MEMOIRS AND TRIALS OF THE POLITICAL MARTYRS OF SCOTLAND;* PERSECUTED DURING THE YEARS 1793-4-5.

Does any one require to be told who formed the illustrious band of patriots now familiarly termed THE SCOTTISH POLITICAL MARTYRS? The most eminent of them—those who can never be forgotten—were THOMAS MUIR, WILLIAM SKIRVING, THOMAS FYSHE PALMER, JOSEPH GERRALD, and MAURICE MARGAROT.

We do not imagine that any one of them is quite forgotten. The blood of the martyrs of the human race is the nurture of the tree of liberty. It is never spilt in vain. If history were silent concerning these illustrious men, tradition would in some sort keep alive and consecrate their memory. But one generation passeth away, and another cometh; and, amidst the struggles of life and the bustle and excitement of contemporary events, everything is swept into temporary oblivion. Even the youngest Reformers may have some vague knowledge that there were such men; and of what they did and suffered in the same cause for which the Reformers are still striving. Yet we consider the present publication peculiarly useful and well-timed. It is not alone due to their memory to keep their principles and their glorious testimony to truth in remembrance; but we consider that no better service could be performed to the cause of civil liberty, than setting before the world the example of that devotedness which they carried even unto death.

That blackest page in the recent annals of the Criminal Court of Scotland, which records their fate, also merits being exposed in the broadest light, were it only to shew the rancorous nature of Toryism, and its tendency to pervert justice, to corrupt the seat of judgment, and to convert those who should be the guardians and protectors of life and property into the vindictive and odious instruments of arbitrary power. At the present moment, we have another motive for calling attention to this subject, and for attempting to revive the memory of the Political Martyrs. We understand that Mr Hume, with the patriotic zeal and sound judgment which marks all his public conduct, is desirous that there should be some public and national demonstration of the deep gratitude and respect which the people of the United Kingdom feel for the memory of those noble benefactors and sufferers—those heralds of the bright day that, at last, is breaking upon us, and of which, even in the darkest eclipse, they never despaired. —If we be true to ourselves, and faithful to their principles, we shall reap those blessings the distant hope of which cheered and consoled them in exile, and sustained them in death.

Shortly before Gerrald expired, he said to those who stood by his bedside, "I DIE IN THE BEST OF CAUSES; AND I DIE, AS YOU ARE MY WITNESSES, WITHOUT REPINING." On his tombstone at Farm Cove, near Port Jackson, it is recorded, that "He died a martyr to the liberties of his country, in the 36th year of his age."

The final words of Skirving to judges predetermined to condemn him, (for we fancy no one will now dispute this,) were—"My Lords, I know that what has been done these two days will be re-judged: that is my comfort, and all my hope."

The words of Muir, in his address to his jury, were yet more remarkable:—"IT IS A GOOD CAUSE. IT SHALL ULTIMATELY PREVAIL—IT SHALL FINALLY TRIUMPH." And shall we leave to neglect the memory of any one of those to whom we greatly owe this coming triumph? Thousands upon thousands, we are satisfied, will warmly reciprocate Mr Hume's feelings, and vie with each other in giving effect to his wise and generous purpose. And is it not true wisdom that those who have faithfully served the People, whether they be alive or dead, should not lack due reward and homage?

Among the numerous banners which graced the Reform Procession of the metropolis of Scotland, there was one emblazoned, "TO THE MEMORY OF THE MARTYRS OF 1793–4, MUIR, SKIRVING, GERRALD;" and no one ensign, we are confident, was looked upon with deeper veneration—not even those which bore the names of Russell, Grey, and Brougham. This brief and passing show is, we imagine, all the public tribute which has yet been paid to those true patriots, in the servile city which formed the scene of their persecution, and which is adorned, or disgraced—at the reader's pleasure—with statues of Henry Dundas and William Pitt. We hope to see this national reproach wiped away, and some solemn public demonstration made of the respect felt for their courageous services to the people.

To a monument, or an enduring memorial of some kind, we should not object; yet that signifies comparatively little—

Not marble, nor the gilded monuments of princes, Shall outlive the lofty tale—

recorded in the small publication before us. The true atonement would be, for Parliament still to express a strong opinion of the horrible injustice by which these devoted men were sacrificed, through the violated forms of law, in order that the progress of Reform might be arrested, and Tory supremacy more firmly established. Their trials were indecent mockeries of the very forms of justice. Their punishment filled all that were free in Europe with indignation and alarm. Even in these, the lowest times of Scotland's political prostration, the disgust of the people could not be repressed. An attempt was made in Parliament at the time to obtain inquiry in order to a reversal of the sentence of Muir, or some atonement for injustice, some apology to outraged freedom, for the iniquity perpetrated by the tribunals of Scotland; but in vain! In the Upper House of Parliament, Earl Stanhope, a man who, by his genius and public virtue, was an honour to the peerage, formed a glorious minority of one. A vigorous effort was made by the small Whig minority—then dwindled away (as, in times of trial, all mere Whig minorities will, it is to be feared, dwindle away) by the apostacy of Burke, and by either the real idiot-alarm or affected fears of the alarmists. Sheridan said that these trials in Scotland—"the transporting a man like a felon for fourteen years for lending a book—would be enough to raise the people of this country in rebellion. If Ministers attempted to make the law of Scotland the law of England, (but they dared not,) they would find it a sufficient crime to forfeit their heads."

"They charge us," said Mr Sheridan, "with making a party question of this, when we ought to have applied to the fountain of mercy." I know what mercy was shewn them before we made any question on the subject. I speak with some information: I have seen those unfortunate victims—I have visited them in those loathsome hulks, where they were confined among common felons, not indeed with irons upon them, but with irons recently taken off, separated from each other, deprived of the comfort of conversing, and that on a pretence that there was danger of sedition in this society—that two imprisoned men could create an insurrection.—I saw these gentlemen, and I boast of it; for whatever may be the feelings of some, I shall always be proud to countenance whomsoever I conceive to be suffering under oppression."

Fox, in seconding Mr Adam's motion upon this subject, made a speech full of feeling and indignant eloquence. Of the trial of Muir he "maintained that the whole of the proceedings were disgusting and monstrous to every lover of justice and humanity."

If ever this affair should again be brought under the consideration of Parliament, the debate of March 10, 1794, should be previously perused by all the members of the House who wish to give an honest vote. We trust that the most ultra of English Tories would now shrink from such pollution of the sources of justice. Mr Adam—who made the motion for inquiry, or that the records of the Court of Justiciary upon the trial of Muir should be laid upon the table of the House, and who is now the venerable Lord High Commissioner of the Scottish Jury Court—could, at no time of his life, be accused of violent Liberalism. Yet he spoke in a strain which, save for his privilege of Parliament, would have entitled him to a place in the hulks with the political felons, had ill-fortune sent him before Scottish judges, and a Goldsmiths'-Hall jury! "Good God!" said Mr Adam, "what must be the feelings of mankind on seeing so little regard paid to the decency of justice, and the fate of a fellow-creature! The men who declared Mr Muir to be seditious, and who had acted so far against him as to exclude him a society, were yet held to be fair jurors! The treatment in regard to the witnesses was equally hostile to all justice. John Russell, a witness for the defendant, was sentenced to three weeks of imprisonment, because, at the very commencement of his examination, he had not been able to mention the names of the persons who had spoken to him on the subject of the trial. Another witness, William Muir, who, from motives of conscience, hesitated at taking an oath, was ordered to be imprisoned for ever! It was monstrous! It was impossible to speak of such an act without horror! Now, after this sort of trial, they were to consider the most material part of the whole proceeding—the discretion of the court in the sentence which they passed on the prisoner."

The world has not forgotten that cruel and iniquitous sentence, nor the untimely fate of the illustrious victims. And it ought to be remembered that Botany Bay is now a comparative Paradise to the penal colony then in its miserable infancy:—to then the harbour of the off-scourings of British society, and of them alone.

One of Mr Muir's greatest alleged crimes against the state, was lending a copy of Paine's "Rights of Man" to a person who begged a reading of that popular book. "What," said Mr Adam, "would have even been the punishment of Mr Paine himself? He might certainly say that it would have been no more than fine and imprisonment. Such would have been the punishment in England. But in Scotland they sentenced them to the most shocking species of transportation; transportation—not to America, not to a cultivated society, to an easy master, and to kind treatment—but to an inhospitable desert in the extremity of the earth—condemned to live with ruffians, whom the gibbet only had spared, and under a system of despotism rendered necessary for the government of such a tribe! The mind of man, shuddering at a disproportionate sentence, could feel no respect for the administration of justice so strained; and the hand of authority was therefore weakened and palsied by the act. In the exercise of sound discretion it was natural to think that the court would have looked for the guides the most congenial to the feelings of the country. An article in the Union should have guided their discretion; the practice of England should have guided their discretion; unless it was meant that their authority was to be the stalking-horse for extending the same sort of severity to England. They should have remembered that, as the two countries were bound together by political and moral ties, their allegiance was the same, their duties the same."

If Whig lawyers felt thus indignant at the result of those disgraceful trials, what must the Reformers have done—the friends and associates of the victims? For a time, they appeared paralysed. Freedom and hope were condemned in the same moment with Muir and Gerrald. The sufferers alone retained fortitude and magnanimity; they alone held a good and unwavering hope; and now, at the end of forty years, much of the address of the eloquent and accomplished Gerrald to his jury, reads like prophecy fulfilled and daily fulfilling.

Before entering upon the brief narrative which is meant to revive these admirable men in public recollection, preliminary to whatever steps Mr Hume may take to do justice to their memory, we shall beseech the reader's attention to one extract from Gerrald's memorable address to his jury. We think it must bespeak favour for the little we can tell, in our present limits, of the heroic career of the POLITICAL MARTYRS.

"The particular circumstance to which I beg to chain down your attention, is the assertion of the public prosecutor, that, if you were convinced that my intentions were pure, you were bound in duty to pronounce my acquittal. Yes, gentlemen, this is the solid rock of my defence; the purity of the intention by which I was actuated. Could anything but an ardent love of truth, and a desire of promoting the happiness of my fellow-creatures, have induced me to brave the present prosecution, and, by dispelling the mist of prejudices which darkens their understandings, promote the happiness even of my prosecutors themselves? In this glorious though arduous undertaking, by what possible motive of gain or ambition could I have been actuated? Examples have not been wanting of men of whom the world was not worthy, who have fallen victims to an active and zealous virtue; but their fate will never deter firm and well-regulated minds from the performance of that which they will consider as the most sacred of duties, the fulfilment of their engagements to their oppressed and insulted country. These were the sentiments which actuated the conduct of our Common Master when he wept over the city: 'O Jerusalem, Jerusalem! thou that stonest the prophets, and slayest them that are sent unto thee; how often would I have gathered ye, even as the hen gathereth her chickens under her wing, but ye would not!'"

After alluding to the strictly lawful and constitutional objects of the British Convention—to which he had been sent by the London Corresponding Society as a delegate—and to his individual efforts to promote a reform of the representation, Mr Gerrald continued—

"Gentlemen, when I look forward to the political horizon, the prospect seems awful and gloomy to a degree at which the best men must shudder, and which the ablest men must feel themselves incompetent to describe. Everything is turbid and portentous. Indeed, a blacker cloud never hung over this island. Those who are versed in the history of their country, in the history of the human race, must know, that rigorous State prosecutions have always preceded the era of convulsion; and this era, I fear, will be accelerated by the folly and madness of our rulers. If the people are discontented, the proper mode of quieting their discontents is, not by instituting rigorous and sanguinary prosecutions, but by redressing their wrongs and conciliating their affections. Courts of justice, indeed, may be called in to the aid of ministerial vengeance; but if once the purity of their proceedings is suspected, they will cease to be objects of reverence to the nation; they will degenerate into empty and expensive pageantry, and become the partial instruments of vexatious oppression. Whatever may become of me, my principles will last for ever. Individuals may perish; but truth is eternal. The rude blasts of tyranny may blow from every quarter; but freedom is that hardy plant which will survive the tempest, and strike an everlasting root into the most unfavourable soil.

"Gentlemen, I am in your hands. About my life I feel not the slightest anxiety; if it would promote the cause, I would cheerfully make the sacrifice; for, if I perish on an occasion like the present, out of my ashes will arise a flame to consume the tyrants and oppressors of my country.

"Moral light is as irresistible by the mind, as physical by the eye. All attempts to impede its progress are vain. It will roll rapidly along; and as well may tyrants imagine, that by placing their feet upon the earth they can stop its diurnal motion, as that they shall be able, by efforts the most virulent and pertinacious, to extinguish the light of reason and philosophy, which, happily for mankind, is everywhere spreading around us.

"Surely the experience of all ages should have taught our rulers, that persecutions never can efface principles; and that the thunders of the state will prove impotent when wielded against patriotism, innocence, and firmness. Whether, therefore, I shall be permitted to glide gently down the current of life, in the bosom of my native country, among those kindred spirits whose approbation constitutes the great comfort of my being, or whether I be doomed to drag out the remainder of my existence amidst thieves and murderers, a wandering exile on the bleak and melancholy shores of New Holland, my MIND, equal to either fortune, is prepared to meet the destiny that awaits me.

"Seu me tranquilla senectus,
Expectat, seu mors atris circumvolat alis,
Dives, inops, Romae, seu forsitan jusserit.
Exul.

"To be torn a bleeding member from that country which we love, is indeed, upon the first view, painful in the extreme; but all things cease to be painful, when we are supported by the consciousness that we have done our duty to our fellow-creatures; and a wise man, rising superior to all local prejudices, if asked for his country, will turn his eyes from 'this dim spot which men call earth, and will point, like Anaxagoras, to the Heavens.'"*

Thus Gerrald wound up the emphatic prophecy to which his life soon afterwards set the seal. He did not, indeed, perish in open day and upon the scaffold; but, in the language of Fox, the guillotine would have been more merciful than the felons' Bay. The scaffold and the axe had been kindnesses too great for the men left to wither inch by inch in solitary prison cells, in the hulks, and the transport-ships, with all their festering stowage of moral and physical filth and pollution—until death released Joseph Gerrald, and, within three days of his decease, William Skirving.

It is necessary to bestow a very few sentences upon the remarkable epoch and historical events which brought forward these noble spirits.—— The American revolutionary war, that first struggle for liberty maintained by a people for themselves, almost without a government, and certainly without aristocratical or military leaders—the peddling agitation in Scotland for burgh reform—the Irish Volunteer Association—and the example of the apostate Pitt, of Burke, and the Duke of Richmond†—had concurred, during a period of repose and commercial prosperity, to awaken the minds of the people to Reform, and this for seven years previous to the French Revolution. This incipient agitation was especially active in Scotland, where an intelligent and thoughtful population had attained considerable political knowledge and no corresponding degree of political power. The machinery by which Dundas, and his prototypes and successors, managed the humbug of county and corporation representation, and duly sent at least forty members from Scotland—a Dundas Tail, to encumber and cripple all liberal measures in the House of Commons—will hardly now, we suppose, ever again, even in name, be connected with the people of Scotland. A people at peace, and possessing full knowledge of their rights and interests, without any direct and powerful control over their own affairs, is a condition which, of all others, may alarm a bad government. The people of England and Scotland had reached this stage. Ireland was still in a state of strong excitement; and the shock of the French Revolution—the crash of the tumbling walls of the Bastile—of "the King's castle"—shook the old despotisms of Europe to their deepest foundations. In the words of a popular Tory song of the day—and the power and consternation of "the better classe of society," was commensurate to the "madness" of the "swinish multitude." The people formed themselves into societies, to carry out the early principles of Pitt and Burke, and to petition for reform in Parliament, for short Parliaments, and an extension of the franchise; and in Scotland, the societies took the name of "Friends of the People." They met—they made speeches—they got a newspaper—they published addresses, and drew up petitions; but, above all, they acted in concert, and steadily and deliberately pursued their formidable object, until the panic of those who had either profited or hoped to profit by the established system of abuse, became real, and, as we acknowledge, not wholly groundless. Those who had so long "eat of the fat and drunk of the strong," at the expense of the people—whom they appeared to consider born to obedience and for their uses, or as a different race, whose heritage upon earth was toil and submission—were effectually disturbed in their long dream of misrule. The rebellious Americans had been sufficiently alarming; but France was a case still more in point—a living example to which Great Britain and Ireland loudly and enthusiastically responded. The grand discovery was proclaimed throughout Europe, that millions had not been created to be the slaves of one man, and the prey of his minions; and that inviolability and sacredness of life and property were quite compatible with a perfect equality of civil rights and privileges. As the Jeffries of the Scottish political trials remarked—Macqueen, Lord Braxfield, the Lord Justice Clerk of Scotland, a Judge whose brutality on the bench, and disgraceful straining of law for the basest purposes of party, can only be palliated by his furious fanaticism, and, we believe, unfeigned alarm—"were they quietly to let the Friends of the People cut their throats?" This coarse-mannered personage, with whose traditionary sayings we do not choose to disfigure our Radical pages, might not think his own particular weasand in much danger; but his party trembled for what was quite as precious as their throats. Grant the petitions of the Friends of the People, let them once obtain a fair hearing in the House of Commons, and there was imminent danger of the system which had worked so well. Public spirit, in servile, well-bitted Scotland—a love of freedom manifested by the most enthusiastic symptoms—was a new and perilous state of things. The wild, fanatical spirit of the Covenanters had broken forth in fury, after the slumber of above a century, and in a worse shape than at first. In every village and remote hamlet societies of persons "calling themselves Friends of the People," had, by the end of 1793, sprung up; and the People of England and Ireland were, for the first time, in unison with Scotland. The movement was simultaneous, for the impulse was the same.

"The Devil had entered the swine;"

* Milton.

† In the newspaper article of our November number, it was noticed that the excellent and universally respected Montgomery, the poet, had several times suffered a long imprisonment for what, in those evil days, was called libel. One of these punishments—an imprisonment, we think, of eighteen months or two years—was for merely reprinting the Duke of Richmond's Letter. But this was in England. If in Scotland, he must have been transported as a felon.

Among the first and most distinguished of those who caught the generous glow of independence and freedom, was MUIR, then a young and rising advocate at the Scottish bar. He was a native of Glasgow, and the only son of wealthy and respectable parents. From the work before us, we learn, that he had been distinguished at the University, and that, in very early life, he had displayed great firmness and ability upon an occasion when the Professors chose to punish one of their number—Mr Anderson, the Professor of Natural Philosophy, and the founder of the noble Institution which bears his name—because he not only avowed Liberal principles, but ventured to talk of reforms in the immaculate University. Young Muir headed an Andersonian party among the students, harangued them in the college-yard, and drew upon himself the hand of authority. Professor Anderson's party triumphed ultimately; but the young rebel chief did not escape unscathed; and afterwards, instead of studying divinity in Glasgow, which was his original destination, he repaired to Edinburgh to study for the bar.

He had been several years a barrister, and was successful and honourably distinguished in his profession, when the political crisis of 1792 arrived. In Edinburgh, he was active in organizing societies, and, during the recesses of the Court, he was equally so in disseminating political knowledge in Glasgow and the vicinity, by pamphlets and tracts. His talents and eloquence, the affability of his manners, the purity of his life, the general estimation in which he was held in the west of Scotland, but, above all, the contagious influence of his enthusiasm for liberty, rendered Muir a peculiarly dangerous character. An evil eye must have fallen early upon him, and, in point of fact, he was arrested, tried, and condemned long before any other victim had been seized, save Mr Fyshe Palmer. It was Muir who, in the autumn of 1792, drew up the plan of the internal government of affiliated societies for Reform, to be represented in a General Convention, by delegates duly elected. It was he who gave life and energy to the entire movement. The first recorded meeting of Reformers took place in the Star Inn, Glasgow, 30th October 1792. The persons present resolved to form themselves into a permanent society, under the name of

The Associated Friends of the Constitution and of the People.

Lieutenant-Colonel Dalrymple of Fordel was elected President;

Thomas Muir, Esq. younger of Huntershill, Advocate, Vice-President;

George Crawfurd, writer in Glasgow, Secretary.

The following Resolutions were then agreed to:—

RESOLVED, To co-operate with the Association of the Friends of the People in London, in all proper measures to accomplish an equal Representation of the People in Parliament.

RESOLVED, To enter into every legal and constitutional measure to obtain a shorter duration of Parliamentary delegation.

We need not copy the minor resolutions. This was a hopeful beginning; and, on the 11th December, a number of delegates met at Edinburgh. Their meetings were, however, not frequent; and every act of the Convention was strictly and studiously legal, and the language of the discussions temperate and guarded. The chief object was to petition; but the delegates also resolved to co-operate with the Society in London, of which Mr, now Earl Grey, Sir William Jones, Fox, and Whitbread, were leading members, and Sir James Mackintosh secretary. The Scottish delegates likewise exchanged greetings with their brother-Reformers in Ireland, and were even suspected of extending their good-will and courtesies to France. There was increased alarm among the Tories. Several persons of consequence had come as delegates to the Convention. There was Colonel Macleod, a Member of Parliament, who appeared as President; Mr Callander, younger of Craigforth; Colonel Dalrymple of Fordel: Lord Daer, the heir-apparent to the Earldom of Selkirk; Thomas Muir himself; Mr Wild, advocate; Mr Morland, advocate, and many respectable professional persons and dissenting clergymen.* The people of the three kingdoms were combining for the

* Two reverend members of this national assembly were sent from Dundee, a town always distinguished for public spirit; and it was in the same town that the Rev. Mr Fyshe Palmer laboured—a man of whom, after his condemnation, Whitbread, in Parliament, said—"That he had the honour (for an honour, in the truest sense of the word he deemed it) to be acquainted with Mr Palmer;" and he paid him many high compliments for understanding and virtue. The Dundee clerical delegates were the Rev. Niel Douglas, minister of the Relief congregation, and Mr Donaldson, who was pastor of a small congregation of Bereans. Among the numerous party squibs of the day—for the Tories tried the effect of ridicule and contempt, as well as sharper weapons—there was a popular song, enumerating the names of the members of the Convention, and stringing them together in what was meant for ludicrous contrast, as—it being alleged that such noisy functionary was actually a member of the Convention. Sir Walter Scott, though he rarely permitted his unhappy early partisanship to appear in his writings, has condescended to repeat this stale joke in one of his novels. It would have been more to the purpose to shew that the said town-drummer, if such a one ever existed, was unworthy of the distinction. The doggrel referred to was attributed to a W.S. named Bain White, an Edinburgh Parliament-House wit of the day. We are tempted to give a specimen, as we have heard the thing attributed to a much higher quarter:—

redress of their grievances, and the reform of political institutions, either corrupted or originally imperfect, and therefore no longer fit for the advanced condition of society.

An address, which is said to have been written by Grattan—though we have no evidence of the fact—was transmitted to the Convention, which we have pleasure in copying over at this distant date, as it is the earliest record of cordiality and co-operation between the Reformers of Scotland and Ireland.

To the British Convention of Reformers, at Edinburgh.

"BROTHER REFORMERS!—We take the liberty of addressing you in the spirit of civic union, in the fellowship of a just and a common cause. We greatly rejoice that the spirit of freedom moves over the face of Scotland—that light seems to break from the chaos of her internal government; and that a country so respectable in her attainments in science, in arts, and in arms; for men of literary eminence; for the intelligence and morality of her people, now acts from a conviction of the union between virtue, letters, and liberty; and now rises to distinction, not by a calm, contented secret wish for a Reform in Parliament, but by openly, actively, and urgently willing it, with the unity and energy of an embodied nation."

This address was written seven years before the Irish Union; but even then the people of Ireland were apprehensive of the impending measure, which they believed was to place their beloved country still more in the power of her hereditary oppressors. The union of the kingdoms, and pensioning the Catholic priesthood, was the favourite Irish policy of Pitt; and was thus justly dreaded by the Irish patriots. Their address, pointing to these views, concluded—"We rejoice that you do not consider yourselves as merged and melted down into another country; but that, in this great national question, you are still Scotland—the land where Buchanan wrote, and Fletcher spoke, and Wallace fought!"

The question was now to be brought to immediate issue, Whether the people were to obtain their rights, or whether by violent coercive measures, the Tory reign might not be protracted, and Reform delayed if it could not be wholly crushed.

The territory of France had by this time been violated by the Allies, and the recreant Bourbon princes; and the Government of Britain was now upon the eve of declaring war against the French Republic, while the People were sending enthusiastic addresses of encouragement to the French Convention. The Government was threatening war to the knife, and the People were fraternizing with "their natural enemy." When we witness the doings of the present enlightened day, we may conceive the panic of the Winchelseas and Rodens of a half century back, at language like the following, addressed by Britons to French Republicans.

"It is not among the least of the Revolutions which time is unfolding to an astonished world, that two nations, nursed by some wretched craft in reciprocal hatred, should so suddenly break their common odious chain, and rush into amity.

"The principle that can produce such an effect, is the offspring of no earthly court; and, whilst it exhibits to us the expensive iniquity of former politics, it enables us, with bold felicity to say, We have done with them!

"In contemplating the political condition of nations we cannot conceive a more diabolical system of government, than that which has hitherto been generally practised over the world: to feed the avarice and gratify the wickedness of ambition, the fraternity of the human race has been destroyed; as if the several nations of the earth had been created by rival gods. Man has not considered man as the work of one Creator.

"The political institutions under which he has lived have been counter to whatever religion he professed.

"Instead of that universal benevolence which the morality of every known religion declares, he has been politically bred to consider his species as his natural enemy, and to describe virtues and vices by a geographical chart."

Here was the New Philosophy with a vengeance! Not another moment was to be lost. Scotland, servile, prostrate Scotland, was chosen as the safest scene of action; and Thomas Muir was selected as the first victim. He was arrested early in January 1793, about a fortnight after the Convention had met, and conveyed to the office of the sheriff for examination. He declined answering many of those preliminary and ensnaring special questions, by which the legal officers of Scotland so often extort matter of accusation against a prisoner out of his own lips. This was an insidious and inquisitorial practice which Muir, as a lawyer and a friend of the rights of the subject, had always denounced. He was liberated on finding bail; and, intrusting his case to Mr James Campbell, a respectable agent in Edinburgh, who was to apprize him the moment his appearance might be required in Scotland, he proceeded to London, where he saw some of the leading members of the Corresponding Society, and thence to Paris, which he reached upon the eve of the execution of the King. That untoward event he deplored exceedingly, especially as it afforded a handle to the knavish prompters of the alarmists at home.

It was no sooner known that Muir was in France, and in favour with "the regicides," than he was indicted to stand trial for the undefined crime of sedition; and, before he could possibly Fie, let us a' to the meeting!

For many things will be said there,
Explainin' the wrongs o' Great Britain,
And pointin' them out to a hair—
And there will be grievances shewn

And there will be things set agoing

For there a' the members hae sworn,
And pledged to each other their word,
That rather than want a reform,
They'll hae it by fire and by sword.

The Tories have found it so. The names were strung together in this style:—

And there will be Laing and George Innes,
The Reverend Neil Douglas, I trow,
Wha rowed frae Dundee in a pinnace,

have returned and prepared for the trial, he was outlawed, and his bail was forfeited.

But, though Muir had been seized, the dogged Reformers would take no warning. The societies increased in numbers, and the cause gained new and zealous adherents by tens of thousands. WILLIAM SKIRVING, who had been the Secretary of the first Convention, was again the Secretary of that which assembled in May 1793; and, although Muir was absent, and though most of the higher order of delegates had, like the London Corresponding Society, taken fright and disappeared, the Reformers were as firm and resolute as ever; and the delegates, if not so high in station, were far more numerous and of at least equal worth. The creatures of power were not idle; and now ensued that foulest period in the modern history of Scotland—the first REIGN of TERROR. The SPY SYSTEM itself was hardly so vile; for it sought to shroud its deformity in darkness, while, at this time, villany stalked abroad in open day, rampant and unabashed. In the previous year, the Societies of the Friends of the People had been met by Tory associations, equivalent to the Orange Societies of Ireland, or the modern Conservative Associations of England. One of these, composed of some respectable Tories, and also of all that was basely subservient, and of all that was cruel, because cowardly, was formed in Edinburgh, under the name of the GOLDSMITHS'-HALL ASSOCIATION; or, familiarly, as the Life-and-Fortune Men, as life and fortune were pledged to the defence of that glorious constitution in Church and State, which had long made Great Britain "the envy of the surrounding nations" The Friends of the People were also the avowed friends of the Constitution—though not of its perversions and corruptions; so they were not disposed silently to permit anybody whatever to arrogate exclusively this name. Accordingly, Muir, Skirving, and some other influential Reformers, enrolled their names at the Goldsmiths' Hall, as evidence of the purity of their designs. These obnoxious names were indignantly erased by the same individuals who, next year, were picked and packed by the judges as their jurors, and retained as such in the face of all the legal objections which the prisoners could urge, and in the face of common equity and common decency. This detestable proceeding was afterwards severely reprobated in Parliament; but what did that signify to the Scottish judges and jurors? The victims were, by that time, safe in the hulks.

From the body who, in expelling Muir and Skirving from their loyal association, as persons unworthy to defend the constitution, had virtually condemned them beforehand, was formed the jury that found them guilty. But what shall we say?—where else but from those loyal and associated bodies could any jury have been found for the purpose?

But we intended briefly to describe the state of society at this dismal period. It was now that, to borrow the powerful language of Ebenezer Elliott, "worms blasphemed the Almighty," in trying to quench the divine spark in the mind of Robert Burns. It was at this time that Muir, by an unhappy fatality, ran himself into the tiger's throat. The impending war, and the embargo laid upon the shipping, had, for some months, suspended all regular intercourse between France and Great Britain. For all this time, his family had heard nothing of him. He was indicted; and they knew the tender mercies of the party who had marked him out. He was, also, to their everlasting honour, expelled from the Faculty of Advocates, and could no longer practise at the Scottish bar. His parents wished that he should withdraw, for a time, to the United States; and letters, clothes, and money had been transmitted to meet him in the country to which he would have been welcomed with the highest honours. Muir was still hardly twenty-eight years of age, and the only son of virtuous and pious parents, who had gloried in the bright promise of his youth, and reposed in him the hopes of their old age.* After considerable difficulty, he appears to have left France in an American vessel that was going to Ireland. He seems to have spent some time among the Reformers of Dublin, and to have communicated with his family through the medium of the American captain, whose vessel was lying at Belfast. The letter of the anxious, tortured father, in reply to those round-about communications, is, in its affectionate simplicity, exceedingly touching. Whatever might be Muir's own purpose in returning to Scotland, his parents earnestly desired that he might not rush upon certain destruction. To the American captain, his kind, unknown correspondent, the elder Muir wrote—"I am at a very great loss how to answer your letter. If it is the friend that I have, if it is he, I shall be overjoyed to see his handwriting, and to know what has become of him these three months. . . . I hope, dear sir, you will shew him every civility in your power, which I hope some day gratefully to thank you for. The loss of this young man has been a dreadful affliction to us. Please shew our friend this letter. I honoured his draft in favour of Mr Massey. He'll get his letters in the post-office of Philadelphia. I hope, in a year or two, he can return, if he do not love America; and be so good as cause him write me one line in your letter. You can direct it."

In the face of this warning, though it is not apparent that he ever received it, Muir ventured to cross over to Scotland, and by the ordinary passage at Portpatrick. He said he came voluntarily home, to face his accusers; and, from the open route he selected, such seems the fact. Besides, who, conscious of entire moral innocence, and of having, in no shape, violated the laws of the country, could be prepared for the horrors of the "Monster Trial" that awaited him?

* It was a scoff in certain circles at the time, that the mother of Muir had dreamed that her son was Lord Chancellor of England! The son of this heart-broken matron became something infinitely greater than an Eldon or a Lyndhurst.

He certainly wished to surrender himself, or he could never have ventured back to Scotland. On landing at Port-Patrick, he was recognised by an understrapper of the custom-house,* who knew his person from having seen him pleading at the bar in Edinburgh, while the informer himself had been a hanger-on in an attorney's office. Muir was an outlaw. He was immediately arrested. On this person lodging information with the sheriff, Muir was lodged in the jail of Stranraer, and afterwards conveyed to Edinburgh jail, by Williamson, a notorious thief-taker and Friend-of-the-people-catcher of those times, together with all his papers. Most of the papers were of no consequence whatever; but there were some "inflammatory" pamphlets, and, among others, one containing a quotation from Milton on the liberty of unlicensed printing. There were also some letters sealed with the cap of liberty, and Muir's certificate of admission into the Society of United Irishmen, signed by Hamilton Rowan, Secretary to the association. All these, and papers more frivolous, were used against him upon his trial.

There was also his passport to America, granted by the French Minister for Foreign Affairs, which we shall copy, as it contains the only description extant, we believe, of the person and features of this "Pest of Scotland," as the Lord Advocate named him.

Permit Citizen Thomas Muir to proceed on his way to Philadelphia, domiciled at Paris, municipality of Paris, department of Paris, native of Scotland, a lawyer, 28 years of age, 5 feet 9 inches high, his hair and eye-lashes of a chestnut colour, blue eyes, aquiline nose, small mouth, round chin, high forehead, long and full face. Send him aid and assistance if in want.

Muir's trial took place on the 30th August 1793. It excited a strong feeling in Scotland,† and, as soon as the result was known, the greatest indignation in England. It was then Englishmen began justly to congratulate themselves that they were not Scots; and that in England, a jury was not another name for an instrument of oppression and injustice. As we consider this first trial to be marked with every bad feature which characterized all those that followed, we must quote a few passages from the report of it before us, though those who would see the lengths to which Toryism is ever prone to go, should peruse its entire proceedings. As a preliminary, however, to Muir's trial, we shall give these detached scenes from those of Margarot, Skirving, and Gerrald. The judges in all the cases were the same, and the juries uniformly elected from the Goldsmiths'-Hall Life-and-Fortune men.

Margarot was his own counsel. The trial had scarcely opened when he said—

"Now, my Lord, comes a very delicate matter indeed. I mean to call upon my Lord Justice Clerk, and I hope that the questions and the answers will be given in the most solemn manner. I have received a piece of information, which I shall lay before the Court, in the course of my questions: First, my Lord, Are you upon oath?"

Lord Justice Clerk.—State your questions, and I will tell you whether I will answer them or not; if they are proper questions, I will answer them.

Q.—Did you dine at Mr Rocheid's, at Inverleith, in the course of last week?

Lord Justice Clerk.—And what have you to do with that, sir?

Q.—Did any conversation take place with regard to my trial.

Lord Justice Clerk.—Go on, sir!

Q.—Did you use these words:—"What should you think of giving him an hundred lashes, together with Botany Bay?" or words to that purpose?

Lord Justice Clerk.—Go on: put your questions, if you have any more.

Q.—Did any person, did a lady say to you, that the people would not allow you to whip him? and, my Lord, did you not say that the mob would be the better for losing a little blood? These are the questions, my Lord, that I wish to put to you, at present, in the presence of the Court: deny them or acknowledge them.

Lord Justice Clerk.—Do you think I should answer questions of that sort, my Lord Henderland?

Lord Henderland.—No, my Lord; they do not relate to this trial.

The rest of the Judges concurred in this opinion; and so the questions, very properly, were not answered!

But we earnestly entreat our readers to turn up to the list of Mr Muir's jurymen, and they will discover this astonishing fact, that James Rocheid of Inverleith, in whose house the Lord Justice Clerk of Scotland was alleged to have made use of the above horrible language, was one of the jurymen selected by his Lordship, and one who actually sat on the trial of Mr Muir!

The same thing occurred, but in a more direct and tangible shape, in the case of Joseph Gerrald, another Reformer, who was also tried before the same Court, about the same period.

When the Court met, Mr Gerrald rose and said—"My Lords, I feel myself under the painful necessity of objecting to the Lord Justice Clerk sitting upon that bench—upon this plea, that his Lordship has deviated from the strict line of his duty, in prejudging that cause in which my fortune and my fame, which is more precious to me than life, are actually concerned. I beg, therefore, that this (holding a paper in his hand) may be made a minute of this Court."

In order to shew that this objection was not made at random, Joseph Gerrald offered to prove that the Lord Justice Clerk had prejudged the cause of every person who had been a member of that assembly calling itself the British Convention: inasmuch as he had asserted, in the house of James Rocheid of Inverleith, "that the mem-

* This person was named Carmichael. He was then commanding the Justice Hulk at Port-Patrick; but he rose and prospered in the public service every day after the arrest of Muir, in spite of the curses both loud and deep which the old Reformers poured upon him.

† A friend of ours, then a child, and bred among the most noted of the Reformers of the period, gives a lively idea of the general state of feeling in Edinburgh, by recording his own notions. The day of the trial, or of the sentence, was thundery and exceedingly dark, and the rain fell in torrents. There was but one topic, one interest—Muir, and the trial: and every one had gone to witness it. A Trial was beyond the comprehension of our friend: but, gazing through the window, he felt that some awful thing was acting by wicked men; that some terrible catastrophe was impending, like the Crucifixion or the Judgment Day, to which the dismal weather bore token, and in which the fate of Muir was somehow involved. Our young friend was only reassured by the sensible reflection, that this could not be the Day of Judgment, as the Jews, for whose conversion his Puritan grandfather regularly petitioned in his family prayer, were not yet converted and "brought in with the fulness of the Gentile nations."

bers of the British Convention deserved transportation for fourteen years, and even public whipping;" and that, when it was objected, by a person present in company, that the people would not patiently endure the inflicting of that punishment upon the members of the British Convention, the said Lord Justice Clerk replied, that the mob would be the better for the spilling of a little blood. I pray that this may be made a minute of the Court. I desire to have the matters alleged, substantiated by evidence."

Lord Eskgrove.—My Lords, This objection, which comes before your Lordships, is a novelty in many respects—and I don't think this pannel, at this bar, is well advised in making it: what could be his motive for it I cannot perceive. He has the happiness of being tried before one of the ablest judges that ever sat in this Court; but he is to do as he thinks fit. I am sure he can obtain no benefit if he gains the end he has in view; and, therefore, I cannot perceive his motive, unless it is an inclination, as far as he can, to throw an indignity upon this Court.—And, after some farther remarks, his Lordship concluded by saying, that he could ascribe the objection to nothing but malevolence and desperation.

Mr Gerrald.—My Lord, I come here not to be the object of personal abuse, but to meet the justice of my country.

Lord Henderland.—I desire you will behave as becomes a man before this High Court. I will not suffer this Court to be insulted.

Mr Gerrald.—My Lord, far be it from me to insult this Court.

Lord Henderland—Be silent, sir.

Mr Gerrald.—My Lord——

Lord Henderland.—I desire you will be silent, sir!

Lord Swinton.—My Lords, an objection of this kind, coming from any other man, I should consider as a very high insult upon the dignity of this Court; but, coming from him, standing in the peculiar situation in which he now stands at the bar, charged with a crime of little less than treason, the insolence of his objection is swallowed up in the atrocity of his crime. It appears to me that there is not the smallest relevancy in this objection.

Lord Dunsinan.—I think your Lordships ought to pay no attention to it, either in one shape or another.

The objection was unanimously disregarded.

On the trial of William Skirving, another Reformer, and, by all accounts, a most amiable man,

The Lord Justice Clerk proceeded to nominate the first five of the Jury, and asked the pannel if he had any objection to them.

Mr Skirving.—I object, in general, to all those who are members of the Goldsmiths' Hall Association; and, in the second place, I would object to all those who hold places under Government, because this is a prosecution by Government against me: and, therefore, I apprehend they cannot with freedom of mind judge in a case where they are materially parties.

Lord Eskgrove.—This gentleman's objection is, that his Jury ought to consist of the Convention of the Friends of the People; that every person wishing to support Government is incapable of passing upon his assize; and, by making this objection, the pannel is avowing that it was their purpose to overturn the Government.

Lord Justice Clerk.—Do any of your Lordships think otherwise? I dare say not.

Objection repelled.

We had almost omitted to state that, in Margarot's trial, the Lord Justice Clerk, first of all, asked the pannel if he had any objection to his jurymen.

Mr Margarot replied—I have no personal objection; but I must beg to know by what law you have the picking of the Jury, and that you alone have the picking of them?

Lord Abercromlie.—His Lordship is not picking, but naming the Jury, according to the established law, and the established constitution of the country; and the gentleman at the bar has no right to put such a question!

The above, then, is a brief outline of the way in which the whole of these Reformers—the pannels—were treated by the Bench. And we shall now give a few examples of the way in which some of the witnesses were treated, when it was found they did not answer the purposes of the prosecution.

James Calder sworn.

Lord Henderland.—What is your trade?

A.—I have no trade.

Lord Eskgrove.—If you have no trade, how do you live?

A.—I am neither a placeman nor pensioner.

Lord Justice Clerk.—(Turning himself to the Judges.) What do you think of that, my Lords?

Lord Henderland.—What do you call yourself?

A.—A Friend of the People.

Q.—You don't live by that; you must have some occupation?

A.—I am maintained by my father, Donald Calder, merchant in Cromarty.*

Lord Justice Clerk.—Ho! my Lords, he was sent up to the British Convention.

Witness.—No, my Lords, I was not.

Lord Advocate.—I understand he is a student at the University.

A.—Yes: I am.

Alexander Aitchesom sworn.†

Lord Justice Clerk.—You are not come here to give dissertations either on the one side or the other. You are to answer to facts according to the best of your recollection; and, according to the great oath you have taken, answer the facts that are asked of you.

A.—My Lord, I wish to pay all due respect to your Lordship and this Court; but I consider myself as in the presence not only of your Lordship, but also as in the presence of the King of kings and Lord of lords; and, therefore, as bound by my oath, to say everything that I can consistently with truth, to exculpate this pannel who, I am sure, is an innocent man.

Mr Solicitor General.—Many things you have now said, will, in my opinion, tend to do more hurt than good to the pannel.

* Mr Calder was afterwards for many years connected with the London newspaper press. For anything that we know, he is still alive, in retirement, reaping the reward of his early enterprise and ability. "The boy Calder," as the Judge termed him in summing up, is the individual mentioned with what we considered improper levity in the clever local work, "Sketches and Legends of Cromarty," in referring to the Friends of the People in that town. The writer is evidently ignorant of the events of the early career of Mr Calder; but he might have shewn a little more caution. Very many of the young Reformers of the 1793-4, were afterwards honourably connected with the public press both in Great Britain and the United States, and zealous in propagating the principles they had early imbibed. The preachers of former times could only lift up a solitary voice in behalf of truth; the exiled Reformers took possession of a more powerful engine. Their enemies are feeling its effects now.

† Alexander Aitcheson whom we see mentioned here, and whom we find referred to in other trials, was originally a goldsmith in the Parliament Close, and, if we remember aright, at one time the partner of Downie, who was afterwards tried with Watt for high treason. Aitcheson was a very ingenious man, fond of science; harbouring a great soul in a small and deformed body. He gave up his business and studied medicine, warmly embracing the Brownonian doctrines in theory, and perhaps moderately supporting his belief by practice. He was employed by Sir John Sinclair in compiling and arranging the papers of the Statistical Account. He suffered much in his literary prospects, and consequently in his pecuniary circumstances, from his connexion with the Friends of the People. Mr Aitcheson afterwards went to Perth as editor and a principal contributor to the Perth Encyclopædia. He was a person of great humour, simple-minded and warm-hearted, an enthusiastic Reformer, brave as a lion, and not the less endeared to his young friends that they ventured to take pleasant liberties with him. In the book before us, it is stated that he practised surgery in Perth.

Witness.—Of that, the gentlemen of the Jury will judge.

Lord Justice Clerk.—Mr Solicitor General, it is needless to put any more questions to this man.

Solicitor General.—I shall put no more, my Lord.

(Witness was ordered to withdraw.)

Lord Justice Clerk.—Put him out, then! Put him, out!

Witness, Aitcheson.

Q.—Did you ever observe anything of a seditious or riotous appearance in the Convention?

A.—Not in the least.

Q.—Did you ever hear anything mentioned, or whispered in the Convention, that might tend to overturn the Constitution?

A.—Never.

Q.—Did you ever hear anything mentioned there against placemen and pensioners?

A.—Often.

Mr Margarot.—That, I suppose, is the sedition that is meant to be charged.

No further questions were put to this witness.

Muir conducted his own defence, which he was in every way qualified to do, both from professional knowledge and ability. It is, however, less than creditable to the spirit of the Scottish bar to find it stated that none of his quondam brethren cared to assist in the defence of an individual so obnoxious to the bench and to the government of Scotland. Muir's alleged crimes were, lending a copy of Paine's "Rights of Man," and giving away several copies of Volney's "Dialogue between the Governors and the Governed;" and also that, at a meeting of the Convention in Edinburgh, he had read an address from the society of United Irishmen in Dublin to the Delegates for Promoting Reform in Scotland.*

The foreman of the jury on this memorable trial was the late notorious Gilbert Innes of Stow; and nearly the whole were "country-gentlemen," and afterwards placemen; Mr Rocheid of Inverleith, at whose table the edifying conversation related above, had passed, being one of the former. "A Lawnmarket Jury" afterwards became exceedingly docile; but, at this momentous first trial, it was deemed advisable to mak sikker; and greater precaution may have been employed in packing. Muir confessed the crimes of lending the books and pamphlets; but he protested against being tried by a jury of the persons who had, at their own pleasure, erased his name from the books of the Goldsmiths' Hall Association. Among other forcible arguments, he urged this:—

I demand justice. Let me be tried fairly—not by a jury of the Association of Goldsmiths' Hall, not by a jury of the Association of the Friends of the People—but by men unconnected with either, whose minds cannot possibly be supposed warped with prejudices. I therefore solemnly protest, that no person who is a member of the Association in Goldsmiths' Hall, should or can be of the jury in my trial.

Solicitor-General Blair replied, that he considered this objection to be of the most extraordinary nature. The pannel is accused of forming associations contrary to the Constitution, and he presumes to object to those gentlemen who formed associations in its defence. With equal propriety might the pannel object to their Lordships on the bench to be his judges in this trial: their Lordships had sworn to defend the Constitution.

Mr Muir.—This day, I will not descend into the quibbles of a lawyer. I object to these gentlemen, not because they associated in defence of the constitution. I, too, as well as they, have associated in defence of the constitution. But my objection is, that they, by an act of theirs, have publicly accused me of being an enemy to the constitution, have already pronounced the sentence of condemnation, and have imposed upon my name the seal of proscription.

LORD JUSTICE CLERK.—If the objections of the pannel were relevant, it would extend far indeed; it would go to every person who had taken the oaths to government. I can see nothing in the objection, and I am clear for repelling it.

LORD HENDERLAND.—I can see nothing in the objection. These gentlemen entered into a society for a particular purpose, and had the right of judging of the qualification of their members; they did not think Mr Muir or his friends proper members. In no trial whatever could this be a good objection.

The objection was repelled. Mr Muir, however, continued to repeat it, as every five were sworn.

The opinion expressed by Mr Adam of this denial of justice by the Court, is cited above.

The evidence brought against Muir was of the most disgraceful kind. One individual, afterwards notorious, the Rev. Mr Lapslie, minister of Campsie, who had been the intimate personal friend of Muir, actually attended the sheriff round the country, raking up and attempting to suborn evidence against him. This very despicable clerical fanatic, if he was not something worse than a fanatic, was, according to the information before us, afterwards pensioned by the government—one of the most impudent things ever done in Scotland. We see it is inquired if the name of Lapslie does not occur in the Pension list yet. The fact merits inquiry. When this reverend person was called by the Lord Advocate, Muir said—

Let this witness be removed: I have many objections to state against him.

Mr Lapslie was accordingly removed.

Mr Muir.—I have said that I have many objections to state, both to the admissibility and credibility of this witness. My delicacy with regard to that man, will, at present, permit me to adduce the least weighty only; for I mean to prove the most important, in a different shape, in a criminal prosecution against him, when he and I shall exchange places at this bar. I know not what title this reverend gentleman has to act as an agent for the Crown; but this I offer to prove, that he assisted the messengers of the law in exploring and citing witnesses against me; that he attended the sheriffs in their different visits to the parishes of Campsie and Kirkintilloch; that, previously to the precognition, he conversed with the witnesses of the Crown; that he attended their precognition, put questions to them, and took down notes; nay, more, that, without being cited by the Prosecutor, he offered himself ultroneously against me, and insisted that his declaration should be taken in the unusual form, with his oath attending it, to attest its truth.

The Lord Advocate would not dismiss Lapslie;† but (by an oversight, perhaps) he allowed evidence to be led of the vicious intermeddling of that person, which at once quashed him as a witness, and which ought to have drawn ecclesiastical censure upon him, if kirk courts had been as strict as in our times, when a clergyman was condemned for saying grace at a public dinner where Mr O'Connell was present.

One of the most shameful circumstances of this shameful trial was the production of Ann Fisher, a woman who had been in the service of Muir's family, as a witness against him. This species of evidence was strongly and indignantly stigmatized in Parliament. "The domestic and well-tutored spy" had passed into the family of a collector of cess from that of Muir; and, one way or other she had got her lesson, which she repeated volubly, and greatly to the admiration of the Bench. This miserable woman,* in reply to the interrogatories of the public prosecutor, (Robert Dundas of Arniston, the Lord Advocate at the period,) went into matters that had never once been either charged or alluded to in the indictment; and Muir took strong legal objections to so extraordinary and loose a proceeding. "What," he asked, "is the purpose of an indictment, but to specify crimes.

If this is now to be adopted as law, what portion remains to us of our national liberties is for ever torn away. Everything is insecure; an indictment will no longer be regarded but as a piece of unmeaning paper. The unfortunate man who receives it may say, I am charged with robbery. I have many witnesses to prove I did not perpetrate this crime; but what avails preparing a defence? Not a single witness may perhaps be adduced against me for that offence. I may never hear a word of it in court, but I may be instantly called upon to defend myself against a charge of murder, of sedition, or of high treason. In short, if, under the specious pretence of being allowed to introduce what is not specified in the libel to support its generality, you establish a precedent of this kind, you strike the fatal blow against individual security, and of general safety.

This question is of little importance to the individual who is now struggling for the liberties of his country. But the eyes of your children will be fixed upon this trial, and they will tremble and shudder at the precedent! I feel for the country—I feel for posterity—I will not sanction the procedure which is to produce to both a system of injustice, of ruin, and of murder!

The Court at once overruled all objections; indeed, we do not observe that a single legal objection was ever sustained in any one of these trials. The hair-dresser who daily attended Muir was also brought against him; but, unlike the maid-servant, he was a reluctant witness—and he contradicted her in many points. We shall not cite Muir's indignant commentary to the jury upon this woman's evidence, lest it might be fancied a coloured pleading for himself; but the evidence of one who had, too probably, been instructed "to lie in wait to take her watch, and mark to destruction those that fed her," may be viewed as a fair specimen of the sort of evidence upon which the prisoner was condemned.

She saw at that time, a good many country people coming about Mr Muir's father's shop; that Mr Muir has frequently said to these country people, that Mr Paine's book was a good book; that she has frequently bought this book for people in the shop, and that this was sometimes at the desire of Mr Muir, and sometimes at that of these people. She bought both the first and second part of Paine, at different times, and when she returned with them, she sometimes laid them on the table, and sometimes gave them to the people; that she bought two different parts at different times, for Alexander Muir, Mr Muir's uncle. She was sent for a copy by Mr John Muir, hatter; but is not sure whether or not she got it. That John Muir was much pressed upon by the pannel to purchase the book; that, to the best of her remembrance, she bought one for one Barclay; that she knows Mr Muir's hair-dresser, Thomas Wilson, and she has heard Mr Muir advising him to buy Paine's "Rights of Man," and to keep them in his shop to enlighten the people, as it confuted Mr Burke entirely; she read this book herself, and got it in her master's house; that she has seen one copy on fine paper, and one or two coarse ones; that, to the best of her remembrance, she has seen the Paisley Declaration on Mr Muir's table, and sometimes in the dining-room; that she thinks she has seen the Dialogue in Mr Muir's room, and has heard him read it, in presence of his mother, sister, and others, in his father's back shop; that Mr Muir said, it was very clever, and wrote by one Volnew,† one of the first wits in France; that she does not remember to have seen The Patriot; that she thinks she has heard part of the Paisley Declaration read by Mr Muir in the said back shop, in presence of somebody, that being the common place where he read these books; that she has been sent from the back shop, up stairs for some books; that she does not recollect whether he thus read these books on a market day; and that she has known him read some French law books; that she has heard him speak about Reform and Members of Parliament; that, if everybody had a vote, he would be made Member for Calder; that Members of Parliament were to have thirty or forty shillings a-day; and deeds were the subject of several clever caricatures by Kay of Edinburgh, who must have been a Radical genius. In a Life of Muir, by Mr Peter Mackenzie, we find Lapslie thus described:—"The reverend gentleman, to whom we refer, had known Mr Muir from his infancy. They were bosom friends,

"Coupled and linked together
With all religious strength of sacred vows."

And, after Mr Muir had gone to the bar, and was rising to eminence, this reverend friend not only kept up a correspondence with him, but used frequently to sojourn under the hospitable roof of his parents, and to pour into their ears sweet words of praise, about their darling son. He thus acquired their unbounded confidence. He applauded the political tenets of Mr Muir. Nay, he was himself a Reformer—at least, he pretended to be so, and actually recommended some of the very books for which, it will be seen, Mr Muir was afterwards condemned for the having in his possession. But the moment the ministers of the Crown denounced Mr Muir, that moment this minister of religion turned upon him like a serpent. His own sting would have been powerless, because, for aught that appeared, Mr Muir had never uttered one syllable in his presence of a criminal or seditious nature;—but, in order to supply that deficiency, he did not scruple to fish for evidence against him in every quarter where he thought he would be successful He attended the initiatory examination of some of the witnesses for the Crown before the Sheriff, and 'coaxed them to speak out.' And so great was his zeal for the prosecution, that, when the trial itself drew nigh, he left his parish, and voluntarily journeyed to Edinburgh, a distance of forty miles, and, without being subpœnaed, he actually attempted to plant himself in the witnesses' box, as an evidence for the Crown, in regard to facts which must now rest with his own conscience. These things are not exaggerated—they were proved on the trial; and other facts of a more sickening description, were about to be unfolded by Mr Muir, when he was prudently stopped by the Lord Advocate, who, with all his zeal for the prosecution, could not defend such evidence."

* According to a note to the Trial, this woman sank into the lowest prostitution, and died in utter misery in Glasgow.

and that, in that case, there would be none but honest men to keep the Constitution clear; that she has heard it said, by Mr Muir, that France was the most flourishing nation in the world, as they had abolished tyranny and got a free government; that she heard him say the Constitution of this country was very good, but that many abuses had crept in which required a thorough Reform; that the courts of law required Reform also, for they got their money for doing nothing but pronouncing sentence of death upon poor creatures; and that it was a useless parade of their coming into Glasgow.

Such were the witnesses, such the offences, for which Muir was condemned to the punishment of a felon.

Muir's address to the jury was long, able, and eloquent. Much as we regret to mutilate so perfect a whole, we must select a few passages. The infamous conduct of the Rev. Mr Lapslie, and the placing the servant girl in the witness-box, had especially excited the manly indignation of Muir. In this generous strain, he addressed that obdurate jury upon the disgusting theme of domestic espionage:—

Gentlemen, The witness next swears to a fact which must rouse your keenest indignation. Vigilant has this family-spy been in the course of her duty. She tells you what books she has seen on my table, &c. Gentlemen, from this moment lock up your libraries. If they are extensive, as you have heard mine is, there is no crime in the whole decalogue of which, by the testimony of your own servants, you may not be found guilty. The possession of Plato, of Harrington, or of Hume, will mark you down for Republicans. The misfortune of having the Koran of Mahomet will cause the shipwreck of your faith, and stigmatize you as the disciples of the conqueror of Mecca. Well do I congratulate the Lord Advocate of Scotland. He has discovered a new region in the sphere of criminality—he will not merely confine himself to one voyage of discovery, but, along with his associates, he will make many voyages to this fertile land, and return home loaded with many valuable cargoes. But seriousness becomes this place. Can it be believed, that, in the close of the 18th century—that this night—the servants of a man should be examined concerning what particular books he may have had in his house, and that the proof of possession of particular books may ruin his reputation—sweep away his property—and deprive him of life!

Gentlemen, The libel charges me with "feloniously circulating 'A Dialogue between the Governors and the Governed,'" extracted from the "Ruins" of Volney. This Dialogue is narrated in the indictment, and it is charged to be felonious and seditious. There is not a word in this Dialogue which is not true. Alas! in colours but too faithful, it delineates the mournful history of six thousand years—the crimes of despots, and the artifices of impostors, to subjugate and to blind the people. It is purely abstracted. It is entirely speculative. To no particular nation, much less to England, does it allude—if to any, it must be to France under the ancient system. Yet this Dialogue is libelled as seditious and inflammatory. The truth is, the crime of sedition must be brought home against me, and the possession of any book, as well as that of Volney, might be employed to substantiate it. Let us hear what the witness says concerning the "felonious" circulation. She heard me read it in presence of my mother, sister, and some other people—that I said it was very clever, and done by one of the first wits in France. Who were those "other people" that were in company with my mother and sister, when I read it? Her accuracy, so much extolled by the Court, again totally fails her here. But the propagation of sedition must not be confined to a mother and a sister—it must have a wider range: "other people present!" And, founding upon his beloved generality, the prosecutor has reason to argue that there might have been a full company—a numerous meeting—nay, an immense congregation!

Gentlemen, You have heard the testimony of Fisher, and are these the arts by which I am to fall? I again say, that, if you receive such testimony, you for ever destroy domestic society—you blast the sweets of family confidence. And is it not sufficient to weep over public calamities, without thinking, that, when we retire to our own homes, we must be obliged to confine ourselves in dismal solitude, guarded by suspicion and by danger, where no kindred affections can enter, and where no reciprocal consolation can be admitted?

And the exculpatory evidence which he led was of the most honourable kind. Among the witnesses were the late excellent David Dale of New Lanark—who was one of the original Friends of the People, and had been present at the meeting in the Star Inn of Glasgow—and several other merchants and manufacturers. They all concurred in asserting that Muir had counselled calmness in deliberation, and quiet and good order in their proceedings, and only the pursuit of constitutional Reform in Parliament; that he inculcated a firm attachment to the King and constitution in his addresses to the People, and disapproved of violent party books and pamphlets. Though these witnesses were generally in the respectable ranks of middle life, one was an humble countryman, but an elder of the Kirk, and an estimable character, who had been called for the Crown. The Lord Advocate allowed himself to sneer at "a gentleman, a member of the Bar," associating with this respectable individual. The Tories had not then, nor indeed until now, become so very civil and courteous to "operatives," but especially "Conservative operatives."

The next witness is John Barclay, that old and venerable person, whom you saw adduced as a witness by the prosecutor, and who informs you that we were elders in the same parish—the parish of Calder, in which the lands of my father are situated. Gentlemen, the Lord Advocate, in speaking of this virtuous and venerable old man, exclaimed with insolent contempt, "Such men as these are the companions, and such men as these are the friends of Mr Muir!" Yes; I tell the Lord Advocate—I tell the aristocracy of Scotland—I glory more in the friendship of such an old, poor, and virtuous man, than in the friendship of the highest titled Peer who derives the sources of his guilty grandeur from the calamities of the People; who wrings out a splendid but a miserable revenue from their sorrow and distress, from their tears and from their blood, which he squanders in dissipation, to the ruin of private virtue and to the contamination of public morals.

At one period of Muir's speech, when he went into the legal argument against the doctrine of constructive sedition, some of the gentlemen of the jury probably fancied such fine-spun theories an uncivil delay of their dinners, which could not be eat in comfort until they had done the duty they had met for. Mr Muir instantly noticed it, and said:—

Gentlemen, if, whether right or wrong, you have come here determined to find me guilty, say so boldly, openly, and, let me add, honestly—resort not to idle pretexts and expedients to justify a stretch of power. The unprejudiced eye will soon penetrate into these pretexts, and the determination will soon receive the contempt and indignation of mankind.

Muir thus concluded his long address:—

What, then, has been my crime? Not the lending to a relation a copy of Mr Paine's works—not the giving away to another a few numbers of an innocent and constitutional publication—but my crime is for having dared to be, according to the measure of my feeble abilities, a strenuous and active advocate for an equal representation of the People in the House of the People—for having dared to accomplish a measure, by legal means, which was to diminish the weight of their taxes, and to put an end to the profusion of their blood. Gentlemen, from my infancy to this moment. I have devoted myself to the cause of the People. IT IS A GOOD CAUSE—IT SHALL ULTIMATELY PREVAIL—IT SHALL FINALLY TRIUMPH. Say, then, openly in your verdict—if you do condemn me, which, I presume, you will not—that it is for my attachment to this cause alone, and not for those vain and wretched pretexts stated in the indictment, intended only to colour and disguise the real motives of my accusation.

The summing up of the Lord Justice Clerk, the ever-famous Braxfield, looks, in this report, as if it were "nothing extenuate;" but such was the violent character and the homely style of the man. "The question for consideration," he remarked, was—

"Is the pannel guilty of sedition, or is he not? Now, before this question can be answered, two things must be attended to that require no proof. First, That the British Constitution is the best that ever was since the creation of the world, and it is not possible to make it better. For is not every man secure?—does not every man reap the fruits of his own industry, and sit safely under his own fig-tree? The next circumstance is, that there was a spirit of seditioe in this country last winter, which made every good man very uneasy. Yet Mr Muir had, at that time, gone about among ignorant country people, making them forget their work, and told them that a reform was absolutely necessary for preserving their liberty, which, if it had not been for him, they would never have thought was in danger. His Lordship did not doubt that this would appear to them, as it did to him, to be sedition.

The next thing to be attended to was the outlawry. Running away from justice—that was a mark of guilt. But, besides running away, the prisoner had gone to France, and pretended to have had influence with those wretches, the leading men. [This pretension was altogether an assumption of his Lordship.] What kind of folk were they? And his Lordship said, he never liked the French all his days, but now he hated them.

The pannel's haranguing such multitudes of ignorant weavers, about their grievances, might have been attended with the worst consequences to the peace of the nation, and the safety of our glorious constitution.

Mr Muir might have known, that no attention could be paid to such a rabble. What right had they to representation? He could have told them that the Parliament would never listen to their petition. How could they think of it? A government in every country should be just like a corporation; and in this country it is made up of the landed interest, which alone has a right to be represented. As for the rabble, who have nothing but personal property, what hold has the nation of them? what security for the payment of their taxes? They may pack up all their property on their backs, and leave the country in the twinkling of an eye; but landed property cannot be removed.

The tendency of the pannel's conduct, was plainly to promote a spirit of revolt, and, if what was demanded was not given, to take it by force. His Lordship had not the smallest doubt that the Jury were, like himself, convinced of the pannel's guilt, and desired them to return such a verdict as would do them honour.

The Court retired at two o'clock, on Saturday morning, and met again at twelve o'clock of the same day, when the Jury returned a verdict unanimously finding the pannel "guilty of the crimes libelled."

And, now, the punishment was to be considered. Lord Henderland, the father of the present Whig Lord Advocate of Scotland—and we find many such happy changes now-a-days—after expatiating upon the enormity of the offence, gravely remarked, that—Banishment would be improper, as it would only be sending to another country, a man, where he might have the opportunity of exciting the same spirit of discontent, and sowing, with a plentiful hand, sedition. Whipping was too severe and disgraceful, the more especially to a man who had bore his character and rank in life. And imprisonment, he considered, would be but a temporary punishment, when the criminal would be again let loose, and so again disturb the happiness of the people. There remains but one punishment in our law, and it wrung his very heart to mention it, viz. TRANSPORTATION. It was a duty his Lordship considered he owed to his countrymen to pronounce it, in the situation in which he sat, as the punishment due to the pannel's crimes. His Lordship observed, it was extraordinary that a gentleman of his description, of his profession, and of the talents he possessed, should be guilty of a crime deserving such a punishment; but he saw no alternative; for what security could we have against his future operations, but a removal from his country, to a place where he could do no further harm? His Lordship was, therefore, of opinion that the pannel should be recommitted to prison, there to remain till a proper opportunity should offer for transporting him to such place as his Majesty, with the advice of his Privy Council, might appoint, for the space of fourteen years from the date of the sentence; and that he should not return within that period, under the pain of death.

In this righteous opinion, every judge concurred, each vindicating his judgment by a few characteristic pedantic quiddities. The whole matter had, beyond all doubt, been previously arranged and concerted with the Government. The Justice Clerk hesitated between transportation for life or for fourteen years; but, upon the whole, inclined to the merciful side. Before sentence was pronounced, and while it was recording, Muir rose and said—"My Lords, I have only a few words to say. I shall not animadvert upon the severity or the leniency of my sentence. Were I to be led this moment from the bar to the scaffold, I should feel the same calmness and serenity which I now do. My mind tells me that I have acted agreeably to my conscience, and that I have engaged in a GOOD, a JUST, and a GLORIOUS cause—A CAUSE WHICH, SOONER OR LATER, MUST AND WILL PREVAIL, AND, BY TIMELY REFORM, SAVE THIS COUNTRY FROM DESTRUCTION."

With inexpressible loathing and disgust, we turn from these scenes of injustice in its worst, its legalized forms, to pursue the fortunes of Muir. He lay for a short time in Edinburgh jail; but was, we believe, for some months in the hulks before the discussion took place in Parliament, which brought no alleviation to his sufferings. While in prison in Edinburgh, he was much visited by the sympathizing Reformers of the middle rank, and by those of that class of men who, first in every country, "hear the truth gladly;" but his former associates in higher station, and his brethren of the bar, had all fallen away, scared or discouraged by the blast of adversity. In a Life of Muir, published some years ago by Mr Peter Mackenzie of Glasgow, it is stated that those trying scenes, and parting with his unfortunate son, completely broke down the constitution of the elder Muir.

He was struck with a shock of palsy, from which he never recovered. And his poor mother, so powerful was her affection for her devoted son, periled her own life, by making frequent excursions to sea in an open boat in the winter of 1793, in order that she might again catch a glimpse of him, and give vent to her agonized feelings.

During the last of these excursions, but before she could approach near enough to recognise him, the vessel in which Mr Muir was, got under weigh. And, if the agony of mortals could have any effect on the elements of nature, these very elements at that time would have stood motionless on account of Thomas Muir.

One of the last requests he made to his parents was, to furnish him with a small pocket Bible; and we mention that circumstance, because it will be seen how highly he prized that precious relic, and how miraculously it preserved his life under the extraordinary vicissitudes that afterwards befell him.

There were eighty-three convicts on board the Surprise transport, which carried him from England. His fellow-Reformers, Palmer, Skirving, and Margarot, were among them. But there was another individual of a very different description, indeed, in whose society Mr Muir at one time little thought he could sojourn for a single hour. This was a man of the name of Henderson, belonging to Glasgow, who had been tried there by the Circuit Court of Justiciary, about two years before, for the Murder of his wife. And, strange to tell, Mr Muir had been his counsel. He pled successfully for him, as Henderson's jury, instead of a verdict of Murder, brought in a verdict of Culpable Homicide, which saved the culprit's neck, and now he was going to expiate his crime under a like sentence of transportation for fourteen years!—O tempora! O mores! What a commentary on the different degrees of punishment!

There is but one private letter of Muir's found in the work before us. It is addressed from the hulks to a friend at Cambridge, upon the eve of Muir's departure from England. It does equal honour to his religious sensibility and his steady faith.

My Dear Friend,—I received yours at Edinburgh with the sincerest pleasure; your sentiments and mine are equally accordant—the great lesson we have to learn in this world is submission and resignation to the will of God. This lesson strikes upon the heart, not by the force of cold and abstracted precept, but by the example of Him who was the object of all sufferings, and the pattern of all perfection. Much need have I to be taught in his school. Hurled, as it were, in a moment, from some of the most polished societies in Edinburgh and London, into one of the hulks upon the Thames, where every mouth is opened to blaspheme God and every hand stretched out to injure a neighbour, I cannot divest myself of the feelings of nature—I cannot but lament my situation; and, were it not for the hope of immortality, founded upon our common Christianity, alas! I might accuse the Father of all Justice and of all Mercy with severity. But, blessed be God, everything in the great system of nature, everything in the little system of individual man, corresponds with the great dispensations of the gospel, and demonstrates its efficacy.

Much consolation does the reflection now afford me, that in prosperity I always regarded this revelation of Heaven with the most profound reverence.

In solitary exile there is a dignity, there is a conscious pride, which, even independent of philosophy, may support the mind; but I question much, if any of the illustrious of ancient ages could have supported an exile similar to mine surrounded by the veriest outcasts of society, without the aid of religion and of the example of Jesus.

I have been separated from Mr Palmer—he is in one hulk, I am in a different one. The separation is an act of unnecessary cruelty.

My state of health is poorly. The seeds of a consumption, I apprehend, are planted in my breast. I suffer no acute pain, but daily experience a gradual decay.

Of everything relating to my future destination, I am utterly ignorant.

Honour me by your correspondence. I am sure it will ameliorate my heart.

Farewell! my truly worthy and respectable friend.

Muir and Palmer lay so long in the ulks that Skirving and Margarot were shipped off in the Surprise transport along with them. There was an attempt to mutiny in the ship; and a time-serving officer, to recommend himself, endeavoured to fasten the crime upon two of the Scottish patriots, Palmer and Skirving. But their innocence was clearly established. They were active and useful in preserving order. Though some base natures were found in the colony, the banished men, upon the whole, met with great sympathy and kindness. The medical officers were, at all times, particularly kind and attentive to them. Medicine, we apprehend, must be a more liberal and humanizing profession than arms. The Governor of the infant penal colony, Captain Hunter, himself a Scotchman, was disposed to distinguish between these unfortunate men, and the burglars, thieves, and homicides, sent out to his care. Muir especially, from his youth, his disinterested enthusiasm, and the horrible severity with which he had been treated, was an object of peculiar interest. It is related, in Dr Lang's late history of the colony, that "everything which enlightened delicacy could suggest had been done by Governor Hunter, to render Muir's situation, and that of his unfortunate friends, as little painful as possible." A letter from Governor Hunter, to one of his friends in Leith, written a few weeks after the arrival of the convicts, contains the following passage:—

"N. S. Wales, 16th Oct. 1795.

"The four gentlemen whom the activity of the Magistrates of Edinburgh provided for our colony, I have seen and conversed with separately, since my arrival here. They seem, all of them, gifted in the powers of conversation. Muir was the first I saw. I thought him a sensible young man, of a very retired turn, which certainly his situation in this country will give him an opportunity of indulging. He said nothing on the severity of his fate, but seemed to bear his circumstances with a proper degree of fortitude and resignation. Skirving was the next I saw; he appeared to me to be a sensible, well-informed man—not young, perhaps fifty. He is fond of farming, and has purchased a piece of ground, and makes good use of it, which will, by and by, turn to his advantage. Palmer paid me the next visit; he is said to be a turbulent, restless kind of man. It may be so—but I must do him the justice to say, that I have seen nothing of that disposition in him since my arrival.

Shortly afterwards, Muir wrote—

"I am pleased with my situation, as much as a man can be, separated from all he loved and respected. Palmer, Skirving, and myself, live in the utmost harmony. Of our treatment here, I cannot speak too highly. Gratitude will for ever bind me to the officers, civil and military. I have a neat little house here, and another two miles distant, at a farm across the water, which I purchased. When any money is transmitted, cause a considerable part of it to be laid out at the Cape, or at Rio, in rum, tobacco, and sugar, which are invaluable, and the only medium of exchange," &c. &c.

Dividing his time between labouring his Australian fields with his own hands, and congenial studies, Muir spent about a year and a half in comparative tranquillity.* His fate, and that of the other patriots, had excited the strongest interest in America; and, according to Mr Mackenzie, a few generous individuals fitted out a vessel at New York, for a pretended voyage to China; but of which the object was to bring Muir off from Sydney. Into that harbour the captain went, under pretence of being short of wood and water. The plan succeeded completely. Muir got safely on board the Otter, with no property; for he had none transportable save his Bible and a few articles of clothing. He left a letter thanking the Governor for the kindness shewn him while in the colony.

We must, however, confess that the relation of many of the circumstances attending Muir's escape and subsequent adventures appears apocryphal; and the case needs no aid of ornament. The early part of his history in the colony is well authenticated, and also the later events of his life; and it is only certain that he got off in the Otter, an American vessel. The ship, probably in the natural course of a trading voyage, touched at Nootka Sound. An English brig of war, which had sailed from Botany Bay some days before the Otter, also lay here, and both the American captain and his passenger must have been alarmed for discovery. Muir, therefore, left the ship, risking the peril of traversing the whole continent of America, rather than that of falling once more under the tender mercies of Scottish Tory judges. After undergoing extreme hardship, and suffering an imprisonment of four months at the Havannah, he was allowed to go on board a Spanish frigate bound for Cadiz. Spain was, at that time, at war with Britain, and the ally of the French Republic; and one English vessel, blockading the port of Cadiz, attacked the frigate. A desperate action ensued, in which Muir fought with the Spaniards, and against the English, with the greatest intrepidity, and was severely wounded. It was known to the English that he was on board the frigate; but, when the ship struck, the Spaniards said that he had been killed and thrown overboard during the action; and, by some means or other, he was concealed for six days, and at last sent on shore with the rest of the wounded prisoners. Mr Mackenzie states that he was recognised by a surgeon of the English ship, who had been his schoolfellow. There is an air of romantic incident about parts of the story, which throws discredit upon it, although every circumstance, for aught we know, may be true to the letter. We shall, therefore, content ourselves with what Muir himself has told. From Cadiz, of date August 14, 1797, he wrote the following letter:—

"DEAR FRIEND,—Since the memorable evening on which I took leave of you at ———, my melancholy and agitated life has been a continued series of extraordinary events. I hope to meet you again in a few months.

"Contrary to my expectation, I am at last nearly cured of my numerous wounds. The Directory have shewn me great kindness. Their solicitude for an unfortunate being who has been so cruelly oppressed, is a balm of consolation which revives my drooping spirits. The Spaniards detain me as a prisoner because I am a Scotchman. But I have no doubt that the intervention of the Directory of the Great Republic will obtain my liberty. Remember me most affectionately to all my friends, who are the friends of liberty and of mankind. I remain, dear Sir, yours ever, THOMAS MUIR.

The French Government offered the persecuted and expatriated Scottish Reformer an asylum, and the Directory made a formal demand that the Spanish authorities should give him up; and on his way to Paris, at Bourdeaux, the first considerable French city, "The brave Scottish advocate of liberty! the adopted citizen of France!" was received in triumph. This was in February 1798. Muir, in consequence of his sufferings for some years, and of his severe wound in the action in the harbour of Cadiz, was in very delicate health. On his arrival in Paris he addressed the Directory in fervent acknowledgment of the kindness that had been shewn to him, and to the cause of liberty in his person. We shall once more quote from Mackenzie's Life. If it be not always accurate in point of fact in some minor points, we are certain it is always right in feeling.

A deputation from the French Government immediately waited on Mr Muir, to congratulate him on his arrival in Paris. His company was now courted by the highest circles in France; and, indeed, he acquired the sympathy and esteem of all classes in that great community. Nothing was wanting, on their part, to make him happy—and of this, the grateful homage of his heart fully showed that he was deeply sensible. But his constitution was fast sinking. The wounds he had received were found to be incurable; and shortly afterwards, viz. on the 27th of September 1798, he expired at Chantilly, near Paris, and was interred there by the public authorities, with every possible respect.

His venerable parents, who had heard of his escape from Sidney, and subsequent history, were, as may well be imagined, greatly agitated by fresh hopes and fears on his account. Many an anxious thought they must have had about him. They received several letters from him, all breathing the most dutiful and affectionate regard. On his deathbed, he carefully sealed up the Bible which they had given him on his departure from Scotland, and which had been so miraculously preserved by him, through all the difficulties and dangers he had encountered, leaving an injunction that it should be forwarded to his parents by the first opportunity; and it was so forwarded, and received by them with mingled feelings of satisfaction and grief. They only survived him about two years.

Muir, who had done and suffered so much, died at the age of thirty-three. His relations owe his memory and the world the debt of making public as much of his correspondence with his family as concerns the abiding interests of the human race—those interests to which Muir was the disinterested Martyr.

The next trial in Scotland was that of Palmer. He appeared before the Circuit Court of Justiciary at Perth, and for the alleged crime of circulating a handbill or address, known to have been written by another person; and in which we can see no harm, whoever had written it. He was sentenced to transportation; but for seven years only. Perambulating courts, when abroad in the fresh air, and dining socially, are generally much more lenient than the solemn tribunals cooped up in Westminster Hall, the Four Courts, or the Parliament House of Edinburgh.

* There were few, or almost no Bibles in the colony; and it is related that Muir used to print portions of Scripture with his pen, which he gave away in the way he considered the most useful. There could have been but one motive for this first missionary labour in this quarter of the globe.

Mr Palmer was an Englishman, and the pastor of a small Unitarian congregation in Dundee, where we have heard that, at the time, he seemed rather misplaced. Probably Mr Palmer did not feel it so. He was a gentleman and a scholar, refined in mind and polished in manners; but he was also a sincere lover of his race, a true friend of the people. We have seen what Whitbread said of him in Parliament. A most romantic circumstance attended the banishment of this innocent man. A member of his Church, named Ellis, as soon as he heard this iniquitous sentence pronounced, formed the resolution of sharing Palmer's exile; and he actually accompanied him to New South Wales, and shared with him the period of his banishment. "For scarcely a righteous man will one die; yet peradventure for a good man some will even dare to die." We take the quotation from the book before us. It is apt and not too bold. Where a high motive is presented, the Gothic or the Christian world will never fail of counterparts to the Damon and Pythias of classic ages. Mr Palmer died of a fever at some of the islands of the Indian seas, upon his way home.

The summary punishment inflicted upon Muir and Palmer, did not quell the courage of the Friends of the People. In October 1793, the Convention met again, now first assuming the name of the British Convention; for Gerrald and Margarot had arrived as delegates from London, and delegates were also sent by Birmingham, Sheffield, and probably other places in England. Among those who had taken a leading part all along, but especially after the arrest of Muir, was William Skirving, afterwards tried for sedition, and subjected to the same cruel and ignominous punishment as his young and illustrious friend. Skirving was a man in middle life, and one who had long occupied a respectable station in society. His private character was in every respect estimable and unblemished.

He was the son of a farmer at Libberton, near Edinburgh, and had been educated for the Burgher Secession Church. After finishing his academical course at the University of Edinburgh, he studied divinity under the celebrated Professor John Brown of Haddington. He, however, abandoned his views to the ministry—which, as in the case of many other young men, might probably be rather those of his relatives than himself—and became a tutor in the family of Sir Alexander Dick of Prestonfield. He ultimately settled as a farmer in Kinross-shire, and married the daughter and only child of Mr Abercrombie, merchant in Kirkaldy, with whom he obtained the small estate of Strathruddie in Fifeshire. Skirving was fond of agriculture, upon which he published some treatises; and he even stood a competition with the late Dr Coventry for the Chair of Agriculture in the Edinburgh University.

His peculiar studies and publications brought him to Edinburgh, in 1792; and his liberal opinions, and high sense of public duty, enrolled him among the Friends of the People. He became "Secretary to the General Association of the Friends of the People." In those days, a name was a crime; and it was a serious charge against Skirving, that, in some document, he had been accidentally denominated the Secretary-General,* which, together with citizen, section, (which term the people applied to their ward or district societies,) honours of the sitting, and a few other idle phrases, their Lordships, the criminal judges, fancied a very truculent, Frenchified, and alarming kind of polysylables. Convention, though an old and familiar name in Scotland, now inferred the pains and penalties of sedition, at the least. But there was something about a Convention of Emergency—an extraordinary convention, in case Hessian and Hanoverian troops were brought over, and the habeas corpus suspended—which, though nothing was ever agreed upon about it, amounted to treason. And, indeed, in the course of all these trials, the prisoners were often told, from the bench, that their crimes could hardly be distinguished from treason; nor can it, we own, be more difficult to prove constructive treason than constructive sedition.

Mr Skirving continued to act as Secretary to the Convention after the condemnation of Muir and the arrival of the English delegates. He was present, and engaged in performing his official but unsalaried duty, when Mr Elder, the Lord Provost of Edinburgh, attended by a posse of constables, entered the hall of meeting in Blackfriars' Wynd, where the delegates were discussing their intended petition to Parliament, and commanded them to disperse. They yielded to the magistrate, but resolved not tamely to abandon their constitutional rights; and Mr Skirving, in his capacity of Secretary, called a meeting for next night without the jurisdiction of the city magistrates, in the suburbs of the town. Here they were again dispersed by the Sheriff-Substitute of the county. On both occasions, they submitted peacefully; but protested against the illegality of dispersing a body of citizens, met calmly to deliberate upon their grievances, and to petition Parliament for Reform. Skirving was arrested that same evening on a warrant from the Sheriff, and had his whole public and private papers carried off to the Sheriff's chambers.

The ferment in which the Scottish metropolis was at this time may be imagined; and the panic spread through the whole country. The trials of Muir and Palmer were seen to be but the beginning of misery. THE REIGN OF TERROR was now at its height. The Scottish delegates returned home to their constituents, spreading dismay wherever they went. Gerrald was arrested. Margarot was arrested, and several other delegates. One stroke followed hard upon another. A letter addressed by Gerrald—and written from London, whither he had gone when liberated on bail—to Henry Dundas, contains the following accusation; indiscreet it may be, but who shall call it unjust?

I was taken out of my bed, in the city of Edinburgh, in December last, at an early hour of the morning, by five men with clubs in their hands, whose practices induced me to think that they were not the officers, but the violators of justice. I was dragged out by them without the production of any warrant, though I repeatedly demanded to see it. My papers were forcibly seized in the same illegal manner, and the stolen effects soon to be produced in evidence against me, (by a process that would do honour to the Inquisition.) are now in the possession of men who owe their situations to your patronage. I now, as an Englishman, in whose person the sacred rights of his country have been violated, publicly demand of you, Henry Dundas, Secretary of State, and Member of the city of Edinburgh, to avow your sanction, or to express your disapprobation of their proceedings.

The private history of such movements is not only more picturesque and interesting, but often goes deeper into the springs of action than historical records. The dispersion of that Convention upon which the hopes of the People were placed, seemed at that time little less than if the Duke of Wellington were now to march into the House of Commons at the head of a file of soldiers, and bid them remove Mr Abercromby's "bauble." On the second night, all Edinburgh was in commotion; but it was not known where the delegates were to meet, and their stanch adherents were accordingly broken into detachments, searching for them all round the town. This fortunately prevented an excited mass from assembling in any one spot.

The place where the British Convention met for the last time, was in a cabinet-maker's workshop, near about the ground now occupied by Rankeillor Street, and entering from the Cross-causeway by an alley called Cowan's Close. The myrmidons of the Sheriff were better informed than the agitated members of the Sections throughout the city. It was a dark December night, and the Sheriff's train carried torches, to light them to their prey. The delegates yielded, as, upon the previous night—the President of the Convention, which happened to be Margarot, merely requiring to be handed by the Sheriff from the chair, to shew that he was coerced. The scene was very striking. The meetings of the Convention, in compliance with the spirit of the members, had always been opened and closed with prayer. A strong vein of enthusiastic piety runs through particularly the rural speeches and addresses of the period. They are full of Hebraisms, and of those turns of phrase peculiar to the Covenanters. Religion, since become rather of good fashion among the Tories, was certainly not the characteristic of the bold cavaliers of the profligate reign of Dundas; but the leading Reformers were generally "crop-eared, snivelling, praying knaves." A good many of the delegates were Dissenting clergymen. Muir, young as he was, had been an elder of the kirk. Skirving was educated for a Dissenting minister, and was a sincerely pious man; and, when the brilliant Gerrald came to join the puritans of Scotland, he disguised the high-bred gentleman and accomplished scholar under the sober garb of a Quaker, and wore his long hair in the primitive fashion of that sect. On the last night, Gerrald requested leave to pray as in ordinary sittings, before the Convention was finally dispersed by authority. The Sheriff granted permission; and he and the few persons with him, for his main force was stationed without doors, uncovered and stood mixed with the delegates, while Gerrald uttered this remarkable prayer—

"O thou Governor of the Universe! we rejoice that, at all times and in all circumstances, we have liberty to approach thy throne; and that we are assured that no sacrifice is more acceptable to thee, than that which is made for the relief of the oppressed. In this moment of trial and persecution, we pray that thou wouldst be our defender, our counsellor, and our guide. Oh, be thou a pillar of fire to us, as thou wast to our fathers of old, to enlighten and to direct us; and to our enemies a pillar of cloud, and darkness, and confusion.

"Thou art thyself the great patron of liberty. Thy service is perfect freedom. Prosper, we beseech thee, every endeavour which we make to promote thy cause; for we consider the cause of truth, or every cause which tends to promote the happiness of thy creatures, as thy cause.

"O thou merciful Father of mankind, enable us, for thy name's sake, to endure persecution with fortitude; and may we believe that all trials and tribulations of life which we endure, shall work together for good to them that love thee; and grant that, the greater the evil, and the longer it may be continued, the greater good, in thy holy and adorable providence, may be produced therefrom. And this we beg, not for our own merits, but through the merits of Him who is hereafter to judge the world in righteousness and mercy."

The thrilling power of this prayer, at a moment of great excitement, was long spoken of by the auditors as something superhuman. When the delegates left the loft, and descended in groups to the open air, the agitated crowd, and the whole scene lighted by the flaming flambeaux of the Sheriff's waiting train, was wild and striking.

"Behold!" cried Gerrald, "the funeral torches of Liberty!"

Skirving, as we have mentioned, was arrested on the same night; Gerrald, Margarot, and Sinclair on the following nights; and every hour brought its terrors in domiciliary visits, temporary arrests, and the seizure of papers. Skirving was tried on the 6th January 1794. He acted as his own counsel, and conducted his case with great ability and acuteness. Upon the voyage to Botany Bay, and from the colony, after eleven months, we find him writing to his wife in these terms:—

"My increasing love for you constrains me already to begin writing to you; but I shall keep my letter open while I may not lose the first opportunity of transmitting it. My unshaken faith in God our Saviour, that he is and will continue to be the husband of my widow, and the father of my fatherless, while the designs of his providence require the continuation of our separation, continues my support in this very unpleasant voyage. I trust your experience of this grace supports your comfort, and invigorates your faith and hope in the same Almighty power and love."

"Dec. 1794.

"I am already an heritor and freeholder in New South Wales; I have purchased a farm, crop, and work already done upon it, valued above £80; I have also got all upon it, man, woman, and beast. I am not, however, in the slave trade, be assured, but shall treat them as brethren, if they behave well: I have also the servant allowed me by the Governor, and a lad of the name of Moor, belonging to Edinburgh, a free man, who was left here by accident some time ago, whom I found in a very destitute condition. In remembrance of you, I have given the name of New Strathruddie to this far away farm, and, I trust, if I get any tolerable assistance sent me, to make it soon of more value than the old."

This excellent man and true patriot died in the spring of 1796. His death was communicated to Mrs Skirving by Palmer, in a very affecting letter, which concludes thus:—

"Mr Balmain, the principal surgeon of the settlement, and the only one at that time for this district, never paid him a single visit; but our excellent friend Mr Ross, surgeon of the Reliance, in spite of all the obloquy attending it, or the prejudice it might do his interest, attended him twice a-day. Be assured that every possible care and attention was paid him by me, Mr and Mrs Boston, and Ellis, who lives with me. He had soups, wine, spirits tea, and every comfort, which friends, money, and this island could afford.

"Three days before him, died the accomplished Mr Gerrald."

JOSEPH GERRALD was undoubtedly the most brilliant of this band of Martyrs. He was one of those rare characters, combining the highest powers of intellect with their noblest direction, that arise but once in a generation. We are glad to find that the editors of the publication before us have been able to discover several interesting additional facts concerning Gerrald.

Gerrald was the only son of an Irish gentleman who had settled in the West Indies. His mother was an Englishwoman. He was born in St Kitt's, but was brought to England in infancy; and, at twelve years of age, was left an orphan, and imagined rich. Gerrald was placed under the care of Dr Parr, who, to the last, shewed him the kindness and affection of the fondest father. The conduct of this warm and right-hearted man to his pupil Gerrald, to Mr Hone, and to all Reformers in their dark and trying hours, hallow to us every eccentricity and trifling blemish with which he has been wantonly charged: vices he had none; failings none, that did not arise from extreme good-nature and simplicity.

When Gerrald attained his majority, it was found that his fortune, like other West India possessions, was greatly embarrassed. He married rashly, and was left a young widower with two children. Misfortune and imprudence, or, at least, improvidence, threw him into pecuniary difficulty, and he went to America, and, for some years, practised at the bar. His political education, begun under Dr Parr, was thus completed in the United States.

In 1788, he returned to London, in very delicate health, to conduct a law-suit for the recovery of his patrimony; and, from this period, until, in 1793, that he arrived in Edinburgh as a delegate to the British Convention, he appears to have been a good deal interested in literary and political discussions. In boyhood, he had been known to WILLIAM PITT THE REFORMER; in manhood, he was the friend of WILLIAM GODWIN THE REFORMER.

The impassioned eloquence and enthusiastic patriotism of Gerrald, gave a strong impulse to the Reformers of Scotland. In Edinburgh, in particular, the young and ardent crowded around him night and day; hanging upon his glowing words as upon the accents of inspiration. Muir in the hulks, and, at least, as pure a patriot, was forgotten in Gerrald. Every morning his levee at the BLACK BULL was crowded with admiring delegates and worshippers from the country; and every night he was attended by a train when he visited and harangued the different sections. The alarm of Government at the increasing influence of this one man, must have justified the severity of their measures in their own eyes, though no other cause of apprehension had existed.

The traditionary accounts of the eloquence and mental power of Gerrald, will scarcely appear exaggerated to those who peruse his trial and his political writings. The Scottish bar had been shamed out of its supineness or cowardice by this time; and the Liberal counsel assigned to Gerrald by the merciful court, did their duty, as lawyers, manfully. But he was his own best advocate; and even then, his Tory judges declared that Gerrald was the most eloquent man that had ever pleaded at that bar. Had he yielded to the entreaties of Dr Parr and his other friends, he never would have appeared there; but he disdained their prudent and experienced counsels, and dree'd his weird.

"He heard my proposal attentively," says Dr Parr, in a written memorandum of this occurrence, "but with no emotion of joy. At first he paused; then, after discussing with me the propriety of the proposal, he peremptorily refused to accede to it; and finally, after hearing my earnest entreaties and affectionate remonstrances, closed our conversation in words to the following effect:—'In any ordinary case,' said he 'I should, without the smallest hesitation, and with the warmest gratitude, avail myself of your offer. I readily admit that my associates will not suffer more, because I suffer less. I am inclined to believe with you, that the sense of their own suffrings will be alleviated by their knowledge of my escape. But my honour is pledged; and no opportunity for flight, however favourable—no expectation of danger, however alarming—no excuse for consulting my own safety, however plausible, shall induce me to violate that pledge. I gave it to men whom I esteem, and respect, and pity; to men who, by avowing similar principles, have been brought into similar peril; to men who were confirmed in those principles and led into that peril, by the influence of my own arguments, my own persuasions, and my own example. Under these circumstances, they became partakers of my responsibility to the law; and, therefore under no circumstances, will I shrink from the participation with them in the rigours of any punishment which that law, as likely to be administered in Scotland, may ordain for us.' He uttered the foregoing words emphatically, but not turbulently; and, finding him fixedly determined upon returning that night to Scotland, I did not harass his mind by any farther remonstrance. He was very calm, before we parted; and I left him, under the very

In this compilation, we do not find a letter written by Dr Parr to the unfortunate Gerrald in the hulks, which the most obdurate cannot read without being melted; but we meet, for the first time with a document of very great interest —a noble letter from Godwin to his friend, when upon the eve of the trial. Godwin was aware of the warm and impetuous temper of his friend Gerrald—a "child of the sun;" and, without seeking to damp his generous ardour, he offers him the wisest counsel with the warmest sympathy. We shall take but one passage from a letter which cannot be neglected in whatever memoir of its distinguished writer may appear.

"Your trial, if you so please, may be a day such as England, and, I believe the world, never saw. It may be the means of converting thousands, and progressively millions, to the cause of reason and public justice. You have a great stake. You place your fortune, your youth, your liberty, and your talents, on a single throw. If you must suffer, do not, I conjure you, suffer without first making use of this opportunity of telling a tale upon which the happiness of nations depends. Spare none of the resources of your powerful mind. Is this a day for reserves, a day to be slurred over in negligence and neglect, the day that constitutes the very crisis of your fate?

"Never forget that juries are men, and that men are made of penetrable stuff. Probe all the recesses of their souls. Do not spend your strength in vain defiance and empty vaunting. Let every syllable you utter be fraught with persuasion. What an event would it be for England and mankind, if you could gain an acquittal! Is not such an event worthy striving for? It is in man, I am sure it is, to effect that event. Gerrald, you are that man. Fertile in genius, strong in moral feeling, prepared with every accomplishment that literature and reflection can give. Stand up to the situation. Be wholly yourself."

"Above all, let me entreat you to abstain from all harsh epithets and bitter invective. Shew that you are not terrible, but kind, and anxious for the good of all. Truth will lose nothing by this. Truth can never gain by passion, violence, and resentment. It is never so strong as in the firm, fixed mind, that yields to the emotions neither of rage nor fear. It is by calm and collected boldness that we can shake the pillars of the vault of Heaven. How great will you appear if you shew that all the injustice with which you are treated cannot move you; that you are too great to be wounded by their arrows; that you still hold the steadfast course which becomes the friend of man; and that, while you expose their rottenness, you harbour no revenge? Men of this unaltered spirit, whom no persecution can embitter, the public want. The jury, the world, will feel your value, if you shew yourself such a man. Let no human ferment mix in the sacred work.

> "'We will be sacrificers, but not butchers, Cassius.
> We'll carve them as a dish fit for the Gods—
> Not hew them as a carcase fit for hounds.'

("You will not mistake my meaning in this quotation. I adopt the spirit, not the letter.)

"Imitate the courage and self-possession, but not the barbarity, of Horne Tooke, in his last trial. You will find some invaluable hints in Hawles's pamphlet.

"Farewell!—My whole soul goes with you.

"W. Godwin.
Jan. 29, 1794."

"You represent us all!"

Gerrald's defence justified every hope that Godwin could have entertained from the talents and power of his friend, and the event every fear of the Reformers. He languished for above a year in Newgate, having for his companion his infant daughter. We think this poor child died soon afterwards. Upon the 2d May 1795, he was suddenly roused from a sick bed and conveyed to Gosport, where he was put on board the Sovereign transport, which was already freighted with felons, and about to sail for Botany Bay. His removal was so abrupt and unexpected that he was not allowed to provide himself with the common necessaries of life, nor even to take leave of his orphan children.

From on board the hulks at Portsmouth, Gerrald wrote farewell letters to many of his friends; and the following epistle throws so much light upon the true character of the kind-hearted Dr Parr's "dear, dear, Joseph," that we cannot forbear citing it:—

"My Dear Mr Philips—I know not how to express the rising sentiments of my heart for your unbounded kindness to me. The best return, the only return I can make, is, to convince you, by the virtue and energy of my conduct, that I am not altogether unworthy of your friendship. A parade of professions neither suits you, nor me, nor the occasion. You know my feelings, and will, therefore, do justice to them; and with this simple observation, I close the subject. I have repeatedly attempted to write to my ever honoured and loved friend and father, Dr Parr; but it is impossible. The tender and filial affection which I bear to him, the recollection of the many endearing scenes which we have passed together, the sacred relation which subsists between Joseph Gerrald and that Samuel Parr who poured into my untutored mind the elements of all, either of learning or morals which is valuable about me; whose great instructions planted in my bosom the seeds of magnanimity, which I trust I now display, and at which persecution herself must stand abashed; all these, my friend, rush at once upon my mind, and form a conflict of feeling, an awful confusion, which I cannot describe; but which he, who is the cause, I know can feel, and feel in the most full and virtuous extent. To the greater part of my friends I have written—to Dr Parr I have not written; but to his heart my silence speaks. The painter who could not express the excessive grief, covered with a veil the face of Agamemnon. Tell him, then, my dear Mr Philips, that, if ever I have spoken previshly of his supposed neglect of me, he must, nay, I know he will, attribute it to its real cause—a love, vehement and jealous, and which, in a temper like Gerrald's, lights its torches at the fire of the Furies. And when my tongue uttered any harshness of expression, even at that very period my heart would have bled for him; and the compunction of the next moment inflicted a punishment far more than adequate to the guilt of the preceding one. Tell him to estimate my situation, not by the tenderness of his own feelings, but by the firmness of mine. Tell him that, if my destiny is apparently rigorous, the unconquerable firmness of my mind breaks the blow which it cannot avert; and that, enlisted as I am in the cause of truth and virtue, I bear about me a patient integrity which no blandishments can corrupt, and a heart which no dangers can daunt. Tell him, in a word, that as I have hitherto lived, let the hour of dissolution come when it may, I shall die the pupil of Samuel Parr," &c. &c.

His other letters breathe the most dignified philosophy and manly firmness. We have already told the fate of this "rash and unfortunate, but most ingenious and eloquent man."

Such were the men, The Political Martyrs of Scotland, for whom Mr Hume is about to bestir himself. Whatever mode he may consider best fitted to do honour to their memories, and to the cause for which they so nobly suffered, and whatever time he may deem most expedient, we are confident that every Reformer in the United Kingdoms will approve his generous purpose, and cordially support his measure.

Let us again recommend the three small publications before us to Reformers. They will form use ful portion of their political manual.

DINNER DIRGE FOR THE TORIES OF THE MODERN ATHENS.

Good people, hear
Our tale so drear,
And us poor Tories pity,
Who cannot get
Our dinner eat,
After so much entreaty.
By some a host
Is needed most;
But that is not our quest—
We've hosts enow,
But yet, somehow,
We cannot get a guest.
We bought nice prog,
And brewed stout grog,
To entertain our Bobby;
But some folks west
Have prigged our guest,
And swashed our guzzling hobby.
They've clubbed their bobs,
(Excuse our sobs,)
To give Bob a rare blow out;
To us a clean
Blow up it's been,
For our dinner's now a rout.
The truth to tell,
We know full well,
Bob thinks (though he sings dumb)
A banquet here
Would be small beer
After a feed so rum.
Our feast has past
Into a fast,
Our laurels changed to rue;
Our encore's missed,
Our fete's unblest,
We never looked so blue.
But yet, Bob P——
To feed, may feel
Inclined some other day;
So, to cure grief,
We'll cure our beef,
And stow the junk away! S.

ON DRYING SOME WILD FLOWERS FOR A SISTER IN AMERICA.

I love them for calling me back into dreams
Of the blue Highland mountains and echoing streams.
CAMPBELL.

Go, flow'rets of my native land, across the billow's foam!
Bear sweet thoughts to a gentle heart of her own mountain home!
And as she sees in fancy's eye each dear familiar spot,
Oh, tell her that on Scotia's hills she ne'er shall be forgot!
Her figure floats before me still with all its wonted grace—
I see the smile of fond delight upon her lovely face;
And when the evening breezes sigh through the slight aspen tree,
I think her voice is blending there its wild sweet melody.

* * * * * *

I stood beside a corn-field, rich with autumn's golden hue,
Where scarlet poppies to the breeze their fairy banners threw;
I gathered one, its leaves I traced with rude, unskilful hand—
Yet may it bring a thought to thee of thine own blessed land.
This blossomed by a lovely stream, the blue forget-me-not,
As it had sprung from out the wave in that secluded spot.

It was a wild and lovely place: the torrent's dashing might Flung up a cloud of silver spray into the sunny light,
And rushed among the large old rocks o'erhung with lichens grey—
Now hid beneath the bending trees, now flashing into day.

But there was one deep pool where heaven lay glassed in deepest rest,
With all the soft and dreamy clouds that wandered o'er her breast;
And those sweet flowers of purest blue grew all around the spot,
Recalling many an absent form—the loved, the unforgot!

I would these flowers might deck thy hair, and bring thee back the time
When thy foot has pressed the glowing heath in Scotia's happy clime!
I would that o'er their blossoms I might breath a spell of power,
To keep through many an after day the beauty of this hour—
In all the freshness of their spring to meet thy gentle eye—
To bear afar my love to thee, and in thy sight to die!
It may not be—the fairest things but live their little hour,
And change will cloud the clearest sky, and dim the brightest flower.

I would that thou wert here!—the flowers are all so fair and sweet,
And showers of roses strew around a carpet for thy feet;
The heather bell is crimsoning upon the mountains high,
And nature laughs in loveliness where'er I turn my eye:
It is a glorious home of ours, this land of flood and fell—
Soon may I hail thee back to it!—sweet sister, fare-thee-well! INEZ.

HISTORY OF THE CHURCH OF SCOTLAND, IN RELATION TO ENDOWMENTS; BY ALEXANDER FYFE, SURGEON.

We wish that those who are disposed the most heartily to concur in Mr Fyfe's opinions about state endowments for the clergy, and state-paid churches of any kind—whether a Covenanted Kirk or a Popish or Prelatic Establishment—may yet consider him the most judicious of pleaders against the errors they perceive, or wise in his generation. That he is thoroughly conscientious and uncompromisingly honest, no one, we think, can question. The leading object of his history is to demonstrate, by a chain of facts, that state endowments are injurious alike to civil society and to the interests of religion, and contrary to the law of God. But if it be so in the comparatively pure and poor Kirk of Scotland, what are the corruptions and abuses of the other state establishments? With them, however, he does not directly interfere. The history, which is dutifully dedicated to Lord Melbourne, opens with a general view of the Church of Scotland from the period of the Reformation to the union of the crowns, and goes formally on, taking in order each successive reign, down to that of his present Majesty. Mr Fyfe appears to have no fault to find with the doctrines of the Evangelical division of the Church of Scotland; and, indeed, all his leanings appear to be towards what is called the strictly Evangelical party, while he professes to be quite as tolerant as the most liberal philosopher of these enlightened days. We find him often disposed to blame, even to captiousness, the acts of our venerable Assemblies; but he has certainly made out with remarkable clearness, that the most public-spirited opposition to tyranny, and to power assumed over the conscience, upon which pride is now taken by the whole Establishment, was made by the minority at different periods—by dissentients, and by no means the acts of established Presbyterian churchmen as a body. But hostility to all endowments and to every shred of state pay is his avowed object; and he has certainly collected many startling facts, and gone a good way back to find them; as thus:—

We learn from Knox's history of Scotland, and more especially from Buchanan's introduction to that history, that the Reformers, and even the more disinterested part of the Reforming clergy, were horrified at the idea of having the clergy endowed by the state; for they were firm in the belief that it was owing to the rich benefices which the Scottish clergy had enjoyed from the state, under Popery, that all the Popish corruptions had originated. Hence, Buchanan, in his introduction to the history of Knox, speaks thus:—"After the Prelates of the sixth century had obtained a state endowment for themselves, they got Presbyters endowed also, [Chapel-of-Ease men,] and the consequence was, that by little and little [were brought in] idleness and slackness in discharging their calling, from whence are risen [that is, from state endowments to the clergy] all the evils we have since seen in the church."

Such were the opinions of Knox and Buchanan concerning state endowments to the clergy; and we marvel very much that those who now most extol the opinions and deeds of these great men, should entertain a different opinion from them. Knox died soon after state endowments began to be given to the clergy; and, although he enjoyed a salary from the town council of Edinburgh, he could not be said to be a state pensioner, or an advocate for state endowments. True, indeed, he expressed his indignation when the church property was, as he thought, so unequally divided, that "two parts," as he said, "were given to the service of the devil, [i. e., the ejected bishops, &c.,] and one part divided between the Popish Queen and the servants of Christ;" but this only argues his hatred of Popery, and not his love of endowments.

We are not so sure of this. Mr Fyfe imagines that the use and wont of Popish times, in a very poor country, made the purest of the Reformed clergy tacitly acquiesce in taking pay, while the others were as greedy of lucre as ever their Romish predecessors had shewn themselves. Then it first was (in 1575)

That the triumphant majorities began on the wrong side in the Scottish Church; now it was that the Moderate party got the ascendancy; and had the true ministers of Christ then been wise, they would have listened to the voice of their Master, when he says and said to them, "Come out from among them, and be ye separate;" but, being unwilling to trust for their support to the voluntary contributions of their hearers, and puffed up with the vain hope of one day gaining the ascendancy over the Moderate or corrupt party in the Church, they have continued from that day, 1575, to this, 1835, a period of 260 years, battling for the mastery; but, as the vote on patronage, at last Assembly, proves, they are to this day in the minority. The lovers of patronage and state pensions are still the dominant party in the Scottish church, as is too evident, also, from the zeal displayed by them, in order to obtain from the state more endowments; the love of which, as we have seen, gave rise to the introduction of Prelacy, and almost all the other evils which have stained and disgraced the Scottish church for the last 260 years. The Church of Scotland is radically and essentially corrupt, by being built on the law of patronage, which she can no more alter than she can the Reform Bill, unless she give up all claim to endowments; for the specified condition upon which the clergy hold their stipends is, "That they admit such qualified ministers as his Majesty and other patrons present to vacant parishes."—Hist. Scot. vol. iii. p. 181-2.

As soon as the unappropriated church lands were annexed to the crown for civil purposes, the purity of the Church became remarkable; and, although James VI. had great doubts about properly maintaining his dominion over clergymen whom he did not pay, he was enchanted, for a time, with the change which increased his revenue and kept worldly-minded men out of the church.

Having, soon after the passing of the act of annexation, left Scotland for Denmark, whither he went to be married, he learned on his return that order had been maintained during his absence; and, upon seeing the piety and harmony that prevailed in the General Assembly, "in a rapture, and with his hands lifted up, he praised God that he was born in such a time as in the light of the gospel, and in such a place as to be king in such a Kirk." "The Kirk in Geneva," exclaimed he, "keepeth pasch and yule. What have they for them? They have no institution. As for our neighbour Kirk in England, their service is an evil-said mass in English; they want nothing of the mass but the liftings. I charge you, my good people, ministers, doctors, elders, nobles, gentlemen, and barons, to stand to your purity; and I, forsooth, so long as I brook my life and crown, shall maintain the same against all deadly opposition." This speech was received by the General Assembly with a transport of joy.

This did not last long. The King needed the engine of a state church; and over a church without endowments, what prince ever yet maintained influence? The patrimony of the Church —that is, of the Catholic Church—was accordingly given back to the Kirk. She was established, and her purity tainted, according to our author, by the same inauspicious act which endowed her. The people of Scotland called that "a black year" in which this act was passed.

Our author shews that King Gregory, and David, that "sair saunt for the crown," first gave away the nation's property to the cunning priests, and thus forced their successors to tax the nation to make good the defect. Thus, "the public property was swindled from the nation by the craft of priests and the simplicity and superstition of kings." But this is not all. Mr Fyfe, as a New-Testament Christian, disapproves of every separate article of what is still called the charter of the Church of Scotland, obtained in the same "black year." Patronage he, of course, utterly reprobates. But, farther—

> The Church of Christ may ask the countenance of the king, but never his permission to keep the ordinances and commandments of her GREAT HEAD. To ask his permission to do so, implies either mockery to the king or insult to Christ; for, at all hazards, she is bound to obey Christ; and to ask liberty of an earthly power to do so, in such a way as to imply that, if said earthly power do not grant her request, she would be obliged to submit to his majesty, is at once to place the authority of the king above that of Christ. This did not the three Israelites with Nebuchadnezzar. The Church, therefore, had no business to ask liberty of the king to keep her General Assemblies, her Synods, Presbyteries, and Kirk-Sessions, seeing she was commanded to do so by the KING of kings and LORD of lords; for by doing so she dishonoured herself and degraded her great Master.

> The 5th, 6th, and 10th articles in the charter are liable to the very same objections; but especially article 10th. This article, as it imposes the law of patronage, is confessedly anti-Christian. Yet this article forms the very foundation stone of the present Church Establishment, for upon it is built the right which ministers have to their stipends. Hence it says that ministers are to have a right to the benefices, "provided they admit such qualified ministers as his majesty and other patrons shall present." Hist. Scot. vol. iii. p. 182. Hence, it is manifest, that, if the Church refuse to admit such as his majesty and other patrons present, she has no right whatever, by the boasted charter, to the stipends.

When James, acting upon the maxim "no bishop no king," began to attempt the introduction of Prelacy into Scotland, the complete restoration of the patrimony of the Church was his bait—and a successful one it proved with the greater number of the clergy. But the history of this well-baited attempt is less interesting than the clear demonstration that it never was the Kirk of Scotland, as an establishment, but a few faithful found within her body, who successfully opposed the crown.

We have given an account of a mighty struggle between liberty and tyranny, truth and error; and now an important question arises, whether was it the Established Church of Scotland that fought so nobly for the truth and against despotism, or those who dissented from the deed of that Church? It could not be the Established Church that made these struggles for liberty; for we have seen that she decided by a majority of ten, in favour of corruption and despotism. Is it not, therefore, strange, that the votaries of the Establishment in the present day, should have the effrontery to claim those for their forefathers, who suffered, and struggled, and bled, and died, in defence of civil and religious liberty? The truth is manifest—the forefathers of the advocates of establishments were those who espoused the cause of despotism, who established the grossest errors in the church by law, and who persecuted unto the death the friends of God and man. Why is it, then, that the advocates of establishments in the present day, are so anxious to have it believed that the struggles which were made by those who opposed the Assemblies at Perth and Dundee, were made by the Church of Scotland? Every discerning mind must at once see, that the reason is, because by clothing themselves with the garments of the righteous, they can best succeed in deceiving the people, and in carrying their own selfish purposes; hence, the most bigoted among them are loudest in calling upon the people "to contend and fight for that Establishment for which their ancestors bled and died." But those who "bled and died" did so while fighting and contending against that very Establishment for the support of which men are now called upon to contend; and it is the children of the persecutors and murderers of the Dissenters of former days, who are at this day raising the war cry. Every man who wishes to know the truth has only to look at the decisions of the General Assemblies of the Established Church, in order to learn that, as an establishment, the Church of Scotland could never suffer persecution; but that, as such, she could, and she did, persecute all those who opposed her corruptions.

Roman Catholics, looking at the corruptions and persecutions of the Established Church of Scotland, as well as of England and Ireland, are perfectly disgusted and horrified at Protestantism; and, while they only look at these, it is not to be wondered at although they should live in the determination to continue Catholics and Papists, and to hate Protestantism with a perfect hatred: but it becomes them, for their own sakes, as well as for the sake of truth, to look at Protestantism, not as it appears in connection with an Establishment, but as it appeared in a Ferguson, and in a Melville, and those brave men who opposed the corruptions and persecuting principles of the Scottish Establishment; or as it now appears in the conduct of Dissenters in the present day. At the same time, they, the Catholics, should never forget that the persecuting principles of Knox and others, were first learned in the Church of Rome; and that the principle of persecution was almost the only bad principle that Knox did not cast away when he came out of that corrupt and debased church.

In the year 1600, the General Assembly which was to decide the fate of Presbytery, met at Montrose, as being most convenient for the ministers of the north, who had been well schooled by the cubicular, Sir Patrick Murray. "The attendance of members was full, and each side promised themselves the victory." The friends of truth trusted to the unanswerable force of their arguments; their opponents of the Establishment, to the more cogent influence of the crown and the endowments.

The transactions are detailed.

In this way was Prelacy introduced into the Church of Scotland, partly by threatening, partly by cunning, and chiefly by holding out the prospect and offer of endowments to the clergy. It is gratifying, however, to observe such a great number of faithful men as there were in the Scottish Church at this period. The act in favour of Prelacy was carried only by a very small majority, so that the number who opposed it must have been great; and we may learn their spirit, their zeal, their piety, and their views of endowments, from their great leader, Andrew Melville. Upon a motion, whether the voters from the Church were to be chosen annually or for life, it was stated in the Assembly—"That, if they did not consent to the voters being appointed for life, they would lose the benefit," (the stipend.) "The loss will be but small," answered Andrew Melville, who was present as a doctor. "But then," it was said, "the Ministry would be left to contempt and poverty." "It was their Master's lot before them," rejoined Melville; "and better poverty with sincerity, than promotion with corruption."

That faithful body of ministers and others of which Melville was the leader, contemned the endowments, and everything else that had a tendency to make them depart from their duty to Christ. Such was that body of faithful men which formed the Church of Christ in Scotland, and which was opposed to the Established Church of Scotland. Christ was the head of the one, and the king the head of the other. It is to be hoped that still there are in the Established Church of Scotland many who only want a Melville to lead them forth to declare themselves opposed to the present corrupt Establishment.

Such should remember that to support the Episcopal Establishment in England and Ireland, lest, by allowing their endowments to be taken away, the endowments of the Church of Scotland might follow, is the same as if they were at once to declare that sooner than give up their stipends they would become Episcopalians; for they can assign no other reason for supporting the Irish or English Establishment, than that, "if they allowed them to be impaired or abolished, then the taking away of the endowments of the Scottish Church would follow."

Mr Fyfe successfully shews that every Christian establishment has persecuted, from the Church of Rome to that of Scotland; and he goes rather out of his way to attack one of the late Catholic writers. As strongly, however, does he reprobate the persecution of Catholics, and also those Popish relics

Which are still nourished and cherished by the Established clergy, such as Patronage, Prelacy, and State Endowments. Are not these the roots of bitterness, which at this moment are springing up, and threatening to convulse the British empire? And will the Established clergy cling to these, and not rather pluck them up and cast them away? Knox, and Buchanan, and others, have all blamed the state endowments, as the cause of all those corruptions which clung to the Roman Catholic Establishment; and nothing so astonishes me as the fact that Knox and others should have themselves sought state endowments, or that the clergy of the present Establishment should still cling to them.

The extreme simplicity of Mr Fyfe's astonishment will, we suspect, amuse some of his readers. His idea of Establishment is, indeed, quite primitive—we are far from saying that it may not be scriptural.

All that the members of Christ's Church, whether individually or collectively, ought to require from the State, is the protection of their persons and properties, in the free exercise of their duties to God and the King, according to their consciences and the unerring word of God. If such a protection be called an Establishment of the Christian and Protestant religion, I have no objections that in this way the Church be established; for such was the establishment of Protestantism at the Reformation. The great thing then wanted by the Reformed Church was the protection of the state against the fury and rage of the Roman Catholics. The Protestant clergy, indeed, sought, along with this, endowments; but, at the Reformation and establishment of Protestantism, they got no endowments, nor for several years afterwards; nor did the King or other patrons then exercise the law of Patronage; which was never imposed on the Reformed Church, till the clergy began to take the stipends. The establishment, then, which was set up at the Reformation, is that for which I contend.

Let us now follow, for a short way, Mr Fyfe's view of our Establishment, tainted, as he alleges, with dangerous errors before she was seven years old, "and, before she was forty, covered with corruption as a leprosy."

So far from being friendly to the purity of religion, and the peace and prosperity of the country, she has been the inveterate enemy of both. We have seen, also, that the purity of religion was preserved by those only who were persecuted by the Establishment; and are warranted to conclude, that, had it not been for such as dissented from the Establishment of the Scottish Church, the last vestige of pure Christianity would, under the Establishment's persecuting and withering hand, have long since perished from the land. Let us, therefore, hear no more talk about establishments of religion being the grand conservators of the unity and purity of the faith, or of knowledge, and the prosperity of the land. The truth is, as proved by history, that establishments of religion have been the prolific source of mischief to the country, and the enemies of pure religion.

The errors and backslidings of the Church of Scotland are painted in a manner which reminds us of the testimonies of the dying martyrs of Prelacy against the defections of the self-seeking clergy of their times—as this of the famous Donald Cargill:—"My soul trembles to think how little of regeneration there is amongst the ministers and professors of Scotland. Oh, the ministers of Scotland! how have they betrayed Christ's interests and beguiled souls! They have not entered in themselves; and them that were entering in they hindered. They have sold the things of Christ and the liberties of his church, for a short and cursed quiet to themselves. . . . . They are more one, and at peace with God's enemies, after they have done all their mischiefs, than they were at first when they put hand to hand to them." Mr Fyfe would appear to think that the words used by Cargill upon the scaffold, of which these are a portion, are still equally applicable to the great majority of the endowed clergy.

The Protectorate was a happy period for pure religion in Scotland, according to our author; as well as to civil liberty and social improvement. The reign of Cromwell, in short, was distinguished by the total absence of religious persecution, by the impartial administration of justice, and the encouragement of trade.

"The Kirk was deprived of the power of inflicting civil penalties, or, what is nearly similar, the Magistrates were forbid to enforce the civil penalties annexed to ecclesiastical censures; and the ministers having no longer the secular arm to appeal to, applied themselves more to the instruction of their people, and to their immediate and proper pastoral duties, than to those political dissensions which had so much divided them. The dreaded toleration of sectaries, so far from hurting the Presbyterian system, seems to have purified and invigorated it, by exciting the zeal and emulation of the ministers, who began to look upon the questions which had of late divided them as matters of inferior moment. The Synods and Presbyteries were allowed to meet unmolested; nor were the ministers otherwise disturbed, than by being threatened with a deprivation of their salaries, if they continued openly to pray for the restoration of Charles Stuart as King of Scotland; a moderate penalty, compared with the infliction which some of them afterwards endured, for praying for his conversion;" and a most effectual way to stop their mouths.

But the Restoration brought back the old evil in an aggravated form.

The ruling party in the Kirk continued as intolerant and as wedded to their evil principles as ever. Such principles having blinded their minds, they longed for the return of monarchy, and could not rest till they had recalled their Covenanted King. So blind were they to his vices, and so intent upon re-establishing him on the throne, that, without any stipulation except the promise of a Prince who was practised in deceit and blackened with perjury, they at once put him in possession of unlimited power. . . . . They would have a King and an exclusive religious Establishment, and they got both; and the following extracts will give the reader a pretty distinct idea of the nature of a complete establishment. And let it be particularly observed, that the establishment of religion was never so complete as it was during the reign of Charles II.; nor, under any other monarch, was the system of establishments, as a system, ever so faithfully or so punctually put in operation: consequently, if any one wish to know whether a civil establishment of religion be a good or a bad thing, he ought to look at it in its full operation, as it was to be seen under Charles II. Every system must be regulated by certain laws. Now, what are the laws of the Establishment? 1st, That all sectaries be extirpated, or, at least, excluded from all places of civil trust, and denied all emoluments from the state. 2d, That uniformity in religion be enforced by all civil pains and penalties. 3d, That all idolators, witches, or those called witches, and all adulterers and blasphemers be put to death. 4th, That the King be acknowledged as supreme sovereign over all persons and all causes, civil and spiritual. 5th, That his Majesty, and other patrons, have the sole power of presentation to vacant parishes. 6th, That every minister be obliged to preach and pray agreeably to the supreme will and desire of his Majesty, according to the xxiii. chapter of the Confession of Faith; and, 7th, That the clergy be paid by the state. Such are the laws by which the system of ecclesiastical establishments is governed; and, if any one of these laws are suspended or not put into execution, the Establishment is not complete; but Charles observed most religiously to put them all in execution, and, therefore, under him the system of ecclesiastical establishment was most complete.

We may spare our readers the dark scenes that occurred until the Torwood excommunication was followed by the execution of Cargill.

There is a just complaint made of the Church of Scotland allowing King William III. to obtain complete dominion over her, and yielding to the iniquitous oaths and subscriptions imposed by the government.

There were a few faithful and conscientious men in the Church of Scotland, who exposed the sinfulness of these ensnaring oaths; shewed that the administration of such oaths was making the ministers of Christ subject to every change of the civil government; and was nothing but an Erastian addition to the ministerial qualification prescribed by Jesus Christ. Among these faithful men were Messrs James Hogg and John Hepburn, against whom their brethren in the Establishment directed all the shafts of their vengeance. They not only suspended and deposed the latter, and stirred up the Magistrates against him, but also got him imprisoned in Edinburgh jail, until he should submit to the church.

The Roman Catholics could scarcely carry persecution farther than this; nor have we any instance on record to point out a more manifest abuse of civil power by any church, to serve Jesuitical purposes, than that perpetrated by the Church of Scotland on this occasion. The very act of 1693, empowering the clergy to inflict civil pains and penalties for ecclesiastical delinquencies, is an outrage against the word of God; and it cannot be denied but that the Church which had recourse to the civil power to inflict such punishments, was in so far in league with antichrist.

We do not profess to agree with all Mr Fyfe has advanced; but to his last proposition we most heartily assent: the power thus assumed by the clergy, is not of Christ. This was the fit preparation for such penal enactments as immediately followed.

In 1694, the Church agreed upon a formula for admitting the curates, who were, without censure, admitted accordingly. Meanwhile, the Parliament passed several acts against Papists and other sects. We may give the following as an instance of the kind of acts that were passed against these:—"Item, No suspect Papist may teach any science, art, or exercise, in families or outwith, nor may a Protestant have a Popish domestick servant, under the pain of five hundred merks; and these pains may be pursued by any Protestant, and, upon conviction, he is to have the same for reward."—William, Par. 1, Sess. 9, chap. 3.

That the Established Church of Scotland excited the Government to persecute the Papists, is evident from the Act of Assembly 1695, which runs thus—"Recommended to all provincial Synods, Presbyteries, and Kirk-sessions within the National Church, to take particular notice of trafficking priests, and appointed that lists be taken up of their names, and given to the Privy Council, with an address for executing the laws against them," &c.—Laws of the Church of Scotland, vol. ii., p. 194.

The reign of Queen Anne witnessed greater innovation, and a more truckling submission. The Presbyterian clergy prayed that their form of religion should be established unalterably in Scotland.

To please them, the government consented to pass an act to that effect, provided they would consent to the establishment of Episcopacy, or any other form of church government that the Parliament might think expedient in England. The commission of the Assembly demurred to this, as inconsistent with the covenanted engagements of the Church of Scotland, by which she was bound to seek the extirpation of Prelacy, and not its establishment. "But the expectation of £400,000 sterling, to balance the loss of Darien" (a colony which had been established on the American Isthmus in 1699, by the Scots) "to the Spaniards, through the treachery of the English, and the hopes of worldly advantages from the court, or in point of trade, made most of the Parliamenters overlook everything religious; so that the perpetual establishment of Episcopacy and the ceremonies in England, as well as of Presbyterian government, and the simplicity of gospel worship attending it in Scotland, were both fixed as fundamental and unalterable conditions of the Union: and each nation, by a solemn deed of their Parliament, guaranteed to the other an Establishment of religion, not a little contrary to their own."—Brown, vol. ii., p. 401—2.

It is not only extraordinary, but truly lamentable to think how the Church of Scotland had degenerated so far as to give her consent to the establishment of a religion which she knew, and which all Presbyterians had testified, to be contrary to the word of God.

There was no such toleration for the Catholics; and, although they had no longer power to persecute, the Established Kirk did not cease to persecute them.

In 1714, the following act was passed in the General Assembly:—"Ministers and members of kirk sessions are enjoined to keep a watchful eye over Papists, and to deal with them for their conviction, according to act 8, ass. 1707; and to give yearly into the Presbytery lists of their names and designations, particularly of Popish bishops, priests, jesuits, and other traffickers; and of apostates from the true religion, with an account of their Popish meetings, times and places thereof, and witnesses for proving the same; with the names of children under Popish parents, tutors, curators, and governors, and of the nearest Protestant relations of such children; and likewise of all Papists who keep schools, or teach any science or exercise; and also of Protestants who keep Popish servants; and of all Papists who have succeeded to lands or heritages, within their bounds, since the year 1700, &c. &c.

But, while making these heavy accusations against the Assembly and the Kirk, our author admits that its unchristian acts were accompanied by many good deeds, such as propagating the gospel—with, however, this important saving clause, that all of these, her schools and missions, were conducted upon the voluntary principle, and by voluntary subscriptions.

After shewing how contemptuous and intolerant the Tories and Jacobite Episcopalians have ever been of Presbyterians, the author asks, with great pertinence, and we really should be glad to know how he is to be answered—

With what degree of propriety or consistency is it that the Presbyterian Church of Scotland now joins with Episcopalians to put down Popery? With what degree of commonsense is it that they now exert themselves in favour of that bloody Church which persecuted and put to death their forefathers? When the Church of Scotland, and all true Presbyterians and Protestants, were exerting themselves to the utmost in favour of King George I. and against the Popish Pretender, the Episcopalian clergy and their adherents, almost to a man, opposed them, and persecuted them, and pulled down their houses; while they supported the Pretender and encouraged the Papists. History fully warrants me to say, that, had it not been for the Presbyterians, and other conscientious Protestant Dissenters, neither the Elector of Hanover, nor any of his offspring would ever have sat on the British throne. His present Majesty will no doubt remember this, and judge what degree of confidence he can place in the sincerity and purity of these men's motives, who have again raised the Tory cry, "Church in danger!"

We are ashamed to cite the servile addresses of the Assemblies to the different princes that have sat by deputy in their convocations; and with the heresies and doctrinal errors which crept into the Church, it is not our intention to interfere, though we find them exposed here. They were, our author thinks, a natural sequence to the Church of Scotland swearing to maintain Prelacy as by law established, and submitting quietly to the evils of patronage, and other errors. Among the numerous grave charges brought against the Kirk in more recent times, are not only first acquiescing in, and then upholding the principle of patronage, but the enforcing of violent settlements; tyranny to the Seceders; opposing (at first at least,) missionary societies, Sabbath schools, and itinerant preachers; subserviency to every Tory government, and sycophancy to the court. But this is not all.

Besides backing the loyal "life-and-fortune" men in instigating the coalition war against France, the Scottish clergy are charged with co-operating to maintain Popish establishments abroad.

Let it be observed, that the General Assembly not only sent addresses to the King, in which they encourage him to prosecute the war that had begun—as is manifest from the address in 1799, signed by William Moodie, the then Moderator of the Assembly—but, in 1798, they excited the people, in every parish throughout the whole country, to enter into a voluntary subscription to carry on the war, "in defence," as they said, "of the constitution, religion, and independence of the country;" but in reality for the re-establishment of Popery and monarchical government.

The Established Church of Scotland laboured hard for the re-establishment of Popery in France, and contributed to cause the blood of millions to be shed for this nefarious purpose. In the address to which we have already alluded, they deprecate the overthrow of the established religion in France, and encourage his majesty to prosecute the war, at the same time intimating that no establishment would be safe if the revolutionary principles which were rampant in France were not put down, and monarchical government and the established religion again restored.—See Edinburgh Advertiser for May 1799; also, Acts of Assembly for the same year. From these things, the public will be able to judge with what degree of consistency the Established Church now cry out so lustily against Popery.

We apprehend that, had Mr Fyfe diligently searched the Gazettes for the loyal effusions of Assemblies and Synods for the last forty years, and parish annals for the political conduct of the Lapslies of the Kirk, he might have found not a few examples and anecdotes to grace his pages withal, which would have surpassed those he has collected; and in servility of tone have out-done any church. Some of the addresses are, however, too good to pass unnoticed.

About this time, several attempts were made by individuals and societies, called "Radicals," to bring about a reform in the government; and, unquestionably, it stood in need of reform: perhaps the Assembly had reference more particularly to their conduct, or rather the principles they held, when it complained of "the prevalence of infidelity." Now, while every honest man must condemn the means employed by these Radicals—some of whom fell at Bonnymuir by a body of cavalry under Lieutenant Hodgson; and others of them were banished, and some beheaded—yet, it must be admitted, that in principle these unfortunate men were right when they sought reform; and, had the Assembly addressed the Throne on the necessity of reform in the State, in place of attempting to aggravate the errors of these poor, unhappy, and oppressed men, we think they would have been more in the way of their duty. But, unfortunately for the credit of the Assembly, it has been their uniform practice, during the last hundred years, to support and encourage a Tory government, and to discountenance all attempts at reform. In their address, the Assembly complain to his Majesty of the prevalence of licentiousness. Perhaps this was to please the King, who, about this time, had assumed to himself a degree of sanctity, while he endeavoured to blacken the character of Caroline, the persecuted and oppressed Queen. She was, at this time, cruelly blamed with licentiousness; and, as if to please the King and aggravate her grief—which was already weightier than human nature could support—the Established clergy not only reiterated the cry of the monarch against the prevalence of licentiousness, but at his mandate, they ceased to pray for the afflicted Queen—a degree of servility and baseness this, unparalleled in the annals of history since the world began. The professed ministers of Jesus Christ refuse to obey his command to "pray for all," and obey the unjust mandate of one of the most licentious men that ever lived!!! It is the knowledge of this fact that induces us to suspect that, in their address relative to the prevalence of infidelity and licentiousness, the Assembly had some such sinister ends in view as we have mentioned; nevertheless, we are happy in being able to record that there were some noble-minded men in connexion with the Establishment, such as the late Rev. Dr Andrew Thomson of Edinburgh, and Dr Kidd of Aberdeen, who "were not careful to obey the King" in the matter of not praying for the Queen; nay, they disdained the impious mandate, and continued to do their duty. This they did, notwithstanding they were menaced by the Presbyteries to which they belonged.

The Presbytery of Aberdeen appointed two of their number to admonish Dr Kidd not to pray for the Queen, and to reprove him for having done so after being forbid by the Presbytery; but, when the Doctor had come to receive his admonition from the parish ministers, he perceived hat they were not forward in communicating to him he reason wherefore they had sent for him, and he said, "Gentlemen, you sent for me this morning; and, as my time is precious, I wish to know for what purpose you sent?" The one looked at the other, and at last one of them said, "Doctor, we wish to know why you have disobeyed the Presbytery, in praying for the Queen?" The Doctor promptly replied, "I pray for every sinner, sir, and I pray for you too."

It has been proved that, during the reign of the present monarch, the love of endowments has induced most of the endowed clergy of the Church of Scotland to oppose the Reform Bill; to thwart his Majesty's ministers in all their efforts for reform; to petition for more endowments; to oppose those in their own church who wish the abolition of patronage; and to encourage and countenance the bloody prelates in Ireland, who, for the sake of their unrighteous tithes, put to death the widow, the fatherless, and the oppressed.

But one of the worst exposures of the established clergy arises from their tenacious maintenance of the corn laws, and their extraordinary conduct when Mr Canning's government, at a period of great national distress, threw open the ports to foreign grain.

It has been the never-ceasing boast of the Church of Scotland, that she is the purest in the world; that her maintenance does not cost the country one farthing; and that she has ever been the steady friend and protectress of the poor. But what does she do on this trying occasion, when her kindness to the poor is put to the test, and when their accumulated wants and miseries, together with the distress of the whole country, call aloud for her sympathy? Does she, at such a time as this, shew her maternal kindness, and open her hand to relieve a suffering people? Is she willing to forego any portion of her own patrimony for the relief of her suffering children? Or does she petition Parliament to open the ports to admit bread to supply a suffering people? No, no! the very reverse. The sighs of the famishing poor, and the groans of an overburdened community, are alike disregarded by her; and, in place of petitioning for an abatement of taxation, or for bread to the poor, she—horribile dictu!—petitions Parliament not to grant bread to the poor; or, which was the same thing, not to alter the corn laws, whereby the poor and the whole community would have been benefited—lest, thereby, the stipends of her clergy should in any way be diminished!! Nay, more, it was understood at the time, and even boasted of by the more indiscreet of the endowed clergy, that, in deference to their representations, the scale of duties on the importation of corn had been considerably raised! Thus an unjust and cruel tax on the community was augmented, if not actually continued, because the clergy shared in the spoil. The people, who had borne up under their manifold sufferings almost without a murmur, had now mockery and insult added to a sense of injury. Pulpit exhortations to contentment under every privation were sounded forth everywhere, at the very time when the reverend exhorters had committed a barefaced and wholesale robbery on the poor and the oppressed!!! Pause, reader, and calmly consider whether these clergy are entitled to be called the ministers of Christ, or whether they do not rather resemble those who bound heavy burdens on men's shoulders, and would not so much as touch them with one of their fingers? But, lest it should be thought that I am misrepresenting them, or in any way writing under the influence of party feeling or prejudice, I shall, in this, as I have done in every other case, furnish the reader with the facts by which I am directed.

An extract from the clerical agricultural petition follows. It, no doubt, had its proper effect with a Parliament quite willing to be convinced of the propriety of keeping up rents, by keeping up the price of corn, though at the expense of the people.

With all this, Mr Fyfe, who is himself, as we have stated, fervently Evangelical, frequently and warmly acknowledges that there are thousands of true Christians and many faithful ministers in the Church of Scotland—faithful in all things, save in this matter of endowment. He even, after answering every possible argument which he conceives can be adduced for tithes and endowments by Presbyterians, concludes his work with stating the many inducements which faithful ministers have to renounce public pay. He would, however, allow the actual incumbents to enjoy their endowments as long as they live, if they so chose. With church property, which he considers national property, he would pay off public debt so far as teinds will go; and he cannot see what pleasure or profit Tories or endowed clergy can take in perpetuating a system which he has proved to be injurious and mischievous in all ages. We fear some of the incorrigible objects of his pious zeal may be tempted to smile at the strain of homely eloquence with which Mr Fyfe closes his exhortations.

However far the Established clergy may have departed from Christ, and however long they may have remained in bondage to the law of patronage and of state endowments, laws of Satan, yet if they will only listen to the voice of the Son of God, he will rejoice over them to do them good; and their giving up of those "satanic laws," and breaking over those "satanic walls," will cause joy on earth and joy in heaven. If there be joy in heaven even over one sinner that repenteth, oh! what joy must there be on that day, when a thousand ministers and a thousand congregations are turned to God!!! "Now is the accepted time, and now is the day of salvation." I believe that Christ's voice to many in the Church of Scotland, and to every one of these many, now is, "Arise my love, my fair one, and come away." "Turn you to the stronghold, ye prisoners of hope; even to-day do I declare that I will render double unto thee."

We have been struck with our author's historical enumeration of the mischiefs which endowed clergy have done to their allies, kings. They cost Charles I. and Louis XVI. their heads, James II. and Charles X. of France their thrones; and the evils that churchmen, contending for their patrimony and privileges, have brought upon crowned heads are not yet over:—"Time would fail me to speak of Spain and Portugal, and many other places and instances, where the endowed clergy have been a curse to the king, and the king a curse to the endowed clergy. And how could the case be otherwise, seeing they agreed to set aside the laws of the Most High God?"

The church, by her own choice, will never perish alone.

Perhaps we have given quite enough of attention to this pious, honest, and homely volume. Our motive has been that it is one calculated to have extensive and useful influence among plain, honest, and sincerely pious people. We may as well state that we consider Mr Fyfe somewhat prone to magnify trifles and to strain at gnats; but, upon the other hand, he never swallows camels; while his leading principle is one of which we thoroughly approve. We conclude, leaving the Tory Churchmen to crack this nut or swallow it:—

In concluding the history of the Established Church of Scotland, we cannot omit observing, that, although she is bound by her own laws to seek the extirpation of Prelacy, yet the General Assembly, in place of doing this, has defended Episcopacy in its very worst form. The Moderator of the last Assembly, while he poured out the most abusive language against Presbyterian Dissenters, encouraged and supported the missionary [O'Sullivan] of the Established Episcopalian Church in Ireland. Nay, more, the Established clergy of Scotland have made common cause with the Episcopalian bishops against every measure of reform that has been proposed for the abuses in either Church. They admit that Episcopacy is anti-scriptural, and yet they support it! Upon what principle do they so? They say they do not support Episcopacy for its own sake, but for the sake of the principle of Establishments!

As this notice goes through the press, we have seen "A Letter by a Member of the Synod of Ulster," bearing strongly upon the same subject. It is, we presume, by the same writer whose liberal and able strictures we noticed some months back; and is inscribed to Dr Cooke of Belfast. We regret that we cannot devote more space to this pamphlet; for, although controversy is out of our way, we feel that to advocate religious freedom according to his power and opportunity, is the duty of every public writer. The Member of the Synod of Ulster advocates a qualified subscription of the Westminster Confession; and not without reason, if he be able to establish all that he alleges against the laws of the national Establishment of Scotland, and the Confessions of the sister or brother church to which he belongs. Here is one sentence, at page 46—"The infliction of death itself, in consequence of church censures, is, by the divines, expressly referred to the discretion of the civil magistrate, 'if he shall see cause.' And is not this a pretty principle, my beloved, for the Synod of Ulster to avow, without qualification, in the nineteenth century?" In brief, there is in this Letter a cutting and searching exposure of that sort of spirit which Dr Chalmers, in the days of other years, used to preach against, as the Popery of Protestantism, to the offence of, we believe, many of his reverend brethren.

POPULAR SONGS OF THE GERMANS.

We have already, on former occasions, in fulfilment of a welcome duty, attempted to place before the English reader, from time to time, some outlines of the poetical literature of Germany, in noticing certain of her eminent authors. All of these having, more or less, and some especially, (as Körner and Bürger,) enriched the popular lyrics of their country, we have been led to make incidental mention of this beautiful and characteristic branch of poetry. On the present occasion, it is proposed to devote a few pages exclusively to the subject; although only to offer a few gleanings from the harvest of a land exceedingly fertile in popular song. A full display of its riches in this respect, tracing the origin and growth of a plant deeply rooted in national character, and shedding continual influence on the soil which gave it birth, would require a longer treatise, and might exercise and and reward a higher criticism than ours. It must suffice, in the present instance, to gather and exhibit such specimens as a passing hand may here and there select from a field of unbounded extent and diversity. This, a long-cherished purpose, has now been mainly called into execution by the appearance of a pleasant little volume, by M. Klauer Klattowsky; which, as the first of a series destined to make the songs of Germany accessible to English students, deserves kind notice at our hands. The selection, moreover, is generally judicious; and, though it does not include many favourite compositions which we looked to find there, it must be remembered that the limits of a little book can but embrace a small part of what is excellent, amidst the profusion offered on every hand. We have, therefore, great pleasure in recommending M. Klauer's "Anthology" to all young students of the language and poetry of Germany.

Lyrical poetry, as Wordsworth justly remarks, demands, as its specific distinction, the presence of musical accompaniment; and such, in the early periods of the art, was never wanting to it. This condition, however, although constituting its very essence, has, in great measure, ceased to be more than an imaginary one in highly cultivated languages, with respect to many productions of a class which are, nevertheless, truly lyrical. The alliance between music and poetry, has been neglected by custom, as each gradually became more artificial; but has not been virtually dissevered. We are now to speak of that class only in which the alliance actually survives—of poetry written to be sung, and living, with the strains to which it is wedded, on the lips of a people to whom music is an element of daily life, as universal and familiar as the common air. The national features of the Germans are, in an especial manner, reflected on the surface of their national song; which, mingling with the current of all their habits, actions, and feelings, imparts to each an appropriate language and an immediate utterance. And when to this it is added that the lineaments thus reflected are, in themselves, peculiarly distinct and original, we may expect to find in the national lyrics, much that is marked and characteristic. Nor will the expectation be disappointed.

In a wit's description of the great European nations, there was assigned to the Briton, the empire of the sea; to the Gaul, of the land; to the German, of the air. Such are the random traits by which one half of mankind learns to characterise the other. It is at once amusing and pitiable to think how many are content to seek no better idea of nations and races than may be supplied by vague generalities or vulgar nicknames. Those, however, who are not so contented, on applying themselves to observe the points by which the character of a people is revealed, will find in the Germans, a nature, strangely composed indeed, but exceedingly genuine, decided, and love-worthy. Prone alike to the affections and enjoyments of life, steadfast in attachment, and strongly disposed to reverence and a certain methodical love of order; simple, nay, homely in manners; combining an uncontrollable imagination, and a propensity to dream and speculate, with a firm hold on the plainest realities; trustful, truthful, and earnest, beyond measure; of indefatigable perseverance, and rather daring in conception than prompt to actual enterprise; with a nature easily moved to tenderness, and abounding in substantial cordiality, but neither sensitive nor apt to assume the polish of conventional refinement; with much poetry, some humour, and little wit; seldom agitated by violent passions, but ever alive to warm domestic and social feelings:—such are the people amongst whom lyrical song has found a welcome and a home.

Nor should we overlook their peculiar happiness, in the possession of a language the true offspring of a nature such as we have attempted to pourtray—a language strong, hearty, and copious; full of point and idiom; equally ready for the subtlest combinations and the plainest simplicity; sonorous, masculine, and expressive, with a certain positive directness of structure which hardly admits of equivoque or levity; and, above all, possessing a marked and very musical prosody, which renders it unrivalled amongst modern languages in the variety of poetical forms which it can assume. And we may further add, to the surprise perhaps of those who know it only by report, that, with the exception of the Italian only, there is no language more melodious in poetry or more vocally adapted for song.

To the nation thus constituted and endowed, poetry and music were a natural birth-right. But to bind these more closely together, a further privilege was added. Luther, himself a very German, and one of the greatest men the world has yet seen, with the same hand that struck at the roots of Papal abuse, and gave his noble translation of the Bible as an imperishable legacy to his country, also engrafted on the new creed the healthy growth of popular song, to flourish with it in perpetual union. The great Reformer, a thorough lover of music, and wisely aware of the aid to be derived therefrom in attaching his doctrine to the hearts of the people, made it an express and prominent part of all elementary public instruction. In all the schools constituted under the reformed system, singing was and continues to be taught with the alphabet: thus a broad foundation was laid upon which to raise a structure overshadowing all the land. This consecration of two noble arts on a soil where the minnesingers and meistersingers had already claimed them as a patrimony, has established them for ever, with an efficacy of which the consequences may be plainly seen. The fruits this inestimable gift has borne to Music, may be shewn by pointing to the names of Handel, Bach, Haydn, Mozart, and, greatest of all, Beethoven.* Nor has the sister art less happily flourished. To say nothing of the higher branches of poetry—the true lyric, its utterance in song, lives amidst all classes in Germany with a genial vigour, such as no other nation can exhibit. In one class of songs, the French, in another the Spaniards, have each their national advantages; but in neither people is the true alliance of poetry and music so universal and supreme. In the fields, the towns, the villages of Germany, their voice is never mute; wherever three are met together, the chorus is heard. The festival and the holiday, the christening and the funeral, have each their joyful or solemn strain. The soldiers sing on the march, or around the fire of the bivouac; the lover serenades his mistress with a chorus in the twilight;—the year opens and closes amidst songs. Of twenty Germans taken, at hazard, from all or any class, you shall hardly find one that is not ready to bear his part manfully in any of the favourite popular lyrics of his country. Here, indeed, national song has very life and being.

Thus the lyrical poetry of Germany is at once married to music; and, while the compositions generally sung are, for this reason, of a higher class than in countries where music is less supreme, they are at the same time directly modified, in form and tenor, by the application to which they are destined. Where song is either occasional or exotic, the poetry set to music is liable to become worthless or affected, as, with some exceptions, is the case in England; it is only where it is popular and universal that the poet and musician work in entire concert. Hence, in considering the songs of Germany as poems, their vocal purpose must be kept constantly in mind; he that reads them only, has only half of the whole before him. And how much is thereby lost will readily be known by those to whom the unrivalled song-music of the Germans is familiar.

The songs of Germany, moreover, are, in general, intensely popular. They are not artificial things, got up to be exhibited in drawing-rooms, by ladies in ringlets, and amateurs in spotless gloves. They are matters of far more interest and significance—the very expressions of the various emotions, and likings, and manners of a people very earnest in their way, and nowise ashamed of seeming to be so. Of the pretty nonsense verses which pass for songs with us, few specimens will be found amongst them. Their songs are jovial, fond, satirical, or plaintive, as the mood of the singer may require; but all have some downright purpose and meaning, and a flow and energy which bespeak their genuine character. The reader, bearing in mind what has already been said of the people whose nature they reflect, and remembering that, in popular song, the more positive and tangible features will always be the most readily presented, will not be surprised to find them impressed rather with the strong and homely than with the spiritual traits of the national character. In short, these songs, as they are the companions, so will they be found to be faithful interpreters of the Germans' social and domestic life; and the first of their poets and composers, a Goethe and a Beethoven, will be heard, in these compositions, lending their unrivalled genius to express the popular language of their country's lyrical muse.

A pleasant task it would be to treat of the songs current amongst peculiar classes; each of which has strains expressly its own, from the nightly ditty of the watchman, to the chant of the soldier or student, or the guild-song of the artisan. But this would lead us too far into detail. For the same reason, a passing word is all that can be given to the popular hymns of Germany, many of which, with their vigorous, simple speech, and noble chorale tunes, were composed by Luther. Passing from these, we must begin with the extracts that we have prepared; entreating the reader to bear the preceding remarks in mind, as well as to make due allowance for the insufficiency of the translation.

It may be questioned whether, without woman, poetry would ever have been uttered: to her we certainly owe its lyrical form in song. The main sources of this delightful stream, love and honour, flow, the one directly, the other by a returning course, from the influence of the gentle sex;—the poetry whose life is passion, obeys the power which rules the warmer emotions of the heart, as the moon commands the tides. The nations whose women are degraded, are destitute of song, as well as of all other of the best privileges of life. And wherever lyrical poetry exists, its current is principally fed by the overflowings of amorous feeling: its alarms and ecstasies, for ever repeated, have a universal charm, which no repetition can impair; choice therefore, no less than judgment, directs us to draw the first selections from the songs dedicated to this paramount theme. At the first glance, the following little morsel of petulance, by Schubart, may discredit the gallantry of our choice—the second will discover that the show of captiousness is merely assumed by the poet. He is one that loves the objects of his whimsical displeasure far too dearly to reproach them in hard earnest. The next smile he meets will melt all this cynicism like May frost.

Your maidens all are fickle gear—
Now so—to-morrow so!
If but one rosy cloud appear,
How glad and bright they grow!
To-morrow? Why, at once you find
Change in the wind.

Let but an air too roughly blow,
The maiden 's near to die;
Her pretty eyes are all aflow,
Her little mouth's awry.
To-morrow? See how light she springs,
Frolics, and sings!

When maiden greets with loving eye,
You trust the cunning glance;
And mount, all dizzy, to the sky,
In such a blissful trance!
To-morrow? Why, you're hardly known—
Vain dreams alone!

So, maids, howe'er you roll your eyes,
As fond as you may feign—
Ay, came ye straight from paradise—
I'll trust not one again!
False things! To-day, as hot as spice—
To-morrow, ice!

But should this be thought too saucy, here is a corrective, in a more cordial strain, professing devout homage to the "angels of life," all and several. It is conceived in a fine catholic spirit of love, akin to that expressed in Byron's noble wish—

That womankind had but one rosy mouth,
That he might kiss them all from north to south.

As a song, too, it is effective and vigorous, when provided with a sufficient chorus.

A fair good health to every gentle maiden,
Who still in virgin freshness grows!
Health to the matron grave, with years o'erladen,
Whose temples age has crowned with snows!
CHORUS.
But each give a health, ere he drink to the rest,
Thrice fondly repeated, to her he loves best!

Health to the princess on her throne of splendour,
That well her golden crown beseems!
To humble maid, with crown that wild-flowers lend her,
Whose eye with modest virtue beams!
But each, &c. &c.

Health to the child in slumber's sweet caresses,
On wakeful mother's bosom laid!
To her whose heart the lovely nursling presses,
Be next a brimming goblet paid!
But each, &c. &c.

Health to the sylph whose cheek fair colours, blending
With snow the morning blushes, grace!
To the brown reaper o'er her sickle bending,
We drain, as well, one hearty glass!
But each, &c. &c.

Health be to her whom love's dear triumph blesses,
Who deems her bliss, like Heaven's, entire!
Nor less to her whom sadness lone oppresses,
And love torments with mocked desire!
But each, &c. &c.

Health to the maid whom circling graces favour,
Who loves the dance, and song, and joy!
And her, the virgin prone to musings graver,
Whom duties, freely sought, employ!
But each, &c. &c.

All were vouchsafed us by the heavenly Giver,
Our hearts to better and to bless:
All, all to us shall be the image ever
Of good and fair in fairest dress!
CHORUS.
Fill, then, your glasses, your glances uplift;
Thank, in glad choruses, Heaven for its gift!

A more homely and a stronger vein of tenderness, without one atom of sickly sentiment, will be found in the delightful Old-German song we shall now quote. It is an utterance of such manly and fervent love as flourishes only in generous natures; and is expressed with a plainness that enhances its warmth. In the original, there is a rustic earnestness of language which we have in vain attempted to preserve. The author is Simon Dach.

Annie of Tharau is she whom I court;
She is my being, my life, my support!
Annie of Tharau her heart doth incline,
Loving or grieving, in answer to mine!
Annie of Tharau! my riches, my good!
Soul of my body, my flesh and my blood!

Though the storms meet us, and tempests should strike,
We two are plighted to bear them alike—

Sickness, hard usage, and trouble, and pain,
Only the closer our love-knot shall strain!
Annie of Tharau! my joy, my sunshine!
All mine own being is clasped around thine!

Straight as a palm-tree shoots upwards again,
After some yielding to tempest and rain,
So the love in us grows mighty and great,
After much sorrow and hardship of fate!
Annie of Tharau! my riches, my good!
Soul of my body, my flesh and my blood!

Wert thou o'er torn from this bosom, mine own—
Yea, wert thou dwelling where scarce the sun's known—
Iron and dungeons, the waste nor the sea,
Armies of foes should not keep me from thee!
Annie of Tharau! my joy, my sunshine!
All mine own being is clasped around thine!

As a contrast to the above, we subjoin an exquisite little serenade by Goethe, in which the complaint of unreturned affection is breathed in murmurs like the wailing of an Eolian harp. The fanciful tenderness of this strain is no less true than the simple warmth of the preceding one to that passion which moves every chord of the human heart, the lightest as well as the deepest. In this class of songs, Goethe is quite unrivalled; his melody is inimitable.

Oh! while the soft dream's o'er thee,
Half listen, as I pour
My love and song before thee.
Sleep on! what wouldst thou more?

And as my lyre is sighing,
Stars smile all heaven o'er,
To hallow love undying.
Sleep on! what wouldst thou more?

The power of love undying
Uplifts me, and I soar,
From earth's disturbance flying.
Sleep on! what wouldst thou more?

The strife of worldly dealing
For thee I long forswore,
Too oft to silence stealing.
Sleep on! what wouldst thou more?

Thou bidst me wake thus lonely,
Yet wilt not hear—I pour
Song on thy slumbers only.
Sleep on! what wouldst thou more?

This delicate lament is no unfit prelude to one of almost equal sweetness, by Jacobi, the pathos of which is nevertheless deeper; for its sadness is more than a lover's melancholy. The burden of the song is not the less real for being clothed in poetical imagery. It is a plaintive commentary on the old strain—

Mal hay que fia,
A gente que pasa!

Whither be the violets gone—
Those that bloomed of late so gay,
And, in fragrant garlands strown,
Decked the blooming Flower-Queen's way?
Youth! alas! the spring must fly—
Yonder violets withered lie!

Whither are the roses fled
We so gaily singing bound,
When the brow of shepherd maid
And the herdsman's hat was crowned?
Maiden! summer days must fly—
Yonder roses withered lie!

Lead me then the brook beside
That refreshed the violets pale,
And in murmurs low did glide
Downwards to the quiet vale.
Air and sun were scorching sore—
Yonder brooklet flows no more!

Take me then to yonder bower,
Where the summer roses grew;
Where, in love's confiding hour,
Swain and maiden came to woo.
Wind and hail were pelting sore—
Yonder bower is green no more!

Tell me where the maid is flown—
Her I saw, one summer day,
O'er the violets stooping down,
Lowly flower, as sweet as they!
Youth! alas! all beauty dies—
Withered, too, the maiden lies!

Whither has the poet strayed—
He that o'er the chequered plains,
Sung of violet, rose, and maid,
Brook and bower, in pleasant strains?
Maiden! life for ever flies—
Withered, too, the singer lies!

But melancholy is by no means the prevailing character of the German's songs. He is no idle repiner by profession; and if at times subdued by the mournful aspect of life, he is ready, at others, to share heartily in its pleasures, and to enjoy a loud laugh at its drolleries. There is no reason why we should refuse to join him in this exercise; and here is an occasion presented us by honest Klamer Schmidt, in his humorous ballad of the "Fair of Life." The satire has no bitterness, although it be a little rough on the tongue.

I sing you a ballad of life and its fair, sirs:
Full many frequent it, and cheapen bad ware, sirs;
And, thinking right jewels secured by their choice,
Take home from the market mere tinsel and toys.

There's one!—he's by far the chief fool: how he rages,
All breathlessly greedy, through booths and by stages,
And chaffers and bargains for glittering sand
That Fate the next minute may dash from his hand!

The other's more cunning: he wrestles for places
And titles of honour. They're burdensome graces;
But this may console, when they weary and vex,
That fame brays aloud, and the mob bow their necks.

The third, he's for beauty so longing and tender,
His life, the whole world, he would gladly surrender,
In eyes that enchant him his heaven to survey.
Ah! heard he none whisper that charms will decay?

The price-list of Bacchus' rare blessings entrances
A fourth with its promise. This number he fancies,
And that must be purchased. Alas! saw he not
The gout as it lurks in the cask of the sot?

'Tis the fifth that the crown of the merchandise chooses:
The toys that catch others he freely refuses—
His jewel is health; and his care, to engage
The friendship of wisdom to cheer him in age.

Long life to the Fifth! the true king of right reason!
Might I visit the fair, as a Fate, for a season,
On him my whole stuff would I gladly expend,
And leave not a rag to the fools that attend.

Having fallen into a humorous vein, we may as well pursue it a little further. Here is the very song we were looking for, in charity to the impatient reader; who, having doubtless been taught to believe that Germans do nothing else but eat sauer kraut, spin metaphysics, and smoke out of immense pipes, has been amazed to find none of these matters hitherto commemorated. In this strain, of no peculiar worth indeed, he will find tobacco sufficiently conspicuous; although, to render it tractable in an English dress, we have been forced to take some liberty with the name of the magnificent weed—for which we bespeak the indulgence of the adept.

Of croaking fools that whine profanely
At life's disasters, there's a pack:
Me grief assails and pinches vainly,
Blest with a pipeful of taback.
But just to-day quite changed the case is—
To-day my wonted taste is slack;
And gladly for a maiden's graces,
I'd pledge my pipe of best taback!

The soldier 'gainst his will a-fasting,
The sailor that his grog must lack,
Beguiles the vain desire of tasting,
With help of pipe and mild tabeck.
But comes some pearl of pretty wenches—
At once his heart begins, tick-tack!
The joy within him even quenches
His smoking pipeful of taback.

For me, I hold the doctrine stoutly
Maintained by famous Major Crack;
Because, like him, I prize devoutly
Both comely maidens and tabeck.
By war's outrageous din unshaken,
He still kept safe in haversack,
And his dear pipe, to puff tabeck.

Punch follows tobacco as naturally as rain comes after a south-wester. Here is a punch-song, and—by Schiller!—the philosopher—the tragic poet! We see our Glasgow readers already on the alert, arrectis auribus. It may be questioned, indeed, whether any, even the most learned, in that city renowned for its brewage of "the materials," have been until now apprized that their favourite compound was a symbol, as well as a mystery; or that it was typical of the high matters here expounded by the poet. As one of those trifles which betray an infinity of character, this little song tells more of the peculiar bent of Schiller's mind, than a volume of criticism. Here we see the purpose which moulded every object, common as well as sublime, into an image of the ideal. "What!" the reader may exclaim, "even a punch-bowl?" Let the song answer for us.

Four primal elements,
Inly combined,
Build up the universe,
Fashion mankind.

Press ye the citron's star,
Juicy and sour;—
Life has an inner heart,
Sharp at the core.

Now with mild sugar juice
Mingled between,
Temper the influence,
Burning and keen.

Forth let the water gush,
Bounding and clear;—
Water encompasseth
Calmly the sphere.

Now let the spirit drop
Trickling adown;—
Spirit to life a life
Giveth alone.

Ere the fresh perfume dies,
Straight be it quaffed;—
Only while glows the spring,
Quickens the draught.

We suspect that more than one heresy will have been detected in Schiller's doctrine; but this is said sous correction. In the meanwhile, having thus fallen sidelong amongst the cups, we mayas well give one specimen (or rather imitation) of a regular German drinking song, and one of the most outrageous of the sort, enough to paralyze a whole bevy of Temperance Societies. It goes to the stirring air—"Heu! heu! ericht mir Nectar," which Phillips used to sing with such unction and applause some five years ago. The original is not in M. Klauer's collection.

Fill! fill a goblet brimming,
Fit for buoyant mirth to swim in!
When the wine-god lends me wings,
What care I for laws or kings?
State and rules
Were made for fools—
He alone is great and free
Who can drink as deep as we!

Love from sober crews escapes,
To toy with Bacchus and his grapes;
Laughs, and dips
His arrow tips
In every foaming beaker;
Then to timid suitors teaches
Bold addresses, winning speeches—
All that smart
By woman's art,
Drink till pain grow weaker!

Fill! fill a goblet brimming,
To the pretty craft of women!
Let them pout!—its full lip bears
Kisses quite as sweet as theirs!

Pour! pour the magic liquor,
Till the bright thought flashes quicker,
And the heart exults in song,
And the pulse of joy beats strong!
Lo! the sprite
Of wild delight
Flutters o'er the goblet's brim!
Let me quaff, and soar with him!

Fill! fill a goblet brimming,
Fit for dancing souls to swim in!
All the gems of Fancy's mine
Borrow brighter hues from wine!

It is time to turn to inspirations from a nobler source; and, in so doing, let us first pay a willing tribute of gratitude to Tschokke, author of the following patriotic song, and of a little book, but one that will survive many works of more pretension—his "Switzerland's History." This is indeed a precious volume, full of simple, manly eloquence, worthily employed in recording the noblest story that the world has yet heard. It is a book that makes the heart beat and the eye swim as you read it; in a word—and what higher praise can be given?—it is worthy to be read by grey-haired men to their children, on the very hearths which, in old time, sent forth the men of Grütli and Morgarten, to consummate their noble sacrifice in the face of Heaven, and on the majestic altar of their native mountains—a light and an example to all ages! This is a digression; but it is to pay a debt, long owing, for pleasure enjoyed and good received—a duty so nearly religious as to supersede trifling considerations. The following song is one of warning and appeal. It is still customary, in several German towns, for the watchmen to chant a rugged stave, generally containing some trite adage or commonplace moral, as he calls the hour at night. Alluding to this custom, the poet personifies the servile party in his country, as one of these night-birds, groping about in the sunshine, and seeking to persuade his neighbours that all are as dark as himself. The moral, we fancy, might suit other countries as well as Switzerland.

Hear, gentles all! I give you warning,
The hour is late, the night is deep;
At such a time, so far from morning,
Who'd still be wake?—'tis well to sleep!
—The fool through dusty glasses blinking
Sees not the sun in open day!
Let him be hush, that will go winking;
He dotes that shuns the golden ray!
But croak the dotards as they will—
In Switzerland 'tis daylight still!

Hear, sirs! Your psalms of penance patter—
They're safe, and none suspected make:
But still the sound of beakers' clatter—
The sun is down—suspicion's 'wake!
—When Switzers glad carouse together,
And friends to friends their hearts resign,
Ne'er sinks the sun, nor darkens either—
It shines in Heaven, it beams in wine!
So let the mole grub where he will—
In Switzerland 'tis daylight still!

Hear, gentles all! Till morn be dozing,
Draw nightcaps o'er your ears, and snore—
On me and mine your trust reposing,
We'll gladly watch at fold and door.
—The Swiss is still his own best warder—
In his own house the lord he stands;
And, of his native land the guardian,
Entrusts it not to strangers' hands!
So, warn the stranger as he will—
In Switzerland 'tis daylight still!

Hear, gentles! Seek to live securely;
For waking calls for thoughtful pains;
And thinking leads to danger, surely—
So quench your lights, as use ordains.
—Though all around, behind, before us,
The brains of men to blocks ye wrought,
We, Swiss, will laugh and sing in chorus—
"Who dares think freely, well has thought!"
Let light-destroyers preach their fill—
In Switzerland 'tis daylight still!

Hear, sirs! With backs so little supple,
You ne'er may Fortune's grace expect—
Bow then, as bend your neighbours, double;
And live as modish arts direct.
—Begone, with foreign modes and favour!
Ours be the virtues strong of yore;
Were Freedom crushed, with none to save her,
The earth would find the Swiss no more!
But sons of night may groan their fill—
In Switzerland 'tis daylight still!

Having now extracted pretty liberally from M. Klauer's "Anthology," we may continue our specimens of German song from other sources. The next shall be one of the many martial strains which were rife during the war of liberation. Some of these, by the lamented Körner, have already been introduced to the reader;* the following —"Blucher's Song"—written by Arndt, is one of the finest of his numerous stirring lyrics, and deserves the popularity it has acquired. During the period when the strife was actually raging, a song like this was worth an army; even now, as we read it by the fireside, we seem to hear the blast of the trumpet, and see the fierce old warrior charging at the head of his squadrons.

* No. VI. Old Series of this Magazine, for Sept. 1832.

And heard ye not the trumpet call? Up, troopers all to horse!
'Tis he, the old Field-Marshal, spurs like lightning on his course!
How proudly and how joyously his noble horse he rides!
And, ho! with what a biting sweep his good broadsword he guides!

CHORUS.

Up, hearts! and away! 'tis the Germans' array—
The Germans are riding and shouting "huzza!"

Oh, marked ye but his clear blue eye, like kindled beacon glow?
Oh, saw ye how his snowy hair is waving round his brow?
Right strength and heat, like generous wine, his age doth still retain,
And so to conquer shall he ride o'er many a battle plain.

He was the man, when all was lost and every heart dismayed,
That still to Heaven, in steadfast hope, upraised his shining blade;
Then swore he by its biting edge, right wrathfully and stern,
That he some German fashions would make the Frenchmen learn!

He kept his oath; and when abroad the royal summons rang,
Oh, how the hoary stripling up to the saddle sprang!
Then he it was that fairly put the vermin to the rout,
And with an iron besom clean swept the land throughout.

By Lutzen on the meadow, there kept he such a coil,
Some thousands of the enemy lost breath in that turmoil,
And thousands from the battle-field right speedily did strain,
And full ten thousand lay them down that never rose again!

At Katzbach, on the Weser-stream, likewise he kept his oath;
For there he taught the French to swim—to learn they were but loath.
Good night, Messieurs! sail pleasantly down to the Baltic sea!
The swallow of a northern whale your proper bed will be!

At Wurtemberg, hard by the Elbe, how hotly he pressed through!
Nor ditch nor bulwark saved the French, although they were not few.
No choice had they, but rose and ran, like hares across the bent,
And after them the stout old boy a hearty "holla!" sent.

By Leipsic, on the Plauen-stream, oh, 'twas a glorious fight!
There did he dim the Frenchman's star, and crush his power outright;
There still enough the spoilers lay—he finished their campaign!
And there he won his marshal's staff upon the smoking plain.

Then blow the trumpet lustily! Up, troopers all! to horse!
There speeds the old Field-Marshal, with glory, on his course,
Upon the Rhine, beyond the Rhine, the German arms to wield—
Go on! thou tried and valiant sword! and God shall be thy shield!

If this be not the true tones which rouse the heart of a people, we know not how the chord that shall stir them may be struck. To us every note seems full of the right harmony—the energy, the rough scorn, the swiftness and exultation of the several strains, each alike genuine and excellent.

The Burschen-Lieder, or songs current amongst the students at the German universities, form a class by themselves. With a good deal of slang and froth, such as might be expected in the ditties of these very uproarious sons of learning, there are many capital things in the Commers-bücher, which contain their settled favourites; and the music is generally excellent. We must give one specimen; premising that the term Philister, now almost become part of the German language, was invented by the students, and applied to those, not of the university, whom it was their pleasure to consider hostile or unworthy. Here is their own description of the cognomen:—

Know ye a Philistine at sight?
I'll paint him to a tittle:—
Where'er a cautious, sullen wight
Creeps as if stones were brittle,
And roofs an empty pate with thatch
Of caxon, periwig, or scratch:
'Tis he!—Sir Philistine we call him—
The Devil and his beadle maul him!

Who, when the grape's-blood from the Rhine
In manly bosoms tingles,
That drink of gods, with gander-wine,
In puling tipple mingles;
And, where rejoicing songs arise,
Makes faces sour, and groans and sighs:
'Tis he!—Sir Philistine we call him—
The Devil and his beadle maul him!

Who evermore of times of need
And state diseases snivels;
And every bold and manly deed
With vulgar scoffs be-drivels;
And calls the muses' art a curse,
Because they will not gorge his purse:
'Tis he!—Sir Philistine we call him—
The Devil and his beadle maul him!

In short, whoe'er on earth looks down,
With dullard pride inflated,
As though for his great self alone
By our good God created;
And looks, in stupid arrogance,
That when he whistles, all shall dance:
A Philistine we ever call him!
The Devil and his beadle maul him!

Were it not for the unchristianity of the thing, few would be disposed to refuse an "Amen!" to the wish so heartily expressed. The song altogether is full of character and effect;—tameness, indeed, is not the besetting fault of any of the Burschen songs.

We have purposely reserved to the last, our mention of a most delightful class of lyrics, in the manner of the ancient national ballads, which several of the modern poets of Germany have imitated with exquisite success. The stock of genuine originals of this kind, in the different dialects of the country, is exceedingly rich. At present, we must restrict ourselves to later imitations. Some of Goethe's beautiful ballads have already been rendered into English; we shall, therefore, prefer taking our selections from less celebrated authors. Without offering any comment on the following—for, surely, they will not be thought to require an express recommendation—we may begin with this wild and touching strain by Chamisso. It is from the Lithuanian:—

THE WIDOW'S SON.

The swans with war songs came sweeping by;
"To horse! to horse!" was the grating cry.

The youngest sons to the host were bound—
They rode from all the castles around.

We bear great sorrow, and sore complain,
When one goes forth there's none will remain.

My bridegroom! my brother! my son, my son!
Thou art gone, alas!—to the wars art gone!

We women the man-at-arms must dight—
Thy bride must fasten the plume aright.

Thy sister leads out the war-horse great;
The mother unlocks thee the court-yard gate.

Oh, when, my bridegroom! my brother! my son!
When comest thou back? Now quickly make known!

When air, and water, and land are freed,
I stay no longer: then come I with speed.

And air, and water, and land are free—
Why tarries he longer?—why comes not he?

Now forth to meet him, we women will;
And see him coming afar, from the hill.

There wait the women, watching the way
Along the vale, where the sunbeams lay.

And the sun rose high, the sun sank low;
They spy no horseman riding below.

Now smokes the dust, now comes at speed
A war-horse onwards—none rides on the steed!

They up and caught him, and question near—
My horse, what brings thee masterless here?

Base jade, hast left thy master alone?
Where tarries my bridegroom, my brother, my son?

They struck him down in the battle keen;
They made his bed in the valley green;

They left me loose, to run as I might;
I have brought the tidings in woful plight.

There flew three swans with wailing song;
They're seeking a grave the meadow along.

And, when they found it, each lighted down:
At foot, and head, and side, stood one.

At head the sister, at foot the bride;
The grey old mother stooped at the side.

Oh, wo and alas! we three forlorn!
Is none will join us while thus we mourn?

Then, stooping him down, the sun 'gan say—
I'll bear my part as well as I may:

Nine days I mourn in a misty pall;
The tenth, I will not be seen at all.

The bride mourned on till the third week passed;
The sister's mourning three years did last;

The mother her mourning kept alway,
Till, all outworn, in the grave she lay.

From the pathos (we had almost said ghastliness) of this dirge-like chant, let us seek relief in the milder strains of Uhland, whose ballads are almost the sweetest things in the German language. He has the gift by inheritance, as a Swabian; and the minnesingers of his native kingdom would have no reason to be ashamed of their successor. Here is his "Lay of the Goldsmith's Daughter:"—

There stood a goldsmith in his stall,
Around him gems and pearl:—
"The dearest of my jewels all
Art thou, my daughter Helena!
My well-beloved girl!"

A buxom knight came stepping in:
"Now save thee, maiden fair!

And welcome, trusty goldsmith mine!
Make me a precious coronal
For my sweet bride to wear."
And when the circlet all was wrought,
And quickly glinting shone,
Fair Helen hung, in mournful thought—
When none, be sure, could see her—
On her white arm the crown.
"Alas! the bride how blest is she
On whom this band may shine!
Oh, gave yon gentle knight to me
A wreath of common roses,
What joyful heart were mine!"
Eftsoons, the knight came stepping in;
The gaud he strictly eyed:—
"Now set me, trusty goldsmith mine,
A ring with precious diamonds,
For my sweet plighted bride."
And when the ring was rarely wrought
With costly diamonds bright,
Fair Helen drew it, sad of thought—
When none, be sure, could see her—
Half on her finger white.
"Alas! the bride how blest is she
For whom these diamonds shine!
Oh, gave yon gentle knight to me
From his brown locks one ringlet,
What joyful heart were mine!"
Eftsoons, the knight came stepping in;
The ring he closely eyed:—
"Thy cunning, worthy goldsmith mine,
Has wrought these presents rarely
For my sweet plighted bride.
"But now, to see how fit they be,
Come, fairest maiden, now,
That I may know approved on thee
My true love's bridal jewels:—
She's even fair as thou!"
'Twas early on a holiday,
When that sweet maiden was Bedight with special care alway,
All in her bravest garments,
As she was bound to mass.
With lovely shame, all burning red,
Before the knight she shook.
He set the frontlet on her head,
The ring drew on her finger,
And then her white hand took:—
"Sweet Helen! Helen dearly tried!
The time for jest is spent—
Thou art of all the fairest bride,
For whom the golden coronal,
For whom the ring was meant."

Of the following ballad, by the same author, (the last we can give,) we must not say all that is in our heart, lest sober readers should condemn the praise as exaggerated. In the original, to our eyes, it is faultless. Nearly all that can be sought in this class of lyric—a simple yet striking and touching theme, vivid and dramatic narrative, and a melody like the sound of silver bells—are united in this delicate little treasure, with a certain wildness that seems borrowed from a time immeasurably remote. We have taken more pains in translating this than with all the others put together—and the version is a failure after all!

Three maidens stood on the castle wall,
They looked adown the vale;
Their sire came on his charger tall,
Beclad in coat of mail.
"Welcome, Sir Father! a fair welcome!
What hast thou brought thy children?
All we were meek at home."
"My daughter in the yellow vest,
I thought of thee to-day.
Rich garments ever please thee best,
Thy joy is brave array:
This chain of ruddy gold I tore
From a bold knight and haughty;—
Gave him his death therefor."
About her snowy neck space
The lady clasped the chain;
And down she went unto the place
Where she descried the slain:—
"Thou liest like any felon here!
And art a knightly noble,
And art my true love dear!"
She raised him in her arms, and bare
To the house of God adown;
In his father's tomb she laid him there,
With much lament and moan.
The chain that on her neck was tied
She straitly drew around it,
And sank the grave beside.

Two maidens stood on the castle wall,
They looked adown the vale;
Their sire came on his charger tall,
Beclad in coat of mail.
"Welcome, Sir Father! a fair welcome!
What hast thou brought thy children?
Both we were meek at home."
"My daughter in the grassgreen vest,
I thought of thee to-day.
The hunter's sport delights thee best
All in the greenwood gay:
This spear, with golden bands, I tore
From the wild huntsman yonder;—
Gave him his death therefor."
The spear in her lily hand she bent—
The spear her father brought;
And to the forest green she went—
Death was the chase she sought.
There lay, beneath the linden-shade,
With his true blood-hound near him,
Her love in slumber dead.
"I keep the tryst beneath the tree,
I promised, true love dear!"
Then in her heart all suddenly
She plunged the pointed spear.
In that cool shade they slumber well—
Small wood-birds warbled o'er them,
Green leaves upon them fell.

One maiden stood on the castle wall,
She looked adown the vale;
Her sire came on his charger tall,
Beclad in coat of mail.
"Welcome, Sir Father! a fair welcome!
What hast thou for thy daughter?
All meek I kept at home."
"My daughter in the vest of white,
My thought of thee has been.
In flowers thou ever didst delight
More than in golden sheen:
This bloom, all silver bright, I tore,
For thee, from the bold gardener;—
Gave him his death therefor."
"Alas! how grew he so perverse?
Why didst thou slay him there?
The flowers that he was wont to nurse
Will pine for want of care!"
"He bore him strangely bold; and said,
The fairest flower that bloosomed
He kept for his own maid."
The flower that gentle lady laid
Upon her tender breast;
She went and sought the garden shade
She ever loved the best.

There rose a freshly-turfed mound—
There, midst the pale white lilies,
She sate her on the ground.

"Oh, could I die this very hour,
Like my dear sisters all!
I cannot wound me with this flower,
So soft it is, and small!"
All pale and sick at heart, she eyed
The small flower, till it faded—
Till she sank down and died.

We have, we fear, exceeded our limits, and yet it seems as if we had barely made a beginning. The subject is nearly inexhaustible; and, if the examples we have given should occasion the wish for more, we shall not be at a loss for means to gratify it. The only difficulty will arise from the rival claims of so many favourites, each demanding the preference. What would have been the "Judgment of Paris" if the contest had lain between, not three, but three thousand beauties? V.

VISITS TO REMARKABLE PLACES.

BY WILLIAM HOWITT.

NO. I.—VISIT TO THE GREAT JESUIT COLLEGE OF STONYHURST, IN LANCASHIRE.

The increase of the Roman Catholics, of late years, in England, has excited a good deal of surprise and curiosity, as to its real cause, in the public mind. We have been so accustomed to speak and write of Popery as a gross and palpable error—as a superstition that has written its own character in the annals of nearly all civilised nations, in fire and blood, and, at the same time, to boast of the march of intellect in the present age—that to hear of people—and these, too, often educated and influential—every now and then adopting this old, and, as we had accustomed ourselves to hope, nearly worn-out creed; to see Catholic chapels springing up in our towns, and convents, and finally monasteries, once more reviving in our fair fields, which had, for ages, witnessed only the ruins of such fabrics—was matter of no irrational astonishment. The Duke of Newcastle has trumpeted his alarm on this subject in the House of Lords; and many less bigoted, less politically mad, and more disposed than I take his Grace of Clumber to be, to allow of perfect liberty of conscience and opinion, have partaken of that alarm too. The No-Popery cry has not been without its effect. I cannot say that fears from this quarter ever affected me. I have too much faith in the established power of Protestantism—established, I mean, in the true sense; too much in that of a free press, and in the good sense of the Catholics themselves—to dread any insane attempt to restore the religious despotism which England shook off, once and for ever. I have recorded my opinion of the historical character of the Catholic Church in the "History of Priestcraft"—of the present character of it in this country, we may speak hereafter; it is, however, only justice to that Church to say here, that "The History of Priestcraft" itself, and all history, prove that the historical character of the Catholic would have been the historical character of any other church ALLIED TO THE STATE: it would have been a bloody and persecuting church. The Church of England soon gave gory evidence of this; the Puritans themselves soon confirmed it, in New England. It is not my business here to vindicate or assail the religious opinions of the Catholic Church—it is enough that they are not my opinions; but I trust we have now learned sufficient of Christianity to allow every man to read and interpret his Bible as he can, and enough of experience to guard against his religious tenets becoming mischievous to his neighbours by their amalgamation with political power. Towards the end of this article, one cause of the increase of Catholicism amongst us will be made sufficiently obvious.

A college of Jesuits, existing in England in the nineteenth century, possessing a large property there, and flourishing, and proselyting the inhabitants all round them—this is a subject of curious interest! There is something in the very name of it that makes us prick up our ears, and open our eyes, and prepare to inquire and to wonder. At all events—after having read the annals of Romish persecution, the history of Inquisitions, and of this most subtle and distinguished Order itself—this was and has been long the effect upon me. When, years ago, I heard that there was a Jesuits' college at Stonyhurst, my curiosity was strongly aroused. To imagine the disciples of Ignatius Loyola erecting their standard amid the spinners and weavers of Lancashire—the fathers of that famous Order which had figured so conspicuously in the dark annals of the Inquisition; which had insinuated its members into every country and city—into the cabinets and councils of all kings; which had so often directed the political power of Europe, traversed the vast lands of India and America, and moulded savage nations to its designs; of that order so awful in history for its peculiar policy, its sagacity, and its talent, coming out into the face of the English people, into the full blaze of the freest opinion, into the very midst of the jealous and searching scrutiny of Protestant sectaries—was a moral phenomenon worthy of close attention. One was curious to see what system of action these Proteus-like priests assumed; what were the political and social maxims they professedly held; by what links and lines of sympathy, or, at least, of accordance, they sought to connect themselves with a population alive with the spirit of freedom in all its shapes—in religion, in commerce, and in government. Accordingly, Mrs Howitt and myself took the opportunity, on our way northwards, to visit this interesting place. We went thither from Blackburn, where we were spending a short time with our friends; and found it a delightful drive of ten miles, principally along Ribblesdale, in which Stonyhurst is situated. After proceeding about two and a half miles north of Blackburn, Ribblesdale, one of the finest and most extensive vales in England, opened upon us, with Stonyhurst conspicuous on the opposite side of the valley, on a fine elevation, amidst its woods. The building has a noble and commanding aspect, worthy of its situation. It was apparently about three or four miles distant, and, I suppose, was not much more; one of the Jesuits afterwards telling us that they considered it, by the foot-path, a pretty direct line, to be about seven miles between Stonyhurst and Blackburn; but the carriage road is very circuitous, holding down the valley as far as Whalley, and then along winding lanes through Mitton; so that it proves a good ten miles. But whoever takes the drive will not think it one yard too much; a more delightful one can rarely be found. From the first opening of this splendid vale, you have Stonyhurst lying full in view; Ribchester, the celebrated Roman station, to the left, in the level of the valley; down the vale, to the north-east, you have the castle of Clitheroe, standing on its bold and abrupt eminence; and as you wind along the eastern side of the dale, with the Ribble below you on your left, and above you on your right, woods and cottages with their little enclosures, the ruins of Whalley Abbey come in view, and, high beyond, the bare and cloud-mottled heights of Pendle Hill. The ruins of Whalley Abbey, made so familiar to the public by Dr Whittaker's history, are still very extensive and picturesque. Old walls mingled with large trees; large windows here and there visible, still displaying their tracery; a house with smoking chimneys in the midst, and the Calder, a beautiful stream, between high banks, running close past—present a very attractive whole to the passer-by. Here we crossed a bridge and wound away to the left, in a circuitous course, to Stonyhurst; in fact, going, in a great measure, backward again. The lanes through which we drove were fine old pastoral lanes, all embowered with tall luxuriant hedges, rich with fresh foliage, and sweet with the flowers of the elder and the wild rose.

For it was, in fact, the 29th of June. So we drove on, every few yards catching a peep into fields full of grass, or glimpses of fine uplands, distant hills, and hanging woods. On our left, lying low amongst tall trees, appeared Little Mitton manor-house—one of those quaint, ancient, timbered houses with which Lancashire abounds. This is remarkable for its galleried hall of the age of Henry VII., of which an engraving may be found in Whittaker. All about us, as we ascended to the greater Mitton, or the Mitton, were green and whispering trees, and peeps into meadows rich with cattle; and the sound of the two rivers—the Hodder and the Ribble, which unite just below—came up to us delightfully. Mitton is as singularly as sweetly situated on a point of land in the West Riding of Yorkshire, which runs into Lancashire betwixt those streams; and it is a spot at which I must request my readers to pause a moment, not merely because in it lie the greater part of the Sherburne family, the ancient lords of Stonyhurst, but because the village and church of Mitton are, of themselves, highly worthy of a visit from the lovers of antiquity and of rural peace and seclusion. The place is one of the most perfect "Nooks of the World;" one of those places that, however all the country around them be revolutionized by manufactures and politics, stand, save for the ravages of time on their buildings, as they stood ages ago. It is most absolutely Old English. The slumber of a summer noon lies there profoundly as a trance. The low of cattle from a neighbouring croft, or the hum of a passing bee, seem the only living sounds. The village consists of a few old farm-houses—one of which is a dilapidated monastery—the usual diversification of a blacksmith's shop, a wheelwright's shop, the parsonage, and little garden cottages. It stands surrounded with a profusion of trees. The church is a plain, unpretending structure, with a low square tower; but it delights you as you approach with the green sequestered beauty of its churchyard, and, on your entrance, with such a group of effigied tombs as few village churches can shew.

We found the old sexton in his little cottage by the churchyard gate, supping his porridge, to use a Lancashire phrase—for it was twelve o'clock; but, on stating our desire to see the church, he set down his porringer and reached his keys. The man himself was a character worth knowing. He appeared very old, with a face that evidently had been a good one, and that now exhibited much shrewdness and sense of office. He was corpulent, and bound his waist about with a cord. He was so asthmatic that he could hardly breathe, and yet, when we asked his age, he replied—"Oh, I'm nubbut 85!" He seemed, indeed, to regard himself as quite a youth, though he had been clerk sixty-four years, had seen two or three clergymen out, and had copied inscriptions, and held a deal of intercourse with Dr Whittaker, the historian of Whalley, respecting the antiquities of this church.

On entering the churchyard, the very first object was one which spoke greatly in favour of the old man. It was the tomb of the late vicar, surrounded with a spacious railing, and, within the railing, planted with a hedge of evergreens, bays, junipers, box, and arbor-vitæs. He told us that the former clergyman had been very fond of evergreens, and so he had planted these about his tomb, as he had no surviving relatives on the spot to shew this respect to his memory. The shrubs had grown bravely; and he had clipped them square, like a green wall round the tomb, and cut them low at its foot, so as to allow the inscription to be read. The bottom of this verdant screen was newly weeded. He always weeded and clipped it once a year, he said; he had been doing it these last few days, but he had not yet had time "to ready the weeds and clippings away"—and there they lay.

As the old man applied his key to a door on the north side of the church, we observed an old effigy of a knight, in freestone, lying close to the wall. "Yes," said he, "you must notice that, and, when you come out of the church, notice it again." He opened the door; and the sight of the white marble tombs, and their extended figures, was very striking. They were the tombs and effigies of the Sherburnes, executed by William Stanton, and mentioned by Whittaker in his history of Whalley; but which our worthy sexton described in a way very peculiar to himself, and one infinitely more graphic and piquant. They were evidently the pride of his heart; and no wonder—for such an assemblage of marble tombs and recumbent figures, I suppose, scarcely another country church in England can boast.

The old man, like other show-people, had his story by rote; and, taking his stand before every successive monument, gave his account of it, and read off the inscription—Latin or English, legible or illegible, no matter. The first to which he turned, was, in fact, what he should have shewn last, because it was in memory of the last direct male descendant of the Sherburnes; but it was a pathetic subject, and, no doubt, strongly attracted his sympathies. It was an alto relievo of white marble. "This," said he, pointing to the centre figure, a graceful boy, "was the only son of Sir Nicholas Sherburne; and these," shewing two chubby lads on either hand, "were two poor lads that he took to be his playfellows; and they went to play in the gardens, when green fruit was rife, and he eat something that was poison, and died at nine years of age. Here you see the poor lads weeping for him, and the tears are running down their faces, as natural as life; here the angels are cutting down lilies and roses with their sickles—the lilies mean that he was cut off in his innocence, and the roses in his youth; here, the hour-glass, with the sand run out, shews that time to him was no more; and here the angels are receiving his soul into heaven. That is a very affecting thing."

But one specimen of our worthy cicerone's style must suffice. We must make shorter work of it than he did, and restrict our attention to a few particulars, characteristic of the cemetery of an old English family. There are three tombs, with recumbent figures of knights and their ladies, executed with great spirit, especially one lady, who is really beautiful. But the most singular monument, is one of Richard Sherburne, and his lady, who died in childbed of twins, while he was Captain of the Isle of Man, in 1591, "and there lieth entombed." "That," said the sexton, "is Old Fiddle-o'-God and his wife. He went by that name, because, when he was in a passion, that was his word." The pair were kneeling aloft on the monument, at an altar, opposite each other, in prayer, clad and coloured in the quaint style of that age—he in his ruff and full-skirted jerkin; she in a black gown and hood, falling over the top of her head, and with tan-leather gloves on her arms. On the compartments below, are seen the twins in bed, with their nurses watching by them; and, not far off, monks praying for the lady's soul. However passionate and profane the old gentleman might be, (and not only his speech betrays as much, but the inscription itself seems to confirm it, praying most heartily for them—"Whose souls God pardon; grant them His heavenly pardon,") yet he has a most ludicrously pious look on the monument.

There are two inscriptions by the Duchess Dowager of Norfolk, the daughter of Sir Nicholas Sherburne, which are perfect specimens of the manner in which great families glorify themselves in their own churches, over the very pit of corruption, which one would think enough to confound all human greatness. The first is to her parents, and conveys a curious picture of the times:—"Sir Nicholas Shireburn was a man of great humanity, sympathy, and concern for the good of mankind, and did many good charitable things whilst he lived: he particularly set his neighbourhood a-spinning of Jersey wool, and provided a man to comb the wool, and a woman who taught them to spin, whom he kept in his house, and allotted several rooms he had in one of the courts of Stonihurst, for them to work in; and the neighbours came to spin accordingly. The spinners came every-day, and span as long a time as they could spare, morning and afternoon, from their families: this continued from April 1699 to August 1701. When they all had learned, he gave the nearest neighbours each a pound or half a pound of wool ready for spinning, and wheel, to set up for themselves; which did a vast deal of good to that north side of Kibble in Lancashire. Sir Nicholas Sherburn died December 15, 1717. This monument was set up by the Dowager Dutchess of Northfolk, in memory of the best of fathers and mothers, and in this vault designs to be interred herself, whenever it pleases God to take her out of this world."

"Lady Sherburn was a lady of excellent temper and fine sentiment, singular piety, virtue, and charity, constantly employed in doing good, especially to the distressed, sick, poor, and lame, for whom she kept an apothecary's shop in the house. She continued as long as she lived doing great good and charity. She died January 27, 1722. Besides all other great charities which Sir Nicholas and Lady Sherburn did, they gave, on All-Souls Day, a considerable deal of money to the poor; Lady Sherburn serving them with her own hands that day."

But this is nothing to the monumental testimony to the Honourable Peregrin Widderington:—"In this vault lies the body of the Honourable Peregrin Widderington. The Honourable Peregrin Widderington was youngest son of William Lord Widderington, who died April 17th, 1743. This Peregrin was a man of the strictest friendship and honour, with all the good qualities that accomplish a fine gentleman; he was of so amiable a disposition, and so engaging, that he was beloved and esteemed by all who had the honour and happiness of his acquaintance, being ever ready to oblige and to act the friendly part on all occasions; firm and steadfast in all his principles—which were delicately fine and good as could be wished in any man—he was both sincere and agreeable in life and conversation. He was born May 20th, 1692, and died February 4th, 1748–9. He was with his brother in the Preston affair, 1716, where he lost his fortune, with his health, by a long confinement in prison. This monument was set up by the Dowager Dutches of Norfolk, in memory of the Honourable Peregrin Widderington."

"What! was this her second husband?" we inquired.

"Ay," said the old man, with a knowing look, "her tally husband—and that makes a difference!"*

The rest of the interior of the church is old and mean. This aisle, with its proud monuments, separated by a screen, stands in strange contrast, and makes it seem a place where the Sherburnes have the glory rather than God. The old man now led the way to a curious ancient cross in the churchyard, and to the tomb of a monk, whose honoured head is still visible upon it; and then to the freestone effigies under the windows of the Sherburne aisle. The origin of it, he said, was this:—When the monuments of the Sherburnes came down from London, they were, of course, the wonder and the talk of the whole country. A common stone-mason, as he sate by the ale-house fire at Hurst's-Green, hearing the company extolling them, said, "Oh, he would undertake to cut out as good in common stone." The whole place was scandalised at the man's arrogance; it was carried to the hall. The man was sent for, and desired to make good his boast, under penalty of forfeiting their employment for ever if he failed. He was to take only one view of the figure he pitched upon; and twelve months were allowed him to finish it in. "And there it is," said the sexton, "as like as pea to pea. The man had done it long before the year was up; and so surprised were the Sherburnes, that they gave him £20, and allowed it to be laid under the window of the aisle."

We must now hasten to Stonyhurst College—for we have stopped long by the way; but who would not stop awhile at such a pleasant, antiquated place as Mitton? Let my readers look upon it as a distinct episode in this account.

We have seen where the Sherburnes lie—let us now see where they lived; and we cannot give a better general idea of the place than by transcribing the clear and succinct description of it by Mr Baines, in his "History of Lancashire.

"In the year 1794, the stately mansion of Stonyhurst was fixed upon as the seat of an English Roman Catholic college. The heads of that college having been driven from their establishment at Liege by the proscriptions of the French Revolution, were induced, in consequence of the judicious mitigation of the penal enactments in England against Catholic seminaries, to seek an asylum in their native country. A long lease was accordingly obtained of the house and of the college farm, on moderate terms, from the late Thomas Wild, Esq. The mansion they found much dilapidated from time and neglect; but it is now in a state of complete repair, and they have raised, at a great expense, a large and handsome new building, with a south-east aspect, forming a house admirably adapted for the purpose of education.

"In the upper stories are the dormitories, where each student has his little apartment. The next story consists of the apartments for the professors and teachers. Below, are the chambers of the president and other directors, with the hall of study and philosophical room; the former, of seventy-eight feet by twenty feet, is fitted up with desks and benches for 220 scholars; but they do not at present amount to that number. A high throne or pulpit for the prefect, who has the charge of the young gentlemen at their studies, stands against the wall in the central part of the room, so as to command a view of each student. This place is devoted to study exclusively. Not a word is exchanged between the students during the hours allotted to study. The philosophical apparatus room is forty-eight feet by thirty-three broad; it is ornamented with a rich deep frieze; and the instruments which are used in the illustration of the different branches of natural philosophy, are deposited in this room. A fine painting, by Annibal Caracci, of the taking down of the Saviour from the Cross, hangs over the fireplace. The exhibition room is connected with this apartment by sliding doors. This room is adapted for classical or philosophical exhibitions—and such exhibitions are frequent in the college.

"On the ground-floor, are the seven school or class rooms, where the respective scholars of each class recite to their several masters the lessons which they have learned in the study, and receive lectures. The play-rooms, lavatory, drawing-room, music room, and dancing-gallery, are also on this floor. Every duty has its own fixed time, place, and superintendent. The library is a handsome, but small room. It contains, amongst other valuable works, some highly illuminated manuscripts, the prayer-book of the queen of Henry VII., and the office in honour of the blessed Virgin, which belonged to the persecuted Queen of Scotts. There are also here, two or three vellum missals, and several black-letter books; a copy of St John's Gospel; a manuscript of the seventh century, found in the tomb of St Cuthbert; with two sculptures in ivory, and a painted crucifix—all by Michael Angelo; also, a chest of coins and medals, medallions of the popes, &c.

"The museum is between the western towers; and contains, among many other interesting subjects, the private seals of James II. and Fenelon; the embroidered cap of Sir Thomas More; his seal, when Under-Treasurer; and his original George,* when Lord Chancellor, with this inscription—'O passi graviora dabit his quoque finem;' several remarkable vases, pixes, and crosses; with a number of transatlantic curiosities, presented by C. Waterton, Esq. of Walton Hall, in the county of York; a good collection of minerals and shells; bronze casts of the Cæsars, and plaster casts of the martyrdom of the Apostles; and the cabinet of the learned Queen Christina of Sweeden. The merits and promise of this museum, are not known, or we should find here more monuments of Roman antiquity from Ribchester. A Roman altar, dedicated to the mother goddesses, by a captain of the Asturias, has, however, been lately rescued from the rubbish of a neighbouring farm-yard, and now stands on more classical ground, in the garden of Stonyhurst. This rare piece of antiquity proves to be the identical altar which the venerable Camden, in 1603, saw near Ribchester. The altar is thirty-three inches high, by twenty-two inches broad, and the inscription at length may be read thus:—

DIS MATRIBUS MARCUS INGENUIUS ASIATICUS DECURIO ALA ASTRUM SUSCEPTUM SOLVIT LIBENS LUBENS MERITO.

"The recreation-hall of the Professors is a magnificent gallery, ninety feet by twenty, in the old house, running parallel with the study; the grand tapestry of which room was renewed by the Duke of Norfolk. The refectory, which is of the dimensions of sixty feet by twenty, was the baronial hall of the Sherburnes; its ceiling, frieze, and floor, are magnificent. The new building is three hundred feet long, and fronts the extensive play-ground and gardens. The public rooms in the new, as well as in the old buildings, are constructed on a noble scale. The area of the house, play-grounds, and gardens, comprises a space about equal to that on which stood Roman Ribchester—upwards of ten acres.

"Such is the college in which many of the sons of the Catholic nobility and gentry of this country, are educated. Here they are taught to respect and cherish the laws and constitution of their country, and to place a due estimate upon the advantages of a polite and classical education.

"The character of the population, like that of the lands round the college, is much improved during the last thirty years; and many of the poor of the neighbourhood are fed and clothed by the institution. The political importance of large Catholic establishments of this kind, is well known to the legislature; and wise was that monarch and that Parliament which relaxed the severity of the penal laws, and invited the Catholic exiles from foreign countries and colleges, to spend their fortunes and their lives in their own country.

"The stately pile of Stonyhurst, with its towers and park-like grounds, forms a magnificent object to the whole of the surrounding country; and the prospects which it commands are bold, rich, and beautiful. Eastward, appears the picturesquely-wooded valleys of the Hodder and the Ribble; the castle of Clitheroe is seen crowning the summit of an insulated hill; and the vast mass of Pendle closes the view. Southward, appear the high grounds of Blackburn parish, and the windings of the Ribble towards Ribchester. The principal part of the edifice is to the west; looking over the park and grounds, which are ornamented with clumps of plantation. The geographical situation of Stonyhurst is ten miles to the north of Blackburn, the post-town of the establishment, and is equi-distant from Clitheroe, Whalley, and Ribchester.

"On the south angle of the front of the college, a large and handsome Catholic church or chapel is now erecting, partly by subscription and partly out of the college funds, in the Tudor style of architecture, after a design by J. J. Scholes, Esq. The first stone of the structure was laid in 1832; and it will, when finished, be dedicated to St Peter."

On approaching this interesting place, we found two roads, one diverging to the right, the other to the left. We took the right, which led us, through pleasant, bowery lanes—the fine buildings shewing themselves, ever and anon, over the trees—to the lodges, the usual way of entrance. Here, visiters are expected to use the hospitality of the place, by giving their horses and carriages into the hands of the groom, who takes all possible care of them during their stay. As we were, however, not aware of this circumstance, we drove on, by a winding route, to Hurst's-Green, a little hamlet, about half a mile from the college. We found here, that the road diverging to the left from Mitton is the direct way to Hurst's-Green, where those who are not inclined to tax the hospitality of the establishment so much, will find a good village inn, where their horses will be well accommodated. We can only say, however, that, when the heads of the college found that we had not brought our horses to their stable, they expressed the greatest concern.

The approach from Hurst's-Green, is a pleasant walk, and gives you the fullest and finest view of the college. Advancing from the green, you pass several comfortable cottages, and then through a gate, which brings you into the lawn in front of the house; but at the distance of a quarter of a mile. But, before passing through this gate, you come to a charming little cemetery, belonging to the hamlet and neighbourhood, with a plain but very tasteful oratory, with a bell. The ground is adorned with a white cross, and a few scattered tombs of simple and appropriate style, and graves planted with shrubs and flowers. This rural cemetery stands well, giving wide views of the country round—of Pendle in one direction, and the wild uplands of Bowland Forest in another; and is screened and skirted with trees, with good effect. Here, in winter and bad weather, the funeral rites are performed for the deceased, by one of the fathers of Stonyhurst, in the oratory; but, in summer and fine weather, in the open air. The poetical, and, I trust, the religious effect, must be strong, of such a funeral in such a place. The single bell from this fair, but solitary grave-yard, calling, over hill and dale, with its solemn voice, the dead to his place; and the weeping forms, the funeral garments, and the impressive rites of Christian sepulture, thus witnessed in the face of heaven, and the beauties of that earth which shall know him who has departed "no more for ever"—must, one thinks, exercise a strong and even soothing influence, under such circumstances, over the human spirit.

Turning away from this cemetery, and entering upon the lawn, the ruin of Stonyhurst is very impressive. It is a house which accords well with the style of its former lords in Mitton church. You see that it was worthy of the Sherburnes. The grounds, woods, and waters about its solitary stateliness belong strictly to the "old English gentleman." You see that it was not unnatural for the lords and ladies of such a place to take to themselves some credit for "their sympathy and concern for the good of mankind," and for "the many good, charitable things which they did while they lived." You could not avoid thinking of Lady Sherburne now, not as the tenant of a tomb, but as the living lady of this noble mansion; and then, for "a lady of excellent temper and fine sentiments," inhabiting such a house, it really did not seem too much to glorify her condescension in giving money away, "on All Saints' Day, with her own hands." One thought of those delicate hands busy amongst her cordials and plasters, "for the poor and lame, for whom she kept an apothecary's shop in the house;" and then, calling to mind the many stately mansions and stately parks now-a-days, where the fair and high-born shut themselves up from the intrusions of their own poor neighbours during the few months in the year that they dwell amongst them; and calling to mind, at the same time, the poor men removed from their cottages and imprisoned in some monstrous Poor-Law prison—and, truly, the eulogium of her Duchess-daughter became worthy of being carved with "an iron pen, and with lead in the rock.

An avenue of noble trees formerly skirted the carriage road, which runs directly up the lawn to the house. That is gone; but woods on either hand of the lawn still form a wider kind of avenue, at the end of which appears this tall building, with its large entrance gateway in the centre, its large square windows, and two domed towers, surmounted with eagles. About half-way up the lawn, a railing runs across, marking the more immediate approach; and, on each hand, is a sheet of water. The house is in the style of Paul of Padua, and is said, by the Jesuit fathers, to be the most perfect English specimen of that style. It was built in the reign of Elizabeth, on the site of the older edifice, by Sir Richard Sherburne, who received the honour of knighthood for his bravery in the battle of Leith, and was so great a favourite of her Majesty that she allowed him to have his chapel and his priest at Stonyhurst. He did not, however, live to finish it; and the cupolas of the towers were added by Sir Nicholas Sherburne, at a cost of £40! as is shewn by the deed of contract still existing at Stonyhurst. Sir Nicholas was a travelled scholar; and by him the gardens and grounds were laid out in the French taste; and he was preparing to complete the half-finished building, when he lost his only son, Richard Francis, who died in the year 1702, at the age of nine years, and in the manner already related. This severe domestic bereavement so affected him that he abandoned his design. His only daughter, Maria Winifreda Francisca, married Thomas, the eighth Duke of Norfolk, and died without issue in the year 1768. The family possessions now passed to the children of Elizabeth, sister of Sir Nicholas, married to Sir William Wild of Lulworth Castle, Dorsetshire; and his eminence, Cardinal Wild, eldest son of the late Thomas Wild, Esq., of Lulworth, inherited this noble mansion from his father.

This family appears to have been always a stanch Catholic one; and Stonyhurst coming into the possession of a cardinal, one is not surprised that it should be alienated from the family, and converted to the service of the Catholic cause. The estate is now not merely leased, but sold to the founders of the college.

Having devoted a considerable portion of a chapter in "The History of Priestcraft" to the historical character and policy of the Jesuits—a portraiture by no means favourable to the order—it might seem to many, a brazen-visaged sort of thing to present one's self at a Jesuit institution; but what I stated, I stated on the faith of history, and I imagined that I could not give a more convincing proof of the honesty of my convictions, and the absence, on my part, of any intention to give offence to individuals, nor pay a higher compliment to the discreet policy and courtesy of the order itself—than by such an act. I had, therefore, furnished myself with an introduction to the President from a Catholic priest, whom I believe to be at once a Jesuit and a worthy man—and the event justified my opinion. Nothing could be more courteous than our reception, or more candid than the manner in which all answers to our inquiries, both regarding the place and the social and political views of the conductors, were given. We found the President, the Rev. Mr Scott, was extremely ill at some other place—in fact, as was supposed, and as it proved, at the point of death; but two of the priests, Mr Daniells and Mr Irvine, received us most kindly.

They apprised us that we had arrived on a day on which it was contrary to their custom to admit visiters—being no other than the anniversary of the dedication of their new church to St Peter and St Paul—but that they would gladly make an exception in our favour. They could not, indeed, both attend us, divine worship going on in the church the greater part of the day, and Mr Daniells being now just going to celebrate mass; but Mr Irvine would shew us the institution during that time, and lunch would be on the table at our return. Accordingly, we made the round of the house, and were struck with admiration at the general style and nobility of the place—its oaken floor, long galleries, paintings, ceilings, the library, the museum, the exhibition and philosophical apparatus room, and all those relics and antiquarian remains which enrich it. The passing remarks which I have to make upon these may form a sort of running commentary on Mr Baines's statement above. The dormitories are large and airy rooms, every separate bed being inclosed within a screen, like the screens of a coffee-house; and a large curtain is drawn in front, so that every box, with the advantage of ample ventilation, possesses perfect privacy. The philosophical apparatus room and exhibition room merit all the praise bestowed upon them; they are noble rooms, and well furnished with orreries, galvanic batteries, a small steam-engine, mathematical instruments, and every requisite for scientific demonstrations. Besides the fine painting by Annibal Caracci, there is one of St Catherine of Padua, in the hospital, well worthy of attention, for the contrast of benignant beauty in the saint, with the wretched and agonized forms around her. This room is also furnished with a noble organ.

An excellent and effective mode of education is adopted here. After philosophical exhibitions in these rooms, and after silent reading in the hall of study, each class returns to the room of its particular teacher, and every boy is carefully questioned upon what he has seen or read, so as to ascertain that he has clearly comprehended and made himself master of the matter presented to his mind. The silence and decorum of the school are beautiful. At one moment, the sound of 166 boys at play, in front of the college, came up to us; the next, we saw them marching to the hall of study; and, shortly afterwards, passing the door, so profound was the hush that we inquired whether it were not really empty.

Amongst the relics and sculptures in the library which are secured in a glass case, the Prayer Book, stated above to have belonged to the Queen of Scots, was asserted by Mr Irvine to have belonged to Mary of England; and that with good reason—the words Maria Regina merely being written within the cover, and amongst the emblematical silver embossments on the binding, appearing the pomegranate, the emblem of Spain. The seals of James II., of Fenelon, and the cap, beads, seal, and reliquary of Sir Thomas More, were also in this case in the library. The relics of Sir Thomas More were given by Father More, the last of the family. Amongst the many interesting contents of the Museum, none are more striking than the quaint old jewel chest of Queen Christina, a large cup of crystal, a curious old ark surmounted with a cross, and some old English MSS. written on long narrow slips of vellum. The recreation hall is indeed a magnificent gallery, and is embellished with a great number of paintings, amongst which is a very curious large Spanish piece, a portrait of Ignatius Loyola, surrounded by those of almost every celebrated Jesuit. There is also a set of heads of the apostles, very striking, and correspondent with their characters, especially that of St John, which is beautiful, and full of that spirit of love which gave him the bosom-place with his Divine Master. The refectory is one of the finest baronial halls I have seen; and the floors of this and other rooms are of oak laid in squares, lozenges, and other figures, of a rich and antique beauty. This noble room has tables, seats, and other furniture now preparing for it, of a fashion accordant with and worthy of its old English magnificence.

We proceeded from the house, to view the play-ground and gardens. In the former, which has been taken from the gardens, we found 166 boys at play—a fine set of lads, in all the eagerness and animation of their age—the sons of the principal Catholic nobility and gentry of England and Ireland. Sheil was educated here.

With the exception of the piece taken for the play-ground, the gardens remain pretty much in the form in which they were laid out by Sir Nicholas Sherburne. They are delightful in themselves, and delightfully situated—looking out over that splendid valley, with its river, woods, uplands, and distant hills. It is the fashion to cry down all gardens as ugly and tasteless which are not shaped by our modern notions. The formalities of the French and Dutch have been sufficiently condemned. For my part, I like even them in their place. One would no more think of laying out grounds now in this manner than of wearing Elizabethan ruffs, or bob-wigs and basket-hilted swords; but the old French and Dutch gardens, as appendages of a quaint old house, are, in my opinion, beautiful. They are like many other things—not so much beautiful in themselves as beautiful by association, as memorials of certain characters and ages. A garden, after all, is an artificial thing, and, though framed from the materials of nature, may be allowed to mould them into something very different from nature. There is a wild beauty of nature, and there is a beauty in nature linked to art; one looks for a very different kind of beauty in fields and mountains to what one does in a garden. The one delights you by a certain rude freedom and untamed magnificence; the other, by smoothness and elegance—by velvet lawns, bowery arbours, winding paths, fair branching shrubs, fountains, and juxtapositions of many rare flowers. Who will say that Colonel Howard's Elizabethan house and old French gardens at Leven's Bridge are not beautiful?—and who will say, when they have seen them, that the gardens of Stonyhurst are not so too?

In the centre is a capacious circular basin of water, in the midst of which stands a leaden figure of a man in chains, said to be Atilius Regulus. This basin abounds with gold, silver, and black fish. Near it, a fine observatory is erecting which will command an enviable prospect. At each lower extremity of the garden, overlooking the dale, is a summer-house of very beautiful form, with tall pointed roofs, surmounted with eagles. Over each door is a grotesque head, and, above it, a very classical bass-relief vase, with wreaths of flowers and fruit falling on each side. One side of the garden is still divided by pleached walks of yew—in fact, tall screens or walls of yew, cut square, at least ten feet high, and four or five thick, and kept in fine order. From the observatory, you see the whole plan of these fences; but, as you walk among them, you are enveloped in a most green and pleasant solitude. Arched doorways are cut through them, and you come, in one place, to a large circular enclosure, formerly occupied by a fountain, but now converted into a bowling-green. Thence you descend, by broad flights of easy steps, into a most solemn, cool, and twilight walk, formed by ancient, over-arching yews—a place, of all others, made for the meditations of the religious devotee. Reascending, you pass into the air and sunshine, amongst cheerful trees and delicious flowers. Similar flights, at the opposite side of the garden, lead you to walls hung with fruit, and kitchen gardens calculated for such an establishment.

From the garden, we passed into the new church, an erection of great beauty, dedicated to St Peter and St Paul, whose statues occupy niches on each side of the great western window, which is richly painted with the figures of the Saviour, the Virgin, St John, and the other apostles. The church contains four altars decorated with considerable splendour; the carving, which is very good, being principally executed by a working mason of Preston. The different parts of the church are copied from different celebrated ecclesiastical buildings; the pillars and arches forming the aisles from St Winifred's Well; the figures of the saints from Henry VIII.'s chapel. The roof and the organ of oak, are fine.

This was the first anniversary of the opening of this church, and numbers of the country people were at mass. But, about forty years ago, when the Jesuits came here, they found the place a wilderness, having been uninhabited for some years. The lands were wild and overgrown with rushes; now, they present an aspect of great cheerfulness and good farming. About fifty cows are kept to supply the establishment with milk and butter. The place, indeed, is a perfect rural paradise; and what has alarmed the Church of England no little, and caused it to build a new church at the nearest point of approach, and induced the neighbouring clergy to preach furious sermons against them, is the fact, that the fathers have proselyted the greater part of the population of the neighbourhood. Their regular congregation now consists of 1600 people, exclusive of their own establishment, which is 250—making, in all, about 1850 people.

We returned to the house, and found, instead of a lunch, an excellent hot dinner awaiting us. Mr Daniells having now terminated his labours in the chapel, joined us, and our conversation naturally turned upon their peculiar position here, their success, and the general condition of Catholicism in England and Ireland. We joked them on the casuistry and duplicity of the Jesuits, and on their gallantry to the ladies, no women being suffered to sleep under the roof. All this they took in very good part, as Jesuits ought to do, only saying—

"Ah, indeed, Jesuits are dreadful fellows. General Johnstone," said one of them, "with a young friend of his, was, some time ago, obliged to pass the night here in consequence of his chaise not coming for him as he expected, and, in retiring to bed, he said to his companion—'Good-by, my dear fellow—I shall never see you any more; for, when you wake in the morning, you will find your throat cut!'"

"But," said Mrs Howitt, "let what would happen, if it rained or snowed beyond all possibility of travelling, you would turn me out. You would permit Mr Howitt to stay; but poor I must dare the elements, and do as well as I could."

"O ma'am," they replied, "we should be very sorry; but the rules of our order would compel us to do so—not, however, quite so savagely as you represent; for we would take care to get you good quarters in the neighbourhood."

We had found, in different places, as we advanced northward, a good deal of the Newcastle panic prevailing, as I have said, amongst those who possess calmer heads and more Liberal politics than Newcastle or Winchelsea—amongst Dissenters, and, particularly, amongst Friends. They seemed to look upon the Catholics as exerting every energy to regain their ancient power; that, under the mask of Liberal politics, they were uniting with the Dissenters to pull down the Church of England merely to raise their own; that their first attempt would be upon Ireland; and that the Dissenters, by their support of O'Connell, were blindly overlooking their own interests. They contended that the establishment of Popery in Ireland, as the national church, was their great object—perhaps not their ultimate one; for, that once attained, they would exert a pernicious influence over the liberties of England. One Friend did not scruple to say that the Catholics not only aimed at the Irish hierarchy, but that they had a great right to ask it—had a right to say to the government—"The Episcopalians have a majority in England, and you there have established them; the Presbyterians have a majority in Scotland, and you there have established them; we have the majority in Irelaid, and, by the clearest and simplest principles of equity, there you ought to establish us." He thought it reasonable language. It was in vain to tell him that certainly they had the greatest right to ask this of the government, while the government advocated national establishments at all; but that the people, who were tired of establishments altogether, had a right also to say to the government—"You shall not multiply nuisances. We desire to see the inhabitants of all the three countries placed on a level; but it is not the level of establishments, but of the free enjoyment of a free religion."

Here our worthy friend turned round from argument to assertion, and replied—"But the Catholics will, ere long, demand this of the Whigs, and the Whigs will give it them as a bribe to cease their alliance with the Dissenters of England against the English Church."

Another gentleman of the same society took the same view, and condemned the Dissenters, that, while they supported O'Connell and the Irish in their demands for justice to Ireland, they did not call upon every Irish Reformer to pledge himself to support the Dissenters' claims; contending that, the moment O'Connell and his party had obtained their objects, they would leave the Dissenters to shift for themselves. To this I had opposed the uniform conduct of O'Connell and the brave band of Irish patriots, as it regarded English reform, and the repeated declarations that O'Connell had publicly made, that he was opposed to all establishments of religion whatever—a declaration with which all the respectable Catholics that I knew entirely agreed. The answer was—"Yes, they say so! O'Connell says so in public; but his Dublin Review speaks a different language. They say so; but the universal practice of the Catholics on the Continent belies the assertion—they have always been, and still are, only too happy to link themselves to the political machine."

Bearing those things in mind, I sought to introduce this subject to these gentlemen in such a way as I thought would shew me, by their manner as much as their words, what were their real sentiments—spite of the proverbial casuistry and caution of their order. When, therefore, conversation had assumed a confidential and even merry tone, I alluded to the difficulties and popular antipathies which growingly beset the English Church. "Yes," said one of them, "she is going, and I will join, with a hearty good will, in pulling her down."

"But why," I asked, "pull her down? Would it not answer your purpose better to establish your own church in Ireland? Would it not be better to ask this, which you may ask with so good a grace, having there so preponderating a majority? Is not this an object that, as a sincere lover of your own church, you must ardently desire?" In a moment, and with an enthusiasm that could not be mistaken, one of them replied—"No, never! To desire the political establishment of Catholicism, would be to desire its destruction! I hope never to see that day—it would be a fatal day to us."

"Yes," I rejoined, taking up the arguments furnished me by the gentleman alluded to; "this, I know, is the common language of English Catholics; but how is it that it does not agree with the practice of Catholics, when the opportunity is afforded them? On the Continent, we see the Catholics as ready as ever to ally themselves with the State."

"That," replied Mr Daniells, "is the very reason that makes me dread a union with the State here. I know human nature—I know how prone it is to grasp at power and honour; but I know, too, that the union with the State was the destruction of the Church of Rome in this country in the sixteenth century; and it is destroying the Church of England now, and will destroy it. Sir, we have read history, as well as the Protestants, and we know, as well as we know anything, that an establishment is the most fatal curse that can befall any church. We know that it infuses a Lethean lethargy; it destroys the vitality of zeal; it breaks up the living interest between the priest and his people. That is the notorious and necessary result of an establishment; that has been, and is, and must be the perpetual tendency of every such experiment; and, therefore, whatever may be the desire of others, mine is, that Catholicism may never be established by law in these kingdoms. I do not deny that I desire to see Catholicism spread and prosper; as a zealous lover of my Church, and deeming it, as I do, the best form of Christianity, it is what I must desire; and here we have done all that we could, and shall continue to do all that we can, to extend its sphere and its influence. I do not deny that we love power; but, then, it is an intellectual and moral power—not the unnatural power derived from a political alliance, which, in the end, brings weakness for the State, while it confers a specious and external form of existence; and, like a vampire, saps the very life of the life within its victim. If I desire prosperity and power for my Church, all history has shewn me that they only can be derived from the voluntary zeal of the minister and the affections of the people."

I could not but admit that this was, at least, sound reasoning—a wise and legitimate rendering of the language of a long and painful experience; and I felt, in the frank earnestness with which it was delivered, that it was sincere.

We rose to take our leave, and our polite and hospitable hosts also took their caps and walked down with us to Hurst's-Green. As we approached that place, I pointed out to them the new English church built on the hill opposite. They smiled, and said—

"Yes, they may build churches, and preach bitter sermons against us, but it all will not avail; it is not by these means that the hearts of the people are won and their lives amended. We shall go on in our own way."

And what is that way? That is the important question—important to the Church of England—important to all who fear error and desire truth—most important to us all, as we love our fellow-men, and are anxious that they should have Christianity presented to them in its purest and truest form. It is, "to visit the widow and the fatherless in their affliction, and to keep yourselves unspotted from the world." Now, this, it must be confessed, is the plan of their operations; this is "the witchcraft which they have used;" it is by this that, while the Church of England all round them has been weakening its influence and exasperating its enemies, they have been gaining strength every day, and have already acquired a congregation of upwards of 1800 souls. Mr Baines, in the quotation I have made, bears testimony to the improvement they have effected, both in the condition of the land and the condition of the people; and it is this religion of works, after all, that will prevail. If the faith of these men be adulterated by some grievous errors and traditionary superstitions, as it unquestionably is, is not that a strong reason why both the Church people and the Dissenters should look to their own practice, and ask themselves why it is less effective? The purer the church, the more powerful it ought to be found over the human mind. But St James has told us a great truth—"What doth it profit, my brethren, though a man say he have faith, and have not works? If a brother or a sister be naked, and destitute of daily food, and one of you say unto them, Depart in peace, be ye warmed and filled; notwithstanding ye give them not those things which are needful to the body, what doth it profit?" The religion of good works, of generous and active philanthropy, is the only religion which will win the people. The bulk of the people are not nice reasoners; they are none of your acute metaphysicians, who can tell you the difference between the hundredth and the hundredth-and-one shade of a sentiment; but they know in a moment when they are treated as men, and their hearts kindle and embrace their benefactors, with a sympathy not easily destroyed. Their understandings may even revolt at the prominent errors of a church's doctrines; but if they once feel that it has the pith of real Christian love in it, they are gained for ever; errors become changed into matters of indifference, or are actually converted, by the mental alchemy of grateful affection, into real and venerable truths. It should be recollected that, whatever be the errors with which the Catholic faith is blemished, it is the religion of Fenelon; and I ask any candid person, what would be the effect if we had the Archbishop of Cambray on the one hand, preaching and practising love to a suffering and simple-hearted people, succouring their wants, soothing their troubles, entering their cottages, and, by their bedsides or their firesides, acting the part of a kind and affectionate friend, of a cheerful and encouraging neighbour; and the Archbishop of Canterbury, on the other, coming in his carriage to the principal church of the next principal town, and delivering a charge to his clergy, warning them to be ware of the damnable doctrines and pernicious practice of Catholic priests? We need not answer the question—the Jesuits of Stonyhurst have answered it for us. More cheerful, friendly people, it is impossible to find; visiting the poor in their cottages with the usual assiduity and familiar kindness of Catholic priests.

Now we ask, Can any one shew us a more signal example of THE TRIUMPH OF THE VOLUNTARY PRINCIPLE? Here is a religion which, for three centuries, has been stigmatized, throughout all England and Scotland, as a bloody and superstitious religion—a religion which, in fact, when it was the established religion of the land, crowned itself with odium for its rapacity, its sensuality, and for the folly, idleness, and everlasting bickerings of its monks; here is an order, too, of that religion which, more than all others—by the depth of its policy, the ambition and the talent of its leaders, by the pliant and yet most persevering pursuance of its objects—rendered itself the terror and abhorrence of the English people:—this religion and this order have thus come boldly forth in the face of England, in the face of a rival and established Church armed with the wealth and influence of the nation, and have driven that Church out of its own field, and reclaimed the population round it to the faith which their forefathers cast off as an obsolete thing. Now, how has this happened? Simply, because the one Church has been thrown upon its own resources—has been put under the necessity of creating its own prosperity; while the other, boasting itself as the perfection of Christian polity and doctrine, has been rocked to slumber in the lap of the political Dalilah. It is in vain that the Church of England tells us that this Church is the very sink of corruption and delusion—for, if that be true, the more shame to the English Church to suffer such discomfiture from it, with such fearful odds in its own favour. It is in vain that it proclaims its alarm at the progress and the designs of Popery, for Popery itself has shewn it how that progress may be averted and those designs neutralized. We can only answer its outcry, by saying, If you dread its progress, embrace the cause of its prosperity—abandon the false position of State alliance, and assume the position of self-dependence. Your rivals, your scorned and calumniated rivals, have presented to you a text which must shew to the whole empire your actual choice. If you really desire the good of your flocks, you must abandon your political position—if you still maintain that, no man can any longer mistake your character or the meaning of your cry. Come down, Antæus-like, to the naked ground, face to face and foot to foot with your antagonist; and, in proportion as you are purer in doctrine and more Christian in spirit, the more glorious must be your triumph over her.

We took our leave of those gentlemen with sincere respect for their talents and Christian conduct in this neighbourhood; and, still differing as much as ever from their creed, more than ever convinced that the true policy of the Catholics in these kingdoms is this—and none are better persuaded of it than themselves—to unite with the people for both political and religious freedom; and that, if there be any real design against the English Church or Government amongst them, the surest and the only way to counteract it is, to place all religious parties on the same vantage ground as the Catholics themselves—that of SELF-DEPENDENCE and individual exertion, unaided by any other power than that of Truth and the God of Truth.

PRIVATE WHISPERINGS BELOW.

QUOTH Satan to Titus Oates—
"Oates, my boy, you're the jewel for plots;
A word in your ear—I'm provokingly vexed;
Since I quizzed your grim phiz, I've been ne'er so perplexed;
I've forsworn our mad billies on earth for a trice,
To extract from your wise head a bit of advice.
D'ye see, I've left earth and our council corner,
Crammed with the alien and rank suborner,
Bishop and barrister, gown and wig,
Plundering Tory and pilfering Whig;
Copely the renegade, Winchy the frantic;
Hooky and Scarlet, and Charley the antic;
He of the bright sword, and Sinclair the creeper;
M'Ghee the defamer, and Eldon the weeper.
Our plans were well laid—even yours were not better—
The giant of Freedom to gag and to fetter;
Our friends were stanch, and I twigged their vanity,
And primed them with Beelzebub's best of insanity.
So the renegade rose, with a dash and a swagger,
With a face of oil, and a tongue of dagger;
Headed the Lords, and floored the nation;
Hurled to the winds the 'Appropriation;'
Vowed that the fetters of bondage should grace,
For ever and aye, the alien race;
Flung defiance to reason, and shouted 'Victorious!'
I sung out, 'Hurrah, boy!' and Philpotts cried, 'Glorious!'
We had deemed that Old England would smile or would sleep;
But our magic was powerless—her curses were deep.
Out blustered M'Ghee, with a face lack-a-daisical,
Though we knew that the rogue looked confoundedly quizzical—
'I've a letter from Rome, boys, and Dan, by the powers!
Is a traitor—that's plain as the rain when it showers.'
And he read——But, ha! ha! I'm ashamed of the squad—
For the Devil himself, it was really too bad.
Friend Murtagh out-blarneyed the Doctor, and swore
The old lies he has sworn to a hundred times o'er—
That blest would green Erin be, bishop-bestraddled;
While in tithe-fat the Ryder and Beresford waddled,
While the hierarch priest swigged his thousands in riot,
And the Catholic millions were starving in quiet;
That the sun of old Ireland was stanch orthodoxy,
And the smile of a bishop was heaven's by proxy;
That treason and bloodshed were hatched in the skull o' Dan.
But folk sneered, held their hands up, exclaiming,
'O Mulligan!'
Now, in spite of old Peter* and Mortimer's flummery,
Our bribing and dining, our ranting and mummery,
Our hopes that green Erin, be-Peeled and be-Pitted,
Would smile on her shackles—we're fairly outwitted;
The gloom that hung o'er us broods deeper and nigher,
And the white flag of freedom is broader and higher."
Quoth Titus Oates to Satan, " . .
. . . . . ."
Now, the upshot was this, that Titus Oates,
And a legion of imps of the wiliest sect,
In Stygian chaos, and air-tight boats,
From Averno to London, sailed direct.

TALES OF THE CLEIKUM INN, ST RONAN'S.

"BE reasonable, my good landlady—we shall make your inn as renowned as 'The Tabard,' 'The Gordon Arms,' or the very 'Boar's Head' in East Cheap, if you will only be conforming," said the well-known Captain, now Major Jekyll, who, after a dozen years of Indian service, had returned to England, and come for a time to St Ronan's, partly in search of health, and partly for amusement. The good dame he thus addressed, though now turned fourscore years, was as alert and active as ever, and quite as zealous for the accommodation of her guests and the credit of her house, although she had for ten years been constantly talking of retiring.

Mistress Dods was by no means insensible to the eclat of seeing another printed book emanate from her domains, bearing the title and blazon of her famous hostel; but she had now a reputation to preserve, and, like other great people, was chary of committing herself.

"If I could but see it a feasible thing—creditable to my hoose and the country, and a douce, sensible, usefu' beuk"——said Meg, hesitating.

"Sit down, dame, and take a glass of wine," returned the Nabob, in whose teeming brain the project had originated, though his ideas differed from those of his friends as to the plan and subject. "Every soul now-a-days makes a book. Wheel in the arm-chair to the table for your mistress, Jenny." And he went on—"A man can hardly hold up his head in town, unless he is suspected to be the author, or known to be the editor of something—every man and most women write a book."

"And so signs on them—the beuks I mean," said Meg, drily; "but what is a' this to the purpose, gentlemen?"

"Why, I should peer out this season myself, in three neat duodecimos of a fashionable novel announced before it is even named," said Jekyll, "could I only prevail with our excellent hostess to edit me, or to grace my title page with her name, in lieu of that of some dowager of quality."

"Nane o' yer skits, noo, Major. But I see ye are just the auld man. India hasna sobered ye. Think o' my douce, and, though I say it, 'sponsible name, on a nonsense novelle!—or the name of my hoose either! My certes! But this claret should please, I hope, gentlemen?" and she kissed the cup.

"Supereminent!—No trumpery novels, however, should tarnish the well-earned glory of your house's great name. True stories, gently entertaining, mildly pathetic, or such as "purge the soul through pity and terror," shall be all we chronicle. Sure, I have heard you tell yourself, dame, of the 'Weird of the Winrams,' and of 'Pearlin Jean.'

"Ye dinna surely ca' thae things nonsense stories!" cried Meg, in astonishment. "True facts, known from generation to generation to a' this countryside; and no like to be soon forgotten:—such judgment-like dealins wi' great houses never are."

"Precisely—facts; and what do we want, madam, but facts?" said a gentleman of a semi-clerical cast, habited in a full suit of Oxford grey, or, as it was here called, pepper-and-salt mixture.

The Nabob, whose morbid activity seemed to increase with his years, had, before now, swept away his filbert shells, and whipped out his tablets. He read:—

"TALES OF THE CLEIKUM INN, ST RONAN'S.
NO. I.—THE BEGUM SAALI-UL-POORI.
By Peregrine Touchwood, Esq.

Or, stay, shall I touch them off a something on political economy, in the style of Miss Martineau; the world will no longer abide direct instructions, I am told, or what is called prosing."

Major Jekyll had not forgotten his old trick of putting up his lip, with a motion equivalent to a Frenchman's shrug of the shoulders. He curled it quietly upon the present occasion.

"Na, na, Nawbob," cried Meg, who saw as far into a millstone as the hewer of it, "If ye are to begin—and if, moreover, the credit of my Public at St Ronan's is to be concerned—let us make a wiselike job o't. Sir Walter, to be sure, is awa; and even James Hogg e' the Ettrick, puir fallow! But, if ye can get Allan Kinnygemm or John Galt to countenance ye"——

"Countenance us!"

"Ay, countenance ye, and help ye oot;—and the Maister O'Haras, wha tell sae weel aboot Irish firesides, and their doins; and oor ain Dominie there.—Will ye tak yer glass o' wine, Dominie? I'm sure the gentlemen would ne'er hae boded it on ye, had they no made ye welcome." And the modest Dominie, on this remonstrance, modestly sipped his wine. "They'll hae need o' you to mend the spellin', and the wordin', and maybe the sense too, a bit, noo and then; for, if ye haena that muckle mother-wit, ye hae but the mair clergy."

The Nabob went on scribbling:—"Such a corps! all under my drill!—For whom more do you undertake Jekyll?"

"For the admirable author of 'The Beggar's Wallet,' 'Mrs Armytage,' and 'Mothers and Daughters.'"

The Dominie made wondering eyes, round as an owl's.

"Famous beginning! And you, Pepper-and-salt?"

"For Myself, sir, in the first place; for Phadde and all his Friends in the second; and—but this was confided to me under the seal of confession"——

"Good again.—I can, I believe, engage the aid of the author of the 'Experiences of Richard Taylor,' if worth our while."

"Na, tak Maister Taylor by all manner of means," cried Meg; "I'm glad to hear o' a man o' experience among ye. And what's the natur o' his Experiences?—But ye're no to put oot lees in my honest name, and cheat the public, saying stories were told in the common parlour, ye get frae your grand Lon'on authors; nor yet to pretend that the clavers the Major wrote doun frae gaberlunzies and gangrel bodies in my out-kitchen, were made up by yoursels. But I'm sure ye can help the gentlemen, Dominie; for ye hae a hantle o' the auld-warld stories Sir Walter likit sae weel. He would hae made a silk purse, an' gien him but a sow's lug, and stored it with the red gowd. Ye see hoo muckle he made oot o' yoursel', Nawbob."

"Well, well, dame—every dog has his day," returned the Nabob, hastily. "What resources have you, Dominie? Undo your fardel, man."

"No resource have I," said the pale, worn Dominie—"none save Nature, who is still as rich as before Shakspeare and Scott drew their hundred volumes from her bosom."

Jekyll looked up somewhat amused by the pragmatical simplicity of the speaker.

"Then we shall seek her at first hand if you please, sir. Pray, what if we adjourn down stairs, and try what fortune shall send us in the shape of a first story? Your house is full to-night, madam?" inquired Jekyll.

"A' kin-kinds o' folk. This sair weather makes dreich travelling; an', indeed, I'm owre lang here, though I maun hear the tale, and see if the thing look feasible.—There's horse-coupers frae about the Morpeth side; writer chields that has been up at the Jeddart circuit; a Paisley body, i' the saft line; and a Sheffield lad, i' the hard line, as sharp as a whittle."

To cut short all superfluous preliminaries, it was the latter who, after a long talk which we have greatly abridged, made the first contribution to the Tales of St Ronan's.

NO. I.—THE CHRISTENING CLOTH.

"I wish I had something to tell you, in return for your good entertainment," said the hearty-looking young man, in the mahogany topped-boots, who had abstained from joining in the potations, being as intent upon the configurations of a well piled, glowing fire, as if occupied in working a problem in the embers. "It is true I have seen as much of the world as most people—whether by the world you understand nature or human nature—but, somehow or other, I seem to have wanted the gift of observation; for never has it fallen to my lot to run my head against a picturesque robber in a wood, or an interesting swindler in a city—the blackguards with whom I have been involved in adventures, being all sneaking fellows of small account, not fit to figure in the poorest of melodramas. Nor was it ever my luck to travel, per coach or mail, inside or out, with anything sufficiently above or below my own condition of life, to become the hero or heroine of a romance."

"Not even in those foreign countries where I think you said you had travelled in the Sheffield line?" inquired the strange gentleman in pepper-and-salt, whose curiosity had already served to draw forth a variety of interesting particulars from our little community.

"You mean when I was collecting-clerk to the furnaces of old Coquerel, in the neighbourhood of Liege? Why, what was I likely to find there which you have not all seen in Colebrook Dale, or at some of the Welsh forges?"

"But the people—the industrious natives of Eastern Flanders, who work all night as merrily by the harvest moon as we by the noonday sun, and are said to be the best agriculturists in the north of Europe?" demanded pepper-and-salt.

"I understand little or nothing of rural labour," answered Bagshaw, (for such was the name by which he had inscribed himself in the Chronicle of Mistress Dods;) "but, as to night-reaping or the like, I certainly do recollect having heard the merry laughs and songs of the lads and lassies in the meadows, when they were getting in their after-grass by moonlight, near Battices, in the Netherlands; and, for the life and soul of me, I could not persuade myself but what the good people were at work doing an ill turn, maybe, to the farmer, by destroying at night what his men had been completing by day. It was no such thing, however—'twas nothing but the farm-folks working double-tide, by the light of a moon that might have served a nun to thread her needle by, for embroidering a mantle of point lace for the Blessed Virgin of Liesse.

"And, by the way, it was on that self-same night, ladies and gentlemen, that I met with something which, for want of a better, I shall call an adventure. I had been making a circuit of the country for Coquerel's house, visiting Namur, Luxembourg, Cologne, Aix la Chapelle, and divers other places of traffic; and was to finish, before I returned to business at Liege, by giving up an account to old Coquerel, who was residing at his favourite country-house at Spa. It was a fine moonlight night, as I have already told you; and I was trotting briskly along the highroad, on a steady old beast of a Mecklenburg mare, which at thirteen years was as fresh as a four-year-old. The heats of a sultry August day had brought out all those fragrant country smells which we city-bred people think so much finer than the finest of perfume; and the road lay for a mile or two through a wildish sort of wood, where the spiciness of the resinous fir trees, and the astringent scent of the weeping birch, and here and there a gush of overpowering sweetness from a thicket of wild honeysuckle, filled the air with wholesome perfume. Then there was the yellow broom, somewhat sickly in its odour, but soon overpowered by the aromatic vapour of the juniper plants, crushed by the hoofs of my mare, as I indulged the old jade with an occasional canter on the strip of turf skirting between the coppice and the road.

"I was guiding her somewhat more cannily among certain dikes which intersected the grass ground just at the extremity of the road, when, lifting my eyes from the ground, which I had been carefully examining for the sake of my nag, I perceived, on one side the road, a few hundred paces before me, one of those stone shrines or chapels so common in the Netherlands; in a great portion of which the influence of the bigoted Austrian government of other times may still be traced. I may be wrong in my views on that subject; but, wherever I have met with those simple shrines in a country—those spots of holy ground amid the vines, the woods, and the corn-fields—I have found the peasantry the better for it. The husbandman's is, we all know, a life of early labour. He must be astir while the dew is on the grass. The shepherd must lead his flock betimes to the pastures, and the reaper must stand, sickle in hand, before lark or grasshopper begin their song. It is not the life of those who kneel down at leisure, like a lord—(though, in spite of leisure, velvet hassocks, and gilt psalm-books, I am afraid even lords themselves are sometimes too swift in their devotions;) and 'tis a happy thing for the hinds, in the pauses of their toil, to find the image they regard as holiest of holies, standing beside them, under the great, glorious canopy of heaven, inviting them to say a grateful prayer, or to breathe an intercession to the Almighty for a continuance of his mercies.

"Well, useful or useless, there, as I said before, stood one of those little shrines—just a sort of stone alcove, which glimmered white as marble in the moonlight, sheltering what they call, in Papist countries, a Calvary—that is, the Saviour on his Cross, and the three Maries at its foot; and, round the head of Christ, a garland of fresh vine-leaves, or hop-leaves, or ivy, according to the productions of the neighbourhood. As I passed, my eyes glanced towards the Calvary—for a beautiful effect of light and shade was produced on the kneeling figures of the Virgin and Mary Magdalene, by the moonbeams streaming full upon them, while the Cross itself remained deep in the shadow of the alcove. But, behold! just as I was about to resume the burthen of the song with which I had been cheering my way when the sight of this sacred object warned me that I was upon holy ground, I fancied that a dark object, close on the northward side of the shrine, (which at first I had mistaken for the withered stump of a tree, such as one often sees beside such monuments, outlasting, as they do, the verdant shade under which they were originally erected, and the remains of which have acquired too much sanctity from such neighbourhood ever to be rooted up,) was the crouching figure of some living thing! I have admitted that I am no robber-finder. Habituated to both the highways and byways of other countries and my own, I never yet hit upon a highwayman—no!—not even on a simple footpad. But this time, said I to myself, 'I have him!' or, to have better expressed my thoughts, I might perhaps have phrased it, 'He has me!' The pocket-book snugly deposited in the bosom of my waistcoat, containing notes and bills of larger amount than old Coquerel would have cared to lose, or than I should have cared to account for to his cashier, began to grow as troublesome to me as a certain magic book to a certain moss-trooper, whom I have read of in one of Sir Walter's stirring stories, prose or verse. I made up my mind, in short—the lonesomeness of the place considered—that I was about to be called upon to render an account of my clerkship to some fellow nowise entitled to claim the balance at my hands. I forget whether I grew hot or cold—whether I stood upright in my stirrups, or whether my hair stood upright on my head—and no great matter. Only, I observe that, whenever story-tellers protest they were frightened out of their wits, they seemed to have retained exactly wit enough to note every beat of their pulse, and how the owls shrieked and the crickets cried. Leaving them to account for their presence of mind, I own I had so thoroughly prepared myself for a rattling blow about the ears with a cudgel, or for the whistling of a bullet, that I was scarcely less surprised than pleased to find myself trotting on as safely a hundred paces after as a hundred paces before I reached the little chapel. What I said to myself then I shall not repeat; for my words were complimentary neither to my courage nor my understanding; but, as there was no one at hand to gainsay the epithets bestowed, I thought it right to assure myself that I certainly had seen something; and that, if neither the trunk of a tree nor of a brigand, it might be the Devil in proper person, for aught I knew to the contrary.

"Now, if I acknowledge myself to have had small personal intercourse with those who have been called clerks of Old Nick, still less have I to boast of with their master. I have read Tam O'Shanter till I almost regretted the same; and, on the present occasion, a sort of dare-devil, gallop-by-moonlight spirit came over me—the species of heroism that sometimes grows out of fear. As the aforesaid notion accordingly flashed into my mind, I turned the mare's head so much more suddenly than was my wont, that the old lady began to testify, by divers snortings and wincings, her disapprobation of my change of movements; and seemed as determined to go on as I to go back.

"'Is it even so?' thought I, overmastering her obstinacy without much effort. 'Tis a well-known thing that dumb beasts have a quicker instinct of such matters than the human kind. Kätchen is, no doubt, aware that we are in a bad neighbourhood. Yet, so near the Calvary? Impossible! Well, 'twill be no great trouble to set my doubts at rest.'

"I was proceeding at a foot's pace. The shrine lay before me, now, to the right of the road, with its little screen of abele trees close behind; rustling (foolish, fluttering things!) with even so little of a breeze as the soft night air of an August night. Up went the ears of Kätchen, as she started and stood listening! What did the old mare hear besides the shivering leaves of the white poplar trees?"

"Ay! what did she hear!" interrupted the pepper-and-salt gentleman.

"She did not condescend to inform me," replied Bagshaw, drily; "I can only tell you what I heard myself."

"You did hear something?" persisted Pepper-and-salt.

"You shall relate the rest to-morrow at breakfast," quoth Mistress Dods. "'Tis ill talkin' o' sic things at this awsome time o' nicht."

"Now or never!" persisted Bagshaw. "I must be off by daybreak for Galashiels; and what I heard might be told at midnight under a murderer's gibbet."

"A hymn, perhaps, from the saints in stone-work?" resumed Pepper-and-salt.

"If you interrupt me again," said Bagshaw, sturdily, "not another syllable shall you get out of me. Every man to his own story. I heard a woful, wailing cry, like the voice of an infant, and, a moment afterwards, that gentle soothing which no voice but a woman's, and few voices but a mother's, can administer in reply. Take it for granted that, whatever Kätchen might be, I was not much daunted by such music. I made up to the old shrine, without for a moment remembering that Satan is said to invest himself in whatsoever shapes or sounds he may prefer; and, dismounting as I reached it, soon realized my supposition that a woman and a babe were resting themselves beside it on a bank of turf. The woman was on her knees—the babe nestling in her bosom.

"'Can I be of any service to you?' said I, perceiving, from the linen cloak, with the hood drawn over her head, that I was addressing one of the peasants of the country.

"'No one can be of service to me!' sobbed a voice under the hood—"no one but them," she continued, raising her head towards the sacred images to whom she had been addressing her supplications. 'But I have prayed and prayed, and they will not give ear to me. Sinner must I be, since they suffer me to be thus heavily afflicted.'

"I could not but recall to the half-frantic woman that well-known text which assures us that the chastisements of God are dealt heaviest on those whom best He loves; and the poor woman would fain have replied, but the child, startled, perhaps, by a strange voice, set up so piercing a shriek that all her efforts were now directed to the task of appeasing its terror.

"'Is the child ill?' said I.

"'Ill and hungry—ill and famished!' sobbed the poor mother. 'We shall perish here by the way; and he will never know what we have borne for him, and that I died as I lived, for his sake.'

"With the 'he' and 'him' of the stranger's doleful ejaculation, myself had nought to do. Husband or lover, to me it nothing mattered. But what was to be done for the two poor helpless creatures drooping for want of sustenance in that strange place, at that strange hour.

"'I have not food to give you,' said I, as soon as the screamings of the poor infant were pacified; 'I have only money, which is of no immediate avail.' But, as I was proceeding in my explanations, I saw that the woman was now in a half-fainting state, incapable of listening or replying. There was but one thing to be done—to gallop on in all haste to the nearest habitation, procure bread and wine, and hasten back to her relief. For the last four miles, not a house, not a cottage, had been in sight; it seemed unlikely but that, now that I had reached the open country, I should soon chance upon a dwelling-house.

"Never before had I so earnestly looked out for the twinkling light of a human habitation. I began to curse the moonlight, which, I thought, perplexed my eyes, as I galloped on and on without success. At last, somewhat more than a mile from the spot where I had left the sufferers, I was struck by the sound of music and laughter, proceeding, as I thought, from the meadows far down in the valley, below the raised road I was pursuing. For a moment, as I have already owned, I was puzzled as to the origin of these unusual sounds. I saw, by the moonlight, groups of male and female haymakers, diminished by distance into pigmies; and it was only my recollection of what I had heard asserted of the harvest-industry of the Flemish, which convinced me that these night labourers were flesh and blood. Kätchen's bridle was accordingly fastened to a wayside tree. I slid and climbed down the embankments of the road into the pastures below, made over hedge and ditch, and soon found myself in the midst of a goodly company of Walloon peasants, busily carting a fine growth of aftermath.

"My story was soon told—readily believed; and some slices of black bread, and a gourd full of Brabant beer, were heartily offered to me. But, what was more to the purpose, I was instructed that, a short distance further on the highroad, I should find a house of public entertainment, where it would be easy to obtain a horse and cart to remove the sick woman and child to safe lodgings for the night. So said, so done. I made my way to the little inn of The Golden Artichoke; and, if I did not take out twopence and give them to the host, played the good Samaritan to so much purpose that he flung aside his cotton nightcap and offered to drive the little waggon so far as the Calvary.

"To make a long tale short, or rather to abbreviate that part of it of which I seem myself to be the hero, suffice it that the poor woman gratefully accepted our succour; and, when refreshed by food, was lifted into the cart, and, within an hour of my first appearance on the spot, seated in the chimney-nook of the kitchen of The Golden Artichoke, watching the simmering of the broth I had ordered to be prepared for the child; while mine host, a recent widower, was busy settling his horse and cart for the night, so as not to incommode Kätchen, an inmate of the same stable."

"You did not proceed, then, that night on your journey?" demanded the curious pepper-and-salt gentleman. "The white lady you had mistaken for the black gentleman was, perhaps, young and pretty?"

"Both!—but so pale, so thin, so wretched, so exhausted by an aguish fever, that even an individual so facetious as yourself could have found no cause to attribute my assiduity to motives of gallantry."

"Lord sake, sir, go on!" cried Meg. "We carena for motives. Let's hear o' the woman and bairn."

"The woman, then, sat waiting for the strengthening of the food that was to nourish her feeble boy, with her poor, blue lips compressed, and her long, thin hands trembling with weakness, as, every now and then, she skimmed the simmering pot. The child was laid to rest upon a clean deal table near the fireplace, a blanket folded beneath it for a bed, and her own cloak over it as a covering.

"'That cloak is too heavy for it in so hot a room,' said I, longing to stimulate my interesting companion to a word or two of conversation.

"'Perhaps you are right—so weak and so exhausted as he is,' said she, removing the weighty garment from the body of the poor, attenuated babe; and, taking what seemed a piece of cloth from her bosom, she spread it carefully over the child and returned to her place.

"I could not bear this. The babe, thus covered, presented exactly the appearance of a little corpse. I had once seen the body of a young child laid out, under circumstances so afflicting, that the force of reminiscence was too much for me. I fetched a bright-coloured Barcelona handkerchief from my small saddle valise, and, snatching away the cloth, substituted the less ghastly silk in its room.

"'Ah! do not move it—do not touch it!' cried the young woman, apparently shocked by my irreverential action.

"'The handkerchief is lighter and cooler for the little creature,' said I, in a tone of remonstrance.

"'Perhaps so; but the other is a relic—there is salvation in the other,' said she, crossing herself. And, taking it from my hands, she pressed it to her lips and heart; and, again uncovering the face of the sick child, replaced my despised offering with the fine damask napkin she seemed to prize so dearly.

"I longed to ask for explanations; but, between the sufferings of the child and the duties of attendance, there was little time for questioning; and it was only when, on the return of Pierre from the stables, I learned that the few sleeping chambers of The Golden Artichoke, such as they were, were engaged to the extra hands engaged at the adjoining farm of Gros Chenêt, that I offered my services to sit up through the night in the kitchen with poor Mina. I could scarcely do otherwise; for the men, when, at four in the morning, they returned from their carouse at the farm, were so merry with Louvain beer, that it needed all my eloquence to induce them to respect the sufferings of the dying child.

"It was before they had returned, however, and by the gleams of flickering embers and a melancholy watch-light, that Mina related to me her history. Let me tell it you as nearly as possible in her own words."

"I am the child," said she, "of wealthy farmers on the frontier towards Charleroi—their eldest born and their idol. My mother, too, was come of thriving people; and when she gave herself and her handsome portion to the rich farmer Regenhart of Florennes, it was said, in all the country round, that now she might sit like a lady all the rest of her days, spinning fancy thread, according to her favourite taste, of no mortal use for any earthly purpose. Unlucky it was that my mother got hearing of the taunt, for she was of a high spirit, and liked not to be made a jest by her neighbours; for, at the close of a year after her wedding-day, all those who had indulged in the remark were invited over to the farm; and there my good father made it his glory to display to them a damask table-cloth, with napkins to suit, the like of which had never been seen, for fineness of texture, in that part of the country. Each one of the napkins, sir, could be drawn through Madame Regenhart's wedding-ring. Where they had been woven, ('twas in some foreign city—the name I know not; it might be Hamburg—it might be Elberfeldt,) my father deigned not to disclose. He only explained that the flax was grown on his own lands, and the thread spun by the dainty fingers of his dear Marjory, 'who,' said he, 'might, if idly inclined, sit like a lady in her sanded parlour, with her hands crossed on her knees, for the remainder of her life, and no one to say, Why dost thou so?'

"'And what may be the use of this delicate napery, neighbour Regenhart?' asked Klartsch, the blacksmith, who was a bolder man than the rest. 'Is it to be spread yonder, over your cherrywood table, for holidays, to be stained with beer sops, and daubed with prune sauce?'

"'No!' cried my father, planting his hands sturdily upon his hips, and surveying the whole company; 'I have too much respect for Marjory's handywork to throw it away in welcoming such as you to my board. No! goodies,' said he, addressing two of the most cankered gossips of the village; 'tis neither for you nor me to sup our porridge off a web the thread of which might have been wove into Mechlin lace. This suit of table-linen, my fine friends, is destined to no less a person than his Highness the Stadtholder; and I sent for ye to have a sight of it before 'tis packed and forwarded to my cousin, Regenhart, the merchant of Antwerp, who has undertaken to convey it to the Hague.'

"Great, indeed, was the amasement of the envious neighbours; and though, for some days afterwards, they continued to scoff among themselves at the notion of a Flemish farmer pretending to send presents to a sovereign prince, yet when, at the end of a month, there came a letter to Marjory, in the own seal and true handwriting of her Highness, the Princess of Orange, (own sister, sir, to the King of Prussia, as you may have heard,) full of thanks and commendations of the present, and begging her acceptance, in return, of a costly tankard of gilt silver—to look at, as good as gold—you may guess whether my poor mother was pleased, and the neighbours mortified! My father had the Princess's letter framed and glazed, and hung up next to a sampler of needlework, (the ten commandments worked in the house of her parents by his beloved wife,) as the chief ornament of their state parlour; while, in the glazed corner cupboard of the same chamber, was installed the splendid tankard, on a cloth of Utrecht velvet, with nothing on the shelf above, but a rich japanned ewer and basin of green enamel, presented as a wedding gift by my cousin Regenhart of Antwerp; and nothing on the shelf below, but a tea-kettle and service, of Meissen porcelain, bought by my father, as a courtship token for Marjory, at the fair of Düsseldorf.

"Well, sir, all this magnificence did not serve to put my mother and her neighbours in better humour with each other. The very next year there came to be trouble in more countries than one; and crowned kings were put down from their thrones, and kings without crowns set up in their places—in plainer clothes, perhaps, with just as good a mind to make their greatness a bugbear to the people. Among those who were forced to fly their country, were the Stadtholder and his Princess; and I have heard my poor mother say that not a soul in our village but was right glad of their misfortunes, only because the rich Regenharts were now forced to remove from their parlour the latter and tankard, so great an eyesore unto many. His Highness took refuge in England; perhaps, sir, you may have heard of him in your own country?

"My parents, however, had other things to think of than to guess whether their fine damask had been pillaged with the rest of the Princess's belongings; for, on the following year, I was born; and, though my father had sadly longed for a son, glad enough he was to hear the first cry of a daughter. In spite of the ill-will of the neighbours, he determined to call me Wilhelmina, after the great Princess who had written so kindly to my mother; and it was decided, according to the custom of the country, that, ten days after my birth, my christening should be celebrated; and a gay and gaudy day it was to be at Florennes.

"'Ay, ay!' said the gossips—'Farmer Regenhart is killing his fatted calf, and the finest of his Chinese pigs, and the choicest of his flock. His people have been up to the cheese-loft, and down to the beer-cellar. They have emptied jars and jars of pears and plumbs for sauce; and the dovecot and the hen-roost will have something to say of their waste. There will even be a canister of Antwerp Regenhart's perfumed Persian tea, with sugarcandy, as fine and as white as alabaster. The good curé, no doubt, will be invited to the feast; and the farmer will scarcely grudge him a golden ducat for so grand a service as baptising my young Lady Regenhart with the name of her royal godmother. Remains to see whether Mistress Marjory will have the audacity to put off some old house napkin as the christening cloth—she, forsooth, who chose to make herself spinstress to princes and princesses.'

"Thus they talked, sir; but they talked without book—for, when the day came, and the baptistery of the old church at Florennes was decked with fresh flowers in honour of the ceremony, and my comely godmother, (wife of Hans, the miller,) presented me to the priest, it was seen, by all the idle and curious thronging the church and peeping through the iron palisades of the baptistery, that the christening cloth which, according to custom, my father respectfully presented as a gift to the curé at the close of the ceremony, was whiter and finer than the finest lady's kerchief. There it lies, sir; judge yourself of its texture.

"'This is your wife's famous spinning, Regenhart?' asked the old priest, while a kindly smile lighted up his face.

"'It is,' said my father, with a pleased, proud look. 'My Marjory would have been loath to have it said that she gave to the throne what she grudged to the altar; and, long after she was so round and portly (with submission to your reverence) that I had forbidden her to do a turn of work for me or mine, hum, hum, hum went the wheel by my fireside. My good wife would not hear of laying it aside till she had completed a becoming offering to tender to Monsieur le Curé.'

"'Marjory is a good housewife—Heaven prosper her labours!' replied the priest. 'See that she become not over thrifty in the things of this world. It is good to labour, and it is good to gather riches; but, better still, to preserve a quiet mind and humble heart towards God. May this infant,' he continued, signing me anew with the sign of the cross, 'grow to be a grace and blessing to ye!—and, with my benediction, I bestow upon her this specimen of her mother's industry. It will serve as a foundation to begin her marriage trousseau.'

"He smiled as he spoke, imprinting a kiss upon my forehead; and my godmother, Madam Hans, told my poor mother, on her return to the farm, and has often told me since, that I smiled up in his venerable face in return, when she laid the rich christening napkin over my cambric swaddling clothes, and carried me proudly home, and laid me in my mother's bosom. Poor mother! she had not much occasion to rejoice in me. Some harm she took in her lying-in hung upon her ever afterwards, and she was an ailing sufferer to the day of her death.

"There is no need to tell you, sir—who are, no doubt, a book-learned gentleman—how soon after this the French armies came fighting out their grievances on the Belgian territory. The first thing I can well remember of these changes of kings, and nations, and languages, was an outcry at Florennes that the brother of the French Emperor Napoleon was going to be King in Holland, where my namesake, the dethroned Princess of Orange had reigned before. Our neighbours took care that we should have the earliest tidings of it; and seemed to rejoice in the news as a mortification to our family. They thought it, however, no rejoicing matter themselves, that we had a Frenchman put over us in the new Mayor of Florennes, and French gendarmerie to rule the country, and French prefects to rule them; and, above all, that their sons were to be carried off by the conscription to fill up the armies of Napoleon. My mother, sickly as she was, and without hope of further offspring, now rejoiced that she was not the mother of a boy, to be carried off in his turn to the Grand Army; and both she and my father seemed to treasure me the more, that I was likely to abide with them always, and be a comfort to their old age. I was the darling of house and household; a happy child—a very happy child; and, I may say, then, a dutiful."

(Wilhelmina paused, and went and hung over her babe; and, after she had wiped the cold dew from its forehead, with a corner of the christening napkin, methought I saw her raise it to her own eyes, as if to prevent the tears from falling.)

"Time went on, and went well with us," she continued, after resuming her place on the settle. "Whatever king might reign, my father was master of his farm; and he seemed proud of seeing me grow up to womanhood, who was one day to be its mistress; and still the only charge he laid upon me, was—'Mina!—girl—never let thine eye be dazzled by a laced jacket; never dream, child, of marrying a soldier. Who thou wilt beside, so he can prove himself an honest man, and an honest man's son. But no soldier! Hav'n't we seen the fellows sell themselves from service to service, from king to king, as I might transfer a flock or herd? And ar'n't they heard of in foreign lands—yonder in Prussia, for instance—making shame to the name of Frenchman or Belgian, by pillaging houses and lands—burning down barn and garner—making free with money-chest and plate-press—with wife and daughter? Robbers and reivers!—to plunder and burn the fruits of a hard-working fellow-Christian's industry, merely because a bayonet on the shoulder, and cartridges in the pouch, seem to sanctify such wickedness!' And then, sir, I was of my father's way of thinking; for, then, I had not seen Bernhard."

"And who is Bernhard?" said I, with an involuntary glance towards the sleeping child.

"You guess rightly—Bernhard is the father of that boy: a better father, a better husband, never breathed. It was not till after the death of my poor mother, that he came so familiarly to the farm; for a mother would have seen the danger of admitting a fine young man like Bernhard, at all hours and seasons, meal-time and prayer-time, nutting in the woods or fishing in the Sambre. But my father liked Bernhard for the frankness of his sociability; and I, at first, perhaps, because of my father's liking, and, at length, for my own, and in good earnest. And, when, sixteen months after the commencement of our intimacy, Bernhard was drawn for a soldier, and refused the offers made him by his family to furnish a substitute to the conscription, I thought my very heart would have broken. It was the eve of the grand expedition to Moscow, and substitutes were getting scarce; so that, to have paid the money requisite, would have ruined Bernhard's friends, who were small, very small farmers in the neighbourhood of Florennes; so he was, perhaps, right to persist, and on with the knapsack, like the rest. I did not think so then; neither did my father, who was almost as loath as myself to part with the lad. Only he was displeased to observe what he thought a leaning in Bernhard's mind towards a military life; for, during the three days intervening between the drawing and the marching off of the conscripts, which it is the custom of the young men to pass in parading the town and neighbourhood, with the drum-major preceding them, and flaunting cockades on their heads, Bernhard was the noisiest of them all. He did not wish his friends to see what a bitter thing it was to him to quit Florennes.

"Those three days, meanwhile, were grievous days to me. Bernhard had never spoken to me of his affection—for I was rich and he was poor—but I knew pretty well how it was with him, and better still how it was with me. I could not stop the tears from running down my cheeks, as I pretended to busy myself with my mother's old spinning-wheel; and my father seemed so much concerned when he saw me weeping, that I could not but hope, in my heart, he would do something for Bernhard to prevent him going. But my father was proud, and expected Bernhard to ask him, or, at least, to speak first on the subject. He never left home during those three days, though his presence was wanted in the farm, but kept loitering near our door and looking out whenever the conscripts were coming; and when, after the third day, the lads passed our door for the last time, my father banged it to with a sort of desperate fury; and, as the drum and fife sounded fainter and fainter in the distance, along the high road, fixed his eyes upon me with a sort of settled obstinacy—as much as to say, 'I have sworn you shall never be the wife of a soldier, and I will keep my word!' I so perfectly understood the meaning of his looks, that I sank back in my chair without power to speak. I even seemed to forget, for a moment, that Bernhard was quitting his native village for danger and death. All I had power to understand was, that my father had sworn I should never become the wife of a soldier.

"From that day, a sort of enmity seemed to grow between me and my father. He was always proposing to me some marriage or another—I always refusing; and, though he must have known how completely my happiness was wrapt up in Bernhard, there was no end to the pains he took to prevent my obtaining intelligence of the progress of the Grand Army. He forbade me all intercourse with Bernhard's family; and, at length, forbade me even to quit the farm, lest I should, by chance, encounter them. Heaven knows I had little inclination to go abroad—my sorrows, and my spinning wheel, and the chimney corner, engrossed my whole attention.

"My father even threw out hints that he would marry again, unless I changed my proceedings. He said his home was grown worse than a prison; and, to get rid of its gloominess, used to make off, evening after evening, to the house of my godmother, the widow of Hans the miller, to whom all Florennes persisted that he was paying his addresses. I never believed it, however, till he invited me one day to his wedding; when experience taught me how great had been my folly, and what it was to have a step-mother. The new Madam Regenhart had six grown up children of her own, four of whom were soon settled at the farm; and, thenceforward, my life became a burthen to me. Trudchen and Maria, my good friends in childhood, were now always twitting me with my love for a conscript. To please my father, they tried to laugh me out of my attachment for Bernhard, as if such things were to be rooted out of the heart by idle scoffing. A year passed thus—a very sad one; not because the hand of my mother-in-law's authority was heavy, but because bad tidings from the army darkened daily into worse and worse. At last, the great blow came. Napoleon was defeated, to rise no more; and how was I to learn whether Bernhard was among the victims already sacrificed to the madness of his ambition? The spring of 1814 passed over ere I obtained a word that I could trust in; but, one summer morning, as I came out of church, a little child plucked me by the gown, whispering to me, in the name of Bernhard's mother, that her son would shortly be at Florennes! I had a silver dollar in my hand that I was about to drop into the alm's-trunk of the poor, as I had constantly done since my days of trouble; but I hastily thrust it into the hand of the child. Nay, it was all I could do not to fall down on my knees and bless God there in his holy house. He lived—and that was enough. That I was about to behold him again, seemed almost too much.

"That evening did not pass but I had learned the best and worst of my destiny. Bernhard came, presented himself at the farm—no longer a laughing lad, but a way-worn, hard-voiced soldier. My father held out his hand to him when he entered, which was more than I expected; and sat listening, with changing colour and glaring eyes, when Bernhard recounted all the horrors he had witnessed—the blazing city, the frost-defeated troops, the massacres, the desperation. He even pledged him in a cordial cup, and I thought kind feelings of old times were springing up between them; and Trudchen and Maria pointed out, scornfully, to each other, the bright red flush of delight that was burning on my cheeks. But when the time came for Bernhard take leave for the night, my father spoke out:—

"'You and I, my lad,' said he, 'must understand each other. If you come here as a neighbour's son, whom I liked in old times, to taste my beer and have a dish of gossip over the strange sights of the times, well and good. But if you fancy things are to be as they used, or that you are to patch up the threadbare coat on your back with Mina's dowry, you mistake black for white, and there's an end on't. I have said, in your hearing, ten thousand times, that no girl of mine should mate with a soldier. You might have borne the saying in mind when you refused your old father's offer of selling his orchard to the notary at Charleroi, and sending a man in your place. I know—I know! You did not choose to bring ruin on your family. Right enough, perhaps; but plain proof that you loved father, mother, and grandmother better than Mina there, who fancies she loves you so dearly. Understand, therefore, friend Bernhard, that my wench is not for your market! Times, you see, are altered here; and were she to give her ear to you in defiance of my authority, without more ado I would cut her off with a grosch, and settle my property on my wife's two grinning minxes there, Trudchen and Maria, whom I like none the better, I can tell them, for the triumph they are enjoying at my daughter's expense.'

"Madam Regenhart now interposed in defence of her children; but my father's business was with Bernhard. 'Is it, then, a bargain, my lad?' said he. 'Do you consent to give up all notion of Mina?'

"'I do not,' replied Bernhard, with firmness. 'You say that times are altered here. They are so; for Mina has reached woman's estate, and can judge for herself. Her home is not what it was; she may now wish to leave it even for a roof so poor as mine. Here, therefore, before your face, I offer her my hand and heart, and the tender welcome of my family. Had I aught else to give, she knows it would be hers.'

"'You dare?' exclaimed my father, with kindling eyes.

"'I dare,' replied Bernhard, calmly. 'I have fought for my country. My wounds and my sufferings have given me the right to speak as a man, and as a man to claim an answer. But it must be from her. Mina!' he continued, addressing me—'for five long years I have dearly loved you. Will you be mine?'

"'Not against my father's desire,' I faltered, not daring to look him in the face.

"'Desire?' cried the old man, fiercely. 'Is that your milk-and-water word? I tell you, girl, that, if ever you wed this man, or any other wearing the same habit, my eternal malediction shall be upon you and upon your children's children, for evermore.'

"I know not what ensued. I was lying on my bed with my father hanging over me, when I recovered my recollection. 'Bernhard is gone,' said he, in a hoarse voice, as he bade me adieu for the night. 'Bernhard has quitted the house;—he will do well to quit the village—for you must meet no more.'

"He did not quit the village, however; he had obtained two months' leave of absence, to visit his relations; and, for the sake of his aged parents, it behoved him to remain. My step-mother and her children contrived that my father should hear daily and hourly of his sojourn at Florennes; and the old man's wrath was soon stirred up against him by new offences; for Bernhard, like all the soldiers of the Emperor, leaned towards the dominion of the French, and desired, since Belgium was not to become an independent kingdom, that it might remain subjected to the laws under which it had so greatly prospered; while my father, who had thrown up his cap for joy at the first news of the Stadtholder's return to his dominions, could not restrain his ecstasy on learning that Flanders had been tacked (by the great parliament of kings at Aix la Chapelle) to the kingdom of Holland. In his delight at finding the Stadtholder become an anointed king, and my royal namesake a queen, he lost all thought of the dignity of his native country. This, of course, begat greater ill-will between him and Bernhard; and the whole place seemed to take part with one or the other. My step-mother harassed me by constant reproaches; her children allowed me no interval of peace. I was very, very unhappy.

"In the midst of all this, my father determined, as if for vengeance sake, to marry me to the son of Klartsch, the blacksmith, whom, in other days, he would have scarcely judged worthy to enter my presence. The man was a sot, a ruffian, a profane swearer; one of whom I never could bear the sight. Bernhard's leave was almost expired, when Madam Regenhart hit upon this method to drive me to desperation. I felt that, when he was gone, I should have no protector against the violence of my father—that I should be sacrificed to the interests of Trudchen and Maria; and, as I had now attained the age of independence, I accepted the generous proposals of Bernhard, when once more he offered me a loving heart and tranquil home. I quitted my father's roof—already a place of torment to me; I quitted Florennes, my birth-place, the grave of my mother; and, with tears upon my face and terror in my heart, became the wife of my faithful Bernhard."

"In my own country," interrupted I, taking pity upon her distress, "such circumstances are by no means uncommon."

"They are in ours—happily they are in ours," she replied; "for, since I became a mother, I seem better to understand how heart-piercing must be the rebellion of a child. In ours, sir, filial piety is the first of duties. We are taught to reverence old age in all—but in our parents with fear, trembling, and submission. An undutiful child, sir, is an outcast here; and you see I am an outcast. My father's curse pursues me—pursues that babe!"—And again she sobbed aloud, in profound affliction.

"Well, sir, I followed my husband to his regiment, and with his regiment. It was one of those which Napoleon had always named with honour as his 'braves Belges;' and my Bernhard was noted among the bravest of them. I had a little fund that afforded us all the help we needed at starting; and he was quartered at a cheerful happy spot—the town of Huy, on the Meuse, where a grand citadel was already in progress of construction. Poor Bernhard looked with an evil eye on every stone that was laid of it. 'Tis a damned Dutch dike of demarcation,' said he, 'which the blue-breeches and the red-coats are building up, to separate us eternally from that vast and beautiful France under whose banners we at least obtained glory and advancement.'

"I thought of my poor father's hatred against the French, and said nothing; and, while we were thus meeting our destiny together, cheerfully, affectionately, and with full trust in the Almighty and each other, yonder little boy was born.

"Till that time, I had taken less thought than perhaps I ought of my father's alienation. But the moment I became a mother, I seemed to think as I had never thought before, of my parents and their rights. I dearly longed to shew my babe to my father. I obtained my kind husband's permission to name it after my father. I dreamed of my father—I prayed for him—I yearned after him; and, at length, unable to repress my feelings, addressed a letter to him, saying that I was well and happy, submissive, though not repentant, and humbly praying for his forgiveness."

"And old Regenhart's answer contained?"—

"A reiteration of his cruel malediction!"

"Then," said I, "he must be a cruel, unchristian man; and his animosity is not worth fretting for."

"Ah, sir! it took fatal effect upon me and mine! Misfortunes soon came upon me, and nothing that I could say or do would prevent Bernhard from speaking his mind in places where minds are not to be spoken, touching the ill luck of his native country, in falling to the lot of a Prince whom he would never designate otherwise than King of the Butter-Firkins, or Field-Marshal Schiedam. All this was duly reported; and he was reprimanded and reprimanded, and all to no purpose. The more punishment given him to increase his loyalty to the House of Orange, the less he liked the new King; and it was a strange thing, sir, in my husband—for King William was a good man, and merciful, and said to be well-inclined to further the prosperity of his new kingdom. But the taxes and imposts were high; and, whenever a fresh one came to be talked about, Bernhard was giving his free opinion, and throwing up his police-cap in honour of Napoleon and Belgium!

"I did not live in barracks with my husband. During my mother's lifetime, she had bestowed on me, from time to time, little sums in gold, earnings or savings of her own, which she bade me treasure up and say nothing of to my father. 'Strange things happen,' she used to say. 'Tis no bad thing for even the happiest of wives to have a nest-egg against a day of trouble.' And she was right; for, when I rashly quitted my father's house, that sum—a large one, for poor folks like Bernhard and me—became our sheet-anchor; and, even after my boy's birth, I had nearly fifty ducats left, for future exigencies. One night, sir, it was very late, and I had sat up in my lodging expecting home Bernhard from the barracks; and, as the hour was past when the men were rung in, my mind misgave me that he had come to some mischief. I entertained little doubt that he had been at his politics again, and, perhaps, been clapped into the guard-house; but, behold! at midnight, just as I was putting down the baby into his cradle, after having him up to nurse, I heard a well-known step on the stair, and in rushed Bernhard; his face flushed, but not with drinking—it was easy to see that, for his eyes neither sparkled nor were heavy with the effects of liquor.

"'Mina,' said he, instead of answering my questions as to where he had been, 'how long would it take you to pack up your traps, and such of the child's as are movable, to quit this place?'

"'Quit this place?' I exclaimed. 'Is the regiment under marching orders?'

"'No matter,' replied my husband—'answer my question.'

"'You have reason to know,' I replied, smiling, 'that I am not very difficult to move. We owe nothing in the town but the last week's rent for our lodgings; and, in an hour and a half, I could clear all up, pack our few clothes, and be ready to start. But I hope there is no occasion to move the child at such an hour as this? Surely you will wait till to-morrow?'

"'Not an hour—not a second!' cried he. 'Make what speed you can; all you hold dear on earth depends on your activity. If you love me, ask no questions. By this time to-morrow—not sooner—all shall be explained.'

"I had promised Bernhard at the altar to love and obey him: how was I to resist his will in this thing? Within the appointed time, sir, all was cleared up in our little lodging—the amount of our rent deposited on the stone; and, at about two o'clock of a dull hazy autumn night, we crept out of the house; Bernhard almost sinking under a large bundle containing our necessaries, and I carrying a basket and the boy. We were quartered then, sir, at a small town only a few leagues from the frontier; but our lodgings were luckily in a suburb without the walls; and, on reaching a turning of the road, about a quarter of a league from the town, I was surprised to find a cart and horse, into which, without a word of explanation, Bernhard bundled us all. Away we went at a smart pace, which roused up the babe, and set him crying piteously. The wind whistled, and drove eddies of decaying leaves into our faces from the high trees bordering the road. But Bernhard said not a word to comfort me or quiet the child. He seemed exhausted, mind and body, by a great effort; and, having laid my hand upon his sleeve, in climbing into the cart, I perceived that he no longer wore his uniform. The truth now flashed into my mind—he had deserted! and we were making our way across the frontier! Three fatal leagues of road still lay before us! He might be taken. O Heavens! what would be the result of such a misfortune? I dared not utter a syllable of inquiry to my husband. He had requested me to forbear; and a request from him was the same as a promise from myself. I knew not even the exact distance which would set us free from danger of pursuit; and it was almost a surprise when at last the driver suddenly pulled up; and I learned, from a few words whispered between him and my husband, that we had now reached the spot where his agreement of conveyance ended; and that we were about to diverge on foot from the high road, to cross the frontier, at a point of the fields secure from military or excise inspection. The man, already paid for his services, and apparently a friend to my husband, wished us well at parting; and the rattling of the cart was soon lost in the distance.

"Heavy was the task to make our way through the mists of a chilly night across the country, ankle-deep in a miry clay that rendered it all but impracticable, burdened as we were. But terror pricks like a spur. To falter was to decree the death of Bernhard; and on I toiled, till, at length, after two hours' labour, we stumbled, as if by chance, on a high embankment, over which my husband managed to lift me, babe and all; and no sooner did he find us safely lodged on the highroad that ran below, than he clasped us together in his arms; then, uncovering his head, breathed a thanksgiving to Heaven, which assured me that he was in safety. A heavy weight was taken off my breast; and I sat down by the wayside and wept till my heart seemed like to break. It was almost daylight before we set out again, rested and relieved; and, just at sunrise, we reached a hamlet, at the door of one of whose cottages my husband knocked gently, and, presenting a slip of a letter to the aged woman who lifted the latch, she smiled encouragingly in our faces, and bade us welcome as though we were expected guests.

"I need not weary you, sir, with further details. That evening, we proceeded, by a public conveyance, about thirty leagues' distance into France, to a retired village called Isigny, where Bernhard gave himself out as a Burgundian, and hired a small cottage, with a meadow and orchard, sloping to a beautiful brook. We were soon installed there. I saw it was his intention to take up his abode in a foreign land for the remainder of his days; and what mattered it to me? Where he was, there was my home, my country; and, as to my father, what chance had I now of propitiating his pardon?"

"But what can have been the motive which instigated so good a soldier as Bernhard to"——I could not finish the sentence.

"To desert!" added Wilhelmina, in a low, emphatic tone. "Yes, sir! that is the word—the grievous word. That it should ever be applied to a noble, upright soul, such as my husband! But, verily, he had his excuses. On the day preceding that which ended so miserably, Bernhard obtained certain intelligence that, in order to rid the country of so factious a subject, he had been draughted into another regiment—that his route was already made out for Rotterdam, where his new corps was under order of embarkation for Batavia. 'To remove my wife and babe to so pestilential a climate was a cruel thing,' said Bernhard, when he recounted to me the history of his fall—'to leave you both behind, poor and friendless, equally heart-rending. I thought it over, Mina, for four and twenty hours. For one whole night, I lay, shedding my silent tears by your side; and in the morning, I felt that it could not be. What claim had this William of Orange upon me, that was born no subject of his, that I should go and rot away my life in his pestilential marshes, far from my wife and child, or see them perish under my eyes beside the fetid canals of Batavia? The Congress, which they say allotted us Belgians like a herd of dumb beasts to be the bondsmen of the House of Nassau, could not, in lawful justice, before God, condemn me to death for refusing to be banished into Asia for the gain of one who was no more to me by tie of inborn loyalty than an Inca of Peru.'"

"I am not over and above skilled in casuis-tries of this kind," said Bagshaw, interrupting his narration; "but I own, it seemed to me, that poor Bernhard's arguments, if not according to the law, were tolerably cogent according to the equity of the case. Whatever his Majesty the King of Belgium and Holland might be, I myself felt perfectly inclined to overlook his transgression. And poor Mina, discovering my favourable verdict, gained courage to proceed. It appeared that Bernhard, established under an assumed name, in the retired hamlet where they first took refuge, fancied himself secure from pursuit."

"We were happy in ourselves," continued his wife—"happy in our child—happy in a life of prosperous labour. All around us throve—all we undertook succeeded; and, fool that I was, I fancied that, whatever might be the error of Bernhard in the eyes of man, the eyes of God beheld us with a forgiving and favouring eye. It was a valley of green pastures, where our dwelling lay, between shelving banks clothed with rich hanging woods. The air was a mild one; the flowers came earlier, and freer, and fresher there than at Florennes; and already the boy began to take note of them, and to smile at their beauty. But I will not dwell upon it all. It was a dream too bright to last; and the waking, sir, was very, very terrible! There came gendarmes into the country to search for a criminal who had escaped from prison at Mons; and, during the inquiries that arose, my husband was detected as a deserter by the signalement already forwarded by the authorities of Charleroi to the French police. He was seized, sir—torn from me—torn from his home; and I remained in a state of agony and suffering, rendering it impossible to follow him! For a whole week, a delirious fever confined me to my bed; during that time, my child fretted itself ill under the mismanagement of strangers; and, long ere my own strength was restored, I was hanging over the dying bed of my boy!

"But GOD has been good to me in this. He has spared my babe—he has spared me to watch over him; yet if, as those who know best aver, Bernhard must be condemned, condemned to death—may He be still more merciful, and call us to himself!"

"And you are on your way to rejoin your husband?" I inquired, deeply penetrated by her affliction.

"As soon as the health of my child permitted, sir, I fled from Isigny, the place where trouble had overtaken us. But I resolved, on my way to Namur, where Bernhard lies in prison awaiting his court martial, to turn aside to Florennes, and throw myself, for the last time, at the feet of my father. It may be superstition, sir; but it seems to me, that if his curse were recalled, the wrath of the Almighty would be appeased! Of all my earthly possessions, I have retained, as a token of my mother's love, only that christening cloth which she fancied was to be the foundation of an abundant household store for her child. Wrapt in that sacred covering, I would fain have placed my child in his arms; and then he could not—he would not have refused it his blessing. But the precarious state of my poor babe has frustrated my hopes; and, in six days, Bernhard will be called upon to take his trial!"

"Six days?—you are sure that it is not for six days?"

"On the 24th, sir—I have numbered the hours, the minutes; they may be the last my husband is fated to behold on earth!"

"Then there will be time!" was my murmured ejaculation. And, without entering into explanations, further than by affording to Mina the means of reaching Florennes by a public conveyance, I appointed her a rendezvous at Namur, recommended her to the care of mine host of The Golden Artichoke, and, before daylight, was recommending, once more, to poor Kätchen, the utmost speed, to enable me to reach Spa without delay.

"You actually left the poor woman to her fate?" demanded the pepper-and-salt gentleman.

"I did—exactly! I left the child to die, and the mother to bury it," replied Bagshaw, with a sneer; "and, by old Coquerel's usual breakfast hour, had rendered up my accounts. Profiting by the good humour produced in my patron by the sight of my balance sheet, I told him my story, and implored him to exercise his well-known interest with the King, in behalf of Bernhard.

"'Poor wife!—poor child!' murmured the good old man, when I had concluded my story. 'And this,' continued he, examining the cloth of fine damask which Mina, at my earnest prayer, had deposited in my hands; 'this is the counterpart, you say, of the linen spun for his Majesty, five and twenty years ago, by Regenhart's wife? 'Tis well. It may serve to bring the circumstance to his remembrance. Memory is an instinct in kings. In my interviews with William, I have known him advert to trifles of earlier date and similar insignificance. I am about to address a memorial to him respecting a farther improvement in the machinery of his royal cannon foundry at Namur. He has offered me choice of favours more often and more widely than I should care to have it generally known; and, to beg the life of a fellow-creature, is to afford him a double occasion of conferring a benefit. You, Bagshaw, shall be the bearer of my memorial, and of a letter containing the particulars you have just related. The Court is at Brussels. Lose no time; by to-morrow, you may obtain an audience.'

"An audience!" cried Pepper-and-salt. "An audience of the King?"

"Ay, sir, an audience. Nothing more easy than access to the presence of William of Orange. But, even had it been otherwise, a letter from Coquerel the mechanist—Coquerel, whose introduction of British machinery into Flanders, is a chief cause of its commercial prosperity—Coquerel, the cherished of Napoleon, the right hand of kings—would have secured my admission. Nothing could be simpler than the manners and habits of the King of the Netherlands; nothing more straightforward, more intelligent, than his mode of interrogating me respecting the circumstances of the Regenhart family, after perusing the communication of my patron."

"But did he comply with the prayer contained in it?" cried several of the auditors. "Did he give hopes of mercy?"

"Kings are not fond of giving hopes—they leave that to their ministers," replied Bagshaw. "Unless there is certainty in the case, they are wise enough to hold their tongues. His Majesty, King William, sent me back to Namur with about as much insight into his intentions as if I had made a voyage to Guinea, and been conversing with the King of Dahomey. He said he would signify his pleasure to the Sieur Coquerel as early as possible."

"And what was his pleasure?" cried Mrs Meg, with whose right of interrogation even Bagshaw did not think it expedient to trifle.

"With your good leave, I must talk first of my own pain," replied he. "On arriving at Namur, where my worthy master was to meet me, to receive an account of my embassy, an accident most unluckily occurred in one of the newly-invented furnaces, which, for the moment, engrossed all his attention, and ought to have engrossed mine; nor was it till the fifth day after quitting The Golden Artichoke, that I was able to make my way to the obscure inn in the neighbourhood of the citadel, whither I had directed Mina. To my utter consternation, I found, on reaching the place, that no person answering to my description had made her appearance. Either she had been detained near Battices by the debility of her child, or some accident had occurred to her on her way to Florennes! My next inquiries related to Bernhard; and an intelligent corporal of dragoons who frequented the house, acquainted me that the garrison-court had been sitting for the last two days, and that the rigour displayed in the trials already decided before the tribunal, admitted of little hope that a deserter would find mercy. I was still speaking to him, when the feeble accents of a familiar voice interrupted my inquiries. The poor wife, so soon to become a widow, had that moment arrived. The child was no longer in her arms. I dared not ask for it; but my looks, I suppose, expressed the impression I had conceived.

"'Not dead—no!—I trust in all-powerful Providence, not dead!' she faltered in reply. 'After you left me, every minute seemed likely to be its last. But the time is almost expired, and I could tarry no more. I have left my boy to the pity of strangers, to hasten to him. Have you good news for me, sir? You said when we parted that you had formed projects for us—that you had an opening in our favour. What tidings?'

"'At present, none,' said I. 'I have done my best; but nothing, alas! has been effected by my interference.'

"'And to-morrow the court-martial sits!' cried Mina. 'If nothing has been, nothing will be done. Ah! sir, why did you deceive me?—why raise hopes you had not the means to realize?'

"I forbore to remonstrate with her injustice. But, in her agony of mind, she had already forgotten her displeasure in an appeal for information to my friend the corporal; and I could not but admire with what delicacy the man who, but a moment before, had replied to me with the harsh coarseness of naked truth, evaded giving her pain, even while he evaded giving her hope. By his humane interference, too, she succeeded in obtaining immediate access to the Governor, and procuring a warrant of admission to the prisoner. I myself accompanied Mina as far as the wicket; promising to return and fetch her at the hour for closing for the night; and nothing could be more singular than the contrast between the feverish, excited, panting, half-frantic woman whom I saw rush through the wicket, to be conducted to the cell of her husband; and the inanimate form consigned to my arms by the turnkey on my return. Mina had proved unable to support the shock of what was probably their last parting—their last parting save one. She was still in a state of insensibility when, by the kindness of the innkeeper's wife, I saw her laid on a comfortable bed; and all I learned at the citadel and in the barrack-yard, of the probability of capital sentence upon the prisoner, inclined me to wish that her senses might not immediately be restored. She could not remain too long unconscious of the horror of her situation.

"On my return to my duties, a severe reprimand awaited me from both Coquerel and his foreman, for having absented myself at so critical a time. It was in vain that I represented to my master the cause of my absence. His interest in the fate of the young couple seemed wholly merged in the irritation produced by the recent catastrophe at the foundry. Nor could I blame him; for it had been attended by loss of life; and the distress he had recently witnessed in the families of the two workmen sacrificed to an experiment, seemed to have rendered him callous to every other appeal to his feelings.

"On the morrow morning, I would have given worlds to proceed to the military court to see how matters stood; or, at the worst, to have imparted such comfort to Bernhard's wife as the presence of a sympathising friend can afford. But this was impossible. The funeral of the two workmen was to take place at the cemetery without the walls; and Coquerel not only presided in person over the melancholy ceremony, but insisted that his whole establishment should afford a token of respect to the memory of their deceased comrades. Such a solemnity, at such a moment, was not calculated to raise my spirits. My heart sickened as I saw the two coffins lowered into the grave; and felt that, perhaps, at that moment, sentence of death might be passing upon Bernhard."

"Found guilty, or acquitted? Lordsake, sir, come to the point!" cried Mrs Dods. "Talk of your feelings another time—have a wee bit care of ours!"

"Acquitted, then!" said Bagshaw, amused by the interest he had excited. "Acquitted—thanks to one of those nice points of legal sophistry by which judge-advocates can save the life of a man especially honoured by kingly protection. The fact of desertion was proved and admitted; but it was submitted, as a point of law, to the opinion of the court, whether Bernhard, at the moment of deserting, had not been formally draughted from the corps, from whose head-quarters he had made his escape, without being regularly entered into the regiment sentenced to sail for Java. The court bowed and was convinced. He was dismissed with a severe reprimand; and when the poor fellow conveyed in person the glad tidings to his scarcely-conscious wife, an autograph letter from King William was placed in the hands of my old master, containing the usual flummery about allowing justice and the laws to take their course, and enclosing the brevet of a small pension, secured by Her Majesty the Queen of the Netherlands, to the daughter of Marjory Regenhart of Florennes. 'The loyal zeal and industry of your mother have not escaped my recollection,' said the second letter, addressed by Wilhelmina of Prussia, to the favoured family. 'The sight of the very curious specimen of damask, forwarded by the Sieur Coquerel of Namur, forcibly recalled to my mind the eventful moment (the birth of my son) when Madam Regenhart's valuable gift reached the Hague.'"

"And was that letter framed and glazed to match the other, and hung up in the old parlour?" inquired the Nabob, in a fever of excitement.

"In due time, I fancy it was; but, being soon afterwards recalled to my native country, it was not till the year 1820 that I had an opportunity of learning from a friend to whom my old master afforded a few days' hospitality at his country seat, that Bernhard and his wife had repeatedly written to me, and repeatedly forwarded to the iron works such rural dainties as their means enabled them to dispose of; that old Regenhart had opened his heart and house to his penitent daughter, her husband and child; and closed them upon the family of Madam Regenhart the second, who was now gone to rejoin Hans the miller, to the infinite relief of her household."

"If I should ever visit Florennes," said the nabob, "I will certainly find them all out, and learn the concluding particulars of the case."

"You can't do better, my good sir, and you can't do it too soon," said Bagshaw, with a significant look. "And, moreover, if ever you visit the Royal Palace at the Hague, inquire for the Queen's private apartments, look into a glass cabinet of curiosities on the left-hand side of the fire-place, in the blue satin dressing room, and you will see a somewhat discoloured, but exquisitely wrought damask napkin"——

"Well, sir?"

"Well, sir!—which will enable you to prove to the groom of the chambers that you are wiser than himself, by acquainting him that this nameless relique was a gift hallowed to the church and by the church, to become a talisman to the child of Marjory Regenhart, and a token of royal gratitude and clemency. It is, in short, nothing less than the CHRISTENING CLOTH of Wilhelmina, the farmer's daughter of Florennes."

"Weel, now, that is what I ca' a very bonny story, and a very heart-goin' story," said Mistress Dods, "outlandish though it be; and, though I did jalouse a twang o' Papistry at the outset, I like it, for my ain pairt, a'maist as weel as if it had been a' about Black Yerl Angus, and the reavin, ridein times o' whilk there are so many Tales in this Border land o' ours; or about the friars o' Melrose, and the fairies o' Yarrow and Ettrick. But the clock has warned eleven, gentlemen—there are your chaumer lichts—and enough is as good as a feast; so put your tale in your wallet, Dominie, till the next occasion—and a fair good e'en to ye a'!"

POETRY OF THE SEASON.

RINGING OUT THE OLD YEAR, AND IN THE NEW YEAR.

It is the custom, in many parts of the country, to ring the old year out and the new year in. The effect of the bells, in the stillness of midnight, is very striking.

How many hearts now beating high
Shall cold within the dark tomb lie,
And eyes in life's sweet springtime bright
Be veiled in death's o'ershadowing night,
And hopes bend low to sorrow's reign,
Ere that sweet chime be heard again!
What is the tale your music tells
To listening age, sweet midnight bells?
Ye speak of scenes and years gone by,
Treasured in love's deep memory;
Ye tell of buried hopes, whose birth
Too glorious seemed for aught of earth,
But, like all lovely things below,
Being fairest, were the first to go;
Ye bring back voices from the dead—
The tones which long from earth have fled;
Ye speak of manhood's vigorous prime,
Ere the swift steps of noiseless Time
Had in their dead'ning progress chilled
Each high resolve, each lofty aim,
And passion's rushing whirlwind stilled,
And quenched the burning hopes of fame;
Ye bring the thought, for them no more
That chime on midnight breeze shall pour
Its floating echoes—they may hear
The birth-peal of no coming year.

To ardent youth, ye midnight bells,
Your music of the future tells—
The syren Hope her witching song
In mingling these sweet chimes among,
And bringing thoughts of distant years,

Unstained by care, undimmed by tears.
Steeped in her rainbow-tinted dyes,
Life's fancied scenes in brightness rise;
Like shadows in a summer dream,
In Fancy's magic mirror seen,
The imaged forms of all most dear,
Gladdening those sunny paths, appear.
Alas! how may these visions be Disproved by bitter certainty—
The sunny path be clouded o'er,
The dearest forms be seen no more!
Still, as each passing year moves on,
Your chime will have a sadder tone,
Till its sweet strain will only raise
Fond mem'ry's dream of bygone days.

A. H. D.

THE PASSING YEAR.

Hark! to that signal on the midnight air,
Like to the thunder peal when all around
Is hushed and stilly! 'Tis the past year's knell!
Another year is fled!—another wave
Of Time's vast ocean hath onward rolled
To its far boundary, no more to cross
Earth's chequered shores, or bear upon its breast
The bubble, Man; but, on the viewless brink
Of that dark precipice, is lost in foam.
Another year is fled! and Time's frail bark
Is bounding onward to the voiceless shore
Of dread Eternity.—But, list! again
Another sound bursts startling on the ear!
A merry peal, unlike the sullen toll
Which erst upon the silence broke: it speaks
The past year's transit—merrily proclaims
That yet another year hath passed away
Into the shadowy group—the vista dim
Of ages past, and in its vergeless track
Another quick appears, on whose dark stage
Fate hangs her veil!

Ah, me! how many a change
Hath cross'd the spirit of life's fitful dream
Since last the glorious sun his race began
In annual orbit through the azure void!
Death hath its work accomplished! Many a one,
Endeared by kindred or the social tie
Of sacred friendship, o'er the grave's dread bourne
Hath passed away; or the still closer bond
Of young affection Death hath all unsealed—
Leaving the blighted heart to ponder o'er
The sweet remembrance of former joys,
When, in the springtide of youth's buoyant hour,
It dreamt alone of love and happiness.
Despotic tyrant! such is thy dread power!
The mighty and the slave before thee fall;
The palace and the hovel open wide
Their portals at thy call, without appeal;
While meek-eyed Pity breathes her prayer in vain,
And Mercy shrinks appall'd. Insatiate foe!
Thousands have sunk beneath thine iron hand
Since the past year's commencement; yet strange man,
As if to aid in thy destroying course,
"Lets slip the dogs of war;" and, from her throne,
Based on the pillars of inhuman hate
And mortal vengeance, hath fell Slaughter sent
Her desolating mandates, penn'd in blood!
But the heart sickens at the dire review—
I turn me from the scene. Methinks I hear
The noisy Bacchanal, as, quaffing deep
The vicious bowel, he welcomes in the year
With rioting and mirth: be mine the task,
At this all solemn hour, to humbly breathe
A prayer that heaven would in its mercy shower
Its choicest blessings on the new-born year.

A NEW YEAR'S CHANT FOR 1837.

Air—"Here's to the maiden of bashful fifteen!"

Here's to King William, the best of his line!
Here's to his dearest connexion!
Here's to his beautiful heiress, in wine
As bright as her glowing complexion!
Let the toast pass—
Drink to the lass;
I warrant she'll prove an excuse for the glass.

Here's to the patriot who nobly withstood
The favours and frowns of the Crown, sir!
Here's to the baron who boldly avow'd
He'd "do what he liked with his own, sir!"
Let the toast pass—
I swear by the mass,
With claret like this we shall empty the glass.

Here's to the wight with political creed!
Here's to the man that has none, sir!
Here's to the trimmer, the vilest of breed,
False alike to the people and throne, sir!
Let the toast pass—
He is an ass,
Who, with claret like this, would demur at his glass.

Here's to the Duke with his aquiline nose,
In the midst of his coterie so warm, sir!
He's a wiser old fellow than many suppose,
Though he cocked up that nose at Reform, sir.
Let the toast pass—
I swear by the mass,
With millions he's proved an excuse for the glass.

Here's to Sir Robert, the Tory true blue,
Who lately the Rectorship won, sir!
We drink not this bumper for what he will do—
We drink it for what he has done, sir.*

Let the toast pass—
Brighter than gas,
The pearls on the claret appear in the glass.

Here's to O'Connell, the chief of the clan
Who are "alien in blood and religion!"
He has cut off the wings of corruption, has Dan,
And shall pluck her as bare as a pigeon!
Ould Derrynane,
He'll do it clane,
For the love that he bears to the Island so green.

Here's the fat vicar, distraining for rents!
Here's the lean puritan pastor!
Here's to the Bishops—those primitive saints,
Who walk in the paths of their Master!
Let the toast pass—
Drink the old lass—
I mean Mother Church—as excuse for the glass.

Here's the tough Scotsman in Bryanstone Square,
Who thumbs over Cocker so neatly!
May he win the first game played at Middlesex fair,
And thrash his opponents completely!
Happiness, health,
Comfort, and wealth,
To him who ne'er took his foeman by stealth.

Here's to the Baron of Brougham and Vaux,
Who of late's been a little knocked under!
With his back to the wall, and his front to the foe,
May his eloquence issue in thunder!
Let the toast pass,
Break every glass—
He'll tickle the House, for his Lordship's no ass.

* Alluding, we suppose, to his granting Catholic Emancipation, &c. &c.

Here's to the source of legitimate power—
The People, the empire all over!
And shoulder to shoulder, in sunshine or shower,
May they struggle their rights to recover!
Let their foes quail—
They're clothed in mail,
For great is the truth, and must ever prevail!

Again to King William, the best of his line!
Again to his dearest connexion!
Again to his beautiful heiress, in wine
As bright as her glowing complexion!
Let the toast pass—
Drink to the lass;
I'll warrant she'll prove an excuse for the glass.

A LETTER TO MR TAIT, ON THE NEW POOR-LAW BILL, CORN-LAWS, CURRENCY, MASTERS AND WORKMEN.

BY EBENEZER ELLIOTT.

Dear Tait,—I know not whether the aristocratlings of the Modern Athens are serving their master by vituperating the new Poor-Law Bill; but those of Sheffield are as busy as so many maggots in the carcass of a dead horse, with the view, it would seem, of helping the Tories and annoying the Ministry, by exasperating the working classes. I have only been able, however, to meet with one workman with whom they have succeeded. And yet the self-supported poor ought to dislike the new Poor-Law Bill; for it has one enormous fault—a fault which "the friends of the poor," as our enemies call themselves, take especial care not to mention—it begins at the wrong end. Had it begun at the right end—had it been made to apply, first, to the palaced paupers, instead of their victims; had its preliminary been the total and immediate repeal of the Corn-Laws, and of all other laws which prevent or impede the exchange of manufactured goods for the agricultural productions of other countries—we should, by this time, peradventure, have had no paupers but the authors of those laws, and their hopeful families: for food would have kept pace with population, knowledge with both; our rivals would have become every day fewer, our customers more numerous; each passing hour would have increased, instead of diminishing the rate of profit, and, consequently, the amount of that fund out of which high wages can alone continue to be paid.

If we inquire into the origin and authorship of that alteration in the ancient Poor-Law which enabled Tory magistrates to debase the people, and bribe their own dependents, by and through the distribution of what is called out-door relief to the poor, we shall find that the self-supported poor have no reason to quarrel with its abolition. The author of the alteration was the monster Pitt; who, having, by his Bank-Restriction Act, deluged the nation with inconvertible paper-money—trebling rents, and raising the price of wheat from 44s. per quarter, (in gold,) to 84s. (in paper money,) while the wages of agricultural labour rose only from 1s. 9d. to 2s. per day—found that there was likely to be a run on the Workhouses! and that thrice the existing number would probably be insufficient to receive one half of the applicants! He, therefore, impelled by necessity, as well as his own devilish cunning and wickedness, resolved to strike the honest and industrious a double-handed blow, by devising a scheme for relieving his victims in their hovels, by payments out of the rates ordered by the justices! a scheme which, while it degraded the poor lower than the brutes, enabled the aristocracy and their underlings—Tory lawyers, Tory constables, Tory licensed victuallers, Tory footmen, assessors of taxes, &c. &c. &c., by thousands and tens of thousands—to divide among themselves an average of about two millions per annum of the People's money, from the commencement of the alteration in the law to its extinction. And can the working classes of this country be induced, by speechifiers and sham-radical newspaper editors, to clamour for the re-enactment of a law like this? Why, it was one of the means by which the monster carried on his crusade against liberty! First, he bribed, by his Bank-Restriction Act, the bankers and the landowners, the latter of whom were not then aware that it was to make paupers of them; and then, for a time, placed the landowners in security by his alteration of the Poor-Laws, which enabled them to garrison their neighbourhood with idle ruffians, who thenceforth had nothing to do but damn the French, rob and perhaps kill the Jacobins, eat the bread of the poor, and thank the rich for it; doffing their hats to the parson-justice, who was to be seen anywhere except in the pulpit. Why, then, if the altered law so well answered the purpose of the Tories, did they repeal it by acclamation? Because it had ceased to answer their purpose. They discovered at last—what their own personal and hereditary experience ought at once to have taught them—that persons who are kept by others, (as the Tories have ever been, and mean to be,) will do nothing for themselves; and, if proof were wanting that whom God hath doomed he infatuates, it is furnished by the fact, that they did not make this awful discovery (though it is the Tory's instinct) until they were literally in danger of being eaten in their own drawing-rooms, half a dozen for a breakfast, by the hundreds of thousands of wretches whom, by the altered law, they had impoverished and unsouled. And is it to benefit the Tories—whose hatred of the poor is so deadly that they taxed building materials, to render it impossible for working men to invest their savings without ultimate impoverishment—the Tories, who defeat forethought and punish self-denial twice, because they know that if a poor man acquire property, he will build a Mind upon it:—is it, I ask, to benefit these indescribable miscreants (whom I will describe, if I can) that the workmen of Britain are expected to clamour for a Repeal of the new Poor-Law Bill? That the palaced pauper's enslaved portion of the middle class—the practical man, skilful in accounts; the retired and experienced overseer; the so-often-re-elected of the select, with his adoring and honest crew of baker-contractors, grocer-contractors, butcher-contractors, &c. &c. &c.—respect the Tories from habit, and the gratitude which expects future plunder, I am as well aware as the people shall be. But if the latter respect the Tories, it is because they do not know what the Tories cost us. I am sure I do not; but I think I know what their Corn-Law costs. Let us see. The Tories themselves acknowledge that it raises the prices of British agricultural produce, at least 35 per cent. above the continental prices; consequently, if the annual value of that produce, at the bread-tax prices, is £250,000,000, the Corn-Laws cost or destroy £87,500,000 per annum, or about the difference in value between gold and the inconvertible paper money which constituted the circulating medium when the Corn-Laws were enacted. Is it, then, for securing their paper-rents in gold, by means of the Corn-Laws, that the working classes are to respect the Tories? I suppose so. For we are told there are somewhere (under ground, perhaps) "Operative Conservative Societies!" There may be; and if there are, I will not blame, but pity the deluded workmen. Robbed, insulted, trampled upon, as they have been, and are still, it is natural for them to listen to any man who, with a decent coat on his back, pretends to feel an interest in their well-being. Yet, let them beware. They are environed with dangers. But they may avoid the rocks of Tory treachery, and sail safely in the roughest water, if they will only write on their hearts, as a talisman—That all newspaper editors who do not advocate immediate and unrestricted freedom of trade, are either wicked or incapable; and that, whether wicked or incapable, they are the working man's deadliest foes; because they could not better serve his enemies than they do, if they were openly paid by the Tories at the door of their den in Charles Street. Let the working classes, then, read no newspaper—especially if it be a cheap one—that does not denounce monopolies of all descriptions! They may safely make a religion of this, if the Bible does: and yet we are undermined by pretended preachers of that Bible, even at our prayers! But why do the Tories employ these dissenting parsons to help them into office again? Why do they seek office at all? They have already robbed us of everything but toil, sorrow, and death. Has a short abstinence from power taught them the art of picking dry bones? God grant that it may; and that, when they seek food, they may find all they have earned! So, when the Jesuits of the future read of the patrons of their fathers—whose history for the last forty years, proves that the compound noun "Tory-landowner," is the only term in language which expresses fully the ne plus ultra of human vileness—they will see merit and reward coincident. But they will say, "Why Tory-Landowner?" as if it were not known to every Jesuit, that, though there are honest Whigs, every Tory is a bread-tax-eater in his heart!

My present business, however, is not with the Jesuits of the future, but the Wesleyan Jesuits—I mean the popes, cardinals, and grand inquisitors of old Methodism—the saints who are preaching black slavery in America—the immaculates, traders in souls, who started a newspaper to support Peel and Toryism here—the conjurors who boast that they will betray the people through members of their body, who are to be sent to Parliament! With what honest intention a corporation, purporting to be religious, can educate any of its members as political brawlers, I leave your readers to judge. But the Methodist body—though it contains a few putrid aristocratlings, or shreds of the fag-end of the great vulgar, and a considerable number of the corruptible middle class—consists principally of workmen, a little raised above the lowest class, incorruptible, and, if not deluded, not to be sold. For that body to suppose that they who advocate black slavery in America, do not intend to perpetuate white slavery here, would be as absurd as to conclude that the idolatrous Pagans who daily crucify Christ in the name of Jesus, would not, had they lived in his time, have poisoned Socrates! The modern Loyolas, then, will find themselves mistaken. They may offer themselves for sale, and it is said they have already found bidders; but, as they cannot sell their congregations, the bidders will not be buyers, because, being themselves as throng as five in a bed, the congregations are the only things they want to buy. Still the new popedom and conclave will possess much property in chapels, which they may let to Ducrow, or to the hundred thousand seceders who, whether joined in congregations or not, have left them in disgust.

There is hope, then, in despair? Yes; but let us hope wisely, for we stand on the brink of a precipice. After passing to cash payments through unexampled horrors, are we to witness nothing but legislative destruction? experience nothing but alternations of sham-prosperity, and miseries too real? The payment of genuine bills of exchange—of which it is impossible to have too many, and between which and mere promises to pay, whether on demand or not, there exists an eternal and inherent distinction—is again endangered by mere promises to pay. What are we to say of that legislation, that Whig-suicide by Act of Parliament, which has again enabled bad money to endanger good? Bank paper is again a legal tender! Lord Althorp—one of those good-natured pests, who sometimes do more harm in an hour than all the breed ever did good since the creation of the world—partially repealed Peel's Bill; that Bill which in its consequences, carried the Reform Bill! that bill on which Peel's admirers should build his monument; for it is solid enough to sustain any weight of notoriety, and assuredly will not sink beneath a feather, swayed by every wind of expedience. Government has been bullied into the re-enactment of the cause of the crisis of 1825! Blessed with Pitt's Bank-Restriction Act shorn of its rightful security, we are now, as one of the men of Birmingham says, "quiet as a barrel of gunpowder." Yes! under pretence of accommodation to the public, a defunct monopoly has been rechartered, which requires accommodation itself; for, possessing a capital of three millions, it has lent fifteen millions to one customer who cannot repay the loan, and consequently has deprived the public of accommodation to the amount of five times its capital!—and this truly awful concern is hostilely tupping, with its soft sheep's horns, at establishments which have a paid up capital of 27 millions, and a liable capital of, at least, 250 millions more! If the result of all this might be, for once, a process which would teach money-mongers on both sides the Atlantic to be satisfied in future with their fair share of business, honest men would have reason to rejoice. But hitherto the re-chartering of the old libertine, through whose instrumentality, in the days of our glory, not less than fifteen hundred millions were stolen from honest men, to buy a bread-tax for thieves—hitherto, I say, the new undertakings of the strumpet, called of Threadneedle Street, have resulted in a great and sudden influx of business, followed by an equally great advance in the price of provisions, and speedily to be followed by a privation of business, as great and sudden as the influx. Is it not time, then, to look our affairs in the face? We have been saved from ruin so far, by the folly of our rivals, who have imitated our absurd legislation, imagining that we have thriven by our restrictive system—whereas we have thriven in spite of it. If they, generally, establish freedom of trade before us, our ruin is certain: witness the growing trade of Switzerland, a country which possesses no requisite for commerce, except the absence of every restriction upon it! I am told, by my excellent neighbour, Mr Samuel Jackson—whose invaluable evidence before a Committee of the House of Commons, shews him to be a capital witness on the subject—that the French possess all our coal measures, spread over extensive districts; that good coal is sold at the pits for 2s. per ton in France; and that the proprietors can manufacture pig iron for £2 per ton. If, then, our cheap-food rivals possess all our coal measures, nothing but wise legislation is wanting, to give them our cotton trade, on which all our other trades, and, consequently, our subsistence, mainly depend. Now, if the Corn-Laws are suffered to continue, depressing the rate of profit here, our merchants and monied men, may and will remove their capitals to other countries, where they will pay, and be fatally employed against us; but our manufacturers cannot, for their mills cannot fly; nor can our workmen remove themselves, for the continent would not receive them. Full nearly then it concerns the latter to insist on the immediate destruction of all monopolies! As the men have determined that the bread-tax shall not be paid out of wages, it is time for the masters to consider whether it can be paid out of profits; and to remember that the folly of wise men is wickedness.

Here, too, there is hope in our despair. It is consoling to reflect that one of the effects of the rush of artificial prosperity which we have witnessed, has been a circumstance of good omen, hitherto unexampled in the annals of paper money; I allude to the well-timed and successful strike of the Sheffield filesmiths, who anticipated, by gaining an advance of wages, the rise in the price of provisions; and this they did, not by violence, but by a display of enlightened reason, calm, and almost sublime. They also know that, if high wages here are a premium to foreign rivalry, the bread-tax offers the premium. Is it, then, too much to expect that they will soon exhibit a spectacle still more imposing? If they wait until money-monopoly, and bread-monopoly, and bad seasons here, combined with wise legislation on the Continent, and the successful competition of our cheap-food rivals, shall again cause a run on the workhouses, and, as in the days of the monster Pitt, thrice their number be found insufficient to receive the famished and infuriated applicants, what will they do next? Alas! it will be too late to do anything, but eat their oppressors raw and alive, and then each other; for there are crimes and calamities which cannot be repeated without national ruin. Neither in-door relief, nor out-door pay, nor the means of furnishing either, will any longer be possible in this country, if we wait till deep shall shout unto deep, that selfish legislation is about to be swept into eternal darkness, by the gathered thunders of its own broom! and palace and hovel together, precipitated down a Niagara of horrors into an ocean of blood! But I advise them to prevent the catastrophe by demanding (not pay, but) Justice! and by justice, I mean the ballot! household suffrage! responsible Lords, or none! and, above all, immediate and utterly unrestricted freedom of trade in money and all other things! If masters and workmen are not insane—if they do not intend to see six or eight millions of human beings in the streets and lanes, without wages, without food, and without the possibility of either—they will take the advice of one who never deceived them, and prevent the foreseen effects, by a timely removal of the disastrous and most devilish cause. With such leaders as Grote, Hindley, Bulwer, Roebuck, Thompson, Harvey, Hume, and "the man of men," O'Connell, can we fail? Let us fail, then; but let us also tell the landowners that they must henceforth be paid in that inconvertible paper-money which constituted the currency before their Corn-Laws were enacted; and by no means be allowed in future to pocket or destroy £87,500,000 yearly—being the difference in value between the inconvertible paper money and gold, or 35 per cent. on the gross of £250,000,000. This, I think, would retard our fall, and be a surer method of taxing absentees than any which O'Connell has devised. That masters and workmen will haste to ask their hearts, what will be the fate of their wives and children, if the Corn Laws be suffered to destroy our trade, is the earnest, constant, daily, hourly prayer of their fellow-sufferer and humble laureate,

THE CORN-LAW RHYMER.

LITERARY REGISTER.

The Comic Almanack for 1837

Is first-rate in its own original line. In pencil, we have perhaps seen it as good; but, where Cruikshank fails, Rigdum Funnidos, the editor, makes all up.

The poetry, the epistles, the bits of festivals, and of great events and odd matters, are all alike comical and capital. Thus we have—

January 1. Curacoa taken—(rather too freely.)
11. Cayenne taken by as-salt 1809. Enemy well peppered.
April 1. Sapientia. Cockneys commence angling for red-herrings.
16. Mutiny at Spit-head. Cooks strike for wages.
29. Thrashing commences in London. Macready thrashes Bunn, but gets nothing but chaff.
30. *Rogue*ation S. A pickpocket ducked about this time.
May 1. Chimney Sweepers' Jubilee. Emancipation of the Blacks.
June 21. Daniel Lambert died. Grand diet of Worms.
August 1. Charles X. abdicated. New issue of Sovereigns.
Oct. 25. St Crispin. All Soles' day. Cobblers' Holiday. No business done in Downing Street.
31. Brewing ends. Malt-Brun. Sir Matthew Hale.
Nov. 26. First night of Tom and Jerry. Larks in season.

And thus Rigdum Funnidos, Gent. proceeds throughout the 365 days of the Calendar. There is also an Annual Register. From the epistles-general, which are numerous, we quote this of Thomas Gardener to Sally Cook, for the consolation of all prudent lovers in distress, and the benefit of scientific members of Horticultural Societies.

I tak up my pen with much plessure to inform yew that i hav bean quiet Mizzerabl ever sins i left my plase. Evvery think has gon rong from that day to this, i hav ad no Turnups to speek of in my gardn & no Peas in my mind. i offen think of the appy days we ust to spend, parti'kly our Soft tewsdys wen yew ust to toe us up them nice apel friters wile the rest of the sirvents was obleigt to put up with nothink but plane pan caks without nayther apels nor sugger. O saly! i offen sets & thinks that luv is jest like a friing pan & wons art like a pan cak frizzling in the midl on it.

I've nevver repentid leveing but onst and thats evver sins. But i wasent agoin to stand bean dun out of my perquizzits by masters pertending he ad a rites to cum into the gardn whenever he likt & get my peeches & neck-trings, jest becaws it was hisn, and give away my Cabidges and Lettises without so much as with your Leaf or by your Leaf, to say nothink about the rumpus he maid about them 2 or 3 graps & accusing me of Boneing the Bone manure, & wors then al, eaping them 2 tun of coles on my hed wich i no moor stole em then yew did saly & after turning me away on account of the Coles wanting to Cokes me bak agen.

Dear saly, my place hear is verry cumfuttabl, but i am verry uncumfuttabl in it on account of my Bean in sich a tendar pashun with Yew. O luv, luv! i am grew as thin as a lath and hav found out wot it is not to hav cuk for a swete hart. Our under ous made is verry fond on me but wats the use of ous mades, won carnt heat brumes and skrubbin brushs. O saly saly! yew wood ardly no me i am as weak as a kittin, i can scace andl my Spade & its al Hoeing to yew. i set ours & ours in the forsing ous, doing nothink but thinking of yewr perty face, & i offen think ow appy we mite be with yewr 2 underd pound as yewr Grand muther left yew, and yewr 50 pound in the saveing bank, & my 5 pound as Jorge Hawl the squir's futman as is gone away ows me. TUMMAS HOLLYOKE.

If the reader outlive the perusal of Thomas' epistle, he may turn to twenty things equally humorous and pointed. We believe it must be already known that, besides its fun, The Comic Annual is properly ballasted with the useful information common to the sober Almanacks, and has about as much earnest as jest.

The Etterick Shepherd's Tales. Vol. I.

The first volume of a series of the Shepherd's tales has just been published by Blackie & Son of Glasgow. We hope that the publication is, to some extent, for the benefit of Mr Hogg's family, and would have been glad to see some intimation to this effect in the advertisement prefixed to the volume, as we have only heard it casually mentioned. Hogg, it appears from this advertisement, "wrote many original tales and sketches expressly for this series;" so that at least a part of its contents will be fresh to the public. The present volume is, we think, very judiciously selected for a beginning one. It contains the whole of "The Brownie of Bodsbeck," one of Hogg's best tales, and the naive, pastoral and romantic story of "The Wool-Gatherer," with two shorter tales. One of these, "Allan Gordon," ought to be dramatized; not for either its wit or interest, but from that irresistible and grotesque absurdity, half unconscious on the author's part, which kills the reader with laughter. Two characteristic embellishments are from the pencil of Mr D. O. Hill; and the volume is no slim one. Altogether, we hope the work will be successful! It is the only memorial that has yet appeared of a man who, if at one time absurdly flattered and mistakenly caressed to his own injury, has been far too easily forgotten.

Nature Considered as a Revelation. By the Rev. Robert Bayley.

Mr Bayley considers Nature as a Revelation, if we apprehend him aright, in the same sense as Addison, when the latter says—

> The spangled Heavens, a shining frame,
> Their great Original proclaim;

Or as, when in those other lines he writes—

> The unwearied sun, from day to day,
> Does his Creator's power display,

But Mr Bayley is not contented with finding in nature illustrations and analogies. He recognises a twofold law, and finds all nature full of types, emblems, and symbols. He is a Christian divine; but with a relish of the fanciful and the mystic of Quarles, Bunyan, Hervey, and, perhaps, of Swedenborg. He symbolizes all nature, and finds "sermons in stones," and uses of edifying in everything. The system of illustration is, of course, meant to be subservient to the salutary developement and cultivation of the moral perceptions and feelings. But we fear that Mr Bayley may sometimes deal with things as a punster or quibbler does with words—lose sight of their true use and meaning in hunting after the fanciful ones. Besides, where an individual possesses any ingenuity, there can be no limit to those illustrations which are here termed "Revelations of Nature." How much philosophy of this kind could Swift find in a broomstick! How much could the quaint, quibbling, allegorizing preachers of the sixteenth century find in anything whatever that they chose for a text!

The Fallacy of the Art of Physic as Taught in the Schools. By Samuel Dickson, M.D., formerly a Medical Officer on the Staff. Edinburgh: Adam & Charles Black.

We frankly plead entire ignorance to the Art of Physic; yet, like other people, sick or well, in passing through the world, we make our own observations and our guesses about the mystery. These observations and inferences of ours lead us to pronounce Dr Dickson's work as one of vigorous sense and courageous honesty. It is for others to say whether all his medical opinions be sound or not.

The Excitement.

This is a neat Edinburgh Annual for young folks, of which the eighth volume is now upon our table—one proof among others that the compilation is popular. It is understood to be compiled by a clergyman, who does not, however, consider it "essential that every book put into the hands of the young should necessarily contain something of a religious nature." The book is one of entertainment and information. The series professes to be intended to excite young people to read, and to record such incidents as are best fitted to arrest their attention.

A Translation of Buchanan's Latin Psalms

Has been made by Mr John Eadie, a preacher and teacher of languages in Glasgow, and, therefore, it is to be presumed, well prepared for the task. The common version of the Psalms, with which every one in Scotland is familiar from infancy, interferes so much with the judgment, that no one can be qualified to give a just or impartial opinion of what disturbs every old and endeared association entwined around the quaint homeliness of the verses lisped in childhood. We could not, in place of the old Psalms sung in our churches, accept of the strength of Milton or the elegance of Cowper. The present work is a creditable attempt for a scholar; but not a volume for extensive or popular use.

The Apprentices' Guide to Wealth and Esteem.

Does any considerate youth, in about the middle of his apprenticeship, begin to look forward to the world upon which he is about to enter, and desire, after a career of successful, because persevering and well-regulated industry, to die Lord Provost of Glasgow, Sovereign of Belfast, or even Lord Mayor of London—let him forthwith get a copy of this small manual, and study it diligently day and night. It is really one of the most judicious, clear-headed, and solid practical guides for youth we have ever seen. Somehow, we never can get rid of the feeling that there is a small relish of "Mr Thomas Inkle of London" about such productions—a touch of selfishness, in short, and cold-hearted calculation; but this little work, though cautious and prudential, is entirely free of any sordid taint. In short, no one who wishes well to a lad could make him a fitter new-year's gift than this small guide.

Dr Henry Duncan's Sacred Philosophy of the Seasons.

This is a work of a kind that never fails to attract and interest—one which, by pleasing gradation, and a chain of which every link is golden, leads the reader through Nature up to Nature's God. The author has chosen the Winter season for the subject of his first meditations. He has arranged his materials in order, and taken a subject for every week, and its divisions for each day of the week. All nature supplies him with boundless themes for this ingenious and popular compilation. A better idea will be obtained of the nature and object of the work, if we state a few of the leading topics. There are the STARRY HEAVENS, which opens up the wonders of astronomy and all the collateral subjects; the HYBERNATION of PLANTS, and also of BIRDS and INSECTS; FROST; the INHABITANTS of the POLAR REGIONS—with an endless variety of subordinate subjects and illustrations. We do not give out this work as one of exact or profound science, but as a charming winter fire-side book, especially for family circles, and one which agreeably mingles entertaining knowledge with moral and religious instruction.

A Satire on Satirists. By Walter Savage Landor.

In mercy to the author, who seems in a very pitiable case, we forbear minute notice of this production. Had his satire appeared a dozen years ago, one might have sympathized with his indignation, and approved his motives. There are men who can, with edifying composure, see a neighbour run through the body, and yet get into fury and convulsion if the assassin come within a yard of their own gouty toes.

The Parson's Case of Jewels.

Is a little pious story-book, written by the well-known Mrs Sherwood, and published at Berwick. It is exceedingly amiable in tone, and in object unexceptionable. The groundwork of the story is one of the most delightful works of its kind in the language—"Herbert's Country Parson."

THE GOLDEN ALMANACK, and THE VICTORIA ALMANACK, are little calenders, printed in gold and silver letters upon coloured paper. They are intended for Christmas gifts; and, gilding and all, are cheaper than a small cake of gilt gingerbread; so, we presume, there will be a great demand for them. They are only sixpence a-piece, and really pretty and useful toys.

PETER PARLEY, our old friend, has just brought out a budget of tales about the SUN, MOON, STARS, and COMETS; in short, he teaches astronomy in his own clear, pleasant, and peculiar way, and many things subsidiary or connected with this attractive science. Peter has made himself acquainted with the latest discoveries and improvements in instruments, and has really produced, in a lively and entertaining style, a most instructive treatise. The engravings are numerous, and, like all those of this series, alike excellent in design and execution. They are generally illustrative of the experiments by which Mr Parley familiarizes science, and are very happily conceived for this purpose.

FINE ARTS.

Fisher's Views in Syria and the Holy Land.

This selection of views, the beauty and elegance of which we have had occasion to commemorate before now, has just appeared as a handsome volume, cased in green and gold, like my lady's page. We have seen none of the Annua's for 1837 better adapted for a holiday gift than this joint concern of Mr Bartlett and Mr Carne. We had not seen before the View of Kalendria, Coast of Cilicia. It is one of the most delicious, sun-lit sea-views that eyes ever beheld. Mr Carne says moon-lit; and, if so, the moon of the east must be more brilliant than the sun of the west. The engraving floats in glowing light, as if kindled by a transparency. The House of Girgius Adeeb at Antioch is another engraving new to us in the series—very characteristic of the East, and charming in its details. Let our young readers try to imagine it from Mr Carne's description:—"Girgius Adeeb, the host, is delighted to welcome travellers to his house by day or night, or both, and will not accept, even from the wealthiest, any remuneration. . . The dwelling of Girgius is a good one; it rests upon the ancient walls of the city; and from the divan windows on the left, you look upon the Orontes and the distant mountains; and, in the opposite direction, is a glimpse of the walled heights above the city. The harem, or women's abode, is on the right, in light; and, near the door, is a well, and servants fetching water, not muffled, like Turkish females, for Girgius is a Christian. The offices are at right angles with the harem, but are not seen; the children of the host are playing about; the door at the corner open, with the sleeping rooms for the guests, who rest on a broad, low divan, continued round the room. A servant is carrying refreshments up the steps of the divan; and some merchants are conferring with Girgius, who is seated with a pipe in his hand, just without the rails of the divan. A jar of precisely similar make and size to those in the plate formed part of our baggage in Syria, to carry wine, when it chanced to be good, and was filled at intervals, 'few and far between.' The young woman playing with the child is clad in the tunic or short vest, which is embroidered; the large and full pantaloons of silk reach little more than half-way down the leg; the shoes of yellow leather, turn up sharp at the point; the child's dress, like that of most children of good condition in the East, is tasteful and picturesque, and more becoming and graceful to that age than the European costume. In the foreground are the nahrguillies, or pipes, for smoking with water; and two large citron trees afford a scanty shade." Can the reader conceive this Eastern scene? In the hospitable house of Girgius, it is usual, on departing, to give handsomely to the servants. The chief of these is Debro, who figures on the foreground of the plate, a knowing, bustling, and useful steward to his master, and particularly obliging to all strangers. In the evening, there is generally quite a reunion in the house of Girgius, and an excellent supper is laid out, to which ample justice is always done. Before sitting down, raki is served out, in small glasses, as an appetizer. Here are to be met Aleppines in their rich furs, Turks, Christians, and officers of the Pasha. Among the latter was a fine young Pole in the medical service, personally attached to Ibrahim Pasha, and overlooking all his faults; clinching every argument with—"Monsieur, il paie bien ses employés." The argument has force. One would like to sup some fine evening with Girgius Adeeb and his guests. In describing the View of Mount Cassus from the Sea, Mr Carne has given an exceedingly interesting account of Colonel Chesney's attempts, and of the progress of his stupendous projects.

The Cabinet of Modern Art

Is a series of brilliant engravings upon a small scale, all of them from clever designs, and some from recent and admired paintings. They are twenty-four in number, and include heads, landscapes, groups, and architectural and romantic scenic subjects. The artists are almost as numerous as the engravings. There are indeed so many exquisite, and also pretty and pleasing pictures, that we are at a loss how to distinguish them, without going over the whole bead-roll. Our principal favourites are Peasants of Subiaco, sketched by Edmonstone; the Fantoccini, by the same artist; A Peasant Girl of Procida, by Leopold Robert, a French or Belgian artist, we believe; The Morning Bath, by Collins, a scene which may be at Hastings, or Brighton, or twenty places, and which is full of nature and character, of a cheerful and unambitious kind. The Gipsy, by Rochard, is a pleasing portrait of a lady telling fortunes from the cards, in masquerade costume certainly, for this is no swarthy gipsy. The Embroiderer, by Hart, if flat, is yet full of quiet natural grace. We would also single out Stephanhoffe's somewhat crowded, but spirited Triumphal Entry of the Black Prince into London, with John of France as his Prisoner; and a very sweet landscape, A Ruined Fountain, by Chalon. This scene of lucid twilight—when

The moon is up, but yet it is not night—is peculiarly beautiful. The classic and poetical subjects, of which three are by Stothard, are of varying merit. The Muse Erato of this artist is replete with elegance of fancy; and, among the many brilliant specimens of engraving in this selection, this by Portbury deserves to be singled out as wholly worthy of the painting it so exquisitely represents. The Boar that killed Adonis brought to Venus, is by Mr Westall, and among the finest of the classical designs, though the goddess herself looks rather peevish and rueful. In another classic print, The Birth of Venus, the gawky goddess is club-footed; and, as Dandie Dinmont said in spearing the salmon, "turns up a side like a sow," as she rises from her native element. But the Graces and Nereids in attendance, are pretty laughing girls. We have omitted one of the best prints of the series, La Belle Fortunata—a speaking truthful portrait of an Italian girl, whose countenance beams with expression.

We would recommend this selection upon the same principle that a volume of choice pieces of poetry, selected from the best writers, must be of more value than almost any original volume whatever by one author. It consists of everybody's best.

The Book of Gems.

This is a very elegant work. The poets and painters of Great Britain meet, and, combining their rarest beauties, lend grace to each other. The series was, we believe, commenced last year. It will require, perhaps, another volume to complete one of the most tasteful additions that have lately been made to the drawing-room cabinet library. To every specimen chosen from a favourite poet, an exquisite little original design is dedicated, in the style of the illustrated editions of Rogers' poems, and other elegant works with which our readers must be familiar. The present volume contains specimens from fifty-two poets, and consequently the same number of prints. The list of artists and engravers comprehends the most popular names in modern art. We have not space to enumerate the designs. The rustic subjects and landscapes are peculiarly sweet. Autographs of many of the poets are given, and the book is beautifully printed, and forms altogether one of the most handsome and desirable works, of an enduring kind, that have lately appeared in England, within the compass of ordinary purses.

 Our notices of the late interesting publication of M. Von Raumer, Lord Wharncliffe's "Life and Letters of Lady Mary Wortley," Lane's "Account of the Modern Egyptians," the Memoir and Discourses of the late Rev. John Brown Patterson of Falkirk, and several other Works, are unavoidably delayed till next month; also a lot of new novels, for which we cannot, at present, make room.

POLITICAL REGISTER.

GREAT BRITAIN.

Parliament meets on the 31st January, and we hope that, ere that time, means will be devised for re-establishing the union among all classes of Liberals, so that the Tories may be efficiently opposed, and deterred from attempting to seize the reins of government. The demands of the Radicals are so moderate—being merely that such questions as the Ballot and shortening the duration of Parliament shall be left open—that we hardly think Ministers will be so wrong-headed as to refuse them; and, if they do, we cannot see on what grounds they can expect the support of the Liberals. We confess, for our own part, that we have not so great a dread of the Tories getting into power, as to be disposed to yield everything to the Whigs; for we do not think that, with the present state of Ireland, the high price of food, and deficiency of employment in several important branches of trade, the Tories are likely to have a longer tenure of power than they had upon the last occasion on which they attempted to govern the state. A few months' seclusion from the toils of office, would afford the Whigs leisure to study those questions on which so many of them inform their constituents, they have not yet made up their minds, and enable them to resume with more effect their duties, when their services were again required. The real struggle now lies, not between Whigs and Tories, but between the Aristocracy and the People: as long as the Whigs are useful in this struggle, they are deserving of support; but, when they shew any symptoms of being desirous to retard the progress of Reform, they must give way to bolder and honester men, even should there be a risk of the Tories gaining by the change a momentary ascendancy; for the bugbear of Tory ascendancy must not be permitted to give the Whigs a monopoly of office.

We have been looking in all directions for symptoms of that reaction which the Tories have been so loudly proclaiming; but without success. Perhaps the Tories have been exerting themselves more in the way of eating and drinking this recess than formerly, but it never can be difficult to assemble large bodies of men when dinner tickets are given gratuitously. How far it is judicious for the Tories to accustom the people to political discussions may well be doubted. The halcyon days of Toryism were, when every man had nothing to do with the laws but obey them, and nothing to do with the taxes but to pay them; when every man attended to his own business, and left to the Tories affairs of state, and the public purse. Many of those who listen to their after-dinner harangues, will not take all their assertions as truth; and if a spirit of inquiry be once raised, it is all that is required; for a little investigation will soon expose the sophistries and fraud by which the power of the aristocracy over the people is maintained. It is nothing but ignorance which enables a few hundred families to govern, for their own advantage, twenty-four millions of people. Were the masses sufficiently aware of the arts by which they are cozened and swindled out of their money, and made beasts of burden of, they would not long submit to so iniquitous a system, but demand justice with a voice of thunder. We have no hesitation in saying that our whole taxation and the greater part of our legislation, are calculated for the aggrandizement of the rich, on the degradation of the middle and poorer classes; but we are happy to see that, every year, and almost every month, the spirit of resistance is increasing in strength; and we are confident that, though the struggle may be severe and tedious, the cause of justice will ultimately be triumphant. One of the greatest errors, for themselves, the despots of this country ever committed, was reducing the stamp-duty on newspapers; for by that means a flood of light will be let into the dens of corruption, which, by exposing our vicious system of government, will lead to more important reforms than any that have yet been obtained.

At Birmingham, the people, as a speaker at a late public dinner there expressed it, are "quiet as a barrel of gunpowder;" but the match is not far off. The iron masters in Staffordshire are blowing out their furnaces and discharging their men, and it is calculated that 30,000 men are already idle. In the potteries and in other districts, a dispute about wages, has had the same effect; and the accounts from the manufacturing districts of the state of trade, are by no means favourable. Provisions are not likely to be cheap this spring, so that there will be ample leisure, and sufficient reason, for processions and meetings, to pass resolutions, which, as in 1832, will agitate the length and breadth of the land. In such circumstances, we cannot join in the cry which has been raised, for the opening of the ports. Such a measure will only ensure a continuance of our iniquitous starvation laws. By that expedient, these laws have been saved before now. Let therefore the price of food rise until the starvation laws be forced upon the attention of Parliament, and let agitation never cease, until corn and food (including butcher meat and live animals, now prohibited to be imported) be allowed to be imported free from duty. Let us revert, in this instance at least, to the so much boasted wisdom of our ancestors, which consisted in strengthening the country, not by starving, but by feeding the people.

At a meeting of the North Devonshire Reformers, held on the 23d November, Lord Ebrington disclaimed any knowledge or belief of the intention of Ministers to dissolve the House of Commons. On the question of Reform of the Peerage, he stated that he differed entirely from those who maintained that the constitution of the House of Lords was immutable, without the destruction of the constitution. No one would maintain such a doctrine who reflected upon the immense increase of the Peerage, made since the accession of George III., the admission of sixteen peers on the Union with Scotland, elected for the Parliament, and of only twenty-eight peers elected for life, on the union with Ireland. After such innovations, no one could say that any further extension of the elective franchise would be new or unheard of; but he objected to the Reform of the House of Lords, on the ground that he had not heard of any plan of Reform of which the benefit would be commensurate with the difficulty of effecting it. This is the opinion of a Lord. Mr Newton Fellowes had no scruples about reforming the Lords. Before the Reform Bill passed, he was convinced that it could not work without a Reform of the Lords. He proposed that they should make an experiment by holding a county meeting, and signifying their wishes to the Lords to adopt certain measures, which they had thought proper to reject. "If they set themselves up against your representatives and against you as a body, I say then, that, if petitions will not do, state to your Representatives that you wish to go further." This, from the brother and heir apparent of an Earl, is spirited and deserving of commendation. We need hardly remark that the expression of the opinion that the Reform of the Peerage was the only remedy for evils—the only means by which the advance of liberty and good government could be secured—was received by the meeting with vehement and protracted cheering.

At a meeting of the Reformers of South Devon, held on the 16th December., Sir W. Molesworth, advocated with great power the Ballot. He complained that, although the majority of the supporters of Government are in favour of the Ballot, and several of the Members of the Cabinet pledged to it, yet twice have the Ministry joined the Tories in rejecting the measure. He asked if these were the principles of solid union, if such conduct was fair, after the Liberals had struggled and laboured for union, night after night, when the slightest apathy or indifference would have proved fatal. Was it to be tolerated that Ministers should join with their worst foes in opposition to their only true friends? He maintained that, if members of the Cabinet were forced to vote against their real sentiments, they must be forced to relinquish their seats for real constituencies, and resort to those places which are still the sinks of the ancient borough system.

Mr Raikes Currie, a Liberal of the true stamp, has been invited to oppose Mr Charles Ross, the Tory whipper-in, at next election for Northampton. He is opposed to restrictions on trade and to the Corn Laws: he is the advocate of the Ballot, Triennial Parliaments, Household Suffrage, and Reform of the Lords. He will support the Whigs as long as they act honestly and fairly: but, if they do not, "it matters little. Great occasions create if they do not find great men. The people will range themselves under other leaders; and then the Whigs may perish—but the Reform Bill is eternal."

THE BANK.—The bullion continues to ooze out of the Bank's coffers. Every return for several months past has shewn a greater deficiency than the preceding. The return of 15th December, although 200,000 sovereigns has been received from the Bank of France, is £388,000 lower than the return of the preceding month. The exchanges have, however, now improved; and it is to be hoped the drain will stop. Consols for the account have risen to 88¼.

Trial by jury in civil causes, for which the people of Scotland have always had a great, and, in our opinion, a well-founded aversion, has received a severe blow in England by the verdict pronounced in the case of Mr Fraser against Mr Berkeley. The whole compensation given for one of the most atrocious and brutal assaults on record is £100! Did the circumstance that the plaintiff was a tradesman and the defendant an aristocrat, operate on the jury?

The London University has at length obtained a charter, enabling it to confer degrees. The rage of the Tories is in consequence unbounded.

COUNTY POLICE.—We are glad to observe that it is in the contemplation of the Government to establish a rural police in England; but we hope that care will be taken how it is organized, and under whose direction it is placed. To give the Home Secretary, or any other Ministerial official, the control of such a force, would be to place an army not sanctioned by Parliament, in the hands of Government. The establishment of such a force must be preceded by giving a constitution to the counties, similar to that which boroughs now possess. Let every one who contributes to county rates, have a vote in the election of the lord-lieutenant, justices, collectors of taxes, and other local authorities, including the superintendent or head of the rural police. By this means, more than any other within the power of the legislature, the Toryism of the counties will be weakened. But, until the people of the counties have the same control over their own affairs as that possessed by the inhabitants of burghs, the appointment of any county police should be resisted to the utmost. We have only to point to Ireland to shew what an intolerable nuisance such a police, if not properly administered, might, or we ought rather to say, will become.

TITHE COMMUTATION.—Nothing is sufficiently great to satiate, and nothing sufficiently small to elude the grasp of our aristocracy. Not content with compelling the people to purchase what they have to sell—food—at an exorbitant price, they have ransacked the statute book, and having rid themselves of the tax on husbandry horses, shepherds' dogs, insurance on farm buildings and stock, and every other direct tax, they have had the meanness, in the late Act for Commutation of Tithes, to insert a clause for exempting advertisements relative to tithe commutations from payment of advertisement duty. By this exemption, the landlords in each parish of England and Wales, will be enabled to save—that is, to defraud the public of—1s. 6d.! We will venture to say that this piece of meanness is without parellel.

SCOTLAND.

THE CLERGY.—The question of the annuity tax continues to excite considerable interest in Edinburgh. The clergy, with Dr. Chalmers at their head, are standing up manfully for the last shilling the tax will yield; and they indignantly repudiate having the seat rents assigned to them as part of the security for their stipends. The Town Council, on the other hand, backed by the citizens, shew no disposition to yield, and have published a statement, shewing that, if the clergy collected the last shilling of the revenues appropriated to them, they would not receive above £450 each, whereas they refused £500 a year tendered to them by the Town Council with ample security some years ago. We advise the Edinburgh clergy to consider that their brethren in Glasgow receive only £420 a-year; that there are very few country parishes in which the stipend has of late years been £250; and to look to the situation in which the Irish Clergy have placed themselves by their rapacity. We will venture to prophesy that disputes between the clergy and their flocks, or rather the flocks of the Dissenting clergy, about money matters, is likely to have the same result as the bargain with the sybil; and we shall be surprised if the Edinburgh Clergy ever again receive £500 a-year of stipend under the annuity tax system. Notwithstanding that they have still the right of imprisonment, of which all other creditors were deprived, in the case of small debts, by a late statute, we doubt whether they will again venture to resort to a remedy repudiated by public opinion.

COALS.—In all parts of Scotland, a great scarcity of fuel has existed for some months past, caused, as is shrewdly suspected, by a combination of the coal masters. The consumption in Glasgow exceeds in value £300,000 a-year, and the price is double what it was last year. An association has in consequence been formed for discovering and working new seams of coal in the vicinity of that city. It has already had the effect of reducing the price of coals. In order to punish the combined coal-masters, we strongly recommend the use of Newcastle coals, which only require a fair trial to convince any one that they are, at the present relative price, much more economical than the best Scotch coals. It has been satisfactorily ascertained, in iron making, that three quarters of a ton of Newcastle coals are equal to one ton of Scotch coals; and, for economical purposes, we are satisfied that the difference is much greater.

PARISH ROADS.—Numerous complaints exist as to the manner in which parish roads are maintained, and in regard to the administration of the funds. Those who contribute the whole money have not the slightest control over its expenditure, and are never even informed what is done with their money. The tax is levied according to the number of horses, or more generally ploughs, kept by each inhabitant of the parish; and a land proprietor, if non-resident, does not pay anything. The proprietors, however, have the sole control of the collections. The consequence is, that the funds, instead of being employed usefully for the parish, are expended in improving the roads running through the properties of the most influential proprietors; and the grossest encroachments on the parochial roads, if made by such a proprietor are overlooked. We know, for example, one instance of a proprietor—who calls himself a Liberal too—in the parish of Athelstaneford, in East Lothian, having drawn a wall across nearly one-half of the public road at his porter's lodge, to give the road the appearance of an approach to his own mansion; and that encroachment has remained for years unchallenged—his neighbour landlords not being resident, and taking no interest in the matter. We believe that, in every parish, similar encroachments and gross mismanagement of the funds could be pointed out.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY.—A schism has arisen in the Church with regard to the Moderatorship of next Assembly. Dr Lee, who, it was understood, had been agreed on by all parties, though a Tory, is not sufficiently rabid for some of our Churchmen, though affecting to hold Liberal opinions; and hence, Dr Gardiner, a man according to their own mind, has been set up in opposition. It is a very pretty quarrel, and there is little doubt that odium theologicum will not be absent on either side.

The Lord Advocate Murray has met his constituents at Leith, but has given little satisfaction. He is one of the Whigs who would be the better of a little leisure to study such questions as the Ballot, Triennial Parliaments, Church Rates, the Pension List, and the Voluntary System. Lord William Bentinck is in a similar predicament, and must make up his mind to give way to a more Liberal representative at next election. He is for quinquennial Parliaments, reforming the House of Lords by making more Peers, and has rather a short memory regarding the proceedings of Parliament on the Pension List, Tithes, &c. Poor Lord Dalmeny is, however, still more to be pitied; his constituents at Dunfermline not having hesitated to pass a vote of censure on him before his face. His abortive attempt to answer Mr Grote's speech last session on the Ballot has not been forgotten. Sir Henry Parnell also was anything but well received at Dundee; and, on the whole, it may be stated that such of the Scottish Whig Members as have ventured to render an account of their stewardship to their constituents, have met with but an indifferent reception. If they wish to keep their seats they must move forward with the progress of public opinion.

Mr Feargus O'Connor addressed a numerous meeting, principally of the working classes, in the Cowgate Chapel, Edinburgh, on the evening of the 14th December. The principal topics of his address were Universal Suffrage, the Ballot, Reform of the Peers, and the Voluntary System. He was listened to with the utmost attention and repeatedly cheered during his speech, which lasted upwards of two hours. He speaks with great readiness, and occasionally with much eloquence. Nearly 3000 persons were present. Mr O'Connor is on a tour of agitation through the Scottish towns.

EAST LOTHIAN.—A requisition has been got up to Lord Ramsay to stand as candidate for this county at next election, against Mr Ferguson of Raith. As was to be expected, the Tories have made up their differences and united in their opposition. We believe, however, that, although the contest will be severe, Mr Ferguson will carry his election; the only thing that can defeat him will be the want of the Ballot. Here, as elsewhere, many of the tenantry of Tory landlords neither see the expediency, nor indeed the morality of supporting Whiggery, at the expense of ruin to themselves and families. A quarter of a century of Tory denomination could do them less ill than their landlords could in a few months; and it cannot be expected that the electors are to fight defenceless, for those who are to derive the benefit, and yet withhold the shield.

IRELAND.

The National Association have unanimously passed a resolution against Lord Lyndhurst, which must render it difficult for him ever to hold office as a minister, it was moved by Mr Boyce, a Protestant gentleman of large fortune in Wexford, and seconded by Mr O'Connell:—"That it having been ascertained that Lord Baron Lyndhurst has asserted in his place, as a Member of Parliament, that the great and overwhelming majority of the Irish prople, are aliens in blood, aliens in language, and aliens in religion from the British people, we deem it a sacred duty, solemnly, and in the face of the entire British nation, to proclaim our deep convictiion, that the said Lord Lyndhurst is an enemy, at one and the same time, to the peace of Ireland, to the stability of the connection between these countries, to the liberty of the people, and to the safety of the throne."

Another victim has been sacrificed to the Moloch of tithes. Patrick Dwyer, who was imprisoned for tithes due to the Rev. Mr Coote, a clergyman of Kildare, lately died in jail. An immense funeral procession attended his corpse from Dublin to Kildare. Dwyer has left a wife and family, for whom we hope the Establishment will provide.

The proceedings of the Irish Court of Exchequer in issuing writs of rebellion for the recovery of tithes has been established to be erroneous, the defenders not having received the various notices prior to the issuing of the writ to which they were, by law and immemorial practice, entitled. The consequences of this blunder to the clergymen, on whose suit the writs were issued, will be most serious. Several hundreds of such writs have been issued, lives have been sacrificed in executing them, sales have taken place, and numerous persons have been imprisoned in virtue of them. All the persons aggrieved, have, of course, good actions for damages against the plaintiffs.

Several attempts have been made to effect tithe sales during the month; but in not a single instance has any article been sold. During the last 18 months, upwards of 20,000 persons have been prosecuted for non-payment of Tither.

The run on the Irish Banks has stopped. A letter from Mr O'Connell, as Governor of the National Bank, had a considerable effect in producing this result. The run appears to have originated with the Tories, for a political purpose.

The O'Connell Subscription raised in Great Britain to assist in defraying the expenses incurred by the Dublin election petition, has been closed, and the net amount remitted to Mr O'Connell is £8.429:15:2. The Justice rent amounts to from £300 to £400 a-week. The Tory tactics, of defeating their antagonists, by involving them in expense, are not therefore likely to be attended with success. The Dublin Election cost the Carlton Club purse £46,000, the greater proportion of which was expended in bribery.

THE CONTINENT.

FRANCE.—The conquest of Algiers is likely to prove as troublesome and expensive to France as most of our colonies are to Britain. To secure its quiet possession, the French have thought it necessary to occupy a large portion of the surrounding country; and an expedition was fitted out to take the town of Constantine. The army, however, partly from the inclemency of the weather, became completely disorganized on the route, plundered the baggage, and, on their arrival at Constantine, finding the Arabs prepared for resistance, after an ineffectual attempt to take the place by a coup de main, commenced a retreat, which proved most disastrous. It is admitted, in the French official account, that, of 7000 men, who formed the expedition, only 4000 reached Constantine; but how many returned we are not told. The French, however, seem to have run imminent danger of being actually cut off by the Arab horse, of whom from 10,000 to 12,000 were in pursuit. This defeat, so unlooked for, has produced the utmost sensation in Paris, and will, in all probability, prove fatal to the present Ministry, and we trust also to the dynasty of Louis Philippe. As is well known, he is no favourite with the army, and the recent disaster will not add to his popularity. Prince Polignac, having been released from Ham two years before his period of imprisonment expired, has come to England. He has been graciously received at Court, and is feted by our nobility. Fieschi lost his head, although he did not commit a crime of one-tenth of the atrocity of that perpetrated by Polignac; for, if one or two lives were sacrificed by the former, thousands fell victims to the policy of the latter. But our aristocracy sympathize with Polignac in his sufferings, while they execrate the memory of Fieschi. There is yet a chapter in the criminal code to be written—the penalties of treason by rulers against the people.

SPAIN.—The accounts from Spain are so contradictory that it is useless to report them. One day Gomez is in full retreat: next day Madrid is alarmed lest he make a dash upon the city. Bilboa appears, however, to make a serious resistance, greater than the miserable troops arrayed against it can overcome.

PORTUGAL.—There appears every reason to believe that Don Miguel is about to make another attempt to regain the throne of Portugal. We hope the Portuguese will be allowed this time to fight the matter fairly out, without the interference of any of those condottieri, who are so ready, like Dugald Dalgetty, to join in any quarrel for pay and rations. We are strongly inclined to think that every country has as good a government as the people, taken generally, deserve; and that tyranny, as it is the consequence, so it is at the same time the just punishment of pusillanimity.

HOLLAND.—The Dutch Government has been forced to admit its inability to discharge its pecuniary engagements regularly. This is the result of his Majesty of Holland's obstinacy on the Belgian question.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

Van Buren, who adopts generally the same policy, especially on the banking question, as General Jackson, we are happy to observe, is likely to be the new President. The pressure on the money market still continues, though with less severity. The surplus revenue of the Government continues to increase, and measures are in progress to effect its distribution among the different States, in proportion to the number of members each state sends to Congress.

TRADE AND MANUFACTURES.

We regret to state that, for the last few weeks, the accounts from the manufacturing districts have been far from favourable. We hope that the prosperity, which has existed for a longer period than at any time during the present century, has not terminated. The state of the currency, joined with the portentous aspect of the political horizon, has induced both buyers and sellers to contract their business as much as possible; while the operatives, pressed by a higher price of food than they have been for many years accustomed to, are making every effort to obtain a rise of wages, precisely when the diminished profits of their masters render them unable, or, at least, most reluctant to comply with their demands. Hence strikes, throwing thousands of workmen idle, have taken place in various branches of trade. The iron masters have been among the first to take alarm. At a meeting of the Welsh iron masters, held at Newpool, on the 3d. December, it was determined to blow out twenty-one furnaces in South Wales, and otherwise to reduce the manufacture one-fifth from the 15th December to the 31st March next. The Scotch iron masters have come to a similar resolution; so that, including the twenty-nine furnaces already out of blast in Staffordshire and Shropshire, there will be no fewer than sixty blast furnaces extinguished for three months certain, and a consequent reduction in the quantity of iron produced, of 4500 tons a-week.

Another symptom of the bad feeling of the operatives in England is, the incendiary fires which have taken place. On the 10th December the extensive cotton factory of Messrs Faulkner & Owen, Manchester, was discovered to be on fire; but the spectators, instead of assisting the firemen, "manifested their fiendish glee at the progress of destruction, by loudly cheering whenever a falling wall gave indication that the fire was still doing its work." The proprietors of this factory had quarrelled with their regular workmen and had engaged new hands, to protect whom they had been obliged to quarter them in the building.

AGRICULTURE.

The accounts of the crops this year, now that time has been allowed to judge of their quantity and quality, is the most lamentable that has occurred during our experience. To avoid any charge of exaggeration, we shall confine ourselves to copying the reports of our provincial contemporaries. From Fifeshire, it is stated, under date, 30th November, that very little wheat has been sown—not one-tenth of the usual breadth—and from the wetness of the ground, much must remain for spring sowing, it being impossible to plough the bean land; and the potato land generally is also in a very damp state. The last crop of wheat has turned out not much more than half an average, and barley is also deficient. Oats, in point of quantity, are abundant; but that crop, as well as beans, peas, and potatoes, have suffered severely by the rains, winds, and frost. From Kincardineshire, it is reported, the young wheat does not look well; the deficiency of grain and pulse crops is great, and potatoes have received much damage. The account from Strathmore is not more favourable. In all the higher districts of Scotland, much of the crops remained in the field, and there were even considerable patches unshorn in the beginning of December. Taking it altogether, this is one of the latest, most expensive, and deficient harvests we have had for many years. In Inverness-shire, the crop is said to have proved a complete failure. Prices can hardly fail to rise during spring; and should dear food and low wages be combined, the questions of the Reform of the Lords and Extension of the Suffrage will be discussed in a more efficient and more intelligible manner than they have hitherto been.

Meanwhile, the Corn Laws are marked out for popular vengeance. An Association, at the head of which is Mr Hume, Colonel Thompson, Mr Roebuck, and several other Members of Parliament, has been formed for their repeal; and throughout the country, the spirit of hostility, which the low prices of late years had laid dormant, is again exhibiting itself. All the efforts of the aristocracy will not be able to maintain the laws against the importation of food in their present state; and the sooner they are abolished, it will be the better for all parties.

AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF AN ENGLISH OPIUM-EATER.

LITERARY CONNEXIONS OR ACQUAINTANCES.

It was in the year 1801, whilst yet at school, that I made my first literary acquaintance. This was with a gentleman now dead, and little, at any time, known in the literary world; indeed, not at all; for his authorship was confined to a department of religious literature as obscure and as narrow in its influence as any that can be named—viz. Swedenborgianism. Already, on the bare mention of that word, a presumption arises against any man, that, writing much (or writing at all) for a body of doctrines so apparently crazy as those of Mr Swedenborg, a man must have bid adieu to all good sense and manliness of mind. Indeed, this is so much of a settled case, that even to have written against Mr Swedenborg would be generally viewed as a suspicious act, requiring explanation, and not very easily admitting of it. Mr Swedenborg I call him, because I understand that his title to call himself "Baron" is imaginary; or rather he never did call himself by any title of honour—that mistake having originated amongst his followers in this country who have chosen to designate him as the "Honourable" and as the "Baron" Swedenborg, by way of translating, to the ear of England, some one or other of those irrepresentable distinctions—Legations Rath, Hofrath, &c.—which are tossed about with so much profusion in the courts of continental Europe, on both sides the Baltic. For myself, I cannot think myself qualified to speak of any man's writings without a regular examination of some one or two among those which his admirers regard as his best performances. Yet, as any happened to fall in my way, I have looked into them; and the impression left upon my mind was certainly not favourable to their author. They laboured, to my feeling, with two opposite qualities of annoyance, but which I believe not uncommonly found united in lunatics—excessive dulness or matter-of-factness in the execution, with excessive extravagance in the conceptions. The result, at least, was most unhappy; for, of all writers, Swedenborg is the only one I ever heard of who has contrived to strip even the shadowy world beyond the grave of all its mystery and all its awe. From the very heaven of heavens, he has rent away the veil; no need for seraphs to "tremble while they gaze;" for the familiarity with which all objects are invested, makes it impossible that even poor mortals should find any reason to tremble. Until I saw this book, I had not conceived it possible to carry an atmosphere so earthy, and steaming with the vapours of earth, into regions which, by early connexion in our infant thoughts with the sanctities of death, have a hold upon the reverential affections such as they rarely lose. In this view, I should conceive that Swedenborg, if it were at all possible for him to become a popular author, would, at the same time, become immensely mischievous. He would dereligionize men beyond all other authors whatsoever.

Little could this character of Swedenborg's writings—this, indeed, least of all—have been suspected from the temper, mind, or manners of my new friend. He was the most spiritual-looking, the most saintly in outward aspect, of all human beings whom I have known throughout life. He was rather tall, pale, and thin; the most unfleshly, the most of a sublimated spirit dwelling already more than half in some purer world, that a poet could have imagined. He was already aged when I first knew him—a clergyman of the Church of England; which may seem strange in connexion with his Swedenborgianism, but he was however so. He was rector of a large parish in a large town, the more active duties of which parish were discharged by his curate; but much of the duties within the church were still discharged by himself, and with such exemplary zeal that his parishioners, afterwards celebrating the fiftieth anniversary, or golden jubilee of his appointment to the living, (the twenty-fifth anniversary is called in Germany the silver—the fiftieth, the golden jubilee,) went farther than is usual, in giving a public expression and a permanent shape to their sentiments of love and veneration. I am surprised, on reflection, that this venerable clergyman should have been unvexed by Episcopal censures. He might, and I dare say would, keep back the grosser parts of Swedenborg's views from a public display; but, in one point, it would not be easy for a man so conscientious to make a compromise between his ecclesiastical duty and his private belief; for I have since found, though I did not then know it, that Swedenborg held a very peculiar creed on the article of atonement. From the slight pamphlet which let me into this secret I could not accurately collect the exact distinctions of his creed; but it was very different from that of the English Church.

However, my friend continued unvexed for a good deal more than fifty years, enjoying that peace, external as well as internal, which, by so eminent a title, belonged to a spirit so evangelically meek and dove-like. I mention him chiefly for the sake of describing his interesting house and household, so different from all which belong to this troubled age, and his impressive style of living. The house seemed almost monastic; and yet it stood in the centre of one of the largest, busiest, noisiest towns in England; and the whole household seemed to have stepped out of their places in some Vandyke, or even some Titian picture, from a forgotten century and another climate. On knocking at the door, which of itself seemed an outrage to the spirit of quietness which brooded over the place, you were received by an ancient man-servant in the sober livery which belonged traditionally to Mr Cl——'s family; for he was of a gentleman's descent, and had had the most finished education of a gentleman. This venerable old butler put me in mind always, by his noiseless steps, of the Castle of Indolence, where the porter or usher walked about in shoes that were shod with felt, lest any rude echoes might be roused. An ancient housekeeper was equally venerable, equally gentle in her deportment, quiet in her movements, and inaudible in her tread. One or other of these upper domestics—for the others rarely crossed my path—ushered me always into some room expressing, by its furniture, its pictures, and its coloured windows, the solemn tranquillity which, for half a century, had reigned in that mansion. Among the pictures were more than one of St. John, the beloved apostle, by Italian masters. Neither the features nor the expression were very wide of Mr Cl——'s own countenance; and, had it been possible to forget the gross character of Swedenborg's reveries, or to substitute for these fleshly dreams the awful visions of the Apocalypse, one might have imagined easily that the pure, saintly, and childlike evangelist had been once again recalled to this earth—and that this most quiet of mansions was some cell in the island of Patmos. Whence came the stained glass of the windows, I know not; and whether it were stained or painted. The revolutions of that art are known from Horace Walpole's account; and, nine years after this period, I found that, in Birmingham, where the art of staining glass was chiefly practised, no trifling sum was charged even for a vulgar lacing of no great breadth round a few drawing-room windows, which one of my friends thought fit to introduce as an embellishment. These windows, however, of my clerical friend were really "storied windows," having Scriptural histories represented upon them. A crowning ornament to the library or principal room, was a sweet-toned organ, ancient, and elaborately carved in its wood-work, at which my venerable friend readily sate down, and performed the music of anthems as often as I asked him—sometimes accompanying it with his voice, which was tremulous from old age, but neither originally unmusical, nor (as might be perceived) untrained.

Often, from the storms and uproars of this world, I have looked back upon this most quiet and I believe most innocent abode, (had I said saintly, I should hardly have erred,) connecting it in thought with Little Gidding, the famous mansion (in Huntingdonshire, I believe) of the Farrers—an interesting family in the reigns of James I. and Charles I. Of the Farrers there is a long and circumstantial biographical account, and of the conventual discipline maintained at Little Gidding. For many years, it was the rule at Gidding—and it was the wish of the Farrers to have transmitted that practice through succeeding centuries—that a musical or cathedral service should be going on at every hour of night and day in the chapel of the mansion. Let the traveller, at what hour he would, morning or evening, summer or winter, and in what generation or century soever, happen to knock at the gate of Little Gidding, it was the purpose of Nicholas Farrer—a sublime purpose—that always he should hear the blare of the organ, sending upwards its surging volumes of melody, God's worship for ever proceeding, anthems of praise for ever ascending, and jubilates echoing without end or known beginning. One stream of music, in fact, never intermitting, one vestal fire of devotional praise and thanksgiving, was to connect the beginnings with the ends of generations, and to link one century into another. Allowing for the sterner asceticism of N. Farrer—partly arising out of the times, partly out of personal character, and partly, perhaps, out of his travels in Spain—my aged friend's arrangement of the day, and the training of his household, might seem to have been modelled on the plans of Mr Farrer, whom, however, he might never have heard of. There was also, in each house, the same union of religion with some cultivation of the ornamental arts, or some expression of respect for them. In each case, a monastic severity, that might, under other circumstances, have terminated in the gloom of a La Trappe, had been softened, by English sociality, and by the habits of a gentleman's education, into a devotional pomp, reconcilable with Protestant views. When, however, remembering this last fact in Mr Cl——'s case, (the fact I mean of his liberal education,) I have endeavoured to explain the possibility of one so much adorned by all the accomplishments of a high-bred gentleman, and one so truly pious, falling into the grossness—almost the sensuality—which appears to besiege the visions of Swedenborg—I fancy that the whole may be explained out of the same cause which occasionally may be descried, through a distance of two complete centuries, as weighing heavily upon the Farrers—viz. the dire monotony of daily life, when visited by no irritations either of hope or fear—no hopes from ambition, no fears from poverty. Nearly (if not quite) sixty years did my venerable friend inhabit the same parsonage house, without any incident more personally interesting to himself than a cold or a sore throat. And I suppose that he resorted to Swedenborg—reluctantly, perhaps, at the first—as to a book of fairy tales connected with his professional studies. And one thing I am bound to add in candour, which may have had its weight with him, that, more than once, on casually turning over a volume of Swedenborg, I have certainly found most curious and felicitous passages of comment—passages which extracted a brilliant meaning from numbers, circumstances, or trivial accidents, apparently without significance or object, and gave to things, without a place or a habitation in the critic's regard, a value as hieroglyphics or cryptical cyphers, which struck me as elaborately ingenious. This acknowledgment I make not so much in praise of Swedenborg, whom I must still continue to think a madman, as in excuse for Mr Cl——. It may easily be supposed that a person of Mr Cl——'s consideration and authority was not regarded with indifference by the general body of the Swedenborgians. At his motion it was, I believe, that a society was formed for procuring and encouraging a translation into English of Swedenborg's entire works, most of which are written in Latin. Several of these translations are understood to have been executed personally by Mr Cl——; and in this obscure way, for anything I know, he may have been an extensive author. But it shews the upright character of the man, that never, in one instance, did he seek to bias my opinions in this direction. Upon every other subject, he trusted me confidentially—and, notwithstanding my boyish years, (15–16,) as his equal. His regard for me, when thrown by accident in his way, had arisen upon his notice of my fervent simplicity, and my unusual thoughtfulness. Upon these merits, I had gained the honourable distinction of a general invitation to his house, without exception as to days and hours, when few others could boast of any admission at all. The common ground on which we met was literature—more especially the Greek and Roman literature; and much he exerted himself, in a spirit of the purest courtesy, to meet my animation upon these themes. But the interest on his part was too evidently a secondary interest in me for whom he talked, and not in the subject: he spoke much from memory, as it were of things that he had once felt, and little from immediate sympathy with the author; and his animation was artificial, though his courtesy, which prompted the effort, was the truest and most unaffected possible. The connexion between us must have been interesting to an observer; for, though I cannot say with Wordsworth of old Daniel and his grandson, that there were "ninety good years of fair and foul weather" between us, there were, however, sixty, I imagine, at the least; whilst, as a bond of connexion, there was nothing at all that I know of beyond a common tendency to reverie, which is a bad link for a social connexion. The little ardour, meantime, with which he had, for many years, participated in the interests of this world or all that it inherits, was now rapidly departing. Daily and consciously he was loosening all ties which bound him to earlier recollections: and in particular, I remember—because the instance was connected with my last farewell visit as it proved—that for some time he was engaged daily in renouncing with solemnity, (though often enough in cheerful words,) book after book of classical literature, in which he had once taken particular delight. Several of these, after taking his final glance at a few passages to which a pencil reference in the margin pointed his eye, he delivered to me as memorials in time to come of himself. The last of the books given to me under these circumstances, was a Greek "Odyssey" in Clarke's edition. "This," said he, "is nearly the sole book remaining to me of my classical library—which, for some years, I have been dispersing amongst my friends. Homer I retained to the last, and the 'Odyssey' by preference to the 'Iliad,' both in compliance with my own taste, and because this very copy was my chosen companion for evening amusement during my freshman's term at Trinity College, Cambridge—whither I went early in the spring of 1748. Your own favourite Grecian is Euripides; but still you must value—we must all value—Homer. I even, old as I am, could still read him with delight; and as long as any merely human composition ought to occupy my time, I should have made an exception in behalf of this solitary author. But I am a soldier of Christ; the enemy, the last enemy, cannot be far off; sarcinas colligere is, at my age, the watchword for every faithful sentinel, hourly to keep watch and ward, to wait, and to be vigilant. This very day, I have taken my farewell glance at Homer; for I must no more be found seeking my pleasure amongst the works of man; and, that I may not be tempted to break my resolution, I make over this my last book to you." Words to this effect, uttered with his usual solemnity, accompanied his gift; and, at the same time, he added, without any separate comment, a little pocket Virgil—the one edited by Alexander Cunningham, the bitter antagonist of Bentley—with a few annotations placed at the end. The act was in itself a solemn one; something like taking the veil for a nun—a final abjuration of the world's giddy agitations. And yet to him—already and for so long a time linked so feebly to anything that could be called the world, and living in a seclusion so profound—it was but as if an anchorite should retire from his outer to his inner cell. Me, however, it impressed powerfully in after years; because this act of self-dedication to the next world, and of parting from the intellectual luxuries of this, was also, in fact, though neither of us at the time knew it to be such, the scene of his final parting with myself.

Immediately after his solemn speech on presenting me with the "Odyssey," he sat down to the organ, sang a hymn or two, then chanted part of the liturgy, and finally, at my request, performed the anthem so well known in the English Church service—the collect for the seventh Sunday after Trinity—(Lord of all power and might, &c.) It was summer—about half after nine in the evening; the light of day was still lingering, and just strong enough to illuminate the Crucifixion, the Stoning of the Protomartyr, and other grand emblazonries of the Christian faith, which adorned the rich windows of his library. Knowing the early hours of his household, I now received his usual fervent adieus—which, without the words, had the sound and effect of a benediction—felt the warm pressure of his hand, saw dimly the outline of his venerable figure, more dimly his saintly countenance, and quitted that gracious presence, which, in this world, I was destined no more to revisit. The night was one in the first half of July 1802; in the second half of which, or very early in August, I quitted school clandestinely, and consequently the neighbourhood of Mr Cl——. Some years after, I saw his death announced in all the public journals, as having occurred at Leamington Spa, then in the springtime of its medicinal reputation. Farewell, early friend! holiest of men whom it has been my lot to meet! Yes, I repeat, thirty-five years are past since then, and I have yet seen few men approaching to this venerable clergyman in paternal benignity—none certainly in child-like purity, apostolic holiness, or in perfect alienation of heart from the spirit of this fleshly world.

I have delineated the habits and character of Mr Cl—— at some length, chiefly because a connexion is rare and interesting between parties so widely asunder in point of age—one a schoolboy, and the other almost an octogenarian: to quote a stanza from one of the most spiritual sketches of Wordsworth—

> We talked with open heart and tongue,
> Affectionate and free—
> A pair of friends, though I was young
> And Matthew seventy-three.

I have stated a second reason for this record, in the fact that Mr Cl—— was the first of my friends who had any connexion with the press. At one time I have reason to believe that this connexion was pretty extensive, though not publicly avowed; and so far from being lucrative, that at first I believe it to have been expensive to him; and whatever profits might afterwards arise, were applied, as much of his regular income, to the benefit of others. Here, again, it seems surprising that a spirit so beneficent, and, in the amplest sense, charitable, could coalesce in any views with Swedenborg, who, in some senses, was not charitable. Swedenborg had been scandalized by a notion which, it seems, he found prevalent amongst the poor of the Continent—viz., that, if riches were a drag and and a negative force on the road to religious perfection, poverty must be a positive title per se to the favour of Heaven. Grievously offended with this error, he came almost to hate poverty as a presumptive indication of this offensive heresy; scarcely would he allow it an indirect value, as removing in many cases the occasions or incitements of evil. No: being in itself neutral and indifferent, he argued that it had become erroneously a ground of presumptuous hope; whilst the rich man, aware of his danger, was, in some degree, armed against it by fear and humility. And, in this course of arguing and of corresponding feeling, Mr Swedenborg had come to hate the very name of a poor candidate for Heaven as bitterly as a sharking attorney hates the applications of a pauper client. Yet so entirely is it true, that "to the pure all things are pure," and that perfect charity "thinketh no ill," but is gifted with a power to transmute all things into its own resemblance—so entirely is all this true, that this most spiritual, and, as it were, disembodied of men, could find delight in the dreams of the very "fleshliest incubus" that has intruded amongst heavenly objects; and, secondly, this benignest of men found his own pure feelings not outraged by one who threw a withering scowl over the far larger half of his fellow-creatures.

Concurrently with this acquaintance, so impressive and so elevating to me, from the unusual sanctity of Mr Cl——'s character, I formed another with a well-known coterie, more avowedly, and in a more general sense, literary, resident at Liverpool or its neighbourhood. In my sixteenth year, I had accompanied my mother and family on a summer's excursion to Everton, a well-known village upon the heights immediately above Liverpool; though by this time I believe it has thrown out so many fibres of connexion as to have become a mere quarter or suburban "process," (to speak by anatomical phrase,) of the great town below it. In those days, however, distant by one-third of a century from ours, Everton was still a distinct village, (for a mile of ascent is worth three of level ground in the way of effectual separation;) it was delightfully refreshed by marine breezes, though raised above the sea so far that its thunders could be heard only under favourable circumstances. There we had a cottage for some months; and the nearest of our neighbours happened to be that Mr Clarke the banker, to whom acknowledgments are made in the Lorenzo the Magnificent for aid in procuring M.SS. and information from Italy. This gentleman called on my mother, merely in the general view of offering neighbourly attentions to a family of strangers. I, as the eldest of my brothers, and already with strong literary propensities, had received a general invitation to his house. Thither I went, indeed, early and late; and there I met Mr Roscoe, Dr Currie, (who had just at that time published his Life and Edition of Burns,) and Mr Shepherd of Gatacre, the author of some works on Italian literature, (particularly a Life of Poggio Bracciolini,) and since then well known to all England by his

Reform politics. There were other members of this society—some, like myself, visiters merely to that neighbourhood; but those I have mentioned were the chief. Here I had an early opportunity of observing the natural character and tendencies of merely literary society—by which society I mean all such as, having no strong distinctions in power of thinking or in native force of character, are yet raised into circles of pretension and mark, by the fact of having written a book, or of holding a notorious connexion with some department or other of the periodical press. No society is so vapid and uninteresting in its natural quality, none so cheerless and petrific in its influence upon others. Ordinary people, in such company, are in general repressed from uttering with cordiality the natural expression of their own minds or temperaments, under a vague feeling of some peculiar homage due, or at least customarily paid to those lions: such people are no longer at their ease, or masters of their own natural motions in their own natural freedom; whilst indemnification of any sort is least of all to be looked for from the literary dons who have diffused this unpleasant atmosphere of constraint. They disable others, and yet do nothing themselves to fill up the void they have created. One and all—unless by accident people of unusual originality, power, and also nerve, so as to be able without trepidation to face the expectations of men—the literary class labour under two opposite disqualifications for a good tone of conversation. From causes visibly explained, they are either spoiled by the vices of reserve, and of over-consciousness directed upon themselves—this is one extreme; or, where manliness of mind has prevented this, beyond others of equal or inferior natural power, they are apt to be desperately commonplace. The first defect is an accident arising out of the rarity of literary pretensions; and would rapidly subside as the proportion became larger of practising literati to the mass of educated people. But the other is an adjunct scarcely separable from the ordinary prosecution of a literary career, and growing in fact out of literature per se, as literature is generally understood. That same day, says Homer, which makes a man a slave, robs him of half his value. That same hour which first awakens a child to the consciousness of being observed and to the sense of admiration, strips it of its freedom and unpremeditated graces of motion. Awkwardness at the least—and too probably as a consequence of that, affectation and conceit—follow hard upon the consciousness of special notice or admiration. The very attempt to disguise embarrassment, too often issues in a secondary and more marked embarrassment. Another mode of reserve arises with some literary men, who believe themselves to be in possession of novel ideas. Cordiality of communication, or ardour of dispute, might betray them into a revelation of those golden thoughts, sometimes into a necessity of revealing them, since, without such aid, it might be impossible to maintain theirs in the discussion. On this principle it was—a principle of deliberate unsocial reserve—that Adam Smith is said to have governed his conversation: he professed to put a bridle on his words, lest by accident a pearl should drop out of his lips amongst the vigilant bystanders. And in no case would he have allowed himself to be engaged in a disputation, because both the passions of dispute and the necessities of dispute are alike apt to throw men off their guard. A most unamiable reason it certainly is, which places a man in one constant attitude of self-protection against petty larceny. And yet, humiliating as that may be to human nature, the furtive propensities or instincts of petty larceny are diffused most extensively through all ranks—directed, too, upon a sort of property far more tangible and more ignoble as respects the possible motives of the purloiner, than any property in subjects purely intellectual. Rather more than ten years ago, a literary man of the name of Aiton, published, some little time before his own death, a very searching essay upon this chapter of human integrity—arraying a large list of common cases, (cases of hats, gloves, umbrellas, books, newspapers, &c.) where the claim of ownership, left to itself and unsupported by accidents of shame and exposure, appeared to be weak indeed amongst classes of society prescriptively "respectable." And yet, for a double reason, literary larceny is even more to be feared; both because it is countenanced by a less ignoble quality of temptation, and because it is far more easy of achievement—so easy, indeed, that it may be practised without any clear accompanying consciousness. I have myself witnessed or been a party to a case of the following kind:—A new truth—suppose, for example, a new doctrine or a new theory—was communicated to a very able man in the course of conversation, not didactically, or directly as a new truth, but polemically communicated as an argument in the current of a dispute. What followed? Necessarily it followed that a very able man would not be purely passive in receiving this new truth; that he would co-operate with the communicator in many ways—as by raising objections, by half dissipating his own objections, and in a variety of other co-agencies. In such cases, a very clever man does in effect half generate the new idea for himself, but then he does this entirely under your leading; you stand ready at each point of possible deviation, to warn him away from the wrong turn—from the turn which leads nowhither or the turn which leads astray. Yet the final result has been, that the catechumen, under the full consciousness of self-exertion, has so far confounded his just and true belief of having contributed to the evolution of the doctrine quoad his own apprehension of it with the far different case of having evolved the truth itself into light, as to go off with the firm impression that the doctrine had been a product of his own. There is therefore ground enough for the jealousy of Adam Smith, since a robbery may be committed unconsciously; though, by the way, it is not a peril peculiarly applicable to himself, who has not so much succeeded in discovering new truths as in establishing a logical connexion amongst old ones.

On the other hand, it is not by reserve, whether of affectation or of Smithian jealousy, that the majority of literary people offend—at least not by the latter; for, so far from having much novelty to protect against pirates, the most general effect of literary pursuits is to tame down all points of originality to one standard of insipid monotony. I shall not go into the reasons for this. I make my appeal to the matter of fact. Try a Parisian populace, very many of whom are highly cultivated by reading, against a body of illiterate rustics. Mr Scott of Aberdeen, in his "Second Tour to Paris," (1815,) tells us that, on looking over the shoulder of poor stall women selling trifles in the street, he usually found them reading Voltaire, Rousseau, or even (as I think he adds) Montesquieu; but, notwithstanding the polish which such reading both presumes as a previous condition and produces as a natural effect, yet no people could be more lifeless in their minds, or more barren of observing faculties than they; and so he describes them. Words! words! nothing but words! On the other hand, listen to the conversation of a few scandalous village dames collected at a tea-table. Vulgar as the spirit may be which possesses them, and not seldom malicious, still how full of animation and of keen perception it will generally be found, and of a learned spirit of connoisseurship in human character, by comparison with the fade generalities and barren recollections of mere literati!

All this was partially illustrated in the circle to which I was now presented. Mr Clarke was not an author, and he was by much the most interesting person of the whole. He had travelled, and, particularly, he had travelled in Italy—then an aristocratic distinction; had a small but interesting picture gallery; and, at this time, amused himself by studying Greek, for which purpose he and myself met at sunrise every morning through the summer, and read Æschylus together. These meetings, at which we sometimes had the company of any stranger who might happen to be an amateur in Greek, were pleasant enough to my schoolboy vanity—placing me in the position of teacher and guide to men old enough to be my grandfathers. But the dinner parties, at which the literati sometimes assembled in force, were far from being equally amusing. Mr Roscoe was simple and manly in his demeanour; but there was the feebleness of a mere belle-lettrist, a mere man of virtù, in the style of his sentiments on most subjects. Yet he was a politician, took an ardent interest in politics, and wrote upon politics—all which are facts usually presuming some vigour of mind. And he wrote, moreover, on the popular side, and with a boldness which, in that day, when such politics were absolutely disreputable, seemed undeniably to argue great moral courage. But these were accidents arising out of his connexion with the Whig party, or (to speak more accurately) with the Opposition party in Parliament; by whom he was greatly caressed. Mr Fox, the Duchess of Devonshire, Mr Sheridan, and all the powers on that side the question, shewed him him the most marked attention in a great variety of forms; and this it was, not any native propensity for such speculations, which drove him into pamphleteering upon political questions. Mr Fox (himself the very feeblest of party writers) was probably sincere in his admiration of Mr Roscoe's pamphlets; and did seriously think him, as I know that he described him in private letters, an antagonist well matched against Burke; and that he afterwards became in form. The rest of the world wondered at his presumption, or at his gross miscalculation of his own peculiar powers. An eminent person, in after years, (about 1815,) speaking to me of Mr Roscoe's political writings, especially those which had connected his name with Burke, declared that he always felt of him in that relation, not so much as of a feeble man, but absolutely as of a Sporus, (that was his very expression,) or a man emasculated. Right or wrong in his views, he shewed the most painful defect of good sense and prudence in confronting his own understanding, so plain and homely, with the Machiavelian Briareus of a hundred arms—the Titan whom he found in Burke: all the advantages of a living antagonist over a dead one could not compensate odds so fearful in original power.

It was a striking illustration of the impotence of mere literature against natural power and mother wit, that the only man who was considered indispensable in these parties, for giving life and impulse to their vivacity, was a tailor; and not, I was often assured, a person deriving a designation from the craft of those whose labours he supported as a capitalist, but one who drew his own honest daily bread from his own honest needle, except when he laid it aside for the benefit of drooping literati, who needed to be watered with his wit. Wit, perhaps, in a proper sense, he had not—it was rather drollery, and, sometimes, even buffoonery. These, in the lamentable absence of the tailor, could be furnished of an inferior quality by Mr Shepherd, who (as may be imagined from this fact) had but little dignity in private life. I know not how far he might alter in these respects; but, certainly, at that time, (1801–2,) he was decidedly or could be a buffoon; and seemed even ambitious of the title, by courting notice for his grotesque manner and coarse stories, more than was altogether compatible with the pretensions of a scholar and a clergyman. I must have leave to think that such a man could not have emerged from any great university, or from any but a sectarian training. Indeed, about Poggio himself there were circumstances which would have indisposed any regular clergyman of the Church of England or of the Scottish Kirk, to usher him into the literature of his country. With what coarseness and low buffoonery have I heard this Mr Shepherd in these days run down the bishops then upon the bench, but especially those of any public pretensions or reputation, as Horsely and Porteous, and, in connexion with them, the pious Mrs Hannah More! Her he could not endure. . . . . Of this gentleman having said something disparaging, I am bound to go on and add, that I believe him to have been at least a truly upright man—talking often wildly, but incapable of doing a conscious wrong to any man, be his party what it might; and, in the midst of fun or even buffoonery, a real, and, upon occasion, a stern patriot. Mr Canning and others he opposed to the teeth upon the Liverpool hustings; and would take no bribe, as others did, from literary feelings of sympathy, or (which is so hard for an amiable mind to resist) from personal applications of courtesy and respect. Amusing it is to look back upon any political work of Mr Shepherd's, as upon his "Tour to France" in 1815, and to know that the pale pink of his Radicalism was then accounted deep, deep scarlet.

Nothing can better serve to expound the general force of intellect amongst the Liverpool coterie than the quality of their poetry, and the general standard which they set up in poetry. Not that even in their errors, as regarded poetry, they were of a magnitude to establish any standard or authority in their own persons. Imitable or seducing there could be nothing in persons who wrote verses occasionally, and as a παρεργον or by-labour, and were themselves the most timid of imitators. But to me, who, in that year, 1801, already knew of a grand renovation of poetic power—of a new birth in poetry, interesting not so much to England as to the human mind—it was secretly amusing to contrast the little artificial usages of their petty traditional knack, with the natural forms of a divine art—the difference being pretty much as between an American lake, Ontario or Superior, and a carp pond or a tench preserve. Mr Roscoe had just about this time published a translation from the Balia of Luigi Tansillo—a series of dullish lines, with the moral purpose of persuading young women to suckle their own children. The brilliant young Duchess of Devonshire, some half century ago, had, for a frolic—a great lady's caprice—set a precedent in this way; against which, however, in that rank, medical men know that there is a good deal to be said; and in ranks more extensive than those of the Duchess, it must be something of an Irish bull to suppose any general neglect of this duty, since, upon so large a scale, whence could come the vicarious nurses? There is, therefore, no great sense in the fundamental idea of the poem, because the abuse denounced cannot be large enough; but the prefatory sonnet, addressed to the translator's wife, as one at whose maternal breast "six sons successive" had hung in infancy—this is about the one sole bold, natural thought, or natural expression of feeling, to which Mr Roscoe had committed himself in verse. Everywhere else, the most timid and blind servility to the narrowest of conventional usages, conventional ways of viewing things, conventional forms of expression, marks the style. For example, Italy is always Italia, Scotland Scotia, France Gallia;* so inveterately had the mind, in this school of feeling, been trained, alike in the highest things and in the lowest, to a horror of throwing itself boldly upon the great realities of life: even names must be fictions for their taste. Yet what comparison between "France, an Ode," and "Gallia, an Ode?"—Dr Currie was so much occupied with his professional duties, that of him I saw but little. His edition of Burns was just then published, (I think in that very month,) and in everybody's hands. At that time, he was considered not unjust to the memory of the man, and (however constitutionally phlegmatic, or with little enthusiasm, at least in external show) not much below the mark in his appreciation of the poet. So stood matters some twelve or fourteen years; after which period, a "crase" arose on the subject of Burns, which allowed no voice to be heard but that of zealotry and violent partisanship. The first impulse to this arose out of an oblique collision between Lord Jeffrey and Mr Wordsworth; the former having written a disparaging critique upon Burns' pretensions—a little, perhaps, too much coloured by the fastidiousness of long practice in the world, but, in the main, speaking some plain truths on the quality of Burns' understanding, as expressed in his epistolary compositions. Upon which, in his celebrated letter to Mr James Gray, the friend of Burns, himself a poet, and then a master in the High School of Edinburgh, Mr Wordsworth commented with severity, proportioned rather to his personal resentments towards Lord Jeffrey than to the quantity of wrong inflicted upon Burns. Mr Wordsworth's letter, in so far as it was a record of embittered feeling, might have perished; but, as it happened to embody some profound criticisms, applied to the art of biography, and especially to the delicate task of following a man of original genius through his personal infirmities or his constitutional aberrations—this fact, and its relation to Burns and the author's name, have all combined to embalm it. Its momentary effect, in conjunction with Lord Jeffrey's article, was to revive the interest (which, for some time, had languished under the oppression of Sir Walter Scott and Lord Byron) in all that related to Burns. Fresh Lives appeared in a continued succession, until, upon the death of Lord Byron in 1824, Mr Allan Cunningham, who had personally known Burns, so far as a boy could know a mature man, gave a new impulse to the interest, by an impressive paper, in which he contrasted the circumstances of Burns' death with those of Lord Byron's; and also the two funerals—both of which, one altogether, and the other in part, Mr Cunningham had personally witnessed. A man of genius, like Mr Cunningham, throws a new quality of interest upon all which he touches; and having since brought fresh research and the illustrative power of the arts to bear upon the subject, and all this having gone on concurrently with the great modern revolution in literature—that is, the great extension of a popular interest, through the astonishing reductions of price—the result is, that Burns has, at length, become a national, and, therefore, in a certain sense, a privileged subject, which, in a perfect sense, he was not, until the controversial management of his reputation had irritated the public attention. Dr Currie did not address the same alert condition of the public feeling, nor, by many hundred degrees, so diffused a condition of any feeling which might imperfectly exist, as a man must consciously address in these days, whether as the biographer or the critic of Burns. The lower-toned enthusiasm of the public was not of a quality to irritate any little enthusiasm which the worthy Doctor might have felt. The public of that day felt with regard to Burns exactly as with regard to Bloomfield—not the quality of his poems was then the staple of the interest, but the extraordinary fact that a ploughman or a lady's shoemaker should have written any poems at all. The sole difference in the two cases, as regarded by the public of that day, was, that Burns' case was terminated by a premature, and, for the public, a very sudden death: this gave a personal interest to his case, which was wanting in the other; and a direct result of this was, that his executors were able to lay before the world a series of his letters recording his opinions upon a considerable variety of authors, and his feelings under many ordinary occasions of life.

Dr Currie, therefore, if phlegmatic, as he certainly was, must be looked upon as upon a level with the public of his own day—a public how different, different by how many centuries, from the world of this present 1837! One thing I remember which powerfully illustrates the difference. Burns, as we all know, with his peculiarly wild and almost ferocious spirit of independence, came a generation too soon. In this day, he would have been forced to do that, clamorously called upon to do that, and would have found his pecuniary interest in doing that, which in his own generation merely to attempt doing, loaded him with the reproach of Jacobinism. It must be remembered that the society of Liverpool wits, on whom my retrospect is now glancing, were all Whigs—all, indeed, fraternisers with French republicanism. Yet so it was, that—not once, not twice, but daily almost, in the numerous conversations naturally elicited by this Liverpool monument to Burns' memory—I heard every one, clerk or layman, heartily agreeing to tax Burns with ingratitude and with pride falsely directed, because he sate uneasily or restively under the bridle-hand of his noble self-called "patrons." Aristocracy, then—the essential spirit of aristocracy—this I found was not less erect and clamorous amongst partisan democrats—democrats who were such merely in a party sense of supporting his Majesty's Opposition against his Majesty's servants—than it was or could be among the most bigoted of the professed feudal aristocrats. For my part, at this moment, when all the world was reading Currie's monument to the memory of Burns and the support of his family, I felt and avowed my feeling most loudly—that Burns was wronged, was deeply, memorably wronged. A £10 bank note, by way of subscription for a few copies of an early edition of his poems—this is the outside that I could ever see proof given of Burns having received anything in the way of patronage; and doubtless this would have been gladly returned, but from the dire necessity of dissembling. Lord Glencairn is the "patron" for whom Burns appears to have felt the most sincere respect. Yet even he—did he give him more than a seat at his dinner table? Lord Buchan again, whose liberalities are by this time pretty well appreciated in Scotland, exhorts Burns, in a tone of one preaching upon a primary duty of life, to exemplary gratitude towards a person who had given him absolutely nothing at all. The man has not yet lived to whose happiness it was more essential that he should live unencumbered by the sense of obligation; and, on the other hand, the man has not lived upon whose independence as professing benefactors so many people practised, or who found so many others ready to ratify and give value to their pretences.* Him, whom beyond most men, nature had created with the necessity of conscious independence, all men besieged with the assurance that he was, must be, ought to be dependant; nay, that it was his primary duty to be grateful for his dependance. I have not looked into any edition of Burns, except once for a quotation, since this year 1801—when I read the whole in Currie's edition, and had opportunities of meeting the editor—and once subsequently upon occasion of a fifth or supplementary volume being published. I know not, therefore, how this matter has been managed by succeeding editors, such as Allan Cunningham, far more capable of understanding Burns' situation, from the previous struggles of their own honourable lives, and Burns' feelings, from something of congenial power.

I, in this year, 1801, when in the company of Dr

* Jacobinism—although the seminal principle of all political evil in all ages alike of advanced civilization—is natural to the heart of man, and, in a qualified sense, may be meritorious. A good man, a high-minded man, in certain circumstances, must be a Jacobin in a certain sense. The aspect under which Burns' Jacobinism appears is striking: there is a thought which an observing reader will find often recurring, which expresses its peculiar bitterness. It is this:—the necessity which in old countries exists for the labourer humbly to beg permission that he may labour. To eat in the sweat of a man's brow—that is bad; and that is a curse, and pronounced such by God. But when that is all, the labourer is by comparison happy. The second curse makes that a jest: he must sue, he must sneak, he must fawn like an Oriental slave, in order to win his fellow-man, in Burns' indignant words—"To give him leave to toil." That was the scorpion thought that was for ever shooting its sting into Burns' meditations, whether forward-looking or backward-looking; and that considered, there arises a world of allowance for that vulgar bluster of independence which Lord Jeffrey, with so much apparent reason, charges upon his prose writings.

Currie, did not forget, and, with some pride I say that I stood alone in remembering, the very remarkable position of Burns: not merely that, with his genius, and with the intellectual pretensions, generally, of his family, he should have been called to a life of early labour, and of labour unhappily not prosperous, but also that he, by accident about the proudest of human spirits, should have been by accident summoned, beyond all others, to eternal recognitions of some mysterious gratitude, which he owed to some mysterious patrons little and great, whilst yet of all men, perhaps, he reaped the least obvious or known benefit from any patronage that has ever been put on record. Most men, if they reap little from patronage, are liberated from the claims of patronage; or if they are summoned to a galling dependancy, have at least the fruits of their dependancy. But it was this man's unhappy fate—with an early and previous irritability on this very point—to find himself saddled, by his literary correspondents, with all that was odious in dependancy, whilst he had every hardship to face that is most painful in unbefriended poverty.

On this view of the case, I talked, then, being a schoolboy, with and against the first editor of Burns: I did not, and I do not, profess to admire the letters, (that is the prose,) all or any, of Burns. I felt that they were liable to the charges of Lord Jeffrey, and to others beside; that they do not even express the natural vigour of Burns' mind, but are at once vulgar, tawdry, coarse, and commonplace; neither was I a person to affect any profound sympathy with the general character and temperament of Burns, which has often been described as "of the earth, earthy"—unspiritual—animal—beyond those of most men equally intellectual. But still I comprehended his situation; I had for ever ringing in my ears, during that summer of 1801, those groans which ascended to heaven from his over-burthened heart—those harrowing words, "To give him leave to toil," which record almost a reproach to the ordinances of God—and I felt that upon him, amongst all the children of labour, the primal curse had fallen heaviest and sunk deepest. Feelings such as these I had the courage to express: a personal compliment, or so, I might now and then hear; but all were against me on the matter. Dr Currie said—"Poor Burns! such notions had been his ruin;" Mr Shepherd continued to draw from the subject some scoff or growl at Mr Pitt and the Excise; the laughing tailor told us a good story of some proud beggar; Mr Clarke proposed that I should write a Greek inscription for a cenotaph which he was to erect in his garden to the memory of Burns;—and so passed away the solitary protestation on behalf of Burns' Jacobinism, together with the wine and the roses, and the sea-breezes of that same Everton, in that same summer of 1801. Mr Roscoe is dead, and has found time since then to be half forgotten; Dr Currie, the physician, has been found "unable to heal himself;" Mr Shepherd of Gatacre is a name and a shadow; Mr Clarke is a shadow without a name; the tailor, who set the table in a roar, is dust and ashes; and three men at the most remain of all who, in those convivial meetings, held it right to look down upon Burns as upon one whose spirit was rebellious overmuch against the institutions of man, and Jacobinical in a sense which "men of property" and master manufacturers will never brook, albeit democrats by profession.

So passed my noviciate as a literary aspirant, and in circles such as these. The next persons of eminence whom I saw were, with few exceptions, in the circles of London; and these were Sir Humphry Davy, Professor Wilson, Mr Godwin, Mrs Siddons, Lady Hamilton, Mrs Hannah More and her sisters, Walking Stewart, Dr Beddoes, Mr Abernethy, Charles Lamb, Mr Hazlitt, Dr Parr, and others of whom I should say a passing word or two according to the circumstances, slight or ample, under which I saw them.

VON RAUMER ON THE CHARACTER AND TIMES OF CHARLES I.*

To those who read the early struggles of the British people, and watch the balance of despotism and liberty often trembling on the turn, with the intense interest of persons whose fate in life has been stamped by the acts of those critical moments, and who may again possibly live to see the same powers to endure and struggle called into existence, the abstractions of the German philosopher, in his study at Berlin, seem vapid and unsatisfactory. The events of that great struggle of which Lord Chatham justly said, "There was mixed with the public cause, ambition, sedition, and violence; but no man will persuade me that it was not the cause of liberty on the one side, and tyranny on the other"—have, in their own original forms, a surpassing interest, to which no varnish of cold and formal philosophy can give lustre or beauty; and we thank not the German metaphysician for melting down the goodly, though sometimes rude, forms of the events and characters of the seventeenth century, in the fluent of certain pre-established and minutely defined principles of politics, which leave no room for all the noble enthusiasm which happened occasionally to stray from the right path, and the intrepid struggles for freedom which sometimes levelled despotism with too severe a shock.

Some historians have boldly supported Charles and his minions, in their efforts to extend and fortify the prerogative—have viewed the opposing efforts as crimes, and the final end of the drama as the consummation of atrocity and injustice. Others have linked their feelings with some one of the opposition parties—the Parliament, the Presbyterians, or the Army—justifying all their acts, and supporting all their opinions. Von Raumer, probably sketching out to himself a path of lofty impartiality, has designed, in the solitude of his own mind, an abstract code of political conduct, departure from which, on either side, must call forth his censure. He, probably, commenced his task with little prejudice against the individuals on either side; but to support such a principle, amidst the crowd of great actions and startling opinions with which the history of the time is rife, required more qualifications than a perusal of our ordinary historians. A man to be fit for the task of impartiality, must not only have looked on the outward events of the time, but, like Hallam, have embued his mind with the sentiments and impulses of the men who figured in these events. When we read of the repeated risings of the mob of London, and their intimidating shouts, we must reflect that they consisted of the same persons, who saw Prynne, Bastwick, Burton, and Leighton, men of worth and learning, exposed in the pillory, with their bleeding and branded cheeks. The conduct of such men as Ireton, Harrison, and Ludlow, cannot be judged according to abstract rules of morality, when we reflect on the conviction they must have formed, that the return of their adversary to power would seal their death-warrant; and the reluctance of the leading men, in the latter period of the conflict, to treat with Charles on such terms as they would have gladly accepted before, must be viewed in conjunction with the repeatedly proved perfidy of the monarch, and the moral certainty, that it was not in his nature to keep treaties, unless they were supported by force. In viewing the whole aspect of the struggle, too, it must be recollected, that the English people, who, for five years, carried on a war against the King, had, during the previous twenty years, smarted under a complicated and ingenious system of exaction and torture, which directed itself, not only to the subversion of their remaining public rights, but penetrated to their domestic hearths, snatching at the wages of honest industry, and rendering personal liberty as uncertain as in an Eastern despotism. Of this nature were the notorious tax of ship-money—the scale of duties adopted without the sanction of Parliament—the arbitrary levying of soldiers, in defiance of protecting laws, which, centuries before, had been exacted from unwilling sovereigns, and jealously confirmed—the practice of purveyance, equally illegal, which let loose a predatory army, to prey where it listed—the sale of monopolies, by which the honest trader might be suddenly deprived of his means of livelihood, and his customers compelled to pay enormous profits on the necessaries of life, for the benefit of the Exchequer and its favoured contractor. Such were the evils concentrated and fortified by that array of secret tribunals, the Star Chamber, the High Commission, and the Marshal's Court, each vying with the other in trampling on all public rights and individual justice, while the more unbending courts of law were gradually taught to rival them in iniquity.

Von Raumer does not justify the infringements of the law which had taken place previously to the sitting of the Long Parliament; and he even admits that Finch and Windebank—the busy instruments in overawing the Parliament and undermining the laws, who had fled in guilty terror from the justice of a roused people—"were, if not ill disposed, certainly inconsiderate and imprudent statesmen."

It has pleased the author, in the application of his preconceived system of political morality, to consider the King in the wrong up to the time of Strafford's death and the act to prevent the dissolution of the Parliament, and from that moment to cast all blame on the other side. "Strafford's death," he observes, "and this law, which produced the Long Parliament, form the culminating point, from which the natural and necessary amelioration of defects, changes into a disastrous and violent revolution." And thenceforth—overlooking the circumstance that the divisions and bloodshed which followed, were nourished and reared by the resistance to "the natural and necessary amelioration of defects," and that, when parties are ranged against each other in actual civil warfare, they can no more be expected to deal out to each other an exact measure of equal justice, than the troops of opposing nations can be expected to practise the amenities of peaceful life on the field of battle—he gives us on one side all the encroachments and violent acts of the Parliament and the army, as if they had risen causelessly against a merciful and just government; suppressing or smoothing over the equally if not more unjustifiable acts of the other party in the war. This method of considering the subject, has not the merit of originality. It was adopted by one who had far more cogent motives than the German philosopher. Clarendon is seldom the defender of the encroachments of the crown, and treats its adversaries gently, till the assembling of the Long Parliament, in order that he may gain a character of impartiality, large enough to cover a multitude of misstatements in the rest of his narrative. We are not prepared to defend the Parliament from considerable oligarchical assumption in the exercise of the power which it acquired; we heartily agree in censuring the selfish bigotry and spiritual ambition of the Presbyterians, the insolence of the army, the folly of many fanatics of different hues, the harsh measures sometimes adopted by the republican leaders towards their enemies, and, above all, the savage cruelty displayed by Cromwell, Ireton, and Ludlow, among the Irish Catholics; but the author who dwells on these things should have told us, that, during the pending of a treaty, Charles attacked and pillaged Brentford; that Prince Rupert stripped the prisoners taken at Cirencester naked, driving them, tied together by cords, to Oxford; and plundered Bristol, in breach of capitulation; and that, on very few occasions indeed, did the royalists respect the private property of neutrals. It has been always observed with justice, that the Parliamentary party broke up the treaty of Uxbridge, to all outward appearance, with unnecessary haste. Raumer's remarks on the subject are as follows:—

The Parliament, which intended and demanded no discussion, but the unconditional acceptance of its proposals, refused, in spite of the King's remonstrances and the intervention of Holland and France, every prolongation of the term which it had arbitrarily fixed; and to the King's offer to go in person to Westminster with a safe-conduct, and there continue the negotiations, he received no answer whatever. All the moderate and judicious friends of their country were deeply afflicted at the failure at all attempts to bring about a peace, and each party endeavoured to throw the blame upon the other. The Royalists affirmed that Charles had already yielded too much, and had thereby destroyed the due balance between the powers of the state; that any further concessions would make him the mere shadow of a King, not only to his own ruin, but to the injury of the whole kingdom. To this the friends of the Parliament replied, that the present state of affairs, dangers and opinions, required new securities for liberty and religion, as well as a new system of political and ecclesiastical law. The King, therefore, was wrong in referring, in all his demands and discussions, to former times only, and to circumstances which no longer existed, and were least of all calculated to serve as models for the future. That, instead of yielding, with new confidence and a sincere heart, to what was inevitable, he thought of recovering what had been extorted from him at the first favourable opportunity, and relied on the support of foreign powers, on the success of Montrose in Scotland, and on the Irish rebellion.

It would certainly have been unreasonable and injudicious if the King had thought of setting up former relations and rights as unalterable to all eternity, thereby putting an end for ever to all legislation; but, in fact, he had already made so many changes, and either voluntarily or by compulsion yielded so much, that his dangerous preponderance was entirely out of the question, and there was much more need of securities for the few rights left to him, than for the newly-acquired and important increase of liberty. For, though his army was still animated by a sense of honour or by hatred and contempt of its opponents, there was more religious and political enthusiasm in the army of the Parliament. Here all considered themselves as chosen vessels of grace, and the democratic principle allowed talent to make its way in every manner; whereas there were many impediments in the Royalist and Aristocratic circles. If the King hoped much from foreign assistance or from a change at home, he was here again under an illusion.

This appears to be a very candid view, having for its result a proof of the unreasonableness of the Parliamentary party. The treaty, however, was only one of the King's manœuvres—part of "the game he was playing," to use his own words. He was elated with the success of Montrose in Scotland; while solemnly protesting that he would not employ Papists, he was engaged in a clandestine negotiation with the Irish Roman Catholics; and the Queen, to whom he was writing that he had no hopes of a peace, was busily procuring assistance from the Continent. Nothing seems, at that time, to have been so much dreaded by Charles, as that his friends should compel him to agree to a peace, on terms very different from those he would have exacted at the head of a conquering army. The breaking off of the treaty was a relief to him, and he writes to the Queen with an easy mind:—"Now, if I do anything unhandsome, or disadvantageous to myself or friends, in order to a treaty, it will be merely my own fault; for I confess, when I wrote thee last, I was in fear to be pressed to make some overtures to renew the treaty." With such views it was, with grave mockery, that Charles objected to the abolition of Episcopacy, because it affected "his conscience"—a monitor afterwards equally convenient on the other side, when, in the midst of a treaty with the Parliament and army of England, he conducted clandestine negotiations for obtaining the support of the Scotch, the fundamental conditions of which were the establishment of Presbyterianism. Of the King's Letters, found after the battle of Naseby, which exposed the specific insincerities, of which the Parliament acted on the suspicion, the author remarks, "In fact, they show various plans, hopes, ideas of war and peace, and, in general, a changeableness of views and passions, which in no case degenerates into anything criminal, but is deficient in veracity, firmness, and consistency; and, at such a moment, must have diminished, if it had been possible, the affection and confidence of the people." The complicated expression, "a changeableness of views and passions, deficient in veracity," is a gentle way of telling what the good old English term a "teller of lies," would have more distinctly announced. Whether the want of veracity was criminal or not, is a question to be solved by some higher analysis of morality than we comprehend; but it does seem to us, that the confirmation of designs against the country being conducted under the mask of treaties of peace, afforded some justification to the Parliament for treating with the King as if he were a person whose honour was not to be very implicitly relied on. Von Raumer and his translator are peculiarly happy in the choice of soothing epithets for the double dealing of the King. At the time when he was selfishly exulting in the hope, that the various parties might, by artful management, be urged to each other's destruction, and afford room for him to rise with double power on their ruins, he "still considered such absolute concessions as contrary to his duty, and hoped that the equilibrium of the parties opposed to him would, in the end, place the decision in his hands." How much more animated is the language used, four pages farther on, towards the Scotch, who, finding the King by no means a convenient visiter, agreed to transfer him to the English on being paid their arrears. "Their conduct was composed of religious hypocrisy, cowardice, want of feeling, perjury, and treason." Charles, in disclosing his own views, was far more frank than his commentator has proved. "I am endeavouring," he says, in a letter to Lord Digby, "to get to London, so that the conditions may be such as a gentleman may own, and that the rebels may acknowledge me King; being not without hope that I shall be able to draw either the Presbyterians or Independents to side with me for extirpating the one the other, that I shall be really King again." Afterwards, at the treaty of Newport, his last chance for his safety, he wrote to his friends—"I must command you two things—first, to obey all my wife's commands; then, not to obey any public command of mine until I send you word that I am free from restraint; lastly, be not startled at my great concessions concerning Ireland, for they will come to nothing."

We have the following view of the merits of the condemnation of the King:—"In order to counteract this favourable feeling, which was daily growing stronger, witnesses against the King were heard, whose depositions amounted to this—that they had seen him at the head of soldiers, or sword in hand, which maliciously, and at the same time absurdly, was alleged as a proof of murders deserving death; whereas the thorough justification of Charles, which was presented in writing, made no impression." The intended inference from this is, that Charles was an innocent man, and his trial a mockery of justice. It does not infer a sanction of the extent of the punishment to say, that Charles was a great criminal, who merited severe castigation. That what he received exceeded the due medium is to be regretted; but it was the fortune of war—the catastrophe of the contest in which he was engaged with individuals, and a circumstance which, as far as it affected the public or any great party, might be called accidental. Such as the crimes were—and we have given an instance or two of them—they were proved against the King, by evidence too "loud and trumpet-tongued," in the recollection of every man who had lived from the commencement of his reign. Nor was there entirely wanting personal evidence of his perfidy, in addition to the damning deductions necessarily made from his intercepted correspondence, and the papers found at Naseby. A witness was adduced, who stated facts to shew that, during the treaty of Newport, he had authorized the Prince to carry on clandestine negotiations. "This evidence," says Mr Brodie, very justly, "if it had stood alone, might not, at such a juncture, have been entitled to credit; but when we collate it with the private letters which Charles was writing at the very moment, we have no reason to doubt it; and it is just an additional proof of that unfortunate want of faith in this prince, which rendered it utterly impossible to bind him to any law or condition."

On the self-denying ordinance, the author adopts the common view, that it was a subtle design to advance Cromwell. We never could see anything to make us believe that so shrewd a man would have raised his hopes of aggrandizement on his chances of being excepted from the operation of a measure in the design of which he was included. It seems to have escaped the notice of most historians that there must have been a practical utility in this ordinance, clearly seen by its promoters, though the grounds on which they proceeded may not be easily discoverable at the present day. Undoubtedly, the measure immediately produced a marked effect in raising the character of the army. Although the author does not attempt, in Cromwell's character, to trace the origin of motives so deeply as Hume—who seems to have thought that the career of that great man arose in his mind almost at the moment of his birth, as the trunk and branches of the oak are said to be modelled in the acorn—he infuses into his mind certain subtle principles of action, the justice of which will hardly be acknowledged in this practical and unphilosophical country.

At the beginning of his career, he had, by no means, laid down any plan; but the force of circumstances gradually gave him ideas, means, and resolutions. Hence, he said very characteristically to Warwick, "I can very well say what I will not; but, by no means, what I will: I shall know it as soon as it is necessary." Thus circumstances led and misled him; and he, on the other hand, knew how to mould them to the gratification of his passions. In that age, which threw down all barriers, the noble talent of guiding the minds of men could grow up to unbridled ambition, which, at the beginning, was unconsciously united in him with fanaticism; then he designedly used the latter as a pretext and cloak, till religious considerations and opinions withdrew more and more into the back ground; nay, till he at length maintained in theory, and reduced to practice, the impious principle that in extraordinary cases the dictates of morality must be disregarded, and right sacrificed to necessity.

We are not of those who can view Cromwell's mind as containing anything peculiar and contrary to the ordinary routine of nature, farther than that he was one whose talents, in some departments, have been hardly ever equalled. He was a man of vast powers of disciplining and organizing, deeply read in the human heart, and prompt in taking advantage of the opportunities of aggrandizement, which the troubled surge of revolutionary events was ever casting up at his feet—qualities which are often in a more or less degree united with the fanatical enthusiasm which so strongly characterised him.

The rigid fidelity of this translation is more striking than gratifying to a reader. About a third of the work consists of quotations from speeches and pamphlets, which, after having been diluted into German, have been restored to us in such words as we should be sorry to think our worthy ancestors were so barren as to have used. We cannot but wonder at the taste and judgment of the man, who, instead of the reputed testimony of Morton to the courage of Knox—"Here lies he who never feared the face of man"—chooses to give us "Here is one who never feared any man." There are several mistakes, or rather lapses, involving confusion of persons and of the periods at which particular institutions (chiefly in Scotland) had their origin, which an intelligent translator should have amended. We need not notice these, as we have no doubt the Quarterly Review has now several active hands employed in the charitable labour of investigating the accuracy of every sentence. On the whole, we cannot help giving our hearty testimony to the vast erudition of the author in British history, and to the accuracy, characteristic of his country, which appears in his discussion of all important events,

THE SCOTTISH MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT.

The Scottish Members are again nearly all mustered in the House; while there is every probability that a very few months may send them on their country. It becomes a serious inquiry, with what claims or pretensions they will face their different constituencies—upon what rest their claim to approbation for their past conduct, and for a renewal of confidence in their future exertions. A pretty sharp look-out has been kept upon some of the Scottish Members, and, to own the truth, some of them required it; yet we fancy that a few pages, which give a full and distinct tabular view of their votes and attendance, will be usefully occupied at this particular time. An approaching or threatened dissolution always quickens Parliamentary vigilance; but it is proper to see how Members acted when more left to their own free will. Under the best imaginable system of representation, perfect publicity must be the elector's great check on the elected; and, in cases, such as that of Britain, where the representative holds his seat for a long period, the necessity becomes the more urgent for bringing his actions more closely and frequently under the eyes of his constituents, that the power of public opinion may be brought into operation, either to approve or condemn. To furnish the electors of Scotland with a sufficient knowledge of the sayings and doings of the men they have sent to Parliament as their representatives, and thereby guide their future choice, is the object of this article.

The present Parliament was chosen to try the question, whether the reform of the representation was to be followed by the fruits for which it was so anxiously sought; or whether, after all their struggles and sacrifices, the people of this country were to be again ruled by the party who had trampled so long on truth and justice, and made a mockery of human suffering and sorrow. The Tory party was in power; and the influences which, from that circumstance, it possessed, were united with those springing from its wealth and social position, against the people and their friends. The men who, in this crisis, were elected to serve the represented in Parliament, may be divided into three classes. The first and most numerous of the Scottish representatives, was that of mere Whigs; supporters of Lord Melbourne's government; sworn enemies, for the time being, of Toryism; and giving general promises of supporting measures of reform and retrenchment. The second class was that of Liberal Whigs and Radicals; men pledged to particular reforms; anxious for good government at all hazards; and foes, at all times and in all places, to Tories and Toryism. The third class was that of Tories; enemies of popular rights; men who loved misgovernment for the profit it brought to themselves; and open foes to public freedom. These three classes were made up as follows:—

Class I.—Whigs giving general promises of Reform and Retrenchment.

Name.	Seat.	Profession, &c.
Abercromby, J.	Edinburgh City.	Elected Speaker, February 19th, 1835.

Johnstone, J. J. H.	Dumfries County.	A Landholder.
Pringle, R.	Selkirk County.	A Landholder.
Rae, Sir W.	Bute County.	A Lawyer.
Scott, Lord John,	Roxburgh County.	Brother of the Duke of Buccleugh.
Campbell, Sir H. P.	Berwick County.	A Landholder.

Dividing the Scottish members, therefore, into these three classes, it would be found that, of the first class, the number elected by the constituencies was twenty-four; of the second class, or thorough Liberals, twelve; and of the third class, or Tories, seventeen. Looking over these lists, it will be noticed that the Tory party is entirely composed of landholders or the family connexions of landholders—men who enacted and who uphold the corn-laws; and the whole of the Scottish Tory Members have, with one exception, that of Cumming Bruce, been returned by constituencies where their wealth and influence could overawe and intimidate the tenantry. On the other hand, it will be seen that the ultra-Liberals and Independents have been returned for great commercial or manufacturing towns, or for counties covered with manufacturing villages, like Dumbarton and Ayrshires.

In point of steady attention to their duties, the best Members whom Scotland sends to Parliament, are, Dr Bowring, Mr Chalmers of Auldbar, and Mr Wallace of Kelly. These gentlemen, although holding no official situation to compel or reward their attendance, are ever at their post, and regularly vote on the right side. In a record of the divisions of last session we have before us, Dr Bowring stands at the head of the list of Scottish Members—having been present at no less than 121 out of 183 divisions. Close to him is Mr Chalmers; and then Mr Wallace. Almost equally constant was the attendance of the three holders of office—Mr Steuart of Alderston, Mr John Archibald Murray, and Mr Fox Maule. The attendance of the remaining Scottish Members at the 183 divisions, average only 43; and 18 of these representatives were not present at so many as 30 of the divisions out of the 183. Of the Tories, the three most frequently present at divisions, were, Mr Forbes of Callender, Sir George Clerk, and Mr H. Arbuthnot. But the divisions are but an imperfect test for discovering the working Members.

The following table will shew how the Scottish Members redeemed the pledges they gave their constituents:—

THE POST-OFFICE AND ITS ABUSES; WITH HINTS FOR IMPROVEMENT.

The management of the General Post-Office has been a subject of frequent inquiry ever since the year 1788. Parliamentary and Treasury Commissioners have succeeded each other, and have been all unanimous as to the absolute necessity of revising this department, and placing the controlling power in the hands of a Board of Commissioners, in the room of a Postmaster-General.

On the 20th of last June, a premature discussion took place in the Lords, on the subject of a recommendation to that effect, contained in the fourth Report of the present Commissioners of Inquiry—viz., "That a bill be prepared which will enable the Treasury to appoint a Board of Commissioners in the management of the Post-Office." This report bears date the 23d July 1835; but a bill founded on its recommendation was not introduced to the Commons till July 1836—consequently, the Government took ample time to consider the necessity of this highly important change, (which had been so often recommended by former as well as contemporary Commissioners of Inquiry,) before any steps were taken to carry it into effect; otherwise, the bill, which was a very short one, ought to have been brought forward in the Session of 1835; therefore, in this case, they cannot be charged with acting hastily.

The discussion alluded to was brought on by the Duke of Richmond, who, on all occasions, steps forward as the champion of the Post-Office as it is at present constituted. Why he does so, he has not yet assigned any reason.

In reviewing the proceedings in Parliament during the past session, with respect to this department, reference to the arguments used by his Grace only, is matter of necessity and not selection, he being the only speaker on that side of the question.

His Grace first remarked, with reference to the above-quoted recommendation of the Commissioners, "that, before their Lordships legislated on the subject, they really were justified in demanding some evidence on this point." Admitted. There cannot be a doubt that their Lordships are justified in having evidence of the necessity of every measure on which they are called upon to legislate; but, after the thousands of pages of evidence that have been published by Commissioners of Inquiry of various political creeds—in almost every one of which may be found a reason in favour of the proposed change—and forty of these pages, taken prior to the year 1827, being annexed to the Report that his Grace brought under their consideration—it is difficult to come to a conclusion as to the character and quantum of evidence that his Grace requires before he can make up his mind to sanction the change proposed. Men of ordinary minds have long seen the necessity of the alteration suggested, and that without having waded half through the pyramid of Reports, with the contents of which his Grace is so little satisfied. This being over, that he might not appear to stand alone in his opinion, his Grace pressed into his service the Finance Committee of 1817, and claimed them as supporters of his view of the case, solely because they did not, in distinct terms, recommend a "Board of Commissioners to be constituted, like the other existing revenue boards;" at the same time carefully omitting to state—but which omission was ably supplied by Lord Wallace—"that they were of opinion that it would not be advisable permanently to leave the office of Post-Master-General in the possession of a single individual;" thereby censuring the present mode of management, although they did not suggest another.

It is very true, as was observed by his Grace, "that a great machine like the Post-Office, affected every interest, manufacturing, agricultural, and commercial, and was intimately connected with the feelings and well-being of every man in the community." But, with regard to his monition to their Lordships, "to proceed with caution and deliberation" before they sanctioned any alteration in the department, it was rather ill-timed, seeing that some of them, if they have ever attended to the subject, must have on their consciences the weight of fifty or sixty years' collection of arguments in favour of the measure that he was opposing.

That the various interests enumerated by his Grace would suffer by the proposed change in the mode of management, need not be feared. The change, no doubt, would have an opposite tendency.

This assertion is borne out, not only by general observations, but by the statement of Lord Lowther, who, in his evidence before the Commissioners of Inquiry in March last, said—"I think the present system has proved that it is not at all adapted to the circumstances of the times, and I should feel disposed to remodel and reconstruct the Post-Office department altogether. I think one sees, in the present state of the Post-Office, that it remains just what it was ever since the improvement it underwent in 1797 and '1798"—(meaning, no doubt, the improvement introduced by Mr Palmer a few years prior to that date.) "There has hardly been any alteration since in its details, except what has actually been forced upon it by the public; its duties are becoming now great, and so general, notwithstanding its inconvenient and almost prohibitory arrangements, that, however capable or industrious one man might be, I should conceive he could hardly be qualified to look into the number of details that that office would embrace in all its ramifications. I should think the better way would be to have a Board with a head and two assistants." This is the opinion of a noble Lord, of excellent understanding and business habits, well versed in the subject, and opposed in politics to the present Government.

During the discussion herein alluded to, and also at the subsequent one, when the bill intended to empower the Government to effect the proposed change was thrown out by the Lords, the Duke of Richmond reminded their Lordships, "that, in 1830, the Post-Office had been entirely revised and reorganized, and that all the recommendations of Lord Wallace's Commission had been carried into effect." His Grace appears to have forgotten his own evidence before the Select Committee for the Reduction of Salaries, in March 1831, wherein he detailed, under the title of "amendments," a great number of changes that he had made in the department during the four months that he had then been in office; and, in a letter to the Treasury, dated March 1834, he stated that "those amendments did not owe their origin to the recommendations contained in the Reports of Lord Wallace's Commission;" although, to every one who has read these reports, it would appear that the amendments that he recommended resulted from these recommendations only. These are his Grace's own words:—"Although I have been anxious to avail myself of any useful suggestions that might be contained in the Reports of the Commissioners, I did not take the schedules attached to these Reports as my guide in preparing the new establishments which have received your Lordships' approval, because it was evident that the duties could not be performed with the means they have proposed; and because of the great expense which these recommendations would have entailed upon the public." And in another letter on the same subject, dated April 1835, he repeated—"I, therefore, stated that I could not, in the discharge of my duty, adopt their recommendations for the establishments of the respective offices, both on account of the inadequacy of the numbers for the performance of the public service, and of the additional expense they would have entailed upon the revenue; and, at the same time, pointed out some instances in which it was evident that the Commissioners had proceeded upon an erroneous calculation and principle." It will be observed that, in both these passages, his Grace stated, that the number of persons recommended by Lord Wallace's Commission, were "inadequate for the performance of the public service;" yet he complained of the additional expense that would be entailed upon the public by the adoption of their scheme; and, by way of exemplification, he adds, in his letter of April 1834—"I shall confine myself to the simple remark, that, in the principal working department, the Inland Office, they had proposed an establishment of sixty-six persons only, whilst the duty actually required no less than seventy-nine, which number was, at times, found scarcely equal to its performance without great difficulty, as they had recommended the sweeping abolition of one-third of the letter-carriers in the twopenny post." How the greater number of persons employed by his Grace have been a less expense to the country than the smaller number recommended by the Commissioners of Inquiry would have been, must be left to him to explain: although it is not likely that any one will cavil with the noble Duke for having employed as many persons as the exigencies of the service required; nevertheless, the contradictions remain the same, to point out which it is noticed here, as well as to shew how irreconcilable these statements are with that so recently made by him in the Lords, "that all the recommendations of Lord Wallace's Commission had been carried into effect in 1830." But, on this, as well as on other points, his Grace is in error. Those recommendations had not been carried into effect in 1830, or why did he repudiate them in his letters laid before Parliament in March 1834 and April 1835? The fact is, that to these Commissioners of Inquiry the public are indebted for all the improvements that have taken place in this department; and many of their recommendations remain to be effected; and they can be accomplished only by a Board of Commissioners—which, to every unprejudiced person, must be a sufficient reason for changing the controlling power of the department.

On one point, the Duke of Richmond was more happy than on any other that he advanced; but which did not militate against the proposed change—a change which had been insisted on and demanded by Mr Wallace in each of the three preceding sessions of Parliament; and, if the kingdom at large is searched from the Land's-End to John O'Groat's House, it will be scarcely possible to find a single person who dissents from him. His Grace said that "the post-office ought not to be considered so much in the light of a revenue-board; but the Post-Master-General [read "Post-Office Commissioners"] ought not to be allowed to spend more money in increasing the advantages derivable from it." Authorities in favour of this position of the noble Duke's, scarcely need be quoted; as, in support of so popular a measure as the reduction of the tax on letters, and increasing the advantages of post communication, the voice of the public is with him; but, as in parallel cases, the same reasons hold good, so, on this subject, all the arguments used by Sir Henry Parnell, in the 6th cap. of his "Treatise on Finance," against high protecting duties, apply with equal force against the present system of high taxation for the conveyance of letters. On the subject of high rates of postage, Lord Ashburton took a very just and enlightened view; which makes it the more to be regretted, although quite like himself, that he should have opposed the second reading of the bill for abolishing the office of Post-Master-General.

With the solitary exception of the improved construction of mail-coaches—for which the public are indebted, not to the Duke of Richmond, or any other Post-Master-General, nor the officers of the establishment, but to Mr Wallace, the Member for Greenock, and the Commissioners of Inquiry—this department, by Lord Lowther's account, and there is no better authority, has remained stationary, as to the arrangements for the accommodation of the public, for nearly fifty years. It is, therefore, now time that it make a few strides in advance, so as to overtake other departments, and, in its vocation, administer, in an equal degree, to the wants and wishes of the community. It is not intended here to enumerate all the improvements of which the Post-Office is susceptible; but the most prominent and indispensable are—Morning and day mails from London, as well as evening mails; a Sunday delivery to those who may call for their letters in London, and a despatch from London; a cheap conveyance of prices current, and small packets of value, under a certain weight; an accelerated communication for the conveyance of the letters and parcels between post-towns and to the districts surrounding them, instead of the present, in most cases, circuitous way, to which cross posts are subjected; and a general lowering of the rate of postage—which concession Mr Wallace has also strenuously advocated. This latter suggestion, if judiciously carried into effect, will not be the cause of a diminution of revenue, in proportion to its reduction; but, on the contrary, if aided by increased means of communication, will, with the increased ability and anxiety of all classes of the public to communicate by letter, be morally certain to add to the funds of the exchequer. This axiom is almost proved, to the extent here contemplated, by the Finance Committee, in their fourth Report, at p. 10; where, by a reference to accounts shewing the produce of duties, under the heads "Customs," "Excise," "Stamps," and "Assessed Taxes," in 1827, compared with what the produce would have been, if the reduction of taxes, which took effect after 1823, had diminished these revenues in the exact proportion which they bore to the produce of that year; they say—"It will be seen, by this abstract, that the abatement of the revenue by taxes remitted, would have been, in 1827, as compared with 1823, no less than £3,308,316; the difference of £5,874,255 being the increase of revenue from increased consumption." Therefore, it is but fair to infer that, with the increased and increasing intelligence of the community, combined with our increasing domestic and foreign commercial intercourse, the Post-Office revenue would not suffer more, or even so much as the before-named revenues, if the tax on letters was to be diminished in the same proportion that these taxes were reduced between the years 1823 and 1827.

What the Duke of Richmond meant by calling on the Peers "not to legislate to satisfy such gentlemen, such individuals rather," it is difficult to understand. He could not have meant his appeal to their Lordships to apply to so large a body as the members of his Majesty's Government, who brought forward the measure—to the immense majority of the Commons, who sanctioned it by their votes—to the Peers who supported it in the Upper House, and to the general voice of the community in favour of the change, pressing from without; but if he meant it to apply—as, no doubt, he must have done—to the honourable Member for Greenock, who has so meritoriously tugged at the labouring oar for several sessions of Parliament, so as to put in their proper light, with his co-legislators and the public, those officers of the establishment who are incapable of "originating, unsolicited, measures of public utility for the service"—the rebuke can fall but lightly on that honourable gentleman, seeing that he has with him a multitude that cannot be numbered, to share the weight of the noble Duke's spleen and censure for urging a change in the department. Indeed, to use Lord Lowther's words, "hardly an alteration has been made in its details since the improvements introduced by Mr Palmer, except what has actually been forced upon it by the public."

In the appointment of Colonel Maberly to the office of Secretary of this department, vacant by the death of Sir F. Freeling, the public have something like an assurance that the Government are serious in their attempts to effect the reforms that have been recommended. At the same time, they must expect to be called upon to explain how it is that a person whose mismanagement of the trusts reposed in him as Assistant-Secretary of the Post-office, and whose conduct, has been so strongly animadverted on as his has been by the Commissioners of Revenue Inquiry in their twenty-second Report, as well as in Parliament—is qualified for the onerous duties of a Commissioner of Customs. Not that his negligence or incapacity, or by whatever other name should be designated his disqualifications for the performance of public duties, will at all check the current of business in a Board so efficient and well organized as that of the one to which he has been appointed; nevertheless, the Commissioners with whom he is associated, as well as the aspirants to seats at that Board, and, above all, the public, may justly complain, that, in his appointment, an undue preference has been given to a person whose "system of control" over an important branch of another public department that was intrusted to his care, is characterised, by the Commissioners of Inquiry, in their sixth Report, page nineteen, as being completely nugatory in all respects.

The bill that was to have empowered the Lords of the Treasury to appoint a Board of Commissioners to manage the Post-Office, did not comprise any other regulation affecting the department; and, although its supporters were anxious that it should have become the law of the land, still, to many of them, one of its provisions was very objectionable—viz., that the chief Commissioners should have a seat in Parliament. It is true that that provision had the high sanction of my Lord Lowther and Mr Labouchere; the former a late, and the latter a present Commissioner of Inquiry. But both of these eminent persons, after they have read the reasons contained in the twentieth Report of the Commissioners of Excise Inquiry, why a Revenue Court should not sit in Parliament, will probably change standing and business habits, well versed in the subject, and opposed in politics to the present Government.

During the discussion herein alluded to, and also at the subsequent one, when the bill intended to empower the Government to effect the proposed change was thrown out by the Lords, the Duke of Richmond reminded their Lordships, "that, in 1830, the Post-Office had been entirely revised and reorganized, and that all the recommendations of Lord Wallace's Commission had been carried into effect." It is not intended here to enumerate all the improvements of which the Post-Office is susceptible; but the most prominent and indispensable are—Morning and day mails from London, as well as evening mails; a Sunday delivery to those who may call for their letters in London, and a despatch from London; a cheap conveyance of prices current, and small packets of value, under a certain weight; an accelerated communication for the conveyance of the letters and parcels between post-towns and to the districts surrounding them, instead of the present, in most cases, circuitous way, to which cross posts are subjected; and a general lowering of the rate of postage—which concession Mr Wallace has also strenuously advocated. This latter suggestion, if judiciously carried into effect, will not be the cause of a diminution of revenue, in proportion to its reduction; but, on the contrary, if aided by increased means of communication, will, with the increased ability and anxiety of all classes of the public to communicate by letter, be morally certain to add to the funds of the exchequer. This axiom is almost proved, to the extent here contemplated, by the Finance Committee, in their fourth Report, at p. 10; where, by a reference to accounts shewing the produce of duties, under the heads "Customs," "Excise," "Stamps," and "Assessed Taxes," in 1827, compared with what the produce would have been, if the reduction of taxes, which took effect after 1823, had diminished these revenues in the exact proportion which they bore to the produce of that year; they say—"It will be seen, by this abstract, that the abatement of the revenue by taxes remitted, would have been, in 1827, as compared with 1823, no less than £3,308,316; the difference of £5,874,255 being the increase of revenue from increased consumption." Therefore, it is but fair to infer that, with the increased and increasing intelligence of the community, combined with our increasing domestic and foreign commercial intercourse, the Post-Office revenue would not suffer more, or even so much as the before-named revenues, if the tax on letters was to be diminished in the same proportion that these taxes were reduced between the years 1823 and 1827.

What the Duke of Richmond meant by calling on the Peers "not to legislate to satisfy such gentlemen, such individuals rather," it is difficult to understand. He could not have meant his appeal to their Lordships to apply to so large a body as the members of his Majesty's Government, who brought forward the measure—to the immense majority of the Commons, who sanctioned it by their votes—to the Peers who supported it in the Upper House, and to the general voice of the community in favour of the change, pressing from without; but if he meant it to apply—as, no doubt, he must have done—to the honourable Member for Greenock, who has so meritoriously tugged at the labouring oar for several sessions of Parliament, so as to put in their proper light, with his co-legislators and the public, those officers of the establishment who are incapable of "originating, unsolicited, measures of public utility for the service"—the rebuke can fall but lightly on that honourable gentleman, seeing that he has with him a multitude that cannot be numbered, to share the weight of the noble Duke's spleen and censure for urging a change in the department. Indeed, to use Lord Lowther's words, "hardly an alteration has been made in its details since the improvements introduced by Mr Palmer, except what has actually been forced upon it by the public."

In the appointment of Colonel Maberly to the office of Secretary of this department, vacant by the death of Sir F. Freeling, the public have something like an assurance that the Government are serious in their attempts to effect the reforms that have been recommended. At the same time, they must expect to be called upon to explain how it is that a person whose mismanagement of the trusts reposed in him as Assistant-Secretary of the Post-office, and whose conduct, has been so strongly animadverted on as his has been by the Commissioners of Revenue Inquiry in their twenty-second Report, as well as in Parliament—is qualified for the onerous duties of a Commissioner of Customs. Not that his negligence or incapacity, or by whatever other name should be designated his disqualifications for the performance of public duties, will at all check the current of business in a Board so efficient and well organized as that of the one to which he has been appointed; nevertheless, the Commissioners with whom he is associated, as well as the aspirants to seats at that Board, and, above all, the public, may justly complain, that, in his appointment, an undue preference has been given to a person whose "system of control" over an important branch of another public department that was intrusted to his care, is characterised, by the Commissioners of Inquiry, in their sixth Report, page nineteen, as being completely nugatory in all respects.

The bill that was to have empowered the Lords of the Treasury to appoint a Board of Commissioners to manage the Post-Office, did not comprise any other regulation affecting the department; and, although its supporters were anxious that it should have become the law of the land, still, to many of them, one of its provisions was very objectionable—viz., that the chief Commissioners should have a seat in Parliament. It is true that that provision had the high sanction of my Lord Lowther and Mr Labouchere; the former a late, and the latter a present Commissioner of Inquiry. But both of these eminent persons, after they have read the reasons contained in the twentieth Report of the Commissioners of Excise Inquiry, why a Revenue Court should not sit in Parliament, will probably change their opinion; and it is hoped that the measure, in an unobjectionable shape, will receive the sanction of both Houses of Parliament early in the ensuing session. The Commissioners, speaking of the construction of Revenue Boards in general, at page 130, say—"The main objects to be obtained in constructing a Board, are to give the Treasury, or rather the House of Commons, a complete control, and to ensure a real responsibility for the proper administration of the laws of the department. We are of opinion that both these objects would be attained, if full powers were vested in the First Commissioner, to act in all matters of direction and of appointments to office, with the sanction of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. By this plan, the First Commissioner would be subordinate to the Treasury, instead of being, as he now is, subordinate to the Board; and the Chancellor of the Exchequer would necessarily become acquainted with all the details of the administration of the laws, and be able to take upon himself, as he ought to do, in Parliament, the responsibility of their being duly enforced. The First Commissioner ought not to be a Peer, or a Member of the House of Commons; for this would take responsibility away from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who alone should be responsible, and would lead to a change in the office of First Commissioner, with every change of Ministers, and thus place the power of the department in the hands of some subordinate officer.

"In order effectually to secure the authority of the First Commissioner, what the other Commissioners would have to do, ought to be defined. They should be subordinate to the First Commissioner, and serve as assistants to him; and, as such, they should be called 'Assistant-Commissioners.'"

Other reasons, fully as conclusive, why the commissioners of a Board should not be co-equal, and why the First Commissioner ought not to be a Peer or a Member of the House of Commons, are given in paragraphs preceding and following those above quoted. And, further, they recommend, "that one member of a Board be selected from the officers on the establishment."

In constructing a Board for the management of the Post-Office, Ministers have now an opportunity of creating a Revenue Board on those principles which, in practice, have been found to work so well at the Treasury, the Admiralty, the Ordnance, the Woods and Forests, and the India Board of Control; and there cannot be a doubt but that it will be found to work at the Post-Office with greater benefit to the public than if they were to follow the advice of the Duke of Richmond, and, on the appointment of a Post-Master General, "take a pledge from him that he would discharge the duties of his office in person," with an understanding that, "if he did not, they would do their duty, and recommend his Majesty to discharge a person who disgraced the office he held." Even under the obligation of such a pledge, subject to the penalty of the condition annexed to it, it may reasonably be doubted whether a Peer, or any other person of high pretensions, possessed of a large fortune, that would command for him the pleasures of the race-course and the sports of the field, would strictly attend to the duties of the office. And as to exacting a pledge on taking office, other than the usual oath or declaration of office, it is the first time that it has been suggested; and the merit of the suggestion, if there is merit in it, belongs to the Noble Duke. It is true that it is common to exact a pledge from children, that they will do that which is imposed on them; but with "children of a large growth," their acceptance of an appointment is deemed to be a pledge that they will discharge its duties.

The Duke of Richmond, in adverting to the Packet Establishment, referred to Return, No. I., Appendix A, in the sixth Report of the Committee of Inquiry, which shews, in that branch of the service, in four years preceding the 5th January 1836, an expenditure of £154,965 : 14 : 4½, and which, in round numbers, he stated, "gave an average of about £45,000 a-year." He next stated that, "during three years of his experience of the contract-system for conveying the mails to Hamburgh and Rotterdam, the average loss had been £19,000 per annum." He then asked these two questions—"Now, suppose they had taken all the packets by contract, what would have been the loss?" and, "Could his noble friend (Lord Duncannon) expect that his letters could be carried for nothing?" The public did not expect nor wish to have their letters carried for nothing; but they expect that the Government will see that they are carried at as little expense as possible; and it cannot be supposed that, because the three years' average for carrying the mails to Hamburgh and Rotterdam by contract, the one distant from London more than two hundred leagues, the other more than ninety, was a cost of £19,000 per annum, that it necessarily follows that each of the other packet stations would cost the same amount, when two of them—viz., Dover and Calais, and Portpatrick and Donaghadee—are not separate one-tenth of the shortest of these distances; and the vessels that navigate the passages are not a quarter of the size of those to which he alluded. His Grace then complained that no account had been taken by the Post-Office of the packet postage, as a set-off against the "loss." That, however, is not material to a correct view of the case; as the same amount, be it what it may, would stand in the account to the credit of the Post-Office, if all the mails conveyed by water were under contract. If all the mails conveyed by water were under contract, the packet postage would be the only item on the credit side of the account. But that is not the question. The matter for consideration is, which would be the least expensive system to the country—to contract for, or continue to be owners of the mail packets? £45,000, as stated by the Duke of Richmond, is not the total annual loss that the country sustains on account of the Packet Establishment; but only the loss that is sustained IN ADDITION TO A TOTAL LOSS OF CAPI-TAL, as may be seen by a reference to the same return, at the foot of which, and immediately under "Loss, £154,956: 14: 4½," is the following memorandum:—"Note—The above is EXCLUSIVE OF PRIME COST AND OUTFIT; and the Accountant-General has not the means of distinguishing, in the expense at Holyhead, that portion of the stores which may have been expended in the repair of steam-packets belonging to the other stations." Or, in other words, the accounts, when accounts could be found, were so unintelligibly kept that no one could understand them. The Holyhead packet-agent stated that "there was not a book in the dock-yard for the accuracy of which he could answer." And Mr M'Knight, a naval officer of experience, conversant with dock-yard practice, sent by the Admiralty to Holyhead, to examine the accounts, stated, that "they were so complicated as to afford no check on the remains in store," and that "in many cases there were no books or accounts." Such a state of things existing at the principal depot, it cannot be a matter of astonishment that the Accountant-General could not make a detailed return of the expenditure of stores for each packet; and the country can only look upon Sir Henry Freeling, (who was the Assistant-Secretary, and "whose special duty," this Accountant-general stated, "it was to judge of the propriety of the expenditure,") and Mr Goddard, (who was the head of the Holyhead establishment,) to be equally culpable. As it is, therefore, beyond a doubt that the Post-office cannot furnish a satisfactory return of "the total annual loss that the country has sustained on account of the Packet Establishment; the following statement, to supply that defect, is compiled, by estimating for such periods as are not shewn in the Reports of the Commissioners of Revenue Inquiry, or returns to Parliament:—

The Commissioners of Revenue Inquiry, in their 22d Report, at page 6, state, that "The total loss, in nine years, from 1821 to 5th January 1830, exclusive of any charge for interest on the amount invested, must be considered at about . . .	£300,000	0	0"
For the two years, from 5th January 1830 to 5th Jan. 1832, a return cannot be found; therefore, the loss is estimated at two-ninths of the above sum, viz., .	66,666	13	4
For the next four years, from 5th January 1832, to 5th January 1836, the amount is taken from Return No. 1, Appendix A, quoted by the Duke of Richmond, viz., .	154,956	14	4½
Making, in fifteen years, over and above the "prime cost and outfit," a further investment of .	£521,623	7	8½
Carry over,	£521,623	7	8½

Brought over, .	£521,623	7	8½
This amount, being the excess of expenditure over the amount of "receipts for passage money," &c., becomes an investment, for which the country is entitled to interest, and which is calculated, as well as the interest on the "prime cost and outfit," at the low rate of £5 per cent. per annum. Therefore, £300,000 loss in nine years, is, at the rate of £33,333 per annum, on which amount interest is claimed, commencing with 1822, for 14, 13, 12, 11, 10, 9, 8, 7, and 6 years respectively, viz.,	149,940	0	0
For £66,666 loss in two years, interest is claimed on £33,333 for five and four years respectively, viz., ...	14,994	0	0
Three years' interest on £45,438, lost in 1833, (Return No. 1, Appendix A, 6th Report,) is, . .	6,813	0	0
Two years' interest on £31,645, lost in 1834, (Return No. 1, Appendix A, 6th Report,) is . .	3,164	0	0
One year's interest on £38,970, lost in 1835, (Return No. 1, Appendix A, 6th Report,) is, .	1,948	0	0
Interest on "prime cost and outfit" of each packet, calculated from the time "when taken into the service" to 5th January 1836, (as per return to House of Commons, the 20th July 1835, No. 482,) is,	152,450	0	0
Making "a total loss," in 15 years, of . .	£850,932	7	8½

Being, on an average, at a rate per annum of £56,729, instead of £45,000, as stated by the Duke of Richmond; with a certainty of increasing the loss every year, and ultimately sinking, if not all, nearly the whole amount of the "prime cost and outfit," which amounts to about £290,000 more, making a total of £1,140,942, embarked in the Packet Establishment. This defective calculation—which is lower in amount than it ought to be, and considerably below Mr Wallace's estimate as reported in the newspapers—will therefore assist in forming a judgment, Whether it will be advisable for the public to continue packet owners? It then becomes a question whether they shall remain under the Post-Office or be transferred to the Admiralty, as recommended by the Commissioners of Inquiry, in their sixth Report, at page 20; and "their cost of repairs and replacement, as well as the rest of the expenditure incurred on their account, be annually submitted to Parliament in the Navy Estimates." The latter appears to be the most rational mode of controlling the establishment so long as it continues the property of the public; as it is impossible, (as is justly remarked by the "Commissioners of Excise Inquiry," page 52,) "that the expenditure of the Post-Office on steam packets could have been carried on in the negligent way in which it has been described by the Commissioners of Inquiry to have been carried on, if the expenses had been annually voted by Parliament." Nor could Sir Henry Freeling have exercised the undue preference in favour of Mr Graham of Norwich, that may be inferred from several paragraphs at and near to page 74 of the twenty-second Report of the Commissioners of Revenue Inquiry, that he did exercise in his favour, by giving him the contract to build seven of these packets, at a cost of £94,566; or, at an excess, compared with the prices of other builders, varying from £3: 5s. to £10 per ton. These Commissioners say—"In building vessels of corresponding tonnage, prices differing considerably (to the amount of 7 per cent.) have been contracted for with this same builder, Mr Graham, by whom your Lordships may observe more than one-third of the vessels have been built. Your Lordships will further remark that the rates of the contract prices with this gentleman have been, (in corresponding cases as to tonnage, with one exception,) uniformly higher than those of any other private builder; and in the proportions already stated in the cases which have been compared above. These facts have suggested inquiry. Mr G. H. Freeling stated that the differences in the contract prices of Mr Graham for vessels built by himself were, in some measure at least, owing to the different modes of fitting up; but your Lordships will perceive that this explanation cannot extend to a comparison with vessels furnished by other builders, and similarly fitted up: neither does it seem to us to account for the excess of the tonnage rate under the contracts with Mr Graham, compared with other builders' prices, both in the river and at the outposts."

The only reason that could be extracted by the Commissioners from Sir Henry Freeling, why so great a preference had been given to Mr Graham over other builders, was this very unsatisfactory one, "that he is the son-in-law of one of the captains"—Captain Hamilton, one of the Dover captains.

Anything like the "hole-and-corner" system of contracting for packets, that may be inferred from the twenty-second Report of the Commissioners of Revenue Inquiry, to have been practised by Sir Henry Freeling, need not be feared, now that a high-minded, honourable man like Colonel Maberly occupies the post of Secretary of the department; still, for the reasons assigned by the Commissioners of Inquiry at page 19 of their sixth Report, it would doubtless be more satisfactory to the country that, in future, until the mails are conveyed by sea under contract, the building and repairs of the packets for the Post-Office service be effected in one of the King's Yards; or, if that be found to be inconvenient, that their building and repairs be contracted for and superintended by one of the King's master builders. The Commissioners say—"We have stated that we advise your Lordships to propose to the Lords of the Admiralty to undertake the management of the steam packet establishments; we conceive that the business and expenditure of the stations, the building, outfit, and maintenance of the vessels, the care of the stores, the appointment of the commanders, and the navigation of the packets, will be much better placed under the control of a department conversant with such subjects, than under one which possesses no practical knowledge or experience in them; and we believe that such a transfer would be preferable, both with respect to efficiency and economy, to an attempt to introduce into the General Post-Office, officers acquainted with dock-yards and steam-vessels, for the purpose of superintending this particular service."

On the whole, as a general measure, the attempts that the Ministers made, during the past sessions of Parliament, to reform the abuses of this important establishment, to say the least of them, were characterised with dilatoriness, if not insincerity, and had the effect of paralysing all the efforts to that end of the Commissioners of Inquiry, and of the honourable Member for Greenock. It is to be hoped that these parties will be more fortunate with the measures they may contemplate bringing forward during the next session; from the burden of some of which it is anticipated they may be relieved by the activity of Colonel Maberly; but others, of a graver character, (such as the cause of removal of Sir Edward Lees from a patent office on the Dublin establishment, worth £1500 or £1600 per annum, the duties of which he performed for many years with great ability and advantage to the public, to one at Edinburgh with only £600 per annum, to be held during the pleasure of the Post-Master-General—of the dismissal of Mr Anstey from the post-mastership of Bath—and of several other persons from the situations which they held in the department, without assigning any reason, or making them any compensation for their length of service,) require not only a public explanation, but also, if any of the parties were removed without just cause, that they should be reinstated or compensated for the loss they have sustained. This duty Mr Wallace seems to have taken upon himself single-handed. The public will look anxiously to the result.

The great axiom of the late Secretary, Sir Francis Freeling, was, by screwing the impost upon letters to the uttermost, to make as large a Post-Office revenue as was possible, little thinking that accommodation and liberality might attain his object to a greater extent; for he had not perception enough to discover that excessive taxation will be successfully evaded.

The Post-Office of this country is the most rigid, exclusive, and absolute monopoly that can exist anywhere; and, in return, every accommodation and dispatch, together with cheapness, in the transmission of letters, should be afforded. Very few can be found to doubt that a reduction of postage would greatly relieve the public, and would not, ultimately, diminish the revenue. This view of the matter has never been advanced by any Post-Master-General, nor by the late Secretary, whose chief object appeared to be allowed to jog on in the old way; and, with this view, he had tact enough to perceive that the Duke of Richmond, his only defender, fancied himself a man of business, and was desirous of being considered as such. It therefore became an easy matter for Sir Francis Freeling to make the Duke his stalking horse, by cajoling him on his weak point, thereby enlisting him as the strenuous defender of all the abuses going on at St Martin's le Grand, and ultimately the assertor that those were guilty of nothing less than libel who dared to impugn the management of the Post-Office, or the Secretary.

The conduct of Ministers on this question has scarcely been of a character to convince the public that they really desired the reforms pointed out; therefore, their proceedings in the approaching session will be watched with that degree of attention and jealousy which apathy or truckling ever creates.

We shall point out a few cases of the inefficiency of the present system—and every locality may furnish others. How absurd is it that a letter from Manchester to Brighton must remain for fourteen hours in the General Post-Office without being dispatched! This is but one case out of hundreds. The consequence is, that the correspondent at Manchester often encloses his letter to a friend in London, to be forwarded to Brighton by coach many hours before the Post-Office dispatches the mail. The same delay holds in returning an answer from Brighton to Manchester. It is alleged that letters are sometimes sent by circuitous routes, to increase the postage. This seems incredible; but such things are said; and no grounds should be left for such accusations against a public institution. We shall now throw out a few loose hints for practical improvements of the system. Many contend, in London and great cities, for a Sunday penny-post and regular delivery of letters. We shall not enter upon this difficult question; but others are open.

The charging letters by weight has, in some degree, received a sanction in the recent regulations with regard to France; it is certainly the most equitable way, as admitting of no surcharges, while double, treble, &c., are often equivocal and at the discretion of the Post-Master. And here we would observe that the ties of kindred, &c., making the interchange of letters between the poor indispensable, postage is, at its present rates, to them very onerous and grievous; and, from the awkward and cumbersome manner in which they fold their letters, they are often charged double, which they (from their ignorance how to proceed) seldom get rectified, or take for granted as quite correct. The French first rate of charge, is for all letters under 7½ grammes. Now, the gramme is a little more than fifteen English grains. (The difference of English and French grains is, that five English make six grains French.) The first rate, therefore, is under 112 English grains. The English avoirdupois ounce is 437½ English grains; our quarter of an ounce, therefore, 109 grains, (without fractions,) answers very well, and is sufficiently conformable to the French standard. Moderately, their paper will come within this regulation. For instance, the ordinary quarto sheet on which people write, weighs 106 English grains; but it would only admit to be wafered, and not sealed with wax—the weight, 109 grains, however, would answer very well, as there is a paper manufactured, called "bankers' post," which is very suitable. The system of auxiliary mails should be quite done away with, (and, we believe, there is only one now existing,) which is transferring the letters from London to a given place, at some intermediate place, from a regular mail to a heavy coach, to complete the route. We believe Great Yarmouth is the only place so served; having its London letters given up and taken up at Ipswich by the Norwich mail; and this arrangement, we see by a paragraph in The Morning Chronicle of 25th October last, occasions a retardment of from four to five hours in comparison with Bristol—a place equidistantly situate, having no auxiliary mail, but one continuous mail.

The hours fixed for receiving twopenny post letters in the metropolis, and, still more, the threepenny or country letters, are inconvenient and should be altered. The time taken for collecting and sorting the twopenny letters might be easily shortened from two hours to one hour. The letters may be collected from three miles, (the distance,) and deposited in the Head Post Office, at St Martin's le Grand, in twenty-five minutes, and the sorting can be done in half-an-hour. The French petite poste has its levées as follows:—

1st	Levée, at	7	o'clock, A.M.
2d	Levée, at	9	do.
3d	Levée, at	11	do.
4th	Levée, at	1	o'clock, P.M.
5th	Levée, at	3	do.
6th	Levée, at	5	do.
7th	Levée, at	7	do.

This last levée is distributed early the following day. This is a better distribution—being seven times a-day; while, in London, there are but six deliveries. In London, there are only two deliveries for Richmond, for instance, in the same day as the letter is dropped into the Post-office; and these are to be posted by 8 A.M. and 2 P.M. The other delivery, (which must be posted at 5 P.M.,) takes place the following morning; and, paradoxical as it would appear, a person living near Manchester Square had, in the neighbourhood, (Vere Street,) both a general and twopenny post; at the former, he could post a letter for Bristol at 6¾ P.M., which would be delivered at Bristol at 9 A.M. the following morning; while, if he posted a letter at five minutes after 5 P.M. in the twopenny Post-office, at the corner of the very same street, for Richmond, not ten miles off, it would not be delivered till between 12 and 1 P.M. of the following day; and, if posted on a Saturday, it would not be delivered till past noon on Monday. Might it not also be arranged that a letter might be sent between such places as Richmond and Walthamstow, so as to receive an answer on the same day? At all events, letters for the country (or threepenny post) might be collected at 4 or 5 P.M., and distributed that evening. This is but one local illustration of the defects of the system; but it is conclusive of the necessity of improvement. The conduct of Ministers on this question, hitherto, has scarcely been of a kind to convince the public that they wished improvement. Their future conduct will be watched.

RHYMED RAMBLES.—PART I.

BY EBENEZER ELLIOTT.

TO MISS B——.

"WRITE me a song for Betsey," said thy sire:
Lady! it is already written—here,
On the charged brain, in tears, and gloom, and fire:
Read it when I am dust. My waning year
Is shaking down its leaves; I soon shall be Safe, even from myself, where pain and fear
Disturb not him who sleepeth. Then, to thee
The buried dead shall speak, and thou shalt hear
A spirit's voiceless words. He shall appear
To thee, when awe is silence in thy soul;
Yea, thou with him shalt go, whithersoe'er
His feet have been. The lifeless shall control
The living, and, though worlds between ye roll,
Dwell with thee in his thoughts, or linger near.
Then, lady! gaze with me o'er Wharncliffe lone;
And stand, in thought, on Kinder's crest sublime;
And hear a prophet's voice, from Grina Stone,
Denounce thy country's tyrants in my rhyme.
Oh, that the lyre of Milton were my own,
And calm Peronnet Thompson's mental might!
Or that my verse were mountain thunders, blown
As from a trumpet in the dead of night!
Then would I do the poor of Britain right;
Then should my song, like Russia's winter, freeze
Abaddon's host, guilt-petrified in flight;
And the rous'd spirit of Demosthenes,
Strong as heaven's flame from tempests ranged for fight,
Fulmine o'er darken'd lands a storm of light.

MONUMENT AT WENTWORTH.

HITHER I came—when life itself was new,
And new this form of greatness dead and gone—
To tremble in the gloom which draws and drew
A purple veil o'er death, like life in stone.
This man a pitying look on frailty threw;
Knaves called him weak—but when was virtue weak?
And I have heard a matron, good and true,
Speak of him with a tear upon her cheek.
Oh, ye who wring the heart until it break,
And scourge pale nations with the wealth ye steal!
Here, if late pardon for your crimes ye seek,
To your cold souls the thoughts ye dread reveal—
Think of your vulture, and his gory beak!
And of mild Wentworth's deeds, with humbled malice speak.

THRYBERG.

SCENES of my thoughtless youth! here are ye all—
Dalton! and Dalton school! and Dalton Deign!
But changed ye are, or I am. Mean and small
Ye seem, and humbled. Sunk into the plain,
The hill is dwarf'd with age; its coronal
The glen hath lost, its ferny plumes, and, more Than these, its freedom! Thryberg's verdant wall
Is here, and there the oak I knew of yore;
But who to me their grandeur can restore?
My heart hath made them bankrupt. Where they stood
Stand Wentworth's halls; but not, as heretofore,
Portalled for gods. Oh, far-known Silverwood!
Oh, caverned Ravensfield! Don, flowing o'er
A narrower bed, bathes now a tamer shore.
Thou only, Wincobank, reign'st undespoiled,
King of the valley of my youth and prime,
Through which the river, like a snake uncoiled,
Wanders—though tamed, a match for conquering time.
Behind thee mountains, solemn and sublime,
Take from the stooping skies their purply gold;
And could I in that brightness steep my rhyme,
And steal yon glow of green and crimson, rolled
Far o'er the realms of evening's western clime,
A tale of Nature's splendour should be told,
Which Byron might transcribe for Scott, and deem
That earth, like heaven, hath scenes which grow not old.
Oh, let me dip my pencil in thy beam,
Thou setting sun! ere death cut short this fevered dream.

WENTWORTH HOUSE.

"NOW, for the enchanted palace of our youth!"
But what have I with palaces to do,
Taught as I am, by nature, time, and truth,
That pride can envy pomp, and hate it, too?
Yes; but the ideal of the fair and true
Lives here in marble, by creative mind
Made sacred to the glory of mankind;
And if ideal beauty cannot woo
Thy steps to enter Taste's proud temple—Go!
Yet, wherefore? Wentworth's princely halls can shew,
By Vandyke limned, the form of one who knew
How best to strike a tyrant's basest blow:
Behold him! nor to curse his crimes be slow—
Behold fell Strafford! man's and freedom's foe!

PORTRAIT AT WENTWORTH.

WAS he, then, human? Tools of tyrants! could
This face be Strafford's? Strafford's, who his hands
Wrung in Hibernia's hair, and, drunk with blood,
Called murder wisdom? Brutal as his bands,
He startled hell with crime. His savage mood
Nor pity sooth'd, nor reason's might could bow.
But Hampden dared withstand him—Pym withstood;
And men were found who laid his master low,
And sent the servant whither tyrants go.
His rugged heart, at length, strange pangs have riven:
There is a touch of feeling on his brow,
"For pledges left him by a saint in heaven."
No more than this could royal Charles allow?—
"Put not your trust in Princes!"—Why didst thou?

RETROSPECTION.

WORLD of my boyhood! art thou what thou wast?
Seen through the melancholy mist of years,
Thy woods a pale, diminish'd shadow cast

O'er thoughts grown grey, and feelings dimm'd with tears.
Our spirits, biggened by their griefs and fears,
Sadden and dwindle, with their backward view,
All they behold. Chang'd world! thy face appears Poor as the toy that pleas'd when life was new,
And mournful as th' inscription, trite and true,
That lingers on our little sister's grave.
Roch Abbey! Canklow! Aldwark! if I crave
A boy's first rapture, from the milkworts blue,
Will your lov'd flowers assume a pensive hue?
Or smile as once they smil'd, still growing where they grew?

MEMOIR AND DISCOURSES OF THE LATE REV. JOHN BROWN PATTERSON OF FALKIRK.*

The Church of Scotland has not produced many great luminaries within the present century. Dr Chalmers, Dr Andrew Thomson, and a few other distinguished individuals in the Church, belong properly to a rather earlier date. Literature and science have, in Scotland, for a time, outstripped the pulpit, both in rapidity of movement and extent of developement and influence. This circumstance has drawn an almost overweening degree of attention to dawning indications of superior intellect among those young men who promised to fill up the dreary blank left in letters and in the Church, by the extinction of those greater lights, the Robertsons, Blairs, and Erskines. A more than common degree of interest—an almost universal sensation—was therefore experienced among churchmen, old and young, by the early and hopeful beginnings of the highly-gifted and estimable subject of the Memoir prefixed to the above-named discourses.

It is, however, very probable that Mr Patterson's name may never even have been heard of in those English and Irish circles through which this periodical is widely diffused. Yet, we believe that all those who have read with interest and improvement of Oberlin and Felix Neff, of Heber and Charles Wolff, will receive with pleasure our very brief notice of a kindred mind in Scotland, though his range of usefulness was neither so remarkable nor commanding, and though an early death closed his brilliant career before he had well entered upon his ministerial functions.

Mr Patterson first became known to the world of letters, existing beyond college walls, by an essay upon "The National Character of the Athenians," for which he was, in 1827, awarded one hundred guineas, a prize offered by the royal commissioners for visiting the Universities and Colleges of Scotland. His essay was approved over those of twenty-four youthful competitors, all upon their mettle; and this early triumph at once fixed his place in literature as one of height and mark, and cleared his way to rapid advancement in the Church. The gainer of so honourable a distinction found a ready patron in Mr Peel, (then the Home Secretary,) who, to do him justice, seemed to wish to administer the crown patronage of the Kirk as impartially as the interference of the Scottish principle of favouring "kith, kin, and allies" would permit him. From Mr Peel, to whom his chief recommendations must have been his attainments, excellent character, and qualifications for the sacred office, Mr Patterson obtained the living of Falkirk. The offices of well-wishers and friendly solicitors were probably not wanting; but we hear nothing of them; and the Home Secretary would, from the biography, seem to have spontaneously discovered the merits of the unknown candidate, and to have provided for him.

It might have been imagined, from Mr Patterson's lineage and early training, that his natural place would have been the Secession Church; but this disappointment is of the less consequence, as he fulfilled the duties of the station which he held by preference, to the admiration of all men, whether members of the Establishment or Dissenters. Mr Patterson's maternal grandfather was the Rev. John Brown of Haddington—a man "whose praise is in all the churches." His connexions must thus have been numerous among the Dissenting clergy of Scotland; and this alone must have had considerable influence upon his education and future destination. Yet he followed the natural worldly course, and pushed upwards from Dissent to Establishment.

In 1810, at the age of six years, he came, with his widowed mother, to Edinburgh, from Alnwick, the place of his birth, for the benefit of instruction in the public seminaries. He appears to have made an honourable progress in his earlier studies, and to have endeared himself, by his personal qualities, to his school companions.

Though some readers would have forgiven the biographer the specimens of Patterson's school exercises, his account of the internal economy of the Edinburgh High School will, we believe, prove generally acceptable. But, when he cites Mr Patterson's subsequent eulogium on public schools, without explanation, we fear that mere English readers may be apt to confound the system of Eton, Harrow, and Rugby with that of the High School of Edinburgh. Nothing, morally speaking, can be more opposite. At the latter seminary, the boys have all the advantages of a public school, with complete protection from its pernicious influences or positive contamination. They either live, like John Patterson, in the bosom of their own families, or in the domestic circle of relatives and friends. They inhale the salutary atmosphere of home. They are not bound and bundled together in the cold-hearted or polluting contact of the large boarding houses, attached to the English public schools. John Brown Patterson and his schoolfellows pursued their tasks under the affectionate and anxious eye of those nearest and dearest to them; and, as the noble contest drew near, which disturbed the rest of the ardent and emulous boy, the whole family, young and old, often felt as much interested in the gaining of a higher place in the class, or in the fate of an exercise, as the young scholar himself. Patterson concludes an account of the discipline and system of the school in these words:—

Such is a meagre outline of the picture which yet lives in all its freshness in my mind. But how shall I transfer to paper the rainbow-hues of delight, and the active and vigorous spirit with which the original was clothed and animated, and which made the hours of school and of study—usually the most irksome of a boy's existence—those which I enjoyed most when present, and looked back upon with most complacency when past? Shall I attempt to describe the companions who made what was delightful in school and on Arthur's Seat more pleasant, and what was laborious and mortifying more tolerable?

Mr Patterson's career at college was as distinguished as in the rector's class at school. His letters written at this period, when he was only about the age of sixteen, shew a marked superiority both in thought and diction to ordinary puerile epistles, and in some instances, an almost precocious developement of intellect. We have, however, to regret that those published are only such letters as a young, aspiring student might write to his classfellow; for personal history and traits of individual character in boyhood are very scanty. Of domestic, confidential letters—those heart over-brimming letters which are the most fascinating of all—there are none embodied in the Memoir. Most of the epistles published, appear to have been addressed to one person, probably Mr Patterson's biographer; and, though perfectly free and friendly, they are in general not in any way characteristic nor remarkable, save as they bear upon the events of the writer's studies or professional life.

The few scraps we shall select as specimens of his habits and power of thought, have a reflected interest, from their reference to well-known scenes and contemporary characters, or to his early opinions upon books and studies. The writer was still under twenty.

I have resided for some weeks with Mr Pillans here, at Duddingstone, where, amidst books, and trees, and water, and the choicest society, I have been almost intoxicated with pleasure. I met with the Ettrick Shepherd lately. He is excessively uncouth in manner and conversation, but withal exhibiting ever and anon gleams of poetic inspiration when he mentions his native hills and torrents.

We demur to the "excessive uncouthness." Mr Patterson could not have been bred in the most polished circles. A judge of manners equally good, Mrs Elizabeth Hamilton, says—"I have seen the Ettrick Shepherd. He is a man of rustic, but not coarse manners."

I am glad to hear that the Glasgow students are so distinguished by dignity of moral feeling as you represent. At the same time, I do think that if Aristophanes is to be read at all, there is only a choice of evils—either to proceed dashing through everything moral or immoral as it occurs, or by stammering and hammering at circuitous expressions and doubles entendres to excite attention and curiosity: which is the preferable, I do not know.

I don't know whether you have read Brown's Lectures. If not, you have one of the greatest intellectual treats yet to taste which you can enjoy. His acute analysis, his discriminating sagacity, and his fervid eloquence, distinguish him as the first philosopher, in my opinion, who has appeared since Locke, whose system he has so ably vindicated from the cavils of Dr Reid.

. . . . . .

"Have you read Peveril? It is no doubt a wonderful production; but I should scarcely rate it higher than in the second class of the series. It contains much of graphic delineation, but little poetic painting. The general character of the times which it describes comes on the mind with the vivid and powerful impression of reality. The tissue of the tale is marked with utter improbability. There is considerable power, but little unity of interest; many masterly sketches, but no finished portrait; much vigorous writing, but little concentration of thought, and less depth of feeling or impetus of passion.

"What think you of the insolence of that unholy alliance against the liberties of nations and the birthrights of man? The despots who were lately fain to kiss the feet of the conqueror, dare to insult a nation which, in the plenitude of his power, maintained towards him a front of stern and steady opposition! An imbecile, at their suggestion, tells the heroic Spanish nation, that the rights it purchased with the blood of the brave are only to be held rightfully from its Bourbon sovereign; and, to enforce the doctrine, musters his degraded myrmidons! I have no fear for the result. Where the word of kings is, there may be power; but where the word of Freedom is, there is omnipotence.

This is that noble ardent spirit of first youth, which it is always so grateful to see unfold.

Read Godwin's "Caleb Williams." It is a work of very great power and interest. Its style is one of naked and self-dependent strength, unaccompanied with gaudy colouring or unnatural distortion. It is severe and simple as the Torso of Hercules.

I read "Vathek," by Mr Beckford, late proprietor of Fonthill Abbey. It seems a work of considerable genius, displaying great boldness and copiousness of imagination, an extensive mastery of striking and beautiful diction, and a skilful arrangement of the lights and shadows of composition. The great objection to the work, is its total want of object and abiding impression. You rise from its perusal as you would have retired from his abbey—dazzled with the multitudinous sparkling of gaudy ornaments—dissipated with the multiplicity of bright and oriental luxuries—sated with voluptuous feeling—but destitute of any permanent sentiment of utility or of comfort. The moral at the end is nothing; for the details of the work have no bearing on it, nor any subordinate meaning of their own.

. . . The phrenologists talk much about Lord Bacon; but they seem to have forgotten that it is a principle of the inductive philosophy that nothing shall be assumed as the cause of a phenomenon which is not known to exist in nature. Now, that the different portions of the brain vary in activity, is not known to be an arrangement of nature; while, that they vary in size, is plain from experience. But the one supposition is as necessary to the system as the other.

Many pleasing extracts are given from a journal of a residence and short tour to the Highland frontier, and a visit to Lady Keith and her husband. A first tour, like a first love, makes the youth enthusiastic and eloquent, who can travel over the same ground afterwards "all aflat." He winds up a description of a general historical survey, in which he had one day been engaged with Count Flahault, an old officer of Napoleon's staff, with this weighty sentiment:—

Finally, we attended the steps of that most terrible of conquerors, who gave that last and mightiest impulse to the social system, from the agitation of which the world has not yet recovered its equilibrium, and which has given to all its parts a freedom and energy of acting which tyrants will in vain attempt to counteract by the ancient obstacles. The whole contemplation is one of wonder and mystery.

Mr Patterson, over whom no college session passed without adding to his academic triumphs, generally spent part of the summer vacation in some pleasant part of the country with his friends. The summer of 1824 was spent at Craigflower in the western border of Fifeshire; and from thence his letters assume a more earnest character. He had now fixed his thoughts upon the Church; and his mind was deeply occupied with those things which concerned his eternal peace. The extracts, shewing the fermenting of his mind, we must nearly omit; but this rural picture though elaborate, is so engaging and sweetly-toned, that we cannot forbear pointing it out to the notice of our younger readers, with this slight introduction of graver matter.

The glorious sunsets of summer used to prove a strong and rather successful temptation to linger abroad till it was too late to sit down to one's books. This allurement is removed, and I have better improved my time. My chief study has been the Greek New Testament. It is amazing what light the study of the original text throws over the scope and meaning of the Scriptures. I am glad to find that I love the study of the simple Bible more than I used to do, and am more sensible to its force. It is a good feeling with which to enter on the study of theology, and as such I hail it.

This leads to our country Sabbath Day.

I awoke amid the sunshine and the fragrance of a lovely morning, and I felt, in the hallowed stillness in which all nature lay reposing, that it was the Sabbath Day; for nature knows the day of rest. The trees waved their verdant locks slowly and solemnly, as if adoring; the ocean murmured its sublime and reverent worship; a bleating voice of thanksgiving came from the mountains; the timid hare and the little birds came joyously forth, nor fled from the face of man; for the hare and the bird knew that on this day no spoiler will come up against them. The heart of Nature overflowed with delight; and cold must have been the heart which did not participate the joy.

But this day hath loftier pleasures for man than the mere animal delight of beautiful, and odoriferous, and exhilarating sensations. It is consecrated to mighty remembrances. It is the commemoration of the period when the birth-song of the world was sung on high by the glad morning-stars, and of that day-spring, nobler still, when the redemption of the human soul was consumated in the triumphant resurrection of the Lord.

I went abroad amid the beauty of nature, and, as I went, I read of her rising from the unapparent deep, as it is recorded, in sublime simplicity, by the Shepherd beloved of God, and inspired by the true Urania. And then, from the birth of time, I passed onwards to its fulness, when a new created star proclaimed to the Eastern sages, and a celestial choir sung to to the Hebrew shepherds, the advent of the Saviour. Oh! there is nothing in all poetry so sublime as that simple and unostentatious narrative which records the coming of the Messiah. There was humility in the birth, but no meanness. Nothing was pompous—everything was sublime. . . . . .

The Sabbath-bell now pealed from among the trees, and the rustic worshippers were seen winding down from the uplands to the house of prayer. The services were conducted by a youthful minister with much devotional ardour, occasionally warming into powerful eloquence, but generally maintaining the level of unaffected yet striking simplicity, which befitted the character of his audience. His subject was picturesque and rural—Abraham sitting in his tent-door, and, unawares, becoming the host of angels.

In the interval of the service, I walked down the shore by a neighbouring village, where I proposed to worship in the afternoon. It was a lovely day; and I could not help pausing to gaze on the Sabbath-beauty of nature. I sat upon a lofty rock that overlooked the sea. The face of ocean wreathed itself into ten thousand sparkling smiles beneath the bright kisses of the sunbeams; and, amid the solemn stillness, the sound of the grazing of the flocks came up from the pasture below, and blended with the nearer hum of the wild-bee, and the faint distant tolling of the bell. A genial shower had refreshed the fields and the groves, and they sent up their thanks to heaven in clouds of fragrant incense. I was lost in contemplation, when my attention was engaged by a low murmuring sound which issued from behind a hedge on my right. I went silently up to the spot, and I perceived that, on the other side of the hedge, there lay a little pastoral valley; and on its bank, close to the overshadowing and blossoming hawthorn, I saw a rustic group seated around an aged man, who read to them from the Word of God. It was the history of Joseph that engaged their attention; and it was beautiful to remark how, at every touch of tenderness and simple pathos with which that enchanting story is so thickly interspersed, their hearts responded in harmony, and how they dwelt upon the words, repeating them once and again, till they were satiated with their sweetness. But the quickened tones of the bell warned them and me to hasten forwards to the sanctuary. It was no temple made with hands; but a majestic minster roofed with the blue sky, erected by Nature to the glory of her Maker. A verdant bank sloped upwards from the sea-beach to the base of a giant rock, which flung forth from its summit, and from innumerable rifts in its shattered side, a grand canopy of foliage into the air. At the lower extremity stood the rustic pulpit; and, all along the bank, sat the expectant auditors. The broad sunlight rested on the scene, except where the tremulous shadow of the trees played fantastically from above. . . . . .

The evening hours I spent in meditation and perusal of God's Word. There is, in a retired corner of the grounds of Craigflower, the ruin of an ancient church, surrounding and surrounded by mouldering sepulchres. Thither I repaired in the grey twilight, and, seated on a tomb, meditated on the mortality and immortality of man. I read, in harmony with the scene, the exquisite verses which Herbert Knowles composed in a similar situation. The echo of the ruin, like a voice from the grave, answered at every solemn cadence. It was a fear and a joy to listen: I remained riveted to the melancholy spot, till the long, ghost-like shadows of the tombstones were lost in the general darkness.

Such was Mr Patterson's preparation for entering upon the study of theology, after the Church had been fixed upon as his future profession, instead of the bar or a Professor's chair, both of which had been under the consideration of himself and his friends. He did not repent of his less ambitious choice; but, on the contrary, gave himself up to the Christian ministry with entire and warm dedication. An exceedingly interesting statement is given, from his private papers, of the judicious and sober-minded manner in which he commenced his theological studies. To these, for some years, he gave up nearly his whole time. It was, however, during this period, that the brilliant prize essay was composed, which drew him into wider honourable notice.

In 1828, Mr Patterson became private tutor to Lord Cranstoun, whom he accompanied to Oxford. What the Scottish student, reared among the Seceders, thought of this aristocratic University after he had attained the highest honours and distinctions in his own, does excite curiosity and possess interest. His pictures are also, we think, lively, and not overcharged.

There is something very imposing, I must confess, about the whole appearance of Oxford, arising not merely from the style of execution by which its edifices are distinguished, but from their affluence in respect of number, and their crowdedness in respect of space. Twenty-four colleges and seventeen parish churches, besides numerous other buildings, belonging, not to particular colleges, but to the university in general; with groves and gardens, and avenues of majestic trees and branches, and windings numberless of classic streams, shadowed with the sails, or flashing to the oars of gay decorated pleasure-boats—and all resounding with the incessant pealing of uncounted bells—give the place the appearance of being less intended for the common-place uses of humanity—for men and women being born, and living, and marrying, and dying in—than any other you can name. The same idea which the town suggests, is reflected from the appearance of the population, of which the predominant and striking feature is the multitude of academic dresses, in all their mystical varieties of purple gowns, black gowns, white gowns, silk gowns, stuff gowns, linen gowns, long sleeves, half-sleeves, velvet sleeves, no sleeves at all, velvet caps, and cloth caps, with gold tassels, hoods, tippets, bands, leading-strings, &c. &c.—paraphernalia more various and unintelligible than were contained in "Old Aaron's wardrobe, or the Flamen's vestry." The young academics bear themselves, in general, with a very lofty and self-satisfied air, as much as to say, "We are the men, and all this was made for us." One is somewhat disappointed to find so little of a studious air about the place or the people. There is hard working, no doubt, in the secret cells and cloisters; but there are no external symptoms of it. The libraries are unfrequented. The "studious walks and shades" are undisturbed, save by a city-lounger or a sight-seeing stranger. The academicians, old and young, are sleek in surface and elastic in gait, and seem to have all their time at their disposal. As for the pale, languid, Kirk White style of undergraduates, whom I expected to find gliding here and there through the embowered and cloistered gloom, the being is not to be met with, in the open air at least. . . .

I have got a very comfortable set of rooms immediately opposite Christ Church, and very comfortably furnished; my sitting-parlour being garnished, moreover, with half-length portraits of jolly old Luther, and the iron-featured Calvin, the size of life, as well as the full-sized one of a brown and white pointer dog, with a nose admirably like William Pitt's!

I attended M——'s lecture on poetry in the schools. He is rather little, very dark, with an agreeable but not striking expression of countenance. . . . . M—— reads his poetry very agreeably—marking the separate feet of the line somewhat more distinctly than is usual, and pronouncing full all the anapæsts which occurred in place of iambi. There was a tone of subdued earnestness in his elocution exceedingly interesting—as if he felt more than, before a grave, black-gowned, velvet-capped audience, he thought it decorous to express—as if the poet, in short, was struggling to hide himself under the professor. The whole affair was to me very interesting, though in itself there was nothing great or profound.

After this glance at Mr Milman, we have, besides sundry full-length dinners in the noble hall of Christ-Church, this college festival:—

On Saturday, I forgot to mention of one of the annual gaudies (the contraction, I suppose, of our Scotch gaudeamus, with the true pronunciation of which (gowdeawmus) I treated some Christ-Churchmen, to their infinite merriment.) It was held in honour of Dr Fell, the dean of Christ Church, and an especial benefactor of the same—remarkable as one of the principal restorers of Episcopacy after the Rebellion, as it is here the fashion to call it—and as the servile minister of a profligate prince in the expulsion of Locke from the College and University; besides his additional fame derived from the well-known epigram of—

I do not like thee, Dr Fell.

The marks of honour paid to the day consisted in a better dinner than usual, with dessert and wine—the dean and canons dining in hall—and the dignitaries all appearing in full dress—the dean in his scarlet and black, and the noblemen in their purple and gold—together with a Latin oration delivered by the censor before dinner in praise of the ever-memorable dean—not greatly to the delight of the expectant palates of his auditors. The modern fashion of speechifying after dinner, I imagine, gives eloquence a much better chance of "great applause"—"immense cheering"—"loud laughter," and all the other symptoms of delight so dear to the trencher orator.

Let us turn for a moment to more important matters. The young Presbyterian went upon a Sunday evening to New College Chapel, in which the Cathedral service was weekly performed. The word, besides being customary, is apt and significant. He appears to have been naturally fond of good music, and yet——in short, there is a mighty difference between the following exhibition, and the tent preaching which he had witnessed on the shores of the Frith of Forth.

As a spectacle, nothing could be more magnificent: the most splendid religious edifice in this abode of splendour—as rich as sculpture and painting can render it—filled with white-robed priests and choristers—and resounding with all its echoes the melodious thunder of the finest organ in England, mingled with the full-voiced choir, in devotion and laud to the "King of Glory"—was beyond measure sublime to the eye and to the ear. Whether as a religious service it deserve approbation or not I doubt. While there were passages in the service, especially the Magnificat, and the anthem ("Lift up your heads, O ye gates," &c.,) at which devotion could scarcely remain languid—still the whole appearance and character of the thing, and especially the countenances and demeanour of the worshippers, too forcibly in general reminded you of a public exhibition. I often am tempted very much to regret the impossibility which there seems to be in the way of uniting the highest degree of physical pomp and impressiveness with the purity and simplicity of spiritual worship.

The next passage will probably give offence in some quarters; yet Mr Patterson has undoubtedly solved the riddle of Oxonian superiority in learning.

To say the truth, the Oxonian system, viewed merely as a process of instruction, abstractedly from its endowments and means of learned leisure, is—as the world is beginning to find out—most wofully deficient; and that both in respect of the matter and of the manner of education. In regard to the former point, there are absolutely not the means in Oxford of a complete and liberal education, even for those who are inclined to make use of them: the only branch of study for which there are at all adequate appliances provided being the classical department. And even in this department the celebrity of Oxford does not seem to me to depend on the mode of instruction taken by itself, but on the inducements held out, in the way of honours and rewards, to proficiency in the first instance; and then to the establishments it possesses for the support of a great number of individuals whose profession is literature, and among whom it were strange if one or two should not be found who became enthusiasts in their profession, and, having nothing else in the world to attend to, really profound and erudite scholars. This seems to me the true secret of Oxonian erudition: not that as a body the men brought up at Oxford are more learned, far less better informed, than the men educated at Edinburgh, but that Oxford does not, like Edinburgh, let her scholars go just at the moment when they have got over the preliminaries, when they have got the command of their tools, and might, if they were not called away to active service in life, begin to explore the arcana and become initiated into the greater mysteries. Put up a hundred or two rich sinecures in Edinburgh for learned men, as such; and out of the hundred you will certainly find one or two in a generation who will turn these sinecures to their intended use—the undisturbed cultivation of the pursuits of erudition. Whether the gain be worthy of the price is another question; but that is the way, if you wish it, to turn Edinburgh into an Oxford.

The other question is incidentally answered—the great disturbing question of endowments: Establish a hundred or two rich sinecures, to gain perhaps one or two eminent scholars in a generation! The question involves its own answer.

While sojourning at Oxford, Mr Patterson received his appointment to the living of Falkirk. His gratitude to Mr Peel upon this occasion was certainly not lukewarm. The parishioners were highly satisfied with the appointment; and, in February 1830, he was formally inducted—"filled," his biographer states, "with a deep and pervading sense of ministerial responsibility."

He accordingly entered upon his pastoral office with an earnest and even enthusiastic determination to fulfil its duties to the uttermost, and "to be instant in season and out of season." Of those duties he entertained a strict, an exalted, but a liberal idea. His biographer has circumstantially detailed the various plans which this young and highly-gifted clergyman, eminent for learning, and rich in this world's refinements, adopted for the improvement of every class and age of his numerous parishioners. The account is well worthy of the serious attention of young ministers. It is the experimenting of one of the ablest and most conscientious of their body, in a field either ill-cultivated or altogether neglected—that of parish as distinguished from pulpit labour. In his early zeal, he seems to have attempted too much; and excessive physical exertion and mental excitement soon began to undermine an excellent original constitution. A fever caught in the course of duty was, however, the immediate cause of his death, which took place in July 1834, after he had been for about four years the faithful and diligent minister of Falkirk.

During his incumbency, Mr Patterson married. He has left a widow with one child. We regret that our limits do not admit of a more extended notice of the life and ministrations of this esteemed young clergyman. With his discourses, which form a full half of the work, it is not our province to interfere. But one passage, as a small specimen, we must quote, leaving the reader to infer the tenderness of sentiment and elegance of language which distinguish these discourses.

It cannot be doubted that it was not without a reason that Jesus so often chose the solitude of the mountain and the desert—the stillness and majestic gloom of night—for his most solemn and prolonged devotions. He had a human nature like our own, only without sin; and it is no part of our nature's sinfulness that mountains, and gardens, and solitude, and night, and the majestic or the graceful forms of Nature, have a power of their own over the thoughts and feelings, to soothe and to elevate the soul and to bring it into that tone of sedate unworldliness—that consciousness of being linked in our being and our destiny with a higher order of essences and interests than the objects and concerns of this low scene of things—which, of all the moods of natural feeling, best harmonizes with the spirit of heavenly communion. Our Lord, by his example, has consecrated to the use of all his followers such adventitious appliances and means; and he is not to be despised, therefore, as a dreamer and an idle sentimentalist, who loves to employ them so. We sometimes feel as if the impossibility of finding, in this vicinity, such natural solitude as our Saviour delighted to frequent for contemplation and prayer—of escaping easily from amidst the crowd of overflowing population, the noise and the fervour of restless occupation—of finding some Mount of Olives or Desert of Bethsaida, where, under the free and glorious firmament, surrounded by Nature with her features and her form unchanged and untricked by art, we might feel ourselves alone with her Maker and her God—were a great defect in all that rich and stately scenery which fills the landscape round about us; and when the eye glances to the distant hills which bound the brilliant panorama, and fancy fills up the outline presented to our view with details of wooded glens, and hazel-thickets, and green laps of pasture, embosomed in the solitude—the living rock, the shaded brook, and the unviolated spring—piety, and the recollection of our Lord, not less than sentiment and taste for the poetic and the picturesque, might well dictate the desire, "Oh, that I had wings like a dove, that I might flee away and be at rest"—that for one day my spirit might repose from the hurry and the hum of men, pillowed upon Nature's bosom, and communing with Nature's God, the God of our Salvation!

But while the soul, which the God of nature has endowed with a vivid sense of sublimity and beauty, and in which the God of grace has consecrated that fine faculty, and hallowed it to be the handmaid of religion, will thrill with sympathy to that holy strain of the poet, pure and meek, yet, if deprived, by the arrangements of his lot, of the opportunity of frequently enjoying such partly natural, partly spiritual luxuries, he will remember who it is that "determineth the bounds of all our habitations." We may suppose a Christian pastor, for example, who haply in the visions of his youth use to look forward to spend his years amidst the poetry of such an office—to feed the flock of Jehovah's heritage, a quiet flock among the quiet hills, with little intrusion from the busy world to interrupt the course of a serene contemplative existence, or disturb "the noiseless tenor of his way," and who has been called instead to labour amidst the hurry, and the hum, and the manifold distractions of a stirring and thick-peopled neighbourhood—who yet will be ready to allow that He who orders all things, has ordered all things well—who will see, perhaps, that that very taste for retirement and for calmness which was the native tone of his mind, is that which, if gratified, might have sunk him into indolence and apathy, and afforded him, upon the whole, far fewer opportunities, and far less urgent impulses to advancement, even in the way of personal improvement; and gladly will he submit his taste to what is not more his duty than his happiness, resigning himself to God, and saying, "Choose out for me the lot of mine inheritance." Still, however, the taste for retirement—where to indulge it is possible and dutiful—is one that well accords with the nature of Christianity, and with the character of the Christian; nor do we think that there is in our Saviour's all-perfect and harmonious character, a trait more attractive, or, in its own place, more exemplary, than the intensity with which he felt, and the eagerness with which he sought the bliss of solitude.

A friend of ours—a person of some taste, we think, and of great poetical sensibility—was once asked what he thought of Pollok's "Course of Time"—if there was any genius, any originality or power of thought in it? "Yes," he replied—"the man has found out that there must be solitude to complete the happiness of heaven—wastes and loneliness, into which the intellectual being may wander to meditate and exercise his faculties without interruption. It is a happy idea."

As a minister of the establishment, by his own choice, Mr Patterson was a consistent friend to the principle of establishments, which he defended with his pen. But, intimately connected with the Dissenting body, by birth and education, he was, as well as became him, liberal in his views and conciliating in his manners.

He regarded every one who was zealously and efficiently engaged in preaching the gospel, however much he might dissent from his views in some inferior points, as a brother-in-arms and fellow-labourer in the same great cause. Writing to a dissenting friend, with the stanchness of whose principles he was well acquainted, he says—"Most gladly do I hail you as a brother in the mighty work. I will tell you what would give me one of the greatest pleasures upon earth: to see you ere long the minister of your church at Falkirk, and to go along hand in hand with you—as I hope to do with my dissenting brethren already there—in promoting the eternal interests of a people, where jealousy of the appearance and labours of any number of truly Christian pastors would be the excess of weakness and criminality."

He took, we are told, "a warm interest in the proceedings of the church courts;" but we are glad to find that he kept free of the violence and embroilings which sometimes make those necessary appendages of establishments so ensnaring to "spiritual persons;" converting ministers of the gospel into something even worse than angry polemics—into servile or fanatical political partisans or firebrands, and go-betweens of the Church and State. In matters which came directly within the true province of a minister of the Church of Scotland, Mr Patterson took the right side.

As a descendant of Old Seceders, he firmly supported both the Call and the Anti-patronage movements. His best speech in the Presbytery was on the former; his best speech in the Synod on the latter of these questions.

We are under the greatest temptation to cite a few passages from an Essay on the Eloquence of the Pulpit, in which, without wholly agreeing, we see much to admire. Mr Patterson was a Whig, and, at least in his early manhood, a warm one—a Whig and a great deal more. He could then see good in the French Revolution, and the coming of good in the career of Napoleon. He says—

On the whole, the rise and the fall of this wonderful individual proved a severe but a salutary discipline to the spirit which had so rashly undertaken the office of a ruling power in the political world. The bloodless revolutions which followed on the Continent proved that the nations had learned wisdom from the view of the wild excesses and the severe chastisements of the untempered spirit of democracy. Let not the madness of kings render the lesson useless. Their policy hitherto has almost convinced the most temperate lovers of freedom that the revolutionists of France were in the right; and that "Overturn! Overturn! Overturn!" must, after all, be adopted as the watchword of liberty. They are deceived who suppose that it is possible to decide a strife of principle by arms. The nations are awakening to a strong and profound impression of their own rights. In opposition to this impression, monarchs have set up the doctrines of legitimacy and divine delegation. The contest between these two must evidently be decided in the minds of men; and in such a contest, decided on such an arena, Truth must as evidently be victorious at last. And when the nations have been fully impressed with the truth in reference to their own political rights, what power has tyranny to prevent their triumphant vindication? It may for a little while prevail against a people but half-conscious of the truth, and divided in their interests; patriot blood may be shed on a thousand scaffolds, and the cause of tyranny may seem to flourish on a hundred fields; but, when the time arrives, when nations fully enlightened and self-united shall reclaim to themselves their heritage of right, wo be to the power that shall refuse the demand!

It is with reluctance that we leave these interesting volumes. We are sensible that our notice is as hasty and imperfect as it is scanty; but it is something done to have indicated, in any manner, the strength and beauty which they combine; leaving the reader to make his own discoveries. We have, indeed, no doubt that the original work will be much sought after.

THE VIOLIN.*

This is a most meritorious volume. It contains a great deal of curious, amusing, and instructive matter, well arranged, and written in a lively style. Mr Dubourg is very fond of playing upon words. Let him think of Swift's notice of "God's revenge against punning." But we like Mr Dubourg's book, and himself, too; for he is an enthusiast in his subject, and we love to see a man heartily fond of what he writes about. We, too, are a violinist (amateur) of some few centuries—poetically speaking; but, of late years, the chief use we have made of our bow has been to administer raps to the knuckles of certain musical quacks and impudent ignoramuses.

We must permit Mr Dubourg to speak for himself, as he well does in his preface:—"That an instrument thus honoured and esteemed should not already have found, among its English votaries, any distinct recorder of its merits and triumphs, is a fact which may well excite some surprise; while, as regards the present attempt, it may also carry with it some degree of excuse for the various imperfections to be here discovered. To do indifferently a desirable thing hitherto not done at all, is, although a poor achievement, one that should, at least, meet with a milder critic than Zoilus. Perhaps, as the descendant of one who has earned some share of distinction by his performance on the instrument here treated of, I may be allowed to make further plea on behalf of this endeavour." This is sensible and modest; but, indeed, there runs through all Mr Dubourg's book, a tone of unassuming good-nature and gentlemanly feeling, sufficient to redeem many more faults than any body will ever be able to find in its entertaining pages.

In treating of the origin of the violin, Mr Dubourg—we think fairly enough—gives to the Italians the invention of the violin, in its present shape at least. As to the Greek Tablets, and Pherekydes and his Epigonion fiddling, all this was a mere High German hoax—and a very intolerable jest in its way. But it was not at all malevolent, like the German Hammer's hoax with his medals and cups, &c. about Mysterium Baphometi revelatum, and the poor, traduced Templars. Of the real monuments of antiquity that bear representations of objects having some resemblance to the violin, what shall we say of them but by a figurative application of a beautiful passage in Sir Thomas Browne's Essay on Urn-Burial? "But these are sad and sepulchral pitchers, which have no joyful voices; silently expressing old mortality,* the ruins of forgotten times," &c.

Mr Dubourg says, p. 6, "The Welsh mark the fiddle for their own." Now, there is, in Scotland, of the most remote antiquity, a mute, mysterious fiddle, well known to some of the poorer natives of the Highlands, upon which sundry persons scratch and scrape without producing any music at all! And, wonderful to say, although perfectly true, the very same sort of fiddle is well known in England, and Wales, and Ireland, and France, and Germany, and Italy, &c. &c. It is a gross mistake—a mere error of ignorance—to call it the Scotch fiddle peculiarly; seeing that it is common to all Europe and America, &c. A few years ago, a whole regiment of French soldiers at Montpellier, played furiously upon this voiceless fiddle; but their surgeon, M——, stopped their fiddling by sousing them in a solution of sulphuret of potass. Consult, passim, writers de morbis cutaneis. We always rejoice in putting down a vulgar error; so that, henceforth, the Welsh must no longer "mark the fiddle for their own!"

The story of Anthony Wood and his companions—who, in 1654, amusing themselves by fiddling in disguise, were met "by certain soldiers, who forced them to play in the open field, and then left them without a penny of payment"—can be matched by the case of a deceased clergyman of the Church of Scotland, a keen fiddler, who, returning late one evening from a musical party, was met, on Leith Walk, by a number of tipsy sailors. They began to handle him rather roughly; but, hearing the twang of his fiddle, (which he had under his coat,) they insisted upon his playing to them, which he did, and kept them dancing for an hour. They parted from him in great good humour. This occurred many years ago. Another whimsical story of a Scottish clergyman, fond of fiddling:—A number of his parishioners considered it as quite derogatory to his calling, that he should play upon the fiddle; so a deputation of them waited upon him, and remonstrated against this crying enormity. He said—"Gentlemen, did you ever see my fiddle; or hear me play?"—"No!" "You shall do both," said he; and immediately brought a violoncello, on which he struck up a Psalm tune, asking if they had any objection to join him with their voices. They complied; and, when all was over, they expressed themselves perfectly satisfied of his orthodoxy. "A muckle, respectable, religious-sounding fiddle like that, there was nae harm in. Na, na! it was nane o' yer scandalous penny-weddin fiddles that they had heard o'!"

Mr Dubourg's second chapter treats of the Italian school of violinists. We have at present only a few addenda to make to this chapter.

1*st*. As to Veracimi. In his "Sonate Accademiche," opera seconda, published at London in 1744, we meet, on the page immediately preceding the music, with the first example we have noticed in Sonate of that time, of an explanation of marks of bowing and expression that occur in the course of the work. His marks for crescendo-diminuendo, and for diminuendo, and for crescendo, are of the same form as the modern ones—only black throughout. His mark for an up-bow consists of a vertical line drawn from the interior of a semicircle placed beneath it. His mark for a down-bow is the same figure reversed in position; M^r^. for mordente, &c. These are things worth noticing in old music. Pages 67–9, Veracini gives the Scottish air of "Tweedside" with variations; the first instance we know of Scottish music being so honoured by any old Italian violinist.

2*d*. As to Antonio Lolli, he is one of the first old masters who gives difficult passages of great compass to be executed on the fourth string only.

3*d*. We do not know why Mr Dubourg has passed over those very extraordinary violinists, Locatelli and Mestrino, whose compositions for the violin are full of difficulties of the most appalling kind, even to the ablest performers of our day. We are convinced, from an examination of some of their compositions, that Paganini himself has studied them seriously, and has gathered not a little from them.

A good manymonths ago, (before Mr Dubourg's book was published) we sent to Mr Tait M.S. copies of several of the compositions of Locatelli and Mestrino, which were so outrageously difficult that many persons who saw them considered them as spurious productions, intended as a hoax. But we have in our possession the printed copies, ready to shew to any one who may yet doubt of the fact. We could wager a trifle there is not a violinist in Europe who could execute these difficult compositions (we do not mean murder) without pretty hard practice: not even Paganini himself. Dragonetti, (the inimitable contra-bassist,) who is a tolerable judge of difficulties, has assured us that Mestrino was the most extraordinary violinist he ever heard; and he heard Paganini in London.

We may notice, en passant, that the Scordatura, (more properly Accordatura,) or alteration of the usual tuning of the violin, in order to suit the execution of certain passages, was not uncommon among some of the old masters of the 17th and 18th centuries. Paganini seems to have carried the alterations in the tuning of his violin to a greater extent than we find in any of the published works of those masters; and we think it probable that this might be suggested to him by the well-known alterations made in the pitch of horns, clarinets, &c., in order to avoid difficulties of execution otherwise impracticable. We have no room to enter into details to illustrate this; but every good musician will at once understand what we mean. The principle is easy to be followed out, and should be kept in view by all aspiring violinists.

Mr Dubourg's fourth chapter is devoted to Paganini—and well does he deserve a chapter to himself. When we were at Pistoja, in Italy, in the autumn of 1818, we there heard Paganini for the first time; and we were the first who wrote a Scottish criticism upon his performance. It was not published till January 1822, when it appeared on page 222 of the third Number of the New Edinburgh Review. Need we say that our criticism was full of the highest praise, and enthusiastic admiration of that unrivalled performer's talents? When he performed at Edinburgh in 1831, we wrote a more elaborate criticism, which was published in the Edinburgh Weekly Chronicle newspaper—our praise, our admiration, undiminished, of course. Now, when we find our friend Mr Dubourg (we must call him our friend, through freemasonry) agree with us entirely in giving the supremacy to Paganini over all other known violinists of our day, are we not rejoiced to find ourselves so well justified in our former and our present opinion?

We hate to allude even to all the contemptible trash that has been published in Great Britain, in depreciation of Paganini's talents and acquirements; and we laugh at the ignorant comparisons that certain persons have attempted to institute between Paganini and some other violinists, who, we know, only feel themselves made ridiculous by such false praise. All the better violinists confess Paganini's superiority without the least hesitation. All the fiddlers who do not, know neither their fiddles nor themselves.

Let us add a few words to Mr Dubourg's account of Paganini. Paganini knew little of Beethoven's pianoforte music before 1831. At a private party in Edinburgh, Beethoven's magnificent trio in B flat for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, was shewn to him. He had not his own violin, but took up an ordinary one, and ill-strung, that happened to be in the room, and requested that the sonata might be tried. He had never seen nor heard it before. He happened to be well accompanied, and played his difficult part at sight, with a precision, energy, and expression that astonished everybody present. He never seemed to care about the state of the violin, &c. When any part of the sonata pleased him particularly, he made it be repeated; and rapturously expressed his admiration of the whole composition.

He laughs at the modern soi-disant German school of composition; while he reverences the great German masters, such as Beethoven, Haydn, Mozart, &c., &c. We, too, had, long before, our own opinions of the modern schools of music; and we shall here characterise some of them, hoping for better things hereafter at home and abroad:—

1. The hurly-burly school.
2. The flash school of execution.
3. The pickpocket school.
4. The mad, metaphysical, German school.
5. The olla podrida school.
6. The milk-and-water school.

Chapter IV. treats of the French school, chapter V. of the German school, and chapter VI. of the English school. On these, we have little to remark. We are glad to see a just tribute of praise given to our old, and kind, and warm-hearted friend, Spagnoletti, who, by the by, belonged to the Italian school by birth and education. Our old friend, (when he was a little boy,) Henry Gattie, is also mentioned with well-merited honour. We may state that Paolo Diana was Spagnoletti's original name. Chapter VII. is devoted to amateurs; and we sincerely hope that they will all profit by Mr Dubourg's sagacious remarks and advices.

Chapter VIII.—"Female Performers." We remember hearing one of these, who was so deaf that she could not tune her own fiddle. Somebody tuned it for her; but, of course, she did not play in tune, although with great spirit and fair execution. Mr Dubourg infects us with punning; but it is a fact that she played horribly out of tune whenever she shifted. We have heard her play a long passage, in one of her upper shifts, about half a note out of tune; and this she did with the greatest composure; for how could she hear that she was wrong? The only wonder was, that she played a single note in tune on any part of the finger-board.

Chapter IX. is "On the construction of the violin." Mr Dubourg states, on the authority of a German violin-maker, that the violin consists of fifty-eight different parts. We have seen it described, bit by bit, as consisting of seventy-one different pieces, when the back and the belly were each made of two pieces. As to M. Chanot's French violins, which were to beat all the Cremonas, &c., we heard some of them in 1822, and thought them extremely harsh in tone, although powerful. Their shape, too, was clumsy and inelegant. We hear no more of them. The fact is, that the true acoustical principles upon which these and many other musical instruments ought to be constructed, are not yet fully developed.

Chapter X. consists of miscellaneous anecdotes, &c., and makes a merry close upon the violin. We have no hesitation in saying that we think, for the honour of Old England, that this unique work on the violin by an Englishman, ought to be in the hands of every professor or amateur who really loves his violin for its own sake. We look for a second edition to salute 1837. G. F. G.

TALES OF THE CLEIKUM INN, ST RONAN'S.

No II.—THE EDINBURGH DOER'S TALE.

"I HAVE been long satisfied," said the spokesman, as soon as his audience had arranged themselves comfortably in a listening attitude, "that no individual has so many opportunities of studying human nature as a well employed attorney. The criminal judge and the medical practitioner enjoy opportunities of no ordinary kind; but they are generally called upon to observe and operate upon only the moral and physical biles that disease generates in the mind and body; and hence, see mankind under the solitary phases of demoralization and distress. Neither of the two has much to do with the healthy, natural, every-day evil, that, under the semblance of good, is in active operation in every corner of society; and, though industriously concealed from strangers, is yet often observed by the practitioner of the law, who, as the instrument fixed upon for the accomplishment of selfish purposes, or the defeat of unjust objects, procures glimpses of the human heart that are denied to all but the particeps criminis, or the confidential friends of the devoted victim.

"I have now practised as an attorney for a period of about forty years. My practice has been very extensive, for I have never hesitated, as you know, madam, to do all kinds of work for all kinds of people, high and low, rich and poor, good and bad, and at all grades of remuneration. The adage, arctum annulum ne gestato, which has been fathered on Pythagoras, but is more consonant to the principles and practice of Epicurus, I have little regarded, provided the ring was a gold one—for all my life has been passed in anxiety; yet, (though I have thus toiled night and day to amass wealth which I cannot spend and cannot carry with me to the grave, and yet cannot all at once, sirs, think of disposing of by will—unless, like other munificent misers, by mortification, where no individual envied good is conferred,) money is not all that I have extracted from my labours. I have had opportunities, and I have not allowed them to pass, of seeing farther into the heart of man, at the times when that organ is best worth the study of a philosopher—not a stoic—that is, when it is filled with the conflicting and engrossing passions that are generated by selfishness, than most individuals of my calling. I have kept assiduously two repositories of the results of my labours—a bank book and a note book; and, as I have lived to see both filled, I now bethink myself of making some use of the one, through you, sirs, for the benefit of mankind, while the other, I presume, will be useful to my heir-at-law. My notes may be relied upon as genuine—they were taken on the instant; they comprise, as Terence says, what occurred ante pedes, and they possess the advantage (certainly not small) of enjoying the faith of an attorney's parole.

"Lest it should be supposed that I have been a bad man, I premise that I have been what is called an 'honest attorney;' but, while I make use of that much abused term, I dissent entirely from the meaning generally applied to it, and desire to attach one of my own, at once more true, more useful, and significative. It has been generally used in two senses; first, ironically, as indicating that the thing represented has no objective existence in rerum natura, but, like lac gallinaceum, corvus albus, noctuinum ovum—begging your pardon, Mistress Dodds, for the unknown tongues—and other ideal existences, is to be found only in the brains of mortals. This use of the term, I do not hesitate to say, is as unphilosophical as it is unjust towards our profession, in which there are certainly to be found a species at least of honest men. I have the boldness to assert the fact; and, if it should be contradicted, I have the advantage of my opponents, in so much as I have a positive and they a negative to establish. It is, of course, of no consequence to the truth of the proposition, that the creature to be thus proved as enjoying an existence in nature, is phœnice rarior. Pliny, in the second chapter of his tenth book—I had always a turn for natural history—establishes the existence of that rara avis; and I demonstrate the truth of my position, that there do exist honest attorneys, in the signal and transcendental mode whereby Leibnitz (Kant contradic.) established the existence of a necessary nature: Ego sum—I myself, an honest attorney, am here present in your parlour, Mistress Dods.

"Nor is the second meaning attached to the term less objectionable; for it implies that 'honest attorney' is identical with 'honest merchant' or 'trafficker,' or, insigniter et generaliter, 'honest man.' The individual who framed the term—likely some successful litigant, who had received his expenses from the opposite party—must have known better than to waste his time in tautological trifling, and attempting to overturn a term, 'honest man,' which had existed since the days of Noah, ('for Noah was a just man, and perfect in his generations,') and of which Burns made so good an account as to construct upon it one of the grandest lines of poetry that ever flowed from an inspired pen. Othello did not call Iago his 'honest adjutant,' but simply 'honest Iago;' implying nothing more than an intensive application of the term 'honest' to an individual of the species. It is seldom that one hears the term 'honest doctor,' although Homer heaps honour on the profession of physic—Ἰητρος γαρ ἀνηρ πολλων ἀνταξιος ἀλλων. But the familiar and highly expressive term, 'honest rogue,' brings out, by its eloquent analogy, the distinction I aim at; for the greatest stickler for the honour of the sublunar worshippers of Laverna, never maintained that 'honest rogue' meant 'honest man.' The term is, in truth, figurative, though there is not among the twelve tables of figures of speech, in Lord Kaimes' 'Elements of Criticism,' any one in which it can properly be placed; a defect which the next editor of a new edition of that ingenious but fanciful work will do well to supply."

The dominie was listening with great interest, but the Nabob and Mrs Dods discovered some symptoms of impatience here. "Isna he dreigh and lang-winded wi' his Latin speech?" whispered the latter. "Cry me back when he comes to the pith o' the matter." And she went off on housewifery business.

"I have said that the phrase, honest attorney, is figurative. Is there any one who ever perused—pleasantly, at night, over a good fire and a bottle of spiced port, and laid along at his entire ease on a soft sofa—a writer's account, that will impugn the accuracy of my statement? If a figure of speech be properly defined, 'the using of a word in a sense different from what is proper to it,' my case is made out; for I do not opine that all the famed and much-abused casuistry of our craft (at least I should be sorry, for the sake of the honour of our profession, to see any brother's powers of argument so misapplied) would be able to gain a single proselyte to the opinion that the proper application of the adjective honest, is to an attorney. The conclusion I thus come to is logical; and I know that, on that account, it is liable to be suspected of unsoundness; for it may be said that I form my own premises. I admit, to a certain extent, the charge, seeing that I assume as correct, the definition of a fanciful author; but I scorn to take refuge behind the example of all good logicians, who never leave the important task of framing their premises to the unskilful hands of apprentice dialecticians, but act upon the wisdom of the old adage, 'If you wish a thing spoiled, leave the doing of it to others; if you wish it well done, do it yourself.' I renounce my logic, but I adhere, echini asperitate, to my conclusion. All adjectives are acted upon, by the subject forming the substantive to which they are applied—ex. gr., the word bread, following the adjective sweet, decides the nature of that sweetness which is intended to be expressed—viz., that generally found in bread. The substantive 'milk,' again, occupying the place of the word, 'bread,' would indicate sweetness of a different kind; but these expressions are in some degree figurative, for they modify the adjective, whose corresponding substantive, 'sweetness,' would express a taste (that of sugar) of a very different kind. In the same way, the honesty of an attorney is not the honestas simplex of the moralists. He is not Cicero's 'vir sine fuco ac fallaciis'—one without craft or subtlety—but one possessed of the smallest portion of these qualities that an individual of his calling can carry on his trade with. This distinction might be more clearly indicated by having recourse to the familiar phrase already mentioned, 'honest rogue;' but—sus timet omne unguentum—the hog hates ointment, because it is made of lard; and I do not choose, being myself an attorney, to elucidate the honesty of my craft by any analogical aid, drawn from the honesty of rogues, who are said sometimes to be found in our profession.

"The point I have been anxious to clear up is already, I hope, in aprico; but, were it otherwise, and were some plucked pigeon, alias client, inclined to dispute the point with me, and contend that there is no honesty of any kind in our craft—holding up the bare stump of his tail, cauda nudior liberide, in proof of his assertion—I would answer with Aristophanes, in 'The Birds,' Abi ad corvos'—'Go to the villains who took your feathers from you;' for I never said that our profession was perfectly, altogether, out and out—funditus et radicitus—free of rogues.

"In order that I may appear to all courteous people what I have always endeavoured to be, (an honest attorney, in the proper sense of that term—that is, an attorney as honest as an attorney can be—perhaps, the highest distinction to which poor human nature can aspire,) I shall proceed to state a few of those rules of conduct whereby that honesty of which I speak may be brought to the greatest ethical perfection of which it is capable, as well as rendered useful to mankind, by being submitted to the test of practical life. Were I to omit these, I would run the greatest risk of falsifying myself and my profession; a host of unsuccessful clients, who have not been honest enough to pay their accounts, would rise like a legion of ants, and endeavour to close up my mouth with my own words, after the manner of the real species in the Greek proverb, qui inspuerit in cavernam formicarum huic intumescant labra. They might even proceed so far as to apply to me the term, 'dishonest man,' for the distinction between a dishonest man and a dishonest attorney is utterly unknown to such wretches; and, what is worse, they are so unwilling to know it, that an extracted decree of the Amphictyonum consessus itself, with a horning on it, would not be sufficient to make them look upon the strong lineaments of the distinctive marks by which the two characters are generically and eternally contra-distinguished from each other. It is, therefore, as a sort of self-defence, that I thus take care, to state the rules whereby that important distinction is brought out, and the operation of special and peculiar circumstances, in modifying ordinary ethical canons shewn to be consistent with at least as much honesty as these ungrateful creatures called clients deserve at the hands of their benefactors, the attorneys.

"In the first place—As it is a fundamental principle of every well-regulated state, that every cause of complaint, on the part of the citizens, should be heard by upright judges, and decided on according to law—no attorney is entitled to refuse his professional services to an individual wishing to assume the envied character of a litigant, merely because he, the attorney, may, in his wisdom, think the client wrong, and, in his goodness, wish to save him expense. The greatest delicacy ought, therefore, to be observed by every honest attorney, in recommending to a client not to enter into a law plea; because, if his advice is strongly expressed, as it may very likely be, he may thus encroach upon the natural rights of mankind. I am satisfied that many a good practitioner, acting upon this principle, has been censured as wishing to encourage litigation. Clients will thus see how careful they ought to be in attributing improper motives to upright men.

"In the second place—When the history of man is carefully studied, it will be found that, in former times, right was nothing but might, and that was generally decided by fight. Courts of justice (see Blackstone, passim) were, therefore, instituted for the purpose of allowing free egress or vent to the unruly passions of ambitious or selfish men, in the same way as the lancet was resorted to for allaying physical pyrexia, by purging the system of its superabundant blood and bad humours. Hamesucken, murder, arson, stouthrief, cattle-lifting, forcible ejection, and all the other brevi manu modes of taking justice, were accordingly very soon exchanged for the battle of lawyers' tongues, in which sheer wind (one of the non-naturals) was expended in place of blood; and the people were just as well pleased when they thus got their passions disposed of by proxy, as they formerly were when they let out their ill-nature and their blood together. Their vanity was, besides, gratified, by getting men in wigs to fight for them, and seeing a great number of judges (sometimes fifteen) sitting shaking their heads for whole days over their private concerns. Courts of law being in this way moral hospitals, ought to be very open to the lieges; and hence the corollary, that all honest attorneys, who are in fact merely the door-keepers, should observe a proper caution and delicacy in preventing, impeding, or standing in the way of individuals wishing to go to law, otherwise they may be the abettors of every kind of violence, and guilty of the broken heads, if not murders of their fellow-creatures.

"In the third place—Law and justice have, in enlightened nations, been separated as things having very little to do with each other. The latter is easily apprehended by the common or moral sense of mankind, and is well expressed by the golden rule, which has been so often quoted. Law, again, is more subtle and complex, and cannot be known by the mere unassisted power of the moral sense. It is defined by institutional writers, 'a compulsory rule of life for man;' but as all definitions of the subtle matter have been found to carry very little meaning with them, philosophers have rather inclined to satisfy the common people, by telling them what law is like than what it actually is. Accordingly, Plutarch, in his life of Solon, sayeth, that law is like a spider's web—'Leges aranearum telis adsimiles sunt, propterea quod in illas si quid levius aut imbecillum incurrerit, hæret; sin majus aliquid, disscoat ac fugit.' The reason here assigned for law being like a spider's web is, that it catches light matters, while heavy ones break through it. The advantage of this hint to attorneys is self-evident. They ought never to advise a man to give up a law plea, merely because it is thin, subtle, fine spun, doubtful, or frivolous; for that, according to the great authority I have quoted, is the very kind of case suited for the enucleation of a fine legal principle.

"In the fourth place—When attorneys are together feasting, as they often do, at the end of what they call their Sessions, they begin their potations by drinking to what they quaintly denominate 'the glorious uncertainty'—that is quite fair, because it is by that uncertainty we live and make our bread. The truth of the toast is undoubted; for it is justified by every day's experience, and sanctioned by old Phocilides—Τις αν δικην κρινοιεν—'Who shall speak with certainty of the law?' But, though this may be a very good joke to give zest to our claret, it appears a serious matter when more philosophically considered. An honest attorney, by giving an advice to a litigant not to prosecute a case he thinks unfounded, may do him irremediable injustice, in as much as he may prevent an individual from vindicating rights which the judge himself (certainly a better judge) may conceive to be well-founded.

"The glorious uncertainty ought never thus to be turned to the disadvantage of a litigant. A well-disposed man wishing law or justice—it does not signify which—ought never to be scared away by an opinion. A doctor would be considered cruel, who, in place of a recipe, gave his patient a diagnosis; and an attorney may expose himself to a similar charge, who prevents a man from going to law by an officious advice.

"In the fifth place—This last rule applies to advices against urging a plea. Whether and when an honest attorney may be justified in giving a recommendation to prosecute, will depend upon the circumstances of the case; but, generally, it may be stated that such is the strength of the animus litigandi in mankind, that very few (I scarcely ever saw one) require the application of any stimulus to make them go to law. It must always be kept steadily in view, that courts are not only laboratories of law, but lotteries, and no attorney has any right to inquire at a litigant whether he views them in the one light or in the other. All mankind are naturally gamblers, and hence the power and prevalence of the spirit of litigation. Many litigants wax more furious for the legal fight the more the attorney endeavours to repress them. These creatures are easily treated; for the attorney has only to keep them back a little from their good, and they will seek it with redoubled fire and pluck.

"In the sixth place—I think it was a pretty remark that of Lord Bacon, that a court of justice ought to be a solemn place. I would beg leave to add, that litigants, like patients placed on the operating table, ought to behave seriously; yet it is painful to see with what levity clients, forgetful of their awful situation, flutter and frisk about the blind goddess, even at the very moment when the beam is trembling with such delicate irresolution that the weight of a feather may decide the fate and fortune of the one party or the other. It is, therefore, often necessary—at least I have often found it an imperative duty—to impose seriousness on light and giddy-headed clients. The best way of accomplishing this, especially where the attorney is a delicate-minded individual, is to ask for a payment of cash to account. I never saw this remedy fail.

"In the seventh place—The members of our craft are generally esteemed rogues by the individuals who employ us. They hate us, and would, if they could, cheat us; but they cannot do without us. We, no doubt, love to be pursued by such enemies as clients; but the people must not suppose that we are ignorant of the sentiments they entertain towards us, which, indeed, are forced upon us by the melancholy circumstance, that scarcely a single client will pay an attorney after the business is finished. They conceive they have got nothing from us when a case is lost; because we do not sell law by the pound. They take Kant's view of time, and consider it to be a phantom. We require, therefore, to look to ourselves; and I have been long satisfied that there is no better mode of correcting the people's false notions of us, and forcing them to respect us, than by shewing them (by asking for money) that our time is as valuable as the mensurable and ponderable commodities of the merchant. The proper occasion for this is when the client is keen for the fight. The value of his money increases as the case approaches a termination; while, in all likelihood, the value of the case itself will diminish in the same proportion. Asinus esuriens fustem negligit—The hungry ass does not feel the lash. All this is clearly for the benefit of the clients. It is the fevered patient that should be bled. I have heard a client, after the furor was off him, complain that money had not been asked from him soon enough. I think it a great pity that such complaints should be allowed to prevail, and would recommend to my brethren to do their endeavours to render them as few as possible.

"Many other excellent rules might be stated; but these will suffice, in the meantime, to shew the public how much and how often we are belied, when we act conscientiously, from motives different from those generally attributed to us.

"I shall now proceed to my tale.

"On the 17th day of December 1807, according to my memorandum-book, I was sitting in my business room in Brown Square, preparing a memorial for debate, in the case, Purves v. Hamilton, which was to come on next day before Lord G——. I had fallen into a train of thought which I fancied was to lead to the discovery of the legal principle by which the case would be carried—a state of mind not unlike that of the philosopher who is on the eve of deducing, from a long algebraic calculation, a law of physics. I was roused from my reverie by the entrance of my servant Thomas, who said that a person having the appearance of a countryman wished to see me.

"'What sort of man is he, Thomas?' said I.

"'A poor man, I suppose,' answered Thomas.

"'Tell him, I am engaged,' said I, 'and cannot see any person this evening.'

"The servant retired to execute my order, and I plunged again into the mare magnum, from which I had been so reluctantly dragged. My ambition was to astonish my client, the counsel, and the court, by the ingenuity of my reasoning; and getting heated with the subject, and forgetting the adage, sat cito si sat bene, my pen acknowledged the power of an attorney's inspiration. I was soon oblivious of the interruption caused by the poor countryman, and of every thing on earth, save Purves versus Hamilton—a case which I now, in my imagination, saw reduced to the snug form of a res judicata, and legal precedent. My inspiration engrossed the powers of my external perception, and the door of my room opened, without producing any other effect upon me than a momentary interruption of the current of my ideas, unaccompanied with any consciousness of the nature of the cause. On reaching forth my hand to supply my pen with ink, my eye, taking at the time a more extended range, was claimed by a person standing by my side, bowing, with a large blue bonnet in his hand—an attitude he had probably held since the opening of the door, without being able to call up the courage to engage my attention by an address.

"The peculiar mode by which the man had presented himself, did more for securing him a part of that attention I was devoting to the case I was engaged in, than a letter from the Lord High Chancellor; for, indeed, he made use of those claims that are supposed to be peculiar to these self-introduced beings, apparitions. As I looked at him with a mixture of surprise and anger, he kept bowing like a pendulum whose vibrations undergo a gradual decrease of range. He was a true Scottish cottager, or small feuar, advanced in life. He had on a sky-blue woollen coat, made in the old fashion, with the lappels and wrist-bands of prodigious size, and buttons as big as Spanish dollars. A buff vest (intended by the artist to contain the entire chylopoetic apparatus, and extending beyond the tops of his thighs, with a triangle cut out at the bottom of the long range of shining brass buttons—a trick of the old snips, not easily understood by the moderns) met, and, for a considerable way, covered a pair of buff corduroy breeches, which were bound at the knee with a pair of huge steel buckles; the rest of his stout limbs being left to the kindly embrace of a pair of dark blue ribbed hose, the under parts of which were cut so as to allow a small square piece to cover the insteps of a pair of good brogues. His blue bonnet—with its cherry, as designative of character as the cap button of a

"'Well, sir,' said I, 'are you the person who requested to see me, and whom I said I could not see this evening?'

"'The very man, your Honour,' replied he: 'David Brakenrigg, feuar of Greenshaw, on the estate of Lochcairnie. I hae had the misfortune to be decreeted by the Lords o' Session, an' decerned an' ordeened to remove frae my sma' mailin', at the instance o' Augustus Bethune o' Lochcairnie; an' that within fifteen days, on pain o' rebellion, though I'm as guid a Tory as the superior himsel'.'

"'Augustus Bethune of Lochcairnie!' exclaimed I, starting involuntarily; 'the man who, ten years ago, ruined my father at high gambling in Waterstone's hotel, taking from him five thousand pounds, which went as part of the price of this very property of Lochcairnie! Why, man, have you dared to raise, by the charmed sound of that hated name, a spectre a thousand times more hideous and accursed than the ugliest form of the Author of Evil?'

"These hard words were no sooner out of my mouth than I became conscious of the error I had committed, in acting, like a full-mouthed, ranting histrio, a foolish scene of involuntary passion, to the admiring gaze of a thunder-struck clown. The fact I had mentioned was indeed a melancholy truth—Augustus Bethune had ruined my father; but I had long struggled to repress the thought, and had so well succeeded, that I had latterly become nearly oblivious of my calamity. But now the chord that had been for years silent, had been struck by a rude though involuntary hand, and a paroxysm of repressed feeling shook me to the heart's core like an ague. I felt angry and ashamed, and, though an attorney, could scarcely look the poor countryman in the face. He had delicacy enough, notwithstanding his apparent roughness of manners, to feel for me—without, however, losing sight, at the same time, of his own personal interests.

"'An' what think ye,' said he, 'made me apply to your Honour to gie me your advice an' assistance in keepin' my sma' mailin' o' land, whereon I hae reared twa stalwart sons and twa bonny dochters, and whereon I expected to dee, but just that I heard o' the conduct o' Lochcairnie to your faither, wha, as they say, broke his heart, when he lost his fortune, an' dee'd, leavin' his ance braw bairns penniless, though wi' the guid heir-loom o' college lair? Your Honour, as your faither's son, will be the mair inclined to assist a puir man, whose heart is in the same hard grip that broke his whase name ye bear, an' whase virtues I hope ye winna shame.'

"'Let me see your charge, man,' said I, hurriedly, and turning away my face, to prevent him from witnessing an attorney's tear—'sit down till I examine the paper.'

"I looked at the document; but I had a swelling heart to subdue before I could read a word of it. I succeeded, however; and perused the paper. It was a charge on a decree of removing, at the instance of Augustus Bethune of Lochcairnie, against David Brakenrigg, feuar of Greenshaw. The ground of the decreet was, that the feuar had allowed more than two years' feu-duty to run into arrear, whereby what is called an irritancy in the feu had been incurred, which gave the overlord, the proprietor of Lochcairnie, a right—ob non solutum canonem, as we say—to take back again into his own proprietorship and power, the small piece of ground, and turn the feuar to the door."

"I see nae richt he had to ony such thing," said Meg, "as tak' a puir man's mailin."

"It is a part of the feudal law of Scotland. I, an attorney, whose livelihood depends on the intricacies and multiplicity of details and forms, whereby the simple rights of property in this country are encumbered and perplexed, am not the person called upon to point out defects from the continuance of which I am enabled to live. I may require, in other stories of mine, to mention many of these; but I must leave to others to advocate their inexpediency and abolition, or to vindicate their expediency, utility, and perpetuity. I lay my account in these times with changes. Ipsa dies quandoque parens quandoque noverca est.

"'Why did you not save yourself from this disaster, David,' said I, 'by purging the irritancy, as we call it—that is, by paying up the feu-duty in the Court, after you were summoned?'

"'Your Honour may weel put that question,' replied he; 'but ane o' your brethren o' the law can best answer it. I employed your neebor, Mr Peter Renton, just twa doors to the eastward, to lodge a defence against my laird's summons, which I understand he did—at least he says sae; and, some time after, I sent him, according to his ain request, the siller to lodge wi' the clerk o' Court, without which, he said, the defence wad avail me naething; but the scoundrel kept the siller, for the expense o' the defence, and then left the case to sink or swim. The consequence is, that I hae been decreeted; and if your Honour canna or winna assist us, we maun, I fear, dree a' the ills o' a bieldless winter an' cauld poverty—nane o' the twa a guid friend o' eild.'

"This statement appeared to me remarkable; for I knew that the agent mentioned by David, Peter Renton, was Lochcairnie's friend, and had long been associated with him in unjustifiable schemes.

"'How did you come to employ Peter Renton, David?' said I.

"'He came and solicited the employment from me,' answered he, simply.

"This answer confirmed my suspicions. Could it be possible, thought I, that these men had leagued themselves against a poor feuar, for the purpose of taking from him his little property, whereby they might achieve two things bearing no sort of proportion to each other: first, the adding of a spot of ground to the large estate of Lochcairnie—a mere drop in the bucket either of ruin or prosperity; and, secondly, the depriving a father and his family of all they had to trust to on earth for support and consolation? Yes, I could believe it of either of the men. I pitied their victim, who stood before me; but I kept my suspicions to myself. An attorney soon learns to be guarded."

"'That was like yoursel',"' cried Meg. And the story-teller nodded to her, and went on.

"'But why,' continued I, 'David, did you not pay the small feu-duty in time, to Lochcairnie himself? Your dress and manners indicate precision and regularity; and I could not have expected an act of such ruinous imprudence and carelessness, from one of your appearance and good sense.'

"'There's a secret about that,' replied David, 'When the first year's feu-duty was about due, I ca'ed at Lochcairnie House, an' saw the laird. He was exceedin' courteous, an' even bowed to me as I entered the hall; an' held oot his saft hand to welcome me—a', as I thocht, because I was bringin' him siller, though, maybe, partly because my wife Marion is related to the former proprietors, the auld Dempsters o' Lochcairnie. But ye may guess my surprise when he said he did not want the siller at that time, an' bade me keep it till he asked it. I thanked him for his generosity; but I had still mair to thank him for afore we parted; for he hinted mair braidly than I wished, that I, an' Marion, an' my sons an' dochters, wad be better in the back settlements o' America, than fechtin' awa here wi' a dear feu. I didna like to contradict my over-lord, though I secretly hated Canada, an' said, simply, I had nae means to take me an' my family sae far awa, an' buy land an' farm stockin' in a new country. But my feigned excuse was o' nae avail; for, to my wonder and amazement, he offered me a hunder pounds as an outfit, besides payin' me the price o' my feu, at my ain valuation; but a' on the condition that I wad tak my departure at the next term. O'ercome wi' a generosity sae far abune my merits, shame an' gratitude prevented me frae refusin' the offer. I said I wad think on't; an' left him, to communicate the strange tidings to my wife.'

"I believed the man; for truth and honesty were marked on his forehead. His statement put my former suspicions somewhat at fault; but it yielded me no light. My difficulty was rather increased by it.

"'This story, David,' said I, 'agrees very ill with this paper I hold in my hands. Why has Lochcairnie prosecuted you to absolute ejection itself, if he entertains or entertained towards you these sentiments?'

"'That I canna tell,' replied he. 'Lochcairnie cam' often an' asked me if I had made up my mind to accept his offer. I kept the affair hangin' i' the wind as lang I could. Another year's feu-duty fell due. I offered it to him alang wi' the former. He said he didna need the siller, an' again pressed me to consult, as he said, my ain guid, by acceptin' his offer, an' emigratin' wi' my wife an' bairns. At last, when I could put him aff nae langer, I said I was obliged to him for his kind offer, but that I couldna think o' leavin' my native land, an' (my heart grew big as I spoke) especially the bonny green holms o' Lochcairnie, whar, i' my youth, I had sung wi' the blackbird an' the mavis, whase nests I harried; an', in my auld age, wad rather moan wi' the winter winds that blaw owre the pine-headed taps o' the hills that look down on my little mailin o' Greenshaw, than sing again in a new country. Lochcairnie waxed angry. I left him; he prosecuted me—an' ye ken the rest.'

"This farther communication added to my difficulty, and I thought Lochcairnie's conduct inexplicable. I dismissed the feuar, requesting him to call next day. I then proceeded to finish my memorial; but the fervour with which I began it had been cooled by the associations called up in my mind by the reference to the man who had, by unfair play, deprived my father of that money which I ought to have inherited, and which might have saved me from the necessity of devoting my time and talents to a profession which is generally deemed destructive of the moral feelings of those who are obliged to follow it for a livelihood, as it would have been of mine if I had not nobly struggled against the demoralizing influence. I trembled as the gust of passion, which had long slept in the Æolian recesses of my mind, rose and passed over me; and, in my cooler moments, I felt a longing to unravel the mystery involved in David Brakenrigg's story. Disgust had come in place of a love for the work in which I was engaged. My ingenuity in discovering the legal principle which was to carry conviction to the minds of judges who had not learned the first duty of their high craft—to distinguish metaphysically between prejudice and principle, and learn to suspect the presence of the former, and search for it and expel it, as the chemist does the alloy that defeats his experiment—appeared, to my changed feelings, of its true value. What was the triumph of an attorney, even if achieved, to the loss of my paternal inheritance?—a sorrow which now, by the unconscious act of David Brakenrigg, rose upon me with an increase of strength, derived, like that of cavernous exhalation, from the very time and confinement that are deemed destructive of other powers! I finished my paper in an ill-humour, and desired John Shillinglaw, my clerk, to make inquiry whether David Brakenrigg's decree had gone against him without appearance, or whether it was in foro contradictorio, as we say—in which latter case it was insuperable. I then resigned myself to the regrets of one who, from being a gentleman, had been forced to become an attorney; yet I could not help admitting, with a smile of satisfaction, Æqualitas haud parit bellum—There could be no law pleas without inequality; and what had been my misfortune, was in fact the very grub on which we attorneys feed—Inæqualitas mater discordiarum est.

"The account which David Brakenrigg had given of the conduct of Lochcairnie solely occupied my mind. That there was a mystery in the affair, I had no doubt. My poor client was apparently honest; and he had no object to serve by indulging in an invention, where he had serious and melancholy facts to struggle with and overcome. The question rose upon me incessantly—Why did this gentleman wish so ardently to get a poor cotter and his family away to America? He had first tried to bribe him to emigrate; and, that having failed, he had next recourse to force and deception. His creature, Peter Renton, had readily wrought to his hand, and betrayed his client to serve his friend. Yet, cui bono? what was the object of all this elaborate subtlety directed against an obscure individual? My first conclusion was, that Lochcairnie wished merely to get hold of Greenshaw, David Brakenrigg's feu, for some special purpose, of an importance sufficient to authorize so much pains. But objections sprang up against this theory. It was not necessary to Lochcairnie's supposed object that he should, in addition to the price of the feu, offer £100 more, before he knew that David would not be contented with the price alone. Neither was it necessary for him to have recourse to the plan of emigration before he ascertained that his victim would not sell his feu for £100 more than its value. Beyond all, the little wild piece of mountain tract, called Greenshaw, could be of no importance to the great laird of Lochcairnie. The fact still remained unexplained, that Lochcairnie had had recourse to bribery, force, and fraud to get this poor man and his family away to a distant country. What supposition should I next have recourse to as a solvent of the difficulty? I tried several without success, and got tired of the subject. 'Paha!' said I, 'the story may be altogether a fiction; and even if true, there may be twenty good reasons for Lochcairnie's conduct, not one of which would be of any consequence to me though I knew it.' I was on the point of relinquishing the inquiry, when a remembrance flashed on my mind with the quickness of light. I remembered that, at the time when Augustus Bethune purchased Lochcairnie from William Dempster for £20,000, a part of the price had been allowed to lie for some time in the purchaser's hands, in order to secure him against a flaw in the title; but the sum was afterwards paid up, on caution being found that no heir to the Dempsters should appear and take advantage of the defect. At the moment this recollection rose upon me, the cognate fact, mentioned incidentally by David Brakenrigg, that his wife, Marion, was a Dempster, and a relation of the old Dempsters of Lochcairnie, started up in my mind. The two facts, though of no great importance severally, became eloquent in the conjunction they rapidly effected through the electric power of a lawyer's ingenuity. As yet I had but little certainty whereon to proceed; but just in proportion to the paucity and poverty of ascertained facts, the burden of my fancy was light; and, during the whole night, I thought and dreamed of David Brakenrigg and the Dempsters of Lochcairnie. In some of my rapt moments, I despised Archimedes, who asked for a fulcrum. My work was, in imagination, sometimes nearly finished, and I cried, with Cicero, 'Archimedes non posset melius describere.'

"Next morning, my clerk, John Shillinglaw, came up to my room, and told me that the decreet against David Brakenrigg was one in foro, and, therefore, could not be got the better of.

"'Do you know, John,' said I to him, as if I cared little for his answer, 'who were the cautioners that bound themselves for the late William Dempster of Lochcairnie to Augustus Bethune, when the latter paid up the remainder of the price of that estate?'

"'Yes,' replied John, who knew almost everything, without appearing to know anything. 'They were George Aitken, merchant in Glasgow, and Richard Henderson of Hamilton, in the shire of Lanark. They are both bankrupt. The former was in the Gazette about two months ago.'

"'Aha!' cried I, starting up, and clapping my hands, 'a la bonne heure! a la bonne heure!'

"'That is a true French mode,' said John, smiling drily, just as you do now, madam, 'of expressing sympathy for the misfortunes of gazetted victims.'

"David Brakenrigg, at this moment, came in, and John, obeying my nod, went out. I learned from David that old William Dempster had given him the feu of Greenshaw, and that his wife, Marion Dempster, was recognised by her relation, William, as the nearest heir of the Dempsters of Lochcairnie, though, when the property was sold to Augustus Bethune, it was generally given out that no heir was known to exist.

"'I am sorry to inform you, David,' said I, 'that you have no remeid against your decreet. I fear you must be ousted. Your only resource is an action of damages against Peter Renton, who betrayed you.'

"'A puir remeid that,' replied he. 'We lie quiet an' saft on the woo we get frae our hogs, an' it's puir huntin' after hungry goshawks. That man's worth nae mair than his tools—his pen an' ink-horn; an' they are his weapons o' offence an' defence, as weel as his implements o' trade. I maun mak' up my mind, then, to leave Greenshaw.'

"Though an honest attorney, I had here a part to play. I wished to get out of David Brakenrigg what was his wife's exact pedigree; but I was anxious, at same time, to avoid giving him any notice of my object in requiring it. My reason for this, which I hope to be able to justify by the ethical rules of our craft, may yet appear. I led him first circuitously into relationships generally; and soon found that, like other old folks who think they or theirs have some genteel blood in them, he became eloquent on that fertile subject. He soon glided naturally into his wife's relationship to the Dempsters; and I, taking advantage of my opportunity, jotted (as if I were merely amusing myself with my pen on my blad) pater, avus, proavus, and so forth, till I made a flourishing genealogical tree of the Dempsters of Lochcairnie. Finding it as complete as my informant's knowledge would enable me to make it—Marion Dempster's place in it in particular being well marked, both as it stood in relation to the last Laird William, who died two years before, and to that of the previous lairds—I pretended to get wearied of a subject in which I was not in any degree interested.

"'This is of little importance to me, David,' said I, continuing still my playful strokes with my pen; 'neither has it any connexion with your case; for old William Dempster had a right to sell the estate, and that puts an end to the expectations of mere heirs.'

"'That I ken,' replied he; 'and I aften tell Marion, when she's a wee bauld wi' family pride, that bluid is no sae strong as ink; for the drap that was in William Dempster's pen when he signed the rights o' Lochcairnie, had mair pith in't than a' the bluid o' the Dempsters that ever ran in her veins.'

"'You say truly, David,' said I; 'but, returning to our subject, I am sorry I cannot enable you to keep your little mailing. Your charge is out in a fortnight, and you must lay your account with leaving it.'

"'That I winna do till I'm forced,' replied he, trying to conceal a starting tear. 'My ain legs winna carry me frae my ain property. The makers o' unjust laws maun just complete their unjust wark, and shew their injustice by forcin' the blameless breakers o' them out o' their lawfu' inheritances, amidst the greetin' an' sabbin' o' the wives an' bairns o' the righteous owners.'

"Poor David Brakenrigg went away, sad and sorrowful, while I, with light heart and bright eye, (for hope's radiant bow was in my view,) hastened to complete an investigation that promised me a result which no honest attorney could contemplate without delight. I called up John Shillinglaw, and told him to be ready to accompany me to the General Register Office to search for a flaw which I suspected to lie in the title to the lands of Lochcairnie. We hurried away together, and passed David Brakenrigg on the street; musing, no doubt, over his unhappy fate. I said nothing to John about my views or intentions, or the use I might make of the information we were in search of—and he knew that it was not his time to speak; but his keen, sharp, hawk-like look, and his active, nimble motions, shewed clearly that he knew his master was on a right track, where the scent of game would soon gladden his nostrils. Some interruptions by the way called up his impatience; and his rueful, disappointed look, on being thus kept back from the sport in which attorneys take the greatest delight, brought into my mind the saying of Plautus—'Fames et mora bilem in nasum concinunt.' Even in the midst of my own anxiety to get a hunt among the old records, I could scarcely help smiling at the quaint aptness of the quotation.

"We soon got among the old, musty records which, to the nose of a keen attorney, present an odour as pleasant as that which the game-covering heather gives out to the deep-mouthed hound. We searched all day, and got nothing; but our spirits were not quelled, nor our expectations diminished. During the following night, (in nocte consilium,) I ruminated on the subject, and gained strength from those deep recesses of the mind which Des Cartes used to say are accessible only to nocturnal investigators. In the morning we went to our work again, exquisita diligentia et exactissima cura. We came soon upon William Dempster's own title, and took a note of it. We saw that he had made it up simply as heir in general to his father, William, senior. We got nothing more that day. On the day following, about eleven o'clock, (I love to mention the hour,) John Shillinglaw, who had a volume of the records to examine separately, came and shewed me, with a leer in his grey eye, the title of William Dempster, senior, which was made up under a particular destination of the property made by his father, George, to a particular series of heirs. I saw in an instant the meaning of John's significant leer. William Dempster, junior's title was bungled. The hungry tiger does not espy more glegly a limp in the lame buffalo than an attorney does a labes realis in a progress of titles. I gazed silently on the evidence which lay plain before me of a flaw—a fatal, irremediable defect—in the title of Augustus Bethune of Lochcairnie, who had ruined my father and forced me to be an attorney. All the energies of my soul and body passed into that small orb which drank up the intoxicating draught. In vain did Herodotus say that the soul lies in the ears. He must have got tea in his travels, and become a scandal-monger among the ladies of Egypt. He was an exception from the ancients generally, who asserted its seat to be in the eyes. I felt the truth of the dictum. My delight was greater than that of him who is famed to have thrown off his old age—magis gaudet eo qui senectam exuit (Aristoph.)—or of one who may be supposed able to cast off his attorneyship—that is, if he cannot conduct himself honestly. So long as the first gush of surprise and joy continued to flow over my excited mind, I was incapable of perusing the document that produced it. John Shillinglaw gazed on me with the silent pride of a modest discoverer, who knew it to be his duty to yield to his master the credit of the discovery. As I calmed, I became able to see, rationaliter, the whole array of the glorious, undeniable truth lying open before me. All our endeavours to find out any flaw in our process of detection of the error proved abortive, and confirmed us in the opinion that the title to Lochcairnie was, on the principle of the case, Arthur versus Henderson, not worth an obolus.

"'It is accomplished,' I cried.

"'Nam neque inexpertus jam divinavero, verum Egregie callens.'

"'No judge can touch it,' said Shillinglaw; 'and William Dempster, the younger, being dead, the defect cannot be cured.'

"'It is a beautiful chironium vulnus, John,' said I. 'No legal leech can apply a cataplasm there. The wound is in the Achillean heel—irremediable, desperate.'

"I gave my clerk instructions to take exact copies of the documents necessary to prove the truth of our discovery, and left him to return to my chambers. As I proceeded along the street, I recollected that we had not paid attention to the date of the last William Dempster's title, which, if forty years old (and it could not be far from it) would be cured by the act 1617, introducing the long prescription. My calculations made it fully forty years. All my hopes were in an instant clouded. My joy was turned into sorrow. I returned languidly and hopelessly to the office, to get my fearful anticipations confirmed. At the door I met John Shillinglaw, who, having observed me from the window, came running out (ore aperto) to communicate to me some intelligence.

"'We have forgot the prescription,' said I.

"'Count from the 28th of February 17—,' said he, smiling.

"'Thirty-eight years and nine months!' said I—'we are safe.'

"Relieved of this incubus, I proceeded to my chambers, to examine Marion Dempster's pedigree, that I might be certain she was the person entitled to claim. I was satisfied she was.

"'David Brakenrigg, poor man!' said I, musingly, as I continued my examination of the genealogical tree, 'you are by this time home to your mailing of Greenshaw, with that charge in the pocket of your sky-blue coat, whereby you are to be forced to leave the scenes of your youth, renounce your small property, and perhaps betake yourself to the houseless forest; yet at this moment, your wife, Marion Dempster, has the legal right to the large estate of Lochcairnie, and a better title to turn out him who is now oppressing you, than he has to turn out you and yours. And I, an attorney, honestly possess that secret! How strange is the feeling produced by the knowledge of a fact which, while it is capable of overturning vested rights, reversing positions in society, producing to others joy and misery, is yet snugly confined to one's own private bosom, ready to be used to the advantage of the honest custodier, in proportion to the dexterity he displays in turning it to account!

"But the question was, To what use was I fairly entitled to turn my discovery? That my honesty may appear, my position must be understood. I was an attorney, and an honest attorney, practising for emolument. My father had lost five thousand pounds by the unfair gambling of a man who was now in my power. I was not the agent of David Brakenrigg, or of Marion Dempster, who had never consulted me on their right to the property of Lochcairnie. I had got my secret by my own ingenuity, and paid for the use of the books from whence I extracted it. These were the facts to form the substratum of my argument. It required no syllogism to prove that I could and should, in some way or another, gratify a fair and legitimate revenge; but it was equally clear that, unless that could be turned to a pecuniary account, it was of no consequence to an attorney. The next inquiry was apparently clouded and difficult. Could I get back my father's five thousand pounds, or a part of it, by any use I could make of this fatal secret, without sacrificing my honour? This depended upon the solution of these two questions:—In the first place, Was I bound to communicate my secret to David Brakenrigg, and give him the advantage of his wife's right of blood? In the second place, Supposing the first question answered in the negative, would I be justified in using my secret so as to extort from Lochcairnie—who, in consequence of the bankruptcy of his cautioners, would be in great alarm—my father's money, improperly taken from him by unfair gambling?

"As regarded the first question, it seemed clear that I had not been employed by David Brakenrigg. I had received no money from him. On the contrary, I had given him a gratis advice on a subject not in any degree connected with the secret in question. It was very true that it was he who led me to inquire for the secret; but it was equally true that he did it unconsciously. He stood merely in the position of the proprietor of waif wood, which the navigator, finding on the sea-beech, puts together in the form of a vessel, whereby he discovers new lands. Could the original proprietor of the wood complain that the genius of the ship-builder excelled his honesty, and claim the discovered lands as his property? This illustration pleased me only for a little. I soon saw its fallacy. 'Is the secret,' asked my mental casuist, 'not in the position of a jewel dropped by David Brakenrigg, which the finder would be bound to deliver up to the owner?' This (granting conditionally the analogy) I thought myself able to answer. The jewel was only David Brakenrigg's by law: it was Lochcairnie's by equity. The response was good, and I was pleased with it—not so my mental casuist. 'You constitute yourself judge between the legal and equitable owner, whereas you ought to leave the question of ownership to the constituted judicial authorities of the land.' This puzzled me; but I remembered that I had conceded merely causa argumenti, the analogy between the case of the jewel and the secret, and might retract that concession if it turned out that I had a bad case on it. I retracted it on the instant—principally on the ground that the secret was res nullius; it belonged properly to nobody. It might become the property of any one who chose to pay for the register-books, and possessed ingenuity sufficient to extract it. I had paid for the books, and exerted my ingenuity successfully. Therefore the secret was mine, and I might make any lawful use of it I chose. 'Invulnerabilis es,' said I, 'ut Cæneus.'

"The next question was more simple. Lochcairnie had acted unjustly, by defrauding my father of £5000, which would have come to me by inheritance. I held in my hand the ruin of that man; and what law—what sense of justice, honour, or honesty—could prevent me from promising to avert that ruin from the head of the victim, on condition of getting an original act of injustice against me reversed and atoned for? There could be none. It was, no doubt, to a great extent, only an assumption, that Lochcairnie had used unfair means at play. 'You could not prove it to the satisfaction of a court of law,' whispered my casuist. 'True', answered I; 'but neither could Lochcairnie have proved a debt against my father to the satisfaction of a court of law.' 'Granted,' continued my casuist, 'but your father paid the debt.' 'True, again,' answered I; 'but a son can pursue legally a condictio indebiti—a repetition of a debt that was no debt—against an unjust creditor; and, though I am, in this instance, excluded by law, I have a moral right to demand repetition of a debt for which no legal right existed.' This argument I tested several times—though not, perhaps, with the Lydius lapis of a crucial experiment. I was satisfied with it. If there is any flaw in it, it must be imputed to a deficiency in my powers of reasoning, not to any want of honesty.

"It is, indeed, candidly, my honesty alone that compels me to lay before the public this process of reasoning, whereby I arrived at the conclusion of taking the step I am now to mention. Though justified by the opinion of Plautus, that subtlety is the very soul and marrow of self-interest, ad suum quemque quæstum æquum est esse callidum, I have no wish to shew any expertness in argument beyond what is necessary to support my claims to being honest. I trust in God, that no man ever found me, or ever will find me, having recourse to any loop, wail, crook, or torsel, to attain any object, just or unjust; attempting to escape by any hole, corner, cranny, crevice, nook, or angle, from the stern front of obdurate truth arrayed against me; or endeavouring, by any sleight, feint, subtlety, quip, quiddity, quodlibet, or quirk, to cheat the blind goddess into a personal favour.

"Resuming my narrative—John Shillinglaw completed his copies, and I employed another clerk, to make a handsome botanical figure of Marion Dempster's genealogical tree. I packed up these documents into my travelling portfolio, and mounted a horse for a journey. I proceeded direct to Lochcairnie, which is situated in a part of the country I was not much acquainted with. I rode all day, oblivious of everything but the revolving series of ideas suggested by and suited to the important work I had in hand. My intention was to sleep all night at a little house to which I was directed, situated about two miles from the mansion of Lochcairnie. At a late hour of the evening, I arrived at a small cottage, which I took for my destined place of rest and refeshment. I rapped at the door. To my surprise, a rough voice, which I recognised, in a moment, to be that of David Brakenrigg, asked who wanted admittance. In a feigned voice, I inquired for the house of refreshment to which I had been directed. The door now suddenly opened, and a blaze of light from a lamp in David Brakenrigg's hand exposed my face to his recognising gaze.

"'Mr ——, the great lawyer!' ejaculated the astonished man. 'Come in, come in, an' gie us that consolation ye hae brocht sae far. Heaven's mercy is slow, but sure.'

"I stepped in. I had no alternative. The night was late and dark, and I had apparently lost my way. David Brakenrigg was, in the meantime, all activity—crying to some one to attend to my horse, and to his wife, (the identical Marion Dempster, whose genealogical tree I had in my portfolio,) to prepare supper for me. I was soon seated by a blazing fire, and a warm supper was in a little time after placed before me, by the last of the Dempsters of Lochcairnie. The good couple sat by the fire as I partook of the refreshment.

"'Hoo glad am I to see you in my cottage!' said David. 'I needna ask if ye hae brocht us guid tidings—ye wadna hae travelled sae far wi' ill news. The decreet, I fancy, may be got the better o', an Marion, luve, we may yet live an dee in Greenshaw.'

"'God grant that!' said Marion Dempster, looking to me. 'If your Honour wad gie us a helpin hand, we might yet defeat the schemes o' Lochcairnie. A puir but honest cotter may surely keep his ain an' use his ain as weel as the great. It wad be an ill law that put us in the power o' Lochcairnie, an' it wadna be a guid ane that put him i' the power o' the cotters o' Greenshaw.'

"I thought of the papers in my portfolio.

"'I am sorry to say there is no remedy,' said I.

"'An' did you travel forty miles,' said David, sorrowfully, 'to tell us what ye tauld me in Edinburgh?'

"'I have been driven in here by the lateness of the night,' said I. 'I proceed farther onwards.'

"'God help us, Marion!' said David. 'I thought your Honour had come wi' some relief for us. Heaven's will be dune. We maun submit to His ways wha is greater than Lochcairnie. But I could find i' my heart to wish that, when I leave this mailin', it may be to tak up my quarters in the howff o' Lochcairnie kirk, whar my auld body may add ane mair to the green hillocks that hae sprung sae fast there sin' I used to play on their green taps.'

"'An' I wadna be lang ahint ye, David,' said Marion. 'My heart winna stand this leavin' ava. We're no tenants merely o' the place, your Honour. David was aye thocht a sma' laird, an' I hae even heard him ca'ed 'Greenshaw,' though maybe no in the same serious way that Augustus Bethune's ca'ed 'Lochcairnie.' God mend the laws! for o' a' the ills that I ever thought wad befa' us, the leavin' o' our ain property, the free gift o' William Dempster, for whilk we hae parchment an' seal, never entered into my puir head.'

"I was silent. It did not become an attorney to say a word, where there was likely to be a scene. I quietly proceeded with my supper.

"'But maybe his Honour may see Lochcairnie in the mornin',' said Marion, looking bashfully to David, 'before he proceeds farther on his journey.'

"This was as direct as Marion Dempster's modesty would permit. I could scarcely get off by silence. I despise a lie, and my gallantry would not allow me to be rude to a woman. I took a large mouthful of her victuals, and thus voluntarily disqualified myself for speech; while David opportunely chided Marion for her forwardness. The poor woman now began to weep bitterly. I never could stand the tears of a woman, even though she were on the opposite side of a process—a softness of heart wherein I have the greater merit, nam procurator non facile commovetur misericordia. I therefore promised to call upon Lochcairnie in the morning, and endeavour to get him to pass from his decreet of removing. I was in a moment absolutely inundated with thanks, tears, prayers, and exclamations of 'kind friend,' 'good, honest man,' and other characteristic appellatives, with which I was very far from being dissatisfied, seeing they were so near the truth.

"Next morning I proceeded direct to Lochcairnie House, the original object of my journey. I was now about to play one of the most important parts I had yet attempted. I required, for the execution of my task, the union of many powers and qualities; but the honesty of my purpose, to the consciousness of which I had arrived after a fair argument, afforded me that courage which many of my brethren unfortunately want, except when they are sitting by themselves, dictating a summons of damages for battery, pendente lite. Arriving at the house, I rapped boldly at the door, which, after a genteel period of time, was opened by a superb lackey, shining with powder and plush. I asked if Mr Bethune was within. He answered in the affirmative, and I was shewn up stairs into a room, where I found Lochcairnie—that identical Augustus Bethune who had ruined my father, and forced his son to become an attorney; but had been unable, thank God! to prevent him from being an honest one.

"The scene now presented to me was uncommon and striking. The room in which he sat was darkened by large folds of damask window-curtains, of a bright green, drawn close, to exclude the rays of the sun, which, arrested by the superb texture, illuminated its virent tints, and spread a soft and pleasant light throughout the apartment. On a large old oaken chair, with a back of exorbitant height, elaborately carved with innumerable quaint and curious devices, sat the object of my search, enveloped in a long dressing-gown of pure white, which, covering the whole of his tall figure, brought out, in grim contrast, the yellow, phlegmatic, cadaverous aspect of the decayed rake, gambler, and man of ton. A pair of red Morocco slippers, and a chocolate-coloured, Turkish skull-cap, covered respectively the extremities of his person. His left hand, on the slender and emaciated fingers of which several diamond rings glittered in the soft, green light of the room, was spread, as if cushioned on a white cambric handkerchief that lay on the table; while his right was deposited negligently in his bosom, enveloped in the finer cambric of a shirt, which Arachne would have admired for its whiteness and texture, and chosen for the groundwork of her storied devices. A scent-bottle, curiously embossed, declared its presence on the table by its sweet odours; and a handsome hound, as slim as its master, looked up in his face, and, by its fondness and fawning, sustained his consciousness of pride and power, and gratified his love of adulation.

"'I presume I am not unknown to you, sir,' said I, as I walked forward to the table, from which he shewed no inclination to rise to meet a stranger.

"'I think, though dubiously, that I knew your father,' said he, in a drawling, affected voice; 'at least if you are Mr ———, the attorney in Brown Square.'

"'My father, sir,' said I, with peculiar emphasis, 'would not have had the same doubt in his recognition of you.'

"'Perhaps not,' said he, raising, slowly and languidly, his tall person, which I now saw was much bent with the effects of dissipation; 'and what wouldst thou convey by that remark, which thou hast thought proper to pitch in the grating key-note of a coarse and vulgar irony?'

"'Simply, sir,' responded I, with a coolness and calmness peculiar to me, 'that the pigeon is seldom in doubt about the identity of the hawk that, by guile and rapacity, took from her her fairest feathers, with perhaps some blood on the ends of the pinions.'

"'By G—!' cried he, starting in violent anger —'this is the first time that an attorney ever exerted the privilege of his craft within the walls of the house of Lochcairnie; for we have hitherto kept impudence in the highways and streets, where it can borrow the heels of cowardice, and, flying, save itself from the bloody wales of our whip-cord.'

"The fire flashed from his eyes, and he seized, with convulsive eagerness, a long whip, that lay in the corner of the room. The handsome hound flew, with a yell, to the door. I stood unmoved.

"'That weak instrument, sir,' said I, seizing his arm, 'whose cord may one day be useful to its master otherwise than as a lash, has no more power in the cure of an attorney's impudence, than your decreet of removing against David Brakenrigg can boast in being able to deprive Marion Dempster, his wife, of her character of nearest heir to the Dempsters of Lochcairnie.'

"No arrow, shot by the unerring hand of the forester, ever went more directly to the heart of the roe, than did these words, spoken with much ironical power and determination, to the heart of Augustus Bethune. A change passed over him in an instant. He dropped the whip; the fire left his eye; his lips assumed that pallid hue supposed to be symptomatic of hepatitis; and a trembling nervousness, like the access of an ague, triumphed with a cruel domination over his convulsive efforts to maintain possession of himself. If this struggle could have been hid from my piercing eye, his pride might have rallied his powers of firmness, which, taking advantage of nature's reaction, might have been able to obey the call, and bring him timely aid in his distress; but he saw and was conscious that I marked and rejoiced in his moral paralysis—and this consciousness, I am satisfied, contributed more to the final subjugation of his proud spirit than even the harrowing fear of losing his estate, which brought on the fit. At last he struggled to speak:

"'It is not unknown,' he said, in a broken, unnatural voice—'it is not unknown, I presume, absolutely—in these adjacent parts—that this woman, Marion Dempster, is the alleged heir of William Dempster; but you are a man of the law, and must be aware that, even if there was anything to succeed to, a bastard has in her no capability of succession.'

"'If Marion Dempster, by being a bastard,' replied I, keeping my eye still fixed on his countenance, 'could not succeed to William Dempster, senior, there could be no reason for bribing her and her husband to go to America, or for endeavouring to force their departure, by taking out against them, secretly and surreptitiously, and by the treacherous aid of one's creature, Peter Renton, a decreet of removing from their little mailing of Greenshaw.'

"'Peace, peace, good sir!' said the subdued man, with increased agitation—'you talk in a strain unsuited to the thin walls of modern architecture. Though I do not understand—that is, though my capacity be not high enough to enable me properly to construe words of mystical import—others may have the power and the will to misconstrue them. It doth appear that we have got somehow—I fear my violent temper, which God mend! is the cause—into unseemly disagreement. Knowest thou any particular reason, good friend, that we should be enemies?'

"'Yes,' said I, 'you deprived my father, by unfair gambling, of five thousand pounds, reduced him to beggary, and his son to an attorneyship.'

"'Softly—softly,' replied he, in a low voice. 'I won the money fairly—upon my honour, I won it fairly. Your father paid the money like a gentleman, as he was; and thou art also, I am well satisfied—how could I doubt so clear a fact?—a gentleman. A debt of honour is a privileged debt.'

"'I deny it,' said I, determined to keep my victory. 'The ban of the law is against it, and no good system of morals is for it.'

"I beg your pardon, sir,' said he; 'but wherein lieth—for I see it not—the connexion between this debt of honour I won from your father, and the circumstance of the woman Marion Dempster being related to the Dempsters of Lochcairnie.'

"He eyed me intensely at this moment; but I knew my power, and did not yet wish to bring it forth. I hesitated wilfully, and paused, submitting myself calmly, freely, and invitingly, to his timid, nervous look. He rallied slightly, in proportion as I exhibited feigned irresolution—the very result I wished—for there is no mean of subjugation like alternate vindications of power and acknowledged falls. Still eyeing me, he pulled up his shrunk body, and had nearly attained his usual height. I allowed him to proceed in his process of confirmation. His voice became a little firmer, and his eye less nervous.

"'There is clearly no connexion between these things,' he continued, cautiously, and still eyeing me, to see if I exhibited any indications of dissent. 'Besides, though Marion Dempster were not a bastard, and were in fact the heir of the Dempsters of Lochcairnie, how could that affect a lawful purchaser, with a recorded infeftment? Ha! ha!'

"A wretched spasmodic cackle was wrung from his parched throat. This forced hysterical laugh, or rather scream, told me volumes. He knew the flaw, and was sounding me. I was as calm as ether—tranquillum æthera remigavi. He could make nothing of an honest attorney. My calmness, which he had mistaken for irresolution or doubt, again disconcerted him, and fear resumed her domination.

"'Sir,' said I, with the voice, attitude, and decision of a judge, 'deceive not yourself. I have evidence here in my hand,' (taking out the documents,) 'that the title of William Dempster, junior, from whom you bought Lochcairnie, was irregularly made up. It should have been strictly in terms of the destination in George Dempster, his grandfather's disposition. It is not worth the hundredth part of the value of the smallest of these diamonds that glitter on your finger. All this, sir,' (pausing,) 'you know. Marion Dempster, or Brakenrigg, by this genealogical tree, is the lawful heir of William Dempster, senior, in whose hereditas jacens the fee and right of Lochcairnie still lies. She can, and will, if I say the word, take this property from you, out of the teeth of the fifteen senators of the College of Justice. Thus far have I answered you, though not in your own order. The connexion between my knowledge of these facts and the repetition of the five thousand pounds you won from my father, I leave to your own powers of perception.

"My statement put to flight the remnant of his hope and courage, and placed ruin before his eyes.

"'Doth Marion Dempster or David Brakenrigg know this?' he said, despondingly, as he have way to his weakness, and glided into his chair,

"'No,' said I—'no one knows it but you and I. It is yet between ourselves.'

"He revived slightly, and, stretching forth his hand, applied the scent bottle to his nose. Starting up, he exclaimed, as if from the sudden impulse of a new thought—

"'The prescription! the prescription! Thou forgettest the forty years—the act 1617, the palladium of the land rights of Scotland!'

"'The period of prescription,' answered I, calmly, 'does not expire for one year and three months. The —— day of —— 17—, is the date of William Dempster's infeftment.'

"He again fell into his chair. His fears seemed to assume the dreadful form of destitution, if not starvation. But I felt no pity for him. His face was hid in his hands, and intense agitation seemed to shake his frame. A part of his struggle, no doubt, consisted of his difficulty in knowing what to do in the exigency of the situation in which I had placed him. He could not deny the facts stated. A denial would exasperate me, his enemy, who held his fate in my hands; but an admission—a confession—a prostration of his pride, his power, and a consequent submission to the dictation of the man he had first injured and then insulted—was felt like the renunciation of life. Hence the struggle that heaved his bosom and convulsed his limbs, and the shame that covered up his face with hands that shook in their effort to conceal the feelings that agitated his frame. I stood, durus et implacabilis, to see my hellebore work its expected results.

"'What is it, then,' he at last cried, in something like a beseeching strain—'what is it, sir, thou wantest? What is the object of thy visit?'

"'Grant me a bond,' said I, 'for the five thousand pounds you took from my father, payable at twelve o'clock of the day after the expiry of the period of prescription, burdened with the condition that not one penny of the money shall be demandable, if the flaw in your title should in the meantime be discovered and taken advantage of.'

"'I cannot,' he cried—'I have not five thousand pounds clear after paying my debts. But—but to get entirely and for ever quit of this unpleasant business, I shall grant a bond for two thousand pounds on the terms thou mentionest. Thou forgettest I have caution between me and a challenge of my right.'

"'The cautioners are bankrupt,' said I—'your ruin is in my hands; but I have no wish to press matters to extremities—make it £3000, and I will close instantly. Here is the bond with the sum blank, ready to be signed. I will take no less. Refuse, and I go direct to David Brakenrigg, when no power on earth can save Lochcairnie.'

"He was silent. I seized a pen and filled up the sum in the blank bond at three thousand pounds.

"'Is the condition in the bond?' he inquired, with anguish.

"'No,' said I, 'it is in this back letter.'

"He rose hastily, and, taking up the pen hurriedly, signed the instrument. I handed to him the back letter, stating that, in the event of proceedings being taken against him before the day of payment, the sum should not be demandable. Two servants were called up to sign as witnesses; and the transaction being completed, I put the bond in my pocket.

"'Now, sir, discharge your decreet against David Brakenrigg,' said I.

"'That is necessary for my own safety,' said he, 'as matters now stand.'

"I wrote a letter of discharge, which he signed. I bowed and retired.

"I now rode to David Brakenrigg.

"'Bring out your bottle and quaich, Mrs. Brakenrigg,' said I; 'for I must drink joy to the feuar of Greenshaw, who is to be allowed to keep his mailing.'

"My words spread joy throughout the house of the cotter. The bottle and quaich were brought out, and I did not shame the oblation. As I emptied a full quaich, I handed over to David, Lochcairnie's discharge.

"'God bless you, guid sir!' said the old man, as the tear started to his eye—'aften hae I spoken against the scribes, as they wha sit in Moses' seat, an bind heavy burdens grievous to be borne, and lay them on men's shoulders. A malison seize me an' mine if ever I speak against your kind again!—for ye hae reversed the words o' Mathew, an' taen frae our backs a burden we couldna bear.'

"'If God grant us health,' cried the happy dame, 'something better than mere words shall shew our gratitude for this kindness. Cheeses, an' kegs o' butter, an' ankers o' whisky may prove the gratitude o' the puir, as weel as diamonds do the love o' them that live in high places. Whar does your Honour ride to noo?'

"'Home,' answered I.

"'Ah, I was thinkin' that,' rejoined Marion, looking to David. 'The guid creature cam here forty mile o' gaet, to do us this service; an' it was merely his ain fashion o' fun that made him conceal frae us his real intentions.'

"'Was there ever sic kindness witnessed on earth?' said David, holding up his hands. 'But it's no lost to ye, sir—for ye hae laid up a treasure in the heavens that fadeth not, where no thief approacheth, neither moth corrupteth.'

"'David Brakenrigg,' said I, 'if you are pleased, I am pleased.'

"I mounted my horse and rode home. I afterwards got payment of my bond; and Augustus Bethune retained his property of Lochcairnie."

MODERN SOCIETY, OR THE MARCH OF INTELLECT; BY MISS CATHERINE SINCLAIR.

Take away a few sentences from the grave and serious preface to this fiction, and one or two conversations, and let Mr Colburn publish it in three volumes, (which it could very well make,) and we should have something the likest in the world to a fashionable novel—the fashionables being, however, chiefly Scottish persons, and the scene Scotland. Both the characters and town localities may, therefore, be at considerable discount in fashionable life, as it exists in the exclusive circles of the metropolis; but in Scotland they are unexceptionable.

The story affords almost no incident, or none save of the most threadbare kind; and for originality of character, it is vain to look in such society as is here delineated; yet the personages, if tame and commonplace, are very real.

Of heroines we have a pair. They are fair young cousins:—the vain, dashing, selfish, and, we should say, insolent and bad-hearted heiress, Eleanor Fitz-Patrick; and the pattern, Miss Matilda Howard—the one living under the evil influences of a worldly mind, and corrupted by the excess of prosperity, and the other habitually under the guidance and control of Christian feelings and principles. We do not, however, perceive that it costs Matilda any great effort to be whatever is Wisest, virtuousest, discreetest, best.

She is naturally a very happily-conditioned young lady, well brought-up by a pious and amiable aunt, and neither "crazed with care nor crossed in hopeless love." Her disposition is affectionate, benign, and cheerful; and we really cannot perceive that her Christian course is one of much struggle or difficulty, or that it costs her any sacrifice to take up the Cross. To be sure, she does brave the cold of the Highlands, and marches alone through the snow to church upon foot; and eschews large gold ear-rings, and too many brilliant rings and adornings; and, instead of French ringlets, wears her hair nicely arranged in rich folds; and thinks no more of her elegant attire after it is once carefully and well put on; and is kind to the cottagers, and docile to Dr Murray, the pattern parish minister; and is, in brief, a very amiable young person, not severely tried in any one shape, being far too sage to expose herself to danger.

If the object of Miss Sinclair is to shew that there is true wisdom in moderate desires and well-regulated affections, even in a selfish view, her success is complete.

Laying aside the merits of this fiction as a religious and moral instructor, we should say that it possesses considerable value as a faithful transcript, rather than description, of the manners and way of life of what is reckoned the highest society that is now permanently to be found in Scotland. The long dinners, the prosing conversations, the stale puns, and past-date jokes, and other "reciprocities of smartness," are exceedingly like the original, as it is to be found in "the best" Scottish circles, and as it graduates from these by fine divergence to the tables of the minor gentilities. We do not affirm that better and brighter society may not be found in Scotland; but that this is faithful to its original.

The party representing modern society are assembled at Barnard Castle in Inverness-shire, the seat of the heiress, Eleanor Fitz-Patrick. They consist of the cousin heroines; Miss Marabout, once the governess, now the toady of the heiress; Sir Richard, the father of the young lady; Tom Grant, the wit and rattle; and Sir Colin Fletcher, a regular bore, who has a story similar to everything, with which he regularly comes in, answering to his cue—on the plan of some of Madame D'Arblay's characters, and of others in plays and farces—with the one cut-and-dry speech. There is, besides, a gay fashionable widow, Lady Susan Danvers, doting upon lap-dogs, and by no means averse to a second husband; affecting girlish vivacity, and provided with a ready-made attachment to any eligible match proposed. The other personages are Colonels, Majors, Lords, and Baronets—all alike ready and willing to marry the heiress.

In her early girlhood and poverty, Tom Grant had been in love with Eleanor, and there is still a lingering, smothered penchant in her bosom for her rejected lover; but ambition keeps it in check, while Grant begins to get cured of love, by perceiving the many faults and unamiable traits of the heiress, contrasted with the beautiful and consistent character of her cousin. The hero—Sir Alfred Douglas, Bart. of Douglas Priory, a modern Grandison, and a tiresome, pragmatical, solemn coxcomb, as we take leave to think—arrives at Castle Barnard, to canvass the county, and, as the heiress believes, to gain her hand, though he is in reality devoted to her mild, sensible cousin. This gives scope to the indispensable game of cross-purposes, to be played in books, in a great house and a large party. There is also an under-story of a poor servant girl; her head turned with vanity in the first place, and with unfounded suspicions entertained of her honesty, in the next; with her, a broken-hearted mother, and a wicked and artful French Abigail. Matilda plays the guardian angel in all the trials of the inferior personages; while Eleanor, the haughty, careless, fine-lady mistress—provided that her hair is well-dressed, and all her selfish purposes answered—cares nothing whatever about the characters or happiness of her domestics.

We are rather at a loss where to commence with our specimens of "Modern Society." In heroines, the amiabilities and the frivolities, the sweetnesses and the impertinencies, have been so often seen in contrast, that from them we hope nothing. We shall therefore select a combination of wit and wisdom—a situation, and a keen encounter of the wits of the crack men—the paragon Sir Alfred, namely, and the gay, dashing Tom Grant, who is evidently a favourite with Miss Sinclair, and whom we like much better than his pragmatical friend.—Sir Alfred has just arrived to commence his canvass; and Sir Richard, an old Tory alarmist, is overpowering him with prosy counsel. He solemnly replies—

"Sir Richard, what a gentleman can do I shall; he that would do more is none. Of course public business cannot go on without dinners; but my do-er, as you call him in Scotland, had carte blanche to give as many at the King's Arms as he chose. I hope, therefore, that my free and independent constituents have enjoyed abundance of the usual fare on these occasions—soiled tablecloths, steel forks, and cold lobsters. They shall hear my sentiments on all occasions, without disguise or evasion, clearly and fully stated, because there is nothing in them to conceal; but I shall not, on any account, stand up like a schoolboy before his tutors, to be catechised."

"Well, I am thankful to have got over much of my life in better times than you will ever see again," observed Sir Richard, who was a very mournful politician, though cheerful on every other subject. "The change is great; but you young men must conform to the spirit of the age. The people require to be propitiated"——

"Trust me on that score. They are like the bear, who shewed his teeth when the traveller seemed afraid; but, when a stick was held up, he began to dance. We, who are accustomed to command, ensure compliance more certainly by preserving our tone of authority than by relinquishing it."

Sir Richard became outrageous at this reply, and Matilda heard a prodigious accession of energy in her uncle's tone—"Anarchy in the country!—immediate revolution!—rally round the constitution!"——

"Keep all that for the hustings next Friday, Sir Richard; we shall want a little oratory there, and you are wasting a great deal of good alarm on me, which would do admirably for the mob. Depend upon it, no man loses, in the estimation of even the lowest rabble, by keeping up the dignity of that station which he is born to fill. It is scarcely worth while to be so anxious about anything in this world, as you wish me to be respecting my election; but, depend upon it, I shall do my utmost, and, moreover, get up a speech upon any pattern you choose to bespeak for the occasion—either neat and appropriate, or eloquent and impassioned."

So much for Sir Alfred's political ideas, and respect for the mob. Now for his refined wit and sentiment:—

"Is there any truth in that report you told me from Downing Street?"

"I never deal in mere reports," answered Sir Alfred, strolling towards the fire. "A man who circulates false news should be put to death."

"That would cause an alarming mortality here," exclaimed Mr Grant. "How could you furnish conversation, Douglas? for we must talk."

"Je ne'en vois pas la necessite," replied Sir Alfred.

"In fact, a false report often suits my purpose fully better than a true one," said Mr Grant; "because I have first the advantage of telling it, and then follows the pleasure of contradicting it."

"What shocking profligacy!" interrupted Eleanor. "No wonder Miss Murray stares like an astonished cassowary! I am glad the Doctor is not within earshot. We are continually hearing marriages announced which are to take place immediately, and the next day they are gone off upon settlements; but who ever guessed that they were of your counterfeit coinage!"

"Many of them are much better arranged than the matches people make for themselves! I wish no one would ever marry till they have consulted me; for I never saw a happy couple yet, without thinking that one of the parties might have done better."

"I am positively resolved against a sportsman," said Eleanor; "for it must be tiresome remaining a disconsolate widow at home all winter, except during a hard frost. Members of Parliament also shall be blackballed on my list, because they annually abscond from their families during the greater part of the year."

"I shall endeavour to lose my election," said Sir Alfred, drily.

"It would be much better if you did," replied Eleanor, laughing. "I have so often, during my long experience, been disappointed, when gentlemen who had a prodigious reputation for cleverness got into Parliament, and were expected to be great orators. I generally watch for their maiden speeches, expecting a blaze of eloquence, and seldom see more than this:—'An honourable member, whose name we could not learn—Sir Alfred Douglas, we believe—said a few words, which were inaudible under the gallery.'"

Matilda stole a look from her drawing at Sir Alfred, and a brilliant smile illuminated her countenance, while she watched to discover how he bore her cousin's raillery. It was instantly evident that he had not been previously aware she was present, and that her appearance at Barnard Castle was no less interesting than unexpected; for he started when her eye caught his, made a few hasty steps forward, and actually coloured with astonishment and pleasure. . . . . .

Matilda had not believed it was possible for any event in life to cause him so much agitation as he testified at that moment; and her own was not less. . .

She had often blamed herself for wasting time on the remembrance of one whose absence was in itself a mark of indifference; and general report had led her to believe him so entirely changed, that, with all the strength of a well-exercised and well-principled mind, Matilda had resolutely crushed out of her heart every thought that could endanger her peace. She had ceased to think of him except as an interesting acquaintance, in whose conversation there had been a degree of intellectual fire and vigour never equalled by any one since; and she now resolved not hastily to believe what her heart and her hopes suggested.

"You see Sir Alfred is very constant," whispered Eleanor to her cousin, when a noise of talking prevented the possibility of her being heard.

"How!" exclaimed Matilda, starting.

"Did you not observe, when I threatened never to marry a member of Parliament, he immediately wished to lose his election. Nothing could be more decided."

"What a salutary lesson for me, to distrust my own impressions!" thought Matilda.

Matilda's mind became calm, in proportion as she succeeded in convincing herself that Sir Alfred's had been an almost boyish fancy, when she was scarcely yet grown up, but that now he had probably seen many superior to herself, and could not long continue to feel the interest in her which, for a moment, he betrayed; and, being resolved, at least, to think on the subject no more, she again endeavoured to fix her attention on the gay absurdities of Mr Grant, who had a sort of laisser aller in his conversation, which rendered him infinitely diverting.

"How very handsome your poodle looks to-day, Miss Fitz-Patrick! Is it true that you have Blanco bathed every morning in Eau de Cologne? His coat is really as smooth and white as floss silk. What an acquisition he would be at those taverns in London, where a dog is made to walk round the table during dinner, that the company may all wipe their knives and forks on his back!"

"Mr Grant," replied Eleanor, in a remonstrating voice, "I generally make a point of trying to believe what you tell me."

"Well, so you ought! I appeal to Sir Alfred if that is not the case. Douglas, you have seen it done fifty times?"

"Not above twenty," replied the Baronet, ironically; "and I always contrived to have the advantage over every body else, because I doubled up the tail!"

Is not Sir Alfred the model of a hero? The dialogue which follows looks very like a morning conversation, truly reported. If it possess little of the point and brilliance with which Miss Edgeworth and Sheridan have gratuitously invested their imaginary conversations of fashionables, it has far more vraisemblance.

"A propos, have no new marriages come out lately?" inquired Lady Susan Danvers; "they are few and far between at present."

"I refer you to Mr Grant for the last assortment of gossip," replied Eleanor; "he telegraphs Edinburgh for all the events that have or ought to have occurred there, and has a perpetual supply of the newest matches on hand."

"Every one quite certain," added he, in a tone of decision. "The only thing to be regretted is, that I am not on the list myself."

This was said with his usual careless off-hand tone, in which Matilda traced nothing but total indifference; yet Eleanor instantly coloured, giving a little conscious laugh, and a coquettish toss of her head, which would have been infinitely amusing to any one less truly interested in all her feelings than her cousin, who regretted to observe Miss Fitz-Patrick so blindly unaware of the change which had evidently arisen in her former lover.

"I am told," said Miss Charlotte Clifford, "that there are nine-and-thirty marriages on the tapis at present."

"Suppose we make the fortieth!" exclaimed Mr Grant, eagerly.

"Now, Charlotte, what do you say?" cried Eleanor, laughing; "this is rather a public declaration, certainly!"

"I generally propose to every young lady during her first season, if I am sure of being refused, because then she can boast with truth of having rejected somebody."

"But that happens to Charlotte every day! We know of at least a dozen last winter, and I only wonder what would be good enough—peers, officers, authors, travellers!—she must be waiting for a Lord of Session!"

Lady Susan now drew her chair forward and assumed an aspect of the deepest attention, while Mr Grant, with a degree of gravity and importance suited to the occasion, drew out from his pocket a numerous collection of old letters. "Are we quite among friends?" said he, carefully turning over several papers. "The strictest secrecy must be observed. Douglas, pray step aside, because you are such a gossip that my news will be repeated all over the country by to-morrow."

"I don't care who marries, provided nobody marries me!" replied Sir Alfred, looking accidentally towards Eleanor.

"I publish the banns of matrimony, then, between Miss Brown and Mr Smith—that is positive, having been declared last week!"

"Who are they?" asked Lady Susan, anxiously.

"How should I know? very excellent people, I dare say, and extremely suitable!"

"There was a Miss Brown, or White, or Grey, or some such colour, that I remember once rather admiring and bringing into fashion at Cheltenham," said Colonel Pendarvis; "but it was nearly two years ago, so she must be quite passée now."

"For my part, I hate new beauties!" observed Mr Grant, with an arch look at his cousin, Lady Susan. "I never thoroughly admire any face till I have been accustomed to it for eight or ten years."

"Pshaw, Mr Grant! now tell us of somebody whose name, at least, we know," continued she, impatiently. "What does it signify to me whether such people as these marry or not?"

"But, Lady Susan, if those in whom you are interested will not marry, how can I help it? Let me see—the list is only begun! A brother of the Queen of Naples, to the Grand Duke of Baden's half-sister—that is important!—we are getting into high life now! Lady Susan Dan———oh! pardon me!———hem—not yet announced———hem—splendid alliance—hem long attachment———um—magnificent settlements and jewels"——

"Ah, Mr Grant! this is not fair! you are become a fortune-teller rather than a newsmonger," interrupted Eleanor.

At length a dressing bell rung, and the whole party were dispersing to prepare for dinner, when Matilda hastily stooped down to collect some of her drawing materials, which had been scattered on the floor by Lady Susan's dogs. Supposing her to be gone, Colonel Pendarvis eagerly asked, in accents of admiration, who she was; and before Matilda could emerge from concealment, to effect an escape, Eleanor drew a sketch which evidently pointed out to her own admirers in what light she wished them to consider the original.

"A cousin of mine! quite a saint, and very blue! You have heard of my aunt, Lady Howard, who is a perfect Polyglott of languages?—speaks Latin fluently, could tell if there be a dot too many in Dr Porson's essays, and asks gentlemen whether they prefer the plays of Euripides or Sophocles. Her daughter is exactly such another—teaches Sunday schools, and is quite in the good line. If you ask her to dance a quadrille, she will answer with a text; and only last week I saw her mooning at the window so long in the evening that she is evidently trying to count whether the stars are an odd or an even number."

Colonel Pendarvis shrunk into the farthest corner of the sofa, and put up a screen, as if he were seeking protection from such a terrific being as Matilda heard herself described. Lord Alderby turned up his eyes with contempt, Major Foley shrugged his shoulders with horror, and Sir Alfred calmly fixed his penetrating eyes on the heiress's laughing, triumphant countenance.

"I deny the whole indictment, Eleanor!" said Matilda, rising when she found it impossible any longer to avoid being produced, though the necessity for coming so unexpectedly forward covered her with confusion. Her bright eyes sparkled with animation, her transparent complexion glowed with more than its usual brilliancy, and an expression of modest sensibility added a charm to her countenance which nothing could have excelled. Hastily gliding out of the room, she merely whispered to Eleanor, in a tone of gentle reproach—"Defend me from a candid friend! You deserve to be prosecuted for a libel!"

So completely had the heiress's suitors understood their cue, from what Eleanor said of her cousin, that not one in the number ventured to express the admiration which could not but be felt by them all, at her graceful appearance, except Mr Grant, who exclaimed, with his usual independence of thinking and speaking—

"Look to your laurels, Miss Fitz-Patrick! I always maintained there was no one fit to draw in a curricle with you, except Miss Howard, and I think so still."

There are, we think, revelations in this fiction which only a female writer could make. They are touched with pathos and extreme delicacy, and ought to be taken home by all young ladies as solemn warnings and gentle counsels, if they would shun those terrible evils which crush the life out of some young hearts, and harden others into worldly, selfish petrifactions, or translate Miss Adelaide Montagues into Mrs Admiral Mactartans. Many ladies, in the course of painful personal observation, could, we apprehend, tell a tale very like the following:—

Matilda had been frequently warned that it is customary, in the present day, among many gentlemen, along with the most marked attention, to make such enigmatical speeches to young ladies, as may either mean a profession of attachment, or a declaration of indifference, according as they are understood. She had sometimes even laughed at instances which were related to her of the ingenuity with which this can be done; but yet she became aware, that, in all cases of unhappy self-deception, however justified by circumstances, the lady must bear the blame as well as the sorrow. Many of her own friends had been fatally deceived into a permanent loss of happiness, by putting the construction which seemed to be intended upon such treacherous expressions and equivocal conduct. . . . . Matilda could not but at this moment reflect upon an incident which deeply impressed her own mind two years before with a consciousness of the danger there may be in implicitly trusting to any such accidental attentions as are met with frequently in society. Walking one day along Queen Street with her friend, Miss Adelaide Montague, who was then not much older than herself, they accidentally saw Colonel Pendarvis riding past on horseback; but, immediately on observing them, he reined in his beautiful steed, and rode up. It was Adelaide's first winter, during which she had been a reigning beauty of the season, and the Colonel's assiduities were so conspicuous and incessant, that every tea-table in Edinburgh settled, without delay, exactly how much a-year he had, or expected to have, as well as the day on which his marriage was certainly to take place. On the morning which Matilda now remembered, Adelaide's eyes sparkled with animation at this unexpected rencontre, and the handsome Colonel spoke in a tone full of vivacity and pleasure.

"Miss Montague! quite delighted to see you! What a charming day! I am in perfect despair! Our marching orders are come for to-morrow, and I go with the first detachment. We are all breaking our hearts, I assure you. But one consolation is, that the headquarters are to be at Brighton! Anything rather than Ireland! A propos, you will be diverted to hear that our spare major is fairly caught by your friend, Miss Wentworth. I'm afraid it's a lost case. Good morning! My best regards to Lady Montague and your sister."

When Adelaide had acted over all the surprise and indifference which were suitable to the occasion, she took a smiling farewell of the lively Colonel, and hastened on. Matilda felt her companion's arm weigh more heavily upon hers as they proceeded, while the few remarks she made remained unanswered, till, at last, she stole one single glance at Adelaide's face, and saw the consuming anguish which was painted there. Miss Montague silently and rapidly pressed her hand, when they reached home, and vanished into her mother's house; but Matilda never afterwards forgot that expression of mute despondency, and when, in society, she heard the frequently repeated "wonder" how very soon Adelaide Montague's looks had "gone off," and the constantly reiterated witticism, declaring that she now only deserved the last syllable of her name, "laide," that scene recurred to her thoughts, and she could neither wonder nor smile; though, from that hour, it became forcibly impressed on her mind how many might have fallen the unsuspected victims of a too ready belief in the apparent preference which may now be shewn, in accordance with the usages of society; but the real fallacy of which she felt that it was well for herself to know. It had interested Matilda much that morning accidentally to witness the first meeting which took place between them afterwards—Colonel Pendarvis, (now a suitor of the heiress,) with a polite and graceful bow, expressing his fear that Miss Montague might not do him the honour to recollect that he formerly enjoyed the pleasure of knowing her, and Adelaide's equally well-bred reply, that she perfectly remembered long ago having been introduced to him; yet Matilda could not but observe also the bitter smile which followed his retreat, when he bowed himself off: and earnestly did she now desire and pray that such feelings as those of her friend were at that moment might never be her own.

The next tale is equally sad, if not much more painful; for a nobler nature is crushed and destroyed. Dr Murray, the parish priest, has, for his companion and housekeeper, an affectionate and simple-minded old maiden sister—a truly "good sort of a creature;" as those in whom are often contemptuously called. We like Miss Murray vastly; and admire and love her creed.

Miss Murray's creed was simple in the extreme, yet it influenced her whole conduct, and directed all she said. Though unable, like many more showy Christians, to talk fluently, she acted on all occasions with invariable consistency. She could not give a theoretical summary of religious duty, but she was a living model of its practice. She would have failed in sketching a systematic outline of doctrine, but she existed in the exercise of prayer, and of that charity which thinketh no evil, while, with the Scriptures almost constantly in her hand, she continually either studied its pages, or meditated in her own simple way on its contents. Miss Murray had, from the very first, deliberately and cheerfully made up her mind to incur the odium of remaining an old maid; for, though her manners, which were simple and pleasing, attracted an unusual portion of good-will in society, her appearance was unprepossessing, and she anticipated no probability of exciting a permanent interest in any one to whom her happiness could have been safely confided.

The conclusions of her own good sense had been hastened, however, by a family circumstance, so tragical in itself, that the lesson of experience and caution which it gave seemed to have been burnt into her mind with indelible characters. She had once possessed an elder sister in whom her heart delighted, and who was adorned with every attractive quality in which she felt conscious of being herself deficient. Returning home one day, after an absence of several weeks, she flew, as was her custom, to Jane's room, and entered it unnoticed. There she was startled and shocked to observe her usually gay and animated companion immovably seated in the corner of a distant sofa, with pallid cheek and quivering lip, while her eyes were fastened on a visting card in her hand, which she seemed unable to cease contemplating. It might have appeared to a mere observer as if, in that small object, there could be little to raise intense emotion, for it contained no more than the words—"Mr Andrew Falconer, P.P.C.;" yet these few solitary letters were the source of deep and heart-breaking sorrow. They spoke of years which had been passed in deceitful hope. They told of confidence misplaced; and they were a memorial of former pleasures, never more to be remembered without the anguish of blighted affection. Among many admirers Jane distinguished only one, whose incessant attentions and devoted anxiety to please seemed to her young and confiding heart a sufficient proof of sincerity, though no explicit declaration of attachment had pledged his honour. His professional emoluments were scarcely sufficient for competence, and he depended for wealth on the whim of a rich and aged aunt, whose tyranny and caprice sufficiently accounted, in Jane's estimation, for delay. Meantime, every day and every hour bore witness to Mr Falconer's assiduities—he was the companion of her walks—her escort at every party—he listened with intense interest to her conversation—turned over the leaves of music when she played, and sent her bouquets of flowers from his garden—whatever she read he read himself—and when she visited their mutual friends in the country, he followed her there with undiminished attention. Many years had thus passed away—the whole lifetime of her youth—and not a doubt ever occurred to Jane's mind of his attachment; when, on the previous week, he carelessly and accidentally mentioned to her brother that in a few days he was to be married. The card which he left that morning remained for hours in her hand.

Jane Murray had what is called spirit. She speedily roused herself up to meet the occasion; called on Mr Falconer's mother when the wedding was over, congratulated his sisters, talked of the event with her usual vivacity in every company, and apparently smiled and laughed as she had done before; but The Inverness Courier, which "advertised" the "marriage in high life" of Mr Andrew Falconer, contained, not many months afterwards, an announcement which few would have supposed to bear any connexion with so brilliant an event—the death of Jane Murray.

These we consider favourable specimens of Miss Sinclair's serious manner. Her brilliant scenes are developed with equal tact. The arrival of Lady Susan Danvers and her appendages is thus cleverly managed.

"Ah! Lady Susan Danvers is arrived!" cried Eleanor, as the carriage slowly turned round a broad sheet of gravel which expanded before the house. "There she is, as gay and fine as a perfumer's wig-block, staring out of the window. How Mr Grant made me laugh yesterday with an account of her travels abroad, when she refused to marry ever so many ex-kings, counts, and cardinals! Poor Lady Susan is so frequently invited to second-rate Edinburgh parties, on account of her rank being ornamental, that he means to suggest a plan for her being let out by the job, and turning an honest penny by it. In ordinary dress she is worth so much—in diamonds and feathers double the price—but, when she keeps her father's coroneted carriage waiting at the door, she deserves any money."

"It is said that, in Mrs Glass's Receipt-Book, or Hints on Etiquette, I forget which, you may find a prescription for assembling the most agreeable dinner-party imaginable. Get a lawyer to talk, a beauty to excite interest, a traveller to tell stories, and a peer to give it éclat; but, by your account, Lady Susan might serve in nearly all these capacities at once."

"So she does. For instance, Lady Montague, our opposite neighbour, gives only three dinners in a season, which take place on three days running; so, my great amusement is to watch her party arriving. The first day, a coronet is emblazoned on every pannel; the second day, gentlemen's carriages arrive with only supporters; and the third day, nothing is to be seen but hackney-coaches full of poor relations; but I was amused to observe that Lady Susan is always present at the whole of them—first, to be pleased herself at the great party, and then that she may give dignity to the inferior ones."

A perfect uproar of joy took place between Eleanor and her newly-arrived visiter when they met, and the barking of lap-dogs was scarcely louder or more vociferous than the clamour of their voices; while compliments, inquiries, reproaches, and protestations of regard were exchanged in rapid and animated succession. A slight bow of recognition was all that Lady Susan bestowed upon Miss Howard, followed by that deliberate stare of a cold examining eye, which is, above all inflictions, the most formidable in society to a person of sensitive feelings; therefore, being anxious to escape from notice which was so little conciliatory, Matilda gracefully returned the acknowledgement, and quietly seated herself by the fire.

"How very thin you are become, Lady Susan!" exclaimed Eleanor, with well-assumed consternation; for she knew that her friend lived in perpetual vexation, because her embonpoint was beyond what suited with any pretensions to young ladyism. "You must be fed up in the Highlands for the credit of our mountain air, and not leave Barnard Castle till you can scarcely get out at the door."

"Bien obligée! but you shall positively not make a prize-ox of me."

. . . . . .

Matilda's attention was, in the meantime, diverted from the scene before her, by a perpetual annoyance from Lady Susan's three little Blenheim spaniels, which were constantly fighting or playing under the table where she sat, causing such a vibration as occasionally threatened the total overthrow of her drawing materials, till, at length, one of them began barking so violently, that further conversation became utterly impossible.

"Excuse me, Miss Howard," said Lady Susan, affectedly; "my darling Tiny cannot bear to be looked at."

"What a modest dog!" exclaimed Matilda, unable to help laughing; "but she is certainly a great beauty."

"Yes," said Eleanor, "Tiny has quite the air of a dog of fashion, and such a friendly way of putting her paw upon my arm, as if she really could speak, and had something confidential to say."

"Dear little creatures! they are very attaching! Positively Tiny becomes so melancholy during my absence that Dantelle and I take it by turns now to remain at home from church on alternate Sundays, that she may not be dull."

A long conversation ensued between the two friends on the good qualities of their respective pets, while innumerable anecdotes were told of their sagacity and affection. Dogs, long since deceased, were remembered and deplored with melancholy regret; and the infirmities and distempers of others still living were described and lamented, with expressions of interest and pity which might have been applied to their dearest friends in similar circumstances. The medical treatment of their complaints was anxiously considered, the variety of their tastes discussed, and many unpleasant endurances they each boasted of having put up with from the canine race, which would have caused a fellow-creature to be banished with disgust from their sitting-rooms. In short, it appeared as if the two ladies had formed a conspiracy to render dogs, at least equal to mankind, if not superior. Before the endless subject seemed more than begun, the door suddenly opened, and a head appeared, exhibiting an expression of laughing animation, which Murillo might have vainly attempted to copy.

A dinner-party in Barnard Castle brings out all the characters in their different and contrasted parts; and is, we think, a strictly fair, as well as a clever piece of representation and dialogue. Matilda enters the drawing-room, and joins the gay assembled party, having just been consoling poor Nanny, the suspected waiting-maid, who is going distracted under the odium of the charges of purloining trinkets brought against her.

Lively groups were scattered about the room, all apparently animated by the highest spirits; and she looked around to ascertain if there was any individual with whom she felt sufficiently acquainted to place herself; but all were already engaged, or else comparative strangers, and Eleanor was so surrounded by her satellites as to be quite unapproachable; therefore, feeling very much like some person who had dropped from the clouds and belonged to nobody, Matilda quietly glided into a chair as near her cousin as possible, and began examining a volume of prints, to diminish the awkwardness of sitting alone and unnoticed. Meantime, she stole an intelligent glance around, to observe what was passing, and felt as completely au fait in reading the plot of all that was going on, and as far removed from taking an active part in it, as if she had been seated in a side-box at the Opera. Lady Montague and Mrs Clifford appeared to be in deep and consequential conference, probably comparing the relative prices of their milliners' bills, or else each praising her own daughter in a confidential tone to the other, and boasting of the brilliant talents and prospects of their respective sons. Sir Richard occupied the whole fire, which was large enough to have roasted an ox; but he contrived to spread himself entirely over it, holding by the button Dr Murray, to whom he was eagerly demonstrating on the subject of politics. Mr Grant had placed himself beside Miss Murray, and seemed for once to be talking gravely and in earnest, with a degree of respectful deference towards his aged companion, which, in Matilda's estimation, did him honour. Eleanor continued to be hemmed in by a cordon of beaux, each of whom seemed to rival all the others in the brilliancy of his own sallies, and in the readiness of his laughter at hers. Not far off was a contrast to this noisy coterie. Sir Alfred Douglas had retired to a distant corner of the room, externally in a state of suspended animation, though an unconscious knitting of his brow seemed to indicate that his mind at the moment was not so inactive as his body. His eyes were half closed, and overshadowed by the dark cluster of his hair; his head was thrown back; his arms folded and his legs stretched out to their fullest extent, so that Matilda could have laughed to see how impregnably he had fortified himself against the possibility of being invaded by any one. Before long, however, she had reason to suspect that her estimate of fashionable intrepidity was too low, for Miss Charlotte Clifford evidently intended, by a daring enterprise, to carry the outworks; and she was amused to observe, when Sir Alfred first became aware of that young lady's approach, a momentary smile that glittered only in his eyes, and the sly humour with which he observed the proceedings of his unexpected assailant.

"What an enchanting day this was, Sir Alfred!" said she, dropping accidentally into a neighbouring chair.

"Indeed! I am glad it pleased you."

"Of course it did! We had a west wind and sunshine all day."

"Had we! Now, who noticed all that? You never could have observed so much yourself?"

"I am half dead, Sir Alfred, this morning, with the fatigue of riding to Gaelfield."

"I can't help it!"

"Was that a new britschka you came in this morning? What a variety of equipages, I am told, you have! Pray, tell me how many?"

"I shall have them counted some day, and let you know."

"Do you mean to hunt at Melton this year?"

"No! Do you?"

"Pshaw, Sir Alfred! what nonsense you talk!"

"Merely for the sake of contrast, that I may be as different as possible from you."

"Now that is quite polite and proper! I shall repeat what you have said to every person in the house; because civil speeches are not supposed to be your forte. How agreeable it always makes people when they go to the Continent!"

"You have never been there, I believe?"

"No! but I have a cousin-german at Paris. By the way, one's cousins-German should all come from Vienna or Dresden."

"Your geography is all astray, Miss Clifford! Did you never hear that Dresden is in China? I am sure you might know better, when we dine every day off Dresden China."

"So we do! How very strange that I——Apropos, you will be delighted to hear that Mr Grant, who can prove any two people that he pleases to be related, was shewing us this morning that you are actually a Scotch cousin of Eleanor's."

"How glad she must be! Miss Fitz-Patrick has something now to boast of."

"Yes! she will probably inscribe on her tombstone, 'Here lies the cousin of Sir Alfred Douglas.' Talking of that, did you admire Pere la Chaise?"

"I am not very apt to admire," answered he, turning a laughing eye towards Miss Charlotte herself; "'all seen,' as Lord Byron says, 'but nought admired.'"

Though the repartee of Sir Alfred often savours, as we think, more of flippant impertinence than polished wit, we allow that it is not easy to repress the attentions of the Miss Charlotte Cliffords of high life. Yet Sir Alfred's style is so bad that, were he not Miss Sinclair's favourite model of gentlemen, lovers, and M.P.'s., we should consider him an intolerable nuisance.

Now for a specimen of the table-talk and table-twaddle of the dinner party. With some blunders and difficulty, they get themselves arranged, and as much in heraldic order as possible.

Matilda found herself seated next to Sir Colin Fletcher. Opposite was Sir Alfred Douglas; but, as no attempt had been made on his part to approach her, she at once determined on encouraging the conviction of his indifference, and on preserving her own by the consciousness of his.

"No one will venture into this chair between us," observed Eleanor, who never took the head of her own table, and placed herself now within one of her cousin. "Your learned reputation has caused quite a panic among the gentlemen! only think, we have been laughing for an hour at the terror poor Colonel Pendarvis is in!"

Matilda was surprised at the audacity with which the heiress alluded to her own misrepresentations: but, though it did cost her an effort, she resolved to preserve her good-humour, and tried to change the subject immediately—

"Eleanor! if we enjoyed the privilege which ladies had formerly in France, of choosing what gentleman shall sit next to them at dinner, I wonder if we could agree whom to summon now."

"Mr Grant, of course," said that gentleman, inserting himself into the empty space. "Are not your utmost wishes anticipated?"

Both ladies smiled a gracious assent.

. . . .

"Now, Mr Grant, there is a laugh in your eye that tells me you are going to be satirical!—is it a droll remark or a dry observation?"

"Let me try the droll remark—hem!—what shall I say?—hem!—what a delightful day this was!"

"So I have been told a hundred and fifty times already. If that be meant for a sample of your powers, I shall turn to Lord Alderby on my other side. You shall be allowed five minutes to strike out something new."

"I do not require two seconds. Some people are obliged to search their minds for ideas; but mine rush out like a pack of hounds from the kennel every time my mouth opens. The only difficulty is to keep them back."

"Then pray be very original and amusing without a moment's delay."

"In your company that is not difficult."

"How! do you think me so easily pleased?"

"Quite the contrary!—my meaning is, that I need only take example from yourself."

"Now, that is the only tolerable thing you have said for a century. I perceive, Mr Grant, that your wit is a mere annual, which flourishes but once in a season. You probably live at the rate of an idea a-year. Be sure to set down that last good saying in your commonplace book for future use."

"Perhaps I never write one."

"Impossible! every human being does. Did you never hear Mrs Ramsbottom's advice, that we should all 'keep a dairy for the cream of what we see.' Why, even my maid Pauline, who has not three ideas, keeps her journal."

"What a literary gem it must be! I could form a tolerably correct guess of the subjects recorded therein—a list of her true lovers, followed by a catalogue of how many gowns Miss Fitz-Patrick ought to have left off wearing."

"Now, that is a severe hit at my old black velvet. How I detest mourning!—all my cousins and relations may depend on being regretted, if they oblige me to wear black. People should mourn in white, like the Chinese. One thing I have fully made up my mind about: if ever I am in a widow's bonnet, to wear some pink bows under it; for that is the most odious dress altogether that has ever been invented."

"So it is. How fortunate for me that I shall never live to behold my widow in full costume!"

"Not unless you are buried alive. But tell me what you think the most becoming of all dresses?"

"Black velvet."

"That is a proper amende to my respectable old gown. But now, seriously, Mr Grant, and upon your veracity, what do you think?"

"I never was half so serious upon any subject before, as in declaring that every lady might be a beauty, in my estimation, if she would wear black velvet and diamonds. I give you no credit whatever for looking well in them Lady Susan herself would be quite young and handsome in such an equipment; but shew me the beauty who would be tolerable in a Quaker's cap?"

"I shall wear one to-morrow."

"But then, perhaps, I may give out that your cap is set at me."

"No one would believe it; however, for your comfort, Miss Murray certainly intends to do so. She has been watching us all dinner-time; what a dear old dot she is!"

"Truly excellent indeed," replied Mr Grant, with sudden gravity. "I do not know her equal in the world. Miss Murray, will you do me the honour to drink wine? How I wish we were all like her!"

"What a dull respectable world it would be!—why, the very art of laughing would be lost, and that is the only faculty we possess which animals do not."

"Philosophers have discovered now, that laughter is always at the expense of others, and, therefore, it must be a very unamiable propensity. I never have a good opinion of people who indulge in it much."

"Then take the consequences, Mr Grant; for I shall not do more than smile at your next bon mot, if it be ever so good."

"That would be exceedingly ungrateful; for I have laughed heartily at many of yours, when they were none of the best. But, Miss Fitz-Patrick, you are not properly sensible of half your obligations to me. It was only yesterday that I wore out an entire set of intellects in trying to understand some of the worst puns you perpetrated."

"Did I ever degrade myself to punning?—impossible!—your bill is protested."

"Well, then, I danced last year with two plain, elderly misses at your own ball, to make it go off well."

"Ah, that is worth mentioning!—it is a tolerable cheval de bataille, so let it stand. I begin to blame myself for not having sufficiently appreciated your merits."

"Besides, I spoilt a good ear for music this morning by listening to your attempts on the flageolet."

"You are running up a perfect national debt against me. How flagrantly ungrateful I have been!"

Matilda, thrown entirely out of the conversation by her brilliant cousin, is astonished to see Dr Murray also, with all his wisdom, knowledge, and eloquence, acting the part of Dummy in this gay society. At a certain stage of the dinner—

Eleanor, with that laudable ambition which she often testified, to raise her dogs on a level with herself, sent for a second supply of soup, which she gave to Blanco; while Lady Susan, not to be outdone, soon afterwards minced down carefully, for Tiny, a slice of Turkey which Sir Richard sent for her own consumption. The dogs being hungry, "licked the platter clean," and a footman, in haste, put Tiny's plate on the sideboard, from whence Martin, without becoming aware of any previous destination, transferred it to Lord Alderby. Matilda, being the only person who observed this oversight, made a hasty signal for the objectionable plate to be changed; but she coloured with confusion to observe the astonishment of his Lordship at her unaccountable interference, which it was impossible to explain, and she could not but think afterwards that those ladies who blame a Roman Emperor for promoting his horse above human nature, should look at home.

It is an equal chance, we imagine, that this lick-trencher anecdote is from the life.

The dinner proceeds with great spirit. We know not whether we are most diverted by the hospitable bustle of the rather ostentatious Scottish host, or the cross-fire of Sir Colin Fletcher, and the unhappy Miss Charlotte Clifford's indefatigable, and oft frustrated attempts to edge in her valuable meteorological observation sideways or anyways. Matilda, baffled in her endeavours to be sociable, and to contribute her mite to the conversation, was trying

To cover her defeat by a spirited attempt at engaging Sir Richard in conversation, though he was so engrossed with his public duties, as host, that her success became laughably deficient. Of all the forlorn hopes that any one can volunteer upon, none is more desperate than that of monopolizing much attention from a hospitable country gentleman presiding at his own table, of which Matilda now saw an amusing exemplification.

"This was a charming day!" said Miss Charlotte, who seemed never to tire of praising it.

"Lady Susan Danvers! will you take wine?—port or sherry? Sir Colin calls this vin cheri, it is so excellent! Were you speaking to me, Miss Clifford?"

"This was a"——

"Douglas! try that salmon; it was in the river three hours ago! Alderby! send Lady Montague a paté. Pardon me, Miss Clifford; I am all attention!"

"This was a char"——

"Dr Murray! as Mathews says, 'you are not a soup-or-fishial man,' I perceive. A disciple of Jephson's evidently. Well! it is what we must all come to, sooner or later. I would rather not live at all than live on a rule-of-three diet. De Mainbury! try that vol-au-vent. Made on a Leamington prescription, you may depend upon it. Were you remarking anything, Miss Clifford?"

"I merely said"——

"Fletcher! that Madeira has been forty years in bottle! Excuse me, Miss Clifford!"

"My observation was very insignificant; merely that"——

"Lady Montague! pray call for a screen! you don't stand fire well!"

Matilda's countenance had been gradually kindling with animation as she watched the fate of Miss Charlotte's valuable remark, which was destined never to struggle into existence at all. She now hastily averted her eyes, to conceal a smile which irresistibly forced itself on her countenance, and, in turning another way, she unexpectedly received a look from Sir Alfred, so full of archness and humour, that she was completely taken by surprise.

This is, we consider, sprightly and entertaining, and we are sure it is exceedingly natural—the very scene and language. We must still consider Miss Sinclair much less happy in her accomplished gentleman, the peerless Sir Alfred. Sometimes we have him as a solemn coxcomb—in what follows, he verges upon the puppy, fancying himself privileged to assume the superior airs of an eligible with a good rent-roll; against whom mothers and daughters are vainly plotting by night and day.

Sir Alfred placed himself near the pianoforte, where it might be imagined he was listening to the music, as no other ostensible object appeared in his sitting beside Matilda. Not a word passed upon either side, and at length Eleanor came up to him, exclaiming, in a remonstrating voice—

"Sir Alfred, you really ought to do a little popularity amongst us, since you are canvassing the neighbourhood. A dance now would be excellent practice for the election-ball, where every fat farmer's cherry-cheeked daughter will expect a quadrille."

"I would rather, at this moment, relinquish my seat in Parliament than my seat here."

"I wonder what your valet thinks, Sir Alfred, when you return from parties, night after night, without having worn out any shoes with dancing! He must fancy that you have been dreadfully at a loss for partners?"

"So I am! and, therefore, I never presume to ask one!"

"But did I not hear Charlotte Clifford say, some minutes ago, when Sir Colin asked her to dance, that she was very much afraid a previous engagement to you would interfere?"

"Let Miss Clifford plead any engagement she please provided I am never asked to fulfil it. Nothing on this side of Circassia would tempt me from my quiet corner."

"I wish we had the enchanted horn which forced people to dance while it was played upon, and then you should not be allowed to sit down for a year. Charlotte would be delighted to perform also for as long a time; and you have no idea how charmingly she galopes—one might suppose she was blown along the floor by a gale of wind."

"How enchanting! If your friend is really such a superlative performer, perhaps she will favour us with a specimen now. Pray ask her to exhibit a few steps here!"

"Well, Sir Alfred, since you are inexorable to Charlotte, perhaps I might be prevailed on to dance with you myself."

"It is very plain why you propose that, Miss Fitz-Patrick, because all the world would immediately exclaim, 'There is the handsomest couple in the world!' but I cannot countenance such inordinate vanity."

"It is more a matter of curiosity, to ascertain how I should feel in dancing, for once, with an unwilling partner."

"You would be as much uplifted by the honour as Abou Hassan during his one day of being a caliph; but, seriously, Miss Fitz-Patrick, I have got what is called in this country a sitting-down-cold, and I was, besides, given over by the doctors yesterday with a sprained ancle. Pray let me settle here quietly—for life."

Eleanor gave a conscious look, and a blush, at these inadvertent words of Sir Alfred, to which Matilda perceived that she attributed as much meaning as they could carry, while she jestingly replied—

"Then I must make away with myself, since you give me no hope, for I am like time and tide, which wait for nobody; and once lost can never be recalled.—Going! going! gone!"

Sir Alfred looked much relieved at the departure of his lively persecutor, and re-established himself in his retreat near the piano, where Matilda observed the inward diversion with which he seemed to watch some daring manœuvres of Mrs Clifford to provide her daughters with partners for a quadrille which was about to be formed.

Where Miss Sinclair, in the conversations of Dr Murray, does introduce sacred subjects—the most sacred of all—and we are not sure that we ever care to meet with such within the same boards with clever pictures of fashionable manness, or of dissipated or heartless worldly characters—she manages to avoid everything approaching the hackneyed phraseology of that bold and presumptuous portion of the religious public whom Coleridge christens the Slangi. Nay, more; she checks and rebukes this audacious spirit. "I shall never," says Sir Alfred upon one occasion—

"Be slow to acknowledge opinions and principles, where it seems right to do so, for they are my highest honour; but, in proportion to my reverence for holy things, is my apprehension of hearing them hackneyed in ordinary conversation, as a subject for mawkish sentiment or idle gossip."

"I quite agree with you, Sir Alfred, in disliking a superficial interchange of unfelt truths, and all that mere jargon which people sometimes talk in society now; but yet it appears to me a matter of duty openly to acknowledge such convictions as are inwardly felt, that we may not seem ashamed of them."

* * * * * *

"It is certainly singular what a general familiarity prevails in every company with the doctrines and feelings of religion. You never encounter any one in society now who is not able and willing to discuss that subject in an interesting manner; and, though there are not many to whom it is the first object in life, scarcely an individual I ever converse with does not make it the second, to be promoted at some future time to its proper place."

"There is pain in associating with those who are entirely ignorant of religion, but still more in hearing those who know their Master's will, and evidently do it not. I have seen your cousin talk like a bishop to Dr Murray when the whim takes her, and if it were understood that the subject is one of more than common interest for me, even my friend Miss Charlotte Clifford might get up a few suitable questions and remarks."

Miss Sinclair has, moreover, shrewd notions upon various other matters of pretension and flummery. Here is a sketch of fashionable boarding-school studies—of a school where the young ladies were obliged to bring their books to table:—

"I know of several excellent boarding-schools for young ladies, where that is actually insisted on," observed Lady Montague. "My daughter, Maria, at Elysium House, was always obliged to learn her Italian exercise while she breakfasted, and her Euclid during the intervals of dinner. The girls walked out in pairs, one guiding her companion along the path, while the other read aloud from the best works on science and natural history; besides which, the French governess repeated verses to them all the time they dressed. Nothing could be more admirable than the whole system, and I only lamented being obliged to take my daughter away, on account of that long unaccountable illness she had, which has never entirely left her. It is, I must say, a great mortification to me that, with so many accomplishments, she can scarcely leave her sofa, and that, with a perfect knowledge of every language in Europe, she has hardly strength to speak even in English."

"The Manchester cotton-weavers, with their sixteen hours of labour a-day, are nothing to this," cried Mr Grant, laughing. "When I get into Parliament, my first exploit shall be to present a petition from the distressed young ladies of Great Britain, praying to be relieved from excessive taxation on their health, their spirits, their time, and their understandings."

A quiet stroke of satire closes the system of modern tuition, where we leave Miss Marabout, the treacherous toady of the discomfited heiress, with another female preceptor—

Having each obtained the most satisfactory testimonials from a variety of distinguished families, to whom references can be given. Both profess to teach all the usual branches of education, music, drawing, and languages, besides every kind of useless or useful knowledge, and also, as Miss Marabout expresses herself—

"PRINCIPLES OF COURSE."

How the heiress is checked in the career of vanity, selfishness, and worldly ambition, purified in the furnace, and restored to sober-minded happiness, and how the fair fortunes of Matilda bourgeon and blossom, while she extends to the repentant Eleanor the most tender and generous forgiveness, we shall now leave to the leisure of the reader, believing that our random specimens may stimulate his search, though they can scarcely direct it.

NEW LIGHTS THROWN, BY M. VON RAUMER, ON THE PRIVATE AND PERSONAL HISTORY OF QUEEN ELIZABETH AND MARY QUEEN OF SCOTS.

If the above be not the exact title of M. Von Raumer's "Contributions to Modern History," it accurately describes the portion of the volume which we have felt of the highest interest, and which we, therefore, propose to introduce to our readers.

M. Von Raumer, in his careful gleanings from the State Paper Office and the collections in the British Museum, has given his readers only the cream or quintessence of his researches; and, for his judicious omissions, he renders the most satisfactory reasons. A few persons might have dug through the load of rubbish with which the rich material is overlaid; but his work, which must have consisted of many volumes, would have remained a sealed book to the multitudes of modern readers; instead of which, in its present state it is full of interest and entertainment. These curiosities of history and literature are thrown into the form of letters, which are addressed to Tieck.

What an unhappy life was that of Mary Stuart The short period which, to the superficial observer, appears the most brilliant and enviable era of her existence, is, on closer inspection, found to have been fraught with anxiety and misery. Her happiest years, after the period of thoughtless childhood—if Mary, in her conventual seclusion in France, ever tasted the careless happiness of childhood—must have been spent in prison, when, abandoning hope, resignation came, at last, in the place of despair. The main cause of all her crimes and all her wo, may have been, that, with violent passions and a bad education, her heart never once found a resting-place; that she never found one deserving her confidence, in whom she could safely trust. All princes are unfortunate in the circumstances of their early life; but she was the most unhappy of all.

We must premise that Raumer has a strong prepossession in favour of Elizabeth; because, as we think, he looks more steadily to the public consequences of actions, than to their motives and impulses originating in character and situation. The education of the rival Queens, he considers to have had an essential influence on the fortunes of their after life; and it is certain that the early prudence, masterly self-possession, and craft of Elizabeth, acquired in the severe school of adversity, outweighed the more shallow perfidy of the weak, violent, and fascinating Mary. The first notices of this unhappy Princess that are found in the volume, are those sent by Randolph, the English ambassador, to his court, upon the young Queen's arrival from France. She reached Edinburgh in August 1561. In September of that year, we find her embroiled with Knox and his adherents, whom she had vainly imagined her queenly wishes and womanly blandishments were to win over, and, if not completely to alienate from the great cause of the Reformation, at least to soften towards her religion and to the Catholics. Randolph confirms all that has been said of the wonderful energy and influence of Knox:—

"I assure you the voice of one man is able, in one hour, to put more life in us than five hundred trumpets continually blustering in our ears Mr Knox spoke last Thursday to the Queen: he knocked so heartily upon her heart, that he made her weep;—for that will do as well for anger as for grief. She charged him with his book, with his severe dealing with all men that disagree with him in his opinions. She willed him to use more meekness in his sermons. Some things he spoke to her satisfaction in mitigating the rigours of his book; and in some things he pleased her very little, in special speaking against the mass. It was presented her (at a feast) a boy of six years; he came, as it were, from heaven, out of a globe, which offered her a bible, psalter, and the key of the gates. They had pageants to represent the horrible judgments of God upon idolatry; they had the burning of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram; they designed to have a priest burnt at the elevation: Huntly hindered that pageant."

"Sunday, the 8th of September, the Earl of Argyle and Lord James (Mary's half brother) so disturbed the Queen during mass, that some priests and others left their places with broken heads and bloody ears. This was a sport for some, while others shed tears for that matter. It is suspected that Lord James seeked to mind his own advancement; but as yet he has had but little from the Queen."

The influence and feelings of Mary received a still severer blow by the proclamation of Archibald Douglas, the provost, and the magistrates of Edinburgh, which commanded all monks, priests, and papists, to leave the city on pain of death. . . . . .

"It seemeth wonder that the whole state of this realm should be altered by one head or two, by one woman, and some men of whose excellent wisdom there was never yet either great opinion or fame."

The young Queen had yet been but three short weeks in Scotland, and, before three months were elapsed, it became a question "whether the Queen, being an idolatress, may be obeyed in all civil and political actions. I think marvel of the wisdom of God that gave this unruly, stout, and cumbersome people no more substance or power than they have; for then they would run wild."

Mary almost immediately placed strong hopes in Elizabeth for support against her turbulent subjects. For Elizabeth, her relation and protectress, and the powerful English Queen, she accordingly affected the warmest gratitude and regard. In the second year of her residence in her native kingdom, it was Mary's fortune to be called upon to punish her evil genius, the detestable and infamous Bothwell.

The romantic tale of Chastellet, the romantic lover of the beautiful Queen, which has so often furnished a theme to poets and a subject t painters, is here stripped of much of its romance. The extreme freedom, if not levity of her manners, had created the most injurious suspicions of her character, and encouraged the audacity of those around her. Yet, her gaiety and love of splendour and amusement, were perfectly consistent with the innocence and purity of a young mind, chafed and disappointed in every dearer interest.

"She devotes every morning," says the French ambassador, Foys, "to the chase, and every evening to balls and masquerades, which greatly offends the Puritans."

"Since the beginning of this Queen's sorrows," writes Randolph, on the 1st of April 1563, to Cecil, "she has taken pleasure to ride up and down, a hawking and hunting daily, from place to place. She renewed unto me all her griefs and great adventures that had fallen unto her since the death of her husband, and how she was now destitute of all friendship. Wherefore I should not wonder to see her at so extreme points of sorrow, as she was, whereunto it was not possible for her to put an end."

When Randolph, however, brought her a letter from Elizabeth, at which she was greatly rejoiced and comforted, she said, "God will not leave me destitute; I have received the best letter of my good sister of England that ever I had; and I do assure you it comforted me much.

"The Queen," writes Randolph, on the 13th of June, "gave me audience in bed; she keeped her bed that day, rather for her ease than for any grief she found in her body." Perhaps, however, she needed rest after nocturnal entertainments; of one of which Randolph says—"The banquet continued with joy and mirth, marvellous sights and great show, and singular devices; nothing left undone that might either fill the bellies, feed the eyes, or content the mind." Many were offended at Mary and her ladies sometimes appearing at such entertainments in male attire; and the following report of Randolph to Elizabeth, of the 5th of February 1565, will shew better than those detatched remarks, the lights and shadows of Mary's way of life.

The Queen had gone with a few attendants to St. Andrew's, and lived very merrily in a citizen's house. Randolph delivered to her a letter from Elizabeth, to which she gave no answer, except that he should dine and sup with her every day. After this had continued for three days, and the Queen did not begin to speak of matters of business, Randolph thought it his duty to mention them. She answered, "I see now well that you are weary of this company and treatment. I wish for you to be merry, and to see how like a bourgeois wife I live with my little troop. And you will interrupt the pastimes with your great and grave matters. I pray you, sir, if you be weary here, return home to Edinburgh, and keep your gravity and great embassade until the Queen come thither, for I assure you, you shall not see her here, nor I know not myself where she is become. You see neither cloth of state, nor such appearances that you may think there is a Queen here; nor I would not that you should think that I am she at St. Andrew's that I was at Edinburgh.

This was Mary's mode of life; and such were her natural tastes—which she freely indulged, without remembering that constraint and the rigid observance of etiquette, are part of the high price Princes pay for authority.

Chastellet was in the suite of the French ambassador. Randolph, whom the affair disturbed exceedingly, gives two editions of the attempt which cost this man his life. The last is, probably, the most accurate:—

"Chastellet was found under her bed with his sword beside him, and his dagger about him, (the day before Mary's departure from Edinburgh,) the Queen being ready to go into her bed. Whereof the Queen, not being made privy that night, and in the morning being advertised, she commanded him out of her presence. He, notwithstanding, followed her to Dumfermline, and either by some words or token, finding, as he thought, her wrath appeased, took new courage upon him; and at her coming unto Burnte Island, the Queen being in her chamber, no man in her company, only certain gentlewomen about her, he cometh in alone, and desired that he might purge himself of that crime that he was charged with, that he was found under her bed; but said, that, being in the Queen's chamber late at night, and finding himself heavy for want of sleep, got him into the next place that was at hand. Yet was he convicted by sufficient witnesses, that he (was) not found there, but under the bed. This being proved against him, he was committed to ward; the next day sent unto St. Andrew's, and, within five or six days after, his head cut off in the open market place. He died with repentance; he confessed privately more than he spoke openly. His purpose was, that night that he was found under her bed, to have tried her constance (?), and by force to have attempted that which by no preservation (?) he could attain unto; whereof ensued to him the worthy reward of so rash an enterprise of so unworthy a creature, even to have thought to come by that, which she herself, I believe, judgeth very few men in the world worthy of. The Queen herself had taken some grief of mind for that matter. She begins now to be merry again; I doubt not but this sorrow will pass, and the wonder thereof within few days be outblown."

We cannot see why Raumer should blame Mary for harshness and cruelty in delivering this presumptuous man to the executioner, in his text, while, immediately below, he adds, in a note, that Murray and the other counsellors insisted upon his death. Several incidental notices of Bothwell occur almost about the same time that Darnley arrived from England:—

"We hear that the Earl of Bothwell is at liberty, as it is said, upon his faith. I think it the best way to make him a very stark-naked naughty beggar. His substance is consumed for more than twenty days since, saving a Portugal piece, which he received for a token out of the north, from a gentlewoman, that, if ever she be a widow should never be my wife."

. . . . . .

"The Queen mislikes Bothwell's coming home without license. She has already sent a serjeant-of-arms to summon him to undergo the law, which if he refuses to do, he shall be pronounced a rebel. It is intended in this manner to drive him out of the country, and I have been requested to write to England, that he may not be received there. Bothwell is charged by Murray to have spoken divers dishonourable words against the Queen, and threatened Murray and Lethington that he would be the death of them both."

And this was the reckless profligate and bold villain who made this unhappy woman's fate.

The conduct of the popular leaders at this period must have been intolerable to the Queen, who could not, at all times, dissemble her indignation. Mary soon lost the good graces of the English ambassador, who had, at first, judged of her with indulgence. As a zealous Protestant, an English statesman, and a servant of Elizabeth, the Scottish Queen daily made herself more and more obnoxious to him; and from the time that she resolved upon a marriage so displeasing to his royal mistress, his complaints rise to denunciations. Every symptom portended violent change; but we should imagine that a part of the intelligence which Randolph sent to his court, was coloured by the medium through which it reached him.

"There is a very great lack of governing in the rulers, and great disobedience in the subjects. Contrary to the Queen's ordinance, more repair daily to mass to her chapel, than cometh to a sermon. One Muffet, feigning himself mad, entered the Queen's chapel, drew his sword, overthrew the chalices, candlesticks, and cross, sent off the priest, &c. At this the Queen is angry, and many are glad." Intrigues and parties increase at court, especially since the appearance of Darnley. "They are all sorry that such a guest is come among them, to make their ruler (to play the master.) One showed a map of Scotland to Darnley, and the possessions of Murray. He said it was too much. Of this speech the Queen willed him to excuse himself to Murray."

"All things now grow too libertine, and the Queen taketh upon her to do what she pleases. She would have a liberty for all men to go where they list. She thinks it too great a subjection, as a prince in her own country, to have her will broke. The subjects desire to live in their own fear and worship of God—offer their lives again, rather, to be sacrificed. This kindles in her a desire of revenge, and breeds in others a liberty to speak, and a will to attempt by force, what by others means they cannot get reformed."

"A schoolmaster at Haddington made a play, to exercise his scholars against the ministers, and baptized a cat. One of the Queen's chapel, a singing man, said he believed as well of Robin Hood as anything in the Bible. Her own mass, and the resorting to it, such blasphemies as these unpunished, her will to continue Popery, her wish to let all men live as they list, have offended the godly. Besides, there are many who desire alteration, all which occasions continual fear that these matters will shortly break out to some great mischief. These frequent debates and controversies between her and her nobles, must needs occasion malcontents, and, some time or other, must break out. When she marries a Papist, this will fortify her in her measures. A marriage with Leicester, who is a Protestant, may easily convert her, or at least make her more moderate.

"The Queen's affection to Darnley is at present known. They are sorry that he is come; they say of Darnley, that in wisdom he does not much differ from his father. The honourable treatment he has here makes him think no little of himself. Some persuade him that he is so loved by many of this nation, that they think him a fit match for the Queen. This may make a great impression on a young man who is still at court, and well received by those who are nearest to her. This may induce him to attempt this matter."

"She has already so good a liking of him, that she can be content to forsake all other offers, and give up all suitors, and content herself with her own choice. She attended Darnley in an illness" (Report of 29th of April) "with marvellous great and tender care. Such talks and bruits spread abroad for her doing, that it is wonder to hear what discontent there is presently amongst her people. I speak not now of the common sort, of whom I thought least, but of those of best judgment, and the wisest in this realm; and in one word to say it, nothing in her government is liked.

"Your lordship shall know, that greater reviving there was never in any time of mass Popery, than was this Easter at the Resurrection, and at her high mass. Organs was wont to be the common music; she wanted now neither trumpet, drum, nor fife, bagpipe, nor sakers. Upon the Monday, she and divers of her women apparelled themselves like bourgeois' wives, and went upon their feet up and down the town. Of every man they met they took a pledge or a piece of money towards the banquet; and in the same lodging where I am accustomed to lodge, there was the dinner prepared, and great cheer made, at which she was herself, with the great wonder and gaping of men, women, and children."

This masquerading of the Queen and her ladies, and taking money, is, after all, very like the humours of our decorous modern Fancy Fairs.

Randolph became more severe in his language as the marriage proceeded; and at last wrote that "she was now almost in utter contempt of her people;" but his heart relented and melted to her subsequent misery, arising from that ill-starred and most unhappy marriage. The character of Darnley left no room for doubt of the speedy consequences of this alliance; even before it took place, Randolph clearly foretold and bewailed her fate.

"I hear that in words he is a fool; by some deeds, also, to her, shewed what his will is, if his power be equal to his furious passions. I will only speak of this, when with his dagger he would have stricken the justice-clerk that brought him word, that the creation of his being a duke was deferred for a time."

"I know not," writes Randolph, on the same day, "in what sort to utter unto your lordship so much as I conceive of the pitiful and lamentable estate of this poor Queen, whom ever before I esteemed so worthy, so wise, so honourable in all her doing; and at this present do find so altered with affection towards Darnley, that she has brought her honour in question, her estate in hazard, her country to be torn in pieces.

"This Queen in her love is so transported, and he in his behaviour grown to be so proud, that to all honest men he is intolerable, and almost forgetful of his duty to her already, that hath adventured so much for his sake. What shall come of her, or what life with him she shall lead, that already takes so much upon him as to control and command her, I leave it to others to think. What shall be judged of him, that for bringing of a message from the Queen, that was to his discontentment, would with his dagger have slain the messenger? So little he yielded to her desire; so bold he was at the first with one of her counsellors; yea, with him that most favoured his cause, and was the chief worker of that what passed between them. These things, my lord, do move me much to lament her case; this it is that may move any man to pity that ever saw her, that ever loved her; but most of all, I am sorry to see so good opportunity, so great likelihood to unite these two realms together, to be omitted, to the great disadvantage, to the great hurt and hindrance of Christ's true religion, and undoing a great number of godly men.

"Your lordship now sees our hard case; her poor estate, blinded, transported, carried I know not whither, or which way, to her own confusion, and destruction of her country, for the love of him that ever I judged the most unworthy to be matched to such a one, as I have known her and seen her to be."

To Leicester, who had raised his hopes to the alliance of the Queen of Scots, Randolph was yet more explicit. What a picture of a headstrong imbecile ruffian, and a passionate woman, tortured by a misplaced and degrading attachment!

"So great tokens of love pass daily between Mary and Darnley as ever did before. Within her has wrought so strange an effect, that shame is laid aside, and all regard to that what chiefly pertains to princely honour removed out of sight. Her counsellors are those whom she likes worst. The nearest of her kin, the farthest from her heart. My Lord Murray liveth where he lists. My Lord Lethington hath now both leave and time enough to pay the court unto his fair mistress. Such good favour hath he won through his long travail and late favour that he found amongst you. David [Rizzio] is he that now worketh as chief secretary to the Queen, and only governor to her good man. The bruits here are wonderful; men's talk very strange; the hate towards him and his house marvellous great; his pride intolerable; his words not to be borne, but where no man dare speak again. He spares not, also, in token of his manhood, to let some blows fly, when he knows they will be taken. Such passions, such furies, as I hear say that sometimes he will be in, is strange to believe. What cause this people have to rejoice of this their worthy prince, I leave it to the world to think. When they have said all, and thought what they can, they find nothing, but that God must send him a short end, or themselves a miserable life, under such an estate and government as this is like to be.

"I am sorry that I have lost my good hope, but most of all that your lordship has foreslowed (missed) so good a fortune, where I am assured your life had been happy, and should have here found wherewith to have contented you, if it had been taken in time. This Queen is now so much altered from what lately she was known to be, that they who now behold her, doth not think her to be the same. Her majesty is laid aside; her wits not such as they were; her beauty other than it was; her cheer and countenance changed—I wot not into what. A woman more to be pitied than any that ever I saw—such one now as neither her own regardeth, nor she taked count of any that is virtuous or good. How loth I am thus to write, or what grief I have thus to think, your lordship may well conceive of whom so many times, and for my chief delight hath been always to set forth her worthy praise, equal to any that ever I saw; she only excepted whom I am most bound in duty to honour and serve.

"The saying is this, that surely she is bewitched. The parties, the persons are named to be the doers, the tokens, the rings, the bracelets, are found and daily worn, that retain the sacred mysteries.

"Darnley's behaviour is such that he is now contemned of all men, even by those who were his chief friends. What shall become of him I know not; but it is greatly to be feared that he can have no long life among this people. The Queen herself being of better understanding, seeks to frame and fashion him to the temper of her subjects. No persuasion can change that what custom has made natural to him. He is reckoned proud, disdainful, and suspicious; which kind of men this soil, of any other, can worse bear. Towards the Queen herself I saw never men's minds so greatly altered; you may say almost to utter contempt of her behaviour; without the fear of God, princely majesty, or care that she ought to have about her subjects and country."

Such were the days of Mary's inauspicious courtship; and it was part and parcel of her nature, as a Stuart, to be but the more resolutely determined upon following her own will, in proportion as the opposition of duty and reason became powerful. The Catholics, as well as the Protestants, now condemned her infatuated passion. Attention has been too exclusively fixed upon the revolting crimes of Mary, without taking into consideration the palliatives of her lesser offences. No shadow of palliation can be offered for guilt so deep and complicated as hers became. The marriage took place.

"All honour that may be attributed unto any man by a wife, he hath it wholly and fully. All praise that may be spoken of (him) he lacketh not from herself. All dignities that she can endue him with, are already given and granted. No man pleaseth her that contenteth not him; and (I say more) she hath given unto him her whole will to be ruled and guided as himself best liketh. She cannot as much prevail with him in anything that is against his will."

Thus early was the unhappy Queen

Spited with a fool—
Spited and angered worse.

The honeymoon, if Queens ever know honeymoons, was not over when Randolph wrote of the quarrels of the royal pair—one cause of contention being, that Darnley would have his father Lieutenant-general of the kingdom, while she was for Bothwell. Their quarrels soon became open.

The place of Randolph, whom the Queen had forbidden to appear at court, as she believed him a spy and an enemy, was now assumed by Drury, who wrote to Cecil:—

"The people say that Darnley is too much addicted to drinking. It is certainly reported there was some jar between the Queen and him, at a mert's (merchant's) house at Edinburgh, she only dissuading him from drinking, and enticing others; in both which he proceeded, and gave her such words, that she left the place with tears, which they that are known to those proceedings, say is not strange to be seen.

"These jars arise, among other things, from his seeking the matrimonial crown, which she will not yield unto. Darnley is in great mislike with the Queen; she is very weary of him, and, as some judge, will be more so ere long. As true it is, that those who depend wholly upon him are not liked of her, nor they that follow her of him, as David [Rizzio] and others."

The savage murder of Rizzio took place in the eighth month of the Queen's marriage. The new lights that M. Von Raumer has cast upon this savage butchery are drawn from the correspondence of Foy, the French ambassador; but there is no fresh fact of any importance. The letters to Queen Elizabeth dwell upon two causes for the murder:—

"The first [cause] that the King, a few days before, about an hour after midnight, knocked at the door of the Queen's chamber, but received no answer. Hereupon he called out aloud and begged Mary to open the door, but in vain. At last he threatened to break it open; and found the Queen, when she let him in, quite alone in her room; but, looking about, he found Rizzio in a closet, who had thrown a morning gown over him, having nothing else on but his shirt. This is the chief cause of the murder. The second was, that Mary positively refused to have her husband crowned as king, and declined to comply with almost every request that he made her. He took it into his head that this was all done by the advice of Rizzio; and the earls and noblemen had similar grounds of hatred, for reasons relating to themselves."

After Rizzio had been dragged from the presence of the Queen, she seems to have remained unconscious of his murder: the report to the English Privy Council states that—

"There remained a long time with the Queen, her husband and Lord Ruthven. She made, as we hear, great intercession that he should have no harm. She blamed greatly her husband that was the author of so foul an act. It is said that he did answer that David had more company of her body than he for the space of two months, and, therefore, for her honour and his own contentment, he gave his consent that he should be taken away. 'It is not,' said she, 'the woman's part to seek her husband, and therefore that the fault was his own.' He said, that when he came, she either would not see him, or made herself sick. 'Well,' said she, 'you have taken your leave of me, and your farewell!' 'That were a pity,' said Lord Ruthven; 'he is your majesty's husband, and you must yield to one another!' 'Why may not I,' said she, 'leave him as well as your wife left her husband?—others have done the like.' Ruthven said that she was lawfully divorced from her husband, and for such cause as the King found himself grieved; besides, this man was mean, base—an enemy to the nobility, a shame to her, and dishonour to her country. 'Well,' said she, 'it shall be dear blood to some of you if his be spilt.' 'God forbid,' said Lord Ruthven, 'for the more your grace show yourself offended, the world will judge the worse.' Her husband this time speaked little, her grace continually weeped—the Lord Ruthven being ill at ease and weak, call'd for a drink, and said, 'I must do this with your majesty's pardon;' and persuaded her, in the best sort he could, that she would pacify herself; nothing that could be said could please her. In this mean time, there arose a tumult in the court, to pacify which, there went down Lord Ruthven, who went straight to the Earls Huntley, Bothwell, and Athol, to quiet them, and to assure them, from the King, that nothing was intended against them. They, notwithstanding, taking fear, when they heard Lord Murray would be there next day, and Argyle meet them; Huntley and Bothwell got out of a window, and so departed."

M. Von Raumer indulges in a strain and style of philosophical commentary upon these and some other dark passages of Scottish history, which we apprehend is anything but fitted to British tastes. Where conjecture will at all bear him out, he does not hesitate to put the worst and the foulest construction upon some things which history has left in obscurity, and which may very safely be so left. The criminality of Mary is sufficiently established without seeking to load her memory—very much at random, as we think—with mysterious, rank, and foul offences, for which there seems no tenable ground whatever. Mary was capable of great crimes; but she was not a monster.

The murder of Darnley on the 10th of February, the abduction of the Queen by Bothwell in April, their infamous marriage early in May after the fraudulent divorce, and Mary's final abasement and captivity in June, follow like the acts of some dark and sanguinary tragedy; the guilty marriage being not the least memorable scene. The English ambassador, and most of the foreign ambassadors, had left Edinburgh upon the murder of Darnley; and even the French minister Croc declined being present at the ominous nuptials of Mary and Bothwell. Shortly afterwards, Croc wrote to Queen Catherine de Medicis.

"The marriage is too unhappy, and begins already to be repented of. On Thursday the Queen sent for me, when I perceived something strange in the mutual behaviour of her and her husband. She attempted to excuse it, and said, 'If you see me melancholy, it is because I do not choose to be cheerful; because I never will be so, and wish for nothing but death.' Yesterday, when they were both in a room with the Earl of Dommelle (d'Aumale,) she called aloud for a knife to kill herself; the persons in the antechamber heard it. I believe that, if God does not support her, she will fall entirely into despair. On three occasions, when I have seen her, I have given her advice, and consoled her as well as I was able. Her husband will not be able to continue here long, for he is too much hated in the kingdom, and the people will always be convinced that the death of the King was his work."

The confederacies of the nobility against him soon grew so powerful that Croc reports: "On the following day, the 5th of June, at ten o'clock in the evening, the Queen secretly disguised herself in male attire, and took the road from Borthwick to Dunbar, where she arrived at three o'clock in the morning, having sat the whole way on an ordinary saddle, and met the Duke on the road. The danger increasing, they were soon obliged to leave that castle, and suddenly saw herself in front of the army of the nobles. At last, (continues Croc,) it was thought fit to send Baron Lamington and M. de Tresbrouin with a declaration, that the Duke, in order to prevent bloodshed, was ready to engage in single combat, for which Baron Tullibardine also offered himself. Bothwell showed much alacrity, and began to arm; but the Queen being informed of the circumstances, would by no means allow her husband to fight with one of inferior rank, who was, besides, a traitor. On this the friends and relations of Bothwell were of opinion, that, if an earl or nobleman of high rank offered to accept the combat with him, he and every one ought to ask the Queen's permission. This declaration being communicated to the enemy, Lord Lindsay resolved to undertake the combat. Hereupon he laid aside his armour, took some refreshment; then, in the presence of the whole army, fell on his knees, and prayed that God might in his mercy protect the innocent, and punish, according to his justice, the guilty murderer of the King."

The Queen, however, still refused her consent to the combat, and for this and other reasons, it did not take place. "But," says Croc, "as the enemies were very superior in number, Bothwell became greatly alarmed, and at last asked the Queen whether she would keep the promise of fidelity which she had made to him. She answered, 'Yes,' and gave him her hand upon it. He then mounted his horse, and fled with a few attendants. The Queen was conducted to Lislesburgh (Edinburgh?) where she arrived at ten o'clock in the evening. On the way she reproached Lord Lindsay in the bitterest terms for his great fury, referring to the past and to the present, to which he was not able to give a ready answer. Though the Queen had taken no nourishment for four-and-twenty hours, she refused to take any refreshment, and retired to her chamber, after she had upbraided the Earls of Athol and Morton in harsh terms. On the following morning she found that she was watched like a prisoner, so that none of her servants had access to her. In the night, she went to one of the windows of her chamber and called for help, and on the following day she did the same before all the people, till the lords were informed of it, and endeavoured to pacify her by friendly language."

In another report, Croc says, "I expected that the Queen would endeavour to appease her enemies, and to gain them by gentleness; but, on the contrary, on her arrival in Edinburgh, she spoke of nothing but of having them all hanged and crucified, and still continues in the same manner, which provokes them to the utmost; for they are afraid that the moment she obtains her liberty she will hasten to Bothwell, and begin all over again; on this account she was conveyed during the night to Lochleven Castle. I told Lethington that they might, perhaps, have more trouble in guarding the Queen than in taking her prisoner; and that I feared, if they found themselves the weaker, that they would seek assistance from England, which must induce the King of France to take the part of Mary. On this he swore to me that they had not yet formed an alliance either with Elizabeth or any other prince.

"Lethington told me, that the Queen had called him aside to represent to him how much they wronged her in desiring to separate her from her husband, with whom she thought to live and die in the greatest happiness. He answered, 'We are far from thinking that we do any thing disagreeable to you in separating you from him whom you call your husband. On the contrary, nothing can so much contribute to your tranquillity, honour, and contentment. It is a fact that Bothwell, since his marriage with you, has written repeatedly to his first wife, and still considers her as his lawful spouse, but your majesty as his concubine.' Mary affirmed that Bothwell's letters, addressed to her, proved that this was not true. But, added Lethington, we can none of us entertain any doubt that he loved his first wife better than the Queen.

What agonizing reflections must this wretched Princess have carried to her prison! With all her crimes and all her sacrifices, she had not even gained the dearest solace of a woman's bosom, the consciousness of being beloved. The letters of Elizabeth and her ministers must have pierced her to the heart. Those of Burleigh were written with the stern dignity of reason and truth, and Elizabeth's epistles must have been felt the more cutting, from the tone of forbearance and compassion assumed by the writer.

Elizabeth was too true a daughter of Henry VIII., and too faithful to the principle of legitimacy and the divine right of kings, to submit quietly to the treatment which the guilty and degraded Queen of Scots now received from her discontented or rebellious subjects. Before hearing of Mary's abdication, she wrote the following instructions to Throckmorton.

"You shall again exert yourself for Mary's deliverance: I will then mediate impartially between her and her subjects. If the Lords again proceed to the deprivation of Queen Mary, their sovereign lady, of her royal estate, we are well assured of our own determination, and we have some just and probable cause to think the like of other princes of Christendom, that we will make ourselves a plain party against them to the revenge of their sovereign, for example to all posterity. And therein we doubt not but God will assist us, and confound them in their devices, considering they have no warrant nor authority, by the law of God or man, to be as superior judges or vindicators over their prince and sovereign."

This is in the true spirit of kingcraft. The remonstrances of the English were, however, treated with slight attention by the Scottish leaders. Mary's infant son was crowned amidst universal joy, and Murray accepted the Regency; upon which Throckmorton was sturdily told that he might write to Elizabeth that they never designed to touch the life of Mary.

That for their behaviour towards her, all princes had condemned them, as traitors, rebels, seditious, ungrateful, and cruel. They are thoughtless of all that, and will not justify themselves; but if Queen Elizabeth, or any foreign prince, shall, either by force or any other way, endeavour to rescue Queen Mary, they shall be compelled to deal otherwise with her than ever they intended to do. They would rather venture a war with England than grant the Queen's liberty, who would certainly ruin them, recal Bothwell, the former bad government should again take place. If England would invade them, France would assist them. It was the interest of Elizabeth to assist them.

To the relative and the woman in distress, Elizabeth was more than indifferent; but she could not brook such audacious conduct in subjects to their "anointed" Princess.

The subsequent events of Mary's life are too familiarly known to merit attention. But many original characteristic traits are found down to the close of Raumer's work, which possess interest. On Mary's escape into England, Knolleys the envoy sent by Elizabeth to confer with the fugitive, writes—

"Queen Mary possesses great courage, very engaging manners, and speaks well. She cares not what perils she be exposed to, provided she gains the victory over her enemies. It is well to be considered what is to be done with a lady of such a spirit. She told she would rather that all her party were hanged, than submit to Murray; and told, if she were not retained, she would go into Turkey, rather than not be revenged on him."

Raumer, who is throughout the advocate, where he is not the panegyrist of Elizabeth, vindicates her severity to Mary from the feelings of the English people to the Queen of Scots, as well as from the exigencies of the State, and the interest of the Protestant cause throughout Christendom. The bloodthirsty fury of fanaticism has never perhaps been more disgustingly manifested under the guise of zeal for religion, than in a letter addressed to Leicester, calling for the execution of the Queen of Scots:—

"There is here such common lamenting, such remembrance backward, such seeing forward, such ominous fear of our Queen, that for my own part I can speak with no man, and yet I speak with many, but they all hold it for a most certain respect that our princess's life is in peril, and that her own safety is with speed to execute the dangerous traitoress and pestilence of Christendom. And that if it be not speedily done, loyalty is discouraged, and true faith put out of hope, &c. It cannot be but that the Scottish Queen is appointed upon to be the means to overthrow religion and to advance all Papistry. Our good Queen's life is the only impediment; what will not Papists do to remove any impediment to that desire?"

"God forbid that our Queen should so lose the honour of her gracious government, that posterity should say that she had destroyed herself—had undone her realm—had overthrown all Christianity in Christendom, if she do not duly and speedily execute the Scottish Queen. Let her Majesty be prayed to remember conscience and eternity. God forbid so grievous a thing as for her to carry out of this world, to God's judgment, the guiltiness of so much noble and innocent blood as has and shall be spilt; of so great waste, spoil, and destruction of England her charge; of so many murders, rapes, robberies, violent and barbarous slaughter of all sorts, sexes, and ages likely to happen: and what worse is, of the damnation of so many seduced souls, both here and in the whole Christendom, by advancing of Papistry and withdrawing of true religion; and all for piteous pity and miserable mercy in sparing one horrible woman, that carries God's wrath where she goeth; the sparing of whom has been told us by God's messengers to be a failing of God's service, who hath not for nothing delivered her into his minister's hands, and miraculously detected her treason, either to have his people preserved by her due execution, or to add more inexcusableness to them that preserve her to waste the church of God. Here is justice in right course, not so much to punish offence past, as to provide for universal safety to come.

"Here is true mercy to relieve so many, so great, so apparent dangers and miseries, &c. The delivering the earth from a devouring, wasting, unfeeling, destroying monster of unthankfulness, is a far more glorious act than all the labours of Hercules, or than any one victory of the noblest prince that ever served God. Will Elizabeth leave England and us all subject to an adulterous traitoress, a seeker of the life of her own saviour, one irritated tyrant (and shall I say all in one word?)—the Scottish Queen? Shall we not trust that her Majesty, our mother, will not stick to command to kill a toad, a snake, or a mad dog, whom she findeth poisoning or gnawing the throats of her infants, and presently threatening the same to her life."

That Mary—who, from the cradle to the grave, never had one true and able friend, and who, from the age of twenty-five, was a prisoner—intrigued to recover her freedom and her justly-forfeited authority, there is no doubt; yet the horrible woman upon whom this writer demands vengeance, is of the very painting of his fears and his hatred, and not Mary Stuart.

A few trifling paragraphs from the private correspondence of the unfortunate prisoner with her friends and confidential servants, throw a pleasing light upon her natural disposition. In one, she says:—

"I recommend old Curle to you—he is an old and faithful servant, and his son true and active in my service. To the former I have ordered a sum of money, to spend in the way that he knows of."

Mary's cook having desired to quit her service, she says—"I am not out of danger if my meals are not closely watched. He is the only one who knows about them; and since I have no apothecary, he also prepares my medicines."

"July 9, 1574.

"I pray you send me some pigeons, red partridges, and Barbary fowls. I mean to try to rear them in this country, or keep them in cages; it is an amusement for a prisoner, and I do so with all the little birds I can obtain."

"July 18, 1574.

"Always bear in mind that my will in all things be strictly followed, and send me, if it be possible, some one with my accounts. He must bring me patterns of dresses and samples of cloths, gold and silver stuffs and silks, the most costly and new now worn at court. Order for me at Poissy a couple of coifs with gold and silver crowns, such as they have made for me before. Remind Breton of his promise to send me from Italy the newest kind of head-dress, veils, and ribands wrought with gold and silver, and I will repay him."

"September 22, 1574.

"Deliver to my uncle, the cardinal, the two cushions of my work, which I send herewith. Should he be gone to Lyons, he will doubtless send me a couple of beautiful little dogs, and you likewise may procure a couple for me; for, except in reading and working, I take pleasure solely in all the little animals I can obtain. You must send them hither very comfortably put up in baskets."

"February 12, 1576.

"I send the King of France some poodle dogs, (barbets,) but can only answer for the beauty of the dogs, as I am not allowed either to hunt or to ride."

TO CARDINAL GUISE.

"January 31, 1579.

"I have offended the Queen of England neither in thought, nor word, nor deed. If, in spite of this, I am treated so rigorously, I throw the blame upon some of her ministers, who have always sought my destruction. It may be by exciting suspicion respecting me, or by other intrigues, the nothingness of which you can judge of better than I in my prison-house, and which deserve no credence whatever."

Raumer endeavours to clear up the hypocritical juggle between Elizabeth and her ministers about the death-warrant, upon his ordinary principle of vindicating every act done by Elizabeth.

It is not possible for Raumer to lessen the impression produced upon the reader, by the dignity, serenity, and the self-possession retained by Mary in the last scenes of her miserable life; and by her piety, and tender and considerate humanity to her attendants. The death of Elizabeth, worn out with suffering and remorse, in contrast with the last tranquil hours of Mary, tends much to equalize the circumstances of their lives. A more humiliating picture of human decay and helplessness cannot be imagined than that of the powerful and high-spirited Elizabeth in the "last scene of all." Many very interesting notices of the habits of Elizabeth and her court are given in this volume, from the correspondence of the French envoy, Bouillon. Of the Queen, he says—

"She is blamed in the country for having sequestrated 60,000 crowns which Sir Francis Drake had deposited with the Mayor of London while he was in her naval service; likewise for having retained in confinement several persons under sentence, in order to enjoy, meantime, their revenues, and those of their wives.

"Though she is sixty-three years of age, she still dresses like a girl. Those whom she has loved have perhaps had much power in the affairs of the state; but never all. She has constantly had the commendable prudence of trusting much to able statesmen, and by their influence counterbalancing such as enjoyed her personal favour.

"The Earl of Essex is, at present, the person most in favour."

Six years later, another French ambassador, Count Harlay de Beaumont, writes:—

"Elizabeth gave an entertainment to the Duke of Nevers at Richmond, and, after dinner, opened the ball with him, in a gaillarde, which she danced with admirable skill for her age. Since the Duke of Alençon was here, she has not done this honour to any foreign prince. On hearing from the ambassador that Henry IV. had suffered from gout, she said, 'This complaint is much more suitable for the Pope and the Emperor, who live in great repose and constantly shut up; but not for the King of France, who is fond of bodily exercises, the chase, and war.'"

Essex was now executed. At an interview with the ambassador, the Queen said—

I had a mind to go to Ireland in person; but my counsellors declared that my people would never consent to my leaving this kingdom, and put me in mind that during my absence King James of Scotland might attempt to put himself in my place. I disregard all grounds of personal danger on such an occasion, so dear to me are the honour and happiness of my subjects. I am, besides, weary of life, for nothing now contents my mind, or gives me pleasure.

"She accompanied these words with sighs and other expressions which indicated great sorrow respecting the past, by which she probably intended to make me understand how much she lamented Essex. She also said to me, almost with tears, 'I clearly foresaw that his impatient spirit and his ambitious conduct would entangle him, to his misfortune, in evil designs. More than two years before, I had warned him, by telling him that he would do well to content himself with making a point of displeasing me on all occasions, and of despising my person so arrogantly, but that he should beware of touching my sceptre. Thus I was compelled to punish him according to the laws of England, and not according to my own, which he had found far too mild and pleasant for him to fear that I should do anything disagreeable to him. My too affectionate and salutary exhortations could not restrain him from plunging into ruin, and thus my passion was overcome by one still stronger, though I shall look back upon it with regret as long as I live.'"

Elizabeth's death took place in the following spring. De Beaumont wrote from day to day—

The Queen has not had any sleep during this time, and eats much less than usual. Though she has no actual fears, she suffers much from incessant restlessness, and from so great a heat of the mouth and stomach, that she is obliged to cool herself every instant, in order that the burning phlegm, with which she is often oppressed, may not stifle her. Some are of opinion that her illness has been brought on by her displeasure at what has happened with Miss Arabella; others suppose that it has been caused by the Irish affairs, her council having constrained her (against her nature and inclination) to grant a pardon to the Earl of Tyrone; while others affirm that she is possessed with grief at the death of the Earl of Essex. It is certain a deep melancholy is visible in her countenance and her actions. It is, however, much more probable that the sufferings incident to her age, and the fear of death, are the chief causes of all.

"On Thursday the 23d of March, the lord admiral being at the right side of her bed, the lord keeper at the left, and Cecil at the bed's feet, all standing, the lord admiral put her in mind of her speech concerning the succession, had at Richmond; and that they, in the name of all the rest of her council, were come unto her to know her pleasure who should succeed? whereunto she thus replied:—'I told you my seat has been the seat of kings, and I will have no rascal to succeed me, but a king.' The lords not understanding this dark speech, and looking the one on the other, at length Mr

Secretary boldly asked her, what she meant by those words, that no rascal should succeed her? 'And who,' quoth she, 'should that be (namely, her successor) but our cousin of Scotland?' They asked her whether that was her absolute resolution? whereunto she answered, 'I pray you trouble me no more; I will have none but him;' with which answer they departed.

"Notwithstanding, about four o'clock in the afternoon the next day, after the Archbishop of Canterbury and other divines had been with her, and left her in a manner speechless, the three lords aforesaid repaired unto her again, asking her if she remained in her former resolution, and who should succeed her? But she not being able to speak, was asked by the Secretary in this sort, 'We beseech you, if you remain in your former resolution, and you would have the King of Scotland to succeed you in your kingdom, show some sign unto us?' Whereat, suddenly heaving herself up in her bed, and putting her arms out of bed, she held both her hands jointly together over her head in manner of a crown, whereby they guessed she signified that she did not only wish him the kingdom, but desired the continuance of his estate."

A portrait of Queen Mary is prefixed to the volume, which cannot surely be authentic, though it comes in an authentic character. It must have been painted before Mary was sixteen; and the placid, large, and rather masculine features, are those of a woman of forty. M. Von Raumer, in his zeal for Elizabeth, would deprive her rival of what no one has ever disputed—her fleeting, perishable beauty.

Upon the whole, this is a volume which will be read with great interest. How many hints and new lights it would have afforded to Sir Walter Scott!

LITERARY REGISTER.

Adventures of Captain John Patterson of the 50th Regiment.

Yet another old soldier's book!—and they are all welcome; for few narratives are more entertaining, and none so manly and unaffected.

A soldier's own regiment—"ours"—like the ladye-love of a knight of chivalry, is, of course, the first under the cope of heaven. This is a proposition we never yet had the hardihood to dispute. For the time being, we deferentially bow to, and swear by "the button," whatever number it bears. Acknowledging, therefore, what, after all, is only the truth, that the Queen's Own, "The Old Black Cuffs," is among the best and bravest corps under the Crown, we may state, that "John Patterson, Gent., to be ensign in the 50th," was gazetted some thirty years ago; that the young candidate for glory joined the regiment at Deal, and soon afterwards embarked at Portsmouth for foreign service. His off-set is touching to those who have ever witnessed, or even imagined such scenes of sorrow and despair as the following—

Previous to our going on board, a limited number of women were allowed to accompany the regiment, and lots were cast in order to decide this very delicate affair. It was most affecting to witness the distress of those whose fate it was to remain behind; and the despair that was pictured on the countenances of the unhappy creatures, was truly pitiable. Many of them, young, helpless, and unprotected, were forced to wander back to their own country, penniless and broken-hearted, and, to all intents and purposes, left in a widowed state; for few of them were fated ever to behold their husbands again.

After touching at Gibraltar, and experiencing a good deal of tossing about, the expedition landed at Mendego Bay. Captain Patterson narrates the various occurrences of the campaign, which was terminated by the convention of Cintra, so far as they fell under his personal observation. In fact, Colonel Napier, and the other historians of the war of the Peninsula, have left little to relate save anecdotes and personal adventures. These Captain Patterson tells with easy pleasantry. He has, indeed, rather a knack of seizing and presenting the brightest attitudes of the vicissitudes of a soldier's life, and of making the brave endurance of petty evils look very like enjoyment in spite of them. From the discomforts of a filthy billet at Santarem, we find him thus cheerfully on the march towards Salamanca; and we think the picture of a soldier's gay and snatch-joy life engaging, and not overcharged.

Yet, in spite of circumstances of this kind, the life of a soldier on service, taking all things together, is the finest in the world. While he moves on, a roving adventurer, care, pain, and trouble are banished from his mind; and, though he is, at times, on short commons, and often driven to his wit's end, he but seldom repines. His sufferings give him a greater relish for the enjoyment of any good things that may be forthcoming, or any windfall that fortune may throw in his way. Once fairly on the road, it is astonishing how rapidly the hours glide away. The formalities of parade or drill-marching, are now at an end, and every one indulges in that mode of perambulation which best suits him. When the commanding officer is not one of your strict disciplinarians, the regimental juniors congregate together in groups—some in front, some in rear—while the men, though keeping their sections, travel in open ranks, filling the entire space of ground over which the route extends.

At the head of the column, is to be seen a host of seniors, or old hands, among whom the laugh and joke prevail; and there many a long-winded veteran inflicts upon the ears of his patient auditors, a narrative as endless as the road. Ever and anon, the second Major falls back, and, in order to shew his consequence and zeal, especially if a General with his staff should chance to be passing, he calls out, in a most important tone, "Gentlemen, get into your places!" "Keep on the flanks!" and other friendly admonitions. As soon as he is convinced, by the approving looks of the great man with the long feather and epaulettes, that his vigilance has been duly noticed, he gallops off to his old station, and the gentlemen betake themselves again to theirs, till another appearance of the chief, when the stray sheep are again called back to the flock. By the by, I know of nothing else that these second Majors have to do, unless it be to act the part of moveable pivots for dressing up the line, (in which they are generally very fussy,) or in whipping-in the young subalterns, whom they endeavour to keep in order.

The surgeon, who is often a very hearty fellow—with better things than boluses and pill boxes in his panniers—together with the adjutant and his brethren of the staff, attract around them, in the rear, a batch of thoroughly pleasant men, who keep up such a volley of jest and drollery, as frequently to beguile the weariness of the longest march. Thanks to their amusing powers, we have often found ourselves at the gates of the town, or on the camp ground, without being aware that we had travelled any distance.

At intervals of one or two hours each day, the troops are halted for a few minutes' rest. Then all, as if by magic wand, are quickly squatted; and haversack being called for, the whole of them, like hungry cormorants at their prey, are soon engaged in one grand scene of mastication. Some perform a solo on the shank-bone of a well-picked ham; others display their talents on the drumstick of a half-starved fowl; while the majority gnaw their way through the skinny junk of an old tough bullock. The vultures and other birds of evil omen are, meanwhile, hovering in mid air, ready to pounce upon the remnants of the feast when we are gone.

At the well-known sound of pipes or bugles, the warriors are again (to use a parliamentary phrase) on their legs, stretching them out with renewed vigour. Among the soldiers, there is likewise much of drollery and mirth; nothing makes much difference with them—it matters not whether trumps turn up or not—whether the chance be a battle or a good billet, they are still the same, and trudge along devoid of care. Give them their allowance and a little rest, and they require no more. Day after day, I have listened to their jokes and stories, and been highly entertained by their originality and humour.

On this march, and it took place in dark November, we find a part of the secret revealed, by which military leaders gain the hearts of their soldiers, and make lambs of tigers.

The young recruits and drummers felt the hardship most; and often, upon the journey, has Major Napier given his charger to one of them, or to any poor fellow who could not well get on, while, with a musket, or sometimes a brace of them, on his shoulder, he walked before the regiment. Thus, by his considerate kindness for the men, he was securing to himself that respect and estimation in which they always held him, as well as actuating them to perform their duty in a manner worthy of one who, whether in quarters or in the field, never spared himself whenever an opportunity offered to promote their comfort.

At first landing in Portugal, the English were sadly at a loss for language, and for want of dragomen. Many an ingenious device was fallen upon to eke out the extraordinary dialect of the men, trying to make themselves understood in a jumble of Irish, Welsh, Gaelic, and oaths. They succeeded better by using signs—

As varied as the movements of a posture-master or even punchinello. When pork, or any other thing pertaining to the hog was wanted, grunting, in imitation of that animal, was the means employed. The desire for eggs was signified by cackling like a hen; was a mule or jackass required, the hands were stuck up on each side above the head, to denote the length of ears, or an awful braying was put forth, enough to call the brotherhood about the performer; tobacco or snuff was demanded by a sneeze, followed, in many cases, by a tweak upon the organ in which the filthy powder was to be deposited; and milk was procured by imitating the extraction of that useful fluid from the cow. In short, for everything there was a corresponding signal, a code of which would have formed an excellent appendage to a soldier's kit.

There is an account of the disastrous retreat of Sir John Moore, containing a wild mixture of the comic and the horrible, which alternately dilates the risible muscles and chills the blood, like those ludicrous accidents which sometimes accompany an execution. Captain Patterson's intimate friend, Ensign Moore, was severely wounded at the battle of Corunna, and died in Gosport Hospital shortly after reaching England. This brief notice is exceedingly touching.

Poor Moore, my esteemed friend and companion, had all along a presentiment of his fate; and talked of it as an event inevitably to happen in the first battle. This sad foreboding, from which I could not rally him, never for a moment preyed upon his mind, which was always cheerful and contented.

Of this battle it is quaintly said—"It was such hot work, that a man would be inclined to give himself a shake or two after all was over, in order to ascertain whether his head was on his shoulders."

Captain Patterson next went upon the unhappy expedition to Walcheren, where he escaped the fate of so many brave and sacrificed men, and returned again to the Peninsula. His future adventures do not, and indeed cannot differ from those of many other subalterns, yet there is originality in the mode of telling them; as, for instance, in his description of the Capuchins of Villa Bourba in the Alentejo.

Since the day that a cavalier and "foot-wobbler" were first arrayed together in order of battle, or on any kind of service, there must, we apprehend, have been jealousy between the horse and foot; and the former do certainly assume high airs, of which Captain Patterson endeavours to explain the philosophy. One night, the infantry officers had got a most comfortable billet; and, after a tiresome march, were beginning to enjoy themselves, when an event chanced which gives rise to his speculations.

I will take the opportunity of saying a few words as to certain persons who seemed to think that we had no title to such a luxury. The dragoons sometimes acted towards the infantry in rather a cavalier manner, and appeared to treat them as if they were quite an inferior order of beings. Whether it was because they had the honour of being a little more elevated from the ground, or that to their visage were appended the whisker and mustachio, and they talked their mother tongue in a lisping style, it would be difficult to determine. It is, at all events, pretty certain that many of them, recently imported from the purlieus of St James's, assumed a great variety of airs and graces, unbecoming in the field, however beautiful they might have seemed in Bond Street, and which the rough and dirty work of war and fighting failed to do away with. I can never forget the conduct of one of their noble sprigs, whose regiment happened to arrive at the town when we were halted. It was a poor place after a hard march, under bad weather and very heavy rain; but we were glad to obtain any sort of shelter in the wretched village. We had scarcely entered, when our ears were saluted with the noise of cavalry, coming down the street, and, in a short space, we had a sample of dragooning, such as it would be vain to look for even among the Cherokees.

Three or four of us were seated round the wide fireplace of a Spanish hearth, after taking off our well-drenched jackets and accoutrements, and were enjoying the benefit of a fine blazing pile of fire, the very counterpart of that I have just described, and our servants were preparing for the culinary operations, when a loud hammering was heard at the door of the hovel, accompanied by the clanking of carbines, sabres, saberdashes, and other warlike appurtenances. At the same moment, in burst a tall, raw-boned trooper, (armed cap-a-pied, with a countenance well furnished with a most abundant crop, in which the crows might have built their nests,) followed by two others, carrying sundry hampers belonging to their masters. The intruder, who proved to be the officer commanding, gazed with awful stare upon the lodgers already in the house, and, drawing himself up, as if, like Sampson, he were about to raise the building on his shoulders, called, or rather growled out, in the tone of an angry mastiff, while he curled the points of his black mustachios, "These quarters are not too good for a Col—o—nel of Dra—goons —eh!" and, suiting the action to the word, he flung his implements of war on a table close at hand, with a degree of violence that shook our frail tenement to its base. His claims to supremacy being intimated to us, we gathered up our traps, and bundled out indignantly, looking round, with no very gracious glances, at the statue in whose possession we quietly left the premises, to go in search of another billet.

There was a want of courtesy and good feeling here, not in anyway consistent with high bearing, and these, with many other traits of character, produced a jealousy between us, so that no very cordial intimacy could take place; nor was there much love wasted on either side. Engaged in one common cause, in duty on the same field together, all those ideas of superiority should have been forgotten; and those heroes with spurs of at least a half yard in length, should have packed up all their high opinions and fine notions, and sent them to the stores in England, there to be made use of at some future period. Such commodities never do for service, nor will they harmonize with camp or bivouac. They may pass current at home, where the pride of wealth, gold lace, and dress, go far to raise a man in public estimation; but lying in a wet ditch, or stretched by the side of a tree upon the ground, with a tattered cloak for covering, they are of little value. In that situation, a good blanket, and a well-filled haversack, are worth all the lace, fringe, feathers, and aiguillettes in the British army.

About this time I remember an officer joined our camp from England, with a canteen profusely stocked, as well as a good kit. He was, moreover, a well-dressed young man, apparently fresh from the hands of Dodd, of St James' Street, equipped in garments that seemed as if they were pasted on his body, besides a grey frock coat, lined throughout with silk, and adorned with frogs and tassels in abundance.

Such a set of poor unfortunate gipsies as we were must have been doubtless held in little estimation by our hero, who viewed with scorn our dingy costume, tarnished and tattered in so vile a manner, that even a Jew broker, or an Irish beggarman, would have scarcely picked them up. We had, however, each of us a good blanket, (and some had two,) that was designed a double debt to pay—

> By night a coverlet,
> A saddle-cloth by day.

Johnny Newcome, well scented, had a good stock of odours and essences for service in the field; and, instead of beef or rum, his hampers were amply stored with otto of roses, macassar oil, and other articles of sweet perfume. He glanced with horror at our ugly trim; but, when he beheld the saddle sloth, he laughed outright, and called us "blanket merchants."

It was then cold and wintry weather, the rain occasionally came down in torrents, so that, when the night set in, we found our friendly coverlet a most timely aid. The green-horn, who was certainly one of his Majesty's hard bargains, eyed us most wistfully askance, and, shivering in his stays and broadcloath, envied the old stagers, while he tried to crouch from the rain and nipping air under any shelter he could find.

One of our fellows, an admirable wag, peeped out from beneath his fleecy counterpane, and observing the plight of Master Superfine, who lay ensconced behind the stump of an old tree, he hallooed, and bellowed out so that the whole camp might hear him, "Halloo, old boy! How do you like the blanket merchants now?" The field was in an uproar at the joke, and the unfortunate recruit having no desire for war's alarms, of which he had seen quite enough to damp his fiery spirit, took himself away soon after, and the Blanketeers never had the pleasure of seeing his pretty face again.

This is a long extract; but we do not grudge it, as the remarks contain much practical good sense, bearing on those reforms which that over-grown army with which we are carrying on the peace in its twenty-second year, urgently requires.* Will the peace now be allowed to have become major, and to be capable of managing its own affairs, without so many military guardians.

We could find no difficulty in multiplying lively extracts from this pleasant narrative, of the vicissitudes and enjoyments of a soldier's life: but it is unnecessary. One of those little episodes in war, which affect the reader more than events of far greater public importance, is thus told. The event took place at the storming of a mountain fort, when the British were pushing across the Tagus in face of the French lines.

An affecting interview took place, after the surrender of the fort, between two brothers, Laurence and Patrick Egan, who were so strongly attached that they were never content on separate duties—the eldest, Laurence, or Larry, as his comrades called him, being a batman, was consequently ordered to remain in charge of the baggage of his company, on the march of the regiment. Prompted by a noble feeling, as well as an ardent desire to be near his brother, this spirited young soldier begged so earnestly for leave to join and meet the enemy with his own companions, that he was at length permitted to do so.

The brothers behaved gallantly on the occasion, and maintained the character of Irishmen. Patrick was mortally wounded during the escalade, being one of the first to mount the ladder. Lying on the rampart in a most painful state, he lingered out for some hours. Poor Larry, in the joy of his heart on our success, ran to find out his brother, whom he soon discovered extended in the agonies of death! A more touching or affecting scene could not be witnessed, and, though it was in humble life, it was moving to the hearts of all around. Many who had long been callous to the horrors of a battle-field, and familiarized to the work of slaughter, could have wept over the deep sorrows of those truly brave and affectionate brothers. The mournful Larry never regained his spirits, and fell in one of the subsequent engagements. They were both excellent soldiers, having a good claim to this feeble record of their worth.

After peace was concluded, Captain Patterson served for some time in Jamaica, and saw many of his companions in arms, who had survived through all the hardships and risks of the Peninsular war, perish of the pestilential fever of that beautiful and fatal island. His description of military quarters and life in the Barracks of Up Park Camp and the other stations is picturesque and true. It is not inviting. What a blessing to the British army will the metamorphosing of old slaves into young apprentices prove, if there be any hope that in due time they will grow into journeymen and masters, and be able to manage their own affairs, without the continual superintendance of armed guards!

From all the luxuries of these sun-smitten islands, happy was Captain Patterson to find himself once again in foggy, humid England, in which, with many thanks for his pleasant adventures, we wish the veteran long life and prosperity.

Autobiography of a Country Curate. Smith, Elder, & Co. 2 vols.

The Curate is the friend of the Church, and yet feelingly alive to the miseries of a life without a living. With the painful events and trials of such a life, the Curate has combined recollections of a picturesque tour in Scotland, and thus made up a readable book of a rather miscellaneous character. He is extremely alive to the present dangers of the Church of England, whose enemies he states to be "roaring without, while her friends are snoring within." Those who exclusively arrogate the name are awakening, however, we imagine; and, like many persons, when suddenly scared out of a comfortable nap, in a state very much resembling delirium; as witness their new Church of England Quarterly Review, which is rabid and raving.

Essay on the Nature, Ends, and Means of Imitation in the Fine Arts. Translated from the French of M. Q. De Quincey. By T. C. Kent. Smith & Elder. 1 vol. 8vo.

The translator claims in this work to give his countrymen a book of uncommon excellence, which is very much wanted. "An all-comprehensive and universal theory is now, for the first time, unfolded, as a sure guide and instructor where to find the secrets and how best to wield the spells of art in moulding its creations." This is a high claim. Though the book of the French philosophical critic should fall considerably short of this, it is well worthy of attention. Those who may not coincide in all the views of M. De Quincey, will still be gratified by his eloquent, ingenious, and sometimes subtle speculations.

The Inquisitor. Macrone. 1 vol. post 8vo.

In this neat volume, a recent tour in Spain—not military, but literary, descriptive, antiquarian, and romantic—is thrown into the form of letters. To relieve and propitiate the impatient public, responses are returned from London, dated from the Athenæum Club, which are devoted to literary and gossipping discussion. With these appliances the reader scuds along, as sailors say, at a pleasant rate, through an elegant if not an enduring book.

The Letters of Runnymede. Macrone. 1 vol. 8vo.

It is not because the author of this work is a Tory that we dislike his book; nor yet because he calls Mr O'Connell bad names and abuses the Whigs; but solely by reason that his work is flippant, shallow, and impertinent, and without one grain of information that may not be gleaned from an old file of a weekly newspaper. To our opinion of this Brummagem Junius, Sir Robert Peel, to whom these Letters are inscribed, will, we have no doubt, subscribe.

Mrs Maberly. Macrone. 3 vols.

This novel is considerably injured, if not in part completely spoiled, by the attempt to make it something fresh, original, and unlike other commonplace novels. The author, to gain his end, has taken it into his head, to throw the current manners and habitudes of English society two centuries forward, when railways and steamers have attained incredible perfection, while men and women, their frailties, follies, and fashions, flourish at his New Leamingtons, and Vitreas, his fashionable Asiatic and Australian watering-places, exact counterparts, in 2036, of those of 1837. There is, however, some humour in the improvement which shall then have taken place in musical instruments, compositions, and performers. Mr Longlegs' song is that very consummation of musical absurdity to which the age may have arrived in two hundred years, if it go on at the late rate of progression.

Life and Character of Joan D'Arc. London: Churton.

This is a very slender volume; but it contains all the interesting particulars of the strange story of the Maid of Orleans. A little more might, however, have been made of Joan when the writer was about it.

* Flogging is, we rejoice to see, abolished in the army of Denmark. Are Englishmen to be the last civilised men subjected to punishment which a good modern game-keeper no longer employs in training his dogs?

The Book of Human Character. By Mr Bucke. Knight. 1 vol.

We have here one section of an extensive commonplace book, or scrap-book, into which are gathered numerous stray thoughts, reflections, and anecdotes; together with much wisdom at second-hand, and not a little second-hand wisdom. Yet the book is a good book, and a wise; and one, moreover, upon which the writer has taken great pains, and in which he has found, we doubt not, much pleasure. It is somewhat after the manner of D'Israeli's gleanings, but more ambitious of originality and point of style. We may give a better idea of "The Book of Human Characters," by describing it as hovering between the writings of the author we have named, and the Recollections of Conversation Sharpe. Mr Bucke would fain try a hit at the provoking sex now and then; but as often he prudently draws in his horns. Mr Bucke's volume forms a part of the Library of Anecdote.

Aerial Sights and Sounds. By Charles Williams. Westley & Davis.

We have here a nice and very neat small volume, the purpose of which is to make Natural Philosophy familiar to young persons in a very engaging way. Mr Williams relates the popular, we may say the almost romantic experiments of Sir H. Davy and other philosophers, generally in their own language; and altogether has compiled a valuable volume of Entertaining Knowledge. The book is illustrated by many wood engravings.

The Student of Padua, a Tragedy.

A very diverting performance. If it ever reach the stage, we promise the spectators rare fun.

Life of Ali Pasha.

This Memoir forms the seventy-first volume of Murray's, now Tegg's, "Family Library." The Memoir is compiled by Mr Davenport, who has diligently gleaned from all the travellers and writers who have either visited or heard of his remarkable hero. The volume possesses so much interest that we should have been glad to give an analysis of it, had our limits permitted. It is, however, not dear.

Tints of Talent from many Pencils. Simpkin, Marshall, & Co.

This is a book of scraps in prose and verse by many authors, though we are not sure that the writers are so numerous as the names, or that there may not be a few aliases. The Tales are of the average merit of the Annuals. Some of them have been probably seen before, but are still as good as MS. to the multitude.

The History of England Made Visible. By Charles Williams. London: Westley & Davis.

This History of England, which embraces a period extending from the period of the Ancient Britons to the Reign of George IV., is formed upon an ingenious plan. The principal events, and the character, manners, and customs of every successive age, are exhibited rather than illustrated by circular plates. The first plate, for example, represents in the centre, Druid Worship; while, in six bordering sections, we have the ruins, armour, arms, domestic utensils, dwellings, &c. &c. of the period. This, we imagine, will make a very entertaining and instructive domestic volume. The plates are really spirited and clever. Thus, in the one devoted to the Norman period, we have beautiful specimens of the Anglo-Saxon architecture, and of the costumes of warriors, civilians, ladies, and priests.

POLITICAL REGISTER.

GREAT BRITAIN.

ALTHOUGH now on the eve of the opening of Parliament, nothing has transpired with regard to the measures likely to be introduced by Ministers; and no attempts have been made to secure the co-operation of Liberals of all classes, though it is obvious that, by the result of this session, the cause of Liberalism must be decided. Throughout Britain, though there is unquestionably no reaction in favour of Toryism, there is great indifference towards the Ministry; nor can we wonder that there should be, considering how much the hopes and expectations of the people, in regard to the fruits of the Reform Bill, have been disappointed. Had it been known that the four first sessions of the reformed Parliament were to prove so barren as they have done, few would have made the exertions which they did in 1832. It was expected that that Act would have annihilated Toryism and corruption —that it would have secured a speedy abolition of the Corn-Laws, and of the laws against importation of food of all kinds—that it would have swept off the Pension List—put an end to sinecures and useless places, and, by remodelling the ecclesiastical establishments of England and Ireland, have afforded a large fund to be employed in purposes of national education. Triennial Parliaments were all but promised by Lord John Russell, in his speech on 1st March 1831, when he introduced the Reform Bill; and the question of the Ballot, it was implied, was to receive a fair consideration by the Cabinet. But, except the English and Scottish Corporation Acts, hardly a single measure has been carried, for securing which, the people exerted themselves to obtain Reform in the Representation. The Boroughmonger Parliament in its last four Sessions passed as many important beneficial measures as the Reformed Parliament has done in the same time. In 1828, the Test and Corporation Act was repealed; in 1829, the Catholic Emancipation Act passed; in 1830, the Tories were driven out of office; and in 1831, the Reform Bill was carried, in a Wellington Parliament, by a majority of one. Next Session the majority was 162, and that in a Parliament elected under the old system; but now the Ministry, supported as they have been throughout by the Radicals, can barely calculate on a majority of 20, and that majority is diminishing every month. At a late dinner at Northampton, Earl Spencer stated, that, in the long course of his political life, there were four measures he had always looked to as of the greatest importance: the Repeal of the Test Act, Catholic Emancipation, the Reform Act, and the Abolition of Slavery. Well, only one of these was carried by the Reformed Parliament; and it might have been passed in the worst parliament that ever sat, by the same means, viz. by giving twenty millions—more than the total value of the slaves—for having the name of slavery changed into that of apprenticeship. The English Poor Law Act, on which the Whigs pride themselves, is precisely one of those which would have been gladly received in a Castlereagh Parliament, for it saves the landed proprietors at the expense of the poor; and among its most efficient supporters in both Houses, were accordingly to be found some of the leading Tories. The army and navy, which absorb nearly two-thirds of the disposable revenue of the country, have both been greatly increased by the Whig Cabinet; and by our intervention in the pitiful squabbles of the Peninsula, we are incurring the danger of involving ourselves in war, without doing anything to expedite the restoration of peace in that country. It is not remarkable, therefore, that much indifference towards the Whigs exists, and that the electors feel little inclination to expose themselves to annoyance and loss, for the support of a party which obstinately withholds the only shield which can effectually protect them in the honest and independent exercise, not of the trust, but of the right which they gained with so many struggles and so many sacrifices. The notion of the Whigs plainly is, and has all along been, that the only object of the Reform Act was to keep them in power, and enable them to divide the loaves and fishes among themselves. But if they do not bestir themselves, even this object will be defeated. By their absurd conduct in allowing the army to remain in the hands of the Tories, and in permitting the whole counties to be ruled by Tory Lord Lieutenants and their Deputies, and Tory Justices of the Peace, by withholding from the counties an organization similar to that of the towns, their political opponents are daily increasing in power, and will, unless a change of conduct takes place, turn them out of office. In the 26 contested elections of English counties, since the dissolution of Parliament, the Reformers have been defeated in 19, and have lost 22 Members. In Scotland, the Tories have almost everywhere been creating numerous fictitious votes, and in a few years the county elections will be entirely in their hands. No effectual check to the creation of such votes seems at all likely to be given by Parliament, in which the Tory votes all but balance the Whig and Radical. Ireland alone prevents the Tories resuming office; for there seems little reason to doubt, that the King will dismiss the Whigs, whenever their Tory opponents declare themselves prepared to assume office.

This melancholy state of matters, at the opening of the fifth session of the Reformed Parliament, has rendered it imperative on the leaders of the people to chalk out a new system of Parliamentary action. Instead of merely following in the wake of the Whigs, and maintaining them in power, popular measures must be introduced, and zealously supported; for otherwise it is vain to expect again to rouse the dormant energies of the people. This line of action, while it will keep the Tories out of office, will, at the same time, force the Whigs either to move forward with the spirit of the age, or compel them to give way to honester and bolder men. We can easily anticipate which alternative they will choose; and there is not, therefore, the smallest risk of fighting the Tory game by adopting this course of proceeding. Sir William Molesworth, who has risen into public esteem more rapidly than any other man, has the merit of contriving this plan, and we have no doubt that it will be eagerly adopted by every independent and untrammelled representative. If the Radical Members, as a body, support it, and they are 170 in number, its success is certain. Frequent divisions on such questions as the Ballot, Shortening the Duration of Parliaments, the Corn-Laws, Extension of the Suffrage, Reduction of the Army, Abolition of Flogging, and the publication of these divisions, will prove more than the great majority of the Whig supporters will be able to sustain, with any chance of being again elected by their constituents. Neither will Peerage Reform be forgotten. Mr Canning always maintained that the Peers could not co-exist with a Reformed House of Commons. The event has shewn that he is perfectly correct; and unless their Lordships are rendered responsible to the people, it is in vain to go through the farce of dissolutions of Parliament and elections of representatives, when the acts of the representatives are rendered nugatory by a set of legislators, either hereditary or named on account of their services in the cause of tyranny and corruption.

The benefit to be derived from the mere discussion of salutary measures of Reform, can hardly be overrated. The great support of Toryism is ignorance. Notwithstanding all the efforts which are incessantly made to point out the abuses existing in our political system, little progress has yet been made in diffusing information throughout the masses. Immense multitudes, even of the middle classes, think they have no more to do with politics than the Cabinet Ministers have with their private affairs. They are willing to leave them to manage as they like, as if it was of no consequence whether a man paid double what he ought to do for his food and clothing—whether profits and wages were high or low—and whether his life and property were to be exposed to the judicial prostitution of a Braxfield, or the atrocious conspiracies of a Castlereagh. The great body of the people are so intent on filling their pockets, that they have neither time nor inclination to examine how they are emptied. But a debate in Parliament resounds through the breadth and length of the land. No system of publication which can be devised can at all approach it in extent and efficacy. It reaches, almost with the rapidity of thought, every individual, high and low; and the reports being mixed up with miscellaneous matter, suitable to every capacity and every taste, are more or less perused by those who would revolt from the study of any merely political writing. Many a speech which has fallen ineffectually upon the drowsy senators of St Stephens, has, in a short time, caused such a feeling throughout the country, as to ensure, in another session, the passing of the measure which it advocated. Catholic Emancipation, Abolition of Slavery, the Repeal of the House Duty, of the Stamps on Newspapers, could not have been effected without numerous debates in Parliament disseminated throughout the kingdom. All these measures, when first introduced, were rejected by so great majorities, and held up to such scorn and ridicule, that it seemed mere waste of time to persevere in again bringing them under the notice of Parliament. Mr Cobbett's motion for leave to bring in a bill to equalise the Stamp Duties, was treated as a mere chimera, and thrown out by a majority of four to one. Although that question was only once debated, the Chancellor of the Exchequer has already brought in a bill carrying into effect the spirit and almost the letter of Mr Cobbett's resolutions—and there is little doubt that that bill will become law before the termination of the present year. These remarks we intend as an answer, by anticipation, to the complaints which will soon be made of the Radicals wasting time by the introduction of measures which, it is assumed, will never be carried, because the Whigs and Tories may succeed in rejecting them by large majorties when first introduced.

The probable efficacy of the new Radical system may be judged of by the dismay it has cast over the Whig camp. There is hardly one of their supporters of the press, from the Land's-End to John o' Groat's, who has not raised his voice against it. The Tories, on the other hand, affect an air of exultation, as if the people were so easily imposed on as not to see, that, although it may prove injurious to Whiggery, it must, in the end, give the death-blow to Toryism.

ENGLAND.

The most important and interesting event of the month, was the dinner, given by the Reformers of Bath, to their representatives, General Palmer and Mr Roebuck, on the 5th of Jauuary. Nearly 500 persons were present, and the speeches were very spirited. Colonel Charles Napier advocated Annual Parliaments, Universal Suffrage, the Vote by Ballot, and Reform of the Lords: Annual Parliaments, because short accounts made long friends, and because the representative would be brought annually before his constituents; Universal Suffrage, because representation and taxation should go together; the Ballot, because at present the poor man was put in jeopardy if he voted against the rich; and Reform of the Lords, because the existing system was rotten. General Palmer defended the Ministry, and said that Lord Melbourne would give the Ballot, &c., when Mr Roebuck and his fellow-labourers succeeded in agitating the public mind on these questions. This, he stated on a knowledge of thirty years' standing of his Lordship. This hint should not be overlooked. We believe, indeed, that the Whigs will give anything rather than resign office.—Mr Roebuck, who was enthusiastically received, defended himself for having found fault with the Ministry. He maintained that Reform was moving at a snail's pace. The Radicals did not ask the Whigs to bring forward such questions as the Ballot and Reform of the Peers, but merely to leave the members of the Cabinet to vote on them as they chose. If the Whigs refused justice, there was no other course than to turn them out, and their fall would be their own suicidal act, and not that of the Radicals. In speaking of O'Connell, he denied that the Melbourne Ministry were doing justice to Ireland. Making some good appointments was not doing justice. They had passed no new law to prevent the atrocities which were so frequent in that country when under Tory rule, from being again committed. He concluded by shewing that a dangerous crisis had arrived, and it was now plain that the Radicals must either cease to be the representatives of the people, or compel the Whigs to do justice if they remained in office.—Sir W. Molesworth insisted that Reform measures should have fair play, and maintained that, by submitting them to Parliament and the country, the confidence and support of the people would be regained. He would be sorry to see a Tory Government in power, because his political hatred to that party was uncompromising and unquenchable; but if, in order to keep the Whigs in power, the Radicals must co-operate with them in doing nothing, must suppress their opinions, shrink from carrying out their principles, and thus produce among the people a doubt of their honesty and zeal, and a feeling that they were compromising their principles, for the sake of power and connexion with those who have good things to bestow—then the sacrifice was too great, for it was a sacrifice of principle. He firmly believed that the course the Radicals were now taking, so far from being disagreeable, was secretly approved of by the best and worthiest now in the Ministry; and he did not think that it would drive the Whigs into the Tory ranks, or into private life. He insisted on the propriety of the Radicals, on every occasion, making known their opinions, and proving to the people that they were in earnest in their attempts to carry their principles into effect, by treating as foes all who stood in their way. Sir William was vehemently cheered for some minutes at the conclusion of his speech.—Mr Leader held up the Lords as the great obstruction to the progress of civilization and improvement. He ridiculed the notion that the Lords were the protectors of the people; and pointed to the statute-book, which is peculiarly the book of the aristocracy, to confute any such notion. There are to be found the Game-Laws, the Corn-Laws, and the numerous restrictions and prohibitions which prove that the interests of the people have always been, and are sacrificed to the interests of the aristocracy. It was said the prosperity of England was mainly owing to the Lords: but he asked, What had they done for its prosperity? Did they encourage the arts and sciences, establish manufactures, foster trade, or enlarge our commerce? He strongly urged the necessity of the Ballot, and entreated that every effort should be made, and no rest from agitation allowed, until the Ballot became the law of the land. He deprecated the policy of conciliating the Tories, and appealed to the carrying of the Reform Bill in a boroughmonger Parliament, to shew that it was only through faint-heartedness or misunderstanding, that the Liberals could fail in their efforts. He scouted the notion that there was any chance of the Tories getting into power by a disunion of the Liberal party. The Radicals would co-operate with the Government, and, at the same time, endeavour to improve its measures, not for the sake of place or power, but of principle: and in order to exclude from power the most illiberal party that ever attempted to rule a great country.—Colonel W. Napier, in replying to the toast of his health and "Justice to Ireland," spoke for two hours. He believed the only way to get justice to Ireland, was to have a government which would do justice to England. He denounced the conduct of the Whigs in their treatment of Ireland, their treachery in preventing the people obtaining the fruits of the Reform Bill, their incapacity for public business, their protecting the Lords in their attempts to defraud the people of their rights. He believed the Poor Law Amendment Bill was intended by its authors, though not by its supporters, as a bill for raising rents. He recommended to Mr O'Connell, now that he had established the National Association, and that the Irish were strong enough to resist any ephemeral administration, to join the English Radicals—at all events it would be the duty of the latter not to sacrifice their principles to the double dealing of any faction. In conclusion, the Colonel recommended agitation for Peerage Reform. The Lords sprang from the people: they did not fall like manna from heaven, and care should be taken they did not become like locusts on the land. Hitherto the people had only cried out "Reform the Lords!" but, if they went on in their present course, the cry would be, "Up with the People and down with the Lords!" This dinner has created more sensation among all parties than any meeting which has taken place for the last twelve months.

Church-Rates.—The opposition to this tax has become so formidable that the Ministry will be forced to abolish it without further delay. There will be no great difficulty in accomplishing that object; for it appears, from a statement of Mr Baines, M.P., that, if the funds applicable to the repairs of churches were used for that purpose, there would only remain £30,558, to be raised by 13,614 congregations. Since 1813, 375 persons have been prosecuted for these rates; and in some instances, the costs have been forty times the sum due! Large meetings have been held at Leeds, Manchester, and other towns, at which resolutions for the abolition of Church Rates have been carried, almost without opposition.

The Ballot.—One of the arguments, if the verbiage uttered against secret voting can be called argument, is, that the elective franchise is a trust—held for behoof of the non-electors. If this were the case, the non-electors who are assumed by law not to be qualified to judge who is a proper representative, would control the choice of the electors, who are assumed to be qualified. This is as pretty a piece of absurdity as can well be imagined. If the non-electors named the electors, in the first place, there might be something said in favour of such an assertion; but, as matters stand, the elective franchise is as much a right as any other which a man possesses, though controlled in its exercise, like all other rights, by law. Who ever heard of an elector being called to account by the non-electors for his vote? What elector would answer such a call? If the law gives the non-electors such a right, why does it not enable them to enforce it? But what compulsion have they over the elector? They can neither deprive him of his vote, nor punish him in any other way. But even if it were a trust, is it a more sacred one than that exercised by a member of a court martial, or a juryman on a trial for life and death? Yet what is the law in such cases? The deliberations of a court martial are carried on in secret, and each member must swear, "That he shall not, upon any account, at any time whatsoever, disclose or discover the vote or opinion of any particular member of the court martial, unless required to give evidence thereof as a witness, by a court of justice, in due course of law;"—(Tytler, p. 231;) and this regulation is defended by all writers on courts martial, on grounds which are, with still greater force applicable to the elective franchise. Jurymen, in the same way, deliberate in secret, and it is hardly ever known how they vote, even though attempts are often made to discover the state of the vote. It is accordingly doubtful, whether, by any process in a court of law, they can be compelled to make this discovery, even where the rights of third parties are concerned, as when a person alleges that a verdict given against him in a court trial was not unanimous;—yet the practice of secret voting, which is as old as the Constitution—whatever may be the period fixed on at which we had a Constitution, for we have none now, it seems—is held up to be un-English!

Prince Polignac.—The traitor against the liberties of France has received so many invitations from the English nobility, that, for the preservation of his health, he has been obliged to decline accepting any to large dinner or evening parties. The court, after an interval, in which Louis Philippe's permission was, no doubt, obtained, has gone into mourning for the expelled and dethroned tyrant of France, Charles X. These facts shew what is thought in high quarters in this country of treason against the people. What would be thought of any one who would fête such persons as Alibaud, Fieschi, or Meunier, or put on mournings for their death?

The Revenue.—The year ending 5th January exhibits an increase of the receipts, as compared with the preceding year, of £2,570,957; but the quarter's income exceeds that of the corresponding quarter of last year by £16,231 only. The revenue for the year just ended is £44,431,000.

THE BANK OF ENGLAND.—The bullion still continues to decrease, the monthly return to the 10th January being £254,000 less than the preceding return. There is now only £4,287,000 of bullion in the Bank.

NEW POOR-LAW.—A great outcry has been got up against the new Poor-Law, but apparently without any good ground. 173 unions of parishes have been formed, and the sum expended has, in every one of them, decreased from twenty-three to fifty per cent., the average of the whole being forty-one per cent. Crime has also generally diminished; and, as a proof that the labouring classes are acquiring more provident habits, Friendly Societies are rising up throughout England.

THE BREVET.—We are surprised that the Ministry should have consented to the brevet at this particular time. It is certain that a dissolution of Parliament will take place within a few months; the officers of the army and navy are mostly Tories, and the promotion and additional pay will stimulate them to use their utmost exertions for their party, from whom, and not from the Whigs, they have really obtained them. Nearly a hundred regiments, commands, and staff situations, will become vacant, all of which will be filled up at the Horse Guards by enemies of the Ministry. The increase to the Dead Weight is also no inconsiderable evil. We have already more officers than the total number of the army of the United States; and, in numerous instances, promotion will be given, not to the men who fought during the war, but to those who never saw a foreign enemy, and who have obtained their commissions by sycophancy and court favour. The navy is in hardly a better condition. We have 184 flag officers, 789 captains, 1105 commanders, and 2994 lieutenants. Of naval officers of all kinds, there are no fewer than 7921—a sufficient number to supply all the navies in the world.

NEW NEWSPAPERS.—It was very generally feared that, on the reduction of the newspaper duty, the country would be inundated with new and trashy newspapers, springing up in every direction. No such consequence has followed the reduction of duty. Not many new journals have yet appeared. In addition to those mentioned in our late papers on the newspaper press, we have remarked only the following:—The Aylesbury Gazette, a Radical paper of good promise, which already announces a circulation higher, by some 30 or 40 per cent., than the circulation of both the Tory and the Whig papers of the same town put together. The Scarborough, Whitby, and Bridlington Chronicle, a paper of Liberal principles—whether of Whig or Radical we cannot make out from the single number we have seen; The Preston Observer and North Lancashire Advertiser, a decided Radical, and strenuous supporter of Mr John Crawfurd, who is to stand for Preston at next election; The Kidderminster Messenger, a moderate Tory; and The Shetland Journal, printed in London, but conducted by natives of Shetland, and circulating in those Islands to the extent of nearly 1000—a spirited attempt, to which we wish continued success. In our papers on the newspaper press, we have fallen into one or two mistakes, which we take this opportunity of correcting. The high Tory paper of Birmingham is The Birmingham Advertiser, and not The Gazette. Monmouthshire has a newspaper, published at Newport, called The Monmouthshire Merlin, a respectable and successful print of eight years standing, and a steady supporter of Liberal principles. Not having been aware that The Edinburgh Advertiser, the leading Tory paper of the place, had, of late years, increased very considerably in circulation, we unintentionally, in our paper on Advertising in Scotland, underrated the value of that paper as an advertising medium. It is one of the best in Scotland. Once more we remind the friends of thoroughly independent principles, that there is now a London daily newspaper, which they would find quite congenial to their taste—The Constitutional, a paper entirely devoted to the cause of the people, without regard to party. The Sunday Times, a paper of the largest size, and written in a bold and independent style, and exceedingly popular among the citizens of London, has of late, we understand, doubled its circulation.

SCOTLAND.

Sir R. Peel dined with the Tories from all parts of Scotland, on the 13th of January. To refresh the memories of his admirers and fellow compotators, The Glasgow Argus very opportunely ransacked the files of the Tory journals for 1829 for the character of the hero of the feast; and the search produced an abundant harvest. The Standard of that year characterised him as a person "who had given up in succession everything for which he had contended, except his place"—described him as "notoriously inefficient as a leader in the House of Commons"—denounced the "Swan River job"—and held up his whole political life as "a tissue of simulation." The Morning Journal asserted, that, "of all apostates he was undoubtedly the most culpable"—maintained that he was "a fallen and despicable man"—and he was advised "to migrate and seek a retreat among the kangaroos and Peels of the Swan River." The Age depicted him as "a poor, creeping, mechanical drudge, whose political existence was sacrificed"—as "the disgraced, the characterless, the false, lying, perjured turncoat." The Glasgow Courier asserted he was lost for ever as a statesman. His conduct "stands undefended, indefensible. No party ever will or can trust him again." Yet this is the man the Tories of Scotland now delight to honour. Are they sure they can rely on him now? May he not turn his coat again? We should not be surprised if he did. An attempt was made to get the Town Council of Glasgow to vote the freedom of the corporation to Sir Robert Peel; but it was defeated by a majority of nineteen to twelve. The Dean of Guild had the assurance to say that Sir Robert's visit was not political! Sir Robert, in his speech at the dinner, seemed to be of the same opinion as the Dean. He flattered his audience by encomiums on the Scotch, and more particularly on the people of Glasgow, which were, of course, received with many plaudits. All that could be gathered from the speech, in regard to politics, was, that he is to stand by the Church and the House of Lords. He defended hereditary legislation, on the ground that hereditary Lords were as good as hereditary tailors—a defence which we have no inclination to controvert. He abused the American government, but took no notice of its results—freedom from debt, a revenue more than double the expenditure, and raised from the customs and sale of lands alone, and some ten millions sterling, now dividing among the different States, to stimulate internal improvements, manufactures, and commerce. Sir Robert remarked, that there were other enjoyments besides cheap newspapers; but we presume he does not include among them excise and stamp laws, a flogged army, starvation laws, and a pensioned and profligate aristocracy. Upon the whole, the Peel dinner has produced little if any effect; and it is evident that Sir Robert is not disposed to go the length which the Tories of the Cumberland and Lyndhurst school desire.

EAST LOTHIAN.—The contest in this county will be very hard; not that there is the slightest reason for apprehending any reaction, but because the Tories are making a most unscrupulous use of all the bad influences, and because they have created far more votes than the Liberals since last election. It is hardly, however, possible, to conceive that a majority of the electors of this enlightened county can prefer Lord Ramsay, of whom, as a public man, nothing good is known, to a gentleman of worth, integrity, and long and faithful service in the cause of the people, like Robert Ferguson of Raith. The electors should remember, that it was on their solicitation that Mr Ferguson resigned the Kirkaldy Burghs, which he might have represented as long as he lived without trouble or expense, to come and beard the Tories in what might be considered their own den, the county never having been represented by a Liberal before. They ought not to forget that no other man could have defeated them, and that the struggle has called for the most serious sacrifices. Whatever may be the result, however, of the next election, the canvass has already had the good effect of convincing many of the electors, formerly opposed to such measures, of the necessity of the Ballot, in order to protect the voters, and of an extension of the franchise, to counteract the creation of fictitious qualifications so abundantly manufactured by the Tories.

FIRE INSURANCE.—We strongly recommend co-operation with the citizens of Edinburgh to obtain a repeal of this oppressive tax, which amounts, in common risks, to 200 per cent. of the premium. This tax, from which the landlords and their tenants are now totally exempt, prevents numerous insurances, particularly among the lower classes, and hence is the cause of extreme misery in the event of their property being consumed by fire. It is impossible that Parliament can refuse to repeal the tax, if the demand is made by sufficient numbers. Let every town in England and Scotland petition.

IRELAND.

☞ The Orangemen have received a severe defeat by the return of Mr White, a Liberal, for the county of Longford. This county was considered perfectly safe; the Tories, in former elections, having carried it by a majority of 300 or 400. But the insults of Lyndhurst have caused many of the electors to change sides, and hence the result. The numbers, at the close of the poll, were—White, 619; Fox, 526; majority, 93. The notion landlords entertain of their tenants' votes, was finely illustrated at this election. Mr Lovell Edgeworth, who proposed the Orange candidate, said, "He had no hesitation in stating what he himself would do as a landlord. He would say to his Catholic tenants, Vote for me—vote as I vote; and if you don't do so, I will never sign a lease for a Catholic again, or give him the power of voting." Another landlord spoke of being "robbed" of his tenants' votes!

The question of Poor-Laws is exciting much discussion in Ireland. It has been debated before the National Association; but, on the motion of Mr Shiel, the debate was adjourned until the conclusion of the registries of voters. It is impossible that matters can continue on their present footing, because, independently of the misery of the poor Irish, it is unjust towards this country that the wages of labour should be reduced, and a burden thrown on us which should be borne by the Irish landlords. It is quite preposterous, that subscriptions should be constantly raised in Britain for the relief of those whose great cause of misery is the exorbitant rents exacted from them.

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION.—Three Aldermen and fifty-two Common-Councilmen of London were lately admitted members. Subscriptions to the rent continue to flow in, many of them from England.

THE CONTINENT.

FRANCE.—Another unsuccessful attempt has been made on the life of Louis Philippe. In proceeding in a close carriage from the Tuileries on the 27th December, to open the Chamber of Deputies, he was fired at, about fifty yards from the gateway which was the scene of Alibaud's attempt, by a person from behind the line of National Guards. The weapon was a small pistol. The ball broke the glass of the carriage window; and the Duke of Orleans, who, along with the Duke de Nemours and Prince de Joinville, were in the carriage with the King, was slightly wounded in the face by the splinters of the glass. The ball passed through the back of the carriage, not far from where Louis Philippe was sitting. The person who fired the pistol is Meunier, a journeyman saddler, in destitute circumstances. He made no effort to escape, and has expressed no contrition for his offence in prison. This attempt has been very opportune for Ministers, as it has taken public attention off the defeat of the French Army in Africa, and it will probably lengthen their tenure of office. Several newspapers, which maintained that the frequent attacks on Louis Philippe's life arose from his insisting on conducting the government, and not allowing the management of it to rest with his Ministers, have been seized. This is the sort of liberty which exists in France, under a prince who owes his throne to the people!

SPAIN.—The Queen's troops under Espartero, with the assistance of the British, have gained an important advantage over the Carlists. On the 24th December they attacked the Carlists engaged in the siege of Bilboa, and drove them from their camp with great loss, and next day entered the town. 6000 Portuguese have arrived at Vittoria to reinforce General Evans' troops, and his force is to be increased to 15,000 men, to enable him to attack the Carlists in the neighbourhood of St Sebastian, while Espartero presses them in another direction.

HANOVER.—"A Royal Family Law for the Kingdom of Hanover," has been published. It asserts throughout the absolute power of the King, no more notice being taken of the people than if they did not exist.

TRADE, MANUFACTURES, AND COMMERCE.

In the West of England, the masters and workmen in many places have not yet come to any arrangement; and at Preston, Oldham, and other places, many thousands of persons are unemployed. In the potteries, an agreement had nearly been made, but the delegates from other places interfered and prevented it.

The demand for yarns and goods is improving, and matters are in a more satisfactory state than they were a few weeks ago, as it has been found that the mischief, arising from the stoppage of the Joint Stock Banks, is less serious than was anticipated. Our monetary system is not, however, by any means on a sound nor permanent footing, and therefore more embarrassment to our trade and manufactures may be anticipated.

The late resolution of the iron masters to blow out numerous furnaces, will, it is calculated, diminish the produce of iron one-fifth, and keep up the price which the masters have fixed. Such a monopoly as the iron trade, conducted in so barefaced a manner, calls loudly for legislative interference. The heavy duties on foreign iron ought immediately to be repealed. On cast-iron articles it is ten per cent.; on those of wrought iron, twenty per cent.; while bar and pig iron also pay a considerable duty. Bad as the landowners are, they have always encouraged the increase of the produce of the soil within Britain; they have never combined together to limit its production. We, therefore, advise our friends at Sheffield, who are consumers of iron as well as of corn, to attack the iron masters' monopoly, in order that they may obtain the raw material of their manufacture at a moderate rate.

AGRICULTURE.

The wheat crop in Scotland is turning out ill on the thrashing-floor. The wet weather in the latter part of October and in November, followed as it has been by the late snow storm, has almost put an end to agricultural operations. It has also affected severely sheep in exposed districts; and there is much reason to apprehend that the sufferings to which the ewes have been exposed will have an injurious effect at lambing season.

Markets continue high, without any prospect of a fall. The general average price of wheat for England last year, in January, was 36s. 7d.; by the last return, it is 60s. 1 Last year large quantities of meat, and sheep, and cattle, were sent to London from all parts of Scotland; this year it is so scarce, that there is greater probability of our transporting meat from London than sending any to that city. We could obtain excellent meat from Holland, Belgium, and France, at present, and sell it at a good profit in our own markets at 3d. per pound; but to permit such an importation, would endanger the Church and the aristocracy, who are perfectly convinced that the prosperity of the country is promoted by the starvation of the people.

MARCH, 1837.

THE APPROACHING CRISIS.

The Whigs may not be very willing to resign; nor are the considerate and prudent part of the Tories altogether prepared to step into place and enjoy their turn. Both parties would avoid the impending Crisis if they could; the one trusting to Ireland, the chapter of accidents, and a transient gale of popularity, caught from the proposition of one or two Liberal measures; and the other to improving the brief interval afforded, like the last two years, in extending their corrupt influence among the new constituencies, by every means, whether foul or fair. The lapse of a few more months before an election would bring their hordes of new voters into play, and enable them to muster all their mercenaries. But whatever be the secret wishes, or the hopes and fears, of the two aristocratic parties, the crisis is inevitable—and close at hand; and the Radicals will, at the last moment, have neither the praise nor discredit of overturning the Whig Government. They will not even have tacitly acquiesced in its destruction, but the reverse. In its fall it will have retained the support of the Radical representatives, so far as is consistent with their principles and their duty to the people. However it may be with the Reformers in relation to the Whig Ministry, the friends of the latter can have no reason to complain of the factious hostility of the Liberal party. The first numerical defeat that the Ministry has sustained in the session, Ministers owe to the delicate sensitiveness of one of their colleagues. Sir John C. Hobhouse is as free to frustrate a Cabinet measure by desertion, as he is bound to vote against his avowed principles as a Radical Reformer, in pretended obedience to Ministerial etiquette, which imposes such grievous burdens upon conscience. The Radical party, then, is clear of all blame in the approaching event. They have been firm and strenuous supporters of the Government, so far as they could, consistently with higher duties; and if the Whigs are doomed permanently to fall, it must be from inherent weakness, and the growing indifference of the people. The remedy for both causes of the decay of Whig power, has often been pointed out. The Whigs seem, at times, to have a perception of its efficacy; but aristocratic influences and prejudices are powerful against its application—and thus the season is lost. The country is deafened with representations of the difficulties of their position as a middle party. But are not these difficulties altogether of their own creation? The people want, in the administration, no middle party, which can only benefit their enemies; but one that shall cordially unite with the Reformers in Parliament, in obtaining those measures which they consider essential to good government, and to which the difficulties pleaded are but so many obstructions. The real difficulty is disinclination. The lion in the way of the Whigs, is not the hostility of the House of Lords, but the Ballot, Short Parliaments, and a widely-extended Suffrage, which would at once give a House of Commons that would make factious opposition to the People's wishes, wherever it arose, a very slight thing. If the matter were fairly stated, it should be described as the difficulty which the Whigs experience to maintain themselves in power, by means of the People, whose will and interest they oppose in the most pressing and important of all measures. It might easily then be understood. Their difficulties with the Radical Reformers are more formidable than with the Tories, only because with them they appear to cuncur in more and greater points. The out-lying portion of the purely Whig party are, however, beginning to feel, that, if a Whig Government be to exist much longer, it must consent to the removal of some of those self-created difficulties. The question of Ballot has made considerable way among such persons, since it has been divined that, however un-English it may be, and otherwise objectionable, it is necessary to the existence of the Ministry. The same conviction will force itself either into the Cabinet, or, as probably, into a Whig Opposition. And for this we may not have long to wait. The Irish Municipal Bill has become the point of honour with the Government. Lord John Russell cannot flinch here; and a collision which forces the Ministry to resign, is the unavoidable consequence. Even if the Peers, rejecting the bold counsels of their favourite Captain, should descend one step towards conciliating Ireland, and try to Sauter la coupe, the Ministers cannot fall into the snare. The country would not permit misconception, nor tolerate compromise. There must be the bill in its integrity or none. Nor, to do the Government justice, would it submit to disgrace upon this chosen question. By it the Whigs stand or fall. Is, then, their immediate fall, temporary as it may prove, a matter of longer dubiety? Their recovery is more doubtful; yet, fortunate as they have been in so many fortuitous circumstances, that remains in their own power. Formerly, the Liberal Reformers rallied in their defence. They are still as willing and more able to act as their allies. On the eve of the Crisis, on the verge of ruin, the Whigs have only to avow some leading principle of government, and some important and practical object, worthy of, and demanding union among Reformers, and to adopt a common creed, and a common watch-word, to combine all orders of Reformers, to the utmost extremes of Radicalism. Will they do this until driven to it? We doubt it.

Since the opening of the present Session, the Government has not shewn less liberality than formerly. Several good measures, though of a neutral character, have been proposed; and Lord John Russell has improved the Tory respite granted him, to catch a little popularity by flashes of spirit, which are ever so delightful to the people when directed against the Tories. The Ministerial press, always complimentary, is thrown into an ecstasy of admiration by such fiery out-breaks; and an ebullition of personal feeling, into which the Minister is stung by the insolence of rivals, but comprehending no principle, and leading to nothing, is lauded as if some great and permanent measure of reform had obtained his support.

Through the medium of the Ministerial organs, and before the opening of the Session, a stupid and dishonest threat of coalition between the Whigs and the Tories, was held out to the Radical Reformers. This, like the spirit displayed upon one or two occasions, has reacted momentarily in favour of Ministers; and, at this moment, a sort of negative merit is attributed to Lord John Russell, and one or two of his colleagues, for not rushing into the embraces of Sir Robert Peel and Lord Stanley, in revenge of the discontent of the Radicals with the tardy progress of such Reforms as have been acknowledged necessary, and with the reluctance displayed by the Cabinet to confess the necessity of those which the Reformers consider the most essential of all. Whig blindness has often been lamented; but the Whigs of this day are not so stone-blind but that they have a glimmering perception that, of all forms of destruction which can overtake them, a coalition with the Tories would be the most complete and irretrievable.

If, in past and worse times of our history, such unprincipled and degrading leagues to retain power and emolument, have been considered as hateful and odious combinations against the people, what would be thought of them now? The Tories are also well aware of the contemptible nature of such alliances in the eyes of all honest men. Sir Robert Peel does not invite the adhesion of Whig subalterns; and he is in the right. Save to grace his triumphal car, of what good could they be? What has the defection of Lord Stanley and Sir James Graham, with the small fry they led, profited the Tory party, though such vaulting hopes were placed in their accession—what beyond their personal and family interest as landlords? They have rather embarrassed their adopted chief than aided him. Peel, save for their aristocratic connexions, and their corrupting power among electors, would not have a gift of all the talent and eloquence the Whig deserters could bring him. The odium of so infamous a defection would greatly counterbalance every other advantage. With what patience would the country endure a Ministry formed of the basest ingredients of all former Governments, coalescing on the principle of stopping all improvement—one part of which must be despised by the consistent Tories, while the whole was hated by the Reformers? A plausible, conforming Tory Ministry would ultimately be more dangerous to the interests of the People, worn out with agitation, and desiring repose, than that rope of sand, which could not hold together for a month, a Whig and Tory Coalition Ministry.

The menace of such an infliction we hold in utter scorn. There is at present no choice, save between the ancient "constitutional parties;" though it is quite as evident that the new, the Third party, has already attained the place of umpire, and is enabled to pronounce which of the other two shall enjoy power, in which they desire no active participation. This singular state of things must continue until the House of Commons be effectually purified, and become in reality what it is in name, the representative of the interests and will of the whole people. Nothing short of beginning at the foundation, can remove those obstacles which stand between the sincere and uncompromising Radicals and the doors of the Cabinet. A coalition of Radicals and mere Whigs is more improbable than the union of Conservatives and party Whigs; and, in the present state of affairs, is quite as much to be deprecated, since, without a sacrifice of principle, it is impossible. No enlightened Reformer can wish to see the public virtue of any Radical statesman submitted to the perilous ordeal of a gagged and shackled Cabinet, whose members must either extinguish their consciences or cease to draw their pay. The place of the Radical leaders is still in the House of Commons, and neither in Cabinets nor Privy Councils. It is, therefore, no soreness at the studied neglect of those gentlemen that influences us.

The Reformers ought rather to be gratified in witnessing the powerful position which the men who represent their opinions have assumed in the State, and in a Peel-Parliament. If they cannot be, or should not choose to be Ministers, they can make the thing they would not become. In England it is now King, Lords, Commons, and RADICALS; the two latter soon to be blended in one, whatever fate may await the second branch. With nothing like concert, and without much tact or experience as a mere party, the Radicals have, in the present Session, simply by a firm adherence to their principles—each man for himself—made a marked and honourable progress, and a strong impression upon the country. Is a minority of 92, in a thin house, for excluding the Bishops from Parliament—or rather for relieving them altogether from the turmoil of politics, and permitting them to give undivided attention to spiritual concerns—no triumph? A few years back, Mr Lushington and his 91 adherents would have been denounced as Infidels and Atheists. The victory on Sir William Molesworth's motion for abolishing the invidious property qualification for Members of Parliament was equally decided. Whigs and Tories combined defeat the Radicals—deserted, too, by many loose-jointed, professing Reformers—only by so narrow a majority as 29! These results exceed our expectations.

When Mr Grote's persevering test, the Ballot question, comes on, he may expect a far greater number of votes than upon former trials, when studied pains were taken to discredit and defeat his measure. It would not be very surprising if he this time should catch a stray vote from the Cabinet; or that, at the least, some of its Liberal members should be absent from the division. For the late rapid progress of the Ballot question, there are various causes. Some who would have opposed the principle of protecting dependent men, in voting "according to their inclination," begin to discover that this practice is the only means available in the county constituencies to neutralize or swamp the swarms of fictitious and compulsory Tory votes. With the Ministerial journalists, especially in the provinces, the necessity of Ballot to the Whigs, has perceptibly, within the last few months, advanced that measure. An equally favourable reception of Mr Hume's motion for the extension of the suffrage to householders is not yet to be anticipated. That act of justice must be waited for. It is not felt to be necessary to the Whig party at elections, and it might be found seriously detrimental to them, unless they shall enlarge their views. Besides, upon the question of extended suffrage, many of the class possessing ten, twenty, thirty, and fifty pound qualifications, and calling themselves Reformers, are quite as jealous and exclusive as the aristocracy, and as desirous as the Whigs to prolong the season of the People's pupilage. Yet the non-electors are neither without influence nor friends in the House of Commons. To them the Radical members for the large towns and populous counties are half indebted for their seats; and they are quite aware of this, as also that the young and spirited non-electors of 1837 must, to a considerable extent, become the actual electors of future years, although the franchise should not be extended. Thus, Mr Hume's motion, an important one in the experimental list of the Radical leaders, will probably command, under the wholesome fear of a dissolution, a fair array of supporters.

Whatever be the result of the Crisis, it is not easy to believe that Sir Robert Peel will have the temerity to venture upon office with the fagend of a Parliament which baffled him in its most hopeful stage, and when plastic and fresh from Tory hands. Whether, therefore, we are to have a Whig or Tory Government, an election is probable; and for that the Reformers must be prepared, with all the means they have yet gained. The smaller these may be, there is the greater necessity for both using and husbanding them as circumstances demand.

Though we scout the idea of reaction against the principles of reform, or of growing indifference to those substantial and durable improvements in government which come home to men's hearths and pockets—supineness to Whig party interests cannot be denied; and its consequences may be severely felt at the next election. If any part of the People who are controlled by their landlords and patrons in trade, are to be roused to another sacrifice, they must be distinctly shewn what they are to gain by it—not to Lord Melbourne's Government, but to their country and their posterity. Those who have already suffered so much for a chimera, must have some tangible good presented to them—something to have and to hold. If they are to strain their sinews in another strong pull, they must be assured that it is the last. What equivalent for their manifold exertions are the Whigs prepared to offer to the people of England and Scotland, or what inducement and stimulus to renew a battle which brings the People neither glory nor gain?

The mere event of Whig discomfiture will rouse many generous sympathies: the consideration the government has shewn for Ireland has given a favourable impression of their enlightened policy, and of their benevolence towards that worse than neglected country; their church-rate extinction bill—for we hope that may be its title—will, perhaps, be calculated to beget confidence and gratitude among the large and influential body of the Dissenters. But something besides all these hopes and prospective benefits is requisite to kindle the whole mass of the people to anything approaching the intense enthusiasm of the exciting days of the Reform Bill; and to fuse them, as then, into one compact and energetic body, against which aristocratic resistance was hopeless. There is hardly one measure that could be relied upon to produce this electrical effect, save returning to the same grand principle—a thorough Representative Reform, secured by the Ballot and an Extension of the Suffrage; thus making effectual that which has hitherto been counteracted or eluded by Tory art and influence, aided by Whig connivance and submission. Are the Ministers prepared for this?—for nothing short of it can give them that strength and stability in the next Parliament which alone can render them either useful to their friends or formidable to their enemies. The country requires a vigorous Administration, but one which shall be strong only in its strength, and which shall sympathize in its wishes and requirements. At former elections, the favourite candidates of the Whigs have been individuals unscrupulously devoted to the party, with a convenient laxity of principle as to the measures which might either be rejected or patronised by the Government— sort of out-cabinet men, ready to vote, on the signal; though violent Reformers, where no particular abuse was, in earnest, proposed to be reformed. Some of them are Radicals also, except upon a very few points, which, unhappily, are all vital ones. These are the kind of persons who conceive that the Ministers, for the time being, ought to possess the initiative in every legislative measure—an abuse and usurpation now tacitly submitted to by all parties—and that the representatives of the People are in their fit place when acting as their subalterns. This species of candidates, whether enjoying office or languishing in expectancy, will no longer find acceptance with genuine Reformers. They have been but too often tolerated in former elections. The "government candidate" will now be found to have lost his vantage ground in many localities. If he possess no better claim, he is entitled to stand only a degree higher than the "Tory candidate."

In the struggle between aristocracy and democracy, which has become so animated since the Reform Bill took form and likelihood, the trifling skirmish with the Lords is but an affair of pickets—an episode in the grand epic movement. At present, the controversy with the Peers is almost forgotten in higher interests. Men feel more and more the necessity of beginning in earnest at the beginning; and of fixing among the constituencies, and in the House of Commons, that lever which shall peacefully remove all obstructions, as soon as its fair action is unimpeded. To this point should every effort of stanch Reformers be directed. It is in the House of Commons, and in the next Parliament, that, short of revolution, the cause of freedom and of social amelioration must either be rapidly advanced or retarded for an incalculable period. It is, therefore, upon every consideration, the bounden and immediate duty of electors and non-electors to bestir themselves, to secure, if not the purest imaginable, yet the best possible House of Representatives. Though the aristocratic factions may mutually dread the crisis, the Reformers have no cause for doubt or discouragement. Their invincible strength lies in their fixity of principle and earnestness of purpose. To these, if there be joined the discretion, wisdom, and forbearance necessary to every union, who shall gainsay them?

On his broad brow a darkness, as of night,
Falls deep; and in the horrid gloom, Despair
Scowls stern and voiceless; through the blacken'd air
The parting eagle takes her latest flight,
And her spread pinions hide the sun. Alone
He stands beneath their shadow, every limb
Fixed, rigid, as if harden'd into stone;
And the dark eye, without a motion—dim
As his who sees a spectre 'mid the gloom
Of midnight graves! Around him the loud rush
Of struggling armies, and the unceasing boom
Of the dread cannon, break not on the hush
Of his rapt spirit. In a silent place,
Willows bend o'er a tomb; he hears the flow
Of a clear fountain, that, with stealthy pace,
Winds calmly in the parching sun's fierce glow——
Hark! 'mid the panting battle's stormiest glee,
Mingles the rushing sound of the wild sea!

LETITIA.

(DIED AT ROME, 2d FEBRUARY 1836.)

(From the German, Morgen-Blatt, 9th May 1836.)

It lingered! Hath it come at last,
The summons of thy doom?
Thou heart, where lay so many dead,
As in a living tomb!
Strong one, whose life embraced a grief
For which a thousand years were brief!

Where was there sorrow like to thine?
Thy looks were ever bent
Upon the ship, upon the sea,
The island and its tent,
The grave o'erhung with willows hoary,
Where ignominy wedded glory.

Oh, pride! the mother's victory,
How deep, how deep it fell!
That which thy closed lips concealed,
Thy silence deigned to tell:—
The eagle lies with plumage torn—
Alas! he seemed almighty born.

Thy very name was mockery—
Of gladsome days it told:
Thou mightst have scoffed with bitter mirth,
Like Naomi of old:
"Upon my gladness misery came,
And bitterness is now my name."

Full well they named thee—Niobe!
Like fate, she had with thee:
Thou saw'st thy race of noble sons
All blooming at thy knee:
Their noblest passed away:—and then
The rest were homeless, banished men.

The deepest is the silent grief
Which never tears hath known:
So stoodst thou, motionless, unbent,
A monument of stone,
But half enlivened by a rose
Which sprang to wither among snows.

So stoodst thou, like a giant-shape
From mightier times of man,
Lone in this pigmy age which shares
With thee but this—its ban—
The doom of hovering like a ghost
O'er strength, and pride, and glory lost!

LORD WHARNCLIFFE'S LIFE AND WRITINGS OF LADY MARY WORTLEY.*

Lord Wharncliffe, and the long-extended and widely-ramified lines of Stuarts and Wortleys, have merit in the pride which they take in the talents of their remarkable grand-dame—a lady in whose eccentric character, and acute and brilliant mind, though there might be little to love, there was much to admire and something to respect.

The house of Stafford or Sutherland claim honour from their kinsman, "ancient Gower;" the noble family of Spencer derive lustre from the alliance of the author of the "Fairy Queen:" and Lady Mary possessed genius and wit to vivify and illustrate a more obtuse mass of aristocracy than that which claims descent from one whose celebrated name is now classic in English literature, and who would have stood much higher were it possible to obliterate every personal impression and moral sentiment when judging of a favourite writer, and that writer a woman. Discarding altogether the venomous libels of Pope, and the flippant slanders of Horace Walpole—whose malicious pen, in relation to Lady Mary Wortley, was a retributive instrument, punishing her memory in the self-same sort that, in her vivacious youth, she had so often sinned—there will still remain but too much evidence of the inherent defects of a character combined of the most extraordinary elements. The fertile source of the errors and misfortunes of Lady Mary was a neglected or bad moral education, and an entire want of natural sensibility. Walpole enumerates the intrigues of Lady Mary, and her gallantries up to her sixtieth year! Those infamous calumnies generally carry their own refutation in their face; but, whether admitting or denying the lady's unparalleled depravity and profligacy from youth to old age, it is impossible to deny that Lady Mary Wortley never loved any human being in the whole course of her life, beyond the instincts of a mother for her babe in infancy; and that nature, which had so lavishly gifted her with a head, had altogether withheld that nobler part of female anatomy, a feeling heart, or a heart of any kind. Her curious letters, written in maidenhood, to Mr Wortley, her future husband, give the key to her whole character. Never was a head so shrewd and aiming to be calculating, yet missing true wisdom, set upon the shoulders of a girl of twenty. Her natural vivacity and vanity, the impetuosity of her lively mind, and the temptations of her position in society, were continually hurrying her into errors and indiscretions, while no strong or generous affection, no virtuous sensibility, acted as a check or counterpoise. Those persons who, like Lady Mary Wortley, never say foolish things and rarely do wise ones, will generally be found to possess a quick and penetrative judgment of the affairs of life, together with a deplorable want of those feelings which are the best support of duty, and of those principles which alone can steadily regulate conduct.

Lady Mary, who never made a false judgment where her passions did not interfere, says, in her old age and exile, that the great world was grown better than in her younger years. We hope she was right; for a more corrupted, ignorant, and ignoble society than that in which she moved, as it is depicted in her letters, and by the other oracles of the period—Chesterfield, Doddington, and Horace Walpole—cannot easily be imagined. Those who would paint the inherent vices and tendencies of the English aristocratical system, should not turn over the trumpery of modern fashionable novels, but at once refer to the unimpeached records of those competent witnesses. But this, happily, is not our present duty.

If time can never wholly separate the lees and feculence of Lady Mary Wortley's effusions from the wine which gladdens and the spirit which stimulates, its lapse now enables us to partake of the mingled draught without danger, and of the pure with increased enjoyment. The truth is, that, with their alloy of witty malice, inexpressible coarseness, and unpardonable levity and exaggeration, these are not only brilliant and charming volumes, as the world well knows, but they also contain a mine of solid wisdom and profound reflection, which, we apprehend, remains to be explored. This excellence is principally found in the series of letters to her daughter, the Countess of Bute, written in the last years of Lady Mary's life and of her exile, when her mind had mellowed and her wit refined, without losing one particle of original strength or brightness. If Lady Mary ever loved any creature after the ordinary manner of women, it was, in old age, her respectable daughter. Even this affection seems to have come with time and reflection, and not by force of blood or tenderness of heart. In her child's eyes she wished to appear deserving of respect; and, play the fool where she would, it was never in the knowledge of her husband or her daughter. The entire correspondence with Lady Bute is distinguished by calm good sense and considerate kindness—by more than the talent and all the graces of style of the early letters. But we must come to the author and the edition.

Lady Mary Pierrepont was born in 1690. Her father, then Earl, was afterwards Duke of Kingston. It was probably her first misfortune to lose her mother in childhood. The Earl was a gay, fashionable, dissipated man, who occasionally amused himself with his babies while they were playthings, but who neither felt serious affection for his children, nor took any interest in their education or improvement. He was wholly devoted to his own pleasures; and his daughter, who at no time was a hypocrite, in after life, returned his indifference with interest; when "Sir Charles Grandison" appeared, although Lady Mary would not allow the author to have any knowledge whatever of high life and high-lived manners, she said that, in Sir Thomas, the father, she recognised her father; and when that father died in the midst of a scolding-match, by his bedside, between Lady Mary and her young stepmother, while he was actually expiring, she wrote her sister, Lady Mar, who felt or pretended deeper affliction:—"I am unfeignedly sorry that I cannot send word of a good legacy. . . . . I am very sorry for your past illness and affliction; though, au bout du compte, I don't see why filial piety should exceed fatherly fondness. So much by way of consolation." Lady Mary carried this philosophy of exact balances into every connection of life, and seldom erred upon the side of paying too much love or gratitude.

After all that has been said of her classic education, her learning, and it was not much, appears to have been scrambled up by native aptitude and cleverness. She often lamented her neglected education. Of Greek she knew nothing; and, if Voltaire's theory be true, that ladies write so much better than men because they don't understand Latin, Lady Mary's knowledge of that language was not so comprehensive as to injure her natural style. Reading, her earliest pleasure and her last, was her chief means of improvement in the dismal seclusion of her father's country seat, where her neglected sisters and herself consoled each other with the idea of how happy they should be when they were married! After her singular courtship with Mr Wortley, the Earl rejected that gentleman as his son-in-law, because he would not agree to settle his estates upon the eldest son of the marriage; Wortley pleading, against the rule of primogeniture, the commonsense argument of settling large property upon an unborn creature, who, if born, might turn out a fool or a villain. His son justified his sense and caution by turning out both; but the Earl, who did not understand such novel refinements, settled that "his grandson should not be a beggar;" and Lady Mary, without pretending to those tender sentiments which other girls call love, eloped with her lover. It does not appear in this work, but the anecdote is well-known, of Lady Mary very characteristically relating to Pope, or Congreve, or we forget whom, that, having two admirers, she balanced for a whole month between them; and was only determined by her father deciding against Mr Wortley, with whom she accordingly "scuttled off, one morning, to be married." The union, first and last, was certainly anything but happy or congenial. As a lover, Mr Wortley had not been blind. He admired this clever, volatile, and pretty young woman, so superior in understanding and knowledge to her fair contemporaries, almost in spite of his better judgment; and married with a full consciousness of the perils of the lot he had been constrained to choose by that over-ruling destiny in which Lady Mary became a believer. This was a bad beginning; but the good sense of both parties prevented anything like a disgraceful rupture; and, if Lady Mary was utterly indifferent to her husband, she at least respected his strong character, and was devoted to interests so intimately interwoven with her own. From his penurious disposition, which degenerated at last into confirmed avarice, Lady Mary could not have personally suffered; as she participated, though (notwithstanding Walpole's calumnies) probably in a much less degree, of the same temper. It was then, as now, but too much the habit of the great world and the small, to confound selfish prodigality with generosity of disposition, and to be less merciful to those whose sole pleasure is in hoarding, than to the equally despicable persons whose reckless and selfish delight is mischievous, unprincipled squandering. Walpole, who doubtless imagined himself far above the sordid, was, nevertheless, of a mean disposition; but he chose to hoard cracked tea-cups and enamels, instead of crowns and guineas; and was fertile and almost dishonest in small stratagems and shifts to gratify his fribble propensities at the cheapest possible rate. Our respect for Walpole's judgment of Lady Mary, even if we were satisfied of his truth, is greatly diminished by finding that, in his moral scale, every vice and foible is put upon a par. A soiled or an unfashionable dress is as iniquitous as cheating at play, or as indecency in language, impudence, avarice, and the most abandoned impurity which he attributed to her.

Lady Mary spent the first years of her married life chiefly in the country; but, as soon as Mr Wortley—a zealous supporter of the Whigs—obtained a place in the government, she came to London, and burst forth a bel esprit and a beauty; though for the latter quality she was, if we may judge from the portrait, mainly indebted to the kindness of her flatterers. She was soon known to Congreve and Addison, and flattered and complimented by Pope. After all that has been said about her connexion with Pope, we must confess that the evidence of the most malignant hatred between those celebrated personages is much stronger than any proof which remains of their mutual regard or respect. The vanity of the lady was gratified by the attentions and homage of a man so celebrated; and the poet, for a little time, may have had his brain excited, if not absolutely turned, by the attentions of a sprightly and pretty woman, distinguished in fashionable life, and the only blue stocking of her age. But this was before the proper era of blue stockings. We shall not debase the name of friendship or respectful esteem, by bestowing it upon this species of intercourse. Lady Mary, always too apt to be abrupt and insolent, if not, as Walpole asserts, impudent, soon despised the deformed man and low-born poet, and made no secret of her contempt; and Pope, heartily despising himself as a dupe and a fool, never, probably, forgave either himself or the lady, though his malignant revenge was taken solely of the latter. Besides being a wit and a coquette, Lady Mary was an out-and-out aristocrat. To her dying hour she spoke with the utmost contempt of the birth and station of Pope, Swift, and Richardson, and exceedingly regretted that she had ever stooped to grace low people with her favour. When an old, reflecting woman, she writes this homily to her daughter :—

It has long been the endeavour of our English writers, to represent people of quality as the vilest and silliest part of the nation, being (generally) very low born themselves. I am not surprised at their propagating this doctrine; but I am much mistaken if this levelling principle does not, one day or other, break out in fatal consequences to the public, as it has already done in many private families. You will think I am influenced by living under an aristocratic government, where distinction of rank is carried to a very great height; but I can assure you my opinion is founded on reflection and experience, and I wish to God I had always thought in the same manner. Though I had ever the utmost contempt for mis-alliances, yet the silly prejudices of my education had taught me to believe that I was to treat nobody as an inferior, and that poverty was a degree of merit: this imaginary humility has made me admit many familiar acquaintances, of which I have heartily repented every one; and the greatest examples I have known of honour and integrity have been among those of the highest birth and fortunes.

Unfortunately for her readers, Lady Mary has left them few or no examples of this sort in her writings, and very many of an opposite sort.

On whatever footing her intercourse with Pope was begun, it could neither have been at any time very close nor long continued. Previous to the embassy to Constantinople, she had lived but little in London, and the coldness and quarrel ensued soon after her return to England, the friendship not being able to survive so near a contact as a residence at Twickenham. While abroad, Pope had addressed a few high-flown and studiedly complimentary epistles to her Ladyship; who, in return, transmitted to him one or two of her charming letters from the Levant. We should require no better proof of Pope's indifference to Lady Mary, than his love-letters, which were mere essays in rhetoric and composition.

Lady Mary afterwards gave the best colouring, for herself, to Pope's implacable indignation, by relating, that, when the crooked bard one day rather abruptly made violent love to her, she, in spite of her utmost endeavours to look angry and grave, burst into an immoderate fit of laughter. It may have been so. Yet Pope hated her more congenial friend, Lord Hervey, quite as much as herself. He found "they had too much wit for him, and could do with their wit many things he could not do with his." He did not even spare Mr Wortley, while he studiously complimented Lady Hervey. The malignity of Pope in this instance exceeds forgiveness—he degraded himself in pursuing a mean revenge; but this does not palliate the insolence and treachery of those who betrayed him into a ridiculous position, only to overwhelm him with contempt. The intimacy of Lady Mary and Lord Hervey will not bear too severe a scrutiny. If we smile at the affected, high-flown inditings of Pope, what shall we say to the freedom and profligate tone of the letter addressed to her from Bath by her associate wit? After their quarrel, Lady Mary would no more allow talent to Pope, than he would any virtue or feminine quality to her. He became but too truly "the wicked wasp of Twickenham;" but he was also to her "the nightingale, all sound and no sense." The portraits of Avidien and his wife* were expiated by her retorts of the avarice of the poet. Very late in life, Lord Orrery's Life of Swift fell into Lady Mary's hands while abroad. The Dean, whom she hated as a Tory writer, but far more as the chosen friend of Pope, was certainly no admirer of her Ladyship nor her kind. She writes—

His character seems to me a parallel with that of Caligula; and had he had the same power, would have made the same use of it. That emperor erected a temple to himself, where he was his own high-priest, preferred his horse to the highest honours in the state, professed enmity to the human race, and at last lost his life by a nasty jest on one of his inferiors, which I dare swear Swift would have made in his place. There can be no worse picture made of the Doctor's morals than he has given us himself in the letters printed by Pope. We see him vain, trifling, ungrateful to the memory of his patron, that of Lord Oxford, making a servile court where he had any interested views, and meanly abusive when they were disappointed, and, as he says, (in his own phrase,) flying in the face of mankind, in company with his adorer Pope. It is pleasant to consider, that, had it not been for the good nature of these very mortals they contemn, these two superior beings were entitled, by their birth and hereditary fortune, to be only a couple of link-boys. I am of opinion their friendship would have continued, though they had remained in the same kingdom: it had a very strong foundation—the love of flattery on one side, and the love of money on the other. Pope courted with the utmost assiduity all the old men from whom he could hope a legacy, the Duke of Buckingham, Lord Peterborough, Sir G. Kneller, Lord Bolingbroke, Mr Wycherly, Mr Congreve, Lord Harcourt, &c.; and, I do not doubt, projected to sweep the Dean's whole inheritance, if he could have persuaded him to throw up his deanery, and come to die in his house; and his general preaching against money was meant to induce people to throw it away, that he might pick it up. There cannot be a stronger proof of his being capable of any action for the sake of gain, than publishing his literary correspondence, which lays open such a mixture of dulness and iniquity, that one would imagine it visible even to his most passionate admirers.

It is but fair to say that Pope denied in plain terms his libels upon Lord Hervey and Lady Mary—the Sporus and Sappho with which his works are often disfigured; and that some of Lady Mary's friends, or her early biographers, have been but too desirous to establish an identity, which, therefore, few persons now question. The lady and gentleman in conjunction took their revenge in kind for the offensive and abominable verses in Pope's translation of the First Satire of the Second Book of Horace. The writer of the "Introductory Anecdotes" to this edition, who is either a lady, or commands at

* This is Pope's family portrait of the Wortleys:—

"Avidien and his wife, (no matter which;
For him you call a dog, and her a bitch,)
Sell their presented partridges and fruits,
And humbly live on rabbits and on roots.
One half-pint bottle serves them both to dine,
And is at once their vinegar and wine;
But on some lucky day, (as when they found
A lost bank-bill, or heard their son was drowned,)
At such a feast, old vinegar to spare,
Is what two souls so generous cannot bear;
Oil, though it stinks, they drop by drop impart,
But souse the cabbage with a bounteous heart."

will many of the light, peculiar graces which hover round a lady's pen, would have suppressed them altogether. Lord Wharncliffe has, very properly, restored them. They are, the provocation considered, far from offensive; and, at any rate, it would be straining at a gnat and swallowing a camel, to omit these verses in a collection so rich and racy as this.

We have rather anticipated the events of Lady Mary's life. In the third or fourth year of her marriage, she accompanied her husband to Constantinople, he having been appointed Envoy to the Sublime Porte.

From a very early age, Lady Mary had been in the practice of keeping a journal; and, in this manner, she daily noted all that she heard, saw, or observed, and afterwards leisurely drew from these materials that lively and delightful narrative of her travels transmitted to her friends in England in the form of letters. This favourite portion of her writings has long been in the hands of the world, which will never part with it. It, therefore, requires neither notice nor eulogy. The writer of the Introductory Anecdotes successfully, as we think, vindicates Lady Mary's memory from the charge of wilful falsehood in the eastern letters, and particularly in her pretended admission into the royal harem, which she not only never did assert, but the direct reverse, as her letters themselves establish. The malicious story of the Sultan honouring the wife of the British ambassador with the handkerchief, she herself imputed to Pope. It was, in all probability, one of those impudent laughing jests, peculiar alike to the freedom of very high and very low life, of which sort of pleasantries Lady Mary was herself quite capable; but never meant to be seriously believed, though, if the simple were hoaxed, it was so much the better, and gave tenfold piquancy to the witty story.

After her return to England, Lady Mary's correspondence with her sister, the Countess of Mar, commenced. That lady was then in France with her husband, in a kind of honourable exile. Though Lady Mary's early letters shew a satirical and hard disposition, and something which often rather resembles straining at wit, than its easy, natural flow, they are comparatively refined, and even decorous, when the next familiar series comes in play, and when ten years had been added to her life, and her fashionable and gallant experiences. We are far from thinking the epistles to Lady Mar, Lady Mary's wittiest letters, and are dull enough not to perceive much of the brilliancy which she said would make this correspondence as much admired as Madame de Sevigné's in forty years; yet we are tempted, before selecting a few extracts, to give Walpole's opinion of those sprightly effusions of sisterly affection and confidence. He sets out by inquiring of his friend, Sir Horace Mann, the Resident at Florence—

> Did you receive the questions I asked you about Lady Mary Wortley's being confined by a lover which she keeps somewhere in the Brescian? I long to know the particulars. I have lately been at Woburn, where the Duchess of Bedford borrowed for me, from a niece of Lady Mary, about fifty of her letters. They are charming! have more spirit and vivacity than you can conceive, and as much of the spirit of debauchery in them as you will conceive in her writings. They were written to her sister, the unfortunate Lady Mar, whom she treated so hardly when out of her senses. Ten of the letters, indeed, are dismal lamentations and frights on a scene of villany of Lady Mary, who, having persuaded one Ruremonde, a Frenchman, and her lover, to entrust her with a large sum of money to buy stock for him, frightened him out of England, by persuading him that Mr Wortley had discovered the intrigue and would murder him, and then would have sunk the trust. That not succeeding, and he threatening to print her letters, she endeavoured to make Lord Mar or Lord Stair cut his throat. Pope hints at these anecdotes of her history in that line—
> "Who starves a sister or denies a debt."
> In one of her letters, she says—"We all partake of Father Adam's folly and knavery, who first eat the apple like a sot, and then turned informer like a scoundrel." This is character at least, if not very delicate; but in most of them the wit and style are superior to any I ever read but Madame Sevigné's. It is very remarkable how much better women write than men!

Many of the statements in the above passage are either explained or denied by the writer of the Introductory Anecdotes, and, among others, the hard treatment of Lady Mar, which is not understood, any more than the lover in the Brescian, kept by a lady then of sixty-one years! The Frenchman is a more difficult text. Lady Mary's correspondence with her sister about this troublesome person, is now first printed in the appendix; nine, not ten letters, as Walpole states. This Ruremonde, evidently a scoundrel and an adventurer, knew much better how to deal with coquettes and fine ladies, and to pursue a bonne fortune, to the advantage of his purse, than "the wicked wasp of Twickenham." Lady Mary, by imprudence, which, the worthless character of the man considered, was more than ordinarily degrading and disgraceful, placed herself in the power of this chevalier d'industrie, who seems to have followed her to England proclaiming violent, irresistible love. To requite so vehement and disinterested a passion, Lady Mary, who dabbled in such matters upon her own account, did something in South-Sea Stock for the benefit of her admirer, which turned out well, but tried again and lost. This loss he vowed that she should make good, at the peril of publishing their correspondence. Her admirer told everywhere that the lady had borrowed the money from him to carry on her own money-making speculations, and would not sustain the loss she had incurred, amounting to £500. Lady Mary writes in terror and agony, which is truly pitiable, on this degrading subject; but as to the money, she probably gives the true version of the affair; and Walpole's tale is another calumny. She had recourse to the intervention of Lady Stafford, a favourite friend; and, it is probable, a lettre-de-cachet would not have been at all unacceptable. Instead, however, of her compelling the admirer to leave England by threats of Mr Wortley's vengeance, he would seem to have threatened her with making his pecuniary claims known to her husband. We may cite a passage here, as an example to ladies of the comparative safety of accepting lovers, like Pope, who only write euphuisms, rather than bold cavaliers like Ruremonde:—

I am now at Twickenham: 'tis impossible to tell you, dear sister, what agonies I suffer every post-day; my health really suffers so much from my fears, that I have reason to apprehend the worst consequences. If that monster acted on the least principles of reason, I should have nothing to fear, since 'tis certain that, after he has exposed me, he will get nothing by it. Mr Wortley can do nothing for his satisfaction I am not willing to do myself. I desire not the least indulgence of any kind. Let him put his affair into the hands of any lawyer whatever. I am willing to submit to any examination; 'tis impossible to make a fairer offer than this is: whoever he employs may come to me hither on several pretences. I desire nothing from him, but that he would send no letters or messages to my house at London, where Mr Wortley now is. I am come hither in hopes of benefit from the air, but I carry my distemper about me in an anguish of mind that visibly decays my body every day. I am too melancholy to talk of any other subject. Let me beg you (dear sister) to take some care of this affair, and think you have it in your power to do more than save the life of a sister that loves you.

I send you, dear sister, by Lady Lansdown, this letter, accompanied with the only present that was ever sent me by that monster. I beg you to return it immediately. I am told he is preparing to come to London.

We certainly hear nothing whatever of the friendly offices of Lord Stair or Lord Mar being solicited in cutting the Frenchman's throat; but, in spite of her noble descendant's generous defence, we do think her Ladyship's temper was at this time up to something very near assassination. It must be confessed that she had received no little provocation.

As soon as I hear he is in London, and if he dares to give me any further trouble, I shall take care to have him rewarded in a stronger manner than he expects; there is nothing more true than this; and I solemnly swear, that, if all the credit or money that I have in the world can do it, either for friendship or hire, I shall not fail to have him used as he deserves; and, since I know his journey can only be intended to expose me, I shall not value what noise is made. Perhaps you may prevent it; I leave you to judge of the most proper method; 'tis certain no time should be lost; fear is his predominant passion, and I believe you may fright him from coming hither, where he will certainly find a reception very disagreeable to him.

How Lady Mary finally got out of this scrape, does not appear; but her letters to Mons. Ruremonde never were printed. This person seems to have made a faction against her in Paris, among ladies who would easily have forgiven her gallantry, but not her imputed avarice and impudent dishonesty.

The disparaging praise of Walpole alone is sufficient to excite curiosity about the correspondence with Lady Mar. Among the best specimens of "the spirit, vivacity, and debauchery," which he has eulogised, are the following:—

London was never more gay than it is at present: but I don't know how, I would fain be ten years younger; I love flattery so well, I would fain have some circumstances of probability added to it, that I might swallow it with comfort. The reigning Duchess of Marlborough has entertained the town with concerts of Bononcini's composition very often: but she and I are not in that degree of friendship to have me often invited: we continue to see one another like two people who are resolved to hate with civility. Sophia is going to Aix la Chapelle, and from thence to Paris. I dare swear she'll endeavour to get acquainted with you. We are broke to an irremediable degree. Various are the persecutions I have endured this winter, in all which I remain neuter, and shall certainly go to Heaven from the passive meekness of my temper. Lady Lansdown is in that sort of figure here, nobody cares to appear with her. Madame Villette has been the favourite of the town, and by a natural transition is grown the aversion; she has now nobody attached to her suite but the vivacious Lord Bathurst,* with whom I have been well and ill ten times within two months: we now hardly speak to one another.—I wish you would lay out part of my money in a made-up mantua and petticoat of Rat de St. Martin. It will be no trouble to you to send a thing of that nature by the first travelling lady.

At this instant I am at Twickenham; Mr Wortley has purchased the small habitation where you saw me. We propose to make some small alterations. That and the education of my daughter are my chief amusements. I hope yours is well, et ne fait que croître et embellir. I beg you would let me hear soon from you; and particularly if the approaching coronation at Paris raises the price of diamonds. I have some to sell, and cannot dispose of them here. I am afraid you have quite forgot my plain lutestring, which I am in great want of; and I can hardly think you miss opportunities to send it. At this dead season 'tis impossible to entertain you with news; and yet more impossible (with my dulness) to entertain you without it.

I see sometimes Mr Congreve, and very seldom Mr Pope, who continues to embellish his house at Twickenham. He has made a subterranean grotto, which he has furnished with looking-glasses, and they tell me it has a very good effect.

. . . . . .

I give you ten thousand thanks for the trouble you have given yourself. I hope you will continue to take some care of my affairs,† because I do not hear they are finished, and I cannot yet get rid of my fears. You have not told me that you have received what I sent you by Lady Lansdown, as also three guineas that she took for you; one of which I beg you to lay out in the same narrow minunet which you sent Mrs Murray; and send it me by the next opportunity, for the use of my daughter, who is very much your humble servant and grows a little woman. I suppose you know our sister Gower has lain-in in the country of a son. The Duchess of Kingston is preparing for the Bath. I live in a sort of solitude, which wants very little of being such as I would have it. Lady J. Wharton is to be married to Mr Holt, which I am sorry for; to see a young woman that I really think one of the agreeablest girls upon earth so vilely misplaced. But where are people matched? I suppose we shall all come right in Heaven. As in a country dance—the hands are strangely given and taken, while they are in motion: at last all meet their partners when the jig is done.

But it is time we had a specimen of what Walpole must mean, if he meant anything, by the debauchery of a lady's letters:—

The bearer of this epistle is our cousin, and a consummate puppy, as you will perceive at first sight; his shoulder-knot last birth-day made many a pretty gentleman's heart ache with envy, and his addresses have made Miss Howard the happiest of her Highness's honourable virgins; besides the glory of thrusting the Earl of Deloraine from the post he held in her affections. But his relations are so ill bred as to be quite insensible of the honour arising from this conquest, and fearing that so much gallantry may conclude in captivity for life, pack him off to you, where 'tis to be hoped there is no such killing fare as Miss Howard. I made a sort of resolution at the beginning of my letter not to trouble you with the mention of what passes here, since you receive it with so much coldness. But I find it is impossible to forbear telling you the metamorphoses of some of your acquaintance, which appear as wonderous to me as any in Ovid. Would any one believe that Lady Hss* is a beauty, and in love? and that Mrs Robinson is at the same time a prude and a kept mistress? and these things in spite of nature and fortune. The first of these ladies is tenderly attached to the polite Mr M, and sunk in all the joys of happy love, notwithstanding she wants the use of her two hands by rheumatism, and he has an arm that he cannot move. I wish I could tell you the particulars of this amour, which seems to me as curious as that between two oysters, and as well worth the serious attention of the naturalists. The second heroine has engaged half the town in arms, from the nicety of her virtue, which was not able to bear the too near approach of Senesino in the opera; and her condecension in her accepting of Lord Peterborough† for a champion, who has signalized both his love and courage upon this occasion in as many instances as ever Don Quixote did for Dulcinea. Poor Senesino, like a vanquished giant, was forced to confess upon his knees that Anastasia was a nonpareil of virtue and beauty. Lord Stanhope, as dwarf to the said giant, joked on his side, and was challenged for his pains. Lord Delawar was Lord Peterborough's second; my lady miscarried—the whole town divided into parties on this important point. Innumerable have been the disorders between the two sexes on so great an account, besides half the House of Peers being put under an arrest. By the providence of Heaven, and the wise cares of his Majesty, no bloodshed ensued. However, things are now tolerably accommodated; and the fair lady rides through the town in triumph, in the shining berlin of her hero, not to reckon the more solid advantage of 100*l.* a-month, which 'tis said he allows her.

In general, gallantry was never in so elevated a figure as at present. Twenty very pretty fellows (the Duke of Wharton being president and chief director) have formed themselves into a committee of gallantry, who call themselves Schemers; and meet regularly three times a-week, to consult on gallant schemes for the advancement and advantage of that branch of happiness. I consider the duty of a true Englishwoman is to do honour to her native country; and that it would be a sin against the pious love I bear to the land of my nativity, to confine the renown due to the schemers within the small extent of this little island, which ought to be spread wherever men can sigh or women can wish. 'Tis true they have the envy and the curses of the old and ugly of both sexes, and a general persecution from all old women; but this is no more than all reformations must expect in their beginning.

There need be no end to such instances of the vivacity and point of Lady Mary's epistolary style. She is never once tedious, never once dull; but that a private letter, even to a sister, could be either gay, clever, or even amusing, without satire, exaggeration, and an overpowering zest of scandal, never seems to have entered her mind. How much finer, as well as purer, epistolary models does the world now possess in the letters of Cowper, Gray, and many others, than those which stimulated the ambition of Walpole!

The freshest news in town, is the fatal accident happened three nights ago, to a very pretty young fellow, brother to Lord Finch, who was drinking with a dearly beloved drab, whom you may have heard of by the name of Sally Salisbury. In a jealous pique, she stabbed him to the heart with a knife. He fell down dead immediately, but a surgeon being called for, and the knife drawn out of his body, he opened his eyes, and his first words were to beg her to be friends with him, and kissed her. She has since staid by his bed-side, till last night, when he begged her to fly, for he thought he could not live; and she has taken his advice, and perhaps will honour you with her residence at Paris. Adieu, dear sister! I send you, along with this letter, the Count of Caylus, who, if you do not know already, you will thank me for introducing to you; he is a Frenchman, and no fop; which, besides the curiosity of it, is one of the prettiest things in the world.

Our mutual acquaintance are exceedingly dispersed, and I am engaged in a new set, whose ways would not be entertaining to you, since you know not the people. Mrs Murray is still at Castle-Howard. I am at Twickenham, where there is, at this time, more company than at London. I think Mr and Madame Harvey are at Lord Bristol's. A propos of that family—the Countess is come out a new creature; she has left off the dull occupations of hazard and basset, and is grown young, blooming, coquette, and gallant; and, to shew she is fully sensible of the errors of her past life, and resolved to make up for time misspent, she has two lovers at a time, and is equally wickedly talked of for the gentle Colonel Cotton and the superfine Mr Braddocks. Now, I think this the greatest compliment in nature to her own lord; since it is plain that when she will be false to him, she is forced to take two men in his stead, and that no one mortal has merit enough to make up for him. Poor Lady G† is parting from her discreet spouse for a mere trifle. She had a mind to take the air, this spring, in a new yacht, which Lord Hillsborough‡ built for many good uses, and which has been the scene of much pleasure and pain: she went in company with his Lordship, Fabrice, Mr Cook, Lady Litchfield,§ and her sister, as far as Greenwich, and from thence as far as the buoy of the Nore; when, to the great surprise of the good company, who thought it impossible the wind should not be as fair to bring them back as it was to carry them thither, they found there was no possibility of returning that night. Lady G, in all the concern of a good wife, desired her lord might be informed of her safety, and that she was no way blameable in staying out all night. Fabrice writ a most gallant letter to Lord G;‖ concluding that Mr Cook presents his humble service to him, and let him know (in case of necessity) "Lady Margaret was in town;"¶ but his Lordship not liking the change, I suppose, carried the letter straight to the King's Majesty, who not being at leisure to give him an audience, he sent it in open by Mahomet; though it is hard to guess what sort of redress he intended to petition for—the nature of the thing being such, that had he complained he was no cuckold, his Majesty at least might have prevailed that some of his court might confer that dignity upon him; but if he was, neither king, council, nor the two houses of parliament, could make it null and of none effect. This public rupture is succeeded by a treaty of separation—and here is all the scandal that is uppermost in my head.

Your old friend, Mrs Louther, is still fair and young, and in pale pink every night in the parks; but, after being highly in favour, poor I am in utter disgrace, without my being able to guess wherefore, except she fancied me the author or abettor of two vile ballads, written on her dying adventure, which I am so innocent of, that I never saw it. A propos of ballads, a most delightful one is said or sung in most houses about our dearly beloved plot, which has been laid first to Pope, and secondly to me, when, God knows, we have neither of us wit enough to make it. Mrs Harvey lies-in of a female child. Lady Rich is happy in dear Sir Robert's absence, and the polite Mr Holt's return to his allegiance, who, though in a treaty of marriage with one of the prettiest girls in town, (Lady J. Wharton,) appears better with her than ever. Lady B. Manners is on the brink of matrimony with a Yorkshire Mr Monkton, of £3000 per annum. It is a match of the young Duchess's making, and she thinks matter of great triumph over the two coquette beauties, who can get nobody to have and to hold; they are decayed to a piteous degree, and so neglected that they are grown constant and particular to the two ugliest fellows in London. Mrs P——* condescends to be publicly kept by the noble Earl of Cadogan; whether Mr P——† has a pad nag deducted out of the profits for his share, I cannot tell; but he appears very well satisfied with it. This is, I think, the whole state of love; as to that of wit, it splits itself into ten thousand branches. Poets increase and multiply to that stupendous degree, you see them at every turn, even in embroidered coats and pink-coloured top-knots; making verses is become almost as common as taking snuff, and God can tell what miserable stuff people carry about in their pockets, and offer to all their acquaintances, and, you know, one cannot refuse reading and taking a pinch.

It is not easy to guess how the ladies of 1837 are to read or shew in their drawing-rooms the letters of the witty gentlewomen of 1723. They will, at least, put down affectation of prudery among the higher orders; but prudery was, indeed, never their peculiar vice. Though there is much that is grossly indecent in Lady Mary's writings, there is no sweet insinuating poison; their very freedom and coarseness prevent the danger of contamination.

Here is a court birthday almost a hundred and twenty years old, and quite as fresh as if it had chanced last year.

It is to be hoped that my letter will entertain you; at least you will certainly have the freshest account of all passages on that glorious day. First, you must know that I led up the ball, which you'll stare at; but what is more, I believe in my conscience I made one of the best figures there; to say truth, people are grown so extravagantly ugly, that we old beauties are forced to come out on show-days, to keep the court in countenance. I saw Mrs Murray there, through whose hands this epistle will be conveyed; I do not know whether she will make the same complaint to you that I do. Mrs West was with her, who is a great prude, having but two lovers at a time; I think those are Lord Haddington and Mr Lindsay—the one for use, the other for show.

The world improves in one virtue to a violent degree—I mean plain-dealing. Hypocrisy being, as the Scripture declares, a damnable sin, I hope our publicans and sinners will be saved by the open profession of the contrary virtue. I was told by a very good author, who is deep in the secret, that at this very minute there is a bill cooking-up at a hunting-seat in Norfolk,‡ to have not taken out of the commandments and clapped into the creed, the ensuing session of Parliament. This bold attempt for the liberty of the subject is wholly projected by Mr Walpole, who proposed it to the secret committee in his parlour. William Young† seconded it, and answered for all his acquaintance voting right to a man. Doddington very gravely objected, that the obstinacy of human nature was such, that he feared when they had positive commandments to do so, perhaps people would not commit adultery and bear false witness against their neighbours, with the readiness and cheerfulness they do at present.

‡ Houghton; Mr (afterwards Sir Robert) Walpole's, then prime-minister. § Sir William Young.

If Horace Walpole and other individuals took all manner of freedoms with the character, manners, dress, and personal habits of Lady Mary, she set certainly the strongest example upon record that ever a woman gave of similar license. We might multiply instances without end, but a few may suffice. They are in the highest style of those letters that were admired, reprobated, and imitated by Walpole. While Lady Mary was indulging in this vein of private correspondence, she was also making lampoons and "filthy ballads" upon half her female acquaintances, and had become dreaded, hated, and calumniated, and, we have no doubt, by noble and virtuous minds, silently despised.

All our acquaintances are run mad; they do such things! such monstrous and stupendous things! Lady Hervey and Lady Bristol have quarrelled in such a polite manner, that they have given one another all the titles so liberally bestowed amongst the ladies at Billingsgate. Sophia and I have been quite reconciled, and are now quite broke, and, I believe, not likely to piece up again. Ned Thomson is as happy as the money and charms of Belle Dunch can make him, and a miserable dog for all that. . . . For my part, as it is my established opinion that this globe of ours is no better than a Holland cheese, and the walkers about in it mites, I possess my mind in patience, let what will happen; and should feel tolerably easy though a great rat came and eat half of it up. My sister Gower has got a sixth daughter, by the grace of God, and is as merry as if nothing had happened. My poor love, Mr Cook, has fought and been disarmed by J. Stapleton on a national quarrel; in short, he was born to conquer nothing in England, that's certain, and has good luck neither with our ladies nor gentlemen. B. Noel is come out Lady Milsington, to the encouragement and consolation of all the coquettes about town; and they make haste to be as infamous as possible, in order to make their fortunes. I have this moment received from Mrs Peling a very pretty cap for my girl; I give you many thanks for the trouble you have had in sending it.

I wrote to you very lately, my dear sister, but ridiculous things happening, I cannot help (as far as in me lies) sharing all my pleasures with you. I own I enjoy vast delight in the folly of mankind; and, God be praised, that is an inexhaustible source of entertainment. You may remember that I mentioned in my last some suspicions of my own in relation to Lord Bathurst, which I really never mentioned, for fifty reasons, to any one whatever; but, as there is very rarely smoke without some fire, there is never fire without some smoke. These smothered flames, though admirably covered with whole heaps of politics laid over them, were at length seen, felt, heard, and understood; and the fair lady [Mrs Howard, the King's mistress,] given to understand by her commanding officer, that, if she served under other colours, she must expect to have her pay retrenched. Upon which the good lord was dismissed, and has not attended in the drawing-room since. You know one cannot help laughing when one sees him next, and I own I long for that pleasurable moment.

Lady Mary must have suffered severe mortification from the character of her son, to whom, in his infancy, she seems to have been a fond, if not a tender mother. Young Wortley Montague, afterwards so notorious, was one of nature's predestined blackguards, if we may so speak. He was tainted with every vice, and debased by every meanness. His family considered his aberrations the consequence of a weak understanding, while the world regarded him as endowed with more than ordinary abilities perverted to the worst purposes. Both were so far in the right. He appears to have possessed quick talents, but to have altogether wanted a moral sense, while his understanding was not sufficiently powerful to correct or regulate his conduct. Lady Mary might have seen a greatly exaggerated and distorted image of herself reflected in her unhappy son. As a schoolboy, he began to shew his innate depravity; and in her letters to Lady Mar, his mother has no sooner got over the horrors of Monsieur Ruremonde, than she begins to complain of her young, runaway rogue and rake, who soon became the torment and disgrace of his family. The various extraordinary adventures of young Wortley are very well known. He was a prodigy of profligacy. In this work we have the relation of an interview which his mother had with him in France, after her final retreat to the Continent, at the secret instigation of his father, who was anxious to give the unhappy youth a last chance of redeeming himself. The unfortunate mother's report is severe and hopeless; and Cato could not have judged with more unrelenting sternness and apparent impartiality than did Lady Mary of her son. She had steeled her heart against him, but her judgment remained unclouded. How far the extreme avarice of his father, and the want of tenderness and proper attention in both his parents might palliate the errors of the son, it is now impossible to tell. The following extract from Walpole's correspondence will explain the exact condition of young Wortley, previous to the interview with his mother:—

Our greatest miracle is Lady Mary Wortley's son, whose adventures have made so much noise. His parts are not proportionate, but his expense is incredible. His father scarce allows him anything, yet he plays, dresses, diamonds himself, even to distinct shoe-buckles for a frock, and has more snuff-boxes than would suffice a Chinese idol with an hundred noses. But the most curious part of his dress, which he has brought from Paris, is an iron wig. You literally could not know it from hair.

The ways and means of this eccentric and thoroughly worthless person, are in part explained by the following relation from the same pen:—

It seems uncertain whether Lady Mary Wortley is in voluntary or constrained durance. It is not at all equivocal that her son and a Mr Taaffe have been in the latter at Fort l'Evesque and the Chatelet. All the letters from Paris have been very cautious of relating the circumstances. The outlines are, that these two gentlemen, who were pharaoh bankers to Madame de Mirepoix, [the wife of the French Ambassador to England,] had travelled to France to exercise the same profession, where, it is supposed, they cheated a Jew, who would afterwards have cheated them of the money he owed, and that, to secure payment, they broke open his lodgings and bureau, and seized jewels and other effects—that he accused them, that they were taken out of their beds at two o'clock in the morning, kept in different prisons without fire or candle for six-and-thirty hours. . . . . Their separate anecdotes are curious. Wortley, you know, has been a perfect Gil Blas; and for one of his last adventures, is thought to have added the famous Miss Ashe to the number of his wives.

Taaffe was an infamous character. In those days the clubs were nice. Both gentlemen were members of the House of Commons, but neither were admitted to White's.

Mr Wortley's letter respecting his son shews much more heart than the cool dissection of the mother. It is quite characteristic of a man of his disposition.

I hear he avoids the sharpers, and is grown a good manager of his money. . . . . He declares he sets his heart on being in England; but then he should give me such proofs as I require, that he is able to persevere in behaving like a reasonable man. These proofs may be agreed on between you and me, and I believe I shall readily agree to what you shall think right. I think you should say nothing to him but in the most calm and gentle way possible, that he may be invited to open himself to you freely. He seems, I hear, shocked at your letter, in which you complained of his not regarding the truth, though I believe you made no mistake in it. . . . . I incline to think he has been made an enthusiast in Holland, and you would do well to try thoroughly whether he is in earnest, and likely to continue so. If he is, I need not mention how much caution should be used in speaking to him. . . . . To tell you fully what I judge of him from the variety of accounts I have had, I incline to think he will for the future avoid thieves, and be no ill manager of his money. These, you will say, are great amendments. But I believe he will always appear a weak man. The single question seems to be whether he will be one of those weak men that will follow the advice of those who wish them well, or be governed by his own fancies, or companions that will make a prey of him. In Holland he seems to have followed the advice of Captain Leutsinger and other persons of good credit. I believe he has been in no company here this last time but men of good credit, and I hear he values himself upon it.

Lady Mary agreed to see, converse with, and judge of her son, who, among his other acquirements, had, in extreme youth, obtained a wife by a Fleet marriage—a woman of inferior rank, and considerably older than himself. Lady Mary says—

If you order your son to go to Valence, I desire you would give him a strict command of going by a feigned name. I do not doubt your returning me whatever money I may give him; but, as I believe, if he receives money from me, he will be making me frequent visits, it is clearly my opinion that I should give him none.

You need not apprehend that I shall speak to him in passion. I do not know that I ever did in my life. I am not apt to be overheated in discourse, and am so far prepared, even for the worst on his side, that I think nothing he can say can alter the resolution I have taken of treating him with calmness. Both reason and interest, (were I inclined to follow blindly the dictates of either,) would determine me to wish him your heir rather than a stranger; but I think myself obliged both by honour and by conscience, and my regard for you, no way to deceive you; and I confess, hitherto I see nothing but falsehood and weakness through his whole conduct. It is possible his person may be altered since I saw him, but his figure then was very agreeable and his manner insinuating. I very well remember the professions he made to me, and do not doubt he is lavish of them to other people. Perhaps Lord Carteret may think him no ill match for an ugly girl that sticks on his hands. The project of breaking his marriage shews at least his devotion counterfeit, since I am sensible it cannot be done but by false witness. His wife is not young enough to get gallants, nor rich enough to buy them.

Lady Mary would apparently have had no objection to the marriage being set aside, even with the aid of "false witnesses." She was not devout—she had not grown an enthusiast in Holland, like her son, who afterwards became, among many worse things, a Mahommedan. When the interview took place, she reports with acuteness which amounts to prescience :—

As to his enthusiasm, if he had it, I suppose he has already lost it; since I could perceive no turn of it in all his conversation. But, with his head, I believe it is possible to make him a monk one day and a Turk three days after. He has a flattering insinuating manner, which naturally prejudices strangers in his favour. He began to talk to me in the usual silly cant I have so often heard from him, which I shortened by telling him I desired not to be troubled with it; that professions were of no use where actions were expected; and that the only thing could give me hopes of a good conduct was regularity and truth.

He began to insinuate, that if I could prevail on you to settle the estate on him, I might expect anything from his gratitude. I made him a very clear and positive answer in these words :—"I hope your father will outlive me, and if I should be so unfortunate to have it otherwise, I do not believe he will leave me in your power. But, was I sure of the contrary, no interest, nor no necessity, shall ever make me act against my honour and conscience; and, I plainly tell you, that I will never persuade your father to do anything for you till I think you deserve it." He answered by great promises of good behaviour and economy.

The rest of his conversation was extremely gay. The various things he has seen have given him a superficial universal knowledge. He really knows most of the modern languages, and if I could believe him, can read Arabic, and has read the Bible in Hebrew.

Young Wortley, at this time, felt, or pretended an extreme anxiety to go into the army; and, after he had been rejected by several commanding officers, he was somehow saddled upon Sir John Cope. His Roman-hearted mother writes to his father upon this occasion thus reasonably and soundly—

It is my opinion he should have no distinction, in equipage, from any other cornet; and everything of that sort will only serve to shew his vanity, and consequently heighten his folly. Your indulgence has always been greater to him than any other parent's would have been in the same circumstances. I have always said so, and thought so. If anything can alter him, it will be thinking firmly that he has no dependance but on his own conduct for a future maintenance

From Lord Wharncliffe's notes, we learn that Mr Wortley did not altogether and finally cut off his son's hopes. In the event of his having an heir legitimately born, the estate was to return to that heir. There was, indeed, little prospect of any such heir ever appearing. Young Wortley had early deserted his first, or lawful wife—for he had numerous wives—and, after vagabondizing in every part of the Continent, had finally settled in Egypt, freely indulging in the customs of his new religion. His wife outlived his father for many years; but, when she died at last, her husband, who had come to Venice, caused the following singular advertisement to be inserted in the English newspapers :—

"A gentleman who has filled two successive seats in parliament, is nearly sixty years of age, lives in great splendour and hospitality, and from whom a considerable estate must pass if he dies without issue, hath no objection to marry a widow or single lady, provided the party be of genteel birth, polite manners, and is five or six months gone in her pregnancy. Letters directed to —— Brecknock, Esq. at Will's Coffee-house, will be honoured with due attention, secrecy, and every mark of respect."

It has always been believed in the family that this advertisement was successful, and that a woman having the qualifications required by it was actually sent to Paris to meet Mr E. Wortley, who got as far as Lyons, on his way thither. There, however, while eating a beccafico for supper, a bone stuck in his throat, and occasioned his death; thus putting an end to this honest scheme.

The Countess of Bute was, consequently, the sole heiress to the estate, as well as to the immense accumulations of her father, and the savings of her mother. Before we return to Lady Mary's correspondence, we shall close the account by borrowing Walpole's gossip respecting Mr Wortley :—

Old Wortley Montague lives in the very spot where the Dragon of Wantley did; only, I believe, the latter was much better lodged. You never saw such a wretched hovel—lean, unpainted, and half its nakedness barely shaded with haratеen stretched till it cracks. Here the miser hoards health and money—his only two objects. He has chronicles in behalf of the air, and battens on Tokay, his single indulgence, as he has heard it is particularly salutary. . . . . I wanted to ask if Pope had not visited Lady Mary Wortley here, during their intimacy; but could only put that question to Avidien himself.

A few years later, in the beginning of 1761, Walpole wrote :—"Have you heard what immense riches old Wortley has left? One million, three hundred, and fifty thousand pounds. It is all to centre in my Lady Bute. Her husband is one of fortune's prodigies." There was an immediate rumour that Lady Mary, after her long voluntary exile, was to return to England; and, in less than a year after the death of her husband, she did return—to die!

Mr Wortley's portrait gives the lie to the science of physiognomy. It is that of a young and eminently handsome man, with a noble and candid countenance—the least possible resembling that which imagination assigns to a miser.

Lady Mary Wortley's biographer, though by no means blind to the failings of his or her ancestress, labours to find personal motives for Walpole's "excessive dislike of Lady Mary," with more zeal than success, and too much after the manner of Lady Mary. That Lady Mary hated Walpole's mother, is quite clear; but this is no reason "for taking for granted," without any evidence whatever, that Lady Walpole "did not spare Lady Mary." Lady Walpole was the neglected wife of a coarse-mannered and indifferent husband, who did not even seek to disguise his vices from her. That Lady Mary had had for her dear, intimate, domestic friend, his mistress, Miss Skerret—whom he married with indecent haste immediately upon the death of his wife—may, indeed, be a reason, and it is no bad one, for the aversion Horace Walpole entertained for her Ladyship. The insinuations of Swift, who tried, laughingly, to wound the Whig Minister through the current fashionable scandals of the day, is really a slight argument against Lady Walpole; and we apprehend that it is entire misapprehension to construe Pope's plain and direct lines into concealed irony, on the husband's laxity of principle on certain points. Pope meant what he said when he wrote that Sir Robert Walpole

> "Had never made a friend in private life,
> And was, besides, a tyrant to his wife."

Horace Walpole may not have been the son of his legitimate father—though he never suspected as much himself—and he may have been the son of Carr, Lord Hervey, as we learn here for the first time; but for this stale scandal there is surely very slight evidence in a mere want of personal resemblance to Sir Robert, or yet in the carelessness of a statesman and a man absorbed in politics and business to a younger son while a child. Even admitting the fact that Sir Robert left the child wholly to his mother's care, he may yet have believed him his son. Horace Walpole's tender affection for his mother is indeed the most amiable—the truly redeeming trait of his half-hearted character.

When Miss Skerret, very shortly after she had been "made an honest woman," died, Sir Robert returned Lady Mary's letters to her, sealed and unread. That series, Lady Mary—who had a high value for every scrap of the correspondence which, "in forty years, was to become as valuable as the letters of Madame de Sevigné"—must have destroyed; as she also did her correspondence with Lord Hervey, which was returned at his death by his son, also unread. She thanked the young Lord Hervey, in a letter, which he preserved, for his attention; and when she returned to England, in old age, he requested to be made acquainted with the distinguished lady, who, it must be remembered, was now the mother-in law of the all-powerful or all-prosperous Earl of Bute. But Lady Hervey, the widow, and the "dear Lepel" of Pope's muse, instead of following this example, frankly told the Countess of Bute, with whom she had previously been on terms of friendly intimacy, that she must pardon her for withdrawing from her society. She would not see her mother. Though Lady Bute felt great pride in her mother's talents, and wished only to see her fairest side, no one, we apprehend, was more aware of her indiscretions. A few days before her own death, she burnt the far greater part of her mother's diaries, for which she gave excellent reasons; though, from the clearness, and solid, yet quick judgment displayed in the few scraps and sketches preserved, one could almost wish that the conflagration had not been quite so sweeping.

Why Lady Mary went abroad, and lived in constant separation from her husband, her daughter, and her whole family, for the last twenty-two years of her life, is one of those mysteries which people choose to create for the pleasure of puzzling at a solution. It might have been old Wortley's maxim, as it is said to have been that of Sir Robert Walpole, "to go his own way, and let Madam go hers." Mr Wortley, at least, seems to have acted upon this principle, which was also probably Madam's, so far as he would pay down. At the outset, Lady Mary seems desirous to avoid the appearance of a formal separation, as is shewn by her fine-lady tittle tattle or flummery correspondence with Lady Pomfret—a new appendage to this edition. It is assumed by her biographer that she may even have expected her husband to join her, and to settle on the Continent, as she affirmed or insinuated to her friends.

> But if, on the contrary, it was only the colour they chose to give the affair; if the husband and wife—she in her fiftieth year, he several years older—had determined upon a separation; nothing can be more likely than that they settled it quietly and deliberately between themselves, neither proclaiming it to the world, nor consulting any third person; since their daughter was married, their son disjoined and alienated from them, and there existed nobody who had a right to call them to an account or inquire into what was solely their own business. It admits of little doubt that their dispositions were unsuitable; and Mr Wortley had sensibly felt it even while a lover. When, at length, convinced that in their case the approach of age would not have the harmonizing effect which it has been sometimes known to produce upon minds originally but ill-assorted, he was the very man to think within himself, "If we cannot add to each other's happiness, why should we do the reverse? Let us be the friends at a distance which we could not hope to remain by continuing uneasily yoked together."

This seems the whole truth. Lady Mary was, in the abstract, no admirer of the married state, at least for women of rank. She says she "looks upon her grand-daughters as lay nuns," from seeing no prospect of establishing so many of them advantageously; and she gives frequent counsel for the education necessary to prepare girls of family for that single condition which she considered as always safer, though it might not be so happy as marriage is sometimes found. She envies Richardson his project of Protestant nunneries, which had been an idea of her own in girlhood; and she says that she laid all the pains and penalties of matrimony fairly and frankly before her daughter, when Lord Bute proposed for her. Though we find no trace of the idea in this edition, we surely remember something of a scheme attributed to Lady Mary Wortley for making all marriages revocable, but also renewable at the end of every seven years—a plan which might have produced little alteration in the body of the society in which she lived, though a magical change of titles among the ladies.

Lady Mary, on her final journey, wrote occasionally to her husband of its progress, and upon matters of business, in the calm tone of one friend to another. His replies are of like character. But of sympathy, or affection, or even of the tenderness of habit, there is no trace, nor yet of that unrestrained confidence which, with hearts attuned, cannot be repressed. She takes pleasure in telling him of the attentions that were paid to her in the Italian cities which she reached, and of the consequence which surrounded her, of which she probably made the most. Except from her own letters, we learn almost nothing of Lady Mary's residence abroad; for Walpole's sketches are mere scraps, gleaned in the few months that he spent at Florence, when a youth on his travels. Without tracing his dislike to the far-fetched causes to which it is attributed by Lord Wharncliffe's coadjutor, we think it probable that Lady Mary may have piqued the vanity of the petulant young man by some neglect, or by oblivion of his existence altogether; for his name hardly ever occurs in her letters, and only in the slightest way, though she says he paid court to her. After all, he wrote of her exactly as she did of hundreds, and from the same unjustifiable motives—the inordinate love of scandal and gossip, and the rage of being witty, totally unrestrained by any sense of propriety, and quite indifferent to truth in its essence, so that its mere form was not violated by their abominable satires and caricature daubings. Lady Mary and Lord Orford would have been equally shocked to be fancied Mars; yet such is the plain English name for many of their gross misrepresentations.

In the year in which Lady Mary left England, and in her own fiftieth year, it is thus, for example, she writes to Lady Mar of the wife of her friend, Lord Hervey, and of that beautiful Mrs Murray, the daughter of Scotland's Grisel Baillie, whose amiable character and unfortunate story, as the wife of a malignant madman, all the world knows:—

Mrs Murray has retrieved his Grace, and, being reconciled to the temporal, has renounced the spiritual. Her friend, Lady Hervey, by aiming too high, has fallen very low; and is reduced to trying to persuade folks she has an intrigue, and gets nobody to believe her; the man in question taking a great deal of pains to clear himself of the scandal. Her Chelsea Grace of Rutland has married an attorney. There's prudence for you!

If this was the favourite and approved style of the fashionable wits of that time, we trust it has amended. Here again is a letter written in early life, in the country, which Walpole would have admired prodigiously; and yet it is not much more honest or decorous than those he has composed upon Lady Mary, of which her descendants, with reason, complain so loudly; save, indeed, that freedoms may be taken with an unknown Mrs D——, which would be unpardonable if ventured when a Lady M—— is concerned.

I find, after all, by your letter of yesterday, that Mrs D—— is resolved to marry the old greasy curate. She was always High Church in an excessive degree; and, you know, she used to speak of Sacheverel as an apostolic saint, who was worthy to sit in the same place with St Paul, if not a step above him. It is a matter, however, very doubtful to me, whether it is not still more the man than the apostle that Mrs D—— looks to in the present alliance. Though at the age of forty, she is, I assure you, very far from being cold and insensible; her fire may be covered with ashes, but it is not extinguished. Don't be deceived, my dear, by that prudish and sanctified air. Warm devotion is no equivocal mark of warm passions; besides, I know it is a fact, of which I have proofs in hand, which I will tell you by word of mouth, that our learned and holy prude is exceedingly disposed to use the means supposed in the primitive command, let what will come of the end. The curate, indeed, is very filthy—such a red, spungy, warty nose! such a squint! In short, he is ugly beyond expression; and, what ought naturally to render him peculiarly displeasing to one of Mrs D——'s constitution and propensities, he is stricken in years. Nor do I really know how they will live. He has but forty-five pounds a-year—she but a trifling sum; so that they are likely to feast upon love and ecclesiastical history, which will be very empty food without a proper mixture of beef and pudding. I have, however, engaged our friend, who is the curate's landlord, to give them a good lease; and, if Mrs D——, instead of spending whole days reading Collier, Hickes, and vile translations of Plato and Epictetus, will but form the resolution of taking care of her house and minding her dairy, things may go tolerably. It is not likely that their tender loves will give them many sweet babes to provide for.

I met the lover yesterday, going to the alehouse in his dirty night-gown, with a book under his arm, to entertain the club; and, as Mrs D—— was with me at the time, I pointed out to her the charming creature. She blushed and looked prim; but quoted a passage out of Herodotus, in which it is said that the Persians wore long night gowns. There is really no more accounting for the taste in marriage of many of our sex, than there is for the appetite of your neighbour Miss S—y, who makes such waste of chalk and charcoal when they fall in her way.

This, quite in his own worst manner, may serve to pave the way for Walpole's announcement of Lady Mary's expected arrival at Florence.

On Wednesday, we expect a third she-meteor—those luminaries the Ladies Pomfret and W—— are to be joined by the Lady Mary Wortley. You have not been witness to the rhapsody of mystic nonsense which these fair ones debate incessantly, and consequently cannot figure what must be the issue of this triple alliance. We have some idea of it. Only figure the coalition of prudery, debauchery, sentiment, history, Greek, Latin, French, Italian, and metaphysics—all, except the second, understood by halves, by quarters, or not at all.

The lady arrived, and is thus announced by the chief epistolary chronicler of the fashionable world for more than forty years:—

Did I not tell you Lady Mary Wortley is here? She laughs at my Lady W——, scolds my Lady Pomfret, and is laughed at by the whole town. Her dress, her avarice, and her impudence, must amaze any one that never heard her name. She wears a foul mob that does not cover her greasy black locks, that hang loose, never combed or curled; an old mazarine blue wrapper that gapes open, and discovers a canvass petticoat. Her face swelled violently on one side. . . . . .

But the fashionable describer of fashionables becomes too gross for our pages. He concludes by stating that the lady had covered her face with white paint, "which, for cheapness, she has bought so coarse, that you could not use it to wash a chimney. In three words, I will give you her picture, as we drew it in the Sortes Virgilianæ—

Insanam vatem aspicies.

"I give you my honour, we did not choose it; but Gray, [the poet,] Mr Cooke, Sir Fr. Dashwood, and I, and several others drew it fairly amongst a thousand for different people." Returning afterwards to what he chose to call the Academy—the private society, namely, or coterie of English ladies established at Florence—he says—

For the Academy, I am not of it, but frequently in company with it. 't Is'is all disjointed. Madam ——, who, though a learned lady, has not lost her modesty and character, is extremely scandalized with the other two dames, especially with Moll Worthless, [Lady Mary Wortley,] who knows no bounds. She is at rivalry with Lady W——, for a certain Mr ——, whom, perhaps, you knew at Oxford. If you did not, I'll tell you; he is a grave young man by temper, and a rich one by constitution—a shallow creature by nature, but a wit by the grace of our women here, whom he deals with as of old with the Oxford toasts. . . . . Lady Mary is so far gone, that to get him from the mouth of her entagonist, [she literally took him out to dance country dances last night at a formal ball, where there was no measure kept in laughing at her old, foul, tawdry, painted, plastered personage. She played at pharaoh two or three times, at Princess Craons, where she cheats horse and foot. She is really entertaining; I have been reading her works, which she lends out in manuscript, but they are too womanish. I like few of her performances.

Walpole changed his opinion of Lady Mary's works, a part of which he printed at Strawberry Hill; but his opinion of their author remained unchanged. Twenty-two years subsequently to the date of the above malicious report, when Lady Mary, after the death of her husband, returned to England, he again writes:—

Lady Mary Wortley is arrived. I have seen her. I think her avarice, her dirt, and her vivacity, are all increased. Her dress, like her language, is a galimatias of several countries—the groundwork rags, and the embroidery nastiness. She needs no cap, no handkerchief, no gown, no petticoat, no shoes. An old black laced hood represents the first; the fur of a horseman's coat, which replaces the third, serves for the second; a dimity petticoat is deputy and officiates for the fourth; and slippers act the part of the last. When I was at Florence, and she was expected there, we were drawing Sortes Virgilianæ for her. We literally drew

Insanam vatem aspicies.

It would have been a stranger prophecy now even than it was then.

Such, we say it again, was the style in which the luminaries of aristocracy wrote about each other, conceiving themselves all the while models of taste, elegance, and refinement—thanking their gods that they were not as those plebeians. It strikes us that the taste of much of this vivacious nonsense is quite as vile as the morality is low. This species of wit has now descended, as a legitimate inheritance, deprived of little of its original venom, to the more scurrilous of those newspapers which charm the higher orders; while a small dividend has come to the smart police reporters who minister to the pleasures of the other fag-end of society. This spurious pleasantry—which bears the same relation to true wit that caricature does to humorous or comic painting—is the easy resource of those who are altogether incapable of seizing and portraying the more delicate and evanescent traits and shadowy hues of character. To this more delicate and difficult task Walpole and Lady Mary were quite equal when it so pleased them, and when the temptation did not set in the other way. To be done with this, we must again protest against the adequacy of the cause assigned for Walpole's personal dislike of the lady. He has spoken at least as much evil of twenty persons, all his own near relatives—of his uncle, and his uncle's wife, his cousins, and his sister-in-law—as of Lady Mary Wortley. Of Whitfield who could neither have offended him through his mother's feelings, nor yet through his father's fame, nor any one of his generation, he has related very scandalous, and, we doubt not, false anecdotes. In brief, he and Lady Mary, and too many of their society, fancied such matters clever and graceful, and necessary to maintain their reputation as wits. Our numerous new novels have a merit not generally contemplated, in fixing down the vivacious idle to the reading of innocent nonsense, instead of scribbling scandalous gossip.

Lady Mary Wortley's finest private letters, beyond all comparison, are, as we have said, those addressed to her daughter. The series written during her husband's embassy are more travels, or a descriptive narrative, than letters in the proper sense of the term; while her latest correspondence—that with the Countess of Bute—is exactly what friendly letters ought to be—the free and easy interchange of sentiment, and the familiar or "fond and trivial" records of a life checkered by few events. These letters possess an inexpressible charm, from the undecaying vivacity of the writer, her extensive observation on life, and experiences of its ways; and a tone of sober dignity, from a certain calm elevation of mind, the fruit of reflection and long retirement. Lady Mary Wortley, who piqued herself on free, bold, independent thinking, never outgrew some of her prejudices and bitternesses; but an increasing placidity and mellowness of disposition gradually creeps on as the passions fall asleep, and as her spirit shone out, in a purer and less troubled atmosphere than that which had vitiated her youth. To some readers—nay, we fear, to many—this series of letters may appear much less entertaining than those libelled by Walpole's praise. Some of them may even be felt tiresome. Yet we abide by our original judgment. Though it is apparent that she was quite conscious of having been unsuccessful in the great aim of life, we never find Lady Mary expressing either regret or compunction for any part of her conduct. That she was sometimes blamed where innocent, seems a sufficient justification of actual error; and, though boasting of impartiality and dispassionateness in her judgments, her ancient enmities and rivalries were never forgotten in the expression of her opinion of men and actions. She is incapable of justice, and loses the power of discrimination, whenever Pope, Swift, Bolingbroke, and that faction are concerned; and the last thing which an aristocrat can conquer, is the prejudice of birth. Lady Mary never imagined the effort any part of the duty of her new philosophy. The letters to Lady Bute contain abundance of criticism upon the novels and memoirs that appeared, which were regularly transmitted to Italy, and afforded the greatest solace to the exile, who would sit up all night reading what her daughter considered "trash and trumpery" as often as a fresh box of books arrived. Her criticism on Richardson's novels is severe, but not so wholly unjust as it has been considered; and it is no mean triumph to his genius that his power in the pathetic wrings forth such acknowledgments as the following. The author was quite unknown to her. "This Richardson is a strange fellow. I heartily despise him, and eagerly read him, nay, sob over his works in a most scandalous manner. The two first tomes of 'Clarissa' touched me, as being very resembling to my maiden days; and I find in the pictures of Sir Thomas Grandison and his lady what I have heard of my mother and seen of my father."

Fielding was her relation. She admired his writings with a true relish of their beauties; but she also saw their blemishes. Upon her copy of "Tom Jones" she wrote, "Ne plus ultra." Of her kinsman she says—

H. Fielding has given a true picture of himself and his first wife, in the characters of Mr and Mrs Booth, some compliments to his own figure excepted; and, I am persuaded, several of the incidents he mentions are real matters of fact. I wonder he does not perceive Tom Jones and Mr Booth are sorry scoundrels. All this sort of books have the same fault, which I cannot easily pardon, being very mischievous. They place a merit in extravagant passions, and encourage young people to hope for impossible events, to draw them out of the misery they choose to plunge themselves into, expecting legacies from unknown relations, and generous benefactors to distressed virtue, as much out of nature as fairy treasures. Fielding has really a fund of true humour, and was to be pitied at his first entrance into the world, having no choice, as he said himself, but to be a hackney writer or a hackney coachman. His genius deserved a better fate; but I cannot help blaming that continued indiscretion, to give it the softest name, that has run through his life, and I am afraid still remains.

After his death she wrote—

I am sorrow for H. Fielding's death, not only as I shall read no more of his writings, but I believe he lost more than others, as no man enjoyed life more than he did, though few had less reason to do so, the highest of his preferment being raking in the lowest sinks of vice and misery. I should think it a noble1 and less nauseous employment, to be one of the staff-officers that conduct the nocturnal weddings. His happy constitution (even when he had, with great pains, half demolished it) made him forget everything when he was before a venison pasty, or over a flask of champaigne, and I am persuaded he has known more happy moments than any prince upon earth. His natural spirits gave him rapture with his cook-maid, and cheerfulness when he was starving in a garret. There was a great similitude between his character and that of Sir Richard Steele. He had the advantage both in learning, and, in my opinion, genius; they both agreed in wanting money in spite of all their friends, and would have wanted it, if their hereditary lands had been as extensive as their imagination; yet each of them was so formed for happiness, it is pity he was not immortal.

The following opinion of "The Rambler" would make a good standing prospectus for all the small, modern, useful wares of literature—its penny horn-books and primers—now circulated so widely among the class of gentle readers described:—

The "Rambler" is certainly a strong misnomer; he always plods in the beaten road of his predecessors, following the "Spectator" (with the same pace a pack horse would do a hunter) in the style that is proper to lengthen a paper. These writers may, perhaps, be of service to the public, which is saying a great deal in their favour. There are numbers of both sexes who never read anything but such productions, and cannot spare time, from doing nothing, to go through a sixpenny pamphlet. Such gentle readers may be improved by a moral hint, which, though repeated over and over, from generation to generation, they never heard in their lives.

Lady Mary thus gaily pleads the pardon of those lovers of entertaining reading who can digest something stronger and bulkier than its pap and milk:—

Daughter! daughter! don't call names; you are always abusing my pleasures, which is what no mortal will bear. Trash, lumber, sad stuff, are the titles you give to my favourite amusement. If I called a white staff a stick of wood, a gold key gilded brass, and the ensigns of illustrious orders coloured strings, this may be philosophically true, but would be very ill received. We have all our playthings; happy are they that can be contented with those they can obtain: those hours are spent in the wisest manner, that can easiest shade the ills of life, and are the least productive of ill consequences. I think my time better employed in reading the adventures of imaginary people, than the Duchess of Marlborough, who passed the latter years of her life in paddling with her will, and contriving schemes of plaguing some, and extracting praise from others, to no purpose; eternally disappointed, and eternally fretting. The active scenes are over at my age. I indulge, with all the art I can, my taste for reading. If I would confine it to valuable books, they are almost as rare as valuable men. I must be content with what I can find. As I approach a second childhood, I endeavour to enter into the pleasures of it. Your youngest son is, perhaps, at this very moment riding on a poker, with great delight, not at all regretting that it is not a gold one, and much less wishing it an Arabian horse, which he could not know how to manage. I am reading an idle tale, not expecting wit or truth in it, and am very glad it is not metaphysics to puzzle my judgment, or history to mislead my opinion. He fortifies his health by exercise; I calm my cares by oblivion. The methods may appear low to busy people; but, if he improves his strength, and I forget my infirmities, we both attain very desirable ends.

I thank God my taste still continues for the gay part of reading.* Wiser people may think it trifling, but it serves to sweeten life to me, and is at worst better than the generality of conversation.

Mr Bentley should stereotype this as an advertisement, to be prefixed to his new novels as they appear. It is a case wholly made out. A very sensible piece of moralizing upon the idle pursuit of ambition is concluded as if Lady Mary had been an enlightened Radical.

A wise and honest man lives to his own heart, without that silly splendour that makes him a prey to knaves, and which commonly ends in his becoming one of the fraternity. I am very glad to hear Lord Bute's decent economy sets him above anything of that kind. I wish it may become national. A collective body of men differs very little from a single man; and frugality is the foundation of generosity. I have often been complimented on the English heroism, who have thrown away so many millions, without any prospect of advantage to themselves, purely to succour a distressed Princess. I never could hear these praises without some impatience; they sounded to me like the panegyrics made by the dependants on the Duke of Newcastle and poor Lord Oxford, bubbled when they were commended, and laughed at when they were undone. Some late events will, I hope, open our eyes: we shall see we are an island, and endeavour to extend our commerce rather than the Quixote reputation of redressing wrongs and placing diadems on heads that should be equally indifferent to us. When time has ripened mankind into commonsense, the name of conqueror will be an odious title. I could easily prove that had the Spaniards established a trade with the Americans, they would have enriched their country more than by the addition of twenty-two kingdoms, and all the mines they now work—I do not say possess; since, though they are the proprietors, others enjoy the profit.

A little more politics:—George III.—and the custom has been continued with the more recent heirs to the throne—was educated in a manner which makes Lady Mary say—

I am sorry the Prince has an episcopal education: he cannot have a worse both for himself and the nation;

* In Spence's Anecdotes, by Singer, there is an observation of Lady Oxford in these words:—"I wonder how anybody can find pleasure in reading the books which are that lady's chief favourites." Here we have Lady Mary's confession of her liking to works of imagination, and her defence of her taste.

though the court of England is no more personally to me than the court of Pekin, yet I cannot help some concern for my native country, nor can I see any good purpose from church precepts, except they design him to take orders. I confess if I was King of Great Britain I would certainly be also Archbishop of Canterbury; but I believe that is a refinement of politics that will never enter into the heads of our managers, though there is no other way of having supreme power in church and state. I could say a great deal in favour of this idea; but as neither you nor I will ever be consulted on the subject, I will not trouble you with my speculative notions.

There is really something to make people reflect in this bold project. Lady Mary herself, though a steady and a born Protestant, was, from anything that appears, not troublesome to her neighbours either with her devotional feelings or practice, yet she held the legitimate opinions of her age concerning religion.

I am not surprised at Lady Orford's folly, having known her at Florence: she made great court to me. She has parts, and a very engaging manner. Her company would have amused me very much, but I durst not indulge myself in it, her character being in universal horror—I do not mean from her gallantries, which nobody trouble their heads with, but she had a collection of freethinkers that met weekly at her house to the scandal of all good Christians. She invited me to one of these honourable assemblies, which I civilly refused, not desiring to be thought of her opinion, nor thinking it right to make a jest of ordinances that are, at least, so far sacred, as they are absolutely necessary in all civilized governments.

This piece of piety and prudence was directed to Mr Wortley; and the lady was Walpole's sister-in-law, whom he represents as the intimate friend of Lady Mary.

The essays upon female education embodied in these letters, though not unexceptionable, are well worthy the serious attention of mothers in high life. Want of proper instruction was considered by Lady Mary as the source of many of the faults and consequent misfortunes of women of rank. Having given one instance of an erring woman through deficient education, she characteristically adds—"You know another, who, if she had had her natural good understanding cultivated by letters, would never have mistaken Johnny Gay for a wit, and much less have printed, that he took the liberty of calling her his Laura." She might, however, have included herself in the same list with the Duchess of Queensberry, since she had the misfortune at one time to mistake Pope for a wit, and had encouraged him to address gallant letters to her. She gives a more striking, though a very worldly instance; and her Ladyship's views seldom rose above the good things of this life to any higher rewarding sphere:—

My poor friend the Duchess of Bolton was educated in solitude, with some choice of books, by a saint-like governess: crammed with virtue and good qualities, she thought it impossible not to find gratitude, though she failed to give passion; and upon this plan threw away her estate, was despised by her husband, and laughed at by the public. Polly,* bred in an alehouse, and produced on the stage, has obtained wealth and title, and found the way to be esteemed. So useful is early experience—without it half of life is dissipated in correcting the errors that we have been taught to receive as indisputable truths.

Of the misery of women of gallantry and what is named pleasure, whatever her personal conduct may have been, she had a true conception. M. Ruremonde might, indeed, have assisted her experience. Referring to Lady Vane, whose Memoirs in "Peregrine Pickle" she had just read with all the interest of an old acquaintance, and the zest of a scandal-monger of past times, she writes:—"I think there is no rational creature that would not prefer the life of the strictest Carmelite to the round of hurry and misfortune she has gone through." Of one of her Florence acquaintances, Walpole's beloved sister-in-law, noticed above, she again remarks:—

I am not surprised at Lady Orford's marriage; her money was, doubtless, convenient to Mr Shirley, and I dare swear she piques herself on not being able to refuse him anything. It has been her way with all her lovers: he is the most creditable of any she ever had: his birth and sense will induce him to behave to her with decency, and it is what she has not been much used to. As it is a true saying, "Cowards more blows than any hero bear;" it is as certainly true, ladies of pleasure (very improperly so called) suffer more mortifications than any nun of the most austere order that ever was instituted. Lady Orford is a shining instance of that truth; the most submissive wife to the most tyrannic husband that ever was born, is not such a slave as I saw her at Florence.

Upon this head we would "take the ghost's word for a thousand pounds."

Since we have passed over the letters from the Levant, as too well-known to bear citation, we shall borrow one specimen of Lady Mary's descriptive powers, which remained unimpaired to the close of her advanced life, and became, in her latter Italian sketches, more attractive and graceful in their elegant, unstudied simplicity. After sojourning in many different towns of the Italian States, she settled for a length of years at Louvere, a watering-place near Brescia, and romantically situated upon the Lake of Isco. Here she bought a palace or castle, but it cost only one hundred pounds, with all its terraces marbles, balustrades, and grand saloons. "I have fitted up six rooms, with lodgings for five servants, which are all I ever will have in this place; and I am persuaded that I could make a profit if I would part with my purchase, having been very much favoured in the sale, which was by auction, the owner having died without children, and I believe he had never seen this mansion in his life, it having stood empty from the death of his grandfather. The governor bid for me, and nobody would bid against him. Thus I am become a citizen of Louvere, to the great joy of the inhabitants." This introduces the delightful picture of her residence and way of life:—

I have been these six weeks, and still am, at my dairy-house, which joins to my garden. I believe I have already told you it is a long mile from the castle, which is situate in the midst of a very large village, once a considerable town, part of the walls still remaining, and has not vacant ground enough about it to make a garden, which is my greatest amusement, it being now troublesome to walk, or even go in the chaise till the evening. I have fitted up in this farm-house a room for myself—that is to say, strewed the floor with rushes, covered the chimney with moss and branches, and adorned the room with basons of earthen ware (which is made here to great perfection) filled with flowers, and put in some straw chairs, and a couch bed, which is my whole furniture. This spot of ground is so beautiful, I am afraid you will scarce credit the description, which, however, I can assure, shall be very literal, without any embellishment from imagination. It is on a bank, forming a kind of peninsula, raised from the river Oglio fifty feet, to which you may descend by easy stairs cut in the turf, and either take the air on the river, which is as large as the Thames at Richmond, or by walking an avenue two hundred yards on the side of it, you find a wood of a hundred acres, which was all ready cut into walks and ridings when I took it. I have only added fifteen bowers, in different views, with seats of turf. They were easily made, here being a large quantity of underwood, and a great number of wild vines, which twist to the top of the highest trees, and from which they make a very good sort of wine they call bruseo. I am now writing to you in one of these arbours, which is so thick shaded, the sun is not troublesome, even at noon. Another is on the side of the river, where I have made a camp kitchen, that I may take the fish, dress, and eat it immediately, and at the same time see the barks, which ascend or descend every day to or from Mantua, Guastalla, or Pont de Vie, all considerable towns. This little wood is carpeted, in their succeeding seasons, with violets and strawberries, inhabited by a nation of nightingales, and filled with game of all kinds, excepting deer and wild boar, the first being unknown here, and not being large enough for the other.

My garden was a plain vineyard when it came into my hands not two years ago, and it is, with a small expense, turned into a garden that (apart from the advantage of the climate) I like better than that of Kensington. The Italian vineyards are not planted like those in France, but in clumps, fastened to trees planted in equal ranks, (commonly fruit trees,) and continued in festoons from one to another, which I have turned into covered galleries of shade, that I can walk in the heat without being incommoded by it. I have made a dining room of verdure, capable of holding a table of twenty covers; the whole ground is three hundred and seventeen feet in length, and two hundred in breadth. You see it is far from large; but so prettily disposed (though I say it) that I never saw a more agreeable rustic garden, abounding with all sorts of fruit, and producing a variety of wines. I would send you a pipe, if I did not fear the customs would make you pay too dear for it. I believe my description gives you but an imperfect idea of my garden. Perhaps I shall succeed better in describing my manner of life, which is as regular as that of any monastery. I generally rise at six, and as soon as I have breakfasted, put myself at the head of my needle-women and work with them till nine. I then inspect my dairy, and take a turn among my poultry, which is a very large inquiry. I have, at present, two hundred chickens, besides turkeys, geese, ducks, and peacocks. All things have hitherto prospered under my care; my bees and silk-worms are doubled, and I am told that, without accidents, my capital will be so in two years' time. At eleven o'clock I retire to my books. I dare not indulge myself in that pleasure above an hour. At twelve I constantly dine, and sleep after dinner till about three. I then send for some of my old priests, and either play at piquet or whist, till 'tis cool enough to go out. One evening I walk in my wood, where I often sup, take the air on horseback the next, and go on the water the third. The fishery of this part of the river belongs to me; and my fisherman's little boat (to which I have a green lutestring awning) serves me for a barge. He and his son are my rowers without any expense, he being very well paid by the profit of the fish, which I give him on condition of having every day one dish for my table. Here is plenty of every sort of fresh-water fish (excepting salmon;) but we have a large trout so like it, that I who have almost forgot the taste, do not distinguish it.

We are both placed properly in regard to our different times of life: you amidst the fair, the gallant, and the gay; I, in a retreat, where I enjoy every amusement that solitude can afford. I confess I sometimes wish for a little conversation: but I reflect that the commerce of the world gives more uneasiness than pleasure, and quiet is all the hope that can reasonably be indulged at my age.

I have mixed in my espaliers as many rose and jessamine trees as I can cram in; and in the squares designed for the use of the kitchen, have avoided putting anything disagreeable either to sight or smell, having another garden below for cabbage, onions, garlick. All the walks are garnished with beds of flowers, beside the parterres, which are for a more distinguished sort. I have neither brick nor stone walls; all my fence is a high hedge, mingled with trees; but fruit is so plenty in this country, nobody thinks it worth stealing. Gardening is certainly the next amusement to reading; and as my sight will now permit me little of that, I am glad to form a taste that can give me so much employment, and be the plaything of my age now my pen and needle are almost useless to me. . . . . .

I have had this morning as much delight in a walk in the sun as ever I felt formerly in the crowded mall, even when I imagined I had my share of the admiration of the place, which was generally soured before I slept, by the informations of my female friends, who seldom failed to tell me, it was observed that I had shewed an inch above my shoe-heels, or some other criticism of equal weight, which was construed affectation, and utterly destroyed all the satisfaction my vanity had given me. I have now no other but in my little housewifery, which is easily gratified in this country, where, by the help of my receipt book, I make a very shining figure among my neighbours, by the introduction of custards, cheesecakes, and minced pies, which were entirely unknown to these parts, and are received with universal applause, and I have reason to believe will preserve my memory even to future ages, particularly by the art of butter-making, in which I have so improved them, that they now make as good as in any part of England.

These, with reading, were the tranquil pleasures which consoled Lady Mary Wortley for absence from her native land, her daughter, and all her early connexions. Another of her amusements was composing memoirs of her own time, which she alleges she burned as fast as they were composed. Some of these writings came, however into the hands of the Countess of Bute, and a few fragments are published in this edition, which fully equal anything that might have been expected from her lively and unscrupulous pen. Of George I. she says, tersely—

The King's character may be comprised in very few words. In private life he would have been called an honest blockhead; and fortune, that made him a king, added nothing to his happiness, only prejudiced his honesty, and shortened his days. No man was ever more free from ambition; he loved money, but loved to keep his own, without being rapacious of other men's. He would have grown rich by saving, but was incapable of laying schemes for getting; he was more properly dull than lazy, and would have been so well contented to have remained in his little town of Hanover, that, if the ambition of those about him had not been greater than his own, we should never have seen him in England; and the natural honesty of his temper, joined with the narrow notions of a low education, made him look upon his acceptance of the crown as an act of usurpation, which was always uneasy to him. But he was carried by the stream of the people about him, in that, as in every action of his life. He could speak no English, and was past the age of learning it. Our customs and laws were all mysteries to him, which he neither tried to understand, nor was capable of understanding if he had endeavoured it. He was passively good-natured, and wished all mankind enjoyed quiet, if they would let him do so. The mistress that followed him hither was so much of his own temper, that I do not wonder at the engagement between them. She was duller than himself, and consequently did not find out that he was so; and had lived in that figure at Hanover almost forty years, (for she came hither at threescore,) without meddling in any affairs of the electorate; content with the small pension he allowed her, and the honour of his visits when he had nothing else to do, which happened very often. She even refused coming hither at first, fearing that the people of England, who, she thought, were accustomed to use their kings barbarously, might chop off his head in the first fortnight; and had not love or gratitude enough to venture being involved in his ruin. And the poor man was in peril of coming hither without knowing where to pass his evenings; which he was accustomed to do in the apartments of women, free from business.

This is enough. Radical as we are, we consider it highly probable that the court was not quite so profligate as Lady Mary has described it. If there were two editions of any scandalous tale, there is, we fear, little doubt about the one she would have adopted. Lady Mary might not invent; but she was, at all times, rather prone to embellish than extenuate. Her story of her early companion, Dolly Walpole, the sister of Sir Robert, should have been consigned to oblivion with the other obnoxious parts of her diary. The part which she assigns to the wife of Sir Robert Walpole, is abundantly infamous; and the Duchess of Wharton's is not only improbable, but a libel upon woman's nature. Dolly's history, which the good-natured Lady Mary seems to have sat down to compose, as soon as the poor girl (her friend) had made a good and a high marriage, is made the worst of. In the Introductory Anecdotes, it is said, from Lady Mary's Diaries, that Lord Townsend, "falling in love, at once proposed and was accepted;" and, in Lady Mary's history of the Court of England, that Sir Robert "Walpole had art enough to make him marry his sister Dolly. At that time, I believe, he did not propose much more advantage by the match, than to get rid of a girl that lay heavy on his hands." In short, Lady Mary's stories of her female acquaintances, like her descriptions of them, are to be received as those of a professed wit.

It would be unpardonable to omit one noble achievement of Lady Mary Wortley's life. We allude to her introduction of inoculation for small-pox into England. At Constantinople she became acquainted with this mode of treating a disease which was then the pest of Europe; and, apprehending all the advantages of the remedy, with judgment and courage which few women could have displayed, she subjected her only son to chances which she saw so favourable—and with the happiest results. Upon her return to England, Lady Mary did much to introduce this beneficial practice; and she appears to have incurred no little professional jealousy, opposition, and obloquy at the period, though the historians of the medical profession now represent this important discovery as having been received at once. The case is not singular. It is never easy to vanquish professional prejudices; nor yet, afterwards, to extort from the learned of any faculty, a candid confession of their obstinacy or repugnance to reform or improvement. It is said that no physician above forty, could ever be made to put trust in Hervey's discovery of the circulation of the blood.

But it is more than time we were drawing to a close with this attractive, and, as we believe, classic and enduring work. To the letters on Turkey, every English reader has been indebted for no mean part of his purest literary enjoyment; and the few specimens which we have selected from the three large volumes before us, shew that Lady Mary excelled in different styles. Her brilliant works are indeed unique in English literature. Upon her poetry and translations, we have not touched, as we deem them very inferior to her descriptive narratives and her familiar letters; although the "Town Eclogues," and some other pieces, have been generally admired, and the former praised by her detractor, Walpole, even to extravagance. The public we consider indebted to Lord Wharncliffe for this edition. It is, at least, an authentic one, though there is not much new correspondence of nearly equal value to that which we formerly possessed. The Introductory Anecdotes communicate many curious traits of out-worn manners and customs among the nobility; and as it regards Lady Mary personally, this part of the work is, on the whole, wonderfully impartial. That she was satirical, fully as free as became her privileged age, and spared nobody in her dashing strictures, is admitted. That she was not utterly infamous in depravity, the vilest of the vile, as has been asserted and assumed, is denied and disproved. If any one before put faith in Walpole's slanders and Pope's libels, that can no longer be done; yet we can hardly suppose that there are many reflecting persons acquainted with the history of that age, who now require to be convinced that, though far from being a pattern of discretion, or feminine amiability or excellence, this woman, so remarkable for the splendour of her talents, was never the utterly abandoned and foully degraded creature which malice or indifference to truth has represented.

A CHAPTER ON POLITICAL AGITATION; OR, MEMOIRS OF DR TROPE.

Spiritus intus alit; totamque infusa per artus,
Mens agitat molem, et magno se corpore miscet.—Æn.
Agita labris.—Hor.
"Agitate—agitate—agitate!"—Marquis of Anglesey's Letter.

The Duke of Wellington—in that stormy interval which immediately preceded the formation of Lord Grey's administration, when the voice of a nation, demanding reform of its time-worn institutions, rose from hollow and distant murmurs into tempestuous clamour—committed a signal and irretrievable blunder. His error was the more fatal, because it was based on the grossest ignorance. His Grace not only avowed his opposition to all reform, but scoffed at the numerous assemblies of the people, which had recently sent forth peremptory demands—miscalled "petitions"—for its concession; and declared, in his place in the House of Lords, that he considered "county meetings as no better than farces." The farces, however, turned out to be "physic" to his Grace; and the clumsy pantomime in which the ex-hero was then enacting the part of the "lean and slippered Pantaloon," was forthwith hustled by their agency from the political stage. Abundant proof has been since that period afforded of the efficacy of these comitial assemblies, in significantly demonstrating the direction of the popular wishes. When held simultaneously for a common object, they represent public opinion with an accuracy of portraiture which is nowhere else to be found. They reflect, veluti in speculo, the nation's will; and have often afforded an unerring index to legislative enactments. Forcibly did Earl Grey describe this effect, when he used the phrase of "pressure from without." Popular meetings, when followed up by vigorous resolutions and well-digested petitions, constitute a most ingenious mode of conveying a "friendly hint" to the statesman, or squeezing a reluctant will into compliance. Lord Grey's metaphor, no doubt, was borrowed from that elbowing and shouldering process, which, at county meetings themselves, is so frequently witnessed. The crowd at the door press upon those immediately before them, with a view to obtain a hearing; those who are outside the door press still more energetically with the same object: thus the whole moving mass is impelled forward—no matter what may be their individual wishes—until those in the inner circle itself are made to advance. Such is the onward impulse of the "pressure from without."

We will venture to affirm that his Grace of Wellington's creed has been enlarged since the passing of the Reform Act, by the introduction of the article, "I believe in county meetings." More than once has he of late declined to act with his party in opposing certain political measures which indices like these informed him could not be withheld. But, though his Grace's political rule of faith may have undergone a change, we will not vouch for any modification in his political tendencies.

His Grace declared once against all reform; and never since did he make one graceful concession. His Grace would still lacerate with scorpion whips the backs of British subjects.

A county meeting for political purposes is never a simultaneous movement. It is always originated by a very limited number of individuals. Sometimes a solitary one constitutes its nucleus. It is in the principal towns that these "originators" usually reside; for the means of acquiring political knowledge, and the stimulants to political energy, exist there in greater abundance. There is a vis inertiæ in the body politic, into which the vitalities proper that exist in the more active members must have time to diffuse themselves before symptoms of general activity will begin to be exhibited. Like beasts of burthen, the major part of mankind must be goaded before they will stir themselves to any purpose. This incipient stimulus is applied by the few "public-spirited individuals" (so they are phrased) of the district. The example of other districts is also, with those who are laggard in the political race, a frequent spur to action. Such is the anomalous constitution of human nature: inert and apathetic where its dearest interests are at stake—active to ill, and sleepless in the pursuit of gain—tardy in entering the lists, where the contest is for popular rights and free institutions—breathless with anxiety, when the prize is at length within their grasp—boastful of intellectual capacity, yet slavishly imitative and dependent as children on the operations of a few active minds for the direction of those efforts which are as indispensable for the preservation as they were essential to the acquisition of freedom. The energetic few are denominated, by the perpetuators of abuse, agitators. Be it so. Society, without their aid, would stagnate. Agitation is but another name for activity. These are the minds that contrive and originate. The rest find no difficulty in executing the work when it is once cut out. Until that point has been attained, they will not budge from their state of fixed apathy. The common herd are as sheep which would continue for ever browsing within the same limits, without dreaming of a better pasture, until the leader of the flock bestirs himself. He bounds across the style, and the rest follow his example, overleaping the obstacle with the utmost agility. Point out the way—the course is easily taken—and the finis laborum may be neither remote nor difficult of attainment; but the guide—the finger-post of flesh and blood—is indispensable. Before the glorious days of Bacon and his con temporaries, who would have dreamt of undervaluing the Aristotelian philosophy?—and yet what was so easy as, after that period, to demonstrate its errors? The herd followed without difficulty. Every fool could make the egg stand when Columbus had shewn the way. These were the human finger-posts—the agitators and innovators of the world of science. The scientific world is, however, greatly obliged to them; and the social world is quite as much indebted to those whom the shallow or the corrupt are wont to designate as officious agitators.

Had there been no O'Connell, it is not improbable that the Catholics would still have remained unemancipated. They undoubtedly would not have shaken off their degrading disabilities so soon. That great man's agitation raised up, almost created a public spirit in Ireland. Meetings for the purpose of petitioning were held in Dublin; and county after county caught up the flame in rapid succession, and kindled the torch of liberty. The force of example did much; that of local agitation, in pursuance of O'Connell's advice, did more. Men are seldom so obtuse as not to be able to appreciate the distinction between political rights and political grievances; but their estimate is, in most cases, too weakly formed, and their minds are too sluggish, to assume the posture of active remonstrance until a way has been prepared and facilities afforded. The path to the temple of liberty must be cleared of all obstructions by the pioneers of agitation, before the generality of men will make a step in their progress towards it.

Let not the aristocratic Liberal, then, despise the political agitator—albeit of plebeian descent and vulgar occupation. He may be fond of rubbing his skirts rather closely to the great men of his party; he may be intrusive, although out at elbows; and, from a conception, real or groundless, that he has been slighted, he may indulge, while haranguing the populace who dote upon his homespun oratory, and for whose welfare he is sincerely interested, in intemperate language, or even in virulent invective; he may sometimes urge his views too far, for he is almost necessarily of a sanguine temperament; he may be a cobbler, or a tailor, or a dealer in the smallest wares;—but in his capacity of agitator, he should ever be respected by the genuine lover of liberty. If his political views are ultra, they will be rendered innoxious by the good sense of society; if he use strong language, he will not be the less efficacious in instructing the people; if he has "a devil of a tongue," it may be beneficial for keeping high-bred and high-blooded gentlemen in order; if his coat be torn, he will not be hearkened to with less confidence by the people; if he be a cobbler, or a dresser of polls, he will not be a whit the worse handcraftsman for being a politician—the one may mend laws as well as broken leather, and the wit of the other may be as keen as his razor; while both may do the state some service, by reading and expounding the newspapers to those who frequent their shops. The agitator's uses, like those of adversity, are beneficial; and the village politician, though he may be "ugly and venomous" as the toad,

"Still wears a precious jewel in his head."

He thinks for the thoughtless, and acts for the social sluggard. He is the Coryphæus and Chorægus of public life. What storms are to the atmosphere—what tempests to the ocean—the agitator is to the political world. He sets its particles in motion, and produces a salubrious excitement. Agitation is no more to be proscribed, because individuals have sometimes abused the power which it confers, to the infliction of injury, than the admirable order established throughout the universe is to be sneered at, because whole forests are sometimes desolated by the whirlwind, and fleets engulfed in the ocean. Perfection is not an attribute of humanity or of human laws, any more than undisturbed tranquillity is of the physical world.

Agitators, like poets, are an irritable race; and a not unusual blemish in their character, is an overweening sensitiveness, pushed to a considerable distance beyond the bounds of mere self-respect. The desire to be specially courted, and the dread of being twitted, even in all friendliness, for peculiarities of language and manner, are strongly developed in their character and bearing. They are conscious of having attained to no small degree of social importance, and are apt to magnify in their own minds the political influence which they undeniably possess. They are frequently unfortunate in suggesting their own views to Members of Parliament and other leading men; for which elaborate painstaking, they are sometimes wished to the Devil. If the wish, at the moment it is conceived, be not carefully withheld from their observation, they are converted at once into implacable enemies; and the chances are ten to one that they will, at some future period, find an opportunity of retaliating the incivility, by detecting and exposing to the offender's constituents a flaw in his Parliamentary conduct. Pride is obviously at the root of this evil; and as long as men enjoy the privilege monstrari digito—a species of notoriety which necessarily attaches itself to successful orators, in whatever sphere they move—it is in vain to attempt to preach down personal vanity, or endeavour to persuade men accustomed to the music of their own "sweet voices," that what Ben Jonson terms,

"The liberal voice of Fame," is a deceitful trumpeter, or that the incense of popular praise emits an odour which wisdom should despise. Those who entertain a good opinion of their own powers, are too frequently led to confine a large portion of their affections within the limited circle of which "self" is a centre; and, adopting the Berkleian theory of immaterialism, to "dispense with the whole world beside." This is, however, a fault which is by no means confined to a particular class. Immaterialism, in this sense, is diffused over a very large proportion of English society. When the political agitator is attacked, his great error is the bitterness of his defence—when slighted, of his revenge.

Dick Trope was a fortunate man—fortunate in natural gifts, and in the conjunction of various propitious circumstances. Good-looking, without regular features; acute, without much depth; an imposing smatterer, without much learning—he was persuasive, although not remarkably eloquent; keen, though not subtle; caustic in sarcasm and bitter in invective, though incapable of grasping the arguments of an antagonist possessed of uncommon skill, and inadequate to the task of analyzing deeply a question of more than ordinary magnitude. Had Dick's mind been cast in a mould of much smaller dimensions, Dick would have passed through life as little better than a clod. But Dick was no clod; for, though not one particle too much did he possess of any one quality for general effect, Dick sailed manfully down the tide of life, and earned for himself no small portion of local glorification. Dick had a high opinion of his own mental excellence, and was gifted by nature with unlimited powers of talking; he was further possessed of "Matchless intrepidity of face"— and therefore Dick was an orator. He could not pretend to the possession of much originality, except in his manner, which was most energetically pounding. At a vestry meeting, Dick once flattened the curate's hat, by this species of rhetoric, into the shape of a pancake. So electrical was the effect produced upon his auditors by this "coup du jambe du mouton," that the item of five pounds for sacramental cakes, against which Dick was then inveighing, was forthwith reduced to one-twentieth the amount. This was one of the smallest of the miracles of oratory that Dick performed in his time. We have said that Dick did not possess much originality. He had, however, an excellent memory, and exhibited great skill in treasuring up the good sayings of others, and reproducing them afterwards to his delighted auditors, upon whom they came with the effect of gold just hewed from the mine. Dick read the newspapers with avidity: their editorial dicta were seldom lost, either to him or to his audience. He was also something of a petty-larceny man among the poets; and from those of their works which came within his reach, had stored his mind with an abundance of imagery, which he introduced, and of select passages, which he quoted, in his speeches—applicably or inapplicably, as the case might be, but most frequently with appropriate effect. Indeed his flights of fancy were sometimes ludicrously lofty, and his imagery as entangled as the mazes of the Cretan labyrinth. "The judicious grieved;" but Richard recked not of their smiles. He succeeded in effecting his twofold object; which was, firstly, to render the serious and sober part of his discourse effective, by the adventitious aids derived from his reading; and, secondly, to glorify himself in his own proper person—

"While still the wonder grew How ONE small head could carry all he knew."

Another "part of his system" was the occasional introduction of sesquipedalia verba, commonly called "jaw-breakers," which completed his triumph. To be sure, he sometimes mispronounced them, and not unfrequently misconceived their meaning. Upon one occasion, the classical schoolmaster of the district took him severely to task for calling the Peel administration a "con-cotton-ation of arrant humbugs."

"It is perfectly perspicuous, sir," quoth Dr Floggem, "that you have not applied yourself to deduce your principles of orthoepy from the well of English undefiled."

"Haven't I?" rejoined Dick. "Surely a man may drink at the well without swallowing the bucket!"

This metaphor has been commonly attributed to one of Kean's apologists; but with our friend Dick rests the honour of its invention. Although, when Dick was "i' th' vein," his rhetorical powers were scarcely inferior to those of the doughty knight who

"Scarce could ope
His mouth, but out there flew a trope," yet Dick's oratory was by no means of that school which administers its reasoning and verbiage in the proportion of a grain of wheat to a bushel of chaff. No, no! Dick might sometimes talk rhetoric by the rood; but he could talk sound sense, too, by the yard. His finer yarns were, as before stated, only occasional and illustrative; his exordiums, narrations, and perorations were all of sounder stuff, and homespun texture—appealing directly to the plainest understandings, and treating, in a downright matter-of-fact style, the subject, whatever it might be, of the day's discussion. Although Dick himself was of opinion that his brilliant flights of fancy were the groundwork of his popularity, it is very much to be doubted whether the homely truths which he uttered in a homely and forcible manner, did not constitute, after all, the secret of his success.

"Convince your audience that you are in earnest," says a great writer, "if you wish to speak effectively." So convinced of this truth was the celebrated Dr Young, that, upon one occasion, when he was preaching to an apathetic audience, in order to convince them that he was in earnest, he stopped short, and burst into tears, at what he termed "so sad a spectacle of unmoved indifference." Whether this was "clap-trap" or not, we do not mean to determine; but with our beloved Richard it certainly was perfectly natural. The veins of his forehead would swell, until they seemed on the point of cracking, when he had occasion to paint a deed of deep political turpitude. His eyes would sparkle with an almost supernatural fire, and become marvellously distended. His whole face would be suffused with a glow of fervent animation, as if every feature were converted into a "luminous escape of thought;" and all his motions and gestures were of the same striking character, like the symptoms of a brief epilepsy. Dick was undoubtedly an extraordinary man, although not of extraordinary intellect; and possessed a rare combination of those qualities which confer oratorical weight and influence.

It was in a Foundling Hospital that Dick first became conscious of existence. The moment he was ushered into this world, he was deposited in a basket—the fate of more than one great man in embryo—

"Without even a relic of drapery round him."

It was only the exceeding mildness of a sweet night in June, that prevented him from being made one of the victims of infanticide. The tender solicitude of a charitable elderly female, had him conveyed, the next morning, to the Foundling Hospital. Of course it was not from Richard's fault that he was thus made one of the "strays and waifs" of nature; but one of the bitterest pangs of his after life, was the facility which the knowledge of this circumstance gave to his enemies to sneer and jibe, when his back was turned. Few were bold enough to allude to his unrecorded birth in his presence—few were deterred by delicacy of sentiment. The meanness of human nature makes enemies for every man who has achieved even a temporary renown. Substance and shadow, reputation and envy, are equally close companions. But the withering force of Dick's well-known powers of retort protected him effectually from insult.

When Dick grew up into a sturdy youth, his shrewdness of observation and pleasing exterior attracted the notice of an eminent surgeon, who forthwith transplanted him to his establishment, to which Dick's activity and tact soon made him an extremely useful appendage. He did not "pick" his way to the secrets of science, but gathered up knowledge in handfuls, and, in the course of a few years, became almost as skilful a practitioner as his master. But he was also, at this period, making great progress in another art—"the art of love." The surgeon had a daughter—an only child—dear to him as the apple of his eye. She had also become dear to Dick; and the same qualities which had recommended him to the father, had found no small share of favour in the sight of Emily Potts. No wonder Dick's heart got the mastery over his head, for Emily was a sweet girl—fair as a lily, with "lustrous black eyes," finely pencilled brows, and raven locks floating in glossy ringlets over shoulders white as snow, and curved with exquisite grace—

"Her form was pliant as the shoots
Of a young tree in vernal flower,
Yet round and glowing as the fruits
That drop from it in summer's hour."

Old Potts one day caught the youthful pair in close conference in his garden. Dick's right arm was, by some strange accident, encircling Emily's waist, and his left was drawing her cheek closer to his, while his bold request—"Won't we get privately married, love?" was positively responded to in the affirmative—when smack came the old gentleman's stick across Dick's shoulders. The stick was shattered into pieces by the force of the blow. Astonishment, dismay—an attempt at explanation, and a refusal to listen to it—a beautiful girl in tears, an inexorable father—the word "bastard" pronounced in a tone into which Belial or Beelzebub could not have thrown more bitterness of contempt—and Dick made a retreat as precipitate as mingled rage and consternation could elicit from a pair of singularly active legs.

Dick had one sincere friend in the same town where his now indignant master resided; and to his house he forthwith repaired. His tale was briefly recited, and heartily, but in all kindness, laughed at. This ill-timed merriment he upbraided at first; but, being of an elastic temperament, soon laughed in his turn. He had one consolation left, of which all old Potts' venom could not deprive him: Emily would never prove false! Three quarters of an hour had just elapsed after the melo-dramatic denouément before narrated, when a note was placed in his hands. It bore his Emily's tiny superscription, and was sealed without the slightest appearance of perturbation or hurry. Admirable fortitude, which woman alone can summon to her aid in the hour of trial! Unshaken truth and wondrous fidelity! Such were our friend Dick's reflections as he tore open the seal, and exclaimed with Othello, (for Dick, as an amateur, had obtained some celebrity,) ——"Excellent wench!

Perdition catch my soul but I do love ye!"

Horror of horrors! he faints—he falls! and but for the ready arm of his friend Nixon, he would have measured his length on the floor. The next instant he was blaspheming away at a frightful rate, and coupling the name of his whilom beloved Emily with epithets which it would neither serve our purpose nor be wholesome to our readers to repeat. "D—n her! d—n her! d—n her!" he exclaimed, catching Nixon by the arm—"look what the —— has written."

Nixon read the note, which was as follows:—

"Sir,—After the extraordinary and unexpected disclosure which was made this morning it is impossible that I can ever see you more.

"I cannot but feel shocked at the gross and practised duplicity which, in trifling with my heart, could withhold from me all knowledge of the disgraceful cloud which overhangs your origin.

"In consideration of your present distress, I am directed by my father to enclose you ten sovereigns.

"Ignominy shall never be associated with the name of "Emily Potts.

"P.S.—The servant carries you your things."

Dick roared after the servant, who was by this time half way down the street, called for pen, ink, and paper, and wrote as follows—almost transcribing Miss Potts' epistle.

"Miss Emily Potts,—After the extraordinary and unexpected disclosure of your selfish heartlessness which was made this morning, it is impossible that I can love you more.

"I cannot but feel shocked at the gross and practised duplicity which could indite such an epistle, without staining it with a single tear, or misplacing the wax even the hundredth part of an inch.

"In consideration of your and your father's niggardly meanness, I re-enclose you your ten sovereigns.

"The paltry Pottses shall never be associated with the name of "RICHARD TROPE."

Though the guardian angel of Dick's good fortune deserted him here, he was far from being totally shipwrecked. His voyage in life only received a new direction. The sale of some surgical preparations, the fruit of his leisure hours, together with a sum of money which his disinterested friend Nixon advanced, enabled him to purchase the "good-will" of a small surgery, from the widow of the deceased occupant, in a provincial town at some distance. Here Dick, although without a diploma, contrived—by the aid of the experience which he had acquired at the establishment of the false Emily's father, united to an infinite degree of not unamiable assurance—effectually to cure some, and to wheedle all into the belief of his extraordinary powers. His natural volubility, aided by a bold assumption of learning, a plentiful sprinkling of Ollapodisms, and a grave seriousness of demeanour which would not have disgraced Boerhaave, pleased the men; and, by dint of talking, joking, and flattering, he insinuated himself effectually into the good graces of the women. Dr Trope soon became a very general favourite among the middle and lower classes. Upon one occasion, he moreover dosed out of a fit of galloping consumption the Dowager Lady Starchall's lap-dog; and was on the point of securing a good share of aristocratic patronage, when the fact of his not having been regularly bred to the profession coming to the lady's ears, he was discarded without mercy, and obliged to fall back upon the support of the humbler classes. Here, however, his "noontide of fame" never suffered an eclipse; and his ability was not for a moment disputed. Collegiate attestation they did not inquire after; and the knowledge of its absence did not detract from his merit, in the opinion of those who had sagacity enough to perceive that the half-dozen diplomas enjoyed by the "Grandee Doctor" of the town did not make him one whit less of a dunce.

As the sphere of Dick's practice extended, his social importance increased in proportion. From the period of his first arrival in ——, he had frequently nibbled at the character of a politician. Political meetings were not unfrequent at ——, which was a county town. Dick's early speeches were brief, and moderately well received. With the increase of the confidence which the people reposed in him, his speeches grew in length, and himself in popularity, until at length he became immovably established in this new character, by the successful opposition which he gave to a bare-faced grand jury job, by which the county court-house, although an exceedingly commodious one, was to have been pulled down and re-erected, for the purpose of enriching some dependants of an aristocratic junto. Dick summoned a meeting of the inhabitants, anatomized the pettifogging scheme in a speech in which he was more than usually felicitous, and passed a series of vigorous condemnatory resolutions. From this period, Dick became the victim of all the malevolence of all the aristocratic branches and dependencies throughout the neighbourhood. The people clung to him more tenaciously than ever. The very persecutions which were perpetually drizzling upon him like sleet, from the higher regions of society, tended to confirm into tenfold strength his character of assertor of the poor man's rights, and chivalrous champion of the weak against the "proud man's contumely" and injustice. The aristocrats of the neighbourhood soon became cautious and circumspect in their movements. The dread of Dick's tongue was ever uppermost in their minds. That tongue was a perfect blood-sucker—as tenacious as one of his own leeches, when an opportunity was afforded for its exercise. Many and many an act of meditated injustice, was crushed in the shell unhatched; because to escape, in its perpetration, from Dick's searching surveillance, was clearly impracticable. Dick's was a twofold sphere of usefulness—the application of moral and physical remedies to constitutional ills of either description. The health of the body as well as of the body corporate—the salus individua, and the salus reipublicæ, were equally the objects of his care.

Dick had been but for a short time resident in ——, when the blooming daughter of a wealthy farmer attracted his attention. His "petits soins" were eminently successful; and the moment he had achieved a lasting popularity by his successful resistance to the grand jury job of which we have already made mention, (a resistance which at once established him as a political leader,) he wooed and won the lovely Kate, and with her an accession of funds so handsome as to enable him to take and furnish an excellent house, in which the "compounding department" was in no wise neglected, either in point of space or of splendour. A strong-built, yet not clumsy horse, and a four wheeled vehicle, of which it would be difficult to ascertain the genus, were purchased concurrently with the new house; and Mr and Mrs Doctor Trope were now able to "ruffle it with the best of them," whether on Sunday or week day. As the stately carriage of my Lady Starchall would roll past Dick's shandrydan, a liberal use of her eye-glass, and a very visible sneer, often informed Dick of the state of her Ladyship's feelings; and, upon those occasions, he would sometimes mentally ejaculate, "D—n her! ungrateful old tabby—why didn't I kill the cur!" Constantly, as the vehicles of her Ladyship and "the Doctor" met, the petted cur, with hair as white and soft as her Ladyship's boa, would stretch its head out of the carriage window, and bark—positively bark at the man whose divine art had rescued it from the fangs of death! "Ungrateful as its mistress!" would be Dick's reflection; and then the cold sweat would literally bedew his forehead, as the thought would pass across his mind, that the cur had been taught to bark at him, and at him exclusively! Your geniuses are always particularly sensitive.

No increase of reputation, or accession of fortune, ever abated one jot of Dick's ardent desire to be identified with the mass of the people. An excellent house and a four-wheeled vehicle would have turned the heads of many men, and tempted most to cringe to the aristocracy. But Dick's was a sturdy virtue and an honest pride. He set infinitely more value on the confidence which the people (as distinguished from those born with silver ladles in their mouths) universally reposed in him, than in the certainty which a prostitution of principle would have afforded him of sitting, in due gradation, at the tables of the great. Persecuted—scoffed at for his honesty—sneered at by the clique of which Lady Starchall was a prominent member—barked at by her Ladyship's dog—not only was Dick kept aloof from aristocratic intercourse by a feeling of indomitable pride, but a keen acerbity of feeling was engendered in his mind, having, for its object, all who were even remotely connected with his persecutors.

One of Dick's most prominent faults, was the too frequent indulgence in sallies, characterised as often by severity as humour, against "the Starchall clique," in whom the desire to extinguish his influence was at length engendered. A plot was secretly hatched for that purpose, in her Ladyship's drawing-room—ay, in her drawing-room. Her nephew, the Hon. Augustus Starchall—a moderately clever, but much over-rated young man, who had just concluded his studies at Cambridge, and had an eye to the representation of the burgh—was selected as the instrument for carrying it into effect.

A county meeting was, at this period, convened, to be held in ———, for the purpose of passing a vote of confidence in a newly-chosen ministry. Their politics being more popular than those of their predecessors, the people at large concurred in the object of the meeting, with a large segment of the aristocracy, embracing the genuine liberals, the time-servers, and the expectants on Providence. The Hon. Mr Starchall, being of the latter class, had signified his intention of moving the principal resolution, and occupied the entire interval of a fortnight, previous to the meeting, in preparing a speech, which was to set up his oratorical reputation for life. The "Institutes of Quintilian," "Longinus on the Sublime," "Cicero de Oratore," Pope's "Essay on Taste," and Lord Kaimes' "Elements of Criticism," were all consulted in turn; and his Lordship's reading in each revised for the great occasion; while a posture-master and a tenth-rate tragedian from London, were specially engaged for the purpose of investing the honourable debutant with their several adventitious aids. Everything, in short, that money could procure, was made tributary to the one grand object of enabling the future legislator in aspiration, to deliver his maiden speech with "due emphasis and discretion." Our friend Dick had heard of all these preparations, (for from him nothing was concealed,) and, bearing a keenly sensitive remembrance of the puppyism displayed by young Starchall upon some half-dozen occasions, when, his aunt having smiled at Dick's passing equipage, he laughed himself outright, Dick was determined that the young honourable should, on this occasion, receive some token of his indignant resentment. More Christian-like would it have been in Dick to afford facilities to the youthful display even of one by whom he had been bitterly insulted. Dick was, however, human-like in all, and felt that condescension might be rewarded with contempt. But into the composition of his pride, which might have been excessive, not one particle of narrow selfishness entered.

The High Sheriff of the county was a Starchall; but his politics were of the most ultra class. A violent supporter of the administration which had been just dismissed from power, he was a consistently vehement opponent of the newly-chosen ministry. A very numerously signed requisition, for convening a meeting of his bailiwick, was presented to him in the present instance; but not only did he refuse to comply with this proposal, but stigmatized the contemplated meeting in the most unmeasured terms, and expressed his individual opinion that he would be a traitor to his king and country, if, by any overt act, he was even indirectly to concur in any expression of confidence in the acts of men whose accession to office he looked upon as a national insult as well as injury. In Ireland, such language as this coming from a high sheriff, would, after the last twelvemonth's experience, excite but little surprise. It was not so, however, in England, at the period to which we allude. The most unmitigated astonishment at the Sheriff's audacity pervaded all classes of the community. The meeting was held in the county court-house, in despite of the Sheriff's interdict, and an exceedingly large and influential assembly it was. In the preparatory meeting, for the arrangement of the resolutions, our hero, departing from his conduct upon all former occasions, took no part whatever. But the moment the requisitionists appeared upon the platform, Dick presented himself to the meeting, and the cheers and cries of "Hear the Doctor!" were such as palpably to exhibit the extent of his popularity. "What can the fellow mean?" was buzzed about among the exclusive circles; but Dick, although hearing them distinctly, proceeded with his rôle, and, with a multitude of elaborate compliments, proposed, in all due form, as the most fit and proper person to fill the chair, THE HONOURABLE AUGUSTUS STARCHALL! The most ludicrous confusion upon the platform followed this announcement; but the crowd applauded so lustily that to interfere with the nomination was next to impossible. To preclude the possibility of an amendment being moved, Dick resumed the subject, and having spoken at some length upon the amiable diffidence—ever allied to talent—which the honourable young gentleman had exhibited, he achieved his point with the utmost success, and installed the young man, nolens volens, into a chair which he occupied with as much reluctance as if he had been forced into Procrustes' bed. The efforts which young Starchall made to deliver an opening address, suitable to his new and unexpected situation, were truly pitiable. With much difficulty he succeeded in boggling through a few disjointed sentences of thanks, and having miserably failed in the attempt to lug in some portions of the prepared speech, he sat down in the midst of a tempest of half-friendly, half-ironical "hear, hears," coughing, and applause, with which some very audible laughing was intermingled. The maiden effort at oratory of the Honourable Augustus Starchall was "a dead failure," and his situation of chairman precluded the possibility of redeeming his bedeviled character by firing off his prepared pocket-piece. It was a mischievous revenge to which Dick had resorted, and Dick himself was almost sorry for what had happened. There sat the young man, the visible picture of mortification, biting his lips with unnatural energy. His whole face, from forehead to chin, from ear to ear, was clothed in a flaming suit of what Corporal Bunting, in the novel of "Eugene Aram" calls, "Love's scarlet regimentals." But if his disappointment had been ten times as great, he had earned it all by the scandalous indelicacy of his systematic sneering at our friend Dick's just pretensions to decency of exterior and comfort.

The routine business of the meeting having been transacted, Dick submitted a resolution of censure upon the High Sheriff's conduct and language, which he successfully exposed in a speech which surpassed all his former efforts. At every step of his progress he was heartily cheered. His resolution was duly seconded; but the chairman, a first cousin of the High Sheriff, refused to propose it. Loud cries to have the resolution put from the chair, came from every quarter of the meeting. The chairman consulted with his immediate friends, and remained obstinate. Two of these advisers made themselves particularly conspicuous in their opposition to Dick's resolution, and one of them uttered (loudly enough to be heard by the whole meeting) the phrase, "Quack Doctor!" The other, with equal emphasis, called him "a bastard!!"—epithets which the chairman, forgetful of his station, loudly and scornfully repeated. Tremendous was the uproar which instantaneously ensued. Dick, who was remarkably well-built and active, commenced a course of corporeal infliction upon the three scions of the aristocracy who had thus dishonoured him. A scuffle ensued; and, as Dick's adherents far outnumbered those of his antagonists, in a very few minutes the aristocratic party were made to disappear. The most cowardly of the clique were the chairman and the two others, who had made themselves most prominent in inflicting gratuitous insult.

Dick was unanimously voted into the chair; upon taking which, he made a most feeling and judicious speech. In alluding, however, to the epithets with which his name had been coupled, he became personally abusive, as most men under similar circumstances would have done:—"The cowardly rascals!" he exclaimed. "You saw how they made good their words! They were prodigal of odious epithets, but not one of them was man enough to withstand the object of their venom. You saw how they fled—one of them like a cur, with his tail between his legs; the other like a rat, with his tail in a trap; and the third like a monkey, that never had so much as a tail to boast of!"

This ludicrous passage was, of course, cheered to the echo; and the resolution condemnatory of the Sheriff's conduct having been unanimously carried, and a memorial to Government upon the subject agreed to, the meeting separated, after giving three hearty cheers for Ministers, and three for Dr Trope.

Ever after this event, Dick was the first political man in the district—elevated in the popular estimation far beyond the reach of his enemies. We do not hold Dick excused for spoiling young Starchall's speech; but we would have every man of aristocratic pretensions and haughty demeanour to be warned by the fate of that hairbrained young aspirant and his injudicious friends.

THE RIGHT OF PRIMOGENITURE—MR EWART'S MOTION.*

THERE is no question of greater importance than that which forms the subject of the pamphlet now under our consideration. It affects us not only in the most private relations of domestic life—in the arrangement and disposition of our property, the choice of a profession, and the means to be placed within our reach when we embark in life—but it has great political consequences, which concern the welfare, more or less, of every class of the community—the peer and the peasant, the lordly bishop and the humble curate. It is singular that a question of such deep import to the community—one, moreover, which is more or less brought home to the bosom of nearly every member of that numerous and intelligent class who subsist by professional labour—should have so long passed almost wholly without notice, and that the common law course of descent should have been considered by many as part of the course of nature, and sanctioned by revelation. It is peculiar to the jurisprudence of England, to permit the existence of evils and abuses which have nothing to make them respectable but their antiquity, to remain in a kind of hopeless and helpless inactivity; and, sooner than call upon the legislature to remove them, to elude them by what is termed by Mr Bentham the art of judicial lying, and even in some cases by actual and direct perjury. The fiction of fines and recoveries, and the disgusting absurdity of benefit of clergy, have indeed passed away; but the laws respecting idiocy and deodands are still in full force and vigour, and their hard and unjust consequences are only avoided by the good-natured and immoral laxity of jurors, who prefer perjury to injustice, and save the property of their neighbours at the expense of their own consciences. In England, such has been the dread of calling first principles in question, that even apparent absurdities have been assumed as such. We have thought whatever has been, has been right, and have treated with veneration and respect even those sources from which almost unmixed evils have for ages flowed down upon the country. Among other false gods that we have thus set up and worshipped, is this monstrous Juggernaut of injustice, to which but too many among those reputed most liberal still bow the knee and offer human victims. Of late, however, attention has been more closely directed to the subject; and, as Mr Ewart has given notice that he shall repeat his motion of last session, we need not doubt that the renewed discussion will so expose the impolicy and monstrous injustice of primogeniture in all its ramifications and bearings, that the public will at last pass sentence upon the practice, though the law itself, with many other grievances, must be patiently endured until some change take place in the House of Lords. Besides their natural antipathy to improvement, the Lords look upon primogeniture as the mainstay and very foundation of their order.

Mr Ewart's motion did not embrace the entire question. It was limited to the operation of the law of descent, which never works but to work an injustice; and is wholly inoperative, except in those cases where it is absolutely mischievous. Mr Ewart proposed that, where a person seised of real estate died intestate, the inheritance should be divided among his children equally, instead of falling wholly to the share of the eldest. This proposal, so consonant to justice and humanity—to the moral duties of parents towards their children—was opposed not only by the members of the Opposition—not only by the dead-weight and leaden ballast of the House of Commons—not only by the dense resisting medium of our political system—but by the leaders of the Liberal party; and not only by their votes, but by their voices. To the arguments—if such, indeed, they can be called—of Lord John Russell and the Attorney and Solicitor-General on this occasion, the first ten pages of this pamphlet are dedicated—a labour which the well-meaning writer might have wholly spared himself, as the reasoning which he refutes contains an absurdity so apparent that he who runs may read, and carries with it its own complete and entire refutation. The sum and substance of the opposition to Mr Ewart's motion was, that the question raised by him was an abstract point; and that, were his proposition to be carried, it would be wholly or nearly inefficacious, as intestacy is of rare occurrence, and consequently little evil is caused by the law as it stands. The first objection is entirely untrue. The great and abstract question of primogeniture—if, indeed, a practical question of that magnitude, can, with propriety, be called abstract—was not raised by Mr Ewart. The second objection is wholly and palpably absurd. Be the cases few or many in which intestacy occurs, they are the only cases in which the law of primogeniture operates. The evil in those cases is admitted. If they are few, the change must be too small to do harm. If many, they are then of sufficient consequence to set the legislature in motion to prevent them. But, admitting, for the sake of argument, the rarity of cases of intestacy, and the consequent minuteness of the evil occasioned by it, yet no argument can be drawn from the rarity in this case. Mr Ewart, calls upon the legislature not to enact a law for the prevention of an accidental and casual evil, but to change an unjust law, which, of itself, occasions the evil; and to remove an anomaly in our code which compels a man, when living, to support his infant offspring, but may cause him, against his wishes, his intention, and his duty, to throw him on the parish at his decease. Well, indeed, may our author style the speeches made on this occasion, "a beggarly account of empty boxes;" and well, indeed, may he express his astonishment that men of acknowledged ability should have uttered them.

But was the opposition really made to Mr Ewart's motion? Just, reasonable, and necessary, that measure was too limited in its extent and operation to incur an opposition so decided for its own sake. If we consider it as a resistance in limine to a change in the practice of primogeniture, we may then better understand the nature and causes of this opposition, and may account, in some degree at least, for the inconsistencies into which Mr Ewart's opponents have been betrayed. We can conceive that Lord John Russell, though he has successively vanquished many of the prejudices incident to his birth, and has earned for himself a brighter lustre than descent could confer upon him, may still cling with veneration to what he believes necessary to the subsistence of an hereditary aristocracy, which the house of Russell has long so adorned; and may scruple to break ground, even at a remote distance, against the venerable fortress of hereditary rank. We can imagine, too, how the Attorney-General, who, like Banquo, shall get "Lords," though he be none, may hesitate to endanger the order in which his posterity will be numbered. With considerations like these, they view the subject in a false position, and have committed the error of defending with too great pertinacity the most untenable outwork of a position not tenable itself; and have thus given the advantage to their opponents in this attack upon what, though itself absurd and mischievous, is not so palpably bad as that which Mr Ewart seeks to remedy.

Our author then proceeds to demonstrate that cases of intestacy are by no means so rare as is commonly supposed, and to shew that, however suited to the wealthy, the present law is productive of frequent misery among the poorer classes.

He then examines an assertion contained in the speech of Lord John Russell, that—"If the House agreed with the honourable Member for London, in declaring the existing law of descent of property to the eldest son an injustice, it would be obliged, as a consequence, to do that which the French people had compelled the French Chamber of Deputies to do—namely, to pass a law taking away the power of committing such injustice; or, in other words, to determine that, where a man had a certain number of children and a certain amount of property, he should not give a larger portion to one than another, but distribute equally, according to the laws of justice"—(P. 17.) Our author points out how entirely illogical is the noble Lord's deduction, and shews, by the examples of other countries, that perfect freedom of disposition by the parent, and even the existence of entails, is compatible with equal partibility in cases of intestacy. Indeed, it is unnecessary to look abroad for instances. The common law of Kent, where all sons inherit, to the exclusion, however, of females, and numerous copyhold manors throughout England, where gavelkind prevails, are practical refutations of the noble Lord's assertion, no less cogent and powerful than the settlements which are daily made of personal estate, giving the same undue and unnatural preference to the eldest son which the law has given in the descent of freeholds.

Lord John Russell, indeed, slightly hints at the bearing of the motion on the question of primogeniture in general; but it is by Mr Tooke, an attorney, that the broad ground is stated.

"This," said that learned gentleman, "was a question involving one of the fundamental bulwarks of the constitution and stability of the country, extending to the total destruction of that fair and reasonable influence which the property and aristocracy of the country was allowed to possess. He called upon the House, therefore, to interpose against the very initiatory step of such a measure as the present, and not allow it to be brought even to a second reading!"—Pp. 24, 25.

Here is the general question of the expediency of primogeniture opened, and the broad ground upon which Lord John Russell and the Attorney-General might, without inconsistency, have made their stand, stated openly and fairly. With this broad question our author does not venture to grapple, but confines himself to the effects of Mr Ewart's proposal. He considers, it is true, at some length the propriety of sacrificing the immediate object of a law to some supposed remote political object to be attained by it; the propriety, in short, of prescribing, as a remedy for a particular disorder, that by which it may be aggravated instead of relieved; and pleading as an apology, that, though the cough or fever for which the physician was called in, may be rendered incurable, the general system of the patient may be improved. We apprehend that the shorter and more satisfactory course would have been, to have at once taken the "bull by the horns," and to have denied the supposed advantages of primogeniture, the supposed beneficial effects of Mr Tooke's nostrum. Our author does indeed point out the evils produced by it in private families, and shews on this ground strong and cogent reasons against it, sufficient to convince any unprejudiced persons. We regret that he has not thought it within the scope of his design, to point out the strong political objections which exist to primogeniture, and the absolute falsehood of its supposed benefits. When we read the title of the work, we hoped that we should have seen the weak and absurd arguments of Paley held up to ridicule and contempt, and the monstrous fallacies of Burke on the artificial accumulation of real property examined and exposed; that we should have been presented with a succinct history of the causes of the prevalence of primogeniture throughout great part of Europe; that we should have seen it traced upwards to the feudal system, and the times of military tenures and rural slavery; and that, when the veneration with which the practice has so long been regarded was removed, by an explanation of the causes which had given birth to it, its effects on our political system would have been sketched out; and that most false of all false positions, that an aristocracy is the cheap defence of nations, treated as it deserves. There is, indeed, hardly one of the supposed benefits of primogeniture, which may not be proved to be an evil. How true is the saying, that idleness is the mother of mischief! Human nature is alike in all ranks. The labourer will hardly work without the excitement of necessity; and we must not expect great exertions from those whose circumstances place them at once in affluence; nor that those on whom distinction has been conferred by the mere accident of birth, will labour to deserve it. The maintenance of one class in idleness is almost synonymous with their maintenance in vice. The existence of this in one class gives opportunities and temptations to its practice in others: gambling and horse-racing, the pastimes of the peerage, have their charms too for the groom 'prentice boy. The keeping up of great families, which we have been taught to regard as one of the main ends of primogeniture, is, in fact, but a minor instance of the hereditary castes and offices which exist in India. By this, the supply of our army and navy is restricted to a few favoured families, to whom the church also is devoted; and we are thus not only saddled with the maintenance—by silly, unmeaning places at court, pensions, sinecures, and commissions—of the scions of noble and illustrious houses, but we are forbidden to dig into that unexplored mine of latent treasure to be found among the masses of our population, and deprived of the services of thousands who, but for the artificial difficulties thus placed in their path, would constantly rise to consideration and eminence. The unnatural maintenance of a small remnant in the highest rank and places of greatest consideration in society, renders it the interest of those of whom it is composed to deny to those beneath them the means of attaining the same eminence, and to maintain them as far as possible in a state of servitude, ignorance, and brutality. To this we may ascribe the apathy or reluctance shewn to the introduction of a comprehensive system of national education—that ladder by which the foolish cannot climb, that strainer which would sweep down the scum to the dregs of the political vessel, and permit the truly refined and deserving alone to rise up to the surface. The tendency of primogeniture, like injustice of all kinds, is to check the wholesome and natural competition of individuals for pre-eminence and station, and to convert society, from a clear stream of running water, to a stagnant pool, with weeds floating on the surface, into which, if a few clear bubbles spring up from beneath, they are speedily assimilated to the superficial scum into which they force their way.

But we have already exceeded our limits, and have now only to express our regret that our author has confined his attention to that portion of the question which least required his assistance, and has neglected the consideration of the indirect but most important consequences of primogeniture.

POLITICS AND POETRY.

A WORD FROM GOETHE AND A WORD TO GOETHE.

To have made Goethe a great man, as he undoubtedly was a great poet, there was only wanting one circumstance: that he should have been born a Briton, and not a German—that he should have lived in London, and not in Weimar. If it be true, as Schiller has it, that—

"Es wächst der Mensch mit seinem grösserem Kreise," then the converse of the maxim is also true, that—

> "Narrow the sphere of action, and the man
> Is narrowed with it."

Thus, taking men as men are constituted, it might have been most certainly predicated, a priori, that the young, robust Goethe of Frankfort, transplanted into the delicate glass-house of a petty German court, at the age of five-and-twenty, and there nursed and nurtured by the smooth hands of princes and princesses, during the quiet uniformity of an octogenarian life—must have necessarily degenerated into the dreaming philosophe, and the curious artist, who shrinks back with an instinctive dread from the rough conflicts and collisions of life. We do not mean here to say anything against the private or public character of the Duke Charles Augustus, or the Duchess Louisa of Weimar. Their worth is universally acknowledged, and none but a malicious person would dare to spit a spot of black venom upon their pure vestments; but, with all their excellences, they belonged to the order of princes; and it has always been our opinion that a prince is not the highest style of man, and that a court is not the most fitting atmosphere for a poet. So long as we hold this opinion, we cannot but lament deeply that Goethe ever went to Weimar; and, after long and patient study, we are convinced that his residence there acted most unfavourably, not only upon his poetical activity, but upon what is, in our eyes, of more importance—his character as a man. It is in vain, indeed, that some critics, more subtle than sound, set themselves to make a nice distinction between the character of the poet and the character of the man. If poetry be, as it has been well designated, the blossom of humanity, it is impossible that it can be independent of that root and stem of human character from which it springs. A reckless and vicious man may, indeed, shoot forth wild arabesques of fancy, and make the black atmosphere of his moral deformity resplendent with the meteors of his wit; but the health, the dignity, the purity of feeling that pervades the soul of the true poet, as from the presence of an indwelling god, will be sought for in vain. To write a heroic poem, the first great essential, as Milton says, is, that yourself be a hero; and the best preparation for writing truth, is to act it—ποιειν την αληθειαν, as the evangelist expresses it.

No person can read Goethe's later works without being convinced that these remarks apply with very great force to him. We do not, indeed, say, that, living in any part of Germany, born, as he was, in the middle of the last century, it was to have been expected that he should ever turn out a hero in the world of action. But there was something sound and healthy, and essentially human, in his "Götz von Berlichingen," and others of his early works, which gave promise of better things than the "West-Eastern Divan," and the second part of "Faust." We say better things, with a special reference to the common sympathies and feelings of healthy humanity; for, so far as mere luxuriance of a rich and playful fancy is concerned, nothing could be better than the second part of "Faust," while the "West-Eastern Divan" is a perfect harem of poetical voluptuousness, such as an Eastern sultan might rejoice to have recourse to when satiated with his real one. But in these works we seek in vain for anything strong—anything energetic—anything by which the whole active man may be steeled against the rude insults, and strengthened to work himself through the hard duties of life. Compare the "Prometheus Vinctus" of Aeschylus with the second, or, if you please, with the first part of "Faust," and you will understand what we mean. Look at the Titan! With what unbending force of moral energy he stands alone against the whole host of despot gods, nursing a hate of tyranny too deep to be spoken! See with what calm disdain he rejects the repeated supplications of Ocean and Ocean's daughters! and with what an air of conscious superiority he turns a deaf ear to the overtures of Herald Mercury, subservient minion of the usurped dynasty of Olympus! Look now at Faust! Here you have neither clear intellect nor decided will. You see a creature of groping speculation and dreaming mysticism, suddenly metamorphosed into a base and degraded sensualist, as irresolute in active life as he was confused and sceptical in theoretical. This creature sells his soul to the Devil, as it would seem, for no other purpose than that he may make use of the daring hand of a supernatural power to attain the enjoyment of base, sensual pleasures—fruits which his own milky villany had no courage to pluck. In the outset of his career, however, he does at times indicate the existence of feelings in his bosom such as a noble and generous mind can sympathise with. The prison scene with Margaret is true to nature and satisfactory to our moral sense. This forms a worthy conclusion to the first part of the poem. But follow the sensualist in his ripened career, and see in what garb he appears. He is now the mere football of whim and fancy—a thing not only destitute of all energy of character, but without any character at all; a trifling plaything in the hand of a trifler; a soap bubble, blown into existence by one who has the name of a devil and the nature of a buffoon. The metaphysical dreamer is now changed—very naturally perhaps—into a child, and, like a child, amused with vulgar harlequinading shows and empty juggleries of fire and water. The loves of the sensualist are now become as unsubstantial as himself—the phantom εἴδωλον of an ancient adulteress must submit to the embraces of a modern libertine; and, to crown all, this most recherché of all sensualists is serenaded into Heaven by the liltings of a few boys, for no other reason that we can see than because he has neither strength, nor stuff, nor spirit enough to be a proper inmate of Hell.

It is not our intention to follow out these remarks—as might easily be done—by an examination of the whole series of Goethe's works. Let this one instance suffice to shew, that whoever wishes to train his mind to manly energy and independence of character, must seek it in some Avatar of "the divine" very different from Johann Wolfgang von Goethe. In a work, for instance, of Goethian memorabilia which has lately appeared,* we find the following specimen of very flimsy critical sophistry, to prove that the ideas of "fatherland" and "patriotism" are no parts of a poet's universal heritage, and that the true "artist" must necessarily freeze up his human feelings against all sympathy with the great political regenerations of his species:—

"It is affectation in us moderns," said Goethe, speaking of the celebrated destiny-tragedians, "to bring the old Greek idea of Fate upon the stage. We would do better to say, with Napoleon—Politics is fate. But let us beware how we say, with our most recent literary men, that politics is poetry, or that politics is, in any respect, a proper subject for poetry. The English poet Thomson wrote a very good poem on 'The Seasons,' but a very bad poem on 'Liberty;' and this not from any want of poetry in the poet, but from a want of poetry in his subject.

"As soon as a poet becomes a politician, he must necessarily throw himself into the arms of a party; and as soon as he does this, he is lost for ever as a poet; he must forego for ever his fine bird's eye view of human affairs, and draw over head and ears the cap of narrowness and of blind party hate.

"A poet will, as a man and a citizen, love his fatherland; but the proper fatherland of his poetical activity is the good, the noble, and the beautiful that is confined to no geographical province, but waits everywhere throughout the wide universe for the poet's appropriation. Herein the son of the muse is like the eagle, who hovers with free glance over many lands, and to whom it is a matter of indifference whether this hare that he is about to make his prey, runs over Prussian or Saxon ground.

"And, after all, what is the meaning of these fine-sounding phrases—Love your country—Be an active patriot—and so forth? If a poet has been earnestly occupied during a long life in combating pernicious prejudices, clearing up misty views, purifying the taste and ennobling the intellect of his people, in what way better than this can he shew himself a true and a zealous patriot? To demand anything more of a poet would be almost as reasonable as to demand of the head of a regiment that he should busy himself with modern revolutions, and, in the heat of his political zeal, become indifferent to the condition and discipline of his corps. But the fatherland of a true officer of the army is his regiment, and the only legitimate way in which he can shew his love for that fatherland, is by attending to the state of his battalions, and keeping them in active readiness for the service of their country whenever it shall stand in need of their services.

"I hate all bungling interference in foreign matters as I hate sin, and most of all do I hate all bungling interference with matters of state, whereby thousands and millions of a people have been ruined.

"It is not my fashion to concern myself much about what other people say about me; but I have ears, and I know very well what a certain set of young literateurs have been lately philippising against me. Though I have worked like a slave all my life long, and done everything in my power, within my own proper province of art, to benefit my country, yet these gentlemen count all my exertions as worse than nothing, and vanity, because I have always considered it beneath me to identify myself with a political party. To please such critics, I must have become a member of a Jacobin club, and preached blood and murder! But I will not speak another word on this miserable theme, lest I should myself lose my reason in attempting to inoculate reason into that which is essentially unreasonable."

* "Gespräche mit Goethe, in den letzun Jahren seines Lebens von Johann Peter Eckermann. Leipzig. 1836.

Now, this whole passage which we have extracted at length, is a specimen of as glaring one-sidedness as we, who are no believers in the many-sided universality of the Weimarian bard could have happily stumbled upon. It contains two propositions equally false and equally emasculate. The first proposition here openly expressed is, that a poet should not only seclude himself from all share in the active business of life, but also keep his mind from any fellow-feeling or warm brotherly sympathy with political changes. The second proposition, which is covertly implied in this passage, is, that a poet, if he allows his mind to think upon political subjects at all, must necessarily espouse the weak and milky tenets of Toryism. Perhaps these two propositions, though different in the form of words, are not substantially distinct; for no man who has looked with an eye of common discernment into the character of the individuals of whom political parties are composed, can have failed to observe, that, wherever a man is weak, timid, irresolute, and, as it were a cipher in political sentiment, that man will be found, in the hour of trial, skulking in the defeated rear of Toryism. To say that a man has no politics, is, accordingly, practically equivalent to saying that he is a Conservative. And, in perfect accordance with this remark, we find that Goethe, though he constantly gave himself out as a man of no political party, was, nevertheless, at soul and bottom, a Conservative; and we find him upon all occasions preaching Tory doctrines, and looking with a jealous eye upon the noble band of patriot poets whom he saw rising up in Swabia:—"Mark me," said he to Eckermann*—"Uhland is ruined for ever. The politician will swallow up the poet; for to live in daily conflict and ferment is altogether inconsistent with the TENDER NATURE OF A POET." This speech is worth remembering. With Goethe the poet is nothing but an eye, lined with a most exquisitely sensitive retina, upon which the multifarious pictures of nature and art play their most whimsical and planless dance. The "artist" may look, but he may not strike. No matter what scenes of injustice and oppression may be enacted before him—he is not supposed to have human blood or human feelings; and where a vulgar man would raise his sword and smite a tyrant, he pulls out his pencil and sketches a few traits in the character of an Oriental despot.

* Vol ii. p. 359, immediately after our former quotation.

But he is not even allowed this privilege. His "nature" is too "tender" to stand the rubs and collisions of common life; he must creep into his study, and peruse Greek cameos and Chinese romances. If Goethe himself is to be held up as the beau-ideal of the poetical character, then in the true poet we must always find "a most sensitive shrinking from all intense impressions, which, by every means, and under every circumstance of his life, he seeks to ward off from himself."* The learned Goethian memorialist from whom we have quoted these last words, deduces this laudable peculiarity of character from Goethe's mother; and Mrs Austin labours to shew, in a note, that the most distinguished men in this country, as in Germany, have derived their most distinguished qualities from their mothers. This may be in some cases; but the instance of Goethe is peculiarly unfortunate—for that quality of mind which he is said to have derived from his mother, is a weakness rather than an excellence, and precisely such a weakness as, in nervous and sensitive woman, is most common. We are inclined, indeed, to go a certain length with that stout anti-Goethian Wolfgang Menzel, and to say that there is something weak and effeminate about Goethe's whole genius. At all events, it is somewhat remarkable, that he should have whipped up his voluptuous Faust into a heaven principally composed of women, and that he should have chosen to conclude his last and greatest work with a hymn in praise of the "eternally female."†

The arguments by which Goethe has chosen to defend his political indifference, or, what is the same thing, his indolent Conservatism, are not worth serious refutation. If a soldier, like a lawyer, is too often a mere machine, this can be no reason why a poet should be so. Poetry, indeed, is no separate profession, like law, theology, medicine, or soldiership. Its voice is neither the voice of the bar, nor the voice of the pulpit, nor the voice of the cannon; but it is emphatically the voice of man. If, indeed, it were the sole province of the artist to decorate the palaces of the great with the playful sports of a trifling fancy—if it were the sole province of the poet to be the rhyming herald of courtly feasts and masquerades—in this case, poetry might be looked upon as a separate profession, living apart from the serious interests, from the stirring hopes and fears of human life. But, is it not plain that the bard divine is thus sunk into something little more dignified than a court buffoon, and the "maker," the creator of shapes and thoughts Heaven-pointing, becomes a mere carver and gilder to an earthly majesty? Such unworthy thoughts of poets and poetry, we cannot entertain. The true artist is a patriot, not merely by turning his verses and mixing his colours, but by feeling, and acting, and writing, as a patriot ought to feel, and to write, and to act. He may not, on all occasions, be a soldier, while he is a singer—though Korner was so, and so was Dante; but he will always cherish, in his heart, a warm, glowing sympathy with the political and religious condition of his fatherland. The only subject of his theme is humanity, pure and noble humanity; and it is impossible that he can ever remain indifferent to the advancement and amelioration of his race. He is not allowed to be "the impartial spectator," much less is he allowed to be the indifferent sceptic. If man, and man's life, be nothing else to him than the hubbub of a fair, and the juggling of a mountebank, he deserves no longer the sacred name of a bard. The limbs and outward flourishes may remain; but the soul, the vital principle, is gone. The sermon is ingenious and eloquent, but it hath no unction from above—Israel is still Israel, but the glory is departed from the midst of it.

We have said that Goethe was a Tory. It is not merely in literary matters that he throws off the mask of pretended political indifference, and shews the old German aristocrat in all his narrowness and in all his coldness. We have also his recorded opinions on the important subjects of the Slave-Trade, Catholic Emancipation, &c.; and on these subjects his mind, which has been so often compared to a mirror of universal nature, becomes, without effort, the mirror of vulgarest English Toryism. In his "Walpurgis Night's Dream," he could afford to laugh at Nicolai's Jesuitical apprehensions; and he spared not his wit upon the "inquisitive traveller," who walked with "stiff and measured paces" through the motley hubbub of the Brocken; but, in his latter years, the cry of "No Popery!" seems to have been potent in working even upon his sceptical ears; and, on the 3d April 1829, when the Emancipation question was agitated in England, we find him lecturing honest Eckermann as follows:—

"With the Catholics, all precautions are in vain. The Papal chair has interests to advance, of which we have no conception, and means, moreover, to work its own ends in quiet, of which we Protestants cannot even dream. Were I at this moment in the British Parliament, I certainly would not oppose Catholic Emancipation; but I would desire my words to be protocolled, that note might be taken of them when the head of the first Protestant should fall by the voice of a Catholic."

On the 7th of April, of the same year, we find him returning to the same theme:—"We learn much," said he, "from this business of Catholic Emancipation; but the matter is far too complicated for a foreigner altogether to see through. So much, however, seems plain, that Ireland labours under evils that no emancipation can cure. It was formerly bad enough that Ireland suffered so much by itself; but the evil is now worse when England is drawn into the net along with it. This is the serious point in the matter. For it is altogether impossible to put any trust in the Catholics. We see what an evil case the wretched two millions of Protestants have been in, in contest with the five millions of Catholics; and the poor Protestant farmers who have the misfortune to be surrounded by Catholic neighbours, have been oppressed, and tormented, and persecuted in every possible way. The Catholics never agree among themselves; but they are willing to forget their most bitter feuds when a crusade is to be made against Protestantism. They are like a rabble of dogs, whose sport it is to bite one another; but, as soon as a stag appears, they join heartily in a common pursuit, and exult in the ruin of a common prey."

More lamentable derangement of judgment than these extracts exhibit—and that too in a man who has been justly celebrated for the clearness and comprehensiveness of his intellectual vision—it has seldom been our lot to encounter. So far as our observation has hitherto gone, it is only in Britain that Catholic Emancipation has ever been made a question; the "impartial spectator" abroad, whether Whig or Tory, has generally seen, without any difficulty, through the flimsy webs of political reasonings, whose substance is sophistry, and whose mother is sheerest selfishness. But through these webs, Goethe—the universal, the many-sided, the prophetic, Goethe—could not see. The mist of Court-Toryism was before his eyes, and there was no Minerva at hand to remove it. Let other thinkers look and learn. Let them not make their abode in palaces, neither put their trust in princes.

We have expressed, in language sufficiently strong, our own views with regard to that state of contemplative quietism and passionless scepticism, in which, according to Goethe's doctrine, "the tender nature of a poet" ought to be nursed. But we cannot dismiss this subject without adding to our humble opinion the weight and authority of such a name as John Gottfried Herder. This man was of a nature more tender and more sensitive than either Goethe himself, or the beau-ideal of poetical sensibility that we have seen him set up; but this extreme irritability of his constitution he did not nourish, and fondle, and fold in a blanket, like a sick child; but he sent forth its sympathetic feelers into every path and recess of human existence. Let us hear how this truly great man estimated Goethe's boasted "equipoise of the soul," and what he thought of the import and significance of that mystic syllable ART—the sacred OM of Germanic Brahmism, which Goethe was continually repeating:—

"All that is very well," said Herder;* "but whether man here below ought to ascend into that region where fictitious and real life become one to his perception—where he loses the character of man, though not that of artist—where the light shines, but does not warm or quicken; and whether the adoption of these maxims would not lead to a general want of character—is another question.

"We must not contest with the gods their seats of eternal tranquillity. They may regard all that passes on this earth as a game foreordered by them. But man, subject to all human necessities and frailties, ought not to be amused by any painted drop-scene. He ought to retain that holy earnestness without which art degenerates at last into mere juggling and buffoonery. Play—for ever play. Sophocles did not play—Æschylus still less. These are all inventions of modern times, which are little or nothing worth. David sang hymns of bolder flight than even Pindar, and governed a kingdom to boot. What do you govern? It is good and praiseworthy that you should examine (or, as you are pleased to call it, make yourselves masters of) all, from the hyssop that groweth upon the wall to the cedar of Lebanon—every phenomenon and variety of nature; only, you ought not, meanwhile, to lose sight of man, the crown of all phenomena in his moral, inborn greatness.

"When I think of Nero, how he set Rome on fire, and touched the lyre while he gazed on the conflagration—ay, he too played!—it is a splendid picture! What does it signify to Nero's architect, that women and children shed tears of desolation over their burning city? That is an old story. He, for his part, draws the plan for the rebuilding of Rome; and, if his drawing looks well on paper, and does not get rubbed out, that is all he cares about. All will be executed 'in an improved taste,' and people ought to be grateful to the world's master for bringing about such a reform. Here, then, we have a pictured and a real Rome. The difference is not so great. We are artists, gods, Neroes; and be we how we may, or what we may, we are always right:—

"'Denn Recht hat jeder eigene Charakter Es gibt kein Unrecht als den Widerspruch.'"*

The manly sarcasm of this passage must have had some effect on Goethe, if anything could; but Nature, as Horace says, cannot be driven out by a pitchfork; and Goethe remained to the end of his life the same trifling, indifferent artist, that Herder had known him when a student at Strasburg, "Goethe," says he, in a letter written about that period, "is really a good man; but he is too easy and too trifling, and on this point I never give him any rest." How thoroughly Herder here saw through Goethe's character, is manifest from almost every page of the poet's future works. The want of that "holy earnestness without which art degenerates at last into mere juggling and buffoonery," offends us in many parts even of his more serious works, (as in the first part of "Faust,") but is particularly felt in such of his later works as have a more direct reference to the living world and its living history. None of the mighty movements of time that propel the vessel of humanity towards its destined haven, can move him to send forth one horn from the shell of artistical self-satisfaction in which he reposes: the roar of patriotic cannon, and the shout of a nation's triumph, are equally unheard; and to every prophet of Church or State, whose voice proclaims the advent of a new era in the great history of human advancement, he says, with the rude soldier in his own puppet play:—

"And yet, with all your ghostly schemes
And high evangelising themes,
Each man lives on from day to day,
Nor worse nor better, as best he may."†

The sentiment conveyed in these lines is neither more nor less than that hopeless scepticism in human nature, which is the essence of philosophical, as distinguished from merely traditionary and consuetudinary Toryism. It is that want of faith in man, without which—however our theologians may at times overlook it—any real, profitable, edifying faith in God is impossible. It is the "live and let live" principle with which the grandsons of Luther had still bent the knee before a Pope, and the free men of Gaul still worshipped the gilded Dagon of the old noblesse. Goethe, indeed, was a most faithful worshipper of that Dagon, as his Campaign in 1792, and other of his works, bear witness; and as to Martin Luther and the glorious Reformation, notwithstanding the specimens of anti-Catholicism which we have above given from Eckermann's conversations, the poet of Faust had truly much less sympathy with the energy of Protestantism than with the repose of Catholicism; and we have no cause to be surprised when Falk informs us that "Such characters as Luther and Coriolanus excited in him a kind of uncomfortable feeling, which could be satisfactorily explained only on the hypothesis, that their natures stood in a mysterious sort of opposition with his?"* With all deference, we see nothing mysterious in the matter. Energy, enthusiasm, and, above all, moral earnestness, were elements in which Luther's character wonderfully excelled, and Goethe's was as wonderfully defective. Hence the aversion to Luther; and hence that offensive trifling and playing with serious subjects, from which none, even of Goethe's greatest admirers, have been able successfully to vindicate him. It is of no use here to mystify our clear English senses with some foreign prate about objectivity, subjectivity, aesthetics, &c., wherewith pedantic Teutonists have been lately endeavouring to corrupt the simple phrase of English criticism. Human feelings are human feelings; and so long as they remain what they are, the colloquial levity of the celebrated prologue to "Faust," and the inane buffoonery of the second part, can never be made consistent either with the reverence that is inspired by religion, or the dignity that is suitable to poetry. As little can a healthy mind sympathize with the broad farce into which the "Bürger-general" metamorphoses the fearful realities of the French Revolution. Of that great event, sound-minded men can have only two opinions: they must look upon it either as a deadly poison, tainting, or as a fevered paroxysm, regenerating the body politic. But in whichever light they view it, it can assuredly never become a matter of jest; and it is one of the most appalling symptoms of the moral disease that weakened Goethe's mind, that he had the audacity to bring this most serious scene in the great epos of modern history, upon the Weimar stage in the form of a farce. But the words of Herder were prophetic, and that "ART" of which Goethe made an idol, being without "holy earnestness," at last degenerated into "mere jugglery and buffoonery."

We have thrown off these remarks on the weak points of Goethe's character, not from any perverse, critical desire to detract from his real merits as a calm observer, a beautiful painter, and a profound speculator on man and nature. Neither are we of the number of those unreasonable critics who demand of Mother Nature, without a blush, that she should unite, for their admiration, the souls of a Plato and an O'Connell in one individual. Even the universal Shakspeare was universal only in his own province of poetry. Had he been tried by his contemporaries by the same unreasonable standard that Börne, and those that echo his babble, have tried Goethe, he might have been weighed in the balance and found wanting. But our object, on the present occasion, has been to shake ourselves free, in some measure, from the choking atmosphere of Toryism that pervades the works of Germany's greatest poet, and to warn our philo-Teutonic youth against that cold indifference to the progress of human society, and that nerveless apathy to the great stirring interests of the day, which too long a sojourn in the region of Goetheism is apt to engender. It has, at the same time, and most especially, been our object to enter our decided protest against that spirit of blind, indiscriminating admiration with which the prevalent party in Germany regard the genius of Goethe. The manner in which German minds allow themselves to be blindly lorded over by a succession of literary absolutists, appears to us, unequivocally, as one of the most unfavourable traits in the national character. The despotic sway which Lutheran polemics long exercised over their Church, is well known; after the exhaustion of the thirty years' war, they submitted to be tame imitators of the French; and, so late as the middle of the last century, we find them submitting to the dictation of such a critic of straw as John Christopher Gottsched. Then followed the Pindarico-patriotic mania, excited by Klopstock. Lessing never was a universal favourite—for he is too severe; but, after the short, convulsive explosion of tears and gunpowder excited by Werther, Wieland was, for a series of years, the pet of this weak-minded public. Wieland, however, was too French, too frivolous, for the serious spirit that the French Revolution was awakening in the minds of men; and the dictators of the romantic school arose, with the two Schlegels at their head, calling up the Barbarossas and the Bonifaces of a lost age, to revive the sunken spirit of German patriotism. These men reigned for a time. But they committed one strange mistake: they crowned Goethe as the Charlemagne of this holy Roman empire of poetry; and, in so doing, they acted like Æsop's boor, who was stung to death by the frozen viper whom his foolish benevolence had warmed to life within his bosom. Goethe was neither a romanticist nor a patriot; and sympathised as little with the Virgin Mary as with Hermann and Velleda. But he sat down quietly upon the throne which the heads of the romantic school placed before him; and there he sits quietly to the present day, holding undisputed sway over the whole north of Germany, and disturbed only by the distant missiles sent from the fettered hands of a few honest Liberals in Swabia, and a few desperate Republicans in Paris. Nor is Goethe a king only in the eyes of many—he is also a god. More highly favoured than the ancient heroes, he received divine honours even during his lifetime; he was spared the cumbersome ceremony of canonization, and mounted up to Heaven as instinctively as some cloud that merely has reposed on without having ever been fettered to this vulgar earth. The worship that was paid to him during life continues uninterrupted after death; and the centre of that worship is and was Berlin. Fit conjunction that political and poetical absolutism should mingle in friendly mystification together!

But the reign of this poetical superstition cannot last for ever. Already the dawn of a new day is seen; the voice of "Young Germany" has issued from the honest breast of Swabia—and that voice must be heard. We do not mean by this designation, "Young Germany," to express an approval of all the mad pranks that certain mad youths have lately been exhibiting before their modest countrymen under that self-imposed title. But there is a "Young Germany" altogether independent of the Heines and the Börnes, the Gutzkows and the Wienbargs, whose extravagances and excesses have connected an unworthy association with a name in which every true German should rejoice. There is an "Old Germany" and there is a "Young Germany," to one of which great national divisions every German now alive necessarily belongs. "Old Germany" is now very old. His senile weakness was first shewn in the battle of Jena; and, in the rising of 1813, the shout of a nation rang his death warning; but, like many old dotards, he did not understand it. It is indeed quite natural and quite proper that he should be unwilling to die, and that he should resort to every mean shift and base subterfuge to prolong his waning life for a season. Let him gag the mouth of nature, let him set up the image of Goethe and call it God, let him change the free institutions of youthful education into the mere manufactures of submissive thought, and drill a whole people into the discipline of one vast military school:—it is all in vain. The day of his doom is at hand. Time will not stop his march for him; and will trample upon kings and aristocrats as recklessly as he did upon the slaves and serfs of a former age. Time has declared for Young Germany, for Liberal Germany; and Old Germany, Aristocratic Germany, must yield. May God grant him a speedy dissolution, and we shall not refuse him the prayer—mollitir ossa quies. cant!

THE SPANISH BARD.

"The harp! the harp!" Don Roderick cried,
In Spain's high regal hall of pride—
While round flashed many a haughty eye
Of Spain's unconquered chivalry;
And darted many a glowing glance
From dark rich eyes in mazy dance;
And blushed the blood of Tayo's vine
In goblets gold and crystalline;
And gleamed the pomp of Roderick's reign
From all the tower-clad hills of Spain.

Up rose the bard—his harp he strung,
And courtly magic round him flung.

"Fill high, fill high the flowing cup—
I love to see it gleaming;
Fill every rose-crowned goblet up—
The joy of life is beaming.
Quaff gaily now the crimson tide
That gushes from Morena's side.

"I see! I see!—Don Roderick's star
Of conquest fiercely flashes,
From Calpe's rock to climes where far
The Indian billow dashes;
It lightens Zaara's herbless breast,
It brightens Atlas' snowy crest.

"I see the Moorman's turbaned lord
Beside his banner sleeping,
And bright with blood the Christian sword
Death's harvest vega reaping!
Dark is the doom his seers foretell,
The monarch of the infidel!

"The Arab maid awaits the meed
Her bridegroom pledged in vaunting—
She starts, and sees his Arab steed
All riderless and panting;
She seeks the battle field to weep—
Her Osman lies where thousands sleep.

"Fill high the cup! Let Leon's plume
Wave prouder still and prouder—
Let stern Vandalia's battle-boom
Wax louder still and louder—
Till o'er the Crescent's broken arch
The legions of the Cross shall march!

"Let music and the wine-cup flow
By forest, mount, and river—
By Blanca's peaks of clouded snow
And sunny Guadalquiver;
And lovers woo the light of eyes
Beneath the night of southern skies."

The music ceased. A sudden change—
An aspect thrilling, wild, and strange—
Burst on the gaze: the minstrel's eye
In frenzy fixed on vacancy;
Mute horror quivered on his brow,
And heavy icedrops, oozing slow,
Fell chillingly adown his frame;
Gone from his eye its prophet flame—
He stood, a monument of Life
With conquering Death in latest strife.

The courtiers felt that moment's dread—
Mirth, song, and revelry had fled;
They deemed he saw some vision scrawl
A mystic writing on the wall.

The trance had ceased. His harp he caught—
Trembled the strings with new-born thought;
Around he flung some tones of thunder,
Then tore the quivering strings asunder.

"Begone, false enchanter! for never again
Shalt thou charm from my bosom that vision of pain.
I have read a red line from the judgments of Heaven:
O'er the waste and the waters our legions are driven;
And, as autumn-hued leaves o'er the wilderness pour,
Come, countless and blackening, the hosts of the Moor.

"From the cloud-crested summits that leaguer the north
I beheld a dark shadow come rushingly forth;
Over vale and sierra I followed its sweep,
Till it hovered in blackness o'er Abyle's steep—
Like a column of smoke with a crescent of flame
The turbans and banners of Heathendom came."

DEUCALION'S SONG TO PYRRHA.

Cling to me, girl! The chill night-breeze is sighing;
Around our feet the dark-brown waters sweep,
Beneath whose whelming wave, all lowly lying,
The blue-eyed maids and hoary fathers sleep!

Has not this shallop, long our habitation,
Above the lofty mountain-tops been curled?
And are we not alone, 'mid desolation—
The only remnants of a ruined world—

Without companion? Save the spear-like lightning,
The new moon glimmering through her cloudy screen,
And daylight in the horizon feebly brightening—
Above, beneath, around us, nought is seen.

Cling to me, girl! and let thy voice delight me—
Its tones inspire my heart and soul with pride;
Nor even this wreck of all things can affright me,
While thou art with me, ever by my side.

Nay, do not weep, love Pyrrha!—though our home is Cheerless and rayless on the watery waste,
Soon wilt thou see the mild, bright bow of promise
Gleaming in splendour on the cloud's dark breast.

Soon shall the world, from night and waters breaking,
With verdure wave, and fruits and flower-buds fair;
Soon woodland songs of gladness shall awaken
Low winds to fan thy hyacinthine hair.

TWEED REVISITED.

Oh, welcome, welcome, once again, my own, my native river!
The same calm, bright blue wanderer, unchangeable as ever,
As when of yore on thy sweet banks, I thought the mighty sea
For wondrous width and soundless depth could hardly rival thee!

Thou singest still as when I heard, with hopes and feelings young,
First on thy bonny primrose braes, the water anthem sung,
And dreamed—a fond believing boy—it told of other years,
When maidens gazed from castle keep on glittering Border spears.

For with my infant lullaby was blent the mighty charm
Of song that told of Flodden Field and Randolph's potent arm;
Of English blood, from Douglas' brand washed in thy azure tide;
And all that Border minstrelsy has warbled on Tweedside.

The same wild song thou'rt singing now, the same wild witch-notes, burst
From memory's fount of melody, pure as they gushed at first,
When, innocent as thou, with brain, unscorched by passion's fire,
To bound above thy sunlit waves was all my heart's desire.

I love thee, Tweed, with deepest love—though with no headlong shock
Thou fling'st thy flashing might of waves from foamy rock to rock—
Though thou hast not sweet Teviot's charm of haugh and heathery fell, Nor Tay's far Highland solitudes, nor Clutha's foaming hell.

I love thee, for thou wanderest through a land of song and beauty,
Where Loveliness is wooed by Truth, and Valour dwells with Duty—
A land of grey old castle walls and legendary lore—
A land of happy hearths and homes, where lances gleamed of yore.

I love thee, Tweed, for dear thou wert to Border minstrels' eyes
That often gazed with dreamy joy on thy sweet mirrored skies;
Now dim the eye and cold the brow that wore the laurel meed,
And mighty Scott and Wilson sleep as erst they sung on Tweed.

I love thee, for thou art the same thou wert in days gone by—
The cloudlets of long years ago seem floating in thy sky!
And ne'er, my native stream, may change on thy loved borders be,
Till death shall darken from my eyes this beauteous world and thee!

AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF AN ENGLISH OPIUM EATER.

Sir Humphry Davy, of all those whom I have just mentioned—nay, of all the eminent persons whom I have ever seen even by a casual glimpse—was the most agreeable to know on the terms of a slight acquaintance. What he might have proved upon a closer intimacy, I cannot say; not having had the honour of any such connexion with him. My acquaintance had never gone far enough to pass the barrier of stranger-ship, and the protection which lies in that consciousness, reciprocally felt; for, if friendship and confidential intimacy have the power to confer privileges, there are other privileges which they take away; and many times it is better to be privileged as the "stranger" of a family than as its friend. Some I have known who, therefore, only called a man their friend, that they might have a license for taking liberties with him. Sir Humphry, I have no reason to believe, would have altered for the worse on a closer connexion. But for myself I knew him only within ceremonious bounds; and I must say that nowhere before or since have I seen a man who had so felicitously caught the fascinating tone of high-bred urbanity which distinguishes the best part of the British nobility. The first time of my seeing him was at the Courier office, in a drawing-room then occupied by Mr Coleridge, and as a guest of that gentleman: this must have been either in 1808 or 1809. Sir Humphry (I forget whether then a baronet, but I think not) had promised to drink tea with Mr Coleridge, on his road to a meeting of the Royal Society; before which learned body he was on that evening to read some paper or other of his own composition. I had the honour to be invited as sole "respondent" to the learned philosopher—sole supporter of the antistrophe in our choral performance. It sounded rather appalling to be engaged in a glee for three voices, with two performers such as these; and I trepidated a little as I went up stairs, having previously understood that the great man was already come. The door was thrown open by the servant who announced me; and I saw at once, in full proportions before me, the full length figure of the young savant, not perhaps above ten years older than myself, whose name already filled all the post-horns of Europe, and levied homage from Napoleon. He was a little below the middle height; agreeable in his person, and amiable in the expression of his countenance. His dress was elaborately accurate and fashionable—no traces of soot or furnace there; it might be said, also, that it was youthful and almost gay in its character. But what chiefly distinguished him from other men, was the captivating—one might call it the radiant—courtesy of his manner. It was at once animated, and chastised by good-breeding; graceful, and, at the same time, gracious. From a person so eminent it would not have been a sufficient encouragement that his manner should be, in a passive sense, courteous. This would have expressed only a consciousness of what was due to himself. But Sir Humphry's manner was conciliatory and intentionally winning. To a person as obscure as myself, it held out the flattering expressions of a wish to recommend himself, an assurance of interest in your person, and a desire both to know and to be known. In such expressions of feeling, when they are borne upon the very surface of the manners, and scattered like sunbeams indiscriminately upon all who fall within their range, doubtless there must be something of artifice and a polished hypocrisy. And nobody can more readily acknowledge than myself the integrity which lies at the bottom of our insular reserve and moroseness. Two sound qualities are at the root of these unpleasant phenomena—modesty or unpresumingness in the first place, and sincerity in the second. To be impudent was so much of the essence of profligacy in the ideas of the ancients, that the one became the most ordinary expression* for the other; and sincerity, again, or directness of purpose, is so much of the essence of conscientiousness, that we take obliquity or crookedness for one way of expounding dishonesty, or depravity of the moral sense—and, according to their natural tendencies, no doubt this is true. But such things admit of many modifications. Without absolute dissimulation, it is allowable and even laudable to reject, by a second or amended impulse, what the first involuntary impulse would have prompted; and to practise so much disguise as may withdraw from too open notice the natural play of human feelings. By what right does a man display to another, in his very look of alienation and repulsion at his first introduction, that he dislikes him, or that he is doubtful whether he shall like him? Yet this is the too general movement of British sincerity. The play of the feelings, the very flux and reflux of contending emotions, passes too nakedly, in the very act and process of introduction, under the eyes of the party interested. Frankness is good, honesty is good; but not a frankness, not an honesty which counteracts the very purposes of social meetings—for, unless he comes with the purpose of being pleased, why does a man come at all into meetings, not of business or necessity, but of relaxation and social pleasure?

From Sir H. Davy's conversation, which he carefully turned aside from his professional knowledge, nothing of importance was to be collected: he did not mean that there should. He meant to be a French talker—light, glancing, sparkling; and he was so. Upon this first occasion of my seeing him, I remember that he supported the peculiarly shallow hypothesis, that climate was the great operating cause in determining national differences of all kinds—in the arts as well as in civil institutions. Apparently he did this with malice prepense, as a means of exciting Mr Coleridge to talk, by the provocation of shallowness. But he fought imparibus armis against Coleridge: the great boa constrictor could not be roused into unfolding his coils; the monster was lethargic on this evening, as if he had recently swallowed a herd of goats and their horns. The fact was, as I afterwards found, that Coleridge did not like the brilliant manipulator and lecturer. Coleridge thought him effeminate, and (like many others at that time) ridiculed his lecturing "in white kid gloves," and adapting his experiments—that is, his public experiments at the Royal Institution—to the shallow and trivial taste of mere amateurs, who happened to be in powerful stations. Still more, he complained of what he considered Davy's sycophancy and subservience to women of fashion and high rank. Coleridge assured me that Davy was much admired by various women of quality; and so enthusiastically by some, that they would exclaim audibly at the public lecture-room—"Oh, those eyes! those brilliant eyes!" and that the philosopher was weak enough to be pleased with this homage. Worse even than this, in Coleridge's eyes, was Davy's behaviour at fashionable dinner-tables, especially at Lord Darnley's, where the élite of the London savans and literati at that time congregated. Davy was charged, by many others as well as Coleridge, with too much forgetting the dignity of science in such society, and too openly laying himself out to win favour or applause. "I could read in Lady Darnley's eyes," said Coleridge

* Viz., in the word improbus. But so defective are all dictionaries, that there is some difficulty in convincing scholars that the leading idea of improbus, its sole original idea, is—impudence, boldness, or audacity. Great is the incoherency and absurdity of learned men in questions of philology. Thus, Heyne, in a vain attempt to make out (consistently to make out) the well-known words, "labor improbus omnia vincit," says, that improbus means pertinax. How so? Improbus originally always has the meaning of audacious. Thus Pliny, speaking of the first catalogue of stars made by Hipparchus, calls it—"labor itiam Deo improbus"—an enterprise audacious even for a superhuman being. Here is the very same word labor again qualified by the same epithet. And 500 other cases might be adduced in which the sense of audacity, and that only, will unlock all, as by a master key. Salmasius fancied (see his De Pallio of Tertullian) that the true idea was the excessive or enormous—whatever violated the common standards in any mode of disproportion.

one day, when reporting an instance of Davy's suppleness in accommodating himself to a very great man's theory of aeroliths—"I could read plainly in Lady Darnley's eyes the very words—'I despise this man; this man is degrading himself wilfully.'" However, it must be remembered that Sir H. Davy had a much larger and readier introduction into fashionable society than Coleridge. To profess any one intelligible art or accomplishment, and in this one to have attained an acknowledged or reputed pre-eminence, is a far better passport into privileged society than to have the largest intellectual pretensions of a less determinate class. The very narrowness of a man's claims, by making them definite and appreciable, is an advantage. Not merely a leader in a branch of art which presupposes a high sense of beauty, a cultivated taste, and other gifts properly intellectual, but even in some art presuming little beyond manual dexterity, is sure of his election into the exclusive circles. Not merely a painter, therefore, but a fiddler, provided only he be the first of his order—nay, I doubt not, a "chin-chopper" or Jews'-harp player, if only he happen to exceed all other chin-choppers or Jew-harpists—will find himself a privileged man in comparison with the philosopher, or the very largest and amplest intellect that ever nature endowed or education expanded. The advantage lies in doing a thing which has a name, an assignable name; and the narrower is the art, the more appreciable are the degrees of merit in that art. Now, it is the distinction, the being foremost, the place of protagonist, or Coryphœus in an art, which forms the ground of eligibility to that society which is par excellence distingué. An actor, therefore, beyond almost any other artist, except only the portrait painter, whose very craft is exercised in the society of its patrons, and cannot (unless partially) be otherwise exercised—an actor, I say, more easily than others, is admitted to graduate in such society, because his rank as an artist is more precisely ascertained by public reputation daily put to the test. Humiliating to any intellectual man thinking haughtily of those pretensions, and standing upon no other title himself, is the collision which sometimes will befall him in aristocratic houses with actors even of a low order; for in behalf of such actors, supposing them to have comic talents for drollery, is sometimes suspended the general rule which demands first-rate excellence; fourth or fifth-rate excellence on the stage being very compatible with superiority in convivial talents. Never shall I forget the wrath with which a London wit, who had indisputable powers of conversation, repeated the circumstances of a professional call, which he made, by appointment, (for he was a lawyer,) upon Y—ng the tragic actor, who, in the absence of higher powers, then presided on the metropolitan stage:—"Sir," said he, "in the room where I was left to cool my heels until the great man should find himself disengaged for a person so inconsiderable as myself, there were strewed upon a table, for scenic effect, cards of invitation to dinner parties of grandee lords by the dozen, and to the balls, routes, soirées, and heaven knows what all, of countesses, ambassadresses, and duchesses by the score—ay, and all falling within a few days; more than ever I shall have in my whole life." Yet this man, who thus complained, was rather a brilliant "diner-out," as it is called. Coleridge, as is notorious, whenever he happened to be in force or even in artificial spirits, was even more than brilliant; to use a word too often abused and prostituted, he was even magnificent beyond all human standards; and a felicitous conversational specimen from him was sometimes the most memorable chapter in a man's whole intellectual experience through life. Yet this Coleridge was not in request, was not sought after in the aristocratic circles of London—to their shame be it said! He had just such introductions—such and so many—as would, if turned to account by a pushing, worldly man, have slipped him on sufferance into many more houses of the same distinction. An invitation more or less costs little to a woman of fashion; and he might have kept his ground, as many admitted bores do, upon toleration, in some two or three hundred great privileged mansions. Coleridge, however, had dignity of character sufficient to court no such distinctions; nor would his spirits have been equal to the expense of labour requisite in so enormous a capital for a duty so widely dispersed. Neither do I overlook the fact that Mr Coleridge's peculiar powers were not adapted to parties beyond the scale of a small dinner party. Yet, still, I contend, that, for the honour of literature, and for the sake of expressing a public homage to the most majestic forms in which the intellect of the age expresses itself, and by way of conciliating the grace and sanction of Scholarship and authentic Philosophy to the circles of rank and wealth, upon the same principle which leads those same circles to court the inferior sanction and grace of Art even in its lowest walks—for all these reasons, Coleridge should have been courted and wooed into such society. I am not apt to praise the continent at the expense of my own country; but here is an instance in which (generally speaking) the continental taste is better than ours. No great meeting is complete in Germany, in France, in Italy, unless the intellect of the land—its scholarship, its philosophy, its literature—be there by deputation: "the table is not full," unless these great leading interests are there represented. We inaugurate our wine cups by remembering the King's health; we inaugurate (let it not be thought profane to make such an allusion) our great civil transactions by prayer and remembrance of our highest relations: in reason, then, and by all analogy, we should inaugurate and legitimate, as it were, our meetings of festal pleasure, by the presence of intellectual power and intellectual grace, as the ultimate sources upon which we should all be glad to have it thought that our pleasures depend. Aristocracy of Britain! be not careless of the philosophy and intellect of the age, lest it be thought that your pursuits and taste exist in alienation from both. Dr Johnson had talked himself into being so much talked of, that he—had he lived for another generation—would have become indispensable to fashionable parties. Coleridge, who, most assuredly, was far superior in creative power and fertility of new intuitions to Dr Johnson, and immeasurably superior in the philosophic understanding, (for, in direct philosophic speculation, Dr Johnson never even attempted anything, except in one little pamphlet against Soame Jenyns,) was scarcely beginning to be heard of amongst the higher circles of England when he died. The reason for comparing him with Dr Johnson is on account of their common gifts of colloquial power.*

Did I not once hear a friend objecting to me such cases as those of Gibbon?—and, again, "Wordsworth," said he—"him I met at the Marchioness of Salisbury's party, at Canning's, at the English Ambassador's in Paris, and so forth." True; but Gibbon was a Member of Parliament, and in that capacity, not as a literary man, he had made his connexions. Wordsworth, again, was introduced to the great world by Sir George Beaumont, a powerful friend; for he had a large fortune, having no children, and stood midway as a connecting link between the world of art and the world of fashion. Most cases are liable to some personal or casual explanation of this sort, where they seem to be exceptions to the general rule, that commanding intellect is not peculiarly welcome in the most aristocratic circles; or, at least, not in anything like that proportion in which art, nay, the lowest branches of the lowest arts, are welcome; for these are absolutely courted. Actors, for seventy or eighty years back at the least, have formed a constituent part of the British aristocratic circles.

Yet it is amusing on this subject to recall the contradictory complaints of different parties according to their different positions. Coleridge told me that Sir Humphry protested that a man had no chance for making himself a very distinguished person in the eyes of London society, unless he were a good House of Commons debater, (and that had a look of truth about it;) or, secondly, unless he had written a treatise on Greek lyric metres. "Ah, if I could say something now that was pretty and showy on Choriambic metre, or on the Versus Dochmiaci!" This was his sneering form of expression. On the other hand, at that very time, Dr Parr, who could have written ably on some parts of philology, and Middleton, a friend of Coleridge's, and soon after Bishop of Calcutta, who could have written Greek lyric metre itself, as well as on Greek metre—both were apt to complain of the undue usurpation of chemistry and the kindred researches, over the consecrated studies of our universities. The plain truth was, that great distinction in either way led to all sorts of public honour in England. Mathematics is the sole unprotected and unprivileged branch of knowledge—except what goes under the name of metaphysics, that being absolutely proscribed—not so much without privilege or reward, as without toleration.

Davy was not a favourite with Coleridge; and yet Coleridge, who grasped the whole philosophy of chemistry perhaps better than any man except Schelling, admired him, and praised him much; and often he went so far as to say that he might have been a great poet, which perhaps few people will be disposed to think, from the specimens he has left in the Bristol Anthology, (edited in 2 vols., about the year 1799–1800, by Mr Southey.) But, however much he might admire this far-famed man, Coleridge did not at that time seem greatly to respect him. Once or twice he complained a little that Davy had been deficient in proper attentions to himself. In one of the cases alluded to, I suggested, which I believe really to have been the case, that Davy waited for Mr Coleridge to make the first advances. But this Coleridge would not hear of. No, no, he said—Davy was the superior in social consideration—of that there could be no doubt—and to the superior belonged the initiatory act in any steps for proposing the relations on which they were to stand. I do not mean, however, that Coleridge had much, or perhaps any soreness on this point; for he was very forgiving in such cases. But he certainly looked with a disapproving eye on what he viewed at that time as suppleness and want of self-respect in Davy; and he also charged him with sensuality in eating. I know not whence Coleridge had his information; but he sometimes commented with asperity on Davy's luxuriousness in this particular; and he repeated, as if he knew it on some better authority than that of rumour—what rumour, however, plentifully buzzed about at that time—that Davy would sometimes sit down in solitary epicureanism to dishes which cost him half-a-guinea each or more. Even if it were so, many epicureans there are, who would cry out, Is that all? And whatever faults might be found in Davy at that time, I have reason to believe that time and philosophy did much to raise and strengthen his character in after years; for as to foibles of physical temperament, a man must settle that account with his own conscience. For others, it is really impertinent to complain. And perhaps the great temperance which Mr Coleridge, as well as myself, practised through life, may have been due to advantages of organic structure or inirritability of palate, as much as to philosophic self-command. At least for myself, I can say that, though very few men indeed have maintained so simple and almost

* Three persons, in all, may be mentioned, from the ranks of intellectual people, who have had a footing in privileged society—I mean, not merely had an admission there, but a known and extensive acceptation. These three were—Lord Byron, Dr Johnson, and Sir Walter Scott. Now, it is observable that the first was, in some sense, a denizen of such society in right of birth and rank; and, of both the others, it is remarkable that their passes were first countersigned by kings—Dr Johnson's by George III., Sir Walter's by George IV.

Hindooish a diet, I do not take much merit to myself for my forbearance; and I extend the largest indulgence of charitable construction to all men—except young ones, whose gamut of pleasures is wider—for seeking that irritation from a moderate sensuality, which the flagging pulses of life no longer supply through other modes of excitement. Davy was then supposed to be making a fortune by some manufactory of gunpowder, from which he drew a large share of profit, not for capital contributed, or not for that originally, but for chemical secrets communicated. Soon afterwards, he married a widow with a very large income, (as much as £4000 a-year by common report;) was made a baronet; was crowned with the laureateship of science, viz. the President's chair in the London Royal Society; withdrew in consequence from further lecturing in kid gloves of any colour; drank moderately, as a man of elegant tastes, of the cup of human enjoyment; throve into a prosperous leader of a circle; sickened; travelled for health, unavailingly for himself, not altogether for others; died; and left a name which, from the necessity of things, must grow fainter in its impression under each revolving sun, but which, at one time, was by much the most resounding name—the most splendid in the estimate of the laity, if not of the clerus in science—which has arisen since the days of Newton.

Mr Godwin, of whom the reader will perhaps wish to hear more than of Sir H. Davy, was one of those eminent persons whom, unfortunately, I saw less of than perhaps any other lion of the times. He was in person a little man, with manners peculiarly tranquil, philosophic, and dignified—so at least I thought. I was greatly interested in all that related to this gentleman; not so much, not at all indeed, for his novels—which I do not profess to admire: and I am of opinion that, if Mr Godwin himself had been asked the question searchingly, he would have acknowledged that I had seen a little into his constitution of mind, when I pronounce that of all men who can ever have lived, he, by preference, must have found the labour most irksome of creating incidents, and making the narrative continue to move. Cocytus is not so stagnant or so sluggish in motion as the "Caleb Williams" in parts, and a later novel, whose name I forget, (but turning upon the case of kidnapping an heir to an English estate, and carrying him to the Continent;) and I would have consented to abide by an appeal to Mr Godwin himself, whether, to the last extremity of a soil parched up and arid, he had not felt the condition of his own mind when summoned to produce incidents. Is there anything disgraceful in this dearth of incident—this palsy of the fable-creating* faculty? Far from it; so far from it, that the powerful minds I have happened to know were certainly those who had least of it. The most powerful mind I have ever known had none of it—positively none. Shakspeare, whom few men would disagree in making FIRST of human intellects, though double difficulties would arise as to who should be SECOND, and threefold difficulties as to who should be THIRD, and fourfold as to who should be FOURTH: —well, Shakspeare had, perhaps, as little of this power as most men, who have had (like him) something of universal minds. Not, therefore, by any possibility, can it be supposed that I mean to disparage Mr Godwin, in charging him with this defect. And yet, in a newspaper, some months ago, I saw the novel of "Caleb Williams" called "magnificent"—a word which, as I have remarked elsewhere, is more than any other abused, from the hotbed excitement of the age; and, previously by some years, I saw a paper which, in other circumstances, might have moved laughter—a paper which compared and equalised Mr Godwin, as a novelist, with Sir Walter Scott; but which, because I fancied that I saw in it the filial hand of a gifted writer, whom the whole world, from the east to the west, admires, was fitted, by its very extravagance, to draw tears on account of its piety. Involuntarily I thought of a paper which a German wife had written about her ugly husband, (Herder,) whom all others had admired, but whom she only thought proper to find handsome. But enough of what Mr Godwin was not. I felt the nearest interest in this famous man on three separate accounts: first, as the husband of Mrs Wolstonecraft.—What a woman! the sole rival in this country of the noblest of her sex—Madame Roland—the rival, I mean, in constitution of mind:—would that she had glorified her life and end by the same self-sacrifices, which, under favouring circumstances, she was equally able to have done!—Next, I felt a profound interest in Mr Godwin, as the great mormo set up to terrify all England, some forty years ago, by two separate classes of enemies—by the "panic-of-property men," as Coleridge christened the party who arose in England under the terrors of the French "war against the palace—peace to the cottage;" and, secondly, by the antagonists of what was then called French Philosophy, or Modern Philosophy; or the philosophy of the Illuminati. In two works, of great circulation at that time, "Pilgrim Good Intent," and Miss Hamilton's novel, "Modern Philosophers," the two great moving agents are Dr Priestley and Mr Godwin. His connexion with Mrs Wolstonecraft had completed what the first or 4to edition of his "Political Justice" had begun: the first edition, I say; for, in the second, the hypothesis which alarmed the "men of property," (as Mr Hood has it,) had been emasculated. Such was the awe inspired at that time by these shocks to public opinion, that most people felt of Mr Godwin with the same alienation and horror as of a goul, or a bloodless vampire, or the monster created by

* But I here take an opportunity of observing, that, to produce a fable, (i. e., the outline or frame-work of nexus of incidents,) is not very difficult; the true difficulty is in making the fable move—in calling up the secondary incidents, through which and by which this fable is to revolve.

Frankenstein. It may be supposed that I had not shared in these thoughtless impressions; and yet, from the audacity of his speculations, I looked to see a loud, clamorous, and, perhaps, self-sufficient dogmatist; whereas the qualities most apparent on the surface of his manners were a gentle dignity of self-restraint and a tranquil benignity. I saw him, however, always under a cloud—that is, under the dust and confusion, to the intellect, of a large party, composed of what (by analogy to its slang use) might be termed a mob of literary swells. Once only, I saw him in a smaller party at the Courier Office—present Coleridge, Wordsworth, Southey, Charles Lamb, Mr Stewart a proprietor of the Courier, and some four or five others. But, on this occasion, it happened, which, perhaps, had not often happened before, that neither Coleridge nor Wordsworth talked; Coleridge being more than usually out of spirits; Wordsworth fatigued by attending a dull debate in the House of Commons; Southey naturally indisposed to the exertions connected with colloquial duties; myself and others repressed by youth and reverence for our company. Thus it fell by accident to Charles Lamb to entertain the company, which he did in his happiest style, as a Diogenes with the heart of a Saint John; but nothing, as it happened, arose to call out the powers of Mr Godwin. Though balked, therefore, of all fair occasion for measuring his colloquial calibre, I was not sorry to have gone off with an amended impression of the demeanour and general bearing to be naturally expected from revolutionary minds, and a personal redress given to the common partisan portrait circulated of one who had filled the mouth of declaimers for many a year, and become a by-word or a commonplace of rhetoric for the schools.

In 1808, going up to London from Oxford, about May or June, in order to attend the marriage of a college friend, I met a lady of great conversational spirit—a Scottish lady, who, with her daughter, were the lions for that particular season in the higher circles of London; the mother for her wit, the daughter for her beauty. This was Mrs Grant, of Laggan—a valley or parish in the Scottish Highlands. The interest about her had been evoked for this particular winter of London by the quality of her introductions, and stimulated by the beauty of the daughter. But the permanent ground of it lay in her books; which, however, were thought below her conversation. Her visit was chiefly to the Bishop of London, whose palace she had just left at the time I met her, in order to fulfil some engagement to a city friend—the wife of a rich stockbroker; and there it was I had the honour of being presented to her. Her kindness to me was particularly flattering; and, to this day, I retain the impression of the benignity which she—an established wit, and just then receiving incense from all quarters—shewed in her manners to me—a person utterly unknown. Once, however, she gave a rough assault to my deepest sensibilities. Either from myself or from somebody else, she had learned my profound veneration for the poetry of Wordsworth. Upon this, she suddenly put a question to me upon the lines of Wordsworth, on seeing a robin red-breast pursuing a butterfly. The particular passage which she selected, was to this effect:—

> "If Father Adam could open his eyes,
> And see but this sight beneath the skies,
> He would wish to close them again."

"Now," said Mrs Grant, "what possible relation can Father Adam have to this case of the bird and the butterfly?" It must be mentioned here, that the poem was not in the "Lyrical Ballads," by which originally Wordsworth had become known, but in a second collection which had but just issued from the press. The volumes had been in the public hands, if they could be said to have reached the public at all in those years, for about a fortnight; but in mine, who had only recently arrived in London, not above two days. Consequently, I had not seen the poem; and, being quite taken aback by such a question, in a dinner party made up of people who had either not heard of Wordsworth or heard of him only as an extravagant and feeble innovator, I believe that I made some absurd answer about Adam being possibly taken as a representative man, or representing the general sensibilities of human nature. Anything passes in company for a reason or an explanation, when people have not the demoniac passion for disputation; and Mrs Grant accordly bowed, in sign of acquiescence. I easily judged, however, that she could not have been satisfied; and in going home, with a strong feeling of self-reproach for having but ill sustained a poetic reputation for which I was so intensely jealous, I set myself to consider what could be the meaning for this connexion of Father Adam with the case; and, without having read the poem, by the light of so much as Mrs Grant had quoted, instantly it flashed upon me that the secret reference must be to that passage in the "Paradise Lost," where Adam is represented—on the very next morning after his fatal transgression, and whilst yet in suspense as to the shape in which the dread consequences would begin to reveal themselves, and how soon begin—as lifting up his eyes, and seeing the first sad proof that all flesh was tainted, and that corruption had already travelled, by mysterious sympathy, through universal nature. The passage is most memorable, and can never be forgotten by one who has thoughtfully read it:—

> "The bird of Jove stoop'd from his airy flight,
> Two birds of gayest plume before him drove;
> Down from the hills, the beast that reigns in woods—
> First hunter then—pursued a gentle brace,
> Goodliest of all the forest—hart and hind.
> Adam observed"——

Here, then, we find that, in Milton's representation of the Fall, the very earliest—not the second or third, but positively the very first—outward signs by which Adam was made aware of a secret but awful revolution, which had gone like a whisper through all nature, was this very phenomenon of two animals pursuing in wrath others of more innocent and beautiful appearance. Reasonably, therefore, we may imagine, for the purposes of a poet, that, if Adam were permitted to open his eyes again upon this earthly scene of things, it would send a peculiar anguish through his thoughts to see renewed before him that very same image and manifestation of ruin by which his eyes had been met and his suspense had been resolved on the very first morning succeeding to his fall. The only question which could arise after this upon the propriety of Mr Wordsworth's allusion, was, Had he a right to presume in his readers such a knowledge of Milton? The answer to which is—that Milton is as much a presumable or presupposable book in the reference of a poet as nature herself and the common phenomena of nature. These a poet postulates, or presupposes in his reader, and is entitled to do so. However, I mentioned the case afterwards to Mr Wordsworth; and, in consequence of what I then said, he added the note of reference to Milton, which will be found in the subsequent editions. Another, and hardly, perhaps, so excusable a mistake, had been made upon the very same poem by The Edinburgh Review. Mr Wordsworth had noticed the household character of the red-breast and his consecration to the feelings of men, in all Christian countries; and this he had expressed by calling it

"The bird whom, by some name or other,
All men who know thee call their brother"— which passage the Reviewer had so little understood as to direct attention to it by Italics. Yet the explanation was found in what immediately followed:—

"Their Thomas in Finland
And Russia far inland;
The Peter of Norway boors."

The bird is Robin with us in Britain, Thomas in another land, Peter in another, and so on. This was the explanation of what the Reviewer thought so absurd or inexplicable. To call a bird by a Christian name is, in effect, when expressed by a poet, to "call him a brother" of man. And with equal ease might all the passages be explained which have hitherto been stumblingblocks to critics, where at least the objection has arisen out of misconstruction of the sense.

Some years after this, I saw Mrs Grant again in Edinburgh; but grief was then heavy upon her: the fair-haired young lady, the "Scottish Beauty" of the London circles in 1808, had gone to an early grave; and others of her family were expected to follow. Her "Letters from the Mountains" made a considerable impression at the time of its first appearance. But the work which interested me the most was that in which she painted her own early years as passed among the Anglo-Dutch of the New England States. It was a condition of society which had thus much of a paradisiacal condition—that none was "afore or after the other;" no jealous precedencies; no suspicions; no spectacles of grinding poverty. Aristocracy, there was none; pauperism, there was none; and every member of the community saw a friend and a wellwisher in every other. Happy, happy state, in which were to be found a state which, with the expansion of civilisation as it travels through American forests, may, for a century to come, be continually renewed in those lands, but elsewhere I fear never more in this world.

I have been anticipating a little, and looking forward into years which I have not yet regularly reached. It may surprise a reader who has gone through the slight records of my life, to find me originally, as a boy, moving amongst the circles of the nobility, and now courting only those of intellectual people. The final resolution which led me into renouncing my connexions with ranks above my own, arose upon the following occasion. On leaving school clandestinely, which I did some weeks before my seventeenth birthday, I went into Wales; where I continued for months to walk about. As long as I kept up any negociation with my guardians, I received a regular allowance of a guinea a-week. But, upon this sum, not, however, (as may be supposed,) without great difficulty, I continued to obtain a bed, and some apology for supper, in the shape of coffee or tea, at the inns scattered about the Welsh valleys for the sake of the tourist. The old village inns had, till lately, charged the most primitive prices—sixpence, for example, had been the usual rate for a dinner, and so on; but all this had very nearly disappeared under the great revolution of the times. War prices had arisen in the great markets; a great influx of tourists and artists had begun to set in to the Welsh valleys; elegant hotels arose on every side; and the prices were pretty much as on the Bath road. Finding, therefore, that my three shillings a-day did but little at these showy inns, more than the better half being at once exhausted upon a bed and the perquisites to "waiter," "chambermaid," and "boots," I came to the resolution of carrying a tent with me and sleeping out of doors. This tent, as may be imagined, was miserably small; both to make it more portable, and also on account of the tent-pole, which, to avoid notice and trouble, was no more than a common walking cane. I pitched my tent always on the lee side of a hill; and, in a land so solitary, and free from "high-viced" towns, I apprehended but little from any enemies, except the wild mountain cattle: these sometimes used to take umbrage at my intrusion, and advance upon my encampment in the darkness—with what intentions I could not discover, nor perhaps did they know; but I lay in constant anxiety that some lumbering cow or other should break into my preserve, and poach her heavy foot into my face. This, however, was not the worst evil. I soon found the truth of Napoleon's criticism at St Helena, on a proposal made for improving the art of war, by portable tents, treble-barrelled guns, &c.—that the practice of bivouacking, which offended so deeply the humanity of some philanthropic people, was in fact most favourable to the health of troops; and that at most, a screen hung up to windward was the utmost protection from open air, (or properly from the weather, rather than the air,) which is consistent with health. The loftier tents of the officers may be an exception; but mine, which resembled more the humbler and crowded tents of the privates, confirmed strikingly the medical objection of Napoleon. I soon found it necessary to resign it in that form; using it rather as a screen against wind, or, on a calm night, as a pillow. Selecting the ground well on such occasions, I found the advantage of this sub dio sleeping, in improved health; but summer air and dry ground disappearing, I was at length obliged to seek other modes of lodging. One morning, however, during the season when I practised it, I was sitting as yet undecided upon my day's movements, when a sound of wheels, as if rapidly approaching my own station, became audible. I rose and went forwards in the direction of the sound, with as much surprise as if "Gabriel's hounds" had been really approaching; for my idea was, that I had taken up my sleeping quarters on a wild moor remote from roads. A little ascent, and the turning of a knoll, shewed me that in part I was right: a wild moor it was, but one which was traversed by the high road between Kerniogge and Llanrwst. A travelling carriage was advancing, and swept past me at the very moment when I touched the high road. The carriage seemed known to me; and on the pannels I observed the coronet of a marquis; and, immediately after, I saw a head put out of the window, and looking at me until the downhill track and abrupt turns of the road hid me from sight. It was a natural conclusion enough, this being the high road to Holyhead, that the carriage I had just seen might be that of my Irish friend, who had been created a marquis soon after I left Ireland; and the face of the person who surveyed me so keenly, doubtless one of his household, knowing me better than I knew her. Great was my joy at this probability; and, without delay, I struck my tent and walked to Llanrwst. The distance proved to be six miles; and on my arrival the bird was flown. I went into the stable-yard, and inquired earnestly of a group just fresh from attending to the horses recently come in—"Who was the last traveller?" All remembered that it was a lord, and that it was a marquis. "Was it the Marquis of S———?" "Yes: that was the very title," several voices answered; "and he would stop for dinner at Conway." Thither I resolved to pursue; and, for that purpose, went into the house. Luckily, the landlord was able to inform me that the noble marquis was not my friend, but Lord Bath. And, by this timely information, I was saved from the very awkward embarrassment of finding myself at Conway with a chaise and four to pay and no money at my command. The momentary evil was past. But the sort of danger I had escaped, of finding myself viewed by the inn at Conway as a fraudulent tourist, threw me powerfully on considering what had been my motive for pursuing the party, supposing even that it had been Lord S———. What would have come of it? He would naturally have been pleased to see me, as everybody is pleased to see old friends after a long interval; he would have asked me to dine with him; and, supposing a vacant seat in his carriage, he would have asked me to go along with him to Holyhead or Dublin. But even so, he would not have particularly admired my call on his purse for a chaise and four. Next I went on to ask myself—What if all this were conceded, and it should happen that he really was pleased, and wishing for my company to Dublin—upon what principles or views did I mean to cultivate a connexion of this sort? Boyish years stood upon other grounds; but, on coming to an accountable age, I knew that everywhere sprung up an impertinent question as to a young man's future destination. Up to sixteen or fifteen, a boy is ranked upon the footing of his father's rank. After that time, his rank is deduced proleptically from the probable stations which he will hold in future times. Now, if my object was to make myself a trading Member of Parliament, certainly the connexions which I had with ministerial noblemen would be of use. Through them, a borough might be had; and, that obtained, all was done for a man which he could owe to fortune—the rest depended upon himself. But, supposing that personally there should be no objections, still I had seen enough of borough-disposers to know that they were not willing to give, without a consideration something more than that of support to a particular line of politics. Lord S—— in particular, who in those days had some borough interest, looked upon it as "bespoke" for family connexions. And so of others. But the most signal bar to all this was, my own grievous disinclination to any mode of public, or noisy, or contentious life. Peace, liberty to think, solitude—these were the cravings of my heart. And unless I went among the nobility in the character of a demanding, insolent claimant, I knew that I had better not go at all. Inevitably the question arises—Upon what footing is this man here? Is it his natural station? No: then at least he is an interloper; and the chances are, that he is a toad-eater and sycophant. Suppose he is not—yet the known presumption that he is (a presumption of which he cannot be unaware) loads him with almost the worst reproaches of the reality. He is no sycophant; yet he is willing to stand the presumption that he is, and the consequent contempt——For what? Every way, I saw that my own dignity—which, above all things, a man should scrupulously maintain—required that I should no longer go into any circles where I did not stand on my own native footing—proprio jure. Many a time had I wondered at the false conceptions of dignity which could lead Addison to think himself elevated by marriage with Lady Warwick—a husband to seek protection, as it were, from a wife! What had been abundantly right for me as a boy, ceased to be right for me when I ceased to be a boy.

ANNALS OF HORSEMONGER LANE.

If any etymologist or antiquary should be in want of employment, we would recommend him to set about sifting the names of various localities in London. Some of these appear to us of so graphic a character, as to denote their origin with much greater fidelity than one-half of the china-pattern tea-cups of modern manufacture. We select a few by way of illustration. "Charing Cross" is evidently significant of the petulant altercations arising from a confluence of rival sedan-men at such an eligible place of rendezvous. "St George in the Fields," refers to the juvenile sports of that illustrious warrior, when he dreamt more of capturing birds' nests than of rescuing captive damsels, and was more ambitious of getting up a kite than of laying low a dragon. "Leicester Square," it is currently reported, was conferred, by a lady of high rank, to commemorate the final adjustment of a favourite friend's pecuniary embarrassments. There is good reason to believe that "Little Turnstile" was a kind of Beau Brummel, whose capricious fancy used to regulate the habits and habiliments of the élite circle who sought illumination from the sun of his fascinating presence. The legend of St Mary le Bonne and St Martin le Grand, runs simply thus:—A gay and pompous French marquis (ultimately he became penitent, bequeathed a thousand crowns to the pope, and was justly canonized) at one time made his declarations to an amiable young maiden, whom he endeavoured to incite to an elopement; but, with a virtuous inflexibility, for which it would perhaps be difficult now to find a parallel, she turned her eyes away from his dazzling plans—(they were executed by a first-rate surveyor)—St Mary prudently resolving to remain in her present situation, and look after the "Poultry."

Every body will remark that we have been guilty of a most culpable omission in the preceding disquisition. The most eminent example in support of our theory has found no place there—Horsemonger Lane. Now, we candidly acknowledge that, notwithstanding our intimate acquaintance with all the most important districts of town—their origin, history, and character; despite of having set ourselves up in opposition to Garter King at Arms, qualified to adjudicate upon all titles in longitude not exceeding the diameter of Bloomsbury Square, and any genealogy not rising higher than a third story—notwithstanding all this, in compiling our learned and elaborate work upon Street Peerage, we never caught a glimpse of his most excellent Majesty Horsemonger Lane. Think of Lodge, Burke, or Debrett introducing the House of Hanover in a note at the end of their last chapter! Our unpardonable inadvertence was first pointed out to us by a morning newspaper some six weeks ago. It announced the demise of Mr John Richardson, at his residence in Horsemonger Lane. A flash of lightning seemed to strike upon our mental optics, revealing the truth in all its glaring colours. In the agony of our shame, we screwed up a countenance like a boy's who has swallowed a frightfully hot apple dumpling. What an illiterate world we live in! The immortal Richardson—he whose itinerant exertions have sounded the praise of Shakspeare in regions so outlandish and tumultuous that the sixpenny trumpet of Fame could only have been heard there as a mere squeak—he had transformed the notorious site of an asylum for delinquents into classic soil; and yet nobody of education could afford us the slightest information respecting Horsemonger Lane.—We felt chagrined exceedingly, and, donning our chapeau, resolved to prosecute a journey thither on foot instanter.

"It is understood that Mr Richardson has left the handsome cottage and furniture in Horsemonger Lane"—and so on ran the paragraph which communicated his departure in spirit. Alas! poor Yorick!—we had known his velveteen smalls for years, and made a memorandum of every successive symptom of decay in their complexion and texture; for, somehow or other, we flattered ourselves that honest John had got the measure of our personal identity in his eye, and had set down the indescribables to our account in his last last will. Even now we are in daily expectation of hearing from the executors; and we take this opportunity of saying that the bequest shall have the first post of honour assigned to them in our long-expectant wardrobe.—"A HANDSOME COTTAGE IN HORSEMONGER LANE." Had a report obtained circulation that fine plump salmon had been detected in Fleet Ditch, we might have swallowed it, because they are slippery fish, and can whisk their tails along with their noddles up the fall of a loch with an agility emulating the Bedouin Arabs; but how a handsome cottage and furniture could find their way into Horsemonger Lane is an entangled skein of mystery, which, lost to all confidence in our own powers, we willingly leave to Dr Buckland, of Bridgewater-treatise celebrity, to unravel.

On arriving at the Stone's End in the Borough, we felt a presentiment that the goal of our curiosity lay not far distant. We accordingly turned down a road, leading to a high-walled, dark, repulsive building, at sight of which we blessed our stars for being personally unknown to the sheriffs of London and Middlesex. Presently a small tailor's shop attracted our notice. There was no superstructure to bring it within the designation of a dwelling-house. It resembled a moderate-sized out-fitting case, sufficiently large to contain the entire body of the biggest alderman, when he had once been let in—by any other channel than the door-way. A little garrulous-looking old piece of buckram, in stocking-sleeves and spectacles, was seated on his board, busily employed in various branches of fortification—both repairing the breaches of mishap, and neutralizing the inroads of time. In a confined back room, rose a tall, perpendicular, reserved young woman, whose features had determined to lay themselves under no obligation to the famous Jenner, as they presented the appearance of having been fired at by a volley of duck-shot from a child's pea-gun, violent enough to imprint, without danger of penetration.

"Know Horsemonger Lane!" replied Buckram, looking up with an air of complacent contempt for our ignorance of topography—"should think I ought, when my grandfather kept a cabbage and bacon shop there up'ards of five and forty year."

"Perhaps, then, it is not too much to presume that you are in possession of a few particulars respecting its early history. Some persons have a whim for those kind of things."

"Love o' knowledge very nat'ral," rejoined Shears, waxing his thread with growing importance. "My grandfather, who carried on a pretty considerable business for five and forty year, used to tell some queer tales of old Horsemonger Lane."

"Old?—you mean before the prison was erected?"

"Goose!" muttered the uninoculated young woman, clapping down that ponderous instrument within an inch and a fraction of her lord and master's unprepared fingers. Buckram looked in the interesting countenance of his young spouse, while his own exhibited an expression of surprise blended with anger, and both allied to reluctant tongue-denial. Then, heaving a barely audible groan, he continued:—

"Before the pris'n was 'rected!—I should rather say, before the individuals as 'rected it was born, or ever expected they should be. My grandfather, who carried on a wery extensive business in the cabbage and bacon line for five and forty year"——

We will not inflict upon our readers a verbatim report of old Buckram's narrative, however much his pride, like that of more patriotic orators, may be wounded by the abridgement. The sum and substance of his communication, when improved by the lopping of sundry superfluous "you knows," &c., will read very nearly as follows. It is "my grandfather's" account of the aborigines of Horsemonger Lane.

At the period to which our veritable history refers, the world seemed to have been first attacked by paralysis in its lower extremities. Legs then began to betray their weaknesses; else, why did they take to horse-riding? To supply the wants of a sinking population, a body of men, remarkable alike for their philanthropic aims and their unblushing impudence, imported a stud of Barbary mares into Horsemonger Lane. Judging from the peculiar conformation of these Barbary mares, we should say that the adjective was employed rather as a quaint figure of speech by the facetious owners, than to throw any light upon their peculiar breed. Every one allowed that the treatment of these mares was most barbarous; and who will wonder at it when he considers the cranial organization of their uneducated masters? A more incorrigible pack of scoundrels never put on spurs. To use an epigrammatic paradox employed by many humane spectators—"They never were easy but when they were running the horses about." But the brutal propensities of the majority dwindle into gentleness or nothingness, when compared with the ferocious habits of their leader—one being, in proportion to the other, like the nervous titillation of a schoolmaster's whisk, to the sanguinary flagellation of a military cat-o'-nine-tails. Could his dumb slaves have expressed their sentiments upon this worthy, they would have pronounced him the Nero of Horsemonger Lane.

A gigantic, black-whiskered, broad-brimmed monster—the fellow's muscular capabilities were Herculean. He seemed to have been turned out by nature, in a moment of vindictiveness, on purpose to spite the brute creation. His legitimate name (as "my grandfather" conscientiously believed) was Dick Thunderheels; but, amongst his compeers, he generally went by the cognomen of the "Out-and-outer."

Thunderheels rode a trickish, tight-winded, tile-coloured young Galloway, in shape, case, and disposition, forming a striking contrast to all its fellows in the market. They were long-limbed and raw-boned animals; their heads almost as long as their legs; their teeth very little shorter than their tails; and their demeanour was prim and old-maiden like. But Dick's mare was a frisky, intelligent little creature, that seemed to feel proud of the passionate temper of its rider; the more Dick spurred, the more delight his Moggy displayed, and a flogging appeared only to strengthen the affection which she evinced for Dick Thunderheels, the hero of Horsemonger Lane.

When whipping and spurring, our hero was in his element. Had Dick ever been taught to write, we had never presented the world with these delineations of his character; for he would have cut up our article as though it had been an unfortunate stray nag that should happen to come in the way of a general Review. Brutality, ferocity, and monstrosity, when applied to Dick Thunderheels' treatment of his animals, are mere breaths of wind. He lashed, and punched, and lashed again, till an uninitiated looker-on would have expected to see the poor jades' sides streaked with red and blue, like the silk of a modern balloon; but they never were; for, as "my grandfather" shrewdly insinuated, it would be difficult to get blood out of a stone, nor less so to extract it from the counterfeit hides which enclosed the ossified remains of animals who were warranted, not only to be engaging articles to look at, but remarkably fine ones to go.

Ingenuity never was exercised with more extraordinary effect than by the artists in Horsemonger Lane. The dentist volunteered his aid to rejuvenate a whole stud. Eyes, that had long grown dim with infirmity and age, sparkled again with more than their native playfulness and energy, when a couple of vitreous auxiliaries were set before them. Tails, equal to new, (for they had never been worn,) were distributed in unbounded profusion. To put the machinery in motion, a small quantity of that irritating substance, the hairy phaseolus, or cow-itch, used to be introduced between the artificial surcoat and the natural one, so that the friction of the saddle, operating upon an established raw, stimulated the animals' spirits as if they had been influenced by a powerful voltaic battery. In short, had a person, out of curiosity, divided one of these eccentric bits of workmanship into ten parts, "my grandfather" declared that he would have found nine to be the work of man, and only one the production of nature. The national credit was beginning to tremble. Our horses, universally, were getting a bad name abroad; while none but very courageous equestrians could dare to mount one at home. Gentlemen were absolutely afraid to sit on the saddle, for fear the whole structure beneath them should break down with a crash, or even to lead a horse along, save with very great timidity and care, lest the elaborate piece of machinery should drop all to pieces. But a crisis was approaching to sweep away the iniquities of Horsemonger Lane.

A suit which had been pending in Chancery for some considerable time, was, during the life of the great-grandson of the original claimant, brought to a final and successful issue; when he (the rightful claimant's great-grandson) found himself obliged to dispose of the estate, in order to defray the legal expenses, which ought, in equity, to have been borne by the opposing party; but he had been dead upwards of eighty years, and his representatives had been declared bankrupt. About five acres adjoining Horsemonger Lane were purchased by the city, with an intention of building upon it; and the city, accordingly, went to take possession; but they found, to their ineffable surprise, that the city had been anticipated, for a length of time, by Dick Thunderheels and other periodical visiters, by whom the ground had been converted into a cattle market; and it was as much as the city could do, to maintain a footing of two minutes together upon their territorial acquisition.

Complaints had been made, loudly and frequently, but in vain, by persons who had occasion to pass down Horsemonger Lane, of the danger they incurred by the racing of, and experimentalizing upon, horses, mules, and other quadrupeds thereabouts. Gouty old men had, more than once, been nearly knocked down, trampled upon, bruised, and maimed, if not disabled for life; while ladies, both old and young, had been dreadfully frightened in crossing the road; but whether this alarm was excited by the daring of the riders, or the phantom-like appearance of their steeds, "my grandfather, who kept a cabbage and bacon shop in Horsemonger Lane for five-and-forty year," never could determine.

The nuisance, however, since the late visit of the city authorities, had grown to such an enormous extent, that they felt themselves imperatively called upon to interfere. Accordingly, Alderman Doublepay, Mr Deputy Scroggs, and their little clerk, Yocker, were commissioned to wait upon the trespassers, expostulate with them concerning their unlawful proceedings, and insist upon an immediate resignation of the territory.

It was a beautiful sight, "my grandfather" used to say, to behold the mild, benevolent form of Alderman Doublepay—supported on one side by the erect and aristocratic Scroggs, and, on the other side, by the stunted, neckless, and crabbed old clerk, Yocker—holding a free conference with the uncivilized denizens of Horsemonger Lane. We rather think it must have been the prototype of West's celebrated picture of Penn's confabulation with the natives.

Three specific grounds of complaint were preferred against the horsemongers. The first, that of wanton cruelty; secondly, the annoyance to pedestrians; and, thirdly, the wrong inflicted upon the city by occupying their possessions in Horsemonger Lane.

Dick Thunderheels was elected spokesman on behalf of the respondents; and, with his arms planted in an independent akimbo position, he conducted their defence.

"Do you suppose, my friend, that horses have no feeling?" said Alderman Doublepay, in bringing forward the first count in the indictment.

"Not arter they gets to a certain age," replied Dick, coolly; "bless you, if their hearts had been as full o' feeling as their bellies is of corn, we should a' cut it all out of 'em afore this."

"Persons can't go down the Lane without being in danger of getting knocked down by some unmannerly ruffian," said Deputy Scroggs, pinching his starched cravat.

"Indeed," replied Thunderheels—"then, I advise you never to attempt it, unless you thinks your neck is stronger than my Moggy's hind-leg."

Here Dick's admirers laughed outright, with their faces turned up, as though they saw something very ludicrous in the disposition of the clouds.

"We want to build upon the ground," said tart old Yocker; "and, therefore, you must remove somewhere else."

"Build! We don't prevent you building—do we?" returned Thunderheels, looking at the little clerk, as though he had it in contemplation to put a saddle upon his back.

"But, my good man," said Alderman Doublepay, extending his mediatorial hand, "the bricklayers could not pursue their employment while your horses were racing about; their lives would be in danger every moment."

"Lord love you," replied Dick, with a satanic smile, which made the Alderman feel very much indisposed, "we wouldn't hinger a 'air o' their heads, if they vas only sharp enough to get out of our way."

To parry this fallacious thrust would have been an unprofitable expenditure of civic energy. Horsemonger Lane enjoyed its temporary triumph. But, notwithstanding their apparent defeat, the Common Council quietly determined to afford their opponents tangible demonstration that the Court did not, in general, advance arguments which they were unable effectually to substantiate. On the motion of Mr Deputy Scroggs, it was unanimously agreed to erect a jail, whose applicable terrors, every one naturally anticipated, would scare away the incorrigibles from the spot to which they had shewn such a long and resolute attachment. In accordance with this design, mattocks and spades, trowels and hods of mortar, were put in requisition; and one eventful 29th of February, saw a sturdy, frowning structure, with a fantastic death's-head and a pair of fetters sculptured over the gateway, securely settled upon the debatable ground in Horsemonger Lane.

A brave but unfortunate garrison turned out of a besieged citadel, without military honours—a municipal corporation, expelled by some relentless statute from their Common Hall, and casting many a long and lingering look at the savoury commons left behind them—are both very affecting spectacles. But neither is worthy of comparison with the exodus of the Horsemongers, which "my grandfather" never alluded to but with tears dripping warm from the urn of his susceptible heart. But destiny had signed the decree, and a cataract of tears could not have blotted out her immutable sign-manual.

Dick Thunderheels and his co-mates had assembled (as indeed they had done, in spite of all remonstrances, since the foundation stone was laid) in the quadrangle of the new building, and were pursuing their vocation with as much brutality, rascality, and jocularity as ever—when, lo! a body of marshalmen, in their buck-skin inferiors and their scarlet-breasted coats—constables and extra constables, with Alderman Doublepay, Deputy Scroggs, and little Yocker at their head—marched into the fortress; and silence having been called for, Alderman Doublepay and his quizzing-glass read a proclamation, supposed to be the model of the more recent "Riot Act." Within five minutes, every living body, whether pertaining to man or beast, (if there was any distinction, further than that the latter, perhaps, had none to carry away,) was peremptorily commanded to retire. Every eye turned to Dick Thunderheels; while Dick laughed himself hoarse, and whipped his little Moggy round and round, till his arm was tired, and then he carelessly whipped his boot. Meanwhile, Doublepay, Scroggs, the constables, marshalmen, and supernumerary constables, shewed, by the fixedness of every feature in their varied physogs, that they considered the insult offered to civic dignitaries to be no laughable matter. The signal was given to advance. Then it certainly was a grand thing ("my grandfather" used to expatiate upon it for a couple of hours without pausing) to see the portly functionaries, with "good capon lined," concentrated into one determined phalanx, each individual presenting his small gold-headed emblem of authority. Inch by inch they marched up to the rebels, making good their ground at every step. Nothing could resist the severity of their dignity. Thunderheels, mounted upon his frisky little mare, heading his motley and odd-apparelled band, looked like the leader of some Asiatic adventurers departing from a caravansera. Dick, whose large dark eyes seemed to black-ball every candidate for their approbation, affected to look with sarcastic indifference upon his opponents. But the captain and his ragged regiment had managed to get as far as the archway contiguous to the open gates, and Alderman Doublepay and his subalterns were close upon them, when, at a flourish of the whip from Thunderheels, all the donkeys uttered a terrific lamentation, and the chargers, venting their indignation in their peculiar strains, both species simultaneously set fifty pair of hind-hoofs into active operation, and sent an explosion of slush and mud at the very heads of the common council—then Dick Thunderheels and his accomplices dashed off in a body, making the air ring again in high exultation at their triumphant revenge.

Some two or three years had rolled over, down the bumpy Hill of Time, when, one morning, a man in a white nightcap stood upon the summit of the gaol in Horsemonger Lane. True, his arms were uncomfortably cramped, and a hempen collar was round his neck; therefore, although poor Dick Thunderheels had raised himself in the estimation of society, he did not consider himself placed in better circumstances, in any sense of these words. Dick was going to drop all his animosities, and depart in charity with all mankind; for how could he be otherwise than blind to the errors of his brethren, when he had got an ugly beam in his own eye? Just before Dick could cry, Play! a trickish, tight-winded, tile-coloured young Galloway, carrying an elderly personage, suddenly halted at the place of execution, and looked up with an air of intelligent curiosity; then, stretching out her neck, as though she recognised some familiar object, Moggy, profoundly absorbed in the contemplation of her old master, made way into the crowd, with a slow, mechanical pace, the attendant ladies falling back on either side, wondering what business such a strange animal as that could have there. Thunderheels knew his little Moggy in an instant; and, leaping from the scaffold, Dick threw himself upon the mare's back, burst through the astonished multitude, and dashed off like a whirlwind. The concluding part of this performance, we regret to say, poor Dick only went through in his imagination; and, seeing the impracticability of its being done in any other way, he flung his bird's-eye weeper as a token of affection towards his little Moggy, which, being taken for his cue by the scene shifter below, he dropped the curtain upon this high tragedy. Moggy was led off very reluctantly to livery stables near at hand; but when they attempted to tie her up, she resolutely drew back to the full length of her tether, apparently afraid of meeting with the same treatment as that so recently inflicted upon poor Dick Thunderheels. So, to cure the little creature of her whimsical peculiarities, the scraggy-haired ostler secured Moggy's halter to the cross-bar of the hay-rack. On returning with some water, the scraggy-haired ostler discovered Moggy with the rope twisted round her neck, in a depending attitude. She had evidently been making the experiment which she had seen tried upon her old master, and, like many other experimentalists, had paid dearly for her temerity. The horse was dead as a herring.

Here little Buckram finished his "Tales of my Grandfather." And it was fortunate that he had done so; for, during the latter part of his discourse, the frizzling of sausages, which the perpendicular young woman, his spouse, had been cooking for dinner, made such a confounded noise that we could hardly understand a word he uttered.

"Dinner!" muttered the marked young woman; and, without waiting for her little husband, she sat herself down to table. Buckram quickly screwed himself round, and sprang from his board with the same alacrity that a British tar would leap upon the deck of an enemy, fearful of not having a hand in the glorious work of destruction. We had been so long detained by little Buckram's story, that we found it inconvenient to pay our promised visit to the scene upon which it was founded; but, should any of our readers feel inclined to perform a pilgrimage to that Mecca of the Drama, and the handsome cottage in Horsemonger Lane, we would warn them not to stray (as we fear some gentlemen who have been missing from their friends have done) into the neighbouring intricacies of Banco Regis, better known by its less classical appellation of the King's Bench.

VISIT TO THE ABBEY OF MOUNT MELLERAY, IRELAND, OCCUPIED BY THE MONKS OF LA TRAPPE.

As I considered it incumbent on me to be acquainted with those objects which nature or art have rendered remarkable in my own country before seeking those in another—applying the same rule to such places worth visiting as Pope does to language—

> "Leave ev'ry foreign tongue alone
> Till you can read and spell your own"—

I mounted the driving seat of my vehicle, one fine morning in December, and, accompanied but by my servant, set out to visit the newly erected abbey.

The brethren now located amongst us are of the Trappist Order, of which there are no less than seventeen houses in France; but, during the disturbances which continually pervade that distracted country, some of the members of Melleray Abbey (which was the name of their convent in France) were suspected of hostility to the tyranny of their Government; and with the facts before their eyes that this peculiar class of men have no connexion with the affairs of this world, (perpetual silence being one of their most inviolate rules,) forced them, without trial or inquiry, by the ruthless means of armed soldiery, to leave the peaceful monastery, where they were worshipping God after their own ways; as they fondly hoped, "forgetting the world and by the world forgot;" and seek in another land that refuge they were denied in their own.

Upon this, without home or means of acquiring one, being stripped of all save the habits they wore, and trusting to the charity of the Irish, many of whose pious sons were among their number, and, above all, upheld by the hope that the Being whom they served would not forsake them in their distresses, they came to this country. Sir R. Keane of the county Waterford generously allotted them a portion of ground at a nominal value; and on this the brethren, in the short space of three years, raised a splendid temple to God—a monument of perseverance to men.

Possessed with an anxious desire to be a personal observer of what had taken such a powerful hold of my imagination—the gloomy solitude, the desert situation, the rugged abode, chosen by this singular fraternity for their abbey—I was impelled to seek them; and then, when I called to mind their rigid separation from the intercourse of human society, the inviolable taciturnity imposed on themselves by their rules, and their severe penances, including total abstinence from animal food, it seemed more like the visionary fabrics of fancy, revelling in the exuberant ideas of an Arabian tale, or dream of bygone ages, than actual reality, seen, heard, and discovered by the senses of those who would take the trouble of putting them to the test by an actual survey in the present day.

The road from Fermoy led by the picturesque banks of the river Blackwater; and, about twelve miles from that town, we beheld, in all the pride of feudal, ducal greatness, the romantic castle of Lismore, crowning the summit of a precipitous rock. Its proprietor, the Duke of Devonshire, has seldom visited it; royalty has occupied it for a short time. As you approach the castle, the tall trees of the stately avenue give its massive front a deep and solemn shade. We wound through a gloomy, arched passage, over the portal of which is read—

> "God's providence
> Is my inheritance."

After emerging from this archway, we found ourselves in a court-yard, where ranges of offices belonging to the Castle, with the main buildings, enclose a square. Strong towers flank the angles. In all the aristocratic pride of feudal greatness, the splendid pile frowns from its elevated height. Imagination cannot paint a more romantic scene. The river, broad and undisturbed, runs at the base of the lofty walls; and to a fearful height arise the rocks, bearing the embattled towers. James II. dined in the great hall, and, going to view the country, on approaching the window, drew back in terror at its precipitate elevation above the river. The contrast between the dark hue of the rocks, and the green moss and ivy with which they are in many places covered, is pleasing and agreeable. The banks are richly wooded. The Cathedral of Lismore is an imposing and venerable building, built in the Gothic style. The interior possesses the tomb of Milo Magrath, first bishop after the Reformation; it is an antiquated and curious piece of sculpture, the date 1567. Few who behold Lismore at the present day, would ever believe that it once was the chief seat of western lore, and gave education, it is said, to no less a personage than Alfred the Great. An ancient writer thus describes it:—"Lismor is a famous and holy city, full of cells and monasteries, in which religious men in great numbers abide; and the holy men flock thither from all parts of Ireland, and not alone from Ireland, but also from England and Britain, being desirous to remove from thence to Christ, and the city is built on the banks of the river Avon-mor" (Blackwater.) After three miles' driving from Lismore, we reached Cappoquin. The road between these two small towns runs along the left bank of the river. The scenery on either side is beautiful. Rich plantations clothe the winding hills in robes of varied hue, and neat mansions peep from out the vistas of the trees. Sloping down to the water's edge are green lawns, or fine tillage-land. Fat, contented cattle, were grazing on the well-watered meads, or the industrious ploughman urged his yoked steeds to draw the coulter through the loamy furrow. At the entrance to Cappoquin, there is a very handsome wooden bridge. This is washed by the tide from the Atlantic, which comes up about a dozen miles from Youghall. The town is small, but contains some good houses; at the upper end, it dwindles into a row of mud cabins. After leaving the town, we continued by the main road for a quarter of mile, when we diverged into a mountain track, wide enough to admit a gig, striking to the left. Soon the native wildness of the district became apparent; cultivation grew "small by degrees, and beautifully less;" until we lost all trace of its existence altogether, and nothing save the clear sky and savage hills were to be seen. The road now led us along the side of a steep dell, majestically wooded—and the effect was sublime. On one hand, the trees rose above us, the oaks casting their brawny arms over our path, and on the other continuing to wave their topmast branches until lost in the depth of the abyss. Then there ran at the woods' base, a clear, murmuring rivulet, that hummed its wild way like a bee among flowers, singing vespers to the stars which now appeared in the evening sky; and, right up from the brink of the tiny stream, rose the broad, steep bosom of a Titanic mountain, thickly strewn with a noble forest, looking, in the haze of coming night, like a vast sea, undisturbed by the breath of winds—all was so smooth and tranquil. Piercing through the gorge of the mountain, the eye surveyed a vast tract of bog and moorland, stretching away to a horizon of lofty hills; and, nearly at the base of the central hill, rises the elevated spire of Melleray Abbey.

Descending the hill, the full view of the convent strikes you, and has a singular effect. Alone in a wilderness, no habitation near it, the vastness of its size, its origin and appropriation—all combine to render it an object of interest; and, as its majestic proportions are disclosed by a nearer approach, and compared with its unexpected appearance in the isolated region in which it is built, we are reminded of the genii-built palaces said to be seen in the Arabian deserts by a few favoured mortals. At the foot of the eminence on which the Abbey is built, and where the land of the monks commences, I observed a small house, in which I was afterwards informed by the Abbot, two of the fraternity reside. Here they have established a nursery for rearing young trees, which, when of sufficient growth, and inured to the soil, are transplanted to the higher and more exposed plantations. As I ascended, I could perceive everywhere the marks of order and cultivation—good fences, heaps of manure, and growing crops, corn, turnips, &c. They have here 570 acres, which, when presented, were mere bog. They set about their task of reclaiming, with the resolve of men determined to conquer every difficulty: burnt lime, quarried stones, picked them off the land; and the first year had a fine abundant crop of potatoes! There were 300 acres reclaimed in three years, and the remainder is in a fair way! There is a neat lodge at the entrance, two stories high, where, I understand, the guests must dine—flesh meat being prohibited from use within the precincts of the monastery. The brethren live entirely on bread and vegetable diet; they are spare, sinewy men, equal to much labour.

I directed my servant to drive round to the guest-house; and, on the porter making his appearance, was ushered into the small reception-room. I handed him my card for the Abbot; and, on his going to seek him, had full leisure to survey the apartment. It is a square room, rather low. Over the chimney-piece are several religious prints, and an exquisite crayon Madonna. The porter returned, and introduced his superior—Doctor Ryan—who is a mitred abbot, with jurisdiction of bishop within his abbey. (The Prior of St Bernard has similar authority.) I found the Abbot a most gentlemanly, good-humoured clergyman; and, as he is permitted to communicate with visiters, we had a good deal of conversation. On his invitation to see the buildings, I accompanied him; and, certainly, the vastness of design and skill of execution are almost miraculous. It would be endless—and, indeed, from my limited stay, impossible—for me to describe minutely every portion of this stupendous place. I was in one room which is finished—it is intended for the dormitory—one hundred and seventy feet in length! The spire is of about equal height—all the work of the monks themselves. They are excellent workmen. The chapel is of amazing extent. I may quote the account of it by Mr Inglis:—"The building vies in size with any moderate cathedral, and might hold within it a dozen of the Irish Protestant churches." The monks are about fifty in number. Others of their persecuted brethren, who are also in Ireland, purpose joining them when their work is finished—at present they have not accommodation for more. To enable them to procure materials for their extensive buildings, many of the gentry contributed to supply the necessary funds. The Duke of Devonshire munificently gave them £100; and many others, Protestant and Catholic, assisted, by their horses and servants, to aid their useful undertaking.

The brethren are chiefly young men—slight, and hardy-looking. There are a good number Irish—the rest English and French. In a handsome square formed by the church and other buildings, is the cemetery. It is not yet laid out properly; but one brother sleeps there already.

As the night was drawing near, I left the superior to return to Cappoquin. The reflections produced by a survey of God's power, here manifested by the successful undertaking of his servants, were naturally pleasing—pleasing, in as much as the facility of improving the vast extent of useless land in Ireland, was here proved; and such has been the success of the persevering monks' experiments, and so great an effect had it on the minds of the neighbouring farmers, that those who had quitted their lands in despair some few years ago—not being able to turn them to any account—are now glad to retake and improve them. The brethren have done, and will do much good, by directing public attention to this national object, and prevent national power being lessened by the system of expatriation so extensively pursued, and the chief reason for which the example of the brothers of La Trappe may speedily put an end to.

RHYMED RAMBLES.—PART II.

BY EBENEZER ELLIOTT.

WALKLEY BANK.

SARAH and William Adams! here we stood,
Roof'd by the cloud which cast his frown between Wardsend and Loxley's mountains. From the wood
Of one-starr'd Greno, like a sea unseen,
The wind swept o'er us, seeming, in his might,
To move the steadfast rocks; while, rushing keen
Beyond the edge of darkness, stormy light,
As from a league-wide trumpet, on the scene
A cataract of glory pour'd; and, bright
In gloom, the hill-tops islanded the night
Of billowy shade around us. Vale and hill,
Forest and cloud, were restless as a fight—
They seemed as they would never more be still;
While, anchor'd over all, the high-pois'd kite
Saw the foam'd rivers dash their blue with white.

THE CHAINED EAGLE.

Slow Time seems swift. Since Charles stood here with me,
Three years have pass'd o'er Wharncliffe's wood and stream;
And Charles is busy still, where'er he be—Willing to labour, if he may but dream.
Poor Pemberton! the forest speaks of thee;
The eagles—no, they dwell with other things;
But he who caged them here, though chained, is free,
And might do better for us, with his wings,
Than flap his mental bonds to flatter kings.
When will he fly away and be at rest?
Can he roll back the ocean to its springs?
Ye chained in soul! what must be shall be best:
To space and time their food improvement brings.
"We dwell with God in both," Obstruction's poet sings.

A CLOUD ON WHARNCLIFFE.

Don whispers audibly! but Wharncliffe dread
Like speechless adoration, hymns the Lord;
While, smiting his broad lyre, with thunder stor'd,
He makes the clouds his harp-strings. Gloom is spread O'er Midhope, gloom o'er Tankersley, with red
Streak'd; and noon's midnight stillness doth afford
Deep meanings, like the preaching of the Word
To dying men. Then, let thy heart be fed
With honest thoughts, and be it made a lyre,
That God may wake its soul of living fire,
And listen to the music. Oh, do thou,
Serene of mind, to useful aims aspire,
And, scorning idle men and low desire,
Look on our Father's face with meek, submitted brow!

CLOUDLESS STANAGE.

Why, shower-loved Derwent! have the rainbows left thee?
Mam-Tor! Win-Hill! a single falcon sails
Between ye; but no airy music wails.
Who, mountains! of your soft hues hath bereft ye,
And stol'n the dewy freshness of your dales?
Dove-Stone, thy cold, drip-drinking fountain fails;
Sun-darken'd shadows, motionless, are on ye;
Silence, to his embrace of fire, hath won ye;
And Light, as with a shroud of glory, veils
The Peak and all his marvels. Slowly trails
One streak of silver o'er the deep, dark blue,
Its feathery stillness—while of whisper'd tales
The ash, where late his quivering shade he threw,
Dreams, o'er the thoughtful plant that hoards its drop of dew.

NOON ON GREAT KINDER.

WHEN last I looked on thee, thy brow was black
With trouble, and beneath it flames flashed out;
While on thine awful face the heavens flung back
The red glare of thy lightnings, Kinderscout!
And all thy brethren answered, with a shout,
Their monarch's voice, that spake from sea to sea,
O'er all their cataracts. But now the trout
Sleeps in thy voiceless runlets. Now the bee
Alone is restless here: he sings to thee
An ode of praise, where, reddening like the rose,

Amid the hoof-marks of the thunder, glows
The cloud-fed berry; and the clouds, to me,
While brightens wide around the purple flower,
Seem mute, in horror of thy noontide hour!

THE VALE OF DON.

Mountains! ye awe and tire me. Fare ye well!
And let the tempest love ye. But below,
The happy homed-and-hearthed affections dwell
Amid their floral sea, where daisies blow
And children cull them. There the village bell
Saith that the young are married; while the old
Talk of glad yesterdays, or fondly tell
Of buried loves. For joy is grief foretold!
And there young widows' hearts grow deadly cold,
And the poor orphan's smile is faint and brief,
When marriage chimes are heard o'er grange and wold.
Yet comfort there I seek, and joy in grief!
For man, by feelings strong as death controlled,
Gives heart for heart, and knows that hearts are never sold.

ROCH ABBEY.

Pale ruin! no—they come no more, the days
When thought was like a bee within a rose,
Happier and busier than the beam that plays
On this thy stream. The stream sings, as it flows,
A song of valleys, where the hawthorn blows;
And wanderings through a world of flowery ways,
Even as of old; but never will it bring Back to my heart its guileless love of praise—
The blossomy hours of life's all-beauteous spring,
When joy and hope were ever on the wing,
Chasing the redstart for its flamy glare,
The corn-craik for its secret. Who can wring
A healing balsam from the dregs of care,
And turn to auburn curls the soul's grey hair?

Yet, Abbey! pleased, I greet thee once again;
Shake hands, old friend, for I, in soul, am old!
But storms assault thy golden front in vain;
Unchanged thou seem'st, though times are changed and cold;
While to thy side I bring a man of pain,
With youthful cheeks, in furrows deep and wide,
Ploughed up by fortune's volleyed hail and rain;
To truth a martyr, hated and belied;
Of freedom's cause a champion true and tried.
Oh, take him to thy heart! for Pemberton
Loves thee and thine, because your might hath died—
Because thy friends are dead, thy glories gone—
Because, like him, thy battered walls abide
A thousand wrongs, and smile at power and pride.

Oh, bid him welcome, then! and let his eyes
Look on thy beauty, until blissful tears
Flood the deep channels, worn by agonies
Which leave a wreck more sad than that of years.
Yes; let him see the evening-purpled skies,
Above thy glowing lake, bend down to thee;
And the love-listening vesper-star arise,
Slowly, o'er silent earth's tranquillity;
And all thy ruins weeping silently:
Then, be his weakness pitied and forgiven,
If, when the moon illumes her deep blue sea,
His soul could wish to dream of thee in heaven,
And, with a friend his bosomed mate to be,
Wander through endless years, by silvered arch and tree.

COMMONSENSE AND GENIUS.—A RHAPSODY.

Commonsense, one night—
Though not used to gambols—
Went out, by moonlight,
With Genius, on his rambles.

I HAVE a quarrel with Mr Moore. What means he in this poetical apologue of Commonsense and Genius? Surely it is high treason against the very Muses he was courting, when he wrote it. Fie, Mr Moore! If the fate of Genius were to lie shivering on the bank of a cold river, many a time would you have invoked the aid of the Humane Society. And, after all, who would not rather wander with Genius, idly gazing "on each night-cloud o'er him," than plod wearily along with Commonsense, never raising his eyes from the path?

Would Mr Moore choose this dull companion, the twin brother of Commonplace, to listen with him, by the old grey oak, to the midnight prayer of Christabel? Would he have Commonsense by his side, when conversing with the little maid who "would have her way, and answered, We are seven?" Would he wish, with him, to visit the icy abode of Leila and her snow-formed attendants? Or to explore the mysteries of the castle of St John?—Nay, would he like his readers to follow his own Peri, with such an intruder in their company? Mr Moore is ungrateful.

Fancy Commonsense with Gulliver, exhibiting a Lilliputian dance on his handkerchief, or displaying his own antics on a Brobdignagdian dinner-table! Fancy him watching the Knight of La Mancha whirled round by the windmill, or his trusty squire engaged in disenchanting Dulcinea del Toboso! Fancy him—Oh, the profanation!—listening to my uncle Toby, when busy with the siege of Namur!

Who that has read, remembers not the exquisite garden scene in "Faust"—when, just as poor Margaret has confessed her affection—just as the lips of the lovers have met for the first time—Mephistopheles interrupts them with his execrable summons? Even such an interloper is Commonsense.

What said the fiend when he first saw Niagara? His thoughts were of water-power. What would he meditate among the glaciers of Switzerland? Surely ice-creams. Place him upon the Andes—and he would be boring for gold; on the shores of the dark Nile—he would investigate the soil. Go with him to St Peter's—he will exclaim, "Waste of room;" to the Pyramids—and he will speculate on the granite. Shew him the Goddess that "loves in stone"—he will tell you of some danseuse. In art or nature there is nothing beautiful, nothing sublime, which loses not its charm in his company. He > "Strips the distance of its phantasies, > Making the cold reality too real."

Were I in the most inhospitable of regions—crossing the deserts of Asia, or the ice of the North Sea—Genius should be my companion. I should prefer chasing the mirage or watching the aurora with him, to smoking away the hours on the camel of Commonsense, or plodding carefully along in his snow-shoes.

Well do I remember the print which illustrated the song. There was Commonsense, a robust young man, with a shawl round his nose, and a cloak about his shoulders, holding a staff in his hand, and tramping steadily forwards, with eyes fixed on the track. And there went Genius, lightly clad, tripping airily along, upright and gay, looking at the stars. The print decided the question.

Might not Genius take the arm of Commonsense? 'Twould be the far-seeing led by the blind.

Why, even the philosophers have discarded Commonsense—and shall the poets protect him? The Muses forbid! Leave him in quiet possession of his air-pumps and water-pumps, and let him go to the Devil his own way.

SLAVERY IN BRITISH INDIA.

It is not generally known in this country that slavery prevails to a very great extent in the British possessions in India. The exact number of slaves has never been ascertained, except in a few districts under the Madras presidency, where it was found, in 1819, that, in five collectorates only, there were 210,000 slaves, and that slavery prevailed in a less degree in five other collectorates. There are slaves also in the Bombay provinces; but it is in the extensive territories under Bengal, that probably the greatest number of slaves will be found to exist. In the lower provinces of Bengal, agricultural slavery is little known, except in the Dacca districts, and in Silhet, where the slaves have been estimated at one-sixth of the population; but in the upper provinces, slaves are commonly employed in the labours of agriculture, by the petty landholders, and in some districts (particularly Ramghur) Mr Richardson, a judge and magistrate, declared, in 1808, that to his own knowledge the greatest part of the cultivators and labourers were slaves. Add to this that domestic slavery exists in every part of India, and we may estimate the total number of slaves in British India as more probably exceeding than falling short of 800,000, the number of slaves in all the British colonies who are now approaching the term of their emancipation. The slaves in India are of two kinds—first, agricultural slaves, who are found only in particular districts, where certain castes or races of men have been held in slavery from time immemorial; and, secondly, domestic slaves, who are common to every part of India. Agricultural slaves are sometimes considered as slaves of the soil, and are usually sold or transferred only with the land; yet the owners claim the right, and sometimes exercise it, of selling their slaves separately, although they ought not to be removed to a distance from the place of their nativity. Besides those who are born slaves, many become slaves of their own free will, to discharge a debt which they are otherwise unable to pay, or to obtain wherewith to perform their marriage ceremonies; and free born children are frequently sold into slavery, by their parents and guardians. The condition of the agricultural slaves varies in some degree in different parts of India; they are most wretched and most numerous in Malabar, where they are estimated at 100,000 souls. Dr F. Buchanan Hamilton, who was deputed by Government to travel through India, and report on the state of the provinces, speaks of the slaves of Malabar thus—"whose huts are little better than mere baskets, and whose diminutive stature and squalid appearance evidently shew a want of adequate nourishment;" and Mr Walter Hamilton says—"These slaves are very severely treated, &c.; there can be no comparison of their condition with that of the slaves in the West Indies, except that in Malabar there are a sufficient number of females, who are allowed to marry any person of the same caste with themselves." The slaves of Malabar are attached to the soil, and are generally sold with it; but they may also be sold without it, which is frequently done; and they may be mortgaged or lent out on hire. They have been slaves from time immemorial, and are divided into different castes, some of whom will not intermarry with others. There is a fixed allowance of food given to them daily, while they work for their masters; but when their masters have no work for them, the allowance is only one half, or they are required to find work and subsistence elsewhere; but the masters can at any time call back their slaves to resume their labour, which is generally in the rice cultivation. The masters may punish their slaves by flogging or confinement in the stocks; formerly they were accustomed to punish the slaves by amputating their noses; and although they are prohibited from doing so at present, instances have been known in which this barbarous punishment has been inflicted. On a trial for the murder of a slave in 1823, it was proved that one man had cut off the noses of three of his slaves; and when one of the slaves was asked why he had not complained to the magistrate, he replied, "that he would be only worse treated if he did." In some districts the right of corporal punishment does not exist, or is never exercised by the masters; but this is not generally the case. The usual price of a good male slave in Malabar, is from £3 to £5, which is about a third more than it was in former times; women and children being of less value, the average price of all does not perhaps exceed £2 a-head. In Tinnivelly the highest price of a male slave is £3, and of a female slave £1; and in some other districts the prices are still lower. When the slaves of different masters intermarry, and their homes are at a distance, it is usual for the woman to go and live with her husband; whose master indemnifies the owner of the female, by a small annual payment in rice; and in some districts the children of such slaves, when arrived at maturity, are divided between the two masters. Though the condition of the slaves in India differs, in several respects, from that of the colonial slaves, it may be questioned if it is not on the whole quite as deplorable as that of the latter. The agricultural slaves of India are generally the slaves of poor men, and their appearance indicates the misery and privation they habitually suffer; they are farther removed from the observation of the magistrate, and have less hope of obtaining redress for any undue severity, than the West India slave; and the general apathy of the Hindoo with regard to the sufferings of others, is in Malabar greatly aggravated by religious prejudice; the slaves there being considered as so degraded in caste, that they are not allowed to approach a free man within sixty-four paces.

Domestic slavery, it has already been observed, is common in every part of India; almost every wealthy Mahommedan, and many of the Hindoos, have female slaves to attend the women s apartments, and from amongst whom they take their concubines; and they have male slaves to act as domestic servants. The companies of dancing women who attend the Hindoo temples, or travel through the country, purchase female children and train them up to their own profession, which includes prostitution, as well as their more ostensible vocation; and many abandoned women purchase or kidnap young females for the sole purpose of offering them for public prostitution. It is a custom which appears common in all parts of India, for parents to sell their children in times of scarcity or famine, though the price under these circumstances, is seldom more than five or six shillings for a child, or about twenty shillings for a well grown lad. This was carried to so great an extent in 1785, that Sir William Jones, in his charge to the grand jury of Calcutta, observed—"Hardly a man or woman exists, in a corner of this populous town, who has not at least one slave child, either purchased at a trifling price, or saved perhaps from a death that might have been fortunate, for a life that seldom fails of being miserable. Many of you, I presume, have seen large boats, filled with such children, coming down the river, for open sale at Calcutta; nor can you be ignorant that most of them were stolen from their parents, or bought, perhaps for a measure of rice, in a time of scarcity." The traffic in slaves was so actively pursued at this time, that not only were all the large towns in Bengal plentifully supplied with them, but great numbers were also exported by sea to other parts of India, and particularly to the French islands of Mauritius and Bourbon. For several years, the French continued to export slaves from their own and the Dutch settlements in various parts of India, notwithstanding the remonstrances of the British Government, from whose teritories the slaves were either purchased or stolen; nor was the practice discontinued till the war between the two countries shut out French vessels from the ports of India. In 1791, it was discovered that many free persons, natives of India, who had left that country as domestic servants, had been sold as slaves by their masters at St Helena, where they had remained in bondage for several years; in consequence of which, measures were adopted by the Bengal Government to prevent the recurrence of this scandalous offence, by requiring security, previous to embarkation, for the return of every native servant.

The situation of domestic slaves, in the family of a respectable Mahommedan, is often one of comparative comfort; they are generally purchased young, brought up in the Mahommedan faith, and treated as attached and faithful servants of the family. This, however, is the most favourable view of the case; for where so much is in the power of the master, much must depend on his personal character. By the Mahommedan law, (sanctioned and established by the British Government,) a master may employ his slaves to the extent of their ability; he may inflict corporal punishment on them; he may not only cohabit with his female slaves, but also have with them "licentious intercourse, at the mention of which modesty recedes with blushes, and humanity shrinks with horror." If a master should have intercourse with his female slave before she has arrived at the years of maturity, and if the slave should, in consequence, be seriously injured, or should die, the ruling power may punish him by stripes! When we consider the general ignorance of the slaves, their entire dependence on their masters, the exclusion of those in the harem from intercourse with the world, and the distance they would have to travel (in some cases fifty or a hundred miles) before they could lay their complaints before a magistrate, it will not appear incredible that the legal authority of the master, enlarged as it is, may sometimes be passed with impunity. But admitting that the master confines himself within the bounds of his legal authority, it may yet be asked if such horrors should be allowed to be perpetrated under the sanction of the British Government? It was not till 1799 that the murder of a slave was made a capital offence, and since that period no further modification of the Mohommedan law regarding slaves has been passed. That the slaves in India are frequently treated with great cruelty, is evident from what transpires in the courts. Yet, from the seclusion in which both Mahommedans and Hindoos live in their houses, it may be doubted if one case in a hundred is ever brought to light, unless it involves the crime of murder.

One of the most baneful effects of slavery in India, is the encouragement it gives to the practice of stealing and kidnapping children, which prevails both in town and country wherever there is a ready market near for the sale of them.

Although the subject of slavery has been inquired into, at various times, by the Indian Government, with a view to its mitigation or gradual extinction, little has, in reality, been effected beyond the prohibition to export and import slaves. As early as 1774—the first year that the English undertook the judicial administration of Bengal—Warren Hastings passed a regulation, providing that every person holding or purchasing a slave should have a written deed passed before the lawyers, describing the right by which the slave was held, and that no person should buy or sell a slave who was not such by former legal purchase. These rules went to suppress the practice of kidnapping, which had greatly increased since the establishment of the English Government, and to declare the children of slaves to be free. This regulation, however, soon became a dead letter, as will appear from Sir William Jones' account in 1785, and from the number of slaves exported, to put a stop to which latter practice Lord Cornwallis issued a proclamation in 1789, prohibiting the exportation under the severest penalties which the law could inflict. About the same time, Lord Cornwallis informed the Court of Directors that he had a plan under consideration for the abolition of slavery, under certain limitations, and for establishing some rules and regulations to alleviate, as much as might be possible, the misery of these unfortunate people during the time that they might be retained in that wretched situation; and which he hoped to be able to execute without doing much injury to the private interests, or offering great violence to the feelings of the natives. This plan afterwards received the sanction of the Judges of the Supreme Court, and a copy of it was transmitted to Mahomed Reza Cawn for his opinion. This is the last which has been heard about it. In 1799, the murder of a slave was made a capital offence; and in 1811, the importation of slaves from foreign states was prohibited; but, a few months afterwards, this regulation was rendered nugatory by the Judges of the Company's Court, who declared it to extend only to slaves imported for the purpose of being sold. The importation of slaves by sea was, however, prohibited by the act of Parliament of 1811, for the more effectual suppression of the slave trade; and, although the act extended to the importation of slaves by land into the British territories in India, this part of it was not strictly enforced. In 1812, Mr C. T. Metcalfe, the resident at Delhi, issued a proclamation, prohibiting entirely the sale of slaves, as well as their importation, within that province. The Bengal Government objected to this measure, and desired Mr Metcalfe to permit the sale of slaves already within the territory. Mr Metcalfe replied, that it was amongst the worst orders of the community—the professed dealers in human flesh, whose abominable livelihood is affected by the abolition, and amongst that detestable class of wretches who bring up slave girls from the earliest age for public prostitution—that the prohibition would occasion most dissatisfaction; and that the respectable classes, although they might experience some inconvenience from the privation, acknowledged the humanity and propriety of the measure. For these and other reasons, the Government at last acquiesced in it; and there is no complaint of any dissatisfaction with this act, although the sale of slaves was, and still is, permitted in all the other provinces. In 1816, the Governor General in Council desired the Judges of the Company's Court to prepare the draft of a regulation, prohibiting the sale of free born persons, but allowing such to sell themselves or their children for a limited period; and for the emancipation of slaves on proof of ill-treatment; and for the correction of other abuses of slavery. Nothing, however, was done. In 1818, the Madras Government instituted inquiries in all the districts under that presidency where slavery prevails, as to the condition of the slaves, and their peculiar usages; and, in the following year, a considerable body of information was collected on these points, which was sent home to the Court of Directors, with the following remarks of the Board of Revenue:—"Because no immediate measures are urgently called for, it does not follow that the most useful, the most laborious, and one of the most numerous classes of our subjects in these territories, should, from generation to generation, continue the hereditary bondsmen of their masters, incapable of inheriting property of their own, deprived of that stimulus to industry which possession of property ever inspires; and because they are fed and clothed, and reconciled to their present condition, it does not follow that the Government should confirm institutions which doom those who have thus fallen into this condition, incapable of ever again recovering their liberty, or of rising to a level with their fellow-men." The Board proceed to say, that they had under consideration certain propositions for the amelioration of the condition of the slaves in Malabar, and their gradual emancipation; but whatever might be the future decision on this point, they thought that a regulation ought to be published, declaring the children of slaves to be free, and prohibiting the future sale of free persons, except for a specified term of years; depriving the masters of the power of inflicting corporal punishment; obliging them to provide proper food, &c.; with other provisions for the protection of the slaves. To this communication the Court of Directors replied—"We desire that you will be extremely cautious in making any regulation for defining the relations of master and slave. It is our wish to improve the condition of the latter to the utmost extent; and we fear, that, in defining the power of masters, acts of compulsion might be legalized, which, by custom, are not now tolerated, and the slaves might be placed in a worse condition than before." This is a most extraordinary reason for not depriving the masters of the power of inflicting corporal punishment; and it is remarkable that, throughout the whole period from 1772 to 1824, this is the only instance in which the Court of Directors have instructed the governments in India how to act in regard to slavery. At a later period, the Court of Directors succeeded in getting struck out of the act of parliament by which their charter was prolonged, a clause which provided, that slavery in India should cease by a specified time. The understanding, no doubt, was, that preparatory measures should be adopted, so that slavery should be eventually abolished, without creating alarm in the minds of the natives. We believe that no such measures have been attempted, and that slavery is exactly in the same state now as it was then, with the exception of the newly acquired district of Assam, containing about 17,000 slaves and bondmen. The chief provisions of the regulation relating to Assam (which, however, had not actually passed into a law at the date of our last advices) were—That all slaves should be registered; that those only should be held as slaves who could be proved to have been such prior to 1817; that all who had become slaves since 1817, should be held as redeemable bondmen; that the offspring of all slaves or bondmen, born after the present time, and all children sold by their parents, are to be free on attaining the age of eighteen years; that any slave who is ill treated by his master, shall be restored to liberty; that no engagement for service shall extend beyond the term of seven years, &c. &c. We shall only add, that it has been the opinion of all those gentlemen in the Company's service who at various periods have devoted their attention to the subject, that slavery in India might be either gradually abolished or mitigated, and its principal evils eradicated, without the slightest degree of risk or inconvenience.

THE RECORD COMMISSION*—ITS COST AND ACHIEVEMENTS.

Partial as we are to economy in every department of the national expenditure, we would not grudge a considerable sum for the preservation of our historical and legal records, and the adoption of a system by which the public may have access to them. The result of the present Report is, that those who have had concern in the matter have been of the same opinion as to the propriety of liberal expenditure, but have adopted a different view of the application of it. "The Secretary states," says the Report, "that the Commissioners, previous to the present, nowhere recorded their receipts and payments," and that "£360,000, and more, passed through their hands, and there is no trace of it whatever."

The present Commission appears to have received Parliamentary grants to the amount of £48,500. The Secretary of the Commission, 'prior to 1831, could have obtained money to any amount from the King's printers; and, from 1807 to 1830, a sum of £49,750 : 3 : 2 was advanced by them. The present Secretary appears to have possessed a power of borrowing, to the amount of £10,000, from the bankers, of which he has availed himself, on the acquiescence, but without the direct authority of the Commission; leaving doubts in his own mind whether money so borrowed was on his individual responsibility or that of the Board." The annual grant was always absorbed before it was received. Within the last four years, it appears that debt has been incurred to the amount of about £24,000. A sum of £1,576 : 13 : 3 was expended on a neat library kept in the Secretary's chambers; while the Commissioners had to purchase books, required in the performance of their duties, copies of which were in this library. Nor have officials shewn less alacrity in collecting, through the petty streams of individual exaction. Enormous fees are charged on individuals having occasion to use the records; and, "lest this charge should be evaded by the personal diligence of the inquirer, or should not amount to so much as may satisfy the expectations of the keepers, in most of the Record Offices no person is allowed to make the copy for himself; and at the Rolls, not even a memorandum, nor a copy of only such portion of a Record as may be useful to him, is allowed. In all cases he must pay the officer for making the copy, and almost always for copying more than he needs."

The amount of service stands in bold contrast with the remuneration. The state of preservation of the Records is, in general, wretched.

"Your committee have seen the public Records deposited at the Tower over a gunpowder magazine, and contiguous to a steam engine in daily operation; at the Rolls, in a chapel where divine service is performed; in vaults, two stories underground in Somerset House; in dark and humid cellars at Westminster Hall; in the stables of the late Carleton Ride; in the Chapter House of Westminster Abbey; in offices surrounded by and subject to all the accidents of private dwellings, as the Augmentation Office and First Fruits Office." A quantity of the records of the Court of Exchequer were kept migrating at an expense which "would have sufficed to erect an excellent General Record Office." Their state at one time is thus graphically described:—"Decay and damp had rendered a large quantity so fragile as hardly to admit of being touched; others, particularly those in the form of rolls, were so coagulated together, that they could not be uncoiled. Six or seven perfect skeletons of rats were found imbedded, and bones of these vermin were generally distributed throughout the mass; and, besides furnishing a charnel house for the dead, during the first removal of these national records, a dog was employed in hunting the live rats which were thus disturbed from their nests." Again, "It is said that the labourers and soldiers, to whose custody the records, during their migration into the shed in Westminster Hall, seem for a while to have been transferred, in place of that of the Barons of Exchequer, disposed of them to the glue-makers; and, as they had full power of doing so, and must have supposed that matters so intrusted to them could be of no value to anybody else, it may easily be believed that they did so." The Report gives us the satisfactory information, that the state of the Records in Scotland is a pleasing contrast to this state of matters.

A POOR-LAW FOR IRELAND.

No question of social amelioration ever made so impetuous a progress as the necessity of introducing Poor-Laws into Ireland. In comparison with this most important object, every other national measure, affecting either this country or Ireland, or involving the dearest interests of universal humanity, has moved at a snail's pace. The abolition of Negro Slavery, with all the appliances and means of religious feeling and zeal; the Emancipation of the Catholics; the Reform of the Representation—required to be each discussed, cherished, and gradually ripened, during nearly a half century before the happy consummation. A Poor-Law for Ireland is a thing of yesterday; and already it is carried throughout the three kingdoms by acclamation, and all but unanimously. If the people of this country might ever justly have been accused of indifference to the condition of their fellow-subjects while artfully divided from them in interest and affection, and kept in ignorance of the injustice and oppression under which they groaned, light was no sooner let in, than their hearts were melted and their minds roused to a sense of the sufferings, physical and political, of Ireland. There may, however, and indeed must be, a diversity of opinion upon the political claims and rights of the Irish; but, upon the one absorbing question—relief of the existing misery, and permanent security against its recurrence, given in the provisions of a well-matured and thoroughly efficient Poor-Law—we exult to say that there is identity of sentiment, and a generous obliteration of ordinary party hostility. Laying aside a portion, and, we fear, not an inconsiderable one, of the Irish landlords, and a fraction of the landed aristocracy of Britain, Whig as well as Tory, who may be presumed to sympathize in aristocratic hostility, the three kingdoms are as one man, so far as the preliminary step of recognising the necessity of immediate relief and an enduring remedy. The astounding facts brought to light by the Parliamentary Commissioners upon the last and upon previous inquiries into what was called the agricultural distress of Ireland, pleaded with trumpet-tongues for the mitigation, at all hazards, of the unimagined misery of millions who were seen to be always pinched, always upon the verge of famine, and frequently enduring its pangs.

The Catholic clergy—who, as a body, are much better acquainted with the wretched state of the Irish labouring population than any other class of men whatever, and who are deeply interested in its amelioration—are of one mind upon this question, which is not one of either Catholic or Protestant, of Whig or of Tory, but of our common humanity. With a few exceptions, the resident Protestant clergy hold similar opinions. The middle classes, as may be gathered from the voluminous Report, were almost universally favourable to the introduction of Poor-Laws; and from the proceedings of the Dublin Association, and the recent meetings held in various parts of Ireland, we learn the sentiments of many of the resident gentry, and those the purest patriots of which Ireland can boast. It is painful for us to refer to the recent ill-advised and inconsistent opposition of Mr O'Connell. His conduct in this matter "has been worse than a crime—it is a blunder;" and he ought to retrieve it, by now supporting in Parliament that measure upon which every man sees that the future peace and prosperity of the land so dear to O'Connell must be based. It is a measure which even his great influence and his concentrated power has not been able to damage out of doors; and another such attempt would not only destroy his popularity in England, but vastly diminish his influence where it is of more consequence that it should be maintained. What, to the starving, unemployed millions of Mr O'Connell's countrymen, is the tardy, mutilated abatement of the church nuisance, which, if worth gaining at all, in this half-and-half way, must be struggled for session after session?—what the far more important measure of Municipal Reform?—when weighed against Mr Sheil's contemned "theoretical abstraction"—a law, namely, to enable the poor Irishman to live by the sweat of his brow in the land of his birth. Mr Sheil may remember the blunt greeting which his eloquent periods met with from a sturdy yeoman on Penenden Heath, when he posted over from Dublin to address the vast assembly met there, and to demand, in name of his Catholic countrymen, the righteous boon of Emancipation. "Will it fill their bellies?" was the troublesome question of the Tory chaw-bacon; and if it has yet been answered at all, it is not in the most satisfactory way. Emancipation, which first opened the doors of the House of Commons to the friends of the Irish poor, must soon bring forth its expected fruits; and though the mass of the people have certainly not obtained the lion's share of any of the measures of redress granted to Ireland, their turn will come at last.

Poverty, unequalled in any other part of the civilized world, and physical degradation, unimagined until the late appalling disclosures, though no secret to those who chose to inquire, is the eating sore, the bitter root of the worst evils of Ireland. The causes of that unimaginable misery have made themselves well understood. The contagion of the evil, and its inevitable consequences to the whole empire, are dreaded more and more every day; and England and Ireland, with one accord, demand a remedy and preventive, not in visionary theories, not in wire-drawn abstractions, but from that sheet-anchor which enabled Britain to weather every storm, because the mass of her people had bread and security—that grand experiment, which has already stood the test of centuries—the Poor-Law of the 43d of Elizabeth, which found the English labourer in a condition as destitute and deplorable as is that of the Irish peasant at this moment, and which made him what we see him;—which builded his neat, cleanly cottage, clothed him in decency, and spread his bed and board in homely comfort. Even when his birth-right was tampered with by selfish and short-sighted men, converting into a curse what had been his security, a remnant of the original blessing was spared to him, which we trust to see restored and renovated under a better administration and discipline.

The question of whether or not there shall be any sort of Poor-Law given to Ireland, we therefore assume as carried in the affirmative. No man dare longer openly raise his voice against this imperative act of justice, without attempting to disguise his motives. Hypocrisy is here the homage which selfishness is compelled to pay to humanity. The matter is thus narrowed to the nature of the intended measure; and we confess the force of the taunt already employed by the Tories, of Irish patriots claiming identity with England in such measures as Municipal Reform, but moulding a Poor-Law to suit prevailing humours and interests, and with as little as possible of the complexion of the original English Poor-Law.

The exact nature of the Ministerial measure has not yet transpired; but we are sorry to find sinister rumours are abroad, as if the Whig Government, instead of manfully grappling the depth and length of the acknowledged evil, were about to dabble and nibble in a matter which admits of no tampering, but which demands both a bold and dexterous hand, with entire freedom from Irish party trammels. We shall not, in the dark, prejudge the expected measure. Let us hope for the best. No English statesmen were ever before presented with so glorious an opportunity of effecting a moral and social regeneration, of which endless generations shall reap the fruits. Wisdom and sound policy alike demand the change. The united voice of the united kingdoms urge it; and on this one point, however it may be in inferior questions, Ministers ought not to forget that the Tories are equally well inclined with themselves, more unfettered, and (if they invite the country to go along with them in a noble act of justice) more powerful. The country desires to receive an efficient Poor-law for Ireland, as another valuable Whig measure; but, far above any party consideration, it cries aloud to see it carried by whatever Ministry.

An energetic and courageous policy upon this subject, would better serve the Government than that which they are sometimes accused of employing. They are surrounded, but surely not overawed, by the sinister influences of powerful party adherents, who may be led, by mere selfish instincts, to imagine that their personal interests are threatened in so sweeping an act of justice to the Irish poor. Disinclination may lurk within the Cabinet itself. The position of Mr Spring Rice, for example, is liable to suspicion in relation to this question; so is that of Lord Palmerston; and, if the same principle was carried into Cabinets which determines the courses of justice in ordinary cases, perhaps neither the Marquis of Lansdowne, Lord Duncannon, nor the two gentlemen named above, would take any part in the affair, unless they could at once go the whole length of the most decided friend of an effectual measure of relief. But this is intruding into high and sacred state mysteries. Whatever the Ministerial scheme of relief shall turn out, let us not be annoyed with that puling and helpless argument for declining to meet the exigency, that the evil is too enormous to admit at once of the full application of a remedy. Its extent and aggravation are the most cogent of all reasons for manfully facing it, and performing instantly, as well as effectually, a duty which every revolving year will render more difficult, and which, at all events, if neglected, will glide from the hands of the Whigs. There might be a left-handed satisfaction in believing that the condition of Ireland was already so bad that nothing could make it worse. But have we any assurance of this, wretched as the consolation would be? or will the misery which we shrink from meeting to-day, and which proceeds at an accelerated ratio, appear in a more remediable form to-morrow?

Although we do not know, with any exactness, the nature of the Ministerial remedy, we may conclude that, whatever it be, it will obtain the strenuous support of Mr O'Connell and a few more Irish Members; and we are, at all events, free to say what we think ought to be its main features. To be satisfactory to England, or permanently beneficial to Ireland, the Poor-Law should be no half-and-half, no sham, no trimming measure. We hear of the preliminary experiment being tried of How far Ireland will bear a Poor-Law similar to that of England. Bear a Poor-Law! Is it then feared that the starving, unemployed labourer, the widow, the orphan, the destitute, the blind, the maimed, will reject food, shelter, and clothing, to which their legal right shall be recognised if there is to be a Poor-Law granted at all? Or does the recusant party, whose capacities of bearing are to be delicately experimented upon, consist of that numerous and struggling body of the population, the cottiers, and small farmers, and shopkeepers, upon whom the burden of maintaining the vagrant destitute, by what is called spontaneous charity and alms, rests at present? Oh, no! If an experiment is to be tried at all, it must be solely for the comfort of the landowners and gentry—of that class on whom, in almost every other Christian country, and in every well-regulated kingdom, the duty of maintaining the poor mainly devolves, but who, in Ireland, have never voluntarily shewn either justice or mercy. Nothing short of a compulsory law, a rate, will ever stretch the landowners' powers of endurance, if by any means they can shift the burden to other shoulders. We speak of them as a body, for there are many noble exceptions. This is the true obstacle—the lively apprehensions of the great landlords, and their subalterns, trembling for their rack-rents, as well as for a direct drain upon their purses. A Poor-Law, of which one of the best immediate consequences must be some advance upon the pauper-pittance of 2s. or 2s. 6d., which at present forms the average of the labourer's weekly remuneration, would, by checking the competition for land, diminish their nominal rents, while a justly-apportioned rate would be a complete turning of the tables upon them. These selfish interests will, we apprehend, be found the principal, though not the ostensible obstacle.

The chief bugbear brought in sight—and we confess it is at first an appalling one—is the immense number of able-bodied men, amounting to 585,000, with their 1,800,000 wives and children, requiring aid for thirty weeks of every year. To provide for these multitudinous paupers would, it is said, eat up the whole rental of Ireland! Now this round estimate of numbers, which is, perhaps, somewhat rashly adopted by the Commissioners, has been sifted by intelligent individuals, thoroughly acquainted with the state of Ireland, and very much diminished; and, though wages are quite as low as is stated in the reports, the weeks of employment must be very considerably under-rated, in an agricultural country, where almost everything is performed by manual labour—by the peasant, with no power or implement, save his spade and his hoe. But if the report of the Commissioners be correct to a fraction, in the name of Justice and Mercy how have these miserable people been hitherto supported? They do not live altogether upon thin air; they are already half-covered with some tissue of rags; they do not at once spring up, on Irish soil, crying, to the wealthy, "You must maintain us." Very large sums—by the estimate of the Commissioners, between one and two millions in money, or rather in money's worth, in meal and potatoes—are, at present, annually given to those destitute people, in alms, at the door of farm-houses and cabins. Here is an amount of revenue—call it but a million and a half, taking the estimate of the Commissioners moderately—which would go a far way, under judicious and economical distribution, in relieving the existing distress. A Poor-Law, however, which does not relieve the respectable poor, who are, at present, the voluntary supporters of the vagrant poor, would fall far short of the mark. To them, any legal rate would be inconceivably lighter than the voluntary alms which they now give, from pity, from religious feeling, superstitious fear, or as black mail to sturdy vagabonds. The cheap rate at which Irish paupers can be maintained, compared with those accustomed to the superior diet and accommodations indispensable, and, we fervently hope, ever to be held indispensable to English labourers, helps to overcome the formidable obstacle of the immense and, as we believe, exaggerated numbers that may at once demand aid. The maintenance of two millions of Irish paupers, were so monstrous a number credible, would cost less than half that number of English labourers and their families requiring relief; and, apart from confinement to work-houses, enjoying a much higher degree of comfort, and a fuller and richer diet, than the small farmers of Ireland. The chief difference that we can perceive between the present system, so fertile in crime, and so fraught with demoralization and misery—is, that, at worst, the destitute poor, instead of being thrown, in idleness and vagrancy, upon the country, would be left to find relief in their parishes or districts, administered with economy and discrimination, until those who felt the pressure of a rate found employment for them, and until good order and security attracted British capital to a cheap-labour market, and a land abounding in natural capabilities.

Since we were last upon the subject of a Poor-Law, which has ever lain near our hearts, as the Alpha and Omega of Irish renovation, Mr Revans' valuable pamphlet has appeared, and many other arguments and pleadings have come forth. Among these we would notice, with especial commendation, an able, calm-toned, and judicious paper in the Dublin Review, evidently written by one who knows Ireland well, and who cherishes true patriotic feeling. In the article referred to, one pernicious fallacy of the Commissioners is exposed, which has paralysed many of the friends of Ireland in Great Britain. The Report represents that, in relation to production, labour in Ireland already draws as much from the common fund as in England: how, then, is more to be afforded? The wages of the English labourer vary from 8s. to 10s. a-week; those of the Irish peasant from 2s. to 2s. 6d. But then five Irishmen are employed, or are seeking employment, to do the work performed by two Englishmen. The five produce no more than the two; and, therefore, though each has so small a pittance, as much of the produce is divided among them. The improved modes of husbandry, the horse power, the manure, the thrashing-mill, and every other mechanical contrivance employed in aid of labour in England in the cultivation of land, is laid quite out of sight. Yet all this is as real a charge upon the total produce as the ploughman's hire; and all this the Irish peasant performs with no power save that of his sinews, and no implement save his hoe and his spade. It is a wretched backward system altogether; but the penalty must fall exclusively upon the peasant, who is reckoned as well recompensed in proportion, as if he received the same share of the scanty produce which the English labourer does of the abundant crops raised by all the appliances and means of the most improved system of husbandry. The writer in the Dublin Review is also entitled to place the many weeks of every year which the Irish peasant is employed in procuring the necessary supply of fuel to the account of agricultural labour, as fuel is found for the English labourer at comparatively small cost and with no trouble. The authors of the Report, he remarks, would be surprised to hear that a hand-loom weaver was entitled to no higher wages for the yards of cloth he produces, than if the same quantity had been woven by the power-loom. Were the Commissioners' principle of division to be strictly applied, and all the expense of maintaining steam-engines and power-looms laid out of sight, the gains of the hand-loom operative would disappear altogether. The Commissioners state "that the English labourer raises four times as much produce as the Irish, and, therefore, that the remuneration is at present in just proportion and cannot be altered without involving the whole community in destruction;" forgetting altogether the expenses of that more perfect system of husbandry which enables the English labourer to attain this advantage.

Emigration is looked to by some as the salvation of Ireland. But the best informed and most intelligent advocates of a Poor-Law have the least faith in emigration at the public cost, save as an auxiliary aid while the country is in a state of transition. Emigration upon a small scale is a drop in the bucket; and upon the gigantic scale contemplated by a few well-meaning and sanguine persons, "a physical and moral impossibility." The Commissioners themselves, looking to every quarter for help, exhausting every imaginable resource, consider emigration only as a help—as a subsidiary measure. Less than the expense of enabling the poor to emigrate would exceed that which might open up sources of employment, and relieve them at home. A fund, proposed to be raised by the sale of colonial lands, is, after all, only a round-about illusory mode of taxation, or of confiscation of a part of the national property, to relieve Irish landlords, and make jobs for colonial land-brokers. We take for granted, that coercive emigration is not contemplated. Every feeling of humanity and justice forbids this; yet how are so many hundreds of thousands as might take off the glut in the labour market—hundreds of thousands of Irishmen, devoted to their native land with enthusiastic and romantic attachment—to be induced to sing, Erin go Bragh, and take their rejoicing departure? The wild savannahs and slumbering primeval forests of Canada are neither more near nor dear to Britain than the waste mountains and reclaimable bogs of Ireland, which equally demand capital and labour, and which are better fitted to make a quick and fair return. Mr Story, the humane and intelligent Protestant rector of the pattern Irish parish of Burrishoole, the statistics* of which demonstrate at once the depths of the country's misery, and the extent of its productive capability, when requested by the Commissioners to state his opinion as to the utility of emigration, made a reply which we consider conclusive for two-thirds of Connaught and much of the remaining provinces. "It would be much better," said Mr Story, "to enable them to emigrate to the distance of a few hundred yards, to the reclaimable mountain land of which this parish principally consists." Mr Story is an oracle. But how are the labourers to make their way these few hundred yards? The solution of this problem is not so difficult as at first sight it appears. Suppose, for the sake of illustration, that Burrishoole is included in a district having a work-house, or a place of refuge under some name, where the destitute poor of all descriptions were entitled to demand support, and that such asylum was maintained by a compulsory local assessment, fairly levied upon the landowners—the proprietors of the waste lands, as well as those reclaimed, and the occupiers of the ill-cultivated farms of the district—legislative wisdom might set itself at ease, leaving to the powerful principle of individual interest and to Irish ingenuity to adjust the matter, or, in other words, to the rate-payers to get work for their money, since pay it they must.

Public Works, like limited emigration, might also be found a useful auxiliary in the commencement of the operation of a Poor-Law; but in no country, and least of all in Ireland, can such unprofitable undertakings be depended upon as a permanent field of employment. Nor would they be required, so soon as a Poor-Law put an end to agrarian disturbance and its attendant crimes, and when tranquillity and good order opened a secure field to British and also to Irish capital. It is a memorable and melancholy fact, that a large amount of Irish accumulation is at present annually invested in British securities at a low rate of interest, instead of being risked at home either in agriculture or trade.

Before the measure proposed, whatever its nature may be, can pass into law, we shall have another opportunity of examining its provisions and tendency; and we sincerely hope that both may be such as shall deserve the confidence and approbation of the country. The Peers, wayward as they are, and backward to every liberal measure, can hardly reject any feasible bill for the relief of the Irish poor. Policy, humanity—nay, that senseless but prevailing motive, spite to Mr O'Connell—will act as so many inducements with them; and, in the House of Commons, if a measure of any promise and breadth of basis be brought forward, opposition is either vanquished or gagged.

In closing these observations, there is great pleasure in being able to state, that the most intelligent advocates of a real and substantial, a modified Elizabethan Poor-Law, are also the most sanguine of its efficacy, if it be properly put in operation. They are, we think, uniformly in favour of work-houses upon the large scale. This, however, is the only feature of the system in which we should like to try the effect of experiment, were it practicable. One thing should be kept in view in relation to work-houses—they are unknown in Scotland, save in the larger towns, and there they are upon a very small scale. But domiciliary aid for the aged and destitute, also upon a most frugal scale, is a general practice, and is found more economical than work-houses, as the poor are contented to accept of very niggardly assistance, if they may live and shift at home, and among their children and friends. The habits of the people assimilate the poor of Ireland more to Scotland than to England; and it might, perhaps, be matter of fair experiment, whether work-houses for the poor might not be dispensed with in the case of widows with young children, and destitute aged persons, and of such of the blind or maimed as could remain amidst the comforts and endearments of home, with the help of pensions, smaller than the meanest English work-house allowance. In Scotland, such allowances vary from so low a rate as one shilling a month (and we have heard of less) to four and five, according to the number in family. We do not recommend this niggardly provision; but, where voluntarily accepted, it is worth consideration, as an alternative with the work-house; and, there is little doubt, it would be preferred by many of the Irish poor. For the able-bodied, the confinement of a work-house is, we fear, indispensable; but, before the great expense of work-houses for the whole pauper population is incurred, the Scottish system of out-door aid to the aged, the infirm, and widows with children, might be a fit subject of experiment.

Upon the supposed tendency of work-houses there are very different opinions. Some allege the Irish will never submit to be confined in them. Hunger is, however, a powerful tamer. Others state—and Mr O'Connell among the number, who should know the temper of his countrymen intimately—that, if asylums are provided for the able-bodied, all voluntary labour will be at an end! They will rush to the work-houses, and luxuriate in idleness and captivity at the public expense. This is an imputation upon the national character which Mr O'Connell would not have patiently heard from a Sassenach. Truth, as in most cases, lies between those extreme opinions. The Irish, when driven by necessity, will, like the English, avail themselves of the work-house; and, when a prospect of employment opens, they will joyfully abandon its irksome restraints and its cold comforts for freedom and their own cabin-hearths.

We wait anxiously but hopefully for the developement of the Ministerial plan of giving first peace, and next prosperity to Ireland.

Adventures in the Moon and other Worlds.
London: Longman & Co.

We had fancied this antiquated style of writing almost exploded, and that philosophy no longer sought the aid of allegory or preternatural fiction and invention, or dialogues between spirits and organized beings representing abstract qualities. Here we have a complete revival of this once favourite style of composition. Philosophical discussion and speculation, reflection, criticism, and satire, are couched or embodied in allegory and vision. The book displays considerable inventive power, and much justness of thought and sarcastic point; but the idea in the main piece, the Adventures in the Moon, is so long-drawn out, and turned so often to all sides, that it becomes worn, if not tiresome, at last. What would have furnished material for a dozen neat essays in the Spectator, becomes heavy when strung into one.

It is no new idea that everything lost on earth is to be found in the moon. Good advice, lost complexions and animal spirits, hopes, wishes, desires, and ambitions, are all stored up in well-stopped bottles, where their original earthly proprietors may find them.—The following is ingenious and pointed, and a fair specimen of the style of the book.

A confused noise came towards me, which at first I could by no means interpret; for a solemn declamatory tone, and a shrill railing voice, seemed to be united in it. As the sound approached me, I heard what I should have thought a sermon, had not some angry and profane expressions been inserted in it. As it went slowly along, I accompanied it, and by a little attention was able to understand this singular combination; for in the solemn part of the clamour I remembered the voice of a celebrated preacher, whom I had often listened to. It appeared that one of his sermons, not being the cause of much virtue on the earth, and accordingly discharged, had taken refuge in the moon, where, while it was floating about in the air, and preaching with great solemnity, it had unfortunately been entangled in the invective of a fish-woman, which, no doubt, had been lost by the fortitude of her antagonist. Thus these two pieces of eloquence, having by some means been involved in each other, continued with equal vehemence, and without the least chance of one being silenced by the other. I was scandalized to hear the solemn words interrupted by such abominable phrases, and waved my hat about the place in hope of separating the two harangues; but they were so confused together, that, though I drove them about by disturbing the air, my efforts to disengage them were vain, and I was obliged to leave a fine moral discourse loaded with these vile execrations.

The divine and his associate, the fish-woman, were no sooner out of hearing than I walked into a long story, which was telling itself with great pomp and emphasis. I listened, and heard some passages, where I was sure that an explanatory finger had been stretched out. I could not, however, discover the purport of the narrative, which seemed to be wholly destitute of all the three particulars required by Aristotle—a beginning, a middle, and an end; but it had this excellence, that it might have been undertaken at any period of it without disadvantage. I afterwards found that the tellers of long stories provide the moon with a great abundance of sound. I now heard other attempts at conversation, and amongst them many of the small enterprises which are called puns.

But now, from a different quarter, a sudden wind sprung up, which was encumbered with a great variety of sounds, and I was quite overwhelmed with the clamour. First, it blew sermons for a short time, and doctrines of every sect flew past me. This hurricane of divinity was succeeded by speeches in parliament: I was entertained by a declamatory breeze on the grievances of Ireland; then came a zealous wind in defence of the Church of England; and, afterwards, a prolix gale on free trade. I was at first amused by the novelty of all this piety, anger, learning, and eloquence in the air; but when it was no longer new, I found the clamour intolerable; and it is certainly a discouragement to those who would visit the moon, that any breeze which rises may preach and declaim so immoderately.

I may here mention that all sounds from the earth are at first allotted to separate districts in the moon. There is the region of puns, that of speeches, of sermons, and of every other fruitless noise. To each kind of noise a valley is assigned; the surface of the moon being very much varied, and the valleys very deep. Each sound, upon its first arrival, repairs, of its own accord, to the valley which is its proper habitation; but when the wind is violent, and happens to blow through one of these valleys, it sweeps away many of the sounds, and scatters them over the moon. Thus the most unsuitable alliances are formed of the different sounds, and the precepts of religion are often enforced by oaths; for a violent gale having passed through the residence of sermons, and carried many discourses away with it, may blow them through the valley where the Billingsgate rhetoric is preserved, by which means an unusual energy is added to those pious compositions; and many other sounds equally averse to each other are in this manner united.

Here we have another description of lunar adventurer:—

I now saw a young woman running towards me in pursuit of something which rolled along in the wind. As she approached, I perceived that it bore the figure of a heart; and the lady I knew to be one who had lately been very much dejected on account of a hopeless passion. She had come to the moon to recover her lost heart, and was just about to possess herself of it when the wind had snatched it away, and she pursued it with all the speed she could exert.

Another young lady, who had once sung extremely well was come in search of her voice, which she had lost by an illness. She had heard it at a distance singing an Italian song with great taste, and hastened to the spot in hope that she might inhale it; but a wind springing up had swept it along singing as it flew, and in despair she heard her own sweet notes dying away in the distance.

I now saw a well-known English statesman, who had come here in search of his integrity, which he had lost in the service of his country. Without it he had found himself quite disabled in the pursuit of his designs, being no longer eloquent in parliament or dexterous in council.

Books, among other things, fly in great numbers to the English province of the moon; whether bouncing quartos of travels and biography or fluttering duodecimos of poetry and fiction. The curiosity of the adventurer was—

Excited by a thin book, which, having just flown in, hovered about unable to find a resting place, and seemed to be in great distress. It had first approached the district of religious writings, and, finding room, was just preparing to light, when the surly volumes closed themselves together with one accord, and refused to admit the new comer amongst them. It attempted several different openings in these shelves, but still found the same want of hospitality; and, wherever it appeared, the divines shut up their ranks. It then flew round the room in great trouble; and I observed that, as it passed the political pamphlets, they opened of their own accord, and offered it an asylum; but it turned away in disdain, and again made trial of the clergy: these inexorable octavos still refused, and it fluttered about, appearing to be almost exhausted. I endeavoured to catch it; but it was too active to be entrapped. I then took aim at it with another book, and was so dexterous as to bring it down, stunned and crippled by the blow. I found it to be a bishop's "Charge," which, instead of enforcing the topics that belong to that sort of exhortation, was almost entirely a political treatise. The religious writings, therefore, had not acknowledged it as divinity; but the pamphlets had supposed it to be one of themselves. I thought that this "Charge" was justly excluded from the religious shelves, and that it had no right to look with contempt upon the political writings, the language of which it had thought proper to assume. I, therefore, pushed it in amongst the pamphlets, though it flapped violently and made great efforts to escape.

As I left the library, I observed two men, who were likewise quitting it, each of them having a roll of parchment in his hand, about which they were engaged in a violent controversy. I found that they had come up to the moon in search of the British Constitution, which they agreed had long ago been lost. Each fancied that he had found it, and vehemently asserted that what he carried was the real constitution, and the parchment of the other a fiction.

The adventures of the traveller are brought to an end in this striking manner.

While I was engaged in these thoughts, I first heard the striking of my own lost hours, which impressed upon me a horror that I cannot describe. I knew each particular hour as I heard it, and remembered the abused opportunities which I had long before ceased to lament. I stood in the persuasion and despair of having lived in vain, and no more thought of inquiring into the grounds of this trouble and conviction, than we do in an anxious dream. Suddenly I was seized with a desire of recovering what I had thrown away: I reproached myself with wandering for amusement in the moon, and resolved to return without delay, in order to use my remaining hours with rigorous frugality.

"A Letter from Posterity to the present Age," and the "Answer," contains many felicitous hits and quiet strokes of satire.—If any volume constructed upon this classic but past-date scheme will now succeed, this certainly has many saving qualities; yet in a direct matter-of-fact, hop-skip-and-jump age, we fear, with all its talent and scope of thought, it may be felt tedious.

The Gambler's Dream. London: Bull. 3 vols.

We have here a clever, non-commonplace, and, in many respects, a masterly performance, in a series of historiettes of different countries; yet one that is miserably vitiated. The plan of the work has the rare merit of at once arresting attention. A desperate, ruined gambler, rushes from a London hell at midnight, and finds food for meditation as he passes Crockford's and sundry club-houses, where deep play is practised. He falls asleep in his lodgings, over the embers of a smouldering fire, while cogitating the design of reform, and dreams that he is in Crockford's well-stored cellars, where, upon this particular night, a conclave of demons, seven in number, have met, in an Unholy Alliance, the members of which preside over all the diablerie of Europe, Turkey, and the West Indian division of the African population. There is some fertility of invention in the outline; and the story related by each of these Influences, displays no mean knowledge of the genius and condition of the nations over which each presides. Yet how withering, painful, and revolting are the records of the demon-prompted deeds conducted by human agency! Is it not a culpable abuse of talent and power, thus to overwhelm us with baseness, fraud, treachery, disgusting crimes, and demoniac horrors, and uniformly to present human nature in so degraded or loathsome an aspect? The demons themselves could hardly justify the uniformity of these torturing inflictions, or the maddening and loathsome images presented in the powerful story related by Hans—Victor Hugo's veritable monster—Hans of Iceland—the evil and brutal Influence which presides over the Cossack, the Russ, and the Pole. The Influence of Turkey is a female spirit, of rather gentler mould than the rest. The writer has, we think, very felicitously pourtrayed national characteristics in several of his tales, and especially in that of Mouvement, the genius who guides the destinies of France. Our British demon is the familiar Old Nick; yet not the vulgar Nick of the nursery and servants' hall—with hoof and tail—but a gentlemanly, and, what the ladies call, an interesting young man, fashionably dressed in black, and with the pale face, ebon whiskers, and insinuating, Byronic air—

"Framed to make women false."

Nicolas ought to have selected a higher specimen of his influence than a tale of gipsies, poachers, female adventurers, and low cheats and ruffians. All the world knew already that these were subjects of the Lower Empire.

At the conclusion of their sitting, these potent Influences congratulate themselves upon the perfect security of their several empires, and the absence of danger or innovation. Sophia has no apprehension of a breach in her kingdom of Turkey from the spirit of European improvement. Mouvement, Mephisto, and Hans, have abundant work before them, and the most flattering prospects of a widening dominion and a long reign. Obi alone, since the abolition of negro slavery, and the introduction of education among the blacks, trembles lest the spirit of knowledge and truth may, through these means, penetrate one day into Africa and overthrow his central throne. From what we have said, it may be guessed that the "Gambler's Dream" is not likely to become a favourite or generally popular book. Talent we freely concede to the writer; but his production is often painful and disagreeable and of very questionable tendency. Human nature is not quite so depraved and sunk as we find it here, and the devils themselves might have been constrained to bear testimony to its excellencies, were it only for contrast and relief.

Lane's Account of the Modern Egyptians. Knight. 2 vols.

No work that we have ever perused, places us at once so fairly in the midst of the Egyptians, and familiarizes their manners, customs, and national characteristics so completely as this. Mr Lane, in the first place, acquired an accurate knowledge of Arabic, by studying that difficult language at the fountain-head. He afterwards returned a second time to Egypt, resided long in the country, and became as like a Turk as Gutzlaff was to a Chinese. He made admirable use of his rare opportunities, and has produced the fullest and best account of Modern Egypt that has appeared either in England or France. We can confidently recommend this work as one full of entertainment and solid information of an abiding character; which, with deference, is more than we could say for all the works published like this, under the superintendance of the Society for Useful Knowledge. The two volumes are profusely illustrated with characteristic wood engravings, and are very handsomely done up. If the work has a fault, it is the minuteness and microscopic quality of much of its information. We could have desired more of what we may call the table-talk of the people; which, from Mr Lane's domestic familiarity with many respectable families and individuals in Cairo, he must have had opportunity of affording. Nothing more truly represents the genius of a people, than their unbending, familiar conversation.

No book that we have seen of late, can make thoughtful readers more humbly and earnestly thankful to Heaven for their country, their Christian faith, and social institutions, than this turning inside out of Egypt. There are a few very well-meaning persons among us who, we believe, consider the laws of marriage in this country as severe and cruel, and tending to unhappiness and immorality. Let them look to the consequences of the facility of divorce—for we do not bid them look to polygamy—among the people with whom Mr Lane lived so long.

The Life of Alcuin,

Has been translated from the German, by a lady. This eminent person, who was, at one time, the friend, instructor, and spiritual director of Charlemagne and his family, was born and educated at York, in which city there then flourished a celebrated Anglo-Saxon seminary. Schools were first established in France by Alcuin, under the patronage of the King. After leaving the Court of Charlemagne, he became Abbot of Tours, which office he held until his death. Alcuin was continually engaged in religious controversy; but he loved and cultivated science and learning—he encouraged the establishment of schools and libraries, and the multiplication of books; and, protected by Charlemagne, attempted the reformation of the ecclesiastical order, who were then wholly devoted to secular pursuits and worldly pleasures and amusements. The clergy were only to be permitted to kill as many deer in the chase as would furnish leather for binding their books! The more books, therefore, the more field-sports. Alcuin composed many works in different styles—history, philosophy, theology, and poetry; and, among others, a Life of Charlemagne, which has been lost. The King became too zealous a church reformer at last to suit the temper of so thorough a priest. He became embroiled with his royal patron, from the zeal with which he maintained the privileges of his order; and his death was probably hastened by grief and chagrin. He died in the odour of sanctity—miracles attending his last moments. Alcuin was a very remarkable man for his age; one in whom the prejudices of a churchman were counterbalanced by the desire of diffusing such knowledge, and by such instruments, as he chose to think right. The book is curious, and will greatly interest a certain limited class of readers.

The Romance of Nature. By Miss Twamley. London: Tilt.

The whole face of nature, together with all the floral creation, chanced to be buried deep under ice and snow when Miss Twamley's amaranthine wreaths reached us.

In her splendid and tasteful volume, the most charming things in nature, poetry and flowers, reflect lustre upon each other. Both are the offspring of her genius; the fruit of her imagination and her pencil. Groups of favourite flowers, the "culled darlings" of English fields and gardens, glow on every other page, and furnish the fairest and most engaging themes for fanciful verse, or for prose description quite as poetical. Miss Twamley is quite an enthusiast in her fondness for flowers. She has interwoven numerous garlands to adorn her favourites from the greatest of our elder poets, who loved them almost as well. We are glad to see that this elegant and lady-like work is already in a second edition. The good taste of the public has therefore forestalled criticism, which must, in this case, have been unmixed eulogium upon this beautiful addition to an English lady's literary and pictorial treasures.

Beauties of the Country. By the Author of "A Day in the Woods."

This is a book of a class which, we believe, is peculiar to the country-loving English. We have a regular succession of such works under many names, and they are all popular. They hold in books, the place of the bough-pot, or box of mignionette. They give a far-off glimpse, almost a smell of the country. A book descriptive of rural scenes, and old customs and feelings, cannot fail to be popular if the writer has any relish for what he writes about, or a true feeling of poetry in his nature. Mr Miller, our author—sometimes, we believe, designated "the basket-maker"—has both requisites in no stinted measure. This new volume, which is illustrated with many pretty and sweet vignettes, we consider an advance upon "the Day in the Woods," and a very meritorious work of an exceedingly pleasing kind. It is divided into months—a sort of rural calendar; and is studded and greatly enriched by the author's free borrowings from all that is the most charming in the poets and descriptive writers who have been worshippers of nature as she is seen in rural England.

Lives and Exploits of Banditti and Robbers. By Charles Macfarlane, Esq. Family Library, No. LXII.

Is the delight which almost every reader, but especially young lads, take in narratives of peril, enterprise, fearless daring, and undaunted courage, significant of the corruption or of the nobility of human nature? We consider it to betoken both qualities. But, apart from this discussion altogether, the fact is undeniable. The taste exists in every human being whose intellect is at all awakened; and in the young it is an inordinate appetite. Our author has, on this occasion, ministered to popular curiosity with considerable address. He places before us a quite new set of actors. Instead of our hackneyed Turpins, and customary rogues and Rapparees, he has introduced us to the various brigands of the Italian States—those of Sicily, Naples, Calabria; and the Hungarian robbers; with such heroes as Schinder-Hannes, the Rob Roy of the Rhine—the priest robber, Don Ciro—and the Spanish Banditti, of which the world has heard so much. Exhausting the Old World, he has gone to the New; and to the Buccaneers of America, joined the robber clans spread over India. These ample materials furnish forth a varied feast to curiosity, and throw strange lights upon human nature.

Floral Sketches, Fables, and other Poems. By Agnes Strickland. Effingham Wilson.

In form, and a good deal in character, this little book resembles the poetical sketches of Charlotte Smith and Mrs Howitt.

Many of the little poems are simple and elegant, and all are pretty. Several of the fables are from the Italian. We had marked as specimens, The Lilies of Jerusalem, The Birth of Spring, The Country Dog in Town, and The Music Shell, which are all elegant and pretty. But we must be contented with simpler things—like, for example, these few stanzas from the farewell of emigrant Highland girls to the fountain of their native valley :—

Dear fountain of our native glen!
From hence we're doomed to go;
And soon for other urns than ours
Thy crystal streams will flow.

Thy snowy lilies still will bloom
On this delightful spot,
Dear fountain of our native glen!
Though we behold them not.

And thou wilt, from thy sparkling cell,
Still softly murmur on,
When those that lov'd thy voice to hear
To other lands are gone.

Dear fountain of our native glen,
Which we no more must view!
With breaking hearts thy children pour
Their long, their last adieu.

Sweet Lavender!—a London cry—is the theme of the following lines :—

Sweet Lavender! I love thy flower
Of meek and modest blue,
Which meets the noon and evening hour,
The storm, the sunshine, and the shower,
And changeth not its hue.

In cottage maid's parterre thou'rt seen
In simple, touching grace;
And in the garden of the Queen,
'Midst costly plants and blossoms sheen,
Thou also hast a place.

. . . . . .

Thou art the emblem of the friend,
Who, whatso'er our lot,
The balm of faithful love will lend,
And, true and constant to the end,
May die but alter not.

The Cribbage-Player's Text-Book, By S. Walker,

Is a smart and handy small affair, and may be the best possible treatise for aught we know. One good addition is, the whole of Anthony Pasquin's treatise, embodied in this new one. Besides, Mr Walker is, we believe, the approved public instructor in all games—the modern Philidor and Hoyle in one, or, at least, their popular exponent.

Webster on the Structure of the Ear. Simpkin, Marshall, & Co.

We do not pretend to understand the subject treated of in this book; but it strikes us that the author's observations, and the description of his instrument, are worthy the consideration of the deaf, or of those whose hearing is deficient, or beginning to be impaired. Upon this account alone we mention the appearance of the book, that those better qualified to judge may become aware of its existence, and examine into its merits or demerits. Its object is an important one.

Two Thousand Five Hundred Practical Receipts in Family Cookery. By James Jennings. London: Sherwood & Piper.

We have no doubt whatever that this is a very good cookery book—indeed, we never saw a bad one. The compiler is the author of the "Family Encyclopædia," to which this volume may be considered as a companion or supplement, as constant reference is made to that work. The most novel feature of the work is what is now generally called useful or entertaining knowledge. Thus we are informed what opium is, and how it grows and is prepared; and also about olive oil, and apricots, and peaches, &c. &c., which sort of varied information the writer may have stored during his previous labours. A mass of miscellaneous amusing facts is, by this means, collected, besides the proper business of the book as one of useful receipts in cookery.

Goethe's Novel.

Mr Moxon has published the translation of a fragment, or a thing of fragmentary length, which is, however, in some sort complete, entitled Goethe's Novel. When the translator shewed the work to an intelligent friend, he was asked the question, "What is the moral of it?" More stupid still, we fear, we must have asked, "What is the meaning of it?" It was written in the author's seventy-eighth year; and for thirty years he had cherished the idea of the story. The worshippers of Goethe will be stirred by this information; for ourselves, we humbly confess that the idea fairly baffles and transcends us. When we take to the story we are perplexed by the allegory; and if we cling to the latter, the matters of fact throw us out again.

Several indifferent poems and good pamphlets have appeared. Among the latter we may notice Mr Joplin's EXAMINATION OF THE JOINT-STOCK BANKS COMMITTEE and THE CONSERVATIVE PEERS AND REFORM MINISTRY, which last, if Whiggish enough, is written with spirit, and a wider range of illustration than is usual in pamphlets.

JUVENILE BOOKS.

From Mrs Howitt we have obtained a nice little volume of short anecdotes, scraps, tales, and dialogues, illustrated by pretty engravings. None are of a length that can possibly fatigue the most juvenile or lazy reader; and though one or two are of a more romantic cast than Miss Edgeworth might altogether approve, and accomplish a happy denouement, by the leap, or the short and golden cut, we are not sure that we like them a bit the worse for that.

The Use of Talents, by Mrs Cameron,

Is another good little volume, very judicious in its moral lessons, and clear and direct in enforcing them.

The Parent's Guide,

Is yet another sensible little book. It is mainly devoted to the health of children in infancy and early childhood. To form the minds of children, the author, in another section, lays before parents many good extracts from the most popular of the philosophic writers upon education.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

Several books of more than temporary interest have appeared, which we purpose afterwards to notice at a length corresponding to their importance; and, consequently, exceeding our limits in the current month. Among these we may announce Prior's Life of Goldsmith; Grund's Americans in their Moral, Social, and Political Relations; and a new edition, published by Pickering, and edited by Simon Walker, Esq., of one of the most curious books in our language, namely, The Works, Life, and Correspondence of Sir Thomas Browne. This edition was undertaken twelve years ago, and is brought to a happy conclusion now. Here is promise to those who must wait, and an ample banquet to such as are more enviably circumstanced.

FINE ARTS.

In this department there are few novelties. The serial publications move steadily on. In the late numbers of HEATH'S SHAKSPEARE GALLERY we have a majestically beautiful and gorgeous Cleopatra; a sweet and gentle Desdemona; a placid Queen Margaret; a grief-clouded Imogen; a Jessica, with the pretty demure air of one who could trick a fond old father, and think small harm of it; a saint-like Anna Bullen; a stately Olivia, somewhat inanimate, perhaps, for that lively dame; besides an exquisite Titania, asleep in her bower. The designs are by different popular artists, the engravings generally good, and the whole one of those tasteful and refined works which it is so pleasing to see becoming, next to books, almost a necessary of life in every sphere of cultivated society. We are assuredly not of those who limit the term cultivated to the higher, nor yet to the wealthier classes.

FINDEN'S PORTS AND HARBOURS OF GREAT BRITAIN is another of those works which minister at once to cultivated taste and patriotic feeling. The views are spirited and truthful. In the late numbers we have been particularly struck with the wild, free life of the view of Flamborough Head; and the integrity, so to speak, and boldness of the first view of Sunderland. Equally fine is Dunstanborough Castle, and the castle of Holy Island. The quieter subjects are treated in the same artist-like manner. This work is accompanied by copious explanatory and descriptive letterpress.

The forty-eighth number of the MEMORIALS OF OXFORD is before us. The subject is exhaustless. The print of the Divinity School, and that of the Quadrangle of the Schools, and the views of Albon Hall, are as choice as any that have graced this long series.

The Messrs FISHER having happily finished one volume of the VIEWS IN SYRIA AND THE HOLY LAND, have commenced another set of Parts, which, they announce, will excel its forerunner. Part first contains a view of Djouri, the residence or eyry of the celebrated Lady Hester Stanhope, one of the most picturesque spots ever inhabited by an English lady, and apparently quite as difficult of access as it has been described by La Martine. Another is the Convent of St Antonio in Lebanon. It hangs on the mountain side, overtopped by splintered crags, as wild and forlorn as the monastery of La Trappe. A very interesting story, told of a youthful martyr to a purer form of Christianity than that taught among the fathers, is related here. The young man had imbibed heretical doctrines while teaching the Syriac language to an American missionary, whom he attempted to convert to his Maronite faith, but who ended by convincing him. He avowed Protestantism at every hazard, and was about to translate part of the gospels into the common language of the people, the vulgar Arabic, for their benefit. He was entrapped, confined in a cell in St Antonio, and, after resisting all attempts to make him renounce his new belief, he suffered so severe an imprisonment by orders of the Patriarch, that, in a few months, he died of confinement and privation, the missionaries being unable to afford him any aid.

POLITICAL REGISTER.

PARLIAMENT.—We regret to find that our anticipations in last Register are likely to be realized, and that, as far as the Ministry are concerned, this is likely to prove an abortive session. There are to be no open questions; the Members of the Government are to be dragged through the mud by the hand of power, and compelled either to vote against their avowed opinions, on liberal measures, or to absent themselves from the divisions, leaving them to settle their pledges with their constituents in the best way they may. The Ministry having thus taken their stand on one side, it becomes the constituencies to take their ground on the other, and to reject all candidates holding office under them; for such persons are not free agents, and are, therefore, unfit to represent any constituency. By such a course of proceeding, no doubt, some very excellent men would be excluded from Parliament; but the injury which would arise from their exclusion is incomparably less than that which must necessarily arise from allowing the Minister of the day openly to dictate how the representatives of any constituency shall vote. We advise those who defend the Ministry, to consider this state of things, and to explain on what grounds it is defensible. We have always been of opinion that the very notion of representation implies that the representative is to carry into effect the wishes and to enforce the opinions of his constituents, where those wishes and opinions are generally and firmly entertained by a large majority of his constituents—in short, that the result ought to be the same as if the constituency voted in Parliament according to the opinion of the majority. But, whatever may be thought of this notion of representation, surely no one will defend a system which compels the representative to vote, not only contrary to the opinions of his electors, but contrary to his own. Such a system completely nullifies the representation. For example, will Dundee be represented by Sir Henry Parnell, when Mr Grote brings in his Bill for the Ballot? And, if not, why should the inhabitants of that enterprising town submit to a representation which, however effective in matters of mere routine, fails them in questions of importance? In such questions, they are not represented; and they, and all other constituencies in the same predicament, ought to ask their representatives, either to give up their connection with Government, or to resign their seats. Without open questions, no man can do his duty both to Ministers and his constituents; and we think it is discreditable to any constituency to submit to such a defective representation as the present policy of Ministers necessarily creates. Two or three rejections of representatives or demands for resignations, will soon teach Ministers the conduct they ought to follow; and the sooner that lesson is taught it will be the better for the country.

The Session was opened by commission. We wonder it is ever opened in any other way. No one, however humble, could be made the mouth-piece for the delivery of the verbiage called a King's Speech, without a feeling of degradation. The object of such a document is to tell nothing that every man in the country has not known for months, and to conceal the Ministerial measures of the Session. On the present occasion, it consists in a great measure, of the words "His Majesty," which occur twenty times in all, and four times in one sentence. If we contrast a King's Speech with a message of the President of the United States to Congress, we will be mortified by the contrast. The King is used as a mere puppet by the aristocracy, and is not permitted to express, even to the representatives of the people in Parliament, his own sentiments; but is compelled to utter whatever the ruling oligarchy of the day, Whig, Tory, or a combination of both, in turns, puts into his mouth. His constitutional right of rejecting bills passed by both Houses of Parliament, has been wrested from him. The only attempt since the Revolution, was that made by King William, to oppose the repeal of the Act for Septennial Parliaments; but, although no one can doubt that he was right, and that it was a gross usurpation of power for a body of men elected for three years to sit for seven, he was ultimately compelled to yield. The Revolution of 1688 was the victory of the aristocracy, and has enabled them to trample alike on the prerogatives of the crown and the liberties of the people. From this source has arisen the subserviency of the Commons to the aristocracy; increased stringency of the Corn Laws; bounties on the export of food—that is, on the starvation of the people; the property qualification of Members of Parliament, the object of which is to exclude the representation of any other interest than that of the landowners; the national debt, an enormous increase of taxation, and of a standing army to enforce its collection; the pillage of the people by an artificial scarcity of food; the increase of colonies to afford places for the pauper branches of the ruling few; the bloated establishments of the English and Irish Churches, kept up for the same purpose; sinecures, the pension list, the irresponsibility of the Lords; and numerous other enormities, for the enumeration of which space fails us.

The debate on the address led to no division in either House; but Lord Melbourne took the opportunity, somewhat gratuitously, of expressing his dislike of the National Association of Ireland, without which he would ere now, have ceased to be Premier. Lord John Russell took care not to be entrapped into a similar blunder. The only speech the first night, worthy of notice, was that of Mr Roebuck, who, in the course of one hour, told more downright, honest truth than has for many a session been uttered in Parliament. He neither spared Whigs, Tories, nor Radicals. It was heard with marked attention, but with little cheering; for the truths were too disagreeable, the invective too severe, and the whole speech too straight-forward and uncompromising to excite any feelings of a pleasing kind among those to whom it was addressed. Many of the Radical Members of the House do not seem prepared to coincide with Mr Roebuck in his views; and we fear that it will be long before this able and truly independent Member will find much support, either in the House or even among those classes to whom the elective franchise is at present confined. We are strongly inclined to think, indeed, that the majority of the people of this country are yet far from comprehending the benefits of a really good government. They are eager enough about some of the objects to be obtained by it; but they do not seem to understand that a proper representation of the people in Parliament is the only means by which these ends can be effectually secured.

Meanwhile, the Liberal Members of Parliament are exerting themselves in the most effectual manner to rouse the people to exert themselves in defence of their rights, by diffusing sound political information throughout the kingdom, by means of debates in Parliament. Bills for the Ballot, for amending the laws relative to the qualification required for Members of Parliament, to regulate the expense of elections, for Household Suffrage, to abolish the rate-paying clauses, to repeal the Septennial Act, to abolish the law of Primogeniture, to establish a system of National Education, to abolish Penny Stamps on Newspapers, to establish Local Courts, to amend the Law of Libel, for the disposal of Colonial Waste Lands in order to provide a fund for emigration, and many other important measures—are about to be introduced. The subjects of Reform of the Lords, Vote by Proxy, the state of the English Universities, Military Punishments, the late Brevet, the Corn-Laws, and the repeal of the duty on Cotton, Soaps, and Marine Insurances, will also be shortly brought under the notice of Parliament.

THE IRISH CORPORATION BILL.—The rock on which the present Ministry is to be wrecked, and which may possibly annihilate the Whigs as a political party, was introduced by Lord John Russell in an able speech on the state of Ireland. His Lordship shewed, conclusively, that Ireland enjoyed greater tranquility at present than she has done for many years. This was proved by returns of criminal convictions at different periods, which the Orangemen in the House did not venture to impugn. The debate which ensued related to everything except the subject under discussion; and the Irish Members on both sides distinguished themselves by the personal abuse by which their speeches were filled, or rather of which they consisted. The Tories on this, as on other occasions, have reserved their strength till a later period of the session.

THE CREATION OF FICTITIOUS VOTES IN THE SCOTTISH COUNTIES received a severe blow from the speech of Mr Horsman, in moving for a Select Committee on the subject. He addressed himself with such energy, and exposed the abuse so effectually, that all attempts directly to oppose his motion were abandoned; and petty artifices to obtain delay, and to overwhelm the Committee, by extending the inquiry to England and Ireland, were unsuccessfully resorted to. We believe we were among the first to expose this nefarious system; and, as we anticipated two years ago, the abuse has been proceeding with continually accelerated rapidity. Perhaps, however, it is rather a matter of exultation than of regret; for nothing could more effectually promote the Extension of the Suffrage and the Ballot. In the meantime, the palliatives, though not alluded to in Parliament, are sufficiently apparent. The first is, to enforce residence, which, in Scotland, at least, is according to the wisdom of our ancestors. The next is, to limit the poll to a few hours, instead of two days, as at present; and to make all the elections in the kingdom take place on the same day. Then it is essential to exclude liferenters and joint-owners; for by liferents and joint ownerships the abuse is principally committed. This exclusion would undoubtedly have the bad effect of depriving parochial schoolmasters of their votes—a most meritorious class of individuals, and generally of independent character, though kept in a disgraceful state of poverty by the niggardliness of the land-owners; but the mischief would be amply compensated by relieving from their political duties the Established clergy—the toadies of the squirearchy, and an unleavened mass of the worst description of Toryism, because their stipends being regulated by the fiars, they think that their interest coincides with that of the landowners in the starvation of their parishioners.

Some of the details of Mr Horsman's speech are well deserving of record, from their shewing how rapidly the Tories are defeating the Reform Act. It appears that there is in Edinburgh a squadrone volante, of the dregs of the Tory party, forty or fifty in number, consisting principally of advocates, writers, and their clerks, who, as the Swiss of the party, and looking forward in due time to the loaves and fishes, are to be relied on for the unscrupulous performance of the dirtiest and most discreditable work which can be assigned them. We know the names of most of them, and shall perhaps take a future opportunity of publishing them. This contemptible squad has been presented with votes in the counties in the neighbourhood of the capital; and, favoured by the Whig provision of two days' poll, can, in a case of emergency, vote in four or five counties at one general election. The following table shews the progress of corruption in the short space of four years:—

POOR LAWS FOR IRELAND.—This appears to be the only measure of importance which is likely to pass both Houses this Session. The following are the principal features of the plan, as introduced by Lord John Russell:—The management is to be confided to the Poor-Law Commissioners of England, one of whom is to be constantly resident in Dublin; Boards of Guardians are to be appointed throughout the country, to be elected by the rate-payers; and from which clergymen of all denominations—in order to avoid quarrels—are to be excluded. The country is to be divided into districts of twenty miles square, in each of which a workhouse is to be erected, capable of containing, on an average, 800 individuals. No relief is to be afforded except in these workhouses; and destitution alone, without impotency, is to be a sufficient cause for the relief of any applicant. The poor are to be supported by rates levied on the landlords and occupiers in the district, in equal proportions. Five or ten workhouses are to be erected immediately in the most destitute districts, and there are to be no laws of settlement, vagrancy, bastardy, or apprenticeship. It is calculated that 100 unions, with as many workhouses, each capable of containing 800 paupers, will be sufficient for all Ireland. We doubt exceedingly this calculation. It only allows one pauper to 100 of the population; while in Scotland the proportion, some years ago, was one in 48, and, at the same period, in England, one in eight! A system of emigration is also to be connected with the Irish Poor-Laws. Emigration agents are to be stationed in different sea-ports in Ireland; and, whenever persons connected with the Poor-Laws certify that a certain number of persons fit for emigration are ready and willing to be sent out, vessels are to be furnished to convey them to different parts, at the expense of Government. The proceeds of the sales of land in the Colonies, it is calculated, will afford a fund to defray a part of this expense; for, last year, £100,000 was realised by the sale of lands in New South Wales. The plan was favourably received, and without the exhibition of party feeling on any side of the House. Sir Robert Peel objected to allowing able-bodied men, in a state of destitution, relief; as if there were any difference between the case of a man who is starving, because, though able and willing to work, he cannot get employment, and of him who is starving from inability to work. If a man be refused relief because he is able to labour, two days' starvation will soon put him in the predicament Sir R. Peel desires, and entitle him to relief on the ground of impotency; for in that short space will his physical energies be impaired to the proper degree qualifying for relief.

* 63 of these are non-resident.

QUALIFICATION FOR MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT.—The wisdom of our ancestors is constantly appealed to by those who think that the human race is not progressive, and that the long-continued existence of an abuse is a sufficient reason for its continuance. The Radicals, who have a better opinion of mankind, may join issue with their antagonists on the wisdom of their ancestors—for in very many matters connected with government and trade we have been proceeding in a retrograde course for nearly two centuries. Before that period, we find no corn-laws, no restrictions on trade, no standing army—the country being defended by that feudal militia the maintaining of which is the tenure by which the landowners hold their estates. Then we find no pensioners, no civil lists, the sovereign defraying the expenses of the throne from his own private revenues and the demesne lands of the Crown. Excise, stamps, national debt—the only thing national we possess—were then all alike unknown. The qualification for Members of Parliament—that is, the necessity for possessing £600 a-year in land—is little more than a century old, the statutes which imposed it being the 9th Anne, c. 5, and 33 Geo. II. c. 20. In practice, these statutes are evaded something in the same style in which fictitious votes are made in Scotland; and Sir W. Molesworth's motion for their repeal was lost by a majority of only twenty-nine, the numbers being 104 and 133. Lord J. Russell admitted the absurdity of excluding merchants, however wealthy they might be in movable property, but opposed the abolition of qualifications. Lord Ebrington voted for the motion. The subject is in itself of little practical importance, as we do not believe that half a dozen of persons have been excluded from Parliament by the law; but we presume it is intended as a forerunner to the introduction of a measure which is essential to all proper representation—the payment of Members of Parliament for their attendance, joined with the right of a majority of the constituency to dismiss their representative whenever they may think fit. Until the electors and the elected stand on the well-known footing of principal and agent, the interest of the former will never be properly attended to, but will always be liable to be sacrificed to the whim, caprice, or love of aggrandizement of the representative.

ENGLAND.

The question of church-rates may now be considered as finally set at rest. A meeting of 400 delegates from Dissenting Societies and Anti-Church-Rate Associations, was held, in London, on the 1st February; and next day a public meeting took place, at which a petition to Parliament, for the abolition of Church-Rates, was agreed to. The delegates afterwards walked, in double file, to Downing Street, where they had an interview with Lord Melbourne, who assured them that the Government measure on church-rates would be satisfactory to them. These proceedings have excited great interest throughout the kingdom.

THE PEERS.—It may be useful for those who have a veneration for the peerage, on account of its antiquity, to look into any account of the peerage, or even almanack, and they will find that no fewer than 274, out of 394, have been created since 1760; and they may also observe that nearly all the Peers of old families are Liberals.

GAMBLING.—Lord de Roos, the Premier Baron of England, has been convicted of cheating at cards; the person who accused him, and whom he prosecuted for libel, having, on the clearest evidence, been acquitted by the jury. Whether his Lordship, after all, is worse than other card-players, may be doubted, as some of the Honourable gentlemen who were examined as witnesses, admitted on oath that they were in the practice of playing with his Lordship, and betting on his play, after they were perfectly aware that he was cheating. A similar circumstance occurred in a trial which took place some years ago in Edinburgh. The witnesses, in that case, did not seem to think there was anything wrong in betting on the success of the cheat.

ADDITIONS TO THE LIBERAL PRESS.—A weekly newspaper, called The Scottish Pilot, has been started at Edinburgh, chiefly for the purpose of advocating, in season and out of season, the question of questions, Church Establishments or Religious Liberty. According to its prospectus, "Scottish Dissenters must support this paper—Liberal Churchmen may support it. "Must" has a compulsory sound. We trust the proprietors of The Scottish Pilot, whom we know to be men of the best intentions, will recollect that newspapers are taken in on the voluntary system; and that, if The Pilot is intended to make converts to religious liberty, it should have attractions for those who are not seeking for the truth as to the question of questions. At Glasgow, another weekly paper, The Scottish Reformer's Gazette, has been issued by Mr Peter Mackenzie, to whom we owe the "Exposure of the Spy System." It is of the most liberal principles, and advocates them with that redundancy of vigour which marks all the effusions of Mr Mackenzie's pen. Lancaster has at last a Liberal newspaper as well as a Tory one. The Lancaster Guardian, professing Radical and Voluntary Church principles, was commenced on 28th January, with every prospect of success. Oxford, too, has ventured upon a Liberal newspaper. Although The Oxford City and County Chronicle is neither a Radical nor a Voluntary, it cannot fail to do much good in a quarter where an organ of Liberal principles was so much wanted.

SCOTLAND.

The creditors of the town of Edinburgh, under the guidance of Sir William Rae, have refused to accept of 15s. per pound of their debts. We will venture to say many of them will be glad to get 12s. per pound ere long.

RENFREWSHIRE.—By the mismanagement of the Whigs in this county, the Tories have gained a signal victory. Sir John Maxwell was forced to abandon the contest, Mr Houston being 173 a-head of him at the close of the first day's poll.

IRELAND.

The weekly subscriptions to the National Association Fund amount to about £380 a-week. The Association has agreed to a resolution against any provision to the Catholic Clergy from the State.

A requisition for an exclusive meeting of the Protestants of Ireland having been issued by Lord Roden and several other Orange Peers, a protest against their proceedings was immediately originated by the Duke of Leinster, and was speedily signed by 34 Peers. 57 Members of the House of Commons expressed their entire concurrence in it. In this way, the attempt of the Orangemen, instead of being attended with any benefit to them, resulted in a complete defeat.

COMMERCE AND MANUFACTURES.

We have from time to time pointed out the great and increasing prosperity of our commerce, and we are glad to find that the more the subject is investigated, the more clearly is that prosperity established. If we only go back for six years, and contrast our commerce during the last year the Tories were in office with that of 1835, we will find ample grounds for exultation. The following table exhibits the result in a striking form :—

	1829	1835
British produce and manufactures exported, .	£36.150 379	£46.926,370
Linen manufacture, -	1,885,831	3,226 000
Woollen, . .	4,556,000	7 145,826
Cotton, . . .	17,140,114	22,128,384
Printed cottons, (yards)	130,075,858	379,811,176
Manufactured silk, .	£255,871	973,786
Iron and steel, average exported in 5 years, 1825 to 1829, . . .		87,237 tons.
Do. in do. 1830 to 1834,		142,071 ——

The increase of imports is equally remarkable. The following articles are those most exposed to foreign competition, the prohibitory duties on them having been of late years removed :—

	1829	1835
Kid skins imported, .	No. 698,604	1,044,000
Silk, raw, waste, and thrown, lbs.	2,292,2011	5,787,000

Let us look now to home consumption, perhaps the most important consideration of all :—

	1829	1835
Tea consumed, (lbs.)	29,495,190	36,574,304
Cocoa,	393.847	1,084,170
Soap, . . .	118.134.863	160,909 316
Seaborne coals, (tons)	4,270,557	8,416,805
Currants and raisins, (cwts.)	235,813	354,413
Cotton-wool, average 10 years, 1816 to 1825, (lbs.)	138,120,000
Do. do. 1826 to 1835,		255,975,000

The condition of the industrious classes may be tried by another criterion—the amount of their deposits in the Saving Banks. In 1829 the number of depositors was 409,945, and the amount deposited £14,434,921—in 1835 the number was 537,517, and the amount £16,456,104. The insolvents have also been gradually decreasing since 1829—the number then was 4648, while in 1835 it had fallen to 3890.

The beneficial effects of reduction of duties in adding to the comforts of the people, without diminishing the income, is also shewn by the above returns. The duty on soap was reduced one-half in 1833, and on currants and raisins one-half in 1834. One or two years is evidently too short a period to allow the reduction of duty to exhibit its full effect ; but cocoa, the duty on which was reduced from 6d. to 2d. in 1832, so increased in consumption in three years, that the revenue derived from it in 1835 was nearly as great as before the reduction.

Two of the articles of daily consumption among all classes, the most heavily taxed, are tea and sugar, the duty on the first being 100, and on the other 80 or 90 per cent. It can hardly be doubted that, while the reduction of the duty one-half would tend greatly to increase the comforts of the people, the additional consumption would soon raise the revenue to its present amount. The reduction of the duty on these articles would be much more widely and sensibly felt than the repeal of the duty on malt; which, as we have formerly shewn, would reduce, in a very imperceptible degree, the price of malt liquor to the consumer, even on the supposition—improbable as we believe it—that the duty would not ultimately find its way into the pockets of the landowners in the shape of a higher price of barley and increased rents. Indeed, if the landowners did not think that this would be the inevitable result, we should not hear so much about the malt-tax.

AGRICULTURE.

The opposition to the Corn-Laws is steadily proceeding, and their supporters ought to lay their account in soon being engaged in an arduous contest. In every county, from Cornwall to Shetland, discussions on the impolicy of these laws are going on, and little or nothing is advanced in their defence. One of the staple arguments for their support, is, that this country being more highly taxed than any other, the taxes could not be paid, unless the agriculturists and landowners, who are assumed to be the chief tax-payers, were protected from competition with foreigners. But this argument is full of fallacies. The revenue of this country is not raised, as it is in most of the continental states, by a land or property tax ; but by taxes on articles of consumption. Although it is the property alone of the country which is represented, it is not property but population which is taxed. This fact has been overlooked in the Reform Acts. Of 45 millions of revenue collected in 1836, 32½ were raised by customs and excise, 77 by stamps, 1½ by the Post-Office, and little more than a million by the land-tax—a considerable proportion of which is paid by the inhabitants of towns. In 1821, in England and Wales, 847,957 families were chiefly employed in agriculture, and 1,645,466 in other pursuits ; so that not more than one third of the revenue is paid by those engaged in agriculture. It is, therefore, as false as it is paradoxical, to assert that taxing food enables the revenue to be paid.

But, farther, assuming that each individual in Britain consumes a quarter of wheat a-year, then, last year, there must have been about 18 millions of quarters consumed, which, at the average price of 50s., is 45 millions. Now, during the whole year, excellent foreign wheat could have been purchased in bond in England, at 30s. a-quarter. On the single article of wheat alone, therefore, the non-agricultural population of Britain paid 12 millions more than they would have done, had there been no Corn-Laws. If we take into view the other kinds of grain, of which the consumption must exceed 25 millions of quarters, we may add other 8 millions to the surplus expenditure of the non-agricultural classes in grain. To say nothing of butter, cheese, lamb, veal, beer, spirits, timber, and the numerous other products of the soil, which are either altogether prohibited or taxed to such an amount as to be virtually excluded, let us endeavour to ascertain the tax paid to the agriculturists on beef and mutton alone. Last year, the inhabitants of London consumed 16½ millions stones (8 lbs.)

of beef, at 3s. 5d. . . .	£2,818,750
15 millions stones of mutton, at 4s. .	3,000,000
	£5,818,750
Now, in Paris, by no means a cheap market, beef, of the first quality, averaged 2s. 11d. ; and mutton 3s. 1d., per London stone of 8lbs., at which prices the above supply could have been purchased for	4,718.250
Which is less than the inhabitants of London actually paid, by . . .	£1,100.500

The population of London and its vicinity may be taken at one million and a half, or one-twelfth of the whole population of Britain; but, assuming that they consume more animal food by one-third than the remaining population, or one-eighth of the whole, we have nearly nine millions, one-third of which is paid by the agriculturists, leaving six millions for the other classes ; so that, on grain, beef, and mutton, twenty-six millions are annually expended in Britain more than there ought to be, for the purpose of keeping up a system which is, beyond all doubt, pernicious to everybody but the owners of land, of whom there are not 100,000 ; and it is exceedingly questionable whether this insignificant fraction of the community, the one hundred and eightieth part of the whole, derives any benefit from it. This is surely a singular scheme for enabling the public revenue to be paid. Nothing but a legislature of land-owners, regardless of every interest but their own, would tolerate such a system for a single year. The effect of a high price of food in diminishing profits, shews also the absurdity of the argument of the corn monopolists ; but we must defer this point till a future occasion.

FROM THE STEAM-PRESS OF PETER BROWN, PRINTER, ST JAMES' SQUARE.

TAIT'S EDINBURGH MAGAZINE.

APRIL, 1837.

LOCKHART'S LIFE OF SIR WALTER SCOTT.

The form and manner of this long-expected work is one of the most striking indications of a revolution in letters, and of the democratic or popular tendency of publication, which has yet appeared. A memoir of Sir Walter Scott, written in obedience to his last solemn directions, by his son-in-law, the editor of the High-Tory and aristocratic Review, comes forth piecemeal, in half-guinea volumes, and, doubtless, after the nicest calculation of the commercial prudence of such a measure by all concerned. The fact is memorable. Books are not now published for patrons and the wealthy, but for the public; and if they be not adapted in everything, and even in price, to the public taste, they are treated with neglect. Splendid quarto editions, with "a beautiful rivulet of print meandering through meadows of margin," have no longer any chance against plain, legible, unpretending, and well-filled volumes. There is no longer a remunerating demand from the libraries of noblemen and gentlemen for what are called stock and standard books. The public is become the only patron and paymaster. The change is worthy of the congratulation of the wise, though, in the particular instance before us, one could have wished that the memory of Walter Scott had not lacked those customary honours of type, and board, and embellishment which he was prone to value, and which his distinguished compeers have received. But here is the volume—the avant courier of six volumes, or of three guineas' worth—and there is no reasonable cause for grumbling at a size and price which render it at once accessible to the mass of readers.

Mr Lockhart—who, take him for all in all, is, beyond doubt, the best qualified individual in existence to discharge the sacred trust bequeathed to him by Scott—accounts for the tardy appearance of the Life by the fortunate discovery of an autobiography, stowed away in an old cabinet at Abbotsford, and written at Ashestiel so far back as 1808. This circumstance compelled him to recast the first chapters of these memoirs.

This fragment of personal history reaches from the author's birth until 1792, when he passed his trials as an advocate, and assumed the robe. It is precious for its authorship, and bears many characteristics of Scott's mingled sagacity modesty, and amiability; yet it is meagre withal and unsatisfactory, at least to the ardent and pertinacious curiosity of the national reader concerning everything which relates to so distinguished a man. We would not let so precious a fragment slip; though we approve Mr Lockhart's judgment in preferring a fuller detail. Fulness has become absolutely necessary, from the many apocryphal and half-authenticated anecdotes of Scott's childhood and youth which have got into circulation.

From feelings of respect and veneration, Mr Lockhart has placed the autobiography, dated Ashestiel, April 26, 1808, first in the memoirs; and this arrangement, if not the most judicious, carries its own apology. The fragment, with numerous notes, added in 1826, fills about sixty pages of the volume, and will be regarded, we say not how justly, as the most valuable part of its ample contents.

No man indulged himself in the Scottish and Irish prejudice of birth to a more ludicrous extent than Sir Walter Scott. It was his most easily besetting foible—and yet he has drawn Sir Halbert Glendinning! Admit all his claims at his own value, and how many pedigrees, pure and lofty, might be traced in the parish of St Giles, the Canongate of Edinburgh, and the Liberties of Dublin? How is it that only the one cousin, nine or nineteen times removed, who scrambles for it, comes forth with the blazon of gentry, while the rest sink and disappear? And how, alas! does so much good and gentle blood ebb away into gutters and ditches? This foible might be forgiven in Sir Walter Scott. It was his hobby; but Mr Lockhart has cantered off in the same direction at an accelerated pace, and with much greater latitude of divergence. We shall, for this reason, adopt Sir Walter's own account of his ancestral dignities. It is, moreover, a fair specimen of the narrative.

> Every Scottishman has a pedigree. It is a national prerogative as unalienable as his pride and his poverty. My birth was neither distinguished nor sordid. According to the prejudices of my country, it was esteemed gentle, as I was connected, though remotely, with ancient families both by my father's and mother's side. My father's grandfather was Walter Scott, well known in Teviotdale by the surname of Beardie. He was the second son of Walter Scott, first Laird of Raeburn, who was third son of Sir William Scott, and the grandson of Walter Scott, commonly called in tradition, Auld Watt of Harden. I am therefore, lineally descended from that ancient chieftain, whose name I have made to ring in many a ditty, and from his fair dame, the Flower of Yarrow—no bad genealogy for a Border minstrel. Beardie, my great-grandfather aforesaid, derived his cognomen from a venerable beard, which he wore unblemished by razor or scissors, in token of his regret for the banished dynasty of Stewart. . . . . Old Beardie died in a house, still standing, at the north-east entrance to the churchyard of Kelso, about——. He left three sons. The eldest, Walter, had a family, of which any that now remain, have been long settled in America:—the male-heirs are long since extinct. The third was William, father of James Scott, well known in India as one of the original settlers of Prince of Wales's Island:—he had, besides, a numerous family both of sons and daughters, and died at Lasswade, in Mid-Lothian, about——. The second, Robert Scott, was my grandfather.

What became of all these sons and daughters no one can tell; probably few of them are able to trace their pedigree. The great-granduncle alluded to in this narrative, must be the person meant in Mrs Hemans' letters, whom she describes as the grandfather of Sir Walter Scott, when she relates that he pointed out to her in Yarrow the scene of the duel in which he was killed. Scott's grandfather was the second son of Beardie. He was cast off destitute by his father. But he got a lease of the farm of Sandy-Knowe, now classic ground, and a loan of £30 with which to stock it. He afterwards became skilful in the cattle trade, and is described by his grandson as—

A man of middle stature, extremely active, quick, keen, and fiery in his temper, stubbornly honest, and so distinguished for his skill in country matters, that he was the general referee in all points of dispute which occurred in the neighbourhood. His birth being admitted as gentle, gave him access to the best society in the county, and his dexterity in country sports, particularly hunting, made him an acceptable companion in the field as well as at the table. Robert Scott of Sandy-Knowe, married in 1728, Barbara Haliburton, daughter of Thomas Haliburton of Newmains, an ancient and respectable family in Berwickshire. Among other patrimonial possessions, they enjoyed the part of Dryburgh, now the property of the Earl of Buchan, comprehending the ruins of the Abbey. My granduncle, Robert Haliburton, having no male heirs, this estate, as well as the representation of the family, would have devolved upon my father, and, indeed, Old Newmains had settled it upon him; but this was prevented by the misfortunes of my granduncle, a weak, silly man, who engaged in trade, for which he had neither stock nor talents, and became bankrupt. The ancient patrimony was sold for a trifle, (about £3000,) and my father, who might have purchased it with ease, was dissuaded by my grandfather, who at that time believed a more advantageous purchase might have been made of some lands which Raeburn thought of selling. And thus we have nothing left of Dryburgh, although my father's maternal inheritance, but the right of stretching our bones where mine may perhaps be laid ere any eye but my own glances over these pages. Walter Scott, my father, was born in 1729, and educated to the profession of a Writer to the Signet.

Most attorneys have been suspected, more or less justly, of making their own fortune at the expense of their clients—my father's fate was to vindicate his calling from the stain in one instance, for in many cases his clients contrived to ease him of considerable sums. Many worshipful and be-knighted names occur to my memory, who did him the honour to run in his debt to the amount of thousands, and to pay him with a law-suit, or a commission of bankruptcy, as the case happened. But they are gone to a different accounting, and it would be ungenerous to visit their disgrace upon their descendants.

It was so far fortunate that the son of Robert of Sandy-Knowe could stand such losses, and be in condition to purchase back the maternal family inheritance notwithstanding. As it is agreed, upon all hands, that Scott has drawn his father, and to the life, in Mr Saunders Fairford in "Redgauntlet," himself in Alan Fairford, and in Dairsie Latimer, his friend William Clerk, this portion of the autobiography is forestalled. His father married, in April 1758, Anne Rutherford, the eldest daughter of Dr John Rutherford, Professor of Medicine in the University of Edinburgh. They had a family of twelve children, of whom seven died in infancy. Of the rest Sir Walter has given an interesting sketch. His eldest brother, Robert, was bred in the navy—he had a literary turn, but was boisterous and tyrannical; the second, John, was in the army; his only sister, Anne, was amiable and imaginative, but of a feeble, unhealthy constitution. She died young. At eighteen months, Scott, previously a strong, healthy child, lost the power of his right leg in a fever of teething. By his medical grandfather's advice—and it was a happy one—he was sent to Sandy-Knowes to be nursed, and to recruit, and was intrusted to a nurse-maid half-mad for love, who lay under strong temptations to cut the child's throat with her scissors, and bury him in the moss, that she might get back to Edinburgh to her sweetheart. She subsequently became a confirmed lunatic. Everything that a doting grandfather and grandmother, and that Miss Jenny Scott, a most maternal aunt, could do, was tried to restore the blighted limb, while the indifferent little Walter, then about three years old, was as anxious to hear of the defeat of Washington as afterwards of the disasters of Napoleon. He was already a Jacobite; and relates—

"This latter political propensity was deeply confirmed by the stories told in my hearing of the cruelties exercised in the executions at Carlisle, and in the Highlands after the battle of Culloden. One or two of our own distant relations had fallen on that occasion, and I remember detesting the name of Cumberland with more than infant hatred. Mr Curle, farmer at Yetbyre, husband of one of my aunts, had been present at their execution; and it was probably from him that I first heard these tragic tales which made so great an impression on me. The local information, which I conceive had some share in forming my future taste and pursuits, I derived from the old songs and tales which then formed the amusement of a retired country family. My grandmother, in whose youth the old Border depredations were matter of recent tradition, used to tell me many a tale of Watt of Harden, Wight Willie of Aikwood, Jamie Telfer of the fair Dodhead, and other heroes—merrymen all of the persuasion and calling of Robin Hood and Little John. A more recent hero, but not of less note, was the celebrated De'il of Littledean, whom she well remembered, as he had married her mother's sister. . . . . .

"My kind and affectionate aunt, Miss Janet Scott, whose memory will ever be dear to me, used to read these works to me with admirable patience, until I could repeat long passages by heart. The ballad of Hardyknute I was early master of, to the great annoyance of almost our only visiter, the worthy clergyman of the parish, Dr Duncan, who had not patience to have a sober chat interrupted by my shouting forth this ditty."

Mr Lockhart's description of this early and most interesting part of Scott's childhood, is, we think, very engaging, and fills in the shades which Scott has either modestly omitted, or, from some motive, forborne to throw into his sketch:—

He says that his consciousness of existence dated from Sandy-Knowe; and how deep and indelible was the impression which its romantic localities had left on his imagination, I need not remind the readers of "Marmion" and "The Eve of St John." On the summit of the Crags which overhang the farm-house stands the ruined tower of Smailholme, the scene of that fine ballad; and the view from thence takes in a wide expanse of the district in which, as has been truly said, every field has its battle, and every rivulet its song:—

"The lady looked in mournful mood,
Looked over hill and vale,
O'er Mertoun's wood, and Tweed's fair flood,
And all down Teviotdale."

Mertoun, the principal seat of the Harden family, with its noble groves; nearly in front of it, across the Tweed, Lessudden, the comparatively small but still venerable and stately abode of the Lairds of Raeburn; and the hoary Abbey of Dryburgh, surrounded with yew-trees as ancient as itself, seem to lie almost below the feet of the spectator. Opposite him rise the purple peaks of Eildon, the traditional scene of Thomas the Rymer's interview with the Queen of Faerie; behind are the blasted peel which the seer of Erceldoun himself inhabited, "The Broom of the Cowdenknowes," the pastoral valley of the Leader, and the bleak wilderness of Lammermoor. To the eastward the desolate grandeur of Hume Castle breaks the horizon, as the eye travels towards the range of the Cheviot. A few miles westward, Melrose, "like some tall rock with lichens grey," appears clasped amidst the windings of the Tweed; and the distance presents the serrated mountains of the Gala, the Ettrick, and the Yarrow, all famous in song. Such were the objects that had painted the earliest images on the eye of the last and greatest of the Border Minstrels.

There are still living in that neighbourhood two old women, who were in the domestic service of Sandy-Knowe, when the lame child was brought thither in the third year of his age. One of them, Tibby Hunter, remembers his coming well; and that "he was a sweet-tempered bairn, a darling with all about the house." The young ewe-milkers delighted, she says, to carry him about on their backs among the crags; and he was "very gleg (quick) at the uptake, and soon kenned every sheep and lamb by headmark as well as any of them." His great pleasure, however, was in the society of the "aged hind," recorded in the epistle to Erskine. "Auld Sandy Ormistoun," called, from the most dignified part of his function, "the Cow-bailie," had the chief superintendence of the flocks that browsed upon "the velvet tufts of loveliest green." If the child saw him in the morning, he could not be satisfied unless the old man would set him astride on his shoulder, and take him to keep him company as he lay watching his charge.

"Here was poetic impulse given By the green hill and clear blue heaven."

The cow-bailie blew a particular note on his whistle, which signified to the maid-servants in the house below when the little boy wished to be carried home again. He told his friend, Mr Skene of Rubislaw, when spending a summer day in his old age among these well-remembered crags, that he delighted to roll about on the grass all day long in the midst of the flock, and that "the sort of fellowship he thus formed with the sheep and lambs had impressed his mind with a degree of affectionate feeling towards them which had lasted throughout life." There is a story of his having been forgotten one day among the knolls when a thunder-storm came on; and his aunt, suddenly recollecting his situation, and running out to bring him home, is said to have found him lying on his back, clapping his hands at the lightning, and crying out "Bonny, bonny!" at every flash.

According to Tibby Hunter, he was not particularly fond of his book, embracing every pretext for joining his friend the cow-bailie out of doors; but "Miss Jenny was a grand hand at keeping him to the bit, and by degrees he came to read brawly." An early acquaintance of a higher class, Mrs Duncan, the wife of the present excellent minister of Mertoun, informs me, that, though she was younger than Sir Walter, she has a dim remembrance of the interior of Sandy-Knowe;—"Old Mrs Scott sitting, with her spinning-wheel, at one side of the fire, in a clean clean parlour; the grandfather, a good deal failed, in his elbow-chair opposite; and the little boy lying on the carpet, at the old man's feet, listening to the Bible, or whatever good book Miss Jenny was reading to them."

How charming is this picture! and how faithful!—In his fourth year, Walter was sent to Bath for the advantage of the waters in the cure of his lameness; and, under the care of his aunt, Miss Jenny. He remained about a year in Bath, and retained an accurate and even vivid recollection of all the wonders he had seen, but especially of the theatre. He came home uncured. Sea-bathing was next tried for his withered limb; and at Prestonpans, whither his aunt again accompanied him, he contracted a juvenile intimacy with a veteran ensign named Dalgetty, who told him how fields were won. Here also he first met Mr George Constable, the original of the Antiquary, and an admirer, as at four or five years he seems slily to have discovered, of his aunt Jenny. Mr Constable, he says—

Was the first person who told me about Falstaff and Hotspur, and other characters in Shakspeare. What idea I annexed to them I know not, but I must have annexed some, for I remember quite well being interested on the subject. Indeed, I rather suspect that children derive impulses of a powerful and important kind in hearing things which they cannot entirely comprehend: and therefore, that to write down to children's understanding is a mistake; set them on the scent, and let them puzzle it out.

We request attention to the sentence we have put in Italics; as we are proud to find so weighty a corroboration of a favourite opinion of our own. The plan of the Edgeworths and other educational Utilitarians, to turn poetry into what they call its prose meaning, is one of the best contrivances that ever was fallen upon to starve and deaden the awakening imagination of a child. But it cannot succeed; nature disowns and repels it.

Little Scott found George's Square, the residence of his father, a much less agreeable residence than Sandy-Knowe.

The spoiled brat—

"The self-willed imp,
A grandame's child"—

now first began to taste the ills which poetic flesh is heir to; for, doubtless, his natural and cultivated sensibilities made him keenly alive to the change in his domestic circumstances, before he could say—

I had sense enough, however, to bend my temper to my new circumstances; but such was the agony which I internally experienced, that I have guarded against nothing more in the education of my own family, than against their acquiring habits of self-willed caprice and domination. I found much consolation, during this period of mortification, in the partiality of my mother. She joined, to a light and happy temper of mind, a strong turn to study poetry and works of imagination. She was sincerely devout, but her religion was, as became her sex, of a cast less austere than my father's. Still, the discipline of the Presbyterian Sabbath was severely strict, and I think injudiciously so. Although Bunyan's Pilgrim, Gesner's Death of Abel, Rowe's Letters, and one or two other books, which, for that reason, I still have a favour for, were admitted to relieve the gloom of one dull sermon succeeding to another; there was far too much tedium annexed to the duties of the day; and in the end it did none of us any good. My week-day tasks were more agreeable. My lameness and my solitary habits had made me a tolerable reader, and my hours of leisure were usually spent in reading aloud to my mother Pope's translation of Homer, which, excepting a few traditionary ballads, and the songs in Allan Ramsay's "Evergreen," was the first poetry which I perused. My mother had good natural taste and great feeling: she used to make me pause upon those passages which expressed generous and worthy sentiments, and if she could not divert me from those which were descriptive of battle and tumult, she contrived at least to divide my attention between them. My own enthusiasm, however, was chiefly awakened by the wonderful and the terrible—the common taste of children, but in which I have remained a child even unto this day.

It has been said that his teachers, and those who had opportunities of observing Scott in early childhood, declared him a dunce. He denies that he was ever thought a dunce; but admits that he was reckoned an idle imp. Yet, if we are to receive implicitly a document recovered by Mr Lockhart, he must have been one of the most extraordinary children in the world. Mrs Cockburn, the celebrated authoress of the more modern "Flowers of the Forest," one of the most exquisite of our Scottish songs, supped one night at Scott's father's. Next day she wrote to Dr Douglas, then the minister of her native parish of Galashiels:—

"I last night supped in Mr Walter Scott's. He has the most extraordinary genius of a boy I ever saw. He was reading a poem to his mother when I went in. I made him read on; it was the description of a shipwreck. His passion rose with the storm. He lifted his eyes and hands. 'There's the mast gone!' says he; 'crash it goes! —they will all perish!' After his agitation, he turns to me. 'That is too melancholy,' says he; 'I had better read you something more amusing.' I preferred a little chat, and asked his opinion of Milton and other books he was reading, which he gave me wonderfully. One of his observations was, 'How strange it is that Adam, just new come into the world, should know everything—that must be the poet's fancy,' says he. But when he was told he was created perfect by God, he instantly yielded. When taken to bed last night, he told his aunt he liked that lady. 'What lady?' says she. 'Why, Mrs Cockburn; for I think she is a virtuoso, like myself.' 'Dear Walter,' says aunt Jenny, 'what is a virtuoso?' 'Don't ye know? Why, it's one who wishes and will know everything.'"

The virtuoso was then six years and three months old! About the same time, his attendant, in one day giving alms to a poor mendicant, told the child to be thankful for the circumstances in which Providence had placed him. "The child looked up with a half wistful, half incredulous expression—and said, 'Homer was a beggar!'" Walter was more of the elementary philosopher at this age than thirty years later.

After leaving Prestonpans, he went back to Sandy-Knowe, where, his grandfather being dead, his uncle Thomas managed the farm. He was very kind and indulgent to his little cripple nephew, to whom he gave Marion, a dwarf sheltie; which gift led to such daring feats of horsemanship, round the old Tower of Smailholm, as alarmed Aunty Jenny. He was soon recalled to town, and put regularly to the High School of Edinburgh; where, notwithstanding his lameness, he for some years not only distinguished himself more in the yards than in the class, but already drew an admiring audience around Luckie Brown's fireside to listen to his stories. But he has described this period himself in a way which distances all biographers. His brothers and himself had also a domestic tutor, named Mitchell, bred to the Kirk, and, according to Scott, a confirmed fanatic. Scott seems to have had a strong prejudice against the Presbyterian clergy, though bred a Pharisee of the Pharisees, or, in the phrase of Edinburgh, a Greyfriars' Whig. He praises Dr Duncan, the minister of his grandfather's parish, who had been chaplain to Lord Marchmont, as one who "was a gentleman in every feeling, and altogether different from those of his order who cringe at the tables of the gentry, or domineer and riot at those of the yeomanry."

Of his fanatical tutor, he says—"The calibre of his understanding may be guessed from his folly in giving up his living." All his own boyish prepossessions were opposed to those of Mitchell. "I," he remarks—

With a head on fire for chivalry, was a Cavalier—my friend was a Roundhead; I was a Tory, and he was a Whig. I hated Presbyterians, and admired Montrose with his victorious Highlanders; he liked the Presbyterian Ulysses, the dark and politic Argyle: so that we never wanted subjects of dispute, but our disputes were always amicable. . . . . I took up my politics at that period as King Charles II. did his religion, from an idea that the Cavalier creed was the more gentleman-like persuasion of the two.

Perhaps it was on the same principle Sir Walter continued to regulate his political creed.

This gentleman survived his pupil; and has given an interesting relation of their early intercourse, in a MS. work, drawn up for the use of his children, from which Mr Lockhart has obtained an extract. This excellent man, who gave up his living for conscience-sake, became ultimately the pastor of a small congregation at Wooler, where he lately died. He describes the strict Sunday discipline of Mr Saunders Fairford's family in George's Square, and expresses great admiration of the pains bestowed by both father and mother in instructing and setting a religious example before them. He tells, with diverting simplicity, that, "When in church, Master Walter had more of a soporific tendency than the rest of my young charge. This seemed to be constitutional. He needed one or other of the family to arouse him; and from this it might be inferred that he would cut a poor figure on the Sabbath evening when examined about the sermons. But, what excited the admiration of the family was, that none of the children, however wakeful, could answer as he did."

This good man sincerely loved all his pupils; but, above all the children of the family, he declares that Master Walter deserved the preference, "for temper, conduct, and talents natural and acquired." The following anecdote is touchingly beautiful:—

Master Walter might be regarded not so much as a pupil of mine, but as a friend and companion, and, I may add, as an assistant also; for, by his example and admonitions, he greatly strengthened my hands, and stimulated my other pupils to industry and good behaviour. I seldom had occasion all the time I was in the family to find fault with him even for trifles, and only once to threaten serious castigation, of which he was no sooner aware than he suddenly sprung up, threw his arms about my neck, and kissed me. It is hardly needful to state, that now the intended castigation was no longer thought of. By such generous and noble conduct my displeasure was in a moment converted into esteem and admiration; my soul melted into tenderness, and I was ready to mingle my tears with his.

Master Walter, when a young advocate, first going the Aberdeen circuit, spent a night at Montrose with his former tutor; and, impressed even thus early, with the belief that Scott would arrive at honour and influence, the good man endeavoured to bespeak his patronage "in behalf of the strict and evangelical party in the Church of Scotland, in exerting himself to induce patrons to grant to the Christian people liberty to elect their own pastors in cases of vacancy. His answer struck me much—it was, 'Nay, nay, Mr Mitchell, I'll not do that; for, if that were to be done, I and the like of me would have no life with such as you.'"

Mr Mitchell was grieved to understand that his former pupil "devoted his precious time more to the dulce than the utile of composition," and wasted his talents upon ancient ballads and traditions of witches and fairies, though finally he is happy to understand that his novels are not quite so bad, or, rather, are "of a more pure and unexceptionable nature than characterises writings of a similar description."

But we anticipate. Even while Scott was under the strict discipline of Mr James Mitchell, who abhorred all profane ballads and harlotry plays, he contrived furtively to obtain stray volumes of Shakspeare from his mother's room; and accident threw the ingenious boy into the way of the poetical and blind Dr Blacklock, with whom and the young gentlemen boarded in his family, Walter became a favourite. He now read Ossian and Spenser—the latter dotingly; but, above all, he obtained Percy's "Reliques of Ancient Poetry"—and his destiny was fixed. His aunt, Jenny, had, by this time, retired to Kelso, to a cottage situated in a large old-fashioned garden, or orchard; and with her Walter spent his long summer vacations—for fashion's sake attending the grammar school of Mr Lancelot Whale, who is described as a sort of Dominie Sampson. Here he first became acquainted with Mr James Ballantyne, then also under the discipline of Mr Whale. Master Walter, as a reader of Homer, occupied an isolated and honourable, but solitary post in the school, from whence he would whisper Ballantyne—"Come, slink over beside me, Jamie, and I'll tell you a story."

In his "Essay on Landscape Gardening," he has commemorated the beauties of his Aunt Jenny's retreat:—

It was full of long straight walks, between hedges o yew and hornbeam, which rose tall and close on every side. There were thickets of flowery shrubs, a bower, and an arbour, to which access was obtained through a little maze of contorted walks calling itself a labyrinth. In the centre of the bower was a splendid platanus, or Oriental plane—a huge hill of leaves—one of the noblest specimens of that regularly beautiful tree which I remember to have seen. In different parts of the garden were fine ornamental trees, which had attained great size, and the orchard was filled with fruit trees of the best description. There were seats, and hilly walks, and a banqueting house. I visited this scene lately, after an absence of many years. Its air of retreat, the seclusion which its alleys afforded, was entirely gone; the huge platanus had died, like most of its kind, in the beginning of this century; the hedges were cut down, the trees stubbed up, and the whole character of the place so destroyed, that I was glad when I could leave it.

How charmingly, in the autobiography, he describes his young, enthusiastic feelings on here perusing the Percy ballads, while his heart burned within him!

I remember well the spot where I read these volumes for the first time. It was beneath a huge platanus-tree, in the ruins of what had been intended for an old-fashioned arbour in the garden [his aunt's at Kelso] I have mentioned. The summer day sped onward so fast, that, notwithstanding the sharp appetite of thirteen, I forgot the hour of dinner, was sought for with anxiety, and was still found entranced in my intellectual banquet. To read and to remember was, in this instance, the same thing, and henceforth I overwhelmed my schoolfellows, and all who would hearken to me, with tragical recitations from the ballads of Bishop Percy. The first time, too, I could scrape a few shillings together, which were not common occurrences with me, I bought unto myself a copy of these beloved volumes, nor do I believe I ever read a book half so frequently, or with half the enthusiasm.

Scott was now done with Latin; and he passes a grateful encomium on his virtues and scholarship, while he gives a sly, graphical description of his old teacher, the republican Dr Adams.

He went to college with slender knowledge of Greek, and, according to himself, made no addition to his stock. He had even the audacity to prefer Ariosto to Homer, in the face of his teacher Dalzell, who pronounced that "Dunce he was and dunce he would remain." He afterwards attended the Logic professor, and also the Moral Philosophy class, then taught by Dugald Stewart. He attempted mathematics with a private tutor. The opinion he avows regarding his attainments in learning is perhaps too humble, and his warnings and admonitory declarations savour somewhat of the pride which apes humility.

In the meanwhile, he enjoyed, in consequence of a lingering illness caused by the rupture of a blood-vessel, another long course of delicious miscellaneous reading.—At this time, his most intimate companion, Mr John Irving, attended him daily, watching over him with the warmth of young friendship.

The bed on which he lay was piled with a constant succession of works of imagination; and sad realities were forgotten amidst the brilliant day-dreams of genius drinking unwearied from the eternal fountains of Spenser and Shakspeare. Chess was recommended as a relief to these unintermitted though desultory studies; and he engaged eagerly in the game which had found favour with so many of his Paladins. Mr Irving remembers playing it with him hour after hour, in very cold weather, when, the windows being kept open as a part of the medical treatment, nothing but youthful nerves and spirit could have persevered.

On his perfect recovery, Scott was bound apprentice for five years to his father, in order to acquire the routine knowledge of the business of an attorney's office. He disliked the drudgery of his post; but it had its consolations:—"The allowance for copy-money furnished a little fund for the menus plaisirs of the circulating library and the theatre; and this was no trifling incentive to labour. When actually at the oar, no man could pull it harder than I; and I remember writing upwards of 120 folio pages with no interval either for food or rest."

We like to hear from Scott himself of the growth and developement of his mind; and the following passage, we consider not only singular but important.

My greatest intimate, from the days of my schooltide, was Mr John Irving, now a Writer to the Signet. We lived near each other, and, by joint agreement, were wont, each of us, to compose a romance for the other's amusement. These legends, in which the martial and the miraculous always predominated, we rehearsed to each other during our walks, which were usually directed to the most solitary spots about Arthur's Seat and Salisbury Crags. We naturally sought seclusion; for we were conscious no small degree of ridicule would have attended our amusement, if the nature of it had become known. Whole holidays were spent in this singular pastime, which continued for two or three years, and had, I believe, no small effect in directing the turn of my imagination to the chivalrous and romantic in poetry and prose. The translations of Mr Hoole having made me acquainted with Tasso and Ariosto, I learned from his notes on the latter, that the Italian language contained a fund of romantic lore. A part of my earnings was dedicated to an Italian class, which I attended twice a-week, and rapidly acquired some proficiency. I had previously renewed and extended my knowledge of the French language, from the same principle of romantic research. Tressan's romances, the Bibliothèque Bleue, and Bibliothèque de Romans, were already familiar to me, and I now acquired similar intimacy with the works of Dante, Boiardo, Pulci, and other eminent Italian authors. I fastened, also, like a tiger upon every collection of old songs or romances which chance threw in my way, or which my scrutiny was able to discover on the dusty shelves of John Sibbald's circulating library in the Parliament Square. This collection, now dismantled and dispersed, contained, at that time, many rare and curious works, seldom found in such a collection. Mr Sibbald himself, a man of rough manners, but of some taste and judgment, cultivated music and poetry; and, in his shop, I had a distant view of some literary characters, besides the privilege of ransacking the stores of old French and Italian books, which were in little demand among the bulk of his subscribers. Here I saw the unfortunate Andrew Macdonald, author of "Vimonda;" and here, too, I saw, at a distance, the boast of Scotland, Robert Burns.

In another place, it is stated, upon his own authority, that, before he was ten years old, he had bound up several volumes of Chap books and ballads—by binding up, no doubt meaning the stitching together the bunch of ballads which then formed, and probably still form, a main portion of the winter fire-side entertainment of every farm-house in Selkirk and Roxburghshires, and indeed of all Lowland Scotland. Scott became strong and even robust after his long illness; and, defying lameness, he began a course of those pedestrian excursions to old towers and castles, to which the neighbourhood of Edinburgh affords so many temptations. He says—

I was rather disfigured than disabled by my lameness. This personal disadvantage did not prevent me from taking much exercise on horseback, and making long journeys on foot, in the course of which I often walked from twenty to thirty miles a-day. A distinct instance occurs to me. I remember walking with poor James Ramsay, my fellow apprentice, now no more, and two other friends, to breakfast at Prestonpans. We spent the forenoon in visiting the ruins at Seton, and the field of battle at Preston—dined at Prestonpans on tiled haddocks, very sumptuously—drank half a bottle of port each, and returned in the evening. This could not be less than thirty miles; nor do I remember being at all fatigued upon the occasion.

Rambles of this kind, little fishing excursions, and explorations of feudal holds and pictorial scenes, have long and happily been the Ascot and Epsom, or Greenwich Fair of the youth of Edinburgh; and Scott intensely enjoyed those rational and delightful modes of recreation. Sometimes, however, "Mr Walter" forgot to return home at night; and until his father was broken into a toleration of such escapades by their repetition, there was offence and remonstrance. Even before this period, he had seen the finest parts of Stirlingshire and Perthshire in casual journeys of business made to his father's Highland clients; and on these tours, took in nourishment for a lifetime. Among other apocryphal or highly-embellished stories which Mr Lockhart has reported in simple good faith, such as the legend of the Blue-gown—a traditionary tale which had been floating in Scotland for generations before Scott was born, together with its pointed concluding phrase, and of which an edition is to be found in all our great towns—the following amusing, though most improbable story is recited:—

"Imagination feeding at the eye,"

I have often heard Scott mention some curious particulars of his first visit to the remote fastness of one of these Highland friends; but whether he told the story of Invernahyle, or of one of his own relations of the Clan Campbell, I do not recollect; I rather think the latter was the case. On reaching the brow of a bleak eminence overhanging the primitive tower and its tiny patch of cultivated ground, he found his host and three sons, and perhaps half-a-dozen attendant gillies, all stretched half asleep in their tartans upon the heath, with guns and dogs, and a profusion of game about them; while in the courtyard, far below, appeared a company of women, actively engaged in loading a cart with manure. The stranger was not a little astonished when he discovered, on descending from the height, that among these industrious females were the laird's own lady, and two or three of her daughters; but they seemed quite unconscious of having been detected in an occupation unsuitable to their rank—retired presently to their "bowers," and when they re-appeared in other dresses, retained no traces of their morning's work, except complexions glowing with a radiant freshness, for one evening of which many a high-bred beauty would have bartered half her diamonds. He found the young ladies not ill informed, and exceedingly agreeable; and the song and the dance seemed to form the invariable termination of their busy days. I must not forget his admiration at the principal article of this laird's first course; namely, a gigantic haggis, borne into the hall in a wicker basket by two half-naked Celts, while the piper strutted fiercely behind them, blowing a tempest of dissonance.

Although we were to receive the thrift of the ladies carting the manure, so long before Sir John Sinclair's husbandry or Lord Meadowbank's compost middens had been heard of, and were to let the piper and the idle gillies lounge around, it is impossible to swallow the gigantic haggis; and for the substantial reason, that every haggis must of necessity be limited by the dimensions of the haggis-bag, and that again by the size of the sheep whose stomach is employed. But a gigantic haggis supposes an elephant. When, under the old regime, it was found necessary to afford some ostensible employment to the chief's multitudinous tail, to keep them out of mischief, we have heard of such things as two gillies carrying in the pile of bannocks and oaten cakes, and another pair, the enormous pièce de resistance which furnished the banquet, and so on, to the number of a dozen or more, of sewers, skinkers, and serving-men; but even this usage was exploded generations since. So we must demur to the pipe-marshalled haggis, save as a good story, such as Sir Walter Scott could tell of the clans or of anything else, but which he could not mean to be seriously believed. A lively fiction may often be better than a dull fact, though the interests of truth demand some definite bounds. Sir Walter Scott, especially in his prefaces, abounds in mystifications and loose statements; but then, we presume, he required no one to believe more than seemed good and agreeable to him.

Attendance at the Civil Law Class renewed Scott's intimacy with several of the more distinguished of his old schoolfellows, whose destination was the bar, and fixed the ambition of Mr Saunders Fairford's apprentice on the same goal. This class opened up new views in many ways. There he first became acquainted with William Clerk of Eldin, and, through him, with the aristocratic group that Lockhart describes, in Scott's words, as the Scottish noblesse de la robe:—

He soon became linked in the closest intimacy with George Cranstoun, (now Lord Corehouse,) George Abercromby, (now Lord Abercromby,) Sir Patrick Murray of Ochtertyre, John James Edmonstone of Newton, Patrick Murray of Simprim, and a group of other young men, all high in birth and connexion, and all remarkable in early life for the qualities which afterwards led them to eminent station, or adorned it. The introduction to their several families is alluded to by Scott as having opened to him abundantly certain advantages which no one could have been more qualified to improve, but from which he had hitherto been in great measure debarred in consequence of the retired habits of his parents.

Scott was at this time homely in his costume, if not a sloven; and it was not until he fell in love, and aspired to become "the squire of dames," that he paid any attention to his dress. Clerk told that he

Rallied Walter during one of their first evening walks together, on the slovenliness of his dress; he wore a pair of corduroy breeches, much glazed by the rubbing of his staff, which he immediately flourished—and said, "They be good enough for drinking in—let us go and have some oysters in the Covenant Close."

Convivial habits were then indulged among the young men of Edinburgh, whether students of law, writers, or barristers, to an extent now happily unknown; and this anecdote recalls some striking hints on that subject which occur in Scott's brief autobiography. That he partook profusely in the juvenile bacchanalia of that day, and continued to take a plentiful share in such jollities down to the time of his marriage, are facts worthy of being distinctly stated; for no man in mature life was more habitually averse to every sort of intemperance.

Of this period of Scott's life, Mr Lockhart relates many pleasing anecdotes, of which we can take but one:—

William Clerk well remembers his father telling a story which was introduced in due time in "The Antiquary." While he was visiting his grandfather, Sir John Clerk, at Dumcrieff, in Dumfriesshire, many years before this time, the old Baronet carried some English virtuosos to see a supposed Roman camp; and, on his exclaiming at a particular spot, "This I take to have been the Prætorium," a herdsman, who stood by, answered, "Prætorium here, Prætorium there, I made it wi' a flaughter spade." Many traits of the elder Clerk were, his son has no doubt, embroidered on the character of George Constable in the composition of Jonathan Oldbuck. The old gentleman's enthusiasm for antiquities was often played on by these young friends, but more effectually by his eldest son, John Clerk, (Lord Eldin,) who, having a great genius for art, used to amuse himself with manufacturing mutilated heads, which, after being buried for a convenient time in the ground, were accidentally discovered in some fortunate hour, and received by the laird with great honour as valuable accessions to his museum.

In Mr Campbell's entertaining Letters from Algiers, he mentions a secretary of John Clerk's, who, in reference to his employer's fondness for modelling in stucco, was one morning tempted to remonstrate—"Eh, Maister Clerk, but I wonder a sensible man like you can put off your time makin' stooky men."

Scott states that, in looking back, he cannot, in all respects, approve of the manner in which the days of this brotherhood were spent. "There was too much idleness, and too much convivality." Yet his remorse does not seem to outgo the occasion.

Longer and more frequent excursions and rambles, was one of the happiest consequences of this new association. These were the amusements of the leisure intervals of summer; as literary and debating societies, terminating in oyster ploys, were of those of winter. His object, in his tours, was romantic scenery; but that sunk and became secondary to the stirring impulses begotten by historical, poetical, and chivalrous associations. He says—

To me the wandering over the field of Bannockburn was the source of more exquisite pleasure than gazing upon the celebrated landscape from the battlements of Stirling Castle. I do not by any means infer that I was dead to the feeling of picturesque scenery; on the contrary, few delighted more in its general effect. . . . . Shew me an old castle or a field of battle, and I was at home at once, filled it with its combatants in their proper costume, and overwhelmed my hearers by the enthusiasm of my description. In crossing Magus Moor, near St Andrews, the spirit moved me to give a picture of the assassination of the Archbishop of St Andrew's to some fellow-travellers with whom I was accidentally associated, and one of them, though well acquainted with the story, protested my narrative had frightened away his night's sleep.

It was in his nineteenth year, that Scott entered zealously upon his law studies, in which he persevered diligently for four years. It is acknowledged by his biographer, as well as himself, that he was no great scholar; and his proficiency in legal knowledge was probably upon a par with his other regular attainments. Yet he must have been both diligent and persevering while law continued his first object. Mr Lockhart cites his bad hand-writing in proof of his industry.

That nothing might interrupt his legal studies, a little parlour, as he describes it, was assigned him in his father's house, "which was spacious and convenient," and of which he took possession with as much delight as the mansion of Abbotsford could have afforded to him in after years. There was formed the nucleus of his future collections, and of that which lumbers Abbotsford.

"Routh o' auld nick-nackets"

The imagination of a poet, and that turn for aggrandizing and embellishing the most commonplace scenes or objects—the faculty which makes

"Cobwebs on a dungeon wall Seem tapestry in lordly hall"— is fully evinced in the case of this dingy sanctum, which wore a very different aspect to Mr Jeffrey, and probably to all other commonplace eyes. Mr Lockhart relates that Lord Jeffrey "remembers being struck, the first night he spent at the Speculative, with the singular appearance of the secretary, who sat gravely at the bottom of the table in a huge woollen nightcap; and when the president took the chair, pleaded a bad toothache as his apology for coming into that worshipful assembly in such a 'portentuous machine.' He read that night an essay on ballads, which so much interested the new member, that he requested to be introduced to him. Mr Jeffrey called on him next evening, and found him 'in a small den, on the sunk floor of his father's house, in George's Square, surrounded with dingy books,' from which they adjourned to a tavern and supped together."

In this den Scott had already got together a Lochaber axe, a claymore, a print of Prince Charlie, and a skull and cross bones.

He had now obtained the entrée at Dugald Stewart's, and had long been a visiter at the house of John Home, the author of Douglas.

Among his convivial clubs was the Teviotdale, at which he renewed his boyish acquaintance with Mr James Ballantyne, who was attending the law classes, previous to commencing business in Kelso as a solicitor. Mr Ballantyne's information to the biographer, so far as this volume goes, is of no great interest.

Mr Lockhart has seen fit to hunt up a mysterious story, drawn from an early correspondence, which it might have been as well either to suppress altogether, from delicacy to the parties, (if that was called for,) or to tell out, from respect to the public which he addresses. The biographer has a wide charter; but he must, as we take it, upon certain occasions, either preserve a strict silence, or speak frankly out. He has no right to tantalize the reader, unless his hints are really meant as a fillip to curiosity which is afterwards to be gratified. The grave and formal apologies in the preface, for "trenching upon delicacy in certain details" concerning Scott's early disappointment in love, seem also quite uncalled for. Mr Lockhart states that he would have preferred to omit these "love passages"—but he has not; and he adds that, as he has been constrained to tell the story, he has done so "truly and intelligibly." Now, the fact is, that a mystery is, for the first time, made of a matter that has been current gossip in Scotland for more than forty years; and the story in Mr Lockhart's narrative is so far from being "intelligible" that an affair is involved in triple darkness which three plain sentences would have cleared away, and without shadow of blame. Some one else will undoubtedly supply to longing readers the tantalizing hiatus, which tens of thousands in Scotland have the power of doing. Why, then, touch upon the matter at all, and not at once tell the little all that was to be told? Young Scott had admired this lady for several years; and, at the end of five, if we may credit the dates, she was giving him a very reasonable degree of encouragement. He was, indeed, in no condition to marry; but the lady must have been perfectly aware of his circumstances and prospects. We may excuse the introduction of this unsatisfactory story for the sake of one letter of Scott's. To a confidential friend he says—

You have formed precisely the same opinion with me, both with regard to the interpretation of —— ——'s letter as highly flattering and favourable, and to the mode of conduct I ought to pursue—for, after all, what she has pointed out is the most prudent line of conduct for us both, at least till better days, which, I think myself now entitled to suppose, she, as well as I myself, will look forward to with pleasure. If you were surprised at reading the important billet, you may guess how agreeably I was so at receiving it; for I had, to anticipate disappointment, struggled to suppress every rising gleam of hope—and it would be very difficult to describe the mixed feelings her letter occasioned, which, entre nous, terminated in a very hearty fit of crying. I read over her epistle about ten times a-day, and always with new admiration of her generosity and candour—and as often take shame to myself for the mean suspicions which, after knowing her so long, I could listen to, while endeavouring to guess how she would conduct herself. To tell you the truth, I cannot but confess that my amour propre, which one would expect should have been exalted, has suffered not a little upon this occasion, through a sense of my own unworthiness, pretty similar to that which afflicted Linton upon sitting down at Keir's table. I ought perhaps to tell you, what, indeed, you will perceive from her letter, that I was always attentive, while consulting with you upon the subject of my declaration, rather to under than over-rate the extent of our intimacy.

Those who have read Captain Hall's "Schloss Hainfeld" will remember how warm an interest Miss Cranstoun took in the advancement of Scott's suit. Mr Lockhart, in quoting an eccentric letter from her to Scott, says—

The affair in which this romantic creature took so lively an interest, was now approaching its end. It was known, before this autumn closed, that the lady of his vows had finally promised her hand to his amiable rival; and, when the fact was announced, some of those who knew Scott the best appear to have entertained very serious apprehensions as to the effect [which the disappointment might have upon his feelings. For example, one of those brothers of the Mountain wrote as follows to another of them, on the 12th October 1796 :—"Mr —— marries Miss ——. This is not good news. I always dreaded there was some self-deception on the part of our romantic friend, and I now shudder at the violence of his most irritable and ungovernable mind. Who is it that says, "Men have died, and worms have eaten them, but not for LOVE?' I hope sincerely it may be verified on this occasion."

So the forlorn youth had deceived himself. Miss —— did not care a fig about him and his hopes of "long years," but at once accepted his amiable rival—and without appearing to feel that the almost briefless barrister had any concern in the matter.

Scott had dedicated a few sonnets to her eyebrow, which his friends Erskine and Clerk thought "very poor," as they probably at this time would have done everything that proceeded from his Galilean pen. Fashion and fame had not yet stamped their imprimatur upon his poorest effusions. Among the verses to this first and only romantic lady-love of Scott's are the well-known and beautiful lines "To a Violet."

Immediately after this melancholy termination of

"Hopes too fondly nursed, too rudely crossed,"

he published his translations of Bürger's "Lenore," and "The Wild Huntsman." These German wonders had been introduced to Edinburgh literary circles by Mrs Barbauld; but Scott's first or best acquaintance with German literature is ascribed by his biographer to Mrs Scott of Harden, a lady of noble German descent, who had shortly before married "his kinsman," as Mr Lockhart, with a true Scotsman's adhesion to gentle blood, calls Harden. This lady is here described as performing for the young provincial poet those gracious offices of refining or protecting womanhood, which, if we remember aright, Mr Lockhart, in writing to Captain Hall, formerly ascribed to Miss Cranstoun, afterwards Countess Purgstall. No one will grudge Mrs Scott of Harden her laurels; but, on the other hand, no one can like to see them so very soon plucked from the brow of Miss Cranstoun, to adorn a newer patroness and fairer critic.

Scott was not at this period, nor probably at any other, an inveterate or set letter-writer, composing, with malice prepense, fine and witty epistles. He reserved his pen for better occasions, and would probably, if expected to become a regular correspondent, have, like Charles Lamb, laughingly asked his friends how much they paid a sheet? When on his Border excursions, however, he wrote to his club cronies or to his female relatives; and Mr Lockhart seems to have amassed from many quarters a much more voluminous than select, miscellaneous correspondence.

From what has appeared of it, we shall take a few illustrative extracts, chiefly because they display Scott's character and tastes at this early period. This we consider to cast a shadow before his path. The letter is dated from one of those places in the heart of the Cheviots, where the Kelso folks, and those of that region, still repair to drink goats' whey, and to make watering-places in the hills, if we may so speak.

The morning's sun beheld us on our journey, through a pass in the Cheviots, upon the back of two special nags, and man Thomas behind with a portmanteau, and two fishing rods fastened across his back, much in the style of St. Andrew's Cross. Upon reaching Wooler we found the accommodation so bad that we were forced to use some interest to get lodgings here, where we are most delightfully appointed indeed. To add to my satisfaction, we are amidst places renowned by the feats of former days; each hill is crowned with a tower, or camp, or cairn, and in no situation can you be near more fields of battle: Flodden, Otterburn, Chevy Chase, Ford Castle, Chillingham Castle, Copland Castle, and many another scene of blood are within the compass of a forenoon's ride. Out of the brooks with which these hills are intersected, we pull trouts of half a yard in length, as fast as we did the perches from the pond at Pennycuick, and we are in the very country of muirfowl.

Often as I have wished for your company, I never did it more earnestly than when I rode over Flodden Edge.

He then proceeds to make a rude prose outline of a future scene in Marmion, and finishes thus naturally:—

My uncle drinks the whey here, as I do ever since I understood it was brought to his bedside every morning at six, by a very pretty dairy-maid. So much for my residence. All the day we shoot, fish, walk, and ride; dine and sup upon fish struggling from the stream, and the most delicious heath-fed mutton, barn-door fowls, poys,* milk-cheese, &c. all in perfection; and so much simplicity resides among these hills, that a pen, which could write at least, was not to be found about the house.

To the same correspondent, Clerk, he writes from Rosebank, in the following year:—

"I am lounging about the country here, to speak sincerely, as idle as the day is long. Two old companions of mine, brothers of Mr Walker of Wooden, having come to this country, we have renewed a great intimacy. As they live directly upon the opposite bank of the river, we have signals agreed upon, by which we concert a plan of operations for the day. They are both officers, and very intelligent young fellows; and, what is of some consequence, have a brace of fine greyhounds. Yesterday forenoon we killed seven hares, so you may see how plenty the game is with us. I have turned a keen duck shooter, though my success is not very great; and, when wading through the mosses upon this errand, accoutred with a long gun, a jacket, musquito trowsers, and a rough cap, I might well pass for one of my redoubted mosstrooper progenitors, Walter Fire-the-Braes, or rather Willie wi' the Bolt-Foot.

This Willie wi' the Bolt-Foot was a stalwart Border hero of the Harden family, whose character, deeds of prowess, and club-foot, Mr Lockhart conjectures to have had no mean influence on his descendant or clansman.

The South circuit naturally attracted the young advocate; and he had no sooner passed, than he attended the court at Jedburgh; but only as a looker-on. About this time, he became acquainted with Mr Robert Shortreed, the sheriff-substitute of Roxburghshire. This gentleman had many connexions in Liddesdale; and, for seven successive years, they made a raid into that country, for the ostensible purpose of picking up old ballads and legends, and for other objects, not less worthy of the pursuit of Borderers of taste and spirit. A narrative of these expeditions has been obtained from one of the sons of Mr Shortreed, which, Mr Lockhart asserts, represents the conversation of the worthy Jedburgh functionary exactly as it was. Without this information, we should have imagined the chronicles of the raids into Liddesdale, an imitation of Hogg's style. In fact, Hogg's narratives and these are, in character, identical:—

There was no inn nor public-house of any kind in the whole valley: the travellers passed from the shepherd's hut to the minister's manse, and again from the cheerful hospitality of the manse to the rough and jolly welcome of the homestead; gathering, wherever they went, songs and tunes, and occasionally more tangible relics of antiquity—even such "rowth o' auld nicknackets" as Burns ascribes to Captain Grose. To these rambles Scott owed much of the materials of his "Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border;" and not less of that intimate acquaintance with the living manners of these unsophisticated regions, which constitutes the chief charm of one of the most charming of his prose works. But how soon he had any definite object before him in his researches, seems very doubtful. "He was makin' himsel a' the time," said Mr Shortreed; "but he didna ken maybe what he was about till years had passed: at first he thought o' little, I dare say, but the queerness and the fun."

"In those days," says the memorandum before me, "advocates were not so plenty—at least, about Liddesdale;" and the worthy sheriff-substitute goes on to describe the sort of bustle, not unmixed with alarm, produced at the first farm-house they visited, (Willie Elliot's at Millburnholm,) when the honest man was informed of the quality of one of his guests. When they dismounted, accordingly, he received Mr Scott with great ceremony, and insisted upon himself leading his horse to the stable. Shortreed accompanied Willie, however; and the latter, after taking a deliberate peep at Scott, "out-by the edge of the door-cheek," whispered, "Weel, Robin, I say, de'il has me if I's be a bit feared for him now; he's just a chield like ourselves, I think."

According to Mr Shortreed, this good-man of Millburnholm was the great original of Dandie Dinmont. As he seems to have been the first of these upland sheep-farmers that Scott ever visited, there can be little doubt that he sat for some parts of that inimitable portraiture. . . . . I have the best reason to believe that the kind and manly character of Dandie, the gentle and delicious one of his wife, and some, at least, of the most picturesque peculiarities of the menage at Charlieshope, were filled up from Scott's observation, years after this period, of a family, with one of whose members he had, through the best part of his life, a close and affectionate connexion. To those who were familiar with him, I have perhaps already sufficiently indicated the early home of his dear friend, William Laidlaw, among "the braes of Yarrow."

They dined at Millburnholm, and after having lingered over Willie Elliot's punch-bowl until, in Mr Shortreed's phrase, they were "half-glowrin," mounted their steeds again, and proceeded to Dr Elliot's at Cleughhead, where ("for," says my memorandum, "folk werna very nice in those days,") the two travellers slept in one and the same bed; as, indeed, seems to have been the case with them throughout most of their excursions in this primitive district.

Next morning they seem to have ridden a long way for the express purpose of visiting one "auld Thomas o' Tuzzilehope," another Elliot, I suppose, who was celebrated for his skill on the Border pipe, and in particular for being in possession of the real lilt of Dick o' the Cow. Before starting—that is, at six o'clock—the ballad-hunters had, "just to lay the stomach, a deviled duck or twae, and some London porter." Auld Thomas found them, nevertheless, well disposed for "breakfast" on their arrival at Tuzzilehope; and this being over, he delighted them with one of the most hideous and unearthly of all the specimens of "riding music," and, moreover, with considerable libations of whisky-punch, manufactured in a certain wooden vessel resembling a very small milk-pail, which he called "Wisdom," because it "made" only a few spoonfuls of spirits—though he had the art of replenishing it so adroitly, that it had been celebrated for fifty years as more fatal to sobriety than any bowl in the parish. Having done due honour to "Wisdom," they again mounted, and proceeded over moss and moor to some other equally hospitable master of the pipe. "Ah, me," says Shortreed, "sic an endless fund o' humour and drollery as he then had wi' him! Never ten yards but we were either laughing or roaring and singing. Wherever we stopped, how brawlie he suited himsel to everybody! He aye did as the lave did; never made himsel the great man, or took ony airs in the company. I've seen him in a' moods in these jaunts, grave and gay, daft and serious, sober and drunk—(this, however, even in our wildest rambles, was but rare)—but drunk or sober, he was aye the gentleman. He lookit excessively heavy and stupid when he was fou, but he was never out o' guid humour."

This may be slightly touched with caricature; but a good caricature is always more acceptable than a bad likeness. On this same raid, Sir Walter was enriched by the gift of an old Border war-horn. "How great he was when he was made master o' that!" quoth Mr Shortreed.

I believe it had been found in Hermitage Castle—and one of the doctor's servants had used it many a day as a grease-horn for his scythe, before they discovered its history. When cleaned out, it was never a hair the worse—the original chain, hoop, and mouthpiece of steel were all entire, just as you now see them. Sir Walter carried it home all the way from Liddesdale to Jedburgh, slung about his neck like Johnny Gilpin's bottle, while I was intrusted with an ancient bridlebit, which we had likewise picked up.

> "The feint o' pride—na pride had he . . .
> A lang kail-gully hung down by his side,
> And a great meikle knowt-horn to rout on had he."

And meikle and sair we routed on't, and "hotched and blew, wi' micht and main." Oh, what pleasant days! And then a' the nonsense we had cost us naething. We never put hand in pocket for a week on end. Toll-bars there were none—and, indeed, I think our haill charges were a feed o' corn to our horses in the gangin' and comin' at Riccartoun Mill.

In the summer vacation after his first Liddesdale expedition, he made a long desultory excursion into Stirlingshire and Perthshire, diverging into Forfarshire with his friend Clerk; halting at every hospitable mansion, or straying among kith, kin, and allies, in the easy manner then common among young Edinburgh lawyers and students of respectable connexions, and not yet wholly exploded. Here Scott picked up much of those rich materials which he afterwards turned to ample account in "Waverley" and his other works.

It was now 1794, and the period which has been aptly termed the Dundas Reign of Terror. Mr Lockhart has judiciously forborne any marked exposition of Scott's partisan feeling or conduct, at a period of Edinburgh history to which no Tory of honour or principle can have much pleasure in looking back; and it might have been better to have omitted altogether those early exploits, which Scott's best friends blamed at the time, and which redound little in any way to his credit. Mr Lockhart's account of the theatrical row is, besides, partial and one-sided; though he may never have had the means of seeing both sides in a fair point of view. The disturbances which took place in the Edinburgh theatre originated, we believe, in a quarrel between certain swaggering subalterns belonging to the regiment then lying in the Castle, and the Irish students; and the overbearing insolence of the military, and afterwards of the young Tories of the Parliament House, was at least as provoking to the excited Irishmen, glowing with the first ardours of republican feeling, as the proud and patriotic defiance of "Paddy," which Mr Lockhart describes as studied insult to the boxes, could be to the loyal partisans of Dundas and Things as they were. The national anthem had been degraded into a party tune; and the Irishmen did not choose to submit to the insolent order of "Hats off!" as often as the subalterns and writers chose to disturb the house by giving it. Resistance and tumult were inevitable. One night, the usual affray ended in a regular preconcerted skirmish on the part of the Tories, with a flourish of shillelahs on both sides. Mr Lockhart's informant, in this transaction, says—

"Walter was certainly our Coriphæus, and signalized himself splendidly in this desperate fray: and nothing used afterwards to afford him more delight than dramatizing its incidents. Some of the most efficient of our allies were persons previously unknown to him, and of several of these whom he had particularly observed, he never lost sight afterwards. There were, I believe, cases in which they owed most valuable assistance in life to his recollection of the playhouse row." To this last part of Sir Alexander's testimony I can also add mine; and I am sure my worthy friend, Mr Donald M'Lean, W.S., will gratefully confirm it. When that gentleman became candidate for some office in the Exchequer, about 1822 or 1823, and Sir Walter's interest was requested on his behalf—"To be sure!" said he, "did not he sound the charge upon Paddy? Can I ever forget Donald's 'Sticks, by G—t?'"

We fear that even worse and more slender services in the same good cause of Toryism than those of this fiery Celt, were long held by "Walter's" party, as the fittest qualification for office, and as the strongest plea for the monopoly of all public emoluments.

We hear of nothing whatever, in relation to Scott, of the memorable trials of Muir and Gerrald; but the trials of Watt and Downie, in the following year, seem to have attracted his attention to an extraordinary extent. In introducing to the reader a letter from Scott to his mother's half-sister, Miss Christian Rutherford, a maiden lady with whom he was in frequent correspondence, Mr Lockhart gives an account of Watt's trial, which is palpably erroneous. We also venture to think, that, though Scott's share in this affair, and his two letters concerning it, had been left to oblivion, no damage could have been done to his memory. Sir Walter Scott died an alarmist; but this weakness might be pitied as the natural consequence of a racked and overspent mind; but it is humiliating to the pride of intellect, to find him, in the vigour of manhood, describing the idiotic scheme of Dundas's traitorous spy, as most alarming to the public security of the country. How horrified the worthy maiden, and, probably, the parish minister, must have been, when the young advocate's awful epistles disturbed the repose of Ashestiel! Watt (actuated by the same zeal of loyalty which was the boast of every friend of the abuses which they baptised "our glorious constitution," and, according to his own professions, holding the seditious and treasonable designs of the Friends of the People in as ardent abhorrence as any Tory whatever) tendered his virtuous services to Mr Dundas—and had them accepted. He was, by a mental combination by no means rare, a fool as well as a knave; and his few dupes, for we deny that he was ever countenanced by the Reformers, were greater fools than himself. He fell into his own snare and was noosed by the Government, while no man regretted his fate. His principal dupe, Downie—whom Lockhart describes "as one Downie a mechanic," but who was in fact a respectable goldsmith in the Parliament Square, whose shop Scott must have passed every day—was reprieved; and it is lamentable and revolting to find Scott actually regretting that this ensnared dupe of the treacherous spy had been allowed to escape the dire punishment of treason. His business was ruined, his family broken up and dispersed, but he was mercifully allowed by Pitt and Dundas to carry his head upon his shoulders to the grave, though in America—and Walter Scott regrets this act of mercy! How much does this little circumstance, in connexion with a mind like Scott's, tell of the warped partisan and even blood-thirsty feelings which then pervaded the rabid Tories of Edinburgh! We should rejoice to see these things obliterated in every future edition of this memoir. And now a word to Mr Lockhart. By what possible means has he learned that Watt's plan—fostered, or at least winked at, by the Government—was "supposed to be arranged in concert with the Hardies, Thelwalls, Holcrofts, and so forth"—and he might have added "the Horne Tookes" as well? What man in his senses ever said or supposed any such thing? Who ever believed it—anxious as Government was that it should be believed? Not Mr Lockhart, we are certain. Yet there is no bounds to the credulity of your thorough partisan. Scott seems actually to have imagined that the brawls in the theatre were, as he says, "found to have formed a link of the chain." The Irish students whose heads he had helped to break, were, in short, the same blood-thirsty individuals who, together with Watt, were to take the Castle, seize the banks, and cut the throats of all the loyal inhabitants of Edinburgh.

Stooks* (he writes) was the prime mover of the whole, and the person who supplied the money; and our theatrical disturbances are found to have formed one link of the chain. So, I have no doubt, Messrs Stooks, Burk, &c., would have found out a new way of paying old debts.

We turn, for relief, from these transactions to Scott's military fanaticism. The volunteers were embodied; and he was seized with the most violent symptoms of that scarlet-fever which was

* The name should, we think, be Stocks, which Mr Lockhart gives as Stooks. This young Irishman, about the time of the theatrical disturbances, fought a duel with an officer in consequence of them, and was wounded. He was a wild Republican, and afterwards went to France.

the furious epidemic of the times he has described so well in "The Antiquary." His lameness prevented Scott from serving in the foot; but the yeomanry were raised, and, to his inexpressible delight, he at last swung in a saddle—

"With his long spurs and sabre so bright."

Mr Lockhart relates, that—

Some of Scott's most intimate friends at the Bar—partly, no doubt, from entertaining political opinions of another cast—were by no means disposed to sympathize with the demonstrations of his military enthusiasm at this period. For example, one of these gentlemen thus writes to another in April 1797:—"By the way, Scott is become the merest trooper that ever was begotten by a drunken dragoon on his trull in a hay loft. Not an idea crosses his mind, or a word his lips, that has not an allusion to some d——d instrument or evolution of the cavalry—'Draw your swords—by single files to the right of front—to the left wheel—charge.' After all, he knows little more about wheels and charges than I do about the wheels of Ezekiel, or the King of Pelew about charges of horning on six days' date. I saw them charge on Leith Walk a few days ago, and I can assure you it was by no means orderly proceeded."

Scott celebrated the embodying of the Edinburgh troop in a chivalrous lyric, which his biographer has passed over, though the strain is found in his works, and has been greatly admired. Hogg, indeed, relates, in his characteristic manner, that, when Sir Walter first made this piece of what north country folks call glorifluckum be sung to his comrades at the mess table, one of them—Captain Robinson, we think—cried out, "That's but a drool of a sang. Let us have Donald Macdonald!" The Shepherd's patriotic lilt was given accordingly, with great glee, in full chorus, to the great satisfaction of the company, who, at this time, had small understanding and less value for Scott's high-flown assimilation of the *sour-milk troop to the knights of the old romances.

It was in the autumn of 1797, that Scott, in an excursion to the little watering-place of Gilsland, in Cumberland, first saw Miss Carpenter or Charpentier, whom, after a happy wooing not long a-doing, he married. There is so much gossip, and so many floating and contradictory stories about this affair, and the parentage of the lady, that, although Mr Lockhart has no doubt given the edition which he believes correct, we fear he is far from having settled the question for ever. Not to mention Hogg's anecdotes and insinuations—which certainly ought to be noticed, as they have obtained a great circulation both at home and in America, and will not soon be forgotten, and, unless peremptorily contradicted by authority, never be wholly disbelieved—there is at this moment lying upon our table a small work, entitled "Anecdotes of the Family Circle," which contains an account of the peculiar circumstances of Lady Scott's early life, diametrically opposite, in many important points, to that which Mr Lockhart has given; and yet minute, circumstantial, and wearing the appearance of an intimate knowledge of the facts. For example, Mr Lockhart states that he has never heard what post the father of Miss Charpentier—which gentleman he describes as "a devoted loyalist"—held in the service of the King of France. We find him described here as holding "the lucrative office of provider of post-horses to the royal family." We have no desire to go farther into this matter; but the book containing the scandal is published, but the other month, by respectable and extensive dealers, who, we believe, publish, among other things, the Messrs Chambers' widely-circulated Journal. It is, therefore, we submit, in every view, advisable for the biographer, if he would not have his silence misconstrued, at once to meet such glaring statements, and either to disprove or explain them. They will be talked of. Nothing in which Sir Walter Scott is concerned, however remotely, can, or ought to be forgotten; and there is wisdom and manliness in meeting every charge.

Mr Lockhart becomes almost poetical, in describing the personal charms of his mother-in-law, as she first appeared at Gilsland. Her lover's description is much more sober, and probably as correct. The love and the proposal must both have been rather hastier affairs than Miss Edgeworth might have approved; yet the letter which Scott addressed to his mother is exceedingly prudent. Scott had by this time been five years at the bar; his professional emoluments were very slender, though they had steadily improved, from £25, in the first year, to above £144, in the fifth—of which, however, £50 came from his father's office. Thus his prospects were not of the brightest. His father was now rendered unfit for business, by ill health—we believe by paralysis; and for some time the business of the office had been falling off. Scott's hasty marriage, in short—we hope it is no treason to say it—was the evident result of sudden admiration of a pretty and lively young woman, who had an income of £500 a-year. He writes, however, like a man of sense and principle.

I have been very explicit with her upon the nature of my expectations; and she thinks she can accommodate herself to the situation which I should wish her to hold in society as my wife, which, you will easily comprehend, I mean should neither be extravagant nor degrading. Her fortune, though partly dependent upon her brother, who is high in office at Madras, is very considerable—at present £500 a-year. This, however, we must, in some degree, regard as precarious—I mean to the full extent; and indeed when you know her you will not be surprised that I regard this circumstance chiefly because it removes those prudential considerations which would otherwise render our union impossible for the present. Betwixt her income and my own professional exertions, I have little doubt we will be enabled to hold the rank in society which my family and situation entitle me to fill.

He also gives his mother the most favourable account of the lady's temper, and of her serious and Protestant principles of religion. To Miss

* The name given to the cavalry by the boys of Edinburgh, in allusion to their war-steeds being supposed to be employed occasionally in the civic duty of drawing butter-milk carts to market. The last scour-the-causey affairs with military, have, we believe, been in consequence of the insulting cry of "Sourmilks!" raised as often as a solitary trooper appeared from the west, on his way to muster, by the impudent urchins of the Grassmarket or the High Street, who could defy and laugh at his gallant charge, by escaping into one or other of those numerous defiles impregnable to cavalry, called wynds and closes.

Christy Rutherford, in a subsequent letter, he says, after a modest preliminary flourish:—

Hem! Hem! It must come out at once—I am in a very fair way of being married to a very amiable young woman, with whom I formed an attachment in the course of my tour. She was born in France—her parents were of English extraction—the name Carpenter. . . . . Miss Carpenter is of age; but, as she lies under great obligations to the Marquis of Downshire, who was her guardian, she cannot take a step of such importance without his consent—and I daily expect his final answer upon the subject. Her fortune is dependent, in a great measure, upon an only and very affectionate brother. He is Commercial Resident at Salem in India, and has settled upon her an annuity of £500. . . . .

I may give you a hint that there is no romance in her composition; and that, though born in France, she has the sentiments and manners of an Englishwoman, and does not like to be thought otherwise. A very slight tinge in her pronunciation is all which marks the foreigner. She is at present at Carlisle, where I shall join her as soon as our arrangements are finally made. . . . . She is not a beauty, by any means; but her person and face are very engaging. She is a brunette—her manners are lively, but, when necessary, she can be very serious. She was baptized and educated a Protestant of the Church of England.

Mr Lockhart has seen fit to publish fully as many of the young lady's letters as were necessary; but not one of Scott's to her, which the world would have been as well pleased to receive. Miss Carpenter's letters display an innocent if somewhat frivolous mind, and a character not difficult to attach. According to the legend in the "Family Circle," alluded to above, the young lady had been sent to Cumberland to take her out of the way of some dangerous young admirer, to whom she had become attached, and whose addresses the Marquis of Downshire disapproved. There is an age at which some young ladies change their loves as easily as they do their sashes; and Miss Carpenter was probably indebted to her stars that, at this epoch, she fell in with Scott. One specimen of Miss Carpenter's love-letters we shall give; and we think it far the best of the series, though even in it our object is to shew Scott's imagination reflected in his mistress's pages.

"You have made me very triste all day. Pray never more complain of being poor. Are you not ten times richer than I am? Depend on yourself and your profession. I have no doubt you will rise very high, and be a great rich man, but we shall look down to be contented with our lot, and banish all disagreeable thoughts. We shall do very well. I am very sorry to hear you have such a bad head. I hope I shall nurse away all your aches. I think you write too much. When I am mistress I shall not allow it. How very angry I should be with you if you were to part with Lenore. Do you really believe I should think it an unnecessary expense where your health and pleasure can be concerned? I have a better opinion of you, and I am very glad you don't give up the cavalry, as I love anything that is stylish. Don't forget to find a stand for the old carriage, as I shall like to keep it, in case we should have to go any journey; it is so much more convenient than the post-chaises, and will do very well till we can keep our carriage. What an idea of yours was that to mention where you wish to have your bones laid! If you were married, I should think you were tired of me. A very pretty compliment before marriage. I hope sincerely that I shall not live to see that day.

At Christmas, they married, certainly upon a very slender acquaintance; but, probably, with a fair and increasable stock of mutual regard. They settled in Edinburgh, "in a house of their own;" and Mrs Scott was, we apprehend, quite as well received as, in those primitive days, any lady could expect to be, who, to the serious detriment of the carpet and clear-barred grate, sat in her drawing-room every day in the week; who was "passionately fond" of the theatre; and who, above all, was a foreigner in look, manners, dress, and accent. We have heard of a worthy Scotch lady who, when, in a similar case, pushed to specify the cause of a feeling which amounted to an unreasonable dislike, replied—"I have no fault to find wi' her; but she is no just like hereawa folk." If Mrs Walter Scott was, by the majority of the gentry of Edinburgh, considered "no just like hereawa folk," she found a kind welcome from the immediate circle of her husband's relatives and professional young friends, and also in his jovial companions of the Light Horse.

The officers of the Light Horse established a club among themselves, supping once a-week at each other's houses in rotation. The young lady thus found two somewhat different, but both highly agreeable, circles ready to receive her with cordial kindness; and the evening hours passed in a round of innocent gaiety, all the arrangements being conducted in a simple and inexpensive fashion, suitable to young people whose days were mostly laborious, and very few of their purses heavy.

In the following summer, Scott established himself in a cottage at Lasswade, which he continued to occupy for several years, during the recess of the Court. Here he became acquainted with the families of Melville and Buccleugh—a connexion which, together with his glowing and approved loyalty, and yeoman's service in the theatre, and in quelling divers Radical mobs by dint of his baton, had, we apprehend, fully as much influence in his subsequently obtaining the sheriffship of the Forest, as his great personal and professional merits, and the claims of his awakening genius.

Monk Lewis was now in the zenith of his fame; and an invitation from him to contribute to "The Tales of Wonder," filled Scott with elation and delight. He told Allan Cunningham, thirty years afterwards, that he never felt such elation as when the first live poet that he had ever seen—since, in his youth, he had beheld Burns—invited him, the future bard of "Marmion," to dine at his hotel.

Next spring, he visited London with his wife; and through Lewis saw such literary society as the latter frequented. The publication of his translation of "Goetz von Berlichengen" had harbingered his approach to these circles. For the copy-right he received twenty-five guineas—he who afterwards could write for fifty pounds in a long morning.

While Scott was in London he lost his father; but not till death had become a blessing. Mr Lockhart relates—

When the first "Chronicles of the Canongate" appeared, a near relation of the family said to me—"I had been out of Scotland for some time, and did not know of my good friend's illness, until I reached Edinburgh, a few months before his death. Walter carried me to visit him; and warned me that I should see a great change. I saw the very scene that is here painted of the elder Croftangry's sickroom:—not a feature different—poor Anne Scott, the gentlest of creatures, was treated by the fretful patient precisely like this niece."

I have lived to see [says Lockhart] the curtain rise and fall once more on a like scene."

It was now that Scott, in good earnest, set about laying deep and broad the foundations of his fame. His ballads of "Glenfinlas," "The Eve of St John," and "The Grey Brother," were written; and he at once took his true place among the immortals. By this time, the materials of the Border Minstrelsy were nearly collected; for in John Leyden he had found a potent auxiliary, to whom his obligations have, we think, never yet been adequately appreciated. Mr Lockhart means, we presume, to be just, if not complimentary, to Leyden, "the poor student;" who was, however, quite as rich a student as are one half of all the Scottish students of divinity of his time, or of this time. We also venture to think that Leyden's obligations to the patronage of Scott are either altogether misunderstood by Mr Lockhart, or marvellously overrated. What Mr Lockhart terms "these new friendships" of Leyden's might have done his heart and his intellect much good; but they made no change whatever on his views or position. Mr Lockhart must have been very inadequately informed about the person he so strangely describes. As a literary character, Leyden was, in point of fact, on their first acquaintance, more distinguished in Edinburgh than Scott. He was the right arm of Constable, and the subsequent manager of the chief periodical then published in Scotland. He was on the eve of being licensed as a preacher of the Kirk, which in 1800 he became; and he had lived for three or four years before he could have known Scott, in the family of Mr Campbell of Fairfield, as the tutor of his sons, and been introduced to Lady Charlotte Campbell and the Duchess of Gordon—what honours these were then!—and to whatever of fair and gay the northern metropolis boasted, that could flatter a young poet's vanity, or stimulate his ambition.

He had lived in intimate intercourse with the blue coterie of Dr Robert Anderson, and he was the familiar friend and guest of Dr Thomas Brown and his amiable sisters. Among his associates were Thomas Campbell; and, if the learned professors of the University of St Andrew's may be deemed good society, then he enjoyed it to satiety during his attendance there with his pupils. We have, indeed, seldom seen so many inaccuracies in one paragraph as the Editor of the Quarterly Review—meaning all the while to be graciously condescending, and a little humorous withal—has crowded together respecting the true character, or at least the manners and position of John Leyden. The scene of the following remarks is Constable's shop, into which Heber often dived, to glean materials for the Border Minstrelsy—that work which, in its present form, Scotland owes almost as much to Leyden as to Scott. It is said that Heber, attracted by volumes of antiquarian lore, frequented this place—

And observed with some curiosity the barbarous aspect and gestures of another daily visitant, who came not to purchase evidently, but to pore over the more recondite articles of the collection—often balanced for hours on a ladder with a folio in his hand, like Dominie Sampson. The English virtuoso was on the look-out for any books or MSS. that might be of use to the editor of the projected "Minstrelsy," and some casual colloquy led to the discovery that this unshorn stranger was, amidst the endless labyrinth of his lore, a master of legend and tradition—an enthusiastic collector and most skilful expounder of these very Border ballads in particular. Scott heard with much interest Heber's account of his odd acquaintance, and found, when introduced, the person whose initials, affixed to a series of pieces in verse, chiefly translations from Greek, Latin, and the northern languages, scattered, during the last three or four years, over the pages of the "Edinburgh Magazine," had often much excited his curiosity, as various indications pointed out the Scotch Border for the native district of this unknown "J. L."

These new friendships led to a great change in Leyden's position, purposes, and prospects. He was presently received into the best society of Edinburgh, where his strange, wild uncouthness of demeanour does not seem to have at all interfered with the general appreciation of his genius, his gigantic endowments, and really amiable virtues.

Who, we beg to know, that ever enjoyed his acquaintance, could, in this "unshorn stranger," "balanced for hours on a ladder like Dominie Sampson"—this person of "wild and uncouth demeanour"—recognise John Leyden? and, in him, a person whose "position, prospects, and purposes" all underwent an extraordinary revolution, in consequence of "these new friendships?" Mr Lockhart labours here under gross misconception. With more than the talents and ardour for knowledge which he has ascribed to this prematurely-lost and deeply-regretted individual, we will aver that if any man with the manners, appearance, and feelings of a gentleman, was then to be found among the native Borderers, John Leyden was one. Many persons in Scotland must remember him well—and to those we appeal. We can assure Sir Walter's biographer that this uncouth personage was an exceedingly gentlemanly-looking scholar; some years younger than Scott; always well, or at least neatly dressed; and never abroad in "corduroy drinking breeches," nor "portentous" woollen night-caps. His tones might, indeed, in his fits of enthusiasm, become a little more obstreperous than the whispers of a modern English drawing-room—and small etiquettes he despised; but he was anything but the grotesque and uncouth-looking learned monster which he is here pictured. Mr Lockhart has contrived to mould a handsome youthful Hercules out of Sir Walter Scott in his early manhood—at which season, "a lady of high rank said, 'Walter Scott was a comely creature.'" We once heard a fiddler, in a patronizing tone, call him "that good creature Scott;"—but it would have been much easier for ordinary spectators to find an Apollo in Leyden, who is painted as a half-civilized satyr, or wild man of the moors. The pecuniary debt of Leyden to Sir Walter Scott, it is not easy to understand. The former, in leaving England for India, writes:—"My money concerns I shall consider you as trustee of; and all remittances, as well as dividends from Longman, will be to your direction. These, I hope, we shall soon be able to adjust very accurately. Money may be paid, but kindness never."

Leyden was certainly well entitled to his own share of whatever the Border Minstrelsy, for which he had laboured so hard, might produce, which we accidentally learn was £600. At his lamented and premature death, he left not only sufficient funds to pay all his just debts, but to form a little independence for his aged parents. Of Leyden's relatives, Scott was the kind friend; but the world was not aware till now that he lies under heavy pecuniary obligations to Sir Walter, which, if not explicitly stated, is certainly left to be inferred from Mr Lockhart's vague statements.

By this time, James Ballantyne, who had for some years conducted a newspaper in Kelso, settled in Edinburgh, on the suggestion of Scott, as a printer, and produced the well-known editions of "The Border Press." The "Minstrelsy" had appeared, well heralded; and Scott had added to his memorable friends and acquaintances, Mr Ellis, Miss Seward, Lady Charlotte Campbell, and that Lady Ann Hamilton to whom he dedicates his ballad of "Cadzow Castle," and who will ever be remembered with honour, for her heroic fidelity to her unfortunate mistress, Queen Caroline. The "Lay of the Last Minstrel" was next commenced; and had well-nigh been strangled in the birth, by the coldness of his fastidious friends, Erskine and Cranstoun. Happily he soon learned to have more confidence in himself.

But this article, like the volume, begins to drag; and we pass at once to what remains of interest in its comprehensive contents.

It was in the autumn of 1803 that Scott first saw Wordsworth:—

Mr and Miss Wordsworth had just completed that tour in the Highlands of which so many incidents have since been immortalized, both in the poet's verse and in the hardly less poetical prose of his sister's Diary. On the morning of the 17th September, having left their carriage at Rosslyn, they walked down the valley to Lasswade, and arrived there before Mr and Mrs Scott had risen. "We were received," Mr Wordsworth has told me, "with that frank cordiality which, under whatever circumstances I afterwards met him, always marked his manners; and, indeed, I found him then in every respect—except, perhaps, that his animal spirits were somewhat higher—precisely the same man that you knew him in later life; the same lively, entertaining conversation, full of anecdote, and averse from disquisition; the same unaffected modesty about himself; the same cheerful and benevolent and hopeful views of man and the world. He partly read and partly recited, sometimes in an enthusiastic style of chant, the first four cantos of the Lay of the Last Minstrel; and the novelty of the manners, the clear picturesque descriptions, and the easy glowing energy of much of the verse, greatly delighted me."

After this he walked with the tourists to Rosslyn, and promised to meet them in two days at Melrose.

. . . . . .

He met them at Melrose on the 19th, and escorted them through the Abbey, pointing out all its beauties, and pouring out his rich stores of history and tradition. They then dined and spent the evening together at the inn; but Miss Wordsworth observed that there was some difficulty about arranging matters for the night, "the landlady refusing to settle anything until she had ascertained from the Sheriff himself that he had no objection to sleep in the same room with William." Scott was thus far on his way to the Circuit Court at Jedburgh, in his capacity of Sheriff, and there his new friends again joined him; but he begged that they would not enter the court; "for," said he, "I really would not like you to see the sort of figure I cut there." They did see him casually, however, in his cocked hat and sword, marching in the Judge's procession to the sound of one cracked trumpet, and were then not surprised that he should have been a little ashamed of the whole ceremonial. He introduced to them his friend William Laidlaw, who was attending the court as a juryman, and who, having read some of Wordsworth's verses in a newspaper, was exceedingly anxious to be of the party, when they explored at leisure, all the law-business being over, the beautiful valley of the Jed, and the ruins of the Castle of Fernieherst, the original fastness of the noble family of Lothian.

From Hawick, where they spent the night, he led them next morning to the brow of a hill, from which they could see a wide range of the Border mountains, Ruberslaw, the Carter, and the Cheviots; and lamented that neither their engagements nor his own would permit them to make at this time an excursion into the wilder glens of Liddesdale, "where," said he, "I have strolled so often and so long, that I may say I have a home in every farm-house." "And, indeed," adds Mr Wordsworth, "wherever we went with him, he seemed to know everybody, and everybody to know and like him." Here they parted—the Wordsworths to pursue their journey homeward by Eskdale—he to return to Lasswade. . . . . Scott spoke of his profession as if he had already given up almost all hope of rising by it; and some allusion being made to its profits, observed that "he was sure he could, if he chose, get more money than he should ever wish to have from the booksellers."

On reaching his home—then the cottage which afterwards became De Quincey's abode—Wordsworth wrote an account of their journey, after parting with their new friend:—

We reached our little cottage in high spirits, and thankful to God for all his bounties. My wife and child were both well, and, as I need not say, we had all of us a happy meeting. . . . . We passed Branxholme—your Branxholme, we supposed—about four miles on this side of Hawick. It looks better in your poem than in its present realities. The situation, however, is delightful, and makes amends for an ordinary mansion. The whole of the Teviot and the pastoral steeps about Mosspaul pleased us exceedingly. The Esk below Langholm is a delicious river, and we saw it to great advantage. We did not omit noticing Johnnie Armstrong's keep; but his hanging place, to our great regret, we missed. We were, indeed, most truly sorry that we could not have you along with us into Westmoreland. The country was in its full glory—the verdure of the valleys, in which we are so much superior to you in Scotland, but little tarnished by the weather, and the trees putting on their most beautiful looks. My sister was quite enchanted, and we often said to each other, "What a pity Mr Scott is not with us!" . . . I had the pleasure of seeing Coleridge and Southey at Keswick last Sunday. Southey, whom I never saw much of before, I liked much: he is very pleasant in his manner, and a man of great reading in old books, poetry, chronicles, memoirs, &c. &c., particularly Spanish and Portuguese.

The Etterick Shepherd comes next upon the carpet; and we do not think he is too kindly treated, though Mr Lockhart has wisely dropped the indignant tone he at one time assumed in relation to a man whom he ought to have understood too thoroughly to indulge in anger against him. The following story, like many of those in this volume, has often been told and even published before, but it is necessary to repeat it, in order to introduce James's anecdotes :—

The next time that Hogg's business carried him to Edinburgh, he waited upon Scott, who invited him to dinner in Castle Street, in company with William Laidlaw, who happened also to be in town, and some other admirers of the rustic genius. When Hogg entered the drawingroom, Mrs Scott, being at the time in a delicate state of health, was reclining on a sofa. The Shepherd, after being presented, and making his best bow, forthwith took possession of another sofa placed opposite to hers, and stretched himself thereupon at all his length; for, as he said afterwards, "I thought I could never do wrong to copy the lady of the house." As his dress at this period was precisely that in which any ordinary herdsman attends cattle to the market, and as his hands, moreover, bore most legible marks of a recent sheep-smearing, the lady of the house did not observe with perfect equanimity the novel usage to which her chintz was exposed. The Shepherd, however, remarked nothing of all this—dined heartily and drank freely, and, by jest, anecdote, and song, afforded plentiful merriment to the more civilized part of the company. As the liquor operated, his familiarity increased and strengthened; from "Mr Scott," he advanced to "Sherra," and thence to "Scott," "Walter," and "Wattie"—until, at supper, he fairly convulsed the whole party by addressing Mrs Scott as "Charlotte."

Shortly afterwards, Hogg wrote—

I am afraid that I was at least half-seas over the night I was with you, for I cannot, for my life, recollect what passed when it was late; and there being certainly a small vacuum in my brain, which, when empty, is quite empty, but is sometimes supplied with a small distillation of intellectual matter—this must have been empty that night, or it never could have been taken possession of by the fumes of the liquor so easily. If I was in the state in which I suspect that I was, I must have spoke a very great deal of nonsense, for which I beg ten thousand pardons. I have the consolation, however, of remembering that Mrs Scott kept in company all or most of the time, which she certainly could not have done had I been very rude. I remember, too, of the filial injunction you gave at parting, cautioning me against being ensnared by the loose women in town. I am sure I had not reason enough left at that time to express either the half of my gratitude for the kind hint, or the utter abhorrence I inherit at those seminaries of lewdness. . . . . .

James was an exceeding admirer of Lady Scott, whom her husband had described to him as "as brown as a blackberry," but whom when he first saw her he found divine. His description, which could not be admitted into Mr Lockhart's filial and decorous pages, is graphic and diverting :—

I found her quite affable, and she spoke English very well, save that she put always the d for the th, and left the aspiration of the h out altogether. She called me all her life Mr Og. I understood perfectly well what she said, but, for many years, I could not make her understand what I said; she had frequently to ask an explanation from her husband, and I must say this of Lady Scott, though it was well known how jealous she was of the rank of Sir Walter's visiters, yet I was all my life received with the same kindness as if I had been a relation or one of the family, although one of his most homely daily associates. But there were many others, both poets, and play-actors, whom she received with no very pleasant countenance. Jeffrey and his satellites she could not endure; and there was none whom she disliked more than Brougham, for what reason I do not know, but I have heard her misca' him terribly, as well as "dat body Jeffrey."

Hogg never could divest himself of the belief that Scott was a little jealous of the extraordinary genius of the author of "Bonny Kilmeny," and "The Witch of Fife," &c. &c.; nor could he comprehend the churlishness which made Sir Walter always decline being his editor. Neither would Sir Walter sanction James's scheme "of trusting an edition of my prose tales, in twenty volumes, to Lockhart's editing." This was in Sir Walter's last sad days; and when he was bowed down in body, and sorrowfully bruised in mind. "The Whig ascendancy in the British Cabinet, killed Sir Walter," says Hogg; and perhaps so slight a thing might add to his private griefs and mortifications, though no man, save, perhaps, a fallen minister, ever yet died of a government. Their last interview took place in Yarrow, and on the wayside, where Sir Walter had made a tryst with the Shepherd, as he passed from Drumlanrig to Abbotsford. The last interview between two persons, each in his own way so remarkable, is described by Hogg with true feeling.

The last time that I saw his loved and honoured face, was at the little inn on my own farm, in the autumn of 1830. I waited at the inn, and handed him out of the carriage. His daughter was with him, but we left her at the inn, and walked slowly down the way as far as Mountbenger-Burn. He then walked very ill indeed, for the weak limb had become almost completely useless, but he leaned on my shoulder all the way, and did me the honour of saying that he never leaned on a firmer or a surer.

We talked of many things, past, present, and to come, but both his memory and onward calculation appeared to me then to be considerably decayed. I cannot tell what it was, but there was something in his manner that distressed me. He often changed the subject very abruptly, and never laughed. He expressed the deepest concern for my welfare and success in life, more than I had ever heard him do before, and all mixed with sorrow for my worldly misfortunes. There is little doubt that his own were then preying on his vitals.

With deep reluctance we turn from this fascinating record, of by far the most interesting and important portion of Sir Walter Scott's existence—those years, lying between the child on the braes of Sandy-Knowe, and the man entering on that triumphant and matchless literary career, upon which he is about to start as the book closes. From the forthcoming volumes, and especially from the concluding one, we anticipate much pleasure and instruction; but what remains that can at all approach his own reminiscences, and Lockhart's narrative of his childhood, and of his school-day life, and of those years of romantic and adventurous youth, before the spirit of the world had breathed upon the freshness of the heart. The period of this precious volume was the era of those young hopes, which, in their flattering promise, far surpassed the realizations of his most aspiring dreams—the season of his loves, and of whatever was most vital and endearing in his friendships; it also chronicles those long years of busy days and studious nights, in which, in Mr Shortreed's homely and emphatic phrase, "he was makin' himsel."

THE BEGGAR'S WALLET.—NO. IX.

NEIGHBOUR GRAY AND HER DAUGHTER.

Among the vestiges of Papistry still perceptible in England, is the dedication of every town and village to some patron saint. This latent influence of a "creed outworn," assumes, however, a very harmless shape; even that of fixing the epochs of fairs and feasts—of fairs which tend to the annual or bi-annual recreation of our towns, and of feasts which serve to gather together, once a year, the scattered tribes of our villages. Neither France nor Belgium is more punctilious in keeping up the fêtes, ducasses, and kermesses of its hamlets and villages, than the northern districts of England!

It was at Falkstone Feast that the simple heart of Mary Gray became very unexpectedly exposed to the seductions of a London suitor. Falkstone is a pretty village on the confines of Nottinghamshire, which, every November—just as its soil becomes glutinized into the consistency of pitch, and the little brook by which it is traversed swells so as to render the lower grounds impassable—rewards itself for the arrival of winter and typhus fever, by celebrating its annual feast, dedicated, in the olden time, as well as its parish church, to the cloak-rending saint, St Martin; and solemnized, in latter times, with considerable slaughter of fatted calves, and a massacre of half the fowls and turkeys of the barnyards of the neighbourhood. Every 11th of November down come flitches and hams from housewifely chimneys; barrels of strong beer are broached in the richer farms; long-hoarded and long-bearded bottles of currant or cowslip wine are brought forth; a glorious confusion of pork-pies and apple-pies steams in the oven; and scarce a hut or hovel in Falkstone so wanting in means or public spirit as not to shew a well-scoured deal table covered with some sort of cheer, from the well-spiced round of pressed beef, down to a barley-loaf and angle of pale-faced Derby cheese—in order to welcome from afar the kinsfolk and acquaintance, the hundredth cousins or neighbours' children, who repair, for the annual renewal of such associations, to the clayey parish, constituting what is called their "native soil." The custom is as good as it is old. Patriotism is the natural growth of such attachments. As the abounding river is fed by tributary streamlets, love of parish, county, country, form an inevitable gradation of virtue.

Twenty years ago, Falkstone was so fortunate as to boast of four Tritons among its fifteen hundred minnows. The manor was let off in small farms; none of the inhabitants were very wealthy, none of them very poor, and, consequently, as few of them subject to the pangs of envy as the infirmities of human nature would allow. The homely old church boasted not a single pew whose hassocks were covered with a nobler tissue than rush matting; and, excepting one very severe winter, not a Christian was known to have died of want in the place. This, considering that the rector was a non-resident, and that Falkstone boasted no squire's family, to parade its Christmas dole of coals and blankets, is as much as can be expected of any decent parish of modern times.

Among the poorest inhabitants was a widow-woman known by the name of Neighbour Gray. "Neighbour," by the way, is a title of honour peculiarly characteristic of village life. Stiff-necked Grosvenor Square disdains the bonds of neighbourship; and, even in country towns, people are beginning to ignore the existence of the tie derivable a century ago from similar propinquities. But in places such as Falkstone, a neighbour (in the worldly as well as the Christian sense of the word) still implies one who is to be loved as thyself; one who has a claim for succour and support; one whose sheep you are to assist in pulling out of a ditch; whose sicknesses you are to aid in nursing, and whose offspring you are to save from oppression. In Falkstone, after slaving all day in the harvest-field, you would be expected to sit up at night with a sick "neighbour," who had none other to "do for her;" just as, in Grosvenor Square, it would be a breach of politeness even to inquire after the health of a dying next-door neighbour, on whose visiting-list your name has not been previously inscribed—so officious an act exposing you to the opprobrious suspicion of trying to pick up an acquaintance with the inmates.

Neighbour Gray, to her honour be it spoken, had never been known at Falkstone under any other denomination: she was neither Mrs Gray in her husband's lifetime, nor Widow Gray after his decease; nor was even old age and misery likely to reduce her to the ignominy of "Goody"—for she was a friendly, serviceable woman, who had done much to merit her distinction, having acquired as much popularity by the kind-hearted activity with which she lent a hand at a neighbour's baking, brewing, washing, or scrubbing, as ever was obtained by the dinners of a noble lord, boasting a French cook with a salary doubling that of the curate of Falkstone. Neighbour Gray was, accordingly, a very happy woman. She lay down to rest every night, rich in the good-will of every soul to whom her name was familiar.

Of her two children, Dick, the elder, had died in his apprenticeship, while Mary lived with her mother—a pretty, delicate girl, too pretty and too delicate for the stirring duties likely to fall to her lot; for hard service was the only prospect of Mary Gray. In order to lay by something for her mother's old age, (who, as a poor widow disdaining parish aid, had been able to lay by nothing for herself,) Mary must inevitably look out for a place as soon as she should attain her seventeenth year, and some degree of strength and self-reliance. But Mary had no means of reaching London, where her prettiness and gentility might pass for qualifications; and the farmers' wives had little mind to engage a poor slip of a girl, who looked as if she had scarcely strength to turn a mangle or handle a churn. For the sake of Neighbour Gray, who had been so good a charwoman in her time, they gave her daughter what employment they could in needlework; but Mary was able to earn little more than her day's food; and this was the more lamentable, because her mother was shewing symptoms of infirmity. A clay floor in a damp village, and hard labour fourteen hours a-day, are as apt to bring on premature old age as the enervation of hot rooms and fashionable vigils; and want of sufficient nourishment is as hard a pull upon the constitution as those evil results which the President of the College of Physicians denounces to the lordly epicure his patient, from a course of turtle and venison. Mary saw that her mother would soon need her assistance, and promised herself that, at the next statute, she would certainly attempt to put herself forward in life.

Previous, however, to the statute, unluckily came Falkstone Feast; and Neighbour Gray having been engaged to aid in the grand preparations at Welland's farm, was invited to bring her daughter, and share in the general entertainment during the three days of the Feast. Open house was kept; and, on the third night, the festivities were to end with a supper and dance in Farmer Welland's barn, at which nearly all the inhabitants of Falkstone were to be present. Neighbour Gray figured, for that night only, in the gown of gay glazed calico in which, every feast since her wedding-day, she had made her annual appearance; and Mary thought herself almost too fine in a new stuff gown, spun by the hands of her mother, and sewed by her own. Both were very happy. Mary's eyes were bright with girlish joyousness, and her usually pale cheeks flushed with the excitement of the season; while Neighbour Gray was sufficiently happy in hearing from so many old friends, become strangers by long absence from the village, what a pretty lass little Mary had turned out, and by knowing that most of the guests gathered together at Falkstone, pronounced her daughter to be the queen of the village. Nor were Mary's ears less attentive than those of her mother. Admiration flushed her cheek to a yet brighter blush, and lighted up a still more brilliant sparkle in her eyes; and when she found herself chosen as a partner for the opening of the ball, by "a young gentleman from Lon'on, visiting at the farm"—an object of contention to all the coquettes of the village—poor Mary smiled a smile well worthy of a London beauty.

William Harding, the young gentleman from London, having visited Falkstone in company with the young nephew of old Welland, and heir to his property, seemed to consider it his duty to make up in courtesy and vivacity for the taciturn reserve of Frank Welland; who was what is called in England, among the great, high; among the little, odd-tempered; and what ought to be called, among great, little, and middle-sized, shy. Shyness is in fact one of the most prevalent national peculiarities of our countrymen; taking various shapes, according to station and estate, but insuring the common consequence of rendering the sufferer an object of dislike instead of commiseration. Frank Welland, even in his native village, passed for a disagreeable, sulky young man; while William Harding was voted, by general acclamation, a good fellow, before he had been four-and-twenty hours in the place. He sang a good song, told a good story; and, when he stood up to dance with Mary, they made as pretty a couple as had ever been seen in Falkstone. It was only Neighbour Gray (who had been present at Frank Welland's birth, and helped to lay his parents in the grave) who inclined in favour of the stern, sullen, hard-featured youth, who stood silently looking on, disdaining to join in the dance—some said, because he was too proud, some, because he was too good, but, in reality, because he was too shy.

William Harding, meanwhile, was not only free from any such infirmity; but the necessity of making from an early age his own way in the world, had impressed upon his mind the conviction that popularity is one of the stepping-stones to advancement. He had not naturally a bad disposition; but, without parents to turn his good ones to account, the germs withered for want of sunshine. Reared by the family of a distant relation, to which he was a burthen, William Harding grew up prudent instead of virtuous. Character, not excellence, was his aim in life; and, just as he saw his cousin, the Cheapside mercer, insist upon the advantage of a good surface to his silks and satins, as an equally vendible quality with the more costly one of solid consistency, William came to regard reputation as the one thing needful, both in public and private life. Some people talk, in all awkward emergencies, of "putting a good face on the matter;" William Harding's course consisted in putting a good face upon life.

It was perhaps the unpopularity of his friend Frank Welland (who officiated, first as clerk, and next as junior partner, in a small house of business adjoining the large one of his own wealthy relative) which first roused his attention to the prudence of being agreeable; and all that Neighbour Gray performed at Falkstone, out of the abundance of her warm feelings and Christian principles, was done in Cheapside by William Harding as a matter of calculation. He had computed the per centage likely to be returned by his good offices; and proved so adroit a moral arithmetician, that even his cheery fortnight at Welland's farm was the repayment of his attentions to Frank during a long illness the preceding winter. Even by the relations by whom, as an awkward boy, he had been disliked as a burthen, he contrived, between fifteen and twenty, to render himself beloved. He was so useful, so civil, so attentive. It was the fate of he rich mercer to outlive his children, with the exception of one puny daughter; and already it was predicted in the city, that old Harding would eventually bestow Sophia and her fortune upon the kinsman who was so useful to him in his business, and so comfortable to him in his domestic life; or, if the young lady chose otherwise, that the business in Cheapside, at least, would descend to William Harding. At present, however, he was still on probation. Sophy was only sixteen, and William, at four-and-twenty, still a shopman with a good salary. He might be discarded on the morrow, as easily as promoted to be the son-in-law of his master.

Such was the state of things at the period of his visit to Welland's farm. Even that visit, much as he seemed to enjoy it, was a matter of calculation. William thought his relation slow in pressing his advancement; and, fancying that old Harding, from whose side, for ten years past, he had never been separated half as many days, might be stimulated by his absence to a higher appreciation of his utility, humbly requested leave to accompany his bosom friend, Frank Welland, into Notts.

"Why, what can Frank Welland be wanting to leave town for, at this stirring season, just as the winter orders are coming in?" demanded the matter-of-fact mercer of Cheapside.

"He is going, sir, to visit the uncle who brought him up."

The mercer sneered.

"The uncle, sir, whose property is coming to him."

"Ay, ay?—and why does he choose such a time of year as this? Why can't he go, pray, in August or September, when town's thin and business slack?"

"Falkstone Feast, it seems, sir, takes place at Martinmas; when it is the custom of the country for the families of the place to meet together."

"And do you belong to one of the families of the place?"

"Frank Welland is desirous to make me known to his. There will be a great deal of merry-making going forward; and, as you have always thought well of Frank, sir, and expressed yourself willing that we should be friends together, I consider the opportunity a good one, to afford myself a little recreation."

"Recreation in a farm house in a rainy November! Pretty recreation! Pretty moment for the country! There hasn't been a leaf on the tree in St Paul's Churchyard this fortnight past."

"Certainly, sir, if you cannot spare me," rejoined William, "I shall not think of pressing my request."

"If you want amusement, why can't you go to the playhouses?" remonstrated old Harding. "I'm sure you seemed gay enough, t'other night, at the club."

"A little change of air and scene," William began.

"Oh, go!—go if you like. I don't want to hinder you," replied old Harding, testily. "If you find pleasure in the company of that sulky young fellow, Frank Welland, I wish you joy of your taste. Your cousin Sophy will be home from school in six weeks, and then"——

"I shall be back, sir, in less than two," interrupted William; "and, if my going is likely to be the least inconvenience to the business, I shall be most happy to give up the excursion altogether."

"Inconvenience! Why, what have Clark and Wilkinson to do but attend to their duties? Wilkinson is the steadiest young man that ever entered my shop; and no one better understands his business than Clark. No! make the best of your way to Falkstone Feast, and let me hear no more about the matter."

William was now almost inclined to withdraw his petition. But it was too late. The old gentleman insisted that he should go; and the young one could only hope that his kinsman was finessing as well as himself; and that, instead of according his confidence to the smug, smooth, demure Gabriel Wilkinson, he would become hourly more sensible of the loss of a relative to whom alone, of all the house, he accorded unlimited confidence.

To Falkstone, therefore, the two young men repaired by the night coach; and, though William Harding had not been sufficiently misled by the rhapsodies of his usually silent and reserved companion, to expect great things of the village and farm, which were home to Frank, he was careful not to betray to those who welcomed him so warmly, his amazement, that persons in their right minds could prefer living in a place whose ways were so miry, and whose homesteads so mean. William, at heart a pure Cockney, languished after the wide pavements and radiant gas of Cheapside. He could not comprehend the hearty shake of the hand bestowed by Frank Welland upon Neighbour Gray. Neighbour Gray appeared to him only a foolish old charwoman: the only thing he saw to admire in her was a calimanco petticoat of a peculiar quality—"a stuff that had been out of make in the trade for the last twenty years."

The nature of the country-bred youth soon broke out in Frank; and, the day following his arrival, he was out with his uncle in a survey of the farm; and the day following, (as the hounds met within four miles' distance,) mounted a favourite mare bred on the farm, and was not at home again till some hours after dark. But William Harding displayed no similar propensities. William loitered with the lasses about the village, entering into the sports and gossipings of the place; and, in eight and forty hours, had completely established his popularity among those who, in spite of the commendations of Farmer Welland and Neighbour Gray, persisted in considering Master Frank as a very unked young gentleman, who did little honour to his London breeding. They saw too much of sportsmen to care for his manliness, and too little of fine gentlemen to regard the courteous deportment of William Harding as anything short of the pink of the London mode.

The young men were to spend ten days at Falkstone; the first week of which was chiefly engrossed by the hospitalities of the Feast. The last three days were passed by Frank in visiting and bidding adieu to his various kinsfolk; and it was on the day preceding their departure—which they had agreed to devote to a walk across the country, to dine at the house of a young farmer, with whom, during the recent festivities, they had formed a friendship—that Frank, so taciturn in company, began suddenly to wax garrulous in descanting on his future prospects.

"If my uncle would but make up his mind to bring matters between us to a settlement," cried he. "Like most old people, he likes to keep a hard grip on his property to the last minute, and a close tongue concerning his intentions of disposing of it. As far as he has ever told me, the £800 laid out to establish me in business, is all I am to expect from him; but, as he has no relations but myself, I am pretty sure of coming into what he has to leave."

"Of course—to be sure," replied William, whose thoughts were elsewhere; "and, as you are getting on so well in life, you can afford to wait."

"No, I can't," was the blunt reply of Frank. "I want to get away from London altogether."

"Away from London! Why, I thought that, when old Grimstone died, you were to come into the whole business?"

"And so I am. But I care nothing for the business."

"Nothing for the business! Didn't you tell me that, last year, it returned you seventeen per cent., and that you have a year's orders before you?"

"Eighteen! But what is that to the purpose? I hate London—I have always hated it; and now the prospect of returning there makes me detest it more than ever."

"You surprise me!" cried his companion. "Independent as you are"——

"I am not independent, since my uncle insists upon my sticking to business," replied Frank. "My uncle gave me a good country education, brought me up with country tastes and habits; and when everybody at Falkstone thought he was going to settle me at home, to assist and succeed him in the farm, as my father would have done had he survived, he bundles me off to London, and plants me behind a counter—a thing that, by nature, I was never made for."

"He wanted you, perhaps, to see something of life?"

"He wanted to get me out of the way. The old gentleman likes to be master at home; and, when I rebelled against being driven off to town like a beast to Smithfield market, told me outright he would not have a grown-up nephew shoving him out of his place before his time; and that he did not mean to take off his shoes till he went to bed."

"Well, if you make sure of having the shoes when he does go to bed, you ought to be satisfied."

"And so I would. God knows I don't want to deprive the old gentleman of an inch of his property; but, if I am to earn my inheritance by slaving away the best of my days in the smother and noise of the city, I'd rather be a day-labourer at Falkstone."

William Harding looked with a smile of pity upon the innate rustic, so little deserving his prospects of preferment.

"My uncle may live these ten, these fifteen years!" cried Frank, striking his stick harder on the ground as they trudged on. "It is not for me, to whom he has been so kind a friend, to wish his days shortened."

"The farmer is ten years older than my cousin Harding," observed William, musingly; "yet, you see, I do not grumble—I am satisfied to wait."

"To be sure you are—because you will marry your cousin Sophy, live according to your own likings in London, and devote yourself to improve a business which you know will one day be your own; while I am not only constrained to a way of life I abhor, but, when the time arrives that is to make me my own master, Mary Gray will be an old woman, or, perhaps, availing herself of my absence, be married to another."

It had need of all William Harding's self-command to prevent his stopping short and fixing his eyes on the face of his companion, as he exclaimed—"Mary Gray! Are you engaged then to marry Mary Gray?"

"We are not even what is called sweethearts," replied Frank, with perfect composure. "When I was last at Falkstone, the girl was but fifteen; and, though I then made a vow to myself that none but she whom I had danced on my knee as a child should be my wife, I knew it would anger my uncle even to hint at such a thing. And so things remain as they were."

"But you know yourself, at least, to be as sure of Mary's affections as you are of old Welland's property."

"I used to think so. Neighbour Gray loves me as a son of her own; and it was but natural that Mary should grow up with a liking for her old playmate. But, out of sight, out of mind. Since I have been here this time, I fancy I notice a change in Mary's manner; and, though I can't make out that any one has been courting her during my absence, (such a mild, delicate creature as it is, the young fellows hereabouts seem afraid she would not make enough of a housewife for them; for, in truth, Mary is not strong enough to do much in a family,) still, I can see that I am not so great a favourite as I used to be."

"Perhaps her mother may have doubts about your being in earnest, and have warned the girl to be on her guard," said William, in a confused manner.

"In earnest!—on her guard!" reiterated Frank. "You don't know Neighbour Gray. There's not a thought of evil or guile in that woman's mind. She's above any such manœuvring notions. If Mary has grown cold, it is because she likes me less than she used; or, perhaps, she hates the thoughts of a town life as much as I do, and is afraid I might be wanting to marry her at once, and carry her away from her mother."

"I am told she is likely to leave Falkstone without any such interference," observed William, carelessly; "Mrs Gray, it seems, is in bad circumstances."

"Neighbour Gray," amended Frank.

"And Mary is going out to service in a month or two."

"Mary going out to service! Who told you so?"

"It is the common talk of the farm; so that I should think a settlement in life as the wife of an honest man in a good business"——

"Yes; but you know that I cannot make her the wife of an honest man in a good business. Were I to talk of marrying Neighbour Gray's daughter, my uncle would cut me off with a shilling; and what would then become of my mother and sister, whom, you know, it is my duty and happiness to support?"

"Well, well, I meant no offence," replied William. "For my part, I think you have no call to think of marrying for the next ten years, when you will be free to follow your own fancies; and, after all, Mary Gray will be but seven and twenty."

Nevertheless, before the actual departure of the young men from Falkstone, Frank did think it necessary to come to some explanation with the object of his affections. William Harding met them entering together the farm, from the garden, where Mary had been sent to gather herbs by her mother, and where young Welland had made himself so thoroughly understood that Mary was forced to speak as plainly as himself. So far from accepting his offer of such pecuniary assistance to her mother as would prevent the necessity of her going out to service, till the death of old Welland should enable him to make the daughter his wife and the mother his inmate, Mary assured him that Neighbour Gray would disdain being indebted for support to any but her own or her daughter's industry; and that, were he already in possession of Welland's farm, she should decline to become its mistress and his wife.

Frank was not nettled by this declaration—he was deeply hurt; too much hurt, indeed, to confess to his friend and confidant how much he had hazarded, and how much in vain. Once, when, in the course of their journey back to town, William attempted to advert to Neighbour Gray and Mary, Frank replied so abruptly that he had given up all thoughts of her, that there was no possibility of pushing the question.

Meanwhile, William had laid his plans so cunningly as to insure the warmest reception from Harding of Cheapside. He knew that, were the old gentleman apprized of the day of his arrival, he would get up an air of indifference, to prevent the young truant from fancying himself of too much consequence. But, by arriving unexpectedly one evening after tea, when the old gentleman was wearying after his usual antagonist for his usual game at cribbage, he was sure of being received with open arms as "long looked for come at last." In another month, cousin Sophy was at home; and, in the diversions of the holidays—twelfth-cake, parties, balls, and pantomimes—enjoyed with the father and cousin, Falkstone appeared to be forgotten.

Time passed on. It was noticed by Clark and Wilkinson, and other small observers, to whom the proceedings of William Harding afforded a matter of interest, that, from the period of their return from Falkstone Feast, the two young men were less in each other's company than before. But who could wonder? Frank Welland, always so dry and uncompanionable, was now more morose than ever; and William soon acquired a painful accession to his duties. During his absence in the north, the old mercer had beguiled the tedium of his solitude by consulting a new apothecary, and attempting a sudden change of diet and prescriptions; and was now as ill in earnest as before in fancy, though his daughter was recalled permanently home to become his nurse. The management of the business, too, fell entirely to his hands. Saving one week in the course of the ensuing summer, when he proceeded in person to Nottingham, in the interest of the concern, William was not a moment away from Cheapside. He was evidently doing his utmost to please the old man; and, in spite of the peevishness of age and sickness, fully succeeded.

At length Martinmas came round again; and one evening, as William Harding was passing Welland's shop, on his way to his weekly club, he stepped in, for the first time for many months, to chat; inquiring, in a careless manner, whether, this Feast, Frank intended to visit Falkstone?

"I am not even invited," was the young man's reply. "My uncle is not quite so fond of my company as old Harding of yours; and once in two years is as often as he seems inclined to see me at the farm."

Still harping on the subject, William proceeded to a few casual inquiries concerning the Nottinghamshire friends and acquaintances he had made the preceding year. But Frank could tell him nothing. His uncle was a bad correspondent; and, when he did write, dwelt more upon the condition of his stock and the prospects of his fields than upon village news. William even hazarded an express inquiry concerning Neighbour Gray and her daughter; but Frank immediately stopped short. Colouring deeply, he seemed to feel it impossible to allude to Mary, and broke off into questions concerning the prevailing rumour of an approaching marriage between William and Miss Harding.

"Yes," replied William, assuming a more cheerful tone—"everything is settled. As soon as Sophy enters her eighteenth year, she is to be my wife. Her father gives me up the business, and all the rest is to follow at his death. A fine prospect for one who, like myself, began the world with nothing, and am not yet five-and-twenty."

Three months afterwards, as Frank Welland was listening to the gossiping account given over his counter by some neighbour, of the grand doings about to take place at William's wedding, which was fixed for the following week, a letter was put into his hand, which bore the Falkstone post-mark, requiring his immediate attendance at the farm, as his uncle had undergone a paralytic attack, and was speechless.

Frank was at Falkstone on the following day; and, after visiting the bedside of the now insensible old man, and learning from the medical attendant that, though his uncle might linger for a few weeks or even months, his recovery was impossible, young Welland noticed several strange faces about the place. Almost mechanically he uttered an inquiry after Neighbour Gray

"Ah, poor Neighbour Gray!" replied the venerable dairy-woman to whom his question was addressed—"the old soul has never held up her head since."

"Since what?"

"Since poor Mary's business. Neighbour Gray keeps her bed, Master Frank; and, as the poor soul has no one to look to her, or doctor her, like the farmer here, it's likely sickness 'll get the uppermost."

"But Mary—Mary"——

"And, maybe, 'tis the best thing as can happen to the poor 'oman," persisted the contemporary, whose sympathies were enlisted rather with the mother than the daughter; "for what has she to look to in life, now as it's all up with her daughter?"

"What is up with her daughter?—what has happened to Mary?" interrupted Frank, with unusual impetuosity.

"Such a mother surely as she has been!" continued the dame, raising her hands and eyes; "and to be so rewarded at last!"

And Frank, finding it impossible to worm out of the old woman the information he desired, dashed off out of the house; and, meeting in the farmyard his uncle's favourite herdsman, an intelligent man, for years an inmate of the house, he resumed his inquiries touching Neighbour Gray and her daughter.

"Ah, poor Mary! I'm feared, Master Frank, 'twill turn out a bad business," replied the man.

"What will turn out a bad business? For God's sake, speak! I have never heard a word of the matter!" cried young Welland.

"Why, Lord bless your heart alive, Master Frank! where have you been living? Nothen else was talked of in Falkstone town for a month or more; and, God knows, poor Neighbour Gray have never looked one in the face sin'"——

"Since"——

"Sin' Mary was put in jail for child-murder."

"Child-murder?—Mary Gray in jail?" faltered Frank.

"Well may you be surprised. But you see, Master Frank, older heads than yourn foretold as no good 'ould come out when Mary persisted in setting off to the place she had heard of in Notten'am, in spite of mother and friends, and all as was bound to advise the poor lass. All she had to say in answer was, as there was fourteen pound a-year to be arned—and that's wages as is not to be had every day, and was not to be overlooked by the daughter of poor Neighbour Gray. So away went the girl, sir; and, being no scholar with her pen, though so good a hand at the needle, she got some un to write home for her, as she was comfortably settled with a good master and missus, and to forward a couple of guineas to her mother as she'd got in the way of arnest. Well, sir, all this was well and good; and Neighbour Gray, though sure enough she was always pining after the girl's company, used to comfort herself by the notion, that, maybe in a year's time, Mary would get leave to come home to Falkstone for a day or two; or, if not, she would make the best of her way to Notten'am for a peep at the lass. But, Lord bless you, Master Frank! afore the year was quite at an end, comes news to Justice Snokes, up at Barleywood, to make inquiries at Falkstone concerning one Mary Gray as had been tooked up at Notten'am on suspicion of making away with a base-born child."

"Gracious God!" cried Frank. "And the unfortunate creature has been convicted, then?"

"The 'sizes don't come on till next week; but, from all as one hears, the poor lass has little chance. And, surely, to think of Neighbour Gray's daughter coming to the gallows!—It seems to bring shame upon the whole village."

The gallows!—Frank Welland clenched his hands till the blood started, and gnashed his teeth for very anguish, as, without hesitation, he took his way to the cottage of Neighbour Gray—not for the satisfaction of his misgivings—not even with an intention of alluding to the name of Mary—but to afford his mite of consolation to the unhappy old woman who had assisted to watch over his infancy, and whose grey hairs were about to be brought down in sorrow to the grave. It was June—genial, breezy, hope-breathing June—yet the door of the cottage, usually so hospitably ajar, was closed against the sunshine; and, when Frank Welland entered, instead of the busy sounds of industry, formerly saluting him—Neighbour Gray croning some old ditty over her house-work, or as an accompaniment to the whirr of the spinning-wheel—all was still as death; the old woman sat in her lonely arm-chair, with her back turned to the window, and her eyes fixed upon the embers, as if listening to a far off sound.

Reserved as Frank Welland was on most occasions, for once he waxed eloquent to express, to the distressed mother, his hopes that she would command his utmost assistance, either pecuniary or personal, to administer to the service of one who had proved so little worthy of the love they bore her. But Neighbour Gray listened and listened, and seemed to lack comprehension or courage to reply; for she uttered not a single syllable. At length, on some expression falling from Frank, that implied his apprehension of the worst, and his conviction of the guilt of the accused, she exclaimed—

"Why, sure, it is not you, Master Frank, who have known the girl from her cradle, who could believe her capable of taking away an innocent life?"

"It is hard, indeed, for me to think ill of Mary," replied young Welland, with quivering lips. "Mary was the dearest thing I had on earth. Mary might have been my wife before now, had she chosen to accept an honest man for her husband; but I'm fain to fear, Neighbour Gray, from all I've just now been hearing, that things will go hard with her."

"Fear no such a thing, Master Frank," replied the old woman, with firmness. "If I sit grieving here, it is for the trouble into which my poor child has fallen, not for any danger that threatens her. To be sure, the law is a frightful thing; but, masterful as it is, it can't go to prove a thing as never happened upon the 'varsal 'arth. I have word from Mary, Master Frank, that, as sure as God is above us, she is innocent of the crime laid to her charge; and Mary's plain word is more to me than all the oaths ever sworn in a court of justice. From a babe to a woman, never did those lips of hers utter an untruth!" And an involuntary sob burst from those of Neighbour Gray, as she offered this tender testimony to the virtues of her girl. Even Frank felt comforted by the assurance; and he had now courage to listen to the poor mother's details concerning the suspicions under which Mary had fallen, the investigations instituted by her master and mistress, and the evidence upon which she had been committed to take her trial for child-murder. The birth of an infant she admitted; but not only refused to give up the name of the father, but persisted in swearing that it had been removed from Nottingham immediately after its birth, and was still in existence. Further than this, not a syllable could be extracted from the prisoner. Frank Welland's suspicions were now excited. Connecting the visit of William Harding to Nottingham, the preceding summer, with the partiality he had betrayed for Mary on his visit to Falkstone, and her own subsequent coldness towards himself, Frank saw sufficient justification for addressing a letter to his young friend—not absolutely of accusation, but acquainting Harding with the actual situation of Mary Gray, and imploring him, if aware of any circumstance tending to establish her innocence, to bring it forward without delay. He mentioned that nothing but his uncle's dying state prevented his starting for Nottingham, to act a brother's part by the poor prisoner; and ended by a forcible appeal to the feelings of his friend. "Think what would be Heaven's judgment upon those who are really chargeable with the suspicions under which she labours," wrote young Welland, "if Mary Gray, at nineteen years of age, should be condemned to death for a crime of which she is as innocent as yourself. To death!—Think of that, William; and do not fail to return an instant answer to my letter."

William Harding's reply was inconclusive and unsatisfactory; but agitation of mind was so perceptible in every line it contained, as fully to confirm the suspicions of Frank. He began by imploring Welland, if he valued his reputation and comfort in life, to refrain from addressing him again on the subject. "Next Tuesday is my wedding-day," said he; "and should such a letter as I have just received from you fall into Sophy's hands, Heaven knows what might be the consequences. I am as willing as you can be to stand a friend to Neighbour Gray's daughter; and having been already apprised of her unfortunate situation, have given her the best law advice to be had for money. I have ascertained that she has nothing to fear; there is no evidence against her. She must be acquitted; and the only thing to be done for her future comfort, is to take a passage for her at once to America, as it will be impossible for her to live in peace at home after what has happened. In the meantime, all I have to beg of you, my dear Welland, is to forbear all discussion of the subject, till we meet again; when I shall explain matters to your satisfaction. Not a syllable more by letter!"

Frank Welland did refrain from further correspondence with the friend he had detected as a villain; though not from the most zealous interference in behalf of Mary. At the risk of eternally offending his uncle, who had occasional glimpses of memory and consciousness, he resolved to set off for Nottingham; but, at the very moment of departure, old Welland experienced a second stroke of palsy, which, within twenty-four hours, terminated his existence; and scarcely had the old man breathed his last, when Frank, disdaining to inquire for a will or after the disposal of the property, left the dead to bury their dead, mounted his uncle's favourite mare, and rode off, like a madman, to Nottingham. The assizes had commenced the preceding day; the trial of Mary Gray was actually before the grand jury, when Frank Welland, half-dead with emotion and exhaustion, entered the court. For the first time after nearly two years' absence, he beheld his gentle, sensitive Mary standing, wild and ghastly, at the bar, holding up her hand to plead for life, against the advocate of the laws of her country.

But the opinion of the able counsellors procured by William Harding, was fully borne out; a deficiency of evidence secured the acquittal of the prisoner; and she was received from the bar, insensible, into the friendly arms of Francis Welland. He, indeed, entertained no further doubt of her innocence; but Mary did not leave the court with an unblemished reputation. She had not attempted to deny the birth of the child, but proved that she had confided the fact to others, so as to receive professional attendance; and, though her life was thus preserved from the retribution of the law, her character was gone for ever.

"And what is to become of you, Mary?" demanded Frank, as he watched by her side, when at length she woke from the heavy slumber into which she had fallen, after being conducted, by her devoted friend, to an obscure inn in Nottingham, where he obtained her shelter for the night. "Shall you have courage to shew your face at Falkstone? My uncle is lying dead at the farm; I must hasten back to do my duty by him. If you wish it, I will carry you home to your mother; it seems to me you have no alternative but to go back to your mother."

"I must wait his orders," replied the humbled girl, in a low voice.

"Whose orders must you wait?"

"My husband's!"

"Your husband's?—you do not mean to pretend that you are married?"

"I am married," replied Mary, mildly. "And if I had not known yesterday that nothing could be proved against an innocent person, I might have set aside the trial at once, for I was indicted under my maiden name."

"And why, for God's sake, did you not put in the plea?"

"Because the discovery of our marriage would have been the ruin of my husband. Such has been throughout the motive of so much mystery. My little boy was taken away the moment he was born; and every means has been resorted to to keep the secret. What have I not borne for it? Disgrace, imprisonment, danger! and, above all, the wretchedness of knowing the sorrow I had brought down on my mother—on my poor, dear, kind, loving mother! Oh, Master Frank! I will not wait here any longer. Take me back to Falkstone!—take me back to my mother!—take me home!"

"In defiance of your husband, Mary?" sternly demanded Welland, who, in this softening of the poor girl's heart, felt he had an opportunity for the clearing up of his doubts.

"Why should I think more of him than he thinks of me?" cried Mary. "Why was he not like yourself in court, to give me courage and countenance? He promised to come down for the trial; he promised to be in readiness to receive me when all was over."

"To come down!—from London, perhaps?" demanded Frank, fixing his eye upon the countenance of the agitated girl. "Mary! it cannot, surely, be William Harding who has deceived you?"

Mary turned paler than before, but uttered not a word.

"What is the alleged motive of this husband of yours," persisted Frank, "for so obstinate a concealment of his marriage?"

"That he would be instantly cast off by a relative from whom he has great expectations. What right have I to ruin his prospects in life? The moment he comes into the business, all is to be made known—our boy acknowledged, and our marriage declared."

"Mary!" cried Frank Welland, "it is no longer possible for me to doubt that the villain who has all but brought you to a death of shame, is no other than William Harding. Do not deny it—do not attempt to deceive me or yourself. I tell you that, at this very moment, he is married to another. The business and fortune he was expecting were the wedding portion of his cousin."

Mary smiled incredulously. "I am lawfully married—believe me, I am lawfully married," was her sole reply.

"Not if your supposed husband be William Harding," persisted Frank, with solemn earnestness; and, taking from his pocket-book the letter announcing William's approaching marriage with Sophia, he placed this irrefragable proof in the hands of his companion. But Mary was no scholar. She begged him to read to her what he supposed to concern her of the epistle; and the horror-struck countenance with which she listened to every successive line, gradually unfolding the miseries of her fate, and the worthlessness of him in whom she trusted, afforded eloquent confirmation of Welland's previous suspicions. She sat for some moments silent after he had concluded the letter, then replied, by producing for his inspection what she believed to be the legal certificate of a legal marriage, privately solemnized at Nottingham the preceding summer.

"He has deceived you, Mary," cried Frank, returning her the papers. "This is mere imposition—this is good for nothing. The marriage was a trick, an imposture."

It was useless to add more. Mary, who had supported her courage so well at the bar of criminal justice, was now senseless at his feet.

A week elapsed—and Frank Welland had laid in the grave the venerable head of the relative by whose will he came into possession of property to the value of twelve thousand pounds; and a spectral figure sat by the fireside of Neighbour Gray, whose door was now closed more scrupulously than before against the consolatory visits of her village friends. Overwhelmed by the discovery of the infamous deception practised upon her, poor Mary refused to be comforted. One moment, she burst into invectives against her seducer, threatening to set off for London and bring his villanies to light—the next, she seemed to shrink from the contemplation of the act of cruel justice she was about to inflict upon the worthless being so steadfastly beloved; and finding, from young Welland, that he was about to visit London to wind up his commercial affairs and dispose of his business, preparatory to retiring to Falkstone for the remainder of his days, she placed her cause in his hands, charging him to claim back from William Harding the pledge of a now withered affection, and engage, on her part, to institute no proceedings against him, in consideration of his consenting to give her back the child.

Her commission was more than fulfilled by the young farmer. Armed with all the sternness of righteous indignation, he proceeded to the house of feasting, over whose front the name of the happy bridegroom was now triumphantly inscribed in letters of gold; and, having refused the hand extended towards him, in friendly greeting, by young Harding, repeated, word by word, the adjurations of the unfortunate daughter of Neighbour Gray.

"Hush, hush!—speak lower, I entreat you," said the delinquent, turning pale as death at the mere mention of Mary's name. "I can explain everything; I can"——

"You can explain nothing!" replied Welland, with firmness. "You have acted like a scoundrel; and your guilt will only be increased by the denial. I know not how far your proceedings may have brought you within reach of the criminal justice of the country; but this I know, that, in spite of all your prosperity, all your pride, this thriving business of yours would fall away to nothing, were I to proclaim what you have done, and what you have hazarded to do."

"Welland, my dear Welland!" faltered Harding, going anxiously to the door of the room in which they were standing, to ascertain that the listening ears of Gabriel Wilkinson were not on the watch. "For old friendship's sake, be merciful!—dictate your own terms—I am willing to do to Mary Gray all the justice still in my power. I will make a comfortable settlement upon her and her mother."

"Neither her mother nor she would stoop to receive a shilling at your hands," replied Frank, with contempt. "All this poor girl asks of you is possession of her child."

"And that is the sole request beyond my power to grant," replied Harding. "The boy died within ten days of removal from his mother. I can give you the certificate of his burial."

"Another forged certificate?" demanded Welland, with a scornful smile.

"No, on my honour!"

"Your honour!"

"On my word as a man and a Christian. Here it is," he continued, having unlocked and taken from his bureau a paper, which Welland recognised as in proper form. "Take it down to Mary. Set her mind at rest on that point. Make my peace with her, as far as peace is possible; and, whenever she will accept assistance at my hands, you shall dictate the settlement to be made upon her."

"I shall; but it will never proceed from funds of yours," replied Welland, impatiently. "There is but one concession I require of you—namely, a written engagement to attempt, on no future occasion, or on whatever pretext, any further communication with the family of Neighbour Gray."

"That is easily granted," replied Harding, readily taking up his pen to comply with the demand, in hopes that compliance would rid him of the company of his dangerous visiter. "Here is my attestation, which you may sign as witness, though I cannot exactly perceive what interest you have in such an agreement."

It was not to the culprit before him that Welland felt bound to enter into explanations. It was by the humble hearthside of Neighbour Gray, that the young farmer unfolded, for the first time, to the weeping Mary, his desire to make her his wife; a match that would not only secure her happiness for life, but, in a great measure, procure her vindication in the eyes of the world, and at the expense of his own character. Those who were aware of Frank Welland's inability to declare Mary his wife during the lifetime of his uncle, would attribute to him the evil that had befallen her, and the suspicions to which she had been on the point of falling a victim.

But, to the grief of Frank and the amazement of Neighbour Gray, Mary was inexorable. She was not going to carry shame, she said, into any honest man's homestead. Nor could even the utmost eloquence of Welland convince her of the authenticity of the certificate he had brought from London. Mary felt how grievously she had been already misled by her want of scholarship; and, once deceived, could not bring herself to believe that the paltry slip of paper was anything better than a new feint to impose upon her The mother—the young mother—was yearning in her heart. The first cry of her infant had sounded in her ears only to be silenced for ever; and, though now proved a child of shame, she felt that, if only permitted to fold her little son to her breast, all would be atoned—all might be forgotten: her withered youth, her blighted fame, her broken heart. Even the fixed sadness of her mother's venerable countenance would be dispelled, after bestowing her benediction upon the precious child of her precious Mary.

Again and again—sometimes with entreaties, sometimes with chiding—did Welland labour to undeceive her. He resigned his own views, he forgot his own passion, while striving to restore the composure of the unhappy girl. But the more earnestly he protested, the more convinced was Mary that he was bent on persuading her of the death of the babe, in order that, finding herself alone in the world, she might consent to become his wife, and resign all recollection of the past. She slept not by night, she rested not by day. Had it not been for the friendly aid of Farmer Welland, Neighbour Gray must have come to want; for the old woman was no longer able, nor her daughter willing to work. A spirit of restlessness, induced by her misfortunes, and almost amounting to insanity, seemed to have taken possession of poor Mary.

Unable to address a letter of appeal to her persecutor, and faithful to her resolution of confiding the secret so momentous to William's welfare to no other living soul, the devoted girl set about learning to write; and, in the course of a few months, so far accomplished her object as to be able to frame a petition to Harding, embodying the requests already conveyed through the hands of Francis Welland. But, after all her patience, all her cares, all her labours, her letter was in a few days returned to her without a syllable of reply. Such was William Harding's mode of fulfilling the written engagement into which he had entered with his friend.

Two years had now elapsed since his marriage; and, though many men might have felt the evil to which his misdoings had given rise, a drawback upon their happiness, nothing could exceed the triumphant pride of William Harding. Sophia had already made him the father of a boy, upon whom, at his birth, the grandfather settled a sum of £10,000; and, to complete his satisfaction, Welland, the only individual in London cognisant of his guilt, had retired for life into a remote county. Harding was now a Common-Councilman, with a prospect of civic honours; pending which accession of importance, he gratified his vanity by the re-adornment and extension of his premises in Cheapside. His shining, French-varnished mahogany counters; the large looking-glasses advantageously disposed for the reflection of light; the arabesque garlands adorning the pannels of the shop; the ormolu sconces, emitting long tongues of lucent gas—all was arranged according to the most approved form of modern luxury. And the rich India shawls, and silks of Lyons manufacture, were disposed in folds and draperies, imparting to the place the air of a lady's boudoir rather than of a shop in Cheapside; while vases of enamelled Nankin porcelain, birds of Paradise, and pagodas of carved ivory or filigree, were interposed among his merceries, after the fashion of an India warehouse. Of this exhibition of taste and splendour, William Harding was vastly proud; and, when the old gentleman drove in, once or twice a week, from his villa at Camberwell, to dine with the young couple, and admire the progress of his grandson, although he was apt to jeer and banter his successor upon his tendency to parade, he was, at heart, pleased to perceive that his son-in-law marched with the times, and had spirit to adventure further than himself. The business was daily, hourly rising in importance. Harding & Co. realized more in six months than John Harding alone in twelve; nor could the old gentleman refrain from pointing out occasionally to Gabriel Wilkinson, as he passed through the shop, how many sources of profit had been neglected in his time, and how much of present prosperity was owing to the sharp head and high character of his son-in-law. William would come to be churchwarden of the parish—William would come to be Alderman—William might come to be Lord Mayor—William would, at all events, come into possession of the sixty-five thousand pounds amassed by his father-in-law; Sophy was the happiest of wives—the boy a princely child:—had not old John Harding cause to applaud his choice of a son, and William the price he had set upon an unblemished reputation?

The only drawback on his satisfaction, was a degree of incompatibility of temper with his flighty wife. Mrs Harding, so far from possessing the gentleness and devotedness of his once idolized Mary, was a young woman of haughty spirit, educated at a third-rate boarding-school, in considerable admiration of her own heiress-ship. She knew the prosperity of her husband to emanate solely from herself, and made use of the argument, on all occasions, to enforce her claims to consideration and indulgence. She was alike jealous of her husband's attention to his business, in preference to herself, and jealous of her husband's influence over her father as superior to her own. She was often fretful, always imperious. But William felt that, for the present, it was desirable to bear all with submission; it was necessary, till the death of old Harding, to maintain, in the eyes of his father-in-law, the reputation of the best of husbands.

One day, as the old gentleman was enjoying, in his daughter's drawing-room, the basin of smoking soup which William always took care to have in readiness for his visits, a sort of scuffle was heard at the door—an altercation between William and the nurse, who was for pushing into the room with the child. "I don't care, sir," reached the ears of Mrs Harding and her father. "I know that woman will end with doing Master John a mischief. She shan't touch the child whilst he's in my care. I choose to go to my Missus"——

"Come in, nurse—come in!" cried Sophy, advancing towards the door; but the sovereign, silently slipped, by William, into nurse's hand, had produced a total confusion of ideas in the woman's mind. When interrogated by "Missus," she knew nothing—could remember nothing; and flattered herself she had succeeded in persuading the jealous woman that her ears had deceived her.

But Sophia was too shrewd to be so imposed on. She had always secretly resented William's coldness as a suitor and indifference as a husband, and now so perseveringly addressed her questions to Gabriel Wilkinson, concerning the disturbance which had driven the nurse and child from the shop into the drawing-room, as at length to elicit that a young woman, in deep mourning, having considerable remains of beauty, had more than once pursued the nurse and child into the house—claimed the boy as her own—upbraided William Harding, in presence of his shopmen and customers—and only been driven at length from the place, by threats of sending for peace-officers.

"The young woman is evidently out of her mind," observed Wilkinson, watching the effect of his communications. "But the tender way in which she appeals to her dear William, and the earnestness with which she insists upon getting possession of the little boy, are truly alarming; for, I fear, they have been already the means of raising reports in the neighbourhood disadvantageous to Mr Harding. Twice the vehemence of her outcries has attracted a mob round the shop-door; and I can perceive officious people, as they pass, pointing to the house as the scene of a mysterious occurrence."

"And have you not been able to discover the girl's name?" demanded Sophia, her heart fluttering with agitation.

"No, ma'am. It was no business of mine. But I think I have heard Mr Harding address her as 'Mary.' I fancy it is some acquaintance from the country."

This hint was enough for the petulant Sophia. Much as she had before affected to despise the shop, she was now constantly visiting William at his counter, with his boy in her arms; nay, would even stand with him at the door, on pretence of amusing the child with the carriages passing by. Harding, meanwhile, was on thorns. Significant smiles passed between his envious shopmen, Wilkinson and Clark, when they saw their master, in his uneasiness, bringing down to his customers plush for velvet, or china crape for aërophane. But, at length, Sophia's manœuvres succeeded: she obtained an interview with "Mary."

For it was, indeed, Mary Gray—Mary, care-erased and friendless; who, having paid the last duties to her mother, and realised a small sum by the sale of her cottage and effects, had repaired to London on pretext of seeking a situation, but, in reality, on the frantic errand of persuading William Harding to give up her child. Her mind was more than ever bewildered by delusions; and, having readily found her way to the residence of the splendid mercer, she could not dispossess herself of the idea that the beautiful boy she saw laughing and crowing in his nurse's arms, in a shop inscribed with the name of "William Harding," could be no other than the one of whom she was in search.

"Give him to me!" cried she, rushing into the shop on the memorable afternoon Sophia was lying in wait for her. "He is mine—he is my child; and William will tell you that he was married to me before he ever saw your face! But I do not ask for William—I do not want William—I want the child—I want our son—our boy!"

"Put her quietly out," said Harding, in an under tone to Gabriel Wilkinson; "the poor creature is evidently mad." But the paleness overspreading his own features, and the faltering of his voice as he spoke, bore testimony to his secret terrors.

"Do not hurt her—she seems quite harmless," cried Sophia, interfering, as Wilkinson was about to obey the directions of his master. "Do you want anything here, young woman?" she continued, addressing Mary Gray.

"I want my child!" replied Mary, more gently, on finding herself addressed in a tone of gentleness. "William Harding took it from me the moment it was born, promising I should have it again when he was able to acknowledge our marriage. And now, though you see how dearly he loves it, and how finely it is dressed, he keeps it from me on pretence that it is dead and buried!" And she attempted, with so much vehemence, to snatch the babe from the arms of its mother, that Sophia, terrified in her turn, was glad to escape into the interior of the house.

The rest of that day was anything but a day of peace to William. All that female exasperation could put forth in the way of reproach, was lavished upon him. He was accused by Sophy of having redeemed himself from beggary by a marriage with herself, to the ruin of some unhappy creature sacrificed to his interests; and she informed him that she had already addressed a letter to her father, acquainting him with her discoveries, and imploring him to fetch her away from the city the following day. Overwhelmed by the prospect of a breach with his father-in-law, Harding exerted himself to the utmost to "put the best face on the matter," taxing his wife with injustice in giving ear to the incoherences of one who was either a maniac or a person suborned to bring false accusations against an innocent man. By the time tea was nearly over, he had so far recovered his influence over the mind of the indignant Sophy as to be permitted to sit beside her on the sofa, and obtain a remote prospect of reconciliation.

But Mary Gray—who, though expelled with rough entreatment that morning from the threshold of her once loved William, felt that she had obtained an advantage in being permitted to approach the child whom her disordered intellects represented to her as her own—was still lurking near the shop; and, when the business of the day was ended, and, by the light of the blazing gas gleaming through the transparent plate glass, she discerned Clark, Wilkinson, and their confraternity, busily engaged in making entries and folding up the rich cachemere and Ternan shawls, she made a sudden dart across the shop, towards the door through which she had seen Sophia disappear in the morning. In another moment, she was in the drawing-room, confronting, with frantic gestures, the husband and wife, and interrupting their tête-à-tête with outcries for her child—her boy.

"He is dead, Mary," cried William Harding, startled out of all self-possession by her sudden reappearance. "You have seen the certificate of his burial. You well know that he is dead."

"Then you have murdered him. I accuse you of having murdered him!" exclaimed the poor girl, her face livid with excitement. "You tried hard to betray me to the gallows, in hopes of getting rid of me. I tell you, William Harding, you tried to make away with me; and, now, you have made away with your poor, blessed, innocent, smiling babe. What have you done with it, madam?—where have you put it?" she cried, making a wild rush towards the now shrieking Sophia, which was parried by the agitated husband; and, as they were struggling together, the young men below, alarmed by the screams of Mrs Harding, hurried up stairs. The window was thrown up, and the police called in. Ere they made their appearance, Mary, exhausted by her efforts, and the disease by which they were excited, had fallen on the floor in a fit—her lips covered with foam, and her eyes starting from their orbits.

"Take her away! take her away!" shrieked Mrs Harding, as the policemen entered; while her husband remained speechless with consternation.

"She is mad, I fancy," observed one of the shopmen, in explanation.

"More likely drunk," replied the police-men, to whom such incidents were familiar.

"Drunk and disorderly," added Clark, after representing to the police-men, the strange intrusion of the offender, whom he proceeded to give in charge, with a view of putting an end to the dilemma of his employer.

"I warrant you a few hours in the station-house will bring the lady to herself," replied the man. And the still senseless Mary was, accordingly, borne off, conveyed to the station-house, and locked into a damp cell till morning. William Harding had no leisure for the consideration of her sufferings—Sophia's hysterics were quite as much, just then, as he could manage.

Two hours afterwards, just as the house was closed for the night, a knock was heard, followed by the voice of a stranger, insisting on an immediate interview with Mr Harding. It was Welland, who, having followed the unfortunate daughter of Neighbour Gray to town, had only that afternoon traced out her lodgings, and, alarmed by her absence, and conjecturing whither the wanderings of the poor maniac had been directed, was come to demand tidings of the unhappy girl. William would, perhaps, have followed up his system of deception, by denying all knowledge of her, had not the very servants of the house already admitted to the visiter, that a young woman, out of her mind, had, in truth, been there, and, having bred disturbances in the family, been committed to the nearest police station.

Frank Welland did not waste a moment in appealing to the conscience of his former friend. Hastening eagerly to the station-house, by dint of a considerable bribe, he obtained immediate access to the prisoner.

"She be som'ere her'abouts. But the young woman war blind drunk when shut in for the night," observed the constable, lowering his lantern to the floor of the cell on which Mary Gray was lying. "She war obstropulous when we took her into custody; but she do seem quiet enough now."

And quiet enough she was, when Frank, with streaming eyes, bent over her body. Mary was dead! Yes, dead!—still warm, but quite dead.

"There didn't seem no good in sending for a doctor," observed the policeman, in self-extenuation. "She war given in charge as drunk and disorderly. How was we to know as she war in a fit?"

"Given in charge!—by whom?" faltered Welland.

"By a respectable householder, Mr William Harding of Cheapside. There ben't a gemman of higher character in the whole parish."

The unfortunate daughter of Neighbour Gray was laid decently in the grave by him over whose infancy the good woman had watched so kindly; but the prosperity, to the acquirement of which William Harding had sacrificed so largely, did not long outlast that sad event. The wrongs of poor Mary were avenged by the vindictive Sophia, who, till her father's death, remained his inmate, and, by her representations of the worthlessness of her husband, obtained the sole and separate control over the property left behind by old Harding.

No one pitied the delinquent—no one stood his friend. His gorgeous shop became deserted; and the failing business was, at length, made over, for a trifling consideration, to a new firm, Messrs Wilkinson & Clark. The ruined man, true to the last to his false principles, instead of attributing to his misdoings the failure of his worldly prosperity, bewailed only his loss of reputation. "I had no chance of getting over such a stroke of ill-luck," was his constant exclamation. "Knowledge of business is a fine thing; but my case is a plain proof that, in trade, the one thing needful is CHARACTER!"

HIGHLAND BIOGRAPHY.—NO. I.

BY DAVID VEDDER.

AULD Dugald M'Donald—ye'll scarcely believ't—
Was ance a wee tot on the knee o' his mither;
An' a' the guid crones i' the clachan perceiv'd
Him as like to his dad as ae pea's till anither.
His hair was as red as a sunbeam in mist;
His face was a' freckled; his nose it was sma' like;
His bonny wee mou' had a trifle o' twist,
Remarkably fitted for lisping the Gaelic.

Deaf Janet, the spaewife, she munted her specs,
An' glower'd like a hawk i' the loof o' the callan';
An' Dominie Dhu, in a fit o' the freaks,
Spak o' stars an' conjunctions to Rory M'Allan.
For Dominie Dhu had ta'en note o' the stars,
An' Rory M'Allan had studied the planets;
An' though their opinions were whiles at the wars,
They coost up their noses an' scouted auld Janet's.

M'Lauchlan, the priest, wi' his weel-shaven crown—
Whase father was shot at Drummossie wi' Charlie—
He whuppit a book frae the sleeve o' his gown,
An' cross'd him, an' sain'd him, an' kirsen'd him fairly.

Mair joy in ae family scarcely could be,
Frae green Aberfoyle to the borders o' Buchan;
Sae Ranald shool'd out, in the shape o' a fee,
A weel-hoarded guinea frae out o' his spleuchan.

Now gentle an' semple they emptied the horn—
Even matrons an' maidens they werena above it;
For wee Dugald's sire was a gentleman born,
Being ninety-sixth cousin to Fraser o' Lovat.
A fig for sic tipple as sherry or port,
It's no worth a snuff frae a Highlandman's mill—
What raises his soul to the regions o' sport,
Is double strong usquabae het frae the still!

So they drank an' they sang like the sons o' Apollo,
For frolic an' fun they got riper and riper;
But at drinking, the caliant wha beat them a' hollow
Was Evan, the Laird o' M'Alister's piper;
For he drank an' he play'd, an' he play'd an' he drank;
An' his pipes they were buskit wi' ribbons a' o'er;
An' I dare to be sworn, for a man o' his rank,
He laid in a stock for a towmond an' more!

The lang winter nicht flitted by like a dream;
They felt themsel's queer, but they wistna what ail'd them;
Till the sun frae the lift shone on mountain and stream,
An' cam' down through the lum an' the window, an' skail'd them.
M'Lauchlan he steadily munted his beast—
For his reverence was bound on a mission to Forres;
But, ere he departed, the kind-hearted priest,
He gae them his blessing, an' drank doch an doris.

A truce with his nonage—that task I resign;
Young Dugald M'Donald's deserves not a stanza;
Suffice it to say, he grew tall as a pine,
And stout as the heiress of regal Braganza.
He was proud as a peacock, a stranger to fear,
He was strong as a garron, and fleet as a hound;
And for spearin' a sawmont or stalking a deer,
There wasna his maik in six parishes round.

But naething like learnin' wad enter his skull;
The dominie grat that his mind was "obtuse;"
He knew not a B frae the foot of a bull,
Nor ever could master his P's and his Q's.
If dullness is bliss, 'tis in vain to be wise—
So Dugald exultingly swore by St George,
"If she couldna for learnin' optain ta pra prize,
She wadna pe panished nor hang'd for a forge."

He sorn'd on the tacksmen, he poach'd frae the laird,
He rifled the doo-cot, an' plundered the stream;
An' whiles a bit ewe or a lamb disappeared,
But the corbie or eagle they aye gat the blame.
At markets he aye made a shift to get fu',
Wi' wonderfu' combative powers he was gifted;
But, ae weary night, the poor dominie's cow—
The pet o' the bairnies—alas! she was lifted.

Frae shielin' to shielin', through clachan an' toun,
The tidin's flew swift as the auld fiery corse;
They thought on M'Donald, the lang-fingered loon,
An' the saddle for ance set upon the right horse.
The clan in a crack was his foe to a man;
The grey-headed patriarchs sairly misca'ed him,
Sae he took to his heels like a sleuth hound, an' ran,
For the bounds o' the parish were owre het to haud him.

An' down to the Lowlands the land-lowper hied;
He ne'er coost the glance o' his ee owre his shouther;
But gallop'd full three Scottish ells at a stride,
An' thought upon bay'nets, an' bullets, an' pouther.
In sooth, but the uppermost thought in his mind
Was Hangie, the drap, an' the horrible fa';
Sae he flew to a sergeant, as fleet as the wind,
An' listed at ance i' the auld Forty-Twa.

An' there he got rations an' fightin' galore,
Where bayonets clash'd, an' where ordnance thunder'd;
He aye was the first an' the last i' the splore,
An' mony a weel-stickit Frenchman he plunder'd.
A skirmish was a' very weel in its way;
But a battle afforded him unalloy'd pleasure;
For he prowl'd 'mang the slain at the close o' the day,
An' rifled their sporrans an' spleuchans at leisure.

An ingot, a cross, or a braw diamond ring—
A chain, or a star, or a gowden repeater—
A brooch, or a locket, awa he wad bring,
An' mair than a poet can hitch in his metre.
Nae matter, he held up his head wi' the best,
An' calmly submitted to every restriction;
For brawlie he kenned he had feather'd his nest,
An' that was a comfort in every affliction.

Thus Dugald industriously fill'd his pock neuk,
But valour oozed out at each pore in his skin;
So he wearied to beat his claymore to a heuk,
An' back to the mountains o' Scotland to win.
"Let them rush on ta bagnets, an' slash at ta French—
Let them munt ta fell breach while ta cannons are roarin'—
Let them stan' to ta knees amang glaur in ta trench,
Wha haena a plack i' the neuk o' their sporran——

"I'm aff." A tremendous hurricane blew—
Ye wad thought auld Sathan was rulin' the roast;
Sae he took a gowd piece frae the sole o' his shoe,
To bribe the poor sentry, an' ran to the coast.
An', lang afore daylight, the fortunate dog,
Was safely on board o' a three-lugged bikker;*
Wha was bound to Lochalsh an' Lochaber incog,
Pang fu' o' guid tea, an' tobacco, an' liquor.

In Albyn he landed in less than a week,
An' vow but his heart was as light as a feather;
When his nose was saluted wi' Highland peat reek,
He loupit an' danc'd like a cowt on the heather.
But, sly as a fumart, he travelled to Lorn,
Twice sixty miles south frae his ain native glen;
Ca'd in at the change house an' took a guid horn,
An' tauld them his name it was Dugald M'Lean.

The mistress was gaucy, an' ance had been young,
A widow she 'd been for a year an' a day;
An' Dugald he fleeched wi' a traveller's tongue;
For while it was summer he meant to mak' hay.
The courtin' was done in a fortnight at maist,
The breach had been made, an' the fortress was carried,
Sae he hurried a boat to Lismore for the priest,
Wha cam' in a crack, an' the twasome were married.

In six months he awoke frae his dream wi' a stairt,
The minions o' justice an' law cried—"Remember!"
An' bills shower'd around him frae every airt,
As thick as the snaw-flakes i' gloomy December.
He paid frae his ill-gotten gear as he might,
Till his siller was gane, an' his credit was coupit;
An' now fell upon him the finishin' blight—
The hail o' his stock an' his steadin' were roupit!
Expell'd frae his hame, owre the country a ranger,
An' beggar'd in conscience, an' credit, an' cunyie,
He seeks his bit piece frae the hand o' the stranger,
A heart-broken, haggard, an' puir gaberlunyie.

MORAL.

Reader, if honesty you lack,
This wholesome truth I tell ye—
The gear that's won owre Satan's back
Is spent beneath his belly.

* Bikker, or Bukker, the Highland name for a smuggler, probably a corruption of Buccaneer.

FRENCH EXPEDITION TO CONSTANTINE, AND FRENCH SCHEMES OF COLONIZATION.*

The defeat of the French expedition to Constantine was a surprise to the public. It was not so to us; nor ought it to have been to any one who reflects upon the repeated and invariable failures of the French in their attempts to conquer and colonize barbarous or semi-barbarous countries. With all their courage, their many military virtues, their many agreeable personal qualities, and their high civilisation, there is not, in truth, any European people so little qualified for such undertakings. In the management of a conquered people, they have no suppleness—everything is measured by a French standard; and, as colonists, they lack practice, industry, perseverance, and enterprise. "There is something," says Mr Hazlitt, "in the tone of French assumption and defiance, peculiarly offensive other nations. We can bear pride in a superior, for there is something serious and dignified in it; but self-conceit jars through every fibre of the frame. French impertinence has perhaps done more than the horrors of the Revolution or Buonaparte's strides to power, to rivet the chains of Europe. It was that air of making light of their enemies which whetted so many daggers against them, more than any other given cause, and which, till they get rid of it, will never allow them to be respected in adversity nor safe in the lap of conquest."

Without referring to their European failures—in Spain, Portugal, and Russia—let the reader take, along with us, a glance at the attempts made by them in the other quarters of the world, and we think he will be satisfied of the truth and accuracy of our assertion. The most successful attempts of the French were made in America. There they had little to struggle against but the soil and the elements; for European rivalry was common to them and to others; and the wretched savages, as usual, gave way before them, affording almost as little resistance to their progress as the pine trees or the bisons of the forest. In Canada, after 150 years of colonization, the colonists amounted to but 70,000—an amiable, but a feeble and unenterprising race, who carried with them the preposterous and incompatible feudal institutions of Europe, and the manners of the reign of Louis XIV., to the unoccupied lands of the New World, and preserved them there unchanged as long as they were under French dominion. In Louisiana, with a far better soil, and a more genial climate, and superior local advantages, they were not more successful. The prosperity of this country dates from its cession, in the first year of the present century, to its present possessors, of the Saxon race. The whole territory in 1801 did not perhaps contain 100,000 inhabitants; by the American census of 1830, it contained above 350,000—now probably increased to half a million. All French America, when the Anglo-American revolution commenced, did not contain 100,000 inhabitants. The British colonists, at that moment, although founded at about the same period, and, when founded, receiving less active assistance from the mother country, amounted to twenty times the number, vastly superior in knowledge, love of liberty, enterprise, and wealth.

Let us next turn to India. The French and the English met here, at least, upon terms of perfect equality—indeed, for that matter, the advantage was in favour of the French, for they had anticipated the English in the establishment of political influence and territorial acquisition. They cannot be said to have wanted leaders; for Labourdonnais, Dupleix, and De Bussy were at least equal to Lawrence, Clive, and Hastings. They were, notwithstanding, beaten completely out of the field, by the dogged perseverance and superior discretion of their rivals. The French, in India, offended the religious and national prejudices of their subjects and of their allies. They never could contrive to organize a decent battalion of Sepoys. The English Sepoys, officered by Englishmen, beat the French Sepoys, officered by Frenchmen, wherever they met them. We have at present an army of 150,000 Sepoys, well armed, well clothed, and punctually paid; and this is, in reality, the chief instrument by which we maintain dominion over a hundred millions of people. Even if the French had had no rivals in India, we are clearly of opinion that their want of temper, impetuosity, and defect of tact, would have rendered it impossible for them ever to have organized such a body. The writer whom we have already quoted, we think, has satisfactorily explained the difference between the English and French character in so far as respects practical questions of this nature:—"The English understanding, so to speak," says he, "even from a certain slowness and hebetude, runs less into fine distinctions, and is less liable to be led away by a variety of minor considerations, which it has not the art to magnify at pleasure into matters of importance; it sees and attends only to the principal point, the one thing needful; and, therefore, in cases of critical emergency and urgent necessity, possesses a sounder practical judgment than the French, which flutters about an object, and is distracted by a multiplicity of shifting and insignificant views of the same thing. For the same reason, the English are as inferior to the French in diplomacy as they are superior to them in downright action; because there the essential business is not to feel the real home truth, but to disguise it and draw off attention from it by fifty evasions and verbal excuses. The predominant feature of the English is a certain honesty or sincerity of feeling which makes them dupes, but accompanied with a steadiness of purpose, and a proportion in their efforts to their sense of the importance of the occasion, which does not allow them to be willing ones. The Englishman's head is essentially mechanical, and his will acts upon the decision of the understanding; when a Frenchman, on the contrary, has to act from foresight and combination, he forgets the end in the means, and is either rash and flighty or formal and pedantic."

The French for fifty years had sighed to possess Egypt. Their imagination was charmed with the reputation of its ancient and modern fertility. They fancied they had only to conquer it, to let in an inexhaustible stream of wealth upon France. They thought, besides, that it was the sure stepping-stone to India, to the destruction of the English power there; and, consequently, to the pouring into the lap of France, the vaunted but the imaginary wealth of the East. They never considered that they had not the command of the sea—that the commerce of Egypt could not be theirs without it—that Egypt was already peopled with two millions of men—that there was a warlike militia of Mamelukes and Turks difficult to subdue, and that, even if the country were conquered, they never could maintain the tranquil possession of it, as it was almost everywhere surrounded by sands and deserts, the abode of wandering and warlike Arabs, whose easy incursions would make the possession not worth maintaining. The conquest was, notwithstanding, resolved upon, and the scheme was even a personal favourite with the greatest military genius of ancient or modern times. At the head of 40,000 men, of perhaps the finest troops that the world ever saw, he persevered personally in the attempt for a whole year. The Turks and the Arabs, in the field, were but a mere rabble, whom he routed wherever he met them; but a paltry fortress on the coast of Syria, garrisoned by a few desperate Turks, was sufficient to baffle the genius and arrest the progress of the man who had, in a single campaign, destroyed three Austrian armies, each greater than his own. The attempt to make a conquest of Egypt, and the conduct of the invaders during a three years' residence in that country, are anything but creditable to the political sagacity and common-sense of the French people. We may safely assert that the English and Americans would not have entered upon so wild a scheme at all; or, if they had committed themselves to it, that they would have accomplished the task with more wisdom and discretion.

The French are now engaged in the scheme of conquering and colonizing a country very much resembling Egypt in the nature of its inhabitants and in the character of its climate. It is, indeed, inferior to Egypt in fertility; but, then, it is far nearer to them; for, instead of being two months', it is hardly three days' sail from the coast of France.* No European rival has interfered with them, as in the cases of America, India, and Egypt; and yet, although they have been at work for six long years, they have made wonderfully little progress in their undertaking. Independent of the real defects of the French character in reference to foreign conquest and colonization, many causes of want of success are easily to be found in the character of the people and country which they are attempting to subdue and settle. This will be made obvious enough by a brief sketch. The territory of Algiers has no definite and defencible line, except on the coast of the Mediterranean; and, in war-time, even this is anything but defencible against any superior naval power. To the east and to the west, it has Tunis and Morocco; to the south, it has the vast sandy desert of the Sahara, occupied by predatory and roving Arabs. The ridge of the Atlas, with its branches and spurs, runs east and west through the whole country, giving the entire region a mountainous or hilly character. The area of the country is in round numbers full 100,000 square miles,† or within one-sixth part of the extent of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland; but, if we deduct vast marshes, sandy deserts, and sterile mountains, the real amount of good land will be found very small, and its value for cultivation and settlement greatly depreciated, by its being necessarily scattered in patches over so immense a surface. The rivers of Algiers run but a short course, and, although some of them be valuable for irrigation, none are so for external navigation, or for internal communication; on the contrary, some of them, by overflowing their banks during the rainy season, and producing vast marshes, instead of facilitating intercourse, altogether obstruct the communication, in that season of the year, between one portion of the country and another. Algiers is computed to contain two millions of inhabitants; probably an over estimate. This would give twenty inhabitants to the square mile—a wretched amount of population for a country that has been occupied from the earliest ages of antiquity; that had the Carthaginians, the Romans, and the Greeks for its masters; and that is within a few hours' sail of the most civilized nations of Europe, ancient and modern. Physical defects alone in the country itself can account for this. The long continuance of bad government would not suffice. Four hundred years of Turkish misgovernment, did not succeed in bringing continental or insular Greece, or any other portion of Turkey in Europe, to so low a condition; their natural resources were sufficient to resist such a degradation.

The inhabitants of Algiers consist of seven distinct tribes or nations; the most numerous of these are the Barbers, or Kabyls, who are supposed to constitute half the population. These people are the descendants of the ancient Numidians; in fact, the aborigines of the country. They constitute the husbandmen of the country, and, indeed, with the exception of the inhabitants of the towns, are the only tolerably industrious portion of the population. The Moors, so called by Europeans, are the inhabitants of the towns: they are the descendants, but the mixed descendants, of the more civilized Arabian conquerors, who conquered the Mediterranean coast of Africa, under the Kaliphat. We have then the Bedouins, or wandering Arabs, who, like the rest of the same race spread over Arabia, Syria, and Egypt, live in tents, and tend their flocks, and are a pest to the industrious inhabitants, as their ancestors were three thousand years ago. Then we have the Turks, few in number; some Jews; a few thousand negroes, in a state of slavery; with, now, the Christian army and Christian settlers of France, attempting to conquer and colonize, among this motley population of African or Asiatic race, of Mahomedans, Jews, or Pagans, speaking languages and possessing manners distinct from each other, and both still more widely different from those of their invaders.

How can European industry flourish, or, in other terms, how can European colonization be planted in a country already strewed with thorns, thistles, and rank weeds of the human species—

* According to the French map, published at Paris in 1834, the distance from Toulon to Port Mahon is seventy marine leagues, and from the latter to Algiers is sixty-five leagues; making, in all, about 400 nautical miles, or not so much as the voyage from London to Edinburgh, with a much easier navigation.

† See—Carte du Gouvernment d'Algier, &c., par. J. Andriveau. Goujon, Paris, 1834.

not the promoters, but the very antipodes of industry and civilization? It is very difficult to imagine that the new acquisition should flourish, with anything short of the extermination or the expulsion of the existing races of inhabitants; and this, humanity aside, would cost such millions of French gold and such torrents of French blood, that the acquisition would unquestionably not be worth the purchase.

It may be said, perhaps, that the people may be rendered civilized, industrious, and docile, through French example and discipline; and that, in this case, they would pay taxes which would not only maintain the establishments of the colony, but even furnish a tribute to the mother country. All this would suppose a change of manners and of habits in the people; a change, or, at least, a great modification in religion; the conversion of the migratory hordes of the desert, and of the mountaineers of the Atlas, into peaceable husbandmen, and artisans, and traders. Even then, the frontier would still be exposed to the predatory incursions of the immemorial free-booters of the desert. Such a revolution would be the work, not of years, but of centuries. The French have been already six years in Algiers, and, out of its hundred thousand square miles, they have not ten that are free from anarchy, and in which a French subject can invest his capital with security.

Even the conquest of the country, to say nothing of its peaceable settlement, has made but very little progress; not one half of what that of Egypt had made in the single year of Napoleon's residence in that country. The French are at war with the Kabyles and the Arabs; and the largest of the four provinces of the Regency, Constantine, has set them at utter defiance. The mismanagement of the French, even in the easiest part of their task, conquest, is strikingly exemplified in their recent expedition against the capital of this province. A Marshal of the Empire, with a high military reputation, led an army of 6000 men against it. From his headquarters at Bona, the place is not an hundred miles distant; yet he seems to have known little of the route; nothing of the fortifications of the place he was going to attack; and nothing of the dispositions of its garrison and inhabitants, which, together, could not have amounted to less than 30,000 persons. His commissariat arrangements were as bad as possible. He undertook the expedition in the end of November, when the low country was knee-deep in mud, and the high country covered with snow. Before the army (gallant and enthusiastic at starting) had reached its point of destination, it was in a state of complete disorganization. Most of its artillery was buried in the mud; the soldiers were benumbed, frost-bitten, and heartless. 1200 effective men only could be brought up to the walls of the stronghold of Constantine; after firing a few vain shots at which, the army sounded a retreat, pursued, and cut up, and murdered by a rabble of Bedouin cavalry, which, as Napoleon said of the Cossacks on the retreat from Moscow, "would not, under ordinary circumstance, have pierced a company of voltigeurs." It has been said that the force under Marshal Clausel was not sufficiently strong. If that were really the case, the Marshal ought not to have undertaken the expedition, and especially in the depth of winter, and without food or tent-equipage. We are of opinion, however, that the army was not too small; and that a force of 6000 men, with a due proportion of artillery and cavalry, was better, under the circumstances, than one of three times the number; and, for this plain reason, that it was more easily fed and moved; that it was strong enough to prevent any horde of barbarians from distracting its attention from a siege; and that, when a practicable breach was effected, 1000 granadiers would be as efficient in storming it as five times the number.

The French are, however, committed to the settlement and conquest of Algiers. They have no disposition to retire, nor, indeed, can they retreat with credit, or, supposing them to desire to hold the sea-ports only, even with safety to their existence in the country. They must go on with it; and, in the favourable season of the year, a new expedition, with more knowledge, must be undertaken against Constantine, which, we have not the least doubt, will fall in the course of the next summer. The entire territory of Algiers must, indeed, be subjugated and taken military occupation of. For the latter purpose, an army of at least 50,000 French troops (double the number of British troops necessary to maintain dominion over the docile and industrious Hindoos) will be indispensable, independent of a native militia and auxiliaries in French pay. France will have to pay the charge of all this for many a year to come; for the utmost that can be expected from local taxation, will be to meet the expenses of the civil establishments.

The French, in their very ignorant thirst for conquest and colonization, are clearly misled by the example of our Indian conquests. They fancy that Egypt and Africa, with their rude and predatory tribes, are exactly like Hindostan, with its comparatively industrious and obedient inhabitants; and they are under an impression that our conquests in the latter are a source of vast wealth and prosperity to England. Every Englishman of competent capacity, who has inquired into this subject, knows that there is no truth in such a supposition. It would, in fact, be telling this country many millions of money, if it had never possessed a square mile of territory on the Indian continent. The patronage of India throws a mischievous power into the hands of the executive, which more than counterbalances the only substantial advantage we have derived from India—the extension of our commerce; and that advantage, let it be observed, is of little more than twenty years' standing; for, before that period, the Indian commerce was not a profit, but a burthen to the people of England; who paid more for every article, the produce of that country, than if they had received them indirectly through Americans; while they exported less of their own produce than the Americans would have exported for them. We furnish the following brief sketch, in illustration of our assertion respecting our Indian conquests, for the advantage of our uninstructed countrymen, and of our yet more uninstructed neighbours in France. The latter are in the useful habit of translating and inserting in one of their most popular periodicals, some of the leading articles of the English journals. We beg them to do us the honour, and give themselves the benefit, of inserting in the periodical in question, the present article on Algiers, and, more especially, that part of it which we are now about to give, describing the financial position of the English in reference to their Indian conquests.—We have in round numbers, in India, not less than one million and a quarter of square geographical miles of territory; ninety millions of subjects; and about forty millions of tributaries. The number of nations and tribes in this vast aggregate of human beings, as they are distinguished by their different languages and dialects, is certainly not less than forty. The very utmost of the revenue derived from the taxation of ninety millions of people is about twenty-one millions sterling, which includes not only general taxes, but very nearly every provincial and municipal tax too. Compared to English taxation, on the peace establishment, excluding local taxation, this is not one-third part of the revenue yielded by our twenty-four millions of inhabitants, nor one-fourth part of what eighteen millions of British subjects paid during the late war. The rate of taxation, per head, is about 4s. 6d.; that is, little more than a French crown a-head. If ninety millions of frugal, industrious, unwarlike, and unresisting Hindoos, in a rich country, yield a revenue equal to a French crown a-head, what will two millions of restless, ferocious, and warlike Numidians, and wild, roving, and predatory Arabs yield, in a comparatively barren country? This is the question to be answered; and the answer cannot be difficult. They will most probably take more than can be taken from them. Their contributions will be purely nominal. If they were as productive as the Hindoos, and no one in his senses will say that they are likely to be so, they would, of course, yield something like twelve millions of francs; and the French Minister of War will be able to tell to what extent so paltry a sum will go towards defraying the expense of an army of fifty thousand men, or even of half the number. Already, it appears from the correspondence between Mr Dupin and Marshal Clausel, that the enormous sum of 200,000,000 of francs, or £8,000,000 sterling, have been squandered on the colony. But what is the surplus of the Anglo-Indian revenue of twenty millions? There is no part of the Indian territory of England which has ever paid the expense of maintaining it, except the valley and delta of the Ganges. This has paid its own expenses, and contributed to cover the deficiencies of the rest; which rest, however, must be preserved, or the Gangetic provinces would be useless. Had the rich valley and delta of the Ganges, with its timid, laborious, and obsequious population, been sea-girt, or surrounded by an impassable wall of brass, it might have yielded a large tribute to Great Britain; but this is not the case. It is surrounded, in almost every direction, by people more warlike than its inhabitants—by predatory hordes, not unlike the Arabs of the desert; and a great army must be maintained, to protect the garden of India from their incursions and depredations. The civil charges of India amount to about eight millions; the military to nine millions; the interest of a debt of sixty millions, to three millions; and an annual tribute has, moreover, to be remitted to England, amounting to £630,000, in order to pay the dividends on East India Stock—a tribute formerly levied upon the tea-drinkers of England, and transferred by the last charter to the already tax-ridden Indians. A further tribute has to be remitted, for the payment of exorbitant pensions. We have here the whole revenue expended, to within a few hundred thousand pounds. But the real truth is, that, while the people of India are obviously over-taxed, and the improvement of their condition hindered by such over-taxation, there is the utmost difficulty in making the revenue equal to the expenditure, or, as we express it, by an English idiom, "to make both ends meet."

A silly outcry has been raised, in this country, against the French conquest of Algiers; and our Foreign Secretaries have, we believe, taken the trouble of remonstrating against it. If our object had been the philanthropic one of beseeching the French not to waste their treasure and spill their blood in so profitless an enterprise, this would be all right enough. In a political and a worldly sense, nothing can be more senseless and impertinent. All the injury is to the French, who are wasting those resources upon a worthless object—wasting those resources which, should the barbarous policy of considering the two most civilized nations of the world as natural enemies, be unhappily revived, might be used to our own detriment. It is hardly necessary to add, that, in the event of war between the two countries, the possession of Algiers must add to the weakness, and not to the strength of France. It would inevitably fall before the party that had the command of the ocean; and the French garrison would exist in Africa only to become so many prisoners of war in England. Most of the benefit arising from the conquest of Algiers, accrues to the other nations of Europe, and perhaps the largest share of it to ourselves, as enjoying the largest share in the trade of the Mediterranean, which the vagabonds of the Regency had infested with their piracies for three centuries. The French, in short, are at the heavy charge of keeping watch and ward over a den of thieves and robbers, and the rest of Europe, paying neither fee nor toll, receives nothing but benefit from their services. Instead, then, of snarling and growling at the French occupation of Algiers, we ought to express our gratitude for the good offices rendered to us. But the truth is, that John Bull is a thick-skulled blockhead, who never knows when he is well off, and who, in this instance, as in many others, instead of pasturing peaceably in the green fields made secure to him at the expense of others, employs his noddle, day and night, in butting against their stone walls. We will venture to guess that his shrewder younger brother, across the Atlantic, has never hinted one objection against the French occupation of Algiers; but, on the contrary, thankfully taken the goods the gods and the French projectors have provided him.

PRIOR'S LIFE OF GOLDSMITH.

The story of Goldsmith's life embodies the calamities of the literary career, the pains and penalties of authorship, more completely than the adventures of any other classic English writer. "Poor Goldsmith!" breathed a kindred and sympathizing spirit—"how much enjoyment he has given to others! how unhappy he was himself!—he never had even the pleasure of reading his own works." The pleasure of feeling and composing those delightful works, and of exercising, by snatches, the most expansive kindness and the tenderest pity that ever thrilled a poet's bosom, were the sole blessings of that checkered and always struggling lot of literary drudgery, the bitterness of which he tasted to the lees. Yet its acrid bitterness was not able to taint the original nature of the most bland and sweet-blooded among the sons of genius; nor had the world, into the turmoil of which he was helplessly thrown, power to inoculate him with its virus. With all his diverting or endearing foibles, and some of those faults which shoot the most luxuriantly from the warm soil of the kindly virtues, it is impossible to look back upon him without tenderness and almost personal affection, as on one whom we must have loved, with or in spite of his failings. Such appear to have been the feelings of the most distinguished men of the circle in which he latterly lived. Burke and Sir Joshua Reynolds regarded him with the more tenderness for that very guilelessness of nature and amusing simplicity with which the former sometimes diverted himself; while Johnson's rough chidings and rebukes must have originated in the most friendly motives. He loved and appreciated the man so truly himself, that he was often heartily provoked and irritated when the simplicity of Goldsmith laid him open to the ridicule or contempt of persons quite incapable of either understanding the beauty of his genius or of his character. Johnson was, moreover, jealous for the dignity of letters, and for that Literary Order which his open-hearted friend was so apt to compromise in mixed society, by the dangerous habit of thinking aloud. But Johnson, as in other cases, suffered no one to take liberties with Goldsmith, nor to depreciate his talents and manners, save himself; and, though not insensible to praise, he was too right-hearted and acute to receive the homage of those who sought to pay their court by disparaging the genius of his literary associate.

Goldsmith, beyond question, was the general favourite, the amusing and easy friend, upon whom devolved the good-will and good-nature of that brilliant society which figures in his poem of "Retaliation." The venomous strictures of Hawkins, who was quite incapable of understanding the nature of the Irish poet, and the jealousy or envy felt by Boswell of a man highly distinguished by Dr Johnson's regard, have, we think, hardly injured the memory of Goldsmith. The bitter-bad heart of the former has failed in this as in other malignant purposes; and the involuntary candour and truth of Boswell have corrected the erroneous impressions he might otherwise have conveyed. The vindication of Goldsmith's memory, which Mr Prior has undertaken in the felicitous spirit of fervent admiration and warm indulgence, was therefore hardly necessary. The fondest admirers of Goldsmith's writings are likewise the truest judges of his character. No literary man has ever had the seamy side of his mind and his life more completely turned out; and who now thinks with harshness or severity of him—

"In wit, a man—simplicity, a child?"

Yet Mr Prior's task, if not, in this respect, one of necessity, is one of delight; and, although his assiduous and painstaking researches, which occasionally sink into trifling, had added less to the sum of our knowledge about Goldsmith, we should still feel grateful. Above all, we are grateful for so fair an occasion of speaking of so great a writer, so universal a favourite, and so pure a specimen of that most pitiable being—the author by trade. A few months an usher, a few more the assistant of an apothecary, and, at other times, for a brief interval, attempting to act or ape the physician, with some humble patients but few fees—"poor Goldsmith," with all the aspirations and sensibilities of genius, may be said to have lived and died with the badge of his melancholy vocation, the hack quill, in his fingers. His exquisite poems, his incomparable novel, and his lively plays, were but a few brilliant accidents in his wayward life—the wonder being how he found time for their composition from the daily drudgery to which he was condemned.

It is, however, just possible that indulgence may be carried to a dangerous excess in judging of a man whom those that knew him best loved the most; so much more ingratiating is simple, intuitive gentleness and kindness of nature, than the pride of steady virtue, and the sturdiness of self-depending intellect. Yet the greatest weaknesses of that most unworldly and compassionate spirit did not approach to vice; and excessive confidingness, and ill-regulated, impulsive generosity, the worst errors of Goldsmith's character, involved no suffering save to himself. His imprudences lurked in his blood. All the Goldsmiths are reported to have been a singular race; and the poet's immediate connexions are described as a strange family:—"They rarely acted like other people; their hearts were always in the right place, but their heads seemed to be doing anything but what they ought." This implied reproach ought perhaps to fall heavier upon the world than on the Goldsmiths. They were, from generation to generation, a clerical family, living in the simplicity and hospitality which distinguished the rural parts of Ireland in those primitive days. The father, the brother, and the uncle of Goldsmith, have each been imagined the original of his Vicar of Wakefield and village pastor. These venerable and endearing characters were alike applicable to each of his relatives. "Sweet Auburn" was his beloved village of Lissoy, which ever lived in his heart; and the manners and habits of the Vicar's family were those with which his childhood and youth were familiar. Among their other failings, the Goldsmiths were in the habit of contracting early and improvident marriages—consulting inclination, and totally disregarding prudence. The poet's father was no exception to the family custom. Among his other children, Oliver came into the world at the farm-house of Pallasmore in county Longford. His parents had obtained this shelter, and the lease of fifty acres of land, from his maternal grandmother, as a temporary support until better days should come. While the poet was still in infancy, his father obtained the rectory of Kilkenny-West, and removed to a respectable house and farm on the verge of the village of Lissoy, "the Deserted Village," still the frequent scene of pilgrimages to the admirers of Goldsmith. The house is now a ruin; but the village bears the poetical name of Auburn, and will live for ever in the delightful letters of the poet, although it were possible that his verse should be forgotten. Among the many minute accounts of this scene of Goldsmith's early happiness, and of his tenderest reminiscences, which Mr Prior has collected, we are most pleased with the following, from the lips of Mr Best, an Irish clergyman:—

> Auburn is a poetical name for the village of Lissoy, in the county of Westmeath, barony of Kilkenny-West. The name of the schoolmaster was Paddy Burns. I remember him well. He was, indeed, a man severe to view. A woman called Walsey Cruse kept the alehouse.
> "Imagination fondly stoops to trace
> The parlour splendours of that festive place."
> I have been often in the house. The hawthorn-bush was remarkably large, and stood opposite the alehouse. I was once riding with Brady, titular Bishop of Ardagh, when he observed to me, "Ma foi,* Best, this huge overgrown bush is mightily in the way: I will order it to be cut down." "What, sir!" said I, "cut down Goldsmith's hawthorn-bush, that supplies so beautiful an image in 'The Deserted Village!'" "Ma foi!" exclaimed the Bishop, "is that the hawthorn-bush? Then ever let it be sacred from the edge of the axe, and evil to him that would cut from it a branch!"

* The Irish Roman Catholic Clergy were then all educated in France, and in language and manners were often more French than Irish.

At three years of age, Oliver was given in charge to Elizabeth Delap, a widow, and a relative, residing in some humble capacity in his father's family. This person, who afterwards kept a Dame's School in the village, gave an indifferent account of the capacity of her celebrated pupil. Yet, dull as Oliver had been under her charge, this Irish gentlewoman, who long survived him, with no wonderful inconsistency, felt his fame reflected back upon her "who had first put a book into his hands;" and boasted accordingly. The Paddy Burns, the village schoolmaster referred to by Mr Best, whose accurate name was Thomas Byrne, was a singular and eccentric character, who must have had much more influence upon the dawning mind of Goldsmith. He had received a classic education, and was intended for a schoolmaster, but enlisted in a horse regiment, rose by merit to be quarter-master, and, after serving in Spain through the wars of Queen Anne, returned to Ireland, and took up his destined vocation in the village of Lissoy. If Goldsmith made little progress in elementary learning under this martial preceptor, he could not miss, between the stirring years of six and ten, to have imbibed lessons as influential.

> Byrne was eccentric in his habits, unsettled in disposition, of a romantic turn, wrote poetry, was well versed in the fairy superstitions of the country, and, what is not less common in Ireland, believed implicitly in their truth. He could likewise (according to the accounts of a few of his scholars who were living about 1790, given to the Rev. Mr Hancock) translate extemporaneously Virgil's Eclogues into Irish verse. Not the least of his qualifications was the art of narrating his adventures in a manner to fix the attention and curiosity of his neighbours; and the scene of these narratives was commonly the alehouse. In the school, also, when indisposed to teach a lesson, he would often tell a story; and among the most eager listeners on such occasions was young Goldsmith.

One cause of Oliver's backwardness in learning is attributed to his fondness for those legends, ballads, and stories of fairies, and all manner of superstitions, which then, as now, formed the enchantment of rural Irish fire-sides. Nearly forty years afterwards, Goldsmith could delight his intimate friends by singing the comic songs or the tender ballads which he had picked up in his boyhood. Upon one occasion, he is said to have been carried to visit the last of the Irish bards, and one of the most eminent of their number—Turlogh O'Carolan, alias Blind Carolan. Though this celebrated person died when Goldsmith was not more than ten years old, his genius and character must have produced a strong impression upon the mind of a boy naturally imaginative. The Irish songs of Carolan were then as popular in those parts of Ireland as those of Burns are now among the people of Scotland; and his musical compositions were fully as much admired as his lyrics. Of the latter some beautiful specimens still keep their place. Goldsmith afterwards gave an account of this Irish Homer in a London periodical work, one of a half dozen to which he contributed at the same time.

The small-pox, in a very severe form, caused young Oliver to be removed from his eccentric tutor, Byrne; and he was sent to the seminary of a clergyman, named Campbell, at Athlone, to receive a classical education—some early indications of talent having induced his family to change his destination, which had been commerce, for the Church. Here he remained for about two years, and was remembered by his schoolfellows as a short, thick, pale-faced, pock-marked boy, awkward in manner, backward and diffident at first, but afterwards acquiring sufficient confidence to become a leader in boyish sports. He was, at this period, in no way remarkably distinguished from his companions, either in scholarship or character. He had, however, written some indifferent verses. Goldsmith's next school was at Edgeworthstown, where he remained until he went to Trinity College. At this period his taste for poetry is supposed to have been developed. Parnell, Denham, and Roscommon, were, from pride and patriotism, studied in Irish seminaries. The two former may fairly be presumed, in some sort, as the early classic models of Goldsmith, whose imagination had been kindled by Carolan, and another remarkable local poet, in whose rude strains the germ of "The Deserted Village" may be found. This person was named Lawrence Whyte. He was a native of the county of Westmeath, a schoolmaster, and a neighbour of the Goldsmith family. His volume was published when Oliver was about thirteen years old, and when those evils which have now reached the height—rack-rents, namely, absenteeism, and ejectments—had begun to be severely felt. This patriotic rhymer was an humble imitator of Swift; and his topics, if not his talents, gained him considerable popularity. Goldsmith acknowledged that Whyte's doggerel verses had first taught him to commiserate the wretched condition of the peasantry of his native country, and inspired that compassion for their sufferings which so often breaks out in his writings. Whyte's verses would still be very popular in Ireland. He is the Laureate of the future Whitefeet and Blackfeet, and of all the tumultuous clans of Boys then unheard of, which have sprung from the state of society whose beginnings he thus describes:—

"Farmers lived like gentlemen,
Ere lands were raised from five to ten.
Again from ten to three times five,
Then very few could hope to thrive;
But tugg'd against the rapid stream,
Which drove them back from whence they came.
At length 'twas canted* to a pound:
What tenant then could keep his ground?
"Not knowing which, to stand or fly,
When rent rolls mounted zenith high,
They had their choice, to run away,
Or labour for a groat a-day;
Now beggar'd and of all bereft,
Are doom'd to starve or live by theft;
Take to the mountains or the roads,
When banished from their old abodes;
Their native soil were forced to quit—
So Irish landlords thought it fit;
Who, without ceremony or rout,
For their improvements turn'd them out;
Embracing still the highest bidder,
Inviting all ye nations hither,
Encouraging all strollers, caitiffs,
Or any other but the natives."

* Auctioned.

The rustic poet feelingly reverts to the good old times, before the landlords began by

"Depopulating every village,
Where we had husbandry and tillage;
Fat bacon, poultry, and good bread,
By which the poor were daily fed.
The landlords, then, at every gale,*
Besides their rent, got nappy ale,
A hearty welcome and good cheer,
With rent well paid them twice a-year;
But now the case is quite reversed:
The tenants every day distress'd;
Instead of living well and thriving,
There's nothing now but leading, driving;
The lands are all monopolized,
The tenants rack'd and sacrificed;
Whole colonies, to shun the fate
Of being oppress'd at such a rate,
By tyrants who still raise their rent,
Sail'd to the Western continent;
Rather than live at home like slaves,
They trust themselves to winds and waves."

* Rent-time.

The advocates of emigration may perceive that this mode of relief has been tried in Ireland for a century without much effect. Irish absentees have also had a pretty long run without being checked. Save that the modern strays may now be found as far off as Florence, Rome, and Naples, the breed are quite unchanged whom Whyte thus stigmatizes:—

"Our squires of late through Europe roam;
Are too well-bred to live at home;
Are not content with Dublin College,
But range abroad for greater knowledge;
To strut in velvets and brocades,
At balls and plays and masquerades;
To have their rent their chiefest care is,
In bills to London and to Paris.
. . . . .
These absentees we here describe
Are mostly of our Irish tribe,
Who live in luxury and pleasure,
And throw away their time and treasure;
Cause poverty and devastation,
And sink the credit of the nation.
. . . . .
Their mansions moulder quite away,
And run to ruin and decay,
Left like a desert wild and waste,
Without the track of man or beast;
Where wild-fowl may with safety rest,
At every gate may build a nest;
Where grass or weeds on pavements grow,
And every year is fit to mow.
No smoke from chimneys does ascend,
Nor entertainment for a friend;
Nor sign of drink, or smell of meat,
For human creatures there to eat."

While Goldsmith was at Edgeworthstown school, he is said to have been himself the hero of an adventure which gave birth to the plot of "She Stoops to Conquer." He was benighted at Ardagh, in going to Ballymahon to spend his holidays; and, having a guinea in his pocket, determined to take his ease in his inn like a gentleman. Applying to a wag in the town for information about the best house, he was directed to that of Mr Featherstone, in which his informant was domesticated, and where the swaggering schoolboy called about him on the strength of his purse, nor discovered "the mistakes of a night" till about to take leave. The story, however amusing, looks apocryphal.

By this time Henry, the elder brother, and seven years the senior of Oliver, had nearly completed his studies at the university, and the eldest daughter of the family had made a clandestine marriage with Mr Hodson, a very young gentleman, the son of a man of some property in the neighbourhood of Athlone. The marriage looked like one of interest and intrigue upon the part of the Goldsmiths; and, from an overstrained feeling of honour, the father, though indignant at the union, impoverished himself, and deeply injured his other children, to give a suitable portion to his rash daughter. The act looks little short of madness; but "it was the way of the Blenkinsops." The education of Oliver could not now be completed unless in the humiliating condition of a sizer; and against this the pride of the youth revolted. His affectionate and benevolent uncle, the Rev. Thomas Contarine—who proved to him more than a second father, and for whom, amidst all his youthful follies, Goldsmith continued to cherish the most ardent regard and gratitude—prevailed with him to submit to circumstances; and he entered Trinity College in June 1745. It is not without reason that Mr Prior attributes some of the subsequent errors and mortifications of Goldsmith's life to that poverty which was rendered so early familiar that it was never afterwards viewed with sufficient terror. Goldsmith never forgot nor surmounted the galling humiliations and tyrannical treatment which he received at Trinity as a sizer. In the Essay on the Polite Learning of Europe, written many years subsequently, his indignation thus breaks forth:—

> Sure pride itself has dictated to the fellows of our colleges the absurd passion of being attended at meals and on other public occasions, by those poor men who, willing to be scholars, come in upon some charitable foundation. It implies a contradiction, for men to be at once learning the liberal arts, and at the same time treated as slaves; at once studying freedom and practising servitude.

In a man named Wilder, whose subsequent history is a record of poetical justice, he found a brutal tutor irritated into a vindictive persecutor. Goldsmith's recollections of his college life are the reverse of agreeable. Of college endowments, he remarks, that "they at best more frequently enrich the prudent than reward the ingenious;" and, indeed, he never either felt or expressed esteem for the sciences and pursuits that are chiefly valued and cultivated in colleges. Mr Prior, who is more of a disciplinarian, rebukes the complaints and slights which Goldsmith indulged against all colleges, but especially his own; and for once hints that at least a part of the blame may have rested with the student, who, as a youth of the poetical temperament, was more attached to pleasure than severe study. Early in 1747, his father died, leaving the family in deep poverty. Oliver must now have been forced to leave college, save for the remittances of his uncle Contarine, whose often-tried kindness never grew chill. Yet this bounty was, from its very nature, precarious; and now began that struggle between the temptations of improvidence alternating with the pinches of necessity which only terminated with his life. His difficulties were, however, combated or eluded by "that knack at hoping," which was his best preservative against despair caused by poverty and the cruelty of his savage tutor. Mr Prior relates that—

> Under such circumstances, he was more than once driven to the necessity of pawning his books, until the stated supply arrived, or some friendly hand interposed to relieve them. The disposal of the books coming to the knowledge of the tutor, he, in addition to bitter taunts and reprehension, said that he was like the silly fellow in Horace—Mutat quadrata rotundis.
> There is, we are assured, no stimulus to ingenuity like distress. Goldsmith was now taught, for the first time, to draw upon his resources in a mode which, however beneath the dignity, was not inappropriate to the calling of the future poet. This was the composition of street ballads—to which, Beatty [a fellow-student] knew him frequently to resort, when in want of small sums for present exigencies. The price of these was five shillings each; and all that he wrote found a ready sale at a shop known as the sign of The Rein-deer, in Mountrath Street. None of the names of these verses were recollected at the time Mr Beatty related the fact to his friends; but popular occurrences commonly supplied the subjects. Poor as they may be supposed to have been in character, from the remuneration received, and the class for whom intended, he is said to have exhibited for his offspring all the partiality of a parent, by strolling the streets, at night, to hear them sung, and marking the degree of applause which each received from the auditors.

This interesting fact must be received with caution. Goldsmith, who kept no secrets, never mentioned it himself. So, we apprehend, should the following ludicrous anecdote told by Mr Edward Mills, a professed wag, and Goldsmith's relation:—

> Mills, whose family in Roscommon was opulent, possessing a handsome allowance at the University, occasionally furnished his relative with small supplies, and frequently invited him to breakfast. On being summoned on one occasion to this repast, he declared from within, to the messenger, his inability to rise, and that to enable him to do so, they must come to his assistance, by forcing open the door. This was accordingly done by Mills; who found his cousin not on his bed, but literally in it, having ripped part of the ticking, and immersed himself in the feathers, from which situation, as alleged, he found difficulty in extricating himself. By his own account, in explanation of this strange scene, after the merriment which it occasioned had subsided, it appeared that, while strolling in the suburbs, the preceding evening, he met a poor woman with five children, who told a pitiful story of her husband being in the hospital, and herself and offspring destitute of food, and of a place of shelter for the night; and that, being from the country, they knew no person to whom, under such circumstances, they could apply with hope of relief. The appeal, to one of his sensitive disposition, was irresistible; but unfortunately he had no money. In this situation he brought her to the college gate, sent out his blankets to cover the wretched group, and part of his clothes in order to sell for their present subsistence; and finding himself cold during the night, from want of the usual covering, had hit upon the expedient just related for supplying the place of his blankets.

A college riot, in which Goldsmith was at least passively concerned, drew upon him a solemn rebuke, which was next year followed by imprudence, involving more serious consequences.

> He had invited a party of young friends, of both sexes, from the city, to supper and a dance in his chambers, when his tutor, hearing of the irregularity, proceeded thither, addressed him in gross terms of abuse before his guests, and, being probably irritated by the replies of the pupil, at length proceeded to the unwarrantable extremity of personal chastisement. The effect of this violence, upon a sensitive mind like that of Goldsmith, may be conceived: he thought himself irretrievably disgraced; and, with that "exquisite sensibility of contempt," of which he speaks on another occasion, determined to forsake not only the scene of his mortification, but his country; and, unknown even to his friends, seek his fortune in a kinder region.

With this view, he disposed of his books and clothes, and quitted the University; but loitered in Dublin until, with no more than a shilling left, he set out for Cork. His intention was to embark there for some other country—he knew not whither. On this shilling he supported himself, as he affirmed, for three days; and then parting by degrees with his clothes, was at length reduced to such extremity of famine, that, after fasting twenty-four hours, he thought a handful of grey peas, given him by a girl at a wake, the most comfortable repast he had ever made. Fatigue and privation produced what, perhaps, persuasion might not have effected—conviction of his folly and imprudence. The project of going to America (for this seemed his destination) was therefore for the present abandoned; his steps turned gradually homeward; and when near enough to communicate with his brother, he sent forward a messenger to announce his situation; and Henry, who immediately went to the assistance of the wanderer, clothed and carried him back to college, where something of a reconciliation was attempted with the tutor.

He was about four years altogether at the university, which he quitted without regret, though with prospects anything but flattering. His imprudent sister, Mrs Hodson, in right of her marriage-settlement, had, with her husband, taken possession of her father's house at Lissoy; and his widowed mother had retired, in very straitened circumstances, to the village of Ballymahon, where the small house which she occupied for twenty years still forms an object of curiosity to travellers. Henry, the elder brother, was by this time curate of Pallasmore, and taught some pupils; and of the other children, two sons and two daughters, we have at this period no account. Oliver, on leaving Trinity College, appears to have lounged and hung about among his relatives for two years, though his nominal headquarters was Ballymahon, and though he sometimes attempted to assist Henry in his school. In that pleasant and truthful book, the Journey throughout Ireland, by the late Henry Inglis, we are informed that entries of articles furnished to Goldsmith's mother, are still to be seen in a grocer's book; and Mr Prior has ferreted out those literary curiosities, if we may so call them. "Tea by Master Noll," and "Cash by ditto," is one entry; but if Noll was degraded into his mother's errand-boy, he was not overloaded by the weight of commodities. An ounce of green tea, or a pound of Jamaica sugar, are the largest orders. He spent a good deal of his time at Lissoy with his brother-in-law, the Dan Hodson of his future correspondence; and entered with ardour into those rural sports and occupations which were pursued as fervently in Ireland as in any part of the King's dominions. Another of his companions at this idle period was his school and college friend Mr Robert Bryanton, to whom some of his finest letters were afterwards addressed. These precious letters are still in the possession of Mr Bryanton's descendants.

They breathe the warmest regard for him and his relatives; and in the postscript to one he even adds, after expressing attachment to its members—"If there be a favourite dog in the family, let me be remembered to him."

In company with this gentleman, besides their convivial scenes, to which slight allusion is made in the same letter, he made frequent excursions on foot through the country; sometimes for the purpose of shooting; sometimes to fish in the course of the river Inny, which flows through the town, and with a few green islets and the ruins of a mill, then in full activity, presents a pretty picturesque scene. Ballymulvey, an agreeable house and grounds in the vicinity, and afterwards the residence, for some years, of his friend Bryanton, was a frequent resort. Here, by the river side, he is said to have amused himself with his flute; and here likewise, and in the neighbouring pieces of water communicating with the Shannon, as well as in the course of that river, sometimes joined or led an otter hunt; for (speaking of that animal) he says, in "Animated Nature," "With us, its young are never found till the latter end of summer; and I have frequently, when a boy, discovered their retreats and hunted them at that season." In this vicinity also, at the house of a gentleman named Gannon, he gained his only actual acquaintance with the seal tribe, as mentioned in the same work:—"How long this animal lives is unknown: a gentleman whom I knew in Ireland kept two of them, which he had taken very young, in his house for ten years; and they appeared to have the marks of age at the time I saw them, for they were grown grey about the muzzle." One of the rustic exercises pursued by him as a source of amusement was throwing the sledge, a common feat of strength and activity in Ireland.

. . . . . .

"George Conway's Inn," mentioned in one of his letters, which stood, and still stands, though shorn of its honours by rival establishments, opposite the residence of his mother, had more of his time than his brother thought becoming or prudent. Without being seriously open to the charge of dissipation, the attractions of a convivial evening were strong enough to draw him from more sober pursuits. This inn formed the scene of some of his triumphs over more unlettered opponents: here he delighted to argue, to exhibit his classical attainments and general learning, to quote verses, and occasionally to write them; and when these ceased to be attractive, he found equal pleasure in amusing his party by telling a story or singing a song. He seems to have been naturally, as he says of one of his characters, "an admirer of happy human faces;" and with this gay and joyous spirit, so long as he saw the effect, did not much study the means by which it was produced. All this, though it did not corrupt his heart, tended to deteriorate his manners. It imparted that tinge of what afterwards, in the societies of London, some rather harshly termed uncouthness, but which might have been more appropriately named rusticity.

Besides "George Conway's Inn," a new and unfinished, or Irish-finished erection, "The Three Pigeons," in his beloved Lissoy, was the frequent scene of his social triumphs. There is no trait of Goldsmith's character more amiable than his fond recollections of the scenes and friends of his youth. When about the zenith of his London fame, he says, with exquisite tenderness—"If I go to the opera, where Signora Colomba pours out all the mazes of melody, I sit and sigh for Lissoy fire-side and 'Johnny Armstrong's Last Good-Night' from Peggy Golden: or, if I climb Hampstead Hill, I confess it is fine; but then I had rather be placed on the little mount before Lissoy gate, and there take into me the most pleasing horizon in nature." We cannot forbear a short extract from one of his essays, where the same haunting idea is beautifully touched:—

When I reflect on the unambitious retirement in which I passed the earlier part of my life in the country, I cannot avoid feeling some pain in thinking that those happy days are never to return. In that retreat all nature seemed capable of affording pleasure. I then made no refinements on happiness, but could be pleased with the most awkward efforts of rustic mirth; thought Cross-purposes the highest stretch of human wit; and Questions and Commands the most rational way of spending the evening. Happy could so charming an illusion still continue! I find that age and knowledge only contribute to sour our dispositions. My present enjoyments may be more refined, but they are infinitely less pleasing. The pleasure the best actor gives can no way compare to that I have received from a country wag who imitated a Quaker's sermon. The music of the finest singer is dissonance to what I felt when our old dairy-maid sung me into tears with "Johnny Armstrong's Last Good Night," or the cruelty of Barbara Allen.

These songs he would sing in after life to those friends in London who could relish their pathos, with the tender sensibility which formed the main quality of his disposition.

Goldsmith's relatives were desirous that he should enter the Church; to which, from what seems conscientious motives, he was decidedly averse. He was, in few words, too honest a man to assume those sacred functions upon which many, we fear, enter with no distrustful thought, save how they are to obtain a good living. His feelings were naturally pious, and his convictions strong and sincere; yet, late in life, we find him declining to read prayers in a friend's family, because "he did not deem himself good enough." We must, however, notice the tradition, upon which, we presume, Mr Prior places no reliance, of Mr Noll being refused ordination, because, with his habitual inconsequence, he chose to appear before his diocesan, the Bishop of Elphin, in a pair of scarlet breeches. His lounging life was brought to a close by his uncle, Contarine, procuring him an appointment as tutor in the family of a gentleman of Roscommon, named Flinn. Here he remained about a year. There are various accounts of his reasons for quitting an occupation he always found so uncongenial to his disposition. His sister, Hodson, from whom his different biographers have received considerable information concerning the earlier periods of his history, Attributes his immediate removal to an altercation with one of the family, in consequence of sitting down to cards on the receipt of his salary, and, by a train of ill luck, or, as he did not hesitate to say, by unfair play, losing the sum that had been paid him. Securing, however, according to her account, though it does not appear from what quarter, about thirty pounds and a good horse, he quitted the country, none of his family knew whither.

At the end of six weeks, he unexpectedly returned, destitute of money or the horse on which he set out, but provided with an inferior animal, facetiously denominated by him Fiddleback. In reply to the anxious inquiries of his friends, he gave the following account of his adventures; first, verbally, and then in a letter to his mother, who had expressed some doubts of its truth, and to whom he said, with characteristic simplicity, on observing her coolness, "And now, my dear mother, after having struggled so hard to come home to you, I wonder you are not more rejoiced to see me."

An exceedingly amusing and characteristic letter to his mother, detailing his adventures, has been preserved by Mrs Hodson; though, as it was merely a copy, its authenticity has been questioned. Failing the church, law was next proposed for Goldsmith; but we must now draw upon Mr Prior's narrative, as all his amiable partiality for his subject is required to gloss over the provoking folly which marked this part of the poet's career—

The law was determined upon; and, with this view, Mr Contarine supplied Goldsmith with fifty pounds, according to the account of Mrs Hodson, and sent him off to the Irish metropolis, on his way to London, in order to keep the usual terms common to Irish students. In Dublin, however, the same authority informs us, his evil genius again prevailed; for, being tempted into a gaming house, according to traditionary accounts, by a Roscommon acquaintance, no inconsiderable adept in the art, he was stript of all his money, and again left to become a burthen and a subject of reproach to his friends.

The shame and mortification occasioned by this imprudence were very sincere; for, however prone to fall into error, few felt more acutely, or lamented more strongly, when too late, its usual results. He continued some time in Dublin without having courage to communicate his loss. This, however, being at length made known, he was again invited to the country and forgiven by his uncle; but less readily by his mother, who experienced no ordinary vexation and evinced some resentment, at such repeated imprudences and miscarriages. He lived for a few months afterwards with his brother Henry; until a quarrel, arising from some trifling cause, proceeded to undue extremities, and, for a time, terminated all regard and intercourse between the brothers. We know it was not permanent; none were more aware of their own faults than Oliver, or more grateful for the kindness and exertions of his relatives for his interests, although continually subject to that weakness which, however conscious of doing wrong, seems unable to perform what is right. This momentary anger, though carried farther on the part of both than propriety warranted, gradually subsided, and we have seen with what respect and tenderness he addresses him in the dedication to and introductory lines of "The Traveller." Another profession was chosen, not only with the concurrence of his immediate relatives, but the advice, as was asserted by the poet himself, of Dean Goldsmith of Cloyne; the design now being to proceed to Edinburgh, and commence the study of physic.

By the united contributions of his uncle, brother, and sister, (Mrs Hodson,) and their promise of continued support, as she stated to Mr Handcock, he reached Edinburgh in the autumn of 1752.

On his first appearance in Edinburgh, he was in danger of becoming a stray or waif, from very characteristically sallying forth, without taking note either of the street in which he had taken lodgings, or the name of his landlady. By good fortune, the trusty cawdie who had carried his luggage, picked him up, at night, in this perplexity, and restored him to his trunks and his new abode. The meagre fare furnished by his frugal landlady, furnished Goldsmith with as many jokes against the Scotch as she cooked dinners out of one poor leg of mutton. The elder Monro, and other eminent medical professors, at this time gave celebrity to the University of Edinburgh. The degree of application which Goldsmith gave to his new studies, is not ascertained; but it was probably not great. His fellow-students, after he rose to celebrity, had a better recollection of his convivial qualities, his Irish songs, and humorous stories, than of his ardour for science. As usual, he was frequently involved in pecuniary difficulties—partly, no doubt, from the proverbially short length which gifted money goes, and partly by his own imprudence. Mr Prior has seen the original of the subjoined letter, written from Edinburgh, which we might perhaps have omitted to notice, as we should have believed that it appeared complete in every edition of Goldsmith's works, had not Mr Prior mentioned the curious fact that it is suppressed in the Scottish editions. They must be thin-skinned Scots indeed who can take offence at the balderdash written by one wild young Irishman to another.

To Robert Bryanton, at Ballymahon, Ireland.

Edinburgh, Sept. 26, 1753.

MY DEAR BOB,—How many good excuses (and you know I was ever good at an excuse) might I call up to vindicate my past shameful silence! I might tell how I wrote a long letter on my first coming hither, and seem vastly angry at my not receiving an answer; I might allege that business (with business, you know, I was always pestered) had never given me time to finger a pen. But I suppress those and twenty more as plausible, and as easily invented, since they might be attended with a slight inconvenience of being known to be lies. Let me then speak truth. An hereditary indolence (I have it from the mother's side) has hitherto prevented my writing to you, and still prevents my writing at least twenty-five letters more, due to my friends in Ireland. No turnspit-dog gets up into his wheel with more reluctance than I sit down to write; yet no dog ever loved the roast meat he turns better than I do him I now address.

Yet what shall I say now I am entered? Shall I tire you with a description of this unfruitful country; where I must lead you over their hills all brown with heath, or their valleys scarcely able to feed a rabbit? Man alone seems to be the only creature who has arrived to the natural size in this poor soil. Every part of the country presents the same dismal landscape. No grove nor brook lend their music to cheer the stranger, or make the inhabitants forget their poverty. Yet, with all these disadvantages to call him down to humility, a Scotchman is one of the proudest things alive. The poor have pride ever ready to relieve them. If mankind should happen to despise them, they are masters of their own admiration; and that they can plentifully bestow upon themselves.

From their pride and poverty, as I take it, results one advantage this country enjoys; namely, the gentlemen here are much better bred than among us. No such character here as our fox-hunters; and they have expressed great surprise when I informed them that some men in Ireland, of one thousand pounds a-year, spend their whole lives in running after a hare, drinking to be drunk, and getting every girl with child that will let them. Truly if such a being, equipped in his hunting dress, came among a circle of Scotch gentry, they would behold him with the same astonishment that a countryman does King George on horseback.

The men here have generally high cheek bones, and are lean and swarthy, fond of action, dancing in particular. Now that I have mentioned dancing, let me say something of their balls, which are very frequent here. When a stranger enters the dancing-hall, he sees one end of the room taken up by the ladies, who sit dismally in a group by themselves—in the other end stand their pensive partners that are to be—but no more intercourse between the sexes than there is between two countries at war. The ladies indeed may ogle, and the gentlemen sigh; but an embargo is laid on any closer commerce. At length, to interrupt hostilities, the lady directress, or intendant, or what you will, pitches upon a lady and gentleman to walk a minuet; which they perform with a formality that approaches to despondence. After five or six couple have thus walked the gauntlet, all stand up to country dances; each gentleman furnished with a partner from the aforesaid lady directress; so they dance much, say nothing, and thus concludes our assembly. I told a Scotch gentleman that such profound silence resembled the ancient procession of the Roman matrons in honour of Ceres; and the Scotch gentleman told me, (and, faith, I believe he was right) that I was a very great pedant for my pains.

Now I am come to the ladies; and to shew that I love Scotland, and everything that belongs to so charming a country, I insist on it, and will give him leave to break my head that denies it—that the Scotch ladies are ten thousand times finer and handsomer than the Irish. To be sure, now, I see your sisters Betty and Peggy vastly surprised at my partiality; but tell them flatly, I don't value them, or their fine skins, or eyes, or good sense, or ——, a potato; for I say, and will maintain it; and as a convincing proof (I am in a great passion) of what I assert, the Scotch ladies say it themselves. But to be less serious: where will you find a language so prettily become a pretty mouth as the broad Scotch? And the women here speak it in its highest purity; for instance, teach one of your young ladies at home to pronounce the "Whoar wull I gong?" with a becoming widening of mouth, and I'll lay my life they'll wound every hearer.

We have no such character here as a coquette; but alas! how many envious prudes! Some days ago I walked into my Lord Kilcoubry's, (don't be surprised—my Lord is but a glover,*) when the Duchess of Hamilton (that fair who sacrificed her beauty to her ambition, and her inward peace to a title and gilt equipage) passed by in her chariot;† her battered husband, or more properly the guardian of her charms, sat by her side. Straight envy began, in the shape of no less than three ladies who sat with me, to find faults in her faultless form. "For my part," says the first, "I think, what I always thought, that the Duchess has too much of the red in her complexion." "Madam, I am of your opinion," says the second; "I think her face has a palish cast too much on the delicate order." "And let me tell you," added the third lady, whose mouth was puckered up to the size of an issue, "that the Duchess has fine lips, but she wants a mouth."—At this every lady drew up her mouth as if going to pronounce the letter P.

But how ill, my Bob, does it become me to ridicule women with whom I have scarcely any correspondence? There are, 'tis certain, handsome women here; and 'tis as certain they have handsome men to keep them company. An ugly and a poor man is society only for himself; and such society the world lets me enjoy in great abundance. Fortune has given you circumstances, and nature a person to look charming in the eyes of the fair. Nor do I envy my dear Bob such blessings, while I may sit down and laugh at the world, and at myself—the most ridiculous object in it. But you see I am grown downright splenetic, and perhaps the fit may continue till I receive an answer to this. I know you cannot send me much news from Ballymahon, but such as it is, send it all; everything you send will be agreeable to me.

Has George Conway put up a sign yet; or John Binely left off drinking drams; or Tom Allen got a new wig? But I leave you to your own choice what to write. While I live, know you have a true friend in yours, &c. &c. &c.

OLIVER GOLDSMITH.

P. S. Give my sincere respects (not compliments, do you mind) to your agreeable family, and give my service

* William Maclellan, who claimed the title, and whose son succeeded in establishing the claim in 1773. The father is said to have voted at the election of the sixteen peers for Scotland; and to have sold gloves in the lobby at this and other public assemblages.

to my mother if you see her; for, as you express it in Ireland, I have a sneaking kindness for her still. Direct to me, ——, Student in Physic, in Edinburgh.

Mr Prior has been so fortunate as to recover one or two letters, written from Edinburgh, to Mr Contarine, of which the following are extracts:—

MY DEAR UNCLE,—In your letter (the only one I received from Kilmore) you call me the philosopher who carries all his goods about him. Yet how can such a character fit me, who have left behind in Ireland everything I think worth possessing—friends that I loved, and a society that pleased while it instructed? Who but must regret the loss of such enjoyments? Who but must regret his absence from Kilmore, that ever knew it as I did? Here, as recluse as the Turkish Spy at Paris, I am almost unknown to everybody, except some few who attend the professors of physic as I do.

Apropos, I shall give you the professors' names, and, as far as occurs to me, their characters; and, first, as most deserving, Mr Monro, Professor of Anatomy: this man has brought the science he teaches to as much perfection as it is capable of; and, not content with barely teaching anatomy, he launches out into all the branches of physic, when all his remarks are new and useful. 'Tis he, I may venture to say, that draws hither such a number of students from most parts of the world, even from Russia. He is not only a skilful physician, but an able orator, and delivers things, in their nature obscure, in so easy a manner, that the most unlearned may understand him. . . . . .

You see, then, dear sir, that Monro is the only great man among them; so that I intend to hear him another winter and go then to hear Albinus, the great professor at Leyden. I read (with satisfaction) a science the most pleasing in nature, so that my labours are but a relaxation, and, I may truly say, the only thing here that gives me pleasure. How I enjoy the pleasing hope of returning with skill, and to find my friends stand in no need of my assistance! How many happy years do I wish you! and nothing but want of health can take from you happiness, since you so well pursue the paths that conduct to virtue.

P.S.—I draw this time for £6, and will draw next October but for £4, as I was obliged to buy everything since I came to Scotland, shirts not even excepted. I am a little more early the first year than I shall be for the future, for I absolutely will not trouble you before the time hereafter.

My best love attend Mr and Mrs Lawder, and Heaven preserve them! I am again your dutiful nephew, O. G.

I have been a month in the Highlands. I set out the first day on foot; but an ill-natured corn I have got on my toe has, for the future, prevented that cheap method of travelling; so the second day I hired a horse, of about the size of a ram, and he walked away (trot he could not) as pensive as his master. In three days we reached the Highlands. This letter would be too long if it contained the description I intend giving of that country; so shall make it the subject of my next.

Of this promised narrative of the Highland excursion, no trace can be found. It was, in all likelihood, never written. Mr Prior gives us a circumstantial and rather interesting account of Goldsmith's fellow-students,* before he gets to a second letter to Mr Contarine, the generous, indulgent uncle, which is dated January 1754. It announces the projects of the student, who had now been two winters in Edinburgh, in farther prosecuting his profession—

I have seen all that this country can exhibit in the medical way, and therefore intend to visit Paris, where the great Mr Farhein, Petit, and Du Hammel de Monceau instruct their pupils in all the branches of medicine. They speak French, and consequently I shall have the advantage of most of my countrymen, as I am perfectly acquainted with that language, and few who leave Ireland are so.

. . . . . .

I shall spend this spring and summer in Paris, and the beginning of next winter go to Leyden. The great Albinus is still alive there, and 'twill be proper to go, though only to have it said that we have studied in so famous an university.

As I shall not have another opportunity of receiving money from your bounty till my return to Ireland, so I have drawn for the last sum that I hope I shall ever trouble you for; 'tis £20. And now, dear sir, let me here acknowledge the humility of the station in which you found me; let me tell how I was despised by most, and hateful to myself. Poverty, hopeless poverty, was my lot, and Melancholy was beginning to make me her own; when you—— But I stop here, to inquire how your health goes on? How does my cousin Jenny, and has she recovered her late complaint? How does my poor Jack Goldsmith? I fear his disorder is of such a nature as he won't easily recover. I wish, my dear sir, you would make me happy by another letter before I go abroad, for there I shall hardly hear from you. I shall carry just £33 to France, with good store of clothes, shirts, &c. &c., and that, with economy, will serve.

I have spent more than a fortnight every second day at the Duke of Hamilton's; but it seems they like me more as a jester than as a companion; so I disdained so servile an employment; 'twas unworthy my calling as a physician.

Mr Prior concludes that Goldsmith must have been an inmate with the Duke of Hamilton; which is not probable. The Dukes of Hamilton, as hereditary Keepers of Holyrood House, have apartments in the palace; and there probably poor Goldsmith was brought up to make sport for the Philistines. Mr Prior might have remarked that he only spent every "second day" at the Duke's.

Mr Prior betrays a little credulity in his ready adoption of Goldsmith's mystification about the cause of his arrest at Newcastle. We fear that, whether the £33 were entire in his pocket or not, he stole away from Edinburgh in a manner not unusual with his countrymen in those days, without consulting his tailor. He tells his uncle that, having embarked at Leith in a vessel bound for Bourdeaux, which put into Newcastle from stress of weather, he was arrested under the following extraordinary circumstances:—

We all went on shore to refresh us after the fatigues of our voyage. Seven men and I were one day on shore; and, on the following evening, as we were all very merry, the room door bursts open; enters a sergeant, and twelve grenadiers, with their bayonets screwed, and puts us all under the King's arrest. It seems my company were Scotchmen in the French service, and had been in Scotland to enlist soldiers for the French army. I endeavoured all I could to prove my innocence; however, I remained in prison with the rest a fortnight, and with difficulty got off even then. Dear sir, keep this all a secret, or, at least, say it was for debt; for, if it were once known at the University, I should hardly get a degree. But hear how Providence interfered in my favour: the ship was gone on to Bourdeaux before I got from prison, and was wrecked at the mouth of the Garonne, and every one of the crew were drowned. It happened the last great storm. There was a ship at that time ready for Holland: I embarked, and, in nine days, thank my God, I arrived safe at Rotterdam, whence I travelled by land to Leyden; and whence I now write.

* These were all Goldsmith's countrymen, and had been students at Trinity College, Dublin. The most noticeable of the number, Mr Lauchlan Macleane, is attracting the public attention as we write, from the circumstance of Sir David Brewster having lately discovered, among the papers of Macpherson, of Ossianic celebrity, documents which, it is said, confirm the fact of Macleane being the real Junius. Macpherson's repositories are, however, a very suspicious quarter from which to authenticate any disputed literary fact. To do the thing in good style he should have been Junius himself.—E. T. M.

It is not surprising that Mr Contarine received this legend as gospel, since Mr Prior swallows it. Macleane said this story was a hoax, and that Goldsmith was arrested at Sunderland by one Barclay, an Edinburgh tailor. Yielding to the propensity of telling white lies was one of Goldsmith's constitutional infirmities. "Sir," said Johnson, upon one occasion, "Noll will lie through an inch board."

His description of Leyden and the Dutch is as clever and entertaining, and quite as much exaggerated, as his account of the Scotch. It is to "The Traveller" we must turn for a striking and faithful delineation of national character, and the true philosophy of its gradual formation.

The modern Dutchman is quite a different creature from him of former times: he in everything imitates a Frenchman, but in his easy disengaged air, which is the result of keeping polite company. The Dutchman is vastly ceremonious, and is perhaps what a Frenchman might have been in the reign of Louis XIV. Such are the better bred. But the downright Hollander is one of the oddest figures in nature: upon a head of lank hair, he wears a half-cocked narrow hat, laced with black ribbon; no coat, but seven waistcoats, and nine pairs of breeches; so that his hips reach almost up to his armpits. This well-clothed vegetable is now fit to see company, or to make love. But what a pleasing creature is the object of his appetite! Why, she wears a large fur cap, with a deal of Flanders lace; and for every pair of breeches he carries, she puts on two petticoats.

A Dutch lady burns nothing about her phlegmatic admirer but his tobacco. You must know, sir, every woman carries in her hand a stove with coals in it, which, when she sits, she snugs under her petticoats; and at this chimney, dozing Strephon lights his pipe. I take it that this continual smoking is what gives the man the ruddy, healthful complexion he generally wears, by draining his superfluous moisture, while the woman, deprived of this amusement, overflows with such viscidities as tint the complexion, and give that paleness of visage which low fenny grounds and moist air conspire to cause.

A Dutch woman and Scotch will well bear an opposition. The one is pale and fat, the other lean and ruddy: the one walks as if she were straddling after a go-cart, and the other takes too masculine a stride. I shall not endeavour to deprive either country of its share of beauty; but must say, that, of all objects on this earth, an English farmer's daughter is most charming. Every woman there is a complete beauty, while the higher class of women want many of the requisites to make them even tolerable. Their pleasures here are very dull, though very various. You may smoke, you may doze, you may go to the Italian comedy—as good an amusement as either of the former.

Scotland and this country bear the highest contrast. There, hills and rocks intercept every prospect; here, 'tis all a continued plain. There, you might see a well-dressed duchess issuing from a dirty close; and here, a dirty Dutchman inhabiting a palace. The Scotch may be compared to a tulip planted in dung; but I never see a Dutchman in his own house, but I think of a magnificent Egyptian temple dedicated to an ox.

Physic is by no means taught so well here as in Edinburgh.

He seems to have entertained but a poor opinion of all the Leyden professors, save Gaubius; of whom he relates—Happening once, in conversation with Gaubius of Leyden, to mention the College of Edinburgh, he began by complaining that all the English students who formerly came to his university, now went entirely there; and the fact surprised him more, as Leyden was now as well as ever furnished with masters excellent in their respective professions. He concluded by asking if the professors at Edinburgh were rich. I replied, that the salary of a professor there seldom amounted to more than thirty pounds a-year. "Poor men!" says he, "I heartily wish they were better provided for; until they become rich, we can have no expectation of English students at Leyden."

Gaubius had the modern idea of the utility of college endowments.

From Dr Ellis, his countryman and fellow-student at Leyden, an account is obtained of Goldsmith's habits at that university, which is probably more candid than, we regret to confess, satisfactory. He was often in extreme distress, and sometimes reduced to borrowing small, we fear very small, sums, upon the strength of expected Irish remittances, which seldom or never came.

Occasionally he taught his native language; and sometimes resorted to play, frequently the forlorn hope of the necessitous, as well as the amusement of the idle or the dissipated, in the hope, by some lucky effort, of extricating himself from difficulties. Such habits we may lament more than condemn; for the needy are almost necessarily among the irregular in conduct; and it requires some self-denial and strength of mind to prevent poverty from relaxing even rigid morality. But it had little influence on his good humour; he was usually gay and cheerful; and, when taxed with imprudence for risking such small sums as he possessed, admitted the fact, and promised amendment for the future. . . . . .

Having had a successful run at play, according to Dr Ellis, Goldsmith called upon that gentleman the following morning, and counted out a considerable sum, which he was advised not again to trust to chance, but hoard as a provision for future necessities. This recommendation he promised to follow, and probably meant to fulfil; but he was again seduced to the scene of his former success, and, with the usual lot of the dupes to this passion, lost the whole of what he had previously gained.

He had been about a year at Leyden before he set out upon that pedestrian ramble in France, Switzerland, and Italy, a detailed account of which, from his own pen, would have been beyond all price. Such a one existed, and was destroyed by an accidental fire. But we have its essence in "The Traveller," and are content. His departure was characterised by another of his impulsive generous imprudencies. A loan was obtained from his friend Ellis to enable him to commence his journey, when he chanced to see some of those rare tulips then an object of mad speculation in Holland, and of curiosity to the rest of Europe. He remembered his uncle, Mr Contarine's, love of flowers; and, laying out all his cash in the purchase of those costly roots, he fared forth, with one clean shirt, and little or no money in his pocket.

The period of Goldsmith's wanderings must have been an important one in the history of his mind. He was already poetical; and his solitary ramble, with its lavish variety of scenery, vicissitudes, hardships, and adventures, made him a poet. Mr Prior is led to believe that some of the "Philosophic Vagabond's" letters from the Continent may still exist; but his persevering researches have not yet recovered them. This gentleman also believes, that, with some embellishments and suppressions, Goldsmith has embodied the leading traits and incidents of his personal adventures in the story of "George Primrose, the Philosophic Vagabond." It is known that he remained for some time at Louvain; and he also visited the other principal towns of Belgium. His journeys were made on foot, and probably in the exact manner he has stated in "The Vicar of Wakefield."

"I had some knowledge of music," he says, "with a tolerable voice, and now turned what was my amusement into a present means of subsistence. I passed among the harmless peasants of Flanders, and among such of the French as were poor enough to be very merry; for I ever found them sprightly in proportion to their wants. Whenever I approached a peasant's house, towards nightfall, I played one of my most merry tunes, and that procured me not only a lodging, but subsistence for the next day. I once or twice attempted to play for people of fashion, but they always thought my performance odious, and never rewarded me even with a trifle."

In foreign monasteries, he must have met with countrymen; and there are no people warmer in their national feelings than the Irish. Upon stated days, disputations were held in some of those convents and colleges, and a moderate display of logic and Latinity obtained the hospitality of the brotherhood for one night, and some small gratuity. "Thus," he says, in the character of the Vicar's son, "I fought my way towards England, walked from city to city, examined mankind more nearly, and, if I may so express it, saw both sides of the picture."

At Paris, he attended the lectures of Rouelle, an eminent professor of chemistry—the Davy of the time—who was daily attended by a bright circle of fashion and beauty. By some unknown means, he was introduced to Voltaire, for whose genius and brilliant talents he entertained high admiration. From Paris, he took the route to Strasburgh; and, crossing the Rhine, entered Switzerland, at a season when the cataract of Schaffhausen was ice-bound. From incidental allusions scattered through his works, it is known that he must have crossed the Alps in June or July. It is believed that he was for a time the tutor or travelling companion of a parsimonious person, whose character he has traced in that of the pupil of George Primrose.

From Switzerland, he sent his brother Henry the first rude sketch of "The Traveller," in eighty lines.

Descending into Piedmont, he visited Florence, Verona, Mantua, Milan, and Venice, and remained for some months at Padua, where he is supposed to have taken his medical degree. We consider it doubtful if he ever had a right to any such distinction—save, if it be not a bull, the very common one accorded by his countrymen to every apothecary's apprentice—the grave title, namely, of Doctor. In Italy, his slender, untutored skill in music was of no use in helping him forward, and accordingly the convents were his dependence; but, upon re-entering France, he again took up his flute. His remarks upon the internal condition of France shew considerable political sagacity in a rambling poet of twenty-seven years of age:—

When I consider that these Parliaments, the members of which are all created by the Court, (the Presidents of which can only act by immediate direction,) presume even to mention privileges and freedom, who till of late received directions from the throne with implicit humility; when this is considered, I cannot help fancying that the genius of freedom has entered that kingdom in disguise. If they have but three weak monarchs more successively on the throne, the mask will be laid aside, and the country will once more be free.

"Poor Goldsmith" reached London in the beginning of February 1756, and in extreme destitution. Disguising his real name, he attempted to procure employment as an usher. But who could receive an usher without testimonials?—and these he ventured, upon slender acquaintance, to solicit from Dr Radcliffe, of Trinity College, whom he knew to be an amiable and benevolent man; at the same time privately informing him of the alias, and throwing himself upon his compassion. No notice was taken of this equivocal application; yet he did, by some means, obtain temporary employment in a small school, supposed to have been near Tenterden. The drudgery and mortifications of the kind of life which he has described so graphically, soon disgusted him, and he returned to London no better than he had left it. Goldsmith one day astonished a brilliant dinner party at Sir Joshua Reynolds', by commencing a story, "When I lived among the beggars of Axe Lane." His residence in this society is supposed to have been while he was without any employment at all.

Ultimately he obtained temporary employment, from motives of pity, as assistant to a chemist named Jacob. It is recorded, among the tardy indemnifications of genius, that the house of his employer afterwards became an object of interest and curiosity to young literary men. While thus occupied, he learned that Dr Joseph Fenn Sleigh, his fellow-student at Trinity College, and afterwards in Edinburgh, was in London. This gentleman, an amiable and intelligent Quaker, had been the schoolfellow of Burke at Ballitore. He ultimately settled in Cork as a physician, and died prematurely. Goldsmith found him out; and he mournfully relates—"But, notwithstanding it was Sunday, and it is to be supposed in my best clothes, Sleigh scarcely knew me—such is the tax the unfortunate pay to poverty. However, when he did recollect me, I found his heart as warm as ever, and he shared his purse and friendship with me during his continuance in London."

Supplies from Ireland had totally failed before this period; but Sleigh, and one or two more early friends, enabled Goldsmith to commence as an humble practitioner in medicine, in a very poor neighbourhood in Southwark. To fit himself for this vocation, he, with his ordinary discretion, equipped himself from Rag Fair, or some similar repository of cast-off tawdry finery.

"My father," writes the Rev. Thomas Beatty, Rector of Moira, in Ireland, in a communication on this subject, "met Goldsmith in London, during a visit to that capital, about the year 1756. He was dressed, according to the fashion of that day, in a suit of green and gold, but old and tarnished; and his shirt and neckcloth appeared to have been worn at least a fortnight. He said he was practising physic, and doing very well."

A ludicrous story, told of him at this period, afterwards reached the ears of Sir Joshua Reynolds, who repeated it to one of their mutual friends, a lady, who, to the delight of her acquaintance, can still detail the anecdote, and through whom it is, with much more information, communicated to the reader. In conformity to the prevailing garb of the day for physicians, Goldsmith, unable probably to obtain a new, had procured a second-hand velvet coat; but, either from being deceived in the bargain, or by subsequent accident, a considerable breach in the left breast was obliged to be repaired by the introduction of a new piece. This had not been so neatly done, as not to be apparent to the close observation of his acquaintance, and such persons as he visited in the capacity of medical attendant; willing, therefore, to conceal what is considered too obvious a symptom of poverty, he was accustomed to place his hat over the patch, and retain it there carefully during the visit; but this constant position becoming noticed, and the cause being soon known, occasioned no little merriment at his expense.

About the same period, he obtained an introduction to Richardson, through a patient, one of the diligent compositors or correctors of the press to that admired author and prosperous printer. There is no evidence that Richardson—a vain and cautious man—paid any attention to the unfortunate son of Apollo, beyond giving him proof-sheets to correct, an employment which he felt irksome and speedily abandoned.

Fortune now began to relent. He obtained employment as an usher with Dr Milner, a worthy Dissenter, who kept a respectable and large boarding-school at Peckham, and whose son he had known at the Edinburgh University. Dr and Mrs Milner treated him with consideration; and he is said, by their daughter, to have remained for three years at Peckham, though Mr Prior doubts the accuracy of her memory. The daughter of his employer farther reports, "that he was very good-natured, played tricks somewhat familiar, and occasionally a little coarse, upon the servants and boys; told very entertaining stories; and found frequent amusement in his flute. With the scholars he was a favourite, being ever ready to indulge them in certain, not very expensive indeed, school-boy dainties, whenever his pecuniary means permitted; and he was not over-strict in that discipline which, however necessary to observe, a man of amiable disposition occasionally feels reluctant to enforce. His benevolent feelings appeared always active: mendicants rarely quitted him without relief; and a tale of distress roused all his sympathies. His small supplies were thus exhausted frequently before the stated salary became due, when Mrs Milner would say to him with a smile, upon application for an advance, 'You had better, Mr Goldsmith, let me take care of your money, as I do for some of the young gentlemen;' to which he would reply, in the same spirit of good humour, 'In truth, madam, there is equal need.'"

At Peckham, he became acquainted with Griffiths, the bookseller, who was either projecting, or had commenced, The Monthly Review; and, after contributing several papers to that miscellany, the usher was transferred to the house of the publisher, where, for his regular assistance, he was to obtain his board and lodging, and a salary, the amount of which is not specified. The engagement was found unsatisfactory by both parties. The drudgery to which poor Goldsmith was now subjected was even more weary wo than his tasks as an usher. Feelingly does Mr Prior remark, that—

Writing, though one of the most delightful of amusements, is the most laborious of trades. To sit down daily to furnish the stated number of pages for a periodical journal—to work, whether disposed or not, whether suffering under a diseased body or jaded mind—to rack invention and memory in order to furnish the expected amount of information to the reader, the customary supplies of wisdom and wit, of research, judgment, and taste—can be no easy or enviable employment. Between a methodical man like the bookseller, and a man without method like the critic, there was not likely to be much community of feeling. They, therefore, parted; but, however dissatisfied with each other, as was afterwards sufficiently obvious, not, as it would seem, in open hostility at the moment.

Goldsmith declared that he wrote daily from nine o'clock till two, and often, as he sometimes added, during the whole of the day; that he experienced little personal consideration at the hands of his employer, and few comforts from the arrangements of his wife.

This was not all. Griffiths—who is represented as a man of strong, shrewd good sense, but not of refinement or cultivation—not only assumed the office of altering and interpolating the compositions of his lodger himself, but he permitted Mrs Griffiths to take similar liberties. The domestic connexion was soon dissolved; but Goldsmith continued to contribute to The Review. From Griffiths' books, and his private copy of The Review, Mr Prior has been able to discover the most of Goldsmith's articles during the six months that he contributed. Among them is a review of Burke's "Essay on the Sublime and Beautiful," and of Smollet's "History of England." It was about this time that he wrote to his brother-in-law Hodson at Lissoy—"By a very little practice as a physician, and a very little reputation as a poet, I make a shift to live." The medical practice could not have been great, nor was it long continued; and he was now beginning to furnish occasional articles to numerous mushroom miscellanies, and had found means, at intervals, to compose his "Inquiry into the Present State of Polite Learning." The work was published by Dodsley in 1759, the bookseller having advanced the price in small occasional sums during the two former years. With more than his usual providence, he formed the design of securing to himself the profits of the Irish sale, at a time when every popular English work was remorselessly though legally pirated in Dublin as soon as it appeared. His letters at this period form the best record of his personal history, and give the most lively picture of his way of life.

You may easily imagine what difficulties I had to encounter, left as I was without friends, recommendations, money, or impudence; and that in a country where being born an Irishman was sufficient to keep me unemployed. Many, in such circumstances, would have had recourse to the friar's cord, or the suicide's halter,

But with all my follies I had principle to resist the one and resolution to combat the other.

I suppose you desire to know my present situation. As there is nothing in it at which I should blush, or which mankind could censure, I see no reason for making it a secret. In short, by a very little practice as a physician, and a very little reputation as a poet, I make a shift to live. Nothing is more apt to introduce us to the gates of the muses than poverty; but it were well if they only left us at the door. The mischief is, they sometimes choose to give us their company at the entertainment; and want, instead of being gentleman-usher, often turns master of the ceremonies.

Thus, upon learning I write, no doubt you imagine I starve; and the name of an author naturally reminds you of a garret. In this particular I do not think it proper to undeceive my friends. But whether I eat or starve, live in a first floor or four pair of stairs high, I still remember them with ardour; nay, my very country comes in for a share of my affection. Unaccountable fondness for country, this maladie du pais, as the French call it! Unaccountable that he should still have an affection for a place who never, when in it, received above common civility; who never brought anything out of it except his brogue and his blunders! Surely my affection is equally ridiculous with the Scotchman's, who refused to be cured of the itch, because it made him unco thoughtful of his wife and bonny Inverary.

To his friend Bryanton, he thus concludes an epistle of bitter gaiety:—

Oh, gods! gods! here in a garret writing for bread, and expecting to be dunned for a milk score! However, dear Bob, whether in penury or affluence, serious or gay, I am ever wholly thine.

Give my—no, not compliments neither, but something [the] most warm and sincere wish that you can conceive, to your mother, Mrs Bryanton, to Miss Bryanton, to yourself; and, if there be a favourite dog in the family, let me be remembered to it.

An elegant and playful letter, hovering between serious reflection and banter, was addressed, about the same period, to Mrs Lawder, the daughter of his affectionate uncle, Contarine, who had now, it would seem, fallen into harmless dotage. Goldsmith commences with apologetic explanations of the reason of his long silence:—

I could not—I own I could not—continue a correspondence; for every acknowledgment for past favours might be considered as an indirect request for future ones, and where it might be thought I gave my heart from a motive of gratitude alone, when I was conscious of having bestowed it on much more disinterested principles.

It is true, this conduct might have been simple enough, but yourself must confess it was in character. Those who know me at all know that I have always been actuated by different principles from the rest of mankind; and while none regarded the interest of his friend more, no man on earth regarded his own less. I have often affected bluntness to avoid the imputation of flattery: have frequently seemed to overlook those merits too obvious to escape notice, and pretended disregard to those instances of good nature and good sense, which I could not fail tacitly to applaud; and all this lest I should be ranked amongst the grinning tribe, who say, "Very true" to all that is said, who fill a vacant chair at a tea-table, whose narrow souls never moved in a wider circle than the circumference of a guinea, and who had rather be reckoning the money in your pocket than the virtue of your breast. All this, I say, I have done, and a thousand other very silly though very disinterested things in my time, and for all which no soul cares a farthing about me. God's curse, madam! is it to be wondered, that he should once in his life forget you, who has been all his life forgetting himself?

However, it is probable you may one of those days see me turned into a perfect hunks, and as dark and intricate as a mouse hole. I have already given my landlady orders for an entire reform in the state of my finances. I declaim against hot suppers, drink less sugar in my tea, and cheek my grate with brick-bats. Instead of hanging my room with pictures, I intend to adorn it with maxims of frugality. Those will make pretty furniture enough, and won't be a bit too expensive; for I shall draw them all out with my own hands, and my landlady's daughter shall frame them with the parings of black waistcoat. Each maxim is to be inscribed on a sheet of clean paper, and wrote with my best pen; of which the following will serve as a specimen:—"Look sharp;" "Mind the main chance;" "Money is money now;" "If you have a thousand pounds you can put your hands by your sides, and say you are worth a thousand pounds every day of the year;" "Take a farthing from a hundred and it will be a hundred no longer." Thus, which way soever I turn my eyes, they are sure to meet one of those friendly monitors; and, as we are told of an actor who hung his room round with looking-glass to correct the defects of his person, my apartment shall be furnished in a peculiar manner, to correct the errors of my mind.

Faith! madam, I heartily wish to be rich, if it were only for this reason, to say without a blush how much I esteem you; but, alas! I have many a fatigue to encounter before that happy time comes, when your poor old simple friend may again give a loose to the luxuriance of his nature, sitting by Kilmore fire-side, recount the various adventures of a hard-fought life, laugh over the follies of the day, join his flute to your harpischord, and forget that ever he starved in those streets where Butler and Otway starved before him.

And now I mention those great names—My uncle! he is no more that soul of fire as when once I knew him. Newton and Swift grew dim with age as well as he. But what shall I say?—his mind was too active an inhabitant not to disorder the feeble mansion of its abode; for the richest jewels soonest wear their settings. Yet who but the fool would lament his condition! He now forgets the calamities of life. Perhaps indulgent heaven has given him a foretaste of that tranquillity here, which he so well deserves hereafter.

But I must come to business; for business, as one of my maxims tells me, must be minded or lost.

We find him, about this time, engaged in translations, and in assisting Smollett in The Critical Review, of which the latter was editor, and which had been set up to rival Griffiths' popular publication. His best friends combined in advising him against this precarious way of life, and urged him to obtain a permanent appointment, which he imagined he had secured, in the East India Company's Service, as a surgeon on the coast of Coromandel, and through the interest of Mr Jones, an East India Director. The evidence that his appointment was ever confirmed is, to us, not clear; and, at all events, either from awkwardness and confusion of mind, or real ignorance of his nominal profession, he was cast in an examination at Surgeons' Hall; while a James Barnard, another and rival candidate, passed as mate to an hospital, for which office Oliver Goldsmith was found not qualified. This humiliation he studiously concealed from his friends. The misery and mortification did not terminate here. Griffiths had become security to a tailor for the suit of clothes in which Goldsmith appeared at Surgeons' Hall, and which were to be returned if not paid for. Driven by urgent necessity to so degrading a step, he was compelled to pawn them; and Griffiths was exasperated beyond measure. He had also entrusted books to the custody of the unfortunate author, and became alarmed lest they should have followed the pawned apparel. Mr Prior states that Griffiths, who certainly had some cause of complaint, wrote the unhappy debtor an abusive letter; to which "poor Goldsmith" replied by an apology for his conduct, and for "the occasional meannesses which poverty unavoidably brings with it." But Griffiths was not softened by this submission; and reproaches of the most galling nature, and threats of legal severity, drew forth the following most affecting letter, written with the prospect of a gaol and starvation staring the unhappy poet full in the face:—

SIR,—I know of no misery but a jail to which my own imprudencies and your letter seem to point. I have seen it inevitable these three or four weeks, and, by heavens! request it as a favour—as a favour that may prevent somewhat more fatal. I have been some years struggling with a wretched being—with all that contempt that indigence brings with it—with all those strong passions which make contempt insupportable. What, then, has a jail that is formidable? I shall at least have the society of wretches, and such is, to me, true society. I tell you again and again, I am now neither able nor willing to pay you a farthing, but I will be punctual to any appointment you or the tailor shall make; thus far, at least, I do not act the sharper, since, unable to pay my debts one way, I would willingly give some security another. No, sir, had I been a sharper, had I been possessed of less good nature and native generosity, I might surely now have been in better circumstances.

I am guilty, I own, of meannesses which poverty unavoidably brings with it: my reflections are filled with repentance for my imprudence, but not with any remorse for being a villain; that may be a character you unjustly charge me with. Your books, I can assure you, are neither pawned nor sold, but in the custody of a friend from whom my necessities obliged me to borrow some money: whatever becomes of my person, you shall have them in a month. It is very possible both the reports you have heard and your own suggestions may have brought you false information with respect to my character; it is very possible that the man whom you now regard with detestation may inwardly burn with grateful resentment. It is very possible that, upon a second perusal of the letter I sent you, you may see the workings of a mind strongly agitated with gratitude and jealousy. If such circumstances should appear, at least spare invective till my book with Mr Dodsley shall be published, and then perhaps you may see the bright side of a mind, when my professions shall not appear the dictates of necessity, but of choice.

You seem to think Dr Milner knew me not. Perhaps so; but he was a man I shall ever honour; but I have friendships only with the dead! I ask pardon for taking up so much time; nor shall I add to it by any other professions than that I am, sir your humble servant,

OLIVER GOLDSMITH.

P.S. I shall expect impatiently the result of your resolutions.

Goldsmith got out of this disagreeable scrape by writing for Griffiths a Life of Voltaire, now first published by Mr Prior, in the collected works; but their subsequent connexion was neither friendly nor of long duration; and when the "Inquiry into the State of Literature and Taste" shortly appeared, the work, but especially the author, was virulently attacked, by the notorious libeller Kenrick, in Griffiths' Review. In that work Goldsmith continued to be persecuted with rancorous meanness. We may give one passage:—

Notwithstanding our author talks so familiarly of us, the great, and affects to be thought to stand in the rank of patrons, we cannot help thinking that, in more places than one, he has betrayed in himself the man he so severely condemns for drawing his quill to take a purse. We are even so firmly convinced of this, that we dare put the question home to his conscience, whether he never experienced the unhappy situation he so feelingly describes, in that of a literary understrapper? His remarking him as coming down from his garret to rummage the bookseller's shop for materials to work upon, and the knowledge he displays of his minutest labours, give great reason to suspect he may himself have had recourse to the bad trade of book-making. Fronti nulla fides. We have heard of many a writer, who, "patronized only by his bookseller," has, nevertheless, affected the gentleman in print, and talked full as cavalierly as our author himself. We have even known one hardy enough publicly to stigmatise men of the first rank in literature for their immoralities, while conscious himself of labouring under the infamy of having, by the vilest and meanest actions, forfeited all pretensions to honour and honesty.

If such men as these, boasting a liberal education, and pretending to genius, practise, at the same time, those arts which bring the sharper to the cart's tail or the pillory, need our author wonder that "learning partakes the contempt of its professors?"

This was a heavy measure of vengeance for the enormity of the pawned clothes, and the other humbly acknowledged "meannesses attendant on extreme poverty." About this time we find him more heartless and desponding than even at the lowest ebb of previous misfortune.

His friends in Ireland had not replied to his application for promoting the subscription to his work, though the letters are, we find, preserved as family relics, or heir-looms, which were then thought unworthy of reply. To his brother Henry he, about this time, indulges in this strain of touching moralising and sensible reflection—

I must confess, it gives me some pain to think I am almost beginning the world at the age of thirty-one. Though I never had a day's sickness since I saw you, yet I am not that strong active man you once knew me. You scarcely can conceive how much eight years of disappointment, anguish, and study have worn me down. If I remember right, you are seven or eight years older than me, yet I dare venture to say, that, if a stranger saw us both, he would pay me the honours of seniority. Imagine to yourself a pale melancholy visage, with two great wrinkles between the eyebrows, with an eye disgustingly severe, and a big wig; and you may have a perfect picture of my present appearance. On the other hand, I conceive you as perfectly sleek and healthy, passing many a happy day among your own children, or those who know you a child.

Since I knew what it was to be a man, this is a pleasure I have not known. I have passed my days among a parcel of cool, designing beings, and have contracted all their suspicious manner in my own behaviour. I should actually be as unfit for the society of my friends at home, as I detest that which I am obliged to partake of here. I can now neither partake of the pleasure of a revel, nor contribute to raise its jollity. I can neither laugh nor drink; have contracted a hesitating disagreeable manner of speaking, and a visage that looks ill-nature itself; in short, I have thought myself into a settled melancholy, and an utter disgust of all that life brings with it. Whence this romantic turn that all our family are possessed with? Whence this love for every place and every country but that in which we reside?—for every occupation but our own?—this desire of fortune, and yet this eagerness to dissipate? I perceive, my dear sir, that I am at intervals for indulging this splenetic manner, and following my own taste, regardless of yours.

The reasons you have given me for breeding up your son a scholar, are judicious and convincing; I should, however, be glad to know for what particular profession he is designed. If he be assiduous, and divested of strong passions, (for passions in youth always lead to pleasure,) he may do very well in your college; for it must be owned that the industrious poor have good encouragement there, perhaps better than in any other in Europe. But if he has ambition, strong passions, and an exquisite sensibility of contempt, do not send him there, unless you have no other trade for him but your own. It is impossible to conceive how much may be done by a proper education at home. A boy, for instance, who understands perfectly well Latin, French, arithmetic, and the principles of the civil law, and can write a fine hand, has an education that may qualify him for any undertaking; and these parts of learning should be carefully inculcated, let him be designed for whatever calling he will.

Above all things, let him never touch a romance or novel: these paint beauty in colours more charming than nature, and describe happiness that man never tastes. How delusive, how destructive are those pictures of consummate bliss! They teach the youthful mind to sigh after beauty and happiness which never existed; to despise the little good which fortune has mixed in our cup, by expecting more than she ever gave; and in general, take the word of a man who has seen the world, and has studied human nature more by experience than precept—take my word for it, I say, that books teach us very little of the world. The greatest merit in a state of poverty would only serve to make the possessor ridiculous—may distress, but cannot relieve him. Frugality, and even avarice, in the lower orders of mankind, are true ambition. These afford the only ladder for the poor to rise to preferment. Teach then, my dear sir, to your son thrift and economy. Let his poor wandering uncle's example be placed before his eyes. I had learned from books to be disinterested and generous, before I was taught from experience the necessity of being prudent. I had contracted the habits and notions of a philosopher, while I was exposing myself to the approaches of insidious cunning; and often by being, even with my narrow finances, charitable to excess, I forgot the rules of justice, and placed myself in the very situation of the wretch who thanked me for my bounty. When I am in the remotest part of the world, tell him this, and perhaps he may improve from my example. But I find myself again falling into my gloomy habits of thinking.

My mother, I am informed, is almost blind; even though I had the utmost inclination to return home, under such circumstances I could not; for, to behold her in distress without a capacity of relieving her from it, would add too much to my splenetic habit. Your last letter was much too short; it should have answered some queries I had made in my former. Just sit down as I do, and write forward until you have filled all your paper. It requires no thought, at least from the ease with which my own sentiments rise when they are addressed to you; for, believe me, my head has no share in all I write; my heart dictates the whole. Pray, give my love to Bob Bryanton, and entreat him from me not to drink. My dear sir, give me some account about poor Jenny.* Yet her husband loves her; if so, she cannot be unhappy.

It is believed that, about this period, he assisted his friend, Ned Purdon, immortalized by his epitaph, in translating the "Henriade." Another friend, the Rev. Thomas Percy, afterwards Bishop of Dromore, but then a young man in straitened circumstances, now first became acquainted with him; and Mr Archibald Hamilton, the printer of Smollett's Review, introduced him to that celebrated individual, and shewed him marks of substantial kindness. He appears to have commenced writing for that Review, The Critical, immediately upon his rupture with Griffiths, if not before; and, in the early part of 1759, his contributions were frequent.

At this time he resided in Green-Arbour Court, between the Old Bailey and Fleet Market.

The spot was central, in the immediate vicinity of the booksellers, now his chief or only employers; and here he became well known to his literary brethren, was visited by them, and his lodgings well remembered.

This house, a few years ago, formed the abode, as it appears to have done in his own time, of laborious indigence. The adjoining houses likewise presented every appearance of squalid poverty, every floor being occupied by the poorest class; two of the number fell down from age and dilapidation, and the remainder on the same side of the court, including that in which the Poet resided, standing in the right-hand corner on entering from Farringdon Street by what is called, from their steepness and number, Break-neck Steps, were taken down some time afterwards, to avoid a similar catastrophe. They were four stories in height; the attics had casement windows, and at one time they were probably inhabited by a superior class of tenants. The site is now occupied by a large building, enclosed by a wall running through the court or square, intended for the stabling and lofts of a waggon-office. Several intimate associates at this time remembered, and repeated after his death, that while here he had formed the strictest resolutions of future economy. His letters to Ireland, and occasional essays written at this time and in these apartments, impress, as we have seen in a preceding page, in the strongest manner the virtues of prudence; and the same friends stated, that for a time he permitted these lessons to influence his conduct.

But his frugal resolutions always gave way at the sight of distress; and those in greater want, or more importunate than himself, might, at all times, have drawn forth Goldsmith's last shilling. His condition is picturesquely set before us by an anecdote for which we have the authority of Dr Percy—

He (observed the prelate) was employed in writing his "Inquiry into Polite Learning," (or rather, perhaps, in correcting the proof-sheets, for the work, as already noticed, appeared on the 3d of April following,) in a wretchedly dirty room, in which there was but one chair, and when, from civility, this was offered to his visitant, he himself was obliged to sit in the window. While they were conversing, some one gently rapped at the door, and on being desired to come in, a poor ragged little girl, of very decent behaviour, entered, who, dropping a courtesy, said, "My mamma sends her compliments, and begs the favour of you to lend her a chamber-pot full of coals."

Mr Prior conjectures that the suit of clothes about which Griffiths gave him so much trouble, may have been the identical suit which Goldsmith once gave to his landlady, in Green-Arbour Court, to pawn, in order to release her husband from arrest. In 1820, Mr Prior accidentally met with an old woman who kept a small shop in Clapham Road, who had known Goldsmith when she was a child, and retained a grateful recollection of him.

By her account she was a near relative of the woman who kept the house in Green-Arbour Court, and at the age of seven or eight years went frequently thither, one of the inducements to which was the cakes and sweetmeats given to her and other children of the family by the gentleman who lodged there; these they duly valued at the moment, but when afterwards considered as the gifts of one so eminent, the recollection became a source of pride and boast. Another of his amusements consisted in assembling these children in his room, and inducing them to dance to the music of his flute. Of this instrument, as a favourite relaxation from study, he was fond. He was usually, as she subsequently heard when older, and induced to inquire more about him, shut up in the room during the day, went out in the evenings, and preserved regular hours. His habits otherwise were sociable, and he had several visiters. One of the companions whose society gave him particular pleasure, was a respectable watchmaker, residing in the same court, celebrated for the possession of much wit and humour; qualities which, as they distinguish his own writings, he professes to have sought and cultivated wherever they were to be found. His benevolence, as usual, flowed freely, according to my informant, whenever he had anything to bestow, and even when he had not, the stream could not always be checked in its current; an instance of which tells highly to his honour.

In many other places we hear of his kindness to children, and the delight which he took in treating them with sweetmeats, and making them dance to his flute.

He was now beginning to be known as a writer, and The Bee, The Busy Body, The Ladies' Magazine, and The Literary Magazine, and British Magazine, gave forth his temporary lucubrations as well as the two Reviews. Among these periodicals his earliest Essays were scattered, previous to the starting of The Public Ledger, by Newbery, in 1760, in which the series of Chinese letters appeared, and made a strong impression. For two contributions a-week to this journal, he received £100 a-year. His literary friends increased in number and still more in value. Dr Percy made him known to Johnson, through whom he was introduced, some time afterwards, to Burke, Reynolds, and Garrick. The two former continued his warm and steadfast friends down to the last hour of his existence; and, if Johnson was the most respected, Goldsmith was, beyond doubt, the most generally beloved member of that illustrious circle afterwards celebrated as the Literary Club.

Mr John Newbery of St Paul's Churchyard, a benevolent bookseller, was the first projector of juvenile works of instruction and entertainment; and he derived considerable assistance from Goldsmith in this new branch of the trade. Besides his contributions to The Public Ledger, he compiled many small works of temporary interest, suited to the current market, in which articles he was industriously occupied, and for which he was tolerably paid. Among them were a "Life of Beau Nash," and a "Memoir of the House of Mecklenberg," brought out upon the marriage of Queen Charlotte; and whether he be the veritable author of "The History of Tommy Trip" or not, it is more than probable that he composed "The Memoirs of Goody Two-Shoes; or, Mistress Margery Two-Shoes"—a work which we have always admired as the most delightful of those minor classics; and shall not undervalue because it is imagined to proceed from the same pen as "The Vicar of Wakefield," and "The Traveller." Many of his delightful essays and sketches were written from hand to mouth; but his exquisite novel, the darling of all Europe, and his poems, were composed at leisure, in the intervals of his labours for daily bread, and carefully revised and retouched. It is imagined that he never, previous to publication, knew the value of his works. This must be misapprehension. Confidence in their money-value he could not have until that was ascertained.

The first period of his engagements with Newbery was marked by great industry; and he was enabled to emerge from Green-Arbour Court and settle in respectable lodgings in a court of Fleet Street, which event he solemnized by a literary supper, at which Dr Johnson appeared as his guest. Of this banquet Bishop Percy related—

"He had on," said the Bishop, in telling the story, "a new suit of clothes, a new wig nicely powdered, and everything so dissimilar from his usual habits that I could not resist the impulse of inquiring the cause of such rigid regard in him to exterior appearance. 'Why, sir,' said he, with characteristic shrewdness, and willing to play the instructor as well by example as by precept, 'I hear that Goldsmith, who is a very great sloven, justifies his disregard of cleanliness and decency by quoting my practice, and I am desirous this night to shew him a better example.'"

Goldsmith's circumstances no sooner began to improve than he became the prey of that scrambling class of his countrymen of which the metropolis was then peculiarly fertile. Starveling authors formed another part of his daily surroundings; and several stories are related of his melting tenderness of nature, and of the simple credulity of his character, when thus beset, which look more like romance than work-day realities. Some of them are quite equal to Moses' bargain of the gross of green spectacles, or the impositions of Jenkinson upon the Vicar.

Other characteristic anecdotes are of a nobler kind. Notwithstanding all that has been said of his childish pettishness, his nature was without gall and without suspicion. No degree of personal suffering ever deadened his sympathies, or taught him distrust. We cannot deny ourselves the pleasure of extracting one or two of those traits of mingled generosity and sensibility which display his true character; and the following story has interest independent of Goldsmith's kindness of heart:—

An instance of his habitual commiseration for the poor and destitute occurred about this period, which derives additional interest from being related to the writer by the gentleman who was the object of it, shortly before his death; this was the late Dr M'Veagh M'Donnell, a physician known to many in London.

This gentleman, who possessed considerable classical attainments, and whose detailed history would form an interesting page in a romance, was descended from a poor but respectable Roman Catholic family in the north of Ireland. Having a brother educating for a priest in one of the Jesuit seminaries in France, he proceeded thither with the same view at the age of eleven. After a residence there for several years, he and his brother, whose health was rapidly declining, made an effort to regain their native land; but the latter died on reaching London, leaving the survivor destitute of friends or money. Accident threw him in the way of Goldsmith. By him he was protected for a time, and afterwards recommended to a school, as a means of turning his attainments to advantage. Subsequently he studied physic, passed some time in England and on the Continent, aiming to establish himself in practice; but without success. At length, according to the account given to his relatives, a brother physician and intimate friend, named M'Donnell, a native of Scotland, being taken with a fatal illness, recommended him on his deathbed to assume his name and country as a means of improving his worldly prospects, and adopt, if he could, a Scottish accent. "As an Irishman, you have failed, my dear friend; but as a countryman of mine, you may succeed."

The injunction was easily fulfilled, where there were none to inquire or to care for any appellation he thought proper to assume; and to the patronymic M'Veagh was added the legacy, not wholly unprofitable as it turned out, of that of M'Donnell. His residence on the Continent brought him to the knowledge of some English families of rank, by whom it is said he was employed in situations of confidence. During the early part of the revolution in France, he is represented to have been placed in some trying and dangerous situations; but quitting that country before its more atrocious excesses commenced, established himself ultimately in London. He was a man of strong and original powers of mind, eccentric in address and conversation, though of considerable learning. . . . . The detail of his first knowledge of Goldsmith had been previously communicated to the writer in Dublin, derived from the information of his relatives.

"It was in the year 1772, that the death of my elder brother in London, on our way to Ireland, left me in a most forlorn situation; I was then about eighteen; I possessed neither friends nor money, nor the means of getting to Ireland; of which, or of England, I knew scarcely anything, from having so long resided in France. In this situation I had strolled about for two or three days, considering what to do, but unable to come to any determination, when Providence directed me to the Temple Gardens. I threw myself on a seat, and, willing to forget my miseries for a moment, drew out a book—that book was a volume of Boileau. I had not been there long when a gentleman, strolling about, passed near me; and observing, perhaps, something Irish or foreign in my garb or countenance, addressed me—'Sir, you seem studious; I hope you find this a favourable place to pursue it.' 'Not very studious, sir, I fear; it is the want of society that brings me hither; I am solitary and unknown in this metropolis;' and a passage from Cicero,—Oratio pro Archia—occurring to me, I quoted it.—Hæc studia pernoctant nobiscum, perigrinantur, rusticantur. 'You are a scholar, too, sir, I perceive.' 'A piece of one, sir; but I ought still to have been in the college where I had the good fortune to pick up the little I know.' A good deal of conversation ensued; I told him part of my history, and he, in return, gave his address in the Temple, desiring me to call soon, from which, to my infinite surprise and gratification, I found that the person who thus seemed to take an interest in my fate, was my countryman, and a distinguished ornament of letters.

"I did not fail to keep the appointment, and was received in the kindest manner. He told me, smilingly, that he was not rich; that he could do little for me in direct pecuniary aid, but would endeavour to put me in the way of doing something for myself; observing that he could, at least, furnish me with advice not wholly useless to a young man placed in the heart of a great metropolis. 'In London,' he continued, 'nothing is to be got for nothing; you must work; and no man who chooses to be industrious, need be under obligations to another; for here labour of every kind commands its reward. If you think proper to assist me occasionally as amanuensis, I shall be obliged, and you will be placed under no obligation, until something more permanent can be secured for you.' This employment, which I pursued for some time, was to translate passages from Buffon, which was abridged or altered, according to circumstances, for his Natural History.

"It has been said he was irritable. Such may have been the case at times; nay, I believe it was so; for what, with the continual pursuit of authors, printers, and booksellers, and occasional pecuniary embarrassments, few could have avoided exhibiting similar marks of impatience. But it was never so towards me. I saw him only in his bland and kind moods, with a flow, perhaps an overflow, of the milk of human kindness for all who were in any manner dependant upon him. I looked upon him with awe and veneration, and he upon me as a kind parent upon a child.

"His manner and address exhibited much frankness and cordiality, particularly to those with whom he possessed any degree of intimacy. His good nature was equally apparent. You could not dislike the man, although several of his follies and foibles you might be tempted to condemn. He was generous and inconsiderate; money with him had little value.

"I was abroad at the time of his death, and wept bitterly when the intelligence first reached me."

Burke also, on hearing of Goldsmith's death, burst into tears; Reynolds painted none during the whole day. The lively grief of Johnson is recorded in several of his letters.—While he lived in the Temple, in what seemed his most prosperous days, it was his custom to keep his money lying loose in an open drawer, from which his servant, Dennis, took whatever was necessary. A friend reproached him with his carelessness, and with the needless temptation to which it exposed the man. "What! my dear fellow!" cried the astonished poet, "do you take Dennis for a thief!" He is known to have given his watch to be pawned to enable the younger Pilkington to raise a couple of guineas to purchase white mice from the captain of a foreign ship; of which live curiosities a fortune was to be made by the buyer, as a certain Duchess had taken a capricious longing for the rarities. Goldsmith, of course, never saw either watch, mice, or the adventurer who had imposed on his credulous kindness by this ludicrous story. At other times, when he had resolved to be prudent, his feelings revolted at what had the appearance of want of generosity. Mr Cooke, or "Conversation Cooke," a barrister, recommended to him by his friend Sleigh, related many amusing and affecting anecdotes of the poet, one of which we shall borrow.

While yet but a stranger in town, and his supplies occasionally short, Goldsmith had more than once offered the use of his purse, which Cooke at length accepted, the temptation of an evening at Marylebone or Ranelagh Gardens with several companions being irresistible; although at the moment destitute of necessary funds for the occasion. On applying to the Poet, however, he was told very seriously, and no doubt truly, that he had not a guinea in his possession. This being considered an evasion, something like a reproach escaped the applicant, that he regretted having made such a request, where, notwithstanding voluntary offers of assistance, there existed so little disposition to afford it. Nettled by the remark, Goldsmith, as evidence of his desire to oblige, borrowed the money. In the meantime, Cooke, provided from another quarter, had locked his chambers and proceeded to his amusement, but returning at an early hour in the morning, found a difficulty in opening the door, which, on examination, proved to arise from the sum he had requested, in silver, being wrapt in paper, and thrust underneath. On being thanked for this proof of sincerity on the following day, but told that the money might as readily have fallen into strange hands as of him for whom it was meant, he characteristically replied, "In truth my dear fellow, I did not think of that."

His kindness, and unsuspicious nature, made him the subject of the tricks and waggery of his friends, as well as of the impositions of the designing. He was cheated at cards, imposed on by every feigned tale of suffering, and victimized by every description of literary adventurers; but nothing could cool or harden his heart. One waggish story may serve as a specimen; and we select it among many from respect to the principal actor. It was related to Mr Croker by Colonel O'Moore:—

As the Colonel and Mr Burke were proceeding to dine with Sir Joshua, they observed Goldsmith also on his way thither, standing near a crowd who were staring and shouting at some foreign women in the windows of a house in Leicester Square. "Observe Goldsmith," said Burke to his companion, "and mark what passes between him and me by and by at Sir Joshua's." Proceeding forward, they reached the house before him; and when the Poet came up to Mr Burke, the latter affected to receive him coolly, when an explanation of the cause of offence was with some urgency requested. Burke appeared reluctant to speak, but, after some pressing, said, that he almost regretted keeping up an intimacy with one who could be guilty of such indiscretions as he had just exhibited in the Square. The Poet, with great earnestness, protested he was unconscious of what was meant. "Why," said Mr Burke, "did you not exclaim, as you were looking up at those women, what stupid beasts the people must be for staring with such admiration at those painted Jezebels, while a man of your talents passed by unnoticed?" Goldsmith was astonished. "Surely, surely, my dear friend, I did not say so." "Nay," replied Mr Burke, "if you had not said so how should I have known it?" "That's true," answered Goldsmith with great humility; "I am very sorry—it was very foolish; I do recollect that something of the kind passed through my mind, but I did not think I had uttered it."

His readiness to listen to every tale of wo, and to relieve every species of misery without reflection or discrimination, might sometimes border upon weak facility; yet was there a latent tenderness in his nature which placed him above almost every other man whose history is as familiarly known. He was indeed "a machine of pity." One, and but one anecdote, illustrative of this innate trembling sensibility, we shall extract:—

While playing whist at the house of Sir William Chambers, in Berners Street, the party at the table consisting, besides Sir William, of Lady Chambers, Baretti, and Goldsmith, the latter hastily threw down his cards, at a critical point of the game, flew out of the room, and, as appeared by the opening of the door, into the street, returning speedily and resuming his seat. Sir William conceiving that something unusual had occurred, ventured, after the lapse of a few minutes, to inquire the cause of his sudden retreat, trusting it had not been occasioned by the heat of the room. "Not at all," was the reply; "but, in truth, I could not bear to hear that unfortunate woman in the street half singing, half sobbing, for such tones could only arise from the extremity of distress." . . . . On farther explanation, it appeared that others had likewise noticed a female voice of peculiar character, aiming to sing, but without remarking that mingled tone of misery conveyed to the mind of the Poet, and which he had quitted the room to relieve.

In another person this might have seemed affectation; but it was only natural and proper to Goldsmith.

In consequence of his connexion with Newbery, and in prosecution of a wiser scheme of life, Goldsmith left London, and boarded with a respectable widow lady at Islington; his friendly publisher taking care of his cash, which it was impossible to confine to his own pocket, and defraying his ordinary expenses. His board was £50 a-year; his incidental expenses, as they appear in the bills of his landlady, were very moderate; and, as he worked with diligence and became better paid, his subsequent embarrassments can only be accounted for by debts incurred unknown to his cash-keeper, Newbery. Mr Prior has given a most minute, and, to literary men, an interesting account of the various sums which he received for his multifarious labours, and of the mode and times of payment. They were at first very low, and varied either with the urgent necessity of the author, and the risk, or the disposition of the publishers to take advantage of this necessity; yet, from the age of thirty-five, or when he had been about seven years in London at his painful vocation, Goldsmith, with ordinary resolution and prudence, might have maintained a respectable station in society, and placed himself permanently above want. But his charity always ended where that of prudent men ought, it is said, to begin; and had outrun its means long before it reached the most important point of destination. As his means increased, so did his clients. His personal wants seem to have been moderate, save, latterly, in the article of fine clothes; though his absurdity and extravagance in dress were, in all probability, fostered by his tailor. With Goldsmith's vanity and facility, a tailor might make him order whatever he chose. Boswell's immortal anecdote of the peach-blossom-coloured coat favours our opinion that many of the extraordinary articles set forth in John Filby's bills, and generally paid by an advance or forced loan from the booksellers, were foisted upon the simple wit by the tradesman; or else ordered for some Irish friend or relative, such as his nephew Hodson. This gentleman, a volunteer visiter to his uncle, was a genuine sprig of the Goldsmith family tree.

Although Goldsmith died deep in Filby's debt, that generous flint frankly forgave him, protesting that the Doctor had been a good customer, and would, had he lived, have paid every farthing handsomely. The famous bloom-coloured coat we find charged at twelve guineas. A pair of "Tyrian-bloom satin grain and garter blue silk breeches," cost £8 : 2 : 7, and a velvet suit £21. The anecdote of the coat of itself proves that the tailor made a walking pattern-card of his credulous customer. Boswell one day gave a dinner to a distinguished party.

He had invited Goldsmith, Johnson, Reynolds, Garrick, and others to dinner, when the party were kept waiting by the non-arrival of one of the guests. "Goldsmith," in the words of the biographer, who, however, seems to overcharge the description, "to divert the tedious minutes, strutted about bragging of his dress, and, I believe, was seriously vain of it; for his mind was wonderfully prone to such impressions. 'Come, come,' said Garrick, 'talk no more of that. You are perhaps the worst—eh, eh?' Goldsmith was eagerly attempting to interrupt him, when Garrick went on laughing ironically. 'Nay, you will always look like a gentleman; but I am talking of being well or ill dress'd.' 'Well, let me tell you,' said Goldsmith, 'when my tailor brought home my bloom-coloured coat, he said, 'Sir, I have a favour to beg of you—when anybody asks you who made your clothes, be pleased to mention John Filby at the Harrow, in Water Lane.' Johnson: 'Why, sir, that was because he knew the strange colour would attract crowds to gaze at it, and thus they might hear of him, and see how well he could make a coat of so absurd a colour.'"

It is probable that his wardrobe was quite as open to his hangers-on as his purse. Besides what he disbursed in gifts, and loans, and charity, he was in the practice of frequently giving bounteous public breakfasts, the fragments of which repasts were divided among poor women in the neighbourhood, in the fashion of those Irish banquets with which his youth must have been familiar.

On one occasion, a wealthy city acquaintance, not remarkable for elegance of mind or manners, who observed this liberality, said, with some degree of freedom, "Why, Doctor, you must be a rich man; I cannot afford to do this?" "It is not wealth, my dear sir," was the reply of the Doctor, willing to rebuke without offending his guest, "but inclination. I have only to suppose that a few more friends than usual have been of our party, and then it amounts to the same thing."

Collecting his followers, he would then sally forth into some of the villages around London, and make with them what he sportively called, "a shoemaker's holiday," entertaining his friends, according to the state of his finances, either with bacon and eggs, or better fare. The name by which he was known in this circle of admirers and flatterers, was Our Doctor, in contra-distinction to Dr Johnson, who was The Doctor. While in the country, to which he often went for months together, when engaged in a new or important literary job, such as his English History, or the "History of Animated Nature," he occasionally visited his literary friends in London; but he was also to be seen in other society. He, at different periods, frequented convivial clubs where gaming was practised; and, though it is impossible that a man of his character ever could have been a gambler in the worst sense, vanity, facility, and habit may have exposed him to losses which, trifling to a man of fortune, were ruinous to him. Of the better class of his associates, no one save Topham Beauclerk could have been so base as to pillage a person who might have become a skilful player, but whom nature forbade being a dexterous gamester. There is, however, no evidence that he lost money to Beauclerk. The late Judge Day, who, when a student in the Middle Temple, had been a near neighbour and a warm admirer of his countryman, has favoured Mr Prior with a very interesting letter, descriptive of Goldsmith's habits, of which the following is an extract:—

The Poet frequented much the Grecian Coffee-house, then the favourite resort of the Irish and Lancashire Templars; and delighted in collecting around him his friends, whom he entertained with a cordial and unostentatious hospitality. Occasionally he amused them with his flute, or with whist, neither of which he played well, particularly the latter; but, in losing his money, he never lost his temper. In a run of bad luck and worse play, he would fling his cards upon the floor, and exclaim, "Bye-fore George! I ought for ever to renounce thee, fickle, faithless Fortune!"

In person he was short—about five feet five or six inches—strong, but not heavy in make; rather fair in complexion, with brown hair, such, at least, as could be distinguished from his wig. His features were plain, but not repulsive—certainly not so when lighted up by conversation. His manners were simple, natural, and, perhaps, on the whole, we may say not polished—at least, without that refinement and good breeding which the exquisite polish of his compositions would lead us to expect. He was always cheerful and animated, often, indeed, boisterous in his mirth; entered with spirit into convivial society; contributed largely to its enjoyments by solidity of information and the naiveté and originality of his character; talked often without premeditation, and laughed loudly without restraint. Being then a young man, I felt myself much flattered by the notice of so celebrated a person. He took great delight in the conversation and society of Grattan, whose brilliancy in the morning of life furnished full earnest of the unrivalled splendour which awaited his meridian; and, finding us dwelling together in Essex Court near himself, where he frequently visited my immortal friend, his warm heart became naturally prepossessed towards the associate of one whom he so much admired.

. . . . . .

His purse replenished by literary labours, the season of relaxation and pleasure took its turn, in attending the theatres, Ranelagh, Vauxhall, and other scenes of gaiety and amusement, which he continued to frequent as long as his supply held out. He was fond of exhibiting his muscular little person in the gayest apparel of the day, to which was added a bag-wig and sword.

. . . . . .

Whenever his funds were dissipated—and they fled more rapidly from being the dupe of many artful persons, male and female, who practised upon his benevolence—he returned to his literary labours, and shut himself up from society, to provide fresh matter for his bookseller, and fresh supplies for himself.

We fear it was not alone the Duke of Hamilton's circle which made a jest of a man too easy and really good-natured to retain respect among the high vulgar. In the latter part of his life, he was sometimes a visiter at Barton, the residence of the celebrated painter and caricaturist, Bunbury, who had married the daughter of his friend, Captain Horneck. A member of that society informs Mr Prior that—

His manners were always playful and amusing, taking the lead in promoting any scheme of innocent mirth, and usually prefacing the invitation by, "Come now and let us play the fool a little." At cards, which was commonly a round game and the stake small, he was always the most noisy, affected great eagerness to win, and teased his opponents of the gentler sex with continual jest and banter on their want of spirit in not risking the hazards of the game. But one of his most favourite enjoyments was to romp with children, when he threw off all reserve, and seemed one of the most joyous of the group.

"His simplicity of manners," continued my informant, "made him occasionally the object of tricks of the jocular kind to other visiters of the house. Being at all times gay in dress, he made his appearance at the breakfast table in a smart black silk coat, with an expensive pair of ruffles; the coat some one contrived to soil, and it was sent to be cleansed; but either by accident, or probably design, the day after it came home the sleeves became daubed with paint, which was not discovered until the ruffles also, to his great mortification, were irretrievably disfigured.

"He always wore a wig, a peculiarity which those who judge of his appearance only from the fine poetical head by Reynolds, would not suspect; and on one occasion some person contrived seriously to injure this important adjunct to dress. It was the only one he had in the country, and the misfortune seemed irreparable until the services of Mr Bunbury's valet were called in, who, however, performed his functions so indifferently, that poor Goldsmith's appearance became the signal for a general smile."

This sort of impertinence, and liberties which no one durst have taken with himself, and have escaped being kicked down stairs, provoked Johnson at his unsuspecting open-minded friend, as appears from several of Boswell's anecdotes:—

"Goldsmith, in his diverting simplicity," writes Boswell, "complained one day in a mixed company of Lord Camden. 'I met him,' said he, 'at Lord Clare's house in the country, and he took no more notice of me than if I had been an ordinary man.' The company having laughed heartily, Johnson stood forth in defence of his friend. 'Nay, gentlemen, Dr Goldsmith is in the right. A nobleman ought to have made up to such a man as Goldsmith; and I think it is much against Lord Camden that he neglected him.'"

What shall we think of those who treat the candid poet as a fool, because he once warned Newbery of the risks of printing one of his own comedies! At an interview which he obtained with the Earl of Northumberland, who was expected to go to Ireland as Viceroy, when asked by his Lordship of what use he could be to so ingenious a man, whose writings he so much admired, Goldsmith protested that he had nothing to solicit for himself. He worked for the booksellers, and placed no faith in great men's promises. But he mentioned his brother Henry, a learned and worthy clergyman, encumbered with a large family, and living on the slender preferment of forty pounds a-year. The malignant Hawkins, who had no sympathy with these disinterested and affectionate feelings, exclaims against this idiot folly. The ridicule in which Beauclerk, the fine gentleman and polished wit of the Literary Club, indulged as much at the expense of Johnson as of Goldsmith, draws forth the following sensible and right-minded observations from Mr Prior; and many of Mr Prior's remarks, drawn forth by the rare and singularly amiable character of his hero, are acute, and generally go to the root of the subject.

To a man of fashion and a wit, oddities of speech, person, or manner, furnish themes for ridicule that all their admiration of genius cannot suppress; and deviation from conventional forms meets from them with little forbearance. It is to this we owe Lord Chesterfield's description of Dr Johnson; to this also Horace Walpole's impertinence towards him and to Goldsmith; and Beauclerk, while professing himself superior to the prejudices of his class in fashionable life, could not wholly escape a similar feeling.

We fear, that, to those who have not our own appreciation of the amiable character of Goldsmith, we may have dwelt too long upon his diverting absurdities, and those foibles which spring from the softest feelings of the human heart. If there are any such, they will find the true corrective of their severe or mistaken opinions in the full perusal of the Life before us, and in the proofs with which it abounds, of the candour, child-like simplicity, disinterestedness, and goodness of heart, of a man whose genius stands, if not first, in the "very first line." But Goldsmith possessed nobler and rarer qualities for which the world has hitherto given him no credit whatever. He could submit to be a half-starving drudge in literature, but not, like many of his betters, to degrade or prostitute his pen to venal objects. He would have accepted the national rewards of genius through the hands of his sovereign, as some of his deserving contemporaries had done, but he would not become the secret, well-paid hireling of the ministry of the day, though his opinions, as an old-fashioned opposition Tory, were considered to be, at least, not inimical. We must give the whole anecdote. It is among the most honourable to literature belonging to Goldsmith's age.

To the Earl of Lisburn, who once addressed him at a dinner at the Royal Academy with a complimentary notice of his poetical talents, and an inquiry whether the world was to be favoured by a new production of his genius, he jocularly replied, "My Lord, I cannot afford to court the draggle-tail Muses; they will let me starve: but by pursuing plain prose, I can make shift to eat, and drink, and wear good clothes."

No other notice of the hints thus dropped was taken by the dispensers of national bounty, than an attempt made some months afterwards, to engage him, through the means of one of their most active agents, in support of the ministry, which was then hard pressed by the opposition in parliament, and by Junius, Wilkes, and a variety of other political writers out of it; so that his reward or expected reward was thus to be made dependent not on his literary, but on his political services.

This proposal he had the courage to decline. The fact of its having been made seems to be placed beyond doubt by the bearer of it, the Rev Dr Scott—well known as a warm political partisan of the day, and a constant writer in the newspapers under a variety of signatures, particularly Anti-Sejanus, Panurge, and others—having communicated the fact to living witnesses. To one of these, Mr Basil Montagu, to whom the public is indebted for matters of much more importance, the writer is obliged for the anecdote. It exhibits the very different tone of feeling between the Poet, though poor, and the reverend and prosperous politician, the studious scholar and the veteran man of the world; and the former, perhaps, deserves the more credit for his independence, when we consider that, in complying with the request, he would have been advancing not only his worldly interests, but supporting his avowed political principles, which were nearly similar to those of Dr Johnson.

"A few months," writes Mr Montagu, "before the death of Dr Scott, author of Anti-Sejanus and other political tracts in support of Lord North's administration, I happened to dine with him in company with my friend Sir George Tuthill, who was the Doctor's physician. After dinner Dr Scott mentioned, as matter of astonishment and a proof of the folly of men who are, according to common opinion, ignorant of the world, that he was once sent with a carte blanche from the ministry to Oliver Goldsmith, to induce him to write in favour of the administration. 'I found him,' said the Doctor, 'in a miserable set of chambers in the Temple; I told him my authority; I told him that I was empowered to pay most liberally for his exertions; and, would you believe it! he was so absurd as to say—'I can earn as much as will supply my wants without writing for any party; the assistance, therefore, you offer is unnecessary to me:' and so I left him," added Dr Scott, "in his garret."

This story ought to be coupled with that of Marvell's mutton-bone. What a fine subject for an essay, in the manner of Goldsmith, "On the Means which enable a Meddling Political Parson of Inferior Parts to keep his Carriage, while a Man of Genius can scarcely, in his Garret, supply his Daily Wants by his Daily Drudgery!"

These volumes, from the almost superfluous care which Mr Prior has bestowed in ferreting out the musty papers and old ledgers of the booksellers, furnish important additions to the statistics of book-making and book-publishing. But, for this sort of information, we must refer to the fountain-head. Some of the sums paid to Goldsmith, before he was known, appear wretchedly small, and scarcely such as would indemnify a copying clerk for manual labour; but towards the end of his brief career, his value began to be better understood. No more than twenty guineas was obtained for "The Traveller," and sixty for "The Vicar of Wakefield;" which last Newbery had not courage to publish after he had purchased the copyright, nor until the author had gained an established reputation. For the "History of Animated Nature," he received from Griffiths eight hundred guineas; he was fairly paid for his "Histories" and the copyright of his plays; and often liberally in such small matters as prefaces and introductory biographies to new editions of works. Davies paid £500 for "The History of England." It is, however, mortifying to find him even, while enjoying the fame of "The Traveller," "The Vicar of Wakefield," and of his other productions, receiving no more than a hundred guineas for "The Deserted Village;" the precise sum, Mr Prior states, which Hannah More received at the same time for her legendary doggrel of "Sir Eldred of the Bower." But Goldsmith was always pressed for money; and the well-patronized lady was not only the better manager, but enjoyed that sort of coterie reputation, diligently cultivated by every effort, which, for a limited period, must have been of great pecuniary value to her publishers. The first publisher may have been more enriched by the sale of "Sir Eldred" than by that of Goldsmith's charming and enduring poem, which was brought out at the moderate price of 1s. 6d. a copy. The blame, therefore, in all such cases, rests with the public, or the fashion, and not with the trader in copyrights, who only exercises a sound discretion in sometimes purchasing not what he may consider intrinsically the best, but the most marketable literary wares. By a trick of trade, not yet altogether obsolete, Goldsmith sometimes obtained the credit of being paid far more than he actually received.

With the habits and disposition of Goldsmith, it may be more easily understood than forgiven, that, as his precarious income increased, so did his embarrassments. A project of "A Dictionary of Arts and Sciences," from which he expected great results, failed, after he had circulated prospectuses; and also a plan formed by his influential friends to obtain for him some place or provision from the government. His creditors became clamorous, his sources of supply were drained, his health and spirits failed, and even his sweetness of temper gave way. The following is a melancholy passage:—

As none of his acquaintance were informed of the extent of these embarrassments, they understood not certain inconsistencies, or, as they were termed, absurdities, in his behaviour, assumed, no doubt, often to throw off unpleasant recollections. From seeming absence or gravity, he would fly to the extremes of mirth and jollity; and from silence, would commence talking incessantly and inconsiderately on all subjects; just as he was formerly seen, when by his own account nearly suffocating with vexation at the reception of his play, singing a song of "An old woman tossed in a blanket seventeen times as high as the moon." Unwilling to be suspected of wishing to tax the generosity of his friends, or too proud to seem as poor as he really was, a few only suspected his situation; to these he exhibited the assumed gaiety of despair.

We have already trespassed so far upon the indulgence of our readers, that we must abruptly close this paper, without having touched upon half the interesting materials supplied by these memoirs. At one period Goldsmith made an excursion to the Continent with Captain Horneck's family; and several letters to his distinguished friends of the Club remain, giving an account of his tour. But for these—and the many interesting notices and reminiscences, written by Colman, Percy, Cradock, and others, and the engaging description of the poet's different rural habitations and Temple residence—we must again refer to the original. Nor can we notice his fracas with Evans the bookseller, and his horror of libellous attacks in periodicals, and that "rack of the newspapers" which the more manly Johnson so heartily despised. We are also tempted by Mr Prior's amiable and ingenious commentaries upon "The Vicar of Wakefield," "The Traveller," and the scenes of "The Deserted Village." All these, however, must be passed; yet Goldsmith's last published letter to his own family, written four years before his death, is irresistible. It may be premised, that the native Irish, and perhaps the Scotch, could never, until a recent period, separate the idea of a man of rank from that of a patron. Goldsmith's relations in Ireland knew that he was acquainted with lords, esquires, and men in power, and calculated, with rustic simplicity, upon his influence. The letter of which we speak is addressed to his brother Maurice.

"I should have answered your letter sooner, but, in truth, I am not fond of thinking of the necessities of those I love, when it is so very little in my power to help them. I am sorry to find you are every way unprovided for; and what adds to my uneasiness is, that I have received a letter from my sister Johnson, by which I learn that she is pretty much in the same circumstances. As to myself, I believe I could get both you and my poor brother-in-law something like that which you desire; but I am determined never to ask for little things, nor exhaust any little interest I may have, until I can serve you, him, and myself more effectually. As yet no opportunity has offered; but I believe you are pretty well convinced that I will not be remiss when it arrives.

"The King has lately been pleased to make me professor of Ancient History in a Royal Academy of Painting, which he has just established, but there is no salary annexed; and I took it rather as a compliment to the institution, than any benefit to myself. Honours to one in my situation, are something like ruffles to one that wants a shirt.

"You tell me that there are fourteen or fifteen pounds left me in the hands of my cousin Lawder, and you ask me what I would have done with them. My dear brother, I would by no means give any directions to my dear worthy relations at Kilmore, how to dispose of money, which is, properly speaking, more theirs than mine. All that I can say is, that I entirely, and this letter will serve to witness, give up any right and title to it; and I am sure they will dispose of it to the best advantage. To them I entirely leave it; whether they or you may think the whole necessary to fit you out, or whether our poor sister Johnson may not want the half, I leave entirely to their and your discretion. The kindness of that good couple to our shattered family, demands our sincerest gratitude; and though they have almost forgot me, yet i good things at last arrive, I hope one day to return and increase their good humour by adding to my own.

"I have sent my cousin Jenny a miniature picture of myself, as I believe it is the most acceptable present I can offer. I have ordered it to be left for her at George Faulkner's, folded in a letter. The face you well know is ugly enough, but it is finely painted. I will shortly, also, send my friends over the Shannon some Mezzotinto prints of myself, and some more of my friends here, such as Burke, Johnson, Reynolds, and Coleman. I believe I have written an hundred letters to different friends in your country, and never received an answer to any of them. I do not know how to account for this, or why they are unwilling to keep up for me those regards which I must ever retain for them.

"If, then, you have a mind to oblige me, you will write often, whether I answer you or not. Let me particularly have the news of our family and old acquaintances. For instance, you may begin by telling me about the family where you reside, how they spend their time, and whether they ever make mention of me. Tell me about my mother, my brother Hodson, and his son; my brother Harry's son and daughter, my sister Johnson, the family of Ballyoughter—what is become of them, where they live, and how they do. You talked of being my only brother. I don't understand you. Where is Charles? A sheet of paper occasionally filled with the news of this kind, would make me very happy, and would keep you nearer my mind."

Much as Goldsmith enjoyed literary and general society, it is said that he, about this time, contemplated leaving London, as a residence, altogether, and only making an occasional visit to town. He probably meant leaving behind him his debts and embarrassments. We now approach the last scene of all. Excessive application to his desk by fits, and the consequent neglect, for weeks together, of regular exercise and needful relaxation, had laid the foundation of a complaint greatly aggravated by mental distress. Viewing the whole case, we should say that his death was caused by nervous fever, of which the disease to which it is attributed was but an incidental symptom. He was taken ill, though not severely, at Hyde, in the farm-house to which he often retired from his chambers in the Temple, that he might devote himself, without temptation or interruption, to his tasks. Feeling indisposed, he went to town in the end of March, intending to return to Hyde. He died upon the 4th of April 1774. Presuming, perhaps, too much upon his own medical knowledge, he is imagined to have used improper medicines. Yet this is only conjectural.

Thus (says Mr Prior, concluding a minute narrative of poor Goldsmith's deathbed) terminated the life of an admirable writer and estimable man, at the early age of forty-five, when his powers were in full vigour, and much was to be expected from their exertion. The shock to his friends appears to have been great, from the unexpected loss of one whose substantial virtues, with all his foibles and singularities, they had learned to value. Burke, on hearing of it, burst into tears. Sir Joshua Reynolds, as Northcote informed the writer, relinquished painting for the day; an unusual forbearance, it was considered, of one who, under all common circumstances, rarely permitted himself to be diverted from the exercise of his art. Dr Johnson, though little prone to exhibit strong emotions of grief, seems to have felt sincerely on this occasion; for, three months afterwards, he thus wrote to Boswell:—

"Of poor dear Dr Goldsmith there is little to be told more than the papers have made public. He died of a fever, I am afraid more violent from uneasiness of mind. His debts began to be heavy, and all his resources were exhausted. Sir Joshua is of opinion that he owed not less than two thousand pounds. Was ever poet so trusted before?" And again—"Chambers, you find, is gone far, and poor Goldsmith is gone much further. He died of a fever, exasperated, as I believe, by the fear of distress." . . . In allusion to his pecuniary involvements, yet in a tone of tenderness, Dr Johnson writes at this time:—"He had raised money and squandered it, by every artifice of acquisition and folly of expense. But let not his frailties be remembered; he was a very great man."

From the many testimonies borne by contemporaries to "the good, ingenious, and honest Doctor Goldsmith," which his biographer has piously collected, we shall cull but two. They may be considered as the antipodes of tributes to departed genius and personal worth. The first is recorded by Mr Cradock, who says—"When I returned to town after his death, I had an interview with his nephew, an apothecary in Newman Street, and with the two sister milliners, the Miss Guns, who resided in a house at the corner of Temple Lane, who were always most attentive to him, and who once said to me most feelingly, 'O sir, sooner persuade him to let us work for him gratis, rather than apply to any other; we are sure he will pay us when he can.'"

The second is supposed, by Mr Prior, to have proceeded from the pen of Burke, and is dated on the day after Goldsmith's death, when it appeared in the newspapers:—

In an age when genius and learning are too generally sacrificed to the purposes of ambition and avarice, it is the consolation of virtue as well as of its friends, that they can commemorate the name of Goldsmith as a shining example to the contrary. Early compelled, like some of our greatest men, into the service of the muses, he never once permitted his necessities to have the least improper influence on his conduct; but, knowing and respecting the honourable line of his profession, he made no farther use of fiction than to set off the dignity of truth; and in this he succeeded so happily, that his writings stamp no less the man of genius than the universal friend of mankind.

Such is the outline of his poetical character, which perhaps, will be remembered whilst the first-rate poets of the country have any monument left them. But, alas! his noble and immortal part—the good man—is only consigned to the short-lived memory of those who are left to lament his death.

Having naturally a powerful bias on his mind to the cause of virtue, he was cheerful and indefatigable in the pursuit of it; warm in his friendships, gentle in his manners, and, in every act of charity and benevolence, "the very milk of human kindness." Nay, even his foibles and little weaknesses of temper, may be said rather to shew the simplicity of his nature than to degrade his understanding; for, though there may be many instances to prove he was no man of the world, most of those instances would attest the unadulterated purity of his heart. One who esteemed the kindness and friendship of such a man, as forming a principal part of the happiness of his life, pays this last, sincere, and grateful tribute to his memory.

Goldsmith's sorrowing friends at first contemplated a public funeral; but, upon second thoughts, it was considered advisable to spare the expense, and to subscribe for a monument to him in Westminster Abbey. His remains were, therefore, privately deposited in the Temple burying-ground. Reynolds designed his monument, and chose the niche in Poets' Corner, in which it was placed.

Johnson's epitaph upon his friend, written "in choice Latin," is engraved upon a tablet of white marble, under the medallion, which is said to present a good resemblance of Goldsmith's face.

RHYMED RAMBLES.—PART II.

BY EBENEZER ELLIOTT.

THE CORN-LAWS.

I DREAM'D, that, tir'd with travel, I return'd
To Blakelowe's summit,* and stood there with God,
Alone at midnight. Side by side, we trod
The heath; and, while around us rock'd and burn'd
The mountains, like a mountain'd sea of flame,
A gilded worm pronounc'd in scorn His name!
I, with my foot, the reptile would have spurn'd,
But could not. We stood still as death! That worm
Then spun slim films around th' Almighty's form,
Binding the hands that lift the seas, the feet
That will tread out the stars! and while, in mirth,
It spake this curse, I heard my own heart beat—
"With worse than barrenness, I curse thee, Earth!
Henceforth let every child be hopeless from his birth!"†

But God said, "No! thou surely shalt not see
Ev'ry child hopeless because thou art vile;
For thou art thy own victim, watch'd by me,
And wrongs sheath vengeance in a dreadful smile:
But, ere I bless thy curses for mankind,
And make them curses infinite to thee,
Thousands of thousands, foodless as the wind—
Yes, thousand thousand thousand men shall be Care-hunted to the worms, by thine and thee;
And thou more crimes and criminals shalt make
Than all earth's miscreants heretofore have made:
Hell from beneath shall rise to bless thee, snake!
And Death, to sum his profits by thy trade,
Count through all ages past their men and states betray'd."‡

CONINGSBOROUGH CASTLE.

In other days, time-darken'd Coningsb'rough,
Men thought of Hengist when they spoke of thee!
My native river murmurs near thee now,
As then it murmur'd, hasting to the sea
Through hazel bowers, where memory loves to be;
But in these days, thy pilgrims whisper low
The name of Scott, and join with his thy name.
Him, the Napoleon of Parnassus, thou
Hast seen with Shakspeare equal deem'd in fame.
Nor may the Cæsar of the Muses claim
His throne unshar'd. Twice thirteen years are past
Since hither, almost dead with care, I came,
What time another Cæsar fiercely cast
O'er earth his stormy shade, which kings beheld aghast.

Through Russian wastes that Cæsar chased a cloud:
Calm was its aspect; for it had the power
To make his crowded host a lifeless crowd—
He being conquered in that fated hour
Which gave his queen destruction for a dower.
Slow was its motion, and few accents loud
Brake from its chamber'd thunder as it fled;
But, when it stopp'd and spake, the conqueror bow'd
Lower than vanquish'd kings his laurel'd head.
They, waking from the vileness of their dread,
Gaz'd on the self-crown'd wretch in mean surprise;
Then, with the vulgar dust, which he had spread
Around the Consul's chair, bedimm'd his eyes,
And bade him die, as baffled baseness dies.

Yet better was it that the Fool of Force
Triumph'd by force, and fell by force subdued,
Than that the ancient thrones of foot and horse
Had quell'd, at once, the uprous'd multitude,
Whom giant wrongs with Titan might embued.
Well fought the people under Terror's wing;
And banded monarchs trembled, fled, and sued;
For Terror reign'd—Gaul's omnipresent king!—
And poured on tyrants' hearths the storm they brew'd.
They serve us still with strife! still, still renew'd
The fight of fate accelerates their doom;
Themselves they maim, by battle, fraud, and feud;
And, in large letters of mix'd flame and gloom,
Write "THE REPUBLIC cometh, and will come."

Come the Republic, then! or come the will
Of one wise despot! Let the nation sway,
Or be sway'd well! But we will not be still
Of fifty thousand kingling-wolves the prey.
Oh, England, sweep them from thy hearth away!‖
What! shall they rèign alone, like the simoom,
Kings of the dead? Not so! We toil and pay,
And, ere we perish, pall'd beneath their gloom—
Ere Mockery, thron'd o'er London's ashes, say,
"Behold a manless land! a nation's tomb!"—
"Ha, ha!" the heavens shall cry, and shout their doom—
"Their name shall be a byword of dismay;
Chaff for the whirlwind shall their pomp become;
Their homes be graves, and dust for ruin they!"

Come the Republic, then!—but not the strife
Of want-struck millions for immediate bread!
"The labour of the poor man is his life;"
And on our lives shall palsc'd fraud be fed?
"They who wrong him, strike me!" the Lord hath said;
"They break my everlasting covenant!
And, therefore, worms beneath their pride are spread;
For are not murderers numbered with the dead?
Fainting, their sons shall ask, their daughters pant
For drink and bread in vain; and both shall flee,
Unbless'd, go where they may, o'er land or sea,
And learn how hard to bear are scorn and want;
For I (the poor man's God) his strength will be,
And shake the dead boughs down to save the tree!"†

† "How happy might nations be if they had not governments to hinder them!" says Colonel Thompson, in his "Letters of a Representative."

‖ "All the good which is attributed to governments, society does for itself," says a prohibited author.

‡ It is marvellous to me that the matrons of Britain do not spit in the faces of their cowardly husbands for enduring laws which interdict our best affections, or convert marriage into a criminal curse, multiplied by the number of its births. If there were in the veins of our maidens one drop of Spartan blood, the worst enemies of the human race would long since have hid themselves, like owls, in those woods which they still call their own.

* "If military men look with scorn on men of letters, it is because the latter so seldom speak out. But when the art of composition becomes a weapon, eloquence is action, and tyranny finds itself attacked by its most formidable foes, reason and indignation; and, what is called 'protection' being of the very essence of despotism, all tyrants have hated and dreaded the natural enemies of 'protection'—men who think deeply, and speak honestly, that is, fearlessly."
—MADAME DE STAEL.

Yet, when we complain of the greatest wrong ever inflicted on the world by faction, we are told that we must speak meekly of its authors, cauterise with milk and water, and by no means convert a sarcasm into an argument; as if it were possible to address to such persons a sarcasm that is not an argument! That it is not possible, I will endeavour to demonstrate. Instead of "argument," then, read "gallows," and I defy them to shew that it ever was more properly applied as a punishment to criminals than it might be to that of about three hundred and fifty of their number, whom it would be easy to name, and, perhaps, in the highest degree prudent.

† The sonnet, I believe, has succeeded in those languages only in which it is more difficult to avoid similar rhymes than to find them. The legitimate or Petrarchan sonnet consists of two disjoined stanzas, and I dislike it on that account. I still think that the sonnet ought generally to conclude with a couplet. But I venture to suggest, that the Spenserian stanza, preceded by five lines, linked to it in melody, or by four lines only, and sometimes concluding with an Alexandrine, or even with a triplet, will be found to be the best English measure which the sonneteer can employ. Of this let the reader judge for himself, as, in these sonnets, I have used the legitimate, the Spenserian, and other forms.

AFFAIRS OF CANADA, AND THE MINISTERIAL BILL.

A STRUGGLE has commenced between the British Ministry and Canada, which, unless conciliatory measures be adopted, and some rash steps be retraced, can terminate only in one way—the separation of that colony, as well as all the other North American colonies, from this country. After the experience the people of Britain had, sixty years ago, of the issue of the contest between the old American colonies and the mother country, and the more recent example of the Spanish settlements in South America, we think they ought seriously to consider whether they will waste their treasure and their blood in a dispute, in which victory will bring neither advantage nor honour, while defeat will be attended with mortification and disgrace. Nor is that defeat likely to be distant or uncertain. The first Congress in the old colonies, on account of the grievances arising from the British government, was held in New York in 1765; and on the 4th of July 1776, the independence of the United States was declared. When that struggle commenced, the inhabitants of the States did not exceed two millions, and they were supposed to be unfit to become soldiers; yet, in a few years, they defeated, in numerous pitched battles, the best troops of Britain, veterans who had distinguished themselves in the Continental wars. The grievances of which the Canadians complain are, at least, as great as those of the old colonists. All that the British government attempted with them was to raise taxes within the colonies by the act of the British legislature, for the purpose of defraying the expense incurred in their own defence; and no complaints existed—or, at least, were much felt, or loudly expressed—as to the administration of their internal governments. In some of the colonies, such as Connecticut and Rhode Island, indeed, the people enjoyed so uncontrolled an independence in the regulation of their local concerns, that the revolution did not render necessary the slightest alteration in the forms of their administration. One of these colonies retains, even to this day, the charter of Charles II., as its system of state government; and another parted with the Royal charter, for a constitution of its own making, only in 1818. At the beginning of the quarrel, as has now been ascertained beyond doubt, the old colonists had not the slightest intention of separating from Britain; and it was only in the struggle, when the inferiority of regular troops to bands of freemen, fired with a sense of their wrongs and determined to assert their liberty, became apparent, that the hope of creating an independent state—untrammelled by the base and selfish aristocracy which blunts the energies and weakens the resources of European states—arose, and was so triumphantly realized.

Lower Canada is by far the most important of our North American colonies, both as regards population and trade; and whatever course the ruling oligarchy of this country (for both factions, Whig and Tory, seem to make common cause in oppressing her) force Canada to take, will soon be followed by all the rest. In 1832, the population of these colonies was as follows :—

Lower Canada,	539,822
Upper Canada,	211,567
New Brunswick,	72,943
Nova Scotia and Cape Breton,	142,548
Prince Edward's Island,	32,292
Newfoundland,	60,088

At present, the population, from its rapid increase in new countries, and the number of emigrants who have arrived from Europe, probably approaches a million and a half; so that, if inclined, the North American colonies, assisted as they would be, openly or secretly, by the United States, have at least men enough to afford a most formidable resistance to any force which might be sent against them. That all the colonies will join in an effort to obtain justice for any one of them which may be attacked, admits of little doubt. In Upper Canada deep discontent prevails. The expression of it is, at this moment, obscured by a majority of the Members of the Legislative Assembly favourable to Government, having been gained; but the means taken to secure this majority—the wholesale grants of public lands by the Governor of the Province to the hangers-on of the officials, to qualify them to outvote the real electors—is one of the grossest abuses and most flagrant violations of the Constitution, which even the history of British colonial tyranny affords. Though the inhabitants of Upper Canada are almost exclusively of British origin or descent, the Legislative Assembly of 1835, which really represented the opinions of the population, adopted a report prepared by a committee on grievances, by a majority of 25 to 17; and that report denounced the Legislative Council as the source of the evils which afflicted the colony, in terms not less energetic than those used by their neighbours of the Lower Province. The Upper Canada Land Company is equally obnoxious in the one province, as the British American Land Company is in the other. In April 1835, the Legislative Assembly of Upper Canada agreed to a resolution, by a majority of 28 to 14, against the Land Company; lamenting the selling, or rather jobbing away, of the Huron Tract, consisting of upwards of a million of acres of the finest land in the world, while the annual instalments of the price were expended by the Provincial Executive, without the consent of Parliament. The Assembly did not hesitate boldly to maintain that the grant to the Company was an absolute nullity, being in direct violation of the 18 Geo. III. and of their Constitutional Act. In Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward's Island, continual complaints have been made of the administration of affairs—the jobbing of the revenues in salaries among the officials, and the mismanagement of the public lands, the sales of which ought, as in the United States, to defray, not only the whole expense of the internal government, but also the cost of their external defence, which has all along been a great and yearly-increasing burden on this country. If we look to the West Indies, we shall find that, in the day of need, troops will rather be required to keep down revolt in these settlements, than assistance obtained to retain in subjection other colonies that may be driven, by mismanagement and oppression, into rebellion; and we may be sure that, if ever a contest with the Canadas arise, we must fight the battle single-handed.

Our space does not permit us to enumerate the many abuses and acts of oppression, of which the inhabitants of Lower Canada complain. They were set forth in a petition, signed by nearly the whole adult male population—by 87,000 persons—and presented to Parliament in 1828; but not one of them has yet been removed. The government of the Province is conducted by a Governor named by the Crown; an Executive Council, in imitation of our Privy Council; a Legislative Council, in mimicry of our House of Lords—both nominated by the Governor; and a Legislative Assembly, elected by nearly universal suffrage—of which seventy-eight are decidedly opposed to the Government, only seven are supporters of it, and three are neutral; the total number being eighty-eight. The Governors of the Province have almost always been soldiers, ignorant of civil affairs, and despising civil institutions, who regard a nation as they do a camp, and consider every act of the most constitutional resistance to their will, or remonstrance against their dictates, as nothing less than insubordination and mutiny, which must be instantly put down, be the consequences what they may.

The master grievance, however, of Lower Canada, as well as of most of the other colonies, and which is the root of all the abuses and heart-burnings which exist, is, that the Legislative Council, the second branch of the Legislature, instead of being elected by the people, is nominated by the Governor of the colony. This body consists almost entirely of persons holding official situations in the colony, and whose chance of promotion, or of obtaining Government patronage for their relations and friends, depends upon their sycophancy. It is admitted by all parties, that the conduct of the Legislative Council, in rejecting bills for education; for securing the judges appointments for life, and not as at present during pleasure; and for other beneficial measures—has on many occasions been utterly indefensible; and that persons have been nominated as councillors neither qualified for the office, nor respectable in private life. It is needless to assert, as Lord Stanley now does, that the demands of the colonists for an elective Legislative Council are exorbitant and unworthy of attention, because the people of this country have not the power of electing the House of Lords. It has yet to be seen whether the business of the country can be conducted in Britain as matters stand at present, and whether it may not be necessary not merely to render the Second Chamber elective and responsible to the people, but to abolish it altogether. The progress of the divisions of the House of Commons on the question of expelling the Bishops, shews that the necessity of a change in the constitution of our Second Chamber is now felt by men of all classes. But, even though it should be found possible to conduct public affairs with a hereditary and irresponsible House of Peers, it by no means follows that Legislative Councils, of nominees of the Governor, can be tolerated in our colonies. In the discussion which preceded the Canadian Constitutional Act of 1791, Mr Fox urged Mr Pitt to make the Legislative Council elective, and prophesied that, if he did not, the affairs of the colony could not be properly conducted. Mr Stanley, when in the Whig opposition in 1828 and 1829—and his opinion was held by many of the party to which he then attached himself—repeatedly stated, in his place in Parliament, that the Legislative Council was the source of all the abuses of the colony. The Solicitor-General of Nova Scotia did not hesitate, in his place in the House of Assembly of that colony, to declare it, as the result of his anxious deliberation and inquiry, and of much reflection and research, "that no legislative council can be formed with advantage to the public, but upon principles of election." In the late debate in the House of Commons, Mr Labouchere frankly expressed his conviction that it was most unfortunate that the Legislative Council had not been made elective—"He firmly believed that many evils had arisen from that course not having been followed. There were two Councils in Lower Canada, constituted on widely different principles. The popular party entrenched themselves in the one, and what he, for shortness only, would call the British party, or the minority, entrenched themselves in the other. What have been the consequences? These two Councils have always been in a state of violent opposition. He thought it was not possible to find a better recipe to perpetuate those dissensions than to perpetuate the constitution of Lower Canada. What would have been the result if an elective council had been established in 1791? After some strugglings, quarrels, and conflicts, the people would have mutually made concessions; and we should have seen the French and English living on terms of friendship and cordial intercourse with each other, without respect to religion or descent. Let them look at Louisiana. They would see there a state of things very analogous to that of Lower Canada. There was a very large population of French descent, and a small Anglo population. How were they treated? Whether of English or French descent, they were under the protection of equal laws. No one was asked whence he came, or what was his descent; and, though there was a great deal of local separation between the two races, yet, politically, they lived very well together; and there was no state in the Union where things went on more harmoniously than in Louisiana. He was, therefore, upon abstract grounds, not opposed to an elective legislative council in Lower Canada. How any one could contend that it was contrary to the British constitution, and to our colonial system, that there should be an elective council in Canada—how any one who had ever read the history of our colonies, could maintain this proposition in the teeth of the fact, that, in America, more than one-half of our colonies actually were governed by elective legislative councils, he could not conceive. Our colonial system had always gone upon the principle, to give to every colony a proper constitution, without troubling ourselves about any close analogy with the constitution which might be perfectly good for ourselves, at home, but not at all applicable to a colonial society, where there are no materials for an aristocracy, out of which might be made an aristocratic branch of the legislature." One would have thought that such arguments, supported by such authorities, would have had some influence on a Reformed House of Commons. But what was the result of the division? Why, that 318 voted against, and only 56 for an elective council; and, among the names in the majority, are to be found those of Mr Labouchere, Master of the Mint, and of Lord Stanley, who, though at present in the Opposition, as he was in 1828, no longer professes himself in favour of Liberal opinions, but joins the Tories—too efficiently supported, on the present occasion, by the Whigs—in trampling under foot the liberties of the people. The Ministry have obtained, by the division, a strong opinion of the House of Commons against the Canadians; but let the colonists appeal, from the decision of the so-called representatives of the three kingdoms, to the good sense of the people, who have now begun to interest themselves in Canadian affairs; and the appeal, we foretell, will not be made in vain. The history of the Catholic Bill, of the Reform Bill, and of numerous other measures, shews that the decision of Parliament is not always according to the opinion of the country, and that, with a still more defective representation than that which we now possess, the public voice can make itself not only heard, but obeyed by both Peers and Commoners.

Another grievance of which the Canadians complain, is the charter to the British American Land Company, by which immense districts of fertile land are conveyed away at an inadequate price. The bill constituting this Company, was smuggled through the House of Commons, by the agency of an honourable Member who has a direct pecuniary interest in the speculation. The Canadians have repeatedly demanded the recall of the charter, and the repeal of the act constituting the company. Lord John Russel's sixth resolution, however, declares that the title of the Company shall be maintained inviolate. It is probable, however, that, as matters stand, emigrants will feel some hesitation in purchasing land from the Company, after the opinions which have been expressed in Canada as to the validity of the grant. To render palpable the gross injustice perpetrated by the North or British American Land Company job—for it is nothing else—it is only necessary to explain, that, under the alarm occasioned by the revolt of the old colonies, and, by soothing the Canadians, to keep them in their allegiance, a statute was passed in the year 1778, guaranteeing to all Colonial Assemblies—first, That no taxes should be imposed by the Imperial Parliament; and second, that the proceeds of all taxes levied in the colonies should be placed under their control. The revenue of Lower Canada amounts to £120,000 a-year—not, certainly, a heavy burden, when contrasted with the taxation under which we labour; but, in proportion to the population, equal to that of many considerable states. But, independently of the amount of taxation, whether great or small, it is a badge of oppressive mismanagement to be taxed in Canada at all. In the adjoining United States of America, the whole amount of the expenditure of the Government for all objects last year, was raised without any tax whatever—that expenditure being twenty-two millions of dollars, and the proceeds of the sale of the public lands, twenty-four millions of dollars. Besides the revenues of the Canadas, their military and naval defence, generously defrayed by the people of Great Britain out of their exuberant wealth, exceeds a quarter of a million of pounds sterling yearly. Now, there cannot be a doubt that, were the Canadas either independent, or part of the American Union, they might and would raise the whole funds necessary for their internal government, and for their military and naval defence, solely by the sale of land, without levying a single sixpence by taxation! But, at present, this ample source of revenue is jobbed away in the most shameful and barefaced manner; and the miserable pittances in name of price that are received from the granters, instead of being placed under the control of the Legislative Assembly, is seized by the Executive Council of the Governor, and expended on unconstitutional purposes. In this manner, a robbery of the people of Canada, and a violation of the constitution of the colony, are at one and the same time committed.

The eighth resolution of Lord John Russell is another plain violation of the constitution of the Canadas. It is the duty and the province of the Legislative Assembly not only to raise, but to appropriate the revenues. They have, therefore, as much right as the British House of Commons, or any other assembly on earth, to stop the supplies. Accordingly, finding all their remonstrances, representations, and petitions rejected, they at length, in 1832, exercised their undoubted constitutional privilege of stopping the supplies; a measure which the Whig Mr—now the Tory Lord—Stanley, especially recommended in 1829. How his Lordship can reconcile his conduct, when Colonial Secretary, in 1834, and his speeches in Parliament now, with his letter in 1829, we leave him to explain. In that letter he says, and says truly, "A constitutional mode is open to the people, of addressing for the removal of the advisers of the Crown," (was he then anxious for office?) "and refusing supplies, if necessary, to support their wishes." Mr Stanley perhaps thought that the remedy of stopping the supplies would prove, in Canada, what it has been of late in this country—a fine thing to talk about, a fine threat, but which would never be carried into effect. But the Canadian representatives being returned, not by the aristocratic classes and their dependants, but by the people, under a system of franchise approaching universal suffrage, have not merely stopped the supplies, but to such good effect, that four and a-half years' salary are now due the judges and other officials; the whole amount being £142,160. There happens, however, to be a sum nearly equal in the Canadian treasury, and Lord John Russell means to seize it and pay the salaries; thus setting at nought the undoubted constitutional right of the Legislative Assembly to stop the supplies. It would have been not one whit more unconstitutional, had he ordered the British troops, in the Province, to seize the money; and we suspect that the Canadians will not be able to distinguish any difference between the one proceeding and the other. They are both nothing else than appeals to force. Matters are now, indeed, brought very closely to the state in which they were in the old colonies at the time of their revolt. The British Parliament does not, it is true, assert the right their predecessors did to tax the colonies; but they do what is equivalent; and by an overwhelming majority, too: they take upon them to appropriate—that is, to spend the revenues of the Canadians. If taxation without representation was sixty years ago ultimately admitted by all parties to be nothing else but tyranny, by what term shall we designate the expenditure of the taxes, when collected, without representation?

Matters have come to that pass, that the only true course to be followed with Lower Canada, is for the British government generously and candidly to free it from restraint, and allow its inhabitants to choose the form of government which best pleases them. If we cannot govern them for good, let us not govern them for evil. Let us separate in friendship and in peace, and we shall be rewarded for the mortification such a course may give the pride of some few among us, by the extension of a beneficial commercial intercourse with a country yet in its infancy, and which, with unrestricted freedom in its institutions, will proceed in its career of prosperity with the most rapid strides. In the sixty years which have elapsed since the declaration of American independence, the United States have made greater advances in wealth, population, and civilization, than in any period of three times the length, when under British control. Their population has increased sevenfold, and their wealth in a still greater degree. The enterprise and energy of their inhabitants are unequalled in the history of the human race; and the benefits derived by Britain from commercial intercourse with their free citizens, has been infinitely greater than they could have been, had our dominion continued undisturbed to this day.

The cry which will no doubt be raised against the pacific and friendly separation of the two countries will no doubt be "The Dismemberment of the Empire!" In the ignorance which prevails in this country, of statistics and political matters, a cry is much more efficacious than an argument. Thousands hear the former, while not one in a hundred will listen to the latter. But the truth is, that the cry of "Dismemberment of the Empire!" like the "Church in Danger!" "No Popery!" is raised solely by those who wish to maintain the system of corruption and plunder which has so long existed. The colonies have afforded too valuable a means for providing for the Noodles and Doodles of the aristocracy, who were not presentable at home, and for replenishing those purses which had been emptied by profligacy and debauchery, to be given up without a desperate struggle. If they be driven into rebellion so much the better, in the eyes of aristocrats, whether Tories or Whigs. Troops and ships will be required to coerce the Canadian rebels, or at least to make the attempt; and hence there will be an increased expenditure of public money, and commissions to bestow among the favoured class. The Lord Charleses and the Lord Johns, whose patrimonies have suffered from feats of Sauter la coupe, performed by more expert knaves than themselves, will be provided for; and what proves beneficial to the ruling classes must, of course, be advantageous to the whole community.

To console those who look at the separation of a colony from the mother country, in a mere pecuniary point of view, we have a few remarks to offer. Many entertain the opinion that a colony is to a state what an estate is to a private individual—a source whence an income or revenue is derived. But—with the exception, we believe, of Jamaica, and one or two others—none of the British colonies pays the expense of its own internal government. The people of this country are at the sole expense of their naval and military defence. This, for the North American colonies and the West Indies, exceeds a million and a half a-year. Under the statute of 1778, no revenue can, under any circumstances, be raised in these colonies for the service of Britain. But then, it will be said, we have the monopoly of their trade, which is held out as of great consequence. The truth is, however, that the total imports into Great Britain from all the North American colonies in 1831, amounted only to £1,456, 909, and the exports to £3,074,628 in official value, from which one-third must be deducted, to ascertain the real value. In the above year, we imported into the United Kingdom, from Lower and Upper Canada, to the amount of £902,914, and exported £1,922,088, both in official value. Now, let the profit on the Canadian trade be set down as high as any one desires—although there is no reason to suppose that it is more valuable even to the merchants engaged in it, than the trade with the United States or other foreign countries—it will be found exceedingly difficult to make it balance the following items on the other side of the sheet. First, we have, for the naval and military defence of these colonies, an annual expense of £260,000, or more than ten per cent. on the total amount of the exports and imports. Then we have a million expended within a short period on the fortifications of Quebec; a million and a half on canals and other public works, £893,000 of which has been expended on the Rideau Canal, which will be of service only when we are at war with the Americans; for, during peace, the St Lawrence affords a much superior route for shipping. A new project has lately been set on foot, in which our Government have already employed some of the engineers in making surveys. We allude to the railroad from St Andrew's in the Bay of Fundy to Quebec, by means of which 1200 miles of dangerous navigation in the St Lawrence, and along the coasts at its mouth would be saved. But where is the money to come from, to make a railroad of 250 miles? Nowhere but from the overtaxed inhabitants of Britain; and a deputation of the colonists is on its way to this country to solicit funds from our Government for the purpose. The injury we have sustained from the North American colonies by supporting their timber trade is incalculable. By levying a duty on Baltic timber from five to six times higher than on that from our own colonies, we have seriously injured our trade with the whole Baltic. Instead of 1000 British ships loading at Memel yearly, the number has sunk to 250 or 300; and the trade with Norway and Sweden has almost disappeared. The landlords prevent our taking corn or cattle from the states surrounding the Baltic—the colonists, from taking timber. The interests of these parties must of course be protected, while that of the public is too general a matter to be at all attended to. As we will not take corn and timber, the only things the nations on the Baltic have to dispose of, they have it not in their power to take the cottons and other manufactured goods of Britain; and their governments, being irritated by the selfish and exclusive commercial system of Britain, are organizing an equally restrictive system for the exclusion of British goods, to which a great part of Germany has already declared its accession. Every one knows the very inferior quality of the North American timber, and how liable it is to the dry rot. Since the Custom House required almost to be rebuilt, on account of American timber having been used in its construction, it is not permitted to be employed in any public edifice. Some years ago, several frigates were built, under the direction of Sir Robert Seppings, some of them of Baltic, and the others of Canadian fir; and the result was, that while the former lasted eight years, the latter did not last four. Yet, to encourage the consumption of this bad and dear timber, and to prevent the importation of cheap and excellent timber from the Baltic, the people of the United Kingdom are taxed probably a million a-year; while it is exceedingly doubtful if the trade we foster at so great an expense is not injurious to the colonies, by removing industry and capital from the cultivation of the soil, and engaging them in an employment which, from the manner in which it is carried on, is extremely demoralising, and has completely failed in one of the chief objects for which it was encouraged—clearing the soil of trees; not one in ten of the trees being worth the cutting for timber.

A great evil attending colonies are the wars in, which they involve us. We have seen the expensive preparations we are making in Canada alone, for war. Most of the wars we were engaged in last century arose out of colonial questions. The war which commenced in 1739, and lasted nine years, arose from the Spaniards in America insulting our old colonies, and from squabbles about cutting logwood in the Bay of Campeachy. It added to our national debt twenty-nine millions. The war of 1756 originated in disputes with the French, about certain districts in Nova Scotia. It lasted seven years, and augmented our debt by sixty millions. The war which ended in our acknowledging the independence of the United States commenced in 1775, and lasted eight years, increasing by one hundred and four millions our debt. If to these sums we add the additional taxes raised to carry on these wars, and to pay the interest of the loans, together with the expense of the defence of the colonies during peace, we will venture to say that the amount would not be compensated by the whole imports from our colonies since their first settlement or conquest, even had we received these imports without payment either in goods or money.

The United States shew that it is by trading with independent states, and not with colonies, that any real benefit is to be gained. The monopoly of the trade with such colonies as the Canadas it is impossible to obtain; for, with so wild and extended a frontier, there never can be any difficulty in smuggling; nor, in truth, as experience as well as argument teach us, would it be of any great value to secure the monopoly. At all events, in the state to which matters have been brought by the corruption and misgovernment of the Tories, followed as it has been by the course pursued by the Whigs, every right-thinking man would rejoice to see the Canadas emancipated from the control of the mother country, and a friendly and pacific separation effected.

*Campbell's Letters from the South.

Since Dr Johnson buttoned his great-coat to the chin, seized his immortal oaken stick, and adventured for the misty Hebrides, no great literary character has gone forth on such daring quests as Mr Campbell, in his late expedition to Africa. He had, indeed, some experience in such matters, and, we believe, began where Johnson ended—the starting-post of the one proving the goal of the other. Like Johnson, too, he narrates his adventures, and makes his epistolary confidences to a lady; not "My mistress," nor any counterpart of the buxom Thrale, but to an anonymous fair one—probably Mr Colburn's elder and admired daughter, La Belle New Monthly. However this may be, the letters themselves are lively, playful, waggish, hilarious, and redolent of the jocund spirit of youth, with just as much serious feeling as a poet who is a man of the world, cares to exhibit. They may not contain a very remarkable quantity of useful knowledge. So much the better. We are overladen with its burden. Nor does Mr Campbell profess to care much about colonial interests, either English or French. He is superior to petty national jealousy, and attentive only to the general progress of civilization and human happiness. Whatever his exact object may have been, the charm of his letters is personal narrative. He has been in perils upon the great deep; and has heard the Lybian lion roar; and slept sumptuously in an Arab tent, between a calf and a Nanny goat; and looked on the tomb of Barbarossa; and read an Elzevir edition of Leo Africanus, in the very scenes described; and had the honour of a patriot-poet's volunteer body-guard, consisting of all the martial Poles in Algiers; and heard his own sweet verses recited there by sweeter infant lips: and all this he has told with a sprightly and charming facility—ay, and much more than this. The poet breaks out in many of his descriptions; and his images are often those of the finest poetry. Here is a glowing picture in words. Mr Campbell regrets that he had not an artist to paint the "Grande Place" of Algiers. He has done it himself.

The "Grande Place," as I have told you, affords the only tolerable promenade. Here, at the market time of a morning, you see not only the various people, but the animal and vegetable productions of nature, displayed in rich picturesqueness. It has been a perfect treat to me, for several days, to lounge here before breakfast. How I long for the pencil of a Flemish painter, to delineate to you the human figures of all complexions and dresses!—the turbaned Moor—the Jew with his sly face, and his spouse Rebecca, with her yard-long head-dress behind her. I could not pass over the Jew boys that blacken shoes, without being struck by the nimbleness of their tongues, and the comic play of their countenances. They all speak French, and seem the happiest creatures on earth; excepting, perhaps, the half-naked negroes, who are always chattering and laughing loudest, in proportion to the scantiness of duds upon their backs. I omit the Europeans, for they rather spoil the picture.

Peculiarly striking is the look of the Kabyles, the abroginal highlanders of Barbary, who have, all of them, a fierce air, and, many of them, legs and square forms that would not disgrace the grenadier company of the forty-second. Taller, and generally slenderer, are the Arabs, descended from those who conquered the country in the seventh century. They are distinguishable by vivid black eyes, shaped like an almond laid sidewise; and, though many of them look wretched and squalid, you see some among them whose better drapery and forms, and fine Old-Testament heads, give them a truly patriarchal appearance. I thought myself looking on a living image of antiquity, as I stood this morning beside a majestic old

* London: Colburn. 2 vols. 8vo. With numerous illustrative engravings of scenery and costumes.

Arab, whilst he made the camels he had led into the market kneel before him, to be unloaded of their enormous cargoes of herbs and fruits. I felt "my very een enriched" at the sight of the vegetable treasures around me, glowing with all the colours of the rainbow—splendid heaps of purple grapes in one pannier, and oranges, peaches, lemons, and pomegranates in another. Here were spread out in piles the huge and golden-hued melons and pompions, and there the white garlic, "and the scarlet and green pepper-pods," together with the brown melogines, an excellent pot vegetable, in size, shape, and colour, resembling a polished cocoa-nut.

Mr Campbell finishes by telling of the Barbary fig, a wild fruit which grows on the cactus-bush; and winds up, touching thus airily on a rather ticklish subject in any hands less dexterous.

The leaves [of the cactus-bush] are thickly covered with prickles, which, when they get into animal flesh, are with difficulty coaxed out of it. It is much used for hedges about Algiers; but, if you should ever come to this country, my dear friend, I exhort you never to let your linen be spread out on the cactus. An affecting story is told of a Dutch family who had a country house near this city. In the house there were five plump interesting daughters, who, in an evil hour, gave their garments to be washed to an ignorant European laundress. She hung them out to dry on these prickly bushes, and such evils were entailed on the lovely wearers of them, that they could neither sit nor recline with comfort, for a week or two afterwards.

Here is a charming landscape, most poetically painted. It lay on the road to the English Consul's country-house.

The road to the Consul's house, which is a short league from town, goes round those gardens, [the late Dey's,] up a steep ascent, where the country presents, at first, only a sterile appearance; but, as you get farther up, the villas increase in number, and the vegetable power of nature increases with the height you attain. The fig tree, the orange and lemon tree, the pomegranate, the olive, and the jujubier, are either growing wild or in orchards, with little or no cultivation. The cactus, with its massy leaves and fantastic trunk, raises ramparts around the fields and along the road sides, while the agave, a variety of the aloe, shoots up its branches ten feet high, like the swords of a race of giants. Then, at a certain height, you pass ravines on one side, beneath you, displaying lovely openings into the sea-coast, where the waves are whitening its distant rocks. In coming to one of these peculiarly beautiful, I could not but recall the lines of Thomson's "Castle of Indolence"—

"And where this valley winded out below,
The murmuring main was heard, and scarcely heard, to flow."

I left my horse on the road with my servant, and went down to traverse this ravine. With delight I heard the gush of a gurgling runnel, and followed a stream almost worthy of a Scottish glen, that was wimpling from rock to rock. A brown little singing bird flitted before me. I could see it only by glimpses; but its note, though short and twittering, was sweet. Is it possible, I thought to myself, that I am in Africa the torrid! The air was balmy—the banks of the rivulet were thick with wild flowers—I knew not the names of most of them, or merely guessed at them, from their resemblance to the productions of our gardens and hot-houses; but this uncertainty nowise diminished my interest in the charming strangers. When one meets with a smiling beauty, does it spoil one's admiration not to know her name? I suspect that it sometimes enhances it. Oh, but you will tell me, perhaps, that it is fantastic to compare a man's homage to woman with his love of a flower! True, if you mean a strict, unfanciful comparison. But allow a little phantasy; for it is an ingredient in all sorts of love. When we admire your sex, and, most of all, when we address you in poetry, do we not compare you to every flower that is most beautiful? Then why should I be shy to confess that my heart has a gallantry for flowers? They make me dream that I am among graceful and gentle females.

This was a day which I should never wish to forget: I could not tread a step, or look a yard around me, without seeing floral treasures that were exotic to an Englishman. It is true that the ivy, the blackberry, and the daisy, pleasantly reminded me that I had not dropped into another planet; yet, altogether, Nature appeared to me like an old friend with a new face; but it was a brightened face, and she was still "my goddess."

One more landscape—the highlands of Algiers—and we have done:—

Conceive me cicerone-ing you in imagination out of the gate of Babasoun. Leaving that gate on the right, you are led, by a fine spacious road, cut on the side of the hill by the orders of the Duc de Rovigo, and very creditable to his memory. If ascending, it is pleasant to look back below. There is a palm-tree, that, with its feathery foliage, gives an oriental character to the scene. . . . . You see, also, from this ascent, several picturesque Maraboot chapels; and the guide pointed out to me the spot which, he said, was the tomb of Barbarossa. At the top of the hill, you get to the great road that leads towards Douera and Boufaric. From this eminence the view is superb; the bay, with its mighty blue semi-circle fringed with creamy foam—the white country-houses, with their orange gardens—the Maraboots, interspersed with here and there a palm-tree—the plain below, where the vapours of the river Arach, as it discharges itself into Cape Matifou, are seen sporting in the sun; and the noble mountains towering behind the Metidjoh. All these objects, when I looked around me, filled me with but vain regrets that I had not a painter beside me, some capital artist, to mark the scene. . . . What studies would not Wilkie find among the Arabs and Kabyles, the laughing negroes and merry Jew-boys of the market place! What scope on these shores for the graces of Callcott! and what mountain lights and shadows for the sublimity of Turner! The altitude of these mountains I find differently estimated; but I love them too well to quarrel about a few hundred toises as to their stature; but the height of them seemed to me to be twice the height of Ben Nevis. They have an aspect peculiarly bold. Stretching, in a long sweep, with visibly deep indentations and ravines—with cliffs that are purpled, and masses of precipices that are bronsed by the sun—they strike the fancy—if one may compare mountains to men—as soldier-featured beings that bid defiance to invasion. And full sure among these passes, the Kabyles have taught both the Turks and French that Freedom is a mountain nymph. But the ascent to this landscape is too fatiguing for a pedestrian excursion; and at noon it is apt to be too sunny for a ride. You should go out thither on horseback when the crier from the minaret is chanting to matin prayers, and when the cannon in the harbour announces daybreak; while the jackall and the hyena are skulking home through the dewy nopals; and whilst the day-light is blushing in Heaven, like the life-blood returning to a lovely countenance.

This is worthy of the poet who has told us of the epal-morn. In another situation, on the Algerine coast, at Bornia, he exclaims—

Such is the grandeur of the surrounding mountain scenery, that I drop my pen in despair of giving you any conception of it. Scotchman as I am, and much as I love my native land, I declare to you that I felt as if I had never before seen the full glory of mountain scenery. The African highlands spring up to the sight not only with a sterner boldness than our own, but they borrow colours from the sun unknown to our climate, and they are marked in clouds of richer dye. The farthest-off summits appeared in their snow, like the turbans of gigantic Moors, whilst the nearer masses glared in crimson and gold under the light of morning.

We should like to give the Moorish dinner of Ben Omar which Mr Campbell describes with inimitable glee, or his account of the Jews, not forgetting the Jewesses; but this little picture or poem, for it is either at pleasure, will better suit our limits. At Bona, the traveller was wandering among ruins—Roman, and Roman Catholic—

Among the ruins, is shewn the gable of a high building which is said to be that of the convent of St Augustine; some lofty trees overshade the neighbourhood of the saint's abode. Undefinable but solemn feelings came over me as I trod the ground. We pursued our way beyond the ruins along the eastern road, and came up with an Arab family, whose habitation was an old ruinous house on the road side. The father of the family was tending some cattle in the adjacent field; and the mother, a very good-looking woman, with the relics of true Arabian beauty, was weaving a web of woollen cloth on the grass, near their habitation. The simplicity of her weaving was worthy of the first age of the world; instead of a shuttle, she employed a needle, which carried the woof along the threads of the warp that were stretched along the ground. She had a rude sort of reed, through which the threads of the warp were run; and by drawing in this reed, she bound the woof and warp together. How pleasing is human art in all its stages, from simplicity to perfection! With full recollections in my mind of the wonderful power-looms which I had seen at Glasgow, I could still look with interest on the work of this poor female artisan. Her two little sons and a daughter were beside her; all three struck us as being remarkably beautiful. I made Brown, who understands Arabic, put some questions to her, and she answered them, without interrupting her work, as gracefully and easily as if she had been receiving us in a drawing-room. "How old," I asked, "is this sweet little girl?" (She seemed to be about eight years old.) "I cannot tell you," she answered; "she was born some summers and winters before the French came." "Do you remember, then, how many summers and winters have gone by since the birth of either of your sons?" "No, I cannot tell you; but I was married not long after there was a great battle in this neighbourhood, and when many heads were carried about on poles." In fact, these Arabs take no note of time, and have neither clocks nor registers; yet they are the descendants of the people who taught us algebra!

The following is a specimen of Mr Campbell's knack at hitting off a trifle. It succeeds a poetical and passionate fit of wild-flower worship—

Although meat, fish, and fruits are twice as cheap here as at Algiers, I suspect our entertainers can make but little profit by their boarders; indeed, the landlady told me so the other day. When remaining last of the company, I complimented her on her cuisine, and the gastronomic powers of her guests, I found that I had touched the tenderest chord of her heart. "Alas, sir," said she, with a voice of grief, "if they would all eat as you do, like a man of conscience, of a dish or two, we could live by our trade; but the ravens!—the ogres!—oh, their maws will be the ruin of us!" And she wiped the tears with her apron. "I always tell my husband that it is of no use to take pains with our cookery; for the nicer we cook, the more unmercifully they devour." And I believed her; for I had remarked a bluff major bag for his own share an omelet—the flesh of a fowl, with ham to match—besides reducing the height of a pyramid of cutlets by half a foot. . . . . Apropos to omelets, I dined off a very nice and savoury one, made of an ostrich's egg, the day after I came to Oran. It was at the table of General Trezel. The men, excepting a Spanish priest and myself, were all military. Mio Padre, the priest, is a friend of Mina, and a bold Constitutionalist. He says it is all nonsense to talk of the Catholic religion being adverse to liberty, and favourable to the divine right of kings and emperors, for it has dethroned more kings and emperors than ever Protestantism did; and that Catholicism is naturally allied with Republicanism. I was so busy with the ostrich omelet, and he reminded me so much of Daniel O'Connell, that I could not even grunt a contradiction. There were some very pretty women of the party. One of them told me that she had once ate a bit of lion's flesh, and that it tasted like very good veal; she had also once half-dined, she said, off a roasted jackall, and taken a large slice, which was very like venison, and more savoury than mutton. Was this a vulgar eccentric woman? No, I assure you, quite the reverse on all other points of conversation—delicate and lady-like.

These may serve as specimens of Mr Campbell's easy and lively epistles. We leave whatever they contain of the solid, the statistical and speculative, to the researches of the reader.

Wilkie's Sketches of Canada and New York.

Mr Wilkie is a gallant yeoman of East Lothian, who, in the spring of 1824, (his book says, but it must be a misprint for 1834,) left his home to look about him, and spy the fertility and capabilities of the United States to a Scottish agriculturist. Such we at least apprehend was his object, for he scarcely lets us into the secret; and he is, from first to last, so uproariously merry, and so incorrigible a joker, that there is no knowing what to make of him. What demon has possessed Mr Wilkie to set up for a wit, out of the proper localities of the farmers' dinner clubs of his native county? No good could come of it. We are the more earnest upon this point, as men whose talk is only of cropping, and draining, and liming, and beaves, and markets, and the price of land and labour, will be apt to meet with a serious disappointment, when, instead of solid information, conveyed in plain, direct terms, they only meet with the caprioles and curvettings of this obstreperous humourist, or with endless grandiloquent descriptions, which could almost make us take our oath, without examination, that there must have been a circulating library of romances established either at Haddington or Dunbar for many years back. He puns, too! We could not have imagined it. We were not prepared for it; and having made up our minds beforehand that Mr Wilkie's book should be a plain, sensible guide or pioneer to agricultural emigrants, chokeful of facts, we may have been too prone to revenge the balking of our wondrous sagacity upon our author, whom, on a second perusal, and taking him on his own terms, we found an entertaining and enlivening travelling companion, whose wit, if not always in the best taste, never fails in that first ingredient, good-nature. The most new and agreeable portion of the volume is the author's sojourn in the bush, short as it was. Here is a day in the Canadian backwoods:—

"At present I am seated in a log-hut of no lordly dimensions. It contains three apartments—I can reach my hand to the ceiling as I sit—three paces brings me to the middle of my sleeping chamber, and three more from the opposite side of the room, would place me in the centre of the kitchen. The view I have from the window, is in unison with the diminutive dwelling. To the south and east, we have a half mile of elbow room; to the west, about a hundred yards, and on the north, within forty yards of me, is the public way, displaying a specimen of genuine corduroy that might well draw a shriek of horror from the slipshod spirit of Macadam!

"C. left this some mornings ago for Illinois. F. and I convoyed him on his way through the woods for several miles, and wishing him all safety to his destination, parted, turned back, and here am I now with not one of all these in whose company I crossed the Atlantic, to exchange a thought or a word with. And during such a time as the present moment, when F. is away in the woods after his own farming concerns, I feel solitary enough. There is, I believe, not a soul within a mile or two of me; and what is there to compensate for the want? Nothing living at least. There is even no approach to what one might style an animated landscape, unless fancy could endow, with a fictitious life, all those mangled stumps that stud the clearance. But, to me, these rather add to, instead of breaking in on the tameness of the limited prospect.

"On Thursday last, I was engaged in performing a very tough day's work. An intimation was sent to F., that a Chopping Bee was to take place on the ground of Mr Webb, a neighbouring farmer. The poor man had employed a Canadian to clear a certain space of wood, but he unluckily paid him beforehand, and soon had the misfortune to discover that gratitude was not one of the chopper's virtues; for he marched off—shouldering his hatchet—and leaving ten acres, the stipulated clearance, groaning under their original burden.

"Having supplied ourselves with the needful chopping axes, we set off after breakfast, which will generally be found a good ally in the performance of a hard day's work. We left our coats behind, the glass indicating a good many degrees of heat above the comfortable point. We arrived in about an hour at the field of action, and met fifteen of the backwood gentry; and I am sure you could not produce so large a group from the inhabitants of East Lothian, displaying such an overweening quantum of wild recklessness, combined, as I thought, with an abundant portion of underhand cunning. This was not, however, a fair specimen of the rural population, but consisted mostly of men who employ themselves clearing the woods, or turning their hands to anything that promises a good day's feeding, accompanied with a fair allowance of grog.

"There is little doubt, therefore, we found this choice selection of mortals in their element; and, as a novelty, I did not regret joining the ploy. We soon commenced a war of extermination against some of the loftiest trees the world can produce, and in half an hour you might have mourned over many a fallen monarch of the wood.

"I accomplished, out-and-out, the severest day's work I ever set my hands to; and, to cheer my sinking strength, I was frequently complimented by my squatter friends upon my dexterity in using the chopping-axe. I was even daring enough to challenge one of them to single combat; and, by the way, this might suggest a decisive, and, at the same time, bloodless method of terminating encounters of a more honourable nature. My opponent and I proceeded thus:—We selected a tree of fair dimensions, having a perpendicular stem, and standing free of others. We placed ourselves on each side, hatchet in hand, ready to attack our victim on a signal being given. The one towards whom the tree fell was declared the victor, for this plain reason, that his cut must have been the deepest, and, like conscientious folks, trees seem generally to lean to the weaker side. I had the good fortune to floor my opponent, or at least the tree, in this my first trial of strength; but the various professors of the noble art who were looking on, did not yield the full share of approbation which, in my vanity, I conceived my due—my supple form, long arms, and long legs, were, in their turn, lugged in for a part of the honour. In this manner, the worthies managed very successfully to fritter away all the laurels that I might have plumed myself upon. My feathers were, therefore, up; and, although light was beginning to fail, I signified my wish to enter the lists anew. My knight of the chopper immediately started from the side of the grog-can, where he had been comfortably seated, engaged in discussing the contents. I likewise took a little before engaging, and, although it tasted well enough under our parched and worn-out circumstances, I am convinced I never before or since tasted such a harsh and even abominable beverage. It was composed of the worst description of Canadian spirits, and lukewarm water, brought from the muddy creeks in the wood—smelling and tasting of the decayed vegetation with which it was impregnated—no well being within many miles of us. A tree was again selected, of more moderate dimensions, however, than our first, and again we fell to. But, in this instance, as luck would have it, we were both cheated of victory; for the tree, having a perverse inclination of its own, fell halfway between us, seemingly determined neither to add to nor rob me of my former triumph.

"In the course of the day we levelled to the ground many a tree that would have done honour to the noble woods of Tyningham or Yester, or to those braes

> "Where Salton's oak and Humble's pine > Fringe the rude banks of pebbly Tyne."

The oaks of this district are the finest I have seen; but this only forms an additional motive for their destruction. They escape the fire, but undergo the inglorious fate of being manufactured into barrel staves.

"The grog I have already mentioned was our only drink during the day, and, uncouth as it was, the capacious can was many times emptied, replenished, and emptied again, before we struck work. Thus passed the play—which lasted till about sunset—and then came an afterpiece, which most certainly was considered quite in season by the dramatis personæ engaged. Instead of shifting the scenes, the actors shifted their quarters, by adjourning to the log-hut of Mr Webb, whose provident dame had busied herself to some purpose.

"The festal board (composed of everything the house afforded in the shape of tables, clubbed together) was creaking, if not actually groaning under its substantial load of eatables and drinkables. No ceremony was either thought of or requisite; we planted ourselves round, after the true take-what-you-have-and-you-won't-want fashion.

"The soul and body of our feast was pork, tortured into every description of dish, from the complicated concealment of a pie, to the unaspiring rotundity of an humble ham; and its simple hand-maiden, the potato, was, in some of the platters, presented to us, so buttered, toasted, and shaped, that even the shrewd wit of an Irishman might have been taken aback, and rendered unable to discover the presence of his beloved root. To give you some idea of the style of this bush feast—a huge cast-metal goblet was handed round the table, filled with potatoes, for the benefit of those who preferred them, boiled, and clothed in the primitive covering of their own jackets.

"But I have yet to tell how we got accommodated with seats; for you can hardly suppose our hostess possessed chairs sufficient for a company that filled her house to overflowing. At the head of the board sat our landlord, on a bag of wool, supported on the right and left by two of his friends, occupying chairs, which appeared to be the sum total in his possession. Down the right side of the board, ran a rough-hewn plank, supported at each end by a sack half filled with corn; and the opposition bench was a broken ladder, with similar supports, and forming, you may well imagine, no very comfortable resting-place. At the foot of the table, opposite the gentleman on the wool-sack, stood a huge chest; but whether containing napery or corn, I never discovered—perhaps there were both, for there was not a fellow to it in the house.

"More noise was made during the process of feeding than there would have been heard at fifty tables d'hotes in New York. When we had got this part of our festival over, the sun had likewise finished his course above board, and candles appeared to be highly requisite to assist us in discussing what might be called the serious business of the evening. By the light of the fire, I made a survey of the apartment; but was unable to discover anything in the shape of a candle or candlestick; and this led me to suppose that our future proceedings would be little better than fighting in the dark. And, perhaps, this might happen in a too literal sense; for I could see that there were several hot tempers among us; and, when these are in the company of hot spirits, the odds are generally in favour of a blow-up. Part of my conjectures were, however, soon set at rest; for the dame brought forth, from some mysterious corner, a half-dozen good substantial tallow candles; and, as she lighted them—with happy invention and dexterity—popped their nether ends into the bottles that had been conveniently emptied during dinner.

A jolly can of punch was brewed, and the mirth and fun grew fast and furious. Mr Wilkie and his friend stole away before the last act.

Cholera was raging while Mr Wilkie was in Canada; and he retired from Toronto to the new settlement of a friend, with a party to which he and another gentleman acted as avant-couriers—

To take possession of the country quarters, and put everything to rights, as far as our poor male management would go, and rig out the domicile for the reception of the female comers. We set out on a delightful afternoon, just as the excessive heat was on the wane, and when the animal spirits are in consequence on the rise. Our vehicle was provided with supplies for a few days, such as a tea-pot, and requisites for the preparation of a comfortable cup of tea—a couple of tin jugs, (the lady wisely judging that, in our hands, they would stand a better chance than more fashionable ware,) a loaf of bread—spoons and knives. For other needfuls we had to trust to the stores of a wayside tavern, in the same clearance with our friend's farm.

We passed, in our journey, through rather a varied and pleasant part of the country. Our first stage was beneath the shade of large pines, that cover a sandy plain many miles in extent, we then got into a better country, with goodly clearances at intervals, and at no part were we long with the wood on both sides of the way.

We crossed the river Humber, a clearer running stream at this part than any other of the district. There is here the pretty little village of Tobococke—most of the houses with independent stations of their own, such as the fancy of the proprietors had chosen to stick them on. Some were on the crests of rising sandy knolls, some buried in little hollows; and on the opposite side of the bridge, by the wayside, in more orthodox and old country fashion, some cottages were placed in a continuous row. A diminutive piazza in front, covered over and under with wild vines, and other elegant creeping plants, gave a cast of domestic elegance to the dwellings; and, more lovely still, we observed several blooming cheeks and blue eyes watching us from the half-buried lattices, as we jogged past in our primitive equipage. We had our vicissitudes too, analagous to storm and calm. The one in the shape of patches of corduroy, over which we were tossed and tumbled in gallant style; and the other in the form of long tracks of sandy road, through which the waggon wheels had to squeeze their way, like a vessel moving along at half a knot in the hour.

The sun had set, and the air became accordingly chilly when we got to the end of our last stage, and, as the wisest thing we could do in our circumstances, we hastened to inquire about our accommodation. There was neither chair, table, nor almost any other piece of furniture in the house; but we found a fire lighted in the garden, beside which sat a couple of workmen, who were employed in finishing the house we were about to inhabit.

They made themselves as comfortable as possible with a tea-pot of Scotch toddy, for which they prudently carried materials; and next morning, after a bivouack within doors, if that be not a bull, set about repairing the mansion.

Half the windows were unglazed, half the doors unhung, and the house, in short, only half finished. It was a frame one, consisting of two stories and an attic; and altogether the mansion-house, with reference to the other habitations in the township.

Hammers, saws, and sweeping-brooms were kept in full operation, and we soon got the whole in fitting trim to receive the lady and her family. With the usual providence of the fair sex, a waggon, stowed three times its own height, brought up the rear, on the day of their arrival; and, before dark, we rigged out several beds, cooking apparatus, and many other needfuls and necessaries, named and nondescript. . . . . .

We were pleased to find that our party was not alone in the wilderness. There were several habitations straggled up and down the clearance, like so many wooden boxes tossed at random over the tops of the surrounding wood. It was, too, a "handsome clearance," being about three miles in one direction, and half that distance in another; but, from the great height of the boundary trees, it did not appear to be nearly of such extent. A smith's forge stood within a hundred yards of us, and next it a small tavern, in which there were sometimes glorious carousals, when a wet day drove the people from their outdoor labours. This occasioned it receiving, from one of our party, the appropriate cognomen of "Little Hellie."

Those composing our party employed themselves in the ways that best suited their pleasure and conveniences. Several who had got a knowledge of mechanics were soon over head and ears in work. Shelving, benches, tables, &c. were the fruits of our industry; and we even managed, with two day's labour, to provide the lady with the there unheard-of luxury of a sofa. It was rude enough, but such refinement as it displayed had never, till then, appeared within the woody precincts of the township. When we quitted the country some time afterwards, the squire of the district prayed that we would allow him to retain the envied couch, which was willingly granted. And there is little doubt, that, at this very moment, the youthful offspring of his honour, as they cluster themselves on our transcendent handiwork, recollect the strangers, and continue to speculate over the silent witness of their wonderful skill.

Although we were often without a ready supply of beef or mutton, there was no lack of the grunting gentry in the clearance. One old man, from Wales, named Davis, possessed six fine families, each consisting of a mother and twelve pigs. The house door was seldom left five minutes ajar, ere we received a free and easy visit from some half dozen of our squeaking neighbours; but this was quite excusable in them, poor things, for they only followed the example of their masters, whose unbidden visits were often more untimely still. A mere word to the dog was sufficient to rid us of the forward piglings, but it was no easy task, we found, to keep clear of the presence of our two-legged intruders; a broad hint did not seem to be a figure of speech made use of or understood in their conversational intercourse.

Harvest was now approaching, and we had a slight share of it. A field of peas behind the house ripened, and all the effective weapons in the district were mustered to cut it down; they consisted of a scythe, which the only servant on the farm made use of, and several hedge-bills, (at least some would have so named them at home,) which his aid-de-camps assisted him with to the best of their abilities. It was truly a rough job; but in the course of a few days we finished it by forming the whole crop into a good sized stack in the middle of the field. The rest of the cleared part of the farm, containing about sixty acres, was laid down in grass, and we were thankful; for whatever it might be to the skin-dried natives, field work at this season was a roasting business to us. The thermometer was generally at 80° by nine o'clock A.M., and, at a little past noon, as high as 90° and 96°.

While staying here, we had an opportunity of observing the effects of a sudden hurricane in the woods, one afternoon while several of us were in the garden, from which we had, now and then, to run to the house for a little respite from the rays of the sun. The thermometer stood about 90° in the shade, and we felt as if breathing the heated air of a furnace, for not a single breath of air fanned the wood-bound clearance. We were, in fact, as if standing at the bottom of a huge tub, the trees around forming the upright staves.

About two o'clock we were startled by a strange, undefinable noise, which every moment became louder and louder, and sounded like the sea swelling in the distance. We were unable to divine the cause, but kept our eyes fixed along the road to the north-west, from whence the disturbance seemed to proceed; and we soon observed the white dust rising in vast volumes, over the tops of the trees, accompanied with several cracking and booming sounds, which we afterwards discovered arose from trees that were prostrated by the violence of the wind. Little more than two minutes brought the hurricane, in all its violence, across our clearance, whirling aloft everything in its way which was of a light or moveable description. It appeared for a second or two as violent as an explosion of fire-damp in a coal-mine, and as soon over; but it left most unequivocal effects behind. The close and sultry heat was gone, and in its stead we enjoyed a most refreshing, though it might have proved a dangerous coolness. We had been moving languidly about without either coats or vests, and with our necks exposed to the air; but in five minutes our teeth and limbs were shivering and chilled, and we hastened in to get covering from the cold.

There was little to be had in the way of sport; we saw no feathered game, save now and then a hawk hovering over the trees at a very circumspect and unshootable distance; and black squirrels were all we saw of the four-footed sort. One day, indeed, we got notice that a bear had been heard in an oat-field adjoining, and we were persuaded to set off in a body, to take the marauding brute by storm.

The bear escaped them. It is clear that Mr Wilkie was not enamoured of Canada:—

In this part of the country, the settlers pass—as far as we are able to judge—a busy enough life, considering the climate, &c., which they must submit to. They have little in the shape of comfort, and nothing at all of luxury. Many of the locations around us appeared to be as old as any in the province, and had not the raw look of many others we visited. But still there were few of those indications that speak of a valued home, and whisper at once to the heart of a stranger, that he is amongst those who are surrounded with domestic comfort and happiness. There is none of those decorations, in and out of the woodland cots, that mark the hand of peaceful contentment, and which resemble the thousand nameless attentions that shew the love one bears to the partner of his choice. We saw only a scanty portion of fruit trees, and but few flowers and plants.

Many are the calamities of the bush, especially to those who have spent all their lives in the snug homesteads of the Lothians. Add to them the last, worst pest of insects, the croaking of bull-frogs, the chirping of crickets, and the alarm of serpents, and the misery is complete, without those minor touches which Mr Wilkie has given.

The flies were our greatest and most persevering tormentors, however; there were millions of them ever buzzing about the room; and when we lay down, as we had to do several times a-day to refresh ourselves with a rest or nap, hundreds of these winged pests would in one moment settle on our faces, necks, or whatever part of our languid bodies was left exposed to the air. Nose, mouth, and eyes were clustered and covered, while the tickling from their feet and suckers was altogether unbearable. Sometimes one might manage, by a quick motion of the hand, to crush a dozen or two to death; but it was far from pleasant, rendering the face a puny war-field even when successful—and when not, the only satisfaction was in having bestowed on our own flesh and blood a good hard thump. We were unable to bear the covering of a handkerchief over our faces, the air being too hot to allow the slightest obstruction to our breathing; so we often rather submitted to the irritating manœuvres of the little brutes. We had plenty of snakes, too: I captured several in the garden, and one fine large fellow who had his retreat under the floor of the house. But we never ascertained whether they were of a dangerous sort or not. . .

The chilly nights of autumn began to wax keener and keener, and so great did the contrast between heat and cold become to us before leaving the woods, that while at mid-day we were roasted under a heat that raised the thermometer above 90°, we were nearly frozen at midnight under the protection of eight substantial blankets.

We sincerely congratulate Mr Wilkie upon once more finding himself at home.

NEW NOVELS.

MR COLBURN has of late furnished the public with a fresh and most bountiful supply—served up hot and hot—of those first necessaries of civilised life, novels and romances. Of Picciola, which some readers may consider a flight above the level height of modern fictitious soarings, we have spoken below; and although Henrietta Temple is the elder in point of birth, we presume that Lady Charlotte Bury's Divorced is entitled to take precedence. The scope, "the end and aim," of the tale, may easily be imagined from its title. It is a thrice painful story; though the misery it inflicts might be endured for the sake of the moral lesson. But does it teach one? There is the rub! The meek, the gentle, the beautiful, the long-suffering and penitent Lady Howard, the divorced, becomes,—in consequence of her fault and her sorrows, the object of our deepest sympathy, and, finally, of our respect. Is it this the author intended? Her sufferings and humiliation endear Lady Howard ten thousand times more to her noble-minded daughter, than if she had never forsaken her child—never been the divorced wife of Lord Vernon. Her sole punishment is the misery which her early misconduct entailed upon her innocent children; and this is bitter enough. But what does it avail as a lesson? Everything is overdone; and we rise from the perusal of a melancholy tale with the disposition to murmur at the awful visitation of the sins of the fathers upon the children, and filled with compassion for the crushed and heart-bruised Magdalen. The involvements of this tragic story, however improbable, give room for scenes and situations of deep pathos, and of the most painful interest; but, when the pure and innocent are one by one immolated as victims for the long-past crime of the sorrowing mother, the heart rebels, and the judgment revolts. Nor is it wise to leave us blaming and almost detesting the stern virtues of the immaculate and severe Lady Margaret Leicester, and the frigid decencies of the heartless and worldly-minded Lady Harcourt, while our sympathies are exhausted by the misery with which the victim of early indiscretion is pursued, and finally overwhelmed. In brief, we consider this novel, which will, we doubt not, be eagerly sought after and perused, as unskilfully framed to forward the author's avowed object. The work has, however, merit in execution, if we look only to its power in exciting the feelings; and the character of Alice Talbot, the gentle and magnanimous daughter of the divorcée, is a beautiful conception. Why was there no salvation for her, since her death makes us pity and not hate its cause—her subdued mother? But we are speaking in enigmas, and must refer to the book, of which we may give one small specimen. It is Alice's soliloquy, shortly after a malicious fiend, in female form, had acquainted her, in the most torturing manner, with her mother's history, and afforded the clue to the sorrows and mortifications to which her social position, as the daughter of an erring woman, exposed her.

"So, then," she thought, with that aching throb of anguish which has no name, "my first sorrow was caused by my mother's guilt! She who so coaxed and doated upon me is, in fact, my worst enemy!—so there is an end of my reverence for my parent! I no longer can consider our house as the abode of virtuous love. No!—all the ties which bind us together as a family—which make them my parents—which make Henry and I brother and sister—are sinful. We ought never to have existed! Poor, poor mamma! This, then, is the reason she never goes out; this, then, is the reason no ladies visit her, and that my name is so carefully written on the cards left at our door. Oh, how my heart bleeds for her disgrace and humbling! how much more should we, her children, be kind to her! how much more does she require our love! And papa, too, I wish he were never cross to her—he ought not to be cross to her; for miserable it must make her, that he for whom she forfeited all, should be for an instant harsh. This, then, is the reason of her mournful looks—this, then, is the cause of her weeping so often! Poor, dear mamma!" And Alice Talbot's heart did indeed bleed.

Henrietta Temple

Is altogether a story of a lighter and more cheerful cast. It is one of love at first sight—young, passionate, immoveable love; crossed and tried, no doubt, but coming out of the furnace, like gold, seven times refined; and all ending cheerfully and happily at last, like a gay comedy, with a double wedding. This novel is, moreover, very cleverly and elegantly written; but it is superfluous to speak of it, as we notice that it has already reached a second edition. [So, we are glad to say, has our favourite "Mrs Armytage," a pleasing proof of our sagacity, and of the good taste of the public.] The comic scenes (as that laid in the spunging-house) and the subsidiary characters in "Henrietta Temple" are touched with felicitous spirit. Count Mirabel is the true fine gentleman of the old genteel comedy, with certain airy, fluttering, foreign graces. Had he not, as we understand, a certain living prototype, now in London, the author would have infinite merit in the invention of a character so true to nature, and yet perfectly original. He has great merit as it is; for Mirabel is inimitable. Lady Bellairs, also, is true comedy and true nature. We are sorry to understand that her diverting, old, fairy ladyship has been cut off by influenza, above the age of ninety, since "Henrietta Temple" was published. We daily expect to hear the auction of her china announced—an event which will, no doubt, attract the whole fashionable world.

Picciola, or Captivity Captive. 2 vols. 8vo. Colburn.

No person condemned to tread the wishy-washy ways of modern literature, as a critic of the novels of the day, but must have sighed forth the axiom that half is sometimes greater than the whole, and longed to reduce, by at least a moiety, every three-volume novel inflicted upon his patience. For our own parts, we sicken at the mere idea of the infinite deal of nothing indispensable to make out the lawful complement of the booksellers; and have much satisfaction in announcing that "Picciola," as the name denotes, is both short and sweet. Two other qualities, rarely to be found in combination, are also discernible in this singular little work—elegance and vigour. "Picciola" is as graceful as forcible; and well deserves the honours decreed her by the French Academy; being fully equal to the gigantic task assigned her, of vindicating the literature of la jéune France, from the aspersions of English criticism.

The story is briefly as follows:—The young Count de Charney, having exhausted the sources of amusement open to every noble and wealthy libertine, as well as the studies available to a gifted but perverted mind, conspires against the government of Napoleon, and is thrown into a state prison in one of the fortresses of Piedmont. Without sympathy with his kind, without self-respect, without hope, the selfish sceptic soon becomes weary of his own society; and the chain of incidents by which he is induced to a happier frame of mind, and eventually to light, liberty, and happiness, we shall not defeat the interest of our readers by rendering prematurely public. We defy them to guess the means employed; we defy them to take up the work without fairly pursuing it to the end. The conversion of the infidel, and the destinies of "Picciola," fill up a scene that appears to be passing in vivid interest before our eyes.

We recommend this little flight of fancy to readers of all ages; but more especially to the young, who are likely to derive as much profit as pleasure from the perusal.

NEW EDITIONS OF WORKS.

In the literary lists of the current quarter, new editions are conspicuous. They are of popular and stable works, and embrace, to a remarkable extent, the new and indispensable condition of cheapness. Among them we have, from Colburn, one of the most amusing books in the language—Walpole's Correspondence. The work is compressed into three octavo volumes, and much reduced in price. This edition is farther illustrated by new notes, besides those which accompanied it when originally published. The correspondence extends from the year 1735 to 1793, and forms the most piquant chronicle of the court and the world of fashion, during that period, that is extant. It is the complete revival of the persons of an age which, though passed away, is still replete with interest; and the fullest view behind the scenes of high life, of the naked puppets, and the strings and pulleys by which they are moved, that we possess.

Another of Colburn's new editions of standard works is—Brenton's Naval History of Great Britain.

Captain Brenton has enlarged and carefully improved this edition, rendering it as perfect and as worthy as possible of holding a permanent place in the national literature. He has, moreover, brought down his narrative to the most recent periods of British naval history, including Ross's second voyage, and all the late surveys. Captain Brenton is not without his prejudices, whether as a Tory, a seaman, or a disciplinarian; but his maritime annals are fortunately so chokeful of facts as to leave little room for mere speculation on matters upon which controversy might be raised. Captain Brenton complains that an able writer in The New Monthly Magazine accuses him of an anti-Gallic mania, or anti-Napoleonophobia. Now, we should not differ with him about this hobby; but why will Captain Brenton, who is a religious man, assume that there can be no end to wars, that "wars are unhappily the lot of human nature—the scourge of the Almighty;" and that it must ever be the duty of Christians to mitigate what they cannot suppress? Why contemplate war as an indispensable condition of human society in every state? We have no faith in this. It is the doctrine of devils.

> "War is a game that, were their subjects wise, > Kings would not often play at."

And as subjects are becoming wise, kings, if they do not lead, must follow. But all this has little to do with a new edition. This is, exteriorly, a very handsome and a marvellously cheap book. The two large volumes are well done up in navy blue, studded with twenty-four good portraits of our greatest naval captains, with views of harbours, the lines of battle of our greatest sea-fights, plans, &c. &c.; and the price is only a guinea and a half!—of this valuable accession to a seaman's store of books, and to a British gentleman's library.

POLITICAL REGISTER.

PARLIAMENT.

THE proceedings of the last month must convince every one that there is an absolute necessity for a speedy dissolution of Parliament. The triumphant majority for the Canada Coercion Bill, the virtual rejection of the Church Rate Bill, the division on the Ballot, and on the Corn-Law Question, the maintaining of the Army and Navy on a war establishment, prove how little influence Liberal opinions exert in Parliament. It is plain that the Whigs have resolved, in so far as lies in their power, to stop the progress of Reform. They appear inclined to join the Tories in supporting misgovernment whenever they can do it with safety; and it is only by reforming the Reformed Parliament that there is any chance of securing the passing of Liberal measures. The House of Commons requires an organic change as much as the Lords; for, as at present constituted, it will merely prepare bills for the rejection of the Upper House.

The Church-rate Abolition Bill has given great satisfaction to the Dissenters; and though it will unquestionably be thrown out by the Lords, church-rates are at an end; for, after the expression of the Government and the House of Commons against them, it will be in vain again to attempt their collection. The funds are to be raised from the church property itself, it being estimated that, by a better management of the church lands, and by letting them on lease, instead of on lives, as at present, £250,000 will be realized, to be applied in lieu of church-rates. The rents of the pews of churches are also to be applied in the same way, a certain proportion of pews being reserved for the poor. This bill is not only important in itself, but still more so from the consequences to which it may lead. Tithes are in a similar situation to church-rates, and the next attack will be made upon them; for the new tithe act is found, in many instances, to be attended with oppressive consequences. We hope that, in Scotland, the immense revenues drawn by the land proprietors from unexhausted teinds, will not be overlooked. These revenues are held merely in trust for the church; and, before any assessments on the heritors for repairs on, or the rebuilding of a parish church are granted, they ought to be surrendered. We hope that the Church Commissioners will make an investigation into this subject, for which the records of the teind court afford ample and unexceptionable materials, and report the amount in each parish. The Church Extension Association should also look into the matter. It is in vain to expect that the people of England and Ireland, as well as the Scottish Dissenters, will suffer themselves to be taxed—for that is the effect of a grant from the public revenue—to endow the proposed new churches, while there are ample funds for the purpose belonging to the church itself; but which those who affect to be so anxious for her extension conceal, lest they offend the landed aristocracy. It is disgraceful that these revenues have not long before now been made available. Immense sums of money have been drawn from the public revenue for building churches and repairing universities in Scotland, and in making up the small stipends of the parochial clergy to £150, all of which should have been drawn from the unexhausted teinds.

THE BALLOT.—Ministers have seriously injured their popularity by their conduct on the Canada question, and their opposition to the Ballot. The arguments of Mr Grote in its favour were unanswerable; but the Ministry, supported by the Tories, defeated the motion—the numbers, including tellers, being 267 to 155. The majority is thus composed:—Tories 200; Ministers and their subalterns, 12; doubtfuls, 10; Whigs, 45. In June 1835, the numbers were 146 and 319, so that the question goes on successfully. Of those absent, 27 are pledged to support the Ballot, so that the Peel Parliament contains no fewer than 182 supporters of this measure. There is little doubt that, in a few years, the Ballot will be carried in the House of Commons; but it certainly will not be an easy task to get the bill through the Lords.

NEW POOR-LAW ACT.—Attempts have been frequently made to injure the popularity of Ministers on account of this act; but the truth is, that, whatever blame or merit attaches to it, must be shared equally by Whigs, Tories, and Radicals; for all parties supported it when it was before Parliament. A Committee has been appointed to inquire into its operation; and we have little doubt that their investigation will prove that the attacks which have been made on the new Poor-Law are unfounded; and that they have been got up by those officials who were getting rich by administering the affairs of the poor, and whom the new law has deprived of lucrative offices, aided, as these officials are, in their efforts, by lazy paupers, who prefer living on the industry of others, to subsisting by the labour of their own hands. The labouring classes in England have been completely demoralized by the operation of the Poor-laws; and it is not remarkable that there should be numerous paupers, but that any of the lower orders should work at all. In many of the work-houses, the food they receive is both better in quality and greater in quantity than any independent labourer can possibly afford. Here, for example, is the food now given in a work-house in Nottingham. The quantity is unlimited, and all of the best quality, such as is used in the houses of the gentry of the country:—Breakfast, bread and milk; dinner, meat and vegetables, three or four days in the week—the other days, soup and vegetables, and plum dumplings; supper, bread and milk, and bread and cheese, on alternate nights. The fare is admitted to be many degrees superior to that of the labourers in the district; and the inmates of the work-house perform no work of any kind.

THE MERCANTILE MARINE.—On the motion of Mr Buckingham, leave has been granted to bring in a bill for the establishment of a Marine Board, and for the better regulation of the merchant shipping of the kingdom. The mercantile navy belonging to Great Britain and her colonies, amounts to two millions and a half of tons, manned by from 250,000 to 280,000 seamen, and the value of the ships and cargoes cannot be less than fifty millions. So deficient, however, is the construction of the ships, that the average annual loss of ships, taking the period from 1793 to 1829, is 557; but, of late years, the loss has been increasing in an alarming degree—no fewer than 1068 having, in the year 1829, been wrecked, foundered, upset, or driven ashore. It appears, in fact, that our merchant ships are the worst in the world, and that they have been rapidly deteriorating of late years. The chief cause of this is the system of insurance, combined with the mode of classifying the shipping at Lloyd's. After a certain length of time, a ship ceases to be in the first class, or A. 1, whatever may be her strength. The merchant, finding the rate of insurance is lowest in new ships, of course prefers them. The shipowner is thus compelled to have not good but new ships; he, like the merchant, protects himself against the risk of loss from their insufficiency, by insurance; and hence it is only cheap ships which are in demand. A merchant ship of 1000 tons, is only three inches thick in the bottom; while a ship of the Royal Navy of equal tonnage, is twenty-one inches thick. Many merchant ships are so weak, even when new, that they cannot bear the weight of their own cargoes, unless when afloat; and hence the enormous loss of that kind of shipping, compared with that of the Royal Navy, and the vessels of the East India Company, neither of which are insured. In 1833, 800 merchant ships were lost, and not one of the Royal Navy. Although shipbuilders, shipowners, merchants, and insurers, may all contrive to carry on a lucrative business, the loss of property, amounting to three millions a-year, ultimately falls on the public, in the form of an increased price of the commodities carried by sea. The loss of life by this state of matters is so great, that Professor Faraday lately mentioned, at the Royal Society, that of all classes of men, sailors are the shortest lived.

Another cause of the bad construction of the British mercantile shipping, is the tonnage duties. Every vessel arriving from a foreign voyage has to pay certain duties, levied according to her size or tonnage; and all vessels, whether employed in foreign or coasting trade, pay a penny or twopence a-ton for lighthouse dues to each lighthouse they must pass in the voyage. Hence the wits of the ship-builders are set at work, not to build the strongest, safest, and quickest sailing vessel, but the vessel which will carry the greatest cargo compared with the tonnage, as estimated by the rules laid down by Government. This is the true cause of the inferiority of our shipping, in appearance and sailing qualities, to that of the Americans, who are not subjected to tonnage duties.

The want of a code of maritime law is also a great evil. The French, as well as most of the continental nations, have had for centuries laws regulating everything connected with shipping—the qualification of the captain and other officers, the number of men necessary for the crew, and all other particulars. In this country we have no code of maritime law; any one may be captain of a ship whom the owners choose to appoint; and only last year a vessel of 279 tons was in the Thames commanded by a boy of fourteen, he being younger than his own apprentices, and indeed the youngest person in the ship. No such thing could take place in any other European state.

To enable our shipping interest successfully to compete with foreigners, it is indispensably necessary to repeal the duties on tar, timber, hemp, and other articles used in ship-building. To counteract the pernicious effects of insurance, it has been proposed to form associations of shipowners—such as already exist in many ports—for mutual assurance, and to prohibit marine insurance as conducted at present. It would be the interest of such associations to prevent any vessel being enrolled which was not properly and substantially built. The inhuman practice of impressment ought also to be abolished. The object of the proposed Marine Board is to accomplish all these objects. Every friend to humanity and lover of his country must wish success to the measure; and we hope that no paltry jealousies nor selfish interests will prevent it passing through Parliament.

RAILWAYS.—Friendly as we are to railways, we think that the mania which prevails for them at present, is deserving rather of a check than of encouragement. We cannot help thinking that seventy-seven railway bills, in a single session, is somewhat too many. To engage so extensively in their formation at once, is to raise up a ruinous competition for iron, labour, and the capital which must be employed in their formation. Besides, it must be obvious to every one that the knowledge and science applicable to the formation of railways, is yet in its infancy. Experience has shewn that the estimates of their cost are mere random assertions, unworthy of consideration; and, as might be anticipated, they always fall much short of the real expenditure. The London and Birmingham railway, it was estimated, would be completed for £2,500,000; nearly the whole of that sum is expended, and it is now estimated that the cost will be £4,446,594. It is found impossible to raise this large sum from the subscribers; and £600,000 have already been raised on loan, and an application made to Government for the loan of a million. The original estimate of the Liverpool and Manchester railway, was £400,000; it cost £1,200,000. The Liverpool and Birmingham railway will cost a million beyond the original estimate; the Great Western, two millions; and the Southampton and London double. The estimate for the Glasgow and Edinburgh railway is £893,000—upwards of £20,000 a mile, which appears an ample allowance; but it will be unprecedented if it be completed for the estimated sum.

INCLOSURE BILLS.—On the motion of Mr Hume, a standing order has been made that in all Inclosure Bills, a provision shall be made for leaving an open space, for the purpose of exercise and recreation of the neighbouring population. This is a highly proper provision; and we hope steps will be taken to prevent the people in Scotland from being deprived of grounds which have been long open to them, by the rapacity of the adjoining proprietors. The poor people of Edinburgh have great reason to complain of being shut out from the North Loch grounds, for the purpose of making gardens to increase the revenues of the corporation, and for the recreation of the rich; but we hope that the legal servitude the public had acquired over these grounds, will still be enforced, for it is not too late, and that they will be again thrown open to the public.

SCOTLAND.

CHURCH ACCOMMODATION.—At a period when so great an outcry is making about the want of church accommodation, and when additional places of worship are rising up all round Edinburgh, it is a remarkable fact that nearly one-third of the seats in the city churches are unoccupied; and that, as compared with last year, there is a decrease on the number of let sittings in no fewer than nine churches, and an increase only in four. The following return made to the Town Council is too valuable in exposing the cant of church accommodation, to be overlooked. The date of the return is 20th Feb. 1837.

	Let.	Unlet.		Let.	Unlet.
Tolbooth,	930	321	Old Greyfriar's,	404	422
New North,	533	660	New Greyfriar's,	382	610
High,	812	486	St Andrew's,	969	4
Old,	79	496	St George's	1397	200
Tron,	292	424	St Mary's,	951	10
College,	312	508	St Stephen's,	1563	50
Lady Yester's,	966	.....

The result is, that 9610 seats are let, being 333 less than last year, while no fewer than 4792 are unlet; that only one church in Edinburgh out of thirteen is completely occupied; that some of them are five-sixths empty, and no fewer than one-half—and among these several whose clergymen are most zealous advocates of church building—not half filled! In such circumstances, it is difficult to comprehend what is meant by the want of church accommodation.

DISTRESS IN THE HIGHLANDS.—We have often in this Magazine pointed out the amazing increase in the value of land in Scotland during the last half century; and any one who wishes evidence of the fact will find it in our volume for last year. In the Highlands especially, the value has augmented in a degree almost incredible; and we doubt exceedingly if there in a single parish in the whole Highland district, the rental of which is not at least three-fold higher than it was at the commencement of this century, while numerous estates could be pointed out which have been sold for prices five or six times higher than they cost forty or fifty years ago. The rental of the whole clans who joined Prince Charles in 1745 did not amount to £12,000, now it exceeds £150,000.

The cause of this great increase is, that the face of the tenantry and peasantry is ground to make up rents which their ancestors never dreamed of. In such circumstances, it is disgraceful in the Highland proprietors to come a begging every year or two, to the south of Scotland and to England for their tenantry and peasantry, and to send deputations of clergymen to London to make pathetic descriptions of the state of destitution in the Highlands. There is just now, and at all times, great distress in that part of the country. But who are the cause of it? Nobody but the Highland lairds themselves, who screw the last shilling from their tenantry, so that it is impossible for them to exist on the miserable pittance which is left them, when a season of more than usual severity occurs. As to any relief from poor-rates, that is out of the question, for there is no such thing in the Highland parishes; and as the lairds are mostly absentees, the whole rents are spent at a distance. So completely do the lairds neglect the peasantry on their estates, that, according to the evidence of Dr M'Leod, there are 80,000 persons in the distressed districts alone who cannot read. As there is much probability that any sums collected for the relief of the distressed Highlanders will find its way into the pockets of the lairds, the only security for its true appropriation is to convert it into blankets, fuel, and meal, (not unground grain,) and to send these articles to the ministers and elders to distribute. Let the lairds, as they will get the chief benefit, provide seed-corn to sow their estates. We cannot understand on what principle the Government is asked, on such an occasion as the present, to expend any part of the taxes paid, in many instances by people as poor, though not so noisy and rapacious as the Highlanders, in giving that relief which the soil itself should afford. The Government have no right to make gifts of the public revenue for such a purpose. If funds are needed to prevent the miserable Highland serfs, still the abject slaves of their feudal superiors, from dying of want, let security be taken for repayment on the estates of the lairds, who are the sole cause of the misery. Were they to reside among their tenantry, lower their rents, spend their incomes on their estates, establish manufactures, and encourage fisheries in the Highlands, and, at the same time, give up their absurd associations for wearing kilts, reverting to barbarism, and preserving the uncouth Gaelic jargon and literature, as it is called, although there never was a book in the language which was not a translation, there would be fewer of these discreditable begging appeals to their southern neighbours.

IRELAND.

Applications have been made more than once to Government for aid to support the police establishments of our large towns; but it has been uniformly refused. Why London and Dublin should have the expense of their police defrayed in a great measure from the general revenue, while Edinburgh and Glasgow are allowed to defray the whole of theirs, is not obvious; nor why public money should be lavished on Ireland, while she is exempted from her fair share of taxation. Ireland does not pay the assessed taxes, from which source about £300,000 is drawn from Scotland. Neither the property tax nor house-duty were ever levied in Ireland; and even in the new stamp-bill the schedule for Britain is double that for Ireland. In ten years, 1823 to 1833, Ireland received of public money no less than £3,179,140—Scotland only £256,922, or the fifteenth part of the money! Of the sums paid to Ireland, £346,422 were for the poor; £908,398 for academies and hospitals, of which one-third was for the Foundling Hospital of Dublin, although it is now the universal opinion that such institutions encourage vice and immorality; £413,941 for education; £304,307 for harbours and public works; £294,753 for the Dublin police; £58,300 for publishing proclamations; and £398,289 for criminal prosecutions. The whole grants to Scotland in ten years were—

College of Edinburgh,	£50,000
Caledonian Canal,	100,010
Port-Patrick Harbour,	106,912
	£256,922

The last item should evidently be put down against Ireland. The cost of the judicial establishments of Ireland in 1830 was £157,648; but if we add £406,589 for proclamations and criminal prosecutions, it exceeded £600,000. In Scotland, in the same year, the total expense was only £150,251. The revenue of Ireland in 1828 was £4,685,642, collected at an expense of £13 : 16 : 3 per cent.; that of Scotland, containing not one-third of the population, was almost the same—£4,627,349, and collected at one-half of the expense, £6 : 7 : 3 per cent. When justice to Ireland is so loudly called for, surely some regard should be had to Scotland. Her taxes should be reduced to the same rate as those of Ireland, and the share of the public money given to each country brought to something like an equality, as the revenues drawn from each are equal. The Scotch have, in truth, more reason to call for a repeal of the Union than the Irish.

THE CONTINENT.

SPAIN.—It is difficult to conjecture on what grounds Britain considers herself the arbitress of the world; but not a war arises between any two nations, nor even an internal quarrel in any country, in which she can refrain from interfering. Of what possible consequence is it to the people of this country, which of the contemptible despots who are now contending for sovereignty in Spain is successful? and what right have we, directly or indirectly, to aid either the one or the other? Spain contains a population of fourteen millions, and an army, even in time of peace, of 50,000 men, and, surely, that is a sufficient population to fight about whether a despotic Don or a profligate Queen should be at the head of affairs. If they cannot or will not settle the question, is there any probability that 4000 or 5000 ragamuffins, the outscourings of the jails of Britain and France, will produce any effect? They no doubt find their own condition much changed for the better, whether they get their promised pay or not; for, by fair or foul means, they contrive to obtain a subsistence, which is, at least, as much as they were able to do at home. Their propensity for robbery, assault, and murder, is also gratified; for acts which would deservedly bring them to the gallows at home, are not only lawful but glorious in their present circumstances. This may be thought by some a matter of little consequence; but it must be recollected that different men are operated on by different motives. The indulgence of the propensities is probably the greatest source of human enjoyment. Many, for example, can feel no pleasure in gambling, even when successful, and cannot conceive why it should be so fascinating to the aristocracy; but how would the Premier Baron of England and his worthy associates be delighted with a country where not only gambling but cheating were honourable! How the sacking of a few villages and towns, and the massacre of their inhabitants—ignorant, we will venture to say, in many instances, even of the pretence under which they suffer—can tend to promote good government, is not very comprehensible.

Whatever professions of liberality may be held out at present, we do not believe that it is of the slightest consequence to the people of Spain which party is successful. The opposition is, in general, exceedingly Liberal; but when they seize the reins of power, experience tells us how they act. Of still less consequence is it to this country, whether the Carlists or Christinos are victorious. Whoever succeeds will govern the country according to what he conceives his own advantage; hatred, indeed, may operate for a time, but no nation ever allowed its interest to suffer from any feeling of gratitude. The Spaniards, like other nations, have as good a government as they deserve. The evils of despotism, of priestcraft, of tyranny of all sorts, are the merited and predestined punishment of the conjoined pusillanimity, cowardice, and corruption which generate and maintain the despots, priests, and tyrants. Even in this country it is difficult to enlighten the ignorance of the great body of the people on their wrongs, or to inspirit them to insist on their removal. Misery, destitution, and poverty, for example, are preached through the length and breadth of the land, which the three quarters of a million already spent by our Government on the Spanish squabble, would alleviate effectually. As to any part of the money ever being repaid, no one expects that; nor is there much chance of any commercial advantages being given, let the quarrel terminate how it may. It is plain that our Government have too much money when they throw it away in such a manner. The revenue must be curtailed, and we must obtain such a reform in the representation as will return a House of Commons which will not merely talk of stopping the supplies, but will follow the Canadian plan of withholding the ministers' salaries till they yield to the wishes of the people, and abstain from interfering in foreign quarrels.

COMMERCE AND MANUFACTURES.

In our last Number we contrasted our commerce in 1829 with the state of it in 1835; and we shewed that in every branch of it, a great increase had taken place. Notwithstanding the gloomy condition of the money market, and the stagnation of business in some districts during the latter part of 1836, the return of the exports for the whole year shews an increase of 12 per cent. as compared with those of the year preceding. Periods, however, of revulsion and depression must continually recur, till our monetary system be placed on a more secure basis. The Bank of England is the only bank in the three kingdoms which is called on to publish any account of its transactions, and the return cannot be of much value, as long as the Directors are the sole judges what are to be returned as "Securities;" for, till within a recent period, some of Fauntleroy's forgeries were included under that head. It appears from the evidence lately collected by Parliament, that some of the joint-stock banks were paying handsome dividends, when they were known to the Directors to be bankrupt, the object being to keep the shares at a premium until those in the secret could dispose of their shares. The great increase of prices at the beginning of last year, seems to be partly attributable to large issues of paper by joint-stock banks. Of 102 established in England in the ten years ending with 26th November 1836, no fewer than seventy-two were established within the last four years. Most of these have numerous branches, equivalent in effect to as many separate banks. The circulation of these banks increased from £10,200,000 in March 1834 to £12,200,000 in June 1836; and in Ireland during the same period from £1,300,000 to £2,300,000. To support this superstructure—amounting, with the circulation of the Banks of England and Ireland, and the Scotch Banks, to above forty millions—and also to meet deposits to at least an equal amount—there is nothing to rely on but the bullion in the coffers of the Bank of England, which has in three years gradually sunk from eleven to four millions. If any panic, therefore, takes place in the country, the most disastrous consequences may ensue. At the root of the whole mischief, is the Bank of England's monopoly. The renewal of the Bank's charter was one of the grievous sins of Lord Grey's Government.

AGRICULTURE.

In our last register, in controverting the argument of the corn monopolists, that protection to agriculture—that is, the starvation of the people—is necessary to enable the public revenue to be paid, we shewed that the corn-laws compel the non-agricultural classes of Britain to pay at least twenty-six millions annually on the three articles of grain, beef, and mutton, more than they would do, were the importation of food free. If this large sum went into the pockets of the landowners, we admit that, however unjust such a state of things might be, the evil, in a mere pecuniary point of view, might be compensated; but the curse of restrictions on trade is, that they cause an enormous loss to the great body of the community, without benefiting, in any considerable degree, any other class. It is admitted on all hands that, since the highest period of the war, rents have not sunk more than one-third; and, in many instances, little or no reduction has taken place; yet, since that time, wheat has fallen from 90s. to 50s. a-quarter. Now, land worth £3 per acre, during the war, is better worth £2 now. But such land will easily produce five quarters of wheat, the value of which was £22 : 10s., and is now £12 : 10s.; so that, while the landowner has only lost £1, the consumers have gained £10 by the reduction of price. If the landowners receive only so small a proportion as one-tenth of what the community pay more than they ought to do for food, we may ask, Who is so fortunate as to get the other nine-tenths? We answer, Nobody. It is absolute loss. The farmers assuredly do not get it; for they have been crying distress all through, and their profits can, at any rate, not be greater than those of the other classes; and there is no other party who can be suspected of receiving any benefit from the high price of food.

Another fallacy by which the advocates of the Corn-Laws endeavour to render the industrious classes indifferent to their monopoly is, that, supposing food lowered in price, their wages would be diminished in the same proportion. Now, even were this to take place at first, it would very quickly prove beneficial to the labouring classes; for, by increasing profits, and consequently capital, it would produce a greater demand for labour. But, farther, we have always considered the great evil of the Corn-Laws, to consist not so much in raising the price of food here, but in sinking it abroad, and thus to create an inequality in the price of food, highly disadvantageous to this country. There being no market for the surplus produce of the grain of the corn-growing countries, the markets are glutted, and the prices fall to an unnatural degree. Food, and consequently wages, being so low on the Continent, we are exposed to a severe competition in selling our manufactures in foreign markets; and every year we are undersold in some article we have been long in the practice of exporting, by foreigners. It is only, for example, the finer cottons for which there is an export demand; and foreigners are gradually manufacturing for themselves finer and finer qualities. Were the Corn-Laws repealed, the price of food would be equalised over Europe; foreign manufacturers would be deprived of the advantage of cheaper food, which they now possess; and the capital and industry of this country would assert its superiority, and drive all competition out of the market. Hence a great demand for labour would arise, and the competition would create an increase in the rate of wages. Thus, we see that, so far from the existence of Corn-Laws being a matter of indifference to the labouring classes, they are more deeply interested in their repeal than any other class. It is, however, in vain to agitate for their repeal till a farther reform takes place in the House of Commons. The present Parliament is landlord-ridden; and the division on Mr Clay's motion shews that there are not a hundred Members who will support any modification of the Corn-Laws. The first work to be set about is, Extension of the Suffrage, Equal Representation, Vote by Ballot, Shortening the Duration of Parliaments, and Payment of the Members. Till these measures be obtained, it is useless to expect good government.*

* A bill, embodying all these measures, should be brought in by some leading Member of the House of Commons. Popular enthusiasm would soon be excited in its support.

COTTLE'S RECOLLECTIONS OF COLERIDGE.*

The singular union of exalted moral feeling and great intellectual power, with impotence of will and infirmity of purpose, which were quite as remarkable, have made the character of Coleridge a study of uncommon interest to those who, knowing something of what is in man, prize above all science that of mind in its original constitution and peculiarities of development. In Coleridge, the human being may be viewed in the utmost extremes: in one sense he is seen soaring with the archangels; and in another enchained in prostrate, hopeless imbecility—struggling against the impotence of volition, like a man suffering under nightmare. Many years of his life might, indeed, be fitly described as a long moral nightmare, from which he at last happily awoke, although in exhaustion. Whether the "sloth which jaundiced all" was the effect of an originally sluggish physical temperament and bad early discipline—aggravated by the habit of taking opium, to an extent which converted what might to some men have been a useful stimulant into a destructive poison—or was attributable to the perilous drug alone, it is not easy now to determine. We are, however, inclined to believe, that constitutional tendency, uncorrected by the education of habit, may, in this deplorable case, fairly divide the blame with opium. In Coleridge the greatest activity of imagination—a mind whose element was perpetual and subtle rumination rather than thought—seemed imprisoned in a body which, for many of the ordinary purposes of life, may be said to have been constituted without organs. The man who, in the course of an afternoon, could, it is affirmed by his friends—Mr Cottle among the number—speak a half volume, which, in matter and language, was fit for the press, was incapacitated to fulfil the most trifling literary engagements, by total want of the ordinary power of application, or by what is usually termed habits of indolence and procrastination. Other indolent men atone for their constitutional defect by an effort of what Johnson, who could vigorously put it forth, calls "dogged resolution," or by that fitful energy which supplies the place of the spontaneous application, order, and industry of more happily constituted minds—perhaps we should say, bodies. Coleridge was quite as incapable of this energy of volition, this masterly power over sluggish organization and bad habit, as of tying down to the needful drudgery of a tasked desk thoughts that wandered in cloud-land or the empyrean. His mind, with its wonderful aggregate of powers, wanted that "stalk of carle-hemp in man," which binds all together and keeps each in its proper place, and without which genius too often becomes of sadly diminished value to society, and the source of reproach and self-torment to its possessor.

For the most melancholy disclosures made of the prostrate condition of his friend, Mr Cottle pleads the utility of his revelations as warnings. They are certainly among the most impressive and affecting moral spectacles which instructed human beings can contemplate. The pangs and throes of a sensitive conscience—the gnawings of remorse in a mind like that of Coleridge—the struggles of a majestic intellect against the feebleness of an emasculated will and the strength of dreadful habits—present a series of tragic emotions, of which Prometheus, bound to his rock, is but a type. His internal agony—of the depth and intensity of which, pitiful as the causes might be, there is no question—is perhaps revealed more fully in the present work than in any of the late volumes relating to Coleridge. His friends at Bristol, where he made his literary and social debut, saw him in his best and also in his most unhappy aspects:—we have not heart to apply the epithet degraded to such a man.

Mr Cottle chanced to be a young bookseller in Bristol when Coleridge and his brilliant satellites first emerged in that city. In the preface to his work, the author discusses at some length the propriety of the right he has assumed, to publish his personal recollections of the distinguished group, and also the letters of Coleridge in his possession, and those which he has been able to obtain. He, of course, affirms the right; yet rests his vindication on an individual like Coleridge being an exception to all ordinary rules; thus tacitly admitting, that it might not be altogether handsome, in ordinary life, or in ordinary cases, to treasure up, for forty years, every careless and hasty note, written on matters of trivial business, and every letter in which, in moments of distress or of great excitement, a man pours forth his relying heart to a friend, and then make a book of these unwary confidences. If, to take a ready example, the representatives of the late Mr Constable, or those of the Messrs Ballantyne, chose to publish all the notes and letters which had passed between them and Sir Walter Scott, during their copartnery relations, concerning the details of their various projects, failures, and embarrassments, the world might obtain considerable insight into the individual character of a great writer; yet it is to us very questionable how far such a proceeding would be justifiable, unless upon the principle, that those who have so often and vainly sacrificed themselves for the sake of society during life, should afterwards have their memories given up for dissection for the same laudable object.

This, however, is not the matter before us; and, although the publication should not be altogether justifiable, we are grateful for the results. A good deal was previously known of Coleridge's habits and mental conflicts. Mr Cottle gives a few new facts; but, taken as a whole, his work is mainly corroborative, though it goes pleasantly into minutiæ of narrative, which, where the heroes are men like Coleridge and his early friends, constitute no ordinary attraction. He had been in business for a few years, when his friend, Mr Robert Lovell, a young Quaker of some acquirements and of very amiable manners—who had married Miss Fricker, the sister of the future wives of Southey and Coleridge—gravely informed him, that himself and those gentlemen, (including, we presume, the three Miss Frickers,) and a fourth enthusiast, named George Burnet, an Oxonian, were about to sail forthwith for America, and to plant a colony upon the banks of the Susquehannah, where all was to be love, poetry, harmony, and equality; or, in short, a new and indescribable form of society, dubbed a Pantisocracy. Burnet had already arrived; Southey also came from Oxford, and was introduced to Cottle, who was much pleased with his new acquaintance; and, in a short time, Coleridge appeared, the last yet leading member of the Social Union. They were just ready to embark, lacking nothing but that trifling consideration to young philosophers, the ways and means. Mr Cottle—who, as many of our readers must be aware, is himself a man of talent and of no mean poetical acquirements—had his first volume of verse then in the press. Southey's "Joan of Arc," and many of Coleridge's early exquisite verses, were already in manuscript. The poetical bookseller read, and was delighted, and so much interested, both as a poet and probably as a publisher, that he became seriously apprehensive lest these wondrously-gifted young men should ruin themselves in prosecution of their wild scheme of expatriation, and organization of a Pantisocracy. His alarm was quieted by Mr Coleridge—in a few days after his acquaintance had commenced—applying for the loan of five pounds, to pay the lodgings of these philosophic and poetical Madocs!

> Never (he says) did I lend money with such unmingled pleasure; for now I ceased to be haunted day and night with the spectre of the ship! the ship! which was to effect such incalculable mischief!

They remained at Bristol, giving lectures, courting the Muses and the Miss Frickers; and Coleridge obtained thirty pounds for that volume of verse for which a London bookseller had offered him six—and Southey fifty for his "Joan of Arc." Lecturing was, however, their main resource. Coleridge, who, like Southey, was then a thorough Radical, chose political economy and morals as his themes, and Southey history. Even thus early, the very opposite habits of these friends were strongly contrasted, and even then Coleridge vexed and disappointed his friends and his audiences. Upon one unlucky day, fancying himself more equal to the subject of the "Rise and Fall of the Roman Empire" than his friend, he volunteered to lecture for Southey, and failed to appear; and Mr Cottle shews his idea of the character of Coleridge by imagining that, while the audience were impatiently expecting him, he might be composedly smoking his pipe in his lodgings, and dreaming of his Arcadian colony. It is very probable, too, that he had not found himself so well prepared as he might have imagined.

About this time, Mr Cottle, wishing to gratify his friends and authors, and their ladies elect, arranged a party to visit Tintern Abbey. The adventures and details of the excursion are amusing enough. It took place the very day after Coleridge failed at the lecture; but he was promptly forthcoming here.

Shortly after this, in October 1795, Coleridge married Miss Sara Fricker, on the faith, it would appear, of a guinea and a half, offered by Mr Cottle, for every hundred lines of verse he might compose. His future ways and means were derived from many precarious sources; but he never drew hard upon Mr Cottle, on account of poetry. He had taken a cottage at Clevedon, a small village on the Severn, instead of the Susquehannah, at the moderate rent of £5 a-year; and thither he carried his bride. It is impossible to anticipate every want; and, two days after marriage, Mr, or, as is probable, Mrs Coleridge, required some trifling conveniences for their humble establishment, which their friend Cottle was required to furnish, and which he sent with all dispatch. This is the long preserved list. How proud may poets be! Even the parings of their nails become precious relics.

> A riddle slice; a candle box; two ventilators; two glasses for the wash-hand stand; one tin dust-pan; one small tin tea-kettle; one pair of candlesticks; one carpet brush; one flour dredge; three tin extinguishers; two mats; a pair of slippers; a cheese toaster; two large tin spoons; a bible; a keg of porter; coffee; raisins; currants; catsup; nutmegs; allspice; cinnamon; rice; ginger; and mace.

The ventilators say little, we fear, for the airiness of a cottage in October; yet here, for a very brief season, Coleridge was happy; here he offered Cottle, instead of the cake and wine sacred to the British Hymen, a hearty welcome; and here he composed his charming verses "To Sara," and to the tall rose-tree which peeped in at their chamber window. This cottage of love and poetry, like too many of the same description, was soon found uncomfortable and inconvenient; and the new-married pair returned to "pent-up rooms" on Redcliff Hill. Coleridge was, by this time, acquainted with Mr Poole of Stowey, who, in connexion with him, is so handsomely mentioned in the "Autobiography of an English Opium-Eater."* For a time they either visited this gentleman or remained near him—Coleridge, writing, as he tells, reviews, "for his potatoes and meat," and applying to his poem, "Religious Musings," at happy intervals; bestowing three days on the correction of what had cost but an hour in writing. Among the vulgar and empirical stories circulated about literary men, and which some of themselves, if they have not propagated, have winked at, it is related that this poem was written in a tap-room at Reading, by private Cumberbatch of the 15th regiment of horse, and, we think, at a sitting. That Coleridge while at Oxford enlisted in a horse regiment, is undoubted. The original of the story of his learning being discovered by his setting two of the officers to rights in a dispute about some passage in the Greek dramatists, may be found in "Roderick Random," where the hero, while acting as a footman, is called in to solve some knotty classical point, for the learned aunt of Narcissa. A similar story is also told of the early life of Rousseau.

The expenses of Coleridge could not have been great; as his establishment, in the early part of his married life, seems to have been as simple and frugal as possible; but then his incomings were next to nothing, and already he was having recourse to the perilous aids of small loans, and accepting tributes to his genius, as the humiliating pecuniary gifts of small patrons are named. It is superfluous to say, that, had his habits of application been in any degree equal to his intellectual power and his copious knowledge, he needed never have known the corroding miseries and abject meannesses of a depending man of letters. In his friends Southey and Wordsworth, the noblest example was before his eyes of regular industry, and that steady frugality which is the only foundation of all enduring personal independence, whether in poet or politician. If the reader is curious to know how frugally great poets sometimes dine, Mr Cottle gratifies him.

He has preserved one note in which Coleridge requests him to make his servant buy a pound of bacon and two quarts of broad beans, and have them cooked for him, at his lodgings, by three o'clock; and recorded a dinner, to which he was carried by Wordsworth, at a country-house rented by the poet, where the repast consisted of a huge loaf, cos lettuces, and Castalian champagne—as fair water, on a poet's board, is elegantly named by a poet. Cheese and a bottle of brandy had been calculated upon—for the poets were not quite Pythagoreans—but the rats had ate up "the stout piece of cheese," and Mr Coleridge, in a clumsy attempt at activity, broke the brandy bottle, to the dismay and grief of the whole party.

Shortly after Coleridge's return to Bristol from Stowey, Mr Cottle invited him, by letter, one day to dinner, for the purpose of being introduced to some lion-seer or other. The unopened invitation-card Coleridge concluded to be a fresh expostulation or dunning for M.S. notes, prefaces, and text, &c. &c., of the volume so long paid for and delayed, and so often promised; and, without opening the note, he sat down and wrote the following painful letter. The individuals that he reflects upon, are Southey and those other members of the Susquehannah union, who had now abandoned the fantasy.

It is my duty and business to thank God for all his dispensations, and to believe them the best possible; but, indeed, I think I should have been more thankful, if he had made me a journeyman shoemaker, instead of an "author by trade." I have left my friends: I have left plenty: I have left that ease which would have secured a literary immortality, and have enabled me to give the public works conceived in moments of inspiration, and polished with leisurely solicitude; and, alas! for what have I left them? for—who deserted me in the hour of distress, and for a scheme of virtue, impracticable and romantic! So I am forced to write for bread! write the flights of poetic enthusiasm, when every minute I am hearing a groan from my wife. Groans, and complaints, and sickness! The present hour I am in a quickset hedge of embarrassment, and whichever way I turn, a thorn runs into me! The future is cloud and thick darkness! Poverty, perhaps, and the thin faces of them that want bread, looking up to me! Nor is this all. My happiest moments for composition are broken in upon by the reflection that I must make haste. I am too late! I am already months behind! I have received my pay beforehand! Oh, wayward and desultory spirit of genius! Ill canst thou brook a task-master! The tenderest touch from the hand of obligation, wounds thee like a scourge of scorpions!

I have been composing in the fields this morning, and came home to write down the first rude sheet of my prefaces, when I heard that your man had brought a note from you. I have not seen it, but I guess its contents. I am writing as fast as I can. Depend upon it you shall not be out of pocket for me! I feel what I owe you; and, independently of this, I love you as a friend; indeed, so much, that I regret, seriously regret, that you have been my copyholder.

Mr Cottle remitted some of the precious metal; and Coleridge came to dinner, wore a cheerful face, and talked as brilliantly as ever.

During the first year of his imprudent and unfortunate marriage, many plans of gaining daily bread appear to have passed through his mind, which teemed with projects. His own relations seem, at no period, to have taken any concern whatever about him. He left his paternal home a young orphan child, for the Blue-coat School, and, from that time, his elder and more fortunate brothers made no account of him. He used, even thus early, to regret, with poignancy of feeling, that he had no friend in the world to whom he could, in time of extremity, apply "for a guinea." We fear, on the other hand, that the facility he had acquired in making application "for guineas," became the cause of his so often being without.

them. Yet there is something most melancholy about the neglect he suffered in his earlier years. Mr Cottle remarks that, if the world neglected Chatterton, yet, by his own family—his mother and his sisters—he was loved and cherished; his heart had a resting-place, while Coleridge

Appeared like a being dropped from the clouds, without tie or connexion on earth; and, during the years in which I knew him, he never once visited (that I could learn) any one of his relations, nor exchanged a letter with them. It used to fill myself and others with concern and the deepest astonishment, that such a man should, apparently, be abandoned. On some occasions, I urged him to break through all impediments, and go and visit his friends; but this his high spirit could not brook.

. . . . . .

In the agony of mind which Mr C. sometimes manifested on this subject, I have wished to forget those four tender lines in his Monody on Chatterton.

"Poor Chatterton! farewell! Of darkest hues,
This chaplet cast I on thy unshaped tomb;
But dare no longer on the sad theme muse,
Lest kindred woes persuade a kindred doom!"

Mr C. would not have felt so much, if his own natural and unshaken affections had been less ardent.

When about six months married, or in the spring of 1796, he projected The Watchman, and made that journey through the manufacturing towns to establish it, of which he has given so ample an account in the "Biographia Literaria." He shewed what appears to us a wonderful degree of activity and energy in his attempts to establish this miscellany; but he had no funds; he wanted both experience and industry; and, finally, authors seldom succeed as publishers. His "Review, Newspaper, and Annual Register"—and The Watchman was to combine the qualities of each, and to be sold at only fourpence the weekly number—failed at the tenth number.

One pitiful subscriber of fourpence every eighth day, thought his boys "did not improve much under it!" Another expected more from his "Annual Register!" Another wanted more "reviews!" Another, more "politics!" and those a little "sharper."

Mr Cottle has obtained and published Coleridge's letters to his friend Mr Wade, while on the Watchman tour. He was, at this time, a Unitarian, and he preached at different places, in the chapels of that sect. His friends were then principally either among the decided Reformers, or the Unitarians. Of Sheffield, he says—

I might have succeeded there, at least, equally well with the former towns, but I should injure the sale of the Iris, the editor of which paper (a very able and ingenious young man, of the name of 'James Montgomery') is now in prison, for a libel on a bloody-minded magistrate there. Of course, I declined publicly advertising or disposing of The Watchman in that town.

This morning I called on Mr — with H's letter. Mr — received me as a rider, and treated me with insolence that was really amusing from its novelty. 'Overstocked with these articles.' 'People always setting up some new thing or other.' 'I read The Star and another paper: what can I want with this paper, which is nothing more.' 'Well, well, I'll consider of it.' To these entertaining bon mots, I returned the following repartee —'Good morning, sir.'

Such were the delightful preliminaries to the abortive Watchman. At other times he thought of attempting a school; and then we hear no more of these schemes. He was, in very truth, distracted. "I believe," he says in one letter—

I verily believe no poor fellow's ideа-pot ever bubbled up so vehemently with fears, doubts, and difficulties, as mine does at present. Heaven grant it may not boil over, and put out the fire! I am almost heartless! My past life seems to me like a dream, a feverish dream! all one gloomy huddle of strange actions and dim-discovered motives! Friendships lost by indolence, and happiness murdered by mismanaged sensibility! The present hour I seem in a quickset hedge of embarrassments! For shame! I ought not to mistrust God; but indeed, to hope is far more difficult than to fear.

Mr Cottle, who long enjoyed the friendship of Robert Hall, gives an account of Coleridge's exhibitions in the pulpit. They do not appear to have been distinguished. The parlour was his peculiar theatre—the pulpit the place of Hall's triumph. The brilliant conversational powers of Coleridge gained him admirers wherever he appeared; yet too many of these friendships seem to have rested on no solid or satisfactory basis. They sprung up like gourds in a night, and as quickly withered, leaving unsightly wrecks and shedding unwholesome vapours. A connexion somewhat of this nature was formed with Charles Lloyd, the son of an eminent banker in Birmingham. This person, whose name is known in connexion with those of Coleridge and Lamb, possessed a quaint genius and amiable dispositions, but he was probably of feeble mind—he was in fact epileptic. He left his father's banking-house, followed Coleridge to Bristol, and finally boarded in the poet's family, first in that town and then at Stowey. Indeed, had Coleridge chosen to become the founder of some new sect in poetry or philosophy, his eloquence and various powers of attraction would certainly have drawn crowds of young disciples around him. No man more powerfully fascinated the young, the ardent, and gifted; and few have through life found friends so devotedly attached among strangers. At Stowey, with Mr Lloyd for a permanent boarder and Mr Poole for a friend, his first child, David Hartley, a few months old, with a comfortable and cheap-rented cottage, a garden, and an ample command of books, another interval of quiet was granted to the racked mind of Coleridge, and he wrote cheerily to his friend Cottle from his new retreat. But, in ten short days, he again writes in doubt and despondency. He had quarrelled with Southey, and bitterly accused him of "desertion" of friendship; and, in the hopeful Pantisocracy scheme, of "dishonourable retraction, in a compact the most solemn and binding." Mr Cottle laboured ineffectually to make them friends at this time; though, on Southey's return from Portugal, a reconciliation was effected without his interference. They seemed, indeed, to have amused themselves at his expense. The first intimation of the feud being healed was—

Mr Southey and Mr Coleridge calling on me, arm in arm, after having taken a pleasant walk together into the country. Each seemed to relish the surprise and the delight in me, which it was impossible to conceal; and I had reason afterwards to think, that this sprightly scene was a preconcerted arrangement to heighten the stage-effect.

At this time Coleridge made acquaintance with Wordsworth, then living in Dorsetshire, whom he soon admired with an excess of enthusiasm. He was "the giant Wordsworth." A tragedy which Wordsworth had written, but which has never yet seen the light, he describes as "absolutely wonderful." He goes farther:—"There are in the piece those profound touches of the human heart which I find three or four times in the 'Robbers' of Schiller, and often in Shakspeare; but in Wordsworth there are no inequalities." Wordsworth's congenial sister gained on him as rapidly. They came to Stowey, and he writes—

W— and his exquisite sister are with me. She is a woman indeed! in mind, I mean, and heart; for her person is such, that, if you expected to see a pretty woman, you would think her rather ordinary; if you expected to see an ordinary woman, you would think her pretty. But her manners are simple, ardent, impressive. In every motion, her most innocent soul outbeams so brightly that who saw would say,

"Guilt was a thing impossible in her."

Her information various; her eye watchful in minutest observation of nature; and her taste, a perfect electrometer. It bends, protrudes, and draws in, at subtlest beauties and most recondite faults.

According to Mr De Quincey's insinuations, Mrs Coleridge did not admire quite so ardently.

Thelwall, the "acquitted traitor," was another guest at Stowey in this memorable 1797.

He is a great favourite with Sara. Energetic activity of mind and of heart, is his master feature. He is prompt to conceive, and still prompter to execute: but I think he is deficient in that patience of mind which can look intensely and frequently at the same subject. He believes and disbelieves with impassioned confidence. I wish to see him doubting, and doubting. He is intrepid, eloquent, and honest—perhaps, the only acting democrat that is honest, for the patriots are ragged cattle: a most execrable herd.

Charles Lamb came also—how could the cottage hold so many?—and Lloyd and Lamb became bosom friends. Mr Cottle, though earnestly invited, could not meet Lamb; but he went to Stowey shortly afterwards; and, for once in his life, we see Coleridge in his own house, and happy at home.

Mr Coleridge welcomed me with the warmest cordiality. He talked of his old school-fellow, Lamb, with affection, who had so recently left him; regretted he had not an opportunity of introducing me to one whom he so highly valued. Mr C. took peculiar delight in assuring me (at least at that time) how happy he was; exhibiting, successfully, his house, his garden, his orchard, laden with fruit; and also the contrivances he had made to unite his two neighbours', Mr Poole and Mr Cruickshanks, domains with his own.

After the grand circuit had been accomplished, by hospitable contrivance, we approached the "jasmine harbour," when, to our gratifying surprise, we found the tripod table laden with delicious bread and cheese, surmounted by a brown mug of the true Taunton ale. We instinctively took our seats; and there must have been some downright witchery in the provision, which surpassed all of its kind; nothing like it on the wide terrene, and one glass of the Taunton settled it to an axiom. While the dappled sun-beams played on our table, through the umbrageous canopy, the very birds seemed to participate in our felicities, and poured forth their selectest anthems. As we sat in our sylvan hall of splendour, a company of the happiest of mortals, (T. Poole, C. Lloyd, S. T. Coleridge, and myself,) the bright blue heavens; the sporting insects; the balmy zephyrs; the feathered choristers; the sympathy of friends—all augmented the pleasurable to the highest point this side the celestial! Every interstice of our hearts being filled with happiness, as a consequence there was no room for sorrow, exorcised as it now was, and hovering around at inapproachable distance. With our spirits thus entranced, though we might weep at other moments, yet joyance so filled all within and without, that, if, at this juncture, tidings had been brought us that an irruption of the ocean had swallowed up all our dear brethren of Pekin, from the pre-occupation of our minds, "Poor things!" would have been our only reply, with anguish put off till the morrow. While thus elevated in the universal current of our feelings, Mrs Coleridge approached, with her fine Hartley; we all smiled, but the father's eye beamed transcendental joy! "But all things have an end."

About this time Coleridge was in the habit of mystifying the public with parodies and imitations of himself, Lamb, and Lloyd, for the correction of the bad taste of this New School. One of these hoaxing productions was an epigram in ridicule of the "Ancient Mariner;" and there was a series of mock sonnets, signed Nehemiah Higginbotham, exposing, as he said, the "affectation of unaffectedness" in the verses of himself and his friends, who did not altogether see the fun of it. He also, but in good faith, sent the serious epistles of Sara—his wife, to wit—to Mr Cottle, which we make no doubt are the composition of Sara's husband, though Cottle does not question the authorship. Before a new edition of the conjoint poems was called for, the poets had quarreled. Lloyd had left Coleridge's house, and Lamb took part with him, and wrote reproachfully, and with quaint and stinging petulance, to his older friend.

The Unitarians earnestly wished to see Coleridge enrolled among their preachers; and, after Lloyd left him, he had nearly accepted of their chapel at Shrewsbury, when the Wedgewoods, to whom he was introduced by Mr Poole, stepped in, and, by the offer of an annuity of £150 a-year, redeemed him to literature. Those who have in this Magazine read Mr De Quincey's narrative of his first acquaintance with Coleridge, are already aware how the Wedgewood munificence terminated.

Wordsworth and Coleridge were now much together. They wished to travel into Germany, and, in order to raise the necessary funds, to dispose of their tragedies. But, as they entertained the hope of getting them brought out on the stage at some more propitious time, they were unwilling to throw them away for less than thirty guineas each. Wordsworth wished also to bargain for his poems, (the "Lyrical Ballads,") and to publish anonymously. This volume appears to have been Mr Cottle's last speculation. In 1798, and while the poets were in Germany, he quitted business. Of the impression of 500 of Wordsworth's ballads, Mr Cottle was compelled to dispose of the greater proportion to a London bookseller, at a considerable loss. Be not down-hearted, ye young poets, who are true poets! The public of 1798 was quite as indifferent to poetry as that of 1837. Mr Wordsworth accounted to Mr Cottle for this woful failure, from the "Ancient Mariner" having been included in the volume, and also from the unfavourable opinion of most of the reviewers. When Mr Cottle sold all his copy-rights to Longman & Rees, they told him the value of Wordsworth's Ballads was "reckoned as nothing," and, at his request, they made him a present of the copy-right which he, in turn, presented to Mr Wordsworth, who has since derived whatever advantage may have arisen from the sale of the "Lyrical Ballads."

It was at long intervals that Mr Cottle afterwards met Coleridge, who, separated from his wife and children, had lived much in London, and also visited Italy and Malta in the early part of the century. About 1807, he came to Bristol to deliver a course of lectures on Shakspeare, as he had done in London and other places. He was, as indeed at all times, involved in extreme pecuniary difficulty, now arising principally from the excessive use of opium. The fact of his slavery to this perilous stimulant was not then known to his friend Cottle, who afterwards ascertained that he used from two quarts a-week to a pint a-day, and that he has been known, in twenty-four hours, to consume a whole quart! Besides disqualifying the unhappy sufferer for useful exertion, the mere expense of this destructive drug is estimated at two pounds ten shillings a-week. Coleridge, reduced to the pitiable and degraded condition which he has himself painted in fearful colours, was still constantly receiving pecuniary presents from his friends, besides his regular annuity from the Wedgewoods, which, however, after the death of Thomas Wedgewood, had been reduced to £75. The most munificent of his benefactors was Mr De Quincey, who was introduced to Mr Cottle by a lady, with, it would seem, the purpose, through the channel of an old friend, of delicately ministering to the necessities of the man whose genius he so greatly admired, and of setting him free for noble literary achievements. Mr Cottle narrates—

Mr De Q. asked me if I knew anything of Mr Coleridge's pecuniary affairs. I replied, "I am afraid he is a legitimate son of genius." He asked me if I thought he would accept a hundred or two pounds. I answered, I could not tell, but that I expected shortly to see him, when, if he seriously desired to learn, I would ascertain what the state of his finances was, and let him know. This, he said, was his particular wish.

When Mr Coleridge called on me, and the extended conversation had occurred, before stated, I asked him concerning his circumstances. He confessed that he had some present difficulties which oppressed his mind. He said that all the money he had received from his office in Malta, as secretary to Sir Alexander Ball, had been expended in Italy, and on his way home. I then told him, that a young man of fortune, who admired his talents, had inquired of me, if I thought Mr C. would accept the present of a hundred or two pounds, "and I now ask you," said I, "that question, that I may return an answer." Mr Coleridge rose from his seat. He appeared much oppressed, and, after a short silence, he turned to me—"Cottle, I will write to you. We will change the subject."

The money was immediately accepted as "an unconditional loan, which," writes Coleridge, "I trust I shall be able to return in two years." Mr De Quincey wished to give five hundred pounds, and absolutely prohibited Mr Cottle from naming the source whence the money was derived. Mr Cottle remarked—

"To the latter part of your injunction, if you require it, I will accede; but, although I am deeply interested in Mr Coleridge's welfare, yet a spirit of equity compels me to recommend to you, in the first instance, to present Mr C. with a smaller sum, and which, if you see it right, you can, at any time, augment." Mr De Quincey then replied, "Three hundred pounds I will give him, and you will oblige me by making this offer of mine to Mr Coleridge."

The money was paid accordingly; and Mr Cottle adds, that, notwithstanding the strict prohibition, some indirect notices from himself could have left no doubt with Coleridge of the source of this gift. We would charitably hope that some of Coleridge's younger relatives have, until now, been ignorant of this fact, or surely delicacy, if not gratitude, would have restrained their pens. Shortly before this handsome present was made, Coleridge was writing in the following terms to his generous and enduring friend, Mr Wade of Bristol:—

"O God! if you knew the weight of my heart, the misery that cleaves to my spirit! I have too much reason to suspect and fear, that I must not much longer expect my annuity! so that at my age, I am to be penniless, resourceless, in heavy debt, my health and spirits absolutely broken down, and with scarce a friend in the world!" . . . . . So that Mr De Quincey's £300 must have been received at an acceptable time.

But no exertion of friendship could permanently relieve him; though the most generous efforts were made. The great difficulty was to wean him from "the fatal drug;" and, for this purpose, Mr Wade, in whose house he resided for some months, obtained medical assistance, and appointed a respectable decayed tradesman to watch him day and night. When it was fondly imagined that he had been reduced to the moderate dose of twenty drops a-day, he was not only cheating the doctor, but eluding the vigilance of his sentinel, as he afterwards confessed. Upon one occasion he told a friend, that—

In passing along the quay, where the ships were moored, he noticed, by a side glance, a druggist's shop, probably an old resort, and, standing near the door, he looked toward the ships, and, pointing to one at some distance, he said to his attendant, "I think that's an American." "Oh, no, that I am sure it is not," said the man. "I think it is," replied Mr C; "I wish you would step over and ask, and bring me the particulars." The man accordingly went; when, as soon as his back was turned, Mr C. stepped into the shop, had his portly bottle filled with laudanum, (which he always carried in his pocket,) and then expeditiously placed himself in the spot where he was left. The man now returned with the particulars, beginning, "I told you, sir, it was not an American; but I have learned all about her." "As I am mistaken, never mind the rest," said Mr C., and walked on.

His unfortunate habits and the hopelessness of his case, wore out his friends; and his own feelings must have been wretched indeed before he wrote to Mr Cottle, wishing to sell or pledge certain M.SS. for thirty or forty pounds; and declaring that he would die rather than, after his recent experience of the cruel and insolent spirit of calumny, "again subject himself to a club of subscribers to his poverty." He had gone to the friends at Calne, Mr John Morgan and his family, so handsomely referred to in Mr De Quincey's "Autobiography," with whom he had previously resided for three years in London, but who were now reduced to comparative poverty. It may be said of Coleridge what Johnson affirmed of Savage and his alleged unnatural mother—that her cruelty gave him a claim on all mankind. The neglect of Coleridge's own family opened many hearts to him. Before Mr Cottle's letter declining the offered M.SS., and refusing the money, which he imagined intended for the purchase of opium, reached Coleridge, another epistle was received, which contained a scheme of opening a day-school at Bristol for ten youths and ten boys, whose instruction was to cost each £15 a-year. This was the first application for money which Mr Cottle—who appears to have been a truly indulgent, as well as considerate friend—had ever refused. It was only recently, and by an accident, that he had learned Coleridge's deplorable habit. His vindication of his refusal, if to the prudent any be required, is complete.

Had I (he remarks) been satisfied that the money Mr C. required would have been expended in lawful purposes, I would have supplied him (without being an affluent man) to the utmost of his requirements, and that not by dividing the honour with others, or receiving his writings in pledge. But, knowing that whatever moneys he received would, assuredly, be expended in opium, COMPASSION STAYED MY HAND!

In my reply to his second letter, by "return of post," I enclosed Mr C. another five pounds: urged him, in a kind letter, to come immediately to Bristol, where myself and others would do all that could be done to advise and assist him.

The stern moralist may sometimes be apt to think that Coleridge, in the cries wrung forth by the agony of his conflicts with conscience, has too ostentatiously paraded the remorse, which was not followed by reformation. Yet, in the candour of these agonizing confessions, there is much that is hopeful as well as redeeming, and it is happily known, that, long before the close of his days, Coleridge had conquered his enemy. Who can peruse the following letter without deep sympathy with the sufferer, and deeper humility before God? It was written to Mr Wade, the old friend with whom he had been domesticated, while the great effort was made to snatch him from destruction.

"Bristol, June 26, 1814.

DEAR SIR,—For I am unworthy to call any good man friend—much less you, whose hospitality and love I have abused—accept, however, my entreaties for your forgiveness and for your prayers.

Conceive a poor, miserable wretch, who for many years has been attempting to beat off pain, by a constant recurrence to the vice that reproduces it. Conceive a spirit in hell, employed in tracing out for others the road to that heaven from which his crimes exclude him! In short, conceive whatever is most wretched, helpless, and hopeless, and you will form as tolerable a notion of my state as it is possible for a good man to have.

I used to think the text in St James, that 'he who offended in one point, offends in all,' very harsh; but I now feel the awful, the tremendous truth of it. In the one crime of OPIUM, what crime have I not made myself guilty of!—Ingratitude to my Maker and to my benefactors, injustice and unnatural cruelty to my poor children!—self-contempt—for my repeated promise, breach, nay, too often, actual falsehood!

After my death, I earnestly entreat, that a full and unqualified narration of my wretchedness, and of its guilty cause, may be made public, that, at least, some little good may be effected by the direful example!

May God Almighty bless you, and have mercy on your still affectionate, and, in his heart, grateful,

S. T. COLERIDGE."

This is a letter to pause upon. About the same time he wrote to his friend Cottle, that, if he had £200—half to send to his wife, and half to place himself in a private mad-house, where he would be under strict medical restraint for three months—there might be hope. His case he justly considered one of derangement. Though not of the ordinary kind, it was one as hopeless—an utter impotence of volition, though not of the intellectual faculties. He even proposed that his friends at Bristol should make arrangements for placing him under the care of Dr Fox, who kept an asylum for lunatics in that neighbourhood. Mr Cottle would not consent to this extreme measure.

The refusal of the money for the M.SS. terminated the correspondence between Mr Cottle and Coleridge, who never wrote to him again. In 1821, Cottle saw for the last time the man to whom he had felt so strong an attachment and shewn so much liberality, at Mr Gillman's in London. Coleridge received him kindly and cordially. How could he have done otherwise?

From his fortunate position in Bristol, his agreeable talents, and estimable character, Mr Cottle enjoyed the friendship of many distinguished persons, with notices of whom he has pleasantly diversified his book. Among them were Davy, Robert Hall, and Hannah More. His relation of the breaking up of this lady's establishment at Barley Wood, is one more proof of how much more easily religious hypocrites may be made by a small bounty on the forced production, than faithful, well-principled domestics. After Hannah More had been for years confined to her room, she kept eight pampered menials—five women and three men—of whom the chiefs had been long in her service, and completely trusted and indulged. Their crime, however, upon examination, may not appear quite so heinous to worldly eyes as Mr Cottle sets it down. Their human or social nature prevailed against the almost conventual rules of the sober, maidenly establishment at Barley Wood; and, after evening prayers, and heartily saying "Amen!" when the whole household was believed to be sunk in repose, Mr Timothy, the coachman, and Miss Teddy, the lady's maid, and Mrs Susan, the housekeeper, &c. &c., were in the habit of either getting up little suppers at home, or going abroad to new-year's junketings, like other servants, leaving only the scullion, to guard the premises, and support the religious character of the house. When poor Mrs Hannah More heard of these ungrateful and heathenish doings, she was nearly petrified.

She preserved silence, while a tear stole down her pallid cheek. At length, with a faltering voice, she said, "What! Susan unfaithful, who has lived with me so many years?" "Yes!" "And Timothy, whose relations I have fed and clothed?" "Yes!" The venerable and afflicted lady continued, "And Teddy, and Rebecca, and Jane?" "Yes, all!" "What!" she continued—"not one faithful?" The answer was—"The whole are faithless!" "Then," said the aged Hannah More, "I will leave it all! Find me a quite retreat where my few last days may be spent in calmness, prayer, and praise!"

And she removed to a lodging at Clifton, where she died, at the age of eighty-nine; and, what is far more wonderful, after having consulted thirty-eight physicians, all of whom died before her! Hannah More admired Robert Hall, at least to Mr Cottle, above all contemporary preachers "in the Church and out of it." Mr Cottle, who entertains great respect for his friend Mrs Hannah More, nevertheless places her quarrel with the Bristol milk-woman—her protegée, Ann Yearsley—in the proper and reasonable light. He rescues the name of the latter from what he justly considers the unmerited obloquy of ingratitude to a benefactress, fixed upon her because she wanted the money which arose from the sale of her poems, to educate her sons, instead of having it doled out by her self-appointed trustees, Mrs Hannah More and Mrs Montague.

WHAT SORT OF A GROWN CHILD ARE YOU?

BY LEIGH HUNT.*

"Men are but children of a larger growth."

STANDING too near the fire the other day, in a morning-gown, a little girl admonished us of our peril; and, upon our expressing a suitable remorse, and making our tone more and more serious, for fear of producing a wrong effect respecting a point so dangerous, she said, with an exquisite mixture of archness and tenderness, "Good boy!"

This set us upon thinking what sort of little boy we should really make, if some supernatural circumstance or other were at once to keep us in our grown condition, and yet reduce us to a state of childhood in comparison with certain new creatures, our superiors; if a finer set of human beings, for example, were to visit the earth from another planet, and become to its present inhabitants what ourselves are to the children around us—people who should be as much our masters in wisdom and strength as Shakspeare compared with Tomkins, or a Cornish wrestler with an infant; who should good-humouredly smile at our little profundities in ethics and science; say "Look at 'em," as we sat in Parliament, playing at legislators; and put aside our army and navy as parents do pop-guns: in short, Brobdingnagians come to conquer and refine us.

Dear reader, what sort of a boy or girl should you make? A self-interrogation to that end might not be without its use, as well as amusement. Of one thing you may be certain, and perhaps have anticipated it, by thinking what sort of child you were. Your grown childhood, be assured, would be very like your ungrown; nay, is so. It is said, that no man's nature is different from what it was at two years old, or at "two hours." We know not how that may be; but we think it would be very unaccountable if the case were much the reverse; and certain we are, that all the grown people we ever knew in childhood, were precisely the same individuals at both periods, modified more or less by experience and good sense. The tendencies had not altered a whit. Among our domestic and school acquaintances, for instance, there was F—thoughtless, luxurious, and good-natured; P—didactic and authoritative, yet full of jest; M—conventional, and a lover of power, but with a manliness; B—dispassionate as to taking a part, from the clearness with which he saw all sides of a question, yet easily inclined this way or that, by a friend; S—scholarly, but violent; C—correcting his impulses by a sympathy with grace; G—a born gentleman; T—loud and generous. All this they were, to a tittle, in their early days; and precisely such they remained ever afterwards, as far as we knew them. How should it be otherwise? Their fathers, mothers, grandfathers, grandmothers, ancestors, nurses, servants, diet, breeding, health, sickness, and a thousand other circumstances, contributed to make them what they were; and how were they to get rid of all this by a jerk, or by the substitution of habits to which they had no tendency, for those to which they had been bent from the very first? Oh, happy are we, if, with assiduous cultivation of our better qualities, we can but succeed in keeping down our worse, without quarreling either with others or ourselves! To this happiness we most assuredly have all the right which our original dependence can give us; and in sweet thoughts does a due consideration of it terminate; for it finds nobody to blame, and all to sympathize with. The discoveries of society may help the whole of us forward, and thus modify individuals hereafter, far beyond what has been done yet; though we ourselves have to struggle in harder nets of circumstance.

But we are getting out of our subject. An imaginary bit of Boswell shall bring us round to it. Suppose him asking Dr Johnson, what sort of great, grown, man-boy he would have made, under the circumstances above imagined? If the doctor were in ill-humour—worried, perhaps, by a bit of scepticism or veal-pie—he would angrily cry out—"Sir! why tease me by supposing what is impossible? or, worse, sir! why remind me that I am not a child—not innocent, sir?" Nay, as to that matter, when was I, when are any of us innocent? Sir, I should doubtless be a very bad boy—peevish, sir; disobedient—violent. Sir, I shouldn't go to bed when I was told. I should be a thief and a liar—steal pie, sir, and say I hadn't done it; and I should neglect my prayers, till I was frightened. I do it now. Let us have no more of this."

* We must intimate that there is a bet depending among certain critics on the relative merits of this extravaganza. That our private judgment will be affirmed by the tribunal of final resort we make no question.—E. T. M.

But, if he was in good humour—going to a capital dinner, perhaps, or just come from a successful argument with Burke, or thinking of the poor woman he relieved last night—he would very likely say, with a smile—"Why, sir, I should be a very fair boy; nay, sir, not pulcher—not flavicomus"—(observing me smile at thinking of him as a pretty child with blond ringlets)—"but I should be decently good. Orderly, sir, if treated with love—though with outbreaks of sullenness. And yet, if the supernatural beings were infallible, or if I thought them so, I should be good always. I hope so." (Here he looked meditative and bland.) "For what do we require, sir, but certainty, to enable us to act like rational beings? Sir," (smiling,) "I should go to bed without giving the supernatural beings the trouble of telling me twice. I should exchange my wig for a night-cap, sir, without oppugnancy—too happy to lay aside the pride of a man, for the felicity of an infant, and to repose on the bosom of an infallible Glumdalca."

Here Boswell, by dint of pushing the bottle, suppresses an immense desire to laugh at the idea of his illustrious friend taking off his wig and brown suit, and reposing, with his night-cap on, in the lap of a nurse from Brobdingnag. He then proceeds:—

"And Cæsar, sir! What sort of a boy do you think Cæsar would have made?"

"Why, sir, Cæsar would have made as good a boy as any, if he thought his new masters infallible; but, if he did not, I should not wonder if he ran away, sir. You know his ambition was to be chief everywhere, and that he would rather be the first man in a village, than second in Rome. Cæsar would have broken out of bounds, sir, and gone to head the Lilliputians."

"Mr Burke, sir, would have said his lessons well?"

"Why, yes, sir—and perhaps suggested an improvement in the new Propria quæ Maribus. Nay, sir, there would be no end of Burke's mind, even in Brobdingnag. And he has a tendency to innovate, sir—has Burke; and to a degree, too, which would not be properly respectful to superiors, in a less man—except, indeed, when others shew a like tendency, and then Edmund is for pulling them down. This confidence in himself is naturally greater than it is in others. He knows what he knows, sir—a rare knowledge."

"Our friend Garrick, sir, can hardly be said to know what he knows."

"Yes, sir—by heart"—(smiling.)

"But of man's nature and faculties, sir?"

"Man's nature and faculties!—Man's fiddlestick and bill of the play, sir. Garrick, sir, would be whipped for making your men-boys laugh, with his grimaces. Don't let us talk of Garrick, sir, when we are talking of mind."

"Poor Goldy, however, sir—I may mention him. How would he conduct himself?"

"Why, sir, poor Goldy, as you call him, would very likely be one of the happiest and most honoured boys in the school. He would not be quite cured of his freaks. He would give away all his money too often, unless Glumdalca kept it for him. But, sir, he would not only know superiors such as those, but they would know him; and Goldsmith, sir, is a ready-made innocent child, sir, with such man's wit as beings like those would understand, though we always do not."

Boswell is silenced at this; and Johnson, pitying him, does not proceed to shew what sort of a boy he would have made.

Well now, dear reader, have you made up your mind, by this time, as to yourself? For our part we do not choose to say publicly what kind of bad-and-good boy we ourselves should be; though we should not much mind to confess it to some very charitable friend. Can you venture as much? Can you state candidly to the person sitting next you, your opinion of your own puerile self? Are you too bad to confess it, or too good?—too modest? And what is your opinion of those about you? What sort of little girls and boys do you think your own kindred? Would your married brother shine in his pinafore, or your aunt in her bib and tucker?

Then, again, to look a little more widely around us, What sort of boys and girls would our leading statesmen make? Imagine a play-ground full of Wellingtons, Peels, Broughams, Lord John Russells, Spring Rices, O'Connells, Roebucks, Charles Bullers, Molesworths, and Humes; all, too, in their new Brobdingnagian jackets, coming in to breakfast or to school, or saying their lessons—for our new masters would have to re-educate us all: wonderful is the quantity of things we should have to unlearn! How would they all behave?—And the new ladies' boarding-school, (we should like to go to school near it,) containing the Blessingtons, Gores, Opies, Halls, Landons, Nortons, and Morgans? What would Glumdalca say to them? Which of them would have surreptitious pie for supper, or scramble over the garden-wall?

It is no mean test of the characters of grown people, to consider which among them you would like under this new aspect—with whom you could be most easy, sincere, loving, and independent. Or suppose the whole race of mankind could come back to be re-taught all at once, where would you pick and choose for playfellows? Alexander the Great, we suspect, would be but an overbearing "sort of chap." We should prefer Epaminondas, who loved his father and mother; or Cæsar, who could be all things. Washington would be well behaved, to a pitch of the provoking. It would seem as if he had not feeling enough to run out of bounds, or draw a face on his slate. If you asked him to come and play, he would say it wanted "two minutes to eleven." Addison, we fear, might think it his duty to go and "tell the master." Steele, however, would never peach. He would be flogged first. Homer would be a good fellow!

Shakspeare, Cervantes, Ariosto, Sir Walter Scott, would be capital playmates and companions—fine tellers of stories out of books—with a love of robust sport, while they were about it. We should admire Bacon prodigiously, for his attainments in the new "Analecta Majora," but are afraid should not be fond of him. He would be made assistant to one of the ushers.

Chaucer, in the most compulsory of verses, speaks

"Of Samson, Turnus, and of Socrates"— three such personages as were never before brought together. Our favourite acquaintances at the English ladies' boarding-school (were we so happy as to know their brothers) would be Godiva, Nancy Finch, and Eleonora.

The first, the famous Countess of Coventry, everybody knows. The second (so familiar becomes the language of love!) is another Countess, not so famous, nor indeed very well known to any but a few lovers of poetry—Anne, Countess of Winchelsea, authoress (besides the poems in Mr Dyce's collection) of a charming one entitled the "Petition for an Absolute Retreat," which shews her to be just the sort of woman to our taste, of a spirit at once social and sequestered, and fit to have lived in Arcadia: we do not mean the Greek Arcadia, which is not the place it is taken for; but the real one—far more touching than your land of rocks and wild beasts—the Arcadia of Claude and the poets. As to Eleonora, she was a queen, in times anti-Brobdingnagian—the wife that sucked the poison out of the wound of Edward I. But we do not go upon that, though it was a right womanly action; for it was probably as safe as it was touching, though it may have required, in that age, a particular courage to venture upon it. We take it only as an evidence of those many congenial actions, those habits of love and beneficence, which made the fond Edward raise a cross in her honour, wherever her body stopped in its way to Westminster; as though it rendered the ground precious—which it did. (By the way, why do they not restore the one at Charing Cross? The place retains the honour of the name—why does it not in gratitude retain the thing? It would constitute a beautiful and justly triumphant memorial to the sex, in the midst of less peaceful trophies.) Now, the said Eleonora would make a fine, hearty boarder in our Brobdingnagian school, with very little to learn over again, and willing to undergo any punishment for a friend. Godiva would be much such another. She would get up on winter mornings without her flannel petticoat, to hurry up the rest of the school, when late. We do not know that Lady Winchelsea's public virtue was ever put to the trial; but her goodwill was unbounded; and she would be an especial lover of walks in the neighbouring forest—which amounts to a virtue in our eyes. But all the new schools would be taught a love of nature—not a leaf or a colour would be lost upon them; and they would be as great singers as the birds.

We shall again, however, be getting too serious for boyhood. Up, Charles William Augustus Maximilian Smith, and vindicate our facetiousness! Up on the table, Smith, and let the company see you! Smith (as you will see the moment you look at him) is no Smith of any "mark or likelihood." He is not James nor Horace Smith, nor one of the Sidney Smiths, nor a Southwood Smith, nor any northern, eastern, or western Smith of the least un-Smithism;—he is not a man of wit, nor of valour, nor of virtue; he is not any way original—not one who can turn a common name into uncommonness.

But we have given this sort of caution before. Look at him, however. What a different opinion he evidently has of himself! How far superior he thinks himself to all the numerous and highly respectable, though not famous multitude, who bear the Smithian cognomen! And yet, nevertheless, conceited as he stands there, Smith is at this present moment in a very puzzled state of mind; as indeed you may guess, when you see what he has come to in his middle age—a pinafore!

Yes; Smith, aged five-and-forty, and some five feet eight inches in stature, is a little boy in a big tail-coat and pinafore, in the new school of the Brobdingnagian visiters. He is as proud and sulky a fellow, as he is a shallow one; and, as the usher happens to have set him on a table to say his lesson, and has just gone out of the school to speak to somebody, we are taking advantage of his absence (not very wisely perhaps) to plague Smith, and catechise him a little—he not answering a word, but looking very red and savage. But we have a vindictive recollection of the way in which he used to lord it over us, upon the strength of his being an epitome of commonplaces, except the good-natured ones. This exception is the only thing we quarrel with him for, or with any one. But, situated as he is, the temptation is irresistible. All the livelier part of his schoolfellows are "having at him."

"I say, Smith—you'll have to go to bed before your time. You're a naughty boy, Smith—a bad middle-aged chap, and have been very sulky."

"Why didn't you learn your lesson, Smith, instead of doing nothing but make dumps all day, and stuff yourself?"

"Look at his neckcloth and bibs, and how big he looks! and yet he doesn't know Brobdingnagian for 'charity' nor 'modesty'—no, nor for 'sense.'"

"Take your hand out of your pocket, Smith, and don't stand cluttering your dumps."

"Shall it then? Shall it have no more pudding and turtle-pap? Did they vex it, poor middle-aged thing, and expect it to have a little sense, and know a man when it sees one?"

"Never mind 'em, Smith. Don't stand swelling so, and thinking of your 'gig,' poor respectable little fellow! Shall have another—it shall; and then all will be well. Shall ride in it to Banbury Cross, and look as big as it likes, and speak loud, and be a man again."

"Here!—see what I've got for you, Smith—a nice plaything, a pretty watch. Come to me for it over the table—never mind your boots. Shall hold it to your ear, and see how time goes for little Smithy. Why, with a watch, and his dumps, and his gig, Smithy will be quite a man again; and nobody shall plague him about 'sense' and 'modesty.'"

"Say ta to the gentleman, Smith. Oh, say, ta! Be a good middle-aged little boy. Ah, ha! What! stamping, Smith! Oh, fie!—stamping on the nice mahogany table, and in boots! Hist! Hist!—here's the usher coming."

Boy (aside to another.)—I'm afraid the usher would think us as great babies as Smith.

Other Boy.—Not quite—but Tomkins does. See how solemn he looks! He doesn't see the joke, any more than when he looks in the glass.

First Boy.—Perhaps he does, a little bit; and is standing on his dignity in consequence.

Other.—Oh, poor we!

TRIAL BY JURY IN SCOTLAND.*

It is upwards of twenty years since the trial of civil causes by jury was introduced into Scotland; and the experience we have obtained has increased, rather than diminished, the dislike with which this manner of deciding lawsuits has always been regarded on this side of the Tweed. The only persons whom we have ever heard speak favourably of it are some of the lawyers and agents, who, as will be afterwards seen, have good reason for their partiality: but, even in the profession of the law, the trial of a civil cause by jury is generally regarded with no ordinary feelings of dread and apprehension; and there are few litigants who do not quail when they find their suits have reached the fearful point of "Notice of Trial." Hence is to be explained the fact that not one-half of the causes in which all the expense of the preparation for trial has been incurred, and the jury has been summoned, are actually brought to trial; for, however clear may be the case, and however much satisfied a party may be that he has justice on his side, he can never have any reliance that he may not on the day of trial be defeated by some quirk, quibble, or oversight, against which, in other modes of trial, some remedy might be found, but which this summary and peremptory form of proceeding does not admit of.† In a great number of the trials which have taken place, an impression very generally prevails that justice has not been obtained; yet the attempts to get redress have generally failed, and have involved the parties who made them only in greater expense.

Trial by jury evidently takes its origin in those times when law has not yet become a science, and when no such profession as that of lawyers exists. Then the baron, or other feudal superior—the judge in time of peace, and the leader in war—assembled his vassals, who were as ignorant as himself, for the adjudication of such disputes as arose. This practice the English—ever remarkable for their reverence for antiquity, their attachment to established forms, and dread of innovation—have always adhered to, and gradually moulded, so as to adapt it to a state of matters very different from that for which it had originally been intended. In this process, however, as in many others, those who affect to respect so much the wisdom of our ancestors have not always been guided by their principles. We have a striking instance of this in the regulation which requires the jury to be unanimous in their verdict. By the ancient English practice unanimity was not required; all that was needed was the concurrence of twelve in the verdict, when the jury consisted of a greater number. To this day in England, a grand jury may consist of any number from twelve to twenty-three; but a presentment cannot be made by fewer than twelve. So, in the High Court of Parliament, and the Court of the Lord High Steward, a Peer may be convicted by the greater number; yet there can be no conviction unless the majority consists of twelve, at least. When, therefore, in the progress of time, only twelve jurymen were impannelled, there became a necessity of their concurring in opinion; and, in this way, the absurdity of unanimity was reached. Of the manner in which absurdities once established may be defended, we have a fair specimen in a treatise of Lord Somers, a writer of some pretension at the end of the seventeenth century. He remarks—"In analogy, of late, the jury has been reduced to twelve—like as the prophets were twelve, to foretell the truth; the apostles twelve, to teach the truth; the discoverers twelve, sent into Canaan to seek and report the truth; and the stones twelve that the heavenly Jerusalem is built on; and, as the judges were twelve, anciently, to try and determine matters of law; and always, when there is any waging law, there must be twelve, to swear in it; and also, as for matters of state, there were twelve councillors of state; and anything now which any jury can be said to do, must have the joint consent of twelve; otherwise, it is, in the construction of law, not the doing of the jury, but of private persons, and void." Yet the necessity of unanimity, which can be supported only by such absurd arguments as the preceding, and which has been reprobated by Sir William Blackstone and other English lawyers, "as repugnant to all experience of human conduct, passions, and understandings," has, in our blind adoption of English forms, been made a part of the system of jury trial in Scotland in civil causes.

* The Practice of the Court of Session in Jury Cases. By Robert Macfarlane, W.S. Edinburgh: 1837.

† Of 611 causes set down for trial in the first eight years of the Jury Court, not one-half, only 233, were tried.

Whether jury trial in England is so valuable an institution, and worthy of the praises so fulsomely lavished on it, is a question on which we shall not enter. But it is easy to see that a procedure which has been familiar for centuries, which has been engrafted on and grown with the law, and for the conducting of which peculiar facilities exist in England, may there be found beneficial, while it may be totally unfitted for the present state of the law and the habits of the people of Scotland. In England the law appears much more fixed than with us; it having sometimes occurred that many years have elapsed without the judges in some of the courts having once differed in opinion. The English lawyers are also, we suspect, much better acquainted with their law, than the Scottish have generally been with theirs; the former making it the constant and unremitted study of their lives, while politics and other pursuits have always occupied a great proportion of the time of Scottish lawyers. Lord Mansfield once remarked, that, if Blackstone's Commentaries had been published when he was a student, they would have saved him five years' study! Sergeant Marryat, on being asked if he had read some new publication, observed, that he had not looked into an unprofessional book for thirty years. One of the judges of our Supreme Court characterised the English judges as "legal monks." Matters are managed differently in Scotland. The first step of promotion at the bar is the appointment of deputy to the Lord Advocate of the day, necessarily a political office; next a sheriffship, worth from £300 to £800 a-year, and having some patronage. Besides numerous clerkships, there are about thirty sheriffs; and, although they are judges having jurisdiction, both in civil and criminal cases, very little inferior to that of the Supreme Court itself, there never, we believe, was a single instance of the appointment being given to a lawyer of political opinions opposed to those of the minister of the day; or, indeed, we ought rather to say, that keen political partisanship has uniformly been considered the sole test of fitness for that important office. Matters have hardly been better in the Supreme Court. The appointment of a political opponent is never made, as long as any materials for the office, however inferior, are to be found on the side of the party in power. The great weakness of the Scottish bar at present is to be attributed to this unprincipled system. The Tories, during their long career of power, left the eminent Whig lawyers of long standing at the bar, till there were so many of them that it was unnecessary to employ the younger men in the management of any law-suit. Thus, the latter had not a fair opportunity of exercising their talents, and of distinguishing themselves; and many who might very probably have been at the head of the profession, left the bar in disgust. At length the bench became so much inferior to the bar in knowledge and talent—by the appointment of men whose chief qualification for the bench, in some instances, was, that they could not do so much mischief to the government there, as in the subordinate offices which they held—that Sir Robert Peel was forced to break through the established practice, and promote one or two of the most eminent Whig lawyers to the bench. Since their accession to power, the Whigs, as they are well entitled, have promoted their own party; and the bench of the Court of Session, instead of being, as formerly, an undiluted mass of Toryism, now presents an equal array of the adherents of the two factions which have so long divided the loaves and fishes between them. In this way, it has happened, that all the men of known talent who were at the bar a few years ago, who have not died, have been removed to the bench. A more favourable field for the display of talent at the Scottish bar than at any former period now presents itself; but, sorry are we to say, that there is as yet little appearance of the field being occupied, either by men of talent and learning, or of eloquence and genius. The lawyer and the orator are both to be sought for.

In the circumstances in which the bar is placed, independence is not to be looked for. All—with the exception, perhaps, of one in a hundred—attach themselves to one or other of the dominant parties, hitherto the sole depositaries of power in this country. Partisanship is a better recommendation to promotion than learning. During the volunteer mania, for example, almost every person connected with the Court of Session was enrolled. The Lord President of the Court was the Colonel; and the steady attendance of the officials in the field was conducive to their advancement, in at least as great a degree as the punctual discharge of their duties in the Parliament House. At all political dinners, the lawyers are the chief spokesmen, and in every job they are the tools the most to be relied on. Whether in such a state of matters the bar or bench is likely to acquire that profound knowledge of the law, and that readiness in its application, which jury trial in civil causes imperiously demands—where the most difficult questions may suddenly arise, and must be instantly argued and decided, without time for reflection or reference to books of authority—may, we humbly venture to think, be well doubted.

Another impediment to jury trial in Scotland, is our juries. We do not impugn their integrity, though one or two cases have occurred where the conduct of particular jurymen has been called in question; but to the fact that, in London and the large towns of England, juries are to be found of a very superior kind to those we have in Scotland. These jurymen consist of eminent merchants and intelligent men of business, who, in numerous instances—as in lawsuits among merchants—are better qualified to instruct the court than to receive directions from it, as to the verdict they should pronounce. Hence, at Guildhall, instead of the three or four hours' harangues which the judges here think it necessary to address to the jury, the only remark the court often makes, is—"Gentlemen, you must be much more familiar with the matter which has formed the subject of this day's investigation than I can pretend to be, and your own experience will teach you where the justice of the case lies. I, therefore, consider it unnecessary to trouble you with any observations." It is no unusual thing for the English judges to send for eminent merchants to their chambers, for the purpose of being informed as to their practice in mercantile questions. The trying a case with juries composed of such men, is a very different matter from doing so with juries ignorant of all sorts of business, whose only qualification is the possession of property of £5 of yearly rent, or movables to the amount of £200; and who often, from the beginning to the end of a trial, never comprehend the nature of the subject in dispute.

In Edinburgh, the exemption of the members of the College of Justice from serving as jurymen, has an injurious effect; and we have heard counsel of much experience in jury trials state that they never saw a good jury, except in Glasgow—that city and neighbourhood being the only place in Scotland which furnishes intelligent mercantile men in sufficient number to afford materials for efficient juries.*

The consequence of having juries of shoemakers, cowfeeders, tavern keepers, sheep-farmers, and so on, is, that, if the case is not exceedingly simple, they soon become bewildered by the conflicting evidence, and the contradictory speeches of counsel; and they could come to no verdict whatever, did they not regulate themselves by the address of the presiding judge, which is generally a strong pleading for one or other of the parties; for Scottish juries are never left in any doubt how the court would decide the question. In ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, the opinion of the judge is the verdict of the jury: in the hundredth the jury, often from mere obstinacy, and to assert their independence, give a contrary verdict. In one case—where a large estate, too, was at stake—it was strongly suspected that the jury had decided their verdict by lot; but, as the court ruled that the jurymen themselves could not be examined as witnesses, and no other person, of course, was present, it was impossible to ascertain the truth.

The great length of the trials is an evil not to be disregarded. It is no unusual thing in England to try 150 or 200 causes in fourteen days; in Scotland, a trial generally lasts ten or twelve hours; and to get through ten in five days, would be considered great work. The cause of the length of the trials, is the examining of more witnesses than are necessary, and the extreme length of the speeches of counsel, to which is sometimes added a tedious charge from the bench, recapitulating the whole evidence which the jury have just heard from the mouths of the witnesses themselves.

But the unpopularity, or rather failure, of jury trial in Scotland is, in part, also, to be attributed to other causes besides the unfitness of this sort of proceeding to the state of the law and of the country. As originally established in 1815, the Jury Court was of so anomalous a kind that it was not easy even for the practitioners themselves to determine whether it was a distinct court, or merely a branch of the Court of Session. The separate functions of the Jury Court and Court of Session were so little fixed, that frequently a cause was bandied from one court to another, until the litigants were exhausted by the delay and expense thus occasioned; nor were they without the suspicion that remits were occasionally made for the purpose of getting rid of a troublesome case. Then, instead of leaving the general issue to the jury—for example, if the question were regarding the authenticity of a deed, instead of putting the question—Whether it was or was not the deed of the party? the jury were asked, Whether he could write? Whether he could see to write? Whether he could read a written paper? and numerous other questions; the result of which was, that, although the jury might be of opinion on the whole that the party was in the right, yet they found themselves compelled to give a verdict against him, simply because they could not find any one of the issues among which the case was frittered away, in his favour. On the other hand, the objection to general issues is obvious; for, by resorting to them, the jury is made the judge of the law, as well as the fact—a state of matters which we cannot consider satisfactory in the present advanced state of the law, when no one can obtain an accurate knowledge of it without dedicating his life to its practice and study. The ordinary notion, and one which tyrannical judges have in all ages inculcated, is, that the jury have nothing to do with the law, but only with the facts of the case; but this is incorrect. For example, to take a simple case—that of murder:—The jury have not to find merely that A fell by the hand of B; but whether A was murdered by B; whether the offence of murder has been committed—a question which no one can solve who does not understand what is the legal definition of the crime of murder. The same remark applies throughout. Thus no jury can decide whether a document is the deed of a party, until they understand what a probative writ is in Scottish law. The Court, no doubt, explains the law; but the jury are not bound to take the explanation given them, but may decide the matter according to their own notions. Thus, for example, no one doubts that, in our law, to occasion death in a duel is murder; yet no jury in modern times can be prevailed on to convict a person who has had the misfortune to kill his antagonist in a fair duel. Numerous other instances in trials for libel, sedition, &c., might be pointed out. In England, juries have not hesitated to intrude on the undoubted province of the Court—that of inflicting punishment. When stealing in a dwelling-house, to the extent of 40s., was a capital offence, juries did not hesitate to return verdicts contrary to the fact, in order to save the accused. In numerous instances, they returned verdicts of stealing to the amount of 39s., where the property was proved to be of much greater amount. In one case, such a verdict was returned, though among the articles stolen, was a Bank of England note for £10!

* There is great reason to believe that the lists of persons qualified to serve as jurymen, are not properly taken up. We have heard it repeatedly remarked by gentlemen of Liberal opinions, that, since they took an active part in politics, they have seldom or ever been summoned on a jury. Is this the work of the Tory sheriffs, or of their underlings? The exemption of the members of the College of Justice, should be repealed. Trials by jury seldom take place when the Court is sitting for the dispatch of its ordinary business; and most of the members are very willing, and, indeed, anxious, to act occasionally as jurymen. Perhaps the judges would not like men acquainted with the law on the jury; but it would, undoubtedly, be very beneficial, in most cases, to the administration of justice.

Another cause of unpopularity is the unnecessary and uncalled for introduction of English technicalities. The constant use of affidavits on the most trivial occasions, the adherence to English forms in the notices of motions for trial, &c., and in many other matters of no consequence in themselves, are found annoying to the practitioners, and expensive to the litigants. The judge who originally presided in the Jury-Court, an English lawyer, being necessarily ignorant of the manner in which law business is conducted in Scotland, and enamoured of the law practice "in the other end of the island," was ill fitted to engraft the new system on the administration of the Scottish law. The inferior officers of the Court, though ignorant of the mode of conducting jury trials in England, and most of them having no professional experience of any kind, aped, to the best of their ability, the language of the head of the Court. Being all paid by salaries, and so, independent of the practitioners, they do not give that accommodation and those facilities to which the practitioners have been accustomed from officers paid by fees, and where there is a competition for employment, by a choice being given of more than one officer. For example, the issue clerks insist on counsel and clients attending them, to adjust issues, precisely at the time when they are least likely to be at leisure; that is to say, when both divisions of the Inner House and three or four Lords Ordinary are sitting hearing causes. Although all the offices in the Register House, connected with the Court of Session, are open in the evening, that connected with trial by jury is open only from two to four. The trouble given by these inconveniences cannot be estimated by any one who has not experience in such matters. Twenty or thirty meetings often take place, and an expense of forty or fifty pounds is frequently occasioned in the adjustment of a single issue; for it is very improbable to find three or four counsel disengaged at the hour at which alone the issue clerks will give attendance. In the case of jury trial, as everywhere else, the pernicious effects of high salaries is experienced. By giving £800 or £800 a-year, where £200 or £300 are sufficient, you secure the appointment of persons who think signing a receipt for their salary is quite sufficient duty, and who look upon attendance in their offices, and answering the inquiries of the practitioners, as a task beneath them.

The judges who now preside over jury trials, labour under the disadvantage of having had no experience in such matters while at the bar; and it has been rather ingeniously managed, that those who had acquired some experience under the original constitution of the court, are not required to attend and give their assistance in the trials which take place at Edinburgh—always the most important.

The great expense to be incurred in a single day, is another cause of the dislike to jury trial. Accounts of expenses, amounting to £300, £400, £500 for each side, are by no means unusual, and many of much larger amount could be pointed out. It is true that, in the sixty-three causes first tried, the expense averaged £112 for each party; but, when the trifling nature of some of the causes is considered, the expense will be found greatly beyond the value of the matter in dispute. Indeed, a large proportion of the cases tried have been actions of damages for technical blunders, occasioning no loss to any one, but regarding which our courts, of late years, have become singularly scrupulous, or for trifling injuries, which would never have been brought, had it not been for the establishment of trial by jury. For example, on the Perth circuit in 1823, an action of damages against an innkeeper was tried, for dismissing a cook as unqualified, she having, as he alleged, spoiled a wedding supper. To decide this important matter, a judge of the jury court, in all his state, with clerks, macers, counsel, and agents, proceeded from Edinburgh to Perth; and thirty-six jurymen, some of them from the counties of Fife and Forfar, were brought from forty to fifty miles, at a considerable expense, and to the neglect of their own business. The jury very properly complained of the hardship of being put to so much trouble and inconvenience to decide so paltry a case. Actions, however, of equally trifling amount, are every year tried by jury.

The unanimity required of the Jury has not been attended with so many bad effects as might have been anticipated, simply because juries, seeing the absurdity of the rule, and being accustomed to a majority in all other cases, except civil trials in the Court of Session, have had the good sense practically to disregard it, the minority yielding to the majority. To say nothing of the perjury thus forced, by law, on the jurors, there have been many instances which prove the necessity of reverting to the recognised rule in Scotland of allowing the majority to decide. The plausible argument in favour of unanimity is, that, in all cases, the side of truth and justice is to be discovered, if the jury take sufficient pains. But those who know anything about a court of law must be aware that, in a large proportion of law-suits, the right is not entirely on one side; but, on the contrary, that, as in most other disputes, both parties are very generally to blame. Besides, in questions of evidence, the testimony of the witnesses and the documents on each side may nearly, or altogether balance each other. Such a case, for example, was the famous Douglas cause. The casting-vote of the President of the Court of Session decided it one way, and a majority of a single vote in the House of Lords the other. Now, when would the judges or the Peers have come to an unanimous judgment in such a case? In questions of law even, the arguments and authorities on the opposing sides, may leave the point exceedingly doubtful, of which we have daily experience. It is in vain, therefore, to assert, that, in all law-suits, one of the sides is absolutely in the right. So far from it, that it very seldom happens.

The manner in which juries proceed in assessing damages is too valuable an illustration of the folly of requiring unanimity, to be passed over. Instead of the verdict in such cases being the unanimous opinion of the jury, it is not the verdict of any one of them! The jury, after some talk, finding they cannot agree on the sum to be awarded, write down what each juror is inclined to give, and, dividing the sum total by twelve, the quotient is the verdict, thus leaving the matter to the decision of Cocker, as judges are sometimes said to leave their decisions to the dice. Were the damages each juryman is inclined to give nearly equal, no great harm would arise; but these are not the cases in which Cocker is resorted to. It is where there are great differences of opinion; and then a minority of the jury, or a single juryman, may control the verdict of the whole. Suppose, for example, eight jurymen think £100 enough, but four think it should be £200: these four have, in order to obtain what they conceive the justice of the case, only each to put down £400 on the paper; for £100 × 8 = £800, and £400 × 4 = £1600, and £1600 + £800 = £2400 ÷ 12, gives £200, the verdict required. In several cases, great trouble has been given to juries by the obstinacy of one or two jurymen, whom the rule for unanimity prevents the majority controlling. No longer ago than last year, after a case had been abandoned by the pursuer, and his counsel declined addressing the jury, one juror kept the whole jury locked up, and the Court waiting for three hours, because he would not concur with the rest. To prepare himself for the task he had undertaken, of bringing the majority of eleven to see that the truth was on his side, he brought a bottle of whisky with him; and it is difficult to say what might have been the result, had the whisky not been discovered and taken from him by order of the Court before the jury were inclosed.

In the anomalous proceeding of trial by Jury, where persons ignorant of the law are called on to aid, and, indeed, if they please, control those whose life has been spent in its study and practice, it has been found absolutely necessary, for the sake of justice, to permit the Court to review the proper duties of the jury—that of judging of the evidence, and of the amount of damages assessed. Thus, the allegation, that the verdict is contrary to the evidence, is a good ground for applying for a new trial; and new trials have been granted on such a ground, even although the verdict was supported by the charge and opinion of the judge who presided. Giving too little, or giving excessive damages, is also a ground for a new trial; and, even although the second jury coincide in opinion with the first, this is no absolute bar to a third trial. It thus appears, that, notwithstanding the boasted finality of trial by jury, there is ample room for further litigation after a verdict is returned. And so it has been found; for, wherever the litigants have been sufficiently keen, and rich enough to pay the expense, they have found ample scope for litigation in excepting to the decision of the judge in the rejection or admission of evidence, to his directions to the jury, or to the verdict itself, as contrary to evidence, contrary to law, or on the ground of the damages being excessive or the reverse.

Although we have serious doubts as to the utility of jury trial in civil cases, we certainly do not mean to defend the former practice of the Court of Session, and which is still followed in all our inferior courts—that of taking proofs by commission. A commission was granted to a lawyer, generally of little experience or knowledge, to call the parties, or their counsel or agents, and the witnesses, before him; and to write down the evidence of the witnesses. In the inferior courts, the commission is granted to one of the clerks of court, or one of the practitioners in general little acquainted with the rules by which he ought to regulate his proceedings. Day after day, and week after week, is spent in writing down an immense mass of matter, great part of which has often little or no bearing on the point at issue. Objections to witnesses and to questions, are discussed with provoking and tedious pertinacity; and, after a great consumption of time, it often happens that the objection and answer must be written down and referred to the judge for decision. The sitting is, in the meantime, broken up, and a new meeting must be held after the decision on the objection is obtained. When it is considered that there are never fewer than five persons present at such a proof, and often more—all of whom must be paid by the litigants—the expense of such a proceeding may be judged of. At length, after a delay of many months, the proof, now swelled into a large volume, is concluded; and, to enable the court to judge of it, the parties are generally allowed to write memorials as long as itself on its import, in which they take good care to distort it as much as possible. The judge, who is deprived of the advantage of judging, from the appearance of the witnesses, how far they are speaking the truth, and having no opportunity of expiscating the facts which appear to him important, is then left to decide the case in the best way he can; and no wonder the decision is often unsatisfactory, and is carried from one Court to another, by appeal, and at a great expense—the costs being now probably more than the whole sum in dispute—until at length the chequer is shut by the decision of the House of Lords.

It was to get rid of this system in the Supreme Court, and to check appeals,* that trial by jury was resorted to; but we cannot help thinking that it would have been desirable to have tried the experiment of examining the witnesses, in open Court before the judges, previously well acquainted with the facts in dispute, without troubling six-and-thirty shopkeepers, farmers, &c., about the matter. In Scotland, where the judges are certainly not "legal monks," whatever they may be elsewhere, but men of the world, the court is as well fitted to assess the amount of damages for breach of promise of marriage, assault, or the like, as any jury whatever. Indeed, in many cases which it is imperative at present to try by jury, in Scotland, there may be, and often is, no question of fact at all to be ascertained, and no damages to be assessed—such, for example, as actions on policies of insurance, where there is no denial of the facts, but simply a defence in law—as that the voyage insured was illegal.

As a check on the court, we think the value of juries in Scotland has been greatly overrated. In ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, no such check is required; and to apply the incumbrance of a jury trial to the ninety-nine cases, because it may be useful in the hundredth, is as sensible a contrivance as to keep the drag constantly on the carriage wheel, because it may possibly be once a-day needed in descending a hill. We would allow the parties to decide whether they would have a jury or not. Why not give them their choice? The great curse of all legislatures is gouverner trop. So much care must be taken of the subject, that he is allowed to do nothing in his own way. The statute-book is filled with restrictions, regulations, and prohibitions. Our ancestors ascertained the lengths of coat tails, of shoe-points, the number of dishes to be placed on the tables of each rank; exporting a salmon, or marrying an Englishwoman, have been, in Scotland, alike capital offences. To this day, it is held dangerous to allow the importation of foreign grain, and absolutely destructive to the empire to permit the consumption of foreign meat. On the same principle, the management of a law-suit is taken out of the hands of the parties concerned. But the truth is, that, practically, Scottish juries have not restrained the political inclinations of the court. In 1794, the jury were as eager for conviction as the court. Under Castlereagh's reign, in 1817, no greater difficulty was found; and it was from the vigorous efforts of the bar, in defence of the accused, and not from the conduct of the jury, that any check was given to the career of despotism.* Still later instances might be pointed out, of the inefficacy of Scottish juries to protect the subject against the crown. We suppose we must not do more than allude to the case of Gilbert M'Leod, the editor of the "Spirit of the Union," in 1819, who, although unanimously recommended to mercy by the jury, was transported for five years, for what was termed sedition. To a man in his rank of life, the sentence was, in reality, what it proved to the martyrs of 1794—a capital punishment. The manner of protecting the subject from the Crown, is sufficiently obvious—viz., by excluding politics from the bench, and not by going into the streets and the fields, to find men who will construe the law differently from the judges of the land. It is a matter well deserving of consideration, whether the only efficient check is not for the people to appoint the judges themselves. Why should the expounders of the law not be elected by popular suffrage, as well as the makers of the law?

Whatever opinion may, however, be formed of jury trial in civil causes in Scotland, there can only be one as to the merits of Mr Macfarlane's treatise on the subject. In the space of a moderate-sized volume, he has condensed the substance of many hundred decisions, besides acts of Parliament, and acts of sederunt, relative to jury trials. His work is lucid in its arrangement, and complete in its details; and no counsel nor agent, engaged in a trial by jury, will do justice either to his client or himself, without consulting it. It will be found highly useful during the trial, from the ready solution it affords of the numerous questions, requiring immediate decision, which arise. The former treatises on jury trial were, even when published, very paltry performances, and now are completely obselete from the changes which have taken place; and every practitioner has long felt the want of such a work as the present. Nor is it to those engaged in jury trials alone, that it is valuable. In conducting proofs before the commissaries, and in cases depending in the inferior courts, it will be found extremely useful, by furnishing the rules by which questions relative to evidence, such as the admissibility of witnesses, the questions which may competently be put, the documents which may be received, and the mode generally of conducting a proof, are to be judged of. The appendix contains issues applicable to the various classes of actions, taken from cases which have actually been tried, and all the practical forms in use in jury causes. Nothing could have tended more to the safe and satisfactory management of that branch of business, the most troublesome and hazardous to the practitioner—trial by jury—than the publication of this book.

* In this object it has, however, failed. Notwithstanding the great diminution of the business of the Court of Session, of late years, there have been more appeals since trial by jury was established, than before.

* In a case for administering illegal oaths, the Whig lawyers—whose services in 1817 and 1819 should not be overlooked—succeeded in quashing, we think, eight different indictments before the case went to the jury! The Lord Advocate (Maconochie) had almost given up the task of preparing a correct libel in despair.

TALES OF THE CLEIKUM INN, ST. RONAN'S.—NO. III.

THE DOMINIE'S TALE; OR, THE WEIRD OF THE WINRAMS.

THERE are many months in every year when the hostel of St Ronan's, and the whole of that lonely village, are as mute and desolate as if it were one of those romantic watering-places embosomed in the Swiss Alps, or buried in the heart of the Pyrenees, after the last flight of the summer-loving martlets from the cities had taken wing. It was at this deserted season, and to a rustic and purely Scottish audience of greedy listeners, that the dominie narrated the following traditionary story, which he thus preluded:—

"It might be in the latter year of the godless and gainless reign of Charles Stuart, the second of that unhappy name, or in the first year that his black-hearted, Papistical brother bore sway in this ancient realm, that a gathering of douce neighbours and orra wayfarers, much like this same, was drawn round the ingle-neuk, within these same stanch, auld, black wa's—the whilk, sirs, were utterance gifted them, could tell many a stranger tale than mine. It was Candlemas-tide, as I have heard, and snow lay thick on all the heights, and deep in all the hollows of the Gala, the Leader, and the other waters round; by reason of which, Robin Scott, the then carrier, or cadger, between this countryside and Edinburgh, was full three days behind his ordinary time; and, as this was a period of sore trial and tribulation to the persecuted Kirk and oppressed Estates of Scotland, the men folk, ye may be sure, were hungering as sair for tidings as the women for the nonsense trinkum-trankums Robin brought, in exchange for fresh eggs and fat eerocks. Robin, slow as his pace was, in dandering from farmstead to farmstead, was the only post and mail of those days, unless when a laird or a lord, like Thirlstane or Torwoodlee, or him of the Black Barony, or the malignant persecutor, Sir Marmaduke Winram, might send off one of their house-varlets with a special budget, on some of their godless errands of harriment and cruel oppression of the Lord's people. For this, sirs, was a time when heavy judgments were abroad in this land of Scotland, and when the sword of the smiter was unsheathed to slay utterly. There is a yirmin of discontent and a barming of restlessness abroad among this ancient people even now; but I trow, sirs, our lines have fallen in pleasant places, when our lot under the Protestant princes of the House of Hanover is compared with that of our godly and persecuted forebears, hunted like patricks owre the mountains and through the moss-hags, by Claverhouse and his godless gang; harried in their gear, and racked in their members with the bootikins and pilnewinks, and the other damnable devices of that Pandemonium, the committee of the Privy Council of Scotland; where the apostate Lauderdale, and Middleton, and Rothes, and their hellish instruments, Bloody Mackenzie, and the Muscovite tiger Dalyell, and the excommunicate malignant, Sir Marmaduke Winram, of whom it more nearly concerns me to speak"—— The dominie gasped for breath.

"Weel a weel," cried a young farmer, named Elliot, interrupting his old teacher somewhat irreverently, "if times are on the mend, thanks to the spirit of our forefathers; and, if they righted matters then at the price of their blood, let us try to hold them so, or shame befa' us, say I." The dominie, who mightily prided himself on being "a Whig of the Revolution," was looked on with suspicion by the younger Liberals of the parish, from having lately, in obedience to his ecclesiastical superior, the minister, refused them the use of the school-house to hold a meeting for Parliamentary Reform. This circumstance gave sting to young Elliot's speech, especially when he added—"It is just the auld story owre again then, dominie, as now—'Do as the laird and the minister bid ye, or else——.' Then it was the king and the curates:—it comes aye to the same thing—now it is, hereawa at least, the Deuke and the Chamberlin."

The dominie waved his hand, sawing the air with Ciceronian dignity; and, giving the go-by to this remark, held on—

"At a time when judgments were abroad, and the Malignants, in their blind and blood-thirsty rage, spared neither age, sex, nor station, tidings from the capital were, as I remarked, sorely waited for; and, in especial, the guidman of Elshieshiels—who likewise farmed the Mains of Redheugh, and had himself been out at Pentland with his auld maister, Rutherfurd of Redheugh—declared he would not stir till Robin appeared, though it should be broad daylight, and called for another bicker of ale, to help on the clatter, and also the graver discourse, which naturally ran in the subdued vein of a people quailing under oppression, yet stirred and excited in their minds by the many brave examples of steadfastness, even unto death, with which the period abounded. Among the remorseless and cruel characters to which that disturbed age gave birth, none were regarded, by the country people, with greater horror and superstitious dread than Sir Marmaduke Winram, whose patrimonial possessions in this neighbourhood had lately been increased by several forfeitures, and the gift of the fines he had levied in the course of his zealous service. He had been concerned in the arrest of Mr Donald Cargill, and had also been solemnly excommunicated by one of the preachers among the Covenanters—a circumstance deemed so awful that some of his own servants abandoned him as one set aside and sealed to perdition and to the Enemy of man.

'It is tauld, and I have good authority for believing it,' said the goodman of the Mains, 'that, the same night tidings came to his lordly dwelling of Randolph's Tower, that Mr Donald Cargill had lifted up his testimony at the Gallowlee of Edinburgh, and laid down his precious life for the cause of Christ's crown and covenant—that the blasphemous wretch leuch loud out, and cried to his man, Sergeant Warrock, another wicked oppressor of God's people, and a spoiler and harrier of his heritage—'Fill me a cup of wine, Warrock, and we'll drink the Whig-a-muir's draidgie!' Whereupon the red wine in the cup turned in his hands into congealed blood! Yet he greedily drank it up!'

A thrill of horror crept through the circle then surrounding the ingle like ourselves; and many other tales were related of the cold-blooded butchery committed by the persecutors; of their dissolute and abandoned lives; and of the visible retributory judgments already visited upon them for their savage cruelties to the Covenanters, and all those emphatically named 'the Lord's people.'

'He is off to Edinburgh last Monday morning, to crave from the Privy Council a deed of gift of Redheugh's lands,' said the farmer of the Mains—your own great-grandsire, Mr Elliot, and a savoury Christian in his generation; 'but there will be words about that; for there are as greedy gleds before him yonder as himself—off, after attending ane of their Pandemonium Councils against us and ours, over at Thirlstane, where the hallowed rest of the blessed Sabbath was spent in cards and dice, drinking and damning, and blasphemies fit to have split the roof of the castle, and sunk it fathoms deep in the earth.'

While the honest man held forth, the dogs began to yowff, and a glaikit lassie threw over her wheel in her haste, and ran out, expecting the longed-for cadger.

'It's no Robin,' was her cry, on returning, 'but just Sikker Simmie, the packman, wha, guid be aboot us! when I speered for tidings, tauld me, the Malignants have burnt the Nor' Loch of Edinboro, and that the cadgers are selling the burnt fish for half naething!'

The laugh at the pedlar's joke was not general; and that small grey man, who had been stabling his pony, shortly afterwards appeared in person. Simon Sloan, or Sikker Simmie, as the itinerant merchant was named from the extreme caution of his dealings, had for many years plied at stated periods in this district—his beat being up and down the Gala, the Ale, and Leader Waters, and also other tributaries of the Tweed, before he annually traversed the valleys of Yarrow and Ettrick, making, that way, his exit into Moffatdale. It was also known that he statedly travelled the east of Fife, whence he made his transit across the Frith, and ranged the Lammermoors, before descending upon the Tweed and its feeders. But this was not Simmie's usual period of appearance at St Ronan's, which was never till after the bear-seed time; and surprise and questioning was added to that usual warm welcome to the Cleikum Inn, from the female part of the household, which the facetious pedlar always received. Wants of all kinds were now to be supplied to the females; but the cravings of the men for tidings were still more eager. Simmie heard all questions, and often parried them with jokes, sometimes at the expense of the Covenanters; for, strange as it might be for one in his rank of life, Simmie was loyal and a Malignant; and in Fife, where his principles were better known or more rigidly canvassed, he was even latterly suspected of using his calling to act as a spy for the curates and persecuting lairds. Some light remarks from Simmie provoked the displeasure of the grave goodman of Elshieshiels, who, shaking his head, said—

'I trow they did not wrong you far, friend, that put honest men on their guard against ye.'

The pedlar looked disturbed, but laughed it over.

'Against the length of my ellwand is it, guidman? Weel, it measured aff ten ells of Flanders lace this day week, and double that of French lawn, for the bridal gear of bonny Lady Lochkeltie, owre yonder at Lindores, who is coming to be your lady here at Redheugh; and, if she shall say I wronged her, let me abide it.'

Here was news—and twenty throats were opened.

'And will Sir Marmaduke ever let the lady and her gear past himsel' or his son?'

'Ay, that's a point for divines like you, guidman; but see here, lasses, saw ye ever rarer ribbons? That's ca'ed The Duke of York's darling.' And he threw a wreath of ribbon temptingly over his arm.

'Maiden of mine shall never wear snood o' that bloody hue,' said the old farmer. 'And I take blame to myself for clatterin' wi' a scoffing fool-bodie like ye, who, I have heard, partook, twenty and more years since, in the heathenish doings at Linlithgow, when Middleton and Dalyell, and other rotten-hearted Malignants, the magistrates of that town, burnt the Covenant, and put the Cause to open shame with their mocking devices, dancing around their big bonfire, while the public fountain spouted French and Spanish wine, in which the frantic wretches toasted the healths of the excommunicate apostate, Charles Stuart, and the enemies of the Kirk and of Scotland. No wonder ye blench, poor sinful wretch, and that the sweat breaks on your brow, come as ye are of pious Presbyterian parents, and allied to the blood of the Covenant. A present judgment was seen on him, my friends,' continued the speaker, as the appalled circle drew back, leaving the sacrilegious pedlar alone in his shame: 'he wasted in flesh, sirs, and pined in spirit, like a thing bewitched, from that day; never again could settle to his honest trade of a shoemaker, and so took to the pack, and to what other less honest trades lies between him and his conscience.'

'Simmie must have been but a stripling callant, then,' said the landlord, sympathizing with his guest. 'It will not do, Elshieshiels, in these times, to look owre strictly back to what ony o' us were aboot a score o' years syne. There has been a hantel changes o' beliefs and unbeliefs in our day, and there is like to be mair yet—so least maid is soonest mended; but let the guidman try, Simmie, what temper your razors are o'.'

It was not a little remarkable, that, besides ballads and broadsides of all descriptions, for the lads and lasses who heard the curates, Simon never travelled without a secret assortment of such seditious and rebel tracts as 'Lex Rex,' which boldly maintained the doctrine of the lawfulness of armed resistance, or 'The Causes of God's Wrath;' and such proscribed documents as 'The Lanark and Sanquhar Declaration,' 'The Ruglen Testimony,' 'The Torwood Excommunication,' and 'The Dying Testimonies of the Martyrs,' who were still suffering in numbers at Edinburgh, and in many parts of Scotland. 'What can the like o' me do,' he would reason, 'who am but a servant of the public, trying to earn a bit of honest bread at a season when the very giglet lasses, that wont to sing 'Gilmorice' or 'Kathrine Jamfrie,' affect mair these tragedies regarding the last hours of the virgin martyrs, Isabel Alison and Marion Harvie, than Vans Bentinck o' the Krames' best pinners and pearlins.'

As all was safe in the Cleikum at this time, in his estimation, Simon undid the contraband printed papers, which were concealed in a web of duffle; and, at very moderate cost, but under strict injunctions of secrecy, dealt out a supply of those wares, which were eagerly and instantly read.

'And this is what they mak' by their villanous tests and edicts, an' grievous burdens laid on tender consciences,' cried old Elshieshiels: 'their sin creatures, such like as that weirdless body, Simon Sloan, being, by a gracious, overruling Providence, turned into sharp instruments to work their downfall and destruction. Honest Robin Scott durst not hawk about the precious inditings which, for the lucre of pelf, the Council-curates' tools sell to us. No, no, sirs—all the soul-killing tests, and body-slaying murders, and all the finings, and hangings, and drownings, and racks, and thumbikins ever hell devised, and all the dragoons and troopers in the three kingdoms, will never extinguish that fire of love kindled in the heart of Scotland! For nearly twenty years they have tried to drown it in blood; but it will never be quenched. The fathers will be telling the bairns, when they are old men, that in their young years there were great days in Scotland; and that the faithful ministers—a Cameron and a King—a Wellwood, a Renwick, and a Kid—would not be silenced from preaching the truth, nor the Lord's people kept back from hearing of their civil and religious rights; and how the scaffolds ran owre wi' blood, and how gory heads of martyred saints were stuck on all the ports of Edinboro; but all would not do.'

This was the talk of auld Elliot of Elshieshiels. Some of his friends thought that his long keeping to the hills under hiding, after the business at Airmoss, and a sore imprisonment, suffered in Tantallon Castle, had given his brain a shake from the base of solidity; but it was remarked that his love waxed aye the warmer and more vehement as his worldly judgment failed; and he would find fault even with his landlord, Redheugh, and other old companions in arms for the cause of the Covenant, because of what he scrupled not to call a lukewarmness and defection. This made Elshieshiels the more anxious about the fact, when he heard from Simon an inkling of the marriage.

'Comely house-dames and rich heritages have long been among the Enemy's most effectual snares,' he remarked; and he strictly interrogated Simon as to Redheugh's project of matrimony with the young widow of Lochkeltie.

Though Redheugh was well stricken in years, the lady was yet a fair and buxom gentlewoman, on whom more than one or two suitors (even among the Cavaliers) cast eyes of regard, with maybe a sklent towards her fat dowry lands in the Howe of Fife, and some ulterior view of the custody and bestowal, in due season, of her only child Magdalen Leslie, to whom, though still in years but a babe, great wealth had fallen, both in lands and money-bonds held by her late goodsire, the Provost of Cupar, over the Laird of Winram's estates. Lady Lochkeltie, in her state of bereavement, sojourned for personal safety near the West Bow Port of Edinburgh; and, though carrying herself with marvellous discretion for one of the weaker sex, she could not altogether withhold her succour and solace from the persecuted and outed ministers then under flight and hiding; for which fact her dwelling had been repeatedly searched, and herself brought up before the Privy Council, to bide the gibing and jeering of Lauderdale anent harbouring sturdy trams of the Kirk in her very secret chamber. Her woman's wit, and maybe her comely countenance, helped her through; though it was alleged, by Elshieshiels and other highflyers, that her replies were not altogether so single-minded and ae-fold as became her pure profession. So she was dismissed skaithless, Lauderdale saying—

'Ye maun ware your widowhood upon a jolly Cavalier, madam, who will answer to us for your good conduct.'

At one of these targings she chanced to be seen by this said Winram, who had just come from Galloway, where the storm was raging, to give an account of his devil's stewardship, in shooting, and hanging, and fining, and plundering. His prodigal and dissolute life at the Court of Charles Stuart, and the maintenance of his riotous troopers, had long since brought Sir Marmaduke to a piece of bread, in spite of the plunder and fines he pocketed; and he was now clamouring for prey with the best of those ravening wolves. It was remarked that, when the widow was removed, whose daughter, if there had been justice in the land, might in right of bonds be said to carry his estate in her bib, he got into a rage with the whole Council which parried his demands; and, the Duke of York being in presence, he swore a blasphemous oath, by the rood, that he must have siller, if he gaed to hell and pawned his soul for it! upon which either Lauderdale, or Rothes, or some of that pack—for they were all alike, and, to use the idiom of the vernacular, 'ae sow's farrow'—cried out—

'A God's name, man, take the Whig-a-muir Leslie's widow as the first instalment of thy unreasonable demands, and worry thy poor friends nae mair. The quean has a drop or two of gentle blood in her veins. If ye manage half, ye may, in due time, bestow her weel-tochered daughter on that hopeful youth, the Master of Winram, which will cancel all heritable bonds, and spare ye the lang journey ye may take soon enough. The wench ought in conscience to be made a ward of the crown, and bred up in honesty. But she will be safe in thy fatherly custody.'

Sir Marmaduke, who had the pride of the foul Fiend, winced at this frank project, but let himself be overruled; especially as it was expounded to him that there was no need whatever to part with his English concubine, Mistress Anne, who duly attended the curate's mass, and reigned my Lady Paramount, at Randolph's Tower, over the entire household, and the Master to boot; and never, it was said, did this woman forget or forgive this scheme, though it turned out of non-effect. But the matter got air, as, somehow or other, the friends of the cause of the covenant had a sharp ear even in Privy Council committees; and, that same night, the hand of the widow of Lochkeltie was, by the offices of godly Mr Blackadder, then under hiding in Edinboro, secretly bestowed in holy wedlock upon Rutherford of Redheugh; the little maiden, Magdalen Leslie, acting as her own mother's bride's-maiden, and James Rutherfurd, then a stripling of ten or twelve years, as his father's best man.

'I look upon us two,' said Redheugh, 'but as the proxies of our children, if it shall please the Lord to incline their young hearts to each other.'

There were divers reasons in operation among good friends. By the preachers then in Edinboro, the sudden union was considered a matter of needful carnal polity, (as Lady Lochkeltie was bent on wedlock,) to keep so rich a prize, in a temporal sense, from the enemy; and as a clear dispensation of Providence, to strengthen the hands of friends. Instead of 'the young folk' (as every pair is called when they marry, however well stricken in years they may be) travelling to Redheugh, to keep the honeymoon, as Sikker Simmie had foretold, they took boat for Fife betimes next morning, and had crossed the Frith lang before Sir Marmaduke, who had been drinking and diceing all night with Lauderdale, heard of the march which the Covenanters had stolen on him. Flinging his furred cloak over his gold-laced habit, that had never gone off his back after the debauch, he burst into the Privy Council chamber like a man possessed by the Evil One; and, the Duke of York being again in presence, first swore a deadly revenge against the Laird of Redheugh—of whose lands he demanded the instant forfeiture—and a deeper and more burning hatred than that, set on fire of hell, which already raged in his veins against the Lord's people. He even offered his dagger at his kinsman, Lauderdale, who could not keep from jeering at his disappointment; for such is the friendship of the wicked.

Though afflictions vexed and bruised the Kirk and commonwealth of Scotland more sorely than ever after these happy espousals, and though the ungodly trode down the vineyard like swine, and rioted in the goodly fruits thereof, there were quiet days and peaceful nights for Redheugh in his own peculiar; so that it was alleged by Elshieshiels, and other suffering brethren, that he was forgetting the afflictions of Zion in the calm couthiness of his wife's fireside at Lindores; where, if there was one member of the circle more dear to him than another, it was his step-bairn, the gentle and winsome Magdalen Leslie, who had at once gained for herself a daughter's place in his heart. The children, James and Magdalen, had also mingled the buds and blossoms of the affections of youth, and could not so much be said to have fallen in love, according to any worldly or carnal sense of the phrase, as that the tenderest affection and endearment had been the law of their young life, as far back as the memory of Magdalen reached. The children had together at Lindores shared the instructions of a godly outed preacher, until James had been sent to Holland to complete his education under the especial direction of Sir Patrick Home, an old friend and neighbour of his father. It was in his first absence that the golden-haired, mild Magdalen, with a skin of milk and an eye of softest blue, grew up into graceful maidenhood, unfolding her beauty beneath the fond eye of her stepfather, like a living flower, until the match of the maiden could not have been met with from Crail to Culross, in all the goodly kingdom of Fife. Magdalen had, in duty and love, cherished James Rutherfurd as a dear and only brother, and jaloused nae mair, until light broke in upon her maiden innocence, when she chanced to be scorned one day with the Master of Winram, and felt that she never could be the bride of any man by her own free choice, save her dear and early companion. Ye may be sure that a matter so desirable to all concerned, both in a public and in a private capacity, was not ill to manage; and, on James going back to Holland, after a visit to Lindores, he carried away her troth-plight; while, blushing in her secret chamber, with inborn modesty, and thrilling with innocent delight, the pious maiden blessed the Lord that those ties which had made so much of the happiness of her childhood did not preclude that closer, more rapturously-endearing connexion for time and for eternity, to which she tremblingly looked forward. For Magdalen Leslie almost grudged her own felicity, while Zion was in the furnace; and this had been a season of quiet for her parents, purchased, as I have said, by what was surmised a touch of lukewarmness, or some want of a fervent, fiery zeal, on the part of auld Redheugh. Yet was he a man of great weight among the friends of the cause, and highly respected; and something was yielded to his grey hairs, which demanded ease and peace, and something more to the prudent policy of Lady Lochkeltie, who, from the time she had been handled by the Privy Council, was ever in deadly terror of fines, forfeitures, and pilnewinks. However, a time was now drawing near, when a double-faced or worldly policy would not longer suffice, and when the choice was to be made between the Kirk and the curates, between the Lord's service and Baal's; for now the soul-ensnaring edicts daily issued, were as a trap set upon Mizpeh, and as a net spread upon Tabor. To be brief, a crisis was drawing near within this ancient kingdom; for, as is said in the vernacular, when things are at the worst they mend. But the blackness of darkness was only lowering—the fiery deluge had not burst; and, such is the frailty of human nature in young and plighted hearts, that, maybe, Magdalen Leslie, as the appointed time drew nearer and nearer, thought but even owre muckle of her true-love in the Lowlands of Holland, and partly forgot the public troubles of Scotland; though the maiden could not be called wilful nor remiss in duty—as her purpose of wedlock had been fortified and hallowed by the consent of their common parents, and warmly approved by those godly ministers and leading elders among the Covenanters, who, it was thought, liked to assume a temporal as well as spiritual authority over the adherents of the mighty cause.

This marriage had long been the subject-matter of debate, and also of prayer, in the secret conferences of the Lord's people; and it was hoped that, young as they were, James Rutherfurd and Magdalen Leslie might live to prove a nursing-father and a nursing-mother of the afflicted Kirk; for the youth was of a generous, high-spirited nature, and of a singularly ripe judgment for his brief years—his understanding of matters of civil polity having been wonderfully enlarged by his residence in Holland. It was thought, moreover, that the son of Redheugh, who had suffered sorely in his worldly possessions by the oppression of his powerful and persecuting neighbour, Sir Marmaduke Winram, had a double title to the well-tochered heiress of Lochkeltie; and it was the merry saying of one of the preachers, maybe Samuel Rutherford—"Is not the house of Lochkeltie honoured in ministering of its substantial siller spoons to the toom aumrie of Redheugh, where Sergeant Warroch has left nothing better than horn cuttles?" It is, indeed, a well-known historical fact, that whatever of vessels of silver, and vessels of gold, and ornaments, and gauds of gentlewomen, had been treasured in Presbyterian households, were freely cast into the public treasury. It was, indeed, a time of a singular awakening and opening of hearts, so far as the free communication of gear and substance went—and that same is a severe test of what spirit a man is of, in his zeal for a cause.

You are now, my friends, to suppose that ten years had elapsed from the marriage of Redheugh, during which time he had so ordered his walk, that, save refusing to hear the curates, for which his household suffered fine upon fine, it was next to impossible to fasten a quarrel upon him; and, by altogether avoiding this country-side, he had not roused the enemy in crossing Winram's path. As for the annual-rent on the late Provost of Cupar's heavy bonds, it was thought best to keep quiet about that, the Cavaliers' song being then as now—

"Instead of broad pieces we'll pay with broad swords."

But how was the young hot spirit of James Rutherfurd to brook this insolent injustice? The prudent Lady hoped, that, by submitting patiently to every injustice, save in matters affecting conscience, the grey and honoured head of her husband might descend to the grave in tranquillity in the bosom of his family; and—though his spirit still travailed in secret for the wrongs inflicted on the land of Scotland, and his heart yearned over those sufferings of glorified martyrs and persecuted saints which had, twenty years before, kindled his soul with burning zeal, and unsheathed his father's sword—it was alleged that he had set his heart, with an over desire, upon the completion of the marriage of his son and Magdalen, who was, indeed, the very apple of his eye—the light of his life. It was settled that young Redheugh should return to Scotland at Whitsuntide, and the marriage take place without a delay, which the broken state of the country forbade. Some of the ladies of those Cavaliers who were distantly connected by blood with Magdalen Leslie, had expressed a desire to take charge of the heiress in Edinburgh, and introduce her to society becoming her expectations and claims; and one or two matches had been proposed for her on the part of young and needy Malignants among the King's and the Duke's friends, and in especial by Sprinkel, and Douglas of Stenhouse, a Papist, and one who vowed that he would bring her back to the true church before she had been three months his wife. The family at Lindores were in great dismay at pretensions backed by men in power, who were then given up to work all unrighteousness with greediness; and the Lady of Lochkeltie would have sent her daughter abroad to be out of danger, had she not known that their enemies only waited for a pretext to confiscate her lands and gear. Wicked Winram was now, in the ways of Providence, made their stay; for, when he heard of the heiress of Lindores and Lochkeltie being given to any Cavalier save himself or his son, he raged like a bull of Bashan, and the plan was suspended to keep peace in their camps and councils. Still the overly-prudent Lady of Lochkeltie, foreseeing nothing but danger and mischief to the whole family while Magdalen remained single, wrote with her own hand to speed the return of her stepson; to whom she remarked, 'that, godless monsters as the Privy Council were, they durst not put asunder those united by the holiest of human ordinances, and with the consent of parents and the next of kin.'

Under cover of her lady-mother's missive, Magdalen also wrote to him as her brother, which she yet called him, and for the last time in her single state; but also as to her long-beloved and early betrothed; and that—for the letter was carefully preserved among the family papers—in a strain of tenderness, and with the out-pouring of an affectionate spirit, which after circumstances made memorable. The lady of Lochkeltie's letter contained, no doubt, much sound and evangelical doctrine, though it touched more on certain bridal purchases of Flanders lace, and Holland linen, and Indian china, and posset-dishes, than Redheugh might altogether have countenanced, while so many precious saints, hunted like wild beasts to the hills, had not a meal of meat to sustain nature. The epistle of the maiden contained also an account of a remarkable and solemn public renewal of her covenant, and a devout casting of her betrothed and herself upon Providence, in their new relation, for time and for eternity, which was wonderful in one so young. Rutherfurd, the younger of Redheugh, who, by all accounts, was of a manly, loving, frank nature, had sometimes chided his young connexion for an over degree of maidenly coyness in her late correspondence; but he was now satisfied that his Magdalen's love far exceeded the giddy, flickering, light passion of ordinary women; and his heart, already rejoicing like a bridegroom's over his bride, he boune himself for Scotland, and was expected in the port of Dysart within fourteen days.

As evil fortune would have it—for so to short-sighted eyes it might at first have seemed—certain papers necessary to the completion of the nuptial contract with which Gideon Urie, a God-fearing clerk in Cupar, was then busy, were deposited in a secret hiding-place in the peel-house of Redheugh, of which no one possessed the secret, save the old laird, and which he did not judge fit to intrust to any one save those nearest and dearest to him; so it was agreed that he should make the journey accompanied by Magdalen, and be back again before the Malignants in Edinburgh would wot of their absence. For this purpose they were to take shipping at Largo, and, crossing at once into East Lothian, altogether shun the perils and snares of a city polluted with the blood of the saints. A dull, grey, cold February morning it was when they took horse, and the heart of Magdalen failed her altogether as they rode off, so that, leaping from her pony, sorrow overcoming her, she ran back and fell into her mother's arms, sorely sobbing in a passion of grief, while she cried out, 'O mother! dear, dear mother, there is a load on my heart this morning it will never get aboon!' And the mother chided and comforted in the same breath, as mothers will do, saying—'What ails my Maidline, my winsome bairn?'

Now the maiden had dreamed a dream; and, as they say in the vernacular idiom, 'Cadgers aye dream o' creels,' so young girls will dream of their sweethearts just as like as of anything else. [Upon this there arose the only titter among the spinners, carders, and knitters of the Cleikum, which the Dominie's tale had excited.] 'All this long drearie night,' said Magdalen, 'was my broken sleep haunted by a pale spectre, taking the form of our beloved James; and then the wan thing would change like the mist-wreath, till it brightened into the countenance of an angel, and then the haughty countenance and scowling brows, and the eyne that scorch me, of the wicked Malignant Sir Marmaduke Winram would come between us; and hundreds on hundreds of demon visages would cluster about and press on and suffocate me, like the fiendish faces that frightened me in my childhood, of Sergeant Warrock and the blood-thirsty murderers that paced past our window and down the West Bow on the day the innocent blood of young Isabel Alison was spilt like water.'

'Whist, whist, my child,' returned the lady, who was a careful dame, 'ye are bound on the path of duty, to secure your dower of widowhood over the lands of Redheugh, if it please Providence to afflict you, like me, with the same sore bereavement of an early separation.' There was a cold touch of a worldly spirit in this, which found no response in the leal and loving heart of the maiden.

'Mother,' she uplifted her voice, 'speak not to me of widowhood, who never will be blest to be the bride of young Redheugh—Oh, never, never!'

'Silly girl, these are your maiden fears,' replied the lady, kissing and soothing her child. 'And this is an unlucky back-coming,' she added; for a touch of superstition in those days mingled strangely with a strong religious faith in the minds of all classes in Scotland.

'I fear to see again that stone on which the Papist witch-wife of the Pathhead stood the morning we fled from Edinburgh, denouncing wrath, on our landing in our own country,' said Magdalen. 'How can I forget her eldritch scream, 'Ye think ye have made a braw escape this morning, Lady Lochkeltie—you and your Whigamuir bridegroom; but the Weird of the Winrams hangs owre ye yet—ay, owre you and yours.''

'I could chide thee, silly maiden,' said the lady, forcing a smile; 'but I must leave it to a blither companion to chase away these black vapours, bred of an idle brain and the public troubles; for I will not believe the Enemy has power over my Maidline. Blessings on my daughter!—far from her be doubt and temptation—near be faith and trust!'

'Mother,' said the maiden, 'I know the ground of my hope, and I have not been nurtured like those who trinket with witch-women and put faith in soothsayers; but the finger of fate is in this, as ye shall learn. Early this morning, when I had shaken off these ensnaring dreams, after seeking counsel and direction of Him in whose hands are the issues of life, I opened my Bible at that fearful Scripture—

Watchman, what of the night?—watchman, what of the night? And they fled from the sword, from the drawn sword, and from the bent bow, and from the grievousness of war. For thus hath the Lord said unto me within a year, according to the years of an hireling, and all the glory of Kedar shall fail.

'Is not that a warning of speedy judgment? And, again and again, my Bible opened as if an unseen hand held back the brods at the same threatening text.'

This was a species of appeal to fortune, a kind of heathenish sortes virgilianæ, in which even sober Christians, especially of the weaker sex, then indulged. And well might the awful response thus solemnly and not without sin invoked, have made the maiden quail; nor did her lady-mother altogether elude the contagion of a superstitious fear, though she strove to believe that the threatening Scripture bore the rather upon the public estate of this covenanted and backsliding land than on her own fire-side. And so with blessings and prayers they parted, and four hours' easy riding brought Redheugh and the damsel to Largo, whence they proposed to take shipping, by the dawn of next day, for Dunbar, and thence, traversing the Lammermuir, pass quietly down the Leader side, and on to the auld peel-house, which Redheugh had not visited for several seasons bygone. It so chanced that Andro Baikie's brig, a coglie bit craft, which the Laird intended to hire for his occasions, had been bespoken by the prelatic travelling merchant, Simon Sloan, of whom ye formerly heard; but this was the less matter, as he was bound on the same voyage with his packs, passing on his annual journey from St Andrew's to the Merse, Tweeddale, and the other regions he frequented in his traffic. He was naturally but overly happy and vogie to have ability to grant a passage to Redheugh and the young lady; but he would suffer no one else to enter the vessel, save, as it chanced, that singular Christian the guidman of Elshieshiels, who, his brain being more and more infirm with what he had suffered, had taken a craze to make a pilgrimage to Magus Muir—for, as he said, the refreshment of his spirit, in viewing the scene where righteous judgment had been executed once more before he yielded up his soul. There had also been some secret conference at St Andrew's of ministers and leaders, at which he had been present. Magdalen had often heard of this person, who was regarded by many as a half-crazed fanatic, by others as a saint of the first magnitude; and there was much in his physiognomy, and in the wild light which shot from his restless, gledging eye, to rivet attention. When, as the day broke, the group met together on the ruckle of sea-stones called Largo pier, ready to embark, and Elshieshiels joined them, his deep, unearthly voice, as he poured forth the words, 'Watchman, what of the night?' made the damsel involuntarily start, recalling the oracular text.

Redheugh, when on board, fell into close and private conference with his old companion in conventicles, prisons, hiding-places, and maybe battle-fields, and appeared deeply interested in the subject-matter of discourse; the pedlar trimmed his packs, and sat him down upon them, smoking a pipe, and humming what seemed the profane tune of 'Maggie Lauder;' and Magdalen, cherishing her own thoughts in a pensive heart, gazed into the hazy east, where the sun was wading in clouds, and dreamed of far-off Holland. She was again startled by the high tones of the Covenanter, who was thus addressing her stepfather:—

'How are the mighty in Israel fallen!—alack for sinful defections! for the putting the hand to the plough, and then drawing back!—Let those that abide by their bein firesides, toasting their shins, and eating, and drinking, and making merry in their tents, and come not out to the help of the Lord, remember Meroz' curse; for verily they shall not, when those things are inquired for, be guiltless of the blood of their brethren.'

The colour mounted to auld Redheugh's brent brows. 'If this is levelled at me,' he said, in a calm, but severe and constrained voice, 'I must say it bespeaks less than courteous civility, and far less than Christian charity. My fellow-sufferer even unto bonds ought to remember that the same command which enjoined glory to God, proclaimed good will to man.'

'I crave your pardon, Laird of Redheugh, and far am I from saying that the root of the matter is not in ye. But ye maun be tried, ye maun be sifted, ye maun be winnowed; the pure gold must be purged from the dirt and dross; ye have been ower lang at ease in Zion; ye have been practically saying, 'Soul take thine ease—there are goods laid up in store for thee for many days.' Yet will ye be a brand plucked from the burning, for the noble testimony ye bore in times past, against the covenant-breaking and idolatry of this perjured land, with which the Lord has a controversy; and through the breadth and length of which He will go up in judgment, and give the fowls of the air, and the birds of prey, a feast of flesh and blood. Yea, I see the sword is whetted for blood,' he exclaimed, in yet wilder tones, tossing up his arms, while his elf-locks streamed in the wind—'He will have a day of the blood of kings and of nobles. Blood has touched blood in this sinful land! Pentland Hills yonder, on which the mist is lowering, drank Mr Guthrie's blood; and Bothwell shook hands with Pentland, and the drowned in the sea touched Bothwell; and Airmoss the drowned in the sea; and the Grass Market and the Gallowlee swim red—ye may wade therein in the blood of precious saints knee-deep!—And will He keep silence for this?'

'The poor man is distraught with his long and cruel sufferings and solitary imprisonment in Tantallon Castle, with nothing but the German Sea sweltering below, and the mews and gulls screaming around him, my Magdalen,' whispered Redheugh to the trembling maiden, whose eyes were as if fascinated by the wild maniacal glare of the man's eyes; 'and, though I pity him, and sincerely respect what he has boldly done for the religious and civil liberties of Scotland, I wish we had had a quieter fellow-passenger.'

Magdalen's gaze had attracted the poor man's wandering eye, and he shouted—'Rise up, ye women that are at ease! hear my voice, ye careless daughters! give ear unto my speech!—for the spoiler has gone up; and think ye he will spare the little ones or the delicate women; or that the fair and ruddy countenance which may allure the soldier of Christ from commanded duty, and prove the same snare to the son that the mother's wiles have done to the father, will not be changed into blackness and ashes, and'——

'Halt there, now,' cried Sikker Simmie, interposing, 'I gave you a cast in the brig, mainly to keep you from running into worse mischief, and that is the jougs o' the Laird of Anster, or the Crail tolbooth; but ye are not to make a conventicle of this deck-head, which is but an ill return for my civility.'

'Your civility, apostate wretch!——But I scorn to bandy words with you; and, if I have infringed upon due courtesy in my expostulation with more honourable persons, I bear the signet and authority of Him who has honoured a poor worm with the mission I bear.' He flung himself upon the deck and unclasped his Bible, muttering what to the ears of Magdalen as much resembled imprecation as prayer, as he turned over the leaves.

'It would be a well-governed Kirk and State that had the like of your cock-brain at the head of it,' said the pedlar, aside; and Magdalen and her father were silent under the Malignant's jeer. Elshieshiels refused to partake of their refreshment at noontide, and spoke no more until, as it seemed, between sleeping and waking, he perceived the afternoon sun flashing upon the far-off Castle and the kirk spires of Edinburgh, when he arose, and, taking off his broad blue bonnet, pronounced a passionate anathema against the proud city whose high places had, for twenty years, reeked with the blood of martyrs, and again sank silent on the deck.

'To reflect on these things is enough to drive any man mad,' said Redheugh, who had been very taciturn and thoughtful all day, as if oppressed by the weight of railing accusation to which an overly-tender conscience gave sting.

'Now, with your leave, Redheugh,' put in the packman, 'these things, instead of driving men of sense and gumption donnart, should make them doubly wise, doubly cautious, doubly sure that they see to the end before they risk, not merely their own lives and the peace of their families, but the lives of thousands, and even the safety of the cause they so foolishly contend for.'

'This is a matter, friend, on which we are not like to agree,' returned Redheugh, drily, and drawing forth his purse; 'so ye will take the freight ye have paid for the boat, and we will be free and ready to part on landing. We push forward to my sister's house of Edgelaw before the sun go down.'

The money was at once accepted, Sikker Simmie remarking, 'that it never became a poor man to refuse a gentleman's siller.' It was now late in the afternoon; but the destined port was close in view, the weather clear, and the horses fresh, and Redheugh was satisfied with his progress hitherto, when an alarming difficulty rose. Andro Baikie, the Largo skipper, as a Fife-man, and, consequently, a Whig, was favourably inclined to the Covenanters; but still within the limits of discretion, and safety to the brig and its navigator.

'As we are within two bows' length of running into the harbour, ye'll better bestir ye, friend, and seek out your pass; for we will be all strictly looked after, gentle and simple.'

'The more especially as Andrew has an ill name, since a certain trafficking with a Dutch lugger off Eyemouth, whose cargo Hackstoun of Rathillet, and a wheen Whigamores, lying landward in your county of Fife, valued more than good brandy-wine or stout Geneva. I'm no saying, Andrew, it was either arms or ammunition.' And Simmie chuckled.

'And if ye did, Mr Sloan, it would be but one lee more to the diel's dozen was spread about that same auld nonsense, bringing honest folk into trouble.—But seek out your pass, honest man.'

Elshieshiels raised himself, and sternly demanded—'Am I then not also a free man of no mean city?'

'He'll be meaning Peebles or Jeddart, I'se warrant,' said Simmie, apart.

'Am I not a free-born Scot, at liberty to travel upon my lawful occasions the length and breadth of my native country of Scotland, without speering the leave of any malignant prelatic magistrate whatever?'

'Clean havers, man,' replied Simmie. 'But I need not tell you of not sitting in Rome and striving with the Pope; for ye would pick a quarrel with a whin-stane, though ye surely could not be so misleared as bring Redheugh into trouble, who has had fash eneugh already from the Privy Council, by travelling in his company and his freighted boat, without a lawful pass and warrant. But, if so, ye ken the remedy, Andro.'

'Ay, that do I—ye shall be able to satisfy the town-clerk and the bailies, friend, or stow away, neck and crop, behind those salt barrels, and be landed again safe on the pier of Largo, or my name is no Andro Baikie.'

The fugitive at first expressed violent indignation; but, becoming more calm, at length proposed that they should lie to until darkening, and then he would cast himself into the waters, swim on shore, and rid them of the Jonah in the bark. This was refused point blank. It was more than the brig was worth, or its owner's neck, to make such an attempt to elude justice in these severe times. Driven to extremity, the man called Redheugh aside, and communicated something which appeared to make a sudden and strong impression upon that gentleman.

'I cannot send back this honest man,' he cried, advancing, after a few seconds, spent, as it appeared, in rumination. 'I will peril all ere that.' Sikker Simmie remonstrated.

'He must go forward,' replied Redheugh, with an air of vexation. 'Magdalen, my dear,' he whispered, 'life and death are on his journey—my word is plighted to the protection of my old friend.'

'Ye will sairly rue this interference, Redheugh,' said the pedler, impressively. 'But what do ye propose?'

'To lie to till darkening,' said Redheugh, 'go ashore in the boat, and take our chance.'

'Well, well, Redheugh,' said the skipper, doggedly, 'I have seen your money before now, and may see it again, and I would be loath to disoblige you; but, if ill befal the brig, which is the bairns' bread-winner, through that camstairie Whig carle, ye ken—and ye are witness to it, Simon Sloan, and so is the young lady—to whom I look, to make good the damage.'

Redheugh undertook all risks; and that the pedler might, as he said, run none, he also made the singular request, of being smuggled on shore with his pack, and along with the Covenanter.

The pass which Redheugh had procured from the government authorities at Cupar, for himself and his daughter, was undergoing rigid scrutiny from the zealous town-clerk and a magistrate in the town-house, when a couple of constables, or what were named sheriff-mairs, arrived with Elshieshiels in their custody. He had been apprehended a mile from the town, on his way southward; and upon the information of Simon Sloan the packman.

'Who has picked my pocket, the malignant villain, of a charge of private papers,' whispered the prisoner, 'and a small sum in silver coins.'

Redheugh went up to his friend, his countenance expressing deep vexation and alarm, which blackened into despair at a single word, whispered in his ear. 'What is this?—what is this?' cried the official, with dignity; 'no private communing there. And where is the aforesaid Simon Sloan? Let him be called into court.' But Sikker Simmie was nowhere to be found; he had put in leg-bail, and the prisoner was committed for a future examination. The only crime charged against him, was clandestinely landing from a boat, and travelling homeward without a pass; but that was enough.

Redheugh joined his daughter at the inn which was close by the jail and the council chamber, and proposed that, as the moon was rising, they should set forth instantly, if she were able for the journey. So Peter Cairns, the laird's man, who, by this time, had got the beasts landed, saddled them forthwith.

'Something—some unhappy thing has chanced to trouble ye, my father,' cried Magdalen, reading the laird's troubled countenance. He told her of the treachery of the packman, and of the arrest of his poor friend. She was lost in conjecture. 'Robbed him of a charge of papers!—Yet, spite of appearances, I cannot help thinking Simon a just man, and a very tolerant Prelatist, and one who has a clearer judgment than falls to the generality of those of his rank.'

Not a word passed between father and daughter until they had rode several miles; Magdalen fearing—she could not tell for what—that the gloom which hung upon her father's spirits partook of deeper concernments than the condition in which he had left the goodman of Elshieshiels. They gained a point where a bridle-track struck up into the hills, while the highway winded on nearer the coast. The moon was about the full; the sky starry, clear, and calm, with a light frost; and the prospect out upon the shimmering waters, and to the misty bays and capes, and up towards the hills, which might have seemed bare and tame in broad day, received that romantic charm from the magic of moonlight, which the flash of bright intelligence or the glow of enthusiasm is seen to communicate to the most ordinary features.

'It is a fair night, and a fair scene,' said the damsel.

'I have a boon to ask of my Magdalen,' said Redheugh, without direct reply, but drawing to her side. 'Two more hours' good riding up hill will bring her to the dwelling of my sister at Edgelaw, where she will be kindly entreated for her own sake, even more than for mine. My man, Peter Cairns, knows every foot of the way through brake and heather; and much, much this night demands from me, frail, feckless old man as I am—much, much depends on my pushing southward without stay—much that concerns the weal of the kingdom, and the safety of the best and truest friends of poor, enslaved, persecuted Scotland.'

'Father, do you think so meanly of me as that, in times which have made Scottish maidens martyrs and the fit companions of brave men and heroes, I should stand upon so small a thing as this?'

'Bless thy tender and courageous heart, my darling Magdalen! And it shall be blessed! Many of thy gentle kind have like generous impulses; but how few like thee the steadfast spirit that makes good the purpose! Bless thee, my Magdalen! Surely the Lord will prosper my journey but for thy sake, maiden. Let me but see thee the wife of our James, and freedom of conscience and peace within the borders of Scotland—and for what more does the auld man wait? Bless thee again, twin-lamb of my little flock!'

Magdalen felt that this was no ordinary leave-taking. The old man stooped as if to imprint a kiss upon her brow, when her spirited and restive pony sprung aside; and, though she kept her seat, carried her in an instant a considerable distance off.

'Ill luck precedes and follows this journey,' said the maiden. 'I am not even permitted to receive my father's farewell kiss.'

It was a saying of the younger Lady of Lochkeltie that she had aye found a good gallop the most exhilarating threshold-cup on parting with friends; and she now gave her palfrey, as such beasts are called in story-books, the rein, and also the switch, which fell but as honey-dew from her light hand; so that Peter Cairns was put to his mettle to keep her in sight. Magdalen had slackened her pace to permit this worthy guardian to overtake her; and had dipped into a small hollow, into which the path cut, where a little rivulet trilled away and glimmered in the moonlight, below the shadow of a thicket of alders, hazel and bourtree bushes, and briers. From under these, the voice of Sikker Simmie suddenly addressed her with—

'A fair good even, Mistress Magdalen Leslie! Ye are boune, like myself, for the Edgelaw; for, to say the sooth, the air of a town-end, like yon of Dunbar, never agrees with me; while, in among the hills, I get a good supper and free quarters, instead of a lawin as lang as a Galston grace, for my breakfast, and never a plack gained in the way of trade to clear it with.' And, putting his interrogatory in a Scotsman's canny way, he added, 'Redheugh will be behind ye, it's like? As I will be stepping on before gentry's hours, I might let the housekeeper and the herd at the Peel ken the Laird is on the road.'

Before Magdalen could reply, the doughty Peter, still some yards off, took up speech:—

'Ye audacious knave! if, after your tricks of this day, ye set your impudent snout that gait, or the way of the Edgelaw, we'll hound the dougs on ye!' And Peter struck out with his heavy riding-whip, while Simmie parried with his ell-wand, and proved more than a match for his man—the agile creature having acquired a great sleight of such wanton pastimes, at the tilts and tournaments, or riding at the ring, kept up, until a late day, among the ancient fraternity of packmen.

'I command you, peace!' cried the damsel, made the unwilling spectatress of this unseemly tuilyie. 'Is it by hectoring with every varlet upon the road, that ye fulfil the orders of your absent master, touching my safe-conduct?' And the men were subdued and quieted to a pass that enabled the thick clatter of horse-hoofs on the frosty ground—implying a party of advancing riders, or what, in the old romaunts, was termed a plump of spears—to be heard, bearing down upon the place of rencontre.

'Tak' the muir, man!—tak' to the muir!' cried Sikker Simmie, kicking his pack into the bushes with the left foot, and with the right hand seizing the lady's bridle-rein—'Winram's sleuth-hounds are on us!'

I fear me this Peter Cairns was, after all, though in high credit and trust with the Laird of Redheugh, but a self-seeking loon, and a bit of a gomeril to boot; but the man's instincts were quick for self-preservation, and he took to the muir, heeding little of the young lady, whom the packman, helping from her steed, with all of ceremony the time allowed, prayed to take shelter in the thicket till the storm passed over; and, tying her hood and riding-skirt to his ell-wand, he set this apparition of a lady on the side-saddle, and gave it a scud off in the direction of flying Peter;—and laigh laughed Simmie as to outward sound but loudly and jeeringly in his sleeve, when the troopers, five in number, and led by Sergeant Warrock, fell into the snare, and off and away over the heather, in pursuit of the shellie-coatie and the knave. I need not dwell on the plight of Mistress Magdalen, whose heart flichtered like a snared bird, though her judgment remained clear and steadfast.

'Honest man, I believe ye mean me well,' she said. 'Conduct me safely to the house of Edgelaw, and it is not this gold alone shall reward the service.' And she offered her few broad pieces to the pedler's acceptance, who said—

'Keep the gowd—keep the gowd; ye may need it yet. It is not siller-service I am upon this night, but a work of atonement and a redemption of good name. This deed is but arles of my faithful service to the house of Redheugh, and the cause of Kirk and Covenant, if the trust put in me be equal to the strength given me.'

'This from you, Simon!' returned the young lady—'a Prelatist, a hanger-on of the curates and an apostate Presbyterian, if not something still baser—a spy of those malignant persecutors, Mackenzie and Middleton—besides this day's black business, by which a poor man is plundered and brought into trouble:—how can I help mistrusting you? I blame myself for thus parleying with one whose doings are so doubtful; though, when I remember your songs, and ballads, and merry tales, and drollery, and good-nature with my brother and myself in our childhood at Lindores, I cannot for my heart question but that ye mean me fair in this deliverance from that dreadful oppressor of our house and of the Lord's heritage, Sir Marmaduke Winram.'

'Weels me on the gentle-hearted maiden, whose eye aye carried blitheness and blessing in it! Weels me on her bonny face!—craving pardon for the liberty—wha thought so kindly of the Linlithgow apostate, and on the tongue that said it; and, if e'er Simon Sloan did man or woman a good turn in his born days, he meant one this night when he spulyied that fool-body of that charge of papers, and took—ye call it robbing—the bodle siller, to put a fair face on the deed. If I kenned not, Mistress Magdalen, that ye are of a steadfast spirit, and come of the blood of Leslie, I would fear to afflict you with needful tidings and warnings of near danger.'

'To my father!' cried Magdalen, gasping.

'And to his son!' whispered Simon—and the damsel clutched at his sleeve—and ye may be sure Magdalen listened to his discourse with more earnestness than if he had been a gospel minister. 'My name has become a reproach among my people,' said he, 'a shame and a hissing—yet there are captains in our Israel that put trust in me yet. Know ye the hand and seal of Argyle, madam?' And he produced a certificate to good character and trust-worthiness from his spleuchan, which, again, for greater safety, had been hidden in a clue of blue worsted yarn; and Magdalen could, in the clear moonlight, recognises the signature and seal of that patriotic and God-fearing nobleman. Some Presbyterian gentlemen of the east, away by Fife and Angus-shires, had, it seemed, commissioned arms and ammunition from Holland, and by the very same ship in which Redheugh the younger was to return home; and the youth, as one well thought on for parts, and courage, and true principles, had been intrusted with divers papers by Baillie of Jerviswood, and Sir Patrick Home, and others, exiles for conscience and civil liberty, both touching their private affairs, the sufferings of the realm, and the dawn of a better day.

'It was my unworthy self,' said Simon, 'was deputed to meet young Redheugh at Dysart, and free him of his written charge, which lay snug in the core of sundry prime Gouda cheeses sent to my care; when all at once an inkling got to the Privy Council of shot, powder, guns, and conspiracies; and blank warrants were issued, the ports watched, and thus we abode all last week; when some, as great warlocks as himself, misdoubting me, placed power in the hands of the daft goodman of Elshieshiels. There is in these papers what would have hanged twenty gentlemen in one rope. But they are all mad together; and—partly from regard to their craigs, and maybe a wee thought that, if certain papers from the Hague, destined for the Earl's friends, fell into uncanny hands between Dunbar and the Tyne, the name of one Simon Sloan, a travelling merchant, might gain more bruit and blazonry than beseemed his station and humility, and the crazed member, Elshieshiels himself, get a walk down the West Bow some fine morning—I determined to ease him of his burden, and intercept the bark.'

'And this is the cause of my dear father's sudden journey!' cried the damsel. 'Oh, why might I not have been with him in his affliction! And how, then, kind and honest man, and true friend of thy country, is this dire wo to be averted?'

'That is just what I was ruminating. I maun back to Largo—round-about as Brownie did—and try to get Andro Baikie aff, and doun the Frith, and out on the coast, to warn off the Dutch bark; and that I meant to have concerted with Redheugh, for which purpose I waylaid ye here; but the poor demented gentleman is aff eastward, believing me a rampant rogue, no doubt.'

'And what can I do? Alas, alas! how little can helpless woman perform for friends in trouble!—our lot is to pine and suffer, and be silent. But go; every hour will seem an age until I hear of the success of your merciful enterprise. And lavish shall be your reward. Oh, what is all the dross of Redheugh and Lochkeltie, and of this dwelling of Edgelaw, to the safety of James Rutherfurd and the friends of Scotland! Go, go, then!—lose not a moment. The lives of many—the hope of kingdoms—are in your errand—which may our God prosper!' And she fervently clasped her hands in the attitude of prayer.

'Amen!' said Simon, raising his bonnet; and, having seen the damsel to the Mains of Edgelaw, he left her to make her own way into the dwelling. Ye may be sure her welcome was the blither for the narrow escape she had to recount. The Lady of Edgelaw—and guidwives of the better class were aye called lady in these days—was a wealthy and childless widow, who, as a Rutherfurd of Redheugh, and proud of her father's house, was thought rather to have demeaned herself by her matrimonial alliance with a thriving cattle-dealer. But that was all past, and the gold was to the fore; and, though a woman of spirit and discretion, Leddy Edgelaw was a true Presbyterian, as became a daughter of the house of Redheugh; and, moreover, a woman of a fervent piety; so that her fireside and her purse were ever open to the preachers who were sufferers for conscience.

Late on the evening of Saturday, which happened to be the third after Magdalen reached Edgelaw, and while she was anxiously looking out for her father, and pining and yearning after intelligence of that Dutch bark in which so many hopes and fears were freighted, a shepherd came down from the heights with tidings that Mr Richard Kidd, an ejected preacher, who had crossed from the mountain parts of the Upper Ward of Clydesdale, was to feed the flock scattered in the wilderness, at a lone place among the hills on the Edgelaw grounds; and that persons had been sent out to warn the waters of an occasion now become rare and doubly precious, as the laws against field-preaching were more severe than ever. You are to know that the scanty inhabitants of this pastoral land, then, as now, pitched their tents—that is, their huts and cot-houses—in the pleasant valleys, and by the sides of brooks or streams like the Whitadder, the Leader, the Gala, and the Heriot, and what not; with a' their sprinkling of lone dwellings in the muirs. And, far and around, for scores of miles, would the soul-thirsty people of all ages and degrees flock to hill-side preachings for the refreshment of their languishing and parched souls—lying out all night on the heather, or at the lee side of a rock, sustained from the scrip and the brook. Lady Edgelaw and her household—who refused to hear either curates, or, what to them was worse, the indulged ministers, and had not been at public ordinances for months—gladly embraced the opportunity, and despised the cowardly counsels of Peter Cairns, who maundered aye on the fine of 1500 merks on the rigs of Edgelaw for the last outbreak, which he thought as much money out of his master's pocket, and so hinted that mercy was better than sacrifice, and that there were seasons when the dwellings of Jacob were seemlier for gentlewomen than the gates of Zion—and especially for Miss Maidline Leslie, now when Winram's blood-hounds were scouring the hills, and her grey-haired father a marked man. But the maiden—though not yet called to a personal grappling with the enemy, and trial of faith in the furnace—was of that high enthusiastic strain of nature which warms at the sight of danger when planted in the path of duty, and who would have been steadfast unto the death—declared, that, whatever should betide, she had a call of Providence to accompany the pious family with whom she sojourned to the place of worship.

Lady Edgelaw superintended her maidens baking, brewing, and preparing divers dainties for the refreshment of the little flock in the wilderness, until the clock struck twelve, and by seven was on horseback behind her oversman. The place of appointment was a wild derned cleugh in the very heart of the hills, five miles from any human dwelling, and so remote and well fenced by mosses and quagmires that it seemed next to impossible the troopers could traverse the marshy broken ground, if the fact had been bruited that a remnant had gathered there. Holding upwards, crossing a shoulder of the ridge, and traversing wide, grey, up-lying muirs, where no vegetation was seen but the ling and the heather, nor voice of bird heard, save the plover and the curlew, Magdalen, ever ahead of her party, came sheer on the little dell where many small groups of families and neighbours, gathered from all the adjoining valleys, were in little knots, or clustered, picturesquely scattered about, sitting, standing, and lolling—the old talking in quiet tones of the state of the times, or on religious subjects, while the young read their Bibles, awaiting the beginning of the service. Such solemn gatherings were wonderful times of refreshment, when the living waters were poured forth like a flood. Cold, hunger, and fatigue were forgotten in the holy zeal of their spiritual exercises; and, if some had come up in perturbation of spirit, before the ending of the first psalm they would not have feared the face of thousands. There is, my friends, no courage like the courage of faith.

The first service was ended, the people had partaken of their repast, and the preacher was engaged in the duties of catechising the young, preparatory to the evening diet, when a shepherd stationed on the heights as a sentinel gave a signal of danger. Winram's blood-hounds, as the troopers were named, were out, scouring the hills; and the preacher, after pronouncing a short but powerful benediction, broke up the assembly and held a council with the elders and armed men. An hour or two later and the cloud of darkness would wrap the people of God from the eyes of their enemies, and the herds and those who knew the ground could lead them through the bogs and swamps in safety; so the women and little ones, with Lady Edgelaw and Magdalen Leslie, were placed in whatever shelter the clefts of the rocks and bushes of the cleugh afforded, while the men took post at the gorge of the dell, ready to defend their citadel if need were. But evening descended on the hills and no foe appeared, and soon the gloom of night prevented further observation of the sentinels; and it was judged safe to disperse, breaking up and dropping off in threes and fours as quietly as possible, till few, save the preacher and the household and herds of Edgelaw, were left. They, too, parted on the edge of the hill, the man of God meaning to return to the shepherd's hut, and the others wending downwards to the lower range of heathery heights. All danger was imagined past for the present, and Magdalen, ever a bold horsewoman, feeling chill in body and more chill and anxious in spirit, pushed onward at a brisk canter, not without hope that tidings of her father, or of one dearer still, might await her at the dwelling, which it was ordained she was not to reach. She had cleared a level rushy glen, from which a bridle track led up a narrow steep gully, opening upon the stretch of muir which sloped to the ridge named Edgelaw. The distance between the solitary farm-house—for, though a bein Lammermoor Laird's dwelling, Edgelaw house was little better—and the place where Magdalen put her pony to its speed, did not exceed a mile-and-a-half; so the more sober equestrians could not be many minutes behind her. When they approached the house, who should stand by the threshold to interchange greetings but Redheugh, who at once and earnestly demanded his daughter from his widowed sister, as he helped her from the pillion.

'Where is my Magdalen?' cried the old man, his voice quivering. 'She is not wont to be the laggard among blithe riders.'

Lady Edgelaw's heart misgave her.

'Within, surely, snooding her hair,' replied the lady, trying to put a calm face upon it. 'Her spunkie Fife creature far outstrips our heavy Merse cattle, and puts us to our speed too. Here, ye hussies, take in my riding-skirt, and summon Mistress Leslie to her father. And, O brother! but I am wae to see ye looking so ill!'

There was none to obey her summons; and a half hour, an hour, two hours elapsed, and the cóllies and men, with lighted lanterns, had been high and low, out and atowre the muirs, shouting and yelping, and routing on horns, to spread alarm, and communicate with each other how they sped in the darksome chase. And aye as one and another returned, old Redheugh's cry was—"My daughter—my Magdalen! What, sirs, have you done with my darling child—my last earthly comfort, now that the prop of my house is struck down? My son, my poor James—in imminent jeopardy himself—will be driven distraught when he hears of her plight. And her poor heart-broken mother"—— It so chanced that Redheugh had met the packman that same afternoon, travelling, as he pleaded, on matters of necessity and mercy. He had succeeded in warning the Dutch vessel off that part of the coast, by means of Andro Baikie, and also in apprizing young Rutherfurd of his danger. The youth had got off in spite of the waylaying of his enemies, in the guise of a packman, which Simon had recommended, and was supposed to have taken the way to the Peel-house of Redheugh, to abide his father's arrival with Magdalen, before taking further measures.

'It was my hope to have seen them united, and safe out of this distressed land, until the indignation be overpast,' said the bereaved old man, who had now taken Simon Sloan as far into his confidence as was needful. 'But my hope is sunshine on water. Alas! I have been too lax in public duty, and my sin has been followed by speedy judgment. My bairns! my bairns!'

'Trust in the Lord and in the power of his might, brother,' said Lady Edgelaw. 'My nevoy can fend for himsel'; and the maiden has a spirit of courage and constancy far above her years and sex; strength will be given her in the hour of need. There is no a praying heart in all broad Scotland that, when this sad news flees abroad, will not be exercised in supplication for sweet Magdalen Leslie. A way of deliverance will be opened, never doubt it.'

'Then, too sure, ye believe her in the hands of that ruthless villain, who neither fears God nor regards man. My Magdalen! my Magdalen! my meek, innocent child!—Oh, to lie down beside her skaithless corpse in the blackest moss-flow of these hills, rather than think of her in that hardened man's custody! Make saddle my horse, sirs! If I can give her but little help, I may die in my duty. For what better use is this remnant of a miserable life? Make saddle my horse with speed! He shall taste Tweed water ere sunrise.'

'You are fitter for your bed, Redheugh,' cried his sister; 'there is fever in your blood and in your eyes. But many shall run and ride on this errand.' And she turned to her gaping servants. 'Dare ye parley with me, ye coward loons, and Magdalen Leslie torn from the very hearthstane of Edgelaw, and the prey of Winram's troopers? Mount and give chase! And do ye go also, Simmie, and try to warn my nephew. But, oh! bid him be wary—ye are a bodie for sense by the ordinary.'

'I need no biddin, guidwife, in this errand,' was Simon's answer; and he was already on his feet. 'Few ken the country better; and I will have speech or tidings of the young lady or four-and-twenty hours go by.'

'Save my child,' cried the poor father, clinging to the slenderest thread of hope, 'and I'll make you the wealthiest packman in all Scotland, if I beg my own bread at Christian doors.'

Withstanding all entreaties and persuasions, the Laird also mounted and set off, though it was with difficulty he kept the saddle; and that Peter Cairns got him to the desolate peel-house of Redheugh, after fever and grief had half turned his brain.

The Lady of Edgelaw only tarried the break of day to mount and send off her overseer and some of her neighbour farmers in different directions; and, as she ministered to them the stirrup-cup with her own hands, she cried briskly out—

'We have sought counsel and help from above; and now, if there be ruth or manhood, or the spirit of a true-blood Scot, left among us, ye will quit ye like men this day. Spare neither horse flesh nor man's strength; and, as ye ride, raise the waters! Make saddle my nag; I'll owre to Thirlstane."

Ill news fly fast. Long ere mid-day, or before any of the regular messengers had returned, a lad, sent back by Simon Sloan to Edgelaw, brought certain intelligence that Sergeant Warrock and a party of horse had rode through Earlston at day-break, with one or two prisoners, and a young female strapped to her saddle, and her horse placed between two troopers. She had struggled and shrieked for help to the few villagers abroad on early labour. The pedlar had no doubt but that this unfortunate person was Mistress Magdalen Leslie, and that she was by this time a prisoner in Randolph's Tower; whence, if she came out with life, it must be as the bride of Randolph Winram. Sir Marmaduke was not a man to be baffled twice. But this Simon kept to himself; and, hiring a horse, he rode back to Edgelaw, in furtherance of his schemes; the Leddy, he said, having routh of the sinews of war; and gold, above a' things, was the first good wanted, whatever was to be done. He found this good dame's queans buckling on her blue camblet riding-skirt, and giving her silver-mounted riding-whip to her hands, while she soliloquized in her own fashion.

'The wealthy heiress of Lochkeltie, whose portion is to redeem the captivity of my father's house'—for the old lady, though religious, had much of the pride of family of the Scots of that day—'the troth-plighted bride of my nevoy, the last of the Rutherfurds of Redheugh, now in sore circumstances himself—an innocent and virtuous maiden, and of gentle blood—torn from the fire-side of Edgelaw! I'm for Thirlstane, Simon Sloan. His godless Grace is at hame; and owes the house of Edgelaw a day in hairst, if the pledged word of a Duke is worth an onion peeling.—They shall all hear of this night's work; and that on the deafest side of their heads, and in the inmost chambers of their councils. All Scotland shall hear of it, and answer too! What care we for their headings and hangings, when driven to extremities like this! So go tell the excommunicate apostate at Thirlstane that, Simon Sloan, as ye are one of his Malignant kind. What has an auld wife like me, with one foot in the grave and the other fast following, to fear from the power the enemy may give the oppressors for a season to destroy the body? But I'll speak him fair first.'

'I wish I saw ye mounted!' cried the pedler—'an auld wife, saving your pardon, may blurt out a rash and a bauld word, and one that may find a mark, which a bearded man, however feckless, durst not venture; but be sure ye do not seek an audience with his Grace of Lauderdale till he has gotten his wame filled. Save and sain us! but they tell he can eat a horse behind the saddle, after clearing two sheep-heads, a bouk of lamb, a half-dozen kain capons, and a kebbuck of half a stone tron.' And, of a truth, it remains the burden of tradition," continued the Dominie, "that this rampant and wicked apostate and persecutor was possessed by a familiar evil spirit, ravening within his swollen and bloated carcase, like the daughters of the horse-leech, and night and day crying, Give, give! This may, however, have been but the inordinate and furious false appetite which physicians reckon among the many ills that afflict the body; though our forefathers believed it an open judgment, and a sore one, on this brutal though ducal specimen of humanity.
