And how should this advocate not be a gainer?
If he has not, he cannot long want a retainer.

His eye was aye flashing, his blood flowing cheerily,
Like a fine-feather'd wagtail his busy tongue goes.
The points of his fingers electric with wit were,
The world seem'd poised on the point of his nose.
He saw so clear, and he looked so steadily,
The writers all gave him a brief so readily.
And how should this advocate not be a gainer?
So clever, he never could want a retainer!

His laugh was aye loudest where mirth was a-going;
His wit flew like shuttlecock well-play'd and true;
He drank aye the longest where good wine was flowing,
But headache or heartache he never yet knew.
When he drank so free, and roared so mellow,
What wonder all praised him a "devilish fine fellow!"
And how should this advocate not be a gainer,
When each joke was a fee, and each glass a retainer?

His brethren in circles they gathered around him,
To hear him discourse of all possible things—

Greek, Hebrew, and German, half song and half sermon,
The Vedas, the Eddas, Courts, Cabins, and Kings:
And if for the nonce he might make a blunder,
He was up like a cork ere you knew he was under.
And how should this advocate not be a gainer,
So clever, and never without a retainer?

O! if you had seen him bamboozling a jury,
With a glance to command, and a smile to decoy,
While he fanned his nose with his white muslin kerchief—
In truth but he was a most wonderful boy!
He tipped his wig, he looked so knowingly,
The words came purling so sweet and flowingly.
And how could this advocate not be a gainer,
When every new speech brought another retainer?

One day on the street the Lord Advocate met him:
"To carry the county, friend, do what you can!"—
He called and he canvassed, he jested, he feasted,
He phrased them and dazed them, and brought in his man.
Whoso will have ease, must first learn to drudge, Sir:
The Advocate speedily made him a judge, Sir.
And how should this advocate not be a gainer,
When he's snug on the Bench, and now needs no retainer? B.

THE LUSTY PEN.

"Pennis——homini datis."—Horace.

I sing the Pen, the lusty Pen,
The fittest muse for manful men.
Let courtly poets make a fuss
About their Hippocrene,
And mount their winged Pegasus,
My fount, my steed 's the Pen.
The kindliest muse Parnassus shows,
By brooklet, grove, or glen,
To my imagination glows
Less brightly than my Pen!
Hurrah! the lusty Pen,
Companion meet for men!

I sing the Pen, the lusty Pen,
The shield, the sword, of trustful men!
Once barons bold at Runnymede,
Their "spiriting" did well,
Invoked its sanction to their deed,
While tyrants own'd the spell.
Should barons bold in turn oppress
Stouthearted, poor, good men,
The Charter where we seek redress
Is none but Her's—the Pen.
Hurrah! the lusty Pen,
The Champion stout of men!

I sing the Pen—the lusty Pen,
Weapon of wrong'd, resentful men.
When taxlords, lawlords, landlords meet,
In privilege secure,
And league to stint the millions' meat,
And grind in dust God's poor.
What takes the Tory clique aback?
What gives their chiefest pain?
What deals them many a hearty whack?—
The flagellating Pen.
Hurrah! the lusty Pen,
Apt scourge for cruel men!

I sing the Pen, the lusty Pen,
Life, liberty, to needful men.
To crown and crozier bent we down
Long years—mere slaves, in sooth;
Our crozier's now the Pen alone,
The crown we bow to, Truth.
Kingcraft and Priestcraft, hand in hand,
Skulk back into their den;
Not magic owns more forceful wand,
Than disenchanting Pen.
Hurrah! the lusty Pen,
Liege sovereign of men!

I sing the Pen, the lusty Pen,
That gives the heart to fearful men.
Pale Ghost, dark Goblin, hence, avaunt!
Your "occupation's gone;".
Mind's Sun is risen, nor may ye haunt
The precincts of the dawn.
Night visitants, ye gibe and mow
No more—the monkish chain
Ye cast o'er man is rent, I trow,
By dint of honest Pen.
Hurrah! the lusty Pen,
Emancipating men!

I sing the Pen, the lusty Pen,
That stills the feuds of wrathful men.
The heart is curs'd—the crime of Cain
Dries up its kindliest dews,
And Abel's blood, with vengeful stain,
The earth with slaughter strews.
Brother slays brother:—thus no mo
Shall war shed blood of men.
No streams in fight shall henceforth flow
But those from nib of pen.
Hurrah! the lusty Pen,
True peacemaker of men!

I sing the Pen, the lusty Pen,
Best balm for Cupid's woful men.
When the blue eyes of some sweet girl
Play havoc with our hearts,
And forth from every clustered curl
Some latent mischief darts,
What anodyne may cure the ill
And give back health to men?
The virtue of a grey goose quill—
The soft proposing Pen.
Hurrah! the lusty Pen,
That winneth Love for men!

I sing the Pen, the lusty Pen,
The trust of the world's hopeful men.
It rights the wrong, makes weakness strong,
Where'er its flag 's unfurled;
And mind with mind it links in long
Enweavement round the world.
Earth's complicated woes removes,
Brings Eden back again,
Breathes only brotherhoods and loves—
God speed thee, noble Pen!
Hurrah! the lusty Pen,
Best friend of gods and men!

A DECADE FOR THE CHOLERA.

"Clap on the cataplasm."—Monsieur Thomas.

Toll for the loved departed
A glad, though muffled knell;
They died not broken-hearted,
Though suddenly they fell:
They heard no sounds of gladness
Mock widows as they wept,
They felt not hunger's madness,
But full, and hoping, slept:—
Their thoughts, though sad, were holy:
No famine-tortured mind
Knew its own sorrows solely,
But sympathised—was kind.
Though that sad year proved ungrateful,
'Twas welcomed at its birth;
Its malignity seemed hateful,
Yet joy was at the hearth.

It came with summer's presage,
More secure to strike the blow,
Without a stormy message,
Or island built of snow;
From cottage to the palace,
From infancy to age,
The humblest felt its malice,
The "noblest" feared its rage.

Fond ties—the strongest—nearest—
Were broken at a sweep,
And many of the dearest
Found their everlasting sleep.

There a father, or a mother,
Where all had used to meet,
Or a sister, or a brother,
Have left "a vacant seat;"

The maid sunk o'er her lover,
The bridegroom o'er his bride;
Beneath their earthy cover
They now lie side by side,
For ere they were forsaken
Whom Love had tended well,
The watcher's strength was taken,
And loved and loving fell.

All wept;—but now the harvest
Of England's "surplus" sons,
Cries, "Cholera! thou starvest;
Devour the cankerous ones:
Thy plough-share to the furrow,
Thy harrow to the plain,
Where the bloated vermin burrow,
Who rob us of the grain:

"Oh, leave us not to linger,
Palsied in strength and mind;
Stretch thy spasmodic finger
And snatch us from our kind;
Thy gripe hath less of terror,
It breeds no famine-worm;—
Life-love is all an error
When Hope can yield no germ:—

"What hope for shrunken sinews?
Wealth's mildew, with the rot
Of purchased Power continues,
——Old England's leprous spot—
Destroying God's best blessing,
The yellow harvest fields;
Drying, while babe's caressing,
The milk the bosom yields!

"Emit, then, jungles—Nigers—
Contagion in a flood;
Fell us, so fall the tigers
Who live upon our blood;
Come Plague, with all thy evils;
Come Typhus—dreadful breath—
The human demi-devils
Have power o'er all but Death;

"Welcome to us! and batten;
Destruction brings no dread
Save to the fiends who fatten
Upon the poor man's bread.
Round them your horrors wreathing,
Be busy night and morn,
Leave not a locust breathing,
To blast the future corn;

"For no pity can we render
Where we no pity find;
Is vengeance ever tender?
Despair, can it be kind?
Ere comes the howling winter,
God! change, or chase;—or then
Their vintage finds a vinter
In us, famine-maddened men.

"So, toll for the departed
A glad, though muffled tone.
They died not broken-hearted
When worn to wasted bone;
They heard no ruler's gladness
While doomed to starve and mourn,
No stern revengeful madness
Was in their musings borne." J. A. O.

THE EMIGRANT'S SONG.

[AIR—"Hence to the Happy Land."]

Cheer, brethren, cheer,
We seek a brighter sky;
Brethren, dry the falling tear,
'Tis from misery we fly.

Our Fatherland no more 's a home
For those that would be free;
The poor are robbed, the meek oppressed,
By the sons of Tyranny.
Then cheer! brethren, cheer,
We seek a brighter sky;
Brethren, dry the falling tear,
'Tis from misery we fly.

The ruthless tyrants of the soil,
The plunderers of the poor,
The iron grasp which binds the land,
Oppress us shall no more.
Then cheer! brethren, cheer!
We seek a brighter sky;
Brethren, dry the falling tear,
'Tis from misery we fly.

Their pomp and pageantry we loathe,
Their minions we despise;
Their prancing cars are bought with blood,
With the widow's tears and cries.
Then cheer! brethren, cheer!
We seek a brighter sky;
Brethren, dry the falling tear,
'Tis from misery we fly.

One sigh we heave—one tear we shed,
As we sail from Scotia's shore;
That sigh, that tear 's for our Fathers' graves—
We shall visit them no more.
But cheer! brethren, cheer!
We seek a brighter sky;
Brethren, dry the falling tear,
'Tis from misery we fly.

Each bounding billow heaves us,
To a free and happy home;
The rustling of the rising breeze
We hail as freedom's song.
Then cheer! brethren, cheer!
We seek a brighter sky;
Brethren, dry the falling tear,
'Tis from misery we fly.

POETRY OF THE AFFECTIONS.

VISITS TO GRAVES.—NO. I. THE STUDENT'S GRAVE.

"He has outscar'd the shadow of our night."

I stood beside his low and lonely grave
When the bright sun shed noontide beams around;
Lighted the grey-worn church, and show'd each nook
And sheltered spot of that old burying-ground.

The fresh grass springing, and the young buds bursting,
As they could know of change and blight no more,
But added to the grief which shook my bosom:
I had not stood beside his grave before.

The simple stone told only of the lineage
And name, and age of him who slept below;
And straggling weeds were growing o'er the inscription
Carved by rude hands a few short months ago.

Those cold sods weigh'd upon a heart as gentle
As ever bless'd the weary ways of earth,
And press'd upon a brow as broad and noble
As ever gave the thoughts of genius birth.

From early childhood had his soul been thirsting
With that deep fever which such minds endure;
The zeal for knowledge, and high aspirations
After things beautiful, and good and pure.

There was no grief or gloom within his bosom:
He look'd on Nature with a lover's eye,
And drank the light of beauty which was streaming
From every varied form in earth and sky.

And dreams of far renown were his heart's visions
Through years of studious toil and weary thought;
And offering up his fresh youth on Fame's altar,
He deemed her smile was all too cheaply bought.

No clouds of dark mistrust came o'er his spirit
To mar the future which he fondly formed ;
With Hope's far gaze he look'd on glory's summits,
As heights his genius had already storm'd.
And midnight studies o'er the works of sages
Had streak'd with grey his locks of raven hair ;
And written on that forehead's glorious surface
The wrinkles of deep watching thought and care.
But what were these to him ? his proud ambition
Look'd to the future for its guerdon high ;
And yielded up his health, strength, youth, and beauty,
For the blest name the world would not let die.
Already had his early works, though nameless,
Rais'd a new train of thought the nation o'er ;
And anxious minds had turn'd to that new teacher,
Eagerly asking and expecting more—
When Death's dread bolt fell on him, and the fever,
Which haunted his young life, fed on its powers ;
The mind which grasp'd infinity, resided
In a frail form which number'd o'er its hours.
And he whose highest aspirations pointed
To earthly fame, turn'd trembling now to Him
Who show'd that, to the mighty future opening,
Earth's highest powers and proudest names were dim.
In that fell hour I saw him—I had dreaded
The anguish of that soul check'd in its might,
The passionate longing for fresh life, and horror
Of the dark coming and mysterious night.
But all was calm ; and deep and strong reliance
Upon God's goodness, mixed with the desire
To know the mighty secret of our being,
And to draw near to our Eternal Sire—
Had superseded all the earnest craving
Which once was his, to build himself a name;—
An immortality was dawning on him,
Which render'd dim and shadowy that of fame.
Nature still held her place—her charms undying
Yielded a sense of rapture near to pain ;
For waving grove and murmuring rill repeated,
" Thou wilt not look upon my face again !"
He died—and rustic hands and toil-bow'd shoulders
Consign'd him to the humble bed,—where sighing
From the green branches of the trees wind-shaken,
Was the sole wailing o'er his grave low lying.
The shadow of the church, as late I linger'd,
Fell o'er its turf, and gave the only gloom
Which, in that day of summer pomp and gladness,
Seem'd to befit the sadness of the tomb.
And though his lot seems mournful—yet in spring-time,
Before one hope had blossom'd thus to perish,
With all his gifts to go down lone, forgotten,
Leaving not one his memory to cherish—
Who will deny that from such graves are springing
Profounder truths and lessons more sublime,
Than all the gifted pens of bards and sages
Have sent to float along the tide of Time?
Who has not caught from dying lips and glances
An impulse winning him to thoughts more true,
And deeds more sacrificing, pure and tender,
Than till that hour he ever dream'd or knew ?
And when the gifted stand on Death's dark threshold,
They surely feel the wish that fill'd their spirit
To win a name—to be a form more humble
Of the great hope that all live to inherit !
Peace to the slumbers of the early dying !
Peace to the mind that pour'd its wealth too fast !—
Already has oblivion, creeping slowly,
Mix'd him with shadows of the buried past !
Sweet may his rest be, in that green, old churchyard !
May children's footsteps lightly on him fall;
And the lark's singing, and the loud wind's murmur,
Steal o'er the spot soften'd and musical !
Better that calm, deep sleep than high aspirings !
Better its silence than wide-spread renown !
And better far in bright worlds to press onwards,
Than wear on earth fame's freshest, fairest crown !

WILT THOU REMEMBER ?

Wilt thou remember me when I am gone ?
Say, wilt thou weep when I am far from thee ?
Let all the world forget, so thou alone
Wilt give me place within thy memory.

Remember me, when, in the hour of sadness,
Thou fain would'st have a friend to weep with thee;
And sometimes, in thy careless hours of gladness,
Pause for a moment, and remember me.

Though smiles around thy beauteous lip be wreathing,
Though thy light laugh should echo through the hall,
Though many round thee flattery are breathing,—
Remember me ! thy heart will spurn it all.

Remember me in the soft summer's eve,
And let me be remembered with a sigh;
The very fragrance of the flowers will grieve
Thee, raising sad thoughts of days gone by.

Remember me when the night-winds are sighing,
Think that my name is echoed in their tone;
And when their voice is slowly, sadly dying,
Bow down thy head, and weep for him that's gone !

Remember me when thou art sad and weary,
And fain would'st weep, although thou know'st not why.
When all without and all within seems dreary,
Then breathe my name, and breathe it in a sigh !

Remember me when, starting from thy sleep,
And happy dreams of hopes and days long past,
A long-forgotten voice sounds sad and deep
Above the loudest, dreariest, wintry blast.

Remember me when friends have wronged, deceived thee;
When the cold world repels, remember me !
Then think, with tears, of him who ne'er had grieved thee,
Whose heart was true, although unprized by thee.

If ever, in a mirthful, joyous hour,
Some voice should chance to sing that gentle strain,
Then, then remembrance will assert her power,
And thou shalt weep, remembering me again !

Sadly the well-known chords will meet thine ear,
Sadly my voice will echo in each tone.
What then, though bright and gay thy smiles appear !
Thy heart will throb, and ache for him that's gone.

Thou shalt remember me ! for many ties
Will chain my image to thy memory,
And tears unbidden often shall arise,
And thou shalt find their source in thoughts of me!

Thou shalt remember me ! an aching heart
Must sometimes, in a joyous scene, be thine;
And suddenly, as from a dream, thou'lt start,
Thinking thou hear'st a voice resembling mine.

Thou shalt remember me ! thou canst not blot
All that has past from out thy memory.
In weal or woe, whatever be thy lot,
Thou canst not choose but still remember me !

STANZAS TO A STILL-BORN INFANT.

Oh, born to light, though not to life, my child—
My child, sweet sharer of my wayward fate—
For thee my harp, in silence long exiled,
Once more shall wake, lingering albeit and late
The lay—though nought avail to dissipate
The shadows which thy destiny enfold,
To fix those hues, brief even in fancy's date,
Reft pledge of earliest love—(the heart's hidden gold)—
Sealed spring of thousand hopes, and sympathies untold.

Thou blighted bud of being—if to be Indeed were thine, (thus dubious all we deem,) Tears have been shed, and pangs endured for thee,
And thou of prescient cares wert ceaseless theme;
And these and thou have passed alike—a dream
Of tenderness, all dim and unrevealed;
An unformed thought of love—an orient beam,
Beneath the horizon quenched—a mystery sealed—
A spiritual fount even at its sacred source congealed.

Earth has its due—what certain life hath more,
  Than waits on thy less surely quickened clay?
So the far wave, too weak to win the shore,
  Blends pure with ocean's deep its idle spray,
  The mightier bears the taint of earth away;
Imagination, too, of what had been,
  Shapes yet her mystic tracery day by day;
How like some lucid lake, where oft, at een,
Mirrors the illimitable arc its multitudinous sheen.

In tranquil miniature, upon thy face
  And taintless brow it had been mine to gaze,
And watch thy mother's form reimaged there,
  And her deep eyes in thine renew the rays;
  Or how the head—thy little world—might raise
A fane, where aspirations high should dwell,
  Even such as were thy sire's in other days,
Safe from the mortal chill which those befell—
Such may no longer be—and thus, perchance, 'tis well.

Pass thou unwept: even that beloved breast
  Whence thou hadst drunk young life, may now be calm:—
What hast thou lost?—nay, what hadst thou possessed?
  A sea of bitterness—a drop of balm.
  Hath hope no solace now?—hath love no charm?—
Pain hath no terror to a doom like thine:
  Dear purchase asks the strangely envied palm.
Few win—who win with life, with life resign.
Happy thy wakeless rest—ah, happier deemed if mine!

THE GRANDAME—A FRAGMENT.

Eighty summers o'er her head
Have passed,
Yet still she walks the earth
With lightsome step.
No cares harass her guileless heart,
Nor pondered woes, nor gloomy thoughts
Are nourished in her mind.
By blazing fire and happy hearth,
She sits contentment;
And o'er the youthful faces
That surround her seat
Sheds mirth and joyful wonder.
With tales oft told,
But ever willing heard,
She feeds their greedy fancy:
How knights of old,
By deeds of arms and prowess great,
Had conquered and had won;
How beauteous dames,
With grateful arms, and praises loud,
Received them.
Or, sooth to say, some other theme
Might charm the wondering child:
How daring youth,
With 'venturous heart
And eager soul,
Attacked a giant fell,
Whose deeds of blood
And savage mien
Struck horror dread and deep.
Or to some wild and mournful tale,
She'd change with glistening eye;
And tell how, on the foaming deep,
'Midst lightning's flame
And thunder's peal,
A shattered bark was driven:
How loud the shriek
And fierce the yell
That burst from every breast,
As, on the rock,
The trembling ship
Is dashed with frightful force.
With these and other moving tales
She'll pass the winter's night;
Then, as the hour draws
Nigh for rest,
Their minds she'll turn above,
And paint to each
The holy joy
That there awaits the good.
Her aged hands she'll now employ
Their simple dress
To doff;
And then to kneel
With fervent mind,
Directs the willing child.
In lisping accents
Sweet, their prayer
She hears with purest pleasure;
And in her arms,
With fond embrace,
Craves blessings
On their head.
* * * *
The child's delight,
The mourner's stay,
The ever ready friend;
May sweetest bliss
And endless joy
Such virtue always find! N.

NOT WORDS, BUT FLOWERS.

By SPENCER HALL, the Sherwood Forrester.

Bring me a poem, Betsy love,
  Not writ in words, but flowers,
Gather'd from lane, and field, and grove,
  In May's delicious hours:
For I full oft have known thee show
  Poetic taste and skill,
In making wreaths of wild-flowers glow
  Harmonious to thy will.

Bring then, a wild, sweet poem bring,
  That to the heart will bear
Whate'er of blossom-bursting spring
  The memory holds most dear!
Let its first verse be golden broom,
  Its next a white-thorn spray,
Its third a wild-rose in full bloom,
  From some green bowery way:

For these will 'mind me much of thee,
  While from the future turning
To long-gone hours of ectasy,
  Ere thou wert wan with mourning:
Ev'n Hope itself will backward steal,
  Charmed by such emblems gay,
And brightlier smile, as they reveal
  Thy own life's lovely May!

Betsy, bring daisies from the hill,
  And cowslips from the valley—
Primroses from the wood-side rill,
  Where ring-doves love to dally—
And bluebells from beneath the boughs
  That o'er the warm bank spread;
Where violets breathe their sweetest vows,
  And bine and bramble wed.

Bring from yon blackbird's choral shade,
  Where gladdest sounds are born,
A branch of blossomy crab, array'd
  In hues that mock the morn;
And fetch the full-orb'd king-cup bright,
  And meadow-lady, while
I stand and watch thee with delight
  From this old village stile.

And hie thee where broad chestnuts flower—
  Where oft, in life's young day,
We felt the rapturous evening hour
  Melt our fond thoughts away.
Then pull we down the waxlike cone,
  That blooms o'er one dear spot;
And thence bring, too, for joys far-flown,
  The sweet forget-me-not.

Betsy, my love! my heart of hearts!
  My muse! my life of life!
The word a thrill still new imparts,
  Whene'er I call thee—Wife!
There is a melody in flowers
  By thy light fingers strung,
In sunny fields or shadowy bowers,
  When the glad year is young!

And 'tis most sweet with thee to tread
Wherever they abound,
And catch the ectasy they shed
On everything around:
For wide o'er mountain, plain, and dell,
Their countless little blooms
Are stars, that sparkle to dispel
Life's sad and weary glooms.

Then thanks to thee, loved poetess!
The wreath by thee entwined
Bespeaks, in words of blessedness,
The beauties of thy mind!
For flowers—dear flowers—I love to greet
Their hues from spray or sod:
They are the language, mute though meet,
When Nature worships God!

GROUP III.
CLASSICAL AND REFLECTIVE POETRY.

HYMN TO "REASON."

The life of Man were a life in Death, without Reason.

The subjoined poem will be better understood, by the ordinary readers of poetry, from the few words explanatory of the motive-power of the piece, which we take the liberty to prefix, although they were intended only for the eye of the Editor.

[I submit to your judgment a few lines which I wrote upon rising from the perusal of the greatest work of the immortal Coleridge,—"The Friend":—for if the Reason be the only light and medium, in and through which alone we are made conscious and become partakers of the Eternal Truths which God has made the pillars of the world,—that which was written by Coleridge, solely for the purpose of directing men's thoughts and consciences to this momentous truth, (being in itself the ground of all other truths, the true fountain of all wisdom,) must surely be considered his greatest work. And the reflections of others, if they be sincerely reflections, however faint, of the same light, so far as they serve to awaken the minds of others to this true knowledge of themselves, and thus echo the eternal oracle—Γνῶθι σεαυτὸν—must have their uses. And I have no doubt, that you have often observed the true difference between the doctors of the true and the pseudo ethics, of all ages, to consist in this very important difference,—namely, that the false ever seek to draw men away from the contemplation of this divine inward light, which is the sole explanator of all other revelation, and confusing the judgment by taxing the understanding alone; and thus rendering them blind to their own powers and self respect, ever seek to make them dependent upon the dicta of others, the slaves of a system or a doctrine:—hence is Sophistry and Superstition in the place of Philosophy and Religion:—While all true Philosophy ever and ever appeals to all that is truly human in man, seeking to arouse the Light that shall give birth to the qualities that slumber rather than perish. "None can under-rate his merit: None can over-rate his Nature," says YOUNG, in one of his sublime passages.]

O Life, thou art a dark and troubled dream,
Dim-shadowing with thy wings our proper being,
Clouding the spirit that should shed its beam
Bright to the vision of our inward-seeing.

Yet not the less, my soul, I strive to raise
The film of matter from thy God-like eye,
That thou may'st know and feel His glorious rays
That light thy passage thro' Eternity!

Alas! how few those holy rays descry,— Crush'd by the Sense's vilest tyranny,
The herd's inglorious days roll vainly by Dark'ning the image of the Deity;

They never seek to know Life's solemn end,—
As they were creatures of a destiny;
And the calm Conscience, which should be a Friend,
Is alien to their hearts of vanity!

It is a mournful thought, O God! that they,
Whose souls are lighted by Thy smile divine,
Should seek to shadow that prolific ray,
They dwell in darkness, who were born to shine,

And to reflect thy heavenly light on high,
Th' eternal Reason, which we have from Thee,
Reason supreme, 'tis that alone whereby
We contemplate our own eternity!

For that, we know, must aye have shone supreme Ere the first dawning of created day,— Light Increate! thou cause of all would'st seem,
Efflux divine! thy nature who shall say!*

Ev'n as the clouds reflect the sun's bright ray,
Diffusing the glad light with varied hue,
And multiply the beams they cannot pay,
As in return some gratitude to show;—

So should the soul reflect the Reason's light,
The precious boon by God to mankind giv'n,
Grateful for that it never can requite,
Though it should make its own return to Heav'n!

Shine inward then, O glorious ray divine!—
For thou hast shone through all eternity,—
O! shine in me—for He has made thee mine,
One with my being and identity.

O! rise, my thoughts, in gratitude to Him
Who hath ordain'd my soul to dwell in thee,
O light! and let me triumph over sin,
And vindicate mine own divinity!

For what?—if He had never made thee mine,
Nor made me conscious of thy mystery,
My very life had crept o'er Earth supine,
The creature of a fated destiny!

The cattle grazing on the grassy lea,
The herb that flutters in the joyous wind,
Had met a fate as noble and as free;—
For they have sense—have life—but have not mind!

And what is mind but self lit up by thine
Eternal radiance? What the gift of thee,
But that all-living light, which aye must shine,
Where'er thou dwellest, in Infinity!

Thine are the rays that circle round the Throne,
Whence beams the glory of the Arch-Unseen!
Thine are the smiles He sheddeth on His own,
Raising the heart above this transient scene!

O mystic Conscience! thine Arch-angel cry,
Heard o'er the tumult of the world's vain noise,
I reverence; it is thy prophecy,
O Reason! warning with a prophet's voice;

The messenger of His Eternal Will
Of all that is, or has been,—having power
The loudest tumults of the heart to still,
And make e'en Ages seem a passing hour

"In the eternal silence!"†—Wherefore then
Do ye still dwell in darkness heedlessly?
O! wherefore do ye seek, children of men,
To darken down your own divinity?

O! know the Truth,—that this dark waste of years,
Which men call life!—this rock in Time's vast sea,
Which darkly frowns over its vale of tears,
Is not the proper resting-place for ye!

Your home is far away! Your native shore,
Where doth eternal summer ever shine,
Is lighted up, as it was told of yore,
With the primæval smile of Love Divine!‡

Ask your own hearts! and they will tell ye true,
Far truer ev'n than wisdom's golden page,
That the high fate which is design'd for you
Is onward progress thro' Eternal Age!

The Conscience, gifted with the eternal light
Of Reason shining thro' Eternity,
Is gifted with its nature, and of right
Partakes of Reason's own Infinity.

O ye, who move with Folly's thoughtless wheel,
Yourselves unknown, your own hearts unexplor'd,
Could ye your God-like nature truly feel,
No more would Folly be, but Self, ador'd.

* Reason, being in its nature self-affirmative, self-grounded, can never be understood in the true sense of the word "understand:" for, being spiritual in its nature, it cannot be subjected to the sensuous understanding. We possess it, and know that we possess it, as a special gift of God:—but the ray that beameth from His throne, who shall understand but God himself!

† Wordsworth. "Intimations of Immortality"—

"Our noisy years seem moments in the being Of the eternal silence."——

‡ See the beautiful Greek mythus of "the Creation out of chaos."

It is no less than truth, though it might seem
To thoughtless folly arrogance to say—
To folly shrinking from Light's inward beam,—
"None to himself doth his due homage pay!"

Yet pause, and think,—to contemplation grand
Pay your arrear, cast off your vanity,
Expatiate for a while in Thought's wide land,—
Land unexplored and all-unknown to ye;—

And to your hearts will glide an holy light,
Won from Reflection's ever-beaming ray,
And rouse your souls from their long, dreamless Night,
To the bright morning of eternal Day!

Arise, arise! the God within ye know!
Steep not the spirit in dull lethargy:
Virtue's high path ascend with lofty brow,
And vindicate your Immortality!

ADDRESS FROM THE SPIRIT OF ANCIENT PHILOSOPHY TO THE STUDENTS OF THE MORAL PHILOSOPHY CLASS IN THE UNIVERSITY OF ST. ANDREW'S.

Haste! oh haste! I have call'd ye long,
I shine through the mist of years;
A holy spirit pervades my shrine
To scatter doubts and fears:
I am rich with the glorious spoils of Eld,
With the lore of gifted seers.

I will strew, as I tread your cloister'd hall,
The visions which Plato drew:
O how my heart thrill'd with delight—
Perchance they might be true!
They will stir your thoughts like Music's swell:
Such dreams ye never knew.

We'll bend o'er the Stagyrite's* noble dust;
But no tear shall dim our eye;
A colder spirit congeals the drop
And checks the rising sigh;
For a haughty Stoic marks our grief—
Zeno is standing by.

Come, then, I'll lead your willing feet,
Not by Castalia's stream,
Not to the vale where Peneus glides
And Tempe's marbles gleam;
But through a fresher nobler maze—
The groves of Academe.

There Epicurus, great and good,
His mental feast shall spread;
Take from his hand yon talisman,
Thy cares—thy griefs are fled:
Then pluck that fragrant myrtle green,
And wreathe it round thy head!

And see! clad in Egyptian stole,
The Samian sage appears.
It is—it is Pythagoras
His God-like form uprears,
And bears that brow where swell sublime
The garner'd thoughts of years.

Behold—my pride—yon care-worn wight!
No genius lights his eye,
But call to mind the poison-cup—
His high philosophy;—
Hush! I will summon Socrates,
He'll teach you how to die.

Yet kneel not blindly!—would ye scan
The page of Destiny?
Ah! none with me may seek to cross
The dark unhallow'd sea
That rolls before her gloomy hall,—
The shrine of Mystery.

Nor will I tempt your vagrant steps
Where Elean Pyrrho trod—
The man who doubted e'en his doubts,
Himself,—his soul,—his God.
Ah! no,—I ne'er would tempt your feet
On such a cheerless road.

But when Misfortune rains her ills
On your devoted head,—
When Calumny's envenom'd web
Around your fame is spread,—
When all the ties that bind to Earth
Are rudely severed,—

When, hanging o'er a dying friend,
Thy heart is chill and drear,—
When prostrate o'er his wasted corpse,
You groan upon the bier;—
I will be there to soothe thy grief
And wipe away the tear.

Should pale-faced Envy raise her head,
And hiss upon thy name,—
Should wild ambition fire thy breast,
With reckless, ruthless flame;—
I'll shield thee from thyself and foes,
Thy saviour—still the same.

Be thou my child! thy head shall tower
Among thy compeers high,
Sublime as yonder hoary piles
That frown unto the sky;
Pleasure and Peace thy constant guests,—
O calmly thou shalt die.

Be thou my child! the priceless mines
Of THOUGHT I will disclose—
A wondrous gem,—the HUMAN MIND—
Its duties,—all it owes;
A cure for all its little pride—
A balm for all its woes.

Then haste! oh haste! I have called ye long,
I shine through the mist of years;
A holy spirit pervades my shrine,
Dispelling doubts and fears;—
'Tis I alone can nerve the heart
And dry the mourner's tears.

* Aristotle.

ALTERI SÆCULO PROSINT.

They slumber, and are bound and blinded—they
The lords of earth—perchance the heirs of heaven—
And who their Dalilahs? doth fiend or fay
Flutter the vampire wing to lull and slay?
Stirs aught around their couch the poppied air
Which steals the frame throughout, a subtle leaven,
Rendering it strengthless to resist or bear?
Lo you—a dæmon triad—ever near
The food lethargic—Ignorance, Penury,
And Superstition—that hoar hag, whose brow
Glares bloody through the veil of mystery
She shrouds her hideousness withal—these three,
Prime progeny of sloth obscene, who now,
In loathsome interunion linked strong,
Do reproduce their parent ceaselessly;
Man slumbers, and these bind him—God! how long?

They slumber, and are bound and blinded, who Draw ease, wealth, luxury from that vile trance.
The many slumber: have the wakeful few—
Self-deemed such—no vigilant tyrants too,
Whose stern behests fulfil they? Speed Thy glance
O'er the throng universe and know uncraved
Still man's twain destinies one—to enslave or be enslaved.

Yea, destinies: though man have wrought them first,
Yet such the intricacy of the chain,
So strictly knitted round his heart and brain,
That he, albeit self-trammelled, cannot burst
His fetters and be free—be man again—
Save by the laggard Patience, and a still Indomitable energy of will,
Defensive warfare he be taught to wage,
And bid far-sighted Prudence forth, a guide
To pilgrim Reason, scattering far and wide
(While echoless as snow her footstep falls,)
The immortal seeds of truth—revivified,
Which may work marvels to another age,
Yet leave the present hopeless, cureless thralls.

Must we then only live to life blaspheme,
Poor toys of destiny, a stricken race?
To me much meditating on this theme,
Whene'er with aching brow and heart I trace
The history of man and man's disgrace,
(These ever one in deed, and oft in name,)
Through passive ages of endurance base,
A record apathy should write alone;
Or on the crimsoned page, whose letters flame
And sword have graven,—every word a groan—
The past brings agony, the present shame.
Slaved by thyself, whom none might else enslave,
Nature had formed thee for high things—the boon
Thy fathers lost—hast thou redeemed it? Knave,
Fool, tyrant to thyself alike—thy noon
Of opportunity hath ceased to shine—
All present antidote defies thy bane—
Freedom were but thy malison—such shrine
As thou that holiest offering would deprave:
Vain are thy startled slumbers—vain the throes
Convulsive of thy being, ere it close;
Thy dust perchance may nurture hope—but vain
Even hope to thee of aught beside the grave.
Vain for thyself—oh, not all vain for thine.

THE WISH.

Oh! give me matchless eloquence,
And words of thrilling fire,
And with the breath of Poesy
My panting breast inspire!
I would not lay me in the grave,
The being of a day,
To join the crowd of nameless dead,
As nameless as are they.
Perhaps when I sleep quietly
Beneath the waving grass,
The passer by may mark the spot,
And linger ere he pass.
I care not for the sorrowing
Of those who knew me here;
Ah! they may drop upon my grave
Full many a bitter tear.
But e'en the dearest must forget:
Grief quickly passes by:
The flower they planted on my grave
Will like their sorrow die;—
While if the world has heard of me,
By aught that I have done,
My brow shall wear eternally
The wreath it may have won.

LEGENDARY, TRADITIONAL, AND SCOTTISH POETRY.

THE PETRIFIED WEDDING.—A SOMERSETSHIRE LEGEND.

[On my visiting the druidical remains which are disposed in circles in a field or meadow at Stanton Drew,* and which druidical remains no doubt gave name to the village, I inquired of mine hostess with whom I abode, the why and wherefore of these remarkable relics. Her answer may be found in the following lines; and as a proof that every strange story is not incredible, I may state, that the inhabitants (I mean the peasantry) most firmly believe, and strenuously maintain, the story of the Wedding Party being turned into stones for their impiety in profaning the Sabbath.]

'Twas on a morning fair and bright
As ever yet blest human sight—
A Sabbath May-day morn, when Earth
Looks fresh as at her virgin birth—
Our old church bells sent forth a sound
That rous'd the neighbouring hamlets round;
For well you know a marriage peal
Will drooping Sorrow's eye unseal,
While hearts that never knew a sigh,
And eyes whose lids are ever dry,
Ope but to greet, or heave to bless,
The candidates for happiness.
No wonder, then, that Stanton Drew
Sent forth her children not a few,
For Time is different now and then,
Where we name one they reckon'd ten.
So young and old, and rich and poor,
Came trooping round the old church door,
And wondering, ask'd impatiently—
For whom that merry peal might be?
Yet none made answer, save they knew
They might not be of Stanton Drew.

Some baron bold, or doughty knight,
From Palestine's red field of fight,
With Syrian maiden nobly won
In Joppa, or in Ascalon;
Or doting eld, by fancy led
With some young innocent to wed,
Comes here, asham'd at home to stay,
To celebrate his wedding day;
Or spendthrift who, to widow old,
Barters his name for brighter gold.

Thus Wonder, fed by faint surmise,
Stood gaping with distended eyes;
Nor least when laughter, long and loud,
Burst on the sight-expecting crowd,
And strange wild voices rais'd a cry
That told the sight was drawing nigh.
Then 'twas old Age confounded stood,
For that wild laughter spoke no good;
For how mistimed, misplaced, is mirth,
That jests on consecrated earth,
As they shall rue in Heav'n's own hour,
Who mock His name, or slight His power.
Then 'twas that matrons, wedded there,
Turn'd red with rage, and pale with fear;
And fair young maids, old Stanton's pride,
Press'd closer to their lovers' side—
Deeming, be sure, that state unblest,
Whose vows are followed by a jest,
Much wondering that the holy roof
Crush'd not these objects of reproof.
But, 'tis not ever wilful sin
Doth swiftly condemnation win;
Sure not immediate—Vengeance kills
Not as we deem, but as she wills.
Hark! creaking opes the cumbrous door,
Loud grating on the marble floor;
And every eye is fix'd to see
Who these rude revellers may be.
Then 'twas that Expectation took Astonishment's bewilder'd look;
For how might Reason justly pair
Black Sin with those bright creatures there!
First, fifteen smiling maidens came,
Their age alike, their looks the same;
Each with a basket in her hand,
Snow-white the dresses of the band;
Their number showed, what some would hide,
The summers of the wedded bride.
In threes they came, in threes they past,
Sweet singing, as their flowers they cast,
A song to Venus—Queen of Love,
Instead of hymns to God above.
Next came the bridegroom and his bride,
All beauty, loveliness, and pride.
In green and gold the youth was drest,
A sword his knightly rank confest;
And high in air above his head,
A snowy plume wide waving spread.
Lock'd arm in arm, with stately stride,
He led his fair and lovely bride.
His lovely bride! O words are weak
That matchless maiden's charms to speak.
Her look, her air, her shape, her mien,
Were all we fancy Beauty's Queen
Possest, when she, as poets sung,
From Ocean's foam to being sprung;
Or might appear, if once again
For earth she left the starry plain,
And stood to human sight confest
A goddess as a woman drest.
Clad in a robe of purest white,

* Stanton Drew is a small village between six and seven miles distant from Bristol.

Her beauty took the ravish'd sight;
So bright, so spotless, was the show,
You might esteem it woven snow;
And yet so soft, so thin, and clear,
As is the summer's noon-tide air.
Her hair was like full-ripen'd corn,
Deck'd with the dew-drops of the morn,
For there were laid among the curls
Rich strings of glittering orient pearls.

Next came six maidens two and two,
All fair and comely to the view;
Their bosoms bare, their zones unbound,
Their brows with myrtle blossoms crown'd.
These were the bridesmaids,—and, I ween,
A stranger sight was never seen
In these our days, or those of yore,
Come from a consecrated door.
The sun shone clear, the sun shone bright:
In truth it were a goodly sight,
But on this holy day, to see
So glad and gay a company.
They left the church, they left the road,
They left wherever men abode,
And as across the fields they went
Uprose afresh their merriment.
They came beneath a spreading tree,
To them a welcome canopy;
And there they sung in jocund strains,
A song tradition still retains.
To them all other themes above
The wilful waywardness of love.

Let others, slaves to custom still,
The dictates cold she bids fulfil:
We minister to lordly will
For aye and ever.

Love knows no bonds except his own,
By this his birth divine is shown:
Attempt to bind him, he is flown
For aye and ever.

Life reft of love is nothing worth—
A plague, a pestilence, a dearth;
But with him, what a heav'n is earth
For aye and ever!

Love comes as comes the morning bright,
Love goes as goes the evening light,
And none may stop his purposed flight
For aye and ever.

'Twas thus they sung beneath the tree,
To them a welcome canopy;
Then on their way delighted went,
With jest, and laugh, and merriment.
Not far they past, when they espied
A fiddler by their pathway side—
A drunken knave unknown to few,
That lived in honest Stanton Drew.
Outstretched asleep, he snoring lay:
What was to him the Sabbath day?
Two things alone he counted dear,
Namely, his fiddle and his beer.
But God's commands are vilified
As much by drunkenness as pride;
As they shall find, to their dismay,
Who desecrate the Sabbath day;
For high or low, vice is the same—
The only difference is the name.

"A dance, a dance!" the bridegroom cried—
"A dance, a dance!" exclaimed the bride—
"A dance, a dance!" the maidens all
Did in one voice together call.
The word had magic in its sound;
Uprose the fiddler with a bound,
Amazed, and yet right glad to see
So fair and bright a company.
"What do you choose, good sir?" said he,
"There's scarce a tune unknown to me;
But name your choice, and I will play,
E'en though it be the Sabbath day."
"There is a tune," the bridegroom cried,
Which some may fear, and others chide;
But yet, it matters nought to me,
Nor to this goodly company.
We call it 'Dian's dear delight,'
Since best it suits the moony night.
But others, knave, and thou as well,
Ascribe it to the Prince of Hell.
Be this thy task, and thou shalt win
Our gold; so instantly begin."

The maidens form'd a circle wide,
Each with her basket by her side.
The bride and bridegroom hand in hand
Within that joyous circle stand.
The bridesmaids fair with myrtles crowned,
Their bosoms bare, their zones unbound,
Stand tiptoe, three on either side,
Beside the bridegroom and the bride.
The fiddler touch'd his instrument,
And on and on the dancers went.
With graceful step, and blithesome spring,
They make the circuit of the ring.
The circling maids, too, dance around,
With joy's own light fantastic bound.
Light as the clouds upon the sky,
They seem to float, they seem to fly.

The sun shone clear, the sun shone bright
In truth it were a goodly sight,
But on this holy day, to see
So gay and glad a company.

Now, mark the judgment—mark it well,
That on these impious dancers fell!
No light'ning flash'd—no thunders roll'd—
To scare the weak, or fright the bold;
Earth open'd not her mouth, as erst
She did on Korah's tribe accurst;
No tempest howl'd among the trees;
No deadly blast came on the breeze;
No rain-storm dread his stores unbound,
As when he Noah's neighbours drowned.
The daisy with unmoisten'd eye
Look'd upward smiling to the sky.
The king-cup, in his vestment bright,
Stood glistening in the morning light.
The grass had on its Emerald sheen—
May's own dear rich delightful green;
And all below, and all above,
Look'd only as Love looks on love.

Twice round the ring they circling past,
And now prepare they for the last.
"A merrier note!" the bridegroom cries.
"A merrier note!" the bride replies.
"A merrier note!" the maidens all,
In one loud voice together call.
The fiddler bows, his hand is on;
There was a note, but, lo! 'tis gone:
The dance that was afresh begun
Is over ere the dance is done.
The bridegroom as he clasp'd his bride—
The tiptoed maids on either side—
The fiddler, as his bow he sent
Across the sounding instrument—
The cirling ring that seem'd to fly
Light as the clouds across the sky—
All, all, no sign, no warning given,
By outrag'd Earth, or angry Heav'n;
Smote by stern Vengeance, dread and dire,
Whose motion was as flashing fire;
Without a sigh, without a groan,
Stood still and stiffen'd into stone.

There are who may this tale esteem
As some craz'd poet's idle dream;
A phantasy of madness born—
A thing that Wisdom holds in scorn—
A shadowy scene, a vision caught
From the vain realms of vainer thought.
Yet, 'tis not so: I only tell
What once Tradition says befell
In ages past. But false or true,
The stones remain in Stanton Drew.

THE WEE VOYAGER.

[On seeing a notice in a Scotch paper, that a vessel had discovered a hare floating in the Firth of Forth, upon a sheet of ice, to the ocean.]

An' whar' are ye gaun, ye wee voyager,
At e'en whan it 's sae late ?
An' whar' are ye gaun, ye wee voyager,
On sic an eerie gate ?

Ye're sailin' awa' in a cauld, cauld bark,
An' nae a frien' beside ye;
Ye're sailin' awa' in a cauld, cauld bark,
Without ane helm to guide ye.

Ye ha'e nae a mast, ye ha'e nae a sail,
Nor bield frae win' to hide ye;
The lift glowrs mirk, an' it threatens a gale,
Sae ill will sure betide ye.

The gloamin' is cauld, and the gurly sea
Is gapen to owertap ye;
The big pellocks soom, and the wild maws wing,
Watchin' to entrap ye.

The sun has now set in a blea, blea cloud,
Mirkness is comin' on;
There 's nae a stern in its hie, hie bauk,
Nor moon upon her throne.

The wraith o' the storm shows her grim, grim face,
The petrel skreighs aloud;
Sea an' yird look sick—lift gin it wad fa',
For Nature's fun'ral shroud !

Then whar'fore sail ye, in ye're frail, frail bark,
At sic unseemly hour ?
Come ye're ways wi' me, (the Skipper then said,)
Frae gurly Ocean's power.

An' his coggly punt the Skipper then launch'd
Upon the roarin' wave;
And stoutly he plied wi' his stumpy oar,
The wee voyager to save.

Then, glegly he reach'd the wee timid puss,
An' snatch'd her frae the flood;
An now the maukin that ance sail'd the sea
Rins i' the bonny green wood.

MADGE.

Madge is like a stately tower
Made of alabaster;
Ne'er without a cunnin' glower
Can the priest go past her.

Madge has aye a laughin' e'e,
Bless the kindly rays o't !
Could a weary wight like me
But secure the gaze o't ;

Then let howling storms affright
Sun and moon to madness :
Mine's a day that's ever bright,
Mine's a night o' gladness.

Then let scores o' crosses fa',
Gloomy cares a hunder :
Madge's mirth will gleam through a',
Like the nightly thunder.

Madge has aye a laughin' e'e,
Bless the kindly rays o't!
But a weary wight like me
Maunna bide the gaze o't.

O STANEHIVE IS A BONNIE, BONNIE TOUN !

O Stanehive* is a bonnie, bonnie toun,
From its quiet bay bright peeping;
'Twixt the rocks sae hard and bare,
Like a little Eden sleeping.
There ance lived a bonnie, bonnie lass,
And worthy was the man that got her ;
She was like the bonnie toun,
He the rocks of strong Dunottar.

She was mine by rights—a'e night
In the starry clear December,
She did squeeze my hand so warm,
Looked so kindly, I remember.
But for want of needfu' cash,
I was blate to tell my story ;
And so I lost my bonnie lass,
And anither cam' afore me.

Truth, she had a laughing e'e,
And her mou' was made for kissing;
Light her step, and when she spak'
Ilka word did seem a blessing.
O she was a bonnie, bonnie lass,
Worthy was the man that got her ;
Ne'er without a tear I pass
Sweet Stanehive, and strong Dunottar !

THE EMIGRANT'S REVISIT.

Twice twa-and-twenty autumn suns
Had clad the fields in waving grain,
When frae far distant lands I cam'
To see my youthfu' hame again.
E'en in that time, but little change
The outward face o' Nature wore:
There stood the trees; and through the glen
The burn sang sweetly as before.

But yet there was an unco change
Where'er I look'd—whate'er I saw;
In vain the watery e'e I strained
To see my father's ancient ha'.
An auld aik tree, or aiblins twa,
In spite o' Time, was still the same—
Was a' that stood to tell the place
O' my ance blithe and happy hame.

The weel-kent road adoun the park
I looked for, but couldna' see—
Where to the kirk, on Sabbath morn,
I've toddled by my faither's knee :
That park, the scene of childish glee,
Alas ! was noo nae langer green;
An' e'en the very kirk itsel'
Was changed frae what it ance had been.

I speer'd wi' friendly, kind regard,
For youthfu' cronies, ane or twae ;
They led me to the green kirkyard,
An' pointed where their ashes lay.
Ilk mound o' yirth they loot me see,
Some auld acquaintance slumber'd there :
I thocht my heavin' heart wad burst—
For oh, that heart was sair—was sair !

To see ance mair my native place,
I've sail'd across the stormy main;
An' oh ! I thocht some auld, kent face
Wad bid me welcome back again :
But a' my early friends are gane,
An' a' are strangers grown to me;
An' I am left alane, alane,
A sapless, bendin', wither'd tree.

LILT TO THE RISING SUN.

O whaur ha'e ye been, sun ? Whaur ha'e ye been ?
Last gloamin' ye seem't till ha'e mounted till hevin,
As ye drapt, like Elijah, upon the pale meen
The mantle o' glory unto thee given.

The young lambs are bleatin', the wild flow'rs are greetin'
Thy comin', and gladly the burn-trouts play ;
And the sky and the sea stan' like twins at thy knee;
Then why leuk sae dim, and sae dowie, and wae !

O what are ye, sun ? and what ha'e ye seen,
The lee lang nicht, in hevin hie ?
And what's a' adee 'mong the starlets keen,
That licht the lang lanes o' Eternity ?

O thou art the first flow'r o' hevin and time,
Plantit by God not to fade nor decay ;
There's nae cauld nor winter in thy fair clime—
Then why leuk sae dim, and sae dowie, and wae !

Thou hast traced wi' a pencil o' licht and o' flame,
The glory o' God on the far awa sea ;
And never a king had a choir to sing
On his bridal feast such as waiteth thee.

Then come frae thy eastern ha's, come wi' thy brichtness,
The waves will haud up yer' lang train as ye gae ;
Put on thy mantle o' beauty and lichtness,
And leuk nae mair dim, and dowie, and wae.

KILMAVEONAIG.

Lines written at Dunkeld in September 1841, on returning from a visit to Blair-Athole.

[Kilmaveonaig (the Gaelic etymology of which name I will not attempt to explain) lies immediately above the Pass of Killiecrankie, and forms part of the parish of Blair-Athole, but may here stand for the whole of the Blair. Its Episcopal chapel, belfry and ancient burial-ground, lying around the building, all form a singular memorial of the olden time.]

Dear Kilmaveonaig, thy braes are reposing
On Athole's proud bosom, so sunny and still;
I grieve that the winding Strathgarry is closing
Their light from my vision with forest and hill.
O'er hill and o'er forest, by distance decreasing,
Schehallion heaves proudly to view thee below :
O'er hill and o'er torrent, that rushes unceasing,
Look down the high summits of dark Ben-y-Gloe.
Like giants o'erwatching an infant in slumber,
The old mighty mountains stand silent around,
While songs from the streams flowing by without number,
At noontide and midnight thy lullaby sound.
Ye waters of Athole—the Tilt and the Garry—
O ne'er from the banks that embrace you depart,
Lest danger, and ruin, and sadness ye carry
On Kilmaveonaig, the place of my heart !
Ye winds, that through glen and in corrie are swelling,
Blow soft as ye cross it, or harmless if shrill,
But chasing the blight from the leaf, or dispelling
The cloud with its tempest, and mists that would chill !
And I, if misfortune befall not, to wither
The feelings that spring as its beauty I praise,
May often be journeying joyfully thither,
With heart that is fresh as the green of its braes !

THE AULD SCOTS SPRINGS.

The auld Scots springs, the dear Scots springs,
That in my childhood pleasured me :
How different frae the senseless things
Brought o'er fra France an' Italy !

Alas ! our ancient native tunes
Are known and relish'd now by few ;
These foreign follies rule the hour,
And still the cry is—Something new !

The music played in bower and hall,
O'er which our artists raptured bend,
It seems but wild confusion all,
Without beginning—middle—end.

With graceful turn, and melting close,
Our sweet and simple native airs,
They lull'd the infant to repose,
And soothed the man of silver hairs.

Their memory still is dear to me,
Fraught wi' the joys of " Auld lang syne ;"
My heart until the day I dee
Their lingerin' echoes winna tyne.

MISCELLANEOUS POETRY.

THE RIVALS.

Two rivals—young and aged—met
Within the fairy bay,
Where Beauty and her radiant set
Of smiles and glances play ;
The one was Love, so fond and fair,
The other, Gold, the millionaire.

" How's this," cried Gold,
" That Love's so bold,
A pirate on the coast
Where wealthy I
Have sovereignty,
As Beauty 's fain to boast ?"
Love curled his handsome lip with pride,
Said Gold was base, and basely lied ;
To which quoth Gold, " She can't endure
The beggar, Love,—the boy is poor."
Friends interposed,—the duel stay'd,
Wisely advising, " Try the maid :"
So, bending now in Beauty's bower,
Each ply'd her heart with all his power.

Love lit the beacons of his eyes,
And Beauty blushed with joy ;
Love uttered burning words and sighs,
Then Beauty kissed the boy ;
" Ah, Love !" she said, " come weal or woe,
With you alone through life I go."
The graceful youth
Believed it truth
And came forth gay and bold:
" Now, Sir, advance,"
With haughty glance
He said to scornful Gold.
Love's yellow rival bent his knee
To Beauty with a pedigree,
A casket, carriage, laqueys tall,
Soirée, and rout, and frequent ball ;
" Oho ! dear Gold !" false Beauty cried,
" I'll jilt fond Love and be your bride."
Gold tied the knot—Love left the shore.
Now, Love and Beauty meet no more.

STANZAS TO FANCY.

Seldom is the enchantment broken
Fancy doth around her cast,
Not a joy but leaves its token
Lovely-thrilling to the last;
Why of paceless bliss complain,
Doth not memory remain ?

Scarcely deeming why—delighted
Thought renews each vanished scene,
Joyance dimmed, expectance blighted,
Live they yet in what hath been,
Years remembered, shadows caught,
Rising in the " light of thought."

Music of the childhood hour
Wakes in many an after tone.
Hopes and terrors, passion's dower,
Never, never are they flown,
To the heart where once they rested,
Theirs a charm by time invested.

Silent paths of peaceful wanderings,
Falling leaf and changeful billow,
Streamlet's musical meanderings,
Margin sedge and silvery willow,
Varied each and lovely all,
As the visions they recall.

On the gentle brow or bosom
Is the token love hath placed,
Wakes not fantasies that blossom,
Mortal pen hath never traced,
He who wreathed it there is gone,
Lives his image still thereon.

Small their source, let none despise
Feelings " through the heart re-sent,"
Nothing boots it whence they rise,
'Tis the passion with them blent.
Pluck the lily from its stem,
Gaze not on the mantled stream.

Slumber ye in fancy's bower,
(Rapture's self is rapture's dream,)
Wreathing each phantasmal flower
In her witching twilight gleam,
Vision's brighter glow would chase,
Forms of light, and love, and grace.

Song and beauty wait ye there,
In that twilight universe,
Hers the realm whose spell-wove air
Thousand stars in light increase,
Realm where transport ever glows,
Realm of life without its woes.

Hers an atmosphere of passion,
Breathed by passionate souls alone,
Hope, the spirit's sole creation,
Lingering where her first rays shone,
Joy whose fragrant pinions light
Stir the gale that tracks her flight.

WRITTEN IN A GLADE IN EPPING FOREST.

BY CALDER CAMPBELL.

The circumstance doth still endear the scene!—
Yet, in these sunny glades, sweet moods of mind
'Midst fitful pains of body do I find;
And gather from green branches hopes as green,
That wither soon as culled! This woodland screen
Shuts out a world's disquiet:—I have heard
The banded nightingales, when there has been
The plenteous dew-fall on the grass, that stirred
With the cool breath of evening:—I have seen
The forest deer, bounding in liberty,—
And heard the cuckoo's dear, familiar call,
Which whistling blackbirds answered!—More than all,
The voice of Friendship hath, in accents free,
Spoke kindness to my heart:—Should I not grateful be?

SONNET.—TO A POET.

Like to the music of a rich-toned flute,
Breathed by the brink of some unruffled lake,
When all around is motionless and mute,
Thy sweet and plaintive melodies awake
Within the sanctuary of the heart,
A thrill such sounds and scenes alone impart.
The recollections of departed youth,—
The feelings cherished most in their decline—
Find echoes true in every word of thine;
And thou hast painted, in its native truth,
Nature's external aspect—dark or bright,
In vernal freshness in autumnal blight—
And viewed alike, with philosophic eye,
The humblest things on earth—the brightest in the sky!

ANNE.

TO A SWALLOW.

Bird of the restless wing!
From what Winter-home on a distant strand,
Where cold ne'er chills the glowing Spring,
Com'st thou to our fair land?
Hast thou cross'd the ocean,
And left behind that far off sunlit shore,
Again to please us with thy gladsome motion,
Till Summer's reign is o'er?
Didst thou, when far away,
Thy little clay-built nest still keep in sight;
Didst thou sometimes pine far our Summer's day,
And its calm tranquil night?
And did my own sweet home,
When far away, in thy memory dwell,
Didst thou, though forced by Winter's power to roam,
Still fondly love it well?
Thrice welcome art thou then,
Beneath my straw-thatch'd roof to build thy nest;
Till with the rose thou pass away again,
There undisturbed to rest.
Tell me, who hath taught thee,
Through the mid air to take thy wand'ring way?
What kind power hath hither brought thee,
At the appointed day?
Hast thou held on thy way,
The earth unseen, amid the gloom of night?
Hath the mystic star, with its glimm'ring ray,
Guided thy course aright?
How knew'st thou that the flowers
Were springing again from the spell-free'd earth,
And thine old friends in their verdant bowers
Were welcoming their birth?
Though Reason be not thine,
Nor knowledge gained in long and painful hours,
Yet our great Father-God, thy friend and mine,
Doth give thee wondrous powers.
He teacheth thee to tell
The time when thou shouldst quit our island shore;
He guides thee safely o'er the ocean's swell,
Above the wild waves roar.
The same all-seeing eye,
Whose sleepless glance is ever bent on thee—
The same all-powerful hand is ever nigh,
Watching and guiding me.
When Life's sun leaves the land
O'er Death's dark waves, amid the gloom of night,
He too will lead me with a gentle hand
Into the realms of light.

MADRIGAL.

Is not this world a world all bright
To souls whose love and life are one?
Twin sparkles of coeval light,
Twin chords in mystic unison;
One rude touch mars of each the tone,
Of each one cloud obscures the sheen;
Love vanished, life but lingers on,
Drear shade of all its past hath been.

Perchance to-morrow steals the rose
Of mortal loveliness away;
Yet why should he repine who knows
It brightly blooms for him to-day?
'Twere vain to anticipate decay
The true, fond heart would break to see;
Quenched in one shadow, eye and ray
Can each for other mourner be!

To blend with each one other heart,
Blend them inextricably one;
Lest to the joy of life to impart,
And soothe the pang it may not shun;
To win, and wear the wreath when won,
Accorded at thy sacred shrine:
These—these thy boon; beneath the sun
What palm—what prize—O love!—like thine!

How oft hath given the midnight deep,
To my voluptuous, vain caress,
One phantom form of joy, the lip,
The bosom's thrill and tenderness;
Still—still through waking hours no less,
For sleep doth learn of these its theme;
Sweet spirit of love and loveliness,
Be thou the heart's delicious dream!

A SERENADE.

The lonely heart divided far
From all it lived but to adore,
Is dark as night, whose brightest star
Is seen no more!

Alas! that hopes should only spring
Within my soul to be o'erthrown,
Like budding flowers, ere blossoming
All withered strewn.

Thy perfect form within my breast
Have I long hoarded up in vain?
And never can my heart be blest
By thee again?

Not so—not so—the hour of need
Thy noble heart will not forsake,
Thy own sweet breast the bruised reed
Will never break!

Then come;—but yet I fear to see
My fancied joys all melt away,
And faded, as I gaze on thee,
Hope's dying ray.

To gather from thy glance the woe
I should expect—but yet will not;
To see thy smile of scorn, and know
I am forgot.

And wilt thou dash the hopes away
That to thy love still eager cling,
As birds that watch the earliest ray
Of sunny spring?
And will thy heart, so truly loved,
The dearest prayers of mine repel?
To gentle pity steeled—unmoved—
Love's yearnings quell?

When all around with gladness own
The rapture of thy loveliness,
My heart will still—its hopes o'erthrown,
Thy form caress.

Were endless night my future lot,
Should morn but wake to misery,
Till mind was gone—or life was not,
I'd think on thee!

Again then let me see thy face,
Thy lip where smiles should ever play;
If there no thought of me I trace,
I'll turn away.

The brightest dream that cheered my rest,
The sweetest voice that whispered peace,
The loveliest form that filled my breast,
Will ever cease.

H. C.

TO AN ACTRESS.

Not for thy beauty, though thy face
Is very beautiful to see;
Nor for the elegance and grace
That mark thy perfect symmetry:—
I loved thee when I saw thee first,
Flower-like, upon my presence burst!

Not for the flowers, that fill'd thy voice
With music—perfume's very sound;—
Tones, or to bid green Earth rejoice,
Or formed to wail deep sorrow's wound;—
Accents, that thrilled through all my veins,
Like memories of youth-haunting strains.

Nor for the intellect that turned
All common things to things uncommon;
Showing thee all for which I yearn'd—
Woman, without the faults of Woman:—
Less warm than pure, yet warm and fond;
For earth less fit than realms beyond.

Yet not unfit for earth, and all
Its duties high, affections chaste;
Nor hoarding 'gainst its faults the gall
Which meaner spirits love to waste;
Nor, in thy sympathy for Man,
Forgetting Him who life began!

For none of all thy graceful ways
I loved thee; for I loved thee ere
Their merits met perception's gaze;
And, therefore, sweet one, it is clear
That love with me has been most wise,
In choosing more by mind than eyes!

But if I taught thee too to love,
I taught thee too to doubt and dread;
And now too late I try to prove
How false the idle words I said:—
Where pride is stronger love is weak,
Yet Love the strongest pride should break!

And thou shalt never meet again
With love than mine more pure, more true;
Amidst life's many days of rain,
Like sunshine shall its light pursue
Thy memory; whilst, in after years,
Thou'lt bathe its grave with gentle tears!

LITERARY REGISTER.

Forest Life. By the author of "A New Home: who will follow?" Two volumes, post octavo, cloth. Longman & Co.

The fair and lively author of these pleasing volumes, having given the world nearly all the cream of her knowledge of emigrant life in the Far West in her former works, has here very cleverly whipped up what remained, and made, with the help of sundry literary garnishings, a very palatable and dainty dish of it. She herself pleads to having become so Westernized, as no longer to be a competent painter of Western peculiarities. She therefore turns the forests and prairies of Michigan into a sort of "Our Village," and Mitfordizes them. She likewise labours under the disqualification of having become too good-natured. There are, in Michigan, few remarkable changes to note; and good-humoured reproaches on slovenliness and want of taste, and modest suggestions for improvement, have an American and not a European fitness and applicability. The farm-house and establishment of Mr. Hay, a substantial settler, who has lived on the same clearing for the very long term of fourteen or fifteen years, is as Far Westish as anything we can find in the volumes, and therefore affords a favourable specimen of "Forest Life."

Our friend Mr. Hay has a noble farm. His cleared and cultivated acres may be counted by hundreds, and his "stock" of all kinds will far outnumber them. A wide tract of forest land hems in his clearing; and this too calls him master. He is wont to boast that he has more land enclosed within a ring-fence than any man in the county; and he boasts still louder that it is all the fruit of his own industry; and, loudest of all, that it has never made him proud. He maintains, and insists upon his family's maintaining, the simplicity of habits and manners that is usual in the neighbourhood; and watches with jealous eye every tendency towards an imitation of those who attempt fashion and style among us. He goes daily into the field with his men, and his wife and daughters spin and wear wool and flax of home production. No imported luxury graces their daily table. Mrs. Hay, to be sure, has her tea, but she has it in the afternoon, before the family supper; and the sugar (for the few who like "sweet'nin'" in their tea) comes from no further off than the farm "sugar-bush." Notwithstanding these strict sumptuary laws, however, no family lives in greater comfort and abundance.

Mr. Hay's house is large enough to make a respectable figure any where, though it lacks as yet the beautifying aid of the paint-brush. His barn would make a hôtel of tolerable dimensions, and the various outhouses and sheds, and coops and pens, that cluster round it, make passing travellers fancy they are coming upon a rising village in the deep woods. A fine young orchard adorns the sloping bank behind the house; whole rows of peach and cherry trees border the ample door-yard; hedges of currant and gooseberry bushes intersect the garden; thick screens of wild grape and honeysuckle overshadow the porch and drapery the "square-room" windows.

When you enter, you find bare but well-scrubbed floors; the only exception being found in the aforesaid "square-room," which is decorated with a home-made carpet of resplendent colours, large enough to reach (almost) the border of chairs, and shaken every morning on the grass to avoid the ravages of the wasteful broom. A great eight-day clock, with a moon on its face, is the most conspicuous ornament of the common or "keepin'-room;" but there is, besides this, in a favoured corner near the window, a small mirror, round which hang black profiles of all the family, including aunts and uncles; pincushions of every size and hue; strings of little birds' eggs; vials of camphor, peppermint, and essence of lemon; and perhaps a dozen other small articles much prized by different members of the family; while over the glass wave a few peacock's feathers, and a whole plume of asparagus.

Pass into the kitchen, and you will find Mrs. Hay kneading bread or rolling pie-crust, to give her handmaid time for some less delicate service; her daughter Marthy-Ann preparing dinner; her daughter Sophia-Jane shelling peas; her daughter Harriet-'Lizy rocking the cradle, in which lies yet another daughter, whose name is Appollonia,—not quite Apollyon, but so like it that I almost wonder that people who read John Bunyan should be fond of the appellation. The truth is, we do love high-sounding names, and the more syllables or adjuncts the better.

The kitchen has a great fire-place, with a crane stout enough to swing a five-pail kettle of soup, and a great oven too, that will hold at least a dozen country loaves. About the walls are disposed all the conveniences necessary for the full use of fire-place and oven, on the same plenteous scale. A rifle and a shot-gun hang on wooden hooks driven into the rafters over-head; two or three gleaming butcher-knives ornament a leather strap fixed against the chimney. A meal-room near at hand contains several varieties of flour; and a buttery and milk-house supply other rustic dainties in profusion. Is it not to be supposed that Mr. Hay and Mrs. Hay, and their five daughters, and their "help," and their three hired men, live well?

One daughter we have not introduced into the kitchen because she was seldom found there. Caroline Hay was delicate from her infancy, so much so that even her father was willing to see her excused from the more arduous part of domestic duty, and sent to school more constantly than were her sisters. But it was not without many misgivings that Mr. Hay observed the distinction which this circumstance made between his daughters.

Miss Caroline is the heroine of a future Crabbe-like story, which ends happily. The over-refined young lady comes to her senses, and marries the bashful and clownish youth, whose exterior was his only blemish; and even that uncouth exterior acquires polish. Manners are supervened on mind and moral worth. Pass we some years, and accompany Caroline home from a long visit made to a wealthy and luxurious, though Quaker relative in New York:

Before Caroline Hay had been three days at home, she had become painfully sensible that her father's forebodings as to the effect of a city residence had not been groundless. All was changed to her eye, if not to her heart. Much as she loved the dear inmates of the plentiful farm-house,—and she loved them as dearly as ever,—an air of coarseness, which she had never before observed, met her at every turn. Her mother's dress and occupations, the homely phraseology of her sisters, the furniture, the style of living, though certainly unchanged, or at least not changed for the worse, struck her unpleasantly and chilled her feelings, even against the pleadings of her heart and of her better judgment. She saw and acknowledged that all was good and true, generous, and contented, and happy; that her father's house was a well-spring of bounty to all who were in need, and that to him and to his excellent partner and help in all good things the whole neighbourhood looked with undoubting trust for sympathy and kindness. She compared the simplicity and ease of her rustic home with the feverish excitement of the scene she had left; and though her reason and her good sense told her which to approve, she found that habit had become tyrannical, and likely to maintain a struggle in her mind which would cost her many bitter tears.

The acquaintance which she had accidentally formed in the city beyond her aunt's sober circle had been rather showy than solid people, who were, however, possessed of sufficient refinement to add a degree of fascination to their gay tastes and habits; so that the eyes and ears of the inexperienced country girl were at once dazzled and delighted, and she learned to look upon elegance as almost synonymous with dashing, and to find everything insipid and vulgar which was characterised by plainness or sobriety. No wonder she contemplated with mortified pride the unadorned aspect of things at home! . . . . . Unpleasant feelings were not wanting on the other side. So prone is youth to extremes, that it is not surprising that Caroline should have used her liberty and her father's liberal allowance in providing herself with dress which was rather gaudy than elegant. Her aunt had felt her inability to be a counsellor on a subject where her own views made her averse to even the smallest indulgence of taste or fancy, and the dressmaker had been but too happy to display all her art on so elegant a form—those artists generally considering their employers rather in the light of sign-posts than of rational beings. So our poor Caroline was very fine. There were such loads of curls that the fair head reminded one of a flourishing bed of Scotch kail, or of the decorations of some lucky child, who, having the petites entrées of a carpenter's shop, makes use of the opportunity to cover her eyes and ears with elegant pine shavings. Her fingers were heaped with incongruous rings; and worse than all were the long ear-pendants, which vibrated with every word, and seemed determined to repose their weary length on the snow-white shoulders below.

But this is not exclusively American. Parallels to Caroline Hay might be found in any county of England. The Sibthorpes, a genteel and estimable small family of enthusiastic English emigrants, are more at home in the book, and quite out of their element in the Forest. Here they are:

When Mr. and Mrs. Sibthorpe returned our visit, they had experienced some difficulties, in consequence of the marriage of one of the maids with an excellent man-servant, who had been Mr. Sibthorpe's fac-totum, and who now bought land with his wages, and assumed the position of country neighbour, instead of that of faithful domestic. However, as the newly-married couple were living quite near them, they still had the benefit of their occasional services, and were, in the meantime, making diligent inquiry after others, who might, at least, be trained to fill their places. Mrs. Sibthorpe was in fine spirits, boasting that she had learned to make bread, and was even taking lessons in making butter; and declaring that she really believed the best thing that could happen to her would be the desertion of all her servants in time, in order that the domestic employments, which she felt to be so rational and so healthful, might become compulsory; at least, long enough to oblige her to obtain an insight into their mysteries. . .

The next time we visited Newton Grange we found its bright-eyed mistress, with her sleeves turned up, making an attempt at a pie. The only maid who still remained with her was prostrate with ague; and Mr. Sibthorpe himself had experienced a shake or two, and sat in the corner of the great kitchen fire-place, looking doleful to be sure. The account of things was now somewhat shaded: the bright tints which had been cast upon the manufacture of bread and butter were dimmed a little; Mrs Sibthorpe had laid aside her rings, and left the papillotes in her ringlets; a dress scarcely suited to woodland kitchening, was defended by an apron borrowed from the maid. This said maid, a devoted and excellent creature, had her little bed in a corner of the kitchen, with the double view of making the care of her chill days less laborious, and of aiding her mistress in the household duties, by suggestions, and hints, and cautions, which were delivered with most amusing apologies; and ceaseless regrets that such business should fall into such hands. "Oh, ma'am,—if you please, your kettle is boiling over!—dear me! if I could but lift it off myself! This hager is the hoddest thing! Yesterday I was quite stout. Oh, please ma'am,—don't scald yourself! Oh, ma'am! I beg your pardon—but the nasty pig has come in at the door, and has got at master's gruel!"

Mrs. Sibthorpe's spirits were almost as good as ever, and she found amusement in all the vexatious crosses of her present lot. Her husband was far more disturbed: he could not bear to see the exertions and sacrifices made by his wife, while he, only half-sick, but quite useless, sat looking on, "a sad and silent cypher."

And, all this time, no assistance to be procured in any department. Ague is very impartial in its visits, and often puts an entire neighbourhood down at once, so that it not unfrequently occurs that there are not able persons enough in a whole district to attend properly to the sick.

After this seasoning was at an end, and ague seemed to have worn off, or nearly so, our English friends began again to enjoy the real pleasures of a country life, and to gather round them such additional means of comfort and convenience as had been at first unprovided. The new part of the dwelling was finished, and a sweet low-browed many-sided cottage it was. Furniture came, and was placed in its appropriate positions,—that is, appropriate according to Mrs. Sibthorpe's views, though sadly out of order in the estimation of her neighbours. A fine piano-forte was drawn from its hiding-place, in a neighbouring barn; books, in copious measure, filled every corner of the little nook called a library. A rustic arbour was constructed in the garden for Charlotte's special use; and here her school-books and her "baby-things" were bestowed,—the arbour having been carefully thatched to protect the treasures from the weather. A light open carriage, and a pair of ponies, were aded to the establishment; and one would have thought there was little left for plain people to wish for.

But, alack for short-sighted humanity! Parlours and libraries, and halls and verandas, require to be swept and dusted. An air of slovenliness soon spreads itself over gardens and shrubberies that are not duly cared for. Horses exact the most odious regularity in feeding and currying; and carriages give very little comfort if we must use them muddy, or wash the mud off with our own hands. . . . . Certain it is, that the want of good domestics is a sad drawback on the comforts of their pleasant house and its accompaniments. The one faithful damsel still kept her place, and divided herself into as many parts as she could, but she had had rogue enough to lessen her efficiency not a little; and besides, the more we enlarge our bounds and increase our conveniences, the more care and labour do we render necessary. Many and desperate efforts did Mr. Sibthorpe make to supply the deficiency. Women were found who would undertake the business for good wages, but they were ignorant, and must be taught—proud, and must be conciliated. Some would flounce out of doors, and insist on their being carried back to their homes, on the discovery that they were to have a table separate from that of their employers. Others would swallow this mortification for a while, until their own purpose was answered—the price of a new dress, or a smart bonnet perhaps—and then call up the latent dignity, and declare they "couldn't stan' it no longer!"

These usually took a good deal of pains to make known far and wide the ground of their dissatisfaction; and it became, after a while, almost equivalent to a loss of caste to endure indignities which so many had spurned. Then domestics were brought from the city, at enormously-disproportioned expense, and these invariably became dissatisfied—some because they were taught by their neighbours to feel themselves in a degraded position, and others for want of company and amusement. Poor Mr. Sibthorpe was almost in despair, but his wife took all cheerily, and learned to be so good a manager that the discomforts of imperfect arrangements were almost forgotten, and Mr. Sibthorpe acknowledged that the greater amount of absolute labour than he had supposed himself capable of, had really benefited his health and spirits. To till the soil is tiresome enough, but it was only pleasure to dig in the garden at his wife's solicitation. The care of horses has its disagreeables; but he could generally hire some kind of a biped who would attend to the ponies after his own fashion; and for the rest—did not the daily drive with Florella and Charlotte through the openings more than compensate for all the personal supervision which he himself bestowed on them! And so the time wore on, and, for people out of their element, the Sibthorpes were the happiest family I ever saw.

But difficulties multiplied, and novelty lost its charms; and when matters were come to extremity with the "genteel" and refined settlers without help, some rich relations in England popped off, and they were under the happy necessity to return home.

The description of a quilting which Mrs Sibthorpe gives to her correspondent in England is pleasing and genuine American:

It was held at the house of a very tidy neighbour, a Mrs. Boardman, the neatness of whose dwelling and its outworks I have often admired in passing. She invited all the neighbours, and of course included my unworthy self, although I had never had any other acquaintance than that which may be supposed to result from John and Sophy's having boarded with her for some time. The walking being damp, an ox-cart was sent round for such of the guests as had no "teams" of their own, which is our case as yet. This equipage was packed with hay, over which a blue-and-white coverlet was disposed by way of musnud; and by this arrangement half a dozen goodly dames, including myself, found reclining room, and were carried at a stately pace to Mrs. Boardman's. Here we found a collection of women busily occupied in preparing the quilt, which, you may be sure, was a curiosity to me. They had stretched the lining on a frame, and were now laying fleecy cotton on it with much care; and I understood, from several aside remarks which were not intended for the ears of our hostess, that a due regard for etiquette required that this laying of the cotton should have been performed before the arrival of the company, in order to give them a better chance for finishing the quilt before tea, which is considered a point of honour.

However, with so many able hands at work, the preparations were soon accomplished. The "batts" were smoothly disposed, and now consenting hands on either side

> "Induced a splendid cover, green and blue, > Yellow and red,"

wherein stars and garters, squares and triangles, figured in every possible relation to each other, and produced, on the whole, a very pretty mathematical piece of work, on which the eyes of Mrs. Boardman rested with no small amount of womanly pride.

Now needles were in requisition, and every available space round the frame was filled by a busy dame. Several of the company being left-handed, or rather ambidexter, (no uncommon circumstance here,) this peculiarity was made serviceable at the corners, where common sempstresses could only sew in one direction, while these favoured individuals could turn their double power to double account.

This beginning of the solid labour was a serious time. Scarcely a word was spoken, beyond an occasional request for the thread, or an exclamation at the snapping of a needle. This last seemed of no infrequent occurrence, as you may well suppose when you think of the thickness of the materials, and the necessity for making at least tolerable short stitches. I must own, that the most I could accomplish for the first hour was the breaking of needles and the pricking of my fingers, in the vain attempt to do as I was bid, and take my stitches "clean through."

By and by it was announced that it was time to roll—and all was bustle and anxiety. The frame had to be taken apart at the corners, and two of the sides rolled several times with much care; and at this diminished surface we began again with renewed spirit. Now all tongues seemed loosened. The evidence of progress had raised everybody's spirits, and the strife seemed to be who should talk fastest without slackening the industry of her fingers. Some held tête-à-têts communication with a crony in an under-tone; others discussed matters of general interest more openly; and some made observations at nobody in particular, but with a view to the amusement of all. Mrs. Vining told the symptoms of each of her five children through an attack of the measles; Mrs. Ketaltas gave her opinion as to the party most worthy of blame in a late separation in the village: and Miss Polly Mittles said she hoped the quilt would not be "scant of stitches, like a bachelor's shirt."

Tea-time came before the work was completed, and some of the more generous declared they would rather finish it before tea. These offers fell rather coldly, however, for a real tea-drinker does not feel very good-humoured just before tea. So Mr. Boardman drove four stout nails in the rafters over-head, corresponding in distance to the corners of the quilt, and the frame was raised and fastened to these so as to be undisturbed, and yet out of the way during the important ceremony that was to succeed. Is it not well said, that "necessity is the mother of invention!"

A long table was now spread, eked out by boards laid upon carpenters' "horses,"—and this was covered with a variety of table-cloths, all shining clean, however, and carefully disposed. The whole table array was equally various, the contributions, I presume, of several neighbouring log-houses. The feast spread upon it included every variety that ever was put upon a tea-table, from cake and preserves to pickles and raw cabbage cut up in vinegar. Pies there were, and custards, and sliced ham, and cheese, and three or four kinds of bread. I could do little besides look and try to guess out the dishes. However, everything was very good, and our hostess must have felt complimented by the attention paid to her various delicacies. The cabbage, I think, was rather the favourite, vinegar being one of the rarities of a settler's cabin.

I was amused to see the loads of cake and pie that accumulated upon the plates of the guests. When all had finished, most of the plates seemed full. But I was told afterwards that it is not considered civil to decline any one kind of food, though your hostess may have provided a dozen. You are expected, at least, to try each variety. But this leads to something which I cannot think very agreeable.

After all had left the table, our hostess began to clear it away, that the quilt might be restored to its place; and, as a preliminary, she went all round to the different plates, selecting such pieces of cake as were but little bitten, and paring off the half-demolished edges with a knife, in order to replace them in their original circular position on the dishes. When this was accomplished, she assiduously scraped, from the edges of the plates, the scraps of butter that had escaped demolition, and wiped them back on the remains of the pat. This was doubtless a season of delactation to the economical soul of Mrs. Boardman: you may imagine its effects upon the nerves of your friend. Such is the influence of habit! The good woman doubtless thought she was performing a praiseworthy action, and one in no wise at variance with her usual neat habits; and if she could have peeped into my heart, and there have read the resolutions I was tacitly making against breaking bread again under the same auspices, she would have pitied or despised such lamentable pride and extravagance. So goes this strange world.

The quilt was replaced, and several good housewives seated themselves at it, determined to "see it out." I was reluctantly compelled to excuse myself, my inexperienced fingers being pricked to absolute rawness. But I have since ascertained that the quilt was finished that evening, and placed on Mrs. Boardman's best bed immediately. . . . . .

So much for the country chronicle for April, which, I dare say, will find you in deep deliberation upon spring ribands, or the last light mantilla. My preparations for enjoying the spring have been—a pair of very stout shoes waterproof; and a great bonnet, braided of oat straw, by a good lady of my neighbours. These, with a pair of indescribable gloves, will furnish me forth for public appearance for some time to come.

I wish you could have been here this morning when I had a visit from an old woman who is my adviser in perilous emergencies, such as the contumacious refusal of a turkey hen to sit still on her eggs, or the obstinacy of a caldron of soap, refusing to "come," and so justifying the opinion of some ingenious philologist, that the term soap is a contraction of "so hap," betokening the uncertainty attending the manufacture. This good dame dabbles in half the circle of sciences: and when I ask for information on any particular point, I always get a vast deal of gratuitous information. This morning the matter in hand was Charlotte's wrist, which she scraped badly in falling out of her swing, a day or two ago. The place looked so angry this morning that I sent for old Mrs. Lettsom in her surgical capacity.

"Land o' Goshen!" said the good woman, holding up both her hands, when Charlotte, with doleful eyes, unwrapped her arm. "Why, that does look perfectly awful! I never see sich a one but once since I was born, and that was Miss Taylor's, and she come nigh hevin' to hev' her hand took off!"

Charlotte looked at me perfectly aghast, and began to cry sadly.

"Law, me!" said Mrs. Lettsom, "don't you be scar't! I can cure ye! I've cured worse things than that! I cured Miss Taylor's, quick as wink! Jist smash up everlastin', and lay on a good mess of it, and it'll get the information out on't like witchcraft!"

This sounds like a stupendous operation; but a little inquiry brought to light the true nature of Mrs. Lettsom's "everlastin'," which is only a soft cooling herb, much cultivated in these regions.

This being disposed of, I had the usual discursive lecture.

"That everlastin'," said the good woman, "is a prime thing to wrap up the axe in, after you've cut yourself a-choppin'. As long as that keeps moist, the wound 'll keep cool and easy. The bees knows the good of it, for when they've been a-fightin', you'll always see 'em a huntin' for everlastin', if there is any; and they go and get it for to heal 'em up. But bees is dreadful knowin' critters; they understand what you say, jist as well as anybody. If there's anybody dies in the house, they'll all go away if you don't take no notice on 'em; but if you go and talk to 'em, and tell 'em that sich a one is dead, (calling him by name,) and hang a black cloth over the hive, and tell the bees if they'll stay you'll do well by 'em, why, they'll stay and go to work peaceable. And if there's dissension in a house, the hives ought to be set a great way off, down in the garden, so that the bees can't hear what is said. There was the Johnsons down in Austerlitz; there was a division in the family, and the bees began to grow dreadful uneasy, and hardly made any honey; but, by and by, one day, Johnson gin his wife a whippin', and the bees all flew away. And, any how, bees won't never thrive well, unless you talk with 'em. You must take your knittin' work, and go and sit by 'em, and tell 'em things, and talk about the neighbours and sich, or they'll get lonesome and discouraged, and your honey 'll be all bee-bread. Now, honey is one o' the best things you can have in your family, for its good sweet'nin' for anything, cake, or coffee, or anything."

Much more do we admire "Aunty Parshalls," who must be a bit of real and true womanly flesh and blood. "Talk of the Venus, indeed! The statue that enchants the world is not half so respectable as Aunty Parshalls standing on her dish-kettle." This milky-bosomed, warm, and withered old creature, is what the Irish call "the willing slave" of a pretty, little, useless, doll of a daughter-in-law, and of a fat, surly husband; whose lazy selfishness devolves every task and burden upon her shoulders, while she, good creature, excuses all his exactions on the ground of his being "so fleshy." We cannot scan good Aunty Parshalls of her fair proportions, but we may present her dish-kettle. She belongs to universal humanity, but the kettle is exclusively American and of the Backwoods:

One ought to have seen Mr. Parshalls, senior, and his house, and that good but very odd-looking wife of his, to imagine anything of the poor little daughter-in-law's situation, after she became an inmate of the paternal establishment. She sat on one of the chests which garnished the sides of the room, her white hands idly resting in her lap, or listlessly straying among her mazy curls, while she watched, with an aspect of real distress, the labours of poor Aunty. These were of the most primitive kind; various enough, indeed, but all performed with scarcely more utensils than would have been invented by our first mother, if she had had workmen at command.

One article in particular, which Mrs. Parshalls called her "dish-kettle," performed daily a round of duties which would utterly have confounded Papier's Digester, or the "Marmite Perpétuelle." It cooked the potatoes for breakfast, and was then put on to heat water for washing the dishes. When this same washing process was about to commence, the dish-kettle was always hoisted to the table, since where was the use of wearing out a pan when the dish-kettle did just as well, and kept the water hot longer too! By the time the dishes were washed, it was time to feed the pigs; and then poor Aunty, being sadly scanted in pails, carried this heavy iron vessel up the rising ground, at the top of which the pan was placed; then the kettle was scoured and put on for dinner. After dinner came the whole dish-washing process over again; and then the factotum was cleaned once more, and put on to heat water for moping the floor —a daily ceremony. At this point of the diurnal round, I confess a discrepancy of opinion between Aunty Parshalls and myself, since I could never quite like to see the mop going in and out of the dish-kettle. But as she said, in reply to a very sharp remonstrance of her lady daughter on this head,—

"Why, bless your dear soul, I sca-oured it."

I will answer for it she did; but we all have our prejudices.

But the dish-kettle is not yet at rest for the night: it has still, after another "sca-ouring" process, to cook the supper, wash the dishes, carry the pigs' mess up the hill, and come home to be cleaned again, in order that the beans may be put to soak for to-morrow's porridge.

This is one of Mrs. Parshall's peculiarities, and it is one which, I doubt not, will cleave to her as long as she lives, in spite of many snappish remarks from her husband, and the undisguised horror of Mrs. Henry. She says she must do as she has been used to, and as her mother did before her, or she should get her work all "out of kelter." And whatever may be the judgment of others upon this coarse estimate of comfort, I am sure neither of the objectors just mentioned have any right to say a word, since neither of them ever lifted a finger to lighten the good woman's labours. . . .

As for father Parshalls, I fear he is too old to learn. The last time I saw his "old woman," she was on the top of the hill again, and by way of adding to her height, already passing that of women, she had turned the dish-kettle upside down, and was standing on it, a skeleton statue scantily draperied—looking roupd the landscape with a searching glance.

"I do wonder," she said, "what has become of that heifer critter! If my old man comes home afore I find her, I shall get an awful talkin' to!"

Talk of the Venus!

The statue that enchants the world is not half so respectable as Aunty Parshalls standing on her dish-kettle!

These are not unfavourable specimens of this work, of which the usefulness is surely not lessened from its instructions, and the hints exemplifying its own philosophy, being conveyed in a polished and lively style.

The Expedition into Affghanistan: Notes and Sketches Descriptive of the Country, contained in a Personal Narrative during the Campaign of 1839-40, up to the Surrender of Dost Mahomed Khan. By James Atkinson, Esq., Superintending Surgeon of the Army of the Indus, &c., &c. 1 vol. cloth, with Map. London: Allen & Co.

The disastrous events which have taken place in Affghanistan since this narrative was closed, though they may in one sense have lessened its interest, have in another increased it; as there is now a keener curiosity to look into the causes of those events. Up to March 1841, when his Narrative is closed, the author, whatever he may have become, was an enthusiastic admirer of Shah Shoojah, and an approver of the British policy for his restoration; and almost the personal enemy of Dost Mahomed, in whom, or his faithful Affghans, he can see no good point. Viewing the entire question, it is not easy to get rid of the unschooled logic of Jubbar Khan, the half-brother of the Dost, who, after Shah Shoojah had been raised to the throne, came from Caubul to Ghizni to treat with the new sovereign for an adjustment between the contending potentates. When Jubbar Khan was introduced to the king his deportment was not uncourteous; but he said—"If you are to be king, of what use is the British army here? if the English are to rule over the country, of what use are you here?" The Shah, with unruffled temper, parried this observation, by soothing his hurt mind; and, in a bland manner, promised him a confidential situation near his person. But Jubbar Khan was sulky, and returned to Caubul. On seeing the tents of the English army at a distance, this proud chief, who had never before seen a British camp, said contemptuously—"Why, your army consists merely of camels and canvass—ours, of mounted coonies, with sharp swords"—a speech scarcely to be forgiven. This Narrative is compiled under the strong delusions which prevailed among the British up to the fatal moment when they were startled out of their pleasing dream, and found themselves betrayed.—Mr. Atkinson, on his journeys, paid that attention to objects of science and of liberal curiosity, which now more or less distinguishes every gentleman in the British service.

Essays on the Principles of Morality, and on the Private and Political Rights and Obligations of Mankind. By Jonathan Dymond. Fourth edition. London: Gilpin. Carlisle: Scott & Benson.

It gives us sincere pleasure to meet with a popular, cheap edition of this sterling work. The book appeared a good many years ago, and attracted considerable notice, both from the learning and ability with which it was written, and the single-minded view taken by the author of every great question in morals. He was a member of the Society of Friends, and died, we believe, shortly after the publication of his Code. A Memoir of Jonathan Dymond, however brief, would have been desirable with the present edition. To studious readers the book is tolerably well known; but the great mass of casual readers, whom it is so well fitted to enlighten and benefit, may require to be told, that this whole social and political duty of man is written upon the principle, that the Will of God is man's only rule; and that to inquire what is our duty, or what we are in any particular instance obliged to do, is, in effect, to inquire what is the will of God in that instance, which known, consequently becomes our duty, and involves the whole business of morality. This is, in substance, the principle which Paley lays down, but which Jonathan Dymond rigidly abides by. The standard of duty in all cases is the Will of God, and that Will is assumed to be revealed to us in the Scriptures; and those who have no direct revelation, are yet held not to be destitute of all direct knowledge of the divine will. The system of Jonathan Dymond affords no place to the doctrines of expediency; and his notions of Utility are held in complete subordination to the high standard of duty that he assumes. Nor is this unqualified respect given to those subordinate standards of right and wrong,—The Laws of the Land, the Law of Nations, or the Law of Honour, unless where they are in perfect accordance with the higher standard of Christian morality. The author's opinions on some points are naturally modified by the tenets of the sect in which he was bred, and to which he adhered, as on oaths, death punishments, duelling, offensive war, military virtue, idle forms of compliment, and so forth; and he may at times, though not on these subjects, verge upon "straining at a gnat;" but in every weightier matter he is as sound in principle as he is uncompromising; and in his reasoning as acute as he is profound. Two or three brief, isolated paragraphs will better explain the character of a Code of Morals, Rights, and Duties, which we have formerly recommended, and would like to see widely diffused, than any laboured description of the contents of the book.

Duelling.—We are shocked and disgusted at the immolation of women amongst the Hindoos, and think that, if such a sacrifice were attempted in England, it would excite feelings of the utmost repulsion and abhorrence. Of the custom of immolation, duelling is the sister. Their parents are the same, and, like other sisters, their lineaments are similar. Why does a Hindoo mount the funeral pile? To vindicate and maintain her honour. Why does an Englishman go to the heath with his pistols? To vindicate and maintain his honour. What is the nature and character of the Hindoo's honour? Quite factitious. Of the duellist's? Quite factitious. How is the motive applied to the Hindoo? To her fears of reproach. To the duellist? To his fears of reproach. What then is the difference between the two customs? This—That one is practised in the midst of pagan darkness, and the other in the midst of Christian light. And yet these very men give their guineas to the Missionary Society, lament the degradation of the Hindoos, and expatiate upon the sacred duty of enlightening them with Christianity! "Physician! heal thyself."

One consideration connected with duelling is of unusual interest. In the judgment of that religion which requires purity of heart, and of that Being to whom thought is action, he cannot be esteemed innocent of this crime, who lives in a settled, habitual, determination to commit it, when circumstances shall call upon him so to do. This is a consideration which places the crime of duelling on a different footing from almost any other; indeed there is perhaps no other, which mankind habitually and deliberately resolve to practise whenever the temptation shall occur."

Distinction made between Sons and Daughters.—It is a common, though not a very reasonable opinion, that a son needs a larger portion than a daughter. To be sure, if he is to live in greater affluence than she, he does. But why should he? There appears no motive in reason, and certainly there is none in affection, for diminishing one child's comforts to increase another's. A son too has greater opportunities of gain. A woman almost never grows rich except by legacies or marriage; so that, if her father do not provide for her, it is probable that she will not be provided for at all. As to marriage, the opportunity is frequently not offered to a woman; and a father, if he can, should so provide for his daughter, as to enable her, in single life, to live in a state of comfort not greatly inferior to her brother's. The remark that the custom of preferring sons is general, and therefore that when a couple marry the inequality is adjusted, applies only to the case of those who do marry. The number of women who do not is great; and a parent cannot foresee his daughter's lot. Besides, since marriage is (and is reasonably) a great object to a woman, and is desirable both for women and for men, there appears a propriety in increasing the probability of marriage by giving to women such property as shall constitute an additional inducement to marriage in the men. I shall hardly be suspected of recommending persons to "marry for money." My meaning is this: A young man possesses five hundred a-year, and lives on a corresponding scale. He is attached to a woman who has but one hundred a-year. This young man sees that, if he marries, he must reduce his scale of living; and the consideration operates (I do not say that it ought to operate) to deter him from marriage. But if the young man possessed three hundred a year and lived accordingly, and if the object of his attachment possessed three hundred a-year also, he would not be prevented from marrying her by the fear of being obliged to diminish his system of expenditure. Just complaints are made of those half-concealed blandishments by which some women who need "a settlement" endeavour to procure it by marriage. Those blandishments would become more tempered with propriety, if one great motive was taken away by the possession of a competence of their own.

An equal division of a father's property will be said to be incompatible with the system of primogeniture, and almost incompatible with hereditary rank. These are not subjects for the present Essay.

Unjust Defendants.—It does not present a very favourable view of the state of private principle, that there are so many who refuse justice to plaintiffs, unless they are compelled to be just by the law. It is indisputable, that a multitude of suits are undertaken in order to obtain property or rights which the defendant knows he ought voluntarily to give up. Such a person is certainly a dishonest man. When the verdict is given against him, I regard him in the light of a convicted robber—differing from other robbers in the circumstance that he is tried at Nisi prius instead of the Crown bar. For what is the difference between him who takes what is another's and him who withholds it? This severity of censure applies to some who are sued for damages. A man who, whether by design or inadverteney, has injured another, and will not compensate him unless he is legally compelled to do it, is surely unjust. Yet many of these persons seem to think that injury to property, or person, or character, entails no duty to make reparation, except it be enforced. Why, the law does not create this duty, it only compels us to fulfil it. If the minds of such persons were under the influence of integrity, they would pay such debts without compulsion. This subject is one amongst the many upon which Public Opinion needs to be aroused and to be rectified.

Insurance.—It is very possible for a man to act dishonestly every day and yet never to defraud another of a shilling. A merchant who conducts his business partly or wholly with borrowed capital, is not honest if he endangers the loss of an amount of property which, if lost, would disable him from paying his debts. He who possesses a thousand pounds of his own and borrows a thousand of some one else, cannot virtuously speculate so extensively as that, if his prospects should be disappointed, he would lose twelve hundred. The speculation is dishonest whether it succeeds or not: it is risking other men's property without their consent. Under similar circumstances it is unjust not to insure. Perhaps the majority of uninsured traders, if their houses and goods were burnt, would be unable to pay their creditors. The injustice consists not in the actual loss which may be inflicted, (for whether a fire happens or not the injustice is the same,) but in endangering the infliction of the loss. There are but two ways in which, under such circumstances, the claims of rectitude can be satisfied—one is by not endangering the property, and the other by telling its actual owner that it will be endangered, and leaving him to incur the risk or not as he pleases.

"Those who hold the property of others are not warranted, on the principles of justice, in neglecting to inform themselves from time to time, of the real situation of their affairs."

Civil Liberty.—One great cause of diminutions of civil liberty is War; and if no other motive induced a people jealously to scrutinize the grounds of a war, this might be sufficient. The increased loss of personal freedom to a military man is manifest; and it is considerable to other men. The man who now pays twenty pounds a-year in taxes, would probably have paid but two if there had been no war during the past century. If he now gets a hundred and fifty pounds a-year by his exertions, he is obliged to labour six weeks out of the fifty-two to pay the taxes which war has entailed. That is to say, he is compelled to work two hours every day longer than he himself wishes, or than is needful for his support. This is a material deduction from personal liberty, and a man would feel it as such, if the coercion were directly applied—if an officer came to his house every afternoon at four o'clock, when he had finished his business, and obliged him, under penalty of a distraint, to work till six. It is some loss of liberty, again, to a man to be unable to open as many windows in his house as he pleases—or to be forbidden to acknowledge the receipt of a debt without going to the next town for a stamp—or to be obliged to ride in an uneasy carriage unless he will pay for springs. It were to no purpose to say he may pay for windows and springs if he will, and if he can.—A slave may, by the same reasoning, be shown to be free; because, if he will and if he can, he may purchase his freedom. There is a loss of liberty in being obliged to submit to the alternative; and we should feel it as a loss if such things were not habitual, and if we had not receded so considerably from the liberty of nature. A housewife on the Ohio would think it a strange invasion of her liberty, if she were told that henceforth the police would be sent to her house to seize her goods if she made any more soap to wash her clothes.

Now, indeed, that war has created a large public debt, it is necessary to the general good that its interest should be paid: and in this view a man's civil liberty is not encroached upon, though his personal liberty is diminished. The public welfare is consulted by the diminution. I may deplore the cause without complaining of the law. It may, upon emergency, be for the public good to suspend the Habeas Corpus Act. I should lament that such a state of things existed, but I should not complain that civil liberty was invaded. The lesson which such considerations teach, is, jealous watchfulness against wars for the future.

Public Satisfaction.—It is always incumbent upon the legislature to prove the probable superiority of the existing institutions when any considerable portion of the people desire an alteration. That desire constitutes a claim to investigation; and to an alteration, too, unless the existing institutions appear to be superior to those which are desired. It is not enough to show that they are as good; for though in other respects the two plans were equally balanced, the present are not so good as the others if they give less satisfaction to the community. To be satisfied is one great ingredient in the welfare of a people; and in whatever degree a people are not satisfied, in the same degree civil government does not perfectly effect its proper ends. To deny satisfaction to a people without showing a reason, is to withhold from them the due portion of civil liberty. . . . Promises or Oaths of Allegiance to Governors do not appear easily reconcileable with political reason. Promises are made for the advantage or security of the imposer; and to make them to governors seems an inversion of the order which just principles would prescribe. The security should be given by the employed party, not by the employer. A community should not be bound to obey any given officer whom they employ; because they may find occasion to exchange him for another. Men do not swear fidelity to their representatives in the senate. Promising fidelity to the state may appear exempt from these objections, but the promise is likely to be of little avail; for what is the state? or how is its will to be discovered but by the voice of the governing power? To promise fidelity to the state is not very different from promising it to a governor.

Cases of Conscience.—A man who possesses five thousand pounds has two sons, of whom John is well provided for, and Thomas is not. With the privity of his sons he makes a will, leaving four thousand pounds to Thomas and one to John, explaining to both the reason of this division. A fire happens in the house, and the will is burnt; and the father, before he has the opportunity of making another, is carried off by a fever. Now the English law would assign a half of the money to each brother. If John demands his half, is he a just man? Every one I think will perceive that he is not, and that, if he demanded it, he would violate the duties of benevolence. The law is not his sufficient rule.

A person whose near relations do not stand in need of his money, adopts the children of distant relatives, with the declared intention or manifest design of providing for them at his death. If, under such circumstances, he dies without a will, the heir at law could not morally avail himself of his legal privilege, to the injury of these expectant parties. They need the money and he does not; which is one good reason for not seizing it; but the intention of the deceased invested them with a right; and so that the intention is known, it matters little to the moral obligation whether it is expressed on paper or not.

Possibly some reader may say, that if an heir or legatee must always institute inquiries into the uncertain claims of others before he accepts the property of the deceased, and if he is obliged to give up his own claims whenever theirs seem to preponderate, he will be involved in endless doubts and scruples, and testators will never know whether their wills will be executed or not: the answer is, that no such scrupulousness is demanded. Hardheartedness, and extreme unreasonableness, and injustice, are one class of considerations; critical scruples, and uncertain claims, are another.

It may be worth a paragraph to remark, that it is to be feared some persons think too complacently of their charitable bequests, or, what is worse, hope that it is a species of good works which will counterbalance the offence of some present irregularities of conduct. Such bequest ought not to be discouraged; and yet it should be remembered, that he who gives money after his death, parts with nothing of his own. He gives it only when he cannot retain it. The man who leaves his money for the single purpose of doing good, does right: but he who hopes that it is a work of merit, should remember that the money is given, that the privation is endured, not by himself but by his heirs. A man who has more than he needs, should dispense it whilst it is his own.

From these scraps some idea may be formed of this instructive and valuable book.

Letters from Hofwyl, by a Parent, on the Educational Institutions of De Fellenberg. 1 volume, cloth. Pp. 372. Longman & Co.

An English father and mother, convinced, by observation and experiment, that a home education was not that best fitted to render their sons virtuous men, and useful members of society, and afraid of the moral contamination of the great public schools of England, desired "to find an education which should unite the advantages of numbers with the spirit which sanctifies every home." After very careful inquiry, and deliberate reflection, they sent their elder boys to Hofwyl, where they prospered so well, that it became a question whether "all the little ones" (all the boys, we presume,) should not be sent to the same Institution. The result was, that they were taken to Hofwyl by their parents. A minute and careful, and highly encomiastic account of that great educational establishment, written by the mother of the family, during her residence at Hofwyl, forms the subject-matter of the book. The system of Fellenberg is already well-known from the writings of Lord Brougham and others; and it has stood the test of time, and been, in several respects, completed and perfected since it was first brought under the notice of the English public about thirty years ago. The Letters we consider well worthy the attention of parents anxious for the proper training of their sons, and this whether they shall send them to Hofwyl or not,—which is a very different question.—The work is also especially important to persons engaged in the education of youth. An Appendix, more bulky than the original part of the work, consists of a series of sketches of Hofwyl, written by a clergyman of the United States' Episcopal Church, named Woodbridge, and published by him in "The Annals of Education," a periodical work, of which he is Editor. There is a complete concurrence in the views of the English mother and the American clergyman; and, consequently, in their report of Fellenberg's Seminary; but the lady's descriptions are much more lively, picturesque, and inviting.

The Art of Conversation, with Remarks on Fashion and Address. By Captain Orlando Sabertash. 12mo, cloth. Pp. 188. London: Nickisson.

A lively and clever little work, written by a shrewd observer, who understands both the forms and essence of politeness, and whose hints are well worth studying. We feel infinitely indebted to him for the denunciation of those "privileged persons," whose privilege comes of venting, at all times and places, whatever rude and disagreeable impertinence comes uppermost in their vulgar minds; and his proper showing up of another class, and the exposure of another gross fallacy, under which a yet more offensive order of persons obtain social impunity. We must quote.

We sometimes hear superficial observers say, that they would rather have to deal with quick, hasty, or violent-tempered persons—whose outbreak of passion once over, is supposed to leave only sunshine and calm behind—than with the revengeful, rancorous, or malicious, of whom you can never be certain. This is mere foolery; the outburstings of rage are no security against malice and revengefulness; for the tendency to fly into a passion about every trifle, when not resulting, as it generally does, from mere mindless folly, can originate in no very amicable disposition. Besides, men may really possess ordinary equanimity of temper, be free from all flights of fury, without being either malicious or revengeful; and no pigmy of a walking volcano should be allowed to shelter itself, after every half-hour's explosion, under the assurance that it never harbours malice. The fact is, that in nine cases out of ten, people only get into a towering passion when their avarice is assailed, some selfish gratification endangered, or when they strive to conceal error or shabbiness beneath an explosion of paltry rage.

This is the common-sense of the matter.

THE SONGS OF THE MONTHS.

THE SONG OF OCTOBER.—NO. X.

I.

'Now that September's full feast is all over,
And Earth and her myriad breathers are blest;
To the swallows farewell, and the cry of the plover
Sweet Nature would sink to repose on Earth's breast:
Unrobe her,
October,
And lay her to rest,
Lullaby, lullaby, lullaby."

II.

So chanted the winds round my pinnace of cloud,
Gyrating for ever, a frolicksome crowd;
For they waited for me, unbounded in glee,
Assured while I live, they may wander forth free.

III.

I would fain be a gentle mother,
As soft as the dew I weep,
Or the murmur of each to other
As I hush my babes to sleep;
The forester tall,
Who towers o'er all,
And the bines that round him creep;
With the simple weeds that find a tongue,
Proclaiming God their roots among;
I would close their wings, and soft and slow,
Stop their green pulse, and their juices flow,
For they need the sleep which no dream may break,
Till Spring to her flowers shouts out, "Awake!"
I would do it thus, with the tender sigh
Of a loving heart, and a smiling eye,
While the winds breathed only lullaby:—

IV.

But hark! From those oaks at the forest's bound,
A mocking comes forth, and a tittering sound:
What boots it? I must strip them bare
As ever the boughs of their fathers were.
I will take their proud full branches
Of gnarled or dainty form,
Hurling leafy avalanches
In thunder down the storm.
They have felt the brand of my ireful band,
And the withering gripe of my scathing hand.
In the tempest's roar, 'midst their branches hoar,
When their sturdiest boles I cracked,—
O'er their angry throes my voice arose
Like a deafening cataract:
Huge arms I clove from their inmost grove,
Till they writhed and howled with pain,
And darkened the air with fragments bare,
On my furious hurricane.

V.

I will do it again, and with funeral pall
Of a ghastly hue will envelope them all:
For my mission's unfilled till the fast-coming rain
Can creep to the Earth's covered crannies again.—
When the vole-mouse has burrowed, when the squirrel's concealed,
And the Iris-robed snake has forsaken the field,
And the millions of germens, create by the sun,
Are scattered and earthed—then my mission is done.

THE QUEEN'S VISIT TO EDINBURGH.

BY ONE OF THE BRIEFLESS.

LETTER I.—THE PREPARATIONS.

EDINBURGH, 30*th August*, 1842,
Charlotte Square.

MY DEAR CAMPBELL,—Doubtless you will be surprised at receiving a letter from me bearing the Edinburgh postmark; and still more so, when you learn, that for the last fortnight I have been wandering in breechless majesty in the Land of Cakes, instead of attending to my duties on the Northern Circuit. These duties, God knows, are not very difficult to discharge; for though, as you know, I have pursued the Judges for these three years with all the stupid pertinacity of a millhorse, my whole aggregate of fees has scarcely sufficed to pay the charges of keeping my wig in repair. As usual, the bigwigs had all the luck. "I sighed and looked, sighed and looked, sighed and looked again," at those lovely Thaises the attorneys; but they were impervious alike to glances and to groans. At last, finding that briefs were not to be bagged, and hearing from my friend M'Donald that grouse were, I pitched Blackstone and Chitty to the infernal gods; and having first shipped off my gown and wig for the Temple per rail, I shipped myself per steam to the terra incognita of Scotland.

I arrived at Glasgow in the midst of a dense fog, accompanied by a close drizzling rain—a pleasant combination of the vapour and shower bath, which the waiter at the hôtel assured me was "a fine saft drappin' wather, (Anglicè weather,) and uncoomon guid for the craps." Not being in any way interested in the "craps," however, and finding strong symptoms of an asthmatic cough coming on, I resolved to bid adieu to the western metropolis with all convenient speed; the more so that I was informed that the same laxative atmosphere was the staple commodity of the Glasgow skies. To obtain a view of the town through the smoke of two thousand manufactories condensed in a worse than London fog, was about as hopeless as for Sir Christopher Hatton, in The Critic, to have seen the Spanish fleet, and for the same good and substantial reason, viz., that it was not in sight. I was, no doubt, assured by a travelling Tomkins, that if I would mount a chimney, some five hundred feet high, erected to St. Rollox, or some other Glaswegian divinity, I might obtain a view of certain Elysian fields denominated "The Gorbals," and a fine sheet of water, called, I think, "The Gusedubs;" but I resisted the temptation, and fled to join my friend M'Donald in Blair Athole.—

I had immolated a hecatomb of grouse, and began to drink whisky like a native, when a rumour reached us that the Queen was to visit Scotland. It had been officially announced by the "special correspondent" of The Caledonian Mercury, that her Majesty and her princely Consort, sick of the monotony alike of Windsor and the Green Park, had resolved upon a crusade among "the Children of the Mist." The country to a man jumped at the intelligence. All the exuberant loyalty of the nation began to effervesce. The fiery-cross flew from hill to hill. Peer and peasant, laird and citizen thought, spoke, and dreamt of nothing else. Bagpipes, whose drones had been dumb since the Avatar of George the Fourth, were heard in the still of the evening, to wheeze an asthmatic pibroch to the tune of "Carle, now the King's come." Claymores, that had rusted in their sheath since last brandished in the faces of Cumberland's horsemen at Culloden, were taken down from the wall, subjected to a searching scrutiny of sand, and furbished up for a demonstration of adherence (this time) to the reigning house. Heather and thistles were at a premium; and the flags and banners of the Reform era of 1832 reappeared after a renovating dip in the dyer's tub, and some important alterations in the article of motto and device.

It was amusing to remark the anxiety of the populace in the little sequestered hamlets to know, whether their native place would not be selected for some special honour in the course of the Royal progress. Such exclamations as the following were heard on all hands:—"Will the Queen no come to Lochgellie?" "Shure, she'll bide twa three days wi' Sir Jone at Auchtermuchty!" "Hur canna come north, and no pe veesit ta Macallummore!" "Div' ye think, Jock," inquired a sturdy burgess's wife of Pittenweem of her bewildered gudeman, "that oor Provost will be knichtit?" "Wha's to gie her Majesty the keys o' Anst'er?" inquired an ex-bailie of that disfranchised burgh, in blank despair. "Deil's in't, if she disna' come to Kilrenny!" ejaculated the leading grocer of that great city; while, I believe, strong denunciations of personal violence were openly held out by several of the leading gentry of Crail, should her Majesty refuse to tarry among them for a space, until the freedom of their burgh should be presented to Prince Albert in a pewter box. With all their loyalty, the Scotch are confoundedly jealous of each other, and ready to pull caps for the possession of their beloved sovereign. Pray heaven, this Royal visit may not prove the apple of discord among the Royal Burghs. Leith and Edinburgh already look moodily at each other. Glasgow sucks its thumb in disappointed silence; and the inhabitants of Alloa have all but declared war against the indwellers of Kinross, because these latter happen to hold their local habitation on the north road by which her Majesty must inevitably pass, on her way to Perth and Taymouth Castle.

Several days before her Majesty was expected to arrive, the tide of population began to set in steadily towards the metropolis; and the crowded appearance of the stage-coaches warned me that I had no time to lose, if I wished to secure comfortable quarters in Edinburgh. Accordingly I yielded to the stream, and arrived here two days ago. You know what Edinburgh is in the summer—the blank array of closed window-shutters, and the desolation of its untrodden streets. Very different did I find the state of matters on my arrival. The streets swarmed—and hôtel-keepers, as somebody says,

> ——— repenting of their sin,
> Declared they could not take one other in.

Beds were commonly charged at a guinea a-night; and I was in some perplexity where to lay my head, when accident threw me in the way of our old friend and brother of the bar, M——, who kindly offered me the hospitality of his roof.

I hardly knew him at first sight; for, instead of being arrayed in "his customary suit of solemn black," he had converted himself into the likeness of "these misbegotten knaves in Kendal green," whom Falstaff did not slay. In plain language, horresco referens! he had donned a close-fitting green tunic, green small-clothes, and green cap with a sable plume therein, and flourished as a mighty man of valour, with bow in hand, and half-a-dozen arrows stuck in his belt, with the feathers uppermost, and projecting au derrière like a diminutive peacock's tail. This, he tells me, is the costume of the Royal Archers, a corps whose privilege it is to act as body-guard to her Majesty while in Scotland; and I have since observed numbers of them, and, among others, several London men, rushing about the streets with an air of frantic importance, which leads me to conclude that this gallant band are at present labouring under a slight epidemic attack of insanity. Their talk is most martial,—"right face," and "left wheel," being the most intelligible of their current phrases; and as they are called out to drill twice a-day, and it has been announced that none will be allowed to fall into the ranks except those who are reported by their drill-sergeant as not likely to fall out of them, I have no doubt they will cut a most distinguished figure in the ensuing processions. Undeniably, they are a fine-looking set of fellows; but at the same time, it is equally undeniable that their uniform gives them somewhat the air of overgrown children in disguise. I suspect I shall see little of M—— for the next two or three days, as he hints, that the body-guard will be constantly called out on duty.

I have been killing time by perambulating the streets in search of such fragments of intelligence as were to be picked up. There has been talk of her Majesty wishing to make this a private visit. The thing is impossible. There may be no pageant such as ushered in the arrival of George the Fourth. There can, eheu! be no Sir Walter to marshal the clans, and give one impulse to the assembled nation. There will be no apparition of a Lord Lyon, with his heralds and pursuivants buckramed to the teeth in stiff tabards of crimson and gold; no Lord High Constable or Knight Marischal in panoply of steel, with metamorphosed squires clinging in desperation to their saddles—but likewise there will be no privacy. Privacy! The very idea is preposterous. Is anybody so stupid as to imagine, that the first entry of her Majesty into her "Auld kingdom of Scotland" is to pass with as little notice as the return of a Lord Provost to his native city, after presenting a loyal and dutiful address? No, no, there can be no privacy. The dress of the nineteenth century may supersede the older costumes that variegated the streets in 1822: but that will be all.

Meanwhile, that "great and important body" of cherubs, who sit up aloft in the Royal Exchange, and preside over the fate of Edinburgh—I mean the Town Council—have been doing wonders in the way of preparation, in which the question of pounds shillings and pence has, with singular good taste, been continually prominent. Much fiery debate has been held on the subject of cocked-hats, and a new ermine robe proposed to be provided for the provost. A remit to two of their body—knights of the shears—to inquire into the state of the civic gowns, has ended in a report that they were in a fragmentary state of dilapidation, which no tailor's surgery could cure. Of course, a new supply at the cheapest rates was voted; when again a fearful difficulty arose in the item of hackney coaches, to carry their worships to and fro during the ceremonies. One exemplary guardian of the public purse entered his protest "against the old, rotten, abominable, aristocratic system of entertaining the rich at the expense of the poor." Most of the council, however, with an air of lordly indifference, announced their intention of scattering the civic funds to the winds of heaven on this auspicious occasion; while the city treasurer declared, in a paroxysm of unprecedented generosity, that he would not be able to say "No" to any demand on the burgh funds for a month to come. The beautiful steeple of St. Giles, upon the suggestion of some of their number, more conspicuous than the rest for his knowledge of the Fine Arts, has been painted all over with some cream-coloured abomination, that it might look spruce and cleanly in the Royal eyes. One poetic bailie suggested that the streets from Granton to Holyrood should be strewed with flowers; but the proposal was rejected, after an animated discussion, as heathenish and prelatic; and pounded earth (which, if to-morrow be wet, will mean mud) having been voted a fit and economical substitute, has been liberally scattered over the causeway along the whole line of her Majesty's approach. Finally, these deep deliberations have ended in the concoction of the inclosed memorandum of the approaching procession, in which provision is made for the Town Council, and for not a soul besides. In fact, to judge by the style of these worthies' proceedings, one might suppose it was them, and not Scotland, that her Majesty was visiting.

You see, therefore, that so far as the Council are concerned, everything has been satisfactorily arranged. Meanwhile, sea-faring Leith lies wrapped in gloomy rebellion. "Five of your Majesty's ancestors," said a soul-rending remonstrance forwarded a day or two ago to the foot of the throne, "have honoured the pier of Leith with the pressure of their royal toes. Are thy servants dogs, that upstart Granton should be preferred to our ancient burgh?" But plaintive as was this appeal, the royal soul remained unmoved. Leith boils through all her veins. She murmureth angrily along her shore; and should her Majesty still disregard her paramount claims to dirty the royal slipper, why then—the town wont illuminate! Dismal catastrophe!

It hath been notified that a Drawing-Room or Levée, or mixture of both, will be held on Friday; and accordingly every presentable person, and that means half the population, has been giving in his card to Sir William Martin's to-day. No doubt there will be enough of high blood, brilliant talent, gallant bearing, and surpassing beauty, to grace the first Drawing-room in the world; but then all the town-councillors from Jeddart to Thurso, and their wives, and daughters, and sandy-haired sons, and all manner of country parsons, and rural scribes, and distillers from the Highlands, and excisemen from the Lowlands, and lieutenants of yeomanry, and the Lord knows whom besides, must needs be presented, or otherwise be disgraced for ever. The mixture, therefore, you may be sure, cannot but prove as heterogeneous as the contents of a pawnbroker's shelves, but so much the better. Meanwhile the tailors are at work for dear life—scarce time allowed for needful cucumber and cabbage; and Donaldson of the Albion's whiskers expand in neglected luxuriance. The hot goose runs hissing over miles of broad cloth, and the star of tape is in the zenith. Philipps has arrived with a whole Holywell Street of refreshed court suits. Men stand at shop-doors, girding their thighs with every imaginable kind of rapier. Ladies are closeted with milliners, discussing the hidden mysteries of satin petticoats and tulle slips. Grandmothers are besieged for their treasures of Brussels and point-lace, and the country, from sea to sea, is ransacked for ostrich feathers. I see an advertisement from a shop in George Street, announcing an arrival of "Lelong diamond Ornaments and Voizet's pearl jewellery," which the advertiser, amusingly enough, pronounces to be "necessary to complete the court costume;" so that a blaze of Bristol stone of the purest water, and pearls of the most unimpeachable paste may be expected to irradiate the old walls of Holyrood. All the world is on the tiptoe of expectation, and I—am confoundedly tired. So good bye, my boy—I shall let you hear more of these doings as they progress; and now—to bed, Sir Knight. To-morrow for fresh fields and pastures new.

Thine ever, &c., &c.

LETTER II.—THE DISAPPOINTMENT.

EDINBURGH, 31*st August*, 1842,
Charlotte Square.

MY DEAR CAMPBELL,—I said in my yesterday's letter, that the idea of making the Queen's visit a private one was utterly preposterous; and I hardly needed the spectacle which this "romantic town" has presented to-day, to confirm me in what I said. Such downright, hearty, holiday abandonment I never witnessed. The Scotch, we are constantly told, are a cold and phlegmatic people. My own experience of them long since satisfied me that it is only to a superficial glance that they appear so. Still, although I had no doubt as to the strength and glow of feeling which the nation possesses, and fully anticipated a very decided manifestation of loyalty on the present occasion, I was by no means prepared for the outburst of enthusiasm which surrounds me on every side. Never, when king-worship was at its highest, did loyalty indulge itself in such extravagance. The whole city has been casting summersets for the last few days; in fact, it has been playing the part of a Tom Scott, resolutely walking upon its head, in defiance of the objurgations of all radical and anti-monarchical Quilps, and shaking its heels exultingly in the air.

"Fair laughed the morn, and soft the zephyrs blew," when I looked forth this morning about sunrise, from my bedroom window, which commands a sweeping view of the whole Firth of Forth, and the opposite coast of Fife. I am not going to inflict upon you a description of the landscape with which you are more familiar than myself. But you may imagine how gloriously it showed, under the cool deep blue of the morning sky. A few light clouds hovered upon the face of the heavens, just sufficient to enrich the beauty of the scene by catching the golden tints of the rising sun, while the shadows of the opposite coast, reflected in the unruffled mirror of the sea, lent a charm to the whole, more like "the consecration and the poet's dream," than the common "lights which are on sea and land." I don't wonder at the Scotch producing great landscape painters with such studies before them. Your friends, Horatio M'Culloch and D. O. Hill, have only to keep their eyes open, and transfer from nature the tints that give such intense reality to the pictures of the one, and such imaginative richness to those of the other.

Such a morning as this was all that could be wished for; and I doubt not that every Scotsman's heart beat with a stronger pulse, when he thought that his Queen was to behold his country for the first time under such an aspect. Their expectations were, however, doomed to be disappointed.

By the time I had done justice to our friend M——'s coffee, hot rolls, eggs, and kippered herring, and sallied forth, arrayed in what for me was a garb of uncommon gaiety, a blue coat and white indispensables, I found the whole streets in a stir,—and this though it was not then eight of the clock. From every avenue and entrance to the city thousands were pouring in to swell the tide that had for some time been setting towards the streets along which it had been announced that her Majesty was to approach. Glasgow threw in her myriads by the railway; and not a man, woman, or child within twenty miles round, that could find the means of getting into town, seemed to be absent. Almost every shop was shut—the voice of labour was mute, and nothing but the "clink of hammers knocking scaffolds up," indicated that for that day any man was earning his bread by the sweat of his brow. But if not by the sweat of their brow, there were many busy in making market of other articles of their personal property. Every soul who was possessed of the penny-wise spirit of his nation, and who also possessed a window, or other "coigne of vantage," which could by any contrivance be made to command a view of the streets along which her Majesty is to pass, has farmed it out at an enormous price. Four and five guineas for a window is a common charge; and I saw one advertised in Dundas Street for nine guineas! Scaffolds, many of them so fragile that no man in his sober senses would risk his neck upon them, have been erected along the whole line of the road from Granton to Holyrood; and for the seats, or, as they call them here, "stances," charges from three shillings to seven-and-sixpence are made—and, what is more, are readily given. No expense is spared by the people; but as a counterpoise to their extravagance, their civic rulers seem bent upon doing everything upon the cheap and nasty principle. They have put up a few posts of wood, painted of a dirty stone-colour, and which look very much like one of the sides of a village pound, with pseudo-gates of the same material, without hinges and without lock; and this they desire to delude the public and her Majesty into regarding as the city barrier,—a stretch of fancy which the most poetical of Town Councillors could in his honest heart hardly anticipate. Here the city keys are to be presented by the provost, a person, I am informed, of very diminutive stature, and, therefore, a platform of wood, slightly elevated, very much like the spring-board used at Astley's, for aiding the flying leaps of "the wonderful Acrobats," has been erected for his Lordship's convenience in presenting the keys to her Majesty as she passes. On the wing of the hingeless gate immediately in front of this platform, has been placed a knocker, which, in consistency with the extravagance of the whole affair, has been ingeniously constructed so as not to knock, and in the centre of this, wrought in metal, is the grinning visage of a satyr, who seems, by anticipation, to be enjoying the farce of the whole proceeding. And certainly, if the style of this extraordinary structure may be taken as in any way symbolical of the spirit of the men who planned it as the portal, though merely "for the nonce," of this city of noble buildings, and of the manner in which they are likely to perform a now meaningless ceremonial, then will these Dogberrys of the Edinburgh Town Council most surely afford him sufficient cause for merriment.

It had been announced, on the indubitable authority of the newspapers, that a line of signals had been established from St. Abb's Head onwards, to announce her Majesty's approach; and that a gun was to be fired from the Castle two hours before her landing. None of these signals had been given—the thunders of the cannon still slept; but nevertheless, so eager were the multitude to secure a good sight of her Majesty, that every soul was in the streets by ten o'clock, and thousands had taken up their stations in the windows, scaffoldings, and balconies. The Calton Hill resembled a huge living ant-hill; and every species of telescope in town, from the genuine Dollond down to the vilest spy-glass ever vended by misbelieving Jew, was planted against the horizon to catch the first glimpse of the royal squadron. Hour after hour wore on, and still no speck on the horizon quickened the excitement of the spectators. The sun burnt with a fierceness which no extent of soda water could allay; and the dust converted the gaudiest of garments into a meek and sobered brown. Still not a voice murmured. There was not one in the crowd who would not gladly have waited from morn till dewy eve, so that he had then caught but a glimpse of the one great loadstar of attraction. Never in a lifetime can one hope to see such a sight again. It realized the picture in Shakspere's lines, which we used to recite with such uncommon emphasis and villanous discretion at Eton; and some future Marullus may say to the men of Modern Athens, as his prototype did to those of Rome, should they ever prove equally fickle, which Heaven forefend!—"Many a time and oft"—allow this for the poetical license—

> Have you climbed up to walls and battlements,
> To towers and windows, yea to chimney tops,
> Your infants in your arms, and there have sat
> The live-long day with patient expectation,
> To see Victoria pass Edina's streets;
> And when you saw her chariot but appear—

I continue the quotation, having no doubt that to-morrow will prove this part of it to be equally appropriate—

> Have you not made an universal shout,
> That the Forth trembled underneath her banks,
> To hear the replication of your sounds,
> Made in her concave shores?

I walked down in the forenoon to Granton, which, I suppose you are aware, is about two miles from Prince's Street, through such a crowd as I never witnessed in my life. Temple Bar, when the tide of life is flowing there at its fullest, is nothing to it. Carriages of every description, from the nobleman's dashing London-built chariot and four, to the cab or minibus, as they call it here, built heaven only knows where, swarmed in every direction: but through all this weltering mass of human beings, the good humour and order that everywhere prevailed were most remarkable. There was no hustling, no incivility, no blackguardism; and persons of all classes mixed indiscriminately together without insult or annoyance.

The scene at Granton was truly magnificent. The noble estuary, gay with crowds of steamers and yachts, bedecked from stem to stern with flags—the magnificent coast beyond—the slopes crowded with a multitudinous sea of human beings, all arrayed in holiday attire, and among whom bright eyes and sunny cheeks, believe me, were not scarce, presented a spectacle which can never, I am sure, be forgotten by those who witnessed it. I was hailed from a carriage by your friends, the Gordons:—by the bye, Maria is a deucedly nice girl: has she any fortune?—and I lingered with them, flirting with the girls, and partaking the general idleness, for several hours, when the arrival of the Trident steamer, which had passed the squadron at Harwich, put an extinguisher upon the expectations of her Majesty's arrival to-day, by the intelligence, that it was impossible for the squadron to reach the Firth till late this evening at soonest. It was long before this intelligence was generally believed. Thousands who had come from a distance, and were to return home that night, still clung to the hope that the squadron might make its appearance; and on my way up to the town, I saw numbers seated patiently in the same places where they had planted themselves at early morning,—and very possibly they may be sitting there still, brooding, as Frere says, "over the addled eggs of expectation," and resolved that her Majesty shall not steal a march upon them, by landing and driving out to Dalkeith over night.

Ridiculous as this may appear at first sight, there is really some ground for it. From the first the whole arrangements at head quarters as to this royal visit have been bad. First, it was said to be her Majesty's intention not to come through Edinburgh at all, but to skulk off to Dalkeith Palace by a circuitous road. The Magistrates memorialized Sir James Graham, representing the anxiety of the whole population to greet her Majesty on this, her first visit, and praying him to communicate the projected line of proceedings to them, that they might have everything in readiness to give her Majesty a fitting reception. To this they receive no answer. The Duke of Buccleuch is applied to. He knows nothing but that her Majesty wishes to be as private as possible, and to drive up to town at a quick trot. Upon this the Royal Archers, who are to accompany her on foot, grow mutinous to a man; and the Celtic Society, who insist upon flourishing their bloodless claymores in defence of the royal person, clutch at their skene dhus, and murmur a multitude of confused sounds, which, I am told, are meant for Highland oaths. Sir James Forrest, and the whole posse of those who sit in Council with him, are in despair. All their beautiful programme for the reception was to go for nothing; and the scene of the barriers, the great light-comedy feature of the play, was to be cut out of it altogether. A deputation was appointed, and a contract made with the driver of a noddy—which you must know is a one-horse shay, far gone in a decline—to carry the aforesaid deputation to Dalkeith to remonstrate with her Majesty's ministers: and I see the result of the conference in an announcement placarded on the walls in bills of the most minute and paper-sparing dimensions, "that the Lord Provost and Magistrates have received the gratifying assurance from her Majesty's Ministers, that her Majesty will be prepared to accede to the wishes of her loyal subjects, in regard to her progress through the city by the line already announced." "Due notice," add the city Archons, "will be given of her Majesty's arrival, and the probable time of her entrance into the city." We shall see how things go: but for my own part, as I see nothing like orderly preparation—no one person taking a lead—and, consequently, a miserable indecision and uncertainty in the whole arrangements, I should not be surprised if a screw turns out to be loose after all.

M—— returned to-day in a fever of excitement. He had been startled from the revisal of a Condescendence at early morning, by a trumpet call, sounded at his doorway by the trumpeter of the corps, to summon him to parade; and, reversing the axiom, cedant arma togæ, he abandoned his legal strategics for those of the tented field—caught up his bow and arrows, like another Robin Hood, and posted off for the Riding School, where his troop have been under marching orders all day long. I met him, on my return to town, strutting through George Street, in company with A——, another brother of the bar, disguised as a Celt; for what reason I cannot divine, being perfectly certain that A—— is not allied, even by cousinship fifty times removed, with any known sept of Highland caterans. We were joined at dinner by several of M——'s friends, all of whom are bitten with the prevailing mania; and I left a parcel of lawyers and W.S.'s in the dining-room, about an hour ago, talking of ravelins, embrasures, and counterscarps, as though they were as familiar with the outworks of a fortress as they are with the greasy precincts of a Lord Ordinary's bar.

Meanwhile the preparations for an illumination on Friday are proceeding with great vigour. Invention has been racked for devices; and V's and A's of gigantic proportions—a very Gemini of variegated lamps—are destined to illuminate the hemisphere of every crescent and street. The directors of the Royal Bank have very appropriately covered the face of their mansion with a transparency, wherein her Majesty is represented as standing upon a cloud of ingots, "turning up a silver lining to the night;" at which her royal consort, who is dimly seen in the background, is, Ixion-like, ineffectually grasping; while some half dozen of corpulent cherubs—angelic Daniel Lamberts—flutter around the picture, waving Titanic "Promise to Pays" in the face of a penniless public. Edinburgh is seen beneath the aërial group—a sarcastic hint that the wealth of "the gude town" is all in nubibus. Prince Alberts in kilts, and Victorias in tartan scarfs, like the hero and heroine of a Scottish melodrama at Bartlemy Fair, with brown patches of dirt for mountains, and blue ditto for skies, are the favourite devices. In short, all the usual manifestations of High Art, prevalent on similar occasions, are to be seen.

It is rumoured that there is to be no drawing-room. And why, think you? Some unfortunate urchin belonging to some nameless occupant of the royal halls has had measles, or fever, or gripes, or some other infantine complaint; and the Galens of the city declare, that they do not consider the palace free from infection. Mark you, this discovery is made after all the state apartments have been newly fitted up; so that the exquisite skill of "her Majesty's Superintendant of Works, Mr. Nixon," in the disposition of crimson drapery and gold leaf, which the penny-a-liners have chronicled so faithfully for the last ten days, goes for nothing. But, horror of horrors! What is to become of the aspirants to a kiss of the royal hand? Dismay sits gibbering in the boudoir; and Philipps talks darkly of prussic acid. But there is balm in Gilead. Dalkeith Palace hath ample halls, and there shall Majesty do honour to the beauty and the chivalry of Scotland. Thus whispers a voice of comfort; and again the boudoir smiles, and prussic acid is forgotten in —— Moet's champagne. One naturally inquires, what the deuce sickly brats have to do in the palace? And as the change of locality will touch the pockets of nine-tenths of the people going, I hope they will see to a reformation in the future tenancy of Holyrood. The hackney-coachmen, with great public spirit, had fixed three guineas as the minimum charge for a fare to Holyrood; nine will, on the same ratio, be the "prices current" for a fare to Dalkeith.

What the procession to-day was to have been, or what it is to be to-morrow, nobody seems to know. The High Constables are to muster, I believe.—The Incorporation of Tailors have marshalled under their convener—

"Their hearts are a thousand, their numbers are nine."

The Cordiners, or Knights of the Awl, have sworn to be faithful to the last; and the Gardeners have been weaving crowns of dahlias and sun-flowers for a week. Shrubberies have been plundered of their laurels; and it is whispered that sundry damsels of excelling beauty—the Eves of the Mid-Lothian Paradises—are to precede the royal chariot-wheels, scattering flowers. Leigh Hunt should be here to see. What is of most importance, however, viz., a provision for keeping the carriage-way clear from the pressure of the crowd, has not, to all appearance, been made. But of course, the Magistrates are too much taken up with themselves and their procession to think of this.

I have just returned from the Calton Hill, where I have been to see the bonfires blazing a welcome to her Majesty. Arthur's Seat sent forth a huge volcano of flame that lighted up the faces of the crowds upon the Calton Hill, and flung a radiance upon the distant battlements of the castle. Every peak and promontory along the shores of the Forth, and far inland as the eye could reach, had its crest of flame. I counted twenty of these twinkling points of fire. The effect was superb; and by way of wind-up to this prosaic epistle, I feel strongly tempted to commit a bit of verse upon the occasion. As that rare Friar John of the Funnels in Rabelais saith—"The devil a bit do I know the way to go about it. However, the spirit of fustian possesses us all, I find. By St. John, I'll poetize, since everybody else does. But I pray, pardon me if I don't rhyme in crimson. 'Tis my first essay," since I bade adieu to the Muses, eight years agone, at the gateway of Lincoln's Inn. Here goes, then, for

THE GATHERING.

It was as bright a morn, as e'er brought in a glorious day,
And bright and many were the eyes, that hailed its earliest ray.
The flocks were left all shepherdless upon the lonely hill,
The plough within the furrow slept, and silent was the mill,
Among the yellow grain that day no reaper might be seen,
No maiden singing with her pail upon the gowan'd green;
For ere the lark had left her nest, full many a youth and maid,
And sire, whose heart beat youthfully beneath his belted plaid,
Had brushed the heavy dews away from mountain and from down,
For they by daybreak were to be within Dunedin's town.
And wherefore stirs Dunedin now through all her lofty streets,
And why these glances that proclaim how high each bosom beats?
See on her castle's battlements how yonder banner swells,
And hark, within her crested spires how gaily dance the bells!
Ay, proudly may yon banner swell, and bells may gaily dance,
And high may every bosom beat, and joy be in each glance,
And well may stirring crowds along her lofty streets be seen,
For in her ancient walls shall she to-day receive her Queen.
Then, clansmen, let your pibrochs swell! Ye cannoneers, prepare
Your thunders, to reverberate a welcome through the air!
Blow, trumpeters, a louder peal! and you, fair maidens, string
Fresh garlands of all brightest flowers to grace her welcoming!
The sun rose up into the sky—unclouded was his ray—
And town and tower and citadel beneath it smiling lay.
The Firth of Forth gave back its sheen from waves of sheeted glass,
A mirror of pellucid blue from Cramond to the Bass;
And gallant vessels numberless along its bosom glide,
With white sails glancing in the sun, and streamers floating wide,
And in them countless multitudes are borne, a noble train,
Gone forth to greet the Ocean Queen within her own domain.
Still echoing o'er the silent wave is heard the distant cheer,
Still on they glide, and, one by one, grow dim and disappear;
And still from tower and steep is bent full many a straining eye,
But still no sail looms up between the ocean and the sky:
And when the sun had dropt behind Ben Lomond's misty crest,
Unweariedly they gazed along the ocean's shadowy breast,
But still no sail might they descry—night's shadows thicker grew,
And hill, and bay, and purple wave were hidden from the view.
Yet spread the news from lip to lip—it flew from post to post,
The Royal Fleet is steering on by Scotland's iron coast!
A watcher on the heights had seen the sunshine's parting smile
Gleam on its canvass as it swept by Cuthbert's Holy Isle.
The joyful tidings reached Dunbar—to Berwick town they came,
And from its pyramidded hill arose the warning flame.
Anon a blaze from Arthur's Seat gleamed redly o'er the plain;
The couching Lion shook the fire in flashes from his mane;
The city at his feet with cheers received the signal fire,
And reddening in its light shone out dome, pinnacle, and spire;
The Pentlands with a triple blaze gave answer from afar,
And Tintock's distant peak was seen like a resplendent star.
From crag to crag along the coast the fiery heralds sped,
They fired Dunnottar as they passed, they flamed on Dunnet Head;
The warder lit his beacon blaze on Stirling's Castle wall,
And over tower and battlement loud pealed his bugle call;
The shepherd resting on the hill the ruddy signal knew,
That rose serenely through the night from rocky Ben Venue;
And on it sped, that fiery sign, from peak to mountain crest,
Till old Ben Nevis gleamed along the waters of the west.
In town, and holm, and hamlet was that sign with rapture seen,
And sire, and son, and maiden blessed their young and beauteous Queen,
And ever shades of lofty thought would deepen o'er their mirth,
As Scotland's prideful memories were told around the hearth.
To-morrow should her footsteps press Old Scotland's rugged strand,
To-morrow she should learn to love their own beloved land.
Then rose the song of ancient faith, of kingly grace and truth,
Of days when Holyrood was bright with beauty and with youth;
When, glancing on by tower and town, rode king and noble peer,
And royal mote through greenwood rung, a-chasing of the deer.
On sped the night with song and dance, and music's merry strain,
The fisher heard the sounds of mirth come stealing o'er the main,
And all night long the hum of life was heard from sea to sea.
Such night in Scotland ne'er hath been, nor e'er again shall be.

At least I suppose so. But if not, I wanted a rhyme to close my rhapsody, and this serves the turn to a nicety. So wishing her Majesty pleasant slumbers, under the cliffs of Inchkeith, where, doubtless, the royal squadron is by this time safely moored, I shall deposit myself forthwith in the arms of Morpheus. Vale! sis memor mei!

LETTER III.—THE ENTRY.

EDINBURGH, 1*st September*, 1842.

MY DEAR CAMPBELL,—Yesterday Edinburgh was the most loyal of cities—to-day it is in a state of almost total disaffection. Manchester is dutiful in comparison, and Sheffield may be said to reverence authority in high places. Scotland's blood is on fire—her thistle bristles through all its points. The horizon looks louring and revolutionary, and "Pistol's cock is up, and flashing fire will follow,"—or rather it will not follow, for there are vehement threats of "No Illumination!" And now for the explanation of this most strange reverse.

As I told you, everything as to the time and manner of her Majesty's landing down to yesterday night was in the utmost uncertainty. The Provost and Sheriff—par nobile fratrum—had issued a bulletin, that due notice of the great event would be given to the citizens. They, good easy souls, lulled by the Syren song of these civic Circes, tumbled into bed to dream of to-morrow's pageant, and satisfied that, come when she might, the Queen could not steal a march upon the Arguses of the City Chambers. Put not your trust in Town-councils, however, will henceforth be the Edinburgh reading of the preacher's admonition. The Queen landed, passed through the city, and the Town Council were—at their breakfasts.

The morning broke heavily and with clouds. Rain had fallen over night, and the magistrates' road-way of pounded earth was converted into most glutinous mud—undeniable "glaur." Loyalty woke with a headache, after the revels of the previous night, as at seven o'clock two of the castle guns announced to the inhabitants that the royal flotilla was in motion in the Firth. This, the only signal that could be relied on—for, previous to the Provost and Sheriff's bulletin, it had been distinctly intimated that her Majesty would land two hours after the firing of these guns—set the more active in motion. Countless were the chins scarified by reckless razors—countless the throats scalded by rashly-swallowed tea. By eight o'clock the streets were thronged; and windows, story above story, held forth their eager thousands. Still no announcement from Provost or Sheriff came forth—not a Bailie revealed himself in the glory of ruffles and cocked-hat—the procession to the barriers was looked for in vain—and each man asked his neighbour, who was simply as wise as himself, what had become of the signal from Nelson's Monument? The crowd wandered confusedly to and fro, and the prevailing impression seemed to be, that her Majesty would breakfast at Mrs. Clark's, or the Granton Hôtel; give the Magistrates full leisure to enjoy their rolls and marmalade in peace; and come up to town about noon, in a state carriage, attired after the fashion of Chalon's well-known picture. About nine o'clock, a murmur ran through the crowd that her Majesty had landed, and was on her way to town. It could not be. It was not five minutes since the royal body-guard had passed—they could not be half-way to Granton—and the royal person could not possibly trust itself on Scottish ground, save under the protection of their bows and arrows. The Provost's carriage paraded its new hammercloth and liveries, and the brawny limbs of his Lordship's "flunkies," along admiring streets: but where was the Provost himself? Still no procession to the barriers—no elevation of the city keys—no signal from the Monument. The Queen could not be coming, and still the murmuring crowds moved to and fro. The balconies were nearly empty.

The royal body-guard had reached Howard Place on their way to Granton, when they were met by a troop of dragoons, in the centre of whom was an open carriage, with her Majesty and Prince Albert. On dashed the Toxophilites to claim their post of honour. Heedless of their claims, and doubtful of the intentions of such a strange-looking body, the dragoons received their charge manfully, and plume and quiver gave way before helmet and sabre. Many a gallant squire was rolled over in the mud; and by the time the royal body-guard were recognised by the officers of dragoons, and had their claims allowed, the corps was in utter confusion, and glad to follow the royal carriage as best they might. On it went at a quick trot. The barriers were reached. Where is now the Provost with city keys, and courtly speech?—and echo answered—In the Council Chamber! The gates would not close, and her Majesty would not wait. Forward went the royal barouche.

The glitter of the soldiers' helmets, as they stormed the barriers, proclaimed to the crowds that filled the windows of Pitt Street and Dundas Street, that the Queen was at hand. The cry spread through all the avenues of the city, and people flew from street to street, as from before a pursuing foe. Breathless with surprise, the multitudes saw the carriage pass. Those in the windows could not see her Majesty for very amazement, and those in the streets had enough to do to get out of the way of the crowd that swept onwards with the royal carriage. Still along the line there rose a deafening shout that pealed along from house to house, as the pink bonnet of her Majesty was recognised; and hats and handkerchiefs innumerable fluttered from every window. The streets were like a billowy sea. Confusion worse confounded prevailed on every side. Carriages drove furiously along by cross streets to overtake the cortège at some distant turning, pursued by multitudes on foot, running as if for life. The royal carriage moved onwards at a quick trot, and the body-guard, panting like driven deer, "toiled after it in vain." One by one, some archer, fatter than the rest, dropped off, and might be seen calling wildly for ginger-beer or lemonade in a neighbouring restaurateur's. Everywhere the people were taken by surprise. The Celtic Society, who had mustered at the Royal Hôtel in Prince's Street, and were to have escorted the Royal train from the barriers, had barely time to rush out into the street, and with buttered roll in one hand, and claymore in the other, to salute it as it passed. Some were even unable to accomplish this, and one enthusiastic Celt was seen leaning over a bed-room window of the hôtel, with one-half of his chin covered with lather, and waving a razor with loud and exulting cheers.

The crowd that pressed onwards with the royal carriage had by this time become a mob, which it would have required a stronger force than the Royal Archers to keep at bay. I hear that they pressed so close upon the carriage, that they were even able to accost her Majesty. If so, I presume, she was regaled with such expressions of Scottish loyalty, as, "I hope yer majesty's nane the waur o' the fleg that chiel Oxford gae ye!" "Gin I had Maister Francis by the scruff o' the neck, my sang, if I wadna gar his haffets dirl!" "Ye'll hae been sick for a chance: them east winds maks an unco potch in the water." "An' hoo's the bits of bairns?" &c. &c. &c.; a species of conversation, that must have made her Majesty doubt, whether the Scotch populace did not speak some foreign language.

By the time her Majesty reached the Waterloo Bridge, the spectacle had assumed a very imposing aspect. The long line of Prince's Street was alive with gaily dressed figures. Immense crowds were clustered on the balconies in front of the Register Office and Theatre, while the Calton Hill, which closed the vista on the east, was covered with a motley throng. Cheers filled the air, and the booming of the Castle guns gave grandeur to the whole. At the entrance to the Waterloo Bridge, a festoon of flowers and shrubs, was suspended across the street, from the centre of which hung a huge crown of flowers, that seemed almost to touch the royal carriage as it passed. The effect of this really fine device was admirable—indeed it was the only device upon the occasion that showed any imagination. On went the train. The cheering reverberated along the Calton Hill, and the last of the troopers' sabres disappeared from my sight.

Meanwhile, dire dismay had spread through all the Chambers of the Town Council, where the civic dignitaries were waiting the signal to proceed to the barriers. Their speculations on the figure each was to make in the eyes of royalty upon the occasion were interrupted by a messenger "bloody with spurring, fiery red with haste," dashing in among them with the tidings that the Queen was in Prince's Street.—Forth rushed the provost: bailie and councillor, chamberlain and clerk, kilted up their robes, sallied after him to the street, and jumped into the carriages, that were placidly waiting to convey them to the barriers. "A Forrest to the rescue!" was the cry, and away clattered the municipal chariots down High Street and Canongate, followed by the High Constables at the top of their speed. Such hurry-skurry the old gables of the Netherbow have not witnessed, since the days when the alarm of Prince Charles' Highlanders at the gates startled the shop-keepers of the Luckenbooths from their propriety. The Raid of Coltbridge was a trifle to it. Vengeance unutterable was denounced by every plethoric High Constable, as he gave up the ineffectual chase. Their Moderator waved his silver baton in desperate defiance. Peel, like the premier of King Darius, was to close his career in an aërial fandango, and Buccleuch, like Lord Soulis, to be boiled in lead; while Majesty herself——But if others forgot their respect, I sha'n't forget mine.

Sorely spent in wind, the rabble rout reached the Regent Terrace, in time to see the royal carriage sweep past; so unconscious was her Majesty of the presence of kindred greatness, that even the Provost received no beck of salutation; and discomfited, but not crest-fallen, the party returned to their hall of Council. Deep and angry was the consultation that ensued. The city stormed—barriers, reared at ruinous expense, despised—no procession—no dutiful surrender of keys—no speech—no glimpse of royal grace; Heavens and Earth, it was not to be endured! Scotland, in the person of her metropolis, has been insulted—explanations must be given, or——I have not heard what was the alternative.

Meantime the crowds are clamouring without. The Magistrates must themselves explain. Why came no signal from the Monument, no warning to go forth into the streets? Thousands from distant Greenock and the fragrant banks of the Molendinar Burn, have seen no vestige of the royal person. The incorporated trades,—Tailors, Cordiners and all,—have re-painted their banners, the Gardeners have devastated their flowerbeds—in vain. Everybody is disappointed, and somebody must be to blame. Some revile the Council, some execrate Peel and the Duke of Buccleuch, and not a few mutter against our gracious Lady herself. The contention waxes louder. The Council are not to blame, said one. Long ere dawn they despatched a messenger, one of their own bailies, to give signal of the royal approach. No signal came: the bailie has not since been seen, and the prevailing opinion is, that he must have been borne off by some sea nymph, to eat oysters and make love

> In the caves of Domdaniel,
> Under the roots of the sea.

Besides, was not her Majesty to do in all things according to the wishes of her faithful people? in other words, to wait till it pleased the Magistrates to receive her? Peel and Buccleuch, argued another, are not to blame. Nihil noverunt in causa—they promised nothing—could promise nothing. And the Queen was innocent, contended a third. She knew nothing of the crowds that panted to behold her—of the Town Council's procession—of the ceremony of the barriers,—that not having formed a topic of her constitutional studies under Lord Melbourne. She was heartily sick of the sea, and thought only of a good cup of tea and a steady couch at Dalkeith; and if the Magistrates were so unreasonable as to wish her to delay her progress, they ought, at least, to have made the request in person. Tot homines, tot sententiæ. But all agreed, that somebody was to blame, and all grumbled exceedingly.

For my own part, I consider the blame to rest with the Magistrates, or those of their number who were deputed to make the arrangements. It was quite clear that the Queen, after a protracted voyage, would land as soon as she possibly could. Her early habits are well known. To have requested her to delay would have been discourteous; nor, so far as the people were concerned, was any delay necessary. Had her landing taken place at five, in place of nine, in the morning, they would have cheerfully turned out to give her greeting. All that they wanted was reasonable warning; and scarcely this; for, if the unfortunate announcement that such would be given had not been issued, no warning would have been required. They would all have been in their places long before her Majesty could have landed. And what shall be said of the demeanour of the Town Council towards the "Queen of England?" Had they possessed the impulses which are supposed to actuate educated men, they would have been the foremost to salute our gracious Lady when her foot touched Scottish ground, in place of loitering in their Council Chamber, thinking only of their own dignity. Who cared a fig for the mummery of their procession, and the effete symbol of surrendering the city keys, that seems to have gone between them and their wits? Edinburgh looked to her civic rulers to show the Queen the courtesies that a stranger shows to his guest, more especially when that guest is a female; and these should have been shown upon the pier at Granton. This done, they might then have played off the farce of the barriers if they liked. Had they acted in this spirit, there would have been no want of signals. The countless thousands that were burning to give their Queen a true Scottish welcome, and have now lost the opportunity of doing so, would then have been gratified in the indulgence of an amiable curiosity, and not a murmur of disappointment would have been heard. As it was, do not imagine that the reception given to her Majesty by the inhabitants was anything but magnificent. But how much more magnificent it might have been, had the arrangements of the public authorities been what they ought to have been! I confess I shared in the common disappointment. The entry was not what the entry of the first Queen of the world into one of the most picturesque of cities should have been—not what the people of Scotland wished it to be. It needed not the pomp and circumstance of processions and cavalcades to have made the spectacle one to fill the memory for a lifetime. The Queen herself, bearing with her that divinity which the least imaginative acknowledge, yet by the graces and virtues of the woman claiming a household interest in every heart, was all that the people cared to see. But she should have been seen advancing with the dignity and reverence due to a Queen, through long lines of uncovered thousands, not jostled, as she was, by a tumultuous mob. Herald and pursuivant in blazoned surcoat, paladin and peer with golden rigol and cloak of crimson, the fanfare of trumpets and "the measured tread of marching men,"—these are what should herald royalty entering triumphantly into a noble city. But what was the escort of to-day? A brace of supernumerary policemen in greasy fustian—not even members of the regular staff—led off the procession, followed by a rabble of dirty boys. A score of dragoons, with a panting handful of the Royal Archers, completed the cortège, and these were so hemmed in by a weltering mob of clamorous artisans, that a few red coats and glittering sabres was all that was visible to "any thick sight." Well may the cheek of every Scottish man burn with indignation at the thought of such a spectacle! And for this they have to thank the Edinburgh Town Council!

Great was the wrath which these mighty potentates, however, affected to feel. An insult had been done to them, forsooth; and away posted Sir James Forrest and some of his right-hand men to Dalkeith, to demand an explanation. By the time they arrived there, I presume their valour had oozed, like Bob Acres', out at the palms of their hands; and their demand for explanation, I hear, dwindled into an apology for their own supineness. By this time the Queen had been informed of the disappointment her sudden appearance had occasioned—indeed, the vacant benches of the balconies along the line of her approach must have satisfied her Majesty that something was wrong—and she graciously intimated that she would make a progress from Holyrood to the Castle, and thence through the city upon Saturday. Again smiles lit up the fine and benevolent countenance of the Lord Provost, the wrath of the Council was appeased, and the city has been restored to something like tranquillity. It will illuminate after all! But Saturday's progress will be nothing to what to-day's might have been. The one will be a formal procession to obliterate a disappointment—the sugared bun to a fractious child; —the other would have been the spontaneous burst of universal enthusiasm. So far as Edinburgh is concerned, the disappointment will be wiped away; but it will be carried back to the provinces by thousands. The city is still moody and out of humour; it is ashamed of itself, and does not see very clearly where to lay the blame. But its eyes will be opened by degrees. It will perceive the lamentable indecision and imbecility of its rulers, and repudiate their entire proceedings with disgust. Their arrangements throughout have been puerile and absurd. So admirable, for instance, was their selection of a signal master, that it is now understood, that the Bailie who had been despatched to Granton, to watch and intimate the approach of the Royal Yacht to his brethren, coolly saw her Majesty land; and, after she had driven off, got into a minibus and followed the royal party to town. I suppose he expected the Queen to summon him to her knee, like the little foot-page in the ballad, and, after knighting him on the spot, send him up to town with her compliments to the Bailies, "and would be glad to know when she might be permitted to approach!"

Friday, 2d September, 1842. People are begin-ling to get into good humour again, and to laugh

t the ridiculous exhibition the Magistrates made f themselves yesterday. The wags are at work, nd Sir James Forrest and his coadjutors have be-ome the burden of numerous ballads, "sung hrough the streets to filthy tunes." A strong ody of ruffians, with voices of thunder, bellow heir praises through every street; and under my indow, one of those fellows that infest the streets
n the garb of sailors, singing—

'Twas in-a the year-a of ninety-eight
We sailed from-a Portsmouth-a downs, as been rasping out the following canticle for the ast five minutes, to the delight of a group of maidervants and grinning urchins—

Hey, Jamie Forrest, are ye waukin' yet?
Or are your Bailies snorin' yet?
If ye are waukin' I would wit,
Ye'd hae a merry, merry, mornin'.

The frigate guns they loud did roar,
But louder did the Bailies snore,
An' thought it was an unco bore
To rise up in the mornin'.
Hey Jamie, &c.

And syne the castle thunder'd loud;
But kipper it is savoury food,
And that the Bailies understood,
Sae early in the mornin'.
Hey Jamie, &c.

The Queen she 's come to Granton Pier,—
Nae Provost and nae Bailie here:
They 're in their beds, I muckle fear,
Sae early in the mornin'.
Hey Jamie, &c.

The Queen she 's come to Brandon Street,
The Provost and the keys to meet;
And div ye think that she 's to wait
Your waukin' in the mornin'?
Hey Jamie, &c.

My Lord, my Lord, the Queen is here,!
—And vow! my Lord he lookit queer:
"And what sets her so soon asteer?
It 's barely nine in the mornin'!"
Hey Jamie, &c.

"Gae bring to me my robes o' state;
Come, Bailies, we will catch her yet:"
"Run, run, my Lord, ye are ower late,
She 's been through the town this mornin'!"
Hey Jamie, &c.

"Awa' to Dalkeith ye maun hie,
To mak your best apology:
The Queen she 'll say, O fie! O fie!
Ye 're lazy loons in the mornin'."
Hey Jamie, &c.

I have it on the best authority that these lines were sung to her Majesty at the Palace to-day, and hat she enjoyed them heartily. She can have no oubt about the stupidity of the Magistrates—and rill not impute their fault to her good citizens of auld Reekie! Adieu! I am going off to dine with he Gordons, and to accompany them through the own in the evening, to see the flare up of loyal andles—a display which may be very beautiful, ut must be very wick-ed. Under the shelter of his hideous pun I retreat. Thine ever.

LETTER IV.—THE ILLUMINATION—THE PROGRESS—THE RECEPTION.

EDINBURGH, 5th September, 1842.

MY DEAR CAMPBELL,—Though I have undertaken to give you a sketch of the doings here, expect not that I shall chronicle for you all the details. For these consult the newspapers. They will tell you the colour of the royal bonnet, the woof of the royal shawl. Not a smile upon the royal lips shall want its chronicler—not an exclamation of royal wonder pass without its record. Her Majesty on landing, it seems, silenced the remonstrances of her affectionate consort by stating, that she would go to Dalkeith in an open carriage, "unless it rained more." Marvellous fortitude! She actually smiled as she chatted with Sir Robert Peel and the Duke of Buccleuch, on the deck of the Royal yacht. "What noble river is this?" she inquired of an attendant archer, as she passed the Water of Leith. "Which of the Scottish nobility inhabits this splendid mansion?" she again inquired, as she passed the Jail. "Has Edinburgh, then, no Lord Mayor, or Aldermen?" asked her Majesty, with affectionate solicitude, as she was about to bid good-morning to her body-guard. The Prince, again, as he ascended Arthur's Seat on Friday last, was heard to exclaim, with singular originality, "Gad, this tries a fellow's wind!" And he was actually detected this forenoon, by another vigilant penny-a-liner, in the startling act of pulling up his shirt collar. People are surprised that royalty should do anything like anybody else; and these valuable contributions to history are eagerly devoured.

Commend me to Edinburgh above all cities for an illumination! Everywhere else it is generally a very paltry affair. Half-a-dozen blazing muttons in a window are not the noblest sight imaginable; but let a street like Heriot Row, or the High Street, be lighted throughout in this way, and the effect is excellent. The declivity on which the town is built, and the fine areas formed by the gardens of the different streets and squares, afford those points of sight which other towns want; and I can assure you, the peering of these thousand twinkling eyes of fire, from out the dusky shadows of the vast pile of buildings that overhang the Prince's Street gardens, gives the imagination a fillip of uncommon strength. Looking on the town, with its spires standing out in the blaze of light against the clouded sky—its streets glimmering, tier upon tier, like huge carkanets of burnished gold upon the bosom of Night—I felt as if I saw before me an embodiment of some vision gathered from the Arabian Nights, of Bagdad—

In the golden prime
Of good Haroun Alraschid.

Although the night was wet and unpleasant, all the town was in the streets. The crowd was immense—the pressure in some places anything but comfortable—and as a Dandie-Dinmont looking-fellow, who was elbowing his way along, and crushing a rib at every step, exclaimed, "Lord! this is waur nor St. Boswell's fair yet!" Everybody, however, was in good humour. People stared with pleasure at the everlasting lady with the tartan scarf, and squeamish-looking gentleman with the moustache; and devoutly received them as "lively effigies" of the Queen and Prince Albert, without comment upon the palpable squint of the one, or fearfully ill-built coat of the other.

Next morning, about ten o'clock, I found myself perched, like a crow, upon a gable end, in the High Street, with "an auld wife" closely clasped in my embrace. I see you marvel at my selection of a locality for my amours—but be not alarmed either for my virtue or my taste. "An auld wife," Edinburgicè, means only a peculiar species of chimney-pot, to which I had clambered, to obtain a view of her Majesty's progress up the High Street. Airy and cool as was my seat, I was by no means singular. Others as adventurous as myself were clustered over every house-top in the street. The steeple of the Tron Church, and the broad roof of St. Giles, had each its complement of spectators, and there was not a window within sight but was full. The dirty cap and whiskified visage of the Dianas of the close-heads no longer appeared over the tottering window-sills of their chamber windows: but in their stead were seen the lace-trimmed bonnet and blooming face of damsels of gentle blood. High up in attics, next the sky, were the best in the land, glad of any loophole from which a view could be obtained.

> The folks, I knew, were passing rich and fair:
> So wondered how the devil they got there.

The Magistrates had transplanted the far-famed barriers from Brandon Street, and thrown them across the High Street, about fifty yards below the City Chambers; resolved, at whatever sacrifice of common sense, to have their play played out. The provost's speech must be spoken, and the bailies must display their court suits; and for this the city must have its gate of defence in the very centre of the town, where, of all places in the world, it should least have been. It is really high time this ridiculous ceremonial were as utterly exploded as that branch of it, long since abolished, which consisted of presenting majesty with a "propine" of its own current coin, which majesty was mean enough to pocket without a blush. Nothing is so contemptible as a superannuated symbol.

Of course to me, to whom the Queen's pleasant countenance is wellnigh as familiar as the gate of Buckingham Palace, the sight of her to-day was a matter of considerable indifference. But I would not have lost the sight which presented itself as she advanced up the High Street for the heaviest fee that ever crossed Sir William Follett's palm. I know nothing to which it could be compared. Figure to yourself the immense piles of building on either side, towering six and eight stories high, picturesque at any time, and now covered to the roof with people—the fine old cathedral, with its eager crowds bending over buttress and spiracle, the streets thronged, the array of mounted cavalry, handkerchiefs and flags waving at every point, cheer succeeding cheer, and the roar of cannon from the castle in the background deepening but not drowning the huzzahs. Where in the world wide will such a scene be witnessed in our days? All that was picturesque to the eye, all that was most touching to the imagination, were there combined. "The Majesty of England!" The incarnation of that proud idea was swelling in every heart, and rung through these deafening cheers; and when the band struck up "God save the Queen," that noble air, which never fails to stir the heart like a trumpet, there was not one breast but echoed to the strain—one eye that was not dimmed by the depth of its emotion.

I was so much engrossed by the grandeur of the scene, that it was some time before I observed that the Queen had gone at least fifty yards beyond the barriers before she was stopped by the Lord Provost, who at length was safely delivered of his speech. The city keys were presented and returned in the usual form; and if her Majesty did not feel the hollowness and farce of the proceeding, breaking in as it did upon a spectacle of such magnificence, I shall be content to forego my hopes of a silk gown. This done, her Majesty proceeded to the Castle, and by the time I had effected a descent from my perch, and got down to our friend Tait's balcony, she was standing on the highest of the batteries, alongside of the famous Mons Meg, and receiving the cheers of the crowds in Prince's Street. The sky, which had hitherto been heavy and louring, now broke up for a little, and a gleam of sunshine irradiated the old battlements of Dunedin. A nobler view than that commanded by the spot where her Majesty stood it were difficult to conceive; and, with the added effect of the enthusiastic multitudes at her feet, who can doubt that our youthful queen received from it high and ennobling impulses fit for a queenly heart?

The progress from the Castle down Bank Street, the Mound, and along Prince's Street, was one continued triumph, with the usual ingredients of waving hats, handkerchiefs, and huzzahs. The provost, buried under a cocked hat, and his bailies covered with scarlet gowns and immortal ridicule, added dignity to the procession. The Archers—such of them as had not been irrecoverably broken in wind by the chase of Thursday—were in their places round the royal carriage; and things went as smoothly as could be expected, considering that, from the High Street onwards, no provision had been made for keeping the streets clear; a precaution which the confusion of Thursday would have forced upon any civic authorities but those of Edinburgh. After visiting Lord Roseberry at Dalmeny Park, the Queen returned to Dalkeith by way of Leith, in an open carriage, although it rained pretty stiffly most of the time. Everybody has seen her, and even irate Leith no longer sucks its thumb in moody wrath.

Peel, who rode in an open carriage behind that of her Majesty, was received with amazing cordiality. The cheers were numerous and hearty—and the ladies, bless their Conservative hearts! fluttered their handkerchiefs to the smiling Premier with true woman's fervour. By the bye, some of them seemed to have forgotten that a white handkerchief is hardly presentable on a second day. Here and there a hiss or two was audible. But, Conservative as I am, I was surprised at the cordial and ıll but universal huzzahs. Of course, common ›oliteness, and the gratulations due to high and ıccessful intellect, prompted many a political ›pponent to doff his hat and join in the general alute. Peel received these tributes with a smiling onhommie that told well; and surrendered his ıands to the shake of numbers of the great unrashed with a disregard of dirt highly politic, but vhich, considering the national cutaneous irritabiity, must have required no common fortitude.

By the bye, the wild men of the Kirk, eager to eed fat their ancient grudge on Peel, have been ilipending him for what they please to call the 'insult" done to the Scotch people upon Thurslay. They may try to divert the obloquy rom their friend, Sir James Forrest, in this way; ut it will not do. Their abuse of Peel is just as reposterous as the howl they have set up, because he Queen preferred having the service of her own hurch performed to her yesterday at Dalkeith 'alace, to being made the common stare of every urious fool in their High Church. But the Kirk s in affliction, forsooth; and the light of the royal ountenance would be exceeding comfortable to it. Iredat Judæus! Such paragons of reverence for onstitutional law as Gordon, Cunningham, & Co., ıre most fitting suitors for the grace of her who is ts principium et fons! Away with such cant! What care they for Kings or Queens, so they might stablish their own spiritual despotism? Let them emember their weekly revilings of that church, ıccording to whose standards her daily worship is lirected. But were the conceited brawlers, who tyle themselves "The Kirk," dutiful as they are ebellious, catholic as they are bigoted, what are hey that they should dictate to her Majesty where nd how she should worship? Surely the Proestant Queen of England may exercise the freedom f choice which they claim for themselves. Of a erity, the arrogance of these privileged railers is nly paralleled by their want of breeding.

But while the "orthodox, orthodox, wha beeve in John Knox," have been raising the snivel nd whine in their own narrow circles, all the 'orld and his wife have been more pleasantly nd quite as profitably employed in studying ›ourtly genuflections, and crablike retreats from ıe sunshine of the royal glance. Instead of the rawing-room at Holyrood, her Majesty, in pity f the wasteful outlay upon lace and "Voizet's earl jewellery," in anticipation of that birthrangled gala, announced that a Reception, which a compound of drawing-room and levée, without the privileges, I believe, of either, would be ıld to-day at Dalkeith Palace. Again the scisırs flew through acres of satin; and milliners, antuamakers, plumassiers, and tailors, became the reatest creatures upon earth. Mrs. Drumtoustie, ıe provost's wife of Clartyhole, lay awake for ights thinking of the sensation the "buirdly" ırson of her lord in his court suit would make in ıe royal presence. "Save us!" she exclaimed, as was brought home to their lodgings fresh from eyer and Mortimer's; "Geordie, man, ye'll no ın yoursel' in a' that paraffle o' purple an' fine ıen. Satin! as I'm a sinfu' woman," she exclaimed, holding up the vest in consternation; "and sprigged wi' red and blue flowers frae collar to lappets, nae less, like auld Leddy Turntippet's stamadger, (Anglicè stomacher,) up bye at the Place. Lord! what's this? A three-neukit hat, and silver-hilted swurd! Set ye up! My certies, lad, it's weel ye're amang as big fules as yersel'; for gin the bairns and wives o' Clartyhole were to see you makin' a play-actor o' yersel' in siccan gear as that, ye wadna hear the end o't a' your born days!" But the worthy goodman heard her not; for he was speculating how he was to convey the digits of majesty to his lips on the fast approaching Monday. He had already worn out the knees of two pairs of breeches in practising a graceful drop upon his knee, besides unexpectedly embracing the floor more than once in consequence of his sword getting between his legs as he walked backwards to an imaginary door in an imaginary presence-chamber from the feet of an imaginary sovereign. But having heard, that to touch the royal fingers with the hand was against all rule, his agitation reached its climax; for how otherwise he was to get them brought into contact with his lips was a matter far beyond his comprehension. An important personage was now the man or woman who had previously gone through the ordeal of a presentation, and could expound its complex ritual to the uninitiated. In every drawing-room, rehearsals were going forward; and kneeling, and bowing, and kissing of visionary fingers has been the engrossing occupation of the "nobility and gentry" here for the last week.

M——, who, ever since Thursday, has been as sulky as a universal philanthropist—indignant, no doubt, though he won't say so, at the very nonchalant way in which the royal body-guard have been treated—departed this morning in somewhat better humour, to join that sombre body, to whom the illustrious privilege had been accorded of lining the staircase at Dalkeith Palace during the Reception. He has returned radiant with smiles. The scars of wounded pride have ceased to gall; for he and his friends have been permitted to officiate —as lackies of the outer chamber!

You should have seen the vehicles that whirled by hundreds to the gates of the palace to-day. Such a collection of broken-down locomotives never, I dare say, lumbered along a road. The cattle were of a piece with the carriages; and if, occasionally, they indulged in the faint reminiscence of a canter, the freak must have equally surprised their Jehus and themselves. Conceive the vehicular force that must have been necessary to convey fifteen hundred persons, all bending under a load of frippery and gold lace,—for such was the Armageddon that defiled through the drawing-room of Dalkeith Palace between two and five o'clock this afternoon,—and you may fancy the number of hen-roosts which must have been dislodged, before the requisite amount of leathern conveniences could be got together. Anything served. But the incongruity of waving plumes, and glittering epaulettes, behind the dirty glass of a dilapidated cab, was, as you may suppose, highly conducive to mirth, and a philosophical appreciation of the splendour of court pageantry in general, and of a Scotch levée in particular.

Of course, where so many were presented, the company comprised some very equivocal elements,—persons, indeed, who, you would think, could hardly, in their wildest dreams, have aspired to such an honour. The ceremony was despatched with railroad rapidity—and not a few were surprised to find themselves out of the presence before they were conscious of having been in it. Our good friend Provost Drumtoustie was so lifted off his feet by the magnificence of all he saw, that he fairly grasped the royal hand in his iron fist, and planted upon its jewelled fingers a kiss that woke up two of the lords-in-waiting from a dream of a rise of salary; whereupon he was handed along from page to equerry, and from equerry to groom, with such celerity, that in somewhat less than no time he found himself projected into the lawn by > the fury of a foot,

> Whose indignation commonly is stamped
> Upon the hinder quarters of a man.

The Queen was observed to smile—graciously, of course—whenever a member of the Edinburgh Town Council was announced; and so enraptured were some of them at the obvious delight with which she extended her hand to them, that serious fears were entertained for their intellects. "Weel, now, the likes o' yon! Her Majesty smiled as gracious an' pleasantlike, whan I stappit up, as if she had kent me for years and mair. She'll hae read, I'm thinkin', my speech on the Irrigation question,—or maybe seen the doonsettin' I gied Bark-at-a' about the Seat-rents?" said one. "Gae wa' man!" argued another; "it was easy seen she wanted to mak' up for the affront that was put upon us by Peel an' the Duke the ither day. It's my notion, ane o' thae flunkies will be round presently, to ask us to stap in by an' take a check o' wine an' cake wi' her Majesty, when the Reception 's over. She'll need it, puir thing, for yon's weary wark. Deed, I feel as if the wing o' a fowl wadna come amiss, after a' this bobbing and becking." I don't vouch for the ipsissima verba, mind; but the main features are correct; and, as the Italians say—si non è vero, è ben trovato.

But I must conclude—for I see that it is time to dress for the Assembly. It is expected to be very full, as hundreds are sure to come for the sake of showing off their own court suits, and criticising their neighbours'. There will be lots of "bonnie lassies" too—all cogent reasons for a young fellow repairing to

> The gay and festive scene,
> The halls, the halls of dazzling light.

But I have another reason more cogent still. I have promised to meet——I sha'n't say whom, there. If you don't hear from me, therefore, for a week, suppose that I have been sent for to expound Fearn on Contingent Remainders to her Majesty, or—that I have broken my leg in executing a Highland reel,—suppose—anything, in short, but that I have been flirting with an heiress. Adieu.

LETTER V.—THE HIGHLANDS.

EDINBURGH, 15th September, 1842.

MY DEAR CAMPBELL,—My last left me on the point of starting for the Assembly Rooms, where I distinguished myself by dancing reels like Fox Maule, waltzes like D'Orsay, and quadrilles with the finish of Perrot. The room was crowded, the dresses brilliant, the women pretty, the champagne unexceptionable, the dancing spirited, and Maria gracious. What more could heart of man desire? We left the rooms at two, and by six o'clock I found myself trotting briskly towards Queensferry, on the high road to Perthshire. Think not I was on my way to Breadalbane Castle. No. The Marquis had unaccountably overlooked me in his invitations. Think not I had been put upon the staff of The Times to minute the small talk of the royal progress, as "our correspondent;" or that Lord Liverpool had commissioned me to time the royal luncheon at Dupplin, or to regulate the roast at Scone. On no such high vocation was it that I perilled my neck upon such spavined Rosinantes as the post-houses might afford. No! The Thunderer might have showered gold upon me, like Danae, and the Lord Chamberlain promised me the good things of Amphitryon, and yet I would not have gone one step towards the north. But Maria had whispered at the close of our last quadrille, that the family were to be off next day for their seat near Aberfeldy; and I suddenly discovered that I had some geological researches to complete in the neighbourhood of the family mansion, and might very possibly take an opportunity of renewing our acquaintance there. To this the lady seemed no ways averse; and, accordingly, as I have said, I found myself trotting along the great North Road on Tuesday last by six o'clock A.M.

In this way I preceded the royal train by some hours; so that, like the Scotsman newspaper's ingenious "own reporter,"—an Irishman, obviously,—"I could only gather her Majesty's receptions along the roads by the marks of preparation I observed in passing." Fear not, therefore, that I shall furnish you with a catalogue of all the triumphal arches of faded laurel and exanimate dahlias which spanned the entrance to every straggling village through which her Majesty passed. The papers will have informed you how middensteads were cleared away from the streets; how, from the wooden chimney of every thatched roof, a Paisley bandana fluttered in the breeze; how yeomen huzzaed, and cottars cheered, and farmers, on their yauds, pursued the royal pair, that they might afterwards tell their neighbours, over a bottle of tippeny in the change-house, that "They might crack about queens as they liked, but I rade clean beside her a' the time; and she's a real pleasant-lookin' creatur." The villages were just a repetition of what I have described in Edinburgh, mutatis mutandis. Instead of the cherubims of the hospitals chanting the royal anthem, as I believe they tried to do somewhere in the High Street during the progress to the Castle, the hamlet had its crowder perched upon a barrel or other eminence, and quickening the general enthusiasm with "Welcome, royal Charlie!" or "Carle, now the King's come!" Other differences of the same kind might easily be multiplied; but in village as in metropolis, the same hearty loyalty was apparent.

Dunfermline—weaving, democratical, insurrectionary Dunfermline—made no assault upon the royal person, notwithstanding the forebodings of The Globe. Inverkeithing indeed has, I believe, shown symptoms of disaffection, in consequence of her Majesty's want of taste, not to say politeness, in driving at a brisk trot through her picturesque street. The town has but one. But except that some of the loudest of its politicians have indulged in "a swap of drink" extra, and been cuffed by their suffering wives therefor, I have not heard of any more serious consequences. I do not know whether this good burgh had any keys to present, or whether they have long since been melted down into silver chains for its civic rulers. If it had, it was really too bad in her Majesty not to take this opportunity of informing the municipal authorities that articles so utterly useless could not be in better keeping. Most gratifying, by the way, it is to find, that the municipal government is so beautifully faultless in all the counties her Majesty has visited. A rotten burgh, or an incapable council, must be a figment, a chimæra of the dark ages. From the provost of Edinburgh, who, in the matter of the barriers, acted in the spirit of Richard the Second's exclamation, when summoned to the deathbed of John of Gaunt, Pray God we may make haste, and come too late!

to him of Linlithgow, who was swept away by an avalanche of his own burghers from his post at the gates, long before her Majesty reached them, they are, one and all, the most vigilant of warders, the most astute of councillors, the most loyal of subjects. Indeed their loyalty is perfect. Differ from each other as they may in all things else, on this they are all agreed; and "when these gentlemen do agree," as Puff says, "their unanimity is wonderful." Their addresses seem to have been all turned on the same loom. Only in one instance have I observed any deviation from the beaten track, and this was at Stirling, where, after firing off the usual declaration of "ancient burgh—devoted attachment—throne and government—long spared—loyal and happy people," and receiving the usual answer, the provost, like Richie Moniplies thrusting his "bit sifflication" into the royal hands along with his master's petition, informed her Majesty, that "it gave him great pleasure, that, as provost of this town, he had had the honour to receive her Majesty, under whose father he had the honour to serve for twenty years." Exquisite antithesis! The old subaltern, "as provost of his town, has great pleasure in receiving"—mark the phrase!—the Queen of England, who happens to be the daughter of his old officer. The Queen must have been sensibly touched by the compliment. One of those sharp-sighted dogs of the press, whom her Majesty kept constantly beside her, detected a tear in her eye. I should say, that a young female, well known by the endearing epithet of Betty Martin, was more likely to have been there.

I managed to reach Perth in time to see her Majesty's entry, and a very striking contrast it formed to the scene at Edinburgh, so far as the public arrangements went. Here, the keys were presented at a most elegant triumphal arch, that gave something like dignity to the ceremony; which suffered nothing, as you may suppose, from the elegant robes of the officials, and the good order in which the streets were kept by the public bodies. As for the rest, it was a repetition of the old story—huzzahs, hats, and handkerchiefs, till the royal pair reached Scone. The Queen was no doubt reminded by some judicious friend, that the last monarch who made a similar entrée to Perth was Charles the First; a circumstance which, taken in connexion with the incident of his reign recorded in the pithy distich—

Traitor Scot, traitor Scot,
Sold his king for a groat, must have given a very pleasant turn to her Majesty's evening meditations. By the bye, that distich came with a peculiar grace from us English; for, if the Scots sold Charles, who beheaded him?

I can't say, that I am a devout admirer of the Gael. He is very well to read about in books, and makes no bad figure in Landseer's pictures. I can even admire him careering through the Reel of Hullachan, snapping his fingers, and hallooing like a Red Indian. But beyond this my respect for "ta Heeland shentlemans" does not go. I have divers excellent reasons for this. But Highland blood is hot, and your skene dhu is an awkward bloodletter. As for their single-hearted and devoted loyalty, that so much is talked about, I would take an even bet, that if it came to the pinch, your Lowland Radical would rally round the throne, and fight for it as stoutly as any Mac of them all. The Highlander follows his leader, as sheep do their bellweather. If their chief goes out for the King, they go out too; if he declares for the Pretender, the Pretender has their swords. A fico for such loyalty, say I.

But, be this as it may, bring some hundreds of them together, as Lord Glenlyon and the Marquis of Breadalbane have done, and set them marching with claymore, Lochaber axe, and pennon,

All plaided and plumed in their tartan array, under the shadows of their heathy hills, and a picture is presented that is very agreeable to the eye, and may very reasonably inspire a sonnet, or, mayhap, a canto of octosyllabics. Both at Dunkeld and Taymouth, the appearance which they made was splendid; and, as a relic of the old feudal grandeur in days when the links of vassalage and clanship are fast untwining, the muster of so many fine-looking mountaineers around their chiefs, had a romantic interest which heightened even the effect of the noble scenery around. All this was in good taste and keeping. Not so the variegated lamps, and other littlenesses of Vauxhall, which were introduced along the lawns and under the oaks at Taymouth. Torches, as many as you please, with Highlanders for candelabras, and bonfires on every Ben a tar-barrel can be trundled up to; but illumination other than this amid such scenery is ridiculous.

An Athole hunting has been famous from the days of Pitscottie downwards. Scott, in a few of his magical touches, has described one in Waverley, chap. 24, where he cites a passage on the subject from Taylor the Water Poet, which shows how even a Thames boatman could be carried away by the excitement of the scene:—

Through heather, moss, 'mong frogs, and bogs, and fogs,
'Mongst craggy cliffs, and thunder-battled hills,
Hares, hinds, bucks, roes, are chased by men and dogs,
Where two-hours' hunting fourscore fat deer kills.
Lowland, your sports are low as is your seat;
The Highland games and minds are high and great.

A specimen of the thing, in a small way, was given on Thursday last, for the Prince's amusement. At nine o'clock he turned out with the Marquis, and some thirty or forty Highlanders, whose business it was to drive the deer and other game into a narrow circle for the Prince to blaze away at. The Prince having planted himself with the keepers on the summit of Tullohvule, the Highlanders commenced operations; and in due time the roe-deer came scampering past; with the Highlanders at their heels, scrambling through copse and over crag, clapping their hands, and making the woods ring with their loud halloos. I don't mean to disparage the Prince's sportsmanship; but there were two or three M.P.'s at Taymouth that day that would have done more execution than his Highness. Three roe-deer is no great triumph. A second circle was formed, and the Prince had better luck this time; so that, when he returned to the castle, sixteen roe-deer, and a score or two of hares and wild-fowl, had measured their length upon the heather. I confess, the sight of the Prince taking all the sport to himself was too King Jamie-like for my taste. Had he carried half-a-dozen of the sportsmen at the castle with him, and had each peppered away for his own hand, he would have found the sport far more to the purpose. Not that this sort of thing is true sportsman's work at the best. In the far glen, and with a herd of wild-deer, there would be something to try a man's mettle. But driving tame deer in a well-stocked preserve is to deer-stalking proper what decimating the Chinese is to fighting hand to hand with the Affghans; and this the Prince will find out when he comes to try it.

Whilst the Prince was astonishing the natives by his condescension in not shooting the Highlanders in place of the deer,* the Queen was studying dairy production through the medium of silver churns and china milk-pails. Of course, she must have imbibed, in this way, the most correct notions upon the manufacture of cheese and butter. Out upon such foppery! A story was current at Kenmore, however, that she went in upon the dairy-maid one day by herself, and the Celtic Phillis being asked to show something which was not in the way at the time, went for it, telling her Majesty to "ca' the kirn" till she came back, which her Majesty, say the gossips, did. The story is, I fear, too good to be true.

But I grow tired of these royal exhibitions. The dancing of delirious Highlanders upon platforms before the castle on Friday morning—the ball in the castle in the evening—the embarkation on Loch Tay next day—all were noble sights; but they were for the brush, not for the pen to paint. Besides, are not these, and much more that is glorious and grand, written in the books of the chronicles of The Times?

Refreshed in health and gladdened in heart did our gracious young sovereign appear as she stepped on board the Trident at Granton yesterday morning. She had gathered many fair and elevating thoughts among the varied scenes and glowing hearts of Scotland; and beyond all question, to use the noble language of Wordsworth,

When the stream,
That overflowed the soul, hath passed away,
A consciousness remains that it hath left,
Deposited upon the silent shore
Of memory, images, and precious thoughts,
That cannot die, and shall not be destroyed.

Her visit to Scotland has done much good. It has riveted and given vitality to its loyalty. The Queen is no longer merely the Queen—she is the wife, the mother, whom all have seen, whom all insensibly love. "A canty body"—"A bonny body, and sae bashfu', and humble like, too." These were phrases that often fell on my ear—homely, but sufficiently indicative of the hold her Majesty has upon many an honest heart. She has taught a lesson, too, to the ladies of the country, by the activity of her habits, and the simplicity of her manners, which will spread its influence, and be felt in every home.

But these things be for the philosophers and married men. I am neither, although things do look prosperous in a certain quarter. The Birks of Aberfeldy could prate of certain love-passages. But thou art of the profane. Barnwell and Cresswell are thy Dulcineas—Adolphus thy Lindamira. Therefore no more upon this sacred theme. Expect me in town on Monday week: till then adieu. Thine de profundis.

* "It is particularly worthy of remark, that the Prince, though affording proofs of the superiority of his capabilities as a sportsman, was uncommonly careful, and lost many a fine roe because he would not fire when he heard the voices and clapping of hands of the Highlandmen on their near approach, where he could not distinguish their exact position when crouched amongst the trees. The Highlanders were very shrewd; and though they did not appear to know what fear was, they observed this trait in his Royal Highness's character, and spoke in the most unmeasured terms of approbation of the amiable manners and demeanour of the Prince on this occasion."—Times Correspondent, 13th September, 1842.

THE LIFE OF AUGUSTUS VISCOUNT KEPPEL.*

THIS work completes the Lives of the more eminent of British Naval Commanders; works of which the last twenty years have been fertile.

The memoirs of Admiral Keppel have a two-fold interest. He was, for a time, the most illustrious of England's naval commanders, and he was an enlightened and liberal statesman, quite as capable of directing the maritime interests of his country by his sound views in the cabinet as of fighting her battles at sea. Keppel was descended of an ancient and distinguished family of Guelderland. His grandfather, Arnold Joost van Keppel, Lord of Voorst, accompanied the Prince of Orange to England at the period of the Revolution; and, as Earl of Albemarle, is known as William the Third's favourite companion, and most confidential and trusted friend. He was the very reverse of what is usually imagined of a phlegmatic, unwieldy Dutchman, and in many points the antipodes of his royal master; and though a foreigner, at a time when the English were peculiarly jealous of the Dutch followers of their foreign sovereign, Albemarle became very popular, and a general favourite. His son, the second earl, and father of the Admiral, if a less able man, even exceeded him in every polite accomplishment and fascinating quality. He was a refined dandy of the old school, as dandyism was understood before the character had been debased and vulgarized. Of him Walpole sarcastically says—

"His figure was genteel, his manner noble and agreeable; the rest of his merit, for he had not even an estate, was the interest my Lady Albemarle had with the King, through Lady Yarmouth, and his son, Lord Bury, being the Duke's [William, the great Duke of Cumberland] chief favourite. He had all his life imitated the French manners, till he came to Paris, where he never conversed with a Frenchman, not from partiality to his own countrymen, for he conversed as little with them. If good breeding is not different from good sense, Lord Albemarle, who might have disputed even that maxim, at least knew how to distinguish it from good nature. He would bow to his postilion, while he was ruining his tailor."

Lord Chesterfield thus writes of the Earl to his son, Philip Stanhope, who was attached to Lord Albermarle's embassy:—"Between you and me, (for this must go no further,) what do you think made our friend Lord Albemarle colonel of a regiment of guards, governor of Virginia, groom of the stole, and ambassador to Paris—amounting in all to sixteen or seventeen thousand pounds a-year? Was it his birth? No;—a Dutch gentleman only. Was it his estate? No;—he had none. Was it his learning, his parts, his political abilities, and application? You can answer these questions easily and as soon as I can make them. What was it then?—Many people wondered, but I do not. It was his air, his address, his manners, and his graces. He pleased, and by pleasing became a favourite; and by becoming a favourite, became all that he has been since. Show me any one instance where intrinsic worth and merit, unassisted by exterior accomplishments, have raised any man so high."

This popular nobleman died rather suddenly in Paris, where he was long an ambassador of parade. Admiral Keppel was his second son, and one of fifteen children. Keppel's mother was a daughter of the first Duke of Richmond. At the age of ten, Keppel entered the navy; and at fifteen, he was appointed to the Centurion, then commanded by Anson, whom he accompanied in his secret expedition against the Spanish settlements on the coast of South America, and in his famous voyage round the world. Keppel was thus bred in an excellent, but severe school. Among his early companions were the future Admirals, Saumarez, Parker, and Campbell, who all remained his steadfast friends throughout life. Anson, and Sir Charles Saunders, both afterwards, like himself, First Lords of the Admiralty, though of much longer standing in the service, were among his warmest friends and patrons; and the former, at an early period, is said to have foretold his future professional eminence.

The most minute narrative of Anson's memorable circumnavigation, which forms an era in British naval history, can never want interest with English readers. Keppel's kinsman and affectionate biographer has certainly not been able to impart much novelty to an affair so well known; yet a few facts and anecdotes have been gleaned from the young seaman's journal and from that of his friend Saumarez. At the storming of Payta, Mr. Keppel had a very narrow escape for his life, the peak of his jockey-cap having been carried off by a musket shot. A little prize-money was some solace. In the action with the Spanish galleon, Neustra Senora de Cava Danga, he acted as Anson's aid-de-camp, and behaved so gallantly, that the Commodore immediately gave him a lieutenant's commission, the vacancy being occasioned by the promotion of his friend Saumarez to the command of the captured galleon. He was, after his return to England, appointed to the Dreadnought, and made Commander and Post-Captain, probably fully as rapidly as if he had been the son of an obscure family, though not more rapidly than his merits deserved. When cruizing in the Channel, and while very successful in making prizes, he had the misfortune to be shipwrecked on the French coast, and was made prisoner. He was kindly treated, and soon permitted to return to England on his parole, and almost immediately appointed to a sixty-gun new ship. Anson, his friend and patron, and the godfather of the new ship, was now a rising man, and Keppel partook the gale of professional prosperity. It was only about this period—1747—that a uniform was first adopted in the navy, the officers and men till then dressing as they pleased. Instead of the "blue jacket," now so dear to English associations, the naval uniform was at first in some danger of being grey, faced with red. Shortly after Keppel's appointment to the Anson, peace was made by the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, and his ship was turned into a guard-ship; but loving active service, and longing for an opportunity to distinguish himself, by the kindness of Lord Anson he was appointed to his old Centurion, a "crack man-of-war," rendered famous by her previous voyage round the world. During the general European war the Barbary pirates had been even more active than in later times, and were, moreover, the allies of christian England; but when the Algerine rovers violated the maxim of "honour among thieves," and captured and plundered an English packet-vessel on her voyage home from Lisbon, the government resolved upon an expedition to the Barbary coast; and Captain Keppel, then only in his twenty-fourth year, was appointed at once ambassador and commander of the squadron. One of his midshipmen on this expedition was Adam, afterwards Admiral Lord Duncan of Camperdown, between whom and the young Commodore there arose the warmest and most steadfast regard. Keppel took another shipmate at this time, destined to reach equal fame in his own walk. When the Centurion put into Plymouth for repairs, before sailing on the expedition, Keppel, at the seat of Lord Mount Edgecumbe, became acquainted with "Mr. Reynolds," afterwards the celebrated "Sir Joshua," with whom he was so much pleased that he offered him a passage in the Centurion. Reynolds' portrait of Keppel, painted on this voyage, and with which he took very great pains, is still reckoned one of his best productions. A good engraving from it forms the frontispiece to the Memoirs.

Reynolds accompanied the Commodore to Algiers, visiting by the way Lisbon, Cadiz, and several intermediate places, before going to Rome. Among those most deeply interested in the issue of Admiral Keppel's memorable trial (or persecution) many years after this, was Sir Joshua Reynolds, then grown into high celebrity in his profession.

Keppel conducted his negotiations with the Barbary States in a way that would have done credit to a sage, grey-headed diplomatist of three times his years, and brought the affair to a satisfactory and honourable settlement.

When the rupture with France of 1754 was impending, Keppel was appointed Commodore of a squadron to North America, where he was to act as the coadjutor of the unfortunate General Braddock. On the same day that he put to sea with his protegé Duncan, the unexpected death of his father occurred in Paris. Walpole details the following remarkable circumstance in connexion with the Earl's decease, in a letter to his friend, Sir Horace Mann—

I shall relate the following, only prefacing, that I do believe the dream happened, and happened right, among the millions of dreams that do not hit. Lord Bury was at Windsor with the Duke, when the express of his father's death arrived; he came to town time enough to find his mother and sisters at breakfast.—'Lord! child,' said my Lady Albemarle, 'what brings you to town so early?' He said he had been sent for. Says she, 'You are not well!' 'Yes,' replied Lord Bury, 'I am; but a little flustered with something I have heard.' 'Let me feel your pulse,' said Lady Albemarle. 'Oh!' continued she, 'your father is dead!' 'Lord, Madam,' said Lord Bury, 'how could that come into your head? I should rather have imagined that you would have thought it was my poor brother William,' (who is just gone to Lisbon for his health.) 'No,' said my Lady Albemarle, 'I know it is your father; I dreamed last night that he was dead, and came to take leave of me!'—and immediately swooned.

Lord Bury succeeded to the peerage, and the absent Commodore was elected in his stead for the vacated borough of Chichester. After Braddock's disasters, Keppel, who had not been able to accomplish much in the campaign, returned to England, and war being now formally declared, he was appointed to the Swiftsure of seventy-four guns. In a subsequent cruise in the Torbay, off Cape Finisterre, he captured three merchant vessels and a French frigate, and came home in triumph with his prizes. At this time he was a member of the court-martial held on Admiral Byng. In that disgraceful and most unhappy affair he behaved in the manner which might have been anticipated from a man of high professional honour, and humane feelings. A long account is given of Byng's trial, which remains one of the foulest blots of the reign in which it took place.

Keppel was subsequently attached to the abortive expedition against Rochfort, commanded by Sir Edward Hawke, and General Conway; and afterwards he commanded a small squadron, appointed to cruise in the Bay of Biscay, where he made some captures. His next brilliant achievement was the capture of Goree by his squadron, and in which his own ship bore a conspicuous part. Duncan was wounded in that action. After Keppel's return to England at this time, one of those periodical panics of dread of a French invasion, to which John Bull seems liable, seized the country, and Keppel was employed in blockading the French ports, and shared in Hawke's action off Ushant. As an animated specimen of the Memoirs of a great naval chief, we would fain copy out this narrative of a sea engagement, but it is too long for our space.

This fight was a brilliant affair in its own day, and an important triumph for England. The mighty armament which had caused so much alarm was effectually disabled, if not annihilated, and that by the comparatively small force of eight ships. In this decisive victory Keppel reaped his full share of glory. Among the many illustrative anecdotes thrown into the notes, which the biographer has culled with care and judgment, and which add very much to the entertainment of the reader of the Memoirs, is a trait of Keppel's friend, Campbell, who had volunteered into the service when an apprentice on board a small Scottish coaster; gallantly volunteering to go in place of the mate, who, when seized by the press-gang, wept bitterly at being torn from his family. In the action off Ushant, Campbell was Hawke's flag-captain, and was sent home with the account of the victory. He reached London just as the mob were still burning his commander, Hawke, in effigy for the failure of the expedition to Rochfort; but promotions were already talked about as the reward of the brilliant victory; and Lord Anson, in carrying Campbell to the levee, told him the king would knight him.

"I ken nae use that it will be to me," was the reply. "But your lady might like it," said Anson. "Weel, then," rejoined Campbell, "his Majesty may knight her, if he pleases."

Keppel had gained the esteem of Mr Pitt, (the great Earl of Chatham,) who employed him in examining the defences of Belleisle, when an attack was first meditated upon that island. When the siege was sometime afterwards undertaken, he was appointed Commodore of the squadron, and he gallantly supported the land force. Keppel's next important service was at the Havannah, an expedition marked alike by glory and disaster, in which national triumph was hardly repaid by the vast amount of individual suffering. The Earl of Albemarle, Keppel's brother, was Commander-in-chief of the land forces on the expedition. In the general promotion of flag-officers which followed this barren and dear-bought conquest, Keppel was made Admiral. He had previously captured part of a fleet of French merchantmen, which, with their convoy, were nearly all secured; and what was secured proved a valuable prize. He returned to England in time to see his sister, Lady Elizabeth, married to Francis marquis of Tavistock, the only son of the Duke of Bedford. The Marquis died in a few years afterwards, in consequence of a fall from his horse, universally lamented. Walpole gives a charming account of the wedding of this young pair, and the author of the Memoirs a pathetic relation of the early death of the widowed Marchioness, who did not long survive her husband. Thus the marriage is announced, and the death follows too soon :—

"To be sure you have heard the event of this last week? Lord Tavistock has flung his handkerchief, and, except a few jealous sultanas, and some sultanas valides, who had marketable daughters, everybody is pleased that the lot is fallen on Lady Elizabeth Keppel. The house of Bedford came to town last Friday. I supped with them that night at the Spanish ambassador's. Lady Elizabeth was not there, nor mentioned. On the contrary, by the Duchess's conversation, which turned on Lady Betty Montague, there were suspicions in her favour. The next morning Lady Elizabeth received a note from the Duchess of Marlborough, insisting on seeing her that evening. When she arrived at Marlborough House, she found nobody but the Duchess and Lord Tavistock. The Duchess cried, 'La! they have left the window open in the next room!' went to shut it, and shut the lovers in too, where they remained for three hours. The same night all the town was at the Duchess of Richmond's. Lady Albemarle was at a tredille; the Duke of Bedford came up to the table, and told her he must speak to her as soon as the pool was over. You may guess whether she knew a card more that she played. When she had finished, the Duke told her he should wait on her the next morning, to make the demand in form. She told it directly to me and my niece Waldegrave, who was in such transport for her friend, that she promised the Duke of Bedford to kiss him, and hurried home directly, to write to her sisters. The Duke asked no questions about fortune, but has since slipped a bit of paper into Lady Elizabeth's hand, telling her he hoped his son would live, but if he did not, there was something for her; it was a jointure of three thousand pounds a-year, and six hundred pounds pin money. She has behaved in the prettiest manner in the world, and would not appear at a vast assembly at Northumberland House, on Tuesday, nor at a great hay-making at Mrs. Pitt's, on Wednesday. Yesterday they all went to Woburn, and to-morrow the ceremony is to be performed."

After the death of her husband the Marchioness was attended to Lisbon, for the recovery of her health, by her brother, Admiral Keppel, and one of her sisters. The Admiral had just been returned for Windsor, which he represented in several parliaments. Thus writes Keppel's biographer,—

When we had last occasion to mention the name of this lady, it was in reference to her intended union with one of the most amiable and accomplished noblemen of his day. But a few years had passed away, and she was now a heart-broken widow, rapidly sinking into the grave from grief at her irreparable loss.

The accident which caused this bereavement occurred on the 22d of March, 1767. The full extent of the calamity which had befallen Lady Tavistock was considerately kept from her till further concealment was impossible. Throughout the anguish that followed this sudden wrench from happiness the most unclouded, she was sustained by nature, as though in pity for the posthumous infant to which she gave birth on the 20th of August. [This infant was the late Lord William Russell, who was murdered by his servant Courvoisier.] The settled melancholy of the widowed mother's heart appears, after the birth of the child, to have given way to keen sensibility and inconsolable sorrow. Change of air and scene was proposed, and Lisbon fixed upon as the spot most likely to restore the unhappy sufferer. The seeds, however, of an incurable disease were too deeply rooted for human skill or human means to eradicate. Her companions on the voyage to Lisbon were her sister and brother, Lady Caroline Adair and Admiral Keppel. The following affecting incident is said to have occurred previously to Lady Tavistock's departure from England :—"At a consultation of the faculty, held at Bedford House, in August, one of the physicians, whilst he felt her pulse, requested her to open her hand. Her reluctance induced him to use a degree of gentle violence, when he perceived that she had closed it to conceal a miniature of her late husband. 'Ah! Madam,' he exclaimed, 'all our prescriptions must be useless whilst you so fatally cherish the wasting sorrow that destroys you!' 'I have kept it,' she replied, 'either in my bosom or my hand, ever since my dear Lord's death; and thus I must, indeed, continue to retain it, until I drop off after him into the welcome grave.'"

The Marchioness died about a fortnight after landing at Lisbon, and in little more than a year after the decease of her husband, "the victim of exceeding love."

Admiral Keppel was a decided Whig in his politics, and from this and various other causes he fell into great disfavour at Court. One cause may have been, voting against the expulsion of Wilkes from the House of Commons, which was a sin, above all others, hard to be forgiven.

The Earl of Sandwich was now at the head of the Admiralty, and Keppel felt himself neglected, and ventured to make those remonstrances which, with ungenerous officials, oftener aggravate bad feelings than obtain justice. His decided and avowed disapprobation of the unnatural and unwise conflict with the American colonies, could not tend to recommend him at head-quarters. It was carried so far, that while numbers of officers, when war was apprehended, flocked to the Admiralty, offering their services, Keppel kept aloof, openly declaring, "that if the necessities of the times called for his services, and he knew that it was the king's desire, he was ready to do his duty, but not in the line of America." No sooner had the revolt of the colonies assumed a definite character, than preparations of a warlike nature began to be made by France and Spain; and the formidable armaments mustering in the French ports, at length roused the English government from its lethargy. The First Lord of the Admiralty, the Earl of Sandwich, sent his friend, Sir Hugh Palliser, with a message to Vice-Admiral Keppel, requesting, in the name of the king, to know whether, in case of a continental war, he would accept the command of the fleet.

Keppel was already well aware of the petty jealousy and animosity of which he was the object, and he prudently replied,—

That he was ready to attend and give his answer in person to his Majesty. He was accordingly admitted to a private audience, and, at the personal solicitation of the King, consented to assume the command of the Channel fleet. It was not, however, without some misgivings that he found himself about to trust his hard-earned fame to ministers whom he knew to be unfriendly towards him, and in whom he placed not the slightest confidence. These feelings were not confined to his own breast. His friend and cousin, the Duke of Richmond, seems to have had a presentiment of the treatment he was afterwards to receive.

In a letter from the Duke of Richmond to his cousin and friend, it is remarked—

I cannot wish you joy of having a fleet to command, prepared by the Earl of Sandwich, with new men and officers, unacquainted with each other, to risk your reputation and the fate of your country upon, against a French and Spanish fleet, who are, I fear, much better prepared. At the same time, I confess I do not see how you could refuse your service. Let me, however, advise you to insist upon your own terms. No one can be surprised that you should suspect a minister, whom you have constantly opposed, of not giving you all the help he might do to a friend, without suspecting him of treachery. If he has but a bad fleet to send out, 'tis doing Lord Sandwich no injustice to suppose he would be glad to put it under the command of a man whom he does not love, and yet whose name will justify the choice to the nation.

But Keppel's services were not for a considerable time called for. He felt the neglect, and in a letter to his friend and party-chief, Lord Rockingham, written from Bath, to which Keppel often resorted for the benefit of his health, he says, January, 1777,—

Most probably the K— will have no want of my services, and the seeming indifference of his M—— towards me, since the first moment of my having been given to understand I might be called upon, I think, makes it advisable for me to keep out of town, which may help to show my indifference towards them in return.

The Bishop of Exeter is at Windsor, and Sir Thomas Miller will be got to town by a note from any of our friends known to him, or a civil line from yourself.

If the Duke of Manchester should be in town you will, of course, see him. You know he is tolerably informed upon foreign matters. I wish he may not think that on those subjects you don't attend enough to his intelligence. I know you will excuse my taking the liberty to hint this.

Now for a word for your lieutenant; as to his being in the Victory, should I hoist my flag, I do assure you that your wishes would have the preference to every other person, and you should not have had the trouble of asking it; but I thought it, of all others, a situation very unfit for the young man, greatly too inactive; and in regard to advancement, not very promising. He cannot do better—he cannot do so well—as by depending upon Sir Hugh Palliser to put him forward. Perhaps he means him for one of his own officers. Should he be placed with me, Sir Hugh will have done with him; now, should Sir Hugh's interest fail, and ours get better, he will be sure of help in a proper way, which is having a double chance. As I have now engaged myself, I cannot take him; but if I could, I should recommend his not accepting my offer. Employment in an active ship is the most proper for him, on his first advancement to a commission. I flatter myself my reasons will convince his friends so as to give them content. I am sure your Lordship will not imagine I am making excuses that are not sincere, because to yourself beyond every other friend I always speak straightforward.—I am, my dear Lord, most faithfully, your sincere, humble servant,

A. KEPPEL.

Surely the matters on the American side of the water wear a black and dismal aspect. Loss of men, money, and credit, seem to be all that has hitherto been the fate of this once proud and flourishing nation;—but yet it does not seem felt by the generality of people. The country is infatuated.

The session of parliament opened with more than usual acrimony. Lord Chatham vehemently condemned the war, and mercilessly exposed the weakness of the Navy. On this sore point the Opposition put forth Admiral Keppel as their great battle-horse. He, it was averred, had no confidence in the existing naval force being found equal to the defence of the country. Immediate steps were taken to place the navy on a more effective footing; but the blind or obstinate pride of the government allowed Keppel, who was destined to the command (to which he had in every way the best claim,) to draw his own conclusions as to the probability of services being required, which they would fain have dispensed with had they dared. The government of the day possessed the happy art —not peculiar to it—of disgusting whoever was best qualified to serve the country. Keppel wrote to Lord Rockingham,—

I have been told that, although every hour may be, nay, is, productive of matter not to be neglected, that the different Ministers are separated at their different villas. The long recess of Parliament seems now productive of every evil, and is, in my poor opinion, a most impeachable matter.

With this letter went an able memorial on the state of the navy, and the dangers which threatened the commerce and colonies of the country from the attacks of France and Spain, and from the alliance which France had formed with the revolted colonies. In a few months afterwards, Keppel received his instructions and commission as commander-in-chief of the Channel Fleet; which he was disappointed to find in a very ineffective state. Only six ships were fit for service; seamen were scarce; and provisions and stores deficient. He found, in short, that he had been grossly deceived, or betrayed, by the Admiralty; and he submitted in silence to obloquy which ought to have been laid upon those who had placed him in this onerous situation. Under these circumstances the action off Brest was fought, and the result is matter of history. This engagement also involves the most memorable event of Keppel's life—his trial and triumphant acquittal. Not merely his numerous personal friends, but nearly the whole service, and the great majority of the nation, deeply sympathized with a brave and able man, whom it was attempted to victimize, from previous ill-will, and in order to conceal the incapacity and mal-administration of the Admiralty. The ostensible instrument in this persecution was Sir Hugh Palliser, who commanded a division of the Channel Fleet, and who failed to do his duty in the action; a charge which he endeavoured to throw off himself by retorting it upon Keppel; and which he brought forward in the newspapers, before any complaint ad been made of his conduct—taking the first ord in the controversy. Sandwich was the friend f Palliser, and the personal and party enemy of dmiral Keppel ; and upon the vague and invidi- us charge of Palliser, a court-martial was ordered. s soon as this was known, Keppel's friends in the louse of Commons moved an address to the King) order a court-martial upon Palliser also. An nimated debate ensued, in which Keppel de- lared

His readiness to meet inquiry, and in conclusion said, Thank God I am not the accuser, but the accused. I as called out to serve my country at a very critical eriod ; I have performed my duty to the best of my bilities, and whatever the issue may be, I have one con- olation—that I have acted strictly to the best of my adgment. I shall decline saying a syllable to the ques- ion, and, as I cannot think of voting, shall quit the louse."

At each period of this speech he was greeted with the oudest applause, and retired amidst the cheers of the hole House, accompanied by a large body of the mem- ers.

Sir Joseph Mawbey thought the whole matter had he appearance of a preconcerted scheme to ruin the dmiral. He hoped and trusted that so black, malig- ant, and treacherous a step to strip one of the brightest aval characters this country could ever boast of, would neet with the honest indignation it merited, and finally ead to the detection of the authors of so infamous a project.

In the course of this debate, Burke emphatically asked, "Was this the return Admiral Keppel was to meet with, after forty years' painful and laborious service, and after being in ten capital engagements, or important conflicts, in every one of which he had, either as pos- sessed of the sole command or acting in a subordinate character, acquitted himself with the highest honour and reputation ? Was it an adequate return for a person of his rank and consequence, standing forth, as the favourite selected champion of his country, in the moment of dan- ger and difficulty ? He desired no return but that which he had already earned, and was sure of receiving with- out diminution—a return which it was not in the power of the Admiralty to bestow or withhold—an inward con- sciousness of having performed his duty."

With some little difficulty, Keppel's friends car- ried a bill for the court-martial being held on shore, instead of in the usual manner. This was one great point gained for justice. At the same time, twelve Admirals, at the head of whom was Hawke, sent an address to the King, complaining loudly of the conduct of the Admiralty in ordering this court-martial five months after the alleged offence had taken place, and upon the charge of a person in the position of Palliser. The address received a cold and barely civil answer from the King, and the trial proceeded. The state of the public mind may be gathered from Walpole's correspondence, who, in alluding to the impending trial, says of Keppel's mother,—

"Poor Lady Albemarle is indeed very miserable, and full of apprehensions, though the incredible zeal of the navy for Admiral Keppel crowns him with glory; and the indignation of mankind, and the execration of Sir Hugh, add to the triumph. Indeed, I still think Lady A.'s fears may be well founded : some slur may be pro- cured on her son ; and his own bad nerves and worse constitution may not be able to stand agitation and sus- pense."

The public zeal, and indignation too, exceeded any- thing that could have been anticipated. The court- martial was held at Portsmouth, and thither flocked Keppel's friends and political allies of all degrees. Among this phalanx were the royal Dukes of Cumberland and Gloucester ; the Dukes of Bolton, Richmond, and Portland, with other leading Whig noblemen ; and what was more im- portant, Fox, Burke, and Sheridan, with a great many naval officers. The counsel were Erskine, Lee, and Dunning. The memoir gives an elabo- rate and minute account of the trial, which lasted for many days. Much transpired, in its progress, honourable to the integrity and honourable feelings of the professional witnesses, who must have been aware that to do justice to the accused was not at this time the path to promotion. In his able speech in his own defence, Keppel probably had good help. His acquittal was confidently foretold before the verdict was given in.

Gibbon, the historian, at that time a Lord of Trade in expectancy, writes to Mr. Holroyd, on the 6th of Feb- ruary, five days before the sentence was declared :— "Portsmouth is no longer an object of speculation. The whole stream of all men and all parties runs one way. Sir Hugh is disgraced, ruined, &c., &c., and as an old wound has broken out again, they say he must have his leg cut off as soon as he has time. In a night or two we shall be in a blaze of illumination, from the zeal of naval heroes, land patriots, and tallow-chandlers : the last are not the least sincere."

When the verdict was pronounced, acclamations of joy burst forth in repeated peals "from the Duke of Cumberland to the meanest mechanic." The following touching anecdote is related—

Among the general acclamations of joy on the Admiral's acquittal, an instance is recorded of a poor negro who had been liberated from slavery on the reduction of Goree, and had followed Keppel to England. In order to obtain a view of his deliverer, he placed himself at a window, close to which the procession had to pass. No sooner did he see Keppel, than he burst forth into the most extravagant rapture, exclaiming "Gor A'mighty knows my heart,—I do love a dear Admiral ! God bless the Admiral !" These expressions, simple and artless as they were, attracted the attention, says the narrator, "of the whole procession, and coming from one so disin- terested were the greatest eulogy virtue could receive."

The public rejoicings spread from Portsmouth to London, where the mob testified their delight and exultation, by gutting a few of the houses of "little Keppel's" supposed enemies ; and break- ing a great many windows, when the people of the house did not illuminate, or did not illuminate so often as was required. It was said at the time that many of the mob on this occasion were not of the lower class ; and one lady affirmed that she saw Mr. Pitt break her windows. The Duke of Ancaster was caught among the rioters, and other noble persons long afterwards boasted of the share which they had in the assault on the Admiralty. The theatres made their own use of the prevailing feeling, and the public-houses assumed "Admiral Keppel" for their figure-head. There were Keppel buttons, and Keppel cockades for the men ; and Keppel caps for the ladies. The bells rung, and the ships fired ; and the House of Lords and that of Commons, with the city of London, and many other towns, voted addresses of congratulation. More marvellous still, the Admiral's counsel, Dunning, returned the hand- some fee enclosed to him, (two bills for £500 each,) and another professional gentleman, Mr. Lee, would accept of nothing save a portrait of the Admiral, to preserve as a relic or heir-loom in his family. Erskine did accept his £1000, but he was poor at this time, and he wrote a most grateful and affectionate letter to his client, and was ever afterwards his friend, his retained advocate, and warm panegyrist. At the next general election Keppel lost his seat for Windsor: the court notoriously interfering to defeat him, and to add to his triumph; for, no sooner was the result known, than the freeholders of Surrey invited him to stand; and though "government," he says, "moved heaven and earth," he carried his election over their candidate, Mr. Onslow. Keppel wrote to Lord Rockingham upon this occasion—

"The Surrey voters that came from Windsor, and about that place, returned with the utmost speed to announce my victory to the inhabitants of Windsor. The cannon were soon firing, and the bells ringing: and almost every house was lighted. I have been told that his Majesty had said, 'It would possibly be a busy night,' and had recommended a sergeant, and twelve privates, with loaded arms, to patrole the streets. There was, however, no riot; decency with quiet joy prevailed. The noise of the cannon disturbed the Queen, which, as soon as known, the well-bred citizens of Windsor, caused that part, which was among other marks of joy, to cease. The following day, the Prince of Wales and Prince Frederick took the most undisguised pains to express to every friend of mine their extreme satisfaction upon my success, and to one friend—I believe more than one—they said, 'we have had a most complete victory.'"

In an eloquent letter of congratulation from Burke it is said—

"The people of England have risen in my estimation. It is a great event for them; because it is a substantial encouragement to all those who in future shall, like you, serve them with ability, courage, and honour, without regard to cabal and the little politics of a Court."

Keppel had long been identified with the Whig party, both by his opinions and the personal dislike of the King; and when, on the resignation of Lord North in 1782, the Rockingham Administration was formed, he was appointed First Lord of the Admiralty, and was immediately afterwards created a Viscount, and promoted to the rank of Rear Admiral of the White. Rodney's splendid victory over Count de Grasse shortly afterwards lent lustre to the naval department of the new government.

After the death of Rockingham had broken up the Administration, Keppel continued in office, and also his friend the Duke of Richmond, though all of the party besides resigned. Keppel appears to have had good political reasons for his adhesion, and the party must have been of the same opinion; for on the formation of the short-lived coalition ministry in 1783, he again returned to the Admiralty. Of the coalition Administration it has been said by Moore in his Life of Sheridan, "that its death was worthy of its birth." It fell through its inherent weakness, and the contempt universally felt for the motives on which it was formed; though the actual or apparent stumbling-block was Fox's India Bill. It is here stated that,

By an extraordinary interference of the Sovereign, who said that he should consider any man his enemy who voted for the bill, it was rejected in the House of Lords by a majority of nineteen.

The same night, Keppel had an audience of the King. He had previously appointed Mr. Adair to sup with him at ten o'clock. It was past twelve before Keppel returned home. "Why, Admiral," said Adair, "where have you been? Here have I been waiting for my supper these two hours." Keppel replied—"I have been with the King; I thought I should never have got away. His Majesty has been most kind to me; he inquired about our prospects and plans, and treated me with so much openness and honesty, that I entered fully into the state of affairs, with which he seemed highly pleased." "And you believe him?" drily asked Mr. Adair. Keppel felt hurt at the doubt. Adair contented himself with saying—"Well, we shall see." Before they parted, a note arrived from Lord Temple, to inform Lord Keppel that his Majesty had no further occasion for his services. This was one "of those apparent marks of kindness which the King knew so well how to practise."

This is no bad specimen of the art called Kingcraft, in which George the Third was a tolerable "proficient." Keppel was succeeded at the Admiralty by his friend and companion in arms, Lord Howe; and he never afterwards mingled in public life. Severe hardships in his early service, and at different periods of an active professional life of forty years, had undermined his health, which for many years had been precarious. He was advised to spend the winter of 1785 at Naples, but returned in the following spring to his seat in Suffolk, where he died in the autumn, in the sixty-third year of his age. The annals of the British Navy have since been enriched with illustrious names, and surpassing achievements; but Keppel also was a great sea captain, and well merits to be kept in honourable remembrance, among the long list of England's Naval Heroes. In summing up the work the biographer thus notices his illustrious kinsman—

The epithet "little," fondly given by the sailors to Keppel, denotes him to have been low of stature. In his early manhood, a blow received from the butt-end of a pistol, in a scuffle with foot-pads, fractured the bridge of his nose. His face, by this accident, was seriously and permanently disfigured; yet the fascination of his smile, and the lively and benevolent expression of his eyes, redeemed the countenance from extreme plainness. The "hereditary charm" of his demeanour has been mentioned already. It combined a professional honesty and frankness with the ease and simplicity of address which, if not altogether acquired, are certainly confirmed and perfected by intercourse with the best society. . . . The political opinions of Keppel were inherited from ancestors, who for centuries had been citizens of a free state, and whose descendants shared in our own revolution of 1688. Reason and experience confirmed these sentiments in him; and he was, throughout his life, the steady and fearless supporter of civil and religious freedom, even when an opposite course, or neutrality alone, would have smoothed and accelerated his professional advancement. His darling object was, active employment; yet, when required to serve against his unrepresented brethren on the opposite shores of the Atlantic, Keppel courted neglect and misrepresentation rather than lend his services to a cause which his feelings and his principles equally disapproved.

This is high praise, for it rests upon the solid rock of principle. Keppel has been immortalized by the pen of Burke, who, upon accidentally seeing the portrait of the Admiral painted by Reynolds, took occasion in his celebrated letter to Francis duke of Bedford, the nephew of the Admiral, to make this eloquent panegyric—

"It was painted by an artist worthy of the subject, the excellent friend of that excellent man from their earliest youth, and a common friend of us both, with whom we lived for many years without a moment of coldness, of peevishness, of jealousy, or of jar, to the day of our final separation.

"I ever looked on Lord Keppel as one of the greatest and best men of his age, and I loved and cultivated him accordingly. He was much in my heart, and I believe I was in his to the very last beat. It was after his trial at Portsmouth that he gave me this picture. With what zeal and anxious affection I attended him through that his agony of glory; what part my son in the early flush and enthusiasm of his virtue, and the pious passion with which he attached himself to all my connexions; with what prodigality we both squandered ourselves in courting almost every sort of enmity for his sake! I believe he felt just as I should have felt such friendship, on such an occasion. I partook, indeed, of this honour, with several of the first, and best, and ablest in the kingdom; but I was behindhand with none of them, and I am sure that if, to the eternal disgrace of this nation, and to the total annihilation of every trace of honour and virtue in it, things had taken a different turn from what they did, I should have attended him to the quarter-deck with no less good-will and more pride, though with far other feelings, than I partook of the general flow of national joy that attended the justice that was done to his virtue."

Though the examination which the Rev. Mr. Keppel has made, of the many valuable collections of private papers to which he had access, has elicited less connected with his subject and the times of Keppel than might have been expected, his work forms a worthy testimony to the character of a distinguished Naval Commander, and also an important addition to British Naval Biography.

FASHIONABLE SENATORS.

During the unreformed Millennium of borough-mongering, the Most High Court of Parliament was constantly reviled by the press as a mart of corruption and jobbery; wherein seats were bought and votes offered to sale, till the House of Commons became a by-word of disgrace with all other Houses. The briberies of borough Election have of late been too extensively brought to light to need further exposition.—But there are minor abuses, the results of such elections, to which the laws of the land can yield no redress, and which have all the stronger claim to exposure.

Though the time may be at an end when "the most sweet voices" of aspiring Senators were purchaseable by the perquisites of office, a coronet or a riband,—though the practical portion of the House may be reënforced by the acquisition of active men of business, who, but for the Reform Bill, had never found themselves classed among the representatives of the people, there still exists a glittering fry, a species of senatocracy,—the minnows over which these Tritons rise superior,—boy-members placed in parliament by their noble relatives, as a sort of preparatory school to the Eton of the Upper House;—or honourable younger brothers, and lads of fortune, who aspire to a consistency and position in society, through the medium of parliamentary distinction. These, the awkward squad, or chorus of the House, form a serious drawback on the march and respectability of public business. Restless, impatient, their idle vacuity of mind forestalls, by a murmur or a titter, the working out of arguments, whenever they do not retreat to the gallery from the graver progress of debate to doze away the digestion of their dinner, or wander to and fro in the lobbies in fidgety anticipation of the division. They are not only the worst speakers, but the worst listeners in the world;—disrespectful, through the superficiality of their perceptions, and curious only concerning the irregularities and incidental interruptions of a debate. For them the "Order, order!" of the Speaker has more interest than the expositions of Peel or Gladstone, the wit of Charles Buller, or the eloquence of Macaulay.

For what purpose, it may be inquired, do such flutterers force their way into parliament, to the exclusion of good men and true? Verily, all these boy-members are altogether vanity!—Parliament is the pea-stick to which their trailing insignificance must be tied to upraise it from the ground! As members of parliament, they expect to be admitted into White's or Brookes', otherwise sealed against their approach. As members of parliament, they are honoured by invitations to fashionable dinner-parties, to which their beardless inanity might not otherwise pretend. It is true, on the other hand, that they renounce the opera on Tuesday nights, besides many of the best balls of the season; and even Almacks, in the event of an adjourned debate. Still, they gain in consequence more than they abjure in pastime. Compressed in the throng of abler men, they mechanically acquire the jargon of parliamentary intelligence, and amass a host of anecdotes that would never otherwise reach their ears. Witless echoes of wit,—uninstructed retailers of able argument,—as members of the Senatocracy, they are compelled to attend public meetings, to form a portion of literary or scientific institutions, to affect discretion in their follies, and decency in their weaknesses. The magic letters M.P., in short,

> "Give to airy nothing
> A local habitation and a name!"

Far more deleterious to the progress of public business do they become, when afflicted with the ambition of distinguishing themselves by more than crossing the threshold of the Lower House. If smitten with a taste for speaking, they become an incumbrance indeed! Witness their puny, yet laboured harangues; as a peg for the suspension of which, they are forced to get up stalking-horse motions,—(even as a certain four-and-twenty-pounder Review appended its able essay on the Anglo-Saxons to a new edition of Hume's History of England;) whereas, but for the facilities afforded by senatorial privilege to monster their nothings to empty benches and the reporters' gallery, these convulsions of teething statesmen would exhibit themselves in the form of "Occasional Poems," or pap-boat pamphlets, printed at their own expense on hot-pressed paper, and duly presented to their circle of private friends and literary puffers, "from the author;"—an innocent effusion of vanity innoxious to any mortal living, and a happy safety-valve to the high-pressure boilers of vanity. If, as is generally admitted to be the case, the conscript fathers of the senate direct their eloquence to the enlightenment of the country, rather than of each other, standing in their place in parliament,—as a signal-master beside the telegraph which is to convey tidings of the fate of nations to some distant port,—and, by means of the publicity of the press, convincing England and its colonies, that if from four you take three, there remains two; or that the income tax of to-day will net the same returns as the income tax levied upon a reduced currency forty years ago, the polite prattlers of the senatocracy direct their flimsy exposition of—exclusively to the exclusives;—i. e. the fashionable coteries, whose petty praise is petty fame.

What oft was thought but ne'er so ill express'd,

All this might be passed over as unimportant, or perhaps regarded as an improvement on the minor ambitions of barouche-driving or steeple-chasing, did it not involve the destinies of millions,—and influence the happiness here, and perhaps hereafter, of mankind. For though it be more than probable that the representatives of those boroughs for which the parties to whom we allude obtain their seats, be they whom they might, would vote precisely according to the same political bias, it does not follow that because exercising no direct influence in divisions, their presence in parliament exercises none upon the tone and order of debate. No one ever yet attended a public auction of valuable property, without experiencing involuntary regret and compunction at the reckless disregard evinced at the dispersion, waste, and spoliation produced by the indifference of the bidders, and the carelessness of the auctioneer; nor can those who view for the first time the slipshod tone of discussion induced by the impatience of the young members, doubt for a moment that important interests may be sacrificed to the irritability or listlessness of the species. To their absence from the Upper House, where the young and fashionable rarely find themselves on duty, may be attributed, quite as much as to the distinct nature of the functions of the House of Peers, the different order of debating.—The manner of transacting business in the committees of the Upper House, more especially, is mainly attributable to the desire of rational expedition produced by the less petulant nature of their composition. Let it not be supposed that we are ignorant of the existence of many valuable members in the large class we have presumed to arraign, and whom it would be invidious to specify. But we must still persist in separating from the august wisdom of parliament, the representatives of a place, which sends more members thither than the city of London, viz. the LIMBO OF VANITY.

SPORTS OF THE SAINTS.

THE Reverend Ichabod Beresford,
A strenuous fowler before the Lord,
Left, at break of day, his Rectory-house,
To beat, o'er moor and mountain, for grouse.
But as he went forth on that pleasant mission,
A Methodist preacher of low condition,
Presumed to take him roundly to task
About his gun and his powder-flask;—
Inquiring, in an ironical tone,
Which of the twelve Apostles were known
A-brushing the early dews away
After such feathered game to stray,
Instead of reserving their charge, to level
At that old roaring lion, the devil.
"I own," said the Reverend Ichabod,
"What you say is true, though by no means odd;
For the reverend gentlemen you mention
Flourish'd—poor souls—before the invention
Of high-glazed powder and patent caps,
Which may account for the thing, perhaps.
But though you and I have never heard
Of any Apostle winging his bird,
You cannot deny, my stiff precisian,
The good old saints were much giv'n to fishing:
And I'll bet you a sporting rump and dozen,
That St. Peter himself, or St. Peter's cousin,
Were he now on earth, beyond any doubt,
Would throw a fly, now and then, at a trout;
Or this breezy morning, for all your gammon,
Would be angling, perhaps, in the Boyne—for salmon!"

IZAAK.

LINES

ADDRESSED TO A YOUNG LADY ON HER HAVING DRAWN A PORTRAIT OF CALLIOPE, THE CHIEF OF THE NINE MUSES.

The winged muse, like fabled Fawn,
When young and strong in classic shades,
Would wake before the dewy dawn,
To gambol with the mountain maids.

And oft my thoughts have tried in vain
To paint with equal grace and truth
Some faint resemblance of her then,
When in the spring-time of her youth.

But what my mind could ill portray,
Christina's pencil soon supplies;
And blooming, as at dawn of day,
The minstrel maid salutes my eyes.

Whilst every charm to Beauty known,
Where Beauty bright may still be seen,
Her fairy hand has sweetly thrown
Around the young celestial queen.

A brow of pearl, 'mid auburn hair,
Which, curling, hangs in locks so fine;
And rosy lips, and cheeks as fair,
And eyes that beam with love divine.

O surely sweet Christina knew,
That when she sketch'd this winning elf,
She all the while but only drew
A picture of her pretty self.

REPORT ON THE SANITARY CONDITION OF THE LABOURING POPULATION OF GREAT BRITAIN.*

It would not be easy to overrate the importance f this Report; nor would it be possible to wade hrough its painful and often revolting details, unless one were sustained by the fervent hope that reat good must issue, and that speedily, from the xtensive, laborious, and well-conducted inquiry of vhich it gives a luminous view. The Report is lrawn up by Mr. Chadwick, the secretary to the Board of Poor-law Commissioners, which body had een directed by the late Government to make the ecessary inquiries, and transmit the results to the Home Secretary. The task was not accomplished ntil very lately, and after Sir James Graham had aken the place of Lord John Russell. But this hange makes no difference whatever in the nature of the information collected; nor will it, we should hope, in the measures that ought to be based upon that information, and the many useful suggestions by which it is accompanied. The more important and comprehensive of these suggestions are made by Mr. Chadwick himself; and as the Tory Government enjoys greater facilities for carrying useful measures than its predecessor, we are willing to believe that, in this case, earnest inclination will not be wanting; since the improvement of the condition of the "dangerous classes," while it takes nothing out of the pockets of those whom the Government exists to gratify, must greatly add to their security. Though the people may continue to be mulcted as severely as ever in their bread, there will probably be no objection to their obtaining better water in more copious measure, and better ventilation, unless indeed that may interfere with the window tax.

This General Report is an analysis of the numerous local reports that have been transmitted to the Poor-law Commissioners from many different quarters: from the Assistant Commissioners; the Boards of Guardians in the several Unions of England and Wales; from well-qualified medical practitioners in many towns; and from engineers, architects, clergymen, and other intelligent persons, who have paid particular attention to the condition of the working classes generally, and especially to that of the miserable poor. Several of the local reports, now collected into a volume, we have already seen in a detached form, and have formerly noticed. But Mr. Chadwick does not confine himself to them. He has gone to other countries, and has brought forward, from many sources, whatever may best illustrate his facts or enforce his arguments. Altogether, there was never, perhaps, a more minute and ample body of testimony collected on any similar subject. If painful, and, at first sight, almost appalling, the view which the Report exhibits of the moral and physical condition of the great body of the labouring population (rural as well as urban) is unhappily not more new to those conversant with the condition of the poor than it is lamentable. Whatever may be the cause, or combination of causes—and we do not mean at present to investigate them—there is no question that the condition of the great body of the labouring class has deteriorated within the last thirty years, and that in every point embraced in this Report, whether in their dwellings, their food, their habits, or their health. The ostensible object is sanitary, the physical condition of the poor, and the rate of mortality; comprehending every point of an inquiry of which the grand object ought, in the first place, to be removal of the physical barriers to improvement; for, as is here justly said, without these preparatory measures, "moral agencies have but a remote chance of success." It is stated, and in short proved, that the scavenger, the drainer, the mason, the carpenter, the plumber, &c., must precede the schoolmaster; and thus render the surgeon almost a supernumerary among a well-conditioned population.

Of the many painful facts that meet us in this Report, none are perhaps so revolting as the accounts of the brutalized feelings and manners of a portion of the working people, and, we would fain hope, an inconsiderable portion; though it is horrible to conceive that wretches so degraded as some of the colliers and others are represented should be found existing in a civilized country. Savage life has nothing to match in atrocity some of the traits given of the domestic manners of individuals among the Scotch colliers; nor of filth and degradation, equal to that of the denizens of the worst places of London, Glasgow, Edinburgh, Liverpool, and other large and flourishing towns and "centres of civilisation." From the Report of Dr. Scott Alison, upon the sanitary condition and general economy of the colliery districts of Haddingtonshire, and particularly of the village of Tranent, we learn that the average earnings of a collier's family is from 30s. to 40s. a-week; which they waste, while living in a state of filth, misery, and low, brutal debauchery that savage life could not parallel. Fever is never a year without paying these people, and others of like habits, a visit; nor, from the prevailing filth and wretched dwellings, is this surprising. Few places suffered so much from cholera as Tranent. The village is dirty and ill-drained, with dunghills cherished before every door, emitting the most pestilent effluvia. But this is not peculiar to Tranent, nor to the colliers. A medical man, the Provost of Inverness, thus characteristically writes of his constituents. "Inverness is a nice town, situated in a most beautiful country, and with every facility for cleanliness and comfort. The people are, generally speaking, a nice people; but their sufferance of nastiness is past endurance.

Contagious fever is seldom ever absent." "The midden [Anglicè, dunghill] is the chief object of the humble; and though enough of water, for purposes of cleanliness, may be had with very little trouble, still their ablutions are seldom. Muck, indoors and out of doors, must be their portion. When cholera prevailed in Inverness, it was more fatal than in almost any other town of its population in Britain."

Particular districts of London, Glasgow, Edinburgh, Bath, and many other large towns, are in even a worse condition of filth than either Tranent or Inverness. The exceptions to the rule are few and far between; the cases occur everywhere, and under every variety of circumstance. The Report of Mr. Howell, (one of the Council of the Society of Civil Engineers,) of the state of his own parish in London, and that of Dr. Neill Arnott, on the closes, wynds, and back streets of Edinburgh and Glasgow, we could not, without exciting needless disgust, transfer to our pages; a circumstance which makes it but the more imperative that the whole truth should be known to those who are to administer the remedy. We may, however, venture upon the conclusion:

"The interiors of these houses corresponded with their exteriors. We saw half-dressed wretches crowding together to be warm; and in one bed, though in the middle of the day, several women were imprisoned under a blanket, because as many others, who had on their backs all the articles of dress belonging to the party, were then out of doors in the streets. The picture is so shocking that, without ocular proof, one would be disposed to doubt the possibility of the facts; and yet there is, perhaps, no old town in Europe that does not furnish parallel examples. London, before the great fire of 1666, had few drains, and had many such scenes; and the consequence was a pestilence occurring at intervals of about twelve years, each destroying, at an average, about a fourth of the inhabitants."

Glasgow is fearfully preëminent in whatever marks a neglected and degraded population.

Bad drainage and defective sewerage, and want of effectual cleansing for the streets, but especially the lanes, courts, and alleys, are common to both kingdoms, and pervade every district. From these causes alone, many towns and villages, otherwise healthfully situated, are never free from contagious fever, small-pox, &c. As an example, Windsor is found in this condition in the immediate vicinity of the palace.

Nothing in this body of evidence is more completely made out than that bad drainage and bad ventilation, even without overcrowding, is a strong and permanently exciting cause of fever. Greenock is most favourably situated for health, and is well supplied with water; but, by the Report of Dr. Laurie, from bad drainage, want of means of cleansing the streets, and the accumulation of dunghills in the courts and lanes, contagious fever is never long out of the town. As respects salubrity of natural situation existing along with filth and contagious disease, Greenock finds counterparts in Edinburgh, Inverness, and hundreds of other places in England as well as Scotland. "The cottage homes of England!" stand beautiful in poetry, with their whitewashed walls, and porches wreathed with vines and roses; but let us, with the doctor, look within:

"The cottages are in general built more with a view to the per centage of the landlord than to the accommodation of the poor. The joiner's work is ill performed; admitting by the doors, windows, and even floors, air in abundance, which, however, in many cases, is not disadvantageous to the inmates. The houses generally consist of three apartments, viz. the day-room, into which the street-door opens, and two bed-rooms, one above the other. There is likewise beneath the day-room a cellar, let off either by the landlord or tenant of the house, to a more improvident class of labourers; which cellar, in almost all cases, is small and damp, and often crowded with inhabitants to excess. These cellars are, in my opinion, the source of many diseases, particularly catarrh, rheumatic affections, and tedious cases of typhus mitior, which, owing to the overcrowded state of the apartment, occasionally pass into typhus gravior. I need scarcely add that the furniture and bedding are in keeping with the miserable inmates. The rooms above the day-room are often let separately by the tenant to lodgers, varying in number from one or two, to six or eight individuals in each; their slovenly habits, indolence, and consequent accumulation of filth, go far to promote the prevalence of contagious and infectious diseases.

"The houses already alluded to front the street; but there are houses in back courts still more unfavourably placed, which also have their cellars, and their tenants of a description worse, if possible. There is commonly only one receptacle for refuse in a court of eight, ten, or twelve densely-crowded houses. In the year 1836-7, I attended a family of thirteen, twelve of whom had typhus fever, without a bed, in the cellar, without straw or timber shavings—frequent substitutes. They lay on the floor, and so crowded, that I could scarcely pass between them. In another house I attended fourteen patients; there were only two beds in the house. All the patients, as lodgers, lay on the boards, and, during their illness, never had their clothes off. I met with many cases in similar conditions, yet amidst the greatest destitution and want of domestic comfort, I have never heard, during the course of twelve years' practice, a complaint of inconvenient accommodation."

But these are town residences—those of that great and wealthy emporium of commerce, Liverpool; let us turn to the rural cottages of England, the dwellings, not of colliers and miners, but of husbandmen—the happy peasantry.

Dr. Gilly of Norham, in a little tract to which we alluded with approbation when it appeared, thus describes the dwellings of his humble neighbours and parishioners, for whom he pleads with their masters and the landed gentry, whose estates the wretched hovels of the peasantry utterly disgrace.

"The chimneys have lost half their original height, and lean on the roof with fearful gravitation. The rafters are evidently rotten and displaced; and the thatch, yawning to admit the wind and wet in some parts, and in all parts utterly unfit for its original purpose of giving protection from the weather, looks more like the top of a dunghill than of a cottage.

"Such is the exterior; and when the hind comes to take possession, he finds it no better than a shed. The wet, if it happens to rain, is making a puddle on the earth floor. (This earth floor, by the bye, is one of the causes to which Erasmus ascribed the frequent recurrence of epidemic sickness among the cotters of England more than 300 years ago. It is not only cold and wet, but contains the aggregate filth of years, from the time of its first being used. The refuse and dropping of meals, decayed animal and vegetable matter of all kinds, which has been cast upon it from the mouth and stomach, there all mix together and exude from it.) Window-frame there is none. There is neither oven, nor copper, nor grate, nor shelf, nor fixture of any kind; all these things he has to bring with him, besides his ordinary articles of furniture. Imagine the trouble, the inconvenience, and the expense which the poor fellow and his wife have to encounter before they can put this shell of a hut into ything like a habitable form. This year I saw a nily of eight—husband, wife, two sons, and four ughters—who were in utter discomfort, and in de- air of putting themselves in a decent condition, three four weeks after they had come into one of these vels. In vain did they try to stop up the crannies, d to fill up the holes in the floor, and to arrange their niture in tolerably decent order, and to keep out the ather. Alas! what will they not suffer in the winter! ere will be no fireside enjoyment for them. They may ddle together for warmth, and heap coals on the fire; t they will have chilly beds and a damp hearth-stone; d the cold wind will sweep through the roof, and win- w, and crazy door-place, in spite of all their endeavours exclude it.

"The general character of the best of the old-fashioned nd's cottages in this neighbourhood is bad at the best. ey have to bring everything with them—partitions, ndow-frames, fixtures of all kinds, grates, and a sub- itute for ceiling; for they are, as I have already called em, mere sheds. They have no byre for their cows, r styes for their pigs, no pumps or wells, nothing to omote cleanliness or comfort. The average size of ese sheds is about 24 by 16. They are dark and un- holesome. The windows do not open; and many of em are not larger than 20 inches by 16; and into this ace are crowded 8, 10, or even 12 persons.

Upon a former occasion, in an article * on the oor-laws of Scotland, the wretched abodes of the easantry in the finest and most highly improved gricultural districts of Scotland, were pretty fully escribed; but Mr. Wilson, surgeon of Lochmaben, nables us to add a new group to the picture.

"In Lochmaben, they are surrounded by low meadow nds subject to frequent inundations, marshes and lakes, rith dunghills and pools of dirty water, in which vege- able substances are soaked for the purpose of making anure on all sides of the dwellings. These houses, imilar to the dwellings of the generality of the labour- ng classes, consist of a building 30 feet in length by 16 et in breadth within the walls; the floor is formed of lay; ceiling, if any, generally formed by spars of wood aid close together, and covered with dry turf; one front oor and two front windows. This building is usually ccupied by two families, entering by the same door; he partitions are formed by the back of the beds, which rill be best understood by describing them as wooden oxes open on one side; the windows rarely are made to pen, so that they are ventilated by the door; but having ttle fuel, the door must be kept shut to maintain armth, and the chimneys being badly constructed, the welling is often full of smoke. Potatoes are often kept nder the beds. There are no proper receptacles for lth attached to the houses."

As a specimen of the English cottages, we take he following from the fine county of Dorset, and a eighbourhood in which typhus and synochus nevitably abound.

Most of the cases of synochus occurred under circum- tances favourable to its production; most of the cot- ages being of the worst description, some mere mud ovels, and situated in low and damp places, with cess- ools or accumulations of filth close to the doors. The mud floors of many are much below the level of the oad, and in wet seasons are little better than so much lay. The following shocking case occurred in my ractice:—In a family, consisting of six persons, two id fever; the mud floor of their cottage was at least ne foot below the lane; it consisted of one small room ally, in the centre of which stood a foot-ladder reaching the edge of a platform which extended over nearly he-half of the room, and upon which were placed two eds, with space between them for one person only to tand, whilst the outside of each touched the thatch. The head of one of these beds stood within six inches of the edge of the platform, and in this bed one of my unfortunate patients, a boy about eleven years old, was sleeping with his mother, and in a fit of delirium jumped over the head of his bed and fell to the ground below, a height of about seven feet. The injury to the head and spine was so serious that he lived a few hours only after the accident. In a cottage fit for the residence of a human being this could not have occurred. In many of the cottages, also, where synochus prevailed, the beds stood on the ground-floor, which was damp three parts of the year; scarcely one had a fire-place in the bed-room, and one had a single small pane of glass stuck in the mud wall as its only window, with a large heap of wet and dirty potatoes in one corner. Persons living in such cottages are generally very poor, very dirty, and usually in rags, living almost wholly on bread and potatoes, scarcely ever tasting animal food, and consequently highly susceptible of disease, and very unable to contend with it. I am quite sure if such persons were placed in good, comfortable, clean cottages, the improvement in themselves and children would soon be visible, and the exceptions would only be found in a few of the poorest and most wretched, who, perhaps, had been born in a mud hovel, and had lived in one the first 30 years of their lives.

Mr. John Fox, the medical officer who makes this report, concludes thus—

"I think there cannot be a doubt, if the whole of the wretched hovels were converted into good cottages, with a strict attention to warmth, ventilation, and drainage, and a receptacle for filth of every kind placed at a proper distance, it would not only improve the health of the poor by removing a most prolific source of disease, and thereby most sensibly diminish the rates; but I am convinced it would also tend most materially to raise the moral character of the poor man, and render him less susceptible to the allurements of the idle and wicked."

The Reports of nearly all the medical officers belonging to the Unions concur in stating that the ordinary dwellings of the poor are as fatal to health as to the formation and maintenance of good habits. The rents of these places, and of old and dilapidated houses divided into numerous dwellings, each overcrowded, is, at the same time, in general excessively high, though they may not always be very regularly paid. In Greenock, "lands" of houses, of several stories in height, are divided into flats, and let out to the poor in one or two rooms. According to Dr. Laurie—

The rent of these rooms varies from £2, 10s. to £7; the average size of each room, I should think, would be from eight to nine feet square, and about the same measure in height. The demand for this class of houses is very great, which induces the landlords to take such high rents.

I have a district, as a deacon, in one of the parishes, and the hovels (one cannot call them houses) inhabited by some of the paupers in this district, are such abodes of wretchedness that few could imagine that such places were to be found in a Christian community.

There is one poor man who was under my care in the hospital with asthma for six months, he was dismissed as incurable, and is now living with his wife and seven children in a dark room on the ground-floor, more fit for a coal-cellar than a human being: it is lighted by a fixed window, about two feet square; the breadth of the room is only four feet, and the length eight. There is only one bed for the whole family, and yet the rent of this hole is £5.

Still these houses are in such request, that at last term one of the paupers living in a similar place was out-bid as to the rent by another person. He could get no other house, and for a week he slept with his wife and three children in his pig-stye: he had ultimately to seek a house in a neighbouring village.

* Tait's Magazine for November and December 1840.

The rents of hovels in England are often equally enormous.

In one cul-de-sac, in the town of Leeds, there are 34 houses; and in ordinary times, there dwell in these houses 340 persons, or ten to every house; but as these houses are many of them receiving-houses for itinerant labourers, during the periods of hay-time and harvest, and the fairs, at least twice that number are then here congregated. The name of this place is the Boot and Shoe-yard, in Kirkgate, a location from whence the Commissioners removed, in the days of the cholera, 75 cart-loads of manure, which had been untouched for years, and where there now exists a surface of human excrement of very considerable extent, to which these impure and unventilated dwellings are additionally exposed. This property is said to pay the best annual interest of any cottage property in the borough.

Of certain wretched tenements, in every respect wretched, in the metropolitan Union of Whitechapel, Mr. John Liddle, after he had described the deplorable condition of the inmates, was asked—

"How do they get such water as they use?—They get it for the most part from a plug in the courts. I cannot say whether it is the actual scarcity of water, or their reluctance to fetch it, but the effect is a scarcity of water. When I have occasion to visit their rooms, I find they have only a very scanty supply of water in their tubs. When they are washing, the smell of the dirt mixed with the soap is the most offensive of all the smells I have to encounter. They merely pass dirty linen through very dirty water. The smell of the linen itself, when so washed, is very offensive, and must have an injurious effect on the health of the occupants. The filth of their dwellings is excessive, so is their personal filth. When they attend my surgery, I am always obliged to have the door open. When I am coming down stairs from the parlour, I know at the distance of a flight of stairs whether there are any poor patients in the surgery. Any one who attends on the relief days of the out-door relief may satisfy himself as to the personal condition of these parties.

"Are the courts in which the labouring classes reside, in your district, paved or cleansed?—They are not flagged, they have a sort of pebbles; they are always wet and dirty. The people, having no convenience in their houses for getting rid of waste water, throw it down at the doors. If I cast my eye over the whole district at this moment, I do not think that one house for the working classes will be found, in which there is such a thing as a sink for getting rid of the water.

"What are the rents paid for these descriptions of tenements?—I am informed, very high rents. I am informed that this description of property pays a better per centage than any other description of property.—My impression is, that it pays as much as 20 per cent. in many instances."

This evidence exhibits the common condition of large masses of habitations, even in the metropolis, where there are so many competing companies.

In connexion with this we must not forget to notice that, in one case, (in the Stockport Local Act,) power is given to the commissioners of the town to compel the owners of cottages, let to the poor, to provide a good supply of water to their tenants. And this is so far good, where more cannot be obtained; and where not only an abundant supply of water, but proper machinery for ventilation, and means of directly carrying off all impurities by water-closets in connexion with the street drains, are not adopted. We shall afterwards see with what manifest advantage, even in an economical point of view, the thorough and perfect improvement of the poorest of the poor, in these respects, would be attended. A deficient supply of water in the dwellings of the poor, even where water is plentiful around them, often aggravates their other miseries. In many places all classes of people suffer, either from the deficient supply, or the bad quality of water, or from both conjoined. On this head Mr. J. H. Burton, Advocate, of Edinburgh, who was employed by the Board to report upon the state of the laws of Scotland regarding the public health, the abatement of nuisances, and so forth, makes the following important statement:—

"I have reason to believe that in many parts of Scotland the want of a good supply of water is one of the most material impediments to the furtherance of cleanly habits among the working people. Besides the immediate evils of a narrow supply, much time is wasted, and many bad habits are acquired by those who have to wait their turn at the wells in a time of drought. Dundee, Stirling, Dunfermline, Lanark, and Arbroath, are all, I believe, imperfectly supplied. The community of Dundee have spent about £30,000 in a contest between the supporters of two contending water-bills; and I understand that an Act, which was passed about three years ago, has been found incapable of being put in operation."

It is clear, that while water has to be waited for, or carried from even a short distance, it will never be sought after by the labouring poor, in anything like the measure necessary to cleanliness.

The Rev. Whitewell Elwin, the chaplain of the Bath Union, gives the following illustration of the habits of many of the working population even in that city, which is well supplied with water:—

"A man had to fetch water from one of the public pumps in Bath, the distance from his house being about a quarter of a mile,—'It is as valuable,' he said, 'as strong beer. We can't use it for cooking, or anything of that sort, but only for drinking and tea.' 'Then where do you get water for cooking and washing?'—'Why, from the river. But it is muddy, and often stinks bad, because all the filth is carried there.' 'Do you then prefer to cook your victuals in water which is muddy and stinks, to walking a quarter of a mile to fetch it from the pump?'—'We can't help ourselves, you know. We could not go all that way for it.' There are many gentlemen's houses in the same district in which the water is not fit for cooking; and I know that much privation and inconvenience is undergone to avoid the expense of water-carriage. I have often wondered to see the shifts which have been endured, rather than be at the cost of an extra pail of water, of which the price was three halfpence. With the poor, far less obstacles are an absolute barrier, because no privation is felt by them so little as that of cleanliness. The propensity to dirt is so strong, the steps so few and easy, that nothing but the utmost facilities for water can act as a counterpoise; and such is the love of uncleanliness, when once contracted, that no habit, not even drunkenness, is so difficult to eradicate."

In most towns, and certainly in the larger manufacturing towns, those members of a family who are of strength to fetch water are usually of strength to be employed in profitable industry, and the mere value of their time expended in the labour of fetching water, is almost always much higher than the cost of regular supplies of water even at the charge made by the water companies. In Glasgow, the charge for supplying a labourer's tenement is 5s. per annum; in Manchester 6s. In London the usual charge is 10s. for a tenement containing two families, for which sum two tons and a half of water per week may be obtained if needed. For 1s. per annum, then, as a water-rate (on which from 10 to 20 per cent. is paid to the owner for collection,) each labourer's family may be supplied in the metropolis with one ton and a quarter of water weekly, if they find it necessary to use so much. The ton is 216 gallons, equal to 108 pails full, at two gallons the pail. Thus, for less than one penny farthing, 135 pails full of water are taken into the house without the labour of fetching, without spilling or disturbance, and placed in constant readiness for use. Under any circumstances, if the labourer or his wife or child would otherwise be employed, even in the lowest-paid labour, or in knitting stockings, the cost of fetching water by hand is extravagantly high as compared with the highest cost of water lifted by steam and conducted through iron pipes at a large expenditure of capital (the lowest in London is about £200,000) and by an expensive management. In illustration of the difference in economy of the two modes of conveyance, I may mention that the usual cost of filtered water carried into the houses at Paris by the water-carriers, is two sous the pailful, being at the rate of 9s. per ton; whilst the highest charge of any of the companies in London for sending the same quantity of water to any place within the range of their pipes, and delivering it at an average level of 100 feet, at the highest charge, is 6d. per ton.

At the highest of the water companies' charges it would be good economy for the health of the labourer's family to pay for water being laid on in the house, to reduce the expense of medicines and loss of work in the family, as indicated by any of the tables of sickness. The cost of laying on the water in a labourer's tenement, and providing a butt or receptacle to hold it, may be stated to be on an average 40s., which will last twenty years.

The experience of the water companies tends to show that the distribution of water directly into the houses where it is wanted, would be good economy of the water. When the supply of water into the houses is stopped by frost, and cocks are, on that occasion, opened in the streets, the supply of water required is one-third greater than usual; as great, indeed, as it is in the heat of summer, when there is a large additional consumption for watering gardens and roads. I would here suggest that it is essential that the water should be charged on the owners of all the smaller weekly tenements; because, where the owner finds it necessary to collect the rent weekly, the smaller collection of rates for longer periods would often be impracticable, and the expense of the collection alone of such small rates weekly (1½d. per week) would be more than the amount collected.

These are but a part of Mr. Chadwick's valuable suggestions for obtaining a cheap, easy, and copious supply of this first necessary of life, and strengthener of so many good domestic habits. It will be difficult to convince us that a full supply of water laid on in every town-dwelling, efficient draining and sewerage, and some approximation to the proper ventilation of dwellings and workshops, are not among the most attainable of the many good objects to which this Report points. Even these were, of themselves, no mean gain to the cause of social and domestic amelioration. On the subject of cheaply and systematically removing the refuse of towns, we find, among others, the following important suggestions. Mr. Chadwick had previously described the wholesale nuisance near Edinburgh, known as the Foul Burn, which, in conveying the contents of many of the drains, sinks, privies, and open gutters of the Old Town to the sea, is made to irrigate a considerable extent of flat land, which, from being formerly comparatively a waste, now produces four or five successive crops of grass a-year. Some of the richest of these meadows let, in 1835, at £38 an acre; and in 1826, a season of scarce forage, at £57 an acre. Ten acres which formerly brought £60 in whole, are now let at £15 and £20 the acre. Such is the value of city refuse, applied to the irrigation of meadows, by very imperfect means; for, from the report of chemists, it would appear that the same processes which prove highly offensive, and probably deleterious to health in the neighbourhood of those meadows, very considerably deteriorate the quality of the manure. The great importance of the subject, and the certainty that this Magazine will fall into the hands of many intelligent persons, who may not have the advantage of perusing the original Report, induces us to take up the subject at greater length than we had contemplated, and also to notice the arrangements suggested for the protection of the public health, so far as the removal of the offal and litter of towns can effect this great purpose.

After citing, from various Local Reports, many instances of the ignorance and carelessness under which the general health and comfort of the inhabitants of towns suffer from the accumulation of dunghills in the midst of them, Mr. Chadwick proceeds—

> The comparatively recent mode of cleansing adopted in the wealthy and newly-built districts by the use of water-closets, and the discharge of all refuse at once from the house through the drain into the sewers, saves the delay and the previous accumulation, and it also saves the expense of the old means of removal. It is most applicable to the poorer districts, because really the most economical, when they are properly sewered and supplied with water. The cost of cheap and appropriate apparatus, and of water for cleansing, it will be proved, is a reduction of the mere cost of cleansing in the old method, independently of the cost incurred by the decay of woodwork and deterioration of the tenement which commonly takes place on premises in the condition of those described by Mr. Howell. The chief objection to the extension of this system is the pollution of the water of the river into which the sewers are discharged. Admitting the expediency of avoiding the pollution, it is nevertheless proved to be an evil of almost inappreciable magnitude in comparison with the ill health occasioned by the constant retention of several hundred thousand accumulations of pollution in the most densely-peopled districts.
> There is much evidence, however, to prove that it is possible to remove the refuse in such a mode as to avoid the pollution of the river, and at the same time avoid the culpable waste of the most important manure.
> A practical example of the money value which lies in the refuse of a town, when removed in the cheapest manner, and applied in the form best adapted to production, viz., by a system of cleansing by water, is afforded in connexion with the city of Edinburgh. In the course of the sanitary inquiry in that city the particular attention of Dr. Arnott and myself was directed to the effects of some offensive irrigation of the land which had taken place in the immediate vicinity of that city.
> The practice is strongly objected to by the inhabitants as an offensive and injurious nuisance. To Dr. Arnott, who surveyed the district, the process appeared to be, like most offensive processes, unfitted for the vicinity of a town. The miasma from the preparation of the large accumulations of manure in open receptacles near places of public resort or crowded habitations would probably affect the public health injuriously to a greater or less degree. In particular states of the weather it could scarcely fail to engender disease. In the decomposition of substances for manure, deleterious gases will be evolved, which in particular states of the atmosphere will act with powerful effects on animal life within their reach. But it is at the same time stated, the process of applying manure by irrigation, that is, separated and diluted with water, is considered to be productive of less deleterious gas, of less injurious effects, than by spreading it over fields in a solid form, and allowing it to remain until it is decomposed and separated by the atmosphere and conveyed into the soil by rain. Liebig, the greatest living authority on agricultural chemistry, states that night-soil loses in drying half its valuable products, that is, half its "nitrogen," for the "ammonia" escapes into the atmosphere. By irrigation, by the diffusion and conveyance of the manure to the plant in the medium of water, the escape of the valuable substance as a noxious and injurious gas is diminished. Whatever extent of loss there is from manures by decomposition when placed on the land in a solid form, and when exposed to the action of the atmosphere, it is stated that there is proportionate gain by holding the material in suspension in water. The simple offensiveness, it may be assumed, is a sufficient ground of exclusion of any process from amidst the habitations of a town population. But at a reasonable distance the use of dung or any other manure would not be forbidden; and the process which is the least injurious, the irrigative, is entitled therefore to a preference. Effective drainage must make way for the conveyance of diluted manures, and consequently for effective irrigation. . . . . .

This has been briefly noticed above; and we proceed to the remedy,—to the vast improvements which are suggested, economical as well as sanitary; though this is the same thing, as whatever is sanitary must ultimately be found economical.

The public refuse of cities by the usual course of legislation in local Acts, and by custom, and on all principles which govern the application of the proceeds of such produce, belongs to the public; and it may be submitted that, whatever may be the decision in the case of Edinburgh, means should be taken to prevent for the future the acquisition of new rights at the expense of the health and of the conveniences of such large classes of the population. And it may here be observed that it will probably be found, under the circumstances of the increasing population of the towns, and the increasing necessity of keeping open spaces within and around the towns, and of exercising a general control for the beneficial arrangement of new buildings for the public health and convenience, and of securing convenient public walks and places of temperate and healthful recreation for the population—that it is most desirable for all these objects that means should be taken to redeem to the crown the fee, or otherwise obtain as early as practicable, and on the terms of proper compensation, lands within and in the immediate vicinity of towns for public use.

If then, in Edinburgh, the contents of the cesspools were carried by adequate supplies of water in drains from the houses into covered sewers, and thence in covered instead of open sewers to the lands at proper distances where it might be distributed as manure by irrigation, it would be a mode of irrigation considered by Mr. Smith of Deanston, and other authorities on drainage and irrigation, whom I consulted, the best that is now apparently practicable, i. e. the best means for removing quickly, and constantly, and the least injuriously, the matters which can only remain for removal by any other process at the expense of the public health; they concur in opinion that it would also be the most productive mode of distributing the manure.

On the scale of the value set upon that portion of the refuse of Edinburgh that has been appropriated for irrigation by the occupiers of the land in the vicinity of the city, the value of the whole of the soil of the city (not one-third of which finds its way into the irrigated meadows,) if it were made completely available by an appropriate system of town drainage, would be double or treble the amount, producing an income of £15,000 to £20,000 per annum for public purposes. On the same scale of value it would appear that, in the metropolis, refuse to the value of nearly double what is now paid for the water of the metropolis is thrown away, partly from the districts which are sewered into the Thames, and partly from the poor districts which are unsewered, where it accumulates and remains a nuisance until it is removed at a great expense. It is allowed by Captain Vetch, an experienced engineer, and by other authorities, to be the most eligible plan in respect to economy as well as efficiency, wherever the levels were not convenient, or it were desirable to send the refuse over heights for distribution, that the contents of the sewers should be lifted by steam power, as water is lifted in the drainage of the fens, and that it might be sent for distribution, wherever it is required for use, in iron pipes, in the same mode as that in which water is conveyed into towns by the water companies. The estimated expense of this mode of cleansing and removal is about the same as the conveyance of water into towns, i. e. not a tithe of the expense of cartage, as will subsequently be shown.

The comparative economy of conveyance of fluid in pipes has been but little observed, and has only recently perhaps been applied for the purpose of cleansing. The following is an instance of the application of the principle.

The instance we cannot give. It is enough that the experiment was made in London on a large scale; and that it proves the case. We proceed to the results, by which it is seen that refuse, after being conveyed, in a fluid state, for twelve or fourteen miles into the country, through pipes, may still be sold with a profit, thus establishing that,

By the application of capital and machinery, the cost of conveyance of substances in suspension in a fluid, even at the water companies' prices, may be rendered thirty and even more than forty times as cheap as collection by hand-labour and removal by cartage. In the metropolis, where the persons who water the roads may obtain water gratuitously from pumps, the water supplied by stand-pipes by some of the water companies at £1 per 100 tons, is found to be twice as cheap as the mere labour of pumping the water into the cart. By proper hydraulic arrangements heavy solid substances may be swept away through the iron pipes.

Those means which science gives of cheapening the cost of the conveyance of refuse from houses, will be available also in extending and completing the cleansing of the towns, of removing the filth which oppresses the poorer districts, and rendering the whole of it available, in the best form, for future use as manure.

The expense of cleansing the streets of the township of Manchester is £5000 per annum. For this sum the first class of streets, namely, the most opulent and the large thoroughfares, are cleansed once a-week, the second class once a-fortnight, and the third class once a-month. But this provision leaves untouched, or leaves in the condition described in Dr. Baron Howard's report, the courts, alleys, and places where the poorer classes live, and where the cleansing should be daily. There are abundance of recommendations to the effect, "Let it be ordered that the streets be properly cleansed;" but in this instance the cost of cleansing the whole of what is properly the same town, Salford, and the out townships, would be £8000 or £10,000 per annum; and such a recommendation, under the existing modes of management, is equivalent to saying, let £20,000 or £30,000 of additional rates be expended, and 40,000 or 60,000 additional loads of refuse be removed. In other large towns, the service and the expense is on a similar scale. At the rate of expense of one large parish, the present coast of cleansing in the metropolis may be estimated at about £40,000 per annum. This expense, however, is generally repaid by the sale of the coal-ashes, which are used in the manufacture of bricks.

Though the refuse of the poorer districts is often taken and sold, the immediate objection to the extension of the services of the scavenger to them is the increase of the immediate expense, which it is practically necessary to consider in detail, although if there were no compensation by the sale of any coal-ashes or house refuse, and if the occupants were required to pay for the cleansing at the rate of one of the opulent parishes in the metropolis, that is at the rate of 4s. per house per annum, which would be less than a penny per tenement for the weekly street-cleansing; or in the poorer districts, where there are mostly two families to a tenement, a charge of less than one halfpenny per week for cleansing, would be found to be good economy, as one means of diminishing the existing heavy charge of sickness, not to speak of the wear and tear of clothes.

Two-thirds of the usual expense of street cleansing is the expense of cartage, which, with the proper adaptation of the sewers, is wholly unnecessary. The exclusive use of hand-labour in street-sweeping is pronounced by competent judges to be a mere barbarism, and several machines have been invented which demonstrate that by mechanical power, moved by horses, the cleansing may be effected in a far shorter time. Some of these scrape the mud in ridges to the sides, where it remains until it can be lifted and carted away. But this is objected to as inconvenient by the shopkeepers; and the scavengers object that it is no convenience to them, inasmuch as raking it in heaps prevents the evaporation of the liquid, and increases the cartage; and, moreover, that the process of sweeping by hand is as quick as the carts can return for its removal. A machine has been used at Manchester which rapidly and cleanly sweeps the level surfaces of the streets into a cart; but there is still the encumbrance of the labour and cost and delay of carting the refuse to a place of deposit, which may be several miles distant, and returning to reload. The value of a process of street-cleansing is proportioned to the rapidity with which it is performed; but at present it is usually delayed until the sun or the air has done a large portion of the work by the evaporation of the moisture, commonly, however, to the deterioration of the air of the town and the health, and also to the deterioration of the value of the refuse.

On examining these obstructions to the cleanliness and salubrity of our towns, it became apparent that the expensive and slow process of the removal of the surface refuse of the streets by cartage might be dispensed with, and the whole at once carried away by the mode which is proved, in the case of the refuse of houses, to be the most rapid, cheap, and convenient, namely, by sweeping it at once into the sewers, and discharging it by water.

The subject is farther discussed; and the evidence of Mr. Roe, a Civil Engineer, who has been lately appointed to superintend the sewers of a considerable district in London, is given in support of the view taken. It appears that the most expensive, and what are considered the best sewers, have hitherto been constructed with flat bottoms. Mr. Roe has adopted a cheaper, simpler method, which is a very obvious improvement on this plan. He states,

That as compared with sewers or drains with bottoms of a semicircular form, those with flat bottoms invariably occasion a larger amount of deposit; and with the same flow of water, the difference of construction occasions a difference of more than one-half in the deposit which is left. By the common and most expensive form, the drains are apt to be choked up with noxious accumulations; by being built with flat sides, (instead of with curved sides, which give the strength of an arch) they are apt in clayey and slippery ground to be forced in. The expense of the improved form is nearly one-fourth less than those in general use.

In Mr. Roe's district the Commissioners have now adopted "a series of levels, suited from the lowest outlets to the surrounding districts." To prevent the very common occurrence of the sewers being choked by the accumulation of refuse, he states—

I suggested a plan of flushing the sewers, and of carrying off all the refuse by water. This plan has been adopted, and it is now in operation. The breaking up of the streets is avoided by the formation of side entrances; cast-iron flushing gates are fixed in the sewers; the ordinary flow of water in the sewers accumulates at these gates; the gates are opened, and the force of the water is sufficient to sweep off the deposit; and the system may be further extended.

What is the comparative difference in the expense of construction?—The cost of side-entrances and flood-gates, as compared with the cost of man-holes, is from 6d. to 1s. less per foot lineal of the length of new sewers.

What other expense is attendant on this improved practice?—The main expense is the attendance of a man to shut and open the flood-gates.

The structural expense being lower, is the ultimate expense of cleansing lower also?—Yes; the expense of cleansing the sewers is about fifty per cent. less than the prevalent mode. Our expense of cleansing the sewers was about £1200 per annum; we save £600 of that, and expect to save more; but to this must be added the saving to the public of the cleansing of the private drains, formerly choked by the accumulations in the sewers. This saving, on a moderate calculation, is found to be upwards of £300 per annum. There is also the diminution of the escapes of gas from the old and continued accumulations.

During what intervals are deposits allowed to remain on the old mode?—The average is in one set of sewers about five years, and in another about ten years.

During which time the public are subjected to all the escapes of gas from the decomposing accumulation?—Exactly so. It could not, however, go on so long but for heavy falls of rain or snow, which occasion partial clearances.

What is the effect of these accumulations upon the private drainage?—That the drains to the private houses are stopped: the first intimation of the foul state of the main sewer arises from complaints of individuals whose drains are affected; the accumulations in the private drains also occasion an expense to the individuals and much annoyance. By flushing the sewers this expense might be, and in Holborn and Finsbury division it is, avoided.

Are there any other defects you have, as an engineer, noticed in the prevalent mode of constructing the sewers?—Yes; the prevalent practice is to join sewers at angles, frequently at right angles; this occasions eddies and deposits of sediment that would otherwise pass off with the water; it injures the capacity of the main sewers by obstructing the current of water along them.

We leave the remedy for this defect to those who wish to investigate the subject fully.

In the evidence of Mr. Oldfield, an experienced builder in the wealthy districts of the metropolis, will be found exemplifications of the mischiefs resulting from the defective modes of opening sub-drains or communications, even from houses of the first class, into the main drains. The state of sewerage and drainage in the larger towns, as described in the medical reports, in its effects of frequent disease and death,—is much worse in the provincial towns. But every step in improvement is an advance in reduction of existing burdens; drainage, per se, will be found to be a reduction of an existing charge for the expenses of sickness and mortality; scienee, applied to the improvement of drainage, not only gives it efficiency, but reduces greatly the expense.

One important consideration in all these plans of improvement is, gradually lessening, until they are wholly cut down, the number of individuals in every town who are at present, by the wants of society, doomed to degrading, if not absolutely brutalizing occupations. What a step were gained for the city of Paris, morally as well as physically, could it dispense with its water-carriers and chiffonniers! Fervently must every reflecting man join in the hope thus expressed in the Report:

It is to be hoped, however, that the legislature will give the powers and direct the means requisite in this country, to furnish to every city in Europe a practical demonstration, that by the art of the engineer, the obstacle to improvement formed by the great expense and annoyance of removing the refuse of houses and streets may be rendered inconsiderable. In Paris the interests of turbulent bodies of men, the water-carriers, and another class of men called the chiffonniers, who live by raking for what they can find amongst the refuse cast into the streets, are opposed to any change which will reduce the charge of imperfect cleansing, and the disease promoted by filth. The general practice in that metropolis is, to cast all the rubbish of the house into the street on the overnight, or before seven o'clock in the morning, when men attend with carts to sweep it up and remove it. In the night-time, however, the chiffonnier comes with a lantern and rakes amongst the refuse, and picks from it bones, rags, or whatever may have been thrown away by accident, or the carelessness of the servants. The offensive filth of their persons and their occupation, make them outcasts from other classes of workmen; they sleep amidst their collections of refuse, and they are idle during the day. They are, like all men who live under such circumstances, prone to indulgence in ardent spirits; being degraded and savage, they are ready to throw away their wretched lives on every occasion. There are nearly 2000 of the chiffonniers alone in Paris; and they and the water-carriers were conspicuous actors in the revolution of 1830. During the administration of Casimir Perrier the householders had complained of the inconvenient mode of cleansing the streets by large heavy carts drawn by three horses, which, during their slow progress throughout the day, obstruct the public thoroughfares, and occasion great inconveniences, especially in the narrow streets.

In the beginning of the year 1834, when the cholera broke out, the attention of the authorities was directed to sanitary measures, and the municipality decided that the cleansing of the streets should be done by contract, by a quick relay of carts of a smaller and more convenient shape, drawn by single horses; and in order to diminish the inconvenience of the presence of these improved vehicles, the contractor was allowed to collect one load for each of his carts on the over-night, which would have led to a practice similar to that of London, where the dust-carts take the refuse direct from the house without any deposit in the streets. But in this arrangement an important interest had been overlooked: the chiffonniers, who were said to have been aided and directed by the owners and men belonging to the superseded vehicles, rose in revolt, attacked and drove away the conducters, broke to pieces the new carts, threw the fragments into the river, or made bonfires with them. Unfortunately at that time the cholera had broken out at Paris. The mobs of chiffonniers which collected on the following day were swollen by other crowds of ignorant, terrified, and savage people, who were persuaded that the deaths from the strange plague were occasioned by poison. "My agents," says the then préfet of police, in an account of this revolt, "could not be at all points at once, to oppose the fury of these crowds of men with naked arms and haggard figures, and sinister looks, who are never seen in ordinary times, and who seemed on this day to have arisen out of the earth. Wishing to judge myself, of the foundation for the alarming reports that were brought to me, I went out alone and on foot. I had great difficulty in getting through these dense masses, scarcely covered with filthy rags; no description could convey their hideous aspect, or the sensation of terror which their hoarse and ferocious cries created. Although I am not easily moved, I at one time feared for the safety of Paris—of honest people and their property." In fact, the riot was one of the most dangerous that had been witnessed in that city, and it was not suppressed without great exertions and some loss of life. The anxieties which it occasioned to the minister, Casimir Perrier, and his disgust at the political use made of it, were considered to have contributed to his death. He was himself attacked with the cholera, and died a few days after. Shortly before his death, when expressing his disgust, he said to the préfet, "My friend, we are harnessed to a vile carriage." "Truly so," replied the préfet, "and the ways are dreadfully dirty." The material ways of the city continued as they were: the préfet seeing that the introduction of the new carts became "a motive to discontent and collision," took upon himself to set aside the contract with the contractor, who, he states, received no other compensation for his losses than a permission which he could not use, to collect the refuse during the day; and the chiffonniers continue to the present time in the exercise of their wretched vocation at the expense of the public health and cleanliness.

This curious statement is not without instruction. Though this Pariah class is not so numerous in the British towns as in France, they are but too frequent. Mr. Chadwick took pains to ascertain their numbers in London, through the Commissioners of Police.

From returns which they obtained from their superintendents, it appears, that of the class of bone-pickers, mud-rakers, people living on the produce of dung-heaps in mews, courts, yards, and bye-lanes insufficiently cleansed, 598 are known to the police. From an observation of the proportion of filthy children and adults who appear amidst refuse whenever there are new buildings and an unusual quantity of rubbish, and from other circumstances, I believe that, were the refuse of houses daily cast into the streets in London in the same manner as at Paris, London would soon have as large and as dangerous a population of the chiffonnier class. I am informed by Sir Charles Shaw, the chief commissioner of police at Manchester, that there are 302 of them known within the police jurisdiction of that town also. He complains that they have heretofore been licensed in their occupation; that the children are pilferers, and occupy the attention of the police, and furnish a large quota to the stock of juvenile delinquents and the population of the prisons. I am informed that in Bath there are about 100 of them known; and in other towns and places I have little doubt that they would be found in like proportions, which approach the proportions of the stated numbers of chiffonniers to the population of Paris. These degraded creatures are also found amongst the inmates of the workhouses, and the close identity of their habits with those of the chiffonniers of Paris afford a striking proof of the similarity of the population produced by similarity of circumstances. They are thus described to me by an eye-witness.

The description is too loathsome to be copied out here, though very necessary to be known.

The domestic habits of the different classes of artisans, especially as these are affected by their dwellings and other surrounding unfavourable influences and circumstances, independently of their employments and wages, form an interesting feature of the Report. It may be fairly assumed, that the rate of wages is not always, as might be expected, the decisive element of their condition, or the criterion by which it is to be judged. The wages of the colliers are comparatively good; yet in many localities their moral condition seems very low indeed; and it is not amended by their filthy, ill-ventilated cottages. The contrast between the colliers and the agricultural labourers of East Lothian is remarkable: the former wallowing in filth and rioting in intemperance; the latter enjoying cleanliness and domestic comfort so far as their poor habitations and small wages will permit. Domestic mismanagement appears one frequent cause of disease. Of this many proofs are exhibited in the Report. Dr. Baker of Derby states—

"There is also another cause of sickness to be found in their houses, and which, like the former, i. e., the external circumstances, is in constant operation: I mean the want of domestic comforts, a want which the wages they earn would, in many instances, enable them to remove if their means were not, as too often happens, expended viciously or improvidently. It is with regret that I speak unfavourably of the poor, whilst my whole aim, in this communication, has been to awaken a sympathy towards those sufferings of which I have been so often a witness. But several years' experience of the habits of the poor, derived from my situation as an hospital physician, and backed by the additional evidence I have obtained by acting for three years as a guardian of the poor in this large town, has, I am sorry to say, served but to confirm me in the opinion I have just now expressed; and in support of which I shall instance the family of the Slaters mentioned at No. 12, in Short Street.

"The earnings of four members of this family were as follows:—

	s.	d.
The father	14	0	per week, at gardening, &c.
The eldest son, aged 20	12	0	,, at a brewery.
Daughter . { Twins, }	6	0	,, at a factory.
Son . . . { aged 18 }	9	0	,, at the same factory.
	£2	1	0 per week.

"The mother of this family, it appears, is left disengaged from all but her household duties and the care of the younger children; the house, nevertheless, is nearly destitute of furniture, and presents a picture of disorder and want. On the other hand, at No. 15, (Briggs,) although the husband has for some years past been a weak and ailing man, the family is well ordered and cleanly; and to this fact I mainly attribute the milder and modified form of fever which affected the children."

On the same subject the physicians of Birmingham report—

"In the expenditure of their weekly earnings, improvidence and thoughtless extravagance prevail to a lamentable degree. The observations upon which this opinion is formed are made upon the habits of the people themselves, confirmed by extensive and recent inquiries among the shopkeepers with whom they deal. Tea, coffee, sugar, butter, cheese, bacon, (of which a great deal is consumed in this town,) and other articles, the working people purchase in small quantities from the hucksters, who charge an enormous profit upon them, being, as they state, compelled to do so to cover the losses which they frequently sustain by bad debts. Huckster dealing is a most extravagant mode of dealing. There were in this town, in 1834, 717 of these shops; and the number has greatly increased since that time. Meat is purchased in the same improvident manner. The working men generally contrive to have a good joint of meat upon the Sunday; the dinner on the other days of the week is made from steaks or chops, which is the most extravagant mode either of purchasing or cooking meat.

"The improvidence of this class of persons arises in many instances from the indulgence of vicious propensities. Drunkenness, with all its attendant miseries, prevails to a great extent; though it is by no means to be regarded as a characteristic feature of the mechanic of this town in particular. It most generally prevails among that class of workmen who obtain the highest wages, but who are often found in the most deplorable and abject condition.

A contrast in the economy of 20 families is drawn up by Mr. Mott; but many more details would be requisite to make it of general utility. The medical officers of the Unions, and medical practitioners in general, must, however, be intimately acquainted with the improvident habits of the working classes.

Unless it were, as we are glad to find, broadly asserted, that it is in the power of all great masters to improve the condition of their work-people, we should conceive it of little use to cite the following illustrations—

Mr. Harrison, the medical officer of the Preston Union, observes that—"I have known many families whose income has exceeded £100 a-year, who in times of sickness have been in great distress, and even some who have been obliged to have recourse to the parish for assistance. And I am acquainted with several families now of the best paid class of work-people, whose total weekly earnings will average £2, and in some cases £3 a-week, who, should sickness overtake the head of the family, and some of the principal workers among the children, would be thrown upon the parish. I have been convinced from extensive observation, that the masters of these people have it in their power to improve the condition and happiness of their work-people beyond what can be effected by any other agency."

These descriptions are not confined to the English towns: Mr. Jupp and others cite instances from the rural districts. They are similarly prevalent in Scotland. As an example I would refer to the description given by Dr. Scott Alison, of the condition of the highly-paid collier population of Tranent. Take another instance of the condition of the same class, the colliers at Ayr, given by Dr. Sym, in his report on the sanitary condition of the population of that town:—

"Although the colliers have large wages, they are, from their want of economy and their dissolute habits, uniformly in poverty; and their families, though well fed, are miserably clothed, ill lodged, uneducated, and less industrious than the families of the weavers; the females of which work with great constancy at handsewing. The modes of living of these two classes are very different. The weaver is not intemperate, because he cannot afford to purchase ardent spirits, and the nature of his employment prevents him from having those hours of idleness during the day which the collier is so apt to consume in dissipation. He lives on very innutritious food, seldom eats butchers' meat; and the most indigent, who are generally Irishmen, subsist chiefly on potatoes. The collier, on the other hand, indulges to excess in ardent spirits, and both he and his family partake of animal food every day. In short, the colliers live better than any of the other labouring classes in Ayr."

Dr. Scott Alison, speaking of the colliers of Tranent, states that they obtain very high wages. "A man, his wife, and perhaps two children may earn perhaps 40s. a-week, if industriously employed during that time." On the subject of appearances of destitution, on which medical men sometimes report, he observes—

"I have had occasion to know that medical men, judging from internal appearances of the dwellings of the labouring classes, are liable to be led into erroneous inferences as to the extent of destitution. The appearance of the place or of the person is no test of the want of means or of the highness or lowness of wages. Filth is more frequently evidence of depravity than of destitution; indeed, in places where the wages or means are really scanty, there is very frequently considerable cleanliness. If a stranger went into the house of a collier, he might exclaim, 'What extreme wretchedness and destitution!' when, in fact, on the Saturday they had received 30s., which before the Tuesday had all been squandered. I think medical men, who are not intimately acquainted with the character of people, are often drawn into mistakes."

Dr. Scott Alison farther contrasts the cleanly condition of the hinds with the filth of the colliers.

The like contrast, derived from an intimate knowledge of the population of another class, is presented in the following portions of a report from Mr. Wood of Dundee:—

"There are many families among the working classes who are in the receipt of from 15s. to 22s. per week, who are insufficiently clothed, and irregularly and poorly fed, and whose houses as well as their persons appear filthy, disorderly, and uncomfortable. There are other families among them, containing the same number of persons, whose incomes average from 10s. to 14s. a-week, who are neatly, cleanly, and sufficiently clothed, regularly and suitably fed, and whose houses appear orderly and comfortable. The former class care little for the physical comfort, and far less for the intellectual, moral, and religious education of their children; in many cases, indeed, they neglect the education of their offspring when it is offered to them gratuitously, and in place of sending them to school, where they might be fitted for the duties and disappointments of life, they send them at a very early age to some employment, where they will earn the poor pittance of 1s. 6d. to 3s. a-week. The latter class, on the contrary, are most anxious to give their children a good education: they study to obtain it for them by every means in their power, and they pay for it most cheerfully. The former class again grasp at every benefit which the charitable institutions of the place have provided for the poor. When, for example, medical attendance is given them gratuitously, they not unfrequently despise and refuse it, unless medicines are given them gratuitously also. Whereas the latter description of families are not only ready and willing to pay for medicines when prescribed to them, but they generally manifest much gratitude, and very often present their medical attendant with a small fee.

"Now it is among the former class of families where generally there appears to me to be a deficiency of wholesome food and of warm clothing; where contagious, febrile diseases are most commonly found; and from whence they are most extensively propagated. Fever is no doubt found among the latter, more frugal, and therefore better-conditioned families; but seldom of that malignant, contagious character which it invariably assumes among the other class of families. Here, then, we have on the one hand, filth, destitution, and disease, associated with good wages; and on the other, cleanliness, comfort, and comparative good health, in connexion with wages which are much lower. The difference in the amount of their incomes does not account for the difference in the amount of comfort which is found existing among the working classes."

The argument for a low rate of wages, drawn or insinuated from these facts, we conceive quite fallacious. Wages can never be too high, if properly managed.

There is no section of the Report that merits deeper study than that headed Effects of Noxious Physical Agencies on the Moral habits of the Population. The illustrations, and direct proofs, are numerous, and are collected from many different quarters and classes of witnesses. All are painful: many are frightful. Mr. Chadwick thus ably sums up this section.

It would require much time and various opportunities of observation to attempt to make an exact analysis of the combined causes, and an estimate of the effect of each separate cause which operate to produce the masses of moral and physical wretchedness met with in the investigation of the condition of the lowest population. But it became evident, in the progress of the inquiry, that several separate circumstances had each its separate moral as well as physical influence. Thus, tenements of inferior construction had manifestly an injurious operation on the moral as well as on the sanitary condition, independently of any overcrowding. For example, it appears to be matter of common observation, in the instance of migrant families of work-people who are obliged to occupy inferior tenements, that their habits soon become "of a piece" with the dwelling. A gentleman who has observed closely the condition of the work-people in the south of Cheshire and the north of Lancashire, men of similar race and education, working at the same description of work, namely, as cotton-spinners, mill hands, and earning nearly the same amount of wages, states that the workmen of the north of Lancashire are obviously inferior to those in the south of Cheshire, in health and habits of personal cleanliness and general condition. The difference is traced mainly to the circumstance, that the labourers in the north of Lancashire inhabit stone houses of a description that absorb moisture, the dampness of which affects the health, and causes personal uncleanliness, induced by the difficulty of keeping a clean house. The operation of the same deteriorating influences were also observable in Scotland; and it may be illustrated by several instances which I have met with in the course of my own personal inquiries.

One of the circumstances most favourable to the improvement of the condition of an artisan or an agricultural labourer, is his obtaining as a wife a female who has had a good industrial training in the well-regulated household of persons of a higher condition. The following instance of the effect of the dwelling itself on the condition of a female servant when married, was brought to my notice by a member of the family in which they had been brought up. One was of a young woman who had been taught the habits of neatness, order, and cleanliness most thoroughly as regards household work.

"Her attention to personal neatness," says a lady who is my informant, "was very great; her face seemed always as if it were just washed; and with her bright hair neatly combed underneath her snow-white cap, a smooth white apron, and her gown and handkerchief carefully put on, she used to look very comely. After a year or two, she married the serving man, who, as he was retained in his situation, was obliged to take a house as near his place as possible. The cottages in the neighbourhood were of the most wretched kind, mere hovels built of rough stones and covered with ragged thatch. There were few even of these; so there was no choice, and they were obliged to be content with the first that was vacant, which was in the most retired situation. After they had been married about two years, I happened to be walking past one of these miserable cottages, and as the door was open, I had the curiosity to enter. I found it was the home of the servant I have been describing. But what a change had come over her! Her face was dirty, and her tangled hair hung over her eyes. Her cap, though of good materials, was ill-washed and slovenly put on. Her whole dress, though apparently good and serviceable, was very untidy, and looked dirty and slatternly; everything indeed about her seemed wretched and neglected, (except her little child,) and she appeared very discontented. She seemed aware of the change there must be in her appearance since I had last seen her, for she immediately began to complain of her house. The wet came in at the door of the only room; and when it rained, through every part of the roof also, except just over the hearth-stone; large drops fell upon her as she lay in bed, or as she was working at the window: in short, she had found it impossible to keep things in order, so had gradually ceased to make any exertions. Her condition had been borne down by the condition of the house. Then her husband was dissatisfied with his home and with her; his visits became less frequent; and if he had been a day labourer, and there had been a beer-shop or a public-house, the preference of that to his home would have been inevitable, and in the one instance would have presented an example of a multitude of cases.

"She was afterwards, however, removed to a new cottage, which was water-tight, and had some conveniences, and was built close to the road, which her former mistress and all her friends must constantly pass along. She soon resumed, in a great degree, her former good habits, but still there was a little of the dawdle left about her; the remains of the dispiritedness caused by her former very unfavourable circumstances."

I visited some other dwellings not far from the one above described, and met with another instance of a female who had been brought up as a servant in a well-ordered house, and who, for her station, had received a very excellent religious and moral education. Before her marriage she had been distinguished by the refinement with which she sung national airs, and for her knowledge of the Bible and of the doctrines of her church. Her personal condition had become of "a piece" with the wretched stone undrained hovel, with a pigstye before it, to which she had been taken. We found her with rings of dirt about her neck, and turning over with dirty hands Brown's Dictionary, to see whether the newly-elected minister was "sound" in his doctrine. In this case no moral lapse was apparent, but the children were apparently brought up under great disadvantages.

Some inquiries from Mr. Liddle, the medical officer of the Whitechapel Union, as to the condition of the work-people he visited in such places as he has described, brought to notice another indirect effect of the external as well as the internal condition of the dwelling on their domestic economy and general condition.

It appeared that the persons whom he visited for the purpose of administering medical relief, were men earning, when in work, from 16s. to 20s. per week, the usual earning proportionably. Yet whenever they were subjected to the frequent attacks of sickness which prevailed mongst them, they were in the most wretched destitution: the house was bare of everything; they had no rovisions and no credit; and their need for relief was ost imminent. In answer to the inquiry how this was be accounted for, inasmuch as with agricultural laourers, who earned little more than half that sum, and aid nearly as much for their food, in visiting their ttages with their ministers, I had commonly observed me store of provisions; Mr. Liddle stated, that in such laces as those in his district, in such atmospheres, a ore of provisions would not keep: everything decayed pidly, and the work-people consequently lived "from and to mouth." On inquiring as to this fact from a spectable butcher, accustomed to sell meat to persons ving in such situations, he stated that—

"Meat sold on Saturday night, in hot weather, to poor ople, who have only one close room, in which they ep, and live, and cook, will certainly turn before the nday morning; when, if it were kept in the butcher's op, or in a well-ventilated place, it would be in as od a condition on the Monday morning. There is a reat deal of loss of meat in consequence of the want of ntilation and bad condition of the dwellings of the orer classes. The butter kept in such places sooner comes rancid, and the bread dry and disagreeable."

Here, then, we have from the one agent, a close and olluted atmosphere, two different sets of effects; the ne set here noticed engendering improvidence, expense, nd waste,—the other, the depressing effects of external nd internal miasma on the nervous system, tending to ieite to the habitual use of ardent spirits; both tending precipitate this population into disease and misery.

The familiarity with the sickness and death constantr present in the crowded and unwholsome districts, apears to react as another concurrent cause in aggravaon of the wretchedness and vice in which they are lunged. Seeing the apparent uncertainty of the morow, the inhabitants really take no heed of it, and abanon themselves with the recklessness and avidity of ommon soldiers in a war to whatever gross enjoyment omes within their reach. All the districts I visited, here the rate of sickness and mortality was high, preented, as might be expected, a proportionate amount of evere cases of destitute orphanage and widowhood; and he same places were marked by excessive recklessness f the labouring population. In Dumfries, for example, is estimated that the cholera swept away one-eleventh art of the population. Until recently, the town had not ecovered the severe effects of the visitation, and the conition of the orphans was most deplorable. Amongst oung artisans who were earning from 16s. to 18s. a-week, was informed that there were very few who made any eserves against the casualties of sickness. I was led to sk the provost what number of bakers' shops there ere? "Twelve," was his answer. And what number f whisky-shops may the town possess? "Seventyine" was the reply. If we might rely on the inquiries ade of working-men when Dr. Arnott and I went hrough the wynds of Edinburgh, their consumption of pirits bore almost the like proportion to the consumion of wholesome food. We observed to Captain Stuart, he superintendent of the police at Edinburgh, in our nspection of the wynds, that life appeared to be of little alue, and was likely to be held cheap in such spots. He stated, in answer, that a short time ago a man had een executed for the murder of his wife in a fit of assion in the very room we had accidentally entered, nd where we were led to make the observation. At a hort distance from that spot, and amidst others of this lass of habitation, were those which had been the cenes of the murders by Burke and Hare. Yet amidst hese were the residences of working-men engaged in egular industry. The indiscriminate mixture of workeople and their children in the immediate vicinity, and ften in the same rooms with persons whose character vas denoted by the question and answer more than once xchanged, "When were you last washed?" "When was last in prison," was only one mark of the entire legradation to which they had been brought. The working classes living in these districts were equally marked by the abandonment of every civil or social regulation. Asking some children in one of the rooms of the wynds in which they swarmed in Glasgow what were their names, they hesitated to answer; when one of the inmates said, they called them ———, mentioning some nicknames. "The fact is," observed Captain Miller, the superintendent of the police, "they really have no names. Within this range of buildings I have no doubt I should be able to find a thousand children who have no names whatever, or only nicknames, like dogs." There were found amidst the occupants, labourers earning wages undoubtedly sufficient to have paid for comfortable tenements; men and women who were intelligent, and, so far as could be ascertained, had received the ordinary education which should have given better tastes, and led to better habits. My own observations have been confirmed by the statement of Mr. Sheriff Alison, of Glasgow, that in the great manufacturing towns of Scotland, "in the contest with whisky, in their crowded population, education has been entirely overthrown."

It is to be regretted that the coincidence of pestilence and moral disorder is not confined to one part of the island, nor to any one race of the population. The overcrowding and the removal of what may be termed the architectural barriers or protections of decency and propriety, and the causes of physical deterioration, in connexion with the moral deterioration, are also fearfully manifest in the districts in England, which, at the time to which the evidence refers, were in a state of prosperity.

The Noxious Agencies are farther illustrated by the happy contrast presented by the working-people who occupy better dwellings in better-cleansed neighbourhoods. A gentleman who has had considerable experience in managing large numbers of the manufacturing population, told Mr. Chadwick that in every case of personal and moral improvement the first successful step was removing the parties from the ill-conditioned neighbourhood in which they had been brought up; and when a young workman married, interfering to provide him a better residence apart from his fellows, in order to prevent the condition of his wife from being brought down to the common level, and the marriage from becoming a source of wretchedness.

That something more than casual charity, however liberal, is required to improve the condition of the degraded part of the population required no proof; but the mischievous consequences of indiscriminate voluntary benevolence, may still demand illustration. On this head Mr. Chadwick states—

Benevolent persons, viewing the bare aspect of some of the most afflicted neighbourhoods, have raised subscriptions for the purchase of furniture, bedding, and blankets, for the relief of the inmates; but by this pecuniary aid they have only added fuel to the flame: that is, they have enabled the inmates to purchase more ardent spirits. The force of the habit, which is aggravated by misdirected charity, is indicated in the following instances, of which one was mentioned to me by the Rev. Whitwell Elwin:—

"I was lately informed, by a master tailor of Bath, that one of his men, who had earned £3 a-week at piecework for years, had never, within his knowledge, possessed table, chairs, or bedding. I found the statement, on examination, to be strictly true. Some straw on which he slept, a square block of wood, a low three-legged stool, and an old tea-caddy, are the complete inventory of the articles of a room, the occupier of which, with only himself and his wife to maintain, was wealthier than many in the station of gentlemen. He had frequently excited lively compassion in benevolent individuals, who, supposing that he was struggling for very existence, furnished him with a variety of household goods, which were regularly pawned before a week was out, and afforded to the superficial observer fresh evidence of the extremity of his distress. The cause of all this is quickly told: the wife was to be seen going to and fro several times a-day with a cream-jug of gin, and to gratify this appetite, they had voluntarily reduced themselves to the condition of savages. I could add numerous instances of a similar kind. Indeed, were a stranger to go through the town, and judge only from the appearance of things, I am convinced that he would select his examples of greatest privation not from the really poor, but from men who were in the receipt of more than 30s. a-week. Charity, which when prompted by pure motives, always blesses him that gives, does not always bless him that takes. I am afraid that the indiscriminate adoption of dirt and rags as a test of poverty, especially in a town like Bath, where private charity prevails on an extensive scale, operates as a premium upon ill habits, and as a discouragement to cleanliness, and leads many to affect a vice which was not habitual to them. . . . In the course of an examination which I took, under the Poor Law Commission of Inquiry, from the late Mr. Walker, the stipendiary magistrate of the Thames Police Office, he observed, in respect to cases of apparent destitution :—

"Casualties occurring among the indigent or profligate are at all times liable to be represented as cases resulting from the neglect of the proper authorities. Some time ago in going round the parish of Whitechapel with the church-wardens, during service-time, we entered an old building in Rosemary Lane, for which there was then no owner. The stairs were so dark and ruinous that though it was mid-day we were obliged to have a candle, to enable us to go up to them: the first floor was the receptacle of every description of filth. We entered one room, in which we found two half-naked dirty children; their mother lay in one corner on some dirty straw, covered only with a sack. There was no furniture nor other articles in the place, except a fagot of wood and a few broken plates, a basket of skate, and some sprats strewed on the floor. This woman was a fish-hawker, a business by which, in all probability, she gained enough to have made her extremely comfortable, but she preferred an alternation of great privation and profligate enjoyment. Had she accidentally died in this state, here would have been a scene of misery, and a case of excitement for the philanthropists! In our district there are other premises under similar circumstances, all of which are tenanted by persons of the very lowest grade; and it is surprising, considering the state in which they live, that unaccountable deaths, having the semblance of starvation, do not take place amongst them. From what I have observed of these places, I am fully convinced, that if shambles were built on any spot, and all who choose were allowed to occupy them, they would soon be occupied by a race lower than any yet known. I have often said that if empty casks were placed along the streets of Whitechapel, in a few days each of them would have a tenant, and these tenants would keep up their kind, and prey upon the rest of the community. I am sure that if such facilities were offered, there is no conceivable degradation to which portions of the species might not be reduced. Allow these tub-men no education, and you would have so many savages living in the midst of civilisation. Wherever there are empty houses which are not secured, they are soon tenanted by wretched objects; and these tenants continue so long as there is a harbour for them. Parish officers and others come to me to aid them in clearing such places. I tell the police and the parish that there is no use in their watching these places: that they must board them up if they would get rid of the occupants. If they will give the accommodation they will get the occupants. If you will have marshes and stagnant waters, you will there have suitable animals; and the only way of getting rid of them is by draining the marshes."

The Rev. Whitwell Elwin observes upon this subject that "All who know the lower classes will testify that the last want felt by the dirty is cleanliness, that their last expenditure is on the comforts of their home. Two winters ago, I found a painter whose bed was without blankets, whose room was without furniture, who was destitute even of the ordinary utensils of civilized life, whose floor was covered with worse filth than that of the streets: I found this man at dinner with a roast loin of pork stuffed with onions, a Yorkshire pudding, a large jug of ale, cheese, and a salad. I will undertake to say, that half the gentlemen in Bath did not sit down on that Sunday to so good a dinner."

These may seem harsh statements; but the true question is, Are they correct? The grand panacea for all these ills is imagined to be Education. "Educate the people"—"Give them education;" is the prevailing cry, in which we heartily join; yet what kind of education—what system of teaching reading, writing, accounts, and catechisms, is to counteract the foul influences and agencies described in this report? The removal of the physical barriers to improvement must be the first step, if any efficient or permanent amelioration of the condition of the inferior population, and even of the higher order of work-people, is seriously contemplated.

It is usual to impute the extreme degradation in which a part of the population is found in the large manufacturing towns to the example and the influx of the Irish. But whatever remote effect this may have had in reducing the wages of labour, and breaking down good habits, the Scotch and English of the most debased class are actually found in a worse condition than the lowest of the Irish. There is an excuse or palliation for them, offered by Mr. Chadwick, who, to a considerable extent, imputes the use of ardent spirits, and the prostration of the education and moral habits for which the Scotch labourers were formerly distinguished, "to the surrounding physical circumstances, including bad ventilation." The Irish are treated with justice in the Report. Dr. Cowan of Glasgow stated, "that from ample opportunities of observation, they appeared to him to exhibit much less of squalid misery, and addiction to the use of ardent spirits, than the Scotch of the same grade;" and instances were cited to the gentlemen conducting the inquiry, where the Irish were preferred for manufacturing employment "on account of their superior steadiness and docility." In the great flax factories, the Irish were also obtaining a preference "on account of their regular habits."

Attention is drawn, in some of the local reports, to the dangerous and inflammatory state of mind in which the degraded part of the population in the colliery and mining districts are found, which has received a certain degree of confirmation from the late outrages. These ignorant and ferocious men call themselves Chartists, and seem to regard the Charter as a right to make vengeful reprisals on their masters, and all who possess property, or, in short, to plunder. Fortunately this, as it is the most stupid portion of the working population, is also but an inconsiderable fraction of it.

We have but entered upon this most important volume, and shall deem it a duty to return to it again and again. The strong case which it makes out must carry conviction to thousands. And it contemplates nothing visionary, nothing impracticable, or which the most bigoted political partisans need differ about.

LINE BERGMANN'S LOVERS.

FROM UNPUBLISHED MEMOIRS OF A BELIEVER IN DREAMS.

——An event which occurred this Spring (1832) in the family history of my stout friend Bergmann, may be worth relating. I had fallen in love with his little daughter Caroline during my former visit, when she was a child of ten years old, and remembered this when I returned to Munich, and found her a lovely girl of eighteen, surrounded by admirers. Amongst these, it seemed strange to encounter several youths belonging to the university; and what amused me most, was to see that Bergmann, himself as innocent of letters as Mons. Jourdain, seemed to favour them more than any others. Some persons, indeed, are disposed to over-value those gifts of which they are destitute: but I suspect that the true reason here, was the natural affinity which appears to subsist between the Bavarian scholar and Bavarian beer, the production of which had been the business and glory of Bergmann's life.

In most university towns the student seldom finds access to the families of the towns-people, but affects to belong to a separate order, and denounces all citizens under the hostile name of Philistines. Every Bursch, of course, has a mistress, as well as a pipe and a schläger; but she is either some maiden far away at home, or the Röschen of humbler class in the city where he studies; a chance acquaintance, exacting none of the restraints of formal society, nor requiring that his arbitrary galligaskins and horrid locks shall yield to the costume of balls and "singing-teas." The most heroic of the class would think it an indignity to be accused of a hankering after Philistine maidens; and as every one under the years of discretion is a hero, or would be thought one, it follows that this kind of devotion is not much encouraged by the esprit de corps of the universities. The German student is not often rich, and, in general, his settlement in life has to be sought after the close of his academic career: at this season he is rarely able to woo in earnest, and it is therefore well that he does not commonly think of it. The burghers, on their parts, do not much invite the attentions of the students; especially those who are blessed with young wives, or pretty daughters: and the fair creatures themselves have too just a sense of their own value to be content without observances, which the Bursch will rarely submit to pay; and have a feminine preference for decorum and clean linen. Nevertheless, the cordon sanitaire which is drawn around these pretty creatures in university towns, is chiefly maintained by the vigilance of fathers and spouses, and by the rugged independence of student life.

This had been my experience of such cities as Tübingen, Halle, and Giessen; and it therefore surprised me to find so many as three students in Bergmann's house; forgetting, that in Munich the circumstances are totally different. The college here is of late origin, having been transplanted from Landshut some six years only before I returned; and there are no traditional feelings to insulate the students as a class, nor any means for their assumption of much singularity or independence. They are lost in a gay capital, kept in very strict order, and are thankful for any notice from the wealthy burghers, especially when they are the owners of such roses as adorned the dwelling of my friend Bergmann in the Eiermarkt. Munich has now become the centre of modern German art, but had much longer been celebrated for the strength of its beer, and the prettiness of its young women. Herr Bergmann was the court brewer; and his only daughter, Caroline, the very crown and abstract of Munich beauty: unfortunately for her admirers, the saucy creature knew it but too well.

She was spoiled on all hands. Her mother was long since dead, and the charge of Bergmann's house had fallen upon an unmarried sister, older than himself,—the only aged spinster I ever knew without a particle of jealousy or prudishness,—a portly short-sighted jovial old creature, doatingly fond of her niece. Nature had made Caroline gay and capricious; and it may be imagined how this disposition flourished in a beauty and a pet, caressed by her father and Tante Ursel all day long; with a looking-glass, and twenty lovers to remind her that she had the brightest eyes, the finest neck, and the richest velvet lips of any maid in Munich. Yet under all her wilful ways, which were various, there lay unspoiled the sweet hearty nature which is an especial birthright of the good Bavarians. With me she could be reasonable and charming enough, and bestowed the most of her little defects upon her lovers, with whom she was volatile and saucy beyond measure;—not from malice, but in the abundance of youth and animal spirits, and that frolic enjoyment of life which makes filly foals skittish, and young kittens so amusingly mischievous.

Like all great brewers of whom history takes notice, from Odin and Cadwallader, down to Thrale and Sir Felix Booth, Papa Bergmann was prone to hospitality: and it was not difficult for the bachelors who admired his daughter at a distance, to gain admission to his table. The number of Caroline's adorers was thus kept on a most respectable footing; for although her old lovers were soon taught to despair, and laughed out of the field, there was a perpetual succession of new ones to supply their places. Such was her establishment of beaux who frequented the house by invitation, or sighed for the honour of her hand at the city assembly balls. But in addition to this wavering nimbus of admiration, I found her attended more closely by three satellites, who circulated in Bergmann's house on less ceremonious terms. These were the students above-mentioned, whose proceedings I soon began to watch with some curiosity and amusement; for each of the three evidently was, or believed himself to be, at times the object of Line's capricious preferences; and she seemed to find it excellent sport to play with them in her idle moments, as a cat will with a mouse; but she had the gift of keeping all three in torment at the same time.

Two of them had been recommended to her father as sons of honoured customers at a distance, who dealt with Bergmann for beer. Dummhart was from Bremen; a broad-faced, assiduous, bony person, with a burr in his throat like the drone of a bagpipe, and a pair of awkward red hands; an reste, a vociferous, good-humoured fellow, on excellent terms with himself, and prone to believe that he was admired by the gentler sex. The other, Schindesel, from Berlin, was rather sallow and priggish, with a nose of unusual length and small elevation, ending in a pert-looking knob; he spoke with his teeth closed, was curious in his dress, and condescending, as one that came from a capital of vast pretensions. He was older than Dummhart, and studied medicine and the natural sciences; concerning which he was apt to be tedious, in the hope of making Line into a natural philosopher—Heaven save the mark! How the third, Von Callenberg, had fallen into the circle, I never learned. His family dwelt in a crazy old castle in Rhenish Bavaria, and claimed kindred with those hot-blooded Guelfs who were a terror to the Marchers in the fifteenth century. In their position it is not likely that any beer-transactions could have taken place with the good Bergmann; and the acquaintance was probably brought to pass by some third party. You could not see him in the Bergmann group without feeling that he was an alien there. At the time when my observations commenced, he was excessively slender and boyish-looking: and it was only in speaking that his features showed any of the fire and character that announce manhood. By his figure, and the smoothness of his cheek, any one would have supposed him two years younger than his real age; his manners, too, had all the petulance of boyhood, although more civilized than those of the other two. In dancing and other exercises he greatly excelled—was said to be clever; but, in his way, was quite as volatile as Line. He professed to study Roman law; but in reality did little but ride and ramble about; devising all manner of strange pranks—besides whispering cantos of fanciful nonsense into Caroline's pretty ears. Between the two there was a perpetual warfare; but I thought there was more earnest on Callenberg's side than on hers. He seemed hardly man enough for a girl's first fancy; and, altogether, his chance might be considered a bad one.

Meeting frequently at Bergmann's house, the three students rather fell into the habit of associating at other times, than became intimates from choice. In mature age a man may be known by his companions; but it is not so with the chance connexions of youth. Here, for instance, there was hardly a single point of resemblance between the companions, except that each belonged to the college, and admired my friend Caroline. In the latter circumstance, indeed, there was no great promise of their union enduring long; but no rivalship openly disturbed it while each, in turn, received his share of smiles and slights, and, on the whole, had neither any cause for triumph, nor the least occasion for jealousy. In this pacific state the intercourse went on for a while; but every day made the impression of Line's beauty, and the captivation of her charming caprices, more serious; and as the admirers rapidly rose into lovers, they began to feel all the anxieties and suspicions which belong to Passion, and occupied themselves as much with watching each other as with paying court to her. They still met, and walked together as usual, but more from habit than anything else; and in Caroline's presence their concealed jealousy broke out in little fretful remarks, and attempts to mortify and confuse, which afforded her infinite sport, and were not allowed to languish for want of occasion.

If Aunt Ursel could have seen all that passed, (and, from her dim sight and drowsiness, the most of it escaped her,) she would never have thought of interrupting it, so long as her favourite seemed to find it amusing. She assented to every plan—approved of every admirer—and sate smiling and looking on, muttering to herself, now and then, in her broad Münich dialect, "Wait a little, said the snow:" "young blood runs fast—young blood is tamed at last,"—and other sentences of the kind; of which the meaning was not very apparent to any one but herself. The portly brewer thought it quite becoming that his daughter should be much sought after, as his ale had always been: his notions had been acquired in that good old time when the love-making of young people in the burgher class of Germany, was thought as natural and innocent as dressing or eating their dinners; and not, as with us, a thing to be shunned as an immodesty and a crime. He saw no wrong whatever in the homage paid to his darling's beauty, of which he was himself so proud; had no idea that it was possible for her to do anything at which he should be angry or grieved; and supposed, that after she had coquetted and played at hide-and-seek with her lovers until she was tired, the comedy would end in due time with a marriage; to which he had no objection in life, provided she was not taken away from him. As for the three students, they seemed to be ordentlichen Jungens; and any one of them that pleased Line would be sure to please him. As for riches, he had, like the old man in the comedy, "ten thousand pounds to bury him, and could afford to have his humour." A more complacent papa certainly never encouraged the wilfulness of a capricious beauty.

Bergmann was quite able to feel, too, that these admirers of his daughter were superior in education and society to those of his own class whom he met elsewhere. The presence of Caroline, of course, made each ambitious of appearing to the utmost advantage; and it was a great addition to his evening's entertainments to partake of her audiences, (which, on some excuse or another, took place every second or third day,) and sit by, discussing frequent pipes of knaster, while three lively and well-educated young fellows were vying who ıould best amuse his fair daughter; she, by her ›irit and vivacity, maintaining the supremacy ver them all; and Aunt Ursel, so long as she was wake, breaking in at intervals with a kind of horus to the extempore drama. He declared that, ıking into account the use of his own grandfather-hair, and other house comforts, it was better than n evening at the Iserthor theatre; and that Cal-nberg, especially, made him laugh as often as taberl. I really used to think that Bergmann ıjoyed the whole even more than the other several ıembers of the company, who were too intent on ıeir individual parts, and rather eager than leased. But this very excitement is, in itself, to ıe young, a priceless charm, far exceeding the leasures of soberer people.

The ease and gaiety of these meetings, however, egan to fall off sadly, when the students, as I ave already hinted, came to feel the approaches f Passion. The frank cheerfulness which had xisted amongst them gave place to suspicion; ney rarely addressed each other in Line's pre-nce; and innuendoes and sarcastic hints dis-arbed the mirth of the company. Then he who hought another more favoured on one occasion, ppeared moody and silent the evening after; his again was to be punished by some mark of ine's displeasure, or removed by a sign of grace, hich was a torment to the others. All, indeed, as very much subdued; for Line allowed of no ebellion, and kept her subjects in admirable order; ut still the charm was broken:—the careless ierriment of a few months back had disappeared or ever; and Bergmann, forgetting that all were ot, like himself, placid spectators, was annoyed y the change, without at first clearly understand-ng its natural cause. In proportion as it became ess amusing, did he look with less indulgence on he wooing, and gradually wakened to a percep-ion that it could not peaceably continue on its resent footing. Moreover, Line was growing uite a woman, and had as yet shown no inten-ion whatever of making up her mind, although er beauty, and gay spirits, and her many admirers oo, had been the talk of the neighbours for more han a twelvemonth. These considerations at ast induced Papa Bergmann to think it time that is daughter should look more seriously at the uestion; and that some understanding should re-ulate the visits of the amorous students, who now, n one pretext or another, found their way round he corner of the Weingasse nearly every evening. Ie fancied that she was perhaps only wanting some oberer counsel to aid her in choosing a lover; and ost no time in offering his own, with suitable ad-ice on the propriety of her being now betrothed o some one. But Line seemed utterly amazed at he proposal; first laughed, and then pouted,—vondering that Papa could think it possible that he could give her heart to any man; and express-ng the uttermost scorn of her admirers, all and undry. The students, she supposed, had been 'apa's guests, and were of no interest in her eyes, xcept as they occasionally served to amuse him; ut for this, she averred, their absence would be n exceeding relief to her. A reply so unexpected was too much for even Bergmann's indulgence; and he declared, with some heat, that the young fellows had all been courting her with the utmost violence for months, as she well knew; and that, unless she could now make a choice amongst them, it would be his duty to restrict their visits for the future. Line only answered that she begged Papa would do so; but her heightened colour, and the quick motion of her breast, as it bent over her work, showed how much she had been disturbed by the hasty proposal. The old gentleman, who was not exactly the person to succeed in confessing a coy, wilful damsel, retired, no little puzzled; and after long rumination over a pipe and some measures of extraordinary doppel bier, decided that, whether her reluctance was real or affected, it would be expedient to put his threat into execution.

While this catastrophe, as I may say, was brewing, the lovers were each indulging in dreams of future success. Dummhart, because she laughed at him the oftenest, and he had heard that this was a good sign; besides which, he secretly believed himself a lady-killer. Schindesel relied on his intellectual gifts; and Callenberg thought he should succeed, because he could not bear the idea of losing her: so prone we are to hope the most when the only ground for hope is the fear of its disappointment! The effect of the feeling in each was no bad indication of the several characters of the rivals. Neither Dummhart nor his Berlin friend was passionate enough to affect entire constancy, but both gladly received any comfort that circumstances and easier beauties might cast in their way. Schindesel, indeed, had all along been quietly spinning a kind of Platonic fringe to the tissue of his main love, with Sophie Behr, the daughter of Caroline's old music master, and as it happened, (although Schindesel knew nothing of this,) her closest female friend. The best intimacy between girls does not exclude such accidents: and so the wooer in the morning poured into Sophie's sympathizing ears the sighs which he had vainly breathed to Line the evening before; which sighs Sophie discreetly kept to herself. But Callenberg, who had eyes like a wild-cat, was also a pupil of old Behr's, and on friendly terms with his daughter, and soon detected this divided homage; which Schindesel regarded as a master-piece of amorous diplomacy, without caring how it might affect the happiness of poor Sophie, who seemed really to like him. As for Callenberg, he cared for no other woman but Line, or thought no one else worth the trouble of wooing:—indeed, it did not quite appear, whether it was not the pleasure of laughing, and teasing, and vying with her in strange fancies, that kept him even at her feet, more than any tenderer feeling. He made few professions of homage, and seldom refrained from qualifying his compliments with a jest or a little spice of satire: and so was constantly in disgrace, and often remained unforgiven for days together.

But all were unprepared for the determination which Bergmann now made known; and their confidence dwindled extremely, when it appeared that Line's dispositions towards them were to be subjected to an immediate trial: and that if not absolutely banished from the house, they were forbidden to enter it uninvited, unless she could be won to give one of them the title of a permitted suitor. One after the other, they begged for a hearing, in order to present the important petition; but she would receive nothing in private, and only consented to grant a general farewell audience in aunt Ursel's presence. Of course it was impossible to be particularly moving under such disadvantages; and any courage that might have survived them would have given way before the smiling and saucy composure with which Line received her lovers. There was nothing, except, perhaps, a little higher colour on her cheek, from which one might have guessed that there was anything unusual in the interview;—and she gave the rueful petitioners no assistance whatever in opening the conference they had sought for. Dummhart, who had prepared himself for something tender, and Schindesel, who expected an occasion of relieving her maidenly embarrassment, were utterly confused, and could offer nothing better than common regrets and common adieus. Callenberg alone had looked for a sorry reception, and therefore was not wholly abashed by it.

He stood playing with Line's canary, until the rest had done their doleful parts; and then, sedately approaching her, took her hand, saying, with the utmost simplicity,—

"May not I come again?"

The unexpected manner of this question took her quite off her guard, and she could not help laughing heartily.

"Fie!" she said,—"you?—the idlest of all? Papa is quite concerned at your levity, as he tells me!"

"I was light-hearted till I knew you, Lady Caroline! but it is not fair to banish me for that: and you have the power of making all that leave your presence heavy enough!"

Here the other two sent up lamentable sighs by way of chorus.

"Really," Caroline replied, with an air of extreme innocence, "I am sorry that you are going; but Papa must know why: and I have no right to interfere with his guests—"

"I only ask leave to be yours!" said Callenberg, interrupting her.

"O! not for the world!" was the answer, with the prettiest air of scorn possible. "What an audacious proposal!—it is time indeed to send you away! Receive visiters whom Papa discards! Come—you wish to bid me good bye?"

"I do not, and will not," said Callenberg; "because I hope to see you again, after all."

"It is a bold hope, unless you are recalled with Papa's leave—and mine."

"Is that a defiance or a promise that sounds so unkindly?"

"Neither, or both!" Line replied hastily.

"Then I will take both," said Callenberg—"and try them too, whether you will or not!"

"At your peril—if ever I speak to you again—"

"Nay, my sweet enemy," interrupted Callenberg, "no rash words! I shall remember what you have said;—do not say what you might really wish forgotten—God bless you!"

So saying, he kissed her hand, and left the room, after shaking that of aunt Ursel, who had sate by in great restlessness while this scene was acting. The old lady kissed him heartily on both cheeks, and was about to have made some expostulation, but a glance from Caroline checked her. The other students followed Callenberg in silence, looking wofully crestfallen. He paused on the threshold for a last glance at Line; but she had turned her head, and covered her eyes with one hand—the hand he had kissed! And so the unsuccessful suitors took their departure. As Caroline entered her chamber that night, she said to herself, "I wonder if he will try?—it was very presuming in him to say so; and that he will find! But," she added, with something like a sigh, "he is so volatile:—in a week he will have forgotten all about it! How very dull it was this evening!"

On the next day the students met, as usual, in the Schulgasse, and in spite of their tacit agreement, could not help breaking out on the forbidden subject.

"We are all equal, at least," said Schindesel; "the girl is too haughty to confess a liking for any one: she will never sigh for love—she may for jealousy."

"Nonsense!" Dummhart cried; "she is only a little coy thing, and wants to try her suitors' constancy. I am content that she does." (Here he smiled with a self-satisfied air.) "But what says Callenberg after his open rejection?"

"Why," he replied, "I shall not hang my head and stammer, as you two did, when you should have spoken, if ever:—were I a lover, I would think of this, and boast less, Dummhart,—and scold less, Schindesel."

The latter bit his lip, but Dummhart answered quite unabashed.

"You are a novice in love, and little know how the emotion which she causes affects a maiden's heart!"

"Maids are very like butterflies, I think, friend Dummhart; they are not to be caught by puffing; and no one can tell why they alight, or where!"

"Speak for yourself," said the Bremen student; "I am a moss-covered head,* and know something of women. There was never a thing in petticoats (may fashion make them shorter!) that could deceive me. Vixi puellis idoneus, et militavi non sine gloriâ."

"You boast too much for a hero," said the other, "and would tempt any girl that knew it to put you to the proof. But I will not betray you."

"It would be just like one of your page tricks" —observed Schindesel.

"Let him run on," cried Dummhart, "he will not have the opportunity. Girls, especially, love robust manhood—and have a liking for moustaches—"

---

* Vermoostes Haupt. A student's slang term for one of a certain standing in the university.

"Even" interrupted Schindesel "when they are fox-red," (which was Dummhart's colour.) "But no conjuror could tell what Line Bergmann likes: she worships nothing but her own fancies."

"Well may she," said Callenberg; "they must be both bright and sweet;—you, my learned friends, being neither!"—and, without waiting for a reply, he turned into the cross street leading to his lodging.

"She might find worse," said Schindesel contemplatively, as he passed a shop, and surveyed himself in the mirror; but Dummhart was absorbed in the same pleasing study, and made no answer. From the time of this interview the students seldomer met, and a very few weeks dissolved the intimacy which had been made and kept up at Bergmann's.

In order to throw some light on the preceding conversation, it is proper to mention, that at the time, Dummhart and Schindesel had each been indebted to the compassion of aunt Ursel for a later private interview with Caroline. The good old lady thought they had been hardly treated, and helped to throw them successively in her way, on the same evening after they had been publicly dismissed. It may be supposed that they were more eloquent when tête-à-tête, than in the presence of other hearers: at all events they so far prevailed as to extort from Line a modification of her sentence; or rather what each regarded as a conclusive evidence of her favour.

Dummhart was allowed to proceed every Thursday to the third tree in the English garden; where, on condition of his faithfully remaining there until two hours after sunset, he might indulge a hope of seeing Line, nay, of speaking to her for some ten minutes, as she passed by with her maid, on the first moonlight evening which Papa should pass at the Frohsinn alone. Unluckily it was March,—the nights in the valley of the Iser at this season are dismally raw and rainy,—and Dummhart stood under the drip of the third tree for two mortal hours, on three Thursdays running, without a glimpse of moonlight, or, of course, of Line. He began to consult the almanack, and thought his task harder than he had supposed it could be; wondering why the Spring and his mistress were both so long in coming. Schindesel piqued himself on his style; and lived in the hope of a letter from Caroline—to which, of course, he would reply in a killing manner. And equally mindful of his scientific tastes, and of her maiden fears, she had promised to write with an infallible sympathetic ink of which he had formerly shown her the properties, and of which he alone, besides, possessed the secret. Daily did he visit the Post-office to ask for a letter with the feigned address agreed upon: at last he was delighted by the sight of an enclosure—evidently a double sheet. But some failure must have occurred in the composition of the ink—the acids he applied, and the heat in which he toasted the sheets for hours, were alike useless; the pages remained as white as at first! most tantalizing mischance, to hold so much enchantment in the hand and be unable to taste it! the worse, because in this first letter was to be given a direction for the way of sending a reply, which it was strictly forbidden to address to Bergmann's house, for fear of discovery! Again he reviewed the composition of the ink—pored over Schmidt De praxi, and Kohl's Cryptographia—but nothing he could do or learn would coax a single letter into sight. He was almost in despair—but again beset the Post-office; and, almost beyond his hopes, after a fortnight's persecution, again was blessed with a similar letter—and, alas! again tried his chemical arts on its concealed lines in vain!—The truth was, that the mischievous beauty was making excellent sport of both her admirers. And not of Callenberg too? Alas! he had not given her the least opportunity, or aunt Ursel the smallest trouble: but had reconciled himself to the banishment without farther appeal; and was said to be living as joyfully as usual, and did not even throw himself in the way of meeting Bergmann's fair daughter, at church or in market; nor was ever seen to pass round that corner of the Weingasse, commanded by the window at which Line was wont, as he well knew, to sit. Of this she could be in no doubt; because, as it happened, she had of late taken particular notice of that corner—merely from curiosity. She made the observation more than once to aunt Ursel; and seemed little pleased, I thought, that the good lady only shrugged her broad shoulders and made a rueful grimace whenever the subject was approached.

I was frequently at the house at this time, and could not but see that a blank had been made in it which all felt. Bergmann was disappointed at the effects of his interference, and missed the entertainment which he had learned to enjoy; but did not like to take back his word. Aunt Ursel openly lamented her niece's stiff-neckedness; wondering that she could not find enough to satisfy any reasonable damsel in some one of the "golden youths" whom she had sent empty away. And Line, too, although as lively as ever, found the want of some one who cared more for her airy caprices than either Papa or a sober married man like myself. She never confessed this; but it was betrayed by fits of silence, and little starts when a ring came to the door, and now and then something very like a sigh; all recent, and to me intelligible symptoms,—which grew more decided as the kindly Spring came onwards with its mysterious influences. As the weather grew warm, the evenings which used to be spent in the little home circle, were oftener passed, according to the custom of the Munich citizens, in some of the many places of open-air entertainment, with which the capital abounds. Here the two academic swains, Schindesel and Dummhart, hovered around Bergmann's little party, glad to receive a nod from Caroline as she passed on, without venturing to stop or speak to her, which had been prohibited until further orders. But Callenberg never was apparent; and it was impossible not to contrast his indifference with the assiduous patience of the two others. Yet, in reality, both at this moment were beginning to tire of feeding on Line's unfulfilled promises, and to think that all her beauty was little enough to justify such inveterate cruelty and caprice as it pleased her to exhibit.

I accompained Bergmann's family trio, one fine evening in May, to the Englischer Garten, which was now the chief resort of pleasure-seekers, and full of gaily-dressed people. As we paraded along the avenues, Line requested me to look for her friend Sophie Behr, who had promised to join the party with a cousin from Brunswick, newly-arrived, whom all were exceedingly curious to see, after the picture that Sophie had drawn of her talents and eccentric ways. Nothing, however, could be seen of the pair; my companion, who did not like to be disappointed, grew rather pettish; and on some slight pretext or other, (I believe she said I was growing prosy,) left me to the uninspiring society of Papa, and nestled under aunt Ursel's wing. In this order the party was settled in a kind of bosquet or arbour, commanding all that passed in the grand allée, but a little retired from it; the ladies modestly concealed in the leafy recess, and Bergmann and myself forming an advanced guard, before a table at which he smoked and I drank coffee—as the "knitters in the shade" declined my company. None of the many passers by who greeted Bergmann, and peered with longing eyes into the arbour, had any invitation to stay; and as the sun set amidst a warm twilight, and none of the party seemed inclined to talk, a kind of pleasant drowsiness, aided by the fumes of Bergmann's pipe and the hum of the passers-by, stole over all; and aunt Ursel indeed was fairly asleep, when the calm was broken by a hearty exclamation in front, in the broadest patois of the Streicher gasse.

"Ach der Herr Bierbrauer! there you are, God be praised! and we were seeking you amongst the paraders—there is Jungfer Linchen, too?" It was old Jette, father Behr's factotum, who held by the hand a smart young lady:—and proceeded to explain that Sophie had been kept at home by her father, who was ill; but that her cousin was loath to lose the pleasure which had been promised her, as she was to leave on the morrow, and had accordingly come under the guidance of the old body, with a line from Sophie to serve as an introduction. Having delivered this, she merely added: "And here is the Fräulein, who can say all the rest,"—and trotted off, as if she had business to perform elsewhere. Before Line could hasten to welcome the new acquaintance, who was embarrassed at being left so abruptly amongst strangers, Bergmann had laid down his pipe; seized upon her in his rude, hearty fashion, first by the hand, and then by the chin, and looking kindly in her face, exclaimed: Ey was! ein festes, stattliches mädel!" (she was indeed tall and good-looking,) and greeted her with a very emphatic kiss. She received it patiently, but with a kind of fretful grimace that I have often seen on pretty German lips, when kissed by old men. Let me here take occasion to remark, that amongst all classes (and even between males!) the practice of kissing prevails in Germany to an extent of which we have no idea here. Not only is the salute a common form of greeting, but it is much used, especially between girls, at pauses in conversation, and on very slight provocations, especially if men are looking on. Nor are the maidens quite so chary of their lips, to our sex, as those would like, who regard this sweet caress as the choicest token of a woman's fondness. However the wanderer may rejoice in such delicacies, I cannot say that I like to see a girl's lips made too cheap; and for this reason always in secret applauded my friend Line's coyness on this head. She would never suffer any man to kiss her; but used to say when teased about it, that whoever touched her lips with her will, took her heart upon them: and it pleased me to see at a Christmas game, when all the girls around were paying forfeits, with what a saucy dexterity she put up her hand when her turn came, and would not be persuaded to pay in any other fashion. It may have been merely one of her caprices; but if so, it was a very tempting one, and excusable for the sake of the pleasant ideas which it suggested: as I trust the present digression may be.

Line greeted the Fräulein more gently, and invited her to a seat at her side in the recess, where she soon lost her momentary confusion. I could not but overhear most of the discourse, as Bergmann had relapsed into silence. After a few commonplaces had been exchanged, more interesting topics were introduced, which the Fräulein attacked with such alternate spirit and wilfulness, that Caroline, accustomed to no caprices but her own, did not exactly know whether to be amused or affronted, but ended, by laughing heartily, in spite of herself. This seemed to have been the effect intended, for the Fräulein's vivacity increased. She jested, and asked the most pointed questions, with a simplicity only equalled by the frankness of her own confessions. There was no resisting a confidence so naïve and unbounded; and Careline, without well knowing why, found herself talking to her new acquaintance as if they had been intimate for years. From things the discourse soon turned to persons; and she had to describe every passer by whom she knew.

"And who are those objects," said the Fräulein,—it was Dummhart and Schindesel, who had lately come up separately, and, seeing Bergmann, bowed to the darkness, where Line sate unseen,—"occupying their solitary chairs, like dancing dogs who have been ordered to squat on their tails for practice till the master comes?—Ah! now I see," she ran on; "they are lovers of yours, for each has bowed a second time in this direction, and possesses a white handkerchief; the last an infallible sign of extremity in a student!"

"They are silly creatures," lisped Line; "but that is no fault of mine."

"They say we are liable for half the follies they commit," replied the young lady: "at least Sophie told me so this morning in a lecture on the extravagancies of her friend, young Callenberg, who, I believe, admires me. Did you ever see him?"

The reply to this question was not a prompt one; and I could hear Line start at the last words—a little start; but it did not escape me, for her pelisse rustled audibly.

"I may—one sees so many—perhaps—"

"Perhaps!" cried the Fräulein. "What a roaster the man must be! He told me that he had ong known you; and once read me a catalogue of your charms and virtues, which he said ıe had worshipped, but that you turned him out ›f the temple one cold morning lately."

"He is very impertinent to name me at all," Line remarked pettishly.—The young lady, thought I, ıas struck a note at random, which promises to resolve the new-made harmony into a discord. But she answered unsuspectingly.

"Nay, meine Beste, you ought to forgive him, if I could, for praising you when he might have been flattering me."

"I would gladly make you a present of such praises, if you will accept them," Line retorted. "I can guess what they were—"

"Shall I tell you?"

"Not for the world—unless they were very absurd: I dare say they were."

"They were not unmixed, at least," replied the Fräulein: "he said you had too much beauty for a saint, and too much grace for a sinner; that more charming you could not be, but would be happier if you were poorer."

"That is paltry," interrupted the party described.

"Nay, he did not mean in florins—but in wit, and life, and spirits; which, he said, lead you in chase of butterflies when you have diamonds at home, which make you the richest heiress in Munchen; but you do not know it."

"What contradictory nonsense!" cried Line. "I have no diamonds, either figuratively or in reality."

"He said you had; and a pearl, too! a heart-shaped one, but had thrown it away. And I suppose, from what I hear, it will be bestowed as sponsa Christi. Where do you mean to take the veil? The Lieb-frauen kloster has the best choir: let me recommend that."

"I take the veil!" exclaimed Line, with an accent of horror.

"Why, I thought the banishing of all your lovers a first-step to the convent: you are too young and pretty to be tolerated as a lay nun."

"It does not follow," said Line, with a toss of her head, "that I should turn nun because I despise some men who have neither sincerity nor constancy."

"Be just, I pray, if you mean poor Callenberg;" the Fräulein answered. "You have broken the boy's heart; and what wonder if he comes crying to me, who have known him since childhood, to see if he can get it mended? Would that I knew how!"

"O, I have no doubt of your knowledge or of your success," said Line, with some asperity.

"Do not mistake me—I have no love to spare for him; all I have has long been another's." This was said with a tone of feeling and seriousness that made Line involuntarily seize the Fräulein's hand, and press it softly. She continued: "But one feels for an old acquaintance—a well-meaning youth, too—although unfortunate in his manners, I allow."

"Do you think so?" said Line; "we always thought him gentler than his companions."

"Perhaps, but not to me: and then I like a livelier nature."

"Nay, do him justice, he was gay enough—though he was rather fond of making others laugh than of stupidly laughing at trifles, like the rest."

"Well," said the Fräulein—"I have seen him under a cloud—no trace of gaiety now, I promise you,—and he is looking uglier than ever."

"Ugly he never was!" Line replied, tartly; "if anything, he was too pretty for a man." The Fräulein laughed.—"Oh! now I see your treachery!"

"Forgive it! come, there is no denying it," said the Fräulein, taking both hands in her own—"I see—I see."

——Whether Line felt ashamed of the temper she had shown, or of the pretended discovery, or was softened by some hidden emotion, I cannot say—but she replied, "Hush! be still!"—and throwing her arms round the Fräulein's neck, closed her mouth with a kiss, the sound of which made my old lips water. Methought, what an eloquent and touching close to the sentence!

The Fräulein remained for some time silent, returning Line's embrace.

"Listen," she said at last. "I have been traducing your lover, for your sake—to say nothing of my own vanity. If I had said at first that he never told me a thought that was not yours, I might not have been able to tell him how wilful you have really been—"

"Tell him!" cried Line, "what would you tell him?—not for your life!"

"And will you be so perverse as to forbid me even hinting to Sophie, that you will not shut the door in his face if he pitifully besieges it?"

"You do not know all—papa will only allow it if—and I do not think he cares, indeed—"

"O! I think you are wrong there," interrupted the Fräulein.

"What!" Line exclaimed, "after threatening he would see and speak to me, whether I would or no: that was before Innocent's Day—and he has never even come near me since! Had he cared, he would have tried to fulfil his threat," she added plaintively.

"He told me he had; and meant to claim some pledge of yours in return: but I will not tease you any more on the subject."

"Stay a moment," cried Line, eagerly: "he has been jesting! What! did he say he had spoken to me? It may have been in his sleep!"

"No indeed—and I could tell you where."

"Where?—pray tell me!"

"Come nearer," said the Fräulein, "and I will whisper it, for I suspect that tiresome Englishman is listening,"—which, to say the truth, he was, with great amusement; while Bergmann and the good Ursel were comfortably snoring.

Line bent nearer to the Fräulein's lips; which were first most tenderly pressed to her cheek, and then said something in her ear, that made my pretty friend start to her feet with a cry, as if a bee had stung it.

"For God's sake," said the Fräulein, in a strange tone of the most eager entreaty; "do not discover it, and ruin me!" and for a moment, holding Line's hands in one of hers, she laid the other on her lips.

The agitation of both was extraordinary; and I expected some notable disclosure, in reply to the puzzled inquiries of aunt Ursel and Bergmann, who had been wakened by the exclamation. But Line commanded herself and replied evasively,—a bat had suddenly flown past her; and she begged, as it was so late, that they might go home. All were ready for this, as the garden was nearly forsaken, the two lovers only keeping their cheerless posts, for the sake of bowing again as Line passed. She had begged Papa to take charge of the Fräulein, who passed on demurely with eyes cast down, in silence, while he gallantly strode in advance; and she herself clung to aunt Ursel's arm, refusing my attendance, which was bestowed on the skirts of the old Lady.

At the corner, as you cross the avenue leading to the Rumford monument, Bergmann, who walked rather unsteadily in the shade of the trees, trode down a drooping branch, which caught the Fräulein's dress, and, springing back to its position as they passed on, not only tore, but raised the drapery of the young lady considerably higher than the knee; and, as she walked in the moonlight, discovered to my utter amazement and amusement the foundation of an indisputable pair of black satin breeches—such as men wore at that time in gala costume! The couple in front moved on unconscious of the disclosure; and while I was ruminating upon it, and drawing sundry conclusions in my own mind, a suppressed tittering from the other side of aunt Ursel proved that I had not been the only discoverer: and in a few moments Line was seized with a fit of laughter so overpowering, that aunt Ursel stood still, thinking it an hysteric seizure, which, in part, perhaps, it was; for which reason I deemed it best to say nothing at the time. After a hearty fit, she regained tolerable composure, and kept it with some effort when they arrived at Sophie's door, and the Fräulein took leave of her, rather distantly, after receiving a second kiss from Papa Bergmann; at which Line held down her head, and pressed her handkerchief to her mouth.

The sequel I learned in a few days from Bergmann; but after what I had overheard in the arbour, I needed no one to tell me that the wearer of the breeches was a male, and that Callenberg was the person. So well, however, had he been dressed by Sophie's care, and so dexterously was his falsetto managed, that but for the accident with the beech-branch, I should never have suspected the cheat. And how did Line bear it?—At first angrily enough; but something pleased her at the same time in an enterprise which proved that she was not forgotten. Then it was so bold and unexpected, and had so completely deceived her! At this recollection, she smiled and frowned alternately; and then her cheeks grew burning red, and a strange emotion overcame her as she thought how they sate with arms interlaced in the arbour, and how she herself had kissed him! And how could she refuse to speak to him again, after the discovery that he had made of her thoughts, and the successful achievement of his promise? More than all this,—a little still voice, that had begun to make itself heard during his absence, pleaded on his behalf. But maiden pride is a wilful thing; and it first avenged itself on the accomplice, Sophie, who came next morning to bespeak a hearing for Callenberg in propriâ personâ.

"I protest," said Sophie, after waiting till the first heat of reproaches had subsided, "that I believe he would have killed me if I had refused him;—and what harm is done after all? You silly girl, if you will not know your own heart, you ought to thank any one for making it speak against your will."

"He shall gain nothing by it," Line cried; "I would rather acknowledge a regard which is accompanied with respect—like Dummhart's."

"You have at least one point in common," said Sophie, laughing: "the worthy bachelor took Callenberg for a woman—and followed you homewards—and has written the tenderest note! After you had gone, the Fräulein would needs take a run in the moonlight, and fell in with the poor goose, who was inveigled into a flirtation, and believes it is a maid fresh from Ratisbon. Here is the billet doux—imploring a second interview."

Line read, and bit her pretty lip, but could not help laughing. "I would give something," she said, "to witness the courtship. Well! I am free from his wearisomeness after this: his friend Schindesel——"

"My friend, dearest Line, if you please," simpered Sophie: "regard him in that capacity with more favour, than when he was one of your despised admirers."

"What do you mean?" cried Line, amazed to find a second card unexpectedly withdrawn.

"He had long trusted me with his anxieties; at first I listened on your account only:—and then—you know how you have played with his feelings—last night, I can assure you that his declaration quite surprised me!"

"It is very well," said Line, reddening; but feeling at the moment as if she would not be sorry to have a lover of her own, amidst all this defection.

At this moment the door opened, and aunt Ursel, peeping in, with a guilty face, and seeing that Bergmann was not there, gave entrance to Callenberg, saying, "Go, master Penitence, and make your peace, if you can." Sophie laughed, and ran out of the room, bolting the door behind her.

What passed in the tête-à-tête thus forced on poor Caroline, I cannot say: but it was a good hour before she knocked to be let out; and from the redness of her lips, it appeared that something had passed over them warmer than mere words. At all events, Callenberg had made his peace, so far as to be enabled to inform Papa Bergmann that the ban which exiled him from the house was broken. The old fellow, I believe, was as glad as any of the party, and looked forward to a merry household once more: and aunt Ursel nodded, and chuckled, and said that Line's time was come at last; whereat the young lady blushed and pouted, and said, "Have done!"

I found them all in radiant spirits, devising a meeting to be held between the false Fräulein and Dummhart, for the benefit of the family party. Line was the only one who made any objection:

ut she was overruled by the boisterous glee of ier father, who entered into the jest as keenly as f he had been himself a madcap of a student. He ad not quite digested the kisses which he had een seduced into giving on false pretences, and vidently rejoiced in the idea of turning the laugh pon some one else.

The trap was instantly set. Schindesel adroitly cquainted Dummhart with the residence of the air one at Behr's. Notes were sent and answered, nd the lover was permitted to call—being a tranger to Sophie—one evening when she should e from home. At the appointed time, radiant rith self-love and huile de millefleurs, Dummhart ppeared in the most shining varieties of his Bremen wardrobe. The room in which the räulein received him was not lighted, although was already twilight; and she looked most educing in a flowing muslin, and abundant ringets, which that morning had been the pride of Kräuse the fashionable barber's window. There as a door leading to an inner room, where, las! for the unfortunate student, the whole Bergmann party, with Sophie, and her father, were ssembled; and as it was only of glass, they heard very word that passed on the other side.

Callenberg had a beautiful falsetto, a gift not uncommon in deep voices, and imitated the female tones dmirably. Dummhart was delighted, but not urprised, at the rapid progress which his eloquence vidently made in the Fräulein's regard; and rom generals descended to particulars—the theme, f course, being love. The dialogue became animated and amusing; but Callenberg could not refrain from caricaturing the sensibility which he had o affect, so that an ordinary man would have suspected some mischief. Not so Dummhart; he ascribed it all to his own seductions, and was in raptures.

"Ach! bestes Fräulein!" he sighed, "to hear me's inmost thoughts reëchoed for the first time y a beautiful soul!"

"Sympathy! alas!" said the Fräulein; "it is fearful tie, unless intertwined with others!"

"What others can deserve to be so mingled?"

"Equal wishes—equal love—equal truth!" vas the languishing reply.

"Wishes!—love!—oh! that I might pour out mine at your feet!" sighed Dummhart, kissing the lady's glove: "and for truth, for constancy—"

"We all can bear witness," said Line, opening the glass-door, followed by the whole assemblage, bearing lights. Poor Dummhart, petrified by the surprise, and bewildered by the sudden glare, grew purple in the face; and still holding fast by Callenberg's hand, remained on his knees, gasping with open mouth, and staring at the intruders. After this rueful survey had lasted for half a minute at least, he turned to the disguised lady, with an expression so perturbed and sheepish, that Callenberg could no longer contain his mirth, but laughed loudly in his natural voice. At this portentous sound, Dummhart sprang up as if shot; while Schindesel, with one hand tearing off the false locks, and with the other opening the muslin robe, discovered to his rage and horror the features and dress of Callenberg. He uttered a deep "Potztausend! der Spitzbub!" and dropped into a chair.

"Come!" said Callenberg, "you are fairly caught; remember how you boasted of your skill in discoveries of this kind—and how you insisted on following me down the Winter-strasse. You said no woman could deceive you."

"Nay," said Line, interposing, "nor was there any woman here."

"Ah!" Dummhart replied, looking very red, "but there was at the tree in the Englischer Garten."

Line laughed, and answered—"Surely; but I never pretended to like you—"

"But I thought"—urged Dummhart—

"That I was feigning, and that this was a girl; whereas, this is a man, and I spoke the truth," said Line; and Callenberg, taking her hand, cried, "Come! you have companions; for I have deceived more than one in this dress."

"Hold your tongue, Sir!" shouted Bergmann; "and now let us pass into the other room, where all is ready for Line's betrothing."

THE POET'S INSPIRATION.

Oh, thou! unequall'd on the lyre,
For love's lament or passion's fire;
Who stood in independence strong,
And struck the harp of lyric song,
When black misfortune's growing storm
Hung howling night around thy form,—
Why is heaven's desolating fire
The chiefest engine to inspire?

And thou, too, daring in thy youth
To wrench the dragon's venom'd tooth;
Alone, in yet accomplish'd time,
For vivid wit, intense sublime,
And burning beauty,—did not grief
Descend on thee, a noted chief,
And wrap thee in a burning curse,
And fuse thy fancies into verse?

Oh! who art thou that mak'st lament?
The strong bow is not idly bent!
The stricken eagle mad will soar
A height he never touch'd before!—
And thinkest thou the poet's art
Can speak the passions of his heart,
With half their vehemence and spell,
Ere grief has raked its deepest cell?

Let love—such love as poets feel!—
Into his heart insidious steal!
Then blight the flower, and bid him rend
Those roots that with his being blend;
And if there lurk poetic worth,
That harrowing pang will tear it forth,
And make intensest agony
His passport to eternity!

PERCIVAL KEENE.*

Percival Keen-e is the antipodes of Peter Simple; and this conveys a great deal. Both are sea-boys, both tell their own stories, both run through an extraordinary course of vicissitude and adventure, and find nearly the same good fortune at last; but here the resemblance closes. Peter the beloved is the most open-hearted, unsuspecting and generous of fictitious heroes; Perceive-all Keen—a shrewd, knowing, getting-on fellow, with the most selfish disregard for everything below the sun, save his own interests and advancement.

Captain Marryat could not for a wager, or the greater temptation of a good round sum of copy-money, compose a dull story. Percival Keene, therefore, as a composition, if not his best, is among his best Tales. Besides several capital sea characters, (and land or world ones too,) it contains sea-fights, and wild and stirring adventures by flood and field, that are more powerful, in the tragic and horrible, than any of their author's previous sketches in the same characteristic style. And yet the book carries a deadly blight in its bosom. It must amuse,—part of it may even interest; but as a whole it ought not to please, and it will not. Human nature is too good, too generous a thing, at least in its pleasures, to relish a cold-blooded calculating hero, with whatever degree of intellectual ability, good-humour, and personal courage he may be endowed; or to sympathize with one so utterly and intensely selfish, that, from boyhood to manhood, from the time that we meet with him, a malicious imp in petticoats, until we part with him at the wonted goal—the hymeneal altar—is seen under the influence of but one passion, and that the paltry and ignoble ambition of being acknowledged as the illegitimate son of a cold-hearted seducer, who is—a man of family. Such a character is not only unsuitable for the fictionist's purpose, but false to nature; unless the base-born subject be originally a very bad subject indeed.

We must, however, accept of Percival Keene as a picture of life; a quiet, if unintentional satire on the "pleasant vices" of the world's high places, and the justice which its high-born sons dispense to its humble daughters.

The story opens at the mansion of a very wealthy and noble spinster in Hampshire, a Lady of the Manor, who entertains, in the ambiguous capacity of half-companion, half-menial, a young, thoughtless, and very pretty girl, fully conscious of her own charms, and excessively fond of admiration, who is the orphan daughter of the lady's late steward. Arabella Mason, from her attractions and position, was as much the natural prey, the object of les droits de Seigneur, to her lady's nephew, the Honourable Captain Delmar of his Majesty's Navy, as were the foxes and partridges which he came to Madeline Hall to hunt and shoot, while his ship cruised in the Channel. We can almost forgive the cardinal defect of the book for the sake of such hits as the following:—

The Honourable Captain Delmar, at the time I am speaking of, commanded a frigate employed upon what was designated channel service, which in those days implied that the captain held a seat in the House of Commons, and that he voted with the ministry; and further, that his vote might, when required, be forthcoming, the frigate was never sea-going, except during the recess. It must be admitted that H.M. ship Paragon did occasionally get under weigh, and remained cruising in sight of land for two or three days, until the steward reported that the milk provided for the captain's table was turning sour; upon which important information the helm was immediately put up, and the frigate, in a case of such extreme distress, would drop her anchor at the nearest port under her lee. Now, as the Paragon was constantly at Spithead, Captain Delmar was very attentive in visiting his aunt, who lived at Madeline Hall; ill-natured people asserted, because she had so fine an estate in her own gift. Certain it is, that he would remain there for weeks, which gave great satisfaction to the old lady, who liked her nephew, liked attention, and was even so peculiar as to like sailors. But it must be observed that there was another person at the mansion who also liked the captain, liked attention, and liked sailors; this was Miss Arabella Mason, the eldest daughter of the steward of the old Lord de Versely, brother to the Honourable Miss Delmar, and much respected by his lordship for his fidelity, and his knowledge of business in the transaction of which he fell, for he was felling trees, and a tree fell upon him.

By and by, Miss Arabella and the Captain were frequently seen together in the evergreen walk; and this continued, and scandal increased, until it chanced that Miss Bella was very often found in tears; on which the old butler and housekeeper shook their heads like responsive mandarins, and everybody guessed what was going forward save the noble spinster herself. She was inexpressibly shocked when Arabella, as the wife of Benjamin Keene, Captain Delmar's marine valet, having first demeaned herself by marrying a private, still farther disgraced herself and affronted her lady, by producing a son three months after the ceremony. Ben was equally surprised; but he was a quiet, tractable fellow, who did not care to quarrel with his bread and butter; and his honourable master talked the indignant spinster over, and smoothed matters. He acknowledged, it was true—

That Bella Mason might have done better; but she was his aunt's servant, and Keene was his valet, so that the disparity was not so very great. He then intimated that he had long perceived the growing attachment; talked of the danger of young people being left so much together; hinted about opportunity, and descanted upon morals and propriety. The Honourable Miss Delmar was softened down by the dexterous reasoning of her nephew; she was delighted to find so much virtue extant in a sailor; and, after an hour's conversation, the married couple were sent for, graciously pardoned, and Mrs. Keene, after receiving a very tedious lecture, received a very handsome present.

The virtuous captain was equally successful in pacifying his relative when the infant was born, while its presumed father (who had departed on a cruise immediately after his marriage) was still absent.

"Come, my dear aunt, allow me to plead for them;

* By Captain Marryat. 3 vols. Colburn.

although I am very much distressed that such an event should take place in your house. I think," added he, after a pause, "I shall give Mr. Keene seven dozen at the gangway, for his presumption, as soon as I return on board."

"That won't mend the matter, nephew," replied Miss Delmar. "I'll turn her out of the house as soon as she can be moved."

"And I'll flog him as soon as I get him on board," rejoined the captain. "I will not have your feelings shocked, and your mind harassed in this way, by any impropriety on the part of my followers—most infamous—shameful—abominable—unpardonable," interjected the captain, walking the quarter-deck up and down the room.

Ben was soothed, and Bella was forgiven; Miss Delmar, and her honourable nephew, stood sponsors for the premature young marine; a bantering groom was thrashed by the husband; and the young couple retired to Chatham, where Ben lived in barracks, and his wife was enabled to open a cigar shop and circulating library with the captain's handsome marriage-presents. If she had made one false and irretrievable step, her after conduct displayed great strength of character. She was reserved, prudent, and respectable. Mrs. Keene was the natural superior of the man who had degraded himself by marrying her; and she kept her natural place; the nominal husband being the mere appendage of the woman who had consented to bear his name only to conceal her own disgrace. The whole connexion points a highly useful moral; and that Percival, who tells his own tale, should be able to appreciate the character of his mother, and yet feel so coldly for her injuries and the injustice done her by the parent whose favour and countenance it became the great object of his life to obtain, is, in romance, not a little inconsistent.

She had been compelled to marry a man whom she despised, and to whom she felt herself superior in every respect; she had done so to save her reputation. That she had been in error is true, but situation and opportunity had conspired against her; and when she found out the pride and selfishness of the man to whom she was devoted, and for whom she had sacrificed so much; when her ears were wounded by proposals from his lips that she should take such a step to avoid the scandal arising from their intimacy; when at the moment that he made such a proposition, and the veil fell down and revealed the heart of man in its selfishness, it is not to be wondered, that, with bitter tears, arising from wounded love, anger, and despair at her hopeless position, she consented. After having lost all she valued, what did she care for the future? It was but one sacrifice more to make, one more proof of her devotion and obedience. But there are few women who, like my mother, would have recovered her position to the extent that she did. Had she not shown such determination; had she consented to have accompanied her husband to the barracks, and have mixed up with the other wives of the men, she would have gradually sunk down to their level: to this she could not consent. Having once freed herself from her thraldom, he immediately sunk down to his level, as she rose up to a position in which, if she could not ensure more than civility and protection, she was at all events secure from insult and ill treatment.

Such was the state of affairs when I had arrived at the important age of six years, a comic-looking, laughing urchin, petted by the officers, and as full of mischief as a tree full of monkeys.

Percival's mother, as may be supposed, had but one object in life, one engrossing passion,—the advancement of her child. After being fairly settled and thriving, she was joined by her mother and a younger sister.

The adventures and tricks of the boy when sent to a day school, taught by a certain learned Thaddeus O'Gallagher, are humorous and farcical enough, though like everything of the sort, from Roderick Random downwards, grossly caricatured. Percival played off mischievous tricks upon everybody; and in this way, one day set Bob, his bull-pup, upon a captain of the Navy, who had recently arrived in Chatham to join a new ship to which he had been appointed, entirely ignorant of the fact that here was settled and flourishing his old acquaintance Bella Mason and her only child, his name-son Percival. Ben Keene had shortly before been ordered to the East Indies, much to Mrs. Keene's secret contentment. Percival's prank, in which Tommy Dott, a little mischievous middy, had been "art and part," introduced the Honourable Captain Delmar to Mrs. Keene's shop in a rather abrupt way, and in a plight not the most dignified for a naval commander. In short, with an oakum tail fixed to his coat-collar, at which hung the bull-pup tugging with might and main.

Captain Delmar was, to use a sailor's term, completely taken aback; indeed he was nearly capsized by the unexpected assault. For a short time he could not discover what it was; at last, by turning his head over his shoulder, and putting his hand behind him, he discovered who his assailant was.

Just at that time, I called out "Mad dog! mad dog!" and Captain Delmar hearing those alarming words, became dreadfully frightened; his cocked hat dropped from his head, and he took to his heels as fast as he could, running down the street, with Bob clinging behind him.

The first open door he perceived was that of my mother's library; he burst in, nearly upsetting Captain Bridgeman, who was seated at the counter, talking to aunt Milly, crying out "Help! help!" As he turned round, his sword became entangled between his legs, tripped him up, and he fell on the floor. This unhooked the tail, and Bob galloped out of the shop, bearing his prize to me, who, with the little middy, remained in the street convulsed with laughter. Bob delivered up the tail, which I again concealed under my pinafore, and then, with a demure face, ventured to walk towards my mother's house, and, going in at the back door, put Master Bob in the wash-house out of the way; the little middy, who had picked up the captain's hat, giving me a wink as I passed him, as much as to say, I won't inform against you.

In the meantime Captain Delmar had been assisted to his legs by Captain Bridgeman, who well knew who had played the trick, and who, as well as aunt Milly, had great difficulty in controlling his mirth.

"Merciful heaven! what was it? Was the animal mad? Has it bitten me?" exclaimed Captain Delmar, falling back in his chair, in which he had been seated by Captain Bridgeman.

"I really do not know," replied Captain Bridgeman; "but you are not hurt, Sir, apparently, nor indeed is your coat torn."

"What dog—whose dog can it be?—it must be shot immediately—I shall give orders—I shall report the case to the admiral. May I ask for a glass of water? Oh, Mr. Dott! you're there, Sir; how came you to allow that dog to fasten himself on my back in that way?"

"If you please," said the middy, presenting his cocked hat to the captain, "I did draw my dirk to kill him, but you ran away so fast that I couldn't catch you."

"Very well, Sir, you may go down to the boat and wait for orders," replied the captain.

At this moment my mother, who had been dressing herself, made her first appearance, coming out of the back parlour with a glass of water, which aunt Milly had gone in for. Perceiving a gold-laced captain, she advanced all smiles and curtsies, until she looked in his face, and then she gave a scream, and dropped the tumbler on the floor, much to the surprise of Captain Bridgeman, and also of aunt Milly, who, not having been at the Hall, was not acquainted with the person of Captain Delmar.

Just at this moment in came I, looking as demure as if, as the saying is, "butter would not melt in my mouth," and certainly as much astonished as the rest at my mother's embarrassment; but she soon recovered herself, and asked Captain Delmar if he would condescend to repose himself a little in the back parlour. When my mother let the tumbler fall, the captain had looked her full in the face and recognised her, and, in a low voice said, "Excessively strange,—so very unexpected!" He then rose up from the chair and followed my mother into the back room.

"Who can it be?" said aunt Milly to Captain Bridgeman, in a low tone.

"I suppose it must be the new captain appointed to the Calliope. I read his name in the papers, the Honourable Captain Delmar."

"It must be him," replied Milly; "for my sister was brought up by his aunt, Mrs. Delmar; no wonder she was surprised at meeting him so suddenly. Percival, you naughty boy," continued Milly, shaking her finger at me, "it was all your doing."

"Oh, aunt Milly! you should have seen him run," replied I, laughing at the thought.

"I'd recommend you not to play with post captains," said Captain Bridgeman, "or you may get worse than you give. Mercy on us!" exclaimed he, looking at me full in the face.

"What's the matter?" said aunt Milly.

Captain Bridgeman leant over the counter, and I heard him whisper, "Did you ever see such a likeness as between the lad and Captain Delmar?"

Milly blushed a little, nodded her head, and smiled, as she turned away. Captain Bridgeman appeared to be afterwards in a brown study: he tapped his boot with his cane, and did not speak.

No mysterious emotions, no filial instincts, moved the breast of Percival, when he first saw his father. On the contrary, he disliked the pompous great man; nor even, when his mother lectured him upon the value of Captain Delmar's future patronage, was he all at once made aware of his true interests, though that time came. Many private consultations were now held between Mrs. Keene and the haughty aristocratic Captain, whose heart half-acknowledged the natural claim from which his pride revolted. However, he voluntarily offered to take care of the boy, his former valet's son; and when Percival was about thirteen, he was accordingly sent for by the Captain, then at Portsmouth, who generously took the outfitting of the young midshipman upon himself. His mother, now a wealthy widow, accompanied Percival to Portsmouth. The scene is good; and one of the few in which Master Keene discovers any trace of a young heart.

We arrived safe at Portsmouth, and my mother immediately took lodgings at the Common Hard at Portsea. The next day, having dressed herself with great care, with a very thick veil on her bonnet, my mother walked with me to the George Hôtel, where Captain Delmar had taken up his quarters.

On my mother sending up her card, we were immediately ushered up stairs, and on entering the room, found the Honourable Captain Delmar sitting down in full uniform, his sword and hat and numerous papers lying on the table before him. On one side of the table stood a lieutenant, hat in hand; on the other, the captain's clerk, with papers for him to sign. My friend Tommy Dott was standing at the window, chasing a blue-bottle fly, for want of something better to do; and the steward was waiting for orders behind the captain's chair.

My mother, who had pulled down her veil, so that her face was not visible, made a slight curtsy to Captain Delmar, who rose up and advanced to receive her very graciously, requesting that she would be seated for a minute or two, till he had time to speak to her.

I have thought since, that my honourable captain had a mind to impress upon my mother the state and dignity of a captain in his Majesty's service, when in commission. He took no notice whatever of me. Tommy Dott gave me a wink of his eye from the window, and I returned the compliment by putting my tongue into my cheek; but the other parties were too much occupied with the captain to perceive our friendly recognition. Captain Delmar continued to give various orders, and after a time the officers attending were dismissed.

As soon as we were alone, my mother was addressed in, I thought, rather a pompous way, and very much in contrast with his previous politeness before others. Captain Delmar informed her that he should take me immediately under his protection, pay all my expenses, and, if I behaved well, advance me in the service.

At this announcement, my mother expressed a great deal of gratitude, and shedding a few tears, said, that the boy would in future look up to him as a parent. To this speech Captain Delmar made no reply; but changing the conversation, told her that he expected to sail in about three or four days, and that no time must be lost in fitting me out; that, all things considered, he thought it advisable that she should return at once to Chatham and leave the boy with him, as she could not know what was requisite for me, and would therefore be of no use.

At the idea of parting with me, my mother cried bitterly. Captain Delmar did then rise off his chair, and taking my mother by the hand, speak to her a few words of consolation. My mother removed her handkerchief from her eyes and sighed deeply, saying to Captain Delmar, with an appealing look, "Oh! Captain Delmar, remember that for you I have indeed made great sacrifices; do not forget them when you look at that boy, who is very dear to me."

"I will do him justice," replied the captain, somewhat affected, "but I must insist upon inviolable secrecy on your part; you must promise me that, under any circumstances—"

"I have obeyed you for thirteen years," replied my mother; "I am not likely to forget my promise now; it is hard to part with him, but I leave him in the hands of—"

"You forget the boy is there," interrupted Captain Delmar; "take him away now; to-morrow morning I will send my coxswain for him, and you must go back to Chatham."

"God bless you, Sir," replied my mother, weeping, as Captain Delmar shook her hand, and then we left the room. As we were walking back to our lodging I inquired of my mother, "What's the secret between you and Captain Delmar, mother?"

"The secret, child! Oh, something which took place at the time I was living with his aunt, and which he does not wish to have known; so ask me no more questions about it."

After our return, my mother gave me a great deal of advice. She told me that, as I had lost my father Ben, I must now look upon Captain Delmar as a father to me.

I cannot say the advice received the attention it deserved, for I felt more inclined to play tricks on my honourable captain than any person I ever met with; however, I appeared to consent, and, in return, begged my mother to take care of my dog Bob, which she promised to do.

My mother cried a great deal during the night; the next morning she gave me five guineas as pocket-money, recommending me to be careful of it, and telling me I must look to Captain Delmar for my future supply. She tied up the little linen I had brought with me in a handkerchief, and shortly after the coxswain knocked at the door, and came up stairs to claim me for his Majesty's service.

"I'm come for the youngster, if you please, Marm," said the coxswain, a fine, tall seaman, remarkably clean and neat in his dress. My mother put her arms round me, and burst into tears.—"I beg your pardon, Marm," said the coxswain, after standing silent about a minute, "but could not you do the piping after the youngster's gone? If I stay here long I shall be blowed up by the skipper, as sure as my name's Bob Cross."

"I will detain you but a few seconds longer," replied my mother; "I may never see him again."—"Well, that's a fact; my poor mother never did me," replied the coxswain. This observation did not raise my mother's spirits. Another pause ensued, during which I was bedewed with her tears, when the coxswain approached again—"I ax your pardon, Marm; but if you know anything of Captain Delmar, you must know he's not a man to be played with, and you would not wish to get me into trouble. It's a hard thing to part with a child, I'm told; but it wouldn't help me if I said anything about your tears. If the captain were to go to the boat, and find me not there, he'd just say, 'What were my orders, Sir?' and after that, you know, Marm, there is not a word for me to say."—"Take him, then, my good man," replied my mother, pressing me convulsively to her heart; "take him. Heaven bless you, my dear child."—"Thanky, Marm; that's kind of you," replied the coxswain. "Come, my little fellow, we'll soon make a man of you."—I once more pressed my lips to my poor mother's, and she resigned me to the coxswain, at the same time taking some silver off the table and putting it into his hand. "Thanky, Marm; that's kinder still, to think of another when you're in distress yourself; I sha'n't forget it. I'll look after the lad a bit for you, as sure as my name's Bob Cross."—My mother sank down on the sofa, with her handkerchief to her eyes. Bob Cross caught up the bundle, and led me away. I was very melancholy, for I loved my mother, and could not bear to see her so distressed, and for some time we walked on without speaking. The coxswain first broke the silence: "What's your name, my little Trojan?" said he.—"Percival Keene."—"Well, I'm blessed if I didn't think that you were one of the Delmar breed, by the cut of your jib; howsomever, it's a wise child that knows its own father."—"Father's dead," replied I.—"Dead! Well, fathers do die sometimes; you must get on how you can without one. I don't think fathers are of much use, for, you see, mothers take care of you till you're old enough to go to sea. My father did nothing for me, except to help mother to lick me, when I was obstropolous."—The reader, from what he has already been informed about Ben the marine, may easily conceive that I was very much of Bob Cross's opinion.—"I suppose you don't know anybody on board; do you?"—"Yes, I know Tommy Dott; I knew him when the ship was at Chatham."—"Oh! Mr. Tommy Dott; I dare say you're just like him, for you look full of mischief."

Bob Cross and Tommy Dott are henceforward important personages in the drama: the former becoming the bosom friend and counsellor of the young midshipman, now fairly launched; and the latter his companion and scape-goat, in all sorts of mischief; Percival, already a knowing fellow, always contriving to enjoy the fun, and to leave to his partner the disgrace and punishment. It was not long before, by "putting this and that together," the hopeful lad discovered who was his progenitor, on which knowledge he wrote his mother this laconic epistle:—

"DEAR MOTHER.—I have found it all out—I am the son of Captain Delmar, and every one here knows what you have kept a secret from me. I go on board to-day Yours truly, P. KEENE."

The fond and humbled mother's answer is skilful enough; and it gave advice upon which her son, without acknowledging its importance, regulated his conduct. She wrote,—

"I must add, my dear boy, that knowing Captain Delmar, and how proud and sensitive he is, if it should ever come to his knowledge that you had suspected or asserted what you have, his favour and protection would be lost to you for ever: at present he is doing a kind and charitable action in bringing forward the son of a faithful servant; but if he imagined for a moment that you were considered related to him, he would cast you off for ever, and all your prospects in life would be ruined.

"Even allowing it possible that you were what you so madly stated yourself in your letter to be, I am convinced he would do so. If such a report came to his ears, he would immediately disavow you, and leave you to find your own way in the world."

After the diligent study of his mother's ambiguous letter, Percival was more certain than before whose son he was; but he resolved to take the opinion of Bob Cross on the subject. No one could have given the youngster better counsel in the circumstances. It was, in substance, always to be respectful to Captain Delmar, but to keep at as great a distance from the great man as he did from his protegé, Ben Keene's putative son.

The incidental matters and conversations that occur, or are, as it were, interjected, are not the worst parts of the book. They are probably literal transcripts from Captain Marryat's rich memories.

One evening as I was leaning against one of the guns on the main deck, waiting for Cross to come out of the cabin, I was amused with the following conversation between a boatswain's mate and a fore-top man. I shall give it verbatim. They were talking of one that was dead, and after the boatswain's mate had said, "Well, he's in Heaven, poor fellow;" after a pause, the fore-top man said:

"I wonder, Bill, whether I shall ever go to Heaven?"

"Why not?" replied the boatswain's mate.

"Why, the parson says it's good works; now I certainly have been a pretty many times in action, and I have killed plenty of Frenchmen in my time."

"Well, that's sufficient, I should think; I hold my hopes upon just the same claims. I've cut down fifty Frenchmen in my life; and if that ain't good works, I don't know what is."

"I suppose Nelson's in Heaven?"

"Of course; if so be he wishes to be there, I should like to know who would keep him out, if he was determined on it. No, no; depend upon it, he walked slap in."

One of our hero's early adventures is striking from its boldness and completeness. It is also made a hinge upon which his fortunes turn. Percival was one evening tempted from a midshipman's duty by the bribe of some cakes to be found in a boat lying alongside, which he at first refused.

On second thoughts, I determined that I would have the cakes; so I descended by the stern ladder, and desiring the woman who was left in the boat to haul upon the rope, contrived to get into the boat.

"What is it you want, my dear?" said the woman.

"I come for some of those cakes under the stern sheets," replied I.

"Well, I'll soon rummage them out," said she, "and I hope you will let me slip on board when the boat is alongside. Mind, Sir, how you step, you'll smash all the pipes. Give me your hand. I'm an old sailor."

"I should not think so," replied I, looking at her. I could hardly make out her face, but her form was small, and, if an old sailor, she certainly was a very young woman.

We had a good many articles to remove before we could get at the cakes, which were under the stern sheets; and the boat rocked and tossed so violently with the sea which was running, that we were both on our knees for some little while before we obtained the basket: when we did, to our surprise, we found that the boat's painter, somehow or another, had loosened, and that during our search we had drifted nearly one hundred yards from the ship.

"Mercy on me!—why, we are adrift," exclaimed the woman. "What shall we do? It's no use hailing; they'll never hear us; look well round for any boat you may see."

"It is getting so dark that we shall not see far," replied I, not much liking our position. "Where shall we go to?"

"Go to!—clean out to St. Helen's, if the boat does not fill before we get there; and further than that too, if I mistake not, with this gale of wind. We may as well say our prayers, youngster, I can tell you."

"Can't we make sail upon her!" replied I. "Can't we try and pull on shore somewhere? Had we not better do that, and say our prayers afterwards?"

We cannot show how this strangely-assorted crew weathered the gale; nor how Peggy Pearson, awakening to all the horrors of her condition, became from that hour a reformed woman. The pair were picked up at last, and landed at Sheerness, whence Percival made his way to his mother at Chatham. He found the shop shut, the house in darkness, and he heard some one sobbing up stairs, and fancied it might be his mother for his own supposed loss. There was a light in the parlour, and a letter lay on the table in the handwriting of Captain Delmar. In announcing the death of her son—of "our child"—to the unfortunate mother, the letter contained complete evidence of Percival's paternity; and the keen youth, instantly securing it, vanished from the premises, choosing to be believed his own ghost, and resolving that neither the tears nor threats of his mother should ever prevail with him to give up this document, which he thenceforth wore round his neck, sewed in a piece of seal-skin. To his mother and aunt when accused he swore (by letter) that he had never been near Chatham. Thus years passed on, the midshipman keeping a sharp look out to the main chance—his personal advancement; troubled with no scruples of conscience, promptings of noble pride, or yearnings of affection, and making his way with everybody with whom he came in contact, by his ready tact and masterly presence of mind. Captain Delmar's ship was ordered to the West Indies; and Mr. Keene, while employed, at the early age of fifteen, in the confidential office of reconnoitring a pirate ship, got into a much worse scrape than his midnight adventure with Peggy Pearson: he found himself left alone on the midst of the ocean in a sinking vessel. After manfully exerting himself all day for self-preservation, he tells—

I made a supper off some raw ham, for the fire had been extinguished; and committing myself to the protection of Heaven, I lay down as the sun set, and from the fatigue of the day was soon in a sound sleep. I awoke about the middle of the night; the stars shone brightly, and there was but a slight ripple on the water. I thought of my mother, of my aunt Milly, of Captain Delmar, and I felt for the seal-skin pouch which was fastened round my neck. It was all safe. I calculated chances, and I made up my mind that I should be picked up by some vessel or another before long. I said to myself—"Why, I am better off now than I was when in the wherry with Peggy Pearson; I was saved then, why should I not be now?"—I felt no desponding, and lay down, and was soon fast asleep again. It was broad daylight when I awoke; I took my spy-glass, and looking round the horizon, discovered a vessel several miles off, standing towards me. This gave me fresh spirits. I made a raw breakfast, and drank plenty of water as before. The wind, which was very light, increased a little. The vessel came nearer, and I made her out to be a schooner. In two hours she was close to me, and I waved my hat, and hallooed as loud as I could. The schooner was full of men, and steered close to me; she was a beautiful craft, and, although the wind was so light, glided very fast through the water, and I could not help thinking that she was the pirate vessel, which the frigate had been in chase of. It appeared as if they intended to pass me, and I hallooed, "Schooner, a-hoy! Why don't you send a boat on board?"—I must say, that when the idea struck me that she was a pirate vessel, my heart almost failed me. Shortly afterwards the schooner rounded to, and lowered a boat, which pulled to the vessel. The boat's crew were all negroes. One of them said, "Jump in, you white boy; next jump he take be into the shark's mouth," continued the man, grinning, as he addressed himself to the others in the boat. I got into the boat, and they rowed on board the schooner. I did then think that I was done for; for what mercy could I expect, being a king's officer, from pirates, which the words of the negro convinced me that they were? As soon as I was alongside of the schooner, they ordered me to go up the side, which I did, with my spy-glass in my hand. I leaped from the gunwale down on the deck, and found myself on board of an armed vessel, with a crew wholly composed of blacks. I was rudely seized by two of them, who led me aft to where a negro stood apart from the rest. A more fierce, severe, determined-looking countenance I never beheld. He was gigantic in stature, and limbed like the Farnesian Hercules. "Well, boy, who are you?" said he, "and how came you on board of that vessel?" I told him in very few words. "Then you belonged to that frigate that chased us the day before yesterday?"—"Yes," replied I. —"What is her name?"—"The Calliope."—"She sails well," said he.—"Yes," replied I; "she is the fastest sailer on this station."—"That's all the information I want of you, boy: now you may go."—"Go where!" replied I.—"Go where!—go overboard, to be sure," replied he with a grin. My heart died within me; but I mustered courage to say, "Much obliged to you, Sir; but I'd rather stay where I am, if it's all the same to you." The other negroes laughed at this reply, and I felt a little confidence; at all events, their good-humour gave me courage, and I felt that being bold was my only chance. The negro captain looked at me for a time, as if considering, and at last said to the men, "Overboard with him."—"Good bye, Sir, you're very kind," said I; "but this is a capital spy-glass, and I leave it to you as a legacy;" and I went up to him and offered him my spy-glass. Merciful Heaven! how my heart beat against my ribs when I did this. The negro captain took the glass, and looked through it. "It is a good glass," said he, as he removed it from his eyes. It was poor Green's spy-glass, which he had given me for showing him the mason's signs. "Well, white boy, I accept your present, and now good bye."—"Good bye, Sir. Do me one kindness in return," said I very gravely, for I felt my hour was come.—"And what is that?" replied the negro.—"Tie a shot to my heels, that I may sink quickly; it wont take them long."—"You don't ask me to spare your life, then?" replied the negro.—"He de very first white dat not ask it," said one of the negroes.—"Dat really for true," said another.—"Yes, by gum," replied a third. Oh, how I wished to know what to say at that moment! The observations of the negroes made me imagine that I had better not ask for it; and yet how I clung to life. It was an awful moment—I felt as if I had lived a year in a few minutes. For a second or two I felt faint and giddy—I drew a long breath and revived.—"You don't answer me, boy," said the negro captain.—"Why should I ask when I feel certain to be refused? If you will give me my life, I will thank you: I don't particularly wish to die, I assure you."—"I have taken an oath never to spare a white man. For once I am sorry that I cannot break my oath."—"If that is all, I am a boy, and not a man," replied I. "Keep me till I grow bigger."—"By jolly, aptain, that very well said. Keep him, captain," said ne of the negroes.—"Yes, captain," replied another; keep him to tend your cabin. Very proper you have hite slave boy."—The negro captain for some time ade no reply; he appeared to be in deep thought; at st he said,—"Boy, you have saved your life: you may ank yourself, and not me. Prossa, let him be taken be- w; give him a frock and trowsers, and throw that infernal ress overboard, or I may change my resolution."—The egro who was addressed, and who wore a sort of uni- rm as an officer—which he was, being second mate— d me below, nothing loath, I can assure my readers. Vhen I was between decks, I sat down upon a chest, y head swam, and I fainted. The shock had been too owerful for a lad of my age. They brought water and ecovered me. When I revived, I felt that I might ave lost in their good opinion by thus showing my weak- ess; and I had sufficient presence of mind to ask for omething to eat. This deceived them; they said to one nother that I must have been on board that vessel for wo days without food, and of course I did not deny it. hey brought me some meat and some grog. I ate and rank a little. They then took off my uniform, and ut on me a check frock and white trowsers; after which, said I wished to lie down a little, and they left me to leep on the chest where I had been seated. I pre- nded to sleep, although I could not; and I found out y their conversation that I gained the good-will not nly of the crew, but of the captain, by my behaviour. considered that I had gained my life, at least for the resent; but what security could I have in such company? fter an hour or two, I felt quite recovered, and I thought advisable to go on deck. I did so, and went right aft to he negro captain, and stood before him. "Well, boy," aid he, "why do you come to me?"—"You gave me my fe; you're the greatest friend I have here, so I come to ou. Can I do anything?"—"Yes; you may assist in he cabin, if your white blood does not curdle at the idea f attending on a black man."—"Not at all. I will do nything for them who are kind to me, as you have been." —"And think it no disgrace?"—"Not the least. Is it disgrace to be grateful?"—The reader will observe ow particularly judicious my replies were, although ut fifteen years old. My dangerous position had called orth the reflection and caution of manhood.—"Go down nto the cabin; you may amuse yourself till I come."— obeyed this order. The cabin was fitted up equal o most yachts, with Spanish mahogany and gold mould- ngs; a beaufet full of silver (there was no glass) occupied early one-half of it; even the plates and dishes were f the same material. Silver candelabras hung down rom the middle of the beams; a variety of swords, pis- ols, and other weapons, were fixed up against the bulk- ead; a small bookcase, chiefly of Spanish books, occu- ied the after-bulkhead, and the portraits of several hite females filled up the intervals; a large table in he centre, a stand full of charts, half a dozen boxes of igars, and two most luxuriant sofas, completed the fur- iture. A door from the starboard side led, I presumed, o the state-room, where the captain slept, but I did not enture to open it. I surveyed all this magnificence, ondering who this personage could be; and more still, ow it was that the whole of the crew were, as well as he captain, of the negro race. We had heard that the irate we were in search of was a well-known character —a Spaniard—who went by the name of Chico, and that is crew consisted of Americans, English, and Spaniards. hat this was the vessel, I knew, from the conversation f the men, when I was below, for they called her the tella. Now, it appeared that the vessel had changed asters; the crew were chiefly Spanish negroes, or other egroes who spoke Spanish, but some of them spoke nglish, and a few words of Spanish; these I pre- umed were American or English runaways. But he captain—his language was as correct as my own; panish he spoke fluently, for I heard him giving orders that language while I was in the cabin; neither was flat-nosed, like the majority. Had he been white, his atures would have been considered regular, although ere was a fierceness about them at times, which was terrible to look at. Well, thought I, if I live and do well, I shall know more about it; yes, if I live. I wish I was on the quarter-deck of the Calliope, even as Tom- my Dott was, with his pockets stuffed full of the pur- ser's raisins, and looking like a fool and a rogue at the same time. I had been down in the cabin about half an hour, when the negro captain made his appearance.— "Well," said he, "I suppose you would as soon see the devil as me—eh, boy?"—"No, indeed," replied I, laughing—for I had quite recovered my confidence— "for you were about to send me to the devil, and I feel most happy that I still remain with you."—"You're exactly the cut of boy I like," replied he, smiling. "How I wish that you were black—I detest your co- lour."—"I have no objection to black my face, if you wish it," replied I: "its all the same to me what colour I am."—"How old are you?"—"I was fifteen a few months back."—"How long have you been to sea?"— "About eighteen months."—He then asked me a great many more questions, about the captain, the officers, the ship, and myself, to all of which I answered in a guarded way. A negro brought down his supper; it was hot, and very savoury; without any order on his part, I immediately attended upon him during his meal. He told the negro not to wait, and conversed with me dur- ing the time that he was eating; at last, he told me how he had doubled the frigate during the night. I then remarked that we had been informed that the ves- sel was called the Stella, that the Captain's name was Chico, and the crew were composed of white men of dif- ferent nations.—"A month or two ago, it was the case," replied the captain. "Now I have done, and you may clear away," continued he, rising from his chair, and throwing himself down on one of the sofas. "Stop; you are hungry, I don't doubt; you can sit down and eat your supper, and remove the things afterwards."—I did as he told me: it was the first time in my life I had supped off massive plate—but I was in strange com- pany; however, it did not spoil my appetite, and I did not forget to drink a goblet of wine by way of washing down my repast.—"Thank you, Sir," said I, rising, and then performing my office of attendant.—At his order I rang the bell for the negro who assisted me in clearing away, and then went out with the remains of the supper.—"Am I to stay or go?" said I, respect- fully.—"You may go now. Find the man who came in just now—José he is called; tell him to give you some- thing to sleep upon."—"Good night, Sir," said I.— "Good night, boy."

Master Keene, thanks to his ready wit, had, as usual, fallen upon his feet, even in the tiger's den. But he judged it not wise needlessly to inflame the tiger's rage. He therefore got his skin stained black, and changed his name to Cato. His master, the negro captain, could now look upon him with patience; and he soon came to take pleasure in conversing with him, and at last told him his own wild history, which, to the rest of the crew, was a mystery, as it must remain to our readers. Suffice it that the negro captain's hatred of the whites, and his ferocious cruelty to the slavers whom he captured, exceed anything in the history of the Buccaneers. Other captives he only drowned, the crews of the slavers were tortured with hellish cruelty and ingenuity.

Though soon tolerably well contented where he was so comfortable, Master Keene had neither lost the desire nor the hope of regaining his freedom and rejoining his ship; and one day that the negro Captain landed to go to Havannah, to gather the intelligence which was to direct his next cruise, his servant nearly escaped, by falling down a ravine into a secret and dangerous path, fre- quented only by the pirates, and which he had watched his captain take.

I had tumbled into the secret path that I had been in search of. Delighted with this discovery, I now set off with great spirit, and in half an hour found myself on the other side of the hill which formed the ravine, and looking down upon an expanse of country in the interior. Being very tired, I sat down, that I might recover my strength before I continued my journey.

I am free at last, thought I, and my memory wandered back to my mother, my ship, and my captain—old Culpepper, Tommy Dott, and Bob Cross. I shall see them all, I thought, and what a story I shall have to tell. As soon as I had rested myself, and recovered my breath, I thought I might as well start.

I had not proceeded more than a hundred yards before I thought I heard a noise, as if some one was approaching. I listened—I felt sure that such was the case, and I also heard the deep baying of a hound. The noise increased rapidly—it was that of one forcing his way through the brushwood, which covered the side of the hill.

In a minute afterwards I perceived a man coming up the hill at a swift pace, directly towards me. As he approached, I could almost swear that it was Vincent, the negro captain; but when within ten yards of me, I perceived him turn round and flourish his sabre in the air, while, at the same time, three large bloodhounds sprang at him. One fell by the blow of his sabre; but the other two flew at his throat, and fastened on him, tearing him to the ground, and holding him, in spite of all his struggling and his immense strength.

I recollected my pistols; I cocked them, ran up, and putting one to the head of the nearest dog, blew out its brains. I was equally successful with the other; they both lay dead by his side, and Vincent was released.

He started up. "It is me, Cato," said I.

"Cato!" replied he; "but there is not a moment to be lost. I understand it all." He seized me by the arm, and dragged me with him to the entrance of the narrow pass, and as soon as we came in, he rolled three large rocks, which had evidently been used for such purpose before, so as completely to block up the entrance.

"There," said he, leaning back completely exhausted, "be quiet, Cato. We are safe now; they will be on the top of the hill directly."

We remained where we were about ten minutes, when we heard voices not very far from us. They were the pursuers of the negro captain, who were evidently baffled. After a time the sounds receded from us, and we heard them no more. Vincent then spoke:—

"You were escaping, Cato."

"I had escaped," replied I; "I told you that I would."

"Strange that you should have discovered the path; did any one betray it to you?"

"No one," replied I; and I then told him how I had fallen into it.

"Well, you have returned all obligations, and more than ever you owed me," said he: "you have saved my life this time, and that when all chance was over."

"Then," replied I, "although I shall be very sorry to part with you, give me that liberty which I had gained, and which I lost in defending you from the dogs."

"I would have let you go then, Cato," replied he, "but your life would have been sacrificed. My pursuers would have hurried you to prison before you could have explained who you were: you forget your colour is changed. They were not seeking me, but a runaway slave, and the bloodhounds came upon my track. Those white men show no mercy; they have more pleasure in seeing a runaway slave torn to pieces by those dogs than in recovering possession of him. It is a sort of fox chase to them," continued he, grating his teeth after he had said so. "Cato, I will give you your liberty, if you wish it, and I know you do wish it, as soon as I can with any prudence; that I promise you, and you know that I will keep my word."

"I am quite satisfied," replied I.

"And do you promise me that you will not attempt to escape a second time?"

"I promise you that I will not," replied I.

Vincent was brooding dreadful vengeance. A schooner came in sight, bound for Curaçoa, on board of which was a rich Dutch planter, whose property it was, with his only child, a beautiful little girl, the predestined bride of our hero. Captain Marryat delights in little loves. The boldness and promptitude—the moral influence of Percival, preserved the life of father and child, and saved himself; and after a scene, which will tell admirably when the novel comes to be dramatized for the Minor Theatres, he is rescued by an English ship of war, after a desperate engagement, which, like the above scenes, is described with great animation. This is the close of the fight, after the tide of victory had set in for the English.

I ran up the ladder to see what had happened. It appeared, that as the Stella was crossing the bows of the Arrow, the latter had, as a last chance, thrown up in the wind, and discharged her whole broadside into us: two shots had struck our mainmast, which had fallen by the board. I perceived at once that the Stella's chance was over: nothing could save her; she might resist the schooner, but could not escape the frigate.

I ran down below, and went into the cabin; I was afraid that the negroes might perceive the joy in my countenance. I heard the angry voice of the negro captain; I heard him stamping with rage, and I thanked God that I was not by his side. The wreck of the mast was soon cleared away. I heard him address his negroes, point out to them that it was better to die like men at the guns, than swing at the yard-arm like dogs. Some of them came down and took on deck a quarter-cask of spirits, which was plentifully supplied to all.

The English schooner had borne down upon us, and the action now commenced at pistol-shot. Never shall I forget what took place for nearly three-quarters of an hour; the negroes, most of them intoxicated, fought with rage and fury indescribable; their shouts, their screams, their cursing and blasphemy, mingled with the loud report of the guns, the crashing of the spars and bulwarks, the occasional cry of the wounded, and the powerful voice of Vincent. It was terrific between decks; the smoke was so thick, that those who came down for the powder could not see, but felt their way to the screen. Every two seconds, I heard the men come aft, toss off the can of liquor, and throw it on the deck, when they went to resume their labour at their guns.

At the end of the time I have mentioned, the shot flew from to leeward, as well as from to windward: the frigate had got within range, and was pouring in her broadside; still the firing and the shouting on the deck of the Stella continued, but the voices were fewer; and as the firing of the frigate became more severe, they became fainter and fainter; and at last but an occasional gun was fired from our decks.

I became so uneasy, that I could remain where I was no longer; I went forward on the lower deck again, and tumbling over the wounded and the dead, I crept up the fore-ladder. I looked over the combings of the hatchway. The decks were clear of smoke, for not a gun was being fired. Merciful Heaven! what a scene of slaughter! Many of the guns were dismantled, and the decks were strewed with the splinters and plankings of the gunwale, broken spars, and negroes lying dead, or drunk, in all directions; some cut and torn to pieces, others whole, but mixed up with the fragments of other bodies: such a scene of blood I have never since witnessed. Out of the whole crew I do not think there were twenty men left unhurt, and these were leaning or lying down, exhausted with fatigue or overcome with liquor, on various parts of the deck.

The fighting was over; there was not one man at his gun; and of those who remained still alive, one or two fell, while I was looking up, from the shot, which continued every minute to pierce the bulwarks. Where was Vincent? I dare not go aft to see. I dare not venture to meet his eye. I dived down below again, and returned aft to the cabin ; there was no more demand for powder ; not a soul was to be seen abaft. Suddenly the after-hatchway grating was thrown off ; I heard some one descend; I knew it was the hurried tread of the negro captain. It was so dark, and the cabin so full of smoke, that, coming from the light, he did not perceive me, although I could distinguish him. He was evidently badly wounded, and tottered in his walk : he came into the cabin, put his hand to his girdle, and felt for his pistol, and then he commenced pulling down the screen, which was between him and the magazine. His intentions were evident; which were to blow up the vessel.

I felt that I had not a moment to lose. I dashed past him, ran up the ladder, sprung aft to the taffrail, and dashed over the stern into the sea. I was still beneath the surface, having not yet risen from my plunge, when I heard and felt the explosion—felt it, indeed, so powerfully, that it almost took away my senses ; so great was the shock, even when I was under the water, that I was almost insensible. I have a faint recollection of being drawn down by the vortex of the sinking vessel, and scrambling my way to the surface of the water, amidst fragments of timbers and whirling bodies. When I recovered myself, I found that I was clinging to a portion of the wreck, in a sort of patch, as it were, upon the deep blue water, dark as ink, and strewed with splintered fragments.

There I remained some minutes, during which time I gained my recollection : I looked around and perceived the Arrow schooner, lying about one hundred yards off, totally dismantled, and my own frigate about a quarter of a mile to leeward, as bright and as fresh as if she had just been refitted. I observed a signal, made by the Calliope to the schooner, which was answered.

Percival was picked up and thrown into the bottom of the boat.

I scrambled on my feet, and would have gone aft, when the midshipman of the boat said to the men, " Pass that cursed young pirate forward; don't let him come aft here."

Oh, ho, Mr. Lascelles, thinks I, so you don't know me; you shall know me by and by. I quite forgot that I was stained black, till one of the men, who seized me by the collar to pass me forward, said, " Hand along the nigger. He 's a young one for the gallows anyhow."

They handed me forward, and I did not choose to say who I was. My love of fun returned the moment that I was again with my shipmates. After looking well round, and ascertaining that I was the only one left alive, they pulled back to the frigate; and the midshipman went up to report. I was handed up the side, and remained at the break of the gangway, while the captain and first lieutenant were talking with Mr. Lascelles; during which Mr. Tommy Dott came up to me, and, putting his finger to his left ear, gave a cluck with his tongue, as much as to say, " You'll be hanged, my good fellow."

I could not help giving the first masons'-sign which I taught to Mr. Green, in return for Tommy's communication; to wit, putting my thumb to my nose, and extending my finger out towards him; at which Tommy Dott expressed much indignation, and called me a precious impudent varmin. The men who were near us laughed, and said that I was game at all events. No one knew me; for not only was my face well stained, but I was covered from head to foot with a solution of salt water and gunpowder, which made me still more indistinguishable.

I had remained at the gangway about two minutes, when the first lieutenant said, " Bring the prisoner here."

I immediately went aft; and as soon as I was standing before Captain Delmar and the first lieutenant, (and behind were all the officers, anxious to hear what I had to disclose,) I put my hand to my head, having no hat, as may be supposed, and said, "Come on board, Sir," reporting myself, as is usually the custom of officers when they return from leave or duty.

" Good Heavens ! that voice !—why, who are you ?" cried Captain Delmar, starting back a pace.

" Mr. Keene, Sir," replied I, again putting my hand to my head.

Bob Cross, who was, with many of the seamen, close to me, quite forgetting etiquette, ran up and caught me round the waist, looking me full in the face : " It is him, Sir ; it is him ! Huzzah ! huzzah !" and all the seamen joined in the huzzahs, which were, however, mingled with a great deal of laughter.

When Percival found himself alone with his friend Bob Cross,—there was good news for him.

" I saw the captain's eyes wink more than once when speaking of you, and the first lieutenant was always telling the other mids that he had not one worth his salt, now that you were gone. And now that you have come back and gained so much credit for what has passed, I do really think that the captain is proud of you. I overheard a little conversation between the captain and first lieutenant the day you came on board, after you had been in the cabin telling your adventures ; and all that I can say is, that the game is in your own hands if you only play your cards well, and never let Captain Delmar have the least idea that you know that you have such claims upon him."

Mr. Keene continued to make his own way ; keeping, as the Scotch say, " a calm sough," and turning every little incident and fair occasion handsomely to account. He was appointed lieutenant as early as the rules of the service permitted ; but to this promotion his professional gallantry and good conduct entitled him ; and he was made honourable mention of in the Gazette, to the great delight of his fond mother, whom, on his ship being sent into dock, he visited at Chatham, though not with the genial and natural feelings which should have led him to his earliest and most devoted friend, and to the home of his infancy.

I had made up my mind how to act. I was no longer a child, but a man in reflection as well as appearance.

I arrived, and hastened to the house from which I had escaped so mysteriously the last time I was in it. My mother threw herself into my arms, embracing me, and then looking at me with surprise and pleasure. Three years and a half had changed me—she hardly knew me, for her association of ideas had still pictured me as the smart stripling whom she had, with so much anguish, consigned into the hands of Bob Cross. She was proud of me : my adventures, my dangers, my conduct, and my honourable mention in the Gazette, were all known to her, and she had been evidently congratulated by many upon my successful career. . . . . The first two or three days were devoted to narratives, communications, explanations, and admirations, as is usually the case after so long an absence ; after which, we quietly settled down in the relative positions of mother and son, and she assumed, or rather would have assumed, her control over me, but this was not my wish. I had made up my mind that, although a clever woman, I must in future control her ; and I took the first opportunity of a long tête-à-tête, to let her know that such was my intention.

Speaking of Captain Delmar, I at once told her that I knew he was my father, and that I had his own handwriting to prove it. She denied it at first; but I told her that all denial was useless, that I had possession of the letter he had written to her upon my supposed death; and that it was no ghost, but I, who had frightened my grandmother.

This was my first blow, and a heavy one, to my poor mother ; for what woman can bear to be humiliated by her offspring being acquainted with her indiscretion ? I loved my mother, and would fain have spared her this pang, had it not been that all my future plans were based upon this one point, and it was necessary she should aid and abet me in them.

My poor mother was bowed to the earth when she found that it was in vain to deny my parentage : she covered her face with her hands in deep shame before her child; but I consoled, and caressed, and told her

(what I really felt) that I was indebted to her for not being the son of a private marine; that, at all events, I had noble blood in my veins, and would prove myself worthy of my descent, whether it were acknowledged or not; but from that hour I took the command over her—from that hour it was I that dictated, and her authority as a parent was gone for ever.

The dutiful and affectionate son's next step was to compel his mother to give up her business, retire into a distant part of the country, and report herself dead, in the hope of removing one imagined obstruction to Captain Delmar's acknowledging him as his son. The humbled mother readily consented to her own civil death, and in a happy moment the desired letter announcing the event came to hand. Master Keene did not hold the opinion of Rousseau, that there is more true honour in being the wife of a peasant than the mistress of a prince; the legitimate son of a peasant than the bastard of a king.

I felt happy that this letter to the captain arrived at such a propitious time, as I knew that the announcement of my mother's death would be a great point in my favour. That it ought not to have been, I confess; but I knew whom I had to deal with: the captain was ashamed of his intimacy, and the claims of my mother upon him, but not so much ashamed of me; and, now that she was removed, probably he might not be at all ashamed. My mother was no relation, and below him; I was his own flesh and blood, and half ennobled by so being.

By a series of important and useful personal services most dexterously performed, and by the general modesty of his deportment towards his proud patron, Percival made way to his aristocratic father's heart, though he still fell far short of the desired point,—being acknowledged, and allowed to assume the proud name of Delmar. In the course of years, the stately Captain Delmar becomes somewhat more amiable in his personal character, and much more respectable in his professional capacity; and the internal struggles between his natural feelings and his conventional pride become interesting in their developement. While cruising in the West Indies, Lieutenant Keene performed several brilliant achievements, and stood high in favour with the Admiral on the station, who, without solicitation, promoted him. In the course of his cruise he visited the Dutch planter whom he had rescued from the Negro Pirate, and found the little Minnie grown into a beautiful girl of fifteen, and her father overflowing with gratitude. Of the West India adventures we shall give one graphic specimen, both characteristic of manners, and of the practical jokes with which the work abounds. The scene is Jamaica:—

I lodged at a sort of hôtel, kept by a mulatto woman of the name of Crissobella, as the negroes termed her, originally Christobella. She was of Spanish blood by the father's side, and had come down from the Havannah. She was very portly; very proud and dignified in her carriage, and demanded as much attention from her lodgers as a lady would who had received us as her guests; so that, to gain and retain admittance into her hostelry, it was necessary not only to pay a large bill, but compliments to an equal amount. She was very rich, possessed numerous slaves, and was perfectly independant of keeping a hôtel. . . . . The living was the same as at a boarding-house. Breakfast was ready in the large hall by nine o'clock, and remained there until every one had come down at their own hour. Dinner was always ready at five o'clock, and then Crissobella presided at the table. She admitted civilians, army officers, and navy, down to midshipmen; but warrant officers and captains of merchant vessels were considered too low. On the whole, it was a very pleasant establishment, as the private rooms were well furnished, the slaves numerous, and the attendance very good. Considering the price of most eatables on that island, it could not be considered as very dear, although the wines, &c., made up a formidable bill at the end of the month.

This kind of exclusiveness on the part of Signora Crissobella made the hôtel quite the fashion, and certainly it was by far the best in the town. The inmates of it at this time were, besides me, Lieut. Thomas Dott and Lieut. William Maxwell, both appointed to the Diligente; three or four young civilians, on mercantile speculations from New York; three midshipmen, who had been left behind on account of fever, and who were promising fair, by the life they were now leading, to be very soon sent to the hospital again; and one or two planters from the other islands. The latter and I were very well behaved; but the civilians were noisy, drinking and smoking from morning till night. The midshipmen were equally troublesome; and as for the new-made lieutenants, they were so authoritative and so disagreeable, and gave themselves such consequential airs, that Mammy Crissobella, as the slaves called her, was quite indignant—she had never had such a disorderly set in her house. . . . . At last our hostess would stand their behaviour no longer, and ordered them all to leave the hôtel, sending in their bills; but they all were unanimous in declaring that they would not go, and it was not very easy to use force on such occasions. I tried all I could to make matters right, but my efforts were of little avail. At last Mammy Crissobella became quite furious. She did not make any alteration in the meals, as that would be punishing all of us; but she refused wine and spirits; this they did not care for, as they sent for it elsewhere by their own servants, and there was nothing but noise and confusion all day long. Mammy often came to appeal to me, and wished to go to the governor, but I persuaded her not to do so; and the mutiny continued, and every day there was nothing but altercation at the meals.

"So help me God, gemmen, you no gemmen. You make wish me dead, dat you do. I tak obeah water some day. I not live like this," said Mammy Crissobella. "I take pepper-pot—I kill myself."—"Pray don't do that," replied Tommy Dott; we shall be put to the expense of mourning."—"And I shall weep my eyes out," continued one of the mercantile gentlemen.—"Weep your eyes out—is that all? I shall blow my brains out," said another.—"And I will lie down on your grave and die," said the third.—"Dat all very well, gemmen; you say dat and laugh—but I no slave. 'Pose I not get you out my house, I ab vengeance: now I tell you, so you look to that. Yes," continued Mammy Crissobella, striking the table with her fist, "I ab revenge."—"I have been thinking," said one of the mids, "what I shall do if Mammy Crissobella takes pepper-pot; I shall marry Leila, and keep the hôtel. Mammy, you'll leave me the plate and furniture."

Leila was the head female slave; a very well-featured young mulatto girl, and a great favourite, as she was always laughing, always in good humour, and very kind and attentive. At this remark Leila laughed, and Mammy Crissobella, who observed her showing her white teeth, cried out, "You laugh, you huzzy; what you laugh for, Leila? Get away—get out of room. I give you nice flogging by-by. You dare laugh—you take side against me, you nigger!"

I must here observe that Mammy Crisobella had been closeted with me for some time previous to this scene, and that Leila and the two planters were in the secret: this was, of course, unknown, and the hostess's anger appeared now to be extended towards me and the two planters, with whom she had been on good terms.

Shortly afterwards Mammy rose and left the room, and then I spoke to the party, and told them that they were driving the poor woman to extremities. The planters agreed with me, and we argued the case with them, but he majority were, of course, against us, and the young merchants appeared to be very much inclined to be personal with me. At last I replied, "Very well, gentlemen —as you please; but as I happen to be well known both o the admiral and governor, I give you fair warning, hat if this continues much longer, I will report the ffair. I should be very sorry to do so; but the house s now very uncomfortable, and you have no right to emain when the landlady insists upen your going."

At this reply of mine, the naval portion of the guests were silent, but the civilians more insolent than before. I did not wish to come to open war, so I said nothing nore, and left the table. After I was gone, the refractory parties made more noise than ever. Just before the linner hour on the following day, Mammy Crissobella ent a circular round to the young men, stating that she ould not receive them at dinner. They all laughed, and went down to table as before. The dinner was better han usual, and they complimented Mammy upon it. Mammy, who had taken her seat with a scowl on her brow, and had not spoken a word, merely bowed her head in reply to their observations.

Dinner was over, and then Mammy desired Leila to bring her a goblet which was on the sideboard, and a small white jug which was in the buffet. She appeared much distressed, and hesitated a good deal, putting the goblet to her lips, and then putting it down on the table without tasting it. This conduct induced us all to look seriously at her. At last she took it up, sighed deeply, and drank the whole off at a draught. For a few seconds she held her hand over her forehead, with her elbows resting on the table. At last she looked up and said, "Gemmen, I got a little speech to make—I very sorry dat I not drink your health; but it no use—dat why you see me drink; I tell plenty time you make me mad—you make me drink obeah water—make me kill myself. Now I ab done it—I drink pison water just now. In two hour I dead woman."

At this communication, the truth of which appeared confirmed by the woman's behaviour, all the company started from their chairs.

"Gemmen, I dare say you all very sorry; you be more sorry by-and-by. Captain, I beg your pardon; Mr. W. ——, Mr. G., (the two planters), I beg your pardon; I not mean hurt you, but could not help it. Now I tell all company, all drink the pison water—because I not like die on the jibbit, I drink de pison water—Gemmen, your dinner all pison, and you all pisoned. Yes, all pisoned," cried Mammy Crissobella at the highest pitch of her voice, and rushing out of the room.

At this announcement, I started from my chair and clasped my hands, as if in agony. I looked round me—never did I witness such a variety of horror as was expressed in the different faces at the hôtel.

The sequel may be anticipated; but we shall only take the case of Mr. Dott.

At daylight I went into Mr. Dott's room with the surgeon, to whom I had confided the secret. Tommy was a miserable object.

"Thank heaven! here is one still alive," said the surgeon to me.—"Oh! Captain Keene," said Tommy; "I'm glad to see that you are so well; but you had the remedy given you long before we had."—"Yes," replied I, "it was given me in good time; but I hope it was not too late with you."—"I feel very bad," replied Tommy. "Doctor, do you think I shall live?"—The doctor felt his pulse, and looked very grave; at last he said, "If you get over the next twelve hours I think you may."—"How many are dead?" inquired Tommy.—"I don't know; you are the first that I have visited; it's a shocking business."—"I've been thinking that we were very wrong," said Tommy; "we ought not to have driven the poor woman to desperation. If I do recover, her death will be on my conscience."—"I'm glad to hear you say that, Tommy," replied I; "but the doctor says you must remain very quiet, and therefore I shall leave you. Good-by; I will see you again this evening."—"Good-by, Sir, and I hope you'll forgive me for not having been so respectful as I should have been."—"Yes, yes, Tommy; we have been friends too long for that."

Mammy Crissobella's dose had certainly put an end to all Tommy's spirit of resistance. All the others who had been victims to our plot were kept in the dark as to the real facts, and as soon as they were able to be moved, paid their bills to Leila and left the house.

On the third day, Tommy Dott and Mr. Maxwell went on board, imagining that they had had a miraculous escape, and the two old planters and I were left the only inmates of the house to welcome the resurrection of Mammy Crissobella, who was again as busy as before. She said to me, "Massa Keene, I really under great obligation to you; suppose you want two, three hundred, five hundred pounds, very much at your service; never mind pay back."

Mammy Crissobella obtained great renown for her stratagem; and lucky Massa Keene had no bill to pay. A kiss to the old lady was receipt in full.

About this time, Captain Delmar's noble brother died, and he became, in consequence, Lord de Versely, and left the service, though he did not withdraw his patronage from his name-son. Considering the relative position of the interlocutors, the following scene becomes almost farcical. On returning from the West Indies, Captain Keene went to London, and waited upon his patron. "I sent up my card.

I was immediately ushered up, and found myself in his presence. Lord de Versely rose from his sofa and took my hand. "Keene, I am very glad to see you. I am proud that an élève of mine should have done me so much credit. You have gained all your rank in the service by your own merit and exertions."

"Not quite all, my Lord," replied I.

"Yes, all; for you are certain of your next step—they cannot well refuse it to you."

"They will not refuse your lordship, I have no doubt," replied I.

"Sit down, Keene; we will have a little conversation, and then we will go to the Admiralty."

His lordship then asked me many questions relative to what had passed, and I entered into more detail than I had done in my letters. After an hour's conversation carried on by him in so friendly, I may almost say affectionate, a style, as to make my heart bound with delight, the carriage was announced, and I accompanied his lordship down to the Admiralty. His lordship sent up his card, and was requested immediately to go up stairs. He desired me to follow him, and as soon as we were in the presence of the first lord, and he and Lord de Versely had shaken hands, Lord de Versely said, "Allow me to introduce to you Captain Keene, whose name, at least, you have often heard of lately. I have brought him with me because he is a follower of mine; he entered the service under my protection, and continued with me until his conduct gave him his promotion. I have taken this opportunity of introducing him, to assure your lordship, that during the whole time that he served with me as midshipman, his gallantry was quite as conspicuous as it has been since."

The first lord took me by the hand and complimented me on my conduct.

"Captain Keene has strong claims, my Lord; what can we do now for him?"

"I trust you will acknowledge that Captain Keene has earned his post rank, my Lord," replied Lord de Versely, "and I shall take it as a particular favour to myself if your lordship would appoint him to a frigate, and give him an opportunity of doing credit to your lordship's patronage."

The request was granted of course; and Percival had now but one wish, "What would I give to bear the name of one I so love and respect! Oh that I were a Delmar!" There was no thought of a Mason, and his only dread was, lest his deception, regarding the death of his poor mother, might be found out by his noble father. These heartless without damming, for more than an imperceptible instant, the sweeping torrent of his speech.

It belongs to the scholars, in their courses, to say grace publicly, before and after dinner, in the hall; and when Billy Sheridan's turn came, it would make your ears tingle, to hear the stately Latin pouring like muffled thunder out of his mouth, as he proclaimed the thanksgiving already spoken of, to our virgin Foundress, as well as to the other benefactors, by whom so noble a foundation of prime beef and mutton had been perpetuated,

Ad natos natorum, et qui nascentur ab illis.

That was a thing worth hearing more than once in your academic career. But happier man was his dole, to whom our well-lined scholar would smilingly intimate, that he had lemons and sugar, whisky and hot water, which only waited for a knot of honest fellows to compound them into punch. To be invited, after Commons, to a carouse at his three-legged table, was a sort of stamp upon your character for life;—an imprimatur, that carried you through as many editions of good fellowship, as heart of man could desire. For Billy was a fellow of infinite discrimination, and knew a bee from a blockhead. He chose his companions for their wit or their worth; and seldom was he wrong in his calculation of either.

His cœnaculum was "bosom'd high" among the slates, on the top of number twenty-five; and consequently, as the learned world must know, commanded a view of the Park, with its broad walks, and the dreary swamp beyond it. There would Billy shine—but not alone—"in his glory," high above the world and its dull formalities.

His table, as I before remarked, had but three legs, the absent member being well supplied with a column of books, that tapered up, from Ainsworth's large quarto Dictionary at the base, to Burlemaqui's compact little abridgment of Natural Law, at the summit.

His supellex was varied, but somewhat scanty; so that intimate friends were sometimes requested to bring their own glasses, if they did not wish to drink out of delft ware. Of spoons there was no lack; for a dealer in that sort of bijouterie frequented the Post-office yard in College Green, all the day long, crying, "Two spoons for a ha'penny." I shall never forget the stare of aristocratic amazement with which a member of the noble house of Westenra eyed our Amphitryon, one evening, as he flung down three small coppers upon the table, and ordered that most popular of skips, Foly, to step out for "half-a-dozen dessert spoons!"

Having named Foly and his occupation, an explanatory note about both may not be out of place. There is attached to colleges and halls a person more useful than ornamental, and better known than paid, whom Oxonians name Gyp, from his supposed moral affinity to a vulture (γύψ). The same is in Dublin denominated a Skip, because of the activity which is an indispensable item in his qualifications. He is a universal laquais de place—duty as well as interest obliging him to serve as many masters as will employ him. But this is no easy matter; for the students who employ skips, are dispersed, without regard to classification, through the various buildings and floors (or, as your gentes Scoticæ would say, flats) of this most straggling and extensive community; whence it happens that the skip, "whom many masters share," leads the most discursive life of any animal that moves upon two legs. He constitutes, probably, the identical exception which Sir Boyle Roche had in his mind's eye, when he broached his famous problem, that "a man cannot be in two places at once, barring he is a bird." The skip, or according to the Oxford etymology, the man-vulture, is not fit for his calling, who cannot time his business so as to be present simultaneously at several places. He must be at Kinahan's on Carlisle Bridge, for Mr. Moriarty's half-pound of tea, at the very moment that Sir Looby, in the Botany Bay Square, requires his three eggs; and the Billy Sheridan of the day is singing out, like Stentor, from the tiles and skylights of a coctile edifice beside the library, for the "lazy rascal!"

To calls like these was Foly subject at all hours, and equal in all emergencies. Without the wings or light proportions of a Mercury, he shuffled his way from one set of chambers to another, and was in time everywhere. But his bodily activity, though in itself unparalleled, was the least valuable of his many serviceable qualities. Foly had a mind, which neither time nor space could circumscribe; and with that he was often promoting your interests, while his feet were running on another man's errand, or his hands brushing another man's coat. If *the Dean's porter required your presence before that minister of justice, to account for the irregularity of the past night, Foly was at your elbow with his counsel, and his ready wit supplied excuses always new and plausible. "Leave me alone," he would say, "to bother the Dane." If the milkman got sulky, and threatened to stop the supplies, who could wheedle another month's credit out of him like Foly? And when your college-woman pledged the table-cloth, or stole your books, where was the policeman half so quick to bring the pawnbroker "to raison," or to place your hand on the precise stall in Anglesey Street, where the missing volumes were ranged and ticketed?

But, alas! the glory of the world passes away. This inimitable attendant has quitted the proper scene of his renown. His occupation is gone. His Folyage has fallen into the sere: he is now sixteen stone weight, and can skip no longer. Foly has declined into the keeper of a comfortable lodging-house in Wicklow Street, much frequented by fat, elderly gentlemen from the country, *ex*rates, "and else," who find him in his present elevation the same kind-hearted, devoted, and humble minister of their occasions that he was in his fourth lustrum; and there do many delight to talk with him about old times, and particularly of the evenings stolen from care, in that cloud-capt apartment that lifted Billy Sheridan's head to the storm.

"And sure enough"—as honest Foly ejaculates with an emphatic sigh that shakes his "Fourations,"—"Sure enough, them was the times!" have known, on such occasions, my friend Billy o invite to his jovial tripod, some who are now at he very top of their professions, both in Church nd Law, and others—perhaps their superiors—who have long since been mingled with the mighty ead. And they would all come, lightly bound-ng—three steps at a stride—up those steep and earisome flights of stairs, to sit round that rickety able and quaff whisky-punch out of broken tea-cups.

* The authority of the junior Dean here is similar to that of the Proctor at Oxford.

The survivors of those pleasant orgies are, for he most part, now able to revel in the choice vin-ages of the Rhine, while their wealth and station lace the brightest and most social spirits of the ge at their beck; yet if you would but mark hem in their occasional visits to the College, any is the fond lingering look they throw at Billy's cockloft, as if in utter despair of ever find-ng any enjoyment, short of Elysium, worthy to be ompared to that. It is true, their beards are rizzled now, which were then in the primal down; nd that makes more than the difference.

If you imagine, reader, that such meetings were isgraced by drunken excess, or wrangling and nseemly disputation, you know little of a true ollege merrymaking. Much noise, indeed, was here, six or seven voices often going at a time; ut it was the noise of cheerful and friendly con-roversy, interspersed here and there with a song, nd enlivened with many a sparkling witticism or roll conceit. Ours were the cups that "cheer but ot inebriate;" for Billy was, in the main, a mo-al man, and admitted no equivocal characters to is symposia. The solitary bottle, which he set pon the table, full to the cork but never re-lenished, was shared so judiciously, that every ne had enough for mirth and indulgence, but one too much for good manners or propriety.

There often unbended one, who has of late years illed a large space in the world's eye, but in such position as gives an unworthy notion of his great ualities and kindly nature. He has been sobri-uetted by that "pestilent mad wag," Tom Moore, s the Rev. Murtagh O'Mulligan; but if Tom ever eard him sing—"O blame not the Bard," as I ave heard him sing it, with his whole heart in the vords, "the Bard" himself had surely relented, and udged him fit for better things than philandering Miss Biddy O'Fudge to the "Do-nothing-on-Sun-lay Club." His voice, though untutored, was armonious and powerful, and it was his delight o exercise it in the boldest and most patriotic trains of our national lyrist. Au reste, he was a ind soul, unsophisticated, joyous, and convivial; nd he possessed the faculty of pun-making—ex-ellent, good puns too—to such perfection, that I ake no question but he could have composed a ew Joe Miller off hand.

This is not just the place for political allusions; ut I cannot help remarking, that his opinions ere then liberal—moderately but firmly liberal; circumstance which alone would satisfy my ind, did I not know on surer grounds, that his onversion to the Protestant faith, which had aken place previously to the time I speak of, was ot grounded upon the base motives to which, in later times, it has been so freely attributed: for your mere renegade becomes a bigot, or affects to be one, from the post; but this man, for years after his change of creed, retained the love of popular institutions in his heart, and was, in particular, an advocate for Catholic Emancipation. Where is the sordid or trading apostate of whom so much can be said?

It seems not improbable that he would have continued in those sentiments, but for the influence and example of his early patron, Dr. Magee. That erratic luminary, the friend and alter ego of Plunket, had marshalled a Whig party in the university, which triumphed over the conjoint despotism and corruption of Provost Elrington, and the Castle. They elected the great advocate of Emancipation in 1812, compelling the representative of Ascendancy, Leslie Foster, to retire without a contest; and again, in 1818, when Wilson Croker was brought forward by a sudden underhand manœuvre, to take the fortress by surprise, Magee—then Dean of Cork—mustered his friends, and "brushed the vexatious intruder away."

These exploits turned the attention of Lord Liverpool to the man and his works; and he made him a bishop,—alleging, as an excuse for so doing, the great admiration he felt for his clever compilation on "The Atonement;" but the sly Premier saw other merits in the plastic dean. Nor was he deceived: for from that moment the patriotism of this divine, who had stood second only to Swift in the veneration and affections of the Irish people, began to wane; and on his translation to the metropolitan chair of Dublin, he went clean over, (if the word be admissible,) with all his disposable forces, to the High Tory and No-Popery party. That remarkable desertion was followed—whether propter hoc, however, or simply post hoc, I presume not to determine—by a similar change in the politics of two lesser lights, namely, Phelan the Fellow, and the personage whose history has led me into this digression.

But politics and symposiacs go ill together. Let us go back to Billy Sheridan's garret, where the wight who attempted to discuss the eccentricities of Doctor Magee or his satellites, would be classed, in the words of a popular song, with "Any old bellowing woman that chatters

About Father O'Leary, and the Bishop of Cloyne."

Instead of pounding the "drum ecclesiastic" then, you would find our great gun of controversy torturing the logic the gods had given him, to prove Peter Pindar's wit superior to that of Hudibras; whilst his brother Sam would be quietly and blandly mystifying some green freshman from Munster, into a belief, grounded upon the similarity in sound, of certain Greek words, to others of like signification in the Irish tongue, that Homer's Iliad was (or might have been) originally composed in the latter, and sung to the harp of King Brian Boroihme.

Sam was stately, grandiloquent, metaphysical, rhetorical, and a little given to romance. He had great plans of bookmaking ever running in his head. I do not mean making books with a pair of scissars and a pot of paste; for he scorned to borrow anything of any man, unless it might be a spoonful or so of tea, when his canister was run out: and that he always repaid in full tale. But his speculations were most original—thoughts such as had never entered into any man's brain before, upon subjects about which few other men could think of thinking. He was, however, an idler—magna pollicitus, and there an end. He would hold jousts all the forenoon, in imaginary lists, with Dugald Stewart, or project magnificent plans for throwing a girdle round the national debt, so as to bring it into some solvible compass. But the organ of perseverance was nowhere in his phrenology; and, with a capacity equal to the highest attempts, he achieved nothing. He has written some clever theological pamphlets, and is generally thought to be the author of the "Gallery of Illustrious Irishmen" in the Dublin University Magazine, as well as some slashing articles elsewhere, for which the Tories, if they be not, like some of their predecessors, ashamed to appear to set any value upon mere literary support, are bound to reward him very handsomely. But Sam has greater stuff in him than what is apparent in anything that he has done as yet.

Our proper hint, however, is to speak of him as he shone at Billy Sheridan's Conversazioni; and there, to do him justice, he was the soul of good-humour and jollification. His favourite weapon was irony, which he would slip under your short rib with winning politeness. Sometimes it happened, as it will to wags of that sardonic humour, that he would catch a Tartar; and in such cases, no person could enjoy with a higher zest the turning of the tables upon himself. He would laugh till the slates over his head rattled together; and Momus—who was, of course, always, though invisibly, one of our party—would cry to the sprite that makes the blood run tickling up and down the veins—"Let him laugh again—let him laugh again."

That was a "laugh," as honest Foly might say with his own ugly mouth; none of your noiseless American grins or rattlesnake chuckles; no junior Sophister's giggle; no Parliament yelp, like that which, according to the Ex-Secretary at War, constitutes the sole essential difference between certain lords of the creation, and the commoner curs thereof. No—nor was it a hearty English burst, that threatened to "rive the concealing continents" of doublet and waistband; still less, O Northern reader, was it a hoarse Hyperborean bellow, like that rude Caledonian guffaw of yours: but it was a pealing hinnulation—a neigh nasal, that reverberated through every note of the Houyhnhnm scale, as if it proceeded from the war-charger in Job, when he "smelleth the battle afar off, and saith—Ha! Ha!"

The late John Sidney Taylor sometimes enlivened the scene with his sly humour; but though eminently social, he was shy of committing himself to strangers, and rather avoided gregarious merry-makings. To sit round the fireside, an hour before Commons, with two or three airy spirits, or to take a turn in the park after dinner, for about the same space;—that was Taylor's delight—and that was the time to enjoy his cheerful and improving conversation. Yet he would, upon occasion, overcome his wonted reserve, in the most promiscuous company, and set a whole table on a roar. He had the knack of seeming utterly unconscious of his own wit, (artem celandi artem,) and he spoke with a careless, sleepy drawl, which added considerably to the surprise of the hearers, and in the same degree increased the effect of his most eloquent, as well as of his most whimsical effusions.

Taylor had a rare love of fun, which was peculiarly striking in so "asy-going a Scholar of the House," as old Jerry, the badgeman, used to call him; and he would lay down plans for a practical joke, with as thoughtful and grave a concern, as a trapper in the Backwoods sets his gins for a racoon. Ay, and like the trapper too, he would enjoy the sport alone, in the absence of friends to share it with, as heartily as if the result came off amidst a whole theatre of claqueurs.

When he was a student at the Temple, in 1817, the Spafields Riots took place, and a large reward having been offered for the apprehension of the ringleader, Taylor was struck by the likeness of his chum, Bob Power, to the description, given in the proclamation, of Young Watson. Upon that hint he went to work; and having induced Bob to accompany him to a barber's shop, he counterfeited the utmost trepidation, demanded in a hurried whisper to be conducted to a secret apartment, with windows not looking into the street, where the master himself, and by no means any of his journeymen or apprentices, should perform the office which was required to be done.

Bob had been prepared, by a darkling intimation of a scheme to mystify the barber, to place himself implicitly in his friend's hands, content to remain innocent of the knowledge till he might applaud the deed. He uncovered his head, therefore, to the Shearer, in mute and smiling anticipation of the denouement, without the least suspicion that he was himself marked to be a victim. But marked he was, sure enough; for Taylor had previously attempted the operation which he now called upon the professional artist to complete.

"Bless my soul, Sir!" said the barber, widely staring,—"what barbarian was at work upon this head?"

"Hist,"—said Taylor, laying his fore finger upon his lip—"no questions, Sir, if you please."

The barber looked unutterable things. "How shall I trim your whiskers, Sir?"

"Address your conversation to me only," cried Taylor, abruptly; then—sottissimo—"Shave them off, every hair, Sir, to the temples."

"That's a foreign fashion, I presume, Sir, and the gentleman is going abroad."

"Pray, Sir—perform your office and restrain your curiosity."

Ever and anon, during the operation, Taylor would fly to the head of the stairs, and having remained there a few moments, in an attitude of listening anxiety, run back again, and fix a scrutinizing glance upon the barber and then upon Bob.

When the job was done, he slipped half-a-crown into the operator's hand, and stepping into the street, very carefully surveyed all the passengers, at the opposite side. Then crossing over, he reviewed those at the other side; and having repeated this precaution more than once, at length gave a furtive signal to his friend, who forthwith bolted; walking off briskly to the left, whilst Taylor moved away with equal celerity towards the right. When he had proceeded some paces, he looked back, and saw, as he expected, the whole family of the barber, some with combs in their hands and some with scissars, crowding the door or craning out of the windows, to catch a view of this Bob of mystery.

The two friends met, in a few minutes, by appointment, at their lodgings in Drury Lane, when Bob, drawing his four fingers slowly adown his unbushed cheeks, somewhat chopfallen, demanded if the joke was ended?

"No—no—not yet, I hope: for here comes a Bow Street officer to carry you off to Newgate, for Young Watson."

Bob opened his eyes and exerted himself to look pleasant at so exquisite a trap against the Barber: though, if the truth were told, he would have enjoyed it more, had somebody else been used for a bait. But he was not destined to enjoy it to the full extent contemplated by the projector; for Figaro had proved too faithful. He scorned the temptation that had been thrown in his way; and when Taylor returned to his shop, the following day, on some pretence of business, he was accosted with eager inquiries about his "friend" and hopes that he had got beyond the reach of the bloodhounds. Taylor assured him that he was perfectly safe; at which the worthy Radical expressed, and no doubt felt, more delight than if Lord Sidmouth's Thousand Guineas were at the moment jingling in his pocket.

The chosen friend of Taylor, and his competitor for the prizes and honours of the University, was Charles Wolfe, author of the "Ode on the Burial of Sir John Moore," whose name will go down to the latest posterity, linked with that bright, but solitary claim to immortality.* That the mine, out of which such a "gem of purest ray" had been taken, almost by accident, (certainly quite extemore,) should have contained nothing more that was precious or meet to be transmitted to other times, is not to be supposed. But its having remained unwrought, was no wonder at all to Wolfe's college friends, who were well acquainted with his procrastinating habits, and that indolence, which was, probably, one of the premonitory symptoms of the disease which brought him to an early grave.

Besides these constitutional impediments, (if I may so designate them,) he was so patient, so kind, so warm-hearted, and so glad to see every one that was glad to see him, that his time was much more the property of any idler who chose to trespass upon it, than it was his own. He never turned his face away from any man, of a good moral character, who showed a desire to cultivate his acquaintance. As he was a perfect gentleman, and one of the most cheerful and delightful companions that ever lived, his society was eagerly sought, out of doors, and his chambers in college were the constant resort of numbers who might be almost excused for the invasion, seeing what rich spoils they were always sure of carrying away.

It was not merely the fascination of his genius and his wit, which drew this concourse to him. He was the object of universal esteem and love; and no wonder, for he was the gentlest, the most guileless, and the most affectionate of God's creatures. If it be still a "woe" for those, of whom "all men speak well," Wolfe had that misfortune. Omnes omnia bona dicere. And in that respect, he was pretty even with everybody; for he "thought no evil" of any one, and when he spoke of the absent, it was in commendation of some good quality which he saw, or wished to see, in their characters.

Wolfe died before the minds of men were thoroughly embittered by that spirit of controversy, which the political struggles of the last twenty years have called forth. In his profession he had laboured, with unwearied zeal and devotedness, to enlighten the ignorant and reclaim the careless and profane. Catholics as well as Protestants were alike the objects of his pastoral solicitude; but it was not in his nature to offend against that God-like Charity, which ought ever to unite the various branches of the Christian family in one common bond of love and peace. When he left this scene therefore, he left it in the undivided enjoyment of his early popularity. The distinctions of creed and of party, which had everywhere begun to put rancours between man and man, had no place in the solemn thoughts inspired by the event; but all those who had known him in his youth—and in the number were comprised members of every denomination—could stand beside his bier, and "mourn him, saying—Alas, my brother!"

Sometimes, but not often, our meetings were adorned by the presence of a remarkably handsome youth, who sported a broad northern accent, and passed in those days for no more than a very "lively dunce." He was a great theatrical spouter, and used to illustrate his discourse, on the most indifferent topics, with snatches out of Shakspeare or the Castle Spectre. He much affected the society of a certain Patagonian tragedian of the Crow Street Company, who did enact Timour the Tartar most heroically, and could tear a passion to tatters with more applause than any actor of his time.

It was the general expectation of his friends, that our smockfaced boy would go upon the stage, for which he possessed many requisite qualifications. But there are more ways than one of being a Ranter; and this gentleman has chosen the pulpit for his theatre, where he shines as a star of no trifling magnitude. Many who have lately seen him outheroding Herod in his present vocation, and mark the ecstasies into which his performances throw the Ladies, say that he has not mistaken his calling. Perhaps not; but however that may be, the cause of genuine melodrama has lost much, and the cause of Christian charity has not gained a great deal, by the choice.

* Wolfe's Biographer, Archdeacon Russell, has preserved some sketches of Sermons, abounding in beautiful sentiments and passages of noble eloquence, sufficient to show, that as an orator and divine, as well as a poet—"Life only was wanting to his fame."

Miss Strickland's Lives of the Queens of England. Vol. V. Katharine Parr, the Sixth Queen of Henry VIII., and Queen Mary his daughter; with Portrait of Katharine Parr, and Henry VIII. and his Family, after Holbein, &c., &c. Colburn.

The fresh volume of this pleasing, and, with ladies, we should presume, very popular work, cannot be expected to present any new feature in style, though the authoress is equally minute in her researches, graphic in her descriptions, and indulgent in her judgments as in the early volumes. She exalts the wisdom of the serpent, so strikingly displayed in the conduct of Katharine Parr; and can find many grounds of extenuation for the worst crimes of "bloody Mary," in the early trials and the difficulties of that Princess's position. In her childhood and early life Mary was not indeed the gloomy bigot, or instrument in the hands of those who were in every respect much worse than herself, which she became. Towards the end of her brief reign, and when she was sinking into the grave the victim of a complication of painful disorders, and of a tortured mind, arose that fierce and horrible persecution of the professors of the new religion, which has justly rendered her memory hateful to posterity. But it is well said by Miss Strickland, and we wish that she more frequently gave way to this vein—

But if eternal obloquy was incurred by the half-dead queen, what is the due of the parliaments which legalized the acts of cruelty committed in her name? Shall we call the House of Lords bigoted, when its majority, which legalized this wickedness, were composed of the same individuals which had planted, very recently, the Protestant Church of England? Surely not, for the term implies honest, though wrong-headed, attachment to one religion. . . . . The fact, of whether the torpid and half-dead queen was the instigator of a persecution, the memory of which curdles the blood with horror at this distance of time, is a question of less moral import at the present day, than a clear analyzation of the evil with which selfish interests had infected the legislative powers of our country. It was in vain that Mary almost abstained from creation of Peers, and restored the ancient custom of annual Parliaments; the majority of the persons composing the Houses of Peers and Commons were dishonest, indifferent to all religions, and willing to establish the most opposing rituals, so that they might retain their grasp on the accursed thing with which their very souls were corrupted—for corrupted they were, though not by the unfortunate queen. The church lands, with which Henry VIII. had bribed his aristocracy, titled and untitled, into coöperation with his enormities, both personal and political, had induced national depravity.

The leaders of the Marian persecution, Gardiner and Bonner, were of the apostate class of persecutors. "Flesh bred in murder," they had belonged to the Government of Henry VIII., which sent the zealous Roman Catholic and the pious Protestant to the same stake. For the sake of worldly advantage, either of ambition or gain, Gardiner and Bonner had, for twenty years, promoted the burning or quartering of the advocates of papal supremacy; they now turned with the tide, and burnt with the same degree of conscientiousness the opposers of papal supremacy.

The persecution appears to have been greatly aggravated by the caprice of the private vengeance of these prelates; for a great legalist of our times, [Sir James Mackintosh,] who paid unprejudiced attention to the facts, has thus summed up the case:—"Of fourteen bishoprics, the catholic prelates used their influence so successfully, as altogether to prevent bloodshed in nine, and to reduce it within limits in the remaining five. Bonner, 'whom all generations shall call bloody,' raged so furiously in the diocese of London, as to be charged with burning half the martyrs in the kingdom."

This volume, rich in genealogies, family history, court anecdote, and descriptions of dresses and pageants, affords abundant scope for quotation; and having done homage to its philosophy in the above extract, we shall select our farther illustrative specimens from among its lighter passages.

LADIES' QUARRELS.

Katharine Parr, after the death of Henry, lost no time in indemnifying herself for her conjugal endurance. In three little months she secretly married Sir Thomas Seymour, the High Admiral, and the maternal uncle of the young King Edward. The Admiral's brother, Somerset, was now Lord Protector of the kingdom. Between the haughty wife of Somerset and the Queen-Dowager there existed deadly animosity, which Katharine's consummate prudence and tact could not conceal.

Many and various are the accounts given by historians of the cause of the fatal animosity of these ladies towards each other. Open hostility between them broke out after the marriage of Katharine with the admiral, in consequence of the Duchess of Somerset refusing any longer to fulfil her office of bearing up the train of the Queen-Dowager, alleging, "that it was unsuitable for her to submit to perform that service for the wife of her husband's younger brother." She next objected to give place to her majesty, carrying her insolence so far as to dispute precedence with her in the court of Edward VI. The pretence on which the Duchess of Somerset founded her presumptuous claim was, that as the wife of the protector and guardian of the realm, she had a right to take place of every lady in England. It is possible that, with the exception of the ladies of the royal family, she might; but the act of Henry VIII., whereby it was provided that Anne of Cleves should take precedency after his Queen, and the Princesses his daughters of every other lady in the realm, settled the matter of Katharine Parr's precedency beyond contravention; and the arrogant Duchess was compelled to yield, but never forgave the mortification. According to Heylin, the Duchess of Somerset was accustomed to inveigh in the bitterest manner against Queen Katharine, and actually expressed herself concerning her in the following coarse and detracting language:—"Did not Henry VIII. marry Katharine Parr in his doting days, when he had brought himself so low by his lust and cruelty that no lady that stood on her honour would venture on him. And shall I now give place to her who, in her former estate, was but Latimer's widow, and is now fain to cast herself for support on a younger brother? If master Admiral teach his wife no better manners, I am she that will."

HINTS FOR THE EDUCATION OF A PRINCESS.

The character and career of Queen Mary does not recommend a strict and exclusively learned education for princesses. A few of the idle books "of chivalry and romance" might have helped to enlarge and sweeten her heart. Her mother, Katharine of Arragon,

Requested Ludovicus Vives, a Spaniard of deep learning, who was called by his contemporaries the second Quintilian, to draw up a code of instructions for the education of Mary. He sent a treatise in Latin, dedicated to the queen, from Bruges, and afterwards came to England, and at Oxford revised and improved it. He thus addresses Katharine of Arragon :—"Govern by these my monitions Maria thy daughter, and she will be formed by them; she will resemble thy domestic example of probity and wisdom, and, except all human expectations fail, holy and good will she be by necessity."

Vives points out with exultation the daughters of Sir Thomas More as glorious examples of the effects of a learned and virtuous female education. His rules are rigid : he implores that the young Princess may read no idle books of chivalry or romance. He defies and renounces such compositions in Spanish as "Amadis de Gaul," "Tirante the White," and others burnt by the curate in "Don Quixote." He abjures "Lancelot de Lac," "Paris et Vienne," "Pierre Provençal," and "Margalone and the Fairy Melusina." In Flemish, he denounces "Florice and Blanche," and "Pyramus and Thisbe." All these, and such as these, he classes as libri pestiferi, corrupting to the morals of females. In their place he desires that the young Princess Mary may read the Gospels night and morning, the Acts of the Apostles, and the Epistles, selected portions of the Old Testament, and the works of Cyprian, Jerome, Augustine, and Ambrose; likewise Plato, Cicero, Seneca's Maxims, Plutarch's Enchiridion, the Paraphrase of Erasmus, and the "Utopia" of Sir Thomas More. Among the works of classic poets, he admitted the "Pharsalia" of Lucan, the tragedies of Seneca, with selected portions of Horace. He deemed cards, dice, and splendid dress, as pestiferous as romances. He gave rules for her pronunciation of Greek and Latin, and advised that lessons from these languages should be committed to memory every day, and read over two or three times before the pupil went to bed. He recommended that the Princess should render English into Latin frequently, and likewise that she should converse with her preceptor in that language. Her Latin dictionary was to be either Perotti or Colepin. He permitted some stories for her recreation, but they were all to be purely historical, sacred, or classic. He instanced the narrative of Joseph and his brethren in the Scriptures, that of Papyrus in Aulus Gellius, and Lucretia in Livy. The well-known tale of "Griselda" is the only exception to his general exclusion of fiction, and that perhaps he took for fact. It is a curious coincidence that Griselda was afterwards considered in England as the prototype of Queen Katharine.

The young Princess was certainly educated according to the rigorous directions of Vives; and she is an historical example of the noxious effect that over-education has at a very tender age. Her precocious studies probably laid the foundation for her melancholy temperament and delicate health.

From the accounts of the expenditure of this Princess's privy purse, it appears, that in spite of her education, she was fond of betting, and gambled rather deeply, and often with heavy loss, when the relative value of money is considered. Mary fully shared in the misfortunes of her mother, and was treated by Anne Boleyn with severity and insolence, which, when the season of adversity came, weighed heavily on the conscience of that giddy and capricious favourite. Anne's child, the infant Elizabeth, was declared the heiress of the realm; while Mary, the elder Princess, the daughter of the foully divorced Katharine, was separated from her mother, kept as a kind of State prisoner, and denied the title of Princess; while those who dared to pay her any attention were persecuted.

The two melancholy years Mary spent at Hunsdon, under the surveillance of her step-mother, were passed in sorrow and suffering.

The few friends who dared visit her were subjected to the severest espionage, their words were malignantly scrutinized, and sedulously reported to the Privy Council. The papers of the Princess were put under the royal seal; and if she was allowed to read, she certainly was not permitted to write, since in one of her letters, penned just after the execution of Anne Boleyn, she apologizes for "her evil writing, because she had not written a letter for two years." Her father muttered murderous threats against her, and his words were eagerly caught and reëchoed by those members of his council, whose whole study it was to flatter his wilful wishes, however wicked they might be. If the expressions of King Henry had not been appalling to the last degree, would the treasurer, Fitzwilliam, have dared to use the revolting terms he did, regarding his master's once idolized daughter ? "If she will not be obedient to his grace, I would," quoth he, "that her head was from her shoulders, that I might toss it here with my foot," and so put his foot forward, spurning the rushes,—a graphic exemplification added by two witnesses of his horrible speech, which it seems was not resented, but received as a dutiful compliment by the father of the young female whose bleeding head was thus kicked as a football in the lively imagination of the obedient satellite !

After the death of Anne Boleyn, and the marriage of the King to Jane Seymour, and when Elizabeth, like Mary, had been declared illegitimate by act of Parliament, the elder Princess was restored to favour upon agreeing to acknowledge that her late mother's marriage had been incestuous, her own birth illegitimate, and her father's supremacy over the Church absolute. With these hard conditions she complied, and was then allowed to appear at court. Her tastes and way of life, and also the customs of her age, may be gathered from the following extract :—

Notwithstanding the concessions made by the princess, no trace can be found of her admission to her father's presence before the Christmas of 1537. From this time the diary of her privy-purse expenses commences, forming a species of journal of her life, in most instances to her credit, excepting items of high play at cards, and a general propensity to betting and gambling, which will excite surprise. In this examination of the private life of a princess so exceedingly detested by her country, whose memory is loaded with the reproaches to which every sovereign who is a party in the enactment of cruel laws, is liable, it is natural for a biographer (who is an active searcher after facts) to keep a vigilant scrutiny on these records in quest of the evil traits, with which even the private character of the unfortunate Mary has been branded. The search has been vain : these records speak only of charity, affection to her little sister, kindness to her dependants, feminine accomplishments, delicate health, generosity to her god-children, many of whom were orphans dependent on her alms, fondness for birds—very little hunting and hawking is mentioned, and no bear-baiting. Her time seems, indeed, passed most blamelessly, if the gaming propensities above-mentioned may be considered rather faults of the court when she visited it, than faults of hers. It is certain Henry VIII. was one of the most inveterate gamblers that ever wore a crown.

The visit of the Princess Mary at the royal palace of Richmond commenced December the 9th, 1536. How the long-estranged father and daughter met, no pen has chronicled; but it is evident she regained, when once admitted to his presence, a large share of his former affections, tokens of which were shown by presents and new-year's gifts. The king presented her with a bordering for a dress, of goldsmith's work, perhaps some rich ornament belonging to her mother : it was not new, for she paid to a goldsmith £4 3s. 4d, for lengthening the borders, adding, in her own hand, "that the king's grace had given it to her ;" likewise she noted payment to the goldsmith "for coming to Greenwich to take her orders." The court moved from Richmond to Greenwich before Christmas-day. Mary lost at cards six angels, or £2 5s., directly she arrived at Richmond ; in six days, another supply of six angels was needed ; soon after, a third of 20s., besides 30s. lent her by Lady Carew when her pocket was again emptied "at the cards." In the course of this week, the entry of a quarter's wages for one of her footmen occurs of 10s., which offers a fair criterion to estimate the extravagance of her card-losings by comparing the present value of a footman's wages for a quarter of a year with every 10s. thus dissipated. As some atonement for this idle outlay, £1 3s. was paid to "the woman who keepeth Mary Price, my lady Mary's god-daughter, and 15s. in alms, and 3s. 9d. to a poor woman of her grace living at Hatfield, and 7s. 6d. to John of Hatfield."

Cromwell presented the princess with a new-year's gift of some value, for the present given to his servant who brought it amounted to three angels; he likewise sent her a "gift of sweet waters and fumes," for which his servant is given a gratuity of 7s. 6d. Among the other characters of historical interest who sent their offerings to Mary, on her return to court, occur the names of lady Rochford, (then one of Queen Jane Seymour's bedchamber ladies,) of her father, Lord Morley, Mary's old literary friend, of Lord Beauchamp (the Queen's brother) and his wife, likewise Lady Salisbury.

To Queen Jane's maids the princess presented each a ducat, amounting in all to 40s. The queen's page had 45s. for bringing the new-year's gift of his royal mistress. Besides other presents, she gave the princess £50. The princess made many minor gifts at the new year to those whom etiquette would not permit the offering of money. For instance, she bought of the lady mayoress of London six bonnets, for new-year's gifts, at £1 each, and likewise paid her 10s. for two frontlets, a plain proof that the lady mayoress, in 1537, kept a haberdasher's or milliner's shop. The lord mayor that year was Sir Richard Gresham, a near relative of the Boleyns, a circumstance which makes this little mercantile transaction between the Princess Mary and her sister's industrious kinswoman a curious incident. . . .

The Princess Mary paid 5s. for mending a clock given her by Lady Rochford, and 20d. to Haywood's servant for bringing her regals (a sort of portable finger organ) from London to Greenwich. She had still further dealings with Lady Gresham, the lady mayoress; "for divers and sundry things of her had," 42s. were paid in January. In the course of these accounts, attempts were made to charge the princess with various pottles of sack, charges which she pertinaciously resisted, and the intrusive pottles are carefully scored out by her hand.

Mary passed through life without stigma or suspicion as to the purity of her manners. The following anecdote illustrates the high spirit of her court ladies, though they were not all Magdalen Dacres :—

Whilst Mary lay between life and death, only animated by a hope which every day became fainter, the conduct of her young husband was by no means edifying to her court. Fortunately the queen had chosen maids of honour, whose correctness of life was unimpeachable, who were not only ladies of approved virtue, but ready to do battle, if any audacious offender offered an incivility. Of this praiseworthy spirit, the beautiful lady Magdalen Dacre, who married, in the next reign, Viscount Montague, afforded a signal instance. One day, as she was at her toilette, King Philip, who had observed a small window which lighted her dressing-room, from a corridor at Hampton Court, contrived to open it far enough to put in his arm ; when the fair maid of honour, justly indignant at a liberty she never encouraged, took up a staff which stood apropos in a corner, and gave the intruding arm so sound a rap, that Philip was glad to draw it back in a hurry, and to make a speedy retreat. He took no offence at this specimen of an English lady's spirit, but was ever afterwards observed to treat the heroine of the staff with remarkable deference. The fair Dacre was of so stately a presence, that she towered above all the ladies of the court in height ; she was maid of honour afterwards to Queen Elizabeth, but was accustomed to speak with infinite scorn of the immorality of her court, when compared to that of Queen Mary.

The young Elizabeth was bred in a freer school, even when under the care of the sage Katharine Parr. After the hasty marriage of the Queen-dowager with the Admiral, to whom she had been attached previous to her royal alliance, the young Elizabeth lived with her at Chelsea, where the presence of the Princess proved injurious to both ladies.

The queen, forgetful that a blooming girl in her fifteenth year was no longer a child, had imprudently encouraged the admiral to romp with her royal stepdaughter in her presence. Mrs. Ashley, the Princess Elizabeth's governess, in her deposition before the privy council, gives a lively picture of the coarse manners of the times, in which such proceedings could be tolerated in a palace, and with royal ladies.

"At Chelsea, after my lord Thomas Seymour was married to the queen, he would come many mornings into the said lady Elizabeth's chamber before she were ready, and sometimes before she did rise, and if she were up he would bid her good-morrow, and ax how she did, and strike her on the back familiarly, and so go forth to his chamber, and sometimes go through to her maidens and play with them. And if the princess were in bed, he would put open the curtains and bid her good-morrow, and she would go further in the bed. And one morning he tried to kiss the princess in her bed, and this deponent was there, and bade him go away for shame. At Hanworth, for two mornings, the queen (Katharine Parr) was with him, and they both tickled my lady Elizabeth in her bed. Another time, at Hanworth, he romped with her in the garden, and cut her gown, being black cloth, into a hundred pieces, and when Mrs. Ashley came up and chid lady Elizabeth, she answered, 'she could not strive with all, for the queen held her while the lord admiral cut the dress.' Another time, lady Elizabeth heard the master-key unlock ; and knowing my lord admiral would come in, ran out of her bed to her maidens, and then went behind the curtain of her bed, and my lord tarried a long time in hopes she would come out. Mrs. Ashley could not tell how long. She (Mrs. Ashley) was told these things were complained of, and that the lady Elizabeth was evil spoken of. Then the lord admiral swore—'God's precious soul! I will tell my lord Protector how I am slandered ; and I will not leave off, for I mean no evil.'

"At Seymour Place, when the queen slept there, he did use awhile to come up every morning in his night-gown and slippers ; when he found my lady Elizabeth up, and at her book, then he would look in at the gallery door, and bid her good-morrow, and so go on his way ; and the deponent told my lord it was an unseemly sight to see a man so little dressed in a maiden's chamber, with which he was angry, but he left it. At Hanworth, the queen told Mrs. Ashley 'that my lord admiral looked in at the gallery window, and saw my lady Elizabeth with her arms about a man's neck.' Upon which, Mrs. Ashley questioned her charge regarding it, and the lady Elizabeth denied it, weeping, and bad them ax all her women, if there were any man who came to her excepting Grindall, my lady Elizabeth's schoolmaster? Howbeit, Mrs. Ashley thought, the queen being jealous did feign this story, to the intent that Mrs. Ashley might take more heed to the proceedings of lady Elizabeth and the lord admiral." The governess added, "that her husband, Mr. Ashley, (who, it seems, was a relative of Anne Boleyn,) did often give warning that he feared the princess did bear some affection to the lord admiral, as she would sometimes blush when she heard him spoken of."

Elizabeth herself told Parry, the offerer of her household, "that she feared the admiral loved her but too well, and that the queen was jealous of them both ; and that, suspecting the frequent access of the admiral to her, she came suddenly upon them when they were alone, he having her in his arms."

The Queen immediately separated her household from that of the Princess. Her death in child-birth shortly followed. Though the Admiral was her fourth husband, King Henry being her third, Katharine was now for the first time a mother. Her love-match proved far from happy ; though we think it is satisfactorily proved that was not poisoned by her husband; a crime to which t worthless man had no immediate temptation.

Notwithstanding her consummate prudence and tact, tharine Parr had, in her time, a sharp run for her d with the royal Blue Beard. Though her crimes re not of the kind alleged against Anne Boleyn and tharine Howard, she was suspected of heresy, and s guilty of bringing no heirs to the crown. She had adly enemies in Wriothesley and Gardiner, who not only tested the reformed doctrines—"the new learning," as ese were then called, but were jealous of Katharine's luence with the king and his children, and anxiously otted her ruin. Once when she had ventured too far religious discourse, she perceived her error, and Made a few pleasant observations on other subjects, d withdrew. Henry's suppressed choler broke out as on as she left the room. "A good hearing it is," said
, "when women become such clerks; and much to my mfort, to come in mine old age to be taught by my ife!"

Gardiner, who was present, availed himself of this ornful sally to insinuate things against her majesty, hich a few days before he durst not, for his life, have reathed to the king. "For," says a contemporary auior, "never handmaid sought more to please her mis-ess than she to please his humour; and she was of ngular beauty, favour, and comely personage, wherein e king was greatly delighted."

The ruin of the queen and her ladies was finally reolved on, when she was saved by an accident.

At this momentous crisis, when the life of the queen ight be said to hang on a balance so fearfully poised, hat the descent of a feather would have given it a fatal urn, the bill of articles that had been framed against er, together with the mandate for her arrest, were lropped by Wriothesley from his bosom, in the gallery
t Whitehall, after the royal signature of the king had een affixed. Fortunately, it happened that it was icked up by one of the attendants of the queen, and nstantly conveyed to her majesty, whose sweetness of emper and gracious demeanour had endeared her to all ier household. It is impossible but that shuddering ecollections of the fell decree which doomed Henry's econd queen, Anne Boleyn, to be either burned or be-eaded, at the king's pleasure, and of the summary proeedings by which his last queen, Katharine, was hurried o the block, without even the ceremony of a trial, must ave pressed upon her mind as she glanced at these ppalling documents. . . . Be that as it may, the ueen no sooner perceived that a bill for her attainder vas prepared, and that the king had treacherously given is sanction to the machinations of her foes, than she oncluded that she was to be added to the list of his onjugal decapitations, and fell into an hysterical agony.
She occupied an apartment contiguous to that of the ick and froward monarch; and as she fell from one fit nto another, her shrieks and cries reached his ears.
Finding they continued for many hours, either moved with pity, or, as Dr. Lingard shrewdly suggests, "incommoded by the noise," he sent to inquire what was the matter. Katharine's physician, Dr. Wendy, having penetrated the cause of her majesty's indisposition, informed the royal messenger that the queen was dangerously ill, and that it appeared that her sickness was caused by distress of mind. When the king heard this, he was either moved with unwonted feelings of compassion for the sufferings of his consort, or reminded, by his own increasing infirmities, which had confined him for the last two days to his bed, of her unrivalled skill as a nurse; and feeling, perhaps, for the first time, how much he should miss her in that capacity, if death deprived him of her services, he determined to pay her a visit. This act of royal condescension was the more remarkable, because it was attended with great personal inconvenience to himself, for he was carried in a chair into queen Katharine's apartment, being at that time unable to walk. He found her heavy and melancholy, and apparently at the point of death, at which he evinced much sympathy, as if really alarmed at the idea of losing her. . . . On this occasion she testified a proper degree of gratitude for the honour of his visit,
"which," she assured him, "had greatly revived and rejoiced her." She also adroitly offered an opening for an explanation of the cause of Henry's displeasure, by expressing herself much distressed at having seen so little of his majesty of late, adding, that her uneasiness at this was increased by her apprehensions of having been so unhappy as to have given him some unintentional offence. Henry replied only with gracious and encouraging expressions of his good will. During the rest of this critical interview, Katharine behaved in so humble and endearing a manner, and so completely adapted herself to the humour of her imperious lord, that, in the excitement caused by the reaction of his feelings, Henry betrayed to her physician the secret of the plot against her life. This gentleman, being both a good and a prudent person, acted as a mediator with his sovereign in the first instance, and is said to have suggested to the queen the proper means of securing a reconciliation with Henry.

The next evening the queen found herself well enough to return the king's visit in his bedchamber. She came attended by her sister, Lady Herbert, and the king's young niece, Lady Jane Gray, who carried the candles before her majesty. Henry welcomed her very courteously, and appeared to take her attention in good part;
but presently turned the conversation to the old subject of controversy, for the purpose of beguiling her into an argument. Katharine wittily excused herself from the snare by observing, that she was but a woman, accompanied with all the imperfections natural to the weakness of her sex; therefore, in all matters of doubt and difficulty
she must refer herself to his majesty's better judgment, as to her lord and head; "for so God hath appointed you," continued she, "as the supreme head of us all,
and of you, next unto God, will I ever learn."

"Not so, by St. Mary," said the king; "ye are become a doctor, Kate, to instruct us, and not to be instructed of us, as oftentime we have seen." "Indeed," replied the queen, "if your majesty have so conceived, my meaning has been mistaken, for I have always held it preposterous for a woman to instruct her lord; and if I have ever presumed to differ with your highness on religion, it was partly to obtain information for my own comfort, regarding certain nice points on which I stood in doubt, and sometimes because I perceived, that in talking, you were better able to pass away the pain and weariness of your present infirmity, which encouraged me to this boldness, in the hope of profiting withal by your majesty's learned discourse." "And is it so, sweetheart!" replied the king; "then are we perfect friends."
He then kissed her with much tenderness, and gave her leave to depart.

On the day appointed for her arrest, the king, being convalescent, sent for the queen to take the air with him in the garden. Katharine came, attended, as before, by her sister, Lady Jane Gray, and Lady Tyrwhit. Presently, the Lord Chancellor Wriothesley, with forty of the guard, entered the garden, with the expectation of carrying off the queen to the Tower, for he had not received the slightest intimation of the change in the royal caprice. The king received him with a burst of indignation, saluted him with the unexpected address of "Beast, fool, and knave," and sternly withdrawing him from the vicinity of the queen, he bade him "avaunt from his presence." Katharine, when she saw the king so greatly incensed with the Chancellor, had the magnanimity to intercede for her foe, saying, "she would become a humble suitor for him, as she deemed his fault was occasioned by mistake."

"Ah! poor soul," said the king, "thou little knowest,
Kate, how evil he deserveth this grace at thy hands.
On my word, sweetheart, he hath been to thee a very knave!"

The capricious tyrant did not long survive, or his sixth wife's head had still been in danger.

It is impossible to rise from the perusal of any work of this kind, describing the private lives of kings and courtiers, without the reflection involuntarily arising, that monarchy would, to society, need to be the most valuable of all political institutions, since to the individual rulers, and those immediately depending on them, it is the most corrupting.

Colonel Thompson's Exercises, Political and Others.

In six Volumes, 12mo. Effingham Wilson.

Under this quaint title Colonel Thompson has collected and published his voluminous papers, which originally appeared in the Westminster Review, while that work was under his control, and also his articles in different periodicals and newspapers. The Essays are, as most of our readers must know, mainly political, though a few are professional, or purely scientific; and several may be called controversial. Of the latter kind are the expositions and vindications of Bentham's Philosophy.

Though some may question Colonel Thompson's claims as an original thinker, none will deny that he is an original and racy writer. His rare felicity of illustration, happy knack of stating a case, and of familiarizing the abstract, have been universally allowed; but it seems less generally understood, that the best part of his wit is its logic. No one possesses the same knack or tact, or shall we call it instinct of genius, in going directly to the point, and not only knocking the nail on the head himself, but showing the spectators where and how the blow may be the most effectually aimed. He not only dexterously, and by a short and simple process, lays bare a sophism, and turns the seamy side of a favourite fallacy outwards, but he makes them at the same time ridiculous and odious. It is higher and better praise that this rare power has ever been found exercised upon the right side; on that of truth against error, justice against oppression, with the helpless weak against the encroaching strong. The six volumes before us are, we are glad to find published at a very cheap rate, which makes them quite accessible to village clubs and working men as elementary studies in politics.

We have marked out numerous specimens of these Exercises, but suffering under the embarrassment of riches, it is not found so easy to shorten as to make a list. The following is merciful to the—LIVE GODS:—

When a live god in Thibet has been fattened in a coop from his youth up, it would be unreasonable to expect from him either mental or corporeal energy; it would be hard to demand of him much moral virtue; and it would be downright cruelty to put him to death for his deficiency in either. It is the previous estate and training of despotic monarchs, that removes them from fair liability to capital punishment; on the same principles that are acknowledged in the case of those who are physically deficient. Let any reasonable man inquire of himself, by what processes he has arrived at any knowledge, or at any virtue,—how much of his morality he owes to the hourly apprehension of consequences,—how much of his prudence to collision with men of like powers with himself,—and how much of his reverence for truth to the dread of the contempt of his equals,—and then let him determine what portion of all these would have appertained to him, if he had been surrounded from his infancy by insinuations that his will made law, his opinions wisdom, and his word facts. The fault is in the institution of live gods; the vice is in the system, which, in attempting to raise one unfortunate individual above the level of humanity, sinks him beneath it. If men will have such idols, they ought to take the consequences along with them; but not make a holocaust of a poor puppet who after all has flesh and blood, for being what in a common man would be a liar, a cut-throat, or a knave.

There is true pathos as well as lively fancy in the subjoined sketch. The reader will remember the parallel siege of Jerusalem.

THE SIEGE OF BOLTON.—I have been at the siege of Bolton; for nothing but some such cause suggests itself as adequate to the phenomena. And is it not a siege! not carried on, perhaps, by an enemy within gun-shot, but by one working on a wider radius, and making his blockade by sea upon the means of life.

Many sights it has been my chance to see; and I think I know what is the minimum of help with which horse, ass, dog, hog, or monkey can sustain existence, and where it must go out for want of the appliances and means of living. But anything like the squalid misery, the slow, mouldy, putrifying death by which the weak and the feeble of the working-classes are perishing here, it never befell my eyes to behold, nor my imagination to conceive.

Did you ever set eyes on a pennyworth of mutton? Come here, and you shall see how rations are served out under the landlords' state of siege. It might bait a rat-trap; though a well-fed rat would hardly risk his personalities for such a pittance. Pennyworths of mutton, and halfpennyworths of bread cut off the loaf, are what the shopkeepers in Bolton deal out to the inhabitants of their Jerusalem. I saw a woman come for one halfpennyworth of bread, which was to be the dinner for herself and children twain; and when I reflected that of this transparent slice the other half was gone to buy the landlords' claret, astonishment possessed me at the endurance of that bearing ass, the public, and the extent to which ignorance and divisions will prop the rich man's robbery.

I saw another mother of a family, who said she had not tasted meat for many months; and on one of the children being sent off to the butcher's for some of that strange luxury, she was discovered making efforts to intercept the messenger. Her anxiety was to instruct the boy to bring back nothing but one pennyworth of bacon: there was a to-morrow, and to-morrow, and to-morrow, for which she had conceived the idea of spinning out existence by means of the remainder of the fund.

If you are curious in human misery, if you are anxious to know what a shabby tyranny can bring the rank and file to suffer, come at your leisure to the "leaguer" of Bolton, and see what the people sleep on, if they do sleep. Chopped dirt, the sweepings of a hen-house, mingled with a proportion of sparrows'-nests, to show that men had heard of straw, would be the best representatives of what they huddle upon in corners, and call it resting.

MACHINE-BREAKING.—The blunder of desiring to put down machinery, is in the main and in the long run the same as the contemptible fallacy of restrictions upon trade, which is pressed upon the operatives by the supporters of the Corn Laws. The apparent gain made at every step of restriction either on trade or on machinery, is balanced by an equal loss to some other portion of the industrious classes somewhere else, and there is a clear unbalanced loss of the amount in question to the consumers in the aggregate besides. But the operatives are to be persuaded, that if John, Thomas, Richard, and Henry, get sixpence each, by at the same time taking twopence out of the pocket of each of the other three,—John, Thomas, Richard, and Henry make a gain; and not only this, but that they do so if John, Thomas, Richard, and Henry, in their quality of consumers, lose another sixpence among them every time besides. This is the sum and substance of the system that calls itself protection to trade. It is a plan to set everybody to rob the rest, and count the plunder as a general gain. The subject, as relates to trade, has been examined at length in a former article, under the illustration of the monkeys in Exeter 'Change, who chose to feed out of each other's paws: where it was shown that the land monopoly is the great aboon of all, for whose benefit the lesser apes are persuaded to aid in keeping up the fraud.

Machinery then, like the rain of heaven, is a present blessing to all concerned, provided it comes down by drops, and not by tons together; and anything which prevents its free and expanded operation, has an effect of the same kind as would be produced if the rain could be collected into water-spouts.

APT TO THE TIMES.—A particular class, the landed interest, as they rejoice to style themselves, succeeded in persuading the community that nothing could go well unless they had their way. How much of this was self-deception, heaven only knows; but if they succeeded in making fools of other people, there is no known reason why, to a certain extent, they should not have succeeded in the same manner with themselves. At all events they had their way; and the first thing they did, was to prohibit the exchange of the poor man's industry for bread. Whether the manufacturers, if they had haply got the upper hand instead, would have laid a tax on home-grown corn, by way of increasing the quantity that should be bought with their goods from abroad, is what there has not been opportunity to try; but if they had, it would not have been one whit a more outrageous and barefaced wrong, a more wanton and reckless abuse of power, or a cooler and more degrading violence for a civilized society to submit to. If men, under such an exertion of tyranny on the part of the manufacturing interest, had risen in masses, and been put down by the sword and the executioner, it might be true enough that this evil was an inevitable consequence, and for that very reason there would be two evils instead of one to be reckoned for with the manufacturers whenever the day of justice should arrive. There would be no use in tampering with such a rank oppression. It would be an ill which those who are given to bear, would bear, and those who were not, would not; and the end would be, either the timely retreat of the plunderers of society, or a waiting till public indignation had risen high enough to drive them from their hold.

And it does not follow that, if humanity was suffering under such an infliction from the manufacturers, the efforts by which it was put down would all be directed by the purest reasoning and the most exact statistics. The buccaneers of the society must make up their minds to take what might befall them. There would be no use in their crying out, that this starving wretch was out of the line of political economy, and that other was a bad practical philosopher. All these errors would be trifling peccadilloes, compared with the grand stalking wrong, that was at the bottom of the well or ill directed resistance of the community. Nothing can be more eminently typical of passive moderation, joined to considerable powers both of offence and defence, than a drove of oxen under the guidance of humanity and wisdom; but let them be once goaded into madness by the feeling of intolerable suffering, and it is no excuse for the authors of the mischief, that they will stick a peer of parliament as soon as the basest of their persecutors. The ignorant and the poor—those who are ignorant because they are poor, and poor because they are ignorant, and whom laws have been passed to make both one and the other—cannot be expected to reason like doctors in divinity, while suffering under evils the smallest of which would fill a gazette if it could by possibility happen to the authors of their pain;—evils as distinctly referable, in all their branches, to the voluntary and determined acts of those who are the causes of the infliction, as the sounds of a musical instrument are to the striking of the keys;—evils which, they have been told over and over, and will be told again to-morrow, and the day after that, exist, simply because their betters would have it so, and because the portions of the higher classes who think they gain by wrong, are more numerous, united, and active than those of the same classes who set themselves in opposition to it. It is no secret; the members of the existing government avowedly hold office by the confession of the necessity for reform; and never in the history of mankind was reform so necessary, as in a country whose commercial policy is one continuous fraud upon the industrious classes, for the benefit of those whose trade and calling it is to live without working. If the labouring man eats bread, a payment is to be made for the maintenance of one portion of the aristocracy,—there is no mistake, there can be no mistake,—the aristocracy; though the receivers themselves are losing more at one end than they are gaining at the other, with the possible exception of those who are born to the right of providing for their children out of the public purse. If he aspires to tea, he must pay for the support of another portion somewhere else; and if he dreams of sugar, he must keep another; and to crown all, if liberation from any of these abuses is demanded for him, he is told plainly that there shall be no remission of the abuse unless he buys it at full value from the holder. He is the horse, the ass, the mule, who is to be saddled with every "splendid lazzarone" that finds himself too lazy to walk. It is not enough that he is to abstain from his rich neighbour's property, and even to defend it at the hazard of his life when called upon; but this property is to be held imperfect, and but half conducive to the enjoyments of the owner, unless it can be employed to double itself out of the basket of the poor. If the world's history were looked through, there would not—with the single exception of negro slavery—be found so glaring and huge an instance of the abuse of power, and the general misery consequent on giving one selfish class the right of legislation for the rest, as is presented by the commercial policy of this most ill-used country.

We suspect this is little short of sedition, and the most dangerous of seditions.

THE FACTORY FRAUD.—A race of artisans is cut off by the interested persons from the free exchange of their labour, and forced thereby to exchange three hours' work instead of two for a given quantity of food at the permitted shops. And then, so feeble is the popular mind, so easily diverted from following the scent of injury, that it absolutely blesses the individuals who come forward to declare, "We have made you give us eighteen hours' work for the corn of twelve; and now see what we'll do for you. We'll pass a law, that none of you shall work more than twelve hours a-day. It is quite enough; you must not be cruel to yourselves, or children either; do not let an irrational desire for corn, like the irrational desire for business which haunts your masters, induce you to work more than would be for your health. We know your industrious dispositions; but we can't consent. We get your twelve hours' labour for two-thirds the corn; and our consciences would be uneasy if we thought you were overworking yourselves besides."

OXFORD'S CASE.—The powers that be, were the organizers of the attempt. There must be a licenser of plays, to prevent the wholesome progress of opinion from appearing on the stage; and while he excludes the salutary food, he caters for the relaxation of the working community the unmanly ribaldry of "Jack Sheppard." The rising generation of pot-boys are taught through her Majesty's officer to seek the bubble reputation at the gallows' foot; and then the public is astonished that a noodle squibs off at the Queen.

DISCREPANCY IN DEATH PUNISHMENTS.—The people would do well to demand (if they can demand anything) that the crime of violence to women should be among the last from which the punishment of death is taken away. One principal test which places an act in the first class of crime, is that it is irremediable; and in this quality the crime in question, is prominent in a degree only to be equalled by the crime of murder. But I speak advisedly in saying, that among the aristocracy who rule over us, there is a great apathy to dangers of this kind affecting the "lower orders." Who, indeed, can feel much for coarse girls who carry about pots of beer to rude and sometimes half-intoxicated men,—girls to be found by themselves in narrow lanes, doing some vulgar master's bidding, at hours when aristocracy would hardly think herself safe within the walls of a carriage? There is not a daughter of a man of three hundred pounds a-year, (which is the lowest qualification for the House of Commons,) violated in a century; why then should the law be strict, where the lawgiver has so little risk to run?

THE SUFFERING RICH.—The public has been assured, over and over, that tithes are at least as ancient as Melchizedek; and in England it is certain they have belonged to the true church since the Saxon heptarchy. Every man knows, as he knows that, at a restaurateur's, the less he eats the less he has to pay for, that the farmer whose land pays tithes, pays less rent to the landlord; ergo the tithe is, and always was, a portion of the rent in possession of the church. The invitation of the Whig organ therefore to the not-knowing-what-to-do-with-their-money inhabitants of England, is, that they should set about paying the landlords for that compact of their ancestors, by which, for the salvation of their souls, they agreed to give tithe of their produce to the church in the days of Ethelwulf. It is well they are not asked to pay the Jews, for what their forefather gave Melchizedek. The fairest thing in the world would be, that if the plan succeeds, the souls of the ancestors should be turned into purgatory by inversion of the bargain; and till it is ascertained they are, John Bull will be much departing from his proverbial tenacity of fair play, if he consents to the new arrangement. No man has a right to eat his cake and have his cake; and if the lords of the bloody hand chose to wash off the recollections of homicide and the droit de seigneur by a bonus to the priesthood, for the chance of pushing past St. Peter as virgins pure and white,—it seems to form the weakest of all reasons why a Manchester operative of the present day should pay the expense by a tax on his children's bread. Either he feudal ancestors had a right to alienate to the priesthood, or they had not. If they had, why talk of taking it from the people now? If they had not, take it from the priests who have it, not from the people who never had it. This is sound popular justice; and all the whiggery in the world will never make it otherwise. If the people of England have a grain of sense or spirit, the Whigs will have moved a hornet's nest by this attempt to saddle them with compensation to the landlords for the tithes their ancestors gave away. . . . . The landlords have been their own "law-givers." They have kept everybody from being on the jury with them, that did not swear to an interest in the question in debate. And yet they say they have so arranged matters, that they have laid the public burthens desperately hard upon themselves, and must needs have the Corn Laws to do themselves common justice.

It certainly is not an ordinary thing, for men who, like Sancho, flog themselves, to lay on too hard; and there is something fearfully suspicious in a claim for having done it. Suppose the brewers in a parish were found to have contrived to enact, that no man should be of the vestry who did not swear to an interest in breweries and malt-kilns. And fancy they were found asserting, that in the exercise of their self-appointed office, they had found it imperative to lay the rates particularly hard on brewers; as a consequence of which they saw an insuperable necessity for laying twopence on every pot of beer consumed within the parish, and drawing a cordon about the boundaries to keep out other drink. Is there a population in any parish in the kingdom, that would be the dupes of such a barefaced iniquity,—or a breed of brewers that durst face the chances of such a plot! And why is the universal British people to be more stupid than the fragment; or the experiment any safer for the large mass of dishonesty than for the small?

The author of these Exercises would, we are sure, approve the motive which has led us, in the above gleanings, to study the useful and the telling, rather than the witty and brilliant.

SERIAL AND PERIODICAL WORKS.

M'CULLOCH'S GEOGRAPHICAL AND STATISTICAL DICTIONARY, Part XVI.—Here we have the conclusion of a valuable work, containing more useful information than was ever before compressed and condensed into the same compendious bulk; and yet it is remarkable with what fulness, as well as minute accuracy of detail, many articles are given.

ABEDNEGO THE MONEY-LENDER.

BY MRS. GORE.

CHAPTER XV.

"But when I tell you," cried the inconsiderate Lady Winterfield, as Basil drew near,—(little suspecting that a third person was within reach, to note the artifices by which she was attempting to recommend herself to the hard heart of the Money-lender,)—"when I tell you that this is the last time I will ever trouble you with an application?"

"You have told me the same thing, Madam, these half-a-dozen last times!" replied, in his coldest and most deliberate voice, the imperturbable Abednego. "I had the honour of assuring you, during the hurried visit you made to town from Brighton, before Christmas, that it would be totally out of my power to accommodate you further. My advances already exceed the value of the jewels deposited."

"Nonsense!—Don't I know the sum of money they cost Lord Winterfield, on our marriage, only five years ago? I have still by me the jeweller's bills, which I can show you!"

"Can you also show me the jeweller's conscience?" retorted Abednego. "Such articles are invariably sold at two-thirds beyond their intrinsic value. To convince you, Madam, of this, so far from making you a further loan, I am most anxious to replace the diamonds in your keeping, on receiving back, with interest, the amount advanced on such security."

"You say this," cried Lady Winterfield, pettishly, "only because you know that it is utterly out of my power to return it. You are aware that nothing but extreme necessity ever compelled me to place the jewels in your hands; and now, you insult me by wishing to recall a loan you are aware that I cannot repay!—How do you suppose, pray, that I am to obtain such a sum of money?"

"That is your ladyship's affair. When, by your tears and entreaties, you extorted it from me, you assured me that your embarrassments were temporary, and that you would very shortly be able to clear yourself."

"Yes!—of course!—I said all that is usually said to Money-lenders—"

"All that may be usually said to Money-lenders by fashionable Countesses in distress. But I can assure your ladyship, strange as you may think it, that there are persons in the world who hold sacred the redemption of their honest word, even when pledged to a Money-lender!—With respect to the extreme necessity you urge as a plea for placing in my hands your family jewels, I must be permitted to say that I have seen your ladyship's establishment, that I have been allowed the honour of entering your ladyship's drawing-room—very different, I admit, from my own," continued A. O., glancing round the cold, wainscoted, unfurnished room, the boards of which were covered with a square of discoloured Scotch carpet,—"but equally far from inspiring me with compassion for the destitution of the owner!"

"We are bound, in this world, to keep up the decencies of life due to our position in society!" interrupted the Countess, in a haughty tone.

"I thoroughly agree with your ladyship," was the fearless reply of Abednego,—"and it is precisely for that reason I have it at heart to see the valuables of the Countess of Winterfield removed from the custody of a money-lending Jew."

His lovely visiter blushed to the temples at this unexpected retort, but more in anger than in sorrow.

"A step lower in the scale of degradation," calmly resumed Abednego, "and they would appear among the unredeemed pledges in a pawn-broker's window. Think of the brilliant Countess of Winterfield presenting herself at Court with duplicates in her pocket!"

"You presume upon my necessities to insult me thus!"—cried the indignant woman, roused by this terrible sentence.

"Necessities, Madam, permit me to observe, wholly of your own creation! I am not unfrequently compelled to witness the woes of my fellow-creatures,—ay, even those of your own sex. But how different is their nature from those of which you complain! Trust me, there are severer pangs in the world than arise from the rumpling of the rose-leaf!—I have seen mothers of families struggling for their children's bread;—I have seen devoted wives beggared by the improvidence of their husbands, yet exerting themselves diligently, humbly, and silently, to extricate themselves from ruin. Such misfortunes, Madam, and such penury, I respect. Nay, I have known well-born women subject themselves to wretchedness and privation, for the sake of their lovers,—and even those I have respected!—But I have neither respect nor pity for the wantonness of waste that purports only the entanglement of frivolous admirers. The display intended to deceive some unhappy dupe into offering you his hand, moves only my contempt. If you must needs have an opera-box, for the young Marquis to sit beside you throughout the evening as throughout the morning,—if you must needs have a succession of showy dresses, to enhance your beauty to secure these danglers,—if you must needs have brilliant equipages to fly about the town,—to wander from races to breakfasts,—from Greenwich parties to pic-nics at Ken Wood, (your ladyship perceives that I am tolerably well versed in your movements!)—have them at other cost than mine!—I have no money to throw away on the maintenance of your follies."

Lady Winterfield started up.—Galled beyond endurance by the humiliations thus inflicted upon her, she resolved to obey the harsh injunction of Abednego, and seek assistance elsewhere. But alas! a moment's reflection served to remind her that she had already sought it, and in vain;—that she had no resource—no hope—save in the insolent rebuker of her faults. She submitted, therefore,—rendered docile by the iron pressure of necessity. In a moment she subdued her temper, and humbled her pride,—reduced to tameness like the beasts of the field, by the pangs of privation!

"You are most severe upon me," said she, in the pretty coaxing voice that none knew better how to assume when her purpose needed,—"though perhaps not more so than I deserve. But when I assure you, that if you persist in refusing me this five hundred pounds I am utterly ruined—ruined both in fortune and reputation—"

"My refusal will not render your ladyship a shilling poorer than you are now. In what way, therefore, can you charge me with your ruin?"

"You will have, at least, exposed it to the world."

Abednego shrugged his shoulders. "You expose yourself, Madam," said he, "by using such arguments!—Once for all, I repeat that you are wasting the substance of others, and of your children, merely to keep up false appearances in the world. So long as you enjoy luxuries which you do not and cannot pay for, you are shining at the cost of your coach-makers, jewellers, milliners, money-lenders,—the abject obligee of humble tradesmen. At this moment—woman and Countess as you are—you stand before me as an inferior. Though you may be a Countess of the realm, and I the vilified A. O.,—I rise above you as a capitalist,—I rise above you as a moralist, in whose hands you have placed weapons of offence."

It was now the turn of Lady Winterfield to shrug her shoulders; but with impatience rather than contempt.

"Last week," resumed Abednego, careless of the variations of her countenance,—"there came hither to me a woman young and lovely as yourself, who, like yourself, had exceeded her means, and broken her engagements. She came hither to me, not like your ladyship,—hoping to move me to pity by the sight of her loveliness and her affected despair,—she had other arms for the combat; and those arms, Madam, prevailed!—To her I assigned thrice the sum of her original debt, and at my own instigation."

"And of what nature were those arms?"—demanded Lady Winterfield, colouring deeply, and by casting down her eyes, showing that she was prepared for expressions of gallantry and admiration on the part of one whom she loathed like a harpy.

"It avails little to explain," replied Abednego, with an ill-repressed smile of exultation, as he rose from his chair and approached her; and the blood of Basil Annesley boiled in his veins, and he pressed his knee closer upon the wooden bench, while inclining his eyes towards the grated aperture, "for they are such as it were, perhaps, unbecoming so great a lady as the Countess of Winterfield to put to profit."

"I am willing to use any arms,—make any concession," faltered the fair bankrupt,—a deadly paleness succeeding to her previous flush, as she contemplated the growing audacity of the Money-lender.

Abednego folded his meagre hands carelessly before him, and throwing back his head stood contemplating her from head to foot, with a smile of indescribable expression. It was impossible to behold a more lovely woman; and the Money-lender gazed upon her as if taking an appraisement of her charms.

"The arms to which I alluded, are not at your ladyship's disposal!" was at length his sarcastic reply. "For they were tears of genuine remorse for an involuntary breach of faith;—they were the worn and haggard looks which labour and want impose upon the fairest face.—She was a woman of the people, Madam;—like you, left young, a widow,—like you, with helpless children dependent upon her prudence. She told me—and her mien attested her veracity—that for them she had toiled day and night,—for them abstained from food and rest. But the outlay that was to set her up in business, (borrowed of one of the agents of A. O., and at usurious interest,) was still unrepaid. She was still poor, still insolvent, still needing indulgence; and came hither, like the fashionable Countess of Winterfield, to beg for mercy!"

Greatly relieved, even while writhing under the severe lesson imparted by Abednego, the fashionable spendthrift gasped for breath.

"I granted it!"—resumed the harsh admonitor. "And I granted her also my respect,—almost my affection. The old Money-lender soothed her as a father might have done, and sent her home in peace and comfort to her children.—Yours, Madam, will have less to thank you for!—I will not expose you,—I will not pursue you with the rigour of the law. But I choose to retain in security for the property of mine which you have squandered, the diamonds pledged to me, to that effect; and without affording you another guinea in extension of the loan,—aware that neither that, nor millions, would impede your ruin and disgrace."

"Then I am lost!" cried Lady Winterfield, losing all self-possession and unable to restrain her tears—"Those precious diamonds—"

"Those diamonds, Madam, you do well to prize, resumed Abednego. "They were the bridal gift of one who bestowed his heart upon you, confiding in the promise of a fair exterior;—who intrusted his honour to you, believing in the truth of your affections;—who, on his dying bed, bequeathed his children to your care, believing that all his love and confidence could not have been bestowed in vain! You do well, therefore, to prize the tokens of his love!—But, trust me, they are safer in my keeping than in your own!"

"But if I can obtain from some other person upon them," persisted the humbled woman, clasping her hands in intercession, while tears streamed wildly down her cheeks,—"a sufficient amount to repay you what I have borrowed, with the additional sum needful to repair my shattered affairs?"

"You cannot!"—interrupted Abednego, "I have weighed them to the uttermost carat; and the most liberal diamond-merchant could not afford you in purchase within fifty pounds of the sum you have received from myself as a loan.—Few better lapidaries in this town than myself!"

"But if you would permit me to try!"—persisted the lady, half remonstrating, half wheedling.—

"No, Madam!" replied the Money-lender, with a significant smile.—"You are not to be trusted with such valuable property. I could place those diamonds in the hands of the poor workwoman of whom I spake, with a far more sanguine hope of their safe return, than in those of the Right Honourable Countess of Winterfield!"

At that moment, there recurred to the mind of Basil Annesley, a vision of this brilliant woman of fashion at the sale at Rochester House, laughing and talking amid a group of the most distinguished noblemen of the day, to whom her smiles conveyed rapture, and to whom her merest word was a law.

"Then nothing remains for me but death!" cried the distracted lady, throwing back from her face her silken ringlets, intermingled with the filmy drapery of Brussels lace attached to her tiny French bonnet.—"May you never live to repent, Sir, the injury you have this day inflicted upon me and mine!"

"People rarely give up the ghost a day the sooner for threats of self-destruction," replied the unimpressionable Abednego.—"Your ladyship will, I trust, live long,—long enough for retrenchment,—long enough for repentance!"

"Remorseless man!"—cried Lady Winterfield, even in the midst of her genuine tears, unable to renounce her habitual affectation.—"Will nothing move your obdurate heart?—Must I implore you on my bended knees?—Must I—"

"Spare yourself these exaggerations, Madam,"—coolly interposed Abednego. "I am too much used to listen to the pourings forth of human passion, not to decide in a moment what feelings are genuine,—what assumed to move my compassion. Want, Madam, possesses an iron key to the innermost recesses of the human heart,—the recesses where eloquence lies glowing, like the lava within the volcano;—and that key is often turned in my presence. The merchant trembling for his credit,—the soldier for his honour,—the husband for the peace of his fireside,—mothers who would screen the faults of their children,—children tortured by the necessities of their parents,—all these, Madam, plead to me in turns, and often plead in vain. Judge, therefore,—since I can resist the manly struggles of an upright man on the verge of bankruptcy,—of a wife agonized by the prospects of an honourable husband's imprisonment and shame,—whether I am likely to be touched by a few graceful attitudes arising from the extortions of a milliner's bill, or the claims of a compounder of fashionable cosmetics?"

Lady Winterfield now started up with an indignation of wounded pride, far more genuine than her attempts at pathos.

"I was a fool," cried she, "to expect from a Money-lender the sentiments of a man! Do not, however, fancy that you will trample upon me with impunity. You may be compelled to restore those jewels by higher authority than mine. My lawyer assures me you are liable to prosecution for usurious practices against me;—my lawyer assures me you are far more in my power than I in yours. Since you choose to declare war against me, take the consequences!—I promise you that, with all your vulgar effrontery, you shall have the worst of it."

Abednego smiled sarcastically at this sudden transition from the fine lady to the virago.

"I am almost beginning to feel alarmed, Madam," said he. "Suffer me to ring for your carriage.—It will be a relief to my terrors, as well as to your emotions."

He rose from his seat as he spoke; and for a moment, Basil Annesley apprehended that, by one of those effects of legerdemain, (of which he was now beginning to be ever in expectation when dealing with A. O.,) the host and his visiter might find it necessary to invade his retreat to secure egress from the house. But it was not so.—Scarely had Abednego touched the bell lying on his bureau, when an opposite door was partially thrown open, by a brazen-fronted clerk, (having a pen behind his ear, so admirably fitted to the locality that it seemed to have come with him into the world,) who instantly fixed his hard, light-coloured, predial eye scrutinizingly on the lady, as though the habit of officiating for the Money-lender had endowed him with the power of reading in the faces of his clients the success or failure of their mission.

"See this lady to her carriage, Raffles," said Abednego, assuming his usual place at his bureau, with so determined an air of attention to business, as conveyed a sentence of dismissal. "Her ladyship is in haste."

Too proud to exhibit to a low subordinate, probably as impracticable as his employer, the misery gnawing at her heart, Lady Winterfield drew the Brussels lace closer round her face; and, by an habitual impulse of affectation, lifting her silken pelisse from the ground, as if afraid of contact with the vulgar earth, quitted the room, escorted by her singular esquire; who, throwing open wide the folding doors, probably in derision, as if to give passage to some august personage, revealed to view beyond, a handsome apartment richly hung with pictures. It was evident, therefore, to Basil that he was ensconced in the unsuspected issue of some substantial residence. Remembering well the sudden apparition of the Money-lender as if emerging from a panel in the wall, when he himself first sought him as a client, he doubted not that some similar den had enabled Abednego to watch and surprise his actions. Indignant at the idea of this treachery, he was not sorry to have retaliated upon Osalez, by becoming an unsuspected witness of his privacy, before he gave him warning of his involuntary presence in the trap.

Scarcely had the door closed upon the Countess, when, flinging down the pen by which he had signified his decree of dismissal, he resumed his place in his arm-chair, throwing himself back into it with an expansion of self-indulgence, as if luxuriating in the idea of the torture he had been inflicting.—Rubbing his withered hands with an air of exultation, a hearty laugh burst from his leathern cheeks, the hollowness of which thrilled to the marrow the frame of the warm-hearted young auditor.

"Dreadful!"—was the shuddering response of Basil to the triumphant laugh of Abednego. But before he had time to pronounce his purposed warning of the presence of an intruder, the opposite door was again thrown open; and Annesley felt instantly revolted by the apprehension that the unfortunate victim of folly and frivolity might be returning for the fruitless renewal of her supplications. It was a relief to him when the bold-faced clerk entered alone.

"And what amount of bribe did the pretty fool offer you by the way, eh! Raffles, to induce you to influence me favourably in her behalf?"—demanded Abednego, still chuckling.

"You seem to have an instinctive insight into these matters, Sir," said the clerk, with a facetious grin. "Her ladyship offered me ten per cent, if, through you or any other Money-lender, I could effect a levy for her. It was unnecessary to apprize so fine a lady that it is worth your while to pay me so liberal a salary to be honest, that honesty is every way my best policy. Poor soul!—I was almost sorry for her on handing her into the spiry-looking turn-out waiting for her opposite the compting-house door."

"Keep your pity, my good friend, for worthier objects," cried the Money-lender, proceeding to sort some papers on the table beside him. "I have been giving the foolish woman a lesson she will not easily forget. To no purpose, however—a mere waste of eloquence! The moth will singe her silly wings again—nay, probably perish in the flame, the first opportunity."

"Scarcely five-and twenty, (to judge by her appearance,)" cried the confidential clerk,—"yet already debased by transactions with the Jews.—It is afflicting! It is positively afflicting."

"Her ladyship's bright eyes seem to have wrought the charm upon the man, which they had attempted in vain to work upon the master!" cried Abednego, with a sneer. "You are growing as soft as a bale of cotton, Raffles!—Take heed, my man, or you will become unfit for your employment. However, since this cunning hussy seems to have touched your compassion, you shall even carry her the cheque, by means of which I intend to prevent her, not from flinging herself into the Serpentine, or buying two penny-worth of ratsbane,—of neither of which feats she has further purpose than you or I,—but to preserve her already tarnished name from becoming as black as such excess of levity on the part of the mother of a family might well render it. I have intimated to one of her brothers, —a gallant man, to whom her honour is dear—the mad course she is pursuing; and till he arrive in town, am bound to exercise some providence over her destinies."

"You intend then, Sir, to accede to her request for this further loan?"—said the clerk, evidently astonished. "You will please to remember, however, that I have duly apprized you the security is already exceeded."

"I know it—I know it! Curse the security! Have I not security twice as sterling in her dread of exposure?"

"But if she have not the means of paying, however much exposed?"

"Her family have. The pledge of a name such as hers is as good as diamonds or gold-dust. But at what are you grinning, Sir?"

"At the idea of all the invectives so uselessly wasted by the Countess, between this chamber and her carriage."

"Ay!—I can imagine the torrent of abuse she let forth against poor A. O. The way with them all!—Unless one consent to be fleeced like the rest of their creditors, one becomes dog, curmudgeon, robber, JEW! The poor initials of A. O. have been made the object of more execrations, I suspect, than any other combination of the letters of the alphabet."

"But surely, Sir, since you intended to oblige her, you might have spared her the terrible moments of suspense she has had to undergo."

"And the sermon that preceded it, eh? No, no, Raffles! It is because I intended to rescue her out of the jaws of perdition, that I had the courage to reprove. I am too cruel, eh, to these young and tender sinners? I tell you, it were as reasonable to tax the surgeon with cruelty who amputates some gangrened limb to preserve the life of a patient. But enough of this. Let her have her money before five o'clock. By the way, cash the cheque I have written, as you go along the Strand, —which will secure her from the humiliation of presenting the draught of a Money-lender. She will attribute my relenting, of course, to the eloquence wrung out of you by the influence of her proffered ten per cent. Ha! ha! ha!—Better so! It would be the ruin of me if I got the reputation of being chicken-hearted. By the way, you have given instructions, I hope, to Cognovit, to proceed against the old Viscount?"

"I have, Sir."

"And to make out a writ against—"

Basil Annesley now shouted so loudly as to disturb the equanimity of both the Money-lender and his clerk, for he had no wish to pry more extensively into such transactions as he foresaw were about to be disclosed.

"Who the deuce is in the pigeon-hole?" demanded Abednego.

"It is certainly not the voice of Zebedee!"—replied Raffles;—and before Basil could reiterate his signal, part of the wall seemed to recede beside him; the moveable panel, dividing the trap from the council-chamber of the Money-lender, being withdrawn.

The confidential clerk instantly collared the skulking stranger.

"Your pistols, Sir, your pistols!" shouted Raffles to his superior,—"'tis some housebreaker,—some burglar. I have him fast!"

"Loose him again then,—and thank your stars that your noisy zeal has not tempted me into shooting through the head one but for whose aid you would have been now thrown masterless on the world!" cried Abednego, who, having snatched a pistol from his bureau and confronted the open panel, instantly descried through the doubtful light, that it was no other than the young guardsman, who was struggling in the grasp of his deputy.

"I have sought you in many strange places, Mr. Osalez," observed Basil, calmly stepping into the room, on finding himself released, "and found you sometimes in others equally strange, where your presence was wholly unlooked-for. On the present occasion, I had no intention of becoming a spy upon your actions. Though in search of you and at your own desire,—I swear to you that I knew not, when I was thrust into yonder disgraceful cell, to what sort of retreat I was proceeding."

"No need of an oath to confirm your statement!" replied A. O., not in the slightest degree embarrassed; "since, unless favoured by the pass-key of one of my agents, it had been impossible for you to wind your way into one of the most secret of my places of resort. Nevertheless, since you are beginning to affect compunctions of conscience about visiting the den of a Money-lender, it may not be amiss to remind you that, once upon a time, a certain Mr. Basil Annesley—"

"Visited, on a similar errand, a certain A. O.!" replied the involuntary spy. "But I came not then as a friend,—I came not, as now, to—"

"You came then, PRECISELY upon the same errand as now!" retorted Abednego, firmly. "You came, and come, in the hopes of benefiting Verelst. Nay, wherefore deny it?—Can you exhibit a better passport to my regard than solicitude for the welfare of my sister's family?"

The astonished clerk lost for a moment his professional air of callous effrontery, in utter amazement,—first, at hearing the old Money-lender address, in a tone of affectionate interest, a well-dressed young man of Basil's manners and appearance; and secondly, at an avowal of kinsmanship with any mortal living on the part of A. O., whom he had hitherto regarded as an insulated being—a sort of mysterious automaton composed of gold and arithmetic, who was equally likely to have emerged from the Great Pyramid or from St. Giles's Charity School,—so utterly disconnected did he appear from the ordinary associations of life. It was highly mortifying to the astonished and inquisitive Raffles, when, a moment afterwards, Abednego signified his desire to be alone with his handsome young visiter; and, apparently on his guard against the habits of duplicity he had inculcated into his subordinates, followed him gravely across the dining-room as he retreated, and carefully locked the door upon him after his departure; an unmistakeable signal, in that mysterious establishment, that no possible emergency, short of the house being on fire, was to entitle the people of the Money-lender to intrude upon his privacy.

"And now," said Abednego, after returning to the room, and reinstalling himself in his sanctum, "seat yourself, I entreat, and let us have a few minutes' unmolested conversation."

"Excuse me," replied Basil, glancing through the still open panel along the dark corridor,—"I have left my horse yonder in the street, under the care of an utter stranger—"

"Under the care of one of my confidential agents, or you would not be here!" retorted Abednego.—"Fear nothing! Zebedee has something of a taste for horse-flesh. It was him I employed to seize the Duke of Rochester's stud at Newmarket. The fellow will take good care of your hack."

So saying, he closed the panel, by a spring, and came and sat himself down over against Basil, in the arm-chair in which he had mused so exultingly after the departure of the Countess of Winterfield.—But with his usual tact of discrimination, he instantaneously discerned the unfavourable impression made on the young man by the scene he had recently witnessed. Young Annesley was cold, unexpansive, uncordial—neither disposed to receive with applause the biting jests of his companion, nor to listen with respect to his homilies. The open-hearted soldier seemed resolved to demonstrate his consciousness of being in the company of a professional Money-lender.

For some minutes, Abednego attempted to wrestle with this sudden mistrust; but finding all his efforts to raise a smile or command attention abortive, he suddenly burst forth into a more genuine strain.

"I see how it is!" cried he. "I have lost your regard,—I have lost your friendship. The warm interest of a young heart like yours fell like dew upon my old age, reviving feelings I had never expected to find reëxistent in my withered heart; and already the fountain is dried up,—the desert again parched. Master as I am of millions, that first spontaneous impulse of human sympathy towards me, I prized above them all!—And now, you hate me!—I see it in your face,—I hear it in your voice, or rather in your silence!—Do not deny it,—Basil Annesley, you are on the verge of loathing and despising the unfortunate A. O.!"

"Unfortunate!" reiterated Basil, with a smile.

"Ay! most unfortunate!" reiterated Abednego. "A victim from his birth—before his birth,—a foredoomed outcast,—a predestined paria,—a—"

"Pause for a moment, Mr. Osalez," interposed Basil. "Far be it from me to surprise the secrets of your prison-house. Reflect, I entreat, before you enter into rash confidences which you may be hereafter disposed to repent!"

"No!" cried the Money-lender, his countenance evincing tokens of uncontrollable emotion. "The time is come!—I feel that I cannot support the withering weight of your contempt. I must speak or die!—I must vindicate myself. Let there be, at least, one human being entitled to examine and dispassionately judge the real position and provocations of Abednego Osalez.

"In that name, Basil, consists the secret of my destinies!"—resumed the Money-lender, after a pause,—"for it is that of—a JEW!—incontestably that of a Jew. Comport myself as I may, in accordance with all Christian Canons,—though I may fear GOD and love my neighbour as myself—nay, though, as St. Paul hath it, I give my body to be burned,—what profiteth it to me?—I bear a Jewish name!—My patronymic smells of the Synagogue! I am a Jew,—I must be a Jew,—the world avoucheth it, and who is to gainsay the world? Opinion—vulgar opinion! hath placed me among the children of Israel! Basil Annesley,—such is the influence that hath overmastered the impulses of nature,—such is the social tyranny that hath made me what I am!

"Listen to my story!—

"I was born,—as Verelst has probably informed you,—the only son of a wealthy merchant of Cadiz, trading with the whole commercial world, but chiefly with England,—my mother, and my father's mother, being alike natives of that country. It was, in fact, on the marriage of my grandfather with a young Protestant of honourable extraction, a countrywoman of your own, that he renounced the church of his forefathers,—thereby entitling himself to all the charities and indulgences of the Christian faith. His recantation was an act of pure conviction; for my grandfather, rich as a Doria or a Medici, was a man of spirit and intelligence; and even the passion he had conceived for the daughter of an English admiral, would not have beguiled him into a capitulation of conscience. By his conversion, he turned, of course, against himself the hands and hearts of his own people. He made enemies of kith and kin. All those in whose veins his blood was flowing soon proved, to him and to the world, that those kindred drops were converted to the bitterness of gall. Had he not a right, however, to conclude that the church to whose bosom he had betaken himself, would strive to heal the wounds inflicted by their malice? Had he not cause to believe, that the newly-converted Christian would be, by Christians, Christianly entreated?

"It was not so.—In Cadiz, where he abided, the people were at that time illiterate bigots; and to the end of his days, my grandfather's sumptuous mansion was pointed out by the populace as that of 'Osalez the Jew.' Had he embraced the Catholic faith, the case might have been different. But the burnt-offerings of his zeal smoked not on the altars of their cathedral,—and they consequently persisted in opprobriating him as 'Osalez the JEW!'

"Of that time I remember nothing! My grandfather died soon after I saw the light;—but I remember overhearing legendary whisperings by our fireside, betwixt his venerable widow and my father, of the times when, on any occasion of popular tumult, it became essential to conciliate the populace by prodigal benefactions, lest they should attack and spoliate in the harbour or on the quays the vessels or merchandise of 'the Jew of Cadiz.'

"Was this rational?—Has not the God of Christians expressly declared, that there is more joy in Heaven over the sinner that repenteth, than over the ninety and nine just persons who need no repentance?—And which, I pray you, hath done more for the Christian church,—the man who sacrifices the love of kindred, and the predilections and belief of his ancestors, to cling to the Cross—or he to whom a lukewarm faith is transmitted by his forefathers, who accepts it unexamined, yet prospers under the green olive groves of ecclesiastical protection, while the Jewish neophyte is compelled to drag, as a burthen in the dust, the galling weight of that Cross, which he hath voluntarily and zealously adopted?

"Again I ask, Basil Annesley, is this rational!—But when was the population of a priest-ridden country ever rational?—My father, who, at his mother's desire, had been educated in her native country, was deeply affected by the mistrust and evil dealing. In England, therefore, did he linger, even after his education was completed. In England, did he love, and wed, and become a father; nor was it till after my birth, that the sudden death of his father compelled him to return to Cadiz. Fain would he, from that moment, have extricated himself from commercial life,—realized his property, and established himself permanently in the land of religious freedom and scientific enlightenment.—But it was impossible!—His capital was so widely diffused,—his foreign connexions (especially with the English colonies in the East) were of so widely spreading a nature,—that the remainder of his life was expended in attempting to destroy the root of these ramifications, in order to abjure the merchant craft.

"Nothing more heart-gnawing than the bitterness engendered by consciousness of a defeated purpose. Osalez—'the son of the Jew,'—though the wealthiest citizen in Cadiz, while his vessels were hailed in every port of Europe, and while his voice decreed the existence of plenty or famine for hundreds of thousands,—was a miserable man. The corn, wine, and oil, in his rich warehouses conveyed no food to his soul. In Spain,—in Catholic Spain,—he seemed to stand aloof from the community, as his father had done before him. He became a widower; and not the poorest of his brother merchants would have been content to bestow his daughter in marriage upon 'the son of Osalez the JEW!'

"Again I ask you, Basil Annesley, was this rational?—My poor father, fancying that in England,—liberal England,—such prejudices were unadmitted, still looked forward. The time would come, he fancied, when he should find a successor rich enough to undertake his speculations, and invest millions in his vast undertakings; 'and then, my boy,' was ever and ever his cry, 'then will I set up my staff in the happiest and freest country in the world.—England is the land of commerce. There the origin of our opulence will be respected; and the estates, in the purchase of which I intend to sink the greater portion of my capital, will give you a stake in the country entitling you to a voice in its legislation. You shall have a seat in Parliament, Abednego!—With your talents, and the education that is to perfect them, you may achieve public distinction, and become the founder of an honourable family. I could almost wish now that I had bestowed on you at your baptism a name savouring less of the repellent origin of our ancient house. But when you were christened, the old man my father was yet alive; and I shrunk from inflicting a pang upon his warm heart by appearing ashamed of the name he had inflicted on myself,—which was his own, and that of the father of his father. To the unlucky appellative of Abednego I have been myself indebted for half the odium attached in Cadiz to 'the son of Osalez the Jew.' Nevertheless, whenever that title of reprobation meets my ear, I think of my father's grey hairs, and am content;—so may it be with yourself!—Should you ever have to smart under its contumelious application, recall to mind the motives of your parents, and be patient.

"Such, Basil, were the views of this excellent man in affording me what is esteemed the first of English educations,—at a public school, and the university. He could bear to part with me; for he was again wedded, and the father of a little girl, whom he had piously named Rachael, after the custom of his family.

"I was a smart and forward boy. From my infancy I had received in my father's house that best of schooling, the society of the wise and liberal. The table of the rich Osalez was open to all that was enlightened or distinguished in his native city;—the Grand Hidalgos, whom it was so often in his power to oblige,—the Archbishop,—the Governor,—the Commandant,—the noblest and best in the place. The appointments and entertainments of our house were sumptuous as those of the merchant-princes of Italy; and to what level will not the meanness of empty pride descend, for the indulgence of its sensual pleasures!—I quitted Spain for England with the impression that we were a great and powerful family; and that I should find elsewhere, the consideration and obsequiousness I had met with from the guests and dependents of my father.

"The haughty boy was destined to a rough lesson! Shall I ever forget that first week at Eton!—shall I ever outlive the recollection of the swelling heart with which I nightly retired to my pillow, after hearing reiterated around me the opprobrious cry of—'Abednego the Jew!' In the course of the first day, not one of my young school-mates but had inquired after my brothers, Shadrach and Meshech.—The bed I was moistening with my tears was called the burning fiery furnace;—and not a morsel of my food but was embittered by offers of a slice of pork, or other savoury meats the object of Jewish abomination.—At length I turned upon my persecutors. Like other badgered schoolboys, I tried, in the first instance, the force of my puny arm, and fought, and was first beaten in the ring, and then chastised for having fought! I bore all bravely; because my triumphs as a scholar already afforded me a prospect of humiliating my adversaries with the force of higher weapons.—I felt greatness struggling within me.—My aspiring soul resolved to raise itself above the level of the gibbering lordlings by whom I was despised.—'They shall hear of me yet—they shall feel me yet!' was the inward suggestion that spurred on my lagging scholarship, till I became an object of general wonder; my English verses, my proficiency as a Grecian, being equally themes of praise. The masters began to cite me among themselves as a youth of singular promise, likely to distinguish himself in public life. Then came the habitual rejoinder—'Poor fellow!—with such abilities, it is a thousand pities he should be a Jew.'—'But he is not a Jew—neither he nor his parents!' was the indignant retort of the head master.—'Impossible!—the name!—"Abednego Osalez!"—Besides, look in his face,—only look at his face!—Eyes,—features,—hair,—there is Jew impressed in every lineament!'

"The first time remarks of this description reached my ear, I recalled to mind, with bitter consciousness, the air of sadness sometimes overspreading my father's countenance, as he gazed on my own. Often, when addressed by his parasites with laudations of my personal beauty, I had heard him murmur, while they were admiring the Oriental fire of my eyes, or glossy blackness of my hair, 'Would, would that he had inherited the northern fairness of his poor mother! My face may prove a disastrous portion for that noble boy!'—Prophetic words, Basil,—as the taunts of my school-mates, and more polished irony of my college companions, soon taught me to my cost!—

"Still, though wounded and smarting, I was not desperate.—I hated my name,—I detested my origin,—as the source of unjust aspersions; but I did not yet hate the world.—Just as my father and grandfather had said, in extenuation of the scoffs and mistrusts of Cadiz,—'These people are ignorant and priest-ridden; their insolence merits only our pity!'—did I say in my turn,—'Why heed the sarcasms of boys and striplings?—The award that is to determine my position in life must be pronounced by men and women!'—But of the spell included in that latter word, Basil, little did I then know to estimate the power!—At Oxford, politics became my favourite study. The burning ambition of my soul was to distinguish myself in Parliament.—I doubt whether the most fervent patriot ever panted with fonder desire for an occasion of serving his country, than I for the honours of senatorial renown. I was convinced that on the walls of the House of Commons hung the escutcheon of my future ennoblement.—It was there I had to win the laurels destined to replace the absence of an hereditary coronet;—

There, either I must live, or have no life!

"Never, for a moment, did I mistrust the strength of my own powers.—Like the Pythoness, I was conscious of the divinity within me. I felt myself to be master of my own destinies, and, through them, of the opinion of the world.—It was my ambition only to raise myself to the level of my fellow-creatures; to redeem myself from unmerited obloquy. The desire to set my foot upon the neck of mankind arose in later life. As yet, I dreamed only of what appeared easy of achievement: and, so long as the illusion lasted, was at peace with myself, and with the world!

"The covert insults that sometimes assailed me, fell unnoticed on my ear.—The name I was about to create for myself, would soon, I fancied, obliterate that of Abednego Osalez!

"Alas!—how should I have shuddered—how recoiled with horror—had any one, at that period, presumed to predict to me the humiliating career of the future A. O.!"

CHAPTER XVI.

It was not till after a pause of some minutes, during which the irritation of the Money-lender appeared somewhat soothed by the sympathy and interest manifested in his recital by his young companion, that he resumed, in a less-excited tone and manner.

"Mankind are more what they are made by mankind than what they are made by their Creator!" said Osalez. "The wolf is ferocious because hunted from a whelp.—The snake turns upon you because you disturb and pursue it.—The child grows surly, because unjustly coerced. But, above all, man becomes unjust and cruel, because pursued with cruelty and injustice by his brother man.—I was born, imbued with the original sin of human nature: yet certain am I that there were noble purposes in my soul, which the scorn of my fellow-creatures converted into wickedness. The germ of goodness was there; but, watered with poison, it brought forth deadly fruits!—

"Full of eagerness,—full of trust in myself and others, I entered into life. My father made me a splendid allowance,—an allowance doubling that of the richest nobleman at the university; and though this told against me in one sense, by the perpetual citation of 'The rich Osalez—rich—rich as a JEW!'—it enabled me to confer obligations ensuring me hosts of fashionable associates. For them, I was only 'Osalez,'—Osalez who had such famous hunters, such capital wine, and such a knowing curricle always at the service of his friends;—and to be my friend was consequently the pretension of half my acquaintance.—Those who delighted to dine and drive with me, or rather for me, introduced me to their families; and by degrees I became (on sufferance, though I little suspected it) a favoured guest in the beau monde.—I was happy, young, handsome,—as handsome as the Jewish physiognomy, which my grandfather's conversion could not efface from our hereditary nature, would permit.—I was admired,—flattered,—followed,—nay, fancied myself beloved!"——

"And why not?" said Basil Annesley, courteously, fancying that his excited companion paused for the encouragement of a kindly word.

"Why NOT?—Because my name was Abednego,—and because I looked like a Jew!—Listen, Basil!—I had won the highest honour of the university; and before entering the Parliamentary career, to which, at that period, money secured the entrée, I thought it my duty to visit my father. Would I could adequately describe the rapture with which he welcomed me, and the pride he took in my proficiency!—Would you could have seen the passionate admiration of my poor little sister, and the partial kindness of my stepmother!—In that household, more splendid than almost any of those I had left in London, I was a demi-god!

"I would fain pass over that epoch of my life!" said Abednego, in a lower voice. "The reminiscences it must awaken, may possibly expose me as a weakling in your eyes.—Nevertheless, to enable you to judge my cause,—all—all must be disclosed.

"It was winter, Basil. Leaving my hunters at the disposal of my shallow friends, I hurried to Cadiz, at a season when its climate is peculiarly grateful; and, after long immurement in the murky realm of Great Britain, dear, indeed, was my delight in the softness of that southern atmosphere, and the fragrance of its long-forgotten orange bloom.—Till then, I had not imagined the intensity of enjoyment which pleasures so purely physical can impart.—But they were not purely physical!—I enjoyed them so keenly, only because I shared them with another,—another—young, fair, noble, generous,—already dear, and soon to become dearer than my life!

"The family of an English nobleman was passing the winter at Cadiz, for the benefit of the health of an only son, who was supposed to inherit a consumptive tendency. One of his lordship's daughters—one of his three daughters—"

Again Abednego paused; and Basil Annesley, in spite of his eager and growing interest in the narrative, had the forbearance to entreat him once more to desist from his painful task. But at that suggestion, Abednego resumed his firmness.

"Till my arrival at home," said he, as if assuming a peremptory mastery over his emotions,—"these people—these noble exiles, had been overcome with ennui. With the exception of her to whom I have alluded, not one of the family was mentally endowed to find satisfaction in the mere beauties of nature, or the attractions of a strange country. Both father and sisters repined after the pleasures of the fashionable world; hungering and thirsting for news of society,—the gossip of the clubs—the frivolities of aristocratic life;—they welcomed me, therefore, with delight. The splendid entertainments of my father, to whom his lordship had brought letters of introduction as to the first merchant of the city, and in one of whose mansions he was domiciled, assumed a new charm in their eyes. They were constantly in the society of my stepmother, who was a pleasing and accomplished woman; and I,—I who appeared to belong to a world which, as regarded Cadiz, had hitherto been exclusively their own,—was admitted into their circle as a familiar and honoured guest.

"How I loved her, Basil Annesley, that youngest and fairest daughter of the house,"—resumed

Abednego, after a short pause,—"it matters not now to relate! How she loved me, my utmost protestations would scarcely entitle you to believe! We were of one mind—one heart! So short was our acquaintance ere it ripened into love, and soon into intensest passion, that it were fruitless to detail its progress. We were constantly together. At the opera,—in morning promenades,—in marine excursions, the wealth and influence of my father in the city enabled me to enhance and secure their enjoyments; while the presence of the woman of my heart sufficed solely to my own. What a dream it was!—what joy—what madness! Restrained, however, by the presence of her sisters, and, even at her tender age, conscious that I should be an unacceptable suitor to her haughty father, she was the first to propose clandestine meetings. The gardens of our two mansions nearly adjoined; and favoured by the climate, we met, as Southern lovers do, by stealth and in the quiet moonlight;—met often, and parted undiscovered. She was already my plighted wife. It needed only her father's sanction to make her mine for ever!—By her own desire, however, my formal demand for her hand was still delayed.

"'Your great riches,' said she, 'may something avail to smooth down the difficulties likely to arise on the part of my family.—Still, I foresee that your Jewish name and origin will form an obstacle all but insuperable. Render that name renowned, dearest Osalez, and half the difficulty will be overcome. Distinguish yourself in parliament. Even as contact with the divinity converted a gibbet into the emblem of salvation, the instincts of genius consecrate with distinction the most ignominious origin. Come to my father to claim my hand as one who has commanded the applause of senates, and he will not presume to treat you with the disdain I apprehend!'

"Stung by even the hint of scornful entreatment, my wounded pride stimulated me to fresh exertions; nay, gave me courage to bid her farewell, with a view to a speedier and more auspicious meeting. The family was to be in England early in the summer. By that time, I doubted not that opportunity would prosper all I meditated. The parliamentary agent employed by my father's London solicitors had made arrangements for my coming forward for a Government borough, on the creation of a batch of peers, whose patents were already in progress.

"To London, therefore, I hastened; sustained even in the anguish of parting from an object engrossing every feeling of my heart and soul, by the ardent desire to render myself worthy, or rather prove myself worthy of pretending to her hand. Not a moment did I mistrust my own powers. The University had fixed its imprimatur on my scholarship; and already the eyes of many were upon me. All I needed, to acquire a position in society, was the passport which parliamentary distinction, more especially at the period of a National crisis, such as was then imminent, rarely fails to confer.

'But alas!—the borough offered to me for purchase, by the inertness or incapacity of my agent, slipped through our hands;—and bitter was my disappointment on finding that a week's delay at Cadiz conceded to the prayers of that beloved being at the moment of bidding her farewell, had been fatal to our prospects.—So far from realizing the promises I had made her, she would find me on her return to England the same obscure individual who had quitted her; and perhaps hear me rejected by her proud father as 'the grandson of Osalez the Jew!'

"Distracted by this apprehension, and still more by the idea that, should I want courage to make the attempt, some more appropriate match might present itself, which the jealousy of her sisters (with whom she was no favourite, because the favourite of all the world beside) would induce his lordship to press upon her acceptance, I resolved to leave no effort unattempted, however rash, to accomplish my purpose. At that moment, the sudden death of one of the members for a Cathedral town, prospered my views. Aware that my father would consider no expenditure excessive which served our ends, I determined to dare the contest. With money—eloquence—an unblemished character,—the chances seemed most auspiciously in my favour. So, at least, I was assured by the solicitors, whose sole object in my election was the augmentation of their bill. They advised me to hurry down to L——, on the assurance of having smoothed my way to the hustings.

"Never shall I forget the elation of my spirits during that journey! I rejoiced at having declined the attendance of the men of business who had proposed bearing me company. For Hope was my companion by the way—promising all that can make glad the heart of youth,—a happy home,—a blessed, beauteous, loving wife,—and when tempted forth from my glad fireside, the esteem and honour of my fellow-men.

"Such were my feelings and aspirations, Basil, when, on a bright and sun-shiny afternoon, I entered L——! As I approached the city, the aspect of its population seemed to possess a peculiar interest in my eyes; as the people for whom I was about to exercise the first flow of my intellects and human charities. They were about to be intrusted to my care, as a fold to a shepherd;—the constituency over whose welfare I was to be the providence. Do you yet know enough of the world, young Sir, to appreciate the absurdity—the vulgarity, of such generous emotions?"

The eager narrator had now worked himself anew into his former excitement; and the low and mournful voice in which, as with a plaintive organ-stop, he had been describing his felicitous dream of early love, gradually gave place to harsh and abrupt impetuosity.

"Well, Sir! I entered the city!" he resumed.—"You have probably witnessed the triumphal entries of candidates on such flattering occasions? Laurels, ribbons, largesses to the populace, feasting, junketing, music, clamour,—all that money can concede or extort from the venal energies of popular nature. Those men of mind, whom we fondly call the people, gave me back with interest the huzzas I had purchased. But on entering the marketplace, Basil, and confronting the opposition party, the first object that met my eyes was my own effigy roasting in the midst of a burning fiery furnace; surrounded with placards of 'What Christian will dare to vote for Abednego the Jew?'—'No circumcision!'—'Now Barabbas was a robber!'—with pork griskins stuck on poles,—and every other insulting emblem, supposed to be abhorrent to my imputed faith!

"I was irritated,—but nothing further. Conscious of the inapplicability of these whips and scorns of vulgar derision, the usual implement of the hustings, I conceived that nothing would be easier than to undeceive the population of L——. In almost every great assemblage reason preponderates: and having in my speech, on the first day's poll, uttered the most solemn denial of my imputed Judaism, and appealed to the support of the ecclesiastical interest of the city, to which I conscientiously pledged my own, I fancied the mischief overcome.

"My eloquence made a manifest sensation. I was cheered by the people, and encouraged by the gentry.—But during the night my adversaries got up a further storm of insult. Placards representing Shylock, with the knife and scales in his hand, preparing to cut off the pound of flesh, greeted me on emerging from my inn, intermingled with representation of the martyrdom of little St. Hugh, (whose tomb, unfortunately, graced the adjoining cathedral,) the legend of whose barbarous murder by 'the Jew's daughter,' was roared round the hustings by a score of stentorian voices.—Every time I opened my lips to address the multitude, I was interrupted with

> As it fell out one holiday,
> Small rain did fall,—

till the name of St. Hugh of Lincoln, became indeed accursed in my ears!

"The bigotry of Cadiz was pale and tame, in short, compared with that of the cathedral town!—Suffice it, that after throwing away thousands of pounds, I lost my election—and far more than my election—my trust in the justice of mankind, nay, the justice of Providence itself.

"I ask you again, Basil Annesley, was it rational that I should be thus reviled and rejected,—untried,—unheard,—and a booby Squire preferred in my place, simply because some wag had written on the walls previous to my nomination—'What is your name?' 'Abednego!'—'Who gave you that name?' 'The high priest of the synagogue, in my baptism!'

"A thousand crushing thoughts came crowding into my soul when I reëntered London the following day. I was defeated; and the bitterness of a defeated candidate is proverbial. But never did defeat convey, like mine, extinction of every prospect of distinction—every hope of earthly happiness. Parliament was the Promethean torch that was to endow me with vitality;—and the living spark was quenched!

"It was, then, Basil, then that, for the first time, I learnt to appreciate the value of MONEY!—In place of the Providence I was beginning to mistrust, the Molten Calf became my GOD!—I said not to myself, like Lucifer, 'Evil be thou my good!'—but 'Gold be thou my guardian angel!'—For the solicitors, by whose inaptitude I had been so ill supported, now whispered in my ear, that perhaps they might still be able to purchase a seat; and this time they so far redeemed their word, that, within a fortnight from the silvery whisper reaching my ear, a spendthrift lordling had accepted the Chiltern Hundreds,—the credit side of my banker's book was lessened by an item of five thousand pounds,—and Abednego Osalez took his seat in the House of Commons.

"And now, Basil, now, my way seemed clear before me!—I was a member of the most enlightened legislative assembly in the world, and my reputation was in the keeping of the free press of the land of liberty. Forests of laurels seemed shooting up before me. I anticipated fame,—I anticipated popularity,—I anticipated, I—Great GOD!" exclaimed the excited man, interrupting himself,—"the flame of joy and triumph that swelled my veins at that moment seems rushing back anew into my heart, warm with all the glowing energies of youth. All the wealth of my bursting coffers was insufficient to requite the enjoyment of one sunny day of the unsullied brightness of that boyish confidence!"

"But surely, in parliament, the unjust and groundless prejudice you have described did not pursue you?"—demanded Annesley, deeply interested, yet almost alarmed by the vehemence of his companion.

"Even in parliament, Sir," resumed Abednego, in a more subdued tone,—"even in the parliament of liberal England,—enlightened England,—I was still 'Osalez, the JEW!'—They went further, these upright legislators, than the bigots of Cadiz. With them I was not the son of the Jew,—but the Jew. Though admitting me to be, by extraction, a Spaniard—by birth, an Englishman—by faith, a Protestant, I was still 'Osalez the Jew!'—My name and face avouched it; and are not a name and face authentic evidence in any other spot of earth than a court of justice?—When I spoke well in the House,—it was 'well enough for a JEW;' when ill—'what could be expected of a JEW?'—The measures I advocated were stigmatized by the press, as brought forward under the protection of the Jews;—and the whole repertory of waggish and vulgar jocularity was unloosed against me every time I opened my lips!

"I was almost maddened!—Had I entered my public career at a maturer period of life, I should have known how to repress such sneers, or how to retort upon my scorners. But I was a boy. The generous impulses of youth were warm within me. Writhing under a sense of injustice, I lost my temper. I sometimes spoke vilely,—and then, indeed, was the cry redoubled, that 'The seed Daniel had broken down.'—'But, then, what could be expected of a man with such a name as Abednego!'

"A sarcastic member of the Opposition, whose wit was armed as the stings of asps, attacked me one night in reply, upon an effective speech on the Corn-laws, by which I had commanded the aton of the House, with the sneer that—'he was ware that the honourable member's namesake and redecessor was memorable in scripture history rough the persecutions of a king who fed on ass; but it did not follow that the Abednego of odern times was to become famous by his asso- ation with CORN.'—The House was convulsed ith laughter at this sorry jest; and the laugh of arliament burns as with the caustic impress of ie branding-iron. The morning papers enlarged pon the pleasantry,—which was echoed by all the nderlings of the press; and before I had been three onths in the House of Commons, instead of com- anding the attention due to my abilities and good ith, I had become a laughing-stock as 'Corn- aw Abednego!'

"Still, there was comfort in perspective. The oman I loved was too true, too good, too fond, to e influenced by the voice of vulgar derision.—HE knew that I was neither a Jew, nor the son of Jew. SHE knew that my education had been beral,—my habits of life luxurious; and the low- red citations regarding Monmouth Street and uke's Place over her, at least, could have little fluence. Even if her father should refuse me er hand, she, my tender, faithful, trusting love, ould not recall the gift of her heart.

"The family returned to England, Basil;—the mily which for months and months had accepted he hospitality of my father. Their door was shut n my face.

"In the interim, my engagement with her for hom I would have sacrificed my life, had been iscovered, and all further intercourse between us as interdicted!

"The brother was still so infirm as to afford a air plea for retiring instantly into the country; nd in the aristocratic seclusion of his own park, he old lord fancied himself able to hold at bay the resumptuous importunities of the grandson of the ew of Cadiz!"

"And you pursued them, of course!" cried Basil nnesley, a new species of interest mingling with is curiosity. "You accepted dismissal from no ther lips than those of her you loved?"

"I pursued them!"—resumed his companion, alf closing his eyes, as if to reconcentrate himself nto the illusions of retrospection. "I pursu- d them. I saw her again. We met as be- ore, Basil—by stealth. The summer nights fa- oured our frequent interviews. Again, she leaged her faith to me; again she swore, through ood or evil report, to be faithful. But we were iscovered,—spare me the recital! Through the nstrumentality of her sisters, there was a cruel cene of detection. A struggle ensued—a fatal truggle,—the infirm brother was disabled.—As I ive and breathe, Basil, it was not I who inflicted he fatal injury! But he died!—The inquest bsolved me. Surgical examination proved that the ccidental bursting of a blood-vessel had proved fatal.

"To renew my intercourse with the family after his dreadful event, and the terrible publicity given o our cause of quarrel, was impossible. The very ttempt had been an insult. My beloved wrote to ne entreating forbearance. Overtures on my part, she said, would perhaps hurry her broken-hearted father into the grave. But still she swore again and again, with the fervid earnestness that woman only knows how to assume, that, whatever time or distance might divide us, for this world and the next she was my own,—'in the sight of GOD, my wife!'—In the sight of GOD!—Alas! even she, perhaps, felt that the mightiest of names might be appealed to in vain by so utter an outcast as Osalez the JEW!"

"Compose yourself, Sir!"—murmured Basil in a kindly voice, on perceiving that big tears were rolling down the withered cheeks of his companion. "Disturb yourself no further to talk of this!"

"Now, or never!"—cried the old man, with a strong effort over his feelings. "I complied, Basil, with her injunctions.—The Session was over. I returned to Cadiz with the intention of at least six months' absence from England and her!—But what a spot had I chosen to nourish my re- grets! The groves,—the gardens,—in which we had wandered hand in hand;—the same white walls, steeped in the same moonlight, were ever around me;—and she whose very soul had been conjoined there with mine in ecstatic delirium,—she was afar,—weeping,—lonely,—disconsolate,—waiting for me,—sorrowing for me!—In that thought, however, there was comfort!—My tears flowed the more, but the more soothingly, when I remembered that all my sorrows were shared by that dearest of all human beings!

"Within three months, Basil, from the day of my arrival at Cadiz, the newspaper was placed in my hand which announced her marriage with an- other!"

"What treachery!"—burst involuntarily from the lips of the young man, though a terrible sus- picion had already presented itself to his mind, connecting the narrative now unfolded with the revelations of the old gardener.

"Treachery most monstrous and most ungrate- ful!"—rejoined, with kindling eyes, the excited Abednego.—"And lo! on that day I swore an oath before GOD,—an oath to be mightily avenged, —avenged on both,—on all,—the husband,—the wife,—the proud, obdurate family!—And I was so! My cry to the Almighty for vengeance was at least prospered!"

"Before you proceed further, Sir, consider a moment!"—interposed Basil, perplexed and dis- tressed.—"Let not the excitement of the moment betray you into avowals which you may hereafter bitterly repent!"

"I have considered, and would fain you should know all,"—replied the old man in a milder tone. —"And first, to judge me fairly,—to judge me leniently,—reflect upon the misery of my position! —Reflect that I had ventured my 'all of earthly happiness in that frail barque, and that the wreck was total!'—My hopes were withered. Nothing was left me in this world,—nothing but MONEY!—In the first struggles of my anguish, I resigned my seat in Parliament, and abjured the country by which I had been so despitefully entreated and persecuted. I abandoned England. But I brought neither peace nor honour to my home. My father, whose highest ambitions were baffled by my despair, became himself surly and desponding; and domestic comfort was gradually banished from our household!

"It was probably the gloom thus engendered that caused my young sister to look abroad for happiness. Soon after my return, her mother died; and thus left alone with her fractious father and surly brother, the poor girl bestowed her affections on the only individual admitted within our doors, Verelst,—whom her father had engaged for her tuition in painting,—though, as a man of genius travelling for the perfectionment of his art, superior to the ordinary condition of an ordinary professor.

"When apprized of her attachment, my animosity to the young German, who could afford no home to the cherished flower of our fireside, and whom I unjustly accused of interested views in his attachment, sufficed to prove that I had suffered persecution and learnt no mercy!——I advised my father to drive the needy adventurer from our gates; and the consequence was the flight and disastrous marriage of my sister, which precipitated my poor mortified father into the grave.

"I was now the master of millions!—The efforts long made by my father for the realization of his property, with a view to quitting Spain, had, by this time, brought to bear the centralization of our capital.—It was, however, indispensable for the completion of this object, retarded by the old man's death, that I should visit the East; in various parts of which my predecessors had maintained mercantile establishments. The expedition pleased me. I wished to behold mankind in an unconventionized condition. I wanted to look upon the land which had given birth to my ill-fated race. Already my views of social morality were sufficiently disorganized;—in the East, I thoroughly threw off the prejudices of civilisation. To behold other creeds established as firmly, and producing results as beneficial, and more consonant with the demands of climate and country than Christianity, convinced me that the all-seeing God,—to whom altars, like thrones, are but the footstools of his power,—who, for his own wise purposes, has apportioned the faith of the Mussulman to one tropic, of the Brahmin to another,—who revealed, by the lips of his prophets, centuries and centuries before the birth of Christ, the great sacrifice of Redemption, and the cruelty of the Hebrews by which alone it was accomplishable,—must behold with sentiments of mercy, wide from the vengeance imputed to Him by the implacable mind of man, the hereditary responsibility of the children of Israel for the predestined crime of their forefathers! —Thenceforward the Jews, with whom I was classed, became, in my eyes, as any other people; save in being more unjustly aspersed, and consequently more deserving commiseration.

"Amid the succeeding changes of religion and legislation I was compelled to witness,—variations which render morality a matter of latitude and longitude, and the virtues of one hemisphere the vices of the other,—I began to look around me for a substantial and tangible standard of merit.—'WHAT,' I exclaimed,—'what constitutes right and wrong?—where is the Positive, where the True?'—The answer was 'GOLD!' Basil Annesley!

"Who will deny that, over all nations and languages,—under the tyranny of one or the tyranny of many,—the majesty of the crown or the majesty of the tiara,—MAMMON holds the preponderating influence?—GOLD, GOLD, GOLD, constitutes the T. K*ατα*,—the sole divinity,—the Jehovah of the universal earth!

"Once convinced of this, I bowed down my knee and worshipped!—Long and eagerly in search of some First Cause in which to put my trust, I cried aloud with joy when I had found it! —My wandering ark had stuck upon the top of an Ararat; and I sought no better land as a resting-place for the sole of my foot!

THE MODERN PULPIT.*

THE author of these Essays is a distinguished Preacher among that body of dissenters of which, of late years, the clergy (if we dare so call them) have shot rapidly ahead in scholastic acquirements, in general literature, and in a wise adaptation to the liberal and expansive tendencies of the age. John Wesley has the credit of saying, that he saw no use in the Devil engrossing all the best tunes. The Independent clergy, and indeed, to some extent, the dissenting ministers of every denomination, in like manner, no longer permit the Church, as by law established, and by Oxford and Cambridge taught, to monopolize all those gifts and accomplishments, which, held in due subordination to higher purposes, give so much efficiency to the ministrations of the pulpit. The Preface to Dr. Vaughan's volume, in explaining its object, mentions a gratifying fact. Another Independent College is about to rise in the important locality of Birmingham, in the vicinity of which there is already a seminary; and such permanent foundations are urgently required at a period when a systematic warfare seems about to be waged upon the grand and fundamental principle of the Reformation, by both the Universities, and a majority of their pupils. Another college of the same kind is nearly completed at Manchester, for which funds have been contributed by, we presume, the Independent or Congregational Churches of Lancashire. And it is yet more gratifying to learn that, in both these colleges "the means of education will be provided on a plan equal in respect to the essential branches of learning, and superior in respect to theology and pastoral science [which we presume to mean knowledge of the pastoral duties] to what is generally obtained at Oxford and Cambridge." The substance or germ of the present Two ise was given in a discourse delivered at an annual neeting of Spring Hill College, in the vicinity of Birmingham. Dr. Vaughan was requested, by hose of his brethren who had the pleasure of being present, to print his address. But the theme eemed too wide and important to be so briefly liscussed; and it has accordingly expanded into he present able and valuable work. It is divided nto twelve chapters, some of them very short, and f subordinate interest. In the first, "On the Office of Preaching," it is not to be expected that he author should underrate the uses of the pulpit; nor, we admit, would it be easy to overvalue hem, where they are properly understood and ably fulfilled. He contends that the press has not, and never can supersede the Pulpit; that the Christian minister is not to surrender his divinely-appointed office to this powerful modern instrument, with which he must sometimes contend as an antagonist, and sometimes labour as an ally.

There is abundant internal evidence in the volume to prove how much attention its author must bestow upon even the ephemeral productions of he press: and every preacher must give like attention who would fully comprehend the relations of the modern Pulpit to society. The proposition, that the pulpit has lagged behind the press; behind the bar, the lecture-room, and the senate; behind, in a more comprehensive sense, the spirit and scope and attainments of general society, s frankly admitted by Dr. Vaughan, though this he considers no argument that preaching should cease, or be less frequent; but that it should in general be of a higher order, as being, in our days, addressed to an auditory capable of reading,—o an auditory in possession of books,—and to an auditory whose education is of a higher and nore general kind than obtained among assemblies of the people in former ages. Books, he contends, though they may do much, can never abrogate the eternal law which places man in dependence on the immediate tuition, the oral instruction of man.

Revolutions in the social and in the moral world may greatly affect the mode and complexion of preaching: but its high uses must be perpetual, inasmuch as the great aptitudes of human nature to which it commends itself must be perpetual.

The importance of preaching, as the means of promoting religion in the world, he places above he institution of baptism. A short chapter "On he general Characteristics of Modern Society" does ull justice to the increased knowledge and the pirit of inquiry which distinguishes the present ge; and the section which immediately follows, n the relation of the pulpit to the great mass of he people, or to "the manual-labour classes," we onsider the most important in the Treatise, from s sound views and mighty object. The discontent, "the disaffection" which at present pervades nd distinguishes the artisan classes of England, understood in its real causes and bearings as an vil, but one (though this is not clearly stated) regnant with the seeds of future good. If Equality as come to be the great want of the manual-labour lasses, it is, we trust, only equality of civil rights; nd if the ideas of wealth and power have come to be very generally identified with those of oppression, it cannot well be denied, that much of our legislation, and many of our positive institutions, give colour to the not-always erroneous apprehension. Having described the state of popular feeling as alarming and dangerous to government and to religion, in terms which we consider somewhat too sweeping and unqualified, the writer reaches a point where we can more unreservedly concur with him.

> It is not necessary to our present object, that we should deliver any definite opinion concerning the merit or demerit of the objects contemplated by this novel species of popular combination. It may be, that we ought to see in it, nothing more than the natural effect of some much older, and by no means less selfish combinations, in favour of the interests to which it is opposed. It may be, that the unreasonable contained in it has derived its measure of influence and power from its alliance with much that is not unreasonable. It is always safe, as well as humane, to judge leniently concerning the errors of the people; and, on the whole, it may be, that the weak in this case, as in most others, possess a more weighty claim upon our sympathy than the strong. . . . What is the report that should be made concerning the pulpit, viewed in its relation to this large portion of the community? Our answer must be, that we cannot avoid accounting it as being, in a great measure—perhaps in a majority of instances—a manifest failure. Nor are the more considerable of the causes which have conduced to this failure hard to discover.
> It would seem to be a cardinal error among the great majority of preachers in our time, that they think much too meanly of the popular understanding. It is their manner to judge of the minds of men too much by the standard of a technical education, without keeping sufficiently in view either the sameness or the variety of those natural capabilities which God has bestowed upon men as such. It is little remembered, in consequence, that the slightly-educated man in the pew, may possibly be possessed of much greater sagacity than the thoroughly-educated man in the pulpit. Ministers of religion should not need to be reminded, that the smith at his anvil may have more compass of soul in him, than is found in the scholar, however much given to his books. In the case of the one, there may be naturally a robust mental health, such as no amount of artificial means would suffice to confer in the case of the other. Equality in these things is of much wider extent than is commonly supposed. The peer and the mechanic are alike specimens of humanity; and, not unfrequently, all the training in the world would fail of securing to the man of high degree, the same habit of intelligent perception which may be existing as so much natural bestowment in the man of low degree. In all time, the toe of one grade has come, in this manner, near upon the heel of another accounted as greatly its betters. But in no time has this rivalry between the children of nature, and the children of fortune, been so prevalent, or so marked, as in the time in which we live.
> It is a great mistake to suppose, that in order to interest and instruct the popular mind, it will be necessary to descend to it in a manner inconsistent with good taste.

In other parts of the Treatise this is reiterated; and the orators of the hustings and the rostrum will find the cautions as valuable to them as they are to the ministers of the pulpit.

This is stated in an argument for clergymen being trained and educated in a diversity of ways; and differing in rank and station, it would seem, as well as in attainments; an argument, by the way, which we have heard employed for the institution of a hierarchy. On the other hand, Dr. Vaughan himself asserts something equivalent to the opinion, that when a preacher or an orator is imagined, on account of his intellectual stature, or supposed attainments, to shoot over the heads of his auditory, it will usually be found that he is an unskilful archer, who has taken a false measure of his ground, and blunderingly shot aside. Referring to Lord Brougham's Dissertation on the Eloquence of the Ancients as to a body of canons for the orator, he proceeds :—

In the modern pulpit, the effect of learning, and of elegant scholarship, has commonly been to render men incapable of producing impression of that nature in any degree. In the case of such preachers, neither the diction they use, nor the mould into which they cast their expressions and sentences, nor the comparisons they introduce, nor anything belonging to their rhetoric, has been an object of study with a view to its fitness to secure the attention, and to move the thoughts and passions of such assemblies as are generally convened by the preacher—assemblies made up from the popular, much more than from the thoroughly-educated classes of society. The great object of this class of preachers has been to acquit themselves learnedly, or to acquit themselves elegantly. It is grievous to witness the mischiefs which have resulted from this conventionalism in pulpit taste. If our pulpit lessons must be veiled in the language of a particular kind of scholarship, then the people generally, and even men of good natural parts, who have not been initiated into that scholarship, will fail to perceive our meaning, and will begin, as the consequence, to cast about for some better employment than listening to the utterances of our unknown tongue. It should be accounted as a pleasing proof of the good sense pervading the popular mind, when the people refuse to be put off with the jingle of style in place of the clear statement, and vigorous enforcement of truth. Nevertheless, on the ground that the people almost uniformly estimate such pulpit trifling at its proper value, are they commonly reproached as incapable of appreciating pulpit excellence ! In general, the scholar needs only speak in his own language to be understood by the scholar; but should it become his object to make himself equally understood by men who are not scholars, it will be necessary that he should study to become expert in the use of language which may not be strictly his own. He must look from his own immediate associations to the associations of other men. He must become observant of the modes of apprehension which belong to minds widely different from his own. He must be capable of effort to place himself as in the stead of such minds; and from that point he must learn to judge concerning the manner in which such mental habits may be approached with the best effect. Nor must he regard this as being altogether a work of condescension. It is not condescension that is demanded of him, so much as adaptation. This manner of observation, and this kind of study, may be necessary, not so much because the minds about him are weaker than his own, as because they are different. . . . . No man, whose aim in elaborating sermons has been to give clearness and force to Divine Truth, has ever had reason to complain of the obtuseness of the popular apprehension, or of the coldness of the popular gratitude. . . . . It is a sore trial of patience to hear some preachers talk of the inability of their hearers to appreciate good sermons as the reason why they do not labour to produce such sermons. It would often be well for the preacher, in such cases, did he possess half the capacity of not a few of the minds which he has learned to despise.

The manner in which the great majority, and nearly all the intelligent of the middle class, regard the ministrations of the Modern Pulpit, is as strong a proof of its deficient and backward state as is its inefficacy in relation to the multitude.

Every clergyman, it is presumed, is a man of ability in some way, seeing he has patent as such, under the seal of a university. But few things are more common than a feeling of surprise and regret that the results in this case, so far as regards preaching, should be so little commensurate with the understood cost and labour of the process. Not that these persons in general care much about preaching, as a matter relating to themselves; but they look to it as something for which a good price has been paid, as something which on that account ought to be done well, so done as to accomplish its object; and they look to it, moreover, in connexion with what obtains of the same kind elsewhere—and it is not at all gratifying to perceive that their own ministers, who claim to be in all things belonging to their vocation as the first, should so often be in this very notorious matter of preaching as the last.

Looking to churchmen of the middle class generally, particularly to the more shrewd and informed, and taking in the leading men in mercantile and professional life, we cannot avoid the conclusion, that the honest and fixed opinion of those parties must be, that no portion of the public service is, on the whole, so defectively performed, as the service of the pulpit. Such men cannot fail to see, that of all the products in our social system, those of the pulpit are the most costly, and the worst supplied. Nor are the clergy themselves wholly insensible to this fact. Hence, in great part, the ceaseless attempt, in the case of a large number of them, to depreciate the office of preaching altogether, as compared with the reading of prayers, and other official services.

This, of course, applies most, if it be not meant to apply altogether, to the pulpit of the Established Church, where the congregations have not the power of choosing their own minister. In the Chapter on the relation of the Pulpit to the higher classes, Puseyism, and the ornate, scenic, pseudo-sentimental, and ritual religion, now becoming so fashionable, and which, in some men, is combined with a warm and pure devotional spirit, do not escape shrewd home-thrusts.

Society in our day embraces large classes, who, while they know how to tolerate vice, can never be made to tolerate coarseness,—points of taste being with them a much more serious matter than points of morality. Such is the character of modern education, that we are surrounded by multitudes whose distinction from the crowd consists wholly in a superficial and showy sort of refinement; and this large class of persons, we may be sure, will always be much more influenced by the elegant or the picturesque in the form of things, than by any consideration about the true or the rational as relating to their substance. Romanism has never ceased to lay heavy tribute on this infirmity in human nature, and has succeeded, by this means, in substituting emotion in the place of principle, and in confounding the feeling of taste with the feeling of piety. Oxford is now pursuing the same course. In both those connexions religion is arrayed in the drapery of art, and the worship of her costume is accounted as the worship of herself. Our literature during the last thirty years, and particularly by reason of the character and position it has given to works of fiction, has contributed powerfully to diffuse this feeling, and has done much incidentally, toward reviving ideas and sentiments in connexion with religion of a nature most inimical to its purity and power. Puseyism, like Popery, will be a religion of pageantries and mystical pretension, and will derive its main strength from ministering to a species of poor taste, under the name of religion, in the case of the educated; and from misleading the religious instincts by means of the ignis fatuus of imposing forms, in the case of the uneducated.

In a subsequent passage, this sober and satisfactory apology is made for the simpler forms of the Independent churches :—

It may be that our polity and ritual are very simple, so that we hardly expect to see them associated with any strong exercise of the imagination. It may be that ve have learned to look on them as so prosaic and lite-al, that the mind seeing as to the end of them at a glance, and nothing being left to awaken curiosity, or o hold out its visions to the fancy, we find it difficult o suppose that they might be readily allied with a feel-ng of deep and permanent interest. But in so judging, lo we not overlook the great facts in His history who was himself the first preacher of his own truth? Did he account the impressiveness of his own teaching as dependent on the aids of human architecture and decoration, on the pomp of priestly vestments and priestly pageantries, or on anything artificial, however beautiful n itself, or however venerable from its relations to the past? Was not his course as studiously separated from ll the gauds of an ecclesiastical greatness, as from those f a secular greatness? Was he not in his appearance, nd manners, and teaching, as little like the priests of his time, as like its potentates? Has he not taught us, in his manner, that the power of his truth in the earth is as little dependent on its alliance with temples, as on its alliance with palaces? Does he not point to the sea shore and the mountain-side, to the green field and the desert place, to the solitary village road and the crowded pathways of the city, and bid us see in them, both the places and the circumstances of his ministry? Was not the earth as the pavement of his temple, the heavens as the covering beneath which he constantly offered up his spiritual sacrifices; and all the wonders in earth and heaven—were they not as the matters of a marvellous ritual, which, touched by his words, became everywhere as the shadows of a living substance—as the ever-present forms of an ever-living truth?

He has thus taught us, that the symbolic which is of God, is much more to the purpose of the preacher than that which is of man. . . . . He has done enough to make it certain, that the minister of the New Testament who shall be careful to avail himself of the semblances and illustrations of scriptural truth which are everywhere presented in the visible and living world, need not fear the issues of a contest with men who place their great trust in ceremonial observances—matters, which can be at the best only a poor or tawdry imitation of the realities which are constantly passing before the eyes of all men in the evolutions of providence, and the changeless appearances of nature. Our polity and ritual may be simple, but what they denote is shadowed out by universal nature, and is infinitely more wonderful than universal nature. In themselves they are as nothing—in their relations, they embrace all things. We may see to the end of them as mere forms, but no created mind can see to the end of them in their spiritual import. While only an object of the senses, they present nothing of the indefinite or mysterious, and are little adapted to fill the imaginative spirit with those vague thoughts, and still more vague emotions, which it covets; but viewed under the light of a sanctified intellect, we see them send forth, in lengthened perspective, the perfection of the ways of God. Thus viewed, they stand in relation to a thousand mysteries in time, and to much deeper mysteries as pertaining to eternity. No wing of created imagination can ever reach to the borders of that land which is thus opened before us!

This reads like one of Elliott's religious odes; and there may be bigots or hypocrites who will pronounce it equally profane. The conclusion of this chapter is written in the same highly-sustained strain; but we can only quote a small passage. We could almost wish, by the way, that Dr. Vaughan had found a more apt phrase than "a religion based on poetry," to designate the scenic religion—the thing of vague emotions, of tinsel and trappings, and tinkling cymbals, which he means. He is speaking of what effective preaching ought to be, and thus continues,—

> The great demand now made on us in this respect is, that what other men aim to do by scenic show from the altar, should be done, and much better done, in our case, by effective instruction from the pulpit; and that on the whole matter of visible aids in religion, we should spare no pains in opposing to every illusive spectacle supplied by art, the truthful utterances which may be always successfully invoked from the real magnificence of nature!

But the power necessary to this kind of preaching, while it must come in part from nature, must come also from much study, and from a devout solicitude to lead men into the paths of truth and piety. Nor is anything further from our thoughts in the above observations, than to encourage that kind of preaching, which, in its exuberance of language and allusion, seems not to belong either to poetry or prose. Sermons, in general, are addresses to the people, and, as such, should be eminently popular; in some connexions, a certain measure of homeliness would be their great excellence. But men do not need to be unnatural in making use of nature. Our example in this respect is before us in His manner, who preached on—the sower that went forth to sow—on the blade, and the ear, and the full corn in the ear—and on the man who built his house upon the rock, and the other who built upon the sand.

Let it be remembered, also, that a religion based upon poetry must be a frail thing in the hour of trial, compared with a religion based upon principle. Men governed by emotion have necessarily much less stability in them than men governed by reason. Concerning the sort of Christians that are formed, by the system which has more respect to the great truths of theology than to trivial points of church government, and which attaches greater value to an enlightened moral consciousness than to accuracy in matters of ecclesiastical observance, some judgment may be formed from the conduct of the confessors and martyrs in the primitive church, and from that of the same class of sufferers in the south of France during the middle age, and in the history of Europe from the age of Wycliffe and Luther downwards. It was a Christianity restored to something of its ancient simplicity—a Christianity much of the Puritan mould, which enabled the old Germanic states to assert their ecclesiastical freedom; which gave so formidable a character to the remnant of Protestant feeling in France; which nerved the arm of the Dutch, while opposed to the fearful odds arrayed against them by his Catholic majesty; which sustained the heroism of the Covenanters amidst the wilds of Scotland; and which, under God, sufficed to preserve both the Protestant religion and civil and religious liberty in England. Wherever you find a poetical Christianity, you find a despot; and in the history of despotism, whether ecclesiastical or civil, the governing are doomed to reap as they have sown—being often placed in exigencies in which they are made to learn that subjects trained to the passiveness of children, must not be expected to show the vigour of manhood at the pleasure of their rulers. Exceptions to this rule, in the case of individuals, there may be, but the rule is not disturbed by them. So far as respects communities, or the people at large, the daring and endurance proper to manhood, will be found along with the independence and freedom proper to manhood.

In the chapter on the Pulpit in the past, we are struck with the portrait of Latimer, the type of a class, alas! too limited, whether in the Church or among Dissenters; and with that of Baxter, which is elaborated with care and love. The seasonable uses of Methodism in the dark and torpid age in which it arose, and the apostolic labours of the first Methodist preachers, educated and uneducated, are treated with the justice which rareness makes almost kindness.

To the eloquent arguments for preaching being adapted to the spirit of the age, and though maintaining its own place, yet being in harmony with the rapidly onward progress of society, we cannot advert; nor yet to the enforcement of the superiority of extemporaneous delivery to reading sermons.

These, and many technical and subordinate matters, are very well worth the study of young preachers of every denomination, and of all young men "having views to the ministry," and to them we leave them. But we cannot pass the enunciation of the grand principle of the Protestant Reformation, and another well-aimed hit at those whose avowed purpose is to undermine and subvert it.

The principle of appeal to the right of private judgment is the great principle of the Reformation. Its effect on the pulpit, both in England and on the Continent, was at once manifest. The sermons of Luther, of his coadjutors, and of their successors to the close of the sixteenth century, are, in nearly all respects, such as were preached in England during the same interval. . . . . It is always to be observed, with respect to this great intellectual movement, which diffused so much misgiving over the whole surface and splendour of society, that it rose from the many—from beneath; and that the new force then given to those broad and deep elements in the social world which had so long reposed as in their imbedded quietude, was a force given to them mainly by preaching.

It is the glory of Protestantism, that it lives only through intelligence, and through the intelligence of the many, more than through that of the few. It is from this cause that it has so often acted as a reformer even upon Catholicism itself. It was the act of Protestantism to restore the pulpit to its due place among the means of religious improvement, and no sooner had Protestantism seized upon the pulpit, than Catholicism followed its example, and so ran the current of wholesome provocation in a multitude of things besides.

This leads to the brilliant age of the French pulpit,—that of Bossuet, Massillon, Bourdaloue, and Saurin; but passing these, we must rest content with the hard parting hit at the new idol of the day:—

Men are accounted safe, not according to what they are spiritually or morally, but according to what they are ecclesiastically. The signs of the true church come to consist of matters relating to polity, and not of evidence relating to piety. And as the true church is to be known by marks separate from her piety, it is only consistent that her ministers should put forth their official claims on grounds separate from considerations of that nature. Hence, according to this scheme, to find the true church, we must look to the one point of apostolical succession; to find the true priesthood, we must do the same; and we must do the same again, if we would distinguish the true Christian from the crowd bearing that name.

In the esteem of these eminent purists, what men are, as good or bad, is in fact as nothing, compared with what they are, as obedient or disobedient with regard to certain matters of ecclesiastical prescription. The institutional in religion is not accounted by these persons simply as means, relating to the moral and the holy as the end, but it is, in effect, both the means and the end. To be institutionally right, is to be altogether right. The point to be determined is not the relation of the spirit to Christ by faith, penitence, and the renewed affections of the devout mind; but the fact of having been baptized, confirmed, and communed by the hands of a duly-appointed ministry. The piety of a Watts, or a Doddridge, can weigh as nothing, against the fact of their having received the waters of baptism, or the elements of the eucharist, from hands which were not episcopal. Thus everything is determined by a point of polity—the true church, the true ministry, the true Christian. In this manner, revealed religion has become a piece of political machinery, adjusted to subserve the ambition of a priesthood. The simple institutes of the New Testament are converted into a mere framework of priestly and secular domination. The power to be derived from them, in this form, constitutes their great value, in comparison with which their relation to truth, morals, and godliness is a question of no moment. Such is Romanism, wherever its tendencies have full developement, and strictly of this tendency are all the distinctive principles of Puseyism.

Among all the forms of delusion which have been foisted upon men to frustrate the purposes of the Christian religion, this is the most subtle, elaborate, and destructive. Not that it embraces anything new. We find no evil in Romanism which may not be traced to tendencies common to human nature; nor anything which has not had its place in those systems of false religion to which the infirmities of human nature have given existence from the earliest times. Romanism is to scriptural Christianity what paganism was to the scriptural theism of the ancient Church. Formalists among Protestants often became papists, as formalists among the Jews often became idolators. In the ancient paganism, and in the servile copy of it, which has been transmitted to us in modern Romanism, we see the same advantage taken of the weakness of human nature, and the same general substitution, in effect, of the ceremonial services of religion, in the place of religion. With all its pomp and pretension, accordingly, Romanism is at heart a stale and vulgar thing, old as the earliest apostasies from revealed truth and goodness, and strong through the weakness of the human intellect, and the low sense-bound condition of human passions.

The great criminality in every system of this nature is, that it tends to perpetuate the intellectual and moral feebleness of human nature, rather than to remove it; and that it deigns even to profit by infirmities, from which it should have been especially concerned to set men free. It comes, accordingly, in many respects, as an evil rather than a good, inasmuch as it uses the sanctions of religion to uphold things in their own nature the most irreligious. It puts itself forth under the name of truth, and succeeds by that means in giving a new power to falsehood. While it arrogates an exclusive claim to sanctity, it may be seen eagerly employed in undermining every principle of morals. This it does as often as it is heard giving names of piety to the passions of the persecutor, and to the forms of injustice, oppression, and cruelty natural to those passions. In this manner, under the covert of a zeal for religion, the bigot may often be seen making war upon the very instincts of humanity—the moral sentiments of the heart being effaced by the immoral dogmas of authority. Was it not thus in the case of the priest and the Levite, when they passed by on the other side? Was it not thus in the case of the multitude, who said—"Not this man, but Barabbas!" Has it not been thus, more or less, among all people?

It is one of the provisions made in every system of this sort, that the people should not concern themselves about the character of their minister, except to ascertain that he has been appointed to his office after a certain manner. That he should be a regular man, is a point about which they cannot be too scrupulous, but whether he be a good man or not, is a matter not meant to come under their judgment. His ministrations as a priest, are in no respect vitiated by faultiness in his character as a man. If regularly appointed, his hands are equally the channel of the divine blessing, whether those of a Judas, or a St. Paul. It is not from man, but from God, that the power comes, which imparts efficacy to priestly services; and God will honour his own sacraments by connecting his own power with them, whether administered by the hands of the pure or the impure.

A passage from a sermon by the Rev. H. Melville, is cited in the Appendix, in which this strange doctrine is promulgated in the broadest and most startling way; fortunately so broad and so startling, that it can do little harm among rational beings.

A LONDON DRESSMAKER'S DIARY.

October 8, 1841.—I have just come home. It is nine o'clock. I thought I would write a journal, so here is the beginning; but I am so tired and stupified that I can think of nothing to put into it. I never thought I could be so weary with just sewing all day! I calculated on being able to sit up till twelve o'clock, because I need not get up before seven in the morning; and with so little exercise I surely need not sleep more than seven hours. Mrs. Simpson is a very nice woman; she says, in a year or two I shall be expert, if I take pains; and then I may perhaps go with her to Paris for the fashions. But what a long time first; and such labour in that back-room up stairs! I thought to-day I should have cried when Mrs. Simpson sent for some one to help her to attend in the shop, and I might not go. I always thought it was the youngest apprentice that could be spared best, but she says I should be frightened and awkward. But after all, many people have much harder work than this. The servant girl in this very house is almost always out of breath with running up continually out of that dark cellar-kitchen; and our own servant at home used sometimes to have her hands sore with washing. Though my father thinks this an unhealthy trade, I am sure it is much better than anything else I could have chosen: for though I don't pay for my lodgings yet, I shall have more wages soon, and then I may perhaps make a fortune before I die. If Mrs. Simpson thinks well enough of me to take me to Paris, I must be of great use to her; and if I am, why should she not take me in partner? If she did, I should soon have enough money to send Dennis to school. Father keeps regretting that he can't send him just for one year, when he is fourteen or fifteen—and he wont be fourteen for six years yet.

Oct. 9.—My little room is at the top of the house, and I can see nothing out of the window but house-roofs. I stooped down almost to the floor, and looked up to the sky this morning before I went to my work. There was a cloud that looked tinged with red from the sunrise, and the bit of sky that I saw was straight up. What a fine day it must have been!

Oct. 10.—My landlady told me, as I came through the shop, that she was glad to see I came home regularly; that my father had recommended me to her care, and that she hoped I should be steady; because if I were not, she should be forced to send me away from my present lodgings. Is this what she calls taking care of me? I wish I were not so tired—I want to write something about home. It will be Sunday soon, and then I will write part of a long letter to my father.

Oct. 11.—I can write nothing, I am so tired, and there is another day yet before Sunday. I've been crying to-day, because I spoiled some work; and Miss Betts (the lady that sits in the work-room instead of Mrs. Simpson) said no one could ever be so stupid, and that I must have done it on purpose.

Oct. 12.—Miss Betts, and Miss Hayes, and all the rest of the young ladies, have been wondering why I don't alter my frock sleeves: they say such large sleeves are quite out of the fashion. I asked them when I was to do it; and they said, Oh, after I got home at night. I said, I had far too much sewing in the day-time to begin again after nine o'clock. Miss Hayes said she had made herself a new dress in the evenings after she got home. I wonder how she and all of them can afford to dress so extravagantly: none of them wear cotton print; and it seems to me the best they ought to wear.

Oct. 13.—What a strange day this has been! it seems a month since last night. I got up as usual at seven o'clock, though I had no work to go to. When I was dressed, I stood looking up at the bit of sky till breakfast time. I did not like to go out, till I had asked Mrs. Greaves which was the nearest way into the country. I am always to get my meals with her and the family on Sundays; and I can't go out before breakfast. When I mentioned the country, she looked astonished; she said they always liked the country, but I had always lived in it, and she was sure I must like the town better; besides, I ought to go to church in the morning, and then, if I liked, I might go with them into the country in the afternoon. I would not hear of going to church, but I found the country is three miles off; and then it only means houses with gardens to them, instead of houses without. So I agreed to go to St. Paul's. Mrs. Greaves kept telling me she was sure I must like it better than the country: I wish they'd let me like for myself! When we got in sight of the great thing, all the children began asking me to admire it; and when I said it looked very dirty and black, they all ran back to Mrs. Greaves, calling out, "Mamma, she says St. Paul's is dirty!" As soon as we got inside, they began showing me monuments of this person and that, till mamma told them to hush. We were just going through some tremendous iron gates, and I found the church was inside. There were not many people in; I thought the service was not begun; I heard some one talking at the other end of the church. Directly after I saw a man stand up in the pulpit, and all the congregation stood up too. Then just over my head began a note of the organ; I thought it must have been touched in mistake, and would stop directly; but another lower note opened, and both began to swell till the pillars round trembled with the echo. I stooped my head, and half shut my eyes, for I had never heard so much sound. I was not frightened, but I wanted to call out or sing: I thought no one would hear me, so would try. At that moment began, what seemed to me, a hundred voices over my head, and all round, singing not one or two notes, but rolling (and the organ with them) like waves, as if there were nothing else in the world. I held my face down and cried a long time, till the music seemed at last to break, each little stream running by itself, and then all to roll in one flood of sound, swing round and round the bending arches, till it fell and died. It seemed to leave a dew on every head, and the place was so still we heard one man's little voice as plain as if he could speak like the organ.

The music came again and again, and every time we all stood up. At last we went home. One of the children asked me what I thought of the organ. I said, I did not know. Mrs. Greaves said I had no taste; that she had expected I should be in raptures with the "whole thing." After dinner she said, I must be contented now, for they were going to the tea-gardens at somewhere, and I could go with them. I said, I had much rather go again to St. Paul's. She said I was a very strange girl: in the morning I wanted to go into the country, and could scarcely be persuaded to go to church first. I said I did not know there was such music at church. She said, "Why, you never seemed to care for the music; you never said a word about it." We were going up stairs when she said this, and she pushed her room door open, went in, and called out, "Thomas, what do you think! She (jerking her elbow at me) has made up her mind now to go to St. Paul's again! she wants to hear the music." Then she said something else which I could not hear. I could not see Thomas: he seemed to be walking about with one shoe off: he said, "Yes, I know; you must not let her go—not by any means: take her with you to the gardens." Mr. Greaves is a little, good-tempered man, but very mysterious. He is always kind to me, but treats me like an ignorant child, always instructing me in the least things; and when I ask him why I must do so, he says "O, because it is better." When I heard him interfere to prevent me going to church, I was very angry; and when Mrs. Greaves came out and said very sweetly, that I had much better go with them, "that Mr. Greaves thought so too," I answered all at once, "Does he? But I may surely please myself, and do what I like best!" Mrs. Greaves said, "But you can't go this afternoon, there is no one to go with you."—"Then I'll go by myself."—"Oh, how can you say so? it would be very improper."—"How can it be improper?"—"Well, a young girl like you ought not to go out alone."—"I go out alone every day."—"Yes, but that's... you are not dressed... you're going about your regular business... you can't help that."—"And why should I wish to help going to church?"—"You may say what you like... it is very improper of you to wish to separate yourself from your friends; but if you will do your own way, I've nothing to do with it: I've warned you." I asked her when the service began: "It begins at three, and you need not be going before." Mr. Greaves opened the room door, and called her in; I went up stairs. I don't know why I should care for Mrs. Greaves, when the first time I saw her was but a week ago; but still I was almost frightened when she said she would have nothing to do with it: what did she mean?

I have got tea by myself, and written an account to my father of all that I've done this last week. I am glad I did not write before; I should have made him think that I had very hard work and no pleasure. I wonder how I could be so low-spirited, all for nothing. It is worth while to come to London to hear the church service; they sing it nearly all.

I won't indulge myself in whining any more. I'll begin and do something when I come home at night. They shan't persuade me to alter my frock sleeves, because I don't care for not being in the fashion. But Mrs. Greaves offered me sixpence for altering a dress of hers, and I'll do it. I dare say I can finish it in two nights;—and then I might have plenty of such work; I might earn two or three shillings a-week; and if I do, and if my boots will last out, I shall want no money of my father when I go home at Christmas. I may have enough to buy them all a little present, as an eldest sister ought to do. If I did, my father would see that I was doing well.

Oct. 14.—In the middle of this morning Miss Betts had to go down stairs, and the moment she was gone Miss Hayes (she's the eldest next to Miss Betts) began bustling, whispering and laughing, and calling out, "Now then, who'll have some Dantzic?" "I will, I will," every one cried. Then there was such a scuffle! And Miss Hayes brought a little fat bottle out of her pocket full of white clear stuff like water; she poured some of it into her thimble, and drank it off two or three times. Every one held their thimble, and Miss Hayes poured some into each in turn, and then some more into her own. Miss Simpson seized Miss Thoms' thimble, and said she would have it, because it was the largest; so every one began to laugh at Miss Thoms because she's very fat; and she herself began to insist that her thimble was no larger than Miss Simpson's; indeed not so large. Some one told her, then she ought to be glad of the exchange; then they all laughed again, and Miss Thoms, who would neither give up her thimble nor acknowledge it to be the largest, got into a passion, and almost fought to get it back, till Miss Hayes said, if they were not quiet she would put the bottle away. I could not understand what they were drinking, nor why they should be so eager about it. I thought it could not be water, for Miss Hayes said once, "O! how I wish we had a spoon!" and one of the others said, "O! Miss Hayes, could you drink a spoonful at once?" and she said, "O yes—well enough," and Miss Thoms called out, "So could I."

At last Miss Hayes saw me staring at them, and she burst out a-laughing, and said, "Look at that shrimp, how she stares! Did you ever see Dantzic before, child?" Some one cried, "I dare say she does not know what it is!" I said, "No, I don't." Miss Hayes bent her head, so as to see past the others, and whispered, "O! it's very good stuff; send your thimble, and I'll give you some."

Miss Simpson pulled my thimble off and threw it to her, and then it was passed down full. Still I kept asking, "What is it?" and one said, "It's to make you fair," and another, "It's to keep your spirits up." I held it in my hand quite puzzled, till at last, when I heard them all praising it so, I asked, "was it elixir vitæ?" They all called out, "Whatever's that?" I said it was a liquid that made people live for ever; Miss Simpson cried "Why, who ever heard of such a thing?" I said, I had heard my father talk about it; but he said there was no such thing. Miss Thoms said, "Yes, it was aqua vitæ." I said, "elixir vitæ."—"Well, elixir then; they're both the same." "Why, what are they then?" some one asked. "Well, it means brandy . . . it's Latin." Miss Hayes cried, "How do you know any thing about Latin?" so Miss Thoms simpered, and said, "O! I know." I said, "If it's brandy I won't have it." They all exclaimed, "O, what nonsense! it will do you good! . . . You may well be so low if you won't take something to keep you up! . . . . Don't be afraid of the smell . . . . Now, just take that little drop, and you'll see what good spirits you'll be in for the rest of the day." I was frightened to hear them talk so; and asked them if they did not know they would be worse after all their good spirits. I told them they were in danger of learning to get drunk; that they would soon want more than a thimbleful, and then they could never do without it; and when they had got so far, they could not help drinking till they lost their senses; that it would make them ill, and they would die miserably. They all kept laughing, till at last Miss Hayes said, "What is that little Methodist preaching about? Dying miserably, and hell fire?" and Miss Thoms reached across the table and took my thimble and drank the brandy off, saying, "You shan't have it, as you don't know how to value it." Then Miss Betts came back, and they all settled to work; they were very giddy, and kept taunting me slily for being a Methodist. I resolved to care for nothing, but to think of home and earning money. I am not at all tired to-night; I don't think I can sleep. Mrs. Greaves can't give me her gown till to-morrow.

Oct. 15.—With all I can do I cannot keep my thoughts to my work; there seems to me nothing to think of. I tried to look forward to going home or going to Paris: but these pleasures are such a long way off it is like keeping my arm stretched out till it trembles and aches, so that I can hold it no longer. I have got the gown to alter, but it is a brown one, and brown seems just the colour to make people sick. I've been sewing brown all day! so I thought I would write first.

Oct. 16.—I am too tired to write, and have the dress to alter.

Oct. 17.—I wish I could hear some music every day. Then I should have something to think of. I can't force myself to go on with altering the brown gown. It takes far more doing than I thought. I thought I should only have the sleeves to take out and alter, and the waist to take off and put on again; but now I find the waist will be to lengthen with new stuff, and some trimming to hide the joining. I thought I should finish it last night, and now I am putting it off till Friday.

Oct. 18.—I get more and more tired as the week gets on. If I don't finish the dress to-night, it won't get done this week.

Oct. 19.—I have got the sixpence! It has taken me a week. I did not finish the gown last night; I had to set the hooks and eyes on this morning before I went to work. I am glad I did, for we've been sewing white all day, and I can hardly see. O be joyful! to-morrow's Sunday!

Oct. 20.—I wonder how many times we change our minds before we learn consistent firmness. It must be a very respectable character that always carries out its own intentions. But I must learn this. It is ridiculous to choose a mode of life—to know or believe it to be the best I could adopt, and then to spend my time in perpetual lamentations. Every one in this world sometimes has their patience tried to the utmost, and the great minds are those which are least warped by the trial.

I went to St. Paul's. Mr. and Mrs. Greaves won't go with me any more; they say they "won't countenance my going." I think they're out of their head! I've got some more work for the evenings; not from Mrs. Greaves, but a neighbour, and have made a better bargain than I did last time.

Oct. 21.—Tired and going to sew.

Oct. 22.—It is one o'clock in the morning. I was sleepy when I came home, but I began to sew. After a while I got very cold, and lost all inclination to go to bed, so I worked away till now. I am turning a dress, and am to have two shillings for it: I intend to finish it this week. I would not go to bed now, but I must be up at seven o'clock. I don't think I shall sleep. I've been imagining my father coming to see me. I've set a chair by the fireplace—for there shall be a fire when he comes. And then I imagined him asking me, was I really forced to work so late? and me saying, I was not forced; that I did it to please myself, that I had plenty of money, and then proving it by sending for a nice hot apple pie, and making the little fellow get supper ready. They are not here, but I've left the chair by the hearth—it will help me to sew.

Oct. 23.—Mrs. Simpson has been noticing my old-fashioned sleeves, and wondering I don't alter them. I would not have cared, but she seemed to say she could never send me anywhere, because I was "not fit to be seen." I wonder if she would send me to any large houses if I were better dressed. There is a house with a white staircase in the entrance hall, as wide as I could stretch my arms across. Miss Simpson said she had seen it. She's not Mrs. Simpson's daughter, she's her niece.

Oct. 24.—I wish if possible to finish turning the dress this week, and to alter my sleeves besides. Mrs. Simpson said I should do to attend on ladies, I had such a quiet voice.

Oct. 25.—I shan't allow myself to write. I must finish the dress if it is two o'clock in the morning, that I may have to-morrow night for altering my sleeves. I should not care, if my feet did not get so cold. Yet if I were not cold I should fall asleep.

Oct. 26.—It's Sunday to-morrow, so I don't care how late I get up. The organ does not begin before eleven o'clock. I will sit up till I've done the sleeves, though I shall be working on Sunday morning!

Oct. 27.—I must set down Saturday night first.

It was past one o'clock this morning before I had done; and then I got up and began to tidy the room for Sunday. I kept imagining I was talking to my father, and at last I began to speak really, very low down. When I had talked a little while fussing about, dusting the room at the same time, I heard some one quietly trying the room door. I was very cheerful and not at all frightened, so I went and opened it directly. I expected some one walking straight in; but instead of that, a white thing stood in the dark, leaning forward and quite still. I felt in a cold sweat all at once, and crept back into the room that I might not see it. Then it took hold of the door handle and said, "Who have you got to talk to, pray?" I looked again, and there was a part of Mrs. Greaves' face peeping past the door edge. I exclaimed "O! Mrs. Greaves, I'm glad it's you!" She said, "Are you? have you been sitting up till now just for me, pray?" (She always says pray when she's out of temper.) Still she did not come in, but kept peering round the room as if she wanted to see what was in it. She behaved so uncivilly, and spoke so harshly, that I got up my courage in a moment, and burst out, "Mrs. Greaves, if you want to spy about, you'd better come in." She walked in, straight to the bed, and peeped under it. Then looked very much astonished all round the room again! I said, "Hadn't you better peep into my box?" She still stared about, looking so bewildered, I began to think she had got up in her sleep. At last she said, "I thought I heard you talking to some one!—But you have had some one with you—what's that chair there for?" I told her how I had set it for my father, and how I had been talking to him. She tossed her head—"Do you really pretend you've been sitting up till now for that?"—"No, I have been altering my blue frock sleeves." It was hanging on the chair-back, and she pulled it off, and began to look at them. "Ah! yes, I see they're altered.... Well it's a vast improvement!... you were looking quite old-fashioned!... you'll look very well now... really, very well indeed." When she wants to coax me, she always tells me I look well. Still I never spoke; so she began to pat me on the cheek, and say she was sorry she'd disturbed me; then she went away, and I got up in a passion and banged the door after her. This morning she came into my room after breakfast, (though she had said nothing all breakfast time,) and began to apologize for coming into my room last night, saying she really thought she heard me talking to some one; that she thought I ought not to sit up so late,—I ought to take care of myself. Then she asked me if I was going to church; I said, "Yes." So she suddenly came close up to me, and began very low, "Now, you know, Miss Wells, it's no business of mine, and perhaps you'll think I've no right to interfere; but I'll just give you some advice, and tell you something you don't know. It's very proper of you to try for as good a match as you can, and I did not think you would have had so much management with Dicky Batts as to keep him at such a distance; but I can tell you, you'll never get him, because his father intends to set him up very handsomely when he's learnt his trade; and I'm sure he'll never consent to his marrying any one poorer than himself: so you'd better drop him at once, and go with us. Besides, I can tell you he's a very dangerous person; and though girls always think they can take care of themselves, yet he'll be finding out your weak side, and coming round you somehow; and then you know you'll be ruined." I stared at her all the time she was talking, and then asked, "Who is Dicky Batts?"—"It's the name of our apprentice that follows you."—"Why, let him follow me as long as he likes." Then I remembered that she says "follow" as we say "court;" so I said, "He never spoke to me."—"What! did he never offer you his arm as you came home?"—"No."—"Why, it's because he's afraid of some one telling his father then."—"Poor thing!"—"Don't be scorning at him, Miss Wells: you know it's no use you're getting him, without his father will give him money to set him up."—"No, nor then either, I think."—"Well then, you'll leave him and go with us?"—"I'm going to St. Paul's."—"What! after what I've told you about him?"—"I've nothing to do with him."—"Now you need not try to deceive me, Miss Wells; indeed, I think, after what I've told you, and the interest I've shown in you, you might be more sincere. But no good can come of it, you may be sure of that; so I tell you." So she bustled down stairs. I felt inclined to slam the door after her as I had done before; but she always frightens me with her mysterious hints about what's to "come of it." She always gives them when she's angry, and I believe the truth is, that if I vex her she'll invent some tale about me, (just as she has invented a reason for my going to St. Paul's,) and then turn me out of my lodgings.

I have staid at home in the afternoon and gone to the evening service. I have just been reading over my journal. I am surprised to see what little things I begin to take notice of, and how soon I am frightened or put out of temper. When Mrs. Greaves appeared at the door last night, I was ready to drop, without anything in the world to be frightened at. When my mother was ill, I used to sit for hours in the dark or by firelight, and walk about the house in the dark just as I would in the day time. And after she was dead, I used to go into the room to look at her, hoping she might want something. I'm sure I should not have cared then for anything anybody said to me; while now, I get quite into a passion. Yet what can I do? I must pay attention to what's going on; I can't think of anything. I believe having nothing to do makes people selfish—I mean nothing for their minds to do; for what can it turn to so naturally as itself?

My Father says, any one who does their duty may prevent themselves being unhappy by looking forward. Here again I find my mind growing weaker.—I "look forward" till I am sick, and to what?—I begin to feel as wearied as after a day's work, so I will endeavour to say what I may look forward to, that I may get a clearer idea of it. One may always look forward to pleasure arising from the performance of duty. The more sedulous our exertions, the greater our reward. And whatever misery we may endure in the right path, it finally brings us to happiness that will outweigh it all.——Pleasure may arise from the performance of duty, but all that I can feel sure of is the "finally." I cannot see it possible for me to get pleasure in consequence of anything I can do now; nor can any motive make me "sedulous" in attending to—nothing.

Oct. 28.—I've been trying to find something in my work to fix my attention on. I think if it were all cutting out, I could do;—at least for a while. But I've been all day making flounces and sewing them on. Round and round the skirt! till I got so stupid I hardly knew what I was doing. Two or three times looked out of the window when I thread my needle, and then began to sew over again what I had done before.

Oct. 29.—When I look out of the window I see nothing but a house corner, and farther off the roof of a smaller house; on the same side of the window that I sit on there is a poplar tree. I know there is! the end of some of the branches reach past the edge of the window: they are bare; but when the tree waves, a larger branch comes in sight, quite thick with leaves, and almost all green. I dare say some of them are as green as ever they were. If I knew how long the branch was, or how thick, I could guess at the size of the tree. I hope it's a large one.

Oct. 30.—Mrs. Greaves has been asking me if I will sew any more in the evenings, as she has a gown to alter, if I choose to do it. I said, "Not to-night;" and passed on up stairs. The reason I would not speak to her was, that I was afraid of crying. I hardly know why; but to-day Miss Hayes called me to the cutting-out table, to hold some satin while she cut it. I directly thought I would look at the poplar tree when she was cutting. She gave me hold of one side of the piece, doubled and said, "Be careful, now." I thought she meant that I was not to squeeze it; so I took hold very gently, and when she pulled, it slipt out of my hand. She was very angry, because it was very light coloured; and if it had got dirtied she would have had it to pay for; so she sent me away, and called Miss Simpson. I was so frightened I was glad to sit down again, and look out of the window, before I began my work. But when I saw the ends of the branches I was reminded that I had forgot to look at the tree. I began to think I was losing my senses when I forgot things so soon, and began to fear I should not get to see the tree while it had any leaves on: and I've been wishing so to see it! It is the only bit of living green I shall see for longer than I can tell. I was just thinking this, when Miss Hayes came and snatched the work out of my hand, exclaiming, "What are you doing, you stupid thing?" I found that I was sewing with red thread, and my work was green. Miss Hayes held it up and said, "Now, just look, girls! will ever any one believe but what she did this on purpose?" I said, "No, Miss Hayes, I did not." "Do you pretend you did not know what colour it is?" I was just going to say, No; but there came into my head a faint recollection that when I was thinking of the tree I had felt that that thread was a prettier colour than the green, and the contrast was pleasanter; so I had taken it without thinking that it was wrong. So, instead of speaking, I blushed all over; and all the girls exclaimed, what a malicious girl I was; they wondered how I could do such a thing; but it was very easy to see what I was, with all my Methodist hypocrisy. Miss Betts asked what they meant; and I was just going to tell all about the brandy, but I was afraid they would hate me still worse if I did; so I held my tongue. Miss Hayes said, "The fact is, Miss Betts, we've found, all of us, that Miss Wells is very deceitful ..... all of us; hav'n't we?" looking round. They all began at once, "Yes, indeed, we all have."—"Well, how?" said Miss Betts. "O, Miss Betts, it's no use telling you ..... look how she blushes!" They all simpered, and would not answer any questions; till at last Miss Betts said, "Well, if you would not tell me, you need not have mentioned it." I was glad she did not speak to me, for if she had I should have burst into tears.

I thought of this all the way home. I wondered why I had forgotten to look at the tree, and why I had been so frightened when I dropped the satin. I know none of them would have cared. Yet they care a great deal for each other's words. Any of them can make another cry by accusing her of anything whatever. When I first came I thought them very silly; and when I saw how they behaved about the brandy, I determined to have nothing more to do with them; and to care nothing for what they said or did. And now, after all, I find I care more than any of them! My father said, I never need be afraid of any one, unless I did wrong. What wrong have I done now? Why couldn't I speak when they began telling lies about my deceit? Any of them can take their work to the window under pretence of wanting more light, while I have never been to the far side of the room in my life. But they have amusements that I know nothing about. They are always whispering, and saying things I don't understand; and they giggle so, and are so rude, I don't want them to be friends with me. Yet, should I not be better with something to think of?

Oct. 31.—Mrs. Greaves has asked me again to do some work, and it has brought to my mind all my intentions about earning money that I was so full of a short time since. Why or how did I forget them all? I have nothing else to do. Still I refused to do it. I have got into the way of sitting in the dark doing nothing after I come home. I believe I should never light a candle at all if I did not want to write. It's almost as good as talking.

November 1.—Miss Simpson has all at once grown very friendly. She talked to me a long time, without appearing to mind that I hardly answered her, about how much worse off she was than any of the rest: that she could never go out anywhere as they could, because her aunt said she was safer in the house; while all the rest could do just as they liked. Then she asked me all at once, if I should not like to go to the theatre. I said, sulkily, "I've no money; so it's of no use considering what I might like to do if I had." She began to tell me I might easily get money for that; that it would only be half-a-crown. —"What are you blushing at?" she said, all at once. I was blushing because I had half-a-crown; and I began to think I might go. I thought I might perhaps see Coriolanus standing in Aufidius' kitchen, and all the fry of servants in astonishment. I said directly, "I have half-a-crown!" She said, then we could go; she was sure her aunt would let her go with me. I asked if she thought they would act Coriolanus. She said she had never heard of it. I said, "But of course they'll act it sometimes, for it's Shakspeare's." She waited a little, and then called out "Miss Hayes! do you know if they're acting Shakspeare anywhere?"—"Why, what is it to you?"—"Well, we're making up a little party to go to the theatre, and Miss Wells wants to see Shakspeare." I said "No, no; I want to see a play of his." "And pray, when are you going, and who are you going to have in your little party?" (mimicking.) "We're not going to tell you," Miss Simpson said; and then Mrs. Simpson came up stairs, and we all stopped. I looked as I came home at all the play-bills I could see; but I knew none of the plays mentioned in any of them, except Hamlet, and I don't admire Hamlet. He does not know his own mind; and I don't think I understand it.

Nov. 2.—We have talked again about the theatre, but Miss Simpson wants to see a melo-drama: if she won't go to see Shakspeare, I'll go by myself.

Nov. 3.—I have indeed something to say to-day. At breakfast I told Mr. and Mrs. Greaves that I had heard it only cost half-a-crown to go to the theatre, and I would go. Mr. Greaves asked, "Who's going with you, my dear?" I said Miss Simpson had talked of it, but I thought I should go by myself; and told them why. Neither of them spoke a word; but after breakfast Mrs. Greaves followed me up stairs and asked if I was out of my head. She talked with me a long while, and told me that scarcely any one went to the theatre to see what was going on on the stage. I asked, "What then?" She said, "O, they went in parties for amusement." —"Then what do they amuse themselves with?" —"With talking and looking about; and when a young man pays attention to a girl, he treats her to something to eat or drink."—"Well, still I can go; and, being by myself, I can look at the stage, or just what I like."—"But it won't be respectable."—"Why not?"—"Because, you fool, if you have no one with you, any one will speak to you." —"But I sha'n't speak to them." She said, however, that it was quite impossible for me to go. That she did not much approve of me going with a young man, for it often ended in mischief; but that if I went alone it would be supposed that I wanted some one to take notice of me. I cried, and said there was nothing in London called by its right name, and that people never said what they meant. After she was gone away, I went after, and asked her if people went to church to be taken notice of? She said, not in the way they did at the theatre. But if a young woman went alone, an acquaintance might perhaps offer his arm to walk home,—"and then, you know, it looks as if you'd done it on purpose." I went up stairs again, determined to care nothing how I looked. Yet still, as I was going to church and all the time I was there, I could not help thinking people were looking at me. Then I thought—if they believe I want some one to take notice of me, why don't they do it? Do I look like something not fit to talk to? I saw that I was one of the plainest dressed in the place, and began to think every time any one looked at me, that they turned away as if they thought I was not respectable. As I was coming home, Dicky Batts came and offered me his arm, just as Mrs. Greaves said people would. I was pleased at first that he thought me worth taking notice of; but he put his face so close to mine every now and then, that I found out he thought he was doing me a favour, and that I had wanted him to come, and was much obliged to him. At the corner of the street where we live he stopped, and said he was sorry he could not escort me home, but he was obliged to go. I walked on without a word, and told Mrs. Greaves the moment I got home that I would go with them in the afternoon to Hampstead. This journey is what I want to write about.

We could not afford to ride both ways; so we settled we would ride back, as we should be tired. I am tired with walking to work every morning, and this was five times as far. So, when Mrs. Greaves had chosen a room to have tea in, I asked to stay in it till tea time, while the rest went out. Mrs. Greaves pointed out that there were several tables in the room, and that people would probably come to them all. The woman belonging the house said I might very well stay there an hour or two, as no one would come so soon. So I took off my bonnet and sat down in the window seat, and in five minutes I was asleep. Mrs. Greaves woke me to come to tea. The room was full of people, all talking, each at their own table. Mrs. Greaves had brought her own tea, and bread, and butter; and every one else appeared to have done the same. Every one exclaimed at me for not having seen the fine country we were in; and as I did not want any tea, I was recommended to put my bonnet on, and go out for fresh air. The room was very hot, and I went directly. There was a pleasant wind, and without taking much notice, I set off, and walked till I came to a part of the road where there were trees on both sides. I did not like that; it looked gloomy; so I turned back again. I had now the wind in my face, and I began to look round. The road I was on was raised above the heath, and on each side the changing ground was sometimes green, then black, then yellow, with furze blossom. Close on my right hand were some little hills with cottages and gardens; more in front there was a large hollow in the heath, so large I could not tell where the cultivated ground began: then wide-spreading fields, trees, more fields; and a very long way off, rising over the edge of a hill, a white spire and other buildings. This was westward, for there was the sun over it. I could not see so far anywhere else. Straight before me were large trees; and below, on the left hand, two or three ponds and some scattered houses. There was no sunshine, but still everything looked clear, even to the white spire so far off. The hills stood up, and the trees, as if they were cut in iron. Every hollow was black, and the ponds looked dark, though I could see shadows in the water. There was a house on the left hand nearly hid by trees, but the white end of it seemed to blaze out of the darkness. Here and there a bush of furze burnt like fire. A still cold had fallen on everything, and I walked as fast as I could without knowing why. Then it began to rain, and I held down my face and went still faster. I was out of breath and tired when I reached the trees that were straight before me. I did not like to go to the house, so I stood under them, though it was fair. I looked to where I could see farthest; a red line of light was over the hills and the white spire, and it seemed to shine over the heath and come straight under the trees to me. Every branch seemed tipped with crimson, and the wind swept the bright rain off them as it sung through the waving green.——"O, really Miss Wells, do come in! What a pity it has rained! You'll have your bonnet quite spoiled. Do, pray, come in." This was Mr. Greaves. He seemed to me as repulsive as a cold wet toad. However, he had been sent for me, and I was forced to go. When I got into the house, Mrs. Greaves was getting ready to go away. She said it was likely to rain again, and we must go by the next omnibus. We waited a little while, and then set off. As long as we could see a bit of the heath, I looked at it; then at the white sky, and at last watched to catch a glimpse between the houses of the streak of light that was all there was left of day. It seemed to me that I had been home again; and that I should never go any more. I heard Mrs. Greaves say the trees were fading very fast, and that it was the last time they would go into the country. I shut my eyes, and tried to call back the pools of water, the furze, and the white house; and whenever the rattle was loudest I said, softly, "Farewell, farewell." In turning a corner I felt a light shine on my face, and some one said "Miss Wells is asleep." I durst not open my eyes for fear they should shine with tears, so I let them think so.

Nov. 4.—I thought all day of the large trees at Hampstead. I saw nothing of the poplar tree but the ends of a few small branches. I believe I am ill. I am always excited after a Sunday, and to-day I am excessively tired besides; my hands tremble so that I can scarcely write.

Nov. 5.—I have been all day forcing my attention to the trimming of a brown satin gown, and endeavouring to acquire some "taste and judgment," (as Mrs. Simpson said.) While I was working at it, I kept forgetting what I was about; and now I can think of nothing but making plaits for the front, with velvet between.

Nov. 6.—Every girl in the room but me has something to talk about; something they have been doing, or are going to do. I don't like any of their schemes, except going to the theatre; and Miss Simpson seems to have quite forgotten it. I remembered to day that I had paid a shilling omnibus fare on Sunday, so that I had not money enough, unless I went into the gallery; and I want to be close to the stage. As I was coming home, I stopped to read some play bills on a wooden wall; and in the middle of my reading Dicky Batts came close up to me, and said, "Well, which would you like best?" I said I did not know. He began to talk about them until I interrupted him, by saying that "it did not matter, for I could not afford to go." I nearly cried when I said this, for he had described three or four pieces, and at every one I was just going to say, "I'll go to that," and then I recollected that I could not pay for it. He began to stammer out very fast that "that mattered nothing . . . that other people could . . . I need not be down-hearted . . . What was money for, if it was not to give pleasure to people?" Then seizing hold of my arm, he said all at once, "Come, you'll go, won't you?—Just say you will, and I'll run and take two places." Here he dropped my arm all at once, and turned his back to me, saying, in a low voice, "Let's see, which shall we have?" He stood looking until he might have spelt every word of the play-bill, and at last I walked quietly away, thinking he somehow intended an impertinence. When I got home Mrs. Greaves said, "Well, Miss Wells, what did Dicky Batts say to you to-night? Is he going to take you to the theatre? Don't look so astonished: I saw you talking to him, or at least him talking to you." Thus I found out the reason of his turning away so suddenly. He's a very contemptible being.

Nov. 8.—I wrote nothing yesterday, for I was at the theatre; but I will write it all now. I had just set off home from work, when Dicky Batts came to me, and said he had been waiting for me; and showed me two cards, which he said were for "Covent Garden Theatre—Pit." "For you see I did not like to do the thing in a shabby way." He is continually saying and doing things that I don't understand: but he took hold of my arm, and walked through streets where I had never been before, as if it were quite right and natural that he should show me the way. I dared not object, for fear he should laugh at me; and at last we got there. We did not go in directly, and I found the reason was, that it was not time for half-price. I was angry again, secretly, that Dicky Batts should so ostentatiously talk of doing the thing "not in a shabby way," and then keep me at the door. If it be the custom to pay for somebody else, (which strikes me as a very strange one,) why does he not do it right? When we got in, there was loud music playing, plenty of talking, and nothing going on on the stage. Dicky Batts kept talking to me, but I could not hear a word he said: by his gestures I judged he was pointing out what he considered remarkable in the theatre; but as I did not want to see it, I took no notice. I don't know why the music gave me no pleasure like that at St. Paul's, but it seemed to me nothing but noise. At last the curtain rose: a young woman, very prettily dressed, was sitting leaning on a table at the back of the stage. I thought the play was going to begin, and that she was one of the players; but she came close to the edge of the stage, and looking straight out before her, began to speak, as if to some people a long way off, in such a loud shrill voice, and with such a mincing London accent, that I could not tell a word she said. I turned round to see who she was talking to; there were four galleries, with people in all round; but the greater part of them had got as far off the stage as ever they could, and I really don't think they could hear a word she said. Dicky Batts was talking to two or three people, one on my side and two more on his; I asked him why the play did not begin, and what business that woman had on the stage. Instead of answering me he began to stare past me at the man on my right hand. This man said, "What does she say?" Dicky Batts told him exactly, and then turned round and told the two men on his left, and they all four burst out a-laughing. Some one from one of the galleries behind called out silence; they gave over laughing, and I asked over again why the play did not begin. He jogged the man next him and said, "She's asking again;" then they all laughed again, and "silence" was called out from behind. I got up and edged past the man by me, he said, "Holloa! where now?" I never spoke. Dicky Batts got up and asked me where I was going; I said, "Home."—"But I can't go now: I came to see . . . really what's the matter? . . . do sit down . . . I can't afford to lose my money and the play too."—"You can stay if you like; I'll pay you as soon as I have money enough."—"Nay, don't be sulky; whatever is the matter?" I had got nearly to the end of the bench, but I heard him say, "Damned provoking, isn't it?" One of them said, "Let her go." Still he followed me, and spent the greater part of the way home in trying to persuade me not to pay the half-crown. At last we quarrelled, and he got so angry as to say, "Very well; pay me directly then." I said I had but eighteenpence, and I gave him it, and promised him the other shilling in a week, (I intended to earn it at nights.) He snatched it out of my hand, and said something about "getting what he could," as he went away. Mrs. Greaves asked me what made me so late, and I told her all about it. She reminded me that we had gone in at half-price, and he had already got more than he ought. She said a deal more, which I did not understand and can't remember, as I was crying all the time. I am crying yet; not about Dicky Batts, but because I am so utterly disappointed in all that I expected from going to the theatre. I gathered from Mrs. Greaves what were the terms on which I might go as often as I chose. I dare not go, nor speak, nor think of going any more until I am rich. I don't know why this should make me cry so; but I feel as if two planks had parted, and showed a horrid sea beneath! and I thought I was on solid ground! I wish I had a fire. I feel so miserable I don't know what to do! This is the end of my going to the theatre, from which I hoped so much! And what else must I look to now?

Nov. 9.—All the world has a holiday but such as me; I don't know what about, and don't like to ask. If I did I should cry, because I should begin for one.

Nov. 10.—I have stayed at home all to-day. I have been thinking of my father and home; the reason of my coming to London; the prospects I pleased myself with when I came, and the notion I had that some sort of prosperity was coming! But what is worst of all, I find that I myself am hardly the same being. I am weak to such a degree as to be always tired; but for this I should care little, if it were not joined to habits of mind which astonish me. I never listen to what anybody says: if I am forced to listen, I think their manner of talking so silly that I always get into a passion. If I am forced to say anything for myself, I cry! If I have to do anything, I am either in a passion or I am frightened. I know all this is produced by my occupation! I know, I am sure, that the mind ought to have as many different occupations as there are faculties to exercise. If the strongest man were to use nothing but one limb he would be tired; and if he were forbidden to use more, he would die! But when I am not thinking of my work, I think of nothing. Sewing stitch after stitch is not work for the mind; yet whenever it goes away, it is called back to attend to the everlasting repetition of the same. What can I do? I can no more keep my mind to one subject than my body in one position. I have tried this last; and after sitting motionless a little while, I started off the chair involuntarily; if I had sat longer I should have gone mad! And the vagaries of my mind because its healthy exertion is impossible! I believe I am not an idiot, only because I don't believe the things I fancy to be real! But may I not do so in time? I have already begun to take no notice of real things! I already laugh and cry at my own things! What makes idiots? They seem to believe and see what they only imagine. Long imprisonment makes people idiots—that is for want of mental employment—then I am getting to be an idiot! How shall I know when I am?—I dare not look at my father's chair for fear I should see him sitting in it: then I should know!—

Nov. 11.—I never went to bed last night. I dare not get up from the table for fear I should see something which would prove me to be an idiot. I kept the candle burning till it was done, and then covered my face with my hands and stopped my ears. At last I heard some one stirring below; so I looked up, and it was day-light. I will always go to bed, and try to fall asleep directly; when I thought of last night I was afraid to come home.

But the mental idleness!—must I go on so? That I must work I know—God has said so; but is this what he meant? And the faculties I make no use of!—that have no life in me! I know what comes of a limb that is not used; after it has got pined and distorted—like my mind! Am I then to see one faculty after another become deformed? must I watch my own limbs rot, and drop off?—Oh God, no!

Nov. 12.—Dicky Batts again. Mrs. Greaves told me he would! I would not speak to him.

Nov. 13.—All the good I have got by my thinking last Sunday is, that now I dare not amuse myself as I used to do, by imagining things that I like when there is really nothing but what is very disagreeable. I am always afraid of seeing my father, and I keep thinking that if he were to come, his face would be made of steel, gray and hard, except his eyes, which would follow me about. I wish I had something to do. I understand now all the conversation of my fellow slaves, (I can't help writing it.) I know how they get to the theatre, and many other places. I said to-day that I would never let any one pay anything for me, because he would think me under obligation to him. One of them said, "Well, but you know you promise nothing." I said, "But you are not free." Miss Hayes called out, "Well, I always think this, and I always take care to practise it too: if any man offers me anything, I always take it, whatever it is; and if he offered it with a bad intention, it serves him right to let him spend his money and then find himself disappointed." I asked, "But do you always disappoint him?" I did not exactly mean what I said; I meant, Do they always get disappointed? Miss Hayes threw down her work and began screaming, "You little, nasty, ill-tempered, insinuating wretch! do you think I'll give an account to you? you impertinent, interfering little minx!" Every one began to say that she was quite right, and that there was no harm whatever in taking a little pleasure when they had the opportunity: if they did not, how could they live? I had nothing to answer to this question, and I began to think whether I were not wrong, and they right. This is what I get by talking to them! I might well shrink!

Nov. 14.—A pale blue satin dress is in my eyes and fills my head. When there are wedding-dresses to be made, every one talks of them and nothing else; and they are so forced on my attention, that I am sick to death.

Nov. 15.—I used to look forward to Sunday when I got to Friday; but now I dare not, since the last I spent.

Nov. 17.—I wrote none on Saturday night, because I thought I should have all to-day to write in. And now I feel so wearied that I had much rather go to bed than write, though it is only eight o'clock, and I have done nothing all day. This afternoon I lay down and fell asleep on the bed. I wonder why! I am never tired enough to fall asleep for more than an hour after I go to bed at night, and then I keep waking constantly. Mrs. Greaves came up and found me on the bed, and began directly to say she was sure I was ill; that I had never looked well since I got so wet and tired at Hampstead. I wish I had such a chance of getting wet again! But there is no going into the country now; there is not a leaf on the trees! I shall probably never see the wide heath again: I said farewell; but I have not forgotten it. If I live here fifty years I will always ask every one who has come from Hampstead, if the furze and the large trees are thriving. But shall I have to live here? I cannot see how I can get away. O, I am poor! Here for fifty years!—I hope I may die. Yet what shall I do if I am ill? what will become of me then? And for my father to have to fetch me home to die—and to see trees, and flowers, and hay-fields, far, far more beautiful than Hampstead, and then to die!

Nov. 18.—I have begun to be afraid of being ill. How shall I know when I am ill? As to sleep and appetite I need not expect to have much, because I take so little exercise. I am weaker than I used to be; much weaker; but may not that be from the same reason? I will not let my fright extend to this too. I have no pain except when I am tired or out of breath, and every one has then. My head aches sometimes, indeed almost always—but who ever died of a headache?

Nov. 19.—If the object of our creation is our own happiness, there must be some good even in our pain. I can easily see how hard work strengthens us, and how affliction improves us. I know how my mother's illness made me both bold and thoughtful; and I learnt to walk alone by having to support her. But what good arises from my present misery? what faculty is strengthened by it? what state does it fit me for? It has made me weak, fearful, passionate, and almost an idiot; but with my best exertion I can perceive no benefit. I have said all this before; the thing is beyond my apprehension, and out of my control.

Nov. 20.—Nothing.

Nov. 21.—Last night I went to bed as soon as I got home; I cried, both because I was so tired and wanted to save coals to burn all day on Sunday. I have nowhere to go to, and I am always so cold and weary, it seems as if the only thing I should like would be to sit close to the fire and have no sewing to do, and no one to speak to me. If I'm not ill, how is it that the only thing I like is sitting, or, better still, lying down in perfect idleness?

Nov. 22.—It is Saturday night again. I would not have opened my journal to-night, but to put down that there is a pleasure in my present course of life: it is Saturday night.

Nov. 23.—I have not done as I wanted to do. I wonder if there is any place in the world where one could live without people who would talk to them! When any one begins to talk to me, I always feel inclined to tell them to let me alone. Then I think they are intending to be kind to me; and then I wonder why I should be obliged to take their kindness, when they will give me it whether I want it or not. Still I am afraid of offending them, and at last I get so annoyed I am ready to cry. This was the way Mrs. Greaves vexed me to-day. She came up to me just after dinner, and said she was sure I must be moped to death, being by myself, and I had much better come and sit with them and the children. Then when I refused, she began tormenting me to go out—saying I should be "so much better for a short walk." It was in vain I said it was very cold, that I had not been able to see across the street for mist until noon. She kept insisting that "it would do me good . . . it would make me enjoy the fire more." As if I did not already enjoy it with all the little faculty for happiness that I have left. At last she brought me my bonnet and pelerine, and lent me a good warm shawl, and then hurried me down stairs, and told me to walk quick and I should soon be warm. I turned down the street, because up is the way I go to my work. When I got to the bottom I turned to the left, for I had a notion the country was nearest on that side. I walked very slow, for the large shawl made me out of breath; and I soon got so cold that I dared hardly put my feet to the ground for fear of striking them against the edge of the causeway, or slipping between two paving stones. I did so once or twice, and it made me quite sick. I saw nothing on the road for the fog, except once when I looked down a street and saw the great blood-red sun, so large and low, that it looked as if it was going to come between the houses. Then I thought of Hampstead! I looked round, and there were some red brick houses, without shop windows on the ground floor. They looked so different to those in our street that I thought I must have got a long way from home, and I might be losing myself; so I turned back, thinking that it would be nearly dark when I got home. When I got up stairs, I found I had been out half an hour. So slow the time goes! I sat over the fire till I was quite warm, and then took Mrs. Greaves' shawl, and one of my own for my feet, wrapped myself up warm, and lay down on the bed. I shut my eyes and began to think of —— and the hay-field, and the yellow furze bloom; but I fell asleep almost directly, though I wished to keep awake. I wish I could sleep so at night. And now the Sunday is over. I have sat by the fire till it is nearly out, and there is a whole cold, dreary week before another holiday.

Nov. 24.—I am forced to have a fire to-night to dry my clothes for morning. I have got wet through coming home in the rain. But I can't write; I am so tired.

Nov. 25.—I will only write every other day. When I think of something to say, I get melancholy, for it's always the same thing: sewing, out of breath, cold, tired. Here is my life: I will ask it—Why did God make me? If I was made for the life I now lead, why have I more faculties than are needful for it?——I have been walking about the room a little, and now I almost feel inclined to scratch out the last lines. They frighten me. They shall stand, however; for they are true; and the matter rather concerns me.

Nov. 27.—I have seen Dicky Batts again. He followed me nearly all the way home, though I never spoke to him. He said he wondered how I could like to lead such a dull life. (I wondered how he could think I did!) It would be much pleasanter, he thought, to go into a large light room full of merry people, and have a nice dance, and a nice hot supper after it. "Now, if you'll go with me, I'll take you to one." Then he took hold of my arm as he did when he took me to the theatre; but I snatched it back, and walked on without ever speaking. When I turned into our street, he left me, and I came home, thinking I had escaped something. I begin to wonder now what it was. What danger do I run in a "lighted room, with a merry dance, and a hot supper after?" Is there—can there be, any greater misfortune attending a life spent in that way than there is in creeping miserably to idiotcy, as I do now? According to most moralists, the object of life is happiness; and did they propose any other object, how would they persuade people to follow it? It is lawful then for me to follow what will give me pleasure, if it injures no one else, and this will not. If it injures any one, it will be myself. Can I be worse than I am now? Can I be worse than half alive, dead to enjoyment, sensitive to misery, without motive, without hope, terrified by phantoms, never resting, but dragging painfully a miserable mutilated existence, hoping that my grave is near? I will change. Who can understand like myself what I lose and what I gain! Mrs. Greaves would laugh at my "foolish fancies," my father would tell me to mind my work and I should not be unhappy. I have minded it; Oh! I have minded it!

Nov. 29.—I am here again and have been looking at the last lines of my journal. What can I have been thinking of? Is this the way people go mad? I will write to my father and tell him to take me home. It may be, that other women, whom I think so wicked, are only mad, as I was. I am sure they must have been mad to begin their course of life. Well, then, I too may begin the same! I am an idiot; I will write to my father and tell him so. And this is the end of my attempt to maintain myself! I would not be dependent. I wanted to help my father to send Dennis to school! What was there wrong in these wishes that they could not be granted?—There is no such difficulty in fulfilling my last intentions. But I give it up! I have not been here three months, and I can stay no longer.

Nov. 30.—I attempted to tell Mrs. Simpson today that I was not coming any more; but I was so frightened, that though I tried three different times, I could never speak. At last I decided to write to my father to-morrow, and then he would come for me and tell her.

Dec. 1.—My last Sunday; for I have written to my father. I could find no reason to give; so I just said I wished he would fetch me home. I wish I had told him I was not ill. But I am so flurried I can do nothing: I can hardly breathe. I am going to lie down. I have pulled the mattress off the bedstead, and laid it on the floor beneath the window; there I can see the sky. There is a strong wind to-day, and large grey clouds keep sailing over. How wild our home will look now! how the wind will whistle through the doors, and sweep the leaves over the path past the parlour window! I shall never see summer again nor glorious Hampstead! Farewell. FAREWELL.

THE VISION OF KING MALCOLM.

A ROMAUNT.

The days gone by were mighty days,
With their spells of grammarye:
A mystic grandeur o'er them plays,
A witchland drapery.
No more shall Faust's appalling might
The strong Harz-demon bend,
To steep the light in darkest night,
The cavern'd earth to rend.

The genii of the field and flood
No more shall wanderers sweep
Long leagues away, ere break of day,
Across the unmeasur'd deep.
In these degenerate days the sun
Is but a glowing sphere;
And in the blast, now sweeping past,
No wizard forms appear.

It was not so when Malcolm stood
On Arthur's shaggy steep,
And gazed around on forest ground,
Blue sky, and rolling deep.
King Malcolm stood on Arthur's brow,
And gallant knights anear,
All sheenly barbed, and gaily garbed,
With plume and flashing spear.
The shores of Fife before him lay
A houseless, treeless waste—
He turned, and lo! the ruddy glow
The distant Ochils graced.
And here and there a lonely tower,
A patch of fenceless grain,
High mountains wild, in grandeur piled,
A forest-belted plain.
"A goodly scene," exclaimed the king,
"A goodly scene," the court;
"For many a year old Scotland's cheer
Shall be the sylvan sport.
Yon friar cons his book, and tells
Of city-covered lands;
But ours be flood, and wild, and wood,
And our good gleaming brands.—
Ha! good St. Anthony is here—
Why comes the frere to day,
So like a rook, with bell and book:
Art turned a courtier—pray?"
The hoary hermit bowed before
The jest of royalty,
Which loudly rung, from tongue to tongue,
And made them mickle glee.
He grasped the monarch's bridal rein—
The courtiers looked amazed,
And e'en the prince inclined to wince
As on the friar he gazed.
His skull-cap doffed, his white hair strown
Upon the floating wind,
His haggard look the gazer shook
And thralled the monarch's mind.
"I had a vision, mighty Sire,
A vision wild and drear,
Which e'en to tell, my chapel bell
Would cause to toll for fear.
It spoke of change, it spoke of guilt,
Of dark and wondrous spell;
And thou may'st see the grammarye
Within my donjon cell."
"Thy wits, old saint, I sadly fear,
These books of thine bemuse;
But have thy will—the hours to kill,
Small matter what we choose.
To-morrow, knights, Dunedin's steep
Must see ye gaily dight,
At break of morn, with hound and horn,
To course its heathery height."
The court dismissed, a chosen band
At careful distance follow
The prince and friar, to where a spire
Gleamed from a neighbouring hollow.
A lonely turret tower'd aloft
Beside a lonely well,
Whose virtue, Fame, in curing lame
And blind, doth soothly tell.
By spiral stair to donjon tower
The friar led the way,
Into an old dim vaulted hold,
Where night was blent with day.
The king looked round the shadowy vault—
A dauntless knight was he,
Yet sudden thrill o'er heart and will
Half bent his stalwart knee.
For near the loop-hole grimly sat
A Shape of aspect old,
And stony eye fixed chillingly
Upon the warrior bold.
One glance it darted at the king,
Another at the friar,
Then shook its head with meanings dread,
And plucked it's beard with ire.
And "Feast be thine!" it cried in wrath,
"Thou lover of good messes,
As mine to day—from March to May—
On nought but water-cresses.
Thou promisedst a well-fed buck
To feast a hungry devil,
And nought thou bringest but a king!
By Bel, 'tis scarcely civil!
I've given thee gold, and maids, and wine,
And cloaked thy saintly name;
And forged thee lies of monstrous size
About thy spotless fame.
And now—dost thou believe myself
A very shaveling gray,
That promises or water-cress
Will serve the devil to pay?"
The friar plucked his chin, and looked
Strange meanings at the imp,
And swore, with eye aslant and high,
Him near again to scrimp.
Then, by the wildered prince unseen,
A stealthy glance he lent
To cupboard shelf—and winked the elf,
Whose wrinkled brow unbent.
The friar stooped and whispered low,
The grisly feature smiled,
His chin he strook and tamed his look
Unto submission mild.

. . . . . .

A thin white mist crept slowly up
And round and round the wall;
Now volumes rolled that filled the hold,
And darkness covered all.
It cleared away—the monarch stared,
As soothly well he might;
For wizard power had changed the tower
Into a globe of light.
"Grammercy! saint—what meaneth this?
Is that Dunedin's steep?
Where is the place of royal chase,
The tower and valley deep?"
"Gone with the monarch and the priest:
Thou seest, illustrious sire,
Through thousand years a sight of tears,
A land without a friar."
"The scene is fair," the king replied,
"With palace, field, and tree;
And by my troth I'm nothing loath
That such a thing should be."
"Ha! say'st thou so?—full soon, I ween,
Another tale thou 'lt tell;
And fast and pray a year and day,
For wishing us so well."
The monarch felt he knew not how,
Himself he knew not where;
But princely domes, like royal homes,
Gleamed through the fragrant air.
A garden rich with myriad bloom
With perfume loads the breeze,
And flowers that breathe rich odours, wreath
The golden tinted trees.
The royal sense was steeped in balm,
And wonder filled his eye;
Amid the bowers of glowing flowers
He walked luxuriously.
But, hark! a loud and angry tone,
A whistle sharp and clear,
And "Scoundrel, pray—how came to-day
Your bearded worship here?"
A little mannikin accosts
The king with mickle might;
The monarch felt his deerskin belt,
To quench his soul in night.
But steel and scabbard found he none,
Then flamed his forehead high,
"Avaunt thee, slave!—thou, dastard knave,
By Scotland's law shalt die."
"By Scotland's law! and this to me,
A councillor of the town?

Still bends thy brow? dost know me now?
Beg pardon, varlet—down!"
A fist the monarch raised to smite,
The councillor fled amain;
The king pursued through bower and wood,
With burning heart and brain.
Though well his paunch good capon lined,
The councillor vaulted fleet,
With haste intense, o'er garden fence,
And gained the stony street.
"Police, police!" he cried in haste,
"Arrest the madman, ho!"
But all too late to ward his fate
Or shun the wrathful blow.
It scarce was dealt, when pinioned fast
The monarch felt his wrist,
By stalwart band with clubs in hand,
Assailed before he wist.
"High treason! treason!" shouted he;
But nought but laugh and jeer,
From gathering crowd with insult loud,
Burst on his royal ear.
They bore him swift with hoot and yell
Unto a mansion grim,
And left him bound, like loathly pound,
In dungeon barred and dim.

. . . . . .

In silent sadness Malcolm mused,—
But musings nought avail;
His strenuous thought could ponder nought
But cause of royal wail.
Wild medley tossed and whirled his brain:
Revenge, disdain, and wonder,
With maddening haste each other chased,
And rent his wits asunder.
He cursed the friar, imp, and spell,
And fate, that e'er should be
On Scottish land so foul a brand
As prisoned majesty.
He mused and banned till moonlight pale
His prison vault illumed,
Till watchman's yell and city bell
Their midnight music boomed.
With bloodshot eye he scanned the stars,
The grate, the wall, the floor—
Ha! what strange shape, like mowing ape,
Is peering through the door?
The monarch knew the loathly imp
Of cold and sneering eye;
How suit a king the tunes they sing,
In the nineteenth century?
Cold cheer, and palace colder still,
Have Scotland's laws I ween,
For monarchs drest in hodden vest,
Whose beard unkempt hath been.
"Did'st mark, most mighty sovereign, there,
Amidst the rabble rout
That bore thee here with scoff and jeer,
A little ragged lout,
Who wheeled, and danced, and jumped Jim Crow,
And shouted loud and long?
That boy alone might claim thy throne,
Of all yon burgher throng.
The only drop of Malcolm's blood
This age of gold retains,
Flows not in wight with purple dight,
But in that urchin's veins.
And of thy meanest serfs the seed
Those princely mansions claim:
Their coffers hold more yellow gold
Than thou hast words to name."

Uprose the king with angry bound,
Red wrath inflamed his brow—
"By fire and flood, no royal blood
In beggar's veins shall flow.
But tell me, fiend, the traitor knave
Whose rebel sons aspire
To royal trains, and broad domains,
And proudly rich attire.
For bleached shall be their felon bones
By sun, and wind, and rain;
In one short week the raven's beak
Shall prove thy augury vain."
"Ah! little boots it, mighty prince,"
The elvish imp replied;
"From strand to strand, o'er Scottish land,
Thy kingship bold may ride;
But ne'er thou'lt find such Danish names,
In noble, serf, or wittol,
As Forrest, Dun, or Robertson,
Or Tait, or Black, or Spittal.
But smooth thy beard, time wanes, and thou
Hast marvels more to see;
And, thank thy stars, no gates have bars
For cunning Asmodee."
The king walks out beneath the moon,
Amid the city vast;
The withered imp, despite his limp,
Trips merrily and fast.
But what they saw—for sights were rife,
Even in the midnight hour,
Nor wall nor roof was devil-proof—
To tell transcends my power.
But stirring work that nightly tour
Made in the royal brain,
Which, years thereafter, teemed with laughter,
By courtiers deemed insane,
At wights he saw, with quill in hand,
In attic story pent,
Some scribbling cause for mending laws,
And mauling government;
Some cursing Tories for the "Star,"
Some, Whigs for the "Advertiser;"
One calling t'other "fool;" another
Avouching none was wiser.
Asmodeus said—each house would show
The "March of Intellect,"
And curiously the monarch's eye
Did every house inspect.
But nought he universal found,
Perennial or diurnal,
Save, in each house, ubiquitous,
A sheet called "Chambers' Journal."
And oft, in after years, he'd yawn,
While recollection testing,
Of what it meant—the argument
About the Veto question.
For three long hours the imp to him
Had, on St. George's steeple,
Tried to explain, but all in vain,
The "Rights of Church and People."
Till, when Asmodeus clenched the case
With argument profound,
Out flashed the sun, from vapour dun,
And quenched the stars around.
And all at once, in hunting garb,
He found himself alone
On Edin's heath, with spear in sheath,
Beside the hunting-stone.
One bugle blast around him drew
Of knights a gallant ring:
No prouder band had Scottish land—
He felt himself a King.

LAYS OF LOYALTY.

BY EMINENT HANDS.

For two mortal hours have we been heaping ode upon ode, sonnet upon sonnet, epics by the dozen, and ballads by the hundred upon the fire,—all dedicated to one unvarying theme—the late Royal Visit to the Land of Cakes. Not a cockney but has belaboured his donkey up Parnassus upon the occasion,—not a Celtic sennachie, but has exchanged the inspiration of the small still for that of the "true, the blushful Hippocrene" of poetry. The whole race of scribblers has brandished goose-quill in the cause. In short, in the language of a couplet, which must be quite new to our readers, those

Have written now, who never wrote before;
And those who always wrote, then wrote the more.

We read the contributions that flowed in upon us, till we could read no more; and here we are at this moment, with a face as fiery as our own cook's, seated before the cinerary remains of as much doggrel as would have supplied all the Annuals till the end of time. The smell of burnt paper has alarmed the house. The shrill, but most musical voice of our amiable wife sounds fearfully over the staircase, screaming that there is a conflagration somewhere, worse than the great fire at Liverpool. Prudence enjoins that we should pause till the fears of our gentle partner are appeased; and, as a little Pelion of these Lays of Loyalty still survives, we shall beguile the interval by looking into a few of them.

What is this? As we do live by bread, and not by sour kraut, a contribution from that dear old twaddler, Ludwig Uhland! Little did we imagine, when we saw the old gentleman squatting across a lamp-post in Waterloo Place the day the Queen passed, that his lofty contemplation was to produce such golden fruit as it has done in "Der Morgenzug," or "The Morning Procession." Here it is in the original. Aytoun shall translate it for the next Blackwood:—

Sass Ich da in dem Hotelle,
Frey am Sinn, am Herzen frey,
Suppte Klatzsch vom kauldsten Parritsch,
Saurstes Butter-Milch vorbei.

Sang der Kettel an dem Feuer,
An dem Tafel Kaffee stand,
Waren Butter da und Eier,
Pfenning-Rollen, Baps genannt.

Rolle-Sleis hatt' Ich gebüttert,
Kupf von Kaffee ausgepört,
Eier hatt' Ich auch erschüttert,
Als die Freud' war mir zerstört.

Horch! Vom fernen Kastel-Hügel,
Donnern die Kanonen laut!
Ach Gott! Haben sie die Kügel,
Graut mir's nun am ganzen Haut.

Nein! Sie haben keine Kügel,
Frichtet sollen sie nicht sein.
Horch! Wie von dem Kalton Hügel
Die erfreute Volken schrei'n!

Kommt die Königinn! Und plötzlich,
Butter-Brod stoss' Ich herab,
Umkehr' die Kaffee so ergötzlich,
Sturz' hinaus am meinem Stab.

Am benachbarten Lamp-pfoste,
Hob geschwind Ich mein Gesicht;
Wo das Volken-meer sich stosste,
Sass Ich da ein glänzend Licht.

Um mich schwebt, stolz im Gebehrde,
Tartanisch all' die Keltsche Bund,*
Ach der Himmel, ach die Erde,
Ach der Hölle tiefste Schlund!

Mit Klaymoren in den Händen,
Furchtbar waren sie zu sehen,
Kilten an den Hinter-Enden,
Wo die kalte Winde wehen.

Lawt und lawter auf der Strasse
Schallt des freuliches Geschrei,
Dumpf erbrausend durch die Gasse,
Kommt der prachtvoll Zug herbei.

Seh Ich da zwei Politz-männer,
M'Levy vor Scharfsinn gerühmt,
Mulholland auch, der Dieb-Erkenner,
Durch das Volks-getümmel brummt.

Folgen sie viel stolze Ritter,
Glänst ein Engelbild darin—
Ach! Mein Herz fühlt ein Getwütter,
Himmel! 'S ist die Königinn!

Und Fürst Albrecht ihr zur Seite,
Ihr Gemahl so himmel-süss,
Der um Liebe kam von Weite,
Seine saure Kraüte liess.

Damenschrei von den Balkonen
Grüsst das Konigliches Paar:
Schottland's grüne Cupidonen
Schützen sie auf immerdar.

Sieh! Wo kommt, am Kutsche reitend,
Durch das schreiendes Gewühl,
Kammerfrauen sehr gefrightened,
Kammerdiener Liverpool!

Karakollend auf dem Pferde
Kommt der Herzog, "bauld Buccloo,"
Solches nimmer auf der Erde
Soll Ich sehen, sollst noch Du!

Ach! Das Wunder ist ge-endet,
Ach! Der Zug ist angestosst,
Meine Auge ist's geblendet,
Wo, ach wo, ist Mein Prevost?

Noch, wie All's geschah nicht wissend,
Sitzt er in dem Kammer hoch,
Fragt, sein lieben Tomson grüssend,
Kommt sie, kommt Victoria noch?

Ja! Gekommen ist die Dame,
Und gegangen auch dahin,
Schlag dein Dummkopf nun mit Grame,
Fern ist, ach, die Königinn.

Zum Dalkeith's hohen Palaste
Klättern seine Pferde nun,
In den Herz von einem Paste
Soll sie schnell ein Weg aufthun.

Deukend so, von dem Lamp-pfoste
Droppt' Ich, heimwärts rann mit Hast,
Und mit Sleiser drei von Toaste
Endete mein Brochenfast.

A very pretty little poem. The poet at his breakfast—cold porridge and sour milk, followed by eggs, coffee, and buttered rolls—the cup dropping from his hands in alarm lest the castle guns should have balls in them—the reassurance of safety from the cheers of the people—his serene

* The Celtic Society, we presume.—Ed. T. M.

contemplation from the lamp-post, while the crowd below are crushing each other's ribs—

Nil dulcius bene quam munita tenere !
Despicere unde queas alios, passimque videre
Errare—

his affright at the breechless limbs of the Celtic Society—the procession headed by M'Levy and Mulholland, "these active policemen,"—Scotland's grüne Cupidonen, the Royal Archers—the missing Provost's dialogue with his "lieben Tomson," and the bard's return to wind up his breakfast by the demolition of three slices of toast—form a combination of the lyrical, the descriptive, and the dramatic, peculiarly German; and long may it remain so!

Side by side with the foregoing lies a poem by a great French writer, in a different vein; but not less evincing the hand of a master. Throw back your head, most benevolent of readers, rivet your eyes on the fly at the corner of the ceiling, clench your teeth, and sing vehemently through them, in strong French gutturals.

LA BARRIÈRE DE BOIS.

BY VICTOR HUGO.

Courons, mes amis ! mais mettez vos chapeaux,
Tournons vers Granton nos diligents regards—
J'entends les canons tirer du Château,
J'entends les cris feroces des montagnards !
Deja elle vient; dans leur verte uniforme
Les archers entourent sa carosse,
Et les vivats du peuple s'élevent comme une storme,
Car la Reine veut visiter Ecosse !

Fier de récever la fille de tant rois,
Vient avec ses clefs, le Prevôt, Sir Forêt !
Mais, mon Dieu ! On a passé la barrière de bois,
Et la cortège royale jamais ne s'arrête.
Où, dans le nom de quatre vingt diables,
Sont tous les baillis, sont tous les diacres ?
Je ne vois plusqu'un seul connêtable,
Qui est mort-ivre dans une fiacre.

N'importe ! Oh, laissons rester ces gens stupides,
Appuyés peutêtre dans les bras de Morphée,
Et hâtons frapper avec des doigts avides
La lyre et le violin d'Orphée !
Comme deux étoiles dans le firmament serène,
Avancent la Reine, et son noble Epoux,
Après leur carrosse est cela de Lord Abirdene,
Sir Peel, Ministre, et le Duc de Bucklow.

La glance des yeux royales partout penétre,
La foule entrancée fait une grand bruit,
Et la spectacle se présente à chaque fenêtre
Des hommes curieux dans leur bonnets de nuit.
Encore des canons ! encore des grands cris !
Vive toujours la Reine ! disent Edimbourg et Leith,
Et sur-le-champ sa Majesté, et son mari,
Veulent prendre leur dejeuner à Dalkeith.

On a passé ! Moi, je reste triste et sevère,
Lisant dans mon cœur un leçon bien sage,
Et je regarde quelquefois la futile barrière,
Comme Marius les ruines de Carthage.
Et je disais "Helas ! tout cela est bien fort,
Mais vraiment je ne puis plus sourire,—
Car le grand Napoleon l'Empereur est mort,
Et je sens aussi moi-même, qu'il faut mourir."

What the deuce Napoleon's demise, or the mortality of Hugo in common with bards in general—

Carminibus confide bonis, jacet ecce Tibullus—

what these have to do with the Town Council's barriers, a Frenchman only can divine. Perhaps they remind him of the Barrière d'Enfer, an awkward reminiscence certainly—knowing how ready his countrymen are to visit that portal, if the lines may be believed, which declare

All sorts of courtesy a Frenchman knows,
And bid him go to ——, to —— he goes!

Truly national and charming as is the above, more to our taste is the following exquisite morçeau by the great French lyrist, Beranger. Who shall say that the Royal Visit was fruitless, when it impelled the fingers of the veteran bard to sweep from his long slumbering strings a strain so piquant as

MONSIEUR COMME-IL-FAUT.

BY BERANGER.

Commiston, mon bon Prevôt,
Ouvrez vite la porte des bois !
Ce n'est pas vraiment comme il faut
Faire attender tant de rois.
Qui va la ?
C'est comme ça !
Ca ira !!
Ah bah !!!
C'est la Reine Victoria !!!! (Bis.)

Dans son lit le bon Prevôt
Entend tirer les canons,—
Vraiment ce n'est pas comme-il-faut,
Mais c'est vraiment Commiston !
Qui va la ?
C'est comme ça !
Ca ira !!
Ah bah !!!
C'est la Reine Victoria !!!! (Bis.)

So much for foreign bards—now for our own. The traces of a profound study of Uhland are, indeed, perceptible in the following poem, but it has graces of its own, worthy of its fair authoress, who is dear to the British public as having engaged and blighted the young affections of Mr. Richard Swiveller.

NORTHWARD BOUND.

BY MISS SOPHIA WACKLES.

Lo! our gracious Queen is going
Unto Scotland's ancient strand,
Young Favonius gently blowing,
Wafts her from her native land.

In the Royal Yacht so splendid,
Built express for George the Fourth,
By her princely spouse attended,
Sails she for the rugged North.

See the Captain, Lord Fitzclarence,
Welcomes her upon the deck,
Crowds of sailors and of marines
Wait upon her royal beck.

Spread the sails, and lift the anchor,
'Midst the cheering of the crowd;
For the stately yacht 's a spanker,
More especially when towed.

Towed by steamers vast and powerful,
See she cleaves the briny main,
For the land of song and moorfowl,
Where the Stuarts once did reign.

Be ye soft as downy pillows,
Waves that beat the stubborn Nore!
Ocean, calm thine angry billows,
For our Queen is not on shore.

Neptune! monarch of the water,
Bid thy Triton troops attend,
Till Britannia's peerless daughter
Shall attain her journey's end.

Amphitrite! send thy Nereids
From their lonely coral caves;
Let their heads, all crowned with sea-reeds,
Glisten o'er the lively waves.

Hark! sweet music, softly swelling,
Sounds along the glassy deep—
Comes it from the watery dwelling
Where the nymphs their vigils keep?

No! 'tis sweeter, milder music—
'Tis the tabret and the drum.
O Prince Albert! say, are you sick?
Yarmouth's fishermen are come.

Gently night doth fold her pinions,
Gentler sounds the paddle's splash,
As the Queen of these dominions
Glides across the sullen Wash.

Dappled clouds, the dawn's precursor,
Streak the wide expanse of blue,
On the deck the watchful purser
Serves out rations to the crew.

"Tell me now, my Lord Fitzclarence,
What the coast before us spread?"—
"Where those boats are catching herrings,
That, my liege, is Flambro' Head.

"Past that rock, so like a puncheon,
Spreads the Yorkshire coast no more,
And we trust, soon after luncheon
To be off the Berwick shore."

And the captain spoke most wisely,
As was quickly to be seen;
For at three o'clock precisely,
Scotland saw her youthful Queen.

Where St. Abb his promontory
Flings into the raging deep,
And the Bass, so famed in story,
Gazes on Tantallon's steep;

There two steamers, deeply laden,
Both of Granton boats the best,
Bring full many a youth and maiden
To receive the Royal guest.

Every eye with joy is beaming,
Which alone the good can feel,
And the Scottish bagpipes screaming
Soon provoke the lightsome reel.

Kilt and scarf are intermingling
In the Tullochgorum dance,
And each loyal cheek is tingling
Underneath the Royal glance.

Toe and heel in wild commotion
Cut the buckle, thread the ring;
Underneath the quivering ocean
Fly the startled cod and ling.

And her Majesty, astonished,
Puts her finger in her ear,
Till the grateful crowd, admonished,
Hail her with another cheer.

Then, exchanging song and tankard,
Glide they through the quiet sea,
Till the Royal fleet is anchored,
With Inchkeith upon the lee.

Lo! on every distant mountain,
Kindling in volcanic life,
Springs aloft a fiery fountain
Both in Lothian and in Fife.

Bonfires of immense eruction
Fling abroad their gorgeous rays,
Each resembling in construction
Radiant Vs and sparkling As.

When again the morn appeareth
And the darkness flieth fast,
England's Royal standard reareth
Its proud folds above the mast.

Now in Granton, free from danger,
Lies in peace the stately keel,
And on shore the Royal Stranger
Steps, and greets Sir Robert Peel.

Various groups are there assembling,
Thronging from the heights above;
Some look on with fear and trembling,
Some with reverential love.

"Which, among these gay beholders,
Is the Provost?—tell me where!"
But Sir Robert shrugged his shoulders,
And no echo answered—"There!"

As a set-off to all this exuberant loyalty, here are some pithy verses by a Dundee weaver, that excite our extreme disgust and pity, as, doubtless, they will do those of our readers. Horrible audacity flames in the very title.

ROYAL RAREE-SHOWS.

What! Have I seen the queen?
Ere I'd been so besotted,
As after her to dance, I'd rather been
From the earth's surface blotted.
No, I have studied in another school,
Than to be fond Imagination's fool,
Hag-ridden by the rule
Of that poor phantom of their own conceit,
Which men call Royalty! Abase my soul,
That over it the idol's car might roll,
Myself had reared, and crush it in the offal of the street!
No! seen the Queen, forsooth!
My court is Reason, Sir, my queen is Truth!

What is a queen to me,
Her pomp, and her resplendence?
A bloody and a brutal soldiery,
Still riding in attendance.
My shuttles, why should these be cast away,
And I forego the profits of a day?
I need them all to pay
The taxes, from us by our tyrants wrung,
Wrung to uphold the minions of a court,
In bloated luxuries and wanton sport,
And rivet closer still the chains that on our necks are hung.
Out! seen the Queen, indeed!
Queens by the score might pass—I'd take no heed.

A queen! oh, yes, a queen!
I'd like to start her.
Sir, do you think, she's seen,
Seen, Sir, the People's Charter?
She's but a woman—good as she are now
Wasting beside their young with faded brow.
I know a throne, where bow
Myriads on myriads—young, and old, and fair—
There evermore is heard the dying groan,
And Hunger, pallid Queen, sits on that throne,
Whispering to two gaunt fiends, Rapine and grim Despair.
That were a queen to see!
She lords it o'er her slaves right royally!

This is by one of the people—bitter, abusive, and ill-conditioned. As a contrast to it, here are the contemplations of a young female, who, we have reason to know, is very much about the royal person, in fact, one of the royal waiting-maids. The lines are sent to us from Taymouth, and appear to have been written immediately after the exhibition of Highland dancing in front of the castle.

HIGHLAND MUSINGS.

And them is forests, and them 'ere is 'ills,
And that 's a lock (Scottice, loch)—oh, my! And that 's a cliff;
And them 's the places where they 'as the stills,
As makes the whisky so uncommon stiff;

And them 's the deer, them hanimals one seeses,
All running up and down among the treeses!

Oh, goodness gracious! If I ever see
The like of that! And all that 'ere is 'eather;
There's more, oh, crikey! such a quantity,
Than all Blackheath and Hampstead put together.
And in among the trees I can diskiver
A waterfall, a-falling in the river.

Well, Richmond 'ill no doubt's uncommon neat,
And 'ighgate 'ill 's a most romantic spot,
The Thames at Vindsor, too, is really sweet,
And Eel Pie Island vhere the eels is got,
Vite Condick Gardens is not much amiss;
But, lawk! they're nuffin as compared to this.

And, bless my heart, why, wot a lot of men,
With tartan petticoats about their waists—
It's really quite indelicate. But then
There 's no accounting for some people's tastes.
See, how the wretches whirl! That Highland fling,
Upon my life, 's a most improper thing.
I really can't stand looking at it longer,
It's naughtier nor the Hopera a great deal.
They come it strong there. Here they come 't much stronger.
It's really quite uncommon what I feel.
Such things is not for tender nerves, that's clear;
So down I'll go, and have a glass of beer.

A very sensible resolution—which we mean to follow; and therefore, without more ado, we shovel the whole remaining contributions upon the royal excursion into the fiery element; and let no man, woman, or child, from this hour, send us a line upon the subject.

EXCERPTA OF AN ENTHUSIAST.

NO. I.—THE VALE OF GLENMALURE,* AT SUNSET.

The sun had sent his parting rays
Through the warm air, and in a blaze
Of golden glory seem'd to fall—
Like angels gliding from the sky,
One gorgeous cloud encircling all—
Majestic, proud, and brilliantly:
Flinging around a mighty flood
Of liquid flame, as full and splendid
As that wherein the Saviour stood
When Mercy's snow-white Dove descended
On Jordan's banks, and bands above
Proclaim'd Him Lord of Life and Love!

Never can languid words define
The sudden warmth that on me burst,
Beautiful vale! when, with the first
Quick view I snatch'd, I fancied thee
The very entrance to a shrine!—
Where those in pain and suffering nurst,
In manhood stain'd with crimes the worst,
Would know their breasts once more might be—(Though theirs were even as dark as mine—)
Purified to eternity!

Spell-bound I stood, and mute—as 'twere
Heaven's first faint gleam that met my eyes,
And I inhaled its blessed air—
And felt both Thought and Feeling rise
Within me to such glorious height
That, well my mind might deem, not Earth
Had given—or, though supremely bright,
Could give—those deep emotions birth,
Or robe them in a light which shone
Unclouded, chaste, and purely fair
As if it left a Godhead's throne,
Thrilling from its transcendent glare,
And came to earth—nor lost one ray
Of taintless love upon the way!

Oh! 'twas a place, an hour, that he—
Who, from youth's fairy dreams awoke,
Knows there is no true liberty,
Yet burns in bending to the yoke—
Who gives the world and man his hate,
And lives most lone and desolate
Without one object which could move
His sated soul to bliss and love—
Without one object which could cling
Round a heart sear'd and withering—
Oh! 'twas a place, an hour, that he
Thus cursed would with delight confess,
Inspired the thought that he was free!
That even his hate to man was less!
That Nature still remain'd, as given
To soothe a spirit rent and riven,
To woo the wanderer to her kiss,
And clasp him into love and bliss!
And further, that—although bereft
Of Life's most cherish'd ties, and left
Unloved and lonely here below—
There was a light, above, that shone—
Circling him in its radiant glow;
And—as the ivy clothes the tree
To which Decay comes darkly on,
Veiling its ruin verdantly—
That thus God's love would round him twine,
And make his misery half divine!

Oh! when the cold world casts a chill
O'er each sweet passion; and each thrill,
That once waked in the heart, is still:—
Yes! when life—like the northern year,
One part illumed, the next all drear
And dreadful gloom—shall pass the bright,
Fast-fading, luminous glimpse, and night
Sternly and starlessly appears
Deepen'd by unavailing tears;—
When Crime and Custom's wedded curse
Howls through the shuddering universe
Nor spares the very solitude;
But turneth,—like the wormwood star—
With hate surpassing Hell's by far,
Man's best emotions into blood;—
Then, then once more I'll seek this scene
So grand, so glowing, and serene,
Shrining within its calm recess
All that man asks of Loveliness.
And here—as sinners, when they see
Earth's sorrows lessening on their sight,
While Hope unlocks with glittering key
Eden's blest gates, and Seraphs flee,
Sparkling from the Divinity,
To guide them in their God-ward flight—
Thus will I quit Care's worldly din,
Thus stand, as tranquil and as pure
As those redeem'd from grief and sin,
In thy green vale, oh Glenmalure!
And I shall own thee then to be
The dwelling of a Deity!

PROTEUS.

* A spot, to the admirer of nature, consecrate for its magnificent scenery: and dear to the lover of genius, as immortalised by the authoress of "Psyche."

MRS. TROLLOPE'S VISIT TO ITALY.*

Mrs. Trollope has become absolutely too good-atured. What of her bile had not been poured orth upon the Americans, was expended to the ast drop upon the French; and with the Germans nd Italians she is charitable, liberal, indulgent, oneyed; nay, with very particular noble favourites, lmost buttery. We are not, however, certain that the reading public," or even that portion of it hich complained the most loudly of her onslaught pon the Republicans of America, will find that her ncreased amiability makes up for the loss of her riginal piquancy, and biting sarcasm. An au-ience might be allowed to resent an actress who ad played, and very cleverly too, the part of a aucy soubrette, or vixen old maid, coming before hem in the line of genteel comedy, or all at once anguishing in the sentimental vein.

The great defect of her visit to Italy will, we pprehend, be found in the almost total absence of ny account of the social condition of the mass of he Italian people; or of their "domestic man-ers." This lady has never, with all its faults, roduced any book of Travels equal to her Ame-ican work, or any one which has made the same mpression; simply because she was under no re-traint, and took freedom to speak with the frank-ess of spleen, whatever, right or wrong, was in n acute and essentially honest mind. But in taly, she could not tell what she did not know. In er late Tour, Mrs. Trollope has laboured under he great disadvantage of seeing much less of the eople than in any of the countries which she had reviously visited. In Austria, or rather Vienna, he had some personal glimpses of one class; and n Paris she saw something of the different coteries, nd a good deal of the street and public-place opulation. In Italy, where the middle class is imited, and where the old nobility shut them-elves up in either their city palaces or Apennine astles, a foreigner finds much more difficulty in naking way into society than in any other Euro-ean country. But whatever may be the cause, r causes, Mrs. Trollope has never been at home—ever domesticated, among any people, save the Yankees; and she knows best about the people she ikes least. Her prejudices are, however, giving way. If she detest the great body of the nation—nan, woman and child, and all its institutions, she nakes several exceptions in her late journey; luring which she met with several distinguished Americans, resident in Italy. One was a sculptor f some reputation, settled in Florence, named Hiram Powers, whom she had known many years efore, as an ingenious lad, the assistant of the eeper of a Museum in Cincinnati, and who then lisplayed a fine natural genius for modelling. An-ther citizen was Mr. Everett. To all these Ame-icans Mrs. Trollope is studiously complimentary.

If we abide by the rule, "In every work observe he author's end," there may be no fault whatever, and no deficiency in Mrs. Trollope's book. She may have meant to give merely her opinions on the pictures and monuments of Art to be found in Italy, and upon its scenery; and to produce a book that may guide the traveller, and amuse the fire-side reader. In this she has been completely successful, and has even accomplished more than is bargained for: as we do see something of the living as well as of the dead; of the Present as well as the Past. The tone of her opinions, of her apparently diffident and yet pretty decided criticisms, we like exceedingly, and are inclined to believe that they contain much truth as well as spirit. They are, at all events, the lively first impressions of a woman of judgment and cultivated taste. Mrs. Trollope set forth in April 1841, accompanied by her son. She passed through "ugly France," by the Diligence, between Paris and Lyons. The position of the latter city reminded her of New York, though the locale of the Transatlantic city is finer. We suppose we must forgive the following hit, in consideration of Mrs. Trollope letting us through Chambery without one word of testimony against Jean Jacques:—

> Lyons has, however, too many indications of being, like our own manufacturing towns, the sordid root from whence springs the rank luxuriance of commercial wealth, to make any close examination of it agreeable. There are a few good pictures in the museum..... The boar hunt by Sneyders is a masterpiece. It was a little cruel in Mrs. Starke, however, to tell us that it contains "celebrated drawings by Poussin of the seven sacraments." There are unquestionably seven drawings, and very fine drawings too, of Poussin's seven sacraments, but they are by the hand of his engraver instead of his own; and the defeated hope of looking upon the great master's first ébauche of these splendid pictures, was but ill-atoned for by the careful copying of this artist.

Mrs. Starke (sometimes Mrs. Starkie!) is taken to task at several other times; and, we dare say, requires admonition on her blunders; nor are authors, perhaps, bound by the gospel injunction of, in the first place, rebuking an erring brother in secret. Our authoress is highly exhilarated on drawing near the Savoy Alps; as indeed who is not—save those, who, like one of her fair friends, "find this sort of thing uncomfortable." The Tourist was charmed with the Pass of Les Echelles, with the passage of the Alps, and the descent upon Piedmont. But were the route ever so tame, instead of what it is, anything would, to her, be tolerable after travelling "from Calais to Lyons," over the flat face of "La Belle France." At Turin it was found that the royal family had abruptly left the palace, to avoid receiving the Queen-Regent of Spain, then just set out upon her travels.

Pictures, Architecture, and Scenery, the main objects of Mrs. Trollope's research, attracted her at Turin; but as there are many and nobler galleries to which we may accompany her, we shall here keep out of doors.——This, we conceive, conveys a clear and even sharp idea of the scene; a very great feat in a verbal description of scenery, and especially of atmospheric effects.

> It is the frame-work of Turin which constitutes its principal beauty; and though I expect that Italy will become considerably more Italian as we advance, we cannot again hope to see the marvellous effect produced by its atmosphere in full action upon a horizon of snow. When the morning light fell upon this mountain barrier, the colouring was so totally unlike anything I had ever seen before, even in the tropics, that I felt as if my senses were the sport of some optical delusion, and that I looked through a medium that had some trick in it. I have read, and heard talk about rose-coloured light, nay, have talked about it myself, in America; but such soft, liquid, rosy radiance, as I watched floating over the white mountains round Turin, I never saw before.

* Two volumes, octavo, cloth. London: Bentley.

Nothing struck the Tourist so much in Turin, as the quiet and orderly air of the inhabitants; contrasting, in gentlemanly repose, so decidedly with the Parisian population; with—"the fierce moustache, the long beard, the lanky locks of some, the curly bush of others," and the endless variety in hats, caps, frocks, jackets, blouses, and the "dirty aspect of all." Here were neither beards nor moustaches; but well-shaven chins, and ordinary-shaped beavers. Mrs. Trollope's delight at these marks of good morals and sound Toryism was somewhat alloyed, when she learned that moustaches, beards, and bushy hair, and queer caps and hats, were strictly prohibited by royal edict, as Jeune-France-ish, and revolutionary.

It may easily be imagined, that with a person so impressionable as this traveller, and so much alive about all that had filled her dreams for long years, and which she was now to behold for the first time, every new scene should regularly be Good, better, best; Beautiful! more beautiful! most beautiful! This effect was perfectly natural, and the expression of admiration at each new and surpassing scene must be her genuine and sincere feeling—of the moment. The reader must be prepared for raptures upon raptures, though we fully believe that wonderfully few of them are "conjured up" to serve the purpose of the page, and the hour. After the many approaches by sea and land that have been made of late years to Genoa the Superb, this and the continuous description still reads well.

We reached this glittering jewel of a city in the twilight of a lovely evening, and can never forget the impression which the drive from the point where we first reached the shores of the Mediterranean, produced. I remember few things so striking as the views caught as you traverse the beautifully curved line which leads from Sestri di Ponente to the city. But on reaching the town itself the charm is in a great degree lost. The very narrow streets and the very lofty houses, produce an air of gloom and closeness which contrasts very disagreeably with the radiant approach to it. But Genoa is not to be judged by this first nearly dark drive through her streets. She has not obtained the cognomen of "La superba" for nothing; and of this we became very satisfactorily convinced as soon as we stepped forth from our hôtel on the following morning.

It was Sunday, and all that gay contadinesco costumes could add of beauty to the sunny brightness of this most brilliant-looking of cities, was displayed in the churches and public promenades. On first entering the Duomo, I was quite startled by what seemed to me the exceeding richness of the female dresses which crowded the aisle.....And though, on closer examination, I was so far désenchantés as to discover that veils which I had mistaken for the most splendidly-embroidered silk, were, in truth, nothing but very bright and showy-coloured large cotton shawls, the general effect still remained, and was singularly brilliant and picturesque. Every female head is enveloped, rather coquettishly than closely, in these large, square, gaudy draperies, which, falling low over the figure, produced, as they stood or knelt by hundreds in the spacious aisles, one of the most richly-coloured living pictures that I ever saw ....a first-rate Paul Veronese. During the course of the day, however, which was spent in assiduously driving out and walking in every direction where we were most likely to see these brilliant holiday-folks congregated, I observed that the class of females above the cotton shawls, but beneath the Parisian bonnets, had their pretty heads wrapped in flowing draperies of delicate white muslin. These were all sedulously arranged, and, for the most part, with very perfect good taste; and as, on this holyday, they were all in a state of spotless purity, the effect was exceedingly delicate and pretty.

I failed not to look, with as much attention as was civil, at the faces thus shielded from the eye both of the sun of heaven and the sons of men; but though I discovered many that were exceedingly picturesque, and well rewarded the trouble I took to get sight of them, I could not help thinking that I remembered a multitude of young English heads of the same class, which, if clothed in the same pretty style, instead of the stiff bonnet that belongs to us, would have been even lovelier still.

Why does not Mrs. Trollope denounce "the stiff bonnet," and patronize this pretty Genoese style? All the painters would be on her side; and many fathers and husbands, who, though sharing in few of her Anti-Gallican dislikes, detest French milliners, and all their works, long bills included.

Mrs. Trollope applies an observation to Genoa, which she afterwards repeats of Florence, Naples, Rome, and other Italian towns. They are all very well to look at, but not for her to live in; an opinion which the inhabitants of each of those cities might, without doubt, heartily retort upon their visiter in reference to English towns. In Ferrara not one of her party would live for "a hundred thousand a-year." Yet a single piano is rather tempting to most English folks. Wherever Mrs. Trollope went, she was grieved by the sight of groups of little boys in Murillo-tinted rags, basking in the sunshine, supremely idle and supremely happy,—and many of them "superbly handsome." She longed to send them to school; certainly the National school. They would not have thanked her. In Lombardy, Tuscany, and even Venice, the people appeared tolerably comfortable, and the country well, or highly cultivated; while in the Papal dominions and in Naples, she has never seen a population so miserable—save, and the exception is worthy of notice, in Manchester and the neighbouring towns. The extreme poverty of the people in the midst of a country which nature has thrice-blessed, is freely imputed to bad government, and to the Roman Catholic religion, though that is the common faith of Italy, cultivated or uncultivated. But to what are the misery and poverty of the people of Manchester attributable? No doubt, in her opinion, to the manufacturing system. Yet Mrs. Trollope is an admirer of commerce, the solid foundation of nearly all that she beheld in Florence and Venice of the magnificent and the beautiful; and she extols "liberal Liverpool" as the generous patron of Art. But what would Liverpool be without Manchester and its sister manufacturing towns? Sir Robert Peel knows better than this. Tory lady-politicians must speedily begin to be convinced by him.

Mrs. Trollope displays not only enthusiastic admiration, but fine taste in scenery. This is said in the journey from Genoa to Pisa, after describing the charming road, the Apennines on the one hand, and the Mediterranean on the other.

But perhaps the sweetest spots of all, are those where the curving shore forms a little bay, not large enough, it may be, to shelter above a dozen fishing-boats at a time, but where the favourite breeze, mildest where all is mild, is alone permitted to blow upon the happy slope that rises round it.... for there you see such teeming luxury of vegetation, as, unseen, it is, I think, impossible to imagine.... Oh! if I could but take a few yards square of that soil, and that atmosphere, and transport them to my English garden!.... How I should laugh at all my fine neighbours' hot-houses!

Our tourist's taste in female beauty is as good as in landscape. At a town in the dominions of the Duke of Modena, (a potentate whom, notwithstanding her unbounded reverence for legitimate princes, she considers fair game, as he shows no more respect for English Tories than English Whigs,) she went as usual to the Opera,—

In the next box to us, sat, I think, the very prettiest girl I ever saw. Her beauty had, perhaps, a charm for me beyond that of mere feature and complexion, for the looking at her face and figure, was like looking at a picture of Raphael, in life and movement. It was not a Fornarina though, but a Madonna; as heavenly mild, as passionless and holy; as youthfully slender, and as divinely fair, as the very loveliest of the lovely army of virgins that he has left behind him upon the earth. Indeed it was a pain to part with her!

It may save much trouble to state, once for all, that at every town Mrs. Trollope most industriously visited every known lion, dead or alive, artistic or ecclesiastical; and discovered some others worth seeing, though not blazoned by the guide-books. She also travelled with a lively recollection of the Italian poets; and never loses the opportunity of illustrating her letters (for the VISIT is written in this convenient form) by happy allusions to the purely classic galaxy of Italian poets, from Dante to Alfieri inclusive. She reached Florence just in time to see the Colossal statue of Washington, executed by the American sculptor Greenough, despatched to take its honoured place in the capital named after the illustrious original. Had Mrs. Trollope seen this statue in the city of Washington a dozen years since, it were not hard to guess what she might have said of it; but she has mellowed since then, and probably better understands colossal men as well as colossal statues. She admired "the domestic Jupiter;" which we like her all the better for owning, that she could not just at first do "the statue that enchants the world"—the Medicean Venus, and some other things, the admiration of which artists and amateurs have transmitted from generation to generation, as of hereditary right. Indeed it is not clear that she was even able to admire all the boasted masterpieces of Michael Angelo. She confesses, also, that at last St. Peter's had taught her to feel that a Grecian Cathedral might be nobler than a Gothic one. We should not wonder to find Mrs. Trollope's want of susceptibility to the stern grandeur and severe majesty of Michael Angelo attributed to the weakness of her sex.

The sights and amusements of the most fashionable promenade and evening resort of the fine people of Florence, if less worthy in themselves than the Florentine palaces, churches, and picture-galleries, are at least more novel. The locality of that lounge is at a Cascina or embellished dairy-farm belonging to the Duke, and within a short drive of the city. This drive leads through many beautiful views.

On reaching the wide space before the dairy, every carriage stops, taking its station sometimes according to the coachman's pleasure, sometimes in submission to that of his mistress, who may choose to draw up beside a friend, and sometimes, if arriving late, it may be obliged to content itself with any portion of vacant ground big enough to admit its entry. And then the gentlemen in the carriages appear one and all to spring out of them, seldom, as it seemed to me, deeming it necessary to have the step let down.... nearly all the carriages being open.... and they circulate from step to step, and from door to door, or from horse to horse. Sometimes the gentlemen from one equipage take their place in another, or hang about it in a variety of graceful attitudes, flirting the while with the fair dames, who all remain in dignified possession of their cushioned ease.

Meanwhile, half-a-dozen, or so, of very picturesque-looking flower-girls, with large, flat, flapping hats of Tuscan straw, (Anglicè Leghorn,) make their way fearlessly among the horses, and each claiming an intimate personal acquaintance with all the company, (a claim which nobody denies,) they begin tossing their beautiful bouquets into the laps of the ladies, trusting to the gallantry of the gentlemen for payment; who, either for the pleasure of the fair ones receiving these lovely offerings, or for that of the pretty coquets who bestow them, appear not at all disposed to disappoint them. And oh! the beauty of these flowers so carelessly received, and so lavishly given! I know not a blossom that we love and prize that I did not last night see again and again tossed into the carriage as plentifully as if they had been field-daisies. It was at Genoa that I first began to feel how completely I was living in a garden. Every terrace of every house.... every garden-hedge, every stall in every street was redolent of the richest odours and the most brilliant bloom. No town, or village by the road-side, but displayed the same delicious abundance of all that is fairest and sweetest in nature; and on arriving here, I seemed to have reached the ne plus ultra of floral splendour.... I think it is impossible that you can conceive anything like the perfection and the abundance of this luxury at Florence.

The favourite hour for the Cascina drive seems to be immediately after a six o'clock dinner.... For that was the time at which we went there, and the place was then so crowded that I think most of the equipages of Florence must have been upon the ground. We returned from this very agreeable drive in time to dress for a party at home.... a pleasant, easy circle assembled, chatting and eating ices till eleven o'clock; but there were no Italians among them, nor is it very often, as far as I can understand, that the travelling English obtain the advantage of good Italian society.

Though evidently disappointed, the critic of the far-famed Venus—of "the delicate little creature" that excites so many noisy and hollow raptures, finds a wondrous grace in "the air of purity which hangs about the naked figure like a palpable veil." From the criticisms on the celebrated pictures in the Tribune, we select this morsel on Raphael's Fornarina, which hovers so daintily between the prudish and the proper.

The Fornarina is the picture most known, most cited, most talked about. As a work of art it is not very easy to find fault with it.... for it almost lives and breathes; it has the warmth of healthful life upon the cheek, and the softness of human feeling in the eye, the throat and arm are round as if in palpable relief, and the colouring has a quality of light in it, that makes one fancy it would be visible in the dark. Yet with all this, and a good deal more of the same kind that I could say of it, all tending to prove its incredibly close following of nature, it is not a picture that gives me any great pleasure. The woman looks vulgarly Fornarina-ish, and though full of feeling, the physiognomy is not redeemed by it from this accusation..... I better love the gracious softness of her of the Seggiola..... The Fornarina looks as if she could give a kiss, and a buffet too, if the fancy took her.... while the Virgin mother, in her tasselled chair, seems too pure for the one, too feminine for the other, and too angelic for either.

In another place there is some kindred criticism on the Magdalens of different great masters, in too many of whom Mrs. Trollope insinuates there may be found some suspicious trace or trick of their former condition.——Here is a bit of charming criticism, and the avowal of, we suspect, a rank heresy, a revolutionary opinion :—

There is a little Correggio that fascinated me greatly. A virgin mother on her knees, and a heaven-born infant sleeping on a corner of her mantle that was fallen on the ground; the position speaks beautifully of the tender patience of the mother, who could not change her attitude without awaking him.... It is a lovely picture. There is also a Holy Family here, bearing the enormous name of Michael Angelo; and if one could see a bit of mud upon a board, and be assured on good authority that it was his hand which put it there, we all should, would, and must, feel great reverence for it, and allow, with very sincere gravity, that it ought to be preserved with the care belonging to a relic, almost holy..... But I suppose it would not follow that we must also admire it as a work of art! At any rate, if to admire either the supposed bit of mud, or the existing Holy Family above-mentioned, be necessary to the establishing a reputation for taste, I must withdraw all claim to such reputation; for if it were ten times Michael Angelo's, I should still be of opinion, that this Holy Family, independent of his name, would not be considered worth five pounds by any collector in the world.

Now that we have subdued the swart monster Steam, and fitted him to do all our hard and ignoble drudgery, it will not be wonderful if displays of excessive muscular size and energy should sink in value in Art, like mere brute strength in practical life.

Florence seems to have been somewhat dull to the Tourists, though they were with friends, and found many acquaintances—for travellers too many—among the resident English who flock to that city in great numbers. Had Mrs. Trollope taken occasion, as she has done, to praise Sir Robert Peel's happily devised measure, the Income-tax, from its reaching the perverse sojourners on the Continent, we could have better understood her. Her stay at Florence was, however, besides the resources of galleries and all manner of sights, enlivened by some social events. She saw Catalani, a personage about whom many old and middle-aged people may still be curious. There is too much of it; but this morsel will interest :—

Instead of going as usual to the Cascina after dinner yesterday, I was taken a mile or two out of Florence to pay a visit from which I promised myself great pleasure, and received more.... I went to see Europe's umqwhile wonder and delight, Madam Catalani Valabrique. She is residing in a very beautiful villa, which stands in the midst of an extensive podere of which she is the owner. Nothing could be more amiable than the reception she gave us. I think, of all the nations who joined in the universal chorus in praise of her high character, her charming qualities, and her unequalled talent, she loves the English best.... perhaps they best understand her worth; and the rare superiority of a mind, that in the midst of flattery and adulation which really seem to have known no limits, preserved all its simple purity and goodness unscathed. I was equally surprised and pleased to see to what an extraordinary degree she had preserved her beauty. Her eyes and teeth are still magnificent, and I am told that, when seen in evening full dress by candle-light, no stranger can see her for the first time without inquiring who that charming-looking woman is. A multitude of well-behaved reasons would have prevented me, especially at this my first introduction, from naming the very vehement desire I felt once more to hear the notes of a voice that had so often enchanted me. Perhaps if I had not seen her looking so marvellously young and handsome, the idea might neither have seized upon, nor tormented me so strongly as it did; but as it was, I certainly never longed more, perhaps never so much, to hear her sing as I now did. Her charming daughter, Madame de V—— was sitting near me, and I think I ventured to ask her if her mother ever sang now. To which she most gaily and promptly answered in the affirmative.... and then.... what happened next I hardly know.... I am afraid that I must have said something about my secret longings.... for the daughter whispered a few words to the mother, and in a moment Madame Catalani was at the piano.... No, in her very best days, she never smiled a sweeter smile than she did then, as she prepared to comply with the half-expressed wishes of a stranger, who had no claim upon her kindness but that of being an Englishwoman. I know not what it was she sang; but scarcely had she permitted her voice to swell into one of those bravura passages of which her execution was so very peculiar, and so perfectly unequalled, than I felt as if some magical process was being performed upon me which took me back again to something.... I know not what to call it.... which I had neither heard nor felt for nearly twenty years. Involuntarily, unconsciously, my eyes filled with tears, and I felt as much embarrassed as a young lady of fifteen might do, who suddenly found herself in the act of betraying emotions which she was very far indeed from wishing to display. . . . . It was not the feeling often produced by hearing, after a long interval, some strain with which our youth was familiar, for I doubt if I ever heard the notes before.... but it was the sort of peculiar unique Catalani thrill, which I do not believe anybody ever can forget who has heard it once, and of which no one can form a very adequate idea who has never heard it at all. Were I to tell you that the magnificent compass of Madame Catalani's voice was the same as heretofore, and all the clear violin notes of it quite unchanged, you would probably not believe me; but you may venture to do so, I do assure you, without scruple, when I declare, that she still executes passages of the extremest difficulty, with a degree of skill that might cause very nearly all her successors in the science, to pine with envy, and, moreover, give up the competition in despair. . . . . Madame Catalani's eldest son, who seems to love her as such a mother deserves to be loved, is living with her, as her podestà, her friend, and most dear companion; Madame de V—— likewise appeared domiciliée with her excellent mother.... The youngest son, also spoken of as highly estimable, is in the army, and with his regiment. The dwelling of Madame Catalani is extremely beautiful, being a large mansion, containing some very splendid rooms, and situated, like all other Florentine villas, in a spot of great beauty, commanding very extensive views among the picturesque hollows of the neighbouring Apennines, with the ever-bright-looking villas scattered among them.

Mrs. Trollope almost apologizes for Madame Catalani preferring a residence in Italy to one in England; though she has placed herself where she may have the pleasure of yearly seeing troops of the people of the country which she loves the best —next, perhaps, to her own.

While at Florence, Mrs. Trollope saw the pretty lla of Mr. Walter Savage Landor, and his fa-ily, but not himself. The ungracious poet and ıilosopher cuts Florence altogether, its coteries, ıd English visiters. He does not seem to have 'en made his appearance at the grand scientific onference held, while Mrs. Trollope was in the ty, under the immediate auspices of the Grand uke, and which enjoyed not merely an Italian ıt a European reputation. It was made more lustrious by the Pope, the Duke of Modena, and e believe their Majesties of Naples and Sardinia, ›rbidding any of their subjects to associate with ıose suspicious savans whose assemblages have 'er been to them ominous of revolution.

An expedition to the Convents of Vallombrosa and amaldoli, a heroic one for English ladies, formed an greeable episode in the Florentine residence. The reat resort of visiters to Vallombrosa has compel-d the monks to fit up a kind of inn or Tillysow, ›r the accommodation of women. It is a detach-l building, and named the Forestieria. The hos-itality of the monks is of course requited by a onation; and the brethren do not, in the repasts rovided for their guests, minister to the lusts of ıe flesh. Well replenished provision baskets ›rmed therefore an important part of the travel-ng equipage of Mrs. Trollope and her English ·iends in all their pursuits of the picturesque. 'he garlic soup, the penitential potage of the ›nvent, the sensible heretics quickly washed out f their mouths with sparkling champagne.

When worn out with heat and fatigue, Mrs. 'rollope frequently indulged herself in repose, nder circumstances which, had she been the royal onsort of George IV., must inevitably have sub-ected her conduct to "delicate investigation." ıfter scrambling upwards and downwards on orseback to Camaldoli, she was so overcome with eat and fatigue, that she owns that, though the ight of the remarkable scenery "might have cre-ted a soul under the ribs of death," she had a trong desire to lie down for an hour, but where?

One of these rustic buildings had the air of an unin-abited house, and upon inquiry we found that it was ıdeed such, being in fact the Forestieria erected for the ospitable purpose of giving hospitality to women.... 'any such could be found of sufficient courage to pene-·ate to this mountain fastness. But it was not on re-›rd, as a magnificent-looking monk with a long beard ›ld us.... it was not on record that any woman had een ever there; and, consequently, all the preparations ıade for their accommodation had been removed, and othing remained in the house but a rude table and few chairs. These were cold tidings.... but they ·ere uttered with so much kindness, and such cordial ssurances that everything in their power should be one to make us comfortable, that it was impossible not › feel comforted at least, if not rested. I begged per-ıission, notwithstanding the unpromising description of ıe Forestieria, to enter it, feeling certain that with my ıawl rolled up for a pillow, I could take the rest I ·anted, in defiance of its want of furniture.

And there her companions left her, and she sank ıto a comfortable sleep. "How long," she says—nd we quote the story principally to show the enuine kindness of the monks—

How long I had enjoyed the "good dulness" I know ot; but a voice that seemed very close, though very far ·om loud, awoke me, and starting up, I saw three most ·ately-looking monks.... the shortest, as I believe, at least six feet high, with beards as abounding as that of Aaron, and their flowing garments so adding to their size, that as I looked up to them from my (not flowery but) floory couch, I thought they looked like so many gigantic magicians, come to punish me for intruding unbidden into their mysterious haunts. For half a moment I really was most strangely startled, for I had been very soundly asleep, and I could not immediately rouse myself sufficiently to comprehend who they were, or what they were come for.

The kind souls did not, however, leave me long in ignorance; as I sat up and looked around me, I perceived that the three figures I had first seen standing round me were not all my visiters.... there were three others, habited, I believe, in the same manner, but with demeanour less dignified, one of whom was bending under the weight of a large mattress, another bearing a fine plump square pillow in each hand, and the third with his head and shoulders buried under blankets and coverlets. I suppose I looked a little astonished; for one of those I had first espied smiled as he told me not to be alarmed at seeing so many strangers. He said that, having come to see if I wanted anything they could get for me, they had found me sleeping on the ground, and, fearing that must be "troppo spiacevole per una donna," they had ordered the servants of the convent to prepare me a bed as well as the place would permit. I thanked them very gratefully, and having risen from the floor, assured them that I could arrange what they had so kindly brought without giving them any further trouble. But this they would not permit, and a very comfortable bed was speedily arranged for me, upon which, apparently to their great satisfaction, I lay down before they left the room. It is impossible to do justice to the benevolent kindness of their manner, or to the gentle zeal with which they all assisted in preparing this place of rest for me. Nothing, certainly, could be more unlike the hostelry style of our reception at Vallombrosa, than the manner in which we were treated here. This is, of course, naturally enough accounted for, by the fact, that scarcely a summer day passes at Vallombrosa without its receiving guests; whereas, at Camaldoli the male strangers who arrive are very few, and the female (till we made the exception) none at all. . . . . .

My companions returned, delighted with their ramble, and soon after, a neatly-served, but not very good dinner was placed on the table, during which the lay-servants of the convent waited upon us, while one of the reverend brethren remained standing in presence, as if to do us honour, civilly answering whatever questions we asked, and appearing, indeed, very kindly anxious to do the honours of their establishment as hospitably as possible.

Mrs. Trollope obtained one good opportunity of seeing the population of Florence. She was present at a kind of popular fête, which annually takes place at the Cascina on Holy Thursday.

Though infinitely less noisy, and what would generally be called less gay, than the same sort of thing in France, there was an air of universal contentment and happiness among the immense crowds of people assembled, which it was very delightful to witness. In addition to all the artisans and petty tradespeople of the town, there were throngs of peasants from all parts of the surrounding country, amounting we were told to above twenty thousand! The crowd in the drives, walks, and meadows of the Cascina, was, considering its great extent, perfectly astonishing; but not a sound was heard that could be called disorderly or even boisterous, though an air of perfectly unchecked merriment was universal. I visited the ground twice in the course of the day, and on both occasions found it as full as I think it could be, consistently with the power of moving. The Grand Duke and his family walked for an hour among the crowd in the evening. Thousands, I was told, were already assembled, and eating their breakfasts there, at sunrise; and a moderate style of domestic feasting—mothers, fathers, and children, sitting in little circles together—appeared to be going on in one part or another of the ground, during the whole day. I thought that, in this fine and fair specimen of national physiognomy, the men had the advantage. I never saw a more healthy-looking, handsome, well-grown race. Their dress, too, struck me as being peculiarly respectable, as to its material, condition, and form; considerably less picturesque indeed than that of the Germans upon similar occasions, but giving an idea of being considerably more modern, though less fanciful, as well as less costly. Among the women, there were some exquisitely lovely, and certainly more perfectly beautiful, both as to form and features, than I remember anywhere in the same rank. For it is rarely, I think, that the form of a hard-working woman, in any country, reaches its full perfection of growth, without losing some portion of its grace, particularly about the shoulders. But this was not the case among the beauties I am now speaking of, who had several of them an air of historique picturesque perfection that really approached very nearly to the beau idéal of beauty as it may be seen in the Madonnas of Raphael. More than one of these delicate-looking creatures did I see, in peasant's garb, who looked vastly as if they had walked out of a picture-frame; having a look so indescribably resembling an Italian work of art, that I fancied I must have known their nation had I met them in a land the farthest removed from it. But of these fair perfections there were very few. Perhaps I may have seen four or five deserving all I have said, in the course of my two drives and my one walk .... certainly not more; and of the rest I should say that, excepting the bright black eyes, and a good form of head, they were not superior in average beauty to our own peasantry. Those of quite the lower orders had their heads uncovered; and of the rest, the great majority wore the round flat hat of Tuscan straw, which is not unfrequently set upon petites élégantes in the Tuileries gardens, as a guard against the sun.

We find here an account of that singular confraternity, the brethren of the Misericordia, which is more minute than any we had previously met with; though we can hardly accord these Brethren of Charity the warm admiration bestowed upon them by Mrs. Trollope. This society takes its date from the year of the Plague, in the time of Boccacio, and is consequently as old as the Decameron. The horror of infection made the sick be most inhumanly neglected, and led a few brave and faithful spirits to associate together, bound by a vow to afford succour to whoever should call for their assistance. This society, originating in the noblest motives, is still extremely numerous, and contains persons of all ranks, from the prince and noble, who may enter for a limited time, downwards. They are bound together by one common faith, and one common tie.

But that tie is so secret and mysterious, that many of the members live and die without knowing who or how many are united with them. Yet can they, like freemasons, make themselves known to each other when they meet, should such recognition be necessary, by secret signs and words known alike to all, but known to themselves alone. . . . . Of a hundred and five of the brethren called giornanti, seven hold themselves constantly in readiness to attend any special summons, or to obey the sound of the bell by which they are frequently called. But this is only for the ordinary wants of each day; any extraordinary necessity is provided for promptly and readily by extraordinary aid. Another portion of the society is bound to collect the charitable contributions of the public by personal applications, which, be it observed are never refused. The smallest offering may suffice, but something is always given whenever a masked and shrouded brother of the Misericordia asks for it. There is something queer in the idea that one might be asked for a paul any day by a sovereign prince, if one happened to be met in the street by one of these mysterious-looking unknown.

A privilege of the Misericordia is, to have the free pardon of one of the brethren granted every year to them, whatever may have been his offence.

One of the duties of this holy brotherhood, and one which is regularly and constantly performed, is visiting the prisons, and praying with those who are condemned to death. . . . . That this institution is of great and constant utility, may be inferred from the fact, that it is next to impossible to pass through the streets of Florence without meeting them in the performance of their duty. Sometimes they are carrying the sick, or the maimed, to the hospitals, ... sometimes passing to the homes of the sufferers to attend upon them, ... sometimes carrying those who have expired to the grave. The species of respect manifested to them as they pass along, tells plainly in what estimation they are held; I know not how it may chance to be in other countries, but I think it would be impossible to see a brother of the Misericordia jostled in this. I went into their little church, which is in the Piazza del Duomo. It is said to have been erected soon after the scourge which had given birth to the Order had passed away; and it is said, also, that it is built over the pit dug to receive the dead. It is a mournful-looking little place; six of the brethren are in attendance there night and day, that in cases of urgent need all may know where to find them. Divine service is duly performed there night and morning, and a few candles burn unceasingly upon the altar. On the floor of the church were many of their dresses, ... together with biers and palls, all gloomily ready for immediate use.

We are not sure if this be the best possible substitute for an efficient and well-administered poor-law, and our less formal and imposing Protestant associations for benevolent purposes.

One day Mrs. Trollope witnessed a rather extraordinary resurrection, and one by no means so pleasant as the apparition of Madame Catalani, still fresh and fair, as of yore.

To our extreme astonishment, we were some days ago informed that MADAME SACQUI was about to enchant the Tuscan metropolis, by a series of the most difficult performances ever exhibited on the tight-rope. I imagined that the daring advertiser must be a descendant of the Madame Sacqui I remembered in the days of my youth, upon whom the slipper of her great ancestress had fallen. But I was quite wrong.... It was no descendant. ... It was the immortal Madame Sacqui herself!... If wonder and astonishment could have sufficed to give pleasure, then might we have been extravagantly delighted at this unnatural exhibition; but this not being the case, a very near approach to positive pain, was the result. We were told that this preternatural old woman was seventy, and our box being, unfortunately for us, very near the stage, we saw her features with sufficient distinctness to feel persuaded that this was no exaggeration. The exhibition was a very terrible one. Strength and activity, in a degree that at any age would have put the possessor of them apart from the rest of her species, as something out of the ordinary course of nature, displayed by a wrinkled crone who looked as if she had reached the very last stage of human existence, had something so dreadful in it, that I doubt if any could have been found sufficiently light of heart to have made a jest on the subject. It really was tremendously horrible! If, when yielding to the pressure of actual want (which of course can alone explain the business)—if, while thus exhibiting herself for bread, the advisers of the poor old woman had recommended her making her appearance in the dress, and with the appurtenances of a witch, making her devolts on a broomstick, and spinning aloft, like one sustained in the air by some power unknown, I daresay we should have all shuddered; but at any rate there would have been something poetical in the emotion. But how do you think we must have felt at seeing her decked out with all the meretricious decorations of an opera-girl of eighteen? And then, after performing every rt of gymnastic impossibility upon the ropes on the age, she set off with an enormously heavy-looking flag each hand, to walk to the very highest part of the rge Theatre, over the heads of the people in the pit! . I fully expected that some dreadful catastrophe ould be the result, and so I believe did every one else; r there was a sort of extraordinary stillness through ıe house, that told eloquently enough of some common eling of no light kind... but when on her re-ırn, the horrible old sorceress stopped midway and aved her flags aloft, there was a burst, and a scream, ıat she, I suppose, took for applause, which was almost ıafening, and then we got up, and made our escape, ther ashamed perhaps of having been among the crowd ho had looked upon such an unseemly spectacle.

Really this was too much for ordinary mortal ærves; and one could wish the retreat of a decent orkhouse for all improvident, superannuated, great erformers, forced by poverty upon second and third ppearances.——The Florentine ladies, like the ourt devotees of the age of Louis XIV. and is descendants, seek the retirement of a convent ır a few days during Lent; to expiate the sins of ıe past year, and restore their minds to a sober ıne after the license and gaieties of the carnival. f they took voluntarily, and in good earnest, to ıe tread-mill, or the beating of hemp in a solitary ell for a few days, one might fancy them sincere, owever deluded; as it is, the mortification and self-enial are not of a very rigorous kind, being merely ı sit and sleep in clean and snug though small ooms; eat plain food, and go, as often as they lease, to church, but no farther. Mrs. Trollope ronders if they bring any books or carpet-work rith them; and gives ladies living in the world ome credit for being at all able to sit a few hours lone, in mental abstraction.

During the extreme heats of summer, the Tourist ıft Florence for the Baths of Lucca; which is ound a delicious retreat, and one much frequented y the English. The pursuits and amusements re much the same as at other fashionable water-ıg-places, gaming included. The Grand Duke of ucca has a villa here, where he resides with the mplicity of a private gentleman, and where he ives balls and parties, in which the English reatly preponderate.

Nothing can be more agreeable or more gracefully asy than these royal receptions.... The amiable uke, as may easily be imagined, is perfectly adored roughout his "English colony;" and the kind hospi-ality he thus extends to the large circle of English as-embled here is rendered peculiarly agreeable from his hamberlain and major-domo, the Marchese Boccella, aving married one of the most charming Englishwomen ı the world, who presides en dame d'honneur at these eceptions, and whose perfect manner of executing her ask certainly gives a very great additional charm to ese brilliant soirées:... I never on these occasions ooked at this charming woman without feeling proud ıat she was English.

In addition to all this we have an exceedingly pretty ttle theatre, where French plays are performed (as I elieve all French plays are all over the world) ad-ırably... and, better still, we had yesterday the gra-fication, which we had long wished for, of hearing the uch-admired declamation of the celebrated Modena, ho is, I believe, now considered throughout Europe he finest tragic actor on the stage.

This great actor could not act a tragedy alone, o he gave readings from Dante, in a style that nakes one wish he would pay a professional visit to England; though we are not quite sure how the actual costume of the great poet of Italy might take in the nineteenth century in our frigid country. Perpetual balls, plays, and pic-nic parties, enlivened the season at the Baths, which, however, terminated tragically. In return for the gracious civilities of the very popular Duke, the English bachelors resolved to give a parting ball in his honour; which should be followed by the indispensable supper, champagne, toasts, speeches, three times three, and hip-hip-hurrahs! The refreshments at the Duke's sober entertainments consisted solely of ices and tea. The bachelor's ball was accordingly anticipated with great eagerness. We give the conclusion of the affair in Mrs. Trollope's own words; wishing, that as a woman and a Christian, she had moralized a little more upon the catastrophe, and had told us what became of the homicide, and his coadjutors.

It has never before happened to me to see the feelings of a whole circle of society so suddenly and violently turned from mirth to mourning, as I have seen happen here since I last addressed you. The ball of which I spoke has taken place... but its consequences have been most unhappy;... a duel followed between two Englishmen within an hour after the company separated, and the consequences have just been announced to be fatal to one of them.

Oh! that terrible Scotch phrase "foy!" how it haunts me!... The fine young man who has fallen was throughout the evening in such exuberant spirits as to attract the attention of everybody; and being one of the stewards his animated gaiety was felt by all, for all shared the assiduous attention with which he performed the duties of his office.... The supper, which was extremely elegant and profuse in every way, took place while everything was still in apparent harmony.... The royal guest appeared to be delighted himself, as thoroughly as he delighted everybody; and the admirable little speech in which Sir Richard H—k—n proposed his health, though it was followed by applause in which the ladies could not resist joining, evidently pleased the good-natured Prince, notwithstanding its noisy results.... And when it was ended, one of the officers of his household announced to the company that his Royal Highness invited them all to a ball and supper at the palace on the following Wednesday. The tables then broke up, and as his Royal Highness accompanied the ladies from the table, of course no one remained behind, and the dancing immediately recommenced.... I really think I never saw so happy-looking a party; everything seemed to have answered and gone well.... The Duke, with his usual graciousness, danced later on this occasion than is his custom, and did not leave the rooms till late; but later still did all the others stay, and it was near six o'clock before the last carriage drove from the rooms. To the very last moment (though the horrid challenge must have been given and accepted) did the doomed young man continue his gay assiduities; and I really believe that scarcely a lady left the rooms whom he had not assisted with her shawl, or to her carriage.... But within two hours after the last departure, he had received the mortal wound.

* * * * * *

Of course a multitude of stories have been in circulation respecting the cause of this most unhappy affair; but I believe it is now well known that whatever might have been the immediate provocation to the challenge, the cause of quarrel between the parties was of considerably earlier date than the ball, and originated in some very unjustifiable language injurious to the deceased, and which had been too faithfully repeated to him.

On her return to Florence, Mrs. Trollope assist-ed, as the French, and as she also says, at the congress of Philosophers held there last autumn. Of the number was Mr. Babbage, specially invited by the Grand Duke. One is more gratified by the enthusiastic reception given by the Florentines, and all the Italians present, to Orioli, who had been exiled from Bologna for liberalism or free-thinking, or unpardonable innovation of some sort. He is now a Professor at Corfu. We are gratified to find Mrs. Trollope acknowledging the influence of a man of this character, and feeling it herself.

I have witnessed this effect on the approach of several, and our own great English names have been among them; but none has produced it at all in the same degree as ORIOLI. For some time after his arrival in the room I knew not that he was come; but I perceived that there was, beyond all doubt, some great one present whom all who were better informed than myself were desirous to see. There was a movement throughout the long gallery as universal and perceptible as the turning over the leaves of the libretto in a concert-room; ... but here it was the persons, and the heads, and the eyes that were turned, and all turned in the same direction. "What is it?" said I. "Eccolo!" replied some one near me. "Who is it?"... I reiterated. "It is ORIOLI," was the very satisfactory answer; and thereupon, I felt exceedingly disposed to transgress all sorts of high-bred regulations, and the sedative "Nil admirari" among the rest. . . . . .

By the great kindness of a countryman who has long been a resident in Italy, and who seems to know everybody and be able to do everything, I have succeeded in my earnest wish of hearing Professor Orioli speak, and that too under circumstances of peculiar interest. . .

I wish I had Orioli's speech before me.... for I should like nothing so well as to pillage it for you;.... but I might as well wish for the moon..... His appearance is neither dignified nor imposing in any way; but I think it is impossible for the power of mind to go further in redeeming the want of personal preëminence. At first I thought his manner awkward, and he held in his hand a pocket-handkerchief very ungracefully rolled into the smallest possible compass;.... but as he proceeded, either his manner changed, or every defect in it was forgotten.... What became of the pocket-handkerchief then, I cannot say;.... all I know is, that every word he uttered seemed precisely the best he could have hit upon for his purpose; and before he concluded I am very greatly mistaken if he had not contrived to make his audience, from roof to floor, feel that he was able to show very satisfactory, or at any rate very incontrovertible, reasons for the opinions he held.

In this tour Mrs. Trollope did not diverge from the usual route, save in one instance, which laid some scenes, painfully characteristic of the ignorance, misery, and misgovernment of the people, open before her; but these we have not yet reached. She went from Florence to Venice by Bologna, Ferrara, &c.; saw the usual sights, and did not forget either Tasso or Byron, Leonora D'Este, or Parisina. The rivers of Italy everywhere disappointed the traveller, the Arno and the Po most wofully; and the Brenta and Adige, with their far-famed villas, not less. She has not very much to tell, that is at all novel, of Padua, or of Petrarch's tomb and final residence at Arqua. But about Venice, worn and hacknied as the subject has become, she has managed to create a lively interest.. In reference to the vague or erroneous impressions given by the many poets and fictionists, who have celebrated "the Sea Cybele," it is remarked,—

Considering how much charming poetry has been poured out in descriptions of Venice, I am surprised to find that so few of the graphic passages have left true portraits on my mind. I think that Byron's verses have gone nearest to preparing me for its visible aspect; while Milne's light morsels.... which, for power of penetrating as they go, and leaving marks of having touched you, are like winged arrows tipped with steel.... these have more forestalled the feelings it inspires.

Having done sufficient homage to these two English poets, she eloquently assumes the theme herself, and certainly gives a very lively idea of the unparalleled city.

We all know that Venice rises from the sea; and therefore, as we slowly and sedately approach her, we are in no way astonished at perceiving domes and towers before us, with no visible foundation to rest upon but the wave..... But it is necessary to get over all the little trumpery bustle of arrival, and to settle the working-day questions of where we are to be, and so forth, before it is possible to indulge in doing that which perhaps for years you have most longed to do.... But all this tedious little work being performed, seat yourself in your gondola and sally forth; and then, if there be any truth in you, you will confess that never before, let your life have been long, short, still, or stirring, did you find yourself surrounded by such a scene of enchantment as this.

Having adverted to the customary lamentations made by all travellers over the fair and fallen city, which, as prophecies of its total ruin, she is disposed to rate slightly, Mrs Trollope proceeds:—

But for those who will permit themselves to live for the present hour, and be contented to say, sufficient to the day is the beauty thereof, there is still more glory left in Venice, and a richer treasury of the products of human genius, than on any spot of earth beside..... Rome, I suppose, excepted. Examine this wonderful creation of the head and hand of man, from the rude, but bold and effective science which drove the first piles upon which it stands, through the building and decorating of its Churches, the erection of its stupendous palaces, the incredible accumulations of its precious gems and marbles, up to the crowning glories of Titian and Palladio, Sansovino, Paul Veronese, Tintoretto, and the almost endless string of mighty names that follow .... look at it all, as it now stands; and then say if it be a fitting subject for honest unaffected lamentation, or for saying that she

"Sinks, like a sea-weed, into whence she rose."

Instead of sinking, she floats so buoyantly and so beautifully, that, to my eye, she still looks triumphant.... triumphant over Nature, even though she neither buys nor sells so largely as formerly..... and that her Doge, her Council of Ten, and her lion's mouth are no more.

And then as we look at her we float too, and with a perfection of lazy luxury that it is quite impossible to describe.... Why it is that the being carried along in a gondola is so totally unlike any other carrying along, I know not; but it is so, and I doubt if the movement of a balloon would appear more novel to me than did my first voyage from our lodgings to the steps of St. Mark's Place. The soft black cushions into which you sink, the funereal hue and texture of both roof and sides of every boat you pass, with the dark curtain drawn across the front, and only removed, perhaps, to make for a moment visible a pair of flashing eyes, which, whether male or female, tell of comeliness and of character almost as far unlike any with which we are familiar in our northern land, as the vehicles in which they glide are to our rattling equipages.

Throughout her stay, and to the very last hour, the unearthly and solemn stillness of this city was felt. To render it more complete, the people,—those worthy of account at least, the nobility—lie in bed all day, and swim about all night, floating from one pleasure to another; save those few who remain fixtures in their crumbling palaces, nursing neir dignity in strict solitude. Even Lord Byron, hile a lion rampant to all the world besides, Irs. Trollope was informed, was never Admitted to that small select knot of Venetian aris- ocracy, which holds itself precious, apart, and unap- roachable ; and which is, in truth, both too proud and o melancholy to admit the approach of any curious anderers whatever, whether beauty, poet, lady, or ord.

The traveller is, we believe, a fervent admirer f the Austrian Government, which may cause er statements regarding the reviving condition of enice under the Austrian yoke to be received ith some degree of caution. Yet she saw with er own eyes no remarkable symptoms of decay ; nd was not likely to learn much of popular dis- ontent among a people of whose interior life she nd every traveller sees so little.

Mrs. Trollope tells a wonderful adventure, which s said to have occurred lately in Venice, but hich, with a slight and amusing modification, orms the opening incident of a modern romance; nd is, besides, an old story floating over many ocalities.

In the three weeks of her sojourn in Venice, Irs. Trollope made good use of her time in exa- ining its native treasures, the works of Titian nd Tintoretto, and the many striking objects hich this once grandest emporium of the civilized orld still boasts, besides those lesser matters of ococo research in which she delights. Her cri- icism, often beautiful, is also felt to be in general ust, from the same indescribable feeling, or prin- iple, which enables one to pronounce on the fide- ity of resemblance in a portrait who has never een the original.

At Verona, Mrs. Trollope did homage at the omb of Juliet. It is now the fashion for the adies of the town to wear a model of the sarco- hagus as a trinket ; and the Archduchess of Par- ma, the ci-devant Empress Maria Louisa, is said o have had a necklace formed of its red stone. Yes! imagination rules the world, Princesses and ll.

After passing through Modena, without being t all molested, much less clapped under arrest, a ate which the gentlemen of the party had endea- oured to eschew by being most punctiliously shaved, he travellers pushed forward for Rome. In order o see some remarkable scenery, not often visited, hey diverged from the usual route, which they ad bitter cause to rue, so far as personal comfort vas concerned ; though they saw phases of social ife for which Lombardy and Tuscany had not repared them. The roads they had expected to e bad on this little frequented route, but the inns were much worse than the roads. After her worst American discomforts and trials, the Traveller ex- laims :—

Never before have I been so literally called upon to enter into the venerable presence of Hunger, Thirst, nd Cold," as during this memorable expedition. To ake this statement accurately correct, however, the ord "Dirt" must be substituted for "Cold." .... Although we have occasionally been met by a cutting nd a biting wind, that accorded not well with the rich oliage, which has still for the most part more the aspect f August than of November..... But the dirt and melancholy neglect of themselves, which we have found among the people at the miserable little inns, where we have been obliged to pass several nights, is beyond anything you can imagine, and has offered us a sadder picture of human misery, ignorance, and destitution than I have ever witnessed .... except, perhaps, among the manufacturing population of Manchester and its neighbourhood..... The wretched ignorance and poverty of the Ecclesiastical States presses most painfully upon the observation at every step you go, by every object you see, and from every question you ask..... "It is not that we are idle," said a man with whom my son entered into conversation. "We are not idle..... We would dig the very rocks to get bread, if we were not so sorely burdened. "Si gravita," was his phrase .... and he added, that those who would live well must live either in Tuscany or Lombardy. "A man may do well in either."

The consequence of this sort of hopeless despair is a supine abandonment of all the little contrivances which we so frequently see giving decency, and even comfort, to poverty..... Rags, filth, and very deficient nourishment, all seem endured with a degree of sullen calmness, that must be either the prelude to a storm, or one stage of a process, by which the inhabitants of this unhappy portion of the finest country in the world is to sink into a moral condition in no way superior to that of Hottentots.

There is something inexpressibly painful in travelling through a country where the contrast is so fearfully strong, between the munificent operations of nature and the pitiful management of man .... and this too in a land that owns the same language as that spoken in the prosperous fields of Tuscany and Lombardy.... In many cases the commonest resources of human industry appeared to be absolutely unknown.... We were repeatedly told, when asking for milk, "that no cows were kept in that neighbourhood." .... "That there was nothing for them to eat." .... And that in a climate where the very air seems to generate vegetation! .... But all this is too painful to dwell on.

Mrs. Trollope should, next season, visit Protestant-governed Ireland before she so utterly condemn the Papal government ; and see the condition of the people ; though there are cows, and though the cows at all events have something to eat. If they had not, there could be no rents sent to the elegant and luxurious Absentees, whom she must have seen at Florence, Rome, Naples—everywhere, save where they should be. After she had seen all that is finest in scenery in Italy, and admired to excess, she comes to the somewhat mortifying conclusion, that Germany, as a whole, is, after all, more picturesque. Terni is charming, but the rocks and river at Inspruck are more charming still.

A merely flying visit was made to Rome, and the travellers pushed on for Naples. The lovely scenery and fair shows of that city have been a thousand times well described, and are so once more by our Tourist ; though we are more struck at this stage by her philosophy than her descriptive powers :—

The journey from Rome to Naples presents perhaps as lamentable a picture of civilized life as can well be imagined. I think I may venture to say, that no single trace of happy, prosperous, well-paid industry, meets the eye from one end of it to the other. Rags, filth, ignorance, and superstition, are the prominent features that meet the observation of a traveller. In the villages, milk was a luxury unknown.... Of schools I could hear nothing, excepting those scattered thickly enough throughout the papal states, for the education of young priests.... And in the cultivation of the fields, there was such evident neglect of all the ordinary modes of turning land to profit, that Tuscany, Lucca, and Lombardy rose upon the memory like so many samples of the sort of Paradise, into which the earth might be converted, where sunshine and human industry unite to make it fruitful. It is hardly possible, I think, to see a greater difference between the external symptoms of character, and the general manière d' être, than may be observed between the peasants of Tuscany, and those of Naples, and the Roman States. The Tuscan peasant has evidently a feeling of honest pride in himself, in his decent garments, in the produce of his labour, and in the roof that his thrift renders comfortable. But of this there is not a trace left on your journey southward. There is a look of self-abandonment even in the very children, that is terrible.... I am certainly not one of those who are inclined to quarrel with the exercise of human authority, being quite aware that, without it, all societies of men must fall into a state of anarchy, which would speedily bring about the sort of catastrophe which befel the celebrated Kilkenny cats.... Nevertheless I was disgusted as much as the strongest theoretical democrat could be, when I saw the style in which a sentinel at the gate of Capua treated a peasant who was bringing a cart-load of vegetables into the town..... It chanced that our carriage in passing one of the gates, had to wait for a moment, while the above-mentioned cart of vegetables passed on; and on perceiving this, the sentinel caught the driver by the collar, and beat him across the shoulders with the flat of his sword, till he was evidently too tired to proceed,.... the perfectly unoffending peasant submitting to the discipline without daring to withdraw himself from it, for an inch, and with an expression of countenance, at once so abject and so mournful, that it will require many fine sights to put it out of my head, ... and some little sophistry, perhaps, into the bargain, to convince me that any happy being, born on British ground, does right in coming where he is to be so protected in return for the gold which he scatters as he goes along.

In visiting the Sibyl's Cave, the strange question is asked, "Might not this lady [the Cumæan Sibyl styled a lady!] have been one of the persons subject to that derangement of the nerves called Mesmerism?" and Mrs. Trollope, in what follows, almost admits herself to be a believer:—

While at Florence, during the scientific congress, I had recounted to me, by one of the most distinguished individuals present there, a series of wonders on this subject.... all occurring within the last thirty or forty years, and all in the southern part of Italy, which might render such a solution of her mysterious powers perfectly satisfactory to all but unbelievers. I do not mention the name of this gentleman, because he has himself never published any profession of faith on the subject;.... but I found not that his words had less authority on this contested theme than on any other .... and no man, I think, ever spoke with more.

Mrs. Trollope becomes a greater enthusiast about the relics and memorials of the Ancient world in Naples, Rome, and their classic neighbourhoods, than for the masterpieces of the Arts of the Middle Ages, which she had previously examined. We cannot, however, follow her to Baiæ and Pompeii in the rapturous vein; but taking her sage balance of enjoyment, find much to console us for these Ancients having so far surpassed us in their Temples, Theatres, Baths, and Statues. Of Pompeii it is said:—

The very smallest of their dwellings shows much more preparation for public receiving, and display, than for home comforts; and as for the quiet, I might almost call it the sacred retreat, that all classes possessing the decencies of life enjoy in modern days, namely, the portion of a dwelling called a bed-room, it evidently came not into their calculation of necessities. In place of these we see cells,—decorated, indeed, but still cells,—having no ventilation, or light either, save by means of the door, and greatly more resembling the state-rooms of a packet boat than anything else. How many negatives does this singular circumstance carry with it!... How many hours of solitary refinement, impossible to find elsewhere, do women pass in their boudoir or their bed-rooms! The young especially, before they have become mistress of a mansion, in which they may have power to select any other retreat that they may call their "own" par excellence, how could they enjoy the solitary reading that makes so immensely important a part of female education!.... I could not help picturing to myself a family of daughters, packed round the court allotted for the purpose, and peeping out of their cubicule at each other. We should make a miserably bad exchange, methinks, were we to give up "my lady's chamber" for a few fine temples and a majestic forum. .... But pretty must it have been, exceedingly, when the social hour arrived, and the guests, assembled in the cool triclinium, enjoyed, even in the narrow streets of a close-packed city, all the freshness of flowers and of fountains, the grace of statues, and the gay brilliance of fresco decorations.

I wonder where the ladies were during the lazy, lounging, epicurean suppers! Oh!.... if the king of Naples would but have the exceeding kindness to order a scavo of half a mile square, and let the English pay for it and manage it, I feel confident that in the course of about six months after the permission was given we should have, first, a very perfect, uninjurious, and skilful clearing away of all that covers and encumbers the treasures we want to get at.... next, that we should see every individual article, both great and small, carefully deposited (the rubbish surrounding it being removed) exactly in the spot and the position in which the lava first, and then the English workmen, found it .... and lastly, we should see, rising above exactly the richest spot of our purchased half-mile, a large and lofty edifice in wood and stone, with as many windows in the roof and walls as a grape-house (only that there should be no favour shown to the sunny side), into which we could enter as freely and see as perfectly, as we do now in the open street of Pompeii. Just imagine the delight of this!.... Statues in their places.... tables, sofas, stools, as the lava found them.... traces of female usefulness in one place, and masculine enjoyment in another..... Oh! fancy it all, and say if half an hour spent within our house of glass and wood would not bring us more graphically acquainted with the good folks of Pompeii, than all the museums in the world could make us.

Our dinner was sublime. Temples and columns on every side of us.... and all that the courteous caterer of the Victoria Hôtel thought best for us dine sur l'herbe in the foreground.

We must beware the Vatican, the Coliseum, St. Peters, and the whole catalogue of pictures and statues of Rome, that we may find space for one or two tableaux vivans. Before getting at his Holiness, we may see the Cardinals:—

As to the evening parties among the noble Romans, I must confess that I think all enjoyment from them is very greatly destroyed by the sort of state with which it is the custom to receive the cardinals. The venerable college make much too considerable a part of the Roman aristocracy, for this sort of stiff ceremony to be without a pretty strong degree of paralyzing effect upon the Romans themselves, but to Protestant strangers it is generally more so. It appears to me, that the whole arrangement of the company is affected by their presence, which, nevertheless, is absolutely necessary for a salon comme il faut. The ladies seat themselves at the upper end of the saloon, while the gentlemen, red and violet stockings included, circulate in the lower part of it, conversing among themselves, often playing cards, but for the most part taking apparently very little heed of the fair personages permitted to be in their presence. Meanwhile the ladies converse in whispers, and certainly with as little appearance of animation or enjoyment as it is possible to imagine. The moment a cardinal approaches them they rise up, as if it were a sovereign: the only difference being, that whereas a sovereign de-ires the ladies he addresses to reseat themselves, the ardinals very rarely do any such thing.... and the ffect of this upon the circle may easily be imagined. Vhen this sort of old-fashioned, awkward, rococo etiuette is moreover considered a symptom of piety, and here any relaxtion of it in a stranger would be held to e an offensive acknowledgment of heresy, the matter ecomes serious.... rendering a Roman conversazione ery far from being amusing.

If the Cardinals are thus haughty to all ladies, would appear that neither do the free-and-easy nglish concern themselves at all about the Cardials. Some of the anecdotes which Mrs. Trollope elates of her countrymen are absolutely disgraceul; the insolence, if possible, surpassing the igorance. To be sure, she attributes all this to ie shop-keeping or vulgar, moneyed class, in which, owever, if police-reports be true, we rarely find he plunderers of door-knockers, the smashers of amps, and murderers of cats. One day Mrs. rollope was present at High Mass at the Sistine hapel, where the Pope was to be seen, and where he tried to admire the frescoes; she says:—

I cannot say that I was greatly edified by the pecuar ceremonies of this Papal worship, (I speak as a eretic,) but I could not admire or approve the disproortion which seemed to exist between the time bestowed n prayer, and that devoted to the homage offered by ach cardinal to the Pope. But though I did not feel ie service to be very religiously impressive, I was exeedingly disgusted, and not a little ashamed, at the onduct of a party of English young ladies, who sat imediately before me. Their chatter was incessant, and ieir laughter nearly equally so. When the cardinals, ho pass into the chapel close by the ladies' tribune, egan to arrive, my fair countrywomen at first proaimed aloud that each one that entered was the Pope ...and "Look at him! Look at him!" ran through ie disorderly line..... Then one among them having rightly discovered that, as they could not be all Popes, ie real Pope could not be come yet, they amused themelves by instituting a scrutiny on the physical peculiariies of the whole college. One keen-looking little body xclaimed aloud, as one of the purple host passed by, Oh! what a sharp little bird of a man!" a phrase so ptly descriptive of the individual of whom she spoke, iat, with all my indignation, I could scarcely help ughing, for never did man look more like a gay-pluaged bird than the beak-nosed little cardinal in quesion.... but the commentary went on, without even ptness to recommend it, till the cardinals being all at est in their places, the lively ladies were driven to bservations on the Swiss guard for amusement.... nd, "is not that one handsome?" ....and, "does'nt iat one's hat become him?" followed,.... till I felt very heartily ashamed, that I had the greatest posble inclination to get up, and run away. The general haracter of English travellers certainly does not stand igh on the Continent, but no where has it ever appeared me so bad as at Rome. . . . . There one complaint specially made against us at Rome, hich reached me from so many, and such trustworthy ources, that I have but little hope that it is even exaggeated.... I allude to the indecorums repeatedly committed by the English here during the solemnities of Easter. is well known that the travelling gold of England is resource of very considerable importance to the citins of Rome, and a patriotic wish on the part of the uthorities to encourage by all means the arrival of such pulent strangers has induced them to grant the most urteous facilities for their entrance and accommodaon at all the high solemnities of the Church. A frightul variety of anecdotes has reached me, relative to the anner in which these facilities have been abused. uring the Easter week, of, I think, the last year, a ene of this kind occurred at St. Peter's, which sounds ite as offensive to Protestant as to Popish ears, and which must have arisen among persons incapable of feeling religious reverence in any country, though it is probable they never had an equally conspicuous manner of displaying it in their own. There is a moment during the performance of every Papal Mass, when the host is elevated by the Pope himself ....a few notes from a trumpet announce this moment, as the tinkling of a bell does on more ordinary occasions, and the assembled multitude fall on the pavement..... Princes and people, the plumy crest of the soldier, and the monk's cowl, all are bent low together, and some seconds of solemn silence follow.... Exactly at this moment was it, that the rapt worshippers of a faith having the same holy origin as our own were startled by the popping of champagne corks, in one of the tribunes prepared for the English! Authority did not interfere.... at that moment there was no authority at leisure to notice it.... all were alike engaged in prostration before the present God.... But the impression left upon the minds of the Roman people was a very deep one. I have been told that the Propaganda, as the reverend court of Cardinals and Bishops is called, discussed the propriety of issuing an edict forbidding the admission of English heretics from all church ceremonies for the future, but that it was negatived by the majority, from the consciousness that such a measure would very seriously affect the pecuniary interest of a large portion of the citizens.... The whole of this history was extremely painful to me, and the more so, from the temperate and Christian-like manner in which I heard it related.

One cannot imagine a grosser or more wanton outrage than this; yet it is far more likely that the champagne drinkers were of "the educated and well-bred" gentlemanly class than otherwise. They ought to have been exposed and punished. By the intervention of the Hanoverian minister, Mrs. Trollope, with a large party of English, was presented to the Pope. The Bishop of Rome, in these degenerate times, seems a much poorer, and much humbler man than the Bishop of London. A Cardinal, when paid at all, gets from the State about eleven hundred pounds per annum; but few of them, at present, receive anything; and their state is of late years sadly curtailed. Nothing can be more simple than the style of living of the present Pope, his personal expenses being confined to adding to the library of the Vatican. Mrs. Trollope relates:—

I was told, that when the wish to be presented, expressed by the party of English of which myself and my son made part, was mentioned to His Holiness, he said, "Why should they wish it?.... Would they look at me as at a curious animal in a menagerie?".... "They wish to wait upon your Holiness as the Sovereign of the country they are visiting,".... was the reply..... "I am more a monk,".... returned the venerable pontiff,.... "nevertheless, I am willing to receive them." . . . . . The room in which we were received was a small apartment near the library, and nothing could be less magnificent than this little reception-room, though in the middle of the richest palace in the world. His Holiness wore a white dress, which I believe is that of the monastic order to which he belonged, and also the small white cap with which all portraits, Raphael and Lawrence inclusive, have made us familiar. His countenance is amiable, and expressive of much gentleness, and his stature rather below the common size. We found him standing in front of a small table, which was placed before a canopy, under which I imagine he would have sat, had not his politeness to the ladies he expected prevented it..... The party therefore naturally formed themselves into a semicircle round him; and his first words on seeing how extensive that circle was, were, "La stanze è troppo piccolo!".... He looked at us all with much good-humour and kindness; but as he did not walk round the circle, and as the persons forming the circle were not instructed to pass before him, he rather harangued than conversed with us. But considering the awkwardness of this arrangement, he managed it exceedingly well. He inquired our names from the Hanoverian minister, in the order in which we stood, and very politely expressed regret that he could not address us in our own language. The appearance of the circle was singular enough, from the ladies being all dressed in black, and wearing black veils, (which is de rigueur,) while the gentlemen were as gaily habited as possible; all being in full dress, chiefly military, and one in the full Highland costume. This last especially attracted the attention of his Holiness, so much so, that the graceful young chieftain was compelled, in some sort, to make a step forward, that his Holiness might have an opportunity of seeing more distinctly the jewelled powder-horn, which appeared particularly to have arrested his attention, but which he mistook for a mull, which he said he had formerly seen a Scotchman carry, offering the contents to all his friends,....a very natural mistake, snuff being, very properly, a more familiar idea to his Holiness than gunpowder.

He then asked the minister if there were not a literary lady in the company, which being answered in the affirmative, and the individual indicated, his Holiness inquired what species of compositions had been produced, and then remarked that there were many books written in English, but that he had not read them.....He then, à-propos of the great advantage of a general acquaintance with modern languages, spoke to us of the extraordinary acquirements in that line of the Cardinal Mezzofante, and related an anecdote respecting him, in which this remarkable faculty had enabled his Holiness to detect a renegado Christian, who attempted to pass himself as a Turk, desirous of professing the Catholic faith....the "Roman Catholic faith," added his Holiness significantly, correcting himself.....He told this little story with a good deal of spirit, and altogether got through the audience, which for many reasons must have been rather an embarrassing one, with a great deal of good-humoured ease. We remained thus standing before him for about twenty minutes, or half an hour, and then he bowed us off.

Mrs. Trollope was naturally curious to see one of the Cardinals, whose well-known history is of itself a romance. But Cardinal Géramb was not at Rome during her stay. She remembered him as the dashing Baron Géramb of London and Paris, and as a Monk of La Trappe. She relates of him :—

But although I had not the good fortune to see the Père Géramb, I heard several anecdotes of him, but all of a gay and cheerful character, and such as to lead one equally to wonder at his ever taking a vow of silence, and to rejoice at the expediency (which has been of course dictated by the interests of the Church) for relaxing, in his case, the severity of this vow.

A Roman Catholic bishop told me, that when standing next to him one day in the Pope's anti-chamber, waiting for admittance, the illustrious Trappist said to him,

"Do you know, Monsignore, why my beard (which he wore very long) is so much whiter than my hair?"

"No" was, of course, the reply.

"Then I will tell you," said Géramb. "It is because I work more with my jaws than with my head."

Upon another occasion, when walking in a procession which rendered it necessary that he should carry a candle, some one observed to him that the one he bore was longer than all the rest....."That," replied the stout cardinal, "is in order that the candle may match the candlestick."

Cardinal Géramb has certainly not added dignity to the conclave. No one suspects him of insincerity, or of acting a part; but the suspicion that he has a bee in his bonnet is inevitable.

Among the endless tombs in St. Peter's is a monument to the last of the Stuarts, the work of Canova. Mrs. Trollope considers it a pitiful thing for so majestic a temple, and is glad that it is thrust out of sight. It was, however, according to her informant, who attended Sir Walter Scott through Rome, the only work of Art in the imperial city that appeared greatly to interest him. "He sat down before it long, and appeared to feel acutely. The feeling inspired by that name seemed to have outlived most others."

On a very important question Mrs Trollope delivers an opinion which is entitled to respect, both from her judgment and actual observation and experience :—

I have strong doubts, as, perhaps, I may have told you before, whether several consecutive years passed abroad, even under the tuition of the very best of masters, is, on the whole, advantageous to young women, whom their friends wish should remain English, and whose hopes are to become English wives and English mothers; but I have no doubt at all as to the decided intellectual advantages to be obtained by bringing either young men or young women of inquiring minds to pass a few months at Rome. I should not quite choose to say that no education could be accounted good without it, but I certainly do think that nothing else, of any sort or kind, can quite supply its place. Remember, however, if you please, that I am not of those who consider Rome the seat of miracles, par excellence, and, therefore, that I do not mean to tell you that young ladies and gentlemen who come to Rome very stupid go away the reverse. On the contrary, I think that it is not a very slight degree of intelligence which is requisite, in order to draw from such a visit the benefit which I think it capable, under favourable circumstances, of producing. But where the material does exist, I think it cannot fail of doing much towards increasing its value.

In one respect, and that keeping in view the structure and leading objects of the work, the main one, we are sensible that we have done our author scanty justice. It is on its character as a guide, and as an intelligent and liberal critic of those works of Art, ancient and modern, which enrich Italy, and render it the wonder and envy of civilized nations, that her VISIT must rest its permanent claim to attention. And these are but slightly noticed in this hasty analysis.——Before parting, we must notice one of the most gratifying facts which her work contains. Mrs. Trollope repeatedly asserts that the literature of the modern Italians is not to be assumed as the measure of their intellectual condition; that, in short, though they neither read nor write books, they, like Cowper,

Pay it off with thinking.

She repeatedly fortells revolution, much as she detests all popular movements; but of the how or when, is no more informed than her tramontane neighbours. As to the wherefore, no one doubts.

DICKENS' NOTES ON AMERICA, FOR GENERAL CIRCULATION.*

EITHER too much has been expected from "Boz among the Yankees," or the recent works of a host of intelligent and accomplished travellers in the United States are still too freshly remembered to allow justice to be done an after gleaner in the same vast field, however able, especially if he has added little or nothing to the previous amount of actual information. But Mr. Dickens has not only thrown few new lights upon the social state of the people of the United States: he has deepened every shade into palpable blackness; and described society, in all its greater interests, as in a very low and dangerous condition. Slavery is but one of the evils of America; which is represented as helplessly enslaved by the most atrocious press that ever the world heard of, legislated for by the most corrupt of its citizens, distracted by the most rancorous and paltry party spirit, and tainted to the core with dishonesties of every sort. Opinions of the same character have been more openly expressed by former writers, but never so strongly, nor without pointing more directly to the advantages which counterbalance the evils arising, in a new country, from Republican Institutions.

Apart from the weight which may be attached to the judgment and individual opinions of Mr. Dickens, upon these and upon other matters already familiar to the world, the "Notes," as such, are meagre and unsatisfactory. They tell nothing new of America, nor do they take any enlarged or profound view of what is already known; but they are interspersed with many bits of clever composition in their author's peculiar style; which, though they might have been quite as relevant anywhere else, it is pleasant to stumble upon—that is, if people are not very much in earnest to hear about America. Mr. Dickens deprecates the idea of intentionally offending the Americans by his censures; and thin-skinned as the nation is, we fancy he may be quit for his fears; while he may be very certain of having pleased a large party at home. Miss Martineau, with almost rash frankness, stated many unpalatable truths, which, as a true friend and disinterested monitor she was bound to tell; but her censures, though they may have offended the Americans more, will gratify the English Tories infinitely less than the statements or opinions of Mr. Dickens. He states that his only object at the outset was to carry his readers faithfully along with him wherever he went, and that this task he has "discharged;"—so far, it may be added, as they were likely to be amused on the journey. When we have mentioned, that another guiding principle in the construction of his work, "was to mention the name of no individual," we leave the manner in which the task is fulfilled to the judgment of the reader. For illustrations of American character, save a few outré specimens, we must, we presume, wait the appearance of a new fiction by the author of Nickleby, the scene of which shall be the United States; and, meanwhile, take the "Notes" as we find them embodied in two not over-substantial volumes. Boz breaks forth at the very commencement. The winter voyage out, which occupies a large space of the first volume, is a piece of clever and entertaining writing, made up of those small circumstances, and nice and minute strokes, which give individuality and a certain charm to the compositions of Dickens. He makes the most possible of "a very yellow leg of boiled mutton, contrasted with very green capers;" and of the grotesque incidents of incipient sea-sickness, and the actual capsizing of goods and gear, body and estate, to which all voyagers are liable. Often, too, his descriptions are picturesque, or suddenly illuminated by a transient image of rare beauty, which sparkles the brighter for the contrast of its grotesque setting. The passage out was tedious and rough, and the most is made of it before Halifax was made by the steam-packet, which, after it had been eighteen days out, reached Boston. There Mr. Dickens' first error was mistaking certain persons, who at the peril of their lives rushed on board, for newsmen; while, in fact, they were, one and all, editors in the exercise of their vocation; but saving their gentility by "liking the excitement of the thing."

A well-merited tribute is paid to the civility of the Custom-house officers; who presented an edifying contrast to those of home as well as of France. It is characteristic of the Bostonians, that, arriving on Saturday night, so providently were the spiritual wants of Mr. and Mrs. Dickens attended to, that they received as many offers of seats, in churches of different denominations, as might have accommodated a score or two of grown-up families. They pleaded want of clothes.

Eyes long accustomed to the flattened and dingy surfaces of most things in London, were peculiarly sensible of the general brightness of colour and sharpness of outline prevailing in the towns of New England. Of Boston, fortunately, though warmly appreciated, not much is said. It is not easy, it is understood, to please that intellectual, and somewhat self-sufficient and supercilious city, the refinement and superiority of which is attributed by Mr. Dickens to the influence of the neighbouring University of Cambridge. However this may be, we cordially enjoy this gentle rap on the knuckles to older and prouder Universities:—

> Whatever the defects of American universities may be, they disseminate no prejudices; rear no bigots; dig up the buried ashes of no old superstitions; never interpose between the people and their improvement; exclude no man because of his religious opinions; above all, in their whole course of study and instruction, recognise a world, and a broad one too, lying beyond the college walls.

The institutions and public charities of Boston are described with considerable fulness; and if Mr. Dickens be aware of the very minute account which has lately been given by another traveller of the blind, deaf, and dumb girl, Laura Bridgman,

* "American Notes for General Circulation." By Charles Dickens. 2 vols. London: Chapman & Hall.

in nearly the same words—those of her instructor—he would have spared his readers much of a long story, which, though ever touching, is no longer novel. The State Hospital for the Insane, the Refuge for the Destitute, and other establishments of the same kind, are described; and appear worthy of the commendation bestowed on them; and then the city itself, in which Mr. Dickens received, as it were, his Transatlantic diploma, is thus dismissed :—

The tone of society in Boston is one of perfect politeness, courtesy, and good breeding. The ladies are unquestionably very beautiful—in face: but there I am compelled to stop. Their education is much as with us; neither better nor worse. I had heard some very marvellous stories in this respect; but not believing them, was not disappointed. Blue ladies there are, in Boston; but like philosophers of that colour and sex in most other latitudes, they rather desire to be thought superior than to be so. Evangelical ladies there are, likewise, whose attachment to the forms of religion, and horror of theatrical entertainments, are most exemplary. Ladies who have a passion for attending lectures are to be found among all classes and all conditions. In the kind of provincial life which prevails in cities such as this, the Pulpit has great influence. The peculiar province of the Pulpit in New England (always excepting the Unitarian ministry) would appear to be the denouncement of all innocent and rational amusements. The church, the chapel, and the lecture-room, are the only means of excitement excepted; and to the church, the chapel, and the lecture-room, the ladies resort in crowds.

Wherever religion is resorted to, as a strong drink, and as an escape from the dull monotonous round of home, those of its ministers who pepper the highest will be the surest to please. They who strew the Eternal Path with the greatest amount of brimstone, and who most ruthlessly tread down the flowers and leaves that grow by the way-side, will be voted the most righteous; and they who enlarge with the greatest pertinacity on the difficulty of getting into heaven, will be considered by all true believers certain of going there: though it would be hard to say by what process of reasoning this conclusion is arrived at. It is so at home, and it is so abroad. With regard to the other means of excitement, the Lecture, it has at least the merit of being always new. One lecture treads so quickly on the heels of another, that none are remembered; and the course of this month may be safely repeated next, with its charm of novelty unbroken, and its interest unabated. . . .

The usual dinner-hour is two o'clock. A dinner party takes place at five; and at an evening party, they seldom sup later than eleven; so that it goes hard but one gets home, even from a rout, by midnight. I never could find out any difference between a party at Boston and a party in London, saving that, at the former place, all assemblies are held at more rational hours; that the conversation may possibly be a little louder and more cheerful; that a guest is usually expected to ascend to the very top of the house to take his cloak off; that he is certain to see, at every dinner, an unusual amount of poultry on the table; and at every supper, at least two mighty bowls of hot stewed oysters, in any one of which a half-grown Duke of Clarence might be smothered easily. . . . . There is no smoking-room in any hôtel, and there was none consequently in ours; but the bar is a large room with a stone floor, and there people stand and smoke, and lounge about, all the evening: dropping in and out as the humour takes them. There too the stranger is initiated into the mysteries of Gin-sling, Cocktail, Sangaree, Mint Julep, Sherry-cobbler, Timber Doodle, and other rare drinks. The House is full of boarders, both married and single, many of whom sleep upon the premises, and contract by the week for their board and lodging: the charge for which diminishes as they go nearer the sky to roost. A public table is laid in a very handsome hall for breakfast, and for dinner, and for supper. The party sitting down together to these meals will vary in number from one to two hundred: sometimes more. The advent of each of these epochs in the day is proclaimed by an awful gong. . . .

The fruits of the earth have their growth in corruption. Out of the rottenness of these things, there has sprung up in Boston a sect of philosophers known as Transcendentalists. On inquiring what this appellation might be supposed to signify, I was given to understand, that whatever was unintelligible would be certainly transcendental. Not deriving much comfort from this elucidation, I pursued the inquiry still further, and found that the Transcendentalists are followers of my friend Mr. Carlyle, or, I should rather say, of a follower of his, Mr. Ralph Waldo Emerson. This gentleman has written a volume of Essays, in which, among much that is dreamy and fanciful (if he will pardon me for saying so,) there is much more that is true and manly, honest and bold. Transcendentalism has its occasional vagaries (what school has not?) but it has good healthful qualities in spite of them; not least among the number a hearty disgust of Cant, and an aptitude to detect her in all the million varieties of her everlasting wardrobe. And therefore if I were a Bostonian, I think I would be a Transcendentalist.

Then it must be a Transcendentalist with a keen relish for all the creature-comforts and smaller elegancies and enjoyments of elaborately accommodated life. One may conceive the savage contempt with which Emerson would listen to gentle cockney murmurs about the want of bed-curtains, proper wash-hand stands, soft warm beds, and pleasant sips of hot brandy and water; together with theatrical entertainments, literary coteries, and London-made boots. For anything we see, Mr. Emerson, if he allows himself meat at all, will prefer his buffalo steak raw. We assure Mr. Dickens that he is the very antipodes of a Transcendentalist of that peculiar school. He appears to relish to the utmost "all the goods the gods provide us;" and to believe that this taste makes all of us the better men, and more charitable and loving Christians.

At Boston, Mr. Dickens, notwithstanding the numerous invitations to sermon which he received, heard only Taylor, the famous Sailor Preacher; for, to his regret, he missed hearing Dr. Channing. The description of the sailor preacher is clear and graphic. He appears to improvise his sermons: some one present having the privilege of choosing him a theme or text, which is laid on the desk before the commencement of the service. The theme on this occasion was from the Song of Solomon—"Who is this coming up from the wilderness leaning on her beloved?" which the preacher spiritualized in a quaint fashion enough, though one probably well adapted to his rough audience.

During his stay in Boston, Mr. Dickens made an excursion by the railway to Lowell, to witness, with his own eyes, the operation of the Factory system as it still exists in America. After Miss Martineau, Joseph Sturge, and Mr. Combe, and, on the other side, Marryat, we perceive nothing new or remarkable in his observations. Forty or fewer years since, the factories of Manchester or Glasgow were in as healthful a condition, as regards the working people, as Lowell is now. We have not yet sounded to the full depth of the mischief: though we apprehend one part of the mystery is unfolded, when we learn, that there is no stationary manufacturing population in Lowell, "no speak." The girls—who are often the well-brought-up and well-educated daughters of those small farmers of New England who are rich in everything necessary save money—come from the neighbouring States to Lowell; remain a few years in the mills, save money, and then return home. All the mill-owners, also, probably take that paternal care of their work-people, which in England is done only by a few, though with the happiest and most marked results. Would that the great manufacturers, and the great land-owners of Britain, could be shamed out of the disgrace of having a set of improvident, dirty, spiritless, and degraded peasants and operatives in their employment, or in any way connected with them! They have, if not everything, yet much in their power, if they set their hearts on improving the condition of the working class. It is well known that the Lowell factory girls publish an Annual which is entirely their own composition; and which, however the editors of the Book of Beauty and The Keepsake, &c., may take it, Mr. Dickens asserts "will compare advantageously with a great many English Annuals."

New York was his next station and point of observation; and into its bustling Broadway—with which we can now fancy ourselves as familiar as with any home great thoroughfare—Mr. Dickens is quietly looking down from a window of the Carlton House Hôtel.

Warm weather! The sun strikes upon our heads at this open window, as though its rays were concentrated through a burning-glass; but the day is in its zenith, and the season an unusual one. Was there ever such a sunny street as this Broadway! The pavement stones are polished with the tread of feet until they shine again; the red bricks of the houses might be yet in the dry, hot kilns; and the roofs of those omnibuses look as though, if water were poured on them, they would hiss and smoke, and smell like half-quenched fires. No stint of omnibuses here! Half-a-dozen have gone by within as many minutes. Plenty of hackney cabs and coaches too; gigs, phaetons, large-wheeled tilburies, and private carriages—rather of a clumsy make, and not very different from the public vehicles, but built for the heavy roads beyond the city pavement. Negro coachmen and white; in straw hats, black hats, white hats, glazed caps, fur caps; in coats of drab, black, brown, green, blue, nankeen, striped jean and linen: and there, in that one instance, (look while it passes, or it will be too late,) in suits of livery. Some Southern republican that, who puts his blacks in uniform, and swells with Sultan pomp and power. Yonder, where that phaeton with the well-clipped pair of grays has stopped—standing at their heads now, is a Yorkshire groom, who has not been very long in these parts, and looks sorrowfully round for a companion pair of top-boots, which he may traverse the city half-a-year without meeting. Heaven save the ladies, how they dress! We have seen more colours in these ten minutes, than we should have seen elsewhere, in as many days. What various parasols! what rainbow silks and satins! what pinking of thin stockings, and pinching of thin shoes, and fluttering of ribbons and silk tassels, and display of rich cloaks with gaudy hoods and linings! The young gentlemen are fond, you see, of turning down their shirt-collars and cultivating their whiskers, especially under the chin; but they cannot approach the ladies in their dress or bearing, being, to say the truth, humanity of quite another sort. Byrons of the desk and counter, pass on, and let us see what kind of men those are behind ye: those two labourers in holiday clothes, of whom one carries in his hand a crumpled scrap of paper from which he tries to spell out a hard name, while the other looks about for it on all the doors and windows.

Irishmen both! You might know them, if they were masked, by their long-tailed blue coats and bright buttons, and their drab trousers, which they wear like men well used to working dresses, who are easy in no others. It would be hard to keep your model republics going, without the countrymen and countrywomen of those two labourers. For who else would dig, and delve, and drudge, and do domestic work, and make canals and roads, and execute great lines of Internal Improvement! Irishmen both, and sorely puzzled too, to find out what they seek. Let us go down, and help them, for the love of home, and that spirit of liberty which admits of honest service to honest men, and honest work for honest bread, no matter what it be.

This narrow thoroughfare, baking and blistering in the sun, is Wall Street: the Stock Exchange and Lombard Street of New York. Many a rapid fortune has been made in this street, and many a no less rapid ruin. Some of these very merchants whom you see hanging about here now, have locked up Money in their strong-boxes, like the man in the Arabian Nights, and opening them again, have found but withered leaves.

Here follows a good deal more clever writing; but we are in quest of information as much as entertainment, so we pass a street swine, a scavenger of New York, and worthy of Gainsborough, and sundry other irrelevant matters, to accompany Mr. Dickens in a walk quite new to us in the American commercial capital; and one in part of which he required the attendance of a couple of policemen.

We have seen no beggars in the streets by night or day; but of other kinds of strollers plenty. Poverty, wretchedness, and vice, are rife enough where we are going now.

This is the place: these narrow ways, diverging to the right and left, and reeking everywhere with dirt and filth. Such lives as are led here, bear the same fruits here as elsewhere. The coarse and bloated faces at the doors, have counterparts at home, and all the wide world over. Debauchery has made the very houses prematurely old. See how the rotten beams are tumbling down, and how the patched and broken windows seem to scowl dimly, like eyes that have been hurt in drunken frays. Many of those pigs live here. Do they ever wonder why their masters walk upright in lieu of going on all-fours? and why they talk instead of grunting?

So far, nearly every house is a low tavern; and on the bar-room walls, are coloured prints of Washington, and Queen Victoria of England, and the American eagle. Among the pigeon-holes that hold the bottles, are pieces of plate-glass and coloured paper, for there is, in some sort, a taste for decoration, even here. And as seamen frequent these haunts, there are maritime pictures by the dozen: of partings between sailors and their lady-loves, portraits of William, of the ballad, and his Black-Eyed Susan; of Will Watch, the Bold Smuggler; of Paul Jones the Pirate, and the like: on which the painted eyes of Queen Victoria, and of Washington to boot, rest in as strange companionship, as on most of the scenes that are enacted in their wondering presence.

What place is this, to which the squalid street conducts us? A kind of square of leprous houses, some of which are attainable only by crazy wooden stairs without. What lies beyond this tottering flight of steps, that creak beneath our tread? a miserable room, lighted by one dim candle, and destitute of all comfort, save that which may be hidden in a wretched bed. Beside it, sits a man: his elbows on his knees: his forehead hidden in his hands. "What ails that man?" asks the foremost officer. "Fever," he sullenly replies, without looking up. Conceive the fancies of a fevered brain in such a place as this!

Ascend these pitch-dark stairs, heedful of a false footing on the trembling boards, and grope your way with me into this wolfish den, where neither ray of light nor breath of air appears to come. A negro lad, startled from his sleep by the officer's voice—he knows it well—but comforted by his assurance that he has not come on business, officiously bestirs himself to light a candle. The match flickers for a moment, and shows great mounds of dusky rags upon the ground; then dies away and leaves a denser darkness than before, if there can be degrees in such extremes. He stumbles down the stairs and presently comes back, shading a flaring taper with his hand. Then the mounds of rags are seen to be astir, and rise slowly up, and the floor is covered with heaps of negro women, waking from their sleep: their white teeth chattering, and their bright eyes glistening and winking on all sides with surprise and fear, like the countless repetition of one astonished African face in some strange mirror.

Mount up these other stairs with no less caution (there are traps and pitfalls here, for those who are not so well escorted as ourselves) into the housetop; where the bare beams and rafters meet over-head, and calm night looks down through the crevices in the roof. Open the door of one of these cramped hutches full of sleeping negroes. Pah! They have a charcoal fire within; there is a smell of singeing clothes, or flesh, so close they gather round the brazier; and vapours issue forth that blind and suffocate. From every corner, as you glance about you in these dark retreats, some figure crawls half-awakened, as if the judgment hour were near at hand, and every obscene grave were giving up its dead. Where dogs would howl to lie, women, and men, and boys slink off to sleep, forcing the dislodged rats to move away in quest of better lodgings.

Here too are lanes and alleys, paved with mud knee-deep: underground chambers, where they dance and game; the walls bedecked with rough designs of ships, and forts, and flags, and American Eagles out of number: ruined houses, open to the street, whence, through wide gaps in the walls, other ruins loom upon the eye, as though the world of vice and misery had nothing else to show: hideous tenements which take their name from robbery and murder: all that is loathsome, drooping, and decayed is here.

Our leader has his hand upon the latch of "Almack's," and calls to us from the bottom of the steps; for the assembly-room of the Five-Point fashionables is approached by a descent. Shall we go in? It is but a moment.

Heyday! the landlady of Almack's thrives! A buxom fat mulatto woman, with sparkling eyes, whose head is daintily ornamented with a handkerchief of many colours. Nor is the landlord much behind her in his finery, being attired in a smart blue jacket, like a ship's steward, with a thick gold ring upon his little finger, and round his neck a gleaming golden watch-guard. How glad he is to see us! What will we please to call for? A dance! It shall be done directly, sir: "a regular break-down."

The corpulent black fiddler, and his friend who plays the tambourine, stamp upon the boarding of the small raised orchestra in which they sit, and play a lively measure. Five or six couple come upon the floor, marshalled by a lively young negro, who is the wit of the assembly, and the greatest dancer known. He never leaves off making queer faces, and is the delight of all the rest, who grin from ear to ear incessantly. Among the dancers are two young mulatto girls, with large, black, drooping eyes, and head-gear after the fashion of the hostess, who are as shy, or feign to be, as though they never danced before, and so look down before the visiters, that their partners can see nothing but the long fringed lashes.

But the dance commences. Every gentleman sets as long as he likes to the opposite lady, and the opposite lady to him, and all are so long about it that the sport begins to languish, when suddenly the lively hero dashes into the rescue. Instantly the fiddler grins, and goes at it tooth and nail; there is new energy in the tambourine; new laughter in the dancers; new smiles in the landlady; new confidence in the landlord; new brightness in the very candles. Single shuffle, double shuffle, cut and cross-cut: snapping his fingers, rolling his eyes, turning in his knees, presenting the backs of his legs in front, spinning about on his toes and heels like nothing but the man's fingers on the tambourine; dancing with two left legs, two right legs, two wooden legs, two wire-legs, two spring legs—all sorts of legs and no legs—what is this to him? And in what walk of life, or dance of life, does man ever get such stimulating applause as thunders about him, when, having danced his partner off her feet, and himself too, he finishes by leaping gloriously on the bar-counter, and calling for something to drink, with the chuckle of a million of counterfeit Jim Crows, in one inimitable sound!

It requires a delicate touch to prevent this from becoming absolutely sickening to those dainty and delicate people to whom vice loses half its malignity in being purified from its grossness. There is a prison in New York named the Tombs; a squalid, ill-managed, dismal place, of which the city watch-house forms a part; and with it Mr. Dickens concluded his melancholy round. It was the appropriate Finish. In the same style, which he probably adopts from considering it more effective and artistic than the simple narrative, which sometimes as well suits topics so grave, he continues,—

What! do you thrust your common offenders against the police discipline of the town, into such holes as these? Do men and women, against whom no crime is proved, lie here all night in perfect darkness, surrounded by the noisome vapours which encircle that flagging lamp you light us with, and breathing this filthy and offensive stench! Why, such indecent and disgusting dungeons as these cells, would bring disgrace upon the most despotic empire in the world! Look at them, man—you, who see them every night, and keep the keys. Do you see what they are? Do you know how drains are made below the streets, and wherein these human sewers differ, except in being always stagnant?

Well, he don't know. He has had five-and-twenty young women locked up in this very cell at one time, and you'd hardly realise what handsome faces there were among 'em.

In God's name! shut the door upon the wretched creature who is in it now, and put its screen before a place, quite unsurpassed in all the vice, neglect, and devilry, of the worst old town in Europe.

Are people really left all night, untried, in these black sties?—Every night. The watch is set at seven in the evening. The magistrate opens his court at five in the morning. That is the earliest hour at which the first prisoner can be released; and if an officer appear against him, he is not taken out till nine o'clock or ten.—But if any one among them die in the interval, as one man did, not long ago? Then he is half-eaten by the rats in an hour's time; as that man was; and there an end.

Thus the night winds up—

What is this intolerable tolling of great bells, and crashing of wheels, and shouting in the distance! A fire. And what that deep red light in the opposite direction? Another fire. And what these charred and blackened walls we stand before? A dwelling where a fire has been. It was more than hinted, in an official report, not long ago, that some of these conflagrations were not wholly accidental, and that speculation and enterprise found a field of exertion, even in flames: but be this as it may, there was a fire last night, there are two to-night, and you may lay an even wager there will be at least one to-morrow. So, carrying that with us for our comfort, let us say, Good night, and climb up stairs to bed.

Well, all is not absolute perfection even in the United States of Republican America.——Executions in America, it is known, are not, as with us, converted into drunken holidays, affording spectacles to the million, which tend to brutalize the feelings and excite to fresh crime. Yet there is sufficient publicity in them to guard against abuse. The scene of the few executions which do take place, where death-punishment is so rare, is the prison-yard of the Tombs.

Into this narrow, grave-like place, men are brought ut to die. The wretched creature stands beneath the ibbet on the ground; the rope about his neck; and vhen the sign is given, a weight at its other end omes running done, and swings him up into the air—a orpse. The law requires that there be present at this ismal spectacle, the judge, the jury, and citizens to the mount of twenty-five. From the community it is hid- en. To the dissolute and bad, the thing remains a rightful mystery. Between the criminal and them, the rison-wall is interposed as a thick gloomy veil. It is he curtain to his bed of death, his winding-sheet, and rave. From him it shuts out life, and all the motives o unrepenting hardihood in that last hour, which its nere sight and presence is often all-sufficient to sustain. There are no bold eyes to make him bold; no ruffians o uphold a ruffian's name before.

After this, one would require something to revive he heart, and to sweeten the imagination. "Let s then," as our author invites us, "go out into the treets."

At other downward flights of steps, are other lamps, arking the whereabouts of oyster-cellars—pleasant treats, say I: not only by reason of their wonderful ookery of oysters, pretty nigh as large as cheese-plates, or for thy dear sake, heartiest of Greek Professors!) ut because of all kinds of eaters of fish, or flesh, or owl, in these latitudes, the swallowers of oysters alone re not gregarious; but subduing themselves, as it were, o the nature of what they work in, and copying the oyness of the thing they eat, do sit apart in curtained oxes, and consort by twos, not by two hundreds.

But how quiet the streets are! Are there no itinerant ands; no wind or stringed instruments! No, not one. y day, are there no Punches, Fantoccinis, Dancing- ogs, Jugglers, Conjurors, Orchestrinas, or even Barrel- rgans! No, not one. Yes, I remember one. One arrel-organ and a dancing-monkey—sportive by nature, ut fast fading into a dull, lumpish monkey, of the Utilitarian school. Beyond that, nothing lively; no, ot so much as a white mouse in a twirling cage.

Are there no amusements? Yes. There is a lecture- oom across the way, from which that glare of light roceeds, and there may be evening service for the adies thrice a-week, or oftener. For the young gentle- nen, there is the counting-house, the store, the bar- oom: the latter, as you may see through these win- ows, pretty full. Hark! to the clicking sound of ham- ers breaking lumps of ice, and to the cool gurgling of he pounded bits, as, in the process of mixing, they are oured from glass to glass! No amusements? What re these suckers of cigars and swallowers of strong rinks, whose hats and legs we see in every possible ariety of twist, doing, but amusing themselves? What re the fifty newspapers, which those precocious urchins re bawling down the street, and which are kept filed ithin, what are they but amusements? Not vapid aterish amusements, but good strong stuff; dealing in ound abuse and blackguard names; pulling off the oofs of private houses, as the Halting Devil did in pain; pimping and pandering for all degrees of vicious aste, and gorging with coined lies the most voracious aw; imputing to every man in public life the coarsest nd the vilest motives; scaring away from the stabbed nd prostrate body-politic, every Samaritan of clear onscience and good deeds; and setting on, with yell nd whistle, and the clapping of foul hands, the vilest ermin and worst birds of prey.—No amusements!

In the grave summing up of judgment upon the ocial, and, we should say, moral state of the Ame- ican citizens, at the close of his work, Mr. Dickens, n more direct and stronger terms, reiterates this trong opinion of the press; in this confirming the udgment of every British traveller who has spoken n the subject; and among that number are those f the most liberal sentiments, and the warmest riends of the true liberty of printing; Mr. Combe, and Miss Martineau, as well as Captain Marryat. Yet they do not seem to consider this instrument of evil so powerful or influential as our author does. On this subject, and in his graver mood, Mr. Dickens remarks—

Schools may be erected, East, West, North, and South; pupils be taught, and masters reared, by scores upon scores of thousands; colleges may thrive, churches may be crammed, temperance may be diffused, and advancing knowledge in all other forms walk through the land with giant strides; but while the newspaper press of America is in, or near, its present abject state, high moral improvement in that country is hopeless. Year by year, it must and will go back; year by year, the tone of public feeling must sink lower down; year by year, the Congress and the Senate must become of less account before all decent men; and year by year, the memory of the Great Fathers of the Revolution must be outraged more and more, in the bad life of their degenerate child.

A few exceptions are allowed to exist, the more honourable for their rareness; but such is alleged to be the general character of the newspaper press of America; and its despotic power, its vicious influence, must, if Mr. Dickens' challenge be well-founded, be on the increase.

When any man, of any grade of desert in intellect or character, can climb to any public distinction, no matter what, in America, without first grovelling down upon the earth, and bending the knee before this monster of depravity; when any private excellence is safe from its attacks, when any social confidence is left unbroken by it, or any tie of social decency and honour is held in the least regard; when any man in that Free Country has freedom of opinion, and presumes to think for himself, and speak for himself, without humble reference to a censorship which, for its rampant ignorance and base dishonesty, he utterly loathes and despises in his heart; when those who most acutely feel its infamy and the reproach it casts upon the nation, and who most denounce it to each other, dare to set their heels upon, and crush it openly, in the sight of all men; then, I will believe that its influence is lessening, and men are returning to their manly senses. But while that Press has its evil eye in every house, and its black hand in every appointment in the state, from a president to a postman; while, with ribald slander for its only stock in trade, it is the standard literature of an enormous class who must find their reading in a newspaper, or they will not read at all; so long must its odium be upon the country's head, and so long must the evil it works, be plainly visible in the Republic.

Could we believe this to the full extent implied, we should at once say that the Plague-spot has become visible upon the Republic; but we cannot, though we readily admit that there is much room for improvement in this respect—on both sides of the Atlantic.

In New York, as at Boston, no names are mentioned; and we never once accompany Mr. Dickens over any private threshold. The country about New York is declared to be beautiful; but all the world knows that; and we are fortunately not here overwhelmed by descriptions of scenery. The rest is quickly despatched, while Mr. Dickens is stepping into the railway carriage for Philadelphia.

The tone of the best society in this city, is like that of Boston; here and there, it may be, with a greater infusion of the mercantile spirit, but generally polished and refined, and always most hospitable. The houses and tables are elegant; the hours later and more rakish; and there is, perhaps, a greater spirit of contention in reference to appearances, and the display of wealth and costly living. The ladies are singularly beautiful.

Philadelphia is as rapidly handled.

My stay in Philadelphia was very short, but what I saw of its society, I greatly liked. Treating of its general characteristics, I should be disposed to say that it is more provincial than Boston or New York, and that there is, afloat in the fair city, an assumption of taste and criticism, savouring rather of those genteel discussions upon the same themes, in connexion with Shakspeare and the Musical Glasses, of which we read in the Vicar of Wakefield.

In Philadelphia the Penitentiary was visited; and Mr. Dickens, in even stronger terms than we remember to have been employed by former travellers, bears testimony to the evil tendencies, the merciless, the torturing nature of strictly Solitary Confinement, and points out its marked inequality as a punishment.

Washington was reached at the next move; and here, first, Mr. Dickens makes his attack upon the grand national custom. Washington he pronounces the capital of tobacco-tinctured saliva; and he becomes sick and almost angry with the odious twin-practices of chewing and spitting. As we have scarcely yet recovered from Mr. Buckingham, we could pardon the omission of denunciations, by which we hope the citizens whom it concerns will profit. This little hit may, however, be tolerated for its humour,—

I was surprised to observe that even steady old chewers of great experience, are not always good marksmen, which has rather inclined me to doubt that general proficiency with the rifle, of which we have heard so much in England. Several gentlemen called upon me who, in the course of conversation, frequently missed the spittoon at five paces; and one (but he was certainly short-sighted) mistook the closed sash for the open window at three. On another occasion, when I dined out, and was sitting with two ladies and some gentlemen round a fire before dinner, one of the company fell short of the fire-place, six distinct times. I am disposed to think, however, that this was occasioned by his not aiming at that object; as there was a white marble hearth before the fender, which was more convenient, and may have suited his purpose better.

An Indian chief, with whom Mr. Dickens for some days travelled in company in a steamer on the Ohio, and who had lately left Washington, told him that the Indians thought the Congress "wanted dignity." Mr. Dickens seems to think that this Assembly is deficient in many qualities of a more substantial and important kind.

The capital and its capitol have been so often described, that Mr. Dickens cannot make much new of them; but the living pillars of the State were open to his scrutiny.

I was sometimes asked, in my progress through other places, whether I had not been very much impressed by the heads of the lawmakers at Washington; meaning not their chiefs and leaders, but literally their individual and personal heads, whereon their hair grew, and whereby the phrenological character of each legislator was expressed: and I almost as often struck my questioner dumb with indignant consternation by answering "No, that I didn't remember being at all overcome." As I must, at whatever hazard, repeat the avowal here, I will follow it up by relating my impressions on this subject in as few words as possible.

In the first place—it may be from some imperfect developement of my organ of veneration—I do not remember having ever fainted away, or having even been moved to tears of joyful pride, at sight of any legislative body. I have borne the House of Commons like a man, and have yielded to no weakness, but slumber, in the House of Lords. . . . . Did I see in this public body, an assemblage of men, bound together in the sacred names of Liberty and Freedom, and so asserting the chaste dignity of those twin goddesses, in all their discussions, as to exalt at once the Eternal Principles to which their names are given, and their own character, and the character of their countrymen, in the admiring eyes of the whole world!

It was but a week, since an aged, grey-haired man, a lasting honour to the land that gave him birth, who has done good service to his country, as his forefathers did, and who will be remembered scores upon scores of years after the worms bred in its corruption, are but so many grains of dust—it was but a week, since this old man had stood for days upon his trial before this very body, charged with having dared to assert the infamy of that traffic, which has for its accursed merchandize men and women, and their unborn children. Yes. And publicly exhibited in the same city all the while; gilded, framed and glazed; hung up for general admiration; shown to strangers not with shame, but pride; its face not turned towards the wall, itself not taken down and burned; is the Unanimous Declaration of the Thirteen United States of America, which solemnly declares that All Men are created Equal; and are endowed by their Creator with the Inalienable Rights of Life, Liberty, and the Pursuit of Happiness!

It was not a month, since this same body had sat calmly by, and heard a man, one of themselves, with oaths which beggars in their drink reject, threaten to cut another's throat from ear to ear. There he sat, among them; not crushed by the general feeling of the assembly, but as good a man as any.

There was but a week to come, and another of that body, for doing his duty to those who sent him there; for claiming in a Republic the Liberty and Freedom of expressing their sentiments, and making known their prayer; would be tried, found guilty, and have strong censure passed upon him by the rest. His was a grave offence indeed; for years before, he had risen up and said, "A gang of male and female slaves for sale, warranted to breed like cattle, linked to each other by iron fetters, are passing now along the open street beneath the windows of your Temple of Equality! Look!" But there are many kinds of hunters engaged in the Pursuit of Happiness, and they go variously armed. It is the Inalienable Right of some among them, to take the field after their Happiness, equipped with cat and cartwhip, stocks, and iron collar, and to shout their view halloo: (always in praise of Liberty,) to the music of clanking chains and bloody stripes.

Where sat the many legislators of coarse threats; of words and blows such as coalheavers deal upon each other when they forget their breeding! On every side. Every session had its anecdotes of that kind, and the actors were all there.

Did I recognise in this assembly, a body of men, who applying themselves in a new world to correct some of the falsehoods and vices of the old, purified the avenues to Public Life, paved the dirty ways to Place and Power, debated and made laws for the Common Good, and had no party but their Country!

I saw in them, the wheels that move the meanest perversion of virtuous Political Machinery that the worst tools ever wrought. Despicable trickery at elections; under-handed tamperings with public officers; cowardly attacks upon opponents, with scurrilous newspapers for shields, and hired pens for daggers; shameful cringing to mercenary knaves, whose claim to be considered, is, that every day and week they sow new crops of ruin with their venal types, which are the dragon's teeth of vice, in everything but sharpness; aidings and abettings of every bad inclination in the popular mind, and artful suppressions of all its good influences: such things as these, and, in a word, Dishonest Faction in its most depraved and most unblushing form, stared out from every corner of the crowded hall.

Did I see among them, the intelligence and refinement: the true, honest, patriotic heart of America!

lere and there, were drops of its blood and life, but ney scarcely coloured the stream of desperate adven- rers which sets that way for profit and for pay. It is ne game of these men, and of their profligate organs,) make the strife of politics so fierce and brutal, and so estructive of all self-respect in worthy men, that sensi- ve and delicate-minded persons shall be kept aloof, nd they, and such as they, be left to battle out their elfish views, unchecked. And thus this lowest of all rambling fights goes on, and they who in other coun- ries would, from their intelligence and station, most spire to make the laws, do here recoil the farthest from hat degradation.

That there are, among the representatives of the eople in both Houses, and among all parties, some nen of high character and great abilities, I need not ay.

This is a tremendous passage. How the Tories f England will crow over it! The qualification; he few noble exceptions, admitted and rounded off vith a compliment to Mr. Everett, are a poor coun- erpoise against this fierce, coarse, and corrupt ody of legislators. With such a House of Re- resentatives, and such a public Press, indepen- ently of slavery, whither, we may ask, is the oung Republic to drift? What, and that speedily, s to be her fate? Let us hope that this is taking hings at the very worst, and something more; nd that Mr. Dickens is more powerful in fiction han profound in political philosophy. He ac- nowledges that the Congress has not yet imported he latest improvements of our own House of Com- nons, in its farm-yard imitations,—crowing and raying. Mr. Dickens was presented to the Pre- ident on the day after his arrival. The scene is haracteristic. The President's house, within and vithout, he says, resembles a club-house.

We entered a large hall, and having twice or thrice ung a bell which nobody answered, walked without arther ceremony through the rooms on the ground floor, s divers other gentlemen (mostly with their hats on, nd their hands in their pockets) were doing very isurely. Some of these had ladies with them, to whom hey were showing the premises; others were lounging n the chairs and sofas; others, in a perfect state of ex- austion from listlessness, were yawning drearily. The reater portion of this assemblage were rather asserting heir supremacy than doing anything else, as they had o particular business there, that anybody knew of. A w were closely eyeing the moveables, as if to make uite sure that the President (who was far from popu- r) had not made away with any of the furniture, or old the fixtures for his private benefit.

After glancing at these loungers; who were scattered ver a pretty drawing-room, opening upon a terrace hich commanded a beautiful prospect of the river and ne adjacent country; and who were sauntering too, bout a larger state-room called the Eastern Drawing- oom; we went up stairs into another chamber, where ere certain visiters, waiting for audiences. At sight f my conductor, a black in plain clothes and yellow ippers who was gliding noiselessly about, and whisper- ng messages in the ears of the more impatient, made a gn of recognition, and glided off to announce him. . . . . . There were some fifteen or twenty persons n the room. One, a tall, wiry, muscular old man, from ne west; sun-burnt and swarthy; with a brown-white at on his knees, and a giant umbrella resting between is legs; who sat bolt upright in his chair, frowning eadily at the carpet, and twitching the hard lines bout his mouth, as if he had made up his mind "to x" the President on what he had to say and wouldn't ate him a grain. Another, a Kentucky farmer, six- et-six in height, with his hat on, and his hands under is coat-tails, who leaned against the wall and kicked the floor with his heel, as though he had Time's head under his shoe, and were literally "killing" him. A third, an oval-faced, bilious-looking man, with sleek black hair cropped close, and whiskers and beard shaved down to blue dots, who sucked the head of a thick stick, and from time to time took it out of his mouth, to see how it was getting on. A fourth did nothing but whis- tle. A fifth did nothing but spit. And indeed all these gentlemen were so very persevering and energetic in this latter particular, and bestowed their favours so abundantly upon the carpet, that I take it for granted the Presidential housemaids have high wages, or, to speak more genteelly, an ample amount of "compensa- tion:" which is the American word for salary, in the case of all public servants.

We had not waited in this room many minutes, before the black messenger returned, and conducted us into another of smaller dimensions, where, at a business-like table covered with papers, sat the President himself. He looked somewhat worn and anxious, and well he might, being at war with everybody;—but the expres- sion of his face was mild and pleasant, and his manner was remarkably unaffected, gentlemanly, and agreeable. I thought that in his whole carriage and demeanour, he became his station singularly well.

The President's evening receptions are, probably from some good Irish reason, called levées. Mr. Dickens gives the same favourable report of the good order, ease, and propriety of these very mis- cellaneous assemblages that has been made by nearly all the European travellers who have wit- nessed them. He was delighted with the affection- ate, and, as we say, "distinguished," welcome given by the crowd to his dear friend, "Washing- ton Irving."

If Mr. Dickens gathered the laurels and tri- umphs of lionship—about all which glories he ob- serves a modest silence, probably thinking that fully enough has been said on that head already— he has also paid a few of the unavoidable penalties of that honourable condition; and not with nearly the good-humour of Marryat, though the Captain, comparatively with Boz, was received but as a mere cub, and by no means a full-fanged lion rampant. In travelling by the railroad in Mary- land, Mr. Dickens relates—

Being rather early, those men and boys who happened to have nothing particular to do, and were curious in foreigners, came (according to custom) round the car- riage in which I sat; let down all the windows; thrust in their heads and shoulders; hooked themselves on conveniently, by their elbows; and fell to comparing notes on the subject of my personal appearance, with as much indifference as if I were a stuffed figure. I never gained so much uncompromising information with re- ference to my own nose and eyes, the various impres- sions wrought by my mouth and chin on different minds, and how my head looks when it is viewed from behind, as on these occasions. Some gentlemen were only satis- fied by exercising their sense of touch; and the boys (who are surprisingly precocious in America) were sel- dom satisfied, even by that, but would return to the charge over and over again. Many a budding president has walked into my room with his cap on his head and his hands in his pockets, and stared at me for two whole hours: occasionally refreshing himself with a tweak at his nose, or a draught from the water-jug; or by walk- ing to the windows and inviting other boys in the street below, to come up and do likewise: crying, "Here he is!" "Come on!" "Bring all your brothers!" with other hospitable entreaties of that nature.

Again, on the Lakes, in a steamer making way to Buffalo, he was annoyed in the same style.

There was a gentleman on board, to whom, as I unintentionally learned through the thin partition which divided our state-room from the cabin in which he and his wife conversed together, I was unwittingly the occasion of very great uneasiness. I don't know why or wherefore, but I appeared to run in his mind perpetually, and to dissatisfy him very much. First of all I heard him say: and the most ludicrous part of the business was, that he said it in my very ear, and could not have communicated more directly with me, if he had leaned upon my shoulder, and whispered me: "Boz is on board still, my dear." After a considerable pause, he added complainingly, "Boz keeps himself very close:" which was true enough, for I was not very well, and was lying down, with a book. I thought he had done with me after this, but I was deceived; for a long interval having elapsed, during which I imagine him to have been turning restlessly from side to side, and trying to go to sleep; he broke out again, with "I suppose that Boz will be writing a book bye and bye, and putting all our names in it!" at which imaginary consequence of being on board a boat with Boz, he groaned and became silent.

At a new town, somewhere beyond St. Louis, named Belleville, Mr. Dickens met with a countryman of our own, in whose instance he forgets his resolution not to mention the names of individuals; and also violates his laudable custom of not prying into domestic privacy. The landlord of the inn here, and of course a colonel, introduced this Scottish specimen, who is a lecturer on Phrenology, and imputed curer of all manner of diseases; for we do not positively learn that he gives himself out for anything of the sort.

"Mr. Dickens," says the Colonel, "Doctor Crocus."

Upon which Doctor Crocus, who is a tall, fine-looking Scotchman, but rather fierce and warlike in appearance for a professor of the peaceful art of healing, bursts out of the concourse with his right arm extended, and his chest thrown out as far as it will possibly come, and says, "Your countryman, Sir!"

Whereupon Doctor Crocus and I shake hands; and Doctor Crocus looks as if I didn't by any means realize his expectations, which, in a linen blouse, and a great straw hat with a green ribbon, and no gloves, and my face and nose profusely ornamented with the stings of mosquitoes and the bites of bugs, it is very likely I did not.

Now, if authors set out as Bozes, and attempt the grand rôle of literary lions, they ought to go through it manfully, paying the penalties with as much good-humour as they show when reaping the honours of that distinguished part. We are sorry to find that the success of our countryman, Dr. Crocus, in those parts, does by no means correspond with his attainments and appearance. On the evening of the day of Mr. Dickens' visit to Belleville, where, instead of "plain doings," he luxuriated in "wheat-bread and chicken-fixings," the Doctor was to deliver a lecture on Phrenology.

Straying up stairs, during the preparation of the chicken-fixings, I happened to pass the Doctor's chamber; and as the door stood wide open, and the room was empty, I made bold to peep in.

It was a bare, unfurnished, comfortless room, with an unframed portrait hanging up at the head of the bed; a likeness, I take it, of the Doctor, for the forehead was fully displayed, and great stress was laid by the artist upon its phrenological developements. The bed itself was covered with an old patchwork counterpane. The room was destitute of carpet or of curtain. There was a damp fire-place without any stove, full of wood ashes; a chair, and a very small table; and on the last-named piece of furniture was displayed, in grand array, the doctor's library, consisting of some half-dozen greasy old books.

Now, it certainly looked about the last apartment on the whole earth out of which any man would be likely to get anything to do him good. But the door, as I have said, stood coaxingly open, and plainly said, in conjunction with the chair, the portrait, the table, and the books, "Walk in, gentlemen, walk in! Don't be ill, gentlemen, when you may be well in no time. Doctor Crocus is here, gentlemen, the celebrated Doctor Crocus! Doctor Crocus has come all this way to cure you, gentlemen. If you haven't heard of Doctor Crocus, it's your fault, gentlemen, who live a little way out of the world here: not Doctor Crocus's. Walk in, gentlemen, walk in!"

This is a sketch à la Boz, and the only private apartment which we are permitted by Mr. Dickens to enter in all America. Being the only one, we could have spared it, especially as the artist was not invited in himself.

By steamers, canal-boats, and railroads, Cincinnati was reached, though we have left it far behind; and with that fair city of the West the traveller appears more in love than with the older towns of the Atlantic States. His account of the journey is diverting enough; though if any one choose to travel by the canal from Dublin to the Shannon, and in many other directions, its dirt and discomfort may be all realized, and with the exception of the expectoration—a formidable one certainly—exceeded;—beds, washing, and all.

Travelling by land was not much pleasanter than by water. As we get along with Mr. Dickens, we begin to fear that, notwithstanding a few well-pointed periods of general praise, he really dislikes the American people. They have, he avers, no humour; being here decidedly at issue with Miss Martineau, who, on somewhat narrow premises certainly, asserts that they abound in humour, that humour is their great characteristic. Then Mr. Dickens finds them universally dull, taciturn; often sullen, unamusable, and averse to all harmless amusements. In the great cities the inhabitants do not go to the theatre; they are unsocial and cheerless at their meals; and often dyspeptic, from want of personal cleanliness, overstuffing with all sorts of crude food, and from taking no proper exercise.——But let us not make things worse than they are represented.

The washing apparatus is forward, on the deck. It is a little better than on board the canal-boat, but not much. In all modes of travelling, the American customs, with reference to the means of personal cleanliness and wholesome ablution, are extremely negligent and filthy; and I strongly incline to the belief that a considerable amount of illness is referable to this cause.

We are to be on board the Messenger three days: arriving at Cincinnati (barring accidents) on Monday morning. There are three meals a-day. Breakfast at seven, dinner at half-past twelve, supper about six. At each, there are a great many small dishes and plates upon the table, with very little in them; so that although there is every appearance of a mighty "spread," there is seldom really more than a joint: except for those who fancy slices of beet-root, shreds of dried beef, complicated entanglements of yellow pickle; maize, Indian corn, apple-sauce, and pumpkin.

Some people fancy all these little dainties together (and sweet preserves beside,) by way of relish to their roast pig. They are generally those dyspeptic ladies and gentlemen who eat unheard-of quantities of hot corn bread (almost as good for the digestion as a kneaded pin-cushion,) for breakfast and for supper. Those who do not observe this custom, and who help themselves several times instead, usually suck their knives and rks meditatively, until they have decided what to take ext: then pull them out of their mouths; put them in he dish; help themselves; and fall to work again. At inner, there is nothing to drink upon the table, but reat jugs full of cold water. Nobody says anything, t any meal, to anybody. All the passengers are very ismal, and seem to have tremendous secrets weighing n their minds. There is no conversation, no laughter, o cheerfulness, no sociality, except in spitting; and at is done in silent fellowship round the stove, when he meal is over. Every man sits down, dull and lanuid; swallows his fare as if breakfasts, dinners, and uppers were necessities of nature never to be coupled ith recreation or enjoyment; and having bolted his od in a gloomy silence, bolts himself, in the same state. . . . The people are all alike, too. There is no iversity of character. They travel about on the same rrands, say and do the same things in exactly the same anner, and follow in the same dull cheerless round. ll down the long table, there is scarcely a man who is anything different from his neighbour.

The same remark is repeated more than once. oach-drivers necessarily fell frequently under the raveller's observation; and they seem all cast in he same mould—however diversified their costume ay be—and that a bad one. A negro coachriver in Virginia makes, at all events, a good subct for a Bozian picture.

He is a negro—very black indeed. He is dressed in coarse pepper-and-salt suit excessively patched and arned (particularly at the knees,) grey stockings, normous unblacked high-low shoes, and very short rousers. He has two odd gloves: one of parti-coloured orsted, and one of leather. He has a very short whip, roken in the middle and bandaged up with string. nd yet he wears a low-crowned, broad-brimmed, black at: faintly shadowing forth a kind of insane imitation f an English coachman! but somebody in authority ries "Go ahead!" as I am making these observations. he mail takes the lead in a four-horse wagon, and all he coaches follow in procession, headed by No. 1. . . . . The coachmen always change with he horses, and are usually as dirty as the coach. The rst was dressed like a very shabby English baker; the econd like a Russian peasant: for he wore a loose urple camlet robe with a fur collar, tied round his aist with a parti-coloured worsted sash; grey trousers; ght blue gloves; and a cap of bearskin. . . . The frequent change of coachmen works no change or ariety in the coachman's character. He is always irty, sullen, and taciturn. If he be capable of smartess of any kind, moral or physical, he has a faculty of oncealing it which is truly marvellous. He never peaks to you as you sit beside him on the box, and if ou speak to him, he answers (if at all) in monosyllables. le points out nothing on the road, and seldom looks at nything: being, to all appearance, thoroughly weary of , and of existence generally. As to doing the honours f his coach, his business, as I have said, is with the orses.

It comes, at last, to be a question if Mr. Dickns' mind, or, at all events, his habits and associaions, are not too exclusively the growth of old ities—if he is not too new to "roughing it"—to ake him the best judge in the world of what the mericans call their "young country," and its sages. His eye, also, is too microscopic for obcts so vast—a horizon so unbounded; sharp as it at detecting small blemishes and discordant arangements. The only gentleman whom he seems o have seen in the West was the Indian mentioned bove.

There chanced to be on board this boat, in addition to he usual dreary crowd of passengers, one Pitchlynn, a hief of the Choctaw tribe of Indians, who sent in his card to me, and with whom I had the pleasure of a long conversation.

He spoke English perfectly well, though he had not begun to learn the language, he told me, until he was a young man grown. He had read many books; and Scott's poetry appeared to have left a strong impression on his mind; especially the opening of "The Lady of the Lake," and the great battle scene in Marmion, in which, no doubt, from the congeniality of the subjects to his own pursuits and tastes, he had great interest and delight. He appeared to understand correctly all he had read; and whatever fiction had enlisted his sympathy in its belief, had done so keenly and earnestly, I might almost say fiercely. He was dressed in our ordinary every-day costume, which hung about his fine figure loosely, and with indifferent grace. On my telling him that I regretted not to see him in his own attire, he threw up his right arm for a moment, as though he were brandishing some heavy weapon, and answered, as he let it fall again, that his race were losing many things beside their dress, and would soon be seen upon the earth no more: but he wore it at home, he added proudly.

He told me that he had been away from his home, west of the Mississippi, seventeen months: and was now returning. He had been chiefly at Washington on some negotiations pending between his tribe and the Government; which were not settled yet (he said in a melancholy way,) and he feared never would be: for what could a few poor Indians do, against such well-skilled men of business as the whites? He had no love for Washington; tired of towns and cities very soon; and longed for the forest and the prairie.

I asked him what he thought of Congress? He answered, with a smile, that it wanted dignity, in an Indian's eyes.

He would very much like, he said, to see England before he died; and spoke with much interest about the great things to be seen there. When I told him of that chamber in the British Museum wherein are preserved household memorials of a race that ceased to be, thousands of years ago, he was very attentive, and it was not hard to see that he had a reference in his mind to the gradual fading away of his own people. . . . .

He was a remarkably handsome man: some years past forty I should judge; with long black hair, an aquiline nose, broad cheek bones, a sunburnt complexion, and a very bright, keen, dark, and piercing eye. . . . . He took his leave; as stately and complete a gentleman of Nature's making as ever I beheld; and moved among the people in the boat, another kind of being.

Another grievance of the English in America is the intolerance of the Temperance landlords. Where tea and coffee were bad, and water worse, Mr. Dickens reasonably asked for brandy, which he had a right to do had all been of the best,—

But it is a Temperance hôtel, and spirits are not to be had for love or money. This preposterous forcing of unpleasant drinks down the reluctant throats of travellers is not at all uncommon in America; but I never discovered that the scruples of such wincing landlords induced them to preserve any unusually nice balance between the quality of their fare, and their scale of charges: on the contrary, I rather suspected them of diminishing the one and exalting the other, by way of recompense for the loss of their profit on the sale of spirituous liquors. After all, perhaps, the plainest course for persons of such tender consciences, would be a total abstinence from tavern-keeping.

Some originals of the Far West, and various little, affectionate episodes, diversify and relieve the monotony of the voyage to St. Louis, and back again to Cincinnati. Traversing the State of Ohio, Mr. D. reached the Lakes—nor halted until under the Falls of Niagara. The journey to the Far West must, on the whole, have been a dull and tiresome one. All is barren! The Valley of the Mississippi, one vast Lake of the Dismal Swamp—prairies "oppressive in their barren monotony," scenes which Mr. Dickens—and we can believe him—though he may not be able to forget them, never wishes to look on again. He has paid dearly enough already for his search of the Sublime, for all the enjoyment it appears to have afforded him. The social dinner was the best part of the prairie day's work; and in a queer old tumble-down French suburb of St. Louis he is much more at home than in the vast wilderness. Every man after his kind.

We encamped near a solitary log-house, for the sake of its water, and dined upon the plain. The baskets contained roast fowls, buffalo's tongue, (an exquisite dainty, by the way,) ham, bread, cheese, and butter; biscuits, champagne, sherry; lemons and sugar for punch; and abundance of rough ice. The meal was delicious, and the entertainers were the soul of kindness and good humour. . . . . In the old French portion of the town, the thoroughfares are narrow and crooked, and some of the houses are very quaint and picturesque: being built of wood, with tumble-down galleries before the windows, approachable by stairs, or rather ladders, from the street. There are queer little barbers' shops and drinking-houses too, in this quarter; and abundance of crazy old tenements with blinking casements, such as may be seen in Flanders. Some of these ancient habitations, with high-garret gable windows perking into the roofs, have a kind of French shrug about them; and being lop-sided with age, appear to hold their heads askew, besides, as if they were grimacing in astonishment at the American Improvements. It is hardly necessary to say, that these consist of wharfs and warehouses.

Of St. Louis, that young emporium whose future commercial destinies might touch any mind, we learn nothing more, save that, at the Planters' Hôtel, superb dinners were served up to Mr. and Mrs. Dickens.

At Niagara, Mr. Dickens does become Transcendental, though not after the fashion of Emerson's ascetic school. He was exalted and sublimed, though the permanent emotion was tranquillizing.

The visit to Canada presents nothing new. Its record is indeed as meagre as possible. The traveller appears to have liked everything he saw; and he prudently forbears to draw any parallel between the social features of the British colony and the United States; though one may guess that, unlike some previous observers, his comparison would be advantageous to our noble selves. He is more hopeful, and indeed confident, of the fortunes of Canada than most people were at the time of his visit, though matters do look brighter of late.

After visiting Montreal and Quebec, Mr. Dickens regained New York by the customary route of Lake Champlain and the Hudson; and, before taking his departure, made a flying visit to the baths at Lebanon, and the Shaker Settlement there. These baths have satisfied even fastidious English travellers. Not so Mr. Dickens; and his condemnation of the Shakers is without discrimination as without mercy. The happiest part of the expedition to Mr. Dickens, so far as he lets us into the secret of his adventures, seems to have been the voyage home, during which he quite recovered his good humour and good spirits. His fellow-passengers were chiefly Canadians.

Though it will be seen that the general impression, and the report of the American character, are unfavourable, this is somewhat qualified by the sweeping assertion in the concluding remarks, that "they are by nature frank, brave, cordial, hospitable, and affectionate." But then those fine natural qualities are "sadly sapped and blighted in their growth among the mass; and there are influences at work which endanger them still more, and give but little present promise of their healthy restoration." The nature of some of these influences, real or imaginary, we have already seen. Another of them, pronounced "the prolific parent of an innumerable brood of evils," is "universal distrust," which renders the people jealous, suspicious, fickle, unjust, and ungrateful to their most useful servants and best benefactors. A mean and factious party spirit is another besetting sin of the Americans. There is yet another base quality and deep taint, at the existence of which, considering that America is the common resort of the most rascally swindlers and vagabonds that England spews forth, we need not be surprised. For this her present half-settled condition, but surely not her free institutions, are chargeable. This is what Mr. Dickens calls the love of "smart" dealing—cheating, in short, which—

Gilds over many a swindle and gross breach of trust; many a defalcation, public and private; and enables many a knave to hold his head up with the best, who well deserves a halter—though it has not been without its retributive operation, for this smartness has done more in a few years to impair the public credit, and to cripple the public resources, than dull honesty, however rash, could have effected in a century. . . . . The following dialogue I have held a hundred times:—"Is it not a very disgraceful circumstance that such a man as So and So should be acquiring a large property by the most infamous and odious means, and notwithstanding all the crimes of which he is guilty, should be tolerated and abetted by your Citizens? He is a public nuisance, is he not?" "Yes, Sir." "A convicted liar?" "Yes, Sir." "He has been kicked, and cuffed, and caned?" "Yes, Sir." "And he is utterly dishonourable, debased, and profligate?" "Yes, Sir." "In the name of wonder, then, what is his merit?" "Well, Sir, he is a smart man."

In the two words, "Yes, Sir," Mr. Dickens finds the sum of American general conversation. Other travellers hear only "dollars;" he, "Yes, Sir."

Though Mr. Dickens did not visit those Southern States in which slavery exists in its foulest degree, it needs not that, in him or any man, to qualify him to speak truly of its complicated and all-pervading iniquity. This he does warmly, quoting from the American newspapers a few of the sort of paragraphs, illustrative of its actual operation, which our readers may have seen in our own pages. A few more, given after the example of Marryat and Buckingham, show the lawless spirit, "the wild justice," of the Far West.

ON THE STUDY OF LANGUAGES.

BY PROFESSOR BLACKIE.

We shall say nothing of the utility of studying nguages: the practical necessity presses on too nany. Hence there is never like to be a lack of tudents in this department; hence there has al-ays been also a plentiful supply of solemn, pe-agogic drill-masters on the one hand, and loose attling quacks on the other, to Ciceronize the raveller in the several provinces of so wide a ingdom. The present writer, though no pro-essed linguist, having, from particular circum-tances, had no small traffic with various famous nguages, both ancient and modern, has bethought imself that he may possibly do a small service to ome honest student in some corner,—perhaps even arnish the educational Reformer with some useful int,—by setting down shortly in print what he onsiders to be the most sure and easy methods of vercoming the difficulties commonly encountered n linguistical study. For, truly, if in any depart-ent of intellectual activity a few encouraging rords at the outset of the expedition are profitable, hey are necessary here; it being plain to a skilful bserver in these matters, that, while of those who egin to study languages and end where they egan, the one half stop because they never had ny serious intention of going on, the other half ave been driven back from the lack, not so much f an earnest purpose, as of a healthy confidence; oth imagining many fearful difficulties which ever existed, and stumbling confusedly upon hose which do exist, without either a pioneer to repare their path, or a general to lead their pro-ress.

Now, in order to see our way clearly through he manifold perplexities and perversities of this ath—(simple enough, however, all the while, if eople would only train themselves to take their nowledge direct from Nature, leave big blundering ooks upon their shelves, and look at pompous rejudice without its stilts)—the first thing to be one is to set clearly down, and consistently hold ast this proposition, that—The study of a language not the study of a science, but the study of an rt; and that it must accordingly be prosecuted, not the method of abstract principles, but by the assi-uous exercise of familiar practices. Manifest as his proposition appears, it is one against which ll teachers, especially the scholastic teachers of he ancient languages, have been very apt to of-nd. It is necessary, therefore, to fix it clearly n the mind, before we proceed to deduce the prac-tal rules for the conduct of study, in which it is uitful. No doubt there is a SCIENCE of language -and that a very grand and very profound one -so, at least, as Humboldt, and other continental holars, have recently prosecuted it on a large ale. There is also a science of each individual nguage, as there is an anatomy of each indivi-ual man: but you must have the man before you n anatomize him; and you must know the lan-uage (vulgarly speaking) before you can make a ience of it. What people would have when they set themselves to learn a language, is not the minute knowledge of all the nerves and sinews, all the bones and processes of bones, joints, and liga-tures of the vocal frame-work,—much less the pre-tenceful and often barbarous jargon wherewith scientific men are wont to designate the same; but what they desire is to create in their minds the familiar association and close concatenation of a certain system of ideas, old and new, with a cer-tain system of new sounds; and this achievement is an art, and to be attained mainly by practice, just as a man learns to cobble a shoe, to play a pipe, or to turn a rhyme dexterously. We shall take this, therefore, for granted—The knowledge of a language is the acquirement of an art to be at-tained mainly by practice.—Mainly, we say, but not exclusively; for, no doubt, a professor of ana-tomy may teach a fair woman a fine carriage as well on osteological principles, as a drill-sergeant can by military practice. Science, indeed, is, in all matters, the perfecter of practice: but as many famous actors have trod the stage properly with-out having been minutely instructed in the machi-nery of the tibial and femoral bone; so many an eloquent mouth has learnt to speak powerfully in divers languages without any aid from grammar or syntax rules, and without the help of any dictionary also, perhaps, other than that which Don Juan had when he learned Greek from Hai-dee. A living dictionary, indeed, is always the best; and a grammar may always be dispensed with. For a grammar is, as we have said, neither more nor less than the anatomy of the thing; and as there is no question but you can walk, run, leap, dance, march, fight, and beat Napoleon, with-out anatomy, so you can as certainly learn a lan-guage without a grammar; and their own lan-guage, in fact, most people do so learn, and many who both speak and write very properly. But with regard to foreign languages, and especially the dead languages, a notion has prevailed that a portentous preparatory scaffolding of grammar is absolutely necessary towards any solid and lasting superstructure; a notion altogether false, and in practice most pernicious. Grammar is not useless to a student of language; nay, it is very useful when wisely used: but as mere mineralogical de-scriptions without minerals, can never teach a man mineralogy; so a system of rules about words,—without a previous stock of words to which these rules may be applied,—can never teach a man language. In all practical arts, while to evolve principles from the facts as the facts gradually become known, is natural and pleasant,—to learn the principles without the facts is unnatural and hard: unnatural, because these principles have no real existence independent of the facts or matter with which they are in living nature embodied and interwoven; hard, because every unnatural ap-plication of the mind is hard and harsh, as many a grammar-school boy can testify.

Languages are to be learned mainly by practice.—This principle being fixed, the next step is to ascertain what is the practice of NATURE in the matter. How do little children learn languages? By what mystery do the innocent lips that at first found enough ado to suck as healthy children ought, learn to articulate MAMMA and PAPA, and to apply certainly these full-lipped and broad-throated vocal enunciations, to certain familiar and fixed persons of a pleasing aspect, by whose presence they are daily and hourly environed? 'Tis a very simple matter; but a matter, like all the great primal truths of existence, the neglect of which, in the study of languages, has puzzled many a hopeful scholar, and perplexed many a famous pedagogue. It is by the continual and persevering repetition of a certain sound, in plain, palpable, and direct connexion with a certain known and familiar object, that a child learns both to understand first one word of a language and then another when spoken, and to speak them with understanding. These two processes in the art of learning a language are cotemporaneous on the part of the child; first, the continual hearing of a certain sound pronounced in connexion with a certain known object; and then the continual imitation or echoing of that sound, in self-perfecting phrase, by its own organ. The same process may be observed in persons of advanced years; as when a young midshipman enters a ship, he learns the slang or peculiar language of the sailors by hearing it continually repeated, and continually echoing what he hears; so a student at the University learns the University slang; and a student of theology the theological slang, Puseyite or Presbyterian as the chance may be; so a lawyer learns the legal slang, which is very bad; a newsmonger the newspaper slang, which is worse; and a writer in critical Reviews the critical slang, which is the worst of all. By the institution of Nature, therefore, it appears, that to learn a language easily and profitably, a person must be put into an echo-chamber, so to speak, of constantly repeated sounds, and remain in that atmosphere for a certain considerable period, more or less according to his capacity of perception and imitation, till these sounds, in connexion with the things of which they are the symbols, have become a habitual and customary part of his associations; and every artificial or imitative system of teaching languages must be good or bad, according as its machinery approaches to or recedes from this original norm which Nature has set up. These principles being premised, we may proceed to state, in detail, the practical rules of teaching which they necessarily beget.—

In the first place, then, one thing is plain, that if we would follow the method of Nature in her practice, we must begin our study of a language at a point where many people think we ought to end, and whereto many great linguists never attain,—that is to say, with talking it—and talking just as children do when they begin to speak, first one word and then another, not grammatically at all, but blundering straight on, not without frequent tripping and stumbling, as we best can, and helping ourselves with signs to complement the deficiency that will for some time characterize our vocabulary. Many persons, especially those who have been accustomed to move only with much labour where the grammar has made a trigonometrical survey before them, will not understand this precipitous procedure, and will, wisely as they deem, be afraid to venture a step on such a headlong path, for fear of breaking their shins; but it is, nevertheless, both the surest and the speediest way, and the way commonly practised by all who learn language as it is naturally learned from living masters and among living men—not from dead grammars and dusty dictionaries. Get, therefore, some one to talk with—a native, or at least a person naturalized in the country—and make him tell you the names of all the common things you see, and give you a small capital to begin with, of the most common and necessary phrases of every-day life—as for instance, (supposing you are studying German,) wein—wine; wasser—water; glas—a glass; gieb—give. Gieb mir ein glas wein—give me a glass of wine. These phrases repeat as often as you possibly can, holding imaginary conversations where real ones fail—just as children are taught to say mamma and papa twenty times a-day or more, till they are perfect—and in the course of a few weeks you will find you have made astonishing progress in the art of conversing, on common subjects, in the strange tongue. And this too, be it borne in mind, even though you are as rude of letters in all respects, and as ignorant of books as a mere child; for it is by the ear that language properly comes, and not by the eye; as the example of many a Betty or Sarah who has gone to Carlsbad or Baden, with master and mistress,

To bouze the drumly German waters, sufficiently shows. For, while master and mistress hear nothing but French and English from the fashionable society that frequent the baths, and return from their German tour as guiltless of a Teutonic guttural as the most native cockney of Cockaigne, Betty, on the other hand, has heard the native dialect from the mouths of native grooms and chambermaids, and has, with very little perceptible trouble, in three months, acquired a more practical command of a language of which she knows not a single printed letter, than many a famous scholar has done by solitary study in three years. So easy and profitable always is it to follow the plan of Nature in all our proceedings. But what shall honest people do, who are not servants to great travelling lords and ladies, and who have no pence to carry them to Hamburg or Berlin? a young merchant, for instance, living in Liverpool or Dundee, and ambitious to acquire the dialect of the Teuts. We say what we said before, let him get a person and talk with him—and let him get a good phrase-book to save his master, or his foreign friend, trouble, and to enrich the vocabulary. This, you perceive, is a step beyond the simple plan of Nature in teaching children, which we sketched: for here we have got not only talking men to imitate, but written books; not spoken sounds merely, but visible sounds—so miraculous and sense-transmuting is the wit of man;—as by similar transmuting power we have now at ength got tangible sounds also, and bibles which he blind man literally reads!—But still books r visible sounds, wonderful as they are, and like eeds which bear increase a hundred-fold to the ower, are yet only of secondary use in the acuirement of language, and can never render the earing ear, and the speaking tongue dispensable; nuch less can they pretend to stand alone. A man nay, by the help of books, learn a language well nough, in a fashion, to the effect of reading written books; but not to the effect of knowing, in its ital fulness, in its blood, bone, muscle, and play f healthy colour, any language that has a life in t. A dead language, accordingly, learned only rom books, can never be thoroughly learned. A iving master, therefore, by the natural method of eaching languages, we hold to be indispensable; nd to masters, accordingly, most people betake hemselves. It is only lamentable to see how, rom vain self-sufficiency on the one hand, and ur want of normal schools on the other, so many eople undertake to instruct youth in the elements f strange tongues, who are utterly unable to do hat for which a master is in the first place, and in he second place, and in the third place desirable —viz., to talk the language. For a good master f languages ought daily, and hourly if possible, to e to his pupils that which papa and mamma are o the child, when they are supplying it with its irst and most indispensable stock of enunciated deas. And this remark applies not merely to eachers of the living languages—in whom inability o talk the tongue they profess is less excusable nd less common—but in an especial manner to eachers of what are, or are called, the dead lanuages. The time was—scarce one hundred years go, we guess, in this country—when the Latin anguage was taught in the natural and proper ray, by talking and discoursing as well as by eading; and to the present day it is so taught, we elieve, in well-ordered Catholic colleges. But for he most part, in this nineteenth century, Latin, nd Greek also (which latter is certainly anything ut a dead language) are taught in a most painful nd perverse manner, by grammars and dictionries and books only, to the utter neglect of the atural method; according to which, as we have hown, the knowledge of language comes by the ar, not by the eye. No wonder, therefore, that ith such mighty preparation, and blowing of lassical trumpets, we produce such insignificantly mall results. They labour for ten years, in Engand, to produce a Greek scholar; and when, out f every fifty seedlings, they succeed in rearing one o some respectable altitude, they present you with creature who, that he may be able curiously to ibble at the shell of the past, has altogether dised his natural stomach to digest the substantial ernel of the present; and who, with that superitious prostration of soul which characterizes the tudent of the mere letter, finds nothing better to o with his Greek, when he has it, than, out of the nd drivel of some doting old father, to plaster up bastard Christianity of priestly pedigrees—a weet-smelling savour in the nostrils of modern bishops. Now this, we say, is a pitiful result; but it is just such a result as might have been expected from the pedantic system of which it is the offspring. If a sensible man wants good Greek, let him go to Athens for it, and not to Oxford. Let him make acquaintance there with intelligent natives, read native newspapers, and hear native talk of all kinds daily and hourly. We pledge ourselves to the result. With tolerable application, he will make a better Greek scholar, by this natural method, in ten months, (and at a less expense too,) than the scholastic method of grammars and dictionaries, practised in our British schools and universities, will make him in ten years. The fact is, Greek is not worth the pains at present bestowed upon it, when studied scholastically and as a dead language. If a man cannot go to Athens for his Greek, in the way we suggest, or bring over an intelligent native to this country to talk with, (which, we guess, he could do at a much less expense than an English university education entails,) then, unless some strong practical necessity presses him, we say, he had better let Greek alone. One may be a very good Christian, and a very wise philosopher, without breaking his shins obliquely over a Dochmiac strophe in Æschylus, or knowing any more about Homer than what he can learn faithfully from Cowper or John Henry Voss.

The idea of learning Greek and Latin in the natural way, by talking them, and by frequent oral discourses, will no doubt appear preposterous to some in principle, and to many, who may agree with the principle, in practice impossible. With the first set of objectors we shall not argue, but leave them to settle the matter for themselves with that all-wise system of Nature against whose established rule they rebel. To the second set of objectors we say, that so long as there are no normal schools for language-masters in this country, and nothing has been done to train the great part of our classical scholars to any practical dexterity in the natural system of teaching what are called the dead languages—so long it is not lawful for a man, with muscle in his arm, to talk of impossibilities. For ourselves, we believe most firmly, that with masters trained to speak Greek and Latin fluently in a well organised normal school, our young men would learn a practical command of these languages in six months, such as they now seldom attain in six years. And this, above all things, we insist on, that GREEK IS A LIVING AND NOT A DEAD LANGUAGE; and that to acquire it with the lumbering laboriosity of dead grammars and dictionaries only, according to the present practice, is a procedure more perverse in principle, and more pernicious in practical results, than anything that the records of pedagogy exhibit. As to Latin, if you call that a dead language, you speak certainly with more propriety than when you apply that designation to the language of Homer and Corai, which are one; but, philosophically speaking, Latin is not a dead language in the same sense that the old Phœnician language and the old Etruscan are dead languages; for these languages, were they known to us now as well as Latin and Greek are, would be languages which, in the history of the world, had undergone a total practical extinction; whereas Latin was at no time altogether extinct in history, but remained in practical activity for ecclesiastical, and for public and scientific purposes, contemporaneously with the other languages, commonly called the languages of Modern Europe, which gradually superseded it for popular purposes. Latin became a dead language only the other day in Hungary, when the National Diet passed an act, allowing the Magyar to be used for parliamentary purposes; and in the church of Rome, Latin has always lived, and lives at the present hour certainly, and will live unquestionably in no dry old age, as long as the Pope lives, and the Puseyites. What hinders us, then, to teach Latin to-day, in as fluent, vigorous, and practical a style, as they did in the days of George Buchanan and Hugo Grotius?—Nothing but bookish pedantry, we say, and slothful prejudice, and that which hinders all grand educational progress in this country—WANT OF SOUL, AND WANT OF SYSTEM. Our system of classical education, altogether, is like an old watch that has been allowed to go nine minutes slow every day, and an hour every week, and more than two days at the end of the year, and at the end of ten years more than twenty days, and so on; till, after a century is past, the Conservative old time-teller is months behind the date. In proportion as the facilities of learning Latin in a natural manner, without the walls of schools and colleges, decreased, the machinery within should have increased, both in intensity of power and in wise application of that power; but the professors, and the tutors, and the schoolmasters, were no miracle-workers; and there being no normal schools, such as were absolutely necessary to set the thing in a proper train, the fluent and ready use of the Latin tongue, even within the walls of universities, and in the lecture-rooms of professed teachers of that language, was lost. No attempt was made to institute, much less to maintain, in vigorous and healthy action, a familiar ECHO-CHAMBER of learned sounds, such as the natural system points out; and boys were set, and are set, in solitary corners, with grammar and dictionary in hand, painfully to feel and finger their way through classical darkness by erudite commentary made visible: and there they sit with most commendable diligence certainly—(poor fellows!)—through much tribulation of pen, ink, and paper, tallow candles and blinking eyes, acquiring to themselves the name of scholars with the small solatium of bursaries and fellowships glimmering indistinctly in the distance. No wonder that out of twenty hopeful youths that set out on this classical progress, nineteen stick fast for a while in the slough of despond, and then make their best way back again, from Cæsar and Cicero to the profane and pleasant paths of the circulating library and the last new novel. No wonder that learning is hated in this country, and classicality odious, when you give an ingenuous youth literally stones to eat for bread; and, tying his feet up in a pair of scholastic skates, send him off pitifully to hash his way through snow and slush, while the Queen's highway is at hand, and one may walk to better purpose there with a pair of common shoes. Oh, that Milton would stand up now from the grave, and preach loudly against these things, as he did two hundred years ago!*

The perversity of the present system of teaching the dead languages—by the eye only, that is to say, and not by the ear—will be made more abundantly manifest by an example from the detail of modern practice. The reader knows that one main characteristic of these languages, as distinguished from the modern, lies in the intimate connexion in which they stand to music; insomuch that, while the most sublime and solemn passages in Shakspeare must, according to the laws of English speech, be pronounced with something of the rapid run which belongs to familiar colloquy, the most common and conversational parts of Æschylus have something in them of that measured and stately character which belongs to the highest genus of cathedral chant. In other words, the quantity of syllables, as long or short, and the structure of poetical rhythm in strict and marked accordance therewith, is a main matter in ancient poetry; in modern poetry only secondary.—Now, what follows from this as a necessary difference in the methods of teaching the ancient and modern languages? Plainly this—that if it would mar the effect of many a good verse and many a good rhyme to teach an English boy to pronounce press short, as if it were written press, it must substantially annihilate the rhythmical principle on which all ancient poetry is constructed, if we allow a boy to say cáinăss, or cáwnăss, instead of cánnaws, which is unquestionably the true pronunciation of the Latin canas, the accent being on the first syllable, but the quantitative extension on the second, as in the English word empire. Nevertheless, the classical masters of this country (many of them at least) teach Latin in this way, making no perceptible difference of pronunciation between ŏvis—of a sheep,—and ōvis, with eggs,—though the one has the quantity of two quavers, and the other that of two crotchets. But the absurdity does not stop here: this rather is merely a bad habit: the perversity is yet to be mentioned. Will it be believed?—after allowing the ear to educate itself altogether to a false habit, (for the English analogy will almost universally lead to a mispronunciation of Latin,) they force the eye and the understanding by a system of painfully barbarous grammar rules to take up the right habit; and thus, instead of helping the one sense to assist the other, (as the Greeks did so admirably when they invented a different character for the long O) they set the eye to undo daily what the ear is daily, and hourly, and yearly doing; and after fighting this most unnatural of all battles stoutly for several years the combatant becomes a learned PROSODIAN! Was anything so monstrous ever heard? Every boy hates Prosody; and, in hating it heartily, shows a great deal more sense than his master does in teaching it. For the pronunciation of a language is not to be learned by dry abstract rules, but by the living habit of sound; and it is one of the main uses of a master of language to watch narrowly, and never to allow a false pronunciation ence made to be repeated, and thus grow up into a practice which it will be difficult to unlearn. Where the pronunciation of a language can be reduced to rules, it is a profitable thing, certainly, for the teacher to make a system of such rules; but it is most impertinent in him to give these merely written rules to the learner, instead of his own living example, which ought to be much more vivid and effectual; and which, if he knows his trade, will, in fact, be sufficient of itself to form the ear of the common scholar, leaving the whole cumbrous lore of the Prosodians from Hephaestion down to the last edition of Carey, as a matter of occasional reference merely to the classical laity, and of curious and recondite study to the academical clergy. Most certain it is, that as our best English speakers are often those who have made the least use of Walker, who have acquired a correct pronunciation, by practice merely,—so Prosody, which is now the most difficult, might be made the most easy department of scholarship, if the classical master would merely act upon that simplest proposition with which we set out—viz., that the learning of a language is an art to be acquired by the training of the ear, not a science to be understood by the indoctrination of the understanding.

* See his letter to Hartlib.

So much for the ancient languages. We shall now make some remarks on the conduct of linguistical study, with a view to show how the general system which we have pointed out may be best carried out in practical detail. First then, it is clear, that pronunciation is a leading thing in the natural method of acquiring languages; and that, accordingly, if a fellow goes through the country with sounding advertisements and letters of recommendation, boasting to give a complete course of German instruction in six lessons, that man is a quack. He may, indeed, in six lessons, or in three, if he please, raise up a complete scaffolding of the principal abstract schemes and rules of grammar: but practically he will do almost nothing; for in attending to rules, neither he nor his scholars will have any leisure left for that continuous and long continued practice, by which alone the living sounds of language can be made familiar to the ear. Let the teacher, therefore, on the very first day, commence reading before his scholars, and teaching them even the shape and power of the letters of the alphabet by living example; for he is not entitled (as is too often done) to throw all the labour off his own shoulders, and say at once to the scholar, "Go to your grammar, at such and such a page, and get such and such a rule by heart, and then come and repeat it to me." The master must act, in the first place, exegetically as a living, speaking, and incarnated grammar; and the scholar must not be discouraged in the outset, by being sent into a corner to learn from a dumb book in an abstract shape, what it is the very proper business of the master to present to him in the totality of its living completeness, and clad with all the freshness of its natural hues. The master must speak and read from the very first—and not only so, but cause what he speaks and reads (beginning, of course, with the most short, easy, and familiar sentences) to be got by heart on the spot, and boldly reëchoed back by his scholars,—so that they shall learn the art of using the language in some measure the very first day; even before they are perfectly familiar with the written characters, if these be different from those used in their native tongue. We say the scholar must be taught boldly and without hesitation to echo back on the spot what he hears; for if he does not begin at first with a certain broad, bold, blundering confidence, he may twirl grammar rules about his fingers for months, and make no satisfactory progress. Mark well the words—a broad, bold, blundering confidence. BLUNDERING; for in the urgent practical movements of the human being, the man who begins with being too proud to stumble, will end in being too stiff to move. And this is a point on which we insist with peculiar emphasis—from having found in practice no greater impediment to the speedy acquirement of a foreign language, than that want of confidence, which may be nervousness or an ingenuous timidity in many cases; but in as many, certainly, is only a specious name for pride. You will not begin by speaking the language, because you are afraid of making a blunder, and committing an unpardonable sin against some solemn grammar rule, with whose requirements you are not yet acquainted. And then you are afraid some skilful person may laugh at your incompetency. Pshaw!—Who expects you to march like an old Roman senator, when you are only learning to stand, and must help yourself by creeping? And if impudent people will laugh at you, learn you to laugh at them again. It is one of the most useful and necessary lessons of life. It is, in fact, with the element of speech, as with that of water; not weight, but fear, sinks the swimmer. Blunder on, therefore, we repeat it, with a broad confidence; and learn to stand as the child does practically, by learning not to fall. And to encourage your early attempts, we would prescribe an exercise from the first, in which you cannot possibly blunder. Let your master read to you every day some pretty rhyme or other, containing a striking image, a beautiful sentiment, or a profound thought; and let him, at the same time, tell you the meaning of the whole and of every word: then repeat it yourself after him, once and again, till you have perfectly mastered its pronunciation and cadence. Then get the stanza by heart to-day, and repeat it to-morrow, reciting it with as much fulness of tone and propriety of emphasis as you can manage. And so on for six months at least without remission; for without great and continuous labour Jove gave nothing to mortals, least of all, the knowledge of languages.

But where have we left the grammar and the dictionary all this while? Are we really so insane as to dream that doctor or disciple can get on without them? or are we, perhaps, Hamiltonian in our notions, and would advise the use of an interlinear translation? No!—neither Hamiltonian nor Oxonian, nor any other name of any pedantic or empirical extreme, which, with one half of a great truth, runs away and rides to the devil, while the other half is left behind, like the poor Samaritan, where no Pharisee will help it, in the ditch. Honour be to all makers of grammars and dictionaries, (the most laborious species of much-labouring men,) if they would only make the one in some cases more concise, and the other in all cases more complete! Let us state, therefore, shortly here, how the master and scholar are to use them. Now, in regard to these great implements of language-learning it will be evident, from the scope of the preceding remarks, that we consider the two great practical blunders in the use of them to be, FIRST, the substitution of these dead repositories altogether, as of primary importance, into the place of that of which they are merely the imperfect and stereotyped echo; and, SECOND, the sending the unaided pupil to grope and grabble his way by the help of them only, at a period of his progress when he can use them but with small profit and with much tribulation. We would say, therefore, let only the most necessary forms and paradigms of noun, verb, and pronoun be learned by heart from the grammar in the outset; and let the pupil not be left (as is too often the case, by the indolence or perversity of the master) to impress these necessary forms upon his memory from the grammar only, as an independent and separate business; but let the master commence with the reading of the first lessons, and, along with a correct pronunciation, take special care to bring before the pupil, in living examples, as they occur, the most common forms of noun and verb and pronoun; and, while he does this, let him never remit, according to a hint already given, to cause the pupil to repeat some short sentence, involving some single grammatical form, with a clear voice, on the spot. By pursuing this system for some time, the grammar will in fact be practically educed by the teacher from the living body of the language, and forced upon the scholar by the daily echoing of living sounds, differing from the body of sounds with which the spoken intercourse of life brings us into connexion, only in this,—that the sounds are made to bear upon the memory of the scholar in a certain convenient succession wisely calculated by a scientific teacher. With regard to the other matters which grammars usually contain beyond the most necessary forms of declension and conjugation, they ought certainly to be let alone, till a period when the scholar has attained considerable progress both in reading the language, and in understanding it when read; and then, haply, he will find that he has now learned, insensibly, by practice, all that is essentially useful of that which the most laborious systematic study previous to the practice would have failed to hammer into his mind.

Let us illustrate this by an example:—It is a common thing to hear students of German complain of the exceeding difficulty of what, according to the common arrangement of the grammar certainly, are some of the most elementary parts of that language. They complain that there is no rule for the gender of the nouns, that Noehden's four declensions bring only an apparent order into the multifarious perplexity of the variations of case and number, and that the four forms of the adjective, as standing singly, coupled with a noun, with a definite, or with an indefinite article (a thing unheard of in any other language) are, to say the least of them, extremely tantalising to a beginner. Let this be so. All these things are very tantalizing to a beginner. But what necessity is there that a beginner should have anything to do with them at all? They stand there, indeed, in front of the grammar, most formidable, seeming to speak to the trembling disciple in the language of sheer despair, like the inscription which Dante read on Hell-gate—Lasciate ogni speranza voi che intrate! —and many boys at famous classical schools have, no doubt, at an early period despaired of Latinity, by having been prematurely plagued with things of a like nature. But the learner of the language, under the direction of a sensible teacher, has nothing whatever to do cramming himself in an abstract shape with a preparatory doze of matters, which the smooth and agreeable course of practice will afterwards shuffle into his hands abundantly, whether he will or no. If you know, for example, that Band in German means a volume, you have got the main thing, you have got the word for the idea; get as many of these radical words as you can, and as speedily as possible; but don't encumber your first outset with the anxious concern whether it be DER Band or DAS Band, masculine or neuter in gender, and whether the plural be Die Bände, or die Bänder. You can use a master, and use a dictionary, and use your tongue also, in a manner, without having previously learned a minute accuracy, in all points, of gender and declension. Don't vex yourselves with grammar rules, but blunder on, as we said before. Ox. Oxes? Well, that is an error! it should be Oxen!—but you don't require to learn this before reading or speaking the language; but by reading it.

Thus much for the use of the grammar. A word now on dictionaries, and private reading, and on the Hamiltonian system—for all these things hang together. As for dictionaries, though we have all along protested against a lazy or pedantic teacher leaving his scholar to quarry out his stock of vocables from them merely or mainly; yet there is no doubt they are of infinite use in the very first motions of the scholar, and for the prosecution of private reading altogether indispensable. The master, therefore, so soon as he perceives that the memory has got a substantial hold of the main forms of noun and verb, should instruct the pupil minutely in the art of using the dictionary; that is to say, should make him familiar with the common forms of prefix and affix, whereby the root is modified; and at the same time put in his hand, for frequent private repetition, a convenient list of such irregular forms of flection as the dictionary does not present in alphabetical order. So instructed, let the student gird himself lustily to the task (for a task it will be at first) of private reading; and for this purpose let him choose a book that he can read with interest and pleasure; and read, day after day, without intermission, two or three hours at least, continuously. The more the oung scholar reads, and the more incessantly the etter. Every day intermitted is two days lost. n the study of language, as in many other studies,) halt is to go backward. Why do the boys who udy Latin and Greek in our schools and colleges ake such pitiful progress? Not only because, s we have already shown, they are not made to ceive those languages by the natural inlet of the ar by means of speech and discourse, but because, t that early age, they are incapable of carrying n a continued course of attractive reading in the nguages which they are set to acquire. And this ads us to conclude, that the present system of aching Greek and Latin to mere BOYS, as prac-ised in the English schools, and in the Scottish hools and universities, is altogether a mistake. oung people of a very tender age may take up a reign language very readily, when they have a erson near them continually to repeat the foreign hrase, and to help them on with some pleasing ading suited to their capacity; but boys who re set to learn Latin and Greek according to the resent system, both want a master that can so ach, and a book that can so be read. We are f opinion, therefore, that the study of the learned nguages ought (except in a few peculiar cases) ot to be commenced till the higher functions of ncy and feeling begin to stir, and a taste for terature and reading begins to bud in the soul. uch a stimulus only will spur a man on cheer-ully to encounter and manfully to overcome those bstacles, which, as pedagogy is at present consti-uted, stands in the way of all knowledge of the ead languages which is not mere spelling of ords and poising of syllables.

On the Hamiltonian system, and the method of nterlinear translations, much need not be said. f it could be proved that the interlinear transla-ions enabled the student, within a certain time, o master a greater number of words thoroughly, hen of course the use of such translations were to e recommended. But it is plain, that the mean-ng of many words cannot be fully learned from he sense in which they occur in one particular lace of a writing. Some explanation will, in most ases, be necessary to bring before the student the rimary idea of the word, of which idea its use in ny particular passage is a mere modification. ow, if this explanation must be given, why should ou prefer giving it in a note which only serves ne special passage, to giving it in a book of con-enient reference, which contains that word in all ts varieties, and every other word of the language —is in fact a collected system of notes for all the ooks in the language?—It must not be forgotten, noreover, that the consulting of the dictionary is continual and most useful practical exercise in he forms and flections of all words, but especially f the numerous sort of derivative and compound ords that make up the bulk of a language. Be-ides, does not the human mind require to stir p its energy, and formally gird itself to any reat undertaking? And is the Hamiltonian sys-em not rather apt to set the student asleep?—On he other hand, it is plain, that boys in grammar chools, are often set to handle dictionaries from which it is practically impossible for their capacity to fish out the proper meaning of words. For persons of a tender age a special vocabulary for each book, and a set of wisely selected notes, seem absolutely necessary.

We say, therefore, that to talk of dispensing with a dictionary is a dream, and the dream of a very superficial person. But in order that the pupil may, in as speedy a way as possible, get the command of a fair number of vocables, we go back to our living machinery of an ECHO-CHAMBER, and suggest that the master should, at an early period of the course, commence reading to his pupils a series of short discourses or lectures in the language to be acquired. Of these it will be necessary for the teacher, for the first week or two, to give a previous explanation in English to the student: but afterwards it will be sufficient to furnish him with a list of the more difficult words and their meanings on the day previous to the lecture; and the student having carefully committed these to memory, will find himself in a condition to follow the whole discourse, at first with difficulty, but after a few trials, with the most perfect ease. This plan, viewed as a means of lightening the labour of consulting the dictionary, will be found infinitely more natural and efficacious than the Hamiltonian system; for while it puts into the hand of the student directly (without the necessity of laborious quarrying and pioneering on his part) a number of the most common words of the language in their most common acceptation, it at the same time exercises his ear in the art of following the spoken tongue; a matter of the first practical importance, though in scholastic methods of teaching often the last thing attended to, and in not a few cases altogether neglected.

We have said nothing hitherto of written exercises; and we have placed them last for a plain reason, (not always sufficiently considered, however,) that in the natural acquisition of language FLUENCY comes first and ACCURACY afterwards.—Now, it is manifest that the end proposed to be achieved by written exercises is the attainment of accuracy; and if so, it is equally manifest that the nails must be there to pare before a man can pare them. To commence with written exercises, therefore, seems altogether a preposterous method, and tends merely to produce prematurely in the mind of the student a minute and nice anxiety about grammatical points more likely to hinder his progress than to advance it. It is a gross waste of time, moreover, to make a separate and distinct business of learning by the painful tentative iteration of the pen, those things which will flow into the ear spontaneously, by the assiduous use of a practical course such as we have recommended. Let the main thing, therefore, be, for six months to read as much of the written, and to hear as much of the spoken language as possible; and then writing will have some materials to work on, some model on which it may be formed; for to set boys to write Latin themes or "versions" by the help of grammars and dictionaries merely, is the most fruitless of all scholastic laboriosities. The only proper way to write a language is from direct imitation of a written model, as we learn to speak by imitation of a speaking model. The master may accordingly proceed, as his pupils advance, after the delivery of a short lecture, to request them to put into their own language, and read or speak on the spot an epitome of what they have heard; and this practice, if wisely superintended by an assiduous teacher, will in a very short time be observed to have produced miracles,—not accuracy merely in the scholar, but what is of much greater importance, a firm practical hold, and a dexterous command of the tongue. Of course, in all these observations we premise, both that the pupil is determined to learn, and that the master is one who has learned the practical art of swimming in the language which he professes; for if he can only set stones with much preparation, and cross the stream at shallow places, the student must even betake himself to the toilsome but sure method of private study. READ! READ! READ! there is nothing else for it—read whatever your appetite affects, but especially poetry; for ancient verse, besides the meaning, teaches the quantity, as modern rhyme does both the accentuation and the pronunciation of a language.

We now conclude. If the reader has recognised any truth in the above remarks, he will be disposed to think with the writer, that the learning even of the most difficult languages is, or may be made, a much more easy and ready matter than many are apt to suppose. It requires no peculiar bump of the cranium, or intellectual idiosyncrasy, as some persons imagine. Any man who is not incurably lazy, or morbidly timid, may be taught to learn a foreign tongue just as he has learned his own. At the same time, let no mere talker deceive himself. Language is something more than a game: it is a building of words; and to build requires labour. No man can expect to make himself at home in a strange tongue without setting himself seriously to work; taking the outposts of the position by storm, so to speak. The road being clearly known, and the purpose seriously taken to make a journey, three things are necessary to achieve it: Confidence to begin, perseverance to go on, and determination to finish. Have these three: and while the most obvious language will not be learned without considerable labour, the most remote will present nothing that, to a man of ordinary diligence, shall appear a DIFFICULTY.

THE SONGS OF THE MONTHS.

NO. XI.—THE SONG OF NOVEMBER.

I.

ALONE, alone, through cold and plashy fields,
Weeping where none ask why; with soft concern,
Moaning with sadness which no pity shields,
And feeling love that never knows return,
I chant my song, and feather still the sheaves
Of Winter's arrows with my withered leaves,
Lone, withered leaves!
The song, alas! a mournful dirge must be,
Whose solemn burden is an elegy,
Leaves! withered leaves!

II.

Gone are the roses from the cottage walls,
Gone are the wild flowers from the rural way,
Gone fruit and perfume, gone the sun that calls
The whispering coppice to their peeping play:
My merry brothers, and my sisters fair,
Have only left me dreary fog to wear,
And withered leaves.
The robe I don—sad Melancholy's child—
Hung with the berries of the night-shade wild,
And withered leaves.

III.

In vain the gentle stock-dove comes to me,
In vain the buck and roe may wind my horn,
In vain the robin greets me cheerfully,
In vain I wake to life the buried corn;
The royston crow, decked in his plumage drear,
Wheels round the couch of the bed-ridden Year:
And withered leaves,
Borne on the eddies of the mourning wind,
Depress the spirits of all human kind;
Those withered leaves!

IV.

Yea; such men are: 'tis but a little while
Since these now blooming were but babies small;
And those then men, with haughty form and smile,
Are now all borne to earth, strength, pride, and all!
I, sad November, recollect them well
As buds—as blossoms—fruit:—and when they fell,
Poor withered leaves!
The living multitude danced careless by,
And left them rotting where they rotting lie;
Lone, withered leaves!

Life in the West: Backwood Leaves and Prairie Flowers, &c. &c., and Sketches from the Note-Book of Morleigh in search of an Estate. Post 8vo, cloth. Pp. 363, with Lithographs. Saunders & Otley.

WE have here a clever harum-scarum account of a visit to the United States, which possesses the rare merit of brevity, and of a rapid and brilliant touch; and tells and indicates a great deal more of sense and nonsense than is sometimes found in three times the compass. The author, however, in his dread of wearying his readers, like some facetious companions, becomes occasionally tiresome from an excessive and unabating vivacity. A few papers, which have appeared in one of the periodicals, are somewhat violently thrust into the Western narrative; but as they help to beguile the tedium of the outward voyage, they must be forgiven. The author seems to have roughed it out among Squatters and Indians with great spirit and hardihood; and his adventures among the Lakes and prairies, while in search, real or pretended, of land—a clearing—an estate—exhibit as real a picture of "Life in the West" as we have yet seen. Without following him to the farthest bourne, we select a specimen of his travels which will have some interest at home, as it paints the condition of different groupes of emigrants whom he encountered in Upper Canada. At Kingston, he relates,— Fell in with a lot of Irish and Scotch emigrants; they had just completed some bright deal-board houses. The men were employed by the Government, and the women were washing their clothes and children. I asked several of them if they had bought any land; they said they had not, and betrayed most lamentable ignorance, not one of the lot knowing the name of the vast lake before them. But this did not surprise me much, as we have a wealthy Yorkshireman and his wife at our hôtel, as ignorant of the country as the babes in the wood. They bore us to death with stupid and unmeaning questions. They expect to find shingle palaces in the woods, and sugar trees, and apple trees, and peaches, and all sorts of fruit trees, and Indian corn, growing wild; and wild turkeys as easily caught as tame ones; and I verily believe, if a Yankee told them it rained "striped pig" in the back settlements, they would believe him—voyons, voyons.

In sailing on Lake Erie, our sketcher was the fellow-passenger of a westward-bound groupe, consisting of persons of different nations.

The boiler-deck is occupied by Dutch emigrants from the old country; they carry their beds and bedding along—pots, pans, and kettles—genuine campers out. The women, round and strong, dressed in good homespun linsey-woolsey, as happy as the day is long. Not so the English emigrants forward; they have neither beds nor bedding, nor cooking apparatus, nor utensils; to be sure they seem to have some heavy chests and trunks, but their baggage is all roped and nailed down as if they were never to be opened again; while the women, in tight printed-calico dresses and tight stays, looked washy and discontented. One young couple, from Lincolnshire, said they did not fear the ague, as they had both of them had the "hager" at home in the fens; another poor woman, from Somersetshire, had actually brought out her seven children, the eldest of them a girl of fourteen or fifteen, the rest young and feeble. She said she was going to join her husband, who was a stone-mason in good business at Madison, in Wisconsin. I asked her if she knew whereabouts Madison was; she answered, "Close to Lake Michigan, and near Chicago." Having purchased a map of Wisconsin, I soon undeceived her, and pointed out the nearest road to Madison, which is at least seventy miles inland from Lake Michigan. I was glad to find this poor woman profited by the hint, as I afterwards met her with her family at Madison.

The unlucky speculators whom our traveller encountered, far exceeded in number those who had prospered; though the prosperous men are not those who seek to sell their farms. The real or pretended quest of land brought him into contact with many strange characters. While at Chatham on the Thames, his host informed him of a famous farm for sale. He had already been frequently disappointed; but off again he set upon the hunt.

I started on foot, through the New Wood road, full of stumps, and logs, and other little impediments. The air was oppressively close, and the dense woods on either side echoed with the buzzing of musquitoes and flies; the occasional shrill note of a woodpecker varying at intervals the dull hum-drum of the insects. By the time I had walked about four miles, I felt as weary and depressed as if I had marched thirty; and, allured "by the smoke that so gracefully curled," deviated from the rough-hewn track, and entered the brush and stumps of a new settler.

A short distance from the road, I found a tall, gaunt, wild-looking man, presiding over or feeding a huge fire of logs and brushwood. Exposed alike to the heat of the fire and the rays of the sun, the man's face seemed half baked; but it was easy to see he had not been always a labourer. There was an energy almost amounting to impatience in his movements, and firm and contemptuous curling of the upper lip, which spoke the rage of the inward man, at the purgatorial state it was doomed to before its time.

"You seem to have a fatiguing job, my friend," said I, sitting down on a log, sans ceremonie.

The burner muttered some reply, which was lost in the hissing and crackling of the flames, as with half-averted face he continued his labours. Again I opened my fire, and inquired if he knew where the H——'s lived; this drew a more reasonable reply, and I soon learned the history of the man before me.

He was an Old Country man, of course; had been in affluent circumstances, married, outrun the constable—bankrupt. Creditors and friends raised a fund from the residue of his shattered fortunes, which enabled him to emigrate with his wife and six children—a disastrous voyage—delays at Quebec and Montreal—illness of his wife and children—arrival in the land of promise—capital all expended en route. Rented a house in the town; went into the woods to look for his lot, got fever and ague, and finally got into the hands of a speculator, who rented or let him the same wood lot for four years—conditions hard enough, clearing land for another man in the midst of a wilderness, with permission to sell fire-wood to his neighbours; to mend the matter, his log-house was burnt one night, and one of his children injured.

He pointed to a hovel which had escaped my notice; he said his family lay there at night—at present they were "out in the woods, looking for berries to satisfy their hunger," and concluded a chapter of accidents by revealing a deep ulcer in one of his legs. A tree had fallen upon him when he first began to wield the axe; he was alone in the woods, and was jammed down under the tree for the best part of a day, his leg miserably crushed; sores and ulcers formed, which he could not heal."

"By my sole exertions I have built up another log-house," said the poor fellow; "the rude walls are standing, but the most difficult part of the job, the roofing-in, I despair of completing before the winter."

Pondering upon the hapless lot of this unhappy man I wended my way across a rough corduroy road and rude attempt at a log-bridge, over a vile, stinking pond or slough, redolent in marsh miasma, and putrid air, and swarms of flies. A little beyond this romantic piece of ornamental water, I found my farm, or the sixty acres of clearing in woods, which I had walked so far to see. This farm had been cleared by the united exertions of three brothers—Old Country men, of course; they had expended, according to their own showing, about one thousand pounds already; they had oxen, and farm-servants, and horses, and cows, and a loggery and small frame-house; in short, it was easy to see how they had expended their money. As yet the ground was as full of stumps as ever it could stick—beech, butter-nut, oak, hemlock, and some pine. They thought they had done wonders; for my own part, when I looked at the dense wall of forest which surrounded their little clearing, I thought by the time they had cleared the half of their five hundred acres, they would sink, sore and sorry old men. They dug wells for water once a-week at least, and let their cattle live on browse in the woods.

All they asked for their land, cleared and uncleared, was six hundred pounds, with which they said they would move into the home district. They were bachelors to boot, and wanted wives.

"Why don't ye go into Chatham," said I, "and take wives from that flourishing little town?"

"The Chatham girls look very high, and give themselves so many airs," said one.

"And they have no fortunes," said another.

"And the girls think they are fortunes in themselves in the country," said a third.

I wished these fortune-hunters good evening, and wished they might find young ladies with fortunes, romantic enough to prefer the solitude of their log-cabin, and log road, stump fields, and sweet piece of water, to the busy "hum of life," and a chance of sometimes seeing a new face, even in that outskirt of civilisation—Chatham.

The next survey was sixteen miles from Chatham, and he still had no better luck.

We halted upon the banks of the river, and forthwith walked through some well-cleared fields, backed by heavily timbered woods of black walnut and white oak. The fields of grass and weeds told a tale of misery and woe: the proprietor of the farm had been compromised in the late troubles; had fled into Michigan. His farm lay neglected, and he wanted to sell it. As the property was not actually confiscated, I thought it worth looking at. There were two good log-houses on the premises, one of which had been very unceremoniously taken possession of by an Irish family, who, in the plenitude of laziness and power, were using up the adjacent barn for fuel; besides the frontage to the Thames, this farm was well watered by a small creek running into the Thames through masses of fallen timber. The banks of the river were covered with wild gooseberry trees, laden with fruit, of which we ate, together with wild currants, strawberries, and chokecherries.

"This is the spot for a man with some capital," said my whip, waxing eloquent as he satisfied his appetite with wild fruit. "This is the wholesome place—far better than Chatham," continued he; "and if you really want a farm, you may speed farther and fare worse. I would advise you, Sir," said he, "to lose no time about concluding the bargain; for, after all, who knows but the owner may put it up to auction, and then it will bring twice as much as he asks."

Instead of taking this kind advice, the purchaser started for London by the "London Mail," which just then came in sight; a lumbering spring-wagon, laden with featherbeds and boxes.

"Do you call this lumbering wagon the mail?" said I, same time pointing to a grand placard upon a barn door, announcing the fares and hours of departure of the royal mail, headed with a woodcut of a fine open coach full of ladies and gentlemen, and drawn by horses at full gallop.

"Mail's ready to start," said the coachee, tucking up his long blouse; and, pulling out a tin trumpet, he favoured us with a whine, groan, and squeak, swinish enough to have roused all the pigs in the parish.

The host asked us into his parlour, and while his wife prepared dinner, he served up a dish of personal adventures and hair-breadth 'scapes, not unfrequently met with in the backwoods. He was an American born, of an enterprising turn; had travelled far—been to the western country—the far west; spoke loudly about the flat-foot Indians, the Crows, Sauks, and Foxes; passed lightly over that part of his eventful history that wafted him from the far side of the Mississippi, with his wife and daughter, to his present location as tavern-keeper in Upper Canada. He merely rented the tavern and a few acres; the situation was picturesque, and he had improved the place: his garden, his melon patch, his Indian corn, his onions, his beans—everything seemed flourishing.

"Have you seen Prince since you arrived?" he inquired of my whip.

"Noa," replied the whip; "but I hopes he 's well."

"Come and see him," replied the host, as he led the way into a small yard, and, lifting up his voice, hallooed, 'Prince, Prince, my Prince! come out, come out! and, smile upon your humble visiters."

A grunt was the response; and presently forth marched a round corn-fed Berkshire boar, turning up his snout most disdainfully, while the host presented his majesty with a handful of green-corn cobs.

Notwithstanding the favourable appearance, considerable elevation above the Thames, and some old cleared farms in the vicinity, the host assured me the country was far from being healthy. "We have suffered more sickness since we have been here," said he, "than I ever experienced in the States. We have had fevers of all sorts; my eldest boy is only just recovering from a congestive fever. My wife and daughter have had fever and ague here; I myself, with all my partiality to this place," continued he, "have almost resolved to quit it. Every summer I am attacked with a fever, which hangs about me; and even now I am not free from it; the slightest scratch on the skin festers and becomes a sore immediately. Look at my foot: my great toe, chafed a little by a tight shoe, has swollen as big as my fist, and I am forced to limp about in this old slipper. You saw that young woman who attended you at dinner: I brought her here in rude health from Detroit; now she is sickly enough to be a burden, instead of a help. Ho! Matildiana; how is your head, gal?"

"Better, sir," responded the maid.

"What are you doing, gal?"

"Lying down on the bed; I felt pretty ugly just now."

"Well, stay quiet, gal, and I'll give you oil by and by; that will make you pretty smartish, I guess."

This dialogue between master and maid did not restore my confidence in the salubrity of the country.

The following piece of good advice to emigrants may not be wholly thrown away:—

The town of Goderich stands on a high bank, above the lake; it has a bleak and exposed appearance; and, as at Chatham, I felt inclined to exclaim against the building mania that seems to possess Old Country people. Instead of establishing themselves in the woods, they expend their capital upon houses and stones in the town, and, so far from improving their condition by emigration, they are frequently worse off in those new colonial towns, than in the old established towns at home. For my own part, I cannot conceive what the people would be at—huddling together, bag and baggage, into every bit of cleared swamp, cut up, gridiron-wise, into streets and lanes, in which the poor devils purchasing lots are invited to build houses, and establish another thriving new town. If people must, and will live together like a swarm of bees in a hive, they ought to thrust themselves into the midst of Manchester, Birmingham, or London, where they may enjoy all the bustle of life, and be fooled to the top of their bent, without running the risk of crossing the Atlantic in a rotten vessel, and seeking society in the back woods of North America. The winters are said to be very severe here, especially when the winds sweep over the half-frozen lake.

Our traveller chanced to be at Detroit when the Erie steamer was burnt on Lake Erie on her passage up the lake. One of the few survivors of that dreadful accident gave an account of the catastrophe. There were many German and Swiss emigrants on board; of whom he told, that "they began to jump overboard like sheep; and as fast as they got into the water, the paddle-wheels made mash of them."

He described the most heart-rending scenes—women tying children round them—young men and girls jumping overboard, hand-in-hand. Finally, he scrambled upon part of the paddle-box, and jumped into the water, so as to escape from the wheel. Fortunately, he could swim; struck out from the burning mass, and got hold of a floating bench, on which he rested, while he saw the Erie, like a floating volcano, wheel round in her mad career, and return in his direction. This he described as being the most horrible part of the affair. To avoid being run down and crushed, he was forced to abandon his plank, and swim, for a long time, till he found the boat keel, with several people clinging to it; he held on also, and saw the Erie sweep past, like a mass of fire, while shrieks, and groans, and yells, told that some miserable wretches were still alive. It is said, two hundred souls, men, women, and children, perished in this dreadful manner. The poor Swiss little calculated upon such a sad catastrophe, when they left their own wild hills and lovely lakes, enduring all the hardship and fatigue of a long sea voyage, to perish thus so miserably, in sight of their land of promise.

Wisconsin had attracted the fancy of the farm or land-hunter; and on his search, he arrived at Chicago, boasted of as "the capital of the Western world;" where he was immediately attacked by a genuine land-agent.

Sundry maps, plans, and prospectuses, having caught my eye in a flashy store window, I halted, and a smart man, in a tight brown frock, black satin stock, and sandy whiskers, invited me to enter his office and inspect his maps, &c., at leisure. He introduced himself as Captain ——, land-agent, &c., wished he could induce me to settle in the country, expatiated upon the beauty, the fertility, and rising prospects of Illinois—"the garden of America, which rivals, as one of our poets says, the garden of Eden," said the captain, jocosely, turning over the leaves of an old account-book.

I thanked the captain for his attention, assured him that I had enough of the old Adam in me to create a hankering after the garden of Eden; assured him it was my intention to devote the residue of my days upon a farm, be it in Illinois or Tongataboo.

The captain proceeded with much gravity to examine his books, papers, and old newspapers.

"The fact is," said he, "there is such a run—such a rush of emigrants, New Englanders, and foreigners, seeking for good locations, that all the land is bought up round this district, with the exception of this quarter section on the north branch, and this one on the lake shore, north of the city by twenty-five miles. But, ha! ay, here I fix it at last—the colonel has a property, an estate, a park, a residence fit for a nobleman or gentleman to reside on, but, most unhappily, I believe he has already disposed of his estate," said the captain. "Excuse me, sir," said he, seizing his hat, "I'll run and ask the colonel to step this way."

The captain disappeared, and presently returned, followed by a tall, severe, and yellow-visaged gentleman, loosely attired in dingy white, or whitey-brown linen shooting-jacket and pants. The captain introduced this gentleman to me, hoping we would become sworn brothers.

The colonel extended his brawny sinewy fist, and clutched mine. Compliments being passed, the colonel declared he would as soon part with the apple of his eye, his right hand, or any other indispensable member of his outward man as his prairie-farm and wood-lots belonging thereto; but dire necessity compelling, he was regularly tree'd, and would surrender to fate, and fate alone. He had chosen this farm while in command of some troops, assisting the Indians to evacuate the premises. Smitten with the beauty of the spot, he built a house thereon, bought the land at government price, improved it, inclosed it; and all that he asked for it was, three dollars and one-half per acre. He calculated the timber lots would pay the purchase-money, seeing that timber was only four dollars a cord in Chicago, and his lot was not more than twenty miles from town.

I resolved to see the colonel's farm at once. He would have put off the visit for a day or two, but I was anxious to see it.

The farm was examined; but, notwithstanding the mansion, the traveller would not come to terms. The intending purchaser was accompanied by a son of the Colonel's, and accompanied over the grounds by a Squire, his neighbour.

"Pray where is the house, squire?" said I, jumping into his buggy, and leaving the young gentleman to follow at leisure.

"The house," said the squire, "ought to be down here. We'll soon find it, I calculate." Then, whipping his horse, we drove right through some thick brush and underwood for some rods, and pulled up at a low railing in front of a deserted log-hut. The door was unlatched, and creaked to and fro as the wind sighed through the broken windows; wild flowers and briers grew over the threshold. At the rear of this little edifice a patch of potatoes and some Indian corn had been trampled down by cattle, decayed and withered; a deep hole, where water might have been discovered once, was called the well, by the colonel's son, who vapoured a great deal because the hall-door was open; but, as the squire coolly remarked, "It was of no consequence whether the door was open or shut, for, save and excepting three or four shelves, the house could lose nothing by the entry of thieves, or, peradventure, a prairie wolf, seeking a night's lodging."

This latter animal, the squire declared to be the scourge of the prairie, killing his lambs and sheep, his hens and pigs, in spite of all his dogs and vigilance. We drove on through the brush, and entered the prairie; the colonel's farm seemed strangely cramped and cornered in by square fields and the worm-fences of his neighbours; in fact, this garden of Illinois seemed to me the least picturesque bit of dreary flat I had ever seen. "What the deuce can a man gain by confining himself in a corner of Illinois, upon a prairie surrounded with fences?" thought I. The prairie I had pictured to myself—a vast and almost boundless plain, broken only by wild ravines and clumps of trees; but fences, and rail-fences, and squares, and blocks, and sections, and quarter-sections—such gridiron improvements may be found everywhere at home; and I have felt as much in the country on Chalk Farm or Hampstead heath as on this prairie, in the wilds of Illinois.

Our friend, we suspect, left America landless. He put himself a good deal out of his way, and to considerable personal trouble and some peril, to be present at the annual payment of the Indians by the agents of the United States Government. The most remarkable circumstance of this tumultuary if picturesque affair, was the eloquent declamation of a famous chief named Osh Cosh against whisky; though, notwithstanding his exhortations, a good deal of the fire-water was afterwards consumed. After surveying the Colonel's farm, the traveller still pushed westward, and reached a place named Racine in Wisconsin, which, it is prophesied, will become a town of note, rivalling Chicago or Milwakee. His sketches on the way tell a great deal. He travelled by the mail-wagon: his fellow-passengers, a carpenter with a huge tool-chest, and two young ladies of the country.

One of them, a pretty dark-eyed girl, was glib and pert of speech; she bandied jests with the carpenter and driver, silenced them by her volubility, and drove the carpenter to commit himself so far as to sing, or make some abortive effort to squall and groan forth, "I see them on their winding way."

Mount Pleasant Post-office: here we stop to deliver the mail; and the postmaster being out, his wife asks us to enter her house, and eat some wild plums while the letter-bag is emptied on the floor, and the good woman, assisted by the carrier and the carpenter, proceeds to select and sort the letters, two children playing with the same.

"Clara, miss! what are you doing? Take your blackberry-stained fingers off the letters. Do, that's a dear! Give me that letter with the red seal."

"No, I wont, ma.'

"Give it to me for this plum, dear."

"No, I wont, miss—I'll keep it."

"There! lift up the infant; don't you see the state the floor, and the letters, and the newspapers are in?" exclaimed the carrier, as the post-mistress caught up her child, and the young ladies eating plums held up their hands and exclaimed, "My!"

We have got rid of the carpenter and his box, and proceed gaily over the prairie; but the young ladies have grown very reserved, and the driver's jests fall "flat, stale, and unprofitable." The best part of the prairie lands in this district are settled on or taken up by speculators.

Halt at the house or cabin of a New Englander: he owns about one thousand acres of the prairie, and seems well to do. His wife soon spread out her store of good things before us—fried pork, savoury stew of chicken, prairie-hen, potatoes, &c., tea, coffeee, rich cream, pickles, cheese, cheesecakes, cherry-pie, and excellent bread and butter. Our host regulated our seats at his table with great ceremony :—" Miss Eola Jemima Flatwash—be seated, miss, at my right hand ; Aristibia Mariana Dido—take your stool, miss, to my left ; stranger—sit down, Sir, beside my wife," &c. ; and thus the post-boy and others being adjusted at the table, we fell upon the savoury viands like prairie wolves. Here I met one of my Yankee acquaintances, Abimelech Boels, so altered in his outward man, that I only recognised his guessing voice. Last time I had seen him, he was dressed up full fig, in Buffalo, a regular swell, puffing cigars, and talking like a magnate of the land ; now he was clothed in fustian, sported a vagabond old chip hat, two inches of dismal beard, and drove a team of blind horses in a creaking wagon, laden with a winnowing machine, for cleaning corn.

" I have made a pretty decent speculation," said he, pointing to ' that ar wagon.' " I hired that consarn, horses and yoke, for six York shillings a-day, at Milwakee ; took along the machines, set them a-working for the farmers as was hurried to get their wheat into the market; worked some, and sold some, and now I'm going right back with the wagon."

" I thought you were in the fur trade," said I.

" Well, captain, I'm in the fur trade every winter; but in the spring and fall I fly round a bit, and in summer go loafing north-east, like the best of ye."

Mr. Boels then informed me he had fixed his eye upon a good location near a small lake—a rolling prairie, and some wood lots. He had fixed it, he said, and meant to call in at the Land Office at Milwakee, when he had disposed of his winnowing machine ; and the postman calling out that he was all right, I left my quondam companion in earnest discussion with the host, the beauties and perfections of the winnowing machine being " the one loved theme " and topic of conversation.

Halt for the night beside the Fox river, at the tavern kept by the father of one of our lady passengers. This man has not prospered in the West—the cause of his misfortunes stands close by his humble log-house in the gigantic skeleton of a frame-house, through which the wind groans lugubriously. Instead of buying stock, farming utensils, &c., this unhappy individual has expended his all upon the carpenters and blacksmiths who have erected yon unsightly fabric. He intended to have set up a hôtel in the midst of this rising city of five houses, called Burlington ; a dam was built across the river, a mill set up by speculators, and anon, half the population swept off with congestive fever—the sure and invariable attendant upon new mill-dams in the West.

Both ladies were now dropt, and our traveller and his guide drove onward.

Dined at the house of a thriving New Englander, who, from small beginnings, is now the proprietor of five thousand acres of prairie land ; he has enclosed several fields of Indian corn with ditches instead of rails—more permanent work—answering the double purpose of staying the prairie fire and keeping off cattle ; he has sunk a well, and built stables, barn, and hog-pen, on a large scale; and, like a wise man, lived, up to this, in a simple log and mud cabin. I am really at a loss to know where the good people in this country—this out of the way place—find all the good things they set before travellers, especially the New Englanders ; they seem to live better here than they do at home, and riot in pumpkin pies and all sorts of cakes and meats, savoury stews, &c. ; and, to be sure, wine and strong drink is not to be found on the table, but rich cream, and excellent tea and coffee, fill up the vacuum, and invariably conclude a meal fit for an alderman.

The trifling sum of twenty-five cents, or two York shillings a-head, is the moderate demand for all this—and more, for some travellers smoke the landlord's pipe, and others take gum-ticklers and gin-slings by way of a " chasse café."

Near Black Hawke Grove we discovered a flight of sand-hill cranes ; about thirty of them alighted on the prairie, and went stalking about like grenadiers : they are said to be very good eating. Black Hawke Grove, or the oak opening, situate on a little hill, was the rendezvous of that celebrated Indian chief, when he carried fire and sword through the regions of his forefathers. Near this place he was taken prisoner by stratagem and the treachery, saith my postman, of the Pottawattomers, and sold to General Dodge. Certes, Dodge and his men have dodged the poor Indians out of the land, and we have passed over land enough this day to have maintained all the whites and Indians in the whole territory.

Janesville : here we arrived at last, in the midst of a storm of wind and rain. The hôtel was crowded with wayfaring men ; some were very noisy, talking politics at the bar ; others, gravely discussing the late example that had been made of the horse thieves and gamblers down the river. Twenty had been Lynched into the flood—and if twenty more had been thrown after them it would have been no great loss, say they, for society will purge and purify itself even in a new country.

Not a man spoke in favour of the unfortunate men who had met with such an untimely end ; and a stranger upon the banks of Rock River had better think twice before he declaims against Lynch law. For my own part, I believe some such law is absolutely necessary in a country where the executive moves so slowly that the guilty may easily evade the grasp of justice, seated upon that clumsy and complicated vehicle, yclept the law of the land. Here I am happy to secure a single bed, in the midst of upwards of twenty beds, ranged in the attics of the hôtel—bless the mark !—and slept like a watchman, notwithstanding the deep bass, and shrill treble snorers on every side.

He reached Madison, the infant capital of Wisconsin, and had several adventures, as characteristic of the country as the above, before getting to Milwakee, a right miscellaneous town, with a very good hôtel; of which he says—

Many of the store-keepers, clerks, and single-men lodgers, editors of newspapers, and clericos, board at our house : certes, the charge for bed-room, board, breakfast, dinner, tea, and supper is not very exorbitant —only six York shillings a-day, and everthing in very good style. . . . The rival editors of the Whig and Loco-foco papers board in the house, and lash one another daily in the columns of their papers. One has inserted a paragraph, saying, " that his rival has not paid his board bills ;" the other demands the author of that base calumny, and openly declares his intention to shoot the author of it on the spot, whenever he finds him, and goes about armed for this purpose. Matters in this position, it is somewhat amusing to see the editors sitting balanced on their chairs in the bar, grinning defiance at each other ; one picking his teeth and squirting tobacco-juice and blood on the floor ; the other, fiercely whiffing a cigar, with his heels in the air ; while mutual friends and admirers lounge round, reading their lucubrations and red-hot articles aloud, from the columns of their favourite papers.

There are many Germans and Norwegians at this place; and the servants at the hôtel were German girls. The national songs and hymns of these exiles now mingle with those of the Scottish Highlanders in the air of the Far West, as they march through the Forest in search of a new home.

The tenacity of the true Yankee is proverbial ; and Mr. Lebanon Slope is, we presume, a good specimen. There is, besides, a touch of comedy about him.

This morning all the sportsmen are out shooting wild pigeons ; amongst the rest, my shadow, Lebanon Slope, a young gentleman from Massachusets, who is waiting for a consignment of goods, from New York, for his new store, in which he intends to make a rapid fortune in Whitewater. He heard me speak in praises of the rising little village of Whitewater, the home of his choice, and from that moment we were inseparable. In the woods, I found Mr. Slope at my heels, bleating about Whitewater ; on the lake-shore his shadow was seen in the water. I clambered up the steepest and most impracticable part of the banks, and now, thought I, Mr. Slope must slope at least a mile round before he finds me out again;—not at all; for, lo and behold! Mr. Slope glides up the bank after me, and sitting down, pulls out his knife and whittles away, while he persists there is no place like Whitewater.

"We are all young fellows there, growing up together in the bands of harmony; and in a few years, when the territory becomes a state, we shall be men of weight and consequence; men respected—the patriarchs of the republic. Our names will be engraven upon the tablets of history; it will be recorded that we were the first who dared to establish our free institutions in the wilderness. Come, sir, you are at present little better than a disjointed member of society; join our enterprising gallant band. Go it while you are young, for when you are old you can't."

This was the favourite, and not very elegant finale of Lebanon Slope's harangue. He was a shrewd, clever fellow, and will, I am sure, succeed wherever he is.

The pigeons flew very low, whole flocks skimming over the tops of the bushes, as fast as they arrived from their long flight across Lake Michigan. The townsmen kept up a perpetual fusilade; whenever I fired, Mr. Lebanon Slope fired also, with a pocket pistol, with which he pretended to shoot birds on the wing, and as often as a pigeon fell, he would run forward and grasp it, exclaiming, "There was a shot for you! Go it, while you're young! How slick my ball went through his eye." At one period we had exhausted our wadding, so hot had been the battle, and I was fain to wad down my powder and shot with dried leaves. But Slope was ready to keep up the play, without being beholden to the trees; tearing off his shirt sleeves, he soon made wadding enough for his pistol, and pulling out his shirt bosom and collar, he threw the residue of his shirt to me, exclaiming, "Go it, while you're young!" &c. The poor pigeons are fair game everywhere, but it is when they roost at night they are killed in cart loads, even with poles.

Our readers have by this time perceived that the Far West merits the character which we gave of it at the outset. Its lively style does not one whit impair its usefulness as a guide.

Spiridion: from the French of George Sand. 12mo, cloth. Pp. 320. London: Charles Fox.

This is a spirited translation of the celebrated philosophic, or rather psychological romance, of its remarkable and versatile author. Spiridion, so far as we know, has never before appeared in an English dress. As it contains none of George Sand's ordinary faults, it can offend no one, unless it be those who denounce free inquiry, however dispassionate. Even these may console themselves. Abstract imagination, and metaphysics in romance, are not likely to attract many English readers.

Fulcher's Poetical Miscellany.

A neat little book of selected popular poetry of the serious kind, embellished with pretty portraits of English houses, cottages, parsonages, and churches, such as one meets with in ladies' pocket-books. In short, this is an appropriate and cheap gift-book.

Narrative of a Residence on the Mosquito Shore, with an Account of Truxillo. By Thomas Young. Smith and Elder.

This book, besides giving a description of the fatal coast, contains, to all European emigrants, a silent warning off it, though such is not the author's intention. The Narrative gives a full, and rather curious account of the manners, customs, and superstitions of the native tribes of Indians on these shores.

SERIAL WORKS.

Recreations of Christopher North. Volume II.—In this volume of the Fun and Philosophy, the Wisdom and the Wit, of Christopher, we have The Moors: the Moors of the Highlands of course; a theme as varied and expansive as their wide, ocean-like surface, and as variously treated as the fantastic shadows that flit over them in a breezy day. A Highland snow-storm is part and parcel of the Moors; and what is Our Parish but a lowland moorland, improved and peopled.

An Essay on Sacred Poetry, which many of our readers must remember as the genial criticism of a poet upon the highest uses of Poetry, one indeed of its author's rarest compositions, finds a place in the same volume. These uses, we are eloquently told, are "pleasure, delight, instruction, expansion, elevation, honour, glory, happiness here and hereafter." This is the use and end of all poetry, or it is nothing. By way of extract, we can find nothing more pithy in the volume than the dissection of the vulgar idea of the end of poetry being merely to please. "Is the end of Paradise Lost to please? Is the end of Dante's Divine Comedy to please?" inquires our critic. "Is the end of the Psalms of David to please, or of the Songs of Isaiah? Yet it is probable that poetry has often been injured or vitiated by being written in the spirit of this creed. It relieved poets from the burden of their duty—from the responsibility of their endowments—from the conscience that is in genius. We suspect that this doctrine has borne especially hard on all sacred poetry, disinclined poets to devoting their genius to it—and consigned, if not to oblivion, to night, much of what is great in that magnificent walk. For if the Masters of the Holy Harp are to strike it but to please—if their high aspirations are to be deadened and dragged down by the prevalent power of such a mean and unworthy aim—they will either be contented to awaken a few touching notes of 'those strains that once did sweet in Zion glide'—unwilling to prolong and deepen them into the diapason of praise—or they will deposit their lyre within the gloom of the sanctuary, and leave, unawakened, the soul of music sleeping on its strings.'"

Having demolished Johnson's heresy, that sacred subjects are unfit for poetry, the converse of this chilling canon of criticism is eloquently maintained in a noble passage, of which this is the conclusion, "Christian poetry will outlive every other; for the time will come when Christian poetry will be deeper and higher far than any that has ever yet been known among men. Indeed the sovereign songs hitherto have been either religious or superstitious; and 'as the day spring from on high hath visited us' spreads wider and wider over the earth, 'the soul of the world dreaming of things to come' shall assuredly see more glorified visions than have yet been submitted to her ken. That poetry has so seldom satisfied the utmost longings and aspirations of human nature, can only have been because poetry has so seldom dealt in its power with the only mysteries worth knowing—the greater mysteries of religion, into which the Christian is initiated only through faith, an angel sent from heaven to spirits struggling, by supplications and sacrifices, to escape from sin and death."——After this we cannot, without pause, enter into Christopher's gaieties, however innocent these may be.

Selby's History of British Forest Trees, Indigenous and Introduced. Part XI. This Part finishes the volume and the work, with the history of the common Larch and the Cedar of Lebanon. Of both species there are finely engraved specimens, and the usual embellishments of pretty and appropriate vignettes. In the preface Mr. Selby states, that his work is intended to supply a want which is generally felt, between the high-priced and voluminous "Arboretum et Fruticetum Britannicum" of Loudon, and the more practical and limited treatises of Nicol, Menteith, Sang, &c. This object he has endeavoured to accomplish in as concise a manner as was consistent with the design of not only giving a history or description of every species and its varieties, but of forming a useful manual for the planter and all interested in the culture of trees. How far the author may have accomplished the last of these objects it is not for us to say, though the presumption is strongly in favour of an intelligent country gentleman practically engaged in planting; but we confidently affirm that the more popular department forms of itself an interesting and entertaining book, and a desirable addition to an English gentleman's library.

YARRELL'S HISTORY OF BRITISH BIRDS. Parts XXXII. and XXXIII.—In these Parts we find the different varieties of Grebes, Divers, Guillemots, and Auks, with the Cormorant and the Gannet or Soland Goose. The personal anecdotes are numerous; and the engravings of the different birds possess the same lively truth and fidelity which have distinguished the previous portions of this beautiful series.

SUSAN HOPLEY, OR THE ADVENTURES OF A MAID-SERVANT. Part V. and last.—This interesting story has been so warmly welcomed and highly praised by the press, that not a new word is left for us to say, save that, among its other good qualities, with great cheapness, it combines good paper, and very neat and clear typography, so as to make a very handsome book, at less than one-tenth of the original price.

CHAMBERS'S INFORMATION FOR THE PEOPLE. Part XXII. BRITISH COSTUMES, TIME-KEEPERS, PRINTING, ENGRAVING, &c.—This useful work (in many of its articles very useful) is getting so miscellaneous in character, that we presume it is about drawing to a close.

THE ANNALS OF CHEMISTRY AND PRACTICAL PHARMACY. No. I. Longman and Co.—This promises to be a valuable periodical. It is to be published in weekly numbers; the rapid strides making in Chemical science, both at home and on the Continent, requiring an organ which shall, in some measure, keep pace with the pace of discovery. It is hardly fair, nor yet easy, to pronounce upon any work of this nature from a first number, but if future numbers keep up to the same mark, the work must at once command attention. Of the Articles, which are sixteen in number, some are communicated by eminent chemists of different countries. They are generally of a practical character, and short. Some of them, as a paper on the Nourishment of Plants, by M. Th. de Saussure, are to be continued.

THE GARDENER AND PRACTICAL FLORIST. Part I. Illustrated by Engravings on Wood.

SCHOOL-BOOKS.

BLAND'S LATIN HEXAMETERS AND PENTAMETERS. Simpkin and Marshall.—This Sixteenth Edition has, with the Key, been accurately revised by Mr. J. A. Giles of Windlesham, who pronounces it now immaculate.

PRACTICAL INTRODUCTION TO THE STUDY OF THE GERMAN LANGUAGE, ACCORDING TO THE SYSTEM OF Dr. By Heinrich Apel, late Assistant in King's College, London. Simpkin and Marshall.—This new Grammar written by a practical teacher of his native language in a good English school, ought to have some claims upon the attention of teachers of the German language. Mr. Apel has tested the superiority of the system he adopts by an experience of six years in King's College School.

PAMPHLETS AND TRACTS.

EDINBURGH GRADUATION ADDRESS FOR 1842. ON THE CONDUCT AND DUTIES OF YOUNG PHYSICIANS. By Professor Simpson.—An admirable Sermon this is, not only for the young physician, but for all young men entering upon life in any liberal profession; enforcing upon them the importance of continually adding to their stores of professional knowledge; of forming good and regular habits of study and of business, economizing their time, and methodizing their studies; setting before themselves objects of elevated and generous ambition, eschewing indolence and frivolous pursuits, and resting their hopes of advancement on the only sure foundation, the extent of their professional abilities, and their general good conduct. The following counsel, inculcating independence, prudence, gentlemanly self-respect, and manly self-reliance, is quite as applicable to the young lawyer, author, or artist, as to the young physician. "Rather walk by the steady light of your own lamp, than by the more dazzling, but to you more uncertain lustre borrowed from that of others. The patronage of power and wealth may advance your prospects to some extent; but, without genuine professional talents, they never can advance you far, and they never can advance you with certainty. Let me strongly forewarn you against one frequent error. Young physicians often dream, that by extending the circle of their private acquaintances, they thus afford themselves the best chance of extending their private patients. In following out this chimerical view, much invaluable time is frequently lost; and, what is worse, habits of pleasure and indolence are often, with fatal effect, substituted for those habits of study and exertion that are above all price. No man will, in any case of doubt or danger, intrust to your professional care the guardianship of his own life, or of the lives of those who are near and dear to his heart, merely because you happen to be on terms of intimacy with him. The self-interest of human nature forbids it. To have professional faith and confidence in you, he must respect you in your calling as a physician, and not merely in your character as a social friend and acquaintance. . . . . I repeat, therefore, that if you dream of making patients by making friends, you will utterly delude yourselves, and damage your own prospects. By your undivided devotion to your profession, labour to create for yourselves a sound and just medical reputation; and that reputation will create for you patients."

THE SONGS OF THE MONTHS.

NO. XII.—THE SONG OF DECEMBER.

I.

KEEN hoary frost, and chill sleet, unfold
December, King Death, and Christmas bold;
For close leagued with ye,
I ween are we,
So stern, so jolly, and so cold.
A subtle game for a month we play,
The fools we dupe to the last are gay;
Nor youth, nor manhood, nor age, retain
One thought of the thousands we have slain.
With fierce delight we come once more,
To catch them as we caught before,
And, kicking Autumn o'er the moon,
Whistle the North Wind's wintry tune;
Whistle a tune with the cold, cold breath
Of December, Christmas, and King Death:
Scattering berries red and rare,
So rare, and so red, for Christmas folly;
Finding and filling churchyards bare,
While mirth laughs under the bunch of holly,
Ha! ha!
And the parasite misletoe, ripe and jolly.

II.

Oho! the midnight waits:—do you hear?
King Death in the tempest's breath is near;
And a little mound
Shall hem them round,
Before the daffodils appear.
And they who list to the music's play,
As cosy and warm in bed they lay,
Hearing each note through the snow-storm's hush,
Then losing all in the terrible rush
Of the wind, shall come from their lair,
Forgetful what their musings were;
Then will I change the ruby hue
The feast creates, to ghastly blue;
And while their hot blood is boiling o'er,
Will hurry Death's chill through ev'ry pore;
Scattering fevers red and rare,
So rare, and so red, for Christmas folly,
Finding and filling churchyards bare,
Laughing—we three—'neath the bunch of holly,
Ha! ha!
And the parasite misletoe, ripe and jolly.

III.

The groaning board, and the piled-up fire,
Shall welcome Health to the grave to tyre—
Brave mattock and spade!
They help your trade—
For thousands so expire.
Old Christmas, and I, and Death, return,
To fill with tears the funeral urn,
And leave command for the passing bell,
The Year's decease, with his hopes, to tell:
Proud sires shall wring their hands and sigh,
Fond mothers watch their loved ones die;
Fair daughters weep, and sons deplore
That home, for them, is home no more.
In a masking time we just put on
The fair false visage that others don,
Scatt'ring merriment loud and rare,
So rare, and so loud, for Christmas folly;
Finding for churchyards famous fare,
In those who laughed 'neath the bunch of holly,
Ha! ha!
And the parasite misletoe, ripe and jolly.

IV.

Old friends will gather, as gathered they have,
From distant land and treacherous wave;
In the graceful dance,
Bright eyes will glance,
Loud Glee will chant his stave;
And merry all, as merry can be,
They will drink and joke in company,
Telling old tales, while my storms without,
Pass with an ominous, angry shout;
Yet will they laugh! Another year,
Gayest and fairest disappear:
The circle now so free from pain,
Shall never meet complete again.
Mark, Death!—We meet them by the way,
When their hearts are full—their spirits gay,
Scattering torment hard to bear,
So hard to bear for their Christmas folly;
Finding and filling churchyards bare,
With eyeless skulls from under the holly,
Ha! ha!
And the parasite misletoe, ripe and jolly. J. A. O.

ABEDNEGO THE MONEY-LENDER.

BY MRS. GORE.

(Concluded from page 704 of our November No.)

CHAPTER XVII.

"For five years or more I abided in the East—in splendour and enjoyment a very satrap!—Meanwhile, great revolutions were accomplishing in Europe. Thrones were flung down,—dynasties extinguished. The consequences of the French Revolution had made themselves felt even in the country so belaboured into subordination by the rattan of sceptre and crosier;—and England still trembled to her centre!

"It was not in England, however, I was minded to abide. I hated her hypocritical institutions. I despised her pretended zeal for Christianizing the forms of the world; yet ever gainsaying, by her practices, the spirit of Christianity: persecuting, on pretence of resenting persecution, the wretched remnant of the children of Israel; yet faithless to the holy doctrines of the Cross whenever they traverse her vices or reprove her hardness of heart!

"France, if more a sinner, was at least candid and explicit in her sins; and indifferent, as a naturalized subject of Spain, to the war at that moment proceeding between the Directory and Great Britain, I hurried to Paris, to reap the fruitful harvest of pleasure of my golden sowing.

"At that epoch, society, disorganized by the still recent Revolution, was vibrating with those irregular oscillations which precede the restoration of order. It was the very moment for a man, intent, like myself, upon the lawless pursuit of pleasure, to purchase, at an easy cost, a variety of cumbrous spoils which the recent political convulsions had left masterless.—A princely hôtel in the capital,—a noble country residence, once royal, situated on the wooded shores of the Seine, enabled me to establish myself with a degree of magnificence more than rivalling that of the Fermiers Généraux flourishing under the auspices of monarchical corruption. All that was left of aristocracy in Paris crowded to my fêtes, to luxuriate in a renewal of sensual pleasures long withheld from their enjoyment. Half of the Almanach des Gourmands, Basil, was composed upon the strength of experiments made in my kitchen;—and the last effective notes of Garat were uttered in my Salle de Concert!

"No need to corrupt your unsullied imagination, boy, by the description of my effeminate pleasures! They were such as Sardanapalus might have envied;—they were such as the ghost of the Maréchal de Richelieu should have risen to share;—they were such, that (experience having instructed me in the finite and transient nature of physical enjoyment, and the ennui that follows it like a spectral shadow) I have since discerned a charm in privation and abstinence, as a contrast to the wearisome repletion of former days.

"Still, while it lasted, that bewilderment of tumultuous pleasures was indeed intoxicating!—The first artists, wits, and men of letters of the day, crowded into my gilded saloons; even as, before and since, they beset the antechambers of royalty. Among others, Talleyrand, the cynical ex-bishop, and high-bred, future prince, was my frequent companion; and in our luxurious seclusion, what epigrams did we not vent upon the servilities of the human race,—what blasphemies against all creeds and faiths, save that of—the Golden Calf!

"Amid this chaos of political and moral disorganization arose the Consulate and Napoleon!—I took little heed of politics. An avowed Epicurean, I cared only for peace or war as an obstacle or facilitation to my pleasures; and though war becomes a bitter penalty in barren England,—compelled to seek from the Continent all her accessories of sensual enjoyment,—self-sufficing, fertile, joyous France, looks upon the closing of her ports without anxiety. I rejoiced among the rest, however, when Consular negotiation brought about a cessation of hostilities between the rival countries; for it filled me with glorious hopes to witness the arrival of those shoals of English travellers who never fail to rush to Paris, when occasion serves, for flinging aside their pall of national gloom.

"What triumph to deny them access to my house!—What delight to tantalize them with exclusion from the brilliant hospitalities of the wealthy Spaniard; for I was now redeemed from one species of obloquy.—In Paris, religion had ceased to obtain mention from lips polite. Osalez the Jew would have been neither more nor less to them than Osalez the Gheber; and whether I worshipped the God of Christians, or the god Fo, was a matter of indifference to those who quaffed my Sillery and tasted my Salmis.—Even the name of Osalez had, however, become so distasteful to me, from its connexion with my misfortunes, that, from the moment of settling in Paris, I assumed that of Clerval, derived from the estate I had purchased on my naturalization.

"Even as I had predicted, scarcely were the fêtes given for the celebration of the Peace of Amiens (of which those of the Hôtel de Clerval were by far the most gorgeous) at an end, when I was beset with applications from English aristocrats aspiring to the honour of my acquaintance, and access to my gallery and table. Having visited Paris to amuse themselves, they seemed to care little at whose cost they were amused.

"I had no fear of recognition. The burning sun of the East, and the habits of a luxurious satrap, had so thoroughly effaced from my feature all trace of the boy-member, whom their levity had formerly coughed down, as to place an irreconcileable incongruity between the presumptuous Jew of Cadiz and Clerval the Millionary.—I was accounted in Paris the finest of fine gentlemen.—Having formed an intimacy in the East with the beautiful Mrs. Grant, now the graceful and popular wife of Talleyrand, Monsieur de Clerval was considered to occupy, in the fashionable circles of Neuilly, Raincy, and Rambouillet, the posts engrossed by the libertine Duc de Lauzun prior to the Revolution.

"On the other hand, my enormous wealth constituted a rock against which innumerable shallow vessels, launched upon the deceptious sea of Pleasure by fool-hardy London, were successively split to pieces. Wherever they attempted competition with the opulent Clerval, whether as regarded financial speculation, or the briefer madness of the gaming-table, ruin ensued. I retained my prodigious funds in a floating and tangible form: nor was it by means of mortgages or annuities I had to meet the pretensions of the enervate lordlings who presumed to confront me in my path, instead of treading at an humble distance in my footsteps. What chance, therefore, I entreat you, had the empty fops of White's, whose capital was contained in the embroidered note-book in their waistcoat pockets, against one who, in the days when Rothschilds were not, was able to influence, by his financial operations, half the money-markets in Europe?

"Among the first who fell a prey to my strength of courage and purse at the gambling-table, was the husband of the elder of those insolent sisters of the object of my affection, by whose malice my early hopes had been so cruelly blighted.—Lord Willesden, (suffer me to conceal under that designation the title of my victim,) was one of those self-sufficient profligates who, on the pavement of St. James's Street, acquire the authority of a potentate. Arriving in Paris with Charles Fox, flushed by his previous triumphs at White's, and insolent with the favour of Carlton House, the London puppy affected, in the first instance, the same air of defiance, when dining at Legacq's or the Pavillon de Hanovre, to which his recognised position in his own country lent at least some colour.—For a time he affected to brave the man he could not aspire to surpass;—nor was it till he had lost five thousand livres to me on parole, that he was forced to recognise my superiority.

"Heartbroken by his system of profligacy, Lady Willesden was now a confirmed invalid, and rarely quitted her hôtel. We had, consequently, never met; but her lord (launched in the full career of dissipation, affording hope to the Parisians that a new Phœnix was arising from the ashes of their former dissoluteness) was my constant associate.

"Six weeks after his arrival in Paris, Lord Willesden was a ruined man,—ruined beyond hope,—beyond redemption! His estates, his houses, his plate, his jewels, were pledged to those to whom I furnished the funds, destined to flow back, a refluent Pactolus, into my golden coffers.—Hazard and roulette had made the haughty aristocrat my slave!—My foot was upon his neck, and upon the neck of his children's children!—At that period, Basil, I was stern of heart as some devastating monster of antiquity!—Cruelty was my luxury,—revenge my pride!—But that cruelty had been engendered by evil entreatment; and it was perforce of scourging and torture that my nature waxed so hard!

"I now possessed a thousand advantages over the people by whom I had been persecuted into wickedness, and not one of them was neglected.—Every night, when I retired to my luxurious couch, and ground my teeth in ecstasy over the recollection of the day's pleasures, it was, indeed, an enhancement to them to reflect, that not a mischief I was working but conveyed anguish to the bosom of the countrymen by whom I had been so unjustly reviled.—Those who had 'spat upon my Jewish gaberdine' were making heavy atonement for the fault. I now trampled upon them in my turn. Talk of a bed of roses, Basil Annesley!—Commend me to the couch whose pillows are inflated by the swelling sighs of a prostrate enemy;—to the slumbers soothed by the murmurs of ——"

He paused!—An involuntary shudder betraying the disgust of his companion had startled him into silence. But it was too late. The innate prejudice, long dormant in the soul of Basil, involuntarily retraced these workings of malice to the Jewish origin of Osalez.—For the first time, the young man beheld in his companion a legitimate descendant of the tribe who drove nails into the hands and feet, and pierced the side of the meek Jesus of Nazareth!

So forcibly was this feeling of estrangement depicted in the countenance of the young man, that, in resuming his narrative, Abednego hazarded no further reference to the animosities by which his vengeance had been actuated.

"Suffice it," he resumed, in a milder tone of voice, "that, while realizing in the more refined West the warm imaginings of a luxurious Oriental, I did not lose sight of those still profounder passions, and keener anticipations, engendered by the cold-blooded persecutions of English pride.

"Lord Willesden had become my puppet. The fastidious London coxcomb moved only at my beck and bidding. But though he was my daily guest,—sometimes at my brilliant hôtel, sometimes at my princely country seat,—I scrupulously abstained from entering his doors. My pretext for declining his invitation was the infirm health of Lady Willesden, and a disinclination to intrude upon the sober domesticities of an invalid fireside; by which means I contrived to excite an interest in my favour in the mind of the afflicted wife.—My indulgence as a creditor, and liberality as an associate, as yet prevented all rumours of her husband's new follies and prodigalities from reaching her ears; and hearing of Monsieur de Clerval only as a hospitable host, a paragon of refinement courted in the best society, she felt grateful for the deference which kept him aloof from her impoverished seclusion.

"Though vain and dissolute, Willesden was fond of his wife,—that is, fond of her after the selfish fashion of the mere egotist. It would have been a relief to him, had he left her behind him in England, to have suddenly received tidings of her decease. But he could not bear to see her suffer. Conscious of the injuries he was inflicting upon her and her children, he shrunk from the spectacle of her altered countenance.—The more ill and enfeebled she became, the deeper he plunged into excesses that banished all recollection of his embittered home.

"One morning, he entered my breakfast-room earlier than usual, and throwing himself into a causeuse, began to execrate, in his ordinary strain, his ill-luck of the night before.

"'It is all Maria's fault,' cried he. 'The foolish woman fancies it disturbs her to hear the porte cochère open in the dead of night; and protests she lies awake awaiting the signal of my return home. By these means, she has exacted a promise from me not to remain out after three; and the consequence is that, last night, just as the luck began to turn in my favour, I was forced to quit the table.'

"'You were quite right,' said I, adhering to my system of deference towards his wife's exactions. 'No occasion to become a brute because you are a roué. What are a few thousand livres more or less compared with an additional pang, inflicted on a suffering woman, already more than sufficiently injured?'

"Willesden never liked his wife less than when I affected to defend her cause. 'Confound the whole sex and their united injuries!' was his brutal rejoinder. 'It becomes you, forsooth, Clerval, to advocate the cause of these charming martyrs. Unshackled by the iron fetters of lawful wedlock, you behold in them a bevy of angels. My dear fellow, the mere saunterer in a garden beholds the roses in their bloom, worships their beauty and sweetness; but the proprietor, who is fated to see the leaves fall one by one, leaving only a thorny, useless haw behind, is apt to find his enthusiasm evaporate. N'importe! my matrimonial prospects are brightening! Next week, I shall be at liberty to observe the sun rise where and how I please.—My wife's sister is coming over from England to nurse her. Maria has been despatching, I suspect, such doleful accounts of my neglects, that her family consider it necessary she should be better cared for!'

"Judge, Basil, how the blood, which for a moment had receded to my heart, leaving my guilty cheeks colourless, rushed anew to my face when Lord Willesden, in answer to my almost breathless inquiries, acquainted me with the name of his expected visitant. Yes! It was herself,—it was the object of my first and only attachment! The husband, I thanked Heaven, was not to bear her company: his military duties rendering it impossible for him to leave England.—She was to come alone, as the affectionate attendant of her dying sister.

"Never shall I forget the tumultuous nature of my feelings during the remain[illegible] of the day on which this intelligence was comm[illegible] as a [illegible] The ground appeared unsteady under [illegible]e atmosphere too light to satisfy my respiration.—I scarcely knew how to meet the singular occasion that presented itself for the gratification of the hungry vengeance I had been cherishing like some beast of prey in the darksome depths of my soul.

"A few more days, and she arrived. With assumed carelessness did I proceed to question Lord Willesden concerning his sister-in-law; and with apparent indifference I heard that she had been wedded against her will, and was a repining wife and unexulting mother.

"'Thank Heaven,' was Willesden's concluding phrase, 'she will be content to devote herself to the sick-room.—Though still in the prime of life, poor soul, the world has ceased to attract her.—So long as she can be induced to remain here, therefore, I am at liberty to divert myself to my heart's content.'

"From that moment, my influence over Willesden was exercised with wholly different views. Affecting deep compassion for the position in which he had placed his children, I was constantly preaching reformation. Aware of the feebleness of his nature, I was certain that every time his fair sister-in-law pleaded the cause of his injured family, or implored him to renounce his fatal propensity for play, he would exclaim, 'You are almost as great a bore as Clerval!—Just such are the arguments which my friend is perpetually using! Clerval protests that a husband and father has no pretext for indulging in vulgar libertinism.'

"I was careful, nevertheless, while figuring in the novel character of a Mentor, not to neglect the care of my reputation as a man of gallantry.—The sick-room of Lady Willesden was frequented by the Duchess of Gordon, and half-a-dozen other Englishwomen of rank, who glittered in the gay world of Paris during the brief cessation of hostilities between the two countries; and I spared no pains to render my name a constant topic of discussion in their fastidious circle. Never had fêtes excited so supreme a sensation as those which I devised to dazzle the eyes of my unsuspecting countrywomen,—never was exclusiveness so insolent as that which I affected concerning their admittance within my gates.—Sometimes, those gates unclosed for the diversion of hundreds of guests, who were fêted with the prodigality and fancifulness of some Arabian tale. Sometimes, the number of the favoured was limited to a single fortunate group,—and not a syllable allowed to transpire of the nature of the entertainment, of which the amount of the cost was alone cited by the envious; till, like Louis XIV., I was honoured by the frivolous beauties of the day with the name of 'The Enchanter.'

"My object was speedily accomplished. I learnt from Willesden that my peculiarities excited considerable curiosity in his family circle.

"'Lady Willesden seems revived as by a miracle, by her sister's arrival!' said he one day as we were dashing back to Paris from the Château de Clerval, at the utmost speed of a set of fine English horses, to be in time for the opera; 'and the first symptom of her reviving health is her inquisitiveness about yourself. These women want to make your acquaintance, Clerval. When will you come and dine with me?'

"With sudden reserve, I pleaded old-standing engagements for a fortnight to come; and Willesden being perfectly aware that many of these were of my own creation, the sensitiveness of an embarrassed man attributed my reluctance to join his little circle to the distress of his fireside, and the defects of an unaccomplished cook.

"'I am aware,' he retorted, 'that I have nothing to attract an Amphytrion like yourself. Nor should I have presumed to invite Monsieur de Clerval, the gastronome, to fast at my humble board, but for the importunity of my sister-in-law, who is eager to make your acquaintance. Your munificence as a patron of the arts (of which she has taken it into her flighty head to become a votary, to console herself, I suppose, for the disappointments of defeated affections) have strangely excited her interest in your favour.'

"I bowed and smiled, but made no move towards conciliating the wish thus intimated. On the contrary, the plainer his hints the more resolutely I kept aloof. At length, alarmed lest he might estrange me from himself by further pertinacity, Lord Willesden ceased to importune me to visit his house; and my firmness served only to augment the restless curiosity of those against whose peace my manœuvres were concocted. But I had seen her again. From my box at the opera, in the public promenades, I had beheld the object still and ever dearest to my heart; and the sight of her did but still further stimulate my projects of vengeance. She had now attained the full maturity of womanly charms. The lovely girl of eighteen had become the beautiful and commanding woman of thirty. How beautiful, the admiration she attracted, whenever seen by glimpses in the society of Paris, sufficiently attested; how beautiful, the tumults of my own distracted heart, as I hurried on such occasions from her presence, afforded a far more painful proof. Unrestrained in all other pursuits and inclinations, the caution and self-control I was forced to observe in this, served only to augment the force of my passion. I was becoming madly and desperately in love,—far more desperately than when, with the purer fervour of boyhood, I wooed her to become my bride.

"I appreciated too highly, Basil, the gentle nature of that beloved being, to suppose it possible the mere dazzlements of vanity would suffice for her captivation. I knew that she must respect the man, as well as admire the patron, before the brilliant Clerval created any serious impression on her feelings. To effect this, I contrived that, in all her little acts of charity, my name should reach her as beforehand with her in the duties of benevolence. She could not extend her hand to the orphan or the widow, but she encountered mine already outstretched in mercy. Many of these instances were mere clap-traps, got up to attract her notice. By the aid of money, Basil, anything may be manufactured to order,—even 'Cases of extreme distress;'—and little did that humane woman suspect that the wants she fancied herself to be relieving were as much an effort of art as the scenery of the Grand Opera."

"I scarcely conceive, Sir," suddenly interrupted Basil Annesley, "the advantage likely to arise to either of us from these confidences. If an effusion of penitence, it is not for me to grant you absolution; if a matter of vaunt, as I would fain retain some respect for my benefactor, I entreat you to refrain from avowals which are gradually exciting my disgust."

"Hear me to an end," cried Abednego. "I address you neither in a tone of boastfulness nor of whining remorse; but as a man, having wrestled hand to hand with the sorest temptations and trials of life, willing to impart to one he dearly loves the fatally-earned fruits of his experience!—All I can do to favour your squeamish tenderheartedness, is to pass over briefly the snares with which I encompassed the path of my destined victim,—sometimes hoping, but oftener despairing of success. But if unable a second time to conquer her affections, I was resolved at least to humble her pride.

"Spring was in its prime, when I announced one of those gorgeous entertainments which, once in every month, used to set the fashionable world of Paris into commotion. It was to be a daylight fête at my château on the Seine; and a flotilla of Venetian barges, long in preparation, was launched for the purpose of conveying my guests to the landing stairs. It was speedily rumoured among the invited, that not a single English person was to be included among the guests of Monsieur de Clerval; and though Willesden, my constant companion, flattered himself that, as a matter of course, an exception would be made in his favour, I took an early opportunity to inform him that, having an especial object for my Fête des Lilacs, I was forced to exclude him among the rest of the English pretendants.

"Though evidently nettled by my communication, Willesden was too deeply my debtor to hazard a syllable of remonstrance. Attributing the word 'object' to some reigning lady of my thoughts, he ventured to banter me concerning the mysterious liaison demanding such vast concessions; and I replied in terms of romantic gallantry, which, I justly surmised, would be repeated by his fireside, and serve only to excite a new interest in my favour.

"Without intending it, Willesden was constantly betraying to me the fruition of my schemes. I found that I was a perpetual subject of discussion at his house. While informing me how often he was forced to become my champion with his wife and sister, his silly vanity exposed far more than he intended. He did not disguise from me how grievously his lovely guest was mortified to find herself excluded from the only house in Paris she had the slightest curiosity to enter.

"I looked grave; and when Lord Willesden again approached the subject, abstained wholly from his society—and even issued orders for his non-admission to my house;—nay, if we met, by chance, in the Bois de Boulogne, I assumed so cold and [illegible] countenance, that the poor man was [illegible] the wrath he had provoked.

"Though [illegible]

"The amount of I O U's, and bonds, bearing his signature, in my strong-box, rendered it unsafe for him to give offence to one so potential. Had I not reason for self-gratulation?—Abednego the Jew had reduced the insolent English peer to the most abject subservience!

"By degrees, he was compelled to assume a still viler attitude. The embarrassment of his affairs rendered a further levy of money indispensable; and not a banker could be found to assist him. Thus circumstanced, in a foreign country, the straits to which he was reduced became alarming: but I had so often obliged him, and had of late assumed so forbidding a countenance, that to me he dared not apply. Little suspecting that the whole affair was of my contrivance, he met me in the world as though nothing had occurred;—nor was it till the humiliation of finding his wife and guest on the eve of becoming homeless, drove him to the application, he once more addressed me in the subdued tone of a suppliant.

"Before the request had half escaped his lips, it was granted: nay, the amount of the loan he desired was trebled, and forced upon him; till, in the exuberance of his gratitude, Lord Willesden would, I verily believe, have subscribed to any terms his creditor saw fit to propose.

"'Do not perplex yourself about such a mere trifle!' said I,—'I am only too happy to assist you. If you wish, my dear Willesden, to oblige me in your turn, all I have to ask is, that you will admit me, as a friend, into your family circle, in spite of any remonstrances that may be addressed to you by Lady Willesden and her sister.'

"'Remonstrances?' repeated the astonished Willesden. 'Why, I have been hinting to you for the last six weeks the earnest desire of the latter to make your acquaintance.'

"'The lady's good intentions may subside after she has seen me. Besides, I shall not be satisfied with the concessions of mere acquaintanceship. The object of my ambition is, to stand preëminent in her favour.'

"'In that case, my dear Clerval, I cannot flatter you with much prospect of success,' replied Willesden, somewhat embarrassed. 'Though unhappy in her marriage, she is incapable of losing sight of her duties as a wife and mother.'

"'Of course!—All your English ladies are so rigid in their principles—so correct in their conduct,—that one cannot but wonder how such libels as divorce bills are suffered to go unpunished.'

"'I am not vaunting the virtue of my sister-in-law,' replied Lord Willesden; the blood mantling in his sallow cheek, convincing me that nothing but his obligations towards me prevented him from knocking me down. 'She has no heart to bestow. In early life, she formed a low connexion, the effects of which, my poor wife assures me, she has never been able to throw off.'

"It was now my turn to flush with anger; and the insolence of the noble insolvent confirmed me in my evil projects.

"'No one is able to calculate upon the caprices and fantasticalities of woman's nature,' said I. 'All I ask of you is a solemn promise that, whatever ungraciousness may be testified towards me by Lady Willesden and her sister, you will not deny me access to your house.'

"'Deny you access?' cried his lordship. 'You,—my best friend,—my benefactor!—You, who throughout the winter I have been courting as a guest?—Absurd!'

"'Absurd perhaps. But having hitherto resisted your pressing invitations, I will not even now accept them, unless under a written guarantee that my welcome is secured.'

"After the numberless obligations he had signed in my favour, this appeared a trifling concession; and laughing heartily at my squeamishness, Lord Willesden entered readily into what appeared to be a joke, by drawing up a paper ensuring me access to his house at all hours, and under all possible circumstances.

"I conclude that, with certain modifications, he announced my sudden caprice to his wife; for I had reason to know that my visit was now hourly expected and prepared for. I chose, however, to be expected in vain!—Nearly a month passed; and Willesden must have attributed the wayward conditions I had dictated to some momentary whim; for, so far from availing myself of the permission I had extorted, I abstained from associating even with himself. Curiosity and interest were, accordingly, excited to the strongest in his family circle, concerning the man whose movements were erratic as those of a meteor; and on my announcing a second summer entertainment at my château, La fête des Roses, with similar restrictions as to the English, with the single exception of Lord Willesden's family, I rightly conjectured that my invitation would be accepted with gratitude.

"Money constitutes the magic of our epoch. But Paris, above all other places, affords an auspicious field for the exercise of the fairy wand endowed by prodigality. Resolved that the last fête of the mysterious Clerval should excel all his previous efforts, I was ably seconded by the genius of that new Renaissance des arts, fostered under the auspices of the Consulate. But the enormous outlay (rumours of the amount of which afforded ample occupation to the wonderers of the great world) was produced less by the splendour of the entertainment, than by my conceit of producing, on the banks of the Seine, an exact reduplication of those well-remembered gardens of Cadiz, the scene of the happiest moments of my life. The illusion was complete. Tree for tree, arbour for arbour, the spot which had witnessed my midnight interviews with her, was reproduced for the occasion.

"It was there, Basil, I received her!—It was there I advanced to welcome that repining wife, when, in all the exuberance of matronly beauty, and leaning on the arm of her brother-in-law, she beheld before her the injured lover of her youth."

CHAPTER XVIII.

"In the perversity of my heart, Basil Annesley, I anticipated with confidence the success of my projects. The humiliations of former days were effaced by a series of triumphs. Everything, of late, had prospered with me; and long accustomed to the adoration of the vain and interested, I doubted not that the woman described to me as a 'repining wife,' would be content to atone for all I had undergone for her sake.

"But while triumphing in the strength of our own vices, we are apt to calculate too largely on the weakness of others.—Whether as the arbitrary voluptuary of the East, or the corrupt Epicurean of Paris, my experience had not prepared me for the integrity of heart,—the self-respect,—the purity,—the feminine pride arrayed against my pretensions.—She not only resented the manœuvres by which she had been betrayed into my presence, but rejected, as an insult, my protestations of unaltered attachment.

"Had I approached her in a less presumptuous guise, had I appeared before her poor,—humble,—friendless, the promptings of her heart might have stood my friend.—But she despised the proud and ostentatious man who stood before her as a conqueror. Her clear understanding, her upright purposes were not to be baffled by my shallow intrigues; and the net in whose meshes my subtlety had entangled her shallow brother-in-law was unable to enfold her in its meshes. I have not courage to recite the opprobrious terms in which she manifested her insight into my views and character.

"'My father and family judged wisely!' said she; 'and I now admit that I was blinded to your real character by my partial affections!—The penalty invoked by the blaspheming Jews upon themselves and their children's children has converted even you, Osalez, into a worshipper of Mammon. You have attempted to dazzle, by your gorgeous prodigality, the heart that might have been moved to seek you out in penury or affliction. My father was right. There exists no real sympathy between us.'

"Judge of my indignation,—judge of my despair, on hearing from her own lips this bitter condemnation!—Alternately disposed to cast myself at her feet and admit the justice of her sentence, and to turn upon herself the vengeance that had already manifested itself towards her family, I felt, when she withdrew in all the dignity of wounded pride from my presence, that the whole aim of my existence was frustrated!—For two following days I shut myself up in surly desperation. On the third, I emerged from my solitude, with the amended purpose of imploring forgiveness, and offering atonement.—She was gone!—She had quitted Paris!—Mistrusting the protection of her brother-in-law, she was on her road to England,—to the safe-keeping of an honourable husband!

"'My unfortunate sister is the companion of my inauspicious journey,' said the letter she addressed to me from Dover.—'Should the effort prove too much for her declining health, it is you who will have sentenced her to death. Apprized by Lord Willesden of his insolvency and the ruin of her innocent children, she had not courage to abide, in a strange land, the penalty likely to be enforced by a nature ruthless as your own.—Her husband remains behind to answer you with his person.—Do your worst!—If you dare, render Lord Willesden your prisoner—as he is already your dupe!'"

"But you did not dare!"—interrupted Basil Annesley,—whose mind appeared suddenly relieved from some terrible apprehension. "You had not courage to inflict a further injury on this noble-minded woman!"

"You say truly!—I had not!—But others were more relentless. Some months after her return to England, slanderous tongues announced to her husband that my flagitious scheming had prospered. As I live and breathe, Basil, I had no share in the tale of scandal. It was the diabolical invention of some enemy!—Yet groundless as it was, it drove the unhappy man into the grave. He perished, Basil Annesley, at the head of his regiment, on the field of honour; but it was with the cruel conviction that his wife was an adulteress, and his unborn child the offspring of shame! Unhappy woman!—To be cursed with a husband and a lover alike incapable of appreciating the virtue of her soul!

"The poor atonement in my power to offer, was not withheld. But far more contumeliously than ever her proud father had rejected me, did she decline the offer of my hand.—Regarding me as the assassin of her brother, the murderer of her husband, she spurned me from her presence. She spoke of her duty towards her children!—Her children!—The girl had been, by its father's will, already withdrawn from her protection, as unworthy to preside over its education. The boy—the innocent boy now nestling in her bosom—had been rejected by him as the offspring of a crime.—Basil—Basil! Why did not your little hands upraise themselves to intercede in my behalf?"

"My presentiments, then, have not deceived me!" cried the young man, starting from his seat. "It is, indeed, my dear and unfortunate mother who has been through life your victim!"

"My victim?—There was not an earthly sacrifice I would not have made but to obtain permission to become the humblest of her household servants! My victim?—No, no!—I was hers!—Maddened by her indifference, her abhorrence, I now rushed into the most frantic excesses.—I flew to the gaming-table. The cold, calculating Clerval played, for once, like a child.

"My lucky star deserted me. My long-boasted opulence was gradually melting away. Even the securities I held in pledge from Willesden, were at length staked and lost,—lost to those who did not hesitate to expose him to reprisals, attributed by his unfortunate wife and family to myself.

"On the brink of ruin, I looked around me for some desperate chance whereby to retrieve my fortunes, or achieve an honourable death. War was raging in Germany, and I joined the army of the Sambre and Meuse as a volunteer. By degrees my heart warmed to the standard under which I had enlisted. All other pains and pleasures exhausted, the excitement arising from a military career under an able and dauntless commander was a bewildering novelty; and as a means of inflicting humiliation on a country allied with my natural enemies, I embarked all the energies of my nature in the cause of the Eagle of France.

"Like all other men in earnest in their profession, during the supremacy of Napoleon, advancement followed. I was speedily rewarded by a commission. I was promised further advancement. But my military career was destined to a cruel and unexpected interruption.

"In traversing Heidelberg, in the course of my campaign, remembering it to be the birth-place and abiding place of Verelst, I took occasion to make such inquiries respecting the condition of my sister as proved that her letters addressed to my father, which had fallen into my hands, intimating her miserable destitution, conveyed no exaggerated picture of poor Rachael's fallen fortunes. Pampered by prosperity, the stubbornness of cruelty was still rampant within me; for the evil practised against myself had taken root in my soul, and was bringing forth bitter fruits. Having sworn never to behold her more, I made it a virtue to adhere to my oath, and though moved to alleviate her misfortunes, bestowed my humble gift upon her in the shape of alms from a stranger, rather than as an offering of brotherly love.

"The jealous feelings of Verelst took alarm. He pursued the Capitaine de Clerval who had presumed to send a gift of money to his lovely wife. But the artist's application for an audience having been answered by an insult, the indignant man waylaid my coming forth, and rewarded my insolence with a blow. I drew upon him, rushed upon him,—would fain have fought him, fain have killed him! But no more than a slight wound had signalized my frenzy; I was seized and placed in arrest. Imperial discipline was rigorous on such points; and I, so lately the man of millions, might possibly have been shot like a dog, after a hasty court-martial, had not Verelst come forward with attestations of—— Guess on what plea the fool pretended to preserve my life!—Guess!"

Basil Annesley shrugged his shoulders in intimation of ignorance.

"Insanity!—And his wife being my nearest of kin, his attestations were received with deference! While I stood by, in custody, and listened, the fellow presumed to swear before my face that, for some years past, my conduct had been indicative of aberration of intellect! It is true his absurd depositions saved my life. But at what a cost!—to be sent back to Paris under escort, as a lunatic! To be deposited in Charenton, till the physicians decided on my case!—In the irritation of all I had to undergo, I accused Verelst and my sister of malicious and interested views,—of getting me shut up for life with a view to obtain the administration of my remaining property."

"Verelst is as incapable of such an act of baseness as the first noble of the land!" cried Basil, with warm indignation.

"I agree with you,—now that I judge the case dispassionately. But wait, young gentleman, till you have been seized and manacled,—till you have had your head shaved, and been starved and douched at the caprice of an experimentalizing apothecary,—to judge equitably of the motives of your incarcerator," said Osalez with a shudder. "Had my poor brother-in-law entered my cell at Charenton, I am convinced I should have throttled him on the spot!

"There, however, Basil, there, as elsewhere, gold proved my sword and my buckler! One of the visiting surgeons was a shrewd worldly man, who soon saw through the nature of my malady and position. Trust me, that when he proposed confederacy, I drove no hard bargain with him in assigning the sum for which he was to get me placed in a Maison de Santé, as partly convalescent; and, in process of time, pronounce me cured and obtain my enlargement!

"It was during that gloomy interval of imprisonment, Basil, that my nature became thoroughly desophisticated. I learnt, by hard authority, with how many of the so-styled necessaries of human life human nature is able to dispense. I soon found myself the happier for lacking menial attendance. Under such circumstances, my greatest luxury was to be alone. Within the four bare walls of my cell, the expansion of my own glowing mind supplied all the splendours of the East. I carried my Paradise within me. My dreams were now as glowing of the gardens of Sulistan, or the white walls of Cadiz, as my waking impressions had been of yore; and lo! I said unto my soul, what need of costly tapestries,—what need of vessels of gold or vessels of silver,—what need of the toys of art, the marble of the sculptor, the canvas of the painter, since, abiding here in solitary self-contemplation, I am as much in enjoyment of these things as when long use and habit rendered them inostensible and unnoticed under the roof of my stately Spanish palace or Parisian villa! Compulsory starvation, compulsory vigils, compulsory self-attendance, soon rendered my penance habitual, and blunted the edge of the most cutting hardship. From that period I became master of myself, and, consequently, doubly the master of other people.

"Not to weary you with details, suffice it that I was eventually restored to freedom. But instead of profiting by my liberty to resume the enervate habits of life which those four years of thraldom had rendered irksome, I thenceforward devoted myself, solely and exclusively, to the worship of Mammon. Solitary reflection had convinced me that Money was the omnipotent instrument by which I might still work out my projects of vengeance. I resolved to punish my insolent brother-in-law by all the tortures of poverty, while millions were amassing in my coffers; and eventually bequeath them to some public charity or national foundation, while my kindred were begging their bread, and the woman who had twice cast me from her was exposed to all the bitterness of want! There was ecstasy to me then, Basil, in these projects of vengeance! Yes—ecstasy!—If God have reserved to Himself the dealing of Vengeance, is it not because a pleasure worthy the Immortal?"

"You deceive yourself, Mr. Osalez!"—remonstrated Basil;—"or you would deceive me. Deal frankly with both,—and you will own that you experienced dearer delight last night, in your reconciliation with those nearest to you in blood, than ever presented itself to your enjoyment in the course of your projects of retribution."

The silence of Abednego seemed to concede tacit assent to this proposition. But he contented himself with replying evasively, "If I resorted to the joys of revenge to keep alive the lazy current of my blood, what else had they left me?—England had closed the lists of fair and honourable ambition to my approach,—and through them, access to the joys of domestic life. Society had driven me like a dog from its gates. What wonder, then, that the hapless brute, thus spurned, should become rabid, and snarl, and turn upon his persecutors? No matter! I am not here to advocate my own virtues with a view to canonization! Enough that I soon found abundant and increasing joy in the procreation of wealth.—To me it superseded all human instincts.—GOLD was my wife, my child, my kith, my kin!—No labour was too great,—no humiliation too abject for its acquirement. The filthiest mud seemed not to defile my fingers, in which I discerned a single glittering particle!—Perhaps you will accuse these instincts as characteristic of my Jewish origin?—No, Basil! They were not in me when I wandered with her among the orange-groves of Cadiz;—they were not in me when howled by fools and bigots out of the House of Commons!—They were cravings—morbid cravings,—engendered by that gnawing famine of the soul to which I was scornfully condemned by my fellow-men!

"The pursuit of wealth became a pastime rather than a toil. I delighted in the cunning disguises by which I attempted to penetrate the motives, and overmaster the destinies of my clients.—Most men are fond of stage-playing, if they would but own it;—some in their amateur theatres,—some on the velvet foot-cloths of a court,—some in the pulpit,—some in the rostrum,—some on the woolsack,—some on the Bench of Bishops;—I, in Paulet Street, St. Agnes le Clare!—I was, at times, as proud of the dramatic genius, which enabled me to go, like the wind, hither and thither where I listed, as a Judge after delivering a pathetic charge, or the Rector or Chancellor of a University when playing the bigwig for the bewonderment of dunces!—I had my rat-holes in which to chaffer with my Jewish confraternity.—I had my compting-houses, and tables of the money-changers, for those having a fairer footing in the Temple of Mammon;—and, lastly, I had a decent home wherein to treat with the great capitalists of the day, so as to induce their belief in my non-exemption from the ordinary tastes and appetites of mortal nature.—I saw that, by standing too far aloof from the sinful lusts of the flesh,—the pomps and vanities of life,—I must pass for either saint or—devil!

"These motley vicissitudes served to redeem human existence from its monotony.—I was alternately king and beggar,—Richard in the tragedy, Abel Drugger in the farce.—Gods! how have I laughed in my sleeve, at the dupehood of the world!—What puppets were the great in my hands—what tools the powerful!—Exquisite, indeed, was the triumph of watching the manœuvres of those who treated me as an engine, and who, the while, were mere engines for machinations of my own!

"Such were still my sentiments and occupations, Basil Annesley, up to the moment of our first encounter!—But the moment a hand so young and stainless as yours poured oil into my wounds, a new life was enkindled within me. I seemed to espy noble and undreamed-of purposes in MONEY.—I began to suspect that it might be converted into a means of human happiness as well as of transitory pleasure. Your interest in behalf of Verelst brought the exile of my sister to my knowledge.—Mercy was dawning within me. Peace brooded in my heart over her dove-like couplets.

"I visited the family in disguise. I learnt to love their virtues, to admire their graces. I have less compunction, Basil, for having abandoned those lovely girls to the rough schooling of adversity; for it has left them good, true, generous, tender,—all that the gilding of luxury disguises in the courtly bred, if it do not destroy. For worlds, I would not have their honest natures resemble the frippery do-nothingness of your friends, the Maitlands!—Nor would I have had them heartless and proud—like—like HER,—for all the happiness I trust my old age may yet derive from their gentle companionship!

"And now, Basil Annesley, (lest I see you again place your hand on your waistcoat pocket in search of the trumpery toy by which your useless moments are admeasured,) I release you! I ask no opinion, no sentence, on what I have related!—I see, by your altered countenance towards me, that a revolution hath been effected in your mind. Be not over-hasty. Ponder over these things in your heart, and maturely weigh them ere we meet again."

Relieved by this intimation, the young soldier rose calmly and coldly from his seat, and glanced towards the panel by which he had accomplished his entrance.

"No need to sneak out there!" cried the old man, assuming a more cheerful tone. "I shall be proud to introduce you into another of my households." Then, throwing open the door of a dining-room, hung with masterpieces of the old masters, he conducted him through a handsome library, into a snug dressing-room, where his well-brushed coat and hat, his handkerchief and gloves, formally set out, were awaiting him, beside a commodious toilet-table, preparatory to quitting the house. Involuntarily young Annesley shrugged his shoulders.

"You are thinking of Delahaye Street, eh?" observed Osalez, with a smile. "To me both places are of the same account. My heart and soul are not empty enough to find room for petty wants or repinings.—

When the mind's free, the body's delicate.

Should you ever acquire objects in life of the engrossing nature of those that absorb the attention of a great capitalist, you will cease to take thought of the softness of your couch, or the flavour of your dishes. Yet why not do myself fuller justice in your eyes, by avowing that half the privations to which you have seen me expose myself, were acts of voluntary penance? Alas! Basil, if not a Jew, I merit, I own, the charge made by St. Paul, of being 'in all things too superstitious.' I incline much to sacrifices of atonement. That you sought me, Basil, and befriended me amid the wretchedness which appeared so real, seems intended by the Almighty as repayment for all my self-inflicted tortures."

While buttoning on his coat, Osalez intimated to his visiter a desire to transport him in his carriage to the West end of the town.

"Still harping on your horse?" cried he, when his young visiter again excused himself. "Fear nothing!—By my orders, Zebedee conveyed the beast back to your stables half an hour ago."

"Why, you do not even know my stables!" cried Basil, almost with indignation. "Pardon me!—I know all and everything that concerns you. And now, will you come back and dine with me quietly in Bernard Street?"

Already Basil had excused himself, while Osalez was about to step into a chariot awaiting him at the door of the handsome mansion from the spacious hall of which they were emerging together, when an intimation, that the Verelsts were already installed the inmates of their wealthy kinsman, induced him to pause. His scarcely audible mutterings about a change of dress were instantly scouted by Abednego!

"How long have you been such a coxcomb?" cried he. "The last time you dined with me, you had not changed your dress! Why so much respect for the Verelsts?—Have you not been the child of their house—the friend of their fireside? At all events, come with me, and I will drop you when we reach Temple-Bar."

"You have persuaded Verelst, then, to give up his engagements to the Marquis?" inquired Basil, as they drove at a rapid pace through the city.

"On the contrary, I never even attempted it!—I appreciate too highly an artist's independence of mind! Let him distinguish himself,—immortalize himself, if he can!—So much the better and happier for them all. The girls and their mother will reside with me during his absence in the North."

On arriving in Bernard Street (for, once installed in the carriage, Basil found it impossible to resist the old man's solicitations) young Annesley was as cheerfully welcomed by Mrs. Verelst and her daughters as ever he had been to their humble fireside, either at Heidelberg or in London.

"Ungrateful girl!"—mused the young soldier, as he contemplated the open, radiant countenance of his beloved Esther. "Not a sympathizing care has she bestowed on the wretchedness she must know her present views and prospects to be creating."

And, sooth to say, Esther and Salome accosted their young friend as amiably and frankly as if there had been no Duca di San Catalda in the world.

"You have already officiated as my valet, let me now act as yours," cried Osalez, addressing Basil, and motioning to his pompous butler to lead the way to his dressing-room. "Dine with us, Basil, you must and shall. I have some Neckar wine that Verelst swears is superior to Hockheimn —(Lord Maitland, no doubt, has made you a judge of Hock!)—that will open your heart and his, and carry you both back to your cordial German days of old!"

It was when their hearts WERE open and back in the past, that Basil, turning towards Esther, who sat beside him, suddenly whispered an inquiry whether the Branzinis were not sadly disappointed at having lost their expected guest.

"Sadly, indeed!" she replied, with an unembarrassed face. "But my uncle has given us a carriage and horses; and, having no further engagements of tuition to take up our time, we shall now be able to visit every day either Madame Branzini, or Madame di San Catalda."

"Madame di San Catalda!"—exclaimed the astonished Basil. "The mother of the Duke?"

"His wife,—Madame Branzini's sister. Do you not know her?" inquired Esther. "It is true that, being nearly as great an invalid as poor mamma, she rarely goes out."

Basil now began to be entirely of the opinion of Verelst, that the Neckar wine of Osalez was equal to Hock. But for a single, terrible apprehension, —an apprehension he dared not confront, yet could not dismiss from his mind,—he would have felt that he was enjoying the happiest day of his life! Welcomed on all sides as a friend,—benefactor,—idol,—Osalez seemed to fix his eyes upon him as though he were worth a million a carat; while the Verelsts could scarcely refrain from folding him to their hearts, as the origin of all their prosperity and peace.

It stung him to the soul when the reflection glanced into his mind how much more these people loved and prized him than his mother! How seldom in the course of his life had Lady Annesley testified towards him a thousandth part of the sympathy he was now exciting! For what other human being, however, did she display more?—Was she tender even of herself?—Did she not rather, like Osalez, render her existence a species of voluntary penance?

For the first time Basil Annesley reflected on all this with a degree of pity amounting almost to awe. He dreaded to reflect on what she might have undergone to imbue a soul so lofty with such repellent austerity of sternness. He knew that, after his father's death in the Peninsula, his sister had been premptorily withdrawn by the Annesley family from her protection; and connecting this circumstance with the narrative of Osalez, the ravings of old Nicholas, and the discovery of a volume in her possession bearing the hateful initials of A. O.,—trembled to consider what might have been the direful vicissitudes of her troubled life. It was almost impossible to him to remain seated at the board of Abednego!

By degrees every vestige of colour forsook his cheek; and his emotion was so manifest, that not one of the party attempted to detain him when he rose from table and pleaded indisposition as a pretext for quitting the house.

"Fain would I have enjoyed one happy evening in their society," mused Basil, as he hurried homewards. "But the indulgence had only been too dangerously dear!—No! We will meet no more till I have had a full explanation with my dear mother.—If unsatisfactory, I will never see them again!"

Next night he was at Barlingham. It was through the twilight of a glorious evening in May, that he now traversed the fields; a glorious evening fragrant with the breath of thyme and hawthorns,—the springy thymy herbage buoyant beneath his feet,—and the woodlands quivering with that tenderer foliage of early spring, whose beauty is as of an hour's duration.

On reaching the small platform in which the surly old mansion stood isolated, his heart sunk within him. The dread of his mother's mournful voice and aspect overpowered his spirits. The embarrassment,—the chill invariably benumbing his feelings in the only spot on earth where he was entitled to feel at ease, exercised their usual distressing spell over his heart.

On entering the sitting-room he found Lady Annesley seated in her high-backed ebony chair, at her writing-table beside the open casement; enjoying, in solitary meditation, the balmy sweetness of that delicious night. The dews were rising,—the birds at rest. All was stillness, and holiness, and peace. But though she must have seen him traverse the little bridge across the moat in order to reach the old portal, she had not stirred a step to greet her only son! Nevertheless Basil flattered himself that he discerned in her countenance tokens of more than ordinary sociability and good will.

"You are welcome, my dear son!" was as much from the lips of that austere recluse, as the most impassioned caresses from a more demonstrative parent.

It was always difficult to enter into conversation with one who took so little interest in worldly events, the frivolities with which ordinary women are amusable. Anecdotes of the day,—accounts of a new opera or forthcoming ballet,—a brilliant debate or the last new novel,—provoked from her a listless monosyllable, nay sometimes the most reproving severity of countenance. On the present occasion; to his utter surprise, she was the first to question him concerning the dissipations of London.

"With whom have you been living lately?" said she, in a more than usually cheerful voice. "The breaking up of the establishment at Rochester House must have been a loss to you,—frequenting it as you did! The Maitlands too, I find, are about to quit London. You used to speak of their society as a resource.—How will you be able to part with the pretty fair-haired Lucy, who is said to regard you with such partiality?"

"The Maitlands are the sort of girls to regard with partiality any disengaged young man disposed to trifle away his time at their house," replied Basil, becoming grave in his turn, as he reflected with what horror Lady Annesley was likely to listen to an avowal of the motive of his ingratitude for Lucy's predilection!

"Knowing which, you should have been on your guard against any entanglement of the poor girl's affections," retorted his mother.—"In such matters, a woman's peace of mind is the last thing considered;—though, Heaven knows, no holier trust is confided to man by the hands of his Maker, than the happiness and wellbeing of the woman with whom through life he is connected!"

"I heartily agree with you!"—cried her son; "and should hate myself were I capable of dealing lightly or cruelly with any woman to whom I believed myself an object of genuine attachment.—Lucy Maitland, on the contrary, has trifled with me,—since, while indulging in what London calls flirtation, she was prepared to accept the first elder son, with good prospects, who came in her way."

"In short, you are devoid of grace and sympathy!—And yet," resumed Lady Annesley, "I was desired to sound your affections by those who are anxious, humble as your fortunes are, to encumber them with a wife, and who seem to have apprehended, in Miss Maitland, an obstacle to their projects!"

"Projects of a marriage with me?"—cried Basil, in great surprise and some indignation.—"I am exceedingly obliged to their officiousness!—But I have neither the means nor the inclination to marry!—How absurd,—how impertinent!"

"Your affections are engaged then, though not to Miss Maitland, or you would not be thus resentful!" observed Lady Annesley.—"This is precisely the point which Vardyn, my solicitor, has written to me to ascertain. He charged me, I must admit, not to betray his mission to yourself. But I am getting weary of mysteries!—As we approach the grave, Basil, the claims of those we love to our entire confidence, acquire stronger force.—A few short years, and all that can be known of all of us, will be known to all!—To what purpose then the petty disguises and hypocrisies with which, through life, we conceal them from each other?"

Basil Annesley was more amazed to hear such a sentence issue from his mother's lips, than by all her previous amenity.

"Vardyn assures me," continued her ladyship, "that the lady whose family is eager to make you an offer of her hand, is young, lovely, accomplished, amiable, virtuous, a great heiress, warmly attached to you—"

"Warmly attached to me?" interrupted young Annesley;—"are you certain he said that she was warmly attached to me?"

"Quite certain!—But your interest in the fair unknown, whom just now you treated so cavalierly, seems to be suddenly increasing?"

"I am sure I know not why!"—replied Basil, with a heavy sigh, (for already the flattering whispers of his heart assured him that the desire of Osalez to unite him with one of his lovely nieces must be the origin of these singular overtures,) "for were the person referred to a thousand times more attractive and more richly endowed, the match were impossible!"

"You know the parties then?"

"I fear so!—and am unhappily certain, dearest mother, that a less welcome daughter-in-law could not have been presented to your acceptance!"

"Nevertheless," persisted Lady Annesley, "Vardyn, who is a man of the highest respectability,—a man of sense, probity, feeling, though a man of the world, assures me that a more auspicious connexion could not have presented itself. The uncle of the young lady is prepared to bring you into parliament and settle upon you an estate of fifteen thousand a-year!"

"Were it fifteen thousand times as much, my dear mother, suffice it that you would in the end refuse your consent!"

"You excite my curiosity beyond measure!" cried Lady Annesley. "You must indeed give me credit for unworldliness, to suppose me unbiassed by such powerful considerations!"

"I believe you to be biassed by considerations still MORE powerful," replied Basil, in a subdued voice,—dreading lest she should push her inquiries to a fuller explanation.

"Alas! at the end of my career, I am come to the conclusion that no worldly interest is comparable with opulence for those we love!"—replied the recluse; "money, my dear Basil, is the source of all human influences!"

"Nevertheless there are prejudices,—there are resentments, which it is insufficient to overcome!"—observed her son, almost trembling, as he saw the secret on the point of being extorted from his lips.

"There can be none, I should imagine, to bear upon the case in point," resumed the lady.—"Vardyn expressly mentions that the young heiress in question is the daughter of exemplary people of unblemished character.—As regards mere ancestral distinctions, I have ceased to put my trust in coronets!"

"But if she were of Jewish origin?"—faltered Basil, almost encouraged by her moderation.

"Even then, if by faith and profession a Christian, I should not presume to raise objections,"—replied Lady Annesley, in a voice whose mildness was as balm to the ears of her son!—"Listen to me, Basil!—Even such a prejudice as you have supposed on this occasion, was the means of disuniting your mother from the object of her earliest affections,—the noblest and best of human kind.—A long life of affliction has not sufficed to expiate the weakness with which I suffered myself to be forced by my family into renouncing him, and bestowing my hand upon another—an honourable man—whom I did not love.—But that he whose generous heart I perverted by my evil-dealing disgraced himself in his turn, by retaliations which proved the means of steeping my days in anguish and remorse, and inflicting on others an injury still greater than that I had inflicted on himself,—I should go to the grave with the weight upon my soul of a deep and inexpiable offence!—His vengeance seems to have wrought atonement for me.—But pardon me, Basil!"—she continued, shuddering from head to foot with strong emotion—"it is not to you I must speak of this!"

"It is—it is!"—cried the young man, casting himself at her feet and taking her trembling hands fondly in his own.—"To whom but your son,—your loving and submissive son,—can you unfold your griefs?—Who can sympathize in them like myself?—Talk to me of that early love, mother,—talk to me of Cadiz,—of him to whom you pledged your heart—"

"You know all, then?"—interrupted Lady Annesley, turning deathly pale, yet without attempting to withdraw from his endearments.—"I foresaw that the day would come when some officious voice would interpose between us with the tale!"

"That voice, mother, was his own!"

Lady Annesley gently waved her head. "The man I speak of fell, like your fa—— like his happier victim,—in battle!—Enrolled in the Imperial army, at the battle of Austerlitz he was slain.—This, this is all the trace that remains of him on earth!"—pursued the lady, in a scarcely audible tone, taking from the desk beside her the portrait opened by her son on a former occasion,—"How dear,—still and ever how dear,—it becomes me not to say!—Look upon that face, Basil,—examine that noble—that intellectual countenance, and tell me whether it pleads nothing for the weakness of your mother."

As a pretext for averting his eyes from her own, young Annesley gazed for some moments in silence, on the picture,—tracing unmistakeably in every lineament the altered features of Osalez.

"After the warm and unaltered interest you have avowed, mother, in the original of this portrait,"—said he, at length, in as firm a voice as his beating heart would allow,—"I have scarcely courage to reiterate my assertion that he lives;—that but yesterday, my hand was grasped in his,—that he has been my friend,—my benefactor. Next to yourself, Osalez is the person who has exercised the strongest influence over the mind and conduct of your son."

Lady Annesley clasped her hands together in unspeakable emotion.

"Do not deceive me, Basil!" cried she. "Speak—speak.—Let me hear those words again! He lives?—He loves you?"

"He lives,—is rich, prosperous, powerful!—It is the daughter of his only sister he has offered you to become my wife!"

So overpowering was the revolution created in Lady Annesley's mind by the startling intelligence thus communicated, that for a time the prospects of the two families were cruelly overclouded by the danger of one who had loved much, and suffered in proportion to the strength of her affections.—The sorrows of a long series of years,—the vain and fruitless sorrows seemed to have exercised less influence over her stern and powerful nature than this unlooked-for dawn of brighter days.—The tender nursing of her son,—the assiduities of those who hurried down to Barlingham at his summons to receive what she believed to be a last farewell, at length restored her to herself.—But it was not possible to disavow in health the fond avowals of that parting hour.

Not that Lady Annesley evinced an ungenerous desire to recall the concessions she had accorded. The marriage of Basil with his beloved Esther was sanctioned by her presence and benediction; and immediately after the ceremony, the young couple took possession of a beautiful estate in Berkshire, settled on them by the munificence of Mrs. Annesley's generous kinsman. It was the earnest desire of both that the man to whom they were indebted for their happiness should become their honoured inmate. But immediately after witnessing the solemnization of their marriage, Abednego Osalez abruptly quitted England, without fixing any definite period for his return.

Basil Annesley, satisfied that his unexpected departure was the result of a long and painful interview with the object of his early affection, in which, with all the firmness and dignity peculiar to her character, Lady Annesley intimated the impossibility of a nearer connexion between those whom the decrees of Providence appeared expressly to have kept asunder, entertains little expectation of his friend's return to England. Esther, on the contrary, attributes his absence to the desire of extricating her father from the political feuds in which the rashness of poor Verelst had involved him in his native province, previous to negotiating a marriage between Salome and her plighted lover the young Count von Ehrenstein, at present debarred by the opposition of his family from claiming her hand.

Lady Annesley, who, though a frequent visiter to her son, persists in retaining her gloomy residence at Barlingham, listens without comment to the surmises of the family. With the discernment generated by a more intimate insight into his character, she is probably aware that the absence of Osalez will be prolonged only till he has been enabled to break off all ties that connect him with his past calling and interests. Active and trustworthy agents are, in fact, already charged with powers to concentrate and realize his singularly scattered property, with a view to the reinvestment of the enormous capital in a landed estate; and should time and reflection avail to soften the obduracy of one, through life the ruling influence of his conduct, a change of name, connected with this proprietorship, may possibly still further tend to obliterate, in the accomplished country-gentleman, all trace of the Money-lender, A. O.

THE PRAYER OF RAM-MOHUN-ROY.*

BY MRS. THOMAS WOODFORDE.

In a park where bounds the fallow-deer,
As he scents the fragrant thyme,
There is a spot where weeping trees
Drench earth with dewy rime.

Stranger! 'tis not a hermit's cell,
Or grot, or mimic toy;—
It is a grave, where sleepeth well,
The Brahmin—Ram-Mohun-Roy.

A Hindoo brother resteth there,
Far from his caste and home;
No mausoleum riseth near,
No overshadowing dome!

Alone, his form evanisheth
Into the dust around!—
The faithful soul, that loved so well,
Companionship hath found!

To him dark Superstition's wand
Could not its hate impart;
It had no power to fuse his brain,
Or petrify his heart.

The mystic Shaster's ancient page
He learned,—and stood dismayed;
He turned his prayer within his breast,
And thus the Brahmin prayed:—

"Oh, God! thou know'st—for from thine eye
No thought can be concealed—
The cumbrous book on which I look
Still leaves Thee unrevealed!

"My God above, yea! far above,
Whate'er thy creature sees,
My heart must hope thy voice ne'er spoke
Such fearful threats as these!

"Forgive me if I dare not think
To scan Infinity;
Though trembling, driven from Thee in Heaven,
In earth I worship Thee!

"My human heart all tenderly
With earthly love o'erflows;—
Hence come my fears, my hopes, joys, tears,
And hence my crimes and woes!

"A breathing atom of thine earth,
Me Nature's laws oppress;—
My spirit weak doth ever seek
Its kindred earthiness.

"But thou! oh! lovely, living Earth,
And I, a part of thee,
In boundless space have destined place
For dread Eternity!

"Yes, God doth love his own fair Earth,—
Blest Hope! I cling to thee;
And the soul He hath sent from Heav'n is lent
That His Earth may perfect be.

"O! Light Divine, that invests my clay,
Radiance from Him above,
So burn thy fire that my one desire
And mission on Earth be—Love!"

SPECIMENS OF MODERN ROMANCE.

NO. IV.—THE DOMESTIC-CLASSICAL.

THE CONVIVIUM AT GORBELLIUS CÆSAR'S.

A CHAPTER FROM "THE LAST DAYS OF AUGUSTUS."

"You dine with Gorbellius to-day; and not dressed, I declare, though the clepsydra is now upon the stroke of two. Super anima mea, this is too bad, Lucilius, when you know he is as punctual as Chronos, and will swear like a Briton at us, if we are the cause of the sow's udders getting one turn at the fire too many. Come, O my Lucilius! bestir yourself, and let us be off. My biga is at the door, and we may yet be in time for the first course, si spectas acutus."

Thus spoke Fabullus, as he flung open the door of his friend Lucilius' cubiculum, and found him dozing upon a torus of rich Tyrian purple over a libellus, which he held listlessly in his hand.

"Aw—aw—two o'clock—super honore—I had no idea. This last publication of Catullus' has been really most seductive—a delightful dog;" and here he yawned violently, and shook himself like a Newfoundland dog newly out of the water. "Such a divine little poem about Lugubrius' wife—you know her—valde bella—d—— fine woman. He calls her Lesbia; but we scientes canes know who it is he means."

"Oh, confound his Lesbia!—get ready, and let us be moving. Gorbellius has the best lampreys in Rome; but they will be all gone before we are within a mile of that box of his on the Via Appia, if you lie yawning there in place of dressing."

"Well, well—I shall be ready in scintillatione lecti columnæ. I have merely to put on a clean Ricardulus,* brush my toga, and then you may command me."

While Lucilius retired to make these necessary sacrifices at his toilet, Fabullus, who was a leading sporting character, and well known on the Campus Martius for his knowledge of stable literature, amused himself with picking down the flies from the walls with the lash of his horse-whip, an accomplishment which he had brought nearly to perfection by a steady practice of years. He had sent the souls of about three hundred muscæ to Hades, before Lucilius reappeared, followed by his British slave, Faber Ferrarius, a scion of the ancient English house of Smith. They entered the biga, and Faber Ferrarius having got up behind, the vehicle dashed across the Forum, upsetting two apple-stalls and a prætor, and, turning sharp round by the Tribunes Coffee-house, pursued its course along the Via Appia with a speed that electrified even the hackney coachmen at the foot of the Capitoline hill.

"We shall have a pleasant afternoon of it," said Fabullus, "I have no doubt. Gorbellius told me he had invited Mæcenas, Pollio, and Trebonius, besides the little Mantuan, and that glorious fellow Flaccus, who takes his glass and his joke as well as any man in town."

"Is the divine Virgil to be of the party?" inquired Lucilius, who was not aware that by the free-and-easy epithet of "the little Mantuan" was meant the author of the Æneid.

"Ecquid viride prope oculos meos vides? Do you see anything green here?" replied Fabullus, with playful imaginativeness, rubbing his index finger up and down the right side of his nose as he spoke. "Didn't I say he was? and a precious bore he is, I promise you. However, the emperor has taken a fancy to him lately, and so we are forced to put up with him. Indeed, you will have a feast of the poets to-day; for, besides Horace, who is really a trump, et nullus error, Catullus, I believe, is likely to look in about the second amphora. He has gone down the river with my nephew, Varrus, to eat white-bait; but they were to break up early."

"Whose taberna do they patronise?—Lovegrove's?"

"Of course! Don't you know Horace's line? Scriptorum chorus AMAT NEMUS—

> With all your scribblers light and airy,
> Love-Grove's is the ordinary."

"Ah, ha, ha!—Non malum, super hon.," faintly tittered the foppish Lucilius, afraid of deranging a simper which he had adjusted before his mirror, and was treasuring up for the party that awaited them at Gorbellius' box in the suburbs.

"Hooroar, id sors vestra est—that's your sort. Ite capellæ, go it, ye cripples, as the lame duck said to the Chelsea pensioners," shouted Faber Ferrarius, who had heard the pun, and with that relish of fun, so characteristic of his nation, was firing off a small park of laughing artillery at the back of the biga.

"Mens ocellos tuos, scurra,—mind your eyes, sirrah! or, by Pollux! I'll make you laugh on the wrong side of your head," exclaimed Fabullus, bristling up with all that hauteur which marked the masters of the world. "Lucilius, I think that varlet would be all the better for a taste of the fasces. Where did you pick him up?"

"He is a Trinobant, from the city of Londinium," replied Lucilius. "An old and faithful slave of my father's, who avails himself of the license which I give him to laugh at my friends' jokes, when I find I can't gratify them by doing so myself."

"Mehercle, a sturdy knave," responded Fabullus, affecting not to notice the sarcasm. "With a little training, methinks, he would make no bad figure in the arena. Lucilius, my boy, I'll give you forty—fifty sestertia for him. Say the word, and the cash is yours."

* A dicky, we presume.—ED.

"Mustelam dormientem non capias! Catch a weasel asleep," answered Lucilius, adopting the figurative style which was then fashionable among the young Romans in the higher circles. "No, no, I know his value too well. Besides, he would make but a sorry gladiator. He fights capitally with his bare fists, after the manner of his countrymen, but has a mortal antipathy to the cestus."

"Oh, if he can't operate with the irons, non res est pro pecunia mea—he's not the thing for my money. But here we are; and by the steam that salutes my nostrils, I should say they were carrying up the cœna."

With that he alighted from the biga, followed by Lucilius, and the slave; while the vehicle was led off to the stables by one of Gorbellius' negro grooms.

The vestibulum of Gorbellius' house, which received them, was a noble apartment, decorated after the manner of the ancients, with statues of bronzed stucco, and a handsome umbrella-stand of British manufacture, and floored with a tesselated pavement of Parian marble, disposed in alternate squares of green and red. Passing through this, they entered the triclinium, where the guests were already assembled, and where everything was prepared for the banquet.

"Salvete vobis," said an elderly gentleman in a Brutus wig, advancing towards them, as they entered—"I was afraid that the fair Lydia might have been too seductive this forenoon, my Lucilius, to allow of your joining our party."

"Oh, oh—super hon. The fair Lydia does not smile for me," said Lucilius, with that deprecating tone, which means exactly the reverse of what it says.

"And you, my Fabullus, I feared you had been crux rus detergens, (scouring across the country,) and broken your neck in a steeple chase, or been spilt from your biga by a collision with an omnibus."

"Omnibus hoc vitium est; they're infernal things these omnibuses," said a pudgy little gentleman, with weak-looking eyes, stepping up and accosting our friends.

"Ha, my Flaccus! my beatific nightingale, my Philomel of the Tibur—thou lookest fresh after last night's commessatio. Confess, my friend, wert thou not vinosus, when we parted?"

"Confiteor—I was magnopere scissus, cursedly cut!" replied the poet. "The Falernian of our friend Varius seduced my senses infamously."

"Vy, if that ain't the kiddy ve picked out of the gutter last night, vere he lay hitting out at the lamp-post, and fancying himself knocking down kids at the fountain of Bandusia," whispered Faber Ferrarius to his master.

"Silence, sirrah!" said Lucilius, with a frown. "Even the frailties of genius should be revered."

"That's vat they calls justice, I s'pose," muttered the Trinobant. "Ven a poor devil like me gets swipy, the cat-o'-nine is too good for him; but let one of them rhyming shepherds make a beast of himself, and it's only the frailties of genius!"

"Your presence, O illustrious Pollio," said Gorbellius, bowing to a gentlemanly Roman, who now entered the apartment with an air and presence that betokened the finished courtier, "your presence sheds a lustre on my poor house."

Pollio bowed, and taking a perfumed sudarium from the folds of his toga virilis, blew his nose.

"Virgil, my honoured friend, how are you?" continued Gorbellius, addressing a sallow-visaged, slightly-formed young man, who had entered with Pollio—"and how is your aunt?"

"She sleeps," replied the distinguished bard, with a voice of the most moving pathos. "She sleeps within the dark and silent grave, and over her the cypress' dismal branches wave. Upon the nones of August—luckless day!—the venerated dame was swept away, by Hermes' rod, into grim Charon's bark, and now she moans where flows Cocytus dark. Peace to her manes,—and may Minos judge, with mercy, all the old lady's failings——"

"Fudge!" audibly exclaimed Faber Ferrarius, from a corner of the room. The bard stared wildly round him at the unexpected clinch thus given to his rhymes.

"You afflict me much," answered Gorbellius, at the same time elevating his cheek by a slight pressure of his tongue. "She was a most exemplary woman."

"A mother for the Gracchi!" exclaimed Trebonius.

"Or an aunt for Virgil!" said Pollio, with a graceful inclination of his person, which sent that part of it, which is peculiarly the residence of honour, into the paunch of a stout and jolly-looking Eques, with a shining bald head, who stood behind him, whispering to Horace. "So the old hag is gone to Phlegethon at last: she was the veriest bore in Rome—as ignorant as a monkey, and ten times as malicious. Would to Jupiter her nephew had gone with her!" he muttered, as the slight accident above alluded to nearly deprived him of his breath.

"Yes, O my patron Mæcenas—saltitavit vimen—it is a blessing she has hopped the twig, at last; and it would be a general relief to society, if that ponderous jackass were to follow her, like his own Æneas, to the shades of Orcus. He a poet! Barring Bathyllus, I don't know a more pitiful dabbler in the dactyls."

It was thus that Horace, the great lyrist, the lively observer of character, the acute moralist, could speak of the author of the Æneid, that immortal bard, who may in a manner be said to have been the Robert Montgomery of his age and nation. Strange, that amidst all the changes, which sweep, like clouds upon the azure cerulean of the sky, across the surface of the dædal earth, giving us warnings and glimpses of the eternal inane, the mind of mind should alone have undergone no revolution—that the heart of "him that did but yesterday suspire" should throb with the same sensibilities, burn with the same passions, and be distracted with the same jealousies, which perplexed the bosom of our common parents! Time flows on, but we are standing still! Empires rise and fall—but year by year, and century by century, man is found laving himself in the purple soap of his own abominations; and all-erring as we are, it is comfortable to know that our ancestors were touched with the same frailties as ourselves. Let us, then, in the beautiful words of Achilles Tatius, gather wisdom from the past; and when any future poet finds himself undervaluing the pretensions of a successful rival, as poets sometimes will do, let him turn to this history, and while he laments that the jealousy of Horace should so far have warped his better judgment as to allow him to apply the epithet of "ponderous jackass" to the brightest ornament of the Augustan literary circles, let him blush for his own fault, and pay the just tribute to genius, which is never more graceful than when it is accorded by the lips of a kindred spirit.

The entrance of the slaves with the preliminaries of the banquet now put an end to further conversation. Each guest, with the greatest alacrity, unbuckled his girdle after the agreeable fashion of the Greeks, who permitted no impediment to the appetite save a full and luxurious satiety. Water in basins of porphyry and silver was handed round to the guests, and each, having laved his fingers and his brow, dried them with a mappa of the softest damask. This custom seemed a little strange to our friend, Faber Ferrarius, who, while presenting the basin to his master, said, with a grin as broad as Colman's broadest,—the effect of which was not lost upon Lucilius—"Quomodo ex es pro sapone? How are you off for soap?" Wicker baskets filled with the most fragrant flowers were then produced, and each of the company exercised his fancy in selecting the most graceful tribute of the spring to form a garland for his head.

A curious observer of character might have formed his own conclusions as to the habits of those distinguished individuals from the selections which they made. Mæcenas, who was chairman of the Societas Agrestis Romana, or Roman Agricultural Society, adopted a wreath of the intermingled foliage of the flowering bean, the carrot, and the tare. The more courtly Pollio selected the kiss-me-quickly and dandelion. Virgil contented himself with a garland of the simple beech, while the vivacious Horace crowned himself with a luxuriant chaplet of the vine leaf and the rose. Fabullus, true to his equestrian character, wreathed his temples with the horse-gowan; while Lucilius, to whom the image of Lydia was ever present, and who had chosen the narcissus and love-lies-bleeding, was presented by his servant, (who, as he offered the garland, hummed the old English air of "Omne circa petasum," or "All round my hat,") with a coronal of the most verdant willow. The young Roman acknowledged with a smile the aptness of the present, and adopted it forthwith.

Eggs, hashed with Sardinian lard, pumpkins from the islands of the Antipodes, Calabrian fungi, and delicious pies of diseased goose-livers, manufactured at Salernum, the ancient Strasbourg, were now placed upon the table. Falernian and Syracusan wine in vessels of the finest cut crystal sparkled upon the board in graceful propinquity, and the guests, laying themselves at length upon their couches, set in seriously to the work of necessary refection.

"O Silenus, be propitious!" said the host, bowing to a statue of that most respectable deity which stood upon a conspicuous pedestal; and having poured out the usual libation, he placed the calix to his own lips, where it remained, till with pious fervour he had drained it of its contents.

"What a splendid pumpkin! And O what exuberant figs!" said Pollio, stowing pound after pound of the esculents under his belt. "This day shall I mark with a white stone."

"I am sorry, O my Mæcenas," said Gorbellius, "that I cannot offer you any oysters,—but if you will allow me to recommend these Trinacrian mussels, I think you will find them no bad substitute for the natives."

"Admirable!" exclaimed the luxurious equestrian, helping himself to half-a-dozen spoonsful. "Horace, my son, you seem off your feed. Have some of these shellfish?"

"Gratias!" sputtered Horace, with his mouth full of fungus.

Non omne mare est generosæ fertile terræ.
It is not everywhere one sees
Shellfish so excellent as these.

"As usual," whispered Virgil to his patron; "always showing off his own verses."

Pollio, who at the moment was deep in the mysteries of a chicken pie, either did not hear the invidious remark, or did not think it advisable to take notice of it. Lucilius, however, overheard the words, and burning with anxiety to recommend himself to the favourable notice of the poet, said somewhat incautiously across the table, "I agree with you, O most accomplished Maro—a great mind, like the sensitive plant, should shun observation, and not protrude its flowers to court the passing glances of the viator."

"You being the viator, I presume," said Horace, snappishly. "Tell me, young man, do you write verses yourself?"

"I bring no votive offering to the Muses."

"I thought as much," answered the lyrist: "then let me advise you in future never to make remarks on those who do. Since the gods have not made you poetical, masticate your murænæ, and make better use of your teeth than you do of your tongue. Poeta nascitur non fit."

"Which means, I suppose, that it is not fit for a poet to be nasty," whispered Faber Ferrarius to an attendant slave, somewhat incensed at the tone of the remarks levelled against his master, and not a little scandalized at the unseemly manner in which Horace clawed up the mussels with his fingers from the oleaginous stew.

Lucilius would have replied, but Gorbellius aptly interposed. "You do injustice, O my Flaccus, to my young friend, who, I assure you, is a great admirer of yours. Often have I heard him say, that, if he were to choose a patron in Rome, he should seek the atrium of the all-accomplished Horace."

"Say you so," said the bard, much mollified. "Phœbus is my witness, I meant not to offend; and if Lucilius will pay me a visit at my little place on the Anio, I shall be glad to crack a bottle of Vile Sabinum with him, and perhaps open his eyes to the beauty of my verses by immortalizing him in an ode."

Lucilius bowed a gratified assent. Virgil snorted—and the second course was brought in.

It is not our intention to enumerate the various delicacies which graced that festive board. The peacock in full feather, garnished with a delicate condiment of garlic and onions; the sturgeon stuffed with nightingale's tongues stewed in cod's liver oil,

The swelling unctuous paps
Of a fat pregnant sow, newly cut off,
Cooked with an exquisite and poignant sauce,

as "rare old Ben" has it; and many other unspeakable triumphs of the Roman cuisine were all there. These the classical reader must be familiar with; and the unclassical reader who has read The Last Days of Pompeii—and who has not?—can be no stranger to them.

"Ho!" cried Gorbellius, after the cloth had been removed, and an elegant dessert of apples and filberts placed upon the table. "Ho, bring in the goblets, and let us begin seriously to the business of the symposium. I fill this cup to the emperor."

"I do exactly the reverse," said Pollio.

"Aedepol! How?"

"You fill your cup, O my excellent Gorbellius, and I empty mine. Now, which of us is the better philosopher?"

Much more of this excellent species of wit passed, and so the roseate hours flew swiftly on; and Orion displayed his glittering belt in the heavens, and Charles the starry waggoner was seen driving his celestial wain along the milky way, and the harvest moon looked serenely and beautifully down from the pearly, yet unfathomable, depths of ether,—and the wide expanse of the sea, and the crests of the eternal mountains, and the broad vine-covered valleys that undulated beneath, and the spires, and pinnacles, and domes of the imperial city, shone and glittered, and rejoiced in her presence. Nature was hushed into quietude; yet still from the portals of that magnificent mansion came the burst of joyous merriment, and the burden of inspiring song. And oh, not unharmoniously, nor ungratefully, did those sounds invade the regions of the placid night; for, whilst the balmy dews of evening were bathing with strength, with beauty, and with fragrance, the fruitful children of the soil, the ruby nectar, the dew of life, was kindling at the hearts of the happy train, emancipating their thoughts from the dull realities of existence, and exalting each to the intellectual proportions of a Titan!

"A song! a song from Horace!" cried the host, and gracefully did the poet touch the strings of the cithera, and raising his vine-crowned head, which, had Phidias transferred it to marble, would have been worshipped as the very incarnation of Lyæus, burst forth into the following

CARMEN BACCHANALE.

Life 's too short for care and sorrow,
Grief's a dull and weary thing;
We'll be grave enough to-morrow,
But to-day let 's drink and sing.

Joyous be our happy meeting!
Dash all sullen thought aside;
There is nothing that can sweeten
Care, except the ruddy tide
Poculi—poculorum;
Help yourself and push the jorum!

Drink, and let all toil and trouble
Vanish from your kindling soul;
Life itself is but a bubble
Sparkling in the sparkling bowl.
If the sage be melancholy,
What a sorry sage is he!
Better if he drowned his folly
In the liquor mantling free
Poculi—poculorum;
Help yourself and push the jorum!

Edile, tribune, flamen, prætor,
In this just devotion join;
All confess their true dictator
Is the jolly god of wine.
Water is a goodly fluid
When no better drink is by;
But did ever priest or Druid
Scorn for it the sweet supply
Poculi—poculorum;
Help yourself and push the jorum!

Join we in the lusty chorus!
Fill the emptied goblet up!
Bacchus' choicest gifts before us
Sparkle in the rosy cup.
Joyous be our happy meeting!
Dash all sullen thought aside;
There is nothing that can sweeten
Care, except the ruddy tide
Poculi—poculorum;
Help yourself and push the jorum!

"Heavenly!"—"exquisite!"—"gorgeous!"—"good!"—"pretty well!" cried Lucilius, Trebonius, Fabullus, and Gorbellius, in a breath. Mæcenas said nothing; but, squeezing affectionately the hand of his protegé, deposited in it an order for a hundred sestertia upon the banking-house of Lollius, Spurœna, & Co.

"What did you think of that song?" whispered Pollio to the Mantuan bard.

"Coarse and vulgar," answered Virgil; "the sentiments mean and undignified, and the language below contempt. I wonder how any man with common pretensions to education, can listen to such pitiful drivel. But see! by Phœbus! he is at it again!"

And in truth, Horace, animated by the generosity of his patron, caught up the lyre from his side, and after a short and lively prelude, sang that exquisite extempore panegyric which Scaliger has preserved, and which may be thus translated:

IN LAUDEM MÆCENATIS.

O, have you not heard of the noble Mæcenas,
Who keeps a great pond full of splendid murænas,
And hands out his slaves
To find lodgings and graves,
By scores, in the maws of the hungry hyænas!

Last Ides of September, when Pansa was prætor,
Six lions he showed, and a fine gladiator.
'Twas his pride and his boast
That they gave up the ghost
At the feet of Augustus and Jupiter Stator.

Thou son of a line of old monarchs Etruscan,
There's some in the chariot-race kick up a dust can,
Some glory in war,
But you, wiser far,
Patronise the belles lettres, and talk Della Cruscan.

Mæcenas, we thank thee for manifold mercies,
We crown thee with laurels, and greet thee with verses,
And by night and by day
Shall thy Horace still pray,
That thy pockets may always be stuffed with sesterces.

The whole apartment rang with acclamations. Mæcenas, who was no great orator, returned thanks in a short and neat speech; while Virgil, whose patron was by no means so liberal as his more fortunate rival's, growled his contempt of what he was pleased to call the coarse flattery of a base parasite.

Meanwhile the night wore on, the cups were circulated with accelerated velocity, until the senses of most of the company were considerably mystified; and the last objects which swam before the eyes of Lucilius, ere he dropt into the arms of his slave, were a race round the table by Mæcenas and Pollio, each mounted on the back of his respective poet, with Fabullus urging them to the top of their speed, and Gorbellius standing upon the table, stripped to the buff, exhibiting, with surprising fidelity, the attitudes of "The Fighting Gladiator in Six Positions," in imitation of Ducro, a Dacian acrobat, whose imitations of statuary drew thousands nightly to the Colosseum.

WRITTEN AFTER READING
"THE PRESENT AGE," A LECTURE BY DR. CHANNING.

Hail! thou whose hoary brow is deck'd
With laurels, greener far
Than warrior's fresh from battle-field
And spirit-stirring war.
'Tis thine to call the human race
From sensual aims, ignoble, base.
'Tis thine, with tongue of fire,
To form one mighty brotherhood,
And bid them to the Great, the Good,
Continually aspire.

Real and unfading shall thy fame
Illume wherever known;
No entail'd honours gild thy name,
Thy deeds are all thine own.
'Tis thine with matchless eloquence
To sway o'er all intelligence
An empire far and wide;
To dig the intellectual mine,
This is thy work—the triumph thine,
The glory and the pride.

'Tis thine to hail the glorious dawn
Of truth and moral light;
Of freedom bursting all the bonds
Of ignorance and might;
That breaks the fetters of the slave,
To snatch him from his living grave
And ceaseless misery.
Blest hope—he spurns the galling yoke
And with'ring lash—for thou hast spoke
The doom of tyranny.

No superstitious rev'rence checks
Thy course of thought or speech;
The truth alone the prize that thou
Wouldst bid the world to reach.
This arms with intellectual might,
That shuns ambition's fatal blight—
That hollow, gaudy thing—
A riband, or a tinsel star—
For MAN, say'st thou, is nobler far
Than emperor or king.

'Twas thine from off Napoleon's brow
Th' illusive wreath to tear,
And show what bitter blackness lurk'd
Beneath a form so fair.
He would the world's dominion gain,
Of myriads shed the blood in vain
To gain an empty crown—
Thou hast a nobler conquest made,
Which shall, when his proud laurels fade,
Live glorious in renown.

The page that thine own hand hath writ
Shall live and grow for aye,
When the great names of Greece and Rome
Have sunk into decay.
And all the hardy sons of toil,
No longer wretched—brutish—vile—
Shall bless the just, the true.
Him who undaunted led the van,
And taught, that humble, unknown man,
Might yet be noble too.

The dormant virtues then shall own
Religion's peaceful sway;
Not cold sectarian selfishness,
The offspring of a day,
That brings Infinite holiness
Down to the doctrine's littleness,
Nor sees the way bestrew'd
With flowers that cheer our weary state,
Nor deems the Infinitely Great
As Infinitely Good.

Great is the truth, its spread shall turn
The millions from their doom,
Of slavish ignorance—the death
That courts a living tomb.
'Tis this that fills the patriot's soul
With hopes and aims, whose high control
Subserves all-powerful Fate;
And here may vain ambition learn
Oft classic statue, marble urn,
No good commemorate.

No painted canvass, chisel'd bust,
No sculpture needest thou:
Thy intellectual monument
Shall ever be as now,
In that undying love which glows
For all, the light of heav'n that shows
Our humble dignity,
That blends in one all humankind,
And fills the universal mind
With warmest sympathy.

Land of the setting sun, how fair
A lot hath fall'n to thee!
Once holy patriotism—and now
Sublime philanthropy.
How bright a galaxy of names
Thy brief historic page contains,
Begun by Washington:
And now his name claims high repute,
Whose voice inspir'd shall ne'er be mute,
New England's noblest son!

NEW NOVELS.

THE NEIGHBOURS,*—EVELYN HOWARD.

For once, an English translator of foreign novels has made a hit; a circumstance which does not occur above once in one hundred times. The fortunate, or, rather, the wise and tasteful individual is Mary Howitt, who, guided by her own true English heart, knows what should and what will be found congenial to the better heart of her country; what must ameliorate, while it fascinates and entertains. In her preface to The Neighbours, Mrs. Howitt tells us that there is a rich treasure of intellect and literature in Sweden, of which little or nothing is known to England. However this may be, she has undoubtedly fallen upon a small vein of pure gold, and, in faith and hope, we bid her work it out. The English cannot have too many of the domestic novels of a kindred people, if they shall be found to resemble The Neighbours of Frederika Bremer. Of this story of every-day life, the Germans, a brother-people, have already had three editions. The work is also highly adapted to the United States; and the entire undegenerate portion of the British nation must give it a cordial welcome. It is just such a novel as might have been written in England a century ago, had Fielding had any female counterpart, and if French literature and French models had not corrupted or biassed the natural genius of our insular light literature. Somewhat of this bias is visible in the popular modern literature of every northern people; nor has the authoress of The Neighbours wholly escaped the foreign taint, though it is neutralized by her genuine purity, and her heartiness and geniality. The authoress of The Neighbours, Frederika Bremer, spinster, is styled by Mrs. Howitt the Miss Austin of Sweden; and undoubtedly she is, if in one sense not quite equal, in another, superior to Miss Austin. If less subtle and delicately sagacious in the analysis of the everyday men and women of her story—her vivacity is more sparkling; and she possesses, or, at all events, gives freer rein to high imagination. Though quite as delicate as is compatible with a genuine and unpretending modesty, the Swedish single lady also assumes more freedom in delineating "the chaste mysteries of Hymen,"—the inner conjugal life, than any English spinster would have dared to do, and which not every married English authoress would consider herself safe in exhibiting. This freedom sits, however, with excellent grace upon Frederika Bremer, and wonderfully heightens the charm of her narrative.

In point of execution, or, as a whole, the novel (which is the author's first work) is certainly not without faults. We have too much of a certain Ma chère mère, admirable as she is, and far too much of her son, Bruno, and his coal-black steed. A good deal of the second volume might have been spared, with manifest advantage to the interest of the mere story, which drags at last; but we can understand and sympathize with some of the vulgar, or paper-and-print, necessities of authorship, and overlook the tedious or repetitive, for the sake of the true, the natural, the glowing, the tender, and really beautiful delineations of everyday middle life with which we are presented in these delightful volumes. The entire scenes are laid in a rather remote province of Sweden; and the manners and customs in the leading house would, we presume, be considered old-fashioned, even in that country. The book opens where most other novels end, with a marriage just past—and not at all a romantic one—and the bride on her way to her husband's house, her future home, in the country. He has lived a bachelor for nearly fifty years, with many of a bachelor's habits; and, though the son of a distinguished family, he is a physician, living at a short distance from the market-town, where he in general practises. His bride is a very lively little lady, of at least twenty-seven, reduced by family distress to become a teacher of music, and one who brings to her new condition, if not passionate love, yet grateful affection, and a high and warm sense of duty. It is in her letters, the letters of Dr. Werner's "little wife," to a female friend, that the story is told; with certain incidental aids and connecting pieces, which come in like the chorus in a Greek drama.

And thus she opens with herself and her husband, who, though the most humble, modest, and unobtrusive couple in the world, are silently adopted by the reader as the real hero and heroine of the story:—

Rosenvik, 1st June, 18—. Here I am now, my dear Maria, under my own roof, at my own writing-table, and sitting by my own Bear. And who is Bear? you ask: who should it be but my own husband, whom I call Bear because the name suits him so well.

Here then I am, sitting by the window; the sun is setting; two swans swim in the lake and make furrows in its clear mirror; three cows, my cows, stand on the green shore, quite sleek and reflective, thinking certainly upon nothing. How handsome they are! Now comes the maid with her milk-pail; how rich and good is country-milk! but what, in fact, is not good in the country! air and rain, food and feeling, heaven and earth, all is fresh and animated.

But now I must conduct you into my dwelling—no, I will begin yet further off. There, on that hill, in Smaland, several miles off, whence I first looked into the valley where Rosenvik lies, behold a dust-covered carriage, within which sits the Bear and his little wife. That little wife looks forth with curiosity, for before her lies a valley beautiful in the light of evening. Green woods stretch out below, and surround crystal lakes; corn-fields in silken waves encircle grey mountains, and white buildings gleam out with friendly aspects among the trees. Here and there, from the wood-covered heights, pillars of smoke ascend to the clear evening heaven; they might have been mistaken for volcanoes, but they were only peaceful svedjen.* Truly it was beautiful, and I was charmed;

* "The Neighbours; a Story of Everyday Life." Translated by Mary Howitt. 2 vols. London: Longmans.

* Svedjen, the burning of turf, &c., in the fields, used for dressing the land.

I bent myself forward, and was thinking on a certain happy natural family in Paradise, one Adam and Eve, when suddenly the Bear laid his great paws upon me, and held me so tight that I was nearly giving up the ghost, while he kissed me and besought me to find pleasure in what was here. I was the least in the world angry; but, as I knew the heart impulse of this embrace, I made myself tolerably contented.——Here then, in this valley, lay my stationary home, here lived my new family, here lay Rosenvik, here should I and my husband live together. We descended the hill and the carriage rolled rapidly along the level road, while as we advanced he told whose property was this and whose was that, whether near or remote. All was to me like a dream, out of which I was suddenly awoke by his saying with a peculiar accent, "Here lives Ma chère mère," and at the same moment the carriage drove into a court-yard, and drew up at the door of a large handsome stone house.

"What, must we alight here?" I asked.

"Yes, my love," was his reply.

This was to me by no means an agreeable surprise; I would much rather have gone on to my own house; much rather have made some preparation for this first meeting with my husband's step-mother, of whom I stood in great awe from the anecdotes I had heard of her, and the respect which her step-son had for her. This visit seemed to me quite mal-à-propos, but my husband had his own ideas, and as I glanced at him I saw that it was no time for opposition.

It was Sunday, and as the carriage drew up I heard the sound of a violin.

"Aha," said Lars Anders, for such is my husband's christian name, "so much the better!" leaped heavily from the carriage, and helped me out also. There was no time to think about boxes or packages; he took my hand and led me up the steps, along the entrance-hall, and drew me towards the door, whence proceeded the sounds of music and dancing.

"Only see," thought I, "how is it possible for me to dance in this costume?"

O if I could only have gone in somewhere, just to wipe the dust from my face and my bonnet, where at the very least I could just have seen myself in a looking-glass! . . . . . "Now," exclaimed I, in a kind of lively despair, "if you take me to a ball, you Bear, I'll make you dance with me."

"With a world of pleasure!" cried he, and in the same moment we two stood in the hall, when my terror was considerably abated by finding that the great room contained merely a number of cleanly dressed servants, men and women, who leapt about lustily with one another, and who were so occupied with their dancing as scarcely to perceive us. Lars Anders led me to the upper end of the room, where I saw sitting upon a high seat, a very tall and strong-built gentlewoman, who was playing with remarkable fervour upon a violin, and beating time to her music with great power. Upon her head was a tall and extraordinary cap, which I may as well call a helmet, because this idea came into my head at the first glance; and after all I can find no better name for it. This was the Generalin (wife of the General) Mansfeld, step-mother of my husband, Ma chère mère, of whom I had heard so much.

She turned instantly her large dark brown eyes upon us, ceased playing, laid down her violin, and arose with a proud bearing, but with, at the same time, a happy and open countenance. I trembled a little, made a deep curtsey, and kissed her hand; in return she kissed my forehead, and for a moment looked on me so keenly as compelled me to cast down my eyes, whereupon she kissed me most cordially on mouth and forehead, and embraced me as warmly as her step-son. And now came his turn; he kissed her hand most reverentially, but she presented her cheek; they regarded each other with the most friendly expression of countenance, she saying in a loud manly voice the moment afterwards: "You are welcome, my dear friends; it is very handsome of you to come here to me before you have been to your own house; I thank you for it. I might, it is true, have received you better, if I could have made preparations; but at all events, this I know, that 'a welcome is the best dish.' I hope, my friends, that you will remain over the evening with me."

My husband excused us, saying that we wished to reach home soon; that I was fatigued with the journey; but that we could not pass Carlsfors without paying our respects to Ma chère mère.

"Nay, good, good!" said she, apparently satisfied; "we will soon have more talk within, but first I must speak a few words with these people here. Listen, good friends!" and Ma chère mère struck the back of the violin with the bow till a general silence prevailed through the hall. "My children," continued she, in a solemn tone, "I have something to say to you,—the hangman! wilt thou not be quiet there below,—I have to tell you that my beloved son Lars Anders Werner takes home his wife, this Franziska Burén whom you see standing by his side. Marriages are determined in heaven, my children, and we will now pray heaven to bless its work in the persons of this couple. This evening we will drink together a skäl to their wellbeing. So now you can dance, my children! Olof, come here and play thy very best."

While a murmur of exultation and good wishes ran through the assembly, Ma chère mère took me by the hand and led me, together with my husband, into another room, into which she ordered punch and glasses to be brought; then placing both her elbows firmly upon the table and supporting her chin on her closed fists, she looked at me with a gaze which was rather dark than friendly. Lars Anders, who saw that this review was rather embarrassing to me began to speak of the harvest, and other country affairs; Ma chère mère, however, sighed several times so deeply, that her sighs rather resembled groans, and then, as it were constraining herself, answered to his observations.

The punch came, and then filling the glass, she said, with earnestness in tone and countenance, "Son and son's wife, your health!"

After this she became more friendly, and said in a jesting tone, which by the bye suited her extremely well, "Lars Anders, I suppose we must not say 'you have bought the calf in the sack.' Your wife does not look amiss, and she 'has a pair of eyes fit to buy fish with.' She is little, very little, one must confess; but 'little and bold often push the great ones aside.'"

I laughed, Ma chère mère did the same, and I began to talk and act quite at my ease.

This is a picture of manners beginning to be antiquated, even in Sweden; the Generalin herself being probably coeval with the age of our own Baron Bradwardine, or Magnus Troil. To complete the picture, we must now presume the lively conversation between the new relatives ended, and an invitation to dine with Madame Mansfeld, after a day of rest at home, given and accepted, ere that lady said—

"Now fill your glasses, and come and drink with the people. Trouble man may keep to himself, but pleasure he must enjoy in company." We followed Ma chère mère, who had gone as herald into the dancing-room; they were all standing as we entered with filled glasses, and she spoke something after this manner: "One must never triumph before one is over the brook; but if people sail in the ship of matrimony with prudence and in the fear of God, there is a proverb which says, 'well begun is half won,' and therefore, my friends, we will drink a skäl to the new-married couple whom you see before you, and wish, not only for them, but for those who come after them, that they may for ever have place in the garden of the Lord!"

"Skäl! skäl!" resounded on all sides. Lars Anders and I drank, and then went round and shook hands with so many people that my head was quite dizzy.

All this over, we prepared for our departure, and then came Ma chère mère to me on the steps with a packet, or rather a bundle in her hand, saying, in the most friendly manner, "Take these veal cutlets with you, children, for breakfast to-morrow morning. In a while you will fatten and eat your own veal; but daughter-in-law, don't forget one thing—let me have my napkin back again! Nay, you shall not carry it, dear child, you have quite enough to do with your bag (pirat) and your cloak. Lars Anders must carry the veal cutlets;" and then, as if he were a little boy still, she gave him the bundle and showed him how he must carry it, all which he did as she bade him, and still her last words were "Don't forget now, that I have my napkin back!"

I glanced full of amazement at my husband, but he only smiled and helped me into the carriage. As to the veal cutlets, I could not but rejoice over them, for I could not tell in what state I might find the provision-room at Rosenvik. Right glad also was I to arrive "at home," and to see a maid-servant and a ready-prepared bed, for we had travelled that day ten miles, (Swedish,) and I was greatly fatigued. I had slept a little on the quarter-of-a-mile way between Carlsfors and Rosenvik, and the twilight had come on so rapidly that, as about eleven o'clock at night we arrived at home, I was unable to see what my Eden resembled. The house seemed, however, to me, somewhat grey and small in comparison of the one we had just left; but that was of no consequence, Lars Anders was so cordially kind, and I was so cordially sleepy. But all at once I was wide awake, for as I entered it seemed to me like a fairy tale. I stepped into a handsome well-lighted room, in the middle of which stood a nicely arranged tea-table glittering with silver and china, whilst beside the tea-table stood the very neatest of maid-servants, in that pretty holiday dress which is peculiar to the peasant girls of this country.

I uttered an exclamation of delight, and all sleep at once was gone. In a quarter of an hour I was quite ready, and sat down as hostess at the tea-table, admiring the beautiful tablecloth, the teacups, the teapot, the teaspoons, upon which were engraved our joint initials, and served tea to my husband, who seemed happy to his heart's core.

And thus the morning and the evening were the first day.

The next morning, as I opened my eyes, I saw that my Adam was directing his eyes with an expression of great devotion towards the window, where a ray of sunshine streamed in through a hole in the blue striped window-curtains, whilst at the same time the mewing of a cat might be heard.

"My beloved husband!" began I solemnly, "I thank you for the beautiful music which you have prepared for my welcome. I conjecture you have a troop of country girls all dressed in white to scatter twigs of fir before my feet. I will soon be ready to receive them."

"I have arranged something much better than this old-fashioned pageantry," said he merrily. "In association with a great artist, I have prepared a panorama which will show you how it looks in Arabia Deserta. You need only to lift up these curtains."

You may imagine, Maria, that I was soon at the window,—with a sort of sacred awe drew aside the curtains. Ah, Maria! there lay before me, in the full glory of the morning, a crystal lake; green meadows, and groves lay around, and in the middle of the lake a small island, upon which grew a magnificent oak; over all the sun shone brightly, and all was so peaceful, so paradisiacal in its beauty, that I was enchanted, and for the first moment could not speak, I could only fold my hands whilst tears filled my eyes.

"May you be happy here!" whispered Lars Anders, and clasped me to his heart.—"I am happy, too happy!" said I, deeply moved, "and grateful."—"Do you see the island, that little Svanö?" asked he, "I will row you often there on a summer's evening; we will take our evening meal with us, and eat it there."—"Why not breakfast?" inquired I, suddenly fired with the idea, "why not to-day, in this beautiful morning, go and drink our coffee? I will immediately"—"No, not this morning," interrupted he, laughing at my earnestness, "I must go into the city and visit my patients."—"Ah!" exclaimed I, in a tone of vexation, "what a thing it is that people cannot remain in health!"—"What then should I do?" asked he, in a sort of comic terror. "Row me over to Svanö," was my reply.—"I shall be back," said he, "for dinner about three o'clock, and then we can—that cursed hole there above," said he; "I could not have believed that the curtains had been so tor—"

"That hole shall remain as long as I am here," exclaimed I with enthusiasm, interrupting him; "never would I forget that through that hole I first saw sunshine at Rosenvik!"

And now the husband is off in his cabriolet to visit his patients, and his little wife is left to examine her new household, and look after her housekeeping; for housewifery is still the main business of the ladies of Sweden, and its homely details are seriously and frequently brought forward in The Neighbours, in a manner which few English writers would have risked; though a dinner might have been described for the purpose of covering, with utter ridicule, the attempt to give one's friends a dinner, without the appliances of first-rate means and first-rate artists. The personages, many of them, are quite as natural and homely as the veal cutlets and the napkin.——Thus the bride describes her most worthy husband, for whom her affections deepen and warm by beautiful gradations, until the union of prudence and good sense becomes "the marriage of true hearts," the tenderest and most cordial and confiding attachment. Every old bachelor meditating the daring step of marrying a woman twenty years younger than himself, should first put The Neighbours into her hands. Thus the wife begins her household sketches:—

First of all for my husband—for my own Bear—here then you shall have his portrait. Of a middle size, but proportionably, not disagreeably, stout and broad; a handsome, well-curled peruke, made by the Creator's own hand; large countenance, couleur de rose; small, clear grey eyes, with a certain penetrating glance, under large, bushy, yellow-grey eyebrows; the nose good, though somewhat thick; the mouth large, with good teeth—but brown, alas! from tobacco smoking; large hands, but well made and well kept; large feet, the gait like a bear: but this gives no idea of his exterior, if you do not take into account an expression of open-hearted goodness and cheerfulness, which inspires a joyful confidence in the beholder. This speaks when the mouth is silent, as is most frequently the case; the forehead is serene, and the bearing of the head such as reminds one of an astronomer; the voice is a deep bass, which is not at all amiss in singing. Here then you have his exterior. His inward self, best Maria, I have not yet myself studied. Betrothed to him only within two months, wife since fourteen days, I have not had great opportunity to become acquainted with a man who is generally silent, and whom I have not known more than half a year. But I trust and hope all for good! You ask whether I feel love, actual love for him; and give, half in jest, half in earnest, extraordinary signs by which I may be able to prove this. . . . . In the first place he is much older than I am; he is nearly fifty, and I want yet three years of thirty; further, he has been so long an old bachelor, has his good and his bad habits, and these last I do not find at all agreeable; but they shall not destroy our domestic happiness, of that I am determined. Thus, in the first place, he has a habit of spitting about everywhere, on handsome matting just the same as on bare boards,—that habit he must leave off.

After going over her friend's infallible signs, Madame Werner finds that she is not in love; for she perceives, that what are faults in anybody else, are also, in her eyes, faults in her husband; and she acknowledges that he has many bad habits: "But understand," she adds, "that I can very well endure him. I must have found him excellent, otherwise I should not have married him. But love!—hem!" The faults are,—

Secondly, he smokes a great deal; to this I shall accustom myself, because I know how necessary and agreeable a pipe is to those who have made it for long the companion of their way through life; but we will have a contract between us thus: "I am quite willing to see the lighted pipe, yet it shall only seldom be introduced into the parlour, and never into our bed-room; he may puff away as much as he likes in his own room, and in the hall, where the fumes pass away freely." Thirdly, he has an extraordinary habit of making most horrible faces, often to his own thoughts, and often during the conversation of others; but here we will have an understanding between us,—sometimes I shall say to him, "Bear, don't make such horrible faces!" but most frequently I shall leave him quietly to himself, because I know how painful it would be, how almost impossible for him to counteract such a long-accustomed working of the features; more especially as it often furnishes a mode of speech which is very expressive, and appears more merry than disagreeable. Fourthly, he has a kind of carpenter mania, and would very willingly sit of an evening and chisel and glue, and make dirty work over table, and chair, and floor; to this I will accustom myself with my whole heart, and merely every morning make all carefully clean again. It always gives me pleasure when a gentleman has some little favourite occupation; and after Bear has been occupying himself all day till he is weary with his medical profession, this is a cheerful diversion of mind to him. Fifthly, he has a habit of using certain coarse words; this I will patiently, and by little and little, get him to leave off; but that to which I am most fully determined above all things to accustom him is, to feel himself happy, and to find contentment and pleasure in his own house;—for, Maria, I was poor, was obliged to get my bread in the sweat of my own brow—for teaching music is no light labour. I was not young any longer, had no beauty, nor talent beyond that little bit of music,—and he, from a family of consequence, of a respectable station in life, and universally esteemed on account of his character, his knowledge, his qualifications, selected me from among many richer, handsomer, and better than I. He attended me during my severe fever with the utmost kindness, and when my mother would have recompensed his trouble with the remains of our hoarded-up money, he put it aside, and requested—my hand. Then he was kind to all who belonged to me, gave presents to my brothers, and through him prosperity entered into our formerly needy house. Should I not be grateful? should I not like him? should I not endeavour with all my power, with my utmost ability, to make him happy? Ah yes! that will I; with all his virtues and his defects, in jest and in earnest, in good and in evil, will I make him happy; and a voice within me says that I shall succeed.

This is setting out well. And she did succeed—even beyond all expectation.

The first quarrel is related with great truth and lively humour, and contains one of those lessons of social wisdom of which Mrs. Howitt gives us promise in her preface:—one given by a spinster to all married women. The contract about smoking had been made and formally signed. When the day came for the new-married couple to pay their visit to the tremendous Generalin, "Ma chère mère," the young wife had a headache; was out of spirits and out of looks, and would fain have pleaded the bad weather as an excuse to remain at home.

But when I gave the slightest hint of that, he made such terrible grimaces that I gave up all attempts of the kind. So we mounted the cabriolet, and in drizzling rain drove off under an umbrella. Ma chère mère received us friendly, but she did not seem to be in good humour herself. There were several old ladies and gentlemen to dine, all strangers to me; it was a heavy affair; and though the dinner was magnificent, spite of all my attempts, I could eat nothing.

In the afternoon, immediately after coffee, Bear went with the gentlemen down into the billiard-room, leaving me with Ma chère mère, the old ladies, who kept talking to themselves, and a certain Lagman Hök, an old and tried friend of Ma chère mère, who sate near her and took snuff. Ma chère mère was silent, played patience and looked grave. I said now and then a word, but every moment grew stiller, for my head ached sadly; the rain beat against the window, and to tell the truth I was out of humour with Lars Anders, who it seemed to me might have come, at least once during that long afternoon, to look after his little wife, and not have gone thus indulging his old bachelor habits of playing billiards, drinking and smoking; and in this ill-humour the afternoon wore by.

Towards evening Ma chère mère requested me to play something; I sate down to the piano, made a prelude, and began to sing that beautiful little thing, "Youth;" but the heat, my headache, and my chagrin together, put me quite out of voice. I sung at first tremulously, then false, and at last out of time, although I had sung that piece a hundred times before. All was as still as death in the room, and I really could have cried, only that at my age one cannot be so affected. I struck a few closing notes and left the piano, with an apology and a few words on my headache. Notwithstanding all this, Ma chère mère seemed really kind towards me; she seated herself by me on the sofa, gave me a great cup of strong tea, and treated me as people treat a sick child. I was now really come to the crying point; for all this, together with the good Lagman Hök's politeness, overcame me. I thought now truly this was the completion of the deplorable part I had been playing the whole day, and that Ma chère mère would think to herself, Lars Anders has made but a bad choice; he has brought home a wife, who is at the same time old and childish, sickly and full of affectation! I was downright miserable.

At last Lars Anders came, and then it was time to leave; the weather had become fine, and the tea had done me good, but the mischief had taken possession of my soul. I was out of humour with myself, with my husband, with the whole world; and more than this, Bear sate all the time silent, and never seemed to trouble himself about my headache, for after he had just asked how I was, and I had answered "better," he did not speak another word.

When I came home I had something in the kitchen to see after, and when I returned to the parlour, there had Lars Anders settled himself into the sofa, and was blowing the tobacco-smoke in long wreaths before him while he read the newspaper. He had not indeed chosen a suitable time for the breach of our compact. I made a remonstrance, and that truly in a lively tone, but in reality I was angry. I took, as it were, a bad pleasure in making him pay for the annoying day I had passed.

"Pardon!" exclaimed he in a cheerful voice, and still continued to sit with the pipe in his mouth. I would not allow that, for I thought the old bachelor might have indulged himself freely enough the whole afternoon.

He prayed for permission only this once to smoke in the parlour; but I would admit of no negotiation, and threatened that if the pipe was not immediately taken away, I would go and sit for the whole evening in the hall. In the beginning, he besought me jokingly to grant him quiet; then he became graver, and prayed earnestly, beseechingly; prayed me at last "out of regard to him." I saw that he wanted to try me; saw that truly from his heart that he wished I would yield—and I, detestable creature, would not. I remained steadfastly, although always cheerfully, by my determination, and at last took up my work in order to go out. Then Lars Anders laid down his pipe;—oh, if he had been only angry and spiteful; if he only would not have laid down his pipe, but would have marched out as proud as a nabob, banged the door violently after him, and never come back again the whole evening, then there would have been some "come off" for me, some comfort, something paid for and done with; and then I could have touched over this fatal history so finely and so superficially. But he did none of all these; he laid the pipe aside, and remained sitting silently; and with that I began immediately to endure the gnawings of conscience: neither did he make any of his grimaces, but remained looking on his newspaper, with a certain grave and quiet mien that went to my very heart. I asked him to read aloud; he did so, but there was a something in his voice that I was in no condition to hear; still, in a sort of stifled bitterness against myself, I must yet tyrannise over him. I snatched the newspaper away from him—understand, this was in joke—and said I would read it myself; he looked at me, and let me have my way. I read, in a tolerably cheerful voice, of a debate in the English House of Commons; but I could not hold out long. I burst into tears, flew to him, threw my arms round his neck, and prayed him to forgive my bad humour and my folly. Without answering, he held me close to his breast so tenderly, so forgivingly, whilst a tear slowly ran down his cheek. Never did I love him so much as in this moment; in this moment I felt for him real love!

I would have begun an explanation, but he would not permit it; and now it was my turn to beg of him, if he loved me, to relight his pipe, and to smoke directly at my very side. He refused; but I besought him so long and earnestly, besought it as a token of continued forgiveness, that he at last yielded. I held my face as much as possible over the smoke—it was to me the incense of reconciliation; once I was nearly coughing, but I changed this into a sigh, and said, "Ah, my own Bear, your wife would not have been so angry if you had not forgotten her for the whole afternoon; she lost all patience while she was longing after you."

"I had not forgotten you, Fanny," said he, taking the pipe from his mouth, and looking half reproachfully on me; "but I was beside a peasant's painful deathbed in the next hamlet: this prevented me from being with you."

Ashamed to the very soul, I covered my face with my hands—I, I who had been fostering such wicked and false mistrusts against him, and now in my vanity had been revenging myself—I, unworthy one—I who wished to make him so happy, what sweet refreshment had I prepared for the weary, troubled man!

The thought of my folly distresses me even at this very moment; and the only thing that can give me any comfort, is the feeling that he and I love one another better since this occurrence than before.

Beloved, good Lars Anders! before I will occasion you another disagreeable moment, you may smoke every day in parlour, sleeping-room, yes, even in bed itself, if you will; only I pray God that the desire to do so may not possess you.

So ends this charming matrimonial lesson. The next visit to Ma chère mère was a voluntary one, proposed by the young wife, who longed to atone for her behaviour on the former day; and Thursday proved as cheerful and cordial as Tuesday had been dull and disagreeable. The Generalin was on this day occupied, to the finger-ends, with her house-thrift. She was preparing to receive two more step-sons, the half-brothers of Bear, with their young wives, who were to reside with her for some time.

Ma chère mère received us in the kindest manner: Bear she provided with newspapers and Virginia tobacco, and me she bespoke as assistant for the whole afternoon. I was cheerful and willing, and succeeded perfectly in pleasing her. Furniture was removed, curtains rehung, and all went quickly and well under her commands and with my assistance. We despatched a world of work, and were right merry over it; many were the bon mots which I made, greatly to Ma chère mère's amusement. She slapped me, pinched my ears, laughed and replied merrily, and altogether afforded me a deal of pleasure.

There is something quite original and fresh in her disposition and manners, and mode of thought; and she has, without doubt, good understanding and great natural wit. The mode of managing her household appears to me strange; it is by union of severity and tenderness; they are at one and the same time, her slaves and her children, and they on their part appear at once to surrender themselves, and obey her slightest hint.

One only time she and I were near coming to a misunderstanding; it was about the toilet tables of the young wives, which I wished to have a little more luxuriously supplied; but Ma chère mère grew angry, excited herself over "the cursed luxury" of our times, and over the pretensions of young women; declaring that the toilet tables should stand exactly as she had placed them, with the same covers and the same looking-glasses, as they were quite good enough. To all this I remained silent, and therefore all was soon right again; yet after all I am not sure whether the toilet covers were not changed, as, soon after, Ma chère mère betook herself to her linen-press.

To the arrangement of the chambers, succeeded several rougher pieces of house business in which I was invited to take part; "for," said Ma chère mère, "it will do you good, little friend, to see how things are managed in a well-ordered household. It will be necessary for you to learn this and the other in domestic economy. 'Roasted pigeons do not fly down people's throats; and one must look if there be anything in the cellar, if one expect anything on the table.'"

I followed Ma chère mère therefore into the cellar, where, with a large piece of red chalk in her hand, she made various, and to me cabalistical, signs and strokes upon herring and salmon tubs, all which she explained to me; and then led me into every corner of these subterraneous and well-superintended vaults. After this we came above ground, where I assisted in the examination of bread-safes; delivered anathemas over rats and mice, and weighed several flour sacks. Last of all I must be weighed myself; and as I proved not to weigh quite five pounds (Swedish) Ma chère mère laughed at me in the most extraordinary manner, asserting that a woman had been burnt as a witch in the time of Charles XI. because she was under five pounds weight. All this I endured in the most philosophical manner—but no philosophy whatever would prevent my admiration of her housekeeping and domestic arrangements. . . . . When all this rummaging about, and this thorough house-inspection was brought to an end, we sate down on a sofa to rest, and Ma chère mère addressed me in the following manner: "It is only now and then, my dear Franziska, that I make such a house review, but it keeps everything in order, and fills the domestics with respect. Set the clock only to the right time, and it will go right of itself, and thus one need not go about tick-tacking like a pendulum. Keep this in mind, my Franziska. Many ladies affect a great deal, and make themselves very important with their bunch of keys, running for ever into the kitchen and store-room;—all unnecessary labour, Franziska; much better is it for a lady to govern her house with her head than with her heels; the husband likes that best, or if he do not he is a stupid fellow, and the wife ought then in heaven's name to box him on the ears with her bunch of keys! Many ladies will have their servants for ever on their feet: that does no good; servants must have their liberty and rest sometimes; one must not muzzle the ox that treads out the corn. Let your people be answerable for all they do; it is good for them as well as the mistress. Have a hold upon them either by the heart or by honour, and give them ungrudgingly whatever by right is theirs, for the labourer is worthy of his hire. But then, three or four times a-year, but not at any regular time, come down upon them like the day of judgment; turn every stone and see into every corner, storm like a thunder tempest, and strike down here and there at the right time ; it will purify the house for many weeks.

This was Ma chère mère's housekeeping doctrine. She next turned the conversation on my husband, and said, "Yes, you can say justly, my dear Franziska, that you are married to a man who through the whole day will be husband ; but still in his own way he is very wilful, and you will have to manage him pretty much in the same way as I managed my husband. Come, we shall see how you will do ! You are little, but you can bestir yourself ; and I will now tell you how you must conduct yourself towards your husband. You will always find him an honourable man, therefore I give you this one especial piece of advice—never have recourse to untruths with him, be it ever so small, or to help yourself out of ever so great a difficulty; for untruth leads ever into still greater difficulty, and besides this it drives confidence out of the house." . . . . After supper, as we took leave, Ma chère mère slapped me heavily on the shoulder, kissed me and thanked me for a cheerful day. The weather was so fine when we came out on the steps that we determined to walk part of the way, and to send the cabriolet before us. Our walk was very lively, and after many mischievous pranks, I had the luck to see Bear arrive at the bottom of a ditch. I cannot help laughing when I think of it ; he looked so like a real Bear lying there on four feet (between us two I am not quite sure whether he did not allow himself to be rolled over). The good Bear !

We are aware that this is not story, not romance ;—though there is much fine romance in the book—but it is of the essence of real life among a people whom we, in past times, more closely resembled, and by whose example we might, perhaps, in some things profit still. If the sunshine of England's prosperity is really on the decline; if every class is waxing poorer; and if many, once comfortable, are uneasy, or actually impoverished, lessons of economy, of prudence and order in domestic affairs, were never more required than now. Those given in this story, show, among other useful things, that a lady who looked sharply after her domestics, and even after the coarse napkin which wrapped up a homely, but useful and well-timed present, was capable of the highest generosity; of that wise generosity whose only sure foundation is economy, order, and self-denial. Ma chère mère is, indeed, a kind of female W ł-ington, in the great as in the minute points of her character. But we must first have the key to that singular character:—

General Mansfeld married to his first wife a widow lady named Werner, with two sons, the eldest of whom was my husband ; the second, Adolf, who has been dead some years. By this wife the General had two sons who yet live, Jean Jacques and Peter Mansfeld. The mother of these two died whilst they were yet children. A year afterwards the General married a rich and proud Miss Barbara B——, our present Ma chère mère. Lars Anders, who was then thirteen years old, was but little satisfied to receive a stepmother twenty years of age. She however conducted herself most exemplarily, and made an excellent although stern stepmother for the four boys, from whom she won both reverence and love, notwithstanding a certain rigour and economy which she practised towards them. There was, however, reason for the practice of this latter virtue ; for the General, who was himself a man of lavish expenditure, had brought his affairs into great disorder, and his wife only succeeded in preserving her own property by her deed of settlement. From her own income she provided the cost of the four step-sons' education, in which she spared nothing.

The boys were made to observe the most punctilious respect in the paternal house ; they were taught a certain precise politeness, and a French style of manner. Every morning at a stated hour they presented themselves before their parents, kissed their hands, and said, "Bon jour, Mon cher père ; bon jour, Ma chère mère !" and every evening in the same manner, at the appointed time, came the hand-kiss and the "Bon soir, Mon cher père ; bon soir, Ma chère mère !" (thus arose the appellation, Ma chère mère, which the sons always apply to her). This kissing of the hand still remains whenever the sons and mother meet, although the French greeting is discontinued. For the rest, the stern stepmother allowed to her sons a deal of time and freedom for games and bodily exercises, and the enjoyment of the fresh air, for she thought to strengthen at the same time both body and mind by these means ; and they had on the whole a happy youth.

General Mansfeld was a handsome man and a brave soldier, but at the same time extravagant, domineering and wilful. He inquired but little after his children, and lavished away his property. Ma chère mère's marriage with him was not happy, and when he died, he left his sons nothing. Since his death her behaviour to them has, without any ostentation, been the most generous ; for, without making any difference between the sons and stepsons of her husband, she bound herself to allow each one of them, as soon as they came of age, a certain annual sum, whilst she herself held the stewardship of her large but debt-burdened estate. My husband, who had chosen his own path in life, and who by his own ability and industry had won for himself an honourable position in society, declined this allowance as soon as he was able, because it was his wish to be dependent on no one, and least of all on Ma chère mère, whose despotic will did not always square with his independent feelings. This, together with some weighty disclosures which various opportunities have brought about, has occasioned them to be towards each other on an independent and very good understanding ; whilst the other sons more or less are obliged to accommodate their wills to hers. Lars Anders and she stand as it were in fear of each other, but have at the same time the highest mutual esteem ; yet she declares that she will never see him beside her as physician. She sends all medicines and all doctors whatever to the hangman ; will have nothing to do with any of them ; and supports her opinion by the proverb, that "nobody can be a good physician till he has filled a churchyard."

Since I have undertaken to write the history of Ma chère mère, I will also sketch her portrait. See, then, a tall lady, of a large but handsome growth, whose figure in youth must have possessed both symmetry and strength ; very straight, somewhat stiff, and with the mien and bearing of a General. The countenance would be handsome, were not the features so strongly marked and the complexion so grey ; the chin, also, is somewhat too large and projecting. Round the mouth, which is furnished with large, white teeth, a very friendly, pleasant smile often plays ; but when the sentiment is less friendly, the under lip closes over the upper, and gives a character of such stern determination as is not pleasing in a woman. But Ma chère mère is a peculiar person. Her hair is quite grey, and streams sometimes, but not in curls, forth from the helmet ; which head-dress thrones itself solitarily on the stern, high, often cloudy forehead. No ornament nor jewel appears upon her attire ; but instead, the greatest cleanliness is attended to, and a something strikingly accordant and appropriate. Ma chère mère never is tight-laced. (In parenthes is let it be remarked, that I should not wonder if lacing up tight may not have something to do with our often being less agreeable in company—the soul never can move freely when the body is in fetters). Her dress generally is of brown or grey silk ; in the morning the yet handsome neck is covered by a white handkerchief, which towards noon is exchanged for a standing collar. The hands are well made, though large, and though not always used, as we must confess, in the most pacific work. Ma chère mère has a rough voice, speaks loud and distinctly, makes use sometimes of extraordinary words, and has a vast many proverbs at her tongue's end. She walks with great strides, often in boots, and swings her arms about ; still, whenever it is her will to do so, she can assume a style of the highest and most perfect breeding. People accuse her of being avaricious, of mixing herself in the affairs of others, and with disregard of consequences; many, indeed, are the histories which are related of her; nevertheless, every one throughout the whole country has the highest respect for her, and her word is worth as much as a king's, for the universal opinion respecting her is, that she is prudent, a person to be relied upon, and a steadfast friend. This appears to me beautiful in her. She reminds me of Götz von Berlechingen; and it sometimes appears to me as if deep and tender feeling were hidden under this stern exterior, and then I feel as if I might love her.

Hitherto, she has been the steward of her own estate, and has managed her affairs admirably; now, however, she wishes that Jean Jacques should take part with her. This son has studied agriculture abroad, has lately married, and will now come and settle down at Carlsfors. Lars Anders shakes his head over this partnership—Ma chère mère and Jean 'Jaques!

It is impossible to speak fully of Ma chère mère without mentioning her maid Elsa. These two have lived together forty years, and appear as if it were impossible for the one to live without the other. Elsa is towards her mistress at once a slave and a tyrant. She is so avaricious that she almost begrudges her mistress the wear of her own clothes, and grumbles over every clean pocket-handkerchief she gives her. But in fidelity, order, and cleanliness, she has not her equal; and on this account her mistress regards her with a certain respect, and yields in many a little strife between them the mastery to her. When there is occasion, Elsa will work for her mistress night and day: Ma chère mère is her fate. Ma chère mère is her sphere of action; Ma chère mère's word is her law; Ma chère mère's person her proper self; without her lady, Elsa is nothing. Once she received permission to visit her family, and to be away eight days; but Elsa was back with her mistress before two days were over.

Such is Madam Mansfeld and her prime maid. We have, as we have intimated, fully enough of her peculiarities at last; though she afterwards comes out in quite a new and majestic aspect—with all the grandeur and sternness of a Spartan mother. She is the most devoted mother of one son, of Bruno, the romantic and mysterious hero of the tale, whom her over-strained notions of honour, and rigour of early discipline, had long since banished for ever from her presence, loaded with the maternal curse, which ate as corrodingly into her own large and passionate heart, as into that of her victim. But of all this the young wife yet knows nothing.

It seems to be the custom of Sweden, that newmarried folks, instead of sitting in state to receive the homage and congratulations of their acquaintances and friends, wait upon as many of their neighbours as they choose, who only then return their visits. These observances bring the Bear and his lively Franziska into contact with The Neighbours, and cause many characters and groups to pass before the reader. But first their own small household is arranged—and a wise and comfortable arrangement it was; and so happy and bright a home did Rosenvik become, that wherever Franziska went, she quickly, like a bird for its nest, longed to return to her own dear little Rosenvik, as a good and happy wife should. Here is the domicile: it is to us more attractive than The Neighbours.

Rosenvik belongs to the estate of Carlsfors, and lies a good half mile from W., where my husband is the principal and most beloved physician. He rents this little place from Ma chère mère, because he, as well as I, are so fond of the country. It is to us a source of pleasure rather than profit, although I have my own speculations about the garden, out of which I think something may be made, though as yet it is no more than a wilderness. The garden, a birch grove, and a meadow in which three cows and a horse have their living, is the whole demesne of Rosenvik. Why it has this name of Rosenvik or Rose-Creek, I cannot imagine, as, although it lies on a creek of the Helga Lake, no rose-bushes are to be found near it; nothing but a quantity of hyssop and elder. This we may preserve, and not throw the other away; but I hope that Rosenvik may yet do honour to its name; and in the meantime, that the beautiful may not supplant the useful, I shall plant currants, peas, and beans, in plenty. On the whole, I rejoice to find myself in a place where there is yet something to do, and where all is not ready and complete. My disposition and my temperament require much employment, and I know how dear that is for which one has worked. The house is small, but comfortably furnished; we have four rooms and a kitchen on the ground-floor. Lars Anders has had them all very prettily furnished; especially the company parlour, with its blue-chintz covered furniture and white muslin curtains, is a sweetly pretty room. In the second story are two handsome guest chambers. The kitchen and store-room were, I must acknowledge, but indifferently supplied, but that is a need, thank God! soon remedied.

In respect to money, my husband has made a regulation which, at the same time that it gives me pleasure, has occasioned me some little uneasiness. He puts all his money into a strong box, to which he has had two keys made, the one he keeps and I the other, with full permission to take out as much money as I will, and when I will, without rendering any account to him. This proof of his perfect confidence in my prudence delights me, and at the same time this his confidence in me is a far stronger bond than any avarice on his part could be. I always fear to take out too much, and not to economize as I ought; constantly avoiding to indulge my heart or even my thoughts in any little extraordinary expenditure, because I myself brought not a penny into that coffer; all that I find there belongs to him, and is the wages of his labour. It seems to me as if I should be more free, and that it would be better if he would allow me monthly a stated sum. One day I made this proposal to him, confessing all my scruples to him with tears in my eyes, but he would not hear a word of it. "Are we not one?" said he, "and I have seen already that you are a skilful manager!" With respect to the scruples, he assured me that I should lose them as we came to know each other better, for that then I should find that there would be no mine and thine between us two. I am greatly disposed to believe in the good man's prophecy; but yet I intend, not only for the peace of my own conscience, but for the sake of good order, to keep an exact account of all my expenditure.

I am greatly pleased with the little maiden that Lars Anders has provided for me, and who is to be my own maid: she is a young peasant girl, with such a happy, innocent, pretty appearance, as does one good even to see. She is quiet and industrious, has understanding and a good heart, so that it will be a pleasure to me to instruct her. If God give me children, Sissa shall take care of them. I will model her into a real Bonne for them, so that I may be easy on their account when they are not in my own arms. The recollection of my own childhood tells me how important first impressions are; therefore purity, goodness, and good sense shall watch over the cradle of my child; shall even then begin to establish themselves in the soul; and one does not soon become indifferent to the friends of one's childhood. I am speaking all this time of modelling my maid to her duties; but believe me, my Maria, that I will not forget also to model myself. How is it that the flame is so soon extinguished on the altar of love? Because the married pair forget to supply materials for the fire. One must unfold, and cultivate, and perfect one's self in one's progress through life, and then life will become an unfolding of love and happiness.

My first employment will be to arrange my house so that contentment and peace may dwell in it.

We are certain that we have inspired at least our fair readers with a longing desire to see how Madam Werner succeeds in her virtuous schemes; and now—

Everything in the house and in the whole household arrangement is in order. Little pâtés are baking in the kitchen; the weather is oppressively hot; and every leaf and bird seem as if deprived of motion. The hens lie outside in the sand before the window; the cock stands solitarily on one leg, and looks upon his harem with the countenance of a sleepy sultan: Bear sits in his room writing letters—I hear him yawn, that infects me—oh! oh!—I must go and have a little quarrel with him on purpose to awaken us both.

I want at this moment a quire of writing paper on which to drop sugar-cakes. He is terribly miserly of his writing paper, and on that very account I must have some now.

The quarrel is charmingly got over, the paper obtained, and this other lesson given. The wife had been saucy; and, says her Bear—

"Nay—I'll pardon you. But now, no sour faces, dear wife, but throw your arms round my neck and kiss me."

I gave him—a little box on the ear, stole a quire of paper, and ran off with loud exultation. Bear followed into the kitchen, growling horribly; but then I turned round upon him armed with two delicious little pâtés, which I aimed at his mouth, and there they vanished. Bear all at once was quite still, the paper was forgotten, and reconciliation concluded.

There is, Maria, no better way of stopping the mouths of these lords of the creation than by putting into them something good to eat.

Visits of ceremony are, we learn, made in Sweden in the afternoon, and after dinner, too; for in the rude countries of the North, as in Germany and the United States of America, people still dine before supper-time; and the women devote their mornings to their households, their children, or their own pursuits. Madame Werner put on a pretty straw bonnet, with flowers, to make her first appearance among "The Neighbours;" and the gardener lad, clad in a grey jacket, with a green velvet collar, was transformed into a footman. But Madame Werner had another—a bride's bonnet, of white crape—in which her Bear thought she looked "lovely;" and Ma chère mère must see her in it: so on it went, though the roads were dusty, and the rain threatening. The festival-bonnet was consequently sacrificed; but what did that signify, compared with pleasing the Bearish husband, who said his little wife "looked lovely" in it?

The first afternoon's round among the neighbours, is amusing enough, and the persons visited are well worth knowing. The second and third are better; but the fire-side conversation over the persons seen, and Bear's reflections, are best of all:—

Yesterday afternoon we were at home, and rejoiced on that account. Lars Anders worked like a regular joiner, and I read to him what I had written about our visiting days. It gave him pleasure; he laughed, and yet he blamed me at the same time for having spoken with so much severity of some persons; neither was he quite satisfied with the judgment I had passed on the Von P.'s.

"You call them," said he, "a collection of unfortunate pretensions, and yet you have seen them only once. It is very difficult, my dear Fanny, to pass judgment on men after a long acquaintance, and quite impossible to do so after one visit. Beyond this, many persons under different circumstances exhibit such different sides of their character. I have seen people affected and ridiculous in society, whom I have admired by a sick bed; many, in one case wearisome and assuming, who in another have been discreet and agreeable. Others, again, have eccentricities at one time which they lose later in life; many turn their best side inward, and perform the noblest actions, whilst the world is laughing at the fool's cap which they seem to exhibit. It may be so with this family."

"Granted, granted, dear Bear," said I; "and I promise you, that as soon as I become aware of the fair side, I'll paint it in my best colours."

"But were it not better till then," argued he, "to place the faults more in the shadow? It is exactly by such over-hasty judgments that man injures his neighbour, for nobody reflects that one fault does not spoil the whole person."

"What would you have?" asked I, "you distress me: do you wish that I should throw all I have written into the fire?"

"No, let it be as it is," said he; "the mind of your reader will probably suggest what I have said."

"But for greater security, Bear, and to ease my own conscience, I will make her partaker of our little conversation."

And this, my best Maria, I have now done. Ah, I shall always remain an over-hasty person, who judges by first impressions!

Another visit remained to be made. It was to the family of Mr. Dahl, particular friends of the Bear, in which dwelt a Serena, of whom all men, and all women too, spoke well. When Bear was asked by his wife where this wondrous Serena lived, he only replied, "Yes, she is lovely!" She was, at last, seen. We select this group from The Neighbours, as, besides skilful delineation, it is more Swedish, more strictly national, than the pretending Von P.'s and the lively Miss Hausgiebel, a little, cultivated old maid, quick as a bird, who exhibits, with kindness and pride, a wonderful museum which she has collected. But she is not a Serena of whom we are told by Madame Werner—

I come from—a better world; I have been in the kingdom of heaven! Do you wish to know how it looks there?

There was a patriarch and wife; and only to see that ancient, venerable couple, made the heart rejoice. Tranquillity was upon their brows, cheerful wisdom on their lips, and in their glance one read love and peace. A band of angels surrounded them: some little children; others blooming maidens, of whom one particularly fixed my attention, because she so perfectly answered my idea of a seraph; not because all the other angels surrounded her, not because she was so beautiful—for she was not beautiful—but because she looked so pure and loving, and because she seemed to be there for the happiness of all.

Now she was with the patriarchs, and mutual love beamed from glance and gesture; then she lifted angel-children in her arms, and kissed and embraced them; and then she spoke joyous, graceful words with the angel-maidens. She was a kind, heavenly being, whose happiness seemed to consist in love. She gave a sign, and nectar and delicious fruits were carried around, whilst she herself took care that the children had as much as their little hands could grasp.

The beauty of innocence seemed throned upon her white and gracefully moulded forehead, which affected me as if by the foresight of a heavenly vision. The expression of her beautiful blue eyes was clear and holy, and had that quiet bashfulness, that candour, which delights us in children. I never saw a glance which expressed so much inward goodness, which spoke so plainly that her whole world was pure blessedness. The light-brown hair was of wonderful beauty and brightness, and the skin white and transparent; in short, I never saw a form so much resembling a beautiful soul, nor a manner which so much reminded me of music.

I learned that this affectionate maiden was called Serena, and that the children had assembled to celebrate her birth-day. All gathered themselves around her, all stood in need of her, all listened to her, and all were listened to by her.

"Ah, Serena!" said the angel-maidens, "sing us 'The Flower Gatherer,' that lovely, sweet song."

"O Serena!" besought the angel-children, "play to us that we may dance."

"I will do what you wish," said the kind Serena; "but what shall I do first? I fancy I must first play for the children, and then we will ask the stranger lady to sing us that beautiful song, because she sings it better certainly than I do."

Serena sate down and played, whilst the young danced and the old smiled, so that it was a pleasure to see. After the dance the fruit-basket was again carried round, and then Serena asked me in the name of all, to sing "The Flower Gatherer." I sate down to the piano, and the little band with oranges in their hands thronged around me; their rosy cheeks and joyful glances animating my song.

"Ah, once more! once more!" burst forth from all sides when I had ended; so I sang it, yet once and twice again, the little angels seeming as if they could not be satisfied. The patriarchs thanked me for my song even as heartily as the children, and I thanked—the poet.

Serena then introduced games of various kinds, and all was laughter and fun during these games. . . . . So passed the whole evening, with games, dance, song, and laughter. At one time the angel-band, conducted by Serena, came and danced round the patriarchs, enclosing us in the joyful circle, till again breaking loose, in the midst of song, they dispersed to form new groups.

However beautiful and joyous it might be in the kingdom of heaven, still we must think of returning to our little earthly home; so, after we had supped with the angels, we set out on our way. . . . . On the way home I could talk of nothing but Serena, and went to sleep with her lovely image in my soul. . . . . Away from home may be good, but at home is best! So have I often thought during the two pleasant days I have passed quietly in looking after my own affairs, in taming my Bear and my little animals. All goes on quite well: six hens, three ducks, and two turkeys, are now my intimate acquaintance. I have caressed and fed the cows to-day—the fine creatures; the largest and handsomest of which I have christened Audumbla, in memory of the beautiful northern mythology, of which I have read in the symbolical lore of the Edda.

What of my husband? Since he has given up his little vices, he has acquired—God knows how!—continually a greater influence over me. This however is certain, that he is good and reasonable. Yesterday evening he came into our best sitting-room with the pipe in his mouth, but stood at the doorway looking at me, and made such roguish, questioning grimaces, that I sprang up, embraced both him and his pipe, and drew them both into the room. I was so happy that the pipe did not hate the room—but really too much friendship.

The prosaic description of the Dahls, of the Patriarchs, and their lovely granddaughter, Serena, is even more fascinating than these raptures of the first sight. Bear dropt his little wife at their house one morning, much against her will; for, though longing to see them again, she had a wholesome dread of an unbidden stranger obtruding herself upon them for a whole day. This was over in a moment:—

Scarcely had I entered the door when I was ready to believe that I must be either "the cream to the coffee," or some much-longed for present, so was I rejoiced over, and welcomed, and embraced; all which I felt in my grateful soul to be on account of my husband. I arrived just as they sate down to coffee; ate, drank, talked, and felt myself, in short, like a child of the house.

And now I will send you in prose a description of the family which I have already drawn in poetical colours. They bear the same relation to each other as an every-day and a holiday—but both are of the kingdom of heaven. I speak not now of my own impressions, but from information which I have had from Miss Hellevi Hausgiebel and Ma chère mère.

THE HOME.

For above half a century this ancient couple have inhabited the same house and the same rooms. There were they married, and there they will celebrate their golden nuptials in the course of the next winter. The rooms are unchanged, the furniture the same as for fifty years; yet everything is clean, comfortable, and friendly, as in a one-year-old dwelling, but much more simple than the houses of our times. I know not what spirit of peace and grace it is which blows upon me in this house. Ah! in this house fifty years have passed as a beautiful day—here a virtuous couple have lived, loved, and worked together.

The portraits of the venerable father, the mother, and their fair ministering spirit—Serena, the orphan child of their youngest daughter, their Benjamina—are delicately and truthfully traced, and look like real resemblances.

In this quiet family, as over all the neighbourhood, there was, at this time, much speculation and ardent curiosity about a foreign gentleman, who had lately taken the mansion of Ramm; once the magnificent residence of the Generalin, which she had sold, for reasons which still remained a secret to the vivacious little wife of the Bear, great favourite as she was become with Ma chère mère. At the Birds'-Nest, the residence of Miss Hausgiebel of the museum, at the grand dwelling of the vain and aspiring Von P.'s, in the hugger-mugger household of a third neighbour, where a large brood of troublesome and unruly children did as they pleased, and tormented every one—even with the Dahls, there was nothing talked about save the mysterious Mr. Romulus, or Romilly, or something of the sort, who was establishing himself in princely splendour at Ramm. That fine, but now desolate demesne, like Rosenvik, lay on the shores of the Helga Sea, and across the bay, in the centre of which was the Svanö, the lovely islet to which Madame Werner delighted to row her friends, to sup and to enjoy music, or some harmless and elegant pleasure. In the woods and glades of Ramm, though it was a long walk to reach it, she had sometimes wandered with her Bear, who delighted in them, as the haunts of his own happy childhood and boyhood, and that of his half-brothers. One evening, when he was driving home his little wife, he took the route by Ramm, which had never to her seemed so dismal. It looked like an old castle haunted by ghosts. "And yet," said Dr Werner, "there has been great joy here, and great sorrow also." They alighted, walked down an alley like a church-vault, crossed the dilapidated court, and entered the desolate dwelling. The apartments were noble, the views gloriously beautiful; and the dislike of Franziska was at once changed to rapturous admiration. They met one of the workmen preparing the house for Mr

Romilly, who was described as a very wealthy Portuguese.

"He was attached to Don Miguel's party; inherited afterwards the property of an uncle in the West Indies, and will now come and enjoy his great wealth in our country, because it is the quietest and most secure in the world. . . . . I could not resist trying the organ, which was of a magnificent, although somewhat too strong a tone for my taste; yet at the same time it enchanted me; and I know not how long I should have sate before it, had not Lars Anders reminded me that it was already evening.

"Now the only agreeable things in this house," said I, "are the organ and the prospect towards Rosenvik. I would not live here for all the wealth in this world; still, on an autumn evening I would gladly come here by moonlight, if you would only come with me, Bear, and wander about to see whether it be not here, as in old castles of which I have read. Whether there be not moving walls, ghost-like shadows, blood-stains which can never be effaced, balls of thread which roll after one's heels, and at last transform themselves into bloody daggers——," here I suddenly paused, for my husband sighed, and glancing at him I saw that his unusually friendly, good-natured countenance had become so dark that I shuddered, and turned round involuntarily to see whether a ball of thread were not following us, but thank God, I saw nothing; and then with secret haste followed him out of the house; and the moment we descended the steps a flight of jackdaws from the tower flew over our heads into the wood.

"And here it was so joyful, so beautiful!" sighed Lars Anders; "it was a home for youth, for joy, and love!"

"But how is it so different now?" asked I, "and why did Ma chère mère leave a dwelling which is far finer than Carlsfors, and which had once, you say, far more lively guests than jackdaws?"

"Because, because," hesitated he, "she experienced a great sorrow here. Do not speak to her of Ramm, Fanny; do not tell her that you have been here; another time I will tell you why."

Meanwhile the two brothers arrived at Carlsfors, with their young wives. Peter, a lawyer of eminence, who had been captivated by a beautiful, wayward, and terribly-spoiled child, Ebba, who, in her girlish senselessness, and the consciousness of great beauty and power over her elderly husband, made the good Lars Anders—the astonished witness of her caprices—sigh out, a thousand times—"Ah, poor Peter!" Jean Jacques, the younger brother, brought his accomplished, too sensible, and not over-well-tempered spouse, the very pattern of elegant dress, elegant manners, and all the proprieties. Lars Anders, with his little music-mistress, had, in the matrimonial lottery, been the most fortunate of the brothers; yet Jean Jacques, and his well-behaved Jane Maria, had the sense and grace to keep their differences, if they had any, to themselves; while the infantile partner of the adoring lawyer, by her caprices, tormented him all day long, and affronted Ma chère mère, and every one else. The presentation of these sisters-in-law is characteristic—

A servant announced "Baron Jean Jacques and his lady!"

A silken dress rustled, and a lady entered, probably of my age, but taller, conducted by a gentleman. She looked altogether comme il faut, stepped quickly, but with great self-possession, through the room towards Ma chère mère, who raised herself majestically, and advancing a few paces to meet her, looked highly imposing. The young lady curtesied very deeply, and kissed the offered hands as I had done, whilst Ma chère mère in return kissed her, but only on the forehead; embraced her and bade her welcome, hoping she would find herself agreeably at home in this house. . . . . The new-comer and I sate down near each other; at first we were a little excited, but soon calming ourselves, became most friendly, and engaged in an agreeable conversation, in short I greatly admired this first-seen sister-in-law, by name Jane Maria. She is not handsome, but has something superior in her appearance, whilst her form is exquisite. Her remarks and demeanour show both gentleness and understanding; her toilet also is very pleasing and appropriate.

Yet Jane Maria has her faults, as is afterwards found. She is exacting, dictating, jealous; apt to take offence, and has, nevertheless, many fine qualities, when they are properly brought out by a little flattery. Many fine natural qualities, obscured by defective education, and the ignorance of extreme youth, also remained to be developed in Ebba, the next specimen of Ma chère mère's daughters-in-law:—

A slight little figure floated in petulantly, but gracefully; the eyes half shut; a little straw hat hanging on the arm; a little cap with rose-coloured ribbons inclined to one ear, and kissing, as it were, on the other side, several locks of dark brown hair which flowed negligently forth. Her husband followed her with his eyes, whilst he was stopped in the door-way by a second embrace from his brother.

Ma chère mère raised herself majestically, as on the first occasion, and advanced three steps towards the little sylph, but she, to our great astonishment, floated past without looking up to her, and throwing herself negligently into the armed chair from which Ma chère mère had the moment before risen, exclaimed, "Ah, I am so fatigued, so fatigued, so warm that I must die; ah!" whilst the silken robe which she wore, falling open, showed a fine cambric dress; and, still further, the very prettiest of all little feet.

O that you could have seen Ma chère mère! She stood as if thunderstruck! whilst Peter, rushing forward, seized Ebba's hand, and endeavouring to raise her from the chair, whispered, "Ebba, in heaven's name, bethink thee! Ebba, it is Ma chère mère."

"Heavens!" exclaimed Ebba, like one wakened out of a dream, and looked up with a pair of beautiful brown eyes to the great lady, just as people look up to a church steeple. Ma chère mère, on her side, approached her with a countenance that seemed to express, "What sort of an extraordinary little creature are you?"

As the two were about to meet, Ebba snatched her hand suddenly from her husband's, and springing upon a chair, threw both her arms round Ma chère mère's neck, and kissed her with all the grace and freedom of a child. This seemed to make a peculiar impression on the elder lady, who, grasping her little person in both her large hands, placed her like a child in her arms, and carried her under the chandelier, which was then lit up with the beams of the setting sun, and examined what seemed like a cherub's head surrounded with light. Ebba laughed, and we all were obliged to laugh too, whilst Ma chère mère's loud 'ha! ha! ha!' resounded above all. She patted and pinched the cheeks of the ill-trained but lovely young creature, till her fine dark eyebrows contracted themselves, and she exclaimed again and again, "Let me go!" But Ma chère mère, who wished somewhat to punish her, jested still with her as people jest with a child; but at length, as tears filled her eyes, she shook her friendly by the hand, kissed her forehead, and saluted Peter with the words:

"Chastise your wife, my dear son, otherwise she will chastise you." . . . . . Peter, to all appearance, is desperately in love with his little humoursome wife, who, on her part, does not appear to trouble herself particularly about him; nor does it seem extraordinary that he has not inspired love in such a young, childish creature. Peter is singularly plain in person; has a very large nose, and his yellow-grey hair stands towards all points of the compass. In manner, he is quiet and introverted; yet his eyes, which are handsome, have an expression which is speaking, and full of soul. He sate the whole evening as if sunk into himself; pressed Lars Anders' hand sometimes, and glanced often at his wife, who lay on the sofa and slept. . . . . On the announcement of supper we all turned towards Ebba, who, indescribably pretty, lay asleep on the sofa, like a rosebud folded in leaves. I said something of the kind as we stood round her, and was thanked by her husband with one of his fine glances; then bending over her, he kissed her in order to wake her, saying, "Ebba, my angel, rise!"

Why cannot you let me rest in quiet? How unbearable you are!" was her loving reply; and she would have composed herself anew to sleep had not Ma chère mère elevated her strong voice.

"My dear child," said she, "hear! if you are not ready to come with us to table this moment you will have nothing to eat. Don't imagine that anybody will give themselves trouble on your account."

The little one opened her eyes in the greatest astonishment, raised herself, and without another word Ma chère mère took her hand and led her into the eating-room. Ebba allowed herself to be led, but with a look of indescribable ill-humour.

After supper, the hostess ordered a steaming bowl of punch, filled every one's glass, and delivered a long and sensible homily on the relative duties of the married state; which ended, she said—

"For the remainder, do your best! I have done mine. God help and bless you altogether!" With these words she extended her arms as if to bless us, made a solemn greeting with the head, and emptied her glass to the bottom.

Ebba was insolent enough to let a very genteel yawn be audible, nor did she even raise her glass, but reclining backward in her chair, closed her eyes, whilst Jane Maria emptied hers with a very becoming air. For myself, I must acknowledge that I thought the beginning of the speech heavy, and could hardly refrain from smiling, but by degrees the earnestness and energy of Ma chère mère's words took hold of me; and by the time the speech was ended Lars Anders and I heartily drank to each other and to Ma chère mère.

Next day there was a grand dinner given to the assembled family and their friends, among whom was the never absent Lagman Hök. He is a personage in his way; but we have no time for him. The elders of the party were preparing for their customary game at Boston, and a young servant was handing about coffee, when Jean Jacques accidentally exclaimed—"Heavens! how like he is to Bruno!" These simple words produced the most extraordinary effect:—

All at once Ma chère mère's patience-table received a blow which sent it with the blockade of Copenhagen spinning to the floor; yet no one looked at anything but Ma chère mère, who had become deadly pale. The nose was contracted, the lips blue, and the breath emitted with a strong, heavy sound. Then raising herself, like a fermenting billow, she shook her clenched fist at Jean Jacques, while the eyes seemed starting from the head. It was a figure to excite a shudder; and Jean Jacques, growing pale likewise, drew himself back. It was terrible to see her; and I awaited, almost breathless, some fearful catastrophe. But she stood as if stiffened into that threatening attitude, immoveable and speechless as if under the spell of a terrible enchantment, or as if some horror-exciting ghost had passed before her. For a long time she stood thus, and only the wild, audible breathing gave evidence of the strong inward emotion.

Whilst I gazed upon her thus, my terror changed into anguish of heart, and I was about to hasten to her when Lars Anders held me back; and whilst he threw his arm round my waist to detain me, he himself sat still and attentively observed her. No one approached her; and after a few moments, the fearful emotion passed by of itself. The clenched hand sunk; colour returned to her countenance, and her eyes grew milder; she breathed deeply several times, always lower, as if she sighed, and then, without speaking a word, or even looking round on any one, passed with slow steps, from the room, closing the door after her. Notwithstanding this I would have followed, had Lars Anders not restrained me; but seeing me restless and excited, he took me aside, and in a few words gave an explanation of this extraordinary and painful scene.

"Ma chère mère," said he, "had herself one son, called Bruno." . . . . . "It is a long history; I will tell you another time, Fanny."

"Another time is a villain!" said I. "I hate another time! I can wait no longer than this evening."

"Well then," said he, "this evening;—but we must not longer stand whispering here."

As we returned to the company, we found Lagman Hök sitting on the sofa at the patience-table, endeavouring to re-arrange the pieces exactly as they were before they were upset, that Ma chère mère, on her return, might not, by any circumstance, be reminded of the scene which had just occurred. When he had succeeded in arranging the pieces, he took snuff, and sneezed nine times successively, which convulsed Ebba with laughter. His solicitude for Ma chère mère affected me; such attention is amiable;—so ought friends to have care one for another.

A walk was proposed, after every one had been teased by the childish folly and monkey-tricks of Ebba; and, in a lovely wood-path by the mill, an object was seen which made Franziska pause in her conversation with Jane Maria, and pluck her husband by the sleeve, to make him observe what had fixed her attention.

All stood still, and looked to the left, where the sun shone upon an open green space. A man of a strong, almost athletic figure, in a dark handsome riding-dress, was passing under the oaks which grew there. He passed slowly, his arms crossed over his breast, and his head depressed, as if in deep thought; near, or more correctly speaking, behind him, went a handsome, glossy black horse, whose bridle was richly set with studs of silver; the rein hung loose, and the beautiful head now bent itself to the grass, and now caressingly raised itself to the shoulder of its master, who appeared accustomed to this, and left his faithful attendant at full liberty.

We had only a glimpse of the man's profile, since he was passing from us, but it gave us the augury of a dark, gloomy countenance. Thus went man and horse onward in friendly understanding with each other, deeper into the wood, and vanished at last from our view; but our conjectures followed him, and we came to the fixed and unanimous conclusion that this was no other than our so-much-spoken-of mysterious neighbour at Ramm. And now, whether he be called Romulus, or Romanus, whether he may justify Mrs. Von P.'s romance or not, this is certain, that his appearance before us, and his exterior, had a truly romantic air. I confess that I am quite curious to see more of him, for I am convinced that if I could only see him face to face, I should immediately know whether he be a Don Miguel or a Howard, as the account we heard of him at the Dahls might lead me to suspect.

When we returned to the house, after about an hour's wandering, we found Ma chère mère sitting in the anteroom by her patience-table, and Lagman Hök beside her, all looking as if nothing remarkable had happened, excepting that Ma chère mère's countenance was unusually pale and earnest. She motioned to us kindly on our entrance, but spoke with no one.

She, however, played that night as usual, though she stormed at her partner. Upon an appeal from an upper servant, she set off for the stables to lay down the law and enforce discipline. This agreeable domestic exercise wonderfully composed her spirits; and at supper she was, as usual, the most polite and attentive of hosts. That night Franziska, who was half afraid to love so tremendous a person, learned deeply to pity the most unhappy of mothers. Thus the good Lars Anders, by their own tranquil fireside, told his wife the story:—

"Ma chère mère had, by General Mansfeld, one only son, who was called Bruno, after his father. His birth nearly cost the life of the mother; and that which she had bought so dearly was more precious to her than life itself. Many a time has she been seen on her knees by his cradle, as if worshipping him;—many a time, when a slight indisposition has made his nights restless, she sate and watched by him. She suckled him herself;—scarcely would permit any one beside herself to nurse him, scarcely to touch him. He slept in her bosom, he rested on her knee; her arms were his world, and they encircled him with undying love: and he, on his side, wild and despotic as he then was, hung on her neck with the utmost tenderness, and seemed to find rest nowhere but upon her bosom. It was beautiful to see them together: they were the lioness and her cub, who, in a union of savage strength and deep tenderness, combat together and caress at the same time. . . . . When they met, even after a short separation, it was ever an outbreak of the warmest love; still the next moment, perhaps, they would be at strife with each other. This state of feeling increased with years, for both were of the same powerful, determined character. They seemed unable to live either together or apart.

"It would have been impossible to find anywhere a handsomer boy than Bruno was; and yet, although the mother worshipped him in her heart, her sense of justice was so strict that she never, not even in the slightest instance, favoured him to his step-brothers' disadvantage. Never, if he deserved punishment, was he spared before them; never had a preference shown to him in regard of pleasure or reward; in no way had he the advantage of them, excepting in the caresses of his mother.

"We were all brought up with severity; and as regards money, were too scantily supplied. For myself I always had an inclination towards economy; nevertheless I was compelled to have recourse to my own innocent industry to supply myself with postage-money, or the means to obtain any little outlay which Ma chère mère considered superfluous,—hence I became, in secret, a carpenter.

"Bruno was naturally extravagant, and prone to dissipation, and very early, in order to gratify his palate, or to appease his thirst for pleasure, resorted to less innocent means. He purloined what he could not obtain voluntarily, first from his brothers, then from the domestics; but no one dared to punish him for this, or to represent it to his mother, for the fiery-tempered boy, gifted with almost herculean strength, had obtained power over his brothers, and was feared not only by them, but by all the household. He was beloved by none, excepting by me; I cannot exactly say what it was in him that was so captivating to me; I admired, it is true, his great natural abilities. His wild and witty tricks often decoyed me to smile, at the same time that I was compelled to blame; but what operated most upon me was the simple fact, that I really think he liked me."

Lars Anders said this with an agitated voice, remained silent a few moments, and then continued.

"I must do him the justice, however, to say, that he never was disobedient to those who spoke to him with mildness and reason. . . . . The influence which a child, a little girl, had over Bruno from his thirteenth to his sixteenth year was very extraordinary. This was Serena Lövfen, with whom you were so greatly pleased the other day in the city. She was at that time a lovely, quiet, but sickly child; and Ma chère mère, who had always a great esteem for Madame Dahl, prevailed upon her for three years to bring her during the summer months to Ramm, in order, partly by the water of a mineral spring, and partly by the fresh country air, to improve Serena's health. The little angel-like child interested the wild Bruno, and it was wonderful to see what constraint he had over himself, and of what self-denial he was capable on her account. He left all, to carry her out into the woods about Ramm—to caress her, or to sit quietly by and watch her while she slept. . . . . If this better part of Bruno's nature had been cultivated—the violent repressed, and the gentle yielded to—I am convinced that he would have become a good and distinguished man; but his tutor, a person of rigid, unbending character, and still more his mother, seemed to have resolved only to make use of power in the subjection of his undisciplined will.

"All this time Ma chère mère forboded not how perilous was the course which Bruno was pursuing, and I myself knew nothing which I should have feared so much as her making the discovery—she, so proud, so sensitive on every point of honour, so rigid in her principles and her whole moral conduct! Bruno's great beauty, his remarkable abilities and natural talents; his expertness in all bodily exercises, his courage, nay, even his overbearing strength, constituted her pride, and made her eyes sparkle with delight at his approach, or even at the very speaking of his name. To have heard anything dishonourable of him must have been a death-blow to her. Bruno too had pride, and sense of honour, and the approbation of his mother was necessary to him; but his violent passions, and his inability to govern them, drew him perpetually into guilty conduct."

Lars Anders was unfortunately absent about this time, pursuing his own studies, and he was, besides, unable to afford the impetuous youth so much money as he required. One day Bruno asked for a very large sum, which Lars Anders could not supply, and he reproved his brother's extravagance. The boy ground his teeth in anger, but went off to the town to take leave of the old Dahls and his little bride, as he now called Serena; for next day he was to set off for the university. And now occurs one of the most powerful scenes in the story. We have hitherto more regarded its beauty than its strength.——Lars Anders related circumstantially how the crime of theft had been brought home to the youth, by the rigid scrutiny of his own mother, maddened by the taunt of a domestic, whom she had unjustly suspected:—

"'Your honour may perhaps find nearer home what you seek!' said the servant.

"'What do you mean!' demanded she with an awful glance.

"'That your honour,' replied the irritated man, 'may find with your own flesh and blood, that for which you have cast suspicions on innocent men!'

"'Man, you lie!' exclaimed Ma chère mère, pale with rage, seizing him and shaking him by the arm.

"'I will be a liar!' returned he, almost beside himself with passion, 'if one of your own sons be not a thief!'

"'Follow me!' said she; and with flashing eyes and pale cheeks, accompanied by the book-keeper and the two old servants, she went into our chamber.

"I had been out, and had only just returned and been informed of what had occurred, as Ma chère mère with her attendants entered. I cannot describe the sensation which I felt at that moment: a foreboding of the true fact passed through me; I became pale, and involuntarily seated myself on Bruno's travelling-chest, which together with mine stood ready packed for the journey. Ma chère mère looked at me with a penetrating glance, started, and became yet paler."

Lars Anders saw that he was suspected; but the rigid justice of the feudal matron admitted of no partiality. She persisted in going on with the search. He says:—

"When all had been examined, Ma chère mère cast upon me a glance full of maternal love and joy. Alas! she had had suspicions of me—of the thoughtful man, rather than the wild youth! and now she raised her head, and one could read, in her strong expressive countenance, 'Thank God! now I am easy.'

"'Now then, there are only the things of the young Baron left,' said one of the old servants, respectfully; 'but the chest is locked; and besides this, it is not necessary.'

"'That may be,' said Ma chère mère, 'but he must fare like the rest; the box shall be broken open.'

"'But the young Baron—is not at home,' said the servant anxiously; 'we cannot—'

"'His mother commands it,' said she, warmly.

"It was done.

"With her own hand the mother took out books and clothes which had been thrown in in great disorder. Presently the hand was withdrawn, as if it had been burnt by red-hot iron; she had stumbled upon a bundle of notes. It was the missing money. She took it out; turned it about in her hand; examined it, as if she could not believe her own eyes; grew paler and paler; and then exclaiming in a voice of inexpressible anguish, 'My blood! my own flesh and blood!' sank as if lifeless to the floor.

"We carried her out; and our exertions at length recalled her to consciousness. Terrible was her awaking. But she shed no tear, uttered no word of anger or complaint. She appeared strong and determined.

"She sent immediately to Pastor Rhen, the clergyman of the district. He was a man of iron; stern, strong, and one ready to combat with word or deed, in support of what he considered right; and more than this, he was an honest and faithful friend of Ma chère mère. To him she confided this painful circumstance, and they too decided the steps which should be taken in consequence. I anticipated what was designed, and made use of the influence I had frequently found myself to possess with Ma chère mère, to induce her, but in vain, to resort to less severe, or, at all events, less violent measures. But all my representations were useless; she merely answered, 'Unpunished crime only induces to still further crime. Bitter must be atoned for by bitter.'

"In the evening, about the time when Bruno was expected to return—myself, my three brothers, the old servants, and the book-keeper, were ordered into Ma chère mère's apartment. The room was dimly lighted; and there, in its gloomy half-light, sat, in a tall armed chair, Bruno's mother, with Pastor Rhen beside her; her countenance bearing traces of the sorrow which she bore in her heart. But over sorrow, and shame, and anger, there prevailed such an expression of stern determination as I never saw before in a human countenance.

"Thus then was assembled that small but fearful court of judgment before which Bruno was to be cited. Here we awaited him—a terrible hour! during which no one spoke; but I saw, in that dull light, the drops of cold sweat stand like beads on the brow of that unhappy mother.

"It was towards the end of September—a stormy evening, and a gusty wind shook the casements. One moment it was still, and then we heard the fiery clatter of a horse's hoofs on the court pavement. Ma chère mère trembled as I had never seen her before. I heard a dismal rattling—not of the casements—but of her teeth, as they chattered together. My brothers wept; the old servants stood dumb, and with downcast glances: an expression of remorse was on the countenance of the book-keeper, and even the iron-souled pastor seemed gasping for breath.

"The door was quickly opened, and Bruno stepped in. I see him this moment, as if he stood before me, as he was then—warm from riding, and from the storm; full of health and spirit; I never saw him handsomer than then! He came to his mother, longing, as he always did, even after only a day's absence, to throw himself into her arms; but, as he reached the door he paused, started, and threw a terrified glance on his mother, who covered her face with her hands. Bruno grew pale, looked round upon us, and then again upon her; she cast a flashing glance upon him, and his countenance fell; he became yet paler, and stood there a criminal.

"At that moment her voice was heard, hollow and stern, to accuse him of theft; and pointing to his rifled chest and to the money which had been found in it, she demanded his confession.

"Bruno acknowledged himself guilty, with an inconceivably bold haughtiness.

"'Fall upon your knees and receive your punishment!' said the stern judge. But Bruno bent not. A consciousness which, after his haughty confession, seemed to have deprived him of all volition, overwhelmed him; he stood pale as death, his head dropped upon his breast, and his eyes riveted to the ground.

"Pastor Rhen approached him. 'Young man,' said he in a low voice, 'you have grievously sinned against the commands of God, and against your mother—acknowledge your guilt, and submit to your punishment!'"

We cannot give all of this highly wrought scene. The maddened youth, with the strength of an infuriated animal, struck down all who ventured to touch him, until his mother interfered.

"Fall upon your knees, sinner! exclaimed Ma chère mère, raising herself, and in an awful voice.

"Bruno cast a dark and threatening glance upon her, which she returned, and then he replied proudly, 'I will not! What,' demanded he, 'has this priest to do with me? I have not desired him. If he be here about confessions of guilt, others may come in question as well as I! Exasperate me not—or—'

"'Silence!' said Ma chère mère, gloomily, 'and answer only to my demands. Acknowledge, are you alone guilty in this theft?'

"Bruno answered only by a dark glance.

"'Answer!' said she, hastily, 'answer! Is there any partner with you in this guilt?'

"Bruno cast another long look on his mother; and then, with a firm voice, said, 'No! I alone am guilty.'

"'Bow down your knee, then, unhappy one!' said she. 'Your mother, whom you have covered with shame, commands you to endure the dishonour which you have deserved. Fall down!'

"Bruno stamped his foot in wild rage, clenched his fist, and darted a furious glance at her.

"'Compel him down, you people!' cried Ma chère mère, in terrible anger: 'Priest, if thou art a man, bow the disobedient, degenerate son to the earth. Make him humble himself before the commands of the Lord.'

"I was about to step between them; but the moment the Pastor laid his strong hands on Bruno's shoulders, they were flung off again with a violence which whirled the Pastor completely round.

"'Layest thou hands on the servant of the Lord!' exclaimed the Pastor in a frenzy of rage, forgetting himself, and seizing Bruno with a sinewy grasp. But Bruno had the strength and elasticity of the lion; and, after a strong struggle, the Pastor lay stretched on the ground.

"'Seize him! hold him!' exclaimed Ma chère mère, beside herself.

"The book-keeper and one of my brothers, who attempted to hold him, soon lay by the Pastor; and then Bruno, starting back a few paces, seized a staff which stood in a corner of the room, and swinging it over his head, threatened, with the expression of mad frenzy, to strike it upon the face of any one who should dare to approach him.

"No one dared to do so, except his mother, 'Remain where you are,' said she to the others; and then, with firm steps and quiet mien, she approached him, laid her hand upon his head, bowed him down before her, and asked, in a voice which made the blood freeze in my veins, whether he would submit himself to her will, or receive her curse.

"Mother and son looked at each other with eyes of flame and defiance. They stood so, long. Again she repeated the question; and then followed terrible words on both sides. Again all was still; the curse-speaking lips became stiff, the haughty glance dimmed, and mother and son sank fainting together.

"Both were carried to their separate chambers ——"

Lars Anders paused here; and I, shuddering, laid my head upon his shoulder, exclaiming, "Oh, horrible! horrible!"

"They returned to consciousness," continued he, after a silence of some moments, "but did not see each other again that evening. I sought to speak with him; but he affected to be sleeping, and I returned to my chamber.

"In the night, when all was dark and still, we heard a wild, prolonged, and thrilling cry from his room. I sprang up and hastened there. Bruno's mother was standing there alone, with a wild and agitated look; he was gone.

That night Bruno fled, leaving a letter for Lars Anders, stating that the money was not for himself, but for an unfortunate friend, and would in a few days have been replaced; and that he only took what must soon be all his own. He had sworn that this was to be his last theft. The Baroness tore the paper from the hands of her step-son—

"'He has stolen more than once, then,' said she, passionately; 'I have brought a thief into the world!' added she, rending the letter into a thousand pieces.

"From this moment she spoke not one word for three years. She shut herself in her own room, which was darkened; would endure neither light nor the sight of man; ate and drank but little; slept scarcely at all; spake with none; and no one, with the exception of Elsa, ventured to speak with her.

At the end of three years Lars Anders called a family meeting, to consult what should be done about the Baroness.

The next act in the drama of her life, is as striking as the previous one—

"This family meeting took place at Ramm, in October 18—, three years after Bruno's flight. One day, as we sate together in the great hall, busily occupied by our council, the door was suddenly opened, and Ma chère mère entered; lofty, quiet, collected, and more respect-inspiring than ever. She addressed the assembly in her customary strong, solemn manner; saying that she knew the object of their meeting; justified it on account of her long sickness; but declared the Congress to be now dissolved, because she felt herself again in perfect health, and again in a condition to regulate, as before, her family and her property. She returned thanks to all her friends with an earnestness that affected all, for the patience which they had shown towards her, whom the Lord had so severely afflicted. Next she bade her relations all kindly welcome, prayed them to remain yet longer, and to be as cheerful and happy at Ramm as formerly.

"It would be difficult to describe the effect which this scene produced upon the assembly; admiration, esteem, and sympathy, were the feelings of most: for myself, I felt sincere joy, for I really loved her.

"To gratify her wishes, the family remained there a few days; but all gaiety had vanished from Ramm. Ma chère mère, though strong and domineering as ever, went about like the shadow of what she had formerly been.

She left Ramm for Carlsfors, and discharged all her servants, save Elsa. No word ever betrayed her state of mind; but her complexion faded, her hair became perfectly grey; she laid aside every ornament, wore a dark penitential dress, and was liable to deep attacks of melancholy. Time, however, had its usual soothing influence, and, save when some rash allusion was made which recalled past events, she was able to control the outward expression of her feelings. The real cause of Bruno's disappearance was never known in the neighbourhood, and was generally attributed to the incompatibility of the tempers of the mother and son.

The Sunday's dance was again celebrated at Carlsfors; the skäl was drank, and speeches made upon every occasion demanding such honour, and the duties of hospitality were rigidly observed; though, for many years, Madame Mansfeld had given up visiting. This made her decline an invitation to a great entertainment which was to be given by the mysterious Mr. Romilly, who, though little known, had become exceedingly popular in the neighbourhood, from his munificence to the poor, and liberal donations to schools, of which he made the patriarch Dhal administrator. He had, moreover, gained the good will of the Generalin, by attentive politeness to her wishes (accidentally learned) about haunches of the Ramm venison, and its breed of roebucks. Mr. Romilly had also insinuated himself into the dwelling of Lars Anders, now brightened by the presence of the lovely Serena, whose health required country air, and who was the more readily spared by her fond grand-parents, as at Rosenvik she might have the advantage of Dr. Werner's ever-friendly care, and of his kind little wife's musical talents; most warmly at the service of her beloved Serena, whose sweet voice only required cultivation to be that of an angel. One evening, while the brothers and their wives chanced to be at Rosenvik, in stalked Mr. Romilly; and Madame Werner exclaims to her correspondent—"I have seen him! The Beneficent one!—the Mystery!—the New Neighbour at Ramm! I have seen him; and, if I live fifty years, and never see him again, I shall never forget him." The conversation was long and interesting, and brought out some peculiar points of character. At its close, Mr. Romilly declined going with the family party to take supper on the island. When there, Franziska could think of nothing, save Romilly—whose character she described as giving a sense of power that was oppressive—who reminded her of a beautiful thunder-cloud. Among the many topics of her confidential conversation with Serena, was Bruno, of whom Madame Werner was curious to hear her friend speak. Serena had declined four excellent offers of marriage that she might remain, as Lars Anders believed, with her grand-parents; but his shrewd little wife had an idea that some tender recollection of Bruno still lurked in her heart.

"She sighed at the mention of his name; and when I questioned if she thought he had a bad heart, she replied warmly, "No, certainly not! His heart, indeed, must have been good and tender, or how otherwise would he have been so kind towards me who was only a weak and sickly child, and must have been burdensome to others. Is not that Ramm on the other side of the lake?" asked she.

I replied in the affirmative.

"I remember yet so well," resumed she, "how Bruno led me about in the woods or drew me in my little carriage. The first impressions which I received of the beauty of life and of nature, were from this time. . .

. . "Ah, depend upon it," continued she after a moment's pause, "that he was not wisely treated. They certainly had not sufficient regard to his ability of loving. Had they, he would not have caused his mother so much anxiety, and not have fled from his home and his fatherland!"

"Do you remember his appearance?" I inquired.

"Not clearly;" she said. "It seems to me as if I saw, through a mist, a handsome, rosy-cheeked boy, with large, beautiful eyes; but if I try to make the image more distinct, it fades."

"And what do you suppose occasioned his flight from home?" I inquired.

"I have been told," said Serena, "that dissension with his mother, and severe treatment on her side, occasioned it. There was great similarity in their tempers. They opposed obstinacy to obstinacy—force against force. Bruno must have died in his exile. Poor Bruno! I have truly lamented his fate, he was so good to me!" said she, with a mournful countenance; whilst a sentiment of deep sadness filled my heart also.

I changed the conversation then to other persons, spoke of her grand-parents, and as I praised them she became cheerful and joyous. The sentiment of gratitude seemed to prevail in her heart to an uncommon degree; it seems as if she clung to every recollection which incited to love. If she spoke of a book also, it was with an acknowledgment of the good she had derived from it; and then how natural and graceful is every word, in short her whole being! I loved her, she did me good, and I wished that I also could be inscribed on a leaf of her remembrance-book.

At dinner we had—Lars Anders—good humour, good appetite, and—without boasting—good eating. In the afternoon came back Cousin Stellan in the condition which I generally expect after a shooting excursion, namely, savagely hungry and without game.

When we had sate and talked pleasantly for an hour after coffee, we determined to make an excursion to Svanö, there to eat our evening meal. Serena and I cut bread and butter; filled some bottles with cold schale, and laid these, together with a piece of cold roast meat, in a basket; and with this our cheerful little company wandered down to the shore, where a prettily painted green boat received us. Stellan rowed, a light wind cooled us and curled the water, and whilst Serena and I sang "La Biondina," we reached the appointed place. We threw ourselves down on a grassy mound, in the red and white clover, under the great oak tree. I between my husband and the basket of provisions, and Stellan by Serena; and as I saw them sitting there in the green grass, so lovely and so cheerful, weaving flower garlands for each other, the transient, perhaps sinful, thought rose in my heart of a possible union between those two.

Bear, lying on the fresh, odorous turf, smoked his pipe, and slowly puffed out the volumes of smoke towards the blue heaven, whilst he listened to, God knows what! foolish nonsense about the Great Mogul which his wife told him.

Anon, the air seemed suddenly tremulous, and a rush as of a far-off tempest of melody reached our ears. This tone—solemn, gloomy, but beautiful—made an extraordinary impression upon us. All were still in a moment, a breeze passed by, and upon this breeze came again a tremulous, mournful, but inexpressibly harmonious tone, which oppressed me to the heart.

"It is the organ at Ramm!" I exclaimed, "the wind bears the sound to us. O that we could hear it nearer! Hush! hush! it comes nearer."

We listened; the melodious, panting sound came again and again, with every flying wind that came towards us from Ramm, but we could not connect together a whole. The trembling tones mounted and died away like the sighings of a sorrowful spirit, and as I listened to them I felt as many an inquirer of the old times must have felt, when he pondered on the broken and incomprehensible melodies of Being, and believed that the wind of Fate played upon the strings of the Æolian harp of life. A longing took possession of me, almost an agony; which those only can understand who experience like me, a passion for music.

"I must hear this near;" exclaimed I with decision. "Serena, we two will row towards Ramm, and obtain a clear idea of this music, for I shall become mad if I hear these tones without their intelligence. Remain lying there, dear Bear; and smoke your pipe in peace. Pray let us go; and you remain there, Cousin Stellan; we would be alone, Serena and I; we shall soon be back again."

Bear growled as he continued to lie on the grass. Serena and I were quite joyous and ardent. I rowed the little boat easily. The little voyage was enchanting, for the nearer we approached the more significant became the music. I could have fancied that the boat sped of itself, as if drawn onward by the invisible might of that wonderful music. The evening was calm; the sunbeams trembled into ever darker gold through the wood; higher ever rose the melodious tempest. Serena and I both experienced an elevated delight, although in a different manner. My heart beat violently, and tears of rapture filled my eyes. Serena was calmer; her white hand played with the waves, whilst an expression of pure delight and child-like piety gleamed in her clear beautiful eyes.

Both of us remained silent, eager more distinctly to hear that captivating music. The boat approached nearer and nearer to the black walls of Ramm, and at last lay still as smugglers-craft, in the shadow of the alder bushes close under an open window.

There we heard, in tones that seemed to come from no human hand, the beloved melody of the Neck,* Polika, an interweaving of rich melodies which for beauty and powers surpassed all that I had ever heard or imagined before. They were the children of a mighty inspiration. Enraptured, and carried away as it were, I bowed my head in my hand, and dreamed that the king of the sea, inspired by the beauty of the evening and of nature, made known to us himself, his wonderful life; that life which he leads in the mysterious depths, and in the crystal castles of the ocean. But all at once the tones ceased, and I woke out of my dream to a consciousness of the present. I seized the oar involuntarily, and with one little stroke turned the boat away from the shore; at the same moment both Serena and I turned our eyes to the open window above, but turned them hastily away again, for there stood the dark Romilly, in his own gloomy person, with his eyes fixed upon us. We blushed, took each an oar, and returned in much shorter time, I fancy, than we went, although our oars had now to keep time without the accompaniment of the music.

In the meanwhile, as we had been absent nearly two hours, we found Bear not quite as good-tempered as we had left him, which did not astonish me; but, however, he was soon perfectly right again on my heartily praying for forgiveness. I feel at times a certain degree of pleasure in sinning, quarter or no quarter, and then in obtaining dispensation by flattery.

Baron Stellan is a courtier, a fine gentleman, consumed by ennui, and the former ward of Dr. Werner. He possesses many agreeable talents, but very lax morals; and his indirect attempts, by sophistry and flattery, to undermine the virtuous principles of his hostess and the happiness of his former guardian, though they serve to bring out the ready wit and fine character of Franziska, are, on the whole, felt as a blemish in the book, while they say little for Swedish morality. Ma chère mère had early given Franziska advice how she was to conduct herself in the supposed circumstances; but when the hour came, without exactly acting upon that counsel, she extricated her self with honour and delicacy—her greatest safeguard and best counsellor being her warmly-devoted affection for her Bear. Repulsed by Franziska, the gay Baron, who had railed against marriage, and who was, on a calculating principle of selfishness, opposed to the "honourable state," was so deeply captivated by the beautiful Serena, that he actually proposed for her, and was rejected. In the meanwhile, Ma chère mère, though she would not accept of any invitation for herself, considered herself bound in honour to show hospitality to her gloomy neighbour at Ramm; so she summoned her family and friends to a grand banquet, to which he was invited. In due time, the lofty, black-apparelled figure, appeared, knitting his dark brows; a gesture peculiar to him, which made him look tenfold more fierce—

Ma chère mère, who was en grande toilette, and really looked very well, approached him majestically, and made an oration to him in French, which was equally polite and stately; but which, however, the stranger seemed to understand no more than if it had been Laplandish. He stood immoveable, with downcast eyes; and when Ma chère mère had ended, returned, in a low voice, a few words which were inaudible to me, bowed very low, and left her. I fancy Ma chère mère was but little edified by the foreign politeness which she had praised so much before; and, as if she had been infected by Mr. de Romilly's mood, she too contracted her eyebrows, and returned to her seat.

The next moment an extraordinary commotion took place at the end of the room. The gentlemen rushed together; and as the group opened itself again, De Romilly was seen pale as death and almost insensible, supported by two persons, and about to leave the room. Lars Anders attended him out, and Ma chère mère ordered whatever the house contained to be at his service, and after a few minutes, taking me with her, she went out to him herself.

Mr. de Romilly, who sate in a corner of the sofa, seemed then to have recovered himself, but his face was concealed by his pocket-handkerchief. Ma chère mère questioned him most kindly of his health. He replied, in a hollow voice, that he found himself compelled to leave the house, since the violent headache from which he was suffering would render him unfit for company.

The sagacious reader need not be told who this was, nor yet, perhaps, Lars Anders. The next meeting, at all events, left him in no doubt. Madame Werner thus begins the narration of it:—

Oh, the violent, hideous, cruel, detestable!—you shall hear whom.

Cousin Stellan was gone yesterday afternoon into the city to pay a visit to the Dahls, and Lars Anders and I rejoiced to be alone. He had brought out his work-bench; I had drawn my little work-table to the sofa, and just opened the third part of the "Watch Tower in Keatven," which I was reading aloud. That book is to me horrible: the only good lesson which it seems to me people can derive from it is—I have skimmed it through to the end—to feel what a moral extravagance the life of many people and many things in this world would present, if we did not cast one glance to the solving of the great riddle, to the sequel of the history on the other side of the grave. For my part, I would gladly throw the book into the fire, but my husband insists on it that we should finish it. I fancy all the grislinesses of the book gave him pleasure.

At the very moment, however, when I was about to begin reading, I glanced through the window. The leaves of the alder bushes whispered in the wind, the swans moved their white wings, clouds collected softly towards the west, and it seemed to me as if all beckoned and whispered, "Come out! come out!" impelling me with an indescribable desire into the fresh air and greenness. I seized Bear by the ear, and whispered my wishes. He grumbled a little, stretched himself, and then after a few moments, stood up and took his hat. The good Bear!

I soon put on my bonnet and shawl, and was ready to take his arm, but the moment we were about to pass through the door, he looked around with a peculiar long glance as if he had forgotten something, and I, for I know now very well the meaning of his looks, sprang in immediately, took his pipe, filled it, struck fire and lighted it myself, to his great delight.

He had a wish to go and look about in the park at Ramm. We procured a rower; and very cool and pleasant was the sail across that peaceful lake. Bear puffed the long volumes of smoke from his pipe, I sang little barcaroles; and never noticing where we went, about a quarter of a mile on our backward way struck upon the land by the shadowy shore of Ramm. We landed tolerably far from the house, and then arm and arm went into the beautiful, gloomy park. I felt myself happy, happy to be wandering on Bear's arm in the still wood; to feel how the fresh delicious air played on my cheek; to know my husband to be so good, and the heaven above us so clear. Also he was happy, to be wandering with his wife amid the remembrances of his childhood. He looked around him, breathed deeply, and said in a low voice, while he pressed my arm to him, "How glorious!" And know, my Maria, if he says one word, it has more weight than a hundred out of the mouth of another.

So wandered we deeper and deeper into the wood. The high thick-leaved trees; the shade, the silence, the recollections which seemed to abide under these shades, the loneliness, and the image of the gloomy hermit of Ramm; and Ramm itself, which stood there like the Genius of the place,—all combined to produce in us a solemnity of mood. But as we slowly wandered onward we heard, at first dull, then more distinctly, a treading and stamping as of a wild horse which some one was endeavouring, but in vain, to master. I for my part have no great fancy for unbroken horses; but Lars Anders, on the contrary, must have had, for he hastened his steps towards the place from whence the noise proceeded. We advanced to an open space, and there making halt, were fascinated, as it were, by the wild but fine spectacle.

The same man and the same horse which we had seen once before wandering together in such Idyllian peace, we here beheld again; but now in violent contest. The man sate commandingly on the back of the horse, which he would compel to leap over a broad ditch. The beautiful creature trembled and backed. It threw itself to the left and to the right; it pawed, it would not take the leap; and the foam fell from its black and shining body. But like an intrepid, despotic will, the man sate firm, admonishing, punishing, compelling.

The noble animal developed in this wild strife the whole beauty of his race. His eyes sparkled, his wide outspread nostrils seemed to dart forth fire, while he struck the earth with his hoofs, and with a hundred leaps sought to escape that one leap which he was urged to. The rider sate with unexampled skill, moved himself to the motions of the horse, and ever again was the refractory animal brought to the same spot. The same demand was made, and ever again began the same contest. Thus certainly for a whole hour did the two strive together. The horse then appeared weary, became still, but made no attempt to obey the will of his master. The blood ran down his spur-fretted sides; the man dismounted and threw the bridle loose; the horse stood quiet and looked at him; he took something from his breast-pocket, held it to the forehead of the horse. "It is the third time we have striven," said he sullenly; "farewell!"

There was a flash before the horse, a shot was fired, and he fell at the feet of his master. We saw it stretch forth its head when dying, as if for a caress; we heard a dull groan, and then all was still.

My husband pressed my arm to him with a violence which I had never seen before, struck his clenched fist to his brow, and drawing back, exclaimed to himself, "It is Bruno! Lord, my God! yes, it is he!"

"It is Satan, Satan himself!" cried I, greatly excited. "Oh let us go, Lars Anders, far from this horrible man; I will not see him again!"

By this time the interest of the reader is tolerably deep, we should imagine, in the fortunes of the personages of this story. We dare only tell, that after many exciting scenes, and fiery trials, all ends well, and without any great violation of probability; though we should say the sternness and rigour of the Baroness, in her maternal character, did violence to nature, if we did not remember the history of Byron and his mother, of Mirabeau and his father, and the high-strained notions of paternal authority which belonged to feudal usages.——Leaving the romance of the work, we regret that we cannot follow, to the close, the union of the Bear and his Bearess. Dr Werner loses, by a bankruptcy, all the bachelor savings which had placed his mind above care for after-life, and entitled him prudently to marry. But this season of adversity and impending ruin only tends to give deeper tenderness to mutual wedded affection. These scenes, with equal beauty with those which ushered in the married life of Dr. and Mrs. Werner, have a more delicious tenderness. The Baron Stellan genus, if possessed of any remaining heart or candour, need but witness them to renounce their cold creed.

We can give but a part of one of these scenes.—— Dr. Werner and his wife, when they had paid all their debts, had very little left; and they had abandoned their beloved Rosenvik for a dull, small house in the town; but the best was made of everything, and all met by a kind and strong spirit in the husband, and with cheerfulness and activity by the wife. She resolved to begin to give music lessons without telling her Bear; but she first set her house in order—

Our three rooms are neat and comfortable, but do not lie on the sunny side, which I regret. Farewell, my flowers! Well, we can live without them. I have during three days rummaged about greatly. Yesterday I put up curtains myself in our chamber. Serena was here, and helped me. How interesting the conversation over this was you can imagine. "My angel, give me that piece of muslin!"—"Have you the scissors?"—"Where are the needles?"—"Here!"—"The hammer!"—"There!"—"This nail is blunted."—"Here, here is another;" and so on. And there was some joke, some laughter. With Serena work becomes pleasure; she does all easily and well. Towards noon we had all in order, and when Bear came home I led him with some pride into my room, which he had never before seen so adorned. "Ah! the d——l!" he exclaimed, gaping and grimacing with all his might.

Serena dined with us. She was merry, and joked with Bear. The dinner was good; it was a pleasant little meal. When Serena, after dinner, had left us, Bear fell into a sort of ecstasy over her, and exclaimed, "She is an actual angel!"

"Yes, Bear; and on that account she would be not in the least suitable as a wife for thee."

"Not in the least; even as little as I am fit for a husband for her. For me there is only one that is suitable, and that is——my wife."

"Ah! she suits you admirably."

All is now in order in my little house; had I only a little sun. But, thank God, I have the best sunshine of the house. I have peace!

Franziska was about to become a mother. In their half-bantering conversations, the Baron Stellan had, in picturing the discomforts and pains of matrimony, spoken of the chance of ten daughters!—one lame, another with a spine complaint; and the ludicrous idea had taken serious hold of her imagination. Besides, she dreaded that her Bear would be more than averse to her girls, and feared to communicate her condition:—

Bear is no longer young; he loves undisturbed quiet at home; and it is not to be wondered at that he should dislike the crying and noise of children, and all the trouble which they occasion. And then—after the loss of his property, it must be oppressive to him to have new expenses, new cares to support, which, instead of decreasing, continually increase. And if I should have two girls at once, and then, according to Stellan's prophecy, eight in addition, what will he think? How will he be satisfied with it? You cannot tell, Maria, how these thoughts weighed me down!

My poor little maiden! It is not enough that many a suffering, many a bitter experience must be thy lot in the world, but probably thy father will not once welcome thee into life with a smile; perhaps he will press thee with a secret sigh to his bosom. And if thou shouldest lose thy mother early, perhaps even at thy birth—for how many women die in giving life to their children, and I am not strong—who then, my little maiden, will sit fondly by thy cradle? Who will soothe thy disquiet into peace? Who will, later, comfort thee in difficulties? Who will love thee, and teach thee to conduct thyself? Where wilt thou find ever-open arms? My tears flow, and I must conclude.

5th.—But now I dry up my tears, and proceed. Last evening I sate alone, and worked at a little child's cap. My heart was heavy, and my unshed tears choked me. Bear was not come home. The wind blew strongly without, and sounded disagreeably to me. It also occasioned that I did not hear Bear's arrival before he opened, as usual, abruptly the door of the room where I sate. I hastily threw my work under a shawl, blushed, and had scarcely time to bid him good evening. Bear looked unwontedly cheerful, and exclaimed, loudly: "Good evening, my little wife, how is it with thee?"

"Very well," answered I; and, in order to ward off further questions, asked myself—"What hast thou in thy hand there?"

"Only an ugly pasteboard box. An old woman bothered me to buy it. We will see if thou canst make it of any use to hold thy combs, hair-pins, and so on. He set the great pretended box on the table, loosened the cloth in which it was wrapped with a horrible grimace, and before my eyes lay a picture in a costly gold frame. Two figures, as it were, stood living before me in it. The most beautiful Mother-of-God hovered on the clouds, with the Child-God on her arm. It was a copy of Raphael's Madonna Sistina, in black chalk, by the clever Miss Röhl. I saw the heavenly peace in Maria's countenance; I saw the divine, all-illuminating glance of the child, and I became so comfortable, so heavenly comfortable in my mind, I could not speak, and, without being aware of it, ran sweet happy tears on the glass of the picture. I had forgotten all around me; I knew not whether I was on earth or in heaven, when I found myself encircled by Bear's arms, and heard him say with a tender, but affectionately upbraiding voice—"Fanny, why should I not know that I am a father?"

In this moment I became violently affected. I hid my head on his shoulder, and could scarcely stammer forth—"O Bear! I was afraid that you would not be pleased!"

My Maria! how did I feel as I saw Bear drop on his knees before me, as he kissed my hands, my dress, while with great tears in his eyes, and with a faltering voice, he exclaimed—"I not pleased! I not happy! I am delighted! My Fanny, my wife, my child!" In such emotion I had never seen him, and my heart dissolved itself in inexpressible love and joy.

This hour was beautiful, was divine! But one such in this earthly life, and one may be contented; one has understood what heaven is.

After our first extreme agitation had subsided, Bear seated himself by me, and lectured me, half in a tender and sportive, and half in a serious tone, on my strange secresy. My heart was open; I let him read it; I let him see all which of late had been working there. At first he smiled, then he became more serious, and at last he said, somewhat out of humour—"But that is very silly, Fanny! Where has been thy reliance on the Most High? Does this miserable fear become those who believe in Him and his Goodness?"

"Ah!" I said, sighing, "I believe firmly on Him, and yet children fall down stairs, or out of the window, and become cripples or idiots for life."

"Well, and what then?" said Bear, and looked me in the face with a glance which at once was firm and clear; I did not imagine he could have made his eyes so large. I cast my eyes down, and answered, softly—"And children may also become unfortunate."

"Well, and what then?" exclaimed Bear, and looked at me as before.

"And what then! and what then!" I cried, impatiently, and was very near getting angry; but Bear's look again struck me, and penetrated into my inmost soul. I understood him now—understood his manly strength, his love, and piety. "Bear," said I, with contrition, "I will trust, with thee; come what will, I will not murmur, nor despair; but hold fast my faith in the everlasting Goodness."

Bear clasped me to his heart.

I was somewhat anxious to avoid going further into the fears which I had entertained; but he had laid himself out to question me, and he would not desist till he had drawn all forth. When I alluded to my doubt regarding himself, he became angry and said—"How couldst thou think so ill of me, Fanny! How couldst thou imagine me to be so pitiful, so unnatural a wretch! This only can excuse thee, that thou wert unwell."

"But, Bear——now that we are become poor, it will, indeed, be a matter of great anxiety to bring up and educate children, especially if we have many—if we actually have ten girls!" I laughed as I said this, but it was with tearful eyes.

"That will be done even. We shall find means, never fear. Children that are received in love, bring a blessing with them. The more children, the more paternosters."

"But the education—the education!" sighed I; "what burdens this brings with it, when we consider the demands of the present day."

"I ask the d——l after the demands of the time, in many respects," muttered Bear; and added, with serious and cordial kindness—"We will love our children, Fanny! We will bring them up in a clear and steady fear of God. We will teach them order and diligence. What relates to talent and a finer accomplishment, they shall receive that too if we have the means; if we have them not, then do not let us trouble ourselves about them. The chief thing is, that they become good and useful men; they will then find their way both here and hereafter. Thou, my Fanny, wilt early teach them what is in the hymn which thou art so fond of singing—

He who can read his paternoster right,
Fears neither witch nor devil.

Bear's words and mild and manly expression, took hold on and elevated my heart. "No!" I exclaimed, "I will no longer be anxious and fearful. I cannot be so with thee, my Bear. And thou little exiled prophet"—I took up the little cap—"come forth to the light, and speak openly of the mystery!"

How delighted was Bear with the little cap! He had never yet seen anything so neat and pretty. I now sewed on the small lace round it. Bear held it on his great fist, and smiled at it, as if he already saw it adorn the head of his child. The whole evening was a succession of the most joyful feelings and scenes.

And now we tear ourselves away from a work which it is really a delight to tell the world about; congratulating Mrs Howitt upon her useful labours, and firmly believing that there is taste, and nature, and goodness enough left among us to appreciate The Neighbours.

EVELYN HOWARD.*

This is a novel of considerable merit, though its movement is too slow for the dash and glitter of these latter times of light literature. The principal hero, the immaculate Revil Sydney, flies above common sympathies; and the reader is fairly worn out with mistakes, misunderstandings, and cross-purposes. There is an episode—a subordinate story, of Douglas Howard, the brother of the heroine, a mean and selfish, but very handsome and fascinating young soldier, who gains the light heart of a wild and wilful heiress, and breaks it—which is more effective than the main story, because much more true to nature. Douglas Howard is disappointed of his wife's fortune, which, by a condition in the will of the relative who bequeathed it, was forfeited by her marrying, without the approbation of her guardian, the all-perfect Revil Sydney. From this part of the novel we extract a scene or two which are not unfavourable specimens of its execution—

Scarcely a fortnight had elapsed, since Catherine cast behind her friends and kindred to unite her fortunes with him she loved; but that fortnight had strangely sobered the high spirit of the wild and thoughtless girl. The bridal chaplet yet bound her brows, but the roses were faded. With more sorrow in her heart than she had even dreamt of before, she sat in one of the smallest rooms of the Ship Hôtel at Dover, listening for her husband's step; and when it came, far from going to welcome him with the timid yet beaming tenderness, which marks the demeanour of the young wife, she remained where she was, her tearful eyes fixed on the letter that lay before her.

And why was this? Because she was afraid of him who had vowed "to love and cherish her"—vowed to share her sorrow, as well as her gladness, at that altar where the promise of the lip alone is a mockery that will be registered against the offender. She feared unkindness, whose chilling touch will wither life and soul—the branch and root, as well as the leaf and bud, and was soon to learn the feeble influence of the oath which is lightly spoken; that, like characters traced in sand, it is easily obliterated.

With her hand she had given her heart, with all its sacred affections, and an undoubting confidence. In launching her bark of happiness upon the shores of matrimony, she had made Douglas her pilot and her guiding star; nor ever thought it could be wrecked by him, who ought to steer her through the troubled waves as well as through the peaceful waters. But clouds soon gathered over the life of joy she had expected to lead. The first intimation to Douglas, that her fortune might be withheld, by destroying the delusion that she had been loved for herself alone, gave her the first knowledge of the meaning of "bitterness of heart."

With vindictive malice, Alexander Bruce, having first perilled his life to gratify his intemperate anger, made the certain loss of Catherine's property a subject of open triumph; and Catherine, sure of her brother's opposition, had begun to feel her confidence that Mr. Sydney's regard for her would withhold him from testifying disapprobation of her marriage, considerably shaken.

She wrote to him, and put forth her case with all the eloquence of which she was mistress; but in vain: the answer had just arrived, and though far from unkind, it crushed entirely her ill-founded hopes. Wishing to break her disappointment gradually to Douglas, as soon as she heard his step, she hastily dried her eyes, and had just time to fold up the letter, and throw her handkerchief over it, when Douglas entered the room. It was evening, and more for cheerfulness than warmth, a fire burnt in the grate. Douglas sat down by the fire, and Catherine knelt on the footstool by his side.

"I have not seen you all day," murmured Catherine, with an accent of sorrow rather than reproach.

"M'Naughten and I have been engaged elsewhere," replied Douglas, coolly.

"I detest M'Naughten," said Catherine, pettishly.

"Very possibly," said Douglas, resuming the whistling which the pronunciation of those two words interrupted, and then proceeded to arrange his hair and cravat by the glass over the mantel-piece. "That Pepys knows no more of cutting hair than an ass; he has shorn my locks as completely as ever Samson's were, though I expressly told him not to cut the curls. He has so transformed me, that I no longer think I am my mother's son, but changed at my birth, as was a transatlantic neighbour, who was so persuaded he was a changling that he spent a whole life seeking his original self. By the bye, I forgot to say that M'Naughten dines with us to-day."

"Is he always to be at our fireside? Can you never dispense with his society!" asked Catherine.

"Not easily; for I find him both useful and agreeable. I suppose you have not yet heard from Mr. Sydney."

"Speak kindly to me, Douglas; remember what I have forsaken for your sake—friends, wealth——"

"I hope not, or I shall find it difficult to testify my gratitude. I never asked you to forsake wealth for me—on the contrary; but where is the letter? I see you have received one."

"Do not break my heart with unkindness, Douglas; it is cruel to blame, for had I the wealth of India I would gladly resign it to you."

Without replying, Douglas snatched the letter from her hand, and began to read; but had scarcely perused half-a-dozen lines when, throwing it down with an exclamation that made her shudder, he paced the room like one distracted.

Affection, as well as a sense of duty, prompted Catherine to soothe and lull the violence she witnessed; and, laying her hand gently on his arm, she said, in as cheerful a tone as she could assume—

"Let us not be cast down; darkest clouds will sometimes pass over without breaking. People are not the less happy for being less rich. I shall soon learn to be poor, if that is my fate; and you will never hear me mourn departed luxuries."

"Away!" said Douglas, roughly shaking her off; "you deceived me, and have consequently ruined yourself, and me also. Had you dealt with me fairly and candidly, as you ought, and revealed the particulars of your uncle's will, neither you nor I would have been placed in the situation in which we now stand."

"It appears that I have deceived myself," said Catherine, bitterly. "I neither suspected you of interested motives, nor believed my guardian could be inexorable. You said then that you loved me—say so again, Douglas; do not let me think you so base and cruel as to have lured me from a home where I was happy, from no other motive than to possess my gold. Say that you had other feelings—that you did not deceive me—and that I have not been the victim of cupidity."

"My gold!" repeated Douglas, with a laugh that congealed the blood in her heart—"my gold! Where is it? There seems little chance of handling that; but produce it, and I will tell you again that I love you."

"Heaven forgive you, Douglas!" said the heart-stricken wife, and rushed out of the room.

The young bride saw and felt her position in all its misery; and the blast of desolation, sweeping over her heart, roughly laid low all the flowery hopes which in fancy she had seen blooming on her path. . . . .

Half an hour after Catherine had left him, with the cry of an anguished heart upon her lips, Douglas knocked at her door, and receiving no answer, he called her several times by name. Instead of any reply, he heard at intervals the convulsive sob of one who had no power to vent or to suppress her sorrow.

"Catherine, open the door, and do not make a fool of yourself, or of me, by keeping me here for every one that passes by to see."

A slow, reluctant step crossed the room. Catherine unturned the lock, and, without speaking, walked back to the seat she had quitted. Douglas entered—he said nothing, but passed his arm round her shoulders and kissed her cheek.

Selfishness had not, then, so completely encrusted his heart as to render it impenetrable to compunction—he was capable of remorse, but neither noble nor generous enough to make much concession. A sullen look or a reproachful word would have changed his superficial penitence into anger and enmity. But Catherine was too justly and heavily aggrieved, and her heart was too crushed for upbraiding. Douglas had been enthusiastically loved, and according to her views, esteemed; he had just evinced disregard, if not contempt, of her affection, and centring all his anxiety in the possession of her wealth, had added insult to disrespect, as the expectation of obtaining it vanished. With all her wildness and thoughtlessness, she was not devoid of that sort of sensibility which renders its possessor peculiarly vulnerable to the shafts of unkindness; but Douglas's conduct deserved a harsher name, and was well calculated to arouse her resentment.

Reflection was not one of the powers of her mind; habitually guided by feeling and impulse, she knew nothing of the principle which, in obedience to the Divine command, and to the dethronement of human passion, "suffereth long, and is kind." Constantly following the promptings of her natural disposition, Catherine's actions had no certain regulator, and being consequently the sport of every feeling which swept by, it was fortunate for her that those feelings were generally kind and amiable.

At first she turned away her head; but when Douglas repeated the caress, her reply, though an indirect, was a more certain proof of his pardon than anything she could have said, and plainly evidenced that her tenderness might be bleeding from the blow it had just received, but was not weakened. Without mentioning his unkindness, or alluding to the past, she gently replaced his arm in the sling, observing, with affectionate solicitude, that it could not get well without care. Douglas was touched, for unexpected forbearance often unlocks the heart, and draws thence a torrent of generous feelings which would otherwise have remained congealed. Pride, which would have led him to resent reproach, and have rendered him callous to the suffering he had inflicted, now gave way; throwing himself on his knees, he execrated the hastiness of his temper, and, clasping her hands within his own, entreated for forgiveness.

"You must not mind these gusts of rage; I cannot prevent them—they are natural to me," said Douglas; as if their being natural was sufficient excuse for their indulgence.

"But when they lacerate the feelings of others, they ought to be controlled," replied Catherine, for the first time betrayed into declamation upon a moral duty.

"And for the future I will make the attempt," said Douglas; "but come into the next room—see what you can devise to meet my present exigencies, for if Mr. Sydney is resolved upon withholding your fortune, I am ruined."

"Perhaps he will relent; I cannot believe him so unjust and cruel as to deprive me of it, when by a word he can secure it me."

"Look there!" said Douglas, pointing to a large pile of papers, some folded in the suspicious shape of bills, others lying open, bearing similar symptoms in the ledger lines and various figures, ranged in columns, on one side of the paper; "look there, Catherine—and when I tell you that these are not half of what will come in when my affairs are known, and that, far from being able to support you, I have not a shilling which is not owing twenty times over—can you wonder at the intemperate expressions despair has forced from me. Oppressed with debts which I have now no means of discharging, blasted in name, with the disgrace of arrest before me, I have no refuge but an ounce of lead."

"Oh! Douglas, Douglas, do not talk so recklessly!" said Catherine, shuddering with horror at what he had said. "I at least, need not be an encumbrance to you; I can go back to Alexander. He will not easily forgive me; but he will not leave his sister in starvation."

The last word almost choked Catherine. She, who from childhood had known only wealth, and squandered it in idle profusion, was now obliged to cast in her mind how she should get her daily bread.

To send her away did not suit Douglas.

Catherine's friends provided for her, and for the reasonable wants of her husband; but her fate is sealed. The story is wound up—the heroine, Evelyn Howard, after her endless trials and tiresome agonies, is the happy wife of Revil Sydney—now Lord Ravenshaw. Catherine had gone abroad with her husband, and gradually declined in health. Her character is moralized over; but we leave the moral for the tale:—

For some time after her return to England, the endearments of her little girl, and the caresses universally bestowed upon her, infused fresh energy into her mind; but that did not last long, and the spirit which might have enabled her to struggle against sorrow and isolation was wanting. Silently, and almost imperceptibly, she was fading away like a neglected flower.

Douglas' indifference had alienated her affection; he was no longer loved as when she was content to share cheerfully his poverty and disgrace; but the secrecy of wedded sorrow she was not now willing to violate. She had found complaint useless, and sympathy unavailing; and no longer made the one nor sought the other. Evelyn's character she had learned to admire, and to wish it had been her own, yet was too feeble-minded to make the exertions necessary in the imitation of it.

"It is too late, I cannot alter now," would Catherine often say, when comparing herself with Evelyn. . . .

It was autumn, and Lord and Lady Ravenshaw were about to start on a tour through the western counties, intending afterwards to pay the long-promised visit to Corvyn. Catherine had latterly evinced a restless desire for change; but Douglas, a keen sportsman, was little inclined to forego his favourite pastime, and willingly consented to her accompanying his sister in her tour.

The carriage was at the door, but Catherine still lingered, regarding again and again every object eloquent of happier days, and endeared by former associations.

"Ready at last!" said Douglas, as she entered the room, slightly turning his head from the glass, where he was arranging his handsome curls; and, glancing at his watch, added, "I shall be late for my engagement as it is."

"When shall you join us?" asked Catherine, as he led her from the room, after a farewell, solemn enough to have startled any less determinedly thoughtless than he.

"Oh! when I have nothing else to do. Travelling is not much to my taste."

"Will you come if I send for you?" asked Catherine.

"I cannot promise," was the careless reply.

Catherine was then seated in the carriage; she said no more; and as Douglas then immediately walked away, she followed him for one half instant with her eye, and then raised her attenuated hand to wipe away a solitary tear. The carriage drove off, and, as it whirled along, she turned her head, and fixed an earnest gaze on the windows of the home she was leaving, and then pressed her arm round the little prattler at her side.

Catherine remained at a cottage in Devonshire, while her friends pursued their tour.

Having left Catherine to all appearance improving, Evelyn was surprised at the change she found in her on her return; but Catherine owned to no increase of indisposition, and the next day they were again en route to Ilfracombe, where Douglas was expected to join them. On arriving there, they found not Douglas, but a letter describing his engagements, and excusing himself from keeping the appointment.

Catherine took the letter, and, fatigued with her journey, retired to rest. Some time afterwards, Evelyn found her kneeling by her infant's crib, pale and calm as the sleeping child before her. At her entrance, Catherine looked up, and beckoning her to approach, for some time rested her head in silence upon her shoulder. Her breathing soon became gradually thicker, and she broke forth into rapid convulsive sobs.

"Evelyn, I have not much longer to remain here. I have felt it for some time past; but not till now did I think my end was so near. I owe you for years of kindness—add more to the many. When I am gone, become the mother of my child—watch over her, rear her as your own—and neither in destiny nor character may she resemble me," said Catherine, pressing her hand tightly upon her heart, as if to control by force the emotion which almost choked her.

Evelyn, for the first time aware of Catherine's opinion of herself, was shocked and distressed; but considering her illness more in spirit than in body, she strove to argue her into a more cheerful train of thinking.

"I shall never be better, nor ever see my home again," said Catherine. "Do not grieve for me, Evelyn; I am not now sorry to die. Time was when I feared death; but it is not so now. I was not cut down in my thoughtless days, but spared to sorrow and repent. I am young in years, but old here," said Catherine, again pressing her heart, and, leaning down, covered her face with her hands. When she removed them, her countenance appeared calm and serene.

"Good night, Evelyn; I am too tired to talk more this evening."

Evelyn left her without participating Catherine's impression to its fullest extent, and communicated all that had passed to Lord Ravenshaw, who immediately despatched an express for Douglas, whose whereabouts, however, was not accurately known.

"I hope nothing was kept back—he does not require it," said Catherine, bitterly, when informed the following morning of what had been done; then added, in a gentler tone, "If he comes at all, he will come too late; I feel that I shall not see him again. Tell him—but no, he will not care to hear it; say only that if, in memory of all he once promised, he would grant my last request—it is to leave Julia to be educated and brought up by you. Promise—promise to undertake the charge. . . . . .

"I could not perform the duty as well as you will. Untaught myself, how am I fit to instruct others? The wisdom I have now hived, tastes too much of the bitterness of regret for me to wish to impart that to Julia. No, you will be a better teacher for her than her mother could have been! All is well, but there is anguish in parting past all revealing."

At that moment, Julia made her appearance, caressing and fondling her doll. Catherine called her, and in answer to the long fervent kiss the mother imprinted on her darling's cheek, Julia wreathed her soft round arms about her neck, lisping out some childish tale, little dreaming that the ears then eagerly drinking in every word would shortly hear no more—that not the voice of any charmer could invade the stillness of that dwelling to which every passing hour brought her nearer and nearer.

"I have not done as many do," said Catherine, when talking to Evelyn, a few days afterwards,—"I seldom upbraided Douglas; I never voluntarily vexed him. My faults have been committed against myself. Seeing that my remonstrances angered without altering him, I was silent, and thought I did my whole duty; it never occurred to me to seek a submissive spirit, or strength to bear my trials. With a heart formed for affection, I could neither receive nor bestow it. My marriage alienated my brother, and I would have clung the more to Douglas if he would have let me—but—it matters not now, all is forgiven and will soon be forgotten, for such sorrows go not beyond the grave."

Catherine's illness soon assumed an alarming appearance: she sunk rapidly, and grew weaker almost every hour. Her disorder baffled every effort of human skill, and it soon became evident that the last pulses of life were beating. Douglas had not arrived, and though Catherine appeared calm, and said but little, every sound of carriage wheels brought a faint flush upon her wasted cheek.

One afternoon, her sofa at her desire having been placed near the window, she had rested as if asleep for several hours, when she suddenly started from her apparent slumber at the noise of a post-chaise galloping up to the door.

"Is it Douglas, Evelyn!—quick, tell me!" said Catherine eagerly; but ere Evelyn could speak, the last effort of Catherine's expiring strength was exerted to raise herself to the window. The attempt failed, and she fell back senseless on her pillow.

It was Douglas.—But his wife was dead.

His grief and remorse were frantic for the moment; but he was not one long to harbour thoughts that disturbed his own repose. We think this episode no unfavourable specimen of the powers of the authoress of Evelyn Howard; a romance which will delight those who relish delicate embarrassments and innocent manœuvring.

A REVOLUTIONARY ODE.*

"I will overturn, overturn, overturn it."—EZEKIEL.

I DID dream a bodeful dreaming;
Thunders rolled, red fires were gleaming;
Earth did quake.
And I saw God's angel winging
Earthward, earnest message bringing;
Fearful in my ears 'tis wringing:
Thus he spake:

"Rouse thee, Wrath, and be a giant!
People's will that has been pliant
Long, too long,
Up! and snap thy rusty chaining,
Brittle bond for thy restraining;
Know the hour; the weak are reigning;
Thou art strong.

"Rise, and right the wrongs of ages,
Balance Time's unequal pages
With the sword!
Velvet-cushioned fools have slumbered,
Wanton weeds my garden cumbered,
Now their barren days are numbered,
Saith the Lord.

"Hear, ye loveless narrow-hearted,
Few for whom the many smarted,
Hear my word!
I have heard the people's moaning,
I have known the poor man's groaning,
I have vowed a sad atoning,
Saith the Lord!

"Who have lived in pillowed pleasure,
Ye shall now, in righteous measure,
Eat the dust.
Who beheld the bondman sallow
Pine, that ye in lust might wallow,
Ye shall fat young Freedom's fallow;
So 'tis just.

"People's heroes, mountain-breasted,
Looking lightnings, tempest-crested,
Seize the sword!
Bellow with a vengeful thunder,
Turn each topmast over under,
Let Pride's purple minions wonder,
Saith the Lord!

"For their hopes a strong delusion,
For their plans a dark confusion,
I have stored.
Pride with folly shall be mated,
Wisdom still shall come belated,
Mercy shall not find the fated,
Saith the Lord!

"Iron men and unrelenting,
Who shall do, without repenting,
Deeds abhorred,
For my vengeance I have chosen;
Them no wheedling words shall cozen,
They are hard, their tears are frozen,
Saith the Lord!

"Sudden fear shall seize the palace;
Every wile of witless malice
Shall be tried.
Things despised, the weak, the nameless,
I will fire with fury tameless,
They shall smite, themselves not blameless,
Blameful pride.

"Kings shall meet and band together,
Despot spread for despot brother
Solemn beard.
What they vow they shall pursue it,
I will spur and goad them to it;
They shall do; I will undo it,†
Saith the Lord!

"March, mine elect iron warriors!
Strike! and old Pride's jealous barriers
Stand no more.
Ye shall judge the kings with rigour,
Ope the lists to strength and vigour;
Earth her increase to the digger
Shall restore.

"Tear the patch-work, rend the rotten,
Let the useless be forgotten,
Earth the dead!
Time 'tis none for square and bevel,
Those I send shall rage and level;
Terror through the courtly revel
They shall spread.

"Wit I sent—the fools did spoff it;
Love they knew not; now my prophet
Is the Sweun.
With stern hate I have begun it;
When strong Love hath bravely won it,
They shall know that I have done it,
Saith the LORD!"

Spake the God-sent, thunder-knelling
Feeble hearts of men compelling,
And up soared.
I with salved sight awaking,
In swift ruin's overtaking,
In the fast Earth's fearful quaking,
Knew the Lord.

* It has been attempted, in the following verses, to epitomise the principal phases of the French Revolution; only, however, in so far as these appeared to be the necessary phases of every great national convulsion under the present constitution of society.

† Compare 1688 in England, and 1830 in France. A RESTORATION never can succeed. What the body politic throws off as foreign to its healthy nature, may be stuck on again for a season, but will never grow.

CRACKNELS FOR CHRISTMAS.

BY BON GAULTIER.

A CLEAR fire, a clean hearth, and a merry party of friends! Mrs. Battle, undying Mrs. Battle, gave "the rigour of the game" the preference to the third of the agrèmens we have just named; and, undoubtedly, a well-fought game of whist to a person of a calmly ferocious disposition, who, like her, loves the conflicts which give "time to form rooted friendships, and to cultivate steady enmities," is a great luxury. But commend us to the merry party, especially when, like that now beside us, nobody monopolises the conversation—nobody talks out of place. For our friends are all mutely eloquent,—paper-stainers, valiant wielders of the quill,—poets who have "penned their inspiration," and romancers who have given an inky cloak to the phantoms of their brain. There they are—ranged round our table. Miss Lætitia Jones, authoress of "The Love Spell, and other Poems," presents herself in yonder ream of post-wove; Mr. Vernon Smawker pleads in the most moving Iambics from yonder page of banker's post. Others in the same way,—all silent till we give them leave, and speaking no longer than we allow. Our soirées are admirably contrived. In place of inviting our literary acquaintances to visit us in the body, we ask them to throw off a proof impression of their souls upon paper; and thus we have the full enjoyment of "an æsthetical tea," as the Germans call their conglomerations of bohea and blueism, without being deafened by the Babylonish jabber of small litterateurs, or ruined by their insatiable demands upon our sherry and sandwiches.

The results of our last circular are before us, and we shall have half an hour's recreation among them. Mr. Frederick Chumley, a pale Werther-faced young gentleman, at the end of the table, has been labouring with the throes of composition for the last hour. We shall give him relief, for he seems as if his thoughts, Minerva-like, were ready to leap forth from his pericranium,—

LINES.

Can I e'er cease to love thee?
Forget thee? Ah, no!
I think of thy beauties,
Wherever I go.

The sky's dewy azure
Shall speak of thine eyes;
The evening's soft zephyr
Shall murmur thy sighs.

When the calm of the twilight
Shall lap me in bliss,
I will think of thy voice, love,
I'll think of thy kiss.

I may roam 'mong the daughters
Of beautiful Spain;
Or the darkly-eyed maids of
The gay State of Maine.

But in hall or in greenwood,
Afar from my home,
My footsteps may stray, but
My heart cannot roam.

Worthy of Mr. Frederick Chumley,—or Lord Anybody, author of "Thoughts on Michaelmas—Geese, and any other Poems." One remark, for Mr. Chumley's behoof. If the lady, to whom his verses are addressed, did not take the very first offer she got from another (eligible) party, the more's the pity. Depend upon it, the man who writes in this way is never constant for less than a week—or more.

Oh! this love, this love! It has given rise to more rhymes than any other reason in the world. Here is a lay of common life, for which everybody can find a parallel in his own experience, though it is not everybody who can paint with such skill the sorrows of

THE BITER BIT.

BY MISS JULIA PELTIROGUS.

The sun is in the sky, mother, the flowers are springing fair,
And the melody of woodland birds is stirring in the air;
The river, smiling to the sky, glides onward to the sea,
And happiness is everywhere, oh mother, but with me!

They are going to the church, mother,—I hear the marriage bell,—
It rises o'er the upland,—it haunts me like a knell;
He leads her on his arm, mother, he cheers her faltering step,
And she clings closer to his side, she does, the demirep!

They are crossing by the stile, mother, where we so oft have stood,—
The stile beside the thorn at the corner of the wood;
The boughs that oft have echoed the words that won my ear,
Now bend their blossoms o'er him, as he leads his bridal fere.

He will pass beside the stream, mother, where first my hand he pressed;
By the meadow where, with quivering lip, his passion he confessed;
And down the hedgerows, where we've strayed again and yet again;
Yet he will not think of me, mother, his broken-hearted Jane!

He said that I was proud, mother, he said I looked for gold;
He said I did not love him, that my words were few and cold;
He said I kept him off and on, in hopes of higher game,
And it may be that I did, mother,—but who hasn't done the same!

I did not know my heart, mother, I know it now too late;
I thought that I without a pang could wed some nobler mate;
But no nobler suitor sought me, and he has gone elsewhere,
And my heart is gone, and I am left to wither in despair.

You may lay me in my bed, mother, my head is throbbing sore;
And, mother, prithee, let the sheets be duly aired before;
And, if you would do pleasure to your poor desponding child,
Draw me a pot of beer, mother, and, mother, draw it mild!

This reminds us of a valued friend of ours, Sarah Briggs. Sarah had many amiable qualities, among others a partiality for porter, which she prized beyond nectar. A pint a-day was her allowance. Sarah fell in love. Appetite, as usual in these cases, forsook her,—even Guinness was forsworn. But the object of her affections did not propose. The res angusta domi, it was understood, prevented him,—and, one day, after the lovers had had a long walk together, Sarah's agitation was visible. Explanations had passed, and her hopes had vanished. With an air of serene despair, she took forth a pint of Guinness's best from her long-neglected stores, and drank it with a lingering satisfaction. We rallied her upon this symptom of returning reason, and she,—she was a merry soul,—calmly observed, that she was forced to fall back upon her beer, as her beloved could not sup-port 'er.

At lovers' perjuries, they say, Jove laughs; and if we are to believe poets and romancers, "the beautiful sex," as Mr. Benjamin D'Israeli calls them, are daily contributing not a little to the merriment of the facetious Thunderer. According to his own showing, your true verse-spinner is the most luckless of swains that ever split his unmentionables in prostrating himself at the feet of beauty; and the number of refusals he receives would be enough to break the heart of the most stoical tax-gatherer that ever handled bell-pull. Ianthe, Medora, Claribel, Madeline, Adeline, and Marguerite, (the latter, by the bye, we believe, on our soul, to keep a cigar-shop in Oxford Street,) are all equally fair and false. This is in the course of nature, and the legitimate exercise of feminine caprice. We have suffered in this way ourselves, at least half-a-dozen times, till our heart has attained the callosity of a rhinoceros' hide, and we, therefore, pity no man, who allows himself to be similarly befooled. But there is a peculiar atrocity in the circumstances which gave rise to the following poem, that stirs even the Dead Sea of our sensibilities. The lady, in this instance, appears to have carried on a furious flirtation with the bard,—a cousin of her own,—which she, naturally, perhaps, but, certainly, cruelly terminated, by marrying an old East Indian nabob, with a complexion like currie powder, innumerable lacs of rupees, and a woful lack of liver. A refusal by one's cousin is a domestic treason of the most ruthless kind; and, assuming the author's statement to be substantially correct, we must say, that the lady's conduct was disgraceful. What her sensations may be, on reading the following passionate appeal, we cannot of course divine: but, if one spark of feeling lingers in her bosom, she must, for four-and-twenty hours at least, have little appetite for mulligatawny.

THE JILTED GENT.

BY THEODORE SMIFZER.

Comrades, you may pass the rosy. With permission of the chair,
I shall leave you for a little, for I'd like to take the air.
Whether 'twas the sauce at dinner, or that glass of ginger beer,
Or these strong cheroots, I know not, but I feel a little queer.
Let me go. Now, Chuckster, blow me, 'pon my soul, this is too bad!
When you want me, ask the waiter, he knows where I'm to be had.
Whew! This is a great relief now! Let me but undo my stock,
Resting, here beneath the porch, my nerves will steady like a rock.
In my ears I hear the singing of a lot of favourite tunes—
Bless my heart, how very odd! Why, surely, there's a brace of moons!
See, the stars, how bright they twinkle, winking with a frosty glare,
Like my faithless cousin Amy, when she drove me to despair.
Oh, my cousin, spider-hearted! Oh, my Amy! No, confound it!
I must wear the mournful willow,—all round my hat I've bound it.
Falser than the Bank of Fancy,—frailer than a shilling glove,—
Puppet to a father's anger,—minion to a nabob's love!
Is it well to wish thee happy! Having known me, could you ever
Stoop to marry half a heart, and little more than half a liver!
Happy! D——! Thou shalt lower, day by day, to suit thy lot,—
Thy china clay all turning to the common kind of gallipot.
As the husband is, the wife is,—he is stomach-plagued and old;
And his curry soups will make thy cheek the colour of his gold.
When his feeble love is sated, he will hold thee surely, then,
Something lower than his hookah,—something less than his cayenne.
What is this! His eyes are pinky. Was't the claret! Oh, no, no,—
Bless your soul it was the salmon,—salmon always makes him so.
Better thou wert dead before me,—better, better that I stood
Looking on thy murdered body, like the injured Daniel Good!
Better, thou and I were lying, cold and timber-stiff and dead,
With a pan of burning charcoal underneath the nuptial bed!
Cursed be the Bank of England's notes, that tempt the soul to sin!
Cursed be the want of acres,—doubly cursed the want of tin!
Cursed be the marriage contract, that enslaved thy soul to greed!
Cursed be the sallow lawyer, that prepared and drew the deed!
Cursed be his foul apprentice, who the loathsome fees did earn!
Cursed be the clerk and parson,—cursed be the whole concern!

And so on through a general commination, which extends to half a dozen stanzas more. This sweeping system of anathema may be consonant to what the philosophers call a high and imaginative mood of passion, but it is surely as unjust as any fulminations that ever emanated from the Papal chair. No doubt cousin Amy behaved shockingly; but why, on that account, should the Bank of England, incorporated by royal charter, or the most respectable practitioner who prepared the settlements, along with his innocent clerk, be handed over to the uncovenanted mercies of the foul fiend? No, no, Smifzer, this will never do! In a more manly strain is what follows:—

Oh, 'tis well, that I should bluster,—much I'm like to make of that;
Better comfort have I found in singing, "All around My Hat."
But that song, so wildly plaintive, palls upon my British ears.
'Twill not do to pine for ever,—I am getting up in years.
Can't I turn the honest penny, scribbling for the weekly press,
And in writing Sunday libels drown my private wretchedness?
Oh, to feel the wild pulsation, that in manhood's dawn I knew,
When my days were all before me, and my years were twenty-two.
When I smoked my independent pipe along the Quadrant wide,
With the many larks of London flaring up on every side.
When I went the pace so wildly, caring little what might come,
Coffee-milling care and sorrow, with a nose-adapted thumb.
Felt the exquisite enjoyment, tossing nightly off, oh heavens!
Brandy at the Cider Cellars, kidneys smoking hot at Evans'!
Or in the Adelphi sitting, half in rapture, half in tears,
Saw the glorious melo-drama, conjure up the shades of years!
Saw Jack Sheppard, noble stripling, act his wondrous feats again,
Snapping Newgate's bars of iron, like an infant's daisy-chain.
Might was right, and all the terrors which had held the world in awe,
Were despised, and prigging prospered, spite of Lawrie, spite of law.
In such scenes as these I triumphed, ere my passion's edge was rusted,
And my cousin's cold refusal left me very much disgusted!
Since my heart is sere and withered, and I do not care a pin,
Whether worse shall be the better, who shall lose or who shall win.
Hark, my merry comrades call me, bawling for another jorum,
They would mock me in derision, should I thus appear before 'em;
Womankind no more shall vex me, such at least as go arrayed
In the most expensive satins and the newest silk brocade.
I'll to Afric, lion-haunted, where the giant forest yields,
Rarer robes and finer tissue than are sold at Spitalfields.
Or to burst all chains of habit, flinging habit's self aside,
I shall walk the tangled jungle in mankind's primæval pride;
Feeding on the luscious berries and the rich cassava root,
Lots of dates and lots of guavas, clusters of forbidden fruit.
Never comes the trader thither, never o'er the purple main
Sounds the oath of British commerce, or the accents of Cockaigne.
There, methinks, would be enjoyment where no envious rule prevents,
Sink the steam-boats! cuss the railways! rot, O rot, the three per cents!
There the passions, cramped no longer, shall have space to breathe, my cousin!
I will take some savage woman—nay, I'll take at least a dozen.
They shall rear my young mulattoes, as no Bond Street brats are reared,
They shall dive for alligators, catch the wild-goats by the beard—
Whistle to the cockatoos, and mock the hairy-faced baboon,
Worship mighty Mumbo-Jumbo in the Mountains of the Moon.
I myself, in far Timbuctoo, leopard's blood will daily quaff,
Ride a-tiger-hunting, mounted on a thorough-bred giraffe.
Fiercely shall I shout the war-whoop, as some sullen stream he crosses,
Startling from their noon-day slumbers iron-bound rhinoceroses.
Fool! again the dream, the fancy! But I know my words are mad,
For I hold the grey barbarian lower than the Christian cad.
I the swell—the city dandy! I to seek such horrid places,—
I to haunt with squalid negroes, blubber-lips and monkey faces!
I to wed with Coromantees! I, who managed—very near—
To secure the heart and fortune of the widow Shillibeer.
Stuff and nonsense! let me never fling a single chance away:
Maids ere now, I know, have loved me, and another maiden may.
Morning Post (The Times won't trust me) help me, as I know you can;
I will pen an advertisement,—that's a never-failing plan.
"Wanted. By a bard, in wedlock, some young interesting woman:
Looks are not so much an object, if the shiners be forthcoming.
"Hymen's chains the advertiser vows shall be but silken fetters.
Please address to T. S., Chelsea. N. B. You must pay the letters."
That's the sort of thing to do it. Now I'll go, and taste the balmy,— Rest thee with thy yellow nabob, spider-hearted cousin Amy!

Bravo, Smifzer! That is the sort of thing—no wishy-washy snivelling about a wounded heart and all that kind of stuff—but savage sarcasm, the lava of a volcanic spirit. In a fine prophetic strain is that vision of Amy's feelings, as the inebriated nawaub stumbles boskily into the drawing-room, steaming fulsomely of chilma! And that picture of the African jungle, with Smifzer in puris mounted on a high trotting giraffe, with his twelve dusky brides around him! Cruikshank alone could do it justice. But the triumph of the poem is in the high-toned sentiment of civilisation and moral duty, which, esteeming "the grey barbarian" lower than "the Christian cad"—and that is low enough in all conscience—tears the captivating delusions of freedom and polygamy from the poet's eyes, even while his pulse is throbbing at the wildest, and sends him from the shades of the palm and the orange tree to the advertising columns of The Morning Post. This is indeed a great poem, and we need only add, that the reader will find something like it in Mr. Alfred Tennyson's Locksley Hall. There has been pilfering somewhere: but Messieurs Smifzer and Tennyson must settle it between them.

Apropos of this latter gentleman, we think we can recognise some of his playful peculiarities in the following lines :—

TO ISAAC TOMKINS' CHILD.

Lovely, airy, fairy creature,
Life is in thy every feature,
To and fro for ever flitting,
Never standing, never sitting
Three whole minutes in a place,
Keeping up an idle chase,
Jumping, stumping, thumping, squalling,
Over chairs and sofas sprawling,
Making such a din and pother,
Lobbies, rooms, and garrets through,— Sweetest, fleetest, has your mother,
Tell me, any more of you?
All thy artifices simple,
That thy cheeks so chubby dimple,
All thy sly coquetting airs,
Wheedling from me nuts and pears,
To prophetic eyes discover
How thou'lt rule thy future lover,
Make him madly near thee linger,
Turn him round thy little finger;
And thy lips, my little lamb,
Sweetly pout in mirthful flashes,
Especially when bread and jam
Have fringed them with superb moustaches.
Sunny, funny Caroline,
What a merry life is thine!
Ever eating, day and night,
With prodigious appetite;
Life, to most so drear and sandy,
Is to thee all sugar candy:
No perplexing thoughts hast thou,
Seaming furrows on thy brow.
Friendships riven, and loves untrue,
Pride and griping lust of Mammon,
By Philosophy and you
Are considered merest gammon.
Wisdom's type, my little dove,
Come, live with me, and be my love!
Come, close my lips up with thy kisses!
See, what a pretty orange this is—
And you shall have it, if to me
You come, and sit upon my knee.
There! that 's a dear! But where, my sweet,
Have you been dirtying your feet?
You little filthy monkey, look,
The mess that you have made my breeches,
If you were mine, I'd make the cook
Whip you to death, like pigs, with switches!

Decidedly that child is, what Cornelia remarked of the elder of the Gracchi, "a young varmint." But as decidedly the poet made a mistake in expressing himself so warmly as he has done. Off goes Missey to her mamma, whimpering and howling, tells what the cross old gentleman said of "the mother's pride;" and the cross old gentleman is never again flattered with the hope that Mr. and Mrs. Tomkins may have the pleasure of his company to dinner. We reverence the memory of King Herod; but we have refrained, on many an occasion, when an incursion of young Vandals let loose upon us after dinner, along with the grapes and walnuts, has suggested horrible promptings of infanticide, because the experience of a high-principled world has taught us never to allow our feelings to interfere with our interest. Of this first principle of civilized life it is pitiable to see so accomplished a writer as the author of these lines ignorant.

After all this verse, a dash of prose would not be amiss, like the soupçon of brandy which people have been known to mingle with their soda-water. What to choose is the difficulty. Richard Rasp, or the Sentimental Ruffian, by Mr. Whitehead, is enlivened with a liberal sprinkling of expletives and demoniac laughter, and pervaded by an airy ferocity, that are all very pleasant and stimulating to the admirers of the British-brandy-school of literature. But as we are not of that number, we must look for entertainment elsewhere. A Rough Ride through Russia, by the Marquis di Cockagna, is very lively and amusing. As it says nothing of the country, however, and a great deal about the personal miseries of the author, which are very heart-rending, we can afford to pass it over, more especially as we have our eye upon a delicious novella. Here it is :—

LA MARCHESA DI BELLADENTE.

BY MISS LÆTITIA JONES.

* * * * * *

"Thou wilt go, and wilt forget me, as others have done!" The gitarrho dropped from her long sylph-like fingers; her voice, trembling into silence like the faint leaves of the aspen, was hushed; her eyes glistened with moisture; and dropping her head upon her hands, she burst into a passion of tears.

"Juliana, ah mia Juliana! Che ni dite? Do not weep, mia bella. I will not forget thee. No, dearest, no! Thou art the fairest portion of my life—my vision by day, my dream by night. Thou, thou only," and he folded her gently to his bosom, "fillest all my thoughts. I move among beauty,—it passes like a shadow before me. To all the world beside I am dead as yonder cold marble; but to thee my bosom kindles into life, like the sculptured Venus beneath the glowing touch of Pygmalion."

"Teodoro!" she faintly exclaimed, and buried her face upon his bosom.

"Yes, my own Juliana, yes. Eyes, senses, heart—all, all are gone, and you alone fill up my sum of being. Rob me of thee, strip me of the glowing fancies that throng around thy image in my brain, and the hollow skull, jerked from the grave by the rude shovel of the sexton, is not more void of soul, of feeling, than am I."

"But you are going to your own bright land—will see others fairer, wealthier than I!"

"Fairer, wealthier—Anch Io son sospetto! Ah, cruda," and, as he spoke, he pressed back her long dark ringlets from her snowy forehead—"Ah, cruda, to wrong me by these doubts. Fairer cheek than thine, the sun of my own glorious land never gazed on. Wealthier! Think'st thou that all the dross that e'er was gathered by the hands of grovelling man, could dim or weaken that love for thee which is the cherished vestal fire of my existence! Kiss me, kiss me, dear girl, that I may take the heresy from thy lips!"

* * * * * *

And so they sat locked in each other's arms—mute in the ecstasy of transcendent joy—and a sense of beauty, and purity, and holy calm, fanned their gentle spirits, like the beating of seraphs' wings. The sun had sunk beneath the horizon, but left upon the sky, like the crimson track of a mighty conqueror, soft streaks of ruddy gold. And they were so happy! Beneath them, under the foliage of the Boulevards, rose the hum of the joyous multitude, abandoned to all the gaieties which are congenial to the sunny clime and spirits of la Belle France. The stirring notes of the Apollonicon and Hebrew lyre, or Jew's harp, rose here and there from many a dancing group, and, save the excitement occasioned by the passage every few minutes of a corpse, borne from the waters of the Seine by the officers of the Morgue, all, all was harmony, and all was joy.

"Addio!" exclaimed Teodoro Visconti, waking out of a reverie of two hours' duration.

"Ah, mon chèr!" exclaimed the Marchesa, clinging agonizedly to his neck.

"Andiam, andiam, mio bene! I must go; la Diligenza starts at three to-morrow morning, and I shall have little enough sleep as it is."

"Et vous, vous pouvez donc dormir!"

"Per chè non, bel idol mio! when it is to dream of thee! I must see M. le Notaire about the settlements, that when I return in a month there may be no obstruction to our happiness! Till then, once more addio!"

The agony of that parting! Crushing his chapeau upon his fevered brows, he rushed from the Hôtel Beauxdents, to a neighbouring cafè, to nerve himself for the conflict by maddening draughts of eau sucrè. The Marchesa for hours defied the efforts of sal volatile and burnt feathers.

* * * * * *

"Julie, ma chère, you don't take your coffee this morning! Ah, je vois, l'amour, l'amour! C'est une grand folie, vraiment! What stupid things it makes girls do! Soupir, soupir, tous les jours, and neither dinner nor souper will they touch! Ha, ha! Bah, bah, 'tis a great nonsense!"

These fathers are so heartless! Poor Juliana, too much cause had she for sighs and indigestion. Each succeeding letter of her lover had grown colder than its predecessor, and they came only like angel's visits. But when was man sincere? Faithless, unideal man—the heart of woman lavishes its deep devotion upon thee, turning evermore its soul-fraught glances to thy hollow smiles, like, &c. &c.—

We can't afford room for this apostrophe.

"It came—it fell, that fatal thunderbolt!"

The reader must not be alarmed. Miss Jones means simply to announce the morning delivery of letters by the postman.

A glance served to reveal the contents of the letter. "Cara Juliana," it bore, "we have both been mistaken—at least I have. I thought I loved you. Fancy, all fancy! I found this out when I met the fair Contessa di Parmesano. She is beautiful as the day, and has, without exception, the finest estates in Lombardy, of which another fortnight will see me in possession. Good bye, charming Juliana; I hope to hear shortly that you have followed my example. Thine, TEODORO VISCONTI."

"Tutto è sciolto
Giu per me non v'ha conforto,
Il mio cor per semprè è morto
Alla gioja ed all 'amor!"

exclaimed the Marchesa, in the notes of Elvino's beautiful scena from La Sonnambula, and dropped like lead upon the floor, dying like a swan in music.

* * * * * *

"Mon pauvre enfant! Sacre! ventre bleu! Que diable! diantre! Ventre St. Gris! Coquin, faquin, belitre! Il faut que j'aie vengeance! terrible vengeance!" exclaimed the old Marquis, lounging, with desperate ferocity, at an imaginary Visconti, whom, in his frenzy, he thought he saw before him. "Ha, ha, ha! blood, blood, blood! The honour of Belladente is avenged!" and the poor old man sank upon the floor, firmly satisfied that a bottle of claret which he had upset was the life-blood of his daughter's betrayer.

* * * * * *

"Midnight, at the Piazza del Popolo!"

"Ay, ay, your honour," said the sturdier of the ruffians; "never fear, but we shall give you full value for your ten zecchini."

"Ten zecchini, said you! I thought your price was eight!"

"Ten—not a scudo less, upon the honour of a gentleman. Would you have us sin our souls for nothing?"

"Ay, would you have us sin our souls for nothing?" struck in the other ruffian, who had hitherto been silent, playfully stabbing, as he spoke, at a variety of mental victims.

"Well, ten zecchini be it; and remember to strike home."

"Leave us alone for that. We didn't learn our craft yesterday, or the day before, either. Did we, Truculento?"

"I should rayther say not," said the other, with a strong American snivel.

"I shall be with him—on his left-hand side. You will not forget?"

"Oh, never fear!" and they separated; the Marquis to a casino at the Contessa di Parmesano's—the bravoes to a carousal at a neighbouring vassoio, or gin-palace.

It is within a few minutes of midnight, and Omicidio and Truculento are upon the Piazza del Popolo.

"Which side did the old fellow say our man was to be on?"

"The left, I think."

"I'll be hanged, if I think so! I'm certain it was the right."

"But I'm positive it was the left."

"Take your own way of it; but, look you, I'll take mine. I know it was the right, and I shall strike accordingly."

"Just as you please; but I shall do exactly the reverse. I'm not going to lose my zecchini for your stupidity."

"Corpo di Venere, we shall see who's right. Back, back—here they are!"

At this moment, two figures were seen approaching, in earnest conversation.

"And so, my dear Marquis, Juliana was not angry. Really, do you know, I was afraid that I was not altogether right about that business?"

"Quelle sottise! young folks never know their own minds. I was in love half-a-dozen times myself; but it was all nonsense."

"You'll tell her I was asking for her. La Contessa and myself shall always be glad to see her."

"Beaucoup obligè," said the Marquis, stepping back, and making a low congè; at which moment a blow from the poniard of Truculento laid him senseless on the pavement. Visconti fell bleeding at his side, struck to the heart by the stiletto of Omicidio.

"Cents diavoli!" exclaimed Omicidio and Truculento, in a breath. "Here's a nice business! This all comes of your infernal obstinacy, Truculento."

"Santa Vergine! what does it matter?" replied Truculento, savagely.

"Matter—Santo Sebastiano del Piombo! Matter, you low ruffian! Who is to pay us the zecchini?" responded Omicidio, as he concluded an unsuccessful foray into the Marquis's pockets. The Marquis had lost all his money at the casino.

"Corpo di Caravaggio, is it so? Then there's no more than will pay for one of us in that brooch," said Truculento, making a dash at the pearl brooch which bound the Marquis's feather to his hat.

"Is that your game? Why, then, take that!" And, as he spoke, Omicidio buried his still reeking stilette in his companion's neck.

Wounded as he was, Truculento sprang upon his throat, like a tiger on his prey. The struggle was but for a moment, and they both fell lifeless across the bodies of their murdered victims.

There is a tomb in Padua—and on it the simple words,

TEODORO VISCONTI IMPLORA PACE.

Beside it, on the long summer nights, may be seen a highborn female, beautiful as the skies above her. Flowers, freshly gathered, are breathing fragrance from the tomb, and the last prayer of the brave youth that sleeps below is seconded by the vestal supplications of the Contessa di Parmesano.

"Bless our old eyes!" as the boatswains say in the nautical dramas, that last paragraph has set them running like the conduits at the Versaille's. Lovely Lætitia Jones, for lovely you must be, don't write any more in that moving style! It must wear out your sensibilities—it must, indeed. Leave it to the M.P.'s, who contribute tales of love and murder to The Keepsake and The Book of Beauty.

Turn we now to a tale of The Middle Ages,—a tale of love, and high emprize and chivalry. We have read Minnesingers and Troubadours by the bushel; but none of them, in our apprehension, have blended domestic interest with glowing romance more happily than has been done in

THE KNIGHT AND THE TAYLZEOUR'S DAUGHTER.

BY MR. ALFRED SNEIDER.

Did you ever hear the story—
  Old the legend is and true—
How a knight of fame and glory
  All aside his armour threw;
Spouted spear and pawned habergeon,
  Pledged his sword and surcoat gay,
Sate down cross-legg'd on the shop-board,
  Sate and stitched the live long day!

"Taylzeour! Not one single shilling
  Does my breeches pocket hold.
I to pay am really willing,
  If I truly had the gold.
Farmers none can I encounter,
  Graziers there are none to kill;
Therefore, prithee, gentle taylzeour,
  Bother not about thy bill!"

"Good Sir knyghte, just once too often
  Have you tried that slippery trick;
Hearts like mine you cannot soften,
  Vainly do you ask for tick.
Christmas and its bills are coming,
  Soon will they be showering in,
Therefore, once for all, my rum 'un,
  I expect you'll post the tin!

"Mark, Sir knyghte, that gloomy bayliffe,
  In the palmer's amice brown;
He shall lead you unto jail, if
  You don't instantly stump down!"
Deeply swore the young crusader,
  But the taylzeour would not hear,
And the gloomy, bearded bayliffe
  Evermore kept sneaking near.

"Neither groat, nor maravedi,
  Have I got my soul to bless;
And I'd feel extremely seedy
  Languishing in vile duresse.
Therefore, listen, ruthless taylzeour,
  Take my steed and armour free,
Pawn them at thy Hebrew uncle's,
  And I'll work the rest for thee!"

Lightly leaped he on the shop-board,
  Lightly crooked his manly limb,
Lightly drove the glancing needle
  Through the growing doublet's rim.
Gaberdines in countless number,
  Did the taylzeour knyghte repair;
And entirely on cucumber,
  And on cabbage lived he there.

Once his weary task beguiling,
  With a melancholy song,
That good knight o'er miles of broadcloth
  Drove the hissing goose along.
From her lofty lattice window,
  Looked the taylzeour's daughter down,
And she instantly discovered,
  That her heart was not her own.

"Canst thou love me, gentle stranger!"
  Blushing like a rose she stood—
And the knyghte at once admitted,
  That he rather thought he could.
"He who weds me shall have riches,
  Gold, and lands, and houses free."
"For a single pair of—small-clothes,
  I would roam the world with thee."

Then she flung him down the tickets—
  Well the knyghte their import knew—
"Take this gold, and win thy armour
  From the unbelieving Jew.
Though in garments mean and lowly,
  Thou wouldst roam the world with me,
Only as a belted warrior,
  Stranger, will I wed with thee!"

At the feast of good Saint Alban,
  In the middle of the Spring,
There was some superior jousting
  By the order of the king.
"Valiant knights!" exclaimed the monarch,
  "You will please to understand,
He who bears himself most bravely,
  Shall obtain my daughter's hand."

Well and bravely did they bear them,
  Bravely battled, one and all;
But the bravest in the tourney
  Was a warrior stout and tall.
None could tell his name or lineage,
  None could meet him in the field,
And a goose regardant proper
  Hissed upon his azure shield.

"Warrior, thou hast won my daughter!"
  But the champion bowed his knee,
"Princely blood may not be wasted
  On a simple knyghte like me.
She I love is meek and lowly;
  But her heart is frank and free;
And there must be tin forthcoming,
  Though she is of low degree."

Slowly rose that nameless warrior,
  Slowly turned his steps aside,
Passed the lattice where the princess
  Sate in beauty and in pride;
Passed the row of noble ladies,
  Hied him to an humbler seat,
And in silence laid the chaplet
  At the taylzeour's daughter's feet.

If Mr. S. C. Hall does not include this in his Book of British Ballads, he does his subscribers an injustice. What a theme for the graphic pencil of Franklin or Scott! That scene of the bankrupt crusader trying to soften—vain task—the flint of his Stultz's heart, with "the gloomy, bearded bayliffe" sneaking in the back-ground, would do for plate first. "The Hebrew Uncle" is suggestive of a charming sketch. The knight, careering with needle and cotton twist through the Field of the Cloth of Taffeta—the Taylzeour's Daughter watering her cab——we mean jonquils, at the lattice—the joust—the offering of the chaplet; why, there never was such a set of subjects! Mr. Sneider—we presume you are connected with the respectable artist in wearing apparel, whose advertisements, with the genteel pickpocket with a glass in his eye in one corner, and the lady in the riding-habit in the other, assail us in every periodical. If so, we are much obliged to you. You have won our hearts, and we shall allow you to make a coat for us, and charge the price to your profit and loss account. Can we do more?

To descend from the pure empyrean of Romance, which breathes in the poem just quoted, to that which we are about to quote, is to quit a balloon for a canal boat. But as some might prefer the safe, though tedious drawl of the latter to the exhilarating sweep of the former, so there may be readers to whom not even the loves of the Knight and the Tailor's Daughter are so interesting as the following record of a pic-nic excursion to—

CORA LINN, ON THE FALLS OF THE CLYDE.

The time I saw thee, Cora, last,
'Twas with congenial friends,
And calmer hours of pleasure past
My memory seldom lends.

It was as sweet a summer day
As ever shone on Clyde,
And some of us were in a shay,
And some of us did ride.

Five miles an hour along the road,
Full blythely we did scamper;
For well we knew a pleasant load
Was lurking in our hamper.

We reach the linn, its waters see
Sweep down with roar incessant,
And thought a tumble in would be Exceedingly unpleasant.

Awhile our wondering eyes, we stood,
The lovely scene to glut on;
Then, having walked into the wood,
We walked into the mutton.

And, lying on the grassy slopes,
We took our bread and salt;
While he, that Pleasures sang of Hopes,
Presided o'er the malt.

And Moore in ecstasy declared,
That bards might rave in vain,
Of champaign countries;—he preferred
The country and champagne.

He sang of love and beauty bright,
And woman's vows so brittle;
And, though his voice had tones of might,
His words were only Little.

We heeded not; and soon, uncheer'd,
All vocal ardour sickens:
So Tommy quickly disappear'd
Into a pie of chickens.

And when, upon our dainty fare,
We'd plied our knives and forks,
Some took to drawing sketches there,
But most to drawing corks.

The wine flew round; and when our cranks
And merriment went fleetest,
All own'd that draughts on country banks,
Of all draughts were the sweetest.

Some took to singing, some to prayers,
And some grew blind as bats;
Some wander'd off to shoot for hares,
A few were shooting cats.

Some call'd for brandy, some for gin,
And some for toddy bowls;
Some spoke of jumping o'er the linn,
And all were drunk as owls.

And, for the hour, life's dreary lot
Lost all its rankling sting;
For everybody was forgot,
And also everything.

Delightful hours of jollity,
And mirth-inspiring din!
They've made thee ever dear to me,
Romantic Cora Linn.

Now, this is what may truly be called giving a human interest to a landscape. The bard indulges in no nonsense about waving birches, and roaring cataracts, and the usual et ceteras of poetic landscape painting, but confesses, candidly and at once, that it was the fun and the good things that made the memory of Cora Linn so pleasant. The poet is quite right. But for the flirting, the veal pasties, and the champagne, pic-nics would be intolerable. Here there is no flirting, indeed. The party was one of gentlemen, rather on the shady side of forty; and at that age gentlemen find smiles and kisses rather thin and unsubstantial as a regular diet. But for the high authority of the writer, however, we could hardly have supposed that the "congenial friends" would have become so very jolly as he describes them, seeing what great names they numbered among them. Being under the seal of secrecy, we cannot mention the writer's name; but we are satisfied that we violate no confidence, when we say it is not Mr Campbell.

A good deal of interest was recently excited by the desolation that spoke in a simple advertisement in The Times, to this effect:—"Why does Frederick come no more to Saint John's Wood?" There was a plaintiveness in these words that went to the heart of every banker's clerk and stockbroker in the city. A new relay of omnibuses was started between the Mansion-House and St. John's Wood, and these were filled with the élite of London's youth, eager to catch a glimpse of the deserted fair one. What the result was,—whether Frederick came back, or the lady sought comfort in the arms of another, we don't know; but our friend, Mr. Vincent Stubbins, has sent us the following graceful lines upon the subject, which we gladly insert:—

THE MOURNER OF SAINT JOHN'S WOOD.

He said that he would meet me there—
The old familiar place—
I went, I waited—oh, despair!
Of him was ne'er a trace.
The autumn leaves fall fast and thick,
The dusk is come and gone;
Oh, why comes not my Frederick
To the wood of good Saint John!

Again, again I sought the spot,
I lingered by the tree,
And still I sang, he cometh not,
He cometh not, ah me!
At every sound my heart beats quick,
And still I linger on,
Oh, why comes not my Frederick
To the wood of good Saint John!

Oh, cruel, thus to wring my breast!
Loves he another maid,
Has death on him her fell arrest,
Or else his tailor, laid!
Oh, leave me not to wander, sick
At heart, and make my moan,
But come, oh come, my Frederick,
To the wood of good Saint John!

Sweetly plaintive, indeed—and Frederick's heart must have been as hard as a money-lender's if he resisted the appeal. With the melancholy cadence of this poemett ringing in our ears, let us turn to a sketch, for which it will form no bad symphony.

THE SUICIDE.

BY ALDERMAN CRUNCHLEIGH.

"I am engaged to wed another!"

Such were the words that withered the soul of Edward Progsley. Not the red levin-bolt of the thunder in its overwhelming career could have paralyzed his frame and electrified his being more than that simple phrase—Wedded to another. There was misery in the idea—destruction in the thought—death, in short, in the pot! He was regularly dished.

Edward Progsley went home—so calmly, that an unobservant beholder might have deemed him a careless man. But into his bosom—into his marrow, deep, deep beyond the power of human surgery to probe, had sped the fatal shaft. There was a fire in his brain, a craving in his vitals, which no rare condiments could assuage.

He returned home, and sat down silently to the wonted social meal. His mother did not mark his disturbed air. Possibly—because age is hungry—the necessity of ministering to her own wants might have dulled her ordinary acuteness; but the eye of a sister is sharper. Jemima Progsley remarked, not without alarm, that her brother had absorbed four platesful of peas-soup without uttering one monosyllable; but when the tureen was removed, and the fish substituted in its place, she could keep silence no longer.

"Edward!" she said—"Dear Edward! Gracious, that is your third haddock!"

"Peace, girl!" was the moody reply. "I am sick at heart."

There was a roast pig that day for dinner—a yeanling of the sty. Edward devoured it all—all save a minute portion of the crackling, and that would have gone too, but his mother wished it, and he yielded: Casting the cheese-parings from him, he left his seat, rushed to his own still apartment, secured the door, and brooded over his ruined hopes in sullen silence till the hour of midnight pealed. Then a strange feeling of utter desolation came over the mind of the unfortunate young man. Early hopes blighted—the smile of love turned to the scowl of hate—the honey of love overrun with its bitterest gall! Cautiously he opened the door and listened. There was no sound except the heavy breathing of his respected parent. All the inmates of the house were locked in deep repose. Furtively and noiselessly he stole down stairs, opened the door of the pantry, threw a hurried glance around, and selecting from the nourishing stores a leg of cold mutton and the torso of a chicken pie, he conveyed them to his own apartment.

"Oh, Julia!" he exclaimed, "without thee what is life? I had tasted its sweets, I had eaten my fill of joy, and now what is it but a gloomy banquet, a wreck of broken victuals! Better," he continued, "striking his fork into a chicken—"better that I were, like this poor silly fowl, beneath the monumental crust, with the wild parsley waving above my unconscious head!"

He finished it—that pie—jelly and all. Not a fragment of the crust remained. But there was yet work to do.

From a corner of his study he drew out a strange implement known to sportsmen by the necromantic name of Conjuror, and poured into it some portion of dark liquid from a phial. The name that phial bore was HARVEY! Horrible delusion! He had no knife, but with a razor, keener than the pangs of conscience, he cut the cold hard mutton to the bone, and, piling slice upon slice, till the utensil could contain no more, he placed it on the glowing fire. Then with desperate calmness he lay down upon his bed, and crunched apples, until the savoury smell of the stew pervaded the apartment with something of Elysian freshness.

Three times during that night was the Conjuror refilled! Three times he rose, and there, like a ghastly Ghool, held his lone repast in the midst of dust and darkness and desolation. At length the bone had yielded up its flesh. Not one morsel of all the mutton remained.

Terrible then was it to behold the countenance of the exhausted Progsley. His eyes started from their sockets,—his face was flushed to a deep purple hue, a sound like the ringing of a thousand bells was in his ears, the weight as of a leaden statue hung beneath his heart, and threatened to pull him down. A thick sob issued from his lips.

"Now, Julia, thou art avenged, and I am food for——"

He dropped lifeless on the floor.

Next morning the servants found him dead, cold, and extended on the carpet, with a bare bone clenched firmly in his right hand. They laid him with his fathers.

After a sketch so original and so powerful as this, it would be folly to go further. Therefore, good reader, we bid thee adieu; wishing thee, in the words of our revered master in fun, Dr. Francis Rabelais, "all ease of your body, and comfort of your reins!"

The Feast of Turkeys.
EDINBURGH, 1842.

MOSS-TROOPER WILL.

A LEGEND OF AVONDALE.

[The Castle of Strathaven, or Avondale, stands upon a rocky eminence on the banks of the Pomealing or Pomillion. It was formerly surrounded by a strong wall, with turrets at certain distances, and the entrance secured by a drawbridge.

During the period of the Commonwealth, this castle was a favourite residence of Duchess Anne of Hamilton, who held Cromwell in utter detestation for the rigour with which he acted towards her. While the Duchess was residing at the castle, one of Cromwell's generals, with a body of troops, passed on his way to Ayrshire; but no sooner had he come near the castle than the Duchess ordered the guns on the ramparts to be opened on him. Surprised, and enraged at so unexpected a salute, the General demanded—"Who holds that castle?"—"Duchess Anne of Hamilton," was the answer.—"She must be a bold and fearless woman indeed!" exclaimed the General, as another volley of shot whistled about his ears, and compelled him to lead his troops another way.

This castle was unroofed in 1740 in a violent storm, and has gradually gone to decay ever since. It is one of the most picturesque ruins in Scotland, and beautifully situated. Part of one of the remaining turrets was formerly used as a prison, but was shut up in consequence of a drunken prisoner tumbling through an old window, which he mistook for a door. The Pomealing or Pomillion is celebrated for a delicious species of trout.]

THE folks about Straven oft tell a strange tale
Of Will the Moss-trooper of old Avondale,
Who, merry and free,
With a hundred and three
Bold men at his back,
Armed with spear and with jack,
Rode dauntlessly through all the low countrie;
A rattling, rollicking Reiver was he,
Around the Pomealing,
He carried on stealing
The cattle from farmers and graziers—whose feeling
Was strongly opposed to this system of dealing!
On the banks of Pomealing, commanding the vale,
Stood the dark frowning castle of old Avondale;

And there an old Baron lived quite at his ease,
Building dry dykes and planting young trees.

It seems this old Baron had sworn by Saint Paul,
That he would hang Will and his followers all,
If they did not allow
Every sheep, horse, and cow
They had carried away—
Forgetting to pay—
To be sent back instanter to old Avonhall,
And that Will and his troopers should come at his call.

Now, Will thought the Baron's request most unfair,
And swore that no cow, horse, nor sheep, he would spare:
So that very night—
It was fine clear moonlight—
Bold Will and his band
Rode over the land,
And stole all the cattle that they could find there,
Cut down the crops, and laid the land bare.

Oh! how the old Baron cursed and he swore;
He danced in his rage, and his beard he tore;
And he vowed a hundred times o'er and o'er,
That Will and his band should that night's work deplore!
So he called up each vassal
Who lived near the cas'le,
And all sallied out,
To hunt round about
For the rascally reivers who'd harried the nowt!
Now Will and his men
Lay concealed in a glen,
Watching the Baron's manœuvring then:
So quietly they lay
Till he rode far away
Along with the whole of his vassals so true;
Then what does the rascally Moss-trooper do?

He boldly walked up to the old castle walls,
And loudly upon the stanch Warder he calls
To come quickly down and open the gate:
He had word from the Baron, and no time to wait.

The old Warder growled, and wasn't quite sure
Whether or not he should open the door;
For the vassals and all,
At the old Baron's call,
Had all sallied out, thus leaving the hall
Without any protection from any bold foemen,
Except the old Warder and certain old women.

But while the old Warder was blinking and thinking,
The gallant Moss-trooper as quickly as winking,
Sprang light as a goat
Right over the moat,
And catching the poor Warder firm by the throat,
Threw him down on his knees,
And quickly did seize,
From the old fellow's pocket, a large bunch of keys.

Then his good sword he drew, and his bugle he blew,
And swift to his aid the Moss-troopers flew;
And they rummaged the old castle all through and through,
While the women kicked up such a hulla-baloo,
The like of it old Straven's towers never knew.
And thus was the Castle of Avondale ta'en,
And it's pleasing to think there was nobody slain.

After taking the castle, the impudent sinner
Caused the women to cook up a capital dinner,
And, inviting his troopers to sit down and dine,
Made free with the old Baron's viands and wine.

While Will and his troopers sat feasting with glee,
And the old hall rang loud with their wild revelrie,
The honest old Baron—oh! where was he?—
Riding about with his companie.

They hunted far, and they hunted about,
They searched the whole country all in and out;
And the vassals oft wished, in a manner uncivil,
That Will and his followers were all at the d——l;
For hungry and tired they rode onward, but still
They could never get tidings of Moss-trooper Will.

Tired at length of such work,
While he swore like a Turk,
The old Baron cried to his followers "Come—
I think it is time we were turning for home;
For it now must appear
To you all very clear,
That Will and his rascals have taken leg bail,
And made their escape out of old Avondale."

So homewards they rode, and the turrets they saw:
But the vassals were struck with amazement and awe;
For while the old castle they eagerly scanned,
They saw that the walls were completely manned.

The old Baron gazed, and he rubbed his eyes,
He gaped, and he stared with the utmost surprise,
For he certainly thought, amid his confusion,
The men on the wall seemed an optic delusion:
But no! there stood they,
All in battle array.
And a shout of defiance rung loud on his ear—
"Ho—ho! can you catch the bold moss-troopers here!"

Well! here was a go!
And the Baron thought so;
While the vassals all swore 'twas an infamous sin,
That they should march out, to let the rogues in;
And the Baron, with rueful visage, confest,
"Well now—if I am not diddled I'm blest!"

Now, thinking the matter would painfully end,
The Baron saluted bold Will as a friend—
And said he might keep
Every cow, horse, and sheep,
As well as the grain he happened to reap,
And ne'er be molested by any again,
If he'd only come out of the Keep with his men.

But Will the Moss-trooper was rather too sly—
He firmly declared "it was all in his eye;"
And that the old Baron "might trundle to pot,"
For he—Will—was resolved to keep all he had got.

So the Baron, as nothing was made of this parley,
Bivouacked near the castle on some ricks of barley;
Resolving that he next morning, sans doubt,
Would drive Moss-trooper Will and his followers out.

Now, under the ground,
The Moss-troopers found
A long subterranean passage, that wound
Far away from the castle—'tis said good miles three,
And led to the country so open and free.
So they plundered the castle, and through this long den,
Fled back to their old fav'rite haunt in the glen,
And carried away all the good Baron's cattle,
While he was preparing to give them tough battle.

Early next morning, 'twas just about dawn,
The vassals in order of battle were drawn,
And boldly advanced the old castle to take,
Before the Moss-troopers should all be awake.
They scrambled o'er walls, and they scrambled through ditches,
With scratching of hands, and tearing of breeches,
They entered the court with a thrilling "hurrah!"
But, to their amazement, no foemen they saw.
They searched from the tower-tops down to the ground,
But Will and his troopers they never yet found.
And thus the old castle was quickly reta'en,
While—just as before—there was nobody slain.

MACAULAY'S LAYS OF ANCIENT ROME.*

THE Northern is degenerate who does not, to his heart's core, relish National Ballad poetry. Indeed, we should augur unfavourably of the poetical sensibilities of any one who did not enjoy those inspiring if rude strains which rouse the soul "like a battle-trumpet." In every language in which these spontaneous bardic effusions are found—and they have a place in the earliest literature, the literature "before the letters," of every warlike people that are at all advanced from the savage state—they breathe the fire of passion; while, by small incidental natural touches, they often embody the most thrilling tenderness, and the deepest pathos. Neither the genius of its early population, nor the credible annals of Ancient Rome, were peculiarly adapted to ballad poetry, whose cradle and elements were found in the East and in the North; and which, after the Homeric period, so far as is authentically known, first flourished in the chivalrous and romantic times of the Middle Ages. Yet, in the unpromising field of the Roman annals, Mr. Macaulay has found rich materials, apt for his purpose, which he has fashioned and moulded with a skill and felicity which almost borders upon creative genius. These materials are found in the early Books of Livy, which narrate, if not as literal facts, yet without dull imagination-freezing scepticism, the wild tales and legends of the origin of the Republic; the Rape of the Sabine women; the nightly meetings of Numa and the Nymph; and those other fanciful or heroic traditions familiar to every schoolboy, which, in the opinion of Mr. Macaulay, are far more poetical than anything else in Roman literature. And, indeed, it may be generally affirmed, that the early age of every nation is its most poetical age. Among those heroic tales which, whether authentic or not, imagination longs to adopt with entire faith, are the gallant adventures of Horatius Cocles, the defender of the Bridge; the Battle of the Lake Regillus, when, to succour the Romans, Castor and Pollux, mixed personally in the mêlée, and turned the fate of the day. These two brave legends Mr. Macaulay has adopted, as of sufficient verity for his purpose of imitating or personating the earliest poets of Rome. The story of Virginia may have been recommended to him by its exquisite pathos, as well as the political importance of its consequences; and in the Fourth Lay, The Prophecy of Capys, which is supposed to be "sung at the banquet in the capitol, on the day when Manius Curius Dentatus, a second time Consul, triumphed over King Pyrrhus and the Tarentines, in the year of the City CCCCLXXIX," he has chosen no legend or tradition, but invented a medium suited to his design. The above, and many other wild and exalting tales, which find a place in the fabulous history of ancient Rome, have, by modern critics, been ascribed to an earlier Roman literature, of which every trace had perished long before the classic writers were born. Upon this idea, countenanced, if not absolutely confirmed, by the learned and acute Niebuhr, Mr. Macaulay has acted in the magnanimous attempt to make the dry bones live—to render back into animated ballad poetry those stirring and heroic incidents recorded in chronicles presumed to be wholly derived from poetical sources. In accomplishing this task—and personating not one ancient Roman poet but four, living at different periods—he throws himself back into the times when the deeds sung by the bards were freshly remembered by their countrymen; and with, as we think, if not absolute verisimilitude—which would not, to modern readers, be desirable although it were possible—yet with very marked effect. For the secondary, the merely learned or classical part of his undertaking, Mr. Macaulay must be, if not eminently yet sufficiently qualified, by ample knowledge of the history, usages, manners, superstitions and religion of the Roman people; of their national genius, and all that may be included under that sweeping word costume. He has, in brief, assumed the part of the Macpherson of the Romans; though, in those fragments of poetry, and floating traditions of bards, which were certainly to be found in the Highlands of Scotland, the translator of Ossian possessed more materials ready prepared.

It must be left to some future Niebuhr to settle when Mr. Macaulay actually wrote these Lays. They are, however, closely allied in genius, mode, and metre to those kindling early ballads of his, which gave so fair a promise of poetic power; but whether they have slumbered in his desk for twenty years, to be polished and produced during his temporary [?] retreat from public life, or are the production of that brief period of leisure, we receive no hint. Nor is the question of any great importance.——If the Lays are not of the solid or utilitarian kind of literature expected from a modern Statesman and Jurist, they are in nothing incompatible with the higher part of the nature of such grave characters. At all events there they are, a free-will offering to refined literature, and as such, as well as from their intrinsic worth, deserving admiration. The Lays of Ancient Rome differ from the Spanish ballads of Mr. Lockhart in this, that Mr. Macaulay is himself the poet, the creator; and Lockhart merely the translator, though an admirable one.

The first lay, Horatius, is our favourite, probably from having been the first read. The ballad opens with great animation,—with Lars Porsena, in the attempt to restore the House of Tarquin, summoning his array to march upon Rome, his messengers speeding through Tuscany in every direction. The final muster reminds one of the Scottish army, as seen by Marmion, in the Borough Moor of Edinburgh, before the battle of Flodden, though in the one case the wild levy is brought vividly before us, and in the other the representation is less dramatic.

* Longmans & Co.

The preparations made in Rome to resist this formidable array, the panic of the citizens, the alarm and hasty consultations of the senators, and the anxious watch of the burghers, have grace, truth, and life. Yet the description of the preparations for the defence, though distinguished by the literal minuteness of the old historic ballad, is more artificial in structure and ornate in style; and perhaps it is too long-drawn out; though the final struggle and triumph are truly animating in their homely sublimity, and the close of the Lay is exceedingly beautiful. We must be content to choose merely a stanza here and there.

The citizens are dispirited, and filled with the utmost dismay at the approach of the formidable army; but when the chief wrong-doer, the hated Sextus, is seen among the besiegers, indignation rouses their spirit, and recalls their courage.

But when the face of Sextus
Was seen among the foes,
A yell that rent the firmament
From all the town arose.
On the house-tops was no woman
But spate toward him and hissed;
No child but screamed out curses,
And shook its little fist.

When the bridge, upon the demolition of which the safety of the city depended, had been fairly beaten down, and was sinking; and when of the devoted Three who had defended it against the assailing force, two had darted back to the side of Rome and of safety, we again take up the ballad.

Back darted Spurius Lartius;
Herminius darted back:
And, as they passed, beneath their feet
They felt the timbers crack.
But when they turned their faces,
And on the farther shore
Saw brave Horatius stand alone,
They would have crossed once more.

But with a crash like thunder
Fell every loosened beam,
And, like a dam, the mighty wreck
Lay right athwart the stream:
And a long shout of triumph
Rose from the walls of Rome,
As to the highest turret-tops
Was splashed the yellow foam.

And, like a horse unbroken
When first he feels the rein,
The furious river struggled hard,
And tossed his tawny mane;
And burst the curb, and bounded,
Rejoicing to be free;
And whirling down, in fierce career,
Battlement, and plank, and pier,
Rushed headlong to the sea.

Alone stood brave Horatius,
But constant still in mind;
Thrice thirty thousand foes before,
And the broad flood behind.
"Down with him!" cried false Sextus,
With a smile on his pale face.
"Now yield thee!" cried Lars Porsena,
"Now yield thee to our grace."

Round turned he, as not deigning
Those craven ranks to see;
Nought spake he to Lars Porsena,
To Sextus nought spake he;
But he saw on Palatinus
The white porch of his home;
And he spake to the noble river
That rolls by the towers of Rome,

"Oh, Tiber! father Tiber!
To whom the Romans pray,
A Roman's life, a Roman's arms,
Take thou in charge this day!"
So he spake, and speaking sheathed
The good sword by his side,
And, with his harness on his back,
Plunged headlong in the tide.

No sound of joy or sorrow
Was heard from either bank;
But friends and foes, in dumb surprise,
With parted lips and straining eyes,
Stood gazing where he sank;
And when above the surges
They saw his crest appear,
All Rome sent forth a rapturous cry;
And even the ranks of Tuscany
Could scarce forbear to cheer.

* * * *

Never, I ween, did swimmer,
In such an evil case,
Struggle through such a raging flood
Safe to the landing-place:
But his limbs were borne up bravely
By the brave heart within,
And our good father Tiber
Bare bravely up his chin.

"Curse on him!" quoth false Sextus;
"Will not the villain drown?
But for this stay, ere close of day,
We should have sacked the town!"
"Heaven help him!" quoth Lars Porsena,
"And bring him safe to shore;
For such a gallant feat of arms
Was never seen before."

And now he feels the bottom;
Now on dry earth he stands;
Now round him throng the Fathers
To press his gory hands;
And now with shouts and clapping,
And noise of weeping loud,
He enters through the River-gate,
Borne by the joyous crowd.

They gave him of the corn-land,
That was of public right,
As much as two strong oxen
Could plough from morn till night:
And they made a molten image,
And set it up on high,
And there it stands unto this day
To witness if I lie.

It stands in the Comitium,
Plain for all folk to see;
Horatius in his harness,
Halting upon one knee:
And underneath is written,
In letters all of gold,
How valiantly he kept the bridge,
In the brave days of old.

And still his name sounds stirring
Unto the men of Rome,
As the trumpet-blast that cries to them
To charge the Volscian home;
And wives still pray to Juno
For boys with hearts as bold
As his who kept the bridge so well
In the brave days of old.

There is nothing in the Lays finer than the conclusion of this ballad, though the poetry may be of a more refined character than is to be expected in the ballad strains of a rude age, however stirring or pathetic these may sometimes be. The end is this:—

And in the nights of winter,
When the cold north-winds blow,

And the long howling of the wolves
Is heard amidst the snow;
When round the lonely cottage
Roars loud the tempest's din,
And the good logs of Algidus
Roar louder yet within;

When the oldest cask is opened,
And the largest lamp is lit,
When the chestnuts glow in the embers,
And the kid turns on the spit;
When young and old in circle
Around the firebrands close;
When the girls are weaving baskets,
And the lads are shaping bows;

When the goodman mends his armour
And trims his helmet's plume;
When the goodwife's shuttle merrily
Goes flashing through the loom;
With weeping and with laughter
Still is the story told,
How well Horatius kept the bridge
In the brave days of old.

The next Lay, of which we shall give a brief specimen, is in a different style. The interest of the tragic story of Virginia is essentially domestic. It affects the deep and universal affections of our common nature; and Roman patriotism here finds its animating principle in the purity of private life, the sacredness of female honour.

The first appearance of the young Virginia, in the light-hearted buoyancy of girlish innocence, is in exquisite contrast with the boding apparition of Appius Claudius, attended by his guard of axes, his pimps, parasites, and jesters, scowling along the Forum—

Like King Tarquin in his pride.
Just then, as through one cloudless chink in a black stormy sky
Shines out the dewy morning-star, a fair young girl came by.
With her small tablets in her hand, and her satchel on her arm,
Home she went bounding from the school, nor dreamed of shame or harm;
And past those dreaded Axes she innocently ran,
With bright, frank, brow that had not learned to blush at gaze of man;
And up the Sacred Street she turned, and, as she danced along,
She warbled gaily to herself lines of the good old song,
How for a sport the princes came spurring from the camp,
And found Lucrece, combing the fleece, under the midnight lamp.
The maiden sang, as sings the lark, when up he darts his flight,
From his nest in the green April corn, to meet the morning light;
And Appius heard her sweet young voice, and saw her sweet young face,
And loved her with the accursed love of his accursed race,
And all along the Forum, and up the Sacred Street,
His vulture eye pursued the trip of those small glancing feet.
* * * * * * *
Over the Alban mountains the light of morning broke;
From all the roofs of the Seven Hills curled the thin wreaths of smoke:
The city-gates were opened; the Forum, all alive,
With buyers and with sellers was humming like a hive:
Blithely on brass and timber the craftsman's stroke was ringing,
And blithely o'er her panniers the market-girl was singing,
And blithely young Virginia came smiling from her home:
Ah! woe for young Virginia, the sweetest maid in Rome!
With her small tablets in her hand, and her satchel on her arm,
Forth she went bounding to the school, nor dreamed of shame or harm.
She crossed the Forum shining with stalls in alleys gay,
And just had reached the very spot whereon I stand this day.

The seizure of Virginia, by Marius, the minion of Appius Claudius; the hot rage of the people; the sturdy resistance of the flesher, and of the "strong smith, Muræna," are narrated with great spirit. But vain was their courage; this was in the evil and degenerate times of Rome—

There was no brave Licinius, no honest Sextius then;
But all the city, in great fear, obeyed the wicked Ten.

Yet before "the varlet Marius" had completed his odius task, and seized Virginia as his alleged slave-girl—while she "sobbed and shrieked for aid," the young Icilius started forth, stamped his foot, rent his gown, smote upon his breast, and springing upon the oft-sung column in the Forum, he—

Beckoned to the people, and in bold voice and clear
Poured thick and fast the burning words which tyrants quake to hear.
"Now, by your children's cradles, now, by your fathers' graves,
Be men to-day, Quirites, or be for ever slaves!
For this did Servius give us laws? For this did Lucrece bleed?
For this was the great vengeance done on Tarquin's evil seed?
For this did those false sons make red the axes of their sire?
For this did Scævola's right hand hiss in the Tuscan fire?

The poet passes over the immediate effect of this rousing democratic harangue upon the populace, which sinks into their hearts, and is only revealed in the subsequent insurrection. He hurries on to the catastrophe, to the most pathetic of Roman sacrifices, which is touched with singular delicacy and tenderness. The fate of his child is foreseen by the heroic father—and

Straightway Virginius led the maid a little space aside,
To where the reeking shambles stood, piled up with horn and hide,
Close to yon low dark archway, where, in a crimson flood,
Leaps down to the great sewer the gurgling stream of blood.
Hard by, a flesher on a block had laid his whittle down:
Virginius caught the whittle up, and hid it in his gown.
And then his eyes grew very dim, and his throat began to swell,
And in a hoarse, changed voice he spake: "Farewell, sweet child! farewell!
Oh! how I loved my darling! though stern I sometimes be,
To thee, thou know'st, I was not so—who could be so to thee?
And how my darling loved me! how glad she was to hear
My footstep on the threshold, when I came back last year!
And how she danced with pleasure, to see my civic crown,
And took my sword, and hung it up, and brought me forth my gown!
Now, all those things are over—yes, all thy pretty ways,
Thy needlework, thy prattle, thy snatches of old lays;

And none will grieve when I go forth, or smile when I return,
Or watch beside the old man's bed, or weep upon his urn.
The house that was the happiest within the Roman walls,
The house that envied not the wealth of Capua's marble halls,
Now, for the brightness of thy smile, must have eternal gloom,
And for the music of thy voice, the silence of the tomb.
The time is come. See how he points his eager hand this way!
See how his eyes gloat on thy grief, like a kite's upon the prey!
With all his wit, he little deems, that, spurned, betrayed, bereft,
Thy father hath in his despair one fearful refuge left.
He little deems that in this hand, I clutch what still can save
Thy gentle youth from taunts and blows, the portion of the slave;
Yea, and from nameless evil, that passeth taunt and blow—
Foul outrage, which thou knowest not, which thou shalt never know.
Then clasp me round the neck once more, and give me one more kiss;
And now, mine own dear little girl, there is no way but this."
With that he lifted high the steel, and smote her in the side,
And in her blood she sank to earth, and with one sob she died.

The horror and tumult in the market-place are dramatically displayed,—

Some felt her lips and little wrist, if life might there be found;
And some tore up their garments fast, and strove to stanch the wound.
In vain they ran, and felt and stanched; for never truer blow
That good right arm had dealt in fight against a Volscian foe.
When Appius Claudius saw that deed, he shuddered and sank down,
And hid his face some little space with the corner of his gown,
Till, with white lips and blood-shot eyes, Virginius tottered nigh,
And stood before the judgment-seat, and held the knife on high.
"O! dwellers in the nether gloom, avengers of the slain,
By this dear blood I cry to you, do right between us twain;
And even as Appius Claudius hath dealt by me and mine,
Deal you by Appius Claudius and all the Claudian line!"
So spake the slayer of his child, and turned and went his way;
But first he cast one haggard glance to where the body lay,
And writhed, and groaned a fearful groan, and then, with steadfast feet,
Strode right across the market-place unto the Sacred Street.

The popular émeute, and the resistance of the lictors and the followers, "the clients" of Claudius, are portrayed with equal spirit; and the ballad closes in this good and homely Chevy-Chase fashion,—

And when his stout retainers had brought him to his door,
His face and neck were all one cake of filth and clotted gore.
As Appius Claudius was that day, so may his grandson be.
God send Rome one such other sight, and send me there to see!

Many of Mr. Macaulay's readers, and most of his more learned critics, will probably single out the Battle of the Lake Regillus as the finest of these Lays. The main distinction which he makes between this poem and Horatius is, that the latter is meant to be purely Roman, while the Battle of Regillus, though national in its general spirit, has "a slight tincture of Greek learning, and of Greek superstition." As the Battle of Regillus is, in all respects, a Homeric battle, so does the poem in which it is chronicled, or dramatically described, aspire to be a Homeric ballad, and therefore, "upon principle," incidents and images are freely borrowed from the battle-pieces of Homer. It certainly has fire and action enough. The Lay is supposed to be chanted at the celebration of a solemn annual banquet given, about two centuries after the battle was gained, in honour of Castor and Pollux, the potent auxiliaries of Rome. As we have already given specimens of the descriptive style of the Lays, we may now plunge, for a stanza or two, into the tug of war, the combat hand to hand ——the very heart and current of the heady fight.

Now on each side the leaders
Gave signal for the charge;
And on each side the footmen
Strode on with lance and targe;
And on each side the horsemen
Struck their spurs deep in gore,
And front to front the armies
Met with a mighty roar:
And under that great battle
The earth with blood was red;
And, like the Pomptine fog at morn,
The dust hung overhead;
And louder still and louder,
Rose from the darkened field
The braying of the war-horns,
The clang of sword and shield—
The rush of squadrons sweeping
Like whirlwinds o'er the plain,
The shouting of the slayers,
And screeching of the slain.

False Sextus rode out foremost:
His look was high and bold;
His corslet was a bison's hide,
Plated with steel and gold.
As glares the famished eagle
From the Digentian rock,
On a choice lamb that bounds alone
Before Bandusia's flock,
Herminius glared on Sextus,
And came with eagle speed;
Herminius on black Auster—
Brave champion on brave steed;
In his right hand the broadsword
That kept the Bridge so well,
And on his helm the crown he won
When proud Fidenæ fell.
Woe to the maid whose lover
Shall cross his path to-day!
False Sextus saw, and trembled,
And turned, and fled away.
* * * * *

Then far to North Æbutius,
The Master of the Knights,
Gave Tubero of Norba
To feed the Porcian kites.
Next under those red horse-hoofs
Flaccus of Setia lay;
Better had he been pruning
Among his elms that day.
Mamilius saw the slaughter,
And tossed his golden crest,

And towards the Master of the Knights,
Through the thick battle pressed.
Æbutius smote Mamilius
So fiercely on the shield,
That the great lord of Tusculum
Well nigh rolled on the field.
Mamilius smote Æbutius,
With a good aim and true,
Just where the neck and shoulder join,
And pierced him through and through;
And brave Æbutius Elva
Fell swooning to the ground:
But a thick wall of bucklers
Encompassed him around.
His clients from the battle
Bare him some little space;
And filled a helm from the dark lake,
And bathed his brow and face;
And when at last he opened
His swimming eyes to light,
Men say, the earliest word he spake
Was, "Friends, how goes the fight?"
But meanwhile in the centre
Great deeds of arms were wrought;
There Aulus the Dictator,
And there Valerius fought.
Aulus, with his good broadsword,
A bloody passage cleared
To where, amidst the thickest foes,
He saw the long white beard.
Flat lighted that good broadsword
Upon proud Tarquin's head.
He dropped the lance: he dropped the reins:
He fell as fall the dead.
Down Aulus springs to slay him,
With eyes like coals of fire;
But faster Titus hath sprung down,
And hath bestrode his sire.
Latian captains, Roman knights,
Fast down to earth they spring;
And hand to hand they fight on foot
Around the ancient King.
First Titus gave tall Caeso
A death wound in the face;
Tall Caeso was the bravest man
Of the brave Fabian race:
Aulus slew Rex of Gabii,
The priest of Juno's shrine:
Valerius smote down Julius,
Of Rome's great Julian line;
Julius, who left his mansion
High on the Velian hill,
And through all turns of weal and woe
Followed proud Tarquin still.
Now right across proud Tarquin
A corpse was Julius laid:
And Titus groaned with rage and grief,
And at Valerius made.
Valerius struck at Titus,
And lopped off half his crest;
But Titus stabbed Valerius
A span deep in the breast.
Like a mast snapped by the tempest,
Valerius reeled and fell.
Ah! woe is me for the good house
That loves the People well!

The struggle is now to recover the bodies of the fallen warriors; Aulus animating the Romans to recover the body of their champion Valerius—bidding the patriot warriors remember that—

"For your wives and babies
In the front rank he fell:
Now play the men for the good house
That loves the People well!"
Then tenfold round the body
The roar of battle rose,
Like the roar of a burning forest,
When a strong North wind blows.

Other desperate encounters of knights and leaders take place, but auxiliaries are seen approaching the Latian array. Herminius is slain, and fortune is turning against the Romans; when, at the critical moment, while the Dictator is preparing for a last desperate effort, Castor and Pollux, the Twin-gods, appear, and—

He was aware of a princely pair
That rode at his right hand.
So like they were, no mortal
Might one from other know:
White as snow their armour was:
Their steeds were white as snow.
Never on earthly anvil
Did such rare armour gleam;
And never did such gallant steeds
Drink of an earthly stream.

Every warrior is struck with awe when these unknown knights take the van of the Roman ranks. They confess that they are called by many names, and known in many lands; that their home is by the proud Eurotas, and that they have come to battle for the right on the side of Rome. The fight is now renewed with fresh vigour. Victory is with Rome, the citizens of which, with the High Pontiff, the Fathers, the higher dignitaries, and a great promiscuous crowd, are represented as waiting, with anxious hearts, for tidings of the battle. Eve was closing, when the same princely pair who, in the hour of need, stood by Aulus, were seen "pricking towards the town."

So like they were, man never Saw twins so like before;
Red with gore their armour was,
Their steeds were red with gore.
"Hail to the great Asylum!
Hail to the hill-tops seven!
Hail to the fire that burns for aye,
And the shield that fell from Heaven!
This day, by Lake Regillus,
Under the Porcian height,
All in the lands of Tusculum
Was fought a glorious fight.
To-morrow, your Dictator
Shall bring in triumph home
The spoils of thirty cities
To deck the shrines of Rome!"
Then burst from that great concourse
A shout that shook the towers,
And some ran north, and some ran south,
Crying, "The day is ours!"
But on rode these strange horsemen,
With slow and lordly pace;
And none who saw their bearing
Durst ask their name or race.
On rode they to the Forum,
While laurel-boughs and flowers,
From house-tops and from windows,
Fell on their crest in showers.
When they drew nigh to Vesta,
They vaulted down amain,
And washed their horses in the well
That springs by Vesta's fane.
And straight again they mounted,
And rode to Vesta's door;
Then, like a blast, away they passed,
And no man saw them more.

We must stop here.——The generous attempt of Mr. Macaulay will, we hope, give an impulse to our younger poets. When the capabilities of the popular Ballad, for great and regenerating moral and political, as well as poetical purposes, begin to be understood, a change for the better must be visible in the character of popular verse,

ANNUALS AND GIFT-BOOKS.

THESE flowers of the season are just beginning to peer forth. The most remarkable that we have yet seen is FISHER'S DRAWING-ROOM SCRAP-BOOK; which has again changed its Editress—Mrs. Ellis having taken the place of Mary Howitt, whose residence abroad, it is stated in the preface, precludes the publishers from availing themselves of her talents. The loss is theirs; and, in our opinion, a very decided one to the work. There is, as in former years, a copy of verses attached to each plate: though, no disparagement to Mrs. Ellis, a heavy monotony is felt even in their metres. A book of this sort demands lighter—more sparkling, or if the grave will it so, more frivolous talent; and, above all, greater diversity and brilliancy. The attractions of the DRAWING-ROOM SCRAP-BOOK must therefore, in the present season, rest mainly upon the engravings, and the handsome binding. There are, among the plates, some good Oriental groups, some fine architectural and scenic pictures of the East; and a few portraits of distinguished individuals. Among these are the late Duke and the Duchess of Orleans, the late Earl of Munster, Lord Lyndhurst, Wordsworth, and Mrs. Fry. As we cannot exactly please ourselves in an extract, and take for granted that ELIZABETH FRY must stand very high in the esteem and and regard of Mrs. Ellis, we shall copy out a few of the verses addressed to her; which must be written under the inspiration of love and admiration.

Friend of the friendless! when we think of thee,
Strange feelings rise of human vanity.
Strange—for thy smile of meekness well might chide
Our lowlier claims to glory, and to pride.
Yet 'tis a thought the heart will linger o'er,
To tread with thee our own beloved shore,
To call thy peaceful sect—thy nation—ours,
To share with thee life's sunshine, and its showers.

Friend of the friendless! ever be thy brow
In its mild majesty, serene as now;
Thy voice untiring, with melodious thrill,
To bid all grovelling thoughts of self be still;
Wakening sublimest hopes of bliss divine,
With noble aims and purposes like thine;
Sending the spirit, on the wings of faith,
Through darkest scenes of infamy and death.
Yet soft and gentle as an angel's wings,
The soothing calm of thy sweet visitings.
Not to the court of kings, though such might well
Befit thy noble bearing there to dwell;
Not to the couch of rest, though soft and kind
The tender yearnings of thy woman's mind;
Not to the walks of intellectual pride,
Though knowledge there its humbled head might hide;—
But to the prison-hold, the dreary cell,
Thy footsteps turn, where guilt and misery dwell;
To the lone wretch on restless pillow toss'd,
The early doomed, the desolate, the lost.

* * * * * * *

Then pass thou on, along life's troubled ways,
Unharmed, unsullied, with thy Maker's praise
In strains of music ever on thy tongue.
Happiest of womankind! to whom belong
Ascription meet of gratitude and love,
That one among our sisterhood should prove
Before admiring nations, far and near,
How many Christian charity may cheer!
How much, with humble faith and purpose true,
The loveliest daughters of our land may do!

The verses addressed to Wordsworth may also be presumed to be written with effort and care. They are these;—

TO THE POET WORDSWORTH.

Oh hang not on the silent bough
Thy lyre of sweetness yet;
Sing once again an evening song
Before thy sun shall set.

Sing once again—the listening hills
Wait for thy melody;
And mournful Echo asks once more
Her favourite strain from thee.

Strike once again with charmed touch
Thy harp, whose magic tone
Could wake from Feeling's deepest fount
A music all thine own.

Shines not the sun on Rydall Mount
As brightly as of yore?
Flows not the stream with silvery swell
Upon as green a shore?

Roll not the clouds of purple morn
As softly o'er the scene?
Rise not the mountain-peaks as high
Those misty waves between?

Sing not the birds their summer song
As blithely from the brake?
Glides not the bark at eventide
As smoothly o'er the lake?

Wave not the woods as glad and green?
Blooms not the rose as fair?
Glows not the golden West as bright
When sunset gilds the air?

Yes, Nature woos thee to her bowers;
While, all unchanged to thee,
She spreads again her choicest flowers,
And asks thy melody.

She asks of thee, her "great high-priest,"
To whom her rites belong,
To wake once more, throughout her realm,
The omnipotence of song.

Then hang not on the silent bough
Thy lyre of sweetness yet;
Sing once again—an evening song
Before thy sun shall set.

It was not to be expected that the Drawing-room Scrap-book, under the auspices of "The gay and gifted thing" sleeping at Cape-Coast Castle, and of Mrs. Ellis, was to be, in any respect, the same work,—and we are probably not yet reconciled to the inevitable change.

FISHER'S JUVENILE SCRAP-BOOK is also edited by Mrs. Ellis; and here we like her much better. She is not tasked to the tread-mill; bound down to grind forth verses on every subject that offers. Most of the little stories, illustrative of the plates, are written in prose; and they all inculcate a pure moral, and breathe those sentiments of tenderness and affection which, while they refine the youthful imagination, ameliorate the heart. The plates, also, are of a much better kind than those which usually appear in juvenile books; and the whole forms as pretty a work of the kind as one could wish to endow a young friend withal.

FRIENDSHIP'S OFFERING AND WINTER'S WREATH.—We cannot tell how many of these Offerings have now been presented to the public; but certainly not fewer them fifteen or more. Yet the volume for 1845 shows no symptom whatever of falling off, either in strength or grace. The contributors are even more numerous than usual; and there are many attractive names among them. The Editor, Mr. Leitch Ritchie, has, as becomes him, written one of the longest and best Tales or Sketches; but there are many good stories besides his of the quaint title. Among them we would point out the Adventures of a Cashmere; Norah; and Passages—melancholy ones—in the Life of a Governess. The plates are, in general, very good; and the frontispiece, the domestic life of Queen Victoria—or of young Mr. and Mrs. Albert, and their "sweet babies" will, we are certain, be quite a pet thing. This neat and nice volume labours under no disadvantage that we can guess, save two very great ones; it is too cheap, and its names are not graced with titles.

We give one brief specimen of the FRIENDSHIP'S OFFERING, the only contribution of the Editor in this style.

THE BEETLE-WORSHIPPER.

"How cam'st thou on that gentle hand, where love should kisses bring
For Beauty's tribute? answer me, thou foul and frightful thing!
Why dwell upon thy hideous form those reverent eyes, that seem Themselves the worshipped stars that light some youthful poet's dream?"

"Why bends the thick and golden grain, that ripes at my command:
From the cracked earth I creep to bless with food the fainting land;
And thus no foulness in my form the grateful people see,
But as sweet and bright as this are priestesses to me.

Throned in the slime of ancient Nile I bid the earth to bear,
And blades and blossoms at my voice, and corn and fruits appear.
And thus upon my loathly form are showers of beauty shed,
And peace and plenty join to fling a halo round my head."

"Dark teacher! tell me yet again, what hidden lore doth lie Beneath the exoteric type of thy philosophy?"
"The Useful is the Beautiful; the good, and kind, and true,
To feature and to form impart their own celestial hue."

The FEMALE MR NOY, the mother of the goodly family of the Annuals, which has now, if we remember aright, nearly attained the years of majority, exhibits no symptom of falling off. The contributors have changed again and again during its existence, but its character retains the original impression. The Tales are numerous, and of fair average Annual merit; the Poems are few and good. Among the plates are several female portraits of probably real persons with ideal names, and all of them striking. In the list of contributors we find James Montgomery, Charles Swain, Mrs. Sigourney, Mrs. Abdy, Miss M. A. Browne, the author of The Lion; and various other popular names.

Among the Gift-books of the Season, we may point out Fisher's HISTORIC ILLUSTRATIONS OF THE BIBLE, PRINCIPALLY AFTER THE OLD PAINTERS, OR THE GREAT MODERNS. Thirty plates are taken from the master-pieces of Guido, Raffaelle, Rubens, Poussin, Vandyke, Guercino, &c., &c.; and accounts of the original paintings are given in English, French, and German. The work forms an elegant, and, from its contents, a standard table-book.

ITALY ILLUSTRATED.—This is another of the numerous handsomely embellished books which the Messrs. Fisher put forth for the delectation of all Europe and America. The plates are from views on the Rhine, and in Italy and Greece; the drawings by Bartlett, Leitch, and Wolfenberg, and sundry amateurs. The letter-press descriptions, historical, traditional, and legendary, are written by the Rev. G. N. Wright, an experienced littérateur, familiar, from his previous labours, with such subjects. The book has a more abiding value than any Annual, as annuals are now to be obtained; and, from its rich binding and other appointments, it is equally ornamental as a drawing-room table-book.

Lectures on Female Prostitution: its Nature, Extent, Effects, Guilt, Causes, and Remedy. By Ralph Wardlaw, D.D. One volume, cloth. Glasgow: James Maclehose.

This delicate and difficult subject was almost forced upon Dr. Wardlaw, by a great number of respectable laymen, and thirty-eight ministers of all denominations; who, in a memorial addressed to him, state, that they view with alarm and regret the constant increase of gross immorality in their own city and neighbourhood. An application, made on such solemn grounds, Dr. Wardlaw could not resist; and the Lectures which he delivered are here published. He has accomplished his difficult task with equal judgment and tact; without veiling the deep horrors of the widely ramified evils he laments, or falling into an error—not always avoided by those treating this subject—of ministering to a prurient curiosity, by too great minuteness of detail. On the statistics of Female Prostitution there has, it strikes us, always been error and gross exaggeration, which is the more to be regretted, as the truth is lamentable enough without magnifying the number of victims. Dr. Wardlaw appears sensible of this tendency, and his statistical statements are founded on information as accurate as is likely to be obtained on so dark and complicated a subject. Excellent as these Lectures are, they do not offer many passages for popular extract. They are for the silent, thoughtful, and conscientious reflection of women as well as of men. We may, however, cite a passage or two to show in what style the awful question is treated. Dr. Wardlaw, after quoting, from a medical writer on the same subject, a shocking description of the filth, drunkenness, nakedness, and utter and shameless misery, in which, upon a December Saturday night, he had found the wretched inmates of an over-crowded low brothel, in which there was neither a particle of food nor an article of furniture, continues thus—

And now, some of you may naturally ask me—is this fair? Why dwell on scenes of such low and disgusting loathsomeness? Is this a just average specimen of the whole system? Is there nothing superior?—nothing more refined?—nothing less revolting? And if there be, why take an ad-captandum advantage, by giving such prominence to the very lowest and worst grade of the evil? My answer to such questions forms my promised reason for having introduced at all these disgusting details. The answer and the reason are one. It is—the affecting and fearful consideration,—that to this lowest grade, in all its horrors, the entire system tends. Yes:—I repeat it, and press it on your serious attention,—the tendency is all downwards. The case is, in this respect, unique. Even in thievery there may be an advance. The boy, of the lowest grade, who, by his inferior practice, comes to be a dexterous pickpocket, or a clever abstracter of the contents of a till, may in time rise to the envied, though unenviable, celebrity of a Barrington. He who first pilfers a penny from a shop, if he gets forward in the arts of villany, may find his way to the thousands of a bank.—But in the present case, rising is a thing unknown. It cannot be. It is all descent. The young woman, who begins her shameless career in a low brothel, and amongst the refuse of the other sex, does not rise from the lower to the higher, and push her way upward, till she become the mistress of a peer. Mark me:—let me not be misunderstood: let me not be supposed to say this, as if I conceived the guilt would, in that case, be the less. Far be the thought! It would be the very same in the rising as it is in the sinking scale. I am speaking at present, not of the morality, but of the misery of the case. And again I say—the tendency is all downward. Gentlemen in high life may think lightly of their gallantries. They do things genteelly. They seduce in style; and they keep in style. They conceive themselves to lay under a kind of obligation the females whom they honour with their preference. And, alas! the poor females, in the vanity of their hearts, often think so too. But the honour is infamy; the flattery is ruin. Not only is the sin the same in the highest as in the lowest,—but soon the poor victim, who has yielded to the temptation, comes to know what I mean by the tendency downward. Whether seduced in private, or beguiled into one of the superior receptacles of infamy, it is seldom long ere satiety and the passion for change throw her off. She is turned mercilessly adrift. Her seducer has gained his end, and thinks no more of her.

We have a friend, not Ebenezer Elliott of Sheffield, who, without scruple, imputes the frightful extent of Female Prostitution, and its attendant evils, to the Corn Laws—to the restrictions on Trade; which, by lessening employment and crippling industry, prevent early marriages. In treating of the causes which contribute to the prevalence of Prostitution, Dr. Wardlaw comes forward as the eloquent advocate of early marriages, in the apparent belief that false ideas of prudence, or rather vanity and paltry ambition, may often urge the "preventive check" beyond the bounds of that virtue which is the highest prudence.

Early marriages, wherever they can be contracted with any ordinary regard to prudence, are among its best preventives;—and whatever contributes to hinder the formation of these, may be regarded as standing chargeable with their share of it,—as ranking among the causes of prostitution. I deny not that prudence is a virtue, and that the question of marriage is a proper sphere for its exercise. But there cannot be a doubt, that the high notions which, by the refinement and extravagance of our times, have been introduced, of the style in which young men entering on life must set up their domestic establishment, have, in many instances, laid restraints on the early cultivation of virtuous love, and prevented the happy union of hearts in youthful wedlock. I cannot look upon this as at all an improvement on the homely habits of our fathers. Many are the young men who are thus tempted to remain single by their felt inability to start in what is regarded a somewhat creditable style. Would to God I had the ear of all the youth in our city, and in our country, that I might tell them of the sweets of early virtuous union; that I might earnestly and affectionately urge them to consult their own best interests, and to set an example pregnant with the most beneficial results to the community, by bidding defiance to the tyranny of fashion; by returning to the good old way; by finding a partner who will marry from love, and who will be willing, and more than willing, to begin upon little, and by the blessing of Providence to rise gradually to more. That was the way in the olden time;—and, although no croaker for the superiority of all that pertained to ancestry, this, most assuredly, is a point in which I should "say of the former days they were better than these." I would say to the rising youth—the hopes of coming generations—"Moderate your views: defy custom; marry; fear God; be virtuous; and be happy." Could my voice and my counsel prevail, what a salutary check would be given to the prevalence of the vice which is our present subject! Virtuous love operates with a most beneficial influence on the vicious principles of our fallen nature;—nor are there many sights on earth more delightful for the eye to rest on, than that of youth joined with youth in honourable and hallowed union,—union of heart as well as hand,—and living together in all the faithfulness and tenderness of a first love. Even should their outset in conjugal life be somewhat stinted, how much better a little mutual self-denial, than that cold, calculating celibacy, which is ever looking forward to some distant, stylish, starting-point,—and which, in the meanwhile, is so frequent an occasion of young men's "falling into temptation and a snare," and into "foolish and hurtful lusts, which drown them in destruction and perdition!"

Another prominent cause of the prevalence of prostitution, is to be found, in the low and light conceptions, existing throughout society generally, of the evil of the sin itself;—and in the ignorant and inconsiderate estimates of the train of miseries which, in this world and the next, attend and follow it. Whatever tends to maintain upon the public mind light impressions of the turpitude of the vice, and of the fearfulness of its effects, contributes proportionally, of course, to its extension and perpetuation.

But we stop here, earnestly recommending the Lectures to the public attention; but especially to that of christian women; to matrons, and single women of mature age. It is most painful to learn how very little, comparatively, has yet been done by all the Magdalen Institutions in the kingdoms to mitigate the frightful consequences of prostitution.

Von Rolleck's General History of the World; from the earliest Times to 1831. Translated from the German, and continued to 1840. 4 vols. 8vo, cloth. Longmans & Co.

It is only in Germany, learned, patient, plodding Germany, that in this age of the world a work like this by Dr. Charles Von Rolleck could be produced. It is, in our opinion, a gift to the whole world; furnishing a compendious and yet complete view of all that the human family, in its numerous divisions, has done or suffered. Immense labour and industry must have been employed in gathering the materials for so vast an undertaking; but the ability which has enabled the author to reject, to generalize, to condense such materials when collected, is a much rarer quality, and one which stamps a corresponding value upon his work. In addition to this, the whole is moulded by the large and liberal views and philosophic spirit of the author. We may briefly illustrate our opinion by stating, that he sees a true hero in Washington, and in Buonaparte an ambitious and reckless adventurer; possessed of splendid talents, devoted to purposes which, if not wholly selfish—an impossibility—yet all centred in self. But Von Rolleck is as strictly just to the Legitimatists, to the "Holy Alliance;" as to Louis Philippe, or to Buonaparte.

By a clear arrangement, the History of the Modern World moves on beneath the eye of the reader, as it were simultaneously, or like a piece of well-constructed mechanism. This is felt to be of especial value in the momentous period extending from the French Revolution until the present hour. The work appears to be translated with the verbal accuracy which yet does not always give, or properly sustain, the ideas of the author. Scholars will most admire the Ancient History; politicians, moralists, and philanthropists the Modern History.

The attempt to convey an adequate notion of so comprehensive a work by a few detached passages would be idle; but as a faint indication of its free spirit we shall copy out a paragraph from the Introduction, when, after viewing the causes and progress of the Reformation, the author comes to the grand "World-History of the present time,"—to the French Revolution. This stupendous movement he divides into four sections—I. The period of the French Monarchy; II. That of the Republic; III. The period of the Empire; and, IV. The times that have succeeded Napoleon. Of these, and of all they comprehend, he remarks:—

One character—the struggle of philosophical law against historical institutions—of the eternal idea against accidental relations, dictated by arbitrary authority and perversity, or of the force of public opinion against public power—reigns through the whole period; and gives it before all anterior periods a quite peculiar and imposing aspect; but the success, the extent, the chances of this struggle change multifariously; and an immensity of consequences result from every great blow. In general it is no more the resolves of cabinets, diplomatic intrigues, and the regular tactics of mercenary troops that direct the stream of events, and the destiny of nations; the life of these nations is itself awakened, and enters amidst violent opposition, yet formidably, into the history of the world;—they begin to be the terror of ministers and of the privileged, to be accounted something. The authorities deign to observe public opinion; and where they are indisposed to fall in with it, wage more violent war against it than before against the most formidable and odious enemy. War is no longer carried on merely for the acquisition or preservation of a province, or the maintenance of the worn-out system of the European balance of power. Continuance or destruction, the form of states and independence, triumph or suppression of political doctrines, liberty or slavery of large parts of the world, the highest destinations of mankind—these are now the springs of action. New tactics, new systems of administration, arise; all the relations of civil life are essentially changed. The conquests of science are immense in depth and extent; participation in them is diffused through all changes of society. The rays of enlightenment penetrate into the hitherto darkest recesses; self-judgment takes a bold stand against authority. But the aberrations of this yet unpurified self-judgment, and more still, the excesses of passion, and the numberless crimes of selfishness committed under the profaned banner of liberty give authority, and the classes reposing in its shade have specious reasons there; welcome pretexts for combating and persecuting the at all events inconvenient light. But the reaction produced new excesses and new crimes on the opposite side too; tyranny arises from the bosom of the revolution itself, and destroys its noblest traits; the counter-revolution undertakes the part of liberation. But the war of principles speedily returns; natural and historical law, allied against the tyrants of the world, renew their fatal contest. Who shall adjust it? Truth cannot yield; selfishness submits to no sacrifice; passion gives everything a false appearance. Spirits are more and more estranged; the course of truth and justice, as clear as it is traced by unbiassed reason, is abandoned; more and more the demands of liberality and legitimacy appear absolutely incompatible; it is resolved "the peace of the world cannot be bought too dear"—to attempt desperately to suppress all ideas that were the principle of the revolution; to make a disconsolate retrogression towards a time long since buried. Then the Genius of Liberty soars over the Sea of the New World in order to return one day, shedding its blessings upon Europe, or to cast looks of compassion and contempt upon this degenerate part of the world.

As affording a complete bird's-eye, or panoramic, view of the History of the World, this work, which supplies the place of hundreds of volumes, will be found invaluable to the student of General and of Elementary History; but its especial merit is, that its reflections are in general precious commentaries upon its facts.

The Parent's Hand-Book, or Guide to the Choice of Professions, Employments, and Situations. By J. C. Hudson, Esq., Author of "Plain Directions for Making Wills," &c. 18mo, cloth. Pp. 245. Longman & Co.

To how many fond and anxious parents do the subjects which are discussed in this informing and judicious book form the daily theme of inquiry and fire-side talk; of hopes and fears; of earnest and deep consultation! The difficulty among the middle classes, of finding profitable, or even promising employment for sons, is yearly increasing, and is generally complained of. With daughters, the difficulty, if as great, is sooner surmounted, as the utmost that can be done with them is known at once. If they have no fortune, and do not marry, there remains but the two usual resources, of either becoming governesses or burthens on their friends. But, with boys something must be done, or at all events tried; and it is the question,—How for the best! This Treatise gives much useful information, and clears away some difficulties, by, among other things, destroying many fallacious notions and hopes. It is, for instance, a general opinion, that if a man be so lucky as to get a son into one of the government offices, the youth's fortune is made, if he is only attentive and tolerably well-behaved. What is the fact! We cannot travel through the Army, the Navy, and Ordnance Offices, but, take the best among them, the Treasury.

There are (besides several special appointments) four classes of clerks, whose salaries are as follow:—Juniors, about twelve in number, commencing at £90, increasing after a certain period up to £200 per annum.

Assistants, between twelve and fifteen, commencing at £300, and increasing gradually but slowly to about £500 per annum.

Seniors, not more than six, commencing at £600, and increasing gradually to £800.

Five chief clerks at £1000, per annum each.

That no one may be misled by these figures, the highest of which have a tempting appearance, it is strongly recommended to every person who seriously entertains the idea of soliciting an appointment in either of the above-mentioned offices, to take pen in hand, and supposing certain probable ages for the persons at present filling the several clerkships, to calculate how long a newly-appointed clerk will be in arriving at a salary of £200 a-year, how much more time it will take to get £300, and what is the probability, regard being paid to his health, and the chances of survivorship, that he will ever succeed at all to either of the higher grades. It is certain that there are officers among the assistants in the Treasury, who have served 25 years, and are not yet half way through that class; although they are men of acknowledged ability, and have never been passed over. And in the Colonial office, there are clerks of more than fifteen years' standing, who have never been put aside when promotions took place, but who, nevertheless, have not yet arrived at a salary of £200 per annum.

Of Custom-house appointments it is said,—

A salary of £80 or £90 per annum, for a young man of sixteen or eighteen years of age at his very outset in life, and for which no capital is necessary to be laid out or sunk in previous education, (as in the legal and medical professions,) is a temptation to which many a parent yields, who thinks, nevertheless, that he is consulting the welfare and happiness of his son. But if the future could at all times be placed before his view as vivid in colour and as distinct in outline as the present: if he could be brought to contemplate the situation of his son at the age of twenty-eight, with a salary of only £150; at the age of thirty-three, with no more than £200, and with prospects, in all probability, bounded by £300, he would pause to consider whether some immediate sacrifice on his own part would not be well made to put his son into a line of life where industry and talent may eventually lead to higher rewards.

The Parent's Hand-Book accurately and minutely describes the amount of emoluments, and the rational expectations of a young man entering upon the different employments specified, and the method of proceeding in soliciting or obtaining for him an appointment in the Church, the Army, the Navy, the Merchant-service, the East India Company's service, and Bank of England, and all Banking-houses, Insurance-offices, &c., &c. It explains the nature and usages of all the different professions, and the expense of properly training young men to exercise them. Nor are the Arts, and the genteeler trades neglected. In short, we consider Mr. Hudson a valuable chamber-counsellor to parents and guardians, who are turning the destinies of their young friends anxiously in their minds. As a curious specimen of the work, we shall introduce to our readers an order of men in the metropolis, who are, probably, less known to most of them than the Newspaper Reporters, or short-hand writers, who are described here. These are called Hackney writers, though hackney clerks might be as accurate a designation, and their employers are not the publishers.

HACKNEY WRITERS.

These useful persons are ever waiting for any rush of business which may happen in the offices of law stationers. They may be compared to the sailors, who during calm weather are to be seen loitering about the beach at Deal, Ramsgate, and such places, with their hands in their pockets, and telescopes under their arms, hoping for a squall or a fog, or some mischance or other to bring a vessel into trouble and put their services in requisition. In something like the same manner, the hackney writers wait at the public-houses in and about Chancery Lane until a law stationer is taken aback to get some copying done which defies all the strength of his regular establishment. Then the hackney writers are called in, and the work is done be it what it may. No mass of parchment and paper was ever yet seen which the law stationer, by means of the hackney writers, did not get copied by the appointed time, however small, and in whatever portion of the twenty-four hours that time might happen to be.

After many commands and countermands, consultations, disputations, obliterations, alterations, and emendations, the draft is at length finished, after midnight, perhaps, of the day preceding that on which the fair copy is required to be ready for perusal. The worn-out draftsman, grateful that his task is accomplished, retires to rest, and the huge bundle of scarcely legible manuscript is sent to the law stationer. The gloom of his office is in a moment dissipated by a score of candles, the hackney writers are summoned; the work is portioned out; the well-trained fingers, like "machiners," gallop the distance allotted to them with certainty and precision; the task is done as if by magic, and the hackney writers return to their hiding-places and relapse into their former state of inaction. But this employment is a sort of pis aller for a young man.

The encouragement to parents held out in the Hand-Book is, upon the whole, not great; yet the world is not really standing still, though it seems at present in a state of temporary stagnation; and though the supply of skill and talent of all kinds seems far to exceed the demand, hope is held out.

"At present," we are told, "the most certain road to fortune is the discovery or creation of a new want in mankind, and of the means to gratify it.

To what insignificant trifles do some men owe their success! Since the invention of soda water and ginger beer, people have found out that they cannot live without these things, although sixty years ago they had never been heard of. The manufacture of blacking for polishing shoes is comparatively recent, and has raised many men to affluence. In every branch of trade and manufacture the introduction of a new article appears to be the most effective plan for getting money. Tea was unknown in England in the beginning of the reign of Elizabeth; at the present day so vast is the consumption of this article, that the duty upon it amounts to three millions per annum.

How the great problem of finding employment for the million is to be solved it is not proposed here to discuss; but so long as it remains unsolved, so long as the race of competition must be run for a subsistence, the best advice which a young man in trade can follow is to endeavour to strike into a new path; and if by such means the area for the exertion of human industry can be widely extended, the successful inventor will derive the three-fold gratification of enriching himself, conferring a benefit on those who adopt his invention, and providing a means of subsistence for a certain number of his fellow-creatures.

So concludes Mr. Hudson; but, alas! the paths are ill to find, and the inventors many.

Polynesia: or an Historical Account of the Principal Islands in the South Sea, including New Zealand; the Introduction of Christianity, &c., &c. By the Right Rev. Michael Russell, LL.D. & D.C.L. Cloth. Pp. 440; with map and frontispiece. Oliver & Boyd.

This well-filled volume forms the thirty-third of the series of the EDINBURGH CABINET LIBRARY; nor has any more interesting portion of that sterling work yet appeared, whether we regard the subject or the execution. The field was vast, but by care and skill in condensation Dr. Russell has managed to give a comprehensive, as well as luminous view of all its more interesting features. We own we opened the volume with some apprehension as to how a High Churchman and a Right Reverend was to describe the doings of the rough breakers-up of the fallow ground in the South Seas; but we are more than pleased to find that Dr. Russell has not in anything undervalued the labours of the missionaries, by whomsoever sent forth—at least not in the past time. Whether "the missionary is in due time to be followed by the churchman,"—whether the churchman is to systematize the materials, the elements the dissenting pioneers have collected; and whether those whom Dr. Russell understands by "the lively stones of an apostolical priesthood, qualified to offer the oblation of a spiritual sacrifice," shall be the only spiritual teachers and guides of Polynesia, remains to be seen; and is not, at this stage, worth cavilling about.

Of the work we may add, that by the narratives of voyagers from the earliest times of discovery in the South Seas until the present day, and the voluminous and interesting missionary records of the last forty years, the richest materials are supplied; and that on these are made to bear the various knowledge of a highly-cultivated and well-stored mind, whether for illustration or apt reflection.

Newfoundland in 1842. By Sir Richard Henry Bonnycastle, Knight, Colonel in the Royal Engineers, &c. 2 vols. cloth; with map, and illustrative wood engravings.

This is a minute and elaborate history and description of an important portion of the British colonies in North America. The first volume relates to the discovery and settlement of Newfoundland, and to its natural history; the second describes its natural productions and resources, and what the author terms its Moral History, Political Economy, and Statistics. The work will have an especial interest to those connected with Newfoundland; and some of its chapters, as those on the manners and customs of the people and on the aborigines, form pleasing and instructive reading. Some of the quaint old-fashioned Christmas and other holiday customs about St. John's, appear to have been preserved in their purity in exile, while at home they have been almost forgotten. The Mummers, the Morris-dance, and the revels of the Lord of Misrule, still flourish in this settlement; though, from the different character of the "Pilgrim Fathers," nothing of the kind is to be found in New England. Fishermen form an important class in Newfoundland, and in condition it is far from being a comfortable one. The following gives a pleasing picture of the more wealthy and comfortable of the fishermen and small farmers, though the avocations of fisherman and agriculturist are often found united:—

"They reside in comfortable dwellings, generally substantially built of Newfoundland wood," which is of such diminutive girth that the walls must necessarily be thin. "The house, in the country villages or stations, and in the farms, usually consists of one common room or kitchen; at the end of which is a capacious stone-chimney, with a deep recess, like those of the old farm-houses in Buckinghamshire, where benches and chairs are placed, and where the old people sit; or females knit stockings, woollen shirts, and mittens, or fingerless gloves, for the men. There, during the summer, you always see the good housewife busily employed in some culinary occupations; whilst the maidens are either assisting her, knitting or sewing, rocking the cradle, spinning, or minding the infants learning to walk in that most ancient and most abominable invention, which consists of two circles of wood, over the upper of which the poor child's arms lean, to the manifest danger of rendering it round-shouldered for life. The floor is boarded, and usually raised above the ground or cellar, which has stone walls; and there are plenty of windows, but I do not observe that these are often opened; partly because they are usually fixtures, and partly from the necessity of rendering them weather-tight in winter. Almost every house has a deep porch, to cover the door from the snow, rain and wind; but you very seldom see the door shut. The sleeping places are separated from the kitchen or common room by a bulk head, or wood partition; and the roof or garret is also thus employed. The great difference between a small farmer's kitchen, and at home, here consists in the absence of strings of onions, hams, and bacon, depending from the ceilings or joists. There you see sealing-guns, fishing apparatus, a fresh herring, or some other fish just caught, supplying their place. But still the good things of this world are not wanting. I never walked into one of these kind-hearted people's dwellings (and I often did so during my rambles last summer) without immediate and silent preparation for the stranger; for they do the same to all respectable persons, and in my instance frequently at first they did not know me. The goodwife puts some tea in the pot, spreads a clean cloth, if she has one at hand or time admits, boils some eggs, produces a pot of fresh butter and a large jug of milk, with a loaf of home-made bread, or if that is wanting, white biscuit; and without saying a word during the preparation, expects her visiter, whether he is hungry or not, to fall to; being perfectly satisfied if you drink three or four cups of tea—luckily the cups are not large—and eat a good deal of bread and butter, and two or three eggs, which she always takes care shall not hurt your digestion by their hardness. . . . . Fresh meat is seldom seen but on rare and festive occasions, when the fatted calf or the household lamb graces the board. They have usually, however, a store of flour, and of salt beef and pork, which, with their poultry, would afford at all times a good table, were it not that the latter are too profitably employed in producing eggs for the market, and the former too dear to eat much of."

The common necessaries of life, and clothing of all kinds, are dear in Newfoundland, though the absence of taxation makes wine, spirits, tea, and other luxuries, comparatively cheap; and also the untaxed manufactured commodities brought in abundance from England. Newfoundland, from its severe climate, and the poverty of the soil, holds out few attractions to the agricultural emigrant, although the author of this account of the island holds a different opinion, and is a strong advocate for colonising the unsettled parts of the coast, and making Newfoundland something more than a fishing-station—namely, a barrier of the British empire in North America.

Leaves from Eusebius, Bishop of Cesarea in Palestine, A. D. 330. By the Rev. Henry Street, M.A., late of Baliol College, Oxford. Post 8vo, cloth. Pp. 288. Edward Bull.

These Leaves consist of passages selected from the celebrated work of Eusebius entitled the Evangelical Preparation, and translated from the original Greek by the selector. The Evangelical Preparation is considered by the translator the most powerful in argument, and the most varied and copious in laborious erudition of any treatise of the fourth century,—which abounded in the writings of the Fathers. The treatise would be valuable to the scholar and theologian were it only as a compendium of the creeds and superstitions of the Greeks and Egyptians, as a record of ancient Paganism, by, we may almost say, a contemporary. By the way, this primitive bishop, whose authority on some points will not, we should imagine, be often quoted by the modern Oxford divines, holds the opinions of the Quakers on oaths, for which the Saviour, Eusebius avers, had substituted affirmation.

The exposition of the leading doctrines of Christianity with which this treatise sets out, would do honour to the most enlightened age.

"Under the dispensations of Christ," says Eusebius, "there is no longer any necessity for oaths in confirmation of truth, (far from any evasion of perjury being offered,) inasmuch as the Saviour hath taught us never to swear at all; and on no account to speak a falsehood, but to give utterance to truth, and to be content with the terms, yea and nay, as men who show that the purpose of the mind is more binding than any oath. We learn also from Christ, that in the common intercourse of life we should not speak unguardedly, but accurately, so that no untruth, no reviling, neither any base, nor unseemly words, should proceed from our lips; inasmuch as they are forbidden by Him in this declaration, 'For every idle word ye shall give an account in the day of judgment.' Facts like these, do they not give the promise of a life preëminently that of a wise man?——It must be added also, that countless multitudes of men, women, and children, slaves and free, learned and unlearned, Greeks and Barbarians—throughout every city, region, and country, and of all nations under the sun—seek to be taught in these doctrines, which persuade them not only to curb intemperate acts, but the evil thoughts of the mind. . . . . The same institute also teaches, that the whole race of mankind ought to receive a Godly and divine education, through which they may learn, with a noble and lofty mind, to endure the affronts of adversaries; and not to make a like return to evil men, but to master their anger and indignation, and every furious impulse; and lastly, to communicate their substance to the needy and distressed, and to have fellowship with men in general, as being of one family, and to esteem him who is reckoned a foreigner, as being by the law of nature very near of kin, and a brother. Can any one, with such a collection of facts before him, deny that the word of our faith hath bestowed upon mankind the most service, and the most extensive good, and that it hath conferred on human life the chiefest instrument of its welfare! What must be the character of that system which hath put into the minds of the whole race of mankind—not only of Greeks, but also of the most fierce barbarians, and of the most distant nations—not only to abstain from their irrational brutality of manners, but as men fond of wisdom, to embrace Gospel doctrines; such, for instance, as the immortality of the soul, and of that life in the presence of God, laid up in store for those who are dear to him, after their separation from the present state! Through this belief men have imbibed a contempt of this momentary life; yea and they have made it clear, that they who of old were so loudly extolled for their wisdom, were children; and that death, the subject of so much philosophical declamation, was but a child's game; for women, boys of a tender age, and foreigners and others of no great esteem, humanly speaking, have, by the communion and power of the Saviour, declared the veritableness of the doctrine of the immortality of the soul, by acts rather than by arguments. Hence also, mankind everywhere throughout the world have, through the instruction of the Saviour, been taught to hold solid and wholesome opinions concerning the providence of God, as superintending the universe; and as each individual soul learns the doctrine of the Divine justice, and of the judgment-seat of God, so doth it learn to live with discretion, and carefully to guard itself against the solicitation of moral evil. The beneficial tendency also of the doctrines of salvation, may be recognised as largely in action, if we turn our attention to the error of demon fear belonging to ancient idolatry, through which the whole race of mankind was tormented by the vexations of demons, even from very olden times. From this, as from a gloomy darkness, Christ hath translated Greeks and barbarians by his Divine power, into the light and intellectual day of the true and godly worship of the King of the universe."

This is a fitting preparation for an exposure of the manifold errors of paganism, and the "vain philosophy" of the Greeks, which, in his disputation with Porphyry, and defence of the Christian system from the attacks of that able adversary, Eusebius undertook. The translator is evidently a high Churchman; but he has the good taste, on this neutral ground, to avoid embarrassing topics; and his selection is a valuable contribution to sound popular literature.

Two Years in China; and Narrative of the Chinese Expedition. By D. M'Pherson, M.D. 1 vol. 8vo, cloth. Pp. 391. Saunders & Otley.

Dr. M'Pherson belongs to the part of the Madras Army, attached to the service of the Nizam. In 1840 he accompanied his regiment to China, where he remained during many of the late remarkable events. Of most of them he was, indeed, an eye-witness; and, on the voyage back from Hong-Kong to Madras, he employed an interval of professional leisure in writing this narrative of the Expedition. It may not add very much to the previous sum of public or political information; nor yet to our knowledge of the Chinese people; though a clear account is given of several of the negotiations and actions; and the personal adventures possess interest. The author appears to share in the hostile feelings and aggressive spirit too common among those officers who have been engaged in the untoward affairs he describes. One would like to hear what Chinese chroniclers and gazette writers have to say on the other side.

The scientific reader will here find a minute description of the small foot of a Chinawoman, which, by means of a bribe, Mr. M'Pherson was allowed to examine; and economists an account of that grand smuggling trade in opium, which, for the profit of a few magnificent English smugglers, named India or China merchants, occasioned the late unhappy disturbances. The Chinese appear to use opium in a less objectionable form than Europeans; but we must not say anything about it, lest our opium-eaters, Mr. De Quincey included, break their phials, and take at once to the smoking apparatus. Smoking the poison, or the bliss, seems not only the more elegant way of using the drug, but to be much less deleterious. Dr. M'Pherson tells us that an old prophecy, attributed to Confucius, is revived among the Chinese, that China is to be conquered by a woman—and, of course, by Queen Victoria. He concludes his observations by saying—

Though this war has dealt harshly with us, both in purse and person, yet must it be proceeded with until the proud Chinese nation be brought to succumb to us; and that can only be done under the walls of Pekin. Like all our eastern wars, this one has been too much a war of negotiation, until we found the enemy were laughing at us.

To quote the words of the great Duke—"A great nation can never engage in a little war." Happily, at present, John Bull feels, for the first time, that he cannot afford another great war, whether just or unjust; for as to the justice, if a "British object" were in view, he might not, we fear, be very scrupulous. We are somewhat amused by the following sly expression of a confident expectation of prize-money, the division of the ransom of Canton, which, it is alleged, ought to have been greater:—

The authorities, in fact, were driven to that state, that they would have agreed to any terms we chose to dictate, and have granted a much larger ransom had it been demanded. How unfortunate that Captain Elliott's temperament should be so conciliating! As it is, however, both the navy and army will be well rewarded for the toils and troubles they have endured. This ransom-money being quite unconnected with the original claims on the Chinese, it would be rather hard that those who succeeded in procuring it, should not benefit therefrom. Besides, we know of no case in the annals of history in which this practice was deviated from.

Now, this surely settles the point:—The following anecdote of two English cock-sparrows, will suggest reflections to some readers, which do not seem to have occurred to the narrator.

Encounters, some of an amusing nature, were of frequent occurrence about this time at Chusan. On one occasion, two middies—one fifteen, the other thirteen years old—went out on a foraging excursion for the benefit of their mess. They had taken the precaution to carry with them—a double-barrelled gun, loaded with ball. Proceeding inland, they soon met a Fakee in charge of a flock of goats. The younger of the boys now tried to strike a bargain; and, sporting his dollars rather too freely, advanced towards the latter, who, however, instead of receiving the dollars, caught the boy in his arms, and was running away with him. His progress, however, was soon stopped; the elder boy having, on seeing his companion seized, advanced, and, placing the muzzle of his piece to the Chinaman's ear, blew his brains out; whereupon some men who were looking on proceeded to seize the boys. The boys stood still till the foremost was within shot. The younger boy, now snatching the gun out of his companion's hand, said it was his turn now to have a shot. He fired, and lodged the contents of the second barrel in the man's chest. The remainder of the Chinamen, not liking the aspect of affairs, took to their heels.

Sir Henry Cavendish's Debates of the House of Commons during the Thirteenth Parliament of Great Britain, commonly called the Unreported Parliament. Drawn up, from the Original Manuscripts, by John Wright, Editor of the Parliamentary History of England, &c. Volume I. Royal octavo, cloth. Longman & Co.

At the commencement of this work, which is appearing in Parts, we gave an account of its character and objects. The Unreported Parliament—so named because reporters were jealously excluded from witnessing the proceedings—embraces an important period in English History,—from the years 1768 to 1774; when Burke was in his glory, and Fox made his first appearance in the House. This was also the era of the Letters of Junius; of the Wilkes affair; and the breaking out, and gathering of the elements of revolt in the American colonies. Save for the persevering industry of Sir Henry Cavendish, many of the best speeches of Burke, and others scarcely less worthy of preservation, would have been for ever lost to the English statesman and historian. The work, which is diligently and carefully illustrated from published books, and the unpublished letters, private journals, and memoirs of the leading public characters of that age, to which the editor has obtained access, is one which nothing else can ever supply; an important portion of authentic parliamentary history. The present volume gives the reports for two sessions. Another of the same size will, we presume, finish a book indispensable to an English library.

Statistical Chart of the British Empire. Engraved by S. Williams, under the superintendence of Mr. B. Wyon, her Majesty's Chief Engraver of Seals. London: George Beeson.

Upon a very large sheet of drawing-paper, in columns and sections, diversely coloured, are given at one view the statistics of the Empire, in all its colonies, a separate column being devoted to each of the following heads: —Extent, Population, Latitude, and Longitude, Face of Country, Climate, Productions and Exports, Trade, History, Government, Language, Religion, Cities and their Population, Finance. This sheet is surrounded by the devices and mottoes of the seals of the different colonies and settlements, which form a handsome border to the Chart. The utility of this Chart is obvious. It will be found of great convenience if hung up in newsrooms, coffee-houses, and all places of public resort, supplying, as it does in a moment, accurate statistical information on any of the above heads.

The Rioters: a Tale. By Harriet Martineau. Second Edition. Houlston and Stoneman.

The appearance of this little story is peculiarly opportune. It is well said that only experience teaches fools; and what might have been ineffectual as warning, may be found useful in directing the thoughts of those now suffering the severe penalty of their rashness, to a wiser line of conduct in future.

Life and Times of Louis Philippe, King of the French. By the Rev. G. N. Wright, M.A., Author of the Life and Campaigns of the Duke of Wellington, &c. &c. 8vo. Pp. 624. With a portrait of the King, and numerous other portraits and illustrations. Fisher & Sons.

There is much to interest in the strange vicissitudes and contrasts presented by the life of the French King; and in his early romantic adventures and trials. Louis Philippe, as he advances in life, does not appear to sink in the affection of the world, in which he never stood very high; yet in sober truth, the Rev. Mr. Wright's Life of this sage prince does too strongly entitle that gentleman to a gold snuff-box, or portrait of the King set in brilliants, or whatever may be the latest fashion of rewarding adulation, to be agreeable to our tastes. One might fancy that the composition of some hireling eulogist had here been freely rendered from the French. Even Egalité finds favour, because he is the father of Louis Philippe. To make amends for fulsome courtliness to Louis Philippe and his family, the elder Bourbons are not spared.

Narrative of a Residence in various parts of New Zealand; together with a Description of the present state of the Company's Settlements. By Charles Heaphy, Draftsman to the New Zealand Company. Smith & Elder.

This history of New Zealand has at least the merit of brevity. The author disclaims every interested motive, but admires the Company's system very much, and very naturally. He speaks highly of the Chatham Islands as a field of emigration.

A Narrative of Voyages and Commercial Enterprises. By Richard J. Cleveland. Moxon.

This is an American production. An old navigator, a native and inhabitant of Boston, who has suffered not a few of the hardships, vicissitudes, and reverses attendant upon the profession, has here related his adventures from his first going to sea. From Robinson Crusoe and Dampier, downwards, all works of this kind are interesting, and this is not an exception. It, moreover, affords insight into the shrewd, calculating, go-a-head character of American traders, and, indeed, of all voyaging speculators. The voyages, continued through a long series of years, were to all parts of the world, and show more of the interior life of a trading mariner than any book we remember.

The Life and Poetical Remains of Margaret M. Davidson. Edited by Washington Irving. 12mo, cloth. Pp. 350. Tilt & Bogue.

Margaret was the younger sister of Lucretia Davidson, a young and beautiful girl of New England, who, after a remarkable display of precocious poetical talent, died of consumption at the early age of seventeen. Margaret, not less gifted, followed her sister to the grave at a still earlier age, the victim of the same fatal malady. Lucretia's works were introduced to the world by President Morse, who, shortly after her death, wrote an interesting biography of her brief life, which, with her poems, was reviewed by Southey in the Quarterly Review. Mr. Washington Irving has here performed the same affectionate office for Margaret which Morse did for Lucretia; though the Memoir is not the less interesting from the bereaved mother of these gifted young creatures having supplied nearly all the materials. The Life will be read with deep sympathy by the young and gentle-hearted; and the Remains, which are wonderful productions for so young a girl, will be admired by many, and be criticised with kindness and indulgence by all. Many of the poems would not, indeed, discredit the most celebrated of the numerous versifiers of Margaret Davidson's native land.

The Royal Visit. By Andrew Park, Author of Blindness, a Poem, &c., &c. Glasgow: Smith & Sons.

A Glasgow Bard has got the start in the several poetical and embellished works meant to form a record and memorial of the visit of Queen Victoria to Scotland. The volume—a very neat one, well-printed, and bound in splendid ruby-coloured Paisley silk—is illustrated with landscapes of the most noted scenes honoured by her Majesty's presence; Taymouth Castle, Dalkeith Palace, Stirling Castle, and has, for a frontispiece, medallion portraits of the royal pair. Not its least agreeable feature is a long list of respectable subscribers; a tail which renders it superfluous to say much about the body to which it belongs.

How did England become an Oligarchy? By Jonathan Duncan, Esq., Author of "The Dukes of Normandy," "History of Guernsey," &c.

We heartily recommend this small elementary treatise to all who desire to be well-grounded in the science of government; and wish to know what is meant by the Constitution of England. It is yet more deserving of recommendation from the manner in which it traces the gradual, but steady encroachments made upon all classes by the Oligarchy; until Standing Armies, a numerous Police, Septennial Parliaments, Paper-money, and an enormous National Debt, have brought us to the condition thus described by Mr. Duncan:—

Since 1660, in its consequences the most important epoch in English history, the government has tended more and more to an oligarchic form and character, the crown having been as completely deprived of its prerogative as the people have been spoliated of their rights; all that remains to the sovereign is the power of signing official documents; all that remains to the people is the barren privilege of petitioning a legislature predetermined to turn a deaf ear to their grievances. The landed interest, to secure high rents; the colonial interest, to retain a monopoly of the home market; the monied interest, to guarantee the dividends due on the public debt; and the ecclesiastical interest, to perpetuate tithes; these have formed a compact alliance, supported by a standing army and a salaried police. Thus, the many are governed for the sake of the few. The classes who supply money to the national exchequer have no voice either in its assessment or distribution. How long will this system last? Till the capital and industry of the country can no longer pay the interest of the national debt. Is nothing to be expected from the justice of the legislature? Let those who put the question read the answer in the past.

And we would add, agitate, agitate, agitate, for complete suffrage.

Whistle-Binkie.

A fourth Part or series has been added to this Collection, which now forms a good thick "bunch of ballands." Contributions from the best of the living Scottish song-writers, Ballantine, Miller, Vedder, Rodgers, Gilfillan, Maclaggan, Thom, &c., &c., still enrich this ample body of modern fire-side and convivial minstrelsy. The fresh additions show no falling off whatever; so that we may anticipate many more series. Our brief specimen shall be this very sweet little Grandame's song by Ballantine; who is eminently felicitous in combining cheerful natural humour with simple tenderness.

Creep awa', my bairnie, creep afore ye gang,
Cock ye baith your lugs to your auld grannie's sang;
Gin ye gang as far, ye'll think the road lang;
Creep awa', my bairnie,—creep afore ye gang.

Creep awa', my bairnie, you're ower young to learn
To tot up and down yet, my bonnie wee bairn;
Better creepin' cannie than fa'in' wi' a bang,
Duntin' a' your wee broo;—creep afore ye gang.

Ye will creep and hotch, and ye'll nod to your mither,
Watchin' ilka step o' your wee dousy brither;
Rest ye on the floor, till your wee limbs grow strang;
Ye will be a braw chield yet—creep afore ye gang.

The wee birdie fa's when it tries ower soon to flee,
Folks are sure to tumble when they climb ower hie,
They wha canna walk right are sure to come wrang;
Creep awa', my bairnie—creep afore ye gang.

Stray Leaves from the Portfolio of Alisander the Seer, Andrew Whaup, and Humphrey Hankshi. Edited by Alex. Rodgers. Glasgow: Rattray.

The Glaswegians are a spirited race. Some of them—for their name is Legion—who admire the compositions of their townsman Rodgers, have formed themselves into a committee, and collected and published these Stray Leaves as a means of preserving the careless Poet's scattered treasures. They have printed a large edition, and obtained a numerous subscription; but we hope, and indeed are pretty confident, that one object of the publication being the benefit of Mr. Rodgers, much more may be done. He is in his own walk perfectly original, and of sterling merit. A brief memoir of the Poet prefixed to the volume, shows that he is also what every poet ought to be—a man of liberal opinions, which, at the time of the Political persecution of 1819, brought him into considerable trouble. During a period of solitary confinement in the Glasgow Bridewell, into which he was thrown upon suspicion, and released without any charge being made against him, he solaced himself with singing "wi' a' his birr" from morning to night; and he seems to sing songs as well as he composes them. Rodgers was bred a handloom weaver, and at one time gave instructions in singing. He has been in several casual employments, but has latterly been connected with the liberal newspaper press; and is become a favourite with all classes of politicians, though many of his best poetical pieces are pungent if homely satires on Tories and Tory measures. His Songs of the Kirk and ditties on the late Sunday Railway-travelling affray are even more severe. A considerable part of the Stray Leaves consists of prose Sketches, which are generally inferior to the poetical pieces, though they also possess considerable humour. We need not remind our Scotch readers that Rodgers is the author of the very popular songs "Behave yoursel' before folk," and "St. Mungo."

Brewster's Seven Chartist Military Discourses. Part I. Price 3½d.—The bold free spirit of John Knox is not yet wholly extinguished in the Church of Scotland; though that Church has, in the case of Mr. Brewster, become the most active agent in suppressing it. Mr. Patrick Brewster, Minister of the Abbey Church of Paisley, from his locality and warm sympathy with the distress of his parishioners and neighbours—which extreme distress he in a great degree imputes to bad government and the denial of political power to the Christian people—has been induced to preach a series of discourses of a political character, which the Commission of the General Assembly has ordered the Presbytery of Paisley to libel. The order of that anomalous body has been obeyed. Mr. Brewster is libelled and dragged to the bar of the Church Courts, to answer for this offence. The result we do not pretend to foretell; but judging by recent instances, there is little chance that mercy will be strained in his case. Mr. Brewster not only claims the right, but declares it the first duty of a faithful minister, to preach as he has done; instructing the people in their political rights and duties, and denouncing the oppression and corruption of rulers, and their unjust and unequal legislation. In the Introductory Sermon to the series of impugned Discourses, it is pertinently asked—

If a teacher of Christianity may discourse, as often and as personally as it likes him, on the duty of obedience to rulers, without incurring the charge of preaching politics,—why is it, that another must be subjected to that charge, when he ventures to touch upon the reciprocal duty of rulers to their subjects? If one may be permitted to descant, at his will, upon the heinous crime of resistance to constituted authority,—why may not another have equal license, to condemn and expose an invasion—no less criminal—of the nation's rights. And if one may, without offence, tell you of the iniquity of breaking a law of the land, and, by such means depriving the government of part of its exactions, often cruel enough,—why may not another have also leave to discourse to you, on the still greater iniquity of a law of the land violating a law of God,—by decreeing "unrighteous decrees," by "turning aside the needy from judgment," and by "taking away the right from the poor of God's people?"

How far it might be expedient, in ordinary times, for the teachers of Theology to assume to become regular instructors in politics, is not the question before us; but whether Mr. Brewster had a right, under the circumstances, to preach these Discourses, or the General Assembly either to seek to gag him or to punish him for discharging what he considered his imperative duty. When the Seven Discourses, which are coming out in cheap Numbers, are fairly before the public, we will be in better condition to judge between the courts of the Kirk of John Knox and one of its ministers, who has ventured to act, whether right or wrong, upon the principles, and to follow the practice, of its great founder and champion. These Discourses are well worthy of the attention of our southern neighbours, both for their intrinsic merits and the question raised upon them. The ministers of other denominations—Baptists, Independents, Unitarians, Scottish Seceders—take an active part in political affairs and discussions unquestioned; and why is not the same freedom allowed to a minister of the Church of Scotland? Upon a former occasion, Mr. Brewster was persecuted by the Kirk Courts for saying grace at a public dinner given to O'Connell.

SERIAL WORKS.

THE BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY OF THE SOCIETY FOR THE DIFFUSION OF USEFUL KNOWLEDGE. Vol. I., Part II.—This completes the first volume. But each Part is a respectably-sized volume, bound in cloth, though capable of being compressed into one when re-bound. The lives extend from that of Agathocles to Alexander. Among the more interesting modern Memoirs are those of the Aikens, Alembert, and Aikenside.

KNIGHT'S PICTORIAL SHAKSPERE.—William Shakespere, a Biography, No. 4.

CUMMING'S FOX'S BOOK OF MARTYRS. Part XVII. With a view of Berne.

WHIST; ITS HISTORY AND PRACTICE. By an Amateur. Illustrated by Kenny Meadows; the designs engraved by Orrin Smith, and W. Linton. London: Bell & Wood.—For anything we can tell, or guess, this system of Whist may be from the pen of Hood, or the Editor of the Comic Almanac. It overflows with jest, humour, and pun; and is rich in felicitous literary allusions, proving the author to be a man as well-read in other books as in the "deil's beuks." The illustrations, also, are generally clever, and remarkably well engraved. A history of the Game, and of works on Whist, precedes the instructions, which are not the less clear and precise for being quaintly expressed, and scoffing occasionally at the whist-playing "wisdom of our ancestors."

SCHOOL BOOKS.

SELECTORUM LATINE: FOR THE USE OF SCOTTISH SCHOOLS. New edition, revised. Edinburgh: A. Macredie.—This is a small, sturdy, cheap, leathern-bound tome, adapted to the daily tear and wear of school-boys. So far, the externals are faultless; but the kernel is deserving of the careful shell. The little book is a manual for beginners. It comprises a variety of lessons and exercises; commencing with merely the verb and its nominative, it proceeds to very short sentences and phrases, and gradually ascends until entire paragraphs are given, selected from the best classic authors, with a secondary view to the instruction and moral and religious improvement of the pupil. The book we consider particularly well adapted to country schools, to female seminaries in which a little Latin is taught, and to the use of those who study without the aid of a master; as the graduated lessons and tolerably full vocabulary form of themselves, a complete compendium.

I. A GUIDE TO GERMAN SPELLING AND PRONUNCIATION. By Ludwig Schwabe, Professor of the German language.

II. A CONCISE GRAMMAR OF THE GERMAN LANGUAGE.

III. A PROGRESSIVE GERMAN READER. Longmans & Co.

STEILL'S PICTORIAL SPELLING-BOOK; OR A SERIES OF EASY AND PROGRESSIVE LESSONS ON FACTS AND OBJECTS. London: Virtue.—We see nothing remarkable about this Lesson-book, save that many of the lessons are illustrated by a wood-cut of the thing or object described being prefixed to the reading; as the lesson about the great house-dog Trim, by a Dog; that about the Duck and the Goat, and so forth, with portraits of these animals. This plan is likely to catch the attention of children. The Parts of Speech are also illustrated, or made visible or tangible in the same manner, by figures. The evil of all these helps is, that the thing learned—the symbol, has to be, in due time, unlearned, and this becomes a troublesome process with dull children.

LECTURES GRAMMATICALES, ET HISTORIQUE OU EXERCISES SUR LA LANGUE FRANCAISE.—A new French Grammar, illustrated by Examples, referring to the History of Great Britain and Ireland, &c. &c. By A. F. Guillerez. Translated by E. C. Anderson. Edinburgh: Rickard. London: Simpkin & Marshall.

PAMPHLETS AND TRACTS.

THE LADIES' HAND-BOOK OF FANCY NEEDLE-WORK AND EMBROIDERY. London: Clarke & Company.—A neat very small tome, containing "plain and ample directions," according to its own story, "whereby ladies may become perfect mistresses" of the above "delightful arts."

THE LADIES' HAND-BOOK OF KNITTING, NETTING, AND CROCHET.—This is by the same author, and a ditto ditto to the above. We do not pretend to understand either of them; but that is not wonderful.

THE HAND-BOOK OF THE ELEMENTS OF PAINTING IN OIL. Pp. 53. London: Clarke & Wilson.

CLAXTON AND MORTON'S COMPANION TO A HYDROSTATIC AND HYDRAULIC APPARATUS. Pp. 45.

LETTERS ON THE SLAVE TRADE, SLAVERY, AND EMANCIPATION; WITH A REPLY TO OBJECTIONS MADE TO THE LIBERATION OF THE SLAVES IN THE SPANISH COLONIES, &c. &c. 12mo, cloth. Pp. 176. By G. W. Alexander. London: Gilpin.—This little work is in the form of Letters, purporting to be written while the author was in Spain and Portugal. The letters are addressed to FRIENDS (Quakers, we presume) on the Continent of Europe. They give a succinct history of the Anti-Slavery cause in England from its commencement; of the trade itself; and the present condition of the negroes in the emancipated colonies. The Letters are of comparatively small value at home, where the subject is so familiar; but they may do good abroad.

LETTS'S DIARY FOR 1843.—A volume ready-prepared for daily entries, on every-day in the year, and containing many useful tables, and a great deal of miscellaneous information.

THE VOICE OF AN OCTOGENARIAN, DENOUNCING WICKEDNESS IN HIGH PLACES. By Samuel Roberts, the Paupers' Advocate. In a Letter to Sir Robert Peel.—The Octogenarian is a violent enemy of the New Poor-Law, and a warm friend of the poor;—of those who have so few friends, that one must not look too nicely into the colouring of those few, where their drawing is so right. No one pretends to say that the New Poor-Law was not a faulty, and, in many respects, a very harsh and unequal measure. It was not for itself, but for its anticipated results, that it found many of its friends and advocates. The best that can now be said is, that time has not yet been afforded for these beneficial results to develop themselves; and that the doubts of them which have been entertained by many, (among others ourselves,) are not lessening as time passes and experience increases.

THE THIRD ANNUAL REPORT OF THE BRITISH AND FOREIGN ANTI-SLAVERY SOCIETY.

WAGHORN & Co.'s OVERLAND GUIDE TO INDIA, BY FOUR ROUTES.—Persons going to India, overland, will find the information, hints, and directions in this pamphlet of the greatest utility.

OLIVER & BOYD'S THREEPENNY ALMANAC FOR 1843.—This is one of the wonders of this age of improvement; a great mass of useful information is given of the kind found in Almanacs, at the low price which makes it as accessible as it must be found useful to even the poorest individual.

LETTERS ON INFANT SCHOOLS, ADDRESSED TO A YOUNG TEACHER. By a Lady. London: Burns.—The Letters contain sound and judicious advice.

FOURRIER AND HIS SYSTEM. By Madame Gatti de Gamond. Translated from the French, by C. T. Woon, jun., Esq.—Fourrier, a prophet long without honour in his own country, has found an able and zealous disciple and exponent of his doctrines in Madame Gatti de Gamond. We do not pretend thoroughly to understand the doctrines; which, however, seem a vast improvement on those of St. Simon and Mr. Owen, though partaking somewhat of the character of both systems; but the sect is at present making some noise in the United States, and also in this country; and the curious and speculative could not find an easier method of studying the system of Fourrier, than in this tract.

QUACKS AND QUACKERY UNMASKED. By J. E. Feldman, M.D.

THE METEOROLOGICAL EPHEMERIS FOR 1843.

GAS-METERS; THEIR UNFAIRNESS DEMONSTRATED, &c. &c. By Henry Flower. London: G. Mann.—According to Mr. Flower, extensive frauds are committed by the servants of all gas companies upon the unfortunate consumers, who, all the while, are never the wiser, trusting implicitly to their meters, which register a great deal more gas as consumed than ever passes through them. He indeed states that consumers pay for from ten to twenty, and sometimes even thirty, per cent. more gas than they burn. The matter deserves to be looked into. If the gas companies assume the sole regulation of the meters, these instruments ought surely to be made and managed in as perfect a manner as is possible. The pamphlet strenuously recommends Mr. Lowe's method of naphthalizing and purifying coal gas.

CATECHISM OF GEOLOGY. By James Nicol, Author of a "Catechism of the Natural History of Man," &c. &c. —This is one of Oliver and Boyd's excellent cheap series of Elementary Scientific works. It gives a clear outline of Geology; and has even the illustrations cut in wood, necessary to an accurate knowledge of the first principles of the science.
