JANUARY, 1842.

LINES ON THE BIRTH OF THE HEIR-APPARENT.

BY MRS. GORE.

By other lips be lofty Pæans sung,
By other knees lowly allegiance paid;
A word of warning trembles on my tongue,
That may not be unsaid!

Yet welcome, welcome, Babe! as though a star
Beacon'd thy cradle, as in Bethlehem,
To tell the nations One was born afar,
A sacrifice for them!

For, arduous is thy mission, royal boy!
Not unto thee sufficeth, by thy smile
To tinge with rainbow-hues the tears of joy
A mother's pangs beguile!—

Thou cam'st not here to sport with childish glee;
With thy first breath the task of care began:
Purple and pall oppress thine infancy,
For thou art born a MAN!

Thornless, as fortune favours theirs or them,
May prove the wreath of roses that adorns
All other brows;—the regal diadem
Must be a crown of thorns!

Nor sparkling dews, nor glowing noontide flame
Must mar the calmness of thy youth sedate;
Shunning temptation, lest in Frailty's shame
The throne participate!

No wild exploit, no pleasant midnight chimes,
Must the severer cares of State relieve;
The faults of subjects darken into crimes,
Worn on a prince's sleeve.

Stern, as the statue on its pedestal,—
Pure, as the silvery clouds of moonlit skies,
Should be the Royal One, whose actions all
Survey with jealous eyes.

By the defilements of their temples moved,
The Heathen, school'd by Nature's mystic spell,
Struck down the altars of the gods he lov'd,
And mock'd their oracles.

And thou! O happier Alfred, from whose lands
Are swept the beast of prey, and man of blood;
Know that a nation great and free, demands
A monarch great and good!

He, in whose breast abides the subjects' breath,
Spotless as truth, should keep the heart within:
And thrice accursed the king who dooms to death,
Yet dares to live in sin!—

Therefore, oh! therefore, those who love thee best,
E'en while they swell the triumph of this hour,
Fair human child!—rejoice with trembling, lest
Thy task exceed thy power.

Yet with that fear, what glorious hopes unite!—
Lov'd of a nation's heart!—what prayers ascend
For thee to Heaven's eternal throne of light,
As for a future friend!—

Vast as thy cares, thy virtues' scope is wrought!—
One noble impulse of thy heart may bless
The fate of millions,—one bright moment's thought
Secure an age's happiness!—

England hath put away her childish things;
And thine may be the name predestinate
To shine, as wisest of the mightier kings
Who glorify her state.

For this we pray!—with great ones hand in hand,—
But with the poor and humble, heart in heart,—
Oh! may'st thou live and prosper,—and the land
Bear in thy grace a part!—

So, though the nation's triumph in thy birth
Be but a tribute to old England's throne,
When we resign thee to thy parent earth,
Its tears shall be thine own!

TORY REMEDIES FOR NATIONAL DISTRESS—EMIGRATION.

During the sitting of Parliament, the Tory leaders affected not to believe that any great distress existed in the country; and certain partial returns of the receipts and payments of Savings Banks were confidently appealed to, in order to establish the prosperity of the working-classes.* Since Parliament rose, however, the destitution has become too widely spread, and too severe, to be longer denied; and the fact, that the last crop has turned out greatly deficient, conjoined with the renewed activity of the Corn-law repealers, has alarmed the Ministry. There seems no reason to doubt, that any attempt even to modify, in however inconsiderable a degree, the laws against the importation of food, must lead to the destruction of the present administration; and to avoid, or at least delay, this catastrophe, the scheme of an extensive system of emigration has been taken into the serious consideration of Government. Whether such a scheme is likely to relieve the existing distress, is the first matter we propose to consider.

It is too obvious for argument, that unless emigration be carried to such an extent as to exceed the daily increase of population, it can have no effect in alleviating the existing distress; emigration of an equal or smaller amount can merely tend to prevent the distress from becoming more severe. Now, the population of the United Kingdom, as shown by the last census, increases at the rate of about 300,000 a-year; and unless more than this number of persons be annually sent out of the country, emigration will have no effect in diminishing distress. It appears from parliamentary returns, that, of late years, the emigrants to all our colonies and the United States, very seldom exceed 100,000 a-year, and have often been under 20,000. The average may be taken at 50,000; and it is important, in passing, to remark, that from one-half to one-third of the emigrants go directly to the United States, while it is not improbable that of the emigrants to British America—forming one-half of the total number—a very great proportion ultimately settle in the United States. To produce any perceptible effect, therefore, the emigrants must be increased by sixfold in number, in comparison with those who hitherto have voluntarily left this country; and it will be observed, that every encouragement has been given to emigration, not only by Government, but by several of our colonies applying a great proportion of the price received for land sold, to take out emigrants free of expense. Considering the natural propensity of men to remain where they have been born, the love of country, and the peril and uncertainty of a settlement on a distant and unknown shore, it is exceedingly improbable that 300,000 persons could be prevailed on annually to leave this kingdom, for any inducement it is possible to hold out. We have no doubt that many who look to emigration as a remedy for distress, will be surprised to hear it maintained, that emigration must be yearly repeated; but there is sufficient reason to establish, that any drain made in this way, is speedily replenished. By the returns made to Dr. Webster, in the year 1755, the Isle of Skye contained 11,252 inhabitants: by those to Sir John Sinclair, between 1791 and 1794, 14,470. From 1770 to 1791, 4000 persons emigrated, and during the same period at least 8000 left the island for the low country, yet the population in 1794 was larger than in 1755: and although great numbers have continued to emigrate to America, though the kelp manufactory has been annihilated, no new branch of industry been created, and the island is ill adapted for agriculture, the population had increased, in 1821, to 20,627, and in 1831, to 22,796. Many similar instances could be mentioned: but it is unnecessary; as it is a fact well established, and of which abundant evidence may be found in writers on Population, that marriages and births are in proportion to the deaths, or other causes of removal. Thus the necessity of an annual or periodical emigration, when once this remedy is resorted to as a cure for over-population, is apparent.

With regard to the expense which is necessary for transporting great bodies of men, little experience has yet been had. On two or three occasions, however, Government has advanced money for the transportation of emigrants. In 1819, £50,000 were advanced to assist 5000 persons to proceed to the Cape of Good Hope. Whether the aid given was insufficient, or whether it arose from other causes, this experiment in colonization proved anything but successful. In 1823 and 1825, two bodies of emigrants were located on lands in Canada, at the public expense. The emigrants of 1825, consisted of 2024 persons; and, independently of the value of the lands given them, the expense of settling cost £43,145; rather more than £20 for each person. In 1823, 568 Irish emigrants were settled at the rate of £22 for each person. We are well aware that estimates of the expense of transporting and locating settlers, have been made at a much lower rate: but we prefer the results of actual experience to hypothetical estimates. Assuming, then, that £20 ahead, is the expense of removing an emigrant to, and settling him in Canada—we ask how six millions are annually to be raised, merely for the purpose of keeping our population at its present number, and preventing the increasing severity of distress arising from the daily augmentation of numbers. This has always been felt by the advocates of emigration, as the great difficulty: for it has been clearly seen, that the attempt to raise an additional tax for a purpose which has never been popular—the transporting of our fellow-subjects to wild and distant lands—would effectually put an end to the scheme. The only proposition, therefore, that is at all practicable or worthy of consideration, is that of which Mr. E. G. Wakefield is the author, and which has been in operation in some of our Australian colonies for a few years. But as this new plan of colonization has been carried into effect in the most complete manner, in New Zealand, we shall explain it by showing how it operates there.

It may be premised, that formerly our Government gave grants of waste lands in our colonies gratis; as much as five hundred thousand acres being sometimes granted to a single individual. This was not only a fertile source of jobbing, but, as the favoured holders of these extensive grants were never able to cultivate any considerable portion of their grant, the result was, that the grants, if not sold, remained an uncultivated desert, which separated the cultivated districts of the country from each other, and kept the population in an isolated and barbarous state. A new plan was, therefore, suggested to the Government, viz., the selling of all lands at a low rate, but at the same time at such a price as would check individuals from acquiring right to great tracts of country. In furtherance of this new system, the present New Zealand Land Company was formed in 1839. They purchased a tract of land from the natives, and besides the purchase-money paid, one-tenth of the whole land sold is reserved for the use of the natives—which tenth must necessarily yearly become more valuable. The first colony consisted of 1100 town acres, and 110,000 country acres at Port Nicholson. These were sold at 20s. an acre, and realized, after deducting the native reserves, about £100,000. Of this sum, three-fourths were set apart to form an emigration fund, to be employed in conveying emigrants to the colony; thereby increasing the value of the lands already sold. The purchasers of land were entitled to claim the three fourths of their purchase-money, either in the shape of free passages for themselves and families, or for their servants and labourers; and where the claim was not made, the money was expended by the Company in conveying labourers to the country. Another settlement called Nelson, is now in course of formation, from which it is anticipated that £300,000 will be realized by the price of allotments: but only one half of this sum is to be appropriated for conveying labourers to the country. We confess, we see no objection to this system; but however beneficial it may be to the colonies which adopt it, it is easy to show that it must prove totally inoperative in removing the distress or diminishing, in any available degree, the population of the United Kingdom. From July 1839 to July 1841 —two years, the total number of emigrants conveyed by the Company's ships, has been 3469. Of these, a considerable proportion, no doubt, paid their own expenses; but as we have no means of ascertaining the proportion, we shall assume that they were all carried out at the Company's expense. Now, the Company had, previously to the sailing of the first vessel, realized £100,000 by the sale of the allotments at Port Nicholson,—£75,000 of which were set aside for conveying labour to the colony, so that each emigrant appears to have cost £21 for mere conveyance; and while the population of the United Kingdom increased 600,000, the Company removed only 3469. But to show that Mr. Wakefield's plan would give little relief to this country, even if carried to the greatest extent, we have only to advert to the circumstance, that to carry it through effectively, only a particular class must be selected—that is, the flower of our population; for the emigration fund must be expended in carrying out equal proportions of both sexes, between certain ages, say 18 and 35. Mr. Wakefield remarks:—"There are great objections to any but young people; I will not say the narrow class to which I have adverted. Children suffer immensely in being removed: they suffer on board ship, they suffer from confinement; and when they arrive in the Colony, they are either neglected, or are a great encumbrance. Old people suffer much more from being removed from the scenes to which they are attached, and they are also less able to bear the fatigues which necessarily attend upon a long voyage." However beneficial, therefore, Mr. Wakefield's system may be to the colonies which adopt it, we cannot help thinking it cannot be advantageous to the mother-country to remove the people in the prime of life, and to leave the old men and women to be supported, and the children to be brought up, at the expense of the mother-country, till they are fit to be removed to the colonies. Such a system of emigration, instead of relieving the distress and lessening poor rates, would increase both; because, for every able-bodied man removed, probably two old or feeble persons would be left to be supported. This, indeed, is the evil of all emigration; it takes away the active, strong, and enterprising, and leaves the lazy, weak, and indolent. Another evil of Mr. Wakefield's scheme is, that it tends to draw capital from Britain to be invested in the colonies, whereby the fund necessary for the employment of labour at home is diminished. Only a small portion of the price of lands to be sold can be expected to be raised in the colonies themselves; the great bulk of it must, as hitherto, be drawn from the mother-country. It is obvious that, if capital be sent abroad in as great a proportion as population, no benefit will be derived at home, from emigration, at least for many years to come. The chief cause of the welfare, and of the advance of the prosperity of any country, is the increase of capital at a greater rate than population. We really believe, therefore, that, in as far as relief from the present distress is to be regarded as the chief object for encouraging emigration, it would be much better to raise the whole money by a tax, and expend it either in employing the hands who are out of work in some useful labour at home, till the present crisis is over,—or, if that plan be objectionable, on account of the additional produce and competition it would necessarily create—to employ it directly in conveying away our population, than to draw it from our capitalists in the shape of price of lands at the other side of the globe, and then indirectly return only one half of it to be expended for the same purpose. It is unnecessary, however, to consider the subject further; for could the quantity of land sold annually, be increased one hundred fold, the price of it would not remove our yearly additional population.

But perhaps the greatest objection to emigration is, that it would not relieve the classes among whom the distress chiefly prevails. These are, the hand-loom weavers, the spinners, and others employed in the cotton, woollen, and silk trades, the workers of iron, printers, &c. While population in our pastoral and agricultural counties has hardly increased at all during the last thirty years, that of the manufacturing districts has doubled. We have also a much greater number of professional men of all sorts—clergymen, lawyers, and medical men, as well as clerks, governesses, and other educated persons, than can find adequate employment. For all these there is, in reality, no opening in the colonies. In the East and West Indies, in all the settlements in New Holland, and even in New Zealand, the warehouses are filled with British commodities and manufactures, to an amount utterly beyond the demand; they can, consequently, be bought at a less price than they cost in Britain. Nobody imagines that manufacturers of cloth, of any sort, could be employed at all in our colonies. They must, whatever their age, whatever their strength or state of health be, relinquish the pursuits of their whole lives—sacrifice all the knowledge and skill which they have acquired—sink into the lowest class of labourers—and be contented to be ranked in the same order as the New Zealanders, or the late slaves in the West Indies. A person accustomed solely to in-door labour, in such work as weaving and spinning, is indeed of less value in New Zealand than the natives themselves. To send such people to our colonies is merely to send them to starve abroad, instead of starving at home. The colonies do not want such labour. Were it, indeed, proposed to export them in tens of thousands,—and in smaller numbers emigration is useless for the purpose in view,—the colonies would resort to every expedient to prevent the emigrants settling among them. Notwithstanding the almost boundless extent of the United States, and the immense demand for labour, by the construction of their extended and numerous canals, railways, (of each of which they have made, within a few years, nearly 4000 miles,) and other public and private works, there is a constant complaint in the newspapers of the Eastern States, of the insupportable influx of Irish immigrants, who are almost daily thrown on their shores; although these are the very class most fitted for the works continually in progress, and without whose aid these works could either not be completed at all, or at an expense greatly larger than that which they have hitherto cost.

The only classes fitted for an extensive emigration are, farm-servants, shepherds, and mechanics of all sorts; though the number of the two former to the latter ought probably to be in the proportion of at least 100 to 1. In country parishes in Scotland, of 1000 or 1500 inhabitants, it is unusual to find more than two or three wrights, smiths, shoemakers, tailors, &c., employing two or three journeymen and apprentices each. What is the value of weavers, and other in-door operatives, when employed in country labour,—every one must have observed, who has seen them, in periods of distress, at such work. It is no exaggeration to say that one labourer will do five times the work of such men at out-door labour; and hence the classes who are most distressed are the very last our colonists would be inclined to assist to remove.

And although means could be found to transport our working population in tens of thousands, what is likely to be the result? From the great length and consequent expense of the voyage to Australia, British North America must be fixed on as their place of destination. We have seen that already half of our emigrants either sail directly for, or find their way indirectly into, the United States. Is it likely that industrious spinners of cotton and silk, and skilful mechanics, would contentedly clear the forests in the back settlements of Canada or Nova Scotia, among frost and snow, when by a few days' journey they would receive constant employment and higher wages than ever they got at home, in the United States? It is wonderful, indeed, to mark how rapidly the views of our rulers change upon such subjects as that of which we are treating. Half a century ago, the proposal to export any part of our people, and the bare notion that we could have too many people, would have been scouted from the throne to the cottage. In earlier times, no one was allowed to leave the kingdom without the king's license; for the king was held to have such a right to the services of his subjects for the defence of the realm, that he could not be deprived of it without his own consent. To this day, the king may prevent any one, by the writ ne exeat regno, from leaving the kingdom. So far, again, from compelling, or even permitting, artisans to settle abroad, they were expressly prohibited from emigrating,—and upon this law two convictions actually took place at the Old Bailey in 1809: the one of a master who had offered an artificer advantageous terms to emigrate to the United States, and the other of the artificer, who, having no work at home, had accepted of these terms. The judge, who tried the case, commended highly its policy, and dwelt at great length on the mischievous crime with which the prisoner stood charged, as deservedly severely punishable by law. All this was certainly absurd; for the industry of an artificer is his only inheritance, and to prevent him from disposing of it to the best advantage, is an unwarrantable act of power; but it is at least equally unwarrantable, by imposing restrictive laws on the importation of food for the supposed benefit of a particular class, to compel him to depart from his native land, and to spend his days in a foreign, and perhaps an unhealthy, climate, among people whose feelings, manners, and habits, are totally at variance with those to which he has been accustomed. And now we come to the point:—

The Emigration scheme has evidently been set on foot to meet the Corn-law agitation; for the numbers, intelligence, and independence of the working-classes have become troublesome, and indeed alarming, to the aristocracy. It is not for the distress so universally spread over the country that our rulers have any sympathy,—they care not for the starvation and misery of the thousands,—but they fear that they will not die quietly. They are not ignorant that all new settlers are exposed to great hardships and dangers. The first colonists in the United States almost all perished. Of 300 settlers taken out by Mr. Peel to Swan River, in 1836, a number perished, and all were dispersed in less than six months. After suffering the greatest distress, the survivors returned to Swan River, and would have put Mr. Peel to death, had he not run away and secreted himself till they were carried off to Van Dieman's Land. But what signifies thirty or forty thousand weavers dying at the Antipodes!

In the best and most favourable view, the whole question is, Whether the food shall be transported to the people, or the people to the food. Nothing is so expensive to remove as man; and therefore it is not only the most expedient, but the cheapest mode of alleviating the existing distress, to bring the food to the people. If money must be raised, let it be spent,—not in exporting our population as lumber, but in finding them work here: by this means, the mother country, instead of distant colonies, will be enriched. Their allegiance may be of very temporary duration, and we never will derive any repayment from advances to them in the way of revenue; for by a statute passed shortly after the American war of independence, all our colonies were freed from contributing to the revenue of the mother country. Of the value of colonies, in any shape, we doubt. Our trade with the United States of America is now ten times greater than before their independence. The more colonies we have, the greater the risk of quarrels and wars, the larger must be our navy, and the larger our army, to defend them; not one farthing of the expense of which, be it remembered, is ever defrayed by our colonies, but must be paid by the over-taxed population of Britain. If the landowners are apprehensive that the unemployed operatives will increase the poor-rates, let them reflect, that property has duties as well as rights, that it is merely the creation of positive law, and that the ground on which that law rests, is the promotion of the public good, and the increase of human happiness. Hence it may be modified or altogether changed by the same authority by which it was established, if the objects it has in view can be otherwise more completely attained.

We utterly deny that there is any surplus population in this kingdom. Even with the defective agriculture of nearly the whole of England and Ireland, and of a great part of Scotland, we, for several years recently, grew a sufficient quantity of food to support our entire population; very little foreign grain having been entered for home consumption for four or five years together. The prices of food were then low—approaching the continental rates. There was no want of work, and surplus population and emigration schemes were equally unheard-of. Our working-classes were then regarded as a blessing—not as a curse, as they now are. Between 1835 and 1838, all years of low prices, nearly 1000 new factories for the manufacture of cotton, wool, flax, and silk, were opened in Britain, and about 70,000 additional hands were engaged. What is to prevent such times returning, and full employment being afforded to every one who is disposed to work? Nothing but the factitious high price of food maintained for the benefit of the landowners.

But, admitting for a moment that the population of this country is excessive, the question arises, Who ought to be dismissed? The answer is obvious. Not surely the industrious and productive, but the idle and spendthrift class. God gave the land equally to the whole human race, and all have the same natural right to its possession. If there is to be a transportation of part of the population, let the fox-hunters and sportsmen go first, as they are a nuisance here, and will be useful for keeping down vermin in the colonies; then let the other useless part of the aristocracy follow, especially those who at present are not content to reside and spend their revenues within Britain, but who draw their rents from a highly-taxed and starving population, to spend them on the continent, and thus escape their fair contribution for the protection of the property they leave behind them. Finally, let not the people be deceived and be transported, "to please their lairds;" but, on the contrary, let them insist for Free Trade, beginning first with the repeal of the Corn Laws.

NO. I.—THE SONG OF JANUARY.

Coem hearkaune toe mee, loteby toe ye,

Johannes: Prior of Broomwicham.

He is gone—the Year!—I am free! am free!
To revel again in my majesty.
At the hour of his birth I hastened forth
From my crystal halls in the gelid north,
And the sun looked pale at each frozen gem
On my own imperial diadem:—
For he hath small power with me.—
And I pranked it rare, for I chilled the skies,
And the crowded hearths of the human styes,
And blistered with kibes both the Scholar and Sage,
And stopped the thin blood in the veins of Age.
And I pinched the Queen in her chair of state,
And perished a miser by empty grate,
So hungry for riches was he!

And I whipt through their rags to the couch of the poor,
While they dreamed they were spurned from their own wretched door.
And I silenced the voice of the choristers—all,
The ingle-side cricket, and the dog in the hall;
For none shall compete with the glee
Of the double-faced Wizard who deigns to appear,
And swaddle the limbs of the infant year.

He is gone—the Year! He is dead! is dead!
To the tomb of past ages gathered,—
I will pile him a cairn of drifted snow,
And chain up the water-fall's headlong flow,
While the North flings a thousand rockets up,
And the wassailers drain the deep cordial cup
And replenish it merrily,
Then revel again: I will bite the toes
Of the pulpited priest; and tweak his nose.
I will blister and gash his hearers' lips,
And bury sharp pangs in the labourer's hips.
The brooks I will charm, and harden the field,
Till the plough-share bright may not burrow concealed,
Though so valiant a knight is he.
I will burn your Yule logs, and with light arabesque
All your windows will furnish; and figures grotesque
I will hang from your eaves: and your boards shall be burdened
With all that is choicest, then I shall be guerdoned,
For, who half so jolly can be,
As the double-faced Wizard who deigns to appear,
And swaddle the limbs of the infant year!

NO. I.—THE INTENSE; OR, MURDEROUS SENTIMENTAL.*

LA BELLA BEATRICE: A TALE OF VENICE.

Italy, beautiful Italy, thou land of love
And love's impassioned trance;
Thy sunny skies so golden bright above
Thy dark-eyed daughters' glance:
Meet emblems are they of the fiery hate,
That with love's warmest passion still doth mate
In thee, thou glorious land,
Where jealousy can buy the dark assassin's brand!

CHAPTER I.

* * * * * *

It was within half an hour of midnight, and the Piazza di San Marco was nearly deserted by the gay throng of revellers who had but lately made its arches ring with the jocund strains of a hundred hurdygurdies. The moon, cloudless and unspotted as a maiden's virgin thoughts, was shining full into the square. Near the brazen statue of the Centaur Nessus, Chizellini's Capo d'Opere, two figures might have been seen, engaged in close conversation, and occasionally emerging from behind the shadow of the statue, as if to look for some one, whose approach they were expecting.

"Cente maledizioni!" exclaimed one of the figures, "Son' dannato, if I wait any longer. My Giulietta is dying for me, and I promised to be with her by twelve."

"Tace, Gasparo; you're always in some infernal amour or another. Surely you might attend to business, and leave the girls alone for one night? The signor is past his time, no doubt, but we'll charge it in the bill, you know," said the other figure, sharpening, as he spoke, the edge of his stiletto upon the pavement.

"Corpo di Caio Mario, charge it in the bill! And what answer will that be to my Giulietta? Do you know the risk I run? 'Cod, she would think as little of dropping me a settler of Aqua Tofana in my next cup, as she would of eating garlic in her soup! I'll cut a throat, Poniardo, upon any reasonable consideration, but, hang me, if I peril my soul for any man!"

"Ecco lo quà! Here comes the Signor di Aquavita at last," replied Poniardo, pointing to a figure shrouded in an ample cloak, that was now seen striding towards them across the Piazza.

"Buona notte, signor!" said Gasparo and Poniardo at once, as the figure came up to where they stood. "We wait the signor's orders."

"You know young Giovanni Beltesta?"

Gasparo and Poniardo assented.

"He crosses the Ponté dei Sospiri to-morrow night, at twelve. Your stilettoes have a sure aim, I have been told. You know my meaning. This purse contains a hundred scudi. Dispose of Beltesta, and you shall have another of twice the amount."

At this moment, the organ of the adjacent church of San Marco was heard, blending with the voices of the choristers, as they chanted the vesper hymn to the Virgin. Awed by the sacredness of the appeal, to which the moonlight and the silence gave redoubled power, the Signor di Aquavita, Gasparo, and Poniardo dropped on their knees, where they remained, in devout contemplation, till the service ended. They then rose, and left the place.

CHAPTER II.

It is a stately room in one of the noblest palaces of Venice. Rich damask from "far Cathay" adorns the walls; and here and there some noble work of the divine Tiziano, then in the zenith of his fame, shows that the proprietor of the palazzo is as liberally endowed with taste as with the wealth which it ennobles. A room it is, where elegance conspires with luxury to build a fairy home for beauty to surround with golden visions, and weave her rare enchantments in.

* For a specimen (and a famous one, we venture to think) of the modern classic school of romance, we refer to Endymion, page 50, of this Number.

And who is she, the fair Duessa of that princely chamber? 'Tis the rose of Venice,—the worshipped of her noble cavalieri,—the chanted of her immortal poets,—La Bella Beatrice. She was, indeed, a theme to give a painter's pencil inspiration,—there, as she lay reclined upon a couch, her matchless form robed in the costly silks of distant Franguistan, and her fair brow softened with an air of sadness, as she perused the sonetti of the divine Petrarca, which she held lightly in her delicate fingers. Is she reading, or are her thoughts wandering with him to whom she hath offered up the incense of her young and passionate heart? Who may tell?

She has dropped the book, and half raised herself upon the couch, to listen; for beneath the window, which is open, a voice is singing to the notes of the mandolin.

Soft moonlight is silently streaming
Over the murmuring sea,
Then wake, love, O wake, from thy dreaming,
To shine for an hour, love, on me,
On me, love, on me;
For love, without thee,
Thee, my belovèd, my own Beatrice,
Io no son', no son' felice!

"'Tis he—my Giovanni—my beautiful, my own Giovanni!" she exclaimed, as, starting from her couch, she rushed to the window, and, leaning over it, kissed her hand to a figure that stood in a gondola in the lagune which washed the walls of the palazzo. Giovanni continued his song:

Hushed are the wakeful in slumber,
And there are none, love, to see;
The stars shine in radiant number,
But they tell not of thee, love, and me:
Of thee, love, and me;
Then place me with thee—
Thee, my belovèd, my own Beatrice,
Ed io son, io son felice!

"My poet-lover,—my peerless Giovanni,—thy Beatrice has no joy, no happiness but with thee. Haste thee, sweetest," she exclaimed, as she dropped from the window a silken ladder, that indispensable appurtenance of a Venetian balcony, "haste thee, my dearest Giovanni."

In another moment the graceful Giovanni had bounded up the ladder, vaulted over the balcony, and was standing in the room.

"Dearest Beatrice!" he exclaimed, as he folded her to his breast.

"Oh, my own beautiful Giovanni," she murmured, as she yielded to his repeated kisses, "what joy once more to hold you in my arms—E si bello —si divino! Di piacer mi baliza il cor!"

"Dunqu'io son, tu non m'inganni? dunqu'io son felice!" passionately replied the youth; and again he strained her to his bosom, again he pressed her rosy lips.

"But you must go, my own Giovanni. My jealous lord will be here anon. At every sound I have thought 'twas he ascending the staircase. Nay, dearest, you must go. He was to be home by twelve, and 'tis now within a few minutes of that hour."

"Crudel, perche, signora, farmi languir cosi!"

"Call me not cruel! Thou knowest, love, that did it lie with myself, I should never bid thee adieu. But should he find thee here, 'twere death to both of us!"

"Addio, then, bel idol mio!"

"You will not forget me, Giovanni?" said the beauty, as she hung upon his shoulder, and gazed at him with eyes moist with the sadness of too eager love.

"Forget thee! I have no thought that is not given to thee,—no hope, but that of once more folding thee to my arms. Addio!—And till I see thee again,

il cor mi dice,
Io no son', no son' felice!"

A violent knocking was heard at the outer gate. Giovanni dropped into the gondola, and rowed off. Beatrice resumed her seat upon the couch, and the Sonetti of Petrarca.

CHAPTER III.

"Stand back into the shadow of that buttress," said Poniardo to his friend. "Here is the young springald at last!"

They were upon the Ponté dei Sospiri, and midnight was pealing from the lofty Campanile of San Marco. Giovanni Beltesta advanced with the unsuspecting gaiety of youth, singing, as he went,

O Beatrice, il cor mi dice
Chi' io no son', no son' felice!

He stumbled, and fell forward with a groan. The stilettoes of the two ruffians had met within his gentle heart!

"Let us chuck him into the lagune!" said Poniardo, lifting the bloody body by the shoulders.

"Bravely said, mio bon camarado," responded Gasparo, as he seized the legs.

A splash was heard, and the smooth surface of the lagune was broken for a moment. It passed away, and the moon was once more shining upon the water's unbroken mirror.

That night the Signor Aquavita swallowed poison. 'Twas said that the fingers of La Bella Beatrice had mingled it with his evening cup; but on this a veil of the deepest mystery rests.

In a lonely cell of San Lazaro is a lovely female. See her raven tresses streaming over a throat and neck that might shame the marble of Antiparos! Her laughing eyes are bright with the lustre of a more than natural fire. 'Tis La Bella Beatrice. She speaks but of one—her beautiful Giovanni; and in the dead of night she is heard singing, in tones of the most plaintive sadness, the words that, with a foreboding spirit, had been spoken by her lover at parting,

il cor mi dice,
Io no son', no son' felice!

A romance so pure in its morals, so original in its incidents, so remarkable for the dramatic individuality of its characters, forms * * [Here the manuscript and moral abruptly break off. Through the same channel we expect the conclusion of Bulwer's sentimental and preternatural tale of Zicci; now in a state of suspended animation for several years; provided the gifted author does not finish it right speedily himself.]

HOWITT'S VISITS TO REMARKABLE PLACES.*

RIGHT glad are we to meet Mr. Howitt once more with his foot upon the green sward of England, rambling at his own good liking, by the bright, rock-bedded streams of the North; threading its secluded valleys, wandering in its ancient woods; now musing under the towers of Brancepeth, Raby, or Lumley; and anon exploring the ruins of many an edifice of mighty name, the chiefless strongholds of the Nevilles, the Delavals, or the Hiltons,—families of far-descent, of whose fame and prowess small trace will shortly remain, save such traditions as are preserved in ballads and in storied pages like those of Mr. Howitt and his contemporaries. But who are his contemporaries? The delightful walk in literature which he occupies is at present all his own. To the eye of philosophy, or the keener orb of practical utility, his may not seem the highest sphere of lettered wisdom, or creative art; but it is undeniably that in which a successful writer largely promotes "the greatest enjoyment of the greatest number" of readers. This is surely no small achievement.

To those familiar with the previous volume of this work, it may be unnecessary to say that this one is framed upon exactly the same plan; one of entire freedom, embracing in its wide range every beautiful object and pleasure-raising emotion; whatever the painter has sketched, the poet sung, or the local antiquary narrated, of fact, legend, and tradition. Anecdotes illustrative of manners, snatches of family history, and all kinds of agreeable gossip give zest to the sketches; nay, tales of somewhat superannuated scandal, either slightly known, or long since forgotten, are revived, and will, for many readers, possess novelty as well as piquancy.

Mr. Howitt's rambles at this time have been principally in the counties of Durham and Northumberland, though he proceeded the length of Berwick, and made a raid into Liddesdale. His field is thus "The North Countrie,"—the storied Border land of daring adventure, battle, and ballad. Though he examined every scene for himself, and in measuring the ground, generally made his own legs his compasses, he has enriched, and greatly enhanced the value of his work, by a diligent perusal of county histories, memoirs, and chronicles; the works of that prince of local antiquaries and picturesque tourists, Pennant; of Surtees, Hutchinson, Grose, and a host of men of smaller note, who are, however, prophets in their own country. With all this, the entire body of northern legendary ballad poetry was at his finger's end. So many fine original elements, together with no mean skill in the art of combining and arranging them, could not fail to produce an exceedingly agreeable book. But not resting on literary merit alone, the resources of art also have been called in to accomplish the charms of the work. It is beautifully illustrated with numerous vignettes and tail-pieces, either actual representations of the finest scenes and places described, or poetically in harmony with their character. So that the Visits to Remarkable Places forms one of the most elegantly embellished books of the present season. To heighten the charm of the designs, they are all from the pencils of eminent northern artists; men of talents, full of enthusiasm for the natural beauty and ancient fame of their native region.

The Tourist, or Rambler, whose steps seem to have been almost as eccentric as his fancies—"wandering at his own sweet will," starts with a visit to the city of Durham, with which locality he is enraptured, and fairly enchants the reader. The annals of the different towns which he visited fall within Mr. Howitt's scheme; and the past and present history of this city, and of Newcastle and Berwick-upon-Tweed, are accordingly given, with amplitude sufficient to satisfy, we should imagine, even the citizens of those places; and to make the work of peculiar interest to them, from its saying so much about themselves. In describing these towns, Mr. Howitt has done full justice to their respective and relative claims. The most zealous for the beauty of the venerable and picturesque city of St. Cuthbert, among the inhabitants of Durham, must be not merely satisfied, but grateful, and proud of the lengthened descriptive eulogy of which this is a specimen:—

> There is this characteristic of most of our cathedral towns, that they have changed less in their outward aspect than others; and you would imagine that Durham had not changed at all. . . . . .
> Whichever way you approach Durham, you are first struck with the great central tower of the cathedral peeping over the hills that envelop the city. It looks colossal, massy, and silent. Anon you lose sight of it; but again you mark it, solemnly breasting the green heights, like some Titan watcher, and it well prepares the mind for the view of the whole great pile, which presently opens upon you. Every traveller must be sensibly impressed with the bold beauty of Durham in the first view. As he emerges from some defile in those hills which, farther off, hid from him all but that one great tower, he sees before him a wide, open valley, in the centre of which a fine mount stands crowned with the ancient clustered houses of Durham; the turrets and battlements of its old and now restored castle rising above them; and again, above all, soaring high into the air, the noble towers and pinnacles of its Norman minster. Around recede in manifold forms, the higher hills, as if intended by nature to give at once beauty and retirement to this splendid seat of ancient religion. From various points of these hills, the city looks quite magnificent. The old town, with its red roofs, runs along the ridges of the lower hills, and these higher ones are thrown into knolls and dells, with their green crofts and wooded clumps and lines of trees. The whole surrounding scenery, in fact, is beautiful. My visit there was in the middle of May. The grass had a delicious freshness to the eye; the foliage of the trees was of spring's most delicate green; and the bluebells and primroses, which the hot weather in April had entirely, a month before, withered up in the south, were there in abundance in all their dewy and fragrant beauty. Through all the finer seasons of the year, however, the environs of Durham are delightful.

* Visits to Remarkable Places, Old Halls, Battle Fields, and Scenes illustrative of Striking Passages in Poetry and History, &c. &c. By William Howitt, royal 8vo, cloth, pp. 610: Longman & Co.

This we consider a favourable specimen of Mr. Howitt's most studied manner, though we are not sure that this manner is his best. Durham possesses rare advantages over many of the English towns, in the extent, beauty, and accessibility of its public walks:—

Unlike the condition of many a beautiful neighbourhood in many a part of England, where you may peep into paradise, but may not enter; here almost wherever the allurements of the scene draw you, you may follow. Footpaths in all imaginable directions strike across these lovely crofts. You may climb hills, descend into woody dells, follow the course of a little stream, as its bright waters and flowery banks attract you, and never find yourselves out of the way. In all directions, as lines radiating from a centre, deep old lanes stretch off from the city, along which you may wander, hidden from view of everything but the high bosky banks, and overhanging trees, and intervening sky. Other lanes, as deep, and as sweetly rustic and secluded, wind away right and left, leading you to some peep of antiquated cottage, or old mill, or glance over hollow glades to far-off hills, and ever and anon bringing you out on the heights to a fresh and striking view of that clustered city, its castled turrets, and majestic cathedral. It would seem as if the amenities of this sweet neighbourhood had from earliest times been fully felt, and that the jealousies and restrictions of property had here never dreamed of hedging the public out from them.

The inhabitants are duly sensible of their high privileges; and accordingly in fine weather, on Sundays, these beautiful walks have "a gay and social aspect," from the number of decently dressed people, who are taking the air, and enjoying the scenery, without any reproach in the eyes of Mr. Howitt. He seems to think that the pious and venerable Barnard Gilpin, the Apostle of the north, employed the Sunday afternoons exceedingly fitly and well, when he gathered the poor of his flock around him at his hospitable table, and fed while he taught them, on the Sabbath-day.

To Houghton-le-Spring, the residence and burial-place of the apostolic Gilpin, the tourist repaired with the same feelings which lead a pilgrim to a shrine, or to the tomb of a saint; those of enthusiastic love and veneration. The Life and Acts of the Apostle of the North fill a few pages most delightfully. They overflow with true unction. If the clergy will learn the secret of turning men to God; of being beloved and adored by their parishioners, and revered by the pious and the good of all sects, let them follow the steps of this primitive apostle.

His hospitable manner of living was the admiration of the whole country; and strangers and travellers met with a cheerful reception. Even their beasts had so much care taken of them, that it was humorously said, if a horse was turned loose in any part of the country, it would immediately make its way to the rectory of Houghton. Every Sunday, from Michaelmas to Easter, was a sort of public day with him; that is, through the worst part of the year, when such comforts were the most needed. During this season, he expected to see his parishioners and their families; whom he seated, according to their ranks, at three tables; and when absent from home, the same establishment was kept up. Lord Burleigh, when Lord Treasurer, unexpectedly visited him on his way into Scotland, but the economy of Mr. Gilpin's house was not easily disconcerted; and he entertained the statesman and his retinue in such a manner, as made him acknowledge he could hardly have expected more at Lambeth. Lord Burleigh made him great offers of advancement, which he respectfully but firmly declined, feeling persuaded that he was in a far more useful sphere than a bishopric. On looking back from an eminence, after he left Houghton, Burleigh could not help exclaiming, "There is the enjoyment of life, indeed! Who can blame that man for not accepting a bishopric? What doth he want to make him greater, happier, or more useful to mankind?"

His charities were large;—he visited the jails; though we do not hear of him sending any one to those dismal abodes, either for the recovery of tithes or for ecclesiastical discipline.

Externally, the scene of Gilpin's labours has not improved. Neither mining nor steam are good landscape painters; and they often even mar the mellowing and beautifying effects of Time on the Dead and the Past. But if there is not much actually to see at Houghton, the tourist is one of those possessed of the happy faculty of being able to conjure up long trains of images of faded beauty, and hallowed remembrances of departed excellence. His fancy was naturally excited while he gazed upon Barnard Gilpin's once secluded abode, now almost approached by railway omnibuses.

The parsonage is a good parsonage, with ample and pleasant grounds. It is occupied by the present rector, a nephew of old Chancellor Thurlow, but has no single monument of Gilpin left about it. Some splendid old hawthorns on the lawn may, perhaps, be considered as the most legitimate relics of his time. But one would fain enter these old and twilight rooms where he lived and studied; where he renewed his knowledge of the classical labours of his youth, and indulged in "music and poetry, in which he excelled;" where he prepared his heart-warm addresses to his people; where he prayed for them, as he rose up and lay down, who in their own humble habitations, far and wide, on many a wild mountain, and in many a hidden dale, blessed him daily in their hearts before God. We would fain see that ample, if rude, hall, in which from Michaelmas to Easter, every Sunday, the tables were spread for all his flock; and where, no doubt, as they sate together at meat, many a discourse passed—many a question was asked of the doings and sufferings of simple life, and many a quaint relation was made, that it would do one's heart good to hear now. One would like to see, in one's mind's eye, those "four and twenty scollers," sitting at their place at table by him, "whom in his own house he boarded and kept, sometimes fewer, but seldom; the greater part poor men's sonnes, upon whom he bestowed meat, drink, and cloth, and education." One would like to see where that great pot hung, "which he took order should, every Thursday, throughout the yeare, be provided full of boyled meat, for the poor of Houghton." One would like to image where and how sate and looked the great statesman Burleigh, and his train, with that venerable Apostle at the head of the table, which astonished Burleigh, "who took of such diligence and abundance of all things, and so compleat service in the entertainment of so great a stranger, and so unlooked-for a guest." "His parsonage," says his protegé and biographer, George Carleton, bishop of Chichester, from whom we quote, "seemed like a bishop's pallace; nor shall a man lightly find one bishop's house among many, worthy to be compared to this house of his, if he consider the variety of buildings, and neatness of the situation. Within, his house was like a monasterie, if a man consider a monasterie such as were in the time of St. Augustine, where hospitality and economy went hand in hand, and the doors were always open to the poor and the stranger." What a thousand pities that modern taste has swept all this away!

Gilpin's school, which stands near his church, has escaped the hand of Time; but nothing worth taking can in England escape less hallowed and greedier clutches. This seminary, which the founder intended for the children of the poor as well as the rich, has long, in common with nearly every foundation of the kind, been diverted from the original, benevolent, and useful purpose.

In some turret, tower, or niche of every old church or deserted castle, Mr. Howitt always found a sort of howlet in the shape of a very old woman, the custodier and chronicler of the spot. The guardian genius of Gilpin's church knew little about the most illustrious of its many incumbents; but she has a touching human story of her own, which is well brought out.

Such ancient crones, vagrants, casual wayfarers, and mendicants, or lady-like housekeepers of the old school, contribute by their gossip to enliven the narrative. The tourist was, however, fortunate in occasionally meeting with intelligencers of a higher order in the course of his desultory rambles,—with obliging and well-informed persons, fitted by their local knowledge and connexions, as well as by their acquirements, to enrich his note-books, and who often participated in his enthusiasm in the pursuit of the varied objects of his pilgrimage. Of this number were the daughters of Bewick, the celebrated wood-engraver, whose genius has kindled the passion for natural history in not a few minds; and in many more a higher feeling—the love of all that is most beautiful and true in the rural scenery which lies in and around every one's daily path. Bewick's daughters accompanied Mr. and Mrs. Howitt to Cherryburn, the cottage and little farm where their father was born, and where he spent his boyhood. None of the rambles described is more delightful than the excursion to this sweet spot, which—lying about ten miles from Newcastle, and once deeply secluded—is now brought into the town by the Carlisle railway.

It is a single house, standing on the south side of the Tyne, and at some distance from the river. A little rustic lane leads you up to it, and you find it occupying a rather elevated situation, commanding a pleasant view over the vale of the Tyne. The house is now a modest farm-house, still occupied by Ralph Bewick, a nephew of the artist's; and, as Miss Bewick observed on approaching the dwelling—"May the descendants of the present possessor continue there in all time to come."

The house, in the state in which it was when Thomas Bewick passed his boyhood in it, was as humble a rural nest as any son of genius ever issued from. It was a thatched cottage, containing three apartments, and a dairy or milkhouse on the ground-floor, and a chamber above. The east end of this was lately pulled down, and the rest is now converted into stables. Bewick was very fond of introducing his native cottage into his vignettes, and often used to talk of "the little window at his bed-head." Which room this was, however, none of the family knew.

We have cited this passage, by no means to the disparagement of the sumptuous and luxurious rooms and galleries of Lambton castle, or of the magnificence and grandeur of the saloons of Raby, and of many other gorgeous and far-famed residence, but simply because it is more rare and choice in its own department, and not less illustrious than those stately abodes.

Many of the older feudal residences of the north now possess the romantic charm of being deserted, and partly dilapidated. Among these is Lumley Castle, which we select in preference to any other, in a locality where the ancient seats of English nobility are as "plenty as blackberries." The Lumleys were a very ancient, and also a brave and gallant race, and among the most illustrious of the Saxon families which, distinguished long before the Conquest, survived the oppression of the Normans, and became famous during the Crusades. They were entitled to the nobler praise of being often found among the champions of freedom; if the resistance of the turbulent nobility to the encroachments of the crown upon the privileges of their order deserve so high a name. But the belief, that among this stanch Saxon family champions of popular right were found, may give more interest to the view of their deserted feudal hold.

A very aged housekeeper was the sole inmate of Lumley castle when Mr. Howitt visited it,—the exact counterpart of her who, in Mrs. Radcliffe's and kindred romances, hobbles after the orphan heroine, carrying a bunch of keys, and shows the picture gallery; among the portraits of which is discovered, by instinct, the lovely, murdered mother of the beautiful Adeline or Emmeline. An eerie abode the old lady must have had; yet she was cheerful and hospitable; and though it might detract somewhat from the romance of the situation, we hope that she had some tidy country-girl to keep her company, and put her snug apartments in order. It is diverting to contrast the simple and rather awkward reception of Mr. Howitt at this grand old place, with the high-sounding descriptions of such events which one usually finds in novels and histories. The castle is a large and massive structure. The Wear winds round the green slopes above which it stands, but is half-hidden by groups and avenues of lofty lime-trees. The views of the surrounding country are fine and wide; and in the distance rise the roofs and spires of Chester-le-Street. As Mr. Howitt, revolving the memories of other days, stood late in the day before this enchanted solitary pile, wrapt in romance and admiration, no living thing was in sight; and though he had been warned that the keeper was, though no giant, a gruff or querulous old lady, he resolutely pursued the adventure.

The silence of the place was only broken by the rattling of windows in the castle front, for the wind was considerably strong; I rang the bell, and presently heard a feeble footstep approaching within. A female voice demanded who was there, and giving for answer, a stranger from the south, there immediately commenced a drawing of bars, a dropping of bolts, and lugging at the huge and lofty door. "Push, there, if you please," cried the voice from within; "for I cannot open the door myself." I pushed accordingly, and at once inward turned the door, and with the force of the wind, drove the old lady backwards, for it was she. I had now to help to close it again, the wind seeming to defy both our endeavours, and even when we had accomplished it, rattling and roaring at it as if it would tear it loose. I was too much struck with the view of this noble and unique hall to be able to take my eyes from surveying it for some time, when I found the old housekeeper standing patiently by me, and on telling her I was sorry to trespass on her at so late an hour of the day, but that I was going from London into the North, and wished to have a peep at the castle, this good dame, who had been represented to me as so wayward, said with the greatest cheerfulness—O, certain, you can soon see it—the main thing is this hall. I'll tell you all about these pictures, and then you can go where you like. I see you're a gentleman: you'll find the doors open; and when you have been where you will, here is my room," said she, showing the way into a nice, snug, well-carpeted room in the north-western tower just by, with a good fire blazing on walls adorned with some very interesting family portraits. "I cannot stand long," she said; "at my age my legs soon fail me; but if you want to know anything, you can come and ask me, and I'll go anywhere, and explain if necessary; and when you have done, here is a room or two here, near mine, with some paintings in, I'll show you." With this roving commission I again entered the great hall.

This is quite a hall to enchant a heraldic antiquary; but the mere catalogue of half its treasures would be far too much for us; and we are, besides, more interested by the romantic situation of the adventurous explorer, who, like a knight of old romance, traversed a vast wilderness of mighty rooms; finding all the doors fly open before him; and at dusk stood thus:—

Sometimes I was gliding carefully over floors of polished oak, that echoed to the tread, and threatened to throw me down at every step; then I came to a staircase that led me up into other stories, or down into subterranean passages, vaults, and offices of various descriptions; once, no doubt, busy enough with servants and their concerns, but small, damp, chill, empty, and desolate. Then again, I looked out of the front windows, finding myself gazing over a wide twilight landscape, or encountering those dark masses of woods that stretch along the western side, and rendered more solemn by the shadows of night, and the hoarse brawling of the stream in the deep glen below. Then I was at a window looking into the inner area, where all was gloomy, silent, and full of the spirit of the past. Opposite to me, in the west centre, stood a turreted gateway, on which was carved two long perpendicular lines of armorial shields, over one of which, in an escutcheon, showed the lily, and over the other the rose. The shields themselves, having the true air of ancient baronial state, as they were wont to be emblazoned on the front of martial halls, were in truth proud shields, testimonies of many a high alliance. The dexter line, Lumley and Northumberland; Lumley and Hesilden; Lumley and Daudre; Lumley and Thevenay; Lumley and Neville; Lumley and Harrington; Lumley and Plantagenet, &c. . . . . Above, on the turrets, some ancient heraldic beasts, lions or rams, seemed to range in the twilight, and threaten, as the night advanced, to become instinct with life, and prepared to play strange gambols through these old wild rooms. In the dusk below, were dimly visible the remains of ancient marble fountains. As the gathering gloom warned me, I turned from the window, and began to retrace my way through the house. Nothing could be more dismal. The wind now thundered round the whole fabric, shaking the windows, many of which presented without the view of iron bars, as of a prison. In the court-yard, the huge watch-dog barked in deep, and sonorous, and measured notes, and his hoarse voice was echoed by the dusky buildings. The wildness and gloom; the half-seen forms of things, as I steered dubiously my way through unknown passages and empty rooms, were worthy of one of Mrs. Radcliffe's most fearful castles of wonder and dread. I at one moment found myself in a few rooms fitted up for the temporary sojourn of the earl when he came there, and thought that I had much rather he occupied them than myself. It was, in fact, quite pleasant to reach once more the housekeeper's snug apartment, and find a cheerful fire, and candles casting their social light all over it.

This is surely famous reading for a gusty December night in the country. The polite ancient retainer of the representatives of the Lumleys produced her cake and wine. She was pleasant and chatty, and had a number of stories to tell of the former lords of the domain, and their family connexions; and a thorough knowledge of the family portraits.

She dwelt with natural interest on the splendour of the house ere it was stripped; on all the rooms, with their fine paintings, silk hangings and "lovely furnitur;" every room having its great pier glasses that reached to the ceiling. She related how after the house had been stripped, the earl and countess came, and how much they lamented over it. "Let us fit the old castle up again," said the countess. "Nay, my dear," replied the earl, with a sigh, "that can never be done; it would take, if it took a penny, £50,000; and then, my dear," said he, "you don't take into account that our house at Sandbach is stripped too." "Sandbach," added Mrs. Chandler, "is fitted up again, but this has never been, and I reckon never will now." She went on to inform me that her mother had been housekeeper at Glenter's Hall, a seat of Lord Scarborough's in Lincolnshire, and came here to be housekeeper fifty-three years ago. She came with her, a young woman, and had lived here ever since, being now eighty-four. That the gentry of the neighbourhood came sometimes in summer, and had archery parties on the lawn in front of the castle, and took luncheon in the hall, and sometimes had a dance there; the only circumstance, except the occasional arrival of a curious stranger, that now seems to connect this house of many ages with the living world.

The night had now settled darkly down. This grand old castle front, with all its projecting towers, gloomy gateway, ancient shields, with grim and uncouth heads of beasts and horned prophets, and its lofty battlements, frowned solemnly and sternly upon me. Below, deep in its glen, brawled and muttered along the stream; and vast woods extending right and left, spread a deeper blackness around, and sent from their wind-stirred depths, dreary sighings, such as seem to belong only to night and to woods. I thought if ever there was scene calculated to create a belief in haunted halls, and in the tales and creatures of ancient romance, it was this; and as I hastened away to cross the river and regain my inn, I often turned and saw with a peculiar pleasure the ancient towers of the Lumleys looming majestically through the gloom.

Lambton castle, with its modern luxuries, follows, as if chosen for the purpose of contrast; and a fair occasion is found to bring in the legend of the Lambton Worm,* which, if somewhat worn with long use, is at least as pleasant in a book as the elegant boudoirs and rich dressing-rooms of Lambton, save, perhaps, to their noble owners.

Another pilgrim shrine was Jarrow, the abode, some thousand and a few more years since, of the learned and venerable Bede; from whose writings alone we know how Christianity was first introduced into our island; and who, long after he wrote, found a translator in King Alfred, who turned his Ecclesiastical History into the vernacular Saxon of his own age. It was no ordinary event to contemplate the spot on which this pious and learned man lived and died, and near which he was born. Little is known of his life; but Mr. Howitt, by the aid of imagination, fills up the meagre outline of the history of this early light of British literature, and contrasts the Jarrow of his days with the locality as it is now seen. He imagines that the venerable scholar would not have approved of many of the visible signs of the march of improvement.

* See Tait's Magazine for July, 1840, page 446.

Exactly opposite to his window he would see the dragons of steam running too on dry land, and sending their screams farther and more piercingly than, soon after his time, the flying Saxons sent their outcries at the onset of the Danes, who came, and twice laid his beloved cell in ashes. He would see—where the Tyne then looked on its pleasant banks in one long summer Sabbath of quietness, on its overhanging trees, on its solitary angler—now huge ranges of ballast-hills; that is, hills, and almost mountains of sand, that ships coming from the south of England, and the continent, have brought as ballast, and emptied here; and upon these hills, now grown over, in a great degree, with grass, and even grazed by cattle, a blue, bearded, and amphibious race, with their hands in their trouser pockets and quid in mouth, rolling along, and a motley crew of keelmen, boatmen, ship-carpenters, cokers, and diggers of railway lines, more intently busy than even he himself in his life of St. Cuthbert, and the records of the ancient church. Instead of the smell of the unsullied, wild, and sweeping sea, what smells would there not reach him! tar and sulphur, coal and smoke, and arsenic, and all "the nasty poisons which kill everything but their own makers."

But Bede would never visit the spot again if he could. Not only is it now engulphed in that Pandemonium of scenes and sounds just mentioned, but the neighbouring district is become an actual region of railroads. . . . The air thrills with the shrieking of steam whistles, and the rush of iron wheels catches your ear even where some little hollow would persuade you that you had reached a solitude. The green headland of Jarrow looking out pleasantly amid such incongruous scenes; its shattered monastery; its old Norman church, and its ample, quiet burial-ground, thickly studded with tombs, serve only to show the grand contrast between the England of his day and the England of ours. He would cast one approving glance, if he ventured anywhere within sight of the place, at a school which they are building at the eastern end of the ruins; and then retire to Monkton, his native village, about a mile off, where his Well still flows into a green winding valley, and where women still bring their children to be dipped in it for the cure of various diseases, first dropping in a crooked pin; and after every immersion lading out the water, and suffering it to re-fill before they plunge a fresh patient.

Bede, if he did return, might perhaps perceive the utility of these nuisances, and forgive them; on the same principle that a Bucolick poet overlooks a compost dunghill.

The castle of Hilton, in this richly-castled region, is, though in a very dilapidated state, still a magnificent place. It boasts an antiquity almost coeval with Bede. The Hyltons are said to have been settled here three hundred years before the Conquest. They, however, sided with William of Normandy, who, in consequence, granted them very large possessions on the Wear. The ancestral fame of this family was resplendent in their own county.

Surtees states, that even when the fortunes of the house were fallen, the gentry of the North continued to testify their respect for them, and to acknowledge them as "the highest noblesse of the North without the peerage." The name of Hilton, he adds, always stands first in every episcopal commission. In 1669, Mr. Arden, complaining to Miles Stapleton, Esq., of the unseemly pride of Dean Carleton and his daughters, adduces, as a superlative instance of it, that the Dean had seated himself above Baron Hilton at the quarter sessions, to the great disgust and reluctancy of the country gentry; and that, moreover, the young Lady Carletons had crowded themselves into a pew in the cathedral before Baron Hilton's daughters.

The Hiltons, at one period, possessed eight manors in the county of Durham, two in Yorkshire, and two in Northumberland; and rich church livings. The civil wars completed their ruin which expensive law-suits had begun.

The Barons of Hilton sunk lower and lower, till the last of the family, a widow and her daughter, lived on the Windmill Hill, Gateshead; the husband and father—the last of the direct Hiltons—having been, it is supposed, a woollen-draper. Such were the strange fortunes of that family before whose ancestral house I now stood.

What is this decay, after all, to the numerous descendants of the "ould ancient Kings of Ireland," who are now acting as porters on the quays of Dublin or Cork, and as hewers of wood and drawers of water in all the cities of their conquerors, or on the spot where their ancestors were sovereign princes. The chiefless pile of Hilton, now the dwelling of a poor family of field-labourers, was the haunt of one of the last brownies, or goblins, known in English family traditions. Apropos to Hilton, Mr. Howitt revives an equally wild tale in those adventures of the Countess of Strathmore, and her infamous husband, Stoney Robinson, or Bowes, which amused the tea-tables of our grandmothers. The story would make a capital groundwork for a modern novel, with the addition of a few more mysteries, and at least one fair murder, if it had not, as we believe, done duty of this kind already.

A romantic or poetical antiquary could no more pass the towers of Brancepeth and Raby, than a Quaker the town of Darlington, sung by us, as—

The darling town of schism

Pease and plenty.

Darlington is the residence of many respectable and wealthy families of FRIENDS. Their co-disciple—if they allow him the honour—compares them with the priests who formerly held their place in this locality, and indeed monopolized every rich and beautiful spot that had not been pounced upon by the feudal barons, and makes this broad and important distinction between the ancient and modern lords of Darlington:—

The clergy since have had nothing to do but to reside; the Friends, on the contrary, have been born in the enlightened modern times, when phrenology did exist, and have added to these other organs, the one discovered by this science as very large in modern heads—acquisitiveness,—and they have accordingly, most of them, made their fortunes by their own right hands. It must be allowed at the same time that the Friends, and amongst them conspicuously the Darlington Friends, have been as free to distribute their wealth for the public good, as to acquire it for their own. They are active in all works of public interest and improvement, though in this particular it may shrewdly be said that they find such matters by no means inimical to their own interests.

From a rather full account of Newcastle, ancient and modern, and, among others of its live elements, the colliers, we extract the following passage, for different reasons. It is, in the first place, the picture of a peculiar class not much known beyond their own districts; and, secondly, one is at present doubly glad of the relief of contemplating any section of the labouring population of England that still command a fair share of those comforts which they all toil so hard and industriously to obtain.

There are commonly as many houses erected near each colliery as serve the whole of the workmen, and each one is allowed a small plot of ground for the growth of pot-herbs, potatoes, &c. They are fond of good living, in which they freely indulge, whenever their circumstances will allow them. Pies, dumplings, and puddings, with the best of beef and mutton, &c., are their common fare. They have a great liking for kneaded cakes baked on the girdle, which with them are called singing-hinnies, and their propensities for black-puddings is notorious. On market-days,

> —— For black puddings, long measure,
> They go to Tile Trullikay's stand,
> And away bear the glossy rich treasure,
> With joy, like curled bugles in hand.

As the colliers form a distinct body of men, and seldom associate with others, they entertain strong feelings of mutual attachment. When they combine, or stick, for the purpose of raising their wages, they are said to spit upon a stone together, by way of cementing their confederacy. This appears to be a very old custom, the origin of which is lost in the remoteness of time.

Their diversions are bowling, foot-racing, hand-balls, quoits, cards, and sometimes, in places where they dare pursue it, hunting and fowling. Cock-fighting used to be a great diversion before it was forbidden by the law. When they have their bowling matches, they usually repair to a level piece of ground on a moor or common. A certain number of throws is agreed upon, and the game is won by the party who, to use their own phrase, "measures out the greatest length of ground." Some of these bowlers can throw to an incredible distance. Many of them will venture the full amount of their fortnight's wages—for they are paid only once a fortnight—on a bowling match, and often to the great embarrassment of their family affairs.

To the annual public feasts, vulgarly called hoppings, in the southern parts of the county, great numbers of the colliers resort. Here some of them display their buffoonery in grinning for a parcel of tobacco, which is commonly either hung on the sign-post of a public-house, or suspended at the end of a stick projected from one of the windows for that purpose. The competitors exhibit beneath, with their eyes fixed on the precious prize, which is the reward of him who assumes the most frightful countenance. They also at these places show their activity in playing at the hand-ball, in dancing, and foot-racing; and he who outstrips his fellows in the race, is presented with a coarse woollen hat of about three or four shillings value.

In the families of colliers there are frequent intermarriages. . . . . .

In their dress they often affect to be gaudy, and are fond of clothes of flaring colours. Their holiday waistcoats, called by them posey jackets, are frequently of very curious patterns, displaying flowers of various dyes; and their stockings mostly of blue, purple, pink, or mixed colours. A great part of them have their hair very long, which on work-days is either tied in a queue, or rolled up in curls; but when dressed in their best attire, is commonly spread over their shoulders. Some of them wear two or three narrow ribbons round their hats, placed at equal distances, in which it is customary with them to insert one or more bunches of primroses or other flowers.

Those who have been long employed in pits where the passages, or head-ways, are very low and confined, contract a partial deformity of shape. In such subjects, the breast is more than usually prominent, and the body rather twisted; others are crooked in the legs.

The Methodists, the first reformers of the unhappy classes, abandoned by their more fortunate fellow-citizens and completely neglected by their clergy, and latterly the Temperance Societies, have made some inroads on the old usages of the colliers. Among the young, many now neither fight nor drink on Sundays; thus flying directly in the face of the wisdom of their ancestors. There is quite enough of the magical transformations of Mr. Grainger in this book, save for those who have profited by them; and after all that has been accomplished, there still appears an abundant field in Newcastle for one who, in civilized communities, ought to precede, or at all events keep pace, with the ornamental architect—namely, the scavenger. This, however, is not the fault of Mr. Grainger.

A visit to Seaton-Delaval affords scope for a long history of the exploits of that eccentric roué—(blackguard is the plain English word)—Sir Francis Delaval, the founder of that school for clever and agreeable rakes, which was perfected by Sheridan. A noble marquis, who figures as frequently in the reports of the police as in the House of his peers, is maternally descended from the Delavals, and certainly shows the blood. From the Delaval family the Marquis of Waterford inherits Ford castle, famed in Border wars and Border legends; at which rumour lately bruited that he was to keep up the customs of chivalry so sublimely revived—from the sublime to the ridiculous being but a step—at Eglinton castle. But tournaments are costly toys; and the marquis is not quite so extravagant as his notorious kinsman Sir Francis, who, after running through his own large fortune in a course of profligate extravagance and low vice, by base arts swindled a poor woman out of her hand, and a fortune of £90,000, which was quickly sent the same road. He was, in short, one of those gentlemen of great talents, great family, and far descent, who, if half the stories of his friends and panegyrists be authentic, eminently deserved the tread-mill.

We shall not attempt to follow Mr. Howitt, to Mitford, Warkworth, Alnwick, Bamborough, and other celebrated places, in Northumberland, though we can promise those who do so, fine description, storied lore, and a vast fund of entertainment. Nay, we shall not be tempted even by Grace Darling, who is compared with Jeanie Deans, whom she certainly may resemble in simplicity of manners, prudence, and modesty. But, obeying the natural impulse of humanity, even in the face of great danger, is one thing, and the moral heroism of Jeanie Deans another. There are many Grace Darlings to be found among the sex in all parts of the world, and in all ranks; but we suspect there are very few Helen Walkers to be met with anywhere. It wrongs the cause of truth to speak of Jeanie Deans as the creation of a novelist. She was the genuine woman which a happy nature, and the fire-side religious education, and high moral feelings, of the peasantry of Scotland had made her. It was easier to invent a Rebecca or a Minna Troil, than this sober-minded but high-souled country girl. To Scott belongs the honour of adopting her, and embellishing her modest virtue with a thousand beauties. Grace Darling herself cannot be persuaded that she did anything so very unusual or wonderful. She is perfectly right; and entitled to more respect for the general modesty and propriety of her conduct and demeanour, after so many people have been trying to turn her head, (when their own was a little touched,) than for her noble but yet simple act. She deserves yet higher praise for having refused £20 a-night to appear on a London stage, merely seated in a boat, or on a rock, and saying nothing. Assuredly Jeanie Deans would have done the same, and have far preferred to earn, by milking her cows, the half of twenty-pence a-day. Like Jeanie Deans, Grace Darling has a Duke and Duchess for friends and protectors, and the liegewoman of the Duke of Northumberland is not to marry without his approbation.

His stately castle draws forth the warm admiration of Mr. Howitt. Among its multitudinous beauties and rarities, we find nothing more interesting than the dairy, nor amusing than the late Duke's wooden steed—named Velocipede, dam, Elm-tree,—sire, the Village Carpenter; now laid up for the gratification of posterity. Of this horse, it is told here—

The Duke and his physician used to amuse themselves with careering on these steeds about the grounds; but one day, being somewhere on the terrace, his Grace's Trojan steed capsized, and rolled over and over with him down the green bank, much to the amusement of a troop of urchins who were mounted on a wall by the road to witness this novel kind of racing. On this accident the velocipede was laid up in lavender, and a fine specimen of the breed it is. I asked the old porter if the story was true, but he only smiled, and said, "Mind! I did not tell you that. Don't pretend to say, if you write any account of this place, that you had that from me." . . .

But the one object which marks the rural taste and affluence of our English nobility as much as anything connected with their country estates, is a dairy; and here is one, the Duchess's Dairy, with which few in England can compare. It is a cottage building, standing in a beautiful shrubbery garden on the banks of the Aln. The building without has a projecting roof, is surrounded by a veranda, or rustic colonnade, and over its walls clambers, and clusters, and blossoms luxuriantly, the Ayrshire rose. The colonnade is neatly paved with different coloured pebbles. Within, the floor is of alternate squares of black and white marble. The walls, the ceiling, the windows, everything about it is of the most exquisite and delicate cleanness. In the centre stands a massy slab of marble, nearly white, of from five to six inches thick, of more than three yards long, and a yard and a half wide. On this, stand the two last meals of the milk unskimmed, and in white earthenware milk-pans. Around the walls run two shelves of marble, bearing other pans; and on the upper shelf a luxurious assortment of old china bottles, dishes, vases, &c. The cows which supply this beautifully managed dairy are twenty-eight in number. At this early period of the season, when many of them were not giving milk, the produce was 50 pounds of butter per week; when they are most of them milkers, it amounts often to more than 120 pounds. The skimmed milk goes to feed a large family of pigs which are kept in an adjoining piggery, of which the arrangements and animals themselves are equally remarkable. The dairy gardens are as delightful as you can imagine. They are indeed a sort of fairyland region, lying along the banks of the Aln, and literally flowing with milk and honey.

Not one of the many magnificent seats and vast feudal castles described, charm us so much as this glimpse of the old English Manor-house of Mitford.

Its battlemented tower, with large mullioned windows boarded up, and converted into a dovecote; the arched entrance below, with the family escutcheon over it, and the beehives seen within it; the broken walls; the old yew trees about it; the part converted into a tenement covered with ivy, with its ancient porch supported on two stone pillars; the simple garden; the orchard; the walks clean swept; the lofty trees overhanging,—realized all that the poetry of rural life has feigned or imaged forth from such beautiful realities as this. . . . . It was a scene that belonged to England, and to England only—a portion of that deep, rich, and perfect rural beauty, that, from the love of our poets, has become as much part of our literature as of nature itself. Around was the sound of rooks, those attendants only of English country houses, which still cling with strong attachment to the old manor-house rookery; of daws and starlings which haunt the ruins of the manor-house and the castle; and the notes of the various birds which build in the orchard trees, added a great cheerfulness to the spot.

But peacefully beautiful as this scene is now, it has seen many a stern warrior its lord, and stood the brunt of many a fierce blast of war.

After exhausting Northumberland, coastwise and central, and leaving Berwick, Mr. Howitt commenced, what he calls, a Stroll along the Borders, and made a plunge into the Cheviots. It is so difficult to get off macadamized roads now-a-days, even in the most ardent pursuit of the picturesque, that we gladly embrace whatever slender opportunity offers of obtaining a view of Nature in all the undress in which she can now be caught, in any quarter of this tamed island. For this purpose we follow our tourist from Rothbury, dear to Churchmen! up the valley of the Coquet, by a track not yet altogether hacknied. After spending a fine June night at the Three Moons, in this Goshen of the clergy, our traveller starts off thus:—

My way up the valley to Elsden and Otterburne became every step wilder, and to me therefore more attractive. It was a glorious day, at once sunny and breezy. The way laid along the foot of the high craggy fells on the one hand, here and there stretching out into cultivated uplands; and on the other side of the valley rose the stern and dark mountains of Simonside. When about half-way—it was twelve miles—the roads became very bad indeed. . . . . As I proceeded I had to cross and recross with the windings of the stream, the valley becoming more solitary, wild, and desolate. Alpine bridges, such as they have in Scotland, composed of two poles and a little turf, or at least the remains of them, were now the means of transit, and as these were at least a dozen feet above the stream, they were pretty good testimony of the height to which floods rise in this valley. I learned afterwards that it was the great rainy time of last harvest that had raised the river so as to carry away all these bridges together; and that the river will sometimes rise, rapidly, twenty feet above its ordinary channel. Indeed, the vast shoals of gravel and huge stones that are lying here and there in the bed of the river, and the river itself running like a silver thread, amid a wide expanse of this debris, between its shaggy banks, show the fury of the waters that sometimes pass along here.

About two-thirds of the way I came to an old park, which occupies the bottom of the valley and the sides of the hills for a large compass; its old gray walls running over the black stony fells, and through the thick copses which fill the hollows. Its old gates, with large stone gate-posts, peeped out close to me unawares, amongst the alders in the bottom of the vale up which I was advancing, and deer and black cattle showed themselves on the distant slopes. It was one of the most lovely things I ever beheld: there is no house belonging to it; the gloomy cragged summits, and brown, heathery, and stony wastes of Simonside, expanded themselves into the sky on the opposite ridge of the valley; and on my side, high fells also, and long deep glens filled with bushes showed themselves over the alder wood, through which I wended, along the river bank. All in the distance was silent and basking; all about me were the scents of the woodland, and fresh green of young leaves and young grass, of primroses peeping under the boughs, and blue-bells in their first beauty, not as with us in the south, worn out with the old age of a few warm weeks, but as if fled hither with the cuckoo, and smiling at our southern notion that they were dead. This park belongs to a gentleman who resides at a distance—Mr Ord of Nunnykirk, and being a general appurtenance to a large house, and yet fixed here where no such house is to be found, it has the air of an enchanted domain, watched over by some invisible hunters. But I dare say, did we venture to give chase to one of its deer, a substantial keeper would soon issue from some hidden hut in a woody nook!

A dismal narration is given of a murder committed by tinkers, at a solitary peel-house on Whiskershields Common, in this neighbourhood, about fifty years since; for which two women and one man were executed, and the latter hung in chains on the spot. The subject is recommended, by our author, "to Mr. Ainsworth, and his scoundrel-admiring disciples."

Mr. Howitt crossed the country from this place, and so to speak, threaded the Cheviots, keeping as far away from high roads as possible, until he found himself upon, what he calls, Dandie Dinmont's farm; though certainly not the true Charley's Hope.

A long wade through deep heather,—a single shepherd going his round barefoot, and a woman or two looking out from a lonely hut, as I passed, where perhaps no stranger is seen twice in a life,—and I found myself on—Dandie Dinmont's Farm.

Yes! I was now at the head of Liddesdale, once the grand retreat of Border thieves—the land of the Armstrongs and Elliotts—and on the very ground which supplied Scott with the prototype of one of the most genuine rough diamonds of humanity which his own or any works have presented to public admiration. The farm-house lies on the Jedburgh road, not far from the Note-of-the-Gate. It is called Hendley Farm. James Davison was the hearty fellow's name, whose character was so well known, and so exactly touched off by Scott, that everybody immediately recognised it, and he bore the name as if it were really his own.

Mr. Howitt falls into some inaccuracies here, and elsewhere, from adopting popular editions of current stories; but they are of little consequence. He, however, commits a worse and a wilful fault, in occasionally reporting conversations which he himself invited, and which must hurt the feelings, and, perhaps, the interests, of the persons so unguardedly giving him their confidence. Such are the cautious old farmer, near Berwick; and the clergyman who was met at Warkworth; both of whom were civil and kind to the stranger, and neither of whom could ever expect to see their "loose cracks" set down against him in a great book. The practice, whether Yankee or English, deserves to be checked and rebuked. But Mr. Howitt's book was printed while he was abroad. Had he seen pages 415-16, and especially 489, staring him in the face, in a proof-sheet, he would probably have scored out what we consider objectionable. Things look very differently in print and in manuscript. In brief, when—he should either give us some warning intimation, or exercise that discretion—of which good taste is the parent.

Anecdotes like the following do not fall under this censure, and they illustrate points of character and states of popular feeling.

At the Note-of-the-Gate, where I stopped some time for a rest, the old man and woman were a right hearty old couple. When they heard over what a moorland I had steered my course, they were astonished that I had ever found the way; and said that I must be dreadfully tired and hungry. They would, therefore, cook me a rasher of bacon, and soon produced good white bread, and equally good beer. But it was their conversation that was the most refreshing. They were so keenly curious of news, and so humorous in their observations on it. When I said I came from London—"Eh! London, that's a gran' place! Ye're wise folk at London," said the old man. "How so?" I asked. "Why, ye ha' just noo fetched a callant out o' a furrin country to be the queen's husband, and gein him thritty thousand pounds a-year for it; and there's many a braw chiel here wad ha' takken the job for noothing, and done it weel too. It was a great shame," he added, "that a woman should rule all the men in England, and find none of them good enough for her into the bargain."

While exploring in this direction, where all was new to the traveller, (however familiar, Hermitage Castle, and the grave of the Cout of Keeldar may be to many,) and which will be not only new but welcome to the great bulk of his readers, Mr. Howitt had the good fortune to stumble upon the annual celebration of the Liddesdale Games, at Castleton. These he describes, with great animation; for he appears to have entered completely into the spirit of the scene; and to have viewed everything with the lively feelings of first impressions, and the poetry of old association. For him the old Border times were for the moment revived.

At Keeldar Castle occurred the last, and one of the most pleasant of his adventures. This solitary mountain hold is a hunting seat, belonging to the Duke of Northumberland, who has, we believe, opposed the scheme of opening a public road through the domain; though such a line, it is imagined, would be of great utility to the whole kingdom, as well as to the particular district, by shortening distance and facilitating communication. It is to be hoped that the Duke's objections will give way before much higher considerations, than the pleasure of an individual, of whatever rank, opposed to the convenience and interests of a community. In the meanwhile, we are glad that no such road was opened before Mr. Howitt stood at gloamin under the battlements of Keeldar Castle. He had visited Mangerton Tower, the original hold of the redoubted Johnnie Armstrong, on the evening after the games, and thus continues:—

I now hastened back over the Borders into Northumberland. My course was over high, green mountains, without track and without tree. The moorcocks rose noisily from the grass around me as I went on; the sheep fled like wild deer as I approached; and far and wide nothing could be seen but green and naked hills. So lonely, so pathless was the whole region, that had the Brown Man of the Moors started up, I should scarcely have felt it stranger than seemed the whole unusual scenery about me. My directions from a countryman, however, were to steer south. . . . . .

At length I caught sight of the gray battlements of the castle, and entered the open gates of its court with some caution, lest, as a stranger at that time of night, I might be set upon by some large dogs. I now heard the merry sound of bagpipes within, and approaching a door whence a light came—for nobody was in the court-yard, nor could I see a bell—I discerned a large kitchen, with a famous peat fire, and before it a woman with a child on her knees. This was Mrs. Dagg, the wife of the Duke of Northumberland's head keeper here, and mistress of the house. I explained to her that I wished to visit the scene of the ancient abode of the Cout of Keeldar, and that I was afraid that I must petition for a night's lodging, as I understood that there was no inn within eleven miles. Mrs. Dagg, who was a tall and intelligent-looking woman, looked rather strange at this proposition, but said that she was expecting her husband every moment from the Liddesdale Games, and she had no doubt he would accede to my request. She then asked me to sit down, and begged to know my name. I told her my name would be quite strange to her, as I came from London, and never was there before, but that it was Howitt. "Howitt!" said she, "that is a name very familiar to me. Pray are you at all related to the lady of that name who writes such beautiful poetry?" I told her that it gave me equal surprise and pleasure, in that secluded region, to find that my wife's poetry was so well known to her. "Here, Janet!" she cried, rising up, "take the bairn. Pray come this way, sir; I am delighted to see you, and so will my husband be." She speedily led the way into a handsome parlour; asked what I would take; made tea for me, and again expressed her delight in seeing the husband of Mary Howitt. While she made tea, she inquired if anything had been cleared up about the mysterious fate of poor L. E. L., talked of her poetry, and of Mrs. Hemans', and was impatient for the arrival of her husband. Presently, two young men entered, who seemed well acquainted with books; and we sate, most unexpectedly to me, talking of literature, and the legends and history of the border, till twelve o'clock. . . . . .

The first thing which I saw on looking out of my window the next morning, was a man in front of the castle, with one child on his shoulder, another on his arm, and two or three pulling at the skirts of his coat. "That," said I, "is Mr. Dagg, and the very man for me! One is sure of a hospitable welcome in the house of such a child's playfellow as that." Accordingly when I came down, he hastened to me, gave me a hearty shake of the hand, a hearty welcome to his house, and to breakfast, which was waiting. I found Dagg a thorough Dandie Dinmont. Dandie he used to know; and Hogg, he knew; and he had all the hearty frankness and bluntness of Dandie. He was fond of hares, of hunting, and all field sports; was full of the games where he had been the day before as an umpire, and where he used often to clear off the prizes himself in running and leaping. . . . . .
Mr. Dagg said his father and grandfather had held the same post as himself there before him. Besides this, he was an extensive farmer. How few men are more to be envied than such a one as this Dandie Dinmont of the Northumbrian Border. With a wide scope for all his strong country tastes, and a wife full of intelligence and a love of reading, to make his fireside as cheerful as his own spirit seems to be constitutionally.

Mr. Howitt now steered his course down the north vale of Tyne, by Falstone, Charlton, the seat of the Charltons, an old and powerful Tynedale family, Bellingham, Chipchase, and other places of historical note,—until he came to the Roman wall at Chesters, above Hexham, where, in a howlet-haunted tower, he found yet another old woman and her spinning-wheel.—And thus closes this entertaining record of a very charming ramble, from which Mr. Howitt must have derived much pleasure; while he has for life laid up a store of delightful images and remembrances, and composed a work which will impart enjoyment of the purest and most humanizing kind to thousands.

The remainder of the volume is occupied with an account of the Derwentwater family, apropos to Dilston Hall, one of their seats. It is written by the modern lady of the hall. Its interest is of a different character from the rest of the book; but it communicates some new and authentic facts, regarding the last unfortunate Earl of Derwentwater.

Among the many snatches of old ballads and metrical chronicles which enliven the work, there is a Wanderer's song, written by the author, which is absolutely the best lyric he has ever produced. We cannot resist so apt a conclusion:—

A jolly life, my own sweet wife!
A jolly life 's the wanderer's still,
Though all alone I travel on,
O'er many a Norland moor and hill.

I rise not with the sun, not I;
I let him mount his tow'r and call
The lark into the list'ning sky,
The ousel to the waterfall.

Then up I spring, my window fling
Wide to the sea's delicious roar.
The breakers white, the sails in sight,
These call me to my tramp once more.

The yellow broom nods as I pass;
The gorse breathes orange odours sooth;
The flowers on banks of dewy grass,
Bring back Spring mornings from my youth.

By sandy shore I list the sound
Of rushing waves; I strip, and dash
Amid the billows as they bound,
With shout of joy and giddy splash!

Again I reach the moor-track dim;—
The world of wanderers all is out;—
The pitman grim, the damsel slim,
The jolly boatman short and stout.

The Bondager is in the fields;
The tramper stays to call the town;
And I alone wend gladly on,
Until the sun himself go down.

I cross the brook; I mount the hill;
Gaze o'er the cliff where sea-birds throng;
Where light skiffs sweep, and broad sails fill,
And busy steamers beat along.

The ruined castle beckons me,
The abbey hoar, the forest dell;
By ancient halls I wander free,
And by the hermit's shattered cell.

A jolly life, my own sweet wife!
A jolly life 's the wanderer's still,
Though all alone I journey on,
O'er dusty road and Norland hill.

The cottage dame would know my name;
The sturdy yeoman noddeth free;
The stooping beggar makes his claim,
And talks of battle and of sea.

I meet the brats, I hear the wail
Of woman loaded like a bee,
Who trudges fast o'er hill and dale,
But halts with tears to beg of me.

But lo! the pleasant way-side inn,—
I fling my knapsack on the floor,
Feel tired of tramp, as saints of sin,
And vow that I will budge no more.

The beef-steak smokes—a glorious sight!
The port new life the heart sends through;—
The bread is white, the ale is bright,—
The post brings letters, Love, from you!

What were the vows I made just now,
When faint and weary, worn and chill?—
A jolly life, my own sweet wife,
A jolly life 's the wanderer's still!

MUSINGS IN THE WEN.

THE CROSSINGS, THE GIN-PALACES, &c.

BY A TEMPLAR.

Crossing the Regent's Circus last Sunday, I observed that at each of the four crossings of that little circle, there was a sweeper. Between the Circus and the Haymarket, I counted two men sweeping crossings in Coventry Street. Down Regent Street, in the direction of Waterloo Place, were two more; one was busily sweeping across Regent Street, in front of the County Fire Office, and another from the same corner, at right angles to him, across the lower end of the Quadrant; and along Piccadilly sweepers were to be seen "in number numberless," at the end of every street that opened into it between the Circus and St. James's. There were upwards of twenty of them in a distance not exceeding that between the Register Office and Hanover Street, and the top of the Mound and the corner of George and Hanover Streets. Voluntary labourers are they, in the task of keeping clean the paths which have already been made straight. They lift their brooms or lay them down as suits their inclinations—they drive no bargain beforehand with those for whom they open an unobstructed way—and yet they must find their account in it, as the task can scarcely be plied for amusement. In their beautiful practical faith in the sense of the community, that the labourer is worthy of his hire, the bishop, who rolls smoothly along between his purple-liveried coachman and footman, might read a useful lesson.

In another respect, the prelate might allege, their example is scarcely so edifying. On working days their number is much reduced: it is only on the Sabbath that they are to be found hanging in such bee-like clusters along the street. The cause is obvious; there are not so many halfpence to be picked up on "week days." The income of the sweeper flows from the poorer of the middle-classes, or from those who are only above (if above) himself in circumstances. Rich people never carry coppers, and do not like to give away silver. They pass by the sweeper, as they pass by the post against which his broom is reclined, while he is beating his arms across his body to warm himself. It is from servant maids, shop or errand boys, small hucksters, and the like, that he anticipates the chance halfpenny; and it is only when they are out making holiday that these classes have any halfpence to spare. Their holidays are the sweeper's harvest. Like other people, wise in their generation, he "makes hay while the sun shines." If their masters and mistresses would allow them to make holiday on any other day, he would not "desecrate" the Sabbath from sheer love of the act; but as it is, he cannot help himself. Besides, among the twenty who have set my fancy a-gadding, there are at least ten Lascars, and they of course observe a Sabbath of their own.

There is, however, a class of every-day sweepers, who seem to make it the business of their lives. They are more thinly sown than the Sunday sweepers; but every day, "from morn till dewy eve," you find them at their "accustomed" crossing, as regular as the hero of Gray's elegy. They are a people apart, and have a consuetudinary code of their own: they regard each other's right of property in their respective crossings. Sometimes cases of disputed possession occur; and, as there seem to be no recognised tribunals in their commonwealth, the pleadings are interminable. Like the Jews of old, and the Arabs of the present day, they are apt to lay hold of the first passenger who will lend an ear to them, and say to him, "Do thou be judge between us." A right of appeal to the next good easy man who will allow himself to be stopped, is asserted by the party against whom judgment is given; and a sequence of such appeals renders their litigations almost as interminable as a suit in Chancery.

One fine autumnal morning, as I was loitering about one of the suburbs, two of these disputants, arguing from my leisurely and uncertain pace, seized upon me as a "waif or stray" cast on their domain, and installed me high arbiter between them. It was owing to this chance that I obtained a gauge of the crossings-sweeper's status in society, I might never otherwise have enjoyed. Without entering into all the details of the orations pro and con, it will be sufficient to observe that the claimant complained of the possessor's having obtruded himself into the crossing while he was laid up with a fever in the Middlesex Hospital; while the defendant maintained, that though that might be true, the gentlefolks could not go with their crossing unswept, and that the plaintiff might, now he was recovered, take up some unoccupied one. From the abstract question of right, both diverged into appeals to my humanity; and I learned from the plaintiff (what the other could not deny) that he had nothing but his brooms and his crossing to maintain himself and three motherless children, whilst the other, besides being a much more hale and hearty man, earned a shilling almost every night as supernumerary at the English Opera. It was indeed evident that the stage education of the latter had not been thrown away upon him: there was an air of sentiment in his mute standing at a distance from the passengers, and allowing a little boy, rather sprucely dressed, to apply to them for their small change. Many a tender-hearted milliner has doubtless set him down for one who had seen better days, and still endeavoured to keep his child tidy, regardless of the seediness of his own apparel. These little revelations seemed to bring the rival sweepers within the pale of the "respectable" classes. It was clear that their profession could ensure a livelihood to a steady man of regular habits; and it was equally clear that there were men of genius in it, who aspired to make it do more. The supernumerary of the English Opera belongs to the same class, though moving in an humbler sphere, as the nominal merchant who speculates upon opening a trade with Circassia, or in settlements on the coast of Central America; or as the "literary gentleman" who obtains the applause of a small circle by his avowed writings, and adds to his income by anonymously puffing or cutting up the works of others, whichever pays best—the dirty work of literature.

But crossings-sweepers are not the only professional gentlemen (or ladies) in London who drive a steady regular trade in what might appear to the casual observer mere chance employment. From the cabman who hires his horse and vehicle from some proprietor by the day, down to the mud-lark who picks up coals at low-water in the bed of the Thames, you find in each scrambling pursuit many who, by persevering adherence to the same poor employment, from day to day and from year to year, contrive not only to supply immediate cravings, but to lay up a trifle. The class of cabmen named, and the watermen at coach-stands, form the connecting link between the drivers of the anomalous and anonymous trades under consideration, and those recognised by "society" as legitimate pursuits with distinguishing names. The mud-larks verge upon the more precarious livers who depend for subsistence upon what they can pick up, without inquiring too curiously as to whether it has an owner, or whether that owner is inclined to dispense with it. The mud-larks and cinder-rakers of London are much on a par with the gleaners of the rural districts; with such "damnable iteration" does Nature repeat herself under such varying forms. It is not safe to allow the mud-lark to creep too near a coal barge lest she make more coals fall out than would naturally do so: and we believe reapers and overseers are jealous of gleaners treading too closely on their heels. The gleaner with her accompaniments—blue skies with high white clouds straggling across them—the rustle of the unreaped corn, and the contrast between the golden stubble-field and the trees yet brightly green—may suggest more pleasing images to the painter or poet; but the mud-lark, as she emerges from the ooze of the Thames, (like the heroes of the Dunciad emerging from their dive in Fleet-ditch,) is not a whit more apt to overstep the narrow limits which divide meum from tuum; and it is ten to one that she is, in her department, a much more civilized and sociable being than the other. At all events, the Ruths of London are good enough for the Boazes of Houndsditch and Hollywell Street. Cowper, no eulogist of town life, has drawn a picture of the vegetable souls of the rural poor, to which no large town can produce a parallel. The veriest outcast there finds associates, and is humanized by their intercourse.

The class of which we are speaking—the Lazaruses who, from the abundance of rich men with well-spread tables, are enabled, in London, to elevate the picking up of crumbs to the dignity of a profession—the voluntary occupants of odd corners of the great field of employment, which labour on a larger scale leaves untilled—are perhaps as refined in their feelings and deportment in this metropolis as in any city in the world. The emissaries of statistical societies, and other curious inquirers, who have of late endeavoured to learn the numbers of these people, and the appearance of their homes, bear unvarying testimony to the civility with which they have been received, while going from house to house, taking their unauthorized census. They are a community sufficiently numerous and wealthy to have drawn upon themselves the attention of speculators. The gin-palaces are built and kept up out of their earnings. The artisan, and the unskilled labourers who do the rough work under him, have their pint of beer with their meals, or may occasionally take or give a glass at their house of call. Of late they have been getting fonder of the Temperance Coffee-houses. The regular customers of the gin-palace are the toilers in these squalid unhealthy pursuits which lie on the extreme verge of the realm of industry—in the "debateable land" between Workdom and Thiefdom.

It is worth while for the snug merchant or other member of what ought to be the comfortable classes in a land like ours, to step into a gin-palace occasionally, as he returns home from the theatre or his club. In one corner he will see some veteran out-pensioner, who has encountered an old acquaintance, sunk down to this class, and, for the sake of former days, has stepped in to take a glass. The old hero has perhaps been at Astley's or some minor theatre, and is eloquent about the absurd manner in which the storming of the fort, amid a blaze of blue or red light, was got up; no general ever dreamed of mounting a breach with cavalry. Near these gossips stand a group of dustmen, with a stray chimney-sweep amongst them, puffing at enormously long tobacco-pipes. These are the more select portion of the assemblage; the vestments of the remainder are indescribable—sex, age, and shape, are scarcely distinguishable. They are ragged as if worn for centuries, and filthy as if gathered from the lay-stalls. They are shouldering and pushing to the counter,—all tongues are loosed, and loud and incoherent is their clatter. But, with the exception of brief angry bursts, all is good nature. The gin-palace is a city of refuge, within which the policeman does not intrude, so long as the noise is not very excessive: the inmates know the precarious tenure of their sanctuary, and have acquired the habit of respecting its conditions. Still, the scene is not over-edifying; and those verging on dishonesty are brought into perilous contact with those who have already sunk into the quagmire. And yet every one of the inmates, if remonstrated with for their indulgence in "Old Tom," or "Cream of the Valley," might urge, and with more reason, the plea which Scott has put into the mouth of Maggie Mucklebacket.

Since we have got to the gin-palace, we may as well hover about a little, for the sake of watching those who loiter round its doors of a Sunday morning. The street-sweeper is the only one whose industry encroaches on the rest of the Sabbath; and even in his case, the bulk of the labourers are casual—mere Sunday sweepers, as has already been noticed. For the rest, however, Sunday is a mere cessation from toil. They have become so inured to their haunts that they cannot leave them. The bashfulness of bad clothes keeps them from emerging into the airy and open spaces of the town; and to wander beyond its limits is an enterprise of which they seem as incapable as the fish of taking a walk on shore. Their rest is a wearisome effort; and to dull their sense of it, they repair for a doze to the gin-palace, and then lounge apathetically about its door, relieved for the time from the tedium of their own existence.

This is the true picture of the pariah caste of London—the lowest grade of honesty. They are more conversible than the same class elsewhere, because they are tamed by being accustomed to society. It is mere taming: the human being is not raised above its animal condition. The delusive representation of some popular writers conveys a totally erroneous impression of this class, which has the picturesque of grotesqueness, and nothing more. Startling adventures are as rare in it as in any other; the police keeps it within the bounds of commonplace. The quaint smart sayings attributed to its members are mostly inventions of a higher class, which they learn and repeat by rote. The rabble of London is as void of inventive wit as the rabble of any other place. Whoever would trace to their source the Cockney witticisms which gave the hint, (and no more,) expanded into the Weller budget, must go to another fountain-head. Flash songs and flash tales, convey about as accurate a notion of the street Cockney as Dibdin's songs do of the real Jack tar, or the Donald of the Operahouse of a genuine Highlander. They are composed by a class of mimics and song-writers not clever enough for the minor theatres, ("in the lowest deep a lower depth,") who exert their most sweet voices, and practice their last compositions, for the edification of clerks, shopmen, and country boobies, in the Cider Cellars, the Adelphi Shades, and similar places of midnight rendezvous. It is the scraps of these wit-feasts, caught up by stray conductors of omnibuses, and bandied from one to the other in passing from behind their respective vehicles, that are in time picked up by the class with whom they are by some supposed to originate.

It is probably out of place to moralise on such a subject. In their uncultivated state, these men can only be susceptible of animal pleasures. Their pipe, their pot, and their glass of gin they must have, when they can get it. And somebody must be paid for providing them with it. So any man, who is inclined to trade in this way, may say to himself, "If I don't, another will,"—an argument by which men can reconcile themselves to many strange actions. This is fair enough; but when one finds eminent patriots, before Committees of the House of Commons, attempting to persuade Honourable Members that they have been induced to establish gin-palaces, by an idea that they tended to promote morality—because their publicity, and the want of benches to sit down upon, prevent men from sitting and soaking—one cannot help feeling sick and sad at such coxcombry.

Some such class as this will probably always exist so long as men and the world continue what they are. Human nature can soar high, but it cannot always keep on wing, and at each new flight it must spring upwards from the ground. "We stand in the dirt while we look at the stars," is an old proverb; and some portion or other of society must be smirched by the mud with which it comes in contact. There are minds too unergetic to learn or labour skilfully: there are dregs in society as well as in liquor—we may fine and rack as we please, but some will remain. But this is no reason why we should not try to make it as pure as possible: let men have education—if they reject it, then the fault is their own. And, above all, let us struggle against all laws which have a tendency to drive down, into the class I have been describing, minds which, but for them, would have struggled to keep above it. The questionables are not numerous in a healthy state of society, and they can then be easily kept in check. But when rulers and lawgivers take upon them to be wiser than God Almighty, and undertake to decide what industry profits a country and what must be abstained from—like the farmer in the fable, who prayed to have the distribution of the weather in his own hands—then does their bungling bankrupt and beggar the intelligent and industrious on all hands. Men who have struggled year after year, gradually sinking in the scale of social comfort, at last lose hope, and allow themselves to sink to the bottom. But they do not acquiesce in their fate with the equanimity of those who feel themselves in their natural position. They are seared by misfortune, and envious of all who are or seem more successful than themselves. They are the materials out of which rioters are made, when some accident breaks in upon the ordinary current of society.

Let our rulers look to it: what they call their "policy" is fearfully swelling the numbers of this class. Every moment they put off attending to the growing clamour for bread, is pregnant with danger. "The needy man who hath known better days," has been noted, from the time of Shakspeare, as eminently liable to the seduction of evil prompters. "I will do such things—what they are I yet know not," says poor Lear. When Jaffier saw his doors hedged round by "gaping creditors," and knew he had not "twenty ducats in the world," then it was that Pierre found him in a mood to dream he could redress the wrongs of society by the dagger. It is those who are seared, by feeling themselves driven down to an element of which they are not native, that are what a modern writer terms "the dangerous classes in large towns." The natural mob, or rabble, or whatever they may be called, are too torpid, and too devoid of invention, to do much mischief. Effective rioters—even where there is least apology—are cast-off copying-clerks, dissipated apprentices who have enlisted and been drummed out of the regiment, and such like. Society has enough to do to guard itself against this ragged regiment under any circumstances; but when its numbers are swelled with men who can lay the flattering unction to their souls, that the misgovernment of others, more than their own misdeeds, have made them what they are—then, indeed, "there is danger in them," which, "let thy wisdom fear." Our rulers may rest assured, that if evil come of it, many have deeply sworn, that, cost what it may, they whose heartless apathy has caused the mischief shall suffer most.

MIDDLE TEMPLE, November.

A DROPPED PAPER.

TO THE EDITOR OF TAIT'S MAGAZINE.

MR. EDITOR,—I have long had a great ambition to see some lucubration of my own figuring in the fair printed double columns of your magazine. Being a stanch Tory, I could not promise myself that pleasure from the inditing a political diatribe against these Reforming Times, and hallooing, at the top of my voice, that there has been a tremendous ὁδος κατω ever since the passing of the Reform Bill. Therefore I tried a sonnet in the manner of Haynes Bayley; studded with plaintive lamentations for a fair girl with blue eyes and flaxen hair, and snowy neck, and half-a-dozen etceteras, whom I met plucking flowers somewhere in the south of Utopia. But the censor to whom, with a panting heart, I brought the effusion, just muttered something, of which I only caught the ominous sounds, "Morta Minerva." Dashing the sonnet into the fire—an office which my tutor kindly performed himself to all my Latin verses in more juvenile days—I put on my hat with a dignified air, told my tutor he was an ass, and stalked into the Parliament House. The Court had risen; but I walked up to that weary corner, where so many gentlemen, clothed with the full panoply of gown, &c., but without a brief, "while away the weary hours" in mutual sympathy, or patrol the spacious Court-room, in ever-revolving cycle, like the demons in Vathek. The spot awakened too many painful reminiscences; so I was marching off, when I saw, lying on the ground, a somewhat soiled manuscript. Picking it up, I found it to contain a rhapsody about German Metaphysics, of which your contributor, Mr. De Quincey, is the Atlas, since poor Coleridge retired from the stage.

Now, Mr. Editor, I do maintain, and am ready to demonstrate the position, that the next best thing to composing a paper is to transcribe it. For there are just two things in the matter. There is the thought and the expression. But the expression, because it is so, must contain within itself the elements of the thought; and these bore, Coleridge says, that a symbol must partake, in some measure, of the reality of what it symbolizes. Therefore the writing is just an abbreviated expression of the thought. Doubtless both are best: but the one which contains the other is the more valuable of the two ingredients. Most metaphysically reasoned, my clerk has just ejaculated. Why, in that way my writing is better than your thinking. Don't, my good fellow, too rapidly reduce into maxims what are, a priori, laws. But the editor will be tiring of this palaver. So, for these, and diverse other good and weighty reasons, I transcribed the said rhapsody, and herewith I send the first part of it, which is merely an introduction to the principal; but the latter is very ill-written, and not yet transcribed. I will send it, however, should you like the first part.

1st P.S.—You need be under no apprehensions of the wrath of the author, seeing that, if Jean Paul, after stealing and printing the contents of fifteen letter-boxes belonging to the Quintas, coolly said, he would keep the injured man under his thumb, I may surely bear the wrath of one mystified German "Schwindel Geist."

2d P.S.—Being but a poor German scholar, I trust you will make allowances for the transcribing of hard names from an abominable scrawl.

Yours, &c.

KLEPTES.

"Dans notre enfance nous vivons selon l'imagination: et l'imagination se prend aux formes. L'emploi des mythes est destiné à satisfaire cette faculté. Le mythe n'est autre chose qu'une fiction qui représente la verité."
—Victor Cousin's Nouveaux Fragmens Philosophiques, p. 382.

Schelling was wont to tell a dream which he dreamed one night when a student at Leipsic. He had been studying the "Grundriss der Wissenschaftlehre," which had then newly come out, and collating with it the Treatise of Spinoza de Deo: and he supposed that the two ideas had battled together in his mind, and from the conflict arose the dream. Thus he used to praise the dream, and to say that there was a good kernel within the Mythical shell. He told it as follows:—

When the twilight consciousness, which is the theatre of dreams, awoke within me, I found myself in a valley, whose greenness was variegated (ποικιλη) with many flowers; and there were high blue hills which fenced in the valley; and from them descended a stream which was glittering in the sunshine. It was the hour of noon. There were many people passing up and down that valley, all happy and careless. Many bells, too, were pealing through the valley whose sound made the air melodious; and I thought I heard a well-known strain, the "Christ is arisen," chanted by many voices. Birds were singing sweetly on the trees by the river side, which were green with a June greenness.

Yet could I not linger in that fair valley. For the careless happiness of man and nature met no echo in my soul. I felt I was a searcher for something I found not there.

And I strode, I knew not well why, to the distant hills. There was a path among those hills, alongside of the shining river, which, as I went up, became black and turbid; and its blackened waters seemed to be reflected in my soul, and to cloud all my thoughts. And the sun went down into a far-off sea, whereto flowed the river: and many stars came forth from the bosom of the sunless sky. Their queen, too, came forth with a white-robed planet in her train. And the dark heath of the hills was lightened up again, and rocks, decked with rain-drops, glittered in the moon-beams. Still trode I among those hills, and there was no sound nor any voice to answer my own. But a great stillness brooded over all that country, like chaos before the voice of God rang through the void. And I looked up to the clear and cloudless face of the virgin sky, and called upon her to answer the problem which vexed me; but there was no reply:—the sky looked as calm as ever.

Gradually, as I looked upon the lonely planet, which alone twinkled not, it seemed to move; and, with a soft music—it might be but in thought—moved along the skies, as erst the star of Bethlehem to mark where the Meek One lay. And I followed its motion; and I walked for many miles in the course pointed out by it, which was in a far sinking path among the hills. And they rose higher and viewlessly in distance on either side of it. At length the planet stopped, and its partner in that strange dance stopped also. And it was a deep cave wherein that path ended, and above which the star stood fixed, looking softly with her dead eye of love.

I looked anxiously into the cave, but heard nought but a ceaseless dropping of water along its sides; and I was faint with much exertion, and well nigh turned away in despair. But there came, I knew not whence, a solemn sound like that of an Æolian harp, as if the organ of nature itself was sounding palpably; and the music was like that glorious music which I loved in my childhood—the deep yet harmonious Hundredth Psalm—the music-embodied spirit of Martin Luther. When the music ceased, I heard a small still voice, and yet the sound came as if I heard only the reverberations of the voice on the walls of the cave, and thus it spoke— * * * * *

LIGHTS AND SHADOWS OF LONDON LIFE.*

The attention and interest, which the previous works of this writer on the same fertile subject have excited, in spite of their manifold blemishes and blunders, is proof enough that London is an inexhaustible theme; and that, merely to speak about the great Babylon, is to make sure of a large number of auditors. So far as the present author's powers of description and means of information go, the theme is indeed pretty well run out; but, like an economical manufacturer, even from the fag-ends and waste he contrives to spin out another couple of volumes; with which, however, some good new material is intermixed. The subject with which he opens, Medical Quackery, is of itself copious; and, although he has told several stories which strongly tax the reader's powers of belief, it is too probable that much more extraordinary facts, in the history of quackery, remain to be disclosed. It is but the vulgar quack whose arts are ever fully discovered.

London is the grand emporium for all the quacks of the three kingdoms, and for many of those of the continent; though, like other stars, they often make excursions into the provinces during the dull season, and there reap a rich harvest. Of the metropolis, this writer remarks, as thousands have done before him,

> There is nothing too ridiculous for a London population to swallow; nothing so absurd that they will not at once subscribe to it. Nor is this predisposition to be duped by empirics, this alacrity in reposing faith in the preposterous promises and pledges of quacks, confined to the lower or less informed part of the London population. It is by no means uncommon among the aristocracy, and those whose standing in society implies more than the average amount of education and intelligence. Who does not remember the crowd of aristocratic and fashionable witnesses, the host of lords and ladies, who came forward, fourteen or fifteen years ago, in a court of justice, to bear testimony, in the capacity of his quondam patients, to the distinguished, nay, the unparalleled medical skill of the late St. John Long? And is it not notorious, that at this very hour many of the higher classes are daily becoming the easy dupes of empirics, in all departments of the medical profession?

Among the most strenuous of St. John Long's believers was Sir Francis Burdett, then a Liberal. The person, who of late has done business in the largest way, was Morrison, in whose universal pills a flourishing trade is still carried on. Some of the arts of quacks, to bring themselves and their drugs into notice, are here described. Puffing paragraphs, and advertisements in the newspapers, are of course their main reliance; though their schemes and rogueries are numerous, and often most ingenious; something new being always fallen upon when the old trick grows stale. Small hand-bills copiously distributed; peripatetic advertisers, and chalking, have all had their day. Some Medical Quacks start at once with a book. Here is an awrist of the tribe.

> There lately lived, on the south side of Oxford Street,—I do not know what has become of him now,—an empiric who professed to cure all diseases of the ear, and who surpassed all the other quacks I ever knew, in the article of advertising himself at the cheapest rate, considering the effectual way in which he did it. He was constantly on the look-out among his patients for hapless authors, literary men, or other persons in any way connected with the press; and the moment he discovered any of the "lettered" or philosophical fraternity, he called all his cunning and ingenuity into full play, with the view of turning them to what he called his professional account. If they had influence enough, directly or indirectly, over any journal, to get a puff of the empiric inserted gratis, so much the better; but if they should not be able to do that, it would, he used to say, go hard indeed, if they could not assist him in drawing up a neat paragraph, which some other patient, when put into his hand cut and dry, would get published in some newspaper or periodical, into whose columns he might have access. Some years ago an acquaintance of mine, labouring under a defect of hearing, waited on the empiric in question. The former was instructed to sit down in a chair, and having, in that respect, promptly attended to the commands of his medical monitor, the latter commenced an examination of the ear, and afterwards had recourse, for about a quarter of a minute or so, to the farce of poking in it with an instrument which I am incompetent to describe. "The loss of one's hearing is a great calamity," bawled the empiric into the other's ear, with as self-consequential and oracular an air, as if he had made some marvellous discovery of infinite practical importance.

"It is, indeed," sighed the other.

"Very great misfortune, certainly," resumed the quack.

"It is particularly so to me," observed the patient.

"I don't doubt it, sir, I don't doubt it, sir," pursued the empiric. "Pray, do you follow any particular profession?"

"I am a reader in a newspaper office," answered my acquaintance.

"A reader in a newspaper office, did you say, sir?" remarked the quack, suspending, all of a sudden, the poking process, while his eye and countenance lighted up with exultation at the words.

The patient repeated his statement.

"What is the paper, pray, that you are connected with?"

"The 'Public Ledger,' sir."

"Oh then," remarked the quack, his eye gleaming with ineffable delight, and tossing the instrument for clearing the tunnel of people's ears aside, "Oh, then, perhaps you could get this little paragraph inserted in that journal." And so saying, Dr. G—— handed his patient a small paragraph prepared for the occasion, surcharged with his own praise as a professional man.

"I have no connexion with the editorial department of the paper," remarked the young man, "otherwise I should be glad if I could serve you."

"Oh! but of course you know the editor, and if you ask the insertion of the paragraph as a favour to yourself, he will put it in at once."

In short, the aurist tried every method before he came to the main point.

"Two guineas, sir, is the fee," said this incarnation of cunning and quackery, his fingers quivering in a paroxysm of impatience to clutch the circulating medium.

On the fee being deposited in his hand, he rang the bell by way of intimation to the servant to open the door. "You'll take care that the paragraph appears," remarked the quack, as his patient was in the act of quitting the room.

"I'll do what I can, sir," returned the other.

"And to-morrow, if possible?"

"I'll try."

"Call on me again in a few days, if your hearing be not improved;' it's only half-a-guinea for a second visit."

In noticing a sensible and useful little book, entitled Spectacle Secrets, we exposed the tricks of the eye quacks, and need not return to them here. Quacks, like strolling players, generally assume fictitious names. One of them is noticed, who has changed his name a dozen of times. Quackery, like all other descriptions of fraud, does not once in a hundred times enrich the practisers,

With all their thrift they thrive not, though a few do make great hits; as this one—

One of the most ingenious and successful expedients ever resorted to with the view of practising on the gullibility of the metropolitan public, was hit upon by a quack, who is still alive, and living in great splendour at the West End, on the princely fortune he acquired by his well-conducted empiricism. Being of the humblest birth and origin, and unacquainted with even the most common rudiments of education, he, before commencing business, had the tact to employ a person of dissipated habits, who had been regularly trained up to the medical profession, and to whom a few shillings were everything, to instruct him how to use a certain number of medical terms and professional phrases. Having mastered this preliminary task, he engaged, for six months, at so much per week, six persons, some of whom were porters, and others day-labourers, and, as an inducement to keep the secret, and skilfully to act the part he should allot to them, he held out to them the strong probability of their situations being permanent. These half-dozen persons, not one of whom could read or write, he formed into a Board of Health, to sit daily from ten o'clock till three; while, during the remainder of the day, they were to "make themselves useful" by carrying boards on their shoulders, containing the name and address, and profession of their master; or distributing lilliputian hand-bills, announcing his miraculous medical skill in all diseases, and also the fact that his patients should, in all cases of importance, have the benefit, for a small extra charge, of any advice of his "Board of Health," consisting of the "first physicians in Europe." Previous to this, however, I ought to have observed, he had carefully tutored the Board how they were individually to act. They were instructed, never, on any account, to venture a remark of their own on any case, or in the presence of any patient, but simply to concur in every opinion he expressed, or observation he made, either in audible accents, or by the silent but not less expressive language of a nod of the head. In order to carry out the idea to its greatest practicable extent, and to make the aspect of the Board as imposing as possible, this arch empiric provided suits of black clothes for them of the first quality, together with a fashionable cane for each. The clothes were doffed and the canes laid aside, in an adjoining room, as soon as the various consultations for the day were over; and the "first physicians in Europe" were obliged to encase themselves again in their dirty, tattered, and thread-bare apparel, and resume the undignified employment of carrying large boards on their shoulders, and distributing hand-bills. The thing took amazingly. Whenever a patient waited on the quack, whom the latter deemed one who was in circumstances to pay a little in the shape of extra fees for medical advice, he was invariably told that his case was one of great importance, and must be referred to the Board of Health. Into the presence of their medical highnesses, the patient was accordingly forthwith ushered. There they sat, around a large table, in solemn—affectedly solemn—conclave, leaning on their canes, and looking wondrously wise and attentive, while their chieftain was asking the patient questions respecting the nature and manifestations of his malady. They, of course assented to everything he advanced by way of opinion, either as to the case itself or as regarded the mode of treatment to be adopted. In a short time, the fame of the Board of Health, over the water, (for its locality was on the Surrey side of the river,) soon extended itself far and wide, and patients flocked from all parts of the metropolis to receive the advice of half-a-dozen of the "first physicians in Europe," which I ought not to omit to state, was to be had at a remarkably low rate, considering the usual charges of physicians. The Board existed for many years, and was only dissolved when the proprietor of the establishment thought fit to retire from business, after having made a princely fortune by his ingenious quackery.

A living sample is thus described—

There is now living, in one of the streets leading out of Oxford Street, a consummate quack, who makes experiments with great success on public ignorance and credulity, in the capacity of a physician that can cure all manner of diseases,—who previously appeared in almost every conceivable department of medical charlatanism, always professing to confine himself exclusively to each particular department. He commenced as an eye-doctor; but that would not do: then he appeared, but with no greater success, as an aurist: a year or two afterwards, he undertook the cure of the toothache, without extraction, or indeed without anything. Still the speculation did not answer. He eventually tried, with no better fortune, every other branch of the medical profession; and at last found that to be a universalist, a doctor who could cure every disease brought under his notice, was the only way in which he could hope to fill his pockets, by gulling the public. With each profession, this ingenious empiric changed his name, and also his residence; in two or three instances, indeed, he changed, if there be propriety in the expression, his country; for he suffered his beard to grow into luxuriant mustachios, and, having thus acquired something of the external aspect of a foreigner, he represented himself as Monsieur Malletron from Paris.

In a succeeding chapter, Miscellaneous Quackery is treated; as Quackery in Shoe-blacking, Religion, Publishing, Parliamenteering, the Weather, and so on. The Scientific and Literary Quack is thus presented at full length. Count Fathom was nothing to him.

There is a noted empiric in town at the present moment, whose quackish practices are so varied and multifarious, that it were no easy matter to name a line of business or profession in which he has not at one time or other appeared. In several departments of quackery, he is at this instant carrying on a thriving business.

The history of this empiric is an extraordinary one. He was brought up to the business of a cobbler, at which he worked to the satisfaction of those who intrusted him with the repairs of their damaged boots and shoes, until he had attained the age of twenty-five. He then married; and his soul rising contemporaneously with that event, above his leather and his last, he resolved on earning literary renown, and if possible bettering his pecuniary circumstances at the same time. But the question suggested itself how was this to be done? How was literary distinction, and an improved state of his finances to be achieved? The embryo empiric did not possess a particle of learning,—unless the capability of reading ordinary English in an ordinary way, and writing a tolerable hand, ought to be dignified with the name. An ingenious idea struck him. He resolved on reading a number of works on popular science, and then, having, by means of a pair of scissors and a quantity of paste, dovetailed together the more interesting and more easily comprehensible portions of each book, forming them into a whole. The work thus promptly manufactured, was carefully transcribed by a young acquaintance, who could write a superior hand. An attractive title was next invented, and to give the greater effect to the title, he prefixed to his name, as the author, the honorary term "Professor," and appended to it the initials, "F.R.S. L.L.D.," and several others of an equally imposing kind. The little work found a publisher, and the publisher obtained for it a remunerating sale. The little reputation which "The Professor" thus acquired, by not only stealing other people's ideas, but their very words, did not, however, satisfy his aspirations after literary and scientific fame. Nor did the comparatively slow process of obtaining a name in the world by the publication of books, at all accord with his eager and impatient anxiety to be considered a man of literary note. What, then, was to be done to accelerate his progress to the distinction he coveted, and to his possession of the means which he concluded that distinction would place at his disposal for bettering his pecuniary condition?—a consummation of which, I ought to have already remarked, he never lost sight in his yearnings after literary and scientific celebrity. His ideas on this head proved him to be a genius of no ordinary kind. In the course of five minutes his fertile brain—fertile, I mean, in the way of inventing ways and means of bringing himself into notice—not only formed a philosophic society which was called by the name of the greatest moral philosopher the world ever produced, but represented the society as being in active operation, and including in the list of its directors and members, a multitude of names, which, though altogether unknown to fame, were nevertheless those of persons who were members of all the learned and philosophical societies in Christendom. The number of initials which was appended to each name, was not only extraordinary, but reminded one of the tail of a comet. It was only surprising that the names of gentlemen who could rejoice in being members of such a host of learned bodies, should have been wholly unknown to an "intelligent and discerning public." Yet so it was: nobody had ever, not even by accident, encountered the name of any of these illustrious philosophers; but being unwilling to admit his ignorance of the existence of the attainments of such men, every person concealed his surprise in his own breast. The very first intimation which the public received of the existence of this imposing association of literati and philosophers, was conveyed to them in the shape of a report of their proceedings in a morning paper; the Professor himself figuring as the president and principal speaker. With the assistance of the person already referred to, who was a young man of some education, and whose pecuniary circumstances, coupled with the utter absence of principle in such matters, rendered him the obedient servant and convenient tool of the empiric—the clap-trap report was prepared and sent to the morning journal alluded to. But how, it will be asked, did it find its way into the columns of the paper? Why, the empiric's inventive powers hit upon a very ingenious scheme for the purpose. To the report was appended a resolution purporting to have been carried by deafening acclamations, after most eulogistic speeches by the mover and seconder, to the effect that Jacob Judkins, Esq., the editor of the Morning Intelligencer, had been unanimously appointed honorary member of the V—— Society. The distinguished compliment thus paid to the editor, ensured a ready passport to the entire report into the columns of the Intelligencer. Finding the thing thus far eminently successful, the Professor or empiric, assigned weekly meetings to the non-existent Society, at all of which, as a matter of course, he himself was the principal speaker; and on no occasion did he omit to pay some high-flown compliments to his friend the editor. Week after week did the reports of the proceedings of this distinguished philosophical society appear in the Morning Intelligencer; and the result was that, though no one ever before heard the name of the Professor or his associates, everybody concluded that the former must be some great man, who, in verification of the remark of a Greek historian, that the greatest geniuses often lie concealed, had hitherto remained unknown to the world, in consequence of one of those capricious freaks in which dame Nature (alike regardless of the justice due to the illustrious parties themselves, and the honour and interests of mankind) occasionally delights to indulge herself.

The empiric having thus procured a publicity for his name which must have satisfied the most voracious appetite for newspaper notoriety, next bethought himself of the way in which he could convert his celebrity to the best pecuniary account.

This was as dexterously managed. A meeting of the Society resolved that a testimonial should be given to the Professor's merits in the form of plate.

It was further stated, that in order to allow other "friends of philosophy and admirers of science" who were not members of the V—— Society, but might be desirous of being allowed to express their sense of the Professor's services to science, by recording their names on the subscription list; it was, I say, agreed by the Society, that such persons should have an opportunity of gratifying their feelings by contributing to the testimonial fund. And in order that a good example might be set to all such persons, the members of the Society—no one of whom, be it ever remembered, but the Professor himself, had an existence—appended very handsome subscriptions to their respective names. A treasurer was duly appointed to receive the money, and to retain it until the Society should determine on the nature of the testimonial to be presented to the Professor. This treasurer was none other than the quack himself, though of course under a fictitious name. The appointment of a secretary (also the quack himself), followed, and the meeting agreed that a lithographed copy of the resolution should be forwarded by the secretary to "every known friend of science and philosophy in England," with a request that he would give a practical expression of his sense of the Professor's services to science, by subscribing to the fund. Many of the persons to whom the circulars were sent, knowing nothing more of science than of the Professor, and yet proud of the compliment paid to them by the assumption that they were the friends of philosophy and admirers of science, were prompt in forwarding their subscriptions "in aid of the fund for a testimonial to Professor ——." The subscriptions, which were very considerable, being directed to be sent to his lodgings, addressed to an imaginary treasurer, whom he christened Henry Blunt, Esq.—found their way at once, as a matter of course, into the pockets of the Professor.

At a great dinner, attended by many savans, the plate was of course presented, and the country subscribers satisfied with reading learned and eloquent speeches which were never spoken, save in the newspaper; in which also a Shacabac dinner, consisting of all the delicacies of the season, and the rarest wines, was served up in first-rate style. After quoting these speeches at some length, our author concludes,

Such was the tenor of the report which appeared next morning in the Morning Intelligencer.

Each subscriber fancied that he was the only person absent; and the only drawback to the gratification with which he read the account of the way in which the affair passed off, was, that he had not been apprized of the dinner, so as that he might have had the pleasure of being present.

But what of the Professor now? Since practising the above ingenious and successful piece of empiricism, he has appeared before the public in every conceivable variety of character. Two or three years ago, he became an apostle of tee-totalism, and visited different parts of the country for the purpose of lecturing in favour of an entire abstinence from spirituous liquors, and on the singularly salubrious qualities of cold water in its "aboriginal" state. This of course was at the expense of the Abstinence Societies; but the supplies having somehow or other stopped, after several weeks' advocacy of the cause, he suddenly ceased to waste his eloquence on the merits of that cause. For anything he cared to the contrary, tee-totalism, the moment it failed to afford him pecuniary advantage, may have gone to the dogs—or to any other quarter it pleased.

The next evolution of the Professor, in his character of a quack, was in the capacity of a preacher of the Gospel. My readers may startle at this. It is, nevertheless, melancholy though it be, a sober fact. And there is not the slightest infusion of fancy in the statement I am about to make, namely, that when he had made up his mind to try what could be done in the assumed character of a reverend gentleman, he felt at a loss to decide as to what denomination it would be best for him, in a pecuniary point of view, to profess to belong. He actually had the cool effrontery and the fearful mental profligacy, to ask a friend of mine, when making known his ministerial intentions, what he deemed the section of Christians whom it would be most advisable to connect himself with. Curious to learn to what awful lengths the empiric was prepared to go, my friend asked him what he thought of appearing as a preacher among the Wesleyan Methodists? He objected to any connexion with that body, because he could not conceal from them the circumstance of his being no preacher at all. The peculiar organization of their society, and the rigid supervision observed over all the movements of their ministers, would render it impossible for him to practise the imposture, without detection, for many weeks. "The Baptists, then!" suggested the other. The Professor had a high respect for the Baptists; there were many men of great moral worth and undoubted talent among them; but the prejudices in favour of infant baptism and sprinkling were too general and too strong to admit of their principles or themselves becoming extensively popular. "What do you say to the Independents?" The Professor replied to the latter suggestion, that he certainly thought that body preferable to either of the other two which had been named; and accordingly made his election in its favour. In accordance with this choice he actually forthwith proceeded to engage a chapel, and without any change in his name beyond the prefix of Rev., caused himself to be placarded through a great part of the metropolis as the Rev. A—— B——, minister of the Independent Chapel in T—— Street. In this locality, and this character, he continued, however, for only a limited time. He soon made the discovery that there was little chance of his acquiring either money or reputation in his capacity of a reverend gentleman, and, therefore, in nine or ten weeks, he abdicated his ministerial functions, forsook the Independent Chapel in T—— Street, and reappeared in the newspapers as a person of high sounding scientific and philosophic attainments.

This must have been a shallow, sorry knave. He throve in no walk. We dishonoured Ferdinand Count Fathom by the comparison. His next appearance was as an M.D., the physician to an hospital that never existed, in which capacity he recommended another quack's pills. Is there not some one who takes a malicious pleasure in priming or cramming our author at times? or in experimenting upon the largeness of his swallow? There has no doubt been a Verulam Society, and there are quacks enow in every department, but his Professor out-Herods Herod. Thus is he finally disposed of. Nor would it be worth while to follow his infamous career, save to put people on their guard against all manner of pseudo-professors.

But what is he doing at the present moment? I cannot answer the question, though I still observe his name figuring in the papers as the "Professor."

The last part he played, which has come under my notice, was that of a begging letter-writer. The Mendicity Society have in their possession a goodly number of his epistles, written in this character. Some of these have come under my observation, and are very curious in their way. I shall watch with peculiar interest the future movements of this Protean empiric.

The arts of Begging Impostors occupy a considerable portion of the volumes. But these have already been sufficiently exposed by the published reports of the Mendicity Society, and in the newspapers. We have some doubts as to the new and curious facts on this subject, imparted to the author, or picked up by him, without, as we apprehend, very rigid examination; and in the conjectural statistics of all such statists, from Colquhoun downwards, we place no faith whatever. Still many of the strange things told of begging impostors must be grounded on fact, though we are not prepared to go the length of receiving the whole of the following statements without qualification:—

was the case with blind Williams, so well known in town some years ago. It was ascertained at the time, that his annual income, from his begging-epistles, averaged from £600 to £800. He regularly employed two clerks, at a salary of £80 a-year, in the one case, and £50 in the other. He likewise kept his horse and gig, and might often be seen "showing off" in the most fashionable parts of the town. He kept his mistress also, and on his death, his principal clerk, Joseph Underwood, of whom I shall have to speak hereafter, actually married her, regarding the printed documents and business materials of her late "protector" as equivalent to a fortune. The other clerk of Williams also afterwards established a profitable business, on his own account, in the begging-letter way; but it was not equal to that of his late employer.

A common practice in the begging-letter business is, for a number of impostors to enter into a sort of partnership together, it being found that the trade can generally be carried on most successfully that way. In such cases, however, they do not all "share-and-share alike." The company, if I may so speak, is formed on the banditti principle; in other words, they have always a head who acts in the capacity of a general, and all their movements or "operations," as they themselves phrase it, must be in strict conformity with his instructions. The late notorious Peter Hill, whose case was brought so prominently before the public fifteen or sixteen years since, was the head of one of these companies or gangs. It was ascertained, beyond all question, at the period to which I refer, that the average amount of which the charitable public were daily plundered by the impositions of Peter and his gang, was upwards of £20. His own share, after paying all the subordinates, or his "men," as he used to call them, and after making deductions for expenses in the shape of paper, postage, &c., was not much under £600 a-year.

Of all the begging-letter impostors of whom I have heard, Peter was unrivalled in the facility and success with which he could change his personal appearance. In the course of one day he could assume and sustain, with admirable effect, seven or eight different characters; so that those who saw him, and were conversing with him, at ten o'clock in the morning, might have been in his company at twelve, and never had the slightest suspicion of the fact.

The London police of that day must have been much more easily deceived than their successors. It is well known that the Mendicity Society lately captured the private journal or ledger of a notorious begging letter-writer, which was a great curiosity from the nature of the entries; but some sarcastic wag must have improved on the hint it afforded, and have furnished Mr. Grant with the following jeu d'esprit, probably intended for a Magazine, which he seems to take in sober earnest:—

Some of the begging-letter writers occasionally make droll remarks in their journals, in reference to the result of their applications. The following is a characteristic specimen of a recent case:—

June 20.—Addressed the Duke of Richmond under the name of John Smith; case, leg amputated, out of work for six months, and wife and seven children starving. Result, £2. Not amiss, but hope to be more successful next time.

June 25.—Letter to Bishop of London; name, William Anderson; case, licensed clergyman of the Church of England, but unemployed for four years, and wife dead three weeks ago, leaving five motherless children. Result, no go; too old a bird to be caught with chaff; but try it on again next week.

June 28.—Try Sir Peter Laurie; case, industrious Scotchman, but no employment; lived on bread and water for eight days, but no bread, nor anything to eat, for the last three days; name, John Laurie. Result, referred to the Mendicity Society, Sir Peter being too far north to be done; knowing rogues these Scotchmen; there is no gammoning them.

June 30.—Addressed Sir Peter Durham; case, lost a leg and arm in the service; was one of his men on board the ship Pallas; great destitution; not even as much as to get my timber leg repaired, being broken by accident; name, Jack Scraggs. Result, £5; Sir Peter a regular trump; drink his health in a bottle of best Madeira; have at him again in a fortnight or so; plenty more cases to be got up; plenty more names to assume.

July 4.—Address Lord Wyndford; name, Samuel Downie; case, ruined by attachment to Toryism; have often detected treasonable conspiracies, and been a proscribed man by my former acquaintances in consequence; great hater of Reform, which means Revolution; ready to shed my blood in defence of Church and State. Result, long letter, enclosing half-a-sovereign; miserable work this; won't pay for consumption of time and paper; Wyndford a stingy customer; stingy old boy to deal with; cut the connexion at once.

July 6.—Letter to Lord Holland; name, Jonathan Manson; case, endured for a long series of years a species of living martyrdom for my zeal for Reform principles; was intimately acquainted with Muir, Palmer, and the other Scotch Reformers who suffered in 1794, for their principles; am now struck with palsy; wife dying, and six children without a bed to lie on, a rag to cover them, or a morsel of food of any kind to put into their mouths; most deplorable case altogether; dire necessity that induces to write; great outrage to feelings. Received £5, with a very compassionate letter; the compassion may go to the dogs, but the £5 something substantial; jolly old cock yet; long may he live to lean on his crutches; will go it again; stick it into him at least once a fortnight.

July 3.—Wrote to Lord Brougham; directed to apply to the Mendicity Society; particularly obliged to his lordship for his advice, but would have preferred a sovereign or two; have no wish to make the acquaintance of these Society gentry; wonder how his lordship himself would like their bone-gruel, which they dignify with the name of soup, and to be kept to hard work at the mill to the bargain.

The real impostors are often, however, rogues of great tact, and fertile invention. Our author suggests that, as Romance writers, several of them might have made a fortune. If Romance-writing were "as easy as lying," this might hold. The impositions of common mumpers and street beggars next fall under consideration. They are endless, and as has been well known from the days of Beaumont and Fletcher downward, they are often most ingenious. The very dogs of the blind beggars are as cunning as their masters.

The most original trick among the beggars, which we learn from this book, is committing suicide, by drowning in the Thames in warm weather, and hanging on a lamp-post in winter; a confederate being always at hand to save the "unfortunate man," and of course to make a collection from the humane spectators for his benefit. From the report of a friend who spent a night in jollifying in a beggars' hôtel, our author gives an account of their usual proceedings, which appears about as authentic as the entries of the letter-writer quoted above, or as certain witty police reports that occasionally appear in the newspapers, or as some of the rare anecdotes found in this work. We are far from imputing want of sincerity to the author, but his credulity is marvellous; and, perhaps, this simplicity is the charm of his books.

Rag Fair furnishes material for a curious chapter; and, as comparatively few even of the inhabitants of the great metropolis know either of its whereabout or its usages, one that is novel. "And," says our authority,

There is not a scene in London, more worthy of being witnessed, than that which Rag Fair exhibits. The place in which the fair is held is in the vicinity of Houndsditch. It begins at the end of Cutler Street, leading out of Houndsditch, and proceeds about seventy or eighty feet in an easterward direction. It then embraces a narrow street, called White's Alley, extending about a hundred feet towards the north; thence it again takes an eastward turn, proceeding in a direct line, and extending as far as Petticoat Lane, where it turns to the north and south. Probably the entire length of the locality graced by the presence of the patrons of Rag Fair, may be nearly a quarter of a mile; while the width of the space it occupies varies with the breadth of the streets and lanes in which it is held. The largest of these lanes is dark and dirty. It is quite an era in its existence to be illumed by even the most momentary gleam of sunshine. Any one would find it a perfectly safe speculation to wager any sum his opponent might be pleased to accept, that, for eight consecutive months of the year—namely, from September to May—the sun will not show his face on the pavement of the leading street. It is never dry. While the dust is flying in all directions, to the serious inconvenience of the eyes, the throat, and the nostrils, in the other streets and lanes of the metropolis, the centre of this dark dirty street exhibits a Thames in miniature. Let no one suspect me of exaggeration or hyperbole when I say, that, for centuries past, there has been a substance, at least ankle-deep, constituting a compromise between water and mud, in this particular spot. . . . . .

At what particular period Rag Fair was instituted, is a point which none of our metropolitan antiquaries, so far as I know, have been able to ascertain. That it has existed for centuries is beyond question; there are historical proofs to that effect. It is held every day in the week, Saturday and Sunday excepted. The reason why there is no fair on Saturday is, that the Jews, by whom it is chiefly frequented, hold their Sabbath on that day. The reason of its not being held on our Sunday is, that the law, or rather the local authorities, will not allow it. The fair may be said fairly to commence at half-past one. In the summer season, it is kept up, with great spirit, until about six; in winter, the traffic ceases, and the buyers and sellers quit the place of merchandise, when it becomes too dark to inspect the ragged commodities in which they deal. . . . . .

The quantity of old clothes in Rag Fair is truly astonishing. It is difficult to imagine whence the articles can all have come! One would suppose, the worn-out apparel of the whole population of London was exhibited in it. In addition to the loads under which the thousands of Jews, men, women, and children, who stand in the market-place, groan, there are tables and forms in front of every door and window on either side of the streets, and lanes, and alleys, on which are mountains of old "clo." Of course, as hats, according to the notions that now-a-days prevail in the world, are considered an essential part of one's wardrobe, there is no lack of chapeaus in this mercantile region; and what is more, they are in the most perfect harmony with the articles of woollen manufacture.

The buyers and sellers who congregate in Rag Fair are thorough men of business. They are persons of few words; they have no time for talking. Unlike their brethren in Monmouth Street and Holywell Street, who systematically ask three times as much as they will be glad to accept, they ask the lowest price, or within two or three pence of it, in the first instance.

Eating Houses is a subject on which this author is probably less liable to be deceived than on most others. They are visible; they speak for themselves; they may easily be experimented upon. The writer of a little book, which we noticed some years since, entitled "The Poor Gentleman, or the art of Living in London on a Hundred Pounds a-year, and on Fifty Pounds a-year," fairly exhausted the theme for popular uses; yet the following remarks are worth attention, from incidentally illustrating national character:—

It is a feature in these dining establishments which is worthy of notice, that though, when you go and seat yourself for dinner in them, you may see forty or fifty persons met on a similar purpose, you can have your meal in as much quietness and peace as if you were the only individual present. Nobody will even pass a look with you, far less stare at you to such a degree as either to deprive the articles you have ordered of all relish, or yourself of all stomach. Everybody in these houses scrupulously reduces to practice the popular injunction of "Mind your own business." All is perfect quietness and propriety of conduct. There is no conversation going on beyond, it may be, the exchange of a few words, in the shape of whispers, between two or more friends, who may either have gone to the place to dine together, or met there by accident. . . . . .

Several attempts have been made to establish table d'hôtes in London, similar to those which are so general in Paris and other large continental towns. All such attempts may be said to have proved failures. It is true, that there are still two or three houses in which table d'hôtes are advertised, and to which the public are invited, as if they were flourishing concerns. They are not so. They are attended by very few persons, and want that free and easy air, which is one of the principal elements of the enjoyment afforded by those on the continent.

The most spirited attempt ever made to establish a table d'hôte in London, was made six or seven years ago, by Mr. Leach,—father of the distinguished humorous artist of that name,—then the proprietor of Anderton's hôtel, in Fleet Street. There were three dinners every day, at, if I remember rightly, the respective hours of one, three, and five. The number of persons who sat down each day, varied from fifty to one hundred and fifty. I have been present when the number dining exceeded one hundred and forty. Though the price per head was only eighteen pence, the dinner was most excellent in quality, and ample in quantity. Everything, indeed, was of the very best quality that could be procured. There were the three courses, as at all public dinners: in fact, the table d'hôtes of Mr. Leach were in every respect equal to what is to be had on those public occasions when the ticket is a guinea; only there was not, of course, any wine or dessert. The expectation, indeed, of the thing ever being made to answer, was grounded on the supposition, that a very large majority of those who sat down to dinner, would order a given quantity of wine. The event proved how erroneous was the calculation. Not more than one in twenty "took their wine." They contented themselves with Dr. Wade's favourite beverage, "heavy wet." In some cases, indeed, they acted on the tee-total principle, though tee-totalism was then comparatively unknown. After persevering in the experiment for seven or eight months, Mr. Leach found himself a loser by the speculation to the extent of several thousand pounds.

The principal Fish, and Butchers' Meat, and Vegetable Markets, and the Jews and Quakers, furnish themes, the latter not much to the purpose, perhaps, but which help to eke out the requisite number of pages. But there are other topics discussed, for the selection of which the writer deserves great credit. Among these is the relative condition of the different classes of fellow-rationals and fellow-immortals constituting the society of the Great Metropolis. We have already said that we do not place implicit faith in this writer's statistics; but in the following passage, although his figures should be to some extent erroneous, his sentiment is thoroughly correct:—

All the varied phases of human life are to be witnessed in the metropolis. The extremes of riches and poverty, of luxurious living and the want of the necessaries of life, are hourly exhibited in London, in more marked contrast, perhaps, than in any other place in the world. Little do those in the more fashionable parts of the metropolis, who have been nursed in the lap of opulence, and been always surrounded with a profusion of the luxuries of life; little do they know the deep distress endured by myriads of the lower classes in the central and eastern districts.

It were a curious and not unimportant exercise to inquire into the modes and means of living which obtain in the higher and humbler classes of metropolitan society. Of course the expenditure of aristocratic families varies with the circumstances and habits of the respective heads of those families; but if I were to express an opinion as to the average annual expenditure of each of the 2000 or 3000 titled families who live in London, that opinion would be, that such average expenditure is about £12,000. I have often thought that, if the sum thus yearly dissipated on the follies and extravagances of one family, were judiciously distributed among the poorer classes of our metropolitan population, how vast would be the aggregate amount of happiness of which it would be productive. Supposing, for example, it were divided into sums of £12, and that that amount were given to as many families as there are £12 in £12,000, the benefaction would raise no fewer than 1000 families, at present enduring all the horrors of want, to a condition of comparative comfort. . . . . .

It is painful to think that the aristocracy should feel so little sympathy with the fate of the suffering poor. If they were only to sympathize with those of their fellow-creatures in London, who are doomed to struggle with privations which almost overmaster their powers of endurance, they could never bring themselves to expend such immense sums in mere folly and display; while thousands, and tens of thousands, of those around them, are suffering all the horrors of the deepest poverty. I knew instances in which fashionable families of the West End expend £500 on a single rout. Has it never occurred to these persons that, had this sum been judiciously expended on the famishing poor, it would have provided a plenteous and healthful meal (assuming the expense of such meal to be sixpence) on no fewer than 20,000, out of the 50,000 already referred to as rising every morning from their beds without knowing where they are to procure a meal, or whether one is to be procured at all.

I wish this culpable extravagance were confined to persons moving in aristocratic circles. It prevails, unhappily, to a very great extent among persons in the middle ranks of life. Many of our metropolitan professional men—physicians, lawyers, and others—live at the rate of £3000 or £4000 per annum; while thousands of our city merchants and other tradesmen expend twice that sum. Even some of our literary men, ambitious of aping the manners and expenditure of the great, are in the habit of giving occasional dinners, the cost of which varies from £70 to £100. One instance of a dinner lately given by a literary gentleman to a party of his friends, came under my notice, the expenses of which amounted to upwards of £125. Such extravagance is, in any case, foolish; as well as at variance with right feeling. In the case of literary men it is especially so, for few of them are in circumstances to afford it; or if they be this year, their pecuniary affairs may be in a very different position next year. Of all professions, that of literature is the most precarious. The annals of modern literature are crowded with most painful illustrations of the truth of these observations.

The extravagance which prevails among the middle classes is not, perhaps, so strikingly seen in anything as in the costliness of their furniture. The late Mr. Hope, author of "Anastasius," furnished his residence at the enormous expense, including his pictures, of £300,000.

Of the men of the present day, not claiming aristocratic connexions, there is none so celebrated for the indulgence of an expensive taste in furniture, as Mr. Broadwood, the brewer, son of the late Mr. Broadwood, the eminent pianoforte maker. The former gentleman, who, it ought to be mentioned, is a bachelor, and only keeps a suit of chambers in the Albany, Burlington Street, is said to have a collection of antique furniture in his drawing-room alone, which cost upwards of £15,000.

From a section upon Dress-makers and Milliners' Assistants, the number of whom is probably rather overrated at 15,000, though it must be very great, we extract the account of their hours of labour, which are excessive, and as incompatible with health as with the ends of a rational, probationary existence.

The usual hour at which dress-makers' assistants commence their labours, is seven in the morning, and that at which they close for the day is eleven at night. One half-hour more elapses before they can retire to rest, and in order to be ready to resume their needle at seven in the morning, they must at least get up by half-past six. The average amount of time, therefore, which is allotted them for rest, does not exceed seven hours. This would be obviously too little for delicate female frames—especially at the critical time of life at which by far the largest portion of these girls are apprenticed—even were their labours light and of short duration during the day. But the very reverse is the painful fact: they ply the needle without a moment's intermission, save the twenty or thirty minutes allowed them for eating their meals, from the time they enter the work-room, until they have quitted it for the night. Now, surely it needs no medical genius to tell us, that to poor young delicate creatures thus worn out day after day for a succession of months, with fourteen or fifteen hours' unintermitting toil, seven hours' repose is not only inadequate to meet the requirements of nature, but must be attended with the greatest perils to the constitution. Nor ought I to omit the mention of the fact, that the little repose allowed them is deprived of its beneficial effects, by the circumstance of from ten to twelve of their number being compelled to sleep in one small confined bed-room.

But the evil if merely regarded in a physical light, does not end here. In addition to the injurious effects of these protracted hours of exhausting employment on the bodily health and spirits of these girls, they are pent up, during the day, in heated rooms, where the luxury of a mouthful of pure air is seldom enjoyed. Their meals, too, which are entirely of a coarse description, and altogether unfitted for the subdued and delicate appetite of creatures thus employed in sedentary labour from morn to night are snatched up with an expedition which deprives their food of half its nutritive qualities. As for digestion, who could expect that process to go on, when the transition from the eating-apartment to the work-table is contemporaneous with the last mouthful they have swallowed! Air and exercise are things unknown to them; and to aggravate the physical hardships of their condition, they are, in the majority of cases, subjected to insults and to irritating language from those in whose employment it is their hard lot to be.

Such is the usual fate of dress-makers' assistants, in what is called "the season," which season usually lasts four or five months of the year, beginning in February and ending in July. There is a second season, of two or three months' duration, towards the end of the year, which, though not so oppressive as the first, is still very arduous. On urgent occasions, such as a drawing-room, a ball, or other greater display at court, the hardships of the poor assistants are increased ten-fold.

One case is mentioned of a young and delicate girl who was not permitted to lay herself down on a bed, or even on a sofa, for nine days and nights. But the fact is impossible. If she had not dropt her needle in less than half that time, it must have been because she had fallen down herself. What follows is unhappily less questionable:—

I have myself known young females come up from the country to serve two years' apprenticeship with a London dress-maker, with the view of returning to their native place, and there commencing business for themselves. They have come to London with the bloom of health on their cheeks, a flow of animal spirits in their manner and conversation, and a general appearance of life about them, which were delightful to witness; but before four months had elapsed, I have seen them so pale, emaciated, dispirited, and altered in their appearance, that their own relations could hardly have recognised them.

But the injury done to their health is not the only evil which results from the deplorable situation of dress-makers' assistants. Anxiety to escape from their bondage, disposes them to seize with eagerness on any offer of marriage which may be made to them, without bestowing much consideration on the disposition of the party, or his character or circumstances. Hence, innumerable unhappy marriages are the result.

Nor is this all. The unhappy condition of young dress-makers renders them an easy prey to the evil designs of the profligate of the other sex. An idle protestation of love, mendaciously made, is readily believed by them, and an immediate deviation from the paths of virtue follows. By and by this first and solitary aberration from the path of innocence, is succeeded by their entire abandonment to a guilty course of life, as a means of obtaining a livelihood. Those who have devoted much attention to the subject, assure me, that the number of dress-makers' assistants to be found among the wretched creatures who walk the streets, is very great.

Most of the young dress-makers, especially in the West End, have been brought up in circumstances of comparative comfort, and have received a fair, if not a finished, education; but their parents being either dead, or not in a condition to provide for them any longer, they have been placed under the necessity of doing something for their own support, and hence, as the most likely means of earning a subsistence, have made up their minds to acquire a knowledge of dress-making. It need not be added, that, having been thus brought up in easy circumstances, and receiving the advantages of a respectable education, they are thereby rendered peculiarly sensitive to the hardships of their lot. Their delicate frames suffer greatly, and their susceptible feelings are keenly wounded where females of more robust constitutions and less cultivated minds, would neither receive injury nor suffer annoyance. Far preferable to their condition is that of the house-maid or the servant-of-all-work. The latter in most instances is not worse off now, than, in all probability, she was during the whole of her life; while she has usually the advantage of comfortable meals, and in all cases the benefit of more or less exercise.

But what perhaps constitutes the greatest aggravation of the miseries of the poor dress-makers' assistant, is the fact of her pitiable condition being unpitied. The mistress for whom she toils day and night, has no commiseration to expend on her; but, on the contrary, as before remarked, deepens the distress consequent on her monotonous and irksome labours, by the tyrannical conduct she practises towards her. Nor has the poor creature the most slender share in the sympathies of those for the adornment of whose persons she exercises her taste and wastes her energies. They think of the dresses which she is engaged in making for them, but have not a thought to bestow upon her. Ah! little does the high-born and high-bred beauty, who is to figure in the ball or at the drawing-room; little does she think, while exulting in the anticipated conquests she will make or the impression she will produce, of the jaded condition, the almost broken hearts of the poor delicate creatures, who at that moment are not only wasting their strength, but it may be their lives, in the preparation of the dress in which she is to appear. . . . .

A word or two now in reference to the mistresses of these poor creatures. In the majority of cases—especially in the West End—mistress milliners and dress-makers live in great splendour. They rent large and fashionable houses, and furnish them in a style of great magnificence; have a large retinue of servants; receive formal visiters; and give expensive parties! In fact, it were difficult to distinguish from the style of furniture and general aspect of their houses, between many of our mistress dress-makers and aristocratic families. Need I add that the contrast between their condition and that of their miserable assistants, only aggravates the wretchedness of the latter!

We are far from certain that all is gold which glitters among the mistresses, but the sufferings and probable destiny of too many of the assistants are facts beyond dispute. Our author hopes that those who interest themselves for their black fellow-creatures will not continue to overlook this most interesting class of neglected and suffering creatures. A very great number of other young women in London, as in all the greater towns, obtain a scanty subsistence (for a living it cannot be called) by their needles, as shirt-makers, collar and stock-makers, book-stitchers, fur and carpet-bag sewers, &c. &c. Their condition, though not worse, or not quite so bad, with respect to long hours during any part of the year, is much worse in point of wages than that of the dress-makers. Their average earnings do not exceed six shillings a-week; but their wages are often under that sum. Many of the best and most industrious hands can, at shirt-making, earn only ninepence a-day, so low is the rate of remuneration for this article. Those that work at furs earn rather more, but their work fails in summer. The utmost that is assumed as the average weekly gains of these young women, when the best and worst trades are taken together, is eight shillings; yet we cannot see how that is made out, if the previous statements are correct. The best paid are the book folders and stitchers in certain large establishments, some of whom earn ten shillings weekly. This writer's opinion on one point connected with the condition of these girls, and of others employed in a similar way, is not only charitable, but, we believe, just; and we cite it the more gladly, that we have seen other late pretended statistical works representing nearly this entire class of young women as corrupted, and as procuring dress by illegitimate means. In noticing the extent to which they generally indulge in showy dress, he observes:—

To me it appears that in most cases the circumstance may be accounted for from the fact of their living with their parents or near relations, who lodge and board them either gratuitously, or for a mere trifle; and thus enable them to expend nearly all their earnings on dress. In other instances, where the parents of the girls are not in a condition to afford them this assistance, they submit to many privations in the way of meals, in order that they may be able to indulge their passion for dress. Many of them, in the inferior houses, scarcely ever partake of any other food than a cup of tea and a slice of bread, morning and evening; and a crust of bread and a morsel of cheese in the middle of the day.

The entire number of the young women thus earning their daily bread, is assumed at 37,800; and all of them who are without other honest resources and the protection of friends must be in an unsafe and an uncomfortable condition, and one which indeed "stands in urgent need, morally and socially, of amelioration." He who comes forward to make the attempt, will not only merit the gratitude of the poor creatures themselves, but should be hailed by society as a genuine philanthropist.

This we consider the most important and really valuable chapter in these volumes; and we earnestly hope that it may fulfil the benevolent intentions of the writer. In the Strictures on Female Servants, we find nothing novel, save the notice of an institution which should be imitated in every town. It is of a Servants' Home, with which a Registry is connected, where a temporary home or refuge is provided for young women of good character out of place, and where means are taken to find them suitable situations. How much suffering, misery, despair, and actual vice and crime, arising from destitution, might not such an establishment prevent in all great towns. As to the methods proposed for reforming female servants, although it be in general true that all reforms—all great improvements—proceed upward from the lower classes, and are forced upon the higher—yet improvement within doors, instead of marching upwards, must, we apprehend, to be effectual, begin above, and descend down stairs. It is quite as sure that good mistresses will, in general, make good servants, as that good mothers will be blessed with good children.

The work includes one of the latest miracles of modern London—the public vehicles, and their conductors, who are verily a people as peculiar as the Jews, with whom it closes. From the chapter on Benevolent Institutions, one might be led to imagine that there is no misery known in London, for which the fitting antidote is not liberally provided. We need but recur to the preceding chapters to learn how fallacious is this opinion.

THE RECOVERED MANIAC'S LAST LETTER TO HIS BEAUTIFUL PHYSICIAN.

"The girl was virtuous, intelligent, and lovely, and encouraged his visits when she was told that she was benefiting his mental health. She asked him if he could read and write. He answered no. She wrote some lines to him, to induce him to learn. This had the desired effect. He applied himself to study, and soon wrote good and sensible letters to her."—Combe's Notes on the United States.

How oft, and yet how vainly, do I strive
To comprehend the darkness of the past;—
To have, so long, been what is called alive,
Unheeding summer's sun and winter's blast;—
Moving among the various and the vast,
Insensible to wonder and delight,
To hope, and fear, and shame; and thus, at last,
Emerge from that most miserable night,
Bringing life's shattered lamp for love to reunite.

Maiden! 't is a strange lot,—ay, much too strange
For my so lately quickened heart and brain
To feel secure, lest th' all-glorious change,
Wrought by thy loveliness, may pass again
Like April's wandering sunbeams,—lest the chain
Which melted, at thy presence, from my mind,
As Spring melts Winter's snow from peak and plain,
May be, by some dread power, again designed
With its most callous links my sinking soul to bind.

Yet deem not that my melancholy gaze
Is more allied to madness than despair;
Or that aught, but the loss of thee, can craze
One whom thou hast delivered from the lair
Of that relentless monster. Lady fair!
With thine eyes' light upon me, I defy
All the stern powers of darkness to ensnare
My reason in their net, though they should try
To force me back again with hell's whole enginery!

That eye averted, and that light withdrawn,
Mercy might summon madness to my aid,
To root out all remembrance of the lawn
Which in my life's black forest thou hast made.
Ah, woe is me! that this bright dream must fade,
Or haunt my prostrate heart with such unrest,
As Evil's most inexorable shade
Inflicts for ever on the guilty breast,
Till it becomes the lord, where first 't was but the guest.

Yet I have known no guilt. It was no crime
Of my committing, that shut out the light
Of reason from my boyhood,—blending time,
And scene, and circumstance, in dreamless night,
And hanging round the circle of my sight
The damp unfeeling darkness of the grave:
And yet thy beauty had sufficient might
To penetrate that dismal prison-cave,
From which no power but thine my worthless heart could save.

Angels have visited the sons of men,
When the worst shape of tyranny did make
The quiet nooks of the green earth its den,
And in the blood of peasants strove to slake
A thirst that is insatiate.—They did wake,
Within those lowly hinds, the latent fire
Whose embers still defy oppression's rake;
And suddenly uprose each son and sire
To strangle on their hearths the sordid slaves of hire.

Spirits have answered the inquiring mind,
Resolving mysteries of faith and fate;
Genius and Truth have been to human kind
An ever-active power, to recreate
The purity of that primeval state
Which crime has so obscured.—But, maiden! naught
In all the ages of our nature's date,
Has to another brain and bosom brought,
As thou didst bring to mine, through love, the light of thought!

Thy glorious image, in my heart enshrined,
Seems ever animating Nature's face
With flashes of a spirit more refined
Than any which the multitude can trace
In the cold common earth.—It doth embrace
All objects that the eye can gaze upon,— Brightening and blending hues, and giving grace
To all the various forms that float and run
Beneath the quickening glance of the all-circling sun.

The morn I met thee was a sunny morn,
And dewy flowers were glittering in its light;
The wind swept softly o'er the green-eared corn,
To rouse it from the slumbers of the night;
And the small branches of the forest's height
Were waving like a banner o'er its head;
And harmonies and odours did unite,
With all the forms of beauty which they fed,
In vain, from my crushed heart to lift its weight of lead;—
Until thy form was added to the scene;—
Until thy glowing face and kindling eye
Turned into shade the very morning's sheen,
And from the Spirits of the earth and sky
Drew forth a wondering and admiring sigh:—
For little thought they ever to behold
Beauty that should their brightest nymphs outvie
In any human thing,—whose mortal mould
Has little else but tales of crime and misery told!

The music of thy voice fell on my ear,
Rousing, like the last trumpet, from the dead
The mind's long-dormant energies; while clear,
And deep, and soft, its magic accents spread
A web of glory round my loosened head,
And wove a robe of light for my cold breast,
Beneath whose radiance naked madness fled,
To find, in some dark cell, that gloomy rest
Which it may seek in vain where Love becomes a guest!

Thus I beheld thee! Thus the vision wrought
The restoration of my wandering mind;
Yet is there more than madness with the thought
Of thine approaching bridal-rite combined.
Words would but mock a misery so refined,
Should I attempt to garment it in speech;
And never was a doom to man assigned,
(A lesson of endurance e'en to teach,)
That flung a feeble heart so high above hope's reach.

Flowers bloom not on the lofty mountain's brow,
But its untrodden wreath of snow is pure;
There, though in Beauty's ear Love breathes no vow,
A Spirit dwells from Falsehood's voice secure,—
And from the thousand phantasms that lure
The fickle and the foolish on their way,—
Communing but with objects that endure,
Nor subjected to any other sway
But His whose hand leads on alternate night and day.

While there is beauty in the earth and sky
There may be peace in some sequestered nook.
Maiden! if thou art happy, I will try
In sober sadness on my lot to look.
Though thou art gone, shall I be all forsook
By those delightful thoughts thy presence gave
When sombre madness to its centre shook,
And trembling, like a superstitious slave,
Departed to the gloom of its own hopeless grave?

JEANNETTE THE FEARLESS.

A ROMANTIC TALE: FOUNDED ON AN INCIDENT IN THE RETURN OF THE FLEET FROM TRAFALGAR.

"Major in exiguo regnabat corpore virtus."—STATIUS.

In our most joyous hours,—when we yield ourselves up to the abandon of careless gaiety and pleasure—when our hearts are light as the gossamer, and volatile as the zephyr which lifts it from the ground—when all the earth looks bright, and we forget for a while that there is sorrow or sadness on its surface, that canker riots in the greenest bud, and the serpent lurks beneath the flower!—that moment would seem to be specially chosen by the Demon to remind us that we are fallen, by fiercely demonstrating the power which pristine error has imparted to the enemy of human kind. From behind the curtain of life, while before it in all the glare of gayest revelry, we, "players merely," are disporting our antics in unbridled mirth, he protrudes his grisly head, and grins and gibbers in the midst of our enjoyment, chuckling with fiendish exultation over the combustion which will speedily blaze out amidst all our fragile scene-work and tinsel finery, and mixing the terrible ingredients of a deadly poison, to be heedlessly drained by us with our most intoxicating draught of pleasure.

It is some compensation for the frailty of our common nature, and for the evils which that frailty entails upon its possessors, that virtue has a power of self-sustainment which can blunt the sharpest arrows of misfortune; that heroic souls may dwell even in the slightest forms; that the feebleness of age and sex may be canonized by the firmest resolution; and that the great lesson of tranquil and silent suffering is often most forcibly inculcated in quarters where human eyes would detect nothing but weakness,—a benignant Providence outstripping in their case the efforts of stoic indifference and philosophic pride to support the pressure of calamity.

JEANNETTE JACQUELINE was young,—she had but reached her nineteenth year; lively and intelligent, as the soul which flashed through her eloquent eyes abundantly demonstrated; and singularly beautiful, as the recollection of every surviving seaman who had the good fortune to see her, when she was lifted almost lifeless on board the Belleisle, will readily testify. Her face was one to be remembered for ever. In the words of a French prisoner of rank, who shared her fate at Trafalgar, it was a face "pour faire tourner la tête la plus dure." Her large and full dark eyes denoted her Burgundian orgin; and her forehead, white and smooth as sculptured marble, had its clear albâtre relieved by the most beautifully pencilled brows; while a rich profusion of raven locks, glossy and silken, clustered in natural ringlets round a face, whose charms were not (as is the case with most of her countrywomen) confined to a single feature —the lustrous and soul-piercing eyes—but equably diffused over all. Artless simplicity gave an added sweetness; candour and benevolence left everywhere their impress in the breathing beauty of the mind. Lips redolent of roseate freshness; teeth of the purest pearly whiteness; a delicately rounded cheek, bespread with peach-like bloom; a contour altogether classic and statuesque;—all these harmonizing, blending, and relieving each other with that marvellous symmetry which fixes the eye upon some master-piece of art—the divine creation of a Phidias or a Canova—and forbids it to select one feature upon which to dwell, where all are perfect—where each by its position imparts and derives a "double charm:"—such was the unexaggerated character of Jeannette's beauty, when, six months before, she was the flower of the village of Sainte Marie, within a few leagues' distance of Charmes on the Moselle.

Jeannette was the youngest of six children—the promising family of a comfortable farmer; or (to speak more accurately) of a small landed proprietor —for the Directory had recently broken up the large estates, and completely altered the territorial tenures. The migration, which in several instances ensued upon this memorable change, had attracted her father northwards from Burgundy to the fertile territory which is watered by the Moselle. Of the four sons, two had already been draughted off by the military conscription; one remained at home to aid his father in the management of the farm; Jeannette, assisted by a younger sister, modestly superintended the dairy and the poultry-yard; and the youngest boy was prosecuting his studies at Rheims, being intended for the profession of the law, of which one of his maternal uncles was a distinguished member.

It were strange, indeed, if a maiden of Jeannette's superior attractions—brought up, too, under the eye of a most excellent mother, whose amiable as well as valuable qualities, together with an unruffled sweetness of temper, she was generally reputed to inherit—had not gathered upon herself, as with a lens, the rays of passion, and glances of love, which sped from the hearts and eyes of the neighbouring swains. And gather them she did (although unwittingly) in abundance. It is not our purpose to lay the full particulars of unsuccessful courtships and rejected offers before our readers. Suffice it, that Jeannette's heart, though it had long been sued for in vain, was found at last to be not inexorable. A manly, and high-souled youth, Auguste Choiseul by name, became the chosen companion of her evening walks on the banks of the delicious Moselle, which, here a pleasant streamlet, flows gently with sloping vineyards on either side, and swelling in its course, pours its blue waters onward amid the most enchanting scenery, till it mingles with the storied Rhine at Coblenz.

By the margent of this infant flood, were Auguste and Jeannette to be seen every evening at dusk, gathering the fairest of the wild flowers that grow in neglected abundance on the green sward which skirts the stream, or watching the rising of a favourite star, or hailing the silver radiance of the still lovelier moon, and poring together by her mild benignant light over the beautiful pastorals of Florian, so sweetly in unison with that delightful scene. Auguste would read aloud, yet with subdued emphasis that denoted the depth of feeling within; and Jeannette would listen to the rich tones of his manly voice, while a tear stood in her eye, as the fervent language of the poet painted the sorrows of Galatée or Estelle; and, as she walked hand-in-hand with her Auguste—her accepted lover, and the accepted of her parents—she would gaze into his dark eyes, and whisper with a tremulous voice:—"My Auguste, we are not destined to sorrows like theirs,—our lot is of unmingled happiness!" Alas, for the fallacy of human hopes!

The fête of St. Mary of the Valley fell upon a beautiful day in August. The beautiful rustic church was adorned for this occasion with all that purity of taste and simple elegance for which the inhabitants of this district are famed. The ancient image of the Virgin, reared upon a central and elevated platform, was attired in the richest silks, garnished with gold and strings of pearl. Her pantouffles were of embroidered satin, adorned with the most tastefully disposed rosettes; and the bracelets which encircled her arms, as well as her necklace of brilliants and antique ear-pendants, were supplied from the Château. A diadem, that sparkled in the eyes of the villagers with imperial lustre, encircled her brows, and the effigy of the infant God in her arms bore a crown which they believed to be unrivalled in its magnificence. Clusters of waxen tapers dazzled the eye in every part of the church, and sparkled with reflected beams amidst the ornamental parure which, upon this favourite festival, lavishly decked the image of the village protectress. In the most conspicuous portions of the houses of the more pious inhabitants, smaller figures of La Sainte Vierge were adorned with scarcely inferior care, and lighted tapers were placed in her hand, as well as in that of her blessed Son. Placed at such a distance from Paris, these happy villagers knew little of those recent events with which the world had been made to ring, and sympathized still less with their promoters.

The service of the day was duly performed. Incense floated to the roof of the Gothic pile. The solemn Mass was chanted at the altar; and the responses given, if not with cultivated skill, at least with natural taste, and unmixed fervour, by the village choir. The "Salve, Regina!" and the "Alma Redemptoris Mater!" were sung by fifty voices; the éloge of the Virgin's transcendant merits was pronounced from the beautifully carved pulpit by the curé; the salût, with all its gorgeous attributes, incense and cope, and crystal "pyx," and the swelling strain:

Pange, lingua, gloriosi
Corporis mysterium!

all these rites were accomplished with the wonted continental punctiliousness. The Church poured forth its stream of eager votaries; and the village green became the universal point of attraction. In the centre was erected an image of the Virgin, and round this were placed rows of benches, on which the elder portion of the community proceeded to take their seats. At one side, the village band of musicians occupied an elevated position, and, after sundry efforts of preparatory dissonance to secure the "concord of sweet sounds," as lively an air was struck up, as if revelry and not worship were the work from which they had just proceeded. Places were soon taken, and the spirit-stirring contre danse was at once commenced with all that enthusiasm which is so peculiarly French, and upon a scale so extensive that it would have puzzled the most skilled in the evolutions of a modern drawing-room. In this first dance, it is scarcely necessary to state, that Auguste and Jeannette were partners. With conscious pride did their parents survey their graceful movements; and a pair more suited for each other it would indeed be difficult to conceive.

Of the beauty of Jeannette's face we have already endeavoured to convey some faint notion. The exquisite symmetry of her form we shall find it still more difficult to portray. Rather mignonne than otherwise, her shape was of that peculiar excellence which, under every new phase, exhibits a new beauty. The bust was perfection, and its exquisite snowy swell, slightly revealed according to the custom of that day, might have diverted a follower of the Prophet from his first glimpse of Paradise. The arms hung, as if a sculptor had disposed them. The beautiful neck, with which was disclosed a portion of the smooth and pearl-tinted shoulders, supported the small and lovely head at that precise angle which is characterized as the line of beauty. The tournure was the very limit of grace; the limbs floating in native and unconstrained freedom displayed to the captive eye the untaught "poetry of motion." The jupon revealed by the outer robe, which was gracefully festooned with a bow at either side, did not descend so low as altogether to shroud the symmetry of a matchless ancle; and the foot—"ce petit pied d'amour!"—which might have exercised the fancy of a hundred sonneteers, with half its charms untold, tapered away beneath a high-arched instep into a graceful minceté, which completed the picture of bewitching loveliness.

Upon this exquisite figure the eyes of old and young were centred. Of Jeannette's dancing it is enough to say that it was worthy her natural gifts, and of her partner that he was worthy of her. Of a commanding figure, yet not too tall; square-shouldered, deep-chested, and lightly limbed; erect in stature, with a head nobly set, manly features, clustering curls, and the eye of an eagle, Auguste was no disgrace to the hand, which was his for the dance, and was destined to be his for life. No eye could trace disparity in their personal accomplishments, as there was none whatever in their social stations. Both were the children of respectable, though small, proprietors of land in the same commune. Even the jaundiced eyes of envy could detect no flaw in Auguste's reputation; her croaking voice would not dare to forbid the bans. While affection hallowed, worldly suitableness sanctioned the union; the necessary preliminaries had all been adjusted; and the nuptials were fixed to take place within the octave of the present festival.

The dancing was succeeded by those rural sports, of which the French are so passionately fond. Mâts de cocagne exercised the youthful; and the graceful games of running in a sack for a prize, and straining to retain possession of refractory pigs by their caudal appendage—the said appendage being carefully soaped beforehand—employed the energies of many of the older; while the more manly sports of shooting with the "arc à la perche," and the "grand arbaléte," leaping, and flinging the bar, occupied the more ambitious amongst the adult male community. Music, instrumental and vocal, filled up the intervals of varied amusement. The delicious wine which the banks of the Moselle abundantly produce, circled freely, but not intemperately, amongst the festive groups which dined that day al' fresco, old as well as young—meats prepared on the previous day, and an unbounded profusion of fruit, constituting the bulk of the repast. Health and contentment formed a more potent sauce than the most piquant condiment of palaces; and in the jocund laugh which arose from every group there sounded nothing hollow.

Marmontel has drawn a very pleasant picture of a species of Optimist Island—a philosophical El Dorado, where the customs and institutions of the old world are unknown, where (prok pudor!) a temporary choice usurps the place of marriage; and the earth supplies the dwellers thereon with a spontaneous sufficiency:—a richly tinted cabinet-picture, which looks pretty in the closet where it is painted, but fades the moment it is exposed to the glare of day! All that is rational in the enjoyment which Marmontel describes—all that is reconcilable with the promptings of the unstained soul, was realized that day by the happy villagers of Sainte Marie. In every large assemblage, whether in town or country, the leaven of iniquity is sure to be mixed up; but here there was perhaps as much of innocence as can fall to the lot of our chequered humanity.

A clapping of hands from the untutored master of the ceremonies, and a coup d'archet from the leading violinist, summoned the dancers once more together. The oldest couple in the village was this time amongst the figurans; and even lameness took part in the amusement, without eliciting one unkind remark from the amiable and genuine politeness which uniformly presides in France over these rustic merry-makings. The dancing, as usual, waxed warmer and more excited, as the evening grew later. Featly they footed it in the midst of the figure "L'Eét;" and it is doubtful whether a single soul amongst them was aware of a hostile approach, when they were suddenly surrounded by armed men!

"Yield up your gay galliards to the naval conscription, in the name of the Republic!" exclaimed a man of stentorian lungs, the leader of the band. "If they would dance, it must be on the ocean, en face de ces chiens d'Anglais!"

Consternation, terror, dismay, took possession of the souls of the villagers. Mothers trembled for their sons; girls for their lovers; the old for their protectors; the young for their companions. The air was filled with lamentation, but in vain. The conscription is inexorable!

It is needless to dwell on the details of a heart-rending scene. The band which surprised the peaceful village of Sainte Marie, acted under the immediate orders of the Directory. The ports of France had been ransacked for sailors, and the rural districts must furnish their quota of marines. Food for powder must be extensively provided, and all for the glory of France! Unlike our own press-gangs, these men acted with a show of legal regularity. The village roll was called over, and the ages of the several inhabitants extracted from the parochial register. Nevertheless, this formality was merely delusive. Substantially, it was an impressment, although without knocking on the head. The leader of the gang knew well his rôle, and played it to perfection. Not a single square-shouldered, muscular youth was left out of his summary conscription. Tears, entreaties, offers of pecuniary substitution he turned from with a deaf ear. "Able-bodied galliards, brave and hardy youths"—these, he said, were what the Republic wanted to man her navies, and humble the pride of Britannia's wooden bulwarks. Need we say that Auguste was amongst the number of the unhappy élite? With a proudly submissive air, he tore himself from the arms of the almost frantic Jeannette, invoked a blessing on her head, murmured a broken adieu, that almost rent his heart-strings—kissed her burning forehead, and, within two hours of the period of this terrible intrusion on the peaceful mirth of a secluded village, had set out on his way to Toulon, strongly guarded amidst the flower of its male population.

Amongst the severest afflictions of life is the rude disruption of the ties which we have formed in our progress through its vicissitudes. The separation by main force of a limb from its parent trunk—a horror which makes humanity shudder—is a forcible, but not too strong analogy.

The flesh will quiver where the pincers tear!

The sundered fibres shake with a convulsive movement. And as the heart will "cling like a tendril" to whatever is nearest and dearest, when the chains which have bound its affections are rudely snapped asunder, the revulsion is most fearful to contemplate. This it is which invests dissolution with its worst terrors, both to the parting soul and to the survivors; which makes the word "farewell," amongst beloved friends, so difficult to pronounce; and, when that word is compulsorily uttered—when the separation is forcibly effected—when a fearful future stares us in the face—when probability conjures up before the loving heart the terrible image of an eternal adieu—makes the "drowning eye and choking utterance" but feeble images of the pangs which rend the soul, and invests the shuddering reality of existence with the pall and shroud of death!

To say that Jeannette was horror-struck, agonised, maddened, were a faint expression of the dismay which took possession of her soul. There was but one on earth for whom she cared—but one with whom her sympathies were complete—the master of her fate—her idol—her enchanter! And from him had she been torn but a few hours before they were to have been united indissolubly—for ever! Let none talk of grief that have not witnessed the pangs of such a separation. What was life to her, without him for whom—with whom alone she chose to live? What was this earth to her with all its pleasant places, its joyous sunbeams and its fragrant flowers, without him who could impart savour to the insipid, and greenness to the barren?—without whom the most glowing prospect were a blank, and verdure mere sterility? Her young heart and his were as one. Enough that they were torn asunder!

She wept not—she spoke not—she did not even sigh! They bore her home to her father's house; they laid her down upon her little bed. Her father and her mother, and her sister, tended her with angelic assiduity; but all unconsciously she lay while two suns rose and set. And then she woke from her trance, and wept long and bitterly; and she became calmer, and then she took her resolution.

The scene of our simple tale now shifts to Toulon. The fleet of the Republic there lay at anchor. The conscripts had all undergone the process of drilling; and to each was allotted that portion of the public service, for the discharge of which he seemed to be best fitted. Auguste had been draughted with several of his fellow villagers on board the Achille, a seventy-four gun-ship. The post of gunner was allotted to him as suited to his superior intelligence, which had displayed itself in a sort of mechanical docility, even while his mind was far away on the banks of the sweet Moselle. At first he was moody and doggedly indifferent; but the example of the enthusiasm by which he was surrounded operated upon him insensibly. A patriot, although unmoved by the plottings of political schemers, he could not long remain an uninterested spectator of preparations in which the glory of "La Jeune France" was so deeply involved. Gradually his heart awoke from its trance—he learned even to seek relief from brooding care and home-sick anxiety by an active participation in the stirring scenes which were bustling around him; and cruelly and unjustly as he had been torn from his home, he began to long to plant in the hands of his country, that goddess of every Frenchman's idolatry, the trident of Ocean with the sceptre of Earth. He applied himself vigorously to his allotted tasks; and progressed so rapidly in the estimation of his commanding officer, that he was appointed captain of one of the guns.

The bustle of preparation had almost completely subsided; the signal for departure was hourly expected, when a youth, clad in the homespun garb of a Burgundian peasant, applied to a boat's crew, which was just pushing off from shore for the Achille, beseeching them to take him on board. He was laughed at by the men, but repeated his entreaty in tones of such earnest supplication, declaring himself an orphan with no visible means of support, who would do anything to make himself useful on board ship, and longed for an opportunity to share in the defence of his country, that the lieutenant, who sate in the stern beneath the waving tricolor, moved by the soft and plaintive tones of his voice, and perhaps still more by the good looks of the youth, which, bronzed as he was by an autumnal sun, were nevertheless strikingly apparent, good-humouredly exclaimed, "A la bonne heure, mon jeune héro! France hath need of the arms of all her braves. We shall find a place for you on board l'Achille, though it were but to assist the cook in the cabouse, or perform the rôle of a powder-monkey!" Right joyously did that youth leap on board the pinnace. In truth he seemed to restrain himself with difficulty from screaming aloud, so great was his delight; and the heroic empressement of one so young was hailed by the sanguine as an omen of success.

The signal rocket was fired from the heights of Fort St. Denis; the anchors were weighed, and the stately fleet held its course S.S.W. for Cadiz. The English "hounds" were there before them. Cressy, and Poictiers, and Agincourt, burned in the recollection of every Frenchman; and, unable to effect by land the subjugation of the British Lion, they longed to harpoon the Ocean Mammoth.

"Longed!" There was not a cabin-boy in all that fleet that did not feel assured of success!

The springal, whose eagerness to join in the affray we have just commemorated, was, soon after the sailing of the fleet, added to the gang of which Auguste had the charge, his allotted task being to hand powder up from the magazine during the action which was soon expected. What was there in that youth's appearance which challenged Auguste's attention—which riveted his fixed gaze? What was there in his embrowned lineaments which could awaken remembrance? Gratuitous demand! What effort at disguise can shroud that knowledge to which the heart at a bound intuitively attains? The youth saw that his secret was discovered. Before the anchor was weighed, he had kept himself shielded from observation. But now that it was impossible to put him on shore, he felt that farther effort at concealment was unnecessary. He placed the forefinger of his right hand on his lips, with the other laid hold of Auguste's blouse, and whispered the single word, "Descend!" Down they went, where there was none to observe them. In an instant the stranger youth flew into Auguste's arms, clung to him with passionate fervour, and covered his face with kisses! Is it necessary to write down that adventurous youth's name? Has not the reader's heart divined it? It was JEANNETTE!

To the rapture at this unlooked-for meeting, which took possession of Auguste's heart, succeeded deep horror of the dangers to which his loved Jeannette was about to expose herself—

"Ange de ma vie!" he exclaimed, "thou knowest not the fearful peril."

"Peril! I fear it not," was her reply. "I am with thee!"

"But thou shalt not remain. Thou must be put on shore."

"Auguste! wouldst thou kill me? Part with me now, and we shall meet no more."

"If thou hast no pity on thyself, forlorn maiden, have pity on me."

"Auguste, dost thou love me? Not a word more! If thou lovest me, not a word! I will share thy perils, or die! Put me on shore, if thou wilt. But the ocean is deep, and there are headlong precipices by its side. Auguste, I am thine: I shall not live without thee!"

Auguste wept, and pressed her to his bosom. He saw that she was resolute, and he yielded to the invincible determination of that slender girl. But a new horror aroused him.

"Thy sex! thy sex!" he exclaimed. "Were it once suspected, what single arm could shield thee from the licentiousness of lawless men? Thy sex! thy beauty! Mon Dieu!"—and he covered his eyes with his hands, as if to shut out some fearful image.

"Auguste, fear nothing. I have tinged my face and hands with the walnut juice. No eyes will dwell on the dusky traits of a poor Bohemien. They will never suspect me."

Auguste at once saw that she was right. All-powerful love could alone have enabled him to pierce in a moment through her well-invented disguise. Her complexion was as brown as though she had been exposed from infancy to the fierce action of a Southern sun. The peasant garb hung loosely around her exquisite form, and gave her merely the air of a graceful, though ill-clad boy; clumsy shoes concealed those prettiest of feet; and her long and lovely hair gathered up on the top of her head, beneath a rude but closely-fitting straw hat, left only a few ringlets to be seen at either side, which challenged no remark amongst sailors, proverbial for the attention which they pay to the culture of their chevelure.

Auguste's anxious heart raised new scruples; but the heroic girl was unbending, and she silenced them all with one long kiss of love.

The scene now shifts to the theatre of a mighty and memorable conflict:—

'Twas in Trafalgar Bay
We saw the Frenchmen lay;
Each heart was bounding then!

But why attempt to describe that glorious action, the events of which are stamped on the memory of every true-born Briton, as Nelson's name is engraven on their hearts? Why seek to portray the merits of a victory which, in the words of Lord Collingwood's despatch, "added a ray to the glory of the British crown, and conferred a lasting benefit on the British nation"? Why dwell on the events of the fearful engagement, when the heart reverts irresistibly to that exterminating fire from the tops of the Redoubtable—that ambush of musquetry which slew our noble chief in the arms of victory—which pierced his gallant heart (for it was in the left breast that he was struck) in the very hour of his fame's brightest consummation—sealing with a hero's blood the bond of endless gratitude, to which his country has sworn fidelity—which ducal coronets heaped upon his head could have ill discharged—which will render his name immortal through all time? Let us rather return to the subject of our tale.

In the very hottest of the action, the Achille, which had been engaged with an English seventy-four, took fire! Amid the roar of cannon, the suffocating smoke belched forth at every broadside, and the infernal rattle of grape-shot and shells, Jeannette had maintained her dangerous position fearlessly, passing to and fro with buckets of powder from the magazine-room to the gun, of which her Auguste had the charge, with unflinching regularity; and for all the perils to which she exposed herself, she felt abundantly recompensed by one glance (as she arrived at her destination with each fresh supply of that fuel of destruction) which assured her of her lover's safety. Of herself she thought not; his image absorbed her soul. Engaged on the lowest gun-deck, neither Auguste nor any of those near him had the slightest suspicion of the fearful danger that invested them. But, as the Englishman sheered off, on perceiving that he had silenced his antagonist's fire, and as, on the roar of the artillery ceasing, the cry of "Fire!" from the upper deck became audible, this fresh and imminent peril appalled the most stout-hearted. Auguste seized Jeannette by the arm, and rushed to the ladder; but at that moment the smoke issued down the opening in black and thickening volumes, and threatened to produce instant suffocation. The upper part of the vessel was entirely in flames. But Auguste was nevertheless determined to reach the deck above. He rushed for a moment, bearing Jeannette in his arms, to one of the port-holes for air, and returned to accomplish the fearful ascent. But the ladder now was burning, and certain death awaited them in that quarter. To pass, without destruction, was impossible! They hurried down to the gun-room, but even this was filled with smoke; and the pain of breathing became almost intolerable.

"Mon Dieu, que faire?" exclaimed the agonized Auguste.

He gazed for an instant in Jeannette's face, and saw the heroic girl smiling!

"God," she said, "will protect us!"

If there be an incarnate angel, it is faithful woman in the hour of peril and suffering.

Auguste rushed to the port-holes of the gun-room, and tried them successively; but they were too small to admit his passage. He gnashed his teeth in despair.

"God will protect us!" again exclaimed the smiling girl.

In this fearful position of peril, which taxed to their utmost limit the powers of human endurance, half-suffocated they treaded the decks, one after another gave way, till at last, with a fearful crash, the guns came tumbling down to the deck on which they stood. Some were crushed to atoms; others, in shrieking agony, leaped overboard. Jeannette was left alone.

No cowardly desertion defiled the fearless character of Auguste, even at that terrible hour. He was struck by a portion of the falling timber, and, stunned for the moment, was hurried along unresisting by his frantic fellow-sufferers. They tumbled overboard together. Some sank to rise no more; others, more fortunate, clung to a chance spar, and snatched life from the very jaws of death. Auguste, revived by the immersion, was amongst this number.

Left all alone, in this dire extremity, Jeannette's indomitable courage, and reliance in Providence, did not forsake her.

"God! Thou wilt protect me!" she exclaimed, with clasped hands, and with eyes raised, amidst the terrific havoc around her, to Heaven.

But the fire continued to rage, and to approach her; and, as she knew the position of the magazine, she expected to be blown up every instant with the ship! She tried to effect a passage through the stern port-hole of the gun-room; but in vain. Her clothes were too bulky. Coolly as though she were about to bathe in the most retired and inviting waters of the limpid Moselle—her native stream—she undressed herself, let down her flowing hair—for even in that dread extremity the pride of maidenhood forsook her not—and crept through the port-hole. She clasped the rudder-chain. She raised her eyes to Heaven, and awaited the fearful explosion, which she knew was at hand. Cool and collected was her calculation that, in the breaking up of the ship, the rudder would become separated from it; and, if Heaven protected her from death at the awful moment when the enormous mass of powder became ignited, that she might use the rudder as a kind of raft. There she clung, abandoned but not yet hopeless, her lovely form suspended betwixt earth and heaven, with nought to shield it from the rude sea-breeze, and nought to sustain it but the maiden's own undaunted heart. But

On horror's head horrors accumulate!

The lead from the poop, melted by the flames, ran down like burning pitch upon her; every drop pierced to her soul. Her agonies were sharpened beyond endurance, and she fell into the sea!

Not even here did her self-possession desert her. The cooling waters assuaged her pain, and revived her powers of endurance. She grasped at a piece of spar which floated near her, and she still was buoyant above the waves. The guns on the lower deck of the Achille soon exploded with terrific force—yet they harmed her not. But now the flames had reached the magazine, and with tremendous roar the ship blew up!

Jeannette was still unharmed; and when that appalling sound died away, she found herself still buoyant amidst floating pieces of wreck. At this instant two barges from the Belleisle approached the scene of destruction; and, amongst the few survivors, picked up Jeannette. Who shall picture the astonishment, the superstitious dread, with which these gallant tars lifted into the boat this lovely Nereid—her polished limbs, which sculpture could but feebly imitate, and all the ravishing symmetry of that beauteous form, veiled by no other covering than that which her long dark hair, falling round her like a veil, supplied? Just breathing, but almost inanimate, she was laid on the floor of the barge, and the covering which even the luxuriant folds of her tresses too scantily furnished, was supplied by the gallant officer in command, who covered her with a portion of his clothes. Carefully wrapped up in garments which displayed the insignia of the British naval service, and gradually restored to perception, she was conveyed on board the Belleisle; and recognising on the topmost step of the companion-ladder her faithful lover, who had been picked up by the other boat, she fell weeping on his bosom, and exclaimed—

"My Auguste!—my Auguste!—I knew that God would protect us! The English conquer to save!"

Auguste and Jeannette spent many an after year in their native village, loving and loved on the vine-clad banks of the Moselle, surrounded by their blooming offspring, and blessing the clemency of English victors.

THE GLASGOW MORTALITY BILL FOR 1840.*

THE municipal authorities, and especially the gentlemen connected with the public institutions of Glasgow, deserve the greatest praise for the attention they have for many years paid to statistics connected with the city, and its hospitals and charities. This science, hitherto comparatively, if not entirely, neglected, is at once the basis and the director of reforms and improvements, whether legislative or administrative,—whether affecting the moral or the physical wellbeing of communities. The Tables of the MORTALITY BILL, twenty-six in number, are, we make no question, accurate; and they have been examined and approved by a Committee of the Town Council. But with them, though possessing interest of various kinds, we do not at present concern ourselves; the Letter or Report prefixed to them, and the general remarks by which they are followed, being sufficient for our immediate purpose, of drawing attention to the rapid advances which extreme poverty, and its sure concomitants and attendants, misery, filth, disease, and a high rate of mortality, are making in those places which were once proudly termed the "seats of the national industry."

One startling fact, with which the report sets out, is, that high as the mortality, relative to the population, has been during the last ten years, it is even greater than has been represented in the mortality bills. This inaccuracy has been owing to the estimated population of the city having been assumed as greater than, by the national census taken in June last, it is found to be in reality. Within the last ten years, or from 1830, the condition of the bulk of the inhabitants of the city of Glasgow has deteriorated to an alarming and most painful degree, and the rate of mortality has increased in proportion. "It is painful," the report states,

> To observe the great change which has taken place for the worse in the sanatory condition of Glasgow since 1831. From the official report of the census of Lanarkshire, which I lately had occasion to submit to the Honourable Archibald Alison, sheriff of the county, it appears that the average annual amount of deaths during the five years previous to 1831, was as 1 to 41·47, or 2·39 per cent. compared with the population of that year; whereas during the five years previous to 1841, the average annual number of deaths, when compared to the population of that year, amounted to 1 in 35·59, or 2·97 per cent. It will be observed, however, that though these proportions give a true indication of the sanatory condition of Glasgow at 1831, compared with that at 1841, yet both give too favourable a view of the average mortality of these years, because stating the proportion to the population of the last year only; the average annual deaths for these last five years are to the mean (corrected) population of these years as 1 to 30·41, or 3·28 per cent. It also appears, from the same report, that, while the average annual number of deaths of children during the five years previous to 1831, were to the population of that year as 1 to 101·96, during the five years previous to 1841 they amounted to 1 in 75·41 of the population of that year.
> These are facts that cannot be too strongly brought under your notice; for although the representations to government which have lately been made by you as a body, in conjunction with those of many other municipal authorities of Scotland, have not yet been successful in securing the adoption of measures fitted for the removal of those causes which are known to be so detrimental to the health of the inhabitants of large towns; yet as this subject is of so much importance to the wellbeing of this rapidly increasing community, it is exceedingly desirable that your exertions to procure a beneficial change should not be relaxed.

As in every other large city, disease and mortality prevail to a much greater extent in certain quarters and suburbs of Glasgow than in others; and from causes common to all large towns. In all of them, as well as here, it is found that,— > "Cæteris paribus, the mortality increases as the density of the population increases; and when the density and the population are the same, that the rate of mortality depends upon the efficiency of the ventilation, and of the means which are employed for the removal of impurities," the facts elicited by the late census go a great way to account for the high increase of mortality which has taken place in Glasgow since 1831. In Gorbals proper, where there is one inhabitant for every seven square yards of surface, including houses, streets, lanes, &c., the population has increased 20·39 per cent. since 1831, though no new buildings have been erected. And in Blackfriars parish, where few new buildings have been erected, the increase of population since 1831 is upwards of 40 per cent.

Some hope of improvement is expressed from the introduction of those legislative measures at present contemplated, for improving the health of towns, by better drainage and ventilation, which were discussed in a late number of this Magazine, and by a revision of the poor laws, for which, along with nearly all the municipal bodies of the kingdom, the Town Council of Glasgow lately petitioned parliament.

The increase in the population of Glasgow, and of the other manufacturing towns in Scotland, such as Dundee, is, we apprehend, anything rather than a natural and healthful increase. In reference to Glasgow, it is here ascribed to an influx of the working-classes into the city and suburbs in quest of work, "in numbers which considerably exceed the demand for labour, and consequently the means of obtaining a comfortable subsistence." This is stated as

> One of the causes of the deterioration which is rapidly taking place in the condition of our population in a many localities; an opinion strongly borne out by the reports made by the enumerators for the census, of the cases of destitution which attracted their especial notice to the effect, that of such cases the great majority are natives of Ireland.

By the present poor-laws, there are many cases of extreme destitution among these unwelcome strangers which cannot be effectively met, and hence the unchecked growth of the evils complained of, namely, dense numbers shut up in narrow spaces, bad ventilation, misery, disease, death!

* The Glasgow Mortality Bill for 1840. Drawn up by Alexander Watt, Esq., by order of the Lord Provost and Magistrates of the City. Glasgow: W. G. Blackie & Co.

From the General Remarks, which follow the Tables, we copy the subjoined passages, which are pregnant with matter for reflection. To the consideration of Sir Robert Peel we especially recommend them. Their moral is not limited to Glasgow:—

The deaths of children in 1839 amounted to 50·16 per cent. of the whole deaths; in 1840 they amounted to 45·69 per cent. of the whole deaths. Unfortunately, however, this apparent improvement in the vitality of children under that age is not borne out by a comparison with the amount of population, as the deaths of children under five years of age in 1839 were to the population as 1 to 69·89, whereas in 1840 they were as 1 to 67·70. There can be no greater proof that something is necessary to be done to ameliorate the social condition of the people, than that the mortality among children is so high, as it is well ascertained that the deaths among children, beyond a certain point, may be considered to be in an inverse ratio to the care that is taken of them, and to the proper system that is pursued with regard to their food, clothing, and exercise.

In noticing the mortality of children, Sir James D'Iverneis observes, "if the different states of Europe were to keep and publish every year an exact account of their population, carefully stating, in a separate column, the precise ages at which children have died, that separate column would exhibit the relative merits of the governments, as indicative of the comparative happiness of their subjects. A simple statement of figures would then be more conclusive upon this point than any other arguments that could be adduced." Mr. Porter, in his excellent statistical work on the Progress of the Nation, very justly remarks, on the above paragraph, "that governments cannot with reason be held to be the source of all the circumstances, favourable and unfavourable, which affect the happiness of a country." Yet the knowledge of these facts forms a strong reason for urging forward those sanatory improvements in which so deep an interest is taken, both as regards the unhealthy condition of many portions of the city itself, and also as to those evils which arise from the destitute state of so many of the poorer classes.

That the proportion of the deaths of children under five years of age, in 1840, bears a smaller proportion to the whole deaths than they do in 1839, arises chiefly from a greater number of the adult inhabitants having been cut off by fever.

The number of deaths from fever, always great in Glasgow for many years back, was very great indeed in the year 1840. And fever cases are, in general, attended by most distressing consequences or collateral effects. It is remarked—

From fifteen years of age and upwards, no less than three-fourths of the deaths by fever took place (exclusive of those constantly sick) at those periods of life when the parties dependent on their own labour might be considered as being able to support themselves, and a very large proportion of them as being the means of supporting others, such as their own families and aged parents. And to add to the evil, so far as the value of labour is concerned, the proportion of deaths by fever among males and females at these ages was as 100 males to 75·19 females; thus still further enhancing the evils attendant on poverty and destitution. Were it necessary to show that the funds, as well as the persons, of the rich are affected by the present state of the city, in order that strenuous measures may be adopted to urge forward those sanatory improvements of which the city and its inhabitants are capable, and which they so much require, it will be found in the greater amount of funds paid to the poor during those years in which there is a greater prevalence of sickness and of death, especially among the adult population, than in those years when the city is more healthy. That the increase and virulence of fever are to be attributed, in addition to the destitute state of many of the inhabitants, to those pestilential vapours arising from the want of proper drainage, and the proper circulation of pure air, in many portions of large towns, and in none more than in our own city, is clearly proved by the evidence now before the country. It does not so clearly appear how far the other diseases, besides fever, which cause death, are affected by the same causes; but as it appears that in Glasgow, in 1840, nearly one death in every seven (7·17) was caused by fever, and that one in every three-and-a-fourth (3·25) deaths was caused by the two groups of diseases, fever and eruptive fevers, it forms matter for most serious consideration, and decidedly proves that no time ought to be lost in carrying forward those sanatory improvements in contemplation. This is a question that comes home to the bosom of every family: for although these diseases may be chiefly propagated, and may rage with the most fatal effects in the unwholesome abodes of the poor, the contagion soon passes from street to street, and from one district of the country to another, and the rich become sufferers as well as the poor.

Were the Drainage Bill, recently introduced into Parliament, to be carried into effect, it certainly would be one step in the right direction. But, in order more effectually to arrest the progress of disease in Glasgow, and to raise the moral and physical condition of the poorer classes to a more desirable state, it is to be hoped that other efficient measures will speedily follow.

Among the most efficient of these measures must be unshackling the trammels—giving free play to the energies of trade; and a poor-law that shall not be a mockery of the end proposed by every poor-law, save the niggardly and vitiated system which goes by that name in Scotland.

One curious fact is elicited by these tables—namely, that whereas the young men of Glasgow find themselves wives in other places, neglecting their fair townswomen, the young women of Edinburgh seem to be in request among strangers. In other words, in Edinburgh, in 1839, there were 71 more females belonging to the town married than males; and in Glasgow, (but in four years,) 101 more males married than females.

LETTERS FROM THE BALTIC.*

The title of this pleasant book is somewhat vague, though its history and plan are clear enough. Ten or a dozen years since, an English lady, who has an accomplished and most affectionate sister, married one who would probably be called by her friends, "a Russian nobleman," and who, in fact, was one of the landed class or barons of the province of Estonia, a country which has often changed masters, but which, for the last hundred and twenty years, has been under the dominion of Russia. After a long separation, the unmarried sister had the felicity of visiting her relatives in Russia; and a narrative of her journey and residence in Estonia, and of a winter spent in Petersburg, written in the form of letters, makes the subject-matter of her delightful and instructive work. With a quick and instructed mind, refined taste, and a more than womanly power of reflection, she possessed the rare advantage, over ordinary travellers, of having been for above a year domesticated in the regions which she visited; and of being, from her connexions, received, wherever she went, on the footing of friendly and easy familiarity. Though not without the alloy of a certain quantity of, what is sometimes termed, English prejudice, she is more remarkable for its frequent concomitant, English good sense, and, without a narrow, exclusive spirit, or lack of charity, for English, old-fashioned moral discrimination. To some frigid readers, the frequent expression of her passionate attachment to her sister, may seem superfluous; while to others, and probably to all woman readers, this vehement affection will form, as it were, the key-note to the work, toning and harmonizing all its parts. But the main value of the book is, that it presents an ample and complete picture of feudal manners; nearly such as, modified by other institutions, they existed in England three centuries ago, and in Scotland and Ireland within the last century. We find pictures of the same sort in Mr. Laing's Travels in Sweden and Norway, though these belong to a happier, because a more equal state of society; in Captain Hall's Schloss Hainfeld; and in Miss Pigott's graphic sketches of the rural life of the German nobility at the close of the war. But they are without the fulness of detail, and the finish of this account of the Estonian noblesse, which revives, as brightly as in a romance, that picturesque state of society, to which we probably recur the more fondly that we have long outlived its good and its evil; and seem verging on other tremendous evils incompatible with its institutions.

At the present crisis, this picture of feudal manners—of the feudal life in all its barbaric pomp and rude plenty—may teach a useful lesson to those who would crush, and who seem to despise, the trade and commerce to which they owe that enormous wealth, that refinement of manners and luxurious accommodation, which distinguish them from the landed class of every other European country. The extinction of manufactures must be attended, though after a period of great hardship, by nearly the same consequences as their non-existence. We would pray our barons and baronets, and wealthy estated esquires to ponder the condition of their contemporaries of Estonia, with ten and twenty times their number of fertile acres; and seriously to ask themselves, how they would like to see their refined wives and daughters fulfilling the menial offices of the Frau and Fraulein, and they themselves living as did their forefathers under the Tudors.

The book is without dates; but we gather that the fair traveller embarked one autumn, in an English steamer, for Copenhagen; from whence she proceeded to Petersburg in the steamer which sails regularly, while the navigation is open, between those cities. This was a rather circuitous route to Reval, the capital of Estonia, and the town residence of her sister; but there may have been good reasons for it, with which the reader has nothing to do; and it must always be an object to an intelligent stranger to visit the capital of Russia.

The voyager, but especially the adventurous female voyager, who sails from Dover to Calais, or from Holyhead to Dublin, without encountering a gale, compared to which that which dispelled the Spanish Armada was but a zephyr playfully ruffling a park pond, is to be considered unfortunate; but how much more to be pitied, should she not be taken in an awful hurricane in crossing the Atlantic, or going up the Baltic. In fact, no such tame voyage ever happens. This fair traveller had enough of it. She, and her fellow-passengers, whom she graphically describes, must have been in very serious danger, before the captain of the steamer, a brave veteran lieutenant of the royal navy, called down the companion to the dismayed group, "Let the passengers prepare to come on deck at a moment's warning, but not before." This excellent seaman had been one of Nelson's protegés, and when a midshipman had been kissed by the beautiful and fascinating Lady Hamilton; a way her ladyship had of turning the heads of boys, and of fools of all ages. The gale abated, and they put into Christiansand to refit, where the French steamer from Havre to St. Petersburg had already found shelter. So far as regards one nation—the French—this lady is most rigidly English in all her notions; though, it must be owned, the specimens of La jeune France seen in the Havre steamer, were not favourable ones of the Grand Nation. They seem to have been ladies and gentlemen bound for the Russian theatres, and other places of amusement even less creditable; such as those promiscuous balls, where the women of all ranks are masked and pell-mell, and the men with no disguise save their moustaches and their native bronze; those balls, which the omnipotent Czar has taken under his special protection, and at which he relaxes from the cares of empire in the manner we shall afterwards see.

At Copenhagen, the passengers were transferred to the St. Petersburg steamer; and at Cronstadt commenced those tortures inflicted on all foreigners by the brutal Russian custom-house officers. They did not terminate there. At Petersburg, the same disgraceful inquisition was renewed, and the goods and chattels of the unfortunate strangers rescued at last in a sad state of confusion and dilapidation. Young France swore aloud; and more decorous Conservative England grumbled not a little. The traveller must have a strong motive to visit Russia who makes up his mind to the many pains and penalties, and insulting annoyances which this ordeal heralds.

So much has been said of late of the magnificent exterior of the swamp-based and forced city of the Czar, that we consider the subject exhausted; and this lady, besides, invites us to fresher and more attractive fields. Her shrewd but decorous remarks or significant hints, on the low taste visible, and on the incongruous images of barbaric pomp and architectural magnificence in close neighbourhood with misery, squalor, and filth, are more original. After viewing the vast and gorgeous Casan

Church, and describing the imposing solemnities and rites of the Greek worship, she remarks :—

And then, to turn from all this blaze and gorgeousness, from walls of silver, and hangings of pearls, to the poor creatures who at this moment seemed the only objects of such display;—abject beings with tattered garments, decrepid bodies, and animal countenances, who stood crossing themselves, bowing at intervals before the shrines till their foreheads resounded on the marble floor, and staring around, gaping, or spitting, between every prostration,—old hags of nuns in filthy attire,—wretched cripples and loathsome beggars, whom one seed pearl from the Virgin's shoulder-knot would have enriched, but to whom in their faith the sacrilegious thought, doubtless, never occurred. Here, also, the trophies of conquered armies hung around; but this time the eagle was the emblem. . . . .

Having thus taken the aggregate of a Russian church interior, for the rest are mere repetitions of the same barbaric splendour, unsanctified by true art, we proceeded to the Academy of Arts on the Wassili-Ostrof. This is one of those outwardly splendid piles, with ten times more space than in England would be allowed for the same object, ten times more out of repair, and ten thousand times dirtier. At the ceremony of Russian baptism, the sign of the cross is made on the lips to say nothing bad, on the eyes to see nothing bad, on the ears to hear nothing bad—and, it must be supposed, on the nose also to smell nothing bad;—for the Russians do not seem inconvenienced by the trials to which this organ is exposed on entering their dwellings. But to return to this odoriferous Academy.

The buildings of the capital are magnificent in appearance, but they soon fall into decay; partly from the effects of the alternately severe cold and extreme heat of the climate, but more from the want of substantial finishing at first, and of necessary and timely repairs. The houses are "wretchedly glazed, and wretchedly shod"—floored, we suppose, is meant—and street pavement is, save on one promenade, either unknown or execrable :—

Such holes as an infant Zarowitch might be lost in; and, lest this should seem overdrawn, I can add what I myself was eye-witness to, viz :—an Ischvouschik composedly washing his droschky in a colossal puddle, full in sight of the palace windows, after which he washed his face and hands in the same, and drove off. . . . And now, lest my pen should be deemed invidious, let us turn to the splendid granite blocks in which the Neva and all tributary streams and canals are bound; solid, polished piles, which no mortar has ever defaced, being cramped together with iron: or let us acknowledge the patronage which Russia has afforded our English ironworks, which here relieve these sturdy masses with a border as elegant as it is light.

Among the persons to whom the traveller had letters of introduction was a Russian baron, fortmajor of Petersburg, and an aid-de-camp to the Emperor, who stationed a sentinel at her door, and was zealous in showing her all the sights. A stroll on the cold sunny pavements of Nevski was more congenial to her taste, and the scene is well worth a traveller's notice :—

Here it is that Russians of all garbs and ranks pass before you. Here stands the Ischvouschik, loitering carelessly beneath the trees of the avenue, who, catching your steady gaze, starts up and displays a row of beautiful teeth beneath his thickly-bearded lip, and pointing to his droschky, splutters out "Kudi vam ugodno?" or, "whither does it please you?" Here stalks the erect Russian peasant, by birth a serf and in gait a prince,—the living effigy of an old patriarch,—bearded to the waist, his kaftan of sheep-skin, or any dark cloth wrapt round him, the ample front of which, confined at the waist by a belt of bright colours, contains all that another would stow in a pocket: literally portraying the words of Scripture, "full measure shall men pour into your bosom." Contrary to all established rule, he wears his shirt, always blue or red, over his trowsers, his trowsers under his boots, and doubtless deems this the most sensible arrangement. And look! here go a posse of Russian foot-soldiers, with close shorn head and face, and browbeat look, as little of the martial in their dusky attire as of glory in their hard lives, the mere drudges of a review, whom Mars would disown. Not so the tiny Circassian, light in limb and bright in look, flying past on his native barb, armed to the teeth, with eyes like loadstars, which the cold climate cannot quench. Now, turn to the slender Finn, with teeth of pearl and hair so yellow that you mistake it for a lemon-coloured handkerchief peeping from beneath his round hat; or see, among the whirl of carriages, three and four abreast in the centre of the noble street, that handsome Tartar coachman, his hair and beard of jet, sitting gravely like a statue of Moses on his box, while the little postilion dashes on with the foremost horses, ever and anon throwing an anxious look behind him, lest the ponderous vehicle, which the long traces keep at half a street's distance, should not be duly following; and within lolls the pale Russian beauty, at whose careless bidding they all are hurrying forward, looking as apathetic to all the realities of life as any other fine lady in any other country would do.

Our readers cannot have forgotten the comprehensive remark of the old French Count to the late American traveller, Mr. Stephens,—namely, that in Russia the only difference of manners between the noble and the serf was, that the former tucked his shirt within his trowsers, while the latter let it hang over as is here described. The small number of women seen in the streets contributes to the dull air of Petersburg. The English lady accepted the warmly pressed hospitality of the baron, who, with his wife and family, resided in a suite of rooms in a sort of barrack, which would be fancied sorry accommodation for a man of similar rank in other European capitals. She was kindly offered her choice in this magnificent apartment :—

"Now," said the baron, his pale face glowing with hospitality, "here are eight apartments; select which you please for your sleeping-room. Here are the two drawing-rooms, there the dining-room; there," pointing to the right, "is my wife's cabinet; there," pointing to the left, "is my own writing-room; further on is our bed-room; in short, you have only to choose, and never was a guest more welcome."

His English guest had, in the vaunted eight rooms, conjured up a vision of "eight spare bedrooms, all fitted up with English privacy;" but finding how matters stood, she settled herself where she could be farthest from the children, and farthest from the soldiers, choosing the dining-room, —where a bed—probably a shake-down, was partitioned off by a screen. But her welcome had been cordial, and her rest was good. What more could a traveller wish for? Her host had the charge of above a hundred criminals waiting their trials. These were not the most desirable neighbours; but they were worth examining :—

Those apprehended for murder were chained hand and foot, and at least a fifth of the number were thus fettered. All nations and tribes of Russia were congregated here, Tartars, Finns, Calmucs, Bukharians, Circassians, &c., all wretched, vitiated-looking beings, many fine in feature but hideous in expression. The most remarkable was an Arabian prince, a plunderer of the desert, fine, handsome, haughty, and hardened; a very Thug in impenitent expression, who drew up his fine figure as we passed along, and clanked his murderer's chains as proudly as if they had been the insignia of honour. It has not been at all times safe to enter this den, and the last fort-major, whose guard at the grate was neither so numerous nor so vigilant, narrowly escaped with his life.

These prisoners were well lodged; and they ought to have been well fed, if this were not Russia, in which common vulgar honesty is yet a quality as rare among general officers as if they were British commissaries of a past age. This passage were hardly worth citing, if it were not illustrative of the entire system of Russian administration :—

That I might not tell England that the prisoners under his care were neglected, the colonel sent for a basin of soup from the prisoners' supper, and truly it was such as a more squeamish stomach might have relished.

But the great evil is, that all this is too much in the power of the commanding officer to pervert and abuse, who, being himself entirely without check or control, too often starves his prisoners to increase his own poor pay. The rank of a general, I am sorry to add, does not here pledge its owner to honesty, and it is well known and as frankly acknowledged, that the chef of a regiment will with impunity defraud his soldiers of their allowed weight of rations, and pocket the surplus, or market them out to daily labour, of which he himself appropriates the wages. For here the individual who wears the emperor's livery is denied the pride of knowing that he is absolved from that of any other master, and every soldier who will, learns a trade.

This was not a traveller bit by the Russo-phobia, nor one who went to spy out the nakedness of the land; yet the same opinion of the want of probity and common honesty among men holding high military or official rank, is, in substance, repeated at different stages of her progress. Her book, warmly as she praises him, will certainly be added by Nicholas to the list of the proscribed.

An attack of the fever, to which all foreigners are liable in this "swamp-based capital," delayed her journey till late in November, when, under the sole charge of an alert and trusty Russian man-servant, she set out for Reval, a distance of three hundred miles. The valet or postilion was as ignorant of any language save his own, as the lady was of Russian, and the winter had already set in with severity; yet, in spite of every discouragement, she joined in the universal sentiment—"I detest Petersburg!" and, bundled up in furs, joyously set forth on the lonely and picturesque journey, through forests and wastes of snow, not yet so hard as to bear a sledge, but difficult to get through with four post-horses.

The journey affords one original picture of Russian native manners. At Narva, she had been recommended, by a friend, to people, who must probably have set down the foreign lady as intolerably haughty, if not positively rude. Their house was a rambling edifice of unpainted wood, and "all on the ground floor," or of one storey. She says,—

I entered a suite of rooms, and caught sight of various female shapes receding before me in the same proportion as I advanced, until, having gained the apartment conventionally dedicated to the ceremony of reception, they all faced about, and came bowing and curtseying forward to receive me.

Let me be exonerated from the charge of ingratitude in what I am about to say; but in the house where I now received the outward rites of hospitality, the curiosity excited by the novelty of an English guest, the vanity of showing off an English lion, was so far paramount to every other consideration, that ere I quitted it, my debt of obligation had been pretty well cancelled. I was ill,—tired,—a stranger,—but it mattered not; my advent in this little Kräkwinkel was too great a wonder to be neglected. Before I had been there an hour, visiters crowded in to see me, and first an old lady catechized me, and then a vulgar officer, who from the abundance of his mouth bombarded the store and floor around, instructed me; imparting between every fresh volley various items of information relative to English customs and manners; our queen's beauty, matrimonial intentions, &c.; in all of which he was so perfectly satisfied with his own authority, that I ventured no expostulation. All this time my hostess was in a flutter of importance, and, whenever my answers appeared deficient, filled them up so readily, that I found I could safely leave the task of my biography in her hands. She subtracted some years from my age; she added some thousands of roubles to my rental, placing me, with a delicacy worthy a better occasion, in this respect on a par with the grandees of her own land; and then, with a sigh, she ejaculated, "Poor young creature! so ill too!" "The dysentery," exclaimed three voices; "No, typhus fever," said a fourth; "All the English have it when they travel," cried a fifth; and so on, till I had full occupation in listening. All this would have been very amusing at another time, but I longed for quiet, and had a buzz of voices and glare of lights around me; I longed for rest, and was planted upright in a hard chair, which was exactly convex where it ought to have been concave. I looked back on my quiet carriage with affectionate regret, and wished myself seated in it, and continuing my journey.

Having, with the assistance of my watch and my very slender Slavonic vocabulary, contrived to make Anton understand that we were to start at eight the next morning, and having now borne this examination and exhortation for several hours, I began to consider how I should best sound a retreat from the circle of my spectators, I cannot say audience. At the first indication the whole rose in arms. They had not half enjoyed my company. Besides, supper was coming in, and forthwith my hostess enumerated one greasy dish after another, with various amalgamations of reputed English origin. May I be forgiven for inwardly shuddering as I thought of my late diet of sago and rice-pudding. And now, being thus far, though it was evident my conduct was the most flagrant breach of Narva decorum ever known, I persisted, being hardly able to stand, on retiring to rest, and at last broke through the ring. The next morning, by half-past eight, no carriage was visible; nine o'clock, half-past nine came, and still Anton appeared not; and now I elucidated that, in the hopes of my being induced to meet another select circle that evening, my hostess had remanded my carriage sine die.

But off went the wilful Englishwoman, certainly leaving the Russian ladies to marvel at her ill-breeding, down, probably, to the present hour.

The inns, or post-houses, in the province of Estonia, a comparatively new appendage of the empire, were not found in any respect superior to those of the older dominion; and the traveller does not affect indifference to the accommodations and comforts of civilized life: so that, it is probable, her most joyous moment in this journey from England, until, at its termination, she was clasped in the embrace of the sister, for whose sake she had made so unusual an effort, was when, at a rather decent post-house where the glazed windows were bright, and the floor clean and fresh sanded, she saw and "could have worshipped" a regular eight-day clock, emblazoned, "Thomas Hunter, Fenchurch-street." The mystery of the bright windows, and clean sanded floor, were soon explained. "Twenty years before, the host had spent some months in England, and had he denied it, his habits would have borne witness to it; for the table was neatly spread, water and towels placed." We hope that every foreigner may profit as much by a few months sojourn among us. That night the wearied traveller slept safely below her sister's roof, in the Domberg, which is the aristocratic quarter of Reval. And now the interest of her narrative fairly commences, with the "unlocking hearts, and unpacking trunks."

Even in that empire of strangely mixed races, the Russian, the province of Estonia presents some remarkable features. Originally under the nominal sway of Denmark, it was transferred, in the fourteenth century, to the Teutonic Knights; from whom the present body of nobility claim their descent. It subsequently passed to the dominion of Sweden, and was finally ceded by Sweden to Peter the Great, in 1721, as we have since seen Finland, and on nearly similar terms. Russian policy enjoins the show of liberality to its new subjects. The province was permitted to retain the senate of the knights, a kind of provincial house of nobles, which still, once in three years, exercise certain privileges in managing their own affairs, and enact certain pageants at Reval. The population now consists of Estonians, Germans, and Russians; the former being the peasantry, and still speaking their original language; while the nobles use the dialect of the German, derived from their knightly Teutonic ancestors. Until so late as 1828, the peasantry were actual serfs. Save in name, their condition is not yet much better; and the oligarchical institutions of the province present a bar to the advancement of civilisation; though in Reval, once a branch of the Hanseatic league and a place of commercial importance, there appears something like the germ of a middle-class, and, certainly, a higher degree of mental civilisation than among the noblesse,—if knowledge of the refined arts be held a truer test, than the presence of a barbarous pomp and vulgar ostentation. This is incidentally shown by our letter-writer, in describing the difficulty of getting up a charity concert, when Madame Rossi—once the Sontag of Europe—found her most efficient assistants, not among the sons and daughters of the noble houses, who hold to the royal road, or short cut to Art, but among those of the honest burghers of Reval. Of the noble class it is observed—

> Some offered for music's sake, and other for fashion's sake; and parts were eagerly demanded by the élite among the bathing guests at Reval, as well as by a few practised singers belonging to a musical club among the roodeliche, or not noble, who unfortunately are the only class in Estonia who keep up any interest in such pursuits. These formed an excellent fond to keep wavering voices right, for most of the fashionables thought chorus-singing would come by inspiration, and, when we all removed to Reval for the final rehearsals, were as innocent of their right parts as if they had never seen them. . . . . These ladies were worse to teach than charity-girls. Some of them deemed the rehearsals utterly superfluous, others left their parts behind them, and others were so inveterately in good humour, that it was difficult to scold them for being as much out of tune.

Next to emancipating the serfs of Estonia, Nicholas ought, by his imperial fiat, to abolish that peculiar privilege of the Estonian barons, which must continue to act as a complete bar to the improvement of the noble class; to the rise of a middle order; and to social progress. This is not the law of primogeniture, nor yet of entail—institutions warmly admired by our authoress,—but a corporate right possessed by the nobles, which is more detrimental than either. The entire territory of the province, is divided into above six hundred noble domains, or baronies, after the manner of feudal usages; and though these estates may pass from one noble family to another, and very frequently do, they cannot be purchased by any one that is not, so to say, matriculated of the order of nobility. The wealthiest merchant of Reval cannot become a landed proprietor; and intermarriages between the two classes are regarded as degrading and disgraceful mesalliances. This English lady sportively advised one of those poor, landed, long-legged, proud Barons, to marry the pretty and accomplished heiress of a rich Reval merchant. The joke did not take.

With true appreciation of all that is picturesque, antique, and cordial, in their old-fashioned, buckram, and stereotyped manners, our fair traveller is quite alive to the low intellectual condition of the Estonian nobility; among whom, moreover, the most scrupulous observance of a rigid ceremonial, is as far from being the guarantee of high or refined morality, as among the less stiff Russians. What shall we say of the state of a society, in which the sexes, in their hours of social intercourse and relaxation, are completely separated, save while consuming their victuals at the same plenteous board—for it is not to be called dining, or supping together,—or while actually engaged in the dance, to which the fair partner comes when called, and, when it is over, vanishes, and alone, to regain the herd of her gossips in another apartment? But we waste space in these preliminary remarks, which were better filled up with some of our author's charming and vivid pictures. After spending a few days with her sister, in that aristocratic quarter, the Domberg,—which predominates over the old picturesque town, like a feudal castle over its dependent village, and which is cut off from vulgar contamination, by something resembling the ancient warlike defences of high walls, gates, and draw-bridges,—the family removed to their baronial residence, at about a day's journey from Reval, and a new world opened up to the English lady. After travelling all day through a richly-wooded landscape, she—

> Arrived in the evening before a grand crescent-shaped building, recalling in size and form the many-tenemented terraces of Regent's Park. If the exterior promised fair, the interior far surpassed all expectation, and I have only to shut my eyes to a certain roughness and want of finish to fancy myself in a regal residence. The richness of the architectural ornaments,—the beauty of the frescoes and painted ceilings,—the polish of the many-coloured and marble-like parquêtes,—the height, size, and proportion of the apartments, produce a tout ensemble of the utmost splendour, entirely independent of the aid of furniture, which here, like the Narva chairs, seems to have been constructed before comfort was admitted to form an ingredient in human happiness.

It is a strange assimilation, this splendid case built over the simplest, most primitive customs. The family have no fixed hour for rising, and sometimes you find only your host's empty coffee-cup, whilst he is abroad or busy writing ere you have risen; or you meet a servant bearing his slender breakfast to him in bed, and long after you are settled to the occupation of the day, you see him emerging from his dormitory in his dressing-gown, and with a most sleepy face. Breakfast is here not considered a meal, and not half the respect paid to it which the simplest lunch-tray would command with us; some take it standing, others smoking, and the children as often as not run off with their portion of butterbrod to devour it in comfort in some little niche, or upon the base of a pillar in the magnificent salle; or facilitate the act of mastication by a continual wandering from place to place, which upon English carpets would be considered nothing less than petty treason. Then at one o'clock we all pass through the suite of rooms to a dining-room, spacious and splendid enough for Crockford's Club-house, where an excellent, plentiful, and formal repast is served, generally preceded by what they call here Frühstück, or breakfast, (the real breakfast, according to the acceptation of the term, being simply denominated café,) which is not treated as a midway morsel to silence the voice of appetite, but looked upon as a herald, the dinner being in full view, to summon and encourage all the powers of relish and enjoyment. Accordingly it consists of highly-spiced or salted dishes,—of strong Swiss cheese, pickled fish, black puddings, sausages,—washed down with a glass of potent liqueur, which the elder ladies seem to enjoy quite as much as the gentlemen. The cuisine is German, upon a foundation of native dishes, one of which especially no foreigner can pass a Wednesday or a Saturday in this country without tasting; for, by old established custom, on these two days a kind of pudding made of oatmeal, and called Brei, regularly recurs in lieu of soup; being handed round by one servant, while another follows with an ample jug of the richest cream, which you pour over your smoking hot brei without any reserve. Cream enters into a number of dishes, and is used with a liberality which, except in the cases of its being eaten sour, covers in my view a multitude of culinary sins. Another peculiarity of daily occurrence is the rye bread, here slightly fermented for the table of the family, and most powerfully so for that of the attendants, and which a palate requires the initiation of a few weeks ere it can relish. White bread is here considered as a delicacy little inferior to cake, being made of the finest Moscow flour, easily recognisable by its dryness and insipidity, while the term brod is conventionally restricted exclusively to the long chocolate-coloured rye loaves; and several dear little blonde wiseheads were infinitely amused at the ignorance of the English visiter, who at dinner called for Schwarzbrod, black-bread. The mode of waiting is the same as in Germany—the dishes are carved at the sideboard, and carried round,—a plan which sometimes occasions great mortification, for by the time the solitary lump of meat has been laboured through, swallowed past redemption, and your plate removed, exactly that vegetable succeeds which would have given it the requisite relish. . . . . Tea at six is a slight meal, the beverage itself being of the finest description; but supper is a solemn repast of several courses, when so much is eaten that it is no wonder but little appetite survives for breakfast.

Servants of both sexes swarm here as numerously as in a house of the same rank in England—the one, it is true, with rusty coat and unblacked boots, but the other neat and tidy, generally still in her village costume, if unmarried her hair braided simply and picturesquely round her head, who goes sliding over the parquête floors, and, such is the inconvenience of these thoroughfare houses, has no other passage from her working-room, to the kitchen than through the whole splendid suite of drawing-rooms. Here, as in all countries in an early stage of civilisation, the women labour twice as willingly and effectually as the man. As household servants they become trustworthy and active, work with their needle, wash, and dress hair superiorly well, while the Estonian ladies require so much attendance, and accustom their servants to consider them as so helpless, that it has cost me a severe dumb struggle with an officious lady's-maid to assert the independence of my own habits.

The oatmeal pudding—the liberality in the use of cream, where there is no market for dairy produce—what is it, but old Scotland, in remoter places, down even to the passing hour?—while the rye-bread, is exactly the sour-bread, still used in Cumberland and Westmoreland. To the neat serving maiden, we may still find counterparts, in those remote places at home where wages are low and manners simple;—but where, in England, beyond the rare and notable wife of a large dairy farmer, shall we find anything resembling the over-tasked baroness? The delicate wives of the Georgian and Columbian planters, expiring under the fatigue and responsibility of managing and providing for their hundreds of black serfs, are not more to be pitied.

After taking a review of the dwelling-rooms and bedrooms, all spacious and airy, and wanting nought save that most desirable of all bed-room requisites, privacy, my hostess led the way to her schafferei, or store-room, and, unlocking the door with a slight solemnity of manner, ushered me into a crowded treasury of household goods. The room was a very warehouse, hung round, fitted up, and strewed about with the numerous items of a housekeeper's economy, to which those who only consume them often attach too little importance, and those who have to provide them too much. Side by side on the floor stood big-bodied bottles of spirit and liqueur, rolls of coarse linen, jars of pickles and preserves, hanks of wool, loaves of sugar, and bundles of flax. In deep chests around were the Moscow flour, salt, sago, saffron, starch, &c., &c., while tiers of drawers displayed large provisions of native dried apples, pears, cherries, pease, beans, birch-twigs, applied as a decoction for wounds,—in short, a perfect Hortus siccus for kitchen use. Around hung balls of twine and yarn, nets, corks, candles of as many colours and sizes as those offered to the Virgin of Cæsan, tanned sheep-skins both black and white, and numberless other pendent treasures, while one side was fitted up in numerous partitions, where the raisins, figs and spices for daintier palates were stored. This schafferei is the particular sanctuary of the lady of the house, who, if she do all, has enough business to transact. For the duties of an Estonian wirthschaft, or ménage, are not confined to ordering dinner, or scolding servants, but, like those of our grandmothers a few generations back, who directed the weighty concerns of a large country residence, include the weaving of linen, the making of candles, the boiling of soap, brewing of liqueurs, &c.; and communication with distant towns being necessarily seldom, it requires no small forethought to provide that during the long months of winter the family shall never fail in sugar or plums, nor the many hangers-on in the back settlements of the house in the mere stable articles of subsistence. It is true every lady has her housekeeper to advertise her that there is no more home-brewed vinegar in the bottle, or home-made starch in the tub, or, if she be unusually wealthy, an extra assistant, emphatically styled a Mamselle, on whom all these base cares descend; but housekeepers and mamselles will be human as well as their mistresses, and sometimes all three unite in forgetting some important trifle, which equally spoils the dinner and the temper of the Hausherr for several days.

How would our refined aristocratic ladies like to return to this kind of life,—to what they consider the ignoble cares and household drudgery, from which the progress of society, the increase of wealth, and humanising civilisation, have relieved them, and also many women of greatly inferior rank? After carefully locking up this baronial store, the keys and safety of which must involve a heavy responsibility, the exploratory, or showing-off walk, was continued by the happy sisters. The housekeeper's and servants' rooms came next; the housekeeper being a most important functionary in such an establishment. These rooms were not exactly after the pattern of the snug, carpeted, and wainscoted, and picture-hung parlours of the well-dressed housekeepers of our squires of all degrees.—But we shall see the domestic accommodations of the feudal baron, in their most picturesque and sunniest aspect.

We continued our walk to the housekeeper's rooms, very comfortable and warm, with three little children and half a dozen chickens sharing the brick floor;—to the kitchen, where the men cooks were in active preparation round their flat stoves; and then on to the Volkstube, or people's room, where all the lower servants, the coachmen and grooms, (here not included as house servants,) the cow-girls and the sheep-boys, &c., all come in for their meals at stated times, and muster between twenty and thirty daily. This was a room for an artist—a black earthen floor, walls toned down to every variety of dingy reds, blacks, and yellows, with a huge bulwark of a stove of a good terra cotta colour, and earthen vessels, and wooden tubs and benches; and, in short, every implement of old-fashioned unwieldiness and picturesque form. But the chief attractions were the inmates, for, hard at work, plying their spinning-wheels, sat, either singly or in groups, about fifteen peasant girls—their many-striped petticoats, and dull blue or gray cloth jackets, their tanned locks falling over their shoulders, and deep embrowned spinning-wheels, telling well against the warm tones around them. In some the hair was of so light a hue as exactly to repeat the colour of the flax upon their spindles, and these, the housekeeper informed us in broken German, were the surest of husbands—flaxen hair being a feature that the hearts of the peasants are never known to resist. Most of these picturesque damsels were barefooted, and one pretty yellow-haired lassie, observing that she was particularly an object of attention, let her hair fall like a veil over her stooping face, and peeped archly at us from between the waving strands. I can't say that any of these young ladies looked particularly clean or inviting, but every vice has its pleasant side, and the worst of dirt and filth is, they are so picturesque. Some of them rose on being addressed, and, stooping low, coaxed us down with both hands—much as if they were trying to smooth down our dresses. This is the national salutation to their superiors, especially if there be a request to make. Further on stood a stout kitchen-girl, her jacket thrown off, and only her shift over her shoulders, kneading in a deep trough with a strong wooden bat the coarse bread which is called by distinction the Volksbrod, or people's bread. The spinning-girls belong to the estate, and attend at the hof, or court, as the seigneur's house is termed, for so many weeks in the winter, to spin under the housekeeper's superintendence; nor do they appear very averse to this labour, for, besides the smart grooms and soft shepherds who assort with them at meal-times, this Volkstube is the resort of every beggar and wandering pedlar, and the universal tattleshop of the neighbourhood.

The further branches of this spinning department are among the most interesting of a lady's wirthschaft.

According to a custom not long exploded in our own country, this kind of domestic manufacture was always carried on by the lady-housewife, on a scale proportioned to the number of her daughters, and her own noble ambition to accumulate linen and cloth of all sorts. In Estonia, as once in England, and until lately in Scotland—

A careful parent, who concludes that her daughter is born in order, one time or other, to fulfil Nature's great law, cannot well begin to amass too early, and ere the infant be fairly out of its long clothes, the first foundation of the dozen-dozens of sheets and table-linen, which are to give her additional grace in the eyes of her lord, is laid. In former days this was carried to a much greater extent, and a happy house full of daughters groaned with the growing treasures of their Austeuer, or dowry.

This lady is learned upon the advantages of stoves; and we must confess, that neither all philosophy, nor yet all good common-sense, are monopolized by our own faultless island notwithstanding its multitudinous comforts. Ventilation she considers to be tolerably well provided for in the great houses, by the size of the rooms, and from them all opening into each other, and thus forming one enormous apartment, and from the entire absence of curtains and carpets; and she remarks of the stove-heated rooms—

This equable temperature, to live in, retire to rest, and rise by, is certainly the most agreeable luxury, and there can be no surprise that foreigners rail at our rooms which freeze them by the window or scorch them by the fire; but a more important fact attending this general distribution of heat consists in the absence of all pulmonary complaints and rheumatic maladies in this severe climate, though the want of fresh air—no necessary attendant, however, on this mode of heating—engenders other diseases. How many a delicate girl in our own consumption-stricken land lays the first stone of her early grave in her finishing year at some boarding-school, where she sleeps in a freezing atmosphere, never sufficiently warms herself by day, and frequently fails in that generous diet which might qualify these evils!

The out-door buildings—the offices of this large and rambling establishment—were next examined. They were upon the same gigantic scale.

After this summary of the house, and the various pros and cons of its internal economy, you must now accompany me to the numerous buildings scattered around, all on the same scale of grandeur as itself, where the domestic herds pass their long winter in shelter, warmth, and almost darkness. In the first we entered, a noble edifice 120 feet long, and supported down the centre by a row of solid pillars, above a thousand sheep were most magnificently lodged, affording as they congregated round their cribs, or quietly stopped eating to gaze upon us, a most novel and striking picture of a vast northern fold. In another building was a herd of stalled cattle, some destined for slaughter, others milch-kine, with many a barefooted peasant-girl and half-full machine of milk at their sides. Further on, the pigs had their domicile, and the fowls theirs, and in the midst of these buildings rose the Brandtwein's Küche, or brandy-kitchen, where the process of distilling from rye, barley, or potatoes, goes on night and day; the refuse grains of which contribute to fatten the cattle we have just quitted. It will easily be supposed that the task of calculating and providing food for this multiplication of mouths, all dependent on the help of man, is no light one. Every animal has so many pounds of hay allotted to him per day, and each week's consumption is something which it never entered into the heart of an English farmer to conceive: and, if the winter exceed its usual limits—if these poor quadrupeds, which go up into their annual ark in the month of October, be not released till the beginning of May, a scarcity of food can hardly be hindered. Fresh litter is strewed daily, which never being removed, the cattle stand at least six feet higher at the close than at the commencement of their captivity. In this consists the main provision of manure for the summer's use. The sheep were all of a picked Merino breed, to which the closest attention is paid to preserve it intacte. This is a branch of husbandry only lately undertaken in Estonia, and at present attended with great success and profit. . . . . From the farm-yard we turned our course to the garden, or what will prove to be such when this three feet of snow shall have disappeared. Here were also a number of tender creatures under shelter in the noble line of greenhouses and hothouses, while the graperies and peacheries were in different stages of forwardness—the trees in the latter just putting forth their delicate pink blossoms. These, however, and the other usual exotic tenants of such glass-houses, elicited no sentiment beyond that of admiration.

And these are probably a rare, and certainly but a modern feature, in Estonian residences.

We shall leave our author's vivid descriptions of her exhilarating winter walks, in this new region, to the lovers of nature and poetry. The frequent appearance of the wolves, that still abound in the province, in which a thousand are killed in a year, gave these pedestrian excursions the heightening touch of a small danger.

Christmas—blessings be on it!—comes with its joyous, old-fashioned, quaint, and merry face, to lengthen the long arctic winter, and is kept with due observance for three days. The Old Style is still observed in Estonia, as in older parts of Russia.

The established religion of the province, is not that of the Greek church, but the Lutheran. Religion, however, seems to be considered something far too vulgar for the noble barons, though necessary to the peasants; and the clergy—a poor body—are still much in the same condition as were those of England, when Parson Adams drank his cup of ale in Squire Booby's kitchen. The functions of the clergy and their emoluments, are much the same as in Norway, where the minister's place is no sinecure.

On the first of the glorious three days of Christmas, the Englishwoman was invited to accompany her friends, to dine with a neighbouring family, only about thirty miles off, and at the usual early hour of the country. She accordingly began to dress in the morning, for the evening party. Personal warmth being first duly provided for, so far as woollens and furs could accomplish this difficult business, with the thermometer at 5° of Fahrenheit, our traveller gives this graphic description of sledging, which we have heard other experienced individuals mention, as not always that easy, gliding, exhilarating motion, of which Yankee poets dream.

It must not be supposed that sledging is here such smooth gliding work as it is generally represented; on the contrary, a succession of drifts, worn into deeper declivities and higher ascents by the continual traffic, will subject you to a bumping kind of movement, which, in spite of your solid feather-bed casing, is neither convenient nor agreeable. Then suddenly the sledge declines a fathom deep on one side, and out flies the coachman's or footman's leg to act as an additional prop, and you lie comfortably cradled upon your half-suffocated companion, when, with a loud jingle of all four horses, the sledge is jerked out of the hole, and the travellers once more stuck upright. And then, perhaps, when the track becomes narrower, the outer horses are driven into the loose deep snow, and one of them tumbles over head and ears into an invisible ditch, whence, his long traces giving him perfect liberty, he clambers out again unassisted, shakes the snow from his sides, and snorts and stamps with the utmost impatience to be off again.

But the road was got over, though the journey might not have been quite a pleasure drive; and presently—

The great structure of Fähna—for such was the name of the residence to which we were bound—was soon seen rearing itself in the distance, a square mass against the sky, without a tree or object near it. Here, our wrappers being gradually peeled off, we issued like butterflies from our woollen cells, and were ushered into a large assembly, where the hostess, a pretty graceful young woman, came forward, and welcomed us with the utmost courtesy and good breeding, and even found a few pleasing, though imperfect, words in English to say to her foreign visiter, with a kindness of manner and intention which quite won my heart. Immediately upon our arrival the frühstück of Swiss cheese, and pickled strömlin, a fish peculiar to Estonia, with red and white liqueurs, was handed round, after which a servant whispered something to the hostess, who rose, and with a distinct voice and graceful manner, simply said, "May I beg you all to table?" and, herself taking the lead with the oldest gentleman of the party, we filed off, a party of at least fifty, a cluster of little boys and girls bringing up the rear; for an invitation to the heads of a family is tacitly understood to include all the olive-branches, however numerous or tender. As each couple entered the dining-room, the cavalier bowed profoundly, disengaged himself, and went his way, while all the ladies seated themselves on one side and all the gentlemen on the other, the hostess heading the table, whilst her husband mingled with his male guests. Conversation was therefore restricted to the different lines, and the process of serving dinner absolving, as I have before observed, the gentlemen from all obligation of courtesy, and no intimation to venture a conversation across the narrow table being apparent, not a single gentleman addressed his fair vis-à-vis during the whole repast. This is an additional reason for retaining our old English mode, as engendering trifling attentions, which tend to keep up the outward semblance of good breeding, the absence of which, I am inclined to think, in some measure, contributes to the Transatlantic style of manners which are observable among the present generation of young Estonian nobles. The courtesies of the table began with the well-side and water-drawing times of the patriarchs; the woman-despising Turk eats alone. My own position was very enviable between two charming lady-like women, who proved the most agreeable representatives of their country. The dinner was sumptuous, with a profusion of splendid glass and plate, the latter, as well as the beautiful damask linen, marked with the maiden name of our hostess, and which, it may be as well to mention here, though I should grieve to see that pretty animated face shrouded beneath a mourning cap, all revert with the rest of her dowry to the widow on her husband's death. Among the novel dishes introduced on this occasion, was the elk, a harmless animal which infests the Livonian woods, in flavour much resembling venison, and a preserve of rose-leaves, a luscious kind of ambrosia, like eating perfumes, or a smack of paradise on earth; and lastly, a dish which the season alone rendered peculiar, for who would have thought of ices on Christmas day? But no one could quarrel with the cold interloper, for the room was hot to suffocation, and the delicious walnut-cream ice melted most gratefully down our throats. When the last dishes of fruits and bon-bons had been handed round, our hostess rose, and, the gentlemen clustering at the door, each resumed his lady where he had left her, and, conducting her into the next room, again made his bow and escaped. Coffee was now handed round, and a long and superb suite of rooms being open to us, the whole party of ladies paraded up and down in distinct groups; after which the matrons sat down to sober converse, and talked, as good wives should do, of their children and their wirthschaft, and some drew forth little ladylike bits of embroidery, on which their fair fingers were soon busied, while the older ones knitted away most energetically at the "weary pund."

Meanwhile the younger portion, including many beautiful and graceful young women, well dressed, and elegant in manner, clustered together in girlish guise, in the deep recesses of the windows, or round the piano, or played at bagatelle with many an animated laugh and jest. And where were the gentlemen all this time?

At a subsequent period of her residence, this keen observer and lively writer finishes her picture of Estonian modes and manners, and presents us with a family-party, coeval with the age of the Grandisons, at the latest.

By the word family-party, I must beg not to be understood one of those rude, indecorous gatherings—those social Babels of our native land, where brothers, sisters, cousins, nephews, and nieces meet together to banter, tease, and laugh; but an orderly meeting of courteous individuals, who know what befits their dignity, and are above taking advantage of the bonds of relationship to indulge in any promiscuous levity!—fie upon it! Even the very furniture partakes of the general feeling; —hard stuffed, bright polished, and richly carved, there is no indelicate straying about the rooms like our loose-mannered, depraved, forward generation, who come before they are called; but each stands austerely in its place, and waits to be sought. The ladies curtsy, the gentlemen bow, and sometimes a fair hand is reverently kissed, while the lady—for such is the peculiar custom both here and in Russia—is expected to dive down and imprint a chaste salute on the extreme confine of the cheek, or very tip of the ear, or any other part of the gentleman's physiognomy thus employed which her lips can reach. This requires some practice to do gracefully. . . . . This is looked upon by the gentlemen as their undoubted perquisite; and I have seen a pretty foreignwoman gravely reprimanded by her dull Estonian lord for hesitating to comply. It would be hard to say what grade of relationship or exigency of circumstance would compel an Estonian nobleman to forget that he is not to be at his ease, according to our western notions of such. On the other hand, to a lover of antiquity, this living representation of by-gone manners is highly interesting. At every moment I am reminded of some trait which increasing luxury and increasing retrenchment have equally conspired to banish from our soil. Here every country gentleman keeps open house, and no account is taken of how many mouths there are to fill, whether in hall, kitchen, or stable. The houses are vast, grand, and incommodious, and countless hangers-on and dependants supply the economy of steps by a superfluity of feet. The Seigneurs here never move about with less than four horses, and often six,—rusty equipments it is true;—but it is a mistake to imagine that the coaches and four of our ancestors were marked by the same neatness and finish which now attend the commonest pair; or that their neighbourly meetings were distinguished by that ease, sociability, and intellect which render the English society of the present day so delightful. On the contrary, as soon as the scanty topics of the day were exhausted, they all sat down to cards, and that perhaps by broad daylight, like too many of the Estonian gentlemen. Then, as now here, all natural products were plentiful and cheap, and all artificial objects scarce and dear; and the manners to correspond were hospitable in the main, but rigidly formal in detail.

But there is one rare and beautiful feature in Estonian social relations—the absence of family quarrels—and one to us unaccountable, save, probably, from the absence of the root of all evil. Another softening and kindred feature of this condition of society, is the social equality of all belonging to a certain class, without respect to their wealth. It is remarked that—

All those born in a certain station retain it, whether their means be adequate or not, and are admitted into society with no reference as to whether they can return the obligation. Otherwise I do not believe the real morality of the community in any way advanced by their rigid outward decorum. Like people who first peel their apple and then eat the paring, it comes to the same thing in the end. Consistent with the spirit of an old picture, they bend all their attention to the minutiæ of a fold, and neglect the first principles of perspective. Harmless freedoms are controlled with bars of iron, while, from the facility of divorce, and other laxities which the Lutheran religion allows, many a sin walks in broad daylight, without so much as a cobweb over it.

The class upon whom this prohibition of harmless freedoms, or in other words this chain upon natural spirits, falls heaviest, is that of the unfortunate little Estonian young ladies. Children of all ages are here palmed upon all society, greatly to mutual inconvenience.

Russian manners are gradually creeping into Estonia, to the great alarm of its noble, elderly patriots, the descendants of the Teutonic knights. Nicholas wishes to suck them into the vortex of his mighty system of centralization, and their provincial senate opposes no effectual bar; while interest and ambition powerfully draw the Estonian youth, who often find employment in the civil or military service of the emperor, in the desired direction. The Russian language here, as in all other Russian dependencies, has, in the schools and universities, superseded the native tongues. The ukase of the emperor, requiring that all the children of a Russian parent, whether father or mother, shall be of the Greek religion, while living in Russia—the modest emperor not exacting Conformity from his subjects in countries, where there is no Greek church—has offered no obstacle to the amalgamation going forward; as a larger fortune, with a Russian bride, compensates the Estonian youth beforehand, for his progeny giving up the religion of his ancestors, and adopting that of the emperor, along with other minor regulations and matters, such as the length of spurs, and the curl of moustaches. The Estonian peasant alone, who has, indeed, no motive for changing his faith, remains firm to the form of Christianity to which it was so difficult to win his Pagan ancestors. And now we come to the social condition of the emancipated peasantry—the aborigines of the province, the genuine Scythians—whose manners and condition have not very materially changed, in the many generations which have witnessed the revolutions going on among his varied and distant sovereigns. The specimen chosen is from the better class of the peasantry; those holding the greatest extent of land, and consequently doing the most service to their feudal lord.

Wishing to see the Estonian peasant under every aspect, I requested my hostess—one whose heart feels interest in the most stupid, and love for the most contemned, of her adopted countrymen—to exhibit to me some peasant's dwelling which might fairly represent the comforts of this class. Accordingly we drove to the abode of a hard-working, respectable Estonian, about three wersts removed, and were helped out of our sledge by a gaunt host with streaming locks, who stroked us down in the national fashion, and begged us to enter. The house was a one-storied erection, built of roughly-squared logs, and occupying as much space as any of our large old-fashioned farm-houses, with a double wall on the entrance side, separated by a passage of about six feet wide, which greatly tends both to warmth in winter and coolness in summer. In this passage an extremely filthy sow and a whole litter of little pigs were grunting and tumbling about with some other little animals, seemingly of the same generic origin, but which, on nearer inspection, proved to be part of our host's youthful family. To pass through the inner wall we stepped over a high ledge, through an aperture wide enough for a Lambert, but hardly high enough for a child of twelve years old, more adapted apparently for quadrupeds than for men. Once housed, we were obliged to wait a few minutes before our eyes accustomed themselves to the darkness, or threw off the film of water with which the strong stinging atmosphere of wood-smoke obscured them, when the first object we discerned was a rosy peasant-girl weaving a piece of linen in the same gloom by which we could scarcely distinguish the loom. The room where we stood was at least twenty-five feet long; with a black earthen floor, strewn with fir-tips, and the chief object was the great stove. This was a huge mass of masonry towering among the dry rafters of the roof, with rough ledges of stones, up and down which a second litter of children were climbing in their shifts, while on the highest ledge lay a baby fast asleep. A projecting shelf of wood ran round two sides of the room, about two feet from the floor, which, strewn with straw, serves as the family-bed for the night, is converted by day to any household use, and was conveniently fitted up with hen-coops underneath. There was no chimney in this apartment, and no light but from the low door. Further on were two other rooms, mere little dens, with a pane of dusky glass in each, and a few articles of furniture—a couple of chairs, and chests for clothes—the same roof houses, the little horse, and other cattle. There was nothing in all this to disgust—hard fare and independent habits,—and when we took our leave, we made the little shock-headed children very happy with some rolls of white bread, a dainty they see much more rarely than our poor children do cake.

This peasant occupies about twenty-five acres of land, upon the estate where I am sojourning. Every estate is thus parcelled out, the proprietor having a considerable portion under his own management, the rest being divided among the peasants, who, from time immemorial, have belonged to the land, and till within the last few years in the condition of serfs. The same fields, therefore, for which they formerly paid a rent, limited only by the will of the Herr, or lord, they now hold upon a tenure fixed by law, which is as follows:—Each peasant householder, or Wirth, occupies so much land, for which he pays rent in the shape of so many days' labour, man and horse, per week, upon the lord's fields; by certain contributions of corn; and of a calf, a goose, so many fowls or eggs, and so many bundles of flax—all of which last small tithes generally come within the lady's department, who has thus the products of a most extensive farm-yard to register and superintend. The smaller the occupation, the fewer the days of labour to perform, and the poorer the peasant. A so-called two days' Wirth generally performs the requisite labour in his own person, but a six days' Wirth, a rank which the peasant we had just quitted occupies, sends his labourers to supply his place, and, by sending two men three successive days, has the rest of his week undisturbed. Upon this estate, no less than 360 days' work is contributed weekly, and yet the labour is not equal to the demand. This allotment per week is the only fair arrangement, for, though many a week in winter occurs when no man can work, yet were the proprietor to claim all his permitted days only in the summer, the peasant would not have a day left to reap or sow for himself.

The act of enfranchisement in Estonia has not been accompanied by the advantages which those who abstractedly reckon the state of independence too high, and that of serfage too low, might expect.

We must give time. The white serfs of Estonia, Courland, and Livonia, had no Methodist or Baptist missionaries labouring among them, for a previous half-century, and preparing them for the unknown and unvalued blessing of their human birthright. They have, besides, the misfortune of being only half emancipated,—raised to the dignity of paying a poll-tax, and being forced to become soldiers, but having no more to say than their masters, as to what the amount of that tax shall be, or whether they are able to pay it or not. The act of emancipation produced one amusing consequence. This was the adoption of family names, by those who had, from time immemorial, been only designated by the baptismal appellation. On the estate of this lady's brother-in-law, we are told—

It cost the lord and lady no little trouble and invention to hunt up the requisite number and variety of names for the tenants of their estates. The gentleman took the dictionary—the lady, Walter Scott, for reference—with us it would have been the Bible—and homely German words were given, or old Scottish names revived, which may one day perplex a genealogist. The worst of it was, these poor creatures were very difficult to please, and many a young man, who went away happy with his new family distinction, returned the next day with a sheepish look, owning that his lady had put him out of conceit of it, and that he would trouble the Erra (the Estonian corruption of Herr) to provide him with another, not seldom ending by begging leave to adopt the aristocratic, unsullied, sixteen or thirty-two quartered name of the Count or Baron under whom he served. But, however liberal of his neighbours' names, the Estonian noble is in no hurry to bestow his own; far from running the risk of such vile identity, he does not even allow the peasant the same national appellation which countrymen of the same soil, whether high or low, generally wear alike. The aristocrat is an Esthländer, the peasant an Esthe. The noble's wife is a Frau, the peasant's a Weib, and any transposition of these terms would be deemed highly insulting.

Specimens of the best-looking of the young peasantry were selected as subjects for the lady's sketch-book; and one Estonian yellow-haired Apollo, though at first delighted to have his likeness drawn, became as much alarmed for the consequences, as the Red Indians of the Missouri, whom Mr. Catlin painted there. He feared that he might be sent to Siberia, in consequence of this paper-and-pencil spell,—or to England! The peasants were seen to some advantage in the church of the village, which is five miles distant from the baronial residence, and rarely visited by its inhabitants.

Here we found the peasants' sledges standing in double rows as thick along the road as the carriages before the Opera-house at a morning concert; and, entering through a dense crowd, smelling strongly of their sheep-skin habiliments, and the smoky atmosphere in which they live, we mounted a gallery to a pew reserved for the family, whence we looked down upon a platform of human heads of every variety of rich blondes and and browns—blacks there were but few, and grays none at all; though of wrinkles, failing limbs, and other signs of age, there was a premature profusion. The service, which was in Estonian, had commenced, and, after the first careless wonder with which you listen to a new language subsided, my eyes busied themselves with what was around them.

The men were all on one side, their long hair, untouched by scissars since their birth, divided down the centre of the head, and flowing on their shoulders: the women on the other, with high helmet-shaped caps of every variety of bright colour—their gay ribbons and bright locks streaming promiscuously from beneath; or sometimes all this lowly vanity covered with a white handkerchief, which, disposed in a band across the forehead, and falling in ample folds down the cheeks, ennobled many a homely set of features. Beauty there was but little: here and there a young rosy cheek and bright eye shot through the crowd, but the generality were plain rather than ugly. The first impression on the mind of this dense crowd of attentive poor was almost painful. Our Saviour's audiences were only the poor; and amongst the silent listening throng who stood, each leaning with clasped hands upon his foremost neighbour's shoulder—here and there a child held aloft above the crush of limbs, while a row of sick and decrepit beings, ugly, abject, yet venerable, lying on mattresses in every picturesque form, occupied the centre, and Hebrew-draped heads, and Apostolic countenances, crowded around—you missed only the divine aspect from this ready-made and most touching picture. The women were chiefly in sheep-skins or wolf-skins, with gay bands round their waists,—the men in the same, or in a coarse brown cloth, with rows of silver buttons down the breast. The scene was enlivened by the presence of a bridé—in other words, a fiancés—who, at the publication of her banns, has the enviable privilege of appearing before the public in every rag and ribbon which it ever entered the head of any Estonian Madge Wildfire to desire, being literally loaded with all the ribbons, handkerchiefs, and petticoats which herself or her neighbours can muster; only the outer edge of each, in the insolence of her wealth being visible, till the bride looks like the walking pattern-book of the Kirchspiel, or parish, and the admiring swain views at one glance both his companion and her wardrobe for life. . . . . .

The church itself was a heavy ancient building, with simply groined roof, gay bedizened altar, and white-washed walls behung with tin urns and armorial bearings. Before the conclusion of the sermon, a contribution was levied, with long pole and bag at end, as elsewhere, into which Kopecks of all weights and sizes tumbled, upon which the clergyman retreated to the altar, and, facing the audience, chanted a few sentences in a high key. This was the signal for dismissal: the solid mass stirred, and broke up into hundreds of fragments—the reeking church was abandoned—each recognised his own little sledge and horse among multitudes which seemed cast in the same mould—poles stuck—rope-reins entangled—bells jingled—and voices scolded and laughed alternately; and in five minutes the whole congregation were scouring away across the country.

Many of our readers have seen something very much resembling this, if home-made russets and gay tartans are substituted for the skin cloaks required by the severity of the climate. The clergyman, besides their dues for marriages, confirmation, and administering the Sacrament, and the corn given by the landlords, who appoint them to the livings, are paid a certain amount of very small tithes in fowls and eggs by the peasants, who also pay them service in various ways. Our lady thinks the clergy very ill-paid by the peasants, but we question if they are of the same mind. The Estonian clergy have this peculiar duty:—

Besides his weekly duties, and the penance of a cold church seven months in the year, he has to attend the call of his poor parishioners, scattered frequently over a circumference of a hundred wersts; while twice in the year all the boys and girls in the parish assemble for three weeks under his roof, to be instructed and examined previous to confirmation; on which occasions the Frau Pastorin sets all of them to spin her flax, twine her cord, and do other little household jobs, and not seldom has the honour of entertaining the young countesses or baronesses who have come on the same errand, and must pass through the same Lehre. Thus it is that the sacraments are strictly observed, sometimes it is to be hoped for their own sakes, but principally as a political ordinance, by which government keeps its eye on every individual in the realm; obliging him, at stated intervals, to emerge from the deep torrent of Russian population, and bear witness of his existence.

The Estonian peasant is found in the exact state which his degraded and oppressed position, borne down by the double misery of taxation and military conscription, may augur. On those estates where the proprietors are frequently changing, and which are consequently the worst managed, he is found—

A dull brute indeed; insensible to a kindness he mistrusts,—careless of improvement—improvident as the Irishman, without his wit—and phlegmatic as the German, without his industry. Rather than work beyond the minimum of his necessary Corvéage, he will starve. Provided he can have a pipe in his mouth, and lie sleeping in the bottom of his cart, while his patient wife drives the little rough horse, or, what is more frequent, while the latter will go right of itself, he cares little about an empty stomach. Offer him wages for his labour, and he will tell you with the dullest bumpkin look, that if he works more he must eat more; and the fable of the belly and the members has here a different termination to what it had in our young days. On the other hand, on those few estates which have been occupied for several generations by the same family, the peasants appear invariably an active, industrious, and prosperous set—attached to their lord, and ingenious in various trades. . . . In his very crimes the Estonian is a coward; he seldom gets beyond pilfering, and here makes a curious distinction—regarding it as no crime to steal that which cannot squeak or bleat in its own defence. Thus, a pig or a sheep would be the height of iniquity, while a Kümmet of corn, or an Eimer of brandy, are very venial sins. Other crimes he has few, and murder is unknown. The penal list of this last year offers only eighty-seven misdemeanors in a population of above three hundred thousand peasants, and five of these consist merely in travelling without a passport. In this respect, also, the Estonian's conscience is so tender, that the Legislature allows no punishment to be enforced till a voluntary confession has been made—well knowing that no Estonian can be long without making a clean breast. Not so his lofty and lively neighbour, the Russian; whose Legislature might whistle for his voluntary confession. Serf though he be, he is a very Saracen in independence; and his list of crimes would make a wild Newgate Calendar.

Again the scene is shifted to town-life; for to Reval the family returned, when the Land-tag met; and when the town became somewhat like a French provincial city in the days of Madame de Sevigne, at the yearly Assembly of the States. A few noble families and public functionaries throw open their saloons, and there would be a tolerably pleasant society save for the one appalling blank:—

Were it not for the freezing system of separation and formality which pervades the members of the society itself, and which unfortunately has not been left behind them in the country, Reval would be more attractive than many a capital ten times its size. But a spell seems to hang over both man and woman: the best elements of society are at their disposal—splendid rooms—excellent lighting—throngs of attendants—charming music—and the choicest of refreshments; but the gentlemen occupy several apartments with their thronged card-tables, and the ladies sit, stand, or walk about the rest, and, though all imbued with the very spirit of courtesy and good humour, it must be owned, get at length a little tired of one another's company. Or, if sufficient gentlemen can be seduced from the whist or boston tables to form a dance, the cavalier abstains from fetching his lady till the moment the music begins, and remorselessly casts her off the moment it finishes, leaving her to thread her timid way through files of company to the distant corner where her chaperon is seated, and, once free, never approaches her again. Which party is in fault? It is hard to suppose that Estonia's sons are either "so good or so cold" as not to care for the society of a fair and agreeable woman; and it is equally unjust to asperse her daughters with having wearied them of that which they have so little opportunity of bestowing. The ladies impugn the gentlemen, who, to speak candidly, show no desire to break through these imaginary boundaries, for, if but two meet in the same room, they invariably sit together, or walk together, or smoke together, or in some such way illustrate their principles of strict decorum.

Our authoress considers the grievous error mainly chargeable upon the women, but scarcely, we think, makes out her case. She bewails the facility of divorce permitted by the Lutheran religion, without being able to fix upon this evil, for it is one, the many minor blemishes of what is, in many respects besides want of comforts, a very low state of society. The absence of female influence in Estonian society, and its general langour and insipidity, are attributed to early marriages, where there are so many household calls upon the young matron's time and energies, which must consume her leisure, and arrest the course of self-improvement which education has hardly begun. Marriages or courtships are conducted upon the principle of the father being the absolute master of his dutiful daughter; and as girls are married while children, or little more, our traveller, perhaps justly, considers the father the best judge of his daughter's future happiness. Moreover, she imagines that the "sacrifices" are, in general, very light, and willing submissions. But the Circassian girl, it is said, exults in being purchased from her father, loaded with finery, and carried away to be sold at Constantinople to the highest bidder, though, notwithstanding the bliss of her ignorance, her condition is surely not the less morally pitiable.

The noble descendants of the Teutonic knights, so far as the beautiful sex is concerned, do not appear to be more imbued with the spirit of chivalry than their Calmuck neighbours; yet they get on wonderfully in managing that their daughters, in forming matrimonial unions, shall marry in their own station; and shall drive well, lodge well, and dress well; and what more is to be desired by any prudent, noble father? Our authoress was bidden to a marriage at Reval. Invitations in Reval are in general by "word of mouth;" but on this solemn occasion there came a card, intimating that "Mein Tochter" was to be married. The old County, the wealthy father of this young lady, who, among her other names, bore the Ossianic appellation of Malvina, was a rigid household disciplinarian, who had brought his little wife into admirable training; and who managed his three marriageable daughters upon the national plan, modified by his personal tastes. Many suitors had applied to him; for it would have been as idle as it is unusual, to sound the inclinations of the young lady, or even those of her mamma. We are told by our lively authoress on her way to the auspicious marriage of the properly brought-up young lady—

Nor was it till a suitor appeared, backed by a Schulden-freies Gut, a debt-free estate, and other undeniable guarantees for table, garderobe and stud, that he was known to deviate from his usual ominous dismissal, when, walking at his accustomed pace into his daughter's room, he said, "Malvina du bist Braut," to which the dutiful girl replied, "Gut papa," and not so much as inquired "mit wem?" with whom! . . . . . At the appointed hour, we drove in full evening dress to Count ——'s house, and were received at the door by four shivering marshals, or, in other words, bachelors selected from the mutual families, each with a white bride's knot round his arm who ushered us into a room dazzling with excess of light, where sat the formal circle, the married ladies on one hand, the unmarried on the other, and where the countess, a blooming young woman, scarce older-looking than her daughter, received us in silence.

It is so much the habit in our civilized age to regard marriage de convenance as a thing repugnant to human nature, equally tyrannical in act as cheerless in result that though sad experience had taught me the fallacy of trusting the brightest of wedding hopes, or the most impatient of wedding faces, I involuntarily entered these rooms with the feeling of assisting at a sacrifice. Far however, from the system of marriages de convenance being one of oppression and degradation towards the female sex, I am inclined to think that, in a country where custom marries a girl before she can know her mind, far less that of others, and where the rules of society interdict all previous acquaintance, it is, on the contrary, one of mercy and protection. What act can be more tyrannical to the future woman than the indulgence of the girl's so-called first love! What result more cheerless than the vital mistake of a hasty choice.

In the pair about to be united, if the act on the lady's side was not beautified with the graces of affection, yet had she had the widest scope for choice, she could hardly have given her well-wishers more reasonable grounds for hope. For the Bräutigam was one of a family whose simplicity, kindness, and integrity, are proverbial in Estonia—one whom the quiet girl might find it equally easy to obey—or rule.

The marriage, at which there was abundance of eating and drinking, kissing and dancing, ended very like an English wedding of the days of bluff King Hal; and goes far to palliate the graceless modern English custom of the young couple running away to hide their bridal joys and blushes, from the very door of the church where they are made one:—

Then came a grand supper, with toasts and sententious speeches, where the four indefatigable marshals waited on the company, and, returning to the ball-room, the bride vanished, and in the space of a few minutes reappeared clad in an unbecoming matronly cap, her discarded myrtle wreath hanging on her arm. At this all the unmarried girls formed a circle round her, when, with a pensive, suffering look, which brought tears into many a bright eye, she kissed each in sign of farewell from their ranks. The same ceremony was performed by the bridegroom with his comrades, but brought tears into nobody's eyes. Then again the maiden circle encompassed the bride, who stood, a pretty emblem of Cupid, with blinded eyes, and wreath in hand, while they passed round her, but saw well enough to put it on the head of her husband's eldest marriageable sister. This delighted the old count, who rubbed his hands and exclaimed, "Meine Tochter wird eine kluge Frau werden!" my daughter will make a clever wife. The bridegroom was served the same, and by rather a puzzling countertype bestowed his hat upon one of the youngsters surrounding him, who now, with uproarious voices, seized him in their arms, and disregarding his bride's nerves, tossed him aloft, his long legs almost reaching the ceiling, in sign of having utterly cast him out of their fellowship.

Four o'clock struck ere the guests began to depart, but by noon the next day the new married couple were occupied in receiving a throng of morning visiters who came to congratulate. The same day was a large dinnerarly,—the same evening the pair appeared at a public ncert.—The following days were spent in a succession f entertainments, and thus the spring-time of wedded appiness was offered up for the enjoyment of the public. lowhere are there such volumes of high-flown trash ritten on bridal modesty as in Germany, and nowhere it less respected.

The longer our traveller lived in the country, she ame to understand the more deeply the oppressions nder which the peasantry groan.

Though absenteeism is rare—Estonian landlords rving no, or but slender rents to squander, whether Paris, London, or Petersburg—the peasants are ften oppressed by a functionary in the capacity of bailiff, at whose mercy they are left; and who rinds the poor labourers, while he cheats his employer. When to this are added the exactions of he Government, and the conscription, it is not onderful that very few instances occur of an stonian peasant ever rising above his original ondition. In the protracted winters, and frozen prings, of this climate, when man and beast suffer like, the privations of the peasants are often extreme. Spring—our sweet season of spring—is, ndeed, to all living things, the most dismal time of he northern year; but especially to the peasants nd their domestic animals:—

At the beginning of winter the peasant fares well, eats wholesome rye bread, and plenty of it. Towards spring, his stores, never well husbanded, begin to fail, and the coarse rye flour is eked out with a little chopped straw; but, when the season is thus prolonged, this position is reversed, and it is the straw which becomes the chief ingredient of the loaf which is to fill, not nourish, his body—so much so that on exposure to fire this wretched bread will ignite and blaze like a torch. This insufficient fare is often followed by an epidemic—typhus or scarlet fever. The latter especially is the scourge of the land, and almost invariably fatal to children; and villages are sometimes depopulated of their juvenile members, for those who struggle through the fever are carried off by subsequent dropsy. As for prompt medical attendance, how is that to be expected among a poor and widely-scattered population, which not even the highest classes in the land can command? Many a nobleman's family is situated a hundred wersts from medical aid, and thus four-and-twenty fatal hours will sometimes elapse which no skill can recover. Upon the whole, however, the average of health is very good.

But, however it fare with them, the poll-tax must be paid; and if the fatal lot fall upon him, the wretched serf must promptly obey:—

The present rate of Kopf Steuer, or poll-tax, is four roubles sixty kopecks, or about four shillings English per head, not only upon the able-bodied man, but upon every chick and child of male kind—an enormous tax when the relative value of money is considered. A revision of the population takes place every sixteen years, and, if the household pay not for those born unto them in the interim, they do for those taken from them; therefore the crown is no loser, and the ill wind blows no good to the peasant.

The recruiting system falls especially hard upon those provinces tributary to Russia, but otherwise not Russianised. No matter how foreign and incongruous, all atoms that enter that vast crucible, the Russian army, are fused down to the same form. The Estonian, therefore, fares so much worse than the native Russian, in that he leaves not only kindred and home, but language, country, and religion, and furthermore an inherent taste for a pastoral life, which the Russian does not share. From the moment that the peasant of the Baltic provinces draws the fatal lot No. 1, he knows that he is a Russian, and, worse than that, a Russian soldier, and not only himself, but every son from that hour born to him; for, like the executioner's office in Germany, a soldier's life in Russia is hereditary. He receives no bounty-money; on the contrary his parish is charged with the expense of his outfit to the amount of between thirty and forty roubles—his hair, which an Estonian regards as sacred, is cut to within a straw's breadth of his head; and amidst scenes of distress which have touched the sternest hearts, the Estonian shepherd leaves the home of his youth. If wars and climate and sickness and hardship spare him, he returns after four-and-twenty years of service—his language scarce remembered, his religion changed, and with not a rouble in his pocket—to seek his daily bread by his own exertions for the remainder of his life, or to be chargeable to his parish, who by this time have forgotten that he ever existed, and certainly wish he had never returned. Perhaps an order or two decorates him, or reaches him after his dismissal; but the worn-out Russian soldier has little pride in the tokens of that bravery which has consumed his health, strength, and best years, and earned him no maintenance when these are gone.

A family of three children, however, or a personal defect, gives the claim of exemption. With such a service as the Russian in prospect, it is not wonderful that voluntary maiming is frequent. We are informed:—

A stone-mason whom we observed chiselling a delicate piece of sculpture under the utmost strain of sight, for one eye was blinded with a cataract, we strenuously urged to apply for medical aid, but smiling, he replied, "I would not have two eyes for the world—now I can't be taken for a recruit."

On those estates where the population from some cause is not able to make up the necessary number of recruits, a child is delivered over and consigned to the military school at Reval. The crown must have its "pound of flesh." This substitute, however, it accepts most unwillingly, as each of these little Cantonisten, as they are termed, costs government at the rate of thirty kopecks a-day, and not above one-third are reared for actual service. Such is the anxiety of the crown to enforce every means of securing men for the army, that the moment a soldier's wife gives birth to a son the parish authorities are bound to give notice, under penalty of five-and-twenty roubles for every month's delay. So much bread or corn is then allowed for the infant recruit, which is fetched monthly from the nearest town.

But this hangs on a long concatenation of ifs, ending with this important one—If the higher classes in Russia could be depended on for honesty. This traveller, will not, we imagine, receive the Emperor's portrait set with brilliants, high-strained as her compliments of Nicholas and many of the members of his Court are. We should even fear that she has in some instances been indiscreet, and may have compromised some of her friends and entertainers, with this jealous, implacable, and ever-watchful Government.

Though far, indeed, from being the most agreeable portion of her work, her observations are not the least valuable when, in returning from Reval on her way home, she looks more closely into the structure of the Russian Government, and is forced to see the corrupt and dissolute state of morals among the higher classes, unredeemed by any degree of that refinement which strips vice of part of its offence in veiling its grossness. In judging of Russia, she tacitly claims to have dived beneath the froth of that high society with which such persons as the Marquis of Londonderry mingled, and which they paint en beau; and she may be easily acquitted of entertaining the party views of those who write anti-Russian dissertations in pamphlets and periodicals. She is a high, though a rather rational Tory. She reëntered Petersburg about the Christmas and New-Year holidays—a time of unrestrained intercourse, jollity, and carousing there, as in Estonia:—But her strictures upon the policy, and above all, the manners of the court of St. Petersburg, demand more attention and space than we can at present afford.

ENDYMION; OR, A FAMILY PARTY OF OLYMPUS.

A ROMANCE.

BY RECHOBOAM BEN ABRAHAM, JUN., ESQ.

CHAPTER I.

'Twas a hot season in the skies. Sirius held the ascendant, and under his influence even the radiant band of the Celestials began to droop, while the great ball-room of Olympus grew gradually more and more deserted. For nearly a week had Orpheus, the leader of the heavenly orchestra, played to a deserted floor. The élite would no longer figure in the waltz. Juno obstinately kept her room, complaining of headache and ill-temper. Ceres, who had lately joined a dissenting congregation, objected generally to all frivolous amusements, and Minerva had established, in opposition, a series of literary soirées, at which Pluto nightly lectured on the fine arts and phrenology to a brilliant and fashionable audience. The Muses, with Hebe and some of the younger deities, alone frequented the assemblies; but with all their attractions there was still a sad lack of partners. The younger gods had of late become remarkably dissipated, messed three times a-week, at least, with Mars in the barracks, and seldom separated sober. Bacchus had been sent to Coventry by the ladies, for appearing one night in the ball-room, after a hard sederunt, so drunk that he measured his length upon the floor, after a vain attempt at a Mazurka; and they likewise eschewed the company of Pan, who had become an abandoned smoker, and always smelt infamously of cheroots. But the most serious defection, as also the most unaccountable, was that of the beautiful Diana,—par excellence, the belle of the season,—and assuredly the most graceful nymph that ever tripped along the halls of heaven. She had gone off suddenly to the country without alleging any intelligible excuse, and with her, the last attraction of the ball-room seemed to have disappeared. Even Venus, the perpetual lady patroness, saw that the affair was desperate.

"Ganymede—mon beau garçon," said she, one evening at an unusually thin assembly, "we must really give it up at last. Matters are growing worse and worse, and in another week we shall positively not have enough to get up a tolerable gallopade. Look at these seven poor Muses sitting together on the sofa. Not a soul has spoken to them to night, except that horrid Silenus, who dances nothing but Scotch reels."

"Par dieu!" replied the young Trojan, fixing his glass in his eye. "There may be a reason for that. The girls are decidedly passées, and most inveterate blues. But there's dear little Hebe, who never wants partners, though that clumsy Hercules insists upon his conjugal rights, and keeps moving after her like an enormous shadow. 'Pon my soul, I've a great mind—Do you think, ma belle tante, that anything might be done in that quarter?"

"O fie! Ganymede—fie for shame!" said Flora, who was sitting close to the Queen of Love, and overheard the conversation. "You horrid naughty man, how can you talk so?"

"Pardon, ma chère!" replied the exquisite, with a languid smile. "You must excuse my badinage; and, indeed, a glance of your fair eyes were enough at any time to recall me to my senses. By the way, what a beautiful bouquet you have there. Parole d'honneur, I am quite jealous. May I ask who sent it?"

"What a goose you are!" said Flora, in evident confusion; "how should I know? Some general admirer like yourself, I suppose."

"Apollo is remarkably fond of hyacinths, I believe," said Ganymede, looking significantly at Venus. "Ah, well! I see how it is. We poor detrimentals must break our hearts in silence. It is clear we have no chance with the preux chevaliers of heaven."

"Really, Ganymede, you are very severe this evening," said Venus, with a smile; "but tell me, have you heard anything of Diana?"

"Ah! la belle Diane? They say she is living in the country, somewhere about Caria, at a place they call Latmos cottage, cultivating her faded roses—what a colour Hebe has!—and studying the sentimental."

"Tant pis! She is a great loss to us," said Venus. "Apropos, you will be at Neptune's fête champêtre to-morrow, ne c'est pas? We shall then finally determine about abandoning the assemblies. But I must go home now. The carriage has been waiting this hour, and my doves may catch cold. I suppose that boy, Cupid, will not be home till all the hours of the morning."

"Why, I believe, the Rainbow Club does meet to-night after the dancing," said Ganymede, significantly. "This is the last oyster night of the season."

"Gracious goodness! The boy will be quite tipsy, said Venus. "Do, dear Ganymede! try to keep him sober. But now, give me your arm to the cloak-room."

"Volontiers!" said the exquisite.

As Venus rose to go, there was a rush of persons to the further end of the room, and the music ceased. Presently two or three voices were heard calling for Esculapius.

"What's the row?" asked that learned individual, advancing leisurely from the refreshment table, where he had been cramming himself with tea and cakes.

"Leda's fainted!" shrieked Calliope, who rushed past with her vinaigrette in hand.

"Gammon!" growled the Abernethy of heaven, as he followed her.

"Poor Leda!" said Venus, as her cavalier adjusted her shawl. "These fainting fits are decidedly alarming. I hope it is nothing more serious than the weather."

"I hope so too," said Ganymede. "Let me put on the scarf. But people will talk. Pray heaven it be not a second edition of that old scandal about the eggs!"

"Fi donc! you odious creature! How can you? But after all, stranger things have happened. There now, have done. Good night!" and she stepped into her chariot.

"Bon soir," said the exquisite, kissing his hand as it rolled away. "'Pon my soul, that's a splendid woman. I've a great mind—but there's no hurry about that. Revenons à nos oeufs. I must learn something more about this fainting fit."

So saying, Ganymede reascended the stairs.

CHAPTER II.

A brighter or more exhilarating sun never dawned upon Olympus than that which ushered in the fête champêtre, given by Neptune, perhaps the most popular middle-aged deity of the times. The magnificent lawn of his celestial villa was decorated for the occasion in a manner perfectly unique, even for heaven. A new entrance gate had been built entirely of conch shells; tents, fringed with costly sea ware, were erected on every part of the grounds, and the ample tables they contained were stored with refreshments, terrestrial as well as marine. Crowds of Nereids and Tritons were engaged as waiters on the guests, whilst, in the largest of the artificial ponds, Proteus, the celebrated juggler, who had been retained expressly for the occasion, went through a variety of aquatic evolutions,—sometimes imitating Sam Patch, the famous diver of Niagara, and sometimes assuming the terrific appearance of the great American sea-serpent. At an early hour, the company, which comprised the whole fashion of Olympus, were assembled in the villa, and after partaking of a sumptuous dejeuner à la fourchette, broke up into groups according to their several fancies, and strolled through the pleasure ground in search of amusement. With the reader's leave we shall play the spy upon one tête-à-tête held in a sequestered arbour.

"And so you preferred listening to Pluto's lecture on the dissolving views, instead of meeting me, as you promised, at the assembly! Pretty conduct, indeed, Mr. Apollo, after all that has passed between us!" said our fair acquaintance, Flora, pouting, to a very handsome young man, with a magnificent head of hair, who strove to detain her reluctant hand in his own. "You needn't squeeze my fingers that way. I should have known you better. False, deceitful wretch that you are!"

"Nay! not false, not deceitful, my own charming Flora," replied Apollo, with much empressement in his manner. "You know Pluto is my uncle, and that I have great expectations from him; but I swear by Styx, that rather than draw one tear from the lovely eyes of my Spring-queen, I would pull the venerable codger by the nose!"

"Would you indeed?" said Flora.

"On my honour, I would, if you insisted on it. But why speak more of this? Can you doubt my love—my constancy?"

"Did Daphne find you constant?" asked Flora, with a sigh.

"Daphne? Daphne be hanged!" cried Apollo, vehemently. "She had the thickest ancles in the whole Peloponnesus! Speak not of her—but you, my own, my gentle Flora!—can you doubt that this fond heart beats, trembles only for you? O, on these rosy lips let me impress——"

"Lawk!" screamed Flora, "there's somebody coming."

And, sure enough, two youths in military undress sauntered past the entrance of the arbour; and the keen glances they cast within sufficiently be tokened their perfect consciousness of the proceedings of the amorous deity.

"Ah, Pollux! ah, Castor! my fine fellows, how are ye?" said Apollo, with great effrontery, rising and presenting a finger to each. "What sort of blow-out had you at Mars's last night. Pan and the rest, I presume, eh? Screwed, of course?"

"Tol-lol," said the eldest of the Gemini.

"I can easily believe it," said Apollo. "By the way, Pollux"—and he led the Argonaut aside—"you needn't say anything about seeing me and Flora together in the arbour—you understand? Not that it signifies a brass copper, but the confounded people here will always be talking, and I don't wish to have the poor girl annoyed. There's a good fellow—give a hint to your brother too, and both of you come and dine with me on Wednesday next at seven."

"I'm your man!" said Pollux. "Dinner and dumbness is the word! But I say, Apollo—really, now, ar'n't you coming it rather strong?"

"Devil a-bit!" said the Captain of the Archers. Flo. and I are old friends, and we flirt with each other merely to keep our hands in practice. But, come, let us all take a turn and see the fun."

The four proceeded from the arbour together. Various of the Celestials who encountered them, stopped the Gemini, inquiring eagerly after Leda, their mother's health.

"What the deuce do the people mean?" said Castor, after several such interruptions. "The old lady is as strong as a cart-horse, and ate four muffins this morning."

"Glad to hear it," said Apollo, drily. "But, come—let us walk upon the terrace, and look over the battlements of Olympus."

To that favourite spot they went, and bent over the blue cerulean, while the massive orb of the earth lay beneath them, revolving like a mighty ball. Midway between, they marked a lustrous speck enlarging as it soared upwards, until it seemed to assume the lineaments of a human figure.

"By Jingo! that's Mercury!" cried Pollux; "why, he's two hours before his time."

"Mercury, is it?" cried Pan, who, with his friend Bacchus, now came up. "Then, please the pigs, I'll get my manillas, at last."

"O, confound it!" said Bacchus. "He's a long way off yet. Let's go into one of the tents, and get a hot tumbler."

"No—no—man! stay a moment. There's Juno."

"Bon jour, Messieurs," said the Imperial Queen, caressing her favourite pea-hen, who followed her with as much docility as the famous tame Transatlantic oyster. "What can you be looking at, down there? Ah!" she exclaimed, adjusting her eye-glass, "Mercury, I declare, and in a monstrous hurry too! What possibly can have happened?"

The light figure, of the messenger of Olympus, now rose above the crystal battlements, and, with one graceful circuitous sweep, alighted in the midst of the Celestials. He was flushed and out of breath.

"Mr. Mercury! I presume you have brought me the esprit de milles fleurs?" said Juno.

"Dear Mr. Mercury,—where's the blonde?" cried Flora.

"Mercury, my lad! did old Screwdriver cash that bill?" inquired Apollo.

"What says Hoby?" said Pollux.

"And Stultz?" added Castor.

"Merks, old chap! shell out the cheroots," said Pan.

"And the eau de vie," cried Bacchus with a hiccup.

The herald of Heaven looked from one to the other of his tormentors despairingly.

"I'll give up my place!" said he: "by the Lord, I will, rather than stand this bother! Do you think I had nothing to do but look after your traps, and such a shindy down yonder as never was—Where's Jupiter? My wig! what a rage he'll be in!"

"What's the matter, Mercury? Bless me, what is it?" cried all the gods and godesses in a breath.

"Matter!" repeated the son of Maia: "matter enough, if you knew it. Diana's off—bolted—gone to Gretna-green, or the devil knows where."

"My sister eloped!" cried Apollo, hastily; "that's a lie!"

"Did you apply that expression to me, Sir?" said Mercury, getting very red in the face, and squaring at the Pythian.

"Yes!" said the other, delivering a left-hander: and to it they went with the unction of Dutch Sam and Aby Belasco.

The goddesses shrieked and squalled. The gods formed a ring, and shouted in extreme ecstasy. How long the combat might have lasted is uncertain; but a stately figure burst through the circle, and interposed between the pugilists.

"None of this nonsense," thundered Jupiter in an overwhelming voice, "or I'll knock both of you to eternal smash! Apollo—you're an idiot: Mercury—you're another. Hold your tongues both; or rather you, Mercury, speak and explain this blackguard behaviour."

"Please your Excellency," said Mercury—— But what Mercury said had perhaps better form the commencement of a new chapter.

CHAPTER III.

"Please your Excellency," replied Mercury, "I said Diana had bolted——"

"Eh! what the devil! my daughter, Di?"

"Off—eloped—absquatulated," replied Hermes, applying a slice of raw potatoe to his eye.

"Ten thousand Phlegethons! and with whom?"

"A pig-driver, may it please your Excellency."

Apollo fell into convulsions. Jupiter swore horribly.

"Ten shillings for profane oaths," said Chief-Justice Rhadamanthus, taking out his pencil; "I must book the governor for the tin."

"My Lord Chief-Justice," said Jupiter, "make out a warrant instantly for the apprehension of the audacious scoundrel, who has made away with a ward of our celestial Chancery—What's his name, Mercury?"

"Endymion."

"For the apprehension of Endymion.—I'll trounce the villain at common law, or my name's not Saturnius!"

Rhadamanthus did as he was desired; wrote out the warrant and delivered it (along with a small note of the fees) to the Father of gods and men.

"Here—you, Mercury," said Jupiter, "take this warrant and execute it instantly. Bring the prisoner here, and that unfortunate girl along with him, and do it directly."

"Your Excellency," said the son of Maia, with considerable dignity; "your Excellency will please to remember that I am neither a bailiff nor a messenger's concurrent: if I undertake the job, I shall expect to be paid extra——"

"D'ye grumble, sirrah?" shouted Jupiter. "Be off like winking—or else——;" and he caught up a stray thunderbolt.

Hermes cleared the parapet of Heaven.

"Here's a shindy!" said Pan,—"blowed if I could have believed it! Di. looked as if butter wouldn't have melted in her mouth. What say you, Ganymede?"

The young Trojan indulged his curiosity with a supercilious stare at the questioner,—muttered something about "vulgar fellows" and "d—d impertinence," turned on his heel, and walked away.

"Well—if I ever!" said Pan. "I've a confounded mind to pull the puppy's nose."

"No, no!" said Bacchus, seizing his friend by the arm; "never mind the Jack-a-dandy. Come into this tent, and we'll have a pot and a pipe together."

Jupiter continued walking to and fro in a violent state of excitement. Most of the other deities had retired out of respect; but Juno would not lose such a charming opportunity for a few moral observations.

"Well, Sir," said she, "this is a very pretty business indeed! Nice doings those for a daughter of yours! I presume you remember what I told you when you first allowed her to associate with my Lady Venus?"

"Madam," said Jupiter, "if I were to remember half of your idiotical conversation, I should have very little time to think of anything else."

"O very good!" replied Juno, bitterly; "you may be as rude as you please, but that won't alter facts. I repeat that you have yourself and no one else to blame."

"Zounds, woman!" cried the exasperated deity, "will you hold your infernal tongue? Here do I hardly know whether my head or heels are uppermost; and you keep pestering me with your palaver and Job's comfort."

"And this is my reward," said Juno, "for all my anxieties and cares! O you horrid—horrid brute!"

"Madam!" don't provoke me to blacken your ox-eyes!" roared Jupiter in a towering passion. "And now I think of it—there's these bloody peacocks of yours have scratched up all the vegetables in the garden; but I'll stop their tricks effectually. Here, Neptune! send for a blunderbuss."

"Don't! don't!" screamed Juno, in concert with her imperial fowls, who, as if conscious of their own imminent danger, set up such a pea-hawing, as would have stunned terrestial ears—"Don't do any such thing, dear brother Neptune—for the love of Amphitrite, don't!

There is no saying how the affair might have terminated, for Jupiter had picked up an enormous stone, with a view to peppering the peacocks, when a cry from Castor, that Mercury was reascending with the prisoners, restored a temporary calm, and once more drew the whole hierarchy to the battlement.

CHAPTER IV.

The criminal van of the Celestial Courts was shaped something like a minibus, so that until it was fairly landed on the terrace, none of the eager company could catch a glimpse of those within.

Mercury sprang from the box. "Well! here they are safe and sound, and a pretty business I've had in catching them. Walk out, my doves. Here's a jolly party waiting for you!" And he opened the door.

To the utter amazement of Olympus, who expected the apparition of a curly-haired swarthy Asiatic, clad in tunic and buskins, after the fashion of the Carian pig-drivers,—out stepped from the vehicle a tall sandy-haired, raw-boned individual of six feet, arrayed from head to foot in a suit of tartans of more lustrous dye than the fancy petticoat of Iris: in short, a Highlander in full costume—the first that ever set foot in the heathen heaven. After him descended Diana, blushing, and in tears, yet still peerless in immortal beauty. A murmur of astonishment ran through the assembled circle, which, however, produced no effect on the undaunted Scot, who continued to gaze around him with stoical indifference.

"Who the devil have we got here?" said Jupiter at length—"Are you Endymion, fellow?"

"Am the individual that was arreested at your instance," replied the Highlander calmly, "in token of which I have here a copy of the charge, manifestly incompetent, as not having been executed by a regular messenger; and I reserve to mysell a' richt of action of damages for wrongous imprisonment and otherwise, as accords of law."

"What the deuce does the fellow mean?" said the bewildered Jupiter.

"My Lord," interposed Rhadamanthus, "these matters had better be discussed in pleno foro. If it please your lordship to take your seat as Supreme Judge, you can constitute the Session, and proceed in common form to try this embarrassing case."

"Ye may do as ye like," replied the Scot; "but as a preliminary defence, I plead the privileges of the College of Justice. Am an advocate's first clerk, and in no way amenable to ony jurisdiction, except that o' my ain Coort. Vide Bothwell v. Maitland, December, 1582.—Morrison, page 2399."

"What's the meaning of this jargon?" asked Jupiter.

"A declinature of jurisdiction, my Lord," said Rhadamanthus; "but it won't do. Fellow, that plea must be dismissed, as you are now beyond the bounds of the Court of Session."

"I was arreested in Scotland forty miles north o' Gretna, on the Carlisle road," persevered the Scot; "and the lad wi' the wings in his bannet hadna even a border warrant, though that wadna hae been competent neither."

"Is this the fact, Mercury?" asked Rhadamanthus.

"'Pon my soul, I believe so," replied Mercury.

"Then Jupiter's in an ugly scrape, that's all; and the action must be dismissed," said Rhadamanthus.

"Ye're a wise judge, ma lord," said the Scot with a bow, "and weel versed in the Principles. Ye might make a first-rate Ordinar on the Bills. I submit that I am entitled to full expenses."

"Of course," replied the gratified Rhadamanthus.

"And is this confounded rascal to get off Scot-free, after having eloped with my daughter?" asked Jupiter.

"That's the law," said Rhadamanthus.

"Ye may gang before the Coort o' Session, and tak' a remit to the Commissaries, upon finding caution judicio sisti," remarked the Scot; "and ye'll hae to gie in defences against a sma' action at my instance for wrongous imprisonment, and detention o' ma person: forbye an action o' repetition as ma wife's curator bonis. I presume now we're free to gang. Diana, ma pet, dicht your e'en and pit on yer bannet, and we'll toddle cantily hame."

"Yes, dear Endymion!" said the sobbing Cynthia.

"Endymion! awa' wi' yer havers! Can ye no call me by my richt name, Tavish Mactavish?—an ancient family, gentlemen, and weel kent at the back o' Breadalbane. Sae gude mornin' to ye. Maister Mercury! an' ye wad keep your head out o' the rape o' the law, just take us back to whaur ye fand us."

"Best thing you can do, my lad," remarked Rhadamanthus, in reply to an appealing look from the herald, who accordingly mounted and drove off.

"I'm a wretched man," said Jupiter.

"Here's a go!" roared Pollux, rushing hastily into the presence: "Flora has bolted with Apollo."

Hercules entered, foaming at the mouth—"Justice! Almighty Jupiter! My wife, Hebe, is off with that villain, Ganymede."

"Father of gods and men!" cried the gouty Vulcan, limping up—"Venus, my abandoned wife, has just eloped with Hesperus."

"Go to the Court of Session and the Commissaries, gentlemen," said Jupiter, with desperate calmness.

"O lord! O lord! here's an awful dispensation!" said Pluto, staggering in—"Jupiter, my dear brother, that wretch, Ixion!"

"What next?" said Jupiter—"out with it."

"That sacrilegious monster, Ixion, has carried off your Imperial Consort!"

"Heaven be praised!" cried Jupiter, dashing his wig among the stars, "that's the best news I've heard for many a day. Gentlemen all—least said is soonest mended. Bacchus! order out the drink—'Fore George, we'll have a night of it; and to-morrow we can all go to the Commissaries together."

CERTAIN OMISSIONS IN THE RECENT GAZETTE.

Britons, rejoice with heart and voice,
You here may see respected,
Time-honour'd names whose many claims
The Whigs too long neglected.
But take a peep, with eye of sheep,
At those of late brevetted,
And you will see two more with me
As Generals gazetted.

There's General Famine, foe to cramming,
A long, lean, fearful fellow,
His troops are gaunt, his *Aide is Want,
His uniform pale yellow.
There's Arson, he who likes a spree,
A wicked hum'rous varlet,
Who plays droll tricks with farmer's ricks,
His colour's fiery scarlet.

For me I'm bent (I'm Discontent)
Upon a secret mission,
An ugly job, to head the mob;
And thus runs my commission:—
"Fare quickly forth, rouse South and North,
That nought the purpose mar may
Of General Peel, with lead and steel,
Soon to employ the army.

To murmurs loud invite the crowd,
Sow zealously Sedition,
Cry loud for bread, wail children dead,—
Yet—waken no suspicion.
The Chartist crew assist to brew
Some caldron of commotion,
That we may still their zeal with pill
Of lead, or slumb'rous potion."

In this brevet some minds may fret
That names have been omitted,
Which they suppose Lord John had chose
Had he but been permitted.
There's General Trade, a gallant blade,
And General Education,
Both favourites with the pride and pith,
I own it, of the nation.

Some, too, may blame to miss the name
Of valiant General Freedom,
And call Sir Bob, a scurvy snob,
Who dared to supersede him.
I could defend my gallant friend,
Sir Rob, with reasons twenty,
And show you, too, why entre nous
He passed by General Plenty.

And other change, all woundy strange,
Is fixed in council privy:
But ere the time to blab were crime,
Or tidings I would give ye.
Yet your safe ear I need not fear,—
Well—'tis in agitation
Soon to gazette Peel's special pet,
Old General Taxation.

None but a fool tells tales from school,
Excuse, then, that I tell ye one:
It makes me fret that next Gazette
That upstart Gen. Rebellion,
Ere Spring you'll see, put o'er us Three,
Peel's quondam allies famous.—
Grief stops my pen—Farewell, till then.—
"Majora tunc canamus!"

WALTER MAPES' JOVIAL PRIEST'S CONFESSION.

BY BON GAULTIER.

No doubt many of our readers have often, like ourselves, grown merry over the fine Latin drinking song, beginning,

Mihi est propositum in taberna mori, which Leigh Hunt has naturalized among us, under the above name, in a translation such as he only could produce. Nay, if any of them ever had the fortune, or *mis*fortune—we shall not say which, as tastes are various—to spend an evening with a beer-party of Bürschen, the chances are, that he may have helped to swell the chorus of the song itself, in music, that gave the Bavarian Brown all the smack and relish of Muscadin or Canary. Not that the song needs any such adventitious aids to set it off. Far from it. Like all good Bacchanalian poetry, it carries its own wine and company with it. Here, for instance, are we ourselves, that never, from our youth up, were detected in any greater indulgence than a second glass of dry Lisbon, ready to confess to having alarmed our landlady on more occasions than one, by chanting it ore rotundo, and with a very intoxicated roll of the eye, over a Finnan haddock and a glass of very mitigated ale. And why was this —but that, being rather imaginative, the spirit of the song had transported us into a snug refectory at Oxford in the twelfth or thirteenth century—we are not particular to a year—with a jolly abbot "simmering," like old John Willett, before the fire over against us, as, with upraised flagon, we trolled out our determined resolution, totally forgetting, that all the while we were only a student attending the divinity classes, on a bursary of ten pounds per annum, and accommodated with airy lodgings in the High Calton, at four shillings a-week, including fire, a table-cloth, and other extras.

To end our days, in a tavern drinking;—

In these days, we knew no more of the origin of the lines, than what Camden in his Remains had told us: that "Walter de Mapes, archdeacon of Oxford, who, in the time of King Henry the Second, filled England with his merriments, confessed his love to good liquor in this manner." We believed the venerable antiquary, and inquired no further, till we found on our table, the other day, a comely quarto, issued by the Camden Society, entitled, "The Latin Poems commonly attributed to Walter Mapes, Collected and Edited by Thomas Wright, Esq." We shall say nothing of the very pleasant reading which the whole volume afforded, —its satire, its graphic pictures, its dramatic vigour, its unctuous humour, and, on occasion, its serious force. Our business is with the song, which, oddly enough, turns out to have originally been no song at all, but to be only a part of a satirical poem of some length, from which it had been culled by some choice spirit, some two or three centuries after Walter Mapes, with his jibes and merriments, was as forlorn a thing as Yorick the king's jester himself.

The poem is entitled Confessio Goliæ, (Golias being a sort of clerical jester,—an impersonation of the Gluttony, Intemperance, and Immorality of Monkhood, the character of which Rabelais' Panurge is the more modern type,) and, says Mr. Wright, "it is particularly remarkable, because it contains the lines, which, formed into a kind of drinking song at a later period, have hence been the chief instrument in spreading the reputation of Walter Mapes in modern times." Formed into a kind of drinking song, quotha! Hear this, ye Bürschen of Leipzig, ye Renommisten of Jena, and groan for the Philisterey of Mr. Thomas Wright! For ourselves, we forgive that gentleman; for in the benevolence of his editorial heart, hath he not said, that "without any direct evidence to the contrary, we hesitate in taking from him" (our excellent Walter, to-wit) "the authorship of a poem, which has been so long coupled with his name." Generous forbearance! and without any direct evidence to the contrary too! But, perhaps, there is some indirect evidence? Not a vistage: Mapes, Mr. Wright tells us in his preface, was esteemed by his sovereign "for his extensive learning and courtly manners. He was a wit, and a man with a marked taste for light literature." No doubt he was; and just for these very reasons, the man to have written the poem in question. Indeed, it could only have been written by an elegant scholar and polished humourist. Such compositions never emanate from any meaner source. The inventor of Falstaff was no drunkard; and the mad waggeries of Father Prout, in our own day, spring from a brain as richly stored with "the best of man's best knowledges," as the heart of the reverend father is gentle and refined. Take the more remarkable case of Rabelais, of whom Mr. Wright's volume has constantly reminded us. He was a scholar, and an accomplished gentleman, a man of pure life, of elegant tastes, and kindly and charitable habits: but he did not, therefore, the less certainly write his singular romance. Besides, popular tradition has fathered the poem upon Mapes for many centuries; and the people rarely fail to place the saddle on the right horse. So Mr. Wright, it is just as well that you have let the matter alone, "in absence of direct evidence to the contrary." The man who called in question the existence of Homer has only proved, that learning is not necessarily knowledge —which, indeed, we knew before.

But to return. The poem is supposed to be the confession of a young priest to his bishop,—and a very pretty confession it is. It is written with double rhymes, in a measure corresponding to that which we have adopted in our translation, but with a felicity of expression, to which Leigh Hunt alone could do justice. It has graces, which no pen but his could snatch; unless, indeed, it were the still happier quill of that facetious Mr. Huddesford, who rendered one of the couplets of the song, in this most facetious quatrain.

Mysterious and prophetic truths,
I never could unfold 'em
Without a flagon of old wine,
And a slice of cold ham!

Oh, that Walter Mapes had heard these lines— "Huddesford, Huddesford!" he would have cried, as he finished his hundredth peal of laughter, "thou'lt be the death of me!"

The Confession.

My spirit is perplexèd sore—with sentiments funereal,
And I must give its musings vent,—so bitter and so dreary all;
Alas, alas! I doubt I'm made—of very light material,
And like the leaf that every wind—blows off on dance aërial.

For though 'tis clear a man of sense—a man that's 'cute and knowing,
Would fix his dwelling on a rock—that there was no o'erthrowing,
I'm such an ass, that like a stream—I'm ever onwards flowing,
And over me fresh skies are bent—and fresh winds ever blowing.
I'm like a ship without a guide—I'm sadly deaf, when mass calls,
I keep no lenten holidays,—no macerating Pascals;
Nor bolts, nor bars can hold me back—whene'er a chum or glass calls,—
And sooth, they are, these chums of mine—a precious set of rascals.

Like most young men, steeped to the lips—in vices foul and shameless,
I tread the broad way, that leads down—to a place that shall be nameless,
And eager more for pleasure, than—to be in morals blameless,
I cultivate my outward man—and mind my inward's claim less.
A love affair appears to me—of grave and weighty moment,
A labyrinth of pleasant fears—and cheerfully I roam in't;
The toil that Venus doth enjoin—is pleasant toil, and so meant
For men of nous alone; your fools—were never yet at home in't.

Oh, saintly father, pardon me—forgive my agitation,
I faint, I die, I'm going off—in pleasant trepidation!
The beauty of these girls, it tears—my heart to laceration,
I'm kissing the whole lot of them—the dears, in contemplation!
'Tis no such very easy thing—to keep one's nature down, sir,
And not to feel a little queer—in looking on a gown, sir,
Especially when in it is—a maid of nutty brown, sir,
Young flesh and blood must needs break out—though saints may fret and frown, sir.

Set a man within a fire—will the flames not singe him?
Who can live in this vile world—nor let its vileness tinge him,
When Venus plants on every side—her snares and traps to twinge him,
And rosy lips and sparkling eyes—and sunny locks unhinge him?

The second charge against me is—that I am given to dicing,
But most unfortunate am I—that very pleasant vice in;
And, when cleaned out, I find my wits—so very sharp and slicing,
That floods of song roll in on me—in measure most enticing.

The tavern's pleasures are the next—that do my spirit lumber,
They always have stuck fast to it—and always will encumber,
Until I see the cherubim—approach in goodly number,
To sing my poor departing soul—into eternal slumber.

In a tavern I shall die—unless my purpose misses,
With old wine upon my lips—to cheer me with its kisses,
And, when the angels come to take—my soul away to blisses,
They'll say, "The Lord be merciful—to a toper, such as this is!"

Wine in brimming bumpers bears—the spirit's richest ores up,
And, on nectar-moistened wings—to the stars it soars up;
Greatly I prefer the can—mine host against me scores up,
To the cup our cellarer—with cold water pours up.

There be some small poets who—shunning public places,
Woo in shady solitudes—the Muse's pensive graces;
There they toil, and sweat, and moil—making dire grimaces;
Yet, after all, what they produce—in very piteous case is.

There be bards that put themselves—on thin water gruel,
Fly the world's loud bickerings—strife, and jarrings cruel;
Toil for immortality—and, as they grasp the jewel,
Die off from inanition, like—your fire, for lack of fuel.

With one's own peculiar whims—Nature still doth mould one;
When my genius is starved—'tis a very cold one:
Any boy might beat me then—nor need be a bold one,—
Oh, I hate your fasting days—as I do the Old One!

Every man, by nature, hath—his own gifts and mission;
I'm one of those that need good wine—to aid my composition,
Then my genius doth attain—to its full fruition,
And my language overflows—even unto repletion.

As my liquor floweth good—goodly verses flow so,
But unless I eat as well—they will never go so.
With a bottle in my belt—then my measures glow so,
That Ovidius Naso's are—compared with them, but so so.

Never is there given to me—poetic inspiration,
Till I've ate and drank my fill—even to saturation!
Bacchus then, within my brain—hath the domination,
And Phœbus rusheth into me—to general admiration.

Lo! I have told how ill I've lived—how wickedly and vainly;
For, had I not, your servants would—and that's my reason mainly.
They, sneaking rogues, will never speak—their evil thoughts out plainly;
Nor e'er confess the sins they love—and revel in profanely.

But now I meekly stand before—my blessed lord and bishop,
And all my sins and naughtiness—canonically dish up:
Let him cast a stone at me—who ne'er had wicked wish up—
On his heart, nor now can find—a single fault to fish up.

I have mentioned every sin—that I know about me,
And the venom, cherished long—cast away from out me.
The ancient Adam I abjure—infidels may flout me—
Man sees the face, but Jove the heart—what matter though they doubt me.

Vice I hate:—the virtues all—how pleasant surely they be!
My inward man regenerate—this shall a glorious day be.
On the tender milk of grace—I'm fed, like new-born baby,
That my heart of vanity—the seat no longer may be.

Lord Bishop, pray, be merciful—to me and from the treasure
Of thy abundant goodness yield—thy suppliant good measure;
Forgive my sins, and I'll perform—at my very earliest leisure,
Whatever penance you enjoin—with a very great deal of pleasure.

The History of the Templars, and the Temple Church, and Temple, London. By Charles Addison, Esq. Longman and Co. Post quarto, Pp. 395.

This is a book, even in its form, designed for learned and antiquarian readers. But not for them only; for it exhibits many authentic though singular aspects of character, and courses of action. What has struck us most, is to see the Knights Templars finding not merely an apologist, but an enthusiastic champion in modern times. Their new historian vindicates the Order from many undoubted calumnies and aspersions; and imputes their decline, not in any degree to their turbulence, their indomitable insolence and profligacy, but exclusively to the jealousy of the clergy, and to the cupidity awakened among churchmen and nobles, by the vast wealth of these military-monks. Whatever were their vices, and with whatever danger their great power and wealth, and the abuses of both, threatened society, it must be confessed that the Templars received but scanty justice from the church; which determined, by any means, to crush the formidable rival body it had unduly fostered, as soon as it could no longer be made subservient to its own purposes.

Mr. Addison's narrative of the rise, the usages and customs, and of the decline, and the tyrannical and cruel extinction, of the Templars, is animated in its movement, and pregnant with matter. His admiration of the Order imparts a glow to his pages which excites the reader's sympathy, even when cooler judgment does not sanction all his opinions.

As specimens of the style of the work, we could wish to select a few passages, from what, to the majority of readers, may prove the most interesting part of the volume, namely, the relics of the Knights Templars, which were long preserved in the Temple, in Customs and Regulations, of which many vestiges may still be traced. Among these, so late as the times of Philip and Mary, was the oriental fashion of wearing long beards. Their Majesties found it necessary to interfere to reform this fashion; and ordered that none under the degree of a Knight, being in Commons, should wear the beard above three weeks growing, upon pain of a fine of 40s. The Knights were, moreover, required to lay aside their arms and Spanish cloaks, swords, bucklers, rapiers, hats, and gowns. None of the COMPANIONS, except Knights or Benchers, were allowed to wear light colours in their doublet and hose; or to wear any upper velvet cap, or any scarf, &c. &c. These sumptuary laws are less important in our times than the order:—"That no attorney should be admitted into either of the Houses; and that, in all admissions from thenceforth, it should be an implied condition, that if the party admitted practised any attorneyship, he was ipso facto dismissed. By a statute of James I., it was ordered that no one should be admitted a member of either Society who was not a gentleman by descent. James also took order about their dress and equipments; and made the Templars lay aside boots and spurs, "as ill-befitting gownsmen, and rather the badges of roarers than of civil men." His Majesty allowed no boots in his own Court. These gownsmen, for a long period maintained the ancient character of the Temple for sumptuous and magnificent hospitality.—Much curious information concerning persons of great historical name, connected with the Temple, the Temple Church, and its monuments, is compressed in three or four intermediate chapters of the work.

When the ruin of any individual or body of men has been resolved on by the Church, the cry of infidel, heretic, has been in all ages the watchword. The accusations of this sort, and others brought against the Templars, can only find a parallel in the annals of witch trials. The accusations were, if possible, more absurd and atrocious, and the punishments inflicted more cruel; burning slowly to death having in France been the common sequel to the use of the rack; while long and severe imprisonment, and torture to obtain confessions, were often employed. In England, their ultimate punishment was less sanguinary, and many of them were absolved of their heresy, and what is called reconciled to the Church; but stripped of their property and left to languish out the remainder of life in the most abject poverty. A dark chapter in the history of Priestcraft is that which records the extinction of the Knights Templars, whatever their errors or vices may have been.

A History of the Life of Richard Cœur-de-Lion. By G. P. R. James, Esq., author of the History of Charlemagne; Life of Edward the Black Prince, &c. 2 volumes, octavo. Saunders and Otley.

This addition to the historical labours of Mr. James appears to be incomplete; or more probably a third volume has yet to appear. We have, in the meanwhile, gone no farther than the Introduction to the work, which consists of a comprehensive and luminous view of the feudal system, and of the institutions of chivalry; a necessary preliminary to the History of Cœur-de-Lion, and probably not the least valuable part of it.

Frederick the Great, and his Times. Edited by Thomas Campbell, Esq. 2 vols. 8vo. Colburn.

This, like the above book, has come north either in an imperfect state, or it is only published in part. It is, we should imagine, neither originally written by an Englishman, nor a recent production; but Mr. Campbell discreetly tells us more than that,—he considers it a work for which he is proud to stand sponsor; and this is saying much. It comprehends the memoirs of Frederick William I., as fully as those of his more celebrated son, and exhibits the interior of the principal German courts during both their reigns. It contains a great deal more of anecdote, scandal, and private history, than of national annals. Those who are acquainted with that strange, yet attractive, book, the Memoirs of the Margravine of Bayreuth—the daughter of the one Frederick, and the sister of the other,—may have some idea of much of the piquant contents of a work, to which we hope to return.

An Account of the Settlements of the New Zealand Company, from Personal Observation during a Residence in New Zealand. By the Hon. Henry William Petre.

Though this gentleman's leanings are to the Company, which he thinks has not been fairly treated by the local supreme authority, his account of the new settlement is written in a temperate tone, and gives the most lively hopes of its progress and rapid prosperity. The early adventures of the settlers are replete with interest; and their conduct, by this report, has hitherto been admirable.

New Zealand, South Australia, and New South Wales; a Record of Recent Travels in these Colonies, with especial reference to Emigration, and the Advantageous Employment of Capital. By R. G. Jameson, late Surgeon-Superintendent of Emigrants to Australia. Pp. 372. With Map. Smith & Elder.

This is a judicious and impartial work, which we consider well worth the attention of emigrants. It is, besides, a fair topographical account of New Zealand, with which two-thirds of the volume are occupied. The writer has visited each of the new settlements in this important colony, and also the mission stations, and has judged for himself.

The Works of De Foe. Volume II. Edited by William Hazlitt. London: Clements.

We described the nature of this cheap edition of the works of a popular and classic English writer when announcing the first volume. The second one contains the History of Mr. Duncan Campbell, the Dumb Philosopher; the Journal of the Plague-Year; the Memoirs of Captain Carleton; the Life and Adventures of Robinson Crusoe, with the Further Adventures; and the Serious Reflections of Robinson Crusoe,—works much less known than the original adventures; and the Life of Captain Singleton; taken together, a rich and varied banquet. Another of these comprehensive tomes will, we presume, complete an excellent edition of an author who is indispensable to every Englishman's library of standard and sterling works.

A Search into the Old Testament, in order to trace its Claim of being the Depository of Divine Communications. By Joseph Hume. Longman & Co. Cloth. Pp. 304.

The author—not Mr. Joseph Hume, the patriot and ex-legislator, but Mr. Joseph Hume, the translator of Dante's "Inferno" into English blank verse—states, in his preface, that the investigation, of which the results form the present volume, was "undertaken for the purpose of ascertaining what were the evidences that could be drawn from the Old Testament which might establish the truth of those momentous passages that involve supernatural events, and which must therefore have been divine productions." [predictions?] This purpose is accomplished by a minute analysis of the Old Testament; references only being given to chapter and verse, as the insertion of every passage complete would have swelled the work to several volumes. The work will be of considerable use to Biblical students.

The Fortunes of Faith; or, Church and State. A Poem. By Thomas Hornblower Gill.

In this Poem a historical survey is taken of the difficulties which pure Christianity has in all ages had to struggle against, from ecclesiastical corruption and domination, as well as from the secular arm. The piece must attract notice. The sentiment is excellent, and the style generally terse and vigorous, though the rhymes are often faulty. We cannot tell to what denomination of Christians the author belongs, but he is a thorough Voluntary, and that upon the highest grounds. To several passages which we had marked for extract, as the description of Mahomet, and the spread of Islamism, the humiliation of Henry at the Tomb of Becket, Wickliffe, Luther, and the early puritans, our limited space denies admittance; and we must be contented with the following picture of Cromwell's soldiers:—

Devout enthusiasts! matchless sons of war!
Whom bigots still malign and priests abhor;
Despite their hate a rare renown is yours
Which will not die while deathless Truth endures!
Ye felt the sin of force, the shame of creeds,
Loathed the foul chaff on which the bigot feeds,
A stronger, ampler, nobler diet sought,
And willed that Man should worship as he thought.

This cause their strength, this liberty their boast,
What valour could confront the saintly host!
No dull machines! no vulgar warriors they!
Seasoned with blood, and satisfied with pay!
No soldier passions taint their dread employ,
Nor wanton slaughter yields unhallowed joy;
They spurn the palling stimulant of lust,
Nor bound their wishes to the meed of dust,
Demand the conflict for a nobler prize,
And seek their crowning guerdon in the skies.

Survey their camp! no tumult shocks the eye,
Unseemly brawl, or drunken revelry;
No impious oath grates harshly on the ear,
But prayerful silence reigns unbroken there;
See, side by side in meaning contrast laid,
Life-giving word and death-dispensing blade!
In mystic trance the raptured warrior kneels;
O'er all his soul the bright delusion steals;
Each sense absorbed, his heaving heart outpoured,
He joys in fancied commune with the Lord.
Mark on his changing cheek, his bright'ning eye
The bursting hope, the speechless ecstasy!
O'er each wild hope these waking dreams reveal,
Distempered Faith has set her burning seal;
The vision warms! she greets the expected day,
And thanks the Saviour's smile and shares his sway!

But ere that Faith, with wild, diffusive glow,
Lights her impatient votaries to the foe,
Devotion's impulse wakens every tongue;
The stern enthusiasts kindle into song;
In deepening notes their rugged anthems pour,
High o'er the trumpet's blast, the cannon's roar,
Pray ere they fall beneath its fiery breath,
And close the Book of Life to march on death!

But Truth their various errors would not hide;
They sinned, and Heaven protracted rule denied;
Insulted Freedom cursed their tyrant-chief,
O'ertasked Devotion murmured for relief;
Religion frighted in her gloomy dress,
And Reason sickened at each wild excess.
Revolted feeling swept their strength away;
The people willed that kings again should sway,
In reckless trust expressed their mad delight,
Nor asked a pledge, nor registered a right.
Securely thron'd, the Monarch hailed the priest,
Replaced the purple, and respread the feast;
(He scarce could sin without his ready tool,)
The grasping Church resumed her baleful rule,
Refused to gather wisdom from her woe,
Renewed the crimes that wrought her overthrow,
Recalled each woe that darker times had known,
And in the race of guilt outran the throne.

Their opening deed was worthy of the Twain;
According vengeance doomed the spotless Vane.
Patrician patriot, court-acquainted saint,
Who mingled with the world, but caught no taint!
Sublimely eloquent and purely wise,
He gained in Glory's race, when Virtue won the prize.
Disarmed by mercy, yet unmoved by fear,
True to each right that Conscience counted dear,
Bold when a tyrant's deeds provoked the strife,
He gave to Freedom all his glorious life.
He braved a stormy ocean from his youth,
His pilot, Virtue, and his beacon, Truth;
His soul was bright beneath the darkest sky;
His faith was fervour mixed with charity,
Reproached fanatic hate, ascetic gloom,
Forbore to shrink yet trembled to presume.
He felt that Freedom was the life of Faith,
Born at one birth, alike exempt from death,
Served with one service, courted with one love,
The same their labour here, the same their crown above.

Sublime religion! heart ennobling creed!
Here lay his strength, hence sprang each deathless deed;
'Twas this the poet praised, the friend revered,*
The tyrant hated and the fearless feared;
'Twas this the prelate loathed, the monarch doomed,
Yet quenchless Hope her votary's soul illumed;
When low Ambition played the traitor part,
And warriors quailed, he wore a dauntless heart;
When vengeful Power proscribed the cause he loved
Unworthy Death the willing witness proved

* See the sonnet addressed to him by Milton,
"Vane young in years, but in sage counsel old."

That Hope gave brightness to the dungeon-rock,
Smiled at the sentence, glorified the block,
To opening time a prophet-gaze applied,
And gave her son the victory, though he died!

Rambles in Ceylon. By Lieutenant de Butts. Allen & Co.

This work is intended to supply a blank in light oriental reading; and to draw attention to an interesting and important colony, which is thought of with indifference, chiefly because the people at home know little or nothing about it, and that the climate is in very bad repute. The acknowledged want the author has supplied by lively descriptive sketches, and discussions on all sorts of subjects connected with the island.

He has given a version of the fatal episode of Major Davie and his command, which is new to us, and very disparaging to the memory of that unfortunate officer. We are not enabled to refute the statement from our own knowledge, but we hope that it has been rashly adopted, and admits of explanation. Davie is acused not merely of incapacity, but of poltroonery, and, by implication, of treachery. The following conclusion of Davie's history, is very different, indeed, from that current in Scotland:—

When our troops occupied Kandy, in 1815, Davie managed to elude the strict search that was made for him. He had contrived to insinuate himself into the good graces of the Kandian monarch by adopting the dress, religion, and customs of the natives. He died in 1816. Like the Venetian,

Unanneal'd he passed away,
Without a hope from Mercy's aid:
To the last a renegade.

We extract one other passage, not to show the style of the work, but to serve a higher purpose. After mentioning the old Dutch monopolies, Lieutenant de Butts remarks:—

Ceylon affords a striking instance of the triumph of free principles in commerce. Until within the last few years, nearly every article of produce was subject to almost prohibitory duties. During the government of Sir Wilmot Horton, this unenlightened system was suppressed, and in its stead was substituted tariff duties, founded on the most enlarged views and commercial principles of the present day. The result has even surpassed the anticipations of the most sanguine; and from the day on which the principles of free trade were applied to the colony, the prosperity of Ceylon may henceforward be dated. One unfortunate exception has, however, been made in the application of the universally just principles of freedom in commercial intercourse. Cinnamon, formerly the staple commodity of the island, and that for which it was chiefly famed, is now lying under the incubus of the enormous export duty of one hundred per cent. Thus while the export of coffee, sugar, and cocoa-nut oil, is rapidly increasing, under the beneficial influence of the fiscal regulations that have been mentioned, the demand for cinnamon, fettered as it is with restrictive duties, has rather diminished than increased; and the trade in this spice will continue to languish, until a material change is effected in those absurd and anomolous duties, by which its energies have of late been cramped and subdued.

Treatise on Printing and Type-Founding. By T. C. Hansard. Adam and Charles Black.

This is another reprint of one of the elaborate articles which have appeared in the last Edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica. It will form a useful companion for the Library, as well as an instructor to the practical printer. It comprehends all kinds of printing, and is illustrated with the original engravings of the Encyclopædia.

Traditions of the Covenanters; or, Gleanings among the Mountains. Second Series. By the Rev. Robert Simpson, Sanquhar. Edinburgh: Paterson.

This small and homely volume is composed of the same materials, and written in the same spirit, as the first of the series, in which, however, the more memorable traditions were well-nigh exhausted. But what remains will afford very agreeable reading for a Scottish farmer's ingle-neuk, and will tend to strengthen the healthy principle of resistance to interference with the rights of free opinion, and of private judgment, whether that interference and attempted domination shall emanate from presbyters or curates, from Star Chambers or General Assemblies.

The Young Islanders; a Tale of the Past Century. By Jeffreys Taylor. Pp. 373, with Wood engravings. Tilt & Bogue.

A Juvenile Tale of Crusoeish adventures is in this volume run out to greater length than is usual in the nice little books got up now-a-days for young folks; and into which their papas and mammas often take a sly peep, just to ascertain "if they be proper reading for the children." The Young Islanders will be pronounced quite proper; and every tolerable imitation of Robinson Crusoe must be entertaining. By a series of accidents, in which some acquiescence of the fancy is required, a number of English school-lads are cast upon a desert island, and left wholly to their own resources, which were about as limited as their knowledge or judgment. The history of the progress of this isolated juvenile community, is an epitome of that of large adult colonies. The work is all good and entertaining, save several horrific incidents, and the close, which is too mournful to be wise in a work for the young.

Hood's Comic Annual for 1842.

Here, once more, comes Mr. Hood; open-handed, light-hearted, a droll, a wit, a humorist, as the world sets him down; and, in reality, all and each of these buoyant characters, and also what that wise world does not, we imagine, suspect, a true philosopher; and what is yet more rare, a modest, self-respecting writer. His absence for the last season "eclipsed the gaiety of nations;" and what is unusual, no one could guess in what manner he had disappeared, and whither he had gone. No newspaper "prated of his whereabout;" unlike in this to some authors, who, as he says, are "like Miss Blenkinsop's curls, never out of the papers"—either as going, coming, or fixtures; and yet paying no advertisement-duty, or none that benefits the revenue. He is invited to no public dinner; gets no service of tea-plate; is, we suspect, not to be caught as a lion, though he were capable of being tamed when caught. No American travellers have thought it worth while to break in upon him, and squeeze out an autograph—no one can tell the colour of his eyes, or how he wears his beard. In short, as an author who has works to sell, and a considerable reputation to coddle and keep warm, Mr. Hood is, or for two years has been, an unpardonable man. However, here he is again, and assuredly not the less welcome in our estimation, that he has in this long interval made "no noise nor stir about town."

The fame of his Annual for 1842 rests upon the grand epic of Miss Kilmansegg and her Precious Leg; a poem which eminently entitles the author to the dignity of being dubbed a philosopher; but many bright and funny things, à la Hood, are comprised within the same boards, in which the Precious Leg is rendered Immortal.

It is not without a certain remorse that we mangle or mar its symmetry, in attempting to display were it but its golden great toe to our readers.

The pedigree of Miss Kilmansegg is somewhat doubtful; but of her more immediate ancestors—say her grandpapa—it is certain that he literally rolled in gold—

Gold! and gold! and gold without end!
He had gold to lay by, and gold to spend,
Gold to give, and gold to lend,
And reversions of gold in futuro.
In wealth the family revell'd and roll'd—
Himself, and wife, and sons so bold;
And his daughters sang to their harps of gold
"O bella eta del'oro!"

Such was the tale of the Kilmansegg Kin,
In golden text, on a vellum skin,
Though certain people would wink and grin,
And declare the whole story a parable,—
That the ancestor rich was one Jacob Ghrimes,
Who held a long lease in prosperous times
Of acres, pasture and arable.

Leaving her ancestry in this pleasing and tantalizing obscurity, we come to Miss Kilmansegg's birth, which was as auspicious as gold could make it:—

She was one of those who, by Fortune's boon,
Are born, as they say, with a silver spoon
In her mouth—not a wooden ladle:
To speak according to poets' wont,
Plutus as sponsor stood at her font,
And Midas rocked the cradle.

She was born among eider down, and under damask and golden canopies; her first breath of vital air was redolent of otto of roses—her first glimpse of light, six wax tapers placed in golden branches:—

She was born exactly at half-past two,
As witness'd a time-piece in or-molu
That stood on a marble table—
Showing at once the time of day,
And a team of Gildings running away
As fast as they were able,
With a golden God, with a golden Star,
And a golden Spear in a golden Car,
According to Grecian fable.

Like other babes, at her birth she cried;
Which made a sensation far and wide—
Ay, for twenty miles around her;
For though to the ear 't was nothing more
Than an infant's squall, 't was really the roar
Of a Fifty-thousand Pounder!
It shook the next heir
In his library chair,
And made him cry—"Confound her!"

The signs, omens, and portents, that awaited this wondrous birth, might have sufficed for a Princess Royal, or a Prince of Wales. The feasting and quaffing were on the mightiest scale, and as for the baby wardrobe:—

—— How was the precious Baby drest?
In a robe of the East, with lace of the West,
Like one of Crœsus' issue—
Her best bibs were made
Of rich gold brocade,
And the others of silver tissue.

From a golden boat, with a golden spoon,
The babe was fed, night, morning, noon.

. . . . . .

But her nursing was poor to her christening, when—

It would fill a Court Gazette to name
What East and West-End people came
To the rite of Christianity:
The lofty lord and the titled dame,
All diamonds, plumes, and urbanity.
His Lordship, the May'r, with his golden chain,
And two gold sticks, and the Sheriffs twain,
Nine foreign Counts, and other great men
With their orders and stars to help M or N
To renounce all pomp and vanity.

To paint the maternal Kilmansegg
The pen of an Eastern Poet would beg,
And need an elaborate sonnet;
How she sparkled with gems whenever she stirr'd,
And her head niddle-noddled at every word,
And seemed so happy—a Paradise Bird
Had nidificated upon it.

And Sir Jacob, the Father, strutted and bow'd,
And smiled to himself, and laughed aloud,
To think of his heiress and daughter;
And then in his pockets he made a grope,
And then, in the fulness of joy and hope,
Seem'd washing his hands with invisible soap,
In imperceptible water.

He had rolled in money like pigs in mud,
Till it seemed to have entered into his blood
By some occult projection;
And his cheeks, instead of a healthy hue,
As yellow as any guinea grew,
Making the common phrase seem true
About a rich complexion.

A wealthy Nabob was Godpapa,
And an Indian Begum was Godmamma,
Whose jewels a Queen might covet;—
And the Priest was a Vicar, and Dean withal
Of that Temple we see with a Golden Ball,
And a Golden Cross above it.

The Font was a bowl of American gold,
Won by Raleigh in days of old,
In spite of Spanish bravado:
And the Book of Prayer was so overrun
With gilt devices, it shone in the sun
Like a copy—a presentation one—
Of Humboldt's "El Dorado."

Gold! gold! and nothing but gold!
The same auriferous shine behold,
Wherever the eye could settle!

. . . . . .

The childhood of the golden heiress is even more golden than her infancy. Her go-cart rolled on golden castors; her doll was solid gold; her primer was a book of gold-leaf. Her accomplishments were in harmony with all that had gone before, until her education being completed, it was ever——

Gold! still gold!—the bright and the dead,
With golden beads, and gold lace, and gold thread
She work'd in gold, as if for her bread;
The metal had so undermined her.
Gold ran in her thoughts, and fill'd her brain,
She was golden-headed as Peter's cane
With which he walked behind her.

And there go Peter and she in picture as true as life. Ah! better she had ever walked thus humbly; but Miss Kilmansegg could, among her other accomplishments, sit a lady's horse, although it reared; and one day she was run off with, and thrown by her bay "Banker, by Bullion out of an Ingot mare," and, after a desperate race over half London, thrown. Her amputated human limb, the result of this accident, the brave girl of gold vowed, should be replaced by a Golden one—and nothing baser; wood and cork she disdained.

A leg of Gold—solid gold throughout;
Nothing else, whether slim or stout,
Should ever support her—God willing.

. . . . . .

"Gold! gold! gold! oh, let it be gold!"
Asleep or awake that tale she told,
And when she grew delirious;—
. . . . . .

And the Precious Leg was formed, all sterling metal, bearing the goldsmith's mark on the calf. "'Twas a splendid, brilliant, beautiful leg,"—it was the talk of the whole town—East and West; and it proved Miss Kilmansegg's fate. Her courtship by a fierce foreign Count, her marriage, her honeymoon, her wedded misery, follow in regular succession, and also her father's death, and her mother's madness, when, alas! spite of her gold—

Friend or gossip she had not one
To hear the vile deeds that the Count had done.
. . . . . .
How he kissed the maids, and sparred with John;
And came to bed with his garments on;
With other offences as heinous;—
And brought strange gentlemen home to dine,
That, he said, were in the Fancy Line,
And they fancied spirits instead of wine,
And called her lap-dog "Venus."

Even Sir Jacob's gold could not long supply the wants of the Count; and then came the tug of war:—

Now the Precious Leg, while cash was flush,
Or the Count's acceptance worth a rush,
Had never excited dissension;
But no sooner the Stocks began to fall,
Than, without any ossification at all,
The limb became what people call
A perfect bone of contention.

The catastrophe may be foreseen. The owner of the Precious Leg became its victim.

Gold! still gold! hard, yellow, and cold,
For gold she had lived, and she died for gold—
By a golden weapon—not oaken:
In the morning they found her all alone—
Stiff and bloody, and cold as stone,
But her Leg—the Golden Leg—was gone!
And "the golden bowl was broken!"

So ends Miss Kilmansegg.

The Open Question is a peculiarly well-timed brochure. We wish there was of it a penny edition for Scotland, where it is greatly wanted. There are many shrewd hits, much of the Hood philosophy, and of Sterne wit, in a long sweep-net sort of story, entitled, "A Friend in need,"—but we must not venture upon it, lest it be with us—"In for a penny, in for a pound."

Advice to the Bilious; or, a Treatise on Disease of the Liver. By Rowland East, Member of the Faculty of Physicians and Surgeons, Licentiate of Apothecaries' Hall, &c. &c.

This strikes us, though we pretend to no great knowledge of the subject, as being a sensible and clear little treatise, and one which, without the usual dogmatism of some of the doctors, rises above the safe commonplace, or the "damnable iteration" of others of the publishing members of the Faculty. To show that it is not commonplace, we cite one paragraph, where the writer, at the outset of his discourse, is treating of that ill understood quality or condition of being, which goes by the name of a strong or a powerful constitution.

It is not muscular power, because the highest degree of it is associated with disease. There is something in the human constitution indefinable, call it what you may, essentially distinct from muscular force. It is that preservative principle which keeps up the vigour and maintains the balance of the rest; through atmospheric changes, pestilential vapours, vicious excesses, it sustains the human fabric up to the number twelve. Like the limbs of the polypus, it increases its force in the same ratio in which it is needed, until a certain period, when its productive power is paralyzed, and is sometimes entirely defunct. . . . . .

Unless there be a due proportion of the preservative principle, to which we have alluded, down that constitution falls, like the palace of ice in the beams of the sun. This is that peculiar influence which we sometimes see so remarkably exemplified, sometimes combined with muscular force, at other times apparently dissociated from it, termed, in vulgar language, "a good constitution." Many, even females of delicate appearance, who have not by habit been associated with sudden changes or depressing privations, will struggle through want, privation, the effluvia of disease, the changes of the atmosphere, and still retain the balance of the powers. This is an illustration of the preservative principle.

This difference between muscular power and health is further illustrated thus:—

A man who lifts four hundred-weight may have great power; but it is not yet decided whether he has all its ramifications. It is not the force of a simple individual muscular contraction which is to be estimated relatively to health: it is the duration of that force. He who lifts four hundred-weight with ease, could not probably struggle through a day's march, or a harassing campaign. His enormous strength would be exhausted by its first impulse; and he would be lacking in that great qualification, which would sustain him through continued exertion, without permanently injuring the constitution.

There is an extraordinary resemblance between the physical and moral powers, and the similarity presents an illustration. Many, from the momentary action of moral principles, might resist successfully a powerful temptation, who would yield to a series; whilst many, who would have to call up all the aid of long-established habits and associations, and with difficulty resisting the evil, would hold on their way, by the self-preserving energy of their own principles, through a continued succession.

It is thus with the material frame, the grand desideratum supplying all deficiency. The key-stone preserving the fabric is that peculiar influence which, whether it be a cause or result, gives to the balanced powers of the human body the character of permanency. I know a gentleman whose muscular strength is remarkably low, but whose capabilities of continued exertion are equally remarkable; and I should unhesitatingly pronounce him in possession of a better species of constitution than many whose physical force is much greater. I have known him, through all the fatigues of study, irregularity of living—passing from the dice-box to the wine-cup, and thence to the routine of college duties—and yet his buoyancy was retained, and his health not permanently affected.

Again:—health is not entirely dependent upon the condition of the physical powers. The air may be pure, the diet nutritious, and the varied organs in a state of healthy action, and yet the individual may not be vigorous. There must be the concurrence of the mental faculties.

It is impossible to say when or where is the point of union between body and mind,—when or where impulse partakes most of the physical or mental character. But in spite of this mystery, the union and reciprocal influence does exist, and is perpetually exercised.

But we shall not go farther on this head, nor yet touch upon the specific purpose of the Treatise; imagining that the following specimen of the author's reasoning will not only be more generally intelligible, but, in these extreme tee-total times, more useful. In the undeniable abuses of alcohol, its uses are in some danger of being forgotten; and spiritual usurpation is no longer confined to the clergy.

Much has been written and more said respecting the consumption of fermented liquors: many advocates of total abstinence, urging as an argument that the use of alcoholic drinks is unnatural. This argument amounts to nothing, because the term unnatural in this sense has no definite signification, as the elements of which alcohol is composed are elements which are found in the human body, and which are essential to its existence—hydrogen, oxygen, and carbon—into which elements all wines and spirits must be ultimately separated. There is no substance whose elements are identical with those of which the human body is composed, the moderate use of which is injurious. The opponent may assert that the constant use of opium is injurious—admitted; but opium contains morphia, which forms no part of the body, and is foreign to it. The majority of drugs owe their power to a foreign active principle. This is the case with digitalis, hemlock, colchicum, and all the active preparations. There is associated with these something of a peculiar nature, sometimes in the form of an oil, sometimes of an acid or alkali, which is positively elementary, irreducible into a divided form, the foreign aid of which is called in to counteract disease, or restore the balance of the circulation. To make a condiment of these, even in their smallest doses, is injurious, because there is a principle set at liberty which cannot be connected with the human body, but remains as an irritant or a sedative, without aiding digestion or contributing to the economy of the body. Food becomes obnoxious when elements are introduced which cannot be resolved. But this cannot be asserted of alcohol or wine; there is nothing essentially injurious in the elements of which it is composed. Elements cannot combine in a purer form than in alcohol, and he who pronounces it unnatural must discard the use of bread and water, for even then he is consuming hydrogen, oxygen, and carbon.

Let us look at the opium-eater, a man who resorts to a stimulant, but in addition to it introduces into his system a paralyzing active principle, viz., morphia narcotine, which never can contribute to the formation of the body. He is invariably emaciated by its influence, unless there is in the human frame, as was the case with the celebrated Robert Hall, a virulently painful disease, on which the power of the narcotic is expended. Was ever such a case known as an opium-eater retaining his faculties and strength till the age of eighty? Whilst we daily see many who have wallowed for half a century in beastly intoxication, who have retained health and faculties to the last. And why? Because the intoxicating liquor was composed of nutritious and natural principles. But when these simple elements are used in excess, then they become dangerous. This is the case with all species of diet, with water itself, and with bread. Excess of light, heat, clothing, &c., with calamitous sequences, ought not to lead to their exclusion. "Light is good, and a pleasant thing it is to behold the sun:" but to collect its rays into a focus, and to concentrate them on the organ of vision, is to destroy it. Wine, too, is good when its quantity is regulated by prudence. When the three powers are losing their balance,* no uncommon occurrence in the gloom of sorrow, in the excitement of business, when contemplating the miseries of fallen hopes in the desert of a cruel world, the wine-flask, more exhilarating than the bottle of water to Hagar's child, has restored the balance, and increased the power. When is wine necessary? I will tell you when. In this commercial country a commercial simile will be understood. There are many men in business who, could they obtain the loan of £100 for a few days, would be saved from utter ruin. A bill is due, the returns of the following week would be certain to meet it, but the money is wanted now. "Lend me £100 for seven days, and I am safe; refuse me, the returns of the ensuing week, though certain, I cannot wait for. I am ruined for want of power, a momentary power, which would place me on an elevation where I could throw out my energies." Just so with wine. The powers are down to Seven, it is too low an amount of power to sustain health; they are gradually sinking to Six or Five; could they be raised to Nine, the individual would be safe, because, from Nine to Twelve he would spring by the elasticity of his constitution. This is the moment for wine; it is the £100 which meets the difficulties of the day, and sustains the individual till he has the returns of the ensuing week. It gives an impulse to the three powers, which the preservative principle, being rallied, maintains. Avoid, then, excess; recollect that the elements are natural, but excess of natural elements will destroy the fabric. Reserve the use of these elements to raise the power from Nine to Twelve, not from Twelve to Twenty; and, as a physician and reverer of the word of God, I would say, "Use a little wine for thy stomach's sake and thine often infirmities." Abuse it, you will have disease of the liver, and deserve it.

Among the various causes of Liver complaint which Dr. East enumerates, is the frequent or constant use, in this notoriously drug-consuming country, of drastic purgatives. Against this prolific source of mischief he bears this strong and decided testimony:—

The habit of employing these medicines is lamentably on the increase. Persons, on the plea of economy, are in the habit of applying to the chemists and druggists for an aperient pill and draught. These men, who are necessarily ignorant of the delicate structure of the lining coats of the stomach and bowels, are in the habit of prescribing indiscriminately the most irritating medicines, such as aloes, gamboge, scammony, colocynth, &c. &c., which may give temporary relief from head-ache and fever, but which lay the foundation of a distressing hepatic disease. No language, however strong, or exposè, however searching, can be too severe to demonstrate the melancholy and dangerous results of this practice. The delicacy of the lining coat of the bowels is so fine, as to preclude the majority of these medicines in their larger doses, except in cases of extreme danger; and yet they are daily administered for the simplest derangement of the digestive organs, and are as prolific of constitutional injury, as the adulterated gin of the metropolis. The same remark applies to the abuse of the various "patent medicines" which are distributed through the country, the ingredients of which are of the most injurious tendency; and as the disease under discussion is so lamentably on the increase, it is not rash to assert, that one cause is evident in the universal abuse of these dangerous and irritating medicines. It is well known that the substance of the bowels consists of a mucus and muscular coat. Whether constipation arises from one or the other is a question which alone can be decided by a competent and educated physiologist. To irritate, therefore, the whole mucus coat of the intestinal canal, to set up, both directly and indirectly, an excessive hepatic secretion, merely to overcome the rigidity of the muscular coat of the lower bowels, would be an act of great temerity. Again: to administer a medicine, the specific action of which is on the muscular coat of the bowels, merely for a slight deficiency in the serous discharge, would be equally injudicious. And yet these varied medicines, possessing the most irritating qualities, are indiscriminately administered by hundreds of uneducated men; and hence, amongst other maladies, disease of the liver. Another very common source of hepatic disease is the abuse of bark, or the sulphate of quinine. Quinine is a fashionable medicine, and every lady who lies languidly on her ottoman is conversant with its properties. Its effect on the appetite is great, the stimulus which ensues is a permanent one; hence its abuse. Many of the fair sex, who would shudder at the allusion to gin or brandy, indulge in a habit equally injurious, when they swallow injudiciously Quinine pills. The stomach is subjected to a stimulus beyond its healthy degree, and the hepatic secretion becomes morbid; whilst a general constitutional irritability is the natural consequence. The abuse of bitters is a prolific cause—a general one. There is, in the human constitution, an intuitive love of stimulant; and human nature frequently exhibits great weakness when discussing this particular subject. The thousands who resort to the stimulus of the common dram shop are condemned by those who are taking anti-spasmedic draughts from the apothecary; the "baby's gin-glass" is spoken of as a specimen of the degeneracy of the age, whilst the infant of the objector is probably in the act of being stupified by "Dalby's Carminative;" and the folly of the wine-bibber is frequently rendered the subject of satire by the man who has just finished his opium. All excess is bad, alike to matter and to mind; the human frame, like the instrument of music, requires a peculiar touch: that touch may be varied, on account of the rich compass of the notes; beyond this compass, harmony ceases, and the rude hand which attempts it frequently destroys the instrument. The individual is capable of a certain amount of excitement, and, to restore this when drooping, the aid of stimulants is called in; but it is when it has reached its proper level, there is an attempt to increase what is natural by an artificial agency, that the agent becomes abused.

These are the remarks of a judicious professional man; and it is only by the soundness of his opinions on matters of which they are able to judge, that people can form a proper estimate of "a Liver-Doctor," or any other kind of doctor. This little volume is dedicated, "by special permission," to the Duke of Sussex. It is worthy of the most distinguished patronage.

THE NEW NOVELS.

We have, with very few exceptions, nothing new or agreeable to report of the mid-winter batch of novels. "Thieves! Thieves! Fire! Fire! Murder! Murder!" cries "that make night hideous," are the fitting mottoes for most of them. And first,—

Ferrers.—Much could not be expected from a novel of which the malignant monomaniac Lord Ferrers was the foredoomed hero. Yet from Mr. Ollier better might have been hoped, had he not proclaimed himself the convert, the admiring disciple of Mr. Ainsworth. Now, however it may fare with the heads of the Ainsworth popular school of romance, there is but slender chance for their imitators, unless they out-Herod Herod, and riot in blood and villany. Besides the usual number of murderers, burglars, thief-takers, and so forth, Ferrers is illustrated by an amiable character, who, after murdering his sister in cold blood, for the sake of her money, at the opening of the story, lives as a mysterious and most interesting penitent, the saviour of everybody, throughout its course; and edifies the reader much in the style of those saints whom the gallows speedily translates to glory.

Flirtation, or a Month at Harrowgate, promised better. We fancied ourselves secure here against murder, arson, and other popular topics; and were confirmed in the pleasant delusion by a sensible preface—a grave, moral, and religious preface—disclaiming all frivolity of purpose, and, above all, those false and extravagant representations of life and manners which are generally found in novels. Now, how has Miss Sinclair redeemed the I O U of her title page? With only two bloody murders, one fire, ditto villain Jesuit, mysteries innumerable, and a jealous waiting-maid, who powders her sick mistress's pudding with arsenic, à la Lafarge, as coolly as if the mortal poison were crushed lump. This, however, is not surprising, for the young lady whom it is attempted to poison, and her sister—the pattern girl of the book—take the matter quite as easily. Now, all this might be forgiven by the critics, or conceded to the prevailing raw-head-and-bloody-bones humour of the day; but what will the young ladies say? deluded as they must be by the flattering promise held out to them, when they find that there is no Flirtation; absolutely nothing of that gay, airy, intoxicating, innocent, evanescent, and indefinable thing, which alike defies goose quills, and crow-quills, to paint.

The exception to the Banditti Ruffian and Mystery tomes, is Cecil, a Peer; and Hardness, or the Uncle. The first is the sequel to a fiction which last season set the town a-gape for twice nine days; namely, Cecil, The Coxcomb; as to the authorship of which, the knowing have come to the conclusion that Mrs. Gore and Sir E. L. Bulwer wrote, (Beaumont and Fletcher-wise,) chapter and chapter about, and then shook up the whole composition in a hat. However the truth may be, it is not difficult to say who certainly has had a fair hand in Cecil, though more difficult to say who has not. Both works possess largely all Mrs. Gore's characteristic felicities and graces of style, and a full measure of her peculiarities.

Hardness, or the Uncle, is a string of desultory conversations, passing everywhere, and about any and everything; eked out by every means to get up the specified quantity of letter-press. Story there is none; character none, beyond those that have been stock with Theodore Hook for twenty years back. Yet the book is not without a certain kind of cleverness. Its distinguishing or obtrusive feature, however, is Toryism; but Toryism of that harmless, flippant sort, of which the only effect is to tickle shallow adherents of the same faith, without making for the cause either friend or enemy;—Toryism of the force and efficacy of Dame Partington's broom. The only attempt at original character—the hard uncle, is a complete failure. He is the mere hard outline of an ill-conditioned brute, without distinctness, and without shading; so ill-conceived, that the reader at the end of the book is disappointed to find that so preposterous a personage has not been acting all the while in a mask; and is nothing different from the malignant, petty tyrant which he seems. Worth ten of him is his Irish factotum and Toady, Dr. Higgins, and an amusing, Malaprop, Slipslop country blue, Miss Irvine. We fear the delineations of the dignified pursuits and amusements of her majesty's enlightened and respectable dragoon officers are scarcely to be called libels, unless truth be so.

Lays and Lyrics. By Charles Gray.

This is an exceedingly neat, and even elegant volume of poems, of which the history is somewhat singular, and to the author—the Poet—not a little flattering. Prefixed to it appears a lithographed Round Robin, in which quite a constellation of poetical names surrounds a prayer, that Captain Gray, of the Royal Marines, Woolwich, would be gracious enough to collect the effusions of his lyric muse, scattered through many periodical works, and give them to immortality. The petition has been complied with. It was, indeed, irresistible; for this was not the mere "advice of friends," but the urgent prayer of more living poets than we could reckon up, though our fingers were thrice ten. This importunity is to be held decisive as to the merits and character of the Lays and Lyrics; and after the opinion pronounced by such a tribunal, it would be presumptuous in us to say one word whether in praise or blame. The volume, in external show and accomplishments, is worthy of its honourable origin. It is very neatly printed, and very handsomely bound; and the vignette and frontispiece, (printed from electrotype plates,) are indeed "admirable specimens of art." The frontispiece is a portrait of the poet, in full uniform. The vignette, a delicious view of his native place, Anstruther, the classic town of Maggie Lauder. The volume comes at a good season, and will, we venture to predict, receive a hearty welcome from friends on both sides of the Tweed.

PART XXXVIII. THE PICTORIAL SHAKSPEARE: POEMS. PART II.—[It is with a melancholy feeling that we see this beautiful work drawing to a close. In this feeling, those who for three years have seen a fresh Part placed on their tables, regularly as the first of the month came round, must participate. From a postscript to the sixth volume, we learn that the Editor, Mr. Charles Knight, (after the Pictorial Edition is completed, by the publication of a few more numbers,—which will conclude the Poems, and contain an analysis of the disputed or "ascribed" plays, with life of Shakspeare, and history of opinion on his poetical character)—is to commence editing a New Library Edition of the whole works. No student of Shakspeare, in text and in spirit, or critical Editor, has, in our time, made the subject more thoroughly his own.]

YARRELL'S HISTORY OF BRITISH BIRDS. Parts 26, 27, 28.—[These parts are principally devoted to water-fowl. The engravings of swans, shieldrakes, coots, &c., &c., are as fine as any of the previous illustrations of this elegant work; and the text is full of charming bird-anecdote, and bird personal history.

WINKLE'S CATHEDRALS of ENGLAND and WALES. Nos. 37, 38.—Lichfield Cathedral, of which there are six fine engravings, forms the subject of these numbers. The letter-press is occupied with a History of the See, and a description of the Cathedral, and its monuments.

SELBY'S HISTORY OF BRITISH FOREST-TREES. Parts 4, 5, 6.—[In these Parts we find all the varieties of the willow and the poplar; the birch and the alder; and also the oak, with several splendid specimens of this noblest of British trees, which are probably portraits.]

PART II. VOLUME II. THORNTON'S HISTORY OF BRITISH INDIA.

GEORGE CRUIKSHANK'S OMNIBUS, from No. I. to No. VIII., inclusive.—[The Omnibus had got so far a-head of us, ere we were apprised of its starting, that we cannot pretend to overtake it. The December number, however, has pictorial as well as literary merits, which cannot be passed over in silence. Among the latter is a clever sketch by LAMAN BLANCHARD of a diner-out of a peculiar idiosyncracy, by name Jack Gay; a gentleman whom every one must have met, who knows much of Town society. FRANK HEARTWELL, a novel which has run through all the numbers, is here continued; and we are enchanted once more to meet Mrs. Toddles. The conductor of the Omnibus should never consent to set that dear old body down. Besides the ordinary humours, oddities, and vagaries of the pencil, the December number contains a portrait of Miss Adelaide Kemble, in the character of Norma, and two more good serious plates, illustrative of the late burning of the Tower.

CHARLES O'MALLEY THE IRISH DRAGOON. Two volumes octavo, with Illustrations by Phiz: Curry and Co., Dublin.—[It is a question for the Four Courts, whether this dashing work, in its collective state, falls under the head Serial, though such has been its birth, character, and progress. Of a work so well known, and so popular among a large class of gay, young readers, it is superfluous to say one word; save, that this production shows a somewhat more reflective spirit; and the natural consequence, a sounder moral tone, than its prototype, HARRY LORREQUER, without any abatement of humour, drollery, and broad fun.]

HOW to COLONIZE; the INTEREST of the COUNTRY; and the DUTY of the GOVERNMENT. By Ross D. Mangles, Esq., M.P.

This is an argument showing that Government ought to induce capitalists to go to New Zealand, and buy and settle on the Company's lands; and ought to employ the said Company in the business of conducting a comprehensive scheme of emigration. Never mind the labourers; get the moneyed men in the first place, and the labourers will either follow or be procured by the Company. Mr. Mangles is impressed with the conviction that such a body as the New Zealand Company is the best possible instrument for working out the prompt and effectual occupation of a new field of colonization. There is no question that colonization is very much the interest of the Company, and also that no labourers are wanted without "the employers of labour," or individuals possessing from £1000 to £10,000 capital. Mr. Mangles mentions no other field of colonization save this one. The whole pamphlet refers to the superior advantages of New Zealand. This we notice not to depreciate that colony, which seems destined to be ultimately the most prosperous of the southern colonies, but simply to show the object of the pamphlet. Of this interesting colony we have something to say ourselves by-and-by.

THE SECOND ANNUAL REPORT of the BRITISH and FOREIGN ANTI-SLAVERY SOCIETY, held in Exeter Hall in May 1841.

THE METEOROLOGICAL EPHEMERIS for 1842.

POLITICAL REGISTER.

The meeting of Parliament has been fixed for the 3d February, yet nothing to be relied on has yet transpired of any measures to be adopted by Government. Persons have been sent to the continent to ascertain the rate of wages, mode of living, and progress of manufactures; but as it is stated that they are, in many instances, ignorant of the language of the countries they visit, they must take their information at second hand. Why the former method of obtaining information from the Consuls has been abandoned, we are not aware, unless the report be correct, that British Consuls and Vice-Consuls are sometimes speculators in corn; and we suspect that the object of sending out special messengers on this errand is to procure, not accurate and distinct details, but such facts as may best suit the purposes of their employers. The rumour that the corn laws are to be cobbled a little, by a modification of the Sliding Scale, and a more rigid method of taking the averages, has been again revived, and again contradicted; but the matter is of very little importance, as the corn law repealers have resolved to be content with nothing but a total and immediate repeal. Another rumour prevails that the Kirk question is to be settled by the Ministry; and drafts of a bill for that purpose are even shown; but its provisions are so extraordinary, that we cannot believe the report, for it would confer powers almost equal to those of the Pope on the Non-intrusion party.—The heir to the Crown has been created Prince of Wales, and is to be christened, with great ceremony and extravagance, to gratify the Tories, and to convince the people how little they care for their distresses. The King and Queen of Prussia are expected to be present.—The most important intelligence of the month is, that the French Ministry have resolved to reduce their army by one company in each regiment, or 89,000 men in all—being about the fifth part. This reduction will effect a saving of about £1,200,000. From this step we may draw the inference, that Louis Philippe's designs on Spain are, for the present, abandoned; and that the peace of Europe is secured for some time to come: although, from the manner in which the reduction has been effected, it is obvious that the army may be raised again to its late force in the course of a few weeks. The French army is still the largest in Europe, and consists of 344,000 men.—There is still no news from China. Numerous reinforcements, both in men and ships, have been sent out; and it is to be hoped that the Opium War may be put down without farther delay, as both the Nepaulese and Burmese are preparing for the field, and we are likely to be engaged in a war with the greater part of Asia at one time.—The most important news from America is, that many of the States are unable to pay the interest of their debts; and one of them, Mississippi, refuses to raise taxes, on some quibble, that the debt has not been contracted in due legal form. It is feared that other States will follow the example, and raise quibbles to enable them to resist payment. Such conduct is most disreputable, and will be severely felt in Britain; but it is only following the example of the Continental Monarchs, who have, on many occasions, applied the spunge to the public debt. The Boundary question remains as it did; but the ferment arising out of the cases of M'Leod and Grogan has entirely subsided.—In Ireland, state prosecutions, for sedition, have been commenced; and the Tory press is calling loudly for coercive measures to put down the agitation of repeal, although the country is admitted to be in so tranquil a state that ten of the stipendiary magistrates have been dismissed; and after the 3d April next, there is only to be one stipendiary magistrate in each county.—The new poor law does not seem to work well in Ireland. Out of one hundred infants admitted into the North Dublin Union Workhouse in one year, no less than forty-five have died. In November and December 1840, seventy-six children were attacked with measles, of whom twenty-four died. All the children admitted into the house become scrofulous, owing to their sleeping in crowded and damp dormitories.

Parks near Cities.—Two new parks, or pieces of pleasure-ground, have lately been projected in London; one in the eastern part of the metropolis, to form which, an immense number of houses must be taken down; and another of sixty acres at Kennington, adjoining the Surrey Zoological Gardens. Would something of the same kind not be useful in the neighbourhood of Edinburgh? Of late years the poor people have been deprived of the only open space in the city they had access to—the East and West North Lochs; and even walking on the roads in this vicinity is yearly becoming more disagreeable, by the increase of stone walls, and the raising those already built so high that they cannot be looked over.

Population.—The total population of Great Britain, including the Channel Islands and Isle of Man, by last census, is 9,077,436 males, and 9,567,325 females; in all, 18,664,761. This includes 4003 males, and 893 females, ascertained to have been travelling by railways and canals, on the night of June 6, and that part of the army, navy, and merchant seamen, which was in Great Britain. The population of Scotland is, 1,246,427 males, 1,382,530 females; in all, 2,628,957. The increase of the population is fourteen and a half per cent. for England, and eleven one-tenth for Scotland. The great increase has, as formerly, been in the mining and manufacturing counties; being from sixteen to thirty-six per cent.: while the agricultural counties have advanced at the rate of from five to ten per cent. In Scotland, there has been a decrease in several of the agricultural and pastoral counties:—in Perthshire and Sutherlandshire, 3·4 per cent.; in Kinross-shire, 3·5; Argyleshire, 3·9. Lanarkshire has increased 34·8 per cent.; Edinburghshire only 2.8; and East Lothian and Berwickshire only one per cent. There are now upwards of eight millions more people in Great Britain than there were in 1801, when the population was 10,472,048. If the population goes on at the same rate as it has done during the last ten years, it will be double what it is at present at the end of seventy years. A singular difference in the number of males to females exists in different districts. Taking the whole population of burghs in Scotland, within parliamentary boundaries, which is 960,592, 440,528 are males, and 520,064 are females, or about one-fourth more females than males. In Edinburgh, however, out of 133,692, there are 58,642 males, to 75,050 females—a little above a third more; in Glasgow, of 257,592, there are 120,693 males, and 136,629 females—only about one-eighth more; in Greenock, the proportion is one-seventeenth; in Aberdeen, one-fourth; in Dundee, one-sixth; in Paisley, rather less; and so on. In Airdrie, the males are the more numerous, 6681, to 5735 females. The same is the case in Lauder. But these are the only instances. The return shows, in a distinct manner, how defectively the burgh parliamentary representation is adapted to the population. The Wigtown burghs, with a population of 8702, have one member; the Dumbarton, with 38,373, and the Arbroath, with 43,172, have no more; and Glasgow, with 257,592, has only two: while, if the proportion of the population were regarded, it ought to return nearly thirty. The number of uninhabited houses in Scotland is much greater than could have been anticipated with an increasing population:—the total is 24,307, to 503,357 inhabited. Of the uninhabited, 2861 are in Edinburgh and the county; and 3964 in Lanarkshire. In the county of Edinburgh, only 121 houses are building; while there are a greater number in the counties of Aberdeen, Fife, and Forfar; and there are 863 in Lanarkshire.

Consumption of Grain in the United Kingdom.—A correspondent of The Examiner attributes the whole distress, not to the currency, or any other of the causes to which it has been attributed, but to fluctuation in the price of grain. We some time ago gave a Table of the estimated consumption of grain; and it may be contrasted with the following, given in The Examiner. Both tables take the population at twenty-eight millions.

The value of this quantity of grain, at the average prices of the year 1835, was £109,874,666; of 1837, £131,421,968; of 1838, £140,736,010; and of 1839, £160,525,531. The value of the quantity consumed by man alone, in 1835, was £58,162,235. It is easy to see how injurious to our manufactures a rise of price of 30 or 40 per cent. on the food of the people must be.

THE CORN LAW MOVEMENT is proceeding with more vigour than ever. On the 1st and 2d of December, a meeting of dissenting ministers of religion was held at Caernarvon. The proceedings commenced with a number of speeches, asserting the right and duty of ministers of religion to take part in the efforts now making to repeal the corn and provision laws.—These were followed by statements as to the distress existing in the different districts of North Wales. It was stated, that in the parish of Rhuabon, in North Wales, there were 14,000 persons who had formerly been in full employment, begging their bread. Last year several thousand children had attended the Sunday schools, but the attendance had gradually diminished, till now only a few hundreds were left. In another parish, out of 1400 male inhabitants, 1200 were out of work; and what aggravated the evil was, that while in full work eight pounds of flour could be bought for a shilling, but now that work could hardly be got, only four and a half pounds could be got for that sum. During two days' discussion, a series of resolutions, condemnatory of the Corn Laws, were agreed to, and a memorial to the queen, and addresses to the various religious communities in North Wales, were prepared. The Welsh meeting was followed by another at Derby, at which about 1200 manufacturers from Nottingham, Leicester, and Derby were present. The meeting were quite unanimous in passing a series of resolutions for the total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws. From the statements made at this meeting, it appears that ever since 1815, the manufactures of the middle districts have been rapidly declining, and that during that time wages have sunk one-half,—a fact the more remarkable from its occurring in manufactures in which the principle of their machinery has remained essentially the same, and in which the manual operations have not been interfered with by steam power. A large proportion of the stocking-frames are unemployed; the export trade in hosiery to the European States, formerly important, is now extinct; and the trade with America is almost superseded by German competition. The Corn Laws were denounced as the chief cause of the present distress, and the meeting entered into a solemn pledge to unite all their energies, and to persevere in an unremitting determination in demanding their total abolition. A petition to the House of Commons, to which the signatures of the manufacturers of the middle districts are to be procured, was agreed to. A meeting of the deputies from the various Anti-Corn Law Associations of the West Riding of Yorkshire, was held at Leeds, on the 13th December. Almost all the delegates were persons extensively engaged in manufactures in Leeds, Bradford, Huddersfield, Halifax, Wakefield, and the other towns of the Riding. Since the year 1838, twenty-nine houses engaged in the woollen trade, in Leeds alone, had failed, and their united liabilities amounted to £515,000. In the flax and spinning trade, there had been eighteen failures; sixteen machine-makers had failed, the same number of wool-staplers, and an equal number had gone out of the trade,—the liabilities of these parties being £175,000. Of the stuff houses and worsted spinners, nine had failed, with debts amounting to £457,000. Adding the insolvencies of the clothing districts apart from Leeds, the total amount of the debts due by insolvents was two millions, on which not more than 6s. 8d. per pound had been paid. There had not been more than half employment for the working-classes during the last two years; and although between 1831 and 1841, the houses had only increased 3¼ per cent., the number empty had increased 55 per cent., and they now amounted to 18,870 in the West Riding. The consumption of butcher-meat among the working-classes had diminished in the same ratio as their wages. The shopkeepers had suffered as severely as the manufacturers, and they had failed or gone out of business in hundreds. It was resolved that the main cause of all the mischief was the Corn Laws, which, by raising the price of food in this country, force the labourer to spend the bulk of his earnings on food, whereby he must purchase less clothing than formerly; while consumption of our manufactures in America and other foreign countries, is impeded by our restrictions on trade, which exclude the only payment which those countries can make. Similar statements as those regarding Leeds were made as to other towns and districts in the West Riding. After passing resolutions, pledging the meeting to continue agitation against the Corn and Provision Laws, it was recommended that the Local Committees should collect information, and bring it to a Conference to be held in Leeds not later than the 12th January, in order to collate it, and decide upon the manner in which it shall be laid before the Government and the Legislature. On the 16th December, a Conference was held at Manchester, of Deputies from the various towns of the cotton districts. The assemblage comprised several Members of Parliament, a great number of manufacturers, and gentlemen of influence in Manchester, Lancashire, and Chester. The proceedings occupied the whole day. The first resolution set forth, that the district, of which Manchester is the centre, is suffering under a general depression, the operation of which has no parallel in the history of Lancashire: that the population, both employed and operative, is greatly deteriorated in condition; and that fixed capital, such as buildings and machinery, has depreciated in value one half since 1836: that bankruptcy has alarmingly increased; and that disease, crime, and mortality, have made fearful inroads among the poorer classes. A second resolution attributes the distress to restrictions on trade, and especially to the Corn and Provision Laws; and a third resolution calls for the repeal of all protective duties, including "the miscalled legal" protection to the cotton trade. We are glad to see the manufacturers call so unequivocally for the removal of taxes on the importation of foreign manufactures, and for an unlimited free trade: for, by so doing, they meet one of the arguments—the most frequently used by the monopolists—viz., that while they wish to remove all protection from the agriculturist, they are desirous of maintaining the existing duties on foreign manufactured articles entire. We trust, however, that before the meeting of Parliament, some general system of action will be devised on the part of the advocates of Free Trade: for, however useful such meetings as those we have described may be in turning popular attention to the necessity of repealing the Corn Laws, nothing will be effected until a practical measure be agreed on, and every effort used to carry it through the Legislature.

Conference of Dissenting Ministers at Edinburgh.—In Edinburgh, a preliminary meeting of ministers and members of Dissenting Congregations was held on the 7th Dec.; and it was resolved to hold a meeting of Dissenters from all parts of Scotland, at Edinburgh, on the 11th and 12th of January, to express their opinion of the injustice and immoral tendency of the Corn and Provision Laws, and to petition for their total repeal, and an entirely free trade in corn. It is expected that this meeting will be numerously attended, and that it will have a great effect in forwarding the cause of Corn Law Repeal in Scotland. It was thought to be useless, if not insulting, to invite the ministers of the Establishment, as, from the circumstance of their stipends being paid in grain, convertible at the fiars prices, they had a direct interest in a high price of corn; and as the General Assembly had actually supported the corn laws. It was also remembered, that although they had been all invited to the Conference held some time ago at Manchester, only two or three attended it, and very few had even thought proper to acknowledge the receipt of the invitation. It is apparent, from the speeches made, and resolutions passed at all these meetings, that neither any fixed duty, nor any cobbling of the sliding scale, will now be agreed to; but that a total and immediate repeal will be insisted for.

SCOTLAND.

The Rural Police.—Neither in Scotland nor in England does this force appear to be becoming more popular. In some of the English counties it has been resolved to diminish the number considerably; and the inefficiency of the force is a subject of very general complaint. Although the expense is considerable, robberies and other depredations appear to be as common as ever; but it must be admitted, that they have been of some value as protectors of game, many persons having been punished for offences against the game laws, on prosecutions at their instance. One of the offences they appear to have set themselves most decidedly against, is thimble-rigging: but still these gentry ply their vocation in this neighbourhood as heretofore, and they are to be found almost daily on the road to Duddingston, by Arthur's Seat, where the rural police do not appear to molest them.

The Kirk, notwithstanding all efforts to check it by means of civil process, proceeds in its career. The burying of a child on the Sunday, in the Presbytery of Arbroath, has brought down on its parents the once fearful sentence of excommunication; and the Presbytery has refused to hear an application for the revisal of this sentence, except with closed doors. An effectual step has, however, been taken to prevent the agitation of itinerant orators, such as Leckie and Makgill Crichton, by the heritors interdicting the ministers from using the church for any other purpose than for divine service, and thus preventing it from becoming the theatre for uproarious and even seditious meetings. Any single heritor is entitled to prevent the church being used for any other purpose than the worship of God, and we hope the example set by the heritors of Barry will be generally followed. Rumours are in circulation, that Government intends to bring in a bill to give the Church the liberum arbitrium—that is, practically a right to reject or receive any presentee, independently of the wishes of the people; but it is impossible to believe that any Government could agree to such a measure.

The Railway to England.—The apathy of the people of Edinburgh, and of the eastern districts of Scotland generally, on this subject, is remarkable. To Edinburgh it is a "life and death question;" for, if the western line by Lancaster, Carlisle, and Hamilton to Glasgow, be adopted, Edinburgh will become, in a very few years, a provincial town, as venerable and as respectable as Saint Andrews. The branch, even from Symington to Edinburgh, will never be completed, simply because it has no chance of ever being carried through by private individuals; and because Government, were the revenue as abundant as it is deficient, could never feel itself justified in expending money on a project so entirely hopeless. If the western line of railway be completed, the road to London from Edinburgh will be by Glasgow; not, as hitherto, from Glasgow by Edinburgh. The west line has great difficulties to contend with, not only from the greater length of the line which is required to be formed, but from the circumstance, that the country, from Lancaster to Glasgow, is much less adapted for railway communication than that from Newcastle to Edinburgh. We have, on the western line, works of a kind that have never hitherto been attempted, embankments of immense depth, and bridges of correspondent height—one of them being 232 feet, or just twice the height of St. Andrew's steeple in this town. One great difficulty of the western line is at the outset: notwithstanding all the confident reports to the contrary, no means of passing Shap Fell with locomotive engines has yet been devised; and nothing can show the difficulty of this route more clearly than that it has been seriously proposed to run the railway through the sands of the Solway Firth, though, in proceeding by that route, the line must be useless for one half of the day, from being covered by the tides. Then, supposing the line fairly in Scotland, how are the hilly and barren districts of Dumfries-shire, Ayrshire, and Lanarkshire to be surmounted?—only by a succession of great embankments and high bridges, unequalled, we will venture to say, on any line of equal length in the world. With some few exceptions, there are no towns of importance on the western line, and the country throughout is very thinly inhabited. The great bulk of the population of Scotland reside on the eastern coast. From Berwick to Wick we find the country teeming with population, and the land in a high state of cultivation, with scarcely the intervention of a barren tract; on the west coast, with small intervals at Carlisle, Dumfries, and in the vale of the Clyde, we find neither population nor agriculture, but the country everywhere remaining in a state of nature. Nobody will pretend to compare the south-western counties—such as Dumfries, Kirkcudbright, Ayr, and Wigtown—with the eastern counties of Berwickshire and East Lothian: in the former the population is 82 to the square mile, and the annual value of a square mile is £295; while in the two latter the population is 122, and the annual value £739; showing a superiority of the eastern agricultural counties over the western, when population and value are combined, of more than three to one. As is now too well known to be controverted, no railway can pay its expenses, except from passengers. In the most recent estimates, two-thirds of the money have been estimated to arise from this source; but how can there be any extensive revenue from passengers, when there is no population? It may be thought of little consequence what is the population of the intermediate district, if that at the termini is sufficiently extensive; but a little consideration will show the fallacy of such an opinion. For one man that has anything to do with people a hundred miles off, there are fifty who have business to transact with their neighbours not five miles distant; and hence the extraordinary fact, that three hundred thousand have been conveyed on the Edinburgh and Dalkeith railway in a year, though the country, after passing Dalkeith, is exceedingly thinly peopled and barren. But, in considering the proper line of railway to be adopted it is essential to keep in view, that it is a railway to connect England and Scotland that is wanted, and not merely a line which will make travelling from Newcastle to Edinburgh, or from Lancashire to Glasgow, more expeditious. We have already shown, that if we look to the population and value of the eastern and western districts of Scotland, the former has a great superiority. But if we cross the rivers Forth and Clyde, we find the superiority of the east coast to the west still more strongly established. Beyond the Clyde northwards, civilisation, manufactures, agriculture, and the other arts, may almost be said to cease: on proceeding from the Forth northwards, we find manufactures, agriculture, the arts, and human industry, to the most distant point, flourishing in full vigour. Let us again resort to the sure test of statistics. The western counties of Argyle, Inverness, and Ross, contain, on the average, only 25 to the square mile; the eastern counties of Fife, Forfar, Aberdeen, and Caithness, have a population of 119 to the square mile. The annual average value of the three former counties, per square mile, is £51; of the four latter, £279: so that, looking at population and value conjunctly, the eastern counties are more valuable than the western, in the ratio of 25 to 1, per square mile. There is another important element of consideration. The passage by sea from Glasgow to Liverpool, is much easier and much more frequented, than that from Edinburgh to Newcastle. Railways can hardly ever compete with water communication by steam; and while there is little chance of any great number of passengers ever being carried to Newcastle, or the intermediate ports from Leith, already a great and increasing intercourse exists between Glasgow and Lancashire by steam-boat conveyance. With regard to the engineering qualities of the two lines, our space, as well as the nature of the subject, forbids us at present to speak; but this we will venture to say, that it will require at least double the capital to connect England and Scotland by the west coast as by the east. If the people of the eastern coast of Scotland lose the benefit which the circumstance of being the great centre of communication between the two kingdoms must necessarily confer, it will arise solely from their own apathy and indifference; and we regret to see, that while there are frequent meetings in Glasgow, Carlisle, Lancaster, and in all the towns in the proposed western line, Edinburgh and the towns on the east coast do not stir in the matter. If Edinburgh is dormant, why do not the smaller towns awake? What has become of the bold spirit and mercantile enterprise of Aberdeen and Dundee? They are suffering, we are well aware, under the general depression; but it is not by sitting with their hands across, on a great project of this sort, that alleviation of misery is to be obtained. We are well aware that there are numerous difficulties in the way, and though not the most formidable, certainly among the most annoying, that the landowners from Berwick to Edinburgh, generally speaking, will not interest themselves in the matter, and, on the contrary, appear hostile to railroads coming through their property; but were they once convinced that they would be benefited by such a mode of conveyance—a task of no great difficulty—they would cordially coöperate with the inhabitants of the towns on the east coast.

TRADE AND MANUFACTURES—INCREASING DISTRESS.

Our manufactures generally, have not, for a great length of time, been so much depressed as at present. The distress is not, as hitherto, confined to one or two districts, or to one or two trades, but prevails in every branch of industry, and extends over the whole United Kingdom. At Paisley, the number of persons living on charity continues weekly to increase. It has now reached between 13,000 and 14,000; and it is obvious that it will not be much longer possible to raise funds for their relief from private charity. Considering the high price of provisions, and that there is a large quantity of foreign grain in bond, we think that petitions ought to be got up, for the Government either to release it altogether free of duty, or at a much lower rate than the sliding scale imposes, for the purpose of preventing the people from starving. No harm would be done to any one from such a step, for it may now be confidently predicted that the averages will, in a month or two, rise so high as to liberate the whole grain now in bond, at a nominal duty. It is a matter of total indifference to the farmer, whether the grain be taken out at present at a low duty, or a few months hence. In Spitalfields, in thirty-six streets carefully examined, 1025 looms were found in work, and 658 out of work; and those at work are only half employed. In the whole district, it is calculated that there are between 12,000 and 13,000 looms, half of which are not in work, while the remaining half are working half time; and as each loom employs three hands, a large proportion of the population are necessarily out of employment. In London, there are 15,000 journeymen tailors, of whom one-half are out of employ, and the other half only partially employed. At Bradford, a few months ago, 6000 persons were fully employed in the factories: at present, only 1650 are employed, and not fully; the remainder are living on their savings, or by pawning their furniture and clothes. In the iron trade, the greatest distress prevails, owing to the iron masters, both in England and Scotland, having resolved to blow out one-fourth of their furnaces for six months. The object of this is to increase their own profits, and already the price of iron has risen; but it is well deserving of consideration, whether any body of men should be allowed to enter into a combination, which reduces, in a single week, thousands of industrious men, whom these very masters will be glad to employ six months hence, to utter beggary. Dumbarton and Greenock are suffering severely from the depressed state of the shipping trade; at the former town, upwards of 200 carpenters and joiners are out of employment. In the vale of the Leven, many calico-printers are idle. At Dundee, the greatest distress prevails among all classes; and bankruptcies are almost of daily occurrence. Since 1838, there have been nearly nine hundred sequestrations in Scotland: more than three times the number of the preceding three years. The linen trade of Ireland is much embarrassed; and, at a recent meeting at Belfast, a memorial to the Board of Trade was adopted, calling the attention of Government to the subject. The depression is attributed to the restrictive measures of late adopted by foreign countries, against the importation of Irish linen, in retaliation for our prohibitions against our high duties on foreign grain, provisions, and timber.

AGRICULTURE.

It is now ascertained beyond question, that the late harvest is deficient both in quantity and quality, although the averages do not yet indicate the real state of the matter. Owing to the great quantity of light and inferior grain, which the farmers are anxious to rid themselves of, prices, as estimated by the general returns, continue comparatively low; wheat being 64s. 9d.; barley, 32s. 4d.; and oats, 22s. 4d. per imperial quarter. But if we turn to the provincial markets, we find a different statement. Thus, at Edinburgh, on the 15th December, the best wheat actually brought 80s. a quarter, though the supply was large and sales heavy; but even here the average was reduced, by considerable quantities of wheat being presented, which did not realize more than £2, 5s. a quarter. Such low-priced wheat is unfit for making bread, and is purchased for making starch, and such other purposes. The potato crop in Scotland appears generally to have turned out well, but in Wales and Ireland it is undoubtedly deficient. Owing to the long continuance of wet weather, it was impossible to take up the crop at the proper period. Great quantities have been found to have rotted in the ground; and in some parts of Ireland, not one-half of the potato crop has been saved. In England and Ireland, as well as in France, there have been serious floods, by which the wheat already sown has been much injured, and a great extent of ground intended for that crop has remained unsown. Disease among the cattle and sheep has again made its appearance in East Lothian and other districts, but not with such severity as last year; and as it is now ascertained that no great danger attends it, if not aggravated by improper treatment, the disease has not created much alarm. Notwithstanding the weekly increasing agitation for the repeal of the Corn and Provision Laws, farmers feel no hesitation in taking farms at higher rents, for they are now pretty well convinced that they have little to fear even from the most perfect freedom in trade. The stimulus which such a measure would give to our manufactures, and the additional demand for agricultural produce which would thereby be created, would very quickly compensate for any temporary fall in the price of grain, and place the agriculturist in a much more favourable position than he at present holds.

FEBRUARY, 1842.

THE NEXT MOVE OF THE REFORMERS.

WHITHER are we first to witness the immediate and total abolition of the Bread Tax, and a free trade in the prime necessaries of life,—or a National Combination, consisting of all denominations of Reformers, to obtain for every citizen his constitutional right, the enjoyment of the elective franchise?—To this alternative we have fairly come. One or other of these things must take priority; and from present appearances we are led to conclude that, after all, the first in order must be a general agitation for complete Suffrage. The Free Trade party—the voice of the country, more properly, if ever it was decidedly uttered upon any question, has declared, that no compromise with the Monopolists can be submitted to; that nothing less will meet the exigency than absolute and unconditional repeal of the imposts upon the People's food, and the knocking off of the fetters which trammel their industry. Now, the landowners and other monopolists will, we verily believe, as readily yield the Suffrage as surrender their darling monopolies.

The respite craved by Sir Robert Peel, when he had the boldness to assume office, is fast hastening to a close, and, doubtless, he now has his grand panacea prepared. We shall not be surprised to see the strong head of a strong Tory Government, compelling the great Duke of Buckingham himself to swallow the new Sliding Scale, for the conciliation of the manufacturing and commercial interests. But will the barren victory of Peel over Buckingham meet the necessities of those suffering interests, or the views of the earnest and thoroughgoing men who raised their voices against the Corn and Provision Laws at the late formidable gatherings, and emphatically declared that they will never rest satisfied till every vestige of those cruel, oppressive, impolitic, and unchristian monopolies, which grind the poor and corrupt the rich, are for ever swept away? Now, by what instrument or agency is this to be accomplished? In the present state of the representation, is it to be expected from any Tory, or, for that matter, from any Whig Government?

On the prorogation of Parliament, when Sir Robert Peel had received the days of grace for which he prayed, and when the course which he must, of necessity, take, was pretty clearly indicated by the sort of men of whom he had formed his Government, it was remarked in this publication*—

"Of the Corn-Law agitation abating there is little chance. Hunger will keep it alive; many pressing interests require that it should be continued; and now it is openly encouraged by the late government. But although the Corn and other monopolies may be entitled at present to take precedence in point of date, there are principles to be agitated for of equal importance. The Tories, under the guidance of Peel and the pressure of necessity, may extinguish some of the grosser monopolies; but neither Whigs nor Tories will, without a struggle, give the only effectual security for every Reform that is required—for the permanent means of all improvements, whether fiscal, commercial, or social—namely, a fair, full, and free representative system, which, besides redressing past grievances, may prevent the recurrence of similar injustice under some new name."

Such was then our deliberate opinion. Subsequent events have but confirmed it; and we have reason to know that such is now the opinion of many influential men among the middle classes, who but lately never looked to a time when they should become advocates and agitators for Universal Suffrage.

If the Free-Trade Middle-class party remain stanch to their principle of no compromise with the Monopolists, they must perforce be driven farther than this. It is satisfactory to know that they begin to perceive it is in the right direction insane Tory policy is driving them, when the denial of justice shall compel them to make common cause with their fellow-citizens. A few more weeks must show every reflecting man what is the only effectual remedy for the ills endured; the essential principle to be contended for, and also the wisdom of beginning at the beginning. It is in vain to consume time and strength in attempting to purify the stream while the fountain-head remains polluted. There is in this view much to console Corn-Law abolitionists, who are also Radical Reformers, for the disappointment and defeat awaiting them after all the efforts that have been made,—and after the sufferings of the people and the ruin of manufactures have been demonstrated beyond even the effrontery of Tory denial. If ever public opinion was decidedly expressed on any one point, it is at this juncture against the Corn-Laws, and for their instant repeal. The array of moral force, the justice and wisdom of the measure, and the urgent necessity of allaying the alarming discontents of the famishing millions, must have some influence even with the Monopolists; and yet we greatly fear that the prayers of the people will be, if not openly scouted, then eluded, and finally refused.

But if the ruling class deny the claims of justice at this appalling crisis, on what motives will they ever yield? The aspect of the people of Britain at this moment more resembles that of the Americans at the breaking out of the Revolutionary War, or of the Irish Catholics when the Emancipation Agitation had reached the crisis which made Peel and Wellington quail, than anything in the recent history of political movements in this country. There was great enthusiasm—hearty, honest enthusiasm for the Reform Bill; but that movement, if intense, was much less comprehensive than the present agitation. The Dissenting clergy took no active part in it, and the merchants and manufacturers were divided—many of them, and nearly all the great ones, who are now free-traders, being then Tories. The Quakers held aloof—and now we have the wealthiest manufacturers courting the coöperation of the Chartist workmen; and Joseph Sturge declaring, that nothing less ought to satisfy the people than the principle of equal rights, and every tax-paying Englishman enjoying his constitutional privilege—the elective franchise.

Classes as well as persons that held apart during the Reform agitation, are now united and active against those monopolies which, it should never be forgotten, only exist through the vicious constitution of Parliament. The great gatherings of Dissenting ministers and other delegates, representing the intelligence, the industry, the whole manufacturing capital, and much of the other property of the country, will hardly, we imagine, be described as tumultuary assemblies, where mobs of turbulent workmen are inflamed by the harangues of seditious demagogues. We have no Cobbetts nor Hunts in these days,—useful, rough pioneers as they were, in the march of improvement. Yet this imposing array of moral force, resting on the immutable principles of justice, and enforced by the unprecedented distress of the country, will be baffled, or openly resisted by a strong Tory Government and a sweeping majority of the "Representatives of the People." Representatives of the People! Was ever grosser mockery conveyed by that hackneyed phrase than now? A few more days will exhibit the anomalous, and, we would tell Sir Robert Peel, the ominous spectacle of two bodies of Representatives of the People sitting at the same time in London, now become a yearly and a needful custom: the one body the undoubted Delegates of the People, sent up to support their claims and to watch for their interests, responding to their needs and wishes; and the other set of Representatives, or the great majority of them, diametrically opposed to every object which these Delegates are sent to advocate. Which of these aggregations of men will the People consider their true Representatives? It is a strange sight, this same Chamber of Delegates, to which successive Governments, by the delay or denial of justice, are familiarizing the country. Would that we had one honest and fairly chosen House of Representatives instead of the two! The time is approaching to try for it:—the era of a widely-based, united National Movement, resting upon the simple principle of the equal enjoyment of the Suffrage. The organization of this movement—that of the united People against the Oligarchs and Monopolists—ought not to be lost sight of by the Delegates about to assemble in London, and who, in anticipating the sure defeat of their main object, ought to have something to fall back upon. The sooner, for this purpose, that Sir Robert Peel is run up to the wall, and compelled to own that he, as the Minister of the landowners, can grant nothing commensurate to the wants of the crisis, the better. Every rag of delusion will then be stripped away, and every single-hearted lover of the country will then know what he has to expect,—and what to attempt for its salvation, if it may yet be saved.

As leaders in such a movement as that which we contemplate, there are a few able and honest men in Parliament, and others who, though to its shame now out of it, are not lost to the cause. And to the Humes, Grotes, and Thompsons, are added a new class, powerful from moral weight, represented by such men as Joseph Sturge. Nor at this particular time would zealous Whig auxiliaries be wanting. The energetic members of the Anti-corn-law League cannot surely sit down patiently under ignominious defeat, while every interest dear to them as men and citizens is menaced with ruin. There are, besides, cheering symptoms of renewed good-understanding between the Working-men and the Middle-Classes, whose objects and interests, rightly understood, are one. Neither of them want the sagacity to perceive that their jealousies and dissensions augment the temporary strength of the common enemy of both classes. From the blending of these kindly and natural elements may we not hope for that glorious aggregation of moral force which, by first securing to every citizen his constitutional rights, will best promote the security and wellbeing of the entire community?

THE SONGS OF THE MONTHS.

NO. II.—THE SONG OF FEBRUARY.

Coem hearkaune toe mee, loteby toe ye,
Chaunte ye songes of moine pleasaunte famyle:
Moun bee youre fennes whil garnishe oure gle,
Mirthlesse ment benizon fyttefullie.

Johannes: Prior of Broomwicham.

WEAVE, weave me a chaplet that's meet for my tears.
Woe is me—woe is me—woe is me!

Weave, weave me a chaplet. The Vernal sprite hears:
The snow-drop, the crocus, the starwort appears;

The hellebore waited to see me and die,
And sweet polyanthus peeps up at the sky;
So weave me a chaplet:—but why should I wear
The emblems of gladness? My heart is all bare
To the sleet and the tempest, and cold as the moor
Where shivers and shakes the poor child of the boor.
Submerged are the pastures,—the shepherds complain,—
Clouds cover the mountains,—fast patters the rain,—
I am wayward and weary, what can I but mourn?
Woe is me—woe is me—woe is me!
Bleak demons possess me,
They howl round my walls;
No festivals bless me,
No mirth in my halls:
My days will be shortened, I haste to the bourne,—
Woe is me—woe is me—woe is me!

What so painful as pleasure to hearts that bewail?
Woe is me—woe is me—woe is me!

In the sky there is splendour—moths spangle the vale;
There is song in the woodlands, and joy in the gale;
There is life in the waters—there's warmth on the hill;
The robin forsakes me—the tit 's at the rill;
The noisy rook waketh the hoary-faced morn;
The plover returneth—the sheep leave the corn.
But wherefore this rapture? My wet weeds will bring Back the wild winds of winter; thou mockest me, Spring.
Though thy voice fills the air in the tardy noon-shine,
Dun morning and evening still echo but mine.
If I breathe, thy fair blossoms are icy and dead,—
Woe is me—woe is me—woe is me!
They pass from the meadows
Like hope that deceives,
Ere dance to their shadows
The merry green leaves.
Fit emblems to furnish my premature bed.
Woe is me—woe is me—woe is me!

J. A. O.

THOUGHTS ON ANNIVERSARIES.

BY A MIDDLE-AGED GENTLEMAN.

The age of forty, although, unquestionably, respectable, is, in some points, not a very comfortable one. The mere animal spirits have become less buoyant, less engrossing; the intervals of reflection, undisturbed by passion, are longer; and the portion of threescore years and ten which is to ensue, looks portentously shorter than that which has passed. The close seems just at hand, and, like Master Barnardine, we have not made up our minds to be hanged. Anniversaries of the new year, and other anniversaries, which, at an earlier period, before the consciousness that we must die was awakened within us, (for whatever young people may be taught to say, they cannot feel the necessity of dying,) were so very pleasant, become now impertinent reminiscences. They are hints that the years which remain are few as well as short. It is a passing twinge which we get over; the rude ceremony of crossing the line; and rougher to the sense than even shaving with tar and a notched hoop of rusty iron. But it is passing, and when over, we buckle to the business of life again, fancy we have taken a new lease of existence, and with every succeeding year calculate upon a greater number of years to come.

Hence the age of forty, or a year or two on either side of it, is guilty of more absurd pranks than any other. It is the age at which the maximum of suicides is committed. It is the age at which, during the palmy days of saintly asceticism, men were most liable to take a fancy to shut themselves up in cells, and fast and scourge themselves. Of the two foolish periods of life—that in which men begin to think love the business of life, and that in which most men begin to think it less important—the latter is indubitably the more absurd. The lover does not pretend to be anything more than the slave of an instinct. He is drunk with the fermentation of his own being; without the aid of wine or opium, he plays more ecstatic gambols than the wine-bibber, and revels in more voluptuous and gorgeous visions than the opium-eater. He wastes time—he throws away opportunities—he quarrels with those he loves best—he rushes upon death, in pure gaieté de cœur. He is enjoying the moment with his whole soul, and knows not, believes not in the existence of the next. But the follies of the middle age are the more grotesque from their aping the airs of "wisdom, gravity, profound conceit." The fool who blows out his brains because former pleasures begin to pall upon his taste, or because he feels that his first prime has been wasted in dilapidating, instead of accumulating stores that may support the winter of his life, and misdoubts his ability to make up for lost time, looks upon his jaded feelings as a sense of truth resulting from experience. The coward who seeks to anticipate the punishment which he is conscious his selfishness and wilfulness have merited, by taking the whip into his own hand, piercing and castigating his body till he lashes himself into a state of inflated vanity more dangerous than the first, thinks he has learned wisdom. There is fulness of life about the follies of the young; but the follies of the more advanced period are cold, shadowy, unsubstantial as the gibbering phantasmata, half will-o'-the-wisps, half Scotch mists, that sough and whistle in the rounded periods of Macpherson.

To take an example or two:—The follies of Don Quixote (who, we take it, is the most respectable fool on record on the wintry side of forty) excite alternately laughter and commiseration. The folly of Charles V., sick of the world in which he had played so stirring a part, seeking relief from the emptiness of his own coward soul, in mumming obsequies, which should give him a foretaste of how he was to be spoken of after death, excites only a languid contempt. But the pranks of Romeo and Mercutio are no laughing matters—we may laugh with, not at the latter. And it is even doubtful whether they are objects of pity. Up to the moment of their last brief pang, their career is one of rich enjoyment: Mercutio can scarcely be convinced that he is dying; his soul takes flight in a jest; and if Romeo whine through the whole five acts, why, he whines because he takes pleasure in whining.

It is on this account that middle-aged people are so out of place in the merry-makings of annual festivals. The animal hobble-de-hoy, between boy and lad, is an awkward lout sure enough, but not one-half so absurd as the intellectual hobble-de-hoy between young and old man. He sits abstracted and grave amid the happy; either increasing their sport by furnishing them with a laughing-stock, or casting a chill damp on their gaiety, or, at best, having his presence forgotten. An unforeseen excitement may make him a good companion for the moment; but he cannot be happy with "malice prepense." Burns has caught this truth, with his usual happy instinct, in a picture of new-year festivities, painted with more perfect gusto than has ever been accomplished by any other artist:—

> "That merry day the year begins,
> They bar the door on frosty winds;
> The nappy reeks wi' mantling ream,
> And sheds a heart-inspiring steam;
> The luntin' pipe, and sneeshin' mill,
> Are handed round wi' right gude will;
> The cantie auld folks crackin' crouse,
> The young anes rantin' through the house,—
> My heart has been sae fain to see them,
> That I for joy ha'e barkit wi' them."

There are none of your ambiguities here—none of those whose habitual feeling is akin to that of the poor fellow, who, having just received sentence of death, is stunned for the moment,—but genuine old people and young people. As already hinted, however, the uncomfortable feeling is but of short duration. It is the pang which attends every "state of transition," (as physiologists, geologists, and other ologists, term it,) whether that transition take place in organic or inorganic bodies, in communities or individuals, and be effected by volcanic agency, advance in years, reform bills, or the last and most startling transition, death itself. Our periods of gloom are as brief as our periods of rapture; and busy life is the spear of Achilles, possessed of the double power of inflicting and curing wounds. "The earth has me again!" exclaims Faust, when rudely awakened from the rapt dream of supernatural power; and often have we to thank the earth, and its routine of cares and duties, that absorbs our attention, leading it away from dwelling upon a prospect so much more extensive than its power of comprehension, as to look like vacancy, and deaden the heart with a sense of unreality and preternatural loneliness. We bite our lips, shrug our shoulders, shake off the dull weight of thought with an effort, and in a short time are as cheerfully engrossed with our usual pursuits as if it had never crossed us.

This is the turning point in a man's life, which decides whether he is to leave anything of his head and handiwork that will convey to posterity a notion of his powers. There is an essential difference between the works produced by men before and after this period of life. The man not arrived at middle age is possessed by his subject: he is an instrument or an object of contemplation—a thing of nature, akin to the rushing of a river, or the sparkle of ocean ruffled by a light breeze, beneath an unclouded sun—the τον νεῦτον ανεμίδμον γελασμα, or the nightingale's full tide of song; or anything bright, buoyant, and happy, that is so by the necessity of its nature. The ripened man possesses his subject, and makes of it what he has predetermined. Our interest in the poetry of a young poet is mainly personal; as in the case of Keats, whose fancies and even rhymes led him where they would; or Kirke White alternately pale and hectic-flushed; or Byron pouring out his own feelings of the moment. In poets of a more advanced age, it is the subject that engrosses us. "The blind old man of Scio's rocky isle" nowhere appears in his poems. Milton only once or twice refers to himself in his great epics; and some allowance may be made for his isolated position, amid a busy throng, forcing self back upon him; and as for Shakspeare, there is so little of the author in his plays, one could almost fancy them produced by the same power which produced that society of which they are a counterpart, without the intervention of any mere human mind.

The same distinctive character may be traced in the deeds of the active spirits, who, as logicians, politicians, or warriors, aspire to mould and direct the course of social events, according to their views. The young are theoretical and imaginative, and work by the contagious influence of their enthusiasm: the mature bring the stores of information, the faculty of discriminating character, the patience resulting partly from the abated impetuosity of youth, and the knowledge that he who waits longest has the advantage, and the dogged pertinacity of will, engrained and hardened by years, to bear upon those with whom they have to deal, and conquer them against their will. It is among the young that we are to seek for the apostles of a pure and imaginative faith, which, by awakening the sympathies of those to whom it is preached, can make for a time their aspirations as unsullied and lofty as its own; and the memory of which, haunting the intervals of their passion-fever dreams, may serve as a monitor leading back, after every aberration, to truth and holiness. It is among the young that we are to look for the efficient advocates of any great social change, for which the course of events has ripened society, and the mode of effecting which has been devised by older heads. Theirs is the energy which, never flagging, is urgent "in season and out of season," and the contagious enthusiasm which wins converts among the half-instructed. It is to the young that we are to look for those conquerors who have turned the matured powers of a nation to the pursuit of foreign sway, and cheered them on to perseverance, when baffling events deadened the hopes and paralyzed the efforts of their followers. But it is to the old that we must look to evolve in their closets those abstract truths which are to be preached from the house-tops by the young; to devise those modes of organization, which, for ages after they are laid in dust, are to be the mould in which society is cast; or to accumulate those materials for a colossal and protracted struggle, which some young and ardent soldier is to turn to account. It might startle the prejudices of some, to name the individuals who fall under the class of the efficient teachers of a pure and high-toned morality; but whoever will recall to memory his favourites among those who have advocated social ameliorations, pre-supposing a change for the better in the habitual opinions and feelings of individuals, will find that the most active and influential portion of their life has been from twenty to thirty-five. This was the age of the most powerful leaders in the French Revolution: this was the age of your Alexanders and Napoleons. But Alexander would have come in vain, had not his wily and experienced father prepared before-hand the materials with which he had to work; and Napoleon merely reunited the shattered framework of that army, as a part of which he had been educated. He recruited its ranks with fierce energetic revolutionists, and hurled the might of what had been organizing for centuries at paralyzed Europe. And our most active and eloquent advocates of the liberal cause at this moment, in this country, what are they doing? One and all of them retailing small portions of Benthamism;—and would that they would take the trouble to make themselves acquainted with his system as a whole, instead of merely picking out what suits their purpose for the moment, and as often misapplying it as otherwise.

If men would but reflect that all tastes and faculties have their appropriate sphere of useful action, and that every age has its peculiar duties! Forty is a dangerous age for patriots. The young man is sucked, noways reluctant, into the vortex of politics. With limited partial views of what can be done, and with the unbounded confidence in his own powers, suggested by the thrill of their unfolding one after another, he fancies that all that is to be achieved may be accomplished by a brief strong effort. The very vagueness of his conceptions of the task he has taken in hand is one of the secret sources of his energy. As he advances in years and experience, the extent of the field of action, the length of time necessary for its performance, grow upon him with the rapidity of Jonah's gourd. The unreasonable anticipations of his younger friends strike him as proofs of their ignorance—their impatience, as proofs of their wanting the self-control and patience, which are main secrets of success. Forgetting that he was once as they are, he becomes a harsh and captious critic, and, instead of their more experienced adviser, the object of their suspicion and opposition. He feels his power lessened in proportion as his sense of the difficulties to be overcome increases. He loses heart, and subsides into a sceptical sneerer at everything and every person: or he says, since no general good is to be accomplished, why may not I as well as others take a share in what private good is going; and sinks down into a tool of those who live by abuse, and a participator in their wages. And this melancholy stripping off of "the glittering raiment" of honest Bunyan, he calls wisdom—the fruit of experience.

It is, indeed, but a small portion of those who have been active patriots before forty, who have sufficient stamina to steer unshipwrecked between the moral Scylla and Charybdis which line the shores of the straits of the fortieth year. It is not every one who keeps in the field who can be looked upon as having escaped. There are some men whose intellect does not grow with years, and who, at sixty, as at sixteen, are boys in regard to their treasured experience,—boys in regard to the extension of their views,—boys in everything but the fulness, freshness, and sincerity of youth. Enviable enough creatures some of them are, and therefore to be admired, were they not such bores and interrupters of work. These are your men, who, being able to make a neat little speech at a public meeting or dinner, and incapable of conceiving anything beyond, and gifted, moreover, with an equable flow of animal spirits, and possessed of at least a competent fortune, take a part in political business, for the same reason that others go to the opera. They are rather averse to seeing anything accomplished by their party, as it interferes with their habitual routine, and puts them out. They seek to cherish the complacent feeling that they are important persons, and object to anything that will render it unnecessary to go through the forms which they have mastered by incessant practice. They could go on singing the same monotonous verse to all eternity, delighted with the melody of their own voices. These are the most dangerous tools of the jobbers who attach themselves to all parties. They are your "fine old Whigs," who have actively and consistently supported their party for so many years:—they are your "disinterested politicians who have no private ends in view," as if a man who did not need money, wanted energy to aspire to power, and whose effeminate vanity is tickled with trifles which could gratify no one else, were disinterested:—these are the Nestors, held out as men of ripe experience to raw boys, for whom the cry of "Wilkes and Liberty" has as much of the charm of novelty as "The Charter," when suspicions are to be insinuated against those who are dissatisfied with the "managers" of a party for idly "beating time" with their feet instead of advancing. One is tempted, on seeing theatres converted for a time into temples for the worship of such monkey-gods, to wish that they had had a little less of that consistency which is their only merit; they do the cause of right so much harm by continuing in the ranks, that in them ratting would be a virtue. How much the Liberal cause in Middlesex would be benefited were Byng to follow Burdett!

One cannot have everything in this world; or, as the proverb expresses it—"You can't eat your cake, and have your cake." It is possible, by means of a hot-house, to force plants into more early development; but it is not possible, by any means, to give plants, so forced, the prolonged life of those which have reached maturity by a more tedious growth. The most useful statesmen are those who are past the meridian of life; and it will generally be found that the most distinguished are those who, if they have turned their attention at all to public business before the age of forty, have had their powers but lightly tasked. Our Luthers and Cromwells have always been of ripe years before they buckled to the tasks for which they seem to have been sent into the world. There is a most overpowering monotony of mediocrity in the exhibitions of the existing race of British statesmen; and there is something in the existing organisation of political society that threatens to perpetuate the evil. It is an expensive amusement to become a member of parliament. The whole form and pressure of the system makes it so. Men are selected for the employment, not because they have a liking for it, or the necessary talent, but because they can afford it. The concentration of large fortunes, in the hands of a few, limits the range of choice. As these compulsory servants of the public grow in years, they grow in indolence,—more especially, since constituencies have become somewhat more difficult to be satisfied with their members' performances, and seek for substitutes. No sooner does a young man of property escape from school than he is laid hold of by the parliamentary conscription. The extremely juvenile appearance of a large proportion of the members of the British legislature, reminds one of the infant incarnation of the Lama in Thibet. This precocious breaking into labour causes the most promising lads to break down long before they reach a mature age. It is melancholy —it is cruel in the extreme: but, in a country where so much opposition is offered to any proposal to protect the gristle of children from disproportionate bodily labour, what hope is there of saving the unknit intellect from being overtasked? If "the public" do not feel for physical sufferings, which all can appreciate, it is scarcely to be expected that they will sympathize with mental sufferings, which can only be conceived by those who have minds of their own.

Agitators of ten years' standing, however, like myself, even though they may flatter themselves that they have escaped the dangers that lie in ambush for middle-aged patriots, have at least learned, that our hold on the future is precarious and uncertain, and that the present moment ceases to exist even while we are in the act of naming it. They anchor themselves on the past: of its memories no power can rob them. [Thus I rambled on in a reverie, into which the sight of an early copy of Tait's New Year's number, lying uncut on the table, had thrown me.] Leaving to younger men the excitement of the ball, which has, to such an extent, superseded the more homely joys of first-footing, they love to congregate at seasons like the present, to draw out, like sympathetic inks, beneath the cheering influence of a good fire and genial glass of whisky-punch, the somewhat faded colours of earlier adventures, and by comparing notes to render the picture more complete. The deep-toned bell, which is just tolling the last hour of the departing year, conjures up, in my recollection . . .

[But the Reminiscences of the Middle-aged Gentleman, pleasant, doubtless, to himself, and flattering and delightful to his friends and cronies of auld langsyne, may, perchance, be of less moment to the readers of this Magazine, until a point is reached of great and general concernment—when came his toast of the evening,] "PROSPERITY TO TAIT'S MAGAZINE"—the child and champion of the era, which dates from the meeting of the Citizens of Edinburgh, to congratulate the French people upon their heroic deportment on, and after, the Three Days. The minds—multifarious in unity —which build up this intellectual structure, need fear no such scrutiny as has been instituted in the above remarks. Undeterred by delay—unseduced by languor—they stand true to their faith, and persist in treading the onward path. Less sanguine of immediate results, they are not the less certain of ultimate triumph; for theirs will be no victory clouded by sympathy for the defeated, inasmuch as their opponents must share in its fruits. They possess the equanimity without the humdrum of

NO. II.—THE COCKNEY NAUTICAL.

MONKEY ISLAND; A YANKEE YARN.

FROM THE POSTHUMOUS PAPERS OF THE LATE COLONEL CROCKETT.

STROLLING "down East" one fine morning, I stumbled over a square-built Yankee sailor, who, with his hands in his canvass trousers, was carelessly leading along a monkey attached to a chain.

"Want to buy a monkey, yer honor?" inquired the son of Neptune, regarding me with a pair of twinkling gray eyes, and squinting all the time like a necromantic owl.

"You've got a smart animal there, I guess," said I, chucking the individual a chestnut, which he began forthwith to devour with the gluttonous rapacity which distinguishes monkeys who are entirely dependent on voluntary contributions.

"He's like a mosquito in a full-play steamingin', I calculate," replied the ill-looking tar; "he's up—down—fly; and as for being wide awake, I wish I may be pittiklarly well dressed, if he arn't like a lawyer at election time. You can't get him to wink without paying him for it."

"Stole a leaf out of his master's book, may be," I suggested; "and writ his own name on it."

"Nevor could detarmine where he stole it from 'xactly," rejoined the Ocean's pride, looking very hard at his nose. "My believe's he takes after our tarnation tax makers—robs every one as much as he can, and borrows the rest. What should you say was the walley on him, yer honor?—he comes slick from Monkey Island?"

"Monkey Island!" I exclaimed, with awakened curiosity; "in what outlandish latitude may that be?"

"Lord love yer!" cried he of the converging optics, "did you never hear o' my grandfather's adventures on Monkey Island?"

Having candidly acknowledged that I never had experienced that pleasure, the nautical monkey-dealer took a mouthful of pig-tail, and without further preface, obligingly favoured me with the following statement of facts:—

"It was sometime durin' our great universal war, that my grandfather was coxs'n on board the Billy-Ruffian, 80-gun frigate, and one of the splendidest crafts in the sarvice, as I've heer'd my grandfather declare over and over agin; and, as he warn't in the habit o' cramming us, either with wittels or anything else, in course we're all bound to believe him. You know what a powder-monkey is, yer honor?—it's a young shaver as used, afore the inwention o' machinery, to get into the big guns for the object o' cleanin' on 'em out—a sort o' chimley sweep, on all-fours, wi' no elewation of intellect, as my grandfather used to say. Well, yer honour, on board this 'ere Billy-Ruffian, there was one o' the comicalest powder-monkeys that ever walked itself into the carawan of Natur's curiosities. Such a monkey-fied countenance might have caused a porpoise to turn up the whites of his eyes with dewout thankfulness to Providence for being born a fish in place of a monkey. His wisage was what my grandfather called, in his not-comprehensible lingo—a pun upon humanity; and when the black cook, a biggish fellow too, first see'd it, he turned reg'larly pale at the horrors o' ugliness. Well, yer honor, one night this 'ere powder monkey was taken wery queer in his wittling department—wery queer he was, sure-ly—so wery queer, indeed, that my grandfather, Mungo the cook, the ship's carpenter, purser's clerk, and one or two stiffish marines, actwally thought he was hooked by Davy Jones, to sweep the dust out of his locker. Grandfather supplied mustard poultices, puppies' heads, and everything else they could think on: but nothing did powder-monkey no good; and as he tossed and tumbled about in his hammock, he moaned dismally, and cried for his mother. Now, yer honor, my grandfather never dreamt, as how that he ever had a mother; for that vhereas they pick'd him up at sea one sunshiny arternoon, afloat, on the back of a grampus, from which circumstance they con-cluded amongst theirselves, that he was what people calls a nateral born infant—a specious o' dingy-brown water-lily. Howsomever that might be, about eight bells, that wery identical night, they was all awoke by a horrid hullabaloo on deck—resembling, for all the world, my grandfather used to say, a lot o' little devils playing at fly-the-garter. Presently, yer honor, while my grandfather lay wondering what in creation could produce this 'ere tumultuous phenomena, he was brought to his-self by hearing the Watch sing out, 'All hands, ahoy!' and rushing on deck, in a state of almost perfect impunity, just pictur to yourself his everlastin' conglomeration, when he diskivered, about a cable's length on the weather-bow, a large canoe afloat, manned by about sixteen able-bodied monkeys, in the midst of which respectable party, with tears in his eyes, sot young powder-monkey. 'Vell!' says my grandfather to Tom Oakum, capt'n o' the maintop, who was whistling 'Yankee Doodle' in the lee-scuppers; 'Vell,' says he, 'if that arn't enough to make a alligator laugh till the tears o' agony rushes down his throat and choaks him, it's a pity.' Well, yer honor, while they was conwersing, these 'ere sixteen monkeys pulled away, till they got to shore, when they landed along with powder-monkey, and began dancing and capering about like so many wild Ingians; durin' which, they every now and then embraces young powder-monkey with arduous delight; then giving three loud cheers, they hoisted their long lost brother atop o' their shoulders, and wagging their tails, wi' tarnation impudence at the ship's crew, who was scrowdging the gangways to look at 'em, they sheer'd off into the woods, and my grandfather seed 'em no more."

"Astonishing!" I observed, interrupting my veracious informant. "I always fancied that cheering was confined to members of Congress and the admirers of patriotic sentiments."

"Bless yer hinnocence!" replied the cross-eyed mariner, "not by no means; but what I've been telling on you, won't reach, in pint o' marvellousness by a deuce long chalk, to what's on the woyage. It was about two months arter these remarkable trarnsactions that the Billy-Ruffian happened to be cruising off the Cape de Werds; when the captain sent my grandfather, his mate Tom Oakum, and another or two on shore to get water, they being just then wery hard up for that same lick-weed element. Well, yer honor, it was a awful sultry day; and as my grandfather and Tom Oakum rambled thro' the woods with a couple o' empty water-casks on their shoulders, they came over wery faint and wolfish like—consequence o' which, they sot down under a banyan tree, and began to regale theirselves on some cold taters which Tom Oakum had brought with him in his handkercher. Well, yer honor, whilst their attention was mainly occupied in stowing away this 'ere belly-timber, they was all on a sudden considerably startled by hearing loud cries o' distress. Up they jumped—whipt out their mince-maids—"

"What are they?" I inquired.

"Cutlasses, yer honor; and tarning round as it might be so—may I never get another odd copper given me by a lib'ral gen'l'man like yourself, to buy baccos with, if my grandfather and Tom Oakum didn't see young powder-monkey lashed to the back of a ourang-outang, whilst another branch o' the family was a flogging on him with a rope's end, summut in the style they does in the sarvice, only with not quite so much sewerity. Well, yer honor, while young powder-monkey was a kicking and halloing, who should come up to the scene of action, but a wenerable looking ourang-outang with gray whiskers and green spectacles, and supporting his-self by a bamboo walking-stick."

"Do you call yourself a monkey, to flog a fellow-crittur in that way?" said Barnacles, with a wirtuously indignant expression o' countenance; "you ar'n't worthy the name of a monkey—you're a man—a beef-eater!—a monkey would shudder at sich brutality."

"As good a monkey as you, old whitehairs," replied the chap with the cat o' nine tails.

"Why do you punish your child in that U-rope-ean manner, then?" demanded Barnacles, striking his bamboo 'phatically on the ground.

"'Cause he's been sarcy to his elder brother," replied the vhipper-in, "that's vhy."

"There's a proper way o' correctin' sarcy young monkeys, without resortin' to man-like wiolence," said the old gen'l'man, mildly looking over his barnacles in a Pickwickian sort o' way.

"Is there, old square-toes?" returned the schoolmaster with a sneer; "but suppose I choose to do it—vot then?"

"Why, then, I say, you're no monkey," replied Barnacles; and tucking his bamboo under his arm, off he trotted.

"You, be blowed!" cried the t'other, looking after him; "ar'n't a monkey a right to do what he likes with his own—eh?"

On hearing this observation, which sartainly, as my grandfather remarked, was more worthy of a highly intelligent nobleman, than a hignorant monkey, my grandfather and Tom Oakum bust into a loud laugh, when down drops powder-monkey, and looking at my grandfather for an instant with a aspect of horrible amazement, he takes to his heels and cuts off, like a fox who has accidentally sing'd his brush by bringing it into contract with a brick-kiln. A chase was immediately started by a parcel of idle young monkeys, who was playing at dominoes in a bush close by, and my grandfather and Tom Oakum followed in pursuit; and after about a quarter of an hour's run, they got a-head on 'em, pretty well winded as you may suppose, for them monkeys are plaguy hard to catch, considerin' as how that they'll turn a somerset o' twenty yards, and keep on it (as I know to my sartain knowledge) for a couple o' miles without once touching terra forma, if so be that they're larkishly inclined.

"I say old fellows," cried Tom Oakum, addressing a savage-looking gang of ourangs who had drawn theirselves up in a line, whilst powder-monkey stood behind 'em, piping his eye, and tremelous all over, "I say," cried Tom, "you must give up young powder-monkey, you must rale-ly."

"Cause why?" demanded a proud upstart monkey, sticking a quizzing-glass into his starboard peeper.

"Cause why?" replied Tom, "cause he's desarted from the sarvice, to be sure."

"Fiddle-de-dee!" cried a impudent young monkey, flourishing his tail about in a wery pompous manner.

"Tear a babby away from its nateral parents!" screamed a skinny old female, who'd only got one eye, "you ought to be ashamed o' yourselves,—you men, you!"

"Vell," says Tom, scratching his head, for neither Tom nor my grandfather much relished the idea of being pitched into by this awk'ard squad o' monkeys, "Vell," says Tom, "ve'll leave it to powder-monkey's decision: if he likes to go with us—good,—if so be he prefers staying in your highly cultiwated society, and larning all your iligant monkey discomplishments, vhy then, on behalf of our vorthy capt'n, whose humble sarvant stands afore you, I says, good agin.—So speak, young flipperty-gibbet,—how's it to be?"

Powder-monkey look'd first effectionately at the old gal with the wall-eye,—(he'd got on the blind side of her) then at the savage old monkey who had givin him the tannin', and who was cutting his stick with a bowie knife, (wulgarly called wittling,) then at his beloved brothers,—artful young monkeys, who was twigging him 'cause he hadn't got a ornamental tail like theirselves, and then, with a wiolent internal struggle,—nateral feelin' predominatin',—he rush'd into the arms of his wet-nurse, and buried his face in her hairy busom. It sartinly beat all the affectin' sights that ever my grand-father witnessed,—the melancholy spectacle of a hinnocent young female, unitin' herself to a wery infirm old gen'l'man, labourin' under spasmodic asthma and 30,000 dollars, not accepted; and though, p'rhaps, you may smile at my grand-father's veakness, he and Tom Oakum actively blubbered, till the water that fell in their handkerchers, might have filled a quart tankard. Findin' it was no use 'temptin' to argufy the question, they shook hands with powder-monkey, and bid good-by both to him and to Monkey Island together.—Got a odd copper, just to buy bacca, yer honor?"

This interestin' query having been answered satisfactorily, I proceeded home, where, on taking off my hat, I found my hair to be all on end, and as stiff as bristles, so that I couldn't get on my nightcap for nearly a fortnight afterwards. Thinks I to myself, if these Yankee sailors can't spin it of a toughish texture, now and then, my name isn't Crockett: and so much for Monkey Island!

TORY-SOCIALIST REMEDIES FOR THE NATIONAL DISTRESS.

No. II.—"THE REGULATION OF MACHINERY."

When the deputation from Paisley lately waited on Lord Stanley, for the purpose of calling his attention to the miserable condition of that town, his Lordship told them that the whole distress arose from the increase of machinery. He was met with the decisive answer that it could not arise from that cause, simply for the reason, that machinery was not at all used in the production of the staple articles of manufacture in Paisley. In the report of the conferences held with Sir Robert Peel, and several of his colleagues, by G. A. Fleming, the Editor of "The New Moral World," and Socialist Lecturer, Joshua Hobson, publisher of The Northern Star, and three others, one of them a reporter for the same paper, assuming the title of a deputation from the Short Time Committees of the West Riding of Yorkshire, we find, in the report of their conference with Sir Robert Peel, that they urged on him the necessity of passing a Bill prohibiting the employing any person, under 21 years of age, above ten hours a-day in a factory, and "the gradual withdrawal of all females from the factories." The deputation did not state that they were authorized by the women of Yorkshire to obtain a law to prohibit them from exerting their industry in factories, neither did they point out in what manner they were to be kept in a state of idleness; they appear only to have regarded the male aspect of the question. We presume, the only reason that can be given, for females working in the factories, is, that they have not of themselves the means of subsistence without such work, and that the men are both unable and unwilling to keep them in idleness. After some farther discussion, we find the following statement regarding machinery, which we consider to be highly important, as coming from those who think it the chief cause of the existing distress:—

THE DEPUTATION.—Hitherto, Sir Robert, the interests of the capitalists have been attended to almost exclusively; and the consequence is, that the introduction of self-acting machinery, and machinery requiring the attendance of women and children only,* together with intense competition between our own merchants, has thrown vast numbers out of work, and reduced the wages of those who are employed to the barest pittance which can support existence. This evil is likely to be still further aggravated by the immense increase of machinery abroad. The policy of the late Government had been to allow that it should be freely exported. Of late years machinery has been extensively introduced on the continent. Belgium, Saxony, Prussia, and other places have, instead of taking our goods, succeeded in their primary object—that of supplying their own markets: in some instances they have gone further, and now compete successfully with us in neutral markets; and in some articles even come into direct competition with us in our own markets. Above all, America is a rival that threatens ultimately to destroy one of the staple manufactures of this country—cotton. It can be shown, that, in consequence of the American manufacturer possessing the advantage of having the raw material almost at his own door, he is enabled, notwithstanding a higher price of labour, inferior machinery, and less economical processes of management, which give an advantage to the British manufacturer of 17 per cent., the American is yet enabled, with his water-power, and cheaper raw material, in all fabrics in which quantity is more a matter of consideration than quality, to beat us in the end by a small per centage. Now, the disparity at present existing between us as respects machinery, cheap labour, and superior management, must, in the nature of things, be continually lessening, and a closer approximation take place. The population of the United States of America, by natural increase, aided by immigration, will lower the cost of labour; improvements will be daily introduced in the machinery, effecting more with a less expenditure of power; and experience will improve their modes of management, until at length they will be on a par with us in all these points; while the substantial and permanent drawback of having to send to America for our raw material, bring it home, and retransport it for sale in its manufactured state, will still press upon us.

SIR ROBERT PEEL.—Well, but do you not think that, according to your own admissions, the arguments against any interference which might aid the process which you have so clearly and strongly described as now going on, are very much strengthened.

THE DEPUTATION.—Pardon us, Sir Robert, such is not the case according to the light in which we view the subject. It is an axiom in political economy, that price is dependent upon supply and demand. If an article is scarce in the market, however small the deficiency may be, the price of all the stock in the market is raised. In like manner, if there be a surplus, however small that surplus may be, it affects not merely the surplus, but the whole of the commodity, which is thereby reduced in price. Now, we can show, by statistical facts and irrefutable documents, that since the year 1815, there has been a constant introduction of self-acting machinery, or machinery which imposed greater labour on the smaller number of adult operatives retained; thus cheapening the cost, and increasing the amount of production. And what has been the consequence? Why, exactly in proportion as this has taken place, the profits of the capitalist, and the wages of the labourer, have regularly decreased; until at length, in 1832, we received no more money for three times the amount of raw material manufactured, than we received in 1815 for the one-third. This result, in our opinion, is clearly traceable to the unregulated use and extensive introduction of machinery, which has either superseded adult labour entirely, or replaced it by the cheaper labour of women and children. What is now the consequence? Throughout the manufacturing districts the mills are nearly closed. The capitalists and middle classes are in difficulties—insolvent or bankrupt; while the operatives are in a state of destitution, which must make every heart bleed, and which arises from causes over which they themselves have no control. Now, if this insane course had been checked—if over-production had been discouraged by wise laws, and a prudent system of trade pursued, wages and profits would have been better, and employment more permanent and more equally diffused over the year. We should not have had flushes of prosperity, succeeded by long periods of depression; a continual recurrence of gluts and panics, each crisis following the other at shorter intervals, and finding us less prepared to bear it than its predecessor. For these reasons, Sir Robert, we believe that the dictates of sound political wisdom coincide with the dictates of humanity, morality, and religion, in calling upon us to retrace our steps, and arrest the progress of a system which is spreading disease, disorganization, and disaffection in the factory districts.

"Sir Robert Peel directed the conversation to the broad question of machinery, which, he said, was one of the greatest consideration." We do not, however, find that the Deputation was prepared to take up the "broad question," but, on the contrary, shirked the subject; and as a remedy for the evils felt, the Deputation had only to suggest the passing of the ten-hours' factory bill, the total repeal of the new poor law, and, in regard to machinery, all they had to propose, was the appointment, at an early period of the session, of a committee of experienced, practical, moderate men of all parties, to inquire into the causes of existing distress, and especially into the workings of machinery at home and abroad since the close of the war in 1815, with a view to the adoption of a comprehensive and efficient remedy.

* It would be supposed, from the clamour made about employing women and children, that it is a recent innovation. But what is the fact?—"We have conversed with very old persons, who remember when the weavers, or their factors, travelled about from cottage to cottage with their pack-horses, to collect yarn from the spinsters—often paying a most exorbitant price for it, which absorbed the profits of weaving. This was the commencement of the system of infant labour, which was at its worst and greatest height before anybody thought of a factory. Spinning was so profitable, that every child in the cottage was forced to help in the process—picking the cotton, winding the yarn, and arranging the card-ends. When the father was a weaver, and the mother a spinner—which was very commonly the case—the tasks imposed upon the children were most onerous. One of my informants, a man over eighty years of age, declared that he never thought of his infancy without shuddering."—England in the Nineteenth Century.

After the Deputation had made a variety of other observations, Sir Robert Peel replied, stating, after some preliminary remarks—

I also fear that an extension of our manufactures will not afford the relief desired; for past experience, I think, shows that such an extension would only bring into play more machinery, and not employ manual labour in anything like the rate of the increase in the machine department.

Those who flatter themselves with obtaining a relaxation of the restrictive system, and an approximation to the principles of free trade, from the present Government, will see, from the preceding reply, what probability there is of having their expectations realized.

The Deputation expressed themselves highly gratified with their reception by Sir Robert Peel, but they were by no means so well pleased with their interview with Sir James Graham. After stating their views to him, he asked them, if they did not think that carrying their views into effect would very much aggravate the evils and distress they complained of. The Deputation, of course, said they thought it would not; and then proceeded to show, at considerable length, that the destitute condition of the operatives in manufacturing districts, arose from the neglect of the very first principles of political economy—a neglect which led to an over-supply, a supply greatly beyond the substantial demand for their productions. Since 1811 there had been a continual improvement going on in machinery, by which three times the amount of goods was now manufactured with less adult manual labour than was required in the previous period for the smaller quantity.

Sir J. Graham, in reply, urged most of the reasons adduced by the free-trade party. He dwelt with great emphasis upon the possible results of a policy which, by placing our manufacturers in a comparatively worse position than the manufacturers of the Continent and America, might ultimately render the capital of the former altogether profitless, and thereby induce them to close their mills altogether.

The Deputation proceeded to say, that according to the arguments presented in favour of the policy of causing the operatives to be dependent on a foreign market for employment, it was admitted that our ascendancy in those foreign markets could only be kept up by a continuous cheapening of the cost of production. How was that to be effected? It could not be done by reducing much lower the wages of the adult operatives. That class of labourers were as near the bare "subsistence level," when in full employ, as it was possible to place them.

Did it not occur to the Deputation, that by reducing the expense of the food of the operatives to the continental level, and thus placing the master manufacturer of this country in an equally favourable position with his continental rival, some good might accrue? Although their meeting with Sir Robert Peel and Sir James Graham was on the same day, they suggested a remedy to the latter, besides those they proposed to the former —viz., home colonization,—the passing of "a general waste-land enclosure bill, which should make provision for reasonable compensation for those interested in such lands," and the raising of a loan, to settle down the unemployed operatives on them. Where the money for these purposes is to come from, is not pointed out; nor do we think that weavers, tailors, and printers, are persons well fitted for the laborious task of bringing our moors and bogs into cultivation. The Spitalfields silk weavers at least, we suspect, are not, by any means, converts to the home-colonization system; for at a meeting lately held, complaints were made of the hardships the weavers were exposed to, if they applied to the parish, by being put to stone-breaking —not certainly so severe an employment as digging unreclaimed ground for the first time,—and it was resolved, that "This meeting, from the various accounts given by the several victims of stone-breaking, are disgusted with the practice; and, further, are of opinion, that it is unconstitutional and unchristian." The home-colonization scheme may be very well to talk about, but is not likely to become popular with manufacturing operatives; nor is there any chance that the settling of unemployed weavers on their estates, will ever be looked on with a favourable eye by the landowners. They have a great dislike at having their privacy intruded on, and have especial fear of trespassers, poachers, and poor rates. It would be no easy matter to raise the many millions they would consider a compensation for the land that would be required to make a fair trial of such a scheme—a scheme which bids fair to reduce our operatives to the condition of the Irish cottars.

The Deputation waited on several of the other Ministers: but nothing occurred worth noting, except that Lord Stanley was as intractable as Sir James Graham, and was decidedly opposed to any committee of inquiry, saying, that committees and commissioners had become a byword, and ridiculing their proceedings and the concoction of a "Blue Book." Though the report of the Deputation occupies six of the large and closely printed columns of The Northern Star, the only allusion we find in it to the Corn Laws is the following :—

The extent to which a repeal of the Corn Laws would operate in relieving the labour market from its present depression, was also fully discussed with his Lordship (Stanley,) and the inutility of that measure was exposed by the Deputation; while at the same time, they asserted its abstract justice and propriety.

No doubt it was very easy to convince Lord Stanley of the "inutility" of free trade; but perhaps the Deputation might, without impropriety, have favoured the public with a few of their reasons for thinking that the immediate repeal of the Corn-Laws would be of no utility to the working-classes.

After the very satisfactory reasons stated by the Deputation itself, as well as by Sir Robert Peel, it is hardly necessary for us to say a word to expose the futility of the schemes proposed. As to home colonization, it must require years to carry it to such an extent as to produce any appreciable effect; and the removal of women and children from factories would, at the outset, unquestionably —whatever it might do afterwards—aggravate the distress. As to the complaint about machinery, we should like to know what is meant by "regulating machinery." If, as throughout the conference appears to have been again and again asserted, the wages of the operatives have uniformly decreased with the increase and improvement of machinery, and that it is the great cause of the present distress, not only, as is maintained, by degrading and starving the workman, but by ruining the master, it ought not to be "regulated," but destroyed; and a law should be passed for the destruction of all machinery of a greater amount, or of a superior construction to that used in 1815. Not only ought all manufacturing machinery, but all the thrashing-machines erected in England—all grubbers, horse rakes, and other agricultural implements introduced since that date, to be destroyed; and it should be rendered a capital offence to construct or use any improved machine, engine, or implement; or to make any improvement on such machines or implements for the future. How far this destruction would extend, we do not know. But why stop at the year 1815? Why not destroy the machinery in use at that date? Why not "regulate" the hand-loom? Coarse and simple as it is, they have a coarser and ruder one in India, which has the great desideratum now searched for, viz., with double the quantity of human labour, it only produces one-half of the cloth produced by our own. Why allow thread of any sort to be produced by any means but the common spinning-wheel, which again will require "regulation," since it was an "improvement" on the distaff, which, in its turn, must be regulated, as it was an improvement on a stick stuck through a potatoe, with which we have seen very good worsted spun, as the spinner journeyed through the fields, collecting from the bushes the wool which had accidentally fallen, or had been torn from the sheep's backs? What is the use of ploughs and harrows? The ground may be as well cultivated, and with double the expenditure of human labour, with spades and rakes. So where are we to stop in "regulating?" Evidently nowhere, till we have reduced man to the state of the birds and beasts, and forced him to perform every operation with his bare fingers—the only machinery which nature has judged it proper to bestow on him. So much for the absurdity of the scheme.

Now to the practical result. And as the Deputation did not explain how far they meant to "regulate" machinery, we shall take up a position they cannot object to. We shall merely assume that they think all further improvement should be stopped. In this event, we should soon be outstripped by foreign nations, for we have no means of "regulating" their machinery; and their governments are not likely to be so foolish as to adopt our example in restraining the use of machinery. At present, we have, in various branches of trade, the utmost difficulty in meeting foreigners in our own market. Many articles of cotton manufacture are now imported from the continent, and, after paying a high duty, sold at a cheaper rate than our own. Two-thirds of what are called Paisley shawls worn in this country are of foreign manufacture; and our exporting merchants, instead of now purchasing them at Paisley, procure them from the continent for the American markets. To hint at the impropriety of preventing machines being exported is ridiculous. It was not till all attempts to effect this object were found futile, that the law was relaxed; and there is no more real difficulty at this moment in exporting prohibited than in exporting any other machinery. It is only necessary to ship the different parts from different ports. If, then, our manufacturers, with better machinery than foreigners, have the utmost difficulty in keeping pace with them, what chance would there be if the foreigner was possessed of the superior machinery, and our manufacturers of the inferior? Is there any probability, if that were the case, that more operatives would be employed by our manufacturers? Is it not certain that much fewer would be employed? And can it be doubted, that on the first hint of a proposal by Government to restrict, or in any way interfere with the use of machinery, a great number of our leading manufacturers would transfer their capital to countries where they were allowed to use it at freedom? They would then manufacture, not only for the supply of foreign markets, but employ foreigners in supplying the home markets. The extension of commmerce is treated by some Socialists as an evil. Are they prepared to dispense with the foreign market? Are they aware that more than one-half of the cotton twist and cotton manufactures of this country—to the extent of twenty millions annually—is exported. What would be the effect in Lancashire and Lanarkshire were this market closed?

The present opponents of machinery appear to limit their hostility to the improvements of the last thirty years. But they cannot fail to be aware that former improved machinery was equally the object of hostility to the ignorant. Hargreaves was one of the greatest improvers of the cotton manufacture. He invented his "Spinning Jenny" in 1767, and it occasioned great alarm among those who earned their subsistence by the old mode of spinning, and even produced popular commotions. A mob broke into his house, and destroyed the machine; and sometime after, when a better knowledge of the advantage of his invention had begun to bring his Spinning Jenny into general use, the people rose a second time, and scouring the country, broke to pieces every spinning and carding machine they could find. Is it proposed to have another crusade of this sort against machinery? A complaint is made that a man now produces three times the quantity of goods that he did formerly, without any increase of wages; from which it is left to be inferred, that he is three times more hardly wrought; but the truth is, that the production of additional quantities of goods is entirely owing to the larger capital now invested in manufactures, the more expensive machinery employed, and the great improvements which have taken place in its construction. Before 1767, in the cotton manufacture, each spindle required a man to work it; now one man, with the aid of a few children as piecers to take up and join his broken ends, can work a thousand spindles. A million and a half of people are employed in the cotton manufacture of this country. Is it possible to imagine that had it not been for the inventions of Hargreaves, Arkwright, Crompton, and others, and the application of steam power to the various processes of carding, spinning, and weaving, one-third of the above number of persons could ever have been so employed? Under this system of machinery not only have the masters realized large fortunes, but common operatives have become the greatest manufacturers of the kingdom. In illustration of this fact, we take the following quotation from a Chartist newspaper, which deprecates machinery and the extension of commerce. In addressing the master manufacturers, the writer exclaims—

> You know, too, that we know how most of YOU then were. You know that we know that BENNY GOTT sat upon a stool in the counting-house, as a hired book-keeper. You know that we know that JOHN MARSHALL was a journeyman flax-heckler. You know that we know that TOM STARKEY and JOE STARKEY were journeymen croppers. You know that we know that JOHN left the shear-board in his clogs to go get wed. You know that we know the particulars of most of you; and that we know the particulars relating to ourselves. And you also know that we know, that while you have become immensely rich, we have become deplorably poor.

Ought a system that has made "hired book-keepers," "journeymen flax-dressers," and "croppers," among the most opulent of the land to be lightly interfered with? These men did not live before the introduction of machinery into their respective trades. If they had, they would never have risen to their present station; but they lived and laid the foundation of their fortunes before the Corn Laws restricted the importation of food, and raised up rivals to them in every part of the world. Hargreaves and Arkwright were in their graves before the Gotts and Marshalls were born. It is indeed a remarkable fact, that the year in which the Corn Laws were made operative is the date at which the operatives are said to have begun to receive less wages.

Another objection to machinery is, that it creates an over supply. Are the people of this country over supplied with clothing? Are the thousands in every city, the hundreds in every town and village who have nothing for a bed but a few shavings or straw, over supplied with bedding? Certainly not. And why are they so destitute? Because it takes every shilling of their earnings to purchase food. We showed incontrovertibly in last number, that the price of grain consumed by man alone in this country in 1840, was twenty millions more than the same quantity cost in 1835; and it is too clear to require argument, that these twenty millions must have been withdrawn from the purchase of clothing; for in what can a labouring man retrench except in clothing, miserable as it often is. He must have a house to protect him from the weather, food of some sort or other, a fire to warm him and cook his victuals, whatever be the price of food; and in all cases of men who with their families do not earn more than 20s. or 25s. a-week, four-fifths or five-sixths of their wages are expended on food alone. Take the case of a man and his wife with two children, and give them merely the jail allowance of food to criminals—that is oatmeal, coarse bread and broth; no butcher meat, no tea or sugar, no tobacco, no malt liquor or spirits; and it will be found that it will require 17s. 4d. a-week for food alone. Yet this allowance is felt to be too small even by men confined in jail. In 1836, the same quantity of food could be got for 10s., so that the family could expend 6s. 4d. that year weekly on clothing, as easily as they can expend 1s. now.

But why is there an over supply? Simply, because our Government will not allow our manufacturers to take from foreigners the only thing they can or will give—grain and animal food. Remove the Provision Laws, and though machines were tenfold increased in number, and improved in efficiency, and three times the number of operatives employed, there would be found to be no over supply of clothing, no more than there would be found to be an over supply of food in this country. It is indeed curious that we never hear complaints of an over supply of food. We never heard of our farmers—grumblers as they are professionally—complaining that the harvest was too abundant, or that their cattle were getting too fat. In fact, it can be shown, that the more abundant the crop, the better for the farmer; and a remarkable instance occurred within these few years. In 1836, the wheat sold, in the one hundred and fifty manufacturing towns where the average is struck, was 4,393,000 quarters. The average of the two preceding years was only 3,847,000 quarters: showing an increase of 14 per cent. in quantity; while the annual average price was 5s. 9d. a quarter above the average of 1834, 1835. Thus the farmer, who sold in these one hundred and fifty towns, drew about £125,000 more for their wheat crop alone, in the year 1836, than on the average of each of the preceding two years: yet more foreign wheat was entered for home consumption in 1836, than in 1835.* More cotton wool was consumed in 1836 than in the preceding years; and thousands of additional hands were employed in our manufactures: yet there was no over supply—no glut. Wages were not only higher, but employment was more constant than in dear years. With high prices of provisions, there will always be over supplies of clothing: but there is not the least probability of an over supply, were free trade established, and the markets of the world thrown open without restriction to British enterprise. We should then cease to fear improvements in machinery. The only danger would then be, if it improved more rapidly in other countries than among ourselves.

HE SHALL BE A SOLDIER.

A TALE.—FROM THE GERMAN.

FREDERICK WILLIAM THE FIRST, the second in succession of the Prussian monarchs, had quitted Potsdam to visit Magdeburg, and inspect the walls and fortifications, then newly constructed by his command. On the day following his arrival, the king was to go on horseback, accompanied by a numerous and brilliant staff, in solemn procession, from the new town to the old, traversing the whole length of the city to the castle, or Prince's house as it was called. Early in the morning the whole city was in motion; old and young, rich and poor, all who could and who could not leave their shops, counting-houses, work-shops, kitchens, and cellars were in the streets on that occasion; for to see a king, and their own king, with their own eyes, was then no small matter in the opinion of the Magdeburgers. Great was the honour and glory accruing to all parties concerned; but those who, besides seeing, could relate some circumstance relative to this great event—such as, to whom his majesty had spoken; how he had put his hand to his hat when he condescended to acknowledge a greeting; and how he had cleared his royal mouth of its superfluous moisture; felt themselves an inch taller for a year and a day afterwards. A king went for something in those days; he was looked upon as a controller of eternal destiny, a national godhead in a human form. No one at that time presumed to doubt the divinity of a crowned head; except, perhaps, the chamberlains, pages, body-guards, court physicians, &c. who might come in direct contact with such potentialities.

As brooks and smaller rivers contribute their waters to swell the waves of a mightier stream, so did the courts and alleys of Magdeburg pour forth their population to increase the living mass in the principal street of the city. This street (the Broadway) of unequal width, and very irregular architecture, extended its two rows of buildings of all sizes, ages, shapes, and degrees, above a mile in length, from one gate to the other. The windows in every storey of every house were crowded with spectators looking down upon the throng below, and affording occasion in their turn for gaping admiration, or sly remark. On one side, where the crowd had ranged themselves, heads over heads as in an amphitheatre, upon the blocks of stone scaffolding, and sloping roofs of the masons' sheds before the church of St. Katherine, the stir and bustle trebled that of any other part. A considerable number of schoolboys had scaled the highest points, and were amusing themselves after their customary fashion, in watching their opportunity to push each other, when they thought themselves securest, upon the heads of the multitude below; or sliding altogether down the slippery planks that covered the seats of the stone masons, till they lighted on the ground a living avalanche, with more noise and little less danger to the bystanders.

"A thousand devils," cried a rough voice from the crowd, and accompanied the outcry with a flourish of a formidable knotted stick, that served, the owner, an invalided soldier, as an auxiliary to his wooden leg, "The imps of satan will bring down the two black towers upon our heads! Be quiet there, you young vagabonds! or I'll cut you to pieces!"

The boys stretched their necks over the edge of the precipice, and gazed, with their usual noble thirst for information, without heeding the loose stones they sent rattling down upon the heads of those below, into the abyss beneath, whence issued the aforesaid gentle warning. Some of them were well inclined to renew their diversion at the expense of the volunteer peace-keeper; but the greater part lost all fancy of the kind at the first glance of a countenance that resembled an old grizzled bear's. There was a head stuck between a pair of herculean shoulders, that might have frightened their fathers, much more themselves; a hard, bony, swarthy face, decorated with a mighty hooked nose; an enormous grizzled beard and mustaches; and two black eyes that kindled like live coals, from under shaggy pendant brows, that might have afforded hair enough for the chin ornament of any moderate man.

"What is the matter, Crabb?" said a richly clad, long-legged old gentleman, who, standing a yard higher than the surrounding crowd, like a stately pine among the underwood, reached over their heads to tap the invalid on the shoulder. "Leave the children alone: the more you scold, the better fun they will think it." The old soldier took off his cap respectfully to the speaker, but swore by thunder, hail, and lightning, that if he caught them he would soon drive the fun out of them, and that nothing was like to be half so serviceable to the whelps as a sound drubbing. "Boys must be kept in order, Mr. Wilmson," said the soldier, shaking his cudgel significantly. "The children of Beelzebub! They would make little of kicking up the same row in the presence of his royal majesty himself," added he, turning up his formidable visage, with a look of menace, towards the juvenile mob, congregated above his head; whereupon they all drew back with a loud yell, as much in mockery as in fear, and down came a fresh shower of stones and dirt.

"Still, still! quiet there! hats off!" cried a number of voices from the foremost of the crowd. "The king is coming: will you put the city of Magdeburg to shame before his majesty?"

Old Crabb, to whom a king was a deity upon earth, and something more, took off his cap with greater reverence than if he had been entering a church, and passed forwards, followed by Mr. Wilmson. There was a dead silence.

"See, Mr. Wilmson! grand, glorious! Thunder and lightning! this is an honour not to be had every day! That's the king, the foremost one with the star on his blue coat, and the cane. Doesn't he know how to use it? the best corporal in the service does not handle such a stick. I remember once at Wollin——"

"And who is the old general riding by him, but a little behind? do you know him?" asked Mr. Wilmson.

"Know him, in the name of the three devils! I believe I do; my shoulders will not forget him to the day of judgment. I had not been six weeks in the regiment before I felt the flat of his sabre across my back, because my tail was not the regulation length. That's old Dessau, he is as true as steel, and as hard as a flint. You should have seen him in the year '4 at Höchstadt, when we took Marshal Tallard prisoner, and gave the French a drubbing! Whew!—how the grenades flew about our heads! At first we did not like it so well, but the old boy ordered them to play up Dessau's march, and away we went in the thick of the fiery rain. Holla! be quiet there—here they come!"

There was a profound silence. The king rode slowly onwards in conversation with his renowned General, Field-marshal Prince Leopold of Dessau, and followed by a numerous suite of officers. Just as he passed the group of which Crabb and Mr. Wilmson stood among the foremost, the king reined in his horse a moment, threw a sharp glance at the lengthy merchant, and then turning, said something to the Prince of Dessau. The prince stopped till the commandant of Magdeburg rode up; they spoke together a few minutes, still looking at Mr. Wilmson, and then followed the king.

"Crabb," said Mr. Wilmson, "I will bet ten to one the king recollects you, and your wooden leg, and so does old Dessau: they were certainly speaking of you. There is some good fortune in store for you, perhaps."

"Hang me if I was not just thinking so; I hardly know whether I stand on my head or my heels; and yet I could almost take my oath it was you they were talking about, Mr. Wilmson, instead of poor old Crabb. But Dessau must know me too! for it was I who struck down the Bavarian officer who had seized our colours at Höchstadt, and gave them to the Prince. He snatched them out of my hand as soon as he had got fast hold; hang me if he did not. Mr. Wilmson, I say——"

Here the veteran discovered that Mr. Wilmson had been forced forwards by the throng that followed the royal procession, and that he was telling his story to people he had never seen in his life before. Crabb looked for his man on all sides: he was nowhere to be seen. With a hearty imprecation, he turned about, and was making his way through the crowd, when his arm was seized by a tall handsome young man, who seemed, like himself, to be in search of some one.

"Thunder and lightning! Fritz, is it you?" cried the old man. "Did you see the king? you should have been with your father and me; I have such a story to tell you."

"Not now, I have not time, Crabb," said young Wilmson hastily. "Did you see a young lady in mourning hereabouts, a few minutes ago."

"My boy," responded Dessau's old trooper, curling his nose and his mustaches, "when one can have a look at the king and old Dessau, mourning young ladies may go to Jericho for me. Hark ye, Fritz, my boy, I have got something to tell you better worth listening to. Your father and I can't make out whether his majesty the king spoke to Prince Dessau about him or me. Upon my soul and body I think they were talking of me! The king must have noticed my uniform and my wooden leg; and old Dessau can't have forgotten where I lost my own good stump. Fritz, I had two legs as well shaped as yours! and so—why, Fritz, I say——" But the young man had disappeared, and the bystanders were laughing to hear the old man gesticulating, and talking so loudly to himself.

In the meantime, young Wilmson was renewing his search after the unknown beauty. While awaiting the king's appearance, his attention had been suddenly captivated by a slender graceful figure, clothed in the deepest mourning, with a large black veil thrown back over her head, displaying a brow of snow, half-covered with black crape, cut into a point coming down between the eyebrows, according to the fashion of mourning at that time. Young Wilmson made way for her to stand before him; the young lady turned her head, looked at him a moment with a pair of clear blue expressive eyes, and smiled gently in acknowledgment. Wilmson could have seen perfectly well over her head, if he had not preferred admiring the head itself, with its profusion of rich hair, clustering like fine-spun gold, under the sable folds of crape. A few longer curls clung caressingly round the dazzlingly white and beautifully rounded throat, whose beauty would have riveted the whole attention, but for the graceful symmetry of the shoulders, and exquisitely turned waist, which Wilmson was persuaded he could have spanned, if he had dared. So entirely was the young man absorbed in this interesting study, that although at the cry of "hats off!" his hand moved mechanically to his head, he would have been exceedingly puzzled to say why; and when the fair stranger again turned, and courteously inquired if he had had a good view, he hesitated, coloured, half inclined to think she was laughing at him. The general movement recalling to his mind where he was, and that the beauty probably referred to the royal procession, and not to her own fair person, Wilmson contrived to stammer forth a suitable reply. The lady bowed, and endeavoured to move forwards; but as she was visibly incommoded by the crowd that still pressed on all sides, Wilmson was under the necessity of offering his arm, and the lady of accepting it; and thus they moved slowly through the throng—the youth in silent rapture by the side of the fair girl, and feeling as if the whole festival had been prepared in honour of him.

"I live so far from here, by the Sudenburg gate," said the young stranger, stopping, when they had cleared the crowd, "I will not trouble you any further." "Do not speak of it; I am amply rewarded," replied Wilmson;—"but your will shall be respected. I will leave you when my attendance is no longer necessary. I must learn self-denial; no one can expect to be happy always—even you are not."

"No, certainly not," said she, in a low tone. Then, after a pause, she added, turning towards him, with the gentle smile that always lighted up her sweet face as she spoke—"I have not the honour of knowing you. How have you learned so much of me, and that I am not happy?"

"I should have guessed it by your dress," said Wilmson.

"Oh, I am in mourning for my mother—for my dear mother!" said she, in a tremulous voice. "I hope that is a grief you have not known."

"Nor ever shall. I lost my mother before I could know her; but my father is so much the dearer to me."

"Oh, you are happy then—you are happy! I had lost my father long before; I am an orphan, and alone in the wide world."

The tone of sorrow in which these words were uttered, went to the heart of the young man. Beauty and grace bewitch the senses with their nameless spells, and awaken a tender admiration that may quickly ripen into love; but the sacred touch of sympathy is more powerful than either. The youth felt his whole nature moved by a tenderness of compassion, indescribable in words. How gladly would he have offered the balm of consolation, had he known more of his lovely companion; how did he long to question her further! But the fear of appearing obtrusive, the dread of tearing open wounds, so imperfectly closed, withheld him.

While he yet hesitated in what manner to express compassion, the young stranger suddenly uttered a loud cry, and dropped his arm. "Oh, heavens! what shall I do? what shall I say? what will become of me?" cried she, with a look of consternation, endeavouring in vain to look for something in the crowd.

"What is the matter?" asked Wilmson, hastily. From his companion's exclamations, he gathered that she had lost some object of value intrusted to her, and that it was impossible for her to replace it, and that she stood in great fear of the anger of the owner. "Do not be uneasy—comfort yourself —I will find it, if it is in the city: walk slowly on—I will overtake you," cried Wilmson, who at the moment when startled by his companion's cry, had noticed a young man pressing somewhat rudely against them, and directly after force a passage through the crowd with his elbows, and disappear. Wilmson disengaged himself and his companion from the throng; and without waiting for an answer, darted down a neighbouring street, in the direction taken by the person who, he doubted not, had effected the robbery. In a few minutes, he again caught sight of the individual, whom he recognised by his light green coat, and the glittering clasp in his hat, standing still, contemplating something he held in his hand. The something was wrapped in a white handkerchief, such as he recollected the young lady to have held in her hand, when he first accosted her. Any further doubts he might have had, were quickly banished by the proceedings of the gentleman in light green, who had no sooner perceived Wilmson than he took to his heels, and made off with all the speed he could muster. The green coat had considerably the advantage; nevertheless, after a time, either his mind changing, or his breath failing, he stood still, till Wilmson came up with him.

"Why do you run after me? what do you want with me?" cried he, panting for breath, as his pursuer approached; and endeavouring to thrust the handkerchief into his pocket.

"On my word, I should scarcely have taken you for a thief, if your flight and the handkerchief you are trying to hide did not betray you," said Wilmson, looking with some surprise at the guilty person, who was a handsome young man, and extremely well dressed; and, without further ceremony, snatched the prize from his hand.

"Scoundrel!" cried the other, bursting with rage; and darting forwards, aimed a blow at Wilmson, which was immediately returned with such good will, that the blood spurted from nose and mouth, over the green coat, and its wearer staggered and fell to the ground. Without troubling himself any further, the conqueror immediately retraced his steps, to relieve the anxiety of the fair one with the golden locks. It was on his return that he had encountered old Crabb. The curious crowd had advanced considerably in the meantime; but the beauty was no longer to be seen. He ran up street and down alley, looking backwards and forwards, and right and left, and inquired of every acquaintance he met. No one had seen, or no one had noticed, a young lady, in mourning. With impatience and uneasiness increasing at every step, he traversed the city from one end to the other, till he reached the Domplatz, where the king and his retinue had just alighted from their horses. If all the kings of the earth had held a congress at Magdeburg that moment, they would have been of no more account in Wilmson's eyes than a swarm of gnats on a summer evening. Like the Will o' the Wisp to the benighted wanderer, every visible black point drew him another way; but, on his approach, the black object became now the cloak of a senator, now the petticoat of a peasant woman, the sable apron of a maid-servant, or the garment that enveloped the reverend person of an ecclesiastic. At last the sight-loving crowd dispersed, having nothing more to stare at: the Domplatz was empty. Once more young Wilmson traversed the broadway from the Sudenburg to the Kroten gate. Not a female figure—not a window passed unobserved; and the better to attract her observation, if she were watching for him from any house, he held the white handkerchief conspicuously fluttering in his hand. In vain; the beautiful mourner was nowhere to be seen.

Wearied and dejected, Wilmson at length returned home, where, for the first time, he unfolded the handkerchief, not out of curiosity, but in the hope of finding some clue to the beautiful owner. But he found nothing but the letters C. von St. embroidered in one corner, and an enormous and very magnificent Meerschaum pipe-head, with the letters J. P. v. G., engraved on the lid.

His embarassment in the possession of another's property was so much the greater, because he was to leave Magdeburg on the following day, for a considerable time, in order to escort his father's widowed sister back to Switzerland. She had come to Magdeburg to see her brother, to whom she was fondly attached; and had lingered long, with the hope of persuading him to renounce his extensive mercantile speculations, and pass the remainder of his life in her society.

As usual, the elder Mr. Wilmson was passing the evening in a summer-house in his garden, in company with his sister, Frau von Moos, and his son. They were speaking of the approaching journey, and the solemn parting banquet to be given by Mr. Wilmson in honour of his sister, when the old invalided Crabb came halting into the garden, to smoke his evening pipe in the air. The old man was laid up in snug quarters for life, in the house of the wealthy merchant, to whom he had rendered an important service in the war with Sweden, in preserving, at the hazard of his life, some warehouses, filled with costly wines, from a band of marauding soldiers.

On approaching the group, Crabb took off his cap, and taking the well-used pipe from his mouth, cried out, in a triumphant tone—

"My soul and body, madam, but I am sorry for you! In Magdeburg, and not to see the glorious king of Prussia! when he rode by so grand, and everybody bowed before his royal majesty. My soul, but I felt an all-overness, as if St. Nicholas himself had come down from heaven. Hey, Master Fritz, that was a sight!"

The young man coloured and made no answer, not holding it advisable to let the old soldier into the secret, that the fair neck of a maiden had made him quite unconscious of his majesty's presence.

"Don't be unhappy on my account, Crabb," said the lady. "I revere the great only when wisdom and virtue exalt them above their fellows—not for their outward show and glitter."

Crabb looked somewhat confounded. "Yes, yes; that is quite true, no doubt," with as respectful an air as he was master of; "but then you know, St. Nicholas! a king is not a man like one of us."

"What is he then? An angel?"

"No, not exactly; but I would say, madam, with all respect, that you won't deny but a king is God's representative and deputy upon earth."

"That is blasphemy, Crabb. God is ever present himself, and wants no deputy."

But, madam, madam, my soul! he is king by the grace of God."

"As you are an old soldier by the grace of God—without whose grace, by the king's grace, you might have starved to death, after being crippled for life in his service."

"Well, but who knows but our gracious king is sorry for having forgotten me so long. We can't rightly make it out, whether he was pleased to look at me or your honourable brother there. Only hear, madam,"—and old Crabb went on to relate the story of the monarch's significant glance in his neighbourhood, with his own commentary thereon.

"Is the old man's story true, brother?" asked Frau von Moos, hastily, with an anxious look at the elder Wilmson.

"Partly," answered he, smiling; "but Crabb makes too much of it. I am convinced that neither of us arrested his majesty's attention above a second, if at all. The whole affair is a trifle, not worth your notice."

"Heaven grant it may be so! But every action, however slight, is of importance, as from the great and powerful who decide the weal or woe of millions. How many an innocent person has their fiat deprived of property, life, honour, as I myself have experienced! Oh, the very thought makes me shudder!"

"My dearest aunt," cried young Wilmson; "you are a little too severe in your judgment. Kings in our time are not mere barbarians, as of old. They feel as other men; and many find the same satisfaction in the happiness of their subjects, as fathers in the happiness of their children."

Frau von Moos smiled sadly. "They are kings! I have bloody experience of their tender mercies. A word, and my innocent husband was the sacrifice! Fathers, do you call them? Will they—can they act as such? A father has the laws both human and divine before his eyes; and stronger than all, he feels the sacred bands of nature attach him to his children. Fritz, in the very year you were born, a king's command tore my husband from my side, to perish in a dungeon. And my husband was innocent! The king himself judged him—the king himself condemned him,—and yet he was innocent! All this misery was caused by a mistake of names and persons, and the rashness of the king. The error was discovered too late! and the representative of God's eternal justice and omnipotence could not recall murdered innocence to life. And this destroyer of my peace and of my husband, is now a hero for men to gape and wonder at! Woe to mankind, when such are heroes!"

"My dear, dear aunt! you speak of Charles of Sweden; but we are happy under the milder sway of Frederick William. He may have his faults; he may——"

"My child, let none possess unbounded power, but the one who has unbounded wisdom, and unbounded goodness, too! Unholy is the alliance, when despotic might is linked to human passions and infirmities."

"Thunder and lightning, madam!" exclaimed old Crabb, unable wholly to restrain his wrath at her unheard-of audacity, even out of respect to his patron's sister; "you make my hair stand on end, as I'm a Christian man, Frau von Moos. Don't think to talk me out of honouring my king. He always means right—he always does right—wouldn't hurt a child,—and, what is more, there is not a better soldier in the world! What! have you no master in your country, among the mountains there?"

"None, but He who is master of all, Crabb."

"Ah, ah!" answered Crabb, "we have him here, too; but you have no Mount Sinai among your hills, where the laws were given, as we read in the Bible."

"No, certainly not," said the lady, smiling; "but our citizens meet together to make laws, and choose magistrates to see them put in execution."

"Whew! that must be a queer kind of a Hottentot government."

"Not at all. Everything goes on as regularly as possible."

"Ah, hah, madam! I understand," said the veteran, with a knowing look; "you have good stout garrisons to keep the folks in order."

"Not a single soldier. A constable, with his staff, is sent, if it be necessary,—and all obey."

"Much good may it do them," said Crabb, twirling his iron-gray moustache with a look of great contempt. "A country without soldiers, is like a town without houses, or a forest without trees. Our king knows better—sent his father's hundred gentlemen of the bed-chamber to the right about—keeps a frugal house, and feeds an army of fifty thousand men with the savings—and such an army, that has not its like on the face of God's earth. Pray, if I may be so bold, madam, what would they do in that comical land of yours if a war broke out, and the enemy were close upon your frontiers, with cavalry and infantry, artillery and sharpshooters, cannon-ball, musket-balls, bombs, and the devil knows what besides? Would they send their constable and his stick to tell them to move off?"

"My good Crabb, every one is a soldier with us who can carry a weapon, to defend his honour, his home, his wife and children; and do you think a man will not fight more valiantly for such a cause, than for the pay of a hireling? Let your fifty thousand come, and they will be met by a hundred thousand unbought defenders of their country's freedom."

"Well, well, madam, every one to their taste;—no offence, I hope, but in mind you must live like half-savages. Heaven be praised, I was born a Prussian subject! Zounds, madam, have you ever seen our Sunday parade, in the New Square? My soul and body! there is order and discipline for you. Eyes right—one goes left—whack comes the cane, perhaps from our gracious king himself—that is what I call order and discipline; and to the devil with your old woman of a constable, with his broomstick!—no offence, madam, as I said before."

Before Frau von Moos could reply, if she meant to make any, the garden door was suddenly opened by a servant, and an officer in full uniform entered. All rose respectfully; Crabb drew himself up perpendicularly, with his arms stuck as tightly to his sides as if they and he had been cut out of wood. The elder Wilmson advanced, bareheaded, to meet the new comer, who returned his courtesy with a slight nod and haughty air.

"You are the merchant Wilmson—are you not?" said the officer.

"At your service."

"Have you any children?"

"One son, who has the honour to stand now before you."

"How old are you?"

"Fifty-nine."

"And the young man there?"

"Between twenty and one-and-twenty."

"The commandant wishes to speak to both of you. It is his orders that you should be at his quarters to-morrow morning at nine."

"I shall obey him. Might I presume to inquire what are his commands, and——"

"Don't know—no one has any right to ask—good night. To-morrow at nine precisely, remember."

The officer turned on his heel, and went whistling through the garden. Mr. Wilmson followed, still holding his cap in his hand; the officer did not observe him apparently, and flung the door to almost in his face.

"Hurrah!" cried the veteran, flinging up his cap, and snapping the fingers of both hands, "did not I say so? It was not for nothing that the king looked our way, and spoke to Prince Dessau. Luck will come of it you will see, to say nothing of the honour."

"Evil will come of it, I fear," said Frau von Moos, reseating herself, trembling.

"Bah, madam! if anything were amiss, the officer would not have been so uncommonly polite."

"Polite," said Madam von Moos, in a tone of irritation—"he was insulting! Allowed my brother to stand with his gray hairs uncovered, and never moved his own cap, not even in the presence of a woman."

"Ay, madam; an officer, you see, never forgets his right to command. He must be every inch an officer, but he was as polite as if he had been talking to one of his equals,—and he a nobleman too; think of that, madam. The commandant sends a nobleman to talk to a merchant! Thunder and lightning, that must mean something! The king is at the bottom of it. There's luck in store for the whole family. You must not go to-morrow, madam, when luck is falling on us by pailsfull."

"Ah, brother," said Frau von Moos, turning to the elder Wilmson; "would to heaven that, instead of to-morrow, I could go to-day, and take you with me. Oh, brother, if it be possible, let us go to-day, while it is yet time! It is ill to be defenceless in the neighbourhood of the lion."

Mr. Wilmson laughed, and shook his head. "Fear not, Juliana," said he, soothingly; "neither king nor commandant will harm me. Had I been accused, or even suspected, of any crime, I should not be invited to attend him, but put under arrest. As to the good fortune Crabb prophesies, I have just as little faith in that. I have done the state no particular service that I am aware of, and Frederick still less. Whatever extraordinary Fortune has in store for us, she gives unexpectedly: whatever we anticipate, is never so good, or so bad, as we expect."

"Heaven grant all may go as smoothly as you seem to think!" sighed his sister. "I do not tremble before men, but before those who are less, or would be more than men."

Mr. Wilmson patted his sister, smilingly, on the cheek. "Away with these idle fears. I see you are still the same Juliana that you were twenty years ago—always shuddering at imaginary spectres! Come, we will go into the house: we have sat too long here—it is cold. We will take a glass of good wine to warm us and raise our spirits.—Fritz, go into the cellar, and get us a bottle of Malvosier."

The following morning, all the house was in motion, preparing for the banquet, given by Mr. Wilmson in honour of his sister. In his ordinary housekeeping, the worthy merchant was moderate and frugal, almost to parsimony; but on extraordinary occasions, his liberality knew neither stint nor measure. The costliest dainties were to be procured at any price;—the richest wine flowed in profusion;—the best rooms in his house, which were generally locked up, were thrown open on these state occasions;—the floors covered with the most expensive Persian carpeting;—the ordinary dinner utensils replaced by a magnificent service of plate. Above fifty persons were invited to partake of this splendour, whose ears were to be regaled with the choicest harmony from unseen musicians, and their noses with the rich perfume of the rarest flowers, in vases of the finest porcelain, placed round the banqueting room. Mr. Wilmson himself walked from room to room, to see that all was arranged in the exactest order, and agreeably to his orders. Nothing was too dear, or too difficult to be procured. Before the dinner was over, his sister and his son were to withdraw in silence, and without bidding farewell, that the necessary attention to his guests might diminish the pain of parting. "I hold with Till Eulenspiegel," said the worthy merchant—

> When Fortune smiles, beware her guiles:
> Her frowns defy with steadfast eye.

When Frau von Moos met her brother at breakfast, she could not forbear reverting, even with tears, to the commandant's invitation. "It forebodes us evil, I am sure of it," said she. Wilmson laughed. "You may laugh, brother, but I am right; and oh, I had such a terrible dream about you and my nephew!"

"A dream, had you? Ah, Juliana, that came of despising good advice! you would eat those unlucky lampreys. I told you they were the most indigestible things in the world."

Frau von Moos drew back somewhat offended; but her reproof of her brother's incredulity was interrupted by the entrance of young Wilmson with a letter in his hand, which had been left for his father by a strange servant. There was no signature, and it contained only the following words:—

"A friend warns Mr. Wilmson, on the receipt of this, to go immediately to bed, and feign extreme illness. The said friend knows, from good authority, that Mr. Wilmson has pleased the king too well: sapienti sat."

At the first reading of these enigmatical lines, Mr. Wilmson felt a little disturbed: the handwriting was unknown to him;—then looking at his sister with a sly smile, he put it in his pocket, and said no more about it. Frau von Moos did not, or would not, notice his suspicion; and his son was too full of his yesterday's adventure with the unknown beauty, to observe his father's proceeding. To Mr. Wilmson's great satisfaction, Frederick drew his aunt's whole attention on himself, by the extraordinary animation he displayed in describing the charms of his fair acquaintance.

"I could not have believed that there existed on earth a mortal form, so like the creature of a dream," said he. "She seemed not to walk, but to float on the air;—every motion had the same enchantment of harmony to the eye, that music has to the ear. Her voice was more like the sweet accords that sometimes bless our ears in sleep, than the tones of a mere mortal organ: her countenance had the rapture and purity of a seraph's."

"In a word, it was a heavenly vision of light and glory, and not an earthly maiden," said Mr. Wilmson, laughing at his son's enthusiasm.

"I could almost have thought so," replied the young man quite seriously. "There was a sort of clearness, a transparency in her countenance, that is not to be expressed in words, or bodied forth in colours. So long as I breathe I shall never forget that face, that form, the magic that hung around her!"

Frau von Moos, who had long had a little plan of her own for uniting her nephew to a young relation and favourite of her own in Switzerland, made a grimace at this last flight.

"Your future wife, Fritz," said she, "will not feel particularly delighted at the strength of your memory."

"If your seraph has not flown back to her native skies," said his father, "she must appear again to you and me. I will have the handkerchief and the Meerschaum head cried in the streets, and advertised in the papers; we will have handbills stuck up at the corners of the streets, and even on the church doors."

While they were yet talking the clock struck nine, and Mr. Wilmson and his son prepared to attend the commandant. They walked silently through the streets, each busied with his own thoughts: the elder Wilmson thought chiefly of his dinner; and the younger of his love. The same officer who had brought the summons on the preceding evening, was standing at the door of the commandant's house. He conducted father and son up a broad staircase into a magnificent saloon. Before the door stood two grenadiers with pointed caps and fierce black moustaches; officers of different regiments were walking up and down, not one of whom condescended to take the slightest notice of the new comers, or to return their respectful bows. After a while a door at the other end of the saloon was opened; an officer of the guard put in his head, and called out "Are the merchant and his son there?" The two Wilmsons approached, and on a sign from the officer followed him into an antechamber. "Wait here till you are called for," said the officer; and left the room for a few seconds by another door, and then returning, ordered Mr. Wilmson to attend. "You, I mean the old one," said the military hero, in the same courteous tone as before: "the young fellow is to wait."

In this moment, Fritz forgot even his beautiful unknown, in the eagerness of his desire to know what the monarch could possibly have to say to his father. A chamberlain, or some such person, whose dress was so thickly covered with gold lace, as almost to hide the cloth, was the only person, besides himself, in the room. This glittering gentleman stood facing the window, on which he was beating a march; in a few minutes he turned round with an audible yawn, when his eyes encountering Fritz Wilmson's, he started back, set his teeth hard together, and murmured in a tone of stifled rage: "What, the devil!—you here again!" Young Wilmson, on his side, was scarcely less astonished when he recognised, in his amusing companion, the handkerchief snatcher of the preceding day, whose swollen nose still showed unequivocal proofs of the vigour of Fritz's fist. The gold jacket, measured him from head to foot with looks meant to be withering, approached a few paces nearer, and murmured between his set teeth, "You are the scoundrel who presumed yesterday——"

Frederick's eyes sparkled; he stepped back. "Let me beg of you, Sir, no blackguardism, or that fine jacket of your's will be no protection."

The other also retreated with a sneering laugh; young Wilmson turned his back upon him, and went to the window. At that moment, a carriage containing several ladies rattled by; one of them looked up,—it was the mourning beauty. Fritz hastily threw up the window, and flung himself half out to look after her. She had certainly observed him, and kept her head out of the carriage window till it had turned the corner. "It is she herself," sighed Fritz, and I am here. "The lady has just driven past," said he aloud, turning suddenly round upon the enemy.

"What lady?" asked the chamberlain.

"The lady whom you robbed of her handkerchief yesterday in the crowd."

"Fool," muttered the other, "I rob! I was jesting with her, nothing more; she knows me well enough; but as to the Meerschaum head——"

At the sound of the words "she knows me," young Wilmson forgot his anger with the individual who uttered them, and advancing, eagerly caught him by the hand. "How, Sir, do you really mean that you know her?"

"Do I know her?" repeated the worthy in green and gold, in a scornful tone. "What if I do know her?—but hands off if you please, and don't be quite so familiar."

Young Wilmson would now have willingly given all he possessed in the world to purchase forgiveness from his adversary! He was actually on the point of stammering forth an apology when the door once more opened, and his father entered. "I shall not wait for you," whispered he in passing his son. "I must go home directly. Come after me as soon as you are dismissed."

"What does he want with us?" said the young man. "What did the commandant——"

"Hush!" said his father in a low voice. "The king himself is there," pointing to the room he had just left. "I cannot exactly make out why I was sent for; he asked a number of indifferent questions about my age and situation in life; and also about you and your acquirements. I was then dismissed with a gracious promise to do something for you if you pleased him. His majesty seems in a very good humour; but be careful how you accept any offer that may be made you, however advantageous it may appear. Ask time for consideration. Farewell for the present."

With these words Mr. Wilmson hastily withdrew. However important his approaching interview with a monarch might have appeared formerly to young Wilmson, he now felt neither hope, fear, nor ambition awakened within him, nor even curiosity. All his faculties were absorbed by the declaration of the arrogant gentleman in gold lace, that he knew the sable clad beauty, and by the means of acquiring the good will of that person, whom he would have held altogether unworthy his attention only half an hour ago: but a ray of a goddess had fallen on him from the sunny-haired divinity of the preceding day, and transformed, in the eyes of her lover, an insolent domestic into an individual whose esteem he desired above all things to obtain.

His meditations were broken in upon by the summons of the officer on guard, to the presence of majesty. The young man entered, and bowed with due reverence on all sides, though he could not well make out whereabouts the monarch might be. A cloud was before his eyes, not exactly caused by the reflected splendours of royalty, or his own bashfulness, but because the confined apartment was filled with tobacco smoke from the pipes of several general officers, every one of whom was puffing away with equal zeal and gravity. They were standing bareheaded around a small table, by which sat, hat on head, and pipe in mouth, a person whom young Wilmson recognised as the monarch himself, when the bluish vapour, that had hitherto obscured his royal visage, was somewhat dispersed.

The king looked for a while with evident satisfaction at the tall, handsome figure before him, and then nodding to the officers around, said,—

"And he is scarcely twenty-one! He will grow yet, he has a good four years before him! We may make something of that lad; perhaps fugleman to the life-guard." Then turning to the young man, "Now tell me freely, my lad, what should you like to be?"

"Sire, my father intends me for his successor; my own taste is for agriculture, or a learned profession."

"Learned," asked the king sharply; "what do you know then? Latin, Greek, Hebrew, Chaldee, what——"

"Your majesty, I am tolerably well acquainted with the two first; I have studied history and mathematics, and the literature of France and Italy."

"Pshaw, nonsense, boy; you must not be a mere bookworm! Fie upon it! Reading, writing, and arithmetic are all very well. I will promote you."

"May it please your majesty—" stammered the youth in a fright, as a sudden light burst upon his mind, touching his majesty's notion of promotion. The king went on without heeding his consternation.

"I will admit you among my guards,—you shall go with me to Potsdam; do you hear? You must be a soldier; that is the only trade for a young fellow of spirit.—He will be six feet, or six feet two, perhaps; he bids fair for it," added the monarch, glancing round upon his attendants.

"Your majesty——"

"And, if you behave well, you will not remain six weeks in the ranks. I want sharp fellows in my guard. But, hark ye! one thing more," said the king recollecting himself; "have you got a sweetheart yet?"

At this very unexpected question Wilmson's intended remonstrance died on his lips, and his colour rose to scarlet.

"Look at the smooth-cheeked booby, he blushes like a girl," said the king laughing loudly, and looking again round to the attendant officers. "That will do, my lad, you need say no more; but recollect that, without my special permission, you must not think of marrying. I will look out for a fit wife for you myself. You like a soldier's life, hey?"

"No, your majesty," replied the young man boldly; "I am a freeman: I wish to remain so."

"Ten thousand devils!—young man take care what you are about. What do you mean by that?"

"I have not the honour to be your majesty's subject. I am a citizen of the United Provinces."

"No matter," said the king, waving his hand impatiently.

"I wish to return to my native country."

"Oh, ho! you will forget that before you have been a week in Potsdam."

"I will demand the protection of their High Mightinesses the States General."

"Hold your tongue, fool," cried the king in a rage, "or I will give you earnest of the service over your back, instead of in your hand."

"Your majesty," said the young man firmly, "is too just to compel a free man against his will."

"Silence; you know my will, and that is enough; I want no free men, but faithful soldiers: conduct yourself accordingly.—Go, you will receive a handsome sum as bounty."

"With your majesty's permission, I want no bounty,—I will not accept of bounty; my father is in more than easy circumstances; he is rich; he will pay any sum for my freedom."

"You shall not have it; you are a soldier—a soldier you will remain. Go."

"Sire, as a free man I enter my solemn protest against this arbitrary proceeding. I will rather die than take the oath."

"H—ll and the D—l," cried the enraged monarch, springing from his seat, and raising his stick, he approached Wilmson, as if to fell him to the earth. The latter did not stir, but looked the king full and firmly in the face. His majesty let the stick sink slowly, threw a furious glance at the unruly recruit, and thundered out. "The guard or the gallows!—remember that."

"With your majesty's leave, I choose the latter," said Wilmson calmly.

The king raised his stick again in renewed fury, dropped it again as suddenly, and said to the commandant, "Drag the scoundrel hence! to the barracks or the guard-house with him!—to-morrow he marches with the other recruits. If he makes the slightest resistance keep him in solitary confinement upon bread and water, till he comes to his senses; or, since he is so tough, let him have a taste of the rack." He pointed towards the door; the commandant seized Wilmson by the arm, and with a rough push over the threshold, dismissed him with more haste than ceremony from the royal presence.

In the saloon, the unwilling candidate for military glory was delivered over to two subaltern officers, to be conducted to the depôt, with a repetition of the king's command to keep him on bread and water, &c., &c., in case of resistance.

"Your excellency will, at least, allow me to see my father, once more to bid him farewell," said the young man.

"What's the use of that? I see no occasion for it."

"I request it as the only favour your excellency or the king can now grant me."

The commandant was silent for a moment, as if hesitating, went back into the room they had just left, and then returning, said, "You must go to the depôt: word will be sent to your father if he wishes to see you."

"Your excellency will permit me to return home, if it be only for half an hour, to provide myself with the necessary linen and clothing for a journey,—I cannot travel in that I have on."

"Be off with you to the depôt—or the devil," cried the commandant angrily. "Settle about your trumpery with your father,—I shall send to him."

The two subalterns took Wilmson between them, and hurried him, without further ceremony, into the street, where a corporal, armed with a stout cane, also favoured him with his attendance.

The young man, who, by the single act of a despot, had thus lost at a blow, home, country, kindred; all joy in the present, all hope in the future, to pass the remainder of his life among the refuse of the people; now, swelling with indignation too great for utterance, accompanied his guides without offering further resistance.

"Come, come, my friend, cheer up! don't look so melancholy about it," said one of the officers, who appeared to feel some compassion for the victim to the royal admiration for tall men.

"I am anything but melancholy!" answered Fritz, grinding his teeth.

"That's right! The guardsmen are well taken care of. Patience, and all will go right enough at Potsdam; only try to keep up your spirits, and don't think of what is passed, and can't be helped."

"To lose all, all that I now possess, or ever hoped for!" murmured the youth half to himself.

"Fancy it all swallowed up by an earthquake, and think no more of it."

"Then, I should feel melancholy."

"Why then?" asked the officer in a tone of curiosity.

"Who could feel more,—who would complain of calamity inflicted by the hand of Providence? But to be dragged from my home, from my friends, to be made a slave of—Heaven and Hell! that is——"

The officer whistled and looked away; he did not understand him, and, perhaps, it was as well for Fritz that he did not.

At the barracks, the new recruit was given in charge to the officer in command, and led into a long, low, smoke-blackened room, where a number of youths, similarly circumstanced, were sitting by a long table, eating, drinking, swearing, singing, and smoking detestable tobacco. This agreeable circle saluted him with an uproarious shout, and offered him a seat among them. He declined it, and threw himself, with folded arms, upon a bench apart from the table. They drank to him with mock civility; and some gravely begged to know how his mother did. He took no notice of their mockery; he scarcely heard them; he was brooding over all sorts of impossible schemes of vengeance and escape. A hundred times he swore to himself rather to die than submit, and leave the world an example of how little despotic power could bind one resolved to be free, and careless of life without freedom. His companions had just left the room with much stumbling, struggling, and clamour, to finish their pipes in the open air, when the officer on duty returned, accompanied by the elder Wilmson. At the sight of his father, the young man's high-wrought feelings gave way, and as he threw himself upon his parent's neck, tears of mingled rage and sorrow burst from his eyes, in spite of all his efforts to restrain them. The officer made a grimace, expressive of little liking for the task imposed on him, and, on some pretence, quickly left them together. The elder Wilmson did not utter a word. He allowed the anger and despair of his son to exhaust themselves; and it was not till Fritz had supplicated, threatened, wept, stormed, uttered imprecations on the king, himself, and all mankind—the tyrants, and those who endured their tyranny, and had finally thrown himself once more on the bench, worn out by the variety and vehemence of his emotions, that the father broke silence.

"Frederick," said he, gravely, but kindly taking his son's hand, "I expected to see a man; one master of his destiny, not mastered by it. I find an angry boy: your person is coerced; your soul cannot be. All is not lost, if you can but control yourself."

"Not lost—how?" cried the young man, springing up; "will you, can you, free me from this infernal slavery?"

"I can, I will; but be tranquil—listen to me. It cannot be so soon, perhaps, as you expect. I cannot purchase your freedom; I have offered an enormous sum, the king will not listen to me. He has set his heart upon having you in his guard, and here his will is law. You must obey; you must go to Potsdam—you must yield to your fate."

"And you speak of it so coldly, father!"

"You must yield to your fate! I will send you clothes, money, everything of which you may be in need. Go to Potsdam—accommodate yourself to circumstances as you best may. It is my wish that you conduct yourself so as to acquire the confidence of all about you. I claim thus much from your obedience as a son. Will you give me your promise?"

"I cannot," said young Wilmson, pacing backwards and forwards in uncontrollable agitation. "Submit quietly to such infernal tyranny! I will make my escape the first opportunity, if I am certain of death in consequence."

"I will not hear of such an attempt; I insist on your listening to me quietly and without interruption. Sit down." Frederick obeyed in sullen silence. His father continued:—"The least indiscretion will ruin us both. We are here beyond the protection of the law; avoid, above all things, awakening anger or suspicion: your imprudence may destroy all hope—but your imprudence alone. Leave me to act; I will yet save you, if your impatience does not frustrate my designs."

He paused for a reply. Frederick was silent for some time; he was evidently engaged in a violent conflict with his own feelings.

"And for how long do you require me to act this detestable farce?" said he at length. "How long do you require me to be a slave, and wear the livery of one?"

"Until I myself am free—until my property is converted into paper, and out of the Prussian territory. Then, and not till then, we can take a decisive step. Trouble yourself no further; but bear your present misfortune like a man."

"But the oath, father, you have forgotten that; how can I take the oath of fidelity to this——"

"How can you help yourself?" interrupted his father. "An oath taken on compulsion is no oath at all. You are not called on to throw away your life in a useless contest with overwhelming might. God and reason absolve us from obligations imposed by force. If such oaths were suffered to weigh against the principles of eternal justice, we might be compelled to swear to deeds that would deprive us of all claims to humanity—that would degrade us below the level of the brutes!"

"I will obey you, father," said the youth with a heavy sigh.

"You will do well. Let none despair but those who have done something to repent of. The king has spoiled my grand dinner party, that is all. My sister——"

"Ah! my dear aunt!—does she know what has happened?"

"She does; I told her myself. I said, 'Sister, your wishes will be fulfilled. I will leave Magdeburg, and retire with you and Fritz to a land of freedom, as soon as I can free myself from all ties to this place.'

"She was almost beside herself with joy. By degrees I told her all that had happened, and disclosed my plans for the future. At first she thought of her dead husband, and uttered the bitterest invectives against the mighty of this earth; but in the end she said—'At last, then, I shall have something to thank a king for. Against his own will, he will gild the evening of my days. I shall end them in the society of all I love on earth. Let me leave this hateful city as quickly as possible: the earth burns under my feet.'"

The calmness with which Mr. Wilmson gave all these details to his son had a better effect upon his mind than an hour's consolation would have done. By degrees his heart grew lighter, and his brow cleared up. His forced entry among the guards of Frederick William had even its ridiculous point of view. He would look upon it as a masquerade somewhat of the longest. He parted from his father with some appearance of cheerfulness, and charged him, above all, not to forget to send him the handkerchief with the head of the Meerschaum.

On the following morning, at sunrise, the recruits were marched out of the city. That he might not attract attention, Fritz had changed the more elegant habiliments he had worn in his interview with the king, for the oldest garments in his wardrobe. He was among the foremost, and walked with downcast eyes, without looking either to the right or the left, when his attention was roused by the sound of his own name from the other end of the bridge he was crossing.

"Thunder and lightning, Fritz!—my heart's blood, who would have guessed yesterday, that a spark would have fallen into the magazine to blow us all up sky-high? But never mind, my boy; the king and old Dessau mean honestly by you; hang me if they don't, for all that's said and done. It is all your own fault; as I'm a sinner, it's all your own doing. Why, in the devil's name, must you grow so handsome, and taller by the head, than anybody else? Why were you not little, or crooked, or lame? Thunder and lightning! you knew our good king's whim well enough!"

It was the veteran Crabb, who had hobbled down to the bridge, as fast as his wooden leg would let him, to say farewell to his patron's son, whose misfortune, in being thus kidnapped by the giant-loving old despot, affected him much more than he chose to acknowledge.

Young Wilmson shook hands with him in silence; and the old man limped by his side, trying hard at some fragments of a camp ditty, in praise of a soldier's life; but his voice broke down completely in the middle of a stanza, and Crabb was fain to prove his fortitude by vollies of hard words, and railing at the road, the weather, his wooden leg, and finally at the melancholy visible in his young companion's face.

"Sapperment—thousand devils!" said the veteran, making a hideous grimace, to hide the tear that fell on his grizzled beard, as the recruits halted at the foot of the bridge; and Fritz signified to him that here they must part. "Hang it, Fritz, show more courage, man! you look as moping as an owl in the sunshine. Look at me! a soldier should care for nothing, and nobody. Talking of that—if I had but time now, I could tell you a story of old Dessau, that would make you split your sides with laughing."

"No, never mind now, Crabb; good-by," said young Wilmson, holding out his hand.

The old man wrung it hard,—tried at a parting joke, which ended in an imprecation on the head of somebody, and then at a song; but that failing also, he gave his favourite's hand another squeeze, that brought the tears into his eyes, and then turning his back abruptly, returned, weeping and cursing, over the bridge to Magdeburg.

The recruits reached Potsdam by short marches where they were mustered, and drafted into different regiments. Wilmson went into the foot guards. According to the promise exacted by his father, he digested his wrath as he best could: learned the puppet-like movement, the shouldering, grounding, recovering, and wheeling right and left, and even put on the tawdry disguise of the uniform without any open manifestation of repugnance. Without any effort on his own part, he rapidly acquired favour and distinction with his officers. He was, without dispute, the handsomest man in the regiment, and promised to be the tallest; and his whole manner and demeanour betrayed an evident superiority of education and condition to his comrades. Nor were his various acquirements long unknown or unnoticed; and as he was liberal of his money and freely used his influence with his superiors in their favour, his fellow-soldiers were willing to forgive him his advantages, and even to overlook his disinclination to their society. It was well known that he had been forced, against his will, into the service,—many others were so far similarly circumstanced; but as their talents and station in life were evidently far inferior to Wilmson's, it awakened neither surprise nor ill-will, when he received permission from the colonel to inhabit a separate room out of the barrack;—and this favour, which he had ardently desired, rendered him as happy as in such a situation it was possible for him to be. Having once entered on the task assigned him by his father, he resolved to go through it with spirit and resolution; and so far mastered his feelings as to show on all occasions, a satisfied and even cheerful countenance: listened with every appearance of pleasure to the congratulations of his fellow-soldiers when, within three months, he was advanced to the rank of sergeant, by express desire of the king; and, in short, played his part so well, that it was generally believed that the failure of all the attempts made by the elder Wilmson to procure his son's release, was as much to be attributed to the indifference of the young man himself as to the unwillingness of the king to part with his long-legged recruit. His object was obtained; he had the confidence of all; and many privileges were granted him, of which, however, he seldom made use, and never abused. The colonel called him "My son," when he spoke to him; employed him as his secretary, and, as such, frequently brought him to his house, where, though he could not invite him to his table, Wilmson was treated with more friendliness and consideration than his officers could often boast of.

In the meantime, he maintained a diligent correspondence with his father, and his hopes of release grew daily brighter. By degrees, the elder Wilmson disposed of the greater part of his warehoused goods in Magdeburg; and such as could not be sold without great loss, were deposited in warehouses beyond the Prussian frontier. His out-lying capital was gradually collected, sometimes at a disadvantage, under the pretext that the bankruptcy of some foreign houses rendered some reduction in the number of his speculations necessary. It was admitted on all sides, that he was an honest man; but his credit as a merchant suffered proportionably—a result he had expected and calculated on, and which rendered his subsequent proceeding of converting his possessions in house and land in Magdeburg into ready money perfectly intelligible. At last he wrote to his son:—

"In a fortnight I shall leave Magdeburg, and await your coming at my sister's house by the lake of Constance. It is thought here that I am returning to the Netherlands. I await you with fear and trembling. You have a weighty task to accomplish. Make your preparations with the utmost care and forethought. If you have not money enough, I will send you more immediately. Agreeably to your wish, Crabb will leave me to-day for Potsdam; the old man is out of his wits with joy. He will be a great assistance to you in your escape. Bring him with you to Switzerland. The veteran wishes to end his days with us. To avoid suspicion, it will be better not to be seen together in public; you will act more freely in consequence. I have taken care he shall not want for money."

The sergeant of Potsdam had already projected the means of flight; all that was wanting to the full accomplishment of his plan was a faithful auxiliary, whom he dared not look for in Potsdam. It was therefore he had required the presence of Crabb. The old man was to travel as a rich merchant from Berlin to Potsdam, where he could easily find means to smuggle Fritz into the carriage; and once over the frontier into Saxony, and they were safe. All succeeded according to his wish; Crabb came in state to Potsdam, and cried for joy, when he found himself in Wilmson's little chamber, where he was received with heartfelt joy, and the whole project explained to him.

"Holla!" cried the veteran, rubbing his hands, and chuckling with delight; "now its all daylight with me. Devil punch me dead, if I could make out why the old gentleman in Magdeburg furbished me out in this way. Fritz, you should see my magazine; a chest full of clothes, fit for a privy-councillor or a burgomaster. Hang me, if I don't look like one when my beard is scraped off. The devil himself wouldn't know old Crabb again."

All the details of the projected flight were now agreed on. Crabb was to fix his head-quarters at one of the best hôtels, and keep himself quiet till the receipt of Mr. Wilmson's last letter from Magdeburg, announcing his departure from that city, when the last step was to be taken without further delay. Punctual to the day, Mr. Wilmson wrote to his son; Crabb received another letter nearly to the same effect. With his credentials in his hand, the old man hastened, as soon as it was dark, to the barracks. To his no small astonishment, he found the young sergeant seated in a melancholy attitude, with his head resting on his hand; and far from sharing in the veteran's joy, it was evident, from his short and cold replies, that he scarcely heard, and paid no attention to what was said.

Crabb knew not what to make of this, and stood with his mouth open, staring at the young gentleman for some time in silence.

"Are you ill, Mr. Frederick?" said he at length.

"No, Crabb."

"Any accident happened, then?"

"None that I am aware of."

"Hang me, young gentleman, if I know what to make of you, then. Here, thinks I, he will be ready to jump over the moon for joy; and there you sit—God forgive me!—like a sinner on the stool of repentance! Sha'n't I go to Berlin to-morrow morning, to buy the travelling chaise?"

"There is no hurry for it, Crabb," answered Frederick coldly.

"No hurry!—whew!—what's in the wind now? What am I to do, then, Master Fritz?"

"Leave me—nothing! I don't know," said the young man, resuming his meditative posture.

"Hólla! the fat's in the fire with a vengeance. You don't know—who does then? Don't you recollect that your father is almost at his journey's end by this time? What will he say to your 'don't know,' Master Fritz?"

"I shall remain here some time longer; leave me, Crabb."

With these words young Wilmson rose from his seat, took a few rapid turns up and down the room, and then making a sudden halt, he laid both hands upon Crabb's shoulders, and looked at him with an inexplicable expression of happiness in his whole countenance and manner. Crabb stood as mute as a fish, with mouth wide open, all eyes and ears, in expectation of hearing something extraordinary. Instead of giving the wished-for communication, however, another change came over the young man's spirit; he withdrew his hands, his head dropped on his breast, and he resumed his walk with a slower step, and folded arms.

"The Lord be merciful to us, and forgive us our sins!" muttered Crabb, in a fright; "he is certainly cracked!"

"Be silent," said Frederick, turning sharply round. "The affair stands now on a very different footing. Once for all, I shall remain here at present. I will not, I cannot, leave Potsdam. To-morrow, or the day after, perhaps, I may be able to tell you more; perhaps not for three months, or a year. The aspect of my affairs has changed, I tell you—go."

"So, so, so,—a pretty story this!" grumbled the veteran. "Off I set, ready to break my neck in my hurry at a moment's notice, to help a fellow to desert, cheat the king, and put my own head in the noose; for it would be 'run together, hang together,' if we were caught; and the whole business ends in smoke! and I'm packed off with a flea in my ear, to lie, like a bear in cold weather, sucking my paws, for a year may be! Thunder and lightning! I'd rather be hanged at once."

Young Wilmson paid no attention to his follower's remonstrance; but when Crabb ventured to push them a little farther, he said, with a look and tone that showed him to be in earnest—"No more, friend Crabb—let me hear no more of this. I am unfortunately situated—I cannot go yet—I am fixed to this place for a while—I must remain here. If the king himself were to send me over the frontier, I would return of my own free will. Now, go: it may be that, in a few days, you shall know all; but go now;"—and with these words he led the old man to the door.

Crabb offered no further resistance; but, with a significant pointing to his own head, to indicate his opinion of the condition of Frederick's, he returned, muttering curses, to the hôtel.

The motive of Fritz Wilmson's unexpected change of mind and resolution to hug his chains, was simply this:—The day before Crabb's last visit, he had been on guard at the palace, where he remained till twelve o'clock. He was sauntering among the statues in the square, and enjoying the beauty of the morning, when his notice was attracted by a young girl, in half-mourning, who was walking up and down before the houses, in evident embarrassment, looking right and left, and at length directing her steps towards the spot where he stood. Since his Magdeburg adventure, he never saw a young female in mourning without a certain palpitation of the heart; however, the dress, and the basket on the arm, showed the condition of the person before him, to be that of a maid-servant. When she approached nearer, and, addressing him timidly, asked if he could direct her to the house of Mrs. Major Malzahn—when he heard the soft flute-like voice, that had once touched him to the heart with the words, "I am an orphan, and alone in the wide world"—looked on the child-like purity of expression in her countenance, and met the gaze of the soft, clear, smiling eyes—his breath grew shorter, and a dimness came before his sight.

"Is it possible?" murmured he, at length. "Forgive me; but—have you a relation in Magdeburg, who resembles you strongly—a sister?—or was it yourself I had the happiness of seeing there, in another dress?—or——?"

She looked at him again more earnestly, and with a faint blush. "Good Heaven!" exclaimed she, involuntarily, "if it were not for that uniform; but, no, it is not possible!"

"I am the person you take me for," said he, sadly. "I am the son of the merchant Wilmson, of Magdeburg, forced by the despotic will of a monarch to wear this hateful livery; I have endured the slavery now six months. Ah! the day was at once the happiest of my life, and the most fatal to me."

"That day decided my fate also," said the fair stranger, sighing and casting her eyes on the ground. "I remember you perfectly, Mr. Wilmson, and I never believed the evil that was spoken of you—never."

"Who could have spoken of me to you good or evil?" asked young Wilmson, in some surprise.

"A person of the name of Kiek, in the service of Privy-councillor Von Gundling. He asserted that you were——that you had robbed him of that unfortunate handkerchief with the meerschaum head, that I lost in the crowd; but, I assure you, I never thought ill of you for a moment."

"Did he dare? O, that I had found you again at that moment! Your property is safe. I have kept your handkerchief as a sacred relic always by me; but your name I could not discover: the letters C. v. St. were marked in the corner."

"Clementina Stern," said she, in a low tone.

"Clementina Stern?" he repeated; "then it must be Clementina von Stern?" As Wilmson hesitatingly put this leading question, his eyes fell unconsciously on the well-filled basket on the round white arm, which, with the apron of coloured linen, black neck handkerchief, and white cap with a black ribbon, was at that time the usual costume of female servants, when they adopted something of the town fashions.

Clementina seemed to understand the inquiry implied by his looks better than he was aware of. She blushed deeply, as she answered, "That was my name, but my family has long since abandoned such vain distinctions. Since the death of my dear father, as subrector, and the melancholy journey to Berlin, undertaken by my mother, in the vain hope of assistance from some rich relations, my misfortunes reached their climax: I lost my last dear parent, and I am reduced to servitude as my only resource." As she spoke, a few pearly drops fell on her soft rose-tinted cheek. "Do not mistake the cause of my sorrow, Mr. Wilmson. I have no false shame for the humility of my condition; I did but think what would have been my mother's feelings, if she could have foreseen my future destiny."

"Oh, Fräulein, if I might venture——"

"Do not call me Fräulein," interrupted she, hastily, as if the sound grated on her ear; but when she saw the tears in her own eyes reflected in Frederick's, her voice again softened. "And are you, too, no longer happy?" asked she.

"Happy, when I see you weep?" said Frederick. There was a pause, which was broken at length by an inquiry as to when and where he might restore the handkerchief and its contents.

"Oh, let me never set eyes on it again!" cried Clementina—her colour deepening as she spoke; "it has been the cause of all my late uneasiness, or rather it was the unconscious instrument of the detested Kiek."

Frederick found little difficulty in drawing from her all the circumstances connected with her loss. The owner of this magnificent pipe was Privy-councillor Von Gundling, who, being a lover of finery, valued himself not a little on the possession of such an article. He had given a large sum for it in Magdeburg, whither he had come in the royal suite, and sent it to a goldsmith to have his arms engraved on the lid. Clementina, then a dependant on some part of the councillor's family, had been desired to fetch it back. Kiek, the gentleman in green and gold, who imagined that Clementina's poverty reduced her to his level, had for some time persecuted her with his addresses; and meeting her on Wilmson's arm, in the crowd that followed the king, he took him for a favoured rival, and snatched the handkerchief, partly with the design of provoking her. Wilmson's violence confirmed Kiek's suspicion. On the return of the family to Berlin, he learnt that the admired meerschaum had not been restored to its owner, who, in consequence thereof, had been in a towering passion ever since. This gentleman, Kiek, now tried to profit by poor Clementina's embarrassment, and promised to find means to quiet the privy-councillor, if the proud beauty would show him some favour in return; but meeting with a still more decided repulse, he detailed the adventure in Magdeburg, with some additions of his own. He told his master that he had heard Clementina's companion ask her to give him the meerschaum for a keepsake, which she had at last agreed to; that he, Kiek, had snatched it out of the fellow's hand, but was set upon, in return, by the robber and some of his comrades, and so compelled to surrender what he would never have parted with to one. As Clementina's own account agreed in some particulars with Kiek's fictions, it was held as an entire confirmation of them. No one would believe for a moment that the person in question, so far from being her lover, was not even known to her. She was obliged not only to pay the worth of the missing valuable, and leave the house; but was told, in pretty plain terms, that she might think herself fortunate to get off so easily. Reduced to the brink of despair, by such a concurrence of unhappy accidents, Clementina, after many fruitless attempts to procure an employment more suitable to her birth, left Berlin and came to Potsdam, in the humble situation in which young Wilmson found her.

Wilmson listened with the deepest interest to Clementina's recital. "Let the scoundrel but cross my path," muttered he, through his teeth, "and I will run him through, were he in the royal presence! I understand now," said he, aloud, "why the rascal did not accuse me of the theft when he saw me dragged from the king's presence. He feared your innocence, and his own villany would be made manifest. Ah, Clementina! how much have you suffered through my fault! If I had not been your companion on that unfortunate day, one sorrow had at least been spared you. Be it my task to redress your wrongs—I can, I will. How much have you endured since we first met, how much do you still endure?"

"No, Mr. Wilmson, I have now nothing to endure; I have found a good mistress."

"The best mistress is still a mistress," said Wilmson, hastily; "and you, O dearest Clementina! you must—you shall be—your own mistress. You see me now as a soldier; but I am rich, my father is rich. Do not doubt me. I am not like that wretched fellow—that——"

"I do not think—I never did think—you were," interrupted Clementina. "I thank you for your offers, Mr. Wilmson; you are very kind; but I am my own mistress, so long as I am free from all obligation."

"Turn out the guard," called the sentinel, as a general officer rode by. The sergeant could only bow to his fair companion, before he sprang into his place; the general rode on, the soldiers turned into the guard-house again. Frederick turned to look for Clementina, but she was gone. He paced slowly backwards and forwards, plunged in a delicious reverie. The unexpected vision had changed his whole frame of mind. In the agitation caused by her fluctuating feelings, Clementina appeared still lovelier than at their former meeting in Magdeburg. He murmured her words softly to himself; he stood on the spot where she had stood; something of her still seemed to linger around and hallow it. Potsdam, the city he had hitherto beheld as a dungeon, was suddenly transformed to a fairy kingdom in his eyes; and the command of the king, so often execrated as the mandate of a despot, appeared as the right hand of a divinity leading him to the object of all his hopes and wishes. He blessed the monarch; he blessed his fate; Clementina's presence would have changed a hell into a heaven in his eyes. It was in this mood that Crabb found him after the receipt of his father's letter.

It will scarcely be doubted, that every moment Wilmson could spare on the following day, was devoted to the discovery of Clementina's abode. Potsdam, though a royal residence, was but an insignificant city, and even less remarkable for its population than its size. Every one who has read romances, knows that lovers are sure to find one another in the end, even if they must first traverse every quarter of the world; it was, therefore, not to be wondered at that Wilmson had scarcely employed three hours upon his voyage of discovery, before he was again blessed with the sight of her he sought. In the first floor of a large house, Clementina was standing at a window, from which she occasionally looked out, as if she, too, were in search of somebody or something. As soon, however, as he came right opposite, and took off his cap to salute her, Clementina's eyes unaccountably missed him, and she not only drew back and shut the window, but drew the curtain before it.

His smiling heaven was suddenly obscured and saddened, as if a snow-storm had fallen upon the earth, while glowing in the beauty and freshness of Spring. He returned gloomily to his cell, and entered on a long struggle with himself, in which, in his own mind, he came off victorious. He blushed at the violence of his passion for an unknown, who scorned his respectful homage, and resolved to think of his escape in good earnest. He spoke to Crabb, and appointed the day and the hour. Crabb was to go to Berlin, and return with a carriage and post-horses, as a wealthy merchant travelling in haste through Potsdam, late in the evening, when he was to take up Wilmson, disguised as his servant, and make the best of his way over the frontier. The day he was to set off, Crabb had occasion to pay Wilmson a last visit. The old man came chuckling, and rubbing his hands, into the room where the young sergeant was lying before the window, looking into the street, with so much attention, that he did not observe Crabb's entrance. Clementina had just passed, looked up, and returned his salute with a smile and a blush; and when she reached the corner of the street, the beautiful head was once more turned in his direction, and as quickly averted. Frederick's Spring laughed out once more; the snow melted away, and the bowed but unbroken flowers reared their heads once more. After waiting some time, Crabb's patience failed him, and he pulled Wilmson by the shoulder to make him aware of his presence. The young man turned round with sparkling eyes and cheeks glowing crimson. "I shall remain," said he; "I do not mean to go at all. If I were sure that an earthquake would destroy the town in a few hours, I would stay and be swallowed up in it."

Crabb felt very much as if he were threatened with a similar accident at this unexpected turn. He stormed, entreated, wept and swore, and swore and wept by turns, while Wilmson, without heeding him, lay before the window, and looked at the stones that Clementina's foot had touched and consecrated. After two hours spent in useless endeavour, the old man gave up the point, and withdrew, muttering and grumbling, to the next beer-cellar; and the young man, forgetting him and all the world besides, remained in quiet enjoyment of his prospect from the barrack-room window.

The next time fortune smiled on Wilmson was in the garrison church, where, to the grievous injury of his devotion, he saw Clementina in company with an aged lady. She was too well engaged to notice him; however, in going out, he expected, at least, a look of recognition in answer to his humble inclination; the beauty's colour rose a little, but she passed and gave no sign. The evening of the same day they met again in a public walk, and this time Wilmson mustered up courage, not to bow but to speak! "How happy am I at length!" stammered he. But his happiness was quickly put an end to by the countenance with which the fair one heard him: it seemed to betray astonishment beyond the power of expression at his impertinence. "What is your meaning, Sir, in thus addressing me?" said she coldly; "I do not know you: you have made some mistake—you are speaking to the wrong person." And without deigning to look at him a second time, she turned away with some young persons who were walking with her. The poor sergeant was thunderstruck, and stood for some minutes as stock-still as if he had been on parade before some martinet of an officer; then suddenly starting from his bewilderment, he left the walk with a firm step and indignant air, in double-quick time, execrating the weakness of man and the coquetry of woman, from the time of Helen downwards. "Am I then her dupe only, her laughing-stock, when I thought—heaven and hell! what a tone she assumed—'I do not know you—you are addressing the wrong person:' if ever I put faith in woman again——!" What was likely to happen in the case therein predicated, was lost to the world by his running into the house where old Crabb had taken up his quarters, and ordering him to set out for Berlin forthwith. The veteran did not wait for a second thought, but with an audible thanksgiving, that the young gentleman had at last recovered the use of his wits, he hired horses, and drove out of the town before Wilmson found himself in his own room again. The young sergeant plumed himself not a little in his own mind on the dignity and decision of his proceedings, and repeated a hundred times to himself, that he was miserable, and should always be miserable, so long as he remained in the same city with a being whose charms and caprices made it a question whether she most deserved his love or his hatred. Before night, however, he found reason to doubt of the dignity, and repent grievously of the decision. It happened late in the evening, when he had left his room, and refreshed himself with a solitary walk in the great square, that he stood still to consider whether it would be better to go back and moralise on the coquetry and inconstancy of the other sex, in his solitary chamber, or to forget both in the first coffee-house he came to. He had not quite made up his mind, when a low musical voice bade him good evening, addressing him by his name. It was Clementina. Wilmson bowed with extraordinary politeness, and was walking off, as he flattered himself, with a particularly well-acted air of indifference; but she was evidently prepared to say something more, and common decency required that he should hear what it was.

"Do not be angry with me for my rudeness this morning," said the musical voice timidly; "I was compelled to act as I did, heaven knows. I have had no peace since. How ungrateful and insolent I must have appeared to you!" After such a declaration, parting was of course impossible. Wilmson was too just not to feel it a positive duty to remain, and not condemn a person unheard. Clementina, who had probably forgotten that her old mistress was waiting for her with a lantern to light her home from her card-party, stood still likewise. She had, apparently, no wish to be seen, or, perhaps, she was afraid of wasting the candle, for she extinguished the light: whereupon Wilmson recollecting that the sudden darkness could not but subject her to imminent danger of stumbling, offered his arm as he had done in Magdeburg: it was accepted, and they walked on for some time in silence. By degrees the full heart of the maiden was unladen to her sympathizing companion, and the cause of her apparent incivility explained. Her old enemy, Kiek, had attended his master to Potsdam; had renewed his persecution of Clementina, and revenged himself for her coldness, as he had done before, by a repetition of the calumny, that she was connected with a dissolute fellow in the King's Guard; the girl wanted good looking after, &c. &c. Clementina's mistress,—a lady of the fiercest virtue,—had preached her a sermon two hours long on the one deadly sin that included the other six, of looking at any young man, more especially a young man in uniform, refused to hear a word of the poor girl's justification, and finished by a plain declaration, that, out of pure morality, and a Christian desire to wean her from her evil ways, she would turn Miss Clementina into the streets forthwith, if ever she spoke to, or looked at a soldier again.

The poor orphan wept bitterly as she related her story; but forgot her own sorrow, when Wilmson, in his turn, began to account for his appearance at Potsdam in so different a station from that he had filled in Magdeburg.

"Good Heaven!" cried she, "why do you remain here? In your place, I would not be in Potsdam another day. You have money at command; the Saxon frontier is not far distant; your father is already in safety; what have you to fear? what keeps you here another minute?——"

"You, Clementina!" answered Wilmson, involuntarily.

"I? impossible! How can I be an impediment? We have not the most distant connexion with one another."

"And therefore is it that I remain. I cannot leave Potsdam while it holds you. I will stay here till you have learned to know,—till you have learned to trust me,—till you have learned to look on me as a brother. When you, too, will leave this hateful place, which you have as little cause to love as I, and seek a refuge with my father and my aunt; then Clementina I will fly!"

She was silent, half terrified; and uncertain how to understand him, or what to answer.

"Leave this mistress of yours at once," pursued Wilmson; "you must not—you shall not remain in your present condition. My means are ample——"

"Impossible! quite impossible! Mr. Wilmson," said Clementina quickly; "you cannot be thinking of what you are saying."

"Do you mistrust me so much, Clementina?"

"Have I shown mistrust in the relation of my past or present circumstances? What more can you require?"

"Much more, if I could hope to convince you of the purity of my feelings towards you; but I will not urge you beyond your wishes. I will be silent till you can no longer doubt me. Have you a friend—any female friend in this city?"

"Not one!" said she sadly.

"Let me then be esteemed worthy to bear so precious a name! I dare venture to call myself so, conscious that I have no end in view but your happiness: no hope but in yours to find my own."

"I believe you, and I thank you, Mr. Wilmson; but that I may remain worthy of your esteem, I will accept nothing beyond it from your hands. If you wish to preserve my confidence, you will not renew these offers. I can work; labour, and the consciousness of integrity, will save me from despair."

"Dearest Clementina, you misunderstand me; perhaps you see in me but another persecutor of your helplessness, like that wretched Kiek."

"You cannot think that, Mr. Wilmson," answered Clementina, with some earnestness, leaning slightly on his arm, as if she would give him some assurance of her faith, and half unconscious that she did so.

It was now Wilmson's turn to be silent; the half-pressure of her little hand put all his eloquence to flight in a moment; he did not even hear her speak to him, although she spoke more than once. His silence disturbed her. "Are you angry?" asked she softly. Still no answer. She said no more; but her situation grew every moment more embarrassing, and more mortifying. At length, she withdrew her arm, and murmured with a half-stifled sigh, "Good night, Mr. Wilmson." Her hand was hastily seized—pressed passionately to Frederick's lips—she even felt a tear fall on it.

"What ails you, Mr. Wilmson?—dear Mr. Wilmson," asked she, trembling.

"Good night, dearest Clementina," said he; "you have made me very unhappy, though you know it not."

"Unhappy!—and through me! O, no; that must not be," said Clementina, with an involuntary tenderness of tone, that emboldened her lover once more to urge his request in a somewhat different form.

"If my peace is of any value in your eyes, Clementina, promise me at least that in any future embarrassment, you will have recourse to me immediately, and to no other."

"I will; I do promise that much: and if my peace is dear to you, Mr. Wilmson, you will not ask for more. We part here. Good night, dear friend."

Before he had time to answer, Clementina had disappeared in the darkness. He did not venture to follow her, but remained long in the same spot, softly repeating her words to himself, and deducing from them the sweetest hopes, and still more from the tone in which they were uttered. For some hours he rambled about the streets of Potsdam; his eyes sparkling, his cheeks burning, his breast full of the rapturous dream of youthful happiness. He thought no more of freedom or of flight; he thought only of the moment when he should again be blessed in the presence of the loveliest of her sex. He felt himself the happiest of mankind—he swore it—and that nothing could ever make him unhappy again.

As to the latter point, Mr. Frederick Wilmson was mistaken, as young folks are apt to be; and if he had had but a little more experience in life, he would have expected that, precisely because he was the happiest of mankind to-day, he stood a handsome chance of becoming a miserable dog on the morrow.

The very next morning, at the moment when in the solitude of his chamber, he was revelling in the remembrances of the preceding evening, the sword of fate was dangling over his head, suspended by a thread no thicker than one of Clementina's own golden hairs.

It happened that his most gracious Majesty Frederick William the First, was taking a ride in company with some of his officers without the gates of the city. They had not long cleared the gate, when the attention of the whole party was arrested by the extraordinary height of a smartly dressed damsel, who was coming towards them from an opposite direction.

"Where did that young giantess spring from?" asked the king, throwing an admiring glance on the daughter of Anak, as she drew nearer. "Does any one know her?"

"I have seen the gawky Venus somewhere, and in Potsdam, I believe, Sire," answered one of the officers. "I rather think she is in service, in the household of War Councillor—I forget his name. The wench might be fuglewoman to the whole fair sex of Potsdam."

"Upon my honour!" cried the monarch, slackening his horse's bridle, "if she marry one worthy of her—I mean a man that deserves the name, and not one of your dwarfs—she might be the mother of a race of giants."

"Assuredly she might, Sire," replied the officer; "but the devil delights in making folks love by the rule of contrary. I would lay any wager, that the two yards and a half of beauty there has a fancy for some Hop-o'-my-thumb who scarcely reaches to her elbow."

"Hum! that may be amended," said the king. "That will never do! The wench deserves something better. That is well thought of! She shall have a handsome young fellow, to whom I owe some sort of reparation into the bargain. The boy shall have no cause to complain of me this time," added the monarch, with a chuckle of self-gratulation, as the bright idea occurred to him. "I'll make a match between her and young Wilmson of Magdeburg: he's the very man!"

While he was still speaking, the young Patagonian had come up with them, and looked frightened out of her wits on finding her path completely obstructed by the officers, who, following the example of the king, had reined up their horses, and occupied the road from side to side.

"Come hither my pretty maid," cried the king; "here, this way, and don't look so scared, foolish wench! I am not going to eat you. Where are you going to?—into the town, hey?"

The long-backed damsel glowed like a pan of charcoal under the operation of the bellows, and stammered out an unintelligible "Yes."

"Good!—then you can do me a little service: you can take a note from me to the commandant, and get a crown or two for your trouble,—do you hear? Can any one give me a slip of paper?" added the king, turning to his suite.

One of the officers gave his pocket-book, out of which his majesty tore a blank leaf, and writing a few lines on it with a pencil, twisted the paper up into a peculiar form, and addressed it to the commandant.

"You will take it directly to the commandant—directly, mind. You know where he lives?" The damsel made a frightened curtsey, and was making off as fast as her enormous legs could carry her. "Halt there," cried the king; "here is for your trouble, in case the commandant should forget;" and he put a couple of ducats into her large fist. "Are you married?"

The girl shook her head. "But you have got a sweetheart?" The poor girl made no answer, but her face flamed up again, and her head was once more set in motion, but not so decidedly as before.

"Well, well, I understand; that will do—you may go," said the king, laughing; "but the commandant must have my note directly, remember."

The girl curtsied again, the officers made way for her, and, as she passed, she heard a stifled laugh: they had a shrewd guess at the contents of the note!

About half an hour after this rencontre, an orderly marched into Wilmson's little chamber, and desired the immediate attendance of Sergeant Wilmson at the house of the commandant. The sergeant obeyed as promptly as sergeants do when they can't help themselves, and was shown into a large room, where he found his excellency the commandant with the colonel of his regiment, and a chaplain. Apparently something uncommonly droll had just been said or done; for all three had been laughing immoderately, and the entrance of the young sergeant seemed the signal for a fresh burst. There is a difference of opinion among men on most points, however; and it is possible that the something might not have been so amusing to all parties—so at least might be guessed by the wailing and heavy sobs that proceeded from an inner apartment, and formed a contrast to the exuberant mirth of the two military gentlemen and their clerical coadjutor, more striking than agreeable.

"Sergeant Wilmson," said the colonel, when he had composed his countenance, "you are a lucky fellow! His majesty's favour will make you the envy of all your comrades."

Wilmson started in joyful surprise; he expected nothing less than that the king had granted his discharge; and forgetting the wooden puppet motions proper to the soldier, he only felt as a man, and hastily advanced towards his officer, in speechless eagerness.

"Can you guess what is in store for you?" asked the colonel smiling. "What is your warmest wish at the present moment?"

"My discharge, my freedom!" replied the young man.

"Pshaw, nonsense, trash!" cried the colonel, knitting his brow; "something better than that. What the devil have you to do with freedom? I thought you had got rid of that folly long ago. Come, mend your guess; what! you can't? Well, it is not fair to tantalize you farther. His majesty has been graciously pleased to select a wife for you. What think you of that, comrade?"

Wilmson opened his eyes to double their usual extent, and could scarcely articulate for astonishment: "A wife for me!—and what, in Heaven's name, am I to do with her?"

He was answered by a fresh burst of laughter. "Do with her, you booby!—as other people do—as well as you can."

The blood of the young man mounted to his temples; he drew himself up proudly, but made no reply.

"Upon my honour, she is a fine wench," pursued the commandant, taking a pinch of snuff. "I don't believe all Potsdam, and Berlin put together, could produce a more perfect beauty—hey, Von Escher?" turning to the colonel.

"Certainly not," said Von Escher, applying to the snuff-box in his turn.

"I would not marry her if she were Helen herself," answered Wilmson coolly.

"You are not asked whether you will or no," said the commandant drily. "We have the king's special command; the girl is waiting in the next room, and a confounded howling she makes," muttered he between his teeth! "She has got a fancy for some other too, I suppose. His reverence is waiting to perform the ceremony; come, Sir, quick, despatch!"

"The king's command," cried the young man, almost choking with rage; "what has the king to do with my marriage?"

"Hold your tongue; what's that to you? We have his majesty's command, under his own hand. You may see the billet if you will—it runs thus, 'You are to see Sergeant Wilmson married forthwith to the bearer of the note, in the presence of Colonel von Escher.' That's enough, I hope. I won't hear another word, either from you or the wench."

"The king's commands may effect much; but this is beyond his power," said Wilmson calmly. "My hand and heart are at my own disposal, and at that of no other mortal breathing."

"As to your heart, young man, you may do as you like, but the wife you must have; therefore, you had better submit at once, without making any more wry faces," said the commandant.

"It is contrary to every law of God or man," exclaimed Wilmson, restraining himself with difficulty.

"A soldier, and preach of law! the fellow is crazy. What has he to do with either?" said the officer angrily.

"Very little, indeed, your excellency," said Wilmson, with a bitter smile; "but I have not been so long a soldier as to forget that I am a man. Your tyranny may drive me to desperation; it shall never make me the voluntary instrument of my own disgrace and misery. I am free, so soon as I choose to be, and I laugh at your threats, and those of your king, while my life is in my own power."

"Come, come, my lad," said the colonel, stepping up to him, and clapping him, in a friendly manner, on the shoulder, "no rashness, there's a remedy for everything but death. The king must be obeyed; but, depend upon it, you will have no reason to repent. Obey at once with a good grace, since obey you must. If the king gives the wife, he gives the fortune too; and the girl is really a sweet creature, and it is no great misfortune to have a pretty girl flung into your arms! Most men would endure such a one with great philosophy!"

Wilmson withdrew coldly from the colonel's hand, which still rested on his shoulder. "The king can bestow nothing on me—no equivalent for that he has deprived me of. He has torn me from a happy family—from an affectionate father; he has annihilated my personal and social freedom, by the single exercise of his will; he has degraded me from an independent rational being to a puppet, moving and acting at the bidding of others; and now he makes me feel, through you, that there is a still lower point of misery, to which he would fain reduce me. But he is mistaken this time. I declare, once for all, I will not obey; if you have recourse to violent means, my blood be on your heads."

"Nonsense! fanfaronade!" interrupted the commandant angrily. "Have done with this insolence, or, by heaven, you shall repent it! But there must be an end, and a speedy one, to this business. Ho, without there!" cried the officer, turning to the door by which Wilmson had entered. Two non-commissioned officers of the guard entered, to whom the commandant whispered a few words, and they remained within the door, motionless as statues.

Colonel von Escher walked hastily up and down the room, with his hands behind his back, throwing, from time to time, glances of uneasiness and compassion towards the unfortunate Wilmson, for whom he really felt a strong regard. He drew the commandant to a distant window, and talked with him for some minutes, in a low tone of voice. The shrugging of his excellency's shoulders betrayed the nature of the conversation, and his own answers. The stillness in the saloon rendered the sounds of lamentation, in the neighbouring apartment, more painfully audible; and, from time to time, there was an eager contention of female voices.

"The thing must come to an end, upon my honour," said the commandant, breaking off the conference at the window abruptly. "It is his majesty's pleasure; what is the use of further talking? Chaplain, make ready!"

With these words, he went into the other room, leaving the door open. One of the women uttered a piercing scream as he entered; two others seized her, one by each arm, and dragged her into the saloon. The colonel walked hastily away; Wilmson did not move, but remained with his eyes riveted on the ground, revolving a dark purpose in his mind. The chaplain approached, and spoke to him; it was evident that Wilmson neither saw nor heard him!

The colonel came up to him a second time, and shook him gently by the arm. "Come, come, my son, submit, since there is no help for it; have mercy on the poor girl."

Wilmson started as if roused from a heavy sleep; and first became conscious that the chaplain stood before him, ready for his office, and by his side the unhappy bride, in a convulsion of sorrow, her face buried in her handkerchief, and supported on either side by a stout handmaiden of his excellency's household.

"Put away that wet rag, child, and take a look at the husband his majesty has picked out for you; you might have done worse for yourself, I can tell you," said the commandant, in a tone whose roughness was not altogether natural; and, as he spoke, he drew the handkerchief from her trembling fingers, but without rudeness.

The girl again uttered a faint cry: her swollen eyes met Wilmson's. Heaven and earth, it was Clementina!

"Wretches, you have murdered her!" shouted Wilmson, springing forwards and tearing the now insensible form from the arms of the women. He bore her to a sofa, knelt down by her side, and watched for some sign of returning life, with an eagerness that rendered him unconscious of all that was passing round him.

"What's in the wind now? who have we here?" said the commandant, aside, to the colonel. "This is a new scene in the play. No matter, the young spark is out of his heroics; however, let us make an end of this cursed business, before the storm begins again. Come, parson, begin your office—quick, despatch—do you hear me?"

"Had we not better wait a little?" interposed the chaplain; "the young man seems disposed to be reasonable, and——"

"Not a minute—not a second," cried the commandant. "Proceed, I say: there the girl has opened her eyes. Will you do your duty, Sir, or not?"

Thus admonished, the chaplain prepared to obey. Wilmson neither heard nor saw;—his soul seemed flown to Clementina, whose life appeared fluttering on her lips. No questions were asked of bride or bridegroom;—the rings* were not exchanged, but forced upon their passive fingers by the by-standers, and the unceremonious ceremony was over.

The commandant wiped the drops from his forehead, and gave orders for a carriage to be brought immediately.

"Let me only get the silly wench out of my house, before she gives up the ghost outright," muttered he to himself. "It is a most infernal business altogether. As I am a Christian man, I would rather ten thousand times be charged at once by the enemy front and rear, than go through it again!"

Colonel von Escher drew Wilmson aside, who seemed scarcely yet awakened to his situation.

"My son, recollect yourself; the thing is done now, and cannot be undone. Cast off those wild notions of vengeance that you uttered a while ago; they are fit for none but fools and cowards to utter or to feel. Look at that poor girl there: by heaven, I am sorry for her and for you;—but she is your wife. Treat her kindly; her life hangs on a thread, which one harsh word from you may snap asunder. Be a man, and conquer your disinclination; she at least is innocent of wrong towards you. Promise me to take no further step till you are cooler;—give me your hand upon it;—you shall not repent your compliance. I will act as a father by you—come, my son, your hand and word."

Wilmson gave his hand mechanically to the kind-hearted officer, without having the smallest idea of what he had been talking about. To pass in one half-hour from hell to heaven, might well have set the strongest head in a whirl! The carriage was brought, and, on a sign from the commandant, Clementina was carried down stairs by the women, and placed in it. The colonel followed Wilmson.

"Remember, my son," said he, "you have given me your word of honour to be kind to this poor girl; it were unworthy of a man to act otherwise. Her fate is hard enough in being forced into unwilling arms: let it not become still harder through your fault."

"Is this all really true, or do I dream?" asked Wilmson, as the carriage rolled on, and he found himself alone with his pale trembling bride. "Oh, dearest Clementina! if it be indeed a dream, let me dream on! if it be an illusion of the senses, may their healthful service never more be mine!"

A faint smile stole over Clementina's face; her hand half-returned the pressure of his, but the tears still rolled down her cheeks. The words that trembled on her lips died away, when the carriage suddenly stopped. They were at home—her home now. Wilmson lifted her out, and carried her into the house.

"Where are we? Mr. Wilmson, where are you bringing me?" asked Clementina, standing still, as Wilmson attempted to lead her onwards.

"Where should I bring you, but to my home—to yours, beloved? Henceforth we are one, my Clementina—without our own consent, certainly; nor can I yet understand by what means our union was accomplished, or how, or by whom, a secret, I thought locked in my inmost heart, was betrayed to the king. One sweet assurance alone is mine—you are mine—mine for ever, beyond the reach of fate."

Half led, half carried, by her husband, Clementina entered Wilmson's apartment. It was a large and airy room, furnished as a sergeant's room is not often furnished, though somewhat of a bachelor's no-order was observable throughout. Books and writing materials, several small articles of dress, flowers, and sheets of music, lay on chairs and tables—drawings on the floor, and shoes and empty wine bottles in the windows.

Wilmson glanced smilingly around his disorderly apartment. "Ah, dearest Clementina," said he, "when I left this room in such haste, I little thought it was destined to receive such a guest!"

"And did you really know nothing beforehand of what has taken place? Did you never speak to the colonel, or to the king himself? Perhaps——Ah, Mr. Wilmson, confess it—I was not the object so vehemently solicited!"

"You are right, my Clementina; I would never have dared to gain possession of what I most desired on earth, by such means. I am innocent of all previous knowledge of the transaction."

"I knew it," said Clementina, the tears again stealing down her cheeks; "the king has rendered us both miserable. It was Ma'm'selle Ida, the companion of the war councillor's lady, whom you sought; some people think she is pretty."

"She may be Venus herself, for all I know or care. I have not the honour of knowing the councillor, his lady, or her companion. It was from the commandant I first heard of this strange fancy of the king's. I threatened to blow out my own brains, if such unheard-of tyranny were persisted in; and I believe, I should have done it. How could I dream the bliss that was in store for me?—you were never once named to me."

Clementina heard him with undisguised astonishment; and in her turn related, that she had met the lengthy damsel, who had made such an impression on the royal amateur of overgrown beauty, by accident, an hour or two before Wilmson's summons. They had some acquaintance with each other as neighbours, and whether Miss Ida were really, as she said, in a particular hurry, or had some private objection to entering the commandant's house, could not well be known; but she had earnestly requested Clementina to deliver the note which she had received from the king—if it were the king, as she guessed. Clementina readily complied—gave the letter to an adjutant —and had already left the house, when she was recalled, her name and condition inquired, and the astounding intelligence communicated, that it was his majesty's pleasure that she should give her hand forthwith to a handsome young soldier of his first regiment of guards. Clementina was thunderstruck; she declared it to be a mistake altogether, and eagerly explained how she came by the letter. She was only laughed at, and forcibly detained—the colonel and chaplain sent for—and then terror and anguish had so possessed her, that she had no recollection of anything that had passed, till she had swooned at the sight of Wilmson.

Clementina's account, instead of solving the enigma in Wilmson's mind, only increased the puzzle.

"So it was not you, after all, the king meant to bestow upon me?" cried Wilmson, unable to restrain his laughter, in spite of his bride's agitation. "Never was king or subject more thoroughly caught in his own snare—never before had blunder such blessed consequences!"

"But," said Clementina, looking timidly and anxiously round, "what will become of me? Such a marriage cannot stand; I will not be forced upon you thus."

"You are mine for ever, Clementina; the dearest wishes of my heart are fulfilled, most unexpectedly. An act of outrageous despotism has, unwittingly, bestowed upon me all I hoped for, as the reward of long passionate love. Yes, I loved you, Clementina, from the first time I saw you: from our first meeting, in Magdeburg, you have been the object of my constant thought. See there your beloved name in every book; on every window-pane my fingers traced the letters unconsciously. Ah, that you could as easily read my heart!"

Clementina turned her blushing face a moment towards her lover, and then again towards the door, in an agony of maiden shame.

"Will you then leave me, dearest?—will you put asunder those whom heaven has so wonderfully joined together? You are my betrothed—my bride—my wife. Oh, Clementina, what a future paradise lies in that word! And whether would you go! Am I really so indifferent to you? Have you no trust, no faith, in my heart—my plighted word?"

"All faith in your heart, but not in my unexpected happiness. I was alone in the world; you were my only friend. I have always trusted you—always——"

The word died on her lips; her cheek mantled; her eyes sunk beneath the passionate glance of his. Wilmson clasped her to his breast. "Always what?" whispered he softly.

"Always loved you," she faltered, in a voice so low that none but a lover's ear could have caught the sound; and raising her brilliant eyes, full of timid, trusting tenderness, for one moment to his face, and the first kiss of the bridegroom was pressed on her yet unprofaned virgin lips.

The hours passed swiftly away, and seemed but as moments to the happy lovers. How much had they to relate—how much to hear! One cloud alone darkened the horizon,—the same imperious will that had united, might again tear them asunder. It grew late; the fast fading day scarcely afforded light enough to discern each other's faces; Wilmson had just detailed his plan of flight, and calculated that Crabb might be expected on the following day, when a knock was heard. Could it be the veteran so soon returned? Wilmson opened the door, and an adjutant stood before him. He was the bearer of the royal command, for Sergeant Wilmson to repair forthwith to the castle, with his newly-married wife. Clementina's heart died within her at the dreaded sound. Wilmson had scarcely time to whisper a word of encouragement; the officer would not hear of a minute's delay,—not even till Wilmson, who was in plain clothes, could put on his uniform; he only waited for Clementina to wrap herself in a silk mantle,—the last remaining relic of her former rank,—and then hurried off, reiterating the king's command for their immediate appearance.

They were scarcely a hundred yards from the house, when the knock of a wooden leg against the stones, and the wind of a whole volley of curses, announced the scarcely hoped-for presence of Crabb. Wilmson stretched forth his hand in the darkness, and caught that of his faithful follower.

"Hush, not a word," whispered he; "there is some one within hearing. Is all ready?—where is the carriage?—quick, only say where!"

The hoarse voice of the veteran muttered the desired information, and a few oaths into the bargain.

"Enough, go, speak to no one: I shall be with you, quickly, I hope."

Clementina, who heard nothing that passed, stood still trembling in every limb. Wilmson whispered some words of comfort; but the agitation caused by so many unexpected occurrences, crowding one on the other, betrayed itself in the tone of his voice, and his visible uneasiness only augmented hers.

They reached the castle; a deep silence reigned within, broken only at intervals by the explosions of a loud, harsh voice from a distant apartment,—it was the voice of the king.

In the saloon where the king's chamberlains, in former times, were accustomed to wait, Colonel von Escher was walking up and down in evident discomposure. He stopped when he became aware of Wilmson's presence, and beckoned him to approach.

"Here has been a devil of a blunder!" said he, in a low tone. "The king is furious! He meant you to have had a long-legged, bouncing wench, whom he met when he rode out this morning, and took a great fancy to.—I can't guess how the mistake occurred.—The king pities you heartily.—It is a cursed piece of business! But what do you do in plain clothes? you dare not show yourself to his majesty without your uniform."

Wilmson excused himself on account of the haste in which he had obeyed the royal summons.

"It will never do," said the colonel; "it will make matters worse and worse;" and calling for the sergeant on guard, he ordered him to change clothes with Wilmson immediately. His toilet was scarcely completed when an attendant appeared to conduct him and Clementina into the royal presence.

His majesty was evidently in a tremendous ill-humour, and cast from time to time glances of mingled anger and contempt on the slender figure of Clementina, who looked ready to faint. Wilmson's countenance exhibited mingled grief and indignation; and its paleness grew yet more striking in the strong light of the apartment.

"Why did not you tell the commandant that you were not the right person, it was not to you I gave the letter," said the monarch, roughly addressing Clementina.

"Your majesty, I did say so a hundred times," said Clementina, rallying as well as she could; "but his excellency would not listen to me."

"Your majesty's express commands were, that I should listen to no excuses," said the commandant, who was standing by in evident chagrin.

"Silence," thundered the king, "you will speak when you are spoken to. Had you no eyes in your head? How could you dream that I would tack such a poor slip of a thing as that"—and here his majesty bestowed another look of most unmitigated scorn upon poor Clementina,—"to the handsomest fellow in my regiment?—Never!"

The king took two or three hasty strides through the apartment, then turning suddenly towards Wilmson; "Poor devil, I am sorry for you, on my soul," said he, in a tone of compassion. "We will see what can be done for you; I meant to show you some favour, and I have been the means of fastening this paltry wench on you for life. Well, well; you must submit to your fate like a man, and let me hear of no rash folly; I hear you threatened to blow out your brains. Phoo, phoo; no more of that. A fellow of your inches a suicide! Have you no religion, man,—do you want to be damned? If you dare think of such a thing, I'll have you buried under the gallows. I'll—— hark, ye,—I will make you some amends. Ask some favour of me, and I'll grant it,—but I can't free you from the yoke, unluckily that would be against the law of God,—but anything else, and I will grant it willingly; speak, what do you wish for?"

"My freedom, your majesty,—dismission from your majesty's service," answered Wilmson, without hesitation.

It was evident to the bystanders that the monarch was taken somewhat more literally at his word than he had expected. He turned upon his heel, and was silent for a few seconds, and then bursting into a loud laugh, "The rascal has been too quick for me this time," said he, "I am fairly caught, but I will not break my word. Go, now; perhaps after a night's sleep you will think better of it. Go to-morrow morning early to Colonel von Escher, he will have some proposals to make you in my name."

The doors were opened, Wilmson and Clementina obeyed the signal, and left the royal presence. Quick as lightning Wilmson tore off the borrowed uniform,—the badge of his slavery; he was once more his own master, and there was rapture in the thought. As he found himself again without the castle, he clasped his young wife to his breast, and cried aloud in the fulness of his joy—"I am free! I am free! Father, I shall see you again." And then releasing her, he drew her small hand within his arm, and they turned their steps in the direction of the bridge, where they expected to find Crabb, to make him a partaker of their joy instead of their flight.

The heavens were dark above, but the pair wandered on; a heaven of unclouded glory was within their bosom, and the glimmer from every half-closed window was to them as the morning dawn of ever-enduring joy.

"Oh, I am so happy!—too happy!" sighed Clementina; "and yet I have scarcely faith in my own feelings. I fear to be awakened from a dream of felicity, or that some new sorrow will find us even in our paradise."

She spoke, and it seemed as if fate were inclined to make her words prophetic. Footsteps were heard behind, as if in rapid pursuit of them. Wilmson stood still as soon as he perceived that the person, whoever he might be, was approaching as fast as the darkness would permit. The pursuer came up, and, panting for breath, could scarcely find voice enough to exclaim—"Fly, fly, leave the town as fast as you can—you have not a moment to lose, in ten minutes you will be arrested,"—and without giving them time to ask a single question, he was gone as quickly as he came.

"What is the meaning of this, in Heaven's name?" said Wilmson, in utter consternation. "Has the king repented already? Can he have learned, that in giving you to me, he has fulfilled my dearest wish on earth? Yes, Clementina, we will hasten: in a few hours we shall be beyond his reach; the warning must have come from the good colonel."

"I cannot hasten," said Clementina, exhausted with conflicting emotions. "My limbs will bear me no further. Oh, my foreboding heart!"

She would have fallen to the ground if Wilmson had not caught her; she was evidently unable to proceed. In despair, he threw her fainting across his shoulder, and hurried on, scarcely conscious of her weight. He had not gone far before he perceived some large dark object under the shadow of the trees—it was a carriage and horses. The driver was already seated on the box, another man flung open the coach door, and, in a hurried whisper, urged Wilmson to speed: "Quick, quick," repeated he, "we dare not stop another moment." Wilmson made no reply, but lifted his unconscious burden upon the seat, and sprang in after her; the door was closed, and the horses set off at full gallop. Clementina's fainting fit lasted so long, that Wilmson forgot all other danger; he would fain have stopped to get some assistance, and, putting his head out of the window, he called aloud, "Crabb, Crabb, I say."

"Ten legions of devils! are you possessed?" replied a harsh voice through the darkness; and the horses flew on with unabated speed. Fortunately, the night air, that blew refreshingly over her face, brought Clementina to herself.

"Where am I?" sighed she,

The voice and caresses of Wilmson reassured her; and some rich Malaga, a bottle of which Wilmson discovered, in feeling about, in one of the coach pockets, did wonders for both. Wilmson thought himself in heaven. Love and liberty were before him; a fair young wife hanging on his breast, and the noble horses flying as if through the air!

This blessed state did not, however, last long. In the interval of the carriage slackening its speed a few minutes, the sound of horses' hoofs was distinctly heard behind them; they were evidently pursued!

"Halt! halt!" roared a terrible voice from behind.

"Forwards!" shouted Wilmson; and again the horses dashed on, over stock and stone, till the noise of pursuit was heard no longer.

On they tore, through village and wood and field, faster and faster, till the road lay through a heavy sand. It was then absolutely necessary to give the horses a few minutes rest; again the sound of pursuit was heard!

"Halt! halt!" cried the voice, still nearer than before.

"On! on!" cried Wilmson in reply. The whip cracked; the panting horses toiled through the heavy sand; a shot whistled past, another entered the carriage. Clementina screamed aloud, and clung yet faster to Wilmson; the horses were once more in full gallop, and the enemy was left behind in the sand.

In a quarter of an hour, they drew up before a lonely inn,—fresh horses were in waiting. Old Crabb had performed his task admirably,—they were off again at full speed—another hour, and they were in safety,—they were beyond the Prussian frontier. The fugitives breathed again; the driver slackened his speed. Worn out by such long and violent emotion, Clementina's head drooped heavily on Wilmson's shoulder, and she fell into a deep sleep; Wilmson gazed for some time in silent rapture on her calm, sweet face, as the moonlight streamed upon it, and then weariness overpowered him also, and he slumbered by her side.

It was already broad daylight, when both were awakened by the stopping of the carriage, and the noise of a violent dispute without,—in which, the hoarse voice of Crabb was distinguished above all, in a tempest of execrations. Apprehending some new danger, Wilmson hastily let down the window, and there stood Crabb, sabre in hand, with the flat of which he was administering, with great diligence and effect, a regular drubbing to the driver of Wilmson's carriage,—and who, to his utter amazement, proved to be no other than the well-remembered gentleman in green and gold—the respectable Mr. Kiek himself!

"You infernal scoundrel,—you scum of the earth!" cried Crabb, without losing a moment at his work; "what have you to say for yourself, that I sha'n't spit your worthless carcass upon the point of my sword? Did I not order you to stop?"

"Let me go," roared Kiek, howling, and writhing in the veteran's iron grasp. "You have no longer any right to meddle with me. We are off the Prussian territory."

"I wish I had lined that scull of yours with lead first," answered Crabb, continuing his corporal's discipline with unabated vigour.

"Hold, hold, Crabb; are you stark mad?" shouted Wilmson, springing from the carriage. "What, in the name of Heaven, has the man done to you, that you use him thus?"

"Done!—thunder and lightning! hasn't he run away with you, and led me a dance all night, as if Satan himself had been at my heels?" said the veteran, eying his enemy like a dog who has just been deprived of his bone.

Kiek's first impulse, when released by Wilmson's appearance, was to get as far as possible from old Crabb; but when he saw to whom he owed his deliverance, his surprise almost caused him to forget his bruises. "He here! and in my master's carriage!" cried he,—more he could not say, for Crabb's ready sabre began to fly about his ears again.

"He; who do you mean by he, you jackanapes? I'll teach you better manners before I have done with you. Do you think you are speaking to one of your own platter-licking, shoe-brushing fellows?"

Wilmson threw himself between the belligerents, and with some difficulty effected a truce. After many questions, and much talking and cursing, the riddle was solved. It appeared that the worthy Mr. Kiek, who, as deputy go-between, had assisted a young man of rank in some intrigue, which was to have ended in the flight of the parties, had been intrusted with the charge of providing a carriage at an appointed time and place, had packed in the wrong pair. Crabb, who was also in waiting with his chaise and pair at a little distance, had heard Wilmson's voice calling for assistance for Clementina, as he passed at full speed, and never doubting but that his young master had been arrested, and was on his way to prison, set off immediately to his rescue. He it was, with his well-paid postilions, who had kept Wilmson's horses at a gallop, and himself in a fright the whole night through.

This explanation completed the measure of Mr. Kiek's despair. "Oh, my confounded ill luck! O Lord, my master, the young baron! what will become of him? and what will become of me?"

"Become of you? why, you'll be hanged, I hope," said Crabb gruffly.

Before Kiek could muster a suitable reply to this compliment, a new shock awaited him, in the apparition of Clementina, who was just then assisted out of the carriage by Wilmson. The unlucky chamberlain stood there doing regular penance for all past sins of omission and commission, when he cast now a fearful glance behind, where the grim veteran stood, eying alternately Kiek's back, and his own sabre, and now a furious look of mingled rage and jealousy at Wilmson and Clementina, who were slowly sauntering towards the inn, before which, the carriages of the pursued and the pursuer had drawn up; and raved and cursed by turns, at the reflection, that to his own act and deed was owing the safety and happiness of the people on earth he most hated. As it was now clear enough to Wilmson, that the warning for immediate flight, and the threat of arrest, had been directed to another individual, he lost no time in despatching an express to Colonel von Escher, in which he gave a circumstantial account of his abduction, by the chamberlain of Privy-councillor Gundling, and offered to return to Potsdam if his flight would not be looked upon as desertion..

In three days, the messenger returned with a formal and honourable discharge from his Prussian majesty's service, and assurance from the colonel that the king had laughed heartily at the blunder that had, so fortunately, saved an honourable family from a disgraceful exposure.

On the receipt of this letter, the young pair, attended by the faithful Crabb, set off, with hearts at peace with all the world, and passing through Germany by easy stages, were welcomed, with open arms and tears of joy, on the shores of the beautiful Lake of Constance.

TRAVELS AND SKETCHES AMONG THE RED INDIANS.

(Concluded from the December No.)

We nearly lost sight of our guide, Mr. Catlin, while led away by those traits of intuitive delicacy, devoted affection, and tenderness of heart, which distinguish the Indian women, degraded as is their social condition ; traits which mark how much more powerful are the genial feelings of nature in the female bosom, than the evil institutions of man. Before returning to Mr. Catlin's personal adventures, we shall pursue this engaging theme a little farther.

The manner in which the Indian women carry their infants, by lashing the baby to a straight board, which is tied to their own backs, while they pursue their customary drudgery, is well known. The mother shows her fondness and her innocent vanity by ornamenting the bandages of this singular sort of cradle with beautiful embroidery of porcupine quills, and by fastening trinkets and little bells to it to amuse the child. Another custom mentioned by Mr. Catlin, and illustrative of the warm and tender affections of the Indian women, is less known than the above. This is that of the Mourning Cradle.

If the infant dies during the time that is allotted to it to be carried in this cradle, it is buried, and the disconsolate mother fills the cradle with black quills and feathers, in the parts which the child's body had occupied, and in this way carries it around with her wherever she goes for a year or more, with as much care as if her infant were alive and in it; and she often lays or stands it leaning against the side of the wigwam, where she is all day engaged in her needlework, and chatting and talking to it as familiarly and affectionately as if it were her loved infant, instead of its shell, that she was talking to. So lasting and so strong is the affection of these women for the lost child, that it matters not how heavy or cruel their load, or how rugged the route they have to pass over, they will faithfully carry this, and carefully from day to day, and even more strictly perform their duties to it, than if the child were alive and in it.

In the little toy that I have mentioned, and which is supended before the child's face, is carefully and superstitiously preserved the umbilicus, which is always secured at the time of its birth, and being rolled up into a little wad of the size of a pea, and dried, it is enclosed in the centre of this little bag, and placed before the child's face, as its protector and its security for "good luck" and long life.

This is almost the child's caul of the English peasantry.

The parental affections seem, indeed, as strong and as refined among these people, as in highly civilized life. While Mr. Catlin was among the Sioux, he painted the portrait of a beautiful girl, the daughter of a famous chief, named Black Rock. The girl was much esteemed by her tribe for her modesty and beauty. When sitting for her portrait,

She was beautifully dressed in skins, ornamented profusely with brass buttons and beads. Her hair was plaited, her ears supported a great profusion of curious beads—and over her other dress she wore a handsomely garnished buffalo robe.

So highly was the Black Rock esteemed, (as I have before mentioned,) and his beautiful daughter admired and respected by the Traders, that Mr. M'Kenzie employed me to make him copies of their two portraits, which he has hung up in Mr. Laidlaw's trading-house, as valued ornaments and keepsakes.

The end of this story, which is related in a footnote, written some years after the date of the occurrence, is exceedingly affecting :—

Several years after I left the Sioux country, I saw Messrs. Chardon and Piquot, two of the traders from that country, who recently had left it, and told me in St. Louis, whilst looking at the portrait of this girl, that while staying in Mr. Laidlaw's Fort, the chief, Black Rock, entered the room suddenly where the portrait of his daughter was hanging on the wall, and pointing to it with a heavy heart, told Mr. Laidlaw, that whilst his band was out on the prairies, where they had been for several months "making meat," his daughter had died, and was there buried. "My heart is glad again," said he, "when I see her here alive ; and I want the one the medicine-man made of her, which is now before me, that I can see her, and talk to her. My band are all in mourning for her ; and at the gate of your Fort, which I have just passed, are ten horses for you, and Ee-ah-sa-pa's wigwam, which you know is the best one in the Sioux nation. I wish you to take down my daughter and give her to me." Mr. Laidlaw, seeing the unusually liberal price that this nobleman was willing to pay for a portrait, and the true grief that he expressed for the loss of his child, had not the heart to abuse such noble feeling ; and taking the painting from the wall, placed it into his hands ; telling him that it of right belonged to him, and that his horses and wigwam he must take back and keep them, to mend, as far as possible, his liberal heart, which was broken by the loss of his only daughter.

Mr. Catlin, some years after he had travelled among the Sioux, accompanied, as we shall afterwards see, the detachment of the American army which was sent upon an amicable expedition, to the warlike Camanchees and Pawnees. The commander of the armament, Colonel Dodge, carried with him two young Indian girls, who had been made prisoners by the Osages, and whom he restored to their tribe, in token of friendly feeling [illegible] the condition of a white boy being given up to [illegible], who was known to be in their village. The boy was the son of Judge White, a farmer living on the frontier, who had been killed by the Indians in a hunting excursion some months before. When the boy, after considerable difficulty, was brought in—

He looked around and exclaimed with some surprise, "What! are there white men here?" to which Colonel Dodge replied, and asked his name; and he promptly answered, "my name is Matthew Wright Martin." He was then received into Colonel Dodge's arms; and an order was immediately given for the Pawnee and Kiowa girls to be brought forward; they were in a few minutes brought into the council-house, when they were at once recognised by their friends and relatives, who embraced them with the most extravagant expressions of joy and satisfaction. The heart of the venerable old chief was melted at this evidence of white man's friendship, and he rose upon his feet, and taking Colonel Dodge in his arms, and placing his left cheek against the left cheek of the Colonel, held him for some minutes without saying a word, whilst tears were flowing from his eyes. He then embraced each officer in turn, in the same silent and affectionate manner; which form took half an hour or more, before it was completed.

From this moment the council, which before had been a very grave and uncertain one, took a pleasing and friendly turn. And this excellent old man ordered the women to supply the dragoons with something to eat, as they were hungry.

The little encampment, which heretofore was in a woeful condition, having eaten up their last rations twelve hours before, were now gladdened by the approach of a number of women, who brought their "back loads" of dried buffalo meat and green corn, and threw it down amongst them. This seemed almost like a providential deliverance, for the country between here and the Camanchees, was entirely destitute of game, and our last provisions were consumed.

Among the Pawnees, many of the young women, though very dark, are pretty both in features and shape. The women of all the tribes have soft, sweet voices, a gentle laugh, and delicately formed feet and hands,—the imagined characteristic of the highest born, among the most highly civilized. Many of our readers must remember many instances of the sweet and womanly nature of the degraded squaws, that are related in the travels of Lewis and Clarke on the Missouri, and across to the Pacific.

But to return:—We left Mr. Catlin at his first station, the Fort, at the mouth of the Yellow Stone River, painting chiefs, sachems, and braves; admiring Indian manners and scenery; and, by purchases of weapons and dresses, laying the foundation of his splendid and unique gallery. When this place was exhausted, he launched his canoe on the Missouri, in company with two trappers,—famous fellows both,—whom he had engaged for the voyage, and descended the river two hundred miles to the Mandan village. The voyage, abounding in delightful sylvan adventures and moving incidents, occupied a considerable time. We shall follow it a little way, though it hardly equals in interest the solitary voyages and excursions afterwards made by the artist on other rivers, and in yet frailer craft.

When I had completed my rambles and my sketches in those regions, and Ba'tiste and Bogard had taken their last spree, and fought their last battles, and forgotten them in the final and affectionate embrace and farewell (all of which are habitual with these game-fellows, when settling up their long-standing accounts with their fellow-trappers of the mountain streams;) and after Mr. M'Kenzie had procured for me a snug little craft, that was to waft us down the mighty torrent; we launched off one fine morning, taking our leave of the Fort, and the friends within it; and also, for ever, of the beautiful green fields, and hills, and dales, and prairie bluffs, that encompass the enchanting shores of the Yellow Stone.

Our canoe, which was made of green timber, was heavy and awkward; but our course being with the current, promised us a fair and successful voyage. Ammunition was laid in in abundance—a good stock of dried buffalo tongues—a dozen or two of beavers' tails—and a good supply of pemican. Bogard and Ba'tiste occupied the middle and bow, with their paddles in their hands; and I took my seat in the stern of the boat, at the steering oar. Our larder was as I have said; and added to that, some few pounds of fresh buffalo meat.

Besides which, and ourselves, our little craft carried several packs of Indian dresses and other articles, which I had purchased of the Indians; and also my canvass and easel, and our culinary articles, which were few and simple; consisting of three tin cups, a coffee-pot—one plate—a frying pan—and a tin kettle.

Thus fitted out and embarked, we swept off at a rapid rate under the shouts of the savages, and the cheers of our friends, who lined the banks as we gradually lost sight of them, and turned our eyes towards St. Louis, which was 2000 miles below us, with nought intervening, save the wide-spread and wild regions, inhabited by the roaming savage.

At the end of our first day's journey, we found ourselves handily encamping with several thousand Assinneboins, who had pitched their tents upon the bank of the river, and received us with every mark of esteem and friendship.

Of the village of Assinneboins we took leave on the following morning, and rapidly made our way down the river, the rate of the current being four or five miles per hour; through one continued series of picturesque grass-covered bluffs and knolls, which everywhere had the appearance of an old and highly-cultivated country, with houses and fences removed.

There is, much of the way, on one side or the other, a bold and abrupt precipice of three or four hundred feet in elevation, presenting itself in an exceedingly rough and picturesque form, to the shore of the river; sloping down from the summit level of the prairies above, which sweep off from the brink of the precipice, almost level, to an unknown distance.

It is along the rugged and wild fronts of these cliffs, whose sides are generally formed of hard clay, that the mountain-sheep dwell, and are often discovered in great numbers. Their habits are much like those of the goat; and in every respect they are like that animal, except in the horns, which resemble those of the ram; sometimes making two entire circles in their coil; and at the roots, each horn is, in some instances, from five to six inches in breadth.

On the second day of our voyage we discovered a number of these animals skipping along the sides of the precipice. . . . . Bogard, who was an old hunter, and well acquainted with these creatures, shouldered his rifle, and said to me—"the game is up; and you now see the use of those big horns; when they fall by accident, or find it necessary to quit their foot-hold in the crevice, they fall upon their head at a great distance unharmed, even though it should be on the solid rock."

Being on shore, and our canoe landed secure, we whiled away the greater part of this day amongst the wild and ragged cliffs, into which we had entered; and a part of our labours were vainly spent in the pursuit of a war-eagle. . . . Our day's loitering brought us through many a wild scene; occasionally across the tracks of the grizzly bear, and, in sight merely of a band of buffaloes; "which got the wind of us," and were out of the way, leaving us to return to our canoe at night, with a mere speck of good luck. Just before we reached the river, I heard the crack of a rifle, and in a few moments Bogard came in sight, and threw down from his shoulders a fine antelope; which added to our larder, and we were ready to proceed. We embarked and travelled until nightfall, when we encamped on a beautiful little prairie at the base of a series of grass-covered bluffs; and the next morning cooked our breakfast and ate it, and rowed on until late in the afternoon; when we stopped at the base of some huge clay bluffs, forming one of the most curious and romantic scenes imaginable. At this spot the river expands itself into the appearance somewhat of a beautiful lake; and in the midst of it, and on and about its sand-bars, floated and stood, hundreds and thousands of white swans and pelicans.

Though the scene in front of our encampment at this place was placid and beautiful; with its flowing water —its wild-fowl—and its almost endless variety of gracefully sloping hills and green prairies in the distance; yet it was not less wild and picturesque in our rear, where the rugged and various coloured bluffs were grouped in all the wildest fancies and rudeness of Nature's accidental varieties.

The whole country behind us seemed to have been dug and thrown up into huge piles, as if some giant mason had been there mixing his mortar and paints, and throwing together his rude models for some sublime structure of a colossal city;—with its walls—its domes—its ramparts—its huge portioos and galleries—its castles—its fosses and ditches;—and in the midst of his progress, he had abandoned his works to the destroying hand of time, which had already done much to tumble them down, and deface their noble structure; by jostling them together, with all their vivid colours, into an unsystematic and unintelligible mass of sublime ruins.

We must say no more of these adventures, lest we should be accessary to boys and lads running away from desk, school, and college, to become hunters and fishers in the Far West. Since first reading Robinson Crusoe, they can have been under no greater temptation to burst their trammels, and realize the free and daring life of the wilds. The scenery may be less dangerous, save to sketchers; but as there is no end to its picturesque beauty, choice is bewildered.

On the fifth day of their voyage down the river, Mr. Catlin was once more at the Grand Detour—or in Yankee nomenclature, the Big Bend. One of the most singular scenes on the river is the bluffs here, which are named the Grand Dome and the Three Domes; but they can only be understood by looking at the Plates, Numbers 43 and 44, in the original work; the whole work, indeed, is, as we have noticed, but a catalogue raisonée to the gallery.

Mr. Catlin seems to have been hospitably entertained by the traders wherever he met with them, or visited their stations, and to have been treated with great liberality by whoever, among public functionaries, had the power to forward his views. When he descended to the Mandan village, Mr. Kipp, whom we formerly mentioned, at once ordered his luggage to be carried to his own quarters, and his canoe to be taken care of.

The Mandans, whom we also mentioned in describing the native astonishment and awe at painting, are—or, alas! short as is the intervening time, we must now say were—a highly interesting tribe. Mr. Catlin has a theory of their origin, which we shall afterwards notice, and which is somewhat borne out by peculiar circumstances connected with them. The Mandans were then located on the west bank of the Missouri, about two hundred miles below the mouth of the Yellow Stone River, and eighteen hundred above St. Louis. The clan then consisted of about two thousand souls, living in two villages, about a mile apart.

In his letter written on the spot, our traveller says—

Their present villages are beautifully located, and judiciously also, for defence against the assaults of their enemies. The site of the lower (or principal) town, in particular, is one of the most beautiful and pleasing that can be seen in the world, and even more beautiful than imagination could ever create. In the very midst of an extensive valley (embraced within a thousand graceful swells and parapets or mounds of interminable green, changing to blue, as they vanish in the distance) is built the city, or principal town of the Mandans. On an extensive plain (which is covered with a geeen turf, as well as the hills and dales, as far as the eye can possibly range, without tree or bush to be seen) are to be seen rising from the ground, and towards the heavens, domes—(not "of gold," but) of dirt—and the thousand spears (not "spires") and scalp-poles, &c. &c., of the semi-subterraneous village of the hospitable and gentlemanly Mandans.

These people formerly (and within the recollection of many of their oldest men) lived fifteen or twenty miles farther down the river, in ten contiguous villages; the marks or ruins of which are yet plainly to be seen. At that period, it is evident, as well from the number of lodges which their villages contained, as from their traditions, that their numbers were much greater than at the present day.

There are other, and very interesting, traditions and historical facts relative to a still prior location and condition of these people.

The Mandans were comparatively a mild people, though probably their weakness from diminished numbers had taught them forbearance. Their women raised a good deal of Indian corn, a rare thing among the wilder tribes. The ground on which their village is situated is admirably adapted for defence. It is on the top of an almost perpendicular and angular rocky bank, forty or fifty feet above the bed of the river, so that only one side requires artificial defences.

The Mandans are undoubtedly secure in their villages from the attacks of any Indian nation, and have nothing to fear, except when they meet their enemy on the prairie. Their village has a most novel appearance to the eye of a stranger; their lodges are closely grouped together, leaving but just room enough for walking and riding between them; and appear from without to be built entirely of dirt; but one is surprised when he enters them, to see the neatness, comfort, and spacious dimensions of these earth-covered dwellings. They all have a circular form, and are from forty to sixty feet in diameter. . . . . .

. The floors of these dwellings are of earth, but so hardened by use, and swept so clean, and tracked by bare and moccassined feet, that they have almost a polish, and would scarcely soil the whitest linen. In the centre, and immediately under the sky-light, is the fire-place—a hole of four or five feet in diameter, of a circular form, sunk a foot or more below the surface, and curbed around with stone. Over the fire-place, and suspended from the apex of diverging props or poles, is generally seen the pot or kettle, filled with buffalo meat; and around it are the family, reclining in all the most picturesque attitudes and groups, resting on their buffalo-robes and beautiful mats of rushes.

A great many individuals lived in each of these lodges—the families being all patriarchal. The walls of them are decorated with the weapons, armour, and accoutrements of the men, hung on pegs.

This arrangement of beds, of arms, &c., combining the most vivid display and arrangement of colours, of furs, of trinkets—of barbed and glistening points and steel—of mysteries and hocus pocus, together with the sombre and smoked colour of the roof and sides of the lodge; and the wild, and rude and red—the graceful (though uncivil) conversational, garrulous, story-telling and happy, though ignorant and untutored groups, that are smoking their pipes—wooing their sweethearts, and embracing their little ones about their peaceful and endeared fire-sides; together with their pots and kettles, spoons, and other culinary articles of their own manufacture, around them; present altogether, one of the most picturesque scenes to the eye of a stranger, that can be possibly seen; and far more wild and vivid than could ever be imagined.

Reader, I said these people were garrulous, story-telling, and happy; this is true, and literally so; and it belongs to me to establish the fact, and correct the error which seems to have gone forth to the world on this subject.

Mr. Catlin here combats the ordinary notion of the Red Indians being taciturn, sullen, and unsocial. He maintains that they are fond of good cheer; that they enjoy fun; and love to gossip, and laugh, and joke round the wigwam fire, much like civilized circles in similar situations. Even the women, before "their lot is on them," are gay and sportive creatures. One day, Mr. Catlin, in the course of his wanderings, meant to pay a visit to the upper village of the Minatarees, another tribe on the Missouri; and, for this purpose, had to cross the river, which he did in a skin-canoe, or coracle, in which an old chief ordered one of his women to ferry the stranger over, with his attendants, Ba'tiste and Bogard. But he must tell the adventure with the laughing water-nymphs himself:—

A skin-canoe (more familiarly called in this country a bull-boat) made in the form of a large tub, of a buffalo's skin, stretched on a frame of willow boughs, she carried to the water's edge; and placing it in the water, made signs for us three to get into it. When we were in, and seated flat on its bottom, with scarce room in anyway to adjust our legs and our feet, (as we sat necessarily facing each other,) she stepped before the boat, and pulling it along, waded towards the deeper water, with her back towards us, carefully with the other hand attending to her dress, which seemed to be but a light slip, and floating upon the surface until the water was above her waist, when it was instantly turned off, over her head, and thrown ashore; and she boldly plunged forward, swimming and drawing the boat with one hand, which she did with apparent ease. In this manner we were conveyed to the middle of the stream, where we were soon surrounded by a dozen or more beautiful girls, from twelve to fifteen and eighteen years of age, who were at that time bathing on the opposite shore.

They all swam in a bold and graceful manner, and as confidently as so many otters or beavers; and gathering around us, with their long black hair floating about on the water, whilst their faces were glowing with jokes and fun, which they were cracking about us, and which we could not understand.

In the midst of this delightful little aquatic group, we three sat in our little skin-bound tub, (like the "three wise men of Gotham, who went to sea in a bowl," &c.,) floating along down the current, losing sight and all thoughts of the shore, which was equidistant from us on either side; whilst we were amusing ourselves with the playfulness of these dear little creatures, who were floating about under the clear blue water, catching their hands on to the sides of our boat; occasionally raising one-half of their bodies out of the water, and sinking again, like so many mermaids.

In the midst of this bewildering and tantalizing entertainment, in which poor Ba'tiste and Bogard, as well as myself, were all taking infinite pleasure, and which we supposed was all intended for our especial amusement, we found ourselves suddenly in the delightful dilemma of floating down the current in the middle of the river; and of being turned round and round to the excessive amusement of the villagers, who were laughing at us from the shore, as well as these little tyros, whose delicate hands were besetting our tub on all sides; and for an escape from whom, or for fending off, we had neither an oar or anything else that we could wield in self-defence, or for self-preservation. In this awkward predicament, our feelings of excessive admiration were immediately changed to those of exceeding vexation, as we now learned that they had peremptorily discharged from her occupation our fair conductress, who had undertaken to ferry us safely across the river; and had also very ingeniously laid their plans, of which we had been ignorant until the present moment, to extort from us in this way some little evidences of our liberality, which, in fact, it was impossible to refuse them, after so liberal and bewitching an exhibition on their part, as well as from the imperative obligation which the awkwardness of our situation had laid us under. I had some awls in my pockets, which I presented to them, and also a few strings of beautiful beads, which I placed over their delicate necks as they raised them out of the water by the side of our boat; after which they all joined in conducting our craft to the shore, by swimming by the sides of, and behind it, pushing it along in the direction where they designed to land it, until the water became so shallow, that their feet were upon the bottom, when they waded along with great coyness, dragging us towards the shore, as long as their bodies, in a crouching position, could possibly be half concealed under the water, when they gave our boat the last push for the shore, and, raising a loud and exulting laugh, plunged back again into the river; leaving us the only alternative of sitting still where we were, or of stepping out into the water at half leg deep, and of wading to the shore, which we at once did, and soon escaped from the view of our little tormentors, and the numerous lookers-on, on our way to the upper village, which I have before mentioned.

The Mandans had many peculiar customs, and some arts which were not known to the other Western tribes, particularly in making a rude kind of pottery. They were termed by the traders, "the polite and friendly Mandans;" and a different origin is assigned to them from that of any other Indian nation. They were, in several points, rather farther advanced in civilisation. Mr. Catlin says:—

There are a great many of these people whose complexions appear as light as half-breeds; and amongst the women particularly, there are many whose skins are almost white, with the most pleasing symmetry and proportion of features; with hazel, with gray, and with blue eyes,—with mildness and sweetness of expression, and excessive modesty of demeanour, which render them exceedingly pleasing and beautiful.

Why this diversity of complexion I cannot tell, nor can they themselves account for it. Their traditions, so far as I have yet learned them, afford us no information of their having had any knowledge of white men before the visit of Lewis and Clarke, made to their village thirty-three years ago. Since that time there have been but very few visits from white men to this place, and surely not enough to have changed the complexions and the customs of a nation. And I recollect perfectly well that Governor Clarke told me, before I started for this place, that I would find the Mandans a strange people and half white.

The diversity in the colour of hair is also equally as great as that in the complexion; for in a numerous group of these people, (and more particularly amongst the females, who never take pains to change its natural colour, as the men often do,) there may be seen every shade and colour of hair that can be seen in our own country, with the exception of red or auburn, which is not to be found.

And there is yet one more strange and unaccountable peculiarity, which can probably be seen nowhere else on earth; nor on any rational grounds accounted for,—other than it is a freak or order of Nature, for which she has not seen fit to assign a reason. There are very many of both sexes, and of every age, from infancy to manhood and old age, with hair of a bright silvery gray; and in some instances almost perfectly white. . . . . .

To repeat what I have said before, the Mandans are a pleasing and friendly race of people, of whom it is proverbial amongst the Traders and all who ever have known them, that their treatment of white men in their country has been friendly and kind ever since their first acquaintance with them—they have ever met and received them, on the prairie or in their villages, with hospitality and honour.

They are handsome, straight, and elegant in their forms—not tall, but quick and graceful; easy and polite in their manners, neat in their persons, and beautifully clad. When I say "neat in person and beautifully clad," however, I do not intend my readers to understand that such is the case with them all; for among them and most other tribes, as with the enlightened world, there are different grades of society—those who care but little for their personal appearance, and those who take great pains to please themselves and their friends. Amongst this class of personages, such as chiefs and braves, or warriors of distinction, and their families, and dandies or exquisites, (a class of beings of whom I shall take due time to speak in a future Letter,) the strictest regard to decency, and cleanliness and elegance of dress is observed; and there are few people, perhaps, who take more pains to keep their persons neat and cleanly than they do.

At the distance of half a mile or so above the village is the customary place where the women and girls resort every morning in the summer months to bathe in the river. To this spot they repair by hundreds, every morning at sunrise, where, on a beautiful beach, they can be seen running and glistening in the sun, whilst they are playing their innocent gambols and leaping, into the stream. They all learn to swim well, and the poorest swimmer amongst them will dash fearlessly into the boiling and eddying current of the Missouri, and cross it with perfect ease. At the distance of a quarter of a mile back from the river, extends a terrace or elevated prairie, running north from the village, and forming a kind of semicircle around this bathing-place; and on this terrace, which is some twenty or thirty feet higher than the meadow between it and the river, are stationed every morning several sentinels, with their bows and arrows in hand, to guard and protect this sacred ground from the approach of boys or men from any direction.

At a little distance below the village, also, is the place where the men and boys go to bathe and learn to swim. After this morning ablution, they return to their village, wipe their limbs dry, and use a profusion of bear's grease through their hair and over their bodies.

The Mandans frequently used the vapour bath; which is by several tribes employed in the cure of disease. We have noticed above their elegant and fanciful costumes; and are enabled to see more of their private life at a tête-à-tête dinner, to which their principal chief, "a high-minded and gallant warrior, as well as a polite and polished gentleman," carried the artist, who had just finished his portrait:—

The simple feast which was spread before us consisted of three dishes only; two of which were served in wooden bowls, and the third in an earthen vessel of their own manufacture, somewhat in shape of a bread-tray in our own country. This last contained a quantity of pemican and marrow-fat; and one of the former held a fine brace of buffalo ribs, delightfully roasted; and the other was filled with a kind of paste or pudding, made of the flour of the "pomme blanche," as the French call it, a delicious turnip of the prairie, finely flavoured with the buffalo berries, which are collected in great quantities in this country, and used with divers dishes in cooking, as we in civilized countries use dried currants, which they very much resemble.

A handsome pipe and a tobacco-pouch made of the otter skin, filled with k'nick-k'neck, (Indian tobacco,) laid by the side of the feast; and when we were seated, mine host took up his pipe, and deliberately filled it; and instead of lighting it by the fire, which he could easily have done, he drew from his pouch his flint and steel, and raised a spark with which he kindled it. He drew a few strong whiffs through it, and presented the stem of it to my mouth, through which I drew a whiff or two while he held the stem in his hands. This done, he laid down the pipe, and drawing his knife from his belt, cut off a very small piece of the meat from the ribs, and pronouncing the words "Ho-pe-ne-chee wa-pashee," (meaning a medicine sacrifice,) threw it into the fire.

He then (by signals) requested me to eat, and I commenced, after drawing out from my belt my knife (which it is supposed that every man in this country carries about him, for at an Indian feast a knife is never offered to a guest.) Reader, be not astonished that I sat and ate my dinner alone, for such is the custom of this strange land. . . . . .

The dish of "pemican and marrow-fat," of which I spoke, was thus:—The first, an article of food used throughout this country, as familiarly as we use bread in the civilized world. It is made of buffalo meat dried very hard, and afterwards pounded in a large wooden mortar until it is made nearly as fine as saw-dust, then packed in this dry state in bladders or sacks of skin, and is easily carried to any part of the world in good order. "Marrow-fat" is collected by the Indians from the buffalo bones which they break to pieces, yielding a prodigious quantity of marrow, which is boiled out and put into buffalo bladders which have been distended; and after it cools, becomes quite hard like tallow, and has the appearance, and very nearly the flavour, of the richest yellow butter. . . . . .

I spoke also of the earthen dishes or bowls in which these viands were served out; they are a familiar part of the culinary furniture of every Mandan lodge, and are manufactured by the women of this tribe in great quantities, and modelled into a thousand forms and tastes. They are made by the hands of the women, from a tough black clay, and baked in kilns which are made for the purpose, and are nearly equal in hardness to our own manufacture of pottery; though they have not yet got the art of glazing, which would be to them a most valuable secret. They make them so strong and serviceable, however, that they hang them over the fire as we do our iron pots, and boil their meat in them with perfect success. I have seen some few specimens of such manufacture, which have been dug up in Indian mounds and tombs in the southern and middle states placed in our Eastern museum and looked upon as a great wonder, when here this novelty is at once done away with, and the whole mystery; where women can be seen handling and using them by hundreds, and they can be seen every day in the summer also, moulding them into many fanciful forms, and passing them through the kiln where they are hardened.

Whilst sitting at this feast, the wigwam was as silent as death, although we were not alone in it. This chief, like most others, had a plurality of wives, and all of them (some six or seven) were seated around the sides of the lodge, upon robes or mats placed upon the ground and not allowed to speak, though they were in readiness to obey his orders and commands, which were uniformly given by signs-manual, and executed in the neatest and most silent manner.

When I arose to return, the pipe through which we had smoked was presented to me; and the robe on which I had sat, he gracefully raised by the corners and tendered it to me, explaining by signs that the paintings which were on it were the representations of the battles of his life, where he had fought and killed with his own hand fourteen of his enemies; that he had been two weeks engaged in painting it for me, and that he had invited me here on this occasion to present it to me.

The story delineated by this chief on the robe which he presented to his guest, affords a remarkable illustration of Indian vindictiveness, and thirst of revenge. We commend it to the attention of those who like to study human nature in all its phases.

While residing in the Mandan village, Mr. Catlin had many other good opportunities of improving his knowledge of the customs of the Indians. He witnessed their games, and saw several of their solemn dances performed.

The wild vicissitudes of savage life are strikingly exemplified in an adventure which followed one of these dances—the Buffalo Dance—the object of which is, "to make the buffaloes come." It is told thus—

The day before yesterday, which, though it commenced in joy and thanksgiving to the Great Spirit for the signal success which had attended their several days of dancing and supplication, ended in a calamity which threw the village of the Mandans into mourning and repentant tears, and that at a time of scarcity and great distress. The signal was given into the village on that morning from the top of a distant bluff, that a band of buffaloes were in sight, though at a considerable distance off, and every heart beat with joy, and every eye watered and glistened with gladness.

The dance had lasted some three or four days, and now, instead of the doleful tap of the drum and the begging chants of the dancers, the stamping of horses was heard as they were led and galloped through the village—young men were throwing off their robes and their shirts, were seen snatching a handful of arrows from their quivers, and stringing their sinewy bows, glancing their eyes and their smiles at their sweethearts, and mounting their ponies. . . . . .

A few minutes there had been of bustle and boasting, whilst bows were twanging and spears were polishing by rubbing their blades into the ground—every face and every eye was filled with joy and gladness—horses were pawing and snuffing in fury for the outset, when Louison Frénié, an interpreter of the Fur Company, galloped through the village with his rifle in his hand and his powder-horn at his side; his head and waist were bandaged with handkerchiefs, and his shirt sleeves rolled up to his shoulders—the hunter's yell issued from his lips and was repeated through the village; he flew to the bluffs, and behind him and over the graceful swells of the prairie, galloped the emulous youths, whose hearts were beating high and quick for the onset.

In the village, where hunger had reigned, and starvation was almost ready to look them in the face, all was instantly turned to joy and gladness. The chiefs and doctors who had been for some days dealing out minimum rations to the community from the public crib, now spread before their subjects the contents of their own private caches, and the last of everything that could be mustered, that they might eat a thanksgiving to the Great Spirit for his goodness in sending them a supply of buffalo meat. A general carouse of banqueting ensued, which occupied the greater part of the day; and their hidden stores which might have fed an emergency for several weeks, were pretty nearly used up on the occasion—bones were half picked, and dishes half emptied and then handed to the dogs. I was not forgotten neither, in the general surfeit; several large and generous wooden bowls of pemican and other palatable food were sent to my painting-room, and I received them in this time of scarcity with great pleasure.

After this general indulgence was over, and the dogs had licked the dishes, their usual games and amusements ensued—and hilarity, and mirth, and joy took possession of, and reigned in, every nook and corner of the village. In the midst of this, screams and shrieks were heard! and echoed everywhere. Women and children scrambled to the tops of their wigwams, with their eyes and their hands stretched in agonizing earnestness to the prairie, whilst blackened warriors ran furiously through every winding maze of the village, and issuing their jarring gutturals of vengeance, as they snatched their deadly weapons from their lodges, and struck the reddened post as they furiously passed it by! Two of their hunters were bending their course down the sides of the bluff towards the village, and another broke suddenly out of a deep ravine, and yet another was seen dashing over and down the green hills, and all were goading on their horses at full speed! and then came another, and another, and all entered the village amid shouts and groans of the villagers who crowded around them. The story was told in their looks, for one was bleeding, and the blood that flowed from his naked breast had crimsoned his milk white steed as it had dripped over him; another grasped in his left hand a scalp that was reeking in blood—and in the other his whip—another grasped nothing, save the reins in one hand and the mane of the horse in the other, having thrown his bow and his arrows away, and trusted to the fleetness of his horse for his safety; yet the story was audibly told, and the fatal tragedy recited in irregular and almost suffocating ejaculations—the names of the dead were in turns pronounced, and screams and shrieks burst forth at their recital—murmurs and groans ran through the village, and this happy little community were in a moment smitten with sorrow and distraction.

Their proud band of hunters who had started full of glee and mirth in the morning, had been surrounded by their enemy, the Sioux, and eight of them killed. The Sioux, who had probably reconnoitred their village during the night, and ascertained that they were dancing for buffaloes, laid a stratagem to entrap them in the following manner:—Some six or eight of them appeared the next morning (on a distant bluff, in sight of their sentinel) under the skins of buffaloes, imitating the movements of those animals whilst grazing; and being discovered by the sentinel, the intelligence was telegraphed to the village, which brought out their hunters as I have described. The masked buffaloes were seen grazing on the top of a high bluff, and when the hunters had approached within half a mile or so of them, they suddenly disappeared over the hill. Louison Frénié, who was leading the little band of hunters, became at that moment suspicious of so strange a movement, and came to a halt.

"Look!" (said a Mandan, pointing to a little ravine to the right, and at the foot of the hill, from which suddenly broke some forty or fifty furious Sioux, on fleet horses and under full whip, who were rushing upon them;) they wheeled, and in front of them came another band more furious from the other side of the hill! they started for home (poor fellows), and strained every nerve; but the Sioux were too fleet for them; and every now and then, the whizzing arrow and the lance were heard to rip the flesh of their naked backs, and a grunt and a groan, as they tumbled from their horses. Several miles were run in this desperate race; and Frénié got home, and several of the Mandans, though eight of them were killed and scalped by the way.

So ended that day and the hunt; but many a day and sad, will last the grief of those whose hearts were broken on that unlucky occasion.

Medicine men abounded among the Mandans, and of these one order was the Rain-Makers, and another the Rain-Stoppers; drought being in some seasons, as fatal to the corn crops of the squaws and girls, as in other years is too much moisture rich herbage that was under their feet, but, with deep-drawn sighs, their necks were loftily curved, and their eyes widely stretched over the landscape that was beneath us. From this elevated spot, the horizon was bounded all around us by mountain streaks of blue, softening into azure as they vanished, and the pictured vales that intermediate lay, were deepening into green as the eye was returning from its roamings. Beneath us, and winding through the waving landscape, was seen with peculiar effect, the "bold dragoons," marching in beautiful order, forming a train of a mile in length. Baggage-wagons and Indians (engagés) helped to lengthen the procession. From the point where we stood, the line was seen in miniature; and the undulating hills over which it was bending its way, gave it the appearance of a huge black snake, gracefully gliding over a rich carpet of green.

This picturesque country of 200 miles, over which we have passed, belongs to the Creeks and Choctaws, and affords one of the richest and most desirable countries in the world for agricultural pursuits.

Scarcely a day has passed, in which we have not crossed oak ridges, of several miles in breadth, with a sandy soil and scattering timber; where the ground was almost literally covered with vines, producing the greatest profusion of delicious grapes, of five-eighths of an inch in diameter, and hanging in such endless clusters, as justly to entitle this singular and solitary wilderness to the style of a vineyard, (and ready for the vintage,) for many miles together.

An attack from the Indians was daily expected, and the troops were constantly on their guard; but they advanced unopposed to the Camanchee village; though not without sundry false alarms, and suffering a good deal of hardship before they found the hordes of which they had come so far in quest. At last a war party was seen at a distance, which turned out to be Camanchees on the out-look for their red enemies. The encounter was fairly met on both sides.

The regiment was called to a halt, and the requisite preparations made and orders issued, we advanced in a direct line towards them until we had approached to within two or three miles of them, when they suddenly disappeared over the hill, and soon after showed themselves on another mound farther off and in a different direction. The course of the regiment was then changed, and another advance towards them was commenced, and as before, they disappeared and showed themselves in another direction. After several such efforts which proved ineffectual, Col. Dodge ordered the command to halt, while he rode forward with a few of his staff, and an ensign carrying a white flag. I joined this advance, and the Indians stood their ground until we had come within half a mile of them, and could distinctly observe all their numbers and movements. We then came to a halt, and the white flag was sent a little in advance, and waved as a signal for them to approach; at which one of their party galloped out in advance of the war-party, on a milk-white horse, carrying a piece of white buffalo skin on the point of his long lance, in reply to our flag.

This moment was the commencement of one of the most thrilling and beautiful scenes I ever witnessed. All eyes, both from his own party and ours, were fixed upon the manœuvres of this gallant little fellow,* and he well knew it.

The distance between the two parties was perhaps half a mile, and that a beautiful and gently sloping prairie; over which he was for the space of a quarter of an hour, reining and spurring his maddened horse, and gradually approaching us by tacking to the right and the left, like a vessel beating against the wind. He at length came prancing and leaping along till he met the flag of the regiment, when he leaned his spear for a moment against it, looking the bearer full in the face, when he wheeled his horse, and dashed up to Col. Dodge, with his extended hand, which was instantly grasped and shaken. We all had him by the hand in a moment, and the rest of the party seeing him received in this friendly manner, instead of being sacrificed, as they undoubtedly expected, started under "full whip" in a direct line towards us, and in a moment gathered, like a black cloud, around us! The regiment then moved up in regular order, and a general shake of the hand ensued, which was accomplished by each warrior riding along the ranks, and shaking the hand of every one as he passed. This necessary form took up considerable time, and during the whole operation, my eyes were fixed upon the gallant and wonderful appearance of the little fellow who bore us the white flag on the point of his lance. He rode a fine and spirited wild horse, which was as white as the drifted snow, with an exuberant mane, and its long and bushy tail sweeping the ground. In his hand he tightly drew the reins upon a heavy Spanish bit, and at every jump, plunged into the animal's sides, till they were in a gore of blood, a huge pair of spurs, plundered, no doubt, from the Spaniards in their border wars, which are continually waged on the Mexican frontiers. The eyes of this noble little steed seemed to be squeezed out of its head; and its fright and its agitation had brought out upon its skin a perspiration that was fretted into a white foam and lather. The warrior's quiver was slung on the warrior's back, and his bow grasped in his left hand, ready for instant use, if called for. His shield was on his arm; and across his thigh, in a beautiful cover of buckskin, his gun was slung—and in his right hand his lance of fourteen feet in length.

Thus armed and equipped was this dashing cavalier; and nearly in the same manner, all the rest of the party; and very many of them leading an extra horse, which we soon learned was the favourite war-horse; and from which circumstances altogether, we soon understood that they were a war-party in search of their enemy.

After a shake of the hand, we dismounted, and the pipe was lit, and passed around. And then a "talk" was held, in which we were aided by a Spaniard we luckily had with us, who could converse with one of the Camanchees, who spoke some Spanish.

Colonel Dodge explained to them the friendly motives with which we were penetrating their country—that we were sent by the President to reach their villages—to see the chiefs of the Camanchees and Pawnee Picts—to shake hands with them, and to smoke the pipe of peace, and to establish an acquaintance, and consequently a system of trade, that would be beneficial to both.

They listened attentively, and perfectly appreciated; and taking Colonel Dodge at his word, relying with confidence in what he told them, they informed us that their great town was within a few days' march; and pointing in the direction, offered to abandon their war-excursion, and turn about and escort us to it; which they did in perfect good faith. We were on the march in the afternoon of that day, and from day to day they busily led us on, over hill and dale, encamping by the side of us at night, and resuming the march in the morning.

During this march, over one of the most lovely and picturesque countries in the world, we had enough continually to amuse and excite us. The whole country seemed at times to be alive with buffaloes and bands of wild horses.

We had with us about thirty Osage and Cherokee, Seneca and Delaware Indians, employed as guides and hunters for the regiment; and with the war-party of ninety or a hundred Camanchees, we formed a most picturesque appearance while passing over the green field and consequently, sad havoc amongst the herds of buffaloes, which we were almost hourly passing. We were now out of the influence and reach of bread stuffs, subsisted ourselves on buffaloes' meat altogether. the Indians of the different tribes, emulous to shoot skill in the chase, and prove the mettle of their horses, took infinite pleasure in dashing into every herd that we approached; by which means, the regiment was abundantly supplied from day to day with fresh meat.

In one of those spirited scenes when the regiment were on the march, and the Indians with their bows and arrows were closely plying a band of these affrighted animals, they made a bolt through the line of the dragoons, and a complete breach, through which the whole herd passed, upsetting horses and riders in the most amusing manner, and receiving such shots as came from those guns and pistols that were aimed, and not fired off into the empty air. . . . . .

The tract of country over which we passed, between the False Washita and this place, is stocked, not only with buffaloes, but with numerous bands of wild horses, many of which we saw every day. There is no other animal on the prairies so wild and so sagacious as the horse; and none other so difficult to come up with. So remarkably keen is their eye, that they will generally run "at the sight," when they are a mile distant; being, no doubt, able to distinguish the character of the enemy that is approaching when at that distance; and when in motion, will seldom stop short of three or four miles. I made many attempts to approach them by stealth, when they were grazing and playing their gambols, without ever having been more than once able to succeed. In this instance, I left my horse, and with my friend Chadwick, skulked through a ravine for a couple of miles; until we were at length brought within gun-shot of a fine herd of them, when I used my pencil for some time, while we were under cover of a little hedge of bushes which effectually screened us from their view. In this herd we saw all the colours, nearly, that can be seen in a kennel of English hounds. Some were milk white, some jet black—others were sorrel, and bay, and cream colour—many were of an iron gray; and others were pied, containing a variety of colours on the same animal. Their manes were very profuse, and hanging in the wildest confusion over their necks and faces; and their long tails swept the ground.

The hunting for horses by employing the lasso, and the mode of taming these fine animals when caught, are picturesquely described.

One of the hunters who accompanied the expedition, named Beatte, a young man born of French parents, but bred among the Osages, and whose habits and manners were completely those of an Indian, became an expert hunter of the wild horses. Breaking, or taming them, as it is termed, is a desperate and cruel process, and one which generally destroys the spirit of the animal. It is minutely described by Mr. Catlin.

The arrival at the metropolis of the Camanchees is as imposing as their first encounter with the troops:—

After many hard and tedious days of travel, we were at last told by our Camanchee guides that we were near their village; and having led us to the top of a gently rising elevation on the prairie, they pointed to their village at several miles distance, in the midst of one of the most enchanting valleys that human eyes ever looked upon. The general course of the valley is from N.W. to S.E., of several miles in width, with a magnificent range of mountains rising in distance beyond; it being, without doubt, a huge "spur" of the Rocky Mountains, composed entirely of a reddish granite or gneiss, corresponding with the other links of this stupendous chain. In the midst of this lovely valley, we could just discern, amongst the scattering shrubbery that lined the banks of the water-courses, the tops of the Camanchee wigwams, and the smoke curling above them. The valley, for a mile distant about the village, seemed speckled with horses and mules that were grazing in it. The chiefs of the war-party requested the regiment to halt, until they could ride in, and inform their people who were coming. We then dismounted for an hour or so; when we could see them busily running and catching their horses; and at length, several hundreds of their braves and warriors came out at full speed to welcome us, and forming in a line in front of us, as we were again mounted, presented a formidable and pleasing appearance. As they wheeled their horses, they very rapidly formed in a line, and "dressed" like well-disciplined cavalry. The regiment was drawn up in three columns, with a line formed in front, by Colonel Dodge and his staff, in which rank my friend Chadwick and I were also paraded; when we had a fine view of the whole manœuvre, which was picturesque and thrilling in the extreme.

In the centre of our advance was stationed a white flag, and the Indians answered to it with one which they sent forward and planted by the side of it.

The two lines were thus drawn up, face to face, within twenty or thirty yards of each other, as inveterate foes that never had met; and, to the everlasting credit of the Camanchees, whom the world had always looked upon as murderous and hostile, they had all come out in this manner, with their heads uncovered, and without a weapon of any kind, to meet a war-party bristling with arms, and trespassing to the middle of their country. They had every reason to look upon us as their natural enemy, as they have been in the habit of estimating all pale faces; and yet, instead of arms or defences, or even of frowns, they galloped out and looked us in our faces, without an expression of fear or dismay, and evidently with expressions of joy and impatient pleasure, to shake us by the hand, on the bare assertion of Colonel Dodge, which had been made to the chiefs, that "we came to see them on a friendly visit."

After we had sat and gazed at each other in this way for some half an hour or so, the head chief of the band came galloping up to Colonel Dodge, and having shaken him by the hand, he passed on to the other officers in turn, and then rode alongside of the different columns, shaking hands with every dragoon in the regiment; he was followed in this by his principal chiefs and braves, which altogether took up nearly an hour longer, when the Indians retreated slowly towards their village, escorting us to the banks of a fine clear stream, and a good spring of fresh water, half a mile from their village, which they designated as a suitable place for our encampment, and we were soon bivouacked at the place from which I am now scribbling.

The village of the Camanchees, by the side of which we are encamped, is composed of six or eight hundred skin-covered lodges, made of poles and buffalo skins, in the manner precisely as those of the Sioux and other Missouri tribes, of which I have heretofore given some account. This village, with its thousands of wild inmates, with horses and dogs, and wild sports and domestic occupations, presents a most curious scene; and the manners and looks of the people, a rich subject for the brush and the pen. . . . . .

We white men, strolling about amongst their wigwams, are looked upon with as much curiosity as if we had come from the moon; and evidently create a sort of chill in the blood of children and dogs, when we make our appearance.

The nation is estimated at from 30 to 40,000, of whom six or seven thousand are warriors. Traffic, by barter, was immediately commenced, the Americans making excellent bargains; such as a horse for a sorry blanket, and a butcher's knife—or for an old cotton umbrella.

Mr. Catlin describes some extraordinary feats of horsemanship, that are commonly performed by the Camanchees, and which would, we apprehend, astonish even the riders at Astley's.

The farther quest of the expedition was the Pawnee Picts, a tribe whose mountain villages lay about a hundred miles farther west, on the banks of the Red River, and in a wildly mountainous region. The village contained between five and six hundred neatly constructed wigwams; and to the great surprise of the civilized visiters, the people were found cultivating "extensive" fields of Indian corn, and raising pumpkins, melons, beans, and squashes; and were well supplied with buffalo meat. The friendly views of the expedition were next day explained to the chiefs of the Pawnees at a solemn meeting of the council of the nation.

Colonel Dodge opened a council with the chiefs in the chief's lodge, where he had the most of his officers around him. He first explained to them the friendly views with which he came to see them; and of the wish of our government to establish a lasting peace with them, which they seemed at once to appreciate and highly to estimate.

The head chief of the tribe is a very old man, and he several times replied to Colonel Dodge in a very eloquent manner, assuring him of the friendly feelings of his chief and warriors towards the pale faces, in the direction from whence we came.

The chiefs consented to accompany the commander of the expedition, Colonel Dodge, back to Fort Gibson, to receive suitable presents, and thus confirm the friendship entered into; which they did. The Pawnees are a powerful and numerous nation, consisting of many clans or families. The portraits of their chiefs and women, given by Mr. Catlin, represent a more intelligent race than the Mandans or Sioux; and their costumes, though not so fantastic and gorgeous, are more like those of rational beings. On the backward march, which was pursued by a different route, lying by the Canadian river, and partly through the territory of Texas, the troops suffered severely from fever, produced by the extreme heat of the weather, and the bad quality of the little water that was to be procured. Mr. Catlin was seized with fever, and had nearly sunk before the regiment reached Fort Gibson, diminished in numbers, and many still suffering under the disease. But the object of the enterprise had been accomplished, though our traveller rightly doubts if it will be of any ultimate advantage to the Indians. The Camanchees and the Pawnees will, he fears, have the same destiny as the extirpated tribes. He remarks—

Although the achievement has been a handsome one, of bringing these unknown people to an acquaintance, and a general peace; and at first sight would appear to be of great benefit to them—yet I have my strong doubts whether it will better their condition, unless, with the exercised aid of the strong arm of Government, they can be protected in the rights which, by nature, they are entitled to.

There is already in this place a company of eighty men fitted out, who are to start to-morrow, to overtake these Indians a few miles from this place, and accompany them home, with a large stock of goods, with traps for catching beavers, &c., calculating to build a trading-house amongst them, where they will amass, at once, an immense fortune, being the first traders and trappers that have ever been in that part of the country.

I have travelled too much among Indian tribes, and seen too much, not to know the evil consequences of such a system. Goods are sold at such exorbitant prices, that the Indian gets a mere shadow for his peltries, &c. The Indians see no white people but traders and sellers of whisky; and of course, judge us all by them—they consequently hold us, and always will, in contempt, as inferior to themselves, as they have reason to do—and they neither fear nor respect us.

The consequences are not ill to divine. The vessel of clay dashes itself against the vessel of iron, and falls into potsherds.

The sickness increased, and the sufferings of the troops, from the climate and the journey, were aggravated by the exhaustion of all their luxuries, and the want of forage for their horses, as well as of water and provisions for themselves. Almost every man and officer was attacked by the fever, and many became its victims. Though he seems to have held out long, Mr. Catlin was at length laid prostrate; but after a time, and in all probability feeling himself better, and still seeing his friends dying around him, he was seized with the irresistible desire of leaving this doomed spot, and at all hazards trying to make his way northward and homeward. The attempt for a man in his condition must have appeared like madness, though it is probable that to it he owed his life. He set out alone, save for his sagacious and docile little Camanchee horse "Charley," which was to him in the wilderness what the companion-steed is to the Arab in the desert; his sole, affectionate and intelligent friend, in traversing five hundred miles of forest and prairie, in which the debilitated traveller had no means of sustaining life but by his rifle and his fishing-tackle and the small quantity of coffee, and a few pounds of hard biscuits, that were stowed in his portmanteau. We would fain gratify our younger readers with a sketch of this solitary and picturesque journey, but space has failed, and we must be content to tell that Mr. Catlin and his faithful Charley, not however without perilous adventures, happily accomplished their solitary and romantic journey, his health having improved every day after leaving the dismal Western Fort.

We have left ourselves no room for his subsequent excursions among the broken tribes still inhabiting places on the lakes, or on the Upper Mississippi. The name of the Shawnee Prophet, or Kee-an-ne-kuk, the chief man of the Kickapoos, has already been heard of in Europe. His portrait gives the idea of a shrewd and intelligent man. He is, in reality, one of the most extraordinary men now alive among the Red Indians. His tribe, then located at the south end of Lake Michigan, has since been removed by the United States government beyond the Missouri. Of this remarkable chief Mr. Catlin relates—

He sat for his portrait; he took his attitude, which was that of prayer. And I soon learned that he was a very devoted Christian, regularly holding meetings in his tribe on the Sabbath, preaching to them and exhorting them to a belief in the Christian religion, and to an abandonment of the fatal habit of whisky-drinking, which he strenuously represented as the bane that was to destroy them all, if they did not entirely cease to use it. I went on the sabbath to hear this eloquent man preach, when he had his people assembled in the woods; and although I could not understand his language, I was surprised and pleased with the natural ease and emphasis, and gesticulation, which carried their own evidence of the eloquence of his sermon.

I was singularly struck with the noble efforts of this champion of the mere remnant of a poisoned race, so strenuously labouring to rescue the remainder of his people from the deadly bane that has been brought amongst them by enlightened Christians. How far the efforts of this zealous man have succeeded in christianizing, I cannot tell, but it is quite certain that his exemplary and constant endeavours have completely abolished the practice of drinking whisky in his tribe; which alone is a very praiseworthy achievement, and the first and indispensable step towards all other improvements.

This man is brother of the famous Tecumseh, and quite equal in his medicines or mysteries, to what his brother was in arms; he was blind in his left eye, and in his right hand he was holding his "medicine fire," and his "sacred string of beans" in the other. With these mysteries he made his way through most of the North Western tribes, enlisting warriors wherever he went, to assist Tecumseh in effecting his great scheme, of forming a confederacy of all the Indians on the frontier, to drive back the whites, and defend the Indians' rights; which he told them could never in any other way be protected. His plan was certainly a correct one, if not a very great one; and his brother, the Prophet, exercised his astonishing influence in raising men for him to fight his battles, and carry out his plans. For this purpose, he started upon an embassy to the various tribes on the Upper Missouri, nearly all of which he visited with astonishing success; exhibiting his mystery fire, and using his sacred string of beans, which every young man who was willing to go to war was to touch; thereby taking the solemn oath to start when called upon, and not to turn back.

Among the broken, small tribes then inhabiting the lake country, but now all removed beyond the Mississippi or the Missouri, Mr. Catlin found several civilised and intelligent Indians, wearing the dress and speaking the language of the English. He has preserved the portraits of the more remarkable of them. Mr. Catlin corroborates his frequent testimony to the good character of the Red Indians in their natural condition, by appeals to the missionaries who have gone among them, as well as to traders, and especially as to their honesty and hospitality, qualities never denied. Mr. Catlin's gallery and his narrative afford ample proofs of their knowledge and advancement in those arts absolutely required by their condition. Their wigwams, their canoes, their dresses, their weapons and hunting implements, their furniture and culinary utensils, are probably equal in ingenuity to those of any people found in the condition of hunters, men still living by the chase in a region where game abounds, and by fishing. Civilisation the most imperfect, is not the growth of a few short generations of men, nor yet of centuries. The Red Indians have never been permitted the time necessary to pass from the state of hunters to that of agriculturists. The experiment has never been, and in their case, never will be, fairly tried. In the art of dressing skins, though they are unacquainted with tanning, the Red Indians have given a lesson to Europeans. Their process is slow, but completely effective. They practise an ingenious way of curing buffalo meat, without the use of salt, which, thus preserved, will keep for any length of time. This is a process which may be found very useful, so soon as the working-classes of England are permitted to exchange the products of the loom and the forge for the corn and beef of South and North America. Many of the customs and arts of the Red Indians display a happy and ingenious adaptation to the necessities of their condition;—such as the mode of swimming practised by the Western tribes; for which, with many other things, we again refer to Mr. Catlin's book. A very curious way, (allowing for a touch of the supernatural, or the animal magnetic,) is described, in which buffalo calves are caught, when the Indians want "a bit of veal." When, during the hunting season, the vast herds of buffaloes, consisting of many thousands, are pursued and thrown into confusion, the frightened calves often lose their dams, and try to conceal themselves by dropping on their knees, and burying their noses in the long grass, where they remain as if fascinated. When touched, they butt furiously, but soon yield to a spell described, which reminds one of the manner in which the famous Irish whisperer charmed horses and "made them fain to follow him."

In Mr. Catlin's collection, though the greater part of the Indians neither toil nor spin, may be seen, as he tells—

> Specimens of their spinning and weaving, by which they convert dogs' hair and the wool of the mountain-sheep into durable and splendid robes, the production of which, I venture to say, would bid defiance to any of the looms in the American or British factories.

Many other curious traits of character and pictures of manners are exhibited in these large and closely printed volumes, which will remain an interesting record of the Homeric age and race of North America, when, save a few wild traditions and scattered relics, and a few of the musical and sonorous Indian names of lakes, rivers, and hunting-grounds, every other trace of the Red Man will have perished on that vast continent.

LINES TO CIRCASSIA.

WRITTEN ON THE OCCASION OF THE RECENT RUSSIAN EXPEDITION AGAINST THE CIRCASSIAN PATRIOTS.

And shall the thrice-crushed robber vanquish now—
And must the cypress shade the patriot's brow?
Hast thou no friends but God, and bravery—
No arm to strike in unison with thee?
Still floats the war-flag from thy mountain towers;
Still the armed ramparts on the Russian lowers;
Thy shepherd-warriors are not conquered yet:
For not a mountain-pass, or rivulet,—
A rock, a vale, a hamlet, but shall form
A rallying spot for thee. O, 'mid the storm
Of battle should thine arm or spirit fail!
Think upon Poland, and her bloody tale!
The ice-bound deserts of Siberia,
A nation's best and bravest withering saw.
Think of the knout, the exile, and the chain,—
No mercy from the wolf—then strike again!

RECENT TRAVELLERS IN RUSSIA.

IV.—STEPHEN'S NOTES OF TRAVEL IN RUSSIA, &c.

The last three years have added considerably to the amount of British information on the social and political condition of Russia, without, upon the whole, showing that there is any material difference, save what is either the effect of accident, or merely superficial, since Dr. Clarke went over nearly the same ground that has lately been traversed by three of the Travellers named at the head of this article. The boundaries of the empire have been somewhat extended; and a little progress and improvement are visible in several of the public departments; but in all that constitutes the internal strength and true civilisation of a country, the Russia of 1840 remains, it would appear, in exactly the same state as the Russia of 1800. Her forty-five millions of serfs have undergone no change, worthy of notice, since the days of Peter the Great. They are worshipping the emperor in their sheepskins, exactly as then; without a new want, a new capacity, or the idea of a new enjoyment. The very talk of amelioration, which was so fashionable during the pseudo-liberal reign of Alexander, seems to have died out.

All liberal ideas of government (says Captain Jesse) died with Alexander: it is now, to the letter, absolute and military—two characteristics sufficiently appalling; but the latter is the most blighting in its effects.

Nor is the political or civil condition of the emancipated crown peasants in any important respect different from that of the peasants of the nobility, who, with the character, retain the name, of slaves. The animal activity and energy of Nicholas, who, hemmed in by the Baltic, vexed by the Poles, and baffled by the Circassians, seems as restless as a caged hyena, together, with that lust of conquest and passion for war, which can only be gratified by a vast armed land and maritime force, has made him strain every nerve to create an army and a navy. But the fiat of the Czar is not more potent than the absolute shall of Napoleon; when, by a decree he attempted to create "ships, colonies, and commerce." If we may implicitly believe report, the attempts of Nicholas to form, all at once, a great naval force, are as futile as those of the child who would form a garden, by snatching and sticking living flowers and foliage into the earth. And whatever success he may have had in consolidating a military despotism, or whatever Russia may have gained internally, whether in the better organization of its army and navy and administrative system, since the accession of Nicholas, has been lost in moral influence throughout civilized Europe. The prestige which the mild and plausible Alexander, and a sympathetic hatred of Napoleon, had created in England, has been completely destroyed by the career of his successor. Russia and Russian policy were never more odious in the eyes of free and civilized men than at the present moment. Even among the most devoted lovers of peace it remains a political problem, whether the cruel and tyrannical extermination of the Polish nation ought to have been tolerated by the civilized States of Europe; while the patriotic struggle of the brave Circassians, though it may not justify the hostile interference of England, as a Power, nevertheless, commands the warmest sympathies of the whole nation, and of all nations in which the idea of patriotism and of national independence is understood.

Of the travellers, whose reports we are about to discuss, so far as they bear on the character of the emperor, and the vaunted symptoms of improvement in his dominions, Captain Jesse, the latest, is, if not anti-Russ, somewhat irascible; Mr Bremner, and the American, are both well-tempered and impartial; and the lady is strongly disposed to be as indulgent and favourable in her judgment, as the conscience and tastes of an intelligent and well-informed Englishwoman will at all permit. Yet, allowing for individual character and difference of disposition, it is surprising to find how well, when examined, their several reports and estimates harmonize. The letters of the lady, we should say, bear the hardest upon the emperor and his court, and the entire body of the Russian nobility; as, with better opportunities of observation, and as keen a glance, she is as hesitating, or as reluctant a witness, as Captain Jesse is a frank and willing one. To place her above all suspicion, we find the Quarterly Review contrasting her account of Russia and its higher classes, with that of other recent travellers, and drawing from it a favourable judgment for Russia, on the very points under discussion. She saw more of the emperor personally, than all the other travellers together; and she seems to have been domesticated in a family of the higher nobility, during the whole of the winter gaieties of St. Petersburg, in which she spent two seasons. One of our travellers asserts, that more depends upon the personal character of Nicholas, than on that of any other man now alive. And this is true of that strong-willed and active individual, at least as regards Russia, and those countries which have become inextricably involved in the toils of its policy.

The Emperor is now in his forty-sixth year. As George the IV. was named the "First Gentleman of Europe," so is Nicholas, and with, at least, equal truth, named "the handsomest man of his time." Indeed, one of the travellers says that the imperial family is the only good-looking family in Russia; which they owe to their German blood. The fair letter-writer alleges, that if the statue of Nicholas had been dug up in classic ground, it would have been taken for that of a Grecian demi-god. As a god he is regarded by nine-tenths of his subjects,—if those semi-barbarous hordes are to be described as subjects, who have no civil rights whatever, and no political existence. When a peasant, afraid to give an answer to any simple question which his debased condition makes him dread as dangerous, is asked one, such as "Does it rain?" he replies, "God and the Emperor know." In all the public offices of Russia there is a mysterious affair, in fashion somewhat like a Metronome, made of copper or iron-gilt, set up, and crowned with the Imperial Eagle, on the sides of which are engraved the tables of the wisdom of Peter the Great, in pithy exhortations to functionaries to do their duty, and, above all, to eschew bribery and corruption. This Palladium, this Kaba, this visible representative of the Emperor and of his omnipotence, is the object of universal reverence. No Russian, says Captain Jesse,—

* Two vols. cloth. Madden & Co.

Enters the room without taking off his hat to it; the serfs carry this feeling still further, and I have observed many of them who had accidently caught a glimpse of it from the adjoining room, bow as low to it as they would have done to the altar. Foreigners, ignorant of the sanctity of this emblem, not unfrequently met with sharp rebuffs for their unwitting neglect in not saluting it. I was first awakened to the necessity of so doing, by a threat of having my hat knocked off.

A worthy member of the Society of Friends lately got himself into an unpleasnt scrape at Odessa, by refusing to pay homage to this image of power.

The Letter-writer never tires of praising the physical perfections of the Emperor, who is certainly a noble specimen of one order, though that not the highest, of manly beauty. The sovereign of a semi-barbarous people should always be, like Nicholas, six feet two. She saw him with every advantage, in the midst of fêtes and pageants. The splendours of the Court at the New-Year's fête, given at the Winter Palace, which our fair traveller witnessed from a point of vantage, read like a fairy tale:—

A line of military passed; then a body of chamberlains,—when the band broke into the soul-stirring national hymn, "Boje Zara chrani"—the troops presented arms, and a noble figure was seen advancing.

This was the Emperor—the plainest dressed, but the most magnificent figure present, wanting no outward token to declare the majesty of his presence. He passed slowly on, accommodating his manly movements to the short feeble steps of the Empress, who, arrayed in a blaze of jewels, dragged a heavy train of orange-coloured velvet after her, and seemed hardly able to support her own weight.

In a subsequent part of the ceremony, she overlooked him in the chapel during the long and tedious service:—

Here stood the whole cortége thickly compressed together—one blaze of diamonds, stars, and epaulettes—while in advance of the rest was the Imperial family; the Empress, on account of her ill health, alone seated; the Emperor on her right, motionless as a statue; the Hasledník on her left, shifting from one long limb to the other—all crossing themselves and bowing at intervals. The service lasted two hours, varied only by the delicious responses of the court choristers. It was performed by the metropolitan and two other dignitaries of high rank, in high wizard caps and gorgeous mystic robes, who looked like the priest of Isis, or any other theatrical representation of sacerdotal dignity.

All our authorities agree on the fact, that no Russian noble, no matter how high his rank, dare, even in his chamber, whisper to those nearest and dearest to him, his opinions on the conduct of the Emperor. While in Estonia, the English lady lived for some time in the enchanted palace of Fall, the castle of Count Benkendorff, the Grand Vizier of Nicholas (over whom he exercises a happy influence) and the second spy in the empire, the Emperor himself being the first. This minister is brother to the Princess Lieven, so well known in the circles of London and Paris, and father to three young beauties, to whom, according to our enthusiastic authoress, the graces are dowdies, and Helen and Cleopatra, hildings and gipsies. It might be imagined that the screw and gag, which pervade the farthest and most minute ramifications of the Russian empire, would not muzzle the privileged circles in which she mingled; but they are as mute on the proscribed topics of public affairs and interests, as those with whom to hear is to obey. There is no confidence even in the bosom of friendship, no relaxation by the domestic hearth or the social board. In speaking of Benkendorff, Nesselrode, and other grandees and high officials, our authoress remarks—

It seems natural that individuals with whom politics necessarily occupy so large a portion of time and thought, who return direct from the senate, or from the private conference, to their domestic circles, should involuntarily continue the train of idea aloud. But such is the necessity or the habit of discretion, that not a word transpires to betray the occupation or the circle they have just quitted; save perhaps to a wife or daughter—"L'Empereur t'a trouvée bien jolie hier au bal," or "t'a mise délicieuse."

Once, on occasion of a small dinner where Prince Volkonski, Count Benkendorff, the venerable Prince Lubetski, and other distinguished characters, were united, the conversation fell upon the organization of the senate—the difficulty of expressing themselves in Russian, now the language of the state—the little practice which the nature of the government affords for addressing numbers;—but of the matter there discussed, Gott behüte! not one word. . . . . .

Mr Bremner in alluding to the Marquis of Londonderry's eulogistic, and purblind account of the court of St. Petersburg, remarks—

Was his lordship—the fêted of the court, the friend of the Emperor—in the best position for hearing the real sentiments of those with whom he mingled? The Russian nobility know when to speak, and when to hold their tongue. . . . . every courtier would vie with his neighbour in the struggle, who should best deserve the Emperor's smiles. Not one murmur against the existing order of things—not even one little sigh for a more genial clime, would be heard from the well-disciplined throng that fluttered around him. Plain-speaking has never been proverbial for haunting courts; and of all the courts in Europe, that of St. Petersburg is the last where it will seek to intrude.

In short, the nobility are the first serfs in Russia, with this difference, that being much less affectionate and loyal to an Emperor whom they know too well, and being, individually, often treated with greater severity and contumely than he shows to the lower orders, they much more frequently plot, conspire, and revolt against him. A few years since, the peasants upon an estate in the Ukraine rebelled against their lord, and roasted him to death in his own oven. Of course they suffered the severest punishment due to an atrocity so unusual. The noble serfs are continually plotting against their master, the autocrat for the time being, whether he be a Paul, an Alexander, or a Nicholas.

Though the sketcher is a woman, and a Tory, we must not pass her coup d'œil of the political state of Russia, before noticing her account of the private habits and amusements of the powerful individual upon whom its destinies may be said to depend.

From careful observation, and the judgment of those longer experienced, it would appear that the guarantees for the continued stability of Russia lie exclusively in the person of the monarch and in the body of the people. In the nobility, whose elements of national character fall far beneath those of his serf, the monarch finds no efficient help. Foreign education and contact has, with a few brilliant exceptions, rendered them adepts in the luxury and frivolity rather than in the humanity of civilisation, or grafted them with democratic Utopian ideas that in no state, and least of all in Russia, can bring forth good fruit. The Emperor, therefore, has full ground for the double mistrust with which he views money taken out of the empire and pernicious ideas brought in.

Again, in the so-called middle class—here the mere excrescence of a partial civilisation, who have renounced all of their nationality save its barbarity—all real support to the Crown seems still further removed. These occupy the lower departments of the state, clogging all straightforward dealing, perverting the real intention of the laws, and intercepting every humane Imperial act, by the most cunning and unprincipled dishonesty. What will be said of other and more important intentions of the Emperor, when it is known that the snuff-box destined to reward some act of benevolence, which leaves the Imperial hands embossed with diamonds, reaches those of its destined owner deprived of every stone! And no redress is to be had under laws where an equal accumulation of formalities and liability to abuse meet the innocent at every turn.

Despised by the nobles, this class retaliate by a species of persecution which it is impossible to guard against. No lion's mouth or familiars of the Inquisition are needed in a state of things where, ere a false denunciation can be sifted and dismissed, the denounced is equally ruined in purse and worn out with constant care; and nowhere, sad to say, are denunciations of this kind so frequent as at this time in Russia—nowhere so tedious and ruinous in their exposure. Rank, consideration, long service, and high reputation are of no avail. Once an accusation is laid, however it may bear the stamp of malice, it must distil through all the corkscrew windings of the Russian law, ere the property of the accused be released from sequestration, or his mind from the most corroding anxiety,—and this done, there is neither compensation for the injured nor punishment for the injurer, who has thus cloaked his cupidity or revenge under the semblance of what the people honour most, viz., his loyalty.

This class it is who have made the Russian courts of justice a byword and a proverb—who have called down upon Russia the unmerited sarcasm of being "pourrie avant d' être mure"—while, by a natural retribution, the name of Chinovnik, or the betitled, (for these men are generally distinguished by an order,) is fast becoming the synonym for low dishonesty and intrigue. The national proverb which says, No Russian without "Chai, Tschi, and Chin"—tea, sour-krout, and a title—is perfectly true; but the sarcasm on the latter is derived from the abuse of a noble principle. Peter the Great, the well-intentioned founder of this rage for orders in Russia, was right when he foresaw the veneration with which the mass of the people would regard every individual invested with an insignia emanating direct from the sovereign, and calculated thereby on putting a wholesome power into the hands of the middle ranks: but he reckoned too soon on the formation of this class, which, to be safe or to be useful, must be gradual and spontaneous in growth; and the careless and lavish hand with which orders have been distributed since his reign, has only debased the distinction without elevating the possessor.

It is predicted that, should any political convulsion occur in Russia, this miserable class, who suffer the double ill fate of ideas below their station, and a station above their maintenance, would meet with the nobility in jarring collision, and with equal danger to both, while the crown, firmly seated in the instinctive loyalty of the people, would have nought to fear. By a providential adaptation which surpasses all speculation of legislative philosophy, the people of Russia venerate their sovereign simply because he is absolute. With them respect for the anointed sovereign is a religion; and to restrict him by human ordinances would be to strip him of his divine credentials. What Zar has yet been dethroned or murdered by an act of the people?

What a magnificent engine, thus weighted, is the power of a Russian sovereign! With the mind filled by the absoluteness of his sway, and the eye possessed by the magnificence of his person, Nicholas I. seems too grand a combination for mortal ken.

As citizens of a free state, we do not pretend to understand the "providential adaptation" of an instinct of slavery in any order of rational beings;—but let that pass. The nation seems, indeed, drunk with the idolatrous passion of slaves, misnamed loyalty. While this lady was in Petersburg, Madame Allan and Taglioni were attracting crowded audiences, among a spectacle-loving public. In one ballet, the latter performed for sixty nights; but it was alternated with a very different piece:

Namely, the performance of a Russian opera, the first ever written, called "Jisha za Zara," or "Your Life for your Zar:" the music by Glinki, the words by Baron Rosen. This opera, equally from the popularity of the subject and the beauty and nationality of the music, has met with the utmost success. The plot of the piece, as far as we could fathom it, was the concealment and subsequent discovery of the true Zar, and his final coronation at Moscow, with a splendid representation of the Kremlin. This is woven up with a love-tale, and rendered interesting by the fidelity of a fine old Russian with a long beard and a bass voice, who eventually pays for his adherence with his life.

The music was strikingly national, and one trio in particular appeared to combine every peculiar beauty of Russian melody and pathos, and will doubtless acquire a European celebrity. It was very strange to see true Russians personating true Russians—gallery, pit, and stage being equally filled with the same bearded and caftaned figures. The national feeling seemed in every heart and on every lip; any allusion to the Zar—and the subject was thickly strewn with them—was pronounced by the actors with the utmost animation, and responded to by electric shouts from the audience. Nor was there any casual inducement for this display of loyalty, for neither his Majesty nor any of the Imperial family were present.

It is the policy of the Emperor to cherish this idiotic feeling, (so far as his tyrannical and violent temper admits of any steady course of policy,) by every clap-trap possible. He is the first courier, and the first fireman, in his own dominions. In the desire of keeping alive the vulgar sensation of wonder, as in higher respects, he takes Napoleon for his model. His grand secret is, Keep moving; his main wish to "elevate and surprise;" and in the eyes of the people he seems to possess the attribute of omnipresence, or some magical locomotive power denied to ordinary men; and to bear a charmed life.

Mr. Bremner and Captain Jesse relate numerous instances of his remarkable vigilance and activity. He has no efficient smoothly-working system of any kind; but, from Cronstadt to Odessa, he is, in some measure, his own executive; detecting acts of that corruption which is universal, and sometimes redressing abuses. Partial must be the detection, capricious the redress. It is remarked by the lady traveller, whom we cannot help thinking rather an acute politician, as well as a fine painter of manners and scenery, that—

It seems a prevailing principle with the Crown to interpose its presence, or an earnest of its presence, in every circumstance of life, whether usual or accidental, —to prove to its subjects the indispensability of its help—to maintain literally the relation of parent and child—and by retaining its hold over every department, and making that a favour which we should consider a right, to facilitate the immediate exertion of its power. With the army this is conspicuously the case. The officer whose strict pay is so paltry that it is far from defraying the expenses of his wife's wardrobe, receives in addition what is called Tafel-geld, or table-money; for, like the soldiers, he is supposed to be boarded at the Emperor's expense, and besides this may expect an annual present, either from his Majesty or the Grand Duke Michael, equal about in amount to his pay. Lodging and furniture are also provided him.

No officer, no functionary, is to have life or being save through the immediate favour of the emperor; and he takes the same pains and means to gain the affections of the soldiers, seamen, the cadets and pupils in the military schools, that Napoleon did to engage the enthusiastic affection and fidelity of the troops to his own person. Nicholas is, however, a man of different nature; but the Russians also differ materially from the French; and the results of the policy may be more alike than could be anticipated. The emperor does seem popular with the soldiers.

In his anxiety to form a navy which shall rival or eclipse that of England, Nicholas sometimes indulges in rude horse-play with the cadets who are to form his future Hoods and Nelsons. Mr. Bremner, who is not at all times consistent in his opinions, though for this he is only the more trust-worthy as a reporter of what, in passing, fell under his notice, remarks of the playful propensities of Nicholas—

The Emperor errs even with his young naval cadets. He is extremely fond of them, making them often come to the palace of Peterhof, and there playing all kinds of follies with them. Sometimes he amuses himself with making them run into the lake to charge old Neptune, or Samson and his lion; promising a reward to those who shall first get on the giant's shoulders—in which position they are forced to remain till they shiver with cold and wet. Sometimes he runs, wrestles, and leaps with them; and then, with a flock of them around him, allows the urchins to pull him about, leap on his back, and use every familiarity with him, exclaiming to some newly-caught simpleton from France (or England!) beatified at such amiable condescension in one whom he had always heard spoken of as a gloomy tyrant, "See how my children love me!" All of which goes on delightfully, till a luckless little man, in the excess of his mirth, forgetting how dangerous it is to be familiar with autocrats, does something or other that rouses the true lion, and in a moment the complacent speech is changed to "Go to the black-hole, sir!"—or perhaps some more degrading punishment is inflicted.

Madame Junot, in speaking of the Russians, makes a remark which is especially applicable to Nicholas, and his brother, the Grand Duke Michael: —"One cannot know a Russian long without some day perceiving the bear's skin." We hear from Mr. Bremner of an officer to whom Michael took one of his capricious fancies, and whom he visited at his private lodgings, as often as the humour struck him. One day the Grand Duke arrived unexpectedly, and surprised the unfortunate young man without his sash; a high crime and misdemeanour, which no degree of privacy could extenuate in a Russian officer, nor royal friendship overlook or palliate. His fate was sealed; he was sent off to the Caucasus. This fact is confirmed by anecdotes told of both brothers by the lady. The Grand Duke, using the privilege of his rank, invited himself to certain balls, given by the lady of a rich merchant in Petersburg, which were said to be exceedingly pleasant, and which were very fashionable. But Wherever the Grand Duke appears, he takes the strict disciplinarian with him. Before his Imperial Highness had been in the ball-room half an hour he knit his brows with an ominous expression, and, striding up to a young officer who had just halted from the waltz, and was dreaming at that moment of no other eyes in the world but his lady's, the Grand Duke startled him with the uncomfortable words, "Vasche Sporne schlischkom glinie"—your spurs are too long—"Aux arrêts:" and sent him without further parley from his partner's arms to the guardhouse. The Imperial frown and action, and the young man's discomfited retreat, were seen by many, and the incident was soon buzzed in whispers round the room, greatly to the anxiety and annoyance of host and hostess.

This simple anecdote speaks volumes. Even, without such incidents occurring, these balls, we are told, "though dazzling and brilliant in description, are in reality dull." The truth is, almost every one is dancing in chains, and with Siberia in the vista.

While admitting that Nicholas may have been somewhat violent and capricious at one time of his life, Mr. Bremner contends, that he is much more amiable and gentle now; and indeed with foreign diplomatists, and those whom it is an object to dazzle and win, he is quite captivating; altogether irresistible. The proof which Mr. Bremner adduces of the Emperor not being the violent man, the hateful tyrant, that English people generally imagine him, is about as conclusive as Sir Anthony Absolute's proofs of his own calm, mild, cool temper, while in a furious passion:—

Those who have seen the imperial family in their private moments, when free from the constraint of pomp and ceremony, to which princes are slaves before the world, speak of them in terms of rapture. An English gentleman, who was honoured with many opportunities of entering the august circle, says, that more happiness, more affection, more simplicity, it would be impossible to conceive. The unconstrained and innocent amusements of their evenings, contrasted delightfully with the notions usually formed of imperial family scenes. In short, from all that he beheld, it appeared that a kinder husband or a better father than Nicholas does not exist. The emperor, too quick not to perceive what was passing in the mind of his guest as he mused on the scene before him, said one evening, stamping his foot and grinding his teeth, as the unpleasant thought rose to his mind, "I know that I am unpopular in England. They hate me—because they think me a tyrant; but if they knew me, they would not call me so. They should see me in the bosom of my family!"

To say nothing of the stamping of the feet, and grinding of the teeth, rather singular proofs of mildness and affectionateness of nature; to say nothing indeed of the whole scene, which seems to have been got up for effect—Nicholas, from his domestic feelings, has about the same right to be exempted from the charge of love of war, rage for conquest, and a tyrannical disposition, that George III. had to pass unblamed in his attempt to coerce the American colonies, and deny justice to his Irish Catholic subjects, because he was an exemplary family-man, killed his own mutton, and dined with his children at two o'clock. But the Emperor dare not be civil to his own nobles, we are told, lest he should excite jealousy among them! His graciousness is, therefore, all reserved for foreign ambassadors and journalists; and those having the power to aid his policy, or spread his fame throughout Europe.

There is great discrepancy between Captain Jesse's and the lady's account of the state of morals among the nobility, and that of Mr. Bremner; and, with at least equal powers of observation, she had, out of sight, the fairest means of judging. Bremner says, "From having been the most profligate of all the courts of Europe, the Imperial circle of St. Petersburg is now become the purest and most exemplary." "The Emperor himself deserves a great share of the merit of having accomplished this much-needed reform in Russian manners;" and the Empress receives the most exaggerated praise, for what she has accomplished; for which praise the reasons are far to seek. The Empress seems, however, as strict a disciplinarian in court costume as is the Grand Duke Michael in spurs and sashes. She hates a gown that has been too often seen, with the hate of an abigail whom it defrauds of her lawful perquisites. But we shall see what our intelligent Tory lady says of the Imperial pair, and especially of the Emperor.

In a country where everything depends on the one man whose will is law, whose fiat is destiny; whose only restraint is his own pleasure, and who, as is here said, can, with his consort, according to their inclination, render moderation habitual or extravagance meritorious—morality fashionable or frivolity praiseworthy—who can qualify vices to foibles, or ennoble vanities to virtues; personal character becomes all in all, the example of the crown being as imperative in private life as in public life.

Disapprobation of the empress, a frivolous, sickly, and meddling woman, is hinted; and as for the emperor, we shall see him in action. However he may be adored and worshipped by the people, those of the nobility who are forced to bear his honoured presence, must secretly detest him. One would imagine that, as has been surmised of other sovereigns in barbarous ages, he and the empress encouraged extravagance among the nobility, and plunged them into ruinous expense in order to reduce their power, by impoverishing their fortunes.

The Emperor, who, as Grand Duke Nicholas, was noted for the simplicity of his tastes, and could hardly be induced to enter a place of amusement, now resorts to them with an increasing pleasure, from which some augur no auspicious result;—frequents the houses of his nobility and generals, who would spend to their last kopeck, and often go beyond it, to entertain him suitably—while the Empress's love of amusement and dress, besides inoculating her august spouse, has fixed a standard for merit, and exacted a rate of expenditure, which, to say the least, was not required to stimulate the already too expensively disposed Russian.

For instance: a splendid déjeûner, which is to turn winter into summer, and Russia into Arcadia, is arranged to be given by one of the first families in St. Petersburg. One of the generals in closest attendance upon the Emperor's person is commissioned to intercede for the honour of his Majesty's presence, and obtains a gracious assent. When the day comes, however, and money is wanted, Baron Stieglitz, the great banker, shows how far the wrong page of the account-book has been encroached upon, and refuses the necessary advances. What is to be done? Money must be had.—You can't put off a monarch till a more convenient season (though we, thoughtless mortals, will put off a weightier monarch than he)—you can't "tie up your knocker, say you are sick, you are dead,"—when the Emperor and Empress of all the Russias are expected. The necessary sum—and in a country where Nature gives nothing, the expense of such an entertainment is enormous—is therefore borrowed in haste, and at a usurious interest—for fifty per cent. is demanded and accepted on such exigencies—while all thoughts of future inconvenience are drowned in the flattering honours of the day: "L'Empereur était très content," or, "L'Impératrice a beaucoup dansé," is sufficient atonement.

But if you examine a little closer, and ask a few troublesome questions, it will be found that even this dearly-purchased honour is not productive of the pleasure that might be supposed. Wherever the Imperial family appear, however great their affability, however sincere and obvious their desire to please and be pleased, the mere fact of their presence throws a restraint, a gêne over the whole assembly, who are depressed rather than exhilarated by the cold gaze of the Imperial eye, and who feel that the whole attention of their hosts is concentred on one object.

The young military are in apprehension lest their uniform should not be found in strict accordance, to the shape of a button or the length of a spur, with the latest regulation;—the young ladies, and equally their chaperons, are in anxiety lest any awkwardness of dress or manner should incur the censure, however pleasantly expressed, of her to whom all adjudge the purest taste in toilette and tournure;—while the host and hostess suffer real fear lest any unbecoming speech or incident should transpire to render the recollection of their hospitalities obnoxious to their illustrious guests.

The anxiety attendant on the reception of any monarch by his subject must at all times be proportioned to the honour, but here the total absence of all etiquette multiplies the difficulty an hundredfold. For it must be remembered that the more limited the monarch, the more absolute the etiquette—and vice versâ. In Russia therefore, where the Zar is "la loi vivante,"—the constitution in person—no etiquette can exist, or rather only such as he pleases for the time being. Whatever he does is right—he cannot demean himself. His actions are restrained by no law of ceremony,—by no obligation of dignity,—by no fear of public opinion. His rank takes care of itself—it wants no propping—it is in one piece, like his own Alexander's column. . . . .

But to return to etiquette. However tedious and troublesome its formalities, they are not half so onerous to a host as his perpetual anxiety and real responsibility in a court where there is no rule for manners except the caprice of the monarch or the tact of the subject.

The truth of these remarks was exemplified at a ball at Prince Y.'s, which his Imperial Majesty honoured with his presence, and where, though he was obviously as condescending as his hosts were zealous, yet that stately figure in the portal, presiding in unbending beauty like a being from another world, weighed down the hilarity of all present.

This is the emperor in his social exhibitions. We shall now see him in his moments of relaxation, doing the popular. We have mentioned those equivocal entertainments, the masked balls, where the domino gives license and impunity to the one sex; and where the other requires or seeks none.

At one of these balls, he approached the noble party which our authoress accompanied; and who seem to have enjoyed the amusements from a box, without mingling in the promiscuous crowd. The English fair stranger became the object of curiosity, and we are told,—

After a few minutes his curiosity, the unfailing attribute of a crowned head, dictated the words "Kto eto?"—"Who is that?"—and being satisfied—for he remarks every strange face that enters his capital—he continued alternately in Russian and French commenting upon the scene.

"Personne ne m'intrigue ce soir," he said: "je ne sais pas ce que j'ai fait pour perdre ma réputation, mais on ne veut pas de moi." As he stood, various masks approached, but, either from excess of embarrassment or from lack of wit, after rousing the lion, found nothing to say. At length a couple approached and stood irresolute, each motioning the other to speak. "Donnez-moi la main," said a low trembling voice. He stretched out his noble hand: "et voilà l'autre pour vous," extending the other to her companion; and on they passed, probably never to forget the mighty hand that had clasped theirs. Meanwhile the Emperor carefully scanned the crowd, and owned himself in search of a mask who had attacked him on his first entrance. "Quand je l'aurai trouvé, je vous l'amènerai;" and so saying he left us.

I watched his figure, which, as if surrounded with an invisible barrier, bore a vacant space about it through the thickest of the press. In a short time a little mask stepped boldly up to him, and, reaching upwards to her utmost stretch, hung herself fearlessly upon that arm which wields the destinies of the seventh part of the known world. He threw a look to our box, as if to say, "I have found her;" and off they went together. In five minutes they passed again, and his Majesty made some effort to draw her to our box, but the little black sylph resisted, pulling in a contrary direction at his lefty shoulder with all her strength; on which he called out, "Elle ne veut pas que je m'approche de vous; elle dit que je suis trop mauvaise société." Upon the second round, however, he succeeded in bringing his rebellious subject nearer; when, recognising his manœuvre, she plucked her arm away, gave him a smart slap on the wrist, and, saying, "Va t'en, je ne veux plus de toi," ran into the crowd. The Emperor, they assured me, was in an unusual good temper this evening.—I think there can be no doubt of it.

The Heritier now also took his station at our pillar. He inherits his father's majestic person, and somewhat of the regularity of his face, but with the utter absence of the Emperor's unsympathizing grandeur. On the contrary, the son has a face of much sentiment and feeling; the lips full,—the eyelids pensive,—more of kindness than of character in his expression.

To him succeeded the Grand Duke Michael, wiping the heat from his forehead. A fine, bravo style of face, with somewhat ferocious moustaches,—a terrestrial likeness of the Emperor,—earthly passions written on his high brow, but none of Jove's thunderbolts.

After this the Emperor's arm no longer remained vacant, being occupied by a succession of masks, who, by turns amused, flattered, or enlightened the Imperial ear. In like manner were his Highness the Prince Volkonski, Ministre de la Cour—Count Benkendorff, Chef de la Gendarmerie, de la Haute Police, et de la Police Secrète—Count Tchernitcheff, Ministre de la Guerre—and other high state and military officers, engaged; their attendance at masked balls being a part of their service.

A very pleasant part of their service it must be to them, and also to their wives and daughters. It is said—

The Emperor, when a mask has pleased his fancy, never rests till he has discovered her real name, and sets his secret police upon the scent with as much zest as after a political offender. The mask whom we had observed at the theatre on such familiar terms with him was recognised a few days after to be a little modiste from the most fashionable milliner's in Petersburg, whose frequent errands to the Empress had furnished her with a few graphic touches of the Imperial character.

Our traveller was present at another entertainment of the same kind, held in a splendid room lately erected for public entertainments, and reckoned the finest of the kind in Europe. The Salle de Noblesse, as its name imports, is limited to the amusements of the nobility; but it is probable that the intention of a masked ball would be lost were this restriction observed.

At the Salle de Noblesse none who are not noble may find access; but in the latitudinarian nobility of Russia, and the transferability of a mask, this law is frequently evaded—and at the theatre the grisettes always play a conspicuous part.

The grisettes, the ladies' maids and milliner girls, appear to be the liveliest actors in the motley scene, where the wit is pertness, and where no particular respect is paid to those restraints of delicacy and propriety which it is the main object of such miscellaneous meetings to throw off. The women of rank use their privilege, it is alleged, only to mystify and banter their acquaintances. This is making the best of it. "Two-thirds of the masked ladies," it is added, "in this Liberty Hall, were married women, whose husbands knew not, or cared not whether they were there." One advantage those masquerades possess, though it is trival, indeed, when compared with the amount of evil which they must originate and spread—the imperial ear may sometimes be reached by an unfortunate petitioner, and the imperial sense of justice moved. This has actually been the case. Perhaps the emperor, who likes to do everything himself, may have a fancy for being his own Lion's mouth.

More than once the Emperor was observed engaged with a mask in conversation which had evidently digressed from levity into a more serious strain, and was overheard to thank the mask for her information, and promise the subject his attention. In consequence of the taste which his Majesty has of late years evinced for this species of amusement, the masked balls have greatly increased in number and resort. Previous to being incapacitated by bad health, the Empress also equally partook of them; and it is said greatly enjoyed being addressed with the same familiarity as any of her subjects. Her Majesty has even been the cause of severe terrors to many an unfortunate individual, who, new to the scene, or not recognising by filial instinct the maternal arm which pressed his, has either himself indulged in too much license of speech, or given the Imperial mask to understand that he found liers devoid of interest.

The empress does not seem a favourite among her subjects, nor, by this report, to merit being so; but as for the emperor—

His high moral character has been the pride of the Russian world; and though much is now whispered to invalidate this opinion, yet, by one of the lightest and prettiest women in the high circles, it was said of him, with an accent of entire sincerity, "Il ne peut pas être léger; il vous dit tout crument qu'il vous trouve jolie, mais rien de plus." Nevertheless, in her Majesty's place, I should rather mistrust this passion for masked balls!

The English lady, as we have mentioned, makes a much lower estimate of the morals, manners, and education of the upper classes of Russia than Mr. Bremner, who merely lived a month in Petersburg, in the dull season, while she lived for the greater part of two winters in intimacy with the nobility, or domesticated among them. Her strictures, if less verbally severe, are as decided on the point at issue as those of Captain Jesse. The dissolute manners which, hardly veiled, pervade the entire class, can have received but a feeble check from the example of the Empress, of which Mr. Bremner speaks so warmly. Formerly, he says, the education of a Russian lady of high rank "was not unjustly said to be limited to the study of French, and handling her fan. The young beauty was most thoroughly instructed in the science of turning her personal charms to the greatest account; but while the mode of captivating a lover was so carefully instilled, the more important one of retaining his affections as a husband was left entirely out of view. Such a state of things could not be expected, under an empress belonging to the most highly-educated of all the royal families of Europe, and who had herself received the most complete education that ever a princess enjoyed." The intelligent observer who came after him, drew very different conclusions from sounder and wider premises. She considers the education of the young ladies as superficial and vicious. It is indeed, like many other things which may be seen in Russia, a bad imitation of bad French customs. In speaking of the languid balls, which the rigid discipline of the court renders so constrained and tiresome, she thus adverts to female manners:—

"A "jeune personne,"—in other words, an unmarried woman—is considered a mere cipher in society, danced with seldom, conversed with seldomer, and under these circumstances looks forward to her marriage de convenance as the period which, as I said before, is to commence that which it ought to close. From the day of her marriage she is free—responsible to no one, so that she overstep not the rules of convention for the liberty of her conduct; while her husband is rather piqued than otherwise if her personal charms fail to procure her the particular attentions of his own sex. "Personne ne lui fait la cour" is the most disparaging thing that can be said of a young wife.

If the wife is but moderately handsome she is seldom neglected. What shall be said of a state of society which, among the leading class, justifies the following melancholy observations:—

This social evil is seen in the more glaring colours from the total absence of all rational tastes or literary topics. In other countries it is lamented, and with justice, that literature and education should be made the things of fashion—how infinitely worse is it when they are condemned by the same law! In other countries all fashion, as such, is condemned as bad—how infinitely worse is it where the bad is the fashion! Here it is absolute mauvais genre to discuss a rational subject—mere pédanterie to be caught upon any topics beyond dressing, dancing, and a "jolie tournure." The superficial accomplishments are so superficialised as scarcely to be considered to exist—Russia has no literature, or rather none to attract a frivolous woman:—and political subjects, with all the incidental chit-chat which the observances, anniversaries, &c., of a constitutional government bring more or less into every private family, it is needless to observe, exist not. What then remains? Sad to say, nothing, absolutely nothing, for old and young, man and woman, save the description, discussion, appreciation, or depreciation of toilette—varied by a little cuisine and the witless wit called l'esprit du salon. To own an indifference or an ignorance on the subject of dress, further than a conventional and feminine compliance, would be wilfully to ruin your character equally with the gentlemen as with the ladies of the society; for the former, from some inconceivable motive, will discuss a new bracelet or a new dress with as much relish as if they had hopes of wearing it, and with as great a precision of technical terms as if they had served as a marchand de modes. It may seem almost incredible, but here these externals so entirely occupy every thought, that the highest personage in the land, with the highest in authority under him, will meet and discuss a lady's coiffure, or even a lady's corset, with a gusto and science as incomprehensible in them, to say the least, as the emulation of coachman slang in some of our own eccentric nobility.

But this is not the worst: Than the depths of frivolity there is a lower depth.

Added to this wearying theme, it is the bad taste of the day to indulge in an indelicacy of language which some aver to proceed from the example of the court of Prussia, and which renders at times even the trumperies of toilet or jewellery rather a grateful change of subject.

There are, however, some gracious exceptions; though this is the report of an intelligent Englishwoman, desirous to be as favourable to her Russian friends as truth will permit.

When the peculiar tastes of the "highly-educated" Empress are considered, it is not wonderful that in her court the toilette should be an absorbing interest. She prescribes a very pretty court costume, and, according to Captain Jesse—

Her Imperial Majesty notices the toilette of those of her court to such an extent, that she frequently makes very pointed, and sometimes not very courteous allusions. If a lady presents herself at the palace a second time in the same gown, it seldom escapes her observation, and she is said to have remarked more than once, "Ah, Madame la Comtesse, c'est une ancienne connaissance." Or if the jewels have been reset, "Ah, Madame la Princesse, votre parure a été remontée. Such remarks do not fail to have their effect, not only upon those to whom they are addressed, but upon the rest of the company, who are equally open to them; and this, added to their natural inclination for show and extravagance, makes them lavish to excess. It is not an unusual thing to see ladies of a morning, when they are not expecting company, dressed as if for a wedding breakfast.

But very strange things may, nevertheless, be seen, where so great attention is paid to the toilette. Even the houses of the nobility swarm with vermin of all kinds; the use of finger-glasses is the occasion of worse than American abominations; smoking is allowed in drawing-rooms; and even the ladies sometimes indulge in cigaritos; and spitting-boxes, as an article of refinement, form part of the furniture of the Imperial villa at Moscow. Of Russian manners in high life, Captain Jesse, among many anecdotes of a grosser kind, tells the following:—

I recollect seeing a Russian at St. Petersburg who had gone the round of all the European courts, had been introduced at Almacks, was intimate with the Duke of ——, Lady C., and many other persons of high rank and fashion amongst the English nobility, come into a drawing-room, and bowing most gracefully to the lady of the house, an Englishwoman, walk up to a pier-glass in the room, coolly take out a pocket-comb and arrange his hair. Having performed the operation to his satisfaction, he did not forget, as he replaced his carved tortoise-shell in his pocket, to take out the loose hairs and throw them on the floor. Strange and capricious as such violations of good manners may be, they are trifles compared with the profligacy which, with honourable exceptions, generally pervades society.

But filthy and gross customs are not the worst of a country where a free use of the cane, the whip, and the fist, is the general practice; where the superior officer strikes the inferior at his pleasure; and where both cuff and kick the soldiers like dogs; where the husband, whether in high or in humble life, beats his wife at pleasure; and where the presence of ladies is no security against brutality like this, which is recorded by Captain Jesse:

In Russia, polished manners, nay, even the decencies of life, are often forgotten in the violence of temper fostered by the possession of irresponsible power; and scenes sometimes occur which would not be met with at the tables or in the society of any other European country. At a large dinner-party at which a friend of mine was present, one of the servants in handing a wine-glass had the misfortune to let it fall. The master of the house, a General, totally oblivious of the presence of ladies, rose from his chair, and with one blow laid the luckless offender, his serf, bleeding on the ground; a few excuses followed, as readily accepted as they were made, and the dinner proceeded as if nothing had taken place.

Mr. Bremner tells a similar story:—

The Russians try to conceal from strangers that they chastise their domestic servants in this way: we ourselves saw an instance of it, but we have been told by an Italian, in whom we have every confidence, who had lived among the nobles in the country, that he knew it to be a regular practice. At dinner one day, in the house of a man of high rank, one of the principal servants, equivalent to our butler, omitted something at table—a mere trifle; but the master's blood was chafed at the mistake—his face grew black. He was too polite, however, to say a word before a stranger; but this self-command did not save the offender. The private signal had been given to the man of the scourge, who understands too well to need that his master should betray his barbarity in the presence of foreigners; and that night a respectable domestic bled for an offence which everywhere else would have been sufficiently rebuked with a word!

None are more strict, he said, than ladies, in punishing their servants. The executioner's office is never a sinecure in families where there is no master. . . . . Generally speaking, nothing can be more brutal than the conduct of every man wearing a uniform, whenever he has it in his power; it is in this way that the underling revenges himself for the contumelious treatment he is doomed to endure from those above him. To the poor in particular, they behave in a way which it makes the cheek burn to think of. Fortunately, however, this official brutality is not imitated by people of the lower ranks in their intercourse with each other. Their taskmasters may be cruel and arbitrary, but the peasants among themselves are affectionate and sympathizing to a remarkable degree.

Captain Jesse tells:—

Discipline is kept up by extreme measures, and the cane is used at pleasure; but a man who has received the ribbon of St. George, is, by the regulations of the service, exempt from this species of punishment. The officers not unfrequently give way to violence of temper. I once saw a captain, inspecting his guard near the quarantine at Odessa, strike one of his men a blow on the face with his fist, and, seizing him by both his ears, shake him until he pulled him out of the ranks; the man's cap then fell off, and the officer, ordering a corporal to pick it up, jammed it down on his head with another blow. The whole system is carried on in the same tyrannical and overbearing manner.

Though we gather darker facts regarding the treatment of female serfs by their masters than the following, it may serve as another specimen of Russian civilisation:—

The manner in which the serfs are sometimes treated is perfectly unmanly: they are looked upon as beings made not only for the use, but to submit to all the caprices of their owners. A nobleman, whose house joined mine, accosted me one morning with "Bon jour, mon capitaine: I hope you were not disturbed last night." I replied, that I had been so, by some persons screaming and crying. "Ah, were you!" said my acquaintance; "the fact was, my three washerwomen came home last night dead drunk. 'Conçevez, mon cher, trois femmes ivres mortes!' Had they been men it would have been bad enough—but women! I could not stand it, so I ordered them into the stable to be flogged." And flogged they were by the men their fellow-serfs; and the mystery of the midnight disturbance was fully explained, though not to my satisfaction. This man had received a Parisian education, was rich, and a general officer; he had fought at Leipsic, and was covered with orders.

Mr. Bremner tells of a Russian lord who banished one of his serfs to Siberia, upon the same principle that made David send Uriah to the army of Israel. The wife of the peasant claimed the right to accompany her husband, but this would have entirely defeated the object of his punishment; nor, though the villany of the amorous lord was well understood, could the law protect the innocent, or at all interfere between the tyrant and his victims. This shameful case, however, occasioned a change of the law; and a wife is now at liberty to go to Siberia with her banished husband, if she chooses.

The letter-writer mentions, "we have seen, that, at the masked balls, there were many married women, whose husbands neither knew nor cared where or how they were engaged;" and Captain Jesse thus illustrates the remark:—

So prevalent is light, nay, even licentious conduct, that few women possessing these [the domestic] virtues present themselves to observation; and the finest and most generous natures are soon corrupted by contact with, and the pernicious influence of the many. The men are so much from home on military duty, that their family attachments are naturally weakened, and their admiration of women is merely that of the moment; they do not appreciate, nor become refined by their society. In the short intervals which the government will allow either a husband or son to be at home, he finds, even if he were disposed to enjoy it, very little there to induce him to forego the everlasting balls, theatricals, and the excitement of the gaming-table, so eagerly sought after in this country; that have been, when off duty, his only resource, and to which, from habit, he has become entirely devoted. Smoking, and occasionally a book, vary the routine of his mechanical, servile, and trifling existence; his literary taste is of the same exalted character; for he seldom soars above a novel of De Balzac's, or Paul de Kock. Few years of married life are passed over, before a Russian couple are nothing to each other, and mutual delinquency is overlooked on both sides by tacit consent; appearances are scarcely studied, and it is by no means an uncommon thing to see a man's natural children brought up by his wife. Both manage their "affaires de cœur" with the most perfect coolness imaginable, of which the following anecdote is an example. A nobleman's wife, and the mother of his children, was the object of the attentions of a person of higher rank, and greater riches than himself. This induced her to accept them; but far from its interrupting the intercourse of the husband and wife, she frequently passed a part of her time with him and her grown-up daughters, and when her paramour's carriage arrived for her in the evening, her husband would say, in the presence of his children, "Bon soir, ma chere, la voiture t' attend." This state of things works lamentably well for its own continuance; for how should parents thus circumstanced, command the love and esteem of their children?—nature speaks in vain. They grow up, without a sense of filial duty or respect towards either father or mother, and, consequently, without the latter to themselves.

An anecdote is related by the same gentleman, which, we verily hope and believe, could not be paralleled in any other country in the world:—

I almost witnessed, on my way to the Crimea, the death of the Princess G., who was at that time in the last stage of consumption. Her beauty was peculiar, and, if anything, heightened by this fatal and insidious malady. Though suffering dreadfully from a cough which might be heard in every part of the vessel, she gave no sign of irritability and made no complaint, and her smile betrayed a kind and affectionate heart. Her stay in the Crimea was but short, for, feeling that her end was fast approaching, she requested to be taken back to Odessa. On seeing her children she rallied; but after an ineffectual and painful struggle, sunk under her disease. Two months had not elapsed when I met her husband walking down the most public street in the town, in open day, with one of the lowest prostitutes of the place. But this was not all; soon after he hired a house which had been forfeited to the government by Prince V., for the part he took in the conspiracy of 1825, and set up a kind of guinguette in the garden. Here Russian swings, retired summer-houses, and a temporary ball-room were erected. A restaurateur was also engaged, and the prince's own band, composed of his serfs, attended in the evening. The price of admission was five rubles. At this garden, the prostitutes of the town, headed by another nobleman's mistress and his own, held their saturnalia; the prince acted as master of the ceremonies, and busied himself in visiting the different tables and seeing that the counter was properly attended to.

This gentleman was the brother of the military governor of the town. And was he cut by any of his own class? Not at all. Did they even endeavour to keep aloof from him? No such thing; the question was, whether it was a good speculation and likely to answer.

As a set-off against such debasing profligacy, and the low and vicious state of moral feeling which these anecdotes argue, we must, from the lady's letters from Petersburg, though not quite in place, give this sentimental anecdote of Taglioni.

Taglioni is now the great star of attraction; and, caressée by the Imperial family, worshipped by the young nobles, applauded by overflowing audiences, and most munificently paid, this poetess of the ballet has every reason to be satisfied with her northern visit. But poor Taglioni has suffered deeply here; and, while she dances at night under the least possible encumbrance of gauze drapery, appears by day, her little girl in her hand, shrouded in the deepest widow's mourning—not for her husband, but for a lover, who it seems had proved the more constant friend of the two. At all events, there are not many in Petersburg who may throw stones; —nor, to do them justice, do they seem disposed.

This does look like charity and fellow feeling.

Next to being a slovenly and filthy, and a kicking and cuffing people, the Russians are distinguished as a kissing nation. At Easter, the mistress kisses all her maids; the noblest lady saluting the meanest vassal maiden of her household. Our brilliant letter-writer, on New-Year's eve, was present at a great family reunion. When the house-clock sounded midnight, a great deal of loud and hearty kissing took place among friends and relatives; much like what many of our ancient Scotch readers may remember to have seen in their younger years; though the custom, where it lingers at all, has gradually sunk into the more decorous grasping of friendly hands, and pledging of healths. But the Russians, we have said, are an eminently kissing nation; and the kiss—

The national salute is in universal vogue from remote antiquity—rather a greeting than a caress—derived equally from religious feeling and from oriental custom. Fathers and sons kiss—old generals with rusty moustaches kiss—whole regiments kiss. The Emperor kisses his officers. On a reviewing day there are almost as many kisses as shots exchanged. If a Lilliputian corps de cadets have earned the Imperial approval, the Imperial salute is bestowed upon the head boy, who passes it on with a hearty report to his neighbour, he in his turn to the next, and so on, till it has been diluted through the whole juvenile body. . . . . .

On a holiday or jour de fête the young and delicate mistress of a house will not only kiss all her maid-servants but all her men-servants too, and, as I have mentioned before, if the gentleman venture not above her hand she will stoop and kiss his cheek. As for the Russian father of a family, his affection knows no bounds; if he leaves his cabinet d'affaires ten times in the course of the morning and enter his lady's saloon above, he kisses all his family when he enters, and again when he leaves the room: sometimes indeed so mechanically, that, forgetting whether he has done it or not, he goes a second round to make all sure. To judge also from the number of salutes, the matrimonal bond in these high circles must be one of uninterrupted felicity—a gentleman scarcely enters or leaves the room without kissing his wife, either on forehead, cheek, or hand.

This is almost too much of a good thing; yet we wish the Russians had no worse novel customs than this primitive and rude one.

Mr. Bremner sums up a view of Russian civilisation, which, though not quite consistent with what this hasty observer has said in many other places of his work, coincides entirely with the impressions hinted at by the lady, and the opinions openly expressed by Captain Jesse. Having described a magnificent dinner, which is much the same as a similar entertainment in Paris, or Vienna, or in houses in London, where foreign manners are affected, he proceeds:—

With all his wealth, however—with all his passion for travelling, all his taste for languages, and all the elegance of his table—the Russian noble is still but half civilized.* Such, at least, is the opinion of those who know him best. He puts on the dress, and learns the manners of other European nations, but is infinitely behind them in all the qualities that constitute real refinement. This sentence may appear a harsh one, but was still more harsh, as expressed to us by a gentleman who had studied them for years. "The Russian," said he, "has but the exterior of a civilised man: in heart he is both brutal and cruel—devoid of delicacy and feeling. Before strangers, he is smooth and plausible; in the bosom of his family he is rough and tyrannical. For instance—the kindness and affection which a wife expects, and is entitled to, are seldom rendered by a Russian spouse. He treats her well before the world, because, otherwise, he would be reminding people that he is a Russian; but in private, harsh words—ay, and harsher blows—are often inflicted on his helpless mate.

* "We have seen this term applied by an able writer in Blackwood, to the Danes, Norwegians, and Swedes; but surely with little justice. These nations are as much entitled to be called "civilized" as ourselves. Of wealth indeed, they have less than the English; but of free institutions, though differently modified, they can boast as well as England; while of education, taking the whole population, they display even a higher average than ourselves; and these certainly are good titles to all the honours of civilisation, even when wealth is deficient."—Bremner.

Of the real truth of this charge, no stranger can know much; but we heard from a Russian himself, that he knew the practice of beating their wives to be extremely common among people of rank; while a foreign lady, who has been in the country, says, "that she suspected it in many cases, and knew that it was done, and cruelly, in several; one victim, of high rank, having often bared her arm and shoulder to show the too obvious marks of her husband's ferocity.

Perhaps in what follows, Mr. Bremner intends a handsome reprehension to the vulgarities of the same sort, which are admired at home, when pine-apples, green peas, cherries, and strawberries are purchased at their weight in gold, to grace a dinner, given within perhaps a half-mile of a street full of starving Spitalfields' weavers. If Christian feeling be the true test of civilisation, we are, in many respects, not greatly in advance of our northern neighbours.

That their civilisation is but half completed, is also proved by the tasteless splendour of the entertainments in which many indulge. They are not contented with what nature can furnish, but they must oppose nature. The finest fruits at the proper seasons are not enough for them: some display the rarest delicacies of the stove and the garden, in the months when art must help the season. Great sums are expended on hothouses, in order to produce grapes and other unseasonable rarities in winter. Cherries are to be seen at table in the month of February at a guinea a-piece. Prince P——, who used to spend £1300 on a single entertainment, was in the habit of surpassing this cherry-fête, by displaying plums, peaches, and apricots, at the expense of a couple of guineas for each piece. Little wonder, then, that he has now got rid of his troublesome wealth!

All travellers denounce the system of Espionage; the Secret Police of the Russian government. Its ramifications are minute and endless; it is present—either felt or understood—in every corner of the empire, throwing its net-work over all, and, if we may believe these accounts, comprehending Europe, and Asia, and America, in its meshes. The domestic hearth is not too sacred, the privy-council not too close for its approach. The lady, the guest of the man at its head, only indicates its presence by hints about husbands and fathers on their return from court or council, not venturing to open their lips in their private domestic circle, save in mysterious whispers, of the emperor being in good or in tolerable humour on that lucky day. Captain Jesse speaks out with perfect freedom:—

However defective the administration of the law, customs, and public police, that of the secret is far from being so; it is one of the most powerful engines of Russian despotism, and immense sums are expended upon the maintenance of its emissaries in foreign countries. There is scarcely an embassy that has not one of these gentlemen attached to it; for, strange as it may appear, they sometimes, nay, not unfrequently, present themselves in that character; more humble individuals, however, are to be found in this capacity. During the war between Russia and Persia, Sir J. Macdonald's butler acted as one, and gave all the information that he could to a person at Teheran, by whom it was regularly forwarded to Paskewitch, through Rosen, who commanded a division.

No one who has read the correspondence between Sir J. M'Neil and the English government, can doubt that a number of these spies were employed by Count Simonich and the Russian government throughout Central Asia: they are so at the present moment. One of them, a Baron Dieskau, alluded to by Capt. Wilbraham, was received into the military service of Russia for his doings in Afghanistan; and Capt. W. adds, "that any one who has been in India, whatever may have been the cause of his quitting the country, is received with open arms." The employés of this fearful inquisition are scattered amongst all classes of the community. They are to be found in the Imperial residence, and the drawing-rooms of the nobility; in the General's tent, and on the quarter-deck; in the barrack-room and below decks; behind the counter, in the cabin of the mujik, and among servants of all degrees: the fair sex in the very highest circles are sometimes the paid agents of this most loathsome and disgusting organ of the government.

Captain Jesse tells an anecdote of Benkendorf, which might have challenged the admiration of Fouché, and thus proceeds:—

Individual liberty may be said to depend on the caprices of the police; it is by no means necessary for them to assign a reason for any arrest that is made; any one, guilty or not, or merely suspected, can be, and often is, taken up and imprisoned, punished or banished without ever knowing why, unless his memory can rake up some thoughtless expression against the government, which might be magnified or exaggerated into a political crime; but very possibly he may not succeed in recollecting even that.

During my stay at Odessa, two French booksellers, the only good ones in the place, were visited one evening by the hirelings of this department, and in a winter's night, with the thermometer at eighteen degrees below zero of Reaumur, were ordered into a sledge which was ready for them at the door, and, in perfect ignorance of their crime, were posted off, night and day, to Kief, a distance of six hundred versts. On reaching their destination, the Governor, notorious for his dastardly conduct to the Poles, ordered them into the fortress, where they were confined in a damp casemate near the ditch. During the whole of this time they were kept in a wretched state of filth, had nothing but straw to lie upon, and the little money that they had with them when they left Odessa having been taken away on their arrival, they had only the prison fare, black bread and water, to live upon. All communication was cut off, even from their families. Having been in the habit of dealing with one of them, a quiet, inoffensive man, I went several times to his nephew, who carried on the business, to see whether he had heard from him, but no tidings had been received. The first intelligence he had of his uncle was from the Austrian territory, for after an imprisonment of five months, the affair ended by their being galloped over the frontier by some Cossacks, and turned loose like wild beasts, with rather an unnecessary recommendation never to recross it. Their supposed crime was having sold some Polish national songs.

We leave to the imagination of the reader the reflections which this condition of society draws from an Englishman, who otherwise is not at all remarkable for political liberalism.

Booksellers are a description of traders neither liked nor wanted in Russia. European publications and journals, bearing in any respect upon public affairs, or breathing free opinions, are, without exception, proscribed. The only English newspaper allowed to enter the Russian dominions is the Morning Post, which probably is at all times a safe and proper journal, and that for reasons and considerations well understood. Even the harmless Galignani's Messenger is now excluded, the current gossip, or the mere every-day facts of the rest of Europe, not being acceptable in the emperor's dominions. In explaining the prevailing system of espionage, Mr. Bremner, though the most lenient and courtly of impartial travellers, makes, on we know not what authority, this extraordinary relation :—

The tact of Nicholas in selecting the men fittest for his purpose, is equalled only by the wonderful quality which he has of inspiring them with devotion to himself. Those who serve him at home may not be so warmly attached to him; on them falls all the trouble arising from his activity and vigilance. But his foreign agents are too far off to feel the lash. They hear the shouts, and catch something of the reflected splendour of his triumphs, without being soiled by the dust that is raised. In short, they only see the bright side of their master's character, and are not in the way to be fretted by his discipline. Instead of the sharp rebukes which he deals unsparingly out to those near him, they are receiving only compliments and encouragement. Hence it is that we never yet saw a Russian agent in any part of the world who did not live, as it were, exclusively for the Emperor. He may be fond of gaiety, of this or that pursuit, but it is ever secondary to a higher passion—a desire to please his imperial protector, by the most unwearied attention in promoting Russian interests. He lives but for this, and often is not over scrupulous about the means he employs in the cause. There are Russian ambassadors at some courts—perhaps all of them do the same—who employ spies in the house of the English minister—who can neither receive a friend, nor give a dinner, without the certainty that some of his servants will report every word that has passed on the occasion. Per fas aut nefas should be the motto of Russian diplomatists. With them the end justifies the means. If they can serve the Emperor by it, they see no harm in breaking through the decencies of life.

Nor is it always to needy lackeys that these gentlemen trust for information. Persons who, from their profession and standing in society, ought to be above such treachery, are often dragged into this base traffic. No Englishman would stoop so low; but there are foreigners in English pay, who carry tales from the table they dine at.

In addition to such auxiliaries, the emperor has his regular bands of well-salaried scouts, men and women, Russian and native, in every capital of Europe, whose duty it is to ascertain the sentiments of the leading men towards Russia, and keep the ambassador on the spot, or the political police at St. Petersburg, acquainted with all that may concern the views or wishes of the emperor. It was said the other day by one residing in Paris, and from his position well qualified to know what is passing, "We have five hundred well-dressed men and women here, moving in the best society, who, if it were allowable to give things their plain names, would be described as nothing else than Russian spies."

As might be expected from its vicinity to Poland, no country is more carefully watched than Germany. The emperor's vigilance is not satisfied with placing sentinels at the principal cities merely, such as Dresden and Munich; for it is well known that he also maintains a spy at each of the German universities. The state of opinion among the students, from Königsberg to Freiburg in the Brisgau, and from Kiel to Vienna, is as well known to the secret police of St. Petersburg as to the criminal judges of the universities themselves. But Russia may now dispense with this branch of her espionage: for the students of Germany, once such hot-headed revolutionists, are, now, happily, most completely cured of all their political enthusiasm.

If Russia be thus vigilant in the west and in the centre of Europe, we need not be surprised to find her even more so in those quarters where, as we have seen, she has still a greater interest at stake. It is chiefly in the East that she puts forth all her means of seduction and espionage. The whole of the regions included under that general term, are now struggling in the net which she has silently spread over them. Disdaining no aid, however low, provided it can be useful, she descends so far as to employ hôtel-keepers, and those most in the way of seeing strangers, for the sake of watching all that go or come. Hence it is no uncommon thing in Greece and Turkey to be told, "Take care what you say before your landlord—he is a Russian." Besides this stationary troop, she has a moveable corps of agents, who are constantly traversing all parts of Turkey and the adjacent regions. No traveller can move any distance without meeting some of these.

Should any think that we are pushing the emperor's vigilance too far, and giving him by his agents an almost ubiquitous influence, we would remind the reader, that many carry his interference still further. Who is it that incites the Arabs in the neighbourhood of Constantina against the French? The Parisian journalists answer, "The Emperor Nicholas." What has stirred up the disturbances in Canada? "Russian gold," say the American newspapers—which further state, that there are agents of the emperor busily at work, even in the United States, rallying the malcontents against England! After these specimens of what is believed by some, about the extent of Russian interference, who shall accuse us of exaggeration in saying that it is so actively exerted in countries where the emperor makes no secret of his intrigues?

Mr. Bremner went to Russia with the common opinion that Nicholas was, in few words, what his atrocious conduct to the Poles, and in the Caucasus, and often in his own dominions, points him out to be; but he saw reason, he says, to change or modify his unfavourable opinions; and he makes those apologies for Nicholas, which might, with far more justice, be urged to extenuate the monstrosities of Ivan the Cruel, or the brutality of Peter the Great. He says :—

He is the slave of a vicious system—tied to a course from which, as yet, he has not been able to break loose. The worst excesses he has been guilty of arise from an ungovernable temper, which, by nature sufficiently strong, has been further strengthened to such a degree by the long exercise of unchecked, uncontrolled authority, that now it often bursts out in the most fatal ebullitions. His defenders assert, however, that when the passing madness has subsided, he is the first to regret, and, if possible, to atone for what has been done. They will not allow that the stern, we might say the cruel system of discipline which prevails in the fleet and the army, and extends to officers as well as privates, can with justice be attributed to him; for it is not of his creating, but has been handed down from the times when Russian officers were really as barbarous as Russian privates; and he continues it because, from his military education, he believes it to be the best. In fine, those who know him most intimately assert, that however violent he may be under the fits of passion alluded to, he is not tyrannical on system, or from innate fierceness of disposition.

If neither from system nor disposition, from what proceeds the tyranny of the Autocrat? But the question is not of the vicious system which Nicholas found in existence, but whether instead of checking it, and endeavouring to cultivate the arts of peace, and secure the happiness of his people, he has not exceeded his most tyrannical predecessors, in their worst failings,—their military and despotic propensities. So far as depends on his tastes, the empire is one huge camp or barrack, of which he is the first drill-sergeant, making free use of the cane. Of his passion for soldiership its most ignoble form, Mr. Bremner, in the midst of his laboured vindication, remarks—

This propensity degenerates almost to a weakness: it is his great aim to give the whole empire the appearance of an encampment. This passion is so well known, that the very children in the streets are made to affect the air military, strutting about in a white cap with red band à l'Empereur. On entering a school, the boys and girls rise in files to salute you after the military fashion, and march out, as if wheeling to the sound of fife and drum. In the very prisons, a dash of the corporal's discipline is visible; and even in the hospitals you would say the old nurses ape the imperial guard.

Even the royal nurseries are arranged on the military principle. It was the criticism of an able old soldier—"He treats his army as a little girl does her doll; and teaches his children to do the same." But he, moreover, treats it like a passionate little fury of a girl, who takes all manner of caprices, and who as readily slaps her doll's face, as she caresses, and dresses, and undresses it. Of this affectionate father, who has outlived the age of violent passions, Mr. Bremner, after alluding to the celebrated oration made in Warsaw, which specimen of Imperial and Russian eloquence, threats made good by speedy acts, Europe will never forget,—gives the following trait:—

He is so apt to be carried away by passion in debate, that words often entirely fail him. He has a way, however, of filling up the pause: in an interview with the French ambassador, the discussion became so warm that his majesty, chafed by opposition, at last, in the agony of unwilling words, summed up his arguments very intelligibly, by striking his hand with great violence on the table—a most impressive figure of speech. On another occasion, when hard pressed for a good argument, he rushed to the window, threw it open, and, pointing significantly to some regiments exercising below, clenched his remonstrance with the words, "Voilà ma garde; ce n'est que la vingtième partie de mon armée!" The Emperor knew well that, after all, force is the best ultima ratio of kings.

The Emperor is very religious by all accounts, if such mummings as are described by the lady and by Mr. Bremner be religion—a question which we leave to divines:—

His devoutness while in church is extreme. Some say its part is here overacted; for there is no end to the bowings and salutations between him and the officiating clergy when the service is over. No saint's-day, or formality of the church, is ever neglected by him; and in travelling, he never passes a steeple without crossing himself as devoutly as the yemtchik who drives him. The fervour of his superstition, if not of his devotion, is well shown by a recent act, which is spoken of with great applause by the priests. He has added a new saint to the calendar.

The toleration allowed by the Emperor is of a piece with his religion, and with the abolition of torture, long boasted of in Russia, where prisoners are now only knouted to make them confess, not tortured.

If such be the best that an English traveller can say, who confesses that he went to Russia with prejudices against the Emperor and his government, which a closer inspection overcame, what shall we expect from one, who, the longer he remained in that country, saw the more reason to condemn the man and the system. Captain Jesse sees in Nicholas the legitimate successor of Peter the Great, in his worst character as a sovereign.

All liberal ideas of government died with Alexander. Military despotism, which Peter the Great first systematized in this country, has been more or less the prevailing feature of its government under succeeding monarchs; and peculiarly falls in with the taste of Nicholas. At a late inspection of one of the military colonies he exercised a regiment consisting of six hundred boys—the colonel being only eleven years of age; and they are said to have gone through their manœuvres with all the precision of old soldiers. The lavish expenditure in reviews, from which no benefit is derived, and which take place merely to gratify his extraordinary passion for playing at soldiers, is perfectly absurd.

The garrison of the capital amounts to one-fifth of the population. Such is the military tone and organization given to and spread over the social system of the country, and every branch of the government, that the rank and privileges of the nobility; foundling hospitals and education; literature, civil law, physic, and the navy are all modelled, and the aspirants to, or students in either, are drilled after the most approved system of military discipline. Even the little Grand Dukes and Grand Duchesses are surrounded by the insignia of modern warfare; and their nursery has all the appearance of an arsenal in miniature.

The letters of the lady allude to the general corruption prevailing among the public functionaries of Russia, from the highest to the lowest, and whether in the Army, Navy, or Civil Service; if Russia may be said to have any civil service. The Emperor is certainly most sincere and earnest in his endeavours to stop peculation and bribery; but he unfortunately begins at the wrong end. Like many other legislators, he has no idea of the virtue of prevention. All Russian officials are wretchedly ill paid. The pay of a general-officer is scarcely equal to that of major in the British service; that of a surgeon is about £80 a-year; and of a lieutenant £28. Pilfering and peculation consequently prevail in every department. Captain Jesse relates several instances of this degrading and demoralizing system; and gives a curious picture of the beggarly and wretched appointments of an army which yet wears a fair and a gay exterior. Of bribery in the administrative departments, Mr. Bremner is constrained to say, that—

It grinds the poor, and impoverishes the rich; it is practised in every branch of the administration, from the lowest clerk to the highest minister; it paralyzes industry, enterprise, merit, in every corner of the empire. If you commence a lawsuit, however just your cause, it remains undecided for years, unless you bribe the judges again and again. If you want a government contract, the heads of the department must be propitiated with half of your calculated profits. If a situation is procured, it must be paid for. If you wish to have your passport, especially in any of the remote provinces, a thousand difficulties can be thrown in the way, till money removes them.

The sums drawn in the shape of bribes by some people in office are quite enormous, not only in the capital, but in the provinces also. There is a town in the south of Russia where the director of police has an income of 80,000 rubles a-year (£3,200), though his regular salary is only 6000 rubles, or £240.

When Captain Jesse, after living for nearly a year at Odessa, was about to set out for Moscow and Petersburg, he was compelled to go through the usual tedious and irritating forms of obtaining a passport, which prove so irksome to all travellers, and which are often both expensive and inconvenient. After all appeared to be concluded, and when he had danced attendance for several days, and been spunged by different subordinate jacks-in-office, he came to this conclusion :—

The following day I was once more at my post; but this time it was evident that the legal (though not the illegal) forms and demands had been complied with. My papers lay duly arranged upon the table, but the man in green paid no attention to me; and though many applicants were successful, the crowd around him appeared to increase, rather than diminish. I soon saw how matters stood; and feeling certain that, unless I followed the example of those who had retired, I should again be desired to "call again to-morrow," I put my hand into my pocket, a sign-manual which this purveyor of signatures perfectly understood, and we effected an amicable exchange. Handing me the papers, he pocketed the silver, with the most perfect "sang froid," telling me, as he dropped the 52-copeck pieces into his pocket, that "the Imperial salary would not keep him in boots."

At Belgorod, on his journey, he relates :—

The Ispravnik at this station threw every difficulty in the way of our having horses. The bribe which I administered, as usual, was not large enough, for he rejected it with contempt, saying, though with an evidently painful effort, "Sir, I am the representative of the emperor, and scorn to take a bribe." Seeing, however, that I was about to leave the yard, to get horses in the town, he speedily altered his determination, and begged for a few copecks more.

On this journey, some dismal sights were witnessed, which, unhappily, are not unfrequent in those parts of Russia. The scene is the track between Orel and Tula; and on to Vashani.

This day we found whole families lying by the side of the track craving for food. On making inquiries, through my interpreter, I found that many of them had slept in the open steppe for several days, living upon the precarious assistance they received from the few travellers who passed. Their husbands, indeed all the men, had left them for the south, where there was less distress: more than once during our journey we had met them in parties of twenty and thirty at a time. This district, and the town of Tula, were only kept quiet by the presence of a division of infantry, encamped near the suburb by which we entered. The artisans employed at the Imperial manufactory of arms were well enough off, as they had their meal and flour served out to them at a fixed price all the year round; fluctuation, therefore, was of no consequence to them—the rest were in a wretched state. Formerly provision was made against such a calamity by housing large quantities of grain, which was supplied by each proprietor, according to the number of serfs he possessed; but these stores sometimes perished, from want of care and bad granaries, and were also materially reduced by peculation. Besides this, the nobility, always in difficulties, thought it would be more to their advantage to get interest upon the value of the corn thus lying idle. The subscriptions were therefore taken in money instead of in kind, and the sums collected were placed in the Lombard bank, or other government securities. The absurdity of this system was proved in the present instance; the money was useless, there was neither rye nor wheat to be bought either in these provinces or at St. Petersburg. The owners of the serfs were interested in keeping them alive, if not from motives of humanity, at least as property; but where were they? on their estates, exerting themselves to soften or relieve the miseries of their dependants? No, at Rome, Vienna, or the German watering-places, gambling away the money received for the corn their toil had raised, and for want of a portion of which they were now starving. One of these absentees, with whom I was one day in conversation, told me that he had just returned from his estates in White Russia, adding, "It is the first time I ever saw my peasants."

Unhappily Captain Jesse needed not have gone beyond the British seas to find a peasantry, under absentee lords, not indeed nominally serfs, possessing some civil if no political rights, but in physical condition not much better off than those starving Russians. The prices of grain in those provinces had that season risen seven-fold. In discussing the social condition of the Russian serf, whose moral qualities he rates rather highly, and who is, in truth, the most praiseworthy character in the country he inhabits—his virtues being all his own, his vices those of his debased state—Mr. Bremner makes this painful admission, thus confirming the nearly universal report of British travellers, in every clime, for the last ten years.

That the food of the Russian peasant should be so poor will not surprise any who consider that his earnings are exceedingly small. Nine rubles a week—or seven shillings and sixpence, English—are frequently all that a labourer can gain; and, even in the manufactories, the best hands earn only eleven rubles, or nine shillings and sixpence of our money.

On the whole, however, so far at least as mere food and lodging are concerned, the Russian peasant is not so badly off as the poor man amongst ourselves. He may be rude and uneducated:—liable to be ill-treated by his superiors—intemperate in his habits, and filthy in his person; but he never knows the misery to which the Irish peasant is exposed. His food may be coarse; but he has abundance of it. His hut may be homely; but it is dry and warm. We are apt to fancy, that if our peasantry be badly off, we can at least flatter ourselves with the assurance that they are much more comfortable than those of foreign countries. But this is a gross delusion. Not in Ireland only, but in parts of Great Britain usually considered to be exempt from the miseries of Ireland, we have witnessed wretchedness compared with which the condition of the Russian boor is luxury, whether he live amid the crowded population of large towns, or in the meanest hamlets of the interior. There are parts of Scotland, for instance, where the people are lodged in houses which the Russian peasant would not think fit for his cattle. During the present autumn, (1838,) in the rich and populous county of Inverness, we have beheld scenes of wretchedness, exceeding all that we ever witnessed, either in Russia or any other part of the world.

And after describing the miserable condition of the people in a valley in Inverness-shire, that is named, and which is the property of a new millionnaire, he justly exclaims, "Compare the comforts of the Russian peasant with misery such as this!" Yet a handsome rent is drawn by the wealthy landlord for that pastoral valley, and one which has probably been quadrupled within fifty years.

On the subject of the Russian peasantry Captain Jesse is most eloquent: and much of what he has said, would be quite as much apt nearer home than Russia.

Even the generality of those who have had all the advantages of birth and education, whose nobility is of long standing, make but few attempts to elevate the character and condition of their dependants. The principal idea they have in connexion with their improvement, is to increase their value as property. A tailor is worth more than a labourer, but only a few get the benefit of this spurious benevolence. I know a nobleman who, from similar motives, had his serf taught music; this man always played the pianoforte at his quadrille parties in the country; at Petersburg he did duty as a footman. Why do not those, who have both the means and power, patiently and earnestly persist in improving the habits of the serfs? why do they suffer them to feed like swine, and not give them any idea of a decent deportment? The task would be difficult indeed to teach them to appreciate these things, but if only made to do them it would be one step gained in a generation. . . . Nothing is done to ameliorate the habits of the serfs which are dirty in the extreme, more particularly in the towns; and though they sometimes use the vapour bath, they seldom or never wash themselves, or change their clothes or linen.

The pink shirt, or cotton caftan, that is put on new on Easter-day, is never removed from the wearer's back, excepting when he bathes. He works or idles, eats, drinks, and sleeps in it, and the clothes, as well as the hair and beard, are generally disgustingly filthy. The sheob, or sheepskin, is put on at the commencement of winter; and as it is worn many years consecutively, it becomes at last black with grease: a bed is almost unknown amongst them. . . . . Though in an indirect manner, I have known them sold in the streets and market-place of Kief. The men only are reckoned as souls,—if young and healthy they usually fetch a thousand rubles a-head: a woman that is no soul costs only five hundred. Serfs are often staked at the gaming-table; and I knew of one who was bartered for a pointer.

As we have mentioned, there is a remarkable harmony among these travellers on all vital points, greatly as they differ in temper and in the circumstances under which they saw Russian society and institutions. On the condition of the peasantry, and the character of the Emperor, they are at one, and they take nearly the same view of the prospects of the country. It is one to fill the philanthropist with deep pity for the subjects of the Czar, but to quiet undue apprehensions for the preservation of the peace of Europe. And for the subjugation of Europe, although an important frontier post was carried when Poland fell, that surely enters into no one's dreams. Nicholas has his hands full enough for the term of any one middle-aged Autocrat's life. Those who are very sensitive to alarm, will do well to study Captain Jesse's sketch of the progress of the war in the Caucasus, and his account of the organization and internal economy of the Russian army. The only fault to be found with him is having fairly lost his temper while performing a very tantalizing quarantine at Odessa, when he entered the dominions of the Czar, and never having fully recovered his equanimity, until he exultingly bade adieu to Petersburg;—"Glad to escape" as he says, "from—to the capital of her less powerful but infinitely more civilized neighbours," the Swedes.

From what he has seen at Odessa, and on his subsequent journey, Captain Jesse conceives himself qualified to give an opinion on the absorbing topic of the day—the Corn Laws. He is decidedly opposed to their abolition. After raising many hypothetical cases and objections, and stating what the perfidious conduct of the Autocrat might be, were Old England depending on Russia for bread, he ends by triumphantly inquiring of these supposed cases, "Where is the cheap loaf?" The question may be aptly answered by another: "Where is it now?"—when has it been seen by the labourers of England; when will it be seen by them under the existing corn laws? It is not probable that England will ever depend for any great proportion of her bread upon Russia, though those laws were abolished to-morrow; but on whom has she long depended for articles only less important to her existence than corn; namely, for hemp, tallow, and other commodities, which Russia has been as eager to supply, as England was to obtain.

Of these four travellers, the lady is the most sanguine in belief of the stability of the Emperor's power, or, in other words, of the principle of military absolutism being fixed in Russia. But her incidental revelations of the state of national feeling does not corroborate her ideas of the firmness of the Emperor's hold; or of the consolidation of his unwieldy power. The idiotic or fantastical loyalty of the masses in the capital, and of many, in all parts of Russia Proper, does not pervade the Baltic provinces any more than those of the Black Sea, and the East. The jealousy and hatred existing between the Russians and Estonians, after having been a hundred and twenty years under the same sovereign, and treated with comparative indulgence, is as lively as ever. The Russians despise the rude Estonians, and consider them as a conquered people; while the bitterest reproach that an Estonian can make to his compatriot, is "You have the heart of a Russian."

Hand-book for Emigrants and Others. Being a History of New Zealand, its State and Prospects. By John Bright, M.R.C.S. London: Hooper.

This, if not very well written, appears to us a conscientious and intelligent little book. The title, Hand-book, is, however, rather too much. The author seems to have named it, Information for Emigrants to the Southern Hemisphere; and it certainly furnishes a considerable portion of really useful, and, above all, of honest information. The author, a medical man, went originally out to South Australia, with emigrants, and with the apparent intention of settling in that colony; but the climate did not agree with him; and, in 1839, he sailed to New Zealand, attracted by the favourable accounts of that settlement, and there recovered his health. He has just returned to England, whether to remain or not does not appear; and his work comes forth from the usual reasons, but under no suspicion of either personal or one-sided motives. He gives an outline of all the Australian colonies, and prefers New Zealand to any of them, for the same substantial reasons that have led all impartial judges (ourselves included) to arrive at the same decision. What, indeed, can be placed in the balance against a richer soil, and a better climate, and those advantages of good harbours, and, to some extent, navigable rivers, which New Zealand possesses. Yet he does not represent New Zealand as altogether a terrestrial paradise; and his cautions to emigrants are at least as frequent as his encouragements. It is this fair dealing which gives us a favourable opinion of his book. We shall permit him to speak for himself, selecting what we consider some of the most important passages in his guide-book. These are not the history of the colonies, nor the account of their productions; nor yet dissertations on their presumed capabilities. Of these things the public has heard to satiety. Mr. Bright does not think that the New Zealand Company has had any right to complain so vehemently of those government functionaries in the colony, who had higher public interests to attend to, than in every particular to accommodate them. He seems also to have some doubts as to the validity of the titles which the Company have the power of obtaining, or granting, to purchasers in England; and he remarks—

The Hon. W. Petre, in a work he has just published on the Company's settlements, from which he has lately returned to England, states, that "Shortly after I left, the Bally arrived, bearing the terms of the final arrangement between the New Zealand Company and the Government." Not, however, explaining what that arrangement may be.

The Company are chartered to purchase lands in New Zealand; the local government, having or not having a restraining power, interferes, until the titles to the lands purchased shall have been adjudged to be valid. The charter does not give the Company a power to purchase as they please, or the local government could not stay their proceedings. As affecting present purchasers, no one can say whether the title will be recognised or not; and if decisive information be not afforded on that head, I should deem it a risk to purchase any land-order in England. The specifications of land claims were lodged with the Colonial Secretary in Sydney, as late as January of the present year; what length of forms, or investigation, they had to undergo, did not appear; from there, they were to be referred back to New Zealand, for the inquest of the three commissioners, (one has been sent from London;) this preparatory step would occupy, perhaps, three months; so that no investigation would occur before May, and the adjudications might not be published before the latter end of this year, 1841.

The settler, on the eve of embarking, would do well to await further intelligence, to know the government decision on titles to land already purchased; and what regulations they will issue affecting its future sale. The arrangements between the local government and the directors of the Company, ought to be rendered very clear, before any purchases are made from them, however they may be guaranteed here. I consider it a bad plan taking land-orders; when you arrive you may be determined to settle in districts where the company have no land, and it is not so easy to part with your order there, as it might seem from the accounts you hear at home. In the colonies an excitement is created about land before it is offered in the market; not the pen of Robins could depict greater advantages than do the colonial land-sellers, when they are dressing a district for the hammer. All this requires time and local experience; reference to courts of law are more expensive abroad than at home; and if new settlers are to be hampered with such proceedings on settling, they need not expect any other result than pauperism.

Mr. Petre, at the conclusion of his narrative, adds to our uncertainties about the settlement. He says, "I now foresee no check to the prosperity of the colony, except, indeed, in the possibility of Governor Hobson's perseverance in a policy with respect to the seat of government, which admits of no justification."

Mr. Bright thinks the Governor justifiable in retaining the seat of government at Auckland, where considerable expense has already been incurred for public buildings, &c.; and therefore, if the ruin of the colony is, as Mr. Petre predicts, to follow this choice of the seat of government, it is already incurred. We do not feel competent to speak on this head. It is probable that the seat of government will remain for a considerable time at least where it has been planted, whether wisely or not; and it is not likely that this, or any other cause, can now bring the colonization of New Zealand, as Mr. Petre foretells, "to a speedy and disastrous end." The Governor may persist in remaining at Auckland, instead of adopting the Company's head-quarters, Wellington, and yet the colony, we should hope, prosper; though the Company's prospects may be temporarily damped. To proceed with Mr. Bright's corrections of Mr. Petre:—

In the next place, as I am writing for the public, I must notice the prices of provisions at Wellington. Mr. Petre states—mutton and beef are from 8d. to 1s. per pound; pork, from 4d. to 6d. I think, if Mr. Petre will refer to market prices, he will find this below the actual cost; it certainly is below the cost in the district where, to judge from his statement, (although singular it should be so,) there is a smaller population; and, as the resident agents of the company must be aware, more extensive and older trade—I mean, the northern districts. Poultry and eggs, he says, are scarce and dear at the south; and neither butter nor milk are stated by him, more than that milch cows were there to produce enough for constant sale.

In a letter, dated May, 1841, published in the New Zealand Journal, the prices are given as follows:—mutton, 1s.; beef, 1s. to 1s. 4d.; pork, 7d.; bacon, 1s. 7d.; salt butter, 2s. 6d.; fresh butter, 4s. to 5s.; bread, 8d. (2 lbs.); tea, 5s.; sugar, 4d. to 7d.; cheese, 2s. 6d.; beer, 6d. a pint; liquor, 3s. to 3s. 4d.; rice, 3d.; stout shoes, 13s. to 25s.; women's shoes, (worth at home 2s. 6d.,) 7s. to 8s.; natives build a hut (small!) for a blanket and 10s.

The Company's wages are, 20s. a-week, with 10 lbs. salt pork, and 10 lbs. flour, as rations; carpenters' wages, from 10s. to 12s.; sawyers', from 12s. to 15s.

Extracts from letters published in the New Zealand Journal:—

"Kawia, New Zealand, 14th February, 1840.—One great convenience in the new colony is, that provisions are comparatively abundant and cheap. I have no doubt that, before this time, fresh pork will be sold there at 6d. a pound, and potatoes at £4 per ton. There is plenty of work, but the labourers do not obtain exorbitant wages. Ladies, however, did not seem quite at home."

"Port Nicholson, 11th February, 1841.—Port Nicholson is a very good place; there is not much fine land about it, but there is some fine trade, and a fine port for shipping. I have got a full quarter an acre of ground, for which I pay £7. It is rather out of the heart of the town for business for a time: but there is scarcely a lot of ground to be got in the heart of the town. I know some of it let for £160 per acre a-year, and some of it sold as high as £1000 to £1200 per acre. There must be some prospect before people will go that length.—(Fudge! the footman will play for, nominally, as high stakes as his master, for the look of the thing, but pays in a much lower coin.)—There was no house to let, or if there had, it would cost a very high rent, so we put up a tent! on our ground, of some sheets, blankets, and canvass; wherein we have lived five or six weeks.—(This, in a rainy rheumatic country, crutches had need to be handy, where people care not about making cripples of themselves.)—John's a fool for himself, to stop at home in misery, when he can earn 10s. here with only working nine hours a day. A shoemaker or tailor does well here. A pair of good stout shoes will cost from 20s. to 25s.—(Dear enough.)—I think Lorimer was a fool not to come out. An ordinary servant gets £20 a-year: she might make 50s. or 60s. per week, by washing and dressing.—(Dress-making!)—I believe there will be some very contradictory accounts of this place sent home, because people come out here that are not fit for the place. Because there is nothing in their way to do, they give the place an ill name. We had a great deal of our clothes spoiled on the passage."

"February 25, 1841.—I may say, without the slightest exaggeration, that its prospects, (i. e. the colony,) at this time are brighter than ever."

There is much more of this. But it is enough to contrast what is above stated with Mr. Bright's estimate of what is the actual income and expenditure of a labourer in the colony at the present time; premising that he either seems to have doubts of the Company having raised the wages of all their labourers to 35s. 5d. a-week, or insinuates that there is some juggle about this statement which is made by Mr. Wakefield.

Let us consider the wages of a labourer, having a wife on landing, together with their weekly expenses in New Zealand, stating the wages at 31s. 5d., the Company's rate :—

WAGES.	£ s. d.	HIGH LIVING.	s. d.	LOW LIVING.	s. d.
For man (Woman's work uncertain, varying as to the ability; 50s. for washing, &c. lowest, probably 2s. a-day; supposing her to be fully employed by her family.)	1 11 5	10 lbs. fresh meat - -	10 0	14 lbs. salt meat - -	8 2
		1 lb. butter	2 6	20 lbs. flour	6 8
		20 lbs. flour	6 8	14 lbs. potatoes	2 4
		18 lbs. potatoes	3 6	21 pints beer	5 3
		21 pints beer	5 3	4 oz. tea - -	1 0
		4 oz. tea - -	1 0	1 lb. sugar -	0 4
		1 lb. sugar -	0 4	½ lb. candles	0 6
		1½ lb. soap -	1 0	Pepper, mustard, vinegar, salt -	0 7
		½ lb. candles	0 6	1½ lb. soap -	1 0
		Pepper, mustard, vinegar, salt -	0 7
	£1 11 5		£1 11 4		£1 5 10

To which, add rent, (always high,) clothes, tobacco, tools, &c.

This is not an inviting table. His estimate of expense for a small capitalist, a single unencumbered man, going out, in 1838, and purchasing an hundred acres at £30, fencing fifteen acres, providing seed, tools, implements, &c., with a stock consisting of two goats, two horses, or four oxen, poultry, a boat and oars, tools and implements, the wages and maintenance of two labourers for a twelvemonth, and of himself, with incidental charges, is £395. But this was before the Company was in existence. Now the price of the land of itself is £100 for one hundred acres, and nothing else is cheaper, unless the emigrant accepts the offered free passage. The emigrant, whether he be a labourer or a small capitalist, is cautioned, before he decides on emigrating, to calculate well all possible expenses. Mr. Bright says—

This work may furnish him with data, but he must not omit to gain the most recent. First of all, there is the passage; next, having decided on the extent, the land; next, stock, implements, seed; then, buildings, as house, and such offices as he may desire; next, one year's labour, keep of self, family, and labourers for twelve months; next, expenses on landing, as board and lodging for his family and himself, while seeking his future residence; outfit for self and family for six months.

I will add to the above accounts, taken from the Honourable Mr. Petre's work and the Journal, some items of charges known to myself in New Zealand.

The tea—Tea, bread, and butter.

1841—Beef and mutton, 1s.; pork, 8d. to 10d.; salt pork, 6d. to 7d.; per ton, ranging from £28 to £33; salt butter, 1s. 6d.; fresh butter, a fair supply, from 2s. 6d. to 3s. 6d.; live pigs, 4d. to 5d., 25 per cent. off; eggs, 2s. to 3s. 6d. per dozen; fowls and ducks, from 3s. 6d. to 4s. 6d. each; English cheese, 2s. to 2s. 6d.; hams, 1s. 5d.; potatoes, from £6 to £8 per ton; flour, (Van Diemen's Land,) per bag of 200 pounds, 40s. per 100 pounds; rice, 3d.; meals at inns, 2s. 6d. each, without beer or wine; brandy, 14s.; rum, 5s.; rack, 3s. 6d.; sawn timber, 20s. to 25s. per 100 feet; washing, from 3s. per dozen. Labour was to be had at from 4s. per diem, and those who knew how to manage the Mow-rees, [the natives,] might glean it at a much lower rate.

There seems to be a great facility of procuring necessaries not so readily met with at recent settlements.

Children's boots were made at 8s. per pair, durable; men's shoes from 14s.; ready-made clothes, hats, shoes, boots; haberdashery; hoisery; linen drapery; ironmongery; crockery—in constant supply, and extensive assortments; together with occasional importations from North America, of tobacco, at 1s. per pound, by the ton; of furniture, and various edibles—among which, most excellent biscuit and flour, at £28 per ton, at a time when dear in Sydney. From South America, horses and wheat; and occasional French ships, with goods and light wines; I have bought a fair claret, as a common drink, for 4s. the gallon. Taxes by this time are, I have no doubt, levied on all foreign importations; indeed, wine and spirits I know to be taxed, but forget the rate. Sir George Gipps, on the lieutenant-governor's representation, omitted tobacco, because so universally consumed by the natives; I presume it to be yet untaxed.

Mr. Bright disclaims sinister motives in the warning he gives. He indeed gives New Zealand a decided preference to any one of the southern colonies; and even to New South Wales, the decay of which he predicts. When he makes the following disclaimer, he is entitled to be believed :—

I have no wish to be thought to look upon any matters on which I have written, with a party-directed eye. The Company and Colonel Wakefield, &c. &c., the governor and officials, &c. &c., are, in my eyes, all reputable persons, sans peur, et sans reproche. Mr. Petre's name would not have honoured my pen, but for his publication, and connexion with a Company who, in London and the country, are bagging all the game they can for the colony of New Zealand, driving the people into the nets of their settlements.

For that public to which I belong, I am writing to direct to good, to warn from evil. What matters who the writer, who would "do unto others as he would they should do unto him." Attached to a motto of his earlier days, "In patriam populumque," he is anxious that he may not be suspected of other and lesser motives than that, nor let any ascribe to him a purposed attack.

It is due to the Hon. Mr. Petre and the New Zealand Company to state, that it is not easy to see how Governor Hobson is to be justified for inducing those labourers who had so recently been carried out at their expense, to leave their settlement, while there were work and wages for them there, and go to other quarters, where they very probably were much wanted, yet hardly in common honesty entitled to go. Mr. Bright is, like Mr. Jameson, and most other writers on New Zealand, save Dr. Lang, disposed to rate highly the labours of the missionaries; though he admits that, like other reputable married mere mortals, they may have looked pretty sharply to the interests of their children. All their exertions will be required to counteract the efforts to proselytize the natives, made by the Vicar Apostolic to the South Seas, and his devoted auxiliaries; who, having no tie of wife or child, can act from more single, if not from better motives, than the Protestant missionaries.

Tales of the Great and Brave. By Miss M. Fraser Tytler, author of "Tales of Many Lands," "My Boy's First Book," &c. &c. Second edition, with frontispiece. Pp. 304. Edinburgh: W. Tait.

This instructive little volume, and seasonable gift-book for the young, possesses one advantage, which we failed to point out, when, some time since, noticing the first edition. All young children like to hear about other children, in preference to any other class of persons. For the very same causes that interest grown-up people in the heroes and heroines of Scott, young children are deeply interested in such characters as Miss Edgeworth's Frank, or Rosamond; and her Harry and Lucy. Now, the TALES OF THE GREAT AND BRAVE, besides giving animated and truthful biographical sketches of Bruce and the Black Prince, of Nelson and Napoleon Buonaparte, and other great men, for the delight and instruction of growing boys and girls, contain the personal history and adventures of a real child, which Miss Tytler has ingeniously interwoven with the graver and more heroic narrative. This gives the work a great additional charm, and an extended range of attraction. The book is very neatly printed; and is, in all higher respects, worthy of the name which it bears.

The History of Poland and Russia from the Earliest Periods to the Present Time, adapted to Youth, Schools, and Families. By Miss Julia Corner. Dean and Munday.

This volume forms one of a series of compendious histories for the use of young persons, by the same authoress. The present volume is, however, more descriptive than historical, which we consider an advantage; the living manners of the Poles and Russians being much more instructive and entertaining to young English readers than the rude or warlike annals of those countries.

Monaldi: A Tale. By Washington Alston. Moxon.

Public taste has undergone a considerable revolution since 1822, when this story was written. It is a tale of the passions, as they possess the burning bosoms of the children of Italy; ambitiously written, not very natural, and so painful in its progress, that even the high-toned close does scarce redeem it.

Memorials of Clutha; or Pencillings on the Clyde. Illustrated with Lithographic Views, &c. &c. By Elvira Anna Phipps. Smith, Elder & Co.

In the autumn of 1840, the fair author of this volume appears to have visited the "Laird of Gourock," Lieutenant-general Darroch, and from his beautiful residence to have made many delightful excursions up and down the Clyde; and to Loch-Lomond, and the other Lochs, or arms of the sea, on the Dumbarton and Argyleshire coasts. Enchanting scenes they all are; and quite as well fitted for descriptive narrative, and as well entitled to the honours of the press, as anything to be seen "up the Rhine," or in Switzerland or Italy. To the fair tourist, and also to the great bulk of her readers, the scenes depicted must be equally novel and, we should hope, attractive as those far-famed resorts. With the exception of a little too much of the free-and-easy, slip-shod, or flippant sort of piety so fashionable in all manner of lady-works at present, the book, though without any literary pretensions, or much expense of thought, is a very pleasing one with which to while away a half-hour.

Congregationalism; or, The Polity of the Independent Churches, viewed in relation to the State and Tendencies of Modern Society. By Robert Vaughan, D.D. Pp. 196. Jackson & Walford.

An admirable essay, but one demanding far more space than we can, in the passing month, afford to it. We heartily commend the work to those who wish to understand some of the causes which leaves the professing christian world almost as far behind pure and vital Christianity in the nineteenth as in the ninth century.

A Review of Berkley's Theory of Vision, designed to show the unsoundness of that speculation. By Samuel Bailey, Author of Essays on the Formation and Publication of Opinions. Octavo, Pp. 239. Ridgway.

The name and reputation of Mr. Bailey must draw attention to the Essay, in which he investigates a subject which has long exercised the ingenuity of philosophical inquirers, and on which we may safely pronounce, after reading his treatise, "that much may still be said on both sides."

Letters from Abroad to Kindred at Home. By Miss Sedgwick.

This is one of Mr. Moxon's cheap and neat reprints of popular copyright works; a modern class of publications, which are at once a great benefit to society, and a proof of the spirit and sagacity of those publishers who have adopted the plan.

A Familiar Explanation of the Nature, Advantages, and Importance of Life Assurance. By Lewis Pocock, F.S.A. Smith, Elder, & Co.

This work gives an account of the different London offices, and of the advantages which each offers to insurers; with their tables of rates, &c. A curious section of the volume is a biographical catalogue of the several writers on this most important subject. They are three times the number one could have previously imagined. Of the main value of the latest work, namely Mr. Pocock's own, we do not pretend to give any opinion; but we can vouch for the author's industry in collecting and detailing the necessary information.

Manual of Veterinary Surgery. By William Dick, Professor of Veterinary Surgery, Edinburgh, Pp. 118.

This is one of the valuable reprints from the last edition of the ENCYCLOPÆDIA BRITANNICA. To farmers, shepherds, dairymen, nay, to every one having but a pony, an ass, a dog, or a pig, we recommend the perusal of this treatise on the diseases, and proper care and management of the domestic animals. It is the result of observation, guided by science and unfolded by common sense.

Philosophy in Sport, made Science in Earnest.

A new edition, with additions, of a clever attempt to illustrate the principles of Natural Philosophy, by the toys and sports of young people; and a very nice book, indeed, for all juvenile circles.

Telegraphic Railways; or, the Single Way Recommended, by Safety, Economy, and Efficiency; under the Safeguard and Control of the Electric Telegraph. By William Fothergill Cooke, Esq. Simpkin & Marshall.

The object of this essay is admirable. It is to render railway-travelling cheaper, and more safe; all that remains to be desired in this absorbing new mode of conveyance and communication. It contains many ingenious hints and suggestions, and it is illustrated by numerous lithographs of telegraphs, without which, indeed, it could not be understood.

Every Family's Book of Amusement. Strange.

A little book, giving condensed rules for playing the ordinary games with cards; and also for playing billiards, chess, draughts, &c. For farther amusement, a collection of conundrums, and descriptions of tricks with cards, and legerdemain tricks, are given.

The Book for all Seasons—a Holiday offering.

This is an humble volume of extracts and abridgments, from the popular writers of the day, intended for the amusement of young people. It makes desperate inroads on the pages of Mr. Dickens and others; but this can only do them good, because it gives pleasure to thousands with no injury whatever to them.

A Guide to Philological Investigation. By the Rev. Thomas M'Kenzie, Paisley.

A New English Grammar, with numerous Exercises. By Alexander Allen and James Cornwell.—This is a schoolbook which we can conscientiously recommend; and we make a point of never speaking of any schoolbook without careful examination.

Outlines of a Method of Model Mapping. By J. Bailey Denton, Surveyor.

NEW POEMS.

The Martyrs of Provence. By William Herries Madden, M.D.

The subject of this poem is historical, though the author has given the rein to fancy in many of the characters and scenes which he has depicted, and in all the details of the cruel persecution of those Reformers, whom he has placed in Provence. The general character of the production is exceedingly pleasing, and the poet has more than fulfilled the modest hope expressed in his preface. He has conveyed not one, but many "pleasant thoughts, and grateful and good emotions" to the breasts of his readers.

Körner's Lyre and Sword.

Yet another translation of the fervid, young soldier-poet of Germany. The attempt is more to be regarded as the essay of an elegant German scholar, than a literary achievement demanding minute examination in the pages of a popular miscellany, in which ample justice has already been done to Körner. The translation is very handsomely printed and got up.

Select English Poetry, for the use of Schools. 3d Edition.

A selection in which there are many beauties and no blemishes.

Fugitive Verses. By Joanna Baillie. Moxon.

This is another cheap reprint. The whole poetical works of Miss Baillie, including the lyrics scattered through her dramas, are given for a couple of shillings. In the former edition, we greatly missed an editor or corrector of the press who understood the Scottish language. In the present one this defect seems remedied.

The Book of Sonnets. Edited by A. Montagu Woodford. Saunders & Otley.

This is an elegant and well-chosen selection, comprising the finest specimens of the English Sonnet, from Wyatt to Wordsworth. There are also good specimens of the Sonnets of Petrarch, Camoens, &c., from the best English translations that have been made of those poets.

The Christian Offering. By George B. Scott, Author of the Beauty of Holiness, and other Poems.

This is a volume of lyrical poems, prose sketches, and tales, in character and form like one of the annuals, with pretty engravings, and trim binding. The sentiment is pure and tender, and not without that elegance which will make the Christian Offering acceptable to many.

The Romance of the Dreamer, and other Poems. By Joseph Edwards Carpenter.—We have here a collection of occasional poems, and a great number of songs, written at intervals, on every imaginable subject that falls within the ordinary range of the lyrist. Some of the Sea Songs and the Patriotic Songs, possess spirit; and none of the pieces are deficient in fluency.

Hours with the Muses. By John Critchley Prince.—We are glad so soon to meet with a "second and enlarged edition" of a volume, of which we formed a favourable opinion on its first appearance; and doubly so, to find that the humble poet has found honour in his own country. The book is very neatly printed—but by far its finest feature—independently of the poetry and prose—is a long list of respectable subscribers. Our readers cannot already have forgotten the personal history of this humble bard, so we need not recur to it.

A Selection of Psalms and Hymns. By Seacome Ellison.

Edwy; A Historical Poem. By J. Bell Worrell, Author of Edgina.

Rhymes and Roundelays. By T. Noel.—A very neat small volume, of smooth, fluent, and graceful verse.

Satan; A Poem. By Robert Montgomery. Tenth Edition.

Attempts at Verse. By T. P. Gibbins.

Wanderings. By Robert Gun Cuninghame, Esq. author of "Mora." Saunders & Otley.—The scene of the Wanderings is Switzerland: the poem a close imitation of Childe Harold's wanderings; and not a bad one.

Poems. Written chiefly abroad, by M. Saunders & Otley.

PERIODICALS.

Tyas's Illustrated Shakspeare. Parts XXXI., XXXII., XXXIII. Othello, Coriolanus, and Lear.

Floricultural Magazine for January.

The Anti-bread Tax Almanac for 1842, or the Twenty-Seventh year of the Bread-tax.—With a Calendar, and some of the common information found in all cheap Almanacs, this little work combines many facts that ought to be known, and kept steadily in view at the present crisis. It should, therefore, be accessible to every working-man; and it is fortunately published at a price which makes it so.

SERIAL WORKS.

TYTLER'S HISTORY of SCOTLAND, Vol. VI.—Whoever may write the History of Scotland, that part of the national annals which is comprehended in the epoch to which this volume is devoted, must ever remain of paramount interest. It is the period between 1545 and 1565. The volume opens with a general view of the state of Scotland after the assassination of Cardinal Beaton, and, proceeding with the history of those struggles which ended in the triumph of the Protestant Reformation, it closes with the ill-starred marriage of Mary with Darnley. In our account of this volume of the history when it originally appeared,* we pointed out, at some length, those new facts and emendations which the diligent and well-conducted researches of Mr. Tytler had enabled him to bring to light, for the first time, on this most important portion of Scottish history, and which give his work so decided a superiority over all that have gone before it.

ENGLAND IN THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.—SOUTHERN DIVISION. PART I.—NORTHERN DIVISION. PART I.—This is a new work of some importance. It is an illustrated itinerary, combining descriptions of scenery and antiquities, with living manners and characteristics; and all sorts of useful information, with the delightful gossip called County History. The embellishments which are very good of their kind, are quite in harmony with the character of the work. Thus in the picturesque county of Cornwall, we find views of such objects as St. Michael's Mount; St. Ives' Bay; Browwilly; and many a headland and ruin; mouldering castle and ancient church; while in Lancashire we have accurate views of machinery, and of manufacturing operations illustrative of the present condition of the locality; and also elevations of modern buildings. This Part contains a comprehensive history of the cotton manufacture, and of the town of Manchester. The work is conducted by Mr. Redding, with such literary assistance in several departments, as must render it more perfect in many of the details. The work is elegantly printed; and promises to be, in every respect, a permanently valuable addition to an English library.

THE PICTORIAL SHAKSPEARE: POEMS. PART III.

CUMMING'S FOXE'S BOOK OF MARTYRS. PART X.

THE SONGS OF DIBDIN. PART V.

LE KEUX'S MEMORIALS OF CAMBRIDGE. Nos. XX. and XXI.

CANADIAN SCENERY. PART XXII.

SCENERY AND ANTIQUITIES OF IRELAND. PART XI.

CRUIKSHANK'S COMIC ALMANAC FOR 1842. Adorned "with a dozen right merrie cuts pertaining to the months," and numerous humorous illustrations.—We can remember both Rigdum Funnidos, and his witty coadjutor and illustrator, brighter than in this dismal year of "general distress;" yet the dulness may be in ourselves—a modest doubt that, with which reviewers are seldom troubled. The work, in its minor details, possesses a wealth of fun and humour, which fairly puzzles the selector. Our short specimen (would we could give the illustrations) shall be confined to "November 2d, MICHAELMAS TERM, begins"

CHAMBER PRACTICE.

Fiction all day to use, whate'er the fact is—
To find that everything against some act is;
Champagne to drink all night till the head racked is,
That's Chamber Practice.

A BRIEF.

For pay to prove the honest man a thief,
For pay to break the widow's heart with grief;
To stifle truth, for lies to gain belief—
That's a Brief.

DEEDS ABSTRACTED.

Ten thousand words, where ten would serve the need,
Ten thousand meanings, discord meant to breed;
Where none can understand, and few can read—
That's a DEED.

The auspicious 9th of November, "Royal BARRY born," is thus commemorated:

THE NURSE'S SOLILOQUY.

How do I dote upon my royal charge,
Born to be great, and growing to be large;
Sprung, in his beauty, from the parent tree
An heir, and eke a-parent too, is he.

Dear bellowing babby, apple of my eye,
A young trump-card turned in the royal rubber,
As Duke of Cornwall how he won't to cry;
And now he's Prince of Whales—Oh, won't he be a blubber!

THE GABERLUNZIE'S WALLET. No. I.—An agreeable melange of prose, verse, and picture, which, were its literary merits very inferior to what they are, would be welcome to the lovers of the Scottish language, and of the auld-warld customs and characters of Scotland. As a token of a reviving taste for Scottish Song or Story, of both which it affords some racy specimens, we give the work a cordial welcome.

PAMPHLETS.

THE ORIGIN of SUNDAY SCHOOLS; to which is prefixed a LETTER on the NEW POSTAGE PLAN, showing its TENDENCY to AID the GREAT CAUSE of EDUCATION. By Thomas Clarke, junior. Simpkin & Marshall.—We can see little utility in the controversy, as to whether Mr. Raikes of Gloucester, who has hitherto enjoyed the honour of being the originator of Sunday schools in England, or the Rev. Mr. Stocks, master of the grammar school, his undeniable coadjutor in the scheme, be the real Simon Pure, unless to those zealous to claim every possible distinction for clergymen of the Church of England. The Jesuits, the authors of much good and much evil in education, are the true originators of Sunday Schools, as of Infant Schools, which had flourished under their care for generations. We also find them in Oberlin's poor and secluded valley, long before either were borrowed or adopted by benevolent Englishmen. At all events, they were in our country no precocious growth.—Again, of the new postage scheme we ourselves, in common with many others, pointed out, while pleading for it, the incalculable advantages which it must have on the cause of education, and of good morals; advantages which will not be fully developed for generations, though they are already perceptible. The author of the tract has collected many facts from different parts of the kingdom, illustrative of the moral and educational uses of a thrice-blessed social improvement which is undeniably of English growth, and of which the entire honour belongs to Mr. Rowland Hill. The country has, in our day, had no greater benefactor.

ON the PRODUCTION of ISINGLAS along the COASTS of INDIA; with a NOTICE of its FISHERIES. By J. F. Royle, M.D., F.R.S., &c. Allen & Co.—A valuable pamphlet, as every one must be which elucidates the productive powers and undeveloped sources of natural wealth in our colonies.

POLITICAL REGISTER.

After some years of apathy and disgust at the do-nothing policy of the late Ministry, the country is again roused. The great and immediate object of the movement is free trade, commencing with the repeal of the Corn and Provision Laws; for, after the evidence of the desperate state of the country, which has lately been brought forward, the greatest Conservative must see that something must be done for the relief of our manufactures without delay. There seems every reason to believe, that some change in the Corn Laws is contemplated; but no one supposes that it will be to such an extent as the country will accept. It is in vain now to speculate on the measures to be proposed by Ministers, as a few weeks will withdraw the veil from their mysterious schemes. That new taxes will be imposed, is quite certain. There appears no chance of making up even the deficiency of the revenue by indirect taxes; and the wars in the east, of which there is no prospect of a termination, as well as the probability of a war with the United States, will render farther expenditure necessary. In the present humour of the country, we do not think either an income or a property tax, however small the rate, would be submitted to. If any class is at all in a flourishing state, it is the agriculturists, and especially the landed proprietors, whose rentals are yearly increasing. Notwithstanding the clamour which has been raised against Mr. Cobden's scheme of increasing the land tax, it is well worthy of consideration. Any attempt to raise additional revenue, by increasing the rate of postage, will prove a failure, though it is far from improbable that it will be attempted. The means of evading a high rate of postage, and indeed any rate above a penny, were too clearly pointed out in the evidence collected by the committee on postage, and too widely published to the country, to render it possible to collect much additional revenue from an increase of the present rates. Were the whole system of our Taxation remodelled, a much larger revenue might be raised with less burden to the people.

ANTI-CORN-LAW CONFERENCES

Continue to be held almost daily in all parts of the kingdom. The conference of Dissenting clergymen and elders was held in Edinburgh on the 11th, 12th, and 13th January. Upwards of 700 members were present. Considering that the ticket of admission for strangers, not members, was 5s., and that no person, even to the last hour, was admitted without payment to some extent, it is remarkable how well filled, and even crowded, the place of meeting —a large church—was during the whole three days, and especially in the evenings. It is now certain that the Presbyterian Dissenters, at least in Scotland, are in favour of repeal of the Corn Laws; and although some few of them, before the meeting, had some hesitation regarding the propriety of an immediate and total repeal, we can hardly doubt, that after hearing or reading the arguments adduced at this conference, their scruples must have given way. Not one minister out of 494 who returned answers, expresses himself in favour of the Corn Laws. What a contrast this forms with the Establishment! for we will venture to say, that there are not 11 out of 1100 who are not in favour of them. One of the remarkable features of the meeting was, the bringing forward of practical farmers to advocate repeal. Mr. George Hope, an extensive East-Lothian farmer, of much experience, ridiculed the notion that a repeal would throw great tracts out of cultivation. "Of all the arguments I ever heard urged against the repeal of the bread-tax, it has always appeared to me the most futile. I ask, is there any danger of any of the land running away? Surely not. And if at present the produce is sufficient to give food for the labourer, and leave a surplus to the landlord, what is to prevent it doing so even if the nominal money value of the produce should be lowered?" The actual outlay in money per acre in cultivating land does not exceed 10s. 6d., all other charges and expenses being regulated entirely and immediately by the price of grain. The landlord is generally paid his rent in wheat. The labourers receive the bulk of their wages in the produce of the farm, and it can make no difference to the farmer what is the nominal price of the oats and other produce raised by himself, and given in wages to his ploughmen, or consumed by the horses on the farm. Joseph Sturge, of Birmingham, made his appearance on the last day of the meeting. He was enthusiastically received. He urged, with great earnestness on the meeting, the necessity of unanimity, and of agreeing to nothing less than unconditional and absolute repeal; and expressed his conviction, if this was insisted for, the laws restricting the import of provisions would soon cease to deform the statute book. The only Members of Parliament present were Mr. Wallace and Mr. Ewart. A great mass of valuable statistical information was brought forward by the different speakers. The continual sinking of the wages of the operative, the increase of crime, and the almost inconceivable state of destitution, not only in the large manufacturing towns, but even in the small villages in the agricultural districts, were proved by the most unquestionable evidence.

Glasgow Meeting.—The meeting at Edinburgh was followed by another at Glasgow on the 14th and 15th January, at which many of the most influential manufacturers and merchants attended. The business commenced with a meeting of delegates in the forenoon. Reports of a very interesting description on the State of Trade and the Operation of the Corn and Provision Laws were given in from nearly 30 places. They all represented the distress as most severe. A banquet took place in the City Hall in the evening, at which 2000 persons were present, and, among others, the following Members of Parliament:—Oswald, Fox Maule, Wallace, P. M. Stewart, Rutherfurd, Ewart, and Duncan. Mr. Fox Maule said he did not see why the landed proprietors should dread the abolition of the Corn Laws; and he found on inquiry at practical agriculturists, that they had no fear of getting on although the Repeal took place. Mr. Buchanan gave in a paper, showing that the depositors in Savings' Banks were not persons connected with manufactures, and that the amount of deposits had decreased as the price of bread rose. On the evening of the 15th, another Soirée was held, at which 1600 persons were present.

Dundee Meeting.—A meeting has also been held at Dundee, of the Anti-Corn-Law Association of that town, and deputies from the other associations in Fife and Forfar shires. About fifty deputies, magistrates, merchants, manufacturers, and tradesmen attended. Mr. Baxter, the chairman, estimated the annual tax imposed by the Corn Laws alone at from thirty-six to fifty millions. He showed that the shipments of linen from Dundee had greatly declined since 1836. Since 1837, there had been 210 bankruptcies in Dundee,—an extraordinary number, considering the size of the town. Two-thirds of the looms in the town are unemployed. Since 1836, wages have gradually declined; and they are now 25 per cent. lower than in that year. More than half the mechanics are unemployed, and five-sixths of the masons. Mr. Saunders stated that, up to 1791, the price of wheat had not for a century averaged above 40s.; but since, not less than 65s.. Taking the consumption at forty millions of quarters, the increase on the price, 25s., had obliged the people to pay fifteen hundred millions,—twice the amount of the national debt,—for the advantage of the landlords. Mr. Landale, of Kirkcaldy, feared that the additional duty lately imposed by America on our linen manufactures would reduce the export to that country one-half. He moved a resolution, "That high priced food and depression of trade uniformly accompany each other." Mr. Kinloch, of Kinloch, moved a resolution, disclaiming any intention to injure the agriculturists, and expressing the conviction, that the removal of all restrictions on commerce would be favourable to the true and permanent interests of all classes of the community. Mr. F. L. Carnegie, of Boysack, another landed proprietor, said, "For himself he had not only no objection, but a strong desire to see the abolition made immediate." From an examination of the numerous reports which had been received, it appeared that one-third of the operatives of the district were idle.

General Distress.—But the distress is not confined to any peculiar trade. The shawl manufacture of Edinburgh, once a considerable manufacture, has all but disappeared. The receipts of the clothiers, drapers, &c., in this city, have fallen off a fifth, comparing 1841 with 1840. In the iron manufacture, one-fourth of the blast furnaces has been blown out. At Carlisle it has been found, from a minute personal inspection by advocates of the present Corn Laws, that one-fourth of the population is bordering on absolute starvation. Of 300 paper mills, only 120 are in operation. The broad cloth manufactures of the west of England are as much depressed as those of cotton and linen in other places. At a meeting held at Bath, it was stated that, in the town of Bradford, in 1820, there were nineteen manufacturers, who produced 620 pieces of broadcloth. Nine have since that time failed, six have left the trade, and only two remain, who produce 100 pieces. A factory and premises which, twenty years ago, brought £4200 per annum, are now let for £300. In 1820, with a smaller population, four times as much bread and meat were consumed as at present. The same account was given of a great number of other places; and it appears that the broadcloth trade, once our staple manufacture, is threatened with speedy destruction. From a pamphlet lately published by Alderman Bateson of Leeds, we have learned some important facts regarding the transference of the woollen trade from England to the Continent:—567,317 pieces were exported in 1824; 258,962, or only about two-fifths, in 1840. Verviers, in Belgium, has advanced her woollen productions, from a small amount in 1824, to 105,245 pieces; Aix-la-Chapelle, from a small amount, to 230,000. It is to this place that the East India Company have given an order for 15,000 pieces of cloth, which they have hitherto purchased in this country. Upwards of four millions of pounds of British wool are exported to Belgium alone. Why ought wool to be allowed to be exported, to benefit the agriculturist, and food be prohibited to be imported, to the prejudice of the manufacturer?

Bolton Meeting.—On the 5th January, a meeting of 800 friends of Free Trade was held at Bolton. Dr. Bowring, Colonel Thompson, Mr. George Thompson, and several Members of Parliament were present. The toast of total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws, was received with loud, repeated, and unanimous cheering. Colonel Thompson said, that could we get compensation for the evils sustained by the Corn Laws, it would be nothing but justice. "They must bring up their minds to the proper height, and demand a bounty on the importation of Corn. Try them with that." This proposal was loudly cheered, and ought to be acted on. The landed interest had a bounty on the export of Corn for the first half of the last century, and drew many millions from the people in name of Bounty—a bounty to be paid for starving the people! We are glad to observe at all these meetings that the scheme of Emigration has been treated with merited contempt.

Manchester Conference.—At Manchester, a meeting of delegates from the principal towns in England and Scotland met. The details of the distress in their various localities were similar to those we have already given. A public meeting of the inhabitants was held after the conference. The chairman stated, that as government required 200,000 muskets, to replace those burnt at the Tower, a deputation had been sent from Birmingham to endeavour to get the order; but in submitting a list of prices, they were told they must come down, as the Government could get them cheaper in Prussia and other countries. They did bring down their prices, but still the deputation was informed that they could be got cheaper abroad. A resolution to petition for the total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws was passed, "recommending, in such petitions, the immediate appointment of a Committee, to consider the best mode of making due compensation, which the suffering people of Great Britain and Ireland have a right to demand from the aristocracy." This alludes to Mr. Cobden's proposal to compensate the people by levying the land tax fairly, at the legal rate of four shillings per pound of the rental. This is the proper way of going to work. The best way of defending ourselves is to carry the war into the enemies' country. It is gratifying to observe, that at all the meetings which have been held for some time back, unlimited freedom of trade has been contended for; not merely the removal of the protection to the farmer, but of all protections and restrictions whatever. Let petitions from all parts of the kingdom, from every town, every parish, every village, be got up, to be presented to parliament at its meeting. The number of petitions, as well as the number of signatures, is important.

SCOTLAND.

East Coast Railway.—A meeting was held in Edinburgh on the 14th January, for the purpose of promoting a line of Railway to Dunbar, being the first portion of a railway along the coast to Newcastle: the Lord Provost in the Chair. The large room was nearly full. Mr. Learmonth addressed the meeting. He stated that the line was of very easy construction, and might be made for £500,000, or about £20,000 a-mile. At the lowest estimate, he calculated that above £72,000 per annum would be received for passengers, and £23,000 from goods, or £96,000 in all: from which, deducting one-third for expenses, a clear revenue of £64,000 would be left, yielding 11½ per cent. on the outlay. He adverted to the west coast line of railway to England from Glasgow; and stated the distance to Lancaster, including the branch from Thankerton to Edinburgh, was 202 miles; the engineering difficulties were of the most serious description; and the great proportion of the intermediate country so thinly peopled, that the line could not be made in portions, as no revenue could be expected till the whole line was completed. Taking the expense at £20,000 a mile only, the cost would be upwards of four millions. After several resolutions had been passed, a large committee was appointed. Considering that, with the exception of the first eight or ten miles, the route from Edinburgh to Thankerton runs through Carnwath and other muirs almost totally destitute of population, and that it would cost probably £800,000, there is no chance of the line ever being made. The Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway has cost £30,000 a mile, and we do not think that there is any chance of the western line being made at a smaller cost, or six millions sterling. Truly a magnificent project! Were the line to Dunbar fairly commenced, we have no doubt a company would soon be formed to make a Railway from Newcastle to Berwick, and the intermediate space would then only be thirty miles. Measures are already in progress to connect Newcastle and Darlington by railway: and hence the formation of a railway from Edinburgh to Dunbar will secure the intercourse between Scotland and England by the east coast; for not only will London and the eastern part of England be reached with great ease and expedition by this route, but the middle and west of England, by means of the Carlisle and Newcastle, and other railways. It is, therefore, a matter of the utmost importance to Edinburgh that the railway to Dunbar should be formed; for upon this project it depends whether Edinburgh is to continue to retrograde, as it has done for the last quarter of a century, or again to spring into new life and vigour. The sum set down for passengers may at first sight seem exaggerated; but when it is considered that the number of passengers on the Edinburgh and Dalkeith railway has been as high as 300,000, and that the whole district from Edinburgh to Dunbar, and for many miles beyond, is thickly peopled, a slight consideration will show that there is no improbability of the revenue estimated being derived from passengers.

THE BAR.—Great indignation has been expressed in the London newspapers, at Lord Denman being obliged recently to leave the Court of Queen's Bench, without hearing the cases set down, on account of the non-attendance of counsel; who, in order to increase their chance of employment, choose to practise in two or three courts which sit at the same time. It was the last day of the sittings, and the Court rose at eleven o'clock forenoon, instead of nine at night, as usual, on that day. The evil is equally, at least very strongly, felt in the Scottish Court of Session. In that Court, the two Inner-Houses, and four of the Lords Ordinary, sit at once,—that is to say, six distinct tribunals —and the Jury Clerks hold also a sort of seventh court. It thus daily happens, that when a case is called in one Court, the counsel, who has been instructed and fee'd, is pleading in another; so that the cause must either be delayed, or be proceeded with in absence probably of the leading counsel; or, if not speaking, the counsel may be obliged to leave the one case or let it go on as it may, in order to attend another. The Court have laid it down as a rule, that, however insignificant the cause, there must be two counsel fee'd for Inner-House business, so that one may be ready to plead the case if the other is elsewhere engaged when it is called; a rule which causes not only great expense to litigants, but occasionally exposes a party to much disadvantage:——for example—where the junior counsel on the one side, owing to the absence of his leader, is opposed to both the counsel on the other. Nearly all the delay, confusion, and expense necessarily arising from the sitting of so many courts at once would be avoided by the counsel dividing themselves, each choosing his own court. For example—the senior counsel should be confined to the Inner-House, the junior to the Outer; and farther, they ought again to be divided into First Division Counsel and Second Division Counsel. Thus, in regard to the most important part of the business—that of the Inner-House, a case would never be delayed for want of counsel; the disadvantage at present arising from the junior on one side having to oppose both counsel on the other, would be avoided, and one half of the expense attending an advising in the Inner-House would be saved. The time of the Court would also be saved: for at present it often happens—once or twice a-week certainly—that one of the Divisions of the Inner-House has to rise sooner than it would otherwise do, leaving the business unfinished, because counsel are engaged in the other Division. With regard to the Outer-House, again, although the remedy would not be so perfect as in the Inner, still great and obvious benefit would arise, inasmuch as each counsel, instead of practising before six courts, as at present, would only practise before two. The plan proposed would not prevent the counsel of the Outer and Inner-House consulting with each other in much the same way as at present: for, as matters are now conducted, the senior counsel generally is consulted whether a case should be brought into Court; but the writing of the papers, which are prepared in the Outer-House, and the general management of the case while there, is left to the junior. When the case is carried into the Inner-House, the pleading is in many cases left entirely to the senior, the duty of the junior being only to prompt him if necessary, a matter which can be as well done by the agent. We believe a division of counsel would not only be advantageous to the public, but to the Bar itself. Throwing the matter of delay and expense out of the question, the monopolising of the chief business of a Court by half-a-dozen leading lawyers, must be as pernicious to the Bar itself as the litigants. However industrious and able, there is only a certain quantity of business which any one can do properly. If overwhelmed with business, the lawyer must do some part of it in a slovenly manner; while the monopoly the present system creates keeps back unduly, and discourages the junior portion of the Bar. But as any division of counsel would be opposed by the influential part of the Bar, there is no chance of the change we have proposed being effected unless the public take up the matter.

IRELAND.—Meetings are held weekly in Dublin for the Repeal of the Union, at which the Lord Mayor is a regular attendant, but they do not seem to excite much interest. The weekly receipts are from £50 to £60. Sums are occasionally received from America, and one or two Repeal Associations have been formed in that country. Meetings have also been held for the purpose of furthering the consumption of Irish manufactures, now vending in marts established by working-men in different parts of the city. Marts for the sale of hosiery, silks, shoes, and various other articles, have been established in Dublin, and the sale seems to be considerable—£1000 having been expended in a short time in the purchase of leather.—Mr. West, the Tory Member for Dublin, died some time ago. Lord Morpeth, who is in the United States, has been nominated as a candidate, and has every chance of success. Owing to the great expense of a contest for Dublin, £10,000 or £12,000, the Tories have had much difficulty in getting a candidate to come forward. A Mr. Gregory has been found, who is willing to advance £4000, if other £4000 be forthcoming on the part of the Dublin Tories; but they do not seem very ready with the money.

THE CONTINENT.—France appears to be in a very disturbed state, and it is not likely that any great length of time will pass over without a serious outbreak. Paris is full of soldiers, who, for want of other employment, have been fighting with each other. There has also been an emeute of the students, but not attended with any serious consequences.—In Spain, Espartero is exerting himself to tranquillize the country, and restore her long-lost energies. Freedom of trade is said to be one of the objects he has in view.—A treaty has been signed by the representatives of France, Austria, Russia, and Prussia, with Great Britain, whereby the four foreign powers adopt the English laws against the slave trade. The actual engagement in the trade is piracy, and the embarking of capital in it is felony. All the powers grant to each other the right of search into vessels bearing their flag. This is a most important step towards the abolition of the traffic in slaves.

ASIA.—Amoy, one of the strongest fortresses in China, situated opposite the island of Formosa, has been taken by the British, without loss. The expedition immediately sailed for the northward, leaving a small garrison on an island in the neighbourhood. Pekin, it is said, is the next object of attack; and until it is taken, there seems no probability of the war being brought to a termination.—Hostilities still continue in the north-west of India. The Emperor of Burmah has taken alarm at the force sent against him, and no longer occupies any part of the British force.

UNITED STATES.—The accounts from the United States are by no means satisfactory, and the difficulty of maintaining peace between Great Britain and the States is daily increasing. The affairs of M'Leod and the Caroline have not yet been adjusted; and the States are increasing their navy, which at present consists of only 66 vessels. Inroads have again been made on the Canadian frontier by the American sympathisers: barns have been burned, and houses plundered, and the Canadians seem preparing to retaliate. It is now certain that the American Government will not submit to our searching their vessels for slaves; and war seems inevitable, if we insist upon exercising this pretended right. In this question we conceive the Americans to be in the right, and our Government in the wrong. We have no more right to search an American or other foreign ship for slaves, without the consent of the Government to which it belongs, than we have to make a search for that purpose within the territories of the United States. The thing that aggravates the quarrel is, the recollection of the right we assumed of searching American vessels for British sailors, previous to the war of 1812. It is evident, from what is stated in the French papers, that if we engage in a war on this account, we shall not be supported by the parties to the late treaty; on the contrary, we shall have some of them—France, for instance—against us. There is no doubt, unless some device be fallen on—such as sending a sufficient number of American cruisers to the Slave Coast, to search their own vessels—the trade in slaves will be greatly increased; for every vessel engaged in that nefarious traffic will hoist the American flag. It is somewhat unfortunate that, at this present moment, an American vessel, proceeding from Richmond, Virginia, to New Orleans, with 135 slaves, was seized by them; the master, owner, and some others, murdered; and the crew compelled to run the vessel into Nassau—a port in the Bahama Islands, belonging to England. The British authorities seized those accused of the murder, but refused to send them to America, or to detain the other slaves. The southern states of the Union are, of course, indignant at this proceeding. By the law of England, a slave becomes free whenever he touches the soil of the British dominions; and the authorities at Nassau could do nothing else than liberate the slaves. It seems very doubtful even how far they were justified in detaining those accused of murder. In the eye of British law they did nothing wrong in regaining their liberty at the peril of those who were invading it by carrying them off as slaves. The Americans, on the other hand, maintain that our authorities have no right to judge what is and what is not American property. The question is certainly of the most perplexing nature; for if the American doctrine be right, they ought to be entitled to reclaim the slaves who have escaped from them, and taken refuge in Canada or other British dominions—a right which has never yet, we believe, been asserted.

TRADE AND MANUFACTURES.

We have little to report, in addition to what has already been stated, in regard to the state of manufactures. There appears, as yet, no prospect of revival; on the contrary, a still further reduction of wages in some manufactures, particularly the cotton, is in contemplation. In the iron trade, although one-fourth of the furnaces—each requiring 300 men—have been blown ont, it has been resolved not to lower the wages of those employed. Owing to the fall in the price of sugar a larger quantity has been consumed last year than in the preceding. In this trade a singular mode of evading the duty has been discovered. Foreign sugar is liable to a prohibitory duty of £3, 3s. per cwt.; but it can be imported into Guernsey free of duty. It is there made into lozenges, and other sweetmeats, on which a duty of only 7s. 6d. a cwt. is paid, when imported into Britain, while sugar imported from our own Colonies is liable to a duty of 24s. In this way the revenue is said to be defrauded to the extent of from £200,000 to £300,000 a-year. In general, some acid is put in the drops to cover appearances, but many tons have been imported without any acid at all, being fine loaf sugar, which only requires to be remelted to put it into the ordinary shape. Our restrictive system of commerce is leading every year to counter restrictions on the part of foreign nations. The Americans have raised the duty on the import of linens, and the members for the Northern States are clamouring for higher duties on the import of manufactured goods of all sorts. The Russian Government has it in contemplation also, to raise the duty on woollen goods imported. Manufactures are rapidly extending all over the continent, and the manufacturing interest will soon become so strong, and so well combined in Germany, at least, by the Prussian Commercial League, that, in a few years, we will be entirely excluded from the continental markets, unless we relax our restrictive system without further delay.

AGRICULTURE.

Notwithstanding the agitation for the Repeal of the Corn Laws, farms throughout Scotland are letting as high, and in many instances higher than they did when the former leases were taken twenty years ago. At the Glasgow Anti-Corn Law Meeting, Mr. Thomson the delegate for Dunse, produced a "Statement showing the farms and land let in the neighbourhood of Dunse, county of Berwick, during the last three years, giving the old and new rents, and rise per cent. in each." This document showed a rise in rents, varying from 25 to 128 per cent., the average being 38; and proved, in a strong manner, the rapid increase in the value of land. Sir James Graham of Netherby, expects to increase his rental some £5000 or £6000 a-year, as a provision for his eldest son now coming of age. Grain markets, owing in a great measure to the rawness and bad quality of the crop, and partly from speculators being more willing to invest their money in foreign grain than British, have been very dull, and the duty on wheat has risen to 24s. 8d. There is great probability that, in a month or two, the holders of foreign grain will begin to work the averages, and that the duty will be greatly reduced. We do not see why, in the meantime, the foreign grain in bond should not be liberated from duty at the nominal rate, for the purpose of feeding the starving operatives. We do not think there would be any difficulty in arranging with the Committees which have almost in every town been organized for the relief of the Poor, the means of having the grain ground and baked for their exclusive use. Surely if a measure of this sort were introduced into parliament, no one could oppose it; at least it would be highly important to ascertain, who, in times of distress like the present, would attempt to aggravate the evil, for his own emolument, and on what grounds his opposition would be placed. It is remarkable, that although the consumption of butcher meat has fallen off in the manufacturing towns from one-half to two-thirds, the price still continues without abatement. In 1836, the number of cattle killed in the town of Forfar was 800; in 1841, 400: in Dundee, 7800 cattle were killed in the former year, and only 5096 in the latter, although the population has greatly increased during the five years. This appears to show that the disease among the cattle and sheep, which has prevailed more or less for some years, has been much greater than has generally been supposed; for had trade been as brisk as in 1836, butcher meat would probably have reached 1s. in the pound. American salted beef can be purchased in Liverpool for 1½d. per pound; but a duty of 12s. per cwt. is exacted on it; and fresh meat, which might be brought in any quantity from the continent at 3d. a pound, is altogether excluded. All accounts concur in the statement, that the quantity of wheat sown is much less than for many years, and much of it has been put into the ground in bad condition. As it is only in particular districts that spring wheat can be sown with any advantage, there can be no doubt that the breadth of land under that crop will be comparatively small this year. The turnip crop has generally turned out defective, and more of it than usual has been consumed at this season. Potatoes have proved an average crop, though they have mostly suffered more or less by the frost.

EDINBURGH MAGAZINE.

MARCH, 1842.

THE PEEL MYSTERY.

THE development of that mysterious and marvellous scheme over which Sir Robert Peel has sat hatching for seven months, has not surprised, nor, to own the truth, deeply afflicted us. It has given a vastly increased momentum to that social movement in which Reformers place their last hope. The only real danger was in some quack remedy—some deceptive measure of concession and compromise, which might have skinned over a canker that requires to be probed and cauterized. That danger is past. Now it must be either total repeal of the taxes on food; or something better still, which shall include this among other gains. A storm of wrath is meanwhile bursting around the head of the unfortunate Minister, whose condition really moves compassion. How could he avoid failure? Finesse was of no use here. He had on all sides quick-witted persons to deal with; whose wits were further quickened by the strongest motives of self-interest. Self-interest spoke to his friends and allies from their rent-books; to the manufacturers from their closed warehouses and rusting machinery; while the masses of the people had their deepest feelings roused and sharpened by the daily view of the ragged backs and empty trenchers of their children.

Yes, Sir Robert had a difficult part to perform; nor is it wonderful that the poor baited gentleman has signally failed. Yet, viewing Sir Robert Peel as an individual, his conduct has taken many persons by surprise. As a statesman, he had obtained the credit of having the interest of manufactures sincerely at heart; and also for possessing some comprehension of mind—some enlargement of views. Those who doubted of his statesmanlike capacity in an era like the present, yet had faith in his sagacity and tact as a party leader. And there he stands, confessing himself in the predicament of the old man and the ass in the fable, who, trying to please everybody, pleased nobody,—and lost his ass into the bargain.

From the heroic tone of independence he assumed, it was imagined that the Government he had formed was to submit to him. He has succumbed to it! He has proposed nothing that a Stanley might not approve, and a Knatchbull sanction. In comparison with his paltering policy, the insolent frankness of Sir E. Knatchbull and Lord Stanley is political wisdom as well as manliness. When they avow that the sole object of the Corn Laws is to keep rents artificially high, and that "the protection of agriculture" means neither more nor less than enabling the aristocracy to maintain their luxurious state at the expense of the manufacturer's profits, and the poor man's industry, they can at least be understood. Had the Anti-Corn-Law League, in short, bribed Sir Robert Peel, he could not more effectually have done the business of keeping alive agitation than by the line of conduct he has pursued. The Duke of Buckingham merits respect for having washed his hands of the paltry, evasive scheme,* which satisfies no one, and which will speedily be the law of the land, as surely as it seals Sir Robert's fate as a statesman. Had he at once assumed the High-Tory principle of "No surrender," with his formidable majority of "the Representatives of the People" at his back, he would have stood on clear, if unsafe ground. Now the Tories are well entitled to scout "the bungling plebeian," who has tampered with the best defences of their order; and instead of conciliating the growling beasts of burthen by his concession, has excited them to fiercer discontent than ever.

There is, however, great satisfaction in seeing all delusion at an end, and, we should imagine, all hope from Parliament, as at present constituted. Every minute is now lost in which aught, save total repeal, is so much as talked about; though the Opposition Members must, no doubt, be allowed to go through their usual parliamentary paces—manœuvres in which the people see less and less utility. Lord Palmerston, for example, in the debate on his noble friend's motion, made a speech, which reads like one of Ebenezer Elliott's energetic Free-trade Odes, done into powerful English prose; and then voted for the principle of a fixed duty on corn. The time is surely past for mere Parliamentary tactics, or for farther argument on the Corn Laws. Who can hope to convince men, blinded by self-interest and pride, or by ignorant and obdurate prejudice? The suffering people need no conviction.

The total abolition of the taxes on food, on the necessaries and comforts of humble life, has been advocated in this publication ever since it came into existence, and will be so until the injustice is redressed; and yet just and good as is this cause, and earnestly as we desire to see all ranks and classes combining to promote it, we cannot conceal from ourselves, that the abolition of the Corn Laws is but a partial and inadequate remedy for the many ills under which the People suffer, admitting that it could be carried, of which, in the present state of the franchise, there is no hope whatever. And were these unrighteous and unholy laws abrogated to-day, what shall ensure us against fresh aggressions equally iniquitous, or even a new corn law? Parliament is omnipotent, and the aristocracy still make the Parliament, and are, therefore, more omnipotent than it. A few favourable harvests, a gleam of manufacturing prosperity, the old outcry of "Agricultural Distress," the supineness of the people, the indifference of a comfortable middle-class, and a Parliament of land-owners,—and the whole machinery is restored under some new name. This surely is not an impossible case. Now, then, is the time to attempt the redress, not alone of the Corn-Law injustice, but of the master-grievance under which the country suffers; that which lurks in the vitiated constitution of the House of Representatives. Short of farther improvement of that corrupt system and its clumsy and clogged machinery, there is little hope of effecting even temporary and partial economical or administrative reforms. Sir Robert Peel, who might have been imagined the very man for small, nibbling bits of very useful legislation, stands neutralized and feeble, the reluctant slave of the party whom he can neither lead nor drive in the path which he may see to be the right one. No one can longer have either faith or hope in him. Of the Whigs, the country has had a very fair trial. What solid ground of hope then remains? Surely not in the "mere Whigs" driving Peel from office? Of that, acting on their principles and in their own strength, there is very little chance. They must have a lever to work with, which we fear they have not yet made up their minds to try for. It is an instrument not named Finality.

In the meanwhile, we rejoice in the increasing symptoms of revival among parliamentary Reformers. Sir Robert has done great good. And now we would warn those who go no farther than Corn-Law reform, to eschew the fate of the Whigs, to whose lagging in the slough of Finality we owe a new Tory reign, and among other good things, a continued Corn Law. Let not the Middle-Class Corn Law Reformers fall into a similar error, and perform the same kind office for the Tories which the Whigs performed; talking away, imagining themselves all-powerful in their own strength, until their abortive agitation shall expire of itself, and the Tories, having stood this new burst, are once again more firmly seated than ever. If the free-trade party do not welcome and court, as potent auxiliaries, the working millions,—if they do not chalk out a broad and fair field for the amalgamation of interests, and for the vigorous pursuit of common objects, their isolated movement must and will fail.

The lapse of a few weeks will show whether the Anti-corn Law agitation is to end in vapour, or to pave the way for the whole people obtaining their rights, and the only effectual instrument of social and political improvement,—namely, self-government through their freely chosen representatives.

THE SONGS OF THE MONTHS.

NO. III.—THE SONG OF MARCH.

Cœm hearkaune toe mee, loteby toe ye,
Chaunte y^e^ songes of moine pleasaunte famyle:
Meun bee youre femmes whil garnishe oure gle,
Misthlesse meat benizon fyttefullie.
Johannes: Prior of Broomwicham.

1.

Hark! Hark!—A crash is in the woods;
The gnarled oak bends like mountain-larch:
Who shakes the forest—whips the floods,
Like March, mad March?
I slid down the storm from the drifting cloud,
To frolic awhile in your mansions proud.
While the usurer dreameth of thieves, in affright,
I will rattle his casements, and blow out his light.
I will hurl on the head of the learned owl,
While he studies the stars, the huge chimney cowl;
It shall cut his nose, and black his eye,
To test his sublime philosophy.
Thence, where hard Asthma hacks and houghs,
With purple face and vital sloughs,
Against the windows I'll batter the rain,
And thrust the thick smoke down the flue again.
And just ere your dinner 'neath the covers is put,
I will dredge it deftly with ashes and soot;
I will rend the furled sails as I ride on the blast,
Singing hurricane tones
Through the navy;
And I'll fling the bold mariner down from the mast,
To Davy,
For gravy
To his marrow bones!
I will bleach for the laundress, and blacken her starch,
Such a whimsical fellow is roaring mad March.

X.

Look! Look!—Amidst yon Ocean's strife,
Fear's fever brave men's lips doth parch;
Shall mourning mother—widow'd wife,
Curse March, mad March!
I am not to be bounded, nor curbed in my glee,
By the phantom of human sympathy.
I will search round your jaws for the carious teeth,
And fiddle away on the fibres beneath.
I will blast the old miller, and ruffle his dam,
And strip off his mill-top like the bladder from jam.
The dishclout dank from a beggar's mail,
I will o'er Patrician 'scutcheon trail;
While crieth priest, "Lord! I have drouth,"
I'll whiff a cobweb in his mouth,
Wherever I find that a nervous heart beats,
I will fashion the curtains like winding-sheets.
While the grey sexton dreameth he hears his death knell,
I will sweep out his mattock, and toll the church-bell;
I will shake down the mansion, the trees will uproot,
Decree'd, and confest
Yours eternal.
Then, Sir, how will you pay for the Chancery suit?
Infernal
Hard kernal
For man to digest!
I will droll with the gloomy, and growl at the arch,
Such a whimsical fellow is roaring mad March.

THE HUNGER-FIEND.

[The subjoined Poem is written by one of those nameless, humble bards, whom it has been our delight to honour; and whose effusions wont to be in a gayer strain. In publishing the Poem without the few private lines addressed to us, we feel that its object would be less distinctly brought out: we, therefore, take the liberty to prefix them. The locality of the author is not any of those places in which distress has been made prominent by inquiry; but it is one in which, as in the whole country, "distress," in the words of the Tory Member for Leeds, "is fearfully on the increase."]

TO THE EDITOR OF TAIT'S MAGAZINE.

Sir,—The chant of the Hunger-fiend is somewhat wild, but too true—a Webster cannot speak with patience a the subject: I would fain raise one cry amid the general voice, through your Magazine. I have been working this winter for less than a shilling a-day—many thousands are worse; but still I should know something of the Hunger-fiend.—I am, Sir, with all respect, your most obedient servant,

THOMAS * * * * * * alias TAM WABSTER.

I am the Hunger-fiend,
Who hath not heard of me?
My home, my native hell,
Is the Island of the free;
For I am not of heaven,
Nor do I owe my birth
To devils, but to men:—
The honoured of the earth
Begat the Hunger-fiend.

And they have nursed me well,
Those noble sires of mine,
With flesh of living men:
Ho! Death, the bones are thine,
When in their sunken cheeks
I've writ my horrid name,
Go give them to the earth,
We play a deadly game—
Thou follow'st the Hunger-fiend.

The land of trade is mine,
Where thousands feel my pangs,
Where many an honest heart
Is poisoned with my fangs,
And many a noble soul
Defiled in ravenous clay:—
Though the church hath lordly priests
For the hunger-doomed to pray,
They pray for the Hunger-fiend.

The famished City cries
To the hunger-breathing air,
The while her idle hands
Are clasped in despair:
Saith Hope—"She yet may ply
Her countless iron wheels;
The earth hath store of grain,
And she, a thousand keels:"
"Ha, ha!" quoth the Hunger-fiend.

"'Tis there the mother weeps
For the babe that's yet unborn;
While the weary father sleeps,
But I wake him at the morn.
Ah, he can sleep no more,
The hunger-wail he hears,
And his swelling heart is full
Of desperate thoughts and fears:—
Am I not the Hunger-fiend?"

"Britannia rejoice
In thy loyal sons of toil,
Who eat no alien bread
For love of thy poor soil;
Thou shalt have soldiers yet,
And men to man thy fleets,
And felons for thy jails,
And maidens for thy streets,—
While I am thy Hunger-fiend.

"All hail, thou Island Queen,
In thy people's love rejoice,
In thy army's proud array,
In thy navy's thunder voice:—
Why shock the royal ear
With the curses of my prey,
Why mar the festival,
Pour out the wine!—hurrah!
For the terrible Hunger-fiend."

ABEDNEGO THE MONEY-LENDER.

BY MRS. GORE.

CHAPTER I.

"Antonio and old Shylock, both stand forth!"—Shakspeare.

EVERY social epoch has its distinctive vices, just as epidemics prevail at different seasons and in sundry localities. As surely as the canals of Batavia, the jungles of Sierra-Leone, or the Campagna of Rome, generate malaria and disease, is the infancy of a nation, "ere human statutes purge the general weal," distorted by the convulsions of bloodshed and rapine; while, in the national corruption succeeding the over-ripeness of civilisation, are engendered the colder-blooded crimes of treachery and fraud. According to a genealogical tree, not recorded in the Herald's Office, the prodigal and the wanton are parents of the swindler, the forger, the usurer. Though the knife of the guillotine and bolt of the gallows be of iron, the main-spring influencing their action is formed of a more precious metal.

The first fifteen years of the present century constituted a stirring epoch. The swell of the waters of strife, after the recent revolutionary storm, had not yet subsided; and the gallant vessels of the various States of Europe were still in peril of a shock. On all sides resounded the ha, ha! of the trumpet, and the neighing of the war-horse. A sword was in every hand, and angry passions contended in every breast.

At such periods, the minds of men wax fierce and reckless. The coveter of other men's goods hardens into the highway robber; the coveter of other men's lives attacks by open violence rather than by poison or stealth; "I dare not," no longer "waits upon I would." The social body is in a state of terrible excitement. Its very virtues are ferocious;—what can be expected of its vices?

Yet the unnatural calm that succeeds to this enthusiasm of atrocity, the inglorious sloth of national soul and body arising from prolonged peace and prosperity, has results almost equally pernicious. As the glaring summer heats bring forth the noisome insect or fatal reptile race, a brood of despicable vices and grovelling crimes is hatched into existence by the sunshine of aimless prosperity. As in the becalming of the ocean so powerfully described by Coleridge,

> Slimy things do crawl with legs,
> Upon the slimy sea.

Even "creeping things" acquire force, when "innumerable;" and by the time the swords of legions of disbanded mercenaries have been converted into the implements of the housebreaker and pickpocket, and the gold-shed of luxury has exercised as hardening an influence over the human heart as the blood-shed of a more turbulent period, we begin almost to regret the times when perpetual terror of body begat a more immediate terror of peril to the soul.

While the ascendancy of Napoleon diffused throughout Europe a panic rivalling the Reign of Terror created by Robespierre in France, the generous affections remained in play, to controvert the frenzy of national virulence and party hatred. Most people had some near and dear connexion involved in the dangers of the war; and even the frivolous classes blushed to surrender themselves to the mere vanities of life, when the next courier might bring tidings of the sacrifice of thousands of human beings, or of the one individual dearer than all. The service of plate, the gaudy equipage, the diamond coronet, forfeited a portion of their value. A death's-head was at every banquet,—a memento mori at every ball,—a premonitory knell in every ear!

But the moment these anxieties abated, and Grim-visag'd war did smooth his wrinkled front, what tenfold requital did the worldlings yield themselves for previous self-denial!—What an uproar of rejoicing, what prodigality of pleasure, what cost, what splendour, what riot, what intemperance, celebrated the ratification of peace! England thought no further of her legions of dead, her millions wasted; and not content with hanging up her conquered banners in triumph, or chanting her Te Deums with grateful solemnity, suffered her anthems to be overpowered by a Bacchanalian roar, and the senseless giggle of fashionable levity.

Intoxicated by the brilliancy of a congress of kings in their capital, the English hurried to the Continent to keep up their fever of excitement. From that moment, the manners of the day acquired a looser tone, a more Epicurean luxury. London grew ashamed of its homeliness, and began to affect airs of virtù and graces of savoir vivre. New customs were introduced, and splendid enervation prevailed. To that epoch, may be retraced the ruin of many a princely fortune. Not only were millions left behind by our migrant aristocracy in foreign capitals, or the gaming-tables of Paris, Spa, or Baden; but, on their return to England, their residences, whether in London or the provinces, afforded disgraceful evidence of the new dis-order of things. Foreign servants abounded in every noble household; foreign tradesmen were established in every street. Everything worn, eaten, said, or done, was à la this, or à la that; and money rose proportionately in value, and timber fell. Unlike the ancient retainers or hereditary purveyors of graver times, these strangers came like locusts into the land, to plunder, devour, and take flight again; and thenceforward multiplied advertisements of family estates to be sold, family mansions to be let, and "MONEY TO BE ADVANCED TO NOBLEMEN OR GENTLEMEN" on the most disinterested terms, attested the progress we were making in national refinement.

Among the latter, and singularly familiar to the young spendthrifts of the universities and the Guards, were the manifestoes of a certain A. O., to whom reference was to be made by letter, addressed to the Hungerford Coffee-house. There was a tone of respectability in the phrasing of these advertisements. They had the air of proceeding from some gentleman with a large floating capital, and a great faith in government securities, anxious to obtain good interest and a safe investment for his money,—perhaps for the benefit of a deserving wife and numerous family. People reduced for the first time to the shame of borrowing, said to themselves "A. O. is my man!" There was far less humiliation in addressing a letter to the Hungerford Coffee-house, than in being seen entering the doors of notorious money-brokers in Cork Street or Pall Mall.

But it was observed that no man after a similar application, was ever known to refer his friend to the same source of relief. No one talked about A. O.,—no one admitted that he had any cognizance of this mysterious personage. Or if, in an orgie of thoughtless boys about to repair to the gambling-table, or confessing the ill-luck of the previous night and its results, some novice suggested well advertised name of A. O., every one present appeared anxious to change the conversation. Each had instantly some pet usurer to recommend. Still, not a soul was positively heard to say, "Beware of A. O.!" A charm seemed attached to the name, so averse were even the most hardened thirsters after the pocket's blood to pronounce those direful initials. However prompt to revile the originators of all other advertisements of a similar description, as legitimate descendants of Barabbas, no one whispered a syllable against A. O. Discriminating persons may, perhaps, infer from this, that most of these cautious friends were in his power!

At a dinner at the Guard's Club in St. James's Street, early in the autumn of 1822, it was observed that, discussions having arisen concerning recent losses at play, at Graham's renowned Temple of Chance, where, at that moment, fortunes were winning and losing with fearful rapidity, the countenance of a young officer, who had hitherto listened to such allusions with perfect unconcern, became singularly agitated. It was noticed with the more surprise, because Basil Annesley never entered the doors of Graham's, and bore no relationship to any one of the parties whose affairs were thus freely canvassed.

"Four thousand on Thursday night, and three thousand last week!" observed Colonel Loftus.—"Poor Sir Grinsel! I'm afraid 'tis all up with him! He told me himself he had raised twelve thousand last month; and that he had not a resource left,—mortgaged to the last guinea,—every stick on his Irish estates gone!—Poor Sir Grinsel!"—

"He has latterly had recourse to A. O.," added Captain Blencowe, in a grave under tone; "so one can understand the sort of straits to which he must be reduced."

"A. O.?—Why surely that is the person to whom my uncle, the Duke of Rochester, is said to owe thirty thousand pounds?"—cried a youngster who had lately joined, and was fond of citing his "uncle the duke," (a weakness of course hoaxed out of him before he had been six months in the regiment.)

"Ay, and out of whose clutches half the fellows you meet every day in St. James's Street would be right glad to extricate themselves," retorted Captain Blencowe. "A. O. is the last resource of ruined men;—the executioner who gives the coup de grâce."

"What the deuce do you mean by the coup de grâce?"—demanded the lad so proud of being nephew to a duke.

"The coup de grâce, is the stroke given to a victim on the wheel, to put him out of his pain," replied a grey matter-of-fact old colonel, who officiated as dry-nurse to the subalterns.

"I meant that A. O. was the blackguard who aims the first blow at ruined men; the sort of fellow to fling a stone at a drowning dog, scarcely able to keep his head above water."

"It was he, I fancy, who arrested Eggerstone," observed Colonel Loftus.

"And it was a writ obtained by A. O. that drove Frederick Lumley to Brussels," rejoined Captain Blencowe. "A man must in short have exhausted all other resources, to have recourse to him. However, it must be added that he is unfailing at a pinch. The brute is always flush of cash; and, if one chooses to rush into the jaws of a shark with one's eyes open, one is more to blame than the creature that follows its instincts by closing them upon one. I once borrowed money of A. O. I had tried every other quarter.—A minor with only personal security to offer, the case seemed hopeless.—However, the cormorant was tempted by thirty per cent., and the attestation of my honest countenance and promissory note; and to my dying day, never shall I forget the joy with which I found myself redeemed from the thraldom of the debt, within the year, by the generosity of an old aunt, who was good enough to die for the purpose."

"Within a year, what had you to fear from him?"

"Nothing to fear,—much to endure! I had made the interest of that accursed five hundred pounds, payable monthly, out of the allowance which my skin-flint of a Scotch guardian doled out to me in the same manner. Every third of the month was I visited by a hateful night-mare, in the shape of A. O.—I think I see the door of my room opening to admit him!—"

"But why not make it payable at your banker's or agent's?"

"He conditioned that it should be paid from hand to hand. I suspect, he chose to have an eye upon the morals and health of his debtor; for one day, when he made his appearance as usual, and the effects of a gin-punch party at Limmer's the previous night, were only too visible in my face, I remember his fixing his keen eyes into me, like the talons of a bird of prey, and inquiring the nature of the disorder that made me so ghastly:—just as a ghoul might be supposed to investigate the state of the corpse upon which it was about to make its loathsome repast."

"Fine him,—fine him!—Upon my soul, Blencowe, you are too bad!"—cried several voices.

"You positively make me sick, with your ghoul and your A. O.!" added the Duke of Rochester's nephew.

"He did me!" retorted the captain earnestly; "the very recollection sickens me now.—Loftus! the claret,—something too much of this!"—and the wine was passed round, and the table soon resumed its tone of wonted hilarity.

All this time, Basil Annesley had been peeling his walnuts as assiduously as though they were destined for some fair neighbour at a dinner party, instead of for his listless self. In point of fact, he knew not that he had so much as a walnut on his plate. Throughout the discussion, he had been all ear; and chose an occupation enabling him to listen with his face depressed, so as to conceal his deep interest in the matter.

But the very means he took to disguise his emotion, caused it to be noticed.—Basil Annesley was one of those open-spirited fellows, who confront the observation of society, with an ever frank and fearless countenance; and to find his forehead, usually held so high, thus pertinaciously incumbent, and his voice usually so free in discussion, thus perseveringly silent, excited surmises in the mind of Loftus, who sat opposite to him, as well as in the grey-headed colonel.

"What is the meaning of all this? Has poor Annesley been playing?" was the secret conjecture of both. "Another victim to écarte or hazard!—Another victim for the remorseless claws of A. O!"

Yet Annesley had never been noticed to enter a gambling house. The play of fashionable London was not then concentrated into so decided a focus, as it has since become. But in a community so small as that to which Basil was attached, a man addicted to any grosser vice, is soon convicted; and he had hitherto passed for a lady's man,—an Almacks' pet,—rather than for a fellow likely to be carried away by the dissipations of roué life.

It was only a year, since Basil Annesley had joined the Guards. On quitting Harrow, he had completed his education at a foreign university; and soon afterwards, as the son of the late Sir Bernard Annesley, one of the bravest victims of the Peninsular war, had obtained a commission from the generous patronage of the royal Commander-in-chief. Of the state of his fortunes, little was authentically known. From the period of the General's death, his mother had resided in retirement. No one knew whether she were rich or poor. Basil never mentioned her name. It was concluded that he spent the periods of his leave of absence from his regiment, with Lady Annesley; but on his return, he made no allusion to the visit. His habits of life, induced the inference that his allowance was less than liberal; but though lively and open on indifferent subjects, Basil was too reserved concerning his family affairs, and too self-possessed in his good-breeding, for his brother officers to hazard offending him by betraying impertinent curiosity.

Still, the grey-headed colonel, known in the regiment by the name of old Carrington and the character of an officious bore, meditated on the present occasion some investigation of the origin of the young ensign's embarrassment; when, just as he was turning towards him for a reintroduction of the subject of A. O., Basil Annesley throwing his napkin on the back of his chair, rose and hurried out of the room,

Now old Carrington was gouty; and the active movements of a lad of twenty, soon distanced those of a man, who to twenty added five and twenty years more, many of them years of active service; so that before the Waterloo colonel was able to crook his finger round the button of his ensign, Basil had cast his eyes over the advertisements of the Morning Post, and ascertained to a letter the address of the money-lender to whom Wilberton's uncle, the Duke of Rochester, was said to owe thirty thousand pounds.

In another half hour, he had not only reached his lodgings, but finished and sealed his letter to A. O.—Instead of placing it upon the chimney-piece, however, to attract the notice of his servant, as was his custom with those destined for the twopenny post, Basil Annesley not only left it upon the table, but placed the blotting-book in which he had been writing, over it, like a tombstone, as if—"look on't again, he dare not!"

A letter entreating a personal interview with a money-lender!—an abject letter from him, the proud-spirited son of a proud-hearted mother! What would that mother think of him, could she suppose that, disregarding her solemn charges, her affectionate adjurations, he had within so short a time of entering the army, involved himself in debt to a degree requiring the intervention of an usurer! Poor Basil threw himself at full length on the sofa of his chamber, with his hands clasped over his head, and his eyes fixed vacantly upon a staring print of the Hetman's daughter, which in a gaudy frame graced the opposite wall, as likenesses of Cerito or Duvernay embellish the bachelor lodgings of the present day; revolving within himself, with desperate self-recrimination, all that had passed between him and Lady Annesley on the chapter of finance, at their last interview.

It was impossible to conceive a greater contrast, than between the noisy and public life he was leading in town, and the monotonous seclusion of Barlingham Grange. Situated within a mile of the New Forest, the ancient mansion inhabited by the widow of Sir Bernard Annesley resembled rather a moated farm-house than the cottages of gentility to which widows of moderate means are apt to retire to meet the exigencies of a small establishment. Concealed within the intricacies of a wooded country, attainable only by a detestable cross-road or rather cross-lane cutting across the Forest from Lyndhurst, Barlingham Grange, or as it was abbreviated by the cottagers in the neighbourhood, the Grange, was cut off from all communication with the active world; and Lady Annesley was so cold in her deportment, and so wedded to the solitude in which she had resolutely ensconced herself, that, but for the affectionate fervour of Basil's nature, it must have appeared a penance to him rather than a schoolboy's holiday, to journey twice a year from Harrow into Hampshire, and return thither for a couple of months, between the period of his quitting Heidelberg, and entering the army.

Accustomed, however, to ascribe the melancholy reserve of his surviving parent to affliction for the loss of his father, Basil respected her austere melancholy; and though in his boyhood there had been moments when, weary of flinging stones into the old moat to startle the dab-chicks from the reeds, and of contemplating the dilapidated pointed gables of the old red-brick mansion, he had almost wished he might not again set eyes on Barlingham,—he never returned thither to be folded with momentary warmth to the heart of his grave mother and submit anew to the cross-questioning of her venerable maid Dorcas, and the maundering of the old gardener, the only male domestic of that primitive establishment, without feeling that, after all, home was home,—a mother, a mother; although the former exhibited the uttermost stagnation of earthly dulness, and the latter a reserve according better with the measured affections of more distant relationship.

But Lady Annesley was no longer young. Though still exhibiting traces of beauty of the highest order, she had long passed her fiftieth year, and those eager demonstrations of maternal affection, which burst from the hearts of younger mo these, were not to be expected of a widowed matron, in whom a life of utter solitude confirmed the tendencies which had led to its adoption. Nor was Basil an only son. She had a daughter, twelve years elder than himself; a daughter who, having married young and settled in the North, was now the mother of a numerous family of her own; and as, from the period of her marriage Lady Annesley and Mrs. Vernon had been never known to meet, it might be inferred that the maternal sensibilities of Sir Bernard's widow were of no very vivid nature. She had evidently never recovered the shock of his untimely death.

Still, in spite of appearances, Basil thought otherwise. Undemonstrative as she was, there were moments when he had detected his mother's eyes suffused with tears when fixed, as if furtively, upon his face. On one occasion, when she had taken leave of him with her usual serenity on his departure for Harrow, having been compelled to return a quarter of an hour afterwards in search of a letter addressed to Dr. Butler which he had left behind, he found her, on reëntering her cheerless sitting-room, with her face buried in the cushions of her sofa, sobbing as if her heart would break. Yet when aware of his presence, as if irritated that he should have been a witness of her grief, she only chided his carelessness, and did not renew her parting caress.

He could scarcely remember his sister. She had been brought up by her father's family. Basil was only seven years old at the period of her marriage; and whenever, in earlier life, he expressed to his mother a wish to see Helena again, Lady Annesley replied, that they were not likely to meet, Mr. Vernon being an odd man; an equivocal phrase, implying little or much, according to the acceptation of the hearer. Basil had taken it for granted that his brother-in-law was a brute, who, on account of his sister's want of fortune, tyrannised over her, and kept her apart from her family. But as Mrs. Vernon, during their two or three interviews, had not deigned to bestow on him a single sisterly caress, he felt little indignation in her behalf; and had in fact almost ceased to recall to mind the existence of this estranged relative.

"It is really disgraceful that Helena should exhibit such unnatural indifference!" he once observed to his mother. "The result of bringing up a child under another's roof! Barlingham was never her home, and she has forgotten that it is that of her mother and brother."

A hectic flush tinged Lady Annesley's pale cheek at the observation, and Basil instantly repented his words; for he had now begun to surmise that the strict seclusion in which they lived, and the adoption of his elder sister by his uncle, had a common origin—in the straitened means of his mother. It was strange indeed, that Admiral Annesley should not have selected, as the object of his favour, the son rather than the daughter of his deceased brother. But this might be easily accounted for. At the period of Sir Bernard's death, Basil was of an age to require the affectionate services of a mother; while Helena was nearly sixteen, her education completed. Moreover he flattered himself that Lady Annesley's partiality for her boy was not without its influence in the selection.

A portion of Basil's uncertainties concerning his mother, however, were now at an end. During his sojourn at Heidelberg, his own developed intelligence enabled him to detect, even in her grave and earnest letters, a tone of strong maternal affection, subdued as if by an effort of resolution; and on meeting her again, upon his return from Germany, his strengthened character and greater self-possession, gave him courage to indulge in such demonstrations of grateful filial tenderness as served in some measure to thaw the icy self-restraint of the widow. If she had not treated him more fondly during the two months he had spent at Barlingham, she had treated him more openly. She had avowed to him that she was not on friendly terms with his father's family,—not even on friendly terms with her daughter.—

"It matters not with whom the fault," said she, in answer to Basil's eager interrogatories. "Suffice it that the Annesley family include the son so dear to me in their displeasure against myself, and are consequently little likely to make overtures of kindness towards you. Oblige me, therefore, dearest Basil, by abstaining from all further reference to the subject."

On another point, she had been equally candid. She informed him that she was poor,—very poor; that her income of eight hundred a-year, derived in a great measure from her pension as the widow of a general officer, would only enable her to make him an allowance of three; that the little she could lay aside, was forming a fund for his future promotion; and that necessity, as well as choice, had induced her to make a hermitage of her retreat.

"All my desire, all my ambition, dearest Basil," said she, "is your advancement in life. My fate has been a sad one. I was wedded against my inclinations. Your father's family caballed against me while he lived, and cast me off at his death; yet circumstances forbad me to refuse their offer of adopting Helen, for whom, indeed,—but no matter!—— My happiness has been in you, Basil; my consolation in you. For you have I lived; for you I hope, and am happy. Deficient as you may have sometimes fancied me in tenderness, so dear have you ever been to me, that, had I lost you, I would not, I could not have survived! In your wellbeing, my very existence is bound up. Become what I expect of you,—a man,—a man of honour,—a prudent man, endowed with the esteem of society,—and my old age may perhaps still enjoy the peace and honour denied to my youth. But falter in the path,—disgrace yourself,—and I shall become a widow indeed!"

A warm embrace sealed the compact between them, which Basil long promised himself to hold sacred; and again and again, previous to his embarkation in London life, had poor Lady Annesley dwelt solemnly upon the fact that, possessing only a life income, should he involve himself in debt, she would be unable to afford him relief.

"Think," she had said to him at parting, "think, dearest Basil, what would be the distress, the despair, of this tranquil little household, over which the quiet years have been rolling away unfelt, should any mischance befall you! Govern your conduct, my dear son, by the conviction, that disgrace to you would convey death to your mother!"

And after all this, with the impression still strong on his mind of the noble dignity of that mild woman, and the strong motherly love mysteriously concealed under her solemn deportment, he had done evil,—he was in debt,—he had already referred himself for relief to the interposition of A. O., THE MONEY-LENDER!—

CHAPTER II.

"Which is the merchant here, and which the Jew?"—Shakspeare.

LONG and tedious did the hours appear to Basil Annesley, which served on the morrow to convey his post-paid letter to the Hungerford Coffee-house, and bring back a reply from the individual so bitterly contemned by his Club.

Three times in the course of the day, did he return home to his lodgings, in hopes the post might have brought an answer which, he trusted, would afford a first step of extrication from the difficulties in which he had wantonly involved himself. Still he was disappointed. On his table were divers notes and letters;—some of invitation;—some endited with the clerkly precision announcing, only too painfully to the conscious debtor, strong hints that his earliest convenience must convey a settlement to some expectant creditor:—but not a syllable from A. O.!—

In the evening, he had an engagement. One of his brother officers had exacted a promise that he would accompany him to a private box at Covent Garden, as the escort of his mother and sisters; and, just as, full-dressed, but with his spirits in complete dishabille, he was quitting his lodgings to repair to Lady Maitland's box, the double rap of the last evening post, caused the door of his small dwelling to vibrate, and Basil to recoil a step or two in the passage, while his servant offered the ignominious twopence in exchange for a shabby-looking missive, which was to convey tidings of life or death to the delinquent.

The interview was accorded. "The following day, at noon;"—the place, obscure and strange enough, a Street in St. Agnes le Clare, Old Street Road. Basil, however, was as much enchanted as though the rendezvous were assigned, by some fair handwriting, in the heart of May Fair; and he proceeded in towering spirits to keep his appointment with the Maitlands.

As he walked towards Arlington Street, where he was to join the party, there rose before his mind's eye a vision which, for some days past, he had sedulously banished; a vision of the low-browed sitting room at the Grange, with its deeply embayed Elizabethan windows and spacious projecting chimney; its antique furniture and grave aspect; with the figure of his stern mother in her customary weeds of solemn black, seated in her high-backed ebony chair, with her hands folded upon her knee, again disappointed of the letter from her son, which Dorcas had entered the room to inform her was not brought back by the little messenger despatched for the twentieth time to Lyndhurst for the purpose of daily inquiry.

"If I can arrange matters to-morrow, with this fellow," thought Basil, as he hastened lightsomely along, "I will write to-morrow to my poor mother. For the last three weeks, I have not dared take up my pen for any ordinary purpose of communication; lest all should end in my being forced to reveal to her the desperate situation in which I have placed myself!—My poor mother!—Even now I dare not think of it!—What treachery!—what infatuation! So self-denying as her life,—so watchful as her maternal vigilance has been, to be thus rewarded! Oh! if I can only prevail upon this damnable A. O. to accept the interest and personal security he took from Blencowe, I might, in the course of the next eighteen months, pay off both debt and interest, and dare once more to look her in the face!"

That night, on their return from the play, Lucy Maitland noticed to her sister and brother that she had never seen Mr. Annesley in such spirits.

"You have often told me your friend could be pleasant enough if he liked," said she, addressing John Maitland; "to-night he was really most agreeable."

"Admit also that his gaiety was well-timed!" observed her elder sister. "Because Miss O'Neill had reduced the whole house to silence and tears, Mr. Annesley scarcely left us a minute's respite from his pleasant anecdotes."——

"Annesley had too much respect for the fashionability of my sisters, to fancy they went to the theatre for the sake of anything to be seen there," replied John Maitland, coolly. "He concluded, as I did, that your object was to enjoy our society, in a closer and more incommodious place than your own drawing-room; and rewarded you for submitting to such very hard seats and so stifling an atmosphere, by talking all the nonsense in his power."

So little impression, meanwhile, had the amusements of the evening made upon Basil, that his first impulse, on returning home, was to take from his pocket the unsightly letter of A. O., in order to ascertain, with greater accuracy, the name of the street to which he was to repair on the morrow. He searched first in one waistcoat-pocket, then in the other, and finally in those of his coat and great-coat, and all with the same infructuous result! In his impatience, he flung down on the table his handkerchief and gloves, his opera-glass, and a small gold pencil-case he carried in his waistcoat-pocket. But this eagerness did not enable him to recover the lost treasure: not a vestige of his letter!

Though certain of having received it in the hall, and thrust it into his pocket preparatory to leaving the house, he now, in the perplexity of vexation, began to open his desk and dressing-box, in the hope of finding it there; though aware that he had not returned into his sitting-room after the arrival of the post. Still, the result was the same; and he was forced to end with the conclusion which had first presented itself, that his pocket had been picked in coming out of the theatre; and this document, valueless to any but himself, been mistaken for higher game.

How irritating!—This trivial occurrence might be the means of deferring the promised interview for four-and-twenty hours! Nay, A. O. might, perhaps, fancy himself hoaxed by a second application; or, at all events, resent having his time thrown away by waiting at home for one who had no scruple in disappointing him, and refuse a second rendezvous!—He had been told, only too often, that A. O. was not a person to be trifled with!—

He began, accordingly, to ransack his brain for reminiscences of the address contained in the letter. St. Agnes le Clare, Old Street Road, he perfectly remembered, for there was a novelish sound in the first name, a something of Miss Owenson or Mrs. Opie, singularly discordant with the second: and, by a memoria-technical process, the impression remained with him. But what was the name of the street. It was that of some noble family. It was not Howard, or Percy, or Paget. It was something connected with Wiltshire; he remembered it had brought Wiltshire into his mind; he would examine the Court Guide, and see whether any streets in the neighbourhood of Old Street Road, appeared to bear reference to Wiltshire.

But alas! the Court Guide disdained all mention of St. Agnes le Clare!—The Court Guide rejected A. O. and all his parish; and poor Basil was launched once more upon his sea of troubles.

Of one thing he was certain. The interview was appointed at noon the following day; and the latest effort of his determination before he committed his head to a restless pillow, was to repair to Old Street Road, at an early hour next morning, and try whether, by exploring the neighbourhood, he might not accidentally touch the silent chord of memory.

It is not, however, a pleasant thing for a denizen of the West End, to arise from a warm bed at nine o'clock on a misty November morning, and after seeing the opposite shops opened by yawning shop-boys or damsels in curl-papers, and swallowing a hasty comfortless breakfast, for which the baker has not brought the rolls, or the newspaper boy the Morning Post, jumble off in a hackney coach towards the far East, to be deposited, in a degree of bewilderment worthy of Robinson Crusoe, upon the pavement of Finsbury. It was the first time Basil Annesley had visited that terra incognita. He had been quartered in the Tower, but knew nothing of the wilds of Moorgate; and, being far from a dressy man, and on the present occasion attired with especial plainness, could not conceive it possible that the stare bestowed upon him by the aborigines, proceeded from the striking difference between the cut of his great-coat and that of the tailors of the Barbican. He fancied that the curiosity he excited must be of the same mysterious nature as that which fixed his eager gaze upon the corner of every street, in succession, in the hope of stumbling upon the auspicious dwelling-place of A. O.

It was now only ten o'clock; but in that commercial neighbourhood, the world was in full activity. People were going their ways and executing their business, as if it were a matter of no possible moment that the sun entertained no intention of looking out upon their proceedings. The shop windows were dim with fog. The passers by trudged along with their chilly hands thrust into their pockets, their eyes riveted on the cheerless pavement, their noses red with cold, and their faces screwed into a grimace, symbolical of the uncheeriness of the weather. The streets were defiled by a thick coating of black greasy mud; and the skies and atmosphere seemed composed of a dilution of the same uninviting material. Poor Basil's spirits were becoming depressed to the temperature of the day, and the complexion of the objects around him.

"I fancy I may as well give it up!" muttered he, shrugging his shoulders, after peeping into a variety of streets, whose names brought back no token to his mind. "How I could be such an ass as to trifle with a document of so much importance, is inconceivable. Had it been one of Esther's letters I should have hurried back to my room, and locked it in my desk before I went out!"

At that moment, as he was raising his eyes to Heaven in token of wonderment at his own inadvertency, they lighted upon a name at the turn of the next crossing, which brought an instantaneous flush of colour to his cheeks: "PAULET STREET!" Wiltshire for ever!—He had found it!

But no! on examination, the thing was impossible. The street into which he now eagerly hastened his steps, could not be the abode of such a man as the renowned and redoubted A. O.! It was one of those wretched outlets abounding in the various suburbs of London, yet scarcely worthy to occupy the valuable territory of metropolitan earth; a street, of which the first house or two aspires to three stories, the following ones to two, while the others are of the anomalous kind, whereof the roofs maintain a condescending level with the hats of passengers.

This long looked-for Paulet Street, consisted of houses, of regular one-windowed frontage, and miserable aspect; the street door nearly as large as the house, and the parlour window closely adjoining it, and partially screened by a ragged and discoloured muslin blind, containing square patches of paper; in some instances announcing "Lodgings for single men," in others, "manglin done here;" or, "wanted a child to dry-nurse," or, "lighorn bonets cleaned inquire wethin." In more than one window stood a dead geranium, with its earthen pot standing in a cracked plate, which the hard-working inmate of the house had found no leisure to notice or remove; in one, a bird-cage, not remorselessly exposed, however, to the inclemency of the day; for it contained no bird. The canary, its former inmate, had long been starved to death; and the cage was placed on the window ledge to be out of the way.

In such neighbourhoods, woman appears to be a more than usually fruitful vine.—Children abound in the street, perhaps because, like the bird-cage, put out of doors to make more room within; and on many a door-step, sat the dirty ragged sister of twelve years old, officiating as nurse to the dirty ragged infant of twelve months, whom she fondled, rather with the hope of deriving warmth for herself, than of conferring it on the squalling child.

Basil Annesley turned discomfited away. But that he still felt convinced Paulet Street was the place, he would not have abided a moment in a spot so uninviting. In such a street, the cheer of a passing equipage is unknown: even carts appear to shun its broken pavement. The barrow of the cat's-meat man or the knife-grinder, supplies the only rumble of wheels familiar to those miserable flags! A butcher's boy with a tray, or a milk-woman with her pails, would be a pleasing incident in such a place; as inferring that the inhabitants had their turn of food and comfort. But alas! as if their time were not more valuable than the time of the rich and idle, they are compelled to go in search of those common articles of sustenance, duly brought to the area-gates of wealthy men. Even the more considerable streets adjoining Paulet Street, not wider indeed, but darker and dingier from the greater altitude of the houses, exhibited samples of trade indicative of the outscourings of civilisation: the old clothes' shop of Nathan the Jew; the shop of the dealer in marine stores, with its rusty iron and "broken flint glass," its wax-ends and other incongruous perquisites, pickings, and stealings,—the piece-shop with its harlequinade of shreds and patches,—the rag-shop with its black-doll suspended from a string before the door, bobbing grotesque curtseys in the wind,—the chandler's, with its wicker-basket of stale-eggs, its snuff, tobacco, brown sugar and rush-lights, commingled in unsavoury contact;—or the huckster's with its frost-bitten turnip tops, and sacks of potatoes,—that manna of modern starvation, exemplifying to the pauper-population of our times the virtue of the text, that "man shall not live by bread alone."

"I might have spared myself this fool's errand," murmured Basil to himself as, within a door or two of the junction of Paulet street with one displaying these grander adjuncts, he passed before the cracked door-step of a house, dirtier and more disconsolate looking, though larger than its neighbours; and so deficient either of ragged muslin curtain or notice of "manglin," or "cleanin,"—broken flower-pot or empty bird-cage,—that it had the air of being uninhabited; the mists upon its filthy windows superseding all necessity for curtains, if, indeed, aught within were calculated to attract the curious eye.

Just, however, as Basil threw a hasty glance upon the streaky pea-green door of No. 11, Paulet Street, it revolved slowly upon its hinges, and there issued forth an old man, spare and stooping, who, but for his decrepit gait, had probably been above the middle size. His hat was napless, his brown great-coat thread-bare, and the worsted gloves drawn over his bony hands so coarse and cumbrous, that, after fumbling for some time with his key in locking the house-door after him, he dropped it on the step instead of conveying it into his pocket. His fingers were probably benumbed with cold.

The key fell almost at the feet of Basil; who, perceiving that the poor old man was making sundry efforts to recover it, good-naturedly stooped and placed it in his hand. Unused probably to acts of courtesy, the old fellow made almost as hard an effort to look up into Basil's face with thanks, as he had previously done to reach forth his hand towards his key; and when the eyes of young Annesley and the squalid stranger did meet, the impression appeared to be mutually startling. For a moment they stood, their looks steadily fixed upon each other, as though

> They shared between themselves some separate fate,
> Whose darkness none beside might penetrate.

Even when a few mumbled words of thankfulness on one part, and civility on the other had passed between them, and they went their several ways, Basil, on turning back for a last view of the strange proprietor of that den of desolation, found that he too had paused by the way, and was gazing back wistfully upon himself.

It was a relief to return once more to the haunts of a gayer world. Never before had Bond Street appeared so brilliant to Annesley as when, having alighted in Oxford street from his hackney coach, he hurried back on foot to his lodgings. The prosperous, thriving, well-dressed population of the West End seemed to comfort his eyes. At Basil's age, it is natural to turn with joy from the spectacle of Lazarus with his sores, to the auspicious prosperity of the man clothed in purple and fine linen.

"No use to avow my carelessness. I will write as though for the first time, or as though his letter had not reached me," said he, as he prepared to commence a fresh negotiation with A. O.; and more anxious than ever were the moments that intervened before a second answer was vouchsafed to his application.

It seemed as though the disingenuousness of the Money-lender was to keep pace with his own! Again an appointment was made; but no mention of St. Agnes le Clare, not a syllable about Old Street Road! A. O. consented to see B. A. on the morrow,—but it was at No. — Greek Street, Soho; and this time, Basil kept a check on his infirmities of memory, by carefully depositing the memorandum in his desk.

The mercury of his elastic nature rose once more in the tube, under the influence of this slight encouragement.—It is amazing in what unsubstantial indications, the sanguine find grounds for hope!—As the powers of the microscope convert the green mould of some decaying object into verdant forests and bowers of bliss, the eye of youth discerns promise in the veering of a cloud, and its buoyant heart dances for joy at the broken strain of distant and unattainable music.

To contend, however, with the dreariness of a London November, requires, on the part of a mere lover of pleasure, the utmost efforts of a sanguine temperament. The Western world seems laid under an interdict; the social frame broke up:—no brilliant equipage, no laughing faces, no merry balls, no gaudy crowds, no gleaming windows lighted up for festivity, as he dashes along the streets at night. May Fair looks gloomy as if on the eve of a universal interment. The great mansions of the Squares are as closely shuttered as if legions of dead lay coffined within; and the winter aspect of our metropolis is as depopulated, as the summer ones of every other city in Europe. We prefer our woods when leafless, our gardens when bereft of fruits and flowers; and repair from the country to town, just as the former is putting on her robe of beauty, and the latter becoming insupportable from heat and dust.

"How cursedly boring is all this!" said Captain Blencowe, shrugging his shoulders to Basil, whom, later in the day, he persuaded to take a turn with him in his cab in Hyde Park; where they found only a few venerable dowager-carriages, taking their daily airing, and looking like so many mourning coaches, washed with yellow.

"The air is mild this afternoon," replied Annesley, whose bosom's lord was sitting lightly on his throne, as if refreshed by the change of scene.

"Air?" reiterated Blencowe, with contempt,—"thank Heaven, I get my long leave next week, and shall make off to Melton. What is a man to do with himself in town at this time of year?"

"I seldom find my day hang heavy," replied Basil.

"Ay, ay,—you are new to it all; you will tell a different story when you have had as much of it as I have. I vow to God, I don't know a soul in London at this moment."

"There are the Maitlands, who—"

"The Maitlands!—two marrying girls and a double-marrying mother! By the way, Basil, you certainly do find occupation for your time! But you keep your own secret.—I suppose it is useless asking what takes you so often to the neighbourhood of South Audley Street? Well, well! I will say no more about it! I forgot that, at your age, such an inquiry is a leading question, to which your complexion has a prompt reply. Heigho! I wish South Audley or any other street, contained anything, or any lady, to palliate the accursed dulness of a London winter. The advertisements of the Times assure us every other evil is remediable; that there exist cures for the toothache and smoking chimneys; and patent rat traps, and bug-destroyers to His Majesty, are daily announced. If they would only tell one in what part of the metropolis antidotes are sold against ennui!"

"They do!" observed Basil, pointing laughingly to the vast playbills displayed in red and black variegation at the door of an oilman's shop they were at that moment passing in Piccadilly, on their way back to St. James's Street. But at that moment, the attention of his companion was attracted towards another object, a plain dark chariot, with the wheel of which their own was nearly locked by a concussion of coal-carts and stage-coaches opposite Hatchett's. Dexterous coachmanship alone emancipated them from the collision.

"A lucky escape!" cried Blencowe, as his noble horse, roused by the incident, started off towards St. James's Street. "It would have been no joke had I smashed his pannel."

"Whose pannel?"—

"Did you not see who was in that carriage?

"A grave old fellow, who looked like a physician. Who was it?"

"Neither more nor less than the renowned A. O.,—of whom we were talking the other day at the Club!—"

Basil Annesley started. He almost fancied this might be another of Blencowe's leading questions, addressed to his complexion.

"I feel when I see that man," said Blencowe, with an air of disgust too earnest to be assumed, "as if looking at a rattlesnake in a cage!—I always wonder who is to be the next victim! Even if asleep, one knows that the reptile's fangs are brewing their fatal venom, and that some human being may fall a sacrifice to their next mission."

Luckily for Basil, this terrible prognostication escaped him. He was reflecting upon the absurdity of having gone to seek for the proprietor of that plain but handsome equipage, in the squalid recesses of Paulet Street, St. Agnes le Clare!

The post of the following day brought him a letter from his mother. Lady Annesley appeared unusually depressed. There had been sickness in her household. The old gardener was on his deathbed. "You may have sometimes found Barlingham desolate enough," wrote the recluse; "but at this moment it is so thoroughly saddened, that I shall exonerate you, my dearest son, from your promised Christmas visit. I would not willingly expose your young heart to the sight of our sorrow, or the hazard of our sickness."

After perusing such a letter, Annesley thanked Heaven he had not followed up his momentary project of avowing his embarrassments to his mother; and set off, with redoubled eagerness, in pursuit of the Money-lender.

During his sojourn in London, he had probably traversed Greek Street, Soho, fifty times, without noting more than that it contained the usual double lines of tedious unmeaning brick-houses peculiar to English streets;—diversified only by varieties of Insurance plates,—the Phœnix, or the Sun-fire,—or exhibiting the interesting F. P., prating of the whereabout of their fire-plugs. But now, every house appeared instinct with meaning. Its glaziers' or grocers' shops, were not as the shops of other glaziers and grocers; and on arriving within a few doors of the number specified by A. O.'s communication, he began to count the houses, the earlier to familiarize himself with the "complement extern" of the Money-lender's habitation.

It was one of those square roomy mansions, which still announce that Soho was a fashionable quarter of the town, when the higher classes, taking sudden fright at the insalubrity of the banks of the river,—till the reign of the Second James their favourite residence,—migrated as far as possible from the influence of its miasma. But though spacious, the house in question was nearly as cheerless to look at as the den in Paulet Street. The windows of its vast frontage were closed by shutters, the paint of which was probably coeval with the edifice, if indeed its complexion could be conjectured through panes of glass so encrusted with the unmolested dust of years, that some winged seed might have taken root in the soil, had the well-trimmed parterres of the adjoining sooty Eden of Soho Square, produced specimens of vegetation so genuine as the thistle. The door, ill-fitted to its shrunken disjointed case, was of that dingy ochrous complexion, peculiar to the loungers of the Cheltenham promenades; and even the worn-out and broken caneblinds of the parlour were so closely surmounted by closed shutters, as to preclude all idea that the house was inhabited. It sounded hollow as the grave, when, in spite of appearances, Basil hazarded a modest knock and gentler ring!—

Promptly, however, as at some well-lacqueyed lordly mansion, the summons was answered. An old woman of crippled shape, and having a complexion many degrees darker than her tawny front and the dirty fly-cap that surmounted it, opened and held wide open the door, not as if awaiting his inquiries, but as though he were expected and had only to enter.—A glance at his feet, as hinting a hope that the door-scraper had not been overlooked, was all she vouchsafed him.

"In the back parlour," croaked her discordant voice, before he had recovered self-possession enough to ask a question; and he saw that he was to make his own way in this desolate temple of echoes. With his heart beating more irregularly than he would have cared to own to his friend Blencowe, Basil accordingly advanced along the wide but bare and dirty passage, and knocked at the second door, which was slightly ajar. No one replied;—and he accordingly pushed it open, and went in.

CHAPTER III.

"Let him who wants to know the value of money, try to borrow some."—Popular Proverb.

The chamber into which Basil had thus unceremoniously introduced himself, though empty, had all the appearance of having been recently occupied. Volumes of sulphurous yellow smoke ascended from a black mass of coals in the rusty grate, interspersed with damp shavings, in token that some effort at least had been made to ignite them; and an old-fashioned bureau standing open against the wall, exhibited files of papers, and one or two open letters, besides a compact phalanx of diminutive rouleaux, apparently of sterling value.

To these objects, however, after a cursory glance round the room, Basil paid not the slightest attention. Throwing himself into a roomy arm-chair, of which the horse-hair stuffing protruded at intervals through the well-worn black leather covering, and the channelled mahogany arms promised any thing but a pleasant lounge, he contemplated with listless gaze the old fashioned parlour, with its bare boards, whereof the knots stood prominent from the softer level of the wood worn down by much friction, even as the more obstinate defects of a human character become more remarkable when the weaker qualities have subsided under the pressure of years. The walls were of wainscot, diversified by heavy festoons of flowers and fruit, dividing the compartments, and indicating oaken pannelling. But the wood being concealed by an ignominious coating of paint which appeared to have been contending for nearly a century with that yellow London smoke, of which the adjoining fireplace furnished so satisfactory a specimen, the original richness of effect was lost.

The only object serving by way of decoration to that dingy wainscot, was a paper almanack, nailed up by tacks at the corners, beside the bureau. The only object adorning the floor, was a square of dis-coloured drugget, constituting a sort of dais that extended from the fireplace beyond the bureau;—a straw chair pushed back from which, had evidently been in recent use.—Such was the official residence of the redoubtable A. O.!—

For some minutes, young Annesley sat motionless, with eyes apparently intent upon the cheerless objects around him, but in reality labouring to resume his self-possession. At length he grew impatient, and started up; but instead of approaching the bureau, containing the only desultory objects of interest in the room, he took his stand mechanically on the drugget before the fireplace, as though the latter had emitted warmth, or the former, comfort. To approach a depository of written papers belonging to another, would have appeared criminal to a mind so honourable. Far better to bear the impatience or listlessness of ennui, than relieve the tediousness of the moment by a breach of confidence. At last, after exhibiting the ordinary symptoms of youthful petulance, venting a few ejaculations against the smoky fireplace, and tapping first with one foot, then with another, on the sonorous floor, ill covered with that thin and scanty drugget, he was about to fall with indignation upon the thin green cord serving as bell-rope, in order to summon the old woman in the dirty fly-cap, and ascertain why his dignity was thus trifled with; when, lo, just as he had placed his hand upon the string, a slight sound proceeding from the furthest corner induced him suddenly to turn round, and, standing there, as if emitted by the wainscot, he discerned the unknown proprietor of that dreary apartment! One of the carved panels probably concealed a door, through which he had, unobserved, effected his entrance.

Involuntarily, Basil advanced towards the newcomer, as though it were his business to do the honours of the place. But when within a few paces of his host, who stirred not a step to meet him, the young man stopped short,—startled out of all self-possession by a single glance at the figure that presented itself to his observation.

There was nothing, however, very remarkable in the person of A. O.—Though above the middle height, a certain ignoble character of form and gesture deprived him of the advantages usually inseparable from a commanding stature. His dress, if neither coarse nor rusty, was of an inferior cut; and though his dark eyes might have passed for intelligent in the head of any other man, there was a discrepancy between the blackness of their tint, enhanced by the profuse black eyelashes and eyebrows by which they were overhung, and the scanty grey curls almost approaching to white, that figured on either side a head, the crown of which was bare and lustrous. It was, in short, a face and figure, which, in squalid attire, with a beard and a slouched hat, would have passed muster among the itinerant dealers in old clothes, whose cries disturb the inhabitants of the West End, at an hour when none but Jews, fish-women, chickweed boys, scavengers' carts, and twopenny postmen, are astir in the slumberous streets of the more civilized quarters of the town.

It was not, however, the Israelitish type of the individual before him, which arrested the courtesies of Basil Annesley. From the first, he had heard A. O. classed among "the Jews;" and expected nothing better than to find the outward man of the Money-lender accordant with that inward specification. His amazement arose solely from the discovery, that the decently attired and robust man before him, was no other than the threadbare and decrepit individual, whose key he had restored to him in Paulet Street, St. Agnes le Clare; though as different in form and seeming, as both the one and the other from the well-dressed gentleman in the brown chariot, pointed out to him by Captain Blencowe, in Piccadilly, as the great and influential A. O!

Startled and shocked by a transmutation so little short of magical, young Annesley became perplexed and incoherent in the exordium to which he now attempted to give utterance. He scarcely knew whether it would be better to announce or pass over his discovery. It was essential to him to propitiate the Money-lender. Was this desirable object likely to be accomplished by the detection and development of one of those strange mysteries, in which it seemed his pleasure to envelop his proceedings?

While Basil was still debating within himself this urgent point, the singular master of that singular house, keeping his eye fixed upon the intruder with the same scrutinizing interest which had marked their first encounter, relaxed the spasm of catalepsy into which his sudden apparition appeared to have startled his visiter, by advancing towards the bureau, abruptly turning round the straw-chair placed before it, and, while appropriating it to his own use, motioning to Basil to resume the great elbow-chair in which he had already ensconced himself. His first words decided the question which still agitated the mind of young Annesley.

"Unless I am mistaken, young man," said he, coolly, "we have met before!"

"And so recently, that I can scarcely account for my own uncertainty on the subject," was Annesley's frank rejoinder. "Yet there is so little analogy between—"

"Fine feathers make fine birds,—foul feathers foul ones," interrupted A. O. in the same hard but measured voice, looking down as he spoke upon the sleeve of a coat which, unless in a smoky back parlour in Soho, could scarcely have pretended to the designation of fine. "I had, however, little suspicion," he resumed, "that in the gay young gentleman who took compassion on the predicament of a bungling old man, the other morning, I beheld the identical B. A., an appointment with whom had enticed me, in inclement weather and to no purpose, to that remote quarter of the town."

"The distance was as inconvenient to me as to yourself," replied Annesley, recovering his self-possession under the influence of his discovery that the man before him was either an impostor or a mountebank. "It was you, Sir, who wrote to me, assigning another house than your own for our interview."

"I have houses in various quarters of the town," replied the Money-lender, unabashed by his retort; "in St. James's, to transact my business with spend-thrift lords, and lend my aid towards patching the ragged vesture of fools of quality; in Finsbury, for such as honour me by an appeal to my strong-box, but not with the disclosure of their names. It is my rule to place confidence only in those who show confidence in me."

"In addressing myself to one known to me only by the initials of A. O., I did not feel bound to disclose more than my own of B. A.," replied the young soldier, gravely.

"Mine are pretty universally known to express my real name, replied the Money-lender. "I am called Abednego Osalez. And now permit me to inquire your motive for repairing to so obscure and troublesome a quarter of the town for the despatch of business which your letter described as pressing, yet, after all, leaving it undone?"

"May I first inquire in my turn," replied Basil, encouraged rather than daunted by his sang froid, "why, after sending me on that occasion to the extremity of the city, you condescend, on my second application, conceived in precisely the same terms, to receive me here?"

"Perhaps," replied the Money-lender, evidently in good conceit with the client who had unwittingly obliged him under his garb of misery, "perhaps, because your carelessness on that occasion induced me to suppose your exigencies less urgent than I had implied from the terms of your original letter. The man who could afford to wait, had claims to higher consideration. And now, I am surely entitled to as frank an answer!"

The double mystery was now succinctly and readily explained. From Basil's avowal of having had his pocket picked, the Money-lender probably deduced an inference that it was because, unused to be the depositary of valuable effects, he was thus careless; for his momentary good humour seemed overcast. Perhaps, however, he was merely vexed at finding himself detected in a garb so unseemly by a new customer.

"This is the first time, I fancy, we have done business together?" said he, starting from his reverie and abruptly addressing young Annesley, who replied by an affirmative bow.

"And do you bring me no letter of recommendation from some other of my clients?"

"From no one," he replied, spontaneously recalling to mind the unsatisfactory terms in which the very clients on whom he pinned his reliance, treated him in his absence.

"It is merely my newspaper advertisements, then, which have attracted your notice?"—

"Not altogether," replied Annesley. "More than one of my brother officers have been extricated from pecuniary difficulty by your assistance.—From them, I became aware of your modes of business; and—"

"Did they not also add," interrupted the Money-lender, "their exhortations that you should not apply to me, unless your case were desperate? Did they not tell you, if any other earthly resource be open to you, beware of A. O.? Did they not call me shark, cormorant, vulture, usurer, Jew? You know they did! Not a mess of any regiment in the service in which I am not thus opprobriated."

Basil, who already repented his indiscretion, in having allowed the words "brother officers" to escape him, as too clearly indicative of his social position, would not, by an affirmative reply, hazard the exposure of his friends to the vindictive reprisals of such an enemy as A. O.

"You are cautious, young gentleman!" observed the Money-lender, whose large dark eyes seemed to penetrate the most hidden thoughts of his companion. "Caution, however, is not the parent of confidence. You come to me in the hope of opening my strong-box; and will scarcely accomplish the exploit with close lips and a closer heart. A calling such as mine necessitates some degree of mystery; but when once a bona-fide negotiation commences, all must be above-board,—all truth and daylight. I have told you my name is Abednego Osales. I now ask the favour of your own?"—

Still, Basil hesitated. He could not bear to disgrace the honourable patronymic borne by the object of his filial veneration, by inscription in the registers of a Jew!

"You will be pleased to remember," resumed the Money-lender, "that no act can be authentic between us, unless the business be negotiated under our real names. If, therefore, you scruple to intrust me with yours, this interview has lasted too long already."

Apprehending, from his decided mode of uttering these words, that the peremptory Jew was about to rise and dismiss him, the agitated applicant murmured, in a low voice, "My name, Sir, is Annesley."

"Annesley?"—reiterated the Money-lender, as if requiring him to be more articulate.

"Basil Annesley."

The Jew rose with some precipitation from his seat; and, for a moment or two, occupied himself in turning over the papers lying open on his bureau, as if in search of writing materials, to enable him to take notes of the business of his new client.

"You have lately, I believe, entered the Grenadier Guards?"—said he, still addressing Annesley, but without turning round.

"I have been rather more than a year in the army."

"And during that short space of time, you have contrived to embarrass yourself?"

"Many contrive to do so in less than a twentieth part of it!" replied Basil, as if resolved not to be brow-beaten by a stranger.

"Not the well-conditioned son of a mother in straitened circumstances," replied the insolent Jew, who seemed endowed with an intuitive insight into the position of his new client.

"I applied to you, Sir, as a Money-lender, not as a counsellor," said Basil, haughtily, now rising in his turn. "My business may be briefly explained,—I am, as you seem to be aware, the only son of the late Sir Bernard Annesley. I have immediate necessity for a sum of £350.—My allowance of three hundred a year—"

"She allows you three hundred a-year, then?—too much—too much for her to give, or you to receive!" muttered the Jew, in indistinct tones, of which, however, not a syllable escaped the ear of Annesley.

"I observed, Sir, that my allowance of three hundred a-year, and my pay," persisted Basil, not noticing his interruption, "would enable me to pay you off, by monthly instalments, both interest and principal, in the course of the next two years and a half."

"And should you die in the interim, young gentleman, what security have I, pray, for my money?"—demanded the usurer with a sneer.

"Surely I could effect an insurance on my life, assigning you the policy?" inquired Basil, in a less assured voice.

"You have very soon become familiar with the expedients of an embarrassed man," murmured the Jew,—still, without turning towards him, but apparently engrossed by the money and arrangement of the papers on his bureau.

"I was informed by a brother officer that such was the mode in which you had arranged a similar matter for himself," replied Basil, with increasing hesitation.

"Captain Blencowe, eh?—ay! I remember. Six years ago, however! Your friend has a good memory,—so have I: and I admit that he redeemed the debt like a gentleman, some time within the term of his acceptance."

"I should be glad to convince you that you would obtain in myself a client equally honourable," rejoined Basil, somewhat reassured.

"The will may not be wanting, but I doubt the means. Young Blencowe belonged to a moneyed family.—I knew with whom I had to deal.—Were you to fail me, I might put the whole Annesley family into thumbscrews, without eliciting so much as a ten-pound note in your behoof. Persons of my occupation, Sir, are forced to keep a pretty accurate tariff of the fortunes and consciences of those likely to come within their line of business. I had a relative of yours, one of the Yorkshire Annesleys, two years in the King's Bench at my expense."

"But I conclude he paid you at last?" demanded Basil, too ignorant of the connexionship of his father's family, to refute any such accusation.

"With his life.—He died in prison, leaving me the creditor of heirs who were penniless."

Strange to tell, there was a tone of triumph rather than of vexation, in the Money-lender's mode of alluding to this frustration of his interests.

"But I, who am both young and solvent," persisted Basil, "do not intend to defraud you, either by living or dying. I give you my word of honour as a gentleman, that——"

"The word of honour of a gentleman, has no value, and should have no mention in a money-dealing transaction," interrupted the Jew.—"The affair between us is simply one of speculation. You want money; I have to sell it to you, as much as possible to my own advantage. I must therefore either have good security and fair interest; or without security, such interest as may induce me to incur the risk."

"I have already offered you the latter alternative," said Basil, bluntly.

"I have been offered two hundred per cent. by needy men before now," replied the Money-lender, with a curl of the lip, "and without swallowing the bait. The mere promise of a stranger is not exactly worth its weight in gold. In the first place, Mr. Annesley, have you even so much as reflected upon the amount of the interest of your debt, and keeping up the policy of insurance, besides the expense of the execution of the deed, added to the sinking fund for the gradual defrayment of the three hundred and fifty pounds?"—demanded the pragmatical Jew.

"I am in the receipt of four hundred and thirty pounds a-year," replied Basil, evasively.

"And for what purpose is it assigned to you?" retorted the Money-lender. "To afford you a becoming position in the world!—What right, therefore, have you to alienate this provision, so as to deprive yourself of the necessaries of your sphere of society, and become exposed to the shame of petty embarrassments?"

"None!" replied Basil, astounded at the inexplicable liberties taken by his new acquaintance, yet not daring to resent remonstrances apparently indicative of favourable dispositions towards him. "But the shame to which I may expose myself by the limitation of my income, is surely nothing compared with that which would befall me a month hence, when my acceptances fall due, and I am unable to do them honour."

"But you are still a minor?" remonstrated the Jew.

"Those who were satisfied with my endorsements, asked no questions, contenting themselves with the engagement of a gentleman, the son of a man of honour," replied Basil with firmness. At that moment, the Money-lender accidentally let fall a paper he held in his hand; and the mechanical courtesy with which Basil started forward to assist him in recovering it, probably tended to recall to the recollection of A. O. the kindness displayed by the young Guardsman towards the old pauper of Paulet Street; for on turning to receive it from his extended hand, the countenance of the Jew had relaxed into a more Christian-like expression.

"At least," said he, after receiving the paper and fixing his dark eyes approvingly upon the ingenuous countenance of young Annesley, "at least there was value received for these bills of exchange? You are not applying to me for the means of covering another usurious transaction? Do not deceive me, young Sir; for through my extensive connexions with the moneyed world, I have the means of ascertaining the truth to a guinea."

"I have no disposition to deceive you, Mr. Abednego Osalez," replied young Annesley, with some hauteur; "but if I came not hither to seek a counsellor, still less am I disposed to find a confessor in my man of business. The purpose for which I require these funds, regards you as little as the mode by which you have acquired them, so as to enable you to supply me, regards myself. I ask no questions: let me advise you to be equally discreet."

"There is no occasion for you to ask questions!"—said his singular companion, continuing to examine his papers, and file them carefully, all the time he was speaking. "They are answered for you without inquiry. The world has explanations stereotyped to your hand. Everybody knows the Money-lender to be a Jew—the Jew a usurer—the usurer a criminal in the eye of the law. Christ drove the money-changers from his Temple: man expels them from his tribunals. The money-lending Jew is one who must have acquired his funds by extortion and fraud; one who probably began life as a Corsair—pickpocket—resurrection man—assassin—no matter what amount of obloquy you heap upon his head!—He cannot have too narrowly escaped the hands of the hangman! He cannot be too grossly stigmatized, he has caused the ruin of thousands—

> And if a man have need of poison now,
> Here lives the caitiff wretch would sell it him!

Admit that I portray myself as you have heard me portrayed? Why therefore should you institute further inquiries into my conduct or its motives?"

Basil Annesley was startled out of all self-possession by this strange appeal. From the first few words uttered by his new acquaintance, he had been impressed by the superiority of his tone and phraseology not only to his garb and mode of life, but to a calling affording inducements for such base disguisal as that which had first brought them into collision. But now, the unexpected eloquence of his words and sudden energy of his gestures, were characteristic of the scholar and the gentleman, rather than of the vulgar Jew,—the jobbing money-broker!—Poor Basil almost quailed under the vivid glances of the excited man who gave utterance to this petulant apostrophe.

"I have, I admit, heard you ungraciously spoken of," said he, with a degree of frankness rivalling that of his interlocutor. "That what was told me exercised no very important influence over my opinions, may be inferred from my presence here."

"You are here simply because your position is desperate!"—coolly rejoined A. O. "You are here because there is no hope elsewhere. You may also perhaps, have heard from Captain Blencowe, and other victims who have escaped without serious injury from my clutches, that even the crocodile of the shores of Pactolus is sometimes moved to a caprice of pity; and are willing to try whether anything in your youth and inexperience may reach his milder mood."

"My youth and inexperience at least encourage you to trifle with me!"—cried Basil, with a rising colour, more enraged by the ironical smile pervading the countenance of A. O., than by his mere words. And, having snatched his hat from the window-seat, he was preparing without ceremony to quit the room.

"In all money-dealings, Mr. Annesley," said his companion, undismayed by this tacit threat of breaking up the conference, "you will find the command of your own temper five per cent. in your favour. You cannot afford to quarrel with me. At this moment, I am the necessary evil which must redeem you from the still greater of immediate dishonour. Do me the favour, Sir, to sign this paper," said he, placing in the hands of Basil, one which, during their conference, he had been quietly preparing. "It is, as even your slight knowledge of business must assure you, of no legal value. It is the obligation of a gentleman, and must derive its sole importance from a gentleman's signature. It will neither enable me to imprison my debtor nor molest him; but it will remind Sir Bernard Annesley's son, that, within three years after attaining his majority, he has engaged to pay me back a sum of four hundred pounds; whereof the interest, at five per cent. shall be quarterly forthcoming."

Basil took the promissory note into his hands, and seeing that it was phrased strictly according to the announcement of A. O., conceived himself well off at having so small a bonus as £50 demanded of him as the penalty of the transaction. But what was his amazement when, on taking his place at the bureau, to sign the paper, he found lying before him, a printed cheque of one of the first banking houses of the West End, bearing the signature of Abednego Osalez, and directing the firm in question to "Pay to Mr Annesley or bearer the sum of four hundred pounds!"

Scarcely able to believe the evidence of his eyes,—his cheeks flushed by the excitement of the moment,—his heart throbbing almost to agony with the consciousness of release from the first great embarrassment of his life, Basil, ere he accepted one document or executed the other, was eager to express his astonishment and gratitude to one whom he could scarcely regard in any other light than that of a benefactor; but on turning round for the purpose, he found that A. O., instead of remaining behind his chair to watch his proceedings, was engaged at the door in earnest colloquy with the unsightly crone, who officiated as his clerk of the presence.

"Tell him I am engaged,—say it is impossible for me to see him this morning," said the Money-lender, in the imperative tone he had assumed in the earlier part of his colloquy with Basil.

"I have told him so already, Sir," croaked the old woman, "but he will not be denied. He has got out of his cabriolet, and is standing on the door-steps awaiting."

"Let him wait!" said the Money-lender. "If he persist in coming in, show him into the front parlour, and open one of the shutters, till I am ready to receive him.—You perceive, Mr. Annesley, that I am waited for. Spare me therefore the effusions of thankfulness I see expanding upon your lips," resumed A. O., turning towards Basil, who stood transfixed beside the bureau, the cheque in one hand, and the promissory note in the other. "Have you signed it?"—continued he, pointing to the latter document. "Be quick, if indeed you have carefully perused the terms. Never, while you live, put your name to a paper, of which you have not, to a syllable, mastered the contents. Nay,—spare me your declarations of confidence: you may have less grounds for gratitude than you suppose. Remember the fable of the little fish thrown back into the river to become a bigger, by the wary angler. Be not too sure that the Money-lender is not facilitating your first ingress into his net, in order to secure your return."

Basil Annesley, who had now both read and signed the promissory note, and placed the printed cheque in his pocket-book, smiled at this sinister prognostication.

"I do not choose you to be ruined by anybody but myself," observed the Money-lender with a smile: "in proof of which, let me advise you to place that pocket-book in a securer place than the one from which you own my letter of appointment to have been subtracted. Above all, deposit, this very morning, the money you are about to receive, with your own banker, so as to be ready for the exigencies which——well, well! I will spare you my lecture!"—said he, interrupting himself when he saw the colour rising into the cheeks of Basil. "You receive sterling advice, I perceive, less thankfully than sterling coin."

"The gentleman is in the parlour, Sir," said the old woman, again thrusting in her dingy face and still dingier cap.

"So much the better," replied the Money-lender, with a bitter sneer. "It may serve to bring so fine a gentleman to his senses, to make acquaintance with the mice and spiders of my desolate habitation."

In another moment Basil Annesley, still misdoubting whether he were awake or asleep, had shaken hands with the new acquaintance who had acted by him the part of an old friend, and was once more in the street. A few paces before him was leisurely proceeding a plain but handsome cabriolet, of which the tiger who held the reins wore a plain undress livery. But the horse of which the little fellow was in charge was not to be mistaken. It was one renowned in the glories of Hyde Park, a celebrated cab, announcing that the fine gentleman just then cooling his heels in the dismantled dining-room of A. O. was no less a person than his grace the Duke of Rochester.

CHAPTER IV.

THAT day was a day of overflowing joy to Basil Annesley! Had the pavement, intervening between Soho Square, and St. James's Street, been tesselated with gems, after the fashion of the sanctuaries of the Alhambra or Aladdin's palace, instead of displaying the half-frosty, half-filthy flagstones of one of the least inviting quarters of the West End, he could not have felt more elated or have made his way more lightsomely of foot than on his road to Herries'; where, after receiving his four hundred pounds, he paid the first half-year's interest thereon in advance to the account of Abednego Osalez, Esq., in order that, for twelve months to come, he might be conscience-clear on the subject.

Let him who, after labouring under the pressure of pecuniary embarrassments has ever found himself suddenly and unexpectedly released from thraldom, declare whether any earthly triumph can exceed that soul-stirring emancipation!

> The king may make a belted knight,
> A marquis, duke, and a' that;

but, far surpassing any creation recorded in the peerage, is that of a free man, out of a wretch on whose shoulder the gripe of the bailiff has been felt by agonizing anticipation.

As regarded Annesley's feelings, he was now out of debt; for he was in debt only within limit of his means. Four and twenty hours before, he had looked forward to the dreadful 28th of December, which was to find him in possession of three hundred pounds, or steep him in shame to the very lips, as a criminal to the day of execution. He would not have felt half so overjoyed at being declared heir-apparent to the Duke of Rochester, as to know that four hundred pounds were that day placed to his credit at Coutts's.

How little,—how very little,—do those real potentates of modern times, who sway the destinies of nations and individuals with a rod of gold, and issue their decrees in bank notes and Exchequer bills, the bankers of money-spinning Europe, conjecture the fearful nature of the passions imprisoned in that Pandora's box, their iron safe; the world of magic spells, compassed within the simple parchment covers of the books of their constituents; the fiat of life and death occasionally inscribed on one of the printed cheques which their clerk mechanically cashes, enregistering the number of the notes he gives in exchange with as cool deliberation as though the heart of the expectant "bearer" throbbed not with ecstasy at the sight of those bringers of glad tidings to his necessitous household!—The whole romance of civilisation is in fact comprised within the magic initials of L. S. D. MONEY is indeed POWER,—the "Open sesame" to the seemingly impervious rock of human destiny!—Of all the masquerading guises in which false Philosophy loves to parade herself, contempt of MONEY, the ladder by which almost every earthly advantage is attainable, is surely the most absurd!—

Poor Basil among the rest, had often blazoned forth his contempt of riches; labouring to reconcile his mother to her straitened means by assurances of his indifference to the dross of this world; nay, had even deceived himself by frequent protestations of indifference to the gorgeous gew-gaws of opulence.—He fancied himself content, nay proud and happy to be poor. And now, the possession of a paltry four hundred pounds, was driving him half out of his wits for joy!—

For though the origin of his embarrassments was of a nature far from dishonouring to his head or heart, it was one he dared not have disclosed to his austere mother. Almost, indeed, would he have preferred to pass in her eyes for the dupe of the gaming-table, or for a frivolous spendthrift, ruined by idle extravagance, than to expose the truth.

Not one guinea of the money had been applied to his own use. The necessities of another had caused him to pledge his honourable name beyond his power of redemption. And yet, he had not even enjoyed the happiness of claiming sympathy from that other in his embarrassment. He had been forced to pretend opulence at the moment of signing the bills of exchange, and indifference on the subject ever since, lest the obligation should afflict the delicate and high-minded individual whom his interference had been the means of rescuing from the utmost extremity of distress.

There was only one drawback on his exulting happiness: his mother's illness! Even this, however, was less acutely felt than when sinking under the apprehension that his difficulties might shortly aggravate the evil; and now, disregarding her prohibition, and forestalling his purposed Christmas visit, he readily obtained a few days' leave of absence; and, armed with a thousand little tokens of kindness for the invalids, hurried to Barlingham. Instead of affording Lady Annesley time to renew her prohibition, he chose to take her by surprise.

Few are the contingencies in this world which justify taking people by surprise. Husbands and wives have often had to rue the officious affection which impelled them prematurely into each other's presence; and the best household, the best school, the most united family, the most attached circle of friends, cannot be too accurately apprized of the exact moment at which the absent one is likely to rush once more into their arms.

Poor Basil reached the Grange, his whole heart overflowing not simply with the milk of human kindness but with its cream. Late in the evening, he reached Lyndhurst by the coach; and preferring to restore circulation to his chilly limbs by a walk of a mile and a half across the fields, to a three miles jumble in a postchaise, through one of the most unsatisfactory lanes that ever besloughed the wagon of the despairing farmer, he accepted the offer of a countryman to accompany him with his valise, and cheerfully cut across to Barlingham, by a way familiar to him from boyhood.

To beguile the dreariness of his lonely walk, he almost unconsciously burst forth into a song, the produce of one of the olden poets.

Truce to thy fond misgivings,
These fruitless tears give o'er,—
No absence can divide us, love,
No parting part us more!
Mountains and seas may rise between,
To mock our baffled will;
But heart in heart, and soul in soul,
We bide together still.

Where'er I go, or far or near,
I cannot be alone;
Thy voice is ever in mine ear,
Thy hand press'd in mine own;
Thy head upon my pillow rests,
Thy words my bosom thrill,
And heart in heart, and soul in soul,
We bide together still.

And when stern death shall work his worst,
And all our joys are done,
E'en by the mystery that unites
The dial and the sun;
Though one exist in heavenly bliss,
One in this world of ill,
Yet heart in heart, and soul in soul,
We'll bide together still.

But as his voice died away, the loneliness seemed drearier than before. The weather was frosty. Not a breath was stirring; the moon had risen; and under its influence and that of the bitterness of the weather, the landscape exhibited a ghastly and death-like appearance. The fields were free from all transit of living thing: not so much as a plough left upturned in the furrows, for the readier recommencement of the morrow's labours, as at more propitious seasons of the year. Not so much as a stoat, or urchin, stealing in quest of midnight prey from hedge to hedge. And when at last Basil came in view of the Grange, standing black and desolate in the moonlight, in the centre of its open square of dark and leafless trees, it was like approaching the uninhabited castle of some fairy tale; not a dog to give tongue at sound of their intruding steps, as they crossed the little bridge leading from the moat to the chief entrance. And, lest Lady Annesley should be alarmed by the unwonted sound of the door-bell at so late an hour, her son made his way round to the postern leading to the offices, and entered the kitchen with a degree of humility most vexatious to his temporary esquire of the body, who had anticipated that, in escorting to the Grange the heir-apparent of the family, he should force a triumphal entry, drums beating and colours flying. Basil's hurried injunction to the two astonished women-servants, who screamed aloud on beholding him, to take care of his valise and its bearer, while he made his way into the house, scarcely reconciled poor Hodge to the indignity of stealing into the house, like a thief in the dark.

Leaving the Hampshire bumpkin to the consolations of a blazing fire and substantial supper, young Annesley seized the candle presented by the blushing, curtseying, handmaiden of old Dorcas; from whom he had already extracted that his mother and her waiting-woman were in attendance upon old Nicholas, who had been removed to a bed-room on the first floor, having, it was feared, not many days to live.

"My lady has ordered tea in half an hour in her sitting-room," added the damsel. "Shall I acquaint her, Sir, that you are here?—or would you rather I should go and make a fire, Mr. Basil, in your own room?—

Young Annesley accepted the latter alternative. Unwilling to startle the dying man by too sudden an appearance in his chamber, he determined to await the coming of his mother in her own apartment.

The sitting-room usually occupied by Lady Annesley during the winter months, was a small chamber on the first floor, adjoining her bed-room. The ceiling, as in all the rooms in the Grange, was not only low, but traversed and deformed by heavy beams; and the floor, of stucco or composition. Such a chamber, however, its embayed windows being thickly curtained, and its floor concealed by a carpet, is more easily rendered warm and comfortable for the long cheerless winter evenings, than one of nobler proportions; and the rich saloons of many a lordly castle might have found scope for envy during that bitter weather, in the little snuggery to which, when Basil made his way into the sanctuary, a blazing wood fire was affording the cheerful glow so welcome to the eye of the benighted traveller.

This room was, of all the house, the one least familiar to Basil. It was four years since he had spent a winter at the Grange. His return from Germany had chanced in the summer season; and the preceding Christmas, having recently joined his regiment, he had been forced to pass in town. During his holidays, Lady Annesley usually inhabited her drawing-room on the ground floor, as containing her musical instruments, and the bookcases calculated to afford amusement or instruction to her son; and it was only on occasion of some brief interview between them, that she received him in what she called her dressing-room, though the ceremonies of her simple toilet were performed in the sleeping-room adjoining. It possessed, accordingly, all the charm of prohibition in the eyes of young Annesley. It was the blue chamber of the Grange,—the only one into which he was not permitted to penetrate uninvited.

On the present occasion, he felt privileged. His visit was as the return of the prodigal son; and he chose to anticipate the favours reserved for such an incident. Moreover, Hannah had informed him that the only fire then burning, was in my lady's room; and the temperature of that December night was so little to be trifled with, that he entertained no scruple about invading the forbidden precincts,

"I don't wonder my mother is so fond of it!" was Basil's ejaculation, as, stationed upon the Persian rug before the fire, he cast his eyes round the cheerful chamber, in which Lady Annesley had judiciously assembled such remnants of antique furniture as she had found at the Grange;—the old carved chairs and tables, and a twisted legged cabinet or two, imparting the Elizabethan character he had recently observed as the height of the fashion. From the carved ebony desk on which Lady Annesley's handkerchief was still lying, to the prie-dieu in a recess near the fire-place, which was fitted up as an oratory, everything was so strictly in keeping as the bower-chamber of a ladye-fair of the sixteenth century, that it might have served as a study for Cattermole, or as the boudoir of sweet Anne Page.

"And yet what utter solitude,—what isolation from her caste and kind!" was his second reflection, on recalling to mind that this snuggery, so charming as a retreat from the severity of a winter's night, was Lady Annesley's abode from year's-end to year's-end, season after season! "A woman must have either a very good, or a very bad conscience, to find her happiness in such complete alienation from society."

That the former alternative was the origin of his beloved mother's retreat, was so naturally his conviction, as to excuse the second conjecture, though breathed only to himself; and regarding that elegantly antiquated room rather as the oriel of a Lady Abbess than as the boudoir of a woman of the world, Basil did new homage to the excellent taste which had converted the desolate walls of an old farm-house into a retreat so enviable.

It was not with him there, however, as in the den of the Money-changer. He felt it no treachery to examine, more leisurely than his mother's presence on the spot had ever yet enabled him, the objects around him. They were part and parcel of his mother, even as he, her only son, was a portion of herself; and the time must come, though he had never hazarded the anticipation, when they would become his own.

In the tediousness, therefore, of waiting for Lady Annesley's appearance, he cast his eyes from the heavy Persian carpets muffling the floor, to the bronze lamp, brightening every nook of the antiquated chamber. On the chimney ledge of carved Port land stone, against which he was leaning, stood two old agate chalices of great beauty; and between them, on a slab of green jasper, an antique bronze of considerable value, though exhibiting only an unsightly reptile, formed of that matchless metal of Corinth, of which all modern imitations fail to acquire the glowing tinge arising from the admixture of the more precious metals in the outpourings of the rich old city from whose burning ruins fused forth the metal unwittingly created by the spoliating hands of man.

On the wall opposite the fire-place, hung a fine portrait, well known to artists as one of the chef d'œuvres of Sir Joshua: a likeness of Lord L., the father of Lady Annesley, wearing the numerous foreign orders commemorative of the distinctions of his diplomatic career. A marble statuette of a child, on an isolated pedestal of giallo antico, filled one corner of the room; the others being completed with hanging shelves of carved ebony, filled with books; a female child, of exquisite grace and beauty, evidently the work of a first-rate hand, which Basil fancied he had heard whispered by Dorcas in his boyhood, as an early portrait of his sister, Mrs. Vernon.

All these objects he had noticed before. But upon Lady Annesley's desk lay a square book, covered with dark velvet, and having golden clasps of great beauty and value, like the mass-books of wealthy Catholics, inducing the renewal of a suspicion he had sometimes entertained, that his mother was secretly attached to a faith which was that neither of her husband nor her ancestors. Curious to determine whether it were, indeed, a livre d'heures, he opened the clasps; when, to his utter surprise, he found that the seeming book was a picture case, containing on one side the enamelled portrait of a man,—on the other, also under a glass, a lock of glossy hair, of raven blackness.

Basil stood utterly confounded. His late father, as he knew from portraits and from tradition, was fair as a German. His grandfather, Lord L., seemed to be now looking him in the face, in attestation that he had no affinity with the individual depicted in that mysterious miniature. Lady Annesley was one of three daughters—his coheiresses; nor, as well as Basil could recall to mind, had she a single male relation near enough to account for his picture being in her possession. What was the meaning of all this? He fixed his eyes searchingly upon the portrait, as if to interrogate its right and title to be found in his mother's safe keeping.

The face was one of more interest than regular beauty: dark, high browed, having a profusion of black hair, and eyes that derived a deeper shade from the reflection. The mouth was of rare beauty, yet unpleasing expression: being tempered by an infusion of scorn little in accordance with the mournful character of the eyes; and, on the whole, it was one of those countenances which fascinate the attention even while impressing the beholder with an unfavourable opinion of the original. The age of the person represented could not exceed five-and-twenty, and the dress was that worn by English gentlemen at the commencement of the reign of George III.

The more the attention of Basil became riveted upon the picture, the stronger was his impression that some mysterious interest must be connected with an object which he had attained the age of twenty years without perceiving in his mother's possession. In his boyish days, in those holidays of affection when the secret treasures of a mother are brought forth to amuse a sick child or console an aflicted one, he had often been allowed to admire the contents of his mother's cabinets; curious shells,—rare minerals, antique rings, the old fashioned repeater, with its massive chain and enamelled gew-gaws; nay, there was a valuable miniature of Lady Annesley's mother, the Lady L., in her black-lace hood and point stomacher, set in diamonds and enamel, with an L. and coronet flourished in seed-pearls upon the braid of hair forming the reverse, which had actually been allowed him as a plaything, in the convalescence succeeding a dangerous illness;—Yet of the miniature in the velvet cover he had never been suffered to obtain a glimpse!—

He had just replaced it on the desk and himself upon the hearth rug, when the door was deliberately opened, and Lady Annesley made her appearance.

Prepared to find her as gratified by his visit as he was pleased with his own alacrity in paying it, Basil was moved almost to awe, by the rigid coldness of her mode of receiving him. After rebuking his disobedience in being there, she coolly informed him that, with dangerous illness in her household, his presence would be an inconvenience.

"In that case, I will be off to-morrow," replied Basil, trying to recover or conceal his chagrin. "But, at least, dearest mother, forgive me so far as to bear with me this one night. I could not endure the anxiety of supposing you ill, without bringing my own eyes to verify the state of your health."

"Another time, honour me with your confidence so far as to believe that I tell you the exact truth," said Lady Annesley, sternly. "I have been ill.—I am well again,—unless, indeed, the vexation of being thus broken in upon, should produce a recurrence of my indisposition."

While expressing his hopes that he might not have so great an evil on his conscience, Basil saw the eyes of his mother wander from his face to the desk, and from the desk back again to his varying countenance; as if trying to decipher whether he had found time to examine the scattered contents of her chamber, or open the portrait.—The confusion painted in Basil's face, was, however, just as likely to arise from her ungracious mode of reception, as from consciousness of having indulged a prying curiosity; and she remained lost in perplexity.

The entrance of Hannah with the rich old fashioned tea-service, which having placed on the table, she was hurrying away again, now encouraged young Annesley to ask permission to visit the bedside of the poor old invalid, before the night became too far advanced to admit of disturbing him.

"Dorcas is with him night and day. He has all the attendance his state requires," was Lady Annesley's frigid reply.

"But as a satisfaction to myself, and, if I may be permitted to say so, to him. Poor Nicholas was always so fond of me!"—pleaded Basil.

"He is past deriving pleasure from the presence even of those who are dearest to him," persisted Lady Annesley. "Let me beg you rather to ascertain that your things have been safely deposited in your room, by the person who accompanied you,—yonder poor girl, being scarcely strong enough to supply the place of him we are about to lose."

Basil accepted the hint. Nothing more likely to injure the candour of an ingenuous heart, than the undue possession of a secret. For the first time in his life, he attributed a stratagem to his mother; convinced she was desirous to get rid of him, only that she might replace the mysterious portrait upon her desk in its accustomed concealment.

He was so far justified in his suspicions, that on his return to the tea-table, refreshed after his day's journey by purification from London soot and the dust of the road, a single glance towards the ebony desk convinced him the picture had disappeared. He fancied however, that his mother had detected even that momentary scrutiny; for her deportment was, if possible, more ungracious than before.

At any other moment, he would have attempted to dissipate her ill humour by allusions to the news of the day, and the tittle-tattle of London life. But though excluded from the chamber of death, he could not forget that, at the distance of a few chambers from the one they occupied, lay an aged man, endeared to both by long association, and about to appear in the presence of his Maker. This indeed was a sufficient excuse for the singular mood of Lady Annesley. In many persons, grief takes the form of anger. A proud spirit, unwilling to display itself covered with dust and ashes, uplifts its head with unbecoming pride, in order to conceal that temporary humiliation.

As every stroke tells against a gamester in his vein of illfortune, whatever topic was selected by Basil to dispel the embarrassment of that painful tête-à-tête, seemed to aggravate her still further against him.

Lady Annesley, as if desirous of promoting desultory conversation, adverted to the young nephew of the Duke of Rochester, who had recently entered his regiment.

"I was formerly acquainted with his father, and uncle," said she carelessly.

"His father is dead," observed Basil; "and his uncle were perhaps better in his grave. He is in the jaws of perdition,—ruined soul, body, and estate; a victim to play, with his fine fortune melting away in the grasp of the Jews."—

At that moment, an impulse of compunction, peculiar to generous hearts, brought before him the beneficient conduct of A. O., and the consciousness of his own obligations; and without reflecting on the singular effects such an outburst must produce on Lady Annesley, who had not the slightest clue to the origin of his opinions, he suddenly veered round, and began expressing his contempt of the existing prejudices against that contemned class of the community, citing every advantageous opinion or example ever adduced in favour of the people after God's own heart, from Cumberland and Miss Edgeworth, back to the choicest authorities of the Judaic world.

A sudden flush overspread the habitually pallid face of Lady Annesley. Her spirit seemed chafing within her. At the last she spake with her tongue.

"I can readily understand," said she, with undisguised bitterness, "that the follies and vices of London, and the companionship into which they may have forced you, may have done something towards relaxing the principles in which you have been reared, and the proud instincts of honourable descent. But I had not expected you would so soon have stooped to this! I had not supposed that a few thousands conceded by these wretched unbelievers, these heirs of perdition, gilded over like the molten calf till even Christian kings fall down and worship,—would so soon have obliterated in your honest heart the prejudice common to all ages,—all nations,—and consequently respectable even as a prejudice.—For my part, I loathe a Jew;—I am proud to declare, that I loathe a Jew!—Apart from the crime which stamped them with eternal condemnation, I detest their principles, I detest their practices. Wherever there are Jews, there is narrowness of mind,—foulness of body,—baseness of heart. They are a filthy people. Even as of old they bought with thirty pieces of silver the blood of their Redeemer, would they still chaffer for the heart's blood of the innocent! I tell you Basil, I loathe them! and those who induced you to entertain a contrary opinion, deceived you as much as they injured me!"

The eyes of young Annesley were now fixed upon his mother with unqualified amazement. She, usually so mild, so serene, so low-voiced, so indifferent to the things of this world, to be excited by so slight a cause into this violent diatribe!—And in the house of death!—With her aged servitor expiring almost within hearing of her uncalled-for vociferation!

Basil was awestruck! He could not help surmising for a moment, that his beloved mother's reason might be affected by her attendance on the deathbed of her faithful old domestic, while weakened by the effects of recent indisposition.

"Believe me, dearest mother," said he, "I never heard you accused of any partiality for these maligned people. My inclination in their favour is a weakness arising from peculiar circumstances of a nature wholly personal."

"You have heard it!" cried Lady Annesley, unsubdued by his deprecation. "Do not add deceit to the audacity of attempting to invade the sacredness of my thoughts and feelings. You have heard it!"—

Again, terrified and grieved, young Annesley was about to enter upon his own disculpation. But as he advanced nearer towards his mother, he perceived that, overcome by the violence of her emotions, she had thrown herself back in her chair, and covered her face with her hands to conceal a frantic burst of tears.

Basil Annesley stood transfixed. It was the first time in his life he had ever seen his mother shed a tear.

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN BETTINE BRENTANO AND CAROLINE VON GÜNDERODE.

It is now six years since the publication of "Goëthe's Correspondence with a Child" astonished our friends in Germany. The disclosure of a real passion conceived by a maid of fourteen for a poet of sixty, and the publication of her love-letters, became more piquant by their appearance under the editorship of the lady herself; who, twenty-five years later, and after she had long been the wife of a distinguished Prussian nobleman, seemed nowise desirous to unsay one word of these enthusiastic effusions. Her own position in society, too, as a member of the Brentano family, connected with the best circles of refinement and literature, enhanced the general interest. But, after all, the main charm was found to lie beyond any of these reasons,—in the letters themselves; full of variety and incident, and anecdotes of men and things, from the great poet at Weimar, down to the Marburg Bürschen. They afforded glimpses of the writer's character, more singular, if possible, than her romantic attachment;—a strange assemblage of the queer, the beautiful, the genial, and the capricious; such as one might well be amazed to find in the head and heart of a girl in her teens. Some notice of these was given to the English at the time; and it was then understood that a lady of some literary pretensions was engaged to translate them for publication here: but this never came to pass. It has been stated, that the translator (very judiciously) had resolved to make considerable omissions, and that the enthusiastic authoress insisted on the work being rendered entire, or not at all. Some years later, finding no approval of this condition here, Madame von Arnim actually learned English enough to encounter the task herself, and got her version printed in Berlin. It is now before us; a marvellous Babel of language, it is true, but interesting as an evidence of the energy and devotion of purpose which could attempt such a labour in furtherance of a pious object;—the sale of the book having been dedicated to the erection of a monument to her idolized poet. This translation of course has had no circulation in England.

It may be remembered, that one of the passages in these letters which deservedly attracted the most interest, was an account of the death of Fraülein von Günderode, a young lady of noble family, lay-canoness of the Damenstift, at Frankfort, who was Bettine's first and dearest friend. A disappointment in love, and over-wrought sensibilities, drove this accomplished creature to suicide, under circumstances which the survivor relates with a bitterness of grief that found its way to all hearts. To this friend Bettine had already told us that she owed the first awakening of her mental sense; and that in her companionship she first became allured to reflection, and urged to self-improvement. She related, moreover, how in the desolation of heart caused by her death, she betook herself, by a kind of unaccountable impulse, to solicit the friendship of Goëthe's aged mother, as a compensation for the loss; and in what an original manner this was done; and how it succeeded, and thus led to that wonderful love-fit which gave birth to the letters exchanged with Goëthe.

This history of the unfortunate canoness, and the influence she was said to have exercised on her younger friend's development, made us hear with pleasure the promise of a correspondence with Bettine, bearing the name of Günderode. It has lately been published; and a little time may be well spent in looking over its contents. That it is equal in variety and substance to the former series, will hardly be affirmed; but it completes much that was there wanting, contains much that is pleasant and new, and would have been hailed as a remarkable gift, had it been offered, as it ought to have been, before the other, which was commenced more than a year later than the last letter in these volumes.

The present collection is composed of letters exchanged by the two friends; and terminates at the winter preceding Fraülein von Günderode's death; when, having already resolved to destroy herself, she had the affectionate courage to pretend a coldness to Bettine, and bore the estrangement and the blame in silence, in order that the friend might thus be weaned from a love that would be wounded by her fate; at this time Bettine Brentano was some fifteen years of age. Those whom the title may induce to expect any addition to the pathetic history told in the first published letters, will be disappointed. In this correspondence the Fraülein has the least share; and appears before us with all the modesty which we are told belonged to her. We only see a thoughtful, sensitive, pure-souled young creature, treating her friend with the protecting love of an elder sister; her letters are not only fewer, but much more sedate than Bettine's, and throw no light on the story of her broken heart. Nor is there a single trait that could have prepared us for the long-cherished purpose, executed with cruel fortitude, by a being so gentle and feminine, and shrinking, as she herself tells us in one of the earlier letters, from the very sight of blood. There are a few of her poems scattered throughout the two volumes,—graceful and pensive, but of no other merit;—and we feel that, beyond an increased conviction of her goodness, we have gained from the book no further knowledge of the person whose name it bears.

Such being the case, and as we have been warned that to revert to what appeared in the earlier book will be regarded as superfluous, we shall say little of the gentle Fraülein, and view the present collection as a work by itself, the chief interest of which, under this aspect, must be found i the scattered glimpses which it affords of anoth haracter exceedingly curious and original. C hese, indeed, there is no lack, but they are so v ous as to defy classification. At every step contradictions spring up: the most childish delight in common trifles, the most daring attempts to reach at the mysteries of the Unseen;—thoughts at times capriciously absurd, at others almost as bright as inspirations; qualities masculine, feminine, and neuter; mischief and tenderness, simplicity and penetration: all turned out before us with the utmost naveté, like the contents of a pedler's wallet,—making a whole that it is impossible to behold without surprise, when we think of the writer's age, or without pleasure, as we read her lively effusions.

The best course will, therefore, be to let them be seen and heard for themselves, although a correspondence inevitably loses much of its best grace by being thrown into fragments. We thus forfeit the connexion of question and answer, the progress of small incidents which bring the scene before our eyes, and those little hopes, projects, and suspenses of the writers, by sharing in which we become attached to them, and feel, for the time, inmates of their family. Of Bettine Brentano's it was no small privilege to be a member. The grand-child of the beautiful and accomplished authoress, Sophia de la Roche, (the first-love of Wieland, and throughout life his attached friend;) the daughter of Maximilian Brentano, an Italian settled in Frankfort, where he rose to a position as high as a commoner in Germany can attain; and of a mother of whom it was said, that "if Venus Urania had born a sister to Eros, it could have been no other than her;" sister to Clemens,* a poet of eminence in the old German romantic vein; connected by the marriages of her beautiful sisters, and of her brothers, (all remarkable men,) with whatever was most distinguished in literature and social position; she had opportunities of looking at the world in a variety of aspects, to which young persons under ordinary circumstances must be strangers. She was left an orphan of both parents at an early age, and educated in a convent, until the marriages of her brothers gave her a home: from that period she seems to have passed her time now with one, now with another of these; returning frequently to Madame La Roche, at Offenbach, and travelling on various occasions through many parts of Germany; looking with quick merry eyes at everything she saw. But this was mostly at a later season: the letters now before us are richer in traits of character than in incident. With these we shall at all events begin, but pause for a moment to satisfy the curiosity of bachelor readers, on a point of cardinal importance when a lady is in question. In a family remarkable for the beauty of all its branches, Bettine seems to have been rather an exceptional shoot; she was little, and had irregular features, but her figure was well-formed and agile; she had abundant and beautiful dark hair, and a pair of deep brown eyes which seem to have pierced through every one that looked upon them. At the present day, when the fair owner has reached an age we are too gallant to conjecture, we are assured that their fire and vivacity are amazing. Old Madam Goëthe, whose remarks, wherever we meet them, have a stamp of picturesque quaintness that takes our attention, said, that she was reminded of her young favourite's eyes by the rich and thrilling tones of Romberg's violoncello.

We will first look with her friend Caroline into the young lady's room, after she has taken her departure for Marburg. The canoness seems to have been a girl of elegant orderly tastes; and this was the scene she had to encounter:—

Your room looked like a strand, on which a fleet had lately been cast away. Homer lay open on the floor: and your canary had not spared him. The famous imaginary map which you made of Ulysses' voyages, lay beside him; and your paint-box, with the cup of sepia upset, and all the shells of colour in confusion. This has left a brown spot on your pretty straw floor-mat. I have taken infinite pains to put all to rights again. The flageolet which you wanted to take with you, and sought for in vain—guess where I found it! In the orange-tree's tub, on the balcony, buried in the earth up to its mouthpiece: I suppose, you hoped on your return to find a flageolet-plant in full growth there. Lisbet has been watering the tree unmercifully, so that the instrument is all swollen; and I have laid it in a cool place, to dry gradually, for fear of its bursting. What I shall do with the music that was lying near it, I know not. I laid it in the sun for a while, but you can never let it again be seen by mortal eyes; its decency of appearance is gone for ever. Then, ever since you went, the blue ribbon on your guitar has been waving at full length, to the extreme satisfaction of the school children opposite, out of the window, exposed to rain and sunshine; and has faded, as you may imagine. The instrument itself has not escaped wholly; and I reproved Lisbet not a little for her carelessness in leaving the window open. Her excuse was, that she could not see it was open, because of the green blinds, although it rattled with the draught every time the door opened! . . . . . .

"Siegwart, a Romance of the Past," I found on the pianoforte, with the inkstand overlying it. Happily there was little ink in it, for your papers, over which all has been shed, will hardly ever be legible again. Then there was a little box on the window seat, in which something twittered, and made me curious to open it, when out flew two butterflies, which you must have placed there as chrysalids. Lisbet and I drove them to the balcony, where the climbing bean-flowers appeased their first hunger. From under your bed, Lisbet swept out Charles XII. and the Bible, and also—a kid glove, not a lady's, with a French poem in it. This glove seems to have lain under the pillow. I did not know that you had ever betaken yourself to compose French verses in the ancient style! The scent of the glove is very pleasant, and reminds me and makes my memory clearer every moment, so that I shall very soon bethink me where the companion glove is likely to be found. In the meanwhile, be at ease respecting the safety of this: I have stuffed it behind Kranach's Lucretia, where you will find it, when you return home.

This picture of admired disorder is no bad preparation for the appearance of the heroine, whose character, as it peeps out in these pages, exhibits a similar confusion of queer and precious things, thrown together by chance, and lying in the most unexpected places. A more wilful, perplexing, untameable maid, indeed, never came from the grave embraces of a cloister. Her eccentricity was a natural element: she was no enfant gaté, but seems to have grown up in a positive, will-o'-the-wisp kind of way of her own, which does not prevent her from being, after all, very loveable in our eyes,—tormenting as her occasional levity must have been to serious remonstrating friends, like

Herr von Bostel, who was much distressed that he could not make the wild, dark-eyed, curly-headed child, become as soft and loveable as her beautiful sisters, the pride of all Frankfort. The remonstrances of this monitor, and the lively way in which they were parried, are thus recorded by the culprit herself :—

You know that Bostel is here : he is always running after me, and saying—"Bettine, why are you so unamiable?" I ask him how shall I manage to become amiable? "Be like your sister Loulou : talk soberly now and then, and make some little show of taking interest in what is said to you ;—but whenever one feels inclined, were it but from compassion, to treat you like a girl old enough to count for something, it is impossible. You are as restless as a kitten playing with a mouse ; while any one is paying you the compliment of speaking to you, you clamber over chests and tables to get at the old family portraits, and appear to have more sympathy with their faces than with us living folk." Why, Master von Bostel, that is simply because the poor old creatures yonder are so utterly overlooked and forgotten, and no one else will converse with them ; so I feel for them, just as you feel for me. You see that I am neglected, and out of compassion, take notice of the poor unfledged thing. The disease is catching; I cannot help treating those old painted periwigs in the same manner. "But do listen—are you in your senses? How can you talk of a feeling for a canvass picture?" Why, have not you something of the kind for me? "That may be,—but the portraits cannot return it." No more can I yours. "Good Lord! indeed I pity you! you are in the way to become crazy."

The sedate and commonplace of her acquaintance, indeed, appear to have decided the point as settled past redemption ; while more sympathising friends insisted upon her youth, and asked for time. Caroline conceals nothing from her correspondent :—

When your brother is absent, every one falls upon you ; they dare not when he is by. It used often to give me pain to hear them pass judgment upon you, but now I have overcome this little susceptibility. Yesterday, Ebel, St. Clair, Link, Charlotte, and I, were in your sister Tonie's little cabinet ; but as I know how far the arrows which they shoot against you glance from their mark, I had no fear for you. Ebel is against you, not from personal dislike, but from an opposition in your natures ; and being a great sufferer when your brother Clement is here, as he is then too timid to give way to his zeal, it is not to be wondered at if he now allows it, as a compensation, the fullest exercise. St. Clair shook his head and looked at me, while Lotte wound up a long tirade with the declaration, that your absolute destitution of historical capacity, and utter want of logic, proved that you must be a mere fool. He replied—"Put a banner in her hand, and let her march before us, and in spite of her want of the historical sense, I will be bound she leads us to some real crisis in history; and were you, with your logic, in any danger, she would teach you how to escape from it,—however illogically, according to your notions, she might set about so doing."

So that, even amongst the Philistines, a friendly voice was not always wanting. But far oftener she seems to have been delivered over to unmerciful tongues, to which her vagaries were an abomination; and even her gentle friend, the canoness, was not spared at such times, as we find by her own report to Bettine. She writes :—

This evening I went out by the Gallenthor, as the Sun-god was setting, because you say that is my peculiar hour with him, and indeed I was thoroughly penetrated by his majestic presence ; but, returning homewards, two Frankfort Philistines marred all my devotion. They were plodding behind me, and talking. Says the wife to her husband—"In that canonry (the Damenstift, of which Caroline was a member) the girl's (Bettine's) brains will be ruined outright, and she's sure at last to become utterly mad. Already she is up to all kinds of crazy tricks. They say, that in the convent garden she always clambers up to the roof of the garden house, or into a tree, and preaches away from that station ; and that the tall goose, Günderode, stands below and listens." At this moment they passed me, and I recognised Frau Euler, with her daughter Salomé, and Doctor Lehr, who knew me in the twilight, and told her who it was. She suddenly stood still, and remained staring at me until I had again passed her,—a proceeding which surely was even a stupider one than my standing under the tree (if I did so) when you preach from it.

And yet it is no wonder that she puzzled the Frankfort Philistines, for her ways and inconsistencies were a riddle at times to her playmate and friend. As for instance :—

I often feel as if I were dreaming, when I see you amidst others. All regard you as a mere child, that has no kind of self-control : no one believes or even dreams that anything is in you. And you do nothing then but spring upon tables and chairs, hide yourself, cower down in narrow corners, ramble about the long passages of your house in the moonlight, climb up to the old garret floor in the dark; and, after this, come back, in an absent kind of reverie, yet alive to everything that is said. If anything is wanted, you are already down the stairs to bring it ; and when your name is called, there you stand, although you had been in the farthest nook of the house. They call you the house-goblin, as I learned from Marie yesterday.

A strange compound of sentiment, romance, and adventurous speculation, with such a mischief-loving, romping, volatile, unmanageable activity of body!—a perfect Mercury in petticoats, which indeed must, in many excursions, have been an encumbrance she would gladly have exchanged for a more commodious garment. Yet even in these escapades, there seems to have been something between an impulse and a motive not absolutely childish. On one of her break-neck expeditions to the summit of a ruin, we find her commenting thus :—

Every weed, with its pair of brown leaves, that the winter has not yet blown away, seems to nod a friendly welcome to me when I return thither, and take my seat near it on the crest of the wall, without being dizzy. What a delightful thing climbing is! How rapturous is the boldness of youth! Often as I come home with scratched knees and arms torn, as I did to-day, I do not feel it : nay, when I have suffered smartly, it rather gives me pleasure. "Be hard!" said the smith in the forest, as he struck the glowing iron on his anvil ; and the Thuringian Landgrave heard it, and he became as hard as iron. "Be hard!" said I to myself, when upon that dangerous battlement, and all pain was forgotten.

Such traits as this bespeak something far beyond the mere romping nature of a "mannish girl." It is, indeed, the evidence of an energy of character and idea, quite startling by their contrast with hoydenish wildness, that makes the correspondence most remarkable. The effect is such that many have asserted that the letters must have been retouched, if not rewritten, at a later period. But this we see no reason to believe. There is abundant contemporary proof that they were objects of surprise and interest, at the time, to numbers of distinguished persons, with whom her family connexions made her acquainted. There is, we think, internal evidence of their age in the letters themselves. Those now before us, for instance, earlier in date than the "Correspondence with Goëthe," have throughout a more infantine tone of expression and thought, although abounding in matter that many adult writers would find it difficult to produce. A most remarkable portion of this we must wholly refrain from translating. The speculations concerning art, nature, religion, love, and destiny, which fill three-fourths of the letters to Günderode, would meet with no toleration from English readers at large, however ingenious and fanciful they may be. The Germans, and the British of the present day, stand at the very opposite poles in reference to subjects of this nature; and to a public whose favourite literature is Jack Sheppard and the Pickwick Papers, it would be absurd to look for sympathy with those excursions into the arcana of thought and feeling which are pursued with respect by the German reader. Where the right in this difference may be, it were a bold thing to decide; one might conjecture that it lies somewhere between the extremes of the material and the imaginary: but, however this may be, the attempt to reconcile them just now would be a very hopeless one. Such being the difficulty as to German authors in general, in the case of our "fair maid of Frankfort" it is tenfold greater;—and her enthusiastic flights amidst the clouds of speculation, were they exhibited to our respected readers as evidences of her mental progress, would most probably be received as symptoms of utter insanity. We must, therefore, restrict the choice to specimens of a more popular kind, in which amiable feeling, quick observation, and lively descriptive powers, bespeak the presence of other endowments. Even thus incomplete, the portrait will appear one of the most extraordinary that early genius has ever brightened. As an interesting study in this point of view it will be acceptable to some; but we do not ask the general reader to accept it on this account;—the passages we quote do not appear to us to require any indulgence, but may be judged, on their own merits, like any similar production of more practised pens.

Here, for instance, is a thought and an illustration worth a second perusal:—

When the emperor was crowned, (in * Frankfort,) his way from the cathedral to the Römer, was over a path of scarlet cloth; and as he walked on, the crowd closed up behind him, cutting it away, step by step, and, tearing it into small fragments, divided it amongst themselves; so that, by the time that he entered the great hall of audience, not a trace of it remained. Just so all our paths in life to me seem, like that Emperor's red pathway, to be continually cut away from behind our feet, and become a nothing when we look back to them.

An incident giving rise to a feeling, neither of an uncommon kind, but graced in the telling, will come in here by way of contrast. She is with her brother-in-law,† Von Savigny, at a watering-place:—

In the afternoons we often go into the wood, where Savigny reads aloud to us: this listening is a very misery to me; for on the grassy floor of the wood there is so much to distract one's attention! At every instant there is some herblet, or spiderling, or small caterpillar, or little pebble to look at; or I make a hole in the ground, and find in it all manner of things. Savigny says I am too conceited to listen to him, and seems vexed; so that now I plant myself at his back, where he cannot see me. We go out a-shooting too—even I take a small gun in my hand, but shoot nothing, save what you know I love to hunt, brain-cobwebs that float in the air. But yesterday Bostel would teach me to aim at the birds—I fired, and a little bird fell;—I had never fancied I could hit it, and was terribly shocked at what I had done; but Bostel made such a fuss about the quickness of my eye, and the others so bepraised me for aiming well, that I concealed my remorse for this first murder of mine. I held the bird in my hand till it grew quite cold: in the silence of the night I buried it under the window of your sleeping room, not without some heavy night thoughts; indeed, I did not willingly kill it, but thoughtlessly I did. What is a bird? all sportsmen kill them—yes, but not I;—never would I have shot down the poor bird from amidst its leaves, in its life's merry season; a thing that God has gifted with the freedom of the air. God grants him wings,—and I must take his life? oh no! there is no harmony in this!"

She seems to have turned everything, in her own eager way, into matter for thought, and after a fit of graceful and sprightly description, which makes ordinary things look pleasing, we find her ever falling into questions and conjectures; as in the following pretty passage, which is interrupted by a close not quite so imposing as Neptune's, Quos Ego:

Just now the nightingales are wailing so sweetly around me! There are four of them here, and last year there were just the same number. How they breathe out their souls into that art of rapture—music—and as if all was thrown into a single tone—so pure—so innocent—so true and deep—such as no human creature can ever hope to produce, either with voice or instrument. Why must men learn to sing, while the nightingale, untaught, knows how to warble into our very hearts, so faultlessly in tune, so free from all failure! I have never heard any singing from human voices that moves me like the nightingales'. A minute since I asked myself, since I listen to them so intently, what if they would like to listen to me, as well! for just then they were silent: but hardly did I raise my voice, when all four burst out into such a warble of trilling—just as if they would say—leave us our own empire! Airs, and opera songs, are like the mere false tendencies in the moral world—the rhetoric of a false enthusiasm. And yet man is carried away by sublime music;—why should this be, when he himself is not sublime!—after all, it shows a secret wish in the soul to become great. It is refreshing like dew, to hear this better genius whisper in its natural language. Is it not so! O yes! and we then long to be ourselves like these tones, that dart onwards to their aim without wavering to either side. There they reach the absolutely complete, and in every rhythmical movement give out a profound mystery of spiritual form—this the human being cannot do! Surely melodies are beings created by the Divinity, that have a progressive existence of their own; every such idea comes forth at once in full life, from the human soul: it is not the man that creates the thought, but the thought creates the man. O! O! O! there falls a lime-blossom on my nose! and now it begins to rain a little. It is glooming, so that I cannot see what I write.

At all moments, indeed, we see her gazing earnestly at nature, and poring over her smallest works, as if to obtain from thence some reply to the inquiries of her own heart, and some guidance for the tenor of her daily existence: It is with no merely childish delight that she gazes upon—

* Under the old constitution, of course: the "Roman Empire" being now extinct, with all its pageants.

† The celebrated professor of Roman Law. He married Lulu Brentano.

A pupa, from which I myself saw the butterfly crawl out; it uncloses, and lets the insect escape, and then shuts again. In the inside there are fibres, like small springs, which the butterfly touches when it is grown to maturity, and on this the covering gives way: externally the pupa is quite hard, to protect its tenants from any injury. I have kept it purposely for you,—I will show it to you, and we will exchange some thoughts at the same time on the subject of immortality. Ever when in nature I see a thing like this, showing the presence of so much care, so cautiously protected, that nothing may disturb it before it is fully ripe,—I feel a kind of awe: and surely nothing can be sadder than to handle it rudely, for, delicate and sensitive as it is, this must pierce through its very being. I too would fain not sin against nature, and force myself forward, and wish to become something before the due time; it is against her will that I should be a profound thinker; she says I must run, and leap, and, as for reflection, have nothing to do with it at all; and now the same order, too, stands written in your letter, which delights me greatly!

This picture will not be the worse for a short reminiscence of years still earlier:—

As a child, indeed, I was always easily frightened; but this was rather in the day time, when I was left alone, and in the day-room, where everything looked so prosaic and hard;—but in night there was something familiar, which allured me—and even before I had heard anything of spirits, there was within me a sensation that around me hovered some invisible existence, in whose protection I trusted. I had this feeling when alone on that terrace, as a child of three or four years old; in those days, when, at sunset, all the bells used to toll for the death of the emperor. And then, as if every instant became darker and colder, and not a soul was near me, and it seemed as if the very air had become a mere knell, that thrilled around me—there would steal a sadness over my little heart, and instantly afterwards a reaction so instantaneous—I have the feeling still—as if the guardian angel at the moment took me in his arms!

Nevertheless, this speculative tendency by no means left her in a mere world of dreams. On the contrary, she appears to have been positively afflicted by a desire for action, and this is often exhibited in concert with a warmth of hearty unselfish feeling that is very delightful. It is enough for her to hear of the insanity and wreck of an author whose works she had barely known, and to feel at once the liveliest desire to set forth and comfort him—a purpose which we find her devising every stratagem to accomplish, and only renouncing it with a reluctant indignation, that, if bespeaking her ignorance of society, is at least very amiable.

St. Clair says, the visit would do him* (Hölderlin) good, and fain would I pay it, but may not. Franz said—"You are not half in your senses. What would you do in the company of a lunatic—become insane yourself too?" But if I knew how to set about it, I would go in spite of all; if you would come with me, Günderode, and we would let nobody know; but say we were going to Hanau. Yes, we might tell grandmamma—she would not object to it; to-day, indeed, I spoke to her of him, and told her how he lives there in a peasant's cabin, near a small river; sleeps with the doors open; and, for hours together, will recite, to the murmurs of the stream, Greek odes. The Princess of Homburg presented him with a pianoforte, the strings of which he has cut asunder, but not all of them, so that several of the keys still sound: and upon this instrument he extemporizes at will. How gentle and sublime this madness seems to me! I know not how the world is made, if it be such an unheard-of thing to go and attend upon him. . . . . I have lain awake for many nights with anxiety to go to Homburg. Why, if I resolved on taking the veil, no one could prevent it; and so would I take a vow to attend upon this lunatic, to guide him. This would be no sacrifice: I would converse with him, learning from thence many things that my soul is craving to know; and I am sure that the broken unstrung keys of his soul might then be made to vibrate again. But I know that this will not be allowed me. Thus it is—the natural feeling, which speaks from the soul of every one of us, would we but listen, (for in every heart, however hard, is a voice that cries, "Help thy brother!") is not only suppressed, but even chastised, as if it were the uttermost madness, in those who allow it to appear.

At the time of writing this, she was not quite fifteen.

Still less does the indulgence close her eyes to the scenes of daily life, which she enters into with a gleeful relish, and describes with great quickness of tact for character, and more sense of the humorous, than is common in her country. Few things can be merrier than her recital of the disasters of a diplomatic beau garçon, at a ball, the lion of which was the Elector of Hesse:—

There also was L. H. with his sisters; he grows every day bluer and blacker, by taking the chalybeate baths. His snow-white vest and neckcloth made this change all the more striking; he was altogether, indeed, dressed with the most fastidious elegance—for as he has a diplomatic ambition, he never neglects an opportunity of displaying himself in the appropriate costume. As long as we remained seated near the entrance, where the crowd was great, no one remarked anything peculiar about him; but when he stepped forward to pay his respects to somebody, Franz, who sat beside me, was the first to discover that, instead of a frock, he had put on a spencer without tails—a thing as round as a fisherman's jacket—which made a most absurd effect with his black satin breeches, white silk hose, and buckled shoes; in short, all the rest of a full court dress, even to the cocked-hat and feather held under the arm. It seems that, while the rest of the family were dressing for the ball, he had sat in his greatcoat; and when he ran up stairs to put on his frock, the wind had blown out the light in his dressing-room, and in the dark he seized in its stead this English demi-coat—a kind of thing which it has lately become fashionable to wear over all, when the weather is cold. Until now, he had not yet exhibited his rear to the assembled public; but as he stood with his back to our party, a hasty council was held, and it was resolved that two of our ladies, Lotte and B——, should, under cover of conversing, gently make him fall back without apprizing him of his woeful dilemma, until he was out of danger; while Antonie, Franz, and Voigt, were to form a small kind of rear-guard to cover his retreat. I was excluded from this body, because the droll remarks of Franz had made me laugh until I was unfit for service. The troop broke ground, and advanced steadily through a volley of astonished looks, which were cast on the tailless coat, marching with increased caution the nearer they drew, just as you creep gently behind a bird when you intend to catch him by sprinkling salt upon his tail; but before you come near enough, away he flies! So it happened in this case, too; for, just as they reached, and expected to have caught him, he suddenly wheeled round, and fully displayed his abbreviation. Oh! I ran behind the curtain, and hid myself in its folds, and absolutely bit it in a frenzy of laughter. When it subsided, I went away, for I was in a mood far too extravagantly mirthful for a ball-room. Voigt accompanied me, and related how the rear-guard had let him break through their columns, and had then closed upon him, and carried him fairly off, like a prisoner of state, as far as the door; where he was set down, and informed of his fatal sin against the sublime and beautiful; on learning which he fled, surrounded by his faithful allies. Not an eye will he close to-night; for as his ambition was to gain employment in the Hessian court, he is doubtless in horror at the idea that he has undermined this prospect by this public want of tails.

* The eminent lyrical poet. He died insane.

She is not less happy in describing the adventures of a life, in villegiatura; as in the following sketch of an expedition, that seems to have proved a notable failure. The trait of our dear countryman is to the life; the eccentric prophet, whom no one would believe, (Voigt,) was both an artist and a poet of no common powers, but whimsical and self-willed. To originals of this kind we find Bettine attaching herself at all times, in preference to the most specious professors of common-place; and truly we like her all the better for it.

I have not yet told you anything of our sun-rise, which we did (not) see after all; and how the sun got up behind our backs; while all the party were looking diligently over the mountains at a distance, in the belief that he was to appear on that side; and how, at the same moment, he rose quietly behind the rock in our rear; and how Mr. Haise, (the Englishman,) was armed with a telescope; and that, all the while, Voigt was whispering in my ear—"Now observe what is about to happen; they will all be greatly amazed presently." But no one paid the least attention to him. It grew brighter and brighter, and still no sun came; when all at once we turned round and saw him in full shine behind us, quite in a rational moderate way, and without having troubled any one; just as we might, had we chosen, have seen him as we sate at breakfast on the terrace. But then the mighty strife that arose! No one would allow himself to be one that had not thought so all along. Every one insisted that the other had misled him—it was, indeed, a strange contest; and that poor Mr. Haise, with his telescope, with which he meant to have discovered the sun the first of us all! Voigt was the worst scolded, and all agreed at last in laying the sole blame on him—saying, that he had intentionally turned us all round the wrong way, and had been the first to assert that the east lay in that direction. But this he denied; and said that he had not deceived them; but that he had been well aware they were going wrong, and given me a hint of it beforehand; but he knew that so little was thought of his assertions, that he did not choose to tell them, for, if he had, none would have thought he was right.

To which must be appended another little bit of gipseying, not less pleasantly set down, where the redoubtable Mr. Haise again appears, but in a new character:—

As for the ass-party yesterday to the Rauhenthal, it turned out to be a party by water, although this was at the close of the day only: a terrible deluge of rain overtook us when about half an hour's distance from home, on our return. The rivulets of water from the hill-sides, running together to the valley, made absolute lakes, which the wind crisped up into considerable waves. And as the asses that carried us were plashing through the midst of the flood, there came a tremendous thunder-clap: the most of us shrieked; the asses did no such thing, but, with common consent, threw us off, one and all, into the wash, and not one of them could be controlled: the Englishman, indeed, with his long legs, tried to master his, but the ass reared and threw itself down; whereupon they every one galloped off, so that in a glance they were out of sight, and, after them, the donkey-men, to whom we called out to send us lanterns from the town. The whole assemblage took counsel together in the slough, and having somewhat recovered our senses, we set ourselves in motion; silence soon succeeded to the confused gabble of tongues all talking at once; the road was too difficult to let any one think another thought but how to recover the foot, with the shoe belonging to it, from the swamp in which it was set down: this, however, was an impossibility, most of the shoes stuck fast. After a short time, we were met by the lanterns, the pacified donkeys were again brought up, and thus we arrived at home, riding, indeed, but in what a condition! All our straw-bonnets had been soaked in the puddle; shoes were mostly wanting; the ladies' clothes so wet, that they might have stood as models for statues; and the gentlemen were in the same plight. We all repaired to the baths, from whence we reappeared quite regenerated, and shining with new beams. A general tea-party, all the members of which were in slippers and dressing-gowns, closed the evening, every one crying out upon the wretched mischance, and laughing till they were half dead, at its disasters. Mr. Haise, the natural colour of whose hair now came to light, was not to be known again; but his beauty in this new condition was universally applauded: his reddish-brown hair became him so much better than the powder with which he had wished to hide it, that we all cried, that now for the first time he might be deemed interesting, which until now had been declared an impossibility. Nothing could exceed his contentment: he solemnly renounced powder from henceforward; and in a state of rapturous self-complacency, paraded himself amongst the ladies to receive their admiration. . . . . This morning came the ass-drivers, marching in procession, with the lost shoes elevated on the end of their sticks, in expectation of drink-money, which had to be paid, although it would have been better to leave them where they lay. We were vexed at having the disfigured shoes borne about as a kind of spectacle.

Her talents and volatile disposition, which started from all control, must have made her an object of anxiety to her brothers, by whom she was greatly beloved. Clement, especially, however romantic in his own ways and works, is perpetually attempting to coax her into something like sedateness, and looking askance at her friend, whom he suspected of fostering her impatience of study or constraint. The letters prove that Caroline was far from deserving this suspicion, but rather endeavoured to win her friend to self-discipline, in a manner that, but for the inconsistency of human nature, might surprise us in one who so sadly wanted it in her own hour of trial. She invariably appears as the kind and anxious adviser; more romantic, indeed, than Dr. Gregory or Mrs. Chapone might approve, but ever seeking to train her younger friend's mind towards the light, and to win her to studies which might calm the restless eagerness of her disposition. Amongst other sedatives, she at one time earnestly prescribed a course of history, and so far succeeded, that Bettine consented to begin a set of lessons on this subject with one Herr Arenswald; a most unfortunate choice, as it would appear, from the manner in which he addressed himself to the work of tuition. The man was a kind of Dominie Sampson; and if the account of his lectures afford a characteristic specimen of the intractable vivacity of his pupil, his last appearance will at once give us a comic description, and an evidence of her real goodness of feeling:—

The history-master comes thrice a-week, on Tuesdays, Wednesdays, and Thursdays, stuck in between two lazy terms, Friday and Saturday at the end, Sunday and Monday at the beginning. He teaches me in such sort that most probably I shall turn my back on the future for ever, and should be within an ace of losing my beloved present as well, if my thievish propensities were not stimulated by the unripe apricots in grandmamma's garden, which, for my poor capacity, I do think are a more tangible gain than "The history of Egypt, in early times, is dark and uncertain." That is fortunate, else we should have to afflict ourselves with this too. "Menes is the first king we know of." With all my heart, if we had but learned anything worth hearing of him. "He built Memphis, and led the Nile into a safe channel.

Moeris excavated Lake Moeris, to arrest the injurious inundations of the Nile. Then follows Sesostris the Conqueror, who terminated his life by his own hand." Why did he so?—was he handsome?—was he ever in love?—young—melancholy? To all this no answer vouchsafed by my teacher, who ventures, however, to remark, that we are rather led to imagine him old! I, on the other hand, delivered reasons in support of his youth, for the sole purpose of setting the wheels of antiquity a little in motion, as they seemed to stick fast in the slough of weariness. Then came tumbling out upon me Busiris, who built Thebes; Psammeticus, who gathered the separate states under his wings; then the wars with Babylonians; Nebuchadnezzar, whom Cambyses, Cyrus's son, dispossesses. The Egyptians are united with Lybia; again cast themselves free; war with the Persians, until Alexander makes an end of the contest, and, to my great delight, of this long story. This is the summary of my first lesson, to which you see I have listened well. But what if I had not had a spur to chase my ennui, and to show you how fruitless it is to attempt to rekindle the ashes, the very dead salts of which it is now past the power of nature to use again. As for heat, there is not a spark left. Had we not, once for all, better leave the old monarchs to moulder away in their pyramids? The earth is teeming with spring, on every hand it is forcing up its germs, and growing green with opening leaves.

The contrast was too glaring, indeed; and her impatience soon afterwards breaks out in a rather original way. The teacher must have been a mere drudge, that doled out his dry handsful of historical dust with the steadiest composure, without observing, until the latest moment, that his poor pupil was choking.

My head is like a field that lies fallow; I ramble amidst the hedge-rows, and every clod of earth I see is turned to some purpose; the salad bed here, there overhead the climbing bean-stalks; and I grieve to think that I have nothing as yet planted here; and the trouble you take with me, I fear, is to no good. At night I think, now when the sun rises I will learn something; and when the day comes, I long for the night to come, when I may at least be alone, and try to study myself, a poor little owl that I am! . . . . . —And founded the great Medo-Persian kingdom. That was where we left off; and there, in my history-book, I have drawn a great Medusa's head, with gaping jaws. O that they would swallow up all ancient history, and with it this Arenswald too! I was so happy in the Easter holidays, he stayed away an entire week, the habit of missing him came so kindly! [Here follows another series of extracts from the lecture.] . . . Two hundred and twenty-five years these princely shambles of the Persians lasted; in 3654, Alexander came and took possession of them. The teacher at this stage, seeing my disgust of this leathern story of his, takes an abrupt departure. God knows how it fell out, that the door caught hold of his breeches, a patch of which remained hanging thereon; and now I shall have to give him an extra fee for his catalogue of murders, to buy himself a new pair withal.

To which the Fraülein very sensibly replies:—

I sympathise with your lament for the history-affliction: it makes me sulky, too, to read it; in God's name, buy a pair of breeches as an expiatory offering, and let your Arenswald depart in peace.

Of the pedant thus seasonably provided with a new pair of dittos, we receive, some months later, an account which is strong evidence of a "decline and fall" in his history; but before proceeding to this, we cannot refrain from turning to the account of the apricot robbery, which was committed in the very midst of these studious hours, and seems to have relieved the fair pupil greatly. It could not have fallen in a fitter place for an observation of the various threads that made up this singular creature's being. She is writing to her friend, who was then an invalid:—

I hear the cock crow; it is already past midnight, and I mean to write on until daybreak, so that you may have plenty to read while you are lying sick, poor thing! . . . When the Jew (this was a letter-carrier between Offenbach and Frankfort) came with your letter about four, I was thinking what to get for you that should be very good; and then at once it struck me that the apricots in grandmamma's garden would be sure to agree with you; so I went round and round the tree, and spied out the best, and learned by heart the places where they hung, and kept walking and repeating this lesson till sunset; for I must not steal them by day, but wait till they were all seated fast at cards in the parlour. It was the most delightful thing in the world to steal these apricots for you; in the first place, the fright is such sport! my heart beat so fast, I could not help laughing aloud with delight, palpitation of the heart is such a delicious sensation! (poor girl, she may have learned to think otherwise when she grew older!) and then it seemed just as if they were pleased to be thus stolen, they fell so tenderly into my hand. I had tied a napkin about my neck, and caught them in this—twenty of them! I was delighted when I had them all safe in my room, where they are packed in young vine leaves, all second yearlings, with such a soft velvet on the left cheek. They lie in the basket, and peep at me as if they were longing for me to bite them just once; but they must not be humoured—they are all for you—and cannot have the happiness of being devoured by me.

This is, to our fancy, very engaging, and bespeaks the true spirit of enterprise all the more fully; as there can be little doubt that Frau de la Roche would have willingly given all the peaches on the tree to Bettine's sick friend, if asked. But this would have been tame; we like the reconnoissance and the midnight expedition far better, and so did our student of history. We will now return to the teacher, who discovers himself, as we return from a walk in the country near Offenbach, in rather motley company:—

By the time we got into the town, it was quite Sunday weather, everything streaming with sunshine, and in the Domstrasse, upon every door step, there lay a joli (lap-dog,) with a necklace of blue ribbon. All the joli's knew me, so they came barking to greet me. Next came the terriers and the spaniels; and lastly, Anton André's great English hound, with seventeen little ones, that are already able to bark with tolerable confidence. The milk-wife more than once came to a stand still, to see the dogs so riotous and gambolsome, and also in fear of having her tower of vegetable wares shaken off its balance. "Ay," she said; "the Turkish Emperor himself could not be better welcomed—they keep calling out long life to you, without ceasing!" Grandmamma was still asleep, so I stayed at the door amidst the dogs, when, lo! there came past my good Herr Arenswald. He took off his hat, and I did not beg him to put it on again, for I had observed that there was a hole in it, and was anxious to conceal from him my knowledge of the fact. He related how he had this summer made a tour into Switzerland, being unable to resist his longing to contemplate Nature there; nor did he repent it at all, costly as it had been to him. Indeed, he believed that he had not a doit left on his return. I was rather abashed, and, as he made this confidential communication, not liking to look him in the face, my eyes fell upon his boots—and there, sure enough, that mischievous personage, his great toe, presented itself uninvited: a rudeness which Arenswald would by no means permit during his audience, and so pushed it under the heel of the other boot, which, alas! flapped like an ill closed shutter in the wind. Which way was I to direct my looks? I turned to his body, there, all his buttons were gone, and his waistcoat was hooked together with hair pins. It is unknown whence he can have got these, as he wears only a Caligula, which is notoriously the uttermost originality of confusion in the system of locks, to establish which, neither pomade nor comb, nor hair-pins are necessary, but only dust and straws, so that the swallows and sparrows may always be able to find a supply of materials for their nests. In the meanwhile, he was telling me of a singular occurrence that happened to him in Switzerland. He was informed, namely, that in the wooded parts of the mountains, there abounded a species of snails of remarkable flavour; and that on his way from Lucerne, up some mountain or other, he had found a quantity of the said snails in the woods, and acquired so strong an appetite for them, that he ate of them till he was thoroughly sated—so much so, that on returning to the inn, he countermanded his dinner—saying, that he had found a quantity of these high-flavoured snails, and had eaten of them till he could not find room for anything else. "What!" said the host, "have you really been eating those snails?"—"Surely, why not? Did not you tell me yourself, of their remarkable flavour, and that people are mighty busy in hunting for them?" "Yes, a remarkable flavour, truly, but I did not say a good one. In this part of the world flavour means stench, and the people collect them only to make oil of them for the tanners who smear leather with it." So it seems that I had feasted on this tanners' stuff, "and very well was I contented with it," said Herr Arenswald; while I, blushing sadly, was fain to look up into the air, for in no other direction could I turn my eyes without falling upon some of the deadly sins of utter destitution. I imagine that this snail anecdote was meant to convey to me the extremity of hunger which had forced him to fall upon such food. My cousin now called to me from within, and Arenswald took leave, as it is usual to do with great personages, retiring backwards, from which I conjectured that the reverse of his apparel was in no better condition than his front. . . . . a most submissive exhibition of human misery!

It is almost needless to mention that this calamitous lover of history and nature, was promptly relieved by his former pupil. From the picture, ludicrous as it is, any observant eye will discover that a heartfelt pity lurked beneath the seeming ridicule of the caricatura.

We will now turn to a sketch of a soberer interest, the picture of a Jew, with whom Bettine studied mathematics when at Marburg, for the sake of his aspect and conversation; a perfect antithesis to such a figure as Arenswald, and no bad study for a Lessing's Nathan. This may be a fit place to observe, that in her girlish years, Bettine always appears to have preferred the society of grown up and even old people, to that of her own contemporaries: the young Fraülein seems to have been her only intimate of this class; and when she died, the place was filled by an old lady of nearly eighty!—nor can we find any trace of another close intimacy with girls, still less with youths of her own age. This is a trait of no commonplace nature, and one of the rarest in female character.

Can you guess who is the first acquaintance I have made here?—A Jew! but what a rare one! The handsomest man, with a white beard half a yard long, large brown eyes, features so noble and simple, a calm brow, a splendid majestic nose, the lips of an orator, but fit to give sweet utterance to wisdom. Our host, Professor Weiss, called me, saying: "If you would like to see a handsome Jew, come into my wife's room, where she is selling him an old wed ling gown." It was a subject for a painter; he sate at the table in the dress of a rabbi or sage, his hand peeped out from the wide black sleeve, and the red light of the sunset was streaming through the window. The Professor's wife stood before him, holding the old dress,—it might have been her mother's, so antique the material seemed to be—spread out at full. On each side of her stood the children displaying the train. It was an orange-coloured stuff, embroidered with silver sprigs and crimson flowers, and made a delightful contrast with the glow of the evening. It was a beautiful picture, and I would fain have called Meliné to enjoy it with me, had not a certain timidity, I will not say veneration, kept me fixed to the spot. I could not bring myself to treat such a man as a mere object of curiosity. It was quite singular to see the rest standing before him with so much respect, quietly waiting for his decision in the bargain.

It appears, that although thus humbly employed, he is an object of general notice and respect. Bettine stays conversing with him, until she is quite enamoured of his venerable looks and grave pathetic sayings, and is determined to see him again, which chance soon afterwards brought about.

I was in the garden which lies on the hill-side, and looking over the wall, saw Ephraim coming along the road. I leaned over it, and waved my handkerchief; and when he came up, we conversed for a long while. I told him that I was glad to see him again; that he reminded me of a season with which my nature seems more nearly to sympathize than any other—the twilight of evening. That his looks and whole manner seemed to me like a twilight drawn over a noble nature, and that at such an hour I felt my sight keener, and my heart more disposed to confidence in others. You may imagine that he is one worth speaking to, or I should never have talked to him in this manner. He replied, "The visible world is obscure, but with a clear eye, one need not long look at it in vain. A few glances discover to us the objects with which we may claim kindred." "But how to gain this clearness of vision?" I asked. "Look steadily at nature only, and admit no prejudice—this gives clearness to the sight."—"And do you believe of me," said I, "that I behold nature with this clear and unprejudiced eye?"—"Yes," he answered; "and I know that I am not mistaken, and that you are keen-sighted."—"Then I am not mistaken when I discover in you a man of warm enthusiasm."—"At least in this—you are nearer to the truth than others who hold the Jew for a broken-spirited being,—a source of freedom springs within us, and a drop of this suffices to raise us above all contempt." . . . . . I said, "Farewell! and when you return from your journey, come again to me."

We next learn his real profession, of which Bettine avails herself, for the double purpose of improving his means, and having frequent opportunities for conversing with him:—

He was formerly solely a teacher of mathematics, in Giessen and Marburg, to the university students; and, during the vacations, went home to his family. His daughter died, leaving five children; and old Ephraim could not fall upon any other means of supporting them, than by pursuing as a profession the mathematics, which, from his youth upwards, he says, were his delight; but on his way homewards in the holidays, he began to purchase old garments for his children at home, as he could not afford to buy them new; and thence he fell into a trade with such as had valuable old finery to dispose of, like the lady of Professor Weiss.

This is prosaic enough; but it is otherwise when we listen to his discourse. With every deduction made for Bettine's colouring, we are aware of something in this old Hebrew that is very original and impressive; and in his answers to her eager inquiries, we find a tone of thought and feeling above the vulgar standard, displayed with a certain oriental dignity of language.

I told him how unprosperous my study of thorough-bass had been. He said, "That was because you did not obtain a sufficiently extended view of the subject as a whole—this made your ideas halt"; and that many things at which some men are gnawing all their days, must by others be apprehended at one glance, or their time and pains are thrown away. I said, I feared that so it would be in my case. "And yet," he replied, "in all my life I never yet saw a young acorn that was afraid it would never grow to be an oak tree." And saying this, he laid his hand upon my head, and continued in so kind a manner:—"We have now laid the acorn in the ground, and covered it carefully over, and now we will let it rest there for a time quietly, and see what suns and rains will do for it."

Here is something which makes our young friend's enthusiasm seem not altogether unaccountable. This intercourse was only interrupted by the failing health of the old man, then seventy-one years of age, and Bettine's departure soon afterwards from Marburg. The last interview is not only touching, but thoroughly picturesque in its details:—

Do you know what I have done?—I sent word to Ephraim that I would come to him yesterday, and was driven thither at the hour in which he used to attend me. I entered, and found him sitting handsomely dressed by a table, on which was a lamp and four candles. He tried to rise, but he is grown very feeble. And what does this mean?—is he about to be called to his fathers? I brought him two gold pieces in payment for my lessons. He opened a small casket, in which there were a pair of wedding-rings, and various ornaments, which, he said, once belonged to his deceased wife and daughters. He deposited the gold with these:—all this is so refined and gentlemanly! I had brought him back his rose-tree, (a gift he had sent her not long before,) which he must keep—the roses are now in fuller bloom, and how beautifully they looked by the lamp-light beside his snow-white beard! I said, "the roses and your beard should not be separated: and I was glad that I did not pluck any of them—for the tree is your betrothed one. Once or twice I was tempted to break off a rose to fling to the students when they looked so wistfully up to them." He said—"Oh! if you will allow me, I will distribute them amongst the students yet: there are some of them call upon me now and then, and more will come when they know that I have roses to give." This I consented to; and I am heartily glad that my students will get my roses after all.

When I was about to go, he gave me his blessing, and I kissed his hand:—how beautiful a thing the spirit of man is, when it grows to maturity unstained by evil! His grandson was ordered to wait on me as far as home: for I had only a maid with me. But I soon sent him back, and told him to say to his grandfather that he must think of me daily until I come back. When I left Ephraim, he laid his hand on my head, and said, "all Being lives for a future!" As soon as I arrived at home, I retired at once to my tower in the garden, for I wished to recall once more, undisturbedly, that imposing and yet so friendly and unaffected face of intellect, as I saw it on leaving him in the shine of the glittering lamps, with the roses bending towards his white beard. I feel that I have seen him thus for the last time."

But, before leaving Marburg, where Savigny was then a professor, we must let Bettine give us a glimpse of "my students," which is much more to our liking than the survey to which Dr. Cornelius and his usher have lately invited the public. It is in the depth of winter:—and Every morning Meliné and I find excellent sport in watching them as they march up to Professor Weiss's lecture. . . . They cannot see us, indeed, because the blinds are down, and the windows frozen over, as well: but we make a small hole—enough for one eye. It amuses us in a thousand ways: the amour with the whole university is in the most flourishing state. We have divided it between us. Meliné says, that is mine, and I, this is mine,—thus we have two regiments: and their romping we laugh at with the utmost mirth and triumph. Each party has a captain: the one with a red cap, which he carries not on his head, but always swinging on the end of a thick cudgel, (the student calls it a Ziegenhainer,) is mine: he is always the first on the spot, the others gather round him, and listen to what he says; I fancy he must be the head of some Bürschenschaft; a handsome young fellow, and the tallest amongst them all: every time he opens his mouth, a great cloud of vapour comes out of it, and settles in the shape of hoar-frost on his little beard, of which he is very proud, drawing it every moment through his fingers. We call him the blonde—because, although he has brown hair, his face is so fair and sunny, as it laughs with its cheerful red cheeks in the misty morning: and then, his dress too, is light-coloured. Meliné's, we call the brown—he is quite fair, but has a brown coat: this one wears a blue cap with a tassel, that plays around his nose. He sits tranquilly on the wall, while the others are pelting with snow-balls, wrestling, leaping, one over the other; and amuses himself with curling on his fingers his glittering blond Phœbus locks: I envy Meliné him, and offered to give in exchange for him one of the most considerable in my troop; but she will not part with him for any other but my general, and him I cannot give up. . . Had I but a regiment of such as these, I would soon give you an answer to the unreasonable charge respecting Napoleon.

—— whom Bettine had been accused by her friend of admiring enthusiastically.

A few days later, we find these heroes in a state of most characteristic elevation and glory:—

To-day, I have an amusing occurrence to tell you. There was a comedy by the students, and we were there, under the protection of a numerous escort. The piece was some invention of the students themselves, and contained three duels, with shot, stab, and cut, (schuss, stich, und hieb;) when the firing came, Meliné already began to feel uncomfortable: at the stab, everything turned green and blue before our eyes; but as soon as it came to the cut, there arose an uproar and a riot; and they leaped across the orchestra, over the lamps, right upon the stage: the oil-lamps, for the most part, were thus extinguished, and what before was twilight became darkness: our company posted itself around us on the benches, guarding us in the midst of them from any mischance that might happen, until we could venture to escape from this confusion and the stench of the oil, and draw breath again freely in the open street. The turmoil was caused by the beadle having hinted to the rector, who sate in a chair of state in the centre of the house, that the broadsword duel was to be an actual one: this, he declared, he had just hearkened out: the thing indeed, looked dangerous enough, with all the apparatus the students use. The rector conceived it to be his duty to step forth against this piece of hardihood without turning to right or left, and accordingly forced his way through the midst of the orchestra, at the spot where the double-base stood leaning against the partition; was overturned by the rector, and emitted a dismal sound, that terrified all the company. The dean, and the other College dignitaries, despising all obstacles, pressed forwards in support of their rector, in which process many involuntary tones were extorted from the bases and kettle-drums. Much loud gabbling to and fro amongst the ladies, who were now for preventing the mischief,—now for refusing to stay and witness it: much laughter amidst the students, who were enraptured with the confusion; but the scene on the stage was the most interesting: the rector, with his auxiliaries, just opposite to us, looking quite awful. A student, who had been playing a lady, with a long train, one half of which he had already lost during the rapier-duel, now (most probably from impertinence) displayed his back to the public, which discovered a pair of enormous top-boots, a sabre at his side, on which half the train was caught up, and an immense gauze veil which, floating down his back, alternately threatened to extinguish the remaining lamp or two, or to set itself on fire; so that many voices cried out, "The veil's burning!" Before long, it was decided that it all had been a false alarm; however, the piece could not go on, the lamps were out, the quality gone: and a crowd of the street-mob had invaded the benches, to see what was the matter. The next day we heard from our professor, Weiss, the catastrophe of this tragi-comedy: he was still in doubt if the duel was meant to have been a real one or not; the students denied it: the beadle vowed that he had overheard their agreement on the way thither, and that he who played the lady was to have been one of the seconds, and my trusty captain the other; that they had measured swords at the door, and that he had heard the number of passes arranged, and all the preliminaries settled, as to their gorgets, plastrons, and hand-guards (Hals-binden, Stürmer, Faustbinden.) The students maintained that they had only been rehearsing their parts, and that all this was to have been represented on the stage. Nothing more could be made of it, and they had to be let go: whereupon they gave the rector their word of honour to make no breach of the peace, and held a solemn drinking-bout (einen Commers,) the revelling and singing of which lasted till far into the night. The progress of the piece had hitherto thrown no light on its contents, and the main point of the incident was, that the catastrophe was to be supplied by foreign intervention: for which reason, pretending not to see the beadle, (whose suspicion had previously been aroused by hints,) and who now had concealed himself behind a closet, they made him swallow the whole story, and, by this means, got all the audience to play their parts in the piece, to their great amusement: and, indeed, both old and young will have for some time to tell of the many droll things that happened on the occasion. Professor Weiss was in raptures with his beloved students, and said, "one must have been a student oneself, to imagine their delight when a scheme like this succeeds."

At other times we find her waiting on the feeble steps of Frau de la Roche, and delighting to draw from her anecdotes of the persons and events of an older era. Amongst these is the following account of Laroche, Bettine's grandfather, and Count Stadion, which is worth extracting. Hitherto we have been accustomed to regard Wieland's successful rival as a mere dry man of the world; but the last of these anecdotes places him in a position which even the poetical fame of Wieland does not enable him to overlook. We are quite reconciled to Sophie's proceeding, and thank Bettine for having explained what, until now, always appeared to be very unaccountable. But first, of the youth's education:—

This evening I had to accompany grandmamma in a walk along the canal by moon-light. She talked of the days of her youth, when she was still living with grandpapa, in Warthausen, at the house of the old Count Stadion, and how he loved my grandfather far better than his other sons, and how he bred him up in such a strange way, with exceeding diligence. When a mere boy of eighteen, he made him conduct an important and extensive political correspondence: gave him letters from emperor and king,—from all kinds of viceroys and prime ministers, to answer: there came into play negotiations on all possible matters of state,—commerce,—navigation,—old claims,—new demands,—divisions of territory,—treasons,—stratagems,—imprisonments of eminent persons,—affairs of the clergy,—monastic foundations,—finance matters, in short, everything the examination and ordering of which belongs to a great minister of state; and all this Stadion discussed with him,—made him give his opinion on each subject, and write papers thereupon, which, after adding his own observations, he caused to be fairly copied: made him write letters to various potentates; as, for instance, he conducted the correspondence with Maria Theresa, first respecting the elevation to the throne, and the co-regency of her consort,—then as to the empty treasury,—afterwards on the military forces of the country,—the discontents of the people,—the claims of Bavaria to the hereditary domain of Austria, and the reasons why the electors refused to acknowledge Maria Theresa's succession;—then on the wars with Frederick,—with England,—applications for subsidies,—letters to the French General, Belleisle,—then a correspondence with Charles of Lorrain,—with Cardinal Fleury,—Lobkowitz, the Austrian commander, and, lastly, with the Marquise de Pompadour, always with an eye to the Empress's interest. This last correspondence took first a gallant, and afterwards quite a tender tone; then came answers contained in madrigals, to which my grandfather, in Stadion's name, had to reply in French verse. This cost him the gnawing in pieces of many a pen: while Stadion taught him to infuse his politics into the strain, he had to make allusions to charms, and tresses, brown and fair, and often could not succeed in being tender enough to please Stadion. The replies to all these were then imparted to him by the Count with much satisfaction: especially, whenever she gave any sign of sensibility to my grandpapa's gallantries, Stadion would laugh heartily, and point out how the most fastidious refinement was to be observed. And last of all, when, on the elevation of Maria Theresa to the throne, and her coronation as Empress, the congratulatory addresses were despatched, on his twenty-first birth day, Stadion presented Laroche with a writing-table, in which he found, with the seals yet unbroken, all the letters he had been three years writing, which he fancied had been sent over land and sea, with the answers, which had been invented by Stadion himself, and copied by different secretaries. In this manner, he said, he designed to form him into a statesman. At first, it mortified my grandfather severely, but to this succeeded an emotion of deep gratitude; and he preserved the letters as a memorial of Stadion's noble and affectionate spirit. My grandmamma has all the letters still, and promises to bestow them on me.

It is pleasing to find that in after life the pupil showed himself worthy of such care. The occasion of the next anecdote is in itself a touching one. His aged widow, now on the verge of death, had been wounded by an act of unfeeling rudeness; and, as it would seem, consoled herself with recurring to a time when she had a protector who was deservedly honoured by his countrymen. Bettine found her gazing upon

An armorial bearing, painted on glass, in a splendid frame of silver, with a wreath of golden acorns, on which there is written in Greek, "All by love; the world would perish else." This was given to my grandfather by the city of Triers; because, while he was chancellor in the service of the Elector of Triers, he resisted the imposition by him of an impost, which he deemed oppressive, on the peasants; and finding he was not listened to, preferred resigning the office to subscribing his name to an unjust requisition. The peasants came out to meet him with civic garlands in every place he passed through; and in Spire they had lit up his house to receive him, both inside and out. . . . . The motto on this coat of arms, my grandmamma said, was a real compensation to her husband, who would often, in the narrow circumstances he thenceforth lived in, exclaim, "I could not have wished for a better fortune." The shield used to hang over his writing-table; and as he stood in high regard, both with peasants and burghers, they often came to him in difficult cases, in which, in the spirit of the motto on the shield, he persuaded many to justice or indulgence, and hereby grew to be so much respected, that his decision was more effectual than that of the oldest lawyers. . . . . The Elector afterwards became reconciled to him, and confessed that he had been in the wrong; but my grandpapa rejected the appointment to which he offered to restore him.

Although we have for the most part confined ourselves to Bettine's letters, it would be unjust to her friend to infer that hers are destitute of many engaging features. But our present limits impose the necessity of a selection, and this was guided by a reference to what seemed to have the most of character and originality. We cannot, however, conclude without taking leave of the sweet recluse, and will therefore follow her into the garden for a moment, and hear her relate her discoveries there in a manner that we find very delightful :—

I have yet to mention something notable belonging to your terrace in the garden. The spiders have woven a great veil of Brussels lace over it from one end to the other, from the little pine-royal over the orange tree, across the arbour of scarlet-climbers, which now you cannot enter without destroying their handiwork, then above the pomegranate to the fig-tree. I was very careful not to break a thread of it when I gathered its fruits. Your brother Dominick came down to water them, and sprinkled the net all over,—it was just noon, and the sun was shining brightly. All the crystal drops glittered in the net, like so many mirrors, most beautifully. Your brother then suggested, that if the net-work were but carried a little farther, he could make it into an aviary for butterflies, which he has hitherto tried in vain to render tame by tending in their caterpillar state, for when they fly out of the chrysalis, he complains that they seem to have forgotten all the care and delicate attention which he showed to them while they were mere grubs. I was greatly amused at the seriousness with which he described his attempts to influence the mind of the butterfly by educating the caterpillar and the chrysalis, and told him I thought the great spiders that wove the net would soon devour all, whether grateful or thankless, that he might enclose in such an aviary. I know you like to hear of your little Eden, in which everything is so beautiful, and not a tree is there which bears a forbidden fruit.

Another and closing extract brings us into the company of Goëthe's mother, who, as we have already remarked, never appears but in a manner that attracts attention. A finer specimen of the old German character, as it existed in the highest burgher class of the free cities, could hardly have been found; and the strength, liveliness, and genial hearty warmth of character which she displayed, even in her extreme age, with a mixture of stateliness and homely favour that clothed her like a brocade of ancient fashion, must have made her a delightful companion to many beside Bettine. She appears to have fully justified the remark, that it is to the mother that distinguished men are usually found to owe whatever in their talents or character may be inherited. The letters and anecdotes of this fine old lady, in the first series of Bettine's correspondence, are to us almost the most delightful feature of the collection. Here it is singular to find the Fraülein describing to Bettine, who then knew little of Madame Goëthe, the proceedings of one who was shortly afterwards to occupy her place in the girl's affections.

George (she writes to Bettine) escorted me to your box at the theatre. The play was (Goëthe's) "Brother and Sister." The attendance, owing to the heat, was very scanty. The Frau Rath (Madame Goëthe) sate quite alone, beside me, and called out towards the stage, "Herr Verdy, act your best, now,—I am here!" I was sadly confused. Had he answered, it must have become a conversation, in which I could hardly have escaped playing a part. In the pit there were scarcely fifty people; but Verdy played extremely well, and at every scene Madame clapped so loudly that it echoed through the house. Altogether it was a strange scene, the empty theatre, with all the box doors thrown open on account of the heat, through which the daylight came freely in, as well as a strong draught, which tossed and played with the tattered decorations; while Madame Goëthe, fanning herself, cried out to Verdy, "Ah! this breath of air is delightful." It was just as if she belonged to the piece, and was playing from the boxes in concert with the other two on the stage, as a confidential party to their private domestic conversation.* I could not but think of the great poet, who has not disdained to give utterance to his own deep nature in a thing so unpretending. I believe you are right; there is even a certain kind of grandeur in it: on this occasion it became strangely impressive, almost like a tragedy:—there was the vacant theatre, the silence, the open doors, and the mother sitting almost alone, full of triumph, as if her son had built expressly for her a throne, on which she sate, raised above the common dust of life, to receive the homage of Art. They played admirably, even with a kind of enthusiasm, all on Madame Goëthe's account. She has the gift of commanding respect. At the end, she called out quite audibly, that "she was much obliged to them, and would not fail to mention it to her son." Thereupon ensued a conversation, to which the audience listened quite as eagerly as to the play; but I did not hear the whole, being then fetched away,—to-morrow it will be all over the town.

It only remains to add, that the foregoing extracts give but a partial idea of the variety of matter which these letters contain. To those who love this engaging kind of reading, we would venture to recommend a nearer inspection of their contents, provided that they are willing to look with indulgence on the enthusiasm of a young mind, eagerly seeking on all sides for some relief to those dim aspirations and new desires that attend the first awakening of a nature singularly and early gifted with thought and feeling. V.

* Die Geschwister is a piece of the simplest possible structure, turning upon a point of domestic interest; and for its unaffected elegance and touching effect, may be said to stand alone on the German stage.

THE POOR.

Winter was gathering gloomily around
The thousand naked hovels, where the poor
Are doomed to live and die. There was no sound
Of mirth domestic—speaking, as of yore,
Of industry at home—its long day o'er—
By health, and hope, and joy conjugal crown'd;
But voices, croaking in the raven's key,
And sobbing sounds, that set aside the tongue,
By the strange fear of famine, seem'd to be
From parents, o'er their sleeping infants, wrung.
When, in the Senate House, the hoary chief
Arose and said—"They shall have no relief:"
And o'er their foodless homes that sentence past,
Like an infernal curse, borne on the wintry blast.

LAYS OF SCOTTISH HISTORY.—No. II.

THE LEGEND OF SAINT MARGARET, QUEEN OF MALCOLM CANMORE.—ANNO 1067.

Long, long ago—'tis dreamlike now,
And legends dim and old
Are newer than the tale, I trow,
My simple rhymes unfold;
What time the Norman William came
To win the Saxon's land,
And got him there a Conqueror's name,
And crown, by bow and brand,—
The hope of Edward's royal race,
And Saxon hearts, was she—
The maid that from the Norman's face
Fled to the North countrie.
For shelter to the bold Canmore
The Princess went in sorrow,
For warfare, from the Southern shore,
Had filled fair England thorow.
A guest she came to Malcolm's court,
No suppliant for relief,
And, journeying though in lowly sort,
Was queenly in her grief—
The King sat in Dunfermline tower
And drank the blood-red wine,
While Saxon nobles owned his power,
Who wonned by Tweed and Tyne.
But quickly from the feast he strode,
From dais where high he sate,
When it was told him that there stood
A Princess at the gate.
With kingly step the maid he met,
And words that kindly were—
"Thou 'rt welcome, high-born Margaret,
"Right welcome, lady fair!"
His guest in hall, with gallant grace,
King Malcolm softly led,
Where worthiest lords and dames had place,
And daintiest cheer was spread;
And welcome through the palace hall
In shouts 'gan loudly ring,
And Saxon warriors, one and all,
Arose and blest the king.
For Margaret was their pride and praise,
Nor Scottish lady there
Could chide, because her lord would gaze,
On one so meekly fair.

Her angel beauty witched them so,
For her they wished alone
A queenly crown upon her brow,
Beside King Malcolm's throne.
And wed were they; nor long the while
Till high enthroned was seen
The lady of the angel smile,
Their meek and saintly queen.
O! she was learned in heavenly lore,
In all the good revere!
And better loved the bold Canmore
The right from her to hear,
Than monks or mitred priests to list
Their awful truths declare;
And oft in love, unlearned, he kissed
His lady's Book of Prayer.
Whate'er she loved, the king adored;
And decked with rare device,
Her wondrous volume richly stored
With words of nameless price.
The Scottish men were rough and rude,
But ne'er their bosoms stern
Were moved the less from her of good,
And gentleness to learn.
And proudest lords bowed down in heart
Before their gentle Queen,
For none might from her presence part
With vengeful soul I ween.
Sweet mercy from her lips went forth
And honour's courteous speech,
With honour's deed, unto the North
Her words had power to teach.
And though her time be old and faint,
Our land may laud her yet,
The lovely lady, queen and saint,
The Good Saint Margaret!* N. C.

* The true legend, (I need not alter the ambiguous adjective,) declares, that when Margaret, whose death was actually occasioned or hastened by the intelligence of her husband having fallen in battle, was canonized, and an attempt made to remove her corpse to a tomb more worthy of a saint, it was found impossible to raise her from the side of the buried king, and both bodies were therefore removed together. Her character, as it is described in our National Histories, relieves many a gloomy page.

MORE SWEET THAN FLATTERY IS TRUTH.

BY MAJOR CALDER CAMPBELL.

I do not flatter, when I say
I love thee better day by day;
For like that dainty Summer flower,
That opes a bud for every hour,
Thou dost each day to me impart
Some fairer feature of the heart.
Then fear not falsehood; for, in sooth,
More sweet than Flattery is Truth!

I do not flatter thee, mine own!
When I compare the blushes thrown Across thy cheeks, as thus I tell
Thy charms, to tints within the cell
Of some fresh rosebud, ere its breath
Inhales from life the taint of death.
Oh, no! I feign not, for, in sooth,
More sweet than Flattery is Truth!

I do not flatter, when I swear
I live but in thy presence fair;
For absent from thee, still I have
A shroud around me, and a grave
Beside me—dug by cruel fear,
Lest thou shouldst never more appear
In all the fondness of thy youth:—
More sweet such flattery than Truth!

Nor do I flatter thee, dear heart!
When I aver (as now) thou art
The one thing needful to my bliss—
The all I want in scenes like this—
Where, but for thee, 'twere labour vain
To breathe life's heavy breath of pain.
Oh, no! I flatter not!—in sooth,
More sweet than Flattery is Truth!

LAING'S NOTES OF A TRAVELLER.*

No modern traveller has left a more pleasing impression upon the minds of his readers, than Mr. Laing. A lively style, a happy selection of topics, the power of acute, and also of profound observation, a high and uncompromising moral tone, great liberality of sentiment, and entire superiority to national prejudices and conventionalities combined to render his former works as entertaining to the ordinary reader, as they are agreeable and instructive to the philosopher and the philanthropist. Another charm lay in the happy aspects of society, which they represent; in the engaging pictures of the comfort or wellbeing of the great mass of the inhabitants of the northern regions, possessing free political institutions, and having numerous small land estates.

The present work, if written with the same fulness of detail as the travels in Norway and Sweden, would have filled ten volumes, instead of one. It is not therefore, in any sense, a book of travels; but one containing the pith and marrow, the highly concentrated essence of the author's observations and reflections upon almost every great point in government, legislation, education, religion, and social morals. His range is even wider than this,—and he diverges into the most minute of those particulars which hold unseen control or influence over society in its complicated interests. In avoiding the trite and commonplace, our author may be sometimes chargeable with pronouncing opinions on some subjects, more remarkable for novelty than considerateness. But Mr. Laing is no every-day traveller; and even his heresies on secondary questions are entitled to respectful examination. If there is not truth at the bottom of them, there is the love of truth, and a courage and frankness in avowing that love, which may plead against a few vagaries, in mere matters of taste. It is of far more importance that, on all great questions of morals and government, he is fully up to, or in advance of, the best thinkers of the age who have the courage to tell their thoughts; and that the opinions which he does not mince, he supports with great force, and in a style which, without being either flippant, affected, or hazy, is sufficiently piquant to awaken and arrest the attention of the reader. As the work is more one of reasoning, and of the illustration of facts, than of their narration, the same general topics and ideas are apt to recur; but if the same thought is repeated, without much novelty of statement, it is always one well worth being enforced. Such, for example, is his elaborate exposure of the effects of the military organization, and the lauded educational system of Prussia. But to come to the point:—

Mr. Laing starts by saying, that, in these locomotive days, the old plan of travel-writing will no longer answer; and he therefore at once plunges into the heart of Holland, "the land of cheese and butter," and shows no mean skill as a landscape painter:—

Holland, the land of cheese and butter, is to my eye no unpicturesque, uninteresting country. Flat it is; but it is so geometrically only, and in no other sense. Spires, church towers, bright farm houses—their windows glancing in the sun; long rows of willow trees—their blueish foliage ruffling up white in the breeze; grassy embankments of a tender vivid green, partly hiding the meadows behind, and crowded with glittering gaudily painted gigs, and stool wagons, loaded with rosy-cheeked laughing country girls, decked out in ribbons of many more colours than the rainbow, all a-streaming in the wind;—these are the objects which strike the eye of the traveller from seaward, and form a gay front view of Holland, as he sails or steams along its coasts and up its rivers. On shore, the long continuity of horizontal lines of country in the back ground, each line rising behind the other to a distant, level, unbroken horizon, gives the impressions of vastness and of novelty. It is curious how differently we are impressed by expansion in the horizontal and expansion in the perpendicular plane. Take a section of this country spread out horizontally before the eye, four miles or five in length, and one or two in breadth, and it is but a flat, unimpressive plain. But elevate this small unimpressive parallelogram of land to an angle of sixty degrees with the horizon, and it becomes the most sublime of natural objects; it surpasses Mont Blanc,—it is the side of Chimborazo. Set it on edge, and it would overwhelm the beholder with its sublimity. . . .

Holland is a cabinet picture, in which nature and art join to produce one impression, one homogeneous effect. The Dutch cottage, with its glistening brick walls, white-painted wood work and rails, and its massive roof of thatch, with the stork clappering to her young on her old-established nest on the top of the gable, is admirably in place and keeping, just where it is—at the turn of the canal, shut in by a screen of willow trees, or tall reeds, from seeing, or being seen, beyond the sunny bight of the still calm water, in which its every tint and part is brightly repeated. Then the peculiar character of every article of the household furniture which the Dutch-built house-mother is scouring on the green before the door so industriously; the Dutch character impressed on everything Dutch, and intuitively recognised, like the Jewish or Gipsy countenance, wherever it is met with; the people, their dwellings, and all in or about them,—their very movements in accordance with this style or character, and all bearing its impress strongly,—make this Holland, to my eye, no dull unimpressive land. There is soul in all you see.

He goes on to describe the Dutch taste for the Dutch romantic; and reasons upon the Dutchman's garden-house and flower-beds, as on all things else, like a philosopher. This leads to one of the most important speculations of the work; and one which is often recurred to—the true cause of the stability or decay of nations that have once been great and prosperous. The inquiry, why the Holland of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries is no longer in existence—why her streets are silent, and her canals green with slime, which commerce, no longer busy in her marts, permits to gather there?—is thus answered:—

The greatness of Holland was founded upon commercial prosperity and capital, not upon productive industry. Her capital and industry were not employed in producing what ministers to human wants and gratifications; but in transmitting what other countries produced, or manufactured, from one country to another. She was their broker. When their capitals, applied at first more beneficially to productive industry, had grown large enough to enter also into the business of circulation, as well as into that of production,—into commerce properly so called,—the prosperity of Holland, founded upon commerce alone, unsupported by a basis of productive industry within herself, and among the mass of her own population, fell to the ground. This is the history of Holland. It speaks an important lesson to nations.

* Notes of a Traveller, on the Social and Political State of France, Prussia, Switzerland, Italy, and other parts of Europe. By Samuel Laing, Esq., author of a Journal of a Residence in Norway, and a Tour in Sweden. Longman and Co. Octavo, cloth, pp. 496.

The world has witnessed the decline of commercial greatness in Venice, in Genoa, in Florence, in the Hans Towns, in Holland,—of military greatness in Rome, France, Sweden, Prussia; but has yet to learn whether productive greatness, that which is founded upon the manufacturing industry of a people in all the useful arts, be equally fleeting. It seems to rest upon principles in political philosophy of a more stable nature. It is more bound to soil and locality by natural circumstances. The useful metals, coals, fire-power, water-power, harbours, easy transport by sea and land, a climate favourable to outdoor labour in winter and summer, are advantages peculiar to certain districts of the earth, and are not to be forced by the power of capital into new localities. Markets may be established anywhere, but not manufactures. Human character also in the large, is formed by human employment, and is only removable with it. The busy, active, industrious spirit of a population trained to quick work, and energetic exertion of every power, in the competition of a manufacturing country, is an unchangeable moral element in its national prosperity, founded upon productive industry. Look at an Englishman at his work, and at one of these Dutchmen, or at any other European man. It is no exaggeration to say, that one million of our working men do more work in a twelvemonth, act more, think more, get through more, produce more, live more as active beings in this world, than any three millions in Europe, in the same space of time; and in this sense I hold it to be no vulgar exaggeration that the Englishman is equal to three or to four of the men of any other country. Transplant these men to England; and under the same impulse to exertion, and expeditious working habits, which quickens the English working class, they also would exceed their countrymen at home in productiveness.

This passage is the key to much of Mr. Laing's subsequent reasoning, in his survey of commercial Europe. He is a thorough believer in the influences of climate, and in the moral effects of other external causes; and also in the direct influence of government, and of social usages, upon every people; and he has, we are glad to find, great faith in the renovating inherent power, and in the ultimate destinies of England, notwithstanding his hatred of the root, as he thinks, of all her evils, namely feudalism, the law of primogeniture, and the consequent system of an unfair distribution of property, and unequal representation of interests. But the element of industry, the productive principle, the internal, self-generated, impelling power diffused among her population, he seems to consider a full counterpoise for every evil under which England suffers, and the guarantee for her renewed and continued prosperity. To his more specific remedies, we shall afterwards advert; but must first look farther into the causes of her preëminence.

In Italy, and in Holland, the social condition of great commercial wealth, with comparatively little employment given by it to the mass of the people, called into existence painters, sculptors, architects; furnished artists, and encouragement for them,—that is, demand and taste for their works. It was the main outlet for the activity of the public mind, and for the excess of capital beyond what could be profitably engaged in commerce. But a national mind, formed, like that of the English people, in the school of productive industry, seeks the shadow at least of utility, even in its most extravagant gratifications. Horses, hounds, carriages, a seat in parliament, yachts, gardens, pet-farms, are the objects in which great wealth in England indulges, much more frequently than in grand palaces, fine jewels, valuable paintings, delightful music, or other tastes connected with the fine arts. The turn of the public mind is decidedly towards the useful arts; for which all, high and low, have a taste differing not so much in kind as in the means and scale of its gratification. Capital can be so much more extensively employed in reproduction in the useful arts, where a whole population has a taste for and consumes their objects, that the excess to be invested in objects of the fine arts is surprisingly small in England, considering the vast amount and diffusion of her wealth. What is not useful, at least in appearance, is but lightly esteemed as an expenditure of money. A duke and his shoemaker, or tailor, or tenant, have precisely the same tastes, lay out their excess of capital in objects of the same nature, in gratifications of the same kind; differing only in cost, not in principle. Look, in England, into the tradesman's parlour, kitchen, garden, stable, way of living, amusements, and modes of gratification,—all is in the same taste as the nobleman's: the same principle of utility runs through all. The cultivated or acquired tastes for the fine arts, for music, painting, sculpture, architecture, are little, if at all, more developed among the higher or wealthier classes, than among the middle or lower classes. England at this day, with ten thousand times the wealth, furnishes no such demand for and supply of objects of the fine arts, as Florence, Genoa, or Holland did in the days of their prosperity. Is this peculiar developement of the national mind of the English people, this low appreciation and social influence of the fine arts compared to the useful among them, matter of just regret, as many amateurs consider it; or is it matter of just and enlightened exultation, that our social condition has advanced so far beyond that of any civilized people who have preceded us, that the tastes and gratifications which the few only of great wealth and great station in a community can cultivate, and enjoy, are as nothing in the mass of intellectual and bodily employment which the many give, by the demands upon intellect and industry, for their gratifications?

What, after all, is the real value, in the social condition of man, of the fine arts? Are they not too highly estimated,—raised by prejudices inherited from a period of intellectual culture far behind our own, into a false importance? Do they contribute to the wellbeing, civilisation, and intellectuality of mankind, as much as the cultivation of the useful arts? Do they call into activity higher mental powers, or more of the moral qualities of human nature, than the useful arts? Is the painter, the sculptor, the musician, the theatrical performer, generally a more cultivated, more intellectual, more moral member of society, a man approaching nearer to the highest end and perfection of human nature, than the engineer, the mechanician, the manufacturer? Is Rome, the seat of the fine arts, upon a higher, or so high a grade, in all that distinguishes a civilized community, as Glasgow, Manchester, or Birmingham,—the seats of the useful arts? Are Scotland and the United States of America —without a good picture, a good statue, or a good palace within their bounds, and without more taste, feeling, or knowledge in the fine arts, among the mass of the people, than among so many New Zealanders,—very far below Italy, or Bavaria, with their fine arts, tastes, and artists, as moral and intellectual communities of civilized men? Is a picture, a statue, or a building so high an effort of the human powers, intellectual and bodily, as a ship, a foundery, a cotton mill, with all their complicated machineries and combinations? We give, in reality, an undue importance to the fine arts,—reckon them important, because they minister to the gratification, and are among the legitimate and proper enjoyments of kings and important personages; but, like the military profession, or the servile employments about a royal court, their importance is derivative only,—is founded on prejudice or fashion, not on sound philosophic grounds. . . . .

The plain, undeniable, knock-me-down truth is, that the Glasgow manufacturer, whose printed cotton handkerchiefs the travellers Landers found adorning the woolly heads of negresses far in the interior of Africa, who had never seen a white human face, has done more for civilisation, has extended humanising influences more widely, than all the painters, sculptors, architects, and musicians of our age put together. Monstrous Vandalism, but true.

Such is the notable heresy broached by this sturdy democrat or utilitarian; in which, by the way, he has been preceded by the American, Emerson, who advances as philosophic speculation, what is here delivered as decided opinion. Are then these pictures and statues, the finest works of imitative art, nothing better in reality than dolls and toy figures with which full-grown men and women amuse themselves in the childhood of civilisation? In his subsequent observations upon Genoa "the superb," Naples, and Rome the cradle and seat of modern and of ancient art, our traveller finds many arguments to fortify his paradox. A novel and a good argument might be adduced by Mr. Laing and the speculative American, the extreme insensibility to art shown by minds like those of Scott and Coleridge; and generally, we should say, by the poets, and all highly imaginative persons; who, possessing the faculty of perceiving the originals, and of creating pictures which Raphael could not paint, and forms which Angelo could not mould, wrapped in a world of ideal beauty, remain wonderfully indifferent to works of art, even when fancying they are moved by them. But we leave Mr. Laing in the hopeless "Vandalism" which he avows. On manufactures, he will be held perfectly orthodox, save by the few fanatics among the English landowners, who, in steam-engines and spinning-jennies, instead of the quadrupling of their rent-rolls, which those things signify to the landlords of Germany, perceive only pauperism and Reform Bills. To the want of manufactures, and of the natural power of becoming a manufacturing country, is attributed the hopeless decay of Holland; which, from a highly prosperous commercial state, has sunk into a population of wealthy capitalists and ill-off paupers. Contrasting this country with Holland, where, together with the alternations of a damp, raw, and cold, or a hot and unwholesome climate, there is great want of fuel, Mr. Laing remarks:—

In our manufacturing towns, the poor, however badly off, have more advantages, in fuel, lodging, and occasional work produced by manufacturing establishments, than in towns of greater wealth, arising from commerce, or from the fixed incomes of capitalists, landholders, and public functionaries. Edinburgh, for instance, is not a seat of manufactures. We see a wealthy or well-off upper class in it; a thriving, well-to-do middle class, living by their expenditure; and the class below, living by the family work and handicrafts required by the other two, not very ill off either; but dive to the bottom of society even in Edinburgh, where fuel and fish are cheap, and land work and building work not scarce, but on the contrary taking off much common labour at all seasons, you find the surplus of the labouring class, beyond what the other two classes regularly employ, in extreme distress from the want of manufactures on a great scale circulating employment around them. Now Holland is just one such great city spread over a small country; and not a manufacturing city, but such a city of capitalists, and of middle-class people living by their expenditure, but affording no labour to the lowest class—nothing but city work, as tradesmen, family servants, and porters, seamen, or bargemen. The two upper classes, and those they employ of the lower class, may be well enough off; but such employment is stationary, has no principle of an increase in it, keeping pace, in some degree, with the growth of population; and the surplus, who cannot find work in such a social body, is more wretched than in any other land. After the peace of 1816, Holland was among the first countries in Europe that was obliged to grapple with a pauperism which threatened to subvert all social arrangements.

The economy of the Dutch pauper colonies, and their inefficiency, do not at present fall in our way. It is enough to state the causes of the general pauperism—which is, the want of that productive power which we see crushed, and about to be destroyed in this country which it has enriched, unless for the timely wisdom which may yet arrest its decay. Mr. Laing is so great an admirer of the Federal principle of society, that we are not sure but that he might, so far as depended on him, allow Mr. O'Connell to carry Repeal, and conceive the administration of Irish affairs a happy riddance to Great Britain. His application of the Federal principle to Holland and Belgium admits of less cavil. He points out some of the advantages of a Federal union to both these countries, and omits others which would not be left out of account by Louis Philippe or the King of Prussia, were they called on to consider of the advantages of such a union of public interests, and the wisdom of sanctioning merely a separation or divorce from bed and board between the two little neighbouring states.

After ingeniously reasoning on the Federative principle, which the example of America, and what he saw in Switzerland, taught him to admire, and to consider as, in theory, a more natural and just principle of general government than a forced centralization, or, in other words, the Swiss as better than the Russian system, he proceeds in this strain; and we give the extract as much from a desire to make known the author's opinions, as his literary accomplishments and logical powers:—

As civilisation, peace, and industry acquire an influence in the affairs of mankind, which the individual ambition of a sovereign, or the ignorance and evil passions of a government, will not be allowed to shake, the superiority of small independent states federally united, each extending over such territory, or masses of society only, as can be governed together, without the sacrifice of one part to another, and each interested in the general civilisation, peace, and industry, will probably be acknowledged by all civilized populations. Junctions morally or physically discordant, as that of Belgium and Holland, Austria and Lombardy, districts and populations on the Vistula and Niemen, with districts and populations on the Rhine and Moselle, are political arrangements which lack any principle of permancy founded upon their benefits to the governed. Nature forbids, by the unalterable differences of soil, climate, situation, and natural advantages of country, or by the equally unalterable moral differences between people and people, that one government can equally serve all—be equally suited to promote the utmost good of all. Federalism involves a principle more akin to natural, free, and beneficial legislation, and to the improvement of the social condition of man, than governments in single extensive states, holding legislative and executive powers over distant and distinct countries and populations, whether such governments be constitutional or despotic. It is much more likely to be the future progress of society, that Europe, in the course of time, civilisation, and the increasing influence of public opinion on all public affairs, will resolve itself into one great federal union of many states, of extent suitable to their moral and physical peculiarities, like the union of the American states, than that those American states will, in the course of time and civilisation, fall back into separate, unconnected, and hostile monarchies and aristocracies, which some modern travellers in America assure us is their inevitable doom. With all respect for their gifts of prophecy, the tendency of human affairs is not to retrograde towards the old, but to advance towards the new, towards a higher physical, moral, and religious condition; towards forms of government in which the interests of the people shall be directed by the people and for the people. Moral and intellectual power is leavening the whole mass, and not merely the upper crust of European society. The political balance of power among the European governments, if the idea could be carried out to its utmost completeness and permanency, is in reality a homage to the principle of federalism, an imperfect approximation to a federal union of the European powers—imperfect, because the interests of kingdoms territorially or dynastically considered as family estates, not the distinct physical and moral interests of the different masses of the European population, are attempted to be federalized. Yet this imperfect principle of federalism is eminently successful in the political federation of the Germanic states. This federation acts with dignity and power. In Switzerland, and in America, the constitution of the central federated power may be imperfect, may be too strong, or not strong enough; or even the state of society may not be ripe for the federal constitution adopted, and may, as yet, want a class removed by education and fortune from the temptation of turning public affairs to their private pecuniary advantage; but still the principle of federalism, theoretically considered, appears more reasonable and suitable to the wellbeing of society than the monarchical, and appears to be that towards which civilized and educated society is naturally tending in its course. The German custom-house union, or commercial league, is a remarkable indication of the irresistible tendency of social economy in modern times towards the principle of federalism. Kings and governments are often but the blind agents in these vast spontaneous movements of society. In this great measure of federalizing the German populations for the regulation and advancement of their industrial and commercial interests, is involved a principle which must necessarily extend to the constitutional and political rights and interests of these communities; and one altogether incompatible with the principle and system of the very governments and kings who at present lead this movement of the social body in Germany.

After taking a historical survey of the operation of the principle of Federalism, it is remarked :—

If Holland had been restored, on the expulsion of the French in 1814, to her ancient federal constitution, with a stadtholder instead of a king, and with Belgium as one of the states of the confederation, the cause of the rupture —the interference with the local advantages or prejudices of the one portion of the new-baked kingdom for the sake of the other—the centralisation-attempt of the late king of Holland for giving effect to the monarchical principle of extending one consolidated power, one language, law, and religion over all, would never have existed.

The superior dignity and solidity of the Federal system is corroborated by the recent conduct of the Swiss Confederation, which the rest of Europe fancied about to be swallowed up alive in an unequal contest, when the State of Berne dared to refuse to give up to France Prince Louis Buonaparte, who had acquired the rights of citizenship in Berne.

Mr. Laing, as may be augured from his former books, is at deadly opposition to Macculloch, Young, Birbeck, and all those political economists who uphold the principle of enormous estates, secured by the law of primogeniture; and of those enormous farms, or corn manufactories, which, in the progress of society, seem a natural consequence of that system. But it is not merely as a moralist and philanthropist that he opposes the doctrines of the modern school of political economy, but as an economist going farther in the main requisite—production, than any one of them. It is in entering France that Mr. Laing fairly enters upon this subject; and not Mr. Henry Bulwer, Mr. Jonathan Duncan, Cobbett—no modern writer, in short, is a more strenuous advocate for the division of land, among a numerous body of small proprietors, which seems, indeed, his only permanent remedy for all the evils under which this country is suffering, and is likely long to suffer. This, he argues, was the original condition of "Merry England," before the Norman invasion had introduced the system of feudal tenures; and to this condition, if England be to prosper by agriculture and manufactures in conjunction, she must speedily return.

Though we are not so certain of the exact original date of these yeoman, franklin, and statesman holdings, which must have introduced "the green network of hedges spread over the face of England," and which forms its peculiar rural charm, as Mr. Laing is, we having nothing to urge against this proof of a vast body of small proprietors, or, at all events, of small stationary occupiers enjoying nearly all the immunites of proprietors, having been at some time or other at work in producing it. He imagines that—

The Saxons and Danes,—one people in the principles of their laws, institutions, and languages, although in different states of civilisation,—must have woven this immense veil over the face of the land during the six centuries they possessed England under a social arrangement altogether different from the present; one in which their law of partition of property among all the children, excluding the feudal principle of primogeniture, would produce this subdivision of the land into small distinct fields. France is now, by the abolition of the feudal tenure of land and of the law of primogeniture, recommencing a state of society which was extinguished in England by the Norman conquest and the laws of succession adopted from that period. France is in the midst of a great social experiment. Its results upon civilisation can only be guessed at now, and will only be distinctly seen, perhaps, after the lapse of ages. The opinions of all our political economists are adverse to it. Listen to the groans of the most acute observers of our day, on the appalling consequences of this division of landed property.

Here he has Arthur Young, Birbeck, Peter Paul Cobbett, and the Edinburgh Reviewers, fairly on the hip; and he does not spare them; no, nor yet Dr. Chalmers, who, in his Politico-Theological Lectures, broaches very strange doctrines for a minister of the gospel of justice, mercy, and human equality. Having crowed a little over the Scotch "feelosophers," as Cobbett wont to call those land and corn doctors, our author thus proceeds :—

When new social arrangements, diametrically opposed in principle and spirit to the feudal, grew up, and unfolded themselves, first in America, and afterwards in France, and gradually spread from thence over great part of the present Prussia, the feudalized minds of our

Scotch political economists were lavish in their predictions of the degradation, misery, and barbarism, which must inevitably ensue among that portion of the human race who were so unfortunate as to adopt the dictates of nature and reason in their legislation on property and social rank, instead of adhering to conventional and barbarous laws and institutions, derived from the darkest period of the middle ages. If natural affection, humanity, reason, religion—if all that distinguishes man from the brute creation, speak more clearly in the human breast on the obligation of one duty than of another, it is on that of the parent providing equally according to his means for all the beings he has brought into existence and added to society; leaving none of them to want and distress if he can help it, or to chance for a precarious subsistence, or to be supported by his neighbours out of their alms, as paupers, or out of their taxes, as useless functionaries, or by uncertain dependence upon employment and bread from others. Is not this a moral and religious duty? Is it not the clearest duty of the parent, not only to the offspring he has brought into existence, but to the social body of which he and they are members? Can any argument of expediency, drawn from our artificial state of society under the feudal system and feudal law of succession to property, and of the advantage of that system, turn away the natural sentiments of men from this great moral duty to their own offspring? from this great moral duty to the rest of society? Yet listen to the morality and political economy taught lately in no obscure corner, and to no uninfluential pupils, but from the Divinity chair of the University of Edinburgh to the young men who were to go forth, and are now, the religious and moral instructors of the people in the established church of Scotland. "We know," says Dr. Chalmers, in his Political Economy in connexion with the Moral State and Moral Prospects of Society, being the substance of a course of lectures delivered to the students of the Theological Hall in Edinburgh,—"We know," says this distinguished philosopher, "that there is a mighty force of sentiment and natural affection arrayed against the law of primogeniture But here is the way in which we would appease these feelings, and make compensation for the violence done to them. We would make no inroad on the integrity of estates, or, for the sake of a second brother, take off to the extent of a thousand a-year from that domain of ten thousand a-year which devolved by succession on the eldest son of the family. We should think it vastly better, if, by means of a liberal provision in all the branches of the public service, a place of a thousand a-year lay open to the younger son, whether in the law, or in the church, or in colleges, or in any other well-appointed establishment kept up for the good and interest of the nation."

Now, all this stands in the published works of the great teacher of Theology in Scotland; and upon reading it, our author inquires, surely not ineptly, of those great teachers of morals and religion—

Will they explain the moral principle of their doctrine, that the most virtuous feelings in our nature—the mighty force of natural affection for our children, and the mighty force of the sentiment of justice to our fellow-men—should be sacrificed to support an artificial system or arrangement of society, be that system or arrangement ever so expedient or beneficial? Will they explain the moral principle upon which they recommend "the appeasing those natural feelings of affection and moral duty, and the compensating for the violence done to them," by an appointment of a thousand a-year, or by any other pecuniary compensation? Will they explain the moral difference between the conduct of the owner of a domain of ten thousand a-year, who leaves it all to his eldest son, and leaves his younger son to be provided for by his neighbours out of their taxes, in some appointment of a thousand a-year in the church, or the law, or in any other public establishment,—which is the case propounded and recommended by them—and the conduct of the wretched female who exposes her new-born babe on her neighbour's door-step, to be provided for out of his means? The moral guilt of the latter, driven by want and misery to abandon the infant she is unable to maintain, appears to all men, whose moral sense has not been cultivated at the Theological Hall of the University of Edinburgh, infinitely less than that of the man of ten thousand a-year, who abandons his younger children to the support of the public, in order to leave all his estate to the eldest son. Will they explain the moral grounds of their teaching that the abandonment of his parental and social duties to his offspring, and to his fellow-men, is a laudable act in the case of the rich domain owner, and the same abandonment an immoral and criminal act in the case of the wretched strumpet? They are the teachers of the people of Scotland, whose principles of moral and political philosophy, as laid down in their own text-book, are here arraigned; and they ought to satisfy every doubt that is suggested to the public mind, either of the moral purity or of the philosophical correctness of their speculations.

To the satisfaction of persons of plain understanding, and an unsophisticated moral sense, this will not be easily done.

After exposing the fallacies of those who argue for the principle of primogeniture, and against small farms, from the wretched cotter-tenant system of Ireland, and after showing the hardship and evils of money-rents to the Irish peasants—(and he extends this same principle to farmers of all kinds)—our author proceeds to point out a deeper fallacy, namely, that which, in the reasoning of the economists, confounds small renters with small proprietors, whose condition is totally different. This disposed of, he comes to another axiom of the economists, which assumes the imperfect cultivation of small farms when compared with that of the vast corn manufactories spread over thousands of acres in fields of hundreds of acres in extent. But while speaking of this imperfect cultivation, they,

In the same breath recommend a garden-like cultivation of the land. Pray what is a garden but a small farm? and what do they recommend, but that a large farm should be, as nearly as possible, brought into the state of cultivation and productiveness of a garden or small farm? This can only be done, they tell us, by the application of large capitals, such as small farmers cannot command, to agriculture: let us reduce these grand words to their proper value. Capital signifies the means of purchasing labour; the application of capital to agriculture means the application of labour to land. A man's own labour, as far as it goes, is as good as any he can buy, nay, a great deal better, because it is attended by a perpetual overseer—his self-interest, watching that it is not wasted or misapplied. If this labour be applied to a suitable, not too large nor too small, area of soil, it is capital applied to land, and the best kind of capital, and applied in the best way to a garden-like cultivation. A garden is better dug, and manured, and weeded, and drained, and is proportionably far more productive than a large farm; because more toil and labour, that is more capital is bestowed upon it, in proportion to its area. A small farm, held not by the temporary right of a tenant, and under the burden of a heavy rent, but by the owner of the soil, and cultivated by the labour of his family, is precisely the principle of gardening applied to farming; and in the countries in which land has long been occupied and cultivated in small farms by the owners—in Tuscany, Switzerland, and Flanders,—the garden-like cultivation and productiveness of the soil are cried up by those very agriculturists and political economists, who cry down the means, the only means, by which it can be attained universally in a country—the division of the land into small, garden-like estates, farmed by the proprietors. It is possible that the family of the small proprietor-farmer consume almost all that they produce, and have very little surplus to send to market; but that merely affects the proportions of the population engaged in producing food, and in producing objects to be exchanged for food. The produce supports the same number of human beings—every potato finds a mouth—whether the whole of it belongs to one man, who sells it for the labour and productions of the rest of the number, or belongs in small portions to the whole. The traveller who considers the prices, supplies, and varieties of agricultural food in the market towns in Flanders, France, Switzerland, and the liberal use, or, more correctly, the abundance and waste in the cooking and housekeeping of all classes in those countries, will scarcely admit even, that in proportion to the number of the whole community not engaged in husbandry, a smaller surplus for their consumpt is sent to market by the small farmers. It cannot be denied that a minute division of the land into small, free, garden-like properties, seems, à priori, more favourable to a garden-like cultivation of a country than its division into vast baronial estates, and the subdivision of these into extensive farms, on which the actual husbandmen, as a class, are but hired labourers, having no interest in the productions of the soil, and no object in their work but to get the day over.

Mr. Laing next enters into minute statistical details to prove his position. The leading fact is, that in 1840, France supported eight millions more people than in 1789, upon about the same extent of arable land; a fact somewhat in favour of the superior productiveness of the small proprietary system as opposed to the feudal. Nay, this increased population is also maintained in much greater abundance and comfort, as is shown by the greatly increased amount of tropical products consumed; and its condition as to food, clothing, and lodging is also better. Other causes show the advance of industry and prosperity among the French people since the breaking up of the large estates. The pursuits of agriculture are even weaning them from the worship of the Frenchman's idol, Glory; and it becomes every day more and more difficult and expensive to procure a substitute for a young man drawn by ballot to serve in the army. Industry is on the move—houses are building in every village.

The small landowners have acquired means and confidence, and are beginning to lodge themselves on their little estates. Prices, profits, speculations, undertakings, establishments in business, engrossed all conversation among all classes. . . . . .

How ludicrous, as one sits on the deck of a fine steam-vessel going down the Saone, or the Rhone, or the Seine, passing every half hour other steam-vessels, and every five or six miles under iron suspension bridges, and past canals, short factory railroads even, and new-built factories—how laughable, now, to read the lugubrious predictions of Arthur Young half a century ago, of Birbeck a quarter of a century ago, of the Edinburgh Review some twenty years ago, about the inevitable consequences of the French law of succession! "A pauper warren!" Look up from the page and laugh. Look around upon the actual prosperity, and wellbeing, and rising industry of this people, under their system. Look at the activity on their rivers, at the new-factory chimneys against the horizon, at the steam-boats, canals, roads, coal works, wherever nature gives any opening to enterprise. France owes her present prosperity, and rising industry, to this very system of subdivision of property, which allows no man to live in idleness, and no capital to be employed without a view to its reproduction, and places that great instrument of industry and wellbeing, property, in the hands of all classes. . . . . .

The produce applied to the feeding of soldiery, of labourers employed by a splendid court in works of mere ostentation and grandeur, in building palaces, or constructing magnificent public works of no utility equivalent to the labour expended, and, to a certain extent, even in the fine arts, and, above all, in supporting a numerous idle aristocracy, gentry, and clergy, with their dependent followers, was a waste of means, a consumpt without any corresponding return of consumable or saleable produce from the labour or industry of the consumers. In this view, the comparison between the old feudal construction of society in France, and the new, under the present law of succession, resolves itself into this result, —that one third more people are supported under the new, in greater abundance and comfort, from the same extent of arable land, in consequence of the law of succession having swept off the non-productive classes, forced them into active industry, and obliged all consumers, generally speaking, to be producers also while they consume. In this view, the cost of supporting the old court, aristocracy, gentry, clergy, and all the system and arrangements of society in France, under the ancient régime, has been equivalent to the cost of supporting one third more inhabitants in France, and in greater comfort and wellbeing; and this is the gain France has realized by her revolution, and by the abolition of the law of primogeniture, its most important measure.

In noticing Mr. Henry Bulwer's* work on France, this subject was discussed at some length in our pages; but we may draw fresh proofs of Mr. Laing's theory of the superior productiveness of minute cultivation from other fields. In Tuscany he inquires,

Why should the physical and moral condition of this population be so superior to that of the Neapolitans, or of the neighbouring people in the papal states? The soil and climate and productions are the same in all these countries. The difference must be accounted for by the happier distribution of the land in Tuscany. In 1836, Tuscany contained 1,436,785 inhabitants, and 130,190 landed estates. Deducting 7901 estates, belonging to towns, churches, or other corporate bodies, we have 122,289 belonging to the people—or, in other words, 48 families in every 100 have land of their own to live from. Can the striking difference in the physical and moral condition, and in the standard of living, between the people of Tuscany and those of the papal states be ascribed to any other cause? The taxes are as heavy in Tuscany as in the dominions of the Pope; about 12*s.* 6*d.* sterling per head of the population in the one, and 12*s.* 10*d.* in the other. But in the whole Maremma of Rome, of about 30 leagues in length by 10 or 12 in breadth, Mons. Chateauvieux reckons only 24 factors, or tenants of the large estates of the Roman nobles. From the frontier of the Neapolitan to that of the Tuscan state, the whole country is reckoned to be divided in about 600 landed estates. Compare the husbandry of Tuscany, the perfect system of drainage, for instance, in the strath of the Arno by drains between every two beds of land, all connected with a main drain—being our own lately introduced furrow tile-draining, but connected here with the irrigation as well as the draining of the land,—compare the clean state of the growing crops, the variety and succession of clean crops for foddering cattle in the house all the year round, the attention to collecting manure, the garden-like cultivation of the whole face of the country; compare these with the desert waste of the Roman Maremma, or with the papal country, of soil and productiveness as good as that of the vale of the Arno, the country about Foligno and Perugia; compare the well-clothed, busy people, the smart country girls at work about their cows' food, or their silkworm leaves, with the ragged, sallow, indolent population, lounging about their doors in the papal dominions, starving, and with nothing to do on the great estates; nay, compare the agricultural industry and operations in this land of small farms, with the best of our large-farm districts, with Tweedside, or East Lothian—and snap your fingers at the wisdom of our Sir Johns, and all the host of our book-makers on agriculture, who bleat after each other that solemn saw of the thriving-tenantry-times of the war—that small farms are incompatible with a high and perfect state of cultivation. Scotland, or England, can produce no one tract of land to be compared to this strath of the Arno, not to say for productiveness, because that depends upon soil and climate, which we have not of similar quality to compare, but for industry and intelligence applied to husbandry, for perfect drainage, for irrigation, for garden-like culture, for clean state of crops, for absence of all waste of land, labour, or manure, for good cultivation, in short, and the good condition of the labouring cultivator. These are points which admit of being compared between one farm and another, in the most distinct soils and climates. Our system of large farms will gain nothing in such a comparison with the husbandry of Tuscany, Flanders, or Switzerland, under a system of small farms. Next to the distribution of property, the comparative wellbeing of the lower classes in Tuscany must be ascribed to the government.

* Tait's Magazine for April 1836.

Again, in Switzerland, where he spent some seasons, new argument is found, not only for the superiority of small proprietary farms over great feudal estates in point of mere economy, but from much higher reasons—those of sound morality and social happiness. The parish of Montreux, on the banks of the lake of Geneva, is cited to all Europe, by the Malthuses and Chalmerses, as an exemplary parish; because the "prudential check" being in such constant operation there, marriages are late, if not few, and births yet fewer in proportion to the marriages; and hence the "population never," in the jargon of the economists, "presses on the means of subsistence." All owing to the "moral check," say they: "All owing to the numerous small land properties," says Mr. Laing, as he had, indeed, said before in Norway. Many curious facts are connected with this same Swiss parish, where, if few children are born, still fewer die in proportion to other localities. But what is the secret of the prudence of the people of Montreux, and the healthfulness of their progeny? We shall see what Mr. Laing thinks of it; for he allows the marriages of poverty to be imprudent, though he thinks,——

It is rather too much for our political economists to enlist moral restraint into the defence of the fictitious feudal construction of society. This parish of Montreux, proves the very reverse of the conclusions of Sir Francis d'Ivernois, as to the use of this false moral restraint on improvident marriage. It shows that economical restraint is sufficient. Our parish is divided into three communes or administrations. In that in which I am lodged, Veytaux, there is not a single pauper, although there is an accumulated poor fund, and the village thinks itself sufficiently important to have its post-office, its fire engine, its watchman; and it has a landward population around. The reason is obvious without having recourse to any occult moral restraint, or any tradition of the evils of over-population from the fate of the ancient Helvetians, as Sir Francis absurdly supposes possible, whose emigration from over-population Julius Cæsar repressed with the sword. The parish is one of the best cultivated and most productive vineyards in Europe; and is divided in very small portions among a great body of small proprietors. What is too high up the hill for vines, is in orchard, hay, and pasture land. There is no manufacture, and no chance work going on in the parish. These small proprietors, with their sons and daughters, work on their own land, know exactly what it produces, what it costs them to live, and whether the land can support two families or not. Their standard of living is high, as they are proprietors. They are well lodged, their houses well furnished, and they live well, although they are working men. I lived with one of them two summers successively. This class of the inhabitants would no more think of marrying without means to live in a decent way, than any gentleman's sons or daughters in England; and indeed less, because there is no variety of means of living, as in England. It must be altogether out of the land. The class below them again, the mere labourers, or village tradesmen, are under a similar economical restraint, which it is an abuse of words and principles to call moral restraint. The quantity of work which each of the small proprietors must hire, is a known and filled-up demand, not very variable. There is no corn farming, little or no horse work; and the number of labourers and tradesmen who can live by the work and custom of the other class, is as fixed and known as the means of living of the landowners themselves. There is no chance living—no room for an additional house even for this class; because the land is too valuable, and too minutely divided, to be planted with a labourer's house, if his labour be not necessary. All that is wanted is supplied; and until a vacancy naturally opens, in which a labourer and his wife could find work and house room, he cannot marry. The economical restraint is thus quite as strong among the labourers, as among the class of proprietors. Their standard of living, also, is necessarily raised by living and working all day along with a higher class. They are clad as well, females and males, as the peasant proprietors. The costume of the canton is used by all. This very parish might be cited as an instance of the restraining powers of property, and of the habits, tastes, and standard of living which attend a wide diffusion of property among a people, on their own over-multiplication. It is a proof that a division of property by a law of succession, different in principle from the feudal, is the true check upon over-population.

In Switzerland and Germany, the speculations of the political economists have even led to the adoption of direct restraints on marriage, by the imposition of fines, and otherwise. Sir Francis d'Ivernois approves of a tax on marriages, provided it is not so low as to defeat the object; as a poor couple, very anxious to get married, might still contrive to scrape together about £3,—the amount levied in one State named:—

But he thinks the principle excellent, as both Ricardo and Say, it seems, recommend the postponement of the marriageable age of the poor as an object of legislative enactment,—but not of the rich. . . . . .

All this monstrous, and demoralising, and tyrannical interference with the most sacred of those private rights for which man enters into social union with man, is the consequence of the absurd speculations of our English political economists and their foreign proselytes, who see clearly enough the evil, but who do not see, or are afraid to state, that the remedy is not in a false code of morality, imposing moral restraint upon an act not immoral,—the marriage of the sexes; nor in a false code of laws for preventing the most powerful stimulus of nature; but in raising the civilisation, habits, mode of living, and prudence of the lower classes of the community by a wider diffusion of property among them, by an inoculation of the whole mass of society with the restraints which property carries with it upon imprudence and want of forethought in human action. . . . . .

It is only in Ireland, or Sardinia, that the peasant sees no prospect of being better off at 28 or 30 years of age, than at 18; and therefore very naturally, and very properly, marries at 18 or very early in life, so as to have a prospect of children grown up, before he is past the age to work for them; and who will be able to work for themselves, and perhaps for him, when he is worn out.

Whatever may be said by the economists, as to the soundness of this reasoning, it must at least be confessed more in accordance with human feelings, and the instinctive sense of justice, than their theories:—

Men heard with indignation marriage, however impru-

dent and reckless, classed with fornication, or theft, as a moral delinquency; and the morality or immorality of human action, seriously stated even by divines, by Malthus and Dr. Chalmers, to depend upon prudential considerations. The rough untutored common sense of all men of the lower class rejected this new code of morality; and the socialists and radicals with reason crow over the ecclesiastics in this argument. They ask for what purpose is this new-fashioned moral obligation in the most important of the actions of man, his marriage, to be inculcated? Is it to support any natural and necessary system of society? No. But to support an artificial feudal division of property, originating in the darkest and most barbarous ages, by which one son alone succeeds to the land, and the others, with their posterity, are thrown into that pauper class, who must live on the taxes or alms of the rest of the community. . . . . .

The most profound observation ever made in the science of political economy is that of Solomon—"The destruction of the poor is their poverty." It is their poverty that causes their over-multiplication, and their over-multiplication their poverty. Cure their poverty, give them property, inoculate the whole mass of society with the tastes, habits, and feelings of prudence, which attend the possession of property, by abolishing the laws of succession which tend to concentrate all property in one upper class, and over-multiplication is cured. It is evidently curing itself rapidly in France, without the unnatural and immoral restraints recommended by political economists to be taught as injunctions of religion and morality by their clergy, or to be enforced as law by the local authorities. . . . . .

A political economy opposed to the moral and natural economy of society is unsound. It rests upon an arbitrary expediency only. The speculations upon artificial checks to the increase of population by legislative, educational, or conventional restraints inconsistent with the national rights, moral duties, and social relations of the individuals composing the poorer classes, are altogether false in principle. The administration of the poor law by the commissioners in England—the separation of husband and wife—of parents and children—the confinement in workhouses of all receiving relief—cannot be justified on any principle but expediency; and on that, anything—the veto on marriages among the poor—the enormities alluded to by Sir Francis d'Ivernois—anything and everything, in short, may be justified. The destitute either have a right or have not a right to relief. If they have not, it is a robbery to take the sum from the richer class to relieve them. If they have, from the nature and constitution of property and society, a right inherent to them as animals to such a portion of the fruits of God's earth as will maintain them, it is unjust and tyrannical to withhold that portion except on conditions inconsistent with their free agency and enjoyment of life as moral intelligent beings. The expediency-principle of making the poor-rate relief as sour as possible to the receiver, in order to lessen the pecuniary burden on the giver, would justify the exterminating, or torturing, or mutilating the pauper class. This is from first to last a false legislation.

In labouring to establish the superiority of small farms, Mr. Laing shows the coöperative system at work in Italy and in Switzerland, wherever it is required, as in the dairy-farms, and also wherever it can be beneficially employed. Thus the Swiss and Italian cheeses, the Parmesan or Gruyere, sent to market by the peasant-proprietors, are as large as those cheeses sent to market by the farmers of Cheshire, paying £200 or £300 of rent, and having fifty milch cows in their meadows:—

In Switzerland each parish has its Alp, that is, its common pasture for the cows of the parish—which is the proper meaning of the word Alp—and each inhabitant is entitled to a cow's grazing, or half a cow's grazing, from June to October, on this common pasture. These grazing rights are highly prized, for the Swiss peasant is extravagantly fond of his cow. To pass a winter without a cow to care for, would be a heavy life to him.

On these common mountain grazings, the cheese is made by the herdsman hired by the owners of the cows; who keeps a regular account of the milk yielded by each animal to the common stock, and, after the cheese is sold, divides the price by this rule:—

When we find this, which of all operations in husbandry seems most to require one large stock, and one large capital applied to it, so easily accomplished by the well-understood coöperation of small farmers, it is idle to argue that draining, or irrigation, or liming, or fencing, or manuring, or any operation whatsoever in farming, to which large capital is required, cannot be accomplished also by small farmers—not small tenant-farmers, but small proprietor-farmers, like the Swiss. . . . .

I went one warm forenoon while ascending the Rhigi into one of these dairy houses. From the want of dairy-maids or females about the place, and the appearance of the cow-man and his boys, I thought it prudent to sit down on the bench outside of the smoky dwelling room, and to ask for a bowl of milk there. It was brought me in a remarkably clean wooden bowl, and I had some curiosity, when, clean or dirty, my milk was swallowed, to see where it came from. The man took me to a separate wooden building; and instead of the disgusting dirt and sluttishness I had expected, I found the most unpretending cleanliness in this rough milk room—nothing was in it but the wooden vessels belonging to the dairy; but these were of unexceptionable nicety; and all those holding the milk were standing in a broad rill of water led from the neighbouring burn, and rippling through the centre of the room, and prevented by a little side sluice from running too full, and mingling with the milk. This burn running through gave a freshness and cleanliness to every article; although the whole was of rude construction, and evidently for use, not show. The cows were stabled, I found, at some distance from the milk-house, that the effluvia of their breath and dung might not taint the milk. Cheese is almost the only agricultural product of Switzerland that is exported; and it is manufactured by these small farmers certainly as well, with as much intelligence, cleanliness, and advantage, as by large farmers. . . . . .

The peculiar feature in the condition of the Swiss population—the great charm of Switzerland, next to its natural scenery—is the air of wellbeing, the neatness, the sense of property imprinted on the people, their dwellings, their plots of land. They have a kind of Robinson Crusoe industry about their houses and little properties; they are perpetually building, repairing, altering, or improving something about their tenements. The spirit of the proprietor is not to be mistaken in all that one sees in Switzerland. Some cottages, for instance, are adorned with long texts from Scripture painted on or burnt into the wood in front over the door; others, especially in the Simmenthal and the Haslethal, with the pedigree of the builder and owner. These show, sometimes, that the property has been held for 200 years by the same family. The modern taste of the proprietor shows itself in new windows, or additions to the old original picturesque dwelling, which, with its immense projecting roof sheltering or shading all these successive little additions, looks like a hen sitting with a brood of chickens under her wings. The little spots of land, each close no bigger than a garden, show the same daily care in the fencing, digging, weeding, and watering.

Look at these things, or at the boors of Norway, —contrast with theirs, the condition of the small farmers and peasantry of Ireland, or that of the agricultural labourers on the best, and largest, and highest-rented, and most productive farms of Norfolk, Berwickshire, or East Lothian, and say on which side inclines the right? But all the women take their part in field-work in Switzerland, pruning, binding, and tending the vines, and assuming even coarser tasks. Now, refined English feeling, which can see a poor ill-fed, ill-clothed woman, toiling and sweating a whole day over a wash-tub, is shocked at her hoeing turnips or potatoes under the blue vault of heaven, instead of scrubbing them in the back kitchen. The laborious out-door employments of the Swiss and French women, (on their own land, be it remembered,) even when their husbands or fathers are substantial proprietors, appear to have no ill effects upon their manners, but the very reverse :—

Females, both in France and Switzerland, appear to have a far more important rôle in the family, among the lower and middle classes, than with us. The female, although not exempt from out-door work, and even hard work, undertakes the thinking and managing department in the family affairs, and the husband is but the executive officer. The female is, in fact, very remarkably superior in manners, habits, tact, and intelligence, to the husband, in almost every family in the middle or lower classes in Switzerland. One is surprised to see the wife of such good, even genteel manners, and sound sense, and altogether such a superior person to her station; and the husband very often a mere lout. The hen is the better bird all over Switzerland. This is, perhaps, an effect of the military or servile employments of a great proportion of the male population during youth, and of the mercenary spirit too prevalent in Switzerland. In France, also, the female takes her full share of business with the male part of the family, in keeping accounts, and books, and selling goods, and in both countries occupies a higher and more rational social position certainly than with us. This seems to be the effect of the distribution of property, by which the female has her share and interest, as well as the male; and grows up with the same personal interest and sense of property in all around her.

On this subject we have outrun our author. While he was still in France, we have overshot him into Switzerland and Italy.

The successor to the aristocracy and the clergy, swept away by the Revolution, which (for political purposes) the government of France has found—that new power which in this country is termed official patronage, and which Mr Laing calls Functionarism, is traced in its rise, and to its probable ultimate consequences.

Functionarism, a system begun by Napoleon, and carried out by Louis Philippe, spreading over the whole continental states, (being nowhere more actively progressive than in Russia, though there wearing a military guise,) and even reaching to Britain, where the late Whig government showed itself deeply enamoured of centralization, is examined at some length by Mr Laing; who regards it as an invidious and dangerous principle in governments. Indeed he rests the superiority which he claims for England and Englishmen, on the absence of the systematized interference of the continental governments in everything that affects the public, and even the individual; and which leaves nothing in police, in education, or in religion, in the hands of the people to do for themselves. Illustrating the Functionary system of France, where it is carried to the greatest perfection, by a comparison between the department of the Indre and Loire, and the Scottish county of Ayr, he shows that, with a population twice as large as that of Ayrshire, that French department has 378 paid functionaries, or one to every 230 persons; whereas Ayrshire has only 21 altogether. Truly the French government must be rooted in the hearts of a very considerable part of the population, when together with the paid functionaries, their relatives and connexions, and the expectants of office, are taken into account.

The passage we are about to cite, appears to us one of the most weighty in these Notes, if we except the strictures on the craze which lately took possession of so many intelligent and liberal persons at home, for the introduction of the French and Prussian systems of forced, national education among us; a temporary craze which made us even welcome the bigotry of the established clergy, and the jealousy of the dissenters, as obstacles thrown in the headlong way of such a measure, until people had got time to recover their senses :—

In the ratio of the population 189 paid functionaries in France live upon the public, by doing the duties which, at the utmost, from 30 to 35 paid functionaries live by doing in Scotland. The effects upon the social condition of a people of the two distinct principles—that of doing everything for the people by paid functionaries, and government management, in a system of perfect centralization—and that of doing everything for the people by the people themselves, and with as little as possible of government agency—have never been satisfactorily examined by our political philosophers. We have tirades enough against the abuse of power in the hands of the unpaid magistracy of England, and examples enough of the abuse; but we have no impartial judgment given on the advantages and disadvantages of the system, compared to that of a paid body of judicial functionaries. Lord Brougham has frequently insisted on the great social benefit of bringing cheap law and justice home to every man's fireside; but that great political philosopher has never stated what this cheap law and justice would cost. The financial cost is not the principal or important cost in a system of extensive functionarism, but the moral cost, the deteriorating influence of the system on the industry, habits, and moral condition of the people. We see a tendency in our most enlightened and liberal statesmen —which is only held in check by the financial cost of indulging it—to centralize in the hands of government much of the public business, the local magistracy and police, the prosecution of offences, the care of the poor, the support of high roads, the education of the people, instead of leaving these duties to be, as heretofore, performed by the people for themselves.

The effects of Functionarism, and Centralization, of doing all for the people, assuming them to be incapable of doing anything for themselves, is shown in their visible effects on the continental communities; in their effects on civil liberty, and upon morals and national character. The mind of those well-educated Germans, "bred among the slavish institutions of Germany," is here pronounced to be "itself slavish :"—

The political conceptions of the German mind, as expressed at least in writings or conversation, are, in general, either abject to the last degree, or extravagant to the last degree—the conceptions of slaves, or of slaves run mad; both equally distant from the sober, rational speculations and conclusions of free men, on the subject of their political and civil liberties.

Mr Laing carries this so far as to doubt whether

The Popish church, in the darkest period of the middle ages, abstracted so many people, and so much capital from the paths and employments of productive industry, as the civil and military establishments of the continental governments do at the present day in France and Germany. The means also of obtaining a livelihood in monkish or clerical function were less demoralizing to the public mind and spirit; for some kind of intellectual superiority, or self-denial, or sacrifice, was required, and not merely, as in functionarism, barefaced patronage.

He contrasts this tribe of idle, listless expectants, and corrupt and subservient paid functionaries with the sturdy-minded, industrious Englishman who—

Toils and slaves at his trade, to become some day an independent man, to be beholden to no one, to be master of his own time and actions, to be a free agent individually, acting and thinking for himself, both in his private and, if he has any, in his public capacity or business. To this end he brings up his sons, and puts them out in the world with a trade, and with capital, if he has any, to attain this end. The dependence upon others for a living, the subserviency and seeking for favour, inherent in a functionary career, do not come within his sphere of action. A living by productive industry is, generally speaking, far more certain, and more easily obtained in our social system, in which military, clerical, and legal functions under government patronage, and a living in either of those branches of public employment, are rare, and altogether out of reach and out of sight of the middle classes in general, forming no object to the great mass of the industrialist-class to breed up their sons to. This is the great moral basis on which the national wealth, industry, and character of the English people rest; and is the only basis which can uphold real liberty in a country, or a social state, in which civil liberty, as well as political, free agency in private life, as well as free constitutional forms of government, can exist. The Germans and French never can be free people, nor very industrious, very wealthy nations, with their present social economy—with their armies of functionaries in civil employments, extending the desire and the means among the classes who ought to rely upon their own independent industry in the paths of trade and manufacture, of earning a living in public function by other means than their own productive industry.

The passport system, and the police regulations, all over the continent, where (as in France) a man must get a passport duly signed to enable him to move off a few miles to exercise the franchise he is said to enjoy, is justly described as the caricature of liberty: as Liberty in chains, her charter in her hand and manacles on her feet.

The police of the country, the security of person and property, are, it is alleged, better provided for by this governmental surveillance over, and interference in all individual movement. The same argument would justify the locking up the population every night in public jails. Good police, and the security of person and property, however valuable in society, are far too dearly paid for by the sacrifice of private free agency involved in this ultra-precautionary social economy. The moral sense of right, and the individual independence of judgment in conduct, are superseded by this conventional duty of obedience to office. Men lose the sentiment of what is due to themselves by others, and to others by themselves; and lose the sense of moral rectitude, and the habit of applying it to actions. A Frenchman or German would not think himself entitled to act upon his own judgment and sense of right, and refuse obedience to an order of a superior, if it were morally wrong; nor would the public feeling, as in England, go along with, and justify the individual who, on his own sense of right and wrong, refused to be an instrument of, or party to, any act not approved of by his moral sense. The spirit of subordination and implicit obedience, which we isolate and confine entirely to military service, enters on the continent into civil life. The scenes of bloodshed in France, under the revolutionary government, could never have taken place among a people bred up in the habits of moral free agency, and of reflecting independence of individual judgment on action. The instruments would have been wanting in the tribunals. The general moral sense would have opposed the enactment or fulfilment of such decrees.

The non-interference of government in our social economy with individual free-agency, and the intense repugnance and opposition to every attempt at such interference with the individual's rights of thinking and acting, have developed a more independent movement of the moral sense among the English people than among the continental. It is their distinguished national characteristic. The individual Englishman, the most rude and uncivilized in manners, the most depraved in habits, the most ignorant in reading, writing, and religious knowledge; standing but too often lower than the lowest of other nations on all these points; will yet be found a man wonderfully distinct and far above the educated continental man of a much higher class, in his moral discrimination of the right or wrong in human action; far more decidedly aware of his civil rights as a member of society, and judging far more acutely of what he terms fair play, or of what is due to himself, and by himself, in all public or private relations or actions. It is the total absence of government interference, by superintendence and functionaries, in the stream of private activity and industry, that has developed, in a remarkable degree, this spirit of self-government, and the influence of the moral sense on action among the English. It is their education. We may call them uneducated, because they cannot read and write so generally as the Scotch, the French, or the Prussian people; but as men and citizens they have received a practical education, from the nature of their social arrangements, of a far higher kind and value than the French, the Prussian, or even the Scotch can lay claim to. They are far more independent moral agents in public and private affairs.

In France and Prussia, the state, by the system of functionarism, stepped into the shoes of the feudal baron on the abolition of the feudal system; and he who was the vassal, and now calls himself the citizen, is, in fact, as much restrained in his civil liberty, and free-agency as a moral self-acting member of society, by state enactments, superfluous legislation, and the government-spirit of intermeddling by its functionaries in all things, as he was before by his feudal lords. The physical condition of the people of those countries has, beyond all doubt, been improved by the general diffusion of property through the social mass, and has advanced to a higher state of wellbeing and comfort than with us; but their civil and moral condition has not kept pace and advanced with it.

A great deal is heard in this country of the social wellbeing of the people of Prussia, which is at once ascribed to their compulsory education by the State, and to the paternal character of the government. Here the comfort of the people is ascribed to a very different cause: to the liberal and wise policy of Hardenberg; to the emancipation of the peasantry, and to the numerous body of small hereditary occupiers, who paid in vassal labour for the patches of ground which they held, having been converted into absolute and free proprietors. When the many commons of England were bit by bit divided, no merciful and wise provision of this sort was ever thought of: they have all been swallowed up in estates already overgrown, and those who profited by them, driven to the parish or the factory. The measure of Hardenberg did peacefully for Prussia much that a bloody revolution accomplished for France. "It gave property, wellbeing, and comfort, to a population of serfs."

It gave them no political liberty, though one main instrument in acquiring it,—when they shall one day become impatient of having all done for them that is done, and desire to do something for themselves.

We must omit all notice of the able strictures on the military organization of Prussia, and the political prospects of that country; which are not, according to our author, satisfactory. Mr Laing's view of the policy of England in relation to this and the other continental States is more important; and it is clear and decided. It is also, we are happy to believe, the only view which will now be tolerated among us.

The day is past when an English ministry, however conservative, could venture to propose to the country to join a despotic state in subjugating Poland, or in repressing the extension of constitutional representative government over an enlightened, manufacturing, and commercial population on the Rhine. The aggrandizement of France by such an accession of territory and people is a bugbear which, in the present age, would not mislead the commonsense of England; because it would be an accession of the elements of peace, industry, manufactures, and power, in the public affairs of France, lodged in the hands of an enlightened, industrious, peaceful population—not an accession of warlike spirit and means; and is at any rate an aggrandizement in no way affecting English interests or honour. England can only be a gainer, if every population, from the White Sea to the Straits of Gibraltar, were to give themselves free institutions, civil and political liberty, influence of the public over public affairs, and the power of restraining their rulers from wars and oppression.

To dislike such aggrandizement is one thing: to excite John Bull to ruin himself afresh, in order to maintain "the balance of Europe," that ancient phantasm which has cost industrious England so much blood and treasure, and involved her in debt and taxation, is now beyond the power of Governments.

The German Commercial League receives the lengthened attention from Mr Laing, which he must conceive due to that remarkable social movement, which, he considers, in its results, likely to be the most important and interesting event of this half century. And yet, of these results, he does not seem to have any very definite idea, save that they must ultimately overturn the aristocratic principle of the Prussian Government: manufacturing and commercial freedom and prosperity being incompatible with an irresponsible government, acting by edicts, through mere functionaries, who know nothing of manufacturing interests, have no sympathy with them, are incapable of legislating for them, but will not let them alone. The principle of the League does not, it is whispered, rise in favour with the Government, while the internal state of the country makes it rather a League upon paper than in spirit or practical efficacy: a something to pamper German imaginations, and to talk big about. At all events, our traveller sees nothing in the League to alarm or excite the jealous fears of England. In the first place, the different members of the League are not bound together "by material interests common to all." In the next place, there exist many natural obstacles, although such as are artificial or conventional were removed. The greatest natural obstacle alleged is that sameness of the natural productions in a vast extent of territory, which precludes the exchange of industry for industry, and thus prevents mutual dependence. This Mr. Laing considers as A defect which no league can remedy. The corn and timber growing populations, for instance, in the east or north of Germany, have no natural connexion whatsoever with the manufacturing or wine growing populations in the west or south. The latter produce in sufficient abundance their own corn, timber, flax, and have no natural demand for the products of the former; and the former can far more easily and profitably, and therefore more naturally, supply their wants of manufactured goods, or of wines, from England, Belgium, and France, which take in return the only products they have, corn, timber, flax, than from the provinces of Germany on the Rhine, or from Saxony or Silesia, by an expensive and uncertain land or river carriage, not open seven months in the year, and without retour cargiage for the carriers, and without any reciprocal market for their own products. There is in reality no common interests between the parts, to unite them into one country. They are one only in name, or, as in the Prussian dominions, in a political junction under one government, but have no real and natural union of material interests. The populations on the banks of the Thames and of the Ganges are much more efficiently and truly united into one nation by their material interests, than the populations on the Vistula or Niemen with those on the Rhine or Moselle.

But we need not pursue hypothetical reasoning upon a great experiment, which is still in its infancy, and the entire character of which may be changed or greatly modified by the policy which England shall adopt regarding the corn, meat, and timber duties, and restrictions. In discussing the same topic in another section of the volume, Mr. Laing says,—"It is only one article of agricultural produce—corn, that England buys or needs:" and hence he argues, that the isolated demand could have little effect in improving the husbandry of the continent. But we take it, that England needs many articles, and some of them almost as urgently as corn itself: she needs, beef, mutton, butter, cheese, tallow, seeds, flax, wool, and, to a certain extent, poultry and the lesser matters of vegetables and fruits—in short, every article of exportable farm produce. Again, when he contends that the Germans will never, under any change of circumstances, become customers to either home or English manufacturers, because their clothing is now, and always has been, a domestic manufacture, for which they have abundant leisure, we may reply, that the self-same reasoning would have equally applied to Scotland only fifty or fewer years since; yet what is the fact now? Even in such localities as Shetland, Orkney, and the Hebrides, the spinning-wheel and the small loom are completely at rest, and it is found better to apply to Glasgow and Galashiels for clothing, than continue domestic manufactures, for which there is still leisure. The habit of home manufacture was as deeply rooted in Scotland then, as it appears to be in Germany now; and yet we have even in one generation witnessed a great revolution in domestic economy co-existent with the most rapid improvements in husbandry. Are the young men and young women of Germany never to acquire a taste for finer and better manufactured fabrics than those worn by their homely ancestors? Is there to be no demand for Manchester chintzes, Paisley shawls, and Spittalfields silks among them? Every argument which Mr. Laing has employed to refute the expectations of Mr. Jacob and Dr. Bowring, whether of climate, custom, or habit, would equally have applied to Canada, New England, and Pennsylvania; and yet among all these populations there is a desire for the finer articles of English manufacture, which is only checked by inability to gratify it, as our Corn Laws forbid free exchanges. But it is only fair to let Mr. Laing speak on this point for himself.

It is the opinion of some of our most eminent political economists, of Mr. Jacob, Dr. Bowring, and other able writers who have enjoyed the best opportunities of becoming correctly and officially acquainted with the state of the continent, and from whose opinions, therefore, the ordinary traveller dissents with great diffidence, that the abolition of our corn laws will make these twenty-six millions of people, whose industrial product—corn, we would purchase, become in return great consumers of our industrial product—manufactured goods. This is a delusion of these distinguished political economists, arising from their applying ideas taken from our English social economy, state of property and of labour, to a state and system of society existing on totally different principles. The mass of those twenty-six millions having, each family within itself, land, labour, leisure, and the inveterate custom to provide their own food, clothing, necessaries, and luxuries by their own work; and being moreover during the winter half-year under the physical impossibility of doing any regular out-door agricultural work, would spin, weave, and clothe themselves by their own household industry as before, and buy no more of our manufactures than they do now. A change in those habits of a people which are rooted in their social economy, in the distribution of their property, the occupation of their soil, the nature of their country and climate, the institutions and arrangements of their governments, cannot be produced by any influences from without. . . .

It is quite unreasonable to suppose that they would take our manufactures to the prejudice of their own, because we take corn from the banks of the Vistula; a country with which they have no natural community of interests; with which they have no connexion, unless on paper.

This may be unreasonable; but surely it is not unreasonable to assume that they will take manufactured goods where they can obtain them best and cheapest; and also that the agricultural population of the regions of the Vistula will be more attracted to their corn customers in Britain, than to those with whom they have only "a connexion on paper." No one has more entire faith in the great superiority of our manufacturing powers, and natural and acquired adaptation for their employment, than Mr. Laing. He, indeed, scouts the very idea of rivalship, and thinks the danger of manufacturing capital withdrawing itself to the continent, under the pressure of the Corn Laws, an idle fear, or a vain threat. This comes strongly out in his notes on the Corn Law question, which notes at first sight, involve some fallacies and inconsistencies.

To pass to another topic:—Mr. Laing broaches an opinion which many will dispute, though he supports it ingeniously, namely, that the entire burthen of tithe falls wholly and solely upon the agricultural labourer; and his deduction is—

When the English landlords complain of their poor-rate, they forget that the object of it, the poor man, has been paying all his life a much heavier rich-rate for them—viz. one tenth of his time and labour, for the support of a church establishment to which the landlords and farmers contribute none of their own property; and that he would not be upon the poor-rate, if he had received all his life, wages for all that his time and labour produced, instead of working one day in ten for no wages.

Now this artificial and evil arrangement in our social system, which reduces to misery and to the vices associated with hopeless misery, both the agricultural and manufacturing classes of labourers, will be gradually and imperceptibly remedied, in the long run, by the abolition of the corn laws. This will be the true and beneficial effect of the measure. It will bring about a natural equilibrium between all kinds of labour, by restoring agricultural labour to its just position of having no peculiar tax, such as that of tithe, thrown upon it alone; and, by removing this pressure, will relieve the manufacturing labour-market from that forced influx into it which is the true cause of the low physical and moral condition to which the manufacturing operative class is reduced.

Having established the equal, or rather the superior productiveness of small to large farms, and the principle of rents in kind instead of money-rents,—which he says is in reality making the farmer an underwriter, standing under the double risk of seasons, for his landlord's share of what the land produces as well as for his own,—he thus proceeds to show the root of our social evils, and to unfold his grand remedy:—

The competition for land to hire, in consequence of the monopoly of the property of land in large estates, and the difficulty, or impossibility rather, of employing small capitals with safety in any trade or manufacture in which the large capitals compete with, and ruin the small, forces the class of tenants possessing capital out of their natural position as cultivators paid for the use of their means of cultivation, into the position of the landowners with respect to the risks and losses which equitably, and in a natural instead of a constrained artificial system of land occupancy, would fall proportionably upon the latter. The money-rented tenant is not only an underwriter insuring his landowner's interest in the produce of the land against the risk of seasons, but he is also an underwriter securing him against the fluctuation of markets, and a corn merchant paying all the expenses of transporting and marketing what, in any just view of the nature of rent, is not his property, but the landowner's. It is his bargain, no doubt, and it is his own will to accept the lease of his land under such conditions; but it is not an equitable bargain, nor a man's free will, when an artificial system has grown up under a protective legislation which leaves him no alternative but to step into all the risks for the landowner, or let the land and his trade alone altogether. It is like the bargain and free will of the passengers in a vessel stranded on the Goodwin Sands, treating with the Deal boatmen to bring them to land. The corn laws are the protective legislation under which this artificial relation between the landowner and the cultivator has grown up. When these are abolished, the relations between landowner and cultivator will return to a sound and natural state. The landowner will pay the cultivator the half or whatever proportion may be agreed upon, of the produce of the land, for his capital, skill, and labour in producing it, and run his own risks of seasons and markets. The present tenantry will return to the state from which they fell—that of a yeomanry cultivating their own lands. Their smallest capitals, of two or three thousand pounds sterling, will then find small estates for their investment at the moderate price to which the reduced value of the produce of land will bring landed property. The artificial value given by protective legislation for the benefit of the landowners, and by the exclusive privileges or political advantages attached to their kind of property, being taken away, a thousand pounds' worth of land will be as readily found in the market as a thousand pounds' worth of broad cloth. Land will take the tendency to be distributed again in small estates of yeomanry and gentry living on and farming their own properties, instead of the tendency it has long had, to be concentrated in large masses in the hands of great capitalists. The condition of the money-rented tenantry will be improved. They will be relieved from the unjust position of having the risk of markets and crops thrown entirely on them. Many farmers in the Lothians, and they are not the most short-sighted of men, have of late tipulated for a rent payable partly or wholly in grain ; r in so many bolls per acre, valued at the average or ar prices of the year. This is but a step, a feeling of he way in the dark. . . . . The next step rill be to pay as rent not so many fixed bolls per acre, whether the season produces the crop or not, but a fixed proportion of the crops actually produced, or of the value hey sell for in the market. The tendency clearly is to eturn to the natural principle of rent, as a payment by he landowner to the cultivator, the landowner standing he risks of seasons and markets for his own interest in he produce. The consequences of this change will be, hat the tenantry possessing capital will become yeomen roprietors farming their own estates. The husbandry lass immediately below them, the men of industry, skill nd intelligence, but with little or no capital, will become metayer tenants, and the working labourers in husbandry rill become small farmers, holding land for their work.

Important improvements in our social condition are linked to this inevitable change in the state of landed property. It will, in truth, produce a slow and quiet, but complete revolution in our whole social economy—one much needed, very beneficial in its results to the great mass of the community, and which never can come with less evil to any class or interest, than through the gradual change brought about in the course of years by a regular act of legislation. It is a fact not to be denied, or blinked at, that the upper classes of the landed social body in Britain are too far removed by vast incomes, and conventional privileges and distinctions, from all community of knowledge, business, interests, or feelings, with the middle or lower classes for whom they legislate. They are in reality a kind of Brahmin caste in the social body at present, educated aloof, and living aloof from the mass of the nation. The landed proprietor is out of his just position. The man with an estate worth fifty, sixty, or eighty thousand pounds, enjoys far higher political privilege and influence, both in the public and in the local affairs of the country, than the merchant or manufacturer with an equal capital invested in concerns of far greater importance to the community, and requiring much higher talent for its management. The exclusive weight in society which belonged to landed property when it was almost the only kind of property, continues vested in a class who now are, from their very position in society, necessarily less experienced and versed in the various interests of a modern community than those for whom they act and legislate. Legislators and legislatees have become two distinct tribes, inhabiting the same land, without common objects, interests, or knowledge. The Reform Bill failed to amend this evil in our social economy, because the Bill was founded on the false principle of continuing the monopoly of political influence in one kind of property only, and merely attempting to increase the numbers of those partaking in the monopoly. But the abolition of the corn laws will amend the evil. The social influence of all kinds of property will be equalized. Property will not lose its social and political influence, but landed property will have no more than its just and equal share; and all proprietors who have a stake in the country by any description of property will have a voice in its affairs, through their representatives, proportionable to that stake. The landed proprietor will have to submit to be measured by the standard applied to other proprietors—viz., the value of his property and talents taken together—not by the feudal standard of the measurement of his land as property of a more noble kind than their money-capitals, machinery, or shipping, and entitled exclusively to legislate for these, and to form their representation in the legislature. The landed booby, whose talents extend to crowing like a cock, will no longer take his seat as of birth-right, on the parliamentary benches with a Brougham, a Macauley, or an O'Connell. This sound and rational distribution of the legislative power, and the equality of rights and advantages of all proprietors in proportion to their stake in the country, whether it be as capitalists, landowners, or labourers, and whether invested in agriculture, manufacture, or commerce, without privilege of or pressure upon one kind of property, or class of people more than another, will follow naturally and necessarily, although gradually, in our social economy, from the abolition of all protecting duties on corn in favour of landed property. It will be a revolution. It may not be perceptible in the generation in which it is effected; but on looking back from the higher state of wellbeing to which it will gradually raise all classes, it will be considered a great and beneficial revolution.

We stop here, at a point up to which we can entirely agree with our author.

Besides the warning instance of Holland, there is another and a melancholy consummation to the history of commercial and manufacturing England, which occurs to our author when musing over the decayed city of Genoa, and which, at this particular crisis, comes powerfully home to the heart of the patriot and the philanthropist. He remarks :—

Here in Genoa, the imaginative traveller may revel, in his descriptions of orange groves, vine-clad hills, and marble palaces, mingled in luxuriant magnificence, and rising against a background of Heaven-high peaks of snow cutting into a deep blue sky above, and washed beneath by a sea still more intensely blue. But that miserable proseman, the political economist, goes dodging about this magnificent city, the city of palaces, the Genova la Superba, asking, Where do your middle classes live ? Where did they live in the days of Genoa's greatness ? He sees now, that the same roof covers the beggar and the prince ; for, on the ground-floors, under the marble staircases, and marble-paved halls, and superb state rooms on the first-floor, there are vaults, holes, and coach-house-like places opening into the streets, in which the labouring class and small shopkeepers pig together, living, cooking, and doing all family work, half and half in the open air. But was this always so ? Where did, or where do they live, who are neither princes nor beggars ? who are a degree above porters, or day labourers, or the small shopkeeper, or tradesman living by their custom, in the means and habits of a civilized existence ? Where be the snug, comfortable, suitable, dwellings for this middle class, the pith and marrow of a nation, which cover the land in England and Scotland so entirely, that the great mansion is the exception, not the rule in our national habitations, wealthy as the nation is ? Here, all is palace, and all is noblesse, public functionary, and beggar. They reckon in Genoa, in clerical function alone, 6,000 persons, and 7,000 military. Sweep away the edifices of nobility, those appropriated to public functionaries and their business, together with churches, convents, hospitals, barracks, theatres, and such public buildings, and Genoa would scarcely be a town. Yet Genoa is not a poor town in one sense. Many of these palaces are inhabited by a wealthy nobility, and, it is said, there are more capitalists, more great capitalists in Genoa, than in any town in Italy. To have erected and to keep up such palaces as they live in, or even to afford so much dead stock as is invested in the mere material, the marble, gilding, pictures of value, ornaments, and costly furniture, speaks of enormous wealth, both in past and present days.

And after describing the actual condition of the population of Genoa, where the extremes of luxury and grandeur and of the most squalid poverty meet, he inquires—

May not the history of Genoa's commercial greatness and decline become, in the course of ages, that of England's ? May not the one show in small, what the other will come to in large ? Is not the same element of decay common to the social economy of both ? It is in the nature of trade and manufacture, that great capital drives small capital out of the field ; it can afford to work for smaller returns. There is a natural tendency in trade to monopoly, by the accumulation of great wealth in few hands. It is not impossible, that in every branch of trade and manufacture in Britain, the great capitalist will, in time, entirely occupy the field, and put down small capitalists in the same lines of business; that a monied aristocracy, similar to that here in Genoa, will gradually be formed, the middle class of small capitalists in trade and manufacture become gradually extinguished, and a structure of society gradually arise, in which lords and labourers will be the only classes or gradations in the commercial and manufacturing, as in the landed system. An approximation, a tendency towards this state, is going on in England. In many branches of industry,—for instance, in glass-making, iron-founding, soap-making, cotton-spinning, the great capitalists engaged in them have, by the natural effect of working with great capital, driven small capitals out of the field, and formed a kind of exclusive family property of some of these branches of manufacture. Government, by excessive taxation and excise regulation, both of which have ultimately the effect, as in the glass and soap manufacture and distillery business, of giving a monopoly to the great capitalist who can afford the delay and advance of money these impediments require, has been hitherto aiding, rather than counteracting, this tendency of great capital to swallow all the employments in which small capital can act. It is a question practically undetermined, whether the experiment into which this tendency has forced society within these few years, the junction of small capitalists in joint-stock, subscription, or share companies, can compete in productive industry, with great capital in the hands of one or two partners wielding great means with the energy, activity, and frugality of an individual. It is not an imaginary, nor perhaps a very distant evil, that our middle classes with their small capitals may sink into nothing, may become, as here, tradesmen or small dealers supplying a few great manufacturing and commercial families with the articles of their household consumpt; or supernumerary candidates for unnecessary public functions, civil, military, or clerical; and that in trade, as in land, a noblesse of capitalists, and a population of serfs working for them, may come to be the two main constituent parts in our social structure. A Genoa in large, England may possibly become—with one small class living in almost royal splendour and luxury; and the great mass of the community in rags and hunger.

Legislative wisdom and justice, the common interests, and the common intelligence of the country, must avert such a catastrophe, or proud England will merit no more sympathy from future times, than Mr. Laing now bestows upon fallen Genoa, when he eloquently says:—

When we reflect on the former greatness and the present decay of this once powerful state, how important the lesson it teaches! not the commonplace lesson only of the instability of human greatness—but that the misapplication of capital, or rather of human industry—for capital is the command of human labour and time, embodied in the form of money—is the cause of the instability of greatness in empires, as in individuals. Look at this city of Genoa! at the millions upon millions that have been expended unreproductively! The loom, the ship, the steam engine, the factory, reproduce their own cost with a profit, and the whole is laid out, again and again, and to the latest generation, reproductively; but the palace, the gorgeous ornament, the pageant, the display of pomp and power in fleets and armies and courtly splendour, reproduce nothing. The labourer earns his needful food during the time he is employed in producing them; that done, he is no richer than at first, and the means of his employer to re-employ him, the capital which laid out in a reproductive way, would have gone on to all posterity, augmenting and extending employment, wellbeing, and civilisation, is fixed down and buried in a pile of stones. The labourers of the day earned their wages for piling them together, consumed and paid for their meat and drink during the time; and that is all the result of the outlay of capital, which, if the Genoese nobles had employed it reproductively in manufacturing or transporting the objects of civilized life for the consumers, instead of in building huge palaces, would have vivified the East. Capital is a bank note for so much human labour. If its value is not reproduced by its outlay, the holder of it is wasting his means, and the industrious of the country suffer a loss.

I mourn not for Genoa. Distant countries conquered, plundered, oppressed, reduced to subjection and barbarism, to enable a wealthy and ostentatious aristocracy to vie with each other in splendid extravagance—the middle class extinguished—the useful arts and manufactures, those which diffuse comfort and civilisation through society, and extend by their productive action the sphere of human industry, postponed to the ornamental, to those which administer only to the luxurious enjoyment of the few, and add little or nothing to the means of living, wellbeing, and industry of the many—in the downfal of such a state—of a people of princes and beggars—what is there to regret? Lord Castlereagh need not turn him in his grave, if the annihilation of the Genoese aristocracy as a state be the greatest of his diplomatic sins.

There are many topics discussed in these Notes to which we should have liked to refer, and we were almost bound to give our readers some relish of the lighter parts of the work; but we have already so far exceeded our limits, that we must be contented earnestly to recommend the sections on Catholicism and Protestantism, and, above all, the account of the boasted educational system of the continent, but especially that of Prussia. If no one more keenly perceives the defects of British social arrangements, no one more warmly appreciates the value of those free, if imperfect institutions, which give the people of these islands so great a moral superiority over the continental nations. On this text, in pointing out the difference which exists between Great Britain and Prussia, Austria, and the Italian States, Mr. Laing preaches the purest gospel of democracy.

Man, in his social state, is not intended by his Creator to be only a passive subject of wise and good government, be it ever so wise and good, but to attain the higher moral condition of wisely and well governing himself, not only in his private moral capacity as an individual, but in his social, political capacity as one of the members of a community. Morality and religion direct him in his private capacity; but if he is debarred by the arbitrary institutions of his government from exercising the other half of his social duties, he is, morally considered, but half a man, is answering but half the end for which man is sent into this world as a social being; is fulfilling but half the duties given him to be fulfilled by his Creator—for man is created a political as well as a moral being; has a political as well as a moral existence. A people governed by laws, in the enactment of which they have no voice, and by functionaries independent of public opinion, are in a low social and political, and consequently in a low moral condition, however suitable and excellent the law itself and its administration may be. They are morally slaves. The Prussian, the Austrian, the Neapolitan, the Papal subjects stand equally upon this low moral level. . . . . They are in a state of mental vassalage as moral and social beings, in a state of pupilage, not of free agency, whatever be their education, or their physical condition as to food and the comforts of life. The enjoyments and character of a animal-people are all that men attain to under these paternal autocratic governments, with, perhaps, the developement, in the town-populations, of taste and feeling for the fine arts, and a certain polish and amenity of manners. . . . . We attach too great importance to these superficial, although intellectual and moral acquirements, in estimating the education of an individual or of a nation. National education, as it is called, turns in all these paternal autocratic governments which will not leave the people to the education of their own free agency as moral beings united in society, principally upon the developement of these tastes, manners, and feelings. If eating, drinking, lodging, and living well, for very little outlay of industry, exertion, or bodily labour, and still less of mental, and along with these the enjoyment, through the eye and ear, of all the pleasures that a cultivated, educated taste in the fine arts affords, if physical good with this kind of intellectual culture or developement be the great end to be attained by man in society, these autocratic governments are rapidly carrying their people to a higher social condition than that of the people of Britain.

But if the moral and social duties of man, as a member of the human family, demand something more than his own animal enjoyment, physical wellbeing, and personal gratification, even in the intellectual exercise of his taste and feeling—if his true position in life be that in which his moral and intellectual nature can be fully and freely developed in the exercise of his capabilities, duties, and rights, as a thinking, responsible, free agent—and his true education, that which fits him for this position,—then are these autocratic governments and their subjects in a low social position—one far beneath that of the British,—and their systems of national education are not adapted to the great moral end of human existence, but merely to support their governments. If we fairly consider the social condition of the continental man of whatever class, whatever position, or whatever country, Neapolitan, or Austrian, or Prussian, we find him, body and soul, a slave. His going out and coming in, his personal, bodily, and mental action in the use of his property, in the exercise of his industry and talents, in his education, his religion, his laws, his doings, thinkings, readings, talkings in public or private affairs, are fitted on him by his master, the state, like clothing on a convict; and in these alone can he move, or execute any act of social existence. He has no individual existence socially or morally, for he has no individual free agency. His education fits him for this state of pupilage, but not for independent action as a reflecting, self-guiding being, sensible of, and daily exercising his social, political, moral, and religious rights and duties, as a free agent. In his position relatively to these rights and duties, the continental man stands on a level very far below that of the individual of our country in a corresponding class of society. With all the ignorance and vice imputed to our lower classes, they are in true and efficient education, as members of society acting for themselves in their rights and duties, and under guidance of their own judgment, moral sense, and conscience, in a far higher intellectual, moral, and religious condition, than the educated slaves of the continent. This is the conclusion, in social economy, which the author of the preceding Notes has come to, and which the reader is requested to consider.

The length at which we have analyzed a work of so grave a character as these Notes, must speak our sense of its ability and importance; and of the expansion and the solidity of its author's views.

MISS BURNEY'S DIARY AND LETTERS.*

Were this charming work very inferior to what it is in point of matter and composition, it would still be most welcome throughout the countless thousands of the quiet reading homes of England, were it but for the feelings which it must recall of the days when the name of Miss Burney was a household word, as dear and familiar as that of Scott or Bulwer, and for the delightful reminiscences which it must awaken of the first entranced wanderings of the youthful imagination into the fairy regions of fiction and among the scenes of mimic life.

The author of Evelina not only enjoyed as wide a popularity as the most popular of the modern fictionists, but in her own age she deserved it. Within her own range, there has not been a more felicitous sketcher of English character and oddities. Were Evelina to appear even now, with such modifications as change of mode and manners would lead the author to adopt, the popularity of the book would, we apprehend, be as great as when it was warmly and sincerely praised by Johnson, Burke, Sheridan, Reynolds, Mrs. Thrale, Mrs. Cholmondeley, in short, by the whole world; while the jealousy or soreness of Cumberland formed its author's crowning triumph. But the Diary and Letters will afford us matter enough for discussion, without looking back upon those delightful fictions which still charm after the lapse of sixty years.

Miss Frances Burney was the second daughter of a clever, "talented," and wonderfully "getting on" family; though their success in life was grounded on solid merit, as well as on good tact, and the capacity of making the best of the social position which the abilities, pleasing manners, and indefatigable perseverance of their father, Dr. Burney, had acquired for them. Probably to enhance her subsequent brilliancy, Fanny is pronounced to have been, in childhood, very backward in learning, or an arrant dunce. At eight years of age, she did not even know her letters. At nine, she lost her mother; and while her elder and her younger sister were sent to France for some years to complete their education, poor Fanny was left to scramble on in her widowed father's house as she best could; so that she affords one more instance of the thorough teaching of those who are self-taught. She lived among educated people, and she educated herself. Her father was generally engaged in literary composition, his daughters were his amanuenses; and so Fanny, the brightest of them, became insensibly an authoress, and "awakening one morning, found herself famous." At ten years old, the neglected Fanny, we are told, could absolutely read; and as writing was one main business of the head of the house, so soon as she could make pot-hooks and hangers, she began imitatively to scribble rhymes and little stories. In a few more years, this taste was fortunately superseded by the love of reading; for the author of Evelina and Cecilia, unlike most inventive writers, was an observer of character and manners before she became a reader,—one cause, probably, of her precocity. The Quarterly Review, with that malicious love of truth which may sometimes be a duty in critics, has destroyed the fond illusion of a work of fiction, pregnant with quick and mature observation of life, being written by a girl of seventeen; which gross improbability was at one time credited. Evelina, not a juvenile, was not even a hasty performance. The author must have been shaping and turning it in her mind for many years; and when, in her twenty-sixth year, it finally appeared, it was the production of a mature woman, who, with the outward seeming of excessive shyness and reserve, had seen a great deal of society, and reflected upon what she saw. Though never at a girl's school, Miss Burney had, all her life, under her father's roof, lived in the improving school of a varied and accomplished society. Of her education, her Editor remarks:—

* Diary and Letters of Madame D'Arblay, Author of "Evelina," "Cecilia," &c., Edited by her Niece, Vol. I., comprehending the years 1778 to 1780, pp. 436, with a Portrait of Miss Burney, Fac-similes of her Letters, &c., &c. Colburn.

Although the education of Dr. Burney's daughters was not conducted according to the elaborate systems of the present day, they yet enjoyed some advantages which more than compensated for the absence of regular and salaried instructors. The sentiments and example of their father excited them to love whatever was upright, virtuous, and amiable; while, from not being secluded in a school-room, they also shared the conversation of their father's guests; and, in London, Dr. Burney's miscellaneous but agreeable society included some of those most eminent for literature in our own country, together with many accomplished foreigners, whose observations and criticisms were in themselves lessons. Perhaps the taste of Frances Burney was formed much in the same way as that of her celebrated contemporary, Madame de Staël, who relates that she used to sit with her work, on a little stool at her mother's knee, and listen to the conversation of all Monsieur Neckar's enlightened visiters; thus gathering notions on literature and politics long ere it was suspected that she knew the meaning of the words.

If, however, the above methods were of themselves sufficient for education, all good conversers might offer a "royal road" to learning. But the benefit here obtained was chiefly that of directing the attention to intellectual pursuits, enlightening the judgment, and exciting a thirst for knowledge which led the youthful Frances to diligent and laborious application. By the time she was fourteen she had carefully studied many of the best authors in her father's library, of which she had the uncontrolled range. She began also to make extracts, keeping a catalogue raisonné of the books she read; and some of her early remarks were such as would not have disgraced a maturer judgment.

While her sisters were acquiring accomplishments in France, and "finishing their education," it was in such quiet studies that the author of "Evelina," alone, in her father's house, improved her mind and talents. Among the happy influences around her, next to the example of her father, to whom she was devotedly attached, and, perhaps, before that influence, was the affectionate care of a gentleman,—a sincere and old friend of the Burneys, of whom the world has already heard as Fanny's second father,—the Hermit of Chesington,—her beloved "Daddy Crisp." This old gentleman, who had more than pretensions to literature, is not the least interesting person in the gallery of accomplished and intellectual persons among whom the volume places us. He had, probably, been an early patron of Dr. Burney's, and he was his "guide, philosopher, and friend," when he needed friends. The excellent sense, good taste, and acquirements of this gentleman, as well as the genial nature, revealed in his letters to Fanny, give him a lively interest with the admirers of Miss Burney, whom the reader must like all the better for her cordial regard for her "Daddy." This is, perhaps, the finest trait of individual character which the volume presents. The following passage carries us back to the ruralities of the neighbourhood of London seventy years ago:—

At this time Mr. Crisp had given up the world, in consequence of various losses, diminished fortune, and disappointed hopes; and he had fixed his dwelling in an old-fashioned country-house, called Chesington Hall, not far from Kingston in Surrey, and within a few miles of Hampton. This mansion stood upon a large and nearly desolate common, and not a road or even a track led to it from Epsom, which was the nearest town. It was encircled by ploughed fields, and one-half of the building was inhabited by a farmer; while, in the remaining portion dwelt the proprietor, Christopher Hamilton, Esq. with whom Mr. Crisp had adopted some pic-nic plan, which enabled him to consider Chesington as his decided residence. At the death of Mr. Hamilton, the house, which was then his only property, devolved to his maiden sister, Mrs. Hamilton, who, with her niece, Miss Kitty Cooke, continued to receive Mr. Crisp as an inmate, and to admit other persons as occasional boarders.

This independent method of visiting his friend, and of obtaining country air and exercise for his children, exactly suited the views of Dr. Burney, and they all in turn, or in groups, enjoyed the society of their Chesington Daddy, as they familiarly called Mr. Crisp; while he was indulgent to all their youthful vagaries; and amused with observing their different characters.

Fanny must have been his favourite. Nor was she always, nor probably by nature, the half-prudish and over-conscious, self-occupied, or egotistical person, which an overpowering burst of applause, the necessity of managing a literary reputation, and the etiquette of court life afterwards rendered her. After she had "grown famous," Mr. Crisp, in one of his letters to "Fannikin," thus refers to her as a child:—

Do you remember, about a dozen years ago, how you used to dance Nancy Dawson on the grass-plot, with your cap on the ground, and your long hair streaming down your back, one shoe off, and throwing about your head like a mad thing? Now you are to dance Nancy Dawson with fetters on; there is the difference: yet there is certainly a nameless grace and charm in giving a loose to that wildness and friskiness sometimes.

I am very glad you have secured Mrs. Montagu for your friend; her weight and interest are powerful; but there is one particular I do not relish; though she means it as a mark of favour and distinction—it is, where she says, "If Miss Burney does write a play, I beg I may know of it, and (if she thinks proper) see it."

Now, Fanny, this same seeing it, (in a professed female wit, authoress, and Mæcenas into the bargain,) I fear implies too much interference—implies advising, correcting, altering, &c. &c. &c.; not only so, but in so high a critic the not submitting to such grand authority, might possibly give a secret, concealed, lurking offence. Now d'ye see, as I told you once before, I would have the whole be all my own—all of a piece; and to tell you the truth, I would not give a pin for the advice of the ablest friend who would not suffer me at last to follow my own judgment without resentment.

"Daddy Crisp" had, at one time, seen a good deal of the blue queens, and he appears to have understood them thoroughly.

Dr. Burney married an excellent and clever widow lady while his daughters were dawning into womanhood; but though Mrs. Burney seems to have possessed the respectful esteem of her clever step-daughter, she does not appear to have enjoyed her confidence. Thus, Fanny's literary projects were all pursued by stealth; and though, when about to publish anonymously, she deemed it duty to first apprize her father of the event, the Doctor either considered her communication a joke, or choosing to have no responsibility in the affair, treated it as such. Yet he managed admirably to ensure her success when the right time came, and enjoyed her literary fame with the best feelings of a father.

After all, "Evelina," at first, was left pretty much to make her own way. The manuscript, sent anonymously to Dodsley, was rejected by him with dignity, and it was next offered to Mr. Lowndes, who appears to have been then a rather obscure bookseller in Fleet Street. The negotiator on this occasion was Fanny's younger brother Charles, and her sole confidante her favourite sister Susan. Mr. Lowndes offered twenty pounds for the manuscript, and the group were delighted with the magnificence of the sum, which "Daddy Crisp" afterwards said should have been £1000. In January, 1778, the Book—the wonderful Book—the Book of Books—the sole object of its author's journal for several years,—of her thoughts by day, and her dreams by night, was fairly ushered into the world. Its author had been born on the 13th June, 1752, or twenty-five years and six months earlier. Her private journal had been begun ten years previously; and is, we are told, fully as interesting to her family at its commencement as in her more brilliant periods. But the editor has, in the meanwhile, judiciously started with the memorable era in the life of her aunt, marked by the appearance of this first work. The volume before us, and the year 1778 is, therefore, thus playfully commenced by Miss Burney:—

This year was ushered in by a grand and most important event! At the latter end of January, the literary world was favoured with the first publication of the ingenious, learned, and most profound Fanny Burney! I doubt not but this memorable affair will, in future times, mark the period whence chronologers will date the zenith of the polite arts in this island!

This admirable authoress has named her most elaborate performance, EVELINA; or, a Young Lady's Entrance into the World.

Perhaps this may seem a rather bold attempt and title, for a female whose knowledge of the world is very confined, and whose inclinations, as well as situation, incline her to a private and domestic life. All I can urge is, that I have only presumed to trace the accidents and adventures to which a "young woman" is liable; I have not pretended to show the world what it actually is, but what it appears to a girl of seventeen: and so far as that, surely any girl who is past seventeen may safely do! The motto of my excuse shall be taken from Pope's "Temple of Fame:"

> In every work, regard the writer's end;
> None e'er can compass more than they intend.

This canon of Pope's, by the way, never can be applicable to the works of youthful genius. The journal is so completely filled with the author's hopes and fears, triumphs and checks, while "Evelina" was making her way into the world of fashion, that we fear it might become tiresome to any reader, however patient, to hear all or half that people said, and all that Miss Burney hoped, feared, and believed, about her absorbing book, if the theme were not agreeably relieved by the delightful incidental matter introduced. If every one thought as much about their own book as did poor Miss Burney, and passed through such an ordeal, authors, but especially authoresses, were a race dreadfully to be pitied. But a good deal must depend upon mental constitution, and something on the change of times. Rousseau, when hungry and unknown, could not enter a confectioner's shop to buy a cake, for the dread of people looking at him and watching him; and the author of "Evelina" certainly endured more pangs and throes from people speaking of the book, or from not speaking of the book, or not in the right vein, than Shakspeare suffered with all his dramas, or Scott with all his novels. In short, Miss Burney was as high fantastic about her book, as a lover about his mistress,—now thrilling with pleasure at an eulogium,—now in a ferment if the book was alluded to at all; unable to approach where it was in course of reading, or yet to stay away. Next to being married, or, perhaps, something more trying as more unusual, must, to a young, sensitive woman, be the publication of her first book. The example of Miss Burney should teach all ladies in the same perilous circumstances, who are not properly case-hardened, to enjoy the honeymoon of authorship in the shades of privacy, and to keep no journal.

In these degenerate days, the name of a popular novel would be dead, buried, and forgotten, in the time which it took to bring the popular "Evelina" fairly into notice. Between January and July, it crept on and on; and by the end of the latter month, "Daddy Crisp" had been told who was the proud and happy author of the amusing novel which some of the Burneys had, experimentally, read to him; and Dr. Burney had informed Mrs. Thrale, who had admired the work, and recommended it to him, that the author was none other than "our Fanny." Mrs. Thrale instantly wrote a kind and complimentary letter to the proud father, and mentioned that Johnson had said there were passages in the book which might do honour to Richardson. The exulting author breaks out into this delightful, and, we fear, almost last sally of youthful and natural glee:—

But Dr. Johnson's approbation!—it almost crazed me with agreeable surprise—it gave me such a flight of spirits, that I danced a jig to Mr. Crisp, without any preparation, music, or explanation—to his no small amazement and diversion. I left him, however, to make his own comments upon my friskiness, without affording him the smallest assistance.

An invitation to Streatham, the country residence of the Thrales, immediately followed. Miss Burney was forthwith to be a literary lion,—a comparative rarity in those days,—which Mrs. Thrale had the happiness to catch and exhibit first. "She is our own," said that lady to Johnson: "we caught her first." Mrs. Thrale, however, exercised her privileges with true delicacy, and genuine kindness.—And now for a young authoress' first entrance into the world.

London, August.—I have now to write an account of the most consequential day I have spent since my birth: namely, my Streatham visit!

Our journey to Streatham was the least pleasant part of the day; for the roads were dreadfully dusty, and I was really in the fidgets from thinking what my reception might be, and from fearing they would expect a less awkward and backward kind of person than I was sure they would find.

Mr. Thrale's house is white, and very pleasantly situated, in a fine paddock. Mrs. Thrale was strolling about, and came to us as we got out of the chaise.

"Ah," cried she, "I hear Dr. Burney's voice! and you have brought your daughter!—well, now you are good!"

She then received me, taking both my hands, and with mixed politeness and cordiality welcoming me to Streatham, she led me into the house, and addressed herself almost wholly for a few minutes to my father, as if to give me an assurance she did not mean to regard me as a show, or to distress or frighten me by drawing me out. Afterwards she took me up stairs, and showed me the house, and said she had very much wished to see me at Streatham, and should always think herself much obliged to Dr. Burney for his goodness in bringing me, which she looked upon as a very great favour.

But though we were some time together, and though she was so very civil, she did not hint at my book, and I love her much more than ever for her delicacy in avoiding a subject which she could not but see would have greatly embarrassed me.

When we returned to the music-room, we found Miss Thrale was with my father. Miss Thrale is a very fine girl, about fourteen years of age, but cold and reserved, though full of knowledge and intelligence.

Soon after, Mrs. Thrale took me to the library; she talked a little while upon common topics, and then, at last, she mentioned "Evelina."

"Yesterday at supper," said she, "we talked it all over, and discussed all your characters; but Dr. Johnson's favourite is Mr. Smith. He declares the fine gentleman manqué was never better drawn: and he acted him all the evening, saying he was 'all for the ladies!' He repeated whole scenes by heart. I declare I was astonished at him. O you can't imagine how much he was pleased with the book; he 'could not get rid of the rogue,' he told me. But was it not droll," said she, "that I should recommend it to Dr. Burney! and tease him so innocently, to read it!"

I now prevailed upon Mrs. Thrale to let me amuse myself, and she went to dress. I then prowled about to choose some book, and I saw, upon the reading-table, "Evelina."—I had just fixed upon a new translation of Cicero's Lælius, when the library-door was opened, and Mr. Seward entered. I instantly put away my book, because I dreaded being thought studious and affected. He offered his service to find anything for me, and then, in the same breath, ran on to speak of the book with which I had myself "favoured the world!"

When we were summoned to dinner, Mrs. Thrale made my father and me sit on each side of her. I said that I hoped I did not take Dr. Johnson's place—for he had not yet appeared.

"No," answered Mrs. Thrale, "he will sit by you, which I am sure will give him great pleasure."

Soon after we were seated, this great man entered. I have so true a veneration for him, that the very sight of him inspires me with delight and reverence, notwithstanding the cruel infirmities to which he is subject; for he has almost perpetual convulsive movements, either of his hands, lips, feet, or knees, and sometimes of all together.

Mrs. Thrale introduced me to him, and he took his place. We had a noble dinner, and a most elegant dessert. Dr. Johnson, in the middle of dinner, asked Mrs. Thrale what was in some little pies that were near him.

"Mutton," answered she, "so I don't ask you to eat any, because I know you despise it."

"No, madam, no," cried he; "I despise nothing that is good of its sort; but I am too proud now to eat of it. Sitting by Miss Burney makes me very proud to-day!"

There is here and elsewhere, much of Johnson's table-talk; and he certainly appears in a very amiable light, in relation to Miss Burney. He admired her lively talents; and he must have had a fellow-feeling with her position, and many kindly wishes for her success. Besides, she was the favourite of his "mistress."

Mr. Thrale does not appear to have been hurried away by the enthusiasm of his lady. At first, he seems to have been repelling to the young authoress, but he gradually grew in her esteem, and the slow but sure good-liking was mutual. But we must return to the journal:—

How grateful do I feel to this dear Dr. Johnson, for never naming me and the book as belonging one to the other, and yet making an allusion that showed his thoughts led to it, and, at the same time, that seemed to justify the character as being natural! But, indeed, the delicacy I met with from him, and from all the Thrales, was yet more flattering to me than the praise with which I have heard they have honoured my book.

After dinner, when Mrs. Thrale and I left the gentlemen, we had a conversation that to me could not but be delightful, as she was all good humour, spirits, sense, and agreeability. Surely I may make words, when at a loss, if Dr. Johnson does.

However, I shall not attempt to write any more particulars of this day—than which I have never known a happier, because the chief subject that was started and kept up, was an invitation for me to Streatham, and a desire that I might accompany my father thither next week, and stay with them some time.

We left Streatham at about eight o'clock, and Mr. Seward, who handed me into the chaise, added his interest to the rest, that my father would not fail to bring me. In short, I was loaded with civilities from them all; and my ride home was equally happy with the rest of the day, for my kind and most beloved father was so happy in my happiness, and congratulated me so sweetly, that he could, like myself, think on no other subject: and he told me that, after passing through such a house as that, I could have nothing to fear—meaning for my book, my honoured book. . . . . .

Sir Joshua, it seems, vows he would give fifty pounds to know the author! I have also heard, by the means of Charles, that other persons have delared they will find him out!

This intelligence determined me upon going myself to Mr. Lowndes, and discovering what sort of answers he made to such curious inquirers as I found were likely to address him. But as I did not dare trust myself to speak, for I felt that I should not be able to act my part well, I asked my mother to accompany me.

The cunning ladies made nothing of the bookseller.

In a few days, her long visit to Streatham was made; and during this and the next two seasons, much of Miss Burney's time was spent at this hospitable and learned residence, where she met many of the literary notabilities of the day. She also accompanied the Thrales to Brighton, Tunbridge, and Bath; and Mrs. Thrale, in her own way, which, probably, was the best, did all she could to "push her," both as an author, and a young lady.

The friends of Johnson—the Thrales, as is well-known, lived in great magnificence, and with extreme elegance for "people in trade." The social position of Mr. Thrale, the richest of rich London brewers, the Member for Southwark, the husband of Mrs. Thrale, the friend of Johnson, and, moreover, a really worthy, accomplished, and sensible man, would, at first sight, seem to the world to be one to fill people with envy. Yet there is much to console those enjoying peace, health, and a mere competence, when they look more closely into the life of the Thrales.

When we arrived here, Mrs. Thrale showed me my room, which is an exceeding pleasant one, and then conducted me to the library, there to divert myself while she dressed.

Miss Thrale soon joined me: and I begin to like her. Mr. Thrale was neither well nor in spirits all day. Indeed, he seems not to be a happy man, though he has every means of happiness in his power. But I think I have rarely seen a very rich man with a light heart and light spirits.

Dr. Johnson was in the utmost good humour.

On a subsequent day, she writes:—

Dr. Johnson came home to dinner.

In the evening he was as lively and full of wit and sport as I have ever seen him; and Mrs. Thrale and I had him quite to ourselves; for Mr. Thrale came in from giving an election dinner (to which he sent two bucks and six pine apples) so tired, that he neither opened his eyes nor mouth, but fell fast asleep. Indeed, after tea he generally does.

In the following year, Mr. Thrale had the first of those paralytic attacks which soon afterwards cut him off. While the worn and worried millionaire was sleeping, the gay, old, and poor man of letters, Johnson, now past seventy, was lively and talkative enough, and always good-humoured, save when bored by any of the show-people, that Mrs. Thrale delighted to draw to her coterie. On the first night that Miss Burney spent at Streatham, she relates:—

At night Mrs. Thrale asked if I would have anything? I answered "No;" but Dr. Johnson said,

"Yes: she is used, madam, to suppers; she would like an egg or two, and a few slices of ham, or a rasher—a rasher, I believe, would please her better."

How ridiculous! However, nothing could persuade Mrs. Thrale not to have the cloth laid: and Dr. Johnson was so facetious, that he challenged Mr. Thrale to get drunk!

"I wish," said he, "my master would say to me, Johnson, if you will oblige me, you will call for a bottle of Toulon, and then we will set to it, glass for glass, till it is done; and after that, I will say, Thrale, if you will oblige me, you will call for another bottle of Toulon, and then we will set to it, glass for glass, till that is done: and by the time we should have drunk the two bottles, we should be so happy, and such good friends, that we should fly into each other's arms, and both together call for the third!"

I ate nothing, that they might not again use such a ceremony with me. Indeed, their late dinners forbid suppers, especially as Dr. Johnson made me eat cake at tea, for he held it till I took it, with an odd or absent complaisance.

He was extremely comical after supper, and would not suffer Mrs. Thrale and me to go to bed for near an hour after we made the motion. . . . .

Now for this morning's breakfast.

Dr. Johnson, as usual, came last into the library; he was in high spirits, and full of mirth and sport. I had the honour of sitting next to him: and now, all at once, he flung aside his reserve, thinking, perhaps, that it was time I should fling aside mine.

Mrs. Thrale told him that she intended taking me to Mr. T——'s.

"So you ought, madam," cried he; "'tis your business to be cicerone to her."

Then suddenly he snatched my hand, and kissing it,

"Ah!" he added, "they will little think what a Tartar you carry to them!"

"No, that they won't!" cried Mrs. Thrale; "Miss Burney looks so meek and so quiet, nobody would suspect what a comical girl she is; but I believe she has a great deal of malice at heart."

"Oh, she is a toad!" cried the doctor, laughing—"a sly young rogue! with her Smiths and her Branghtons!"

"Why, Dr. Johnson," said Mrs. Thrale, "I hope you are very well this morning! if one may judge by your spirits and good humour, the fever you threatened us with is gone off."

He had complained that he was going to be ill last night.

"Why no, madam, no," answered he; "I am not yet well; I could not sleep at all; there I lay, restless and uneasy, and thinking all the time of Miss Burney. Perhaps I have offended her, thought I; perhaps she is angry; I have seen her but once, and I talked to her of a rasher!—Were you angry?"

I think I need not tell you my answer.

"I have been endeavouring to find some excuse," continued he, "and, as I could not sleep, I got up, and looked for some authority for the word; and I find, madam, it is used by Dryden: in one of his prologues, he says—'And snatch a homely rasher from the coals.' So you must not mind me, madam; I say strange things, but I mean no harm."

I was almost afraid he thought I was really idiot enough to have taken him seriously; but, a few minutes after, he put his hand on my arm, and shaking his head, exclaimed,

"Oh, you are a sly little rogue!—what a Holbourn beau have you drawn!"

"Ay, Miss Burney," said Mrs. Thrale, "the Holbourn beau is Dr. Johnson's favourite; and we have all your characters by heart, from Mr. Smith up to Lady Louisa."

"Oh, Mr. Smith, Mr. Smith is the man!" cried he, laughing violently. "Harry Fielding never drew so good a character!—such a fine varnish of low politeness!—such a struggle to appear a gentleman! Madam, there is no character better drawn anywhere—in any book or by any author."

I almost poked myself under the table. Never did I feel so delicious a confusion since I was born!

It would be impossible, we presume, for any lady to entertain kind wishes for a young female friend, without proposing to marry her well. Several matrimonial plans were started, between jest and earnest, for Miss Burney. One party was a rich booby knight, the nephew and ward of Mr. Thrale, which we mention to introduce a trait which does honour to her heart and judgment; though we do not say what might have been the result, had Sir J—— popped the question.

"Mr. Thrale says nothing would make him half so happy as giving Miss Burney to Sir J—— L——."

Mercy! what an exclamation did I give. I wonder you did not hear me to St. Martin's Street. However, she continued,

"Mr. Thrale says, Miss Burney seems more formed to draw a husband to herself, by her humour when gay, and her good sense when serious, than almost anybody he ever saw."

"He does me much honour," cried I; though I cannot say I much enjoyed such a proof of his good opinion as giving me to Sir J—— L——; but Mr. Thrale is both his uncle and his guardian, and thinks, perhaps, he would do a mutual good office in securing me so much money, and his nephew a decent companion. Oh, if he knew how little I require with regard to money—how much to even bear with a companion! But he was not brought up with such folks as my father, my Daddy Crisp, and my Susan; and does not know what indifference to all things but good society such people as those inspire.

"My master says a very good speech," cried the doctor, "if Miss Burney's husband should have anything in common with herself; but I know not how we can level her with Sir J—— L——, unless she would be content to put her virtues and talents in a scale against his thousands; and poor Sir J—— must give cheating weight even then! However, if we bestow such a prize upon him, he shall settle his whole fortune on her."

Ah! thought I, I am more mercenary than you fancy me, for not even that would bribe me high enough.

Before Dr. Johnson had finished his eloge, I was actually on the ground, for there was no standing it,—or sitting it, rather: and Mrs. Thrale seemed delighted for me.

As we can no more stand more of this than Miss Burney, we skip it, and come to one of Johnson's extraordinary opinions of a book written by a man who was great, simply because he did not know the value of his own resources. "Mrs. Thrale gave,

Me a long and very entertaining account of Dr. Goldsmith, who was intimately known here; but in speaking of "The Good-natured Man," when I extolled my favourite Croaker, I found that admirable character was a downright theft from Dr. Johnson. Look at the "Rambler," and you will find Suspirius is the man; and that not merely the idea, but the particulars of the character, are all stolen thence!

While we were yet reading this "Rambler," Dr. Johnson came in: we told him what we were about.

"Ah, madam!" cried he, "Goldsmith was not scrupulous; but he would have been a great man had he known the real value of his own internal resources."

"Miss Burney," said Mrs. Thrale, "is fond of his 'Vicar of Wakefield:' and so am I;—don't you like it, Sir?"

"No, madam, it is very faulty; there is nothing of real life in it, and very little of nature. It is a mere fanciful performance."

He then seated himself upon a sofa, and calling to me, said "Come—Evelina—come and sit by me."

I obeyed; and he took me almost in his arms—that is, one of his arms, for one would go three times, at least, round me—and, half laughing, half serious, he charged me to "be a good girl!"

"But, my dear," continued he with a very droll look, "what makes you so fond of the Scotch? I don't like you for that—I hate these Scotch, and so must you. I wish Branghton had sent the dog to jail! That Scotch dog, Macartney."

The Doctor liked at all times "to astonish the natives." He had by this time made his celebrated journey to the Hebrides, and he paid Miss Burney the compliment of wishing she had been of the party. After the Doctor, who piqued himself at all times upon his gallantry and politeness, had been super-refined at Streatham, he became a critic in the dress of fine ladies; without, however, forgetting very different aspects of many-coloured female life. The following is peculiarly rich; and we like the Streatham ladies all the better, for enjoying Johnson's rollicking description of their frail sisters.

We got home late, and had the company of Mr. E——, and of Mr. Rose Fuller, a young man who lives at Streatham, and is nephew of the famous Rose Fuller: and whether Dr. Johnson did not like them, or whether he was displeased that we went out, or whether he was not well, I know not; but he never opened his mouth, except in answer to a question, till he bid us good night.

Saturday morning.—Dr. Johnson was again all himself; and so civil to me!—even admiring how I dressed myself! Indeed, it is well I have so much of his favour; for it seems he always speaks his mind concerning the dress of ladies; and all ladies who are here obey his injunctions implicitly, and alter whatever he disapproves. This is a part of his character that much surprises me: but notwithstanding he is sometimes so absent, and always so near-sighted, he scrutinizes into every part of almost everybody's appearance. They tell me of a Miss Brown, who often visits here, and who has a slovenly way of dressing. "And when she comes down in a morning," says Mrs. Thrale, "her hair will be all loose, and her cap half off; and then Dr. Johnson, who sees something is wrong, and does not know where the fault is, concludes it is in the cap, and says, 'My dear, what do you wear such a vile cap for?' 'I'll change it, Sir,' cries the poor girl, 'if you don't like it.' 'Ay, do,' he says; and away runs poor Miss Brown; but when she gets on another, its the same thing, for the cap has nothing to do with the fault. And then she wonders Dr. Johnson should not like the cap, for she thinks it very pretty. And so on with her gown, which he also makes her change; but if the poor girl were to change through all her wardrobe, unless she could put her things on better, he would still find fault."

When Dr. Johnson was gone, she told me of my mother's being obliged to change her dress.

"Now," said she, "Mrs. Burney had on a very pretty linen jacket and coat, and was going to church; but Dr. Johnson, who, I suppose, did not like her in a jacket, saw something was the matter, and so found fault with the linen: and he looked and peered, and then said, 'Why, madam, this won't do! you must not go to church so!' So away went poor Mrs. Burney and changed her gown! And when she had done so, he did not like it, but he did not know why; so he told her she should not wear a black hat and cloak in summer! Oh, how he did bother poor Mrs. Burney! and himself too, for if the things had been put on to his mind, he would have taken no notice of them." . . . . . .

And now let me try to recollect an account he gave us of certain celebrated ladies of his acquaintance: an account which, had you heard from himself, would have made you die with laughing, his manner is so peculiar, and enforces his humour so originally.

It was begun by Mrs. Thrale's apologising to him for troubling him with some question she thought trifling—O, I remember! We had been talking of colours, and of the fantastic names given to them, and why the palest lilac should be called a soupir étouffé; and when Dr. Johnson came in she applied to him.

"Why, madam," said he with wonderful readiness, "it is called a stifled sigh because it is checked in its progress, and only half a colour."

I could not help expressing my amazement at his universal readiness upon all subjects, and Mrs. Thrale said to him,

"Sir, Miss Burney wonders at your patience with such stuff; but I tell her you are used to me, for I believe I torment you with more foolish questions than anybody else dares do."

"No, madam," said he, "you don't torment me—you teaze me, indeed, sometimes."

"Ay, so I do, Dr. Johnson; and I wonder you bear with my nonsense."

"No, madam, you never talk nonsense; you have as much sense, and more wit, than any woman I know!"

"Oh," cried Mrs. Thrale, blushing, "it is my turn to go under the table this morning, Miss Burney!"

"And yet," continued the doctor, with the most comical look, "I have known all the wits, from Mrs. Montague down to Bet Flint!"

"Bet Flint!" cried Mrs. Thrale; "pray who is she?"

"Oh, a fine character, madam! She was habitually a slut and a drunkard, and occasionally a thief and a harlot."

"And, for Heaven's sake, how came you to know her?"

"Why, madam, she figured in the literary world, too! Bet Flint wrote her own life, and called herself Cassandra, and it was in verse—it began:

'When Nature first ordained my birth,
A diminutive I was born on earth:
And then I came from a dark abode,
Into a gay and gaudy world.'

So Bet brought me her verses to correct; but I gave her half-a-crown, and she liked it as well. Bet had a fine spirit—she advertised for a husband, but she had no success, for she told me no man aspired to her! Then she hired very handsome lodgings and a footboy; and she got a harpsichord, but Bet could not play; however, she put herself in fine attitudes, and drummed."

Then he gave an account of another of these geniuses, who called herself by some fine name, I have forgotten what.

"She had not quite the same stock of virtue," continued he, "nor the same stock of honesty as Bet Flint; but I suppose she envied her accomplishments, for she was so little moved by the power of harmony, that while Bet Flint thought she was drumming very divinely, the other jade had her indicted for a nuisance!"

"And pray what became of her, Sir?"

"Why, madam, she stole a quilt from the man of the house, and he had her taken up: but Bet Flint had a spirit not to be subdued; so when she found herself obliged to go to jail, she ordered a sedan chair, and bid her footboy walk before her. However, the boy proved refractory, for he was ashamed, though his mistress was not."

"And did she ever get out of jail again, Sir?"

"Yes, madam; when she came to her trial, the judge acquitted her. 'So now,' she said to me, 'the quilt is my own, and now I'll make a petticoat of it.' Oh, I loved Bet Flint!"

Oh, how we all laughed! Then he gave an account of another lady, who called herself Laurinda, and who also wrote verses and stole furniture; but he had not the same affection for her, he said, though she too "was a lady who had high notions of honour."

Then followed the history of another, who called herself Hortensia, and who walked up and down the park repeating a book of Virgil.

"But," said he, "though I know her story, I never had the good fortune to see her."

After this he gave us an account of the famous Mrs. Pinkethman; "And she," he said, "told me she owed all her misfortunes to her wit; for she was so unhappy as to marry a man who thought himself also a wit, though I believe she gave him not implicit credit for it, but it occasioned much contradiction and ill-will."

"Bless me, Sir!" cried Mrs. Thrale, "how can all these vagabonds contrive to get at you, of all people?"

"O the dear creatures!" cried he, laughing heartily, "I can't but be glad to see them!"

"Why I wonder, Sir, you never went to see Mrs. Rudd among the rest?"

"Why, madam, I believe I should," said he, "if it was not for the newspapers; but I am prevented many frolics that I should like very well, since I am become such a theme for the papers."

Now would you ever have imagined this? Bet Flint, it seems, once took Kitty Fisher to see him, but to his no little regret he was not at home. "And Mrs. Williams," he added, "did not love Bet Flint, but Bet Flint made herself very easy about that."

How Mr. Crisp would have enjoyed this account! He gave it all with so droll a solemnity, and it was all so unexpected, that Mrs. Thrale and I were both almost equally diverted. . . . . .

Since we are among the female wits, we may as well finish them. The anecdotes are not new to the world, yet they are new from the pen of Miss Burney.

Mrs. Thrale told a story of Hannah More, which I think exceeds, in its severity, all the severe things I have yet heard of Dr. Johnson's saying.

When she was introduced to him, not long ago, she began singing his praise in the warmest manner, and talking of the pleasure and the instruction she had received from his writings, with the highest encomiums. For some time he heard her with that quietness which a long use of praise has given him: she then redoubled her strokes, and, as Mr. Seward calls it, peppered still more highly: till, at length, he turned suddenly to her, with a stern and angry countenance, and said, "Madam, before you flatter a man so grossly to his face, you should consider whether or not your flattery is worth his having."

Afterwards in conversation, he said, that if "Little Burney" served him as Hannah More did, he should say the same to her. Nor, much as he caressed "Dear Burney," and praised her "honoured book," would he be insincere with her. This is the rest of the dialogue:—

Mrs. T.—If you are spoilt, we can only say, nothing in the world is so pleasant as being spoilt.

Dr. J.—No, no; Burney will not be spoilt: she knows too well what praise she has a claim to, and what not, to be in any danger of spoiling.

F. B.—I do, indeed, believe I shall never be spoilt at Streatham, for it is the last place where I can feel of any consequence.

Mrs. T.—Well, Sir, she is our Miss Burney, however; we were the first to catch her, and now we have got, we will keep her. And so she is all our own.

Dr. J.—Yes, I hope she is; I should be very sorry to lose Miss Burney.

F. B.—Oh, dear! how can two such people sit and talk such——

Mrs. T.—Such stuff, you think? but Dr. Johnson's love——

Dr. J.—Love? no, I don't entirely love her yet; I must see more of her first; I have much too high an opinion of her to flatter her. I have, indeed, seen nothing of her but what is fit to be loved, but I must know her more. I admire her, and greatly too.

F. B.—Well this is a very new style to me! I have long enough had reason to think myself loved, but admiration is perfectly new to me.

Dr. J.—I admire her for her observation, for her good sense, for her humour, for her discernment, for her manner of expressing them, and for all her writing talents.

At Miss Burney's first interview with the brilliant and vivacious Mrs. Cholmondely, she thus finishes her sketch of Hannah More:—

After this, Miss More was mentioned; and I was asked what I thought of her?

"Don't be formal with me; if you are, I sha'n't like you!"

"I have no hope that you will any way!"

"Oh, fie! fie! but as to Miss More—I don't like her at all; that is, I detest her! She does nothing but flatter and fawn; and then she thinks ill of nobody. Don't you hate a person who thinks ill of nobody!"

My father then told what Dr. Johnson had said to her on the occasion of her praising him.

"This rejoices, this does me good!" cried she; "I would have given the world to have heard that. Oh, there's no supporting the company of professed flatterers. She gives me such doses of it, that I cannot endure her; but I always sit still and make no answer, but receive it as if I thought it my due: that is the only way to quiet her. She is really detestable. I hope, Miss Burney, you don't think I admire all geniuses? The only person I flatter," continued she, "is Garrick; and he likes it so much, that it pays one by the spirits it gives him. Other people that I like, I dare not flatter!"

A rat-tat-tat-tat ensued, and the Earl of Harcourt was announced.

Though an adorer of "our superiors," a very beadle of "social order," Johnson was somewhat of a democrat in literature, even in spite of himself. His dislike of Mrs. Montagu sprang as much from her overweening airs, as from what he considered her inordinate or shallow pretensions to learning:—

Mrs. T.—To-morrow, Sir, Mrs. Montagu dines here, and then you will have talk enough.

Dr. Johnson began to see-saw with a countenance strongly expressive of inward fun; and after enjoying it some time in silence, he suddenly, and with great animation, turned to me and cried,—

"Down with her, Burney!—down with her!—spare her not!—attack her, fight her, and down with her at once! You are a rising wit, and she is at the top; and when I was beginning the world, and was nothing and nobody, the joy of my life was to fire at all the established wits! and then everybody loved to halloo me on. But there is no game now; everybody would be glad to see me conquered: but then, when I was new, to vanquish the great ones was all the delight of my poor little dear soul! So at her, Burney—at her, and down with her!"

Oh, how we were all amused! By the way I must tell you that Mrs. Montagu is in very great estimation here, even with Dr. Johnson himself, when others do not praise her improperly. Mrs. Thrale ranks her as the first of women in the literary way. I should have told you that Miss Gregory, daughter of the Gregory who wrote the "Letters," or "Legacy of Advice," lives with Mrs. Montagu, and was invited to accompany her.

"Mark, now," said Dr. Johnson, "if I contradict her to-morrow. I am determined, let her say what she will, that I will not contradict her."

Mrs. T.—Why, to be sure, Sir, you did put her a little out of countenance last time she came. Yet you were neither rough, nor cruel, nor ill-natured; but still, when a lady changes colour, we imagine her feelings are not quite composed.

Dr. J.—Why, madam, I won't answer that I sha'n't contradict her again, if she provokes me as she did then; but a less provocation I will withstand. I believe I am not high in her good graces already; and I begin, (added he, laughing heartily,) to tremble for my admission into her new house. I doubt I shall never see the inside of it.

. . . . . .

We could not prevail with him to stay till Mrs. Montagu arrived, though, by appointment, she came very early. She and Miss Gregory came by one o'clock.

There was no party to meet her.

She is middle-sized, very thin, and looks infirm; she has a sensible and penetrating countenance, and the air and manner of a woman accustomed to being distinguished, and of great parts. Dr. Johnson, who agrees in this, told us that a Mrs. Hervey, of his acquaintance, says, she can remember Mrs. Montagu trying for this same air and manner. Mr. Crisp has said the same: however, nobody can now impartially see her, and not confess that she has extremely well succeeded.

Mrs. Montagu, though not a particular admirer of the book, kindly proposed to marry its author to Sir Joshua Reynolds. She and the then Attorney-general, Mr. Wedderburne, thought the Branghtons, in whom Johnson delighted, insufferably bad—"strange low creatures."

There are, in the Diary, many sketches of characters and of groups, quite as good as anything to be found in Miss Burney's novels; and, moreover, fac-similes. We shall try to select a few of those cabinet pictures of the bon ton of the middle and higher classes in those olden days; and of Bath and Tunbridge literary and fashionable society.

Sunday we went to Streatham church, and afterwards to visit the family of the P——s, who now live in B—— House, which is about half-a-mile off. The papa I did not see; the mamma is a civil, simple woman, and the daughters are pretty, well dressed, trifling, and furiously extravagant.

While Mrs. Thrale and I were dressing, and, as usual, confabbing, a chaise drove into the park, and word was brought that Mr. Seward was arrived.

"You don't know much of Mr. Seward, Miss Burney?" said Mrs. Thrale.

I could have told her I wished he had not known much of me; but her maid was in my way, and I only said "No."

"But I hope you will know more of him," said she, "for I want you to take to him. He is a charming young man, though not without oddities. Few people do him justice, because, as Dr. Johnson calls him, he is an abrupt young man; but he has excellent qualities, and an excellent understanding. He has the misfortune to be an hypochondriac; so he runs about the world to borrow spirits, and to forget himself. But after all, if his disorders are merely imaginary, the imagination is disorder sufficient, and therefore I am sorry for him."

The day passed very agreeably, but I have no time for particulars. I fight very shy with Mr. Seward, and as he has a great share of sense and penetration, and not a little one of pride and reserve, he takes the hint; and I believe he would as soon bite off his own nose as mention "Evelina" again. And, indeed, now that the propriety of his after-conduct has softened me in his favour, I begin to think of him much in the same way Mrs. Thrale does, for he is very sensible, very intelligent, and very well bred.

Monday was the day for our great party; and the doctor came home, at Mrs. Thrale's request, to meet them.

The party consisted of Mr. C——, who was formerly a timber-merchant, but having amassed a fortune of one million of pounds, he has left off business. He is a good-natured, busy sort of man.

Mrs. C——, his lady, a sort of Mrs. Nobody.

Mr. N——, another rich business leaver-off.

Mrs. N——, his lady; a pretty sort of woman, who was formerly a pupil of Dr. Hawkesworth. I had a great deal of talk with her about him, and about my favourite Miss Kinnaird, whom she knew very well.

Mr. George and Mr. Thomas N——, her sons-in-law.

Mr. R——, of whom I know nothing, but that he married into Mr. Thrale's family.

Lady Ladd; I ought to have begun with her. I beg her ladyship a thousand pardons—though if she knew my offence, I am sure I should not obtain one. She is own sister to Mr. Thrale. She is a tall and stout woman, has an air of mingled dignity and haughtiness, both of which wear off in conversation. She dresses very youthful and gaily, and attends to her person with no little complacency. She appears to me uncultivated in knowledge, though an adept in the manners of the world, and all that. She chooses to be much more lively than her brother; but liveliness sits as awkwardly upon her as her pink ribbons. In talking her over with Mrs. Thrale, who has a very proper regard for her, but who, I am sure, cannot be blind to her faults, she gave me another proof to those I have already had, of the uncontrolled freedom of speech which Dr. Johnson exercises to everybody, and which everybody receives quietly from him. Lady Ladd has been very handsome, but is now, I think, quite ugly—at least she has a sort of face I like not. Well, she was a little while ago dressed in so showy a manner as to attract the doctor's notice, and when he had looked at her some time, he broke out aloud into this quotation:

"With patches, paint, and jewels on;
Sure Phillis is not twenty-one!
But if at night you Phillis see,
The dame at least is forty-three."

I don't recollect the verses exactly, but such was their purport.

"However," said Mrs. Thrale, "Lady Ladd took it very good-naturedly, and only said,

"'I know enough of that forty-three—I don't desire to hear any more of it!'"

Miss Moss, a pretty girl, who played and sung, to the great fatigue of Mrs. Thrale; Mr. Rose Fuller, Mr. Embry, Mr. Seward, Dr. Johnson, the three Thrales, and myself, close the party.

We had a sumptuous dinner of three courses, and a most superb dessert. I shall give no account of the day, because our common days are so much more worth recounting.

I had the honour of making tea and coffee for all this set, and upon my word I was pretty well tired of it. In the evening the company divided pretty much into parties, and almost everybody walked upon the gravel walk before the windows. I was going to have joined some of them, when Dr. Johnson stopped me, and asked how I did.

"I was afraid, Sir," cried I, "you did not intend to know me again, for you have not spoken to me before since your return from town."

"My dear," cried he, taking both my hands, "I was not sure of you, I am so near sighted, and I apprehended making some mistake."

Then drawing me very unexpectedly towards him, he actually kissed me!

To be sure, I was a little surprised, having no idea of such facetiousness from him. However, I was glad nobody was in the room but Mrs. Thrale, who stood close to us, and Mr. Embry, who was lounging on a sofa at the furthest end of the room. Mrs. Thrale laughed heartily, and said she hoped I was contented with his amends for not knowing me sooner.

One day afterwards that she met Johnson at Sir Joshua Reynolds', she writes Mrs. Thrale, that he gallantly offered to escort her to Grub Street—

To see the ruins of the house demolished there in the late riots, by a mob that, as he observed, could be no friend to the Muses! He inquired if I had ever yet visited Grub Street? but was obliged to restrain his anger when I answered, "No," because he acknowledged he had never paid his respects to it himself. "However," says he, "you and I, Burney, will go together; we have a very good right to go: so we'll visit the mansions of our progenitors, and take up our own freedom together."

There's for you, madam, what can be grander?

The sketches given of Bath society are clever and complete. These were the palmy days of Bath, when Anstey, and Jerningham ("a pink and white poet,") Dr. Porteous the Bishop of Chester, and afterwards Bishop of London, the Bowdlers,—Holy Family the first,—Mrs. Dobson, and many other eminences were among the residents; and among the visiters, Mrs. Montagu, Mrs. Carter, the Thrales, and Miss Burney; with Lady Miller of Bath Easton, and her immortal vase close at hand.

We give precedence to a lady, who, in her own opinion, was well entitled to take it.

Mrs. K—— is a Welsh lady, of immense fortune, who has a house in the Crescent, and lives in a most magnificent style. She is about fifty, very good humoured, well bred, and civil, and her waist does not measure above a hogshead. She is not very deep, I must own; but what of that? If all were wits, where would be the admirers at them?

She received me very graciously, having particularly desired Mrs. Thrale to bring me: for she is an invalid, and makes no visits herself. She told me she knew my uncle at Shrewsbury very well.

"And pray, ma'am," says she, "how does Dr. Burney do?"—"Very well," I thanked her.—"Do you know Dr. Burney, ma'am?" said Mr. Thrale.—"No, Sir, but I know his book. I think it's vastly pretty."—"Why, yes, ma'am," said Mrs. Thrale, "Dr. Burney has found out the art of making all people like both him and his book."

It is comical enough to see how she is always provoked at hearing these underlings praise him. She is ready to kill them for liking him, and has a whimsical notion that their applause degrades him.

"Yes, ma'am," answered Mrs. K——, "and there is somebody else, too, that has made all people like her book."—"True, ma'am; Dr. Burney's daughter inherits that art from him."—"O, ma'am, I was so entertained! Oh, dear! and I was quite ill too, ma'am, quite ill when I read it. But for all that—why, why, ma'am, I was as eager, and I wanted sadly to see the author."

. . . . . .

Afterwards, who should be announced but the author of the "Bath Guide," Mr. Anstey. I was now all eye; but not being able to be all ear, I heard but little that he said, and that little was scarce worth hearing. He had no opportunity of shining, and was as much like another man as you can imagine. It is very unfair to expect wonders from a man all at once; yet it was impossible to help being disappointed, because his air, look, and manner, are mighty heavy and unfavourable to him.

But here see the pride of riches! and see whom the simple Mrs. K—— can draw to her house! However, her party was not thrown away upon her,—as I ought to say, because highly honoured by her exultingly whispering to Mrs. Thrale.

"Now, ma'am, now, Mrs. Thrale, I'm quite happy; for I'm surrounded with people of sense! Here's Mrs. Montagu, and Mrs. Thrale, and Mr. Anstey, and Miss Burney. I'm quite surrounded, as I may say, by people of sense!" . . . . . .

Wednesday was a sort of grand day. We all dined and spent the evening at Mrs. K——'s. Our party was Mrs. Montagu, Mrs. Poyntz, Miss Gregory, Miss Owen, Dr. Maningham, and Mr. Hunt.

The ladies you have heard of enough. Of the men, Dr. Maningham is very good humoured, fat, and facetious. He asked me very much after my dear father, whom he met with at Buxton, and after the Denoyers, with whom he seemed extremely intimate; and so, indeed, he was well inclined to be with me, for he shook me by the wrist twenty times in the course of the day. Mr. Hunt is a young man of very large independent fortune, very ugly, very priggish, a violent talker, and a self-piquer upon immense good breeding.

Mrs. K—— took the first opportunity that presented itself, to make me, in a low voice, abundance of civil speeches about "Evelina." All the loud speeches were made by Mr. Hunt, who talked incessantly, and of nothing but dancing! Poor Mrs. Montagu looked tired to death, and could not get in a word;—it was really ridiculous to see how this coxcomb silenced her.

When everybody was gone but ourselves and Miss Gregory, we Misses growing somewhat facetious in a corner, Mrs. K—— good humouredly called out, "I'm sure, ladies, I am very glad to see you so merry. Ah! one of you young ladies,—I don't say which—has given me a deal of entertainment! I'm sure I could never leave off reading; and when Miss Owen came into my room, says I, don't speak a word to me, for I'm so engaged! I could not bear to be stopped—and then, Mrs. Thrale, I had such a prodigious desire to see her—for I said, says I, 'I'm sure she must have a good heart.—Here's such fine sentiments,' says I.—Oh! it's a sweet book!"

"Ay, ma'am," said Mrs. Thrale; "and we that know her, like her yet better than her book."

"Well, ma'am," answered she, "and I that know the book best,—to be sure I like that."

"Then, ma'am, you show your taste; and I my judgment."

"And what must I show?" cried I—"my back, I believe, and run away, if you go on so!"

Here, then, it stopped; but when I was taking leave, Mrs. K—— repeated her praises, and added,

"I'm sure, ma'am, you must have a very happy way of thinking; and then there's Mrs. Duval,—such a natural character!"

Such scenes and patronesses must have afforded Johnson's "sly litttle Burney," "the Tartar," let loose among them, an infinite deal of amusement, although disgust was sometimes inevitable. What follows is still better. In several novels, we have seen such conversaziones delineated; but how far does truth exceed fiction!

Friday was a busy and comical day. We had an engagement of long standing, to drink tea with Miss Lawes, whither we all went, and a most queer evening did we spend.

When we entered, she and all her company were looking out of the window; however, she found us out in a few minutes, and made us welcome in a strain of delight and humbleness at receiving us, that put her into a flutter of spirits, from which she never recovered all the evening.

Her fat, jolly mother, took her seat at the top of the room; next to her sat a lady in a riding habit, whom I soon found to be Mrs. Dobson; below her sat a gentlewoman, prim, upright, neat, and mean; and, next to her, sat another, thin, hagged, wrinkled, fine, and tawdry, with a thousand frippery ornaments and old-fashioned furbelows; she was excellently nicknamed, by Mrs. Thrale, the Duchess of Monmouth. On the opposite side was placed Mrs. Thrale, and, next to her, Queeny [Miss Thrale.] For my own part, little liking the appearance of the set, and half-dreading Mrs. Dobson, from whose notice I wished to escape, I had made up myself to one of the now-deserted windows, and Mr. Thrale had followed me. As to Miss L——, she came to stand by me, and her panic, I fancy, returned, for she seemed quite panting with a desire to say something, and an incapacity to utter it. It proved happy for me that I had taken this place, for in a few minutes the mean, neat woman, whose name was Aubrey, asked if Miss Thrale was Miss Thrale! "Yes, ma'am."—"And pray, ma'am, who is that other young lady?" "A daughter of Dr. Burney's, ma'am."—"What!" cried Mrs. Dobson, "is that the lady that has favoured us with that excellent novel!" "Yes, ma'am."—Then burst forth a whole volley from all at once. "Very extraordinary, indeed!" said one—"Dear heart, who'd have thought it!" said another—"I never saw the like in my life!" said a third. And Mrs. Dobson, entering more in detail, began praising it through, but chiefly Evelina herself, which she said was the most natural character she had ever met in any book.

Meantime, I had almost thrown myself out of the window, in my eagerness to get out of the way of this gross and noisy applause; but poor Miss L——, having stood quite silent a long time, simpering and nodding her assent to what was said, at last broke forth with—

"I assure you, ma'am, we've been all quite delighted: that is, we had read it before, but only now upon reading it again—" I thanked her, and talked of something else, and she took the hint to have done; but said,—"Pray, ma'am, will you favour me with your opinion of Mrs. Dobson's works?"—A pretty question, in a room so small that even a whisper would be heard from one end to another! However, I truly said I had not read them.

Mr. and Mrs. Whalley now arrived, and I was obliged to go to a chair—when such staring followed; they could not have opened their eyes wider when they first looked at the Guildhall giants! I looked with all the gravity and demureness possible, in order to keep them from coming plump to the subject again, and, indeed this, for a while, kept them off.—Soon after Dr. Harrington arrived, which closed our party. Miss L—— went whispering to him, and then came up to me with a look of dismay, and said,—"O, ma'am, I'm so prodigiously concerned; Mr. Henry won't come!"—"Who, ma'am?" "Mr. Henry, ma'am, the doctor's son. But, to be sure, he does not know you are here, or else—but I'm quite concerned, indeed, for here now we shall have no young gentlemen!"—"O, all the better," cried I, "I hope we shall be able to do very well without." "O yes, ma'am, to be sure. I don't mean for any common young gentlemen; but Mr. Henry, ma'am, it's quite another thing;—however, I think he might have come; but I did not happen to mention in my card that you was to be here, and so—but I think it serves him right for not coming to see me."

Soon after the mamma hobbled to me, and began a furious panegyric upon my book, saying, at the same time,—"I wonder, Miss, how you could get at them low characters. As to the lords and ladies, that's no wonder at all; but as to t'others, why, I have not stirred, night nor morning, while I've been reading it: if I don't wonder how you could be so clever!"

And much, much more. And, scarcely had she unburthened herself, ere Miss L—— trotted back to me, crying, in a tone of mingled triumph and vexation,—"Well, ma'am, Mr. Henry will be very much mortified when he knows who has been here; that he will, indeed: however, I'm sure he deserves it!" . . . . . .

Soon after this, a chair next mine being vacated, Mrs. Dobson came and seated herself in it, to my somewhat dismay, as I knew what would follow. Plump she came upon her subject, saying,—

"Miss Burney, I am come to thank you for the vast entertainment you have given me. I am quite happy to see you; I wished to see you very much. It's a charming book, indeed; the characters are vastly well supported!"

In short, she ran on for half-an-hour, I believe, in nothing but plain, unadorned, downright praise; while I could only bow, and say she was very good, and long to walk out of the room.

When she had run herself out of breath, and exhausted her store of compliments, she began telling me of her own affairs; talked, without any introduction or leading speeches, of her translations, and took occasion to acquaint me she had made £400 of her "Petrarca." She then added some other anecdotes, which I have not time to mention, and then said,—

"Miss Burney, I shall be very happy to wait upon you and Mrs. Thrale. I have longed to know Mrs. Thrale these many years: pray, do you think I may wait upon you both on Sunday morning?"

"To be sure, we shall be very happy."

"Well, then, if you don't think it will be an intrusion—but will you be so good as to mention it to Mrs. Thrale?"

I was obliged to say "Yes;" and soon after she quitted me, to go and give another dose of flummery to Mrs. Thrale.

I was not two minutes relieved ere Miss L—— returned, to again assure me how glad she was that Mr. Henry would be mortified. The poor lady was quite heart-broken that we did not meet.

The next vacation of my neighbouring chair was filled by Mrs. L——, who brought me some flowers: and when I thanked her, said,—

"O miss, you deserve everything! You've writ the best and prettiest book. That lord there—I forget his name, that marries her at last—what a fine gentleman he is! You deserve everything for drawing such a character; and then Miss Elena, there, Miss Belmont, as she is at last—what a noble couple of 'em you have put together! As to that t'other lord I was glad he had not her, for I see he had nothing but a bad design."

Well, have you enough of this ridiculous evening! Mrs. Thrale and I have mutually agreed that we neither of us ever before had so complete a dish of gross flattery as this night. Yet let me be fair, and tell you that this Mrs. Dobson, though coarse, low-bred, forward, self-sufficient, and flaunting, seems to have a strong and masculine understanding, and parts that, had they been united with modesty, or fostered by education, might have made her a shining and agreeable woman; but she has evidently kept low company, which she has risen above in literature, but not in manners.

At the "Whalleys," whoever they may have been, Miss Burney was introduced by Mrs. Thrale to Lady Miller, the high-priestess of the mysteries of Bath Easton, and its far-famed Vase, or dainty dishful of rhymes. Scottish people never heard of anything approaching these rites, save the kindred fooleries perpetrated by the late Earl of Buchan, on the birthday of Thomson. Miss Burney was not only a shrewd observer but, when not speaking of those who could use the freedom to read her journal over her shoulder, she was just and candid. Her estimate of the tremendous blue of Bath Easton, is, therefore, to be received implicitly.

Do you know now, that notwithstanding Bath Easton is so much laughed at in London, nothing here is more tonish than to visit Lady Miller, who is extremely curious in her company, admitting few people who are not of rank or of fame, and excluding of those all who are not people of character very unblemished.

Some time after, Lady Miller took a seat next mine on the sofa, to play at cards, and was excessively civil indeed—scolded Mrs. Thrale for not sooner making us acquainted, and had the politeness to offer to take me to the balls herself, as she heard Mr. and Mrs. Thrale did not choose to go.

After all this, it is hardly fair to tell you what I think of her. However, the truth is, I always, to the best of my intentions, speak honestly what I think of the folks I see, without being biassed either by their civilities or neglect: and that you will allow is being a very faithful historian.

Well, then, Lady Miller, is a round, plump, coarse-looking dame of about forty, and while all her aim is to appear an elegant woman of fashion, all her success is to seem an ordinary woman in very common life, with fine clothes on. Her manners are bustling, her air is mock-important, and her manners very inelegant.

So much for the lady of Bath Easton; who, however, seems extremely good-natured, and who is, I am sure, extremely civil.

We long to direct the attention of the modern Pharisees, to the manner in which a bishop, who had preached in the morning "at the request of Mrs. Thrale," concluded the amusements of the sacred day. There is a just medium in everything; and among others, in Sabbath observances, the Bishop of Peterborough's Sunday being as far on the one side of right, as that which the "unco gude" enjoin on their poorer neighbours, whatever license they may take for themselves, is on the other. But this merry Sunday evening, and the Curiosity Shop, which a humourist had fitted up for a dwelling, full of mechanical tricks and surprises, we must waive from profound veneration for the Muses of Bath Easton and "Vase time."

Thursday, June 8, 1780.—We went to Bath Easton. Mrs. Lambart went with us.

The house is charmingly situated, well fitted up, convenient, and pleasant, and not large, but commodious and elegant. Thursday is still their public day for company, though the business of the vase is over for this season.

The room into which we were conducted was so much crowded we could hardly make our way. Lady Miller came to the door, and as she had first done to the rest of us, took my hand, and led me up to a most prodigious fat old lady, and introduced me to her. This was Mrs. Riggs, her ladyship's mother, who seems to have Bath Easton and its owners under her feet.

I was smiled upon with a graciousness designedly marked, and seemed most uncommonly welcome. Mrs. Riggs looked as if she could have shouted for joy at sight of me! She is mighty merry and facetious. Sir John was very quiet, but very civil.

I saw the place appropriated for the vase, but at this time it was removed. As it was hot, Sir John Miller offered us to walk round the house, and see his greenhouse, &c. So away we set off, Harriet Bowdler accompanying me, and some others following. . . . .

Afterwards, when we returned into the house, we found another room filled with company. Among those that I knew were the Caldwells, the Grenvilles, some of the Bowdlers, Mr. Wyndham, and Miss J——.

This Miss J—— had, when I last met her at Mrs. Lambart's, desired to be introduced to me, as Mrs. Lambart told me, who performed that ceremony; for Mrs. Lambart, with whom I am in no small favour, always makes me the most consequential: and I found she was Mrs. Rishton's old friend, and therefore all I remember hearing of her gave me no desire to make her my new one. However, nothing convinced me more that I was the ton at Bath, than her making this overture, for everything I ever heard of her proved her insolent pride. Besides, Beau Travell has spoken very highly of me! So my fame is now made, and Mrs. G——, who had passed me when she entered the room at Bath Easton while I was engaged in conversation with Lady Miller, afterwards suddenly came up, and with a look of equal surprise and pleasure at sight of me, most graciously and smilingly addressed me. My coldness in return to all these sickening, heartless, ton-led people, I try not to repress, though, to treat them with such respect as their superior stations fairly claim, I would not for the world neglect.

Some time after, while I was talking with Miss W—— and Harriet Bowdler, Mrs. Riggs came up to us, and with an expression of comical admiration, fixed her eyes upon me, and for some time amused herself with apparently watching me. Mrs. Lambart, who was at cards, turned round and begged me to give her her cloak, for she felt rheumatic; I could not readily find it, and after looking some time, I was obliged to give her my own; but while I was hunting, Mrs. Riggs followed me, laughing, nodding, and looking much delighted, and every now and then saying,—

"That's right, Evelina!—Ah, look for it, Evelina!—Evelina always did so—she always looked for people's cloaks, and was obliging and well-bred!"

I grinned a little to be sure, but tried to escape her, by again getting between Miss W—— and Harriet Bowdler; but Mrs. Riggs still kept opposite to me, expressing, from time to time, by uplifted hands and eyes, comical applause.

Harriet Bowdler modestly mumbled some praise, but addressed it to Miss Thrale. I begged a truce, and retired to a chair in a corner, at the request of Miss W—— to have a tête-à-tête, for which, however, her strange levity gave me no great desire. . . . . .

Our conversation would have lasted till leave-taking, but for our being interrupted by Miss Miller, a most beautiful little girl of ten years old.

Miss W—— begged her to sing us a French song. She coquetted, but Mrs. Riggs came to us, and said if I wished it, I did her grand-daughter great honour, and she insisted upon her obedience. The little girl laughed and complied, and we went into another room to hear her, followed by the Misses Caldwell. She sung in a pretty childish manner enough.

When we became more intimate, she said,—

"Ma'am, I have a great favour to request of you, if you please!"

I begged to know what it was, and assured her I would grant it; and to be out of the way of these misses, I led her to the window.

"Ma'am," said the little girl, "will you then be so good as to tell me where Evelina is now?"

I was a little surprised at the question, and told her I had not heard lately. . . . . .

She told me repeatedly how sorry she was that I had not come to Bath Easton in "vase time," and how sorry her mamma had been.

When we were coming away, and Lady Miller and Sir John had both taken very civil leave of me, I curtsied in passing Mrs. Riggs, and she rose, and called after me—"Set about another!"

The remaining part of the volume is chiefly filled with the letters between Mrs. Thrale and Miss Burney: or with the epistles of the latter to her family while at Bath, and in extreme terror about the Anti-Popery, Lord George Gordon riots, which were then alarming London, and which had extended to Bath among other places.

As soon as Mrs. Thrale knew who was the author of Evelina, she had been seized with a vehement desire that Miss Burney should write a comedy. The Streatham coterie, with the exception of Johnson, who seems to have left the matter to her own judgment and inclination, took up the subject warmly; Sheridan, whom she met at a party at the house of Sir Joshua Reynolds, urged it; and Miss Burney was fairly flattered and persecuted into making the attempt. Both her fathers pronounced the comedy, when finished, a failure; though it was loudly commended by Murphy and other persons, who had read some of the acts, and she acquiesced in the judgment of her truest, best friends, with great good sense and sweetness of temper. The letters of "Daddy Crisp," upon this momentous occasion, gives the rationale of the cleverest and most lively novelists usually failing in the drama. "Daddy Crisp" though not himself a successful writer for the stage, was an excellent dramatic critic. We can give but one illustrative paragraph:—

'Tis certain different talents are requisite for the two species of writing, though they are by no means incompatible; I fear, however, the labouring oar lies on the comic author.

In these little entertaining elegant histories, the writer has his full scope; as large a range as he pleases to hunt in—to pick, cull, select whatever he likes: he takes his own time—he may be as minute as he pleases, and the more minute the better, provided that taste, a deep and penetrating knowledge of human nature and the world, accompany that minuteness. When this is the case, the very soul, and all its most secret recesses and workings, are developed and laid as open to the view, as the blood globules circulating in a frog's foot, when seen through a microscope. The exquisite touche! such a work is capable of, (of which, "Evelina" is, without flattery, a glaring instance,) are truly charming. But of these great advantages, these resources, you are strangely curtailed the moment you begin a comedy. There everything passes in dialogue,—all goes on rapidly: narrative and descriptive, if not extremely short, become intolerable. The detail, which in Fielding, Marivaux, and Crebillon, is so delightful, on the stage would bear down all patience. There all must be compressed into quintessence; the moment the scene ceases to move on briskly, and business seems to hang, sighs and groans are the consequence. Dreadful sound!—In a word, if the plot, the story of the comedy does not open and unfold itself in the easy, natural, unconstrained flow of the dialogue—if that dialogue does not go on with spirit, wit, variety, fun, humour, repartee, and—and all in short into the bargain—serviteur!—good by t'ye!

Before the luckless comedy had been submitted to Mr. Crisp's criticism, its author writes him thus: and her letters to him are always charming, from containing so much of her best and warmest heart. This, we should premise, was before the close of the American War, and when public affairs were in a very bad state.

This seems a strange, unseasonable period for my undertaking, among the rest: but yet, my dear daddy, when you have read my conversation with Mr. Sheridan, I believe you will agree that I must have been wholly insensible, nay, almost ungrateful; to resist encouragement, such as he gave me—nay, more than encouragement, entreaties, all of which he warmly repeated to my father.

Now, as to the play itself, I own I had wished to have been the bearer of it when I visit Chesington; but you seem so urgent, and my father himself is so desirous to carry it you, that I have given that plan up.

O my dear daddy, if your next letter were to contain your real opinion of it, how should I dread to open it! Be, however, as honest as your good nature and delicacy will allow you to be, and assure yourself I shall be very certain that all your criticisms will proceed from your earnest wishes to obviate those of others, and that you would have much more pleasure in being my panegyrist.

And now let me tell you what I wish in regard to this affair. I should like that your first reading should have nothing to do with me—that you should go quick through it, or let my father read it to you—forgetting all the time, as much as you can, that Fannikin is the writer, or even that it is a play in manuscript, and capable of alterations;—and then, when you have done, I should like to have three lines, telling me, as nearly as you can trust my candour, its general effect. After that take it to your own desk, and lash it at your leisure.

Adieu, my dear daddy! I shall hope to hear from you very soon, and pray believe me, yours ever and ever, FRANCES BURNEY.

On the first condemnation of her play, she writes thus:—

Miss F. Burney to Dr. Burney.

The fatal knell, then, is knolled, and down among the dead men sink the poor "Witlings"—for ever, and for ever, and for ever!

I give a sigh, whether I will or not, to their memory! for, however worthless, they were mes enfans; and one must do one's nature, as Mr. Crisp will tell you of the dog.

You, my dearest Sir, who enjoyed, I really think, even more than myself, the astonishing success of my first attempt, would, I believe, even more than myself, be hurt at the failure of my second; and I am sure I speak from the bottom of a very honest heart, when I most solemnly declare, that upon your account any disgrace would mortify and afflict me more than upon my own; for whatever appears with your knowledge, will be naturally supposed to have met with your approbation, and, perhaps, your assistance; therefore, though all particular censure would fall where it ought—upon me—yet any general censure of the whole, and the plan, would cruelly, but certainly involve you in its severity. . . . .

You bid me open my heart to you,—and so, my dearest Sir, I will, for it is the greatest happiness of my life that I dare be sincere to you. I expected many objections to be raised—a thousand errors to be pointed out—and a million of alterations to be proposed; but the suppression of the piece were words I did not expect; indeed, after the warm approbation of Mrs. Thrale, and the repeated commendations and flattery of Mr. Murphy, how could I! . . . . . .

What my daddy Crisp says, "that it would be the best policy, but for pecuniary advantages, for me to write no more," is exactly what I have always thought since "Evelina" was published. But I will not now talk of putting it in practice,—for the best way I can take of showing that I have a true and just sense of the spirit of your condemnation, is not to sink sulky and dejected under it, but to exert myself to the utmost of my power in endeavours to produce something less reprehensible. And this shall be the way I will pursue as soon as my mind is more at ease about Hetty and Mrs. Thrale, and as soon as I have read myself into a forgetfulness of my old dramatis personæ,—lest I should produce something else as witless as the last. . . . . .

Miss F. Burney to Mr. Crisp.

Well! "there are plays that are to be saved, and plays that are not to be saved!" so good night, Mr. Dabbler!—good night, Lady Smatter,—Mrs. Sapient,—Mrs. Voluble,—Mrs. Wheedle,—Censor,—Cecilia,—Beaufort,—and you, you great oaf, Bobby!—good night! good night!

And good morning, Miss Fanny Burney!—I hope now you have opened your eyes for some time, and will not close them in so drowsy a fit again—at least till the full of the moon.

I won't tell you I have been absolutely ravie with delight at the fall of the curtain; but I intend to take the affair in the tant mieux manner, and to console myself for your censure by this greatest proof I have ever received of the sincerity, candour, and, let me add, esteem, of my dear daddy. And as I happen to love myself rather more than my play, this consolation is not a very trifling one.

As to all you say of my reputation and so forth, I perceive the kindness of your endeavours to put me in humour with myself, and prevent my taking huff, which, if I did, I should deserve to receive, upon any future trial, hollow praise from you,—and the rest from the public.

This is taking the affair in the best spirit; and it affords a lesson to all authors, from the Archbishop of Granada downwards. Her next work was Cecilia, which is still esteemed her most finished production; though Evelina was the public's first love; and though we do confess a sneaking kindness for Camilla, which comprehends all the beauties of its author's manner. After the publication of Cecilia, those being days when literary talent could cover even plebeian birth, Miss Burney, instead of accomplishing any of the good matches which Mrs. Thrale projected for her, was offered the place of a Maid of Honour to Queen Charlotte. The next portion of her Diary, will therefore refer to the sober Court of George III. While in attendance on her royal mistress, the maid of honour was necessarily brought into daily intercourse with the persons then forming the Court; and she kept a Diary of the conversations that passed, as minute and full, we are informed, as the specimens we have given above. To this portion of the work we therefore look forward, with, if possible, greater interest than we did for the appearance of the present volume. Of the Thrales, Johnson, and the other distinguished literary individuals of her society, the world already knew a great deal; while comparatively nothing is known about the Court of George III. in the way that Miss Burney, from her opportunities, tastes, and abilities, was qualified to describe its characters, and chronicle its events. We hope that the editor will lose no time; and above all, will not be betrayed, by the sickly, squeamish apprehension of giving offence, into undue suppressions. After a lapse of sixty years, and of several reigns, the Court of George III. is become the fair subject of impartial history.

Memorials of the Civil Wars of England. Edited from the Original Letters, by Henry Cary, M.A., 2 vols. 8vo, cloth. Colburn.

The originals of these letters, which embrace a period of six of the most eventful years in English history, from 1646 to 1652, are found in what is called the Tanner Collection, in the Bodleian Library. Among the writers we find the most eminent historical characters of the period, Charles the First and Second, and Cromwell, included. The Letters are arranged in chronological order. The book, though not one of ephemeral interest, will be peculiarly attractive to the student of history, and is essential to the historian. The additional light which it throws upon the personal character, and the secret history of Charles, (the Royal Martyr,) confirms the opinions which all enlightened and thoughtful men, admirers of constitutional freedom, entertain of that unhappy person; who, while attempting to enslave his subjects, was his own worst enemy. The letters of Cromwell are written during his Irish and Scottish expeditions. They are modest and clear narratives of the progress of the war; and are replete with individual character. The letters of the traitor and hypocrite, Monk, addressed to Cromwell, while he headed the forces in Scotland under Cromwell, are yet greater curiosities, from the display of character.

To Lord Stanley we would respectfully recommend the attentive perusal of a discourse by Jeremy Taylor, on the lawfulness of alienating church lands to serve the purposes of the king,—i. e. of the state, when public necessity demands such alienation. It is in the form of a letter, addressed by Taylor to Dr. Richard Bayly, who had propounded certain queries on this ticklish subject. The intention of the discourse, as stated by its author in his postscript, is to prove "that church lands are, in their nature and condition, alienable upon great and notorious necessities." We shall quote one paragraph:—

> There are some sins called "crying sins;" that is, such which God will more certainly and apparently revenge; and oppression of widows and orphans is one; but, I remember, they account not sacrilege in this number; from whence I can collect nothing, but that God hath more apparently undertaken the protection of widows' dowries and orphans' portions, than of church lands. And then, if we suppose these widows placed in an hospital to pray and spin, I would fain know what holiness of lands or dedications signifies, that is not more eminently in the lands given for an hospital for widows, than a college for priests? And yet, if an hospital be spoiled or widows injured, we call it oppression, not sacrilege.
> And by the way, Sir, be pleased to put the case as it was in some instances in the days of that cormorant of church lands, Henry the Eighth, and in Edward the Sixth, that lands given to the clergy should be converted to the maintenance of widows or sick persons. I desire to be resolved whether that be sacrilege? And if so, upon what ground it is said to be so? If not, then, whether the lands be God's portion, any more if they maintain the clergy than if they maintain the indigent and necessitous laity? And whether or no, if the condition of the king's restitutions were to alien the lands of Bethlem or St. Thomas's Hospital, the clergy of England would affirm it lawful? And then why not, if the condition were to alien one manor of the Bishop of St. David's, or one close? If one, then more, and then all as well as any; for one is as much dedicated to God as all, and the alienation is as direct a sacrilege. But this were a hard case, should it be denied to the king's necessities, and the clamourous importunities of the people, and the necessities for peace?

But here we leave the subject, again commending it to the study of Lord Stanley and Sir Robert Inglis.

The following letter exhibits Cromwell in an amiable light, and is admirable in style. It is addressed to the Speaker:—

> Mr. Speaker,—It having pleased God to take away, by death, Colonel John Maleverer, a very useful member of this army, I thought it requisite to move you in behalf of his sad widow, and seven small children.
> I need not say much. His faithfulness in your service, and his willingness to be spent in the same, is very well known. And truly he had a spirit very much beyond his natural strength of body, having undergone many fits of sickness during this hard service in your field, where he was constant and diligent in his charge; and notwithstanding the weakness of his body, thought himself bound in conscience to continue to the utmost, preferring the public service before his private relations. And as I have been credibly informed, his losses by the royal and malignant party, have been very great, being occasioned by his appearing with the first in his county for the Parliament.
> I have therefore made bold to represent these things before you, that you may timely consider of those that he hath left behind him, and bestow some mark of favour upon them towards their comfortable subsistence.—I rest, Sir, your most humble servant,

O. CROMWELL.

Edinburgh, December 28th, 1650.

A curious letter, written to the Speaker by N. Lempriere, Bailie of Jersey, upon that island acknowledging the sovereignty of the Parliament, gives an interesting account of the laws and usages of Jersey at the period.

It is not easy to say, whether the soldiers of the Parliament, or the cavaliers, whether friends or foes, were the greatest scourges to the peaceful inhabitants of the districts upon which they were then let loose. The letter, of which the following is an extract, was written by Col. Cooke to the Parliamentary Commissioners, when their troops were in Wicklow and Wexford, driving the Irish rebels before them, and desolating the country.

Upon this day se'nnight in the evening, our forces all rendezvoused at Enniscorthy, some having marched ten miles that day, some twenty; about ten of the clock the same night, we began our march towards the enemy's quarters, having twelve miles to march before we could come to do service. In the morning before day, we were in the midst of them; but they lay so dispersed that we could not then do much upon them. Some we took, and some we killed. In searching the woods and bogs, we found great store of corn, which we burnt, also all the houses and cabins we could find; in all which we found great plenty of corn. We continued burning and destroying for four days; in which time we wanted no provision for horse or man, finding also housing enough to lie in, though we burnt our quarters every morning, and continued burning all day after. He was an idle soldier, that had not either a fat lamb, veal, pig, or poultry, or all of them, every night to his supper.

Even the wars of the '98 have not eradicated from the memories of the Irish, the cruelties of Cromwell's soldiers. In England the royalist troops acted the same part, without the excuse that they were in an alien country. From a letter of date 1646, addressed to Luke Robinson, then member of Parliament for the North Riding of Yorkshire, and written from Scarborough by Thomas Smallwood, probably a farmer, we gather the bearing of the subdued cavaliers and their new auxiliaries:—

Though my neighbours have felt the smart of Newcastle's army, and twice of the Scots, yet these times were times of peace and prosperity, in comparison of this present time; never were poor people so oppressed as we are. The commander-in-chief, in these parts, is one Major-General Vandruske, a civil gentleman. His regiment consists of many Papists, French, Dutch, Irish, Scotch; and those that are Englishmen are, four parts of them, the king's reduced, or rather subdued, soldiers, who, now our conquerors and tyrants, came from Newark, Oxford, and others of his garrisons. They are most of them very rude in their carriage, for they every day ride abroad and rob all men and women they meet with. None can, with safety, pass to or from a fair, or town, or market; they have left us no horses that are fit to carry a man; and profess, whensoever they go away, to leave us no other goods.

In their quarters they demean themselves most barbarously. They beat their men and women causelessly. They will not eat either salt beef, or milk, or butter, nor drink any small beer; but force the poor men to buy them mutton, lamb, and chickens, and ale in abundance; and though they put their horses in the mown grass, yet they will force their landlords to find them every day a peck of oats for each horse. Our honest men are many of them forced to leave their houses; some are fled in to Whitby Strand, some in to the English army near York, and others into the East Riding. I was forced to fly from my house, and leave all I had to their mercy; as for those towns where no soldiers are quartered, they compel them to pay monies to them, some towns £8, some £10, some £16, some £20 per diem; so that if some speedy course be not taken the whole country will be destroyed.

I cannot see how they can possibly subsist twenty days in all likelihood; and though these burdens lie upon them, they dare not complain. No justice was yet done, except upon one man, who was shot to death for killing his landlord (in cool blood.) They change their quarters every other day, which proves a very heavy burden to the poor people. Honest men dare not show a Bible amongst them, except it have both the Common Prayers and Apocrypha in it; and it were treason for the poor godly men to pray in their families. Sir, I want words to express the misery the country is in. . . . . If you please acquaint Sir Matt. Boynton and Mr. Thomas Chalmers, that they can expect no more rents from us. The Lord incline the hearts of the Parliament to study some relief for us.

The Scots army, consisting of a miscellaneous crew, gathered from every quarter, were equally oppressive. One Emanuel Issachar, writing to the burgesses then in Parliament for the towns of Yorkshire, quaintly says,— Gentlemen,—your languishing country expects comfort from you: ride they cannot, to inform you, for their horses are all taken from them; run they cannot, their hearts are too heavy, their burdens too great; they have much to complain, but dare not; cry aloud they would, if their spirit were not too far spent; and they have had so little encouragement to ride, run, complain, or cry, less success in it, greater oppression by it, that they give all for lost without your present assistance. . . . .

After enumerating the enormities and rapacity of the soldiers, this honest man, who must, probably from his style, have been a dominie, continues—

Nay, many an honest man is forced to trudge night and day to fetch them wine, ale, or beer, or what extraordinary fare as they desire, at his great charge; and this he does to buy a little peace: and thus he prostrates himself and estate to buy a little quiet, to the lust and rage of such as have been our open enemies, such as are lately come out, and such who, though they have pretended to be our friends, now declare themselves for the king, threaten the parliament for burning their papers, &c.—threaten all public officers, and all the Parliament's friends, calling them English dogs, &c.—countenancing and entertaining, daily, Papists and delinquents, and, in one word, lives as if it were their design to destroy our country.

The writer then pertinently inquires, If those be friends, why deal they so unkindly?

In conclusion, we must say, that as we proceed to peruse the entire collection of letters, its value and interest rises in our estimation. It contains the naked truth of history.

The Music of the Church; containing a General History of Music, &c. &c. By Thomas Hirst. Pp. 357. Whittaker & Co.

We have never yet met with any work of which the subject was the Music of the Church, and the history of musicians, that was not both pleasant and profitable reading. Mr. Hirst's work certainly forms no exception to our uniform course of experience. Its plan is popular and comprehensive. It is written for those who may not have means or opportunity to study the subject discussed in all its details and intricacies, but who desire a general knowledge of it, that shall be accurate and tolerably full. The work is divided into four Parts. The first contains a general history of the art, from the earliest periods until the present day; the second Part is the most elaborate—it is exclusively devoted to Hebrew music. The remaining Parts are the most original, and, as we apprehend, the most useful. They treat, in a number of distinct chapters, of music as it is connected with Divine worship, in the Church and among the Dissenters, in this country.

In arrangement, and various other secondary matters, the author shows no great degree of literary skill, or experience; but his work is stuffed full of excellent matter, and well supplies a want which many feel, besides forming a really entertaining volume. We shall give a brief specimen or two; regretting that our space at present forbids further ministering to the pleasure of our readers.

THE MUSIC OF THE REFORMERS.

The feeble rays of divine truth which broke from the mind of Wickliff, on a dark and corrupt age, and which increased their radiance, till the deformity and impious domination of the Romish church was broken at the reformation, carried with them some alteration in the choral service of the church. A more simplified style of singing was practised by the followers of Wickliff, and which was carried forwards by the Hussites.

With these examples before him, Calvin gave a still greater impulse to dissent from the choral service of the popish church, with which, on many other accounts, it is well known he had but little sympathy. With the assistance of Theodore Beza, he introduced a new version of the psalms, set to music by Guillaume Franco, in one part only. These compositions soon became popular through all the reformed churches.

Martin Luther, from having an ear, no doubt more correctly attuned to melodious sounds than those of the two foregoing celebrated men, and a soul on which devotion ascended more readily on the sublime strains of devotion, retained more of the splendour of the established choral service. He composed many hymns, some of which he himself set to music; specimens of both remain to the present time. The hymn beginning, "Great God, what do I see and hear," &c., and the "Old Hundred" tune, are considered, amidst some doubts, to be of the number.

In England many of the reformers disapproved of the secular spirit, and cumbersome ceremonies, of the musical part of the church service, and Latimer went so far as to forbid singing of any kind within the limits of his diocese.

Marbeck is supposed to have been the first who set the Cathedral service of the Reformed Church of England. He composed but for one voice, and they were published in 1511. Elizabeth, in her direction to the clergy, gave particular attention to the music of the church, saying, "Let there be a modest and distinct song used in all parts of the common prayers of the church; and for the comforting of all such as delight in music, it may be permitted, that, in the beginning and in the end of the common prayer, either morning or evening, there may be sung an hymn, or such like song, to the praise of Almighty God." The purity of her motives in this affair are, however, rendered very questionable; at all events, she manifested an arbitrary spirit in the manner in which she sought to supply choristers with singing boys.

ORIGIN OF GOD SAVE THE KING.

Among the cebrated writers and performers of music at this period, was Dr. John Bull, to whom tradition ascribes the honour of composing our national air of "God save the King." This honour, however, has never been unanimously bestowed; and it has lately considerably faded on the Doctor's brow, by information supplied in an elaborate and erudite work on "Old National English Airs," by W. Chappell. Mr. Chappell there shows, by considerations of great force, that the author of the anthem was a Henry Carey, then living in London, and who, it may be remarked, was the grandfather of the mother of the late Edmund Kean. Carey was disaffected towards the reigning government, and composed the air on the eve of the insurrection in 1715, in furtherance of the cause of James the pretender, whose name was the burden of its theme. The insurrection failed, and the tune lay dormant till the occurrence of the victory of Admiral Vernon, in 1740, when the author met a party at a tavern, and sang it—substituting the word George for James, in celebration of the triumph. Dr. Arne harmonized it, and brought it out in Drury Lane Theatre in 1745, with great effect, when another pretender aspired to usurp the British crown. It then took an elevated stand in the musical world, and may be said ever since to have been in growing favour with the public. It is singular that this anthem has greatly served the cause it was intended to destroy. About the year 1743, Carey put an end to his life, being, at the advanced age of eighty years, in abject circumstances, having only a halfpenny in his pocket.

Passing over many illustrious names native and foreign, we come to one whose history is new to us, and, we should imagine, to many of our readers, who may, nevertheless, be familiar with his compositions. The people have had their Handels, and Purcells; composers, springing up as directly from their bosom, as do their poets, their Burnses, Elliotts, and Nicolls.

JAMES LEACH.

The name of Leach is well deserving a place in every historical sketch of English music, however brief; and to omit it, in the estimation of many, would be to make a blank that could not be filled by a more worthy name.

James Leach was born in humble circumstances, and principally earned his bread by the sweat of his brow, as a weaver, at Rochdale, in Lancashire. Having a natural musical genius, and yielding to its impulses in making some proficiency in the instrumental department, he became one of the king's band. But he was also distinguished as a vocalist, and appeared to most advantage in the counter part. In this region he made his musical powers commendably known, as a singer at one of the great musical festivals, held in Westminster Abbey.

His first efforts at composition appear to have had no other object than his own recreation, or that of those with whom he was intimately connected. In the preface to his first set of tunes, he thus expresses himself:—"The truth of the matter is this: having had a turn for music from my infancy, I have employed my leisure hours in cultivating the same. A few years ago I composed a few tunes, and without the least design of their being made public, being at the time ignorant of the rules of composition. These few tunes, accordingly, got handed about, and were introduced into many public congregations, insomuch that I was called upon from all quarters for copies, so that I found myself under the disagreeable necessity of denying many requests of that kind. For, having a family to maintain with my handlabour, I had already spent more time than I could well spare; but a friend of mine, knowing my importunities of that kind, and wishing the tunes to be more generally known, advised me, by all means to compose a few more to some select pieces, and let a number of them be struck off, as the price would be small, so that such as wished to have them, might procure them at a small expense; and therefore I now submit them to the judgment of the public: I mean such as understand music."

This preface is dated Rochdale, June 29th, 1789, and it does not appear to have been reprinted in any subsequent edition. In the first sentence of the extract just given, I have altered a word or two, as the original is glaringly ungrammatical; indeed, the whole preface betrays great ignorance of, in their plainest forms, the rules of literary composition, and shows it to have been Leach's unaided performance. The work was published by subscription, and met with such a welcome reception, as to encourage him to go on composing; indeed, he announced in the same preface, that, "Another volume of tunes of the same size and price will be published in a few months." These two publications contain the whole of his psalm and hymn tunes. His set pieces and anthems were issued in twelve numbers after his death, for the benefit of his surviving family. He came to his end in a melancholy manner. Sometime in the year 1797, he was taking a journey on the top of a coach, and while humming over the Canaan, the first piece he made, the coach upset, and he was killed on the spot, not more than thirty-five years of age, and in the midst of the current of rising fame. For some years before his death he had nearly, if not altogether, laid aside his regular employment, and he was supported partly by the free generosity of his friends, and partly by the exercise of his musical talents, and the profits of his publications. The Rev. Alexander Mather, a celebrated minister in the Wesleyan Connexion, of which body of Christians Leach was a member, is said to have been a valuable friend to him, and used his influence to bring him into notice. . . . . .

Perhaps Leach cannot be considered as evincing very great originality, in the severe, abstract, and comprehensive meaning of that term. Yet there is so much of honest, calm, thoughtful, independence of genius, in conception and development, in the working out of its various themes, as to entitle him, in a subordinate degree at least, to be considered a reformer, in the republic of musical science, and at the head of a respectable class. In his music we recognise a considerable elevation above the prosings of the majority of composers which preceded him. He seems to occupy the same position in the history of music, as Dr. Watts does in poetical psalmody. There is in the character of his music an identity; as painters would say, a keeping in the likeness: that is, in principle, not in detail; in the superintending spirit of the theme, not in the themes themselves. For in this respect, few writers present greater variety than he, within the prescribed limits of psalmody. But, whether you turn to the solemnly impressive strains of Complaint, Joannas, Egypt, Shields, &c., or plume yourselves to accompany him in Rochdale, Syria, Redemption, &c., in their more free and dignified evolutions; or unite in the airy and buoyant trippings of Cyprus, Orpheus, &c., you feel the presence of Leach, in the unity of his commanding genius. His imagination is not so bold, adventurous, and startling, as is that of some other first-rate composers; but this is counterbalanced by an addition of judgment, which adds strength to the pinions of his imagination, and makes his flight more secure, and his return more certain. In him the different parts of the tune come to a friendly close, without the fear of each accusing the other of wandering too far from the melody of the theme. In his lighter effusions, there is nothing of dash, or prettiness, or frivolity, for the purpose of courting applause from low or vitiated tastes; and in his funeral specimens he does not sink into twaddle, and unmeaning and affected croakings; but,

"He is discreet,
And marks the point where sense and dulness meet."

In him there is also a fair proportion of strength, expansion, and harmony, blended with cheerfulness and propriety of adaptation. He is, moreover, at times brilliant and tender.

His anthems and set pieces are of unequal merit. His Crucifixion, as a whole, is the best. . . . . Many of his pieces were left unfinished at his death, which will account for the falling off in the latter portion.

The assertion of Dr. Burney is both bold and true, and is therefore encouraging to real though humble genius, that "Music has been more advanced by unlearned men, than by philosophers and mathematicians." The Doctor's argument will not readily find a more striking illustration than in James Leach. A friend of the author requested him to do justice to the character of "poor Leach," observing, that "he had been of great service to Methodism." The reason for such a request is too limited; as the Dissenters and Church of England share the same benefits. To say that in all Christian assemblies, where devotion breaks forth in praise, Leach's tunes are worthy of a place, would be only asserting the fact, the proof of which is heard in the various and extreme parts of the militant church. And the day is very distant, when the strains of Leach will cease to stimulate the pleasures of devotion.

Several other not mute but inglorious Handels and Charles Wesleys find, for the first time, honourable mention in this popular history, which we commend to all musical readers who are not too fastidious.

Cæsar de Bello Gallico. With a Geographical Index. Edited by Philip Smith, B. A. Simpkin & Marshall.

I. The Book of the Poets. From Chaucer to Beattie.

II. The Book of the Modern Poets of the Nineteenth Century. Octavo. Scott, Webster, and Geary.

These handsome and massive volumes are of an order of embellished works, which every lover of polite literature must rejoice to see gradually displacing the ephemeral and flimsy decorated wares which have been in vogue of late years. They consist of well-selected, tasteful, and characteristic specimens of the English poets, richly and beautifully embellished in the style of the well-known edition of Rogers' Italy, and other poems; the works of Campbell, published by Moxon, and one of Murray's editions of Byron. There are about fifty illustrations to each work; all of them good, and many of them exquisite. The wide field of English poetry gives ample scope for designs; and Corbould, Uwins, Calcott, &c. &c., have surveyed it with poetical as well as artistic eyes. The engraving of these delicious vignettes is by Finden and Heath. The books are elegantly printed, and are worthy of the proud name, Book of the Poets. Such works as this, forming the most valuable part of the decorative furniture, or appliances of the drawing-room, or lady's morning-room, can never be too numerous for the public; nor, we should hope, for the publishers, who, by sending out such works, exalt and refine the taste to which they minister.

The "Book of the Poets" contains a preliminary essay on English poetry, from its rise to the era of Cowper; the "Book of the Modern Poets" a dissertation on the poetry of the 19th century. To the specimens of each poet is prefixed a brief biographical notice, so that the works are in some sort a history of English poetry, and an index, with copious specimens of each poet of any note. Independently of exterior elegance, we cannot tell where, within the same compass, one might find so much that is of sterling and permanent value in English poetical literature.

The Philosophy of Necessity, or the Law of Consequences, as applicable to Mental, Moral, and Social Science. By Charles Bray. Second volume. Longman and Co.

The second volume of this work, which is now before us, we consider of more value than the first. It is practical. It deals in facts and figures, instead of indulging in speculation, sometimes vague and unsatisfactory. Here there can be no mistake. If Mr. Bray, very much (as we believe) underrates the intelligence of the working-classes, he thoroughly understands their sufferings and their wants; and if all his remedies for the social evils he perceives, be not such as men are likely to agree about, they must at least concur in admiring his benevolent spirit, and expansive sympathies. We are struck with one of his isolated opinions, from its coincidence with the opinions of Mr. Laing and others, who are neither of the coöperative school, nor of that of the political economists. It is thus expressed:—"We doubt if any country can long continue prosperous, where the manufacturing population greatly exceeds in number the agricultural." The idea is worthy of consideration

The History of the Republic of Texas. By N. Doran Maillard, Esq., Barrister of Law of Texas. Smith and Elder.

The author of this book seems to have emigrated rashly, to have suffered in consequence, and to be in the very bad humour which tempts men to commit injustice, without being conscious of their bias. We cannot see much to recommend Texas to the British people as a field of emigration. But if any are meditating such a step, they would do well to read this book as a corrective of Mr. Kennedy's glowing descriptions. Truth lies between them, and probably inclines to Mr. Kennedy's side. The good advice with which the Texan barrister has favoured Lord Palmerston, now falls to Lord Aberdeen's share, who, we dare not promise our author, will lend a more willing ear to the voice of the charmer.

Female Character: an Essay. By Albert Pennington.

This little book contains a great deal of good counsel to young women; and also what seems to be considered necessary in all works of the sort written by men, a great deal more of compliment; fulsome, were it only from its superfluity. It will be better for both sexes when the men no longer feel the necessity of paying off in panegyric what is denied to the women in justice.

A Blue-coat Boy's Recollections of Hertford School. By George Wickam. Harvey and Darton.

This is a simple and homely narrative, referring neither to great personages nor momentous events; and yet the powerful instinct which, in all circumstances, makes "man dear to man," impels one to read on to the end, with unabated interest, the man's unvarnished story of the boy's school-life.

Poems of Past Years. By James Parker. Menzies, Edinburgh.

A collection of sweet and tender verses, without strongly marked character. We have, however, seen worse gain prizes in Universities, and put forth by persons of quality in Annuals, with great applause from fashionable circles.

Lady Alice. A Ballad Romance. By El-ton. Saunders and Otley.

There is rare candour in this, probably very youthful, aspirant to the favour of the Muses. His friends, contrary to all former precedent, when consulted, advised him not to publish. But publish he would. He might have committed many a worse folly. Yet we approve the decision of the friends. The romance, written in the easiest ballad jingle-jangle which English metres allow, is not without melody; and it has a story. These are great points.

Schiller's Bride of Messina. Translated by A. Lodge, Esq., M.A. Bohn, London.

In introducing this highly finished production of Schiller's genius and matured skill and taste to the English reader, the Translator states, that it has been less his aim to give a close version of the original than such a transcript of the author's thoughts as might be animated by a portion of his spirit, and wear a certain air of originality. Whether this is gained or not, the performance wears a more finished and classic air from being thus treated.

The Life and Times of Cranmer: an American little work, reprinted in this country.

Rational Reading Lessons; or, Entertaining Intellectual Exercises for Children. By the author of the "Diversions of Hollycot; or, The Mother's Art of Thinking," &c. &c.; with a Key. Oliver & Boyd.

We learn, from the preface, that this small tome forms a link in a series of little books for children, of which some have previously appeared. It owes its existence to its author's dislike of the system of elementary cramming; and consists of entertaining little stories, and descriptive sketches in prose, with a few in verse, which are printed in a way that must exercise the mental faculties of the juvenile reader. We daresay some of them might like to sip the honey by itself, without partaking of the wholesome medicine of which it is the medium; but this the plan of the work renders impossible. Any educational work of which the tendency is the discouragement of mere parroting or showy pretension, deserves commendation at this period, when it is much to be feared that solid improvement in education by no means keeps pace with the bustle and parade which keen competition has introduced among schools, and in elementary books.

Four Lectures to Young Men. Innes, Edinburgh.

These Lectures were delivered in Edinburgh by four of the Clergymen belonging to the city. The first lecture, by the Rev. Andrew Thomson, is worthy of particular attention. It rises above the ordinary commonplace of such discourses.

Tate's Modern Cambist. Fourth Edition, with extensive Alterations and Additions. Effingham Wilson.

What to Teach and how to Teach it, so that a Child may become a Wise and Good Man. By Henry Mayhew. William Smith, Fleet Street.

This is the first portion of a philosophic treatise on Education, which is to be completed in three divisions. This first part, "On the Cultivation of the Intellect," scarce corresponds with the practical title.

The Classical Pronunciation of Proper Names. By Thomas Swinburne Carr, King's College, London.

The utility of this work is obvious; and it must be of yet greater value to Scottish classical students and teachers than in England. An Appendix contains some useful information connected with the subject, and the proper pronunciation of all the Scripture names.

Greek Poetry for Schools. Edited by Philip Smith, B. A. Simpkin and Marshall.

The extracts are reprinted from Dr. Friedmann's "Kleine Griechische Poetische Anthologie." A few alterations have been made by the editor, which he, of course, considers for the better; and he has added two Idyls, for the sake of introducing the learner to the Doric dialect. The book contains three books of the Odyssey, many extracts from the Iliad, and something from nearly all the Greek poets. It is, besides, a beautiful specimen of Greek typography. The type is peculiarly well cut, clear, bold, and yet delicate.

Look Forward. A Tale. By Catherine Irene Finch.

This is a very pretty story for the young of the humbler classes, replete with good sense, good taste, and good moral feeling. It cannot be read without profit.

The Martyr of Erromanga; or, The Philosophy of Missions, illustrated from the Labours, Death, and Character of the late Rev. John Williams. By John Campbell, D.D. Author of "Jethro," "Maritime Discovery," &c., &c. 1 volume octavo, cloth, pp. 448. With coloured frontispiece, &c. Snow: London.

Dr. Campbell is an enthusiast for Missions. Under the above comprehensive title, he has arranged fourteen Letters, addressed to distinguished individuals, which form a series of discourses on Missionary Enterprise, and its various noble objects; and also, in some respects, a sequel to the Narrative of the lamented Williams; the MARTYR OF ERROMANGA. In the opinion of Dr. Campbell, the missionary enterprise of Williams alone, "is of more real value than all the writings of a Clarke, a Butler, a Paley, a Chalmers, a Leland, and a Lardner, united." This is a bold assertion, but we are not prepared to dispute it. The seeds sown, the good done, the new state of society created in the Islands of the South Sea, by the labours of one genuine Apostle, are visible, real, and tangible; the effects and influences of the writings of the eminent individuals enumerated, it is not so easy to calculate. In Polynesia, a great moral revolution has been accomplished by a working-man: under the printed lessons of the divines named above, we fear society remains, if somewhat wiser, very little better than before they lived and wrote. In the right path it moves at a snail's pace; while in the regions of missionary enterprise the progress of many centuries has been made in a few years.

Dr. Campbell has contrived to impart extrinsic interest to his work, by the choice of the persons to whom he addresses the several branches of his subject. To teachers of Sunday and other schools, he devolves the duty of inculcating the missionary spirit; the members of the London and American Peace Societies he addresses on the tendency of Missionary labours to extinguish War, and to establish Peace. This branch of the subject is farther illustrated in Letters to Mr Macaulay and to the Duke of Wellington. Indeed, the Doctor's illustrations of the spirit and principles of the Gospel, in relation to War and Peace, are not the least valuable portion of his work. His Grace of Wellington receives high praise; but he is, at the same time, told some home-truths. Now, as the Duke is quite as much the hero of the Saints as of the Sinners of the land; of those who profess to follow the principles of the Gospel of Peace, as of those who care for none of these things,—we could not find a more apt passage for quotation than a part of the author's warning or remonstrance. It, besides, affords a fair specimen of his manner, which is fluent and discursive; not absolutely o'er informed with matter; but generally showing various and copious knowledge, and just sentiments:—

Among all conquerors, I have read of none who demands a tithe of the respect which I feel for your Grace. But truth compels me to say, that, although I view you as the Prince of Captains, I am constrained to look upon you as immeasurably less than the least of all missionaries. Oh! how high and holy is their vocation as compared with that which occupied the first half of your eventful life! With them, eternity is everything; with your Grace, it appeared in those days, to be nothing. They walk daily and hourly with God; from all that I can discover of your Grace's views, from your volumes, written during your warlike operations, God was not in all your thoughts! I can find no difference of cre- between your Grace and Napoleon, with respect to a future world and the hope of man; nor can I find anything, in which either he or your Grace differs from Alexander or Cæsar, who dwelt in the darkness of idolatry. The letters of condolence which you wrote from fields of battle to the friends of those who fell at your side, are most affecting proofs and illustrations. The considerations, for example, which you employ to console the friends of Colonel Lake, are, that he fell "the admiration of the whole army," and "in the achievement of one of the most heroic actions." In the case of Colonel Cameron, you endeavour to comfort his father with the thought, that "he fell in the performance of his duty." You labour to soothe Lord Somers on the death of his son, with the assurance, that he "fell in the zealous and gallant discharge of his duty." Ah! my Lord Duke, and is this all? With the wounds, and the blood, and the agonies, and the death, was there an utter end of these men? Is there no difference between the warrior and his horse? Does the shell or shot which slays them jointly, extinguish both their beings at once? Does nothing of man survive? Has your Grace not one thought to bestow upon the disembodied spirits of those hapless officers and men who perished by obeying you, who contributed to your victory, and to your fame? Only think of them a moment! Where are they? What are they? Are you silent? My Lord Duke, can you answer these questions? Is military knowledge, are military thoughts, entirely bounded by this sublunary scene? Not one idea concerning the world of spirits can be gathered from your Grace's Despatches, General Orders, and Letters. . . . . .

On that terrible night which drew its curtain around the dismal field of Waterloo, after parting with Blucher, and crossing the battle plain by moonlight, and beholding a scene of carnage seldom paralleled in the annals of war, it is reported, to the honour of your manhood and humanity, that, covering your face with your hands, you burst into tears. The heaps of dead you then saw, the moans of the dying, and the wail of the wounded, you then heard, might well have moved a heart harder than yours. It is but just to quote your well remembered words, in one of your letters, which ran thus:—"My heart is broken by the terrible loss I have sustained of my old friends and companions, and my poor soldiers; and I shall not be satisfied with this battle, however glorious, if it does not put an end to Buonaparte." Ah! my Lord Duke, was it really glorious? Is glory to be measured by the havoc of armies,—by the distress, the distraction, the woe, and the despair created throughout hundreds of thousands of families! Shall I appeal from this Aceldama, this field of blood, to the fathers and mothers, brothers and sisters, wives and children, relatives and friends of the slain, whether, in very deed, this was a "glorious battle?" I well remember the joy of these nations, but what meant the solitary weeping, the deep grief, and the settled sorrow of such multitudes over all the land? Their answer was—Waterloo!

Sir Charles Bell, who followed the army that he might improve his knowledge of gun-shot wounds, and enrich his surgical lectures, throws a light upon one of the aspects of the glory of Waterloo. He describes the condition of the hospitals, in terms which make the ears tingle and the blood run cold! It was, as your Grace will doubtless remember, full sixteen days after the battle before the work of the surgeons was finished. When about three weeks after the tremendous day, the living proceeded in the work of burying the dead, it was found that wounded men had crawled to the carcases of dead horses, and gnawed their raw flesh for food, till putrefaction put an end to the horrid banquet, and they died of hunger! Such facts as these will help to demonstrate how far this was a really glorious battle! Alas! glory and battle are terms which ill agree.

In a letter addressed to Lord Brougham on the results of missionary labours on slavery and education, the author deals as plainly with the great statesman as he does with the illustrious soldier; though the exor-

-..m is all that we can quote. Having enumerated all the public honours which Brougham had won, he continues:—

Your lordship's speeches and writings will go down to the latest ages, and live as long as the language whose rich resources they exemplify and exhaust. History, uninfluenced by party and envy, will do your lordship justice. Posterity will, indeed, assign you a far higher place on "Fame's dread mountain," than even that which has been accorded by the bulk of your contemporaries. In speaking thus, I make no reference to your rank, my lord; no man ever owed less to rank than your lordship; you descended when you entered the Upper House. You elevated the peerage—not the peerage you. The historian will chiefly delight in the patriotic Commoner. Even now the lord is lost in the man. Your simple name, in after times, will blaze in glory as the sun, while your coronet will be a tiny speck on its disc, scarcely visible. No living statesman has so much to hope, and so little to fear from future generations, as your lordship. The great points of your political creed will assuredly be at length embraced by all nations. The progress of reason, the voice of prophecy, the interests of earth, all unite to support your views of war, peace, slavery, education, and the surpassing glories of moral greatness. Every age will bring the mind of England more and more into unison with yours. Like prophecy, your lordship's character will gain with the advance of time. And when the period arrives at which "the kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven, shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most high, whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and all dominions shall serve and obey him;"—when this period arrives, my lord, the evils which you have denounced and opposed, with so much consistency, energy, and eloquence, will cease to be, and the good which you have so long and so strenuously laboured to promote, will be more than realized throughout the whole earth; for, be assured, my lord, your utmost demands and desires are, according to the volume of Inspiration, a poor instalment of the felicity which awaits our now distracted and afflicted world.

My lord, it will be allowed by multitudes of the best and wisest of mankind, that I have not overdrawn the picture of your lordship's prospects of future renown. Personal and political adversaries are incompetent judges of such a matter; and so, indeed, are personal and political friends. But a great reverse awaits your lordship's position. Men who are now all but unknown, will, in the better days of our world, be inconceivably more illustrious than your lordship. You will then be considered as only a humble personage, in comparison with such a man as the missionary martyr, Williams. One chapter of the "Missionary Enterprizes," will then bear a higher value than all the writings of your lordship, and of all the orators, statesmen, historians, and philosophers in our language. Everything is permanently great only as it belongs to Christ and his kingdom. Your speeches in behalf of John Smith, will accordingly possess an interest with the ages to come, infinitely greater than any other—the most celebrated not excepted—that you ever uttered. Those speeches are identified with the cause of Christ, and they will partake of its immortality. Next to those will be your speeches and letters on education; then those against slavery: and finally, such as were made in defence of civil and religious liberty. All the others, splendid as they are, will be deemed of inferior worth. My lord, if these things be so, are not the bulk of your great compeers living to little purpose, and in a manner which but ill comports with their high destinies and real interests as immortal beings! If there is truth in the awful disclosures of the sacred Scriptures, how lamentable is the prospect of the vast body of this world's great men!

Such passages whet curiosity about the hero of this work; the Martyr of Erromanga, thus exalted above all contemporary greatness. And in what did the superiority of Williams consist?—In adaptation to the situation into which religious zeal led him; in a competent knowledge of a most useful plain handicraft; an adroit mechanical turn, and astonishing fortitude and perseverance. He could neither have occupied the station, nor fulfilled the duties of a Brougham nor a Wellington; and yet it is cheering to think how much men of his resolute character, though of limited intellectual calibre, have the power of achieving for humanity, when they go forth as the pioneers of civilisation and pure Christianity. Dr. Campbell has formed, perhaps, an overweening opinion of Williams; but certainly not of the great work which he was the honoured instrument in accomplishing. We will gather a few sentences from his estimate or eulogy of his hero, as our concluding specimen, premising (though the history of this Missionary is pretty well known) that he was a respectable artisan, who, converted by the preaching of the Rev. Mr. East of Birmingham, devoted himself to the work of missions:—

His religion was simple, healthful, robust, and manly. His views of the gospel were highly scriptural. Of the theology of the schools he knew but little; he took his creed from the Volume of Inspiration. He was no wrangler; yet he was a workman that needed not to be ashamed, for he rightly divided the word of truth. He was such a teacher as Paul or Timothy would, without a moment's hesitation, have ordained to the work of the ministry. Although not "mighty in the Scriptures," he was well acquainted with the word of God. Upon what is technically termed "experience," he was a safe guide and a fine model. Much that is in great repute, in some religious circles, had no place in his instructions; he had not within him one particle of what is called religious enthusiasm. In respect of his views and sentiments, all was pure, clear, and scriptural. He had no sympathy with the system of impulses and impressions, and vagaries of the fancy. Experience with him was not an end, but a means. . . . . Every exhibition of truth had a practical bearing; the uniform tendency of his ministration of the gospel of mercy was, to elevate the soul, to form the character, to meeten men "to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light." His views of the Divine character were remarkably clear, and, therefore, in the highest degree consolatory. He was himself a happy man, a cheerful Christian! They who saw him but for a few minutes would have pronounced him a man of a joyous spirit. He seemed to walk in the beams of a perpetual sunshine. In this respect, perhaps, no man ever formed a more striking contrast to David Brainerd. The dismal gloom, the deep depression, the lonely sorrow, of that holy but melancholy man, sadly contrasted with the peace, the comfort, the hope, and the gladness of the Martyr of Erromanga! Truly "the joy of the Lord was his strength." A man of melancholy temperament, a man with dark and doleful views of the gospel of mercy, is not a proper person to be sent to the field of missions.

He went forth with his mind a comparative blank respecting all that appertains to controversy about church order and Christian ordinances. Wherever he found a consistent believer, he found a brother, and as such he was ready to embrace him. He knew no church but the church of Christ; he was for all that were for his Lord! A mind like his, however, so industrious and so inquisitive, was not likely to remain long without some settled notions on this great and important subject. When he arrived in England in 1834, he accordingly manifested a perfect acquaintance with it. He had become, from conviction sincere and deep, a Dissenter from the Church of England and from all Ecclesiastical Establishments. He perceived them to be rotten at the core—founded in fatal error, and irreconcilably hostile to the quiet of nations, the peace of churches, and the true interests of Christ's kingdom. This opinion he most firmly, though mildly, held; and, upon all proper occasions, was ready to avow it. . . . . .

But with all these qualifications, Mr. Williams would have been of small value to the South Sea Islanders save for his Tubal-Cain accomplishments. In the earliest missionary papers, or perhaps in the voyage of the Duff, we recollect an anecdote of an Otaheitean, who had been, with many of his countrymen, induced to attend the ministrations of the missionaries, by the present of a few nails, distributed at the conclusion of the service. The nails fell off in number, and with them the zeal of the convert, who, one Sunday, on returning from worship, on being asked what had passed, remarked—"Plenty of the word of God, but very few nails." Now Williams could not only give a few nails, but teach the art of making nails by thousands, and many other useful things. He was, therefore, the true apostle for a barbarous race. On this head our author remarks:—

Mechanical ingenuity was a striking feature in the character of Mr. Williams. He was highly endowed with the faculty of invention, and would have attained distinction had he devoted himself to the improved application of mechanic powers. The exercise of his genius in this direction was one of the sources of his amazing success in the missionary field. Magic and miracles would not have stood him in half the stead of his skill in the useful arts. His exhibitions in this way spoke to the senses of the savages, who stood in dumb amazement, and confessed the white man's superiority. The art to which he had been specially bred—that of a smith,—was, of all arts, to him infinitely the most important. The art of working in iron stands at the head of all others: they are all subordinate to it, and dependent upon it. In no country has civilisation ever been known to precede the use of iron. It is essential as an instrument in the cultivation of the soil, and in the production of every comfort of civilized life. Combined with this highly important fact, is the well-known circumstance, that the art of working in iron surpasses in usefulness all other arts, as much as iron itself surpasses all other materials put in requisition by the wants and habits of civilized life. Cicero well observes that there is an affinity among the sciences, so that he who has become an adept in one, is, to some extent, initiated in the rest. So likewise is it in regard to languages. But besides the affinities,—the principles common to them all,—there are leading sciences, and leading languages, the mastery of which renders further conquests an easy achievement. The analogy is complete in the case before us. He who has thoroughly acquired the art of working in iron will be at no loss, though at first but rudely, to work in other substances. All sorts of woodwork, house-building, ship-building, agricultural implements, and all that is necessary to the early stages of civilisation, will come within his province and his power. The mathematical principles of these two trades, in particular, have much in common; and working in wood is simple and easy, compared with iron.

These facts explain the secret of Mr. Williams's remarkable skill in all mechanical operations—operations, which, in the first instance, constituted his great charm in the eyes of the poor natives—operations which so amazingly contributed to his success in promoting civilisation,—and operations which form one of the chief and most interesting features of his "Enterprizes." Had he been bred to any other art, he would have made a very different and a very subordinate figure in Polynesia. Had he gone to any other part of the mission field, his skill in working iron, and his great mechanical genius, had been of comparatively little use, and in most places, of absolutely none. Had he been appointed to the West Indies, to Hindostan, to China, to Madagascar, or to South Africa, he would still have been a respectable missionary; but he would never have shone with that peculiar and peerless splendour which now surrounds his name. No man ever owed more to providential circumstances than John Williams: they made him. No man, on the other hand, ever more promptly and aptly met the enlarged and ever-varying demands of such circumstances, mastered their current, and turned them to his purpose.

From these extracts our readers may form some idea of a work devoted to a most important subject; written in a fervent spirit, and affording much entertainment as well as instruction.

POLITICAL REGISTER.

OPENING OF PARLIAMENT.

PARLIAMENT was opened on the 3d of February, by the Queen in person. The Speech, as usual, consisted of vague generalities, and of paragraphs informing the public of what they already knew. Rather unexpectedly to us, considering the politics of the Ministry, and their assertions no longer ago than August last, it contained the following sentences:—"I recommend to your consideration the state of the Laws which affect the import of Corn, and of other articles, the produce of foreign countries." "I have observed, with deep regret, the continued distress in the manufacturing districts of the country. The sufferings and privations which have resulted from it, have been borne with exemplary patience and fortitude." The announcement, that the Corn and Provision Laws required "Consideration," is evidently a great boon extorted from those who, only a few months ago, upheld those Laws as the perfection of human wisdom; and dooms them, at no distant period, to destruction. Sir Robert Peel stated, in the first week of the Session, that the existing prohibitions against the importation of fresh animal food, and oxen, sheep, and other live animals reared for food, are not to be continued. This, also, is an important announcement. It proclaims, throughout the length and breadth of the land, from undoubted authority, the hideous and all but incredible fact, which we, for years, have been printing, that fresh animal food, and live animals whose flesh is used as food, are, by the aristocracy, not taxed merely, but ABSOLUTELY PROHIBITED; while horses and asses are importable at a trifling duty; and monkeys, parrots, dogs, cats, &c., as well as lobsters and turbots, are FREE. Stock-fish, however, as a vulgar article of food, is not forgotten, the duty being 5*s.* per 120. These facts would of themselves enable any one of ordinary sagacity to discover of what class the legislators of this country are composed.

As far, however, as Sir Robert Peel has yet gone there is little ground for expecting much practical from the principles to be found in the Queen's speech. We do not imagine it very probable that his new Corn Bill will, unmodified, pass into law; and whether it does or not, is, we really think, a matter of absolute indifference. It has not satisfied any party, and we do not remember any measure which has been so generally condemned. It has, however, been very useful in increasing the agitation against the Corn Laws. The delegates of the Corn Law Associations, sitting in London, denounced it as a mockery and insult at the moment it was announced; and a feeling of indignation pervaded the country as soon as the scheme was published. Immediately after it was known at Manchester—the second town in the kingdom—a meeting of the most respectable manufacturers and merchants was held, and a declaration—not a petition to either House of Parliament, or an address to the Crown—was agreed to, the conclusion of which we have only room to give. "Having lost all confidence in the Government, and the House of Commons, as at present constituted, and desiring not only the repeal of bad laws already existing, but also a guarantee for good government for the future; and anxious to avoid those unhappy outbreaks which must inevitably result from the continued oppression and starvation of the people; and feeling convinced that no effectual remedies will be applied until the power of applying them be lodged in the hands of the people, we respectfully, but firmly, demand that the franchise be forthwith extended to every man who is twenty-one years of age, of sound mind, unstained by crime; together with the privilege of secret voting, and such other matters of detail as may be found necessary to the honest and practical working of the principle." Similar meetings have been held at Rochdale, Leeds, Liverpool, Glasgow, &c. Though as yet nothing has been done in Edinburgh, we can testify that the feeling is equally intense, and that men, hitherto the most opposed to an extension of the suffrage, see that, except by that means, there is no hope for the country. The aristocracy are evidently determined to resist to the utmost—to place their estates, and perhaps their lives, in issue, to support a system of laws which ruin and destroy all other classes of the community, and are not, we verily believe, of any advantage to the landowners themselves. But, in truth, we do not think that the aristocracy are so ignorant as to imagine that even their rents are likely to be depressed by the repeal of the Corn Laws. Many of them are perfectly confident that they will not; and the increased rents offered within these few months, for farms out of lease, shew clearly that the farmers fear little any change which is likely to be created by a repeal of the Corn Laws. No; it is not a reduction of rent that the aristocrats feel chiefly. What they fear is, that, under any circumstances, they should be defeated in a struggle with the people. The real question now at issue is—not the repeal of the corn and provision laws, but whether twenty-seven millions of inhabitants of the united kingdom are or are not to be ruled by some thirty thousand proud, ignorant, and bigoted landowners; for so few are the number of our tyrants, not only as statistically proved, but as admitted by the Tory section of the landowners themselves. That is the question now at issue, and the only question.

Of Peel's new Sliding Scale, we must now give a few details. At present, when the price is 51s., the duty is 35s. 8d. By the new scale, it is 20s.; and that is the maximum. Now, this looks well on paper, but, in point of fact, 20s. is a prohibitory duty. We have referred to some of the returns, and, from a rough calculation, we think we may venture confidently to say, that there have not been entered for home consumption 10,000 quarters, during the last fourteen years, at a duty of 20s. Twenty shillings has proved a prohibitory duty; and we, therefore, concur with Sir Robert Peel in saying it is useless to make it higher. It is exposing the landowners to o' loquy without an object. The 20s. duty starves the corn man as effectually as any higher duty; and a scale which goes farther than the point of absolute exclusion, ought surely to be amended for the benefit—not of the poor—but of the rich. Let us now look at the other end of the Scale—at the working end. At present, 1s. is the lowest duty—to which rate it is reduced when the price reaches 73s. Above 74s., by the new scale, there is to be no duty at all. Nobody grudges a shilling duty. It is useful to enable us to ascertain the quantity of grain imported, and taken into home consumption; for experience teaches, that where no duty at all is imposed on a commodity imported, the revenue officers, as well as the importers, get exceedingly careless in specifying, with any accuracy, the quantity. Neither of these parties could see the use of specifying whether a vessel contained 300 or 500 quarters of wheat, were no duty to be imposed on it. At 73s., the duty, by the old and new scales, is the same, 1s.; and the remainder of the scale, as far as it is practically useful, can easily be given:—

Price.	New Scale.	Present Scale.
72s.	2s.	2s. 8d.
71s.	3s.	6s. 8d.
70s.	4s.	10s. 8d.

It is useless to go further, for we have already reached the freezing point—the point of starvation. If ever the word Humbug was properly applicable, it is to Sir Robert Peel's modification of the Sliding Scale.

ASIA.—The "little" wars in Asia will make large drafts on the Exchequer, and the prospect of their termination appears more distant than ever. It is true that we beat the Chinese wherever they show face; but it is already apparent that we are teaching them the art of war. More troops are demanded from India; but they cannot be spared. The mud forts which used to form so excellent a subject for ridicule, are found to be only mud externally; and some of them, at least, are constructed of such materials—good granite—that the heaviest guns now used in our ships of war produce no effect on them; it is only when the shot enters by the embrasures that any harm is done. We have re-occupied Chusan, and taken Ningpo, one of the largest towns in the empire; but still the Chinese show no inclination to treat. Since the previous occupation of Chusan, great improvement in the construction of artillery has become apparent. The next attack will probably be on Pekin; but we suspect that, even were that city taken, we would be no farther advanced than at present. The Emperor and court will take care to remove to some more inland locality, before our troops can reach Pekin; and there they will maintain the same policy as at present—give no answer to our demands, but allow time and disease to operate in their behalf. We do not entertain the exaggerated notions of that city generally current; but we have no doubt it is at least as populous as Paris, and that it probably contains 800,000, or one million, of inhabitants. Yet Paris requires an armed force of at least 50,000 men to keep the population in order; and the garrison of London—quiet as the people are, and have long been—consists, at this moment, of four regiments of horse, and three regiments of foot, besides numerous other troops at Chatham, Woolwich, and elsewhere in the vicinity. Our whole force in China is composed of the Service Companies of the following regiments, all foot:—18th, 26th, 49th, 55th, 98th, and a few battalions of sepoys, probably not exceeding in all 6000 men,—about the strength of the garrison usually kept under the Tory régime in Dublin. It is evidently impossible with such a force to hold possession of Pekin alone, even were it taken without any loss;—especially among a people who will not likely adopt the European rules of warfare, but who may probably resort to all sorts of irregular contrivances for getting rid of their enemy, such as poisoning the water and the food—an art in which the Chinese are great adepts—Sicilian vespers, and other very improper means in the eyes of a soldier. The opium war is just beginning; and before it is ended, there is no great foresight required to predict that some thousands of British lives will be sacrificed, and a million or two added to the National Debt. Besides, there is every reason to believe that our soldiers have never yet been engaged with what we may call the troops of the line of the Chinese emperor. It is generally understood, that, besides the militia, who defend the outposts, there is a large body of Tartar troops maintained for the defence of the capital, mostly horse—a sort of pretorian cohort, who may prove of firmer materials than the Chinese soldiers hitherto encountered. The whole people are enrolled for service, when called on, from an early age, so that millions of soldiers may be raised without any difficulty, under a Government so despotic as the Chinese; and however inefficient as compared with European soldiers, they will harass and annoy to death by their mere numbers the handful of troops we have sent against them.

If we turn from China to India, the prospect is still more gloomy. Though the accounts are contradicted, there is every reason to believe that a general insurrection has taken place throughout Affghanistan, a kingdom of great extent on the north-east of India, and situated between that country and Persia, containing fourteen millions of inhabitants. Whether the insurrection has extended into the neighbouring countries, is not yet ascertained; but its speedy suppression alone will prevent, perhaps, a general revolt in India. It is too plain that, throughout the whole of India, the English are detested, and that peace is preserved solely by the powerful force we maintain there, and by the political intrigues through which one prince is set against another. This much seems certain, that many of the officers, Sir Alexander Burnes among others, have fallen victims at Cabul to the first fury of the populace, and that our troops in that city and neighbourhood were, at the date of the last advices, surrounded and blockaded by an armed population, daily augmenting in numbers. Whether any of our soldiers will ever return through the narrow gorges, defensible by a few men against thousands, is at least questionable. It may well be asked, what have we to do at Cabul, a city some hundreds of miles beyond the extreme frontiers of Hindostan, and at least 1500 miles from the nearest presidency? All the answer that can be given is, that possibly at some future period the French or Russians may make use of this pass to invade India, and that, therefore, for the purpose of guarding against a very remote possible evil, we must expose ourselves at this moment to great expense, risk, and danger; while our expedition, instead of diminishing the risk of future invasion, greatly augments such risk—as the event has already proved—by irritating a great population throughout an exclusive territory against us. These wars, unless relinquished, will not prove so "little" as has hitherto been imagined. Both are unjust, and have been disapproved of by the best judges, both civil and military; and it is the duty of the people of this country to apply to the throne, and to Parliament, to put an end to them. Both are mere ebullitions of the pride of the aristocracy, with which the people have no concern.

Trade and Manufactures continue as gloomy as ever, and there appears, as yet, no alleviation of the distress. No animation is apparent in any branch of trade. A very important document regarding the state of the cotton trade has appeared since our last. It is a circular, addressed by no less than sixty of the most respectable firms in Manchester to the wholesale houses in London interested in the cotton trade. It appears from this document that the consumption of cotton wool has been 156,012 bales less in 1841 than in 1840—a quantity that would load 24,000 carts with nearly a ton each. Yet the export of yarns and cotton goods was greater in 1841 than in 1840, thus demonstrating that the whole of the enormous decrease in the consumption of cotton has been occasioned by the falling off of the home trade. "Experience has taught us," say the Manchester manufacturers, "that when provisions are cheap, the home trade in manufactures is prosperous, and vice versa. The average price of wheat for the three years, 1834, 5, 6, was 44s. 8d.; for the three years, 1839, 40, 41, it was 68s. a quarter—being an increase of 50 per cent.; and other provisions were in proportion. Suppose the whole food of the people cost one hundred millions a-year in the cheaper period—not £4 per annum per head—it will have cost one hundred and fifty millions last year, so that there were fifty millions less to expend on clothing in 1841, than on the average of 1834, 5, 6. Surely these facts show that the Corn Laws must be, at least, one great cause of the distress.

The ship-owners are again moving for a repeal of the Reciprocity treaties: they do not even yet seem to see that no legislation can give them the monopoly of the carrying trade of the world, which they enjoyed during the war; for it is only during war, and after our Navy has swept the ocean of every foreign vessel, that we can again have the monopoly. Let them agitate for a repeal of the duties on timber and the other materials of which their ships are built, and for the liberty of victualling their ships with untaxed provisions. They will then be in a state of equality with foreigners. To clamour for the repeal of the Reciprocity treaties, which alone have saved our shipping from ruin, is worse than useless. A very important fact regarding our shipping is deserving of attention. The West India Steam Navigation Company have hired foreign vessels to carry coals to their depôts in the West Indies, the freight of the foreign vessels being much lower than the British. We doubt if the repeal of the Reciprocity treaties would reach such a case as this. It appears that distress is not confined to the country, but has extended to our colonies. The markets of Australia are so glutted with British manufactures, that they are sold cheaper there than at home; yet the extent of our exports is relied on by Sir Robert Peel as evidence of prosperity,—as if it was a sign of prosperity to have bales of goods lying rotting at the Antipodes, or selling for less than they cost. The West India planters also are in anything but a flourishing condition. In Jamaica, there are not half-a-dozen estates in the island which, for the last three or four years, have paid the expense of cultivation.

AGRICULTURE.

The weather for the last few weeks has been very favourable for ploughing; and there is every prospect of a large breadth of wheat being sown in better condition, than the winter crop was got into the ground. Agricultural operations are all well advanced, there having been few material interruptions during the winter. We have seen no reason to alter the estimate of the last crop we have given on former occasions. It is undoubtedly very deficient. The report from Caithness is, that the crop turns out very middling: oats weighing from 37 lbs. to 39 lbs. a bushel, and bear from 46 to 48 lbs. Owing to the apprehended change in the Corn Laws, markets have continued very dull; but now that it is seen that the landed interest have no reason to fear any material change, they may be expected to get brisker. Supplies of foreign grain have been coming in all the winter, and there is now a large quantity in the country. Speculators must, therefore, anticipate a great reduction of duty before next harvest. The duty on wheat, on 10th Feb., rose to 25s. 8d. Agricultural societies, which have done so much good in Scotland, are rapidly spreading over England. The Royal Agricultural Society of England, formed in imitation of our Highland Society, and in which the Duke of Richmond takes much interest, hold their next great meeting at Bristol. Numerous other societies and clubs have been formed, at the meetings of which much useful information has been elicited. We are glad to observe, that in England, the propriety of granting leases is beginning to be appreciated. At a meeting at Gloucester, Earl Ducie, after pointing out to the farmers the necessity of continual progress and improvement in agriculture, remarked, that he never wished to see any man enter upon a farm without a lease. He would regard the tenant as a fool who would sink money on a farm without the protection of a lease; because, however much confidence he might have in the landlord, he had no security for a similar treatment if a son or trustees came into the management. At a meeting at Chepstow, the following mode of feeding farm horses was recommended: their fodder to consist of two-thirds hay and one-third wheat straw chopped small with half a bushel of barley or bran meal, a bushel of bran, and 140 lbs. of Swedish turnips, per week. A species of barley has been discovered in Worcestershire, not only very prolific, but which produces two crops in the year if sown early in spring. After being cut in July, new shoots spring up which are ripe in October. Tile-draining goes on vigorously throughout the kingdom, and numerous patents have been taken out for machines for making the tiles. One of these machines was shown lately in the Grassmarket, so simple in its construction, that it can be sold for £10, yet so efficient, that one man can make by means of it, 5000 or 6000 tiles a day.

CHAPTER V.

"Oh! mother—yet no mother."—SAVAGE.

"I HAD no intention of offending you, dearest mother," whispered Basil, when at length the subsiding of Lady Annesley's emotion seemed to justify his addressing her. But, to his great surprise, on the withdrawal of her hands from her face to enable her to reply, her countenance had so completely resumed its usual rigidity, that all apology appeared superfluous. He now attempted to take into his own one of the hands which had been screening those stern features; but it was obstinately fixed to her side.

"Believe me, I had no intention of offending you," reiterated the young man, with still more earnest affection.

"Your excuses are a deeper offence than your indiscretion," replied Lady Annesley, in a harsh voice. "Your coming hither at all, has disturbed and thwarted me. Your conduct, now you are here, seems scarcely likely to reconcile me to your disobedience."

"Dearest mother!" cried Basil, stung by her severity out of his habitual deference of reserve, "you well know that your wishes are laws to me,—that I would sacrifice my happiness here and hereafter for your sake,"

"You are a large talker, Basil," interrupted Lady Annesley. "It is easy to protest—easy to undertake services or sacrifices that can never be required of you. I requested you to abstain for the present, from visiting the Grange.—Yet, you are here!"

"I have already explained my motives," cried Basil, eagerly—"already pledged myself to immediate departure. If you wish it, mother, I will not wait till to-morrow—I will be off this very night. I can return to Lyndhurst,—I can sleep at the inn. It is late. The fellow who brought my baggage will scarcely be persuaded to return for it to-night. But early in the morning he shall be here, in time to enable me to start by the first coach."

Lady Annesley gazed a moment upon the young and handsome face, on which the most earnest sincerity was painted at that moment.

"Abide here to-night, my son," said she, calmly, at the close of her scrutiny. "Another time, be more acquiescent."

"But I assure you, dearest mother, I should be well accommodated at Lyndhurst; and it may be as well to be there in waiting for the coach. I—"

"You will remain here, if you please!" interrupted Lady Annesley, in a cold and positive tone. "It is, as you observe, late; and the hour is unseemly for traversing the fields. The forest produces inconvenient neighbours, and dangerous company. The illness of my poor Nicholas proceeded, in the first instance, from a rough encounter on the road, one evening at dusk, on his return from conveying my letters to the post. I pray you, therefore, to remain here—"

"Certainly, if such be your desire."

"But not the less to hasten your departure at an early hour to-morrow. I will even take my leave of you to-night, Basil; for I must watch through the small hours, to enable poor Dorcas to take some sleep; and shall probably retire to rest just as you are stirring."

"As you please, dear mother," replied the dispirited young man, perceiving by her tone and gesture that these words implied dismissal for the night. "If you must indeed watch by the poor old man, I can understand that my presence here must be importunate. But if you would only permit me for this one night to take your place—"

"I have already expressed my pleasure on that point."

"At least, since you judge me too restless or careless for a nurse, (though you used to praise my care when I waited upon yourself during your attack of ague last year,) at least, there is Hannah to relieve you. Hannah is a stout, active, trusty girl, who would be none the worse for wanting, occasionally, a night's rest."

"She is not to be trusted. The young are ever inefficient watchers. With them 'the spirit may be willing, but the flesh is weak.'—They have no distracting thoughts to keep their senses on the alert,—no cares to render them wakeful. They lay their heads on their pillows, and are in Heaven till morning; and when they attempt the watcher's chair of penance, fancy their heads upon their pillows!"

"If it be on that account you refuse my services," observed Basil, "I promise you, mother, that I have cares enough in my keeping, both of my own and of other people, to keep me as wakeful as you could desire."

Again did Lady Annesley intently examine her son.

"You have no right to have cares of your own," said she; "and I advise you to be cautious how you become care-keeper for others. Your own turn will come. You have your share, Basil, in the typical inheritance of the sons of Adam,—the thorns which the earth was condemned to bring forth in punishment for the sin of our common parents. Such is the commandment of a jealous GOD!"

"I am more in fear of the penalty entailed upon my head by the fall of man," observed Basil, in a low voice, "than of having to answer for any sins of my own parents. But, as I said before, mother, if it be because you think me a sleepy-head that you deny me the pleasure of relieving your guard for this one night——"

"Once and for all, it is not on that account," said Lady Annesley, in an angry voice; "you were not wont, Basil, to be so pertinacious or so inquisitive. Amend the fault before we meet again; and show me that it is already repented by immediate compliance with my requests. Retire to rest, that you may be stirring the earlier.—Yonder is your bed-candle.—Good night."—

Basil Annesley was conscious at that moment of a choking sensation in his throat, such as he had often experienced in childhood, when unjustly chidden; and which now almost suggested resistance to authority thus harshly exercised. He remained a moment doubtful whether to fling himself at Lady Annesley's feet, and implore a more motherly entreatment; or stand forth reprovingly in all the energy of his youthful sense of her injustice, and hazard a still stronger appeal. But that momentary pause recalled to his generous mind that his mother was harassed by fatigue, and care-worn by the danger of her faithful servant; and he determined, as his filial piety had so often determined before, to submit and be patient.

After imprinting a kiss upon the slender hand which, if no longer obstinately withheld from him, was far from encouragingly held forth, he took the candle from the marble table, hastily lighted it, and silently withdrew; eager to give vent, in his own chamber, to the emotions contending in his heart.

But on his arrival there, he was struck by the order in which his things were laid out for him; and the more than usual care with which his comfort had been provided for.—Hoping to obtain an interview with old Dorcas, and entreat her influence with her lady, to obtain him his due share in the family vigils, he strove to discover some deficiency entitling him to ring for assistance.—Impossible!—Everything was in its place—everything forthcoming; the kettle beside the fire,—the boot-jack and slippers beside the chair.—

"I can, at all events, summon Hannah, on pretence of wishing to be called before daybreak," said he, musing.

Having fulfilled his intention, he anxiously awaited the tap at the door, announcing the usually assiduous attendance of the active damsel. But no knock was heard,—no Hannah made her appearance; and when, weary of waiting and having twice poked up the fire into a blaze to beguile his impatience, he ventured to ring again, the same silence prevailed. Nothing was audible but the shrill whistling of the wind in the old corridor; and now and then, a squeak and a scuffle among the merry mice, coursing each other in brigades, by moonlight, in the deserted chambers above.

A third time did Basil make the attempt, which, he trusted, would summon poor Dorcas for a moment from the chamber of the invalid which lay at the extremity of an adjoining passage. But, lo! when, instead of the expected tap, the door revolved slowly upon its hinges, it was his mother, and not her attendant, who stood before him!—

"Are you in want of anything, that you thus disturb the house?"—said she, gravely. "I thought I had been careful in supplying all you could possibly need to-night."

"I merely rang for Hannah, to say that——"

"Hannah has retired to bed, and Dorcas is retiring," persisted Lady Annesley. "When you released me just now, I took up my post for the night beside the sick man; satisfied that, having carefully arranged your room with my own hands previous to joining you at tea, no further attendance would be wanting.—Is there anything I can procure or do for you?"—

"Could I have entertained the least idea, dearest mother, that you had already given yourself all this trouble on my account——"

"I ask you again, is there anything further I can do for you?—Be quick!—My presence is required elsewhere."—

"Nothing on earth."

"You rang, then, to summon the girl for a needless attendance?"

"I rang to request I might be called at the earliest hour of morning, to secure my obedience to your orders," replied Basil, proudly.

"Did you suppose that I should leave the hour of your rising to chance? Be satisfied!—You shall be called betimes. And now, let me entreat you to abstain from further disturbance. You are in the house of sickness—perhaps to become, before morning, the house of death!"—

Basil stood confounded at the unmerited harshness of his mother; and did not recover his self-possession for many minutes after Lady Annesley quitted the room. His heart was now sorer than before. He was more than ever stung by her severity, on finding it coupled with the vigilance of mother-love which had presided over the arrangements of his chamber. He felt that he must, indeed, be a grievous offender, since the affections of her heart were thus controllable by the sternness of her displeasure.

He now flung himself despondingly, into a seat before the fire; and placing his feet upon the old-fashioned fender, and fixing his eyes upon the heavy brass dogs supporting the crackling logs—upon the hearth, tried to feel himself at home. It is strange how often the habitation familiar to us from infancy, seems less familiar and less a home to us, than the dwelling of the stranger. For the life and soul of him Basil could not feel at home. He kept dreading the reëntrance of his mother for further reprehension, yet equally feared to bolt the door against her return, least she should take offence at this seeming defiance. His very thoughts, under the influence of such impressions, did not seem secure from her intrusion. There were subjects on which he felt afraid to ponder. There were people he dared not pass in review or recall with the tenderness of memory, lest he should suddenly find the severe eye of Lady Annesley fixed upon his face, prepared to scan and scrutinize the nature of his feelings.

Most people are conscious of the sort of disburthenment of thought and sentiment apt to follow a transition from cities to the country. In the quiet of the first night spent out of town, disjointed images reconnect themselves; ideas and conclusions assume a regular train of thought; and Basil experienced all the desire of one suddenly enfranchised from the rabble and tumult of London, to dwell upon the course of recent events, and determine more consideringly what portion of his loves and friendships had been lavished in vain.

But it was no moment for such reveries. The dread of his mother's reappearance was potent over his mind, as over that of a child the terror of a midnight apparition.—His thoughts were paralyzed.—He could not even feel freely at that moment.—

Wondering surmises hastily traversed his brain with regard to the mysterious portrait he had seen that evening, and the still more mysterious emotions betrayed by his mother. Painfully-pleasing visions flitted before his eyes of the bright form of Esther—his own Esther,—his beloved Esther! But just as her eyes seemed gazing into his, the creaking of the wainscot seemed to indicate from without the approach of Lady Annesley; and the light of the fire appeared a reflection of that which had recently brightened the chamber, from the taper held in the hand of his mother.

The night was beginning to be tempestuous. As the moon had set, the winds were rising;—beating menacingly against the crazy walls of the old Grange, as if to demand how they had dared so long to withstand the attacks of time and tide; and roaring in the vast chimney, as though to inquire the meaning of an unwonted inmate in that room.

By degrees, the storm rose into fierceness. The shrill whistling of the winds became a shriek; and the arrowy pattering of sleet was heard sharply against the windows.

Under this influence, the spirits of Basil became still more and more depressed. He was incapable of even the sensations of comfort imparted by a warm fireside, when listening to a storm without. He was an intruder in his mother's house,—he was an alien from his mother's heart. Lady Annesley had secrets in which she rejected his participation,—she had cares for which she disdained his solace.—At that moment, Basil felt himself to be most unhappy.

To sit and gaze upon the glowing embers, however, afforded little consolation. It is when perplexed, not when afflicted, that we delight in fire-gazing. At length, the warmth which imparted no pleasure, seemed to inspire energy: for, suddenly starting up, he recalled to mind that the surest way to win his mother's confidence, was implicit obedience; and that, in order "early to rise," it was expedient to adopt the precept of "early to bed."

Midnight had already struck, previous to this good resolution; and ere his head had been long upon the pillow, the first hour of morning was sternly announced by the crazy old clock gracing the stair-head adjoining his chamber. It was unlikely, however, that he should hear the striking of a second, for he was growing drowsy. His cares assumed a less definite pressure; and the shape of Esther hovered less visibly before his closing eyes. Easier in spirit—easy in position, he forgot the causes of maternal oppression and his own subservience to a Jew, and fell quietly asleep.

His dreams, however, soon became unquiet. The expressive countenance portrayed by the miniature, (its handsome features commingled with those of Abednego Osalez and of his own face,) seemed to mock and perplex his slumbers. Again did his stern mother harshly reproach him; and strange voices seemed to mingle in mockery with her upbraidings.

He woke: he started from his feverish pillow! The strange voices were easily explained by the fitful moaning of the storm, which now appeared to sink into the sobbing of despair,—now to rise into shrieks of eldritch laughter. But there were no faces around him to explain the visions of his disquiet. He was alone, with scarcely a gleam of light emanating from the dying embers on the hearth.

In another moment, he would have sunk down again upon his pillow, and fallen once more asleep, but that his disturbed imagination conceived an idea, that the wailing which at first appeared that of the storm without, might after all be the expression of human suffering,—the plaintive cries of the dying man. His mother might be exposed to the dreadful task of watching alone over an agonized bed of death!—

He rose, and flung on his dressing-gown. Displeased as Lady Annesley might be at his presuming to disobey her commands, he would not suffer this. He could not forbear!—He would insist upon sharing her vigils. Softly opening the door, he proceeded without a light along the corridor, hoping to attain the door of the apartment, which he knew to have been appropriated to the poor old man. But, as he advanced, he became again persuaded that those mournful moanings really proceeded from the gusts of the storm. Nay, as he approached nearer the chamber of sickness, these happened to have fallen into such momentary stillness, that the beating of his own heart seemed almost as audible, as he recognised, in the dead of the night, the stern voice of Lady Annesley reciting aloud, the prayers for the sick and grievously afflicted, beside the bed of the dying man.

Retreating in haste to his chamber, as if unworthy to share a task so solemn, Basil was soon in bed; and the momentary chill and movement of his exploit seemed to have restored the power of slumber; for he now slept heavily, and slep long.—How long he knew not: but a pale grey light was stealing into the chamber, when again he opened his eyes.

And this time, he could not deceive himself. A face was bending over him, and peering into his. Not the ideal face of Esther however. There was no mistaking it for any one of the visages which had haunted his dreams; or even for the rosy face of the damsel who, Lady Annesley had informed him, was charged to rouse him at daybreak. It was an aged face, withered by time and sorrow—even that of his mother's ancient gentlewoman.

"Master Basil, I say,—dear Master Basil," gasped the intruder, "I have been calling you these five minutes."—

"Thanks, Dorcas, many thanks.—I fear I have been sleeping heavily.—Send me my shaving-water, and I will be up directly. Is it late,—or am I yet in time?"—

"Hush, Sir; speak softly, I beg of you. My lady has not been an hour in bed; and having forced her to take an anodyne draught after the dreadful night she has been passing, so as to ensure her a few hours' rest to meet her further trials, I am grievously afraid of having her waked.—Nothing more injurious, Master Basil, than being disturbed when opiates are taking effect; and my poor lady is in no state to bear further extremities. She has not slept till now, these five nights past; nor enjoyed undisturbed slumber from the beginning of the poor old gardener's illness."

"I will be very careful, Dorcas. It had been already settled between us, that she was not to be disturbed for my departure. I will dress immediately, and shall have left the house without her knowing it."

"It is not that, Sir.—I do not wish you to go, Master Basil.—I want your help, Sir; I am in great trouble,—sore trouble and distress!"—faltered the old waiting-woman, drawing her hand across her eyes.

"I am inclined to thank God for your being here, Sir;—and yet I fear my lady will never forgive me for having even mentioned the subject to you.—But indeed, and indeed, Sir, such scenes are too much for her! It would go against my conscience,—nay, I believe it is as much as her life is worth—to wake her at this moment. Yet indeed, Sir, I cannot manage him alone."

"Are you in need, then, of my assistance for Nicholas, Dorcas?" cried young Annesley.—"I will be with you in a moment, ——"

"But you are not aware, Sir; I must first apprize you,—your kind, good heart, Master Basil, would be too much shocked;"—

"My dear Dorcas, it is not the first time I have seen a dying man. Even my professional duties sometimes lead me to an hospital."

"Ay, ay, Sir! But not to a death-bed like this. It is a hard thing even for me, who have passed through enough and to spare of the sorry sights of this world, to see my poor old fellow-servant in such a condition.—But for your young eyes, Master Basil, ——"

"Only give me a moment to throw on my clothes, ——"

"I am not without hope, Sir, that, startled by your coming, whom he has not seen for months, Nicholas may so far recover his reason as to know you; and then, perhaps, he might compose himself, and be quieted without recourse to violent means," ——

"To violent means?"—interrupted Basil. "Is the poor fellow, then, bereft of his reason?"

"He has had repeated attacks of delirium throughout his illness. Yesterday morning, the professional gentleman who comes from Southampton to visit him, found it necessary to place him under restraint. Towards evening, he became calmer; and my lady insisted upon releasing him from the strait-waistcoat. Infirm as he is,—feeble,—dying,—she says his violence is merely that of words, and that he can do no serious injury to himself or others."

"Gracious Heaven!—My mother has been exposed, then, alone, throughout the night, to the violence of a lunatic!"

"Nicholas was never known, even in his worst paroxysms, Master Basil, to lift his hand, or even his voice, against my lady. Her presence seems to have a soothing power over him, beyond the authority or coercion of the physicians."

"But why, Dorcas, did you not tell me all this last night?"

"I was sent to bed by my lady, Sir, tired and exhausted with struggling against him, without so much as an intimation of your arrival; and I am convinced, that, after so anxiously keeping you away from the Grange lest you should witness this mournful scene, my lady was in hopes you would be off to London without obtaining any suspicion of the matter."

"How strange!"—faltered young Annesley.

"My lady loves you too well, Master Basil, to bear your being unnecessarily troubled."

"But herself, Dorcas?"

"My lady is used to trouble—"

"My dear, dear mother!"—

"Show your affection, Sir, by lending me your assistance, and securing her a few hours' sleep: she will wake refreshed and comforted. But unless I can prevail upon you to remain, I have not courage to undertake him alone, till the Doctor comes."

Having persuaded the ancient gentlewoman to facilitate her own object by leaving him to dress and rejoin her, Basil hastily and anxiously accomplished his toilet. He was soon at the door from which he had so timidly retreated in the dead of night.

On entering the chamber, he perceived Dorcas stationed on one side the bed; and, hidden within the curtains on the other, weeping and trembling, the stout servant girl, who had been left in charge of the maniac during her companion's absence. The grey light of dawn dimly penetrated the scene; falling chiefly on the white head of the venerable sufferer, who was propped with pillows, and staring around him with the ghastly fixedness characteristic of aberration of intellect.

"Do not be afraid of approaching him, Sir: he is quite harmless!"—said Dorcas, with the bluntness of a coarse mind, on seeing her young master hesitate beside the door, impressed by the patriarchal aspect of the old man, whose hoary beard had been many weeks unshorn.—"Besides, as I said just now, the surprise might do him good."

"My poor Nicholas!" faltered young Annesley, who had by this time reached the bed.

"Who called me?"—demanded the patient, in a hollow voice.

"I am sorry to hear you have been so ill, Nicholas," persisted Basil, avoiding a direct reply, with a view to determine his power of recognition.

Instead of answering, the old man fixed his glassy eyes upon the person who thus unexpectedly presented himself; and for some moments did not vary the dull steadfastness of his gaze. At length, a gradual ray of intelligence seemed to brighten that soulless stare.

"I know you now!"—said he, in a low voice. "I know you, and I tell you to begone!—What are you doing here?—Must there be more blood upon your hand?—Has not my lord expresely bidden us spurn you from his gate?—But there needed no bidding of his: I would have done it untold!—Even I would not witness the shame of my young lady!"

"My poor Nicholas, compose yourself!" said Basil, in a soothing voice, bending kindly towards him.

"Your poor Nicholas?"—shouted the maniac, at the top of his broken voice, causing young Annesley to start back.—"How dare you call me your poor Nicholas?—How dare you attempt to cajole me?—Away with you!—Away, Jew!—I know you, I tell you. When first your gold persuaded me unsuspectingly to do your bidding, I thought you a gentleman,—I thought you a man!—And now I spit upon you as a false and unbelieving Jew! Away, away, I say; or there is strength enough still in the old man's gripe to tear you limb from limb!"

"For God's sake, Mr. Annesley, Sir, get away from him!" screamed the girl, who, in the danger of another, lost sight of her own.—"He will be the death of you, Sir!"—

"He shall not go!—I have him fast?" cried the maniac, grasping the arm of the unresisting young man.

"Indeed, Master Basil, it will be safer to leave the room,"—cried Dorcas, becoming terrified in her turn.

"Basil?—what Basil?—ay, ay, another of her tricks! She wants to impose him upon my lord as his grandson; but she cannot deceive me! I am not yet so old, or so blind, as not to discover him through all his disguises; and from the moment he attempted to take the life of my master's son, I swore his own should not be safe if he came hither again.—And now I have caught you!—As usual—as usual—as of old—stealing into the house like a thief in the dark, when others are asleep,—others suffering and weeping;—ay, weeping tears of blood for the sorrows you have caused!—My poor young lady!"—

Basil Annesley was now becoming really intimidated; not by the sense of his own danger, but by the dread of obtaining surreptitious insight into the secrets of his mother. The word "Jew,"—the allusion to blood,—to family sorrow,—to family disgrace,—caused his own blood to thrill within his veins.

"Be calm, my poor old friend," faltered he, in an altered voice, without attempting to disengage his arm from the grasp of the lunatic. "Look at me, Nicholas!—Recall me to your mind!—Remember little Basil—remember Basil Annesley!"—A sort of howl instantly burst from the infuriated patient,—a howl terminating in a burst of frenetic laughter.

"ANNESLEY, forsooth!"—cried he. "Poor fool, poor fool!—poor cover to shame,—poor blind, blind dupe!—Annesley?—the victim of a cunning, paltry Jew! If your name be Annesley, again I say, away with ye!—Go hide yourself in the grave, as your father did before you! He swore he would!—He said nothing but death could efface such dishonour; a violent death—a bloody death. But the drops he shed in obtaining it, young man, wrought not half the anguish in the heart they burst from, that the tears of his repentant widow have wrung out of the depths of her own. Away with ye, I say again, and hide yourself,—child of the foulest father and guiltiest mother that ever called down upon the head of their offspring the judgments of GOD!"—

Basil Annesley shuddered as he listened. The trembling fingers of the delirious sufferer still griped his arm. But it was not their feverish hold which caused his heart to quail.—A heavy hand was upon his shoulder!—His mother stood beside him!—

Disturbed from her slumbers by the dreadful cry uttered by her distracted charge, Lady Annesley had risen in haste, and hurried, in her nightdress, to his chamber.—

She arrived there just in time to overhear the terrible revelations which had driven every tinge of colour from the cheeks of her son.

CHAPTER VI.

There are few sunnier or pleasanter mansions in the metropolis, than the one in Arlington Street, inhabited by the Maitland family; overlooking the Green Park, across a trimly little garden belted with lilac bushes and evergreens; but containing within, a scene of brighter seeming than the gayest London thoroughfare can supply.

Impossible to conceive a stronger contrast than between the stern retreat of Sir Bernard Annesley's widow, and the brilliant abode of Lord Maitland's wife:—the one grim and gloomy as her own care-crazed destinies; the other radiant with gilding and varnish, porcelain and or-molu, musical instruments, and fashionable caricatures: everything that modern luxury can supply to dazzle the eyes of Time with their senseless glitter.

The Maitlands were, in most respects, showy people—heartless people—people of the day—such as might be expected in a family where the father is on the turf, and the only duties of the mother's life not discharged by proxy, are those of a patroness of Almack's. Lady Maitland's daughters were the production of the governess; Lord Maitland's son, the work of Eton and Sandhurst; and, considering the superficial second nature derivable from such sources, the young people were amiable enough. They did no harm in the world. It was not their own fault that they had never been taught to do good. Their town residence was one of those pleasant houses which constitute a charming lounge for London idlers. There were always chat, scandal, and music waiting till called for at the Maitlands'.

Before her daughters grew up, her ladyship had adopted the system of encouraging morning visiters to assist her in frittering away her leisure;—and there appeared no pretext for suddenly opposing an obstacle to the tide of busy idleness she had brought upon herself. It was impossible to say frankly—"I no longer desire young men to frequent my house, because my daughters are now young women; and if they see Laura and Lucy too familiarly, they may not be tempted to make them their wives." The thing was, therefore, suffered to go on.

Besides, the spoiled child of the family, John Maitland the eldest son, was too devoid of rational pursuits to dispense with constant society. John hated to be alone with his family. John was in the Guards—a fixture in London; and would have made himself a considerable nuisance to the family with whom he hated to be left alone, unless his pleasure had been duly studied.

His brother officers had consequently the run of the sunny drawing-room in Arlington Street. As the Dowager-Colonel, old Carrington, often observed, "there would have been no getting through the winter in town, without the Maitlands!"—a comprehensive popularity fatal to young ladies on their preferment. It is not often marriages take place in a family, where the daughters are only generalized as "the So-and-So's."

"What the deuce has become of Annesley?" demanded John Maitland of Captain Blencowe, who was sitting with them in Arlington Street the day after Basil's departure for Barlingham Grange.

"Out of town," was the careless reply.

"I fancied that most of the holiday parties were broken up," observed Laura Maitland, whose notion of country attraction consisted in a gay mansion, where thirty people sit down daily to dinner; in a hunting county with meets on the lawn,—or with billiards and private theatricals where the sporting is indifferent.

"Annesley is not gone to join a party. Annesley goes into the country to be privately flogged with his mother's apron-string!" replied Captain Blencowe, jocosely.

"To be tied to it, I suppose you mean," observed John Maitland, who was sealing notes at a writing-table, where his mother had been dictating invitations.

"I don't think she likes him well enough to secure his company by coercive means," retorted Blencowe. "I never saw so cold or harsh a woman as Lady Annesley."

"But where does one meet her, Captain Blencowe?" inquired Lucy Maitland, from the embroidery-frame at which she sat listening.

"Lady Maitland may perhaps have met her, five-and-twenty years ago. In our time, she has lived the life of a recluse."

"Then how came you to see her?"

"I did not come. On the contrary, she came to see me. When Basil had that attack of quinsy last year, and was so near dying, I wrote to Lady Annesley, who hurried up to town. I was officiating as his nurse; and vow to Heaven, that the sight of her severe countenance and mourning dress, from morning till night, made me almost as ill as himself.—After sitting up with her half a night, I fancied I had been in the company of one of the familiars of the Inquisition!"

"By Jove, Blencowe—how you do romance!" cried John Maitland. "To conjure an ugly old woman, in a black bombazeen gown, into a familiar of the Inquisition!"

"How could I tell into what she might conjure me? She had all the air of a practitioner of the Black Art!—However, with all Lady Annesley's apparent harshness, if she be half so good a mother as nurse, Basil can have no fault to find with her."

"But does he find fault?"—inquired Lucy Maitland, with interest.

"Basil seldom finds fault with anything or anybody, for he is the best-natured fellow in the world. But I suspect that he would sooner arraign the Commander-in-chief, or the Commander-in-chief's Commander-in-chiefissimo, than allude slightingly to his mother. Annesley is almost superstitious in his filial devotion."

John Maitland looked round from the writing-table with a significant gesture towards Blencowe, as if to implore silence on so delicate a topic in presence of his own mother; while Lucy murmured something over her crochet work that sounded very like commendation.

"I am sadly afraid young Annesley is likely to make a fool of himself!" sententiously interposed Colonel Carrington, who was in the habit of establishing himself, his half hour per diem, in Lady Maitland's drawing-room, as much as a matter of routine, as he swallowed his morning dose of Harrison's gout mixture, or his evening digestion-pill, fancying that because the boys of the regiment were amused there, he must be amused there also; for it had become a matter of course for every ensign, on entering the regiment, to fall in love with one or other of John Maitland's sisters; and if of sufficient fortune or connexions, to be admitted as a lounger in Arlington Street,—the daughters favouring them as agreeable partners, or the mother as eligible partners for life.

If the Dowager-Colonel formed the same pretensions as his younger and more acceptable brother officers, he was admitted with very different views. Old Carrington, the butt of the subalterns at mess, was also the butt of the Maitlands' drawing-room; nor did they seem aware how many people accept it as a sure indication of the ill-nature and ill-breeding of a society to have an established butt as a stimulant to its attempts at wit.

One of the many ways in which the old beau lent himself to the fulfilment of their purposes, was by his jealousy of every good-looking young fellow who joined the regiment. Till Wilberton came, Annesley had been the object of his antipathy; and Colonel Carrington still rarely neglected an opportunity of attacking Basil.

On the present occasion, finding that no notice was taken of the first discharge of his battery, he hazarded a second fire. "I am afraid," said he, more articulately, "young Annesley is likely to make a fool of himself,—which I sincerely regret. Let Lady Annesley be as disagreeable as she may, Basil is an only son, and the son of a gallant soldier. I should be sorry, indeed, to see his mother's old age rendered miserable by his ruin."

"In what does Basil make himself a greater fool than the rest of us?" demanded John Maitland, (Captain Blencowe being too much engrossed by Lucy's work-basket to take up the cudgels in defence of his absent friend.) "We are all tolerable asses, one way or other. For my part, I look upon Basil Annesley as the Solon of the battalion."

"Then give me leave to observe, that you say very little for the rest of us!" said the Colonel, crabbedly, settling his long throat in an old-fashioned stock.

"Pretty nearly as much as you deserve," gracelessly retorted young Maitland. "For instance, he does not ruin himself in perfumes and cosmetics, like Loftus, for the cultivation of whiskers that will not grow, and the dispersion of freckles that will; or like Wilberton, in building cabs and Broughams for the pleasure of seeing those eternal crests and cyphers of his emblazoned in some new fashion. He does not set Graham's in an uproar, night after night, by his bad play, like Blencowe yonder, who is whispering so low to Lucy that I conclude that neither of them hear what we are saying—"

"Did you speak to me?" inquired Captain Blencowe, consciously, suddenly starting up.

"Nor does he, like you, my dear Colonel," persisted John Maitland, "amuse the figurantes at rehearsal, by the stiff-jointed deliberation with which he stalks out of the way when they are clearing the stage for action."

Colonel Carrington was, just then, troubled with so severe a fit of coughing, that he heard not a syllable of this rude attack.

"You seem to have got your winter cough again, Colonel Carrington?"—said Laura Maitland, with pretended solicitude; "you should try some Arabic lozenges."

"Nonsense—lozenges!" interrupted her brother; "Carrington's cough proceeds from asthma. It is a very serious thing to trifle with a chronic asthma!"

"I have told you a hundred times, Maitland, that it is nothing of the sort," pettishly interrupted the Dowager-Colonel; "Cannot a man take cold without having an habitual asthma?—You are, in fact, the cause of my catarrh, by throwing up the window at the Club, with an east wind blowing in our faces, to shout to Harman in his cab about the issue of the pigeon-match. It would not have hurt him to get out, or you to go out, rather than run the chance of giving cold to twenty of your friends."

"And aggravating the habitual asthma of the twenty-first!—Well, well, my dear Colonel,—I'm sorry I mentioned it. I know it is a delicate point;—and the men know it is a delicate point, particularly on field-days, and in a high wind. However, many poor fellows in the prime of life are subject to gout and asthma. Many besides yourself suffer from gout and asthma before they are fifty:—don't they, mother?"

"Have you finished sealing those notes, John?" demanded Lady Maitland, by way of motherly interference.

"All those that signify: all the elder sons and young baronets of decent estate have been despatched. I left the younger brothers and Irish dowagers to the last, in case the seal should get too warm, and myself too lukewarm, to escape the charge of slovenliness.—We shall still do very well, however, for a 'Lady Maitland requests the honour of Lord George Rawdon's company to a small early party on Friday next:' for if Rawdon were not a Lord George, I suppose we might give him a wafer at once."

"What was that you were saying about gout and asthma, Colonel Carrington?"—demanded Lady Maitland, conceiving in her turn, that it might be as well to change the conversation.

"I was saying," interposed the Colonel—choosing, for his own sake, to misunderstand her,—"that it is a lamentable thing young Annesley should be making such a fool of himself."

"That is the third time you have repeated yourself, Carr, my fine fellow!" said young Maitland, completing the sealing of the last note; "and I see you are determined we should ask questions. You sha'n't be kept in suspense any longer. How is Annesley likely to make a fool of himself—when,—where?—Make haste!—say your worst, and put him and us out of our pain."

"I don't understand you, Maitland," said the Colonel, again settling his head uneasily in his stock: "I know no more than yourself of his proceedings. The rehearsals I attend you attend also; and for once that I set foot in Graham's, you are there twenty times!"

"But is there anything that commits Mr. Annesley more than the rest of the world, in frequenting either of those places?" inquired Lucy Maitland, addressing her question directly to Captain Blencowe,—as much as to say, "If you love me, take the part of your friend;" which, if he loved her, he was the less likely to do.

"I trust not—being therein as great a delinquent as himself," rejoined Blencowe. "But those who want to hear Annesley abused, need only listen to Wilberton and Carrington—one of whom is jealous of him, and the other envious."

"Which of them is envious?" inquired Lucy Maitland, looking archly up from her work.

"The man with the least mind of the two;—Envy being meaner than Jealousy."

Miss Maitland shrugged her shoulders, as if to imply the slightness of mental distinction between the young Ensign and old Colonel.

"Wilberton is envious of Basil," resumed Captain Blencowe; "because he is luckier at tennis than himself. Carrington is jealous of him; because——. But you turn away, Miss Maitland! Have you no curiosity to learn why Carrington is jealous of him?"—

"None in the world!"

"Nor even any to ascertain what Carrington is evidently dying to tell," added Captain Blencowe, "concerning poor Annesley's modes and method of playing the fool?"

"Still less! I have great faith in the judgment of a man so much older than myself as Colonel Carrington," replied Lucy, trying to command emotions of either anger or sympathy;—"but it would require far more to persuade me that a person so universally liked in the world, and loved in the regiment,—whom we see almost daily, and always in so reasonable a mood and with such gentlemanly habits and feelings,—is disgracing himself."

"My dear Lucy, you are very severe! You forget to whom you are speaking," observed her brother with mock gravity.

"I am speaking to three or four of the intimate friends of Mr. Annesley," persisted the young lady, blushing deeply.

"We flatter ourselves, that, however grand that title may appear to you, we have higher qualifications," retorted John Maitland. "We flatter ourselves, (at least so the peerage entitles us,) that we are 'ALL honourable men.' We flatter ourselves, that we all 'play the fool,' as Carrington calls it, if not to our heart's content, to the content of our enemies—viz., to the heart's content of our intimate friends. You are consequently personal, Miss Lucy Maitland, shamefully personal, when you talk about Annesley's 'disgracing' himself, because his friend yonder says he is playing the fool. Understand for the future, my dear little sister, that nobody disgraces himself now-a-days, whose name does not appear in the Saturday Gazette or the Sunday newspapers."

"Then Basil Annesley is safe, I suppose," said the old Colonel, spitefully, giving his head this time a shake in his stock, as violent as though he were trying the strength of the vertebræ,—"for he is too insignificant, in point of fortune and family, to achieve either of these evils."

"I was sure you would claim exemption for him, Carr, on some friendly grounds or other!" cried John Maitland, laughing outright. "But take courage! Insignificant as we all are, no one knows at what honours we may arrive. The least people, as well as the greatest, pretend now-a-days to the distinction of bankruptcy. The fellow who supplies cigars to the door steps of the club, was threatening the other day to betake himself to Basinghall Street, if we did not all square accounts with him; and I never feel certain, any Saturday night of the year, of not seeing the name of 'THOMAS JOHN MAITLAND, LORD MAITLAND, horse-dealer,' figuring in the list of private defaulters, which would be a bore, you know, on opera night!"

"Lord Maitland would not be the first peer of the realm who has appeared in the Gazette," observed Blencowe, accepting his friend's arguments as a joke, by an attempt at rejoinder; seeing that, in a mansion so splendidly furnished, having three servants in gay liveries waiting in the hall, and a butler on the stairs, it was impossible to treat it as earnest. It is true he had heard it rumoured, that two of these domestics were bailiffs, in family liveries, exercising their guardianship in behalf of John Doe and Richard Roe, over the family plate. But the same scandal was astir of one or two other noble houses of his acquaintance, where he knew it to be groundless; and of all the "truths stranger than fiction" of fashionable life, few appear less credible to novices, than the facility of keeping up appearances, with a rent roll of twenty thousand a-year, on which twenty-five thousand a-year is owing.

It seemed impossible even to Blencowe—even to the old Colonel of so many years' London experience,—that there could be any want of money in a house where the dinners were so excellent, the establishment so brilliant. Lady Maitland had her diamonds and her opera-box,—the girls their saddle-horses and French maids. The rooms in Arlington Street were bright with exotics,—the evening parties frequent,—the morning luncheons luxurious. No finer grapes or pine apples were eaten, no older sherry drunk in London, than were to be found every day at three o'clock, at the service of the lounging associates of young Maitland.

Whatever was newest and prettiest in fashionable attire, was first worn by Lady Maitland and her daughters. Whatever appeared that was attractive, in the way of books, music, work, gaudy annuals or fashionable engravings, was to be found on their table. They ordered everything without regard to expense,—as is usually the case with persons who order on credit. They denied themselves nothing. Such good-natured people as the Maitlands have seldom courage to be niggardly in their care of their own comforts. No wonder, therefore, that they had troops of friends and hosts of pleasant acquaintances:

> For men, like butterflies,
> Show not their mealy wings but to the summer;

and in a house where all was so decidedly summerish, the butterflies called men naturally abounded.

On entering the doors in Arlington Street, when open for parties, they were saluted with the sound of music, the sparkling of lights, the blandishments of youth and beauty. Luxury was enthroned there in all her effulgence of bravery,—a very Circe in her fatal charming!—

Nevertheless, had the dull old Colonel or smart young Captain been clearer of observation, they must have noticed, that, at the incautious sally of her son, the brows of Lady Maitland suddenly contracted; and might have chanced to remember the adage, that "many a true word is said in jest." They saw nothing, however, but the accustomed cheerfulness of the room, and mirthfulness of its inmates; for, having dined with the Maitlands the preceding day,—admired the splendour of the family plate, and the number of racing-cups on the buffet, they had complimented Lord Maitland too sincerely on the excellence of his hock and claret, to treat otherwise, than as an exquisite jest, the idea of his appearing in the Gazette.

"What a cursedly stupid invention, mother, is this new taper-stand!" added John Maitland, after burning his fingers in attempting to put out the light with an extinguisher of silver filigree. "You really ought to obtain a premium from Baldock, Fogg, and Emanuel, for trying to bring their stupid novelties into fashion."

"Considering that it was you, John, who broke the stand of old Sèvres, which that one in your hand was bought to replace," said Lady Maitland, —("a bijou, a positive bijou,—which cost fourteen guineas,—whereas the taper in your hand was only five,) the less you say on the subject the better!"

"Don't be in a rage, my dear good mother!" remonstrated the graceless guardsman. "Consider for a moment your obligation to me, for affording you a pretext for the purchase of a new bauble,—the fifty-second, I rather think, in the course of the year. You are the Providence of the rococo shops!—You know very well that Emanuel would send here to inquire after your health, were two days to pass without your carriage having stopped at his door!"

"I wish you would not talk such nonsense!" said Lady Maitland, really angry. "It is by these kind of assertions you persuade your father into a belief of my extravagance; when, if the truth were told, I might have purchased a service of old Sèvres, and dozens of filigree stands with the sum which ——"

"Well, well!—we are all silly enough in our way, it seems, as well as Basil Annesley," interrupted young Maitland, more delicate about the betrayal of his own weaknesses, than in discussing those of other people. "I don't pretend not to be extravagant. Like Othello's handkerchief,—'I had it from my mother.'"

"You deserve to have a severe scolding from your mother, John," said his elder sister, (rising from the table, where she was emblazoning with cobalt, vermillion, and gold, escutcheons for an heraldic illustration of the baronial houses of England, to grace a costly album,) fancying it was her brother's allusions which at that moment drove Lady Maitland from the room; nor was it till, ten minutes afterwards, her ladyship made her reappearance with a portion of the broken inkstand, to exhibit to Colonel Carrington the exquisite beauty of one of its groups of bergères galantes, that Laura discerned her mistake.

But Lady Maitland was mistaken also. Instead of obtaining sympathy from the old beau, she found him chin-deep in further scandal respecting Basil Annesley.

"I admit that Verelst is a clever artist," he was observing as she entered. "But the passion for virtu is not strong enough, at Annesley's age, to account for his devoting hour after hour to the family of an obscure Jew."

"I don't believe Verelst to be a Jew," said Blencowe, coldly.

"His wife, at least, is a Jewess," said Carrington; "and so, doubtless, are his daughters. The girl for whom Annesley obtained admission into the choruses at the Opera was called Esther, and her sister's name is Salome."

"The great Newton's name was Isaac; but I never heard that he was a Jew. What's in a name? A rose, (or Esther,) by any other name would smell as sweet," cried John Maitland. "Faugh! give me an ounce of civet!—Who would fancy we were talking of filthy Jews!"

At that moment, Lady Maitland insisted upon exhibiting her fragment of Sèvres, which excited little interest with the Dowager-Colonel, who was preparing a new assault.

"Annesley's protégée did not have much success, I fancy?"—said he, addressing young Maitland.

"As if you were not perfectly aware, my dear fellow, that she had not even the opportunity for failure! The poor girl was so terrified by the impudence of a set of old fellows—yourself, I fancy, among the rest—amateurs, as they call themselves, who used to stare her out of countenance at rehearsal, that, on the eve of her appearance in Otello, she was seized with a fever from mere affright; and was far nearer giving up the ghost than assisting in softening (in A, Minor) the hard heart of Signor Brabantio!"

"I recollect now!—a footlight panic, as the theatrical people call it," said the old Colonel, with another nervous twist of the neck within his stock.

"No such thing!—Esther Verelst had not so much as a glimpse of the footlights!" cried Blencowe, interfering. "She never even attended a full-dress rehearsal. Nay, so far from Annesley having recommended her to the managers as you suppose, or assert, I never saw a man more shocked than he was on recognising her in her shabby old brown pelisse among the chorus-singers. The poor girl, who had been singing last year at the Ancient Concerts, and knew the importance to her family of doubling her salary, had obtained an engagement unknown to any one; very little surmising the difference between an Ancient Concert singer, and a Chorus girl of the King's Theatre, at half-a-guinea a-week?"

"Poor Esther!—she was far too good for a chorus girl!" said John Maitland, with good-natured interest;—"too good a singer, and too good a girl——"

"She soon, however, found out her mistake: and it was then that Annesley protected her, and tried to get her engagement broken. Esther was too efficient a performer, however, to be readily dispensed with: and, I believe, nothing short of the utter incapacity produced by her dangerous illness, would have softened in her favour that nether mill-stone, a managerial heart."

"And what has become of this poor girl?" demanded the elder Miss Maitland,—Lucy being too much interested in the question, to adventure the inquiry.

"That you had better inquire of Annesley, on his return to town," said the old beau; "for he never leaves her father's house."

"And who is her father?" persisted Laura Maitland.

"A foreign artist, whom Annesley picked up, when a boy, at some foreign university—Jena, or Göttingen,—or wherever he was brought up."

"Verelst was Basil Annesley's drawing-master, when a student at Heidelberg," said Blencowe, firmly; "and, like half the artists of half the countries in Europe, is a man of large family and moderate means. He got into some political scrape at Heidelberg, and fled to this country: so he says at least. But all foreign refugees in England talk of political scrapes, as more popular here than any other. In England, he knew only Annesley, and another chap or two, to whom he had given lessons at Heidelberg: but Basil appears to be the only one of them who profited by his lessons, or chose to recollect his old master: and the first thing we heard of Verelst, was a raffle proposed at the Club for one of his pictures—won, by the way, by Carrington;—and a beautiful thing it was."

"Yes!—I have been offered three times the upset price of that picture by several engravers," said the Colonel, with an air of complacency; "but I never chose to part with it."

"As Verelst and his family are starving, you might, at least, have obtained him an order for a copy," observed John Maitland.

"In order that my own might never afterwards be considered an original?" said the Colonel, gravely.

"And what then? You would have put a hundred guineas in the poor fellow's pocket, without taking one out of your own,—which you know, Carr, you would as soon part with, as with your life's-blood!"

"On the contrary," retorted the Colonel—"I bought, last summer, a set of sporting sketches of Verelst, which had been previously offered to yourself, and rejected."

"Ay!—because you got them at half-price; whereas I had the decency to reject them, because, not having the money to pay for them, I thought I should be an ugly customer for a poor fellow like Verelst."

"Quite right!" interposed Lucy.

"But why did you never mention this artist, or his works, to us, John?" inquired her sister.

"Because I considered that young ladies ought not to have pocket-money enough to enable them to buy pictures," replied John Maitland;—"and to the minor relief of Missish charity, such a man as Verelst would never stoop. He has the soul of a genius, and the courage of a lion!"——

"Which does not, however, appear to be shared by his family," observed Laura; "since you say that his daughter was too timid to sing at the Opera?"

"Esther is a bit of a lioness, I admit, in her way," said Captain Blencowe, with a smile; adding, in a lower voice, and with a glance at the old Colonel—"But what chance has even a lioness, when opposed to a set of tigers?"

Miss Maitland did not choose to hear, or, at all events, to smile, as he expected.

"It seems to me, my dear John," said she, still remonstrating with her brother, "that the man, not too proud to give lessons to Mr. Basil Annesley, need not be too proud to afford them to Laura Maitland. I want a drawing-master.—Mamma has promised me a drawing-master—"

"But how do you know, my dear, that this Verelst man is a competent master?" interrupted Lady Maitland.

"Do you not hear, Mamma, that Colonel Carrington has been offered three times the price of his picture?"—observed Laura, less reverently than feelingly.

"A man may paint very well himself, and have great conceptions of his art," observed the old Colonel, "who is incapable of imparting instruction to others."

"Very sensibly observed!" remarked Lady Maitland, who appeared to have no great leaning towards the indigent drawing-master.

"At all events, one might do something for the daughter," observed Lucy. "If she sang at the Ancient Concert last year, she must understand her business. We have long been talking of getting up some quartettes with Colonel Loftus, and Sir Watkin. Miss Verelst might be of material use to us.—Supposing I write to engage her?"

"You are very easily interested, my dear Lucy, for Basil Annesley's protégée!" said her brother, with a shrug of the shoulders. "You are not half so good to mine!—I have two or three chorus-singers to recommend to you."

"But not the daughters of meritorious artists in distress," said his sister, with indignation.

"The 'meritorious' and 'distress' you have taken solely upon Blencowe's showing; who never tells truth but once a-week—and this is not his day. However, if you mean to oblige Annesley—who, I know, is a vast favourite of yours—you will scarcely effect it by bringing Esther Verelst into contact with Colonel Loftus, or any other fine gentleman of the staring Carrington School. Believe me, he would much rather let the whole family starve in decent privacy."

"It is easy enough for fine gentlemen of the prating Maitland School to talk lightly of starving," retorted his sister; "but I assure you, John——"

At that moment the butler, having entered the room, whispered, more closely than is usual for butlers to whisper in drawing-rooms, a message to Lady Maitland.

"Tell him Lord Maitland is out," was her ladyship's audible reply.

"I have told him so repeatedly, already, my lady," was the butler's rejoinder. "He particularly wishes to know whether his lordship dines at home."

"Of course he does,—yet stay—I really cannot tell," said her ladyship, apparently enlightened by her second thoughts. "But if Lord Maitland does not dine at home, he dines at White's."

The butler left the room noiselessly, as every well-bred ghost and well-bred butler retreats from sight; and Laura Maitland again renewed her interrogations respecting Basil's Esther. "Was she handsome or ugly—tall or short—her voice a soprano or mezzo soprano?"—

"She is a monstrous pretty girl, with a monstrous pretty voice, I can tell you; or Annesley would not have worn himself out at elbows paying debts for her father," cried John, almost out of patience with her pertinacity.

"I never heard anything so impertinent," now burst from the lips of Lady Maitland, who was again colloquizing in whispers with the mysterious butler. "Tell him I never see people on business! —If he call to-morrow at breakfast, Wilson, (say Lord Maitland breakfasts at eleven,) he will be most likely to see him."

"I rather think not, my lady; for my lord particularly desired that this person might never be admitted to him," said the grave Mr. Wilson with sales prepense, to avenge certain unexpiated wrongs of his own upon her ladyship, and her ladyship's daughters.

"Tell him what you are desired!" said Lady Maitland, in a haughty tone.

"I have done my best to send him away," said Wilson. "But he has stationed himself in the library, my lady, and will not leave the house. He says it is essential (if my lord is really out) that he should have an audience of your ladyship."

"I shall certainly not expose myself to an interview with a stranger—a man of whom I know nothing!" said Lady Maitland, with manifestly increasing agitation.

"What is all this, mother?" inquired John, who had now caught here and there a few words of the conversation.

"Merely that there is a person below, who insists upon seeing your father."

"Some impertinent fellow of a tradesman, I suppose, with a large account to make up; (they have always large accounts to make up!)—Well! —we insist too, Wilson!—We insist upon his taking himself off! Lord Maitland is not, and Lady Maitland does not choose to be, at home."

"It is not a tradesman, Sir," said the butler aloud, for the benefit of the party. "If it had been a tradesman, I should not have presumed to trouble her ladyship. The gentleman came in his own carriage, which is still at the door."

"My tailor always visits me in his cab," said Blencowe, "except when he brings his bill, when he comes in his chariot."

"If your tailor drive such a deuced fine pair of bloods as this fellow," said John Maitland, who, from the front drawing-room, had taken a survey in the interim of the equipage of the mysterious guest, which was waiting at the door,—"he is less a tailor than you take him for!"

"Go down and speak to him, John," said Lady Maitland, by this time reassured. "I daresay it is somebody out of Yorkshire, about electioneering business."

And for once—moved, perhaps, by some latent curiosity of his own, to ascertain the proprietor of such a capital pair of horses,—young Maitland exhibited the utmost alacrity of filial obedience.

When he had left the room, old Carrington, who was inquisitiveness itself, began to fidget in his stock to a degree that almost threatened dislocation to his ostrich-like throat. At one moment, he had been on the point of offering Lady Maitland to accompany her son. To assuage his restless curiosity concerning the pertinacious visiter, he had no resource but to fall once more upon the Verelsts, in the hope of picking a third course of scandal out of the remnants of the feast.

Just, however, as he was beginning,—"I am assured by Loftus that Verelst's second daughter—that beautiful Salome," he was again interrupted. With a face pale as death, John Maitland rushed back into the room.

"Why could you not tell me at once, mother," said he, sinking into a chair, "that it was that damnable A. O.!"—

We have the authority of the author for saying that this work "is a romance, and not a romance; a truth for those who can comprehend it, and an extravagance for those who cannot." There is another category, in which we place ourselves. The work is a wild and overdone extravagance, with a liberal mixture of the true and the beautiful; of eloquence and poetry. The author appears to entertain some apprehension that his work will not be popular; and this instinct is probably just. The story was begun some years since in a Magazine, now deceased; but it did not go far, and what was printed appears to us (from recollection) to have undergone considerable alteration. When the supernatural machinery is dismissed, the story is very simple. Gaetano Pisani was a violinist, who gained a humble livelihood by playing in the orchestra of the great theatre of San Carlo in Naples. He was a man of fine genius for his art; but simple, awkward, grotesque, unworldly; "an inspired idiot," a small Beethoven in his enthusiasm for music, and in eccentricities of character; and a Mozart in guileless simplicity. Between the Neapolitan musician and his instrument, there was an indissoluble connexion, an entire blending of souls. He might most appropriately have sung, "My fiddle and me." Yet his violin was only dear, because it gave voice to his music.

You could not separate the man from his music; it was himself. Without it, he was nothing, a mere machine. With it, he was king over worlds of his own. Poor man, he had little enough in this!

This minor Paganini, grotesque, awkward, and half-idiot as he seemed, had gotten him a wife, and was the happy father of one fair child; of Viola, the lovely heroine of this story.

* By Sir E. L. Bulwer. Three volumes. Saunders & Otley.

What is more strange yet, his wife was a daughter of quiet, sober, unfantastic England; she was much younger than himself; she was fair and gentle, with a sweet English face; she had married him from choice, and (will you believe it?) she yet loved him.

The marriage was not, after all, so wonderful. The girl was the natural child "of parents too noble (?) ever to own her," and she had been sent to Italy to learn the art by which she was to live. She was harshly treated; "and poor Pisani was her master, and his voice the only one she had heard from her cradle that seemed without one tone that could scorn or chide."

And so—well, is the rest natural? Natural or not,—they married. This young wife loved her husband; and, young and gentle as she was, she might almost be said to be the protector of the two. From how many disgraces with the despots of San Carlo and the Conservatorio had her unknown officious mediàtion saved him! In how many ailments—for his frame was weak—had she nursed and tended him! Often, in the dark nights, she would wait at the theatre, with her lanthorn to light him, and her steady arm to lean on;—otherwise, in his abstract reveries, who knows but the musician would have walked, after his "Siren," into the sea!

The Siren was an opera upon which the despised violinist had laboured for years; and when his beautiful daughter, at the age of sixteen, her musical education having been completed, under the patronage of a Cardinal-Virtuoso, who had discovered her talent, appeared in this piece, and with the most brilliant success, the poor musician was nearly crazed. The affair had been charmingly contrived by the affectionate Viola, and Pisani was not aware of his triumph until it was complete.

He feels that by the breathless stillness of that multitude—he feels it even by the lifted finger of the Cardinal. He sees his Viola on the stage, radiant in her robes and gems—he hears her voice thrilling through the single heart of the thousands! But the scene—the part—the music! It is his other child—his immortal child—the spirit-infant of his soul—his darling of many years of patient obscurity and pining genius—his masterpiece—his opera of the Siren!

At one time during the representation, the success of the opera had appeared more than doubtful. There are always, in every theatre, rivals to a new author, or a new performer.

A hiss arose; it was partial, it is true, but the significant silence of all applause seemed to forebode the coming moment when the displeasure would grow contagious. It was the breath that stirred the impending avalanche. At that critical moment—Viola, the Siren queen, emerged for the first time from her ocean cave. As she came forward to the lamps, the novelty of her situation, the chilling apathy of the audience—which even the sight of so singular a beauty, did not at the first arouse—the whispers of the malignant singers on the stage, the glare of the lights, and more—far more than the rest—that recent hiss, which had reached her in her concealment, all froze up her faculties and suspended her voice. And instead of the grand invocation into which she ought rapidly to have burst, the regal Siren, retransformed into the trembling girl, stood pale and mute before the stern cold array of those countless eyes.

At that instant, and when consciousness itself seemed about to fail her—as she turned a timid beseeching glance around the still multitude—she perceived, in a box near the stage, a countenance which at once, and like magic, produced on her mind an effect never to be analyzed or forgotten. It was one that awakened an indistinct haunting reminiscence, as if she had seen it in those day dreams she had been so wont from infancy to indulge. She could not withdraw her gaze from that face; and as she gazed, the awe and coldness that had before seized her, vanished, like a mist from before the sun.

In the dark splendour of the eyes that met her own there was indeed so much of gentle encouragement, of benign and compassionate admiration; so much that warmed, and animated, and nerved; that any one—actor or orator—who has ever observed the effect that a single, earnest, and kindly look, in the crowd that is to be addressed and won, will produce upon his mind, may readily account for the sudden and inspiriting influence the eye and smile of the stranger exercised on the debutante.

And while yet she gazed, and the glow returned to her heart, the stranger half rose, as if to recall the audience to a sense of the courtesy due to one so fair and young; and the instant his voice gave the signal, the audience followed it by a burst of generous applause.

This was the hour of fate to Viola, as surely as to the Siren. The stranger was the mysterious, the princely Zanoni, whose appearance in different parts of Italy, and in Naples, and singular manner of life, had excited the curiosity of the gossips of the city; dividing their thoughts with that national concern, the new Opera. Zanoni's wealth was imagined to be vast and boundless; and his occult powers were more astonishing than his wealth. The passion with which this godlike being had inspired the musician's daughter, was not the human love of ordinary romance, but that exalted sentiment with which, in the primeval times, the gods inspired the beautiful daughters of men. Yet many said Zanoni was a sorcerer, a necromancer; and that he possessed the Evil-Eye—the baleful glance, which carries death and woe wherever it is directed.—It is impossible, in a few words, to convey any conception of this demi-god, or incarnation of superhuman powers in alliance with the passions and tenderness of humanity. Yet though thousands of years had rolled by since his birth, the Chaldæan was born of woman. He was a being raised above Death and human destiny by those mystic sciences whose birthplace was the East, and which were afterwards but faintly discerned by the disciples of the Rosy Cross. Zanoni, who will probably be a much greater favourite in Germany than in England, must be taken as he is presented, as the being of poetry and of the transcendentalism of antiquity. As a work of Art, we should say the romance is overdone by the excessive use made of the supernatural; and that the accumulation of wonder upon wonder impairs its effect. Looking below the surface, it may be fancied that the author, under the different characters, has in Zanoni embodied humanity perfected, sublimed; and in Mejnour—for there are two Chaldæan immortals—cold, passionless, self-sufficing Intellect; in the Frenchman of the Reign of Terror, the remorseless and profligate Nicot, cold, dead Atheism, believing nothing, hoping nothing, loving nothing; in Glyndon, the young Englishman, the mingled strength and weakness of man's nature; while Viola typifies the purest elements of tender untutored womanhood; affectionate, trustful, reverential. There is no thread of story to follow in the romance; so that it is but by detached scenes that we are able to give any idea of this purely imaginative work.

Whatever of ordinary interest belongs to the story, hangs upon the passion of Viola and her mysterious lover, the blissful and the terrible scenes through which they pass, and their final destiny,—when, after undergoing the discipline of love and sorrow, the Immortal finds the only true immortality through Death. These trial scenes are cast amid the wildest excess of the French Revolution, during the Reign of Terror. The scenes of that terrible epoch are forcibly portrayed, though the agency of Zanoni, in producing the actual historical events of the period, does not contribute to their strength. He might have kept to his mastery of other spirits than Tallien and Robespierre.

The musician and his wife are dead; and Viola, disdaining the insulting addresses of the young Englishman, who was too proud and prejudiced to marry the singer, and having, by the supernatural intervention of Zanoni, escaped from the toils of a licentious prince, fulfils her mysterious destiny. She becomes the bride of the superhuman Chaldæan; superhuman in personal beauty as in wondrous powers, and they find a paradise in one of the Greek Isles, where they live for some years: the only drawback upon their pure felicity being in the mind of Zanoni. The Immortal is linked to the Mortal, and his love urges him to raise her that he loves to his own condition of being. He thus invokes his guardian genius:—

"Adon-Ai! Adon-Ai!—appear, appear!"

And in the lonely cave, whence once had gone forth the oracles of a heathen god, there emerged from the shadows of fantastic rocks a luminous and gigantic column, glittering and shifting. It resembled the shining but misty spray, which, seen afar off, a fountain seems to send up on a starry night. The radiance lit the stalactites, the crags, the arches of the cave, and shed a pale and tremulous splendour on the features of Zanoni.

"Son of Eternal Light," said the invoker, "thou to whose knowledge, grade after grade, race after race, I attained at last, on the broad Chaldæan plains—thou from whom I have drawn so largely of the unutterable knowledge, that yet eternity alone can suffice to drain—thou who, congenial with myself, so far as our various beings will permit, hast been for centuries my familiar and my friend—answer me and counsel!"

From the column there emerged a shape of unimaginable glory. Its face was that of man in his first youth; but solemn, as with the consciousness of eternity and the tranquillity of wisdom; light, like starbeams, flowed through its transparent veins; light made its limbs themselves, and undulated, in restless sparkles, through the waves of its dazzling hair. With its arms folded on its breast, it stood distant a few feet from Zanoni, and its low voice murmured gently—"My counsels were sweet to thee once; and once, night after night, thy soul could follow my wings through the untroubled splendours of the Infinite. Now thou hast bound thyself back to the earth by its strongest chains, and the attraction to the clay is more potent than the sympathies that drew to thy charms the Dweller of the Starbeam and the Air! When last thy soul hearkened to me, the senses already troubled thine intellect and obscured thy vision. Once again I come to thee; but thy power even to summon me to thy side is fading from thy spirit, as sunshine fades from the wave, when the winds drive the cloud between the ocean and the sky."

"Alas, Adon-Ai!" answered the seer, mournfully—"I know too well the conditions of the being which thy presence was wont to rejoice. I know that our wisdom comes but from the indifference to the things of the world which the wisdom masters. The mirror of the soul cannot reflect both earth and heaven; and the one vanishes from the surface as the other is glassed upon its deeps. But it is not to restore me to that sublime abstraction in which the intellect, free and disembodied, rises, region after region, to the spheres, that once again, and with the agony and travail of enfeebled power, I have called thee to mine aid. I love; and in love I begin to live in the sweet humanities of another! If wise yet, in all which makes danger powerless against myself, or those on whom I can gaze from the calm height of indifferent science, I am blind as the merest mortal to the destinies of the creature that makes my heart beat with the passions that obscure my gaze."

"What matter!" answered Adon-Ai. "Thy love must be but a mockery of the name; thou canst not love as they do for whom there is death and the grave. A short time!—like a day in thy incalculable life, and the form thou dotest on is dust! Others of the nether world go hand in hand, each with each, unto the tomb; hand in hand they ascend from the worm to new cycles of existence. For thee, below are ages; for her, but hours. And for her and thee—oh poor, but mighty one!—will there be even a joint hereafter! Through what grades and heavens of spiritualized being will her soul have passed when thou, the solitary loiterer, comest from the vapours of the earth to the gates of light!"

"Son of the Starbeam, thinkest thou that this thought is not with me ever; and seest thou not that I have invoked thee to hearken and minister to my design? Readest thou not my desire and dream to raise the conditions of her being to my own? Thou, Adon-Ai, bathing the celestial joy that makes thy life in the oceans of eternal splendour,—thou, save by the sympathies of knowledge, canst conjecture not what I, the offspring of mortals, feel—debarred yet from the objects of the tremendous and sublime ambition that first winged my desires above the clay—when I see myself compelled to stand in this low world alone.—I have sought amongst my tribe for comrades, and in vain. At last I have found a mate! The wild bird and the wild beast have theirs; and my mastery over the malignant tribes of terror can banish their larvæ from the path that shall lead her upward till the air of eternity fits the frame for the elixir that baffles death."

"And thou hast begun the initiation, and thou art foiled! I know it. Thou hast conjured to her sleep the fairest visions; thou hast invoked the loveliest children of the air to murmur their music to her trance, and her soul heeds them not; and, returning to the earth, escapes from their control. Blind one, wherefore? Canst thou not perceive? Because in her soul all is love. There is no intermediate passion with which the things thou wouldst charm to her have association and affinities. Their attraction is but to the desires and cravings of the intellect. What have they with the passion that is of earth, and the hope that goes direct to heaven?"

"But can there be no medium, no link, in which our souls, as our hearts, can be united, and so mine may have influence over her own?"

"Ask me not—thou wilt not comprehend me!"

"I adjure thee!—speak!"

"When two souls are divided, knowest thou not that a third in which both meet and live is the link between them?"

"I do comprehend thee, Adon-Ai," said Zanoni, with a light of more human joy upon his face than it had ever before been seen to wear; "and if my destiny, which here is dark to mine eyes, vouchsafes to me the happy lot of the humble—if ever there be a child that I may clasp to my bosom and call my own!——"

"And is it to be man at last, that thou hast aspired to be more than man?"

"But a child—a second Viola!" murmured Zanoni, scarcely heeding the Son of Light; "a young soul fresh from Heaven, that I may rear from the first moment it touches earth—whose wings I may train to follow mine through the glories of creation; and through whom the mother herself may be led upward over the realm of death!"

"Beware—reflect! Knowest thou not that thy darkest enemy dwells in the Real? Thy wishes bring thee near and nearer to Humanity."

"Ah, Humanity is sweet!" answered Zanoni.

And, as the seer spoke, on the glorious face of Adon-Ai there broke a smile.

Admirable in its peculiar style as this scene is, the next which we select, the final subjugation of the Immortal to the tenderness of the husband and the father, and the natural feelings of humanity, is yet finer. The pestilence had reached and desolated the lovely Greek isle, and the lovers had sought an asylum in Venice.

The stars of winter shone down on the Lagunes of Venice. The hum of the Rialto was hushed—the last loiterers had deserted the place of St. Mark's, and only at distant intervals might be heard the oars of the rapid gondolas, bearing reveller or lover to his home. But lights still flitted to and fro across the windows of one of the Palladian palaces, whose shadow slept in the great canal; and within the palace watched the twin Eumenides, that never sleep for Man,—Fear, and Pain.

"I will make thee the richest man in all Venice, if thou savest her."

"Signor," said the Leech; "your gold cannot control death, and the will of Heaven—Signor, unless within the next hour there is some blessed change, prepare your courage."

Ho—ho, Zanoni! man of mystery and might, who hast walked amidst the passions of the world, with no changes on thy brow, art thou tossed at last upon the billows of tempestuous fear!—Does thy spirit reel to and fro!—knowest thou at last the strength and the majesty of Death!

He fled, trembling, from the pale-faced man of art—fled through stately hall, and long-drawn corridor, and gained a remote chamber in the palace, which other step than his was not permitted to profane. Out with thy herbs and vessels! Break from the enchanted elements, O silvery-azure flame! Why comes he not—the Son of the Starbeam!—Why is Adon-Ai deaf to thy solemn call! It comes not—the luminous and delightsome Presence! Cabalist! are thy charms in vain! Has thy throne vanished from the realms of space! Thou standest pale and trembling. Pale trembler! not thus didst thou look, when the things of glory gathered at thy spell. Never to the pale trembler bow the things of glory:—the soul, and not the herbs, nor the silvery-azure flame, nor the chemistry of the Cabala, commands the children of the air; and thy soul, by Love and Death, is made sceptreless and discrowned!

At length the flame quivers—the air grows cold as the wind in charnels. A thing not of earth is present—a mistlike, formless thing. It cowers in the distance—a silent Horror! it rises—it creeps—it nears thee—dark in its mantle of dusky haze; and under its veil it looks on thee with its livid, malignant eyes—the thing of malignant eyes!

"Ha, young Chaldæan! young in thy countless ages—young as when, cold to pleasure and to beauty, thou stoodest on the old Fire-tower, and heardest the starry silence whisper to thee the last mystery that baffles Death, fearest thou Death at length! Is thy knowledge but a circle that brings thee back whence thy wanderings began! Generations on generations have withered since we two met! Lo! thou beholdest me now!"

"But I behold thee without fear! Though beneath thine eyes thousands have perished; though, where they burn, spring up the foul poisons of the human heart, and to those whom thou canst subject to thy will, thy presence glares in the dreams of the raving maniac, or blackens the dungeon of despairing crime, thou art not my vanquisher, but my slave!"

"And as a slave, will I serve thee! Command thy slave, O beautiful Chaldæan!—Hark, the wail of women!—hark, the sharp shriek of thy beloved one! Death is in thy Palace! Adon-Ai comes not to thy call. Only where no cloud of the passion and the flesh veils the eye of the Serene Intelligence can the Sons of the Starbeam glide to man. But I can aid thee!—hark!" And Zanoni heard distinctly in his heart, even at that distance from the chamber, the voice of Viola, calling in delirium on her beloved one.

"And I can save thee not!" exclaimed the Seer, passionately; "my love for thee has made me powerless!"

"Not powerless; I can gift thee with the art to save her—I can place healing in thy hand!"

"For both! child and mother—for both!"

"Both!"

A convulsion shook the limbs of the Seer—a mighty struggle shook him as a child: the Humanity and the Hour conquered the repugnant spirit.

"I yield! Mother and child—save both!"

In the dark chamber lay Viola, in the sharpest agonies of travail; life seemed rending itself away in the groans and cries that spoke of pain in the midst of frenzy; and still, in groan and cry, she called on Zanoni, her beloved. The physician looked to the clock; on it beat—the Heart of time,—regularly and slowly—Heart that never sympathized with Life, and never flagged for Death! "The cries are fainter," said the leech; "in ten minutes more all will be past."

Fool! the minutes laugh at thee; Nature even now, like a blue sky through a shattered temple, is smiling through the tortured frame. The breathing grows more calm and hushed—the voice of delirium is dumb—a sweet dream has come to Viola. Is it a dream, or is it the soul that sees! She thinks suddenly that she is with Zanoni, that her burning head is pillowed on his bosom; she thinks, as he gazes on her, that his eyes dispel the tortures that prey upon her—the touch of his hand cools the fever on her brow; she hears his voice in murmurs—it is a music from which the fiends fly. Where is the mountain that seemed to press upon her temples! Like a vapour it rolls away. In the frosts of the winter night, she sees the sun laughing in luxurious heaven—she hears the whisper of green leaves; the beautiful world, valley and stream, and woodland, lie before, and with a common voice speak to her—"We are not yet past for thee!" Fool of drugs and formula, look to thy dial-plate!—the hand has moved on; the minutes are with Eternity; the soul thy sentence would have dismissed still dwells on the shores of Time. She sleeps; the fever abates; the convulsions are gone; the living rose blooms upon her cheek; the crisis is past! Husband, thy wife lives! lover, thy universe is no solitude.

One more passage, and we have done: it is from an epistle of Zanoni to his fellow-immortal, Mejnour; written when Viola, filled with superstitious terror of her husband's supernatural character, and unhallowed practices, and for the eternal salvation of her infant, had fled, and whither, it is now beyond the reach of his impaired supernatural faculties to discover, as their souls are no longer in harmony. Her own soul she could have perilled for Zanoni.

Paris.

Dost thou remember in the old time, when the Beautiful yet dwelt in Greece, how we two, in the vast Athenian Theatre, witnessed the birth of Divine Words as undying as ourselves! Dost thou remember the thrill of terror that ran through that mighty audience, when the wild Cassandra burst from her awful silence to shriek to her relentless god! How ghastly, at the entrance of the House of Atreus, about to become her tomb—rang out her exclamations of foreboding woe—"Dwelling abhorred of Heaven!—human shamble-house, and floor blood-bespattered!"* Dost thou remember how, amidst the breathless awe of those assembled thousands, I drew close to thee, and whispered, "Verily, no prophet like the Poet! This scene of fabled horror comes to me as a dream, shadowing forth some likeness in my own remoter future!"? As I enter this slaughter-house, that scene returns to me, and I hearken to the voice of Cassandra ringing in my ears. A solemn and warning dread gathers round me, as if I too were come to find a grave, and "the Net of Hades" had already entangled me in its web! What dark treasure-houses of vicissitude and woe are our memories become! What our lives, but the chronicles of unrelenting Death! It seems to me as yesterday when I stood in the streets of this city of the Gaul, as they shone with plumed chivalry, and the air rustled with silken braveries. Young Louis, the monarch and the lover, was victor of the Tournament at the Carousal; and all France felt herself splendid in the splendour of her gorgeous chief! Now there is neither throne nor altar; and what is in their stead? I see it yonder —THE GUILLOTINE! It is dismal to stand amidst the ruins of mouldering cities, to startle the serpent and the lizard amidst the wrecks of Persepolis and Thebes; but more dismal still to stand as I—the stranger from empires that have ceased to be—stand now amidst the yet ghastlier ruins of Law and Order, the shattering of mankind themselves! Yet here, even here, Love, the Beautifier, that hath led my steps, can walk with unshrinking hope through the wilderness of Death! Strange is the passion that makes a world in itself, that individualizes the One amidst the Multitude; that, through all the changes of my solemn life, yet survives, though ambition, and hate, and anger are dead; the one solitary angel, hovering over an universe of tombs on its two tremulous and human wings—Hope and Fear!

How is it, Mejnour, that, as my diviner art abandoned me—as, in my search for Viola, I was aided but by the ordinary instincts of the merest mortal—how is it that I have never desponded, that I have felt in every difficulty the prevailing prescience that we should meet at last!

There is great extravagance, great incongruity, but, as will be seen, much beautiful thought and fancy, in this freak of imagination run riot; and many fragments of true practical wisdom. In this style we can give but one or two specimens. The profligate course adopted during the Reign of Terror by the unprincipled and remorseless Nicot, the infidel painter, leads to the following reflections on revolutionary periods:—

In all men who have devoted themselves to any study, or any art, with sufficient pains to attain a certain degree of excellence, there must be a fund of energy immeasurably above that of the ordinary herd. Usually, this energy is concentred on the objects of their professional ambition, and leaves them, therefore, apathetic to the other pursuits of men. But where those objects are denied, where the stream has not its legitimate vent, the energy, irritated and aroused, possesses the whole being, and if not wasted on desultory schemes, or if not purified by conscience and principle, becomes a dangerous and destructive element in the social system, through which it wanders in riot and disorder. Hence in all wise monarchies—nay, in all well-constituted states, the peculiar care with which channels are opened for every art and every science; hence the honour paid to their cultivators by subtile and thoughtful statesmen, who, perhaps, for themselves, see nothing in a picture but coloured canvass —nothing in a problem but an ingenious puzzle. No state is ever more in danger than when the talent, that should be consecrated to peace, has no occupation but political intrigue or personal advancement. Talent unhonoured is talent at war with men. And here it is noticeable, that the class of Actors having been the most degraded by the public opinion of the old régime, their very dust deprived of Christian burial, no men (with certain exceptions in the company especially favoured by the Court) were more relentless and revengeful among the scourges of the revolution. In the savage Collot d'Herbois, mauvais comedien, were embodied the wrongs and the vengeance of a class.

Now the energy of Jean Nicot had never been sufficiently directed to the Art he professed. Even in his earliest youth, the political disquisitions of his master, David, had distracted him from the more tedious labours of the easel. The defects of his person had embittered his mind; the Atheism of his benefactor had deadened his conscience. For one great excellence of Religion—above all, the Religion of the Cross,—is, that it raises PATIENCE first into a Virtue, and next into a Hope. Take away the doctrine of another life, of requital hereafter, of the smile of a Father upon our sufferings and trials in our ordeal here, and what becomes of Patience? But without patience, what is man?—and what a people? Without patience, Art never can be high; without patience, Liberty never can be perfected. By wild throes, and impetuous, aimless struggles, Intellect seeks to soar from Penury, and a Nation to struggle into Freedom. And woe—thus unfortified, guideless, and unenduring—woe to both!

It must not, however, be forgotten, that if Patience be a passive grace, Endeavour is an active virtue—a noble energy. The French Revolution, even the Reign of Terror, was not all evil; but here only its most hideous aspects are represented; the blood, the perfidy, the cruelty. The overcharged picture is all shadows.

It was at the very close of the Reign of Terror that Zanoni discovered that his wife and his child were in one of the prisons then gorged with the victims of the Guillotine. With the price of his own life he had obtained for her a reprieve of one day; for he knew that this one day passed, and the downfall of Robespierre was accomplished, and his victims rescued. Nicot, the creature of the cold-blooded and treacherous monster, was Viola's fellow-captive.

"And wherefore, my child, do they bring thee hither?" asked an old grey-haired priest.—"I cannot guess."—"Ah! if you know not your offence, fear the worst."—"And, my child?" (for the infant was still suffered to rest upon her bosom.)—"Alas, young mother! they will suffer thy child to live."—"And for this—an orphan in the dungeon!" murmured the accusing heart of Viola, "have I reserved his offspring! Zanoni, even in thought, ask not—ask not, what I have done with the child I bore thee!"

Night came; the crowd rushed to the grate, to hear the muster-roll. Her name was with the doomed. And the old priest, better prepared to die, but reserved from the death-list, laid his hands on her head, and blessed her, while he wept. She heard, and wondered; but she did not weep. With downcast eyes, with arms folded on her bosom, she bent submissively to the call. But now another name was uttered; and a man, who had pushed rudely past her, to gaze or to listen, shrieked out a howl of despair and rage. She turned, and their eyes met. Through the distance of time, she recognised that hideous aspect. Nicot's face settled back into its devilish sneer.—"At least, gentle Neapolitan the Guillotine will unite us. Oh, we shall sleep well our wedding night!" And, with a laugh, he strode away through the crowd, and vanished into his lair. . . . . She was placed in her gloomy cell, to await the morrow. But the child was still spared her; and she thought it seemed as if conscious of the awful Present. In their way to the prison, it had not moaned or wept; it had looked with its clear eyes, unshrinking, on the gleaming pikes and savage brows of the huissiers. And now, alone in the dungeon, it put its arms round her neck, and murmured its indistinct sounds, low and sweet as some unknown language of consolation and of heaven. And of Heaven it was! For, at the murmur, the terror melted from her soul: upward, from the dungeon and the death—upward, where the happy cherubim chant the mercy of the All-loving, whispered that cherub's voice. She fell upon her knees and prayed. . . . . .

Viola was in prayer. She heard not the opening door; she saw not the dark shadow that fell along the floor. His power, his arts were gone; but the mystery and the spoll known to her simple heart, did not desert her in the hours of trial and despair. When Science falls as a firework from the sky it would invade, when Genius withers as a flower in the breath of the icy charnel, the Hope of a childlike soul wraps the air in light, and the innocence of unquestioning Belief covers the grave with blossoms.

In the farthest corner of the cell she knelt; and the infant, as if to imitate what it could not comprehend, bent its little limbs, and bowed its smiling face, and knelt with her also, by her side.

He stood, and gazed upon them, as the light of the lamp fell calmly on their forms. It fell over those clouds of golden hair, dishevelled, parted, thrown back from the rapt, candid brow; the dark eyes raised on high, where, through the human tears, a light as from above was mirrored; the hands clasped—the lips apart—the form all animate and holy with the sad serenity of innocence and the touching humility of woman. And he heard her voice, though it scarcely left her lips—the low voice that the heart speaks—loud enough for God to hear!

"And if never more to see him, O Father! canst thou not make the love that will not die, minister, even beyond the grave, to his earthly fate? Canst thou not yet permit it, as a living spirit, to hover over him—a spirit fairer than all his science can conjure? Oh, whatever lot be ordained to either, grant—even though a thousand ages may roll between us—grant, when at last purified and regenerate, and fitted for the transport of such reunion—grant that we may meet once more! And for his child—it kneels to thee from the dungeon floor! To-morrow, and whose breast shall cradle it!—whose hand shall feed!—whose lips shall pray for its weal below and its soul hereafter!" She paused—her voice choked with sobs.

"Thou Viola!—thou, thyself. He whom thou hast deserted, is here to preserve the mother to the child!"

She started!—those accents, tremulous as her own! She started to her feet!—He was there,—in all the pride of his unwaning youth and superhuman beauty!—there, in the house of dread, and in the hour of travail!—there, image and personation of the love that can pierce the Valley of the Shadow, and can glide the unscathed wanderer from the heaven, through the roaring abyss of hell.

With a cry, never, perhaps, heard before in that gloomy vault—a cry of delight and rapture, she sprang forward, and fell at his feet.

He bent down to raise her, but she slid from his arms. He called her by the familiar epithets of the old endearment, and she only answered him by sobs. Wildly, passionately, she kissed his hands, the hem of his garment: but voice was gone. . . . . .

"Pray for my child!" said Zanoni, mournfully. "The thoughts of souls that would aspire as mine, are all prayer!" And seating himself by her side, he began to reveal to her some of the holier secrets of his lofty being. He spoke of the sublime and intense faith from which alone the diviner knowledge can arise—the faith which, seeing the immortal everywhere, purifies and exalts the mortal that beholds—the glorious ambition that dwells not in the cabals and crimes of earth, but amidst those solemn wonders that speak not of men, but of God—of that power to abstract the soul from the clay which gives to the eye of the soul its subtle vision, and to the soul's wing the unlimited realm. . . . . .

But now, as he closed, and, leaning on his breast, she felt the clasp of his protecting arms,—when, in one holy kiss, the past was forgiven and the present lost,—then there returned to her the sweet and warm hopes of the natural life—of the loving woman. He was come to save her! She asked not how—she believed it without a question. They should be at last again united. They would fly far from those scenes of violence and blood. Their happy Ionian isle, their fearless solitudes, would once more receive them. She laughed, with a child's joy, as this picture rose up amidst the gloom of the dungeon! Her mind, faithful to its sweet, simple instincts, refused to receive the lofty images that flitted confusedly by it, and settled back to its human visions, yet more baseless, of the earthly happiness and the tranquil home.

And she slept so sweetly. Wearied out with joy, secure in the presence of the eyes regained, she had laughed and wept herself to sleep; and still, in that slumber, there seemed a happy consciousness that the Loved was by—the Lost was found. For she smiled and murmured to herself, and breathed his name often, and stretched out her arms, and sighed if they touched him not. He gazed upon her as he stood apart—with what emotions it were vain to say. She would wake no more to him—she could not know how dearly the safety of that sleep was purchased. That morrow she had so yearned for,—it had come at last. How would she greet the eve?

And while she still slept, he was led forth a captive to meet death.

She woke at last—she gazed round. "Zanoni, it is day!" No answer but the low wail of her child. Merciful heaven! was it then all a dream? She tossed back the long tresses that must veil her sight—she felt the amulet on her bosom—it was no dream! "Oh, God, and he is gone!" She sprang to the door—she shrieked aloud. The gaoler comes! "My husband, my child's father!"

"He is gone before thee, woman!"

"Whither? Speak—speak!"

"To the guillotine!" and the black door closed again.

It closed upon the Senseless! As a lightning flash, Zanoni's words, his sadness, the true meaning of his mystic gift, the very sacrifice he made for her, all became distinct for a moment to her mind—and then darkness swept on it like a storm,—yet darkness which had its light.

Robespierre has fallen—the master-butcher has fallen. The Reign of Terror is ended. It is daylight in the prison.

From cell to cell they hurry with the news; crowd upon crowd—the joyous captives mingled with the very gaolers, who, for fear, would fain seem joyous too—they stream through the dens and alleys of the grim house they will shortly leave. They burst into a cell, forgotten since the previous morning. They found there a young female, sitting upon her wretched bed; her arms crossed upon her bosom, her face raised upward; the eyes unclosed, and a smile, of more than serenity,—of bliss upon her lips. Even in the riot of their joy, they drew back in astonishment and awe. Never had they seen life so beautiful; and as they crept nearer, and with noiseless feet, they saw that the lips breathed not, that the repose was of marble, that the beauty, and the ecstasy were of death. They gathered round in silence: and, lo, at her feet there was a young infant, who, wakened by their tread, looked at them steadfastly, and with its rosy fingers played with its dead mother's robe. An orphan there in the dungeon vault!

"Poor one!" said a female, (herself a parent,)—"and they say the father fell yesterday; and now, the mother! Alone in the world, what can be its fate?"

The infant smiled fearlessly on the crowd, as the woman spoke thus. And the old Priest, who stood amongst them, said, gently, "Woman, see! the orphan smiles! THE FATHERLESS ARE THE CARE OF GOD!"

A LECTURE ON THE POETS WHO SUCCEEDED MILTON, AND PRECEDED COWPER AND BURNS.

WRITTEN FOR THE SHEFFIELD MECHANICS' INSTITUTION.

YOUNG MEN!—When I last addressed you here—although my subject was a somewhat animating one—seven ladies honoured my narcotic powers by falling asleep; and if those ladies, when they awaked, had rewarded me with a hearty laugh, I should have thought that a compliment had been paid me, of which a dull lecturer might be reasonably proud. But whatever may be the qualifications of a lecturer, if the materials of his lecture are dull, how can the lecture itself be otherwise? I think, then, I may safely promise you a comfortable social nap on this occasion; for the poets who succeeded Milton, and preceded Cowper and Burns, lived in a dull and happy age—an age which was dull, because it was happy. In those days, the ratio of profit and wages on capital, skill, and labour, was not lessening, but increasing; men had not begun to bid against each other in desperate competition for less and less; the battle of fifty dogs for one bone, and that bone a picked one, had not commenced; nor had it entered into the mind of any statesman to conceive, that such a battle would ever be fought here by act of parliament; nor had Time, the disturber, awaking France from the long slumber of despotism, and startling victims into avengers, as with the touch of Ithuriel's spear, shaken the mind from the depths of its stagnation, and become to Pope and his imitators, what the discovery of America was to Shakspeare and Bacon. The results were correspondent; and I shall not conclude this lecture without attempting to show, that Pope and his followers are essentially mannerists, undramatic and unideal. They chose bonds, for the sake of bondage. And I do not mean to say, that the self-will of poets, in their compositions, ought to be unrestrained by rules. But is there no difference between the earnestness of fools and wise men? He whose brains set his ears on fire, is no more a poet than he is Jeremy Bentham. But passion is to wisdom a higher wisdom. For reason, without emotion, is only the cold two-foot rule, which, measuring the feet of timber in a cedar, feels not the might, and majesty, and goodness of Him, who overshadows Lebanon with his delegated beauty.

The two great founders of what is called the French school of English poetry, give us, in their descriptions of character, processes rather than revelations; while the bright impassioned reason of imaginative poets, like the sun shining on mossy rocks and dewy forests, invests their subjects in beauty, which, though magical in its effects, is not illusion, but truth. The history, then, of modern English poetry—I mean the poetry of the last fifty years—is the history of the revival of poetry in England; the history of the return of our poets to nature—to the ideal, the dramatic, the simple, the true—to what poetry was in its origin, and is in its essence.

From the death of Milton, "the poet of our republic," to the appearance of Cowper and Burns, English poetry declined as an art; but its flame was kept from extinction by a few writers of whom I am now to speak. Of Milton,—one of the most gentle, most beautiful, most manly, most accomplished, most severely tried of men—whose life was a long poem of misery—who dwelt with a congenial spirit but for one short year of his life—who died without receiving his fame—and of whom it is said by a great living writer, "that he was the poet of disappointment,"—of Milton I shall say little. But never, perhaps, was man so slandered as he has been, and is. Before he died, "his life's life was lied away;" and still the pure spirit that conceived Comus, is painted as a demon; still the "homagers of tyrants" write his spotless name in gall. Though, perhaps, the world has never yet seen one man worthy to criticise his Paradise Lost, the apes and the monkeys of criticism flippantly condemn its author; though absolutely nothing but good is known of him, still they speak of his light with tongues of darkness,—following the example of that egregious genius who is said to have described a door, with its bell and knocker, as "a ligneous barricado, with its tintinnabulary appendages." Milton has been called the last of the Elizabethan poets; but neither is he connected with, nor does he in the least resemble, any of the poets who preceded or followed him: he is of no school, and of no age. "His soul," says Wordsworth, "was like a star, and dwelt apart." But this also is a mistake. His soul was a patriot's, and dwelt with the great men of his time,—with Cromwell and Pym, Hampden and Vane; names which have been familiar to me as household words from my childhood; for my father's little preaching-parlour was hung round with the portraits of those men, and men like them; and when in after years I read an account of the heroes and sages whom Charles the First stopped in the Thames, on their way to America, I was surprised to find that Milton (then in his thirtieth year) was not one of them. You may read the account (and all tyrants should read it) in Holme's American Annals. "An order," he says, "was given by the privy-council in May, 1638, to take speedy and effectual course for the stay of eight ships, then in the Thames, prepared to sail for New England. By this order, Oliver Cromwell, Arthur Hazlerig, John Hampden, and other patriots, were prevented from coming to America. How limited is the foresight of man! how inscrutable are the councils of God! By this arbitrary measure, Charles forcibly detained the men destined to overturn his throne, and terminate his days by a violent death." Milton ought to have been—perhaps he was—one of those detained patriots; for he was a younger brother of those enlightened and intrepid Calvinists—the fathers of modern liberty—but for whom she would not now have been found on earth. Having given his patrimony to the commonwealth, he proudly earned his bread as a schoolmaster! Yes, for he was a patriot from a high sense of religious duty; and what is the Paradise Lost but a political treatise, depicting the Almighty as the arbiter of his community of good, and Satan as a tyrant from the beginning? Yet, strange to say, he makes God a Tory, ruling under oligarchical forms—"Thrones, Dominations, Princedoms!"

From the death of the "Bard of our Republic," to the commencement of the first French Revolution, Great Britain and Ireland produced six poets—Pope, Young, Thomson, Goldsmith, Gray, and Collins. Do I, then, forget Otway, Congreve, Akenside? Was not Otway a genuine poet? Yes, and had he lived, (he died in his thirtieth year,) we should, perhaps, have had another Shakspeare. Congreve's Mourning Bride, in its characters of Osmyn and Zara, gave Byron the germ of his Corsair; but I do not now intend to speak of the drama, except incidentally, in contrasting Pope with Shakspeare. But was not Akenside a poet? Yes, the poet of a trustful philosophy. But he did not write poetry. No? No. Perhaps he felt it; and he is the author of the noblest metrical oration in the world: but eloquence is not poetry. Sometimes, indeed, as I have shown, orators unconsciously become poets; but this happened seldom to the author of the Pleasures of Imagination. His versification is the most elaborate in our language. With a Roman's heart he had the mind and tongue of a Greek; and his music is not, like Pope's, mere melody; in every page of his great work there are passages so exquisitely harmonized, that, in reading them, we are compelled to say, in spite of our hearts, "Yes, Mark Akenside was a poet." "There is no art or mystery that requires so long an apprenticeship as this of verse-making," says Robert Southey, in one of his letters to me: See! how beautifully (in the only passage which I can afford to quote from the blank verse of the Bard of the Tyne) his repetitions of phrase balance each other, like corresponding sounds in rhyme!

Is aught so fair
In all the dewy landscapes of the spring,
In the bright eye of Hesper or the morn,
In Nature's fairest forms, is aught so fair
As virtuous friendship! as the candid blush
Of him who strives with fortune to be just!

Pope was a weakling and a cripple. He could not leap over five-barred gates—consequently, he could not excell in fox-hunting: so, to distinguish himself, he wrote an epic poem on a lady's curl. He was conversing with his heart, (such as it was,) when he wrote his Eloisa to Abelard, and his sofa-and-lap-dog poetry—for instance, his unique Rape of the Lock; masterpieces which, for that reason, because his heart wrote them, will never be excelled. Pope, writing rhymed epistles to his titled acquaintance, was not the genuine poet, the man of genius conversing with his heart, but a man frozen, as it were, in a room full of strangers, with whom he could not sympathize; he was no longer the pellucid fountain, nor even the dew-drop frozen on the winter rose, but the stagnant fluid in the china vase, or the dull icicle of the town palace.

I have alluded to Milton, not without purpose; for if he had not been one of the greatest of poets, he would still have been one of the greatest of versifiers. The melody of Pope differs as much from the harmony of Milton, as a flute differs from an organ, or a gilt pin from the steam-engine. Pope was the greatest of melodists, however, and only not a harmonist, because there are in his versification no differences to reconcile. He is also the most condensed of poets; and his English is unrivalled in purity even by the prefaces of Dryden, of whom he has been falsely called an imitator. He wrote, indeed, in the heroic couplet, the easiest of our measures, as Dryden did before him, and as Chaucer and others did before Dryden; and when he wrote from his heart, he was a true poet; but Dryden had no heart—he was like Washington Irvine's cabbage, all head. He was a rhyming polemic, mighty "in the war of verse," but not a poet. Contrary to the general opinion, however, I venture to assert, that although he was not, like Pope, a poet, he was, as a versifier, (not in correctness, but in higher essentials,) immeasurably superior to Pope; as you may convince yourselves by comparing his version of the Knight's Tale, with Pope's of the Wife of Bath, which, though fine, is not finest. But I like neither of these authors. If Dryden's flight is strong, he flies on wings of wire, and there is no beauty on his plumage: it is not wet with the dews of morning—no, for he does not rise "from the daisy's side." Pope, in his versification, closed his eyes against the awful fact, that evil is a great principle of nature; so, he made his lines faultless—and that is a fault, which we sinners cannot forgive.

Poets, it is said, are all mad, more or less; but if so, it seems strange that the least poetical of them are the maddest of all. One would like to be mad after the manner of Shakspeare, and, perhaps, after the manner of Pope; for how great must have been the power of the latter, if, by the mere force of style he has compelled mankind to receive illogical conclusions as proverbial truths.

That he has done so is proved by many a notorious passage in his works, and by a couplet which, oddly enough, might be said to parody and refute itself.

Obscene discourse admits of no defence,
For want of decency is want of sense.

But—

If want of decency is want of sense,
Obscene discourse admits of that defence.

"One truth is clear," said he: "whatever is, is right." Now, it may be very true, that whatever is "is right," but it is not clear. It is quite clear that whatever is, "is;" the other assertion admits of argument.

The five remaining poets named, though they were surrounded by innumerable imitators of Pope, have not the slightest resemblance to that great writer. Blank verse, the most diffuse of our measures, comes from the pen of Young, as condensed almost as Pope's rhyme. But no two things can be more unlike each other than the epigrammatic blank verse of Young, and the epigrammatic couplet of Pope—except the minds of the two authors; and that of Young must have been a great mind, or how could he be, at once, abstracted and popular? God made him a poet; and in spite of his determination to be a metrical sophist, he is a poet—in sublimity second only to Milton.

Thomson, too, had a style, that is, a mind of his own. He did not worship the musical snuff-box, though it has a diamonded lid. He determined to be himself; and the determination was a patent of immortality. Thomson is the most popular of English poets,—the poet of young affections; and will ever be so, because he had a heart which could not grow old. To quote from a writer so well known, might seem a waste of time: I cannot, however, resist the temptation of reciting a few lines from his description of the storm in Winter; the grandeur of which, I believe, is unsurpassed by any descriptive poetry in the world.

Along the woods, along the moorish fens,
Sighs the sad genius of the coming storm.
The cormorant on high
Wheels from the deep, and screams along the land.
Loud shrieks the soaring heron; and with wild wing
The circling sea-fowl cleave the flaky clouds.
Then comes the Father of the Tempest forth,
Wrapt in black gloom.
At last, the roused up river pours along;
From the rude mountain, and the mossy wild,
Tumbling through rocks abrupt, and sounding far,
Resistless, roaring, dreadful, down it comes;
While from its bottom turn'd, the passive main Bursts into chaos.

I need not point out to you the power of the word "along," in the first line of this passage; the sublime circumstance of the "Genius of the coming storm" preceding the Almighty Father of the Tempest, in this awful manifestation of his greatness; the ideality, force, and truth of the epithet in the "roused-up river;" and the almost Miltonic imagination displayed in the description of the sea "bursting into chaos."

All the genuine English poetry written in the period which elapsed from the death of Milton to the appearance of Cowper and Burns—I mean, all the poetry worthy of the Elizabethan era of our literature, and excepting, of course, the poetry of Otway, Young, and Thomson, already alluded to—is comprised in, perhaps, fewer than one thousand lines, which are to be found in the masterpieces of Goldsmith, Gray, and Collins. Of the innumerable faultless couplets, written by the imitators of Pope in any year of the period in which these three genuine poets wrote, perhaps not fifty deserved to be called poetry. Why, then, should they have been written, if mere verse, though excellent as such, cannot live; and if the rule for writing good verse is, that with all the qualities of verse, it shall be equal as language to the best prose? The fact of their having been written, (by commonplace persons, too,) proves that there are harder tasks than the stringing of abstract terms in heroic rhyme. Any well-read lad of good sense may, in six months, learn to write as good epigrammatic couplets as any in Pope. Let me not be misunderstood: I do not say that it is not difficult to write good epigrammatic couplets, but that it is still more difficult to forge penknife blades, or, perhaps, to cut sparables. I know I am heretical in this opinion; but why should we quarrel about rhymes and rhymesters? They certainly are not of the most important things in this world, whether poetry be so or not. What is verse itself, but an artifice? I write in rhyme, because my thoughts are not good enough for prose. He who writes prose must write sense; but half-thoughts may pass for poetry. I do not say that half-thoughts are poetry; for Milton's thoughts are often aggregates of thoughts; and Shakspeare's thoughts are often aggregates of thoughts and feelings—that is, they are more than thoughts. I will endeavour to make this plain, by repeating a couplet from Mr. Lane's poem on the statue of his dead child:

I see thee in thy beauty, with thy waving hair at rest—
And thy busy little fingers, folded lightly on thy breast.

In this passage, the words "busy little fingers," express an aggregate of thoughts and feelings; though referring directly to the lifeless statue, they bring before the mind and heart of the reader the living child, and its brief, sad, beautiful history. The thoughts they express are more than thoughts.

I have said, that there is as much difference between the melody of Pope, and the organ-music of Milton, as there is between a pin and a steam-engine; and I will now say, that there is as much difference between the couplets of Pope and of Goldsmith, as between pins and primroses. There are single lines in Gray and Collins—true and simple as the truth of ideal beauty, and the seeming results of a happy instinct—which have each cost more labour, probably, than any fifty in Pope; not that fine lines are not to be found in him—for we all remember the sigh "wafted" (in a letter) "from Indus to the pole," and the death by a rose, "in aromatic pain;" but the "faultless couplets," and "divine compliments of the English Boileau," remind one of the posy of a ring, and might be slung round the neck, on a locket, whereas, such lines are the staple of his less voluminous successors. Doubtless, there is in Pope as fine composition, of some sort, as any in Gray; but there are passages in the latter, to which, as poetry, there is nothing in Pope that will bear the least comparison. I will not quote them, for they are familiar to most of you, as the faces of your mothers.

In the outset of this lecture, I stated my intention of showing, that our poets of the French school, compared with our Elizabethan poets, and those of the present day, are essentially unideal and undramatic; and this, I think, I shall do, if I show that the great head of that school here, is deficient in the two highest constituents of the highest poetry. But Young, Thomson, Goldsmith, Gray, and Collins—I must request you to observe—are not poets of the French school; they are English through bone and marrow.

I scarcely need tell you, that poetry may be ideal without being indistinct. Wordsworth, literal as Crabbe, is ideal as Shakspeare, who never wrote with more of imaginative truth and beauty than Wordsworth does, when he says of his homeless wanderer, that "she was known to every star and every blast that blows." And I scarcely need tell you, that poetry may be dramatic without being written in dialogue. Milton, who wrote two dramas, is utterly undramatic, but not unideal; Cowper, one of the most original of poets, is dramatic, though he never wrote a play. Milton says of the fallen angel, Moloch—"He trusted with th' Eternal to be deemed equal in strength, and rather than be less cared not to be at all." No language can be stronger than this; it is condensed as Byron's description of the destroying wind, which is where nothing else is, "the most lone Simoom;" but it is quite undramatic. If Cowper had described Moloch, he would probably have placed him in action before us; he would have represented him stretching forth his arm in defiance towards the throne of the Most High, and impiously vociferating, "Pull him down!"

I shall be sorry to do injustice to Pope in my quotations; I confess, I am prejudiced against him, and against the school of which he is the head; but "he was a great writer of some sort," and his Rape of the Lock shows that he was a man of genius and a poet. As, however, he was himself of opinion that his highest excellences are to be found in his delineations of character, I shall not, I think, be unjust to him, if I quote some of the best of them.

How much easier is it to say what a man is, than to put words into his mouth which shall not only show what he is, but place him, living, before our eyes! Pope describes—Scott narrates—Cowper impersonates. Shakspeare has drawn the character of King Henry the Eighth to the life, in seven syllables. He represents that monarch as having discovered a conspiracy of Gardiner and others against Cranmer. One of the conspirators, approaching him with bow and cringe, says, "May it please you, Sire!" "No, Sir! it does not please me," replies the hard-ruled king. Is this a description of bluff Henry? No; it is Henry himself. Pope seldom puts words into the mouths of his characters, which bring them, as it were, into our presence. In his character of Atossa, however, he attempts this, and with some success:

> Who breaks with her, provokes revenge from hell,
> But he's a bolder man who dares be well.
> Superiors? death! and equals? what a curse!
> But an inferior not dependent! worse.
> Offend her, and she knows not to forgive;
> Oblige her, and she'll hate you while you live;
> But die, and she'll adore you.—Then the bust
> And temple rise—and fall again to dust.
> Last night her lord was all that's good and great;
> A knave this morning, and his will a cheat.

His description of the profligate Duke of Buckingham, dying, impoverished and deserted, at a miserable inn, is a favourite with his admirers; and as it is, at least, an average specimen of his mastery in the portraiture of men and manners, I shall recite it. It does not, indeed, record one of those terrible catastrophes, those fated changes of fortune, which teach the proud that they are men, and which the Muse has deplored "in the devoted races of Pelops and of Cadmus:" but whether she speak of kings, or lords or beggars, it is of man that she speaks; and the deserved ruin of the "lord of useless thousands," though it possesses either tragic nor epic dignity, is possibly more instructive, if less affecting, than the death of Hector, the foreshown doom of his august Andromache, and the fall of Priam's great city, which constitute the interest of Homer's mightiest work.

> In the worst inn's worst room, with mat half hung,
> The floor of plaster, and the walls of dung,
> On once a flock-bed, but repaired with straw,
> With tape-tied curtains, never meant to draw,
> The George and Garter dangling from that bed,
> Where tawdry yellow strove with dirty red,
> Great Villiers lies—Alas!—how changed from him,
> The life of pleasure, and the soul of whim!
> Gallant and gay, in Cliveden's proud alcove,
> The bower of wanton Shrewsbury and love;
> Or just as gay at council, in a ring
> Of mimic statesmen, and their merry king.
> No wit to flatter, left of all his store!
> No fool to laugh at—which he valued more.
> There, victor of his health, of fortune, friends,
> And fame—this lord of useless thousands ends.

Certainly this is a fine and instructive picture of dying profligacy. But it turns over for our instruction no new page in the history of the heart. It is destitute of the ideality which exalts the delineations of Shakspeare, Burns, and others. To be convinced of this, you have only to compare it at random, with almost any page of their writings; for instance, with that passage in the world's poet, where Ophelia, driven to madness by sudden, unexpected, and, to her, inexplicable misfortunes, tries to account for them, by reasoning on the chorus of an old nursery song, which asserts, "that the owl was once a baker's daughter." Ought she to wonder that the noble mind of her princely lover has lost its balance? that the high-hearted Hamlet is false to her? that the brave Hamlet has assassinated her helpless and unoffending father? and that suspicions, incredible yet true, have fallen upon the queen, whom she had almost worshipped as a model of all excellence on this side Heaven? Ought she to wonder at these things—can anything on earth be wonderful—if the owl was once a baker's daughter? Her poor brain—like Othello's heart, "perplexed in the extreme,"—believes the strange assertion, and reasons on it as a fact. "They say the owl was a baker's daughter. Lord! we know what we are, but know not what we may be." These simple words lay bare the depths of the soul, and are worth any ten pages in Dryden or Pope. They remind us, by their profundity, of the "sulky sullen dame," in Tam o' Shanter. The laugh, you know, is all against the poor woman; but she is not one of those wives who quarrel with good husbands because they are not bad ones, and whom none but bad ones can cure; she has ample cause for sullenness; yet so attached is she to that strange compound of whimsicality, comicality, and animality, drawn to the very life by Robin in his glory, that she is forced to keep her wrath warm by nursing it. While she is "gathering her brows like gathering storm," we see that her heart is overflowing with tenderness towards the profligate scape-grace who sins "from November till October"—that is, all the year round—and whose whole life is one great wrong done to her; and though she afterwards tells him "weel," that "he is a blethering, blustering drunkard," she has also her miserable forebodings, "that late or soon he will be found deep drowned in Doon." These are touches of nature, such as we shall vainly seek in any writer of the French school. But as it is, perhaps, unfair to contrast Pope with Shakspeare and Burns, writers of a totally different character, I will now compare him with Cowper, a dramatist who never wrote a play, a didactic poet whose words are action.

Adieu, Vinosa cries—ere yet he sips
The purple bumper, trembling at his lips—
Adieu to all morality, if grace
Make works a vain ingredient in the case.
The Christian hope is—Waiter, draw the cork—
If I mistake not—Blockhead! with a fork!—
Without good works, whatever some may boast,
Mere folly and delusion.—Sir, your toast!
My firm persuasion is, at least sometimes,
That heaven will weigh man's virtues and his crimes.
I plant my foot upon this ground of trust,
And silence every fear, with, God is just.
But if perchance, on some dull drizzling day,
A thought intrude that says, or seems to say,
If thus th' important cause is to be tried,
Suppose the beam should dip on the wrong side;
I soon recover from these needless frights,
And, God is merciful—sets all to rights.
Thus, between justice, as my prime support,
And mercy, fled to as the last resort,
I glide and steal along with heaven in view,
And—Pardon me—the bottle stands with you.
I never will believe, the col'nel cries,
The sanguinary schemes that some devise.
My creed is—he is safe that does his best;
And death's a doom sufficient for the rest.

Right, says an ensign; and, for aught I see,
Your faith and mine substantially agree;
The best of every man's performance here
Is to discharge the duties of his sphere.
A soldier's best is courage in the field,
With nothing here that wants to be conceal'd:
The man who scorns to do a wrong by stealth
Must go to heaven—and I must drink his health.
Sir Smug, he cries, (for lowest at the board,
Just made fifth chaplain of his patron lord,
His shoulders witnessing by many a shrug
How much his feelings suffer'd—sate Sir Smug,)
Your office is to winnow false from true;
Come, Prophet, drink, and tell us, what think you?

Sighing and smiling as he takes his glass,
Which they that woo preferment rarely pass;
Fallible man, the church-bred youth replies,
Is still found fallible, however wise;
And differing judgments serve but to declare
That truth lies somewhere, if we knew but where.
Of all it ever was my lot to read,
Of critics now alive, or long since dead,
The book of all the world that pleased me most
Was—well-a-day! the title-page was lost!
The writer well remarks, a heart that knows
To take with gratitude what heav'n bestows,
With prudence always ready at our call
To guide our use of it, is all in all.
Doubtless it is.—To which, of my own store,
I superadd a few essentials more;
But these—excuse the liberty I take—
I wave just now, for conversation sake.
Spoke like an oracle, they all exclaim,
And add Right Rev'rend to Smug's honour'd name.

I shall not treat Pope fairly if I do not quote from some one of the works which his heart wrote, and which are therefore masterpieces. He is worthy of your attention in more ways than one; for not only was he a poet and a philosopher, but—which is of infinitely more importance—an honest man. But when we read him, we read, I am sorry to believe, the most indecent book in the world, except one. How are we to account for this remarkable circumstance? One might imagine a glutton becoming web-footed with eating ducks; but to suppose that Pope became indecent by keeping good company, would be to indicate that we had never kept good company ourselves. It may not be certain that clean people have the uncleanest ideas; but it is quite so that quotations cannot easily be made from Pope, without offending modern delicacy. I ought to recite a portion, at least, of his Eloisa to Abelard; for time has passed judgment on it; great critics declare it to be unrivalled in tenderness and elegance, by any composition, original or translated, in our language; and when the impugners of Pope assert, that he never affects the heart, his admirers triumphantly appeal to that poem. Unfortunately, however, I cannot feel its pathos, and therefore cannot make it felt by you.

It is easy to declaim in rhyme—to string common-place metaphors in rhyme—to ring changes in rhyme, on such cold abstractions as glory, honour, discord, &c.; but it is very difficult to write a letter well in rhyme. I cannot say that Pope has succeeded. Burns has, again and again; his rhymed epistles are his masterpieces, and consequently masterpieces of literature; but in his choice of rhyming from two dialects, he had a great advantage. Perhaps, the most difficult of all tasks is, to tell a tale of common life well in rhyme. The English poet who has succeeded best in bending this bow of Ulysses, is Wordsworth—next to him in merit, is Crabbe; but Pope also has succeeded, and as I am prejudiced against him, it will be only fair that I allow you to judge of his power in narrative. I will recite, then, the last courtship of the wife of five husbands, translated by Pope from the Anglicised French, or Frenchified Saxon of Chaucer. It is very instructive, and ought to teach young men not to marry those pious formalists—alias, punctual gadders,—who cannot be happy at home.

Now for my fifth loved lord, the last and best,
(Kind heav'n afford him everlasting rest!)
Full hearty was his love, and I can show
The tokens on my ribs, in black and blue.
In pure good will I took this jovial spark,
Of Oxford he, a most egregious clerk;
He boarded with a widow in the town,
A trusty gossip, one dame Alison;
Full well the secrets of my soul she knew,
Better than ere our parish priest could do.
To her I told whatever could befall:
Had but my husband cough'd against a wall,
Or done a thing that might have cost his life,
She—and my niece—and one more worthy wife
Had known it all; what most he would conceal,
To these I made no scruple to reveal.
Oft has he blush'd from ear to ear for shame,
That e'er he told a secret to his dame.

It so befell, in holy time of Lent,
That of a day I to this gossip went,
(My husband, thank my stars, was out of town,)
From house to house we rambled up and down;
This clerk, myself, and my good neighbour Alse,
To see, be seen, to tell, and gather tales.
Visits to every church we duly paid,
And march'd in every holy masquerade;
The wasting moth ne'er spoil'd my best array—
The cause was this, I wore it every day.
'Twas when fresh May her early blossom yields,
This clerk and I were walking in the fields;

I vow'd, if e'er my husband fill'd his urn,
That he, and only he, should serve my turn.
I vow'd I scarce could sleep since first I knew him,
And durst be sworn he had bewitched me to him;
If e'er I slept, I dream'd of him alone,
And dreams foretell, as learned men have shown:
All this I said, but dreams, Sirs, I had none;
I follow'd but my crafty crony's lore,
Who bade me tell this lie, and twenty more.

Thus, day by day, and month by month we past;
It pleased the Lord to take my spouse at last.
I tore my gown, I soil'd my locks with dust,
And beat my breast, as wretched widows must.
Before my face my handkerchief I spread,
To hide the floods of tears I did not shed.
The good man's coffin to the church was borne;
Around, the neighbours, and my clerk, too, mourn.
But as he march'd, good gods! he show'd a pair
Of legs and feet, so clean, so strong, and fair!
Of twenty winter's age he seem'd to be;
I (to say truth) was twenty more than he:
But to my tale. A month scarce pass'd away,
With dance and song we kept the nuptial day.
All I possessed I gave to his command,
My goods and chattels, money, house, and land;
But oft repented, and repent it still;
He prov'd a rebel to my sovereign will.
Stubborn as any lioness was I;
And knew full well to raise my voice on high:
He against this right sagely would advise,
And old examples set before my eyes;
But this avail'd not; for whoe'er he be
That tells my faults, I hate him mortally.

My spouse (who was, you know, to learning bred)
A certain treatise oft at evening read,
Where divers authors (whom the devil confound
For all their lies) were in one volume bound.
It chanced my husband, on a winter's night,
Read in this book aloud, with strange delight,
How the first woman, (as the scriptures show,)
Brought her own spouse and all his race to woe.
How Samson fell; and he whom Dejanire
Wrapp'd in th' envenom'd shirt, and set on fire.
How curs'd Eryphille her lord betrayed,
And the dire ambush Clytemnestra laid.

Long time I heard, and swell'd, and blush'd, and frown'd,
But when no end of these vile tales I found,
Provoked to vengeance three large leaves I tore,
And with one buffet fell'd him on the floor.
With that my husband in a fury rose,
And down he settled me, with hearty blows.
I groaned—and lay extended on my side;
"Oh, thou hast slain me for my wealth," I cried,
"Yet I forgive thee—take my last embrace"—
He wept, kind soul! and stoop'd to kiss my face,
I took him such a box as turn'd him blue,
Then sigh'd, and cried, "Adieu, my dear, adieu!"

But after many a hearty struggle past,
I condescended to be pleased at last.
Soon as he said, "My mistress and my wife,
Do what you please, the term of all your life,"
I took to heart the merits of the cause,
And stood content to rule by wholesome laws.
As for the volume that reviled the dames,
'Twas torn to fragments, and condemned to flames.

Now, heav'n, on all my husbands gone, bestow
Pleasure above for tortures felt below;
That rest they wish'd for, grant them in the grave;
And bless the souls my conduct helped to save!

The patience with which you have heard long extracts from the sofa-and-lap-dog poet, indicates that he is a greater poet than the envy, malice, and all uncharitableness of the rhymester of the rabble can afford to allow; but before I shall have inflicted upon you a dozen more lectures on those men who, in our days, write, or have written, that something, or that nothing, which is called poetry, you will feel with me, that our country need not blush for her younger children—the poets of regeneration in poetry, and of improvement in the mind and condition of universal man.

It is remarkable, that of the countless imitators of the author of the Essay on Man—though their verses, as mere verses, were, I doubt not, as good as his own—not one has escaped oblivion. This, I say, is remarkable, but it is not at all surprising; for plagiarists resemble those men who obtain celebrity by getting their coffins made before they die. Imitation itself might be figured by the horse of the poet Ariosto—(mark the fact! the poet had a horse!) "My horse," said he, "has all the good qualities which a man could wish for in a horse; but he has one fault—he is dead." When Locke said of Pope's imitators, "that their poetry was ingenious nonsense," he could not be quite right; it was "ingenious nonsense," barring the ingenuity. Dismal to the last, in the day of those mimics, was the cold dead sea of poetic parrotry—colder and more dismal even than prose declamation. But the French revolution was approaching. The mighty breath and voice of Tendency startled, at length, the barren deep—upheaved the stagnant mass of rhymed perfectibility, and foamed the waves with living fire. There were men asleep on the dreary shore, and to them that voice said, "Arise, and walk!" They arose, and stood—amid the ruins of the temple of formalities; from the portals of which the baboons of worshipped idleness and mischief had for ages blasphemed their feeders, and out of the fragments of which they are in vain reconstructing pagods of abomination. The fall of that temple proved its worthlessness; so men began thenceforth, each in his own way, to build for themselves. Of two of these men, Cowper and Burns, I have to speak in my next lecture. Either they lived and wrote in vain, or they were, like John in the wilderness, heralds of redemption, pioneers of the singers of glad tidings in prose and verse, who shall proclaim, "That from the thronged table, and out of the battle for bread, shall yet come happiness for the many, and plenty for all!" They, it is true, who preach that charity begins at home, and ought to end there, are justly apprehensive that the diffusion of knowledge would not increase the prosperity of pickpockets; but then, even they have no more desire to be eaten raw and alive, "than any unregenerate heathen like you or me." I have heard, or read, or written, "that population is destined to become another Alaric;" —yes, for he was not a destroyer, but an ameliorator. An era of competitive coöperation in good is, I trust, approaching—when "toil without hope" will no longer oppress the soul, like the solitude of a place where the works of men are, and men are not. Are we men? What see we around us, but the triumphs of skill and labour rewarding barbarism? What is the world in which we now live, but a place where the works of men are, and men, as they ought to be, are not? The cunning fox is here, the beauteous and venomous serpent, the terrible human savage, haunting the ruins of the soul, and nicknamed esquire, or lord, or merchant, —but where is the likeness of God? "Cain! Cain! where is thy brother?" We inhabit a den of degraded and degrading victims and victimizers, the ancestors of the latter of whom monopolized knowledge, and (as it would seem) made it a curse, that their descendants might monopolize ignorance. But the new name of Knowledge will be Legion! this our poets, from Cowper and Burns, to Byron and Nicoll—and the subjects which our times have dictated to them—prophesy and prove. The ignorant cannot long misgovern the enlightened. They may pull down on their heads the Corinthian capital of the solitary column; but they can neither rebuild nor sustain the mouldering edifices of despotism. Nor could they, if it would console them, (and perhaps it would,) destroy the community with themselves. "The Palmyra of their Misrule" may be a warning, but it cannot be "a Tadmor in the desert." The poets of our times, then, have indeed a prospect of glorious usefulness before them, whether they write in prose or verse. Oh, that I might live to be the author of some great prose epic, which, though unimmortal itself, might survive long enough to be in its consequences a river of fertility, influencing beneficially unborn generations of men! Who would not be one of the Legion of Immortals, though frail as the flower of the field, yet eternal in their usefulness? Shakspeare or Milton of this year or the next! what, though it may be true that universal reputations are no longer possible? and what, though it may be true that the soldiers of the Legion of Good Works will be so numerous as to tread down each other? Their consequences cannot be trodden down. Your writings may perish with, or before you, but not their results, if indeed ye are Shakspeares or Miltons. Forget not that the instrument of your usefulness is all but indestructible. Why do tyrants wage covert war on language? Because it is a barrier on which cannon balls can make no impression. The Russian autocrat, it has been said, is trying to extinguish the language of Poland! From her exiles—homeless children of a murdered country—he would take even the remembrance of the voice of their mother! We pray not, that her curse, mingled forever in his cup of blood and fire, may be to him the worm that never dies: No! but we tell him that the affections cannot die, and that if truth is eternal, thought is so. Even if he could succeed in destroying the Polish language and Poland itself, and the writings of her poets and sages,—still, some patriot spirit, winged from this planet, would transmit to the angels the beautiful thought of Poland's Copernicus, that the sun is the centre of our system. I can imagine Raphael, after the extinction of suns and systems, redrawing the Cartoons, in the presence of Paul of Tarsus. If the language of Scott and Bacon should be heard no more on earth, Pollok might transcribe for Milton the Cottar's Saturday Night of Burns, and Hemans recite to Sappho the Daisy of Montgomery. If the country itself of Wallace and Shakspeare should perish, Bentham might record in a better world the sublime conception of the mechanic, James Watt, that the food of millions could be furnished by the vapour of a tea-kettle, and the human race lifted ultimately out of ignorance and want by a lever of steam!

BLAZONRY AND MOTTOES IN THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

If the age of chivalry hath departed, not so the age of heraldry. The hieroglyphic literature of barbarism spreads itself abroad on the wings of civilisation. The new invention of "struck work" has issued many an additional blazon from the Birmingham brazieries. The last great act of enlightened legislation—the penny postage—has trebled the circulation of wiverns, mermaids, and "salvage men." The scholar and philosopher, who has built himself a reputation by adding to the knowledge or science of the world, is not secure in his position till he has found some "gryphon argent, beaked, winged, and armed," to defend his gentility; and the retired tradesman, who has made his fortune by integrity and plodding industry, is not satisfied that he has yet earned the good opinion of mankind, till he can get the stones above his doorway to tell an emblematic tale of blood and treachery, which he fondly hopes a partial public will compliment him by attributing to some one of his lineal ancestors. The world seems still to support the view of old William Wyrley, who, in his "True use of Armouries," says, in a moment of enthusiasm, "Without armorial tokens there can be no martial discipline, no army arranged, no attempt of any company [joint-stock?] achieved, and, by consequence, no conquest made, nor so much as any commonwealth defended." But it must be admitted that "the mistress and queen of liberal knowledge," as Edward Bolton calls it, has in some sort degenerated; and that the deep mysterious lore which distinguished a Guillim, an Edmonson, and a Nisbet, would meet with little appreciation by those who so sacrilegiously appropriate the fruit of these men's cabalistic labours. There be those with most gallant achievements on their spoons and tea-pots, who cannot distinguish a blazon potent-counter-potent from a bordure indented; and to whom a bar dexter is no better than a bend sinister. Well might Nisbet, had he been living, now say, as he did a century ago, "I cannot sufficiently wonder at the vanity of a great many, who glory in their carrying these marks and signs of honour which they do not at all understand; and must regret it in the greatest part of my countrymen, who, though otherwise well qualified in the knowledge of other liberal arts and sciences, yet neglect to apply themselves to the study of heraldry—a science so valuable, that the greatest men of all ages have thought it worthy of their study and application."

To say the truth, there would be little to repay any one in the study. The thing wanted is got for the taking of it: it comes liberally to hand; and neither garter king-at-arms, nor the arcana of the science, are troubled for assistance. Unless the name be of the Grub or Buggins order, which it is hopeless to aristocratize without the aid of the Herald Office, a peep into Burke or Playfair will be sure to supply what is wanted; and where there is a choice, the most dashing and warlike achievement belonging to the name will of course be chosen. We in Scotland have a great advantage in this respect over our English friends, in the system of clanship, which makes the most aristocratic names at the same moment the most common. An Archibald Douglas, or a Norman Macleod, befits alike the whisky-shop sign and the peerage; but we find no Adolphus Pierrepoint, or Algernon Sidney Percy, keeping a beer-shop in the Minories. "Light come, light gane:" the honours are now as easily dispersed as they are acquired—no inverting of shields, hacking of spurs, or tearing of banners. The blazon is extinguished thus:—The respectable attorney's clerk, who is its proud possessor, has been charged in the tax survey one window too much. He writes, accordingly, a very polite letter to the surveyor of taxes, explaining the mistake, and, in compliment to her Majesty's officer, seals the same with a very perfect impression of the family coat. The surveyor finds that the complaint is just: deducts 7s. for one window over-charged, and intimates, that he has entered against the applicant a charge of £1, 4s. annually, for armorial bearings, with a penalty of thrice the duty for the first year, on account of his "having unfortunately neglected" to enter armorial bearings in his schedule. The surveyor is more powerful than the Lion; and, by this simple act, he extinguishes the blazon for ever.

The reason why these plants of a barbarous seed flourish so luxuriantly in the cultivated soil of civilisation is not very difficult to be found. They are rooted in the natural egotism of mankind. Talismans and charms, palmistry and the weapon salve, passed away whenever philosophy proved their nothingness; but though a thousand Bacons had a thousand times proved the folly of heraldry, it would live on, rooted in individual ostentation and family pride. It is a great thing to be the descendant of a great statesman or a great warrior; but it is better to show presumptive evidence of descent from some notorious rascal, than to appear the descendant of nobody. We have seen the blush of conscious pride mantle in the face of a Border laird, on being twitted with some diabolical act of his rieving ancestors. Would Scott have parted with the fame of any act of blood or rapine he could arrogate to his ancestry? Not he, indeed: he would have sooner sacrificed the brightest of the creations of his own intellect. And thus it is, that, witnessing the pride which its legitimate possessors feel, the dumpy citizen becomes ambitious to snatch a fragment of this wild ancestral fame, and orders the herald-painter to prepare a symbolical forgery, calculated to impose on mankind the persuasion, that his ancestors were far from being the worthy, honest, but obscure men that his own position in society seems to indicate, and that he is not without a spice of the devil in his blood. The influence of the personel on the opinions and conduct of mankind, is, in our opinion, a mine of intellectual knowledge, which has nearly all to be explored. Shafts have been sunk in it here and there; but the more minute, and delicate, and valuable veins have not been traced out. There is room here for a new philosophy of the ego and the non ego, which, when its riches have been put into the political philosopher's hands, will give a new interest to the science of history, now flagging for want of novelty. But we never intended this to be a philosophical essay, and must go back to our amusement.*

Mottoes, perhaps, convey a richer record of the feelings and the state of society that gave birth to the different phases of heraldry, than the arms themselves. Though not always very lucid, they are certainly more easy of interpretation than the symbols that accompany them; and they let us farther into the heart and philosophy of those who bestowed and adopted them. How singular it is, in the books of family history in the nineteenth century, to see these memorials of the different stages of barbarism, ranged according to some arbitrary order, (such as the alphabetical,) and presented in all their rugged variety and contradictoriness, as if they challenged criticism or demanded assent. Here is the clan watchword giving the world defiance in some uncouth tongue. Next to it stands some classical sophism, or moral aphorism, indicative of more civilized times, and perhaps intended to cloak worse morality. Reprobation of war, and contempt for peace, stand side by side; and occasionally comes some pure relic of candid times, before hypocrisy had begun her homage to virtue, containing a sentiment of uncontaminated selfish ruffianism. There is an amazing fund of conceit in some of these. Aquila non captat muscas—"The eagle catcheth not flies"—is a favourite bravado borne by many English families; one name it adorned not unworthily, Sir Francis Drake's. Cave, adsum, which may be translated—"Take care, here I am"—belongs to the Jardine family: it is a mighty sybilline and con-cited saying. Aspera me juvant—"Difficulties delight me"—accompanies the unostentatious name of Low. Aut viam inveniam aut faciam—"I shall find a way, or make one"—attends an English family of the name of Wightwick. Dei dono sum quod sum, the motto of the Lumsden family, is more doubtful in what it arrogates—"By the gift of God I am what I am," is the literal translation; but then, what is he?—"Thank God, I am no worse than I am," is perhaps what is meant. Aut pax aut bellum—"Either peace or war"—is the self-sufficient text of the Donaldson family; but this is nothing to the extinguo—"I extinguish"—of the Dundasses. The Stewarts carry, Fixus ac solidus—"Firm and substantial"—a more utilitarian characteristic than one would expect to find appropriated in such a quarter,—it would do very well on 'Change. Honeste vivo (Hacket family) savours of the same philosophy: I live honestly, would be the literal translation, but there is little doubt that something more elevated than the poor virtue honesty is insinuated. Touch not the cat but [without] a glove,—held by a host of Highland families,—is of another complexion in its conceit,—it predicates scratches and blood. Dinna waken sleeping dogs,—somewhat of the same class—belongs, we believe, to one of the Robertson families: we have seen it most appropriately traced in the moulding of the portcullis-gate of the grim old tower of Craigievar, in Aberdeenshire,—a silent monitor calculated to startle the stealthy invader. The reader of Galt's novels may recollect his admiration of the mysterious spirit of defiance contained in the legend he picked up in Aberdeen;—They have said: Quhat said they? Let them say. The events that called forth the three sentences, not very logically connected, but possessing an eloquent unity peculiar to themselves, have never been traced. All that is known of the words, is, that they used to stand in front of the old building of Marischal College, carved in a form of letter apparently of a far more ancient date than that of the building itself. We do not know if any northern family holds this legend by way of motto. The Hewetson motto is very like a sententious abbreviation of it; it is simply,—Let them talk. Noli me tangere,—Touch me not,—belongs to the Grahams. Noli irritare leonem,—Don't irritate the lion,—is the still more pompous gasconade of some obscure families in the south; and the pious Sir Robert Inglis has, Nobilis est ira leonis,—Noble is the lion's wrath. Qui me tanget pœnitebit,—Whosoever shall touch me shall repent,—is the saying of one of the great Highland septs; and we daresay there is much reason in it at the present day; the penitence not being in sackcloth and ashes, but in chlorate of lime and sulphur.

* The Phrenologists, who know much more of human nature than they get credit for, make a powerful use of the egotism of mankind in propagating their doctrines. A man who has not a very strong judgment, seldom escapes, without conversion, the ordeal of having his development examined and criticised:—the science becomes quite a new thing to him: instead of a vague nomenclature, it is surrounded by a delightful personal interest. If the intellectual and beneficially active bumps are prominent, there is a bribe to conversion, which few can resist. But even if destructiveness should be found prodigiously large, and both veneration and conscientiousness nonentities, the glimpse of character so afforded is not without its pleasing associations. The examinee discovers that he has always had an impetuous disposition—he is sorry to say he really fears he is a very wild fellow—he never could be kept out of some devilry or another since his earliest boyhood:—there really appears to be great truth in the science.

The most savage mottoes are naturally found among the Irish and Highland septs, and the great Border families. Those of the Irish are generally sonorous war-cries, in their own wild tongue. Crom a boo, is the well-known whoop of the Fitzgeralds. It was with this that old Kildare burst on the church of Cashel, when he involved it in that memorable blaze, which he palliated to the Privy-council by saying, he never would have set the church on fire, if he had not believed that the archbishop was inside! Forth fortune, and fill the fetters, is the marauding tocsin of the Athole family. Come to me, and I will give thee flesh, belongs to another Highland name—we forget which; the crest being an eagle, and the flesh prepared for him, the flesh of men. E'en do, and spare not, is borne by the M'Gregors. The family of Peter bears the same sentiment latinised—Usque fac et non parcas. Pereas nec parcas—Though thou shouldst perish, spare not (?)—is the nobler device of the Lamonts. The Borderers do not waste so much breath in warlike defiance. There is a business-like air about their maxims—an eye to black cattle and broth. I hope to share, is the unassuming, but very intelligible, device of the Riddells. But this is not nearly so full and explicit as the motto of the great Cranstoun family—Thou shalt want, ere I want. There are other mottoes besides this, that seem as if they were made for men who now bear them. If I can, says Colquhoun of Killermont: no doubt of it. Ne nimium—Not too much—is Lord Aberdeen's motto: while the Rae family has In omnia promptus, which may be freely translated, Ready for anything. Che sarà, sarà, is the well-known motto of Lord John Russell. It is embodied in an expressive Scottish proverb—"He that will to Cupar, maun to Cupar." Video, et taceo—I see, and hold my tongue—belongs to the Fox family. It is more characteristic of the name, than of the men who have held it. Aspera virtus—a not very translatable complaint of the difficulty of being virtuous, or perhaps brave—is the property of the Sinclairs. Lord Stanley boldly sports, Sans changer—Without change! while Sir James Graham, in his own vernacular, mumbles, Reason contents me. Templa quam dilecta—How beloved are the Temples—is the self-eulogium of the Buckingham Temple—the farmers' friend. When Lord Liverpool got his peerage, he assumed the words, Palma, non sine pulvere, which the Opposition translated, This is the reward of my dirty work. Swift was not so literal with Queen Anne's Semper eadem, which he paraphrased, Worse and worse.

There is much contradiction in the world of mottoes, especially on the subject of war. Bella, horrida bella—wars, horrid wars, (Lisle); and beati pacifici—blessed are the peacemakers, (Stewart,) make a strange contrast with per ignem, per gladium—by fire and sword, (Welby,) and semper pugnare paratus—always ready to fight, (Litchfield.)*

* We claim no credit for original research for these mottoes, having taken many of them from a little work called, "The Book of Mottoes," published in 1841. Not writing history, we are by no means fastidious about accuracy; and if we were so, we should require to look to some more erudite authority, if we may judge from the internal evidence of the translations in this little work. Take as one instance, ex sudore vultus, which we should naturally take to be a slight modification of the 19th verse of the third chapter of the vulgate edition of Genesis—"By the sweat of thy brow, &;" very different is our author's translation—"Beauty is produced by labour!" "This," he continues, alarmed apparently at the creature of his own imagination, "is probably but a lame translation of the motto borne by this old and respectable family [the Swettenhams] which being rendered literally

Some adages have a touch of jollity in them. Oportet vivere—Let us live, is borne by a family called Todd. Still better is Dum vivimus vivamus—While we live, let us live, or as the bard hath it, "As we journey through life, let us live by the way." Dr. Doddridge, who held it, was so scandalized by its decidedly jovial tendency, that he wrote a very pretty poetical comment to reverse the application:—

> Live while you live, an epicure would say,
> And snatch the pleasures of the present day.
> Live while you live, the sacred preacher cries,
> And give to God each moment while it flies.
> Lord! in my view let both united be.
> I live in pleasure when I live in Thee.

The position of the man who first said, auxiliante resurgo,—Being helped, I get up again, (Graham)—must have been suspicious. One can imagine the motto—Cadenti porrigo dextram—I hold out my right hand to the falling, (Pearse)—to have been the self-gratulation of his more steady boon companion. Medio tutissimus ibis—You will go most safely in the middle, (Senior,) and Gang warily, (Drummond)—seem well-meant advices for such occasions. What are we to make of Gradatim plena—full (or fou) by degrees, sported by one of the branches of the Gordon race? The late Lord Eldin's motto was—Free for a blast: and we daresay few who knew him doubted his being quite free for such exclamations.—We might now begin with the maxims adopted by municipalities, public companies, &c., which would afford us, in the pragmatical conceit they exhibit, perhaps a still more curious picture than the illustrations of individual arrogance; but we must have done. One, however, we cannot entirely pass by; that of the Inn-holders' Company of London, who, with some approach to desecration, say, "Come, ye blessed: when I was harbourless, ye lodged me." This is a caricature of the grasping statesman, who professes to dispose of his services at their high price solely for the public good. By the way, it has always appeared to us, that the favourite advice of the undertakers, memento mori, is very supererogatory. It means, strictly, Don't forget to die; as if the sable community were afraid that the negligence of the human race on this point might reduce their legitimate amount of "orders."

is, 'Beauty,' or 'good appearance from sweat,' an allusion, though not a very elegant one, to the family name."

THE OLD AND THE NEW.

BY AN AMERICAN ARTIST.

Begone with antiquities! give us the worth
Of all that at present is good upon earth;
And of men, modes, and things let us e'en think the last
As good, if not better, than those that have past.
So away with your Old—give us everything New,
Except the strong friends that are feeling and true.

Let them prate of the lands that have for their creeds
The days that have gone, and their ancestors' deeds;
These titles oft cover a century's error,
While merit lies starving and truth hides from terror.
But give me that land where mind is a thing
That raises the humble as high as a king.

They may praise the bleak heath, where carnage was done,
Or the hill where false glory—by treachery was won.
But give me the plains that are gleaming with grain,
And have known only peace since the wild deer was slain;
Where the song of the labourer plucking his store
Is echo'd by wee things that sport round his door.

They may talk of their streams that have often run red
With the blood of a host, when day-light has fled;—
But give me the rivers whose births have been blest
By the Rainbow—that smiled as they leap'd from their nest;
And, dashing o'er mountains, they wind through the vale;
With no stain on the tides but the wide-spreading sail.

They may boast of their towers, where the green ivy hung;
But give me the regions whose battlements young
Hail the first sun of morning without weed or moss,
And bid him depart without mourning his loss;—
Rearing high their proud heads as they wend to their prime
And laugh at the efforts of tarnishing time.

They may sing of the palace whose glories are dead,—
Where croaks the sad raven and owls make their bed;
Where the dark winds of midnight scream round their hearth,
And winter-blasts howl in their desolate mirth.
But give me the land, whose delights still live on;
And whose hearts, like its hearths, are pure, glowing and warm.

No! no! my friend, no, the Old 's not for me.
I love the New land that is own'd by the free,—
Where the crags burst the skies with their wild-tufted heights,—
Where the cataracts play and the eagle delights,—
Where in grandeur and might the great waters meet,
And nature exulting, yet keeps her firm seat.

Then begone with antiquities! I'm for the worth
Of all that at present is good upon earth;
And of men and their countries I'd e'en think the last
As good, if not better, than those that have past.
So away with your Old—give me everything New;
Save those friends of my youth, who have hearts deep and true.

T. R. P.

TO THE CORN LORDS.

O, deaf to hear, and dim of sight to see
Just wrath approaching, long endurance stung
By hard oppression to uplift her tongue,
And cry for vengeance on your tyranny;—
Ye should be gods,—not men, whose infancy
Upon the breasts of mortal mothers hung;—
And strong as is your selfishness should be
The pow'r that nerves your arm: else have ye flung
The gauntlet rashly down. Prepare to stand,
(Ye apoplectic grown by gross excess,)
When General Hunger to sure victory
Leads forth his millions—grasp with tighter hand
Your cherish'd right of spreading wretchedness,—
For, lo, the hour to test your strength is nigh.

THE FURZE-CUTTERS.

BY THE O'HARA FAMILY.

For the following narrative we are indebted to a fine old rebel—we beg his pardon,—to a fine old farming gentleman we should have said, who, about forty years ago, was a rebel, but who now, by virtue of a royal pardon, safe in his possession, is allowed technically to call himself a loyal subject, in something of the same way in which, by the agency of a special license, and an obliging priest, ladies of previously equivocal claims to perfection, are at last legally permitted to call themselves "honest women."

But no matter. May God forgive him, as did good George III.—And whatever at present may be his political principles, he is, we repeat, a fine old fellow; and has been distinguished for his bravery in the field, as an insurgent leader, as well as for his humane dispositions towards all foes who fell into his power, and therefore stood in need of his protection. So let us tell our story at once, or rather his story :—

At the battle of Ross, in 1798, he was high in command. After nearly twelve hours hard fighting against disciplined forces, whom they scarce more than outnumbered, his peasant army won the day—or, at least, seemed to have won it; but, for the want of a "Father Mathew" among them, lost it again, in a hand's-turn. The king's troops, whom they had beaten out of the little town, stole back upon them in the midst of a bestial carouse, and either butchered them in heaps in the streets, or scattered them in all directions over the adjacent country.

Our story-teller made many efforts to rally a small portion of the fugitives, but in vain; and in the twilight of the summer's evening, he stood almost alone, inside an arched entrance to the town of Ross, only awaiting his horse to be led to him, that he might himself ride hard for his life. In this position, and at this moment, his observations and his feelings were very painful. The spot on which he stood had been the scene, in the morning, of a considerable slaughter, by the pikemen, of detachments of the king's dragoons, together with a company of foreign mercenaries, belonging to a regiment whose acts, at that unhappy time in Ireland, disgraced the name even of civil warfare; and their bodies lay stiff all around, sternly reminding him of a brilliant success suddenly overclouded by a miserable infatuation.

Different observations tended, however, to assuage the keenness of his emotions, by otherwise occupying his mind. The body of a man, which he had supposed dead, suddenly stirred at his feet, and turned upon its back; and then he heard a deep rattling groan, and looked upon a corpse indeed. Stooping down, he saw the hands locked upon a crucifix; and more closely regarding the dress and features of the dead, he recognised the mortal remains of a poor wandering zealot, who, for hours during the hot struggle around him, in the early part of the day, amid showers of balls, and trampling of horses, had remained unhurt, holding up his crucifix, as he knelt almost prostrate, that such of the insurgents as were as great devotees as himself, might, under its sign, fight and conquer unharmed.

Here, however, he was now stretched at last, almost riddled, as our chronicler expressed it, with musket-bullets and bayonet-stabs.

And another figure, a more living one though, also attracted the notice of the observer. It was that of a woman, young and comely, with an oval face, blue eyes, light hair, and a strange smile upon her features; and, altogether, appearing greatly at variance with her present situation and employment. She sat upon the trampled sod, amid a group of the slaughtered Hessians; and she would turn up the face of one, and then, seemingly disappointed, mutter and smile, and even laugh; and having cut off, with a little billhook, the dead soldier's cartridge-box, she would push the body from her—and so proceed with another, and another. And in this young creature, our friend saw a rather old acquaintance. From the first victory of the Wexford insurgents at Oulart Hill, he remembered to have observed her actively engaged in every successful battle they had fought; and when it had been won, wandering over the ground in search of dead Hessians, and, it would seem, of such only: and if she found any, doing by them as she now did by those that were near her. Indeed, she was as well known to all the rebel force, as she had been to him. She was very fantastically attired; wearing a soldier's cap, a green flannel jacket, or rather jerkin, rudely fashioned, and adorned with cross-belts, and two old worsted epaulettes, one yellow, the other white. From under her quilted stuff-petticoat, her lower extremities appeared covered with military leggings. The jerkin was closely buttoned across her chest. She had no shoes on.

"We had been all as well acquainted with her history as we had been with herself," continued our narrator; "and deeply and fiercely did we all sympathize with it."

Now I felt alarmed for her. Although the greater portion of the royal troops had passed out of the town by another route, after our wretched runaways, still I had reason to believe that the survivors of the foreigners killed in the morning, had yet to quit it in pursuit of the flying drunkards; and better cutters-down on a retreat could hardly have been chosen. Under these circumstances the present was no place for her; therefore I approached and addressed her.

"Get up, ma-colleen, and take the road with me; all is lost, and we have not a moment to spare. The friends of those dead fellows around us will soon be on our backs: up, up; an honest lad, who fought well to-day, is bringing me my horse ; and as I guess you can ride pillion-ways without a pillion, we may both have a good gallop for it yet."

She made no answer, only glancing upwards for a moment into my face, and then resuming her close scrutiny of, I believe, that of the last remaining subject of her strange interest : she muttered, however, these words to herself :—

" No, he isn't among them yet," and then smiled so grimly, that it was almost fearful to see such an expression on such a countenance.

"Come, come," I continued, "I hear the noise of my horse's feet trotting up the hill. Be ready to mount, or the next moment may be our last."

A horse, indeed, appeared, led by my trusty orderly, who, after our triumphant rush into the town, had undertaken to get my stout plebeian charger well-fed and well-groomed,—attentions of which, considering his previous work, I assure you he stood very much in need. But at first view I did not know the animal to be my own, he was so bedizened and adorned ; in fact, they had sent him to me clad in all the showy trappings of the horse of a noble militia colonel, who, in the beginning of the fight, had fallen a victim to a private vengeance on our part, caused by what I, at least, cannot otherwise name than as a murder, committed upon a very respectable individual, whom, before entering the town, we had in too much simplicity despatched with a flag of truce and parley. Looking at my roadster, however, a second time, I easily recognised him, as his serious and sad young groom Andy (I knew him only by that appellation, for, indeed, he had been but the acquaintance of the day) called him by his name, Snorter, that under which I had given him into Andy's charge ; and as the poor brute, replying to it, doubtless in recollection of services and kindness lately received, laid his nose on the man's shoulder.

I stept away from the young woman to meet Andy, took the horse from him, and telling him to remain for a moment where he was, returned to her side.

" Now, mavourneen," I resumed, " here is our horse, and so give me your hand till I help you up."

" And you are going to run away, General, and the day is lost ?" she asked, awakening to observation, with much energy.

" All too true," I answered ; " and let us talk no more about it, but be off."

" And this," she cried, suddenly springing up, and planting one foot upon a small piece of artillery, which that morning we had taken, but were afterwards compelled to abandon ; " and are we goin' to lave this after us ?—our own dear darlint little cannon, that cost the blood of many a *good boy this morning."

" We must leave it behind," I replied ; " we have no help at hand to remove it.——Come, colleen, quick, quick !"

" No help to remove it ?" she queried : " put your horse to it, and he will remove it.——But no —you wont do that.—But who is that gawk over there ? Let him give his help with me, and we're able to do it together. Come here, come here, mabouchal !" she went on, beckoning to Andy.

The young man, since I left him alone, had been standing motionless ; his hands thrust into his breast, and his head hanging down—a very picture of woeful abstraction. Now, as the loud tones of her voice reached him, he started suddenly round, dropped his arms by his side, and poking out his neck, peered through the twilight at her.

" Quick, quick !" she resumed ; " quick, quick, you coward—if you are man enough to come at all ?"

He was soon close before her, now glaring into her face : and then he sprang backwards, loudly smiting his hands together, as he cried aloud—

" Virgin o' Heaven ! 'tis our poor Winnie !"

" Who ?—what ?—what Winnie ? And who are you ?—and what are you for sayin' at all ?"—and in her turn she peered into his face ; and then arose to the skies, like a rocket of sounds, as it were, her shrill terrific shrieks, as turning her back upon him she bounded to me, seized my hand, and frantically went on :—

" Help me up on the horse now, General, dear, and let us gallop ! Help me up, I say, before he lays a finger on me !"—and very little assistance did she require from me to spring, sitting sideways, to her appointed place.

From my previous information, I understood the meaning of all this.

" But I must interrupt myself here," continued the ex-rebel General. " I see I am a bad storyteller ; for, like a true Irishman, I have begun my story at the wrong end. And the best remedy I know for this is to retrace my steps, and account for the closing scene I have nearly completed for you, before I quite finish it. The evening is still young, and we can easily sit out more gossip."

We will pursue our old friend's tale in our own fashion.

CHAPTER II.

There was not in the county of Wexford, no, nor under the sun, a merrier pair of animals——grasshoppers, crickets, squirrels not even excepted—than Andy Doyle and Winnie Murphy. They were the children of faggot or furze-cutters, and followed themselves the occupation of their respective fathers and mothers. Living near to each other, they often met abroad, going to or returning from their day's work ; and——

We were about to explain at some length, why a certain event, by their joint coöperation took place ; but it will be as well to say at once, that, at a very early age, and with scarce more money between them than paid the priest's fees, they became man and wife ; that in a few days after the ceremony, they went to live together, in quite a new house, raised for them almost as quickly as Aladin's lamp could have done it, by their fathers, brothers, uncles, and cousins ; and composed of mud, fresh-cut sods, and other very primitive materials ; and situated on the edge of a little wild tract of furze ground, upon the produce of which they were to live, and grow rich; and that, lastly, under its humble roof, or else side by side out of doors, among the furze-bushes, cutting and chopping them with their small billhooks, Andy and Winnie were as happy as the day was long.

At the time of their marriage, Wexford had gone far upon the road to civil warfare; but Andy remained unconnected with everything like illegal combinations; not indeed from any want of courage, for Andy was by nature a brave, although a good-humoured and mild-tempered fellow; but, in fact, he lived so far away from towns, and from politics, that he could not understand matters in debate, and was therefore indifferent to them. And inhis new capacity of husband, and with the first faint promise—just hinted to him by his shrewd mother-in-law—of his becoming, in the fulness of time, a father, the anxious poor lad saw additional reasons why be should keep himself out of harm's way. So on went Winnie and he, day after day, cutting furze, and making them into faggots, and selling them; and saying their prayers, morning and night, and going to mass and to confession, and to heaven too we trust; and, most remarkable of all, and notwithstanding our seeming half-sneer just now, the happy and sinless young couple did absolutely begin to grow rich—that is, rich for them. Andy, for instance, was now able to buy a horse and car to carry his furze to the next market town, instead of borrowing or hiring one from a neighbour;—and alas, alas, for the dangers of wealth! it was that very horse and car which, in the first instance, helped, notwithstanding his previous precautions, to plunge him over ears and eyes into more than his share of the evils and horrors of civil contention.

Returning one day from market, along the high road, from which branched a long and wandering bosheen leading to his cabin, he encountered a military party in search of vehicles to convey their luggage from a near barrack station; and Andy's new horse and car, and what was worse, Andy's self, as the most skilful, as well as the readiest carter they could find, were pressed into their service. And not a moment was he allowed to pause, or turn back, or look about him; but off he must go with the soldiers at once.

When first made aware of being thus kidnapped, Andy looked, as may well be supposed, very blank and confounded; then clutching his whip hard, and keeping his eyes on the ground, his face became very red; and lastly, his lips twitched, and the water stood in his eyes as he again appealed for leave of absence only for one moment. He might as well have held his tongue.

"But Winnie, Sir?" he continued, addressing the sergeant of the party—"murther-alive! won't I get lave to go and bid her good-by, and tell her what's happenin' to me?"

"Winnie, my lad?" asked the sergeant. "Oh, a sweetheart, I suppose; never mind; she'll wait till you come back, I promise you."

"Why, then, no, Sir, not a bit of a sweetheart: that's all passed and gone betwixt us; no, Sir, but poor Winnie Murphy, the little wife o' me; and I didn't lay my eyes on her since sparrow-chirp this morning; an' now what will she think has become of the horse and car and myself?"

There was a loud laugh among the soldiers, as they hurried off poor Andy towards a point farther than he had ever yet been from the spot where he was born; and for the first mile of his unwilling journey, wistfully did he look along the road into the face of every chance passenger, hoping to recognise the features of some neighbour who might undertake to convey to Winnie tidings of the misfortune that had overtaken him; but the night fell upon his useless scrutiny, and on he plodded at his horse's head, every moment going to cry like a child, and almost despairing of ever seeing home or wife again.

But Andy was a bad prophet to himself, only in not anticipating the real miseries that lay in store for him. Home and wife he did again see, though they were no longer home nor wife to Andy Doyle.

Sooner than he expected he was returning to his humble place of residence, his spirits lighter than even himself could have hoped, at the near prospect of remeeting the being most dear to him in the world, and of relapsing into all his old ways of seclusion, industry, and happiness. It was a dark night in May—the clouds were low and brooding; but this did not affect him. Sitting upon the side of his curiously-constructed car, he cracked his whip over the head of his delivered horse, making him trot on at a good pace, while he sang or whistled the merriest tunes with which his simple recollections of local native melody supplied him.

He was now within a very short distance of the point where he had to turn off the high road, up the bosheen to his cabin. The land, to either side of the road, being of a rocky, sterile nature, was scarcely fenced in; and almost its sole vegetation consisted of furze, furze, furze, covering little irregularities or mounds, with corresponding little valleys running irregularly between them; and no house was in view, nor, indeed, habitation of any kind; and for many miles, no living thing, human or bestial, had met his view. The night was chilly, too, as well as gloomy; and the drear silence, if we except the noise made by his own horse and car, was broken only by the occasional creak of the land-rail in some unseen meadow at a distance, and the melancholy murmurings of a yet more distant streamlet. But still Andy's chirping vivacity remained uninfluenced by the scene. He knew he should soon come to a house, ay, and to more than one house—that is, precisely to two houses, one after the other, which would fill his heart with a consciousness of human sympathy, more positive than he had experienced in the crowded streets of the town from which he was coming back. He arrived within view of the turn up to the bosheen, and could already perceive the first house of which he had been so fondly thinking. It was a cabin almost as humble as his own, except that time had allowed to come to a half perfection of growth a few wild bushes, and one sad alder tree, planted before its threshold, when it had been built for the reception of his wife's mother by her then youthful bridegroom. But that young man, since become old, had lately died, and his widow lived quite alone in the poor edifice; and before proceeding up the bosheen to his own house, Andy had been arranging to knock up the good dame, and satisfy himself by one short question and answer, of the state of affairs under his own roof.

So, redoubling the threats of his whip around his horse's ears, he came closer and closer still to the old alder tree, which bent so sadly over its little clear fairy lake of spring water, shadowing a seat of turf that his own hand had assisted in building there. Another trot forward, and his trusty horse suddenly started, stopped, snorted, and swerved aside. Andy jumped off the car, held the animal by the head, and looked forward sharply to see what was the matter. There was a something a shade darker than the dark night, or even than the treble darkness cast by the alder tree upon the seat, and the patch of water beneath it; and this something had a wavering, yet monotonous motion. Andy felt a qualm of terror, and did not now in his heart blame his horse for his sudden freak. But he was, as we have intimated, courageous; so leaving the brute to do whatever he liked, he bounced forward, and stood within arm's length of the alder tree. A woman sat on the turf bench under it, closely wrapped up in her dark blue cloak, of which even the plaited hood was drawn over her face.

"Faix, an' no wonther, I say over agin," said Andy, "for poor Bridge Blackberry (his horse's name) to be frightened out of her siven sinses, to see such a fool of an ould woman sittin' in such a lonesome place, at such an hour o' the night. What brings her here, I wonther, the ould banshee? Mrs. Murphy, Mam!" he continued aloud,—he was beginning to have fears for home. At the sound of his voice, the figure ceased its rocking motion, and seemed shrinking from him, but he got no answer.

"Mrs. Murphy, will it be pleasing to you, Mam, to speak to poor Andy Doyle, that's come home to you all, this night, from the wars and the hardships of every kind?" He laid his hand on the shoulder of the person he addressed, who immediately started up, uttering a low shriek, as she ran to the door of the cabin, and knocked furiously at it.

"Divil's in the ould witch," resumed Andy, pulling off his hat, that he might scratch his head to his satisfaction,—"and what's come over her now?"

He was interrupted by the careful opening of the cabin door, upon the threshold of which, to his increased consternation, appeared, not quite attired, and her face fully recognisable by him even in the darkness, his mother-in-law, herself. The other figure darted by her side into the impenetrable gloom of the interior of the hut, and immediately became invisible.

"It was her own ould Fetch," resumed Andy, "come to knock her up out of her sleep, and give her her warnin'."

"It was not, Andy Doyle," replied the impressive tones of the old woman; "but can you tell me what it's all about?"

"Me!" answered Andy, "an' I axin' the whole o' ye for the last two hours the same question.—Murther an' ouns, collough,* make answer to me in one word,—who was it passed you in the open door-way?"

"If you didn't know before, I can make answer to that at laste,—it was your own wife, Winnie; she didn't hould the cloak tight round her face,—an' I had a good right to know her well."

"Crossa Cristhe be about us!" the poor lad staggered back, as he made on his forehead the sign he had named, "an' wouldn't spake a word to me, nor let me lay a hand on her body!"

"And why wouldn't she, Andy? And why did you dhrive her, schreechin' and moanin' into her mother's house, this blessed night?" demanded his mother-in-law sternly, and as if much inclined to scold him.

At this monstrous insinuation, Andy, losing temper, for perhaps the first time in his life, while his vague fears on his young wife's account grew stronger, almost jumped to the cabin door, and in nearly an authoritative voice cried out,—"Winnie! come out here, Winnie, and spake to me!"

"Mother, mother!" Winnie was heard to exclaim from within,—"don't let Andy Doyle come next or nigh me!—it's yourself, mother dear, I want to discoorse a word with, this black night! mother, keep him from the door!"

"An' I will, Winnie, I will," answered her mother. "Come, Andy Doyle, lave my place." She extended her arms across the door-way to keep him back.

"Blur-an-ages! don't cross me ould woman!" roared the hitherto mild Andy, forcing his way into the cabin. "Where are you Winnie?—let me see your face."

He received no answer except a wailing, that had the sound of heart-brokenness in it, reaching him from some quarter of the cabin, of which, in the thick darkness, he could not ascertain the exact place; and then, as if by instinct, he stumbled to the shelf on which his mother-in-law kept her rush-lights, and catching up from the hearth a smouldering sod of turf, which no one but an Irishman would have known to be useful on the occasion, soon lighted at the fitful flame, kindled from it, by his puffing breath, one of the primitive tapers mentioned; and holding this high above his head, he soon discovered, by its assistance, the person he sought. She had hastily snatched a low stool at the first faint flicker of the rush-light, and, evidently still to avoid her husband's scrutiny, now sat upon it with her face to the wall.

"Winnie," resumed Andy, "turn round and spake to me, I bid you——"

"I won't turn round to you, Andy, but I'll spake to you—that is a little—if you don't ax me, nor make me turn round,—or if you don't come near me, nor touch me," was poor Winnie's answer.

"Well, a-chorra, spake to me, at all events—and let your own poor Andy know what's the rason you forbid him to put an arm round you, for the first time in your life——Musha, I wonther is it jealous she'd be o' me," continued Andy, in a mutter to himself,—" on the head of Red Molly Mallay happenin' to meet wid me by chance the other day in the town beyant there—an' then runnin' home here to Winnie, an' bragging of it to her face? Winnie, a-grah," he resumed aloud, " don't be for givin' ear to any foolish stories that Moll Rhu would be tellin' you in regard of me an' herself, or of any other livin' girl or woman."

* Old woman.

" Andy Doyle, I heard no such stories from any one, nor would I give ear to 'em if I had," replied the girl, in hoarse and broken tones; " an' I'll lay no blame of any kind upon you, Andy; an' though I'm no longer fit to be your wife—an,' though, Andy, Machree, we are never to come together agin,—never to share o' the same bit an' sup, or the same roof,—yet, Andy, I can lay no blame on myself either."

" What do you mane at all, then?" he demanded, as motioning his mother-in-law to take the rush-light from his hand, he sat down trembling upon a rude seat in the middle of the floor.

" You'll know it soon enough, Andy darlin'—soon enough tho' I can't tell it to you—soon enough, tho' my woman's tongue can never bring itself to spake of such sin an' such shame to the ear of any livin' man; but oh, Andy, ma vourneen! the shame an' the sorrow has come upon us in our early days, sure enough—an'—God forgive me for the word!—Did we deserve it, Andy? We were a very young couple, loving ache other with an honest love, an' we war rared up, as good Christhins ought to be rared; an' afore we married we went to our duty.* An' we prayed for a grace an' a blessin' on our life to come; an' our priest laid his hands on our heads and called us his good children; an' our fathers and mothers blessed us; an' now—but the will o' the Lord be done! Now, Andy, ma-bouchal——." The unhappy young creature interrupted herself by a succession of agonizing moans, while she clapped her hands loudly.

The old mother, who, holding the rush-light, had been sitting as near to Winnie as she could, having now caught, in consequence of the motion of her hands and arms, a full view of her face, here uttered a scream, and cried out—" there's blood on her cheek, an' on her hands, Andy!"

Repeating the word " blood," the poor young fellow leaped up, and was again about to approach Winnie, when she also suddenly arose, fully confronted him, and, flinging back the hood of her cloak, and extending her hands, in one of which she clasped her little billhook, answered, in a gurgling voice—" Yes, Andy, blood, blood, blood, but not my blood—his blood—his—an,' tho' I warn't strong enough for anything else, I marked him for you, Andy, machree, I marked him for you—I marked him for you so well, that you'll know him whenever you find him out, among a thousand. Lookee, Andy!" she extended the billhook—" I gave him with this, one good gash down the left cheek, from his eyebrow to his chin, that 'ill take more years than he can ever live in this world to hale up from your notice." Here she laughed in such a manner as, for the first time, hinted a wandering of the mind.

" Him? who? what?" stammered her husband, his veins frozen with fear and horror—" go on, woman—for the love of God go on!"

" No, no, no," she said in her previously wretched tones—" I tould you too much already, an' a word more you can never hear from me; but see here—go up to our house, an' maybe you'd find my sisther Nancy there—an' maybe she'd spake to you the words I'm ashamed to spake—ay, an' on her own account as well as mine—for he had a commerade, Andy—an' then come back here, an' I'll tell everything to my mother by the time you see us agin—an'——."

Without waiting for another word, Andy darted out of the cabin, and disappeared up the bosheen. In a few minutes he was again under his mother-in-law's roof. The old woman was alone, sitting on the ground, and wringing her hands, and weeping piteously.

" I know it all now, mother-in-law," he said, in the highest state of fierce excitement. " You needn't say a word—but where's Winnie?" staring round the cabin.

" Gone, Andy, my poor boy—gone from us both! She only whispered her few frightful words into my ear—an' then bid me not to cry; an' then she bid you not to cry—for that herself has never cried a tear since; nor ever would cry a tear, till she had found him for you!—an' then she kissed my lips, an' tould me to kiss yours for her, an' hurried out of the house."

Andy asked which way. The old woman could not tell him; for she had not strength enough to follow Winnie even to the door. Exclaiming that he would soon find her out, he again hastily quitted the humble abode. He was, however, unable to redeem his pledge. Far and wide he wandered in his search for a considerable time, but not even a trace of Winnie could he detect; nor, since that miserable night, did he ever again behold her, till the evening already mentioned, after the battle of Ross. It should be, indeed, mentioned, that he had not at all sought her in the camps or haunts of the insurgents, whose presence he had rather shunned till the day before the eventful one alluded to by our old ex-General; and then a sudden thought of revenging her in the field of battle came into his mind, and he as suddenly acted upon it. Once only he imagined he might have got a glimpse of her; though he hoped in his heart that it would not prove to have been her. He was roaming a good distance from his home, through the old woods of Killaughrin; it was evening; the twilight had fallen, and the shades of the ancient oaks above his head added to its depth, while they also threw around a greenish hue, as if imparting to the air their own colour. At the end of an extensive vista, he saw the figure of a woman, her back turned to him, kneeling amid the tall spare grass, and seemingly absorbed in prayer; for he could perceive that she occasionally lifted up her clasped hands, or bent herself prostrate on the ground. He ran stealthily towards her, but she must have heard his step a good way off; for she suddenly arose, and, without once glancing behind her, plunged into the thickest part of the wood, and Andy's pursuit was vain.

* Confession, and the Sacrament of the Eucharist.

And why did he hope it might not have been Winnie he saw? Because, returning to the spot where he had seen the kneeling figure, he discovered there, half hid among the rank herbage, a little mound of almost fresh earth, with a little flat stone, having a cross rudely scratched on it, placed upright at one of its ends: and, oh! the fear that fell upon Andy's heart was terrible!—for he believed his poor Winnie to be now mad; and, recollecting the state in which the young mother had abandoned her home, what might not madness have perpetrated upon her prematurely-born infant? Was it, indeed, a baby's grave? Again—Andy's heart sickened, and he had not the courage to try, but ran as fast as he was able out of the wood.

We conclude in the words of the original narrator of this little tragedy of humble life.

"You remember," he said, "the incident at which I interrupted myself, when we were within the arched entrance to the town of Ross. Winnie, with scarce any assistance from me, had vaulted to my horse's back, sitting sideways behind the saddle, after having frantically petitioned me to gallop as fast as my steed could go, from Andy's presence and touch. I was preparing to comply with her wishes, when I heard the noise of running feet, with a clattering of horses' hoofs, yells, and what I knew to be pistol shots, coming up the steep ascent of the suburb street behind us. I jumped to my saddle, poor Andy remaining paralyzed; but before I could use my spurs, I caught the whiz of more than one bullet by my ears, and saw Winnie fall to the ground. I was on my feet again in an instant, standing over her. Andy, snatching up a pike that lay near him, turned his face to the approaching tumult. A few of our drunkards, now sober enough, came racing past us. I knew that their pursuers were Hessians, by the peculiarity of the shouts and cries that I still heard. I jumped once more into my saddle, but my horse's head was now turned to the town; and although my right arm remained (I may venture to say it without either exaggeration or boasting) stiff, swollen, and even pained, from having made it do its duty in a certain way for many previous hours, my sword was also out of its scabbard, and then spurring between our fugitives and the arched way leading out of the town, I succeeded, by a few words of hasty and impassioned exclamation, in making some of them turn and stand to me. A pike was soon in the hands of each of them. I had argued from the small number of the flying Croppies, that the Hessians in their rear would be still fewer; and I was right; only three of the atrocious scoundrels now appeared on the brow of the ascent, jabbering their horse-language through the nasty tufts of hair on their lips, and yelling like demons; but as Hessian demons alone could yell. We gave them, as they approached, a manly, Christian-like, Irish cheer in return; and while it was yet ringing round their ears, I had the slight gratification of seeing one of them tumble head foremost from his saddle, in consequence of a pretty well directed bullet fired from one of Lord ——'s holster pistols. Andy Doyle dragged a second of them to the ground, and piked his body piecemeal. The third was scarce a mouthful each for the pikes of the fellows I had rallied before the arch-way. A parcel of hungry hounds might as well be said to have had a meal on the carcass of one vagabond fox.

"Away with you now, boys," I cried, "and run for it as fast as you like."

In a few seconds Andy, Winnie, and I were alone. But Winnie did not appear on the spot where I had left her stretched. She had feebly crawled to the side of the Hessian, whom Andy had settled accounts with,—he having parted from the mangled corpse, to help his friends in another quarter. Now he ran to my side, staggering however; and unfortunate young fellow, he too was bleeding—ay, and bleeding to death. Alas, I now remembered to have heard a shot near him, when he first pulled the Hessian from his horse.

"Where is she?" he screamed, "where is she?" Her maniac laughter directed us where to find her. I was obliged to assist him to her. She was kneeling, although wavering as she knelt, over the dead and hacked carcass of that damned ruffian and villain.—Here our old croppy ground his teeth, and his eyes flashed from beneath his frowning white eyebrows.—And one of her hands was extended over his left cheek. We spoke to her together—poor Andy in but feeble tones, as he dropt at her side. Mad, exhausted, and dying as she was, she knew her young husband at a glance;—and laughing again—Oh, I almost hear that laugh still, and my blood runs cold at it—"It's himself, Andy!" she hoarsely whispered, for she could do no more: "here's the mark I put on him for you, and well did you find it out; and well did you reward me for my throuble in putting it on him. And now, kiss me, Andy: I give the lave for it now—kiss me, my darling of the heart—kiss me, my own grau-gal;*—and hurry, hurry, Andy, while I have the time."

She did not know she was speaking to his corpse. She threw herself upon it, embraced it closely, and kissing his lips almost reverently,—the poor young pair lay dead together.

I was obliged to leave them on that unhappy spot, just as the moon began to gleam over their young and comely, though now distorted features; and, "oh!" I cried with a groan, while my tears fell fast, "I wish that my countrymen, of every degree and class, could be made acquainted with this one simple illustration of civil warfare!"

* Darling boy.

THE POETS OF THE DAY.*

REVIEWED BY BON GAULTIER.

We have been in Arcadia! With a cup of coffee in one hand, and a buttered roll in the other, we wandered at breakfast time into its smiling valleys. Noon-day found us, reckless of tiffin, sauntering adown its sunny slopes in elegant flirtation, with a brace of shepherdesses. "That tocsin of the soul, the dinner-bell," pealed its usually welcome chime at the accustomed hour. To us it seemed but the "drowsy tinkling" of the wether's bell, lulling the distant folds, for we were just then in the very crisis of a declaration to a naïad of the stream, that glittered through the mazes of a sacred grove; and we saw that the fair Egeria, like more mortal maidens, could not withstand the irresistible eloquence of our Irish tongue five minutes longer. But nature will reassert her legitimate rights, despise them as we may; and the clamorous demands of an empty stomach have at last recalled us to the realities of life. Why should we conceal it? Those shepherdesses we spoke of turned out to be the wedded mothers of large families; and the Naïad of the brook, just as we thought she was about to sink confidingly into our arms, spied a juvenile satyr trotting through a distant alley—a great blear-eyed monster, with a beard like an old clothesman's—and in a moment she had bolted from our embrace, and was off after him. Picture our disgust, when, a few minutes afterwards, we caught a glimpse of the pair, reclining, as Maria Darlington says, "on a mossy bank, and making the grove reëcho with their kisses." After such a discovery, is it to be wondered at that we emancipated ourselves forthwith from the trance into which we had been transported? Our amour propre was wounded. We uttered a malediction against the whole crew of nymphs, naïads, shepherdesses, and fauns,—vowed, that if we were to be jilted, it should be by good substantial flesh and blood; and ordered up half a hundred weight of mutton chops, and several bottles of port, upon the strength of our resolution. But, alas! we found we were insensible to their attractions. Our taste for these transient and sublunary dainties was irretrievably spoiled; as young ladies, to the dismay of their mammas, and disgust of their sterner parents, scowl at the pigeon-pie or saddle of mutton, after a forenoon debauch on pastry and ices at Littlejohn's. "The ampler ether, and diviner air" of the region we had spent the day in, had sublimated our appetites, and nothing short of ambrosial fare, washed down with goblets of nectar, could have pleased us;

> For we on honey-dew had fed,
> And drank the milk of Paradise.

Yes, like the bard of old, we have been in Arcadia. But much pondering, as we have since done, the injury which the excursion has inflicted upon our appreciation of earthly viands, we are almost inclined to say with Touchstone, that "when we we are at home, we were in better place; but travellers must be content."

Mr. David Twaddell, Mr. David Twaddell—by the by, that name of yours is not the most poetical in the world: it is you upon whom we must charge the sin of our having, like Titus, lost a day, to say nothing of our dinner. As one of your own well-beloved poets has it,—"Oh thou hast been the cause of this anguish, my brother!" What mischievous gnome prompted thee to amass the treasures of "the poets of the day,"—to pilfer from magazine and newspaper the orient pearls of verse that irradiate their dingy pages,—to bring together these tiny orbs of song, and send them spinning through a portly octavo,—a very milk and watery way in the firmament of poesy? Smifzer, Smauker, Jones, Timms, Smelt, Wiggins, Hobbs, Dobbs, Snobbs, Smith, Jenkins, and Smortolk,—we could endure their individual brightness in the poet's corner of a rankly smelling Sunday paper; but their concentrated radiance is too much even for our eyes, though, like the eagle, we have flashed them against the sun itself in many a daring flight. Like the ecstatic Mantalini, we shrink from the blaze, exclaiming—"Oh this is too beautiful—too demd beautiful!"

And yet, after all, it was a noble thought to open a Foundling Hospital for those stray bantlings of the muse, that, by the law of their existence, are foredoomed to everlasting contempt and oblivion. Such an idea could have been conceived only by a nature of the finest and most disinterested sympathies. The book might not sell—nay, it could not sell—sure we are, at least, that no reader of ours will ever stumble upon a copy of it. But that is by no means an uncommon occurrence with Mr. Twaddell's books; and in his enthusiasm for kindred genius, he was prepared to forego all minor considerations, and to devote his great abilities to the compilation of the work, on the distinct understanding that he was to receive a handsome douceur from such of the "Poets of the Day" as could afford it, for admission into his list of noble and illustrious authors. And we must do Mr. Twaddell the credit to say, that he has performed his task ably. Till we had perused his work, we had no idea, albeit on terms of great familiarity with the Annuals, what an amount of poetical talent was afloat around us—that, in fact, we were moving amid a very chaos of breaking and broken hearts, and that "deep thoughts," and "flowery thoughts," and "anguished thoughts," and fairy thoughts," and heaven knows how many more kinds of thoughts, were labouring in the bosoms of all the Snookses and Brookses, whom, in our benighted ignorance, we conceived, from our own daily observation, not to have one idea to rub against another. The age of chivalry and romance may be gone; but who shall say that poetry is dead, in the era which has given birth to the shady grandeurs of "Pandemonium, by Alfred Peltirogus," or the Anacreontic elegance of "Gleams of Glenlivet, by Jaspar Whiskipunchovicz?" But why do we single out these, when Mr. Twaddell's entire volume bears upon its face the strongest evidence, that the poetic voice "that hourly speaks within us," still soars triumphantly above the clatter of Corn Law agitation, steam-engines, and spinning-jennies?

It is a beautiful book, this of Mr. Twaddell's,—a casket worthy to contain such priceless gems. The paper is the best thick post wove; the printing wonderful, when we consider the notoriously bad spelling of female authoresses and amatory poets, who supply the staple of the contents; and the engravings distinguished by the same force and vigour of handling, which, in the Keepsake and other Annuals, have added new insipidity to the taste of the drawing-room and boudoir. It is, perhaps, almost superfluous to add, that the subjects of the illustrations are furnished by Royal academicians of the most distinguished eminence and incapacity. But the charm of the book lies in the little biographical sketches of the authors, with which the editor has interspersed it. He brings those gifted beings, on whose rhapsodies we have hung enraptured, before our eyes, "in their habits, as they lived." Mr. Twaddell does not fatigue us with fine psychological speculations on their mental phenomena, like your prosy Coleridges, Schlegels, Hegels, Lessings, and De Quinceys. He paints a genius by his small clothes, and fixes a characteristic in a twist of the cravat. With a minuteness truly charming, he details an author's annual outlay upon kid gloves and eau-de-Cologne; and if you do not know the height of his hero, in his stocking-soles, to a hair, it is not Mr. Twaddell's fault. How charming it is to be assured, for instance, that the beautiful authoress of "The Cockatoo of Koordistan" takes her tea without sugar, and that the bard of the "Songs of Fashionable Life"—our readers are, of course, aware that we allude to the accomplished Smuggins—is given to the elegant indulgence of picking his teeth with a three-pronged fork. It is nothing to tell us that Sir Simper Whiffle has the most playful fancy, and the most polished diction of any lyrist of the day: but it is a satisfaction to know, with the certainty which Mr. Twaddell's unquestionable accuracy warrants us in entertaining, that he draws his inspiration from devilled biscuit, and sherry and water. In such items of useful information Mr. Twaddell's sketches abound; and, as a whole, we are prepared to state, with confidence, that his share in the work before us fully supports the reputation he at once achieved throughout Europe and the minor literary circles by his "Reminiscences of Grub Street." But "revenong a no mootong," as Mr. Yellowplush says.

Mr. Twaddell strikes the key-note of the volume in a dedication to Prince Albert, whose portrait, by the way, with singular appropriateness, flourishes as frontispiece to the volume. Without one word of preface, we usher it into our readers' presence, in the perfect assurance that it cannot fail to make the proper impression on their minds.

DEDICATION TO PRINCE ALBERT.

BY THE EDITOR.

Illustrious scion of a noble line,
That rules o'er realms of sourest kraut and wine;
Thou, who has felt the Muses' cheerful flame,
And lisp'd in numbers, when—the numbers came;
Sire of a tome, ne'er criticised but gently,
Published, price one pound one, by Richard Bentley;
Thou who canst gratify the Nation's hopes,
And yet find time for crotchets and for tropes;
To thee we bring—the candle of the Blues—
Decoctions of a barley-water Muse:
Accept the gift presented at thy throne,
And make the feeble fluid all thine own.

Long might my muse this volume's worth unfold,
Its silken boards, its edges bright with gold,
Its jetty type, its paper's mellow tints,
And last, not least, in our dear love, the prints;
But why of these remind your Highness, when
Your Highness has got eyes like other men?
Your portrait, painted for this work expressly,
By that distinguished artist, C. R. Leslie,
As frontispiece, the rapt attention fetters,
A proof of loyalty before the letters.
So thy fair image all abroad shall run,
Beloved of all, yet loving only one,
That gentle partner of thy silent hours,
Who shares thy fame, and stimulates thy powers,
To wield the poet's pen, the painter's brush,
And wake sweet music's transcendental gush.

Yet is it not thy noble Saxon blood,
Thy line of ancestors before the Flood,
'Tis not thy ermined stole, or pomp of state,
The crowd of lackies that infest thy gate,—
'Tis not for these we seek thy presence now,
To place our chaplet on thy laurell'd brow.
No! scan these pages, and on every leaf,
See kindred genius claim thee for its chief,
And, vainly emulous of thy renown,
Write sometimes up to thee, and sometimes—down.

I ask not thanks,—but, if your Highness should Think this poor lay deserves some gratitude,
I'd not refuse—so generous is my thrift—
Any snug place within your royal gift,
Where duties light, and very ample pay,
Might make me bless thy name each quarter-day.
So should I ne'er your princely ear abuse,
With the dull strains of a plethoric muse;
But pray that you may long be spared to grace
Your lofty sphere, and found a royal race,
Filling all Windsor with the noise uproarious,
Of little Alberts, and of small Victorias.

There are points in this Dedication, which puzzle us. The allusion to the Prince's works, which, however, we will say with confidence, as we have never seen them, do equal credit to his head and heart, is rather ambiguous; and, if we could suspect Mr. Twaddell of what Lord Brougham calls "the degrading faculty of sarcasm," we might have been tempted to say that he had indulged it here. But no! though "gentle dulness ever loves a joke," it is plain that Mr. Twaddell was never more serious than on the present occasion. What a fine compliment to his Royal Highness is conveyed in the idea, that he stands in a juste milieu, so nicely balanced between the extremes of poetical fervour that the whole tribe of authors, smitten with emulation of his position,

Write sometimes up to him, and sometimes—down.

It would have puzzled Pope to pen an encomium more delicate; and if it be possible to tag on one other encumbrance to that glory of our country, the Pension List, Prince Albert cannot, with that liberal nature of his, turn a deaf ear to the delicat suggestion of the poet, as to a personal provision, in the concluding paragraph. We shall expect to see Mr. Twaddell promoted to a clerkship of the "Board of Sewers," at least, in an early Gazette. In the course of nature, too, the Laureate's bays and butt must soon be going a-begging. Mr. Twaddell tells us he is fond of sherry; and we would back him for a dozen of that same fluid against Elkanah Settle himself, at a Birth-day Ode. When, therefore, the time comes, her Majesty's Ministers know where to look for a Laureate.

To pass from the presence-room at Windsor, to a private nursery, is a transition somewhat abrupt; but there is something so appropriate in the lines we are about to quote, that we are induced to make it. And here we would remark, that the loyalty of our national character is illustrated in nothing more strongly than in the tendency to call our sons and daughters after the scions of royalty. The number of Victorias that we know is incredible; and Albert Edwards, will soon, we expect, be as plentiful as blackberries. The lines in question are supposed to be addressed by Mr. Albert Sacks of the Coburg, who does "the general utility business," at that popular place of entertainment, and who baptized his infant son "Albert Edward," the very day after the royal christening. Mr. Frederick King, the well-known dealer in Prussian blue, stood godfather on the occasion, and it is to him the public owes the following address:—

TO THE YOUNG ALBERT.

Earth has many joys, but none
Like the father's in his son;
Earth has many a fairy creature,
Light of limb, and bright of feature,
  Lovely surely they be!
But it holds no sight so fair,
  To a father's eyes,
As a little son and heir
Swaddled round and round with care,
  Winking with its little eyes,
  A chubby little baby!

See it on its nurse's lap
  With its rosy face
Peeping from its lacèd cap
All about the place;
How it mumbles down its pap
  With a pretty grace!
How it rubs its little thumbs
All against its little gums,
  Throws its little hands
Round and round its little head,
With its fingers all outspread,
While its little voice is crowing,
Like proud Chanticleer's a-going
  'Mong his feathered bands.

Sullen fit, domestic quarrel,
  What are they to him!
Be his nurses bad or moral,
Leave him but his bells and coral,
  They may sink or swim.
He is ever blithe, and chirrups
O'er his caudle, o'er his syrups,
  Ever wild with frolic;
Save, perchance, his little wits
Are perplexed with teething fits,
  Or a twinge of colic.

Twinge of colic, teething fits,
Much perplex his little wits,
  Make him peak and pine,
Teach the tiny elf to know
Something of the pain and woe,
Which, when that Old Snake prevailed,
Was upon our race entailed
  Through the female line.
But thou root of rhubarb yellow,
  Fragrant leaf of senna,
Come, like saintly thoughts that hallow,
Gripes and griping pangs to mellow,
Set at rest the little fellow,
  Save him from Gehenna!

Dearest love, my toddy's done—
  We may wander bedward;
But up stairs first let me run
To embrace our darling son—
  Our little Albert Edward.
Sweetest love, this evening all
He's done nothing else but squall:
Let me try what I can do
  To pacify the little grumbler.
I'll give him sugar in his pap,
I'll dandle him into a nap;
And in my absence, dearest, you
  Can mix yourself another tumbler.

Windsor Castle, 27th January, 1842.

One of the most charming domestic poems ever penned—redolent of caudle, steaming with the fragrance of what that unfortunate cockaigner, Johnny Keats, calls "lucent syrups tinct with cinnamon," and all the other sugary nutriments of babyish existence. If the editor of the "Infant Annual" does his duty, these lines must lead off his very next volume. Mothers will smile over them, as only mothers can do; and fathers will forget the anxieties of their state, to think that poetry can invest it with such charms. Had the authorship of the lines been left by the editor to surmise, we should, certainly, from the internal evidence, have traced them to a high quarter. The date, "Windsor Castle," might also have been taken as favouring this conclusion, if the well-known letter of a gentleman, who is said to be member for Edinburgh, had not made it doubtful, whether Windsor Castle really means Windsor Castle, or only "The Castle" at Windsor.

But we may not linger on this theme—for behold on the next page blazes, what for us has irresistible attractions—"An Eastern Serenade." The East! To us, there is magic in the word—transporting us to those the days of our green youth, when Moore and Byron held the monopoly of song, and orientalism raged with a scimitar in one hand and a bouquet of acacia blossoms in the other, through the length and breadth of the demoralized British islands. Then we could tell a Giaour from a Ghebir, better than Hamlet knew a hawk from a hernshaw. The land of the cypress and myrtle was as familiar to us as the coast of Fife. Standing on Leith pier, we have fancied ourselves gazing on the waters of the breezy Bosphorus. In short, our whole soul, like the atmosphere of a civic banquet, was redolent of Turkey and of Greece. And even now, though that delicious diet (for, alas! life cannot be one continued Christmas feast!) hath somewhat palled upon our senses, we can still yield to its fascinations, with something of the passion of a first love; and never did Ulysses' boatswain listen more eagerly to the song of that

Syren, Sal Slammock, whose musical abilities are so highly spoken of by Homer, than do we to the EASTERN SERENADE.

BY THE HONOURABLE SINJIN MUFF.

The minarets wave on the plains of Stamboul,
And the breeze of the evening blows freshly and cool;
The voice of the musnud is heard from the west,
And Kaftan and Kalpac have gone to their rest.
The notes of the Kislar reëcho no more,
And the waves of Al Sirat fall light on the shore.

Where art thou, my beauty! where art thou, my bride!
Oh, come and repose by thy Dragoman's side!
I wait for thee still by the flowery tophaik—
I have broken my Eblis for Zuleima's sake.
But the heart that adores thee, is faithful and true,
Though it beat 'neath the folds of a Greek Allah-hu!

Oh wake thee, my dearest! the muftis are still,
And the Tshocadars sleep on the Franguestan hill;
No sullen Aleikoum—no Derveesh is here,
And the mosques are all watching by lonely Kashmere;
Oh, come in the gush of thy beauty so full,
I have waited for thee, my adored Attar-gul!

I see thee—I hear thee—thy antelope foot
Treads lightly and soft on the velvet cheroot,
The jewell'd amaun of thy zemzem is bare,
And the folds of thy palampore wave in the air.
Come, rest on the bosom that loves thee so well,
My dove! my Phingari! my gentle gazelle!

Nay, tremble not, dearest! I feel thy heart throb,
'Neath the sheltering shroud of thy snowy kiebaub;
Lo, there shines Muezzin, the beautiful star,
Thy lover is with thee, and danger afar—
Say, is it the glance of the haughty Vizier,
Or the bark of the distant Effendi, you fear?

Oh, swift fly the hours in the garden of bliss,
And sweeter than balm of Gehenna, thy kiss!
Wherever I wander—wherever I roam,
My spirit flies back to its beautiful home.
It dwells by the lake of the limpid Stamboul,
With thee, my adored one! my own Attar-gul!

Had Byron been alive, or Moore not ceased to write, we should have bidden them look to their laurels; for every one must see, that

> Their verse at best is but insipid stuff,
> Beside the strong potheen of Sinjin Muff.

Nonsense, says Dryden, shall be eloquent in love; and here we find the axiom fairly tested,—for in this eastern serenade are comprised nonsense and eloquence in perfection. But, apart from its erotic and poetical merits, it is a great curiosity, as exhibiting, in a very marked manner, the singular changes which the stride of civilisation, and the bow-string of Sultan Mahmoud, have made in the Turkish language and customs within a very few years. Thus, we learn, from the Hon. Sinjin Muff, that a "musnud," which, in Byron's day, was a sofa, now signifies a nightingale. A "tophaik," which once fired away in Moore's octosyllabics as a musket, is metamorphosed into a bank of flowers. "Zemzem," the sacred well, now makes shift as a chemise; while the rallying cry of "Allah-hu" closes in a stanza, as a military cloak. Even Gehenna, the place of torment, is mitigated into a valley, rich in unctuous spices. But the most singular of all these transmutations, in the Turkish vocabulary, is that of the word "Effendi," which used to be a respectful epithet applied to a Christian gentleman, but is now the denomination of a dog. Most of these changes are certainly highly poetical; and while we admire their ingenuity, we do not impugn their correctness. But with all respect for the Honourable Sinjin Muff, (who, Mr. Twaddell tells us, is a distinguished oriental scholar, having once sailed from Malta to Constantinople in a steam-boat, and lived upon figs and soda water all the way,) we think that, in one or two instances, he has sacrificed propriety at the shrine of imagination. We do not allude to such little incongruities as the waving of a minaret, or the watching of a mosque. These may be accounted for; but who—who, we ask with some earnestness, ever heard of cheroots growing ready-made among the grass, or of a young lady keeping an appointment in a scarf trimmed with mutton cutlets? We say nothing to the bold idea of the Dragoman, who snaps Eblis in twain, as a gardener might do a frosted carrot; but we will not give up our own interpretation of "Kiebaubs," seeing that we dined upon them not two months ago at the best chop-house in Constantinople.

Among the bards of Eastern song, who enrich Mr. Twaddell's volume with orient pearls dragged from the very mire of obscurity, none have signalized themselves more conspicuously than Mr. Abiram Lewti, a young gentleman of the Hebrew persuasion, who, we learn, was introduced to Mr. Twaddell's notice by an accident strictly personal,—indeed, domestic in its character. It appears from that gentleman's narrative, that having formed a determined resolution to convert certain portions of his wardrobe, (of which he has favoured us with a minute catalogue,) into an equivalent in her majesty's currency, he had been on the look-out for a respectable agent to whom he might intrust the conduct of so important and delicate a negotiation. Passing over his interesting, but somewhat prolix narrative of a series of visits to Monmouth and Holywell Streets, we come at once to his first meeting with the singular and "talented" subject of the memoir:—

I was wandering, (says Mr. Twaddell,) slowly, and if, the truth must be told, rather pensively, down Holborn Hill. Repeated rejections of my literary lucubrations by a variety of magazines, had somewhat damped my enthusiasm, and ruffled my temper. The reader will, therefore, hardly be surprised, when I aver, that neither the brilliant display of saveloys and rump-steaks in the windows, nor the frequent remarks of the passers by, (expressed in such terms as these, "That's Twaddell! There goes the Great Metropolitan! Lord bless him! That's one of the 'Popular People!' Hooroar for Twaddell! There he goes with his eye out! &c.)" could distract my attention from the all-absorbing current of my thoughts. Suddenly, I felt some one touch my elbow, and a low and musical, though slightly husky, voice breathed into my ear the following singular interrogatory,—

"Any Old Clothes, Sir?"

I started, looked round, and at once recognized, in the individual who accosted me, the unmistakeable stamp of genius. He was a young man, apparently about four-and-twenty, gaudily, rather than neatly, dressed, with, I should say, a decidedly Jewish cast of mind and countenance. His skin, if duly purified from a rough and somewhat scaly epidermis, would have been of a delicate pease-soup tint; his eyes were dark, penetrating, and expressive, with an inclination towards each other, which blended their mutual lustre at a point, distant, certainly, not more than half an inch from a nose that might have riveted attention upon the Aquiline Hill, in the days of the Cæsars. On his head, with daring originality, he wore three hats piled one above the other; and under his left arm he carried a large, rusty, but well-filled bag, of somewhat extravagant proportions. This was no other than ABIRAM LEWTI, the young Jew bard of Whitechapel East.

The reader must excuse us, if we omit Mr. Twaddell's conversation with the interesting stranger, which was conducted in a neighbouring pot-house, and seems to have terminated in a manner equally satisfactory to both the contracting parties. Neither, unfortunately, can we afford space for the protracted narrative of a supper, at which social meal Mr. Twaddell subsequently entertained the tuneful descendant of Abraham; nor the graphic details of his horror at the sight and smell of a savoury dish of pork sausages, which formed the only dish. Enough for us to know, that Mr. Twaddell, with that editorial dexterity in which he is unrivalled, succeeded in eliciting from his friend sundry choice specimens of Israelitish versification, from which it gratifies us to select the following:—

LAY OF THE LEVITE.

BY ABIRAM LEWTI.

There is a sound that's dear to me,
  It haunts me in my sleep;
I wake, and, if I hear it not,
  I cannot choose but weep.
Above the roaring of the wind,
  Above the river's flow,
Methinks I hear the mystic cry,
  Of "Clo!—Old Clo!"

The exile's song, it thrills among
  The dwellings of the free,
Its sound is strange to English ears,
  But 't is not strange to me;
For it hath shook the tented field
  In ages long ago,
And hosts have quailed before the cry
  Of "Clo!—Old Clo!"

Oh lose it not! forsake it not!
  And let no time efface
The memory of that solemn sound,
  The watchword of our race.
For not by dark and eagle eye,
  The Hebrew shall you know,
So well as by the plaintive cry,
  Of "Clo!—Old Clo!"

Even now, perchance, by Jordan's banks,
  On Sidon's sunny walls,
Where, dial-like, to portion time,
  The palm-tree's shadow falls,
The pilgrims, wending on their way,
  Will linger, as they go,
And listen to the distant cry,
  Of "Clo!—Old Clo!"

Quis, talia fando, temperet a lachrymis?

For ourselves, when the first tearful gush of our emotion was over, we searched out every venerable article of wearing apparel in our possession, and they were not a few, and sending to the front of the Register Office,

That pile, where many a saffron Levite lurks,
And begs old clothes from starving writers' clerks, for one of the fraternity, we handed over our decayed suits to him in the gross for a very bagatelle,—an old song. Such is the power of poesy! Our whole sympathies were stirred for the fallen race, and we vowed that Judah should not want a banner, so long as we had a pair of antique inexpressibles to suspend crosswise, like the Moslem horse-tail, upon an upreared pole. We had travelled with La Martine, through the Holy Land; but nothing, in all his pilgrimage, touched us so deeply as that still recurring burden, of "Clo!—Old Clo!" We became "an Ebrew Jew" for the time, and its plaintive cadence thrilled upon our souls, like the piping Ranz des vâches upon the expatriated Swiss, or the mellifluous breathings of the bagpipe upon an exiled "dhuinewassel."

But we hasten to relieve the melancholy of our mood, by lighter strains; and those of Mr. Jonas Smifzer, and Mr. Jeremiah Smauker, come most opportunely to our aid. "Love and Liquor; or, The Sentimental Pot-boy," by Smauker, is conceived in a strain of finely-blended blackguardism and maudlin, which would render it invaluable to certain periodicals that shall be nameless. But for elegant insipidity, and the pomp and circumstance of language unencumbered with meaning, commend us to "The Blind Old Milkman," in terza rima by Smifzer. "Smifzer," as Mr. Twaddell says, with the discrimination of a Longinus, "has more smoothness,—Smauker more force. Smauker startles, upon occasion, with an almost Milesian fervour,—Smifzer soothes with a tenderness that drivels in dulcet and well-nigh Lesbian measures. When we stumble upon such lines in Smauker, as

No joys serene, no calm delights they knew,
But wildly soaked their clay, till all was blue, the vigour of the conception certainly pleases, but the rough daring of the expression somewhat offends us. But in Smifzer, the coarsest images are clothed in a graceful pomp of diction, that divests them of half their grossness; and we are told,—as in his well-known description of a cow-house,—of

The pungent odours of digested hay, without even a momentary sensation of disgust."

Much more of this sort of criticism follows, but, instructive as it is, we tear ourselves from it, and present our readers with a specimen of the joint labours of Messieurs Smifzer and Smauker, in a modern Town Eclogue, which has been happily designated,

TIPSYCHIDION;

OR, THE POT-HOUSE PASTORAL.

"Sweet Spirit."—Shelley's Epipsychidion.

The Argument.

SMIFZER and SMAUKER, two metropolitan literati, very expert at disposing of "brandies and water, warm with," enter into a friendly contest as to their relative poetical merits, over a hot tumbler at the "Blue Posts"—the loser to pay the bill. EZEKIEL SMUDGE, landlord of the establishment is appointed umpire, holds the stakes, and keeps them. The disputants end where they began, and the bar is closed.

SMIFZER.

Smauker! while thus our hunger we appease
With—frugal supper!—tripe and toasted cheese;
Ere yet the alcoholic juice be poured,
And smoking tumblers grace the genial board,
Let not the voice of prudence be forgot,
But let us settle who's to pay the shot.

SMAUKER.

Like Plato, Smifzer, hast thou reason'd well,
But what reply to give, I cannot tell.
Methinks, unless my recollection fail,
Last night I paid for oysters, and for ale;

Not Dando's self could faster clear the scores,
Than you, my Smifzer, bolted the Pandores.

SMIFZER.

You paid for oysters, Smauker, that is true;
Nor only paid, for you devoured them too.
But calm oblivion closed your eyes at length,
With twelve hot tumblers, each of extra strength,
And broke from memory's chain one binding link;—
You stood the vittles, but I stood the drink.

SMAUKER.

Smifzer, you did! then hear what I propose,
To end this strife, and liquidate the goes:—
Let's order in the fluids, stiff and strong,
And straight contend we in alternate song;
And he who bears the palm of verse away,
Shall calmly drink, and see the other pay.

SMIFZER.

To that proposal gladly I agree;
So—waiter! bring us pipes and drink for three:
And our good landlord here, Ezekiel Smudge,
Shall of this brothers' contest be the judge.

SMUDGE.

I does not care, as how sitch trash I hear,
If so be that you covies stands the beer.

SMAUKER.

Smifzer! begin the dithyrambic lay.

SMUDGE.

Mix up your tums, my lads, and fire away!

SMIFZER.

Soft is the breeze, when Zephyr nightly fans,
With wistful sweep, the cat-frequented cans;
Soft are the cries that haunt our early sleep,
When pot-boys wail, and cinder-maidens weep;
But softer still the verse—so virgins tell—
Which Smifzer writes, and minstrel-packmen sell.

SMAUKER.

I heard, like rain, the pensive tear-drops fall,
In thy resplendent grove, lamp-lit Vauxhall!
When young Squallini, with her silver note,
Wove the long quaver through her tortuous throat,
And Scroggins muttered, as she trilled the ode,
"If that's not Smauker's writing, I'll be blowed!"

SMIFZER.

This prize behold! a trophy nobly won,
In mutual verse, from Alfred Tennyson;
A pinchbeck snuff-box, valued one-and-six—
I beat poor "Oriana" all to sticks.

SMAUKER.

I know the box—'tis pinchbeck, to be sure;
But see this toothpick, gained from Thomas Moore:
Rogers was by, and laid a quart of stout,
That I would floor the kiddy out and out.

SMIFZER.

Me Peltirogus honours with his praise—
Great Peltirogus, whom "The Monthly" pays:
He dined with me last week, and thus he spake—
"Another pot of heavy let us take;
Smifzer! thou art a brick, and no mistake!"

SMAUKER.

Me Diebabs loves, the all-transcending Jane,
Nor greets her pensive Smauker with disdain;
For, lately wandering far in Lisson Grove,
Thus faintly did she own our mutual love,—
"Vell, now! I never see'd so rum a cove!"

SMIFZER.

My lays kind Bentley takes—discerning soul!
And so might Fraser—if he'd post the cole;
For Thackeray whispers, 'tis a burning sin
To leave me out, and patronize Maginn.

SMAUKER.

Far worse, methinks, it is to leave me out,
And vamp the musty wares of Father Prout;
But I for vengeance shall no longer wait,
Next month my name, be sure, appears in Tait.

SMIFZER.

Another tumbler, Smauker, let us fill,
And quaff the more than Heliconian rill;
Then tell me this, and I the prize forego—
What daring mortal first did jump Jim Crow?
Or say, what favoured son of negro song
First bade exulting Josey jim along?

SMAUKER.

Nay, rather say, if ever in mine eye
The faintest speck of green thou could'st espy
Why honoured Ferguson was forced to wait,
And found no entrance, though he knocked so late?
And why the hopeless maid, of love bereft,
Should pine in silent sorrow, o'er the left?

SMIFZER.

Smudge—I appeal to thee! the contest's done.

SMAUKER.

Justice, good Smudge! Say, hath not Smauker won!

SMUDGE.

Them there's the stakes! Vell, then, I pockets they,
And leaves you, as you likes, the shot to pay:
Fill up your tums once more, and light your pipes—
Danged, if I doesn't think I've got the gripes!
Mind, though! to-night you gets no more hot stuff;
Jim! shut the bar—the coves have lushed enough.

This is in the true Virgilian taste. Indeed, that last line is simply an elegant paraphrase of the well-known

Claudite jam rivos, pueri, sat prata biberunt, of the Mantuan's Third Eclogue, thus freely rendered by the late Sir John Sinclair, in his amusing work on irrigation—

The fields are fuddled—lads, shut up the sluices;
To soak one's clay too much a mere abuse is.

The idea of substituting pints of heavy, and goes of brandy for the kid and pipe, which form the customary guerdons of successful shepherds in the ancient eclogue, is very original, and nicely adapted to the tastes of modern society. One thing, certainly, is not to be denied, that Smifzer and Smauker make as great asses of themselves, as any Mænalcas or Damætus of them all, from Bion and Theocritus down to "feeble Philips." This is the triumph of pastoral poetry, as Warton has told us; and as every reader of it knows by drowsy experience.

But let us take a specimen of the individual merits of this noble pair of brothers. What a delightful mixture of playful tenderness, and what the Germans call "Welt-Ironie," and we call knowingness, is presented in

THE LOVERS' QUARREL.

BY SMAUKER.

Why art thou sad, my love,
  Mournful to-day?
I'm not to be had, my love,
  That sort of way.
Pettings and poutings are all very fine,
But think not to catch me with chaff, ladye mine.

Why wilt thou turn away
  Eyes that were made
Not sure to burn away
  Dimly in shade?
Raise, then, these envious eyelids of thine;
Show thyself wide awake, sweetest love mine.

Nay, I will linger not,
Should'st thou command:
What! may I finger not
Thy pretty hand?
Oft have I played with it—but I resign;
You liked that well enough once, ladye mine.

Spoil not thy lip, my love,
Biting it so.
Why fray its tip, my love?
There! Let it go.
Nay, now, do let me sip its dewy wine,—
I'll promise you not to get tipsy, love mine.

Well, I must pity her
Who could look sad,
That's so much prettier,
Smiling, and glad.
Hence, clouds, away, let the sun freely shine!
We'll kiss, and be friends again—sha'n't we, love mine?

What maiden's heart could resist such an appeal? Smauker must be a very Giovanni among the—milliner's apprentices. Smifzer, however, flies at higher game, as we see from the following elegant lines:—

ON THE PORTRAIT OF THE COUNTESS OF TITTERLY.

BY SMIFZER.

What's a lip? A ruby case,
Holding lots of beauteous pearls,
Pouting from thy high-born face,
First of Britain's peerless girls!
Sculptor could not carve it neater,
Cold cream never make it sweeter:
That's a lip!

What's an eye? A thing of fire,
Brighter than the purest spar
From the caves of Derbyshire,
Or a coruscating star,
Gleaming in the heavens, when dim lit,
Sharper than the sharpest gimlet:
That's an eye!

What's a cheek? A veil of flame
Drawn above the mantling blood
Of the chiefs who bore thy name,
Long anterior to the Flood!
Than the peach's down, 'tis softer,
And 'tis touched a good deal ofter:
That's a cheek!

What's a nose? A peerless nose,
Gentle ladye, is thine own—
Like the moss-enveloped rose,
Sweetest, when 'tis fully blown.
Neither Grecian, nor Roman,
But the composite for woman:
That's a nose!

Who, that reads this, can be surprised at being told by Mr. Twaddell, that Smifzer is in high favour with the editors of the Annuals, and readily obtains one and ninepence the printed page for his verses. Mr. Grubley of "THE TOPAZ," it is gratifying to know, has retained him for his next publication; where, as Mr. Twaddell cautiously hints, we may expect to see his "Ruminations of a Scolloped Oyster," and his "Ode to a Dead Donkey," which, like Wordsworth's unpublished tragedy, are known among the select circle of his friends as his finest works.

Alfred Peltirogus—but that a high moral sense restrains us from going to the devil with anybody, we should have been delighted to accompany you into your "Pandemonium." You are the most agreeable guide into that unpleasant district, that we have yet seen. Virgil is gloomy and austere; Dante leaves all hope behind as he enters; and Milton offends with as much blue flame and stench of naphtha, as the manager of the Surrey Theatre in a desperate melodrama. But thou, too fascinating Peltirogus, saunterest into the Stygian portals with the same easy jauntiness that marks thy gait, as, pacing Oxford street of an afternoon, susceptible maidens pause to gaze in rapture on thy expanse of shoulders; and even biscuit bakers' daughters confess a mortal flame. With Pluto thou art "Hail fellow, well met." Proserpine welcomes thy soft nonsense; and thou canst salute even the inexorable Rhadamanthus with a familiar "How do!" This is all very delightful; but we have a foolish prejudice against low company, and decidedly prefer the upper air, and its associations. Therefore do we select from thy minor poems thy almost Wordsworthian lines,

TO A FORGET ME NOT.

FOUND IN MY EMPORIUM OF LOVE TOKENS.

Sweet flower, that with thy soft blue eye
Didst once look up in shady spot,
To whisper to the passer-by Those tender words—Forget me not!

Though withered now, thou art to me
The minister of gentle thought,—
And I could weep to gaze on thee,
Love's faded pledge—Forget me not!

Thou speak'st of hours when I was young,
And happiness arose unsought,
When, wandering the woods among,
She gave me thee—Forget me not!

That rapturous hour with that dear maid
From memory's page no time shall blot,
When, yielding to my kiss, she said,
"Oh, Theodore, Forget me not!"

Alas, for love! alas, for truth!
Alas, for man's uncertain lot!
Alas, for all the hopes of youth
That fade like thee—Forget me not!

Alas! for that one image fair,
With all thy brightest dreams unwrought,
That was about thee everywhere,
Still whispering—Forget me not!

Oh memory, thou art but a sigh
For friendships dead and loves forgot,
And many a cold and altered eye,
That once did say—Forget me not!

And I must bow me to thy laws,
For—odd although it may be thought,—
I can't tell, who the deuce it was,
That gave me this Forget me not!

Who would have believed that so tender a vein of sentiment could lurk beneath the folds of the most brilliant waistcoat that ever petrified the park? But, let man drink ever so deeply of the Circean cup of pleasure, he cannot wholly stifle the memory of those pure feelings which, like angelic visions——We can't finish that sentence just at present, having pitched it in rather too high a key. But what we mean to say is this, that whenever you meet with sentimental verses, you may conclude, with positive accuracy, that the writer is a most dissipated dog. And, as for amatory poets, long experience has convinced us that they are the most flinty-hearted villains in existence. Very different is it with the softer sex. The ruthless conventionalities of society have excluded them from the thousand various resources to which men may fly, when they want to kill a care or extirpate a sorrow. Women, on the other hand, must sit pensively at home, pining over disappointed love and intricate worsted-work, while the tears drop from their dear eyes upon the wreaths of artificial roses, each with a visible canker in the heart as big as a Barcelona nut. As Washington Irving says—"If a woman's thoughts are turned to ministers of sorrow, where shall she look for consolation? Her lot is to be wooed and won; and if unhappy in her love, her heart is like some fortress that has been captured, and sacked, and abandoned, and left desolate."

This somewhat melancholy turn of thought has been occasioned in us by the perusal of "Love's Lamentations," an exquisite Jeremiad, couched in a series of graceful little poems, by the beautiful and accomplished Jane Diebabs. They are headed in a very impressive way—as thus: "The Beloved One," "The Abandoned One," "The Degraded One," "The Humbugged One." But the One, that has chiefly won our *won*der is—

THE MALTREATED ONE.

BY MISS JANE DIEBABS.

Yes! they have broke the hallowed spell,
Have burst the silken cords that bound us,
And dimmed the golden light, that fell
In our love's early dream around us.
Ah me! the joy, the bliss transporting,
When all beneath the oaks so shady,
We'd pass the summer hours a-courting,
I and my own adored O'Grady!
When he, with such a winning air,
Would tell me of the pang that grieved him,—
Would call me, fairest of the fair;
And I, unhappy maid, believed him!

Delightful hours! too swift ye flew,
On wings of joy and airy blisses,
Whose every feather caught the hue,
The rosy hue of love and kisses.
He was so young—so fair—so good!
All other youths, he beat them hollow;
And in his stocking-soles he stood
Five feet eleven—a young Apollo!
But he is gone, my brave hussar!
And my heart-strings are almost cracking;
For my old brute of a papar
One evening caught and sent him packing.

I cannot speak—I cannot smile—
My lips unconscious nonsense mutter;
Perplex'd with woe, oppress'd with bile,
I've lost my taste for bread and butter.
Song hath no more its charms for me:
No more my lute—I mean piano—
Can win me, with its melody,
To cultivate my rich soprano.
No, no! can I that night forget,
When he was warm, and father kicked him?
It will—must—shall—should haunt me yet,
And I be evermore a "WICTIM!"

Miss Diebabs' muse (says Mr. Twaddell) is of a purely pensive cast. The daughter of a retired poulterer from Fleet Market, she grew amid the romantic groves of Highgate, insensible to the poetry of that umbrageous neighbourhood. Like Peter Bell,

A cowslip drooping in the rain,
A yellow cowslip was to Jane,
And it was nothing more.

But the inspiring breath of love, incarnate in the Avatar of an ensign of dragoons, swept across her spirit. In a moment the scales fell from her eyes, and field and meadow were steeped in the golden light of poesy. A neighbouring stationer supplied her with the necessary literary materials; and from that hour the Poet's Corner in the Hampstead Herald had its Sappho. But all that's bright must fade. Mr. Diebabs, like the whole race of fathers, knew sentiment only as a thing which destroyed a girl's appetite and morals. The ensign, after a reasonable amount of amatory skirmishing, did not propose; and finding the son of Mars in a somewhat equivocal position one evening, Mr. Diebabs yielded to that violent impulse which has been so touchingly alluded to in the poem. A seclusion of some months in the country, rendered necessary by the state of Miss Diebabs' health, followed; and on her return home, it was remarked that she had grown much thinner in her person, as well as more lugubrious in her verse. A series of similar disappointments deepened the gloom of her sensitive nature, and drove her to seek a hollow gaiety in the brandy bottle. It was one of these moods that gave birth to the following graceful freak of fancy, to which, as it formed the leading ornament of the Keepsake for 1842, I cheerfully give a place here.

LINES

WRITTEN AND SENT ANONYMOUSLY TO MISS LUCY BRIMSTONE.

The tulip fadeth in her bower,
The diamond is a dim stone,
And every flower's a faded flower,
Near lovely Lucy Brimstone.

The lark, that soars in morning clear,
Though sweet his thrilling hymn's tone,
Hath not a voice so soft, so dear,
As lovely Lucy Brimstone.

Good treacle may be made from tar,
And water sooner swim stone,
The moth forget the evening star,
Ere I my Lucy Brimstone.

When in the grave my eyes I close,
And at my head a grim stone,
'Twere well, perhaps, I should repose
Far, far away from Brimstone.

Poor girl! I know not whether her wish has been fulfilled. The pilgrim to the Highgate church-yard will inquire in vain at the sexton for her resting-place. No monument or cenotaph marks her early tomb. But in the hearts of the young and sensitive, her simple lays live, a nobler monument. Peace be to her ashes!

Light be the turf on Diebabs' breast,
And green the sod that wraps her grave!

This is very touching, and in Mr. Twaddell's best style. Had we space, we should give his minute description of Miss Diebabs' person and wearing apparel, not omitting the interesting dissertation on the utility of flannel petticoats, which he has introduced episodically into his narrative. But we are bound, before closing this article, to do justice to the Laureate of Cockaigne, Mr. Vincent Stubbins, who has already been kept too long waiting, and we refrain.

Mr. Vincent Stubbins (says Mr. Twaddell) is the son of a sugar baker, in Budge Row. He was born of his mother, (not of his aunt, as some biographers have alleged,) in the year 1818; so that, as I am now writing in January, 1842, he may safely be said to be twenty-three years of age. Mr. Vincent Stubbins received the elements of a good education at a respectable seminary in Barbican; to which circumstance his friends have, in later years, ascribed the elision of his h's, and his exuberant aspiration of initial vowels in his ordinary conversation. Mr. Stubbins writes a bold half-text hand, and spells with tolerable correctness. His MS. makes good copy for the printer, but better wrapping paper for cigars. Mr. Stubbins is a man of gay habits, and adorned with the graces which are only to be acquired by nightly visits to the cigar-divan, billiard-room, and tavern. His height may be about five feet eleven inches—some of his friends, who know him well, have told me ten: but from my own observation, I should say eleven. Few men in the city dress better than Stubbins. He is known, in fact, among his companions by the distinctive sobriquet of "Doudney's pride!" Few men turn back their coat collar farther than Stubbins: few wear a more showy assortment of waistcoats. In the cataract of satin, which perpetually streams over his manly chest, he wears a stiletto of the finest pinchbeck, on the head of which blazes a Bristol diamond of the purest water. His boots are glazed; and, like Sir Edward Lytton Bulwer, he wears white kid-gloves and his wristbands turned three inches up his coat-sleeve. His whiskers are dark, and curl with a dash of airy ferocity, that harmonizes finely with the cheroot, which is almost perpetually projecting from his lips. Stubbins is completely a lady's man; and to his success in this department, the odour of brandy and water, blended with that of "full-flavoured Havannahs," which generally accompanies him, is thought to have contributed in no inconsiderable degree. Mr. Stubbins is, likewise, a great favourite in the circles in which he moves; and he is the President of the Society of "The Snugs," the leading members of which are lawyers' clerks, who are ignorant of their business, and young shopkeepers, who are above it. He is the ornament of many a soirée at Camberwell, and is a sort of star in the literary circles of Brixton. There his genius is understood, and the full force of his poetic diction adequately appreciated.

But we must leave Mr. Twaddell, and introduce our readers to his hero. And with this view, we think it impossible to do both parties more justice than by transferring to our pages

THE YOUNG STOCKBROKER'S BRIDE.

BY VINCENT STUBBINS.

"O swiftly speed the gallant bark!—
I say, you mind my luggage, porter?
I do not heed yon storm-cloud dark,
I go to wed old Jenkin's daughter.
I go to claim my own Mariar,
The fairest flower that blooms in Harwich;
My panting bosom is on fire,
And all is ready for the marriage."

Thus spoke young Mivins, as he stept
On board the Firefly, Harwich packet:
The bell rung out, the paddles swept
Plish-plashing round with noisy racket.
The low'ring clouds young Mivins saw,
But fear, he felt, was only folly,
And so he smoked a fresh cigar,
Then fell to whistling—"Nix my dolly!"

The wind it roared; the packet's hulk
Rocked with a most unpleasant motion,—
Young Mivins leant him o'er a bulk,
And poured his sorrows to the ocean.
Tints, blue and yellow—signs of woe—
Flushed, rainbow-like, his noble face in,
As suddenly he rushed below,
Crying, "Steward, steward, bring a basin!"

On sped the bark:—the howling storm
The funnel's tapering smoke did blow far,
Unmoved, young Mivins' lifeless form
Was stretched upon a haircloth sofar.

All night he moaned; the steamer groaned,
And he was hourly getting fainter,
When it came bump against the pier,
And there was fastened by the painter.

Young Mivins rose, and blew his nose,
Caught wildly at his small portmanteau;
He was unfit to lie or sit,
And found it difficult to stand too.
He sought the deck, he sought the shore,
He sought the lady's house like winking,
And asked, low tapping at the door,
"Is this the house of Mr. Jenkin?"

A short man came—he told his name—
Mivins was short—he cut him shorter,
For in a fury he exclaimed,
"Are you the man as vants my darter?
Vot kimed on you last night, young sqvire?"
"It was the steamer, rot and scuttle her!"
"Mayhap it vos, but our Mariar
Valked off last night with Bill the butler.

"And so you've kim'd a post too late."
"It was the packet, sir, miscarried!"
"Vy, does you think a gal can vait
As sets 'er 'art on being married?
Last night she wowed she'd be a bride,
And 'ave a spouse for vuss or better:
So Bill struck in; the knot vos tied,
And now I vishes you may get her!"

Young Mivins turned him from the spot,
Bewildered with the dreadful stroke, her
Perfidy came like a shot;
He was a thunderstruck stockbroker.
"A curse on steam and steamers too!
By their delays I have been undone!"
He cried, as looking very blue,
He rode a bachelor to London.

"There spoke old England's genius!" But we would not, by one word of ours, injure the effect of so striking a production of the muse of Bowbell.

Farewell, then, Mr. Twaddell! We owe you our warmest thanks for the banquet you have prepared for us. The least we can do is to close our paper, as you have done your volume, with your own illustration of the armorial bearings of your family; and let those of our readers who are adepts in heraldry blazon for themselves a characteristic coat of arms from the following

SONNET

ON THE ARMORIAL BEARINGS OF THE TWADDELLS OF GLENSWIPES.

"Dum Magnus Auser!" is the motto set,
Recorded deftly on a blazoned scroll:
Two ganders guardant or, support the whole,
Each couped and crowned with lordly coronet;
And this achievement of the shield is there,
Quarterly: In the first grand quarter gules
Three goslings grazant, cacklant;—the same rules
Obtain unto the third. The others bear,
Vert and engrailed in or a cheveron
Parted per fess between a cross moline,
Charged with a shield assumptive, whereupon
Purpure two eggs, transversed with sable line;
While o'er the scutcheon of pretence is thrown Wavy a bend sinister argentine!

THE continuation of Miss Burney's Diary is, in every respect, equal to its commencement, with this inevitable difference, that, in everything under the sun, first impressions must needs be the most lively. The volume comprehends the years from 1781 to 1786, and many events that were memorable in the life of the Diarist. In these years died Mr. Thrale, whom she esteemed and liked more and more as she came to know him better; next her beloved "Daddy Crisp;" and, lastly, Dr. Johnson. In these years, too, took place the marriage of her younger sisters; that awful event, the union of Mrs. Thrale with Signor Piozzi; and, lastly, Miss Burney's appointment to a place in the Royal Household. In these years she extended her acquaintance among the fashionable literary characters of the period; and among the blues, and the reigning beauties and wits. There is, accordingly, no lack of material for her facile and practised pen; and the lively continuation of her private record displays the same acuteness as its commencement, and even keener penetration into characters—a more subtile and delicate analysis of motives of action. Her account of Mr. Crutchley, for example, a young man of easy fortune, good education, and talents above mediocrity, gradually sinking into a morbid condition of mind, into satiety and half-affected misanthrophy, from having with a large endowment of sensitive pride, too much money, and too little work, is equal to anything in Miss Edgeworth's or Miss Austin's novels; and an exquisite, while a truthful variety of the idle Englishman of fortune, without that stamp of rank or fashion, which afford devouring ennui the relief of certain prescribed frivolous occupations and busy-idle pursuits. Mr. Crutchley is, however, far too long to extract, and he must be seen at full-length to be perfectly understood.

The volume opens with a series of Mrs. Thrale's eloquent and complimentary billets to her "sweetest and loveliest Burney;" which, as the affection of this somewhat flighty lady was already probably on the wane, are correspondingly overdone in professions of fondness. Of this honey-sweet or treacley correspondence, Dr. Burney said, that the letters of the ladies were alike, from their constantly writing to each other; and so they were. Both ladies warbled in one key; and the epistles of both, at this time, afford fair specimens of a style which their friend Johnson would have nauseated and denounced, and an amusing contrast to the brief, piquant note, in which Mrs. Piozzi finally dropped her "sweetest Burney." Yet the affection which Miss Burney entertained for her first patroness, and generous and fascinating friend, was sincere and warm: and until she had the honest courage to oppose the foolish and degrading step, as she considered it, which Mrs. Thrale long meditated, ere she assumed a desperate courage and made the venture, her regard was in some degree returned. Indeed, no part of her Diary does more honour to Miss Burney's heart, and to her constancy and sincerity in friendship, than her allusions to the progress and consummation of Mrs Thrale's vehement passion for Piozzi. It, besides, gives us a much better opinion of Mrs Thrale than is to be gathered from the remains of Johnson, and the representations of Boswell, who was always jealous of this lady.

We are not here going to inquire why it should then, as it would now, be considered an outrage on all the decencies, and all the virtues, that the lively middle-aged widow of a wealthy London brewer, herself a gentlewoman by birth, should have condescended to marry a public singer—that singer being, moreover, an Italian, which was probably an immense aggravation of the crime—but merely to notice the fact, that, with all her then latent prudery, and all her conventional and proper sense of propriety, Miss Burney most generously construed the conduct of her lost friend, and very tenderly pitied her in the long-continued struggle between love and pride, duty and inclination. And she appears to have been, indeed, an object of deep compassion. It was not until after a conflict maintained for three years, under which her health fairly failed, that poor Mrs. Thrale, in spite of the remonstrances and opposition of every friend she had—and what was more powerful, her own pride or prejudices—gave way to her violent attachment. There are some moralists who will less severely blame her infatuated passion for Piozzi, whom we have the authority of Miss Seward, for believing to have been "a handsome man, in middle life, with gentle, pleasing, and unaffected manners, and with very eminent skill in his profession," than her conduct in the latter period of Mr Thrale's life, when her fondness for company and display must have hastened his days. He had had many threatenings of apoplexy—and repeated attacks: but the system of great dinners, routs, and large parties of all kinds, went on as before; and he, in fact, died, we are told, "on the morning of a day when half the fashion of London had been invited to an intended assembly at his house in Grosvenor Square." The grief of his widow was deep of course; but, in the words of Johnson, "Thrale's bridle was no longer on her neck." In Johnson's opinion, she never did well after its gentle and needful pressure was withdrawn; but, with submission to the sage, those who feel the yoke, best know where it galls. She would not at first receive even her "sweet Burney;" and she flew to Brighton to find consolation and counsel from an old gentleman, who was a very sincere friend. When she came back to Streatham, she invited Miss Burney, who thus reports of her in the third or fourth week of her widowhood:—

* Diary and Letters of Madame D'Arblay Author of "Evelina," "Cecilia," &c., Edited by her Niece, Vol. II., comprehending the years 1781 to 1786, pp. 434, with a Portrait of Mrs. Thrale. Colburn.

I am now here with her, and endeavour, by every possible exertion, to be of some use to her. She looks wretchedly, indeed, and is far from well; but she bears up, though not with calm intrepidity, yet with flashes of spirit that rather, I fear, spend than relieve her. Such, however, is her character, and were this exertion repressed, she would probably sink quite.

Miss Thrale is steady and constant, and very sincerely grieved for her father.

Mrs. Thrale's final rupture with Johnson did not take place till some years after this period, though estrangement and gradual alienation were the almost immediate consequences of Mr. Thrale's death. The bridle of the sage, the uncouth and disorderly philosopher, seems to have lain as heavily upon the gay, brilliant widow, and orderly mistress of a family, who was now disposed, and indeed fully determined, to enjoy her freedom, as that of Thrale had done; and Johnson's warmest admirers must confess that, if her faults were the greatest, there were faults on both sides; and that if she did start and fret at the bit, she had endured more than most ladies would have as patiently submitted to. To her natural sweetness of disposition and generosity of feeling, Miss Burney, at the very worst, bears warm and unvarying testimony.

After the death of Thrale, Dr. Johnson continued to be domesticated at Streatham as before; and in a few weeks subsequent to that event, we have the following scene:—

Wednesday.—We had a terrible noisy day. Mr. and Mrs. Cator came to dinner, and brought with them Miss Collison, a niece. Mrs. Nesbitt was also here, and Mr. Pepys.

The long war which has been proclaimed among the wits concerning Lord Lyttelton's "Life," by Dr. Johnson, and which a whole tribe of blues, with Mrs. Montagu at their head, have vowed to execrate and revenge, now broke out with all the fury of the first actual hostilities, stimulated by long-concerted schemes and much spiteful information. Mr. Pepys, Dr. Johnson well knew, was one of Mrs. Montagu's steadiest abetters; and, therefore, as he had some time determined to defend himself with the first of them he met, this day he fell the sacrifice to his wrath.

In a long tête-à-tête which I accidentally had with Mr. Pepys before the company was assembled, he told me his apprehensions of an attack, and entreated me earnestly to endeavour to prevent it; modestly avowing he was no antagonist for Dr. Johnson; and yet declaring his personal friendship for Lord Lyttelton made him so much hurt by the "Life," that he feared he could not discuss the matter without a quarrel, which, especially in the house of Mrs. Thrale, he wished to avoid.

It was, however, utterly impossible for me to serve him. I could have stopped Mrs. Thrale with ease, and Mr. Seward with a hint, had either of them begun the subject; but, unfortunately, in the middle of dinner, it was begun by Dr. Johnson himself, to oppose whom, especially as he spoke with great anger, would have been madness and folly.

Never before have I seen Dr. Johnson speak with so much passion.

"Mr. Pepys," he cried, in a voice the most enraged, "I understand you are offended by my 'Life of Lord Lyttelton.' What is it you have to say against it? Come forth, man! Here am I, ready to answer any charge you can bring!"

"No, Sir," cried Mr. Pepys, "not at present; I must beg leave to decline the subject. I told Miss Burney before dinner that I hoped it would not be started."

I was quite frightened to hear my own name mentioned in a debate which began so seriously; but Dr. Johnson made not to this any answer: he repeated his attack and his challenge, and a violent disputation ensued, in which this great but mortal man did, to own the truth, appear unreasonably furious and grossly severe. I never saw him so before, and I heartily hope I never shall again.

. . . . . When dinner was quite over, and we left the men to their wine, we hoped they would finish the affair; but Dr. Johnson was determined to talk it through, and make a battle of it, though Mr. Pepys tried to be off continually. When they were all summoned to tea, they entered still warm and violent. Mr. Cator had the book in his hand, and was reading the "Life of Lyttelton," that he might better, he said, understand the cause, though not a creature cared if he had never heard of it.

Mr. Pepys came up to me and said,—

"Just what I had so much wished to avoid! I have been crushed in the very onset."

I could make him no answer, for Dr. Johnson immediately called him off, and harangued and attacked him with a vehemence and continuity that quite concerned both Mrs. Thrale and myself, and that made Mr. Pepys, at last, resolutely silent, however called upon.

This now grew more unpleasant than ever; till Mr. Cator, having some time studied his book, exclaimed,—

"What I am now going to say, as I have not yet read the 'Life of Lord Lyttelton' quite through, must be considered as being only said aside, because what I am going to say——"

"I wish, Sir," cried Mrs. Thrale, "it had been all said aside; here is too much about it, indeed, and I should be very glad to hear no more of it."

This speech, which she made with great spirit and dignity, had an admirable effect. Everybody was silenced. Mr. Cator, thus interrupted in the midst of his proposition, looked quite amazed; Mr. Pepys was much gratified by the interference; and Dr. Johnson, after a pause, said,—

"Well, Madam, you shall hear no more of it; yet I will defend myself in every part and in every atom!"

And from this time the subject was wholly dropped. This dear violent Doctor was conscious he had been wrong, and therefore he most candidly bore the reproof. . .

Thursday Morning.—Dr. Johnson went to town for some days, but not before Mrs. Thrale read him a very serious lecture upon giving way to such violence; which he bore with a patience and quietness that even more than made his peace with me; for such a man's confessing himself wrong is almost more amiable than another man being steadily right.

Friday, June 14th.—We had my dear father and Sophy Streatfield, who, as usual, was beautiful, caressing, amiable, sweet, and—fatiguing.

When Mrs. Thrale had been some nine or ten months a widow, we find her writing thus characteristically:—

My Dearest Burney,—May I venture, do you think, to call a little company about me on St. Taffy's day? or, will the world in general, and the Pepyses in particular, feel shocked at my "dissipation" and my "haste to be married?" They came last night, and found me alone with Murphy. There was an epoch! The Bishop of Peterborough came in soon after. Queeny was gone to Mrs. Davenant's, with Miss Owen and Dr. Delap. What dangers we do go through! But I have not gone out to meet mine half way, at least. . . . .

I went to dear Dr. Johnson's rassegnarlo la solita servitù, but at one o'clock he was not up, and I did not like to disturb him. I am very sorry about him—exceeding sorry! When I parted from you on Monday, and found him with Dr. Lawrence, I put my nose into the old man's wig and shouted; but got none except melancholy answers,—so melancholy, that I was forced to crack jokes for fear of crying.

"There is gout at the bottom, Madam," says Lawrence.

"I wish it were at the bottom!" replied saucebox, as loud as she could bawl, and pointing to the pedestals.

This morning I was with him again, and this evening Mrs. Ord's conversation and Piozzi's cara voce have kept away care pretty well. Mr. Selwyn helped us to be comfortable. My Tit went with her Coz. to Abel's concert.

Good night, sweetest; I am tired, and want to go to bed.

The cara voce had even, by this time, stolen from the ear into the heart.—Mrs. Thrale's vehement admiration of the authoress seems to have increased in exact proportion as the influence of the friend declined. Of Cecilia, a novel possessed of much more merit than modern critics seem disposed to allow it, and abounding in broad humour and truth of character, Mrs. Thrale writes thus passionately, and between truth and fudge—

My eyes red with reading and crying, I stop every moment to kiss the book and to wish it was my Burney! 'Tis the sweetest book, the most interesting, the most engaging. Oh! it beats every other book, even your own other vols., for "Evelina" was a baby to it.

Dear charming creature! do I stop every six pages to exclaim; and my Tit is no less delighted than I; she is run out of the room for a moment. But young Delville is come and Queeny returned, so I leave the pen and seize the MSS.

Such a novel! Indeed, I am seriously and sensibly touched by it, and am proud of her friendship who so knows the human heart. May mine long bear the inspection of so penetrating, so discriminating an eye!

This letter is written by scraps and patches, but every scrap is admiration, and every patch thanks you for the pleasure I have received.

Shortly afterwards, the Diary contains the following passage—

A serious piece of intelligence has given, does give, and long must give me the utmost concern and sorrow. My dear Mrs. Thrale, the friend, though not the most dear friend of my heart, is going abroad for three years certain. This scheme has been some time in a sort of distant agitation, but it is now brought to a resolution. Much private business belongs to it relative to her detestable lawsuit; but much private inclination is also joined with it, relative to her long wishing to see Italy. I have determined, therefore, to do all in my power to bear this blow steadily; and the remembrance how very much I suffered when such an one was formerly thought of, makes me suppress all my regret, and drive the subject from my mind by every method in my power, that I may save myself from again experiencing such unavailing concern. The thought, indeed, that she wishes to go, would reconcile me to a yet longer absence, by making me feel that my own sorrow is merely selfish.

Streatham,—my other home, and the place where I have long thought my residence dependent only upon my own pleasure, and where, indeed, I have received such as my father and you alone could make greater,—is already let, for three years, to Lord Shelburne.

Johnson and Burney were alike, thenceforth, to be aliens from Streatham; though the former only was made the confident of the contending feelings of its distracted mistress. It was not until another year had passed, that Miss Burney, in her journal, kept for her sister, writes—

Saturday, Nov. 22d,—I passed in nothing but sorrow—exquisite sorrow, for my dear unhappy friend, who sent me one letter, that came early by the Bath Diligence, and another by the post. But of these things no more.

I am sorry not to be more explicit, but I should not give you more pleasure if I were. I can only now tell you that I love Mrs. Thrale with a never-to-cease affection, and pity her more than ever I pitied any human being; and, if I did not blame her, I could, I should, I believe, almost die for her!

I am extremely sorry, my dearest Susy, that in the late distress of my mind about poor Mrs. Thrale, I mentioned anything that has so much interested you to know more. It is too true that many know all,—but none from me. I am bound, and should be miserable not to say, if called upon, and not to know, if not called upon, that no creature, not even you to whom I communicate everything else, nor to the trusty Charlotte with whom I live, and who sees my frequent distress upon the subject, has tempted me to an explanation. General rumour I have no means to prevent spreading.

* * * * *

I am still as much bent as ever to go to her, if I can obtain leave; but I will mention no more of the matter, since the difficulties under which I labour not to offend or afflict that beloved friend, and yet to do nothing wrong, are by no means new, though of late they have grown doubly painful. I will only say further, that though her failings are unaccountable and most unhappy, her virtues and good qualities, the generosity and feeling of her heart, the liberality and sweetness of her disposition, would counterbalance a thousand more.

This I say, lest you should think something worse than the truth—something stranger you cannot. I am very sorry not to satisfy you more; but when you weigh what I have said, you will be sensible I have reasons to preserve silence; though to myself, believe me, 'tis by far most painful, and has long been most cruel. . . My Bath journey, my dear Susy, I know not what to say about; could I go for one fortnight, nothing could so much rejoice me; for I even languish, I pine to see again my beloved and very—oh, very unhappy Mrs. Thrale! I know well the meeting, as things are at present situated, would half kill her with joy, and me with a thousand feelings I keep off as well as I can; but I cannot tell how to arrange matters for this purpose. The expense of such an expedition, for so short a time, I know not how even to name to my father, who has a thousand reasons against my going, all founded on arguments unanswerable.

She did not go, but wrote in a strain which drew forth this curious and enigmatical response—

Thanks, thanks, a thousand, my prettiest, dearest Burney! This charming letter makes amends for all. And you remember last winter, do you? and remember it with tenderness? What then must have passed in my mind, on the dreadful anniversary of a day which, instead of killing me as it ought to have done, gave to two innocent, unfortunate people, a cruel and lingering death,—like the arrows tipped with African poison, which slowly and gradually retarding the vital powers, at length (in about three years I think) wholly put a stop to their exertion! . . . . .

Pray, is Baretti sick or in distress? The Italians think him dead; but I suppose all is well with him, a'n't it?

Johnson is in a sad way, doubtless; yet he may still with care last another twelvemonth, and every week's existence is gain to him, who, like good Hezekiah, wearies Heaven with entreaties for life. I wrote him a very serious letter the other day.

The Methodists do certainly reconcile one to death, by rendering all temporal enjoyments obtuse, or representing them as illicit. Whoever considers this world as a place of constant mortification and incessant torment, will be well enough contented to leave it; but I can scarcely think our Saviour, who professed his yoke to be easy and his burden to be light, will have peculiar pleasure in their manner of serving him. My principles are never convinced by their arguments, though my imagination is always fluttered by their vehemence. We must do the best we can at last, and, as King David says, "Let us fall into the hands of God, and not into the hands of men; for they are severe and cruel judges of each other."

Apropos—Mr. Seward's disapprobation is merely external, and by no means, like yours, the growth of his heart; but the coarseness of his expressions he has to himself, and I cannot guess how I have deserved them. Sir Lucas Pepys writes very tenderly to me. Live or die, he shall not find me ungrateful.

Why do you catch these horrible fevers, dear Burney! They will demolish you some day before you are aware.

. . You were a dear creature to write so soon and so sweetly; but we shall never meet. I see that clearly, and have seen it long. My going to London would be a dreadful expense, and bring on a thousand inquiries and inconveniencies—visits to Johnson and from Cator: and where must I live for the time, too! Oh, I have desired nothing else since you wrote; but all is impossibility. Why would you ever flatter me that you might, maybe, come to Bath? I saw the unlikelihood even then, and my retired life will not induce your friends to permit your coming hither now. I fancy even my own young ladies [her daughters] will leave me; and I sincerely think they will be perfectly right so to do, as the world they wish to shine in is quite excluded by my style of living. . . . .

Ah, Burney! you little know the suffering, and, I will add, the patient suffering of your

By a sudden flight, Mrs. Thrale did, however, come to London in the summer of 1784, and instantly summoned her "dearest Burney" to her; conveying, in this postscript, a very intelligible hint, that she was not to be interfered with in her plans.

I am somewhat shaken bodily, but 'tis the mental shocks that have made me unable to bear the corporeal ones. 'Tis past ten o'clock, however, and I must lay myself down with the sweet expectation of seeing my charming friend in the morning to breakfast. I love Dr. Burney too well to fear him, and he loves me too well to say a word which should make me love him less.

They met, and Miss Burney writes—

I parted most reluctantly with my dear Mrs. Thrale, whom, when or how, I shall see again, Heaven only knows! but in sorrow we parted—on my side in real affliction.

The next morning, while ruminating in much sadness upon my late interviews with Mrs. Thrale, how great was the relief of my mind,—the delight, indeed, to be summoned to my dear Mr. Cambridge.

Though Miss Burney had, like every one else, been supplanted in the heart of Mrs. Thrale, by the resistless Signor, she had gained many new and useful friends; but, before coming to other matters, we should witness the denouement of the Piozzi affair, the farce after the tragedy. In two "little months" Mrs. Thrale married; and the following sketch of a letter, and memorandum of what passed, are taken from the Burney journal of the month of August, of the year 1784:—

Miss F. Burney to Mrs. Piozzi.

Norbury Park, Aug. 10, 1784.

When my wondering eyes first looked over the letter I received last night, my mind instantly dictated a high-spirited vindication of the consistency, integrity, and faithfulness of the friendship thus abruptly reproached and cast away. But a sleepless night gave me leisure to recollect that you were ever as generous as precipitate, and that your own heart would do justice to mine, in the cooler judgment of future reflection. Committing myself, therefore, to that period, I determined simply to assure you that, if my last letter hurt either you or Mr. Piozzi, I am no less sorry than surprised; and that, if it offended you, I sincerely beg your pardon.

Not to that time, however, can I wait to acknowledge the pain an accusation so unexpected has caused me, nor the heartfelt satisfaction with which I shall receive, when you are able to write it, a softer renewal of regard. . .

May Heaven direct and bless you!

F. B.

N.B.—This is the sketch of the answer which F. B. most painfully wrote to the unmerited reproach of not sending cordial congratulations upon a marriage which she had uniformly, openly, and with deep and avowed affliction, thought wrong.

Mrs. Piozzi to Miss Burney.

Wellbeck Street, No. 33, Cavendish Square,
Friday, Aug. 13, 1784.

Give yourself no serious concern, sweetest Burney. All is well, and I am too happy myself to make a friend otherwise; quiet your kind heart immediately, and love my husband, if you love his and your

H. L. Piozzi.

N.B.—To this kind note F. B. wrote the warmest and most affectionate and heartfelt reply; but never received another word! And here, and thus stopped a correspondence of six years of almost unequalled partiality, and fondness on her side; and affection, gratitude, admiration, and sincerity on that of F. B., who could only conjecture the cessation to be caused by the resentment of Piozzi, when informed of her constant opposition to the union.

The contemptuous anger, and the real and deep grief of Johnson at this marriage, are well known. He was, at the time, in very bad health, and, indeed, he did not many months outlive the event. Hearing of his illness, Miss Burney, to whom he continued his first warm partiality, went to inquire for him, and was admitted; and she relates—

I had a longer and more satisfactory conversation with him than I have had for many months. He was in rather better spirits, too, than I have lately seen him; but he told me he was going to try what sleeping out of town might do for him.

"I remember," said he, "that my wife, when she was near her end, poor woman, was also advised to sleep out of town; and when she was carried to the lodgings that had been prepared for her, she complained that the staircase was in very bad condition—for the plaster was beaten off the walls in many places. 'Oh,' said the man of the house, 'that's nothing but by the knocks against it of the coffins of the poor souls that have died in the lodgings!'"

He laughed, though not without apparent secret anguish, in telling me this. I felt extremely shocked, but, willing to confine my words at least to the literal story, I only exclaimed against the unfeeling absurdity of such a confession.

"Such a confession," cried he, "to a person then coming to try his lodgings for her health, contains, indeed, more absurdity than we can well lay our account for."

I had seen Miss T. the day before.

"So," said he, "did I."

I then said,—"Do you ever, Sir, hear from her mother?"

"No," cried he, "nor write to her. I drive her quite from my mind. If I meet with one of her letters, I burn it instantly. I have burnt all I can find. I never speak of her, and I desire never to hear of her more. I drive her, as I said, wholly from my mind."

But his indignation was moderation itself to the rage of a female friend, whose displeasure at the ill-assorted marriage, so subversive of all English

* The above letter is endorsed as follows in the handwriting of Madame d'Arblay:—

"Many letters of a subsequent date to this letter, of 14th March, 1784, I have utterly, for cogent reasons, (cogent and conscientious,) destroyed. Following, with this so long dearest friend, the simple, but unrivalled, golden rule, I would only preserve such as evince her conflicts, her misery, and her sufferings, mental and corporeal, to exonerate her from the banal (!) reproach of yielding unresisting to her passions. Her fault and grievous misfortune was, not combating them in their origin; not flying even from their menace. How have I loved her! with what affection, what gratitude, what admiration, and what affliction!

/, becomes almost diverting. Miss nis account of the scene, in a letter cke of Norbury Park, a lady who had e to her a second Mrs. Thrale.

I had a very unpleasant morning after I left you. When the coach and I had waited upon my father, I made the visit I mentioned to you. O what a visit !—all that I presupposed of attack, inquiry, and acrimony, was nothing to what passed. Rage more intemperate I have not often seen; and the shrill voice of feeble old age, screaming with unavailing passion, is horrible. She had long looked upon Mrs. T. as a kind of protégée, whom she had fondled when a child, and whose fame, as she grew into notice, she was always proud to hear of, and help to exalt. She is a woman (I can well attest!) of most furious passions herself, however at liberty she thinks she may be to show no sort of mercy to those of another.

Once, had I been less disturbed, I could have laughed; for she declared with great vehemence, that if she had suspected "the wretch of any intention to marry the man, she would have ordered her own postchaise, and followed her to prevent it!" Alas, poor Lady F.!

She then called upon me, to hear my story; which, most painfully to myself, I related. She expressed herself very sorry for me, till I came to an avowal of my letter after the marriage; she then flew out into new choler. "I am amazed you would write to her, Miss Burney! I wonder you could think of it any more!"

I told her, I had thought myself so much indebted to her patience with my opposition to all her views and wishes, for the whole time of her long conflict, that, although I was the first to acknowledge her last action indefensible, I should be the last to forget all that had made me love her before it was committed.

This by no means satisfied her, and she poured forth again a torrent of unrelenting abuse. Some company, at last, came in, and I hastily took my leave. She called after me to fix some day for a longer visit; but I pretended not to hear, and ran down stairs, heartily resolving that necessity alone should ever force me into her presence again.

If we may credit her own testimony, Mrs. Piozzi continued to support life wonderfully well under these inflictions: and she had, at least, pleased herself, if no one else was pleased; always an important consideration in a widow's condemned marriage.

The next important onward step in the worldly career of Miss Burney, was gaining the favour of those ladies whom Sir Joshua Reynolds named the "Old Wits." These were the blues that had existed before blues had been heard of by name in England; and to Miss Burney their representatives were Mrs. Delany and the Duchess-dowager of Portland. It was from Mr. Burke, whom she had now met at the house of Sir Joshua Reynolds, and who must have sincerely admired her novels, that she first learned her important conquest, and that she had performed "the most wonderful of wonders," in pleasing the "Old Wits," to whom it was difficult to give satisfaction, as they piqued themselves on being past receiving it. The friends or contemporaries of Swift and Young, Gay and Pope, and of Lady Mary Wortley, were not to be pleased with the little wits of new, degenerate days. Mrs. Delany was at this time above eighty years of age; but her faculties were unimpaired, and her friendship and that of the Duchess had now endured for half a century. A person so well known to English readers as Mrs. Delany need not be described. Her acquaintance was universally courted, and her influence in society still considerable. She had acquired reputation for her skill in painting and in making a particular sort of artificial flowers. To this venerable lady, who had greatly admired "Cecilia," Miss Burney anxiously wished to be introduced; and Mrs. Chapone did her this kindness. The scene has interest even yet:—

And now for Mrs. Delany. I spent one hour with Mrs. Thrale, and then called for Mrs. Chapone, and we proceeded together to St. James's Place.

Mrs. Delany was alone in her drawing-room, which is entirely hung round with pictures of her own painting, and ornaments of her own designing. She came to the door to receive us. She is still tall, though some of her height may be lost: not much, however, for she is remarkably upright. She has no remains of beauty in feature; but in countenance I never but once saw more, and that was in my sweet maternal grandmother. Benevolence, softness, piety, and gentleness, are all resident in her face; and the resemblance with which she struck me to my dear grandmother, in her first appearance, grew so much stronger from all that came from her mind, which seems to contain nothing but purity and native humility, that I almost longed to embrace her; and I am sure, if I had, the recollection of that saint-like woman would have been so strong that I should never have refrained from crying over her.

Mrs. Chapone presented me to her, and, taking my hand, she said,—

"You must pardon me if I give you an old-fashioned reception, for I know nothing new."

And she saluted me.

In the evening the Duchess-dowager of Portland came:—

She is not near so old as Mrs. Delany, nor, to me, is her face by any means so pleasing; but yet there is sweetness, and dignity, and intelligence in it. Mrs. Delany received her with the same respectful ceremony as if it was her first visit, though she regularly goes to her every evening. But what she at first took as an honour and condescension, she has so much of true humility of mind, that no use can make her see in any other light. She immediately presented me to her. Her Grace courtesied and smiled with the most flattering air of pleasure, and said she was particularly happy in meeting with me.

We then took our places, and Mrs. Delany said,—

"Miss Burney, Ma'am, is acquainted with Mr. Crisp, whom your Grace knew so well; and she tells me he and his sister have been so good as to remember me, and to mention me to her."

The Duchess instantly asked me a thousand questions about him;—where he lived, how he had his health, and whether his fondness for the polite arts still continued. She said he was one of the most ingenious and agreeable men she had ever known; and regretted his having sequestered himself so much from the society of his former friends.

This conversation lasted a long while, for it was one upon which I could myself be voluble. I spared not for boasting of my dear daddy's kindness to me; and you can hardly imagine the pleasure, ease, and happiness it was to me, to talk of him to so elegant a judge, who so well knew I said nothing that was not true. She told me, also, the story of the poor Birmingham boy, and of the sketches which Mr Crisp, she said, had been so good as to give her.

In the course of this conversation I found her very charming, high-bred, courteous, sensible, and spirited; not merely free from pride, but free from affability—its most mortifying deputy.

After this she asked me if I had seen Mrs. Siddons, and what I thought of her. I answered that I admired her very much.

"If Miss Burney approves her," said the Duchess, "no approbation, I am sure, can do her so much credit; for no one can so perfectly judge of characters or of human nature."

"Ah, Ma'am," cried Mrs. Delany, archly, "and does your Grace remember protesting you would never read 'Cecilia!'"

"Yes," said she, laughing; "I declared that five volumes could never be attacked; but since I began I have read it three times."

"O terrible!" cried I, "to make them out fifteen!"

"The reason," continued she, "I held out so long against reading them, was remembering the cry there was in favour of 'Clarissa,' and 'Sir Charles Grandison,' when they came out; and those I never could read. I was teased into trying both of them; but I was disgusted with their tediousness, and could not read eleven letters, with all the effort I could make: so much about my sisters and my brothers, and all my uncles and my aunts!"

"But if your Grace had gone on with 'Clarissa,'" said Mrs. Chapone, "the latter part must certainly have affected you, and charmed you."

"O, I hate anything so dismal! Everybody that did read it had melancholy faces for a week. 'Cecilia' is as pathetic as I can bear, and more sometimes; yet, in the midst of the sorrow, there is a spirit in the writing, a fire in the whole composition, that keep off that heavy depression given by Richardson. Cry, to be sure, we did. O Mrs. Delany, shall you ever forget how we cried? But then we had so much laughter to make us amends, we were never left to sink under our concern."

So much for the prattle of ladies sixty years since. It is not a little amusing to find these high-bred ladies taking to Cecilia and to Fielding, and decrying Richardson; while Johnson, by some perversity, not only detested the lax morality of Fielding's novels, but underrated his genius as much as he did that of Goldsmith.

From this period Miss Burney became a great favourite with the venerable Mrs. Delany, with whom she frequently spent a day.

Mrs. Delany was already a favourite with the King and Queen Charlotte: and when her friend the Duchess died without making any provision for her, his Majesty generously gave her a pension of £300 a-year, and a house at Windsor, which was furnished for her. By this time Miss Burney, who had attended the venerable lady during a feverish attack, was domesticated with her, and a very great stay and solace to an aged woman, who seems to have been lonely enough at heart, though surrounded by many powerful friends. When Mrs. Delany removed to Windsor, her good royal gossips, George and Charlotte, who often dropped in upon her of an evening for a cup of tea and a friendly chat, obtained that knowledge of the celebrated Miss Burney which speedily led her Majesty to select her to fill the place of one of her attendants who was returning to Germany.

But before getting to the royal personages, we must look back on some others more bright, eminent, and amusing, if less exalted in rank. And first of Burke, at the house of Reynolds, with whom lived a maiden sister,—a worthy soul, though not of the brightest,—and a niece, Miss Palmer.

Sir Joshua's house is delightfully situated, almost at the top of Richmond Hill. We walked till near dinner-time upon the terrace, and there met Mr. Richard Burke, the brother of the orator. Miss Palmer, stopping him, said,—

"Are you coming to dine with us?"

"No," he answered; "I shall dine at the Star and Garter."

"How did you come—with Mrs. Burke, or alone?"

"Alone."

"What, on horseback?"

"Ay, sure!" cried he, laughing; "Up and ride! Now's the time."

And he made a fine flourish with his hand, and passed us. He is just made under-secretary at the Treasury. He is a tall and handsome man, and seems to have much dry drollery; but we saw no more of him.

After our return to the house, and while Sir Joshua and I were tête-à-tête, Lord Corke and my father being still walking, and Miss Palmer having, I suppose, some orders to give about the dinner, the "Knight of Plympton" was desiring my opinion of the prospect from his window, and comparing it with Mr. Burke's, as he told me after I had spoken it,—when the Bishop of St. Asaph and his daughter, Miss Georgiana Shipley, were announced. Sir Joshua, to divert himself, in introducing me to the bishop, said, "Miss Burney, my lord; otherwise, 'Evelina.'"

The bishop is a well-looking man, and seemed grave, quiet, and sensible. I have heard much more of him; but nothing more appeared. Miss Georgiana, however, was showy enough for two. She is a very tall, and rather handsome girl; but the expression of her face is, to me, disagreeable. She has almost a constant smile, not of softness, nor of insipidity, but of self-sufficiency and internal satisfaction. . . . . Miss Palmer soon joined us; and in a short time, entered more company,—three gentlemen and one lady; but there was no more ceremony used of introductions. The lady, I concluded, was Mrs. Burke, wife of the Mr. Burke, and was not mistaken. One of the gentlemen I recollected to be young Burke, her son, whom I once met at Sir Joshua's in town, and another of them I knew for Mr. Gibbon: but the third I had never seen before. I had been told that the Burke was not expected; yet I could conclude this gentleman to be no other; he had just the air, the manner, the appearance, I had prepared myself to look for in him; and there was an evident, a striking superiority in his demeanour, his eye, his motions, that announced him no common man.

I could not get at Miss Palmer to satisfy my doubts, and we were soon called down-stairs to dinner. Sir Joshua and the unknown stopped to speak with one another upon the stairs; and, when they followed us, Sir Joshua, in taking his place at the table, asked me to sit next to him; I willingly complied. "And then," he added, "Mr. Burke shall sit on the other side of you."

"Oh, no, indeed!" cried Miss Georgiana, who also had placed herself next Sir Joshua; "I won't consent to that; Mr. Burke must sit next me; I won't agree to part with him. Pray, come and sit down quiet, Mr. Burke."

Mr. Burke,—for him it was,—smiled and obeyed.

"I only meant," said Sir Joshua, "to have made my peace with Mr. Burke, by giving him that place, because he has been scolding me for not introducing him to Miss Burney. However, I must do it now;—Mr. Burke!—Miss Burney!"

We both half rose, and Mr. Burke said,—

"I have been complaining to Sir Joshua that he left me wholly to my own sagacity; however, it did not here deceive me."

"Oh dear, then," said Miss Georgiana, looking a little consternated, "perhaps you won't thank me for calling you to this place!"

Nothing was said, and so we all began dinner,—young Burke making himself my next neighbour.

Captain Phillips knows Mr. Burke. Has he or has he not told you how delightful a creature he is? If he has not, pray, in my name, abuse him without mercy; if he has, pray ask if he will subscribe to my account of him, which herewith shall follow.

He is tall, his figure is noble, his air commanding, his address graceful: his voice is clear, penetrating, sonorous, and powerful; his language is copious, various and eloquent; his manners are attractive, his conversation is delightful.

What says Captain Phillips? Have I chanced to see him in his happiest hour? or is he all this in common? Since we lost Garrick I have seen nobody so enchanting.

I can give you, however, very little of what was said, for the conversation was not suivie, Mr. Burke darting from subject to subject with as much rapidity as entertainment. Neither is the charm of his discourse more in the matter than the manner; all, therefore, that is related from him loses half its effect in not being related by him. Such little sketches as I can recollect take however.

From the window of the dining-parlour, Sir Joshua directed us to look at a pretty white house which belonged to Lady Di. Beauclerk.

"I am extremely glad," said Mr. Burke, "to see her at last so well housed; poor woman! the bowl has long rolled in misery; I rejoice that it has now found its balance. I never, myself, so much enjoyed the sight of happiness in another, as in that woman when I first saw her after the death of her husband. It was really enlivening to behold her placed in that sweet house, released from all her cares, a thousand pounds a-year at her own disposal, and—her husband was dead! Oh, it was pleasant, it was delightful to see her enjoyment of her situation!"

"But, without considering the circumstances," said Mr. Gibbon, "this may appear very strange; though, when they are fairly stated, it is perfectly rational and unavoidable."

"Very true," said Mr. Burke, if the circumstances are not considered, Lady Di. may seem highly reprehensible."

He then, addressing himself particularly to me, as the person least likely to be acquainted with the character of Mr. Beauclerk, drew it himself in strong and marked expressions, describing the misery he gave his wife, his singular ill-treatment of her, and the necessary relief the death of such a man must give.

This lady, the daughter of the Duke of Marlborough, was the divorced wife of Lord Bolingbroke, and apparently not happier when she had married her lover, the celebrated Topham Beauclerk, than in her first matrimonial connexion.

Shortly after this meeting, Burke sent Miss Burney a highly complimentary letter, dated Whitehall, upon her Cecilia. His criticisms, in an after conversation, if not so eulogistic, must have been more grateful to the author. One of his last acts in office was obtaining for Dr. Burney the place of Organist to the Chapel of Chelsea Hospital. This he announced in a courteous letter, and also personally. But no one ever questioned the benevolence and amiability of this great man in private life.

As a contrast to Burke, we select a countryman of his, who does credit to Miss Burney's pencil. He appears to have been on a visit to Mrs. Thrale after the death of Thrale:—

We have now a new character added to our set, and one of no small diversion,—Mr. Musgrave, an Irish gentleman of fortune, and member of the Irish Parliament. He is tall, thin, and agreeable in his face and figure; is reckoned a good scholar, has travelled, and been very well educated. His manners are impetuous and abrupt; his language is high-flown and hyperbolical; his sentiments are romantic and tender; his heart is warm and generous; his head hot and wrong! And the whole of his conversation is a mixture the most uncommon, of knowledge and triteness, simplicity and fury, literature and folly!

Keep this character in your mind, and, contradictory as it seems, I will give you, from time to time, such specimens as shall remind you of each of these six epithets.

He was introduced into this house by Mr. Seward, with whom, and Mr. Graves of Worcester, he travelled into Italy: and some years ago he was extremely intimate here. But, before my acquaintance was made at Streatham, he had returned to Ireland; where, about a year since, he married Miss Cavendish. They are now, by mutual consent, parted. She is gone to a sister in France, and he is come to spend some time in England by way of diverting his chagrin.

Mrs. Thrale who, though open-eyed enough to his absurdities, thinks well of the goodness of his heart, has a real regard for him; and he quite adores her, and quite worships Dr. Johnson—frequently declaring (for what he once says, he says continually) that he would spill his blood for him,—or clean his shoes,—or go to the East Indies to do him any good! "I am never," says he, "afraid of him; none but a fool or a rogue has any need to be afraid of him. What a fine old lion (looking up at his picture) he is! Oh! I love him,—I honour him,—I reverence him! I would black his shoes for him. I wish I could give him my night's sleep!"

These are exclamations which he is making continually. Mrs. Thrale has extremely well said that he is a caricature of Mr. Boswell, who is a caricature, I must add, of all other of Dr. Johnson's admirers.

The next great favourite he has in the world to our Doctor, and the person whom he talks next most of, is Mr. Jessop, who was his schoolmaster, and whose praise he is never tired of singing in terms the most vehement,—quoting his authority for every other thing he says, and lamenting our misfortune in not knowing him.

His third favourite topic, at present, is "The Life of Louis XV." in 4 vols. 8vo, lately translated from the French; and of this he is so extravagantly fond, that he talks of it as a man might talk of his mistress, provided he had so little wit as to talk of her at all.

Painting, music, all the fine arts in their turn, he also speaks of in raptures. He is himself very accomplished, plays the violin extremely well, is a very good linguist, and a very decent painter. But no subject in his hands fails to be ridiculous, as he is sure, by the abruptness of its introduction, the strange turn of his expressions, or the Hibernian twang of his pronunciation, to make everything he says, however usual or common, seem peculiar and absurd.

In the first year of her widowhood, and when they were all apparently good friends, Mrs. Thrale carried "little Burney" and Dr. Johnson to Brighton with her. To the Doctor this seems to have been an uncomfortable residence, for the ladies were generally invited without him. He had quarrelled with some people; and others "almost constantly omitted him either from too much respect, or too much fear." On these omissions the diarist remarks:—

I am sorry for it, as he hates being alone, and as, though he scolds the others, he is well enough satisfied himself; and, having given vent to all his own occasional anger or ill-humour, he is ready to begin again, and is never aware that those who have so been "downed" by him, never can much covet so triumphant a visiter. In contests of wit, the victor is as ill off in future consequences as the vanquished in present ridicule.

Even to little Burney the philosopher was becoming a bore. He was de trop to everybody often in very bad humour, and had much better have been at Bolt Court. One morning they met a great deal of fine company, at a breakfast given by Mr. Swinerton, and she relates:—

I happened to be standing by Dr. Johnson when the ladies came in; but, as I dread him before strangers from the staring attention he attracts both for himself and all with whom he talks, I endeavoured to change my ground. However, he kept prating a sort of comic nonsense that detained me some minutes whether I would or not; but when we were all taking places at the breakfast-table I made another effort to escape. It proved vain; he drew his chair next to mine, and went rattling on in a humorous sort of comparison he was drawing of himself to me,—not one word of which could I enjoy or can I remember, from the hurry I was in to get out of his way. In short, I felt so awkward from being thus marked out, that I was reduced to whisper a request

Mr. Swinerton to put a chair between us, for which I presently made a space: for I have often known him stop all conversation with me, when he has ceased to have me for his next neighbour. Mr. Swinerton, who is an extremely good-natured young man, and so intimate here that I make no scruple with him, instantly complied, and placed himself between us.

But no sooner was this done, than Dr. Johnson, half seriously, and very loudly, took him to task.

"How now, Sir! what do you mean by this? Would you separate me from Miss Burney?"

Mr. Swinerton, a little startled, began some apologies, and Mrs. Thrale winked at him to give up the place; but he was willing to oblige me, though he grew more and more frightened every minute, and coloured violently as the Doctor continued his remonstrance, which he did with rather unmerciful raillery, upon his taking advantage of being in his own house to thus supplant him, and crow; but when he had borne it for about ten minutes, his face became so hot with the fear of hearing something worse, that he ran from the field, and took a chair between Lady De Ferrars and Mrs. Thrale. I think I shall take warning by this failure, to trust only to my own expedients for avoiding his public notice in future. . . . . .

THURSDAY.—Mr. Metcalf called upon Dr. Johnson, and took him out an airing. Mr. Hamilton is gone, and Mr. Metcalf is now the only person out of this house that voluntarily communicates with the Doctor. He has been in a terrible severe humour of late, and has really frightened all the people, till they almost ran from him. To me only I think he is now kind, for Mrs. Thrale fares worse than anybody. 'Tis very strange and very melancholy that he will not a little more accommodate his manners and language to those of other people. He likes Mr. Metcalf, however, and so do I, for he is very clever and entertaining when he pleases.

Poor old Doctor!

It was at this time that Miss Burney first saw a personage, who, until the other day, figured as a great celebrity; and who, first flourishing in this journal, has come down to us in the novels of Lady Morgan and the younger D'Israeli. This was Lady Corke, then the Hon. Miss Monckton, who only died last year.

SUNDAY, NOV. 10TH, brings in a new person. The Honourable Miss Monckton, who is here with her mother the Dowager Lady Galway, has sent various messages of her earnest desire to be acquainted with Mrs. Thrale and your humble servant to command. Dr. Johnson she already knew, for she is one of those who stand foremost in collecting all extraordinary or curious people to her London conversaziones, which, like those of Mrs. Vesey, mix the rank and the literature, and exclude all beside. Well—after divers intimations of this sort, it was at last settled that Lady De Ferrars should bring her here this morning.

In the evening came Lady De Ferrars, Miss Monckton, and Miss Ellerker. Miss Monckton is between thirty and forty, very short, very fat, but handsome; splendidly and fantastically dressed, rouged not unbecomingly, yet evidently and palpably desirous of gaining notice and admiration. She has an easy levity in her air, manner, voice and discourse, that speak all within to be comfortable; and her rage of seeing anything curious may be satisfied, if she pleases, by looking in a mirror.

I can give you no account of the conversation, as it was broken, and not entertaining. Miss Monckton went early, having another engagement, but the other ladies stayed very late. She told us, however, one story extremely well worth recording. The Duke of Devonshire was standing near a very fine glass lustre in a corner of a room, at an assembly, and in a house of people who, Miss Monckton said, were by no means in a style of life to hold expense as immaterial; and by carelessly lolling back, he threw the lustre down and it was broke. He showed not, however, the smallest concern or confusion at the accident, but coolly said, "I wonder how I did that!" He then removed to the opposite corner, and to show, I suppose, he had forgotten what he had done, leaned his head in the same manner, and down came the opposite lustre! He looked at it very calmly, and, with a philosophical dryness, merely said, "This is singular enough!" and walked to another part of the room, without either distress or apology.

Nothing can be more characteristic of the order; nor is it quite clear that there might not have been a little malice prepense in thus punishing presumptuous upstarts who sported lustres. At least such things have been known. But we must not lose sight of the future Lady Corke after her return to town. Many of our readers can still "taste her."

TUESDAY.—Pacchierotti called in the morning, and was very sweet and amiable. I received, also, a most perfumed note, on French paper, gilt, bordered, glazed, enclosed in a finely decorated cover, and sealed with a miniken figure, from Miss Monckton, to invite me for the 8th, to meet Mrs. Thrale. I accepted the invitation with pleasure; her parties are the most brilliant in town, and she is acquainted with many people I wish to meet. In small parties, or intimate acquaintances, it is necessary to like the mistress of the house; but in large assemblies, it is but like going to a better regulated public place.

WEDNESDAY.—I called in the morning upon Miss Palmer, with whom I sat some time. Her uncle has been very dangerously ill, but is now quite recovered. I then went and spent all the day with sweet Mrs. Thrale, who shut out all company, and gave me herself to myself; and it was much the happiest time I have spent, away from my father, since I left Brighton. Dr. Johnson was at home, and in most excellent good humour and spirits.

The at home was no doubt one cause of the now good humour and good spirits. Pacchierotti was a celebrated singer of the day, quite the idol of a few young ladies and dilettanti, though John Bull was deaf and obdurate to the charmer. He seems, however, to have been an intelligent and amiable person. Miss Burney adored his talent, and even gave him a niche in her "Cecilia." The ladies of those days, it is some consolation to learn, were quite as absurd about singers, preachers, and all sorts of actors, as in our own younger, silly times.

THURSDAY, JULY 17TH.—I went with my dear father to-day to dine and spend the evening at Lady Mary Duncan's. How vexatious never to have made this visit till it was necessarily the last in which I could see Pacchierotti there! He was in good humour, and more tolerable spirits than I have lately seen him in. Lady Shaub, mother to Mrs. Locke, and Miss Shaub her sister, and Sir John Elliot, made all the dinner party. The two Miss Bulls came in the evening.

Pacchierotti did not sing one song accompanied, but he sang several little airs and ballads, English, Scotch, French, and Italian, most deliciously. I had a very agreeable day, and I saw he was quite delighted that I made one of the party, and that added to my delight almost its sum total,—though add is a little Irish there. Oh, how the Miss Bulls do idolize him! They profess thinking him quite angelic, and declared they should even look upon it as a favour to be beat by him! I laughed violently at this extravagance, and vowed I would tell him. They desired no better. We called him to us; but I was really ashamed myself when I found they were not. He leaned down his head very patiently for an explanation.

"Do tell him!" cried they, both together.

"What!" cried he; "what does the sweet Miss Burney say?"

"Oh, oh!" cried one—"Oh dear!" cried the other; "how he speaks to Miss Burney!"

"Miss Burney," cried he, quite warmly and undauntedly, "is a treasure!"

"Oh dear!—only hear him, Lady Mary!" exclaimed

Miss Catherine Bull; "he says Miss Burney is a treasure!"

"Well, and is it not true?" said she, graciously.

"Oh, yes!" answered she, half laughing, yet in a repining voice; "but I don't like to hear him say so."

This was our sort of chat almost all the evening, with various imitations, and light summer singing, from Pacchierotti. . . . . .

TUESDAY, NOV. 25TH,—I went this morning to Lady Mary Duncan, whose visit my father grew angry that I did not return. She admitted me, and kept me full two hours. She is really entertaining, very entertaining, though not very respectably always, as everything she says has some mixture of absurdity in the manner, even when the idea is faultless. She much invited me to frequent visits, and was excessively civil and courteous. Our talk was all of her late Sir William and Pacchierotti. She runs from one to the other with a most ludicrous facility, as if well content they should share her favour, divide her thoughts, and keep the use of her tongue wholly to themselves.

Miss Palmer's uncle, whose illness is referred to above, was Sir Joshua Reynolds, who had had a paralytic attack. He had long been talked of in relation to Miss Burney's matrimonial prospects, but the wishes of her friends and of her sister proved of no effect; nor does she seem to have been greatly disappointed, wealthy as he was. And—

Now for Miss Monckton's assembly.

I had begged Mrs. Thrale to call for me, that I might have her countenance and assistance upon my entrance. Miss Thrale came also. Everything was in a new style. We got out of the coach into a hall full of servants, not one of which inquired our names, or took any notice of us. We proceeded, and went up stairs, and when we arrived at a door, stopped and looked behind us. No servant had followed or preceded us. We deliberated what was to be done. To announce ourselves was rather awkward, neither could we be sure we were going into the right apartment. I proposed our going up higher, till we met with somebody; Miss Thrale thought we should go down and call some of the servants; but Mrs. Thrale, after a ridiculous consultation, determined to try her fortune by opening the door. This being done, we entered a room full of—tea-things, and one maid-servant!

"Well," cried Mrs. Thrale, laughing, "what is to be done now? I suppose we are come so early that nothing is ready."

The maid stared, but said,—"There's company in the next room."

Then we considered again how to make ourselves known; and then Mrs. Thrale again resolved to take courage and enter. She therefore opened another door, and went into another apartment. I held back, but looked after, and observing that she made no courtesy, concluded she was gone into some wrong place. Miss Thrale followed, and after her went little I, wondering who was to receive, or what was to become of us.

Miss Monckton lives with her mother, the old Dowager Lady Galway, in a noble house in Charles Street, Berkeley Square. The room was large and magnificent. There was not much company, for we were very early. Lady Galway sat at the side of the fire, and received nobody. She seems very old, and was dressed with a little round white cap, and not a single hair, no cushion, roll, nor anything else but the little round cap, which was flat upon her forehead. Such part of the company as already knew her made their compliments to her where she sat, and the rest were never taken up to her, but belonged wholly to Miss Monckton.

Miss Monckton's own manner of receiving her guests was scarce more laborious; for she kept her seat when they entered, and only turned round her head to nod it, and say "How do do?" after which they found what accommodation they could for themselves.

As soon, however, as she perceived Mrs. and Miss Thrale, which was not till they had been some minutes in the room, she arose to welcome them, contrary to her general custom, and merely because it was their first visit. Our long trains making my entrance some time after theirs, gave me the advantage of being immediately seen by her, and she advanced to me with quickness, and very politely thanked me for coming, and said,—

"I fear you think me very rude for taking the liberty of sending to you."

"No, indeed, you did me much honour," quoth I.

Some new people now coming in, and placing themselves in a regular way, Miss Monckton exclaimed,—"My whole care is to prevent a circle;" and hastily rising, she pulled about the chairs, and planted the people in groups, with as dexterous a disorder as you would desire to see.

The company in general were dressed with more brilliancy than at any rout I ever was at, as most of them were going to the Duchess of Cumberland's and attired for that purpose. Just behind me sat Mrs. Hampden, still very beautiful, but insufferably affected. Another lady, in full dress, and very pretty, came in soon after, and got herself a chair just before me; and then a conversation began between her and Mrs. Hampden, of which I will give you a specimen.

"How disagreeable these sacques are! I am so incommoded with these nasty ruffles! I am going to Cumberland House—are you?"—"To be sure," said Mrs. Hampden; "what else, do you think, would make me bear this weight of dress? I can't bear a sacque."—"Why, I thought you said you should always wear them!"—"Oh, yes, but I have changed my mind since then—as many people do."—"Well, I think it vastly disagreeable indeed," said the other; "you can't think how I'm encumbered with these ruffles!"—"Oh, I am quite oppressed with them," said Mrs. Hampden; "I can hardly bear myself up."—"And I dined in this way!" cried the other; "only think—dining in a sacque!"—"Oh," answered Mrs. Hampden, "it really puts me quite out of spirits."—Well, have you enough?—and has my daddy raved enough? . . . . .

Mrs. and Miss Thrale had other engagements, and soon went away. Miss Monckton then took a chair again next to me, which she kept till we both started at the same voice, and she cried out,—"Oh, it's Mr. Burke!" and she ran to him with as much joy as, if it had been our house, I should. Cause the second for liking her better.

I grew now in a violent fidget, both to have his notice and for what his notice would be; but I sat very still and he was seized upon by scores, and taken to another part of the room.

Then came in Sir Joshua Reynolds, and he soon drew a chair near mine, and from that time I was never without some friend at my elbow.

Miss Burney was fortunate enough in this party to get her share of Mr. Burke, who talked well and wisely about "Cecilia," and finished thus:—

"But," said he, "I have one other fault to find, and a far more material one than any I have mentioned."

"I am the more obliged to you. What is it?"

"The disposal of this book. I have much advice to offer to you upon that subject. Why did not you send for your own friend out of the city? he would have taken care you should not part with it so much below par."

He meant Mr. Briggs.

On the same topic of "solid pudding," Daddy Crisp writes her:—

"Now, Fannikin, I must remind you of your promise which was to come to your loving daddy when you could get loose. Look ye, Fanny, I don't mean to cajole you hither with the expectation of amusement or entertainment. You and I know better than to hum or be hummed in that manner. If you come here, come to work—work hard,—stick to it. This is the harvest-time of your life; your sun shines hot; lose not a moment, then, but make your hay directly. "Touch the yellow boys," as Briggs says,—"grow warm;" make the bookseller come down handsomely—count the ready—the chink.—

Do but secure this one point while it is in your power, and all things else shall be added unto thee.

I talked to your doctor daddy on the subject of disposing of your money; and we both agreed in the project of a well-secured annuity; and in the meantime, till that could be procured, that the ready should be vested in the three per cent annuities, that it might produce something; and he promised to advance, to make even money.

But we must go back to the rout and Burke:—

Sir Joshua Reynolds now joined us.

"Are you telling her," said he, "of our conversation with the old wits? I am glad you hear it from Mr. Burke, Miss Burney, for he can tell it so much better than I can, and remember their very words."

"Nothing else would they talk of for three whole hours," said he, "and we were there at the third reading of the bill."

"I believe I was in good hands," said I, "if they talked of it to you!"

"Why, yes," answered Sir Joshua, laughing, "we joined in from time to time. Gibbon says he read the whole five volumes in a day."

"'Tis impossible," cried Mr. Burke, "it cost me three days; and you know I never parted with it from the time I first opened it."

Here are laurels, Susy! My dear daddy and Kitty, are you not doubly glad you so kindly hurried me upstairs to write when at Chesington?

Mr. Burke then went to some other party, and Mr. Swinerton took his place, with whom I had a dawdling conversation upon dawdling subjects; and I was not a little enlivened, upon his quitting the chair, to have it filled by Mr. Metcalf, who, with much satire, but much entertainment, kept chattering with me till Dr. Johnson found me out, and brought a chair opposite to me.

Do you laugh, my Susan, or cry at your F. B.'s honours!

"So," said he to Mr. Metcalf, "it is you, is it, that are engrossing her thus?"

"He's jealous," said Mr. Metcalf, drily.

"How these people talk of Mrs. Siddons!" said the Doctor. "I came hither in full expectation of hearing no name but the name I love and pant to hear,—when from one corner to another they are talking of that jade, Mrs. Siddons! till, at last wearied out, I went yonder into a corner, and repeated to myself Burney! Burney! Burney! Burney!"

"Ay, Sir," said Mr. Metcalf, "you should have carved it upon the trees."

"Sir, had there been any trees, so I should; but being here, I was content to carve it upon my heart."

Soon after the parties changed again, and young Mr. Burke came and sat by me. He is a very civil and obliging, and a sensible and agreeable young man. I was occasionally spoken to afterwards by strangers, both men and women, whom I could not find out, though they called me by my name as if they had known me all my life. Old Lady Galway trotted from her corner, in the middle of the evening, and leaning her hands upon the backs of two chairs, put her little round head through two fine high dressed ladies on purpose to peep at me, and then trotted back to her place! Ha, ha!

Miss Monckton now came to us again, and I congratulated her upon her power in making Dr. Johnson sit in a group; upon which she immediately said to him,—

"Sir, Miss Burney says you like best to sit in a circle."

"Does she!" said he, laughing; "Ay, never mind what she says. Don't you know she is a writer of romances!"

One quite rejoices to see the Doctor himself again; though he broke out against Mrs. Siddons, who was now become an idol of the coteries, but whose merits he did not yet understand. And players had never stood high in his good graces. On a subsequent evening at Miss Monckton's, Mrs. Siddons was again seen, and is thus graciously noticed:—

We found Mrs. Siddons, the actress, there. She is a woman of excellent character, and therefore I am very glad she is thus patronized, since Mrs. Abington, and so many frail fair ones, have been thus noticed by the great. She behaved with great propriety; very calm, modest, quiet, and unaffected. She has a very fine countenance, and her eyes look both intelligent and soft. She has, however, a steadiness in her manner and deportment by no means engaging. Mrs. Thrale, who was there, said, —"Why, this is a leaden goddess we are all worshipping! however, we shall soon gild it."

A lady who sat near me then began a dialogue with Mr. Erskine, who had placed himself exactly opposite to Mrs. Siddons; and they debated together upon her manner of studying her parts, disputing upon the point with great warmth, yet not only forbearing to ask Mrs. Siddons herself which was right, but quite overpowering her with their loquacity, when she attempted, unasked, to explain the matter.

This also is characteristic. Poor Mrs. Siddons not understanding the profession in which she was already allowed to excel, half so well as her patrons! But the same thing happens with all great artists, and at all times.

Passing Soame Jenyns, the Wartons, the Cambridges, and the whole body of the learned, we stick by the female portraits exhibited in this gallery, as not only the most entertaining, but the best painted. Here is Sir Joshua's simple sister.—What a delightful chat she and Goldsmith might have had together on her genteel perplexities:—

I had afterwards a whispering conversation with Mrs. Reynolds, which made me laugh, from her excessive oddness and absurdity. It began about Chesington. She expressed her wonder how I could have passed so much time there. I assured her that with my own will I should pass much more time there, as I know no place where I had had more, if so much, happiness.

"Well, bless me!" cried she, holding up her hands, "and all this variety comes from only one man! That's strange, indeed, for, by what I can make out, there's nothing but that one Mr. Quip there!"

Mr. Crisp," said I, "is, indeed, the only man: but there are also two ladies, very dear friends of mine, who live there constantly."

"What! and they neither of them married that Mr.—that same gentleman?"

"No, they never married anybody; they are single, and so is he."

"Well, but if he is so mighty agreeable," said she, holding her finger up to her nose most significantly, "can you tell me how it comes to pass he should never have got a wife in all this time?"

There was no answering this but by grinning; but I thought how my dear Kitty would again have called her the old sifter.

She afterwards told me of divers most ridiculous distresses she had been in with Mrs. Montagu and Mrs. Ord.

"I had the most unfortunate thing in the world happen to me," she said, "about Mrs. Montagu, and I always am in some distress or misfortune with that lady. She did me the honour to invite me to dine with her last week,—and I am sure there is nobody in the world can be more obliged to Mrs. Montagu for taking such notice of anybody;—but just when the day came I was so unlucky as to be ill, and that, you know, made it quite improper to go to dine with Mrs. Montagu, for fear of any disagreeable consequences. So this vexed me very much, for I had nobody to send to her that was proper to appear before Mrs. Montagu; for, to own the truth, you must know I have no servant but a maid, and I could not think of sending such a person to Mrs. Montagu. So I thought it best to send a chairman, and to tell him only to ring at the bell, and to wait for no answer; because then the porter might tell Mrs. Montagu my servant brought the note, for the porter could not tell but he might be my servant. But my maid was so stupid, she took the shilling I gave her for the chairman, and went to a green-shop, and bid the woman send somebody with the note, and she left the shilling with her; so the green-woman, I suppose, thought she might keep the shilling, and, instead of sending a chairman, she sent her own errand-girl; and she was all dirt and rags. But this is not all; for, when the girl got to the house, nothing would serve her but she would give the note to Mrs. Montagu, and wait for an answer; so then, you know, Mrs. Montagu saw this ragged green-shop girl. I was never so shocked in my life, for when she brought me back the note I knew at once how it all was. Only think what a mortification, to have Mrs. Montagu see such a person as that! She must think it very odd of me, indeed, to send a green-shop girl to such a house as hers!"

Now for a distress equally grievous with Mrs. Ord:—

"You must know Mrs. Ord called on me the other day when I did not happen to be dressed; so I had a very pretty sort of a bed-gown, like a jacket, hanging at the fire, and I had on a petticoat, with a border on it of the same pattern; but the bed-gown I thought was damp, and I was in a hurry to go down to Mrs. Ord, so I would not stay to dry it, but went down in another bed-gown, and put my cloak on. But only think what Mrs. Ord must think of it, for I have since thought she must suppose, I had no gown on at all, for you must know my cloak was so long it only showed the petticoat."

If this makes you grin as it did me, you will be glad of another specimen of her sorrows:—

"I am always," said she, "out of luck with Mrs. Ord; for, another time when she came, there happened to be a great slop on the table; so, while the maid was going to the door, I took up a rag that I had been wiping my pencils with, for I had been painting, and I wiped the table; but as she got up-stairs before I had put it away, I popped a white handkerchief upon it. However, while we were talking, I thought my handkerchief looked like a litter upon the table, and, thinks I, Mrs. Ord will think it very untidy, for she is all neatness, so I whisked it into my pocket; but I quite forgot the rag with the paint on it. So, when she was gone,—bless me!—there I saw it was sticking out of my pocket, in full sight. Only think what a slut Mrs. Ord must think me, to put a dish-clout in my pocket!"

I had several stories of the same sort, and I fear I have lost all reputation with her for dignity, as I laughed immoderately at her disasters.

Our next specimen is equally good of the kind. Lady Warren might, for high-bred, unconscious insolence, have been linked to the Duke of Devonshire coolly demolishing lustre after lustre:—

Lady Warren is immensely tall, and extremely beautiful: she is now but just nineteen, though she has been married two or three years. She is giddy, gay, chatty, good-humoured, and a little affected; she hazards all that occurs to her, seems to think the world at her feet, and is so young, and gay, and handsome, that she is not much mistaken. She is, in short, an inferior Lady Honoria Pemberton:* somewhat beneath her in parts and understanding, but strongly in that class of character. I had no conversation with her myself; but her voice is loud and deep, and all she said was for the whole room.

Take a trait or two, which I think will divert my daddy Crisp. Marriages being talked of.

"I'll tell you," cried she, "a story; that is, it sha'n't be a story, but a fact. A lady of my acquaintance, who had £50,000 fortune, ran away to Scotland with a gentleman she liked vastly; so she was a little doubtful of him, and had a mind to try him: so, when they stopped to dine, and change horses, and all that, she said, 'Now, as I have a great regard for you, I dare say you have for me; so I will tell you a secret: I have got no fortune at all, in reality, but only £5000; for all the rest is a mere pretence: but if you like me for myself, and not for my fortune, you won't mind that.' So the gentleman said, 'Oh, I don't regard it at all, and you are the same charming angel that ever you was,' and all those sort of things that people say to one, and then went out to see about the chaise. So he did not come back; but when dinner was ready, the lady said, 'Pray, where is he?' 'Lor, ma'am,' said they, 'why, that gentleman has been gone ever so long!' So she came back by herself; and now she's married to somebody else, and has her £50,000 fortune all safe.

Lady Warren was extremely smitten with Mrs. Thrale, and talked to her almost incessantly, though they had never before met; but in the end of the evening, when Mrs. T. mentioned that she was going the next morning to make a visit at Lewes ——

"Oh," cried her Ladyship, "I have a great mind to beg a favour of you then."

"Pray do, ma'am," said Mrs. Thrale, "I shall think it an honour to grant it."

"Oh, but it's such an odd thing—its quite an odd request; but it is for a place in your coach."

"My coach shall be very much at your ladyship's service; I beg you will make what use of it you please."

"Why, you must know it is to carry a little dog for me to Lewes. It belongs to Dr. Poole, and he'll quite break his heart if I don't send it him; so I'll part with it at once before I grow too fond of it."

This was, indeed, an odd request to a new acquaintance, and to a Welchwoman, as Mrs. Thrale said afterwards. The look of her eye, the moment she heard it, made Lady Warren colour violently; but she answered with great good humour—

"Suppose your ladyship was to do me the honour to go too, and so carry your little dog yourself!"

Lady Warren evidently understood her, and began many apologies; but said she was engaged herself to spend the morning at Lady Dashwood's.

"I had hoped," said Mrs. Thrale, "your ladyship had meant your little boy; for I should have been very proud to have been trusted with him; but I suppose you could not spare him so long."

She has one child, of ten weeks old, of which she is doatingly fond.

"Oh, no," she answered eagerly, "not for half an hour. I shall never trust him away from me till he is eight years old, and then I shall send him to sea. He shall be true blue. I bring him up very stout. He sucked a hare bone for dinner to-day."

"A hare bone for a child of ten weeks old!"

"Oh, he liked it vastly. He laughed and crowed the whole time. I often have veal stewed into good strong broth for him."

Her husband, Sir John Borlase Warren, is in the navy.

This is the half-unconscious insolence, either of very high life, or of persons who have been bred among slaves.

The next specimen is less offensive. Lady Say and Sele is merely silly, and not ill-bred, unamiable and inconsiderate of the feelings of others; and her sister is equally good in her own style. They were met at a rout, to which Miss Burney had been attracted because "The Pac" was to sing, which he did delightfully:—

After this he went into another room, to try if it would be cooler; and Mrs. Paradise, leaning over the Kirwans and Charlotte, who hardly got a seat all night for the crowd, said she begged to speak to me. squeezed my great person out, and she then said,—

"Miss Burney, Lady Say and Sele desires the honour of being introduced to you."

Her ladyship stood by her side. She seems pretty near fifty—at least turned forty; her head was full of feathers, flowers, jewels, and gew-gaws, and as high as Lady Archer's; her dress was trimmed with beads, silver, Persian sashes, and all sort of fine fancies; her face is thin and fiery, and her whole manner spoke a lady all alive.

* A character in Cecilia.

"Miss Burney," cried she, with great quickness, and a look all curiosity, "I am very happy to see you; I have longed to see you a great while; I have read your performance, and I am quite delighted with it. I think it's the most elegant novel I ever read in my life. Such a style! I am quite surprised at it. I can't think where you got so much invention!"

You may believe this was a reception not to make me very loquacious. I did not know which way to turn my head.

"I must introduce you," continued her ladyship, "to my sister; she'll be quite delighted to see you. She has written a novel herself; so you are sister authoresses. A most elegant thing it is, I assure you; almost as pretty as yours, only not quite so elegant. She has written two novels, only one is not so pretty as the other. But I shall insist upon your seeing them. One is in letters, like yours, only yours is prettiest; it's called the 'Mausoleum of Julia!'"

What unfeeling things, thought I, are my sisters! I'm sure I never heard them go about thus praising me!

Mrs. Paradise then again came forward, and taking my hand, led me up to her ladyship's sister, Lady Hawke, saying aloud, and with a courteous smirk, "Miss Burney, ma'am, authoress of 'Evelina.'"—"Yes," cried my friend, Lady Say and Sele, who followed me close, "it's the authoress of 'Evelina;' so you are sister authoresses!"

Lady Hawke arose and curtsied. She is much younger than her sister, and rather pretty; extremely languishing, delicate, and pathetic; apparently accustomed to be reckoned the genius of her family, and well contented to be looked upon as a creature dropped from the clouds.

I was then seated between their ladyships, and Lady S. and S., drawing as near to me as possible, said,—"Well, and so you wrote this pretty book!—and pray, did your papa know of it?"—"No, ma'am; not till some months after the publication."—"So I've heard; it's surprising! I can't think how you invented it!—there's a vast deal of invention in it! And you've got so much humour, too! Now my sister has no humour—her's is all sentiment. You can't think how I was entertained with that old grandmother and her son!" I suppose she meant Tom Branghton for the son.—"How much pleasure you must have had in writing it; had not you?"—"Y—e—s, ma'am."—"So has my sister; she's never without a pen in her hand; she can't help writing for her life. When Lord Hawke is travelling about with her, she keeps writing all the way."—"Yes," said Lady Hawke; I really can't help writing. One has great pleasure in writing the things: has not one, Miss Burney?"—"Y—e—s, ma'am."—"But your novel," cried Lady Say and Sele, "is in such a style!—so elegant! I am vastly glad you made it end happily. I hate a novel that don't end happy."—"Yes," said Lady Hawke, with a languid smile, "I was vastly glad when she married Lord Orville. I was sadly afraid it would not have been."—"My sister intends," said Lady Say and Sele, "to print her 'Mausoleum,' just for her own friends and acquaintances."—"Yes," said Lady Hawke; "I have never printed yet."—"I saw Lady Hawke's name," quoth I to my first friend, "ascribed to the play of 'Variety.'"—"Did you indeed?" cried Lady Say, in an ecstasy. "Sister! do you know Miss Burney saw your name in the newspapers, about the play!"—"Did she?" said Lady Hawke, smiling complacently. "But I really did not write it; I never wrote a play in my life."—"Well," cried Lady Say, "but do repeat that sweet part that I am so fond of—you know what I mean; Miss Burney must hear it,—out of your novel, you know!" Lady H.—No, I can't; I have forgot it. Lady S.—Oh, no! I am sure you have not; I insist upon it. Lady H.—But I know you can repeat it yourself; you have so fine a memory; I am sure you can repeat it. Lady S.—Oh, but I should not do it justice! that's all,—I should not do it justice!

Lady Hawke then bent forward, and repeated—"'If, when he made the declaration of his love, the sensibility that beamed in his eyes was felt in his heart, what pleasing sensations and soft alarms might not that tender avowal awaken!'"

"And from what, ma'am," cried I, astonished, and imagining I had mistaken them, "is this taken?" "From my sister's novel!" answered the delighted Lady Say and Sele, expecting my raptures to be equal to her own; "it's in the 'Mausoleum,'—did not you know that? Well, I can't think how you can write these sweet novels! And it's all just like that part. Lord Hawke himself says it's all poetry. For my part, I'm sure I never could write so. I suppose, Miss Burney, you are producing another,—a'n't you?"—"No, ma'am."—"Oh, I dare say you are. I dare say you are writing one at this very minute!"

Mrs. Paradise now came up to me again, followed by a square man, middle-aged, and hum-drum, who, I found, was Lord Say and Sele, afterwards from the Kirwans; for though they introduced him to me, I was so confounded by their vehemence and their manners, that I did not hear his name.

"Miss Burney," said Mrs. P., presenting me to him, "authoress of 'Evelina.'"—"Yes," cried Lady Say and Sele, starting up, "'tis the authoress of 'Evelina!'"—"Of what?" cried he.—"Of 'Evelina.' You'd never think it,—she looks so young, to have so much invention, and such an elegant style! Well, I could write a play, I think, but I'm sure I could never write a novel."—"Oh, yes you could, if you would try," said Lady Hawke.—"Oh, no, I could not," answered she; "I could not get a style—that's the thing—I could not tell how to get a style! and a novel's nothing without a style, you know!"—"Why no," said Lady Hawke; "that's true. But then you write such charming letters, you know!"—"Letters!" repeated Lady S. and S. simpering; "do you think so? Do you know I wrote a long letter to Mrs. Ray just before I came here, this very afternoon—quite a long letter! I did, I assure you!"

Here Mrs. Paradise came forward with another gentleman, younger, slimmer, and smarter, and saying to me, "Sir Gregory Page Turner," said to him, "Miss Burney, authoress of 'Evelina.'"—At which Lady Say and Sele, in fresh transport, again rose, and rapturously again repeated, "Yes, she's authoress of 'Evelina!' Have you read it?"—"No; is it to be had?"—"Oh dear, yes! it's been printed these two years! You'd never think it! But it's the most elegant novel I ever read in my life. Writ in such a style!"—"Certainly," said he, very civilly; "I have every inducement to get it. Pray where is it to be had? everywhere, I suppose?"—"Oh, nowhere, I hope!" cried I, wishing at that moment it had been never in human ken.

My square friend, Lord Say and Sele, then putting his head forward, said, very solemnly—"I'll purchase it!"

This is the climax. We stop here; and have left ourselves very little room for the royalties. Mrs. Delany, whose opinion and judgment deserved to have weight with the queen, must, no doubt, have spoken many good words for her young and celebrated friend, Miss Burney; and their majesties had learned the whole romantic history of the publication of her first novel from Dr. Burney. The story had tickled the king. The author, now rendered doubly famous by the publication of "Cecilia," was living at Windsor, with Mrs. Delany, and in daily perturbation at the idea of being surprised some evening by the king or queen, who often called unceremoniously to have a gossip with their ancient protégé. Several times had she escaped, but she was caught at length, and in this awful wise:—

After dinner, while Mrs. Delany was left alone, as usual, to take a little rest,—for sleep it but seldom proves,—Mr. B. Dewes, his little daughter, Miss Port, and myself, went into the drawing-room. And here, while, to pass the time, I was amusing the little girl with teaching her some Christmas games, in which her father and cousin joined, Mrs. Delany came in. We were all in the middle of the room, and in some confusion;—but she had but just come up to us to inquire what was going forwards, and I was disentangling myself from Miss Dewes, to be ready to fly off if any one knocked at the street-door, when the door of the drawing-room was again opened, and a large man, in deep mourning, appeared at it, entering and shutting it himself without speaking.

A ghost could not more have scared me, when I discovered, by its glitter on the black, a star! The general disorder had prevented his being seen, except by myself, who was always on the watch, till Miss P——, turning round, exclaimed, "The King!—Aunt, the King!"

O mercy! thought I, that I were but out of the room! which way shall I escape! and how pass him unnoticed! There is but the single door, at which he entered, in the room! Every one scampered out of the way: Miss P——, to stand next the door; Mr. Bernard Dewes to a corner opposite it; his little girl clung to me; and Mrs. Delany advanced to meet his Majesty, who, after quietly looking on till she saw him, approached, and inquired how she did.

He then spoke to Mr. Bernard, whom he had already met two or three times here.

I had now retreated to the wall, and purposed gliding softly, though speedily, out of the room; but before I had taken a single step, the King, in a loud whisper to Mrs. Delany, said, "Is that Miss Burney!"—and on her answering "Yes, Sir," he bowed, and with a countenance of the most perfect good humour, came close up to me.

A most profound reverence on my part arrested the progress of my intended retreat.

"How long have you been come back, Miss Burney!"

"Two days, Sir,"

Unluckily he did not hear me, and repeated his question; and whether the second time he heard me or not, I don't know, but he made a little civil inclination of his head, and went back to Mrs. Delany.

After his Majesty had given the old lady an account of the illnesses of all the children, and the hooping-cough of the babies,—the other persons still remaining stuck up "respectful" in their several corners,—he relieved the general distress by going up to the table and looking at a book of prints:—

He turned over a leaf or two, and then said—

"Pray, does Miss Burney draw, too!"

The too was pronounced very civilly.

"I believe not, Sir," answered Mrs. Delany; "at least she does not tell."—"Oh!" cried he laughing, "that's nothing! she is not apt to tell; she never does tell, you know!—Her father told me that himself. He told me the whole history of her Evelina. And I shall never forget his face when he spoke of his feelings at first taking up the book!—he looked quite frightened, just as if he was doing it that moment! I never can forget his face while I live!"

Then coming up close to me he said—

"But what!—what!—how was it!"—"Sir," cried I, not well understanding him.—"How came you—how happened it—what!—what!"—"I—I only wrote, Sir,—for my own amusement,—only in some odd, idle hours."

"But your publishing—your printing—how was that!"—"That was only, Sir,—only because—"

I hesitated most abominably, not knowing how to tell him a long story, and growing terribly confused at these questions;—besides,—to say the truth, his own "what! what!" so reminded me of those vile Probationary Odes, that, in the midst of all my flutter, I was really hardly able to keep my countenance.

The What! was then repeated, with so earnest a look, that, forced to say something, I stammeringly answered—

"I thought—Sir—it would look very well in print!"

I do really flatter myself this is the silliest speech I ever made! I am quite provoked with myself for it; but a fear of laughing made me eager to utter anything, and by no means conscious, till I had spoken, of what I was saying.

He laughed very heartily himself,—well he might—and walked away to enjoy it, crying out,

"Very fair, indeed! that's being very fair and honest!"

Then, returning to me again, he said,

"But your father—how came you not to show him what you wrote!"—"I was too much ashamed of it, Sir, seriously."

Literal truth that, I am sure.

"And how did he find it out!"—"I don't know myself, Sir. He never would tell me."

Literal truth again, my dear father, as you can testify.

"But how did you get it printed!"—"I sent it, Sir, to a bookseller my father never employed, and that I never had seen myself, Mr. Lowndes, in full hope by that means he never would hear of it."—"But how could you manage that!"—"By means of a brother, Sir."—"O!—you confided in a brother, then!"—"Yes, Sir—that is for the publication."—"What entertainment you must have had from hearing people's conjectures, before you were known! Do you remember any of them!"—"Yes, Sir, many."—"And what!"—"I heard that Mr. Baretti laid a wager it was written by a man; for no woman, he said, could have kept her own counsel."

This diverted him extremely.

This is quite enough of it. The conversation, however, passed off extremely well, and before it was ended,—

A violent thunder was made at the door. I was almost certain it was the queen. Once more I would have given anything to escape; but in vain. I had been informed that nobody ever quitted the royal presence after having been conversed with, till motioned to withdraw.

Miss P——, according to established etiquette on these occasions, opened the door, which she stood next by putting her hand behind her, and slid out, backwards into the hall, to light the queen in. The door soon opened again, and her majesty entered.

Immediately seeing the king, she made him a low courtsey, and cried—

"Oh, your majesty is here!"

"Yes," he cried, "I ran here, without speaking to anybody."

She then hastened up to Mrs. Delany, with both her hands held out, saying—

"My dear Mrs. Delany, how are you!"

Instantly after, I felt her eye on my face. I believe too, she curtsied to me; but though I saw the bend, was too near-sighted to be sure it was intended for me I was hardly ever in a situation more embarrassing; dared not return what I was not certain I had received yet considered myself as appearing quite a monster, t stand stiff-necked, if really meant.

Almost at the same moment, she spoke to Mr. Ber nard Dewes, and then nodded to my little clinging girl

I was now really ready to sink, with horrid uncer tainty of what I was doing, or what I should do—whe his majesty, who I fancy saw my distress, most goo humouredly said to the queen something, but I was to much flurried to remember what, except these words- "I have been telling Miss Burney—"

Relieved from so painful a dilemma, I immediatel dropped a curtsey. She made one to me in the sam moment, and, with a very smiling countenance, came t to me; but she could not speak, for the king went o talking, eagerly and very gaily, repeating to her ever word I had said during our conversation upon "Evelina its publication, &c. &c.

Then he told her of Baretti's wager, saying—"Bu she heard of a great many conjectures about the autho before it was known, and of Baretti, an admirabl thing!—he laid a bet it must be a man, as no woman, h said, could have kept her own counsel."

The queen, laughing a little, exclaimed—

"Oh, that is quite too bad an affront to us!—Don you think so!" addressing herself to me, with grea gentleness of voice and manner.

Their majesties had both intended to scrutinize Miss Burney well, and to ascertain the extent of her accomplishments. She did not draw. She did not play :—

"Are you sure you never play?—never touch the keys at all?"—"Never to acknowledge it, Sir."

"Oh! that's it!" cried he; and flying to the queen, cried, "She does play—but not to acknowledge it!"

I was now in a most horrible panic once more; pushed so very home, I could answer no other than I did, for these categorical questions almost constrain categorical answers; and here, at Windsor, it seems an absolute point that whatever they ask must be told, and whatever they desire must be done. Think but, then, of my consternation, in expecting their commands to perform! My dear father, pity me!

The eager air with which he returned to me fully explained what was to follow. I hastily, therefore, spoke first, in order to stop him, crying, "I never, Sir, played to anybody but myself—never!"—"No?" cried he, looking incredulous; "what, not to ——?"—"Not even to me, Sir?" cried my kind Mrs. Delany, who saw what was threatening me. "No?—are you sure?" cried he, disappointed; "but—but you'll——"—"I have never, Sir," cried, I very earnestly, "played in my life, but when I could hear nobody else—quite alone, and from a mere love of any musical sounds."

He repeated all this to the queen, whose answers I never heard; but when he once more came back, with a face that looked unwilling to give it up, in my fright I had recourse to dumb show, and raised my hands in a supplicating fold, with a most begging countenance, to be excused. This, luckily, succeeded; he understood me very readily, and laughed a little, but made a sort of desisting, or rather complying, little bow, and said no more about it.

I felt very much obliged to him, for I saw his curiosity was all alive.

The queen makes a much better figure in these conversations than the king. Of her majesty, at this first interview, it is reported :—

The Queen, indeed, is a most charming woman. She appears to me full of sense and graciousness, mingled with delicacy of mind and liveliness of temper. She speaks English almost perfectly well, with great choice and copiousness of language, though now and then with foreign idiom, and frequently with a foreign accent. Her manners have an easy dignity, with a most engaging simplicity; and she has all that fine high breeding which the mind, not the station, gives, of carefully avoiding to distress those who converse with her, or studiously removing the embarrassment she cannot prevent.

The King, however he may have power, in the cabinet, to command himself, has, in private, the appearance of a character the most open and sincere. He speaks his opinions without reserve, and seems to trust them intuitively to his hearers, from a belief they will make no ill use of them. His countenance is full of inquiry, to gain information without asking it, probably from believing that to be the nearest road to truth. All I saw of both was the most perfect good humour, good spirits, ease, and pleasantness.

These unceremonious calls, to tell Mrs. Delany how the children were, had, however, their own prescribed ceremonial :—

In the evening, while Mrs. Delany, Miss P——, and I were sitting and working together in the drawing-room, the door was opened, and the King entered.

We all started up; Miss P—— flew to her modest post by the door, and I to my more comfortable one opposite the fire, which caused me but a slight and gentle retreat, and Mrs. Delany he immediately commanded to take her own place again.

Our party being so small, he made all that passed general; for though he principally addressed himself to Mrs. Delany, he always looked round to see that we heard him, and frequently referred to us.

I should mention, though, the etiquette always observed upon his entrance, which, first of all, is to fly off to distant quarters; and next, Miss P—— goes out, walking backwards, for more candles, which she brings in, two at a time, and places upon the tables and pianoforte. Next she goes out for tea, which she then carries to his Majesty, upon a large salver, containing sugar, cream, and bread and butter, and cake, while she hangs a napkin over her arm for his fingers.

When he has taken his tea, she returns to her station, where she waits till he has done, and then takes away his cup, and fetches more.

This, it seems, is a ceremony performed, in other places, always by the mistress of the house; but here, neither of their Majesties will permit Mrs. Delany to attempt it.

The conversation turned on literature, and Voltaire. The king condemned him strongly, and Miss Burney, as in duty bound, thought him a "monster;" and then they turned to Rousseau, who fared not quite so badly. Miss Burney was here able to say :—

"Some gratitude, Sir," said I, "he was not without. When my father was in Paris, which was after Rousseau had been in England, he visited him, in his garret, and the first thing he showed him was your Majesty's portrait over his chimney."

The King paused a little while upon this; but nothing more was said of Rousseau.

His Majesty declared himself an enthusiast for Mrs. Siddons; but as for Shakspeare!

"Was there ever," cried he, "such stuff as great part of Shakspeare? only one must not say so! But what think you?—What?—Is there not sad stuff? What?—what?"

"Yes, indeed, I think so, Sir, though mixed with such excellencies, that—"

"O!" cried he, laughing good-humouredly, "I know it is not to be said! but it's true. Only it's Shakspeare, and nobody dare abuse him."

Then he enumerated many of the characters and parts of plays that he objected to; and when he had run them over, finished with again laughing, and exclaiming, "But one should be stoned for saying so!" . . .

His majesty stayed near two hours, and then wished Mrs. Delany good night, and having given me a bow, shut the door himself, to prevent Mrs. Delany, or even me, from attending him out, and, with only Miss P——to wait upon him, put on his own great coat in the passage, and walked away to the lower lodge, to see the Princess Elizabeth, without carriage or attendant. He is a pattern of modest, but manly superiority to rank.

So much for a king putting on his own great-coat. Next day the Queen talked of Madame de Genlis, who had not yet lost caste; and who was then and long afterwards a great authority in education. She sent the Queen of England all her books as they appeared. Her Majesty inquired if Madame de Genlis was about any new work.

"Yes, ma'am; one which she intends 'pour le peuple.'"—"Ah, that will be a good work. Have you heard of—?" (mentioning some German book, of which I forget the name.)—"No, ma'am."—"O, it will be soon translated; very fine language,—very bad book. They translate all our worst! And they are so improved in language; they write so finely now, even for the most silly books, that it makes one read on, and one cannot help it. O, I am very angry sometimes at that! Do you like the 'Sorrows of Werter?"—"I—I have not read it, ma'am, only in part."—"No! Well, I don't know how it is translated, but it is very finely writ in German, and I can't bear it."—"I am very happy to hear that, for what I did look over made me determine never to read it. It seemed only writ as a deliberate defence of suicide."—"Yes; and what is worse, it is done by a bad man for revenge."

She then mentioned, with praise, another book, saying,

—"I wish I knew the translator."—"I wish the translator knew that!"—"O—it is not—I should not like to give my name, for fear I have judged ill; I picked it up on a stall. O, it is amazing what good books there are on stalls."—"It is amazing to me," said Mrs. Delany, "to hear that."—"Why, I don't pick them up myself; but I have a servant very clever; and if they are not to be had at the booksellers', they are not for me any more than for another."

She then spoke of Klopstock's "Messiah," saying it contained four lines most perfect on religion.

"How I should like to see it. Is it translated?" asked Mrs. Delany, turning to me. "Ill:" said her Majesty: "there is a story of Lazarus and the Centurion's daughter; and another young lady, Asyddel, he calls her; and Lazarus is in love; a very pretty scene—no stopping; but it is out of place;—I was quite angry to read it. And a long conversation between Christ and Lazarus—very strange!"—"Yet Milton does that."—"Yes."

And then she went on discussing Milton: this led to Wickliffe, and Cranmer; and she spoke of the Roman Catholic superstitions.

"O, so odd! Can it signify to God Almighty if I eat a piece of fish or a piece of meat? And, one of the Queen of France's sisters wears the heel of her shoe before, for a penance; as if God Almighty could care for that!"—"It is supposing in Him the caprice of a fine lady."—"Yes, just so. Yet it is amusing, and pretty too, how sincere the lower people are, of the Catholics."

And her Majesty told some anecdotes of the kindly superstitions of the Catholics. Would that ladies, as Protestant and as pious as Queen Charlotte, could be made to extend this "What can it signify," to other points in the creed of their neighbours and themselves, certainly not much more important, though they keep society in hot water.

In a few weeks Miss Burney received her flattering appointment, to the great delight of her father. Her own joy was chastened with fear, and a just apprehension of the nature of the splendid slavery upon which she was entering. Yet a salary of £200 a-year, a footman kept for her, apartments in the palace, a coach between her and her colleague, and "many comforts," were some compensation for the loss of liberty. The volume closes with her receiving the congratulation of the ladies of the household, on her appointment, so that the whole of her Court life is yet to come. Her idea of this enviable condition may be gathered from a letter to her sister:—

You would never believe—you, who, distant from courts and courtiers, know nothing of their ways,—the many things to be studied, for appearing with a proper propriety before crowned heads. Heads without crowns are quite other sort of rotundas.

Now, then, to the etiquette. I inquired into every particular, that no error might be committed. And as there is no saying what may happen in this mortal life, I shall give you those instructions I have received myself, that, should you find yourself in the royal presence, you may know how to comport yourself.

Directions for coughing, sneezing, or moving, before the King and Queen.

In the first place, you must not cough. If you find a cough tickling in your throat, you must arrest it from making any sound; if you find yourself choking with the forbearance, you must choke—but not cough.

In the second place, you must not sneeze. If you have a vehement cold, you must take no notice of it; if your nose-membranes feel a great irritation, you must hold your breath; if a sneeze still insists upon making its way, you must oppose it, by keeping your teeth grinding together; if the violence of the repulse breaks some blood-vessel, you must break the blood-vessel—but not sneeze.

In the third place, you must not, upon any account, stir either hand or foot. If, by chance, a black pin runs into your head, you must not take it out. If the pain is very great, you must be sure to bear it without wincing; if it brings the tears into your eyes, you must not wipe them off; if they give you a tingling by running down your cheeks, you must look as if nothing was the matter. If the blood should gush from your head by means of the black pin, you must let it gush; if you are uneasy to think of making such a blurred appearance, you must be uneasy, but you must say nothing about it. If, however, the agony is very great, you may, privately, bite the inside of your cheek, or of your lips, for a little relief; taking care, meanwhile, to do it so cautiously as to make no apparent dent outwardly. And, with that precaution, if you even gnaw a piece out, it will not be minded, only be sure either to swallow it, or commit it to a corner of the inside of your mouth till they are gone—for you must not spit.

I have many other directions, but no more paper; I will endeavour, however, to have them ready for you in time.

We are relieved of our fears of Madame D'Arblay's editor suppressing too much of her aunt's Court Journal. The truth seems, that there is little in her discreet records that requires either pruning or suppression. There is no scandal; and the general tone becomes even more honeyed than her early jottings.

Yet, from her Court Journal, discreet though it may be, we still anticipate great pleasure. One of the most amusing books in the French language was written by a lively woman in nearly the same position at Versailles, as that in which Miss Burney, with equal abilities and wit, was placed at the English Court. The book to which we refer, the Memoirs of Madame de Staël, is as instructive as it is witty. She was the very Gil Blas of waiting-gentlewomen.

We had marked out a great many little detached sketches and mots in the volume, but our space is already gone, and we must be content with the first that occurs. This is by Mrs. Thrale:—

Somebody told me (but not your father) that the opera singers would not be likely to get any money out of Sheridan this year. "Why, that fellow grows fat,' says I, "like Heliogabalus, upon the tongues of nightingales." Did I tell you that bright thing before! Ah Burney! if I was well I would make a little fun yet but I cannot get well.

This glance at past celebrities, is by Miss Burney:—

"I went afterwards, by long appointment, to Mr. Burrows's to meet Mr. and Mrs. Barbauld. Mrs. Chapone carried me.

Mrs. Chapone herself is the most superiorly unaffected creature you can conceive, and full of agrémens from good sense, talents, and conversational powers, in defiance of age, infirmities, and uncommon ugliness. I really love as well as admire and esteem her.

SONGS OF THE MONTHS.

NO. IV.—THE SONG OF APRIL.

1.

In my harlequin jacket I come,
I come!
To the world's dance of folly I come.
Sunshine to the ardent, and snow to the cold,
Hail-sleet to the heartless, and warmth to the old;
To the innocent, blooming in manhood and youth,
A blending of beauties, a vision of truth.
A skip-jack withal; a sage, and a seer;
Of spring-flowers the cradle, of winter the bier.
Do you shake your bells at me? Be mum,
Be mum!
Lord! Lord! what a poor addled cerebellum!

2.

From feeble old age, to the tyro at school,
My natals are bruited the birth of a fool;
But I'll hold you my motley, and dagger,—a new one—
That I am but the sham fool, and you are the true one.
Now cherish that wisdom, 'tis better than pelf,
The pollen of knowledge, thou knowest thyself.
So our mummings must cease, for though fools can be merry,
And witty, and pointed, and politic, very!
I will doff my devices,—your fooling's so real,
'Tis bootless to beat you with bladders ideal!

3.

A sage am I, sometimes severe,
Chiding with storms, like Autumn sere;
But whoso feels my task of sorrow,
His my sunny balm shall be,
To-morrow—and again to-morrow,
In Love's fond continuity
Yes, an advent shall come when my anger is past,
Where the clouds shall be folded, and hushed be the blast;
For the moments are mine, when enraptured you trace
The cloud-islands float through the azure of space;
While Titans that people the shadowy clime
Pile mountain on mountain—the vast and sublime.
There, the Daughter of April shall summons her fays,
To build her an arch of Sol's delicate rays;
And her triumph shall be—while the Titans must weep,
Till their castles are hurled from their crags to the deep.

4.

A change in my bearing—a change
From daggled November to fervid July;
The swallow shall twitter, the butterfly range,
And the cuckoo enliven the woods with his cry:
And placid, serene,
As a midsummer e'en,
I will call you abroad my sweet mood to enjoy.
Apparel you lightly
When day has arisen,
And leave that unsightly,
Parched hearth of your prison.
I will smile like an angel as forward you roam,
And howl like a devil to hurry you home.
The keen North-east shall level
Your pride with his flail,
(How to thrash and to winnow, what peasant so well knows!)
In your joints he shall revel,
And pelt you with hail,
Till your carcass is sore from the heels to the elbows;
Pills, powders, and potions—phials, labels and physic,
Shall be your reward—with the ague or phthysick.

5.

Glen, garden, and wild wood
Shall smile as I tread,
And the light feet of childhood
Go weary to bed;
For no irksome dwelling
Their souls shall confine,
While I am compelling,
Sweet flowers, they are mine.
They are mine! for fair April hath o'er them a spell,
They love me! they love me! for me shall rebel:
They shall slink from your homesteads, and, truants for hours,
Return with my birds' nests, and baskets of flowers.
And those who are sinking
In haste to the grave,
Whose young hearts are drinking
The draught all must have:
When my breath is the blandest
That ushers the eve;
And my banners the grandest
That spring-tide can weave;
They shall ask for my blossoms
Once more, with a sigh,
And, while prest to their bosoms,
Shall kiss them, and die.
So April shall teach you that holiness blends
With the fool that you twit, and the truth that offends.

LITERARY REGISTER.

The Congregational Lecture. Eighth Series. The Theology of the Early Christian Church. By James Bennett, D.D. Jackson and Walford.

The institution of this Lecture was a notable step in advance taken by the Congregationalists. The several volumes of the printed Lectures have shown the world that the ministers of this denomination, who have long obtained all credit for piety and sincerity, have equal claims to sound theological and biblical learning.

From the nature of the subject, The Theology of the first Ages of the Christian Church, this series of Lectures abounds in rare and curious matter; the fruit of the most elaborate research. The selected opinions of the early Christian authorities on the various doctrines and points of theology and discipline are translated almost literally from the originals. In turning over the recorded authorities during the first three centuries of the Christian era, the first thing with which the reader is struck, is to find how soon those corruptions crept into the Christian system, both in doctrines and morals, from which it is yet far from being purified.

We should like much to give a few instructive specimens of this learned, and not abstruse, book; though we are, in a manner, limited to what is curious or entertaining in it, and not at liberty to select what might be more edifying. First, we shall cite the wild opinions held by the early Christian Fathers about the nature and condition of Angels.

These were supposed by some to be, like the forms presented to the patriarchs, produced for the occasion and then destroyed, which Justin, however, refutes. But he argues in a way that Trypho, if a real Jew, and acquainted with Hebrew, must have known to be very foolish. For Isaiah, xxx. 4, which we properly render according to the original—"His princes were at Zoan, and his ambassadors came to Hanes;" Justin quotes according to the Septuagint:—"For there are in Tanes princes, evil angels;" which is made a proof that Egypt was inhabited by evil spirits. Justin, indeed, opens to us a mystery which, perhaps, he learned from Josephus and others, and in which not a few agreed with him, that the fall of angels was the effect of the beauty of women.

"The fruits of the earth are under the power of man; but man himself was placed under the providence of the angels, who, having fallen in love with women, begat from them children, who are called demons, who have enslaved the human race by magic writings, by terrors, and by doctrines concerning sacrifices, and incense, and libations; of which they have become greedy since their subjection to lust." Hence he accounts for the doctrine of the poets concerning the births and amours of the gods; as Lucian ludicrously exhibits the gods gaping to swallow the smoke from the altars, and like flies licking up the blood of the victims.

To this, which was no private opinion of Justin, but the Catholic doctrine of the day, Clement of Alexandria adds a very natural thought:—"That these seduced angels set Samson an example, by letting out their secrets to their mistresses; so that what the chaste angels wished to reserve to the coming of the Lord—i. e., the doctrine of Providence, and the revelation of sublime things—had been already blabbed by the philosophers." . . . . . The same vile theology is found in Tertullian, and also in Lactantius, the Christian Cicero, and tutor to the sons of Constantine. Tillemont traces this to Josephus; but whether the fathers derived it from him, or the apocryphal book of Enoch, or from a misconception of Genesis, vi. 2, it was never questioned, and seems to have been the pillar, if not the basis, of their false doctrine of chastity. The saints, who were to be angels upon earth, were to guard against imitating the angels from heaven, who, seduced by women, let out their secrets to the uninitiated.

The Alexandrian, in his Pædagogue, tells the disciples, that "angels are an example of the consequences of lust; for, leaving the divine beauty for the sake of that which fadeth, they have been so long fallen from heaven to earth." We omit Origen's doctrine of angels, because it forms a part of the heresy with which he is charged; and as we have already observed that Athenagoras adopted Justin's theory, the words of the Athenian have not been transcribed. Tertullian, however, may be allowed to say, "I propose one thing—that they were angels which were those deserters of God, lovers of women, betrayers of this curiosity; therefore also condemned by God." Another occasion of introducing this doctrine will occur.

But the notion of a twofold fall of angels, though implied, is not clearly announced. As Justin understands the Apostle Paul to mean by "the prince of the power of the air" the angel to whom that element was committed; so Clement of Alexandria seems to think that the angel of gross matter was the author of the second fall; and in this Athenagoras agrees.

The demons that sprang from angels and women are supposed, of course, to be hybrid; so that it is difficult to describe their properties. They, however, inhabit heathen temples, animating the idols, dictating oracles, and feasting on the nidor of the sacrifices. This gave a double horror to idolatry; for, beside being an offence to God, it was almost a direct adoration of devils.

Origen, who seems mortified by his adversary's appeal to the fictions of the book of Enoch, is not satisfied with his own remark, that the book was not understood; for he also mentions some one who thought the text, "The sons of God saw the daughters of men," referred to souls, metaphorically called the sons of God, desiring to have a bodily life; which bodily life again must be metaphorically meant by the phrase, "daughters of men." But Origen dismisses this also, as a solution that he could not strongly recommend; a specimen of the uncertainty of the fathers, who are obtruded as the only expositors who can make us certain.

The character and functions of bishops in the early ages of Christianity—the true successors of the Apostles, if any class of men may be so called—are thus described:

As there was originally but one church formed in each place, whether city, or village; when they became too numerous for one congregation, they were naturally reluctant to separate into more, and the bishop, as naturally, wishing to keep the whole charge to himself, gave to separation the name of schism. Augustine was distinguished by his readiness to form new churches under their own bishops. But as in small villages there were bishops, they assembled by hundreds, as the list of the councils show. These chorepiscopi, or country bishops, were afterwards suppressed; for the avowed purpose of maintaining the honour of the episcopal title, by confining it to those who had the care of churches in large places, where population, with its wealth, could give dignity and importance to the bishop. The Council of Sardica thus decreed "that the name and authority of bishops should not be brought into contempt."

"Let him that readeth understand." Wherever there was a church, there was a bishop; and wherever there was a congregation, there was a church. There were as many bishops, therefore, as Christian congregations, and, consequently, many poor bishops; because pastors of village churches. Though this raised no blush on the cheeks of those who remembered that God had chosen the poor of this world; when, as religion declined, episcopal pride increased, the bishops of the cities, by their own decree, without any pretence to scriptural right, laid violent hands on hundreds or thousands of churches, and killed them outright. They were no longer independent churches with their own bishops, for these were unbishoped, pronounced in the ninth century no bishops at all; and their charges, or flocks, unchurched, become nondescript things, for which neither the Scriptures nor the earliest fathers furnish a name. From primaries, shining by their own light, they were made secondaries, reflecting the glory of some civic luminary, who boasted of being called of God as was Aaron, and, like him, possessing a rod that swallowed up all competitors. This aggrandizement of the episcopal rank it would be difficult to overrate; but with what face could the diocesan bishops afterwards complain of a patriarch, or pope, for attempting to swallow them up in their turn? Modern days have heard loud complaints of the presumption of parliaments in cutting up bishoprics, annihilating the old, and fabricating new ones; and on the right, or justice, we give no opinion; but ministers of state may say to bishops, "Who set us the example?" If these reply, "But we complain of it as an act of the state;" secular men may ask, "In what text of Scripture, or sentence from an early father, can you prove even the right of bishops to annihilate others?" Let both church and state remember that the power which can do this to one, can do it to all.

There is, however, one bright spot in this wholesale extinction of bishops and churches. It was honest. For this thing was not done in a corner. No hypocritical mask was worn by the actors; for they tell us plainly how and why they did the deed. By a synodical decree, to enhance the honour of the bishops, the poor ones were put out of the way. Here let the reader pause and meditate; for volumes of instruction lie open to his view. If a church and a bishop may be annihilated because they belong to a village, has not Rome advanced far towards the day when her church and bishop may cease to be? She is even now a village compared to her former self; and if Protestants, chiefly English, should cease to spend in her their gold, another council may decide that a chorepiscous ought no longer to exist.

The Elements of a Christian Church.

The materials of which the church is composed, or the qualities that constitute a genuine member, are thus expressed: "But the virtue which embraces the church, as the Shepherd (of Hermas) speaks, is faith, by which the elect of God are saved." Here is a reference to one supposed to be so early as the Hermas of Paul. Clement of Rome addresses the church of the Corinthians as "elect, sanctified by the will of God." Polycarp, too, assumes that the church of Philippi was composed of such persons. Ignatius writes to the Trallians as "elect, having peace through the flesh and blood of Christ;" to the Romans as "illuminated through the will of God;" to the Philadelphians as "rejoicing in the sufferings of our Lord;" and to the Smyrnæans as "filled with faith and love."

Justin Martyr describes a Christian society as consisting of holy men. Irenæus says, "Where the church is, there is also the Spirit of God; and where the Spirit of God, there is the church and all grace, but the Spirit is truth." Origen tells Celsus, "There are everywhere instituted (arranged in polities) churches, (assemblies, or congregations,) opposite to the churches, or congregations, of the superstitious and wicked." "Many such are arranged everywhere in the churches of the cities. They are as lights in the world. Who would not confess that even the worst of those that are of the church are better than those assemblies among the people?"

A church, consisting of the indiscriminate mass of a nation, where the great majority have no semblance of Christian character, would have astounded the early fathers; though their successors were by degrees familiarized, but not always reconciled, to the mischievous perversion of terms. If we adopt the most moderate hypothesis, and give the name of a church to a society that has a majority of its members visibly answering to the scriptural description of a Christian, even though they should not excommunicate the wicked, which, however, would anciently have unchurched them; still we could not make the best nation upon earth and a Christian church commensurate; for no country has ever yet been able to show that a majority of its inhabitants were real Christians.

The Millenium.

The notion of a millenium sprung up early among the ancient Christian Fathers, though there is no identity nor even coherence in their extravagant notions of its nature. The idea appears to have been originally borrowed from the Jewish Rabbies. The theories of Justin, Papias, Tertullian, and Irenæus, differed from each other. The notions of Irenæus, on a single point, may serve for a sample of these extravagancies:—

Irenæus, after some puerile comments, derived from a false translation, proceeds thus: "These are in the times of the kingdom, on the seventh day, which is sanctified," meaning the seventh thousandth year. "Therefore, the benediction predicted, without contradiction, pertains to the times of the kingdom, when the just, rising from the dead, shall reign; when also, the creature, renovated and liberated, shall fructify abundance of food, by the dew of heaven and the fertility of the earth. The days shall come in which vines shall grow, each having ten thousand branches, and in one branch, ten thousand shoots; and in every shoot, ten thousand bunches; and in every bunch, ten thousand grapes; and every grape, expressed, will yield twenty-five metretas, or firkins of wine. And when any of the saints shall lay hold of a bunch, another will cry out, 'I am a better bunch; take me, and, by me, bless the Lord.'" Of the grain, also, a similar story is told, which it would be a waste of time to repeat.

"These things, Papias, an old man, a companion of Polycarp, testifies, by the Scripture, in the fourth of his books. These things are credible to believers." Irenæus attempts to prove them by the prophecy of Isaiah concerning "the lion lying down with the lamb."

He blames those who attempt to allegorize this; for fables must be taken literally; facts only are to be turned into allegories. He quotes the apocryphal Baruch in support of his theory. "A new Jerusalem shall come down out of heaven, of which that in Palestine was an image. Then, all the renovated shall dwell in the city of God, not allegorically, as we have shown."

We have not given the whole of this long and prosing fable, which was not the offspring of the author's own imagination, but came to him by tradition, not from the apostles, but from apocryphal writers, chiefly the fictitious Barnabas. But when Irenæus contended for the literal meaning of his millennial vine, did he include the speaking bunches of grapes that yield a firkin each? They were not water drinkers who revelled in these bacchanalian fancies; but were certainly open to the censure that Middleton is blamed for flinging upon Justin, as teaching a Millennium of sensual delights. It is unquestionable, that, with all the ultra-angelic spirituality of these fathers, and all their compulsory fasting, they hoped to make up for it in the New Jerusalem, as all pretences to soar above the divine rule, end in sinking far below.

The Authority of the Fathers.

It will be observed that Dr. Bennett has no overweening or superstitious reverence for these primitive Fathers. Passing even much higher authorities, from Augustine down to Owen and Edwards, he looks admiringly to the period when "the children of Time's old age will be the Fathers."

The following passage on the so-called authority of the Fathers is peculiarly apt at the present moment:—

What is now called the authority of the Fathers was, to the earliest of them, unknown, and is a modern doctrine palmed upon the world under a false name. Not one of them, whether early or late, ever mentions his own authority, which, if true, they should have taught, as the apostles asserted theirs; because it is due to Christ and to his church, to inform us who are the authoritative expositors of his will. The mere silence of the fathers on this point would be enough to degrade them from the throne; but they speak, and tell aloud their own want of authority, appealing to the Scriptures as the word of the Lord, which demands the study and obedience of the whole church. Here, with the two Clements, Polycarp, Ignatius, Justin, Irenæus, Origen, Tertullian, Cyprian, we take our stand, leaving to innovators the melancholy glory of venturing to abandon the ancient faith in the sole authority of the Word of God.

The earliest fathers attached the true idea to the Greek word ἐκκλησία, and always considered a church to be a congregation, or assembly, convoked or evoked out of a promiscuous mass. Those who belonged to this assembly were called by its name, even after its session had broken up, and its members were dispersed; and all such assemblies scattered over the whole world, were called the catholic churches, when their distinct localities were in view, but the church, when the identity of their faith was considered, and their relation to Christ, as one body, of which he was the sole head.

The phrase congregational church, then, is pleonastic, being little else than a church church; but such pleonasms become necessary, when time and events have deprived a noun of its radical signification, which must then be conveyed by an adjective, that originally, being unnecessary, would have appeared absurd. That the earliest fathers meant, by A church, a single worshipping assembly, and, by THE church, the aggregate of a number of complete churches, alike independent of each other's authority, and dependent upon Christ alone, can be demonstrated, if that word may ever be employed beyond the bounds of mathematics.

Having seen that what are now called congregational are the original churches, not only of the Scriptures, but of the first three hundred years, we may proceed to observe that even the most strenuous opponents of this truth, have not been able entirely to banish or abandon the idea of an independent church.

But this reasoning we cannot follow. Instead of it we copy out another isolated, but apt passage—apt to the present times of delusion. The lecturer has been describing the heresies of Tertullian, who was cast out of the Church, and comes to what he designates modern Tertullianism:—

There is a far better apology to be made for the Montanist, that, with all his fanaticism, he still regards the Scriptures as the standard of faith and practice; for "this is the work of the Paraclete, that the Scriptures may be revealed." He supposed that they were imperfectly understood, which was, alas, too true. Yet the man who had the most extravagant notions of the inspiration of his new sect still considers that it was not to give additions to revelation, or make us independent of it; but was to reveal what was contained in Scripture, though not known to the church. This is less fanatical than the theory of unwritten traditions, which, by sharing, would supersede the authority of the word of God.

But they who set up a later age as the standard, the maturity of Christianity, share the common fate of error, to promote, in spite of themselves, the cause of truth. They declare that theirs is not the apostolic church, for they abandon this as too rude and simple; and when they talk of the fathers, they mean not those who are so by eminence, but such as are not even good sons; for they belonged to an age which they themselves pronounced so corrupt, that Antichrist might be immediately expected; and if we believe them, we should bless him who "determined the times before appointed, and fixed the bounds of our habitations," that he has not cast our lot on such days.

But we are witnessing the downward course of error. The Scriptures are first forsaken, as the records of an age too simple, the history of churches too pure and too independent to please a hierarchy; the apostolical fathers next are chosen, instead of the apostles; but it is soon found that the same objections again occur, and therefore the ground is changed again; the sons of those fathers are made the standard, but only to be abandoned for their sons again, till it is impossible to say what is meant by the church of the fathers.

Let not the student of the Scriptures, then, shrink from the contest concerning the opinions of the ancients. Antiquity is most to be dreaded by those who vaunt it most, for they would be the last to restore the primitive times. The sanctuary in which the fathers are enthroned is a crypt, for, like other antique idols, they cannot bear the light. Their theology is often so heterodox, their expositions of Scripture so absurd and contradictory, and their chastity so obscene, that he who would dethrone them has but to bring a blazing torch into their shrines, and show to the crouching multitude what it is they have adored. Their high priests, like the Chinese, offer scraps of gilded paper, but would not dare to publish in the vernacular tongue all that the fathers have written, nor consent to be bound by all that they have prescribed.

Mortality is never more cruelly mocked than when exalted to the throne of Deity. The attributes of humanity that might have been esteemed, or at least tolerated, among other men, are then contrasted with the perfections of the divinity assumed, and for a respectable man we have a ridiculous God. The misfortunes of the fathers demand our candour and our pity, but most unfortunate have they been in the worship they have received; for it has placed them on an elevation which they cannot bear, and has compelled those who would have apologized for their simple opinions to despise their pretended oracles. . . . . .

At the modern attempts to bring back the church to that period of her history when corruptions had become rampant, we may frown, because it is guilty; but we may smile, too, for it is futile. The conspirators may not choose to go higher than to Cyprian, or even the Nicene fathers, or may appeal to earlier writers, only to praise their blots; but who would let the foe dictate the tactics of both armies? Have they appealed to the fathers? To the fathers they shall go; to the fathers of those whom some delight to call the fathers. "He that taketh the wise in their own craftiness" will thus "teach them by the briars of the wilderness" that they have raised spirits which they cannot lay. "Truth," says Tertullian, "dreads nothing but concealment;" and we have only to tell the whole truth, in order to put down the attempt to bring us again into bondage to crafty priests. Let the fathers by eminence speak, and let the world, as well as the church, hear, if patience will hold out to the end. Translate; print; publish; explain; tell all.

It will then be seen that the world has been imposed upon by those who appealed to the fathers, to avoid the Scriptures, aware that the people could more easily study for themselves a single book translated into most tongues, than procure or read a library in the dead languages. But it must be shown that corruption can no more claim the fathers than the Scriptures. How the advocates for error shun the testimony of the divine Word is not sufficiently known.

What, then, can we think of those who . . seeking to bring back our countrymen, not as they pr . . the state of the primitive church, but to the days o. bewailed a degeneracy which is now, in spite . own counter testimony, set up as the standard of pu. To the fanaticism of another Shilo, and a preten. miraculous gift of tongues, has at length succeeded, not a new delusion, but a revival of the old, which, under the patronage of moderate learning and semi-asceticism, is making its boast of the fathers. Some, it is to be feared, know whither they are tending, and keep the dome of St. Peter's steadily in view; but others, hoodwinked, are pursuing the same course, without seeing their road, or their end. Have the fires of Smithfield burned in vain! Was not the horror of Popery which they created just and salutary, a merciful reaction produced by him who confounds the counsels of the ungodly? Can the system which introduced that blot on the Christian name, the burning of men for heretics, which Rome has never disavowed, any longer pretend to be the religion of the merciful Saviour, who told those that would call fire from heaven, that they knew not what spirit they were of? Can these be sincere men, who, eating the bread of a Protestant church, labour to undo the work of the Reformation, and, by Jesuitical expositions, supplant the articles they have subscribed? Would they, if successful in establishing their priestly domination, use it less cruelly than their predecessors? Would it not again be said, that "he who crept in like a fox ruled like a lion, till he was hated like a dog"?* Shall our countrymen be left to rush back to Egypt, unobstructed, unwarned? Our protest may be unheeded, perhaps unheard; but, at least, we should be able to say, "We have delivered our souls; their blood is on their own heads."

To those who are not deceivers, but deceived, especially the professors of evangelical truth, who have attempted to amalgamate it with the prevailing semi-popery, it is but a Christian duty to address a word of expostulatory warning. Your sincere concern for the salvation of the soul, and your reverence for the will of God, is abused by men who hate the doctrines you (once, at least) held dear. You know not whither you are tending; for the truths which awakened you from carelessness, or inspired you with peace, will be swallowed up in that false confidence in rites and forms from which you erst deemed it a mercy to have escaped. The regenerating grace of the Spirit, which made "the preaching of the cross the power of God to salvation," you are now learning to identify with baptism, which, you know, leaves millions to "live without God in the world." For justification by faith, which formerly was to you glad tidings, the leaders of your new party are openly substituting justification by the sacraments, never avowed till Trent employed it to countermine Luther. Once you saw Christ in heaven, as your only sacrifice, priest, and altar; and can you now bow down to an altar of stone, or wood; call ministers by the name of priests, which Christ never gave to them; and talk of offering again that sacrifice which "he offered once for all?" "Are ye so foolish? having begun in the spirit, are ye now made perfect by the flesh?" Are ye aware of the "beggarly elements to which you desire to be in bondage?" Are you ready to go all the way back to Rome, that you are adopting, one after another, her essential principles, till a crafty Jesuit, meeting you on your own ground, would draw you over the frontier, ere ever you were aware? And all this, under the false colours of the church of the fathers! Have you ever read the fathers? Are you so well acquainted with their voluminous writings as to secure yourselves from being imposed upon, by extracts obtruded upon you, in the hope that you will not be able to judge of them for yourselves? Can you suppose that, if this were the road to truth, the apostles would not have referred us to the fathers? Has not Christ charged you to "Search the Scriptures; for in them you have eternal life?"

Our readers must pardon this long, serious extract in a popular magazine; but its ultra-Protestantism was to us irresistible. They must have perceived that this is no common-place theological work, as well as that it is one peculiarly adapted to the times. As such, we recommend it to all who like to investigate for themselves.

The Daughters of England. By Mrs. Ellis. Fisher & Co. 12mo, cloth, pp. 396.

Those who are acquainted with Mrs. Ellis's popular work, The Women of England, will be at no loss to understand the plan, object, and tendencies of this volume. The books are in character the same, save that the new treatise is limited to unmarried women of the middle class. Mrs. Ellis sermonizes fluently and sensibly; dealing in safe common-places, and undeniable truisms: and while she teaches the women their duties, she also gains the suffrage of the men; for in this age of innovation, she shows the ladies what is their true place. "As women," they are told, "the first thing of importance is to be content to be inferior to men—inferior in mental power in the same proportion as in bodily strength." "Woman's strength is in her influence." This being the key to the social position of the sex, its duties may be the more easily understood. Yet Mrs. Ellis gives more scope to female faculties, and a wider range to the duties of women, than Fordyce, Gregory, or even Hannah More would have done. She permits them even some right to interest themselves in a certain kind of public affairs. She is "perfectly aware that there are intricate questions brought before our Senate which may require a masculine order of intellect fully to understand," and which must therefore be left to the Colonel Sibthorpes and Mr. Ferrands; "but there are others which may, and ought to engage the attention of every female mind; such as the extinction of slavery, the abolition of war in general, cruelty to animals, temperance, the punishment of death, and many more, on which neither to know nor to feel is almost equally disgraceful." The "many more" may, perhaps, include the taxes on food, in which the women, and particularly the ladies of Lancashire, have lately taken the liberty not merely "to know and to feel," but to act pretty decidedly. But Mrs. Ellis would keep all woman's knowledge in subservience to her moral excellence; and on this there can be no difference of opinion:—The rule, moreover, is quite as applicable to man. And if the Daughters of England study her precepts, and follow her counsels, they will be in the fair way to attain high moral excellence, and many useful acquirements and amiable qualities. Her discourse on Cleverness—meaning by cleverness, domestic inventiveness, handiness, and neat-handedness—on Temper, and on Fashion, are worthy of particular commendation. Many wise things are said about flirtation, too: or those little arts of attraction which are so unconscious, that they almost appear natural instincts. But young ladies will be young ladies; and Mrs. Ellis's test of what is flirtation, namely, whether, in mixed society, the damsel is "the same to women as to men," is, we fear, an impracticable, if not an unsound one. What would be the use of mixed society at all, why might not women associate only with women, men with men, if the refining influences of sex were to have no place in their intercourse? But the topic is intricate and delicate. We give Mrs. Ellis's deduction. "It is good for a woman to bear about with her even in early life, the conviction that her only business with men in society is to learn of them, and not to captivate or dazzle them." We hope the young ladies, when meditating mischief, will keep this in mind. One sentence we copy out, as it comes with especial propriety from the pen of Mrs. Ellis, herself a minister's wife. It refers to the conduct of young women with regard to "eloquent ministers of religion;" or such, it might have been added, as for the day and the hour are imagined to be so. Of "this extravagant and enthusiastic attachment," to popular ministers, she remarks: "There are others, [young women,] chiefly of enthusiastic temperament, who, under the impression that it is right to love and admire to the utmost of their power, whoever is worthy of admiration, give way to a style of expression when speaking of their favourite ministers, and a mode of behaviour towards them, which is not only peculiarly adapted to expose them as religious professors to the ridicule of the world, but which of itself too plainly betrays their want of reverence and right feeling on the subject of religion in general."

Time and Time-Keepers. By Adam Thomson. T. & W. Boone.

This is the production of a practical man, a London watchmaker. It treats of all sorts and sizes of time-keepers, whether clocks, watches, or chronometers; and of their several parts; and generally gives the history of their invention, with many other relative matters. As a specimen of the work, and a thing of general concernment, we copy out some of the precautions necessary to the care and safety of a watch.—Premising that the watch should be bought from a maker of character, and at a fair price, cheap watches being seldom good time-keepers,—we are told that "the watch should be regularly wound, as nearly at the same hour as possible; since few springs are so equably adjusted as to pull with the same force during the whole time of going. While being wound, the watch should be steadily held in one hand, so as to have no circular motion, which always produces variation in the vibration of the balance, and sometimes considerable derangement. For the same reason, also, when a watch is hung up, it should be perfectly at rest. If hung upon a round hook, without farther support, the motion of the balance will generate a pendulous motion in the watch, which will cause much variation in the time. Powerful watches ought not even to be laid horizontally, unless placed on a soft substance; for if put on a smooth flat surface, from the convexity of the glass and case, the watch can only rest on a point, and the vibration of the balance alone is frequently sufficient to produce motion in the watch." But the directions are too full and minute for our space. Watches, when exposed to variations of temperature, may have the hands set to time, but the regulator should not be touched; as we presume the watch will come right of itself in an equal temperature.

A watch regulated to keep time in the pocket, will, when not worn, gain a minute or two per day; the regulator must not, in this case, be altered, or the watch, when again worn, will lose as much as it had previously gained! . . . . . Particular care ought to be taken to keep the works of a watch clean; even though perfectly free from dust, it ought to be taken to pieces and cleared of the dried oil, when required; as without this precaution the best watch would be spoiled; and as good watches will continue to go well, until friction and wear prevent their going longer, they are the most liable to be neglected.

Speeches of Lord Campbell, at the Bar, and in the House of Commons. 8vo, pp. 520. Adam & Charles Black, Edinburgh.

Lord Campbell has employed the earliest leisure afforded by temporary retirement from professional business, in the laudable, or, at all events, inoffensive task of arranging the best of his speeches for the press. They are not numerous, nor as pieces of forensic or parliamentary eloquence of any remarkable note, perhaps; yet they must rank respectably in the eyes of the legal profession; nor, as times go with crown lawyers, will any one dispute his Lordship's claim, "never to have abandoned his principles" or "his party." The first speech in the volume is that made for Lord Melbourne, in the famous, or infamous action of the Hon. George Norton; a case on which Lord Campbell says, "the eyes of all Europe were fixed. Couriers were ready to start to the principal courts on the continent with the news of the verdict." One would like to learn what effect the verdict pronounced has had upon the social position of the plaintiff and his brother, in the circles in which they move; if they occupy the selfsame place in high-minded aristocratic society as before that strange trial. The volume also contains the speech in the case of Medhurst, for stabbing his fellow-pupil; the elaborate speech on Parliamentary Privilege, in the case Stockdale versus Hansard; and several more speeches on public questions of moment.

The Great Commission. By the Rev. John Harris, D. D., Author of "Mammon," &c. Cloth, pp. 538. Ward & Co.

The GREAT COMMISSION was that given by our Saviour to his apostles, "Go ye into all nations, preaching the Gospel to every creature." Some time since a few friends to missionary enterprise, residing in Scotland, offered a prize of two hundred guineas for an Essay on Missions, which should be of more extensive design, and less ephemeral than the sermons, tracts, and pamphlets, which for forty years have appeared on the subject of missions to the heathen. Forty-two Essays were sent in to the five appointed judges, who were chosen from among the most numerous of all denominations of Protestants. They were the Rev. Dr. David Welsh of Edinburgh, the Rev. Dr. Wardlaw of Glasgow, Mr. Melville of London, Jabez Bunting, and Thomas Crisp. Their verdict, by four out of five voices, was in favour of Dr. Harris; and there is every reason to believe that it was come to after due deliberation, and upon the purest grounds. Who was the solitary exception to unanimity we are not informed.

State of Education, Crime, &c. &c., and Proposed National Training Schools for all England and Wales, &c. &c. By Joseph Bentley. Longman & Co.

This work is respectable for its object, and wonderful for the perseverance and industry which it displays, and for what its author has accomplished, without, apparently, any adventitious aid. When very young, he set out as a Sunday-school teacher in his own neighbourhood, near Oldham. He afterwards established several more Sunday schools, and a Mechanics' Institution. Gradually the field of usefulness widened before him; and he at length seems to have devoted himself to the task of, in the first place, becoming "intimately conversant with the wants, wishes, tastes, and vices of the people," in a district where he imagined that his labours might be productive of good. His method was, selling little tracts and cheap periodicals among the decent poor, or giving them away. This was mainly done on the Saturday afternoons, when he found the work-people at home, and at leisure, to chat with him about their circumstances and modes of living. He afterwards became a traveller for a Manchester house, which greatly enlarged his sphere of inquiry; and, finally, he formed the idea of the present work. It is one which all must consider valuable, at least, as an attempt to promote the science of statistics; and as containing many curious facts and details, illustrating the connexion between early education and good conduct.

Greece, as a Kingdom: or, A Statistical Description of that Country, from the arrival of King Otho, in 1833, to the present time. By Frederick Strong, Esq., Consul at Athens, from Bavaria. 12mo, cloth, pp. 404. Longman & Co.

This work is unique of its kind. We have had a thousand and one descriptions of Modern Greece by travellers and letter-writers, but not one systematic account of that kingdom, its productions, resources, and institutions, by an intelligent resident. The work is ample and complete in matters of detail, and in tabular statements. Its author may have imagined that previous writers had said enough about the people, and their manners and customs; for that is the only thing he has omitted, save politics, and his own opinion of the interests and prospects of the country. These are blanks; but everything is not to be expected from a work professedly statistical.

Memoirs of the Rev. William Davidson, late of Barnbow, near Leeds. By James Everett. 12mo, pp. 525, cloth. Hamilton & Adams.

The Memoirs of this worthy man, which are chiefly compiled from a diary, that he kept from an early age, will, no doubt, be interesting to his congregation and immediate friends. To the rest of the world the volume will be less attractive, though it contains some homely wisdom, and original traits of manners, with abundant evidence of the piety of its subject.

A Treatise on the Application of Marine Surveying and Hydrometry to the Practice of Civil Engineering. By David Stevenson, Civil-Engineer; author of the "Civil Engineering of North America; with Charts, Plans, Diagrams, &c." 8vo, pp. 173. Adam & Charles Black.

This work is written for a particular class. Its purpose is expressed in the title.

Moral Agency; and Man as a Moral Agent. By William M'Combie. Seely, London.

This writer takes the orthodox and Protestant side of the question; and claims to range with those who receive their faith from the Bible and not from the Church.

SIX SERMONS on INTERESTING SUBJECTS, including the CONVERSION of the JEWS. By the Rev. John Robertson, Dunse. M. Paterson, Edinburgh.

NEW NOVELS.

Nothing has lately fallen under our observation in this department which we consider worthy of a particular introduction to our readers, save Mrs. Trollope's "BLUE BELLES OF ENGLAND;" and it, from having appeared piecemeal in a magazine, must be pretty well known. It displays all its author's shrewdness and talent; and makes us acquainted with some characters and groups that are really worth knowing. The entanglement of the heroine, a charming and true-hearted girl, with a young poet of the fastidious, exquisitely-selfish, sickly-sentiment class, is delicately traced. The "pink and white poet," and his dainty super-refined patroness and friend, are indeed exquisitely touched. Such family groups, as that of the Markhams, living in respectable and respected poverty, and yet richer in honour and content, and the general esteem, than their ambitious and fashionable neighbours, cannot be made too familiar to readers of fiction. Mrs. Trollope, like her contemporaries Mrs. Gore and Sir E. Bulwer, is, by the way, a sad libeller of the gay aristocratic world, if truth be libel. The veriest scold and cheat in Billingsgate Market is a respectable and honest woman, compared with her manœuvring mother and daughter in this novel.

THE TRADUCED. By N. Michell, author of "The Fatalist; or, The Fortunes of Godolphin." 3 volumes. T. and W. Boone.—This romance is founded upon the mysterious or questionable story of Joanna queen of Sicily, whose fortunes have been as tempting to imaginative writers as those of Mary queen of Scots. From the title, it may be inferred that the author adopts the side of the question favourable to Joanna, and which authentic history bears out, to the satisfaction of the charitable in judgment. The period chosen enables the author to enrich his pages by the introduction of several of those eminent characters of whom Joanna was the friend or patroness; and he has given it a home interest, by the introduction of gallant English soldiers. The romance, taken as a whole, is extremely pleasing.

PAMPHLETS.

THE PRESBYTERIAN EMPIRE, its ORIGIN, DECLINE, and FALL. By John Macfarlan, Esq.—To such of our Southern readers as wish to know the merits of that virulent dissension which is at present rending the Kirk of Scotland, and threatening its destruction, we recommend this able and temperate exposition of the causes of controversy.

OBSERVATIONS on the LAWS which PROHIBIT the FREE IMPORTATION of HUMAN FOOD, in a LETTER to the CONSTITUENTS of the HOUSE of COMMONS. By a Fellow-Elector.

PRIZE-ESSAY of the HIGHLAND SOCIETY; with an APPENDIX, on the CONDITION of FARM-SERVANTS in CERTAIN PARTS of SCOTLAND. By James Cowie.—This pamphlet deserves praise, so far as its object is to expose some of the evils of the Bothy-system, which, as our readers may remember, were noticed in the articles on the Poor-Laws of Scotland that have appeared in this Magazine. Has the Scottish Poor-Law agitation fallen asleep? Have the land-owners and the wrong-headed among the clergy quietly carried their point?

The GOVERNMENT of the METROPOLITAN POLICE of CANTON. By James Henry, Esq., M. D.—This seems a satire on the Dublin police; and is probably a well-merited chastisement of the organization and party-uses of that body.

Not OVER-PRODUCTION, but DEFICIENT CONSUMPTION, the SOURCE of our SUFFERINGS. By W. R. Greg, Esq.—The name of the writer is a guarantee for this being a clear and a moderate statement; and a satisfactory reply to the fallacies by which a half-clad and half-starved population are attempted to be humbugged. Recommending the pamphlet, we quote one or two sentences to show the nature of it:—

DEFICIENT CONSUMPTION.

While the production of the manufactured article has increased pretty steadily through all vicissitudes, the proportion of our manufacture consumed at home, has, of late, rapidly diminished. While for the fifteen years from 1824 to 1838, the home demand absorbed regularly from 40 to 50 per cent. (average 44) of the whole production, during the last three years it has only averaged 36 per cent., and in the last disastrous year only 28 per cent. Nay, more, in spite of a large increase in our population, the actual quantity of Cotton manufactures consumed at home, is less in the last three years than in the preceding three, by 14½ per cent.; and the quantity consumed in 1841, less than at any period since 1830, notwithstanding an augmented population of more than two millions.

It will be objected that, during the whole of this period our exports have increased. True, they have;—but these goods have, to a great extent, been sent abroad, because it was impossible to dispose of them at home; they have not been shipped in regular execution of orders received, but have been consigned for the chance of forcing a sale, by excessive lowness of price.

FALLACY OF WAGES RISING, AS FOOD RISES IN PRICE.

The total weekly income of seven families in Dukinfield, was, in 1836, £8, 0s. 0d. Their household expenditure was £5, 12s. 3d.; leaving a surplus of £2, 7s. 9d. for education, saving, and clothing. In 1841, their aggregate income was reduced to £5, 6s. 8d., while their necessary expenditure increased to £6, 8s. 1d.; leaving not only no surplus for clothing, but a heavy debt instead. In the former year, food formed 46 per cent. of their expenditure; in the latter year, 89 per cent.

THE REMEDY.

Perfect freedom of interchange, therefore,—willing and unburdened admission of the products of other countries,—must form the sole basis of our future prosperity, because it is the sole condition on which we can obtain extended markets for our goods, and increased employment for our people.

The same measures—complete commercial freedom—will, by reducing the price of the necessaries of life in England, (and still more by preventing those extreme fluctuations which have been so ruinous to all,) enable the mass of our citizens again to become extensive purchasers of articles of clothing, and thus restore the home demand to its natural and healthy state, and give us a right to anticipate its steady annual increase.

The same measures will, by raising the price of food abroad, tend to assimilate the wages of the continent to those of England. They will diminish the cost of manufacturing production at home, and augment it abroad;—and by lowering the rate of profit in continental manufactures, will lessen the inducement to invest capital therein;—while, by creating a demand for agricultural produce, they will divert capital, enterprise, and labour into that channel; and thus employ in feeding us, those who are now busily occupied in ruining us.

SERIAL WORKS.

EDINBURGH CABINET LIBRARY, Vol. XXXII. MESOPOTAMIA, and ASSYRIA, from the earliest ages to the present time. By J. Baillie Fraser, Esq., author of "A Descriptive account of Persia," &c., &c. Pp. 383, with map and engravings by Jackson. Oliver and Boyd.—In composing this historical and descriptive account of these seats of ancient empire, and of some of the most momentous events in the annals of the human race, the author has had the great advantage of personal travel, and long familiarity with the manners of the East. In addition to this, he has consulted a host of old authorities and of modern travellers and geographers. The use Mr. Fraser has made of these, leaves nothing to regret save the narrowness of his limits, though he has managed to condense all that can interest the general reader, whether in the past history or modern aspects of the regions described. He has found some valuable original materials in the MS. journals of the late Mr. Elliot, with the perusal of which he was favoured by the intelligent and hospitable British Political Resident at Bagdad, Colonel Taylor, who had also the power of communicating much statistical and other information collected by himself. Yet no part of the work is of so much interest as the sketches of the author's own adventures among the Kurdish and Arab tribes; or rather the results of his own and Mr. Elliot's observation on their manners and usages, while travelling among them. One, in reading these adventures, may fancy himself among the Highland clans a hundred years since. As is the praiseworthy custom of all the volumes of the CABINET LIBRARY, a part of the work is devoted to the Natural History of the countries described. On the whole, Mesopotamia and Assyria will form a valuable and attractive addition to this popular Library.

ENGLAND IN THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.—SOUTHERN DIVISION. PART II. OF CORNWALL.: AND PART II. OF NORTHERN DIVISION: LANCASHIRE.—This gives fair promise of turning out a beautiful and an useful work, well deserving public favour. It amply fulfils all that we said and predicted on its first appearance. From some instinct or other, we involuntarily turned first to CORNWALL; but Lancashire, the Utilitarian division, will have numerous admirers. And even from the manufacturing districts, ancient legends and ballads, and romantic traditions are by no means excluded. In both Parts, the wood-engravings are numerous; and as beautiful and light as if traced by fairy artists.

THE LOCAL HISTORIAN'S TABLE-BOOK. By M. A. Richardson. Parts I. to V. A work devoted to the Border Land of England, and its northern towns; combining, in chronological order, remarkable occurrences, historical facts, ancient traditions, and legendary and descriptive ballads; in short, snatches of everything which may amuse and interest the Northumbrians, the good folks of Newcastle, and the inhabitants of the city and county of Durham. The numerous works of the local antiquaries, the Border county histories and memoirs, afford a rich field; and Mr. Richardson has been a diligent gleaner. Along with a good deal of curious antiquated matter, there is, no doubt, much that is trivial, or of merely local interest. The work is illustrated with good, if rough wood-cuts.

THE LONDON SATURDAY JOURNAL. New and Pictorial Series—volumes I. and II.—This is a work of about the size and of the class of Chambers's Journal, and of other Periodical Works of entertainment; but it is adorned with really clever wood-cuts. Whether we regard the designs or execution, they are capital; and, unlike the absurd caricatures and grotesque embellishments of the general run of such works, give faithful representations of London society in all its lower phases. Chelsea Pensioners, Hackney-coachmen, Draymen, Livery-stablemen, Porters, Jew Old-Clothesmen, Low Gamblers, are all excellent, and evidently from the life. The unnamed artist is equally happy in his representations of the middle class. The volumes make an entertaining table-book.

NEW POEMS AND DRAMAS.

The PILGRIM of GLENCOE, and Other POEMS. By THOMAS CAMPBELL.—This new production of the Bard of Hope, as the learned call Mr. Campbell, has, at the very least, the beauty of unexpectedness. Nay, it has much more. Are not the gleaning-grapes of Edom better than the vintage of Bozrah?—The Pilgrim of Glencoe is a simple and homely tale of real life, and one illustrative of Highland manners, and of the graces and virtues of the mountaineer. In the olden time, it was often objected to Campbell, that he was too fastidious, too finical in style. Now, we suspect, the fault will be fancied to lie on the other side; and he will be found too familiar and colloquial. The poem seldom rises above the narrative style, yet we think that the hand which drew Outalissi, may be recognised in the portrait of the ancient Highlander:—

Old Norman's eye
Was proudly savage, even in courtesy.
His sinewy shoulders,—each, though aged and lean,
Broad as the curled Herculean head between,—
His scornful lip, his eyes of yellow fire,
And nostrils that dilated quick with ire,
With ever downward-slanting shaggy brows,
Marked the old lion you would dread to rouse.
Norman, in truth, had led his earlier life
In raids of red revenge, and feudal strife.
Religious duty in revenge he saw,
Proud Honour's right, and Nature's honest law.
First in the charge, and foremost in pursuit,
Long-breathed, deep-chested, and in speed of foot match for stags,—still fleeter when the prey

'as man, in persecution's evil day;
eered to that chase by brutal, bold Dundee,
o Highland hound had lapped more blood than he.
ft had he changed the Covenanter's breath
rom howls of psalmody to howls of death.
nd though long bound to peace, it irked him still,
is dirk had ne'er one hated foe to kill.
et Norman had fierce virtues, that would mock old-blooded Tories of the modern stock,
'ho starve the breadless poor with fraud and cant,—
e slew, and saved them from the pangs of want.
This old hero has a son, remarkable for good, plain nse, and calm blood; fond of books and knowledge;
rious, meditative, and sagacious, however he had come y his un-Celtic character; and the very opposite of the ery and irascible Norman, whose anger he provokes by bjuring Jacobitism.
lo blow-pipe ever whitened furnace fire
uick as these words lit up his father's ire,
Vho envied even old Abraham for his faith,
rdained to put his only son to death.
le started up in such a mood of soul
he white bear bites his showman's stirring-pole; le damn'd too, and brought out with snarl and howl,
) Dia! Dia! and Dioul! Dioul!

Several minor pieces, more elegantly versified than he Pilgrim, fill up the volume; but as they have already appeared, and as Campell's poetry never remains long under a bushel, we need not specify what must already have been read in half the newspapers of the day.

ZACHARY COBBLE, a Rigmarole in Rhyme. Bull: London.—This is a rather clever satire, in Hudibrastic metres.

ZAIDA, A TALE OF GRANADA, AND MINOR POEMS. By Lewis Evans.

BROWNING'S BELLS AND POMEGRANATES. No. II. King Victor and King Charles: Moxon.—This production is rather dramatic dialogues of a tragic character, than a regular tragedy. Some of the dialogues possess great poetical and dramatic beauty.

CHARACTERISTICS OF PAINTERS, by Henry Reeve, Esq.: Murray.—A series of elegant and beautiful poetic sketches, in which the leading characteristics of each of the great masters of the Italian and Flemish school are felicitously and briefly portrayed.

THE DRUNKARD, a Poem, by John O'Niel, with Illustrations by George Cruikshank.—This little poem, the production of an intelligent mechanic, well deserves the patronage of the friends of the Temperance cause.

SKETCHES OF BRITAIN, by James Howie, M.D., author of "Home," &c.—A descriptive poem, in somewhat halting blank verse, and framed on no definite plan.

POLITICAL REGISTER.

THE TORY BUDGET has at length made its appearance, and among some favourable features, it contains the appalling announcement, that an income-tax of 7d. per pound, or nearly three per cent., is to be imposed on all incomes, from whatever source derived, of above £150 a-year. Nothing, certainly, can be more unfair, than to tax an income derived from trade or professional exertions at the same rate as a similar income derived from land. An income arising from a trade or profession is, in few instances, worth more than two or three years' purchase; while a land rental is worth thirty years' purchase. It is quite plain, therefore, that, in common justice, a graduated scale, somewhat in proportion to the value of the income, ought to be applied. But besides, as is well known, it is impossible to levy a tax derived from trades and professions fairly. Few persons in these ranks of life know precisely what their incomes are; and suppose that, at the time the tax is imposed, and the first returns made, the tradesman has an unusually prosperous year, and honestly returns the amount of his income, he has the utmost difficulty, as was found formerly, in getting an abatement in subsequent years, when his trade is falling off; and it is only through an inquisitorial examination of his books, and the most humiliating exposure of his affairs to the myrmidons of the tax-gatherer, for whose secrecy he has no adequate security, that he has any chance of obtaining relief. Besides, an income-tax offers a direct bribe for fraud and dishonesty. Let a tradesman only keep his books in confusion, and he may defy all the inspectors of the income-tax to discover his income. An income-tax has been hitherto considered exclusively a war-tax; and that of five per cent., imposed by Pitt in 1798, was repealed immediately on the ratification of the treaty of Amiens: and the other tax of ten per cent., imposed by the Whigs, was, in spite of all the efforts of the Ministry to maintain it in a modified degree, repealed in 1816. Another great evil of an income-tax is the ease with which it may be increased, and the hands of the Chancellor of the Exchequer thrust deeper and deeper into the pockets of the subjects. We will venture to predict, that it wont long remain at three per cent.; but will soon be raised to five. Lord Brougham has moved resolutions condemnatory of the extension of the tax to incomes from trades, professions, &c.; and a movement to the same effect is making among the Liberal members of the House of Commons: but it is in vain to expect that a Parliament of landowners and sinecurists will ever consent to tax themselves and let other classes escape. This would be contrary to their whole policy throughout all history. But perhaps those who have most to complain of the manner in which the tax is to be levied are the farmers; and it shows how careless the landowners are of their tenants' interest, provided they get the rents. They are held out as men not to be trusted. Every other class is allowed to make a return of his income, in order to taxation, but the farmer. A rigid and inflexible rule is laid down for him, that his profits are one-half of his rent. By the application of this rule, during the last years of the late property-tax, farmers paid hundreds a-year of tax on an assumed income, while they not only had no income at all, but were, as the sequel proved, losing their whole capital.

The new Budget amounts, in fact, to a complete revision of the Tariff. Among its favourable features is the removal of a number of the prohibitions, especially those on cattle, sheep, &c. The duty on asses is very unnecessarily reduced from 10s. to 2s. 6d; oxen, £1; cows, 15s.; calves, 10s. The duty on calves is not proportioned to that on oxen. Sheep, 3s.; swine, 5s. These are at present prohibited. Bacon, hams, &c., from 28s. to 14s.; beef, fresh or slighty salted, at present prohibited, 8s.—all per cwt. All these are the duties from foreign countries. Tallow, from 3s. 2d. to 6d.; coffee, foreign, from 1s. 3d. to 8d.; and from British possessions, from 7d. to 4d.

The unpopular measure of an income-tax might have been avoided by merely doing justice to all classes; by imposing on the landed interest the taxes they ought to pay. As every one knows, the land-tax, when first imposed, was an assessment of 4s. per pound; so that, if now levied at that rate, it would yield a revenue of nearly eight millions. Then a tax on the succession of land should be imposed, similar to that on moveables, which would yield three or four millions more, so that all financial difficulties would be relieved. But what has rendered it necessary to impose an income-tax in time of peace? Merely the insane interference with the powers of Asia, so that there is not a single nation between Cabul and Pekin which is not ready to rise upon us at a moment's notice.

Peel's Corn-Law Bill is safe, having passed the second reading by 284 to 176,—majority, 108. Mr. Villiers' motion for a total and immediate repeal, was supported only by ninety. So that our readers may judge what chance there is for a measure for total repeal being carried in the House as presently constituted. To continue to agitate for Corn-Law repeal by itself alone, is worse than useless. It is only by an extension of the suffrage, that beneficial reforms will ever be carried. For it is quite plain that the aristocracy hold, and, in fact, are entitled to hold, the agitation of the Corn-Law repealers, unsupported as it is by the working-classes, in utter contempt.

Emigration.—Among the proposals for remedying the distress, (now admitted to be general,) believed to be entertained by Ministers during the vacation, was emi gration on a large scale. In a former number we denounced the notion of transporting the people to the food, and not bringing the food to the people. We were, of course, fiercely attacked by a set of periodicals in this country in the interest of the inhabitants of our colonies, who wish to draw from us all the adult men and women of the working classes, leaving Britain, as a sort of grandmother, to rear up children to the transportable age for the benefit of our dependencies. As some of these periodicals are only yet a few weeks old, they cannot be expected to have come to their senses; but we may merely hint, that as we have uniformly opposed the Black Slave Trade in all its parts, we are equally determined to oppose the White Slave Trade now advocated by numerous "philanthropic" journals. The horrors of the "middle passage," short as it comparatively is, with a fair wind and calm sea, is nothing to a voyage to Australia, either by Cape Horn or the Cape of Good Hope. We are, therefore, glad to observe that the Ministry has no intention of recommending any general system of emigration. On the contrary, they find the misery of the existing practice such, that they are to bring in a Bill to render Emigration more difficult—a bill to prevent emigrants from being starved or poisoned in their passage abroad with rotten provisions, or by the still more ingenious device of stinting them in their supply of water—dirty at the outset—so as to prevent them either cooking or eating the salt junk which has perhaps twice circumnavigated the globe, and been sold by government as useless stores. The passengers are also to have more room than at present. All this will raise the expense of emigrating, and operate as a check. With the single exception of a slave ship, an emigrant ship—and we have our information from living witnesses in this city—is the scene of the greatest human misery that is conceivable. There is plenty of land in this country yet unoccupied. The late Duke of Cleveland paid £600 a-year to his own tenants alone for fox coverts; that is to say, for places to breed vermin—not merely foxes to destroy the farmers' lambs and poultry, but rabbits to feed the other vermin, and to destroy the corn crops also. The same system is now, and has been for years, in operation in the Lothians. We know of two or three fox coverts ourselves, whence the tenants draw a greater return in the way of abatement of rent, and even in direct payment from the squirearchy, than from the best land on their farms. Perhaps some of our readers will assist us in making out "a Return of the number of fox coverts in Scotland, for which the tenant is paid not to cultivate, or depasture," that the foxes may not be disturbed. It is plain, we have not too little, but too much land in this country, when large portions of it are undeniably set aside for the purpose of rearing vermin. But to look to the moral, and it may be the religious aspect of emigration—what right have we, as a nation, to send out a body of men to plunder another body—to dispossess them of their lands, which the God of nature has given them? Is it anything more decent, to open a shop in London for selling the lands of the people at the antipodes, or borrowing money on the security of them—rather a bad security on this side of the Tweed, we opine—than it would be for Mumbo Jumbo to open a shop at Timbuctoo, for the sale of the lordship of Dalkeith?

The late Lord President Hope.—Lord John Russell brought on a discussion relative to the late Lord President's resignation, by moving for the letters of resignation sent in by his lordship, and Chief-Justice Bushe of the Irish Queen's Bench; both of whom had long been incapacitated from the active duties of their offices, and rather suspiciously, it must be admitted, retained office till the Tories came into power. The Whigs, however, undoubtedly touched upon rather a dangerous topic for them. The jobbing about Lord Corehouse's resignation is rather too recent to be entirely forgotten; and the notorious fact that, during the ten years they held office, they did not promote a single Tory to the Bench, or to any other office, cannot be overlooked. It is impossible, also, to keep out of view what sort of appointments they have made. We believe great part of the profession will agree with us when we state, that old and deaf as the late Lord President was, he was at least as efficient as some of the younger Whigs who have been placed on the bench, with whom doing nothing appears to be the rule and working the exception. It was rather an unfortunate period, also, for the Whigs to attack a Tory Judge, from alleged neglect of duty. We do not believe that the late President was, during his whole career, as long absent from his duty as some of the Judges appointed since 1832 have already been. How any one can reconcile it to his conscience—not having even the plea of poverty to plead—to accept of the public money, month after month, for doing nothing, while his table is filled with law processes, and the litigants in the suits starving from the law's delay, we know not. Certainly the eminent Judge we allude to would better consult his dignity, and his well-earned reputation, by an immediate resignation than continue to hold an office, the duties of which he is unable to discharge. We do not see that there is any probability of getting rid of superannuated Judges retaining their seat on the bench, till an imperative rule be laid down for the resignation of all Judges at a certain age. This would, no doubt, sometimes entail a retired allowance or two more on the country than at present; and it might even occasionally deprive the bench of an able Judge, who, though old, was in full possession of his faculties, to make way for one, who, though younger, was of less capacity; but we do not think these evils are at all comparable to that of allowing a worn-out Judge to retain his seat, after his faculties have been greatly deteriorated by age. After all the discussion, it appears, that the Whigs were mistaken, in asserting that the late President had not done his duty in presiding at Jury trials. Since 1830, he has only delegated the duty in three instances to his juniors. For our own parts, we think it would be much better if the Juniors were made to do the duty, either exclusively or in rotation, with the Chief. Nothing can be more awkward than bringing Bills of Exceptions against charges to a Jury, on account of misdirection before the Division in which he sits; thus making the juniors, or who ought, at least, to be juniors, or inferior in talent, sit as Judges on their own Chief. For these, as well as for other obvious reasons, we think that not the President of each Division, but the Junior Judge in the Inner House, should preside at all Jury trials; although we confess we never could see any good reason why the whole Court should not be present. Surely matters as important are tried by Jury in civil cases, as by the Court of Justiciary; yet three Judges must be present in it, to make a quorum, however paltry the case.

Affghanistan.—As we anticipated, the whole British force in Affghanistan, consisting of 5400 men, has been massacred. Of course, nothing but revenge is talked of; and when Sir Robert Peel announced that a large additional force was to be sent to India, he was cheered from all parts of the House. It is well worth consideration, however, whether it is becoming the dignity of a great nation like Britain to follow the example of barbarous nations, and take the savage sort of revenge which must be contemplated. What satisfaction will it be to the people in this country, in return for the income tax, that Affghanistan is laid waste with fire and sword,—that Cabul and other towns are burned, and that a parcel of miserable old men, women, and children, have perished in the flames, or have been massacred by our soldiers? It is perfectly plain that we cannot now occupy the country; and such revenge as is talked of will only have the effect of rendering the Affghans more hostile, and more ready to assist the French or Russians in any invasion of India they may attempt. A savage revenge, such as is contemplated, will still farther irritate the neighbouring nations, and tend farther to facilitate an invasion of India at the proper moment. It should also be kept in view, that it was a British officer who set the example in massacring prisoners in cold blood; and there is little doubt that that atrocity was one of the chief incentives to the revolt.

CHINA.—Sir Henry Pottinger seems to be sailing backwards and forwards along the coast, without attempting anything decisive. He also requires additional troops and ships; and much human blood, and not a few millions of treasure, will be expended before this paltry and unjust opium war be terminated.

TRADE AND MANUFACTURES.

Recent proceedings in Parliament have had no effect in dispelling the gloom which has so long hung over the manufacturing districts, and the distress and destitution continue generally as great as ever. At Paisley, some symptoms of amendment are showing themselves. The number obtaining relief is diminishing weekly, and some of the old branches of manufactures are beginning to revive.

AGRICULTURE.

Owing to the very favourable state of the weather, a much larger breadth of spring wheat has been sown than usual, and in those districts adapted for the spring sowing of this kind of crop, the deficiency in the autumn sowing has been nearly supplied. The supplies of grain in the hands of farmers in this district (Edinburgh) seem fully as much as usual at this season; and as the price of grain has been falling slowly throughout the month, it would appear to be anticipated that there is a sufficient supply in the country till harvest, without any foreign importation. We have seldom known the corn speculators more at fault than they have been within the late few months. It was confidently expected in November, that the whole grain in bond would have been entered ere now at the shilling duty; whereas, the duty is now 26s. 8d., without much probability of any great reduction for some time. As was to be anticipated, the allowing the importation of foreign cattle has created a great sensation in the breeding districts; and it is even said that the proposal has already had the effect of reducing the price of cattle in Ireland. We have no doubt that in both Houses of Parliament an attempt will be made to throw out this part of the Budget,—the only real good part of it; and the manufacturing interest should be on their guard against such an attempt.

POSTCRIPT POLITICAL.

THE CROWNING MERCY OF THE TORIES.

THE Peel policy has reached the climax! Sir Robert has taken even his own warmest supporters by surprise. There were whispers of a Property-tax. To some that seemed a necessary, as it will always be, a just tax, if fairly levied. But the whole Income of the country suddenly brought within the sweep-net of the Minister, that was news! And as surely as that the landlord's clutch of the bread of the people will never be unloosed during his reign, it now is that every man belonging to the generally uneasy middle classes, every man striving to maintain his place in society, upon the lessening, or, in many cases, the almost extinguished profits of a trade or a profession, must not only be taxed, but rendered liable to the same ordeal, in the rigid scrutiny of his most sacred and private affairs, as if he were a bankrupt attempting to defraud his creditors.

Well, the existing constituencies sent those Members to Parliament who, having first adopted Peel's Sliding Scale, which is to mete the People's Food, will next sanction his Fixed Standard for mulcting every man's Income. A Sliding Scale for the purposes of the Landlord; a Procrustean bed for those of the Minister.

The Newspaper press, we rejoice to see, is nearly unanimous in denouncing an Income Tax on trades and professions; the country is already ringing from side to side with indignation; and no man can paint the gross injustice and the injurious and torturing operation of such a tax black enough. Even Sir Robert Peel, himself, though he cares little about its unequal pressure, admits its inquisitorial character. That seems, indeed, to be very generally understood, but not yet to the full extent. The Income Tax, with its Local Boards, Tory Commissioners, Tory understrappers, prying, espionage, and reckless exposure* of private affairs, was, in its day, one of the most envenomed weapons of party spite and political persecution that ever the minions of any Government wielded. Many men of liberal sentiments still alive must remember their own sufferings and the tender mercies of its inquisitorial machinery. And what it was in the beginning of the century, it will be again; for Peel's Budget will be carried, in substance, and in every important detail; and, whatever may be modified, the tax on the precarious incomes of trades and professions will assuredly not be spared, if there shall be a tax on property of any kind. A war tax,—never resorted to but in the last extremity and the most grievous and injurious in operation,—will be imposed upon that class of the community, which, with the exception of the actually half-starving manufacturers, are the least able to bear it. The country has been, for nearly thirty years, comparatively at peace, though the great majority of the class to be mulcted have been, and that for years, at war, in warding off poverty or pecuniary difficulty, in the midst of decaying trade, lessening and precarious profits, ruinous competition in all professions, and no foreign outlet for professional talent. And after a series of bad seasons, when the increased expense of living, of buying merely meat and bread, and common necessaries, has been seriously felt by every family, save the opulent few, it is proposed to impose this tax anew: and that without any cause satisfactorily shown, save the mere convenience of the Minister. Had this odious measure followed the Total Repeal of the Taxes on Food, there might have been some reason, or at least, some decent pretext for the course adopted. But to afford the mass of the community no redress for their master-grievance,—the Bread-Tax,—to give the manufactures of the country no substantial relief that can with certainty be calculated upon, and to impose fresh burdens, heaviest in amount to those least able to bear them, and made intolerable in the mode of exaction, is the Crowning Mercy of Sir Robert Peel's vigorous administration.

* In Parliament, the secrecy, the delicacy, the honour of the persons intrusted to examine schedules and appeals, is paraded in answer to every objection. Now, in Scotland, it is well known that the statements and appeals of persons surcharged, were actually sold to the snuff-shops for waste paper. This might not take place everywhere, but it did take place, and made some noise at the time.

His real reason, after all, may have been fear that the Corn-Law Repealers would put their threats into execution, and force him to surrender, by starving themselves, in order to cut off his Excise and Customs resources. We give Sir Robert some credit for his sagacity. This must be the real reason. "You, Messrs. Cobden & Co.," thinks Sir Robert to himself, "threaten me with using no wine; you, Mrs. Brookes, and your ladies, with using no tea, coffee, and sugar: why, I will match you there—I will directly attack your pockets." He almost admits this view, when he says, "The middle class may save as much through the reduction of duties by the new Tariff, as they will have to pay in Income Tax." But, if so, where was the need of change, or of having recourse to this new, irritating tax? And, admitting that some changes for the better are made by his timid peddling with the Tariff, short is the way that the cautious, yet meddling Minister has ventured in the right direction; while with all his trimming and dexterity, and his evident anxiety to please those of whom he holds, while he attempts some small good, he has laid the foundation of many future difficulties to himself and his successors.

If Peel imagines that he will gain the working-classes by his policy, no mistake can be greater. Many of them can scrutinize his Tariff, with as much knowledge of its probable operation as himself; and then inquire what it promises to them. Increased employment? Doubtful. Cheaper food? Certainly not. The single alteration on the sugar duties, proposed by the late Government, would have afforded more actual relief and solace to the countless number of families in the Kingdom, whose income is under 15s. a-week, than all his proposed alterations of the Tariff. Bread and bread-stuffs, which at present swallow up two-thirds, and as often three-fourths, of their incomes, remain precisely as before. In cheese and butter we hear of no reduction; and as to the reduction which may take place in the price of fresh meat, it little concerns those who rarely see meat, and, while bread remains at its present exorbitant rate, cannot obtain meat in any form. Instead of dividing the working and the middle classes, Peel's Crowning Mercy will force them more rapidly into close alliance. They have the selfsame interests, however it may be with the aristocratic and non-producing classes. Whatever affects the employer, must soon and certainly affect the employed. Whatever lessens the means of the consumer, must soon be felt by the producer. All burthens ultimately press hardest on the lowest body. This has been very clearly stated in Parliament by Lord Brougham, and his lessons will not be lost. The working-men are already acquainted with the operation of taxation. They may escape the fiery ordeal of the Income Inquisition, but they must bear their share of the loss of money going to the tax-gatherer, instead of being employed in giving impulse to their industry.

And whither have vanished all those visions of the relief to trade, of the influx of prosperity, which were to follow in the wake of a Tory Administration? Are they to end in a new Sliding Scale, and an Income Tax falling on all incomes alike, from whatever source they may accrue, whether from the most permanent and well-secured, or the most uncertain and fluctuating? And what a wonderful man he is who has accomplished this!—what a mighty mind that, which, after seven months, devised the marvellous scheme! Why, Mehemet Ali would have done the same thing in seven hours,—and better. He could not have done worse. It is almost ludicrous to hear of the admiration of the Minister into which the House of Commons was thrown, when the mighty scheme was unfolded, and when Sir Robert Peel spoke his long-concocted pamphlet on Finance. What was wonderful in the only important part of his scheme, save the temerity of him that proposed it?

But since Sir Robert has carried his Landlords' Monopoly against the people, it is upon the whole, perhaps, not to be regretted, that he should also carry his Income Tax. It will prove the source of illumination on questions of Government and Finance to thousands; and will speedily recruit the ranks of the Suffrage Associations with many able and useful soldiers. It will be the means of immediate amalgamation. There is, we fear, a very slender chance of the working-class becoming in haste so easy and comfortable in their circumstances, notwithstanding the penny a pound reduction on the price of macaroni and vermicelli, as to be indifferent to public affairs. Sir Robert, by his vigorous measure, may temporarily galvanize the finances; but by what untried, unheard-of process is he to give healthful vigour to those exhausted powers upon which all permanent national prosperity must ultimately depend? The subject remains as dark, as perplexed as ever; and were the Income Tax made five or ten per cent. instead of three, without great retrenchment of the public expenditure, without immediate relief to trade and manufactures, the same causes which have been at work for twenty years, must ultimately undermine the country. Foreign nations already see Ichabod written upon our walls; the glory of rich, proud England departed. It is viewed as a humbled nation, plunged into desperate circumstances; and its Government compelled to have recourse to desperate remedies. Thus, the honour of the nation is tarnished abroad; while at home, much causeless suffering, mental and pecuniary, is entailed upon the whole middle-class, in addition to former hardships. There is, at present, little consolation, save in looking to the national movement for Radical Reform; to the intelligent men represented by such individuals as Lovett, Vincent, and Philips, voluntarily returning to their original confidence in their true and long-tried friends; in Brougham and Hume, and such new and potent auxiliaries as Joseph Sturge. The means of national salvation are still in our hands; and Sir Robert Peel's policy will quicken us to the use of them, and hasten the crisis.

ABEDNEGO THE MONEY-LENDER.

BY MRS. GORE.

CHAPTER VII.

The humblest hovel of a village acquires temporary distinction from the periodical blossoming of the fine old honeysuckle adorning its crumbling walls, and investing the desolate place with beauty and fragrance;—and even into the miserable lodging of a gloomy city, momentary brightness may be infused by the chance introduction of a summer flower, whose rich perfumes bring tidings of a happier world elsewhere.

So was it with the humble abode of Verelst the painter. Nothing could be more dull, more dreary, more dispiriting, than the spot. The house, of which his lodgings occupied the first and second floors, was old and disjointed; and though an ancient stone mansion becomes picturesque when falling into ruins, the slight and ill-conditioned London houses, run up by bricklayers' contracts, degenerate, at the end of a century, into a collection of creaking boards, without a perpendicular line or right angle perceptible in the whole construction. Shrunken doors, and ill-fitting windows, admit eddies of air in all directions; while the sallow paint, dingy floors, smoky ceilings, and rickety stairs, present a miserable and dispiriting combination.

In Verelst's lodgings, selected for the advantage of the better light reaching the artist's chamber over the open space of a small burying-ground backing on North Audley Street, all was as clean as care and friction could make it. But the care applied to the burnishing of shabby furniture renders its inferiority only more prominent; and no person accustomed to the resorts of luxury, or even to habits of comfort, could have entered Verelst's apartments on the day they were first engaged by the poor painter, without experiencing the heavy depression arising from the survey of utter discomfort.

He had not been established three days, however, before those cheerless rooms had assumed the importance acquired by the roughest casket enshrining some precious object.—Two beings, more graceful of form and feature than even the imagination of the gifted painter could have supplied, were dispensing their charm over the place; and, in addition to the gentle presence of Esther and Salome, the rooms were brightened by a variety of those trivial but striking objects which betoken the presence of an artist,—intrinsically valueless, so as to be compatible with poverty,—yet indicative of superior intelligence and refinement.

On wooden brackets against the wall were placed two of the finest pictures of Verelst; which not only concealed the faded paper, but created an atmosphere of grace and poetry, where all before was matter of fact. Beside the fireplace, in a recess formed by the abutting chimney usual in old-fashioned houses, stood a curious carved cabinet; common enough in the quaint old cities of Holland and Germany, but acquiring a certain dignity amid the commonplace vulgarity of a London lodging-house. On the top of this, lay a thick, strange-looking volume, apparently as antiquated and curious as the cabinet itself; for its clumsy silver clasps were blackened with age, and the binding was of the dingy and solemn character peculiar to monastic libraries. This precious book was an object of all but idolatry to the painter. On removing to that wretched house from the abode in Bermondsey in which he had installed himself on his first arrival from Germany, Verelst carried it devoutly under his arm;—leaving the care of his goods and chattels, and even of his infirm wife, to the hands of his daughters. The utmost extremity of poverty would not have induced him to part with it;—in the first place, because it was a gift,—a token of gratitude from one of his scholars, the young Count of Ehrenstein, who, on quitting the University, had despatched it from his ancestral castle in the Odenwald to his old master;—in the second, because it was a treasure of no less magnitude than the sketch-book of Albert Durer!—

Great must have been the importance of any individual in the eyes of Verelst ere he admitted him to view the contents of that sacred volume; and, during the three years of his residence in England, Basil Annesley alone had beheld those venerable clasps unlocked in his honour!—

If the truth must be told, the favour was somewhat thrown away.—Those sublimer touches of art which it requires the eye of an artist to detect,—those curious insights into the mysteries of nature which demand initiation on the part of the spectator to whom they are demonstrated,— were as much lost upon the young guardsman, as the beauties of a Phidian torso to the eye of a child, who sees only a headless trunk, defaced and time-worn, where the virtuoso beholds the breathing chef d'œuvre of the first of sculptors. Basil Annesley, however, though too frank for dissimulation on ordinary matters, was careful not to wound the pride of the sensitive artist, by exhibiting his indifference. He had conferred too many favours on Verelst, to mortify him by disparaging his only treasure. Even the weaknesses, moreover, of the father of Esther were sacred in his sight!

It would have afforded no consolation to the enthusiastic painter, to learn that any human being could be blind enough to appreciate what he estimated as his own puny efforts of art, far beyond the curious jottings and outlines, by which the quaint old master had attempted to lay by stores for the aid of future invention, in his mysterious repository;—snatches of the picturesque,—of striking effects,—of graceful combinations,—which displayed, in many instances to eyes profane, only uncouth blottings, and unmeaning devices. For nothing could exceed the contempt with which Verelst regarded the works to which the exigencies of his position compelled him to descend. The wants of his family obliged him to paint down to the taste of the most unimaginative nation in Europe; and the two noble works constantly before his eyes, for which he had never so much as received an offer, but which, during their composition and the two years devoted to their execution, had appeared to contain the germs of fame and fortune, nay, in his more enthusiastic moments, to foreshow glimmerings of immortality,—afforded a perpetual memento that subjects taken from the Niebelungen Lied, even if treated with the power of a Caravaggio and the grace of a Corregio, possess not half the charm in English eyes of a sporting scene in the Highlands, or some comicality of cockney life.

The bitter lesson was now learned. But it had required the contemptuous refusal of a dozen picture-dealers, to convince Verelst that the higher efforts of modern genius were valueless, unless when stamped as saleable by the prefix of a well-known name, accredited by the magic letters R.A.; —whereas for the humorous Croquis and sporting studies, such as Colonel Carrington had found so profitable a possession, a ready market was at command.

By the sale of these, the artist maintained his family; and he might have maintained them in opulence, could he have brought himself fully and entirely to the level of his position. But the mind of Verelst was pitched to a lofty key. To him it was as much an effort to descend to these profitable puerilities, as for other men to attain to the higher inspirations of art; and often, when engaged to complete for the trade some vulgar series of military groups or hunting adventures, he would fling away the pencil with disgust, and snatching the palette, in a fit of desperation, paint out some former picture, in order to give existence to a new design,—the faint shadowing of some poetical idea, —never, alas! to be fully developed. For there were no Roman princes, no luxurious cardinals, to give food to the family of the necessitous artist while abandoning himself to the nobler promptings of his genius. When mildly remonstrated with by his feeble wife, he replied by citing the victory he had already attained over himself, by producing for lucre' sake works revolting to his taste. But it was like converting a lance of polished steel into a homely instrument of husbandry, to abstract the soul of Verelst from the higher walks of his art.

It is true, that in his two girls he had unconscious flatterers, strongly inciting him to the cultivation of his nobler aspirations. Whenever, in irresistible moments of fervour, the poor artist gave the reins to his imagination, so as to produce anew some wild but exquisite design illustrative of the poetry of his native country, Salome and Esther, by their fond enthusiasm, not only stimulated his exertions, but almost repaid them. Nevertheless, their murmured applauses, their glistening eyes, their flushing cheeks,—grateful as was the tribute to his heart, not only as a token of affection, but as indicative of the possession of genius sympathetic with his own,—did not suffice to satisfy his weekly creditors, or defray the rent of even his inconsiderable lodging. The poor paralytic mother, whose sickness was the real source of their poverty, often entreated the two girls to be more sparing in their admiration. With the wisdom of experience, the infirm wife of Verelst recognised the futility of struggling against destiny. She knew, that to achieve the laurels of glory requires more than the mere possession of genius; that there must be favourable coincidences of time and place, and, above all, of national tastes and prosperity, to create a field for the triumph of art, and the renown of the artist.

Mrs. Verelst was a woman of no common order. Born of an opulent family, she had eloped in early girlhood from her father's house with the enthusiastic artist; and ill-prepared by habits or education for the life of privation she had embraced, her health had fallen a sacrifice, and increased the evil. From the period of her younger daughter's birth, in consequence of premature exertion, she had become crippled; a burthen upon the family, save for the pains she was enabled to bestow upon the education of the girls. Though enfeebled by infirmity, she was unwearied in imparting to her daughters the accomplishments in which she excelled; and even now, though confined at all times to an easy chair, and often to her bed, her industrious hands were constantly exercised for the benefit of the family.

Sore had been the trial to this patient invalid to uproot herself from the humble but cheerful home at Heidelberg to which she had been so long habituated; and exchange the view from her windows over the rippling waters of the Neckar, and the crowning heights of the green forests beyond, for the foggy, smoky, cheerless limitation of a narrow London street. Though of British extraction, she had never abided in England; and became as quickly conscious as any foreign visiter, of the oppressive cost of ordinary enjoyment in a city which supplies no gratuitous pleasures. If, however, either the mother or daughters pined after the purer atmosphere and franker sociability of Heidelberg, they were cautious not to afflict by their lamentations the inconsiderate man by whose want of caution they had been driven into exile.

The artist enjoyed in his family an impunity something between the reverence accorded to a prophet, and the indulgence conceded to an ailing child. His whims were studied, his foibles respected. Whatever evils befell them, it was the common care that they should fall lightest on the father. Among themselves, the disinterestedness of mind and exaltation of character which had reduced them to ruin, commanded a degree of respect that did them honour; and the two girls seemed to feel that they could not better testify their affection for their suffering mother, than by duty towards the improvident father she so dearly loved.

"How lonesome we have been, these four days past!" observed Verelst, as he stood retouching a picture upon the easel, the completion of which he had a thousand times forsworn.—"Not a single visiter the whole of this week!"—

The two girls, who sat working at the same embroidery-frame, waiting till their mother, who was reclining in her arm-chair, should feel disposed to resume the book she had been reading aloud to them the greater part of the morning, looked at each other and smiled,—or rather mutually refrained from a smile. For the only guests who ever crossed their threshold were Basil Annesley, and three or four printsellers and picture-dealers, by whom Verelst was occasionally employed.

"I want cheering up, for the continuation of my military groupings!" resumed the artist. "I have been obliged to take up the brush instead of the pencil to-day, for want of some one to advise me respecting that charge of Polish lancers."

"He is out of town, father. He is gone into Hampshire," said Esther, vaguely enough, if in reply to her father's observation.

"Besides," added the feeble voice of Mrs. Verelst, who, though sitting with her eyes closed, was not dozing, as they had supposed, "even if he were in town, Mr. Annesley has sense enough to know that it is not expedient for him to be a daily visiter in a house like ours,—that it must be injurious to him, and fatal to us."

"Why so?" inquired the painter, without raising his eyes from his work. "He used to come to us every day, at Heidelberg?"

"He was your pupil,—he was eagerly studying the German language, and society was an object to him."

"Not more an object to him there, than his society here to me."

"Besides, Mr. Annesley was then fifteen, and Esther and Salome children of eleven and twelve."

"And is there not precisely the same difference of age between them now?"

"Certainly! But there is a very great difference in the construction others might place upon their intimacy!"

"Their intimacy?—My dear wife, you are dreaming!" cried the painter, almost smiling at her simplicity, and not in the least suspecting his own. "Their intimacy?—Surely you do not suppose that this excellent young man, who, though I never was able to endue him with much artistic perception, made good progress under my hands, (as his aquarelle yonder of the old Castle of Heidelberg, pasted into the lid of Esther's workbox, can testify,) this promising scholar of mine, I say, who has been of such essential service to us during our sojourn in this inhospitable country, cannot come to visit his old master, and advise him in his compositions so as to adapt them to the vulgar appetites of his customers, without provoking remarks by his condescension?—At all events, what have my daughters to do with it?—It is not Salome's pencils he sits pointing. It is not Esther's drawings, of which he suggests the subjects."

"Mr. Annesley is gone down to visit his invalid mother, papa," interposed Esther, apprehensive, perhaps, that her father might take cognizance of her tingling cheeks, or his wife consider it necessary to inspire him with a more worldly view of their relative position.

"Has he a mother?" inquired the artist,—who took little heed of the ordinary business of life. "I always fancied from his independence that he was an orphan, and his own master."

"Do you not remember our first interest in him at Heidelberg originating in the letters he showed us from Lady Annesley?"

"True,—I remember!—Grave, cordial, heart-stirring letters.—But as he never mentioned her here, I thought she might have died in the interim. And so she is an invalid? the reason, perhaps, Rachael, why he interests himself so kindly in your illness,—and is always suggesting some comfort or relief for you.—It is such a kind-hearted creature!—I miss him, after a few days' absence, as I should miss one of you, were you to go away from me."

"Mr. Annesley is very kind,—very affable,—very condescending," said Mrs. Verelst, coldly, as if to give a discouraging view of their terms of friendship.

"But surely we are of as much service to HIM, mother, as he is to papa in the composition and sale of his drawings?"—observed Salome. "Mr. Annesley has a charming voice; but it is Esther's instructions which have enabled him to do it justice."

"So long as he comes as a pupil," persisted Mrs. Verelst, "he comes on appropriate terms. But highly born as he is, and, as I presume, of good hereditary fortune, there can be no equality, and, consequently, no real friendship between him and us. We are people earning our subsistence by our exertions. He is a gentleman,—a fine gentleman."

"He is a man!" cried Verelst, suddenly throwing down his brush, and assuming a tone of energy very unusual to him.—"He is my benefactor, too:—but I should hate myself, and despise him, if I thought that any obstacle to his being my friend."

His wife remained silent; aware of the hazard of introducing suspicion into that simplest of human hearts. A woman's tact forewarned her that, if made to feel the danger and delicacy of their position as regarded Basil Annesley, he would feel it so acutely as to render all further intimacy between them impossible.

Before Verelst had resumed his brush or the girls recovered their apprehensions that some unpleasant explanation was about to ensue, a knock was heard at the street door, and a step on the stairs; but neither the one nor the other of a nature to agitate the daughters or rejoice the father by a hope of Annesley's arrival.

"So, Sir," cried an austere-looking man, whose complexion vied with that of one of the crackled china vases forming part of his stock in trade as a dealer in objects of virtù, "I have been expecting to hear news of you this week or more. How go on, pray, the pair of battle-pieces I ordered in November, and which were to be finished clean off by Christmas?"

"I told you, when I undertook them, that the completion must be uncertain," replied Verelst, resuming his work on recognising in his visiter the proprietor of a rococo shop, to whom he occasionally furnished cabinet pictures on given subjects, and at prices which rendered the connexion far from advantageous to himself.—"You may remember I informed you that I was occupied in a series of military illustrations, which is about to be lithographed for a periodical work; and which I must finish before I commence any new work."

"Yes! You said you had a job on hand for some printseller. But this thing, I conclude, does not form one of your military groups?" said the stranger, pointing to a design of the King of Thule, from Schiller's ballad, which was beginning to make some progress on the canvas of Verelst.

"No,—this is a work of imagination, executed for my own pleasure," replied the artist, coldly.

"So I should guess: least wise it's plaguy unlike to promote the pleasure of other people!" observed the facetious Mr. Stubbs; sinking deliberately into the chair which had been courteously placed for him by Salome, on his entrance. "It's a thousand pities, Mr. Thingumee, that you keep idling your time away in this fashion, and disapp'inting your empl'yers, when you might make a mint of money by sticking to business.—I call it business to paint picturs such as folks can understand, and such as folks is consequently likely to buy. What could I do, I should like to know, with such an outlandish piece of goods as you've afore you? Ask any man as has exper'ence of such things, what modern picturs have found the best market. He'll tell you out and out, those with good straight for'ard, intelligible subjects, such as Gainsborough's Pigs, or Holmes's Cut Finger, or Heaphy's Crossing the Brook, or such like. The English are sensible folks, Mr. Thingumee, and don't like to be asked to step up into the clouds, so long as they've their own tight little island to stand on."

"I have always heard, Sir," replied Verelst, (in English somewhat better than his own, for twenty years of wedded life had familiarized the artist with the native language of his wife,) "that there is no country where the higher branches of art are better estimated than in England; or where higher prices have been paid for the chef d'œuvres of the ancient masters."

"I grant you, Sir,—I grant you!—As a matter of trade,—as a safe investment. John Bull is a man of merchandize, and ready to buy up standard picturs, just as he used to buy toolips in Holland, when toolips was matter of spekilation. But if you fancy, that 'cause he gives two thousand guineas for a Claude which there's a good chance of selling to the Emperor of Russia for three, he is like to give a long price for such a rigmarole concern as the one you are wasting your time on, instead of finishing picturs you've contracted for, I can tell you you'll find yourself in the wrong box, and no mistake."

The girls looked up anxiously from their work, dreading lest their father's reply to this coarse apostrophe should be an angry one. It was some relief to them to find that he was smiling to himself, with the silent contempt of superiority.

Mr. Stubbs was evidently disappointed. Accustomed to wrangle with the persons in his employ, he had hoped to raise a breeze.

"There's one p'int on which I beg we may understand one another, my good friend," said he, with an insulting wag of the head, "and that is, that none of your designs for the lethography trade is to be reproduced in my picturs. I bargained, please to recollect, that my couple of battle-pieces was to be strictly original, and the copyright my own; and it won't suit my purpose to have 'em a figuring in black and white in every printseller's window."

"I understood, Sir, that the pictures you wanted were to be skirmishes in the time and costume of the middle ages,—something in the style of Salvator's battle-pieces. The drawings I am supplying, are to illustrate the military costume of the modern nations of Europe."

"Ay, some'hat in the style of Salvator!"—said the dealer, catching at the expression, and overlooking the argument of the painter. "Now, I tell ye what, Mr. What's-your-name,—If you've a mind to put out your strength in them here two picturs, why I'm prepared to do the thing handsome by you. I spoke of eight pounds, or thereabouts, for the pair"——

"You offered ten guineas," said Verelst, firmly, without removing his hand or eye from the canvas.

"Well, p'rhaps it may have been guineas,—I can't say, without casting my eye over my mem'randum-book, which I don't carry about me. But, as I was a saying, if you've a mind to make these picturs what they ought to be, I don't care if I go as far as fifteen pound for the pair:—provided I secure the copyright, and the picturs is high and dry in my house by the first of April."

"You have fixed upon a curious epoch, Sir, for the completion of such a bargain," observed Verelst, with a quiet smile. "But I can undertake no such limitation. When I bring you my pictures, you shall purchase them or not, as you think proper, and on such terms as we may then agree upon."

The indignant Mr. Stubbs, who had not often found the poor artist so cool at a bargain, now began to surmise that Verelst had fallen into the hands of some rival dealer, and was beginning to be better acquainted with his own value. In order to satisfy himself on this point, he persisted in his bullying tone.

"This won't do for me, Sir!" said he, striking his stick upon the ground, with a vehemence that caused the poor invalid, whose nerves were so studiously respected in the family, to bound in her chair. "I've got my customers to satisfy; and when I've promised a gentleman to have some'hat ready for him by a certain day, why, I choose to be punctooal."

"My pictures, then, have been ordered of you?" said the artist coolly, arranging on his palette the colour prepared for the gray beard of the king of Thule.

"I said no sich thing, that I'm aware on!" retorted the dealer. "Gentlemen who is a furnishing their galleries, or their houses, comes to me and says, 'Stubbs, we want a pair o' pictures, for a dining-room, some'hat in the animal or battle line, three feet by two, or two-and-twenty inches by fourteen, as the case may be,—some'hat as 'll look well in an oak frame, or a Louis XIV. frame, according as it happens.' Well, Sir, I'm bound to answer: 'I've got nothing of the size by me, my lord, but if you'll look in next month, maybe I shall be able to satisfy you.' Sir, if his lordship looks in and finds nothing, he's a right to look elsewhere, and be displeased into the bargain."

The artist smiled. He was beginning to appreciate the line of business pursued by Mr. Stubbs.

"What I have to say, therefore," pursued the dealer, assuming a milder tone, "is, that if you've a mind to clench the bargain, I'm willing to leave a five-pound note or so with you, by way of earnest."

Verelst was just then so anxiously employed retouching the mouth of the king of Thule, that he paid no attention.

In another moment, Esther had stolen towards her father, and was whispering in his ear the offer made by his visiter; and perhaps suggesting motives for its acceptance. So, at least, Mr. Stubbs would probably have inferred, but that his whole attention was, at that moment, engrossed by the beautiful face thus suddenly presented to his admiration.

"Why, as sure as life, that's the original of the Gurl and Goat you sold me last Spring!" said he, unceremoniously contemplating the graceful form and beautiful countenance of the artist's daughter; who, unable to surmise that it was in such terms her father's exquisite picture of the Esmeralda, from Victor Hugo's romance of "Nôtre Dame," was likely to be qualified, stood regarding him with amazement. "A pretty plague that pictur' brought upon my shoulders!"—added the dealer, shrugging them, as if still conscious of the infliction.

"I thought you told me you had sold it?" said Verelst, calmly.

"Ay; but I didn't tell you who I'd sold it to;—and I know that, another time, I'd as lief drive a bargain with the devil! However, if ever he should come again for a companion, (as has once or twice happened, Mr. Thingumee, with picturs of your'n,) I'm glad, at least, to know I can get rid of him with noos of where the face is to be found, concerning which he made such a deuce's own to do in my shop."

The curiosity of Verelst was, by this time, sufficiently awakened to induce him to ask the questions anticipated by his visiter.

"Why, you're to know," resumed Mr. Stubbs in reply, (and as he spoke, both the mother and daughters suspended their needles to listen,) "you are to know, that, finding the pictur' hang on hand, and nowise taking, for not a soul of the nobs as deals at my shop, could make head or tail of the story with which it seemed to be connected,—I stuck it up one day in my window, along with the Nankin vases, and shells and minerals, and what not; as I always does with picturs I find unsaleable to the thorough-going ammytoors. Well, Sir! scarce was it on show, before a crowd was collected round the winders:—some laughing at the ideer of a goat with such horns and feet as them in the pictur'; but most on 'em attracted by seeing anything with fresh bright colours in a shop like mine, which seldom has anything in it but the meller tones and rich colouring o' the old masters. Well, Sir—among these starers, was an old gentleman, in a decent enough suit o' clothes, who stood there a matter of an hour a-staring at the pictur'. Thinks I to myself, 'a customer!' for though there was nothing about such a coat as his'n as looked as if it had a purse in its pocket, I've seen many a Jew dealer with thousands and thousands at command, go the length of a price in three figurs for a pictur',—yet with patches at his elbows. However, off marched the old fellow at last, without so much as a question asked in the shop! Somehow or another, I guessed I hadn't seen the last on him: and, next morning, having set up the Gurl and Goat in the winder, for a second chance, the boy a-watching the shop soon calls out to me, as I was a-breakfasting in the back parlour, 'Master, master, here's the old chap again, watching the winder as though he'd have a snatch at the gem-box.' Up I starts, Sir,—and seeing his eyes so fixed again upon the pictur', I stepped out on the pavement, as if I wanted to arrange the awning. 'A pretty thing that,' said I—as if by way of axing pardon for putting him aside;—and if you'll believe me, when the old feller looked up to answer me, his eyes was full o' tears!—I was nigh laughing outright, to think any one could find matter to cry at in a daub of a Gurl with a Goat. Upon which, instead of noticing my civility, the whimperer showed his manners by marching off. A good riddance, thinks I!—for I'm not one o' those who considers an idle crowd round a shop any advantage. Customers is seldom found in such assemblings."

"But I thought you told us this person had purchased the Esmeralda?" said Verelst.

"You'd have been a conjuror to have guessed as much, I can tell you, if you'd seen the individual as I sold it to!"—rejoined the dealer. "I thought no more, in course, o' the old chap; though my boy a'ter'ards told me, that not an evening passed, but, as soon as the lamps was lighted, he'd pass by the shop, as if on his way elsewhere; but never without casting a longing look at the winder: and ten minutes a'ter'ards, back again, no doubt on the same errand; though he took care not to stand gaping, as he had at first. Well, Sir! 'twas autumn-time, and no bus'ness stirring: so I took the opportoonity, just then, of my annival visit to Margate. When I came back, the pictur' was gone,—within ten shillings, too, of the price I'd first set upon it:—and Mrs. Stubbs, who'd been left in charge o' the shop, informed me, that, one day an old Jew, with whom we'd often had dealings in the lapidary line, after making a deal with her for some engraved stones, hintalios, and cammyos, inquired, in a sort o' careless way, the price o' the Gurl and Goat. At first, he scouted it, at the price named; but seemed cur'ous to learn how it had come into our hands. Now, its a rule in our bus'ness, Mr. Thingumee, never to give explanations o' that natur' to nobody, 'specially to dealers. So my missus said that I was away on a scursion; and that she knowed no more than nothin' at all, about none o' the picturs, except the price marked on 'em. So, not to trouble you with more p'ticlars than necessary, at last they came to a deal: and a'ter he'd booked up for the lot, says the old Jew, 'I'd give a trifle,' says he, 'to know the artist as painted that pictur'!' My wife hinted as much as that maybe he was dead and gone—that the pictur' was p'rhaps an old 'un. 'How can that be,' says the Jew, 'when the romance itself is only of recent date?' My wife know'd nothing about romances—not she——"

"But I told you, Sir, that my picture represented a scene from the novel of Nôtre Dame!"—

"If you did, I've other matters to think of, than to stuff my head with the stories of novels! Well, Sir—a'ter the Jew had fairly made his bargain, my missus swears, that he stood a-looking at the pictur' with tears in his eyes, all as one as the gentleman I had noticed in the street: and she fancied she heard him a-muttering atween his teeth,—'I never thought to have had a sight o' that blessed face again!'—However, Mrs. Stubbs is a nervous, fanciful, stericky body, and apt to take conundrums into her head. 'Where shall I send the pictur' home to?' says she, by way o' putting an end to his vagaries.—'Send?' says he. 'I'll carry it myself!' 'The boy's got nothing to do, Sir,' says Mrs. Stubbs, purlitely; 'and I'm always glad to obleege a customer.'—'I'll carry it myself!' persisted the surly old fellow, without so much as a thank-ye. And without more ado, he hoisted the Gurl and Goat on his arm, and out he trudged! My missus, who was somewhat thrown aback by his p'remptory air, no sooner sees him out o' the shop, than she finds lying on the compter the packet of hintalios, for which the Jew had just paid down forty pounds odd on the nail: so, having a mind to know what became o' the pictur', she bid the boy hurry a'ter him, and be sure not to give him the packet till he'd followed him home. According to the lad's account——but maybe I'm a-tiring you ladies?" said Mr. Stubbs, interrupting himself, on perceiving the breathless attention he was exciting in the little family.

"On the contrary, Sir, we are deeply interested," replied Mrs. Verelst, with her usual well-bred gentleness.

"Well then, ma'am, as I was a saying, 'cording to the lad's account, the old chap hadn't perceeded many streets, which he did charily and cautiously, avoiding jostling with foot-passengers, as if he was a guarding a living Gurl and Goat he was fond of, instead of a pictur' o' no p'rticlar valooe, he looked round cautiously, as though he'd a guess at being watched.—Maybe he'd noticed the lad in the shop; for, having gone the length o' the street, and stopped again, and still found the young feller at his heels, he asked him short round in plain words, what was his bus'ness? The boy had nothin' for it, but to give up the parcel, expecting, maybe, a trifle for his pains,—the lot being of sich valooe. But the old feller gave nothin' but a grunt,—and having pocketed his packet, on again with the pictur'!"—

"And did he still follow him, Sir?" interrupted Esther, as Mr. Stubbs paused for breath; or perhaps, like other orators, to stimulate the curiosity of his hearers.

"He had his missus's orders, and that was enough!" said the dealer, fancying every one as well aware as himself of the absolute sceptre wielded by his helpmate. "More cautious than at first, he crept on at a distance, till he watched the old man into a house in Greek Street, Soho. But lord, what was the good o' that? When, on his return from this precious fox-chase, Mrs. Stubbs looked in B'yle's Guide and the D'rectory, one a'ter t'other, the number pointed out by the lad was missing in both. The house was all as one as uninhabited. H'wever, on hearing his story, it struck me, maybe the Jew, who seemed so mightily taken with the pictur' might have a fancy for a companion: so—the first idle day, off I set to the house. The shutters was all shut, Sir; and the doorway as dirty as if neither broom or scrubbing-brush had touched it for years!—H'wever, I knocked and rang, and rang and knocked; and hollow enough all sounded within!—But the hollow sound of my own rings and knocks was all the good I got; and a'ter half an hour wasted, I saw I might as well give up the bus'ness."

"You did not gain admittance, then?" inquired the artist, curious to learn the mode of the picture-dealer's proceedings in such cases.

"I did another day, Sir;—but only by management,—and plaguy bad management it was! A matter of six weeks a'ter'ards, I was passing through Greek Street, on bus'ness of my own, when what should I spy but a smart cab a-waiting at the door o' the old deserted house,—though for the matter o' that, it was just as much shut up as ever, and just as grimy and dull! Up I went, h'wever; and, by way o' not frighting the spiders if I turned out to be mistaken in s'posing the owner o' the cab admitted within, gave a very gentle ring. A dirty old 'oman—a fit match to the place—opened it in a stanter, as they say in French. 'I've business, Ma'am, with your master,' says I,—and immediately walked in so coolly, that no oppersition did she think of offering. The old cat made no move to show me further; so I made bold to open the front parlour door. All dark as pitch, and smelling as mouldy as a family vault! Shutting the door gently, I thought I'd try my luck at the back 'un. Locked!—However, the n'ise I made, trying to open it, reached them as was within, just as their v'ices reached me;—and in a trice, the lock turned, and the door was placed ajar.——I just leave you to guess, Mrs. Thingumee, who was within!"

"I fear it would be wasting your time, Sir, as well as my own," replied Mrs. Verelst, to whom the inquiry appeared to be addressed.

"Why, neither more nor less than, as large as life, the old gentleman whom I had noticed so often at my winder, staring at the 'Gurl and the Goat!'"—

"But you said there were voices"——

"Ay—and t'other v'ice—'twas my business to have known without knocking,—so often as it had sounded in my shop!——T'other v'ice was that of my best customer—the Duke of Rochester;—to whom I've sold picturs and statooes to the amount of no matter how many thousands of pounds."

"You were admitted, then, into their presence?"

"Not I;—nor I hadn't no wish, when I saw I was an introoder—or at least was told so by the old fogrum who opened the door.——I hadn't a guess, then, what sort of treason they were locked-up a-hatching together;—and a'ter being unceremoniously walked out o' the house by the old chap, who wouldn't so much as listen to what I had to say in explanation, I didn't care to inquire. But a week ago, or so, I had an ugly money transaction with a fine lady customer of mine, who'd given me a bill of her husband's in payment, as required for me to follow up the parties;—and while so doing, I was sent from pillar to post, till at last I got referred to one A. O., in Greek Street, Soho. The murder was out, Sir!—the old Jew, who bought the pictur' of me, was neither more nor less than one o' the agents employed on such errands by the famous Money-lender!"

"I am sorry my picture should have been the means of exposing you to such a disagreeable adventure," observed Verelst. "It seems, however, to have been, in a great measure, one of your own seeking"——

"What do you mean by my own seeking, Sir?" cried Mr. Stubbs, again striking the point of his stick against the floor.——"For as little as you seem to understand, Mr. Thingumee, of the ways of carrying on bus'ness in England, I'd have you to know that——"

The loud and angry tones of the dealer were at that moment interrupted by the sudden entrance of a person whose ascent of the creaking stairs had been drowned in his vociferation. The voice of Mr. Stubbs now, however, became alone silent; while every other person in the room uttered an exclamation of delight to welcome the arrival of —Basil Annesley!

CHAPTER VIII.

No sooner did the picture-dealer notice the courteous familiarity with which the young guardsman accosted the artist, and the almost deferential tone in which he inquired after the health of Mrs. Verelst, than he rose instinctively from his seat. There was no mistaking the fact that the guest belonged to the order of society which he regarded as his customers; or that the painter's family lived with him on terms of intimacy amounting to friendship. Coarse as he was, Mr. Stubbs knew himself at that moment to be the inferior of the party.

"I will call about this little bus'ness, Sir, another time," said he, addressing Verelst, as he prepared to quit the room; and it was only as he moved slowly towards the door, that, incited perhaps by curiosity to ascertain what could have brought so fashionable-looking a young man to the fireside of a poor painter, he recognised the rare loveliness of Salome and her sister. A significant smile unconsciously overspread his features, on a discovery he considered so pregnant with evil-meaning. It was possibly the same perception that induced him, after having closed the door, and gained the staircase for departure, to return into the room, and by way of certifying the relative position of the parties, reapproach poor Verelst with a whispered request, that he would keep to himself the Greek Street secret.

"You'll oblige me, Sir," said he, in an audible whisper, very different from that of his preceding conversations, "by refraining from all mention of the story of the gurl's picture and A. O.!"—

Had Mr. Stubbs searched the world over for a word calculated to startle the feelings of the young stranger, he could not have been more successful! The face of Annesley became instantly crimsoned. Apprehending that the vulgar fellow who thus unceremoniously addressed the father of Esther, could have no other motive for his allusion than the discovery of the difficulties from which he had extricated himself by the aid of Abednego, in order to relieve his humble friend, Basil almost trembled lest the whole affair was about to be exposed before his face by the officiousness of a stranger. It was not till after Mr. Stubbs, after bowing facetiously around him, had again quitted the room, that Annesley breathed freely.

"That was one of my enlightened patrons, my dear Mr. Annesley," said Verelst, resuming his pencil under the cheering influence of Basil's presence;—"one of those who treat me like a clod of the earth, yet expect me to exhibit the instincts and inspiration of genius!"

Basil replied by an ejaculation of disgust.

"But my good Mr. Annesley—my dear young friend," resumed the painter, "these girls told me just now, you had been in the country nursing a sick relative. Are you quite sure you have not taken her disorder? I never saw you look so ill, since the time of your fever at Heidelberg, when we had you into our house for change of air!"

"You remind me of one of the happy epochs of my life!" cried Basil, suddenly acquiring all the bloom of which Verelst was quite justified in accusing him of being deficient.

"Ay—now you look somewhat more like yourself again!" cried the painter. "Now you are a fitter object for an artist's studio!——You cannot imagine, my dear Sir, how I have wanted you!—The sketches cannot get on without you. If you had remained long in the country I should have been ruined!—I wanted spirits to proceed to business during your absence; but since you are here again, I will push back the King of Thule in disgrace into his corner.——Salome! bring forward the drawing-table!"

And while the young man was bending over the chair of the invalid, inquiring anxiously into the events of the four or five last days, without heeding the garrulity of his old master, the change was accomplished. On Basil's release from his almost filial attentions to the worn and wasted, yet still beautiful invalid, all was in readiness to be set in movement, by his advice touching the helmets of Prussian lancers, and the boots of Hungarian pandours.

Taking the chair placed for him by Salome close beside the artist, he proceeded, with patient good-humour, to play the critic on the spirited military groups, in which it was indeed difficult to point out a fault, save in trifling accessories of costume. So animated were the charges, so admirable the equestrian combinations, that Basil, instead of enlarging on a few errors of equipment, fell, as usual, into rhapsodies at the spirit and originality of the whole.

It was probably the stimulus of this very enthusiasm which had been wanting to Verelst; for in a moment his chalks were in full activity, and Basil at leisure to perceive that the seat provided for him by Salome commanded a view of the embroidery frame over which the graceful heads of the two girls were stooping together. It was only natural that he should thenceforward divide his attention between the withered hand, under which was growing into life a rude bridge over a mountain torrent, hotly defended by a legion of Tyrolese peasants, armed with the picturesque wildness of irregular warfare, against a trimly detachment of French light infantry, in all the studied equipment of military array,—and the fairy fingers of the sisters, as they flew over their work. Though the hands of the two girls were closely intertwined as they sat together, so that the slight form of the one almost effaced the still slenderer figure of the other, the eyes of Basil had no difficulty in detecting the hand so dear to him,—the hand which had trembled on his sudden entrance,—and which now, in the joy of his presence again in that chamber, was performing thrice the work effected by the less-interested Salome; who was sufficiently at her ease to contemplate, every now and then, at idle leisure, the venerable figure of her father, contrasted with that of the handsome young visiter bending over him while watching the efforts of his pencil. Placed as Salome was, she was, of course, enabled to see that, ever and anon, his eyes wandered furtively towards Esther; from the detection of whose downcast looks he knew himself to be secure.

"Do you happen to know anything, Mr. Annesley, of a family named Maitland?" suddenly inquired Mrs. Verelst, after exercising, perhaps, the same unnoticed scrutiny as Salome.

Annesley started, and looked confused.

"They live in Arlington Street," added Esther, in a low voice, taking this opportunity to lift her eyes to his face, and surprised, in her turn, to find it covered with conscious blushes.

"The son is a brother-officer of mine," replied he, gradually recovering his self-possession.

"It is, then, as we supposed, to you that Esther is indebted for her introduction to the family!" observed Mrs. Verelst.

"Introduction?" repeated Basil, in evident surprise.

"I received, an hour ago, a note, signed Lucy Maitland, begging to know my terms for tuition, and requesting me to be in Arlington Street at three o'clock to-morrow," said Esther in explanation.

The former confusion of countenance of Basil Annesley was now a thousand times augmented. The idea of Esther Verelst—his Esther—a singing mistress to those flighty girls,—in that showy, heartless house,—subjected to the gaze of the "string of puppies" frequenting it,—exposed to the silly impertinence of Lady Maitland,—condemned to all the ignominy inflicted on a teacher, by people of empty heads and callous hearts!

"And has Miss Verelst engaged herself?" said he, addressing the mother.

"She merely wrote accepting the appointment for to-morrow, when there will probably be little difficulty in adjusting the question of terms and hours," replied the invalid.

"You do me too much honour in supposing that the recommendation came from me," said Annesley, after a pause, in which he had been balancing the evils likely to arise to the beautiful Esther Verelst from such a connexion, against the advantage to the necessitous family of an additional guinea a-week earned by their exertions. "I should scarcely have suggested a place likely to expose a person so timid as Est——as Miss Verelst, to the constant notice and molestation of precisely the order of persons whose familiarity drove her from the rehearsals at the opera. The advantage to be derived would be dearly purchased by exposure to the habits of a house, of all others of my acquaintance the one into which I should be least disposed to introduce a sister of my own."

Esther was satisfied. The pang excited in her bosom by Basil's confusion at the first mention of the name of Maitland, was gradually subsiding.

"Surely," observed Salome, little suspecting the new vexation to which she was about to give rise, "Maitland was the name of the ladies with whom we saw you that night at the opera, when Madame Branzini was so good as to lend us her box?"—

"I scarcely recollect," stammered Basil, with some embarrassment.

"Oh! yes—we met you on the stairs with a beautiful fair girl on your arm—whom you hurried into a carriage, and returned to assist us. I remember hearing it announced as that of Lady Maitland."

"How can you recollect such trash, child!" interrupted Verelst. "Annesley! what think you of placing the stout fellow with the scythe, who is striking down the standard of France, on the broken parapet of the bridge?"—

"Admirable!" cried Basil, glad to direct his eyes towards the drawing at which he had been hitherto only pretending to look. "It will make a modern edition of the famous battle of the Standard. But what a pity, Sir, to throw away this exquisite design on a series for which you are so miserably paid? Why not place it in the gorge of a mountain pass, and execute it in oils?"

"Ay, why not?"—cried the artist, recalling at that moment to mind his order for the two battle-pieces, and justly surmising that Mr. Stubbs had neither art nor learning enough to detect the anachronism, if such a study were made the companion to a skirmish of the condottieri of Sir John Hawkwood and the Cardinal de Bourbon; and little suspecting the anxiety of mind which this interruption of their conversation was causing to his favourite daughter.

"Esther has been setting to music, since you have been gone, those pretty words you brought her the last time you were here," observed Mrs. Verelst, after her husband and his guest had sufficiently debated together the question of the new Battle of the Standard, which was to rival that of Leonardo.

"I thought she would like them!" cried Basil, again raising his eyes, and meeting those of Esther with a degree of frankness that almost satisfied her he was not actuated by fear of exposing his own flirtations to her examination, in opposing her entrance into the Maitland family.

"And a fine melancholy ditty she has made of them!" added her father.

"They were appropriate only to a minor key," observed Esther, in an apologetic tone.

"Will you not let me hear the ballad, and judge for myself?" inquired Basil.

"I am so afraid of not satisfying your expectation!" said Esther, rising, however, instantly from her work. "I am sure they are favourite verses of yours, or you would not have been at the trouble of copying them."

"Show me the man who would like his favourite verses the less from hearing them sung by such a voice as yours, Esther!" said her father fondly. And it was, perhaps, the dread of further encomiums which hastened the blushing girl in her preparations for complying with Mr. Annesley's request, by throwing open the door of her mother's room, in which (in submission to the requirements of the artist's studio) stood the piano.

Sweet as it was expressive was the ritournelle that prefaced Esther Verelst's articulate and melodious recital of the following stanzas:—

BALLAD.

Yes! other eyes may brighten, love,
When gazing upon thine,
As gloomiest brooks run glittering where
The shedding sunbeams shine.
Oh! did I love thee less, be sure,
Mine own would brighter be;
Content thee, then, with smiles from them,
And bear with tears from me!

Yes! other tones may soften, love,
When to thine ear address't,
As breezes lulled the barque allure
O'er ocean's treacherous breast.
Oh! did I love thee less, be sure,
My words would smoother be;
Content thee, then, with praise from them,
And bear with truth from me!

Yes! other arms may bear thee, love,
O'er fortune's flowery way;
Mine, with unwearied fervent faith,
Abide the darker day.
Oh! did I love thee less, be sure,
My aid would prompter be!
Content thee, then, with pleasing them,
And keep thy love for me!

To the utter mortification of poor Esther, not a word of commendation broke from Annesley at the conclusion of her performance. Her father exclaimed—"Brava, my girl! charming, charming!"—but the voice of Annesley was mute. The piano commanded no view of the room in which her auditors were seated; and she had consequently no means of surmising that if her ungracious friend uttered no common phrase of compliment, it was because his feelings were far too deeply excited for words. Salome, who had watched his tearful eyes during the exquisite song of her sister, was satisfied.

"After all, this is a doleful ditty to salute a friend with on his return," observed the artist, also noticing the silence of Basil, and with a glance detecting the cause, which he justly attributed to the sensitiveness produced by a previous shock on the spirits. "You forget, my Esther, that Mr. Annesley is come to us from the sick-room of one he loves, and that he wants cheering."

"I am always cheered when I find myself so kindly welcomed to this fireside," said Basil, attempting to rally his spirits; "in the first place, by your cordiality; in the second, by the sight of your rational occupations. The do-nothing, good-for-nothing world I live in, contains few sights so pleasant."

"I fancied," said Salome, "that the ladies of England were highly enlightened and accomplished?"

"Superficially accomplished. They learn as much music and drawing and as many languages, as can be taught for money; but nothing is done to cultivate that intellectual sense which renders such acquirements available."

"And these Miss Maitlands, Esther's pupils?" demanded Salome, returning to the charge.

"Your sister has decided, then, on accepting their tuition?" demanded Basil, in a constrained tone, as Esther, after closing her instrument, returned into the sitting-room.

"I scarcely know what pretext I could find for refusing," she observed, in a timid voice, resuming her former place.

"Would you favour me with a sight of Miss Maitland's letter?" inquired Annesley.

"The letter?—Willingly!"—said Mrs. Verelst, producing it from a paper-rack on the table beside her chair.

"This is the handwriting of the brother, who is in the same regiment with myself," observed Basil, after examining the letter, having from the first surmised the possibility of a hoax on the part of his brother officers. "If you permit me, I will make inquiries of Lady Maitland concerning her intentions; and bring you an exact account, before you give yourself the trouble and annoyance of a long walk this cold weather, for the sole purpose, perhaps, of gratifying unjustifiable curiosity."

"But what curiosity can poor Esther have excited among persons to whom she is known only by name?" observed Mrs. Verelst, mistrustfully.

"Pardon me,—she is personally known to Lady Maitland's son, who has probably mentioned her to his sisters. Surely," said he, turning suddenly to Esther for confirmation, "you remember the tall, fair, young man, so frequently with old Colonel Carrington, who accosted us at the stage-door on the day you made that hasty exit from rehearsal?"

"Perfectly!" replied Esther, now fully enlightened as to the origin of his objections, "and I am consequently certain that it would be disagreeable to me to give lessons to Lady Maitland's daughters."

"Still, before you give a decided negative, which will, of course, be ungraciously construed, allow me to institute some inquiry into the object of the parties," resumed Basil. "I see these people daily. I will even make a point of going there to-night. Nothing will be easier than for me to discover, without compromising you, whether the young ladies have any serious intention of improving themselves under your hands, and requiting your trouble. The girls are good-natured, though silly and trifling; and would not, I should imagine, lend themselves to unladylike mystification."

"Must you go there to-night?" inquired Esther, blushing crimson.

"Is there any obstacle?" inquired Basil, surprised at her remonstrance.

"Only that this is Twelfth Night," observed Salome, for once almost as much embarrassed as her sister. "Madame Branzini, who intends to faire tirer les rois at her house, has made us promise to join her family party; and begged us, should you return to town, to assure you how much honoured she should feel by your company."

"I accept with pleasure!" cried Basil. "But your friend, Madame Branzini, wisely adheres in England to your rational hours of the continent, and will expect her visiters before nine, and dismiss them at eleven; till which hour, Lady Maitland would be much surprised to see any evening guest enter her house. I shall, therefore, be able to reconcile both visits. I dine at the Club, and will be with your friend at——what hour did you say you were going?"—

"We shall be there soon after eight," replied Salome. We always return home, you know, to assist my mother at ten."

"I will not hear of being an obstacle to your pleasures to-night," said Mrs. Verelst, cheerfully. "It is so seldom you enjoy a pleasant party!—Twelfth Day comes but once a-year.—Do you remember, Mr. Annesley, how merrily we kept it, the winter you were at Heidelberg?"

Basil remembered only too well the joyous cordiality of his old professor's family party.

"Nay, surely you were le roi de la fève?—ay, and Esther yonder was your queen," cried the artist, laughing heartily at the recollection. "She was a mere child, then; and you little better than a boy. But I remember what a fanciful little majesty we made of her in her mother's brocaded dress, with pompons and powder, and old points, like a queen in one of Mademoiselle de Scudéri's novels! Little gipsy, that you were, Esther! you made your old father trick out your draperies and arrange your throne!"

"I wish we may amuse ourselves half so well to-night, at Madame Branzini's!" murmured Esther, with a sigh. "I was a child then—I feared nothing then,—now I seem to be afraid of everything and everybody!"

"You were then in your own home and country, Esther," said the artist, with a sigh far heavier than her own:—"a comfort, my poor child, of which your father's inconsideration has for ever deprived you!"—

"Not for ever, I trust," responded Mrs. Verelst, in a low tone.

"As we are to meet to-night, I will shorten my visit now," said Basil, rising from his seat, by way of interrupting these saddening retrospections; "but I must not go without accomplishing its real object. I have brought you a curiosity to look at, Sir," resumed he, addressing Verelst, after drawing a small volume from his pocket. "Something in your own way—a little book which I borrowed from my mother."

It was a scarce copy of Hollar's Engravings, after Holbein's Dance of Death, which was examined by Verelst with deliberation and enthusiasm.

"I know these designs," said he, "far better than I know any of my own! I spent a month at Basle, for the express purpose of studying the characteristics of that quaint old master. This is a curious copy, and seems enriched with original interleavings," he observed, scrutinizing the volume with the eye of a connoisseur. "But what have we here?—there is an Arabic inscription on the title-page—or Sanscrit—or, stay!—you Rachael, can help us here. Are not these Hebrew characters?"—

Basil Annesley took the open volume from the hands of Verelst, to convey it to his wife. On his way, he naturally glanced at the inscription, which was decidedly Hebrew, and written in ink almost invisible from age. But at the foot, in a modern handwriting, to his utter amazement, were inscribed the memorable initials of—A. O.!—

Before he had recovered the shock caused by this startling, though of course accidental coincidence, the whole attention of Basil was absorbed by the effect produced on Mrs. Verelst by the sight of the volume! Pale as death, with quivering lips, and suspended respiration, she sank back in her chair the moment the inscription was placed before her. Esther and Salome, whose attention was constantly directed towards the invalid, were by her side in a moment.

"Place a screen before the fire—I was afraid the room was too close for her!" faltered Esther, opening a large green fan which lay constantly on her mother's table.

"The ether, father!—you will find it on the dressing-table within," cried Salome; nor had either of them leisure to notice that it was by Basil, by whom, as by a devoted son, the commission was executed. The eyes of Mrs. Verelst, however, even after the application of the ether to her temples, remained closed, and her hands cold as marble.

The book, a glance at which, young Annesley could not forbear regarding as the origin of her sudden seizure, had now fallen on the floor. The dispiriting nature of the frontispiece (which represented the grisly skeleton of Death beguiling an old man into the grave by the music of a dulcimer) had probably conveyed an insupportable shock to the sensitive mind of the enfeebled invalid.

Some minutes elapsed before Mrs. Verelst evinced the smallest token of consciousness;—a longer period than Basil, who had often seen her overcome by faintness, had ever known her remain thoroughly insensible to what was passing around her. At length she slowly unclosed her eyes, and a faint murmur broke from her lips. Esther instantly bent down her head to listen; but Annesley, without any such effort, distinctly heard her exclaim—"My father—who was it spoke to me of my father?"—

"Better wheel her into her own room," interposed the artist, who, during the swoon of his wife, had stood aloof, distressed and helpless. "It is nothing—the heat of the fire—the sulphur of those detestable coals!—Let us all be quiet, and she will be herself again in a moment."

Having assisted the girls to remove her into the adjoining chamber, Verelst returned to receive, with an air of stupefaction, the adieus of Basil; who, conscious that his presence at such a moment might be importunate, hastened to withdraw.

It was dusk when Basil emerged from the house; and a desolate winter rain was falling in torrents, splashing into the overflowing kennels, and almost obscuring the light of the lamps. As the young guardsman reached the junction of the small street in which Verelst's house was situated, with South Audley Street, in attempting to muffle himself in his cloak in resistance to the driving rain, he encountered what, at the first shock, he conceived to be the lamp-post! But on recoiling, he found that, in addition to the lamp-post, he had struck against an individual combating the gusts of wind with a disabled umbrella. Something irresistibly ludicrous in the dilemma of his brother in distress, attracted his attention to the struggling wayfarer; when lo! by the light of the lamp, he recognised the marked and well-remembered features of Abednego the Money-lender!—

The encounter was untimely; but Basil would not shrink from recognising the man by whom he had been so greatly obliged.

"We have untoward weather for our walk," said Annesley, lending his assistance to reverse the obstinate resistance of the reeking cotton umbrella.

"Unpleasant enough; and you, who walk for pleasure, might, I should think, spare your pains for a happier moment," rejoined the harsh voice of Abednego. "With me, the case is different."

"Different indeed! since you have the means of commanding any sort of equipage you please: while I have at my disposal only that enjoyed by our father Adam."

"And how long should I enjoy the means, pray, —were I to lavish them on costly equipages?" rejoined the Money-lender. "Not a year!—not a month, perhaps, were I tempted into such ridiculous prodigality. I might be reduced to the same beggarly shifts which bring so many fine gentlemen shuffling, nay, all but begging to my door! For whether people beg for a loan or beg for a gift, where lies the mighty difference? They are still beggars. Are you bound for St. James's, young Sir? If so, we may become a mutual benefit. Your arm is strong enough to hold up the umbrella; and by taking mine, we may share it between us. Don't be afraid!—In such weather as this, none of your fine friends will be astir. No one will recognise the gallant Mr. Basil Annesley cheek-by-jowl with A. O.!"—

"It is no such consideration—" Basil was beginning.

"Away with ye then, and make an end of the discussion," interrupted Abednego, practically enforcing his advice. "Satisfy your scruples by the certainty that you have a second time rendered service to a man who is more than ready to render service to you."

Partly carried away by his companion's impetuosity, and partly curious of further insight into his eccentric character, Basil suffered himself to be disposed of. In another minute, he found himself sole occupant of the wet flagstones with the mysterious Abednego.

"But surely, Sir, at your age," said he, by way of renewing the conversation, "the enjoyment of personal comfort must be a greater object than the amassment of mere wealth?"—

"Who is to determine a man's notions of personal comfort?" cried the Money-lender. "And what do you mean by mere wealth? My notion of personal comfort is independence of hirelings—whether man or beast; and as to wealth, what is there in this world beyond it?—What else controls the march of empires—the progress of civilisation —the development of science—the cultivation of art? What but money, causes the crucible to glow,—sinks the shaft,—launches the balloon into the sky—or plunges the diving-bell into the depths of the ocean? Of what metal is composed the key of the poet's imagination—the orator's eloquence—the physician's skill—the divine's zeal and fervour?—Of gold, Sir—of current gold!—He who hath that, commands kings on their thrones, or philosophers in their cabinets! Talk not to me of the refinements of art. If I want to enjoy them, I buy up both art and artists—an orchestra of musicians — a legion of sculptors or painters! Your capitalist, boy—your capitalist is the only solid sovereign of modern times!—'Mere wealth?' quotha. I knew that you were a boy, Basil Annesley, but I held you not for a child!"—

The young man could scarcely resist a smile at the impetuosity of his companion.

"I perfectly agree with you Sir," said he at last. "But it was by fully estimating the value of money as a means of commanding enjoyment, that I expressed my surprise at your preferring a wet walk to a luxurious carriage."

"Does the sportsman find the greater pleasure in the flavour of his game, or the pursuit of the chase?" demanded Abednego, in a sterner voice. "Have you not strength of mind to figure to yourself the intensity of enjoyment which a man, appreciating the true value of money, may find in the combinations by which he adds thousand to thousand,—ingot to ingot?—Even as the artist whose family you have just quitted" (Basil found it impossible to repress a start!) "finds exquisite delight in the progress of a picture by whose perfectionment he hopes to attain profit and fame, does the money-monger glory in the machinery by which his enrichment is accomplished. Even economy—even privation—has charms, when tending towards the achievement of the grand object of his life! Ay, stripling—abject as it may seem to you, the Money-lender's is a glorious calling!—Every minute of my life swells the amount of my possessions. Other men's property diminishes with their span of life;—mine, like the evening shadows, grows as the sun goes down. I am a wretch, eh?—a shabby threadbare wretch, with whom a smart officer like you, is ashamed to be seen arm in arm! Shabby and threadbare as I seem, I tell you I hold in subjection those of whose acquaintance you are proud—those to whose acquaintance you barely aspire! Your fine ladies come and beg of me,—cajole me—flatter me!—cajole and flatter A. O. in his cobweb-tapestried halls of State.—'Mere wealth!'—What, but the wealth I have amassed by trudging in the rain while others swelter in carriages, brings the Duke of Rochester cringing to my feet, lying and swindling for the means of keeping up his empty state! His covetings of A. O.'s 'mere wealth' have converted that man, created by nature for honour and refinement, into an equivocating pettifogger. Ay, Sir, you are shocked—you consider my tongue coarse and licentious!—You would plead privilege of peerage against the Money-lender, in favour of the uncle of your fribble acquaintance, young Wilberton." (Again Basil started.) "But when you have lived longer, you will come to the same conclusions. And now, good evening to you, Mr. Basil Annesley! for here we are, opposite to the Gloucester Coffee House, within hail of your out-at-elbows, discreditable friends, the Maitlands!—Good evening!—I should be as loth as yourself to expose you to the shame of being met skulking in the rain under the same ignominious umbrella with such a Barabbas as A. O.!"—

THE SONGS OF THE MONTHS.

NO. V.—THE SONG OF MAY.

1.

Where the snow lies cold
In his glacier hold,
Will I unseal the fountain;
And loosen the reins
Of his silver veins,
To prance down the lichen mountain.
And the agate cups of the lilies pale,
With their golden petals spreading,
Shall pout for his gush in the balmy vale,
As a virgin sighs for her wedding.
They shall meet—shall meet—
For his liquid feet
Shall yield to no long delay;
They shall wed;—and bless
With their loveliness
The wreath of the Poet May,

2.

Where the brown deer slake,
At the lonely lake,
By a glade through the forest peeping;
And bright with the dew
Of the mountains blue,
The weary river is creeping:
With an artful lure shall the fisher ply
His gentle craft, unheeded;
(A supple rod, and a cunning fly,
And a musing soul, are needed.)
While I scatter bloom,
And the Spring's perfume,
From wings of the heron gray,
As he wades, and flies,
Through the argosies
Of emerald-freighted May.

3.

Where steps but a span,
Yonder bow'd old man,
On well-worn crutches leaning;
The oak I will dress
In a wilderness
Of foliage, brightly preening.
And deep in the shade of his goodly boughs,
With lips like dew-bathed roses,
Sweet maidens shall sigh to their rustics' vows,
When the village revel closes;
While Age shall relate
How he danced and sate,
With those in the church-yard clay,
Once the fair and free,
'Neath that self-same tree,
In bright, incense-breathing May.

4.

Even cities dun
Shall partake my sun,
Through shattered casements streaming;
Where the son of toil,
With a ghastly smile,
Of his schoolboy days is dreaming.
And when he awakes to the conscious world,
The bright ideas haunting,
He shall think of the wilds where the woodbines curled,
And the poppies bright were flaunting,
And stricken and shrunk,
Like a blasted trunk
Still bare in the woodlands gay;
Shall forget his care,
In the bloom-charmed air,
Of the dainty Sylphide, May!

IRISH TREASON IN PARIS.

MR. RICHARD O'HARA TO MR. BARNES O'HARA, GRAY'S INN, LONDON.

MY DEAR BARNES,—Here is what you wished me to do for you, after my allusions in conversation to the matter, during your last most welcome visit to Innismore. Make what use you like of it. But, for Heaven's sake, look well at it first, to convince yourself that there is no real treason in it. I can only assure you I meant none. And for your satisfaction, as well as for that of others, I volunteer another declaration. Apart from all the jocose mystifying of authors, I declare to you, on my word, that the character sketched for you, is closely drawn from the life; and also, that, as far as my memory serves me, at a distance of seven years, any remarkable sentiments reported by me of him, were uttered by him.—Ever your affectionate,
R. O'H.

WHEN I was last in Paris,—mind-stirring, heart-cheering Paris!—ay, and, let some people say what they will, social, and truly social Paris!—but this is too vivacious for a beginning; and, besides, it has nothing at all to do with the matter in hand.

Well, when I was last in Paris, in 1835, I believe I was more than half-spoiled, by the unmerited and unexpected attentions paid to me. One mode in which these attentions became manifested, consisted in visits received from celebrated persons, with whom I had been previously unacquainted, except by name and reputation. But of such individuals, it is not now my intention to indulge my vanity by speaking. There were others, less known to fame, who did me a similar honour; and of this class, I shall at present select one, who particularly interested me. I shall never forget even his very first appearance. He followed his presenting friend into the room, holding forward, between his finger and thumb, a great, broad-brimmed hat. He stepped timidly, and yet almost stridingly, towards me; his head and eyes drooped sideways to the floor. There seemed a foregone doubt, through his whole manner and mien, of his claims to self-appreciation, though at that time of day he need have entertained no such sentiment. His attire was also less costly than his present situation in the world ought to have conceded,—and, moreover, was worn very carelessly. And now I must come—though I know not how, with perfect politeness to him, I can pleasantly do so—to glance at his head and face. He was very, very like Socrates; quite bald, to the back of his head; his forehead high, broad, bony, knuckled, and shiny; his brows shaggy and protruding, and his eyes placed far in under them; his nose short, a little snubbed; and heavily visaged; in fact, as I said before, he was very, very like Socrates, and it follows, very, very ugly. And yet these very ugly Socratian head and features would beam with the expression of a perfectly beautiful mind and heart, whenever—and I soon found out that his habits in that way were not of rare occurrence—he spoke of persons whom he loved, esteemed, or honoured.

But it was the self-humiliating manners and expression, which, at a first glance, puzzled me. Alas, I could not have known, till he afterwards explained,—merely, however, by hinting, in a dislocated way, his own history,—I could not have known that they were the indelible marks, which, at a tender age, say eighteen or nineteen, persecution, terror, and wretchedness, had burned and branded into him. When I saw him, he was about sixty.

He sat down at my feet, on the sofa to which then, as well as now, I was chained, except when I went out in a carriage, or was carried to bed; folding his arms tight across his breast, and still inclining his head and eyes to the floor. Although nearly forty years out of Ireland, he had saluted me in a luscious brogue, which it did one's heart good to hear. A pause ensued. He began the conversation by paying me compliments. They were soon acknowledged and passed, for he by no means wanted the good taste of good feeling. He fell upon another introductory topic,—for evidently he would not yet approach some subjects, which he had come purposely to enter into. And a very strange introductory topic it was. He mentioned the name of a mutual acquaintance, a French gentleman: I admitted that I knew him.

"Yes, Sir; and you've lent him money," he said, still keeping his head and eyes turned to the carpet.—I will add here that he followed the exploded fashion of calling you "Sir," at the beginning and end of almost every sentence—another mark, I have since thought, of the effects of the early times of persecution; or else it might have been his quietly ironical imitation of a former necessitous habit and tone.

"You've lent him money, Sir; and you want it yourself now."

I thought it incumbent upon me to get offended; but, after looking at him, laughed out instead, and asked—

"How on earth could you guess that?"

"I guessed it, Sir, because I knew it, Sir; and I knew it, Sir, because I knew him, Sir; and I knew it, Sir, the very moment I heard he knew you, Sir; for that is a man, Sir, who, if the angel Gabriel came down and stood before him, Sir, would think, the very first thing, only how he could best contrive to get his hand into the archangel's breeches pocket, Sir."

I now laughed heartily.

"And I guess more than that, Sir," he continued, his features, his voice, and the shelving inclination of his head, still and still unaltered: "you've lent him a pretty considerable sum."

"Why," said I, thrown off my guard, "pretty well."

"And I can venture to guess even more than that, Sir; it continues due a long time after it has been promised to be repaid. Were you ever hungry, Sir?"—and here he uncrossed his folded arms, merely, however, to place the left arm over the right, in lieu of their former positions, of the right over the left: again hugging them hard—"Were you ever hungry, Sir? I don't mean, have you ever been pleasantly piqued with an appetite for your dinner; but have you ever felt real hunger?—the gnawing, gnawing, gnawing of the unfed worm, which daily demands its bribe, to carry on the business of human vitality, and is daily refused its claim?"

"No, thank God!" said I.

"So I thought, Sir, or you would never have lent that man that money. He tried me, Sir; but I looked round about me, at my wife and children, and I recollected former times, and he didn't get a single halfpenny from me. For, Sir, I have experienced real hunger.

"Sir, I left that country in my eighteenth year. I absconded from it, I mean, in pure terror of the triangle and the gallows, after all hope for it was lost. It was in the year '98 I left it, Sir. And I left it without leaving behind me relation or friend,—father, brothers, uncles, or cousins alive,—or, at all events, able to assist me with a shilling,—though a few months before, they had all been alive, and in good circumstances. Castlereagh, Sir, with Reynolds' help, made quick work of them. Well, Sir, with a hue-and-cry hot after myself, changing my name, and well disguised, I got to Cove, and there went on board an English ship, bound for an English port. And, Sir, the baying bloodhounds were close on my track; and I myself was one of the men who held lights for them, about the vessel, when they came in the night time to search it for me. But they did not recognise me, keen-scented as they were; and so abandoning the land I once loved, I arrived safely, a friendless, relationless, portionless, pennyless stranger, in a land I hated—ay, and feared, in the marrow of my bones. Want soon came upon me; and as my father—God bless his memory for it!—had got plenty of Greek and Latin well flogged into me, I thought, by advertising, with my last funds, in a cheap newspaper,—one of those publican's papers, Sir,—to obtain some tuitions that would half fill my stomach with the poorest food. The first advertisement appeared, Sir; and I economized my few remaining sixpences, by trying to live on a pennyworth of bread per day,—and the loaf was very small that year, Sir,—and this allowance, with liberal contributions from the public pump, Sir, was all that the tall, raw-boned boy of eighteen, with a stomach like an ostrich's, had to keep body and soul together, while he waited, day after day, the golden results of his advertisement. But, Sir, there was no result at all from his advertisement; and so, Sir, I advertised again, now reducing my allowance of bread to a halfpenny-worth per day; and again I waited and waited. Sir, during this second waiting upon Providence, my last halfpenny was spent: and, Sir, I continued for days without a crumb of food of any kind, walking about the streets of London, and stamping, and spurning, and hating their very paving-stones,—the pumps now my only resource. Sir, it happened one day, somehow or other, some one gave me a shilling—stay, I think I earned it by holding a gentleman's horse—ay, Sir, you may start—but the Greek and Latin professor, with perhaps as much gentleman's blood in his veins as my generous benefactor, was brought down to that, Sir. To that do I say? Sir, I was brought down to anything. Before I earned the shilling, I used to spend a good part of the day, walking up and down the street that I lodged in—Little Windmill Street; and, of course, you know the aspect of that street, Sir. There are many mean houses in it, with their hall doors left open, and dirty little children sprawling on the steps ascending to the hall doors, and gnawing buttered crusts, and smearing their faces still more with the crust, which often slips through their little weak hands, and is as often picked up out of the street dust or puddle, to be gnawed again; and, Sir, I used to pass by many of these little creatures,—and as my yearning and abrading stomach sent its fumes into my head, and its raging, wild-beast hunger into my very heart, I could have snatched them up, and twisted their necks round and round, for that morsel of disgusting food. Sir, the fear of the hangman alone withheld me from doing some such violence on somebody. It wasn't philosophy, Sir,—it wasn't morality,—it wasn't religion, though I had been religiously brought up, and wasn't an irreligious, or an immoral lad;—it was not any one of these checks that kept my hands quiet. No, Sir; it was the mere animal dread of being hanged, which mastered even the brute instinct of hunger.

"But, Sir, I got the shilling; and clutching it hard in the palm of my hand, I ran straight to the next baker's shop, bought a shilling loaf with it, and then ran to my lodgings, to devour the bread in secret. Don't believe any one who tells you, Sir, that it is dangerous to put any considerable portion of food, at a time, into a perfectly empty and starving stomach. I have read such assertions, and I have heard them made, Sir; but my own experience proves that they are utterly false. 'Twas a public-house I lodged in, Sir; and my straw pallet was stretched under the very slates, at its tip-top—not its attic story, Sir, not in its garret—that would have been a palace, beyond my means—but, as I have said, literally under the slates, Sir; and, of course, higher up even than the garret. So my retreat was there; and as I went up all the flights of stairs to my chamber, I tore, with my skeleton fingers—my claws, my talons—I tore out of the sides of the loaf, handful after handful, all its soft portions—and I stuffed them so quickly down my throat, Sir, that by the time I got up to my private apartment, nothing but the two crusts were left; and then, Sir, after taking a long draught out of the large brown pitcher that stood at my bedside—'twas a quart draught at least, Sir—and after sitting down on my pallet, the crusts, too, soon disappeared. And then, Sir, nothing injurious happened to me. On the contrary, after I had lain some time on the broad of my back, I jumped up, like a young giant, and laughed out alone, to the slates and rafters above my head, and cried, ha, ha! like the war-horse in Job. I might have been a little mad, perhaps; but not a bit indisposed or inconvenienced in body or in limb.

"And so, Sir, the reason you see why I didn't lend money to our 'mutual friend,' was because, as I have told you before, I had suffered, once in my life, real hunger."

Although during this recital he had scarce raised his eyes from the ground, strong emotions worked his countenance. Bitter contempt for "that land" which he had abandoned, worked it; bitter hatred for the land to which he had escaped, worked it; bitter irony, recollected suffering, recollected degradation, now placed under his feet, and trampled upon;—all these, and more, worked it: until, as I gazed upon him, I thought his ugly Socratian face grew almost hideous. But a little incident soon changed both my opinion of that face, and of the heart which governed its expression.

We were sitting in a back saloon, au premier, which looked out upon a garden. The windows of the room were open, for it was fine sunny weather. The flat, leaded roof of some small outbuilding, came up nearly to the level of the windows, and was enclosed by a wooden railing, which rendered it a perfectly safe play-ground for children; but the leaden roof could not be perceived by my new acquaintance, from the place which he occupied in the room. He had scarce uttered the last words, when a little fellow, between four and five —my only living son—raced into the saloon, beating a drum, then on to one of the open windows, and then, with a jump, disappeared from our sight. My visiter gave a piercing cry, clasped his hands together, and before I could explain to him how little cause for alarm was really in the case, rushed to the window, with a manner and features expressive, I thought, of the keenest sympathy and anxiety that human nature could exhibit. But he soon saw his mistake.

"Qu'avez vous donc, Monsieur?" cried the little fellow's small voice, as he laughed up at him, from the leads. By the way, he spoke no English.

The old man, as I may almost call him, stepped back, and—"Thank God!" he said, dropping his hands to his sides, as he trembled, and grew pale, from his recent excitement. "Your child, Sir?" he resumed, turning to me. "Come up here, you little rascal, until I punish you for having frightened me;" and, returning to the window, he stooped and chucked up, into the room, my poor little namesake; then hugged him, and kissed him, almost in tears—certainly in smiles of pure and fresh benevolence of feeling.

"I see you have some of them at home yourself," I said.

"I have, Sir," he answered; "four girls, and three boys—and all brought up," he added, somewhat strangely, "to hate and detest, and, if they could, to injure to the death, the land which destroyed their father's land, and made it the by-word it has become. But they are all bigger and older than this little fellow; and some of the girls full-grown. I came in to-day from Passy, to leave one of them, to get a lesson at Hertz's."

"But what says their mother to this bringing up of her daughters, in the way you say? I suppose she is as thorough-going a '98 Irishwoman, as you are a thorough-going '98 Irishman?"

"Indeed, and she is not, Sir," he replied, laughing a low mocking laugh, it seemed, at himself—"she isn't an Irishwoman at all, Sir—nor yet a Scotchwoman—nor yet a Frenchwoman; she is an Englishwoman, Sir—and English to the back-bone; and when she married me, she was as handsome as I'm ugly, Sir; and as good and as gentle, as I was evil, and soured, and ill-tempered."

And this is the man, thought I, who hates England, and everything English, and yet takes an Englishwoman to his bosom, and makes her the mother of his children; and this, too, is the man who, almost in the same breath in which he spoke of twisting the heads off various little children, in Little Windmill Street, betrays the emotion of a woman's heart, at a supposed prospect of injury to one little child in Paris.

I may as well mention in this place, how, still in reference to little Johnny, the nature of my new acquaintance became more fully unveiled to me. In a few months afterwards, I lost the child. He, who had never before known an hour's illness, and who was as lovely as a sunbeam, and as strong as a young Hercules, died from me, after about a day's struggle, in the clutch—the hangman clutch of "La gripe." The blow stunned me; and perhaps until this day, I have not recovered from its effects. The little fellow died, too, in convulsions, rising up against death in his cradle-bed, erect on his limbs, and holding his clenched hand high above his head; and in my weakened, and, I suppose, unsound state of mind, I remember to have felt somehow that I despised the grim King of Terrors for his paltry and cowardly triumph over so sinless a little creature.

In my affliction, many friends and acquaintances called upon me, but Socrates redivivus did not come near me; and in the egotism of grief, this made me waver in my growing good opinion of him. In about five days, however, he did come. It was Sunday. I was in bed, but he would see me. I received him coldly.

"I see, Sir," he said, "that you resent a seeming neglect of mine. But it was only a seeming neglect. I could not come near you sooner. And it wasn't occupation that kept me away,—though, God knows, I have my share of labour from morning to night allotted to me. Still I couldn't come. I loved that little child, Sir, and I had also my own feelings towards its father; and 'tisn't my way, nor it isn't in my nature, to get the cold words of condolence by heart, and deal them out during a commonplace visit. In your first grief, I didn't know what to say to you; and I wouldn't come to say nothing to you. The time, since then, has naturally calmed you down a little; and I say to you now, Sir, may God enable you to overcome soon your father's sorrow for that boy, for your loss has been heavy. And I prayed the same prayer this morning before, Sir, in the fairyland cemetery of Mont Martre, while kneeling at the entourrage, that already surrounds his little grave, with its little patch of flower-beds, and after I had read the inscription on the little spotless marble monument, crowned by perhaps almost the only cross in the extensive and most beautiful church-yard.

"And after taking my leave of poor Johnny, I came here, Sir, to see you, but still unable to talk comfort to you. I will, however, tell you a story. It is by contrast with other things that we know the real value of anything; it is by contrasting with the visitations dealt out to others, those which are dealt out to ourselves, that we can estimate the heaviness or the lightness of the latter. So listen to me, Sir.

"I have admitted to you that I had at home four girls and three boys. I did not say that I had any other child,—but I have another at home—a girl, Sir, and my first-born, and my most beautiful, though they are all, boys and girls, comely, and the most of them handsome. Why did I leave out her in mentioning the number of my little flock? Because, Sir, she can scarcely be said to be of it. Because, Sir, it has pleased the Almighty to send her from his hands without the slightest share of intellect or reason—reason, the only medium through which human nature can see or even become conscious of its very existence. Oh, that evening and that hour—she being then in her fifth year—when, sitting on her mother's lap, we became perfectly assured, by the sentence of a highly qualified professional man, that our darling was an idiot! Oh, the sickening qualms in which for years before we suspected the terrible truth! and oh, the agony that to this day she awakens, wandering through the house among us, and scarce addressing a word to us,—or else a word that has no meaning, and that shows no sympathy with family, or kind—with life itself! You are the first human being, Sir, out of my own family, to whom I have opened my lips on this subject. Hardly one but ourselves knows that the poor being breathes. Her case, Sir, is one of perfect idiotism—of cureless, hopeless idiotism; and of a moping, melancholy kind, too; and, Sir, she runs from the sight of a stranger, or the sound of a stranger's voice, as the blind mole runs to hide himself in the earth.

"And now, Sir, compare your visitation with that which I have described, and ask your heart which is the severer of the two? Your little pet suddenly taken from you, by the hand that gave him to you, almost as fresh as when he was given? or left with you to grow up, in mere animal beauty, day after day, year after year, to man's estate, without understanding you, without comprehending the words of your lips, or the tears that you weep over him,—without even the power of knowing that you love him,—without the power of loving you,—without an idea of your existence even, or of his own? Sir, think on my story and be comforted. I have told you, you are the first to whom I ever hinted it. And it has cost me a struggle to make up my mind to impart it even to you. But I said to myself, that it would help to lessen your great sorrow. God grant that it may!"

He walked out of the room, his deeply furrowed cheeks streaming tears, some of which fell on my hand as he took it at parting.

SABBATH PROFANATION.

BY A LADY.

Oh! call it not profane to wander forth
On Sabbath eve—to gaze, with gladden'd eye,
On all the beauties of the teeming earth,
The sea mysterious, and celestial sky.
Then sacred Meditation oft is nigh,
Prompting the heaven-ward hope—the holy thought
That leads to pray'r. Sometimes unwittingly
The careless Spirit is heart-worship taught,
And meek devotion comes, although unsought.

Sweet is the birds' song—lovely seems each flow'r
To toil-worn crowds who rove at Sabbath eve;
Some note the vast economy and pow'r
Display'd in all God's works—these will not leave
Nature with hearts untaught. Nor should we grieve
If lovers rove in quiet privacy;
A pure affection can from vice retrieve—
For virtuous love is heaven-born; and may be
A joy perfected in eternity.

Much "profanation" ev'rywhere takes place
When conscience sleeps. Bigots censoriously
Rail at their neighbours' want of Christian grace;
These in God's Temples but the creature see,
His creed they learn, not Christianity.
Some note the dress and looks of all around,
Yet seem to pray! What sinful thoughts would be (Could we read hearts) in erring creatures found,
For Satan loves to tread on holy ground.

From faithful Pastors, of God's wondrous love,
In earthly Temples it is sweet to hear;
And then true Worshippers delight to rove
Far from the city—for they would be near
His works; and those of men appear
To keep them far from God—each sight and sound
Too common seem—mysterious but dear
This tie to nature! Thus worn hearts have found
New peace and beauty from fair scenes around.

Oft God is hidden from us,—and array'd
In robes of pride, poor frail Humanity
Feigns pow'r divine! By others war is made
On the few joys of toil-worn Penury:
All praise—few practise Christianity.
These few prize social love; they understand
That ev'ry man is God's own, nor should be Harshly prejudg'd. Love was their Lord's command;
For "the good Shepherd" leads with gentle hand.

THE STORY OF THE MARQUISE DE GANGE.

A REAL TRAGEDY OF THE "GOOD OLD TIMES" IN FRANCE.

THE venture was made, in a late number of this Magazine, to claim for histories of real life a share of the interest lavished upon fiction. But it could not be expected that its especial prerogative, which is a power to move and to delight, would ever be seriously invaded by this concession. To say nothing of the privilege enjoyed by the poet alone, of throwing into one focus all the possibilities which are in reality scattered over the whole mass of life, —the historians have in general taken good care that invention should run no risk of being forsaken for their truth. They have seemed to think it a matter of dignity to avoid pleasing; instead of facts, they give us mere skeletons of facts; as if they deemed it frivolous to perceive, or had not the capacity to preserve those living elements of colour, expression, and speech, without which we only see half of an era or an event. The poet's fanciful creation, adorned with these vivid details, is therefore felt to contain a more essential part of truth than survives in the residuum of the chronicler. And in this way has arisen an unnatural idea of opposition between the different properties, the sum of which alone makes up truth; to be seriously regretted, when we think what history might become, if clothed with natural flesh and blood! For there is a power in the actual, quite peculiar to itself, and rooted in the deepest grounds of human sympathy. The knowledge that what I am now hearing was the real history of a living man, touches me with an emotion allied to personal feeling, and forces my imagination to complete a story that the narrator may have merely sketched. Far less active is the assistance given to the fabulist, who is seldom trusted for more than he himself exhibits. It is rarely that we attempt to pursue his invention beyond the limits which he has drawn around it. The Hall of Eblis, and the smoke of Padalon, we do not imagine with more terrors than the poet has described; we behold them with an awe which is passive, and not unpleasing: we mourn over the dying innocence of Cordelia, and take fire at Clarissa's wrongs; but when the book is closed, the spell is half dissolved at once. A totally different sensation overcomes one who kneels in the Pozzi to read the lines, often meagre enough, which their former tenants have scratched on the wainscot, or who crumbles over the rack lying in the gallery of the Audiencia in Toledo. These are impressions that sink deep into the heart, and cannot be effaced at will. From the crisis of the most tragical "Romance of modern Life," we escape with a sigh, as we start from a distressing dream; but the hand will tingle for days after touching the garment through which Gustavus was stabbed at a masquerade, or the ring that discovered the remains of a lovely Princess Schwartzenberg, amidst the ashes of the Pavilion.

Had they who told the history of the Marquise de Gange been aware of this, and filled up its dead outlines with the proper colouring, nothing would have been wanting in the tale to excite all the emotions that fiction commands, and all the interest which attaches itself to positive reality. But the records of French criminal law, voluminous as they are, do not abound in touches of nature; and it is now too late to restore them. The story, however, though but half told, cannot be heard with indifference, and the reader will therefore be requested to accept it in its present imperfect form. It will be recognised as an old acquaintance by those who are conversant with the obscurer literature of France; but we have never seen it alluded to in an English work, and therefore suppose that it may be new to a large class of general readers, as well as to those students of foreign letters whom curiosity has never induced to sift the twenty-two wordy volumes of M. Guyot de Pitaval.

It would be hard to name a story in which some of the prominent characters of the ancien régime, and of the social consequences of its faith and practice, appear more distinctly than in the present narrative. Meagre as it may be, it discloses the canker which even then was destroying the nation, better than a volume of generalities. It indicates to a thoughtful eye the relative positions of the high and low noblesse, beneath which nothing existed but a servile class: the ambition of the one to rise, the hunger of the other for gold to supply its pomp and waste; and what fruits were produced by the alliance of these elements. Another figure starts forward as a living impersonation of that vice of the French Church, the secular Abbé: ecclesiastic in name only, alike exempt from duties, restraints and religion—notable chiefly for the dissolute morals and profane acquirements which were each alike busy in the work of domestic mischief. A fearful glimpse is also shown of the power for evil, which the feudal noble still retained in the 17th century, when remote from the capital, and surrounded in his chateau by creatures who knew no law superior to his will:—while we see how slowly the foot of justice limped after the worst criminals of this dangerous rank. Of the manner in which these features are displayed, the story itself will apprize the reader.

There resided at Avignon, in 1636, a certain Sieur de Rossan, belonging to the lowest class of gentry, but more than commonly wealthy. His only child, a daughter, born in this year, was destined to inherit his riches, as well as the more considerable possessions of Sieur de Nochères, her maternal grandfather, from one of whose estates, by the custom of heiresses, she assumed the style of Mademoiselle de Chateaublanc. Thus she was one of the richest maids in Provence; but far richer in the gifts of a rare beauty, and of a disposition soft and equable, with talents, not dazzling indeed, but sufficient to have rendered her engaging, even had her personal charms been less. These must have been extraordinary. The soberest writers are warmed into a kind of rapture in describing a loveliness which dazzled the eyes of Louis XIV., and which was celebrated at Versailles by the title of La Belle Provençale. Christina of Sweden, who had seen the beauties of all the courts of Europe, declared hers to be unrivalled.

The death of her father, while she was still young, left her to the guardianship of M. de Nochères. Before she had reached a marriageable age, proposals for her hand had already been made by many of the chief Provençal nobility,—far more covetous of the wealth she could bestow, than attracted by her beauty. Her grandfather had no idea that he could fulfil his duty of guardian better than by handing over his niece at once, young and ignorant as she was, to the suitor highest in rank, and with whom he could make the best terms; and, accordingly, chose the Marquis de Castellane. He was not too old, was handsome and good-natured; but De Nochères only accepted him as the grandson of the Duke de Villars. Mademoiselle de Chateaublanc became a wife at thirteen; an age in which even a Provençal maid, although her bloom comes early in that genial climate, has not reached the term of girlhood. But she was already remarkable for her beauty and gentle temper; to both of which maturer years brought embellishment and increase, but no change. She had inherited none of the feverish blood which generally belongs to the natives of Southern France; and seemed in every respect destined to a career as happy as it was possible for one in her condition to enjoy. A few years after their marriage, the Marquis conducted her to Paris; and she appeared at Versailles.

That a young beauty, married while a child, and thrown, on the threshold of womanhood, amidst the vanities of a court like Louis XIV.'s, could hardly avoid danger and suspicion, need not be said:—her husband thought little of this, and left her for the army. It is probable that at this time she did yield to the general example, and gave too willing an ear to the adulation that worshipped her wherever she appeared. But her name, at all events, was never publicly scandalized; and from the conduct of her maturer years, this early weakness, to which it was whispered that she stooped, may fairly be regarded as the error of extreme youth and inexperience, left without a guide. The expedition to Sicily was now in progress; her husband had not long been absent, when the tidings came of his shipwreck. Most of the French galleys had been destroyed by a tempest in the Mediterranean: and amongst those that perished was the Marquis de Castellane.

The young widow, left without children by a husband who had been far from attentive to her, was nevertheless much afflicted by his loss, and appears to have remembered it long. At first, she retired to the protection of Madame D'Ampus, her late husband's mother: but after some time, business, concerning her fortune, called her from this refuge to Avignon. Here she lived in a convent, in great seclusion, seeing none but her female friends, and men of business. But one so rich and charming, in the very sweetest bloom of her age, and now advanced in station by her late marriage, could not remain long unsought by wooers; nor is it reasonable to suppose that after a time she wished to be so: although she was not hasty in making a new engagement. She was now in a position to choose according to her own liking; which, unhappily, seems to have been chiefly led by the eye. At the age of twenty-two, she bestowed herself on M. de Lanide, Marquis de Gange; a youth of twenty, remarkably handsome, well-born, a baron of Languedoc, sufficiently rich, and owner of a military charge—the governorship of St. André. The match was one of reciprocal affection; and the exceeding beauty of the young couple, made all exclaim that a happier marriage could not have been imagined. It was, however, doomed to be far otherwise. The young pair resembled each other in nothing but personal comeliness. The Marquise, as we have said, was remarkable for the placidity of her disposition; the Marquis was a man of a fierce insolent nature, subject to sudden and boisterous fits of passion, and yet cursed with a jealous, distrustful temper, and a proneness to cruelty, which the least offence was sufficient to provoke.

With him the lover's rapture soon subsided; and the Marquis became a negligent husband. He resumed the gaiety of his earlier habits, and sought every kind of dissipation. For this indifference his wife not unnaturally sought compensation in society, where she was always the centre of admiration and homage. But if indiscreet in her girlhood, in this second marriage her conduct appears to have been irreproachable. In company she sought no more than a harmless recreation; and at once imposed silence on her admirers, if their worship appeared on the point of transgressing the bounds of innocent gallantry. But many were on the watch to injure her. Rivals, whom her beauty eclipsed; idle scandle-mongers, eager for employment; lovers, whom she had refused; parasites who sought to establish a merit with her husband; all were ready to report and exaggerate her blameless gaieties. The Marquis, disposed to suspicion became alarmed; but he had not the frankness of nature which might have put the wife on her guard and soon he abandoned himself to a furious, but secret jealousy. The fear of ridicule, and the absence of all real occasion of complaint, compelled him to repress its utterance in public; but at home it broke out in sullen reproaches, and rude and tyrannical behaviour. The gentleness of the Marquise seemed only to exasperate him;—they never met without bickering, and for many years the unfortunate lady was condemned to a species of domestic purgatory, which tried the passive sweetness of her nature to the uttermost. In the early years of her marriage she had given birth to a son and daughter; and her only moments of peace were those which she was permitted to spend in the company of her children. Yet we have every reason to believe that, in spite of this unmerciful and causeless persecution, she still inwardly loved the object of her unfortunate choice.

Such had long been the wretchedness of the Marquise's home, when it introduced to her two new inmates, destined to exercise a material influence on her fortunes. These were her husband's younger brothers, now arrived at man's estate;—who, having completed such studies as had been thought proper for each, were received as members of the Marquis's household, in which they soon became formidable. The elder of the two, nominally a churchman, bore the dubious title of Abbé de Gange;—it is likely that his superior talents and aptitude for intrigue had directed him to this profession, rather than his younger brother. He had, indeed, capacity sufficient for the worst designs, and every propensity which could lead him to conceive them: being imperious, dissolute, and revengeful; but a master of hypocrisy, of fascinating address, witty and eloquent in discourse,—a very painted sepulchre, with an outside that well covered the rottenness within. The Chevalier de Gange, his junior, was a more vulgar character, one of those rude, blind natures, born to be ruled by others, and destitute of any notable quality of their own; a selfish, thoughtless man, entirely under the sway of the Abbé, who had, indeed, such absolute influence over his mind, that the Chevalier obeyed his brother's commands without so much as asking the reason for them. This was an easy thing to master; but the restless Abbé was capable of a higher reach. He had not long been at the Marquis's board before he had dexterously obtained a command, nearly as absolute, of this brother also, although here the influence was concealed with the most cautious dissimulation. He succeeded by persuading the Marquis of his entire devotion to the family interests, and soon acquired the real control of all affairs, both abroad and at home. With this substantial power he was content; in appearance, the Marquis, while really a mere puppet of the Abbé's, was still, as heretofore, the master.

At the first sight of his lovely sister-in-law, the Abbé conceived a violent appetite for her person, and resolved to gratify it; which, taking all circumstances into account, he expected to accomplish easily. But he began with all the caution and cunning of his acquired character. While all his powers of seduction were covertly employed to captivate the lady, he laboured at the same time to soften the mind of her husband; and by address and persuasion actually succeeded in removing his suspicions, and turning his animosity towards the Marquise into indulgence and a show of regard. The change was most welcome to the ill-used wife: with a placability, which was not the least of her charms, she forgot the causeless sufferings of late years, and replied with tenderness to her husband's advances. For a while the morning of their love seemed to have returned.

The author of this revolution took care that his merit should not remain unknown. While with every art he tried to ensnare his sister-in-law's affections, he discovered to her, in confidence, by whose influence her husband had been so greatly changed; and hinted to her, in a manner that could not easily be misunderstood, that her happiness and character were at the mercy of one who could so control the dispositions of the Marquis.

Most creatures are gifted with an instinct that warns them, at the first moment, of the approach of anything noxious or deadly; and the weakest are often the most liberally endowed with this protective sense. On the first appearance of the Abbé, the Marquise had conceived a strong antipathy against him: she was now alarmed by his parade of an obligation that she believed him thoroughly capable of abusing, and her acknowledgments were paid with a coldness that betrayed how much she regretted the occasion which called for them. This was an effect the very opposite to that which the Abbé had looked for; but he was not to be dismayed by the first repulse. His attentions only became more pressing; and he besieged the Marquise with an eagerness, the meaning of which no woman ever long misunderstands. But she would not seem to understand it at all, and intrenched herself within a distant politeness, as cold as the intercourse between relations could decently allow. After he had been foiled in this manner for some time, the Abbé became impatient, and with the audacity natural to him, resolved to declare his intentions openly, and leave her no means of concealing hers. An occasion was soon found, in a visit which she paid to the country-house of a friend: the Abbé followed; and at once ingratiated himself with all the party, by the spirit and gaiety of his conversation. He wished that the Marquise should learn to value the attentions of one who was not accustomed to be treated with indifference. On the next day there was a party on horseback: the Abbé offered himself as her cavalier, and thus gained the fullest liberty of addressing her unheard. Without hesitation he avowed his passion, and vehemently besought her favour. The Marquise was seriously troubled by this attack, which she had long endeavoured to ward off. It was too urgent to be laughed aside as a mere flourish of gallantry; she found herself compelled to rebuke the proposal with the disdain which it merited.

With as much coldness as she could assume, she said, "M. L'Abbé, I need not tell you how a woman of my character should receive a compliment like this: you will please to give yourself the answer I ought to make, and spare me the unpleasant duty of uttering it." This was spoken with a tone of contempt that galled the Abbé to the quick: and changing his manner, he openly told her, that her peace was in his power; that a slight effort would serve to break the truce which he had made, and render her once more as wretched as she had formerly been; while it would be vain to denounce or oppose him in a quarter where his dominion was absolute. "Let us, therefore," he concluded, "consult our mutual repose without thwarting each other: make me happy, and preserve, in return, the calm and cheerfulness which you now enjoy." The Marquise replied with unaltered coldness: "If you have learned to love me, Sir, learn to respect me also; and know that the fears of the worst misery you threaten me with, will not alarm me into a course fatal to my virtue;" adding, with a burst of natural aversion, the imprudence of which may well be excused, "And if I were capable of forgetting myself, you are the last man in the world who could tempt me to do so!" The Abbé, glowing with rage and chagrin, turned away, and rode homewards; and on the same evening abruptly took leave of the party, and repaired to Avignon.

A common seducer would have deemed such a repulse decisive: not so the Abbé. After some reflection, he determined to persevere in the attempt to overcome an aversion so pointedly shown towards him. He therefore refrained for a while from disturbing the peace between the married couple; not without hope that his threat would still have its effect on the Marquise. But time, and his endeavours to please, did not abate her antipathy; it rather seemed to increase: she was deaf to his compliments, and avoided being left alone with him for a moment. The Chevalier, who was, in secret, as warmly enamoured of her beauty as his brother, she had not learned to distrust: his easy temper pleased her, and led, on her part, to an affectionate familiarity, in which there was not a particle of love. In proportion as she more hated the one brother, she grew the more disposed, by contrast, to like the other, and her friendly treatment induced the latter to conceive hopes of success. This could not escape the jealous penetration of the Abbé: at first, he suspected that his brother had obtained favours which had been refused to him; but the most vigilant spy could not have detected in the Marquise a single deviation from the innocent kindness of a friendship that had nothing to conceal. But even thus, the rejected suitor could not bear to see his brother rival him; and seeing the passion grow stronger daily, he feared that it might soon overcome the influence he had hitherto possessed, and determined at once to deceive his brother, and, if possible, ruin the Marquise.

He took the Chevalier aside, and openly declaring his wishes, "We are both," he said, "in love with her: I do not wish to oppose you. Try, therefore, if you can carry your point. If not, retire, and I will see if I can succeed better. We are too good friends to quarrel for any woman's sake." The Chevalier, duped by this show of generosity, the real object of which was to lay a snare for the Marquise, offered to renounce his pursuit; but the Abbé insisted that it should proceed in the manner which he had proposed. The Chevalier, thus urged, began to offer a warmer courtship to his sister-in-law; and the Abbé insidiously kept in the back ground to favour its progress. He wished to try whether the virtue that had rejected him was really impregnable, or merely led by inclination. But no sooner did the Marquise perceive that the Chevalier had assumed the looks and hopes of a lover, than she at once drew back from all familiar intercourse with him also; and testified without disguise the perfect indifference with which she regarded him in this character. He was not so patient a suitor as the Abbé, nor so shameless in his approaches: he tried to win and please to the best of his power; but receiving no encouragement, he had not the boldness to make any declaration. In six months he was, if possible, farther from her favour than at his outset; indeed, the Marquise, to check his advances, did violence to her natural disposition, and affected to notice his empty remarks and ill-chosen expressions with a contempt that destroyed all his confidence. He resolved to subdue a hopeless passion; and told his intention to the Abbé, by whom it was applauded: mortified affection was succeeded by hatred, and he was ready to embrace any plan which should offer him a vengeance on the woman that had despised his love.

The Abbé thought it now time to execute his threat, and poison the husband's mind with doubts of his wife's virtue. During the attempts of his two brothers, seeing with the Abbé's eyes only, the Marquis had never for a moment suspected them, the only real foes of his honour: his jealousy was now to be revived by calumnies which their barbarous revenge alone had invented. In one cursed with a suspicious temper, it was easy to disturb the calm which the Abbé had for his own purposes maintained. He dropped hints that his confidence in the virtue of his sister-in-law had of late been repeatedly shaken: then pretended to notice levities, which no husband could approve of: after this came a more circumstantial story, built upon the single fact that the Marquise, one evening in company, had for some time remained conversing with a young gentleman, who had amused her by his good spirits. This wrought the intended mischief: the brutal temper of the Marquis was again unchained: he assailed his wife with violent reproaches; would not listen to her protestations of innocence, and insulted her openly. The Abbé secretly blew the flame he had kindled; it grew more intolerable daily, and to such an excess, that the unfortunate lady was even subjected to personal ill-treatment. She knew to whose influence this cruel change was owing: but suffered in silence, trusting that time might reveal the treachery practised against her: it was vain, she knew, to oppose her enemies at the moment. Under such circumstances, the Abbé had the cowardly insolence to renew his solicitations. In spite of her vigilance, he surprised her one day when alone in the garden. "Now, madam," he said, "are we to remain in this state of discord for ever?—will you force me to be your enemy?—and do not you see how much it concerns you to make me your friend? Do not persist in this severity, when you see how easily you can secure me, and rule your husband." To this shameless address she listened with an unmoved countenance and turned her back on the speaker, without a word of reply.

She had for some months endured this misery when an event occurred which, for a time, checked the extreme violence of her persecutors. M. De Nochères, her grandfather, died; and she succeeded to his great possessions, which were left at her absolute disposal. This was a prize worth securing at any cost. Some means must be found to induce the Marquise to relinquish her exclusive rights; and in order to this, it became necessary to treat her with some show of decency. The Marquis repressed his cruel insults: the Abbé assumed a studied respect, and importuned and threatened no longer; the Chevalier, as usual, followed the example of his brothers. Again the unhappy Marquise enjoyed a short interval of repose.

It had been usual for the Marquis to reside alternately at Avignon and at his patrimonial château of Gange, a few leagues distant from the city, and nearly the same distance from Montpéllier. It was another benefit, arising from this inheritance, that the visits to Gange were for some time suspended, while the business detained the family at Avignon. The Marquise always dreaded the removal to Gange, where she led a cheerless life, surrounded by persons in absolute dependence upon her husband. The power of a seigneur on his family estates was still almost despotic; and it was unsafe for those whom he disliked to remain there too long. On a former visit to Avignon, the Marquise had met with an accident calculated to excite alarm. There had been arsenic conveyed into a cream of which she had partaken with some others; but as it was not in great quantity, the consequences were not fatal. At the time the circumstance created much speculation; but nothing was found out, and after a while it was apparently forgotten. The Marquise spoke of it with the utmost indifference, as a casual occurrence; but it is said that in reality she regarded it as the first warning of a malicious design against her life; and recurred to the prediction of an astrologer in Paris, who had long since foretold to her that she would perish by a violent death. But with nothing beyond mere apprehensions to allege, it would have been impossible for her to seek for protection from the danger that haunted her. The civility which had been affected since her new accession of fortune did not impose upon her; and she lived in watchfulness and anxiety, the more wretched, because there was no one to whom she could impart her fear, or apply for counsel.

A simple fact will disclose, more impressively than any description, what must have been the state of her feelings at this period. As soon as she learned her husband's intention to take her back to Gange for the autumn, she resolved, before departing from Avignon, to make her will. In this document her mother was made universal heir, with a provision that she might bequeath the property to either of the Marquise's children whom she should prefer. Moreover, she took the precaution of leaving in the hands of the magistracy a declaration disavowing formally beforehand any will of later date that might subsequently be produced as hers. This declaration was made in 1666, immediately before her departure for Gange: its meaning requires no explanation!

She also distributed a considerable sum in gold amongst various religious bodies, especially to the Recollets, for masses to be said on her behalf, that she might not die without the sacraments of the church; and the earnestness with which this office was besought and commended to them, was described as like that of one who stands in near expectation of death. From her friends she parted in a manner more serious and tender than usual; leaving few without shedding tears: and they who were attached to her could not observe without anxious feelings, the solemnity with which she bade them farewell, and begged them to remember her.

At Gange, she found her mother-in-law, who had come thither on a visit from Montpéllier. She was an excellent person, much loved by the Marquise, whose spirits were greatly raised by her presence. Everything seems to have been intended to banish apprehension from the victim's mind at this conjuncture. Her husband and brothers-in-law received her in the most affectionate manner; and, for some days, the château looked more cheerful than it had been for years. But Madame de Gange, after a short stay, returned to Montpéllier: and soon afterwards business recalled the Marquis to Avignon. It is certain that, before leaving Gange, he had concerted with the brothers what should be done in his absence. The unhappy lady was left in the hands of the only persons on earth who implacably hated her.

But they gave no sign of evil intentions throughout the winter and ensuing spring. Indeed, so artfully they dissembled, as to persuade the Marquise that their hostility to her was laid aside: and in one easily won from her just resentments, this belief produced a return of friendliness towards them, which was not overlooked. The Abbé, when he saw the deceit so far successful, began dexterously to approach the subject of the will which she had left at Avignon: suggesting, that the love of the Marquis, which she had now partly regained, would never fully return, while such an evidence of her distrust was extant; and urging her, for her own sake, to remove the only obstacle to a course of entire union and happiness; which all the family would vie, he said, in promoting. Induced by repeated persuasions in this tone, at length the Marquise yielded: revoked her previous will, and made another in favour of her husband. But the declaration still subsisted; and the Abbé was not aware, that while it remained, the new will was mere waste paper. He believed that half of his work was now performed; and the rest he proceeded to execute without delay. He had inflamed the vexation of the Chevalier into the most inveterate and cruel hatred of his victim; and found him a willing accomplice in any iniquity.

On the 17th of May, 1667, the Marquise had ordered some medicine to be prepared for her by the apothecary of the place; but the draught, when brought to her, had so unusual an appearance, that she threw it away, and instead of it took another sort of physic, of which she had brought some from Avignon. The draught had been poisoned: the brothers, not knowing that she had refused it, sent thrice during the forenoon to inquire how she felt herself; and could hardly conceal their surprise and vexation, when they were told that she was relieved by what she had taken. In the course of the day they discovered how they had been foiled; and thereupon determined to accomplish their purpose by other means of a more desperate kind.

The Marquise did not leave her bed that day, but invited some ladies of the neighbourhood to come and sit with her after dinner. The Abbé and his brother were present as usual; but they spoke little, and sate gloomy and absent, looking restlessly on the company. The Marquise appeared in good spirits, and rallied them on this strange and unusual demeanour; which they attempted, when thus addressed, to put off by a forced gaiety; but the effort and its failure were apparent to all. The conversation became broken and constrained, and an impression of some concealed misfortune or danger, communicated itself to the whole party. The Marquise alone was not, or, more probably, would not seem to be, aware of it. A collation was served, of which she partook freely: the brothers tasted nothing. As soon as it was ended, the ladies withdrew; the Abbé, accompanying them to the door, left the Chevalier alone in the chamber with his sister-in-law. Amazed at his dogged silence, she urged him to say what it meant: but he only replied by looks which made her tremble. After an interval of fearful suspense, the Abbé returned, and the mystery was abruptly explained.

Although he had been only a few minutes absent, his countenance was so changed when he entered, that the Marquise cried out with alarm; and she afterwards declared that its expression was so ghastly and devilish, that in all this tragedy, nothing seemed so terrible to her as his aspect at that moment. In one hand he held a pistol, and in the other a glass filled with a dark-coloured liquid. Closing the door behind him, he advanced to the bedside, where he stood for a few seconds in silence, eyeing his victim with looks under which her heart turned cold and sank within her. At the same time the Chevalier drew his sword: for an instant she hoped, in her defence; a second glance at his countenance, which reflected the fury of the other, showed her that no mercy for her was there.

At length the Abbé spoke to her in a low voice, but with the most malicious emphasis and deliberation: "You must prepare to die, madam!—take your choice of fire, steel, or poison."—"Die!—wherefore must I die?" cried the unhappy lady. "What crime have I committed?—when did I injure you, that you both judge and execute me at once? how have I deserved your hatred?—cannot less than such horrible cruelty satisfy you?" But she saw that the Abbé was impenetrable: and turned to the Chevalier, whom she might well hope to find more easily moved. To say nothing of their former cordiality, she had long been his benefactress in many ways: and besides giving him handsome presents, had continually supplied his want of money from her own private purse. Nor had any open difference ever disturbed their friendship: in the name of which she now besought him to spare her, with the most plaintive and winning appeals to his recollection of her kindness. But not a motion of relenting could she excite in his depraved heart. He replied as briefly as the Abbé had spoken: "The thing is decided already: make your election—if not, we will for you."

In a strait so terrible, menaced suddenly by treachery and death in the most cruel and hideous forms, the Marquise displayed a self-possession of which few, of either sex, would have been capable. She said nothing further; but, after raising her eyes to heaven, as if in protest against th wickedness, she turned with a firm and indigna gaze to the Abbé; and, reaching out her han took from him the glass containing poison, whil the one assassin held a pistol to her throat, and th other pointed his weapon at her heart; and, wit the cold sweat bursting from her brow, swallowe the evil draught. It is said to have been made arsenic and sublimate dissolved in aquafortis. Fro what subsequently took place, we can hardly b lieve that it was all compounded of such destructi ingredients. But so corrosive it was, that a fe drops, falling from the edge of the glass on her boson instantly blackened the skin; and her lips, b the mere passage of the liquid over them, wer stained and scorched dreadfully. The Chevali seeing that a sediment was left at the bottom the glass, collected it on the edge with a silv bodkin, and forced it upon her, with a phrase to brutal to be recorded here. This must have bee the deadliest part of the poison: the Marquise too it into her mouth; but, at the same instant, fall ing back on the pillow with a cry, as if suddenl agonized, she turned her head round, and, withou being seen, spat the mouthful out again. Sh then besought them, in God's name, as they ha now satisfied their rage by killing her, not t wreak revenge on her soul, but send her a confe sor, that she might not die like an outcast. The retired; and, locking the door, went out to call th vicar of the place, a dependent on the family fo twenty-five years, to attend the Marquise, and se her die. It is likely that this man was already aware of the design: at all events, he was easil found, and at once ready to serve the crime to th utmost of his power.

The instant the assassins were gone, the Mar quise, whose spirit and judgment throughout wer admirable, instantly bethought her of escaping She was undressed to her shift, and had only tim to throw over it a taffeta skirt: thus, half-clad she ran to a window which looked down into th stable-yard, and flung herself out of it; the dis tance to the ground being more than twenty-fiv English feet. At this moment, the priest entered and seeing her escape, tried to hold her back; bu this only saved her from being dashed to pieces As she was falling, the miscreant caught hold o the skirt of her dress, and kept it long enough before it gave way in his hand, to guide her fal in a safe direction. She alighted on her bare feet with no other harm than the tearing of their deli cate skin by sharp points of the pavement. She had been for an instant suspended by the part o her dress that the priest had caught, and the fal was thus partially broken. Still he hoped to reach her; and seizing a large water-jar, which stood in another window, hurled it down after her: had the aim been true, she must have been crushed to death; but it passed a hair's-breadth from her. The instant that she reached the ground, she forced the ends of her long hair down her throat, and thus in a moment brought on the intended effect of vomiting: no deliberation could have chosen a more important remedy; when this was over, she sought how to pursue her flight. On all sides the yard was hut up. She ran towards the stables, through hich a passage might be found; they were closed: he was a prisoner still, only in a wider space. At his moment she might well give up all hope, when he discovered the face of a groom looking at her om one of the eyelets. She called out to him, 'Mercy! help! Friend, save me from death! I m poisoned! open the door, and let me run to ek some relief!" The man was touched (as who ould not have been?) with the pitiful spectacle f his mistress—a woman, one of the loveliest in rance, half-naked, dishevelled, with bleeding et, wildly imploring help to fly from murder ursuing her in her husband's own walls! The room took her up in his arms, carried her through he offices, and until he met with some women in he highway; with whom, either from fear or a ense of decorum, he left her. It is probable that e dared not be seen openly to protect her flight.

The priest had hastened to inform his masters f the escape. They were furious; and, resolved t all hazards to pursue her to death, ran out after er, crying to the people, who had begun to gather n crowds at the extraordinary sight of the Marquise, in such disarray, seeking wildly for shelter —"She is mad! she is struck with hysteric enzy!" In truth, her appearance and looks of antic alarm, might well seem to confirm the eception. She had, however, reached the house f a Sieur Desprat, distant some three hundred ards from the château, when the Chevalier overook her, and forcing her in at the door, entered rith her, and closed it. The Abbé, who had now ome up, guarded the threshold, pistol in hand, hreatening to kill the first person that approached; nd crying that he would not suffer the madness f his sister-in-law to be made a show of. The bject was to take care that no medical help might each her, before the poison had had time to do its ork.

Unhappily the master of the house was absent; but his wife was there, and with her a company f several young ladies, but no man. The cries of the Marquise and of her pursuers, and the presence of these furious armed men from the château, overcame them with alarm. The Marquise, breathless, threw herself amongst them, crying, "Save me! send for help! I am dying, poisoned!" —but they could attempt nothing in defiance of the two brothers, who had possession of the house. It appears that they were not for a moment duped by the story of the Marquise's being mad; for while the Chevalier turned in the chamber, where he guarded her from escaping, one of the ladies conveyed into her hand a box of orviétan,* from which she contrived to swallow several pieces unseen. Another brought her some water, which she was about to drink eagerly, for the poison was burning her inwardly; but the savage broke the glass at her very lips, begging the ladies not to interfere and foster her complaint by such indulgence, but retire, and leave her to his care; adding that he would watch her himself, until the fit had passed over. The Marquise, now seeing that time was running from her, and that with none but female defenders, she was still at his mercy, made one effort more to soften the Chevalier, while away from his brother. She begged the ladies to pass into the next room; and when they were gone, fell at the murderer's feet, imploring him with the pathos of an innocent creature pleading for its life, to pity her, to let some relief be called for; or if not, at least to leave her the remains of life that still kept her on the threshold of the grave! This touching entreaty, the sight of the beauty he had so long worshipped, her promise to forgive all if he would only now relent, made no impression on the Chevalier; or rather seemed to exasperate his fury. He fell upon her with the short sword that he wore, using it as a dagger; and had already pierced her twice in the bosom, before she could cry out and rush to the door. As she fled, he stabbed her five times in the back; until the blade, breaking at the last blow, remained sticking in her shoulder. After this butchery, believing, as well he might, that his victim could not now survive, he ran out of the house, calling to the Abbé, "Come along: let us make our retreat; the affair is finished!"

The ladies, rushing into the chamber, were horror-struck to find the Marquise weltering in blood. She scarcely breathed, but some life still remained. While such violence was at hand, no woman dared to leave the house; but one of them cried from the window, to the crowd assembled without, begging that a surgeon might instantly be sent for. The Abbé heard this, and judging that the victim must still be alive, returned. He burst into the room, where the women were busied in reviving the Marquise, held his pistol to her side, and would have discharged it; but the piece missed fire, and a Demoiselle Brunel (the same who before had privily supplied the orviétan) seized his hand, turning the weapon from its aim. The Abbé replied by savagely striking the lady; and seizing the pistol, to use the butt as a truncheon, he would have beaten out the last remains of life in the Marquise: but the women, now forgetting their fear in the horror of this attempt, fell upon him in a body, and, with blows and outcries, drove him out of the house.

One of these heroines, fortunately, had some notion of surgery, and bound up the bleeding wounds; having first plucked out the broken blade from the shoulder of the Marquise; who had the fortitude to beg, that the operator, if she wanted strength, would aid herself by pressing her knee against the shoulder, and forcing the weapon out in this manner. None of the wounds, when searched, appeared to be mortal: the Chevalier's fury, if not an instinctive horror of the act, had disturbed his aim, and he had dealt the blows at random: the poison was the real danger that now threatened her life. At last, though tardily, help had arrived. The consuls of the burgh, hearing the alarm, repaired to the house, around which a guard was posted: and the best medical aid was summoned from Montpellier. The neighbouring noblesse, appalled

* This was a renowned antidote, prepared in Italy; and in former times esteemed so sovereign against poison, that few households in France were without a supply of it.

by the news of such a crime, crowded around the sufferer with offers of service. The tenth part of these succours might have saved her life a few hours earlier; now, they could only smooth her way to the grave.

As soon as it was dark, the Chevalier and the Abbé, whose crime had been too public for safety, fled. No one had dared to arrest them; and they retired, without hinderance, to an estate of the Marquis's, at Auberas, a league off. Here they remained together for some time: and it is difficult to conceive anything more frightful than the hours which they passed here in rage and mutual reproaches, each cursing the other for having left the victim alive; and half-disposed, at all hazards, to return, and despatch her outright! But their danger was now become pressing: the country in alarm; the Grand Prévôt already in pursuit of them: and instant flight was their only safety. They had barely time, before they were overtaken, to embark in a fishing-boat on the coast near Agde; and thus escaping, reached Venice in security.

All this time, where was the Marquis? He had received, at Avignon, an account of the will that had been extorted from his wife, and waited impatiently for the news of her death; when he was informed, apparently by some messenger from the Abbé, of the tragedy that had taken place. Soon afterwards, when public rumour brought the tale to Avignon, he affected the utmost grief and horror, and loudly execrated his brothers, vowing to avenge the crime upon them with his own hand. But he did not set out for Gange until the afternoon of the day following. As the first rumour declared that the Marquise was dead, he repaired to the magistracy; and, producing the second will, there learned, to his consternation, that it was of no effect, until the protest had been revoked. After this, he saw more than one acquaintance, to whom he discoursed of other things, never mentioning what had happened at Gange: and at length, hearing that the Marquise still survived, leisurely proceeded thither. A behaviour so callous and indecent, could only admit of one interpretation.

When he reached Gange, the Marquise received him with as much tenderness as a better husband could have deserved: if she suspected his knowledge of the crime, she did not betray her suspicions; and only reproached him gently for leaving her at the mercy of such enemies. The heart that could resolve to authorize their crime, was already dead to common feelings: but it must have been obdurate indeed, to bear, without burning shame and remorse, this demeanour of the Marquise. She even sought to soften the reproaches she had uttered, as if they had been extorted by the sharpness of her bodily sufferings. But the Marquis was not one to be touched by this forgiving softness: he only conceived from it a hope that he might yet deceive his victim, and reap the fruit of his crime. With hypocritical caresses, he besought her to revoke the protest, and confirm the will she had made in his favour. The Marquise met this audacious request by a calm refusal; and from this moment, at least, must have known that her husband was the real author of the conspiracy against her life. After this rebuff, he did not venture to renew the subject: and finding the transaction beginning to excite judicial inquiry, he deemed it prudent to feign the utmost solicitude for his dying wife. When Madame de Rossan, her own mother, hastened to her side, with several of her friends from Avignon, she was amazed to find the Marquis, of whose guilt she was firmly persuaded, in attendance at the house of Desprat. The horror of seeing him hourly in her daughter's presence was more than she could abide; after staying three days, it compelled her to quit the scene;—nor could she afterwards bring herself to endure, for more than a few hours at a time, the company of one whom she regarded as the chief assassin of her child.

At first, the Marquise had some hopes of recovery; although she demanded, after declaring her forgiveness of all her enemies, to take the sacrament. But even in this solemn act, her feelings were subjected to an abominable outrage. The priest, whom the Marquis summoned to perform the office, was no other than the wretch Perrette, who had lately endeavoured to kill her, when escaping from the château! Yet she had the self-command, or, say the Christian gentleness, to endure this last cruel insult; although she insisted that the priest, on giving her the host, should himself partake of it; believing, that even in this sacred mystery she was not secure from a renewed attempt to kill her by poison. This had been an unnecessary crime—the first draught had done its work too fatally. In a few days the hope of life vanished; the wounds healed rapidly, but nothing could arrest the ravages of the poison. She struggled long: the native soundness of her constitution was such, that it surprised her medical attendants; and the ladies who waited on her declared, that, in her fullest health, she had never looked more beautiful than now, while lying on a painful death-bed. A day before her decease, a Commissary from the Parliament of Toulouse was enabled to take, from her own lips, a full declaration; upon which that tribunal afterwards founded its judgment. On the evening of June 5th, after lingering for nearly twenty days, she expired in terrible suffering; but with the words of resignation and forgiveness on her lips. There was lamentation for her death over all Provence: and the people mourned, not in outward show only, for loveliness so excelling, and misfortunes so cruel and extraordinary.

The reader will hardly be satisfied to pause here, without inquiring what signal justice overtook the authors of this tragedy. The answer to be given is more suggestive of the character of the times than satisfactory to our indignant feelings: but the measure of retribution is not filled in this being only. On the death of the Marquise, the Commissary decreed a caption of the person against her husband, who was seized at the château, and carried a prisoner to Montpéllier. Though he arrived there at night, all the city was awake, and stationed at the lighted windows to see the criminal; whom the populace pursued, as he was led along, with hisses and execrations. Madame de Rossan, having taken the inheritance under her daughter's will, prosecuted the murderers with the utmost diligence; and the Marquis, after an examination in which there appeared a flagrant presumption of guilt, was sent for trial before the Parliament of Toulouse. The pleadings before this body were always written; the accuser's factum, (as the exhibition of a case was called,) related the story we have given here. The reply of the Marquis contained a few words only; admitting his brothers' guilt, denying his part in it, and defying any conclusion founded on mere presumptions. This, he felt confident, would save him; and for some time, indeed, the absence of any direct proof suspended the magistrate's decision. Their sentence, however, was at length pronounced against all the parties concerned. The Abbé and Chevalier were condemned to be broken alive on the wheel; the Marquis to be banished for life, degraded from the noblesse, and his possessions confiscated to the crown; the priest Perrette, after degradation by his ecclesiastical superiors, was sentenced for life to the galleys. This last was the only one of the criminals who appeared to die in a manner suited to his deserts. He was attached to the chaine, or convoy of culprits sent to the galleys, and expired of rough usage on the journey. The public, especially the female part of it, loudly condemned the lenity shown to the Marquis; but he was a considerable noble, and few would have dared, in those times, to venture on a more extreme punishment, even when supported by the popular feeling. The Abbé and Chevalier were already beyond the reach of their judges.

At Venice, the Marquis joined them; and he and the Chevalier offered, and were allowed, to take service under the Republic, which was then engaged in the memorable defence of Candia against the Turks. Both are said to have fought bravely at this siege, and both died there:—the Chevalier, blown to atoms by a bomb, shortly after his arrival; the Marquis, a few weeks later, buried in the explosion of a mine; a manner of death far too honourable for miscreants soiled by the cowardly and pitiless murder of a woman!

The Abbé lived longer; but we cannot suppose that the days of the architect of so much mischief were exempt from the secret misery which pursues the guilty. He fled, under an assumed name, to Holland, where a gentleman, in whom he confided, presented him, at Viane, to the Count de la Lippe, as a Frenchman of merit, who, having abjured the Catholic religion, had sought an asylum in a Protestant country. The Abbé thought it little to add to his other crimes the disgrace of renouncing his creed. The Count was pleased by the stranger's address and information, took him into his household, and made him tutor to his heir, a boy of nine or ten years old. This charge was executed with the utmost zeal and success; the pupil became a credit to his instructor, who thereby acquired the entire confidence of the Count and his lady. Still he was careful to conceal his origin; which made his patrons conclude that it must be an obscure one, never imagining that any other reason for secrecy could exist in one whose conduct appeared to be so exemplary. They forbore to urge him on the subject; but he lived in constant fear of detection, and shrunk from every encounter with those who might possibly have seen him in his own country. This appeared when, after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, some Huguenot families sought to establish themselves at Viane. The right of granting this privilege belonged to the Count; and it was expected that M. de la Martellière, (as the Abbé now called himself,) being, like them, a Protestant and a refugee, would advocate their petition. But they were disappointed: the new convert, apprehensive of some discovery, wrought upon his patron to refuse them a settlement. His influence in the Count's family, still increasing, enabled him to win the affections of a young lady, of great beauty, and related to the Countess, to whom he made a proposal of marriage. The Countess, however, opposed it, on the ground of the obscurity which hung over the suitor's history; remarking, that a person of such merit could only conceal his real extraction from reluctance to confess that it was a mean one. But the lady was too much enamoured to yield, and related to her lover what the Countess had said. Upon this, as if an infatuation had seized him, he flattered himself that the time was now come when he might venture to reveal his secret; imagining that his interest with the family, and his uniform good conduct while attached to it, might procure him indulgence for his former crimes. He repaired to the Countess, and throwing himself at her feet, imploring her pity and favour, declared his noble birth, and confessed that he was the unfortunate Abbé de Gange, whose name had formerly been so notorious in his own country. Seeing that the Countess was thunderstruck by this confession, he used all the eloquence of which he was master, to implore her compassion, and awaken her sympathy. But she recoiled from him with horror; and shuddered at the idea that a wretch like this had so long been an inmate of her family, and the teacher of her son. The Count, when informed of the discovery, partook of her abhorrence; and, not content with compelling the offender to depart from Viane, would have had him arrested, but for the entreaties of his son, who was greatly attached to his tutor. The Sieur de la Martellière fled to Amsterdam, where he was soon afterwards joined by his mistress, and privately married to her. The young Count supplied him for some time, in secret, with the means of subsistence, until an inheritance, which fell to his wife, enabled him to live, without charity, in an humble manner. He afterwards became a member of the Protestant Consistory, was much respected for his learning and decorous conduct, and died amongst them at an advanced age, it is said, in the odour of sanctity!

But he told the friend, who was the depositary of his secret, that his private hours were full of remorse and dismay; and constantly haunted by the apparition of the Marquise, as she looked upon him at the moment when he commanded her to choose the manner of her death. He declared that he could not escape from her appearance—that he saw it as distinctly as any living thing—and that words could not describe the torment that he endured in its presence; it was, he said, as if his very entrails were torn with horror!

So that, although he had escaped from the hand of temporal justice, a secret Nemesis pursued the criminal, with a doom of suffering more terrible and lasting than any that he had the power to inflict on his innocent victim! V.

SATIETY.

The Scotch lord look'd o'er his fair domain,
O'er forest and meadow, o'er hill and o'er plain:
The Summer noon sun was shining bright,
And gilding the river with floods of light;
And showing the course of the mountain rills,
As they stream'd like silver adown the hills;
And the young trees waved in the Summer air,
And the spirit of Beauty seem'd hovering there:
But not to their owner was loveliness seen
In the dark blue hills, or the forests green.
And he said, "Though glorious the prospect be,
With its mountains stern, and the silvery sea—
Though boundless wealth may my coffers fill,
Yet my heart is sad and restless still.
I must see the world, and my part must bear
On the crowded stage of life's theatre."

He has roam'd to the east, he has roam'd to the west,
In search of the things which might please him best;
He has tried all follies, one by one,
Till their life was past, and their zest was gone;
He has led the host of Pleasure's sons,
And the phalanx of Fashion's myrmidons;
And yet, in the midst of the world's gay throngs,
Amid wine and music, and laughter and songs,
He has said, "Though I strive regret to kill,
Yet my heart is sad and restless still;
From the cares of the world, its fever and strife,
I will fly to the charms of domestic life;
I will win a young heart before one thought
Has a scene of the world, or its pleasures sought—
Before one envious wish has sprung,
Or the toils of deceit o'er her soul been flung;
I will make her affections all my own—
I will honour and love but her alone;
And with her for ever at my side,
My days will as calmly and happily glide,
As the river that girdles the ancient woods
Of my mountain home's vast solitudes!".

He has chosen a bride from the fair array
Of the young, the beautiful, and the gay;
He has cull'd the fairest creature the sun
In his daily rounds has look'd upon;
In whose young, pure heart, the feelings had slept,
Till this dream of love o'er her spirit crept—
Awaking her thoughts from their secret cells,
And calling forth passion from purest wells,
Where it silent had lain till the mighty spell
Of the wizard Love o'er their still depths fell.
He has taken this lovely creature home
To his ancient seat, where the free winds roam—
Where the eagle builds his eyrie proud
On the cliff that o'ertops the bursting cloud;
Where the murmur of the distant sea
Alone breaks upon Nature's monotony;
And the mind must feel, in its lightest mood,
The awe that reigns over solitude.

This being is his—and her "heavenly grace
Hath a sunshine made in the shady place;"
And her children are round her a lovely band,
The flower of the beautiful of the land.

But the lord is sad, and his heart again
Is fill'd with restlessness and pain;
And he said with a sigh, "Must these bounded ties
The whole of my powers monopolize!
I will win a name, and my fame shall be
To my children their proudest legacy."

And his lamp through the midnight is burning now,
And shedding its light o'er his broad pale brow;
And his works, which betoken a master's hand,
Have traversed the length and the breadth of the land;
From confusion, have into expression brought
The strength and power of a nation's thought,
And have shaped its ideas, only half conceived,
Into solemn truths, which the world believed.
But though splendid his triumphs, and bright his career,
He must make them more varied, and bring them more near.

He is now in the Senate—his long-tried sense,
With the weight of his glorious eloquence—
"The thoughts that breathe, and the words that burn,"
As reason or passion takes its turn—
Have swept o'er the hearts of those who listen'd,
Till each pulse has throbb'd, and each eye has glisten'd;
And conviction has follow'd his flashing words,
As sweet sounds follow the touch of the chords.
He has felt in its fulness, again and again,
The power of swaying the passions of men;
And guiding their feelings, for good or for ill,
With the whelming force of a master will.
Applauses have rung, and laurels been flung,
And the voices of poets his praises have sung;
But the thrill of excitement which once led him on,
With the power of applause, o'er his spirit is gone!

From plan to plan does his fine mind range,
And yet his spirit sighs for change;
And still, in the midst of successful schemes,
His heart is haunted by troubled dreams;
And ever thus is he doom'd to sigh,
For his mind is o'erpower'd by satiety!
He has learn'd not the lesson so hard to reach,
Which nought but Religion itself could teach,
Of giving self-interest a portion—not whole,
Of the boundless love of the human soul;
From self, letting its energies fly as free
As the mighty winds or the restless sea,
Till it hold, in its wide and circling bands,
The natives of other and distant lands;
And embrace, in its kindly and Christian mood,
The whole of mankind in its brotherhood!

He must learn to direct his aspiring mind,
Which on earth is "cribb'd, cabin'd, and confined,"
To a better cause than winning a name—
To a brighter future than that of fame!
For the restless yearning which urges him on,
Till his task is done and renown is won,
Is but one form of that mighty hope
Which, whatever our nature and being's scope,
Burns in all hearts—the desire to be Existing still through eternity! S.

BUCKINGHAM'S TOUR IN THE SLAVE STATES OF AMERICA.*

Mr. Buckingham's Tour in the Southern and Western States, will prove much more generally attractive, than his account of the more familiar and hackneyed route to which his previous volumes were devoted. The field is not only more comprehensive, but more varied and fresh.

This portion of the voluminous work commences with Charleston, the capital of South Carolina, to which city Mr. Buckingham and his travelling companions, (his wife and his son,) made an exceedingly disagreeable voyage from New York, in a sailing vessel. In Charleston, Mr. Buckingham remained at this time for three weeks, delivering his customary course of Lectures on the East, and enjoying frequent friendly intercourse with the most intelligent inhabitants of the place. Charleston, which he afterwards revisited, seems to have left a pleasant impression upon his mind.

As in the first three volumes of the work, the author wherever he sojourns takes occasion to give a pretty full view of the history of the particular State; compiled from the best sources, and of value as a kind of General Survey of the United States, though of less interest to the British reader, and of little or none whatever to those who merely take up the work as a book of recent travels. Of all this weighty, and to us, extraneous matter, we shall therefore steer clear.

In point of appearance, in its public buildings and general air of prosperity, Charleston is inferior to the cities of the Northern States. It more resembles a West Indian than an American town, from the prevalence of wooden buildings painted white; verandas, porticoes, and Venetian blinds; and probably also from the numerous domestic slaves, in light or gaudy dresses. Charleston is considered peculiarly unhealthy, though some of its own physicians uphold it "as decidedly one of the healthiest cities on the face of the globe."

Slavery, the actual condition of slaves in all its bearings, was everywhere an important object to the Tourist; if it was not, next to his private affairs and the Temperance cause, the most important object of his journey. But instead of following his desultory remarks on slavery, in the course of his long, zig-zag ramble, we shall endeavour, at its conclusion, to give a brief summary of the information he collected, and of his personal observations. His next station after leaving Charleston, was Savannah, in Georgia, an old city containing about 10,000 inhabitants, of whom the one-half are "coloured people." In manners and institutions this place as closely resembles a West India town as does Charleston:—

> The white population are chiefly merchants, planters, bankers, and professional men; the laborious trades being all carried on by coloured persons, and nearly all the severe and menial labour is performed by slaves. Like the society of Charleston, this of Savannah is characterized by great elegance in all their deportment; the men are perfect gentlemen in their manners, and the women are accomplished ladies. A high sense of honour, and a freedom from all the little meannesses and tricks of trade, seem to prevail universally among the gentlemen, who are liberal, frank, and hospitable, without ostentation, or much pretence; while the ladies are not only well educated, but elegant in their manners, and mingle with the pleasures of the social circle, much of grace and dignity, blended with the greatest kindness and suavity.
> The principal causes of this difference from the coldness, formality, and reserve of the north, is, no doubt, partly to be attributed to climate, partly to the different style of living, and a great deal to the circumstance, that as all persons of moderate fortunes live here upon a footing of equality with the wealthiest, there is not that straining after distinction, and the practice of various arts to obtain it, which prevail in cities where the aristocracy is composed of three or four grades, or castes, each anxious to outrival and overtop the other, which begets uneasiness, jealousy, suspicion, and an extraordinary degree of fastidiousness as to the acquaintances formed, the parties visited, and the guests entertained. The graceful ease and quiet elegance of the southern families, make their visiters feel that they are in the society of well-bred and recognised gentlemen and ladies; while in the north, the doubt and ambiguity as to relative rank, and position, and the overstrained efforts to be thought genteel, make the stranger feel that he is in the presence of persons new to the sphere of polished society, and labouring under an excessive anxiety about the opinion of others, which makes them a burthen to themselves.

There is inconsistency, more apparent perhaps than real, in the account which Mr. Buckingham gives of the character, manners, and attainments of the gentlemen of the South and the North; the former, under a thin crust, or exterior lackering of politeness, being in many other parts of the work described as irascible, arrogant, vindictive, and, in short, exactly such men as the masters of slaves, educated among slaves, must become, in spite of every countervailing influence. The complaint made by British travellers of the lax discipline of the North in the training of children and young people, appears to be still more applicable to the South; where the boys affect the bravo, carry bowie-knives, and sometimes marry at fourteen.

After visiting Augusta, the Tourists proceeded into the interior of Georgia, and passed through Alabama on their route to New Orleans. This journey, generally made in the wretched stage or mail-coaches of the South, abounds in interest and entertainment; though the complaints of disorder, filth, bad or scanty accommodation, horrid roads and miserable fare, become somewhat tiresome from their continual reiteration, not only here, but in the subsequent rambles in the Alleghanies. No doubt these privations must have been very distressing at the moment; but English travellers ought to remember that they cannot carry all "the comforts of the Saut Market at their tails," over the "corduroy roads," and into the Backwoods; and so make up their minds to two-pronged iron forks, coarse crockery, brass and tin candlesticks, and even worse afflictions, which the Americans bear with perfect good-humour. A taste of these minor calamities of life may even be amusing; and they become in this narrative piquant to the malicious, from the amount of ludicrous distress so gravely and so often and solemnly described. At Sparta—no country in the world equal to Yankeeland for classic names—the Travellers going by the stage to Macon, stopped to dine; but alas! for the squeamish stomachs of people from the Old Country—

* Two thick volumes, 8vo. With numerous plates. Fisher & Son.

The sight of the public table prepared for the passengers, was so revolting, that, hungry as we were after our long and cold ride, early rising, and violent motion, we turned away in disgust from the table, and made our dinner in the coach on hard biscuits. There were three lines of coaches on this road, all leaving at the same hour, and arriving at the same time—the Mail line, the Telegraph line, and the People's line. The passengers from each of these took their seats at the table, and many of them appeared to dine as heartily as if they saw nothing unusual in the fare. But the dirty state of the room in which the table was laid, the filthy condition of the table-cloth, the coarse and broken plates, rusty knives and forks, and large junks of boiled pork, and various messes of corn and rancid butter, added to the coarse and vulgar appearance and manners of most of the guests, made the whole scene the most revolting we had yet witnessed in the country. . . . . .

We left Sparta at three o'clock; and after a cold, dreary, and tedious drive through thick woods and over broken roads, we reached Milledgeville about eight, having been assured before setting out that we should reach there at three. As this is the legislative capital of the State of Georgia, we had hoped to find a good hôtel here at least, as the legislatorial body consists of nearly 400 members, and these all reside here during the few months that the two houses are assembled in annual session. But our hopes were not realized. The inn at which the coach stopped was a wretched one; and though all we desired to have was a cup of tea and some cold meat for our party, we had the greatest difficulty in getting either. . . . . The tea was tardily and reluctantly prepared for us in a bed-room; and it may give some idea of the rudeness with which this was done, to say, that the dirty negress who made the tea, brought the stinted quantity required in the hollow of her hand, without any other receptacle for it—that the milk was placed on the table in a broken tea-cup, milk-cups not being in use—and that when a slop-basin was asked for, the thing was unknown, and a large salad-bowl was brought for that purpose.
