in her hands an altered man.

One earnest remonstrance Piers could not refrain from making, against the sacrilege of taking orders except from the loftiest motives. In this my father earnestly supported him. But Mrs. Danescombe and Mrs. Dionysia were by no means of the same opinion. They were persuaded that there could be no more respectable profession than the clerical, and therefore no profession more likely to lead to respectability. The character was sure to be insensibly influenced by the position.

And as to Francis, he was persuaded that his motives were as lofty as could be required, his talents exactly suited to the office, and he himself quite a changed character.

I was thrown back on my old theory of Francis being a mere mask, a larva with the creature inside lacking. But a kind of external conversion or transformation, such as is possible to an external creature, he did seem to have undergone. The whole outer shape of his life was altered.

In Mrs. Francis's keeping, he became prudent, punctual, orderly, respectable, to the utmost point, gave his family no trouble, gave Mrs. Danescombe much satisfaction, was, people said, a credit to the family, to Mr. Rabbidge, to Abbot's Weir. And what more could be wished, in that ancient, conventional world of my stepmother's?

Piers's second labour was of a more congenial kind. He could not at all comprehend how we had all taken it as a matter of course that Captain Godefroy must remain a prisoner, while Amice went alone on her mission to her slaves. Exchanges had been effected, and could be effected. The Clapham influence, the Beckford-Glanvil borough influence—every influence must be used to set Captain Godefroy free.

With his own marriage in near prospect, his matrimonial sympathies were very strong. He went to London and waited on the officials, stirred up the influences which influence officials, touched the warm heart of the Countess of Abbot's Weir, and even moved the calm judgment of her lord, to discover what might be done; and finally had the joy of bringing back Amice in triumph to our own dear old house (Court being at the time in process of transformation for the reception of Mrs. Beckford-Glanvil); with the promise of glorifying Abbot's Weir by a triple wedding.

For our wedding was indeed to be triple. Our cousin Dick Fyford had at last found the helpmeet whom he had no doubt Providence had designed for him from the beginning. Patience, the eldest of Mr. Rabbidge's fourteen, had entirely captivated him in his captivity. A little older than himself (as had been usual with his early attachments), and, since the death of her mother, enriched by all the experience of serving and nursing involved in the care of thirteen brothers and sisters, she had been frequently called in by Uncle Fyford to give counsel and aid in tending Dick's wounds. On our cousin's impressive heart the natural result had ensued. Patience was more than usually loveable and wise, with a sweet voice, graceful movements, and a kind, bright face. His tenderness was won by the sweetness of what she was to him; whilst all the chivalrous protective manliness in him was roused by the thought of what he might be to her. It was, as he said (and I believe, truly), after all, his first love. Uncle Fyford demurred a little at first, for various prudential considerations.

But many things concurred to soften him. A large portion of Mr. Rabbidge's congregation having waked up to the imperfections of his doctrine, had abandoned him for a new chapel and an orthodox minister; whereupon Mr. Rabbidge had abandoned the remainder to a successor more capable of sustaining a drooping cause, and had glided, with his fourteen children, into a pew in the parish church.

My uncle Fyford felt the compliment, and acknowledged the step as the removal of a social barrier. Mr. Rabbidge's family was of respectable "bourgeois" origin, on the lower ranges of the professions, legal and medical. And then the whole thing was so conservative; which was certainly a recommendation. It was only for Patience to remove from the Abbey Gatehouse to the Vicarage. She would not have any unreasonable expectations. She would not revolutionise his household, or even his cases of Coleoptera. It would be so little trouble, and would make so little difference, and he was so used to her quiet ways, and her quiet soft voice, that, on the whole, he easily glided into feeling it the most natural sequence.

So the triple wedding came to pass.

In those days, Abbot's Weir had not blossomed into æsthetics, social or ecclesiastical. Bridal veils and orange-flowers had not penetrated to our remote regions. Bridesmaids were in this instance a difficulty; I being the only one of our more immediate circle left unmarried. However, the requirements of the age were not so severe as to the multiplicity of assistants then as now. I did duty for Claire and Amice, and two of Patience's sisters for herself; and Uncle Fyford married the three couples securely without assistance.

But we thought it all very complete and festive. The sweetness and beauty of the brides made festival enough for us, as we sat at breakfast on the vicarage lawn; the queenly majesty of Amice's movements, and the southern splendour of her radiant face contrasting with the grace of our Claire, and the sweet English freshness of Patience.

And the landscape was fair enough to set our jewels. The sunny vicarage lawn, the old-fashioned garden, the picturesque ruins of the Abbey, around and beyond; for a background, the river sweeping along the meadows beneath the wooded hills, and the grey, old, familiar Tors; and for human surroundings, the children of the Sunday-school at the feast Amice had provided them in the old Abbey Still-house, where we had taught them for so many years, Reuben and Chloe being master and mistress of the ceremonies.

It was certainly not a wedding without tears. To me, if I dared to think of it (which I did not), this beginning was an ending of so much!

Different as the course and the character of the love which united them to each other, was the course of the life before them.

To Cousin Dick and Patience, as Uncle Fyford had said, in outward scene and circumstance little change.

But to Amice and Claire how much!

Piers and Claire were to live, at first at least, in the old Manor Farm, belonging to my father's family; one of the many small manor houses then existing in our neighbourhood. In its earliest stage, centuries ago, it had doubtless been a stately dwelling compared with thorough cottages of the labourers around it. And to this day an air of good birth and breeding lingered around it. There was a paved court in front, entered by an arched gateway; and a sunny terrace at the side, sloping to one of the countless musical brooks which run among our hills, with beehives on it, and borders of thyme and sweet marjoram and roses and pansies. And within were a hall, with a long mullioned window, and a wainscoted parlour with armorial bearings carved over the large fireplace, and a broad oak staircase with bannisters adorned with carvings of nondescript heraldic creatures, beaked and clawed. And all around its steep roofs and fine old clustered chimneys, a sheltering phalanx of fine old trees, throwing deep shadows athwart the courts and gables and sunny slopes, and made morning and evening musical with the cawings of a pre-historical tribe of rooks, who no doubt looked down a little in a kindly and protective way on us Danescombes as "quite a new family."

A pleasant place it was for Claire to make fair with flowers and fresh draperies, and above all with her own fresh grace; to watch her husband ride from in the morning over the green meadows, and to welcome him to in the evening, with some new discovery or invention of home-delight.

And so life began for Claire and Piers as a delicious pastoral, sunny and pure and calm, shedding the light of its own lustre unconsciously around; whilst Amice and Hervé Godefroy were bent on pilgrimage, literally and mystically, over unknown seas to unfamiliar shores, through untried difficulties to duties as yet dimly perceived. Around them no scenery of sunny pastoral, but storm and battle and peril, to test and develop all that was deepest and highest in them both. No fair golden setting of circumstance around their love. They had only the love itself, the precious stone itself, with all its depth of light and mystic meaning; only each other, as a shield for each other against the world, as a shield together for the sufferers of the world.

Yet certainly they did not feel their lot the poorest.

Nor did I.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

LOVEDAY and I were thus, in a sense, left alone, of all the happy circle of my childhood.

Loveday had always seemed as young as any of us; and now I felt certainly as old as she was, not at all regretfully, but as if set in a little skiff which had reached a calm creek; in a sense, outside the current of life, yet not by any means stranded or anchored, but ready at any moment, at any call, to be in the mid-current to succour any one there. Loveday's skiff had been a life-boat to many. Better I could not wish for mine.

And yet, and yet.—There was a silence in the familiar old terraced garden, on the Leas and by the Leat, and in the empty rooms of the dear up-and-down old house. What was the use of listening to the silence, or of filling it with tears?—of being left behind, or of looking only backwards?

As Amice had said years before, when Piers went first to Mr. Rabbidge's school, "Then don't be left behind."

I would not. Loveday never had been. We would press forward, Loveday and I, together. By the way, we should find not a few "hands that hang down" to lift up. Mine should not be hands that hang down, but hands that lift the burdens of others up. So help me God.

After all, there was double work to do in many ways; and if double work with half-power is depressing to look at, it is inspiring to do. The half-power grows to double power by trying, when the work is given us; and the breath cannot be spent in sighing when all is wanted for the race.

Our Cousin Dick had to leave home soon after his marriage; and he commended Patience to my cousinly and "grandmotherly" care, which she needed, having had her strength overstrained too early by the struggle to make poverty press as lightly as possible on her father and the fourteen, who continued to appeal to her as of old.

And one great gain came to me out of the many gains to others which were in an eternal sense at first loss to me. My father and I became closer companions than ever. Piers was with him by day, but the mornings and evenings were mine; often entirely mine, Mrs. Danescombe being not seldom absent on visits to Francis and his wife. Together we walked through the woods and meadows, or rode among the breezy moors and Tors. And together we roamed over our marvellous English literature, past and present, resting in its sunny pastures, and scaling its far-seeing heights; resting ourselves with his beloved Cowper, in his Winter Walks by the Ouse, or in his Winter Evenings by the Fireside; or led by Shakspeare through the length, and breadth, and heights and depths of human character and human life. Occasionally also new voices came to us, comparatively feeble then, and not at their full force,—yet (my father thought) not without something of the old fire and timbre in them,—in the early poems of Wordsworth and Coleridge. Our father never made a barrier of the past to block out his vision into the present. And so one of the best of all friendships grew up for me—the friendship between a father and a daughter; preserving youth for the child, restoring youth to the parent; enriching the young with the wealth of the recollected past, inspiring the aged with the life of the future which is to expand it; and hallowing all,—the friendship, the memories, the hopes,—with the tenderness of sacred instinctive affection. Often I felt that all my loss elsewhere was made up to me by the gain here. Often I thanked God that I had learned to estimate this treasure before it was too late.

In politics it was not a cheerful time.

It seemed to my father a long descent from the rule of Pitt, of the one man of genius, to the ministry of "All the Talents" which succeeded him. Nor did he share Charles Fox's sanguine hopes of peace with the Emperor Napoleon. He could never comprehend how any one could trust the man whose bulletins were one series of rhetorical lies, who had crushed all true liberty in France, betrayed Venice, and trampled on Switzerland; who had caused the guiltless Duke d'Enghien to be assassinated at midnight in the ditch at Vincennes, and the noble German bookseller Palm, in open day, near Nüremberg, for refusing to give up the name of the author of a patriotic pamphlet; who hated England with the hatred of an imperious will baffled, and a successful conspirator unmasked; hated her as he hated freedom, and patriotism, and genius, and goodness; as he hated Madame de Staël, Queen Louisa of Prussia, and the noblest of the Republican soldiers; as he hated all that were too great or too true to fall at his feet and worship him; with a hatred which hesitated at no weapons, from the slander of a womanish spite, to midnight assassination, or the slaughter of thousands.

For England to make peace with such an enemy, seemed to my father, to betray weaker nations, and her own noblest reason of existence; to sacrifice the reality of patriotism to the theories of liberalism. It was one of the cases, he thought, not unfrequent, in which heart and genius saw alike,—the heart of the nation and the genius of her greatest—and saw truer than prudence and talent,—the prudence of the subtlest policy, and the ability of "All the Talents."

Grievous it was therefore to him to hear of negotiations going on with M. Talleyrand through all the summer of 1806, from spring till autumn, while Napoleon was using the time in bringing nation after nation into submission; "submission," which, as Lord Howick said, "never stopped his progress."

His only consolation was to turn to the other of the two objects which it was said Charles Fox had set his heart on carrying—to the long parliamentary warfare against the slave-trade opened by the first Quaker petition in 1783.

On June 10, 1806, Charles Fox himself, as Prime Minister, moved:—"That this House, considering the slave-trade to be contrary to the principles of justice, humanity, and policy, will with all practicable expedition take effectual measures for its abolition." "His own life was precarious," he said; "if he omitted this opportunity of saving the injured Africans he might have no other opportunity; and under the circumstances he dared not neglect so great a duty."

Too soon was the precariousness of the life, and the sacredness of that opportunity proved. It was indeed his last. That eloquent voice was no more to be heard in Parliament. His health failed almost immediately after that motion was carried by a majority of 114 to 15 in the Commons, and by 41 to 20 in the House of Lords.

Within three months, Charles Fox was laid close beside William Pitt, in the north transept of Westminster Abbey.

"The giants are dead," it was said; "we who have seen them know. We have come to the lesser race."

Another of her great sons had been sacrificed to his work for England. The negotiations for peace with France, from which Charles Fox had hoped so much, had failed. Care and failure had told heavily on his already weakened frame. But "even when removed by pain and sickness from the discussion of political subjects," Mr. Clarkson wrote, "he never forgot the Anti-slavery cause. 'Two things,' he said, on his deathbed, 'I wish earnestly to see accomplished—peace with Europe, and the abolition of the slave trade. But of the two I wish the latter.'" The last and best was granted; and the hope of it was permitted to dawn on his dying eyes.

Debates followed in both Houses, sometimes prolonged till the dawn; until at last on Wednesday, the 25th of March, 1807, Lord Granville's ministry ennobled themselves, and England, by obtaining the royal assent to the abolition of the slave-trade, in the very last hour of their existence, when his Majesty had demanded the resignation of office rather than yield Catholic emancipation.

It was decreed that no slave should be landed in the British colonies after March 1st, 1808. That was a day of pure and exalted triumph at Clapham. To those who fought that battle, success was incomparably dearer than fame, and the success of May 22 was the glory of each, and the joy of all.

Twenty years before, in 1787, the first meeting of the Society for the Abolition of the Slave Trade had been held, by twelve men, mostly merchants, all but two Quakers; at their head Granville Sharp, who had struck the first blow in rescuing Jonathan Strong twenty years earlier yet, in 1767;—amongst them Thomas Clarkson, who of all the advocates approached the nearest to the martyr's crowd, having again and again risked his life in hunting out, through riotous taverns, and on stormy seas, the evidence which convinced the nation and the Parliament.

For forty years they had carried the contest on;—their first victory the decision wrung from Lord Mansfield, that no slavery was possible on English soil.

During those forty years, the monarchy of France had perished; the French Republic had fallen before the Empire; all Europe, all freedom and national life were falling before Buonaparte and the terrible instrument of destruction he had created out of prostrate France.

Three times invasion had threatened our shores. Our navy had saved us, but had lost its greatest commander. Two of our greatest ministers had died, worn out with the combat.

But steadily, undistracted by perils they felt as keenly as any, or by the ruins of fallen dynasties and falling nations, and undismayed by defeat and calumny, Wilberforce and Clarkson, and those who worked with them, had pursued their great purpose.

And at last the midday sun of Wednesday, March 25, 1807, shone on their victory.

Clapham went to the ends of the earth for metaphors to express the joy. My cousins wrote me that Mr. Wilberforce had been compared to "Marco Capac, the child of the sun, descended on earth in pity to human suffering."

A medal was struck, with the head of Mr. Wilberforce, the "Friend of Africa," on one side, and on the reverse, a number of Pagan allegorical personages, with wreaths, Æsculapian serpents, and shields, one of these personages being crowned by a winged being from a cloud, carrying a cross; encircled by the motto which, breaking through the cold haze of allegory, goes straight and warm to the heart—"I have heard their cry." And better than all, through the shouts of victory were heard the threatening murmurs of a war which was to lead to greater victory yet.

Lord Percy spoke of the abolition, not only of the slave trade, but of slavery; and Sheridan dared to say in the House that the abolition of the slave trade was but a prelude to the emancipation of the slaves.

The planters, and those interested in maintaining slavery (like the Dames at Abbot's Weir—and like the Pharisees), had indeed seen, from the first, whither the conflict was tending, better than many of those who began it.

It was a daily delight to me to carry every detail of the debates to Loveday, as she lay, now, on her bed, placed as near the window as might be, that she might see the birds which came to the window-side for crumbs, and the children playing in the empty marketplace. Sometimes I thought her very peace and joy must keep her alive.

"Wish it, only wish it enough, Loveday!" I said to her one day, "and you will live to the next victory as you have lived to this."

On the morning when I told her the king's consent to the Abolition had been given, she yielded to a passionate emotion, rare indeed for her. She wept and sobbed for joy. And then she broke into ritual observance.

"Bride," she said, "I cannot stay in bed to-day; I must dress, and you will place the couch in the front window in the dear old schoolroom; and Piers and Mr. Danescombe will come and lift me to it. And I shall see the children all together again."

She meant not so much again, as "once more," only once more. But she would not pain me by saying so.

Miss Felicity considered it a craze, but she made no resistance.

And that afternoon Claire and I had our Loveday once more on the little couch where she had taught me my "heroes," to say to Miss Felicity, on the first day that Claire kissed me with the fool's cap on.

In the close white cap and the soft grey unrustling dress, and all her cloud of white and dove-colour, with a faint rosy flush on her pale face, like a cloud touched by the earliest dawn.

There she lay like a crowned queen, while all the children came to her, one by one, and from a little basket by her side she gave each some little token; to the girls, pincushions and needlecases, and knitted mittens and housewives, made out of bits of the old dove-coloured dresses; and to the boys, knives and little seals and pencils, which she must have ransacked her scanty childish stores to furnish; for, money she always considered she had none that was not due to her father and Miss Felicity.

She had some kind little saying for every one, and she begged them all to keep the things as keepsakes for her, and as tokens that the poor African mothers and fathers and little children were not to be stolen from their homes again any more, for ever. And then she kissed them all.

The children were pleased, but very subdued. I think they looked on it as some religious festival, which indeed it was, and felt the kiss something sacramental.

And then, when the gifts were given, she said, not in entreaty, but with a gentle easy authority, as of one accustomed to command,—

"Aunt Felicity, I want them all to have a holiday this afternoon, that they may remember the day."

And Miss Felicity made no difficulty or demur, strict as her regulations about holidays were; none having ever been granted by her before, within the memory of Abbot's Weir, for causes less historical than the day of the martyrdom of the blessed King Charles I.—to the confusion of the Jacobins,—or the day of the "happy deliverance of King James I. and the Three Estates of England, from the most treacherous and bloody-intended massacre by gunpowder"—to the confusion of the Papists.

Every one felt that this was Loveday's fête; like a birthday, a wedding, or a coronation.

And so the children went away; but their subdued demeanour, which usually ended with the supposed range of Miss Felicity's inspection, lasted further that day.

The little ones went quietly all the way to their homes, to the surprise of their parents; as if it had been Sunday.

And we, Piers and Claire and my father and I, spent the afternoon with her also, as if it had been Sunday; one of George Herbert's Sundays.

"Day most calm, most bright,
The fruit of this; the next world's bud,
The indorsement of supreme delight;"

a day on which

"Heaven's gate stands open," as indeed it seemed to stand to us that day, seeing the light shine through it on Loveday's radiant face, and feeling her so near the entering in. It was indeed her last day among us all. It seemed like a receiving the Viaticum together.

And after that, I felt the journey had to be taken, and we must let her go.

Something about the day having been like Sunday I said to her when we had lifted her to her bedroom again, and I was leaving her for the night.

"Like Sunday? Yes," she said, "but not a Sabbath; not a close. Not a seventh day, but a first day of the week. A beginning. The victory which made it a festival is only the first victory of the campaign. The warfare has to go on, and you will all help to carry it on. And we also," she said with a solemn joy, "if we are with Him Who is conquering and to conquer—nearer Him than we can be here—we surely may help, not less."

She said few of what are usually called last words. Her words had all been spoken on the shores of the eternal sea, whose murmurs make last words so sacred, in the Presence which makes that sea but as the Sea of Galilee on that calm morning when the risen Master waited there to welcome the disciple to the shore.

She never spoke of closing and ending, or repose, or death; but of continuance, and beginning, and service, and life.

"Going to rest?" she said. "Yes! such rest as is possible to love; the rest of Michael the Archangel, the rest of Him who was 'persecuted' in His Stephen, and Whose strength was made perfect in the weakness in His Paul. 'Sleep'; yes, the sleep of those who 'rest not day nor night.' All that needs sleep in us to be left behind in 'the sleeping place.' And we, for us, waking, serving, seeing, with eyes that can bear to see 'face to face.'"

"I hope I have been learning a little," she said. "And now I shall begin to use what I have learned. Not, indeed, 'ten talents' or 'ten cities,' Bride; but perhaps some little village, some little corner of the worlds, to help."

"Why not this corner?" I said; "dear Loveday. Why not us?"

"I should like it best of all," she said, with her child-like smile. "And we shall be near enough to ask Him. And He knows and cares without our asking. But He will do the very best, here and there, for us all. Here, if we will let Him choose; and there we shall delight for Him to choose."

One morning, when I came, she was holding in her feeble hands a letter from Amice. She gave it me to read, and watched me earnestly as I glanced through it.

And as long as her cough gave her an intermission she entered into every detail of Amice's letter, which was very bright, though not remarkably sanguine.

"I write to thee first, our Loveday," Amice wrote, "because I am in thy country, among thy people. Dear, they are not as delightful as thyself. They are not exactly the aristocracy of the races. I am afraid they have not yet reached a region where they can be ruled without rewards and punishments. And I am afraid the reward most of them like best is repose in the crudest sense of doing nothing. A Paradise of lying still in the sunshine, and occasional singing and dancing, with a good deal of sugar, sensuous and spiritual, would satisfy them.

"In tastes, intellectual and physical, we cannot imagine how to meet them. The things we like would be a burden to them. The things they like would certainly not be delights to us.

"But then there is the heart; that in us all which loves; that is, our inmost selves. And this, of course, we cannot pounce on in a moment.

"Poor dear, blundering, imitative children; children with the passions of middle age, and the cunning of hunted old age.

"On one of the estates they wished to get up a Sunday service in emulation of the white men, and for their Liturgy, recited in solemn measured accents, with responses, 'This is the house that Jack built!'"

"Sometimes I am afraid the sacred words in our real worship may, in their ignorance, be to some of them little better.

"Indeed, for that matter, we are nearer such absurdities than we think, all of us, when we make our devotions in any degree a repetition of charms, instead of a communion of heart or a lifting up of the soul. It is so difficult to know when they understand, and when they only catch the words and tones, and copy, like clever, timid children.

"Yet, here again, there is the heart in common. That they can love, and sacrifice all for love, is true. 'They may shoot me dead, or do with me what they please,' one of them said, 'if they only do no harm to our teachers.'

"And some of them, I am sure, have learned from the Moravians, of a pitying, loving, suffering, dying Saviour, to please Whom they will be patient and honest (and which seems to me a miracle of grace), will work industriously for masters who have no more right to their service than a thief to a stolen purse.

"Also, we are beginning to discriminate to see differences among them, in character, and also in race and training. We have a few men of quite higher races; one Mahomedan, who can read Arabic.

"But the grand difficulty is the slavery itself, soften it as one can.

"To train people to be men by keeping them children, to train people to be free except by making them free, by letting them bear the consequences of their sins and mistakes, seems to me, more and more, an impossibility.

"What does the whole history of the world mean but that it is an impossibility, even to God?

"We have found that Mr. David Barclay, one of our community, as no doubt you know, did emancipate thirty slaves in Jamaica about ten years since; but he could not do it in the island. He had to transport them to Philadelphia, and there apprentice them to trades. It answered in almost all cases; but the coldness of the climate of Pennsylvania was a difficulty.

"Meantime Christianity can raise and does raise some even of these slaves. 'If the Son makes any one free, he is free indeed.'

"Only it seems to me more difficult for owners to do missionary work than for others; especially for owners who feel slavery a great wrong.

"I want to be down among them, poor and toiling and suffering; and we cannot.

"We cannot; oh, Loveday. How can I? when God has made me rich with every kind of riches, and above all, with such unutterable treasures of love and joy?"

"How good of God," Loveday murmured, as I laid the letter down beside her, "to let me know even that! And yet how foolish!" she added. "As if we should be blind and deaf, and forgetful there. Blind in his light! Deaf with His voice within hearing! Forgetful in His Presence, Who careth for the sparrows, to Whom one of us is 'more than many sparrows!' Oh Bride, how I love those words! There seems to me a smile in them, like a mother with playful tenderness reassuring a weeping frightened child."

And then came an interval of breathlessness and pain; and she could say no more.

"Amice has crossed her sea, and begun her new life before I have," she said, when it was over.

"But oh, Loveday," I said, "no letters, no message, no sound across that sea!"

"Not from that side," she said. "Only one Voice audible to mortal ears. 'Go and tell my brethren that I am risen and go before them,' was from that side. And it is enough. But messages from this side, who knows how constantly? And we are to be with Him Whom those messages reach, with Him to Whom here we pray."

"No," I said; "the blindness, dimness, deafness, can be only here! But oh, Loveday, say—promise, prophesy—that you will not forget or change!"

"Did you make Amice promise?" she said, stroking my face as I bent over her. "Life changes us more than death; more than living with Him who changes not. With Him we shall be more ourselves, not less. All ourselves, our true selves, perfected; knowing more, hoping more, loving more. My dear, love in heaven must be deeper than love on earth. No love in idleness, no mere delicious leisures its chief rewards; but caring, giving, helping, serving, giving itself. Loving more than here! My darling," she concluded, "who has been so true to me, so much to me, so long, it seems difficult to think so. Yet it must be true. With Him Who loves best. Loving even more than now. Although it seems difficult to think so. Loving more."

And after that I know not that she said much.

It came to nursing night and day. Many of those she had taught entreated to be allowed to help. Her sick-bed was supplied with the best dainties the little town could give, from little shops, and from the gardens of the poor, sent with apologies in the most delicate way, as to a princess. And every morning Claire brought the sweetest flowers. Not one service was rendered her that was not a service of love.

And when all the pain was over for her, for ever, a rare gleam of intelligence and tenderness came even over her poor father, as he looked on her face for the last time, pale and lifeless and full of deep rest, with lilies and white roses around her, Claire's last offering. Old memories seemed to wake up within him.

"My poor child! Good little Loveday! She was like her poor mother. I did not do all I might for either of them. God forgive me." Then turning to Miss Felicity and recurring to the habitual shield of "adverse circumstances" which she threw round him, he concluded, "But everything went against me."

But even Miss Felicity, as she led him away, for once forgot the shield, and did not try to comfort or excuse him. She knew too well how sure the stream is to sweep down those who do not pull against it.

She only said, "God can forgive us! He has more than made up to her. He can make us a little like her,—a little, before we die.”

The beauty of the patient life had burst on her at last, now it was finished. It had then, after all, been no poor ruin; but a lovely cherished shrine of God.

But to me all through those sad days, and from her grave, beside that of my own mother, her words kept echoing back, as if from heaven,—

“With Him who loves most, Loving more even than she loved here below. Although it seems difficult to think so. Loving more.”

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

THE years were come during which England had to pull absolutely alone against the stream; the whole continent swept away by the torrent of Buonaparte's victories; the oldest dynasties following with such acquiescence as they could assume, in the wake of his triumph; the nations dragged helplessly on, not yet aroused. And England herself without any leader, on the throne, in the Council, in Parliament, by sea or by land, to whom she gave her whole trust; Nelson, Pitt, and Fox all laid low in her defence.

Yet the spirit of the nation was high and unwavering. The conscience of men had been freed from the sense of a great national wrong. The least symptom of success to our army was welcomed by many, after the abolition of the slave trade, as a sign of Divine approval; whilst failure, as at Buenos Ayres, was resented as the result merely of the incapacity of the leader, and did but increase the sturdy determination of the people not to give in.

Meantime Europe seemed falling deeper and deeper. On the 14th of October, 1806, Prussia touched her depth of humiliation at Jena. In November Buonaparte had entered Berlin in triumph. Happily for Prussia and for her kings, at the last, they fought and fell with the nation, and were honourably identified with her sufferings. While dismembering the kingdom, Buonaparte circulated calumnies against the noble Queen, and stooped to call the king “General Brunswick.” Prussia and her royal race were in the dust together; and from the dust together they arose.

But as yet not a promise nor a stir of rising life was visible.

From Berlin Napoleon had issued, in November, 1806, the famous “Berlin Decrees,” making all English commerce contraband.

In April, 1807, after his victory of Friedland, Napoleon met the Czar Alexander in the richly canopied tent on the raft on the river Niemen, and concluded the Treaty of Tilsit.

North and south, east and west, on all the dreary horizon, not a Power seemed to lift its head in opposition, over the fields swept level by triumphant armies; kings were acquiescent, and nations prostrate. Sweden, our one ally at that moment, under the young king so soon to be dethroned, seemed scarcely a Power, and scarcely within the European horizon. Buonaparte's brothers were on the thrones of Naples, Holland, and Westphalia; and one was soon to be on the throne of Spain; whilst his generals were to be transferred to those of Naples and of Sweden.

Yet, hopeless as everything looked, national life was not extinct.

It is good now to recall the thrill of delight with which the first symptom of the rekindling life was welcomed throughout England.

England had seemed the only living nation left in the world, the only people that at the touch of the French armies and the word of the Conqueror would not crumble into atoms. Was there such a thing, some might question, as national life at all? Was not human society after all a mere nebula of disconnected atoms, in perpetual oscillation, and perfectly indifferent around what centre they were grouped, as one attraction or another proved the stronger; the isolation of England being simply mechanical and geographical, an affair of a few miles of separating sea? Was not the “nation,” after all, a Platonic dream, as obsolete as any other of the “Universal Ideas,” or any other exploded theory of old scholasticism, the only reality being individual existence, and self-interest?

The answer came from the most unexpected side; from Spain, asleep for centuries under her imbecile kings.

Buonaparte did but attempt with her what elsewhere had been submitted to patiently enough. The game seemed safer than usual. There was a division in the royal house. One puppet was intriguing against another. What could be easier than to entrap both, betray both, and set a Buonaparte on the vacant throne?

But then suddenly the great chess-player discovered that the pieces had life; kings, queens, bishops, knights, pawns, most evidently of all, and most unaccountably of all, were not puppets but men, fathers and sons, families, a nation.

From end to end Spain awoke; awoke, arose, lived, palpitated in every limb with life. Simultaneously, not at the summons of any one great Leader, but spontaneously, without preparation, city after city, province after province, rose, felt they were not many but one; and refused to be at the bidding of the one man before whom all Europe had bowed down.

The enthusiasm of sympathy throughout England was universal.

All our England (the England some call prosaic, with an exceptional Alfred, Shakespeare, Milton, Cromwell, Nelson, or William Pitt) ran wild with welcome to the "patriots of Spain."

Sonorous Spanish names rang like our own great patriotic household names through every sober little country town in the land. The Maid of Saragossa became as much a heroine among us as Joan of Arc ought to have been in France. England demanded to spend her treasure and her blood in helping this new-born people to freedom. The name of freedom had its old magic still among us, and knit the countrymen of Drake in brotherly bonds to the old enemies of the Armada. Mr. Wilberforce said in the House of Commons, "that every Briton joined in prayer to the Great Ruler of Events to bless with their merited success the struggles of a gallant people, in behalf of everything dear to the Christian, the citizen, and the man."

We who know what came after that first trumpet-call of patriotism and liberty, the struggles with the incapacity and selfishness of "patriotic Juntas," which all but baffled Wellington, and all the chaos that has followed, may find it difficult to recall the deep and generous response that Spanish appeal awoke.

But into whatever feeble and discordant echoes the music fell, it was, nevertheless, in its beginning, a true trumpet-call, clear and strong, giving forth no uncertain sound. It awoke the nations from a sleep of despair into which they never fell again, to prepare themselves for the battle. And for any nation to have rendered that service to Europe is a fact never to be forgotten.

It was in May, 1808, that this voice of patriotic resistance reached us from Spain.

On the 12th of July, Arthur Wellesley sailed from Cork for Corunna. In August he defeated the French at Vimiero; and the Peninsular War, and the fall of Buonaparte had begun. Buonaparte had touched the sacred realities of human life; and henceforth his warfare was no longer merely with dynasties, but with nations, and with men.

During those years my father woke to new hopes for the world.

He had always looked on Buonaparte as the most unmitigated embodiment of the principle of selfishness, which is the root of human evil, that the world, or at least Christendom, had seen; the devil's ideal of humanity, "Ye shall be as gods," opposed to the divine, "I come to do Thy will."

And selfishness, evil, could not, he thought, create, or even organize. Being a negation of light, and heat, and life, it can only detach, divide, disorganize, deny, destroy. The nearest approach it makes to positive organization is in freezing, crystallizing living waters into ice. But the unity thus created is only apparent; ice-seas, ice-bergs, ice-blocks, with no power in them save that of mass and momentum; power which the petal of a flower at the touch of the sun can vanquish.

Into such ice-blocks Buonaparte had been freezing the nations; with such an ice-torrent he had been laying them waste, through his Grand Army. And now at the awaking of life within the nations, the whole frozen fabric was crashing down, or melting away.

He had been able to create nothing. It incensed him that men of genius did not rise at his call. He was ready to lavish rewards and decorations on them. But in the icy atmosphere he had spread, no literature could grow. Even the code called by his name was truly, my father said, but a modification of the work of the Republic; the literature that did flourish was but the feeble harvest of earlier sowing. The conglomerations of people he had forced together into "kingdoms," did not recognise themselves as corporate bodies; and when the icy hand was withdrawn, they simply flowed, without effort, back into the old channels. The one thing which had seemed most like a creation, the Grand Army which moved at his bidding, and was inspired by his will, which had enlarged and compacted year by year, and had desolated Europe, was indeed no organization of life to Europe or to France, but only a terrible engine of death, soon to recoil on itself.

And from the first moment when the nations awoke, that engine of destruction, dreadful and terrible and strong exceedingly, was doomed.

Many vicissitudes indeed there were.

The pathetic elegy—

"Not a drum was heard, not a funeral note," rang like muffled bells throughout England when Sir John Moore fell at Corunna.

Deep was the indignation among us when Andrew Hofer was betrayed and shot in the Tyrol; and true was the grief to many of us when the young Schill fell in battle, saving Buonaparte from the dishonour of executing another patriot as if he had been a rebel.

Many were the reasonable grumbings and murmurings among us when the Government lavished money in sending thousands of Englishmen to die of marsh-fever at Walcheren, and withheld supplies from Sir Arthur Wellesley. Many also were the unreasonable grumbings when Sir Arthur Wellesley, after the victory of Talavera, retired within the lines of Torres Vedras, refusing to risk England and Europe by hurrying before popular outcry, as he refused to abandon her for any niggardliness of cabinets, or cabals of fanatics.

Those two years between Talavera and Ciudad Rodrigo tried the patience and faith of the nation. For while they were slowly passing, Buonaparte had imposed on Sweden one of his generals as king, whilst Austria had given the Corsican an Archduchess in marriage, and an heir had been born to perpetuate the new dynasty; and a deplorable war had broken out with America, to my father the most unnatural of conflicts.

Yet there was a feeling of hope through the nation, the indescribable sense of vitality and growth which distinguishes the dullest spring day from the finest day in autumn.

One hero was amongst us again, who never lost hope.

Sir Arthur Wellesley, behind the lines of Torres Vedras, persisted that Buonaparte's empire was undermined; and that England had only to hold her own, and keep hope alive in the Peninsula a little longer, and the crash would come.

Meantime, in this silence and isolation of our country, there was anything but silence or lifelessness.

In 1811 the first steamboat was launched on the Clyde. The great Steam Power had made another conquest. In the same year the anti-slavery cause gained another victory by the passing of Lord Brougham's Bill, constituting slave-trading Felony.

And throughout the land sounded a chorus of new poetic voices. Buonaparte could create no literature in France. But Freedom, and the conflict with the oppressor, awoke a fresh burst of poetry and art in England.

Once more, as in the days of Luther, English thought drank from the old kindred Teutonic sources (once more themselves issuing afresh into the light), giving and receiving, as is natural and due between races so one and yet so diverse.

Scott and Byron, Wordsworth, Coleridge, Southey, Keats, Shelley, began to be heard among us. And Flaxman was there for the sculpture of our heroes and singers; now that we had again heroes and poets to celebrate.

It was an era of new life; although the powers of death and darkness, storm and whirlwind, were still mighty in the world. As of old, in all our northern spring-tides, the hammer of Thor the Thunderer wakened the earth to song.

And meanwhile, in our little world of Abbot's Weir, life and death were at work.

The feet of little children pattered about the old rooms at Danescombe Manor, and merry little voices echoed among the old trees. The garden terraces of the old house in Abbot's Weir, the Dropping Well and the "Aladdin's Subterranean Passage," became scenes of hopes and delights to a new generation.

Little cousins came to join them, also, from the Vicarage. Once more little motherless children played on the slopes, and along the Leas and the Leat. For during our cousin Dick's absence with the fleet, Patience, his young wife, had died, leaving a twin boy and girl. The strain of motherly care, coming on her so early, had been too much for her tender and anxious nature, and she passed away, leaving the great blank such lives must leave.

Eager, eloquent, questioning voices may soon be replaced. It is the quiet answering voices, scarcely heard except in response, in careful counsel, or in gentle decision, which leave the terrible void of silence.

She lived until the baptism of her babes Piers and Claire and I were sponsors. I had always been drawn closely to her; and she had for me that strange strong affection which so often silently possesses natures that have little power of utterance.¹

Horatio, the boy, was called after his father's hero; and for the baby girl the mother would have her own name joined with mine.

"You will love the little ones, and they will love you," she said, "Bride, Cousin Bride!"

I did indeed love them. Who could have helped it, having a "grandmotherly" heart like mine? Dick was smitten to the dust by the loss of his wife's deep, quiet affection, and was only to be comforted by continual minute details about her babies.

And so it happened that their home was almost as much with us as with Uncle Fyford, to whom the babies were naturally a considerable perplexity.

Mrs. Danescombe was more patient with these little ones than she had been with us.

Indeed, she seemed more dependent and more sympathetic in many ways than of old.

The love for her Francis, which seemed first to have awakened her heart to the joy of loving, brought to her further teaching through the burdens and sorrows, and even the disappointments of love.

Mrs. Dionysia was not at all a person meekly to take the second place. And my stepmother, when she returned from her visits to Francis, seemed to me to cling increasingly to us, and to accept our attention and deference with a gratitude very different from her old way.

Moreover, these visits became rarer, as Francis became established as a popular preacher in a fashionable watering-place, where his exquisite manners and rounded periods made a great impression; and as Mrs. Francis left her village origin farther and farther behind, whilst her father's death left her joint-heiress of his not inconsiderable accumulation of savings.

Mrs. Danescombe never blamed them. She had too long been used to throw a veil over Francis' failings, to hide them from others; and now it touched me to see how she tried to transfer the veil, so as to hide what she could not bear to see, from herself.

Francis' family increased; the spare room in the house diminished. The grandmother's visits became limited to an annual one, and this again had to be limited in extent. There was only one small room,—Francis' dressing-room—when his mother was not there. Of course Mrs. Danescombe was most welcome to it. But she could not but feel she was costing them a sacrifice of comfort whilst she stayed.

And at last, one year, instead of the annual invitation, came a long apologetic epistle from Francis. He and his wife were so distressed; but they had been obliged to make other arrangements in the house. One of the children had to sleep in the dressing-room. Francis had to content himself with a strip of a room on another floor, which really Dionysia could not think of asking his mother to occupy. They must hope for more space in a little time. Dionysia talked of investing part of her property in building a house. But for the present, with the greatest regret, they were reluctantly compelled to deny themselves their annual pleasure, &c.

Mrs. Danescombe gave me the letter to read. I felt an indignant flush rise to my cheek, and could scarcely restrain myself from warm words of blame.

But my stepmother said,—

"You see they have talked it over, and done their best to manage it for me. But they cannot. I will make haste and pack up the little presents for the children, that they may get them in time."

We did not say another word, but I helped her to finish and pack the gifts she had been so busy preparing,—little knitted socks, warm grandmotherly articles of winter clothing, packets of manifold many-coloured sweet-meats, yclept "fairings," picture-books, and some little luxuries Francis had been fond of as a child.

She took it very quietly. But the tears came many times into my eyes, as I helped her. And when the hamper was filled and carefully corded, she sate looking at it a moment, and then said,—

"It will please the little ones."

And then, with a child-like, helpless look, and a quiet hopeless tone I shall never forget, she said,—

"They do not want me. No one wants me."

I tried to comfort her. I said, "We all wanted her—I wanted her;" which, little as I could ever have thought it, began to be really true.

But she shook her head.

Then I went back to the subject of Francis, and spoke of the new house, and the room there would be sure to be in it for her. She tried to take up the hope.

"I am afraid I have been too much given to interfering and finding fault," she said, humbly. "Dionysia said so. I tried not to offend her. But perhaps I said too much. And she does not bear much. She naturally thinks of her own children, as I thought of my Francis. I should have remembered better. I suppose I made an idol and am punished."

I don't know what I said then, she touched me so to the heart. I blamed myself, made the best of Francis, and said many incoherent things. But what I felt in my heart, and ended with was:—

"Oh don't talk of making idols. God gave you a child. And you loved him with your whole heart. He was your joy. And that did your heart good, and warmed it all through. And now your love brings you pain. And that does us good, more than anything; the suffering of love. Idols harden the heart. Your love softens your heart. This is not idolatry. Idolatry is selfishness; worshipping anything or any one for our own sakes. This that makes you suffer is love. God is not punishing you; He is softening, teaching,—making you so dear and good! You love, and suffer, and yet love on. In what better way, in what way more like Himself, can God teach?"

She did not oppose. She kissed me, and said I was kind, but that I was not to think Francis meant anything unkind.

"One day, perhaps, he will love enough to suffer," I ventured to say, "and then God will teach him."

"Not suffer!" she said, deprecatingly. "Please God, at all events, not much. It is not much he has to learn."

We did all we could to cheer her, my father and I. But the "serpent's tooth" had penetrated.

Many an hour we passed in the old Oak Parlour, such as I had never dreamt we could spend there together. I read and chatted to her. She did not talk much. Her range of literature was not large. Novels hurt her. It was so difficult to find any story of human life which did not grate like a saw on that sore heart. In history she had no interest; poetry she felt flimsy. To sermons and religious books, I do not think she attended much; but these were what she liked best. The good words flowed past her like the murmur of a brook; while she sewed, and knitted, and embroidered, for Francis and his children.

And then came a cold; the last blow which so easily strikes down a frame which has lost any strong vital power of resistance.

She did not very much care to live. She hoped Dionysia would one day build the new house, and they would have room for her. Yet they could do without her; that was too plain: and that was the unutterable anguish.

She did not much wish to die. It was not clear what heaven could have better for her than Francis had been. And even in heaven perhaps Francis would not need her. But she hoped God would be merciful, and pity and forgive her. And so life could be lived on there or here.

I wrote to Francis at the first symptoms of serious illness, urgently. I thought it would be so terrible for him if he did not arrive in time. He wrote back very eloquent and affectionate messages. But there was to be an Archdeacon's Visitation, and he was to preach the sermon. It was an opportunity of some importance; an honour, he was sure his mother would be sorry for him to miss. I must write again immediately; and if the accounts were not better, he would come by the earliest coach.

His poor mother did appreciate the honour.

"Tell him on no account to lose it for me," she said. "He will come as soon as he can afterwards, I know."

I wrote, in contradiction to her wish, urging him to give up the Visitation, and come at once. But there were no telegraphs and no railways in those days. My letter arrived on the eve of the Visitation. Dionysia had prepared a considerable entertainment. No one could say what might depend on such an occasion, or result from it. He preached the sermon, and started on the next morning.

Mrs. Danescombe did not ask if Francis had come. But she asked every evening if the coach had arrived. And when she was told it had, and no further news followed, she said nothing more; except on the last evening, and then she moaned,—

"I am weaker to-night, and worse. Poor Francis, he will be very sorry."

And then, after an interval,—

"Bridget, poor little Bride, you have been very kind. You have done all you could."

And again,—

"God so loved the world that He gave His only Son. He must have loved very much. It must be good to go to Him."

And again, in a feeble voice, as if to herself,—

"Poor dear Francis! He will be very sorry. But, you see, he could not help it. He could not help it. Give him my dear love, and tell him I pray God to bless him with my last breath."

That morning the struggle was over. And we trusted she had found how good it is to be with God.

The next evening Francis came.

He was very much moved. He blamed himself, at first, bitterly.

Then the old habit returned on him. And he began to excuse himself, and to explain to us and to himself how impossible it was he could have done otherwise.

But when all was over, and his mother was laid in the family vault beside mine, the truer feeling came back.

"No one will ever love me as she did," he said to me as we sat alone together in the Oak Parlour—"never again. Would to God I had come the day before."

His sermon at the Archdeacon's Visitation was a great success. It brought him the presentation to an excellent living from the patron, who was one of the audience.

But I believe it brought him a far deeper blessing than that. It had brought him, through the irrevocable loss, through the unfulfilled duty, a sense of irreparable, irremediable, ill-return for so much irrecoverable love, which pierced at last through all his self-complacency, and left a sting of remorse and repentance, wakening the real heart within him to the softening discipline of a life-long pain.

There was no more only that smooth, transformed, respectable, but impenetrable larva of an "outside." There was, as Piers always trusted, and I so often doubted, a creature, still undeveloped and feeble, but living, and to live immortally within.

There was no more only the Pharisee, prodigal or respectable, crude or transformed, thanking God for the shadowiness of his sins, and the efficacy of his repentance, and the success of his labours in turning other people from their real sinful sins.

There was the Publican, beating on his breast, in many a secret hour of that inward, irremediable pain; feeling great need of forgiveness, and asking it; and hoping that the unquenchable love which he had returned so ill, which had forgiven and loved to the last, might be matched by another Love, as enduring and as forgiving.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

THE close of the great melodramatic career of Buonaparte was drawing near at last; a close more melodramatic than any of his bulletins. Or, rather, the drama had passed into other hands; and the melodrama was deepening into true and terrible tragedy.

Wellington, and our little determined British army, were no longer crouching in expectation behind their defences. They were pressing on through Spain; and day after day the coach dashed down the quiet streets of Abbot's Weir, garlanded with laurels for victory after victory—Salamanca, Ciudad Rodrigo, Badajos; sonorous words rang as in old Roman days through the island; and lastly, the significant prophetic name "Vittoria." Vittoria! A great battle won at last on the very borders of France, with the French armies driven before us.

"Mere side scenes," some might say—mere skirmishes outside the great line of battle which, in the spring of 1812, had been terribly advancing in the far north, and was now more terribly ebbing.

Yet it was something to have stood alone as England did against that stream, when all the rest of the world were swept away before it. It was something for Europe, which Europe should scarcely forget: it was infinitely much for England, which England is not likely to forget.

II. N.S.

From March to December that last act of the dreadful drama went on; essentially the last, for after it the doom was fixed, and all was scarcely more than epilogue, merely the last struggles of the dying, the last stroke of the coup de grâce.

In May, four hundred thousand men of the Grand Army had crossed the Niemen to crush the great barbaric northern empire; in December, scarcely twenty thousand baffled, beaten men crossed the Niemen again, the Grand Army broken and destroyed for ever; fire and frost sweeping it away as if it had been something elemental, only to be crushed by elemental forces. Hundreds of thousands dying, one by one, on battle-fields, in exhausting marches, of hunger, of cold, of wounds; and, among all the dying, it was said, scarcely one murmur against the man for whom and through whom, in various tortures, and for no purpose, they died. The Triumph of Loyalty (misplaced as it might be), after all greater than the Triumph of Death.

"With Christ instead of Buonaparte, for the King of Kings!" my father used to say, "what might our race have done—what may it not yet do?"

Yet, once again, France responded to the well-known call. Buonaparte, baffled and defeated, with the loss of nearly half a million, not to be hidden by the most grandiloquent bulletins from the thousands of homes whence they were missed, yet had power to gather two hundred and fifty thousand more to encounter the nations at Leipzig; boys four-fifths of them, reluctant and untrained, yet once under the magic of that imperial name and command, able to win the day in more than one hard-fought fight.

Nevertheless, the great destructive power of Napoleon was broken.

It was no more a conflict of dynasties, but a combat of nations. Never was a truer name given to a battle than that of "Battle of the Nations" (Völkerschlacht), claimed for Leipzig.

After his defeat there, Buonaparte knew that for him universal empire was over.

Professors, pastors, parents stirred sons, students, congregations to this War of Liberation of the Fatherland. Ancient history, Bible history, ceased to belong only to the past. The old heroic stories lived again, and became a source of inspiration for the defence of all that was sacred in life, more sacred than life. Songs and ballads, strong and fresh as at the dawn of history, rang from the hearts and lips of the nation.

In one sense, indeed, Buonaparte had created. He had created by destroying. He had renewed through death. At Jena, but seven years before, he had crushed and broken and dismembered the various states of the old Teutonic empire. At Leipzig, he found springing from the scattered ashes a new, patriotic, living Germany. Out of ruin, restoration; out of states, a nation. And against nations the destroyer had no power.

France, indeed, seemed, like the demoniac in the Gospels, still not to be able to free herself from the awful double personality which had so long possessed her. Bewildered, fettered, and bleeding, she seemed still to answer at her tyrant's bidding through her reluctant conscripts, "My name is Legion, for we are many." But even this was soon to cease.

In the South of France, where our Wellington with the first army which had proved Buonaparte's not "Invincible," was pursuing the retreating French troops, paying his way according to the bourgeois code of honour of "the nation of shopkeepers;" and, as we heard, welcomed by the natives of the Garonne districts with indications of the old fortresses which our ancestors had once held, and with friendly inquiries why we did not come back.

And in April, at Fontainebleau, Buonaparte signed the abdication, leaving, as most of us then fondly thought, France once more clothed and in her right mind, at the feet of her ancient kings.

Then, in our England, followed three months of rejoicing, such as England has seldom seen. The very skies seemed to rejoice. The old country for a time threw off her veil of clouds, and shone and laughed, as the green English land can shine and smile, through all her sunny uplands, and grassy meadows and wooded river slopes, to welcome the Allied Powers, and her own victorious soldiers, and peace.

Abbot's Weir was beside itself with delight. If England had her Wellington to be borne from the sea-coast at Dover, like an ancient hero, on the shoulders of the enthusiastic men of Kent; and if London had its three nights of illumination and its three weeks of festivity, leading the Allied Powers to think there was no poverty in the land (and also inconceivable plunder in the City); if the House of Commons rose to receive and thank our Duke—for we had now our Duke as truly as our King—while he sat loyally to receive the homage so fully his due; if Oxford had her Greek and Latin gratulatory speeches; we also in Abbot's Weir, in our manner, had our festivities, to us as imposing.

Had not Abbot's Weir also her heroic sons to welcome? And foremost of them was our cousin Captain Fyford, wounded at Trafalgar, and battered by many a stormy day since, on the transport service for the Peninsular Army.

The spirit of old Elizabethan dramatic days had come over us, not imitatively, but by the old inspiration. We were to have something approaching a Masque or Mystery; although altogether ignoring any alliance with mediæval mummeries or papistical pomps.

There was to be a review of the gallant volunteers, and a sham-fight; to end in the triumphal charring of our cousin Dick as the representative of the British forces, and the banishment of Buonaparte (in the shape of an apothecary of small stature and military bearing, great among the volunteers, who consented to be victimised for the public good), to an island in the middle of our river, designed to represent the Island of Elba.

It was a day of great festivity; too really glad and natural to be riotous and irregular. The country poured itself into the town; flowers and green boughs and garlands and triumphal arches embowering the streets and festooning the windows; the farmers and labourers with their wives and children flocking in on foot through all the green and flower-strewed lanes, or in merry groups, on pillions, and in waggons; whilst every town householder kept open house, and tables were spread in the streets. The review of our volunteers on the Down went off in a way to convince us that had Napoleon had his coveted command of the Channel for twelve hours and landed, Abbot's Weir at least would have had little to fear.

On the Down, nature herself entered like the gayest of the revellers into our holiday, lavishing the sunshine of her clearest skies, and from the golden gardens of furze-blossom filling the breezy air with delicate fragrance.

Captain Fyford having been duly honoured in the capacity of representative of the British Forces, and the military apothecary having been safely banished to the Island of Elba, all returned to take their share in the feastings and the speechifyings, and afterwards in the dance in the old market-house. And it was still early in the night when the entertainments were over, and the merry-makers had broken up into various groups, and were scattering through the lanes to village and hamlet, and solitary farmsteads among the hills.

All day the children had been with us, keeping close to me and Claire; rather awed and stilled than excited by this universal holiday, and by this mysterious bursting of the whole adult population into play.

Little Horace and Patience especially, the motherless twins, being timid children, would scarcely let go my hands. They seemed to feel as if the world had been turned upside down, and the serious part of it had devolved on them.

Claire and I had thought Patience a little feverish; and after the dance she went with me to see if the motherless little ones were sleeping peacefully in the old Vicarage.

We went alone together through the churchyard where our beloved were sleeping.

The town was growing hushed and quiet; only, now and then the voices of the returning country people calling to each other, sounded back from various distances along the valley and up the hills.

It was so still, that we could hear the rush of the river as we went on towards the Vicarage garden by which it flowed.

Softly we went up to the children's nursery; and there we found both the little ones sleeping tranquilly in their cots; and Claire and I tucked them up and kissed them, and then went down together into the garden.

"It was a fancy," she said, "but I did not like the motherless little ones not to have something like a mother's kiss and care to-night."

And we went back through the churchyard.

We paused together a little by our sacred places there.

"The mothers, and the motherless!" she murmured. "I cannot bear to feel they are left out. Two resting-places. The children are asleep; and there is quiet here."

"But not sleep or dreams, Claire," I said; "the real life has begun for them. We watch by the sleep of the little ones unseen; and they surely watch by us."

"And yet this life is no dream!" she said; that life to her so rich and full and precious.

"Only as compared with the waking by-and-by," I said; "the life they have been awakened to,—my mother and yours; and the mother of those little ones; and the poor mother whose love cost her such anguish; and Loveday, who used to spread her motherly wings over us all."

We stood some minutes silent there, while the quiet flow of the river grew more and more audible.

Then the old church bells chimed out midnight,—the deep silvery tones which sounded from so far away through the centuries.

"Praise God," they chimed, as on the first night of the century.

Since then how many dear voices, then with us "creatures here below," had passed among "the heavenly host!"

Yet still it was one choir, and one song, to which the old bells set the tune.

We were turning away, when Piers and Captain Fyford came to look for us, and went home with us through the silent streets to the old house on the market-place.

And then Captain Fyford made a request to me, in broken and doubtful words, which at the time seemed strange and scarcely possible to grant; but which I thought of again and again, and at last found I could not help granting.

"It would make so little difference," as Uncle Fyford had said of his first marriage.

Yet it has made all the difference to me.

CHAPTER XL.

So it came about that once more there reigned a stepmother and a motherless little boy and girl in our old house at home.

And that impressive moral tale which was the romance and consolation of my childhood, of how I would behave to little children situated as Piers and I were, had an opportunity of being translated into fact.

"So runs the round of life from hour to hour."

Yet it is never the same round. The outward forms and scenes may be the same; but the whole inward life which makes the real drama varies endlessly. The very sameness constitutes the difference. We need never fear monotony in a world where God organizes every leaf diversely, and creates personalities as individual as Adam's; and in which circumstance, and sin, and conflict twist these into varieties so inconceivable. The type endlessly various; and endlessly diverged from.

Therefore the morals of those very "pointed" tales of my childhood never came precisely into play.

My temptations and my poor stepmother's, from within and without, were by no means the same.

In the first place, my step-children and I began by loving each other very dearly; and if I shrank determinedly, as I did, from assuming Patience's rights and titles, and being called "mother," it mattered comparatively little to them, because it so happened that "Cousin Bride" had long been to them a name expressive of the person who loved them best in the world.

And in the second place, by no compact or command or sanction, it nevertheless came to pass that I had to submit, in the end, to being called "mother." When or how it began I cannot recall; but I could not forbid to these first-born children the name my own children called me.

The truth would have been rather violated than preserved by my rejecting it, although I often tried to show both Horace and Patience that they were better off even than my own, having always that other sacred and undying love watching over them and awaiting them above.

That first gleam of peace which we had all celebrated as permanent passed away. War came again; and Waterloo and St. Helena.

And the warfare which Loveday had cared for, which, as we believed, she was ever caring for still—was carried on to other stages, and through new combatants, although many of the veterans lived yet to carry on the war.

Faithfully Clapham did its part in the combat; and faithfully the Moravian and Methodist missionaries (with our Amice and Hervé Godefroy among them) did theirs.

Clapham, with its offshoots and dependencies, grew richer and more prosperous; and its generosity kept pace with its wealth.

How could it help growing rich?

Being religious makes people prudent and energetic; being prudent and energetic makes people, in the main, rich. And if being rich does not always help people to remain religious, once more from the depths, from the poor, God calls His rich—rich in faith—and strong, through the prayer and fasting by which only the worst "kind" of "foul spirit" goeth out. Thus healthy air circulates, and the world is kept sweet, by light and fragrance, and by salt and fire.

Clapham held meetings, and brought Bills into Parliament, and subscribed tens and hundreds of thousands, and from its suburban Paradises not only "visited" the prisons, but reformed them; not only gave alms to the poor, but educated them out of poverty; not only visited the sick, but healed them in hospitals and convalescent homes; it allured congregations by the thousand, and set them to work on the millions.

And, meanwhile, in Persia Henry Martyn, sent forth from its midst, toiled, and preached, and died, alone; and left but one convert; but inspired countless other lives.

My cousins married; Harriet the "Reformer" a devoted clergyman who lived and toiled in the missionary field, unpicturesque and illimitable, of the low districts of London; Phoebe went to be the comfort of her husband's country parish; Matilda married a wealthy merchant, and admired and assisted other people's excellent works to her heart's content; every one of them bearing with them, wherever they went, the sunshine and sweetness of that bright early home, from which little Martha had early passed away, leaving the most fragrant memory of all.

And Amice and Hervé Godefroy, with their Moravians, worked on also in their own place, not exactly prosperous, not growing at all rich, sorely tried often, often failing in health; but sometimes overpaid with such rare, unutterable delights as only such service enfolds; by seeing hearts that had seemed dead wake up, and live, and rejoice, and serve; by seeing sufferings nobly borne and nobly avenged, evil conquered by good,—patient, faithful lives crowned by joyful death.

Some of their slaves they emancipated and sent to the new free colony of Sierra Leone. And among the rest the labour proved, so far, not in vain, that at the general emancipation in 1832, the islands in which missionary work had been most encouraged, found themselves able to anticipate the period of apprenticeship, and to trust the slaves with immediate freedom.

And then their work, as far as they could do it, was done. They had parted with their children long before, to be brought up in the bracing English climate, away from the enervating influences, physical and moral, around them there.

But they themselves stayed till the emancipation. Having put their hands to the plough, they turned not back.

Then they returned, and took a cottage on the hills near us, hoping that the vigour of the moorland air would restore the vigour they— but chiefly Captain Godefroy—had lost.

Their reward was not visibly here; except indeed for that best reward of doing good work, and for the rare blessedness of that incomparable companionship of a perfect marriage during the years which they were given to spend together; years, one of which had more life in it than many a lifetime.

Not on the heights; low among the heavy-laden, helping them to bear the burdens, Amice had thought this the highest. And God gave her her highest; I think also His highest, the place His highest took on earth.

"We need not try to make life hard to ourselves," Amice had once said, speaking of Clapham; "what are the little pin-pricks we can inflict on ourselves? When God wounds, it is wounding, and we learn; learn to suffer as He suffered. And when He heals, it is healing; and we learn more—learn in our measure to heal as He healed." And so she found it—my Amice, our Amice, the treasure and the succour of us all.

* * * * *

Twenty-five years from that first abolition in 1807, through wars and adversity, and victory and peace, and again through new wars and new peace, that great anti-slavery conflict went steadfastly on, until, in 1832, the Vittoria, Leipzig, and Elba of the first war were succeeded by the Waterloo of the real final victory; the twenty millions sterling freely given by England to redeem herself and Africa from the great wrong; the banishment of the iniquity for ever from all lands over which England held sway.

To the last the veteran leader, William Wilberforce, lived and fought on; at the very last (by one of those weird repetitions of history which read like the refrain of a dirge), like Pitt and Fox in the first campaigns of the war, dying, if not before the victory was won, yet before the day of triumph dawned. And the whole House of Commons followed him to his grave in Westminster Abbey.

The sixty years' war was over; once more, evil had been conquered by good.

A conflict still, as we know, to be succeeded by other conflicts elsewhere, in the same cause; never indeed to be finished, until the iniquity shall be banished utterly from the world.

And then, and then?

Other wrongs, other slaveries, other warfares, other victories; as long as the source of all wrongs and all bondage remains in man; the great mystery of iniquity, beside which all else that we call darkness is penetrable, the awful possibility of the slavery of selfishness and disobedience involved in the very power to love and obey.

Patiently, for more than half a century, that great anti-slavery struggle went on; the "moral atmosphere," which we call public opinion, slowly clearing and becoming healthy in the only way in which "moral atmospheres" ever do clear and become healthy; not by any volcanic irresistible convulsion, as of the elements; nor by slow inevitable diffusion, as of the seasons; but by a strenuous keeping or restoring of the sanitary laws; by a laborious clearing and planting, and embanking, and draining away of everything that causes malaria; by a few brave and patient men, often at first by only one, refusing to drift smoothly along with the evil current of the times, but pulling resolutely Against the Stream.

The End.

SEASONS.

SOULS have seasons. Youth with spring-time
Breaketh into voice and bloom,
Beareth in her breast the sweetness
Of the golden days to come—
Hush!—a something dawneth straightway,
Openeth a celestial gateway.

Love, with summer. On his bosom,
Ruffled by no changeful wind,
Calm repositeth, full and favoured
All His bounties that is kind:
Yet a silence strangely reigneth
Where the Dove alone complaineth.

Is it that with Love as summer—
All its sweetnesses in view—
He is silent, by the picture
Waked to reading it anew?
Does he, mournful in his gladness,
Bode, "Hereafter cometh sadness?"

Even so. The hill-top mounted,
Straight declineth then the way,
It is fore-ordained of Angels
That the night succeed the day—
After laughter falleth sighing,
After living cometh dying.

Even so. But so 'tis pleasant,
When the soul hath reached its gloom,
When the silence speaketh only
Of the silence of the tomb,
When no more the Dove complaineth
For that ne'er a dove remaineth,

Then, O friends, 'tis well to whisper
Hopeful, to the wearied soul—
Patience heart! the night it endeth,
Way-worn feet have reached the goal—
After sighing falleth laughter,
After Death the great Hereafter.

IN REFORMATION TIMES:

Some Glimpses of Life at a Great Era.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "PAPERS FOR THOUGHTFUL GIRLS."

PART III.—THE BARRETS.

CHAPTER III.—THE SOLID TRIBULATION AND THE MOCKING SHADOW.

LIFE at Chevehurst was singularly uncomfortable, and, as it seemed, unprofitable, during the weeks of early summer which followed Madam reasonable, and meek as she had always been showed no present disposition to take the squire's comfort; and as he hated to look upon her face, he had to fall back on a continual round of bowling matches, fishing-expeditions, inspection of his warrens, and punishment of rogues and vagabonds, which should keep him as much occupied abroad as possible. Madam Selby banished the squire from his own hearth and chair in the hall bow-window.

Hugh the younger had the recoil of the young from the misfortune which they cannot obviate, and from the grief they can neither fathom nor console. He imagined that he knew only too well what it would be to be even near losing his cousin Joyce; but he could not conceive the wild conflict, the dull despair of being forbidden even to mourn a loss, the deadly pain and shame which shot through Elisabeth when it was brought home to her that she, a good woman, was not like other good women, but had never owned a right to the place which she had filled with honour and joy, while she had sought to glorify God in the tie which now was said to be no binding tie either in the sight of God or man.

Selby's return to her place in her uncle's house. The old squire had twinges of conscience. Bluff and hardy as he was, he could not feel at ease, or fall on proper footing, with the black-robed woman who, though she did not dream of blaming him, and did not complain to him, remained a monument of suffering endurance and patient sickness of heart. The squire was provoked by Elisabeth's fidelity in mourning now, if she had forgotten once; the first Selby had been something like a man, a young fellow with apparent flush of health and life, while his brother Julian was no more than a sickly scholar, emaciated and hectic, so that a single ague or a touch of the falling sickness might cut him off any day.

"He needed her the more," she said.

What sort of argument was that for a woman who set a proper value on herself, and might again have the pick of brave husbands? She was worth even a nobleman's wooing now, and might rise two or three steps in social grade. The more mature woman that she was, the less time she had to waste in pining and pining for what the priest had told her was unlawful. But Elisabeth, godly,

In Hugh's secret heart, though he pitied both Julian Selby and Elisabeth very sincerely, and while he had more esteem for Julian's intellectual and moral gifts than his father could spare, he did think that the dissolved marriage was not quite worth the frantic outcry which was made about it. The couple were almost middle-aged in his eyes—Elisabeth, the younger of the two by a year, must be twenty-nine. They were fast growing old. They had had their day; why rave because its end was somewhat anticipated? Above all, why stand in the way, barring the opening day of others?

Not so argued Joyce, whose wholesome heart was changed to gall by her vehement adoption of her sister's sorrows. If a life-long widowhood, without the rights and privileges of widowhood, were good enough for Elisabeth, a single life was only too good for Joyce. Possibly poor Julian could not altogether help himself—a rueful sufferer by the terrible change which had come over his life and blasted his home. Joyce's heart smote her for unkind judgments of her brother-in-law, whom she, together with all women, loved since his compulsory sedentary occupations had drawn him into association with them, while his manliness and superiority had continued unimpaired.

But even Julian Selby ought to have known beforehand what might happen, and should have found some redress, and not allowed himself to be beaten off the field with his kind heart swelling in strange sullenness because Elisabeth, being unable to refute the logic of her teachers, in anguish consented to their verdict, and would rather pluck out her right eye than that she, and above all, he, should be written—anathema maranatha.

It was not poor Joyce's way to be unerringly accurate in apportioning censure and awarding retribution. She took the lion's share to herself, ungrudgingly, in proposing its acceptance to Hugh Barret, who rebelled at the morsel. But it must be confessed that she did not thrive on her self-abnegation. Adopted sorrows make, after all, but a spurious experience. When the God of Providence imposes a burden surely He strengthens the back to bear it; and the inevitable nature of the load, with the absence of any lawful chance of freedom, braces the back with the fortitude born of resignation. But voluntarily assumed martyrdom and fantastic consecration, however honourable, and touching to the woes of another, do not of necessity carry strength with them. God wills wisely our several fortunes, and all that man can do is to accept his will, and because of Christ's grace to trust in its perfect goodness. When the two women are grinding at the mill, and the one is taken and the other left, she who is spared must not forsake her grinding in order to go on bemoaning. "What shall this man do?" asks an apostle of the unspoken future of his fellow. "What is that to thee? follow thou me," answers the all-comprehending, merciful Lord. In this sense every man should bear his own burden. There is danger in any other course. Not even the most generous can interfere with what is really another's, and help that other to any purpose, but on the contrary, must hurt himself with a worse hurt than that of body or worldly estate, or even of sweet human affections by intermeddling. So it was, that Elisabeth waxed dumb, so far as fretting went, under the blow which had shattered her roof-tree, stripped her of the companion of her soul, and even of her matronly dignity and repute; while Joyce was peevish, perverse, inclined to rail under the mere reflection of the adversity which she had clutched as her own.

Joyce was cold and distant to her uncle, who had accustomed himself to bask in the sunshine of her busy content and fresh gladness, until he had come to be damped and vexed when he could by no means win her smiles and prattle, after striving in a manner that was positively pathetic; for with all his faults the squire was stout-hearted, and he had been as a father to her.

Joyce was still harder to her cousin, thwarting his overtures and repulsing his approaches. Then, notwithstanding that he had his share of wit, Hugh, while he was higher-hearted, more unselfish than his father, had not his father's patience with the froward girl, whom both father and son loved. He began to be unsettled and sour. He would talk of the reduction of Ireland, and campaigning against the Scots, of voyages in search of new worlds, and even of the attractions and excitements of great towns, while he would scowl at the benefits of country life, with which he had hitherto been well satisfied. Next, the old squire would take up the cudgels against his son; get into a rage, fume fiercely and decline to be propitiated by Dame Wade, his table, his steward, his accounts, his stand of falcons, his leashes of dogs, his barns, or anything.

The whole household was out of trim, as if drifting to disintegration and grief in company with another household. And Joyce looked on as yet with gloomy consent to the result. "Oh, Uncle Hugh," she would silently appeal to him, "what ill had Elisabeth or Julian Selby done to you? Had you no feeling for the girl who so long dwelt with you—your better than daughter—if you had had eyes to value her? My naughtiness pleased you better, but that does not please me to think of. I dare say if you were sick, uncle, I should forget it all, and watch by your bed; but to stir your sack now with rosemary, and play shovelboard with you, and grin in your face as if nothing had happened, I will have none of it, let you hang your grey beard as you will."

It was a sad sign of how broken in spirit Elisabeth was, that she failed to perceive that her wrong was spreading and engulfing others—her young sister, all her old friends—and she did not rise up to prevent the engulment. She was apathetic, unless when she had starts and fits of anguish, and then she would change parts with her sister, and be more unsettled and wayward than Joyce. Joyce had wished Elisabeth to resume the mistress-ship of Chevehurst, but Elisabeth would not consent to this.

"My hand hath lost its cunning except where another house is concerned," she protested; and when Joyce saw how her mind was bound up with Ditton, she felt that her sister had no living interest in Chevehurst. Indeed, it was as if it were only Elisabeth's body which dwelt without a soul at Chevehurst. Good as she was, and desirous in spite of Joyce's will not to throw her shadow over others, or prove more of a trouble to them than she could help, her heart was all at Ditton, or in London with Julian Selby. When she broke her long fits of silence, and, looking absently into the wood fire, or out into the flower-bordered quadrangle, spoke to Joyce, sitting at her account books or her needlework, covertly watching her sister, it would be to say—

"They will have made the first cheese for the year this week at Ditton. The calves will be part weaned. I wonder how my Lady Suffolk's calf—we called the cow Lady Suffolk because she came from that quarter, and she was a very stately beast—is turning out. The floor-cloth for the summer parlour must have come home. Ah! my foot will never tread upon it, though I chose it, and made a great work about the choice. Julian was always the better of a rug for his feet. I hope that they remember it in London, and see that he has his morning draught flavoured with tansy or borage. Do I forget myself because I hope that? Sure it can be no sin to remember what was once my chief earthly duty."

"Elisabeth," said Joyce, suggesting another idea for her sister's consideration, in order to divert the woe-begone mind from perpetually turning back to re-travel the same round, "are you not thankful that you have been spared the trial of leaving children behind you, or else of parting them from their father?"

"I do not know about that," declared Elisabeth, doubtfully; "they would have been brought up to their marred fortunes, and they might have been a comfort to their father. Many people would have been found with the heart to take care of motherless little children, but who will mind my Julian as I minded him? Oh! God, be good to him and me," she prayed, clasping her hands over her face, and bowing herself under her affliction; "give us our reward at last, unworthy as we are, for it was to keep him and me to thee, that I left my love, my husband."

"I would, Joyce, that the Reformed Church were not so sweeping in condemning all religious houses into which lone women like me might take refuge, to be no more tempted by the sight of our lost joys in the possession of others. In such a retreat a woman might occupy herself with her prayers and works of charity, and at last be at rest." So Elisabeth said one day when she was more like herself, and more concerned with her future.

"Let us walk over to the parish church this afternoon, Elisabeth, and hear the clerk reading the Bible to the people who have gathered to listen, after vespers," Joyce proposed, eagerly fain to entice the desolate woman's foot over the threshold.

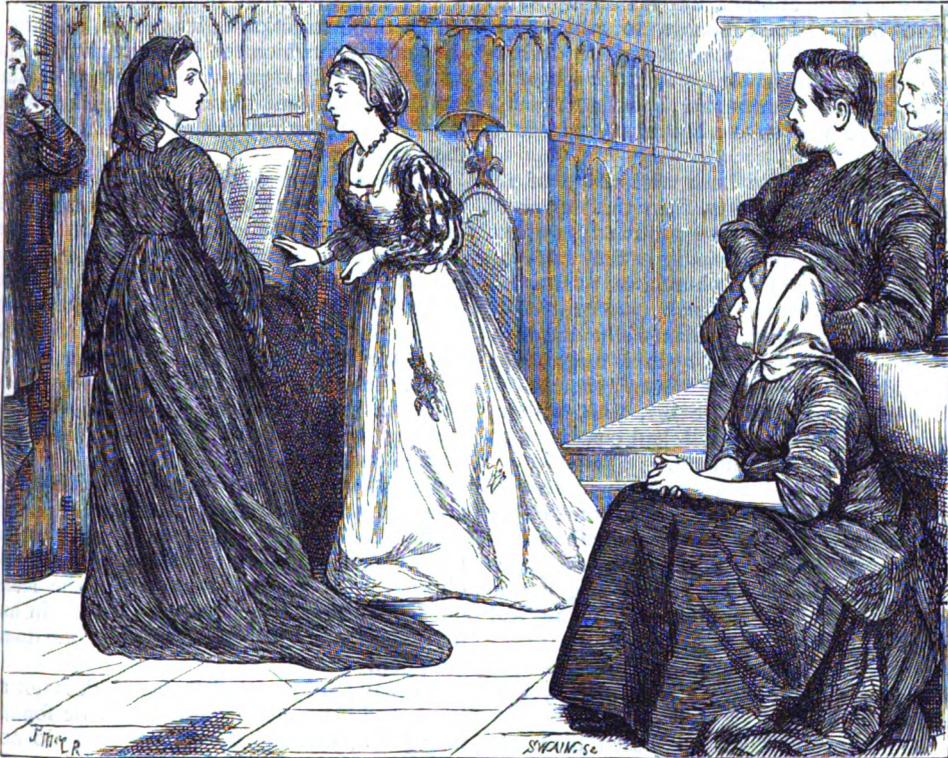

Elisabeth consented, and the two young women took the field path, which was so short, and so near home, that they did not fear to follow it without an attendant, and which terminated in a stile, a lych gate, and a little grey church of Norman architecture, with the vicar's small house adjoining. The path was through the pasture, where the long meadow-grass was beginning to wave in an approach to its June luxuriance, and where red sorrel, black plaitain heads, amber king-cups, and white ox-eyed daisies were already nodding. Colts and heifers were treading up to the fetlocks in their sweet juicy food; larks, willow-wrens, and plovers had their nests in tedded tufts, or under tall stalks of ragwort. Presently the cultivated pasture passed into one of the warrens, into which so much "good English land, because of the value of fur," was retrograding, in defiance of acts of parliament. There the short, bare turf was fragrant and gay with purple wild thyme and golden cowslips, while it was full of burrows, into which living grey-and-white balls were for ever scudding, and haunted by shrill screaming sand martins and lapwings. Like all places in a state of nature, it had a wild, inspiriting freshness. Close to the stile and the lych gate there had once been a pilgrim's holy well, possibly connected with the foundation of the church on that spot. Vigorously reforming hands had thrown down the arch and parapet of the well, so that they had half choked the fountain, causing it to bubble up hysterically, and to overflow its old bounds, with no order or result save that of perpetual oozy discomfort.

"Poor well! thou hast fared no better than some of us," said Elisabeth, pausing and dipping her fingers into the spent water; and then, shaking her hand free of the soiling drops, she added quickly, "but it was no more than thy desert, for thou pretendest to heal what thou couldst not so much as touch. I remember I once sought thee in behalf of a friend, and thou didst cheat me like many another. I owe thee a grudge, yet even in thy best days thou didst not pretend to heal a wounded spirit."

The thatched lych gate still bore its pious inscriptions, carved on its brown wood :—
 “The Place were thine Honour dwelleth.”
 “My Father’s House is a House of Prayer.”
 The iron-studded door of the church stood open as when the empty niches were filled with the figures of saints, and there was a daily stream of wayfarers bound to leave their votive wreaths, present their offerings, and do their penances ; fulfilling the irksome obligations of their enforced round before each shrine. The people were now taught to pray at home, to perform their daily tasks, and rule their hearts and lives, instead of wandering from chapel to chapel, lavishing their substance on robes to the Virgin and St. Lucy, or a silver groat to St. Anthony, or a rose-noble to St. Nicholas, according to the degree and means of the worshipper.

But in the cool dark depths of the church there was a considerable number of persons resting at the foot of the pillars, and on the steps of the pulpit, waiting to see whether Master Nye, who had been sent for to some distance to minister to a sick person, or his clerk, who had accompanied him, would return in time to read a lesson for even-song. These people were of different ages and ranks, and impelled by different motives. There were tottering old women, “ Gray sisters of a day gone by,” dependent on Master Nye’s bounty, and as desirous of pleasing him as of pleasing any old friar or sacristan by attendance to their devotions—listeners for the sake of the loaves and fishes. There were keen looking, middle-aged men, bent on getting to the rights of the theological disputes which were rending the country, and on keeping their own with the arguers on the opposite side, in every marketplace and village ale-house ; listeners, like the old Athenians, in search of some new thing with which to foil their next rival in talk at home or abroad. There were young men, fiery and speculative, though they were in a condition little removed from that of hinds ; farmers’ sons and village artisans, early loosed from the few ploughs which remained in the soil, and from the smithy and cartwrights’ shops, coming to the new doctrines and to the Bible as to a mint of social and political rights; listeners who, if they could no longer hope to take Christ and make Him a king, trusted to draw helps to material prosperity and watchwords for earthly ambition from his Word. And there were a few listeners, both men and women, old and young; but most of them were clad in mourning cloaks and hoods, or with the traces of care and sorrow and longing on their wistful faces. These were they who, through much tribulation, had reached even their present lowly station in the general assembly and church of the First-Born.

Though its interpreter was absent, the book into which all the congregation sought to look by the eyes of another, was manifest. With oaken brass-clasped boards, to which was fixed the chain that bound it to the desk, it lay open and unguarded. But, though some of the inquirers went up and handled it covetously, none was so clerkly as to read it to his fellows.

There was a little hush and rustle of respect for the two ladies from the manor of Chevehurst as, in the comparative dusk of the lengthening afternoon shadows, they came up the middle aisle of the church. A manor was a manor, however religious opinions might differ, and the ladies, Madam Selby and Mrs. Joyce, were well regarded by their neighbours, rich and poor. There was even general sympathy for poor Madam Selby, who, without having thought to do evil, had consented to receive a heavy punishment.

The sisters did not enter their seat in church. Joyce went and spoke to some of her acquaintances in the group; Elisabeth walked softly to the desk, and turned over the pages of the Bible with her finger, seeking in the holy book for the healing which she had missed in the holy well.

Suddenly an impulse seized her—she looked up and around on the company with her haggard face.

“Good people,” she addressed them abruptly, but with modest firmness, “would you that I should read a lesson to you? The Scriptures are free. I may serve till the clerk comes.”

A little murmur of surprise and assent, alike at the condescension and the capability of the speaker, arose from the hearers. No one objected, or cried out that such a deed were sacrilege. Only Joyce stepped quickly to the side of Elisabeth, with eye fixed loyally on her sister to be ready to step into the breach at whatever cost, and relieve the reader should she give way.

But Elisabeth did not even falter; it was as if she had left her shy, retiring nature, with her sorrows, behind her. She read, in a silvery voice, passage after passage, and story after story, choosing, with an instinct or inspiration of selection, what was most comprehensible and applicable to all.

Think what it must have been for Christian men and women to hear, with the eager interest of novelty and the marvel of a fresh acquaintance, the stories of Joseph and his brethren, of David and Jonathan; the parables of the Prodigal Son, and the Good Samaritan? It was not that the Roman Catholic faith did not include such histories and parables, but that in the corruption into which it had fallen when it neglected nearly altogether the instruction of its people, and from the manner in which the Bible narratives had been overlaid by mediæval saints' legends, the simple and sublime records of the Bible were largely lost to the nations who upon it founded their faith.

In these lessons there was really nothing to meet the wants of cunning time-servers, of turbulent or subtle controversialists, of the rising democrat and Ishmaelite fighting for his own hand—only for the weary and the heavy-laden sinner was there rest, only for the single-hearted and the truly noble was there the losing of life in order to find it again, the self-renunciation for the purpose of being in the Father and the Son, and of working with and for the whole family in heaven and earth.

Yet all who listened were more or less fascinated by the words thus spoken to them, and desired to have them spoken again. Elisabeth, withdrawing and returning home as unobtrusively as she had come, while she leaned on Joyce's arm, felt a little lightened in her heart. This act in behalf of others had done her good.

“I may read again when the clerk is not at hand, and if no better reader can be found, may I not, Joyce?” she asked. “I do not think I am barred or unfit. What think you?”

“I cry God-a-mercy on the men who are clerks if you be unfit,” protested Joyce.

After that day Elisabeth went regularly, morning and evening, to the parish church, and gave good help to the singing when there was no call for her to read. Some one has said that all English men and women sang in those days; and Elisabeth had not only the natural advantage of a rich, full voice, but Julian Selby, a master of music, had skilled her in the science. Master Nye was grateful for her assistance; but, though she was obedient and deferential to Master Nye, and fully believed in and respected him as a true physician, who had not shrunk from wielding the operator's knife in her service, somehow weak human nature recoiled from familiar intimacy with him and his, and Elisabeth and he were never nearer to each other than a faithful pastor and a loyal member of his flock. In place of entering his house after the daily services, to rest and consult with him and his wife and daughters, Elisabeth never sought farther rest than what she could get in the church porch, where she would sit for half an hour at a time schooling herself to patience and resignation.

CHAPTER IV.—A SURPRISE.

SEEING Elisabeth sitting alone one hot summer noon, the sole living object among the dead lying under the stones of the churchyard around her, and looking, in spite of what young Hugh Barret had hastily judged her middle-age, wonderfully young, this same Hugh, returning from the great Chevehurst sheep-shearing, was moved to turn aside and join his cousin. He was the more impelled to do so by the circumstance that, whether or not it was a mellow illusion produced by the full flood of light without, the face looked to him as if there was a crown of peace on the worn forehead, while a faint smile hovered about the lips, which had been so long dragged down with the woeful sentence they had allowed themselves to echo.

For the moment Elisabeth struck Hugh as being nearer to content than Joyce, so that the reluctance, half impatient and half delicate, of the young man to come in contact with her great misfortunes, fled, and he sat down beside her.

Elisabeth fairly smiled as she welcomed him. "Come, Hugh, and tell me what you have been about? I never see you here, to get a quiet word with you, except on a Sunday."

Hugh looked a little convicted of negligence; for the early reformers had recovered the zeal of the early Christians in assembling themselves together. Matins and evensongs were no longer utterly neglected in parish churches—no longer a mere form calling together no more than the parish priest and his household.

"I am out of sorts and in trouble, cousin Elisabeth," he muttered. "I am not able to bring my mind to bear upon lessons here."

"Ah, but that is just the reason why you should come," alleged Elisabeth, looking far away across the misty flat of the warren.

"Ay, with regard to some troubles," answered Hugh shyly; "but mine finds no encouragement there," and he glanced into the church at the book on the reading-desk. "Methinks I am childish, or guilty of idol worship," he added quietly and wisely.

"But the Bible is not for wise men and saints, but for the sinful children of men," persisted Elisabeth. "There is reference to you, Hugh; come and see."

And she took him by the hand and walked in, and pointed out how Jacob loved Rachel, and counted the seven years during which he served for her but as one day, because of the love he bore her. "And there is notice of desolate women like me—women parted from their husbands," she explained simply. "There was Michal, the daughter of Saul, who was in worse hap than I am, because she was not only taken from David, but given to another, and taken from him again and restored to David; and see, Hugh, how gently it is recorded that this last poor husband, though he did not resist—how could he against the voice of the king and judge?—followed her, weeping as he went. I fear me, if there had not been such notices in the Bible, I too might not have found grace to come to it and get my portion in it."

"I cannot understand it, cousin," protested Hugh, in a sudden burst of confidence. "We might have all been so happy, and here we are set against each other, because of no fault of ours, as it seemeth, unless it be that of an excess of affection and suffering in each other's pain. Can this be the will of God?"

"'I am not come to send peace on earth, but a sword,' the Lord said to his disciples," Elisabeth reminded him. "I think I see that there must be periods of special confusion and suffering while the light as yet struggles through the darkness. If so, there must be victims whereof it may be said they are only too much honoured, if they will but see it, that they, in their weakness and errors, are selected to know anything, however little, of the fellowship of His sufferings."

"But you, who were the pattern of wifely tenderness and virtue—no wonder that it makes my Joyce mad that your enemies, among the scum of the earth, should have it in their power to point at you as fallen from your estate, deceived, and undone."

"It is hard to bear," owned Elisabeth with a deep sigh, "but am I the only poor woman in this realm who, without guilt, may yet be reviled if some have the heart to revile? As for poor me, I have not many enemies; but I know I was set up, and might have grown even more conceited in my fancied hero if I had not been rudely pulled down. Even good wine will settle upon the lees and ferment foully, and to be let alone is sometimes the awfulest sentence of all. God knows best. I have always the comfort of being avised by thy old friend Julian Selby. Surely you did love him, Hugh; never was such a kindly or gifted man, and he is a virtuous and God-fearing gentleman, though a sorely stricken one."

"You are a good soul sent to better us, after all," declared Hugh, reverently drawing her arm through his to take her home, when Joyce saw the two coming through the gateway. She looked down on Hugh from her window not disapprovingly. "Yes, Hugh, be good to her, it sets you well," she affirmed merrily, though she subjoined immediately, "but give over seeking to get round me. I cannot endure the thought of marriage—God's institution. So it might have been in Eden, but here it has been so bandied about, forsworn, degraded, that it may have lost God's mark and favour utterly for aught that I can see."

CHAPTER V.—TRUCE AND TRUST.

THE even tenor of Elisabeth's way after she had settled at Chevehurst was much disturbed one day by the arrival of a special messenger bringing a letter to her from her renounced husband.

"Dear Elisabeth," the letter set forth, for Elisabeth in place of refusing to read it, caught greedily at the perusal "(for I may call you dear, though no longer wife), since I wrote to you in my deepest dolour, turning even against you in my pain when all seemed over, as I dared not deny, a new authority hath, to my great relief and comfort, entered on the scene. I can say no more than that no man, not even your uncle or Master Nye, will contradict its potency. I propose to travel down, armed with this authority, to Chevehurst, craving sight and speech of you to confer on the fresh feature in our case.

"Yours still to dispose of, my Elisabeth, for the few days which may remain to me, Julian Selby.

"Do not look for me within the week, as I must travel slowly."

"What has come to him?" cried Elisabeth, all stirred and breathless with re-awakened doubt and yearning. "Can the King's Majesty have done aught in our behalf? Alake! he could do nought in his own. I must send my duty to Julian and see him, and hear what he has to say. Neither kinsman nor priests can forbid that which is his right, though he had never been anything more to me than the poor boy Morris's brother. Let me see; what does he write of travelling slowly? and his handwriting, which used to be fair and clerly like everything else he did, is an unsightly scrawl. I am mortally afraid this trouble has been too much for him, and he is sick to death. Oh, love, love! live and let me know that you are breathing common air with me, though I may no longer bask in the sunshine of your presence."

"It is cruel thus to toss her back and fore," protested Joyce indignantly.

"What can the fellow mean?" frowningly questioned the old squire.

"She is his in heart and soul, though all the priests in Christendom agree to sever what they once linked," asserted young Hugh with meaning tones.

But when the litter which bore Julian Selby was carried within the gateway of Chevehurst, and he was assisted out of it, neither Elisabeth nor any one else was left to speculate any longer on his meaning, or to debate what was the supreme authority he had cited which had given him a title to be there. Death was in the litter and looked out of the traveller's hollow eyes, though they were sparkling with a species of joy. The failing sands of Julian Selby's life had been shaken to the last grains by the storm which had divided him and his wife. During the few weeks they had been apart the feeble flame of his life, which she had fanned assiduously, left to itself, had sunk, and flickered down to the socket.

"They would not let you live with me, Elisabeth, but they will let me die with you, and I have come to die," he said to her; and at that strange comfort the woman echoed his words in a cry at once bitter and sweet. One in death, if not in life. United in death, so often the only solution of life's miseries—the end of the whole matter—or rather, the glorious beginning of new cycles of glory, honour, and immortality.

Elisabeth, after the first shock, quickly recovered herself. With great quietness and fortitude she nursed Julian Selby in his last days. Restored to what had been in a measure the source of his life, that faint life leaped up a little, though it was plain to him and to all, that this was but a stage in its transfer. During the brief respite of these painless, refreshed summer days, however, the pair had blessedly peaceful communion with each other, and with the friends who stood around, looking on them with awe-struck faces and stilled, softened hearts. Julian forgave all interference, dictation, censure, acknowledged every right of kinsman and priest, and appointed the old squire, who groaned inwardly over the appointment, to watch over Elisabeth's interests in that heirship of Ditton which Julian Selby was resolute in willing to her. It was little to return to her for all it had cost her; but Elisabeth would take it from him for his sake, and reside there in honour and dignity, while she shed his and her bounty softly, like dew on the mown grass, in the place which had known alike their happiness and their misery.

Julian selected the ministrations of Master Nye, who came and went from the sick man's chamber with moist eyes, and a fervent statement that he had never been favoured to join in a more moving service, or seen a man and woman who more meekly gave God the glory, and appeared in a fairer way to heaven.

The calm hope shining in these two faces was a rebuke to the family divisions.

"Julian would fain see everybody happy before he goes, Joyce," pled Elisabeth with her sister, looking as serene in her lily pallor as if Julian Selby were once more a bridegroom, and she his bride going with him to a surer bridal home. "Canst not please him, Joyce, and please our uncle by binding yourself to take good care of the old man who has been kind to us—and very kind to you—and so draw his spirit, as God will, up to higher regions as he goes down the hill of life? I shall be back at Ditton, and I do not think that I shall ever quit Julian's place more, till I be laid to sleep beside him in the chancel of Ditton church. Canst not do it? Nay, wench, dost not rather pine sore to help to make young Hugh, who is your true lover, the good and noble man, that I devoutly believe and trust it is in him to be, instead of goading and flouting, and destroying the lad as you bid fair to do? It is not like you, Joyce, to be so hard. 'Vengeance is mine, saith the Lord, and I will repay,' even though we had not forgotten and been at peace. Cannot you forget? or must you force us to remember still and mourn that we have innocently marred both your nature and your fortunes?"

"If I could but get back my trust, Elisabeth!" lamented Joyce, shivering in her isolation. "I have lost my trust in man."

"Nay, an' it be as bad as that, if you cannot forgive and trust the brother whom you have seen, I fear me you cannot reverence and trust the Father whom you have not seen, any more than you can love Him in the same strait. Pray, Joyce, pray, and we two will pray that your faith in man may come back. I dare not charge you further to make it up with Hugh in such a temper, for what is marriage without trust? Ah, sister, all life is a trust; death itself is a trust," urged Elisabeth.

But when argument was stayed, and Hugh himself stood aloof tenderly to allow those who had so engrossed and disturbed the family life at Chevehurst to pass on, hand in hand, even into the dark valley where they were to part, Joyce's proud, staunch heart broke and yielded, and her trust came back in a flood. She owned that God, who rules in heaven and earth, did all things well, and that man, God's vicegerent, with all his errors and falls, was still entitled to the human award of magnanimous amnesty, ever-fresh faith, and fond fidelity. Then Joyce, restored to her right mind—to patience, content, and sweet humble affection, saw and confessed that she too had been very wrong in her wilful unmercifulness, sought to be forgiven by her uncle and Hugh, desired nothing better than to atone for her sins against them by loving and serving them all the days of her life, and making Chevehurst, as Elisabeth had made Ditton, a home of godliness, virtue, and peace.

LIEUTENANT MOLYNEUX'S ADVENTURES ON THE DEAD SEA.

BY THE LATE JAMES FINN, M.R.A.S.

ON the last day of August, 1847, a letter from the Consul-General, now Lord Strathnairn, notified to me that a party had started from H.M.S. Spartan, for the Jordan and the Dead Sea; and it recommended that the Pashà of Jerusalem should send some soldiers up the line of the river, to meet them and ensure their safety. I had heard of the project a few days before, from some English travellers, but nothing definite as to the mode of carrying it out.

On receipt of the letter, Mr. Critchlow, the architect of our new church in Jerusalem, and I, started off ourselves with four men of the Bashi-bozuk, to look after the adventurers.

We were not above an hour away from Jerusalem, but just at the brow of the descent to the Hhand el'Azariah (commonly called "the Apostles' Fountain"), when we met two Europeans excessively bronzed by the sun, and one of them, a tall powerful young man, announced himself as Lieutenant Molyneux, of the Spartan, and his dragoman named Joseph.

Turning aside from the road into a field, he stated that he was in a state of much anxiety, for the boat with her three fine fellows, volunteers from the frigate, had been assailed by wild Arabs, half-way down the river, near Abu 'Obeidah, the property plundered, and the men turned loose into the wilderness. He was broken-hearted on their account, and for the failure of the expedition so far. The boat, however, had been spared, and was brought down the Jordan opposite to Jericho by the man in charge of it after leaving Tiberias, and an Arab picked up by the way, and he had hoisted a blue ensign over the petty tower of Jericho, as a signal in case the men should wander down in that direction: only it did not seem probable that they would do so, for he had, while with them, taken particular pains to explain that, notwithstanding all the windings of the stream, the Jordan's course was substantially parallel with the sea coast, running from north to south; he therefore considered it probable that they had taken a westerly direction over the hills, to reach the Mediterranean.

His object in coming now to Jerusalem was to consult with the Consul, as to what might be done in respect to his men, and to get what assistance he could in carrying out the second part of his researches, namely, that upon the Dead Sea.

I decided upon returning to the city for the night, as it was near sunset, and getting a reinforcement of soldiers from the Pashà. So with my Kawwàs I galloped on ahead of Molyneux and the rest, in order to have the city-gate kept open for them on arrival.

It was the season of Ramadàn, and I just reached St. Stephen's gate as the sentinels were about to close it, poor fellows, with their breakfast waiting before them. The castle gun gave the signal of sunset, when eating might begin, as my horse's hoofs rattled over the pavement towards the Seraglio. I insisted on seeing His Excellency Zareaf Pashà immediately, and found him with one of the Effendis, just sitting down to the pilâf. The story was told in brief, out of pity to the faint and fasting creatures, and merely asking for more soldiers I took leave, but returned after a couple of hours with Molyneux, to impart fuller details.

At first the Pashà flatly refused to give any further help, for he said, the district complained of might be probably out of his jurisdiction: how could he know whether it was so or not? and then again the robbers were savages. "Do you not know that the Bedawen are not men but beasts?" (haiwân-ler)—however, he at last promised us ten Arnaouts with their Aga for the morrow.

During the evening Molyneux obtained the services of a Maltese in the city, one who said he had spent some years as a sailor, and might therefore be useful in rowing the boat upon the Dead Sea: and then got a good night's sleep, which was much needed after the cares and sleeplessness of some time past.

On the 1st September we left Jerusalem early with the Arnaout Bashi-bozuk, who had awaited us outside at Sitté Miriam, the reputed Sepulchre of the Virgin Mary, under the command of a Yuz-bashi, or "captain of a hundred" (in Scripture language, a centurion). He was a Bosnian, named Mustafa Aga; and on starting from the trysting place the two pairs of tiny kettledrums were echoed along the Mount of Olives. The Aga was mounted on a good road-horse, with scarlet saddle-cloth and fringes, also strings of small silver pieces (kesh-kesh) and silver chains about the head, besides a turquoise ornament hanging from the nostrils. The fighting horse, however, was a finer animal, arrayed in equal state, and led before us by a mounted groom—a most absurd parade, as it seemed to us, for the kind of service we were engaged in, but perhaps not entirely without use among the barbarians of Jericho.

Descending to the Plain of the Jordan (the Ghor), our British ensign was seen flying over the tower. It was attached to an Arab spear tufted with black ostrich feathers.

The tents, having gone on before us, were already pitched, and on his arrival the Arnaouts formed in line and saluted their officer, by holding their muskets upright from the saddle in the left hand, and giving the Oriental salaam with the right. In a short time we were seated by his side at the stagnant tank, and found that no tidings had arrived about the seamen. The two men from the boat, who had been stripped in company with the sailors, and beaten by the Arabs, gave their evidence, which was simple enough —they had been greatly overpowered by numbers. So it was resolved that we should march up the Ghor during the night, after the Ramadán breakfast, by moonlight, to avoid as much as possible the heat of the day in that region.

Molyneux and I lay down to get some rest, with the thermometer at 97° Fahrenheit in the shade, but our sleep was disturbed by the tramp of horsemen arriving. These were Dr. Schultz, the Prussian Consul, and his cousin, Mr. Weber, who had come to offer any assistance in their power; but alas! their horses, besides being tired, were evidently of a kind unfit for such an expedition as we were bent upon, and this was at once understood.

So we all lay down once more to rest, Bashi-bozuk, Prussians, and English, till one o'clock, when the moon rose over the Moab mountains: then the kettledrums beat the reveille, small cups of coffee were administered, and we were on horseback in a few minutes more.

Having got a reinforcement from the tower, we now mustered sixteen soldiers in the party. Nothing could be more romantic than our single file, preceded by the music (not altogether undeserving of the name in so wild a place and at such an hour), winding among the thorny reb'k trees, and when we emerged upon the open space, the accoutrements glittering in the moonlight (such moonlight!) and the line of shadows moving along the ground at our bridle hand.

"I see them on their winding way,
Above their ranks the moonbeams play;
And nearer yet and yet more near
The martial chorus strikes the ear."
HUBER.

At daybreak a few small birds sung sweetly in the wilderness, but after sunrise the heat soon became oppressive. We made no halts, but kept on—on—on—almost in silence; Molyneux occasionally, however, giving signals on a railway whistle, to which the lost men had been accustomed.

We now and then fell in with single persons or small parties of kelp-burners, but they all ran off at our approach, and hid themselves among thickets of large thorns or canes, or in dried water channels. At length, by dint of shouting out promises that no harm should come to them, two beings, something resembling human, showed themselves, but nothing was learned from them; they could or would tell nothing.

We advanced until the Wadi Zerka (Jab-bok) was visible before us, so that we must nearly have approached the locality of the disaster. At length the soldiers complained of their horses being fatigued, and the commander represented that as they must be back at Jericho by night, there being no other place to go to, it was impossible to proceed further, we would not stay there in the wilderness. So we halted for a short time, each man under the belly of his horse for the benefit of some small shelter from the sun, and then mounted for the return.

It was cruel work for our men under the fast of Ramadán, and my Kawwás, although his face was covered with the Arab kefiéh, barring his eyes, had his eyelids so swollen from the effect of hot reflection from the light-coloured marly ground, that he could scarcely see at all.

Near the site of 'Ain Dook, a copious stream—the Docus of 1 Macc. xvi. 15, where Simon Maccabæus and his sons were assassinated—we rode under the branches of five several trees of the 'Ooher, or Asclepias gigantea. I think some of them must have been twenty feet high. There can be little, if any, doubt that the fruit of this tree is the far-famed "Sodom apple." The size is that of a large apple; it is fair without when ripe, but easily bursts to the touch, and is found to contain nothing but a few black seeds and a small quantity of soft white filaments like silk, of which the Arabs make matches for their rude guns.* These trees are numerous in Upper Egypt: but Josephus was only aware of it existing in his own country. Tacitus followed him.

In the distance we saw numerous fires of the kali-burners, while the very air was quivering with the sun-heat around us. No wind, but frequent little columns of sand twirling upwards from the plain and travelling slowly forward from the south, till they broke and subsided on the ground, only to be followed by others. At one time seven of these were in sight, and at another time four.

We reached our tents between one and two o'clock P.M., in twelve hours from our departure, having marched probably fifty miles without a meal, and almost without halting, in an atmosphere that resembled, more than half the way, the air issuing from an oven.

Then came food for us Europeans, and sleep till night, which when it came was hotter than the preceding one.

After dark the village people got up a fantasia, in honour of our Aga. On the roof

* The nauseous qualities of smell and taste ascribed to the "Sodom apple" by the ancients, belong rather to the apple-looking colocynt found near the Dead Sea, trailed upon the ground. (See Tristram's "Natural History of the Bible.") of the tower a bonfire was made, and the women perpetrated an extempore song with a thrilling chorus (the Zughreet), dancing and waving their long sleeves about in the red light, and clapping hands as they sang—the leader beating time with her pipe-stick.

When this officer came down to us for arrangement of operations on the morrow his choristers followed him with their dinning performances, children's voices mingling with the rest, till we could scarcely hear each other speak. At length they were dismissed.

The Aga asserted that two of his men nearly lost their lives in leaping over a marshy channel during the day's excursion, pursuing the Arabs to get information for us.

We learned that our Prussian friends had returned to Jerusalem, after visiting 'Ain Dook, and comparing the site with some documents in their possession, relating to property of the Teutonic Crusaders during the era of the Latin kingdom.

At night two large tarantulas were killed in our tents.

On Friday, the 3rd, we had a delicious walk before sunrise. The last palm-tree of Jericho, "the city of palm-trees" (Deut. xxxiv. 3), has now only its trunk left, and that is decaying rapidly towards the ground. The blue doves or pigeons are so abundant that it would seem as if one might subsist there by means of a fowling-piece, without stirring many yards from the tent-door. These birds come down from the holes in the rocks of the Quarantana mountain, and pick up relics of the village harvest, which is mostly of Indian corn, and repeated several times in the year.

After breakfast we set off for the Dead Sea, with a few of our Jerusalem Bashi-bozuks, to meet the boat, which had been removed from its mooring at the ford of the Jordan, into the lake, and placed not far from the mouth of the river. Nearing our destination, as the marl became softer, we observed numerous footprints of large birds and wild quadrupeds.

Reeds lined the banks to the height of above five feet, but when they take to trailing on the ground these often measure twenty or thirty feet in length. The breeze coming to us over the surface of the lake was intensely hot and dry.

The fall of the Jordan into the Dead Sea is a spot rarely visited by travellers, but I had been there before, with a Jerusalem party, who encamped nearly a week at Elisha's Fountain.

A tent was now pitched for us on the beach and kept open to the water—thermometer at 94° Fahrenheit inside the tent—and the lines, leads, &c., were got ready for use in the coming researches. A fire was lighted, but this had to be made with reeds, thorns, and branches brought from the river side, inasmuch as the debris of trees lying along the beach were incombustible, owing to their saline incrustation derived from the water. The Bosnian Aga sat very comfortably smoking his chibook inside, or occasionally peering through my telescope at the Moab mountains, particularly at a patch of green millet in one place, where he naturally inferred there must have been people guarding it, and perhaps observing us.

Some wild fowl were shot while flying over the lake, notwithstanding that the ancients have assured us that nothing can fly over that water and live: these would have survived the flight had they not been shot. They were delivered over to the cook.

After the respast Mustafa Aga amused himself with ball practice at a peg stuck in the ground, but always failed to hit it till I lent him my rifle, when he as uniformly succeeded. The Aga, the Maltese, and I got into the boat, and I had the gratification of taking, for a short turn, the stroke oar of a British man-of-war's dingy, the first ever launched upon the lake Asphaltites. When the sun fell low we landed from "that bituminous lake Where Sodom stood,"

and I bade farewell to the adventurers, promising to return on Monday morning, this being Friday evening. Two soldiers remained as guard with the party, the rest returned with the Aga and me to Jericho.

The sun went down, and we wandered among labyrinths of the chalk and marl hillocks, six of the party separated from us. We stopped at 'Ain Hajlah (the Beth-hoglah of Joshua xviii. 19-21, and where, in 1847, our then party chased and slew one wild boar out of a family of seven), and drank of its crystal fountain by starlight, then marched on, firing muskets and beating kettledrums, as signals to the stragglers; the Aga riding up each successive hillock on the look-out.

I slept at Jericho.

On Saturday, the 5th, I got to Jerusalem, after three days and nights without unclothing, and sent off letters to the Spartan, which we learned had arrived off Jaffa.

Letters came from Captain Symonds on Sunday, and also from the consular-agent at Acre, giving intelligence that the three seamen were safe on board, having made their way back from Abu 'Obeidah to Tiberias. The assailants had been forty or fifty in number, and one of our men had been struck on the head with the butt-end of a gun while preparing to fire his pistol, and had fallen, stunned, into the river. The three were stripped to their trousers, and the wounded man carried off by his companions. They made their way into the wilderness, northwards, living on berries, and only going to the Jordan to drink at night.

Having this information, I naturally wished to communicate it to Molyneux, but the Pashà and the Major of the troops being asleep, no Bashi-bozuk messenger could be obtained. I therefore dispatched one of my kawwâses alone with a letter. By daybreak on Monday two lieutenants from the Spartan, sent on by the Captain to meet and cheer up Molyneux, were in my house, having succeeded in overcoming the scruples of the sentinels at the gate, as to their admission at that hour.

By noon they and I left the city, with one man, neither a kawwâs nor a soldier, bound for the Dead Sea; but, arriving at Jericho, and turning aside to fetch a blanket out of my tent—behold!—there was the dingy with her spars all lashed within, and two camels kneeling by her side. There, too, was Molyneux himself. The meeting of the brother officers was touching enough: there was much to ask, and much to tell.

Molyneux had spent two nights and a day and a half upon the lake, and discovered that the Maltese scarcely "knew one end of an oar from the other." The weather had been sometimes very rough, the water running high under certain currents of wind, issuing through crevices from between the mountains, and then subsiding with wonderful rapidity—the thermometer sometimes 130° Fahrenheit out of the sun, and the atmosphere one of hot steam, inducing thirst, drowsiness, and depression of spirits.

The party had become much browner in countenance since I left them. Molyneux's eyes were highly inflamed, and he looked worn by labour and anxiety.

We had a dinner together beside the rill coming down from Elisha's Fountain, after which they sent up a rocket with silver stars, in honour of the occasion, and wondered what the Arabs across the Jordan would think of it.

I slept in my tent upon a piece of matting, with a rice bag for my pillow, pistols at the right hand, rifle and fowling-piece at the left, while the kawwâs, who had taken down the letters, lay wrapped in his cloak at the door.

II. N.S.

At early morning, on Tuesday, a strange scene was witnessed when the camels rose from the ground with the boat slung upon poles between them. Imagine a broken common with prickly shrubs upon it, irregularly scattered: mountains behind—the trunk of headless palm-tree—British officers, and Arab men, women, and children looking on, the latter skipping at the fun, and some unclean babies screaming with delight at the snarling and growling of the camels.

The officers escorted the boat by a road which for the first part differed from ours, on which they found the ascent more gradual, though somewhat longer, and all reached Jerusalem in safety. They remained there till the 10th. Molyneux employed the interval in making up his journal, and they left us for Jaffa by the road to Lydd, that being the easiest for conveying the dingy.

They arrived at Jaffa with the boat, which was as sound as ever, and the crew set up three cheers on her mounting the deck, and vowed she should never be washed again, but keep her slime of the Dead Sea as a memorial.

On reaching the station off Bayroot, fever seized poor Molyneux, and increased in spite of medical skill. He was removed on shore to the house of the Consul-General, where he had two physicians in constant attendance; also a third was summoned from Damascus, but the latter only arrived when there was no more hope; on the 3rd October he died.

Meanwhile, in Jerusalem, Acre, Damascus, and Bayroot, every effort was made to get the Turkish authorities to punish the offending Arabs; yet to this day they are not chastised. One thing, however, which the Turks could not do, which I am sure they were not able to do, was effected by humbler means.

On the 30th of September I learned from the Rev. Mr. Nicolayson that a native Scripture-reader, named Michael Murkus, employed by Bishop Gobat across the Jordan, on hearing that some English travellers had been plundered by the petty 'Abbâd people, went to their Shaikh, and represented the heinous nature of the crime that had been committed, as well as the awful retribution that must necessarily follow from the hand of the mighty English nation; whereupon, after secret deliberation among the chiefs, he was told to go early next morning to a certain hillock described, and lying beside a large stone he would find the booty. He accordingly went there, and taking up the articles carried them to the Governor of Nablus, from whom I received them in Jerusalem, and forwarded them to the frigate.

The Musheer-Pashà of Bayroot had furnished, though unwillingly, our expedition at its starting with a buyuruldi (order) to all governors and chiefs, for facilitating the operations; and after the disaster the military commander in Bayroot sent orders to the officer at Acre to see redress obtained—so we were told. Yet he of Acre, and he of Jerusalem, when pressed, pleaded afterwards that they had received no orders, but only letters of recommendation to do what was necessary. Among them nothing was accomplished.

It was unfortunate that our brave adventurer and his advisers had no sufficient knowledge of that ingrained custom of Arab life known by the name of ghuf'r, which means the right of the occupant of any territory to exact toll from strangers passing over it, in return for which he affords protection. And events have shown that it was absurd to suppose that the Arabs would acknowledge the mere name of Turkish authority. The people to whom Molyneux did pay sums kept their word faithfully, but on both sides those sums were regarded as payments for tasks performed or services rendered. And at length a time arrived when exorbitant sums were demanded, and Molyneux had no one to appeal to.

A nobler specimen of a chivalrous Englishman than Lieutenant Molyneux it has never been my lot to meet with. His stature was considerable, as well as his muscular strength; and I remember the pleasure with which we listened in Jerusalem to the account of his negotiation with the 'Abbad leader on the first demand being made. The latter vaunted, in the manner of all savages, of his own personal prowess and the number of guns he could muster beyond those of his attendants present. Our Briton produced his men and their weapons, then placing a mark against a tree, took a revolver and hit the mark thrice in succession, explaining that he was able to do the same infallibly for thirty times.

The Arab only gravely persisted that he must have his money, or they should not pass further in the morning, and rose up to depart, whereupon Molyneux, in wishing him a good evening, gave him such a grip as extorted from him something like a groan; and the effect was that on the morrow he took care that our hero's back was turned before he ventured to meddle with the boat.

STRIVING TO ATONE.

HE left a happy fireside :
 His parents' hearts were proud ;
 For what of evil could betide,
 Even in the city's crowd,
 The child whom prayers had follow'd—
 As shadow follows cloud ?
 He fell : companions round him
 Their specious lures did weave :
 In the distant Bush he seeks with pain
 His error to retrieve :
 Alone, within their cottage home,
 His parents sit and grieve.
 Their heads are bent so lowly,
 Their hearts beat high no more ;
 Their only wish to hide their shame
 Far from their cottage door.
 He vows to make a home for them
 On far Australia's shore.
 He works—none could work harder—
 He counts the months and days,—
 Till from his well-won wages
 He such a sum may raise,
 As pay their passage out to him,
 To try new work—new ways.
 At last, at last, the sum is won !
 With victory in his eye,
 He mounts his horse and gallops on,

Until he comes anigh
 A little station-house, whereat
 The letters often lie.
 He slackens pace to calm his breast,
 To ask if there may be
 Some word for him.—'Twas needless care ;
 For quick espied is he,
 And in his hand a letter put,
 Dismayed him utterly.
 His parents dead : he all but faints,
 And turns once more away ;
 Leaving the maid to wonder how
 He had no word to say ;—
 To fancy 'twas a lover's death
 Distressed him so that day.
 He turned and wept, and hastened home,
 Anew to strive and plan ;
 But ever with a saddened look
 Bespoke a broken man,
 Who does his work in sheer despite,
 But doth not all he can.
 And yet ere long the answer came
 To these fond parents' prayers :
 He found the Way, the Peace, the Life
 That waiteth, unawares,
 For those whose pride is humbled low—
 All overcome with cares. H. A. PAGE

THE EDITOR'S ROOM.

I.—HOME NOTES.

ACCIDENTS.

“AND they that rejoice as though they rejoiced not”—would seem to be the motto given us by Providence for our holiday season. First, the awfully sudden death of the Bishop of Winchester, impressing men far more than if he had died of apoplexy or heart-disease, because it seemed so unlikely and almost unreasonable that gifts so remarkable, and powers so rare of influencing and delighting his fellows should be extinguished in a moment through the stumbling of a horse, and because there was so appalling a contrast between the beautiful scene, the pleasant ride, the happy holiday, and the valley of the shadow of death. Then in one part of the island there came a thunderstorm which for vehemence and length of duration, as well as the destruction it caused of life and property, was unprecedented in the memory of this generation; the fiery element, escaping apparently from all control, abandoned itself to every form of tumultuous revelry, and spread death among men, women, and cattle; or shook the nerves of persons in delicate health, so that in place of a family group rejoicing over a child born into the world, there would be found in their home a dead mother and still-born babe. And then followed the railway accident at Wigan, mysterious in its cause, awful in its results, and impressing the whole community the more that many of the victims were hastening to enjoy their holidays at the homes of dear friends, and that on this account there was a much larger proportion than usual of children, and of children of the same family. Soon though such things may be forgotten by the general public, and swiftly though the newspapers may bring up new subjects to engage attention, they are not without their deep silent effect, at least in the case of many. They lay a fresh foundation for those appeals from the pulpit which are founded on the shortness and uncertainty of life, and for those arguments which the manifest vanity of earthly things supplies for securing a more abiding portion. We do not doubt that the remembrance of them will linger in the case of many, in the form of a subdued, chastened feeling in regard even to the lawful pleasures of life; a feeling that it is necessary to hold them so loosely that we shall not be struck with consternation, however suddenly we get the summons, “Arise, depart, for this is not your rest.” Such lamentable events, too, in their very darkness and horrorfulness, furnish a striking foreground for the picture of heaven; in vain the agitated mind looks for rest and soothing to any earthly scene; the only true resting-place is that so touchingly delineated by St. John: “The Lamb in the midst of the throne shall feed them, and shall lead them to living fountains of waters; and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes.”

NEW BISHOPS.

“One goeth and another cometh.” The vacant see of Winchester is to be filled by Dr. Harold Browne, Bishop of Ely. The name is well known in the theological world as that of one who has been a powerful defender of vital truth, and who, while leaning somewhat to the High Church, is neither a Romanizer on the one hand, nor a Rationalist on the other. At a recent conference in his diocese, in referring to the documents lately presented to the Bishops and others by the four hundred and eighty clergy and the sixty thousand laymen, he remarked that Hooker, in the sixth book of his “Ecclesiastical Polity,” had exhausted the subject of the Confessional, both as to its theory and its history, and that he thoroughly agreed with his views. In regard to the alleged tendency of Bishops to connive at Romanism, he declared that he believed there was not much ritualism in his diocese, that in examining candidates he took pains to see that they did not hold Romanizing views,—in point of fact, he found more tendency to rationalism than to Romanism, and said that he did not exercise his patronage in favour of such men. The successor to Dr. Browne in the see of Ely is to be his examining chaplain, the Rev. Dr. Woodford, Vicar of Leeds, of whom the Guardian says, “Dr. Woodford is a Cambridge man of good degree, a popular preacher, and a High Churchman.”

BEQUEST TO THE CHURCH OF SCOTLAND.

The Established Church of Scotland has just received what is probably the largest money gift ever given to a Church in the lifetime of the giver. The donor is Mr. Baird of Cambusdoon and Auchmedden, and the amount is five hundred thousand pounds. A few years ago, Mr. Ferguson of Irvine bequeathed a still larger sum for the benefit of the nonconformist churches in the west of Scotland, but Mr. Baird has not waited for his death to make his wealth available for good. Mr. Baird is one of a family connected with the iron trade who have all acquired great riches, and he has for a long time taken an active interest in schemes of Christian philanthropy connected with the Established Church. He states in the short deed of trust which he has executed that he has been moved to do this by seeing how much destitution of the means of grace prevails in densely peopled districts, to overtake which, he is persuaded that the territorial plan and endowments are necessary. He expresses a dread of those unsound views which have lately become prevalent in so many quarters, and he provides that his trustees shall not devote the fund to the support of persons who show that they are failures. Whether it be possible to combine the stability of endowments with the self-regulating elasticity of a system that pays according to results, will be interesting to observe. But all must hope that the generous donor will find his expectations amply fulfilled, and that, as he has provided the means, the Church will find suitable and earnest men to fulfil his wishes, and turn this scheme into a great source of blessing.

WESLEYAN CONFERENCE.

The Wesleyan Conference has been held this year at Newcastle. Newcastle has many associations with Wesleyanism, and the Conference has felt itself at home. The growing influence of Wesleyanism is manifest from the place which its proceedings are now securing in the public press; the Times, for example, both in its reporting and leading columns, striving to do justice to its operations. The usual work of the Conference was gone through partly in the public meetings of the committees, and partly in the meetings of the Conference itself. Thus the various operations of the Connexion were brought under review; approved candidates for the ministry were set apart for their holy work; and next year's arrangements for the distribution of the pastors were announced. In the building of chapels and defraying of debt on buildings, no less a sum than £300,000 has been spent. The committee of review of missions was a scene of very great interest. Among those who delivered addresses was a converted Friar from Naples, and a converted Brahmin from India. At the meeting of the committee of review of the Theological Institution, Mr. T. P. Bunting took occasion to urge his views for a more thorough recognition of laymen in connection with the business of the Conference—an arrangement to which he attaches the highest importance.

II.—GLANCES ABROAD.

SUPERSTITION IN FRANCE.

The mania for pilgrimages advances in France. A new journal, Le Pèlerin, is devoted to the advocacy of the cause. At Lourdes the flow of people is enormous; the directors of the railway have sagaciously lowered their fares; the trains de piété are constantly arriving; objets de piété are sold everywhere, and boys and girls are offering to visitors to say a prayer for them for a couple of sous. The rush of people, and their apparent earnestness, are so great, that the priests are congratulating themselves on the return of the devotional condition of France three hundred and fifty years ago. The superstitious direction in which, however, the religious feeling of the country runs is very deplorable. So much earnestness turned into a more scriptural channel would, we may believe, be productive of great good. But what can we expect of a movement that aims as its great object at putting the whole of France under the protection of the Virgin, and firmly believes that could this be accomplished, its safety is secure? "When Ephraim saw his sickness, and Judah saw his wound, then went Ephraim to the Assyrian and sent to King Jareb: yet could he not heal you, nor cure you of your wound."

Whatever comes of France, the Italian Government have determined that there shall be no pilgrimages in their country, putting the prohibition on the ground that it is not for the public safety or interest to allow great gatherings of the people, except for the purposes of the State.

APPROACHING DISRUPTION IN REFORMED SYNOD.

According to the French correspondent of Evangelical Christendom, the disruption of the Reformed Church of France cannot be far off; the Government, it is said, are soon to issue a decree authorising the promulgation of the Confession of Faith voted by the Synod. Should this be done, the minority of the Synod, holding rationalist views, would then be completely at the mercy of the majority, who would cut them off, property and all. This to many appears an unjust proceeding, so far as temporal interests are concerned. The Free Churches are urging a separation from the State, and equitable division of the property. But the Reformed urge that the effect of such a step would be that many of the congregations would be unable to support a pastor, and would be left as sheep not having a shepherd.

THE STATE-CATHOLICS IN SILESIA.

In Germany, in addition to the revolt of the Old Catholics, the Church of Rome finds itself met, in Silesia, by another body of malcontents, who call themselves State-Catholics. An address was recently presented to the German Emperor by a large body of Silesian Catholics, in which they declare themselves utterly opposed to ultramontane pretensions and aggressions, and prepared to stand by the State in opposition to the encroachments of the Jesuits. The principles which they maintain are—1. Opposition to Ultramontanism and Jesuitism; 2. Opposition to the encroachment of the Church on the rights of the State; 3. Maintenance of connection between Church and State; 4. Prohibition of the use of ecclesiastical services by the clergy for political purposes; 5. Freedom of conscience and Christian love to regulate their relations to Alt-Catholics and other co-religionists. According to the correspondent of the Guardian, who bestows so much attention on such subjects, this revolt against Rome is a very serious one, though it rests on different grounds from the Alt-Catholic movement, and it indicates the bitter opposition, even within the bosom of the Roman Catholic Church, to which the prevalence of liberal views will expose the ultramontanists in their efforts to make the ecclesiastical power wholly independent of the civil.

PROSECUTION OF DR. SYDOW.

It may be remembered that some time ago Dr. Sydow, who is a leading pastor in Berlin, delivered a conference or lecture, in which he denied the pre-existence of Jesus Christ, and used derogatory language on the authority and inspiration of Scripture. Being taken to account for this by the Consistory of Berlin, he was found guilty of attacking "the foundations of Christian doctrine as revealed in Holy Scripture, and affirmed in the general Confessions of Christendom," and deposed from his office. Against this sentence Dr. Sydow appealed to the Superior Ecclesiastical Tribunal, which has reversed the sentence of the Consistory, so far as to substitute a censure for his incaution in place of the sentence of deposition. The ground of this change is very peculiar. The sentence is one "of severe blame, on account of the great scandal caused by a public conference, but which was not delivered during the exercise of his functions." Dr. Sydow is replaced in office because, though he denied the divinity of Christ, he did not do so in canonical hours! One is reminded of the story of the prince-bishop, who, being rebuked for swearing, said that he swore as a prince, but not as a bishop. The Roman Catholic journals are triumphing over this decision, declaring that "Protestantism shows itself so infected with the venom of irreligion, that it dares not even expel a pastor who denies the divinity of Jesus Christ."

SUNDAY IN THE VIENNA EXHIBITION.

The London City Mission Magazine for August contains an interesting account of the exertions of their agent, Mr. Weylland, to secure that English and American exhibitors should not have their stalls and cases open on the Lord's Day. In previous International Exhibitions a testimony for the sacredness of the Lord's day was borne, by the Exhibitions in London being wholly closed on that day, whereas in Paris, the English and American exhibitors abstained from opening their stalls. The same gentleman, Mr. Weylland, who had been instrumental in securing this result at Paris, was sent on a similar errand to Vienna; and, having obtained the sanction of the British Ambassador at Vienna, he proceeded with his mission. As to Sabbath observance at Vienna, he found it at the lowest ebb, the shops being all open, and men and women too at work upon the buildings in the course of erection, the women performing the coarse work which is so often done in this country by Irish labourers. When he visited the Exhibition the Sunday after it was opened, he found hundreds of men and women employed about it in this way, and in the vast Rotunda and foreign courts, great numbers of work-people and exhibitors were busily engaged. But on passing into the British courts and sections, there was happily an expression of Sabbath rest. All the exhibitors were absent, and such of their exhibits as had covers were covered over. Still, in the course of the day a few exhibitors appeared, and were proceeding to work, when Mr. Weylland called their attention to the example of their brother exhibitors, and asked them to join in the national testimony to the day of rest, which, more or less pleasantly, they finally did. The Americans, too, were generally of the same mind. On the second Sunday after the opening, when admission to the Exhibition had been reduced to a guinea, and the erections were densely crowded, when continental exhibitors were there in large numbers, much of their machinery in action, and when all was excitement, work, and pleasure,

"in the British and American portion of the transept, and in their sections, there was a Sabbath calm. Not an exhibitor was to be seen. Many of the cases were covered, and others remained undressed."

"You will rejoice to know," writes Mr. Weylland, in one of his letters, "that among our countrymen employed in the Exhibition there is proof of spiritual good. Several of the workmen to whom I gave Bibles or portions of the good book, have spoken to me of the great matter of personal salvation, and seem anxious to be brought into the liberty of the sons of God. One of them who has charge of work of great value, told me that he has yielded himself to the Lord, and he is giving proof of this by joining in Christian effort. He now gives a quiet but bold testimony, and has accepted a supply of tracts for circulation among his companions—a first fruit, I trust, of good resulting from a published Gospel in this Exhibition."

Meetings similar to those held in Paris by the late Lady Harriet Cooper for the benefit of English girls serving in the refreshment rooms, or otherwise connected with the Exhibition, have also been held, with encouraging results.

There is some indication of the Vienna workmen taking up the question of Sunday labour. One Sunday lately, seven hundred shoemakers refused to work, and it was observed that a larger number than usual of shops were closed.

III.—JOTTINGS FROM THE MISSION FIELD.

SPIRIT OF THE ANNIVERSARY MEETINGS.

We had intended to give some notices in this number of the last report and meeting of the Church Missionary Society, but our space being curtailed, to make room for title, index, &c., we must postpone this subject to our next publication.

MADAGASCAR—THE WORK IN DETAIL.

Mr. Stribling and Mr. Matthews, missionaries of the London Missionary Society, have sent some interesting accounts of their work in the country districts of Madagascar. One thing impresses one very strongly after reading these letters—how very much yet remains to be done before the professing Christians of these districts are Christians in very deed. Occasionally they seem to have come on a good and earnest man; but much ignorance and not a little indifference seem to have been usual characteristics of the people. In training native preachers to preach; in reforming the psalmody, and introducing simple English tunes for the singing of hymns, in place of the unsuitable complicated native tunes; in establishing a system of weekly offerings; in urging regular attendance at the Sabbath services and the faithful observance of the day of rest; as well as in preaching themselves, superintending the issue of medicines and promoting ordinary teaching, the missionaries find a vast deal to do. Mr. Matthews laments that since he came to the island he has not known of one decided case of conversion to God. People will ask him who the Queen of Sheba was; how Satan came to make war in heaven; how Melchizedek could be without father and mother; but they do not ask, 'What must I do to be saved?' Though they have given up their idols and become nominal Christians, there is the utmost need of an outpouring of the Holy Spirit to turn them into living Christians. For this there is the most urgent need of prayer. Indeed the people must be regarded as in a very critical state—having abandoned their old beliefs without having come in any true sense under the power of the Gospel.

Yet, as we have said, interesting cases of real life are found. "The town of Fiarenana," says Mr. Stribling, "is an especially interesting one; from it two of the Christian army of martyrs (Andriampaniry and his wife) went forth during the reign of Queen Ranavalona I. to suffer death by fire at Faravohitra, the spot now so conspicuous by the English Children's Memorial Church. A sister of these martyrs is still living, and was present at my recent visit. Their son also is still living (Andrianaivoraony), and is the senior preacher, and Andriana, or noble of the town. He is a thoroughly earnest, humble-minded Christian, ready to do anything in his power to advance that religion for which his parents so nobly laid down their lives."

JUGGERNAUTH AND THE INDIAN GOVERNMENT.

We learn from the Calcutta correspondence of the Times that the question whether it is the duty of Government to permit the Juggernaut car, or other cars, be dragged through the streets, when persons are ready to throw themselves before it and sacrifice their lives, has been engaging the attention of the officials. The Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, Sir George Campbell, has made a report on the subject, in which he states in substance that among the mass of the people the practice is unpopular, and that there is no need for the Government being very squeamish about the affair. The Government of India, agreeing with that of Bengal, have come to the conclusion that the Nuisance Act gives authority to stop all cars dangerous to human life, and the responsible magistrate has received a discretionary power to stop all cars which he deems dangerous to human life, and in which Act he will be supported by the Government.

IV.—OUR MEMORIAL RECORD.

THE BISHOP OF WINCHESTER.

Dr. Samuel Wilberforce was undoubtedly one of the most prominent and gifted men in the Christian Church. A many-sided character, with sympathies of the widest range, he had something in common with the different schools of the English Church, leaning to the Evangelicals in doctrine, and to the High Church in discipline; and it has been remarked as singular that funeral sermons have been preached on him in both High Church and Low Church pulpits. As a preacher he possessed remarkable ability, his intellectual qualities being greatly aided by the singular fervour with which he uttered his message. His untimely death has produced everywhere a profound impression. It is a remarkable fact that within the last few years so many Bishops have died a violent death. Archbishops of Paris have been either shot in the barricades or murdered in prison; Bishop Patteson died the death of a martyr; Bishop Cotton was accidentally drowned; and now Bishop Wilberforce has been killed by a fall from his horse. Events are never ceasing to happen showing how, in Providence, the most momentous results are made to flow from the most apparently trivial causes.

REV. DR. MORGAN OF BELFAST.

Dr. Morgan for a long time sustained in Belfast a position of singular honour and usefulness. Devoting himself with rare industry and singleness of heart to his pastoral duties, and exercising his ministry for a long period in one of the largest and most influential of the congregations of Belfast, free from political or partizan bearing, his name became the synonym for all that is venerable and of good report. There was no one in the Presbyterian Church of Ireland so worthy to fill the post of Convener of the Foreign Mission Committee, which he held to the end, Mr. Fleming Stevenson being his colleague during the last few years. He has passed away amid the deep regrets of all good men.

REV. ROBERT AITKEN,

a very powerful revival preacher, a Scotchman by birth, a clergyman of the Church of England, though, thoroughly in sympathy with the Wesleys, who opened their pulpits to him, in which he preached with vast success. "He had," says the Western Morning News, "a great heart and a mighty soul, and he was literally absorbed and possessed by the one great object of his life, that of persuading men to forsake their evil ways, and to accept of Christ as their only Saviour. His appeals were truly marvellous. Excited to the highest pitch by his subject, no less than by the presence of the large and attentive audiences that hung on his lips, and who were frequently bathed in tears and choked by sobs, he became thoroughly impassioned." His ministry was quite of the type of Wesley and Whitefield, and not without similar fruits. An attempt to gain admission into the Wesleyan ministry having failed, Mr. Aitken took a chapel in White's Row, Spitalfields, which he occupied for a considerable time. The last twenty-four years of his life were spent as incumbent of Pendeen, Cornwall. "Had he added calmness of judgment to his force of character and zeal and perseverance, he must have attained a high place in the Church. . . . In earnest piety, good works, and a godly zeal for the present well-being and final salvation of mankind he was second to no man."

CHRISTMAS, 1872.

ONE NEW YEAR'S NIGHT.

CHAPTER I.

LT was in the month of May that Alice Baird returned from India. Already, in her short nineteen-year's-old life, it was the second time she had made that journey. First, sixteen years ago, when she had travelled, a sumptuous baby in the care of an embroidered and bangled ayah; and now, when she came, a very airisome young lady, state-cabin passenger, under the particular escort of the captain, and the especial care of the stewardess, to say nothing of the honorary chaperonship of the brevet-major's wife, also travelling home in all the bliss of furlough.

She had enjoyed just three years of Indian life, poor motherless Alice! After thirteen years of incarceration in a rising scale of first-class "homes for Anglo-Indians," she had fluttered for just three years in the Calcutta sunshine, riding in the "Maidan," dancing at Government House, and flirting with all sorts of military and civilian youth. A glittering unprofitable life, whose only enjoyment had been excitement! And now her father had married again, and she was sent home, as it seemed to her, to a living grave.

Mr. Baird had spent all his matured life in Hindoostan. He had gone out a hard, worldly-moral young man, with the wife of his first love. That wife lay buried up in the hill-country, in a grave he had never seen. And Mr. Baird had turned back to his work, and amassed money and gained position.

If Mr. Baird had lived in England, he would very likely have remained a worldly-moral man to the end of his days. There are many people whom the outward influence of Christianity keeps up to that point. Most things have a little heat whilst the sun shines on them. But if it be dangerous for a Christian to be isolated from his exterior helps and privileges, what must it be for the worldling? If the garden of the reclaimed heart wastes in such a wilderness, are not rank and poisonous plants likely to spring up and flourish in the natural heart? And so when Mr. Baird married a second time, his marriage and his wife were such as he would never have thought possible in the decent days of his cold, self-contained youth.

One strain of right feeling remained. He would send his daughter home. The poor man did not believe much in God. He often laughed at the idea of converting the surrounding heathen—conversion was to him a chimera—but he never suspected that the passive influence of paganism had almost converted him to its own deadly level. He thought church-going was nonsense, and Bible-reading waste of time; and though he kept a seat in a fashionable Calcutta chapel for his daughter Alice, she was left free to use it or not, at her own ungodly pleasure. But he was shocked when he found that Alice was not horrified at that last and worst step of his, which profaned home, and put a poor lost sinner in her dead mother's place; and that all her anger, to which she gave free vent, only rose over the loss of her own pre-eminence. Had she been nobly grieved or justly indignant, he would probably have derived a spiteful delight in keeping her in her filial post. But her indifference staggered him. Nobody could tell what such a girl might come to. He felt inclined to admit that the old scorned paths of religion were worth something after all, if only to make safe walking for the young women of one's household. He resolved to send Alice home to her mother's brother. Rathburn, on the borders of the Tweed, would be wholesomer for a girl than Calcutta, in more ways than one.

Alice had, perforce, obeyed him, but with a very bad grace, and she was now on the last stage of her journey. The gallant captain and the obsequious stewardess had been parted from in the London docks. She had seen the last of the brevet-major and his wife at York, and now she was seated alone in a coupé. She was not the least interested in the sweet, smiling country through which she was flying. Four railway novels and three comic papers represented the literary gatherings of her journey north of London. She had glanced over them, with the result of feeling "bored," and was lying back with her eyes closed when the train slackened, and the guard shouted "Rathburn," "Rathburn."

In sleepy bewilderment she jumped up and looked out upon the little station, while a tall young man stepped forward from the little waiting group of white-capped women and sturdy ploughmen, and lifting his hat, with a pleasant smile said, "I think you are Alice Baird. I am your cousin Archibald Anderson."

"Our trap is waiting for you outside," he said cheerily. "I will gather up your things and look after the luggage. You go away and take your seat, for you must be tired." And he proceeded to pick up Alice's travelling literature.

"Never mind that," she said impatiently. "I shan't want those books any more. Leave them where they are." And Archie Anderson obeyed, wondering in his boyish heart what ways these were, for in his quiet home books were bought with great consideration and treasured with tender care.

The cousins were soon seated side by side in the homely gig. Archie scarcely knew how to address this fine lady, the first specimen he had ever met of that order of women whose hearts are in their jewel-case, and whose heads are in their flounces. With one sweep of her eye, and one tone of her voice, she had managed to convey, even to his simplicity, all a woman of the world's contempt for the shy country lad. It is but fair to admit that had she not been his own cousin, and a stranger thrown upon his hospitality, Archie in his turn would very contentedly have left her to herself.

"I hope you will like Rathburn," he said, awkwardly.

"I should think it must be dull," Alice responded, looking from right to left.

"Oh no, it is not," he hastened to assure her. "There's more life here than in Lumglen or Talawick, though they're bigger. There's a reading club that meets in the Town Hall once a week all the winter, and there are all the interests about the three churches. I'm taking you into the town by the bonniest road, though it's a bit further round; but I want to give you a good first impression. They are well-off people in these big houses."

Alice still stared about her in silence. The neat freestone buildings had seemed but cottages to her spacious Indian notions, and she wondered how anybody who could possibly be called "well-off" could choose to live at Rathburn.

"Yon's the Free Kirk, where we sit," said Archie, pointing it out with his whip. "It's built on the very spot where uncle Donald preached in the open air in disruption times. He was your uncle as well as mine, Alice."

Alice would have understood her cousin as well had he been talking in Greek, and in many ways it was not unnatural that it should be so. The pity was, that her ignorance was not that of a cultivated, kindly mind, watching for every chance of enlarging its borders, but the crass ignorance of a vain and selfish girl, measuring the whole world by its own narrowness, like a short-sighted person denying the very existence of the landscape that stretches beyond his own imperfect vision. And Archie was greatly relieved when the pony pulled up at the home-door, and Alice was fairly delivered up to the welcome of her uncle and aunt and the rest of the little household.

She followed Mrs. Anderson to her chamber with much such feelings as a prisoner must go to his dungeon. She would have respected her aunt a great deal more had a servant been sent to do the honours, and she unutterably despised and abominated the prim blue-chintz bedroom, with its spindle-legged chairs and dim old prints, while she passed over as quite unworthy notice the great beau-pot of flowers, with which some kind soul had decorated the window-sill in her honour.

She had taken her northward journey by such short stages, that she could not plead fatigue, and as soon as she was left alone, began to divert herself by rummaging out a boxful of her finery, with which she proceeded to bedizen herself for the "tea-dinner," which she was told was in readiness.

"I wish there was a girl in the family, and I would kill her with envy," she said. "It's hardly worth the trouble to astonish the two louts of boys; but still it's a pleasure to dress just for the sake of the thing."

The operation took nearly an hour, for Alice had her full share of Anglo-Indian helplessness, and scarcely knew how to proceed without two or three dusky attendants, upon whom to vent her irritability.

She found the family all in the parlour waiting for her. Her uncle was seated a little apart from the rest, playing with a fair-haired boy, who sat perched upon his shoulder flourishing the stick of a drum, which had fallen to the ground. Besides her aunt, and the two cousins, Archibald and Alexander, there was also a young girl, who was introduced as "our neighbour and dear friend, Helen Cumming." She arose with extended hand to meet Miss Baird, but was instantly repelled by an overwhelming bow, while the child, with the naiveté of his years, forestalled Alice's determination not to kiss him by sliding down from his elevation and burying his head on Mr. Anderson's shoulder.

"That little one isn't our own, Alice," explained her uncle, as soon as he had pronounced the blessing over the simple, bountiful table. "There was a bad railway accident at Talawick about a year ago, and many people, husbands and wives together, were killed. There was provision made for the children, but instead of spending it getting them into hospitals, the neighbours took them up among themselves. It will be homelier for the bairns. We took two — this little laddie, and a baby girl, but she's never been here yet, having been boarded with a foster-mother on the hills. We expect her in two or three weeks. Ask the bairn his name, Alice."

"Oh never mind, uncle; don't trouble him," said the girl.

"What is your name, my lad?" asked Mr. Anderson himself.

"Wullie Bruce," pronounced the little Scotchman, making a solemn pause in his oat-cake.

"And who are you?" asked Helen Cumming, whom Alice had already decided that she should "hate."

This question was evidently a harmless family joke. "Wullie Bruce" clearly felt himself the hero of the occasion, as he answered, deliberately,—

"I am my aunty's youngest boy,
I am her comfort and her joy," and was rewarded by a hearty laugh all round.

"Who taught him to say that?" Alice condescended to ask.

"He got the verse out of an alphabet-book," Helen explained, "and said it first of his own accord, one day when a visitor came, and asked, 'Well, and who are you, my little man?'"

"Oh, won't he tell another tale when the little girl comes!" said Alice. "I daresay he'll be ready to pick her eyes out."

"Truly, the un-renewed heart is always given to jealousy and anger," Mr. Anderson observed gravely; "but Christ's law of love is simple enough to be learned even by such babes and sucklings as our little Willie here."

Alice felt herself somehow rebuked, as much by the silence of the rest of the circle as by her uncle's words. Gentle Mrs. Anderson took needless pity on her.

"The boys have been quite impatient to see you, niece," she said. "They are always so anxious to hear about far-away, strange countries. I like to hear of them myself. You must tell us all about India."

"Oh, there is nothing that one can tell to people who have not seen it," Alice answered impatiently. "There are just plenty of black servants to do everything that one has to do for oneself here, and it's too hot to go out in the middle of the day, and there are chutney and curries on every table. One never thinks of dining without a curry."

"You must teach me how to make curry, Alice," said Mrs. Anderson.

"Oh, I don't know anything about making it, and I don't care for it much myself, either," responded the ungracious visitor, who had no idea of that generous high breeding which delights to accept little kindnesses, because it understands the pleasure of giving them.

"Have you brought back any pictures of India?" inquired Mrs. Anderson.

"No—not one. Yes, I forgot, I have one. I had a drawing-master when I first went there from school, and he gave me a little sketch of a temple, and I think I have that among some other rubbish somewhere in my trunks. I brought away every shred that belonged to me; I was determined that nobody but myself should have the pleasure of throwing away my litter."

Another awkward silence. It fretted Alice, but she had not the least idea that it could possibly be caused by any expressions of hers. She considered she was making a very fair show of her shrewdness and spirit. Such ideas, couched in such language, had always gained her the applause and flattery of the "beaux," who had hitherto been her "public opinion."

Directly after tea, Helen Cumming proposed taking her over the house and making her acquainted with all the details of her new home. Alice indifferently consented; she would have declined altogether, but for a mean and mocking inclination "to spy out the barrenness" of the land.

"You act quite the daughter of the house, Miss Cumming," she said as they rose from table.

"She's a' but ane," observed Aleck. Aleck had carried everything before him in Rathburn Academy and Edinburgh High School, and therefore could afford to indulge himself in his dear old Doric vernacular, which he kept safe among his learning, and secretly loved as much as a mother's letter in a hamper of class-books. Aleck delighted to puzzle conceited "Southrons," by alternate pure Greek and old-fashioned Scotticisms. It was his form of patriotism. "The bodies are sae gien to think that naeboddy wad speak Scotch, wha kened ony better," he would say. Aleck—small, slight, and quaint, with no redeeming point of form or face, except the grey eyes that were sometimes so keen and sometimes so tender—was much of a mystification even to his own watchful parents.

Alice did not catch what he said, and would not ask him. He was the only one who had not addressed her personally nor made the least effort to entertain her.

She would not pretend to admire the domestic treasures and curiosities in which Helen hospitably strove to interest her. She laughed at the old china, and pretended to mistake a rare family heirloom for a spoiled willow-pattern plate. She disparaged the flowers—they all looked half grown and faded after those she had been accustomed to; not that she had cared for flowers in India. She despised the neat and pretty pieces of fancy-work, executed by divers dead aunts and cousins, as well as by Mrs. Anderson herself. The idle girl, who never did anything, presumed to wonder how women could waste their time over such rubbish. Finally, Helen opened the piano, and asked if she could play.

"I learned, of course," Alice answered; "yes, and I played a little after I went back to India, and I rather liked it. It was nice to have the gentlemen turning over the leaves for one. But I can't play without my music, and it is all packed in a trunk that I need not trouble myself to unlock for a long time."

"Perhaps I can find something you will know among this music," Helen responded with cheery patience, and Alice came and stood beside her as she turned over the heap.

"It all seems old enough to have come out of the ark," she observed.

But she knew nothing, and would try nothing, till they lighted on a stray sheet which had been sent as an advertisement by some enterprising publisher. It was an Italian song full of vocal flourish and quackery, and Alice trilled through one or two of its gymnastics, convincing Helen, as she wished, of the compass and quality of her voice. Then she sat down and ran her fingers up and down the notes once or twice,—then stopped.

"I cannot play at all on such a worn-out old thing as that," she said scornfully. "But won't you try,—I should like to hear what you will make of it, though I suppose it won't affect you so much, if you're used to it."

"As you say you don't know much of Scottish ballads, I will sing one," Helen said, with the patience somewhat predominating over the cheerfulness of her tones. And she chose, "There is nae luck about the house."

Helen sang sweetly, and with a truth and delicacy of expression that would have been beyond her hearer's utmost effort of appreciation. But Alice made no such effort.

She lay back in the sofa, closed her eyes, and wondered which of her fine déshabillé dresses she would sport next day. But she caught enough of the song to understand its drift.

"Strange, isn't it," said Helen, "that this sweetest song of a wife's love and joy should have been written by an old maid?" Helen's voice was low and thoughtful, tender with the pathos of the truth that the soul so often gains just as much as the life misses.

"Dear me! it shows how much she must have wanted a husband," said Alice, in her hard, flippant tone. And Helen sat down in silence, and felt that Alice herself must start the next topic.

"Whose portrait is that?" Alice asked presently, pointing to a small miniature that hung close beside the great arm-chair.

Helen was thankful that they were alone and in the twilight. "Don't you know there is another member of the family?" she inquired, in a slight flutter. "That is Hugh, the eldest son, who is in the West Indies, but he is expected home next winter."

"Well, I hope the world will have brushed him up a little," said Alice. "Anyhow, he will surely be something like a man. These two here are terribly hobble-de-hoyish, though I think that Alexander could be impertinent if one gave him a chance."

Helen said nothing.

"And so you wear a ring," Alice observed with reckless forwardness. "Do you mean to say you are engaged? Where did you pick up a young man in Rathburn? I thought it was an old maid's town, for whenever I asked Archibald who lived in any house, as we came through to-day, it was always some Miss Greig, or Scott, or Bruce, or something."

"I am engaged to your eldest cousin, Hugh Anderson," said Helen, with a quiet dignity, that actually awed even Alice Baird for just five seconds!

"Dear me!" she ejaculated, "and so Mrs. Anderson is to be your respected mamma-in-law! I suppose you think you are obliged to come in and do the civil to her; but don't you find it a terrible bore? It will be fine fun to watch you both, making believe to be so affectionate, while all the time you are hating each other like poison."

"I am sure your aunt loves me, and I know I love her. Why should we not?" Helen asked, a little indignantly.

"Oh, you need not think it," Alice replied, with a smiling confidence of superior wisdom. "Mothers always hate the women whom their sons marry. They're so jealous of losing the first place with their own dear child. In India, I used to encourage the old ladies to pour forth their confidences to me. Used not they to cry down and scandalize daughters-in-law, that were far better born and better bred and richer than themselves. The poor old souls never imagined I could see through it, and indeed I helped them out with their abuse, for the young wives were often very uppish and distant to me, and it was always a bother to see them taken in first to dinner. But I don't wonder at any of it. I'm sure I shall hate my mother-in-law to be, and I know I shall hate my future daughter-in-law. It's nature."

"Then it is very bad nature," said Helen decidedly; "and certainly it is not grace."

"Oh, if you begin to talk religion," Alice interrupted, "I drop the argument, though I don't know what religion has to do with it. Mrs. Colonel Bigg professed to be a very pious woman, but she was dreadfully overbearing, and insulted her sons' wives so much, that her sons would not let them visit her. But now tell me what Hugh Anderson is like, and do you expect to live in Rathburn after you are married?"

"I do not know," Helen answered meekly. "We shall live wherever it will be best for Hugh's business."

"Oh, are you one of the dear good souls who make believe to have no will of their own, in order that they may get everything their own way? Do you know, Helen, if I had not let my father know that I was particularly anxious to stay in India, I don't believe he would have ever sent me away here. But when he found I was so determined, he thought I must have some reason for it, and he just made up his mind to thwart me. And I had a reason, Helen. I wanted to stay there, because Somebody else was there. You don't know how attentive Somebody used to be. I always behaved ever so cruelly to him, because it was such fun to see how he took it to heart. He often drank a great deal too much wine, because he told me it was the only way to drown the misery I caused him. Poor fellow! But he only worshipped me more and more."

"I fear he could not have been worth much better treatment than you gave him," said Helen drily; "but still the worst man merits a decent dismissal."

"Don't you begin to preach to me, Helen," Alice retorted, "because I know beforehand it is only out of envy and spite."

"Girls, girls," cried Mrs. Anderson from the foot of the stairs. "It is time for you to come down to worship." And Helen at least was highly delighted to obey the summons.

"What a time those tunes do take singing!" Alice whispered to Helen, when the little family service was over, "and I listened all through the prayer because I really expected uncle would particularly allude to me. I shan't trouble myself again. Come in, again, to-morrow, dear, and now, good night!" And without waiting to see Helen out, she ran off to her own room.

"I left you two lasses alone this evening," said Mrs. Anderson to Helen, "because I thought it would make Alice feel sooner at home to be free to chatter how she chose to a young thing like herself."

"I hope you take to our new niece, Nellie," observed Mr. Anderson.

Helen looked up and smiled brightly. "I should not think she has had a very happy life yet," she said. "I daresay there are a good many gay worldly people out in India, and perhaps she has happened to be thrown into a set of that kind. But she will soon grow happy here."

"What do ye think o' her, Archie man?" asked Aleck, as the two brothers went together to their chamber.

"Mony ane speers the gate he kens fu' weel," answered Archie, who not having a sufficiently learned reputation to dare to be anything but as English as possible in public, occasionally revenged himself by being the Scotchest of the Scotch when in the strictest retirement. "Dinna ask a man to speak when ye ken fine he's nae guid to say."

"Wadna ye hae liket her for your good sister, Archie?" asked Aleck slyly.

"Are ye thinking o' giving me a chance of luikin' on her in that licht, lad?" retorted Archie. "I'm thinkin' ye'd find her gey auld in the heart, and real feckless wi' the hands."

"Hech, ane never kens," said the incomprehensible Aleck, "she'll be better when she's weel enough. Ye ought to be thinking o' how to do her gude, Archie; you, that's a Sunday-school teacher!"

"I could not have patience with the like of her," observed Archie, returning to gravity.

"Isna her soul worth as much as any ither body's?" asked Aleck quaintly. "Isna she gaun to heaven or hell as fast as auld Luckie Weaver, or that little lad Patterson?"

"But what good would I do if I read the Bible to her as I can to Luckie, or offered to teach her the catechism as I teach Bob? She would laugh in my face, and it would do more harm than good."

"Do ye think ye canna wear religion ony ither gate than on your tongue?" asked Aleck; "an' do ye think yer tongue itsel canna speak it except when it's reading or catechising? Man, if ye think there is nae hope of doing gude to a puir lassie, set down her lane amang a household that professes and delights to serve the Lord, why suld ye gie yer bawbees to send oot a puir missionar' a' by himsel, amang countless pagans?"

An argument in bed is always a very convenient affair, because if you do not answer the unanswerable, it can only be supposed that you have dropped asleep. This time Archibald did not answer.

Another dialogue had been going on downstairs.

Mr. Anderson had lain down on the sofa before the dying fire, while his wife went to and fro on her little final household businesses. She glanced once and again at her "gude-man," and saw that he was thoughtful, and with the fine instinct of five-and-twenty years of happy unity, did not need to be told what he was thinking.

"Wife," he said at last, "I'm afraid we've let the world into our fold. There will be thoughts and words and ways that have not been in this house before. I knew my poor brother-in-law's child could have had no Christian training, but I fear I never before rightly felt the inspired truth that the carnal heart is enmity against God—not indifference but hatred—not mere withholding from, but an actual fighting against. I see the devil has his own moralities and religion, and even his own peculiar scribes and Pharisees. Is it right to our own young ones to take in this poor white pagan, wife?"

"Where else can the lassie go?" asked Mrs. Anderson simply. "I would take hali my bairn's regular dinner to give to a stray bairn that was starving, and I don't know that we would be right to be more selfish over their spiritual meat."

"I should not be so exercised if she were friendless and penniless," said Mr. Anderson, musing, "but when we got the offer of a hundred pounds a year to just board the lassie as ane o' ourselves, I aye thought that it would be a fine help, just as I'm failing, and the lads are beginning to want their start in life. I should have thought it was the Lord's way of helping us, if she had been the simplest bit lassie with an inch of faith in man, wherein one could hope to plant faith in God! But this scoffing, heartless quean! And if we are getting profit by her, it makes me fear we may not be single-hearted in our wish only to do her good, and our faith that God can keep her from unsettling our own children. I wuld trust my boys out on the Frith on the stormiest night trying to save the drowning, because then I'd know they were in God's hands, and I had a right to pray for them. But I wuldna trust them there for a mere wager of a million pounds. Wife, wife, tell me what we are to do in this strait, for a woman's mind, like her step, goes light and safe over many a peat moss where a heavy man would lumber about and sink."

Mrs. Anderson put down the basket of aired linen, which she had borne in her hands as she stood. She kept silence for a moment.

"We mustna turn away the lassie," she said. "It will be no harm to turn away the gear. Give seventy pounds a year to the Indian missions. Just give it without a name. We shall be freer and evener with the lassie when the thought of it is put quite out of the way. And yet we shall be great gainers, for I'm sure, gude man, you've often longed sorely for the luxury of giving."

"Be it so, then," said Mr. Anderson, laying his hand fondly on the bending shoulder that felt so frail beneath his touch. "But well know I, it is given at your expense and Helen's, for you twa will have all the brunt of the airs and tantrums of this niece of mine."

"Ah, well, they'll keep me younger," answered his wife, with her soft laugh: "it often seems to me that it's when we're left to settle down in our own pet ways and habits, be they never so good, that we begin to want spectacles and to tak the gout."

Then they crept softly up-stairs, lest they should disturb their guest, little thinking that she still sat before the mirror trying new modes of dressing her hair, and reflecting—

"I will take care not to let myself be ordered about and kept under. They will not try it too much, for fear of losing my money. What a blessing it must be to them!—enough to keep up the whole house, I should think. What a 'goody' girl that Helen is! but then, poor thing, she has never had a chance of being anything else. It must have been quite a treat to her to hear my lively conversation to-night—no wonder she was so sedulous in attention to me."

And sweet Helen, in her simple chamber in the next house, sat writing busily till long after midnight. For the West Indian mail went out next morning, and she was resolved that her letter to her betrothed lover should not be one line the shorter, because she had devoted her usual time for writing it to "entertaining a stranger."

Verily the worshippers of the god of this world "have not known, nor understood"—"a deceived heart turns them aside, that they cannot deliver their souls, nor say, Is there not a lie in my right hand?"

CHAPTER II.

AND so the other little orphan has come," said Alice Baird, as she came on little Willie, sitting, with a toy in his hand, in one of the passages, when she had been an inmate of the house for some days. "Who are you now, Master Willie Bruce? You won't be the pet any longer; you'll have to give up everything to your little sister."

Willie considered for a moment, with his strong under lip.

"I'd break it all in two, if I tould," he said, and Alice put her own meaning on the speech and laughed heartily, till he went on in his quaint judicial way.

"Only little sissy can't be 'aunty's youngest boy;' but I'll be 'comfort,' and she'll be 'joy,'" and then he rose and broke away from Alice, and ran down the entry shouting in his highest treble—

"I'm still my aunty's youngest boy,
I'm her comfort and sissy's her joy.."

Alice stood suddenly up, as people do under a sharp surprise. It was her first revelation of a possible state of mind free from the envy, hatred, and uncharitableness of all the morbid self-seeking that kept her own heart like the troubled sea. This was no fruit of mere infancy. She remembered her own childhood, and the bitter hatred she had felt for her poor ayah's infant, because the ayah had adorned it with one of her own bangles, which her little mistress had coveted for herself.

"Well, we must be as we are made," Alice said to herself, "and I suppose some people are born angels."

Anything to comfort oneself to remain lazily as one is! When the secrets of all hearts are revealed, it will be marvellous how many persons have gone to hell, because they persuaded themselves they were obliged to go there!

This was the first slight shock received by her contemptuous self-satisfaction. And from that day she grew more and more to regard the Andersons, not, as at first, as people utterly beneath her, but as people entirely different from her. Every difference between them and her she began to impute to this radical dissimilarity. It was because they were so different, that the quiet life and regular discipline which seemed so delightful to them was so intolerable to her. It never even occurred to her whether this quiet life and regular discipline might not have produced much of the difference.

Under this new feeling she grew terribly restive. They seemed to her to do nothing that they did not like, for they seemed to like just what they did. Why then should she not also be "a law unto herself?" That scriptural phrase had happened to fall upon her ear in the midst of some Sabbath reading. She never listened to anything, so that it must have surely been some evil spirit which repeated this in her ear. And she caught hold of it, and constantly quoted it, parrot-like, as ungodly people are given to quote what they learn from the devil's collection of "Texts suitable for one's own case."

She would not kneel at family prayers. She would not attempt to sing. She would look straight at whoever was giving out the tune, to try to put them out. She would not darn her stockings. She would not tidy her hair before she came to breakfast. She would read in her bed at night. She would not make herself civil to the family visitors, but managed to scrape an acquaintance with some neighbours of doubtful reputation.

"I should know what to do with her if she was one of my own," said her uncle, almost grimly.

"If being one of your own she was like she is, she would be in a much worse way," Mrs. Anderson pleaded gently; "but she has been brought up so differently. She has known no happiness except in things that she cannot find in Rathburn. We must let her have as much freedom and change as possible. That will make her take more easily to the restraints that must remain."

If Alice "took" to any of the Anderson household, counting it as inclusive of Helen, that one was Archibald. His was one of those quiet substantial characters that present no aggressive point. A granite character, not of that finer marble, of which is made the picturesque or sublime statuary of the world, but rather the strong enduring boulder on which such statuary is raised for admiring eyes. Archie was not "original" like Aleck; but Aleck had once or twice winked his wonderful eyes, and said that all his originality consisted in saying what Archie thought, and understanding what Archie did. "He's o' the sort that makes the world go round," Aleck would say. "He's sae deep that he doesna frichten the deil himself, who was a fool from the beginning and for all his politics, and hasna yet learned that his own worst enemies arena those who come wi' a flourish of trumpets and an open declaration of war."

One sweet day in the very early autumn, Archibald and Aleck took a holiday to accompany their cousin to Talawick Bay. They went on the coach as far as Lumglen, and walked on to Talawick, through the Talling woods. The leaves were just beginning to fall, and lay like tarnished gold beneath the sunlight that flickered down the long green glades. The whimper of a little burn beside the path, the patient coo of the cushat, and the harsh notes of the "corbies," made up one of nature's sweetest songs. Perhaps the peculiarly soothing scene was not without some influence on Alice, or perhaps it was the reaction after a fit of extraordinary waywardness and passion, or it might be the reassuring commonplace of Archie's cheery conversation, but anyhow she felt rather more kindly than usual. She even waited without grumbling while he dug up a fern for Helen, and actually condescended to own that a certain rare moss was "very pretty."

Then they came out upon the "seascape" of the Bay. A semicircle of sea, enclosed by black beetling rocks overhanging a little strip of shingly shore.

"What a day for a row!" said Archibald to Aleck as they all rested together on an overturned boat. And he took off his hat, and bared his forehead to the delicious sea-breeze.

"I can't understand what pleasure there is in boating, and especially on the horrid sea!" his cousin answered. Yet some more genial influence was certainly upon her, for she added, "But don't let me keep you from it. I can wait here till you come back."

Archibald shook his head. "It is quite safe to-day," he said, "but in rough weather this is a dangerous bit. Mother's only brother was overtaken here in a squall, and drowned. And when we were quite little children she made us promise never to go out on Talawick Bay. I remember my brother Hugh said, 'But what would we do if we saw any one drowning there?' And mother said, 'Then, of course, you would go, but never go only for your pleasure.' And we promised her."

"But I daresay she only meant while you were boys," said Alice.

"I don't know," Archibald answered. "I never asked her."

"You are sure it is quite safe to-day?" Alice inquired.

"Oh yes; it often is."

"Then, Archibald," said she quickly, meaning to be very kind, "there is nobody to tell her if you go to-day. I never will. And she will not think of asking you, because she knows I hate the sea, and she will be sure to think I would not let you leave me."

"No, Alice, thank you," Archibald answered, quietly; "but I would not do behind my mother what I would not do before her face."

"But it is hard you should have to give up your pleasure," she said, unwilling to resign her sympathy, perhaps because its sensation was an agreeable novelty.

"That is a very little thing to give up, Alice," Archibald replied.

"This is always the way," she cried, petulantly, "you are all so good that I can't be kind to you."

"Oh yes, I'm sure you can," said Aleck, breaking his long silence. "Yesterday morning I walked up and down saying that a button had come off my shirt-sleeve. I wanted you to offer to put it on, and save me from interrupting my mother, who was ben the house makin' a pie."

"Pooh, I don't want to put on buttons," Alice answered angrily. And so she let the new pleasant feeling of "comradeship" escape her. But many wiser people than poor Alice are mortally affronted if another ventures to decline a boon that would be a deadly injury.

It was two or three weeks after this, that Alice suddenly rose up from reading a London newspaper, went straight to her room, and scared the whole house by a fit of hysterics. People heard her all down the quiet street. Helen Cumming came running in, and the doctor arrived before he was fetched.

"It has surely been something not right in her health that has made her so fractious all the time," said innocent Mrs. Anderson.

"My poor sister, nor none of my people ever took such fits," observed her husband, as if to relieve his family from any suspicion of uncomfortable hereditary disease.

"But then they had not travelled about as she has," remarked old Miss Cumming, Helen's great aunt, who had never even been to Edinburgh. "It's all a new thing, this travelling, and one does not know what it may do. I'd like to see its effects on two or three generations before I try it myself. But I know one of my cousins went into hysterics because her family would not allow her to marry a man who drank; and her mother dismissed their servant and made her rub the floors and furniture, and she soon got well after that."

Something in this practical precedent and prescription seemed to give Aleck a new idea, for five minutes after Archie found him diligently reading through the "marriage" notices of the Times, which Alice had half-crumpled and thrown down in a corner.

"This is it, Archie," he said, and read—

"At Calcutta, Lieutenant Smith, of the — Regiment, to Kate, daughter of Captain Forbes, of the — Regiment."

"Do you suppose he was her sweetheart?" asked Archie, interested and confidential.

"A woman aye has ane, when she's naething better to do," observed Aleck.

"I wonder if she really loved him! Poor Alice!" said Archie.

"Spare your pity, man. When a woman's lost her heart, and only finds it broken and thrown away, she doesna tell 't to the town-crier."

"I'm two years older than you, but I wish I had half as much sense. 'I shall never wear your bonnet,'" said Archie, quoting a quaint national proverb.

Aleck looked up at Archie with some of that indescribable pathos which occasionally dashed his dry humour: "When the brain's big, the heart's aft heavy wi't," he said in his favourite vernacular. "But we needna waste mair words wondering, for here is Helen, and I daresay she will know something mair of this matter."

Helen did know, for she had reluctantly received many further confidences since that night of Alice's arrival. She looked at the newspaper, and was obliged to own that Aleck's shrewd guess was right.

Helen resigned herself to bear Alice company in the sentimental retirement in which she spent the whole of that and the following day. Poor Helen was dreadfully bewildered by Alice's incoherent and contradictory communications. She had never loved the lost lover; she had quite misunderstood her feelings concerning him. She had loved him enthusiastically; she could never survive it; she would never love another man. He had loved her to distraction, and only married in his despair of ever winning her affection in return. He had been a deliberate and heartless deceiver. From all of which Helen wisely drew the right conclusion that Lieutenant Smith would be astonished to hear that he had ever been supposed to go beyond an unmeaning flirtation between an idle man and a frivolous girl.

Alice amused herself for awhile by the perusal of every soft-sighing poem that she could find. She even opened the old piano, and sang a few sad songs; but imaginary mourning is too great a strain to keep up long, and then, deprived of the best fond fancy on whose unwholesome food she had fed her imagination, her state became pitiable.

She alone was miserable, among contentment and happiness, whose only shadow was sympathy and regret for her. She did not know it herself—for selfishness and self-will are bad paths to self-knowledge—but there were times when she longed to be as Helen Cumming was. She knew she would never have had the patience that Helen had shown towards such a torment as herself, and it only stirred in her a bitter feeling that felt like restless hatred and animosity—yet which really was the hard, sour germ that might ripen into love. There were times when she nearly softened. There was that fair Sabbath afternoon, hot and bright as stray autumn days sometimes are, when she sat moodily at her chamber window, and watched the Rathburn people coming out of church. She had heard the dim, softened sounds of the far-off psalm, and now the congregation were coming out with its music in their faces. Humble, lowly people, all of them—careful, struggling, of no account in this world; and yet as Alice watched them that afternoon, a door in her heart opened to hear a voice whisper, that the gay dress, and the brilliant society, and the prosperity and “fulness of bread” in which she had rested, beside their “peace which passeth understanding,” were but as a child’s mimic bank of gilt buttons and tokens compared with a king’s treasury. She even owned within herself that she longed to go down-stairs, meet the household party on the threshold, throw her arms about her Aunt Anderson’s neck, and own that she had been wrong and miserable. But she said to herself that to-morrow she would repent of such folly; it was just weakness. If she wanted to be a little more companionable and teachable, it was easy to be so without such enthusiastic penitence.

Ah, many people since Saul of Tarsus have “kicked against the pricks.” Poor Alice went to bed that night with a self-righteous reflection that she had cast out some evil demons of obstinacy and malice, and did not know that unless some active love has come in their place, they will only return and increase in strength in the swept and garnished heart.

Only the next morning, sleeping late as was her custom, she was awakened by happy laughter in the summer-house beneath her window. Peeping through her curtain, she saw Archibald and Helen Cumming within, with letters in their hands. They had evidently read them before, for they were in no eager haste, but were just going over them again in sheer enjoyment and thankfulness.

She could distinctly hear Archibald’s voice. The letter had been addressed to Helen, but contained such general good news that it had become common property.

“I quite expect to keep my new year in Rathburn,” Archibald read. “I shall arrive at Southampton, and travel straight north, but do not endeavour to expect me on any definite day, for I will not arrive in a ghastly fashion, at some uncanny hour of the night, but will break my journey in such a way as to walk in among you, a reasonable guest at an appropriate time. I have a trunk packed full of presents, for besides little family remembrances, I am bringing over many simple curiosities that are destined to give our own future home a polite ‘air of foreign travel.’ I have decided, with your consent, that we shall settle at Talawick. It has good rail and steam connections, that will suit me admirably for the journeys that my business may force me to take occasionally, and I shall go on such, with all the lighter heart, knowing that the wee wife is safely left in a familiar place, near her own people and mine. If Archie is over at Talawick shortly, he can give a glance at that pretty cottage overlooking the bay, and if it is to be let, and you feel as kindly to it as I do, he can bespeak it for me from the winter term. I shall only give you grace to remain Helen Cumming for as long—or I mean as short—a time as it will take me to get the house in order. You need not mention trousseaux nor any such things, for, besides my own private opinion that you have had long enough already for such preparations, I shall only quote from Aleck’s stock of proverbs, that ‘a bonnie bride’s sune buskit.’ As soon as I land I shall go to the Southampton post-office in the sure expectation of finding a neat little letter addressed to ‘Mr. Hugh Anderson, to wait till called for.’ Archie can write one too, if he likes, for I am greedy in the matter of letters, and the faithfulness of my home-correspondents has fostered the appetite immensely.”

“No wonder she’s so sweet and amiable,” said Alice, dropping the curtain with a shake. “No wonder they all are. They have everything their own way. All so fond of each other; all living together, or coming home to live together. All thought so much of by everybody. It is easy for them to be good! Look at me! Never mind that, I’ve money and fine dresses, and all that hollow rubbish. Here I am, turned out of my father’s own house, because my father has married a woman he should not have married, and made a scandal that of course hangs about me wherever I go. And the man that I cared for, or that cared for me, or, at any rate, that made himself pleasant, he goes and marries somebody else! It is natural that I should be miserable and passionate. What do I care for prayer, or Bible-reading, or any such things! They wouldn’t if they were me. It’s no wonder they can love God, when He gives them all they can want or wish. Let the tide set the other way, and then they would repine and rebel as much as anybody else!”

Satan is the same now as when he went up among the sons of God and asked—"Doth Job fear God for nought?"

CHAPTER III.

IGHT as were the hearts of the Anderson household that winter-time, Alice contrived to make herself felt as a very appreciable burden. Causelessly unhappy people are never such a curse as in times of joy and gladness. They are like a black stain on a wedding-dress, or a dead flower in a nosegay, worthless and disgusting, yet able to spoil so much.

And Alice's uneasy conscience made her very restlessly and persistently disagreeable. It destroyed the selfish animal good-humour which she had hitherto occasionally enjoyed. It might be partly a sign of spiritual growth and life, though an unpleasant one, like a baby's fractiousness at teething-time.

The Andersons were thoroughly Scotch people, of Scotch feelings and habits. They did not keep Christmas in the English fashion, because they had not been accustomed. Their little household festivities had always been reserved for that New Year-tide, when they now hoped to have their beloved wanderer again among them. But they kept Christmas in its truest and best sense of remembering their brotherhood with the poor and suffering, to whom the first of the "hard weather" comes like a blast from the grave. Besides their contributions in cash and kind to their church charities, Mrs. Anderson and Helen both exerted their wits and kindness to give some little bit of genuine pleasure to every "poor body" they knew.

"The Bible says that man does not live by bread alone," said Mrs. Anderson; "and if flannel and coals warm the body, I'm sure a little tea or snuff or a new book warm the very heart."

Alice would not interest herself in any of these quiet Christian charities, nor did she say a word in allusion to English Christmas customs, till late on the evening of the 25th, when she observed, bitterly,—

"One does not know what one may come to. I never thought to keep Christmas in a house without going to church, without a bit of holly, or a turkey, or a plum-pudding, or a carol. But, of course, your charity is so busy out of doors, that it is quite above considering the feelings of those within."

"Oh, Alice, I am so sorry!" Helen cried sincerely. "If you had only said a word! You see we never think of you as English. We only associate you with Scotland and India, and forget that you were brought up in London. We never thought of it, though I know that is no excuse, for I should have thought of it. If you will try to forgive me, Alice, we will remind your aunt to have Christmas plum-pudding on New Year's Day, and I will decorate the rooms with evergreens, and we will all keep our happy day together, and you must try to forget the different date."

"But New Year's Day is just New Year's date—a fresh sheet of almanac and new account-books," pouted Alice. "Now Christmas means to me the birth of the Saviour, and the manger, and the shepherds, and all sorts of sacred things."

"Yet even Christmas Day is not Christ's real birthday," Helen pleaded gently. "It is only a day chosen by some churches to keep them in remembrance of his taking the form of a servant, and coming among us. Christ's real birthday, for us, can only be the day when he enters into our hearts, and takes our sins upon himself, and gives us his grace in their stead. But, Alice, try to forgive me, and I will make up all that I can, for forgetting your very natural feelings."

Oh, how Alice grudged and scorned, when, in a few days, Helen came in loaded with holly and fir, and made a long garland that was to go round the room, besides smaller ones for every picture and looking-glass. One moment Alice would have liked to go up to her and kiss her, and thank her for such goodness to such a hard-hearted, cantankerous wretch as herself. And the next minute she hated her, envied her, despised her—judged her as hypocritical, sly, and self-seeking in her very kindness. "She can't like me," she said to herself. "Why should she wish to be kind to me, except to make a display of heavenly forgiveness and long-suffering to her admiring future family-in-law?" And yet Alice knew in her inmost heart, that if Helen had grown indignant and indifferent beneath her constant patter of spite and arrogance, she would then have asked, "Where was her Christian patience and forbearance?"

It was early on the morning of the last day of December, when a telegram came from Hugh Anderson. "Arrived at Southampton. Got your letters. All well."

"He will be in Talawick by the midnight train, and will be here by breakfast-time on New Year's Day," said Helen, with a very glory of happiness shining in her face.

Nobody did much in that house that day. All their glad preparations were made, and they were too unsettled in their eager joy to attempt more than going to and fro about the rooms, putting last fond needless touches.

"Hush, isn't that a coach drawing up?" asked Mrs. Anderson breathlessly, as they all sat round the evening fire, Helen on a low stool at her feet, just where the hand of the elder woman could easily stray down on the girl's soft brown hair.

"No, mother, it is only the wind," said Archie, "and it could not possibly be Hugh, for he cannot reach Talawick till midnight, even if he landed in time to catch the earliest train."

"He would do that if he could," observed the mother, happily assured. "But—there's that sound again!"

"It is nothing but the wind," Archie repeated; "hark—you hear it die away by the side of the house. I have noticed it before when a gale is first rising. It will be wild weather to-night."

"Then, thank God, Hugh is off the sea," said Mrs. Anderson, "and may He help and keep every mother's son still out and upon it."

And then they kneeled for their usual "worship," and the head of the household offered a thanksgiving for the son "brought in safety through the perils of his journey," and prayed for "his comfortable and happy arrival at his father's house."

Truly, that was a wild night. Perhaps it was something of the eagerness of expectation that kept the Andersons and Helen wakeful, but even Alice could not sleep for the dashing rain, and the roaring relentless wind. She grew frightened, lying in the darkness, and rose and stole away to her aunt's room.

"God is in the storm," said Mrs. Anderson gently.

"But there is danger," Alice sobbed;

"houses are blown down sometimes and people are killed."

"Yes, dearie," her aunt replied. "I never taught my children not to fear, by saying there was no danger. I only told them it was all in their Heavenly Father's hand, and they were as safe in the tempest as in the calm."

It grew stiller towards morning, and presently the grey light stole in. By breakfast-time Alice would have been almost ready to deny that she had been agitated the night before.

Breakfast-time, but no Hugh.

"He missed the morning train yesterday," observed Archibald, and Mrs. Anderson and Helen both said eagerly that of course they had not expected him—only they had thought perhaps he might be in time.

Presently an old neighbour came in, and sat down, and talked for a few minutes. He seemed grave and pre-occupied, and would not listen to any of their playful railery about his being their "first foot." He said that somebody who had come in by the coach from Talawick, was saying there had been a bad shipwreck in the Bay last night—a Swedish ship had struck on the rocks, and it had gone hard with her. Then he went away.

He had scarcely gone before another neighbour appeared. This was somebody whom the Andersons did not see very often, a reverent, austere man, with a soul as strong as his giant frame, and as little capable of shrinking from hardest tasks. Gentle Mrs. Anderson was a great favourite of his, and had a vast respect for him. She began instantly to tell him how they were looking out for Hugh.

"We thought he might be at Talawick last night," she said.

"He was at Talawick," said the stern Scotchman, with a solemnity that ran to every heart in the room. "He was at Talawick. Oh, woman, woman, God gie ye strength to feel that sair tears ne'er need fa' on a hero's grave, an' that Heaven is a bonnier place than e'en ane's ain fireside!"

Was it for a second, or for an hour, they all sat in silence? None of them ever knew. Pass by that agony of sorrow. Who but God could bear to gaze on those parted quivering lips that never murmured, on those tearful eyes that mutely said, "Thy will be done." Alice Baird could not bear it. She went up to Helen, and threw her arms round her neck, but Helen drew gently—oh, so gently—but firmly away. No comfort could be taken yet except from the Hand that had given the blow, and Alice rose and went softly from the room.

Hugh had arrived in Talawick at the time his mother and Helen had hoped. He had found the foreign ship labouring in her great strait, and the Talawick men, in the absence of one or two of their leaders, had seemed uncertain and wavering in their help. The only boat that was big enough to breast the waves was old, and scarcely seaworthy. Volunteers to man it hung back, except one old man—a former man-o'-war's man. Hugh Anderson had stepped forward, like the gallant gentleman that he was.

"I've not come all the way from the Indies to stand and watch men drown, at my own country-side," he said. "I'm going—for one, and God be with me."

And then others had pressed forward, and the little craft was launched. It brought off all the Swedes, except one or two who had been already washed off. They had a sore struggle to get the old, heavily-laden boat back to shore. Again and again waves broke over her. The old man-o'-war's man was brought in to tell the little he knew to the father and mother.

"It come up ahint me," he said. "Them poor furriners was down in the bottom, half-drowned aforehand, and holding on to what they could. It come ahint me, as I say. I saw It in his eyes. I think he know'd he couldn't stand another of 'em, fur, says he, lookin' straight at It, and kind o' through it, as I've seen men look at harbour-lights ahead through the storm—says he, 'Mother always said I might.' I don't know what he meant, ma'am, but them was just his words. And then It came. And when it was gone by, I rights myself again, and there's them poor furriners and there's my mates. But the gentleman's away. An' it's my honest belief, as have kept the sea man an' boy forty years come Lammas, that out of rough old Talawick bay that there gentleman went up to sit down in glory with every admiral and captain that has served the kings and the King o' kings, sin' the navy fetched the temple-gold for King Solomon."

Evening came again. The sad terrible New Year's night that was to have been so gay! Alice had stolen once or twice to the kitchen, and whispered to the tearful, shocked servant-lasses. But she had always returned to the solitude of her own chamber.

Darkness fell, and Alice still sat in the cold with a heavy shawl drawn tightly round her. Suddenly, striking her ear, like a familiar sound rousing us from a hideous dream, a bell rang. It was the accustomed signal to call scattered members of the family to the household worship.

Awestruck, she stole down to the garlanded little parlour. The servant-lasses were just passing in, and she hung back and entered behind them, and slipped into a seat near the door. The "ha-Bible" lay as usual open before her uncle, and with faltering voice he read a few verses that came in the ordinary course of reading. It chanced to be one of those wonderful psalms, within whose wide range there is a sympathetic touch for every human mood. It was hard, hard for him to go through it, but it was his brave sign of submission and fortitude. And he did it. Then closing the book, he said as usual—

"Let us sing to the praise and glory of God!"

But he could do no more. The psalm remained ungiven out. There was an awful silence in the room. The two young men's heads were bent low over their books. The mother's face was hidden in her hands. The servant-girls and Alice sat paralyzed. Alice could not dare to raise her eyes upon the tragedy of agony before her, but sitting, gazing mutely at the ground, she caught sight of the little kitten beneath the table, still decked in the gay red ribbon that Helen had tied about its neck that morning. That loosened the tension of her nerves, and she would have burst into bitter weeping for the dead man whom she had never seen, but at that moment a sweetly strange voice was raised in that softly solemn strain, which has soothed so many sad and suffering scenes—

"The Lord's my Shepherd, I'll not want;
He makes me down to lie
In pastures green: He leadeth me
The quiet waters by."

It was Helen. The sorest-stricken deer had got the soonest to the Fountain of Healing. She sang through one verse alone; in the second, Aleck's head was raised, and he had joined. Mr. Anderson and Archie were a little later, and Alice heard even her aunt's thin quaver in the concluding lines—

"And in God's house for evermore
My dwelling-place shall be."

Neither Alice nor the servants joined their voices. Some unconscious influence withheld them. The sweet incense of the hearts God had bruised went up to Him unmingled with any commoner sacrifice.

They knelt down in prayer. One moment's silence, and then the father's voice, clear as ever, only very soft and low, as if the sense of God's nearness was strong upon him—

"Lord, we thank Thee. We prayed according to our littleness, and Thou hast answered according to Thy greatness. We thanked Thee for a short and terminable preservation of our dear one, and Thou hast given him the fulness of glory for ever and ever. We asked Thee to bring him back to us, and Thou hast taken him to Thyself. We looked forward to happy days with him here: Thou saidst to him, 'Come up hither, that where their treasure is, there may their heart be also.' Comfort Thy handmaiden, whom Thou hast smitten in the days of her youth. Continue to strengthen her as Thou hast strengthened her to-night, and let her grow in grace below as—Hugh—grows in glory above. Help Thy servants, from whom Thou hast taken one of the props of their age. Give our other sons renewed courage to follow their brother to heaven, as they were proud to emulate him on earth. And make us gentle and patient and open-hearted in our sorrow, so that we be not unlovely and morose in the eyes of our friends who dwell within our gates. O God—Father God, who gave up Thine own Son for our sakes, for His sake hear us! Amen."

* * *

There was a soul born that night in that house of mourning; for Alice Baird kneeled down at her bed-side, in floods of penitent tears, and prayed God to forgive her for all the wickedness that she could never, never forgive herself. She no longer denied that no mere human nature, no mere calmness of fortune had produced the sweet and hallowed dispositions against which she had rebelled with such fierce envy and uncharitableness. She was at the mercy of every trifling wave of circumstance and temperament: they were on a Rock, which no storm could shake. Out of the little blue bed-chamber, which had so often been the self-imposed prison of a morbid, selfish spirit, there rose that never-unanswered cry—

"God be merciful to me a sinner!"

* * *

Alice proved the genuineness of her penitence by forcing no sharp confessions on hearts sore with sorrow. She lived her confessions instead. Do not think her useless hands and thoughtless head suddenly became deft and wise, nor that her pampered temper ever became quite as bright and sweet as Helen's. But from that day, amid all her blunderings and helplessness, she began to live for other people, and for God in them. Mrs. Anderson and Helen, active and even-souled as they maintained themselves through their trial, were still a little absorbed, and perhaps shrewd Aleck was the first to see the change. It came in silence, and he helped it without a recognising word. Only how often he appealed to Alice for small favours! And how patiently he waited while she bungled over little duties of his gloves and buttons which the others would have done twice as well in half the time!

But there came one cool, still autumn afternoon, when Helen and Alice walked together through Talling Wood, and out beside Talawick Bay. It was four years since the Swedish ship had gone down on those treacherous rocks, and Helen had passed into the pale grey and deep violet tints which will be her "everyday wear" all the rest of the days of her mortal life. People often remarked "that these suited her so well, one could not fancy her wearing anything else."

One may be quite sure there must have been many sacred confidences between those two, before Helen would bring Alice to walk arm-in-arm with her, and watch the sun go down over Talawick Bay.

Alice was going away from Rathburn. Her father, widowed a second time, and quite broken in health, was returning to England, determined not to come near his native town, but to settle in some southern watering-place, where he might find Anglo-Indian society. It would be a dreary, trying life for his daughter, alienated from the Christian love and fellowship that she had learned fully to value, and isolated with an ungodly, selfish valetudinarian. But though Alice had already shed many tears of parting sorrow, no word of fretful regret had escaped her.

"I am only so thankful to God that He brought me among you, Helen," she said, as they walked together, facing the solemn crimson sunset, that has a different meaning for every eye that gazes on it. "For you and all the Andersons preached me the only sermon which my hard, vain heart could possibly have heard. Well shall I always understand the full force of King David's repeated adjuration, "O worship the Lord in the BEAUTY OF HOLINESS."

A SONG OF THE CITY.

I'VE got a secret, do you know,
 To tell you as we go along ;—
 They're not good folks that live down here,
 They'll give you nothing for your song :
 I'd learn a new one soon, you see,
 Let's settle what the song shall be !

I've got a secret, do you know,—
 The song we'll settle by-and-by ;—
 They don't care much for music here,
 They shut the window there, up high ;
 It's never worth to come again,
 And stand here singing in the rain.

I've got a secret, do you know,—
 Oh yes, I'm going to tell you soon ;—
 How well God lights up all the world,
 Down goes the sun, up comes the moon !
 I wonder how the world would fare
 Without the lamps He hangs up there !

I've got an angel, do you know ;
 A splendid angel, all in white ;
 I've seen her often—she comes out
 Just with the little stars at night :
 And that is just the angel's way ;
 Who ever knew them come by day ?

I've got an angel, do you know ;
 I've seen her times, and times, and times,
 I've watched till all the lamps are out
 Beside the railings, near the lines ;
 I love to see her face a bit,
 Because God's face has looked in it.

I've got an angel, do you know ;
 A face so white and eyes so blue :
 I've seen a lady like her once,
 Who goes in by the same door too ;
 She bought my primroses one day,
 Though they were withered all away.

Mine is an angel, though, you know ;
 She's always dressed in white, you see ;
 The lady wears bright pretty things,
 Though she smiled sweetly down at me ;
 But mine is always saintly white,
 And goes out watching of a night.

I've got an angel, so, of course,
 I'm never frightened now to sleep ;
 I think of how she's standing by,
 And what good watch her face can keep ;
 I'd let her go and watch by you
 If angels could watch over two.

MISS CHARLOTTE'S PRIDE.

I.

I COULD never make out how Miss Charlotte, my handsome, high-spirited young mistress, came to marry Squire Allworthy. I think she must have had some disappointment, but of that she never spoke to me. Mr. Allworthy was a good deal older than she was ; for she was only twenty-one, and he must have been near fifty. Her father was at first much opposed to the match, but Miss Charlotte's heart, or if not her heart her will, was set on it, and no arguments nor persuasions could move her. Mr. Allworthy was a rich man, kind-hearted, and genial, with a pleasant word and a smile for every one ; his character stood high, and his family was good ; in short, there was no objection to take hold of, so to speak, and in a matter of age young ladies are supposed to please themselves. It is not becoming in servants to talk about such matters, and I never would have said so but at this distance of time ; but I wondered secretly to myself how Miss Charlotte, who was by far the cleverest of the family, should fancy Mr. Allworthy, who never seemed to talk or think of anything but dogs and horses. How well I remember being in the parlour for some reason while the young ladies were all there, busy discussing some wonderful books which were then coming out, written by no one knew whom at the time, though I have since heard that they were novels by Sir Walter Scott, and better than any books of the kind that were ever written before or since. Presently Miss Charlotte turned to Mr. Allworthy, who had been very silent while they were talking, and asked what he thought. He said he had never read any of the books, and evidently hardly knew even the names. There was no such great harm in that, I thought ; but I shall never forget the look of contempt which passed over Miss Charlotte's handsome face, nor the scornful way in which she turned from him, and went on talking to her sisters. And yet she married him. The wedding was a gay one ; but in spite of flowers, and smiles, and glad words, I could not get that one scornful look out of my head, and the thought pressed upon me that the marriage would not be a happy one.

Time went on, Miss Charlotte married and went to her own home, and I remained to look after her brother's children, and often thought of her, though I had seen and heard but little of her, excepting the successive births of four children, and of the early death of two of them. Almost immediately after the sorrowful death of the young squire's wife, and he had gone away for a change, and I was alone with my poor motherless children at the Hall, Mrs. Allworthy came to spend some days there, and make acquaintance with her brother's children. Her husband did not accompany her, but he was to fetch her home at the end of a week. Directly she came into the nursery, I felt sadly sure that my thought on her wedding-day had been a true one, and that she was not happy. There is something very different in the sudden, frank grief which would only have been natural to see upon Mrs. Allworthy's face on coming into that sad house, and the stern, set look of habitual unhappiness which I saw there.

There was nothing frank or natural in Mrs. Allworthy's manner, as she came in, held out her hand to me, and then bent to kiss Nelly and the baby Arthur. It was so steady, grave, and composed, so much as if she had been long accustomed to hide her real feelings carefully away under a thick mantle of pride and indifference, that my heart died within me as I looked at her. Could she be really my Miss Charlotte ? She looked taller than ever, and more upright ; her long black dress had a stiff rustle in every fold, which sounded ominous, her face was pale, and every trace of youth and girliness had vanished, leaving only a grave, stern woman in their stead.

If it had been possible for me to be more downhearted than I was at that sorrowful time, Mrs. Allworthy's presence would have made me so. She had a way of roaming restlessly about the house which fidgeted me so that I could have cried out with the annoyance. The frost had given way at last to rain and sleet, which came pitilessly down with very little intervals, for nearly the whole first week of her stay. I can hardly bear, even now, to think of that dreary time. My only comfort was in my baby. Miss Nelly was old enough to break my heart by crying pitifully now and then for her mamma, but little Arthur was nothing but an innocent, joyous baby, full of dimples, and smiles, and cooing laughter, and he could comfort my heart when it was at its sorest with his pretty ways. Whenever there was a lull in the bad weather, Mrs. Allworthy would go out and pace up and down the broad terrace walk which was in sight of the nursery window, and there I used often to watch her, longing to go and ask what ailed her, and yet not daring to do so. At last she spoke herself. It was one wild evening, after I had put the children to bed. She had been up in the nursery watching baby in his bath, and now they were both asleep, and she was standing by the fire, listening seemingly to the rain, which was every now and then blown sharply against the window panes by the fierce gusts of wind.

"Hannah," she said suddenly, "my first little girl was very like Nelly."

"Was she, ma'am?" I said pitifully.

"Very like," she repeated, the hard lines of her face softening as she thought of her little angel-daughter. "She had the same pensive eyes, and serious, sweet smile, though she was only three years old when she died."

"How long ago?" I asked softly, thinking it would do her good to talk of it.

"Three years," was the reply, with a weary sigh, "and Mr. Allworthy thinks that is long enough to forget."

"To forget!" I echoed in astonishment.

"Yes," she said bitterly; "to forget so far as to go out, and look cheerful, and enjoy life when one's heart is broken."

"Oh! Miss Charlotte," I exclaimed, with tears, "not broken! Don't say that. You have children left."

"No daughter. My boys will leave me; and I shall have no daughter to be with me and cling to me when everything else is gone."

"You will have your husband," I said timidly, for I had remarked that she hardly ever mentioned his name, and when she did, she never called him "my husband," only ceremoniously, "Mr. Allworthy." "You will have your husband," I said.

She was silent; but I saw her face change. The features, which had relaxed, and over which the fire-light had cast something of a tenderer glow, took of a sudden a look of harshness and pride. She turned her face a little more towards me, and it looked sharp and hard.

"Yes, Hannah, I have a husband, as you say," she replied slowly, "but he does not understand me. You know nothing about it."

I was shocked at the cold, indifferent tone she used in speaking such words. I could not be silent. Maybe I had been indulged in the happy days that were gone, but I determined to speak out, and to take my chance of her anger.

"Miss Charlotte—I beg your pardon—Mrs. Allworthy," I said, "no man in my opinion would understand his wife loving her children better than her husband."

She looked up at me, and a great flush, the first bit of colour I had seen in her face since she came to the Hall, rose up to the roots of her hair. I was afraid she might forbid me to say anything more, so I went hurriedly on. I felt that some experiences I had so lately passed through myself had added many years to my age, and had given me an insight into a good deal of which a year before I was ignorant; although of that, of course, she knew nothing. I went on however.

"Miss Charlotte, you are not happy." I could not help calling her so, when I was so troubled about her, and loved her so dearly.

"Is it likely I should be?" she said, the flush fading.

"I do not know why you should not be, with so many good things round you, and so many to love you."

"So that is your idea of happiness!" she said scornfully; "good things round me, and many to love me! What if those very things weary me instead of making me happy? What if I long to be rid of them, never to see them again, so that I could have the one thing I have lost?"

"Then, miss," I said, "I think you are just wanting to choose what no one in this world can choose, and finding fault with Providence."

"I find no fault with any one or anything," she said gloomily, sitting down, and letting her hands drop on her lap. "I only want to be let alone, and—if Letitia had lived, and I had died, that would have been about the best thing that could have happened, Hannah."

I could not yet bear that name mentioned. I burst out crying. Miss Charlotte got up and came to me, but she shed no tear herself, and I very soon forced back mine, and dried my eyes.

"Oh, Miss Charlotte!" I said, "how can you speak so? What is the matter? Won't you tell me?"

"Nothing that you can mend, Hannah," she answered.

"Telling one's troubles sometimes mends them," I persisted. "I can't bear to see you so changed from what you used to be. It's not only that you are thin and pale, but the very look on your face is altered."

"I do not look so amiable as I did, Hannah, you mean," she said, with a kind of smile; "I feel that without a glass."

"You have grown to hide what you feel," I went on, "and to pretend you don't care for anything: and oh, my dear, that is a bitter mistake! Don't go on so; it is killing you!"

"Hannah, you are talking of what you do not understand. I have very little feeling of any kind left, I believe; there is no pretence in the matter, and no one else has ever found out what you fancy."

It was no fancy, I knew that; and I felt too that she had a certain pleasure and relief in talking to me, though she was seemingly so bent on keeping me in the dark. I thought I should find out the truth if I went on, so I said—

"Your husband comes to-morrow."

She started up.

"Yes, he does," she said; "but I shall not see him."

"Not see him!" I cried in dismay.

"No; I have made up my mind not to go home again for a time. You are right. It is killing me. Listen, and you shall hear all about it."

She would not sit again, but paced up and down the room, speaking under her breath.

"You know I have lost two children—girls. The first was hardly two years after my marriage, and I thought my heart would break then, but it did not; for my two boys were born, one after the other—noble children, Hannah, but not like my first-born. Well, then another daughter came to bless me as I thought; a fair little blossom with violet eyes, like Nelly's, and a serious, shy face, that enchanted others besides me. She lived for three years. How I loved her! Love is no word for my feeling, it is poor and commonplace. I could not bear her out of my sight. She filled my whole heart, till it overflowed with very rapture. And she died. She caught a cold, and the cold turned to inflammation, and she was torn from me. I was mad, I believe, for a time, or insensible; for I don't remember what I said or did, till one day Mr. Allworthy came to me and asked me to come out with him, and when I refused, he said I ought to make an effort to shake off my sorrow for his sake, and to remember my other children. His sake!" she repeated, with inexpressible scorn in her voice, "what had he ever been to me that I should forget my darling for him? My other children! The words nearly drove me wild. I could hardly bear the sound of their voices. I told my husband to go and enjoy himself without me, and to do what he liked with the boys; for I would never interfere or trouble him, and then he gave way to a storm of anger which only made me despise him. What right had he to be angry? He could not comprehend deep feeling of any kind—I knew that. He had sorrowed for my Agatha, but had soon wearied of sorrowing. But he might have left me in peace, and have made himself happy as he liked." She stopped with a gasp as if for breath, and then went on. "I listened to what he had to say, and made no second remonstrance. I was not rebellious, Hannah; he can never say that of me. I did everything he wished—received guests again, gave parties, and went here and there as usual, and my husband is not yet satisfied. He complains that I do not make his home cheerful to him. Well—how can I, with this gnawing pain at my heart? Now I am once free, Hannah, I cannot—will not go back. I will ask Herbert to let me stay here for a time. Oh, if you knew the relief!"

She stopped her restless walk and sat down, fastening her eyes upon me with a look which seemed to say—

"I am prepared for objections, and expect them, but they will not move me."

This was worse than I feared. She was destroying her own happiness and her husband's, and would blight that of her children if she persisted in her determination. I remember feeling quite overwhelmed at the misery which I saw she was preparing for herself, and at my want of power to save her. I resolved to make one trial, and to appeal to her love for her children.

"What will become of your boys," I asked, "if you do not go home?"

"They will remain where they are, I suppose," she said; "they are too young to go to school. They will come and see me. I am not going to separate myself from my husband, Hannah. I shall do nothing that the world can lay hold of."

"You are sure then," I said, "that your husband will agree to your plan?"

"I don't think he will care much about it. He will be puzzled, and angry at first—"

"And rightly so," I broke in. "Oh, Miss Charlotte, you cannot be in earnest! You do not know what you are doing!"

"Do I not? Well, at any rate, I am in earnest, and nothing you can say or do, Hannah, will move me."

Nothing that I could say. But I had one refuge left; and when she was gone, I prayed for her with many tears.

II.

The next morning I saw nothing of Mrs. Allworthy till twelve o'clock, when I heard the door-bell ring, and knew that her husband had arrived. Presently she came in with a note in her hand.

"Hannah," she said to me, in a cold, careless voice, "I have a headache, and I am going to lie down in my room. I do not wish to be disturbed. Will you give this to Mr. Allworthy?"

One glance at her face told me that I should never move her now. I took the note in silence, and went down-stairs.

Mr. Allworthy was standing in the dining parlour as I entered, and turned quickly round, evidently expecting to see his wife. He was not much altered from what I remembered him on his wedding day. He was always a fine-looking man. Now he was a little stouter and more florid in complexion, but that was all. He certainly did not look troubled in mind, for his expression was placid and cheerful, as unlike his wife's gloomy, restless face as possible. I lost my sympathy with him at that first moment, but I regained it afterwards.

"Mrs. Allworthy bade me give you this letter, sir," I said, holding it out to him.

He took it, looking bewildered, as he turned it over in his fingers without opening it. "Where is Mrs. Allworthy?" he asked of me.

"Up-stairs, lying down, sir," and I made haste and left the room before he could ask any more questions. Very soon after I had returned to the nursery, I heard, as I expected, the dining-room bell ring, and the butler came to bid me go down-stairs. I obeyed with a good deal of unwillingness, for I felt how awkward and unpleasant the interview would be. When I got into the room, and saw Mr. Allworthy's face, I pitied him, but I could understand Miss Charlotte better. There was no anger, only a weak, puzzled look of distress. I would much rather a husband of mine had knocked me down than have looked as he did. Oh, my dears, never you marry any one whom you cannot thoroughly look up to and respect. No woman ever did so yet, who had not bitter cause to rue it in one way or another.

I stood at the door to hear what he had to say.

"Do you know anything about this letter?" he asked, nervously folding and unfolding the paper in his hand.

"I think I do, sir," I answered.

"What does it mean? I think you knew Mrs. Allworthy before she married; I think"—he paused, evidently ignorant of what I knew, and afraid of saying too much.

A sudden resolution came to my mind.

"Mrs. Allworthy has told me, sir, that she wishes to stay here for the present, and that note is, I believe, to tell you so. She is not well now, and is lying down, but she finds the quiet of this house suits her and does her good. She tells me she has been very unwell—indeed I can see that—and she is better already here. A change is sometimes such a great thing, you know, sir, for mind and body, and I haven't a doubt that when she feels equal to going home, you will see a great improvement for the better."

Heaven help me! I had sore doubts as to whether she ever meant to return at all, but I would not suppose such a thing possible. My mind was made up. I would not rest until I had tried to bring husband and wife together with a better understanding between them, and to do this, I must never show that anything like a separation, or even a misunderstanding, had so much as entered into my thoughts or theirs. Mr. Allworthy's brow cleared a little as I spoke.

"She has been poorly," he said, "I know. A change may be the right thing; but where is she? Can't I see her?"

"Not now, I am afraid, sir," I answered boldly. "Mrs. Allworthy had a bad headache this morning, and is very likely asleep. Can I take any message you would like to leave?"

Poor Mr. Allworthy fidgeted and looked disturbed, but presently said half to himself, "Well, I suppose it's best—best leave her alone, and perhaps she'll come round."

"Oh! yes, sir," I said cheerfully; "depend on it, she will. She'll come round in her native air, and be as well as ever she was in a little time, with patience and quiet."

"Well, well, Hannah, I'll write. I've often heard my wife speak of you—you'll take care of her—you'll give her my letter yourself, and not let any one talk. People gossip so, you know; and they might think it odd that I came here and went away without seeing her. Hang it! I think it's odd myself!"

"I'll take care, sir," I said emphatically; "you may trust me."

"That's a good girl, and, on second thoughts, I won't write, I'll send a message. Just say that I'm glad she's better, and that I'll drive over again with the boys soon—and give her my love," and Mr. Allworthy put his hand in his pocket. I drew back instinctively, guessing his purpose, and when he brought out his hand again, and held it out to me, I felt the proud colour come into my face. It was the first time I had been offered money, except as fair wages.

"No, sir," I said, "I never took money in my life for delivering a message."

"Well, well," he said, putting his hand back into his pocket; "no offence. I'm very much obliged to you, very much obliged indeed. I'll just have a bit of dinner, and then go. And, Hannah," he said, as I was leaving the room, "be sure and give her my love, and tell her I'll bring the boys over."

I went away, thinking that if he had not much "gumption," as my Uncle David would have said, yet he had a kind heart, which should have begotten kindness in return.

Well, two days passed, during which Miss Charlotte wrote to her brother for leave to remain some time longer at the Hall, and by the end of the week got an answer, begging her to do just as she liked. Mr. Herbert asked no questions, and expressed no surprise. The loss of his wife had quenched all feeling but grief for the time.

III.

I watched Mrs. Allworthy daily, but could see very little, if any, change in her looks or manner. She was still cold and unobservant, her face always wore the same expression of haughty, clouded indifference, and she seemed to take the same kind of sullen pleasure in pacing up and down the terrace walk in the garden, till she was ready to drop with fatigue. I was surprised at first; for she had talked so much of the relief it was to her to be left to herself, that I had expected it to work some change in her face.

But I soon guessed that she was dreading her husband's visit, and that I might wait in vain for any signs of improvement while that hung over her.

He came one cloudy, chilly afternoon when the sky was stormy, and the earth all moist and vaporous—a day when, for my part, I thought it needed all the warmth and sunshine of kind words and loving voices to make up for the cheerlessness of everything in the outside world. I was at the window when I saw the chaise drive up, and Mrs. Allworthy, who was in the nursery, heard it, as I could tell well enough by the sound of her catching breath. But she sat quite still, as I saw, without turning round to look at her.

"Here is Mr. Allworthy, Miss Charlotte."

"Very well, Hannah."

The voice was so quiet that I did turn round then, and I should have been better pleased to have seen any amount of agitation than that cold, cold face. It told me that her determination was not one whit altered, and that pride had now come to help her to nurse her stubborn grief.

The bell sounded, and I wondered what she would do. To my surprise, she got up out of her chair, put the baby, who had been on her lap, into my arms, and gathering up her heavy, black drapery, went slowly away—down-stairs. I should have been glad, if she had not worn that face—so handsome and so cold; but with that I knew there was no hope. While I sat wondering, doubting and fearing, I heard childish steps and voices on the staircase, and two noble-looking boys of seven and eight years old, came into the room.

"Mamma said we were to come and see you and our cousins," said Charley in a frank, joyous voice. "Oh! what a pretty little girl!" and he stopped short at the sight of Miss Nelly, who, frightened at the entrance of strangers, and now still more abashed at the boy's sudden exclamation, shrank behind my chair, her little fair face all one sudden blaze of colour.

"See! this is your cousin too, sir," I said, showing him the baby in my arms.

"I don't much care for little babies," he said, after one look, and then ran to the window; while Geoffrey gently stroked the little Arthur's head, and looking at me, whispered earnestly, "Is mamma coming back home?"

"I do not know," I said, feeling quite disconcerted under his look. "I'm afraid not."

"Is she not well yet?"

"No, sir."

"Poor mamma!" And the gentle, little, thoughtful face clouded over.

It seemed to me as if that cloud was the beginning of the blight with which their mother was preparing to darken her boys' lives through her own wilfulness. I tried to dispel it by talking to baby, and getting him to look and crow at his cousin, but the young face kept its gravity.

In the mean time his brother was trying to coax Miss Nelly out of her shyness, and had succeeded so far as to beguile her to the window, where she stood, listening with grave eyes, while he talked about the war, and battle, and fighting. Most boys were all agog to be soldiers then, and I could see that the constant talk about the war which he must have heard had filled his mind and fired his spirit. In the middle his father's voice was heard calling, "Charley! Geoff!" He gave Nelly a hearty kiss, and was off in an instant, while little Geoffrey stopped a moment to say good-bye to me, and then followed his brother.

I waited for what would follow. I heard the chaise drive off, and then Mrs. Allworthy come up-stairs; but she did not stop at my door, but turned off to her own room and remained there till tea-time. After tea she came into the nursery, and I could see in a moment that she had thrown off a great weight, and with it a good deal of her gloomy reserve. She played with the children, and would hardly be induced to let Nelly off her lap when it was bed-time. She asked me about her boys—what I thought of them—and talked of them and their boyish ways more freely than she had ever done to me before. When she said “good night,” and left me, I sat down to my needle-work with dismay at my heart. It seemed so cruel for her to be happy when she had, as it were, driven her husband and children away from her—so heartless!

There seemed so little hope for the future. The task I had set myself looked hopeless and wild. Nevertheless, I looked it steadily in the face, and tried to think what was best to be done; and I could see nothing for it but time. Perhaps when she was perfectly free to be as sad as she liked, she would cease to want to be so; and if all opposition was at an end, she would not care so much for indulging her own will. She might get tired of being let alone, and go home with a prayer for pardon on her lips of her own accord. You see I was building upon the natural contrariness of human nature, half unconsciously, and quite naturally. I was right so far, but I did not know how strong a thing pride is, nor how tightly it can hold its victims, hardly letting them go even when they are crushed and heart-broken in the struggle with their tormentor.

Well, weeks passed, and Mr. Herbert was still away. The first soreness of my grief for my dear, dear mistress was healing, but there were moments when the sense of our loss—of my double loss overwhelmed me, and I felt lonely and desolate beyond expression, as if my life were ended, and I could never know real joy or grief any more in this world. When these moods overcame me, I used to try and turn my mind to some other subject; the children, and what their future lives might be, or Mrs. Allworthy—more often the latter.

IV.

Six weeks had passed since that last visit from her husband. She had not seen him nor her children again, and although the change for the better had not passed away, and she had grown gradually more cheerful and natural, yet I thought I could see that she was not so satisfied. She still took those restless walks on the terrace, communing, I fancied, with her heart, and perhaps striving faintly with the pride that was making her miserable. I used to watch her as she came up to the eastern end of the terrace, which was just underneath my window, and then, turning round with a quick, decided movement, walk steadily along to the western end, and then turn again. Her head was bent down, seldom raised for so much as a minute to look at the turf, the trees, or the sky; but there was no faltering purpose or weakening spirit in those vigorous unswerving footsteps, though the very habit betrayed uneasiness of mind, and a spirit not at peace with itself; and at the end of an hour or so she would come wearily in through the glass door, looking utterly spent and pale. Her mind was stronger than her body—always.

In all this time she never alluded to our one talk about her circumstances, and, of course, I never mentioned it. I think she would have liked me to do so, and that she was impatient at my silence, but I held my tongue and waited.

One day—it was late in February, and the weather was still damp and gloomy—I was pacing about the gallery outside the nursery-door with baby in my arms, for the children had colds, and I had kept them indoors, when I thought I heard sounds in Mrs. Allworthy's bedchamber, which was at one end of the gallery, and, pausing outside the door, I distinctly made out the sound of a sob and suppressed weeping. That evening she came to me, as she often did, when the children were asleep, and I was at work in the outer nursery, and sat down by the fire.

“Don't you want to know, Hannah,” she said abruptly, “what my husband said to me when he was here last?”

I don't know how it was; she had plenty of reserve and pride with most people, plenty very often with me, and yet sometimes she would cast it entirely on one side, which was what encouraged me to do what I could to help her.

“Yes, Miss Charlotte, I do wish it, though I should never make bold to ask,” I said.

“Well, you shall hear without asking. At first he seemed to take it for granted that I was going back with him, which I was quite determined not to do.”

“Ah!” I said quickly, “he supposed you were better already, but I told him I thought it would take longer to do any real good.”

You see I had taken my line of action, and was resolved to keep to it. She looked at me a little doubtfully, and went on speaking.

"He was astonished when I let him know that I was not going to do as he supposed, and then he began to be angry, and asked me where I was going to live, and I told him that Herbert had said I might stay here as long as I pleased; that I was happy here, and that I desired nothing better."

"Gentlemen are so impatient, Miss Charlotte," I said; "it's the way with them. They don't consider that ladies are not so strong as themselves, and want more time to recover from an illness or a shock of any kind. It's thoughtless of them," I said, with simulated indignation. "I couldn't myself approve of your going home just yet—say for a fortnight—that would do great things, please God." She looked at me again, not doubtfully this time, but with rising pride and anger, but I worked on steadily.

"I fixed no time," she said. "I told him that I wanted to be let alone, but he would not understand; he never did," she said bitterly; "he began to argue. I sent the boys away and listened. If he had shown the least comprehension of what I have suffered, I think I would have gone with him, but he did not. He spoke as if he were the sufferer, and I—well, almost as if I were a criminal. I think that has hardened my heart."

"No, not a criminal, Miss Charlotte!" I cried looking up at her, full into her eyes this time, as she stopped speaking. "Not a criminal; you mistook him. Only weak and nervous still, and not quite fit to go home to your duties—to your husband and children. Stay another fortnight, Miss Charlotte, and then go home. Would you like me to write to Mr. Allworthy?"

"No, no; why does he not come and see for himself, or send the boys as he promised?"

"Perhaps he has been expecting you," I said, feeling sure from this question that she could not be so indifferent as she appeared, and that her heart was yearning at least to her children.

"Let me write," I repeated. "I will say that you will come in a fortnight's time, but that you are not equal to coming before."

"Why are you so anxious I should go, Hannah?" she said suddenly.

"Because I think you must be wanted," I said gravely. "Your husband and your boys must both want you. Little Master Geoffrey asked me if you were coming, and looked very grave when I said 'No.'"

I could see that her countenance changed when I mentioned the boys, and her hands which lay on her lap trembled a little, and moved nervously.

"It is a long time not to see them," she murmured.

"Yes," I said, "and a long time for them not to see you. Then I will write and say they may expect you this day fortnight."

"You are very pertinacious, Hannah, and a little forward. You always were as a girl. You must do as you like," and she got up slowly and went into the inner room and stooped over Nelly's little bed. Her face was flushed, and she said nothing to me as she passed out of the room, in answer to my good night. But I did not mind. Poor thing! she had had a struggle to give in to me, and I could well forgive any irritation of feeling against me in consequence. I sat down and wrote my letter before I went to bed, and posted it early the next morning, before she could change her mind. It was four days after that letter was posted that I was seated in the nursery as usual. It was now nearly the end of March, but the long stern winter was not yet at an end. It had snowed in the night, and the ground and trees were half hidden in their white mantle, and the air was cold and piercing. It was much too cold for my children to go out, and I was holding baby up to the window to amuse him, when I heard horses' hoofs coming fast up the road which led to the house, and soon there came in sight a horseman, riding at full speed. As he came nearer I could see that he was splashed from head to foot, and had evidently ridden far and furiously.

I knew directly I saw him that something had happened. It was but a short, short time since I had been startled by similar sounds and a like sight. No tidings could be what those were to me, but they might be worse to others. The very certainty made me calm. I gave the baby to the nursemaid and went down-stairs to meet and stop the messenger before Mrs. Allworthy should be alarmed. I went out at the front door, and as he came near I held up my hands to stop him. I remember how the sun, which had been shining palely a minute before, was suddenly darkened by a cloud, and what a chill came over my whole frame as the man stopped his jaded horse, and held out a letter.

"For Mrs. Allworthy," he said, and that was all.

I motioned to him to go into the stable-yard, for my teeth chattered too much to let me speak, and I went back into the house with the letter under my apron. There was no occasion for me to trouble myself about the way in which I could give it to her, for when I got into the hall she was there. She had been startled too, I suppose, by the unusual sounds, and had come out of the breakfast parlour. When she saw me she held out her hand, and I put the letter into

it. What use was there in keeping it from her for ever so short a time? She knew and I knew that it contained bad tidings of some sort. We neither of us spoke, but I followed her into the room she had just left, and stood near her as she opened the paper. It contained only a few lines. She read them, and then sat suddenly down, and I knew that a mist had come over her eyes, by the groping way in which she held it out to me. I read it quickly. Master Charles had had an accident—was insensible, and Mr. Allworthy wished his mother to come immediately.

I rang the bell to order the carriage and post-horses, before I looked at Mrs. Allworthy. When I did so, I saw that she sat quite still, her hand pressed over her heart, and her eyes looking before her, at nothing. When I spoke to her she turned them on me with a look of only half understanding. "I was going, Hannah, was I not?" she said piteously.

"Yes, dear Miss Charlotte, you were," I cried, "but you must come up-stairs with me now, and get ready to go immediately. Mr. Allworthy said immediately. The carriage will be here in less than an hour."

She repeated the word "immédiately" with a shudder, and got up, but staggered when she tried to walk, so that I was obliged to support her with my arm, and lead her upstairs. I put up a few things for her, put on her bonnet and fur cloak, and then went for some wine. The housekeeper brought it, dressed for a journey, and whispered to me that she was going with Miss Charlotte, which relieved my mind, for the poor thing was not fit to go that long drive alone. She drank the wine, and then sat still as before—waiting. In a shorter time than I had supposed possible, the carriage came to the door, and everything was ready. She got up, and went down-stairs, this time without support. I helped her into the carriage, the door was shut, and she was gone. The husband and wife would be together again shortly, but this was a way I had never thought of!

Well, you may suppose how anxiously I waited for the housekeeper's return, and when she came she brought the sad news that Master Charlie had only lived a few hours after Mrs. Allworthy's arrival. He had fallen from a tree he was climbing, and died from the hurt to his head. He never recovered consciousness—never spoke, nor knew his poor mother. She was bitterly, terribly punished!

I heard from time to time of long fits of depression and silence, which made me fear for her reason, while I hoped and prayed that she was being gradually led, through a fiery furnace, as it were, to see the mistake of her life in its true light, and to humble herself into resignation. Poor thing! She did not learn it then, nor for years afterwards.

v.

It was summer before Mr. Herbert came home; bright, warm weather, bringing with it something like a return of cheerfulness to our weary hearts. His sister, Miss Ann, came with him, bringing Master Geoffrey. My poor master! He sent for me to bring the children to him, but he could not speak. He could hardly bear the sight of them, I could see, and yet he would not let me take them away, but sat with Miss Nelly on his knee, softly stroking her hair, and looking as if years had passed over his head since his wife's death. And it was true that in suffering he was years older. Nothing ages like sorrow, and though my master was a Christian and bore his sorrow as a Christian should, it turned his hair white, and drew lines on his face which deepened and strengthened as time went on, and made him a melancholy and stern-looking man to the end of his days.

Mrs. Allworthy I learned had given herself up to her own sorrow, and had been so neglectful of her husband, and so sullenly forgetful that he too had lost a son, that at last his easy temper had been provoked, and he had spoken hasty words which had been bitterly and resentfully remembered against him. It was a state of things that could not last, and Mr. Allworthy had not resisted his wife's proposal that she should leave him. He was generous to her even in his anger, and provided a house for her at some distance, and a liberal allowance. With regard to his son, he was firm. The boy might visit his mother, but he must live at home, as inheritor of his father's property. Many a woman is proud enough till a child stands in the way, and then she generally humbles herself without much difficulty. But Mrs. Allworthy did not. She had hardened her heart against her husband, and that seemed to have perverted her whole nature. Miss Ann said that she asked nothing and complained of nothing; accepted what Mr. Allworthy offered, and shed no tear when she kissed little Geoffrey and wished him good-bye. Miss Ann begged for the boy, whose little heart had been half-broken by his brother's death. She asked to have him with her for a time, and his father consented, and to avoid the gossip of his neighbours, and the despondency which was creeping over him, and which was so foreign to his nature, he shut up his house and went to a small property he possessed in another part of the country. And so it was that Miss Ann brought her nephew to her own house, and he was daily at the Hall.

The little boy was very sad for a long time, very grave and silent, and Miss Nelly would try in her sweet way to comfort him. Often, as I have watched the two children seated together on the lawn, I have thought that he was the more orphaned of the two.

vi.

Our lives crept on very quietly for a long time after this. Miss Ann still lived on in the Manor as it was called, and to me there was always something very resting and soothing in the sight of her gentle, good face, and in the very feeling of her presence in the house, for of course she was often at the Hall. I think Mr. Herbert felt it so too. She had always been his favourite sister, and he was often loth to let her go home even when she had been at the Hall the whole day, and I had orders to keep a bed-chamber ready in case she ever wished to sleep, which she did on two or three occasions of childish ailments in Miss Nelly. It was from her that I learnt about Mrs. Allworthy from time to time. First, that she was living very quietly at the house her husband had given her. Then of a visit Miss Ann had paid her with little Master Geoffrey, and how she had cried so bitterly, and owned herself wrong, but had passionately refused to say as much to her husband, or to allow Ann to do so. Later still, I went down myself, taking Miss Nelly, who had had the measles, for a change. I was shocked to see the alteration that her own wilfulness had wrought in her, and to find also that her health was in a very precarious state, and that she refused to see a doctor, or to hold counsel with any one. She was fairly in a way to kill herself, and when I found that she did not sleep, and yet took constant, wearying exercise, and eat scarcely anything, I could hold my tongue no longer, and fairly told her that she was acting wickedly both to herself, her husband, and child.

"Not to my child," she said, "nor to him! He is better without me; better never to have known his mother!" And she cried till I thought her heart would burst, and I had to beg and pray that she would quiet herself for the sake of her health.

We stayed there three weeks, and Miss Nelly, who was now eleven years old, and Master Geoffrey, used to pass most of their days in wandering about together over the great commons with which the place was surrounded. Master Geoffrey went to school now, and was still a grave, silent boy—clever beyond his years as I was told, and as full of thought and tenderness as a girl. I always believed that he understood his parents' unhappy position, and thought about it and brooded over it, at an age when most boys would have known little, and cared less about any such matter. After circumstances showed that I was right, and that his mother's fault had already cast a shadow over his young life. But I am only going to tell you of her now. I thought I was sure that she pined secretly for the power of going home, and I wrote to Miss Ann to tell her so, and I mentioned the delicate state of her sister's health, which indeed gave me a great deal of uneasiness. She had a cough which seemed fixed, and she had grown to look thin and flushed, and her hands were deadly white like a person in a fever, and she was weak and listless, quite unlike her family, who had always been full of life and eagerness and activity. I was more uneasy than I chose to confess even to myself. I did not get any answer to my letter for some time, and while I waited for it I could not keep myself from planning for Miss Charlotte to go back to her husband. Sometimes I thought I would write to him and tell him how ill and wretched she was; sometimes that I would start off myself and see him, and explain how matters stood; and oftener I pleased myself with the idea of going with her to her home where Mr. Allworthy now was, of her unexpected arrival, and of the reconciliation which would take place between the husband and wife, separated for five years. The idea grew and grew, and I thought of it, dreamed of it, and prayed about it, till it became more than an idea—a fixed plan which I was resolved, God helping me, to carry out.

I thought Miss Charlotte's pride was nearly worn out of her by this time, or I should never have dared to make the bold stroke I did. But it was more than I could bear to see her pining away her life all for the want of one miserable word which I might speak.

It was late in July; still, brilliant weather, when Master Geoffrey had to go back to school. Children of his age—he was but twelve—should never have found out that their parents can do wrong, but he had. When he kissed his mother, I saw him lift his eyes for a moment, with a puzzled, questioning look to her face, and when he got no answer to his look, only a long embrace which almost broke into a sob, and then an instant return to the old, quiet self-restraint, which was so infinitely more pitiful than the most violent tears could have been, his own face took again the expression of sweet patience, which was growing to be settled there. After he went, I began to act up to my resolution. I never could bear to be quiet when I had once made up my mind.

I went to Miss Charlotte and told her that she was very poorly. I knew it, however she might choose to deny the fact, and that she must have change. Would she come with me? She began to tremble as I asked her the question, for she was no longer strong enough to hide all she felt as completely as she used to do. She looked up at me as if she were going to ask a question, and then dropped her eyes again suddenly, and said nothing. I went on enlarging upon the fineness and warmth of the weather, so suited for travelling, and how I would leave Miss Nelly under the care of Miss Charlotte's own maid, if she would let me be her travelling companion. I never spoke a word of where I wanted to take her, and she never asked me; but she knew, and I felt that she knew, though we neither of us wished to acknowledge it to the other. After that I never said anything more about the journey, but prepared for it, silently and quickly. I think it was strange now, that as I did so no misgivings of any kind entered into my thoughts, no fears of how Mr. Allworthy might receive his wife, nor any doubts about the wisdom of the course I was taking. Miss Charlotte's maid was very fond of Miss Nelly, and readily undertook the charge of her, gladly giving up to me any preparation of her mistress's things that might be necessary. There was but little to be done, for Miss Charlotte had cared nothing about her dress or appearance these desolate years, and had never left off the deep mourning she wore for her lost daughter. This had been one subject of dispute between her and her husband. A year after my dear mistress's death, he had asked her to put away the heavy black dresses she had worn for so long, and she had refused. Now I wanted her return to be as perfect a signal for reconciliation as was possible, so I wrote to London for some pale grey silk, not light enough to shock her feelings by too sudden a change, yet sufficiently so to show that she was no longer in mourning; and when it came I sat and worked at it with great satisfaction, and as its shining folds lay on my lap I pleased myself with thinking that it was something more than a silk gown I was taking such pleasure in, and that it would be a token of submission—a bond of union between the husband and wife.

Well, the day came when all was ready, and I told her in the evening that if she liked we would start the next day. I knew that she had been expecting and waiting for this summons, and a look of relief passed over her face as I spoke. Still she said very little—only a few vague words about the weather and the time for starting, and then put her arms suddenly round Miss Nelly, and kissed her passionately till the gentle child looked at me half frightened. Poor Miss Charlotte! She had such a deep hunger for affection, and yet she had cast away all that God had given her.

The next morning I brought the delicate, bright dress I had such pride in into Miss Charlotte's room, with some fear and trembling, and as I laid it on a chair where the sun caught its lustre, I saw her cheeks redden for a moment, and her eyes light up with anger and glance at me; but the look and the colour both faded away as suddenly as they had come, and she let me put on the dress without a word.

We set out that day, and it was not till after some hours that I found out how very weak Mrs. Allworthy really was. She was quite exhausted by noon, and we were obliged to stop and sleep at the town where we had only intended dining. A dreadful thought came into my mind—that I was only taking her home to die. But she seemed very much revived by her night's rest, and I went on with a lighter heart. As we drew near the country round Allworthy Court a faint colour came into her face, and she sat upright and looked from the carriage window with something like eagerness. If you had ever known what it was to watch a face for long which had no expression in it, or rather a mask of indifference, which you know perfectly to be a mask all the time, you would understand the relief this change was to me.

"Miss Charlotte," I said, as we drove into a village, "we can stop here. It looks pretty and quiet, and the air feels sweet and soft. I am sure I could make you comfortable."

"No, no," she replied, eagerly and feverishly; "let us go on. I can't stop—you don't mean that I should;" and she looked at me with eyes which had an imploring prayer in them.

I said nothing more, but we went on silently. It was four o'clock in the afternoon as we drove into Allworthy Village. We had still a mile to go before we got to the Court, which lay back from the road, up a lane planted on each side with firs and cedars.

The sun was a little less powerful than it had been during the day, but still the shade from the noble old trees, as we turned off from the glaring highroad, was very grateful. I remember it now. There was a high wall on one side of this lane, and over the wall the fir-trees stretched their great red arms straight across the road, the sunlight catching them now and then, and making them gleam like gold. Then came cedars, such as I have never seen before or since—grand, stately, and foreign-looking. And so we drove on; the sunshine gleaming between the boughs and falling on the road in bright patches, the birds singing, and Miss Charlotte sitting straight up, looking out of the window, her colour rising higher and higher. At length we stopped at the gate, and drove up to the house.

We stopped at the door. The bell was rung and sounded loud and portentous, I thought, through the house. I was nervous now, and when a large house-dog darted out the full length of his chain, and barked furiously at the sound, I started violently. The man-servant who opened the door was evidently a stranger, and in answer to my question, said that his master was out walking, but would be in shortly. He stared in surprise when we got out, and began to superintend the taking out of the luggage, but civilly asked our names. The question rather puzzled me, but Miss Charlotte answered for me in a clear, decided voice, "Mrs. Allworthy;" and the man's face brightened into comprehension directly, as I could see by the curious glances he cast at her from under his eyes, as he ushered us into a cool, dark room which I took to be the library. When we were left alone I ventured to look at Miss Charlotte. To tell the truth, I began to be afraid that now she might be angry with me for my bold venture; for you must recollect that I had never yet said a word about bringing her home, and she might have taxed me with inveigling her there under false pretences. A year or two before she would have done so; and when I looked at her, I could hardly feel glad at the change, though I knew it was really for the better. Her sunken colour had all gone, and her cheeks looked so like death in their pallor, that I went to her in alarm. She recovered herself a little when she saw my fright, and said faintly—

"Hannah, I don't think I can bear to see him yet. Supposing he should not—he might be as altered in feelings as I am in person."

"Miss Charlotte, don't think so!" I cried, "don't have such a thought! He will be too glad and happy; I would answer for it with my life! And you, now you are once more here, where you ought to be, you will be as happy as he."

"MISS CHARLOTTE'S PRIDE"

She shook her head and answered—

"I have been very wicked, and I will try and do my duty now; but there is not much happiness left me in this world, Hannah."

I shuddered at the ominous words, and felt them in my heart to be true, though I tried vehemently to disbelieve them. I wanted to remove Miss Charlotte's bonnet and cloak, and make her more comfortable, but she would not let me, and sat in the same position, till voices sounded outside, and the door opened to admit Mr. Allworthy.

He came into the room, and walked straight up to his wife. He was altered, and for the worse. In those days hard drinking was not thought the sin it is now, and Mr. Allworthy, I was sure, had got into the habit of taking more than was good for him. I saw it in his face. He walked up to his wife with a smile, but not a pleasant one, as his smiles used to be. He looked down at her as she sat drooping in the chair I had placed for her, and spoke cruel words.

"So you think you may come and go as you like here, Mrs. Allworthy. You are mistaken."

Miss Charlotte gave a start, and looked up at him.

"You are mistaken," he repeated, in a louder tone; "mistaken! Do you understand?"

Her pride had all deserted her, indeed, for instead of getting up on the instant to go, as I expected, she only said in a sort of murmur:

"Oh, George, George, forgive me! I shan't trouble you long."

Mr. Allworthy looked awkward and uneasy at this appeal, and turned to me.

"Have you aided and abetted my wife in this fine scheme of coming to work on my feelings, now that she has got tired of her solitude and wants a change?"

"Yes, sir," I replied. "I saw that she was pining her life out to come back, and could not bring herself to say the word, and I brought her home. I thought you would surely welcome her; but since you do not, I can but take her away again, and then it will be true that she won't trouble you long."

I spoke bitterly, for though I see now that Mr. Allworthy's anger was only natural, I then thought only of her—of the struggle it had been for her to take the step, of the humility of her present conduct, of her failing health and wounded heart. As I thought this, I looked at her husband and forgot that he had been deeply injured, and that his easy nature had been tried too long to forgive readily now. A deeper colour came into his ruddy cheeks as I spoke.

"She has troubled me with very little of her company for some time past," he said.

I had drawn a little aside from Miss Charlotte's chair as I spoke, and now I turned round at a slight movement, a long sigh from her, and saw that she was fainting. The deadly struggle of feeling that must have been going on within her—shame, disappointment, yearning regret, and remorse, each of these singly was enough to overcome her weak frame, and together they rent her with an agony which was like death. When Mr. Allworthy saw her unconscious, wasted face, so different from the proud, handsome one he had seen last, he seemed moved, and went to her to raise her. But I prevented him. She had sinned grievously, but he might have been more pitiful.

"I will take her to the carriage, sir," I said. "The sooner she gets back to die, the better."

"Nonsense, nonsense, my good woman!" said Mr. Allworthy uneasily. "Who talks of dying? I'm not going to send her off in this state. I'm not a brute. Ring for the housekeeper to take her up-stairs. Bless my soul! she is altered a good deal, poor thing!"

I did as I was bid, and we carried her away, still insensible, and laid her on a bed, where she woke to consciousness with a violent fit of coughing, which left her too exhausted to speak. I watched the night by her; and this was how the repentant wife returned to her home. There was no question of her leaving again; she was too ill for that; and her husband always treated her kindly; but what are such words, after all, for a husband and wife? I could not stay on account of my children, whom I could no longer leave; but Miss Ann went down, and from her I learnt all that happened, and the end. How Miss Charlotte languished gradually, and how her husband used to visit her sick-room daily, and spend the rest of his time with his companions, some of whom were not such as Miss Ann could associate with.

I should hardly have told you such a tale as this if it had not been for a warning. Never marry a man for anything but true love and honour, and never let rebellious pride take possession of your hearts and harden you. These two things together eat into Miss Charlotte's heart, poisoned her life, saddened that of her only child, harmed her husband, body and soul, and brought her at length to an early grave.

A GHOST STORY.

HE had sat for two hours in the snug, brown coffee-room of the Four Swans, Norham, and had ordered nothing, not even a bedroom or a cup of coffee. All in vain had the honest old waiter bustled in and out stirring the fire, and flicking crumbs from the table. He had only brought himself to the conclusion that this strange guest was "a queer sort," especially for a Christmas Eve.

In fact, they of the Four Swans were not much used to strangers of any sort. They had a quiet, steady-going connection in Norham itself. Three or four trade clubs held their meetings there, and the six or seven bedrooms of the establishment were kept in just the state of order and comfort which suited the individuality of the six or seven "commercial gentlemen" who, when on Norham business, had patronised the Four Swans for the last twenty or thirty years. If ever a stranger appeared, it was generally with some such introduction as this: "Landlord, Mr. Dash, of Blank, told me you would give me good quarters for a day, or for a week," as the case might be. Indeed, the Four Swans, had, as it were, hidden itself from all chance-comers, for it was situated in a quiet corner of a very quiet street, down which nobody would think of turning unless he knew something of it beforehand; and altogether, with its interior of brown panelling, its wealth of quaint and grotesque ornaments, its red-tiled verandah, and its communicative confidential old servants, the Four Swans was an excellent type of those honest, homely hostels which are fast being "improved" from the face of the earth.

The gentleman in the coffee-room did not notice that he had done an odd thing by coming in without a word, and remaining without an order. Perhaps he had other things to think about. He was a tall, middle-aged man, with a good deal of hair upon his face; and, though he was unmistakably well-dressed, he had that indefinite air which most men carry who at any period of their lives have "knocked about" in ships and colonies, in canvas suits and corduroys.

He had come in about five o'clock, and six o'clock struck, and seven, and it was within two minutes of eight, when an old Norham townsman came in to look over the papers. To the intense satisfaction of the waiter, that effectually roused the stranger. But so slowly—like the awakening from a long, enchanted sleep. And so it had been, an enchanted sleep haunted by a dream of five-and-twenty years ago.

"I want to stay here for the night, waiter," he said abruptly. "Any comfortable sort of bedroom will suit me. And bring me some tea and toast."

The waiter was alert. "There's a little private room off here, sir," he said, throwing open a door. "I'll set your tray there, it's more retired like than this."

The gentleman followed as invited. It was a square closet, with two or three stuffed chairs, a polished round table, and a dull oil painting over the mantel. That was all that would strike any strange eye. But the gentleman walked straight to a panel beside the fireplace, and peered at it. Under the slow discoloration and many washings of a long time, there was still visible a slight dashing pen-and-ink sketch of an old man, with a long nose and goggle spectacles.

"Dear me, sir, you've got quick eyes to find that out directly," said the chatty old waiter. "Clever, isn't it? A young daredevil he was that did it, and that was a portrait of the London detective that had come down to take him off to prison. His last meal in Norham he ate in this here room, sir, and a rare lot of ham and eggs he did get through, sir, and never minded a bit that the policemen was a-watching of him."

The gentleman said not one word.

"He's queerer than ever," confided the waiter to the old cook, as he received the tea and toast from her hands. "I began to tell him about young Rogerson, but he did not listen a bit, did not even ask if he was hanged or anything. It's like taking a meal to a ghost, that it is."

"You might do better than poke up old stories about as bad a young scamp as ever lived to disgrace a honest family," retorted the old cook, who was sharp in her temper; "and as to ghosts, there's plenty o' ghosts everywhere, for them as has sense to see 'em, Peter, but I don't think you need be afear'd."

Meanwhile another Norham tradesman had dropped into the coffee-room, and Peter, in the intervals of his attendance, came out and chatted with them in a cheerful equality, wherein the sole line of social distinction lay in his remaining standing while they were seated.

"Real Christmas weather this," said Mr. Johnston.

"But Norham's very dull," answered Mr. Lee.

"They're a dead-and-alive set of people, now, the Norhamites," said Mr. Johnston, who was one himself, and would allow nobody else to abuse them. "It used to be different in my young days. I remember it quite gay, what with the oxen roasting to be given in charity, and the puddings boiling for the same, and everybody that was anyways connected with the Church—and everybody seemed to be in those days—invited to tea in the Town-hall. And usedn't there to be fine carol-singing through the streets. And rare Christmas sermons he used to preach, the old rector that was, in my young days."

"Ah, that was Mr. Rogerson," put in Peter, directing his thumb toward the open door. "I've just been showing that gent that bit of an old sketch up agen the wall. He broke the good old gentleman's heart, that young scamp did."

"Ah, yes, and did a deal of harm to Norham every way," pursued Mr. Johnston, "we've never had a lively Christmas since; I remember the first after his going off. What could people do when they knew there was nothing but misery in the rectory house? The town just kept as quiet as ever it could, and it couldn't do less every Christmas after, during the old rector's days. And so it got out of the good old ways."

"Poor young Rogerson," said old Mr. Lee. "I used to think there was something good in the young fellow, for all his wildness, and I always hoped he'd right himself, till he went and did that wickedness that set man against him as well as God."

"I don't know about good or not," persisted Mr. Johnston, "but I know that it took years and years before his sister Mary looked up again. Only at last, as time began to thicken over the tender spots o' grief and shame, she took kind of heart. Says she once to my dear wife that's dead, 'Mrs. Johnston, our poor Dick was the child of many prayers, and I've faith God will keep hold of him.' And then she took fancies that he was dead. And I noticed she was happier-like after that—just as one breathes freer in a house after the dearest corpse is buried. As for poor Tom Rogerson, his brother ruined him for this life, anyway. Maybe, he needn't, but poor Mr. Tom was awful proud and sensitive. Miss Mary, she told my wife that her brother Tom said he'd never ask people to trust him, because he couldn't expect they would, after his brother's ways, and he wouldn't lay himself open to be half-trusted, and watched, and suspected all the time. And so, he that was so clever, stayed a poor under-clerk all the rest of his days, and has left his poor widow just to struggle on and get what places she can for her boys. Such a pretty dainty miss as she used to be, and now she's wearing an old rusty silk that's been turned and turned till she's forgotten which is its real right side. 'I should think what their uncle did won't go against my sons, Mr. Johnston,' she said only the other day. 'Bless you, Mrs. Tom,' says I, 'half the town-people are new since then.' 'I'm always so afraid he'll come back,' says she; 'I'm sure I don't wish him not to repent,' says she, 'I always hoped he would—but I can't help thinking of my own, and for their sakes, I'd rather he never come back.' 'The more penitent he is, the more he'll stay away, ma'am,' says I; 'it isn't as if the whole story was above-ground still, and he'd only got to be forgiven and all would go well, but there's some that's dead that died in wrath and bitterness with others for his sake. Look at poor old Mrs. Rogerson,—how she turned against Mr. Tom, good, dutiful son as he was, because he wouldn't stay by Mr. Dick through thick and thin, and defend him as if he were innocent. Poor dear old lady, she knows better where she's been this many a day; but Mr. Dick had better wait to ask your forgiveness till he can ask hers too. You forgive him, ma'am,' says I, 'and that's enough for you, but I maintain that he'd have no right to come disturbing your mind to ease his own.'"

"There was one that would have been glad to see him, had he returned in ever such shame and misery," said kindly old Mr. Lee.

"Ay, ay," chimed Peter; "I know who you mean. You know she was on the charity school committee, and when the 'lection board met here, she always just stepped in yonder and took a look at that rum picture on the wall. She never thought I saw her. She never thought nobody was looking at her. My old woman says she always walked regular among them green avenues by the old abbey, where she used to walk with Mr. Dick when he was courting of her. Maybe, she thought he'd be sure to go there if ever he'd comed back."

At that instant the stranger came suddenly out of the brown closet, crossed the coffee-room, left the house, and walked up the street towards the main quarter of the town.

Quaint old Norham! The winter moonlight lay clear and cold on its ancient cathedral, standing in its spacious square of sombre, stately houses. The stranger stood still and gazed upon it.

That stranger knew a little boy who had attended many a service in that cathedral—awed by its sweet music, wondering at its white-robed choristers. That little boy had known every face on the quaint gargoyles of the ancient chapter-house, and with child-like familiarity he had given a name to each one of those contorted countenances. That little boy, muffled in black weepers, had stood beside an open grave right under the great west window, and listened to the funeral service over a little sister. The stranger went to seek that little grave—went straight to it without one mistaken step. But it is not a little grave any more, for under the name of "Amy Rogerson, aged four," is written, "Also the Rev. Richard Rogerson, father of the above, aged seventy. Also his wife Amelia, aged sixty-nine. Also their son Thomas, aged forty-eight."

Oh, little sister, who went so long before, how much did you know of earth while you were growing up in heaven? Was not your father very glad on the day when he entered rest and joined the folded lamb of happier times? Oh, little sister, is there any look on the face of an angel, whose human heart was broken?

The stranger stood still by that household tomb, and looked around. There was another grave which that little boy had known—the family grave of that little boy's playfellows, the Herons. But the stranger knew that he could not find that grave in the twilight, though he could have found the way to their house in the utter darkness!

He crossed the Cathedral Square, and issued out on Norham High Street. The shops were very bright with Christmas goods, and busy with Christmas trade.

There was a little, thin, sharp-looking widow, with a boy on one side and a girl on the other, gazing intently into the best draper's shop. The stranger stood still when he first saw them, and then he went up softly and stood behind them.

"It's no good wasting our time, Margey," said the mother, "for we can't afford to buy anything."

"But looking doesn't spend, mamma," pleaded Margey, "and I'd like to plan what I'd give you if I could, mamma, and to choose what I should like you to give me. There, you should have that beautiful thick black silk, and it should be made with one deep flounce like the mayor's wife's, and you should have that soft grey shawl to wear with it. And I would have two of those merinos—a dark brown for everyday, and an olive green for Sundays, and one of those neat, plain black-cloth jackets. And there's Tom gone off to look at the watches. Tom is going to save sixpence a week to buy one, mamma; but won't it take a long time?"

"Ah, I wish I could give you children pleasant surprises," said mamma wistfully. "I was so fond of that kind of tricks once upon a time."

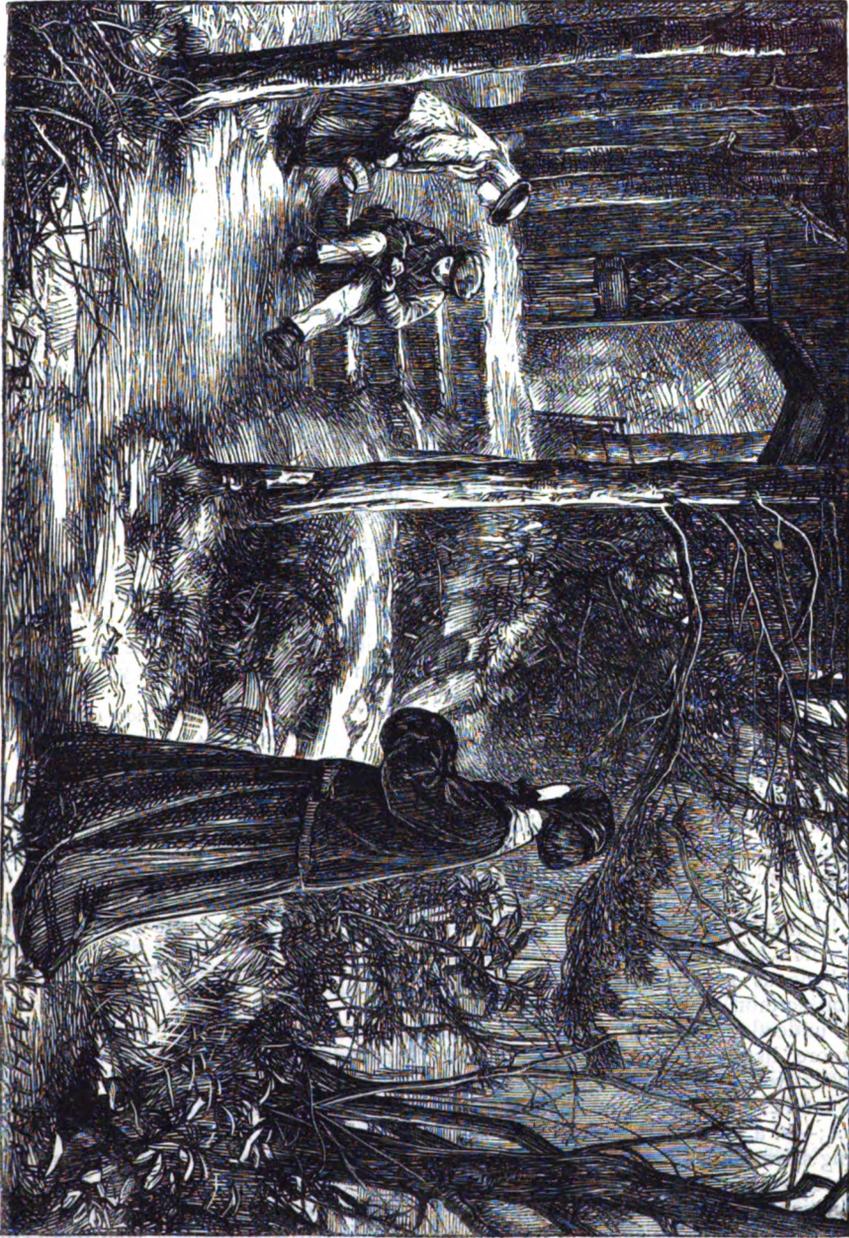

"And so you are still, mammy dear," Margey replied, pressing fondly to her. "Isn't it always a pleasant surprise when you make us a fig-pudding? I'm sure we are very happy, and I won't talk any more of my nonsense if it worries you."

Then the little group passed on; and the tall stranger followed them out of the glare of the gaslight into a small by-way, where they entered a house with "Mrs. T. Rogerson's day-school for young ladies," written on the door. Then he went back to the High Street, and that same night a large parcel from the drapers came "for Mrs. Rogerson and Miss Margery," and a little packet from the jeweller's, for "Master Tom Rogerson."

"Everything we wanted," sighed Margery happily. "I only hope they are real. How could they have come? The shop-people say they were ordered by a tall dark gentleman, very pale. I wish mamma would let us believe in ghosts, and then we could understand it easily, for that description is like dear papa. But I never did hear of any ghost that had money. I wonder what Aunt Mary will say when she comes to-morrow!"

The stranger went back to the Four Swans. Next morning he went to the cathedral, and stole into a shady corner to take part in the service. The sharp little widow came in, looking sweeter and happier than would have seemed possible the night before. Beside

"She always walked regular among them avenues by the old abbey." ..

Margery and Tom, she had a lady with her—an elderly, fragile-looking lady, with one of those pale, fair faces, that look as if perfect repose was their only remaining atmosphere of life, and any jarring element, even of joy, would shake and rend the tender spirit from its feeble dwelling. A face bright with spiritual joy, and pleasant fancies and sentiments. God often sends pleasant fancies to those pure but weakly souls that could never rise to create and grasp pleasant facts. What are such fancies but the dainty aroma of the royal feast awaiting them in their Father's mansion?

Lowly kneeled the stranger through the old familiar prayers. He sat leaning forwards with his face in his hands, while the white-stoled choir chanted the glorious anthem—"Glory be to God in the Highest, and on earth peace, good-will towards men."

Then he came out, silently, among the crowd of worshippers. People were exchanging good wishes with each other—actually Peter, the old waiter, saluted even him with "a merry Christmas."

A merry Christmas!

The stranger stayed and wandered among the graves. There was a world of silent memory seething in his heart. Beside that vision of the little boy, listening awe-struck to the choir, there were others of a young man, vain, extravagant, selfish, counting as of nought, or of little value, all the love and pride and household joy which looked so very fair from this point of view, this lonely wandering among the dead! More pictures still. Of a young man, reckless and cruel in his sins, full of that bravado which dares God and good men out of fear of the devil and his minions;—of the ghastly horrors of a convict ship;—of a shunned man on a wild, lawless shore—the prodigal feeding on the swine's husks. Then of a little rough, miscellaneous group, listening to a simple mission sermon, which even "black fellows" could understand, and which, perhaps, was the more likely to touch the white men, because it was so like what they had heard at their mother's knee, or in their Sabbath-school;—of a hard heart broken, of a sinner seeking salvation, as men dying of thirst seek for water-springs. And then the sweet household instincts, dried and dead under the forgetfulness of God, stirring again in the remembrance of Him, and the return to his ways. O God! such longings for a comforting word in the old familiar voices—such dreams of atonement and reconciliation!

All these memories between that little boy and this strange, silent man, whom nobody knew.

Was there any long-tried servant of God in Norham that afternoon, poor, humble, stricken, and tempted to think that God in his mercy forgets his justice, and tears the moral from the page which He purifies with his pardoning blood? Or was there any heedless young sinner, flattering himself that he will repent in time, and that then all will be as if he had never sinned? Could either have read the secrets of that silent wanderer, each would have got a lesson never to be forgotten.

"How can I bear it?" he said within himself. "I wanted to hear the divine love and forgiveness in a dear human voice; but I must not tear open old wounds, that are healed as much as such wounds can ever heal. It is just. They cannot forget. My life lies among theirs like a waste field, whence noxious weeds creep into other people's gardens. Will God himself forget? How can I bear even his pardon, if his eye is fixed ever on the sins that hang about my neck? And yet, O God, though thou slayest me, yet will I trust in thee."

And so he made his way among the long grass to a square, old-fashioned grave—with all the names on it very old, except one, which, with its remarkable epitaph, had only been written the very last year.

To the memory of
BARBARA HERON,

Aged 47,

who expressly desired that these words of God should be written on her grave for the comfort of whoever should come here, repentant and sorrow-stricken.

"Who is a God like unto Thee? . . . Thou wilt cast all their sins into the depths of the sea.

"For the Lord shall comfort Zion: He will comfort all her waste places, and He will make her wilderness like Eden, and her desert like the garden of the Lord: joy and gladness shall be found therein: thanksgiving and the voice of melody."

And the stranger bowed himself to the ground, as if he had heard an angel's voice. Perhaps he did. Here was the love—type of that heavenly love that he was wildly clutching in a faith that was half despair!—the love that survived sin, and suffering, and death, and stretched a hand to save and soothe from the very grave itself.

Oh, Barbara, Barbara, your tenderness had taught you to lay sweet snares for every possible opportunity! Oh, Barbara, Barbara! surely God must have comforted you in your lonely walkings in those green avenues by the ruined abbey. He did not empty your pure heart of its earthly love, but He dropped into it a balm which changed its bitterness to celestial nectar. Up in heaven, where you are, Barbara, there is only joy over the returning sinner!

And still the stranger sat on the damp winter sod, with his face between his hands. He was not wishing her back, the dear love of his youth. Better where she was, where no mortal soil could ever touch that great love, which was long enough, and strong enough, to stretch from heaven to earth. Only there he sat, shutting out from his eyes the sweet, peaceful scenes around him, even as they must be shut from his life, and seeing far beyond the "waste places" and "wilderness" that his own sins had made, into that joyful country where "the ransomed of the Lord shall return," where "they shall obtain joy and gladness, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away."

That night the stranger walked again in front of that lowly house in the quiet by-way. Christmas savours came through the kitchen window, bright light gleamed between the curtains, even sounds of glad young laughter and merry song reached the lonely watcher without. And he could thank God for them now. He could even smile in sympathy with the joy he might not share. He had his own.

In that lowly house, after supper, when the young ones were quiet round the fire, cracking nuts and asking riddles, Aunt Mary fell into a soft sleep on the sofa. They saw her smile in her slumber, and when she woke she told them in her subdued, pathetic little voice, that she had been dreaming of poor Uncle Dick: she saw him with dear Barbara Heron, and Barbara looked so happy! "And even in my sleep, dears," she said, "I wondered within myself, were we all on earth still, or all safe together in heaven?"

It must have been about that time that the stranger left Norham by the midnight mail-train. He stood up in the carriage, and stretched out his head till the last spire of Norham Cathedral was lost in the darkness. But even he had gotten his Christmas blessing ere he departed—the prodigal son had found his royal feast—heavenly peace and human love.

"He came and he went like a ghost," said old Peter, at the Four Swans.

PAYING BILL HARDING.

I.

"A MERRY Christmas, tather!"

The speaker of the greeting was a little girl of about six years of age. Her face was wan and hunger-pinched, and had something of a careworn expression upon it. This, and the circumstance of her clothes being poor, ill-fitting, and evidently the "cast-offs" of some bigger and older child, gave her an old-fashioned air—an air such as is often seen in the children of the poor, and is in many instances really accompanied by the premature knowledge of the world which it is generally supposed to indicate. Yet Maggie Johnson, as she wished her father a merry Christmas, was both a pretty and a childish child. The prettiness was visible enough in her beautiful blue eyes, soft silky brown hair, small rosy mouth, and delicately rounded chin, in which the dimples had not yet been quite starved out; while in the prattling tone of her voice, and the smile with which she looked up in her father's face as she spoke, could easily be read the childish naïveté proper to her years.

"A merry Christmas, father," she repeated when, after a minute's silence, he had made no answer. "You know this is Christmas morning; hear the bells. Didn't you hear Lizzie Smith and me singing about it yesterday morning, you know?"

'Some did whistle and some did sing,
And all the bells on earth did ring,
On Christmas-day in the morning.'

"Oh, I know it is Christmas-day, Maggie," he said, when she had finished her snatch of song.

"Then why don't you say, 'The same to you?' that is what people say when others wish them a merry Christmas."

"And who told you that, Maggie?" said the father, faintly smiling.

"Oh, I know," she answered briskly; "we were playing at Christmas-parties in the court yesterday. Johnny Rogers was father, and Jane Jones mother, and Lizzie Smith and me were two of the ladies that came to see them, and that was what Johnny told us to say, and he knows. He's eleven, and he's in the second class at school, and he's going to work soon, and then he's to have threepence out of his wages to hissself every Saturday."

She seemed to warm with her subject, and prattled on with breathless volubility up to this point, when, as if suddenly remembering herself, she paused, and, in an altered tone, exclaimed—

"Oh, but you haven't said it yet! Now I'll say mine again, and then you say it—'A merry Christmas, father.'"

"The same to you," he answered; and then, in an undertone and stroking her hair as he spoke, he added, "and if wishing could give it, you should have a merry Christmas. It is hard that you should suffer like this, for you are a good, patient little soul."

Without exactly understanding the purport of what he said, she divined that it was something of love to her—something of implied reproach to himself; and as he spoke she came nestling to his side, and pressed her tiny hand upon his as if to assure him of her affection. He put his arm round her, and with a forced playfulness of tone, asked—

"Do you like Christmas to come, Maggie?"

"All but its being cold I do," she answered; "because I can go and see the shops dressed up and all the nice things in the windows."

"And that is about your share of them, my poor little Maggie," he said, stooping and kissing her. "You deserve better," he went on, in a low musing tone, "both you and your mother, and perhaps better times will come. We have had a hard lot of it of late, but I won't believe that Providence has deserted us for all that. Things can't well be worse with us, and they say that when they get to that stage they mend; perhaps the turn in our long lane of sorrow is not far off, though we can't see it."

As he finished speaking the sound of children's voices was heard outside, and, taking his arm from round her, he said—

"There are your little playmates, Maggie; you had better go and join them for awhile."

"Yes, I'll go till mother comes home," she said; and then she ran out, leaving her father alone in their miserable room.

A miserable room indeed it was! A small second-floor room in an over-crowded court in a densely-populated metropolitan suburb. A room, which was scarcely large enough for a bedroom for a single person, but which had, nevertheless, to serve George Johnson and his wife and child as living and sleeping apartment. The furniture consisted of an old wooden bedstead, but scantily supplied with bedding, two battered chairs, and a box, that served as a table. There was no fire, and only part of a half-quartern loaf in the cupboard in the shape of food. The tenant was in keeping with the apartment. Thin, sickly-looking, haggard, poorly clad, and shrivelled with cold, he appeared a truly wretched being. You could see that he had been severely ill, that he was still suffering from the weakness consequent on a long sickness; and you could see, too, that he had endured, and was still enduring mental as well as bodily sickness—the sickness of heart which comes of hope deferred, till hopefulness is crushed, and despair and bitterness take possession of the mind. He was only thirty years old, and six months before he had scarcely looked his age; but now he appeared more than middle-aged, as well as thoroughly unhappy. He had been in the employ of a large building firm, as an assistant timekeeper, at a payment that had been barely sufficient for the decent maintenance of himself and family; so that when the evil day came upon him it found him but ill-prepared. He had been taking the time of men engaged upon outdoor work, had got wet, gone about in his damp clothes, and as a result had an attack of rheumatic fever. For four months he had been confined to his bed, and, even during the two following months, he had been much fitter to be still in it, than wandering about London—as he had been doing—looking for work. He had looked in vain, and had suffered all the heart-break and depression incidental to such a disappointment. Where he had last worked he found that his place knew him no more. His physical weakness was evident, foremen could look at none but business considerations; and the domestic needs of an assistant timekeeper, or the fact of his having incurred his illness in their employ, were not regarded as matter to be brought under the notice of the principals. His debilitated appearance of course told still more heavily against him at other places, and his weakness seemed likely to be increased rather than diminished as time went on; since the nourishment, which, on the subsiding of the disease, the doctor had said was all that was wanted to put him right again, was beyond his reach. In the early stages of his illness, when constant nursing was necessary, household goods had been sold to pay household expenses, and the little that the wife had latterly been able to earn as a charwoman, had barely sufficed to keep body and soul together in the family. On this Christmas-day she was out assisting in a gentleman's kitchen, and Johnson, left to brood alone, felt all the more unhappy, by reason of its being the "festive season."

II.

But if he was "sad and alone," so were not his next-door neighbours. To them Christmas had brought the good cheer with which it is proverbially associated. In the kitchen the wife was attending to the cooking of a substantial dinner; while round the bright fire in the little parlour sat those who formed the Christmas party of the family. This circle consisted of the husband, a son about sixteen, a brother of the wife's, with his wife, and an old friend of the family named Harding, who had unexpectedly come among them. He was mate of an Australian trading-vessel, and had only arrived in port that morning. His own family were in Liverpool; and, being compelled to stay in London for a day or two, he had looked up these friends, and accepted their invitation to join their party. His sea-going adventures were the chief topic of discourse, and yet he took a modest share in the conversation; for, though he freely and cheerily answered the questions showered upon him from all sides, he never thrust himself forward; and while he laughed at the ignorance about nautical matters that some of the queries made manifest, it was so good-humouredly, and with such a pleasant look upon his comely, weather-bronzed face, that the blunderers laughed as heartily as he.

"Why, let me see, Bill," said the host, "it's over nine years since I saw you last. You were just married then, I remember; I suppose you have a family now?"

"Two—a boy and a girl," was the answer.

"And you have been doing pretty well in the meantime," said the other, not questioning, but as making a general remark upon what his friend had been telling him.

"Yes, I'm thankful to say I have," the sailor answered; "I've been very fortunate in never wanting a ship, and if a fellow may be allowed to say a word for himself, I may add that I have been very careful of what I've earned."

"I thought sailors always spent their money when they got on shore," said one of the others.

"Many of them do, more's the pity!" exclaimed Harding; "but there are more that don't, especially the married ones—that is, when they are happily married. Like other men, they sometimes get hard bargains in the way of wives, and when they do, I'm afraid that helps on any inclination to recklessness there may be. But when you have got a good wife, and children that you love,—as I do mine, bless them,—why then, however far away you may be, you never feel really separated from them. As an old ship-mate of mine used to say whenever he was asked to drink, or anything of that sort, 'No, no, mates! That will never get the child a frock.' Wild Jack-a-shore-ism may be made to seem fine in a nautical novel, but it is a very bad thing for Jack in real life, and a still worse thing for his wife and family. There though!" he exclaimed, pulling himself up, "I'm spinning a yarn; but speaking of the wife and youngsters always does set my tongue on the run."

"It couldn't run on a better subject," said his hostess, who at that moment came into the room to lay the cloth.

In this remark the company generally agreed, and then the bustle attending the setting out of the dinner put an end to conversation until they were seated round the table. The host carved a piece of prime roast beef, which was the chief feature of the meal. When he had served plates to the number of the guests, he was about to put down his knife and fork, when his wife quietly said—

"One more, you know."

"No, there are——"

"For Johnson," she interrupted.

"Oh!" he exclaimed, "I was forgetting him, and his wife away from home to-day too. A next-door neighbour of ours," he went on, addressing himself to Harding, who had looked up with an expression of curiosity. "He has had a hard time of it lately. He was laid up for four months with rheumatic fever, and it has left him neither fit to work, nor able to get the kind of living that would make him fit. It's a thousand pities; he's a decent, steady fellow."

He had cut a good plate of the beef while talking, and now handed it to his wife, who, having added vegetables, went to the door and called to Maggie Johnson, who was playing outside. The child came forward readily enough, but on seeing so many strangers hung back shyly. Noticing this, Harding, who was seated near the door, drew her to his side, and, stroking her hair, said—

"You mustn't be frightened, dear. None of us would hurt a pretty little girl like you—do you think I would, now?"

She looked up in his face, timidly for a moment, but, after the first glance, confidently, and breaking into a smile answered—

"No, sir."

"No, that I wouldn't," he said; "I have a little girl like you, and I like all little girls for her sake. And so your name is Maggie?"

"Yes; Maggie Johnson."

"Well, and if you had a penny, Maggie, what would you do with it?"

"Give it to my mother."

"Ay, that's a good girl; but I don't mean a penny to save up, but to spend, you know, —what would you do with that?"

"Buy a cake."

"That's right," he said, taking a penny out of his pocket and giving it to her. "And now will you give me a kiss?"

Without speaking she held up her face to his.

"That's a little lady," he said, kissing her; "and now I think my friend here has something to say to you."

"Do you think you can take this to your father," said the wife, who had been putting a dish-cover over the plate, and wrapping the whole in a cloth. "That's a clever girl," she went on, as Maggie took it from her; "give it to him, and say we just wanted him to taste a bit of our Christmas dinner. And Maggie," she concluded, as the child was passing out, "when I knock on the wall, just come in again, I shall want you."

When the plum-pudding came upon the table, the knock on the wall was given, and, Maggie promptly answering, a share was sent in for her father and her.

After dinner, the party again drew round the fire and engaged in friendly chat. The parlour was small, the weather, for the time of year, close and muggy, and presently Harding, suiting the action to the word, said that he would take a turn on the door-step, as he felt hot. The reason he assigned was not, however, the only one that prompted him to go out. He had heard the sound of Maggie Johnson in talk with a man, and, guessing that it would be her father, had gone out to get a look at him. Johnson was standing on the step, while his little daughter was on the pavement prattling to him. As soon as Harding came out, Maggie recognised him, and greeted him with a smile.

"Good day," he said, nodding to Johnson; "you see Maggie and I have been making friends; she is a pretty child."

"And she's a good one too," said the father, patting her head.

"Well, I hope so," said Harding, smiling, "for she puts me very much in mind of my own little girl. My friends here," he went on, stepping up to Johnson, "tell me you have had a long illness. I see it has given you a shake—rheumatics, wasn't it?"

"Yes."

"And a terrible bad thing too."

"It has been a terrible bad thing for me," said Johnson, his lip quivering as he spoke. "I'm not churlish, sir; Maggie told me how kindly you took notice of her. I wouldn't keep you standing at the door, but I haven't a place fit to ask you into."

"I know the havoc a long sickness makes in a poor man's home," said Harding in a graver tone than he had previously spoken in; "and I'm sorry yours has suffered in that way; but as to myself, I hope you don't think I look like a fellow to stand upon ceremony on my own account. Not, understand me," he added smiling, "that I am trying to invite myself into your home."

"No; mine is not the sort of home that people seek to invite themselves to," said Johnson; "only if it had been a little less miserable, I would liked to have asked you in for a few minutes; you—you—"

He stopped abruptly, overcome by rising feelings that were too much for him in his weakened condition.

Harding perceived how it was with him, and at once exclaimed—

"Try and keep your heart up, better days will come! I know these severe illnesses leave a man out of nerve. If you think I'll be company to you for a while, I'll come in and yarn a bit with all the pleasure in the world. Just let the little lady here pass the word to my friends, to keep them from wondering where I have got to."

Maggie went with the message, and then the two ascended into Johnson's apartment.

"I had the whole of this floor before my illness," said Johnson, as Harding seated himself on a corner of the box; "but this place is all I have now. However, you'll find room enough; the furniture don't take up much of it."

"Ah, well," said Harding, "I suppose, in the storms of life as in others, we must sometimes lighten the ship to keep her afloat at all; but don't be dispirited, the storm will pass, and you'll be able to refit."

The sailor's cheery and sympathetic tone soon overcame Johnson's bitterness, and he told him all the story of his troubles—told it him more fully as regarded his mental sufferings than he had ever told it to another.

"Well, I do believe that heart-sickness is the worst of all sickness," said Harding when the other had finished; "but at the same time I believe that hope is the best of all doctors for it—so you must try to hope, even though it may seem like hoping against hope.”

“I will,” said Johnson, who seemed to have caught a touch of the other's cheerfulness. “I feel more hopeful even now; it seems something to have met one to listen to me as you have done; I'll take it as a good sign.”

“Well, as to listening to you,” said Harding, his manner suddenly becoming embarrassed, “I don't think much of that; but I should like . . . you know, ‘Do a good turn if you can’ ought to be our motto. I'm such a stranger to you I hardly know how to put it, but let me lend you this;” and as he spoke he thrust a sovereign into the other's hand.

“I—I can't; I didn't speak to you with any thought of this,” Johnson stammered.

“Of course not,” said Harding, “but there you are going off your tack already. It's not the part of a hopeful man to be a self-tormentor. As I look at it, I simply give the money as I would throw a plank to a man struggling to keep his head above water, or expect him to throw one to me.”

“You are very kind; there are not many like you—”

“Oh, I don't know,” interrupted Harding, with a slight laugh; “I hope it is nothing extra to have a heart that can feel for another. However, I must be off now,” he went on, as at that moment there came a rapping at the wall, “they are signalling me in to tea, I suppose. Good-bye.”

“One moment,” said Johnson; “I shall always feel your debtor; but some day I may be able to repay you—if I am, where shall I find you?”

“Well, it would be hard to name any place where you might be able to find me for any length of time together,” answered Harding; “nor so far as I am concerned do I want the money back. Still, if you wish it, I will tell you how you can pay me—perhaps many times over.”

“How?”

“Why, if ever you are in a position to give another some such lift as I have given you, give it, and say to yourself as you do so, ‘Now I am paying Bill Harding.’”

“I will!” exclaimed Johnson earnestly, “if ever I am in a position.”

“You mustn't despair, remember,” said Harding; “keep to hope as your sheet-anchor, and trust to the great Pilot—and now good-bye, and good luck.”

“Good-bye,” responded Johnson, grasping his proffered hand; “good-bye, and God bless you!”

III.

“A merry Christmas, father!”

Again the speaker is Maggie Johnson, but the scene had greatly changed since we last heard her utter that greeting. Ten years have passed, and you can see at a glance that things must have gone prosperously with the family—that they have risen out of the depths of poverty into a comfortable position. They are living in the same suburb, but in a different part of it, and now occupy a neat cottage furnished in a very different style from that of their old room. The parlour in which Maggie meets her father is carpeted, has couch, easy chair, and small chairs en suite, a polished centre table, a neat book-case, and pictures upon the walls, and altogether presents just such an appearance as to any one versed in such matters would indicate that it is the “best” room of the household of a well-to-do artisan or clerk, blest with that treasure, a managing wife.

Johnson himself looks robust and hearty, and though we did not see his wife on that Christmas-day ten years back, it is only reasonable to suppose that she was not, in that time of trouble, the smiling, buxom, matronly-looking woman we now see her, as she comes quickly into the room on hearing her daughter's voice. In Maggie, too, there is a great change—and it is for the better. Her childish promise of good looks has been fulfilled. She has grown into a nice, healthy-looking girl, and neatly and tastefully dressed, presents an appearance that may fairly be described as charming.

The family has been prosperous. Bill Harding's gift had seemed to bring good fortune with it. The sovereign had scarcely been broken into before Johnson found employment. An assistant storekeeper in a neighbouring work did not return to his duties on the expiration of the Christmas holidays. He had gone into the country on a visit to some relations, and it being supposed that he was merely prolonging his holiday for a day or two, it was not considered a matter of much moment who should be temporarily put in his place, and on one of the workmen representing Johnson's case to the manager he was taken. But day after day passed without any word of the other man, until at the end of three weeks there came a letter saying that he had taken another situation. In the meantime Johnson had been doing the work in a satisfactory manner, and having been enabled to procure the nourishment of which he stood in need, was beginning to look himself again, and these circumstances weighing in his favour he was retained in the place.

From this time all had gone well with him, and he had gradually worked his way up, until now when we see him again he is chief storekeeper, at a salary of three pounds a week. His home is a happy one, and he has placed his daughter in a position to be qualified to earn a respectable livelihood for herself. She is a pupil teacher at a school in the neighbourhood. She has been staying the first week of her Christmas holidays with some friends, and it is on returning home from this week's absence that she salutes first her father and then her mother with, "A merry Christmas."

During these happier years Johnson had well remembered his promise to Bill Harding. So far as the mere amount of money was concerned, he had paid his debt to him over and over again—in the figurative sense in which the other had expressed himself willing to be paid. He was naturally of a kind-hearted disposition, and the incident of his meeting with the generous sailor had made him thoughtful and systematic in his kindness. He had not merely done kind actions when occasion had come in his way, but had sought out opportunities to do them. In this way he had become known among his shopmates, neighbours, and most of those in the district connected with works of charity, as a practical philanthropist. He contributed to all, and originated many of the workshop subscriptions for men in distress.

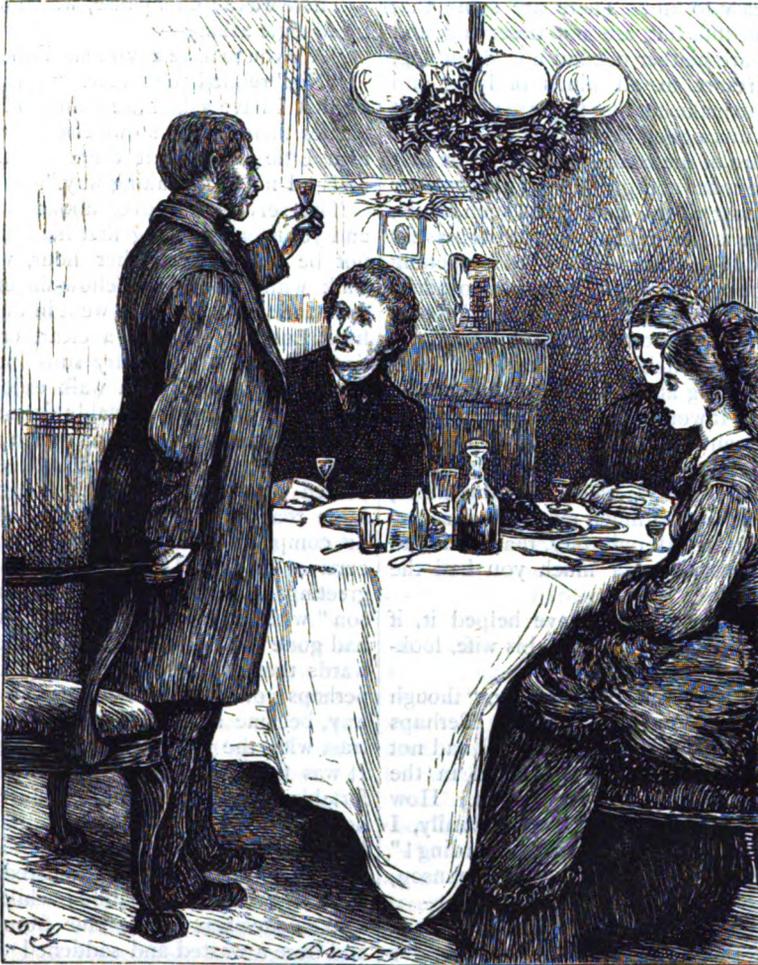

and relieved tramps who came to the workshop-gates in search of employment, but failed to obtain it. Oftener than not a dinner was sent from his table to some poor person; many an hour of his spare time was spent by sick-beds; and in instances in which the necessities of the case called for it, he had been successful in obtaining for distressed individuals the larger assistance it was beyond his personal power to give. And never did he engage in any work of this kind without a thought of the bluff seaman who, with a delicacy worthy of the deed, had been as a good Samaritan to him in his own time of distress.

"Well, and how have you enjoyed yourself, Maggie?" asked her father, when she had put off her bonnet and cloak.

"Very much," she answered. "How have things been going at home?"

"Oh, all right," he said, smiling; "about the same as usual you may know, or you would have heard."

"I don't know so much about that, unless something very particular had happened," said the wife, also smiling, "what with practice, and one thing and another, he has been pretty full of business this week, Maggie, I can tell you."

The "practice" of which his wife spoke had reference to his being a member of the choir of the parish church.

"I've had enough to keep me going, certainly," he said, "but this is rather an extra time. We are going to have new anthems to-day; and then I had charge of the Christmas coal distribution."

"That wouldn't be much trouble, as there would be plenty to give it to," said Maggie.

"No trouble, Maggie," the father answered, with just a shade of reproof in his tone, "but still a thing to make a call upon time and mind."

"I thought you had only to give the tickets to the most needful of the applicants."

"Yes, that's all, Maggie," put in the mother,—"when you have found out who are the most needful and deserving. But that is not very easy to do. There are some that may be needful, but are not deserving, and many that are neither needful nor deserving, who will resort to all kinds of lying and scheming, to make out that they are both. Last year there was a good deal of complaint about a large share of the coals—and as far as that goes of the meat and groceries, and whatever else was being given—falling into such hands, and as your father wanted to put a stop as far as he could to anything of the kind happening this year, he did a lot of from house to house visitation. He was at it every night till eleven o'clock, and came home quite tired out."

"Oh, that was neither here nor there," said Johnson, smiling at his wife's impetuosity.

"Oh, but it would be hard work that way," said the daughter.

"It was hard work, heart-breakingly hard work in one sense, Maggie," said the father, "in showing you so much misery and suffering that you could only pity, that you had not the means, however much you had the will, to help."

"I am sure you would have helped it, if you had had the means," said his wife, looking at him with fond pride.

"I would," he said emphatically, "though I take no pride to myself for that. Perhaps I should not have felt it as I did, if I had not known what it was to have suffered in the same way and to have been helped. How often when I was with some poor family, I wished they could meet with a Bill Harding!"

There was a brief pause, and then Johnson, speaking to his wife, resumed musingly—

"I wish you had seen Harding; it is a pleasure to have even the memory of his brave, kind face. On this day, of all others in the year, I can see him as plainly in my mind's eye as I did with my bodily vision, when he came into our wretched room, making light in its gloom, and leaving means, and better still, hope, behind him. Do you recollect him, Maggie?"

"Yes, I can remember him giving me the penny, and everything, quite well."

"I would dearly have liked to have met him again," the father went on, "if it had only been to let him know that his kindness had brought a blessing with it."

"You tried to find him out, didn't you?" asked Maggie.

"Yes, but I could only learn that his family had left Liverpool altogether. Somehow I think he must have gone trading between foreign ports, or something of that kind, and have settled abroad; for our old neighbours never heard anything of him again either."

There was another pause, which was broken by Maggie asking—

"Are you to have any one to dinner to-day?"

"No," replied the father. "As it happens, all that I have asked are going to have home parties themselves; so we shall have to be our own little party—but there are the church bells; I must be making way."

The service was over about one o'clock, and Johnson, knowing that his dinner would not be ready for another hour, went for a walk with two of his fellow-singers. They took the main road, and went in the direction from London. It was a clear, crisp, frosty day, brightened by wintry sunshine, just the sort of day to make a walk enjoyable and invigorating to a comfortably dressed person. And it had drawn out many such; for numbers of more or less well and seasonably attired people were strolling along this self-same road in either direction. Johnson and his companions sauntered on, engaged in discursive chat, and occasionally exchanging greetings and "the compliments of the season" with acquaintances. In this way they had gone about half a mile, when, coming towards them, they saw a figure which, though perhaps not strikingly noticeable in a general way, became so at this moment by its contrast with the holiday spirit that was about. It was the figure of one who was not comfortably dressed, and whose countenance did not wear a smile. On the contrary, he was lightly clad in garments which, though showing evidence of being well cared for, were woefully worn and shabby; while his thin, sunken face was lividly blue from the cold, and bore a wasted and saddened expression. His dusty boots and general appearance indicated that he was tramping; and yet it was palpable that he did not belong to either of the two classes from among whom tramps almost invariably come. Had he been an artisan or labourer tramping in search of employment he would have had on some sort of working-suit, while his clothes, though threadbare, were of broadcloth, and his hands were small and white. And if his dress showed that he did not belong to the working-class division of tramps, his manner, to any one taking note of it, would have yet more decidedly shown that he was not of the "cadger" order of tramps. He had not the dirt-engrained complexion, slouching movement, and "countenance of demand," which are "the badge of all their tribe." He was quite a young fellow, and seemed to experience a sense of shame at his condition, and was evidently made uncomfortable by the half-curious, half-compassionate glances cast upon him by the passers-by. Now and again he looked up in their faces, and it chanced that he did so as Johnson and his companions approached. He gave one quick glance at the three, and then his eyes rested upon Johnson, while his face rapidly flushed and paled. As he came up to them he paused and appeared about to speak, but, if such was his purpose, he either failed in it, or changed it, for, without having come to a dead stop, he passed on in silence.

When he had got beyond earshot, one of Johnson's companions, laughing, exclaimed—

"Holloa, Johnson, you had a narrow escape there, I fancy! He didn't look the least like a cadger, certainly; but, if I'm not mistaken, he had half made up his mind to try on a bit of cadging with you—'Excuse me being so bold, sir, but would you help a respectable young fellow on tramp?' and so forth."

"I'm more than half sorry that I didn't ask him if I could help him," said Johnson.

"Now, look here, Johnson," said the other, "we all know how kind you are, and what you do down here about, where you know or have a chance of finding out who they are you are helping, is all to your credit; but to give to any stray fellow who may meet you in the street is a very different affair. I don't say that it would be so in your case, but, as a rule, such promiscuous giving shows more thoughtless weakness than true charity."

"That is quite correct in a general way," replied Johnson, "but at the same time you must allow something for discrimination. I feel sure that that young fellow, though under misfortune, is as respectable as any of us. I've a great mind to turn back."

Neither of the others made any answer, and they had walked on quietly some fifty yards, when Johnson suddenly exclaimed—

"There—I will turn back. I'll speak to him, if I can do no more."

The others turned back with him, but when in a few minutes they overtook the young wayfarer they went on by themselves, leaving Johnson alone to speak to him.

"Good day," said Johnson, in a friendly tone. "You see I have soon overtaken you, but I dare say you are too tired to care about going fast."

"I am tired," he answered in a low, vehement tone, "and hungry, and penniless, and friendless,—and I wish I was dead!"

"No, no; don't speak rashly," said Johnson, in a tone of kindly remonstrance, "you are only a boy; you have known better days, I can tell; think that you'll know them again. Have you been on the road long?"

"I have tramped all the way from Sunderland, and I am going to seek for work in London. I'm a clerk, but I wonder what would be thought of me if I applied at an office in this guise; and if I asked for labour it would be thought a good joke."

"It would be folly to argue that there wasn't a good deal in what you say," replied Johnson; "but still, you know, many a young fellow has come to London as poor as you, and lived to be rich and respected in it."

"Ah, yes, but the turn-again-Whittington days are over," said the other, with bitterness.

"Well, there is not room for every man to become lord mayor," said Johnson, smiling; "but every man's cloud has a silver lining."

"It's very easy for you to talk," said the young fellow, in the same bitter tone.

"Well, I have perhaps a better right to talk that way than you think," returned Johnson good-humouredly. "I have been under pretty much the same cloud myself, and had what you can hardly have—a wife and child under it with me. I have been out of work, and penniless, and, as I thought, friendless, and on a Christmas day too, when all around me seemed rejoicing. I couldn't see the silver lining even in the distance; but it was there, and came in sight in good time, and the cloud passed away."

"I had no idea of that," said the other; "but I did see that you pitied me, and that is why I looked at you, and—and thought to beg of you. But I would never have forgiven myself afterwards if I had come down to that."

"Ah, that is a false pride when carried to an extreme," said Johnson, "though, as far as that goes, there would have been no question of begging in your speaking to me. However, it is perhaps best that I should ask you to let me help you as—"

"Excuse me, sir," the other interrupted, "I don't want to be unthankful, and I didn't mean to be disrespectful—but I don't want help. As you say, as poor fellows as me have done well in London, and I daresay I shall pull through somehow."

"I have no doubt you will," answered Johnson, "still you will pull through none the worse for having a rest and a bit of dinner before going any farther. You could do nothing towards getting work to-day, as every place is closed. You needn't be afraid that you will be laying yourself under any obligation to me," he went on, interrupting the other as he was about to speak. "I'm sorry to think that I have little more than the will to assist you, but I'm just going home to dinner, and you had better come with me. I may perhaps be able to point out where you might have the best chances of finding work."

"I'm such a figure," said the other.

"Oh, never mind that," said Johnson, "we are not dressy people—come on."

When they reached the house Johnson briefly explained matters to his wife.

"Well, George, I don't begrudge the cost of anything you may do for him," she said, with just a shade of vexation in her voice, when the unexpected guest had gone up-stairs to wash; "but it is awkward bringing a stranger here on a day like this."

"Well, I daresay it is a little," he answered, "but there was something in his face that made me feel that I must speak to him, and our inconvenience can be but small compared with the hardship it would seem for a youth to be left without a soul to speak to on this day."

"Yes, that would have been hard," said the wife; "and after all, we have nothing to say that any stranger may not hear. He appears very well-behaved; he'll be some decent body's child. He looks a mere boy. I shouldn't think he was more than eighteen."

"That is his age; he mentioned it as we came along."

"Well, you had better go and see how he is getting on, and look him out slippers, and anything of that kind that he may want. I'll go and tell Maggie that we are going to have some one to dinner, after all."

IV.

"Ah yes, that's an improvement; you look quite another fellow!" exclaimed Johnson, when, some ten minutes later, the other stood before him with his face well washed, his clothes well brushed, and his dusty boots exchanged for a pair of slippers. And thus brightened and freshened, he certainly was a great improvement upon the travel-stained being he had looked when Johnson first met him. He showed a well-built, handsome, pleasant-faced youth; and it was perhaps in as great a degree owing to her finding him so presentable as to girlish bashfulness, that Maggie blushed deeply, as she rose to say a word of greeting to him when her father brought him into the parlour.

Dinner being laid, they at once sat down. At first the young stranger was shy and nervous; but after a while he began to be more at ease, took his share in the talk, and under Johnson's delicately managed attention he made a hearty meal. When they were done, Johnson spoke a short thanksgiving, upon the conclusion of which his guest observed—

"I think I ought to add a little grace that my father always used, and used sincerely too, 'I wish that every poor man in the kingdom had had as good a dinner as I have.'"

"And a noble wish too," said Johnson; "and now I have a wish, in the shape of a toast, to give. You will not know the meaning of it till I have explained it afterwards; but you may drink it with the full assurance that you will never drink a worthier. It has been a Christmas custom with us for the last nine years, and involves one of the few extravagances of which we are guilty—a bottle of wine yearly. Bring it out, dear."

The wife brought out the bottle, and Johnson, having filled four glasses, stood up, and in a solemn tone, and with an earnest, prayerful look upon his face, exclaimed—

"Here is health, happiness, and prosperity to Bill Harding; Heaven's blessing be with him, wherever he may be, on land or sea!"

As he finished speaking he noticed that his guest was greatly agitated; but, before he could ask a question, the other exclaimed—

"Why—why, I didn't—; how did you know my name?"

"Your name!" exclaimed Johnson, in surprise.

"Yes, my name—Bill Harding," said the other; "though I am sure I never mentioned it to you."

Johnson stood for a few moments speechless, and then, bringing his hand down on the table, excitedly exclaimed—

"Of course you didn't; but I believe I see it all. I understand now why your face should have drawn me so irresistibly. Was your father's name Bill Harding too? Was he a seaman? Was he ever mate of an Australian ship, the Herbert Henry?"

"Yes, yes; he sailed in her ten years ago!" exclaimed the other.

"The very time," said Johnson.

"Did you know my father, then?"

"I can scarcely say that I did. I only saw him once, but I respect him more than any man I ever did know, and I thank Providence that it has come in my way to be of service to a child of his."

Then, in a few rapid sentences, he told the son how the father had assisted him.

"And where is your father now?" he asked, when he had concluded his story.

"In heaven, I hope," was the answer. "He perished at sea three years ago, and all that we had perished with him. It was his first run as captain and half-owner, and every halfpenny of his savings was invested in the ship and cargo. That was indirectly the cause of his death. The crew left her in boats and were saved; but, with a view to keeping her from being picked up as abandoned, he insisted upon sticking to her, and was lost with her.

"The blow killed my mother, my little sister had died five years before, and so I was left alone in the world. A distant relation gave me shelter for a short time, but he made the bread of dependence bitter to me; so, without either telling him where I was going, or that I was going at all, I took myself from under his roof, and did the best I could for myself. Most of the time it was a very poor best, but I was just beginning to get on well in Sunderland, when I was taken ill, and laid up for nearly three months. When I got better, I found myself out of a situation and out of money, and as I didn't care to walk about like a beggar where I was known, I sold what few clothes I had beside these I stand up in, and with the trifle I got in this way, to keep me on the road, I set out to tramp to London. What will be my fate goodness knows; but if I meet with anything like good fortune, I'll let you know."

"There will be no need for your acquainting me with it," said Johnson, smiling; "you must make this your home till you get a situation. Afterwards you can please yourself as to whether you will live with us, though in any case we shall always expect you to drop in as to a home."

"You are very kind," the other said, speaking brokenly from emotion, "but that is only the more reason why I should not impose——"

"Impose, nonsense!" interrupted Johnson; "I shall really have to lecture you if you talk that way any more. Besides, if there is anything in what I am doing, you should remember that it is to your dead father that you are indebted for it."

"Oh, but——" the other was beginning, when Mrs. Johnson, with good-humoured imperiousness, broke in—

"Now, it is no use talking, Mr. Harding; if it had not been for your father's kindness, we might not have had a home to offer you a share of. You shall stay with us, and there's an end of it."

The other, however, did not seem to think that this settled the matter, and he was about to say something more in the way of demur, when Maggie, blushing a little as she spoke, said—

"Oh yes, do stay; we shall all be so sorry if you go away among strangers—say you will stay."

As she spoke, the look of doubt at last cleared away from his countenance, and, after a momentary pause, he answered—

"You are all very good to me. I will stay, and I hope that some day it may be in my power to prove my gratitude in more than words."

v.

"A merry Christmas, father; a merry Christmas, mother!"

Once more it is Maggie who thus greets her parents. Young Harding, who comes in at her side, repeats, "A merry Christmas, father; a merry Christmas, mother!" And he has the right to so salute them, for Maggie is now his wife, and they have just returned from a week's wedding trip. Six years have gone round since the day when Johnson and young Harding had met upon the road, and fortune had smiled upon the latter as kindly during this interval as it had done upon the Johnsons in the longer one previously spoken of. At the end of a month he had obtained employment in the office of a City merchant. To be near his business he had had to remove from Johnson's house, but he had continued to regard it as a home, going down regularly on Saturday evenings and staying over the Sunday. Maggie and he being thrown together in this way, a favourable first impression had ripened into a strong attachment; and as he had risen to such a position as justified their doing so with every prospect of being able to live comfortably, they had sealed their love by marriage.

After learning that the elder Harding was dead, Johnson had on Christmas-days solemnly proposed his memory, and he was just rising to do so upon this occasion, when they were all startled by a rattling peal at the knocker.

Maggie, who was nearest to the door, sprang to answer it, and in an instant was clasped in the embrace of a stalwart, sunbrowned, black-bearded man, who imprinted a hearty kiss upon her cheek.

"Why, you——. It can't be——"

Her utterance failed, and voice seemed also to have deserted her father and her husband; for, though both had hastily started to their feet, they now stood as if petrified by surprise, with their eyes intently fixed upon the figure of the man in the doorway. He, too, seemed labouring under strong emotion, but he was the first to be able to speak connectedly.

"I know just how you are all taken aback," he said. "You are almost inclined to think that the sea must have given up its dead, but I'll explain everything."

"Father! father! it is really you?" exclaimed young Harding, stepping forward and seizing his hand.

"Yes, it is me, Bill," he said, while he gently put him back with his disengaged hand so as to be able to look in his face. "Something told me I should find you again, and I have, Bill—I have!" He paused, and then stepping up to Johnson and taking his hand, went on—

"And I am only less glad to see you again than to find my son. I have heard all about how kind you have been to him."

"But, father," said the son, "I thought——"

"That I had gone down in the King Canute; and you had every reason to think so, for though I was saved, it was under such circumstances as gave me no chance of letting it be known until after your mother was dead, and you gone away leaving no trace behind you. There, there, I'm not going to beat about," he exclaimed, checking his son as he was going to ask some impatient question. "I'll tell you the whole story at once, and in as few words as well as I can:—

"My craft kept afloat for two days after the crew had left, but nothing came in sight to afford assistance, and at length she began to settle down. Then I tried to launch a boat, but it got stove in, and, as a last resource, I lashed myself to a spar, and fastened an extemporized signal of distress upon it in such a way that it would float upwards. A few minutes after I had done it she sunk, and I remembered no more till I found myself in an hospital in Bombay. Then I found, or rather I came by degrees to understand, that a few hours after the King Canute went down I had been picked up by a sailing vessel bound for Bombay. I was more than half dead, and altogether insensible from the effects of a wound on the head, which must have resulted from my being hit by some piece of wreckage. I was insensible all the while I was on board this ship, which was some weeks. I had remained so in the hospital, and my being brought round at all was considered as something wonderful in the way of cure. I got the doctor to write to your mother for me, but the letter came back with 'Dead' written across it, and though I was able to go about by that time, the shock brought on a relapse that laid me by for another two months. At last, however, I got all right in health again, and shipped to England, and on arriving tried all I could to find you, till my pay was gone. Then of course I had to be off to sea once more, and an old employer of mine gave me command of one of his ships. I have been with him ever since, and as I am liberally paid, and allowed to do a little trading on my own account, I am doing well, and pretty Maggie here shall not go without a present from her father-in-law."

He was stopping with the air of a man who had finished what he had to say, when his son exclaimed—

"But you haven't told us how you found us out."

"There, I was forgetting that!" he exclaimed. "Well, it was this way. I got into dock late last night, and the thought struck me that this would be the first Christmas-day I had had in port in England since the one I spent with Johnson's old neighbours. This in its turn set me wondering whether they were still in the same place, and I made up my mind to find out to-day. They were almost as much astonished to see me as you all were, but when they had got over their surprise they told me about you, Johnson, and about Bill here. Of course I was off before they had fairly finished telling me where you lived; and here I am, happier than I can say."

"I think we are all equally happy to see you," said Johnson.

"I believe you are, Johnson; and let me add, that I am not more happy in myself than grateful to you for your kindness to my boy."

"I was only paying Bill Harding, you know," answered Johnson, smiling.

"Well, you have paid him with overwhelming interest," said the seaman emphatically; "for if, when I first met you, I had cast bread upon the waters, it has certainly returned to me again after many days—and many fold."

ROSE SALTERRE.

L

THE village of Cobden lay at some little distance from Brierley Hall. You did not go down the steep bit of road lined with beeches, but turned up behind the house, past the church, on to the Down, and followed a chalk track for nearly three quarters of a mile, and then you came upon it like a surprise, if you were a stranger. It lay nestled in a hollow of the Down, and seemed to have nothing to do with any other place but itself. When you got out upon the Down beyond it, if it was a clear day, you could see the sea-line away in the distance.

The track was good enough in summer, but in winter, and after heavy rains, it was very bad; indeed often impassable, except to the shepherd boys in their heavy boots, or to the horse of the good village doctor, who often had to ride across in dark winter nights and summer storms, to visit patients whose houses lay scattered on the other side of the Hall. One February night one of the servant-maids at the Hall was taken ill. Miss Mary, who had kept the Squire's house, ever since the sudden death of his wife, was a bit of a doctor herself, for in her young days every lady was taught something of the virtue of herbs, and to cure hurts and burns, and to make salves and ointments. But this illness was getting beyond Miss Mary's skill, and she sent up to the Hill for Dr. Staynes, and sat herself by the bed of the poor suffering girl till he arrived. It took two hours to fetch him. Perhaps it would have taken more with another, but Dr. Staynes never thought of his own ease when illness was concerned. The messenger found him in his little parlour, his feet on the fender, and a glass of elderberry wine simmering on the hob, while his supper was preparing. He put on his boots again, drank the wine, congratulating himself that it at least was ready and hot, and rode off down the hill, with lights and fire behind him, and the cold wet air of a February night in front. He found the poor girl in a state of inflammation which required quick and sharp remedies, and it was not until dawn that the attack was subdued. Then Miss Mary saw that he was exhausted, and ordered him a good breakfast, in which she joined him. While they sat over it, she pressed him to take some rest before returning, but he declined; so she asked if he had many patients just then, and he replied by naming all, except one whom he called "the poor French thing."

"What poor French thing?" said Miss Mary, with a sudden yearning of heart, for her brother had married a French woman against his father's will, and she had come to England on the outbreak of the war, only to die broken-hearted near them.

"Oh, the young French woman," was the reply, "who has been in the village all the winter;" and Miss Mary detected an annoyance in his tone which surprised her. "You must have seen her, madam."

"But I have not. All the winter! What is her name, and what does she do?"

"Her name is Mademoiselle Rose, and she makes dresses and bonnets."

"A French milliner is, you will allow, something so unheard-of," said Miss Mary with a smile, "that I wonder her fame has not descended to the Hall. Poor thing! I suppose she has come over like the rest of them, to earn a livelihood; but why should she pick out Cobden of all places on earth?"

"I fancy her fingers are too fine and dainty for a good deal that she has undertaken," remarked the Doctor drily.

"You interest me very much," said Miss Mary. "And what is the matter with her that she wants you?"

"Oh, it is more a matter of climate than anything else. She has a cough. She is not accustomed to live on a hill."

"Poor thing!" said Miss Mary again. "Has she money? I mean, does she earn enough to support herself, and—pay you?"

"For the latter I can't tell yet," said the Doctor, with a shade of impatience very unlike his usual respectful courtesy; "but she lodges in a spare room in one of our farmer's houses, and I never heard any complaints."

Here the Doctor, who was unusually reluctant in his answers, rose and, with thanks, prepared for his ride home.

"When the weather gets better, I shall come and see Mademoiselle Rose," said Miss Mary, who saw the reluctance without understanding it, and was too kind-hearted and high bred to force a subject upon any one; and, after a few parting words of advice about the servant-girl, the Doctor made his bow and rode off.

Miss Mary was puzzled. Not but what there were a great many French in England then. The war was at an end, and many of them came over, in hopes of retrieving their ruined fortunes, or at least of getting more bread to eat than they could at home. Some of them were sadly disappointed, poor things; especially the women. The men, some of them gentlemen as highly born as the Squire, taught French and dancing, and so gained money; but the poor women, those who had no husbands or brothers to mend and cook for, and none to care for them, had nothing but their needlework, millinery, or artificial flowers, to look to for a livelihood. Some few of the better educated took to teaching, but those were few, and their want of knowledge of English stood in their way. And Cobden was such a poor, out-of-the-way place for a Frenchwoman to settle in. London or Bath would have seemed so much more likely. And then the Doctor was apparently afraid of saying much about the newcomer, or at any rate did not choose to do so; and his manner was most unaccountable, as was the expression of vexation Miss Mary was sure she saw on his face at being questioned. However, it was February, and quite impossible for a lady to get up to the village then; so the French stranger was, not forgotten, but put on one side in Miss Mary's mind till the spring. March was snowy, April more fickle than usual, May cold and windy, and so it happened that June had made everything green and sweet and leafy before she was able to make her long-meditated visit to Cobden. It was not to satisfy an idle curiosity that she went, but to see if she could be of any use to the poor stranger, who must feel so forlorn, alone, among the rough villagers. There was no parson or parson's wife to go to, if she wanted a friend; for in those days one clergyman did duty for two or three parishes, as often as not, and Mr. Rogers, an old and somewhat infirm, but very wealthy man, was the clergyman of two parishes besides Cobden. He was driven over every Sunday, to read prayers and preach to the people in the morning, and hear the children their Catechism in the afternoon, at the old parish church, which was just behind the Hall, and sadly out of reach of the old and ailing among the village folk in the winter; and then he went away, and was never seen till the next week. But he was charitable and kind, and never refused a shilling to any one of the line of people who would be waiting for him after church with pitiful stories of all kinds. Also, he used to give the Squire five pounds every Christmas, to spend in coals and blankets; so that the people of Cobden had less to complain of than many. Now-a-days things are improved, and parishes better looked after, but then it was different. Well, it was a fine June morning when Miss Mary started on her walk. Her maid behind her carried a basket with tea and sugar, and other like comforts for the old women, and some pretty soft stuff for Mademoiselle Rose to make up into a gown for her. When she got to the farm-house where the Doctor had told her Mademoiselle Rose lodged, she tapped at the door, and was disappointed to find that Mademoiselle was out.

"But she will be in very soon, madam," said the farmer's wife. "Do you come in and rest; it is a treat to see your face again, though you do look tired and spent." So saying, the good woman settled her visitor in the great patchwork-cushioned arm-chair, and went off for curds-and-whey. While Miss Mary waited, and drank the whey—her favourite summer drink from a child—she learnt a little about the young woman she had come to see; found that she could talk but very broken English, as was to be expected, that she was very industrious at any kind of work she could get to do, and that she had a cough and a weak chest, for which Dr. Staynes came very often to see her. "She is none too well off, poor soul, I expect," added the farmer's wife; "and then she can't stomach our food, but must needs make her own soup, and messes of one kind and another, which I don't believe are so wholesome as good bacon or meat, such as we have every day. I'm downright sorry for her, she must be so lonesome; but she looks cheerful, so perhaps I'm wasting pity. There she is!" as a little figure passed the window, and light steps were heard ascending the stairs. "I will go and tell her you are here, or she will be flustered;" and the kind-hearted dame went off after her lodger.

Miss Mary said that she was quite disappointed when she went up and first saw the young woman, but that afterwards that feeling left her, and she conceived the greatest interest in her. I can understand this, having seen her so often myself. Miss Mary went up, leaving her maid in the kitchen, and found Mademoiselle Rose standing to receive her. She was a very little person; so small, and so neatly made, that you were reminded of a doll when you looked at her. She had keen black eyes, a sallow complexion, very black hair, which she wore combed straight off her forehead—French fashion, and the smallest, prettiest hands and feet I ever saw. Everything she wore was as dainty as herself, though as cheap and common as possible. A black stuff gown, a white linen apron with pockets, a little white cap with a pink border—that was all; but it was put on so neatly; the gown fitted her trim little figure so well, and the apron and cap were so white and fresh, that she could not have looked better, nor so well in my opinion, if she had been dressed in silk and velvet. On one of her fingers she wore a hair ring, with an opal set in it, and that was the only thing at all out of the way about her. Her bed was in one corner of the room, and she had sewn a white cambric covering for it, with a deep frill, which made it look quite pretty; the table was pushed into the window, and littered with work; and on the window-ledge was a flower-pot with a rose in it. She made a deep curtsy when Miss Mary came in, and then stood as if waiting for a work order. Now the reason for Miss Mary's disappointment was partly because she had made up her mind for a mystery, and mystery there seemed to be none. The little woman was as plain and business-like a person as possible, and spoke straight to the point.

"Good day, mademoiselle," said she in her broken English. And she had this curious thing about her, that she never seemed to be afraid of making a blunder, though, of course, she made plenty, but went on as quickly as if she were talking her own language; and a strange jumble she made of it.

"Good day, mademoiselle," said Miss Mary in French—at which the little woman started, and coloured.

"Ah, mademoiselle, what pleasure!" she exclaimed. "I have heard nothing so sweet for no long!" and tears came into the bright eyes, and then she suddenly became the workwoman again, and added, "I await your commands."

Miss Mary accordingly called to her maid, and produced the stuff, giving her orders for the dress, in such a way as to bring out the taste and skill of the workwoman, who proved to have plenty of both, and to enjoy having anything to do in which she could exercise them. Her eyes sparkled when Miss Mary said she would leave the trimming for her decision, and she asked eagerly when the dress would be wanted.

"Can you bring it to me in a week's time?" said Miss Mary; "then I could try it, and you could make any alterations that might be needful."

Miss Mary said this in the hope of getting an opportunity of more general talk with her than seemed likely now, though Mademoiselle Rose evidently thought so much about her work, that all the romantic story she had been making up in her own mind about the little dressmaker being a countess in her own country, and so on, appeared likely to fade into nothing.

Mademoiselle Rose hesitated.

"Is it too short a time?" said Miss Mary. "I am in no great hurry."

"No, indeed, mademoiselle—but—pardon me, I never go out much—I have not the time—I might be wanted; and for alterations," she added with a little proud smile, "mademoiselle may assure herself none will be required."

This was provoking; but, as Miss Mary wondered what she could say, the little woman suddenly remembered that she had not taken the length of the skirt, and ran across the room for her measure. The quick movement brought on her cough, and she had to stop, and put her hand to her chest. Miss Mary's kind heart was roused in a moment—

"Your cough is very bad, I fear," she said, making her sit down in a chair, and waiting till the fit should pass.

"It has been bad, mademoiselle," panted Mademoiselle Rose, recovering herself; "but that will pass—now the roses are blowing." She pointed to a white rose-bush which was beginning to flower luxuriantly all up one side of the house. "I shall make a tissue of roses, and it will soon cure my chest." And she got up from the chair.

"But what does Dr. Staynes say? He tells me he is attending you for it," said Miss Mary.

Mademoiselle Rose's hands began to fidget a little nervously at the black ribbon which held her scissors to her side, and she glanced quickly at her visitor, with a sort of questioning look in her eyes, and then dropped them as quickly.

"He says it is climate—your fogs;" and breaking off as if with a sudden recollection, she said, "You do me too much honour, mademoiselle. It is nothing, absolutely nothing." And she began folding up the stuff with neat hands, and a quick movement, which plainly said, "Our business is done, and I have no time to talk on other matters."

Miss Mary was fairly baffled, but she ventured to say as she left the room—

"Well, I think a walk to the Hall would do you good, so bring my dress if you can." And then she walked home, thinking that Mademoiselle Rose was a commonplace little body enough, evidently devoted to work, cheerful to all appearance, and not over sensitive—in fact, not at all a person who could be made into the heroine of a romance; and yet, in spite of this, Miss Mary did feel a great interest, not to say curiosity, about her. She did feel sure that there was some concealment somewhere.

"No concern of mine," she said to herself. Yet the wish grew strong within her to find out more about Mademoiselle Rose.

II.

Contrary to Miss Mary's expectations, Mademoiselle Rose brought home the dress herself at the end of four days. Miss Mary was in the garden, and Mademoiselle Rose was shown into the parlour, to wait while the servant went to fetch her mistress. Miss Nelly was at the table in the window with her spelling-books, and told all about it afterwards—how Mademoiselle Rose curtsied to her, and then sat down in the chair placed for her. The chair was one of a row at the side of the room, so that she could see everything in it as she sat.

"I am sure she thought the parlour very pretty, Auntie," said the child afterwards, "she looked at the things so much, and I think she can see more with her eyes than other people, they look so," said my darling, not knowing how to express what she meant. "First of all she looked at the pictures, and then at the rug. Then she turned and looked at the coral and the amethyst, and the china, you know, and as she looked I heard her make a sound something like a sigh, only shorter, and she started up on her feet. I was frightened, Auntie, and I wished you would come; for she went up to the things, and put out her hand and touched the necklace." Miss Nelly called the rosary a necklace, for she was too young to understand what it really was. "Well then," Miss Nelly went on, "of course, I went to her, and said she must not touch it, for Auntie never would let me have it in my hand even, and it belonged to a lady who was dead, and Aunt Anne had loved her very much, and kept the necklace, and let no one so much as dust it but herself. And then, only think, Auntie, she began to cry, and looked at me, and said some French words which I could not understand, and clasped her two hands together, and then you came in."

This was Miss Nelly's explanation of what Miss Mary saw when she entered the room. Mademoiselle Rose stood by the carved console, with tears running down her cheeks.

"Auntie, she is crying," whispered the child. "Shall I go?"

"Yes, my love."

And Miss Nelly ran away, relieved, for the scene had frightened her a little.

Miss Mary took Mademoiselle Rose's hand.

"Can I do anything for you?" she said.

"No, mademoiselle, I thank you much—I am a little unwell—it is nothing." And she turned, and went to the table, and began unfolding her work, seeming so embarrassed, that Miss Mary, for very pity, could ask no more questions then.

The dress fitted to a nicety, and the work and trimming were so beautifully done, that Miss Mary said, involuntarily—

"Why, you are not going to stay at Cobden, surely, if you can do work like this! What made you come here?" and then added, as the sallow face flushed again, "Excuse me, that is an impertinent question."

"Oh, no, no! You are very good. London is sad, and they said I should suffer in my health if I lived there, and I obtain much work here, and fresh air and light. It is better than to live in the town."

"You are right so far, mademoiselle; but the work here is not suited to your abilities."

Mademoiselle Rose smiled, and touched the dress lovingly.

"This is the first robe of taste I have made since I came here. It has been a true pleasure," and she sighed.

"And you are going back to work you dislike," said Miss Mary, "for no other reason than the one you have just told me?"

Mademoiselle Rose dropped her eyes and said nothing. At that moment a horseman rode up to the door, and Miss Mary recognised Dr. Staynes. He had called to see her about a patient in whom she was interested.

Mademoiselle Rose grew nervous again, and hurried on her gloves as if ready to go.

"Stop," said Miss Mary; "we have said nothing about payment. What is your charge?"

Mademoiselle Rose hesitated exceedingly. At last she said, "I know nothing of English charges."

"Well, and I know nothing of French ones," said Miss Mary, smiling. "Will you tell me what you were in the habit of charging for such a dress as this in France?"

More hesitation, and a deeper colour than ever through the sallow skin, and then the words low spoken—

"I was not a dressmaker in France. My sister and I, we worked for amusement only. She dressed her dolls, and she was my doll. I sometime made her dresses."

It was Miss Mary's turn to be confused.

"Forgive me," she said; "I must have pained you. How grieved I am."

But Mademoiselle Rose had recovered herself.

"It has been a pleasure to make the dress," said she, "and if you will add to your kindness by naming your own price, I shall be most grateful."

"And I will do so," said Miss Mary, "with this understanding, that you stay and drink tea with me before you return to Cobden. You know Dr. Staynes, I think; I will ask him to stay too."

But Mademoiselle Rose decidedly refused. In fact she seemed thoroughly distressed when urged, and Miss Mary saw at once she must say no more about it, so with a few parting words and a promise that she would come and pay her debt as soon as she could ascertain what it ought to be, Mademoiselle Rose hurried out of the house as Dr. Staynes came in.

Miss Mary looking at him observed a flush mount over his face as he caught sight of Mademoiselle Rose, though it was so momentary as to leave her in doubt if she had seen rightly.

After some discourse respecting the Doctor's patient, Miss Mary said, "You have got a genius at Cobden, Doctor, without knowing it. Mademoiselle Rose is a very skilled workwoman, and has turned me out a dress which would do honour to a modiste of the first water."

"I think I told you," was the Doctor's answer, "that her skill was rather above what was needed here; at least, I heard so. Good morning; I must get back as fast as possible," and he was out of the house in a great hurry. Nothing more to be got out of him; that was plain enough, and Miss Mary was a little piqued, as was natural.

She went, however, to Cobden with the money for her dress, and paid Mademoiselle Rose, and several times afterwards she gave her needlework to do out of pure kindness, and she would have me now and then go to see her and take her a nosegay or a French book. But she never renewed her invitation to tea, nor in any way tried to win Mademoiselle Rose's confidence again. Mademoiselle Rose always showed herself very grateful for these little kindnesses, and would sometimes look at me during my visits in a wistful way, as if she wanted to say something, and yet could not bring herself to speak the word. Once she asked me about my master, the Squire, and where he was, and if he would ever come back and live at the Hall. But I thought this question forward in a stranger, and was so backward in my answers that she never said anything more of that kind to me. It has often seemed odd to me since, when I came to know the truth, that neither Miss Mary nor I should ever have guessed it, especially after the affair of the rosary. But there is no accounting for these things; we never did.

III.

July passed, and I think it was the beginning of August, when one evening, just as I had come for Miss Nelly, Miss Mary, as she sometimes did, seeing the Doctor ride wearily past her gate, sent me out to ask him in to drink tea with her. He must have been very tired, I thought, for he answered quite eagerly that he would do himself the honour of stopping (that was always his phrase), so Miss Mary sent me and my child home, and she and the Doctor sat down to tea alone.

What passed I will tell you as well as I can from my recollection of Miss Mary's own words, as she related it to me afterwards.

"I filled the tea-pot as usual, and served him with bread-and-butter and tea-cake before I entered into any conversation. He looked tired and harassed, and I knew the best thing was to make him eat and drink. But he seemed too much pre-occupied to benefit by my remedies, and I was sure that he ate and drank mechanically, his mind all the while full of something else. I talked of the beauty of the evening, of some trifling ailment of Nelly's, and of her progress in her lessons. And then I laid my hand upon a book which lay on the window seat within reach. 'By-the-bye,' I said, 'may I trouble you to take this book to Mademoiselle Rose? It is the second volume of one that she is reading.' He looked up with a start, and replied that he would do so gladly.

"'Gladly,' he repeated, and looked full at me in a strange, defiant kind of way. I did not in the least understand what the look meant, but something compelled me to go on and say—

"'How curious it is, that she is no dress-maker after all!' The Doctor made a sudden movement, and nearly upset his tea-cup.

"'She told you that?' he said.

"'Yes; why should she not tell me?' said I, a little mischievously, I own, 'as it seems she has told you!'

"'I am a friend,' stammered the Doctor, who is not usually at a loss for words, but now seemed at fault, 'that is—she has known me—I have attended her all the winter—she—'

"'She has given you all her confidence, and seems oddly unwilling to bestow a grain upon me,' said I, a little piqued. 'Not that I wish to know anything she is desirous of concealing from me, but I had taken an interest—a fancy—the French tongue always goes to my heart;' and here I know I faltered. Then recovering my composure with an effort, I added, 'I shall not frighten her with any more questions, Dr. Staynes. Pray tell her so. Poor thing!' and here I regained the temper I had for a moment lost," (which I don't believe, mind, for Miss Mary never lost her temper).

"'Poor thing!—if she ever wants a woman's counsel, or sympathy, she will always find it if she comes here—tell her that too.'

“Will you have another dish of tea, or some strawberries and cream?”

“Looking up with moist eyes, for a great many feelings and memories were in my heart, I was astonished to see that the Doctor's were full of a strange trouble of some sort, and they were misty without doubt, and yearning, and altogether unlike Dr. Staynes's usual eyes, so unlike indeed, that I sat and stared at him in bewilderment. I was still further astonished when, taking no heed of my question about the strawberries, he got up, and said in an agitated way, ‘God bless you, madam! I will tell her, but a wife is not so much in need of a woman's help as a spinster, and Mademoiselle Rose will be my wife before a fortnight is over her head.’

“Then he sat down, blew his nose, and looked himself again.

“Amazement took away my speech for a full minute. You know the Doctor's age, nearly forty I should say, the grave, professional way he has with him, and his somewhat dry talk and manner; it all takes away any idea of love or marriage in connection with him, and yet here he was talking quite rationally of his marriage with Mademoiselle Rose in a week as a matter of course. It really took away my breath. Mademoiselle Rose, the French milliner—no, not the milliner, but the French woman, and Dr. Staynes, the sensible, downright, sober English parish doctor! Well, after my thoughts had run wild for a full minute, I should say, I recovered myself sufficiently to utter a few civil words. I don't know what they were. Commonplace and cold enough, no doubt, but I felt as if I were in a dream, and as I caught his eye, I broke off ashamed of myself, got up, and held out my hand.

“Forgive me, Doctor, I was too much surprised when you first spoke to express my feelings. I esteem you so much that I feel it incumbent upon me to go to Mademoiselle Rose to-morrow, and wish her joy.”

“But the Doctor looked troubled again as I spoke, and he did not smile, as I intended he should. On the contrary, his lips trembled a little, as he said, his eyes still fixed on me with a curious mixture of expressions in them of dread and defiance.

“I may as well tell you that she has another name. The name by which I shall marry her is Rose Josephine Salterre.”

“I don't know,” said Miss Mary, as she got thus far in her narrative. “I don't know what prompted me, at that distance of time, to burst out weeping at the sudden sound of that name, but so it was. My poor dear lamb! My beautiful, patient sister!” said she, weeping again, “how could I help it?”

“The Doctor, poor man, did not know what to say or do, so he very wisely said and did nothing. He let me cry. But I did not cry longer than I could help; and when I was quite calm, he got up and bowed as if he were going away.

“I felt too shaken to say much, but there was one question among the many I wished to ask, which I felt must be answered before he left me.

“‘What relation—,’ I began, and he did not oblige me to finish it.

“‘A cousin,’ he replied. ‘Old Monsieur Salterre had a brother. Rose is his daughter.’

“‘Ah,’ I said, ‘she spoke now and then of her cousins.’

“‘One word, madam,’ said the Doctor, ‘may I or may she come to you to-morrow, and tell you anything you wish to know?’

“‘Yes,’ I replied, ‘that will be best. I own I do not feel equal to much conversation now. I am so surprised—so startled—’

“I held out my hand. The Doctor, as he took it, looked wistfully at me, with a look I could not understand at the time, and then he said ‘good-bye,’ and went.

“It occurred to me afterwards, that he must have waited for my felicitations, and that I had failed in common courtesy and kindness in not giving them, and I resolved to make due amends on the morrow.

“The next morning I sent Nelly to play instead of keeping her to her lessons as usual, for I felt unsettled, and I could not know for certain when Mademoiselle Rose, or Dr. Staynes, or both might arrive.

“I began to employ myself in a hundred ways, and left them all, and was preparing myself for the twentieth time at least to read, when Mademoiselle Rose passed the window—alone.

“I was very glad that she was alone, and when she entered the room, with a timid, slow step, instead of her usual brisk one, and I saw that her eyes began to fill, my heart warmed to her for her own sake, as well as for the sake of her name; though she was as unlike my Aimée as it was possible to be. I held out both my hands.

“‘Mademoiselle Rose Salterre,’ I said, and the little woman impulsively caught one of my hands and kissed it.

“‘Ah!’ she cried, ‘and mademoiselle is not angry? Dr. Staynes said you would be this morning, when you had had time to think. But I said you looked too good.’

“‘Angry! why, and with whom?’ I asked.

“‘With him and me,’ said Mademoiselle Rose with a little smile; ‘but there—he will talk of mésalliances, and I, who am I? A poor little French dressmaker!’

“I began to see what she meant now. The Doctor had thought that if her real name was known to me, I or my family should object to her marrying a man who was so lowly born, as we knew him to be, and should perhaps persuade her against it, with her ignorance of English ways and manners. He fancied, foolish man, that my brother would dislike such a connexion; and he had wrought his fears into her. I call him foolish, but I do not know on reflection but what he had sufficient grounds to go upon, after what he must have heard from her about bygone times.” And Miss Mary gave one of her heavy sighs of long ago.

“I thought of all this,” Miss Mary said, “or it would be truer to say that it flashed through my mind; and then I looked at the little figure before me, with the eager French face, and the quaintly simple dress, and I said—

“‘My dear, Dr. Staynes is greatly mistaken. You are no doubt above him in birth, but he is a generous, high-minded man, and should have known us better.’

“‘Thanks, thanks, mademoiselle!’ cried the little woman tearfully. ‘I love to hear you say so; you have taken such a load from my heart;’ and she made a pretty gesture with her hands of flinging something away. And then I made her sit down, and got her to tell me all I wanted to know. The substance of it was that Monsieur Ignace Salterre, brother to my poor sister’s father, had lived in the provinces, after his wife’s death, with his two daughters, Rose and Antoinette, who was eleven years younger. The family lived in comfort, but not in luxury, like the Parisian hawker, and there had never been much intercourse between the two, though there seems to have been a strong sentiment of admiration and affection on the part of Rose for her beautiful cousin. Her marriage to Herbert, my father’s anger, and her subsequent death, made a very painful impression upon them, and naturally enough deepened Monsieur Salterre’s feelings of dislike to intercourse with English people. When his brother’s failure took place he was involved in the common ruin. He was proud with the pride of a weak mind, that could not stand up against misfortune. A sudden illness prostrated him, and he died in a week from the day when the news from Paris arrived. Rose, like many women who until they are tried display no particularly heroic qualities, proved a heroine now in the real sense of the word, with courage and wit, and readiness to act, which came out unwittingly in her way of telling her story.

“Antoinette was only fourteen, and had been the pet of her father and the light of her sister’s eyes. She was quite a child, and Rose felt that she must part from her for a time in order to carry her own plan into execution. This was to go to England as she knew many others had done, to make money there by the only talent she possessed, that of needlework, to form a home for her sister, and then when that home, however humble, was secured, to return to France and fetch her. The terrible part of the scheme to her was, not the voyage to England, nor the uncertainty as to what she might be exposed to when she got there—but the parting from Antoinette. It had to be done, however, and it softened the blow to the poor girl that she was able to leave her with an old friend of her father, who, though strict and rigid in her notions, and not likely to be indulgent, was kind and pious, and interested in both the girls.

“Antoinette provided for, and the lamentable parting over, Mademoiselle Salterre wrote to her uncle to tell him of her intention. She conceived that this step was all that was necessary, and, aware that he would object greatly to what she was doing, she awaited no reply, but started for England immediately. She told me very little about her first experiences, which must, I suspect, have been bitter enough. She went to London, and contracted a great dislike to it. Her health failed, and the doctor she consulted told her that she ought to live in country air if possible. She knew, of course, our name, and had heard also in what part of England we lived, and she made up her mind at once to go there. She had three reasons for this rather rash resolve. The first was that she wanted to see the only place in England which possessed a living interest for her; secondly, her ignorance. The country, to a French girl, means a good-sized town, with a promenade, and plenty of well-dressed people. She fancied that, in such a place, she should get full employment, and pass unnoticed. Thirdly, she had heard of me. She knew that I was the only one of my family who had been in the secret of Herbert’s marriage, and she said that she had a dim hope of some day seeing me, and thanking me. Her dismay was great when she saw the place she had come to, but there was no help for it. She could not afford a second move, and so she settled herself down in the dull country village, just as autumn was fading into winter. She refused no work, however rough and coarse; never complained, and hid in her own breast all the disappointment she must have suffered. Poor thing! I could see that that first month had been very, very hard to bear. From the moment, however, that she made the acquaintance of Dr. Staynes, her lot brightened. She consulted him first about her cough, with a great dread of the expense such a step might bring with it; and when he repeated his visits, and continued to prescribe for her, she fairly told him that she could not afford a bill, and therefore must decline seeing him any more. She said that he stared with astonishment (I had not believed the Doctor could be such a Jesuit!), and asked her if it were possible she did not know that his first visit only was a professional one, and that the rest were perfectly voluntary on his part, and, as such, had nothing to do with money. What with her ignorance of English habits and of the English language, Mademoiselle Rose was easily deceived; and so the acquaintance grew, and deepened into something more than acquaintance on both sides.

"I asked her, when she got so far, why the Doctor, who knew me well, had not told me about her, and why he had seemed so reluctant to mention her name when I asked him about her. She coloured deeply at my question.

"'I did not wish it at first,' she said; 'how could I know you would be so good? I concealed my name, for I could not bear to think that you should fancy I came here to be helped by any of your family. You would have done the same in my place, mademoiselle.'

"I owned that I should.

"'But,' she went on, 'after I had seen you two or three times, and heard about you from Mrs. Williams, and when he asked me to marry him, then I wished you to know. The idea of keeping up a secret was painful to me, for I felt I wanted no help then, and my motives could not be called in question. But he objected.' And she stopped, colouring again still more deeply.

"'He thought I—my brother would object,' said I. 'I understood that; but we had no right.'

"'That was not all, mademoiselle,' said Rose. 'I will tell you now, though you will smile.'

"And her simple narration of the jealousy of the Doctor, and of his wish to keep his newly-found possession to himself, and his dislike of her getting known and talked of, nearly did make me smile, though I kept grave, for fear of hurting the feelings of this good Rose."

I felt as Miss Mary did, and I was glad to think that Dr. Staynes was going to be so happy, and Mademoiselle Rose too, and I said so.

"And now," said she to me with tearful eyes, "I must try and do what I can to atone. One member of that family, at least, must——" She broke off. "We must contrive to make the wedding as bright and festive a one as we can. They had thought of stealing off, as it were, to Freysham (the village on the coast where the poor French lady died) to be married. But it must be here. We must show that we heartily approve the match. I wish I could transport that poor little sister over from France; but that is out of the question, so Nelly must be bridesmaid. She shall help you and me to dress the church with flowers, and she shall give the bride a posy. I will write to my brother, and he shall send her a wedding gift."

She looked so bright and young as she spoke, that I felt more strongly than usual how completely she lived for the sake of other people, and said so to her, for which she rebuked me.

Well, the wedding-day came, and went, and the old church which stood close to the Hall was dressed with flowers, and the churchyard path strewn with lilies, and the Doctor and his wife, the former very quiet and grave, the latter beaming in her lilac-coloured silk and white bonnet, came and had breakfast and bride-cake at the manor.

Just before they started for their wedding trip Miss Mary presented Mr. Herbert's wedding gift of a silver teapot and cream ewer, and when they came back at the end of a fortnight she had furnished the little drawing-room for them, as her own present to them both. There they lived very happily for many years. They never had any children; but Antoinette came to live with them after a time, and a winning little creature she was.

She married a Frenchman afterwards, and went back to her own country.

The Doctor died before his wife, and she went to live with Antoinette in her turn; but I thing she got so fond of England, that it was a pang to her to leave it. What wonder, when the happiest part of her life was spent here, and she left behind her her husband's grave!"

SORROW AND SIGHING.

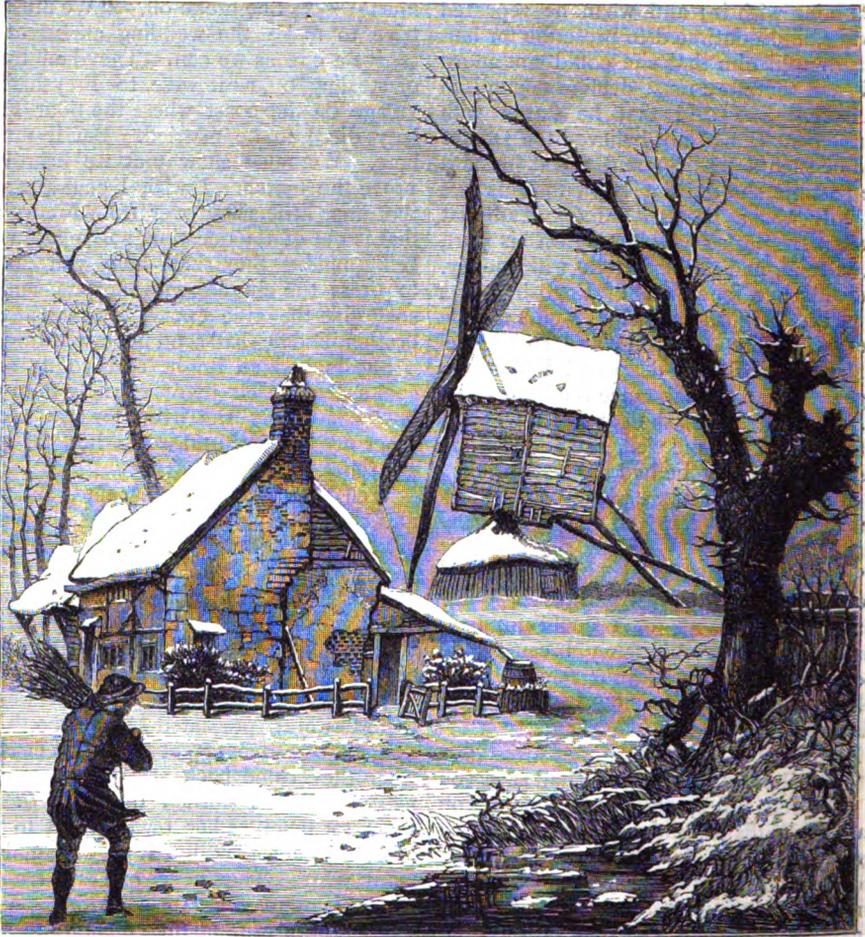

"Sorrow and sighing shall flee away."

I.

THE morn was breaking, the day was fair,
 And heavy with fragrance the dewy air,
 Yet on many a brow were the lines of care.
 But what do the voices of nature say?
 "At length shall dawn a more radiant day,
 And 'sorrow and sighing shall flee away.'"

II.

'Tis winter, and over the hardened snow
 Coldly the bitter north winds blow ;
 Each streamlet and river has ceased to flow :
 Yet a robin is perched on the evergreen spray,
 Singing clearly all through the dreary day,
 "Sorrow and sighing shall flee away."

III.

Now tempest the morning ushereth in,
 And clouds fly o'er us on threatening wing,
 Oh, are there no voices still left to sing?
 Look at that rent, where a single ray
 Through the storm-cloud pierces its lonely way,
 Saying, "Sorrow and sighing shall flee away."

IV.

In every clime is the hopeful strain,—
 For ever repeated again and again ;
 And we can but listen, it sounds so plain ;
 We'll join the chorus, as well we may ;
 With singing we'll welcome the glorious day,
 When "sorrow and sighing shall flee away."

MAT COPPINGER'S LESSON.

I.

ON Christmas-day, 18—, a son and heir was born to Mr. Coppinger, of Marsh Abbots. It was not only a son and heir, but an only child after ten years of marriage. Great were the rejoicings, though they were necessarily subdued as yet, and though they even tended to subdue the festivities of the season both in the dining-room and the servants' hall. Mrs. Deer, the portly house-keeper, said she did not care a "pickle," though the forfeits and snap-dragon were curtailed, now that there was a young master, at whose coming of age she would still hope to carry the keys of the store-room and linen-presses of Marsh Abbots.

Mr. Coppinger himself, an extremely reserved man, became almost demonstrative in the expression of his happiness.

"It is the best Christmas gift I ever got," he said to his unmarried sister, who resided with her brother and his wife at Marsh Abbots.

"I hope it will be a gift to more than you, George, considering the day on which our child has been born," answered Nunks Coppinger. She had been familiarly called Nunks, not only because her proper name was Unton, but because she was a name-daughter and remote descendant of the very Unton who, becoming the wife of a popular statesman of his day, was termed Nunks by him, in heavy playfulness, in the letters which have since passed into national property.

"I trust little Mat—he'll be named for our father, Nunks—will do no discredit to his name and antecedents," said Mr. Coppinger, with a shade of dryness. He held that his sister, Nunks, though an excellent person, like most single women of her style, zealous over-much in good works.

It was characteristic that Mr. Coppinger called his son "little Mat" within an hour of his birth, while Mrs. Coppinger clung to the fondling word "baby" after the child was a sturdy little fellow, running about, and progressing from petticoats to knicker-bockers. But one reason for the mother's habit was, that as Mat had no predecessor, so he had no successor of his own generation.

The frosty, starry night closed in on the new, blessed element vouchsafed to what had been the somewhat stagnant peace and prosperity of the childless house.

The use and wont revels which had followed on the morning's attendance at church, received compensation for the cautious "hush!" whenever the mirth threatened to grow fast and furious, by the permission to drink the young squire's health in a special bumper, and by the announcement that Mr. Coppinger, in addition to his express bounty to the poor on the occasion, was to allow a "thundering" donation to the ringers, who had, in spite of the holiday, made known the late event to an interested neighbourhood.

Mr. Coppinger lingered over his coffee in the solitude of his dining-room, not caring to break the solitude by repairing to the drawing-room to the society of his sister. Already he had withdrawn into himself with his dreams and schemes, and at that moment he was better company for himself than any other mortal could have been for him.

Little Mat would carry on the old name, and win for it fresh distinction. In his mind's eye Mr. Coppinger did not see the pink morsel whose long flowing robes were so out of proportion to the small bit of humanity which they surrounded and set off; but a chubby boy learning to ride, an active lad the captain of the cricket-field, a thoughtful young man, possibly a double first at Oxford, a more or less distinguished member of the Bar, with a seat in Parliament as a further stepping-stone to his rising ambition—a seat provided by the influence and wealth possessed by Mr. Coppinger, not as the squire of Marsh Abbots alone, but as the proprietor of West Indian estates which had been in the family for three generations.

All that Mr. Coppinger had ever in his secret soul imagined that he himself might be, but had not been, except in a lame and impotent manner, he saw his late-given son and heir triumphantly achieving.

If Mr. Coppinger's views were in the least degree shared by his household, no wonder that in the spacious room overhead the great object of attention and admiration was not the glad, pale mother among her lace, cambric, and damask, but the unconscious infant with winking, unseeing eyes and ungrasping hands.

The mother was the first in bestowing the homage. "My baby, my beautiful baby," the weak voice kept repeating. "Are you sure he is all right, nurse? Is the pillow soft enough for him, and does the curtain shade him sufficiently? I must show him to his father again before I go to sleep for the night."

Miss Coppinger put aside the last of her multiplied Christmas work in the big empty drawing-room, and looked out of the window nearest her on the pure whiteness of the hoar-frost covering the earth below, and on the deep blue of the sky lit up by the stars above, while she listened to the regular footfall of her brother as he paced the dining-room in his happily-mounting fancies—to the muffled movements of the nurse in Mrs. Coppinger's room, to the faint cheerings and rappings of the table from the servants' hall. She thought of the child born in Bethlehem who gave name and meaning to that day, how rude was his cradle, and in what a life of labour and sorrow as the ransom for many, the manger was the first resting-place.

II.

The treatment bestowed on Mat Coppinger during succeeding Christmas-days, and the numerous unmarked days between, took its colour from the treatment bestowed on his first day. From his father he had what discipline he received, his mother gave the chief indulgence, and his aunt Nunks held up before him a higher standard.

Mat was still a lad when his mother died. Her illness was sudden, and by the time he was brought home from school, she was barely able to recognise him and take leave of him. But she roused herself by a great effort, the passion of mother-love swelling at her heart serving her for a stimulant.

"Are you there, my boy? Don't be frightened," she said in her faint voice.

"No, mamma," answered Mat, swallowing a sob manfully; "but oh! ain't you any better?" he questioned wistfully.

"I'll never be better in this world," she answered, with conviction. "I'm going away from you all. Are you sorry to lose me, Mat?" she added quickly, with the human craving for sympathy.

"To be sure I am," replied the bewildered boy, with boyish bluntness. "I would do anything to make you well again; you must get well, mamma."

"No, no, it is not God's will; pray to Him, dear, that we may meet again." Her voice was sinking in exhaustion, and she looked feebly for help to her sister-in-law.

"You bid him be a good man for Christ's sake and yours," prompted Nunks Coppinger, thinking for both mother and son through her own sorrow—above all thinking of Mat's future, how he would never forget this meeting and parting, and that a promise doubly sacred, because given at such a time, might be a help to him in the battle of life.

"Yes, Mat," his mother assented, with all the strength left her.

"Yes, mother," was Mat's subdued pledge.

He was sent out of the room, not loth to be released from a position so strange and trying to him, that his mother might try to sleep—a sleep which proved that of death.

III.

Mat Coppinger took no honours at the university. He had fair abilities, but he did not work hard to win honours. He was not plucked; for just as he stopped short of being a reading man, he stopped short of being a fast man.

Mr. Coppinger had wished his son to study for the Bar, and Mat entered his name and ate his dinners, and then discovered that he had no bent for the law.

Mr. Coppinger became a little more demonstrative over this last contradiction on Mat's part. "Since you are disposed to be content with the modest position of a country gentleman, and find that you have no vocation for anything higher," he wrote to his son a little dryly, "I think that you had better come home at once, and acquaint yourself with country matters—I mean with what may be in justice looked for from you after you fill my place, and with the management of the Marsh Abbots estate, on which your prospects will depend to a greater extent than I had at one time believed, not only from your abandonment of the Bar, but from losses which I am sorry to say have arisen in the Jamaica property. I propose to go out to Rocca myself in about a month. Your residence at Marsh Abbots will be the more desirable because of my absence. You are aware that old Broderip is dead. Griffiths, the new steward, promises fairly, but has hardly had a trial. Even your aunt Nunks is affected by the spirit of change. She has agreed to accompany her old friend, the late vicar's daughter, who has been ordered to Madeira as a last chance for her health."

Mat did not dispute his father's will, though he exercised his Englishman's privilege of grumbling. "What am I to do poking down at Marsh Abbots, when my father and Aunt Nunks are off. Had not he better have remained at home and entrusted me with the West Indian business?" The idea had just struck Mat. He knew very little of the family's West Indian concerns. Neither had he, young man though he was, any very burning curiosity to see how that tropical land lay. His long vacations had included as much travelling north, south, east, and west, from Norway to the Grecian Isles, with a run over to the United States, as would have appeased the wandering hunger of all save an ardent vagabond; but Mat Coppinger's defect was that ease and self-indulgence had robbed him early of ardour.

Marsh Abbots had a great mansion-house of white stone, built in the days when no country house was held complete without pillar and portico. It was set down in its park-like paddock, in an old fen country abounding in sedgy pastures and willowy coppices.

Mat's disgust was like much about him—superficial.

In however fault-finding a spirit, he meant to fulfil his part of the contract which his father had set him. He put his shoulder languidly to the wheel, and warmed a little to his work. Very soon he got into a regular track of occupations and amusements, and was tolerably well occupied and amused.

He rode and walked by degrees over all the acres which were destined to belong to him. He examined crops and live-stock, and tried to settle to his own satisfaction the degree of cultivation which the land was receiving, and whether it would bear more with corresponding remuneration. He looked at every building and bit of fence; he inquired into the drainage. He did not neglect the condition of the tenants and labourers, as their prosperous condition seemed to him essential to the prosperity of the whole concern. He had consultations with the new steward on fresh systems of manure and cropping, on fresh applications of machinery to country operations.

Under the head of amusement Mat took what hunting was left him; he revived his personal interest in the rearing and breaking in of colts and puppies. He even condescended to return to his boyish partiality for poultry, plagued the heart out of his hen-wife by his stringent laws and requirements, and became fanatical on questions of spurs and hackles.

The neighbours were old friends of Mat's family, and he visited them faithfully (though not one of them was particularly congenial to his taste and temper), and his runs up to town were brief and occasional.

He spent an hour or two in the library every morning, and after he had studied the newspaper he took to brushing up his classics better than he had brushed them up in his college. He was musical, and he had his Aunt Nunks's old grand piano replaced by his own cottage piano of the latest and most approved construction, on which he could rattle, dash, or meander, and bring himself into harmony with twilight and moonlight, cloudy gloom and brooding sunshine—while he said that he detested sentiment.

In conclusion, as Mat attended church regularly every Sunday morning, he had the reputation of being an exemplary, irreproachable young fellow. But without the faintest sense of being a hypocrite, though a formalist must needs be a modified hypocrite, Mat had no more idea of taking prayers and lessons to himself, and seeking to act them out in his every-day life, than tens and hundreds of thousands of Christian worshippers of every creed and denomination.

I do not say that no effect was produced on Mat Coppinger by his nominal Christianity. Yet I cannot conceive that a man could be losing his life to save it, whose own profit and pleasure—granting that they were lawfully vested so far—were his single consistent aim. He heard of the world lying in wickedness and misery, and whether he gave thorough credence to the fact or not, he never lifted a finger to deliver the world, unless by helping its material prosperity in pursuing his own. He was a man who knew nothing of repentance, of spiritual struggles, of aspirations which rose high above the world while they held the whole world within their grasp.

IV.

Mat's life at Marsh Abbots, at which he had kicked to begin with, but which he had come in his youth to rejoice in mildly, after the fashion of sated and half-weary young men, was still not so full as to prevent him from hearing with some self-congratulation that the nearest country-house had been taken by an exceptionally desirable tenant.

Mr. Hoare was one of her Majesty's judges, whose reputation had penetrated even to the rural parish of Wrinkleham in which the Wildernesse was situated. Happily for the neighbourhood, the judge had taken a fancy for the only picturesque and the most out of repair and inconvenient dwelling in the parish, which was yet capable of being converted into a temporary home for an accommodating family.

The house was a yellow, red-roofed pile of main buildings and out-buildings, in which gables and stacks of chimneys were conspicuous above a close drapery of ivy and roses. The original situation had been in a hollow between two coppices—the undergrowth of which had been allowed to encroach and tangle till the place was like its name.

Mat Coppinger was not oppressed with want of confidence any more than the mass of his compeers, but he did have a feeling as he was setting out to call on Mr. Hoare, that the distinguished judge might be disposed to treat a young fellow and a country neighbour de haut en bas—either to smile in calm superiority over the notion of such companionship, or to shake off the very idea with privileged irritability. Fortunately for Mat, he found the great man had left his greatness behind him, if he had brought his goodness with him.

When Mat arrived he discovered the greater part of the Hoare family in the glade which served for a lawn, before the house, so engrossed in tossing its crop of hay that they were some moments before they were aware of the presence of a visitor. The judge was there with straw hat and a shooting coat, while his legs were encased in such gaiters as Mat had not seen squires wear in his day. A brown-haired, brown-eyed young lady, who looked like a shepherdess in a pastoral, in her white gown and blue ribands with her rake, came next. There were two little girls still in grey linen frocks; while to help the judge to keep order and get any work done, there was one other man, a well-grown, sedate-looking lad of nineteen, whose sedateness gave way at times to a double abandonment of frolic, as was evident from the manner in which Mat saw the son of the house suddenly turn and, leading the irregular forces, make a dash at the judge with the hay. The next moment the wearer of her Majesty's ermine was enveloped in a cloud of flying grass, which he fought to parry and cast back upon his assailants, while he shouted in as great glee as the youngest, "You shockingly disrespectful children, shame! to take a man at a disadvantage. Fair play, Bill, Katie!"

Everybody stopped, and stared when the servant announced Mat; but nobody was disconcerted, least of all the judge, though being a stout man he had to deliver his greeting pantingly.

"I hope you do not object to horse play, Mr. Coppinger. You see we are abroad for the holidays, and I am afraid we forget ourselves sometimes."

Then Mr. Hoare welcomed Mat with urbanity, and named to him the judge's daughters and son. "Shall we move into the house, or should you prefer to remain with us here? Right," he said with hearty emphasis when Mat decided in favour of the latter suggestion; "we have not such a drawing-room," added the judge, letting his eyes travel admiringly round the space encircled by hazel, hawthorn, and elder bushes. "As for a study, we turn our back upon it for the present—nor have we such a couch," waving Mat to a seat and throwing himself down with a long-drawn sigh of content on the fragrant swathes of grass in the shadow of the half-formed haystack of an earlier crop. "And now, chits," he told the little girls, "go in and see if Lambert cannot send us out luncheon, in which Mr. Coppinger will perhaps join us."

Mr. Hoare entertained Mat with the charm of a gracious bearing and no mean talent for conversation—sitting behind the haystack. But although the host was willing to follow where the guest led, it was plain that Mr. Hoare was inclined to let politics, social science, and town's talk drop into the background, and that the wish of his heart that day, was to give himself up to country interests. Mr. Hoare was as full of the rat hunt which his Scotch terrier Jock had conducted with success the preceding evening, as he might have been expected to show himself in the case of a difficult legal decision.

Mr. Hoare was not singular in taking to the country. Bill betrayed an alarming addition to natural history by an unprovoked inquiry whether Mr. Coppinger had any particular acquaintance with the habits of the ousel. Even the little girls wished their papa to ask Mr. Coppinger whether hedgehogs were very common in the neighbourhood, since they had found one by the edge of the wood, before breakfast. And Jane Hoare, the young lady with the brown eyes, who had also good-humouredly saucy dimples in her fresh cheeks, politely questioned Mat's deprecatory statement that the Hoares had got the only pretty bit of scenery in the parish of Wrinkleham within the broken-down fences of the Wilderness.

"If Mr. Coppinger knew that you make pictures yourself, my dear," said Mr. Hoare, with a comical little bow, "he would probably give more weight to your opinion."

"Papa, it is too bad of you to prejudice Mr. Coppinger against my taste as that of an amateur artist. He'll expect me to make my hand into a telescope and quote Tintoret next," protested Jane, wincing a little.

When Mat was gone, the judge remarked—

"I daresay he is a nice enough young fellow—that neighbour of ours; but he might quite as well have turned up in Piccadilly or at Kensington. Young men are no longer divided into beaux and bucks, in town and country now they are cut after one pattern."

The next time Mat went to the Wilderness he saw Mrs. Hoare, fat, fair for her years, sensible and motherly.

He found his next neighbours so agreeable that he became a frequent visitor at the Wildernesse, for although the judge lamented for his own sake that Mat was not more rustic, still he made Mat cordially welcome, and the friendly mistress was ready to admit to her own genial family circle the young man whose own family circle was broken up for the time. His case might be Bill's one day.

Mat's father wrote home that his business in Jamaica would detain him there for another year; but Miss Coppinger's friend ventured back to England for the summer, so that his Aunt Nunks was able to be at Marsh Abbots for some weeks, a fortunate circumstance which helped to consolidate his friendship with the Hoares. Miss Coppinger took kindly to the whole family, and Mat was able to have them all, ladies as well as gentlemen, over frequently at Marsh Abbots.

v.

Some peculiarities in the Hoare family awoke Mat's attention, and had their influence on him as he grew fond of one and all.

The Hoares, young and old, were whole-hearted in always doing whatever they found to do, whether of work or play, with all their might, and had never any time to get palled. They laughed a little, quite openly, and without ill-nature, at Mat's sprouting laissez aller and boredom. He was prompted to show the Hoares that he could work, whether at hay-building, or thatch-mending, or carpentering; and play, whether at cricket, or croquet, or gipsy teas, or coppice charades, with the best, and so he began to earn the esteem of the juniors of the party at least.

Both Jane and Bill Hoare were incipient artists, and their present house was a stumbling-block to them. They could never give over making desperate attempts to "take" the yellow, red, and green gables, and stacks of chimneys, when they were not "studying" old tree-trunks in the coppices, rickety gates, groups of cows, and flights of birds.

The brother and sister threw as much energy into their pursuit for any three days as would have served Mat Coppinger for three months. Yet Bill would leave off in the very heat of his performance, retire within doors, and remain invisible for a time.

"What is your brother up to?" Mat inquired of Jane, the first time he missed him.

"To his mathematics," answered Jane.

"Is mathematics his hobby also?" Mat cross-questioned.

"I am afraid not," Jane said, shaking her head and laughing. "Bill's hobby is natural history—didn't you know? And after natural history, I think he does not object to moral philosophy. Papa says that is mathematics applied to the mind, so far as it is possible. Both Bill and papa are anxious that he should make progress in mathematics."

"But look here, Miss Hoare; Bill has plenty of time for taking his degree," objected Mat. "Mr. Hoare need not require him to read this summer."

"But the question is not about taking his degree; it is about knowing mathematics," explained Jane. "And papa does not require Bill to read; it is Bill himself who would not omit reading an hour every day."

"He would prefer painting," said Mat.

"To be sure he would, but for that reason he would be careful of neglecting his mathematics; and now I am going to stop also."

"Are you going in to read mathematics?"

"Not to-day; I should only be a hindrance, though 'Bill has taken me beyond the Ass's Bridge—indeed, he has. I am going to see Mrs. Armitstead, at the vicarage."

"Why are you leaving that bush of ivy, which you wished particularly to finish, to go on a visit which I should think would do as well any other time?"

"You are wrong. This is the afternoon when Mrs. Armitstead's class get their sewing lesson, and I promised to help her."

"Just like my aunt Nunks," complained Mat, though he could hardly tell why he was dissatisfied. "She must always have a train of poor folks, old people and children, to break in upon her arrangements. I daresay she has left such a train behind her in Madeira. You ladies seem to get up a kind of female apostleship—particularly in the country."

"But Bill is going to meet the vicar's class of young men to tell them about the ways of the Black Forest, where we were last year," argued Jane; "and in town I am junior secretary, under mamma, to a private little parish relief society. We cannot do much, but we have provided a Home, and we are getting up a crèche, in which Katie and Mat are to be allowed to help."

"I suppose Bill likes to practice holding forth on his travels to our ploughboys and mechanics," suggested Mat, with a little shrug of his shoulders.

"No," she answered, "Bill does not like holding forth, as you call it, one bit. He has not much to say, and he is shy, so it goes altogether against the grain with him."

Mat said no more about Bill, but as he was helping Jane to gather up her brushes, he remarked, apropos of seeing the judge and Mrs. Hoare come out of the house and go for a stroll. "I am glad that Mr. and Mrs. Hoare are such a comfortable-looking couple; it is what seniors should be."

Jane paused for a moment, and then, with a merry twinkle in her eyes, replied, "Yes; and the one reason why they are comfortable is, that papa is one of the hardest-working judges in England, and mamma has energy to spare from her household."

"You must not keep us longer," little Mat Hoare strictly forbade her big brown namesake, when he met her and Katie, in one of the lanes, and after having assisted her to secure the first blackberries, proposed to show her where to find mushrooms.

"And why not, madam? Shouldn't you like to gather mushrooms, or are you afraid they would prove toad-stools?"

"Oh, dear no, if you showed us the right ones; besides, mamma would try them with salt and a silver spoon. It would be great fun—I should just like to surprise papa with a lapful," exclaimed the little girl wistfully. "But we have got to go home and have tea ever so soon"—she hastily pulled herself up—"in time to let other people—Bessie there, and Anne, and Lambert—go to the flower-show at Ford."

"Of course you have," declared Mat, with a tone of profound conviction; "but don't you find it hard to go in even to oblige other people, whether you like it or not?"

"Well, it is a little hard," hesitated Katie, who was shy, like Bill, "at first, but the hardness soon goes off, you know," added the child; "and then to do what we don't like, but what is right, grows best of all."

"You little ascetic!" cried Mat in surprise.

"I don't know what ascetic is," declared outspoken Mat, "but Jane says that it is grand to do right things which we don't like to do, and that though it does not feel nice at first, it will soon feel nice."

"Do you know how it feels?" asked Mat, amused.

"A little," owned the other Mat modestly; "because Katie and I have to go to bed dreadfully early."

"But Mat," amended conscientious Katie, "Jane comes and sits by us, when the pleasant things are going on in the drawing-room, and that makes us ashamed to feel cross."

Mat Coppinger was considerably improved by his intercourse with the Hoares, though his feelings with regard to them were soon far from disinterested. His regard for the family had culminated in an attachment to Jane. If he could get Jane Hoare to think well of him, to listen to him, to marry him, Marsh Abbots would become a new place, and he would be a happy man. He was not without hope, though it was tempered by fear, with regard either to Jane or her family. If he had known it, his best hope lay in the fact that having begun by laughing a little at him, they had seen him amend his error, and owed him that among other debts of gratitude.

It was in favour of Mat's projects, that at the end of the judge's recess, he remained so enamoured of the Wilderness, that he entered into terms with its owner, and took the house for a period of years, intending to repair it so as to prevent its falling to pieces, and to use it for a retreat at Easter and Midsummer.

But Mat did not mean to wait till the season of cuckoos and primroses. Reckoning, without doubt, on his father's approval, he meditated a winter's visit to town where his fate might be settled. With that not very distant prospect before him he was able to bid good-bye to Jane for the present, with a kind of agitated resignation.

"Man proposes and God disposes." Within a fortnight of the Hoares' departure in October, the simplest thing, pregnant with grave issues, happened. Mat Coppinger going out to have a smoke, a look at the stars, and to think of Jane Hoare, forgot the fact that some new wire fencing had been put up between one corner of the lawn and the shrubbery, stumbled, fell, and as it was judged, severely bruised his knee. Six weeks afterwards Mat was still lying on a sofa in his room. The bruise had resolved itself into a serious injury to the knee-joint.

The suffering, to which he was as unused as to the forced inaction, and the uncertainty were a sharp trial to Mat Coppinger.

He did his best to bear it. He was not without solace in the commiseration and good offices of his neighbours, who were even cruelly kind. He could reflect, if there were any comfort in the reflection, that thousands of his fellow-creatures were a vast deal worse off than he was. Yet Mat found his best resources miserable failures.

He had refrained from conveying to his father or his aunt all the consequences of his accident, though he had been thinking a good deal of the former in the leisure of those long days and nights, his thoughts taking this direction—how would Mr. Coppinger like it if he were fated to see his son a sickly cripple, cut off even from the active usefulness and enjoyments of a country gentleman?

Just at this time when Mat's small stock of patience was exhausted, when his heart was sinking, when his wounded spirit was beginning to chafe itself, he was at once roused and stunned by the reception of a telegram conveying the bare intelligence of his father's death.

The next post brought a confirmatory letter with the melancholy details. Mr. Coppinger had been much worried and worsted by defalcations in his property, and by disputes, to which the defalcations led, in the colonial courts. He had finally lost an important case which had to do with the title-deed of the larger portion of his estate.

Before he could recover from the fatigue and anxiety of his attendance in court he had been seized with fever and had sunk from the commencement of the attack to its speedy and fatal termination. Among his papers there had been a few lines written to his son after the decision in court, and now forwarded to Mat, according to Mr. Coppinger's last instructions.

"My dear Mat," the unfinished letter said, "I thought to have saved you not only trouble, but the better part of what was my inheritance, and should have been yours, for you are aware that the income from the estates here was always considerably in excess of that derived from Marsh Abbots. I have failed. You will see all the papers, and learn how. It will behove us to practise economy in time to come at Marsh Abbots, and I am afraid these great losses will trammel you heavily. But no more can be said than—God's will be done. I may say that I have fought the battle stoutly, as far as honesty and honour would let me, till I have lost. I am so thoroughly knocked up that I am not able to write further, and must defer finishing this till to-morrow."

After reading that letter the cry which rung through Mat's heart was no longer, what had he done to be stricken down and marked out for adversity? but what had he ever done for his father, who had willingly borne the brunt of the battle, and when beaten had thought more of Mat's loss than of his own?

Mat had done little save abstain from excesses to which he was not animal or scamp enough to incline. He had disappointed his father over and over again without compunction, not because there was not that in Mat which might have fulfilled so far his father's expectations, but because he would not brace himself, or practise self-restraint enough to accomplish his father's wishes. He had never earned his father's confidence, or done anything to break down the grievous barrier of reserve between them. Yet he had loved his father—Mat never knew how well till now, when he felt what a difference it would make to him to see no more the grey head at the foot of the table, and the quiet face which had looked on at so much as with a silent protest. Had Mat Coppinger possessed his old vigorous health and strength, he might not have sat down long under the contrition and regret which quite as much as sorrow, seized upon him on receipt of these sad news. He might have risen and fled from the reproach and the vain yearning of his thoughts, and from God's dealings with him. It would have been the natural impulse in his love for Jane Hoare, while the fate of that love, hanging in the balance, might have served to distract and engross him still further. But not only were Mat's feet in the stocks for the present, the doctors told him at his own urgent request that all that skill could authoritatively pronounce, was that the mischief in his knee was arrested, and would in all likelihood go no farther, while the injury to his constitution might with care and time be repaired. It would be unwarrantable in them to decline to admit to Mat Coppinger that he was a permanent cripple, and his health much shaken.

On the other hand, had Mat's trifling accident with its disastrous effects been his sole discipline, it is more than probable that he would have lost its lesson. He might have grown sourer and more sullen until he was thoroughly embittered with echoing that arrogant, childish cry which seems to have so evil a charm for one class of sufferers, "What have I done to be so afflicted?" as if the cry had not been answered in the sentence which made the Captain of man's salvation perfect through suffering. Mat was left alone with his sickness and sorrow, and yet he was not alone; for One will come and take up his abode in the honest heart, which humbles itself, to bind up its wounds and break its bonds, to enlarge it indefinitely as well as to bid it go free. Mat looked at the life before him in its gravest aspect and faced the gloom; what could he do else when he had to put the thought of Jane Hoare for his wife out of the question. Impoverished in purse, crippled in person, and in the consideration of such a mere walking gentleman of social life as he himself had been, how could he presume any longer to pretend to Jane? What had he to give her in exchange for what she would bring?

The first thing that Mat did was to curtail his household, and shut up a large part of Marsh Abbots, that he might practise the economy which his father had at once gallantly and faithfully projected, live in proportion to his narrowed income, and put the disgrace of debt as far behind him as when he was a rich man. When he was so far recovered as to limp abroad, he went to church, where he filled his father's place in the squire's pew. And the place suited the look with which sickness and loss—and something more than sickness and loss—had matured Mat Coppinger's face.

Christmas was approaching, and though Mat was doing well, both bodily and spiritually—though he had thriven as every true man and woman may, under rough buffeting, thrive by God's grace, and was growing up gradually into his full mental and moral stature, there was much depression to him in the season. It ought to have been one of rejoicing, and if life had gone differently with him, the month would have seen him up in London—it might have been free as another son in the Hoares' house. He must resign all such pleasant visions, and resign them as heroically and cheerfully as a Christian man is bound to resign his dearest wish.

But Mat's heart leapt up with gratitude for one mercy vouchsafed him, when one night, sitting in the twilight before dinner, he heard a carriage drive up to the door, and the next moment recognised the voice of his Aunt Nunks. "Mat, Mat!" was all she said for a space, as she kissed him; but he knew that in these two words were included the exclamation, "How much has passed since we parted, and has it come to this with you, my dear lad!" The next minute she was sitting without her bonnet, quietly telling him that she had returned for good, and that she would have set off within the hour she had heard that his illness was serious—the same that had brought the tidings of his dear father's death—but she had been compelled to remain to do the last duties to her friend, who had then been on her death-bed.

One incident more was to happen to Mat Coppinger before Christmas. It was hearing the announcement that the Hoares were coming down to sing their Christmas hymn among the Wildernesse holly in Wrinkleham Church. The judge had taken care that the roof of the Wildernesse was made snow-tight before he left it.

Mat was dubious whether this intelligence did not mock him with a temporary gain, only to undo him with a lasting injury. But he took the good provided for him thankfully, and after he had been once or twice with the Hoares, joyfully.

No doubt the natural man of the judge had recoiled a little, at first, from his Jane's having anything to do with an encumbered estate and an invalided man; but did not he, as well as his family, hear how Mat Coppinger had borne his troubles, and in what spirit he had come out of them? The Hoares could see how the man was grown in the better part of him, to how much higher a stature he had reached, and was still tending.

Mat was made as free as a son of the house. The judge had never been half so kind, or Mrs. Hoare half so motherly. As for Jane, she was brought face to face with the scars which her former carpet knight had carried out of the fight, and she was soft and sweet, as well as frank and gay, in a way which Mat might be pardoned for regarding as perfection.

On Christmas-eve "a rainy cloud possessed the earth," but to Mat Coppinger it was the tranquil subsiding of the winter's storms ere the world passed anew into the spring sunshine. He could hear swelling roots and bursting buds in that rain, and his Aunt Nunks had been gathering this year's Christmas roses to mix them with the ever-greens in her great jars. Mat had been unfolding to his aunt his plans for retrenchment, and of making the best of Marsh Abbots: he had been calculating with her how much he could spare for the old accustomed charities of the house. She had been reminding him that Christmas-day was his birthday, and repeating his father's words when he had got the best Christmas gift which he had ever received.

"I am not the fellow I once was," Mat had declared, "and probably never will be again in body and estate; though, please God, I shall be a wiser, if a sadder man. It is little that we can do at our best; but if I had given of my best!" he lamented aloud.

"It would have been more to your own credit and satisfaction, Mat," his aunt had acknowledged; "but He who made the stars behind that rain-cloud has but little need of you or me, after all. Do you not think that He can afford to be magnanimous in his fulness? After that gift which He gave nearly two thousand years ago to all mankind on the first Christmas-day that the world ever saw, He has not left us much room for lamentation even over our own lamentable shortcomings. Don't you remember, Mat, the gracious doggrel of the only Christmas hymn which you heartily took to as a boy?—

"God rest you, merry gentlemen,
Let nothing you dismay;
For Jesus Christ the Saviour
Was born on Christmas-day."
